

BIOGRAPHIA
BRITANNICA.

VOLUME THE SIXTH;

PART I.

A Character of this Work, by GILBERT WEST, Esq; at the Conclusion of his Poem on EDUCATION, in a Note on the Words Great Lives explain.

I CANNOT forbear taking occasion from these words, to make my acknowledgments to the writers of Biographia Britannica, for the pleasure and profit I have lately received from perusing the two first volumes of that useful and entertaining work, of which the monumental structure abovementioned, decorated with the statues of great and good men, is no improper emblem. This work, which contains The Lives of the most eminent Persons who have flourished in Great Britain and Ireland, from the earliest Ages, down to the present Time, appears to me, as far as it has hitherto gone, to be executed with great spirit, accuracy, and judgment; and deserves, in my opinion, to be encouraged by all, who have at heart the honour of their country, and that of their particular families and friends; and who can any ways assist the ingenious and laborious authors, to render as perfect as possible, a design so apparently calculated to serve the Public, by setting in the truest and fullest light, the characters of persons already generally, though perhaps too indistinctly, known; and reviving from obscurity and oblivion, examples of private and retired merit; which, though less glaring and ostentatious than the former, are not, however, of a less extensive, or less beneficial influence, to those, who may happen not to have seen this repository of British glory. I cannot give a better idea of it, than in the following lines of Virgil:

Hic manus ob Patriam pugnando vulnera passi;
 Quique Sacerdotes casti, dum vita manebat;
 Quique pii Vates & Phæbo digna locuti;
 Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes;
 Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo.

VIRG. ÆN. Lib. vi. ver. 660.

Here Patriots live, who for their Country's good,
 In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
 Priests of unblemish'd lives here make abode,
 And Poets worthy their aspiring God:
 And searching Wits of more mechanic parts,
 Who grac'd their age with new invented arts;
 Those who to worth their bounty did extend,
 And those who knew that bounty to commend.

DRYDEN'S Transl.

Biographia Britannica :

OR, THE

L I V E S

OF THE

Most eminent PERSONS

Who have flourished in

G R E A T B R I T A I N

A N D

I R E L A N D,

From the earliest Ages, down to the present Times;

Collected from the best Authorities, both Printed and Manuscript,

And digested in the Manner of

Mr BAYLE's HISTORICAL and CRITICAL

D I C T I O N A R Y.

V O L U M E T H E S I X T H ; P A R T I.

L O N D O N:

Printed for J. WALTHOE, T. OSBORNE, H. WHITRIDGE, C. HITCH and L. HAWES, R. MANNY, J. and R. TONSON, H. WOODFALL, J. RIVINGTON, C. BATHURST, L. DAVIS and C. REYMERS, R. BALDWIN, W. JOHNSTON, G. KEITH, J. RICHARDSON, T. LONGMAN, B. LAW and Co. G. KEARSLEY, and J. HINXMAN.

MDCCLXIII.

2264

ADAMS 122.4
v. 6 Pt. 11

CORRIGENDA.

In page 3604, dele rem. [B], the sons of Baronets not being allowed to wear a nobleman's gown—In p. 3665, rem. [PP], col. (2), l. 17, instead of the word Kent read Stanford in Berkshire—In p. 3906, line 6 of the text, for Sir Clement Knight read Sir Clement Wearg, Knt—Item in p. 3907, rem. [E], col. (2), l. 16, instead of the words every line written by Mr Pope was verified, read every line written by Mr Pope upon Lord Bathurst was verified.

T H E
L I V E S
O F T H E

Most eminent P E R S O N S

Who have flourished in

GREAT-BRITAIN, and IRELAND,

From the earliest Ages, down to the present Times.

S.

SCOTT [JOHN], an excellent rational Divine, and one of our best and most pious English Writers, in the XVIIth century, was the son of Thomas Scott, a grazier, and born at Chipenham in Wiltshire (a), in the year 1638 [A]. Not being at first designed for a scholar, he served about three years in London as an apprentice; but it being against his inclination, which was rather bent upon piety and learning, he left his trade and went to Oxford, where he was admitted a Commoner of New-Inn, in 1657, under the tuition of Mr Christopher Lee. Having made a great proficiency in Logic and Philosophy, he quitted the university without a degree, and entering into Holy Orders, resorted to London, where he became an eminent and admired Preacher. His first Preferments were the Chaplainship of St Thomas Southwark (b), and the perpetual Curacy of Trinity in the Minories (c). But, on the first of February 1677, he was instituted to the Rectory of St Peter's-Poor in Broadstreet, to which he was presented by the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's (d). He was also Lecturer of one of the churches in Lombard-street (e). In 1681, he published the First Part of his most excellent work, intituled The Christian Life [B]; and dedicated it to Bishop Compton: by whom

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 921.

(b) Wood, ibid.

(c) Newcourt Repertar. Vol. I. p. 920.

(d) Newcourt, Vol. I. p. 529.

(e) Wood Ath. as above.

[A] In the year 1638] Ant. Wood says, that in 1657, when he came to Oxford, he was about nineteen years age (1). And consequently he was born in the year 1638, or perhaps in the beginning of the year 1639.

[B] In 1681, he published the First Part of his most excellent work, intituled The Christian Life.] The whole title is, 'The Christian Life, Part I. from its beginning to its consummation in Glory; Together with the several Means and Instruments of Christianity conducing thereunto; With Directions for private Devotion, and Forms of Prayer, fitted to the several States of Christians.' London, 8vo In this very sensible and rational Discourse, he shews, 1. That the peculiar and ultimate End of the Christian Life, is Heaven. 2. That the way of obtaining heavenly Happiness, is by using the Means conducing thereunto: of which means there are two sorts, namely, The Practice of the Heavenly Virtues, in the perfection whereof consists the state of Heaven; and the other the Practice of certain Instrumental Duties. The former being the proximate Means, and the latter the more remote Means. 3. The Heavenly Part of the Christian Life, or the Proximate Means, he divides into Humane, Divine, and Social Virtues. The Humane Virtues, are Prudence, Moderation, Fortitude, Temperance, Humility: The Divine Virtues, are, Contemplation of God's nature, Adoration of his Perfections, Love, Imitation, Resignation, Trust and Dependance: And the Social Virtues, Charity, Justice, Peaceableness, Modesty, and Courtesie. 4. The Instrumental Duties he subdivides into Initial, Progressive, and Perfective. The Initial, are, Faith, Consideration, a deep and thorough Conviction of our need of a Mediator, sorrow shame and remorse for our past Iniquities, earnest Prayer for divine Assistance, and a serious and solemn Resolution of Amendment, &c.—The rest we shall not mention, as the book is very common, and indeed ought to be more common, by being in every pious Christian's hands.—In 1685, he published Part II. 'Wherein the Fundamental Principles of Christian Duty are assigned, explained, and proved.' This is also dedicated to Bishop Compton, and our author expresses the grateful sense he had, and should always retain, of the personal Obligations he had laid upon him (2). In this volume, no ways inferior to the former, he treats of these important points. Of the nature of Moral Goodness, which

(2) Namely, in giving him the Prebend. Dedicat. p. 2.

(1) Ath. ut supra.

whom he was collated March 14, 1684, to the Prebend of Bromesbury in the church of St Paul (f). July 9, 1685, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity, having taken no degree before (g). He bore his part in the Popish Controversy, during King James the Second's reign [C]. And published twelve Sermons, preached upon several occasions, between the years 1673 and 1692 [D]. Being grown very eminent for his piety, learning, and most improving way of preaching, he was presented by the Crown to the then very considerable living of St Giles's in the Fields (h); and had institution thereto August 7, 1691 (i). We are told, that he also was offered, and refused, first the Bishopric of Chester, because he could not take the oath of homage, and afterwards another Bishopric, as also the Deanry of Worcester, and a Prebend of Windsor (k) [E]. At length, through too close an application to his studies and the duties of his function, falling into a bad state of health, he dyed March the 10th. 1694-5, leaving behind him the character of a good and learned man, an excellent preacher, and one who had done infinite service to the world by his preaching and writings. The 15th of the said month, he was buried in the Rector's vault under part of his church of St Giles's (l). Besides his other works already mentioned, he wrote some of the Cases to recover Dissenters to the Communion of the Church of England [F]: and a Preface to Mr John March's Sermons

(f) Newcourt, Vol. 1. p. 119.

(g) Wood, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 227.

(h) Vacant by the promotion of Dr John Sharp to the Archbishopric of York.

(i) Newcourt, as above, p. 613.

(k) Some Discourses upon Dr Burnet and Dr Tillotson, supposed to be written by Dr Hickey. A marginal note in the Preface. That Preface is not paged.

(l) Wood, as above, col. 922.

which is essentially and immutably such, and of perpetual obligation. That Moral Good is the main of Religion. Of the causes and folly of Atheism. Of divine Providence, and a Future State. Of the necessity of having right Apprehensions of God, &c.——He published, in 1686, Vol. second of this III Part; 'Wherein that Fundamental Principle of Christian Duty, the Doctrine of our Saviour's Mediation, is explained and proved.' Wherein he also treats of the Nature of Christ's Kingdom, and of its Ministers; and of Christ's regal acts; and concludes with proving That Jesus Christ is this Mediator, of whom he had been treating.——Some materials he had prepared for a continuation and completion of this most useful work, which Sickness hindered him from accomplishing. But what was found among his papers, upon that subject, came out in the following order.—'The Christian Life, Part III. wherein the Great Duties of Justice, Mercy, and Mortification are fully explained and enforced.' Published in 1697, by J. Gale.——And Part IV, or Vol. V. and last, by Humphrey Zouch, in 1699, 8vo. containing four Discourses; viz. The Worth and Excellency of the Soul: The Divinity and Incarnation of our Saviour: The Authority of the Holy Scripture: A Dissuasive from Apostacy.'——Mr J. Gale, in his dedication of the III Part, informs us, that it was 'the Author's design to proceed to a particular explication of the several respective Duties which Men are obliged to render to God, their Neighbours, and Themselves; and for a conclusion of all he proposed a distinct Treatise of Ecclesiastical Duties.'——One favorite, and indeed very just, Notion he hath in this work; which is, 'That the main of Heaven consists not so much in any outward possession, as in an inward state and temper (3).—So that, 'should not God by an immediate Vengeance precipitate wicked Souls into hell, yet their own Wickedness, by the mighty weight of its own nature, would inevitably press and sink them down into that miserable condition. What egregious nonsense therefore is it, for wicked men to talk of going to heaven? Alas! poor creatures what would you do there? There are no wanton Amours among those heavenly Lovers; no rivers of Wine among their rivers of pleasure to gratifie your unbounded sensuality; no parasites to flatter your lofty Pride; no miseries to feed your meagre Envy; no mischiefs to tickle your devillish Revenge; nothing but chaste and divine, pure and spiritual Enjoyments, such as your brutish and devilish Appetites will eternally loath and nauseate. Wherefore if we mean to go to heaven, and to be happy there, we must now endeavour to dispose and attemper our minds to it; which is no other way to be done, but by leading a heavenly Life and Conversation. (4).—The Christian Life hath been printed several times in 8vo. and once in folio.

[C] He bore his part in the Popish controversy during King James the Second's reign.] At that time, he wrote,—'Examination of Bellarmine's eighth Note, concerning Sanctity of Doctrine.'——And, 'The Texts examined, which Papiests cite out of the Bible concerning Prayer in an unknown Tongue.' They were printed in October 1688, 4to (5).

[D] And published twelve Sermons, preached upon several occasions.] They were published in the following order. 1. Sermon preached before the Military Company at St Clement's Danes, 25 July 1673. on Ephes. vi. 11. Lond. 1674. 4to. 2. Sermon before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen at Guildhall-chapel on the 5th of Nov. 1673. on Luke ix. 56. Lond. 1674. 4to. 3. Sermon preached before the Artillery Company of London 15 Septemb. 1680. at St Mary-le-Bow. Lond. 1680. 4to. 4. Sermon preached at the funeral of Dr Will. Crown 23 Oct. 1684. in St Mildred's church in the Poultry, on Matth. xxv. 46. Lond. 1685. 4to. This Dr Crown was a very learned Physician, author of the excellent Observations de Ovo, and of the Theory of Muscular Motion (6). 5. Sermon before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen at Guildhall-chapel 16 Dec. 1684. on Prov. xxiv. 21. Lond. 1685. 4to. 6. Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London at St Mary le Bow 26 July 1685, being the day of public Thanksgiving for his Majesty's late Victory over the Rebels, on 2 Sam. xviii. 28. Lond. 1685. 4to. 7. Sermon preached at the Assizes at Chelmsford in Essex 31 Aug. 1685, before Sir Thomas Street, Knt. one of the Judges of the Common Pleas, on Rom. xiii. 1. Lond. 1685. 4to. 8. Sermon before the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at the church of St Mary-le Bow, 2 Septemb. 1686, being the anniversary Fast for the dreadful Fire in the year 1666, on John v. 14. Lond. 1686. 4to. 9. Sermon preached at the Funeral of Sir John Buckworth in the Parish church of St Peter's le Poor in Broad-street 29 Dec. 1687. on Eccles. xi. 8. Lond. 1688. 4to. 10. Sermon preached at the funeral of Sir John Chapman late Lord Mayor of London, at St Lawrence's church, 27 March 1689, on Eccles. viii. 1. Lond. 1689, 4to. 11. Sermon preached at Fulham 13 Oct. 1689, at the consecration of Edward Bishop of Worcester, Symon Bishop of Chichester, and Gilbert Bishop of Bristol, on Jer. iii. 15. Lond. 1689. 4to. 12. Sermon preached before the Queen 22 May 1692, upon occasion of the late Victory obtained by their Majesties Fleet over the French, on Psaln l. 14. Lond. 1692. 4to.

[E] And a Prebend of Windsor.] Ant Wood is therefore mistaken, when he says, that Dr Scott 'became Canon of Windsor in the place of Dr John Fitz-Williams a Nonjuror in April 1691 (7).' For it was John Hartcliffe who obtained that Prebend, upon the deprivation of John Fitz-Williams (8). The editor of the second volume of our author's Practical Discourses, informs us, that the Earl of Nottingham 'procured for him a little Recess from the Toil and Labours of his weighty Employment (9).' But doth not say how.

[F] He wrote some of the Cases to recover Dissenters to the Communion of the Church of England.] Namely, 'Certain Cases of Conscience resolved, concerning the Lawfulness of joining with Forms of Prayer in public Worship.' Part i. Lond. 1683. in seven sheets and a half in 4to. The second Part was printed the same year in eight sheets 4to and both inserted in the second volume of, A Collection of Cases and other Discourses lately written to recover Dissenters to the Communion

(6) Published in the Philosophical Transactions, and in Mr R. Hook's Philosophical Collections, No. 2.

(3) Christian Life, Part I. edit. 1690. 8vo. p. 21.

(4) In the same Part, p. 190.

(5) Wood Ath. col. 922.

(7) Ath. Vol. II. col. 921.

(8) See Le Neve's Fasti, &c. p. 387.

(9) Dedication to that Volume, p. 2.

Sermons published in 1693 [G]. Two Volumes of his Practical Discourses upon several Subjects, were printed after his decease [H] His Character, as drawn up by Dr Isham at the end of his funeral Sermon [I], is given below. Bishop Burnet ranks him, among those worthy and eminent Clergymen in this nation, who 'deserved a high character; and were indeed an honour, both to the Church, and to the Age in which they lived (m).

(m) Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 90, 91.

munion of the Church of England. Lond. 1685. 2 vols 4to. reprinted afterwards in one volume in folio, and 3 volumes 8vo.

[G] And a Preface to Mr John March's Sermons published in 1693] This Mr March was Vicar of Newcastle upon Tyne, a learned Divine, and eminent Preacher. He died in 1692 (10).

[H] Two volumes of his Practical Discourses upon several subjects, were printed after his decease.] The first volume was published in 1697. 8vo. without the editor's name. But the dedication to the second volume is subscribed by Humphrey Zouch. This second volume is particularly intitled, 'Practical Discourses concerning Obedience, and the Love of God.' Lond. 1698. 8vo

[I] His Character, as drawn up by Dr Isham at the end of his funeral Sermon, &c.] 'I shall, says the Doctor (11), briefly consider him in these two heads; his Private Virtues, and his Services for the Church. He had many Virtues of no ordinary growth: and we may call them to mind, by reviewing his much applauded work of the Christian Life: Which he intended to continue, and perfect, if Providence had not put a stop to his useful design, first by a long Craziness, and then by taking him suddenly from us. Next to his Piety towards God, his Social Virtues (as his own distinction is) were those for which we shall be most sensible of our loss in him; for his Kindness, and Humanity, and amicable Disposition, and Affability, and pleasantness of Temper, and Condescension, and Sincerity, and readiness to do all good Offices for any that had recourse to him. In helping others, and laying out for their advantage the Authority which he had gained; in giving counsel, and directions; and in cementing Amity and Peace, he exhausted very much of his time; and delighted as much in doing any friendly turn, as if the profit had redounded to himself. In works of Mercy he took a peculiar Pleasure; and did as zealously promote them, as if he had relieved himself by supporting the Poor: he was a common Father to the persecuted and afflicted; and the Brethren, and Strangers, whose bowels he hath refreshed, will bear witness of his Charity before the Church. Friendship is one of the noblest ornaments of human nature; and if God himself is Love, 'tis the portraiture of God drawn upon the Soul: and for this Virtue he was exceedingly valued by those that were intimate with him; he was not infected with any of those Vices which blast it, with Pride or Moroseness, or Envy, or Selfishness; his inclinations were to refresh and cherish all men, and only to neglect himself: his doors, and his heart were open to all; and he hath left behind him the indelible commendation of a true, and steadfast, and faithful Friend.

'Again, let us look upon him in his Publick Character; and if they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever; we may be humbly confident of his having a proportionable reward. His Education happened to be in the times of Confusion, and yet without any detriment to him: for he imbibed the principles of that renowned University in which he was bred, and not of the Men who then governed it; the same good Spirit, that called him thither from another Employment, directing him what to do; and when the Church was covered in Ruins, he discerned her beauty; and received holy orders from one of those ejected Confessors, who during the devastation did secretly preserve the Apostolical discipline. His appearance in the world was early; and as God had furnished him with extraordinary talents, and had enabled him to improve them well, and to possess abilities equal to his high profession; the same divine Goodness chose a fitting theatre for them to be manifested upon. His eloquent, and solid, and fervent Preaching, commanded the applauses of men; and his constancy in it procured their love: and though his frequency in this work, and his diligence in his pastoral charge, and his industry in resolving Cases of Conscience, and his restless application to the labours of his calling, wasted him by degrees; yet he could not be satisfied without doing his duty: and that which sent him the sooner to God, will enlarge his recompence from him. He ran his course in times of great trial, and discrimination; and in all of them he approved his inflexible, and uncorrupted integrity; and adhered stedfastly to the Principles of our Church.——When Popery invaded our established Religion, he was one of those worthy Champions that defended it with an upright zeal; they held up their shields together, and united their counsels and endeavours as one man: they saw their Diocesan (whom they mightily honoured) singled out for the first sacrifice, because he would not surrender them; they saw the Roman Eagle advancing every day, and fresh attempts made to demolish our Church; and then it was that by preaching, and praying, and writing, they gained an universal esteem, and supported our holy religion. In this Cause our Friend whom we are waiting upon did cordially concur with his Brethren; and was prepared to suffer as much as any of them. He understood our Constitution entirely, and that made him the more hearty in asserting it upon all occasions.——Therefore, he did upon all emergencies maintain an unspotted fidelity to the Church; and acted consonantly to what he had professed concerning it, in these words: Whatever her fate may be, I am chained to her fortunes by my Reason, and Conscience; and shall ever esteem it more eligible to be crushed in pieces by her fall, which God avert, than to flourish, and triumph on her ruins (12). This resolution he kept to the last, and still with a peaceful, and charitable spirit; and without aiming at his own interest through that of the Church: for when offers were made to him of higher Stations in the Church, he declined them upon the sense of decays creeping upon him; and he rejoiced more in the advancement of other worthy men, than he would have done in his own. His inherent Greatness wanted no outward accessions; and the Preferment he was ambitious of, was to go from his flock unto the Shepherd and Bishop of our Souls.' C

SEDLEY [Sir CHARLES], Bart. one of the gay wits that enlivened the pleasurable Court of King Charles the Second, was grandson of Sir William Sedley, Bart. the munificent founder of the Sedleian lecture of Natural Philosophy at Oxford (a), and son of Sir John Sedley of Aylesford in Kent, Bart. by his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Henry Savile, Knt. [A], the learned Warden of Merton-college in Oxford, and Provost

(a) See Sir H. Savile's article. The salary of the lecture is now reckoned to be 200 l. a year. Dr Edward Lapworth of Magdalen college, who accumulated his degrees in Physic in 1611, was the first Professor. Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 189.

[A] By his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir to Sir Henry Savile. We have the following particular concerning this lady, from that indefatigable collector of private memoirs Mr Wood. Who tells us, he had been credibly informed, that Sir A. Weldon, author of the Court and Character of King James, did, at the beginning of the Long Parliament, communicate the manuscript of it to the lady Elizabeth Sedley, (mother to Sir William and Sir Charles) accounted a very sober and prudent woman; who, after perusal, did lay the vileness of it so much to Sir Anthony's door, that he was resolved never to make it public; which, perhaps, continues

(10) See Wood Ath. Vol. II. col. 896, 897.

(11) Funeral Sermon, p. 21, &c.

(12) Dedicat. of 1st Part of the Christian Life.

Provost of Eton. Sir Charles was born probably at Aylesford, about the year 1639; and, after a proper foundation of Grammar learning, was sent to Oxford, where he was admitted a Fellow-Commoner [B] of Wadham-college, in Lent term, 1655-6. But he left the university without taking any degree, and retiring into his own country, lived privately there; out of humour, as it should seem, with the governing powers, 'till the restoration of King Charles the Second: when he came to London (b), in order to join in the general jubilee, the gaiety of which was both agreeable to his years, and exactly suitable to his taste and temper. He was soon introduced to the King, and it was not long before they who recommended him to his Majesty, found they had thereby in some measure supplanted themselves (c). Sir Charles had such a distinguishingly polite easiness in his manner and conversation, as set him higher in the royal notice and favour, than any of the courtiers his rivals, notwithstanding they all aimed at the same turn, and some of them even excelled in it. In the view of heightening their pleasures, our author, among the rest, did not neglect to exert his talents in writing. The productions of his pen were some plays, and several delicately tender amorous poems (d); in which, the softness of the verses was so exquisite, as to be called by the Duke of Buckingham Sedley's Witchcraft. There were no marks of genius or true poetry to be descried; the art wholly consisted in raising loose thoughts and lewd desires without giving any alarm, and so the poison worked gently and irresistibly [C]. Our author, we may be sure, did not escape the infection of his own art, or rather was first tainted himself, before he spread the infection to others. Dissoluteness and debauchery were the scandalous characteristic of the times; and Sir Charles ambitioned to distinguish himself for being most extravagantly in the fashion. He was confessedly the hero of the frolic with Lord Buckhurst and Sir Thomas Ogle, in 1603, at a tavern in Bow-street Covent-garden (e), and as such was fined heavier than his comrades, being sentenced to pay five hundred pounds to his Majesty; and to go completely through the part he had begun, he gave the Judge himself some highly indecent language (f); who thereupon asking him, if he had ever read a book called the Compleat Gentleman, he replied, that he had read more books than his Lordship. However, some time before the day appointed for payment, Sir Charles desired Mr Henry Killigrew *, and another gentleman, to apply to his Majesty to have the fine remitted; which, 'tis said, they promised, but instead of supplicating in their friend's behalf, they begged the money for themselves, and did not abate him a single farthing. By such ways as these, Sir Charles found his estate much hurt; yet did he not seek to repair it by asking favours of his Majesty, the usual resource of favourite courtiers. He is said, indeed, to have received some marks of the King's bounty (g). But the temper of that Prince is well known; he knew not how to deny an importunate craver, though he hated his forwardness; neither could he remember, to any good purpose, the silent indigence of his friend, though he applauded the modesty of it. After the lastmentioned affair, Sir Charles took a more serious turn, applied himself to business, and was chosen a Recruiter † of the Long Parliament in this reign, to serve for New Romney in Kent. He sat likewise in the three succeeding Parliaments of the same reign, and was a frequent speaker in them. We find him also in the House of Commons in the succeeding reign of King James the Second, whose attempts upon the constitution he vigorously withstood. When the defeat of the rebels in the West, under the Duke of Monmouth, made it necessary, in the language of the Court, to have a standing army, it was opposed strongly by the Country Party in the Parliament, among whom were the Earl of Dorset and Sir Charles Sedley; one of which bore a great sway in the House of Peers, and the other in that of the Commons. Their interest was so great in both, especially Sir Charles Sedley's, that the King, foreseeing it would be a work of the greatest difficulty, to gain their consent for the payment of more troops than what were upon the establishment of the last reign, contented himself with dropping the pursuit of it, by a dissolution of the Parliament (h). In the same spirit, our patriot was very active in bringing on the Revolution. This was thought more extraordinary, as he had received favours from King James: But that Prince had taken a fancy to Sir Charles's daughter (tho' it seems she was not very handsome || [D]); and, in consequence

(b) Memoirs of Charles Montague, late Earl of Halifax, p. 7. edit. 1716, 8vo.

|| King James was remarkable for his choice of mistresses in that respect. General History of England.

of

continues our Antiquary, is the reason why a certain writer should say*, that with some regret of what he had maliciously written, he did intend it for the fire, and died repentant, though since stolen to the press out of a lady's closet. And if this be true, our exceptions may willingly fall upon the publisher of the said libel, who, by his additions, may abuse us with a false story; and therefore in some manner gives us occasion to spare our censure on Sir Anthony, who was dead some time before the said libel was published. The second edition of it, printed at London, in 8vo. 1651, is dedicated to the said noble lady, Elizabeth Sedley (1).

[B] He was admitted a Fellow-Commoner. Was he then only a younger son, and his elder brother, Sir William †, still living? Otherwise, as the eldest son of a Baronet, he would have had a right to be admitted a Nobleman, inferioris ordinis, by Archbishop Laud's statutes: but, indeed, those statutes were little regarded at this time.

[C] The poison worked gently and irresistibly] We have a most picturesque description of it in the following lines, by Wilmot Earl of Rochester.

Sedley has that prevailing, gentle, art,
That can, with a resistless charm, impart,
The loosest wishes to the chafest heart;
Raise such a conflict, kindle such a fire,
Betwixt declining virtue and desire,
That the poor vanquish'd maid dissolves away,
In dreams all night, in sighs and tears all day (2).

[D] She was not very handsome. She is satirised by the Earl of Dorset, that best natured man with the worst natured muse, in the following lines; which, bitter as they are, intimate, however, that she had been once, at least, mistress of a good face.

(2) Imitation of the 10th satire of the first book of Horace, among Rochester's Poems.

To

(b) 1d. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1099.

(c) He has been compared in this respect to Cardinal Richlieu, but with this difference in his favour, that he was never ungrateful.

(d) See his Works, in two volumes 8vo.

(e) See the Article of Charles Sackville, Earl of Dorset.

(f) Mr Wood, from whom we have the account of this frolic, tells us, Sir Charles's words were, that he thought he was the first man that ever payed for th—g. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1100.

* Almoner to the Duke of York, and author of The Conspiracy, a tragedy, besides several sermons; father also of Mrs Anne Killigrew, and brother to Will. and Tho. Killigrew, all of them distinguished wits and poets, and Court-favourites in these times. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1035, 1036, 1080, 1081, 1082; and Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. III.

(g) See the preface to the second volume of his Works.

† That is, he was chosen to fill up a vacancy, which happened during the course of that Parliament, after it's first meeting in 1661.

* W. Saunderson, in the poem to his Reign of King James I. Lond. 1655, fol.

(1) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 729.

† So he is called in the preceding remark.

of his intrigues with her, he created Miss Sedley Countess of Dorchester [E]. This honour, so far from pleasing, greatly shocked Sir Charles; however libertine as himself had been, yet he could not bear the thoughts of his daughter's dishonour; and, with regard to this her exaltation, he only considered it as rendering her more conspicuously infamous. He therefore conceived a hatred for King James, and readily joined to dispossess him of the throne [F]. Sir Charles lived many years after the Revolution in full possession of his wit and humour, and was an agreeable companion to his death; which seems not to have happened before he had arrived to a good old age, and perhaps not much before the year 1722 (i); when his Works were published, in two volumes, 8vo. with a preface to the second volume, by Mr Ayloffe, a relation of the author's, who speaks with pleasure of the happiness he had enjoyed in Sir Charles's company, during the then long interval of peace. We shall give some account of his Works below [G]; which, however censured, it is certain the author was, in Charles the Second's time, the oracle of the poets; and it was by his judgment every performance was approved or condemned: which made the King jestingly tell him, that Nature had given him a patent to be Apollo's Viceroy [H]. He was also a good friend to his brother poets (k).

(i) However, the story, that he lived to the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, and died at an age near ninety, in Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. III. suggests at least a great incon- sistency.

(l) Among others, he was particularly instrumental in bringing Charles Montagu, afterwards Earl of Halifax, into the notice of the world. That Earl's Memoirs, ubi supra.

To the Countess of Dorchester, mistress to King James II.

Tell me, Borinda, why so gay,
Why such embroidery, fringe, and lace;
Can any dresses find a way,
To stop the approaches of decay,
And mend a ruin'd face.

Wilt thou still sparkle in the box,
Still ogle in the ring,
Can'st thou forget thy age and pox;
Can all that shines, in shells and rocks,
Make thee a fine young thing.

So have I seen, in larder dark,
Of veal a lucid loin,
Replete with many a brilliant spark,
As wise philosophers remark,
At once both sink and shine (3).

(3) Collection of the Works of the Minor Poets, p. 199. Vol. I. edit. 1750.

(4) It is remarkable, that his Lordship is severe upon the Oxford antiquary for this very quality. So true it is, that two of a trade can never agree.

(5) She had a daughter by his Majesty, an account of whom see in Sheffield's Duke of Buckingham's article.

[E] She was created Countess of Dorchester. Bishop Burnet, another dealer, like Wood, in secret history (4), introduces an account of this creation in the following story. An accident happened, says he, at this time, that gave the Queen great offence, and put the King [James] much out of countenance. The King continued to go still to Mrs Sedley, and she gained so much on him, that at last she prevailed to be made Countess of Dorchester (5). As soon as the Queen heard of this, she gave orders to bring all the priests, that were admitted into a particular confidence, into her closet; and when she had them all about her, she sent to desire the King to come and speak to her. When he came, he was surprized to see such a company about her, but much more when they fell all on their knees before him, and the Queen break out into bitter mourning for this new honour, which they expected would be followed with the setting her up openly as mistress. The Queen was then in an ill habit of body, and had an illness, that, as was thought, would end in a consumption; and it was believed, that her illness was of such a nature, that it gave a very melancholy presage, that if she should live, she could have no children; the priests assured the King, that such a blemish in his life blasted their designs, and the more it appeared, and the longer it was continued, the more ineffectual all their endeavours would prove. The King was much moved with this, and was out of countenance for what he had done; but to quiet them all, he promised them that he would see the lady no more, and pretended that he gave her this title in order to the breaking with her more decently; and when the Queen did not seem to believe this, he promised that he would send her to Ireland, which was done accordingly; but after a stay for some months, she came over again, and the ill commerce was still continued (6). The priests, continues the Right Reverend Historian, no doubt were the more apprehensive of this, because she was bold and lively, and was always treating them, and their proceedings, with great contempt. After King James's abdication, she married the Earl of Portmore (7).

(6) Burnet's History of his own Times, p. 632, 683. Vol. I. fol. edition.

(7) Warburton's notes to the character of her daughter, in Pope's Letters.

[F] He joined to dispossess King James of the Throne Being asked one day, why he appeared so warm against the King, who had created his daughter a Countess; he replied, it is from a principle of gratitude; for, since his Majesty has made my daughter a Countess, it is fit I should do all I can to make his daughter a Queen (8).

(8) Gen. Hist. of England,

[G] Some account of his works. These are, besides his poems and speeches in Parliament, which have been already mentioned, the following plays. 1. The Mulberry-Garden, a comedy, acted by his Majesty's servants, at the theatre royal, 1668; dedicated to the Dutchess of Richmond and Lenox. 2. Anthony and Cleopatra, a tragedy, acted at the Duke of York's theatre, 1667. This met with great applause. The story is taken from Plutarch's life of Anthony. 3. Bellamira: or, The Mistress, a comedy, acted by his Majesty's servants, 1687. It is taken from Terence's Eunuch. While this play was acting, the roof of the playhouse fell down, but very few were hurt, besides the author, whose merry friend, Sir Fleetwood Shepherd, told him, there was so much fire in the play, that it blew up the Poet, house, and all: Sir Charles answered, No; the play is so heavy, it brought down the house, and buried the Poet in his own rubbish. 4. Beauty the Conqueror: or, The Death of Mark Anthony, a tragedy. To him are also ascribed, 5. The Grumbler, a comedy of three acts; scene, Paris. And 6. The Tyrant King of Crete, a tragedy; both of them first printed with his works, in two volumes 8vo. 1722.

[H] Nature had given him a patent to be Apollo's viceroy. Lord Rochester bears testimony to this, when he puts him foremost among the Judges of Poetry.

I loath the rabble, 'tis enough for me,
If Sedley, Shadwell, Shepherd, Wycherly,
Godolphin, Butler, Buckhurst, Buckingham,
And some few more, whom I omit to name;
Approve my sense, I count their censure same.

P

SELDEN [JOHN], the famed Antiquarian, was born December 16, 1584, at a small village called Salvinton, near Tering, a sea-port town in Sussex; where his ancestors, though not above the common rank, had lived for some time in good repute [A]. He was

(1) Mr Wood tells us he was a Pebeian, but excellently skilled in Music, and obtained his wife thereby. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 179.

[A] A family of common rank In our author's epitaph wrote by himself, he observes that his father John Selden (1), son of Thomas Selden, was born in 1561; that he married Margaret, only daughter and heir of

Thomas Baker of Rushington, descended from the equestrian family of that name in Kent; that from this match there issued besides himself the eldest, two other sons George and Henry, who both died in the cradle, was first put to the free-school at Chichester, and gave a remarkable specimen of his genius at ten years of age [B]; and at fourteen, the schoolmaster (a) seeing him fit for the university, recommended him to his brother Mr Anthony Barker, Fellow of New-college in Oxford, who had him admitted of Hart-hall [C] in 1598 (b). He went through his academical studies with unusual eagerness, absolutely mastering every difficulty that occurred to him in any of the sciences. He continued at the university four years; after which, fixing his choice upon the Law for his profession (c), he removed to Clifford's-Inn in 1602 (d); where, having instructed himself in the ordinary forms and practice of the Courts, he was admitted Socius of the Inner Temple in May 1604: but being persuaded that his talents did not suit for making a figure at the Bar, he resolved to pursue the bent of his inclinations, and employed himself in searching into the origin of the Law in all its branches. This plan he pursued with indefatigable diligence and extraordinary success. The first fruits of his studies was, A Treatise of the Civil Government of our Island, before the coming in of the Normans, which he drew up in 1606. This being done at the age of two and twenty, when the manuscript was shewn to some persons versed in this kind of antiquities, it was much applauded (e), and esteemed an extraordinary performance for his years [D]. Continuing to push his researches the same way, he soon became acquainted with the most eminent in it [E], and published in a few years several other tracts relating to the same subject [F], and, in 1614, enriched the learned world with his incomparable piece upon the Titles of Honour [G]. This was followed by

(a) Mr Hugh Barker of New-college. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 179.

(b) Life of Selden, prefixed to his Works in fol. 1726. Mr Wood fixes his admission in the year 1600.

(c) See his epitaph below, in remark [].

(d) Wilkins, in his Life, as before, who says he was four years at Oxford.

(e) Consult his preface to his Diis Syris.

cradle, and an only daughter, afterwards married to John Bernard of Goring in Suffex, to whom she brought two boys and four girls, nephews and nieces to our author, who by his last Will bequeathed a hundred pounds to each of them.

[B] Specimen of his genius.] This was a smart epigram contained in a Latin distich, which was wrote over the door of the house where he was born, as follows:

Gratus, Honeste, mihi; non claudar, inito, fedebis;
Fur abeas, non sum facta soluta tibi (2).

The house it seems was distinguished by the name of Lacies. The practice of putting mottoes over doors was more in use at that time than it is at present. That which the late Lord Bolingbroke put over the door of his house aptly bespeaks the admiral genius of our author (3). This of our author seems to be drawn in imitation of that famous one set over his school by Plato ἰδὲ δὲ ἀγεωμετρίας εἰσίεισο. Let no one unskilled in geometry enter here; which he might not improbably have met with in some of his school books.

[C] Admitted of Hart-Hall.] This custom of tutors in colleges procuring chambers for their pupils in the neighbouring halls, has been already mentioned in the course of the present work (4). Dr Wilkins has given our author, besides Mr Barker, another tutor, Mr Thomas Young, but both Fellows of New-college.

[D] An extraordinary piece for his years.] The title runs thus: Analektōv Anglo-Britannicōv Libri duo; quibus ea maxime quæ ad civilē illius, quæ jam Anglia dicitur, Magnæ Britannicæ partis antiquitus administrationem, res domi publicas, sacras, profanas, statusque catastrophas usque ad Normanni adventum attinent, ex antiquis simul & neotericis deprompta, temporum juxta seriem digesta, historice & arctissime componuntur. It was put into the hands of a printer as soon as finished, but was not printed 'till 1616, at Francfort, and then so defective and incorrect, that he would not acknowledge it for his work (5). Degory Whear, Professor of history at Oxford, recommends it to young students, as a fit book to begin with in the study of the English history (6); but then he will find it necessary to consult others in many points, since the analektica do not so clearly account for the religion, government, and revolutions of state, as to give full satisfaction (7); and this is insinuated by our author, where he says it was his first piece, and not ill performed for one of his years, quod primo meum & ætatula non ita indignum (8).

[E] He became acquainted with some of the most eminent in it.] Dr Parr tells us (9), that Archbishop Usher became acquainted with him in his third voyage to England in 1609; therefore he must have been known to Camden and Sir Robert Cotton before that time; whether with Sir Henry Spelman so early may justly be doubted, since that knight did not settle in London 'till the year 1611 (10). But that he was not a member of the Society of Antiquaries, upon the revival of it in 1614 is highly probable, since his name is not expressly mentioned by Sir Henry Spelman in his account of it, a distinction which would surely have been made to his merit at that time: it seems a little hard to suppose him concluded in the words 'among others.' However that be, 'tis most likely that he was intimate very early with that Prince of Poets, as he calls him (11), Ben Jonson, who 'tis said, first gave him a true relish for Horace. Our author, whose ambition seems to have aimed at universal scholarship, did occasionally attempt to play the Poet, figuring it in Greek and Latin, as well as English verses, to his friends in various measures. On account of his prodigious learning, he is called the great dictator of learning of the English nation *; and for the same reason Sir John Suckling has given him the precedence in his session of poets.

* There was Selden, and he sat close by the chair,
* Wainman not far off, which was very fair.

[F] Tracts relating to the same subject.] These are first, Jani Anglorum facies altera; secondly, England's Epinomis; the latter of these served for a foundation to the former, and both were printed in 1610, 8vo. †, the former at his own expence, and dedicated to Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Lord High Treasurer of England (12). Dr Adam Lyttleton, author of the Anglo-Latin, &c. dictionary, published a translation of it into English, with large notes, under the name of Redman Westcot, Gent. Lond. 1683, folio (13). They contain several curious remarks upon the English history under the Normans, but is observed, that the laws quoted in the Jani Anglorum, &c. are as faulty as Lambard's translation of them, and want William Somner's emendations (14). Our author published also, in 1610, a third tract, De Duello, or of single Combat ‡; and a fourth, intitled, Notes and illustrations on the first eighteen songs in Michael Drayton's Polyolbion, 1612, folio.

[G] Titles of honour.] This learned piece is dedicated to his friend Edward Heyward of Cardeston in Norfolk, Esq; who was his chamber-fellow in the Temple, and had prefixed a commendatory copy of verses in Latin, to Selden's Jani Anglorum, &c. and a Recommendatory Poem, by his friend Ben Jonson, is also prefixed to it. In the second edition printed in 1631, folio, there are many additions. It was reprinted there in 1672, folio. From this edition it was translated into Latin, by Simon-John Arnold, Inspector of the churches of the Bailiwick of Sonenburg, and printed at Francfort 1696, 4to. And Mons. Briot (who published the French version of Sir Paul Rycaut's history of the Turks) had designed to translate it into French for the use of the French nobility ||, but was prevented by death. Dr John-Christopher Beeman took an occasion from it of writing a treatise upon the same subject; and Eric Mauritius in his Dissertationibus has one p. 237, de Nobilitate imprimis Germanicæ, in which the subjects of several of Mr Selden's chapters in this book, are handled in the same manner. Dr Nicolson observes, that 'as to what concerns our nobility and gentry, all that come within either of those

(11) Poetarum ille facile Princeps. Vindiciæ Existimationis suæ &c. p. 1422. in the second volume of his Works, by Wilkins.

* Lexicon Historicum Universale Germanicum, Tom. IV. p. 390. where there is an account of his Life and Writings, but full of errors.

† Biblioth Angloise, Tom. VI. p. 1.

(12) There was another edition in 1681, without either dedication or preface.

(13) See his article.

(14) Nicolson's Historical Library, ubi supra.

‡ It was reprinted in 1706, and a 2d in 1712, on occasion of the quarrel between Duke Hamilton and Lord Mohun. Bibliothèque Angloise, Tom. VI. p. 1.

|| As Théâtre d'Honneur, by Andrew Favin, was translated into English, for the use of the English Nobility, in 1623.

(2) Dr Wilkins says it was still to be seen in his time.

(3) See his article.

(4) In the article of Sir Thomas More.

(5) Preface to his Syntagmata de Diis Syris.

(6) De Ratione & Methodo legendi Historias Civiles & Ecclesiasticas, §. 27. edit. Oxon. 1637.

(7) Nicolson's English Historical Library. Lond. 1636, 8vo.

(8) Preface to his Syntagm. de Diis Syris.

(9) In his Life of Archbishop Usher.

(10) See his article.

by some notes on Sir John Fortescue de Laudibus Legum Angliæ, and Sir Ralph Hengham's Sums, printed in 1616, 8vo. The next year, 1717, he published his Treatise upon the Idolatry of the Ancient Syrians [H]; and in the mean time he wrote a Dissertation upon the State of the Jews, formerly living in England, published in Purchas's Pilgrimage [I] the same year. His reputation for profound learning was raised at this time to the highest pitch, and therefore the Clergy were greatly alarmed, by an attempt which he made to lessen the general opinion of their divine right to tythes, in 1618. This was thought a matter of so much importance, that complaint being made of it to King James, his Majesty was greatly incensed thereby; and, when this first storm seemed to be blown over,

' lifts will allow, that Mr Selden's Titles of Honour ought to be perused for the gaining of a general notion of the distinction of a degree, from an emperor down to a country gentleman †. Our author in this tract, col. 727, delivers his opinion, that the bishops and other principal governors in the Church, were subject under William the Conqueror, to a military tenure, by act of Parliament: which is confirmed also, by a passage of William of Malmſbury, in vita St. Wulfſtani §. Dr White Kennett in his third Letter to Bishop Merks, p. 85, takes notice of an inadvertency of our author, upon a passage from Froiffard, which mentions the Cinque Pers d'Angleterre, who sat at the table next the King. 'I know not, says Selden, what to make of this passage, though I cannot judge of it by any manuscripts of him having none by me, yet I am forward to think Cinque Pers may be mispublished in him for Cinquante Pers, which does not notify any established but an accidental name only for those that sat with the King at that time.' A strange and remote conjecture, says Kennett, to make a plain thing seem intricate, for most certainly Froiffard's placing the King at the head table at the coronation Dinner, with the Cinque Pers at the second table, and the commonalty of London at the third, must intend the Cinque Barons, or the Barons of the Cinque Ports, who then had, and still have, that precedence of dining at every King's Coronation. The same author, in his Parochial Antiquities, p. 418, speaking of the revenues, which were formerly given out of the profits of the county, for the better support of the dignity of an Earl, convinces Selden in this Treatise of the Titles of Honour of a mistake, in asserting, that Hugo de Aldithly Earl of Gloucester, was not the first Earl, who by his creation-charter had this revenue granted him in lieu of the third penny out of the pleas of the county*.

[H] Idolatry of the Ancient Syrians.] The title is De Diis Syris syntagmata duo. It was wrote as a commentary upon all the passages of the Old Testament, where mention is made of any of the heathen gods, as Bel, Astaroth, &c. and therefore besides the Syrian, gives an account of the Arabian, Ægyptian, Persian, African, and European Idolatry. The first edition was all bought up in a few years, whereupon Ludovicus de Dieu, Professor of Hebrew at Leyden in Holland, wrote a letter to our author, desiring leave for Elziver to print another edition there; Mr Selden complied with the request (15), revised it, making some additions, and dedicated it to Daniel Heinsius, who assisted de Dieu in the care of the press. This second edition came out in 1629, 8vo. After this it was reprinted at Leipſe in 1668, 8vo. and again in 1672, by the same editor Andrew Boyer. Dr Richard Mountagu (16) charged Selden, with having stolen a great part of this book out of Peter Faber's Semestres, but he vindicated himself from that imputation in the preface to the second edition. Mr Le Clerc censures our author (17) for three mistakes common to him, he says, with other writers upon the idolatry of the ancient nations. First, that in treating of the history and deities of these nations, together with those writers who might know something of these matters, either by the advantage of the times and places of their living, or from the ancient histories, he cites the Rabbins as of equal authority, who 'tis well known had no ancient remains of the writers of their nation, except the Old Testament, and never read the heathen authors to inform themselves; but when they attempt to explain any place of the Old Testament, which alludes to the idolatry of the people bordering on the Jews, relate meer romantic stories, as if they were exactly true. Secondly, he taxes Selden, with perpetually confounding the gods of the Greeks with those of the barbarous nations, without making the least distinction. The third error, he says, is, that Selden and others admit in some places, an allegorical meaning of the fables to represent under them certain mysteries. Dr Wilkins's edition has this advantage, that several additions are therein made from the author's manuscripts; among the rest he had some manuscript notes, by Henry James, given him by Dr Tanner, then Chancellor of Norwich, one of these was taken from Sir John Marſham's Canon Chronicle, p. 481, where mention being made of Selden's opinion, de sorte fortunæ, that Leali's acclamation, when she congratulates Zilpah's having born a child to Jacob, is to be understood of this sors fortunæ, in the sense of the astrologers: Sir John says, it does not suit with the age of the Patriarch, since there is no instance of the Syrian's art so ancient, unless we allow, with some, that all Mathematicks had their original in Seth. Again, in p. ii. c. 4 Selden says, the Mahometans borrowed their custom of dedicating the sixth day, Friday, to Venus from the Saracens, of which he makes a great doubt in lib. iii. c. 20. de jure N. & G. apud Hebræos; Dr Wilkins has likewise given us a curious letter from Selden (18), in answer to one from Ben Jonſon, inquiring into the true sense of that text in Deuteronomy xxii 5. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment; which Mr Selden is of opinion does not relate to confounding of the dress peculiar to each sex, about their ordinary occasions; observing that the original is, The woman shall not put on the armour of the man; a practice much used by the Syrians and other neighbouring nations to the Jews, in their idolatrous worship of Mars and Venus, to which he says this prohibition refers. In the same letter, having given the state of this species of idolatrous practice among the Eastern nations, he excuses himself from entering into that of the Greeks and Romans, 'Mr Jonſon being, as he says, a perfect master of the most recondite parts of that learning.'

[I] The state of the Jews in Purchas's pilgrimage.] In this peice he observes, that the time when the Jews first came into England is uncertain; but that their condition was servile both before and after the Conquest; and it appears by the laws of the Confessor, that all they had was the king's right. In the 17th of Henry the Third, the Domus Converterorum [now the Rolls, in Chancery-lane] was built for the converts, their goods being then confiscate to the Crown. Their custom was to steal a young boy, whom they first circumcised, and then crucified him at Easter. That five Jews were dragged at horse tails, and hanged on gibbets, for this offence, in the reign of Henry the Third; and in the the thirty-ninth of the same reign eighteen of them were executed for the like offence. That the lands they held were subject to executions for debt, when other lands were not; so that particular judges were assigned to hear and determine their causes, secundum leges & consuetudines Judaismi, according to the laws and customs of Judaism. That in most cases, two Christians and two Jews were appointed public notaries, for signing all debts of contracts; which instruments were lodged in a chest, of which all four had each a different key. That they were expelled the kingdom for extortion and usury in the eighteenth of Edward the First. This tract is printed very defectuously in the Pilgrimage, as Dr Wilkins informs us, from Mr Prynne, who, in a piece intituled, A short Demurrer to the Jews discontented Remitter, observes, that our author complained much of it. What complaints soever he might make of that kind they did not hinder him from inscribing a copy of Greek verses in commendation of Mr Purchas's work (19); and the marginal notes in that work are cited by Gataker, as made by Selden (20).

(18) It is dated Feb. 28, 1615, and printed in the second volume of Selden's Works, p. 1690, & seq. from a copy communicated by Matth. Ha'e, Esq; of Alderly in Gloucestershire.

(19) It is a treatise, and is printed in the 2d volume of Selden's Works, by Wilkins, p. 1721.

(20) Dissertatio de Nomine Tetragrammato, among Gataker's Opusculis Philosophicis, printed in his Opera Critica, col. 35.

[K] The † Historical Library.

§ C. 16. apud Anglum Sacram, Vol. 11. fol. 264.

* Before this book was finished at the press, our author fell dangerously ill of a fever, but was recovered by the assistance of Dr Fludd, which he gratefully acknowledges in the dedication.

(15) These Letters are prefixed to this edition.

(16) In his Dialectice, &c. p. 9.

(17) In Bibl. Choicæ, p. 82, & seqq.

over, by the interest of his friend Ben Jonson the poet, he was soon after prosecuted in the High-Commission-Court, and obliged in a solemn manner to acknowledge himself guilty of a fault, in publishing that History. The book was likewise suppressed, and he was restrained from printing any thing in defence of it [K]. In 1621, King James having,

[K] The divine right of tithes.] As our author's conduct had yet raised no suspicion of his disaffection to the Clergy, this piece, without any difficulty, obtained the licence from the Archbishop's chaplain; since he declares, in the preface, that it was not written to prove tithes are not due by divine right; or, that the laity may detain them, or still enjoy impropriations, nor at all against the maintenance of the Clergy. But, after it came out, being more diligently perused, it was presently observed, that though he had indeed, strictly speaking, given only the history of the authorities on each side, concerning that right, without making any absolute determination upon it; yet in weighing these authorities, he had managed it so, that every one might plainly see which way the balance turned in his hand; and that though he had cautiously forbore to decide the question himself, yet he had taught others to do it for him. Complaints being made of this to the King, Sir Robert Naunton, Secretary of State, brought him a summons, about the middle of December, to appear before his Majesty, then at Theobalds, in his return from Newmarket: being himself a stranger yet at Court, he got Ben Jonson and Edward Heyward, of Ruffam, in Norfolk, Esq; to introduce him. He staid three days at Theobalds, where his Majesty, among other things, objecting to an incidental passage in his book upon Christmas day; wherein he had intimated, that the 25th of December was not the true birth-day of our Saviour, as had been asserted in the Apostolical Constitutions; and being apprehensive, that the Presbyterians might make an ill use of it against the observation of that festival, desired Selden to write something further upon it. In obedience to his Majesty's request, he drew up his piece upon Christ's birth-day, and presented it to the King in a month's time (21); after hoping, as he says, his Majesty's anger was well pacified: but, in the latter end of this month, he was cited before some Lords of the High Commission, which occasioned the following act to be registered in that Court:

Vicesimo octavo die mensis Januarii, anno domini, juxta computationem ecclesie Anglicanæ, 1618, coram Reverendissimo in Christo Patre Domino Georgio, Providentia divina, Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo, totius Angliæ Primate & Metropolitanano; Johanne London, Lancelot Winton (22), & Johanne Roffen, eadem providentia respectivo Episcopis; Johanne Bennet, Wilhelmo Bird, & Georgio Newman, Militibus in Manerio Episcopali apud Lambeth, in comitatu Surrey, judicialiter sedentibus, præsentè Thoma Mottershed, officiali dominorum contra Johannem Selden, de Interiori-Templo, London, Armigerum.

This day appeared personally, John Selden, Esq; and made his submission, all under his owne handwriting, touching the publication of his book, intituled, The History of Tithes; sub tenore verborum sequente.

My good Lords,
I most humbly acknowledge my errour, which I have committed, in publishing the History of Tithes; and especially in that I have at all, by shewing any interpretation of holy Scriptures, by meddling with Councils, Fathers, or Canons, or by what else soever occurs in it, offered any occasion of argument against any right of maintenance, jure divino, of the ministers of the Gospell; beseeching your Lordships to receive this ingenuous and humble acknowledgment, together with the unfeined protestation of my griefe, for that through it I have incurred both his Majesties and your Lordships displeasure conceived against mee in behalfe of the Church of England.

John Selden.

The same Court proceeded also in the same spirit, to prohibit the sale of the book; neither did the matter rest here. The following year, Sir James Sempil, a Scotch Knight, published a treatise, intituled, Sacriledge sacredly handled; in the appendix to which, he takes our author's history to task. 'By his title, says he, and by his preface, he disclaims it to be written to prove, that tithes are not due by the law of God; wherefore, I have no reason to suspect, much less to account him an adversary to my position. The most is, he may doubt, (and so do many of great note) but he who ingenuously doubteth, may, when God pleaseth, find resolution (23)'. In proceeding, he makes it a remark, that Mr Selden hath given us veram historiam, as he found it recorded, sed hæc ipsa historia, non est vera, but leaves dangerous insinuations and prejudicial impressions on the jus divinum (24). In return to this, our author drew up a paper, which he called The Admonition; wherein he treats the Scotch Knight with great contempt (25). About this time, his Majesty being informed, that an answer to the history was preparing by Dr Richard Mountagu, he sent for Mr Selden, and acquainting him with Dr Mountagu's design, said these words, 'If thou presumest, either thy self, or by any of thy friends, to write any answer to that book, I will throw thee into prison.' Our author had also some discourse with the Marquis of Buckingham, upon this subject, at Greenwich; soon after which, he wrote a letter to that Minister (26), wherein he takes notice, that his Lordship had spoke of the great prejudice the Clergy had suffered by the publication of his book. 'I doubt not, says he, but both his Majestie and your Lordship have been moved only by information, to speak of any such prejudice; seek for an example of it, I dare venture the loss of my life, if any such can be produced.' The Marquis had also told him, that the Clergy alledged, that his whole book was written to no other purpose than to prove that tithes are not due, jure divino; to which he declares, that, in England, tithes are not recovered by that right; but I have, says he, delivered other mens conclusions for and against it, but have not judged of their reasons, nor made any resolution either way about them: this the Marquis, it seems, had pressed him to do, but he declined it, yet, so as sufficiently to intimate his opinion. Complaining of his Majesty's prohibition, he says, all that will, have liberty, (and some use it) to write and preach what they will against me, to abuse my name, my person, my profession, with as many falsehoods as they please, and my hands are tied: I must not so much as answer their calumnies. I am so far from writing more, that I have scarce ventured, for my own safety, so much as to say, they abuse me, though I know it. However, animadversions upon the history being published by Dr Tillesly, Archdeacon of Rochester (27); who, in the preface, took notice of the abovementioned submission; Mr Selden wrote an answer, several copies of which he dispersed among his friends, wherein he has these words: 'He tells you I made a submission in the Court of High Commission. That I was ever present in that Court, or called thither, as I live, it is more than I know; but I wonder not that the doctor should begin with playing false with you, it is common with him through the whole. I confess that I did most willingly acknowledge, not only before some Lords of the High Commission (not in the High Commission Court) but also to the Lords of his Majestie's Privy-Council, that I was most sorry for the publishing of that history, because it had offended; and his Majestie's most gracious favour towards me, received that satisfaction of the fault in so untimely printing it; and I profess still to all the world, that I am sorry for it; and so should I have been, if I had published a most orthodox catechism that had offended; but what is that to the doctrinal consequences of it, which the doctor talks of. Is there a syllable of it of less truth, because I was sorry for the publishing of it? Indeed, perhaps, by the doctor's Logic, there is; and just so might he prove, that there is more truth in his animadversions, because he was glad of the printing them, and because he hopes, as he says, that my submission hath cleared my judgment, touching the right of tithes. What dream made him hope so? There is not a word

(21) It was not printed till after his death, under the title of God made Man: proving the Nativity of our Saviour to be on the 25th of December. Lond. 1661, 8vo. with his picture before it.

(22) Our author in his Vindiciae, &c. says, this book displeased all the Bishops but Bishop Andrews, who was well pleased with it, as most agreeable to the received usage.

(23) P. 36.

(24) Ibid. p. 34.

(25) There is a MS. of this piece in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford; but that being imperfect, Dr Wilkins has printed it, from a corrected copy, in the hands of Joseph Moyle, of Abridge in Hampshire, brother to Walter Moyle, Esq; of whom an account may be seen in this work.

(26) It is dated May 5, 1620. and printed in the second volume of our author's Works, ubi sup.

(27) The title is, Animadversions upon Mr Selden's History of Tithes, and the Review.

having, in his speech to the Parliament, asserted that their privileges were originally grants from the Crown, Mr Selden was consulted by the House of Lords on that occasion, who gave his opinion in favour of the Parliament; which being dissolved in June, he was committed to the custody of the Sheriff of London, as a principal promoter of the famous protest made by the House of Commons, immediately before that dissolution (f). During this confinement, which lasted only five weeks [L], he prepared the History of Radmer of tithes in that submission more than in mentioning the title; neither was my judgment at all in question, but my publishing it, and this the doctor knows too, as I am assured: for the submission, he talks of, was through the favour of some of the Lords, (to whose noble regard towards me I owe all service) given by me in writing in some six lines, least by misreports of some such as the doctor is, I might be injured, by false relations of what I should speak only, and copies of it I dispersed into many hands; and I know the doctor hath seen one. In sum, I was and am sorry that I published it, and that I so gave occasion to others to abuse my history, by their false applications of some arguments; but there is not a passage in it, but that I ever did think and do now think to be most constant truth, as I have there delivered it.' An answer to Mr Selden, was published the same year by Dr Tillestry in a second edition of his Animadversions; before which (in the title page is) in lieu of the two first chapters, purposely pretermitted, is premised a catalogue of seventy two authors before the years 1215, maintaining the jus divinam of tithes, or more, to be paid to the priesthood under the Gospel. In the preface, he remarks Selden's prevarication, in distinguishing between making a submission to the Court, and in the Court; and then to answer even that shift produces a copy of the very act of the Court itself, as above. Dr Mountagu's learned performance came out likewise this year, 1621, intituled, Diatriba upon the first part of the late history of tithes, dedicated to the King. He begun his attack upon our author's strongest fort, and that which would most sensibly touch him; namely, his scholarship. In the introduction (23), addressed to Mr Selden, he writes thus, 'I can tell you, you are vehemently suspected to steal other men's children, and send them into the world for your own. Is all your own which your history representeth? I can say, no: it is as your syntagma δεδιόν στυρηρίσμενον, and you know what that is; if you will say it was not stolen, but borrowed, I will say so too, and confess it lawful so long as you profess per quos profeceris, in what place you had it and of whom. But to drive away, without leave, other men's cattle out of their grounds; for a man to employ or sell them in markets as his own, to alter or embezzle the marks of them, as Sisyphus and Autolyceus used of old, to draw them backward into dens and caves with Cacus by the tails; and last of all, which is worst of all, to deny them upon enquiry and demand; this is not thrift, but theft, that is, as I take it, flat felony; is it not so in law? Yet well fare a little ingenuity at last. You profess yourself beholden to Mr Allen, of Gloucester-Hall; you are very much; and you acknowledged it unto that worthy gentleman, Sir Robert Cotton (29); you could not but profess this, because it was apparent, that you owed much unto his excellent library, that magazine of Antiquity; and do you not owe much also to his pains, as well as to his books? I do but ask you the question, who did mark out, with black lead, in his manuscripts, all places, concerning tithes, with one mark, as other passages with another.' In the same vein, the doctor suggests his taking, at second hand, passages from Plutarch in Lucullo, and in Camillo Diodorus Siculus, lib. v.; and Herodotus in Clio; of Xenophon and Pliny, from Dr Carleton's book of tithes; besides, continues he, you are to be taxed deeply for dealing ungentely and unthankfully with your much admired, and almost deified, Joseph Scaliger, your whole discourse of Jewish tithing is transfused out of his Diatriba, even the very instances and examples are the same. Likewise, in the body of the work (30), he keeps up the same strain 'Good counsel, says he, was given you, before you meddled with the history of tithes, not to begin it, by a friend of your's and mine, in Somersetshire, which you would not follow (31).' This last stroke is evidently in return to our author's alleging in his preface, that his book had been shewn to, and approved by, men of the best learning, and even such as were (as he terms them) Decimatissimi. The other repartees are given to be even with him for reproaching the Clergy with their ignorance; as if they had nothing but beard, title, and habit; as also for the character which he gives of his piece, that it was drawn from originals never before shewn. He speaks very slightly, without naming them, of all that had gone before him upon this subject. These were, 1. The anatomy of Anania's and Sapphira's Sacrilege, by Robert Gostwicke, 1616, 4to. 2. The Writers of the Gospel say, Tithes are due to the Ministers of the Word by that Word, by Foulke Roberts, B. D. Camb. 1613, 4to. 3. Tithes examined and proved to be due by Divine Right, by George Carleton, 1611, 4to. 4. Bishop Andrews also had written to prove the same in his tract, de Decimis, printed among his works (32). Bishop Kennett, in his Parochial Antiquities, says, this tract least deserves Selden's name. But Dr Thomasin (33), declares, that he was the first that left off trifling upon this subject, primus qui hic desipere desit; and he received the following letter from Dr Langbain, in relation to it, to this purpose, 'That although the learned world differed about the divine right of tithes, yet the legal right was greatly strengthened by what he had said: some, whose fears led them thereto, inquired of me, what I thought of this legal right; to whom I had no better answer, than to send them to your History of Tithes; this will seem strange to them, but I make no doubt, but that work, which has greatly destroyed the divine right, will build up the legal right most firmly; and if that should be allowed to be the principal design of that book, I should not despair of it's meeting with good success.* The three first chapters of this History were turned into Latin, by Mr Le Clerc, and inserted in his Commentaries upon the Pentateuch, with corrections.

(f) King James was so much enraged at it, that he tore it out of their books with his own hands. Annals of the Reign of King James I. under this year.

[L] Lasted only five weeks.] After some time, he sent to Bishop Williams, then Lord-Keeper, desiring his interest with the Marquis of Buckingham, with which he readily complied, and dispatched Mr Selden's letter inclosed in one to that favourite, wherein, having first applied for the release of the Earl of Southampton, committed to his own custody, he proceeds thus: 'Now poor Mr Selden falls to the same letter of mercy, and humbly petitions your Lordship's mediation and furtherance. He and the world take notice of that favour your Lordship hath ever afforded my motions; and myself, without the motion of any, do so address my language to intreat for him. The which I do the more boldly, because, by his letter inclosed, he hath absolutely denied, that ever he gave the least approbation of that power and judicature lately usurped by the House of Commons. My Lord, the man hath excellent parts, which may be diverted from an affectation of pleasing idle people, to do some good and useful service to his Majesty. He is but young, and it is the first offence that ever he committed against the King. I presume, therefore, to leave him to your Lordship's mercy and charity.' Accordingly; says Dr Hacket (34), he was released by the next packet, that came from the Court in progress. Our author's own account of this matter is very agreeable to this letter; he tells us, that after five weeks imprisonment, he was sent for to Court; where, coming before the King, he was examined by some of the Council, and asked particularly, what power the Parliament had without the King? Bishop Andrews, being present, stood his friend against that ensnaring question, and further assured his Majesty, that he had been falsely accused. This seems to be the ground of attributing his discharge, as some do (35), to this last Bishop, without mentioning the former, which perhaps did not occur to those writers. This letter of Bishop Williams helps to explain Selden's meaning; where he suggests, that when he was sent for by the Parliament, he spoke freely, as well in defence of the prerogative, as of their

(28) P. 23, 24.

(29) This is in the dedication of Selden's book to that gentleman.

(30) P. 227.

(31) See more of this in Dr Mountagu's article, in this Work. Mr Collier, in his Ecclesiastical History, has given an abstract of Selden's History, and Mountagu's answer to it.

(32) P. 106.

(33) In Dissertat. de decimis, in additamentum observationum selectarum ad rem literarum spectantium, or the Supplement to the Observations Hallenses.

* Ex Lelandi Collectaneis, Append. I. p. 291.

(34) Life of Bishop Williams, p. 69.

(35) Vindicæ, &c. p. 1443. in the second volume of his Works, by Wilkins.

(g) Vindiciae, &c. p. 1426. in ad vol. of his Works, by Wilkins.

(b) Ib. p. 1427.

(i) Wilkins's Life of our author, as before.

Eadmer for the press (g), and it was published in 1623 [M], in folio, with a dedication to the Lord Keeper Williams; wherein he gratefully acknowledges that Bishop's favour, in procuring his releasement. He was chosen Member of Parliament for Lancaster on the 12th of February the same year; but there happening no occurrence which called for his profound knowledge in the constitution of his country, he stuck close to his books, not suffering the divisions of the times to interrupt him in the pursuit of his darling studies (b). In the same humour, he obstinately refused to comply with an order of the society of the Inner Temple, appointing him Reader at Lyon's-Inn in 1624 [N]. In the next Parliament that was called the following year, upon the accession of King Charles the First to the Throne, Mr Selden was returned a Burgess for Great-Bedwin in Wiltshire (i). In this Parliament, he declared himself warmly against the Duke of Buckingham; and in the ensuing Parliament, which was called the next year, 1626, being elected again for the same borough, he was first chosen of the committee for drawing up articles of impeachment against that Minister, and afterwards appointed one of the managers for the House of Commons at his tryal [O]. After the Parliament was dissolved, the King being

(36) Dr Wilkins does so, and is therein followed by the General Dictionary; tho' Wood gives the honour where it is due, to Williams.

(37) History of England, Vol. IX. p. 502. edit. 1729, 8vo.

(38) Reply to Dr Tillesley.

(39) This author's merit is, that he was both a spectator and an actor in the transactions which he relates, from anno 1666 to ann. 1122.

† In p. 1664. of the notes upon Eadmer, Selden has given a copy of the contest at Pinnedene, betwixt Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, and Otho Bishop of Bath; concerning which the reader will find more in Hale's Dissert. Episc. p. 7. and a correct copy of this conference is given by Dugdale, in Origines Juridicales; and by Henry Wharton, in Anglia Sacra, Vol. I. p. 334. Again, in p. 1683. Selden makes Godwin, when he wrote De Praesulibus, to be Bishop of Landaff, whereas he was only then Subdean of Exeter, and was made a Bishop by Queen Elizabeth upon writing that book.

(40) So the meetings of the Masters of the Bench in the Inner Temple are called.

their privileges (36). Dr Wilkins tells us, he complained then, that the King's mind was alienated from his Parliament, by his courtiers; I wish he had given us his vouchers for it. Rapin observes, that this attempt of King James, to stretch the prerogative, increased the number of State-Puritans, as he calls them, greatly, which was inconsiderable before the dissolution of this Parliament; and that, joining with the Church-Puritans, they became formidable (37). Among the former, he reckons Mr Selden as a principal one. However, that be, 'tis certain, he very much abhorred the principles of the latter. For, when Dr Tillesley charged him with some Puritanical conceits, he very briskly answers, he hopes that was not pointed to him; 'For, says he, I was never yet, I trust, either mad enough or fool enough to deserve that name (38).'

[M] Eadmer was published in 1623.] In the dedication, after speaking of the odium raised against him on account of his History of Tithes, in such a manner as must be grounded upon a knowledge, that his patron thought with him upon that subject, he expresses his gratitude to Williams in these terms: Non modo insigni benignitate, atque ea opportunissime prius fere quam tibi omnino innotescerem, in summis primæ reipublicæ fastigiis positus me obstrinxisti, sed fronte etiam continenter exporrocto variatim, Et perpetuo mihi non defuisti, etiamnum accumulare gratuito. The title of this piece is, Spicilegium in Eadmeri vi libros historiarum; consisting of explanatory notes upon that author, whose obscurity had before buried him in oblivion (39). It was reprinted in 1673, at the end of the life of St Anselm. Dr Nicolson observes, that the laws of the Conqueror are here wretchedly translated. But these were afterwards published more correctly, by Sir Henry Spelman. Then Abram Wheelock, Professor of Arabic, at Cambridge, published them with Selden's Latin version, in sua Archaionomia. The editor of the manuscript of the Croyland Monastery added them to his work without a version, p. 88. Nath. Bacon wrote a commentary upon them, in his Discourse historical, of the uniformity of the government of England, part i. cap. 50, 51, 52. They were published by Dr Brady, with an English version, in his introduction to the old English history †. Lastly, a new edition was given of them by Dr David Wilkins, in his edition of the Anglo-Saxon laws.

[N] He refused to read at Lyons-inn.] This is entered in the register of the Inner-Temple, under Michaelmas term, that year, as follows: 'Whereas an order was made at the Bench-table this term, since the last Parliament (40); and entered into the Buttery-Book in these words:

' Jovis 21 die Octobris, 1624.
' Memorandum, That whereas John Selden, Esq;
' one of the Utter-Barristers of this House, was in ' Trinity term last chosen Reader of Lyon's-inn, by
' the Gentlemen of the same House, according to the ' order of the house; which he then refused to take ' upon him, and perform the same, without some ' sufficient cause or good reason, notwithstanding
' many courteous and fair persuasions and admonitions
' by the Masters of the Bench made to him; for ' which cause, he having been twice convented be' fore the Masters of the Bench, it was then ordered,

' that there should be a ne recipiatur entered-upon
' his name, which was done accordingly; and in ' respect the Bench was not then full, the further ' proceedings against him were respited until this term.
' Now, this day, being called again to the table, he ' doth absolutely refuse to read; the Masters of the ' Bench, taking into consideration his contempt and ' offence; and for that it is without precedent, that ' any man elected to read in Chancery has been dis' charged in like case, much less has with such ' wilfulness refused the same; have ordered that he
' presently pay to this House the sum of twenty pounds
' fine, and that he stand and be disabled ever to be ' called to the Bench or to be a Reader of this House.
' Now at this Parliament the said order is confirmed.
' And it is further ordered, that if any of this House,
' who shall hereafter be chosen to read in Chancery,
' shall refuse to read, every such offender shall be ' fined, and be disabled to be called to the Bench, or
' to be a Reader of this House.'

However, in Michaelmas term, 1632, it was ordered, that 'Mr Selden shall stand enabled and be capable of any preferment in the House, in such a manner as other Utter-Barristers of this House are, to all intents and purposes, any former act of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding.' Accordingly, he was called to the Bench in Michaelmas term following.

[O] One of the managers against the Duke of Bucks.] Six articles being brought in against him by Dr Samuel Turner, they were explained by our author, as well as Sir Thomas Wentworth and William Noy. At last, it being voted that common fame was sufficient to ground an impeachment upon; May 8, 1626, the Commons sent up thirteen articles to the Lords; of which Selden had the defence of the fourth and fifth. They related to the discharge of his office of Lord-High-Admiral; as first, for not guarding the seas. In proving this to belong to the office of Lord-High-Admiral, he takes notice, that the seas of England and Ireland are part of the demesne and possessions of the Crown of England; and that thereby, the Admiral had not only jurisdiction, as in the case of the Admirals of France and Spain, but asserts, that the laws of the States of Genoa, Catalonia, and other maritime parts of Spain; as also the maritime towns of Germany, Zealand, Holland, Friesland, Denmark, Norway, and divers other parts of the Empire, shew that the kings of England, by reason that their said realm hath used, time out of mind, to be in peaceable possession of the seas of England and of the islands belonging to them; and altho', says he, Grotius, the Hollander, writes of purpose to destroy all dominion in the Eastern ocean, yet he speaks nothing against the dominion of our English seas; however, he hath been misrepresented, but expressly elsewhere saith, Meta Britannicis littora sunt oris. The utmost limits of the dominions of the Crown of England are the shores of the neighbouring countries. The whole seas, or the territorium maximum that intervenes, being a parcel of the possessions of the Crown of England. That before the title of Admiral came in, these were called Custodes Maris, whose duty consists, 1. In certifying yearly to the King's Council, the names of the King's ships, and also of those of the Merchants, with the number of mariners in each. 2. To shew the wants for these services, and to give in estimates for being advised to impose a loan by virtue of his prerogative, Mr Selden was very active in opposing that measure, prevented the printing of Dr Sibthorp's sermon in defence of it [P], and November 22, 1627, and pleaded at the King's-Bench as Counsel for Mr Hampden [Q], who had been imprisoned for refusing to submit to it. In the third Parliament of King Charles the First, our author sat as one of the representatives a second time for Lancaster (k), when he had a principal share in all the leading steps towards preparing and establishing the famous Petition of Right [R]; which being granted, and a prorogation ensuing for a supply. 3. To go himself upon great occasions to sea. He then proceeds to estimate the greatness of the Duke's offence, by the consequences of it; which were, 1. The losses sustained by the Merchants. 2. The weakness of the naval strength. 3. The neglect of chivalry not regarded nor rewarded. 4. The decay of trade. 5. The loss of the quiet possession of so large a territory as the seas of England and Ireland, by the free use of which the ancient glory and greatness of the Crown of England hath so constantly subsisted. He concludes, with giving instances of the Parliament's jurisdiction in these matters. The consequences he observes, besides the damage of the Merchants, and the discouragements to those that are subject to the marine jurisdiction, that it tends to place an absolute authority in the Admiral, without law or legal course, over the ships and goods of all Merchants whatsoever (41); and instances in the Duke of Suffolk, who being adjudged in Parliament for treason, in Edward the Sixth's time, it was alledged, among other things, that he took to his own use goods piratically taken, and expressly against an order by the Lord Protector, and of the whole Council, whereunto his hand had been set for the restitution of them.

(41) So he says himself in his Vindictæ, tho' Dr Wilkins tells us, he was returned for Ludgerhall in Wiltshire.

(41) The fifth article against the Duke was, the staying the ship called Peter of Newhaven, and detaining part of her cargo. This he pleads to be against all laws marine of common merchants, and therefore against the law of nations.

[P] He hindered the printing of Sibthorp's sermon. This famous sermon being preached at the assizes at Northampton, February 22, 1626; the author first offered it to Archbishop Abbot for a licence, and being refused, he applied to the Bishop of London, whole chaplain, Dr Worrall, a man of great learning, signed an imprimatur; but before he returned it to the party, he sent the sermon, with a letter, to Selden, desiring his opinion of it. Selden having perused the sermon, and not caring to give his opinion in writing, sent for Worrall, and said to him, 'What have you done here? You have given your approbation to a book full of errors; which if they were true, there could be no meum & tuum in England, no body could have any property; and upon a change of the times, when the past transactions will be brought under examination, you will certainly be hanged for this imprimatur.' The other then asking him, in a fright, what could be done, since his name was actually set to it; Selden advised him to be at the pains of erasing his name so perfectly that no traces of it might be discernible; which was done accordingly, and the sermon was not printed 'till 1628 (42).

(42) Life, by Dr Wilkins.

[Q] He was counsel for Mr Hampden. In his speech on this occasion, our author observes, among other things, that if Magna Charta, cap. xxix. was fully executed, as it ought to be, every man would enjoy his liberty better than he does. The law says expressly, no free man shall be imprisoned without due process of law; the words are secundum legem terræ; by which must be meant, either by presentment or indictment; for without that interpretation, the free man will have no privilege above the villain, which both the King and the Barons had, and could imprison for it; but if I imprison another man's villain, that villain may have an action of false imprisonment against me.

(43) This is the second of his speeches in Vol. III. of his Works, by Wilkins, and contains four leaves.

[R] Leading steps to the petition of right. Before the meeting of this Parliament, our author made a long speech or argument concerning the Habeas Corpus (43); and upon the assembling of the Parliament, March 17, 1727, when the debates upon the imprisonment of Hampden and others begun in the House, March 25, 1628, he got up in great warmth, saying, I rise not to make an argument in this point, the greatest that ever was in this place or elsewhere. He then observes, that the liberties of the subject had been violated in other instances, but never, he was confident, had been adjudged before, that upon any commitment of the King and Council, no enlargement can be. I do desire, says he, that some of the King's Counsel may speak what they can, to satisfy us of the power (44). This being done by the Solicitor General, on the twenty-seventh, our author, the next day, made a reply, wherein he took notice, that, in speaking of the judgements given in the King's-Bench, the precedents are said to be mis-cited; let a sub-committee search into judgments and precedents. I heard here a quousque, and there is nothing but a remittitur. The course of the officer is to enter quousque, &c. and that is, 'till they be delivered by law, and is all the judgment that can be. Upon this a sub-committee was appointed, and he was chosen chairman; and upon his reporting to the House, that in the precedents relating to Habeas Corpus they found only a remittitur; those resolutions were made which are printed in Rushworth (45). In the debate upon confinement, April 2, Selden spoke thus: 'For the liberties already concluded (which are the chief) let us determine how we shall right ourselves in them; for confinement is different from imprisonment, and it is against the law, that any should be confined to his house or elsewhere. Every Christide many are confined to their houses by proclamation, this will be taken for a law. I know not what you call a punishment, but that there is some ground of it, or mention in acts of Parliament, law books, or records, but for this I find none. Also, it is a punishment itself. Bracton, p. 36. lib. de corona; speaking of abjuration, saith that exilium est triplex, certorum locorum interdictio, sive villæ, vel comitatus, &c. So it is with him a banishment. In 35 of Eliz. there was then a desire of this House to confine recusants, and they petitioned the Queen about it; but that was not held a safe way, but they made a law for it. In all the questions stirred among us, we cannot better determine them, than by comparing ourselves to villains. A villain regardant must not be out of his lord's manor, 22 Hen. VI. 31. but *liber homo est qui potest ire quo vult, saith the book of Domesday. Jews were confined to certain places, as here in London to the Old Jewry. So Civilians have perpetual prisons and coercive prisons, upon judgments in court, and carcer domesticus, and that is in English confinement. Madmen may be confined. Upon which it was ordered, that no person should be confined in his house or elsewhere. This was succeeded by another question, concerning the violation of the property of goods by deputy-lieutenants. Sir Thomas Wentworth calling for the question to determine this article, Selden said, I am glad to hear we are so nigh the question, but we are near a mistake; no man doth this but as deputy-lieutenant, he is but deputy to the lord-lieutenant, and his authority is derived from him. Those people who are deputy-lieutenants have orders of direction from their lords. After these debates it was resolved, that neither the King, nor any of his ministers, could impose a tax, or tribute, or subsidy, upon the people, without consent of Parliament. Thursday April 3, in the debate upon the employment of the subject in foreign services (46), Selden observed, that there were three courses for levying forces, (1.) By calling them together who were bound to serve upon tenure. (2.) By sending to those who by covenant were engaged to serve the King. (3.) By this new way of pressing. Upon the first way he observes, that the Conqueror gave 6000 knights fees, at 20 l. a year each, to have armed men by their tenure, which he would not have done, if he could have compelled men by his prerogative. These were obliged to serve the King upon any occasion within the kingdom, but no man is to go out of his country but for defence of the realm. (2.) For the point of covenant with the King to serve him in his wars, those only were obliged who held by tenure. The King's right of summoning them to go out of the realm, upon any other occasion, was contested in Edward the Third's time. The Parliament declared against it. This was the way of raising forces from Edward II. to Henry VIII. The barons

(44) On the 27th he made a speech upon the same subject; 'tis the third speech, ubi supra.

(45) Vol. V. p. 513.

* i. e. He is a free man who can go where he pleases.

(46) Some of the inferior sort of persons were pressed for soldiers, for refusing to pay the loan imposed this year by the King.

and

(1) He passed the summer there. Dedication to his Liber de Successionibus, &c.

ensuing in June, he retired to Wrest in Bedfordshire, a seat of the Earl of Kent's (1); where, during this recess of Parliament, he put the last hand to his Commentaries upon the Arundelian and great men could raise 1000 men at any time. (3.) For pressing one may tell whence it came. When covenants were in use, the great men could raise armed men; but when these great mens greatness ended, then their officers began to press. There is not a word in any statute of any soldiers being pressed or sent away by compulsion, and so then the law knew no pressing. Upon the votes of the Lower House being sent to the Upper House, several conferences between the two Houses ensuing, our author made a speech at the first of these; and April 7, he made a long speech, touching personal liberty, out of precedents, records, and resolutions of Judges in former times. Upon this affair, one Kirton declared, that the Earl of Suffolk had said, Selden deserved to be hanged for erasing publick instruments, and promoting sedition. To which Selden said, 'As for erasing records, I hope no man believes I ever did it; I cannot guess what the lord means. I did deliver in whole copies of divers records, examined by myself and divers other gentlemen of this House. These I delivered into the Lords House, and the Clerk of the Crown brought in the records of the office before the Lords. I desire that it may be a message from this House to the Lords at the Bar, to make out a charge against the Lord that spoke this, and I hope we shall have justice.' This was done, but his Lordship denied the words. April 14, when the King's orders and instructions, about the right of arms, were publickly read in the House, Selden said, this matter is of the greatest consequence of any that we have yet meddled with. This concerns our lives. We find the Justices dare not meddle with the law, by reason of these commissions. The commission concerns soldiers, and all dissolute persons that meddle with them. He made several speeches upon this argument, in the debates that were held about it (47). May 14, in the debate about prosecuting Dr Mainwaring, for his sermon, intituled Religion and Loyalty; it being moved in the committee, that an information should be lodged against him, Mr Pym alledged, that this might create a dispute between the two Houses. Selden said, we cannot fitly go otherwise than by the Lords; this is a temporal crime, to have Parliaments thus scandaled in pulpits. To go by bill I do not think fit. In such cases there was never any bill of attainder. In Henry the VIth's and Edward the IVth's time, many attainders were; but in the bills, time was given to the party to come in, or else to stand attainted. He may be fetched from the Convocation into the Lords House, and there answer for himself, and then there may be a bill of attainder. Upon this question, May 16, a bill was proposed for restraining the tumults which might arise from ministers of God's word; When Sir Henry Martyn was for maintaining the privileges of the Clergy, and quoting Magna Charta for them, Selden said, as for Magna Charta, the Church has many liberties, but these liberties, by many acts of Parliament, are lessened and varied. All Clergymen were not to be tried by the Laity, for any offence under treason; as for that, that ministers must be under lay jurisdiction, they were ever in part, and, since the 2d of Hen. VIII. have been totally. As for the points of scandal, we do but the same as the canons, and all councils in former times, did. We have titles de concubinato Episcoporum, & de ebrietate eorum; but I think the bill is not to pass. May 20, an emendation being offered to the Petition of Right, concerning the oath ex officio, Mr Selden explained how that oath was unlawful, thus: This oath is not lawful. No new oath is lawful, that is not warranted by the common law, or by act of Parliament, the ground of this appears, by a resolution in the Queen's time, that Under-Sheriffs did take oaths; but it was resolved they could not, till the statute was made of 13 Eliz. 1. That Judges of Assize may take assizes and oaths in time of Lent and Advent, because before that they could not. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 14. against heresies, it is said to be against justice and equity, that any man should suffer without accusation and witnesses. It was never heard of, that at the first dash a man should be put to his oath, without accusation or witness. May 21. upon the question about the clause added to the Petition of Right by Bishop Williams (48), Selden having shewn, by many instances, that such a clause was unprecedented, and would render the whole petition frustrate, continues to answer the arguments urged in it's favour, thus: For this [saving of the King's sovereignty] it was objected, that in the 28th of Edw. I. in the end of articuli super chartas, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, there is a clause, savant le droit & signory. The words are extant in that roll that is now extant, but but the original roll is not extant. In the bill there was no savant, but it was put in afterwards; and to prove this, it is true there is no parliament-roll of that year, yet we have histories of that kind. In the library at Oxford, there is a journal of a Parliament of that very year, which mentions as much. Also in the publick library of Cambridge, there is a manuscript that belonged to an abbey, 'tis also of the same year; it mentions the parliament, and the petition, and articulos quos petierunt, sic confirmaverat Rex, ut in fine adderet salvo jure coronæ Regis, and it came by a proclamation so in London. When the people heard this clause added in the end, they fell into execrations for that addition, and the great Earls that went away satisfied from the Parliament, hearing of this, went to the King, and after it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this of that time. Only in one roll, at the end of Edw. III. there is a roll that recites not the Parliament bill, but the statute that was the effect of the roll that was proclaimed. June 5, a message being sent from the King, requiring them not to enter upon any new business, Selden made several warm speeches against the Duke of Bucks, of which the following is an extract. Let a declaration be drawn under four heads. (1.) Let us express our dutiful carriage towards his Majesty. (2.) Of our liberties that are violated. (3.) To present what the purpose of the House was to have dealt in. (4.) To preserve our assurance, that that great person, fearing himself to be questioned, did interpose himself, and cause the distraction. All this time, we have cast a mantle upon what was done last Parliament; but now being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun (49). Ye know the charge that was last Parliament, to which he made an answer; but the particulars were sufficient to demand judgment on that answer only. This debate held to the 14th of June, when Selden put the finishing hand to the resolution which was taken, of petitioning his Majesty against him, in these words. As for the last clause, concerning our grievances, it is certain that the power of the Duke is the cause of all this evil. Now we offer it, whether it be fit for so much power to be in one hand; but all here refer it to the excess of his power; let us mention the abuse of his power, and pray that this man may be removed from his Majesty. June 18, there happened a debate, whether the goods of bastards dying intestate belonged to the King. Selden having seconded Sir Edward Coke against this prerogative, alledged, among other things, It is a prerogative I know attempted, but all men may be questioned by it; and then having shewn, that the instances alledged in favour of it, extend only to the King's servants and accompants, he concludes thus: This prerogative is fetched from beyond sea. In France, the King hath the goods of men intestate that are bastards. He observes on this occasion, that bastard was originally not a term of reproach, and that King William the Conqueror, a bastard from a mother whose name was Arlot, gave rise to the appellative word harlot, i. e. strumpet. June 21, Edmund Sawyer, Knt. a member of the House, being found to have exacted a rate of 12d. a pound, against the goods of one Dawes, Selden spoke thus: I find these two things, (1.) His offence to the commonwealth; that is, his project, as far as he could, to double the book of rates. (2.) A scandal of his offence to this House, to plot beforehand, that we might not know the truth; let it be reported to the House; let us commit him to the Tower, and turn him out of the House; 'tis subornation; let him also stand for ever disabled to sit here. Our jurisdiction here extends to the members of our own House, to maintain the privileges of the House, we can fine as well as the lords; and as they disable Lords from sitting there, so can we disable any member of our House from sitting here.

(49) The King had sent a message to that Parliament, asserting the Duke's innocence of his own certain knowledge; and it was dissolved during his tryal. General Histories of England, under that year.

(47) Viz. April 15, 19, 22, 26, and May 7. They are all printed by Wilkins, ubi supra.

(48) See his article.

June

Arundelian Marbles [S]. In the next sessions, he continued among the warmest of the members in opposition to the Court [T], and joined vigorously in the remarkable protestation that was made by the House of Commons, while the Speaker was held by force in the chair, and the doors locked [U]: soon after which he was committed to the Tower by an order of the Privy-Council, and his study sealed up, March 24th, 1628. Here he was kept a close prisoner for three months [W], but magnificently supported at the King's expence: and being afterwards allowed the use of such books as he desired, he proceeded in his studies. On the third of October, 1629, a demand being made of security for his good behaviour, upon a proposal of the Judges to discharge him (m), he steadily rejected that proposition, as entirely unwarranted by Law; and continuing immovable in that resolution, he was, in pursuance of his own suit at the King's Bench, in Hilary term, 1629, removed to the prison of that Court, where he remained above a year (n), but had the liberty of going abroad in the day-time, observing the common rules of that prison. It was at this time that he wrote his piece, De Successionibus in Bona Defuncti, secundum Leges Hebræorum [X]; and he was now prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, for dispersing a libel,

(m) At Serjeant's Inn in Fleetstreet, Mr Selden taking notice they had been 3 months in close confinement, the Chief-Justice told him, it might become 8 years if they did not submit.

(n) The King sent his Chaplain Morley to suggest to him, that upon a petition he might be discharged.

June 24, in the famous debate upon tonnage and poundage, Selden spoke as follows: The King's Counsel objected, that it was granted time out of mind to the King. I fear his Majesty is told so, and some body doth ascertain him so; but we may clear that, and shew how far it is from truth. As for 1 Eliz. it was so also in 1 Jac. but the words time out of mind are, that subereas Henry VII. and other your progenitors, have had some subsidies for the guarding of the seas; there was never a King but had some subsidies, and so in that sense it is indeed time out of mind. This is a matter of free gift: for publick bills, the King saith, Le Roy le veut; for petitions of right, soit fait comme il est desire. For the bill of subsidy, it is thus; the King heartily thanks his subjects for rheir good wills. In all the bills for tonnage and poundage, it is the same answer save one, which was the 1st of Elizabeth; and, but for that only mistake of the clerk, it hath ever had the same assent as the bill of subsidies. Upon the 26th of June the Parliament was prorogued.

* All these extracts of our author's speeches are printed from a MS. of Mr Pym, by Wilkins.

[S] Arundelian Marbles. Selden was recommended to this work by his friend Sir Robert Cotton, to the Earl of Arundel, who had brought these excellent antique monuments from Constantinople the year before, and placed them in his house and gardens in the Strand: so that our author in this book gave a new treasure to the learned world, which no doubt was the principal motive for his undertaking it. But the edition being found very faulty, after these monuments were removed to Oxford, another edition of them was printed by order of that University, and a third has been since printed by Michael Mattaire, Gent. (50). Selden's mistakes were severely censured by Tho. Lydiat, which, Mr Wood tells us, so much provoked our author, that when Lydiat was afterwards thrown into jail for a debt contracted by being bound for a relation, he refused to contribute any thing towards his discharge †.

(50) See Humphry Prideaux's article.

† Athen. Oxon. Vol II. under Lydiat's article.

[T] He appeared warm against the Court. Feb. 12, complaining of the restraint put upon them, in selling books against Popery and Arminianism; and as the liberty of the press depended on a decree of the Star-Chamber only, Selden promoted the petition of the Printers, and proposed that a law might be made about it; otherwise, he said, the Printers and Booksellers might, by virtue of that decree, be fined, imprisoned, and any ways ill used, contrary to the liberties of the subject. This was chiefly levelled at Archbishop Laud, who had the chief hand in these decrees (51).

(51) As appears by his article.

[U] Protestation, while the Speaker was held in the chair. While the cause of Chambers, a member of the House, was before the Star-Chamber, Selden furnished them with a precedent for imprisoning the Sheriff of London, for that seizure. He said, indeed, he did not remember where one of the Sheriffs was imprisoned, but he did where they both were, upon Roll's complaint. Feb. 10, he said, if there be any near the King, that doth misrepresent our actions, let the curse light on him, not on us. I believe it is high time to vindicate ourselves in this cause, else it is in vain for us to sit here. Upon this speech, a committee was appointed; and, on Feb. 22, after a long and warm debate, a motion being made, to vote any such seizure to be a breach of privilege, the Speaker refused to put the question, saying, that it was contrary to the King's command. Mr Selden said, Dare you not, Mr Speaker, put the question, when we command you? If you will not put it, we must sit still. Thus we shall never be able to do any thing. They that come after, they may say they have the King's command not to do it. We sit here, by the command of the King, under the Great Seal; and you are by his Majesty, sitting in his royal chair before both Houses, appointed for our Speaker, now you refuse to do your office. After which, the Speaker being held in the chair, and the doors locked, the protestation was read (52).

(52) For this, and more of this affair, we must refer to Mr Hampden's article.

[W] Close prisoner for three months. About a fortnight after his commitment, the Earls of Arundel, Dorset, and Manchester were sent with the Attorney to examine him more strictly, and objecting to him some words spoken again the King's right to tonnage, he gave such an answer, that the Earl of Dorset, always his friend, told him, he hoped he would be released, but was deceived; and in the Easter holidays, instead of an Habeas Corpus, which they pleaded for, it was hindered by a letter from his Majesty, ordering the Lieutenant of the Tower to detain them in close custody, for a notable contempt (those are the words) against us. This being sent to the Judges, they were remanded to prison, May 7; they remained close prisoners 'till the latter end of November, when they were suffered to walk about the Tower; which Selden says he imagines was done to save expence, for they were, 'till this time, magnificently entertained at the King's charge*.

* Vindiciæ, p. 1430.

[X] De Successionibus, &c. This piece is dedicated to Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, whose library, he acknowledges, was of great help to him in it; and in the prologomena † he professes his opinion against the Fanatics, that the only true way of interpreting scripture is by the Fathers; Cordatiore Christianorum qui ecclesiæ Romanæ renunciarunt, idque ob compluria in ea sancita seu sententias repertas quæ sibi visa sunt divinæ contraria sine prudenti præscarum ejusce ecclesiæ historiaram, annalium, Patrum, Conciliorum, Canonum, sententiarum receptarum, usus forensis, id genus aliorum delectu, suam formari noluerunt. Et qui morose hæc & delectum hujusmodi respiciunt, sui duntaxat ingenii vi sacras literas temere explicantes, ridiculis atque impiis pacem Christianam novationibus perturbare solere passim videmus. In libro de successione in Pontificatum primo, cap. xii. he gives it as his opinion, that by the High-Priest mentioned in the Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, is not understood the High Priest properly, but the Prince or Ruler of the Synagogue; and that when mention is made of two High-Priests at the same time, it is to be understood of those Rulers. This passage is attacked by Dr Hody, in his Case of Sees vacant by unjust or uncanonical Deprivation, stated. 'I deny, says he (53), Selden's conjecture

† P. xiv. in the 2d volume of Wilkins's edition of our author's Works in 1726.

(53) P. 34. edit. 1693.

' to be true; and against it I offer the following conclusions, 1. Neither Josephus nor any of the Jewish writers any where tell us, that the High-Priests, properly so called, were deprived by the Romans of their power and authority in juridical matters, and confined to the offices of the temple. Selden does not pretend to the authority of any writer; and had there been any such thing, Josephus would certainly not have failed to have mentioned it; especially, since he mentions, that in such and such parts of Judæa there were courts of judicature erected by the Romans. 2. Josephus is so far from warranting any such opinion, that he speaks, throughout his whole History, of the High-Priests, properly so called, as of persons of great power and authority libel, intituled, A Proposition for his Majesty's Service, to bridle the Impertinence of Parliaments, which was proved before the Court to be written by Sir Robert Dudley, in the preceding reign [Y]. Hereupon, the King made it one expression of his joy, on the birth of Prince Charles, on the 29th of May, 1630, to discharge this cause. Our author taking this favourable opportunity, applied next day to the Earl of Portland, Lord-Treasurer, who procured him to be removed to the Gate-House in Westminster, May 30 (o). By this means, he was so much at liberty, that he passed the long vacation at Wress [Z]. But when his habeas corpus was brought as usual, in Michaelmas term ensuing, it was absolutely refused by the Court as before; and the Judges complaining likewise of the illegality of this removal to the Gate-House [AA], he was remanded by an order from them to his former prison, where he continued, though with the same liberty as before, 'till May 1631; when, upon a dispute in Law between the Earls of Arundel, Shrewsbury, Kent, and Pembroke, he was admitted to bail, to have the liberty of appearing in any of the Courts of Law, upon the business of that suit [BB]. After this, he was bailed from term to term, and never more detained in prison; 'till at last, petitioning his Majesty [CC] for the purpose, in the end of July, 1634, he was freed likewise from this bail, by the favour of Archbishop Laud, together with the Lord Treasurer (p). During these troubles, he wrote his book De Jure Naturali & Gentium, juxta Disciplinam Hebraeorum [DD], as he did also his Uxor Hebraica *, and finished the second edition of his Titles of Honour. As he gave no fresh matter of provocation, the King's displeasure against

(o) Dr Wilkins mistook this for an absolute discharge, but says he could not tell how Mr Selden obtained it; and he is followed herein by the General Dictionary. No doubt it was in this view that he got the removal out of the Tower.

(p) Vindiciae, p. 1434, & seq.

* The whole title is, Uxor Hebraica: sive, de Nuptiis & Divortio ex Jure Civili, id est Divino & Thalmudico Veterum Hebraeorum. Libri III. It was published in 1646, at London, in 4to. and reprinted at Francfort in 1673, 4to.

in civil affairs. 3. It is likewise confirmed by the frequent and continual changing of the High Priest under the Romans; for if they were not concerned in civil government, only in sacred, how could they come under the displeasure of the Romans. 4. When St Paul was told, that the person he had reviled was God's High-Priest, that is, High Priest properly so called, he strait infers, that he was the ruler of the people. 5. Those difficult places of scripture, upon which Selden's opinion is grounded, may fairly admit of another explication. Against this opinion of our author, that there were two rulers of the synagogue, one stiled the Prince, and the other the Father of it, and that the high-priesthood of Annas was a civil dignity; Bafnage, who opposes it, observes, that Lightfoot was once of this opinion, but retracted it afterwards, when he perceived that there was none of that name ever Prince of the synagogue. Bafnage thinks Annas and Caiaphas were both High-Priests, only held the office yearly by turns (54).

(54) Bafnage, in Exercitationibus Historico-criticis.

[Y] He was prosecuted in the Star Chamber. Dr Wilkins tells us, that he was imprisoned, and together with him, the Earls of Bedford and Clare, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr [Oliver] St John. Our author mentions this prosecution (55), but says nothing of any imprisonment upon that account, and 'tis certain he was already a prisoner on another account. Another author tells us, this paper was industriously spread about by the Fanatics, to discover the importance of Parliaments; and how, by the peoples pufes, to keep the nation in a good defence against the King's enemies. And it was suggested, that the King had not only such a design on foot, but that by him, or his means, this plot first took birth; whereas, if any credit may be given to Sir David Foulis, one not ignorant of State affairs, being therein several times employed by King James, it was discovered by him that this paper was contrived several years before; to wit, about 1613, by Sir Robert Dudley, then living at Florence, with the title of the Duke of Northumberland. The same author also informs us, that this paper was afterwards published under the title of Strafford's Plot discovered, &c. endeavouring thereby to make that Earl odious to the people, as if he had been the composer of it, and that only because a copy of it was found in his study (56).

(55) In his Vindiciae, &c.

(56) Foulis's Hist. of Fanatic Plots, p. 68. edit. 1674, folio.

[Z] He passed the long vacation at Wress. This is the liberty which Hugo Grotius speaks of, in a letter to Peiresc, dated September 3, this year, in the following terms: Ex magna Britannia, nihil habes boni post marmora Arundeliana nisi hoc unum, libero caelo sui virum optimum, & civem fortissimum Seldenum faventibus bonis omnibus (57).

(57) Grotii Epist. 118. inter Epistolas ad Gallos.

[AA] The illegality of his removal to the Gate-house. When the Judges returned to their seats in Westminster Hall, in Michaelmas term, they sent for the Marshal of the King's-Bench Prison, and demanded his prisoner, Selden; and when he produced the Treasurer's warrant, he was reprimanded by the Court for letting his prisoner go without a breve from them; observing, that if the King's mandate had been notified to the Court in time, it might easily have been done in due form of that Court. The Judges added, that in this business, the Clerk of the Crown should have given the writ to be subscribed by the Judges, upon their return to Westminster; and least the like error should be committed for the future, the Court sent Whitlock to the Treasurer, alledging, that Selden despised all Courts and forms of law, and that he had suggested to him [the Treasurer] this new and irregular method of removing himself only in the spirit of opposing them; the Treasurer professed, that he would not have granted this favour to Selden, had not that gentleman assured him, that it was quite regular; and, therefore, as it was by no means in the King's desire to oppose their proceedings in form, he delivered him up to their pleasure; whereupon, a writ was made out for remanding him to the King's-Bench Prison (58).

(58) Wilkins, as before, p. xxviii.

[BB] Was admitted to appear in any of the Courts of Law. At this time, he was retained as counsel for Donald, Lord Rea, in the famous cause of treason, against David Ramsay; the King determined that it should be decided by arms, and in duello, or single combat. In order to which, the cause being according to form, in that way of trial, to be adjudged by the Civil Law; Selden, as a common Lawyer, was excluded. He spoke this year, in Hilary term, as counsel, before the House of Lords (59), for Charles Longueville, in his application for the Barony of Grey and Ruthien; the claim to which, was derived from his mother, Susanna, sister to Henry, Earl of Kent, who died without issue; but the cause was given against him, in favour of the Earl of Kent (60).

(59) The speech is printed by Wilkins, ubi supra, and said to be spoken in Hilary term, 6 Charles I.

(60) Crooke's Reports, Vol. III. p. 601.

[CC] Upon petitioning his Majesty, &c. Dr Wilkins well observes, that this petition was not at all inconsistent with his former refusal to petition upon the first commitment. That would have implied an acknowledgment of the offence for which he was said, in the King's letter, to be committed, which was even dangerous; but that order was superseded by the second, for admitting him to go out of prison upon bail for his surrendering on demand (61).

(61) The bail were Herbert and Gardiner, both of the Inner-Temple; they were bound in 150 l. each, and himself in 500 l. Vindiciae, &c. p. 1433.

[DD] His book, De Jure Naturali & Gentium, &c. This piece has been variously censured. Le Clerc (62) and Barbeyrac (63) condemn it, not only for that obscurity of stile and perplexity of method observed in all our author's performances; but because in it he derives not his principles from the light of reason; laying down as certain, the Rabbinical tradition, concerning the seven precepts, said by them to be given by God to Noah for all mankind to observe. The author of a piece, intituled, Polygamia Triumphans (64), goes still further, and observing, that Selden here asserts, polygamy not to be contrary to the law of nature (65), produces his testimony in defence of that practice. On the other hand, this piece is highly applauded by Puffendorf, who declares, that our author would have been equal to the best writers, if he had undertaken to accommodate the jus naturale to mankind in general, with the same accuracy as he has done to the traditions of the Jews.

(62) Bibl. Choisee, Tom. IX. p. 396.

(63) In the preface to Puffendorf's, De Jure Naturæ & Gent. in French.

(64) P. 14. edit. Stockholm, 1682.

(65) Viz. in lib. v. c. 6, 7.

[EE] The

against him gradually wore away; and the share that he took, as one of the committee for managing the mask exhibited by the gentlemen of the Inns of Court, before their Majesties, on Candlemas-night, 1633, must needs have been very acceptable to them, since it was done expressly to shew, how greatly those gentlemen disapproved of William Prynne's Histriomastix (q). Besides, there was a particular reason against suffering such a mark of the King's unkindness towards him, to stand any longer unremoved. For the disputes with the Dutch about the herring-fishery, began at this time to run to an extremity, the latter having lately set up a claim to that fishery, even upon the British coast. These pretensions were grounded chiefly upon the arguments in a treatise of the celebrated Hugo Grotius, wherein this liberty was asserted to be a matter of common right. It was well known, that our author had composed a piece in defence of the King's dominion over the British seas, not long after the first rise of this dispute in the preceding reign (r); but some accidents having hindered the immediate publication of it [EE], he was easily prevailed on (s), at this juncture, to put it to the press, where it was finished in the beginning of the year 1636 (t) [FF]; and a copy of it placed among the records of the Crown,

(r) Heylin says particularly by Bishop Laud.

(s) An edition of it was printed the same year in Holland, with a defence of their right prefixed by Boxhornius, intitled, Apologia pro Navigationibus Hollandorum, &c. The importation of it into England was prohibited.

(p) See Lord Clarendon's article.

(q) This fishery was first discovered by a Dutchman in 1495, by Henry VIII. and Philip Archduke of Austria, who was the discoverer of the Netherlands. Article XIV. of that treaty long before the Dutch had erected themselves into a sovereign power, by the treaty of Munster in 1654.

[EE] The publication was hindered by some accidents. This treatise was written in the year 1618, as we are told by our author himself, as follows: That when he brought his discourse on Christmas-day to the King, the Lord-High Admiral hearing that he had written a discourse about the dominion of the sea, in the spring of 1618, ordered him to shew it and present it to his Majesty; and that, in the summer of the same year, he presented a fair copy of it, at his Majesty's own request, who gave it to the Lord-High-Admiral, to be communicated to Sir Henry Martyn, Judge of the Admiralty-court; who having read it, had the pen in his hand to give an imprimatur, but threw it down; saying, it was better to be done by the King himself: that his Majesty was about signing it when he slept suddenly; saying, he remembered something in the book about the northern sea, which might perhaps displeas his brother of Denmark, which he would not willingly do, since he owed him a large sum of money already, and must desire him to lend more freely. It was the last chapter of the second book. I accordingly, says Selden, took it again, and filled up the method again in a short time, and carried it to Court; where having waited for his Majesty often, and long, in the Admiralty-chamber to no purpose, and not being received as I thought was my due, I put the book in my study, giving over all thoughts of desiring it to be published; neither, concludes he, did I ever, of my own accord, go to the Admiral afterwards. A little after this, William, Earl of Pembroke, a friend of mine, had the book to review it, and restoring it in a month or two, it lay by me in oblivion for ten years and upwards. I heard, and and believe it, that some creatures of the Admiral's had insinuated, that I had in this book said something in diminution of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, when he grew loose about the publication of it, behaved himself unfriendly to me at Court. I was told also, by some about the King, that his Majesty, upon second thoughts, imagined it might be of some disservice to him with the United Provinces. In the beginning of the spring 1619, the Marquis of Bucks sent for me into the Parliament-chamber, and asked me in good humour, why I had not brought my book to be licenced; I answered, that I had often waited in his chamber to no purpose, both for him and my admission to his Majesty; upon which ill usage I had abstained from Court. He then invited me thither, but I never had more words with him upon the subject afterwards (65).

English right, exclusive both of French and Dutch, from fishing in the four seas, is clearly made out, from the records against the objections of Hugo Grotius, in his Mare liberum. But we must observe, that Grotius's book had been of so much service to our author, as to bring the question to this point, that if an occupancy could be proved it would constitute a right; that point, therefore, was laboured by Selden from the records. 'Tis in this view, that Selden denies that he opposes Hugo Grotius in this dispute. He speaks highly of that great man's abilities, Virum ingentis eruditionis, & rerum divinarum humanarumque (id est juris) scientissimum; and again, speaking of the speech made in defence of the English right to the fishery, by Sir Dudley Carleton, against Grotius; and of this latter's complaint, of an insinuation in that speech, as if he was imprisoned to deter other from defending his opinion, our author has these words: Diſta hæc fuerit non tam in Hugonem Grotium, quam in ipsum (quod perperam ostenditur) communioris maris jus naturale: cui expressus & simplicius multi quam ipse patrocinantur, tam doctæ & ingeniose nemo †. Grotius too speaks in the like handsome manner of Selden's work, in a letter from Paris this year (67). Ex Magna Britannia nihil habes boni, post mariora Arundeliana, nisi quod Johannes Seldenus, spectatum jam multis operibus ingenium, mare clausum addidit mari libero oppositum, si forte legeris. Eo in libro multa sane eruditione asperso, totum id mare quod ab Anglia ad littora usque Hispaniæ, Galliæ, Belgiæ, Germaniæ, Daniæ, patet, Anglico regno jure proprietatis vindicat. At nequis ostentamentum tantum ingenii putet, Extraordinario Batavorum Legato, qui nunc Londini est, facta est per Regis Britannici Ministros, ejus juris denunciatio; edicloque cautum est, ne quis eum Seldenum librum, alibi editum, in regnum importaret ||. In another letter also from Paris, May 7, 1636, he writes thus to his brother William Grotius: Seldenus sumpserit egregium libri sui epiphonema, in quo locutiones meas figuratas opposuit seriis. Ego vero illi & humano & erudito, quod me & humane & erudite tractaverit, multum debeo. Epigrammate tamen hoc puto me non lesisse jus amicitiae, quæ inter nos est:

* Mare Clausum, Lib. I. c. xxvi.

† Ibid.

(67) Letter to Peirelc, dated Sept. 1630.

|| See note (r) in the text.

*Ipsum compedibus qui vinxerat Ennefigæum,
Est Græca Xerxes multus in historia,
Lucullum, Latii, Xerxem dixere togatum, Seldenus Xerxes vere Britannus erit.*

In the second book of this treatise, cap. vii. our author endeavours to prove, that the words litus Saxo cum, in the Notitia, which was under the dominion of the comes littoris Saxonici per Britanniam, comprehends, not only the British, but the opposite shore of France and Holland. The words littoris Saxonici being equivalent to limitis transmarini. This Mr Somner thinks is a mistake of our author's, in not understanding rightly the words in the Notitia. Indeed, says he, admitting limes for litus, Britannicus had been enough; nay, it had been proper, and only proper, without any further paraphrase such as that of per Britanniam. But if we grant that the litus transmarinum was the limes, or limit, or frontier, of the British maritime court's dominion; then of necessary consequence, the ports, havens, creeks, harbours, &c. on the opposite coast one (66) Vindiciæ, &c. p. 1425. in the 3d volume of his Works, by Dr Wilkins.

[FF] It was published in 1636. The dedication to King Charles the First, in which he gives the following account of the history of the publication, is wrote, not only in elegant Latin; but in a courtly and polite address: Divi parentis tui jussu tentata olim adumbrataque, inter schedas sive neglectas sive cives per annos amplius fidecim mecum latuit, ut imperfecta nimis, sic etiam ceu interitura. Postquam autem recognitioni ejus instaurationique totus, idque ea intentissimi studii alacritate, qua, clementissimis utpote Majestatis tuæ auspiciis excitus, cavere nequibam, per menses aliquot vacaveram, non tam ut evocata revixit, quam plane renata est. Tot scilicet in ea sint emendata, tot dissoluta, recitata limata, immutata, tanta insuper accessit ubique summa est, ut pristino, quantum erat, incremento præsertimque discrepante, exeat omnino nova: tam nimirum ex iterata origine, quam ex natura &c. Atchdzacon Nicholson thinks, that the

and

in the Council-chest in the Exchequer, and in the Court of Admiralty; the English sovereignty in the seas being acknowledged by the Dutch, who payed the King thirty thousand pounds for their permission to fish in those seas this year, and agreed to give an annual tribute for the future (u) [GG]. In the mean time, how hearty soever Mr Selden shewed himself, by this performance, in maintaining the prerogative of the British sceptre, against the encroachment of foreigners, yet he was by no means well affected to the Court doctrine of the King's power, to levy money for this purpose upon the subject, without their own consent. He had been a confessor in that cause, and continued still as much out of humour as ever with the opposers of it. Therefore, in the two ensuing Parliaments, of 1640 and 1641, being returned for the University of Oxford, he both spoke and acted with the same spirit, not only in procuring satisfaction for himself and his fellow-sufferers, from the Court, but joined with the most violent, in prosecuting the Earl of Strafford and Archbishop Laud (w) [HH]. He was likewise very instrumental in depriving the Bishops of

(u) General History of England.

(w) Several of his speeches are printed in the last edition of his Works, by Dr Wilkins.

and all were appertaining to the Britons; nor might the Dutch, French, or those of Britain Armoric, then, or at any time since, justly challenge or use them as their own, nor of right stir or put out to sea by them, much less claim or have any toll, tallage, tax, tribute, impost, wreck, or any other customs or rights in any part of the maritime tracts there; nor yet might they or any other nations, without a trespass, or as invaders of the British empire and dominions, pass or repass by the channel though never so near the transmarine shore; nor, but by courtesy of the Britons, make any other use of it, which for all that I have seen or read, I cannot believe to have been observed or practised in those times (68).[†] Dr Wilkins well observes, that this matter has been settled by treaties between the two nations, which are much more firm than the arguments of these learned men. However, a Statesman must not be unacquainted with them, in the view of being prepared in case of future disputes. Archdeacon Nicolson tells us, that when our author penned this book, he was not such an inveterate enemy to the prerogative doctrine of ship-money as afterwards; for he professedly asserts, that in defence of their sovereignty at sea, our Kings constantly practised the levying great sums of money on their subjects, without the concurrence of their Parliaments. And he insinuates, that it was upon this account that the book was commanded by the King's council to be laid up as an inestimable jewel among the choice records which concerned the Crown. In answer to this, Dr Wilkins observes, that the levies for the support of the navy, 'till the end of Henry the Second's reign, are mentioned by our author, from the laws and statutes of the times when he mentions them, and 'tis well known were not passed without consent of the people; so that there was no occasion for taking express notice of the matter, and had it been otherwise understood at that time, when our author opposed the ship money without an act of Parliament, can it be imagined that his antagonists would have been silent on this head, and yet we do not find that this was ever done or that this book was then ever objected to him. It was afterwards † translated into English by Merchmont Nedham, the scurrilous news writer, as Mr Wood calls him, who suppressed the Epistle Dedicatory, interlarding it with several treasonable comments and false glosses of his own; besides which, he added a few old evidences, supposed to be communicated to him by John Bradshaw, of infamous memory. After the Restoration it was revised and corrected by James Howel, Historiographer Royal. The book was attacked by Theodorus Grafwinckell, Knight of the order of St Mark, and Advocate of the Finances in Holland, in Vindiciis Maris Liberi, &c. (69); in which the author having taxed Selden with prostituting his pen to the service of the Court-party in order to obtain his liberty, cites the following words, as from Petrus Burgus: Seldenus nuperrime integrum opus scripsit *; and then adds, says Selden, most insolently, Non mirum: virorum enim ille inter sæculi nostri primicerios numerandus, & meliori fortuna dignus, sati sui infelicitate, carceris se non digni colonus erat. Hinc ut exiret, seque libertati amissæ redonandum sperare daretur, animum ad scribendum appulit, &c.

fence, his Vindiciæ, &c. which we have often quoted in the course of this memoir, and of which something more will be remarked above at the end of the text.

[GG] They agreed to pay an annual tribute for the future.] It would be a great mistake to ascribe this submission to the force of Mr Selden's arguments. They stood out 'till the ultima ratio regum convinced them of their folly in opposing the claim; and did not consent to it, 'till their whole fishing fleet had been destroyed by sixty of our men of war, under the command of the Earl of Northumberland; an observation which no doubt had been made by Sommersdyke, when he advised the States to suppress Grafwinckell's answer to Selden; saying, that this affair must be decided by the sword, and not by the pen Ea res non esset calami, sed gladii (70).

[HH] Archbishop Laud.] When the Canons, which had passed in Convocation after the [Short] Parliament was dissolved in 1640, were called in question by the ensuing [Long] Parliament in the House of Commons, the Archbishop thinking, possibly he might have some interest in Mr Selden, wrote to him the following letter:

To myc much honored friend, Mr John Selden,
' These. Sal. in Christo.

' Worthy Sir,

' I understand that the business about the late cannons will be handled againe in your House to morrowe. I shall never aske any unworthy thinge of you; but give me leave to saye as follows. If wee have erred in anye point of legalitie unknowne unto us, wee shall be hartelye sorye for it, and hope that error shall not be made a cryme; we heare, that ship-monye is layd asyde as a thinge will dye of it selfe; and I am glad it will have soe quiett a death. Maye not these unfortunate cannons be suffered to dye as quietlye, without blemishinge the Church, which hath to manye enemyes both at home and abroad? If this maye be, I heare promise you, I will presentlye humblye beseech his Majestye, for a licence to reviewe the cannons, and abrogat them; assuringe myselfe, that all mye brethren will joyne with me to preserve the publicke peace, rather then that anye act of ours shall be thought a publicke grievance. And upon mye credit with you, I had moved for this licence at the very first sittinge of this Parliament, but that both myselfe and others did feare the House of Commons would take offence at it, (as they did at the last) and sayde we did it on purpose to prevent them. I understand you meane to speake of this busynesse in the House to morrowe, and that hath made me wright these lynes to you to lett you knowe our meaninge and desyers. And I shall take it for a great kindnes to me, and a great service to the Church, if by your means the House will be satisfied with this, which is heare offered of abrogatinge the cannons. To God's blessed protection I leave you, and rest,

' Your lovinge poor friend,

Lambeth,
November 29, 1640.

W. Cant.

' I mean to move the Kinge this daye for a licence, as is within mentioned (71).'

[II] A piece

(68) Wilkins's preface to our author's Works, p. xxviii, & seqq. from Somner's MS. in the Canterbury Library.

† Upon the breaking out of the Dutch war in 1652.

(69) The whole title runs thus: Theodori J. F. Grafwinckelii J. C. Hagæ Commentum, 1652. Maris liberi Vindiciæ adversus Petrum Baptistam Burgum Ligustici maritimi dominii assertorem. 1652.

* Burgus writes, with more truth, editit.

† Ad Burg. c. vi. p. 113.

Neque talia agitantem successus destituit ||. And the following year Selden published, in his own de-

(70) Huberus in H.R. Civili, p. 3. §. 6. l. 2.

(71) From a MS. in the possession of the late Nicolas Harding, Esq; printed in the General Dictionary.

of their votes in Parliament, and incapacitating the Clergy in general to exercise any temporal jurisdiction. He likewise printed a piece, in 1642, in favour of the Presbyterian parity [II], and others upon the power and privileges of Parliaments [KK]. But though he opposed the King's commission of array [LL] this year, yet he asserted his prerogative over [II] A piece in defence of the Presbyterian parity.

This was a passage in the annals of Eutychius, concerning the government of the Church of Alexandria. Our author printed it with this pompous title, Eutychii Egyptii Patriarchæ Orthodoxorum Alexandrini, Scripturis at in Oriente admodum vetustis ac illustris ita in Occidente tum paucissimis visi, tum per raro auditi, Ecclesiæ suæ origines, ex ejusdem Arabico nunc primum typis edidit, ac versione & commentario auxit Johannes Seldenus;

— Non si quid TURBIDA ROMA,

Elevet, accedas; examenque improba in ILLA

Castiges trutinæ. —

PERS.

In the preface he observes, that the disputes about the order of Bishops, turn greatly upon the authenticity of a passage in the eighty-fifth epistle of St Jerom, relating to the Patriarchate of the Church of Alexandria; in which, any superiority of order is expressly denied. He obtrudes this author as an Egyptian Bede, and makes no doubt but these annals were, for the most part, taken out of the archives of the Church of Alexandria; whereas it appears, from the history of Abul Farajus, published by Dr Pococke, that in the tenth century, when Eutyches wrote, there were no archives of that Church. For when the city was taken by the Saracens, many years before, in the reign of Sultan Omar; his General, Annas Elmal, as by a particular order from his master, commanded all the books and writings in it to be sent to the baths as fuel for heating them, where they were all consumed. Eutyches was extremely ignorant in the ecclesiastical affairs of that time, to which Selden's passage relates; as is evident from the instance of Origen, than whom no person was more famous in the Church at that time, the latter part of the third century, when he flourished; yet Eutyches has thrust him down to the middle of the sixth century, makes a Bishop of him, and brings him to the Council of Constantinople, called by the Emperor Justinian, to be there condemned. Selden had imbibed a great opinion of this author from Erpenius, who, as he says, gave him a copy of it at London; to whom it was recommended by Isaac Casaubon as a very useful work. Selden, therefore, in the year 1652, prevailed with Dr Pococke to undertake a translation of it, and put that, with the original Arabic, to press at Oxford, engaging to be at the whole expence of the edition himself. Dr Langbaine, Provost of Queen's college, was also desired by him to assist in the business. This appears from several letters of this last to Selden, in one of which (72), upon Pococke's disliking one of the characters of the Arabic font at Oxford, and desiring him to procure a new puncheon and matrice, with five or six pounds of letters, the request was preferred to Selden, by Dr Langbaine, in the words of the Friars in Chaucer, who begged money for completing their cloyster;

Now help Thomas, for him that harrow'd hell,

Or else mote we all our books sell.

In another, wrote to Dr Pococke, presently after Selden's death, Langbaine acquaints him, that he saw Selden the day before he died, 'who told me, says he, in the hearing of one of his executors, Mr Hayward, how he had disposed of his impression of Eutychius to you and myself; and so he did, by a codicil made to his will in June 1653. I mentioned to him, continues the doctor, that he had often spoken of intended notes; upon that, he gave orders, that all letters or notes concerning that author should be delivered to us.' The codicil here mentioned runs thus: 'Whereas there is in the press, at Oxford, Eutychius, Patriarch of Alexandria, his annals, in Arabic and Latin, under the care of my loving friends Dr Gerard Langbaine and Dr Edward Pococke, Professor of Hebrew and Arabic; if at the time of my decease there should not be left by me, in the hands of Dr Langbaine, money enough to pay for the finishing of the work at the press, my mind and will is, that so much shall be given into his hands to finish it, as he and Dr Pococke shall direct.

VOL. VI. No 302.

' And farther, that when the impression is finished, all and every the copies of the said impression be left wholly to the said Langbaine and Pococke; to whom I hereby give and bequeath them, which I think will be five hundred in number. There are indentures in my behalf, between the said Dr Langbaine and the Printer, which direct the business for the charge of the press (73).' Accordingly, Dr Pococke published the work in 1658, in two volumes folio; in the preface to which, he declares, that it was not undertaken by him from his own choice and inclination, but upon the persuasion and importunity of Selden. That there are many fabulous things in these annals relating to Ancient History, and that the author gives as absurd accounts of the transactions in the western parts of the world, as our Western writers do commonly in those of the Eastern. As to the paragraph of these annals, that had been printed and published by Selden, who had done it very incorrectly; Dr Pococke sets it in a true light (74). In justice to Selden, his picture was put before this edition, and underneath Illustrissimo Johanne Seldeno ἱεροσολίμης Chorago. Whence the compiler of the Bodleian catalogue of printed books, in 1674, imagined, that Selden began this translation, which was only finished by Pococke, whereas the word choragus (75) expresses in a beautiful figure, that it was printed at Selden's charge.

[KK] And another upon the power and privileges of Parliaments. These are, 1. A discourse concerning the rights and privileges of the Subjects, in a conference desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses, in the Year 1628. 2. The privileges of the Baronage of England when they sit in Parliament. 3. A brief discourse concerning the power of Peers and Commoners in Parliament, in point of Judicature.

[LL] The King's commission of array. Lord Clarendon assures us, that our author 'declared himself very positively with much sharpness against it, as a thing expressly without any authority of law; the statute upon which, being, as he said, repealed; and disapproved very much of the ill consequence which might result by submitting to it. He answered the arguments which had been used to support it, and easily prevailed with the House not to like a proceeding, which they knew was intended to do them hurt, and to lessen their authority. But his authority and reputation prevailed much further than in the House, and begot a prejudice against it in many well-affected without doors. When the King was informed of it, he was much troubled, having looked upon Mr Selden as well disposed to his service (76). We have in the General Dictionary a letter of Selden's to Lord Falkland, wrote, after the vote against this commission had passed the House, as follows:

June 29, 1642.

' That of the vote your Lordship speaks of is true, as I presume you by this time see in print. But in what degree it was grounded on my authority (which doubtless goes here for little or nothing), you may guess by this, that I was not in the House at that voting, or any other time when any agitation or mention of it was there, 'till yesterday, being Tuesday, when there was a declaration voted there to shew the reasons of that vote. But it is true, that I was of the committee of Lords and Commons, to whom some ten days since it was referred. And among the rest, my opinion (and that upon the best consideration I could make) was, that it is against law; and so is my opinion still, which shall, as in all other things, change, when I shall be taught the contrary. Your Lordship had sooner received answer, if I could sooner have put my reasons together, and have them transcribed: As they are, I humbly thus offer them to you, and am most devoutly,

' Your Lordship's most humble

' and most affectionate Servant,

' J. S. (77).'
[MM] Yet

(73) Dr Langbaine died in 1654.

(74) It had been censured before by Abraham Echellensis, Part I. c. ix. p. 29. and Morinus de Ordinationibus, P. iii. c. 7. and Renaudot.

(75) It denotes originally the person who was at the charge of exhibiting the scenes in a play, and is taken from Plautus in Perf. Act I. scene 3. where Saturn asks, ἄνευ ὀργαντα. Tom. answers, Abs Chorago. Du Pin has made the same mistake in Bibl. Eccles. Tom. VIII.

(76) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 667. edit. 1707.

(77) Copied from some papers in the hands of the late Nicholas Harding, Esq;

(72) Epist. 732.

over the militia [MM]; and, about the same time, the Lord Keeper Littleton having voted for that ordinance of the Parliament, for the assuming this power to themselves, his Majesty took the Great Seal from him, intending it for Mr Selden; but he declined the first overture that he received of that intention [NN]: yet some of the leading men in Parliament observing his conduct, took up a suspicion of his being concerned, the following year, with Mr Waller the poet, in the design of delivering the city of London to the King. But that jealousy appearing upon examination not to be well grounded [OO], and our author having, moreover, purged himself by his oath, on the sixth of June, when the Assembly of Divines at Westminster was erected on the 12th of that month, he was appointed one of the lay-members, and frequently sat in it [PP]. Soon after this he took

[MM] Yet he asserted the King's prerogative over the militia.] The last mentioned Noble Historian informs us, that ' Lord Falkland, with his Majesty's leave, wrote a friendly letter to Mr Selden, to know his reason, why, in such a conjuncture, whatever his opinions were, he would oppose the submission to the commission of array, which no body could deny to have had it's original from law, and which many learned men still believed to be very legal, to make way for the establishment of an ordinance concerning the militia, which had no manner of pretence to right. He answered this letter very frankly, as a man who had believed himself in the right upon the commission of array, and that the arguments he had used against it could not be answered, summing up some of those arguments in as few words as they could be comprehended in. But then he did as frankly inveigh at the ordinance for the militia, which he said was without any shadow of law or pretence of precedent, and most destructive to the government of the kingdom; and he did acknowledge, that he had been the more inclined to make that discourse in the House against the commission, that he might the more freely argue against the ordinance, which was to be considered upon a day then appointed; and was most confident that he should likewise overthrow the ordinance, which he confessed could be less supported; and he did believe, that it would be much better, if both were rejected, than if either of them should stand and remain uncontrolled. But his confidence deceived him, and he quickly found, that they who suffered themselves to be intirely governed by his reason, when those conclusions resulted from it, which contributed to their own designs, would not at all be guided by it, or submit to it, when it persuaded that which contradicted, and would disappoint those designs. And so upon the day appointed for the debate of their ordinance, when he applied all his faculties to the convincing them of the illegality and monstrousness of it, by arguments at least as clear and demonstrable as his former had been, they made no impression upon them, but were easily answered by those who with most passion insisted on their own sense; he had satisfied them very well when he concurred with them in judgment, but his reasons were weak, when he crossed their resolutions. So most men, concludes his Lordship, are deceived in being too reasonable; concluding, that reason will prevail upon those men to submit to what is right and just, who have no other consideration of right or just, but as it advances their interest, or complies with their humour and passion (78).'

[NN] He declined the first overture of that intention.] This is grounded upon the following letter, to the Marquis of Hertford, concerning that affair, copied by the same hand as the former to Lord Falkland, from Mr Harding's papers.

' My Lord,

' I received from his most excellent Majesty a command for my waiting on him at York; and he is most graciously pleased to say, that I should make as much haste as my health will permit. I have been for many weeks, my Lord, very ill, and am still so infirme, that I have not so much as any hope of being able to endure any kind of travell, much less such a journey. Yet if that were all, I should willingly venture any loss of myself rather than not perform my duty to his Majesty. But if I were able to come, I call God to witness, I have no apprehension of any possibilitie of doing his Majesty service there. On the other side, it is most probable or rather apparent, that a member of the House

' of Commons, and of my condition, by coming thither, might thereby soon be a cause of some very unseasonable disturbance; by this name, I call whatsoever will, at this time, (as this would) doubtlesse, occasion some further or other differences twixt his Majesty and that House. My legal and humble affections to his Majesty and his service are, and shall be, as great and as hearty as any man's; and, therefore, when I am able, I shall really expresse them. But I beseech your Lordship, be pleased, upon what I have here represented, to preserve me from his Majesty's displeasure, which I hope too, from his most excellent goodness towards me; your Lordship's great and continual favours to me, imboldned me to make this suit; which granted, will be a singular happiness to,

Your Lordship's most humble servant,

J. S.

This letter is very agreeable to, and even confirms, Lord Clarendon's account of this affair; which is, that ' the Lord Falkland and himself, to whom his Majesty referred the consideration of a proper person for it, did not doubt of Mr Selden's affection to the King; but withal, they knew him so well, that they concluded he would absolutely refuse the place if it were offered him. He was, continues his Lordship, in years, and of a tender constitution; he had for many years enjoyed his ease, which he loved; he was rich, and would not have made a journey to York, or have lain out of his own bed for any preferment which he had never affected (79).'

[OO] The suspicion appeared not to be well grounded.] Mr Waller was examined about it; and ' being asked, whether Selden, Pierpoint, Whitelocke, and others by name, were acquainted with that design; he answered, that they were not; but that he came one evening to Selden's study, where Pierpoint and Whitelocke then were with Selden, on purpose to impart it to them all; and speaking of such a thing in general terms, those gentlemen did fo inveigh against any such thing as treachery and baseness, and that which might be the occasion of shedding much blood, that he said, he durst not, for the awe and respect which he had for Selden and the rest, communicate any of the particulars to them, but was almost disheartned himself to proceed in it (80).'

[PP] Sat in the Assembly of Divines.] Mr Whitelocke, who was himself a member, tells us, that in the debates of that assembly, Mr Selden spoke admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning; and sometimes, when they had cited a text of scripture to prove their assertion, he would tell them, perhaps, in your little pocket bible with gilt leaves, which they would often pull out and read, the translation may be thus, but the Greek or the Hebrew signifies thus or thus; and so would often totally silence them (81). Of this there are some instances: as when Gilassius Scotus, from Deuteronomy xvii. 12. endeavoured to prove there were two courts of Priests and Judges, and that there lay an appeal from one to the other; Selden denied that two courts were intended by those words. The Vulgate, 'till forty years ago, read the place in question so, Qui non obediverit sacerdoti, ex decreto Judicum morietur; if this be the true reading, there is not the least shadow of two courts, as included there. If the Judges, in any inferior courts, were doubtful in their opinions and went to Jerusalem for a solution therein, and brought back a solution of their doubt, and yet did not give judgment accordingly, they were put

(79) Hist. of the Rebellion, as before.

(80) Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 70. Lond. 1732, fol.

(81) Ibid. p. 1.

(78) History of the Rebellion, ubi supra.

(x) He had been one of the managers for the House of Commons in the Archbishop's trial.

took the Covenant, and, on the eighth of November, he entered upon the post of Keeper of the Records in the Tower, at the appointment of the Parliament. However, upon the attainder of Archbishop Laud (x), in 1644, when the Commissioners seized his endowment of the Arabick lecture at Oxford, Mr Selden, always a friend to learning, defended the Professor's right against that seizure, and procured a restitution [22]. He published his treatise De Anno Civili & Calendario Judaico the same year. In 1645, he was appointed a Commissioner of the Admiralty, but that commission determined in a few days (y); and, upon the death of Dr Eden in July following, being elected unanimously Master of Trinity-hall in Cambridge [R R], with the direction and approbation to death. Those Judges were called rebels by the law of the Hebrews.—Upon the point of the Christians assembling immediately after the Ascension, Acts xi. 46. he gave this explication, that they were πρεσβυτεροι παρισιαις, not as Christians, but as Judaizing Gentiles. For the Jews, who were divided into Scribes and Pharisees, did not acknowledge the Christians to belong to their nation; 'tis said they were called Essenes. Now the Jews of Jerusalem, converted to the Christian faith there, held themselves obliged to observe the law of Moses; and what wonder, if in this opinion they were constantly in the temple. Whence as there is said to be four hundred and eighty synagogues in Jerusalem, in Megillan, folio 73; seventy of which consisted at least of ten families, as appears from Maimonides, חלפול; so the same custom was observed by the Christians; and they divided themselves into different synagogues or assemblies. After the manner of Jews, they feasted at the temple; after the manner of Christians, they broke bread, κατ' οίκου; בית כנסת the house of the synagogue was some house set apart for this use; as to preferve the Christians in Jerusalem, κτήματα καὶ ὑπόθηκες, so no house could be called his own by any Christian; but in this place κατ' οίκου means the house where all had public prayer.—When the discourse turned upon Acts ii. about the different languages heard at Pentecost, some asserted that it was only different dialects of the same language, which yet was understood by all: Selden contradicted them, and said, that variety of languages was not necessary in the ministry of holy things; and that, except in the words of the woman taken in adultery, and of the sacerdotal benediction, which are pronounced in Hebrew, the benedictions in the temple were made in any language that was understood by the people. That the Hellenistic Jews, wherever they were dispersed, spoke in the Greek language; and Phœbe is affirmed by Drusus to be ignorant of the Hebrew; that when a Judge, to be admitted into the Sanhedrim, was required to be instructed in the knowledge of LXX languages, it was to be understood that he must understand various languages. Synagogues of the freedmen, Grecians, &c. manifest a diversity of nations, and why not therefore a diversity of languages. That in Acts vi. a plain and evident distinction is made between the Hellenists and the Hebrews living separately at that time, when all things were common.

(y) It was only a committee of six Lords and twelve Commons, 'till this affair could be settled; they were appointed April 15, and on the 18th the Parliament made three commissioners, the Earl of Warwick, B. and Pelham.

Here we see how good a reason Cleveland, the Poet, had for the following words in his mixt assembly:

And Selden is a galliard by himself,
And well may be, there's more Divines in him
Then in all this their Jewish Sanhedrim (82).

(82) Lightfoot's Genuine Remains.

[22] He procured a restitution, &c.] This was an estate of about forty pounds a year, called Budd's pastures, in the parish of Bray, in Berkshire. John Greaves acquainted Selden with the injury done by this seizure to his friend Dr Pococke, then Arabic Professor, appointed by the Archbishop himself; and begged his interest in the matter. No body could be more ready than Selden was, to grant the request; he told Mr Greaves, that he had a due sense both of the injustice and scandal of the proceeding, and that the persons concerned in it could have no countenance for it, from the order of Parliament, by which they pretended to act; for the sequestration appointed by that order could only relate to particular persons: as Teius and Sempronius, (that was his expression) and not to corporations, which was the case of these lands. He also promised, that he would himself search the rolls, where this donation was recorded, and make the best use of it he could when he had found it. Accordingly, he afterwards commended the matter to some of the leading men of that time, with much earnestness, with whom he had a considerable interest, and by their means this donation was at length restored to Dr Pococke, about the middle of the year 1647, after it had been detained from him about three years (83).

[R R] He was elected Master of Trinity-Hall in Cambridge.] Some time after the election, Selden, deferring his answer, not being, as it seems, determined in his mind about the acceptance, to which he was sollicitated by several of his friends; the Fellows of the society sent him the following Latin letter:

‘ Clarissime Vir,
‘ Cum primum te in præfecturam aulae Trinitatis
‘ cooptavimus, illud nobis solum incubuisse arbitrati
‘ sumus, ut uno eodemque negotio collegio magistrum,
‘ rei literariæ ornamentum, & academiæ patronum,
‘ & præsidium prospiceremus. Qua quidem in re ‘ postquam summis utriusque ordinis viris visum sit ‘ electionis nostræ album calculum adicere, nihil
‘ denique restare speravimus, nisi ut desiderijs nostris
‘ gravissima, jam Pan-Anglii hujus autoritate munitis
‘ succumbes, & voluntatem tuam, adhuc fluctuantem
‘ in utilitatem, atque commodum nostrum dirigi ac
‘ desigi patiaris. Te igitur repetitis denuo votis
‘ ambimus, ut & nos tanti senatus judicio fruamur,
‘ & tu suffragijs tandem nostris supremam manum
‘ imponas: in cujus omnino potestate est, ne orbi-‘ tatem nostram importune lugeamus. Frustra statu-‘ torum interpretamentum sollicitamus, cum am-‘ plissimus ille conventus (nisi ipse nobis te ipsum ‘ invidens) societatem nostram ditioni tuæ addiderit.
‘ Satis cum modestia tua certatum est, ad humani-
‘ tatem tuam provocamus, quam si expugnari demum
‘ siveres curatum erit, ne aut nostris nos obsequi
‘ aut tuæ te facilitatis poeniteat. Fac nos te factu-
‘ rum & speramus & ardemus, vir exoptatissime, ut
‘ te præsentem cominus salutemus, quem eminus mirati
‘ sumus; at qui in Edeno securi fuimus, in Seldeno ‘ felices esse possimus.

‘ Humillimi tui clientes.’

And to leave nothing undone, that might be done, to testify their ardent desires to have this honour, they denounced the election to the Chancellor of the university, the Earl of Holland, in form, for his ratification, to this effect, That the Mastership of the said Hall being vacant by the death of Thomas Eden, the late Master, on the eighteenth of July; they, the Fellows, or at least the major part of them, assembled for the choice of a new Master, and due regard being had for a fit person for the same, did, on the twenty-third of the same month, direct their votes upon John Selden, Esq; Therefore, say they, and because it did and doth belong to your office, we have ordered Robert Wiseman, LL.D. William Forth, and John Begg, LL.B. jointly and severally to appear before you, and present our election and this instrument of it to you. In witness whereof, we have set our common college seal to these presents, dated 19 August, 1645.

Dr Wilkins observes, it does not appear what moved Selden to make this refusal; and is of opinion, that it was not, however, out of any secret hatred to the Clergy, since, though he denied the Clergy's divine right to their possessions, he was very zealous for maintaining them in their rights established by the laws of England. One would be apt to think, from this reason of the doctor's, that he mistakes Trinity-hall for Trinity college, which indeed is a society chiefly of Clergy, and the Master also obliged to be in Orders; a reason sufficient for Selden's refusal; whereas, (83) See Pococke's articles.

(z) Wilkins says, it was by a mandate of the Parliament. Life of our author, p. 37.

of some of the principal members in both Houses of Parliament (z), he renounced the election: yet, in 1646, he secured a donation of Archbishop Bancroft's to that university [SS]. In 1647, he published Fleta, seu Commentarius Juris Anglicani sic nuncupatus *; and being appointed one of the standing Committee for hearing and receiving reports from the visitors of the two universities (aa), he was very serviceable to that of Oxford, upon many occasions, both this and the following year [TT]. He was greatly displeas'd with the

* In this piece, among other things, he discovered the author, viz. Rich. de Winchedon, of the Year-book in the time of Edward II. which was printed in 1638, fol. in pursuance of a particular recommendation of Judge Hale, from a manuscript authenticated by Mr Selden. Preface to that Year-book. (aa) This committee consisted of 20 Lords, and 49 Commoners, six of whom were Lawyers.

whereas, Trinity-hall is a foundation appropriated to the study of Civil and Canon Law, and entirely consisting of such Fellows; and, therefore, Selden's obstinacy must be attributed to the causes assigned by Lord Clarendon, for his opinion, that he would have refused the Great-Seal, which was designed for him; otherwise several particular motives concurred to incline him to make this acceptance of the Mastership; besides it's being a society dedicated to his study, he must have been well acquainted, and probably have had some degree of friendship with Dr Eden, not so much on account of his eminence in his profession, as that the doctor had sat in the House of Commons with him in every Parliament, notwithstanding he was Chancellor to Dr Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely, from the first year of King Charles's reign, and lately had been joined with him in the committee for examining into the complaints against the Lord Marshal's court, or Court of Honour, October 4, 1640; and in 1643, in that for managing the affairs of the Admiralty. The doctor had likewise taken the Covenant as well as Selden, had been a singular benefactor to his college, and effectually saved them from those injuries which had been voted to other colleges, and which is well hinted in the conclusion of the Fellows letter above cited, as an inducement for Selden to take them under his protection; Ut qui in Edeno securi fuimus, in Seldeno felices esse possimus.

[SS] He secured a donation of Archbishop Bancroft's to Cambridge.] The Archbishop, by his Will (85), bequeathed all the books in his study to the Archbishops his successors, upon this condition, that his immediate successor should give his bond, or other security, that he would leave them entire, and without embezzlement, to his successor, and so on, from one to another, for ever; but if his successor should refuse to give such security, then he bequeathed them to his Majesty's new-erected college at Chelsey, but conditionally again, that the said college was finished in six years after his decease; and, if that did not take effect, then to the university of Cambridge. Whether his successors, Abbot and Laud, gave the security demanded, or no, is uncertain; however, the books continued at Lambeth 'till this time, when the first design of building Chelsey-college having been set aside, and the order of Bishops being voted down, Mr Selden, of his own mere motion, and without any application at all, suggested to the university their right to the said books; and, by his direction and assistance, not only Archbishop Bancroft's books, but likewise his successor Abbot's, were delivered into the possession of the university. However, after the Restoration, when Archbishop Juxon demanded them back, and he dying in a short time, his successor Sheldon pursued the demand, as founded upon Bancroft's Will, they were restored to the Archbishop, and remain still in the library at Lambeth (86). The university of Cambridge wrote some letters of thanks to Selden on this occasion, in one of which they express themselves thus: Illud propensissimum in nos animum non parum commendare possit, quod præter spem expectationemque omnem quasi Deo quopiam procurante dormientibus fere hæc evenerint, idemque dies & consilium titum, & felicissimum eventum obtulerit. And in another letter they write as follows: Tua primum solertia hunc thesaurum nobis auxerit, tua animi benevolentia academice vocavit, tuis auspiciis & diligentia suffragia omnium adjudicarunt (87).

[TT] He was very serviceable to Oxford on many occasions.] The committee was appointed May 1, this year; and on the 15th a citation was fixed by the visitors upon the doors of the Convocation house, appointing both the Proctors, and all the Heads of colleges, to appear before them in that place, on the 19th of the next month, between the hours of nine and eleven in the morning; when it happened, that Harris, one of the Visitors, preaching before them at St Mary's, held them 'till past eleven. Upon which, the Vice-chancellor, Dr Samuel Fell, having gotten a testimonial of the attendance of those that had been summoned, attested on the place in due form by a publick notary, immediately dismissed the assembly. However, the citation being renewed, both Dr Fell and the rest were ejected; among these was Dr Payne, Hebrew Professor, and Canon of Christ-Church. Selden, upon the death of Dr Morris, the Hebrew Professor, next year, procured an order from the committee, appointing Dr Pocke to succeed him in that Professorship, and to Dr Payne's Canonry. There are several letters expressing Selden's protection to the university, in his Life by Dr Wilkins; and a long one upon this occasion, in which they applied to him as their only hope and refuge. In one of these letters, Dr Gerard Langbaine, dated March 20, 1648, writes thus: Notwithstanding those common endearments, by which you have purchased so great an interest in their disconsolate university.—However, the condition of this place be now so desperate, that salus ipsa servare non potest; yet we are all abundantly satisfied in your unwearied care and passionate endeavours for our preservation. We know and confess,

— Si Pergama dextra

Defendi poterant etiam hac defensione fuissent.

Of this we are confident, next under God's, it must be imputed to your extraordinary providence, that we have stood thus long. You have been the only belli mora, and

Quicquid apud nostræ cessatum est mania Trojæ

Hæctoris (I cannot add Æneæque, for he had no second) — manu victoria Graium

Hæsit.

By your good acts and prudent manage, our six months have been spun out into two years, and it has been thus far verified upon us by your means,

Nec capti potuere capi.

In another letter, after this, it appears, they did not absolutely despair of his being able to serve them.

Noluit desperatissimam valetudinem medicinæ præcipue quam Deus & quædam interat, Te adstante & salvare jubente, adhuc denuo non diffidimus instauraturi sunt clienti, simul ac matri tuæ, Academice Oxoniensi *. * Wilkins's Life, p. xliii.

Pocke was summoned, it is said, by the Visitors, to take the Covenant; upon which, his friend Greaves wrote to Selden, who advised neither to provoke them, nor to give them any advantage by appearing before them, but to keep out of the reach of their quarter-staff, which would strike down all before it, and against which there was no ward, but suffering or complying. Pocke's name being returned to the committee, as one that contemned their authority, Mr Greaves found the same continuance of affection from Selden as formerly; but he complained greatly of such injustice and wilful baseness, as made him weary of striving against the stream, tho' he said he despaired not entirely of doing Pocke some good. As Pocke, it is certain, was never before the Visitors upon this occasion, and yet kept his place, Dr Timothy Halton being asked about it, said, the Visitors never had the opportunity of pressing the Covenant upon any members of that university, nor was any removed for not taking it. That though, in their commission in 1647, the clause of tendering the Covenant was inserted, yet that com-

(84) See a further account of this worthy person, in Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, p. 240, & seq. of which he was some time Law Professor.

(85) He died Nov 2, 1610; and his Will is dated Oct. 28, preceding.

(86) Wilkins.

(87) Dr Hill, Master of Trinity-college, and Vicechancellor, was also instrumental in procuring this disposition in favour of the University. Funeral Sermon, by Dr Tuckney.

the violent measures that were then pursued against the King, and when the Εικων Βασιλικη came out, presently after his Majesty's death, our author could by no means be prevailed upon to draw his pen against it, notwithstanding Cromwell employed his utmost interest to engage him thereto. After this, the management of publick affairs fell into hands, upon whom our author had no influence; he therefore spent his time altogether in his study, where he was sure both to gratify his own private humour, and at the same time to do eminent service to the publick. In 1650, he printed his first book De Synedriis & Praefecturis Hebraeorum [UU]. He profecuted this subject as long as he lived afterwards; to which he added a second book in 1653, and in the interim published, in 1652, a preface to the Decem Scriptores Anglicanae, containing an account of those writers, with some remarks upon their several histories in folio (bb). In 1653, he published his Vindiciae secundum integritatem existimationis suae, &c. and made his Will the same year. In the beginning of 1654, being near seventy years old, he began to decline very sensibly, and in some months grew apprehensive of his approaching dissolution; when, sending for Dr Usher and Dr Gerard Langbaine, he discoursed with them upon the vanity of learning, and declared, that all his hopes of salvation was upon the promises in Scripture. Not long after, having a mind to make some alterations in his Will, he wrote a letter to his friend Bulstrode Whitelocke, Esq; in these terms:

‘ My Lord,
 ‘ I am a most humble suitor to your Lordship, that you would be pleased that I might ‘ have your presence for a little time tomorrow or next day. Thus much wearies the ‘ most weak hand and body of your Lordship's most humble servant,

‘ J. SELDEN (cc).”

This letter is dated November 10, 1654, from White-Friars. He had resided for some years in the Friary-house there, being possessed of it in the right of Elizabeth, Countess-dowager of Kent, who had appointed him executor of her Will, having before, from the first of her widowhood, committed the management of her affairs to him*. Mr Whitelocke came according to his request, but found his weakness so much increased, that he was not able to perform his intentions. He died the last day of November, 1654, and was buried, according to his own request †, in the Temple-church, Archbishop Usher preaching his funeral sermon. He wrote an inscription for his monument [WW], which was found in the same box with his Will (dd). By this last it appeared that he died very rich [XX], as well in other effects, as in books and monuments of literature. These he bequeathed

(bb) Dr Wilkins, in his preface, has given us a dissertation of Rudd, keeper of the Durham library, asserting the History of the Church of Durham to Simon Dunelmensis, Monk and Precentor of that monastery, against Selden, who ascribes it to Tergotus Prior of the same monastery.

(cc) Whitelocke's Memorians.

* He lived in a conjugal way with her, unmarried. Wood and Wilkins.

(dd) Langbaine's Letter to Dr Pococke, in the Life of the latter, prefixed to his English Works, by Leonard Twells.

† Mentioned in his Will. Mr Wood has given a very particular description of the vault in which he was buried.

(88) Pococke's Life, by Twells.

(89) Wood's History and Antiquities of Oxford.

(90) See Greaves's article.

(91) In Canone Chronico, p. 182.

mission was vacated; and in the next, granted November 28, 1648, the clause was omitted by the interest of Mr Selden (88). Mr Wood, who says this clause was inserted likewise in the second commission, tells us, that this commission was clandestinely obtained, only six or seven of the committee being present. It is not unlikely, that Mr Selden was one of the absent members; and, upon hearing what had been done, might procure either a revocation, or an order for this clause, which required the taking of the Covenant not to be put in execution (89). Dr Pococke was not the only person who felt the good effect of Mr Selden's friendship in these times; for, when Mr Greaves was ejected, this friend rescued the chest of his papers and mathematical instruments from the hands of the soldiers, and procured them for the owner (90).

[UU] De Synedriis & Praefecturis Hebraeorum. Among many other singular notions started in this treatise, he speaks of these Courts assembling before Moses; to which Sir John Marsham (91) remarks, that it does not appear that any of the Patriarchs before Moses, exercised any forensic jurisdiction, and much less that Courts of Law were constituted in the cities and villages: that the family of Heber, from Sem to Abraham, lived in Mesopotamia, and that it was not sufficiently clear that they were sui juris; that the posterity of Abram were in continual peregrination, 'till they were settled in Egypt, where they were far from having their own laws; that there was no republick of the Hebrews, no courts of Judicature, nor forensic practice, before they came out of Egypt; that the laws concerning the Judges were given at Marah, where God gave them statutes and judgments. Exod. xv. 25.

[WW] He wrote an inscription for his monument. It was drawn up in these terms: ‘ Natus est 16 Dec. Salvingtonæ, qui viculus est Terring, oppidi in Suffexia maritimi, in ædibus LACRES ibi dictum, parentibus honestis, Johanne Seldeno Thomæ filio (qui anno natus, septuagenarius obiit) & Margarita Barkeræ, Thomæ cognominis à Rushington, ex equestri in Cantia Bakerorum familia oriundi filia unica & hærede, quibus primogenitus erat & hæres. Fratres habuit ex hisce binos, Georgium & Henricum, in cunis

‘ mortuos; sororem unicam Mariam, Johanni Bernardo à Goring enuptam. Literis puerilibus in scholâ Cicestriensi publica Oxonium amandatus est; ubi, in Aula Cervina, disciplinis academicis per aliquot annos incubuit. Jus illic Anglicanum ultro affectans, primo Hospitii Cliffordensis Londini, deinde Interioris Templi, Maii 1604, Socius admissus est: non indiligenter loci studiis, nec infeliciter, operam navavit; sed genio suo indulgentior, nec molestiis forensibus fatis idoneus, ad alia, ut explorator, se contulit. Amicitias cujusque ordinis, optimis, doctissimis, amplissimis, etiam & illustrissimis, nec paucis beatus fruebatur †, nec sine summis procacium aliquot veritatis & libertatis justæ osorum inimicitias, quas gravissimè sed viriliter perpeffus est. Comitibus Parliamentariis ut Burgensis sæpius intererat, etiam & in illis quæ & Regem habuere & nullum. Denatus anno hic prope situs est (92).’

[XX] He died very rich. It appears by his Will, dated July 11, 1653, that his estate in land consisted of the manor, lordship, or Grange, of Cheadle in Staffordshire, and of diverse lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in Cheadle; and also of one third part of certain lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the county of Lincoln. The whole of these, as well as all his personal estate and sums of money belonging to him, either in his own right, or as executor of the last Will and Testament of the Lady Elizabeth, late Countess-dowager of Kent, he bequeathed, after discharging his funeral expences, debts, and legacies, to his executors, Edward Heyward, of Reyfsham in Norfolk, Esq; John Vaughan, of Troescod in the county of Cardigan, Esq; Rowland Jewks the elder, Esq; all of the Inner-Temple; and Matthew Hale, of Lincoln's-Inn, Esq; to be divided equally among them. Bishop Burnet having observed, that Judge Hale raised his fortune from a hundred a year, to near nine hundred, assures us, that a considerable part of this increase was the share he had in Selden's estate. Besides the legacies mentioned in remark [A], and those taken notice of in remark [YY], he bequeathed to the College of Physicians in London, Hippocrates's Aphorisms in Arabic, and such pieces of Galen as he had in Arabic, bequeathed to his executors, desiring them rather to part them among themselves, or otherwise dispose of them, or the choicest of them for some publick use, than to put them in any common sale; 'it may do well,' these are his words, 'in some convenient publick library, or of some college in one of the universities.' The executors, resolving, in honour to Mr Selden's memory, to keep the collection entire, first intended it for the society of the Inner-Temple, of which he was so many years a member; and it was removed to some chambers in the King's-Bench-walks there, for that purpose: but this society neglecting, for the space of five years, to provide a proper room to receive it, they gave it to the university of Oxford [YY], where a noble room was added to the Bodleian Library for its reception (ee), and all due respect was shewn by that learned body to their worthy benefactor [ZZ]. As to Mr Selden's character, his profound learning, and the first book of Avicen in Arabic, and also all and every other books, among his manuscripts, of the oriental tongues, written upon Physick or Surgery. These legacies are left in a codicil annexed to his Will, and of the same date with it; after which he proceeds in these words: 'Item, Whereas the Right Honourable the Lady Elizabeth, late Countess dowager of Kent, did put to school in Holland, under the care of Mr Francis Junius, William Lyddell, a young boy, to be brought up there, and made fit for some course of life; being now past the age of twelve years, I give and bequeath to him, for his maintenance and education yearly, to begin at the first half year after my decease, the sum of 50*l.* until he be 18 years old, if he shall so long live, and no longer: or otherwise, and if he the said William Lyddell, shall live until he be of the said age of 18 years, then I give and bequeath to him the sum of 500*l.* for a stock to set up with for himself, or otherwise to enjoy it for his best advantage. Item, And whereas Jane Lyddell, sister to the said William Lyddell, was put to be an apprentice with _____, in St Martin's; if she shall live to be out of her apprenticeship, I give and bequeath unto her, the said Jane, the sum of 300*l.* for a portion to marry her with. Item, My will and desire is, that my servants of my family be competently maintained with diet together in my house, for some space after my decease, under the direction of my servant William Richardson; and that every one of them have the whole half-year's wages, for that half-year current wherein I shall happen to die. Item, I give and bequeath to my servant, Thomas Gill, 300*l.* and to my servants, James Gill, William Richardson, and Clement Lavander, 100*l.* a piece, to every of them. Item, To Philip Rumball, of Silesko in Bedfordshire, 100*l.* Item, to _____ Snead, my porter, 50*l.* All these, and the aforesaid sums, to be paid within three months after my decease. Item, I give and bequeath to Mrs Rachel Casewell, widow, since Mrs Williamson, the sum of 500*l.* Item, To Mrs Lucy Longueville, the sum of 100*l.* to Mark Lemon, 100*l.* to Anne Jenkins, 100*l.* All these sums I desire may be raised and paid within three months after my decease. Item, I give unto William, Lord Marquis and Earl of Hertford, my crystal cabinet, with the two cases thereto belonging, together with all the agate stones, and the rest that are in it. Item, I give and bequeath to the Right Hon. Algernoon Earl of Northumberland, a bason and ewer of silver gilt in yellow cases, the one marked A, the other B. Item, to the Right Hon. Jocelyn Lord Percy, my crystal ship, a galley, with all its tackling, and the case belonging to it; together with my square nicomy marble table, set in ebony and ivory. Item, To Sir Thomas Cotton, Bart. a dozen of silver plates, parcel gilt, of Hercules's labours, in a yellow case, marked G; and a crystal kind of flagon, set in silver gilt, marked H, in a yellow case; and a cup of pearl shell, set in silver gilt, in a black case, Marked I; and my cabinet, covered with crimson velvet, which is in perspective the representation of the entrance into Hampton-court. Item, To Mr Grey Longueville, a bason and ewer, and two dozen plates, all parcel gilt, in several red cases, marked C, D, E, F, which were his great-uncle's, Henry Earl of Kent, and afterwards continued to Charles Earl of Kent, his grandfather, and then to Henry Earl of Kent, his uncle, the brother of Earl Charles, a fit heir-loom for his family; together with a hat-band set round with diamonds, which his said uncle usually wore, and is

† Among these was Grotius, Peiresk, Salmasius, Pochart Pricæus, Petit, Gerard Vossius, Imperiali, Holstenius, Rivet, Collius, Gronovius, Dan. Heinsius, Bæclerus, Spizelius, and other foreigners; besides Usher, Langbaine, Pococke, Sir Rob. Cotton, Joh. Greaves, &c. at home.

(92) Wilkins.

(ee) Mr Wood says, the University received it in the year 1659. History and Antiquities of Oxford, under the account of the Bodleian Library.

'increased by me about the buckle with a broad diamond, and some other besides (93).'

[YY] They gave it to the university of Oxford.] Dr Gerard Langbaine, in a letter to Pococke, written soon after Selden's death, saith,

S I R,

I came here only time enough to see and speak with our good friend Mr Selden, who died on Thursday night, about 8 o'clock.—Yesterday I had the sight of so much of his Will as concerns the university. He has given to our publick library all his manuscripts of the oriental tongues, and Greek, not otherwise particularly disposed of; and all his Rabbinical and Talmudical books, which are not there already, or not of the same edition. These to be taken out of his library by you and myself. Item, All his marble statues, heads, and Greek pieces, to be conveyed to Oxford at the charge of his executors, and there placed on the walls of the library (94). The executors are, Justice Hales, Mr Vaughan, Mr Heyward, and Mr Jewx, who desire that you would speedily repair hither, to view and select what belongs to the university, before his library be otherwise meddled with. And to that purpose, I have written to the Vicechancellor and Mr Barlow, to send up the most perfect catalogue of the publick library, for our direction, and the executors satisfaction. To their discretion he hath left all the remainder of his books, not otherwise particularly bequeathed, either to be divided among themselves, or to be sent to the university, or some college or colleges, as they shall think fit. Bishop Burnet tells us, 'The executors were a little put to it, in making this donation to the university, without crossing the Will of their deceased friend. Mr Selden, continues he, had once intended to give his library to that university, and had left it so by his Will; but having occasion for a manuscript which belonged to their library, they asked of him a bond of 1000*l.* for its restitution. This he took so ill at their hands, that he struck out that part of his Will, by which he had given them his library, and with some passion declared they should never have it. The executors stuck at this a little; but having considered better of it, came to this resolution: That they were to be the executors of Mr Selden's Will, and not of his Passion.' There was the more room for such a construction in favour of the university, if it be true what we find in the History of the Bodleian Library, prefixed to the manuscripts of England and Ireland, the writer of which declares, he knew nothing of such a story as is told by Bishop Burnet, there being no publick evidence of it; but that it appeared from the university register, that Mr Selden had the liberty granted him in 1654, of borrowing any book out of the library, upon condition that he should take no more than three at a time, and give a bond of 100*l.* to restore them within a year.

[ZZ] Respect shewn to their benefactor.] In the room where his books were reposit, they put the following inscription at the entrance:

Auctuarium
Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ
Ex Musæo Johannis Seldeni Jurisconsulti.

Likewise on the right hand of the west window:

Bibliothecam
Johannis Seldeni

Nitore

(93) Wilkins, from a copy in the museum of Longueville.

(94) He gave them also a map of China, made there, fairly done in colours, together with a sea-compass of their making, and divisions, which were both taken by an English commander, who being pressed exceedingly at a great ransom, and would not part with it.

(95) Burnet's Life of Sir Matthew Hale, p. 93. Lond. 1682.

learning, it is well known, was the discourse of all the Literati in his time; but he seems to have been chiefly pleased with the attestation given of it by the famous Hugo Grotius, who intituled him, in this respect, the Honour of the English nation. Yet he is allowed to have some very singular opinions [AAA]. Besides the manuscripts which he left, that have been already mentioned, there were some others found among his papers [BBB]; and, in 1671, came out his Discourse of the Office of Lord Chancellor of England, in folio. To which was added, Dugdale's Catalogue of Lord Chancellors and Lord Keepers of England, from the Norman Conquest. In 1675, there was printed at London in 4to. Johannis Seldeni Angli Liber de Nummis; in quo antiqua pecunia Romana & Græca metitur pretio ejus quæ nunc est in usu. Huic accedit Bibliotheca Nummaria. But our Antiquary's name was abused, by setting it to that superficial tract, which was not written by him, and had been published before he was born (ff). In 1683, Dr Adam Littleman, together with his English translation of Jani Anglorum facies altera, published the two following pieces of our author; one, Of the Original of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of Testaments; and the other, Of the Disposition or Administration of Intestates Goods. In 1689, his amanuensis, Richard Milward, published a piece in 4to. intituled, Mr Selden's Table-talk, being discourses of his sense of various matters of weight and high consequence, relating especially to Religion and State. Yet many of these have been thought not genuine, as containing inconsistencies in the several parts, and some remarks not worthy of our author's learning and judgment (gg). In 1725, Dr David Wilkins published an edition of Mr Selden's Works, in three volumes in folio, containing several speeches, arguments, debates, and letters, never before printed. To which is prefixed, an Account of the Author's Life [CCC]; where among other things he tells us, that Selden, notwithstanding his opinions concerning the power of the Church, yet was a friend to the Church of England. Mr Baxter assures us, that Sir Matthew Hale told him, Selden was a resolved serious Christian, and a great adversary to Hobbes's errors; and that Sir Matthew Hale affirmed, he had seen Selden openly oppose Hobbes so earnestly, as either to depart from him, or drive him out of the room (hb). Mr Whitelocke says, his mind was as great as his learning, being very generous and hospitable, and a good companion, especially where he liked. Dr Wilkins observes (ii), that he was charitable, especially to scholars; and Mr Wood gives a remarkable instance of this, in the case of Henry Jacob, a man of more learning than prudence (kk). Dr Wilkins produces some others, but observes that he was naturally of a severe temper, which was soured by his sufferings; so that he was free only with

(AA) He was bred under Erpenius, and instructed Selden in Hebrew, assisted him in writing the Mare Clausum, and on some of his other pieces made several remarks, which are printed in Wilkins's preface to his Works. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 159. Selden's Vindiciae, &c. p. 53. edit. 1653.

(ff) The true author was Alexander Sardo of Ferrara. It was published in 1575 at Mentz, in 4to. with the Bibliotheca Nummaria subjoined to it, by Father Labbé the Jesuit.

(gg) Dr Wilkins, as before; and the publisher of the Acta Eruditorum Lipsiæ, anno 1684.

(hb) Notes on the Life of Sir Matthew Hale, p. 40. edit. 1682.

(ii) In the Life of our author.

Nitore ingenii, candore morum, præcellentia doctrinæ,
 Imparilis viri heic repositam
 Johannes Vaughan, Matthæus Hale, Rolandus Jewks, Armigcri
 (Quibus testamenti sui fidem mandavit) in Duraturam tanti Viri memoriam & rei literariæ
 Bonum, amplissimæ huic Academiæ sacratam voluere.

And in honour of their legacy of the marbles, which were placed according to the direction of his Will, mentioned by Dr Langbaine, as above, about the walls of the library, the university set up a stone, inclosed in an iron palisado, in the præscholium of the Divinity-school, with this inscription:

Universitas Oxoniensis
 Johanni Vaughan supremo Tribunalis Regii Justitiario
 Matthæo Hale
 Fisci Regii Baroni Primario
 Rolando Juks Armigero
 Viris ex recondita Juris peritia
 Et virtute magis sua
 Illustribus
 Ob antiqua marmora & bibliothecam instructissimam
 Diligentia & sumptu ingenti comparatam
 Johannis Seldeni
 Academiæ olim Alumni, Patroni
 Et Burgensis Parlamentarii
 Jurisconsultorum Doctissimi
 Antiquariorum Coryphæi
 Munificentia insolita & merito suspicienda
 Ab ipsis dono datum
 Monumentum hoc honoris ergo
 Et gratitudinis
 L. M. L.
 Posuit
 XII cal. Jan. ann. MDCLXIX.

[AAA] He had some singular opinions.] Many such have been already mentioned in the course of these memoirs, and another will be the subject of the ensuing remark. To these may be added, his opinion concerning Excommunication, which was animadverted on in a piece written expressly for that purpose, by Dr Henry Hammond, and printed under the title Of the Power of the Keys.

[BBB] Some others were found among his papers.]

Mr Selden ordered all the papers and notes that were in his own hand-writing, except those relating to Eutychius's Annals, to be burnt. Those that were saved, must have been wrote by his amanuensis. These were, (1.) The Life of Friar Bacon, written in Latin. Selden had been at some expence in procuring the materials, and gave the copy to Sir Kenelm Digby, in order to have it printed at Paris; but Mr Wood, who tells us this (96), tells us also, that all the papers were embezzled and lost. (2.) Collections out of many Records and Antiquities. (3.) Collection of Votes and Records of various Subjects, marked M. (4.) Extracts of the Leger Books of Battle, Evesham, Winton &c.

(96) Ath. Oxon. under Selden's article, Vol. II.

* N. Bacon's Historical and Political Discourses on the Laws and Government of England, are said in the title-page to be collected from some manuscript papers of Selden. Lond. edit. 5. 1760, 4to.

[CCC] His Works were published by Dr Wilkins.]

The two first volumes of this collection contain his Latin Works, and in the third are inserted the English ones; among which, besides those that have been mentioned in the course of the present memoir, there are several other small pieces, as follow: 1. Of the Privileges of the Baronage of England, in respect to their Judicature in Parliament. 2. A letter to Augustyne Vincent Rouge-Croix, concerning his Discovery of Errors. 3. An Argument concerning the Baronies of Grey and Ruthen. 4. Notes on Sir John Fortescue, de Laudibus Legum Angliæ. 5. Several Speeches and Arguments. 6. Letters and Poems (97). To which must be added, two letters of our author to Mr Thomas Greaves, inserted in the account of Mr John Greaves's Life, prefixed to his Miscellaneous Works, by Dr Thomas Birch (98). Mr Wood likewise tells us, our author had a considerable hand, and gave directions and advice, towards the edition of Plutarch's Lives, printed in 1657, with an addition of the year of the world, and the year of our Lord, together with many chronological notes and explications, out of divers authors (99).

(97) These are inserted at the end of the second volume.

(98) Printed at London, 1737, in 2 vols, 8vo.

(99) Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

[A] All

(ll) Biblioth. Selecta, Tom. VII. p. 117. and Wilkins in Præfat. p. 11.

(mm) Ars Critica, Vol. I. p. 142. and Bibl. Choise, Tom. III. p. 140. and Tom. VII. p. 82. apud Wilkins in Præfat. p. 11.

(nn) The words insolentius læsæ in vindiciis are omitted in the General Dictionary, which might perhaps lead that author into his mistake, since, without these words, the title is not so properly obscure, as clear nonsense.

(oo) In remark [FF].

(pp) Theophilus Spizelius in literato Commonefactione xxx. p. 908. & seqq. apud Wilkins in Præfat. p. 11.

* It should be 84th year.

(qq) But Dr Hickes observes, that he was not master of the Anglo-Saxon language. Præfat. to Theſaurus Linguarum Septentrionalium.

with a few. As to his writings, his style is universally condemned. Budd has well observed, that it is a melange of all that is bad, as well as all that is good, in the Latin language (ll). Le Clerc complains of the trouble caused to the reader, by his obscurity, as well as the perplexity of his method (mm), of which he has given a remarkable instance. We have given another in the article of Sir Henry Spelman, and a third is superadded by a mistake in the General Dictionary, the writer of which, in the conclusion of his account of the Mare Clausum, tells us, that this book of our author was attacked by Peter Baptista Burgus, which occasioned him to publish at London, in 1653, Vindiciæ secundum integritatem existimationis suæ per convitium de descriptione Maris Clausi petulantissimum & mendacissimum insolentius læsæ in Vindiciis (nn) Maris Liberi, adversus Petrum Baptistam Burgum, Ligustici maritimi Domini adfertorem, Hagæ Comitum jam nunc emissis. Whereas we have already observed (oo), that Selden's Vindiciæ, &c. Maris Clausi, was wrote against Grafwinckel's Vindiciæ Maris Liberi, which was levelled against Peter Burk's book adversus Petrum Baptistam Burgum, who agreed with our author in general, that the sea, as well as the earth, is subject to some states, but maintained, that the dominion of the former belonged to the Genoeſe. Nor, indeed, to do Selden justice, is his meaning so obscurely expressed, as to lead a reader of common attention into any mistake, which too the first words of the piece would have discovered. Notwithstanding this censure of his style and method, his writings are allowed, by the several censurers, to be full of various and uncommon erudition, and useful observations; and, in justice to him, we must not conclude, without ballancing their animadversions with the following elogium, made also by a foreigner (pp), who, speaking of our author, writes thus: 'Felix tunc erat atque beata Terra Angliæ, &c. England was then blessed and happy, when she brought forth that inexhaustible treasure of Hebrew antiquities and various erudition, in the 44th year* of the last century, at Salvington. Nor did he keep it to himself alone, but communicated it to the whole learned world; for Nature had given this man that force of sagacity and quickness of wit, that whatever subject he turned his thoughts upon, he seemed not then to learn it, but to have learned it before, and with Plato to remember it. She had endued him also with a firmness and constancy of mind, equal to his wit, in undertaking and executing the most consummately arduous labours; and, whatever he had once resolved upon, for the benefit and advantage of letters, he never suffered it to slip out of his hands, either by a lassitude or listlessness (with which learned men are sometimes seized), and much less by any laziness or languor. Hence sprung that profound knowledge in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Rabbinical, Syriac, and Arabic, tongues (qq); as also his perfect acquaintance with all parts of Philosophy, and of the laws both divine and human: so that, whatever was any where extant, concerning the opinions of Philosophers, or the commentaries of the Lawyers, this Hercules daringly attempted all the difficulties, and, by turning the books over with incredible care, did not fail, as it were, to dispatch them; after which, tempering them with the laws, maxims, and opinions, of the Hebrews, he converted every thing to his own use, that is, to the illustration of sacred and venerable antiquity.' After all, the most endearing part of Mr Selden's character is elegantly touched by himself, in the choice of his motto, Περὶ πάντων τὴν ἐλευθερίαν. i. e. LIBERTY ABOVE ALL THINGS. P

SHADWELL [THOMAS], Poet-Laureat to King William the Third and Queen Mary, was descended from a younger branch of an ancient family in Staffordshire (a), and was born about the year 1640, at Lanton Hall in Norfolk, a seat of his father, who was bred at Caius-college in Cambridge, and thence removed to the Middle-Temple, to study the Law; but having an ample fortune left him by an uncle, did not trouble himself with the practice, chusing rather to serve his country as a Justice of Peace. He was in that commission for three counties, Middlesex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and discharged the office with distinguished ability and exact integrity. In the Civil Wars he sided with the King, and was a great sufferer for the Royal Cause; so that, having a numerous family (b), he was reduced to the necessity of selling and spending a considerable part of his estate, to support it (c). In these circumstances, he resolved to breed this son to his own profession; and for that purpose, he sent him first to the same college, and then to the same seminary of Law, in which he had compleated his own education: but the son, after spending some time in both, took a resolution to travel abroad, having, as it should seem, no disposition to plod in the drudgery of the Law. He had a taste, and some genius, for polite literature; and, upon his return home, falling into the acquaintance of some of the most celebrated persons for wit and distinguished quality in the age, he thought no more of the Law, but applied himself wholly to cultivate those elegant studies, which were the fashionable amusements of the times: and it was not long before he became eminent in dramattick poetry, a specimen of which appeared in a play called The Sullen Lovers; or the Impertinents. A Comedy, which was acted at the Duke of York's theatre, and printed in 1668. In this piece, our author represented variety of humours, according to the practice of Ben Jonson, whom he says all dramattick poets ought to imitate, though none are like to come near, he being the only person that appears to have made perfect

(a) The eldest branch were possessed of an estate of above 500 l. per ann. for more than three centuries, and that without any honours or publick employes. Some Account of Mr Shadwell and his Writings, prefixed to his Works, edit. 1720.

(b) He had eleven children. Ibid.

(c) He was afterwards Recorder of Galway in Ireland, and Receiver there to the Duke of York. He was some time also Attorney-General at Tangier, under the Earl of Inchiquin. Ibid.

perfect representations of human life [A]. As the play was well received, he pushed his genius on in the same road, and wrote a great many more comedies, which met with good success.

[A] All the dramatic Poets ought to imitate Ben Jonson] Shadwell certainly did not judge amiss of the turn of his own genius, when he sets Father Ben for his pattern in humorous characters; in which respect, Jonson will always stand a monument of honour to the Poetic Tribe. 'Tis true, Shadwell followed his leader at an humble distance, as he succeeded him, after many intermediate steps, as Poet-Laureat; to which title Ben too was the occasion of procuring a remarkable honour from his friend Mr Selden; who, at his request, drew up the following account of it's antiquity; it is in his Treatise of the Titles of Honour; where, in speaking of the Counts Palatine, he gives an instance of the form made use of by that Count in creating a Poet-Laureat; the awful solemnity of which is not a little entertaining, as follows.

The course also used by Counts Palatine, in giving the crown of Laurel to Poets, is seen especially in that of Johannes Crusius, who received it at Strasburg in anno 1616, from the hands of Thomas Obrechtus, a Professor of Law and Count Palatine. First, the time and place were solemnly appointed by a public instrument from the Count; where he shews, how much degrees in learning conduce to the advancement of it; and then, that Paulus Crusius, having first received the dignity of Master of Arts, now out of his happy vein in verse, deserved also the laurel of Poetry; and, therefore, by virtue of the power and licence that he had from the Emperor, he appointed the twenty-third of December* for the solemnity of giving it him. Quamobrem, says he, omnes literarum studiorumque amantes, ac imprimis illustres & generosos Dominos, Comites, atque Barones, Patres Academicos omnes, omnium ordinum Doctores, Licentiatos, Professores, Magistros; auditores nobilissimos, præstantissimos, doctissimos, ea quæ decet animi veneratione, invitamus, ut felicitatem hujus actus literarii, illustri ac honorifica sua præsentia, non solum illustrare atque exornare, verum pia etiam vota, hac præsertim conclamata tempestate, pro salute ecclesiæ scholæ & reipublicæ, ad Deum facere nobiscum velint, majorem in modum rogamus ac obtestamur.

At the day appointed, the assembly being full, Crusius begins with the recital of this petitory epigram:

Cæsarei comes alme fori, clarissime Thoma,
Si merui laurum, Phœbus adesto mihi:
Si minus, hic reddas justæ argumenta repulsæ.
Parce monitis, parte in utraque, tuis.
Fallor? an adspicio viridem sub veste coronam.
O Dii! quam pulchre laurus amœna viret!
Cæsaris hoc munus, vigeat cum Cæsare laurus:
Prævaleat vulgo gratia Cæsarea
Quæ mihi contingit per te, celeberrime Confe,
Si mihi continget laurea Cæsarea.

Then the Count Palatine made a long speech in praise of the art of Poetry; which he concluded with—Audivistis hæstenus satis superque, uti spero, auditores nobilissimi, intellexistis artem Poeticam reipublicæ & utilem & necessariam esse, ejus cultores dignis officiendos præmiis, titulum & privilegia Poætæ laureati, non quibusvis promiscue & sine discretionem, sed iis tandem conferenda esse, in arte Poëtica singulares qui secerunt progressus. Then directing himself to Crusius, that was to be honoured with the laurel, Cum itaque, saith he, tu magister Johannes Paulus Crusius, Poëseos candidate, ad eundem honoris & dignitatis titulum aspirare cupias; tui jam officii tuarumque partium erit, ut antequam petitus honoris titulus, solenni cum applausu tibi conferatur, eruditionis tuæ insigne ac nobile aliquod specimen illustri huic auditorio edas, exhibeas te talem, qualem te commendo, ut omnibus & singulis liquido constet, te eum esse, quem ipsa eruditio ac doctrina commendat, & ipsa virtus & morum integritas condecorat, ipsa justitia honore petito condecorandum dignum judicet, nec ipsa etiam invidia, virtutis comes, idem denegat.

VOL. VI. No. CCCIII.

Then Crusius recited a poem of above three hundred verses; his theme (chosen by himself) being, Quam nihil omnis homo! And these verses are called in the act of creation, Specimen pro impetranda laurea. Next the Count Palatine, (to the end, that this act of conferring the laurel might have the fuller credit and authority with all that were present) produces the Emperor's patent, that made him Count Palatine, and gave him this authority, and hath it recognized, upon a solemn observation of the seal and subscription, by a public notary, and openly read by him also. Thence he sums up the authority given him, and shews, that the course is, that whosoever is to be crowned with the laurel ought first to take an oath to the Emperor and his successor; which he bids the public notary read to Crusius, and he carefully to hearken to it. The oath was,

Promittes & jurabis, quod velis esse invictissimo, potentissimo, & serenissimo, Principi ac Domino Domino Matthiæ primo Romanorum Imperatori semper augusto, & eidem sacro Romano Imperio omnibus successoribus ejus Romanorum Imperatoribus ac regibus legitime intrantibus, fidelis; nec unquam assistes consilio, ubi periculum eorum tractetur, sed bonum & salutem eorum defendes fideliter & promovebis; damna eorum pro tua possibilitate & facultate vitabis & avertes; quæ in laudem & honorem Romani Imperii spectabunt aliquando carminibus celebrabis, amplificabis; nec licentia data in maledicentiam & convitia prorumpes; ab omnibus famosis libellis abstinebis; & omnia, quæ Cæsareum verum, sincerum, & Germanum Poëtam jure vel consuetudine decent, modo sint honesta & justa, diligenti exercitio & morum ornatu, facies & præstabis.

By direction then of the Count, he lays his hand on the book, and swears, Hæc omnia prælestia summa, qua potero, obedientia & diligentia observabo & faciam, ut me Deus adjuvet & hæc sancta Dei Evangelia. The oath thus taken; because, says the Count, I doubt not, but that, during your whole life, you will truly observe what you have thus sworn, it remains only, that I now give you the laurel appointed for you.

Te itaque Johannem Paulum Crusium Argentinesem, liberalium artium & disciplinarum magistrum, in hac florentissima assidentium & adstantium corona ob insignes ingenii tui dotes, præsertim vero artis Poëticæ doctrinam singularem, peritiam eximiam, ut moris est, vigore ac tenore Cæsarei hujus nostri diplomatis, tanquam Comes Palatinus augustissima imperatoris ac Cæsareæ Majestatis auctoritate, hac laurea Poëtica coronamus, condecoramus, donamus, ac Poëtam ac Vatem-Laureatum, pronuntiamus, proclamamus, facimus, creamus, promovemus, aureoque hoc annulo ornamus, condecoramus, & hoc ipso laurea Poëticæ insignibus ac titulis insignimus, investimus, aliorumque Poëtarum numero ordini & consortio cooptamus, adscribimus, & aggregamus. Concedimus insuper, plenamque facultatem auctoritatem & licentiam elargimur, ut tu per nos laurea Poëticæ titulo sic donatus, ab hac hora iis fruiturum possis & valeas, omnibus in urbibus civitatibus, communitatibus, universitatibus, collegiis & academiis quibuscunque universis sacri Romani imperii, & ubi libet terrarum, in artis Poëticæ facultate publice legere, docere, scribere, interpretari, commentari, cathedram ascendere, disputare, ac omnes præterea eos actus Poëticos, quos cæteri Poëtæ-Laureati solenniter insigniti & investiti subire, facere, & experiri, soliti sunt, suscipere, & exercere. Ac omnibus denique ac singulis quibuscunque Poëtæ, quocunque deinceps in loco, & a quibuscunque potestatem facultatemque lauream conferendi habentibus promoti, ornamentis, insignibus, privilegiis, prærogativis, exemptionibus, honoribus, præ-eminentiis, favoribus, indultis, & gratiis, uti, frui, potiri, & gaudere, quomodo libet consuetudine vel de jure, omni dolo fraude contradictione quorumcunque ac sinistra machinatione sublata penitus ac remota.

With a laurel we see also a ring was given him; and after the Count had made another speech, touching the laurel and ring, the crowned Poet recites another poem of thanks for his dignity; and so the act ended.

In proceeding, Mr Selden further observes, that this custom of giving crowns of laurel to Poets, as the ensigns of a degree of mastership in poetry, had continued above an hundred and fifty years † in the empire

† This was written in 1637.

* The instrument was dated the 20th of that month.

success. In the mean while, as it was impossible in these times to shine among the great ones, which is the poet's ambition, without siding with one of the parties, Whig or Tory, Mr Shadwell's lot fell among the Whigs; and, in consequence thereof, he was set up as a rival to Mr Dryden. Hence there grew a mutual dislike between them; and, upon the appearance of the Laureat's tragedy, called The Duke of Guise, in 1683, our author was charged (d) with having the principal hand in writing a piece, intituled, Some Reflections on the pretended Parallel, in the Play called The Duke of Guise, in a Letter to a Friend; which was printed the same year, in four sheets, 4to. Mr Dryden wrote a vindication of the Parallel, and such a storm was raised, both against Shadwell, and his friend Hunt, who assisted him in it, that this latter was forced to fly into Holland (e); and we find our author complaining, that in these, which he calls, the worst of times, 'his ruin was designed and his life sought; and that for near ten years he was kept from the exercise of that profession, which had afforded him a competent subsistence (f).' However, he was abundantly rewarded for these sufferings, whatever they were, after the Revolution, by seeing himself crowned with the laurel which was stripped from the brows of his antagonist; who thereupon, by way of revenge, wrote the bitterest satire against him that ever was penned, under the name of Mac Flecknoe [B]. Our new Laureat had the misfortune also to enjoy his honour but a very few years; for, being seized, as was thought, with an apoplexy (g), he died suddenly in November, 1692, in the fifty-second year of his age, at Chelsey; in which church he was interred on the 24th of the same month (h), when his friend Dr Nicholas Brady preached his funeral sermon; wherein he assures us, that our author was 'a man of great honesty and integrity, and had a real love of truth and sincerity; an inviolable fidelity and strictness to his word; an unalterable friendship, wherever he professed it; and (however the world may be mistaken in him) a much deeper sense of religion, than many others have, who pretend to it more openly.' The Doctor proceeds with observing, that 'His natural and acquired abilities made him sufficiently remarkable to all that he conversed with, very few being equal to him, in all the becoming qualities and accomplishments, which adorn and set off a complete gentleman; that his very enemies, continues this preacher, if he has any left behind him, will give him this character, at least if they knew him so thoroughly as I did.' By a remark which the same friend makes afterwards, we are led into an opinion, that he fell a sacrifice to a habit of taking of opium to excess. 'His death, says the preacher, seized him suddenly; but he could not be unprepared, since, to my certain knowledge, he never took his dose of opium, but he solemnly recommended himself to God by prayer (i).' After his death came out The Volunteers, or the Stock-Jobbers, a Comedy, acted by their Majesties servants, with a dedication to the Queen by Mrs Anne Shadwell, our author's widow; and an epilogue, wherein his character as a poet is set in the best and most advantageous light; which, perhaps, was judged necessary to ballance the very different drawing, and even abusive representation, of it, by Mr Dryden [C], who is generally condemned for

(d) By Dryden, in his Vindication of the Parallel, p. 40. See his article.

(e) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 729. and Vol. I. col. 364.

(f) Dedication to the Earl of Dorset of Bury-Fair. A Comedy, printed in 1689, 4to.

(g) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 414.

(h) Id. ibid. In the Inscription upon his monument in Westminster-abbey, his death is dated Decemb. 4, by mistake.

(i) Funeral Sermon, p. 40.

Bale, cent. 8. script. 66.

† In some pieces then published. See Antibiblicon. Lond. 1520.

† MS. in Bibl. Cotton.

|| See a further account of these ornaments, under his article.

§ Cent. 7. Scriptor. 23.

(1) Titles of Honour, p. 457 to 466. in Vol. III. of Selden's Works, edit. 1725.

(2) Rochester's Session of the Poets.

(3) Some Account of Dryden, &c. prefixed to his Poems, published in 1760, in 4 vols, 8vo.

empire at least. That in the latter empire, it proceeded from a kind of example which was under the old Roman Emperors. That such crowns were made proper to the gift of Emperors, by an institution of Domitian; and as from the use of the old empire the latter took the example of crowning Poets, so from that of the latter, some use of giving the laurel was anciently received in England; John Skelton had the title of Laureat * under Henry the Eighth; and in the same time, Robert Whittington called himself † Grammaticæ magister & Protovates Angliæ in florentissima Oxoniensi Academia Laureatus. Under Edward the Fourth, one John Kay, by the title of his humble Poet-Laureat, dedicates to him The Siege of Rhodes in prose †. But John Gower, a famous Poet under Richard the Second, buried in St Mary Overy's church, hath his statue crowned with ivy mixed with roses ||. Habet ibidem statuam, says Bale §, duplici nota insignem, nempe aurea torque, & hederacea corona rosis interserta (1).

[B] Dryden revenged this affront in his Mac Flecknoe.] Dryden seems to have carried his resentment even to the friends of his rival; in this spirit we find him expressing great contempt for Otway, with whom our author was a great favourite, and lived in a most friendly intimacy (2). 'Tis certain, this contempt for Otway was against his clear judgment, and he afterwards recanted it (3). To speak freely, this promotion of our Poet to the laurel was apparently the effect of party, and the exigency of the times upon the Revolution, which made it prudent, in disposing of all offices in the State, to have an eye chiefly to a firm attachment and warm zeal for the new establishment. Accordingly, we are told, that when some persons urged to the then Lord-Chamberlain, that there were others who had better pretensions to the laurel; his Lordship replied, he would not pretend to say how great a Poet Shadwell might be, but was sure he was an honest man (4).

[C] The advantageous character in The Epilogue to the Volunteers might be a ballance to the abuse of him by Dryden] It will be proper to lay them both before the reader, that, by contrasting them to each other, his true character may at last be fixed. In Mac Flecknoe, the God of Dulness is introduced, making this speech upon the choice of a proper person as a son to succeed him:

Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dulness from his tender years.
Shadwell alone of all my sons is high,
He stands confirm'd in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike thro' and make a lucid interval.
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
Besides, is goodly fabric fills the eye,
And seems design'd for thoughtless majesty.

The character in the Epilogue is as follows:

Shadwell the great support 'oth' comic stage,
Born to expose the follies of the age.
To whip prevailing vices, and unite
Mirth with instruction, profit with delight.
For large ideas and a flowing pen,
First, of our times, and second, but to Ben.

Whofe

(4) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, under our author's article.

for treating our author a little too unmercifully, his resentment carrying him even beyond the bounds of truth; for that, though it must be owned he fell vastly short of Jonson, whom he set to himself as a model of excellence, yet it is certain there are high authorities in favour of many of his comedies, and the best judges of that age gave their testimony for them. They have in them fine strokes of humour [D]; the characters are often original, strongly marked, and well sustained. Add to this, that he had the greatest expedition imaginable in writing, and sometimes produced a play in less than a month (k). Besides seventeen plays, he wrote several other pieces of poetry [E], some of which have been commended. An edition of his Works, with some account of his Life and Writings prefixed, was published in 1720, in four volumes, 8vo.

(k) Dedication to the Earl of Dorset, of his comedy called The Miser.

Whose mighty genius and discerning mind,
Trac'd all the various humours of mankind.
Dressing them up with such successful care,
That every fop found his own picture there;
And blush'd for shame at the surprizing skill,
Which made his lov'd resemblance look so ill.
Shadwell, who all his lines from nature drew,
Copied her out, and kept her still in view:
Who never sunk in prose, nor soar'd in verse;
So high as bombast, or so low as farce.
Who ne'er was brib'd by title or estate,
To fawn and flatter with the rich and great.
To let a gilded vice or folly pass,
But always lash'd the villain and the ass.

comedy called Epsom Wells is so diverting, and withal so true a comedy, that even foreigners, who are not generally the kindest to the wit of our nation, have extremely commended it; and, continues he, 'tis no small credit to our author, that the Sieur de St Evremond, speaking of our English comedies in his Essays, has ranked this play with Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, as two of our most diverting comedies (6).

[E] Plays and other poetical pieces.] The titles of his Plays are, I. The Sullen Lovers: or, the Impertinents. II. The Humourists, a comedy. III. The Royal Shepherdess, a tragi-comedy. IV. The Virtuoso, a comedy. V. Psyche, a tragedy. VI. The Libertine, a tragedy. VII. Epsom Wells, a comedy. VIII. The History of Timon of Athens. IX. The Miser, a comedy. X. A true Widow, a comedy, dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley; the prologue was written by Dryden; which shews, that there was no open quarrel between them in the year 1679, when this play was acted. But we have shewn above, that it broke out not long after. XI. The Lancashire Witches and Teague O Divelly, the Irish Priest, a comedy. XII. The Woman Captain, a comedy. XIII. The Squire of Alsatia, a comedy. XIV. Bury Fair, a comedy. XV. The amorous Bigots, with the second part of Teague O Divelly, a comedy. XVI. The Scowrers, a comedy. XVII. The Volunteers: or, The Stock-Jobbers, a comedy. Among his poems, the principal are, A Congratulatory Poem on the Prince of Orange's coming to England. Another on Queen Mary. Translation of the tenth Satire of Juvenal, &c.

(6) Ibid. p. 445, 446.

[D] Some of his Plays have in them fine strokes of humour] Mr Langbaine, speaking of his comedy called The Virtuoso, tells us, that no body will deny this play it's due applause: at least, I know, says he, that the university of Oxford, who may be allowed competent judges of Comedy, especially of such characters as Sir Nicholas Gimerack and Sir Formal Trifle, applauded it. And as no man ever undertook to discover the frailties of such pretenders to this kind of knowledge before Mr Shadwell, so none since Mr Jonson's time ever drew so many different characters of humour, and with such success (5). The same Critic also observes, that our author's

(5) Account of the English Dramatic Poets, p. 451. Oxf. 1691.

P.

SHAKESPEARE [WILLIAM] was descended of a gentleman's family [A], at Stratford upon Avon, in the county of Warwick; but his father entering into the wool-trade,

[A] Descended of a gentleman's family.] Mr Betterton, the player, who took a journey to Stratford, on purpose to get some informations concerning our author, found by the register and public writings relating to that town, that the family of the Shakespeare's was of good figure and fashion there, and mentioned as gentlemen (1). But this was put beyond dispute by Mr Pope (2); who procured the following transcript from the instrument in the Herald's-Office:

(1) Rowe's Life of Shakespeare.

(2) Preface to his edition of Shakespeare's Works.

' To all and singular, noble, and gentlemen of all estates and degrees, bearing arms, to whom these presents shall come. William Dethicke, Garter-Principal King at Arms of England, and William Cambden, alias Clarencieux King at Arms for the south, east, and west parts of this realm, send greeting. Know ye, that in all nations and kingdoms the record and remembrance of worthy men have been made known and divulged by certain shields of arms and tokens of chivalrie; the grant and testimony whereof appertaineth unto us, by virtue of our offices from the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, and her Highness's most noble and victorious progenitors: wherefore, being solicited, and by credible report informed, that John Shakespere, now of Stratford upon Avon, in the county of Warwick, Gentleman (3); whose Great Grandfather, for his faithful and approved service to the late most pudent Prince, King Henry the Seventh, of famous memory, was advanced and rewarded with lards and tenements, given to him in those parts of Warwickshire, where they have continued, by some descents, in good reputation and credit; and for that the said John Shakespere having married

(3) This John was evidently our poet's father, and 'tis said he took out this instrument in honor of his son. Theobald's preface to Shakespeare.

' the daughter and one of the heirs of Robert Arden, of Wellingcote, in the same county; and also produced this his ancient Coat of Arms, heretofore assigned to him, whilst he was her Majesty's officer and bayliff of that town: In consideration of the premises, and for the encouragement of his posterity, unto whom such blazon of Arms and Achievements of inheritance from their said mother, by the ancient custom and law of Arms, may lawfully descend; we the said Garter and Clarencieux have assigned, granted, and confirmed, and by these presents, exemplified unto the said John Shakespere and to his posterity, that shield and Coat of Arms, viz. In a field of gold, upon a bend, fables; a spear of the first, the point upward, bended, argent; and for his crest or cognizance, A falcon, Or; with his wings displayed, standing on a wreath of his colours, supporting a spear, armed, headed, or steeled, silver, fixed upon an helmet, with mantles and tassels; as more plainly may appear depicted in this margin. And we have likewise impaled the same with the ancient Arms of the said Arden of Wellingcote; signifying, thereby, that it may and shall be lawful for the said John Shakespere, Gent. to bear and use the same shield of Arms, single or impaled as aforesaid, during his natural life; and that it shall be lawful for his children, issue, and posterity, lawfully begotten, to bear, use, and quarter, and shew forth, the same, with their due differences, in all lawful warlike feats and civil use or exercises, according to the laws of Arms, and custom that to gentlemen belongeth, without let or interruption of any person or persons for use and bearing the same. In witness and testimony whereof, we have subscribed our names, and fastned the seals

of

(a) Shakespeare's Life, by Rowe.

(b) See the instrument in remark [A].

(c) Mr Rowe tells us, that, upon the best enquiry, he found, the ghost in his own Hamlet was the top of his performances as an actor.

(4) See her monument in the church of Stratford.

(5) In the same church. It is there said, she died July 2, 1649, aged 66.

(6) These were the arms of the Lucies. Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire.

trade, dealt considerably that way (a). He married the daughter and one of the heirs of Robert Arden, of Wellingcote in the same county (b). This gentlewoman brought him ten children, of whom our poet was the eldest, being born in April 1564. At a proper age he was put to the free-school in Stratford, where he acquired the rudiments of Grammar-learning. Whether he discovered at this time any extraordinary genius or inclination for the Classics, is very uncertain; to make the best of any, he might be endued with, in that kind, was not the point in his father's view. He had no design to make a scholar of his son, but, on the contrary, took him early from school into his own business. He did not continue very long in this employ, as a minor, under the immediate guidance of his father; he resolved to write man sooner than ordinary, and at seventeen years of age married a woman of twenty-five. However, in respect to fortune, it was no imprudent match [B]; and thus young Shakespeare not only commenced master of a family, but became father of two if not three children, before he was out of his minority [C]. So settled, he had no other thoughts than of pursuing the wool-trade, when happening to fall into acquaintance with some persons, who followed the practice of deer-stealing, he was prevailed upon to engage with them in robbing Sir Thomas Lucy's park, at Cherlocot near Stratford. The injury being repeated more than once, that gentleman was provoked to enter a prosecution against the delinquents; and Shakespeare in revenge made him the subject of a ballad [D], which tradition says (for unluckily the piece is lost) was pointed with so much bitterness, that it became unsafe for the author to stay any longer in the country. To escape the hands of the Law, he fled to London, where, as might be expected from a man of wit and humour in his circumstances, he threw himself among the players. Thus, at length, this grand luminary was driven, by a very untoward accident, into his genuine and proper sphere of shining in the universe. His first admission into the play-house was suitable to his appearance; a stranger, unacquainted and uninformed in this art, he was glad to be taken into the company in a very mean rank. Neither did his performance recommend him to any distinguished notice (c). The part of an actor neither engaged nor deserved his attention; it was very far from filling, or being adequate to, the prodigious powers of his mind: he turned the advantage which that situation afforded him, to a higher and nobler use; and having, by practice and observation, acquainted himself with the mechanical part of the theatre [E], his native genius inspired all the other most essentially superior qualities of a play-wright [F]. But the whole view of our offices. Given at the Office of Arms, London, the day of in the forty second year of the reign of our Most Gracious Sovereign, Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. 1599.

[B] He married a woman of twenty five, &c.] She was the daughter of one John Hatheway, a substantial yeoman, in the neighbourhood; so that 'tis not improbable, that Shakespeare had an eye to his interest in the match; especially, if we consider her age; however, she survived her husband seven years, dying in 1623, at the age of sixty-seven (4).

[C] Before he was out of his minority.] He had three children by his wife, but we have an account only of two, they were both daughters. The younger was born in 1583, as appears by the inscription on her monument (5); so that, by the course of nature, the father, who was born in 1564, could not well be full eighteen years of age on his marriage, unless we suppose (what ought not to be supposed, there being no evidence of it) that her first child was the fruits of antenuptial fornication.

[D] He made a ballad upon the Knight.] This ballad was not the only shaft which he let fly against his prosecutor, whose anger drove him to the extreme end of ruin, where he was forced to a very low degree of drudgery for a support. How long the Knight continued inexorable is not known; but it is certain, that Shakespeare owed his release at last to the Queen's kindness. When he found, therefore, the character of Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry the Fourth, had won her Majesty's favour to that degree, that she ordered him to bring it once more on the stage; his address to her upon this occasion is admirable, in making this favourite a deer-stealer; which gave him, at the same time, such a natural opening against his prosecutor. The flèche is pointed with excellent humour, and the archer's aim hinted in such an allusion, as is not to be discerned but by those, who were in the secret. Justice Shallow appears conspicuously and splendidly ridiculous, whilst the particular merit that procured him the achievement of the dozen white lucies (6) would be observed only by the knowing ones in Heraldry. By this management of the Knight's reputation, a due respect is paid to his quality; he is saved from falling into the rude and undistinguishing hands of the vulgar; such a management was no less due to the length of twenty years, which had passed for the manager's resentment to cool in. It was still more due to the sense he must have then of his absolute security from any further harm; and, especially, to the advantage he had luckily made in his fortune thereby.

[E] The mechanical part of the theatre.] He used the help of his function in forming himself to create and express that sublime, which other actors can only copy and throw out in action and graceful attitude. His disregard to the two unities of time and place, are evidently owing to this skill, which had taught him the exact temper and disposition of the spectators. These he observed were susceptible of a deception in both those points, and he never suffered either of them to cramp the native force of his genius. In forming the plan of his plays, his design was to observe the unity of action only: this was sufficient to impose the neglect of the other upon the audience; and Mr Upton is of opinion; that he is the best Poet who can impose upon his audience, and that he is the wisest man who is easiest imposed on. The story, which is the principal part, and as it were, the soul of the tragedy, being made a whole, with a natural dependance and connection, the spectator seldom considers the length of time necessary to produce all the incidents, and as to place, there is an artificial contrivance of the scenes. 'For my own part, continues this writer, I see no great hurt likely to accrue to the understanding, in accompanying the Poet in his inmechanical operations, and in helping on an innocent deceit, while he not only raises or soothes the passions, but transports me from place to place, just as it pleases him, and carries on the thread of his story (7).'

[F] The most essentially superior qualities of a play-wright.] These are generally reckoned to be, manners, sentiments, and diction; and in these there are four requisites, which are all remarkably observed by Shakespeare. 1. That they be good. 2. Suitable. 3. True, with respect to history, or common report. 4. Uniform and consistent. As to the first of these, 'tis remarked, by the last-mentioned critic, that they were of this first attempt in stage-poetry [G] being to procure a subsistence, he directed his endeavours solely to hit the taste and humour that then prevailed amongst the meaner sort of people, of whom the audience was generally composed; and therefore his images of life were drawn from those of that rank [H]. These had no notion of the rules of writing, were the natural expressions of his own mind. Shakespeare being a good and honest man, as Ben Jonson testifies in his Discoveries (8); and in another place he says,

(7) Upton's Remarks upon Shakespeare.

— Look how the father's face
Lives in his issue, even so the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-torned and true-filled lines (9).

This is produced by Jonson, as a proof of Shakespeare's art and skill in play-writing. But however true Ben's remark undoubtedly is in general, yet a late author has pointed out a singular deviation from the fourth requisite of consistency, running through the whole fable in one of our author's most finished plays, Macbeth; where the incongruity of all the passages, in which the Thane of Cawdor is mentioned, appears prominently conspicuous. In the second scene of the first act, the Thanes of Ross and Angus bringing the king an account of the battle, inform him, that Norway,

Afflicted by that most disloyal traitor,
The Thane of Cawdor, 'gan a dismal conflict.

It appears, that Cawdor was taken prisoner, for the king says, in the same scene,

— Go, pronounce his death,
And with his former title, greet Macbeth.

Yet, though Cawdor was thus taken by Macbeth in arms against his king, when Macbeth is saluted in the fourth scene, Thane of Cawdor, by the weird sisters, he asks,

How of Cawdor? The Thane of Cawdor lives
A prosperous gentleman.—

And in the next line, considers the promises, that he should be Thane of Cawdor and King, as equally unlikely to be accomplished. How can Macbeth be ignorant of the state of the Thane of Cawdor, whom he has just defeated and taken prisoner; or call him a prosperous gentleman, who has forfeited his title and life by open rebellion? Or why should he wonder, that the title of the rebel, whom he has overthrown, should be conferred upon him? He cannot be supposed to dissemble his knowledge of the condition of Cawdor, because he inquires with all the ardour of curiosity and the vehemence of sudden astonishment, and because no body is present but Banquo, who had an equal part in the battle, and was equally acquainted with Cawdor's treason. However, in the next scene his ignorance still continues; and when Ross and Angus present him, from the king, with this new title, he cries out,

— The Thane of Cawdor lives;
Why do you dress me in his borrow'd robes?

Ross and Angus, who were the messengers that, in the second scene, informed the king of the assistance given by Cawdor to the invader; having lost, as well as Macbeth, all memory of what they had so lately seen and related, make this answer,

— Whether he was
Combin'd with Norway, or did line the rebels
With hidden help and vantage, or with both
He labour'd in his country's wreck, I know not.

Neither Ross knew what he had just reported, nor Macbeth what he had just done. This seems not to be one of the faults that are to be imputed to the transcribers; since though the inconsistency of Ross and Angus might be removed, by supposing, that their names are erroneously inserted, and that only Ross brought the account of the battle, and only Angus was sent to compliment Macbeth; yet the forgetfulness of Macbeth cannot be palliated, since what he says could not have been spoken by any other (10).

[G] His first attempts in Poetry.] We have no certain authority which was the first play he wrote;

VOL. VI. No. 303.

Romeo and Juliet, acted in 1597, was the highest date of any that Mr Pope could find, next to which was Richard the Second and Third, in 1598. The first part of Henry the Fifth, proves that play to be wrote while the Earl of Essex was General in Ireland. If Titus Andronicus were his, it would bid fairest for this right of primogeniture; since Ben Jonson, condemning it in his induction to Bartholomew-Fair, mentions it's being then of twenty-five or thirty years standing; if we take the lesser number, this play must have been wrote in 1589, when our author was twenty-five years old. But Mr Theobald takes Ben's words necessarily to extend to the largest time; and infers from it, that the play, on it's first appearance, could not be the work of Shakespeare's pen, who had not at that time left Warwickshire; and this argument is also esteemed unanswerable by Mr Upton. Mr Pope excludes this piece from the list of Shakespeare's offspring, because openly condemned by Ben Jonson while Shakespeare was living; for he will have it, that these two great Poets were good friends, and that they lived on amicable terms with each other, notwithstanding the warm contests that were carried on with less temper by their partizans (11). It is acknowledged, says he, that Ben Jonson was first introduced upon the stage, and his first works encouraged by Shakespeare, and after his death that author writes to the memory of his beloved William Shakespeare (12), which shews as if the friendship had continued through life. He thinks likewise, that the commendations of Shakespeare in Ben's Discoveries proceed from a personal kindness; he tells us, he loved the man as well as honoured his memory, celebrates the honesty, openness, and frankness of his temper, and only distinguishes, as he reasonably ought, between the real merit of the author and the silly and derogatory applauses of the players. But, however reasonable this might be, there is a very strong proof, that the players had a greater share in Shakespeare's friendship than Ben had: In his Will, he bequeaths to three of them, each a gold ring, ranking them among some of his first friends (13). In reality he had no reason to rank Ben among these; the frequent sneers which are vented in the induction to Bartholomew Fair against Shakespeare, while, as Mr Pope observes, he was still living, are undeniable proofs that Jonson's was such a kind of love as made him blind to some of his friend's most distinguishing excellencies. 'If there be never a servant monster 'ith fair (they are his words) who can help it; he says, nor a nest of antiques? He is loth to make nature afraid in his plays, like those that beget tales, tempests, and such like drolleries, to mix his head with other men's heels.' Here the servant monster is the character of Caliban, in the Tempest; the nest of antiques, is the clowns, who dance in The Winter's Tale; and lest he should be thought not to speak plainly enough, he expressly mentions those plays in the next sentence. I am afraid the reader will think but ill either of Jonson's judgment or his candour, when he thus ridicules what has been generally admired by men of real taste (14). This is the remark of Mr Whalley, who, however, so far agrees with Mr Pope, as to believe the sneer was designed not so much, though not absolutely without any design, to ridicule Shakespeare for his invention, as the passion of the mob for spectacles of this kind (15).

[H] His images of life are drawn from that rank] There being no external proofs to give light into this point, which was the first play of Shakespeare, recourse has been had to the internal evidence, for assistance therein, from the progress of his improvement by use and exercise. But all that could be discovered, was first, in regard to his comedies, that he fell into the general practice followed then, of laying his scene among tradesmen and mechanics; and in the historical plays, strictly copying the common old stories or vulgar traditions of that kind of people; and as in tragedy, nothing was so sure to surprize and raise their admiration, as the most unnatural events and incidents, the most exaggerated thoughts, the most verbose and

(11) Pope's Preface, as before.

(12) In his Epigrams, from p. 301 to 304, inclusive. Mr Pope calls it an ample and honourable panegyric to the memory of his friend; but in opinion he differs from his admired Dryden, who calls it an invidious and sparring one.

(13) See a copy of his Will, in remark [2].

(14) In regard to the character of Caliban, it is a remark of three of the prime wits in Jonson's time, Hale, Vaughan, and Selden, that Shakespeare had not only created a new being, but invented a new language for him.

(15) Works of Shakespeare, Vol. III. p. 282. note (5), edit. 1756, in 7 vols, 8vo.

(8) P. 91. Vol. VII. of his Works, edit. 1756, 8vo.

(9) Verses to Shakespeare's Memory, among his epigrams, Vol. VI. p. 303.

(10) Miscellaneous Observations on the Tragedy of Macbeth, note VI. edit. 1745, 8vo.

writing, or the model of the Ancients [I]. Shakespeare also set out without the advantage of education, and without the advice or assistance of the learned [K]; equally without the patronage bombast expression, the most pompous rhymes and thundering versification. So in comedy, nothing was so sure to please, as the mean buffoonry, idle ribaldry, and unmannerly jests of fools and clowns (16).

(16) This is evident, from the great pains Ben Jonson took to remove their prejudices and inform their judgments, both in his prefaces and prologues, and by the mouth of his actors, grex, chorus, &c.

[I] These had no notion of the rules, &c.] Not only the common audience had no notion of the rules of writing, but few, even of the better sort, piqued themselves upon any degree of knowledge or nicety that way. Their tragedies were only histories in dialogue; and their comedies followed the thread of any novel as they found it, no less implicitly than if it had been true history.

[K] Without the assistance of the learned.] Notwithstanding the remark of Ben Jonson, who knew our author when living, that he had little Latin and less Greek; yet his testimony hath not been sufficient to satisfy all his admirers. We are told, that in a conversation between Sir John Suckling, Sir William Davenant, Endymion Porter, Mr Hales of Eton, and Ben Jonson; Sir John Suckling, who was a professed admirer of Shakespeare, having undertaken his defence against Ben with some warmth, Mr Hales, after sitting still for some time, told them, that if Shakespeare had not read the Ancients he had likewise not stolen any thing from them; and that if Ben would produce any one topic finely treated by any of them, he would undertake to shew something at least as well written by Shakespeare (17). This was a very genteel turn of Ben's censoriousness into a high compliment of Shakespeare's genius; and Mr Rowe ventured further, peremptorily declaring it to be beyond all controversy, that Shakespeare had no knowledge of the writings of the ancient Poets; and that, in his works, no traces could be found of any thing which looked like an imitation of the Ancients. For, says he, the delicacy of his taste, and the natural bent of his own great genius (equal, if not superior, to some of the best of theirs), would certainly have led him to read and study them with so much pleasure, that some of their fine images would naturally have insinuated into, and been mixed with, his own writings. So that his not copying something from them may be an argument of his never having read them. Mr Pope afterwards preserved the compliment of Mr Hales, but with the same caution that he first made it, in the following paraphrase: 'There is certainly, says he, a vast difference between learning and languages; how far Shakespeare was ignorant of the latter I cannot determine, but 'tis plain he had much reading at least, if they will not call that learning. Nor is it any great matter, if a man has knowledge, whether he has it from one language or another. Nothing is more evident, than that he had a taste of natural Philosophy, Mechanics, Ancient and Modern History, Poetical Learning, and Mythology. We find him very knowing in the customs, rites, and manners of Antiquity. In Coriolanus and Julius Cæsar, not only the spirit, but manners of the Romans are exactly drawn, and still a nicer distinction is shewn, between the manners of the Romans, in the time of the former and of the latter. His reading on the ancient historians is no less conspicuous in many references to particular passages; and the speeches copied from Plutarch in Coriolanus may as well be made an instance of his learning as those copied from Cicero in the Cataline of Ben Jonson are of his. The manners of other nations in general, the Egyptians, Venetians, French, &c. are drawn with equal propriety. Whatever object of nature, or branch of science, he either speaks of, or describes, it is always with competent, if not extensive, knowledge; his descriptions are exact; all his metaphors appropriated and remarkably drawn from the true nature and inherent qualities of each subject. When he treats of ethic or politic, we may constantly observe a wonderful justness of distinction as well as extent of comprehension. No one is more a master of the poetical story, or has more frequent allusions to the various parts of it. Mr Waller (who has been celebrated for this last particular) has not shewn more learning this way than Shakespeare. We have translations from Ovid, published in his name, among those poems which pass for his, and for some of which, we have undoubted authority, being published by himself, and dedicated to his noble patron the Earl of Southampton. He appears also to have been conversant with Plautus; from whom he has taken the plan of one of his plays. He follows the Greek authors, and particularly Dares Phrygius in another, although I will not pretend to say in what language he read them. The modern Italian writers of novels he was manifestly acquainted with; and we may conclude him to be no less conversant with the Ancients of his own country, from the use he has made of Chaucer, in Troilus and Cressida; and in the two Noble Kinsmen, if that play be his, which Mr Pope thinks was so (18). He then proceeds to obviate an objection, which threatened to overset all these arguments, from the perpetual blunders and illiteracies which disgrace his writings. These he imputes, either to the neglect, imprudence, or ignorance, of the first transcribers and editors of his works; and ventures to say, that when the nature and kinds of these are enumerated and considered, not only Shakespeare, but even Aristotle and Cicero, had their works undergone the same fate, might have appeared to want sense as well as learning. The reader will perceive, that Mr Pope inclines, against Mr Rowe, to the opinion that our author's fine imitation of the Ancients is none of the least of his excellencies, and so raises a monument to Shakespeare's glory, though set upon a different foundation; which being observed by Mr Theobald, he sums up the whole in these words: 'The result of the controversy most certainly, says he, either way terminate to our author's honour: how happily he could imitate the Ancients, if that point be allowed, or how gloriously he could think like them, without owing any thing to imitation (19).' However, in pursuing this controversy, he takes the side against Mr Pope, as follows:—'Though, says he, I should be very unwilling to allow Shakespeare so poor a scholar as many have laboured to represent him, yet I shall be very cautious of declaring too positively on the other side of the question; that is, with regard to my opinion of his knowledge in the dead languages; and, therefore, the passages, that I occasionally quote from the classics, shall not be urged as proofs, that he knowingly imitated those originals, but brought to shew, how happily he has expressed himself upon the same topics. A very learned critic, of our own nation, has declared, that a sameness of thought and sameness of expression too, in two writers of a different age, can hardly happen, without a violent suspicion of the latter's copying from his predecessor. I shall not, therefore, run any great risk of a censure, though I should venture to hint, that the resemblance in thought and expression of our author and an Ancient (which we should allow to be imitation in learning, was not questioned) may sometimes take its rise from strength of memory, and those impressions which he owed to the school; and if we may allow a possibility of this, considering that when he quitted the school, he gave into his father's profession and way of living; and had, 'tis likely, but a slender library of classical learning; and considering what a number of translations, romances, and legends started about his time and a little before; (most of which, 'tis very evident, he read) I think it may very easily be reconciled, why he rather schemed his plots and characters from these later informations, than went back to those fountains; for which he might entertain a sincere veneration, but to which he could not have so ready a recourse (20).' This reasoning of Mr Theobald undoubtedly deserved a less ungrammatical style and a more coherent method; so that if he does not prove Shakespeare's want of scholarship, he does that of his own. As on the other hand, Mr Upton, who has entered into the list in this dispute, has confessedly demonstrated his own scholarship, however he may have failed in evincing that of Shakespeare; 'I have often wondered, says he, with what kind of reasoning any one could be so far imposed on, as to imagine, that Shakespeare had no learning, when it must, at the same time, be acknowledged, that without learning he cannot be read, with any degree of understanding or taste (21).' Just so the author of Chevy Chase comes

(17) Rowe's Life of Shakespeare, ubi supra.

(18) Pope's preface to his edition of Shakespeare, as before.

(19) Mr Herd observes, that Shakespeare, without designing or without knowing it, hath left us, in his historical plays, with all their anomalies, an exacter resemblance of the Athenian stage, than is any where to be found in its most professed admirers and copyists. Notes on Horace's Art of Poetry, p. 187. edit. 1753.

(20) Theobald's preface to his last edition of Shakespeare, 1757.

(21) Critical Remarks on Shakespeare.

patronage of the better sort, as without any acquaintance among them. But when his performances had merited the protection of his Prince, and the encouragement of the Court had succeeded to that of the Town, the works of his riper years are manifestly raised above those of his former [L]. The dates of his plays sufficiently evidence, that his productions improved, in proportion to the respect he had for his auditors. In this way of writing he was an absolute original [M], and of such a peculiar cast, as hath perpetually comes within this construction of a man of learning, since without the learning of Mr Addison's notes, he cannot be read with any kind of understanding or taste; and to do this writer justice, it must be allowed too, that, like Mr Addison in that old song, his design was not so much to produce proofs of his author's learning, as to communicate the excellent use he made of his own. This is undeniable from a great number of instances, where he shews the closest connection between Shakespeare and the Greek and Latin writers, which yet he plainly supposes to be merely accidental and utterly unknown to Shakespeare. In the mean time, he has justly ridiculed all the attemptors to modernize Shakespeare; who, he observes, is set forth by these vipers as a meer mechanic, a fellow, 'tis true, of genius, who says now and then very good things, but wild and uncultivated; and one who is by no means proper company for Lords and Ladies and Court Pages, 'till some Poet or other, who knows the world better, takes him in hand, and introduces him in the modern dress to good company. He has ventured also (with what candour or success the reader must judge) to aim a stroke of his critical wand at Lord Shaftesbury, whose account of Shakespeare is given in a few words: Our old dramatic Poet may witness for one good ear and manly reliſh, [notwithstanding his natural wildness, his unpolished stile, his antiquated phrase and wit, his want of method and coherence, and his deficiency in almost all the graces and ornaments of these kind of writings] yet by the justness of his morals, the aptness of many of his descriptions, and the plain and natural turn of several of his characters he pleases his audience and even gains their ear, without a single bribe from luxury or vice. 'Those lines,' says Mr Upton, that I have placed between two hooks, ought certainly to be omitted, as they carry with them reflections false in every particular. 'Tis certain, his Lordship leaves us no room to doubt of the little opinion he had of Shakespeare's classical learning.' And Mr Hurd (22) inclines the same way so strongly, that he does not scruple to suggest, the want of what is called the advantage of a learned education, to have been a particular felicity to his genius, which by that means preserved it's natural freedom uninfluenced with the bond of classical superstition. However, the same critic, speaking of the position of known words and an easy deduction of new ones, recommends the study of Shakespeare, who he says, of all the Moderns, hath most successfully practised this secret (23).

[L] Are manifestly raised above those of his former years. This is the assertion of Mr Pope, advanced, as it should seem, to prevent any mistake that might be occasioned by a remark of Mr Rowe; who suggests, that we are not to look for Shakespeare's beginnings, like those of other authors, among their least perfect writings. 'Art, says that gentleman, had so little, and nature so large, a share in what he did, that, for ought I know, the performances of his youth, as they were the most vigorous, and had the most fire and strength of imagination in them, were the best (24).' Mr Pope confines this improvement to those plays only which were writ for the Court. 'I make no doubt, says he, in this observation, that he improved in proportion to the respect he had for his auditors, would appear in every instance, were but editions extant, from whence we might learn the exact time when every piece was composed; and whether he wrote for the town or the Court, directing us to look for this improvement only in the latter, which are his best.' And, as to the fire and strength of imagination, which is made by Mr Rowe, the characteristic of his best pieces, Mr Pope thinks this only a proof that his wit often buoys up and is borne above his subject, when that is not well chosen, as in fools and clowns. 'Shakespeare's genius, says he, in those low parts, is like some prince of a romance, in the disguise of a shepherd or peasant,

' a certain greatness and spirit now and then breaks out, which manifest his higher extraction and qualities.' Mr Rowe, in support of his opinion, says, that he would not be thought to mean, that Shakespeare's fancy was so loose and extravagant as to be independent on the rule and government of judgment, but that what he thought was commonly so great, so justly and rightly conceived in itself, that it wanted little or no correction, and was immediately approved by an impartial judgment at the first sight. On the contrary, Mr Pope declares, that 'most of our author's errors are not so much defects as superſtatations, and arise purely from want of thinking or judging, which yet was not owing so much to any real defect in the faculty or power of his own judgment, but from a compliance to the want of it in the lowest of the people *, whom he was obliged to please, and depress his judgment; or else from being misled, by keeping the worst of company, as a player, and forming himself upon the judgment of that body of men whereof he was a member. As these men live by the majority, they know no rule but that of pleasing the present humour, and complying with the wit in fashion; a consideration, which brings all their judgment to a short point. Players are just such judges of what is right, as taylors are of what is graceful. In this view, it will be but fair to allow, that most of our author's faults are left to be ascribed to his wrong judgment as a Poet, than to his right judgment as a player (25).' However, it ought to be observed, that if those disadvantages were sufficient to mislead and depress the greatest genius upon earth, yet they were recompensed by some extraordinary advantages, flowing from the particular taste and humour of the times. Thus, the universal belief of the power of witches, fairies, and enchantments, among the lowest of the people especially, gave full room for his boundless imagination to roam in. We need not take notice, that two of his best pieces † are formed upon this belief; to say nothing of his Midsummer Night's Dream. The two Gentlemen of Verona, one of the first, as well as one of the worst, of Shakespeare's plays, cannot be said to derive it's faults from any of the causes assigned by Mr Pope. Besides, his employment as a player, gave him the advantage and habit of fancying himself the very character he meant to delineate.

[M] He was an absolute original. This has never been contested; on the contrary, it has constantly been esteemed no slender proof of the force and penetration of succeeding wits, to be able to convey an apt and adequate idea of his. Mr Pope has laboured this point; he tells us (26), that 'Homer himself drew not his art so immediately from the fountains of nature, it proceeded through Egyptian strainers and channels, and came to him, not without some tincture of the learning, or some cast of the models, of those before him. But the poetry of Shakespeare was inspiration indeed. He was not so much an imitator as an instrument of nature. 'Tis not so just to say he speaks from her as that she speaks through him.' In another place he observes, in distinction to Milton's genius, which he says, glows continually, and is kept up by the greatest art, that of Shakespeare strikes us unprepared, like an accidental stroke from Heaven. That he seems to have known the world by intuition, to have looked through human nature at a glance, and to be the only author that gives ground for a very new opinion, that the Philosopher, and even the man of the world, may be born, as well as the Poet. Mr Upton observes (28), that there is no character, that of Socrates only excepted, where refined ridicule, gallery, wit, and humour were so mixed and united with what is most grave and serious in Morals and Philosophy, as our author's; he observes, that this is the magic, with which he works such wonders:

* These faults are such as respect the choice of the subject, the conduct of the incidents, as well as false thoughts, forced expressions, clinches, &c.

(25) Pope's Preface, ubi supra.

† The Tempest, and Macbeth.

(26) In the last cited preface.

(27) In his preface to the translation of the Iliad.

(28) Critical Remarks on Shakespeare.

(22) Notes upon Horace's Art of Poetry, where he says, In another place he expresses it thus: 'It is possible there are, who think a want of reading, as well as a vast superiority of genius, hath contributed to lift this astonishing man [Shakespeare] to the glory of being esteemed the most original THINKER and SPEAKER since the times of Homer. Discourse on Poetical Imit. p. 215.

(23) Ibid. p. 46.

(24) Rowe's Life of Shakespeare.

petually raised and confounded the emulation of his successors; a compound of such very singular blemishes as well as beauties, that these latter have not more mocked the toil of every aspiring undertaker to emulate them than the former, as flaws intimately united to the diamonds, have baffled every attempt of the cunningest artists to take them out, without spoiling the whole [N]. Queen Elizabeth, who shewed Shakespeare many marks of her favour [O], was so much pleased with the delightful character of Sir John Falstaff

—Pectus inaniter angit,
Inritat, mulcet, falsis terroribus implet,
Ut magus; & modo me Thebis, modo ponit Athenis †.

† Horat. Epist.
ad Augustum, l.
211, 212, 213.

(29) In his third letter prefixed to his Elfrida.

(30) Notes on Horace's Epistle
ad Pisonem, p.
187. edit. 1753.

Another unexampled perfection of Shakespeare's wit, is taken notice of by Mr Mason (29), who, speaking of the ordinary advantage of the ancient chorus in dramatic performances, writes thus: 'What-ever these modern play-makers may have gained by rejecting the chorus, the true Poet has lost considerably by it, for he has lost a graceful and natural resource to the embellishments of picturesque description, sublime allegory, and whatever else comes under the denomination of pure poetry. Shakespeare, indeed, had the power of introducing this naturally, and, what is more strange, of joining it with pure passion.' His striking out of the ordinary road, and rejecting the rules of the drama with success, has generally been esteemed another characteristic of his vast and original genius. Shakespeare, says Mr Hurd, first broke through the bond of classical superstition, and uninfluenced by the weight of early prepossession, he struck at once into the road of nature and common sense (30).

[N] A compound of beauties and blemishes] It is the observation of an elegant French writer, 'that the English as well as the Spaniards, were possessed of the theatre at a time when the French had no more than moving itinerant stages. Shakespeare, who was considered as the Corneille of the first mentioned nation, was nearly contemporary with Lopez de Vega, and he created, as it were, the English theatre. Shakespeare, besides a strong, fruitful, genius, was natural and sublime, but had not so much as one single spark of good taste, or any one rule of the drama. I will now hazard a random, but at the same time, a true reflection; which is, that the great merit of this dramatic Poet has been the ruin of the English stage. There are such beautiful, such noble, such dreadful scenes in this writer's monstrous verses, to which the name of tragedy is given, that they have always been exhibited with great success. Time, which only gives reputation to writers, at last makes their very faults venerable. Most of the whimsical gigantic images of this Poet, have, through length of time, acquired a right of passing for sublime. Most of the modern dramatic writers have copied him; but the touches and descriptions which are applauded in Shakespeare are hissed at in these writers; and you'll easily believe, that the veneration, in which this author is held, increases in proportion to the contempt which is shewn to the Moderns. Dramatic writers don't consider, that they should not imitate him; and the ill success of Shakespeare's imitators, produces no other effect, than to make him be considered as inimitable. In Othello, a most tender piece, a man strangles his wife on the stage, and though the poor woman is strangling, she cries out aloud, that she dies very unjustly. In Hamlet, the two grave diggers are drunk, singing ballads, and making humorous reflections on the skulls which they throw up; but a circumstance that will surprize you is, that this ridiculous incident has been imitated. Otway, in his Venice preserved, introduces Antonio the senator and Naki his courtesan in the midst of the horrors of the Marquis of Bidmars's conspiracy. Antonio, the Spaniard senator, plays in his master's presence all the apish tricks of a lewd impotent debauchee, who is quite frantic and out of his senses, he mimicks a dog, and bites his mistress's legs, who kicks and whips him. However, the players have struck these buffoonries (which were calculated merely for the dregs of the people) out of Otway's tragedy, but they have still left in Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar, the jokes of the Roman shoemakers and cobblers, who are introduced in the 'same scene with Brutus and Cassius (31)'. Mr Voltaire has thus given a notable instance how far the brightest genius may be depressed and misguided by a slavish attachment to the antique laws, which he calls being in taste; and will have the various palates of different nations absolutely subjugated to them. A proper answer to this imposition is, that an Englishman scorns to submit to any laws, to which he has not given his own consent. 'Tis no wonder to find a critic, who takes his idea of Shakespeare from what he finds in Corneille, censuring the grave-diggers in Hamlet; Ophelia's dying words in Othello; and the suffering cobblers to crack jokes in the presence of Brutus and Cassius. These are masterly touches, of a very ticklish and dangerous nature*; in attempting to judge of which, the blind superstition of the servile critic is equally exposed, with the impudence of the low creeping imitator. A critic of our own has observed, that the authority of Shakespeare has been so far from spoiling the English stage, that, on the contrary, it was ruined, by leaving his noble and manly virtue to follow the effeminate softness of the French manners and taste. In this depraved spirit we were debauched, by being too much Frenchified, by residing among that people. It was after the Restoration that lewdness and debauchery were publickly brought on the stage by Dryden and Congreve; 'twas then, that Shakespeare's plays were altered to the present taste, and his faults endeavoured to be purged out by Sir William Davenant, Dryden, and the Duke of Bucks; the event shewed, that as Shakespeare came upon the stage with all his faults upon his head, so these could not be taken off without wounding the brain; by which piece of surgery, it became sensible that they were so vitally united to it, that in separating them, the body was brought into the state of a meer lifeless carcase. Originals are sui generis; and it would be intirely out of nature to set Shakespeare for a model to form other wits upon. Some are so formed as to succeed best under the guidance of the Greeks and the common rules. This has been the case of Dryden, Otway, and Rowe †, whose most regular compositions are reckoned their chef d'oeuvres. These regular beauties gain our esteem, and some degree of love and admiration; but 'tis the charm that unexpectedly arises from what was thought to be an irregular contrast of features and colour, that raises enchantment, transport, and rapture. Shakespeare puts his spectators and auditors into a trance, where they both see and feel pleasures unutterable. In this view, Mr Hurd having observed, that there was a time when the art of Jonson was set above the divinest raptures of Shakespeare; proceeds to take notice, that the present age is well convinced of the mistake, and finely remarks, that 'if Shakespeare's genius is now idolized, happily for the public taste, it can scarcely be too much so (32)'. Shakespeare alone was equal to the task of correcting Shakespeare's faults. It has been observed, that there is no vice of style or composition, but what our Poet has in one place or other ridiculed or censured. He has made use of this talent in many of his pieces. If in doing this, he lets some still keep their places, experience has since demonstrated, that his judgment in this particular was more extraordinary and surprizing, as the lofty flowings of his fancy and exactness of his judgment appear to be justly matched to each other (33).

[O] Queen Elizabeth shewed him many marks of her favour.] As no doubt can be made, but that our author felt the first fruits of her Majesty's kindness in the article of deer-stealing; so, in 1581, there was published under the same name, a treatise, dedicated to her Majesty; in which the author particularly mentions that Queen's clemency to him, in these terms: 'Although this [the perfection of her Majesty's government] be of itself so clear and manifest, that it cannot be denied; yet could not I forbear, most renowned sovereigne, being, as it were, enforced by your

(31) Voltaire's
Letters concerning the English
Nation, Letter
18th.

* Thus the great antique original, Plato, is observed to introduce the tumour of poetical compositions into discourses of Philosophy with success. Dionys.
Halicarn. Ep. ad
C. Pomp. p. 205.
edit. Hudf.

† In All for Love, Venice preserved, and Jane Shore.

(32) Notes upon the Art of Poetry, Line 408.

(33) Warbur-ton's Remarks upon Shakespeare.

Majestie's

Falstaff [P], in the two parts of Henry IV. that she commanded the author to continue it for one play more, and to shew the Knight in love, which he executed inimitably in The Merry Wives

(34) A Compendious or Brief Examination of certayne ordinary Compliments of divers of our Countrymen, &c. by way of Dialogue, debated and discussed by Will. Shakespeare, Gentleman. Lond. 1581, 8vo. Reprinted in 1751, 8vo.

Majestie's late and singular clemency, in pardoning certayne my undutifull misdemeanours; but seek to acknowledge your gracious goodness and bounty towards me, &c. (34)* By these two concurring circumstances, this piece might fairly challenge our Poet for it's author, did not his claim appear to be fully confuted, by the date 1581; besides that the offence for which her Majesty's pardon had been obtained, must have been committed, at least, a year or two before; not to mention, that Shakespeare, at the age of fifteen or sixteen, must have been a very wise man, not after the common sort of these clerks, which can talk of nothing but of the faculty which they profess; as if they be Divines of Divinity, Lawyers of the Law, and Physicians of Physic only. This man speaks very naturally of every thing, as a man universally seen; that had joined good learning with good wit. So that this book, if it could be written by our Poet, would be absolutely decisive in the dispute about his learning, since he must have been so by intuition, for he cites Homer, Plato, Cæsar, Cicero, Pomponius Mela, Vegetius, Collumella, and several others; and is suggested expressly to have read them all in the original, though he might have had them in the translations. Moreover, the doctor, who presides in the dialogue, and evidently represents the author himself, has these words: 'I have seen a cap for 14 pence, as good as I can now get for two shillings and six pence. Now a paye of shoes cost twelve pence, that in my time I have bought a better for six pence. Now I can get ne're a horse shod under sixteen pence or twelve pence, whereof I have also seen the common price was six pence *.' That is in Henry the Eighth's reign, long enough before our Poet was born. Who expressed his gratitude to Queen Elizabeth, in his own way; and that (which is a testimony of the devotion of his gratitude) not only in strains above all other Poets, but he even seems, by a peculiar stroke of inspiration, to be raised above himself. In the play of Midsummer Night's Dream, Act ii. scene 3, the king of the Fairies says to his attendant, —Thou remember'st,

Since once I sat upon a promontory,
And heard a mermaid, on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song,
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,
To hear the Mermaid's music.

Puck. I remember too,

At that very time, I saw, but thou could'st not,
Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
Cupid alarm'd; a certain aim he took,
At a fair vestal throned in the west,
And loos'd his love-shafts smartly from his bow,
As it should pierce a Queen of Hearts;
But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft,
Quench'd in the moist beams of the watry moon,
And the imperial votarefs pass'd on
In maiden meditation; fancy free.

(35) In his edition of our author's plays.

Dr Warburton (35) has changed alarm'd for alarm'd because it raises the beauty of the thought greatly; for what an addition is this to the compliment made to this virgin Queen's celibacy, that it alarmed the power of love, as if his empire were in danger, when this imperial votress had declared for a single life; so powerful would her great example be in the world: Queen Elizabeth could not but be pleased with our author's address on this occasion. The same critic also observes, that tho' the compliment paid in these last lines to Queen Elizabeth, is obvious enough; yet the character of Mary, Queen of Scots, in the former lines, was too allegorically delineated to be understood. Nothing is truer, than that both a compliment and a satire, on that unfortunate lady, were here intended, either of which was a sufficient reason to disguise the matter by an allegory. First, the laying of the scene, shews it to be near the British island; for the speaker is represented as hearing the mermaid, at the very time he saw Cupid's attempt upon the vestal. The mermaid on the dolphin's back, plainly designs Queen Mary's marriage with the Dauphin of France. The Poet designs her under the image of a mermaid on two accounts, because she was Queen of one part of the ille, and because of her mischievous allurements:

Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,

This alludes to her great parts of genius and learning, which rendered her the most accomplished woman of her time. The French writers tell us, that while she was in the Court of France, wife to the Dauphin, she pronounced a Latin oration in the great hall of the Louvre with so much grace and eloquence, that the whole assembly were in admiration:

That the rude sea grew civil to her song,

By this is meant Scotland, long in arms against her; there is the greater justness and beauty in it, because the common opinion is, that the mermaid sings in storms:

And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,
To hear the sea-maid's music.

This alludes in general to the many matches proposed to her; but more particularly to the Duke of Norfolk's famous negotiation with her, which bringing such destruction on him, and on the Earls of Northampton and Westmoreland, and many other noble families, it was said with the utmost propriety,

That certain stars shot madly from their spheres.

[P] The character of Sir John Falstaff. This is Shakespeare's master-piece. In it, Shakespeare expressly figures himself by the deer-stealer; in which, we see the perfection of his genius. It will not be our design to examine into the true composition of this character. 'Tis evident, the excellency of it lies in a just mixture of wit and humour. The ground-work is humour, or the representation and detection of a bragging and vaunting coward in real life. However, this alone would only have exposed the Knight, as a meer Noll Bluff, to the derision of the company, and after they had been once gratified with his chastisement, he would have sunk into infamy and become quite odious. But here the inimitable wit of Sir John comes into his support, and gives a new rise and lustre to his character; for the sake of his wit you forgive his cowardice; or rather, are fond of his cowardice for the occasion it gives to his wit. In short, the humour furnishes a subject and spur to the wit, and the wit again supports and embellishes the humour. At the first entrance of the Knight, your good humour and tendency to mirth are irresistibly excited by his jolly appearance and corpulency. You feel and acknowledge him to be the fittest subject imaginable for yielding diversion and merriment. But, when you see him immediately set up for enterprize and activity, with his evident weight and unweildiness, your attention is called forth, and you are eager to watch him to the end of his adventures. Your imagination points out, with a full scope, his future embarrassments. All the while as you accompany him forwards he heightens your relish for his further disasters, by his happy opinion of his own sufficiency, and the gay vaunts which he makes of his talents and accomplishments; so that at last, when he falls into a scrape, your expectation is exquisitely gratified, and you have the full pleasure of seeing all his trumpeted honour laid in the dust; taken in the midst of his misfortune, instead of being utterly demolished and sunk, he rises again, by the superior force of his wit, and begins

Wives of Windsor [2]. Among his other patrons, the Earl of Southampton is particularly honoured a new course, with fresh spirit and alacrity. This excites you the more to renew the chace, in full view of his second defeat; out of which, he recovers again, and triumphs with new pretensions and boasting. After this, he immediately starts upon a third race, and so on; continually detected and caught, and constantly extricating himself by his inimitable wit and invention; thus, yielding a perpetual round of sport and diversion. Again, the genteel quality of Sir John is of great use in supporting his character, it prevents his sinking too low, after several of his misfortunes: besides, you allow him, in consequence of his rank and seniority, the privilege to dictate and take the lead, to rebuke others upon many occasions. By this, he is saved from appearing too nauseous and independent. The good sense which he possesses comes also to his aid, and saves him from being despicable, by forcing your esteem for his real abilities. Again, the privilege you allow him, of rebuking and cheating others, when he assumes it with proper firmness and superiority, helps to settle a new and compose his character, after an embarrassment, and reduces, in some measure, the spirit of the company to a proper level, before he sets out again upon a fresh adventure; without this they would be kept continually strained and wound up to the highest pitch, without sufficient relief and diversity. It may also deserve to be remarked of Falstaff, that the figure of his person is admirably suited to the turn of his mind, so that there arises before you a perpetual allusion from one to the other, which forms an incessant series of wit, whether they be in contrast or agreement together; when he pretends to activity, there is wit in the contrast, between his mind and his person; and wit in their agreement, when he triumphs in jollity. To complete the whole, you have, in this character of Falstaff, not only a free course of humour, supported and embellished with admirable wit, but this humour is of a species the most jovial and gay in all nature. Sir John Falstaff possesses generosity, cheerfulness, alacrity, invention, frolic, and fancy, superior to all other men. The figure of his person is the picture of jollity, mirth, and good nature, and banishes at once all other ideas from your breast. He is happy himself and makes you happy. If you examine him further, he has no fierceness, reserve, malice, or peevishness lurking in his heart; his intentions are all pointed at harmless riot and merriment: Nor has the Knight any inveterate design, except against sack; and that too he loves. If, besides this, he desires to pass for a man of activity and valour, you can easily excuse so harmless a foible, which yields you the highest pleasure in its constant detection. If you put all these together, it is impossible to hate honest Jack Falstaff. If you observe them again, it is impossible to avoid loving him: He is the gay, the witty, the frolicsome, happy, and fat Jack Falstaff, the most delightful swaggerer in all nature. You must love him for your own sake; at the same time, you cannot but love him for his own talents, and when you have enjoyed them, you cannot but love him in gratitude. He has nothing to disgust you, and every thing to give you joy. His sense and his foibles are equally directed to advance your pleasure, and it is impossible to be tired or unhappy in his company. This jovial and gay humour, without any thing envious, malicious, mischievous, or despicable, and continually adorned with wit, yields that peculiar delight, without any alloy, which we all feel and acknowledge in Falstaff's company. Ben Jonson has humour in his characters drawn with the most masterly skill and judgment. In accuracy, depth, propriety, and truth, he has no superior, or equal, among the Ancients or Moderns. But the characters he exhibits are of a satirical and deceitful, or else of a peevish or despicable, species; as Volpone, Subtle, Morose, and Abel Drugger; in all of which there is something very justly to be hated or despised, and you feel the same sentiments of dislike for every other character of Jonson's; so that, after you have been gratified with their detection and punishment, you are quite tired and disgusted with their company. Whereas, Shakespeare, besides the peculiar gaiety in the humour of Falstaff, has guarded him from disgusting you with his forced advances, by giving him rank and quality; from being despicable, by his real good sense and excellent abilities; from being odious, by his harmless plots and designs; and from being tiresome, by his inimitable wit, and his new and incessant sallies of highest fancy and frolic. This discovers the secret of carrying comedy to the highest pitch of delight; which lies in drawing the persons exhibited with such cheerful and amiable oddities and foibles as you would chuse in your own companions in real life; otherwise, though you may be diverted at first with the novelty of a character, and with a proper detection and ridicule of it, yet its peevishness, meanness, or immorality, will begin to disgust you after a little reflection, and become soon tiresome and odious; it being certain, that whoever cannot be endured as an accidental companion in real life, will, for the very same reasons, never become a favourite comic character on the stage. This relish for generous and worthy characters alone, which we all feel upon the theatre, where no bias of envy, malice, or personal resentment, draws us aside, seems to be some evidence of our natural and genuine disposition to probity and virtue; though the minds of most persons, being early and deeply tinged with vicious passions, it is no wonder that stains have been generally mistaken for original colours. All characters that are well drawn justly please, but not all equally; Jonson, in his comic scenes, has exposed and ridiculed folly and vice; Shakespeare has ushered in joy, frolic, and happiness. The Alchymist, Volpone, and Silent Woman of Jonson, are most exquisite satires; the comic entertainments of Shakespeare are the highest compositions of rallery, wit, and humour. Jonson conveys some lesson in every character; Shakespeare, some new species of foible and oddity. The one pointed his satire with masterly skill; the other was inimitable, in touching the strings of delight. With Jonson, you are confined and instructed; with Shakespeare, content and dissolved in joy. It may be further remarked, that Jonson, by pursuing the most useful intention of comedy, is obliged, in justice, to hunt down and demolish his own characters; upon this plan, he must necessarily expose them to your hatred, and of course will never bring out an amiable person. But, Shakespeare, with happier insight, always supports his characters in your favour; His Justice Shallow withdraws before he is tedious; The French doctor and Welsh parson go off in full vigour and spirits. Ancient Pistol, indeed, is scurvily treated; however, he keeps up his spirits, and continues to threaten so well, that you are still desirous of his company: And it is impossible to be tired or dull with the gay, unfading, ever green Falstaff. Abel Drugger bids fairest of any of Jonson's characters for being a favourite of the theatre; he has no hatred, malice, or immorality, nor any assuming arrogance, pertness, or peevishness; and his eager desire of getting and saving money, by methods he thinks lawful, are excusable in a person of his business. He is, therefore, not odious or detestable, but harmless and inoffensive in private life: However, this character, in the whole, is mean and despicable, without any of that free, spirituous, jocund, humour abounding in Shakespeare. It appears, that in imagination, invention, jollity, and gay humour, Jonson had little power; Shakespeare unlimited dominion. The first was cautious and strict, not daring to fall beyond the bounds of regularity; the other bold and impetuous, rejoicing like a giant, to run his course, through all the mountains and wilds of nature and fancy. It requires an almost painful attention, to mark the propriety and accuracy of Jonson; and your satisfaction arises from reflection and comparison; but the fire and invention of Shakespeare are shot instantaneously into your soul, and enlighten and cheer the most indolent mind with their own spirit and lustre (36).

The reader, who examines into this matter, will observe, that the character, here explained, of Sir John Falstaff, is chiefly taken from the first part of Henry the Fourth. For, so far as Sir John, upon any occasion, sinks into a cheat or a scoundrel, he is different from the Falstaff here described, which is entirely an amiable character.

[2] The Merry Wives of Windsor] If this story be true, it is evident, the latter part of Henry the Fourth, must have been added afterwards, since there honoured by him, in the dedications of two poems, Venus and Adonis, and Lucrece; in the latter especially he expresses himself in such terms, as gives countenance to what is related of that patron's distinguished generosity to him [R]. In the beginning of King James the First's reign (if not sooner) he was one of the principal managers of the play-house [S], and continued in it several years afterwards [T]; 'till having acquired such a fortune as satisfied his moderate wishes and views in life (d), he quitted the stage, and all other business, and passed the remainder of his time in an honourable ease, among the conversation of his friends, at his native town of Stratford, with the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, to whom his pleasurable and good nature rendered him very agreeable [U].

(36) Essay upon the true Standard of Wit, Humour, &c. by Corbyn Morris.

(d) Shakespeare's chief ambition was to settle himself as a country gentleman; the instrument for his arms was taken out of the Herald's office by his father with this view, and in the same view he called his house New Place.

He

we have an account of Sir John's imprisonment and death, which might perhaps be done by the author, in compliance with decorum, to avoid the imputation of encouraging idleness and riot, by too amiable and happy an example. However that be, 'tis certain, that though Falstaff is here a fardle of low vices, a liar, a coward, and a thief, yet his good humour makes him a pleasant companion, and what not a little shews the genius of our Poet, he has kept up the spirit of his humour, after having wrote two plays before, in this third, though it was put upon him by another. For this reason, if it be true, what Mr Dryden tells us, speaking of Mercutio's character in Romeo and Juliet, that Shakespeare said himself, he was forced to kill him in the third act, to prevent being killed by him. It must be his diffidence and modesty that made him say this; for it never could be through barrenness of invention, says Mr Upton, that Mercutio's sprightly wit was ended in the third act, but because there was no need of him or his wit any longer (37).

(37) Upton's Critical Remarks, as before.

[R] The Earl of Southampton's generosity] Mr Rowe tells us, upon the authority of Sir William Davenant, that this nobleman, at one time, gave him a thousand pounds, to enable him to go through with a purchase, which he had heard our Poet had a mind to. The dedication of Lucrece runs thus:

' The love I dedicate to your Lordship, is without end; whereof, this imperfect poem, without a beginning, is but a spiritless surety. The warrant I have of your honorable disposition, not the worth of my awkward lines, makes the body of it. Hence, what I have done, is your's; what I have to do, is your's; being part in all I have devoted your's. Were my worth greater, my duty would shew greatest; mean time, as it is, it is bound to your Lordship, to whom I wish long life, still lengthened with all happiness.

Your Lordship's, in all duty,

W. Shakespeare.'

It is worth notice, that how much soever he neglected to take due care in printing his plays, yet this poem is printed very elegantly, by the famous Field, in 1694.

[S] A manager of the play-house in the beginning of King James's reign.] Soon after his Majesty's Accession to the Throne, he granted the following licence:

' Pro Laurentio Fletcher, & Willielmo Shakespeare, & aliis.

' James, by the Grace of God, &c. To all Justices, Maiors, Sheriffs, Constables, Hedboroughs, and other our Officers and loving Subjects, Greetinge.

' Knowe ye, that wee of our especiall grace, certaine knowledge, and mere motion, have licensed and authorized, and, by these presents, do licence and authorize theise our servants, Laurence Fletcher, William Shakespeare, Richard Burbage, Augustyne Philipps, John Henings, Henrie Condell, William Sly, Robert Armin, Richard Cowly, and the rest of their associates,

' Freely to use and exercise the arte and faculty of playing comedies, tragedies, histories, enterludes, morals, pastoralls, stage plaies, and such others, like as theie have alredie studied, or hereafter shall use or studie, as well for the recreation of our lovinge subjects, as for our solace and pleasure, when wee shall thincke good to see them, duringe our pleasure;

' and the said comedies, tragedies, histories, enterludes, morals, pastoralls, stage-playes, and such like, to shewe and exercise publicquely to their best commodity, when the infection of the plague shall decrease, as well within their nowe usuall hoame, called the Globe, within our countie of Surrey, as alsoe within anie towne-halls, or moate-halls, or other convenient place, within the liberties and freedom of anie other citie, universitie, toun, or boroughe whatsoever, within our said realms and dominions.

' Willing and comending you, and everie of you, as you tender our pleasure, not onelie to permit and suffer them herein, without anie your letts, hindrances, or molellations, during our said pleasure, but alsoe to be aiding and assistinge to them, if anie wrong be to them offered, and to allow them such former curtesies as hath been given to men of their place and qualitic; and also, what further favour you shall shewe to theise our servants for our sake we shall take kindlie at your hande.

' In witness whereof, &c.

' Witnesse ourself at Westminster, the nynteenth day of Maye.

' Per breve de privato Sigillo (38).'

(38) Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. XVI. p. 505.

[T] He continued in the house several years afterwards.] The time when Shakespeare came upon the stage is not more uncertain than that of his quitting it. However, the opinion, that Spenser's Talia, in the Tears of the Muses, where she laments the loss of her Willy, in the comic scene, relates to our author's abandoning the stage, is groundless, since Spenser, 'tis known, died in the year 1598; and five years after this, we find Shakespeare's name among the actors in Ben Jonson's Sejanus, which made it's first appearance in 1603 (39). If it relates to him at all, it must hint at some occasional recess he made for a time, upon a disgust taken; but it is most likely, that Willy, there mentioned, relates to some other favourite Poet of the same Christian name. 'Tis evident, that Shakespeare did not exhibit his Macbeth 'till after the two kingdoms of England and Scotland were united under one monarch, nor 'till after King James had begun to touch for the King's evil; for he has complimented his royal master on both those accounts in that tragedy. It is not probable, that he had quitted the stage before 1610; since, in his Tempest, he makes mention of the Bermuda islands, which were unknown to the English 'till 1609, when Sir John Summers, in his voyage to North America, discovered them, and invited afterwards some of his countrymen to settle a plantation there (40).

(39) See Ben Jonson's article.

(40) Theolald, ubi supra.

[U] Very agreeable] Mr Rowe informs us, that there was a story almost still remembered among them, that he had a particular intimacy with Mr Combe, who is said to be an old gentleman, noted for his wealth and usury. It happened once, in a pleasant conversation among their friends, that this Mr Combe told Shakespeare, in a laughing manner, that he fancied he intended to write his epitaph, if he happened to outlive him; and since he could not know what might be said of him when he was dead, he desired it might be done immediately. Upon which Shakespeare gave him these four verses:

' Ten in the hundred lies here engraved,
' 'Tis a hundred to ten his soul is not saved;
' If any man ask who lies in this tomb,
' Oh! Oh! quoth the Devil, 'tis my John a Combe.'

The

He lived in a very handsome house of his own purchasing, to which he gave the name of New Place; and he had the good fortune to save it from the flames, in the dreadful fire that consumed the greatest part of the town, in 1614 [W]. It is very probable, he did not much exercise his talent in poetry, after his retirement [X]. In the beginning of the year 1616 he made his Will [Y], wherein he testified his respect to his quondam partners in

The sharpness of the satire is said to have stung the old gentleman so severely, that he never forgave it. One of this name is mentioned by Dryden to have died in 1614, for whom, at the choir of the guild of the Holy Cross at Stratford, a fair monument is erected, having a statue thereon cut in alabaster, and in a gown, with this epitaph: 'Here lieth interred the body of John Combe, Esq; who died the 10th of July, 1614; who bequeathed several annual charities to the parish of Stratford, and 100 l. to be lent to 15 poor tradesmen, from three years to three years, changing the parties every third year, at the rate of fifty shillings per annum, the increase to be distributed to the alms-poor there (41).' As this is a very well judged charity, it should seem to argue, that Shakespeare indulged too great a severity against this gentleman, unless it be supposed, that his verses gave occasion to the charity; which is not impossible. It seems to have made no breach in his esteem or friendship for that family, since, in his Will, Shakespeare bequeaths his sword to Mr Thomas Combe (42).

[W] He saved his house in the fire, which happened in 1614.] Mr Theobald (43), upon the information of Mr Bishop, tells us, that this house was first built by Sir Hugh Clopton, a younger brother of an ancient family in that neighbourhood, who took their name from the manor of Clopton. Sir Hugh Clopton was Sheriff of London in the reign of Richard the Third, and Lord Mayor in the reign of Henry the Seventh. That the estate had now been fold out of the family for above a century, at the time when Shakespeare became the purchaser; who having repaired and modelled it to his own mind, changed it's former name of Great-House into that of New-Place, which the mansion, since erected upon the same spot, still retains. The house and lands which attended it, continued in Shakespeare's descendants to the time of the Restoration, when they were repurchased by the Clopton family; and the mansion now belongs to Sir Hugh Clopton, Knt. who informed Mr Theobald, that during the civil wars, King Charles the First's Queen, being driven by the necessity of affairs to make a retirement in Warwickshire, she kept her Court for three weeks in New-Place. Whence we may reasonably suppose it to be then the best private house in the town, and her Majesty preferred it to the college, which was in the possession of the Combe family, who did not so strongly favour the King's party.

[X] Whether he employed his poetical talents after his retirement is uncertain.] The author of an answer to Mr Pope's preface to Shakespeare (44), tells us, that two large chests, filled with Shakespeare's loose papers and manuscripts, were in the hands of an ignorant Baker of Warwick, who married one of our Poet's descendants; and that, to the particular knowledge of the late Sir William Bishop, they were carelessly scattered and thrown about, as garret-lumber and litter, till they were all consumed in the general fire and destruction of that town. But this authority is rejected by Mr Theobald (45); who observing, that as Shakespeare's wife survived him seven years, and his favourite daughter Susannah survived her twenty-six years, it is very improbable, that they should suffer such a treasure to be removed and translated into a remoter branch of the family, without a scrutiny first made into the value of it. To this it may be added, that this daughter was his executor, and residuary legatee, which would still prompt and dispose her the more, in point of interest, to search and examine his papers. But, indeed, it must be owned, that the strolling player's account is very consistent with such a prior search; for he expressly declares, the papers were thrown about as garret-litter, of no value.

[Y] In the beginning of 1616 he made his Will.] The following is a copy of it from the register in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury:

Vicesimo quinto die Martii anno regni Domini nostri Jacobi nunc Regis Angliæ, &c. decimo quarto, & Scotiæ quadragesimo nono, anno Domini 1616.

In the name of God, Amen. I William Shakespeare of Stratford upon Avon in the county of Warwick, Gent. in perfect health and memory, God be praised, do make and ordain this my last Will and Testament in manner and form following; that is to say:

First, I commend my soul into the hands of God my creator, hoping, and assuredly believing, through the only merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting; and my body to the earth whereof that is made.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my daughter Judith one hundred and fifty pounds of lawful English money, to be paid unto her in manner and form following; that is to say, one hundred pounds in discharge of her marriage portion within one year after my decease, with considerations after the rate of two shillings in the pound for so long time as the same shall be unpaid unto her after my decease; and the fifty pounds residue thereof, upon her surrendering of, or giving of such sufficient security as the overseers of this my Will shall like of, to surrender or grant all her estate and right that shall descend or come unto her after my decease, or that she now hath of, in, or to, one copyhold tenement, with the appurtenances lying and being in Stratford upon Avon aforesaid, in the said county of Warwick, being parcel or holden of the manor of Rowington, unto my daughter Susannah Hall, and her heirs for ever.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my said daughter Judith one hundred and fifty pounds more, if she, or any issue of her body, be living at the end of three years next ensuing the day of the date of this my Will, during which time my executors to pay her consideration from my decease according to the rate aforesaid: and if she die within the said term without issue of her body, then my will is, and I do give and bequeath one hundred pounds thereof to my niece Elizabeth Hall, and the fifty pounds to be set forth by my executors during the life of my sister Joan Hart, and the use and profit thereof coming, shall be paid to my said sister Joan, and after her decease the fifty pounds shall remain amongst the children of my said sister, equally to be divided amongst them; but if my said daughter Judith be living at the end of the said three years, or any issue of her body, then my will is, and so I devise and bequeath the said hundred and fifty pounds to be set out by my executors and overseers for the best benefit of her and her issue, and the stock not to be paid unto her so long as she shall be married and covert baron; but my will is, that she shall have the consideration yearly paid unto her during her life, and after her decease the said stock and consideration to be paid to her children, if she have any, and if not, to her executors and assigns, she living the said term after my decease; provided that if such husband as she shall at the end of the said three years be married unto, or at and after, do sufficiently assure unto her, and the issue of her body, land answerable to the portion by this my Will given unto her, and to be adjudged so by my executors and overseers, then my will is, that the said hundred and fifty pounds shall be paid to such husband as shall make such assurance, to his own use.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my said sister Joan twenty pounds, and all my wearing apparel, to be paid and delivered within one year after my decease; and I do will and devise unto her the house with the appurtenances in Stratford, wherein she dwelleth, for her natural life, under the yearly rent of twelve pence.

Item, I give and bequeath unto her three sons, William Hart, — Hart, and Michael Hart, five pounds apiece, to be paid within one year after my decease.

Item, I give and bequeath unto the said Elizabeth Hall all my plate that I now have, except my broad silver and gilt boxes, at the date of this my Will.

Item, I give and bequeath unto the poor of Stratford aforesaid ten pounds, to Mr Thomas Combe my sword, to Thomas Russell, Esq; five pounds, and to Francis Collins of the borough of Warwick, in the county of Warwick, Gent. thirteen pounds six shillings and (41) Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire.

(42) See his Will in remark [Y].

(43) Ubi supra.

(44) By a strolling player, p. 45, 46. edit. 1729, 8vo.

(45) Ubi supra.

in the theatre; he appointed his youngest daughter, jointly with her husband, his executors, and bequeathed to them the best part of his estate, which they came into the possession of not long after. He died on the 23d of April following, being the fifty-third year of his age, and was interred among his ancestors, on the north side of the chancel, in the great church of Stratford, where there is a handsome monument erected for him, inscribed with a single elegiac distich in Latin [Z]. In the year 1740, another very noble and most beautiful one was raised to his memory, at the publick expence, in Westminster-abbey; an ample contribution for this purpose being made, upon exhibiting his tragedy of Julius Cæsar, at the theatre-royal in Drury-Lane, April the 28th, 1738 [AA].

Seven

and eight pence, to be paid within one year after my decease.

Item, I give and bequeath to Hamlett Sadler twenty-six shillings, eight pence, to buy him a ring; to William Reynolds, Gent. twenty-six shillings, eight pence, to buy him a ring; to my godson William Walker twenty shillings in gold; to Anthony Nash, Gent. twenty-six shillings, eight pence; and to Mr John Nash, twenty-six shillings, eight pence; and to my fellows, John Hemyng, Richard Burbage, and Henry Cundell, twenty six shillings, eight pence apiece, to buy them rings

Item, I give, will, bequeath, and devise, unto my daughter Susannah Hall, for the better enabling of her to perform this my Will, and towards the performance thereof, all that capital messuage or tenement, with the appurtenances in Stratford aforesaid, called the New Place, wherein I now dwell, and two messuages or tenements, with the appurtenances, situate, lying, and being, in Henley street within the borough of Stratford aforesaid; and all my barns, stables, orchards, gardens, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whatsoever, situate, lying, and being, or to be had, reserved, preserved, or taken, within the towns, hamlets, villages, fields, and grounds, of Stratford upon Avon, Old Stratford, Bushaxton, and Welcombe, or in any of them, in the said county of Warwick; and also all that messuage or tenement, with the appurtenances, wherein one John Robinson dwelleth, situate, lying, and being, in the Black Friars in London, near the Wardrobe; and all other my lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever; to have and to hold all and singular the said premises, with their appurtenances, unto the said Susanna Hall, for and during the term of her natural life; and after her decease to the first son of her body lawfully issuing, and to the heirs males of the body of the said first son lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue, to the second son of her body lawfully issuing, and to the heirs males of the body of the said second son lawfully issuing; and for default of such heirs, to the third son of the body of the said Susanna lawfully issuing, and of the heirs males of the body of the said third son lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue, the same to be and remain to the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sons of her body, lawfully issuing one after another, and to the heirs males of the bodies of the said fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sons lawfully issuing, in such manner as it is before limited to be and remain to the first, second, and third sons of her body, and to their heirs males; and for default of such issue, the said premises to be and remain to my said niece Hall, and the heirs males of her body lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue, to my daughter Judith, and the heirs males of her body lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue, to the right heirs of me the said William Shakespeare for ever.

Item, I give unto my wife my brown best bed, with the furniture.

Item, I give and bequeath to my said daughter Judith, my broad silver gilt bole. All the rest of my goods, chattels, leases, plate, jewels, and household-stuff, whatsoever, after my debts and legacies paid, and my funeral expences discharged, I give, devise, and bequeath, to my son in-law John Hall, Gent. and my daughter Susanna his wife, who I ordain and make executors of this my last Will and Testament. And I do intreat and appoint the said Thomas Russell, Esq; and Francis Collins, Gent. to be overseers hereof. And do revoke all former Wills, and publish this to be my last Will and Testament. In witness whereof I have hereunto put my hand, the day and year first above written, by me

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

VOL. VI. No. CCCIV.

Witness to the publishing hereof,

Fra. Collins,
Julius Shaw,
John Robinson,
Hamlet Sadler,
Robert Whatcott.

Probatum coram Magistro William Byrde, Legum Doctoro Commissario, &c. vicesimo secundo die mensis Junii, anno Domini 1616. Juramento Johannis Hall unius ex et cui, &c. de bene et jurat reservata potestate et Susannæ Hall alt. ex. &c. cu vendit, &c. petitur.

[Z] His monument and inscription] He is represented under an arch in a sitting posture, a cushion spread before him, with a pen in his right hand, and his left resting on a scrole of papers; under the cushion is this Latin distich:

Judicio Pylium, genio Socratem, arte Maronem,
Terra tegit, populus mæret, Olympus habet.

On the grave-stone, in the pavement, underneath, are these lines:

Good friend, for Jesus' sake, forbear
To dig the dust inclosed here.
Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.

[AA] Contributions at the ading of Julius Cæsar.] The trustees for the public on this occasion, were the Earl of Burlington, Dr Richard Mead, M. D. Mr Pope, and Charles Fleetwood, Esq; patentee of the playhouse; the monument was finished in 1740, and stands near the south door of the abbey, in what is called Poets-Corner. Shakespeare is represented, in the dress of his time, in white marble, at full length, leaning a little on his right arm, which is supported by a pedestal; at the bottom of this there hangs a scrole, inscribed with the following words, from his play called The Tempest, to which his left hand appears pointing:

The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inhabit shall dissolve,
And, like the baseless fabrick of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind.

Above his head behind there is fixt a plate of very curious granate marble, on which is the following inscription, in raised letters of brass, richly gilt.

Gulielmo Shakespeare, anno post mortem cxxiv.
amor publicus posuit.

The inscription was composed by Mr Pope. The whole monument was designed by Kent, and executed by Rysbrack, admirably well. A new prologue and epilogue were spoken on the occasion, which are as follows:

The prologue written by Benjamin Martyn, Esq;

Whilst in the venerable dome we view,
The sculptor's art, Britannia's bards renew;
Behold, their names, on speaking marble, live,
Their forms in animated stone revive.

40 N

Shakespeare,

Seven years after his death, his plays were collected and published in 1623, in folio [BB], by two of his principal friends in the company of comedians, Heninge and Condale; who likewise corrected a second edition in folio, in 1632. Though both these editions were extremely faulty, yet no other was attempted 'till 1714, when a third edition was published in 8vo. by Mr Nicholas Rowe [CC], but with few if any corrections; only he prefixed some account of our author's life and writings, the materials of the first of which were communicated to him by Mr Betterton, the celebrated Comedian, who made a journey to Stratford, purposely to learn something further concerning a man, to whom both he

Shakespeare obscurely lies, his laurel'd bust
Neglected, moulders, like his bones, to dust.
No single hand durst claim to rear this stone,
And fix in Shakespeare's monument his own.
To you 'twas left to dignify the bard,
And grace your Shakespeare with his late reward;
Shakespeare! the Father of the British stage,
Shakespeare, the wonder of each rising age.
Whose glowing fancy and whose various art,
With every passion governs every heart.
Whose genius opens nature to our view,
Whose charms, tho' still repeated, still are new.
Tho' Shakespeare wants no stone to speak his praise,
Your gratitude's the monument you raise.
Think, when you fix a basis for his name,
You fix one likewise for your country's fame.
Rome, by her statues, rais'd the Roman blood,
And form'd new heroes by the old she shew'd.
Let then this chief of our dramatic band,
As first in rank, the first in honours stand.
Let every breast, that feels his sacred fire,
Glow with the virtues which his lines inspire.
While Brutus bleeds for liberty and Rome,
Let Britons crowd to deck his Poet's tomb.
To future times, recorded, let it stand,
This head was laurel'd by the public hand.
To future times, with pride, transmit it down,
Such public merit should the public own.

The epilogue written by The Honourable James Noel, Esq; and spoken by Mrs Porter.

These smiles bestow'd, these generous honours paid,
To a dead bard, to long lost Shakespeare's shade;
To public worth such public favours shewn,
Confirm this merit and proclaim your own.
Ev'n here a noble monument you raise;
The tomb of glory is a people's praise.
Perhaps, some will.—Perhaps, no none will say,
No dance, no song, to decorate the play.
No; Shakespeare scorns such common arts to use,
Sense gave it birth, let sense preserve the muse.
If comic scenes divert, or tragic move,
With both delighted, you by both improve;
Fir'd by the muse, you raise each passion higher,
And pant to reach the virtues you admire.
When Portia weeps, all gentle breasts must mourn,
When Brutus arms, all generous bosoms burn.
When Rome's firm patriots on the stage were shewn,
With pride we trace the patriots of our own.
From bondage sav'd, when that bold state we see,
We glow to think, that Britain is as free.
We mount, by bright example, glory's throne,
And make the cause of virtue all our own.
Such was the bard, first grac'd the British stage,
First charm'd and still shall charm thro' every age.
Whose verse is music, not at wit's expence,
But joins the charms of harmony with sense.

He wakes the passions, governs and inspires;
Charms while he pleases, while he teaches fires.
But here what humble thanks, what praise is due,
Ow'd to such generous virtue, ow'd to you.
With grief, you saw a bard neglected lie,
Whom tow'ring genius living rais'd so high;
With grief you saw your Shakespeare's slighted state,
And call'd forth merit from the grave of fate.
Let others boast, they smile on living worth,
You give a buried bard a brighter birth.

[BB] The first edition of his plays] In the preface to this edition it is declared, that Shakespeare never blotted out a line in all his writings; and Ben Jonson tells us, he had often heard the players mention this as an honour to Shakespeare's memory; my answer, says Ben, was, I would he had blotted out a thousand, which they thought a malevolent speech; I had not told posterity this but for their ignorance, who chose that circumstance to commend their friend by, wherein he most failed; and to justify mine own candour (for I loved the man and do honour his memory, on this side idolatry, as much as any). He was indeed honest and of an open and free nature; had an excellent phantasia, brave notions, and gentle expressions; wherein he flowed with that facility, that sometimes it was necessary he should be stopped: Sufflamandus erat, as Augustus said of Haterius. His wit was in his own power; would the rule of it had been so too. Many times he fell into those things and could not escape laughter, as when he said in the person of Cæsar, one speaking to him: 'Cæsar thou dost me wrong;' he replied, 'Cæsar did never wrong, but with just cause;' and such like, which were ridiculous. But he redeemed his vices with his virtues. There was ever more to be praised than to be pardoned (46). Mr Pope observes, that there is indeed in that play something like this expression, but not in these words (47). Mr Whalley takes notice also, that this passage is not to be found in that play, and to excuse Jonson, says, 'tis probable, that he quoted here by memory a line, which some foolish player might possibly pronounce upon the stage, in a manner not unlike what is here represented (48). In either case, it cannot be denied, that the censure has more in it to be pardoned than praised. In short, the whole paragraph may justly be turned upon the writer (49). It is one instance, among numberless others, of his promptness to find fault, Sufflamandus erat. The whole remark is grounded in a mistake. Mr Pope informs us, 'that however it has prevailed, yet in reality, there never was a more groundless report, than this of Shakespeare's never correcting his first writings, or to the contrary of which there are more undeniable evidences. As the comedy of The Merry Wives of Windsor, which he entirely new writ; The History of Henry the Sixth, which was first published under the title of The Contention of York and Lancaster; and that of Henry the Fifth extremely improved; that of Hamlet enlarged to almost as much again as at first, and many others.' After all, the players, who could not be ignorant of these alterations, seem to mean, in what they told Jonson, no more than that Shakespeare's first writing was without a blot, and so given by him to be acted. And how this may justly enough be reckoned as a proof of his genius and inspiration.

[CC] Edition by Mr Rowe] Dr Warburton (50), the present Bishop of Gloucester, observes, that though Mr Rowe was a wit, yet he was so utterly unacquainted with the whole business of criticism, that he did not examine or consult the first editions of the work he undertook to publish.

(46) Jonson's Discoveries, p. 91, 92. Vol. VII. edit. 1756.

(47) In the preface to his edition of Shakespeare.

(48) Note (3) to p. 91. of the VIIth volume of his edition in 1756.

(49) Where last cited.

(50) In the preface to his edition of Shakespeare's plays.

he and all the world were so much indebted. But the plays being in the same mangled condition as at first, Mr Pope was prevailed upon to undertake the task of clearing away the rubbish, and reducing them into a better order; and accordingly he printed a new edition of them in 1721, in 4to. Yet neither did this give satisfaction, and the performance only discovered the editor to be a better poet, than he was a critic; at least of Shakespeare's genius. Hereupon Mr Theobald, after many years spent in the same task, published a piece, called Shakespeare restored, in 1726, 8vo. which was followed by another new edition of his plays in 1733, by the same author, who therein carried the design of his first piece much farther. In 1744, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. published at Oxford a pompous edition, with emendations, in six volumes, 4to. To these Mr Warburton, now Lord Bishop of Gloucester, added still another new edition, with a great number of corrections, in 1747. And Mr Theobald published his edition a second time, with several alterations, in 1757 [DD]. There has appeared very lately this year, 1760, an historical play, intituled, The Raigne of Edward the Third, &c. (e), which is ascribed to Shakespeare, upon these three concurring circumstances, the date, the stile, and the plan, which is taken, as several of Shakespeares are, from Holingshead, and a book of novels, called The Palace of Pleasure (f). Thus new monuments are continually rising to honour Shakespeare's genius in the learned world; and we must not conclude, without adding another testimony of the veneration paid to his manes by the publick in general; which is, that a mulberry-tree, planted upon his estate by the hands of this revered bard, was cut down not many years ago, and the wood being converted into several domestic uses, these were all eagerly bought at a high price, and each single one treasured up by it's purchaser as a precious memorial of Shakespeare's memory (g).

(e) Viz. As it hath bin fundrie times playd about the Citie of London. London printed for Cuthbert Burby, 1595, 4to. and again in 1599, 4to.

(f) Prolusions, or select pieces of ancient poetry, &c. Lond. 1760, 8vo.

(g) A tea chest of this wood, with the mulberries carved upon it, is now in the possession of Joseph Smith, Esq; Dr of Laws, of Kidlington near Oxford.

[DD] Published an edition in 1757.] Mr Pope, who first entered upon the task of criticism, declares, that of all our English Poets, Shakespeare must be confessed to be the fairest and fittest subject for criticism. The first editions being printed from the prompter's books, or the piece-meal parts written out for the players, and very much disfigured by their blunders and interlineations. Accordingly, after his example, Mr Theobald proceeded in this work, but with so little success, that Mr Pope declared he could find very few, which ought to be retained. On the other hand, Mr Theobald has shewn the greatest part of Pope's corrections not only to be groundless but against the mind of the Poet, and therefore justly rejected. Dr Warburton has rejected a great number of Mr Theobald's, and Mr Edwards (51) has shewn, that a great number of Dr Warburton's deserve the same fate. Sir Thomas Hammer had made very few of his own worth notice, according to Mr Johnson, who, in 1745, published Miscellaneous Observations on the Tragedy of Macbeth: with Remarks on Sir T. H.'s edition of Shakespeare. To which was affixed, Proposals for a new Edition of Shakespeare's Plays, with a Specimen. But this design has not yet been executed; so that the last edition, in ten small volumes, by Mr Theobald, in 1757, is generally esteemed the best we have. P

(51) In his Canons of Criticism.

SHARP [JAMES], Archbishop of St Andrews, in the last century; whose tragical death is a sorrowful instance of what a furious and misguided zeal is capable of doing. He was the son of Mr William Sharp, Sheriff Clerk of Banffshire [A], and Isabel Lesley, daughter to the Laird of Kinninvy, a woman of great prudence and piety (a). The time of his birth was in May 1618. From the first, he appeared a child of very good parts; and being early sent to school, out-did all his companions in the rudiments of learning. His masterly genius, quick apprehension, and tenacious memory, were early signs of his future greatness; and induced his father to design him for the Ministry. For that purpose, he sent him to the university of Aberdeen, where he arrived to great perfection in the Philosophy then in vogue. Having past his courses in the college with great applause, and being made Master of Arts, he applied himself to the study of Divinity; in which he used the advice and direction of Dr Forbes, and Dr Baron. These two learned men, with the other Doctors of Aberdeen, zealously appearing against the Scottish Covenant, made in 1628, became exposed to many insults and abuses; as well as their friends and acquaintance, amongst whom was Mr Sharp. Whereupon, he retired into England, and contracted an acquaintance with Dr Sanderfon, Dr Hammond, Dr Taylor, and others of our most eminent Divines; and was in a likely way of obtaining preferment here. But the civil wars coming on, and he being taken very ill, determined, both by advice and inclination, to return to his native country. By the way, happening into company with Sir James McGill of Cranston, afterwards Viscount of Oxenford, that generous person liking his conversation, carried him to his own house in the country. During his stay there,

(a) A true and impartial Account of the Life of the Most Reverend Father in God, Dr James Sharp, Arch-Bishop of St Andrews, &c. Printed in 1723, 8vo. p. 25, 26.

[A] He was the son of Mr William Sharp, &c.] Our Prelate's great-grand father was a Gentleman of Perthshire, who had a large family. One of his sons, named David, and grandfather to the Archbishop, went and settled in the town of Aberdeen, where he became a considerable merchant, and by his industry and frugality acquired a handsome fortune. By his wife Magdalen Halburton, nearly descended from the Laird of Peter, an honorable family in the shire of Angus, he had his son—William, the Archbishop's father: who being educated at the schools and university of Aberdeen, was, for his extraordinary natural parts and proficiency, taken notice of by the Marquis of Huntly, and other persons of quality in that country: But especially James Ogilvy, Earl of Finlater, conceived such great opinion of him, that he took him to his house, and committed to him the management of all his affairs. This Earl had married Elizabeth daughter of Andrew Lesley, Earl of Rothes, who took such a particular liking to Mr William Sharp, that she made up a match between him and Isabel Lesley above mentioned. Not long after, Mr Sharp was made Sheriff Clerk of Banffshire, and lived and dyed in the Castle of Banff, in great esteem and reputation with all that knew him. His wife Isabel was an extraordinary woman, honoured by all for her wisdom and piety, and dyed of a great age after King Charles the Second's Restoration (1).

(1) Life, &c. as above, p. 25, 26.

[B] Which

there, he became known to several of the nobility and gentry, particularly to John Lesley, Earl of Rothes; who patronized him, not only out of respect to his ingenuity, but also at the recommendation of some gentlemen of the name of Lesley, of the Earl's family, and Mr Sharp's relations. By that Lord's interest, and on account of his own merit, he was chosen one of the Professors of Philosophy in St Leonard's college in St Andrews, which was his first preferment (b). His abilities having raised his reputation, and introduced him into the familiarity of many great men, particularly of John Lindsay, Earl of Crawford and Lindsay; by that Lord's means, he quitted his Professorship, and was appointed Minister in the town of Carail. Here, as we are told, he in a singular manner exemplified the evangelical precept, as to the wisdom of the serpent, and the innocency of the dove: and here his labours were most acceptable, and gained on the hearts of the people by calmness, condescension, and affability; only some of the more rigid sort professed, They did not believe him sound (c). And indeed he was not so, according to their notions; for, he had the courage to correspond with King Charles II. in his exile, and spared no pains to keep life in the fainting spirit of Loyalty among many of his brethren (d). In the mean time, great disputes having arisen among the Covenanting Presbyterians in Scotland, which occasioned their splitting into two parties, called Publick Resolutioners, and Protestors or Remonstrators [B]; Mr Sharp joined the former, thinking them persons of the greatest moderation, religion, loyalty, and sincerity. And all the endeavours of the Privy-Council established in that country, not being sufficient to keep them from breaking out into violent flames; in consequence of which, they both carried their complaints to Oliver Cromwell, then Lord Protector; Mr Sharp was unanimously chosen by the Resolutioners as their agent, whom they knew to be an active man, of a strong head, quick wit, and equal temper. The Remonstrators, on their side, sent up Mr Guthry, Preacher at Stirling, a furious zealot. The Protector having appointed a time for hearing the two Agents, Mr Guthry spoke first, and so long, that when he had ended, the Protector told Mr Sharp, he would hear him another time, for his hour for other business was approaching. But Mr Sharp begged to be heard, promising to be short: and being permitted to speak, he in a few words turned Mr Guthry's arguments against himself, and his cause; and gave such a rational representation of his constituents and their party, that Oliver was not only satisfied they had justice on their side, but also so much taken with Mr Sharp's genteel management and address, that he told the by-standers, 'That Gentleman, after the Scotch way, ought to, be styled Sharp of that
' ilk

(b) Life, p. 26
—30.

(c) Life, p. 31,
32.

(d) Life, p. 33.

[B] Which occasioned their splitting into two parties, called Publick Resolutioners, and Protestors or Remonstrators.] Bishop Burnet gives the following account of the heats raised in the Kirk by the Publick Resolutions formed there, and the Protestation made against them (2). 'A general Assembly was in course to meet; and sat at St Andrews. So the commission of the Kirk wrote a circular letter to all the Presbyteries, setting forth all the grounds of their resolutions, and complaining of those who had protested against them; upon which they desired that they would chuse none of those who adhered to the protestation, to represent them in the next assembly. This was only an advice, and had been frequently practised in the former years: But now it was highly complained of, as a limitation on the freedom of elections, which inferred a nullity on all their proceedings: So the Protestors renewed their Protestation against the meeting upon a higher point, disowning that authority which hitherto they had magnified as the highest tribunal in the Church, in which they thought Christ was in his throne. Upon this a great debate followed, and many books were written in a course of several years. The Publickmen said, this was the destroying of Presbytery, if the lesser number did not submit to the greater: It was a sort of Prelacy, if it was pretended that votes ought rather to be weighed than counted: Parity was the essence of their constitution: And in this all people saw they had clearly the better of the argument. The Protestors urged for themselves, that, since all Protestants rejected the pretence of infallibility, the major part of the Church might fall into errors, in which case the lesser number could not be bound to submit to them: They complained of the many corrupt Clergymen who were yet among them, who were leavened with the old leaven, and did on all occasions shew what was still at heart notwithstanding all their outward compliance.'——

'As this debate grew hot, and they were ready to break out into censures on both sides, some were sent down from the Commonwealth of England to settle Scotland: Of these Sir Henry Vane was one. He advised, That, instead of Healing the Wound they had given themselves; which weakned both parties, and kept them from uniting in an opposition against the Government; they should leave them to worry one another, and fight their own quarrels: which would keep them in a greater dependence on the temporal authority, when both sides were forced to make their appeal to it. 'This advice was followed; and the division went on. Both sides studied, when any Church became vacant to get a man of their own party to be chosen to succeed in the election: And upon these occasions many tumults happened: In some of them stones were thrown, and many were wounded, to the great scandal of religion.——At last they proceeded to deprive men of both sides, as they were the majority in the judicatories: But because the possession of the Church, and the benefice, was to depend on the orders of the temporal courts, both sides made their application to the Privy-Council, that Cromwell had set up in Scotland: And they were by them referred to Cromwell himself. So they sent deputies up to London. The Protestors went in great numbers: They came nearer both to the principles, and to the temper that prevailed in the army: So they were looked on as the better men, on whom, by reason of the first rise of the difference, the government might more certainly depend: Whereas the others were considered as more in the King's interests. The Resolutioners, upon this occasion, sent up Mr Sharp, as is more particularly related in the Text above.——Bishop Burnet observes, that all the methods imaginable were used by the Protestors to raise their credit among the people. They preached often, and very long; and seemed to carry their devotions to a greater sublimity than others did.——They gave the sacrament with a new and unusual solemnity. On the Wednesday before, they held a fast day with prayers and sermons for about eight or ten hours together: On the Saturday they had two or three preparation sermons: And on the Lord's day they had so very many, that the action continued above twelve hours in some places: And all ended with three or four sermons on Monday for Thanksgiving —— The Resolutioners tried to imitate them in these practices: But they were not thought so spiritual, nor so ready at them; So the others had the chief following'

[C] Ar

(2) Hist. of his own Time, as above, Vol. I. p. 83—88.

‘ilk (e).’ What induced Cromwell more particularly to favour him, was, his having an acquaintance and interest with the Presbyterian Ministers at London, whom he [the Protector] was then courting much, by reason of their credit in the city (f). And they greatly approved of Mr Sharp’s character and conduct, as appears by the letter inserted below [C]. Having succeeded in this important affair, he returned to Scotland to the exercise of his function; and always kept a good understanding with the chief of the opposite party of the Protestors, that were the most eminent for worth and learning (g). During his residence in London, having made himself known to all sorts of people (b); his reputation and general esteem gave him access to, and acquaintance with, General Monk, who looked upon him as a man of probity and reach, and always after treated him with singular familiarity (i). Upon his advancing towards London, the General sent him a letter from York, in Jan. 1659-60, wherein he desired him to undertake a winter journey, and come to him at London with all speed. Mean while, the chief of the Kirk had writ to the General, signifying their entire confidence in him as to the affairs of Scotland, and the necessity of one from them to be near his person, to put him in mind of what was necessary, and acquaint them with the state of things; asking at the same time a pass for Mr James Sharp: which the General immediately sent, declaring, the sooner he came to him, the more welcome he should be (k). The instructions sent him, February 6, from the Presbyterian ministers at Edinburgh, were, to use his utmost endeavours, that the Kirk of Scotland might, without interruption or encroachment, enjoy the freedom and privileges of her established Judicatures, ratified by the laws of the land: and, whereas by the late established Toleration, a door was opened to many gross errors and loose practices in their Church; he should therefore use all lawful and prudent means to represent the sinfulness and offensiveness thereof, that it might be timously remedied (l). By the twenty-first of February, he seemed to be weary of his station, and desired to be recalled (m): complaining, he was so much engaged in business, that he was deprived of his rest. For, people observing the great countenance given him by the Lord General, pressed him so, that he was forced to abandon his chamber all the day, and much of the night (n). However he continued at London, and seemed then to be more than ordinary zealous for Presbytery (o): endeavouring, as he said, to guard against Sectaries upon the one hand, and Cavaliers upon the other. And expressing his fear that the King would come in, and that with him moderate Episcopacy at least would take place (p). The 17th of March he desired to be recalled home; but expressed his dislike at being appointed Minister of Edinburgh, a favour intended him (q). In the beginning of April, the Earl of Lauderdale and he had a meeting with ten of the chief Presbyterian Ministers in London; who all agreed upon the necessity of bringing in the King upon Covenant-terms (r) [D]. In May, at the earnest desire of General Monk, and of the leading Presbyterians in Scotland, Mr Sharp went over to King Charles at Breda, to acquaint him with their behaviour; and to desire his Majesty to write a letter to some of them [E], to shew his resolution to own them,

(e) Life, p. 34.

(f) Bishop Burnet’s Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1733, 8vo. Vol. 1. p. 88.

(g) Life, p. 36.

(b) Burnet, as above.

(i) Life, p. 36.

(k) Woodrow’s Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. Intro. p. 6.

(l) Idem, Vol. I. Append. No. 2.

(m) Idem, Vol. I. Intro. p. 7.

(n) Ibid. p. 9.

(o) Burnet, as above, p. 83.

(p) Woodrow, as above, p. 9, 10.

(q) Ibid. p. 13, 14.

(r) Ibid. p. 15, 17.

(3) Life, &c. p. 35.

[C] As appears by the letter] It was dated at London December 1657, and expressed in these words: ‘Our Reverend Brother Mr Sharp hath with much prudence, courage, and laboriousness, unweariedly attended, and managed the Trust committed to him; yea (as we believe) he hath secured your cause from sundry aspersions, which otherwise might probably have reproached it, and he hath gained respect in the opinions of some in highest place by his wisdom and meekness, in vindicating it from misrepresentations. And although the great concernment (which he hath faithfully and zealously minded) be not brought to so good a conclusion as was desired and prayed for, yet we see cause to bless God for that which is done, hoping that through your prudent improvement thereof, it will tend to future advantage.’ Subscribed by Mr Calamy and Mr Ashe: and directed to Mr Douglas, Mr Dickson, &c. (3).

[D] In the beginning of April, the Earl of Lauderdale, and he, had a meeting with ten of the chief Presbyterian Ministers, &c.] Mr Sharp, immediately after that meeting, namely on the fifth of April, wrote a letter to Mr Robert Douglas, Minister in Edinburgh; wherein, after mentioning that meeting, he goes on thus:—‘There are endeavours for an accommodation between the moderate Episcopalian party and the Presbyterians. But at our meeting, Lauderdale and I obtained of those Ministers, that they should not give a meeting to the Episcopal men, till they first met among themselves, and resolved on the terms they would stick to.—The King is acquainted with all proceedings here, and wants not information of the carriage and affections of Scotland. The Parliament will address him, some say in hard, others upon honorable terms. I see not full ground of hope, that Covenant-terms will be rigidly stuck to’—In another letter of

VOL. VI. No 304.

April 7, he says thus:—‘The Lord having opened a fair door of hope, we may look for a settlement upon the grounds of the Covenant, and thereby a foundation laid for security against the prelatical and fanatick assaults. But I am dubious if this should be the result of the agitations now on foot.—We intend to publish some letters from the French Protestant Ministers, vindicating the King from Popery, and giving him a large character. The sectaries will not be able to do any thing to prevent the King’s coming in. Our honest Presbyterian Brethren are cordially for him. I have been dealing with some of them to send some testimony of their affection for him, and yesterday five of them promised to send a thousand pieces of gold to him. The Episcopal party are making applications to the Presbyterians for an accommodation, but the Presbyterians resolve to stick to their principles.’—And in a letter of April 12, he hath this passage:—‘To morrow I have promised to meet with Dr Morley who came from the King: The King is at Breda: The Parliament will at its first sitting (as ’tis expected) call him in. Some say, the Sectarian party have made application to him to bring him in without terms.’—Also, in another letter of his, he thus expresses himself:—‘I fear the interest of the Solemn League and Covenant shall be neglected; and I smell that moderate Episcopacy is the fairest Accommodation which moderate Men who wish well to Religion expect (4).’ So he began to open his mind upon the point of Episcopacy.

[E] And to desire his Majesty to write a letter, &c.] This we learn from one of Mr Sharp’s to Mr Douglas, dated May 1 P. S. ‘General Monk has been these ten days pressing me to go over to the King, to deal that he may write a letter to Mr Calamy, to be communicated to the Presbyterian Ministers, shewing his

(4) Woodrow, as above, p. 17, 18.

them, who called themselves the godly sober party. He carried with him a long letter to the King, and another to his Prime Minister (s): Bishop Burnet tells us, that one of those letters was from the Earl of Glencairn to Hyde, recommending Mr Sharp as the only person capable to manage the design of setting up Episcopacy in Scotland; upon which he was received into great confidence (t). Instructions were also sent him from the Kirk [F], with some particulars which he was desired to propound to the King at fit opportunities (u). General Monk having ordered a frigate to carry him over to Holland, he arrived at Breda May the 8th, and was led to the Court by Alexander Bruce, where the Marquis of Ormond introduced him to the King, to whom he delivered his letters. The next morning, he staid an hour and a half with the King alone in his bed-chamber; and in the evening his Majesty took him to walk in the garden near an hour (w). He returned to London May the 26th, and the same day wrote to Mr Douglas, acquainting him, that he 'found the sober Presbyterian Party had no reserve but in his Majesty's Clemency, of which they had no cause to doubt. That he found the King very affectionate to Scotland, and resolved not to wrong the settled Government of their Church. But he apprehended, they were mistaken who went about to settle the Presbyterian government (x).' And he directed his conduct accordingly. For when he, with some others of his brethren, saw nothing remaining (to use his own words) but Prayer and waiting on God.—When he saw, that 'no Good would follow from the proposed Accommodation between the Episcopal party and their adversaries; since those who professed the Presbyterian way resolved to admit moderate Episcopacy.'—When he found, 'from any observation he could make, that the Presbyterian cause was wholly given up and lost [G]: and that the Presbyterians were like to be ground betwixt two mill-stones, viz. the Papists and Presbyterians (y).'—In a word, when he plainly found, that King Charles's Ministry were resolved to crush the Covenanters, and to restore Episcopacy in Scotland, he thought it as well to fish in those troubled waters. However, he held out as long as he thought opposition would answer any purpose [H]. But his becoming soon after a zealous Member of the Church of England, and accepting of an Archbishoprick; made those rigid members of the Kyrk who had maintained him as their Agent, and were resolved never to conform; imagine, that he had been unfaithful to his Trust, and all along undermined and betrayed their cause [I]. This notion bred in those fullen and perverse men such a thorough

(s) Ibid. p. 20, 21. That is, to Edw. Hyde, Esq;

(t) Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. 8vo. p. 126.

(u) Woodrow, Appendix to Intro. p. 57.

(w) Idem, Intro. p. 21, 25.

(x) Ibid. p. 25.

(y) Ibid. p. 27, 40, 45.

(5) Woodrow, p. 20, 21.

(6) Ibid. p. 21.

(7) Woodrow, Intro. p. 39.

(8) Woodrow, ibid. p. 32.

(9) Ibid. p. 34.

(10) Ibid. p. 36.

'his resolution to own the godly sober Party, and to stand for the true Protestant Religion in the power of it, &c. (5).'

[F] Instructions were also sent him from the Kirk. But, notwithstanding them, he signified his intention to one of his constituents in the following words:—'For my part, I shall not be accessory to any thing prejudicial to the Presbyterian Government, but to appear for it in any other way than is within my sphere, is inconvenient, and may do harm, and not good (6).'

[G] When he found, from any observation he could make, that the Presbyterian cause was wholly given up and lost. In his letter of June 19, speaking of 'the Neglect of the Covenant; I see no effectual way (says he) to help this.—I see little the Presbyterians can, or intend to do for the promoting that interest (7).'

[H] However, he held out as long as he thought opposition would answer any purpose. So we learn from the following extracts of some of his letters.—In that of June 5, 1660.—'The Episcopalians, says he, drive so furiously, that all lovers of Religion are awakened to look about them, and to endeavour the stemming of that feared impetuosity of these men: All that is hoped, is to bring them to some Moderation and Closure with an Episcopacy of a new make. You may easily judge how little any endeavour of mine can signify to the preventing of this evil; and, therefore, how desirous I am to be taken off, and returned to my charge (8).'

In another of June 10, he speaks thus:—'Some leading Presbyterians tell me, they must resolve to close in with what they call moderate Episcopacy, or else open Profanity will upon the one hand overwhelm them, or Erastianism (which may be the design of some Statesmen) on the other. I am often thinking of coming away; for my stay here I see is to little purpose. I clearly see the General will not stand by the Presbyterians (9).'

For my part, says he, in one of June 12, whatever constructions may be put on my way here, I have a testimony that my endeavours have not been wanting for promoting the Presbyterian interest according to the Covenant. I cannot say they have been significant, &c. (10).'

And again, in another of June 15.—'I have a testimony that I have not been wanting to improve any opportunity I had during these transactions for the interest of our country and the Covenant. They will bear me up under the constructions my employment at such a juncture lays me open to. I trust when I return to make it appear, I have pursued the publick ends of Religion, as far as the condition of affairs would bear; and I have been byassed by no selfish ends.—I profess it still to be my opinion, that I know no considerable number, and no party in England, that will join with you for settling Presbyterian Government, and pursuing the ends of the Covenant.—The present posture of affairs looks like a ship foundered with the waves from all corners, so that 'tis not known what course will be steered. But discerning men see, that the gale is like to blow for the Prelatick party, and those who are sober will yield to a Liturgy and moderate Episcopacy, which they phrase to be effectual Presbytery, and by this salvo they think they guard against breach of the Covenant. I know this purpose is not pleasing to you, neither to me, &c. (11).'

Finally, in another letter of June 23, he gives all up.—'All is wrong here as to Church-affairs. Episcopacy will be settled here to the height, their lands will be all restored. None of the Presbyterian way here oppose this, or do any thing but mourn in secret. We know not the temper of people, to have any thing to do with them (12).'

[I] And all along undermined and betrayed their cause. His old friend and acquaintance Robert Douglas, in particular, charged him afterwards severely with Fraud and Prevarication; as appears by the following extract from his Account of the Introduction of Prelacy (13).—'I profess I did not suspect Mr Sharp in reference to Prelacy more than I did myself, no more than the Apostles did Judas before his Treachery was discovered: I did not suspect him for that, more than I did suspect him for taking the Tender, after he came out of the Tower so long before us. But since I find that he has been his Truckling; and when he went over to Holland he had a letter from a prime Nobleman to the King, signifying that he was Episcopal in his judgment. This was revealed to me after he was a Bishop. The first thing that gave me a dislike at him was, when he was in Holland he wrote

(11) Ibid. p. 38.

(12) Ibid. p. 40.

(13) See Woodrow's Intro. p. 24.

thorough Hatred and Prejudice, as nothing but Mr Sharp's blood could satisfy and appease. During his absence from Scotland, he was chosen Professor of Divinity in St Mary's-college in St Andrews (z). And, before he quitted London, King Charles, as a mark of his royal favour, made him his Chaplain for Scotland, with a pension of 200 pounds sterling per annum, which he enjoyed as long as he lived (a). About the middle of August 1660, he returned to Edinburgh, carrying with him a Letter from his Majesty, directed to Mr Robert Douglas, to be communicated to the Presbytery of that city [K]. He then delivered up to his constituents his commission, with a full answer to the same: and, after this, never had another commission from them, nor was employed by that party (b) [L]. On the first of January 1660 61, he was appointed one of the Commissioners to visit the college of Aberdeen (c). The same year, an act having passed, for rescinding all the Parliaments held in Scotland since 1633; the Earl of Glencairn Chancellor, and the Earl of Rothes President of the Council, were sent up to London, with a Letter dated April 24, to give the King an account of the proceedings and state of affairs of Scotland (d). Mr Sharp attended those Lords; and, in a Council held at Whitehall, was nominated Archbishop of St Andrews, with the approbation of all present except the Earl of Lauderdale (e) [M]. The last day of August, those two Noblemen and he came back to Scotland, bringing with them a letter from the King to the Privy-Council there; for restoring of that Church to its right Government by Bishops (f). Upon that a resolution was formed, to fill up all the rest of the vacant sees; and the nomination of proper persons was left to Mr Sharp, who acted with great moderation (g). He, and three others, were consecrated at London, by virtue of a commission dated December 12, 1661, and directed to Bishop Sheldon of London, and Bishop Morley of Worcester; for the Archbishop (z) Life, p. 42.

(a) Ibid.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Life, p. 43.

(d) Life, p. 53. and Bishop Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 162—166.

(e) Life, p. 53.

(f) Woodrow, Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 96. and Burnet, as above, p. 181, &c.

(g) Burnet, p. 183—185.

' wrote to me in commendation of Hyde, an enemy to our Nation and Presbyterial Government. I durst not yet believe myself in this, having no more save his commendation of Hyde, but it appeared afterwards that in Holland he was a great enemy to the Presbyterian interest, and when we wrote a favourable letter for the Earl of Rothes, and with him a letter to the King, he dissuaded the Earl from delivering the letter. When at London, he was enraged that we had written to the Ministers of London. He dealt also treacherously with the Brethren who came from Ireland, in dissuading their Addresses to the King. When he came to Scotland, he dealt earnestly against all Addresses made to the Parliament against Prelacy. He dealt treacherously with the King, making him believe, that there were no considerable Persons against Prelacy; but would have persuaded the King, that all our lives were in his hand, and he might do what he pleased; and the man never rested till he was brought himself to a chair.'—Bishop Burnet, an accuser of his Brethren, speaks in yet severer terms upon that subject (14).

(14) See History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 126, 127, 151.

[K] Carrying with him a letter, &c.] That letter was in these words:

' CHARLES R.

' Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. By the letter you sent to us with the bearer Mr James Sharp, and by the account he gave of the state of our Church there, We have received full information of your sense of our Sufferings, and of your constant affection and loyalty to our Person and Authority. And therefore We will detain him here no longer (of whose good service we are very sensible) nor will we delay to let you know by him our gracious acceptance of your Address, and how We are satisfied with your carriages, and with the generality of the Ministers of Scotland in this time of tryal, whilst some under specious pretences swerved from that duty and allegiance they owed to Us. And because such, who by the countenance of Usurpers have disturbed the peace of that our Church, may also labour to create Jealousies in the minds of well meaning people; We have thought fit by this to assure you, that by the grace of God We resolve to discountenance Prophanity, and all contemnners and opposers of the Ordinances of the Gospel. We do also resolve to protect and preserve the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by Law, without violation; and to countenance in the due exercise of their functions, all such Ministers who shall behave themselves dutifully and peaceably, as becomes men of their calling. We will also take care, that the Authority and Acts of the general Assembly, at St Andrews and Dundee, the year 1651, be owned and stand in force, until we shall

' call another general Assembly, which we purpose to do, as soon as our affairs will permit. And We do intend to send for Mr Robert Douglas and some other Ministers, that we may speak with them in what may further concern the affairs of that Church. And as We are very well satisfied with your resolution, not to meddle without your sphere, so we do expect that Church-Judicatories in Scotland, and Ministers there, will keep within the compass of their station, meddling only with matters Ecclesiastick, and promoting our Authority and Interest with our subjects against all opposers; and that they will take special notice of all such, who by preaching, and private Conventicles, or any other way, transgress the limits of their calling, by endeavouring to corrupt the people, or sow seeds of disaffection to Us or our government. This you shall make known to the several Presbyteries within that our kingdom: And as We do give assurance of our Favour and Encouragement to you, and to all honest deserving Ministers there, so We earnestly recommend it to you all, that you be earnest in your prayers, publick and private, to Almighty God, who is our rock and our deliverer, both for Us and for our government, that We may have fresh and constant supplies of his grace, and the right improvement of all his mercies and deliverances, to the honour of his great name, and the peace, safety, and benefit of all our kingdoms. And so We bid you heartily farewell.

' Given at our Court at Whitehall, the tenth of August 1660, and of our reign the twelfth year.

' By his Majesty's Command,

' Lauderdale (15).' (15) Life, p. 39, &c.

[L] And after this never had another commission from them, nor was employed by that party] The author of our Archbishop's life adds the following observation.—' Which shews that it is a gross calumny, and loading his memory unjustly, to affirm that he betrayed them, seeing he was under no trust (16).—But this observation is ill placed here. For it was not after this that they accused him of having betrayed them, but during his negotiations before the King's Restoration.

(16) Life, p. 42.

[M] With the approbation of all present except the Earl of Lauderdale.] That Lord not only entred his dissent openly in Council; but, coming out, he met Mr Sharp walking with the Earl of Stirling, to whom, with an austere voice and threatening gesture, he spoke these words: ' Mr Sharp, Bishops you are to have in Scotland; you are to be Archbishop of St Andrews; but whoever shall be the man, by G - -, I will finite him and his order below the fifth rib.' And he was as good as his word in many instances (17).

[N] And (17) Life, p. 54.

Archbishop of Canterbury, Juxon, was unable by reason of his great age and infirmities, and Dr Frewen Archbishop of York was absent (b). Before consecration, Archbishop Sharp not having Episcopal Orders, was obliged to be re-ordained, though against his inclination (i). His first act was the obtaining a Proclamation, forbidding Clergymen to meet together in any Presbytery, or other judicatory, 'till the Bishops should settle a method of proceeding in them. The occasion of which was, that, upon the consecration of the Bishops, the Presbyteries of Scotland that were still sitting began to declare openly against Episcopacy, and to prepare protestations, or other acts or instruments, against them. But this proceeding created the Archbishop abundance of enemies; John Maitland Earl of Lauderdale, a seeming friend but a private enemy, blowing the coals (k). In April 1662, the Archbishop, with the rest of the new-consecrated Prelates, were introduced into the Parliament that met at that time: and an act, framed by our Primate, passed in that session, for restoring Episcopacy, and settling the government of the Church in the hands of the Bishops (l) [N]. But, rather than comply with the terms of it, and take presentations to their livings, many Ministers chose to be turned out; and, above 150 were also deprived of their preferments, for not obeying and submitting to the Bishops summons to their Synods. This was transacted without Archbishop Sharp's knowledge, who did not imagine that so rash a thing could have been done; and was glad he had no share in it, as we are informed by Bishop Burnet (m). And indeed the writer of his life assures us, that 'Archbishop Sharp's methods were Christian and prudent, and attended with very great success. He entertained his Clergy with much brotherly love and respect, and was a great judge and encourager of learning, wisdom, and piety (n).' However, it is certain that from this time the frequenters of Conventicles were too severely punished [O]. The deprived brethren and their adherents not patiently bearing their losses and sufferings, broke out at last into an open rebellion; which, however, was appeased and suppressed by their defeat at Pentland-hill, 28 November, 1666 (o). To return to some facts that happened in the mean time: In 1663, Archbishop Sharp came to London, to support the Earl of Middleton and his interest, but finding them both upon the decline, he adhered to the Earl of Lauderdale; who never acted but against his inclination for Episcopacy. In 1664, the Archbishop came again to London, to complain of the Lord Glencairn, and the Privy-Council, for their remissness in putting the laws against the Covenanters in execution. He also made strong application to be Chancellor of Scotland (p); but not being able to succeed for himself, he obtained that high place for the Earl of Rothes (q). And, upon a difference between him and the Earl of Lauderdale, he endeavoured to supplant him; that Earl being the bitterest enemy he could possibly have (r) [P]. During the rebellion in the western parts of Scotland, he was in great distress, being then at the head of the Government in that kingdom; and, after the suppression of it, caused the prisoners to be severely proceeded against (s). He was the King's Commissioner in the Convention which met in 1665; but in the beginning of the year 1667, he was ordered to stay within his diocese, and to come no more to Edinburgh. However, before the end of the same year, he was brought again to the Council-board, and behaved for a while with moderation (t). But the rigorous proceedings against the Covenanters, of which the blame was chiefly laid upon our Prelate, so filled that fullen, enthusiastic, and ungovernable set of people (u), with violent prejudices and a bitter zeal against him, that they never rested 'till they had his life. On the 9th of July, 1668,

[N] And an Act, framed by our Primate, passed in that session for restoring Episcopacy.] By this act, the whole government and jurisdiction of the Church in the several dioceses was declared to be lodged in the Bishops, which they were to exercise with the advice and assistance of such of their Clergy, as were of known loyalty and prudence: All men that held any benefice in the Church were required to own and submit to the government of the Church, as now by law established. This, as Bishop Burnet observes, 'was plainly the setting Episcopacy on another bottom, than it had been ever on in Scotland before that time (18).—The whole frame of the act, adds he, 'was liable to great censures. It was thought an inexcusable piece of madness, that, when a government was brought in upon a nation so averse to it, the first step should carry their power so high. All the Bishops, except Sharp, disowned their having any share in the penning this act; which indeed was passed in haste, without due consideration. Nor did any of the Bishops, no not Sharp himself, ever carry their authority so high, as by the act they were warranted to do (19).—The act being so disagreeable in its own nature to the majority of the Scottish Nation, no wonder that the execution of it should bring a great dislike to those Persons, who by their office were bound to see it obeyed.

[O] From this time the frequenters of Conventicles were too severely punished.] An act of the same nature

against Conventicles, was made in Scotland, as what had passed in England. By which, every person above sixteen, that was present at a conventicle, was to lye three months in prison, or to pay 5 l. for the first offence; six months for the second offence, or to pay 20 l. fine; and for the third offence, upon conviction by a jury, to be banished to any of the plantations, except New England or Virginia, or to pay 100 l. (20).

[P] That Earl being the bitterest enemy he could possibly have.] Though he saw that the Archbishop was guilty of some indiscretions, instead of stopping them in a friendly manner, and giving him proper advice; he 'resolved to give him line, even when he was persuaded that he would ruin all. For he said, he had not credit enough to stop him; nor would he oppose any thing that he proposed, unless 'it were very extravagant (21).—The Archbishop complained to the King of Lauderdale's remissness; which occasioned a bitter quarrel between them. And in the end, to compleat the Archbishop's disgrace with the King, Lauderdale got many of his letters, which he had writ to the Presbyterians, after the time in which the King knew that he was negotiating for Episcopacy, in which he had continued to protest, with what zeal he was solliciting their concerns, not without dreadful imprecations on himself, if he was prevaricating with them, and laid these before the King (22).

(20) Idem, p. 286. See also, p. 294, 295.

(21) Burnet, p. 289.

(22) Idem, p. 297, 300.

[2] Shot

(b) Kennett's Register, &c. p. 577.

(i) Burnet, p. 193, 194.

(k) Ibid. p. 196, &c.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Vol. I. p. 215.

(n) Life, p. 58.

(o) Burnet, as above, p. 326—331.

(p) Upon the death of the Earl of Glencairn, the Chancellor, in July 1664.

(q) Burnet, p. 281—294.

(r) Idem, p. 289, 297, 300.

(s) Idem, p. 328, 329, 331, 332.

(t) Idem, p. 335—347.

(u) See an exact Account of their behaviour and disposition, in this Volume of Bishop Burnet, p. 384, &c. 406—416.

(18) Burnet, as above, p. 199.

(19) Idem, p. 200, 201.

1668, one James Mitchel, a field or conventicle Preacher, shot at him, as he was getting into his coach [Q]: for which he was afterwards executed, the eighteenth of January, 1677-8 [R]. But that execution only made way for more desperate undertakings. Conventicles

[Q] Shot at him, as he was getting into his coach, &c.] Of this wicked and desperate attempt, we shall give the exactest account we can, from the most authentic relations published at different times. That given by the author of our Primate's life, is as follows:

—As he came down in the evening from his brother's lodgings, which were over against the Black-frier wynd, and being placed in his coach, was distributing charity to the poor, and blessing them, and receiving their returns, he with Dr Honyman, Bishop of Orkney (who was entering the coach) were assaulted by a wicked ruffian (Mr James Mitchel by name, whose son and heir is present preacher (23) at Dunoter) who shot at them with a pistol charged with three balls, which broke the Bishop of Orkney's left arm, a little above the wrist. In the confusion, occasioned by so unexpected an event, the bloody assassin made his escape; but being afterwards apprehended, he owned the fact, and maintained such principles as are destructive to society, and hateful to all sober men; for which in or about the year 1676 (24) he suffered the punishment due to such execrable crimes (25).

Dr Hickes, in Ravillac redivivus, relates the fact in the following manner.—Mr Mitchel joined in the rebellion of the Fanatics, that broke out in 1666. He had the fortune to escape from the field of battle, but was afterwards proclaimed Traytor, with many other principal actors in that Rebellion, and afterwards excepted by name in his Majesty's proclamation of Pardon, that he might receive no benefit thereby. Then he seulked about, during which time, he took up the resolution of Assassinating the Lord-Primate, and languished away for want of an opportunity to put his inhumane design in execution. At last, having observed that the Lord Arch-Bishop used always to go about the town [of Edinburgh] in his coach, he determined to pistol him in it; and accordingly on Saturday the ninth of July, 1668, discharged a pistol loaden with three bullets at him, which were intercepted by the arm of the Lord Bishop of Orkney, who at the same instant was getting into his Grace's coach: As soon as he had shot, he walked fast away, and as he crossed the street, the Primate got a view of his face. He was not immediately pursued, which gave him opportunity to escape into the house of one — Ferguson, an ejected Minister; which being in an obscure place of the town, he had prepared for a retreat, in case he could get safe thither. There having disguised himself, by putting on a periwig, and changing his cloaths, he immediately went into the street again, and made as great a bustle as any in the throng to find out the assassin, who had shot at the Primate, and, as he hoped, had killed him in his coach. He was known by none in the crowd, but by three of his confederates, who had come to town on purpose to assist him in his bloody design; namely, — Barfcob, — Mandroget, and Major Lermonth, who had been ringleaders in the rebellion of Pentland-hills. The assassin joyned himself with these three; and after a consultation what they should do for their further security, they unanimously resolved to retire into the garden of Sir Archibald Primrose. The morning approaching, they thought it safer to quit the town; and the other three conducting Mr James Mitchel, he made a final escape into Holland by their assistance, and was never after seen in Scotland, 'till the latter end of 1673. In that interval, he rambled through Holland, England, and Ireland, from whence he returned, with a resolution (as it seems) to assassinate the Primate again. Not long after his return he married, and repaired with his wife to Edinburgh, presuming that after more than five years absence, he might live incognito; at least so long, 'till he could find an opportunity to execute his bloody design. In order to which, he hired a shop within a door or two of the Primate's lodgings, where his wife pretended to sell Tobacco and such like things (26).

Much to the same purpose is Bishop Burnet's story. VOL. VI. No. 304.

—A strange accident happened to Sharp in July, 1668, as he was going into his coach in full day-light, the Bishop of Orkney being with him. A man came up to the coach, and discharged a pistol at him with a brace of bullets in it, as the Bishop of Orkney was going up into the coach. He intended to shoot through his cloak at Sharp, as he was mounting up: but the bullet stuck in the Bishop of Orkney's arm, and shattered it so, that, though he lived some years after that, they were forced to open it every year for an exfoliation. Sharp was so universally hated, that, though this was done in full day-light, and on the high-street, yet no body offered to seize the assassin. So he walked off, and went home, and shifted himself of an odd wig, which he was not accustomed to wear, and came out, and walked on the streets immediately. But Sharp had viewed him so narrowly, that he discovered him afterwards.—Proclamations were issued out with great rewards for discovering the actor; but nothing followed on them. On this occasion it was thought proper, that he should be called to Court, and have some marks of the King's favour put on him. He promised to make many good motions.—The King, as he had a particular talent that way, when he had a mind to it, treated him with special characters of favour and respect. But he made no proposition to the King: only in general terms he approved of the methods of gentleness and moderation then in vogue. When he came back to Scotland, (which was in August 1675) he moved in council, that an Indulgence might be granted to some Ministers, of the denomination of Publick Resolutions, who did not conform, with some rules and restraints (27). But they were rejected by those Ministers.

[R] For which he was afterwards executed the eighteenth of January 1677-8.] We have seen, in the foregoing note, that Mitchel returned to Edinburgh in 1673, where he married, and hired a shop within a door or two of the Archbishop's lodgings. But he had not long been there, before he was discovered and apprehended upon suspicion; and when he was taken (which was in the same place where he stood to commit the fact) there were two pistols found about him, in size and shape like that which the Primate saw him hold in his hand, immediately after he had shot at his Grace; and upon search, they were also found to be charged with three bullets each. Being apprehended by Sir William Sharp, he was immediately brought to his brother the Primate's lodgings; and though a great crowd had pressed in after him, yet his Grace knew him at first sight from all the rest (such a deep impression the transient view he got of him after the shot, had made upon him) and going up to him, without any hesitation he said unto him, You, Sir, are the man; upon which the wretch trembled and grew pale. Not long after, he was convened before the Privy-Council, the Duke of Lauderdale, his Majesty's High Commissioner, then sitting in Council; but he would confess nothing before them, which made them depute a Committee for his further examination; before which he freely confessed the fact, and signed his Confession before the King's High-Commissioner sitting in Council; which the Lord Halton, the Treasurer-Deputy; the Earl of Rothes, Lord-Chancellor; and some other of the Council, subscribed as witnesses. After this examination, which was in February 1674, he was put upon his trial. But after his indictment was read, he denied it, and retracted his Confession, which (as our author affirms) he had freely made, without any promise of pardon, before the High-Commissioner and the Council. Upon which, Sir John Nesbit, his Majesty's Advocate, desisted immediately from the prosecution, and would never prosecute the assassin again: so that the Privy Council were forced to send him prisoner to the Bass, where he continued 'till the latter end of December 1677. But then it being rumoured about, that the Fanatics designed to take off our Primate, Archbishop Burnet, some

(23) Namely, when that Life was written.

(24) It was in January 1677-8. See the next note.

(25) Life, p. 63, 24.

(26) Ravillac Redivivus, being a Narrative of the Trial of Mr James Mitchel, &c. 2d edit. Lond. 1682, fol.

(27) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 388, 389. Life, p. 69.

(w) Burnet,
Vol. II. p. 23,
25.

(*) So Bishop
Burnet insinuates.
Vol. II. p. 103.
and Woodrow,
Vol. II. p. 28.

ticles grew at length to a very unfeufferable pitch; they having generally with them a troop of armed and desperate men, that drew up, and sent parties out to secure them (w). From some of these, the precaution which the Archbishop had taken to secure his own life, served only to hasten his fatal and most tragical death. For, whether it was a premeditated design [S], or suggested by an accidental opportunity (*), nine ruffians [T] attacked him, May the third, 1679, on Magask-moor about three miles from St Andrews, and murdered him in a cruel and barbarous manner [U]. His body was interred, May 17, in the south end of

(28) Ravillac/
Redivivus, as
above, p. 6, 7.

of the Bishops, and other eminent persons, by assassination; it was resolved to bring Mr Mitchel to publick justice (28).—Or, as Bishop Burnet expresses it in his invidious way, ‘now Sharp would have his life.—He pretended, he was in great danger of his life, and that the rather because the person that had made the attempt on him was let live still.’—The same historian represents this whole affair in very black colours. And tells us, that ‘Sharp got a friend of his to go to Mitchel, and deal with him to make a full confession: And he made solemn promises, that he would procure his pardon. His friend answered, he hoped he did not intend to make use of him to trepan a man to his ruin. Upon that, with lifted up hands, Sharp promised by the living God, that no hurt should come to him, if he made a full discovery. — And the Duke of Lauderdale, the King’s Commissioner, gave the Council power to promise him his life.’—But, afterwards, upon Mitchel’s refusing to repeat his confession in a court of judicature; the Council past an Act mentioning the promise and his confession, and adding, that since he had retracted his confession, they likewise recalled the promise of pardon (29).—Let us hear what our Archbishop said upon that point, at the time of Mitchel’s tryal. He then deposed, ‘that immediately upon the taking of the pannel [i. e. the prisoner] he promised him, that if he would confess, and repent himself of his fault, without further troubling a Court of Judicature, he would intercede for his Pardon; which he rejeſted then, and therefore though he still forgave him, yet he did not conceive himself bound to endeavour his preservation after more than five years Obſtination (30).’—Bishop Burnet hath given a large and circumstantial Account of this whole affair (31), which we cannot insert, for fear of swelling this note too much. But he owns himself, that he received his information from one who hated Sharp (32). Let therefore the reader coolly judge for himself, between the two extremes. Only we cannot but leave this observation with him, That Archbishop Sharp is by Bishop Burnet painted in as black colours, as Bishop Burnet himself has been by posterity: And that he expresses throughout as bitter a prejudice against our Primate, as even Mitchel himself could do. He had also forgot, that one of the ancientest Laws of the supreme Governor of the universe, is, Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed (33). The obvious meaning of which is, that Murder is to be punished with death, which way soever it comes to be discovered.

(29) Burnet,
Vol. II. p. 18,
19.

(30) Ravillac
Redivivus, p. 14.

(31) History,
Vol. II. p. 17,
&c.

(32) Ibid. p.
19, 23.

(33) Gen. ix. 6.

(34) Life, p. 72.
and Appendix to the Preface, p.
52.

(35) Appendix to
the Preface, p.
56.

[S] Whether it was a premeditated design.] The author of the Archbishop’s Life gives strong reasons to think that it was a premeditated Design. For, towards the end of April 1679, a paper was dropt in the Burgh of Cowper, full of opprobrious language and insinuations of a Design upon Archbishop Sharp’s person, who was then at Edinburgh, and had resolved to go to London, to give a fair representation to his Majesty of the state of affairs, and what was to be done for remedying these evils. It is believed, that if the Archbishop had gone straight to Court, his enemies had failed in their design, and also, that his wife counsels would have prevented much blood and ensuing confusions (34).—And, in another letter from one of his Grace’s enemies, inserted in the same life (35), and dated third of May 1679, we find this passage.—‘I hope you have heard of the dreadful Death of the old Fox, who was clothed with the Sheep’s skin, and countenanced with the King’s authority. The same was intended for others also; but it seems God hath not altogether forsaken them, and given them over to themselves; but it may be supposed, that they are referred to a greater judgment, which God in his own appointed time will cause to fall upon them.’ See Preface to the Archbishop’s Life (36).

(36) P. 25—35.

[T] Nine ruffians attacked him.] Their names were, John Balfour of Kinloch, David Haxton of Rathillet, George Balfour in Gillston, James Ruffel in Kettle, Robert Dingwal a tenant’s son in Caddam, Andrew Guillan, webster in Balmerinloch, Alexander and Andrew Henderfons, sons to John Henderfons in Kilbrachmont, and George Fleeming son to George Fleeming in Balboothie (37).

(37) Life, p. 75,
and 156.

[U] And murdered him in a cruel and barbarous manner.] Of this inhuman murder the following account is given by the writer of his Life ‘Upon Friday May the second, he determined to take journey to St Andrews, with a design to return upon Monday to Edinburgh, and thence to begin his journey for Court. On Friday evening, he reached Kennoway, where he lodged that night. — On Saturday, May 3d, he entered his coach with his daughter Isabel, and went on in his journey. — As he passed by the Struthers, he sent his servant with an excuse to the Earl of Crawford, that he could not wait upon him at that occasion. And, as he was going on, the coachman perceiving some armed men making hard after them, who looked not like friends, calls to the postilion to drive on. The Arch-bishop finding the coach run so hard, look’t out to see what the matter was, and perceiving armed men pursuing him, he turned to his daughter, and said Lord have mercy upon me, my poor child, for I am gone. In the mean time, the coachman put faster on, and out-run the most part of these ruffians, while at last one of the best mounted of them got before the postilion, and, by wounding him in the face, shooting the horse which he led, in the back, and cutting him in the hams, turned the coach out of the way, and gave time to the rest to come up, who immediately stopt the coach, by cutting the harnessing with their swords. One wounded him with the shot of a pistol, another with a small sword: thereafter they called to him to come out. Upon which he composedly opened the coach-door, and step forth: And while his daughter was crying, and all in tears, he besought them to spare his life, and obtested them not to bring innocent blood upon their own heads. But all in vain. Then he entreated them through the bowels and mercies of Christ, that they would at least suffer him to die patiently, and have some time to recommend his soul unto God. Which being denied him, (but would have been granted by the most barbarous of all Heathens) he fell upon his knees, and while he was holding up his eyes and hands to Heaven, and, pouring out his soul before God, and after the example of his blessed Lord, praying for his murderers, he was first deeply wounded in the wrists, and backs of these up-lifted hands, which they did beat down, and then by these bloody Canibals massacred upon the place, having received in his head, and other parts of his body, twenty two wounds (38).’

(38) Life, p.
73, 74, 75, and
140, &c.

To this, it will not be amiss to subjoin the declaration of the Physician and Surgeons, who visited the Archbishop’s body. ‘We under-subscribers, being called to visit the corps of the late Lord Archbishop of St Andrews, do find, that he had received a wound by a sword over the left eye, extending two inches above, and one below, making a great suffusion of blood upon the cheek, and upper and lower eye-lid. Next, we found many wounds upon the posterior part of his head, insomuch, that the whole occipital bone was shattered all in pieces, and a part of the brain thereby lost upon the place, which certainly being so great, could not but occasion his present death. There were only two wounds to be seen upon the body, the first, two or three inches below the right clavicle, betwixt

the

of the high church of St Andrews; where his son erected a magnificent tomb, with an elegant epitaph, to his memory, composed by Dr Andrew Bruce, Bishop of Dunkeld, and afterwards of Orkney (y). By his wife, Helen Moncrief, daughter to William Moncrief, Laird of Randerston, descended from an ancient family, his Grace left one son, and two daughters; viz.—Sir William Sharp, who married Mrs Margaret Erskine, daughter to Sir Charles Erskine of Cambo, Bart. Lyon King at Arms.—Isabel, who was in the coach with her father at the time of his barbarous murder, and was afterwards married to John Cunningham of Barns, Gent. in Fife-shire.—Margaret, who was married to William Lord Saltoun (z). The Archbishop was of a middle stature, strong, and well made. He had a comely forehead, but his eyes appeared to be somewhat sunk, yet full of life. His countenance was cheerful, with a due mixture of gravity; and he was an absolute master of the art of address. For sobriety he was next to a miracle. Neither was his Charity less in all its branches [W]. He was a man of good learning, and a frequent preacher; and thought residence one of the indispensable duties of a Bishop [X]. He was a kind and affectionate husband, a tender and indulgent father, a firm friend, a great encourager of learning and learned men, and a sure patron of societies, particularly of the city and university of St Andrews (a).

(y) Life, p. 82, 83.

(z) Life, p. 81.

(a) Life, p. 76—82.

the second or third rib, which was given by a shot not reaching the capacity of the breast. The next was a small wound upon the region of the kidneys, given by a small sword. Likewise we found three wounds upon his left hand, which might have proved mortal, though he had escaped the former. Also another upon the right hand, as dangerous as the former; as witness our hands at St Andrews, the fifth day of May 1679, George Pitillo, M. D. William Borthwick, Chir. Henry Spence, Chir. James Pringle, Chir. (39).

(39) Appendix to the Preface, as above, p. 57.

[W] Neither was his Charity less in all its branches.] If at any time he made distinction, it was to those of the better rank, upon whom poverty lies heaviest, because they are ashamed to discover their necessities, or to beg supplies from others; and that without any respect to party. 'I have it (adds the author of his life) from a wise, reverend, and aged Presbyter, who had the advantage of knowing him very well, that, to his certain knowledge, he hath caused distribute by his trustees fifty crowns in a morning to the orphans and widows of the Presbyterian brethren, without their being acquainted from what hand it came. And it is now very well known, that a certain Presbyterian lady (whose father was the third and most eminent, except one, that suffered after the Restoration) was entrusted by him in dispensing no small sums of secret charity, to the most needful of that party, which differed so much from him. And his conduct in his family, and on other occasions to the poor, was suitable to discretion, and the true laws of charity (40).'

(40) Life, p. 79.

[X] And thought residence one of the indispensable duties of a Bishop.] The author of our Primate's life explains more fully these particulars, in the following manner:—'He was no friend to Pluralities in the Church, and he thought residence one of the indispensable duties of a Bishop, and was never absent from St Andrews, except when the affairs of the Church and the publick called him. Frequently he preached every Lord's-day, but at least once in the fourteen days: And when he was necessarily at Edinburgh, he preached on all anniversary days, festivals, and solemn occasions. And for that part of the Evangelical function he was happily qualified: for his sermons were methodical, grave and persuasive, altogether free from Enthusiastick flights and bitter invectives; which were then the admirable talents of those denominated a Gospel-gifted Ministry. That which made all Ecclesiastical performances easy to the Archbishop, was, the great progress he had made, from the days of his youth, in the study of the Greek and Latine Fathers, the ancient Liturgies, Councils, and Canons of the Church. Neither was he a stranger to the learning of the school-men (41).'

is pleased to say, that Sharp had a very small portion of Learning, and was but an indifferent Preacher (42).'

But we must consider, that this comes from a very inveterate Enemy.

(41) Life, p. 79.

(42) Hist. Vol. I. p. 88.

SHARP [JOHN], the late most worthy Archbishop of York, was born at Bradford in Yorkshire, February the 16th, 1644, being the son of Mr Thomas Sharp, an eminent tradesman of that place, descended from the Sharps of Little Norton, a family of great antiquity in Bradford-Dale (a) [A]. On the 26th of April, 1660, he was admitted of Christ's-college in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Brooksbank [B]. But he attended for some time Lectures in Natural Philosophy, according to the Cartesian method; which were read by Mr Thomas Burnet, then Fellow of Christ's-college, afterwards Doctor in Divinity, and Master of the Charter-house. However, Mr Sharp did not apply himself so much to the Mathematicks, as he did to Botany and Chemistry, which were his favourite studies in his younger years (b). On the 26th of December, 1663, he commenced Bachelor of Arts, having performed his exercise and examination with good reputation; though he had laboured under great infirmities both of body and mind most part of the time, having been afflicted with a quartan ague, which by its long continuance had brought on a hypochondriac melancholy (c). About the year 1664, he made interest for a Fellowship of his college; but, his county being full, he was expressly excluded by the statutes: Dr Cudworth, the Master, offered to bring him in afterwards, in 1669, but he had then better views. The 9th of July, 1667, he commenced Master of Arts; and, the 12th of the month following, by virtue of a faculty from Archbishop Sheldon, was ordained Deacon and Priest both in one day, by Dr Fuller, then Bishop of Limerick, afterwards of Lincoln. The same year, in the month of October, he became domestic Chaplain,

(a) Mr Thoreby's Topography of Leedes, p. 36.

(b) From Memoirs communicated to us by the learned Dr T. Sharp, Archdeacon of Northumbreland, one of the Archbishop's sons.

(c) Lives of the Protestant Bishops, &c. by J. Le Neve, edit. 1720, 8vo. Part 2. p. 279.

[A] Was born at Bradford in Yorkshire, February the 16th, 1644, &c.] He was baptized by Mr Blazet, with sponsors, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England. Mr Blazet was episcopally ordained: and Dr Sharp was always thankful to God for this blessing (1).

(1) From Memoirs communicated by the learned Dr T. Sharp, as above.

[B] Under the tuition of Mr Brooksbank.] Dr Sharp procured afterwards for him the living of St Mary's in Reading, out of gratitude for the pains he had taken with him, whilst he was under his tuition (2).

(2) From the same Memoirs.

[C] And

Chaplain, and Tutor to four sons of Sir Heneage Finch [C], then Attorney-General, afterwards Lord Chancellor; by the recommendation of his fellow-collegian, the celebrated Dr Henry More (d). July 13, 1669, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, in company with several other Gentlemen from Cambridge, who went to Oxford, at the opening of the Sheldonian Theatre (e). Having attended, with universal liking, for five years in the family of his excellent patron Sir Heneage Finch, he was by him recommended to King Charles II. for the Archdeaconry of Berkshire, then void by the promotion of Dr Mew to the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells; and accordingly he was collated thereto February 20, 1672 (f). Sir Heneage being advanced, the same year, to the high office of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; and sensible, that the several duties of his great post, would not allow him time and leisure, to make that enquiry which was necessary; to know the characters of such as applied to him for the Crown-preferments in his disposal; he devolved this particular province upon his Chaplain Mr Sharp, of whose learning, integrity, and good judgment, he had now sufficient experience [D]. In 1674, he preached a sermon, the first in the collection of his printed works, which occasioned a controversy, of which an account is given in the note [E]. On the 26th of March, 1675-6, he was installed Prebendary of the third stall in the cathedral of Norwich; and, on the 22d of April following, instituted to the Rectory of St Bartholomew Exchange London. He was married, May 16, 1676, by Dr Tillotson, at Clerkenwell church, to Elizabeth, youngest daughter of William Palmer of Winthorp in the county of Lincoln, Esq; And, on the third of January, 1676-7, was instituted to the Rectory of St Giles in the Fields, London, having supplied that place constantly from the death of the last incumbent (g). He now left the Lord Chancellor Finch, and kept house, and his time was taken up, for the ten following years, in close attention to his cure at St Giles's [F]. During that time, he was happy in the intimacy of some, and well acquainted with all, the following eminent Divines then in London: Stillingfleet, Cradock, Whichcot, Calamy, Tillotson [G], Clagett, Williams, Tenison, Beveridge, Scott, Sherlock, Wake, and

(d) Memoirs, &c. and Le Neve, as above, p. 280.

(e) Wood, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 177.

(f) Le Neve, p. 280, 281. and Fasti, p. 280.

(g) Memoirs, &c. as above. Le Neve, p. 281. and Newcourt's Repertorium, &c. Vol. I. p. 292, 613.

(3) Br. Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. I. p. 72, 176.

(4) Life of Dr George Bull, &c. edit. 1713, 8vo. p. 278, 279.

[C] And Tutor to four sons of Sir Heneage Finch. Two of them, Henry and Edward, entering afterwards into Orders, he gave them successively the rich Prebend of Wetwang in his own Cathedral at York. Henry was made Dean of York, in 1702 (3).

[D] Of whose learning, integrity, and good judgment he had now sufficient experience. This particular we learn from the pious Mr Nelson (4), whose larger account is as follows: 'Among the many very commendable qualities of this great man [Sir Heneage] his zeal for the welfare of the Church of England, was not the least conspicuous; which particularly shewed itself, in the care he took in disposing of those Ecclesiastical Preferments, which were in the Gift of the Seal. He judged rightly, in looking upon that Privilege as a Trust for the good of the Church of God, of which he was to give a strict account; and therefore being sensible that the several duties of his great Post, as first Minister of State, as Lord-Chancellor, and as Speaker of the House of Lords, would not allow his Lordship time and leisure to make that enquiry which was necessary to know the Characters of such as were Candidates for Preferment, he devolved this particular province upon his Chaplain, whose Conscience he charged with an impartial Scrutiny in this matter; adding withal, that he would prefer none but those who came recommended from him, and that if he led him wrong, the blame should fall upon his own soul. It is true, that this was a great testimony of my Lord's intire Confidence, in the Uprightness as well as the Capacity of his Chaplain; but the world will quickly be satisfied with what caution and judgment his Lordship took his measures, when they shall know, that his then Chaplain was Dr Sharp, the present Lord Archbishop of York, who fills one of the Archiepiscopal thrones of the Church of England, with that universal applause, which is due to his Grace's distinguishing merit; whose elevation hath not deprived him of his humility, but he exerciseth the same affability and courtesy towards all men, which he practised in a lower sphere. And that Learning and Piety, that Integrity and Zeal for the Glory of God, which influence his Grace in the government of his Diocess and of his Province, were peculiarly serviceable to the Earl of Nottingham, in the charge his Lordship laid upon him with so much solemnity.'—It was he that procured the learned Mr George Bull, afterwards Bishop of St David's, a Prebend of Gloucester, from the Lord-Chancellor, in which he was installed October 9, 1678.

[E] Which occasioned a Controversy, of which an account is given in the note. This Sermon was, soon after, answered by an anonymous writer, supposed to be Wadsworth the dissenter; and that Answer was the occasion of Mr Dodwell's book of Schism (5). R. Baxter replied to Mr Dodwell, in his 'True and only way of Concord.' This drew from Mr Dodwell a second piece on Schism (6). At length Dr Sharp, in 1683, wrote, but without taking any immediate notice of the Authors aforesaid, his first Discourse on Conscience; and in the year following his second Discourse on the same subject: Both which Discourses made part of the London Cafes, and were abridged by Dr Bennet in the London Cafes. So this Dispute ended.—But another arose from the same sermon. Some Popish anonymous writer published in 1704, a piece intitled An Essay towards a Proposal for Catholic Communion, with arguments artfully taken from this Sermon. This was answered in a piece intitled Concordia discors; and again in a pamphlet, recommended publickly by Dr Fowler, Bishop of Gloucester, in an advertisement prefixed: But lastly and most fully by Mr N. Spinckes; all in the same year, viz 1705.

[F] And his time was taken up, for the ten following years, in close attention to his cure at St Giles's. Except that, in the last five years, being then Dean of Norwich, he removed in the summer months to his charge there.—Richard Baxter lived then in his Parish of St Giles's, and kept a large Conventicle there, which he attended on Sundays in the afternoon, but was a constant hearer of, and communicant with, Dr Sharp, at his own church in the morning. And they lived for many years in good friendship with each other (7).

[G] Tillotson. The friendship and acquaintance, between them, was of a long standing, and begun by an accidental meeting, upon this occasion. Mr Joshua Tillotson, the doctor's brother, was a wet and dry Salter, or Oilman, in London, of which trade was Dr Sharp's father, at Bradford in Yorkshire. Mr Sharp returning from thence to London, with a bill drawn on Mr Joshua Tillotson, happened to meet at his house Dr Tillotson, who finding Mr Sharp to be his countryman, and a young clergyman setting out into the world, being above fourteen years younger than himself, with his usual goodness and civility took particular notice of him, and after some conversation gave Mr Sharp leave to come freely to his house, whenever he pleased, and to have recourse to him as often as he thought it might be serviceable to him. Mr Sharp judged this a most fortunate interview, and

(5) See Mr Dodwell's Preface, and Mr Brokesby's Life of Mr Dodwell.

(6) See above the article DODWELL [HENRY].

(7) Memoirs, &c. as above.

and Cave. With Clagett above all others he had a most particular friendship (b) [H]. March 28, 1670, he accepted of the Lecture at St Lawrence-Jewry, London, upon the earnest desire of Dr Benjamin Whichcot, then Vicar of that parish, and held it, according to his promise, as long as the Doctor lived (which was 'till 1683), and no longer. July 8, 1679, he commenced Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge. In 1681, June 17, he was, by the interest of his patron, then Lord High-Chancellor, made Dean of Norwich, into which he was installed June 8 (i). Upon the death of King Charles II. he drew up the Address of the Grand Jury for the city of London. March the 20th, 1684-5, he preached at Whitehall that Sermon which was published at the request of the Bishops who then attended at the King's chapel there (k). Having been Chaplain to King Charles II. and attended as one of the Court Chaplains at the coronation of King James II. (l), he was sworn Chaplain to this last, April 20, 1686, and not in 1688, as Le Neve says by mistake. On the second of May, 1686, he preached in his own church, on 1 Cor. xii. 13. a sermon against Popery (m), which created him some trouble. For, at his coming down from the pulpit, a paper was put into his hand, containing an Argument for the Right of the Church of Rome to the style and title of the only visible Catholick Church. Not knowing where to direct an Answer to that Paper, he answered it the next Sunday, May 9, at the end of his sermon on the same text (n). This being misrepresented at Court, as a design to beget in the minds of the audience an ill opinion of the King and his government, by insinuating fears and jealousies to dispose them to discontent, and to lead them into disobedience and rebellion [I], and consequently as a contempt of his Majesty's order about Preachers; therefore the King resented it extremely (o). But Dr Sharp had no notice of the King's displeasure 'till May the 23d, when he was acquainted with it by the Lord-Chancellor Jefferies. The next day, he took his short-hand sermon to his Lordship, and read it to him [K]. Jefferies pretended to be very angry, and reprimanded him, but advised him to go down to Norwich, and was afterwards a friend to him (p). On the 17th of June following, Dr Henry Compton, then Bishop of London, received a letter from the King [L], commanding him immediately to suspend Dr Sharp from further preaching in any parish church or chapel in his diocese, until he had given his Majesty satisfaction. The Bishop, thereupon, sent for the Doctor, and acquainted him with the King's displeasure, and the occasion of it, by shewing him his Majesty's letter: but he having never been called to answer any such matter, or make his defence, and protesting his innocence, and likewise declaring himself most ready to give his Majesty full satisfaction therein; in order thereto, his Lordship advised him to forbear preaching, 'till he had applied himself to his Majesty. And, at his request, he sent by him, June 18, an answer to the Earl of Sunderland, President of the Council, then at Hampton-court [M]; but no answer could be

(b) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(i) Le Neve, &c. as above, p. 282.

(k) It is the 6th in the first volume of his Sermons.

(l) Le Neve, p. 233.

(m) It is the 5th in the 7th volume of his Works.

(n) Memoirs, &c. It is the 6th sermon in the foregoing volume.

(o) Complete History, Vol. III. edit. 1719, p. 455.

(p) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(8) Life of Dr Tillotson, by Dr Birch; from Memoirs communicated by Mr Archdeacon Sharp.

Himself extremely happy in so valuable an acquaintance, and ever after spoke of this incident with pleasure. And this was the foundation of a firm and lasting friendship between them, improved by an intimate acquaintance for many years, and cemented by repeated acts of mutual good offices (8).

[H] With Clagett above all others he had a most particular friendship. He was perfectly charmed with Dr Clagett. And if similitude of temper and manners, equality of age, conformity of inclination and studies, &c. can make true friendships, these two persons needed only to be known to each other to become fast friends. They lived in a manner together. Clagett who was not well furnished with Books of his own, made use of Dr Sharp's Library, came into it at pleasure, and prosecuted his enquiries in it as he pleased, without the least ceremony used, or interruption given on either side. Dr W. Clagett dying March 28, 1688, Dr Sharp preached his funeral sermon, and published a volume of his sermons (9). And he took Mrs Clagett, immediately upon her husband's decease, to his own house; but she survived not long (10).

[I] And to lead them into disobedience and rebellion.] It was reported falsely, that he had undertaken, in that sermon, to confute the Paper said to have been found in the late King's strong Box. Which was believed at Court (11).

[K] The next day he took his short-hand sermon to his Lordship, and read it to him.] Bishop Burnet is mistaken, when he says, that 'Sharp went to Court to shew the notes of his sermon, which he was ready to swear were those from which he had read it, by which the falshood of the information would appear. But, since he was not suspended, he was not admitted (12).' For, from the more authentick account sent me, it was to Lord Ch. Jefferies the Doctor carried, and read, the notes of his sermon.

[L] Dr Compton, then Bishop of London, received a letter from the King.] It was dated June the 14th, 1686, and in these words:

VOL. VI. No. CCCV.

' James R.

' Right Reverend Father in God, We greet you well. Whereas We have been informed, and are fully satisfied, that Dr John Sharp, Rector of the Parish-Church of St Giles in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex, and in your diocese, notwithstanding Our late Letter to the most Reverend Fathers in God the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and Our Directions concerning Preachers, given at Our Court at Whitehall, the 15th of March, 1685, in the second year of our Reign; yet he, the said Dr John Sharp, in contempt of the said Orders, hath in some of the sermons he hath since preached, presumed to make unbecoming Reflections, and to utter such Expressions as were not fit or proper for him; endeavouring thereby to beget in the minds of his Hearers an evil Opinion of Us and Our Government, by insinuating Fears and Jealousies to dispose them to Discontent, and to lead them into Disobedience and Rebellion. These are therefore to require and command you immediately upon receipt hereof, forthwith to suspend him from further preaching in any parish-church or chappel in your diocese, until he has given us satisfaction, and Our further Pleasure be known herein. And for so doing this shall be your warrant: And so we bid you heartily farewell.

' Given at our Court at Windsor, the fourteenth day of June, 1686, in the second year of our reign.

' By his Majesties command,

' Sunderland.'

[M] He sent by him, June 18, an Answer to the Earl of Sunderland, &c.] It was as follows:

(9) See Preface to that volume.

(10) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(11) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(12) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time edit. 1753, 8vo. Vol. II. p. 370.

(g) An exact Account of the whole Proceedings against the Right Rev. Father in God Henry Lord Bishop of London, &c. Printed in 1688, 4to. p. 7, 8, 9, 22.

(r) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(s) Le Neve, &c. as above, p. 283.

(t) Memoirs, &c. as above.

be obtained to this letter of the Bishop. Therefore, two days after, Dr Sharp carried a petition to the King [N] at Windsor, which however was not admitted to be read (g). After he had voluntarily ceased the exercise of his function, by the advice of the Bishop of London, he removed to Norwich [O]. During this leisure-time, he amused himself with collecting old Coins, chiefly British, Saxon, and English; of which, as well as of Greek and Roman, he picked up, then and afterwards, as many as furnished out a large and choice cabinet. At length, January 9, 1686-7, the Earl of Sunderland wrote to him, that he might return to his function; which he did with great joy. On the 14th and 15th of August, 1688, he agreed with the other Archdeacons (when summoned to appear before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for not obeying the King's orders in respect of the Declaration), not to appear before that Court; and drew up the reasons for their refusal. The 27th of January, 1688-9, he preached before the Prince of Orange, and January the 30th before the Convention. On both occasions he prayed for King James before Sermon (r) [P]. The Deanery of Canterbury becoming vacant by the removal of Dr Tillotson to that of St Paul's, Dr Sharp was declared Dean of Canterbury in his room, September 19, 1689, and instituted by the Vicar-General on the 21st of November (s). About the same time, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for revising the Liturgy: and, November 21, moved in Convocation, that Dr Tillotson should be the Prolocutor; but it was carried for Dr Jane, which was thought one principal reason why the Commission itself failed of success (t) Upon the deprivation of some Bishops, for refusing the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, his Majesty was pleased to mention Dr Sharp, as a proper person to succeed in some of the vacant sees. Two or three were accordingly proposed to him: Norwich in particular was pressed by Dr Tillotson, as the place which he thought would be most acceptable. But Dr Sharp absolutely declined to accept of any of them; not out of any scruple of conscience, for he could not, under such a scruple, have either made

' To the right honourable, the Earl of Sunderland, Lord President, &c.

' My Lord,

' I always have, and shall count it my duty to obey the King in whatever Commands he lays upon me, that I can perform with a safe conscience: But in this, I humbly conceive, I am obliged to proceed according to law; and therefore it is impossible for me to comply; because, though his Majesty commands me only to execute his pleasure, yet in the capacity I am, to do it, I must act as a Judge; and your Lordship knows no Judge condemns any man before he has knowledge of the cause, and has cited the party. However, I sent to Mr Dean, and acquainted him with his Majesty's displeasure, whom I find so ready to give all reasonable satisfaction, that I have thought fit to make him the Bearer of this Answer, from him that will never be unfaithful to the King, nor otherwise than,

' My Lord,

' Your Lordship's most humble servant,

' H. London.'

[N] Therefore, two days after, Dr Sharp carried a petition to the King.] It was in these words:

' To the King's most Excellent Majesty, The humble Petition of John Sharp, Clerk,

' Sheweth,

' That nothing is so afflictive to Your Majesty, as his unhappiness to have incurred Your Majesty's Displeasure, which he is so sensible of, that ever since your Majesty was pleased to give notice of it, he hath forborn all Publick Exercise of his Function, and still continues so to do. Your petitioner can with great sincerity affirm, that ever since he hath been a Preacher, he hath faithfully endeavoured to do the best service he could in his place and station, as well to the late King, your Royal Brother, as your Majesty, both by preaching and otherwise. And so far he hath always been from venting any thing in the pulpit tending to Schism or Faction, or any way to the disturbance of Your Majesty's Government, that he hath upon all occasions in his Sermons, to the utmost of his power, set himself against all sorts of Doctrines and Principles that look that way: And this he is so well assured of, that he cannot but apprehend that his Sermons have been very much misrepresented to Your Majesty. But ' if in any sermon of his, any words or expressions have unwarily slipped from him, that have been capable of such constructions, as to give Your Majesty cause of offence, as he solemnly professes he had no ill intention in those words or expressions, so he is very sorry for them, and resolves for the future to be so careful in the discharge of his duty, that Your Majesty shall have reason to believe him to be Your most faithful subject. And therefore he earnestly prayeth, that Your Majesty out of Your royal grace and clemency, would be pleased to lay aside the Displeasure You have conceived against Your humble Petitioner, and restore him to that Favour which the rest of the Clergy enjoy under Your Majesty's gracious Government.

' So shall your Petitioner ever pray, &c. (13).'

[O] He removed to Norwich.] After he had been some time there, notice was given him, that if he would return and petition the King, he should be restored. Mr Henry Guy, Secretary of the Treasury, directed the manner of the Petition; and the Earl of Rochester undertook to befriend him in it (14) Mr Pepys was also very helpful to him, as we learn from Bishop Kennet, whose account is thus (15): ' I have heard Archbishop Tenison say, That He, as Vicar of St Martin's, used several endeavours with some of the Nobility in vain, to obtain a liberty of preaching for his neighbour Dr Sharp; 'till at last representing his case to Mr Pepys, as a good-natured man with wife and children, Mr Pepys went freely to the King, and prevailed with his Majesty to restore him to the exercise of his office; 'till which time, he had a guard or centinel to attend his lodgings.'

[P] On both occasions he prayed for King James before Sermon.] The first time it gave no visible offence, because then neither of the Houses of Parliament had declared the King's Desertion of the government and kingdom to be properly an Abdication. But on Monday the twenty-eighth the Commons had passed their Vote, That the King had abdicated, and the Throne was vacant. And therefore Dr Sharp's praying for the King, gave great offence; as well as some passages in the sermon itself, less agreeable to mens tempers at that juncture than to the subject of the 30th of January; so that a long debate ensued about giving him thanks as usual, and the House broke up without doing it. Yet, on the first of February they passed a Vote of thanks, with a request that he should print the sermon: but this he declined. This was a pretty remarkable proof, of his steadiness in doing what in his own judgment appeared to him

(13) Proceedings against the Bishop of London, &c. p. 7, 8, 9.

(14) Memoirs, &c. as above.

(15) Complete History of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719. p. 483. note (b).

(16) Memoirs, &c. as above.

[Q] Dr

made a return to the Congé d'eslire for the election of Dr Tillotson to Canterbury, which he did as Dean thereof; nor could he have suffered himself to have been consecrated by Dr Tillotson, as he was soon after; but out of a particular friendship and esteem, which he had for the persons deprived. This however displeased the King, and Dr Sharp seemed no longer to be thought of. While he was in this situation, Dr Tillotson came to his house on the 24th of April, 1691, the day after his own nomination to the Archbishopric, and told him, that since he had so obstinately refused taking any of the vacant Bishoprics, he had thought of a method to bring him off with the King; which was, that he should promise to accept the Archbishopric of York, in his own country, when it fell, as Dr Tenison should take Lincoln. He told him at the same time, how all the vacant bishoprics were designed to be disposed of; observing, that he had thought of this scheme, as he came from Whitehall to his house; and directing him to go and acquaint the Earl of Nottingham with it; and if his Lordship approved of it, he would himself propose it to the King on the Monday following. Accordingly on that day he acquainted his Majesty with what had passed between Dr Sharp and himself, and fixed the affair: which his Majesty declared in Council, the middle of the same week. And Dr Lamplugh dying on the 5th of May following, Dr Sharp was promoted to the see of York [Q], and consecrated July the 5th, 1691 (u). In that high station he behaved in the most laudable and exemplary manner [R]. Upon Queen Anne's accession to the Crown, he was sworn (March 20, 1701-2) of her Majesty's Privy-Council. The 23d of April following he preached the Sermon at her coronation, on Isaiah xlix. 23. And, some time in the same year, was made Lord Almoner to her Majesty, which office he held to his death (w). In 1706, he was one of the Commissioners for treating of the Union between England and Scotland (x). In 1709, while Dr Sacheverell's affair was depending, our excellent Prelate, imagining that through this imprudent attack both Church and State were in danger; he heartily

(u) Memors, as above.
Life of Archbishop Tillotson, by Dr Birch, p. 276, 277. and Le Neve, ut supra, p. 283, 284.

(w) Le Neve, as above, p. 284.

(x) Boyer's Life of Queen Anne, vol. p. 231.

[Q] Dr Sharp was promoted to the See of York. The Earl of Nottingham brought him his Mandate, May the 8th. He was confirmed July 2. Consecrated the 5th. Did homage the 6th. Was introned at York by proxy the 16th. And October 5th was introduced into the House of Lords (17).

[R] In that high station, he behaved in the most laudable and exemplary manner. In his Family, every thing was managed with such admirable regularity, as if all his care and wisdom had been confined to that sphere only. His retirements were divided between study and devotion. At his table there was that decent freedom and alacrity, that hospitable abundance and plenty, which became the dignity of his station and character, and the liberality of his disposition. Had Wolfey been to dictate splendor to him, still his conversation must have been the best part of the entertainment. He redoubled the esteem and veneration of others for him, by aiming only at their love; and lost nothing of the Archbishop, in the very good neighbour and obliging friend. The charity which flowed from his table to his gate, was extremely magnified, by the manner of bestowing it: It reached to the souls, as well as bodies of the poor; and naturally led them to a grateful remembrance of their Maker, when they saw so lively an image of him, in one of his most faithful stewards. His delight in private charities could not be well concealed; but the measures of his bounty in that way, are a secret only known to Him, who shall one day reward them openly. In his chapel and devotions, he was so intent, and abstracted from the world, that the duty looked more like pleasure and enjoyment: And such an unaffected humility and holy ardor accompanied his daily offering of our most excellent Liturgy, that it sensibly diffused itself through all, who had the advantage of praying with him. In his Province and Diocese, he acted with all that wholesome, but gentle authority, which became the spiritual father of the clergy and laity. He so far united those two orders in affection and love for each other, which their first institution plainly tended to promote, that they often joined together, to give publick marks of their high esteem and veneration for him; and of the irresistible force and influence which his example had upon them, to compel them to love and unity. He was constant in his Residence, regular in his Visitations; and by his steady and uniform adherence to the rules and ordinances of the Church, accompanied with a true Christian humility and gentleness, he regained all that authority and regard for the Episcopal function, which is one of the distinguishing marks of the primitive purity of Religion. No man had a more tender concern for the Reformed Interest abroad, nor more careful to preserve the beauty and order of the Church of England; that it might be a standing pattern for all other Protestants. That Discipline, whose decay he often lamented, and tried in some measure to restore, appeared truly reforming and medicinal under his government; and wherever the Canon was invalid, the ends of it were answered by the force of his Example. In the Senate, his opinion and judgment were of the greatest weight, and his Veracity and Sincerity have never been called in question. He spake with all imaginable clearness and solidity upon the most important subjects; and very seldom or never entred into any debates, which turned altogether upon private pique or interest: But he saw at once through the merits and tendency of every cause, which any ways affected the constitution in Church and State; of which he was a consummate judge, and an-unalterable friend to both.—He had the advantageous misfortune of presiding in the Church, for many years of trouble and disorder; in which time, he had frequent opportunities of giving proofs of his unshaken zeal and integrity, whenever any Innovations were attempted against Religion in general, or the Church of England and his own order in particular. His conduct before the Revolution, shewed him to be a strenuous opposer of the Idolatry and Corruptions of the Church of Rome; and his behaviour, both at, and after the Revolution, made it apparent, how just a sense he had of that deliverance, when he promoted every thing, which tended to the restoration and establishment of the Constitution, that had before been lessened and invaded; and as bravely opposed every thing which tended to a further change and alteration in our Laws and Religion (18).—To which must be added, in his further commendation, That he was a most excellent Governour, brought the Prebendaries in his Cathedral of York, and Colleges of Southwell and Rippon, to strict residence; and that they might be the better disposed thereto, he made it his unalterable practice always to elect them out of such as lived in his Diocese, and had recommended themselves by doing their duties in their respective Parochial Cures: By which means no Cathedral in England was better attended by Clergy, and the service more regularly performed than at York; or the Ministers of small livings, in any diocese, more encouraged to attend their charge; because this good Bishop would reward their diligence by such compensations, more especially those in York city, on whose conduct the world had a more especial eye.—He likewise very much repaired the Collegiate Church at Southwell (19).

(17) Le Neve, p. 284. and Memors, &c. as above.

(18) Annual List, &c. at the end of Boyer's Hist. of Queen Anne, fol. Lond. 1735, p. 64. and the Examiner of Feb. 12, 1713.

(19) Survey of the Cathedral of York, &c. by Br. Willis, Esq; p. 60, 61.

(y) Idem, Annual List, &c. p. 64.

(z) Memoirs, &c.

heartily joined those many well-meaning persons, who zealously endeavoured to secure both (y): being sensible, at the same time, how much the great Council of the Nation exposed themselves, by taking notice of what was really below their notice. About the year 1712, he began to decline in his health, and going for the recovery of it to the Bath, he dyed there February the 2d, 1713-14, in the 69th year of his age: after having enjoyed the Archbishopric of York above two and twenty years, with the utmost honour and reputation (z). On the 16th of February he was interred in his own cathedral. His character is given below [S]. He was an excellent Preacher, and published several occasional Sermons; besides which, five new volumes of his Sermons have been printed since his decease [T].

[S] His Character, &c.] His general Character is thus given, by the same Author from whom we have borrowed the account already given of him in the last note.—‘ Archbishop Sharp had all the treasures of antient and modern Learning, which were necessary to render him a perfect master of Divinity, in its own main branches, Preaching and Controversy. He thought, and spoke, and wrote with inimitable clearness. In his person and behaviour, in the Church and the Senate, at his table and in his retirements, he gave all the natural and unaffected proofs of primitive uprightness and integrity: But to the honest plainness and simplicity of the Cypriatick age, he added all those refined graces and improvements of modern Erudition; which others assume to gain applause to themselves, and which He wholly employed in the propagation of truth, and the service of Religion. Nothing mean or trifling, sour or ill-natured, ever came from him; scarce from any body else in his presence. He was far from being of a retired Monastick temper; but had all that well grounded cheerfulness, that decent affability and humanity, which struck a lustre upon all his other Virtues, and made the imitation of him infinitely desirable and pleasing. As his Grace was the delight of all mankind; so all Mankind were his delight. His charity and bounty were large and extensive; and reached not only to whatever objects came in his way, but to all that he could find, by an industry free from ostentation. He had a publick spirit, immensely large and perfectly sincere; and a greatness of soul, sufficient to adorn the highest birth, and to proclaim the advantageous difference between the Roman and Christian honour and nobility. His generosity extended even to the relicts and descendents of good and worthy men; and became the happy instrument of Providence, in rewarding the posterity of religious and loyal ancestors. His continual exercise of this virtue vastly exceeded the intentional devotion of a thousand posthumous charities. He was accessible, complaisant, and courteous to a surprizing degree; and his good-nature made no difference in habits, fortunes, stations, and degrees. Pity and compassion seemed to be a part of his nature, and flowed directly from his heart. He might rather be said not to know what resentment was, than to stifle and suppress it. No man of a more forgiving temper, less acquainted with injuries, or better able to bear them. He perfectly understood the meaning and measures of Moderation; and left the world without excuse for quarrelling about the word, when they saw it so fully explained in his Grace’s life and conversation. He was just, equitable, and impartially good. His temperance was so great and exemplary, that his senses and bodily appetites bore no proportion to those of his mind; to that spiritual sensation, which was perpetually searching after the purest objects. His Understanding and Conscience were two great luminaries, moving together by unalterable concert; as remarkable for their purity and lustre, as for the order and steadiness of their courses. He loved truth, not with the vain curiosity and uncertain distrust of one who searches after it, but with all the delight and complacency of the wise happy man, who has found, and long enjoyed it. His word and promise were esteemed equivalent to the firmest securities (zo).’

(zo) Annual List at the end of Boyer’s History of Queen Anne, p. 63, 64.

We shall subjoin to this, the character given of our excellent Prelate, in his Epitaph, drawn by the elegant pen of Dr George Smalridge, Bishop of Bristol.

‘ Erat in sermone apertus, comis, affabilis,
In concionibus profluens, ardens, nervosus,
In explicandis Theologiæ casuisticæ nodis
Dilucidus, argutus, promptus:
In eximendis dubitantium scrupulis
Utcunque naturæ bonitate ad leniores partes aliquanto propensior,
Æqui tamen rectique custos semper fidissimus:
Primæva morum simplicitate,
Inculpabili vitæ tenore,
Propensa in calamitosos benignitate,
Diffusa in universos benevolentia,
Studio in amicos perpetuo ac singulari,
Inter deterioris sæculi tenebras emicuit,
Purioris Ævi lumina æquavit.
Tam acri rerum cœlestium desiderio flagrabat,
Ut his folis inhians, harum unice avarus,
Terrenas omnes neglexerit, spreverit, conculcarit.
Eo erat erga Deum pietatis ardore,
Ut illum totus adamaverit, spiraverit,
Illum ubique præsentem,
Illum semper intuentem,
Animo suo ac ipsis fere oculis observaverit.
Publicas hæc virtutes domesticis uberrime cumulavit,
Maritus & Pater amantissimus;
Et a conjuge liberisque impense dilectus, &c.

[T] And published several occasional sermons; besides which, Five new Volumes of his sermons have been printed since his decease.] His Sermons are comprized in Seven Volumes. The 1st Volume is a collection of such Sermons as his Grace had printed upon several occasions before the year 1698, being fifteen in number. The 2d Volume was published by his Bookseller after his death, and takes in the Remainder of his Sermons which were printed in his life-time; and his Two Discourses upon Conscience, which were formerly published without a name, and make part of the Collection of the London Cafes. These two Volumes contain all that he himself had suffered at any time to go abroad into the world.— In 1716, his executors published two Volumes more, consisting of Sermons never before printed. Of these, Vol. III. contains sixteen Casuistical Sermons preached on several occasions. And Vol. IV. eighteen sermons preached on several occasions.— In 1734, the Vth Volume was published, being Eight Discourses on several Subjects; with Four Sermons on the Imitation of Christ. The same year, came out the VIth Volume, being Nineteen Sermons on several Subjects. The VIIth and last Volume was printed in 1735, Containing his Grace’s Sermons against Popery: preached in the reign of King James II and other Papers wrote in the Popish Controversy.— ‘ So true and lively a spirit of Religion runs through all those Discourses, that they seem to be as much the dictates of the Author’s practice as of his understanding. And they will be ever admired, as the standard of good Preaching, so long as the English Tongue and the Protestant Religion remain in any degree of purity and perfection (21).’

C (21) Ibid.

SHEFFIELD [JOHN], Duke of Buckinghamshire, a nobleman of distinguished abilities both natural and acquired, was born in 1649 (a). After the death of his father, Edmund Earl of Mulgrave, which happened in 1658, the care of educating his son, then nine years of age (b), was committed to a governor. In the then distracted state of the publick affairs at home, that gentleman travelled into France with his pupil, who was so little satisfied with his tutor's conduct, as to dismiss him in a few years [A]; when the young Earl, finding himself deficient in several branches of learning, took up a noble resolution to supply that defect by his own industry [B]. And the sequel of these memoirs will in some measure shew, to what a degree of perfection he finished his design. However, intent as he was to compleat that task, his ardent thirst after military glory drew him early into action. In 1666, at the age of seventeen (c), he went a volunteer in the first Dutch war to sea [C]. A conduct so devoted to the service of his country, procured him the command of one of those independent troops of horse, which were raised the following year, to defend our coasts from the insults of that enemy. He remained in his quarters at Dover 'till the conclusion of the peace (d), when those troops were disbanded. Soon after which, at the next meeting of the Parliament in October, though so much under the age prefixed for voting in the House of Peers, he received a writ to sit there; which being rejected by the House on that account, he acquiesced not unwillingly, the heat of youth then inclining him more to the affairs of love and gallantry, which, by his own confession (e), he engaged in with too much eagerness, and even without interruption. However, he did not suffer his pleasures to depress or sink his genius, though he employed his Muse to heighten their relish [D], which in that view was far from being strictly chaste (f). These merits set him in high favour at Court; by which means he was very serviceable in procuring the Laureat's place, in 1668, for Mr Dryden [E], whom, as a brother poet, he

(a) In the Peerage of England. It is printed in 1636, the last figure being inverted by an error of the press.

(b) Character of the Duke of Bucks, p. 323. in the second volume of his Works, edit. 1740.

(c) Memoirs of himself, p. 4. in Vol. II. of his Works, in 2 vols 4to. 1723.

(d) The ratifications were exchanged Aug. 14. Salmon's Chron. Hist. p. 139.

(e) Memoirs, ubi supra, p. 8.

(f) His Ode on Love seems to be wrote in this interval.

[A] His Governor behaved in such a manner as to be amissid] We are told, that upon their arrival in France, the Governor, with great earnestness, cautioned his ward against kneeling, whenever he met the host in procession, exhorting him to avoid that compliance with the custom of the country, as an act of idolatry; that our young nobleman listened with attention to the charge, resolving to observe it. It was not long before they met such a procession, which happening to be in the dusk of the evening at the corner of a street, to avoid kneeling, he made his utmost efforts to slip into a shop, so suddenly, as to stumble over his governor, who had fallen on his knees, the moment that the host appeared. It would be idle to look any further for the cause of his losing all his governing authority. However, it is probable the pupil's uncommon share of good sense, would have prevailed so far, as to retain him for the advantage of his literary instructions, if he had not found him very faultily reminds in that part of his charge likewise (1).

[B] He supplied that defect by his own industry.] This was a rare instance of a manly strength of mind, and noble disposition, at his years, and with the additional lure of an ample fortune. It is said, he kept his tutor only two or three years (2); if so, he could not be above twelve years of age, when he took this resolution. 'Tis true, his rank and fortune gave him the advantage of conversing with the first geniuses of the age, which must set his own deficiency in literature in full glare before his eyes; and to this his resolution is ascribed. He could not but feel himself not their inferior in natural wit, and his spirit would not suffer him to be their inferior in acquired learning. It must not still be denied, that he had the further allurements of heightening his pleasures, by that result of his undertaking; and, both from the general dissolute turn of the wits at that time, and from the use our wit made of it afterwards, it is evident that this motive had no small share in determining him to shut himself up, as we are told he did, for several hours every day, not only from his acquaintance, but from his pleasures too.

[C] He went a volunteer in the first Dutch war to sea.] He informs us himself, that he was particularly incited to take this course, by hearing the Earl of Oxford every where commended for being a volunteer in a hot engagement at sea (3). Besides the general spur of glory, that Earl was his relation (4), and perhaps the most deserving young nobleman of the age. Fired by this example, he went directly on board that ship, which Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle jointly commanded in the fleet against the Dutch; and as a storm prevented our volunteer from seeing any action, he entertains us with the following story of the Duke of Albemarle's behaviour. After setting up the bloody flag, Mr Henry Saville and himself being on the quarter deck, spied the old man charging a very little pistol, and put it into his pocket. It seems, he had often said he would answer for nothing, but that they should never be carried into Holland. This being remembered, our two volunteers presently imagined, he had made a resolution to go down into the powder-room, and blow up the ship, in case at any time it should be in danger of being taken. In this opinion, they both in a laughing way most mutinously resolved to throw him over board, in case they should ever catch him going down to the powder-room (5). Our author regretted his own disappointment in the separation of the fleets, which hindering any engagement, he complains very gallantly, that he lost six weeks time at sea, at an age when it might be a great deal more pleasantly spent. He calls this the last year of the Dutch war (6), because a treaty of peace was agreed upon before the expiration of it, and the two fleets never engaged afterwards, though the Dutch burnt some of our best ships at Chatham, in June 1667, and were driven in July from a second attempt by Sir Edward Sprag (7).

[D] He employed his Muse to heighten the relish of his pleasures.] Several of his poetical pieces were written in this interval, between the first and second Dutch wars, as may be gathered from the following quotation from Tully, applied with proper alterations to his Lordship by Mr Dryden, in the dedication to his tragedy of Aurengzebe, written in 1676. De ipsis rebus autem sæpenumero Brute vercor, ne reprehendar, cum hæc ad te scribam, qui tum in Poësi tum in optimo genere Poëseos tantum profeceris; nec ut ea cognoscas quæ tibi notissima sunt ad te mitto, sed quia te habeo æquissimum eorum studiorum quæ mihi tibi communia sunt, æstimatorem & judicem.

[E] He was very serviceable in procuring the Laureat's place for Mr Dryden.] This Laureat had probably been among those early acquaintance of wits, who had fired the Earl's emulation, beforementioned. We find the former, in 1676, mentioning his friendship with the latter, in terms which import it was then of a long standing. 'After which,' continues Dryden, in acknowledging his favour for the Laureat's place, 'I am sure you will more easily permit me to be silent in the care you have taken of my fortune, which you have rescued, not only from the power of others, but from my worst of enemies, my own modesty and laziness (8).' It ought to be remembered, to the Earl's honour, that he kept his friendship to the last; and the words which the Laureat here puts into the mouth of King Charles, as justly spoken of the Earl,

Ille meos primus qui me sibi junxit amores
Abtulit. Ille habeat secum servetque sepulchro,

(1) Character of the Duke of Bucks, p. 324. in his Works, Vol. II. edit. 1740, 8vo.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Memoirs, p. 4.

(4) See his Pedigree, in his Works, p. 349.

(5) Memoirs, p. 6.

(6) Ibid, p. 7.

(7) General Histories of England.

(8) Dedication of Aurengzebe.

he had taken into his particular friendship. In this interval, too nice a sensibility in the point of honour, engaged him in a very singular quarrel with Wilmot the witty Earl of Rochester [F]. At the breaking out of the second Dutch war, in 1672, he went again to sea, a volunteer under the Duke of York [G], and behaved so gallantly [H], at the famous battle of Solebay, that immediately upon his return to London, the King gave him the command of the Royal Katharine [I], the best second rate ship then in the Navy, a favour the praise of which, he declares, there needed no inspiration to foresee how well his Lordship would deserve, may be justly put into his Lordship's mouth with regard to the Laureat himself; for whom he testified his entire respect, by erecting a handsome monument in Westminster-abbey, at his own expence, in memory of this friend, not long before his own death.

[F] He had a quarrel with Wilmot Earl of Rochester] Being informed that the Earl of Rochester had said something maliciously of him, he immediately sent a mettled friend of his, Colonel Aston, with a challenge. Wilmot denied the words; and though our challenger was soon convinced his suspicion was false, yet he foolishly thought the meer report obliged him to go on with the quarrel. Since it could not be avoided, Wilmot chose to fight on horseback, and accordingly met our hero next morning at the place appointed; but instead of one Mr Porter, whom he assured Aston he would make his second, he brought an errant life-guard-man, whom no body knew. Mr Aston taking exception to this, especially on account of his being so much better mounted than they, they all agreed to fight on foot. 'But, continues our author, as Lord Rochester and I were riding into the next field, in order to it, he told me, that he had at first chosen to fight on horseback, because he was so weak with a certain distemper, that he found himself unfit to fight at all, much less on foot.' At this, which was deemed a plain confessing himself a coward, his antagonist, whose anger was appeased by the discovery of the falseness of the charge which had kindled it, pushed him upon the consideration of the necessity there would be, in case they should not fight, of clearing his own character, by telling the truth of the matter. Wilmot submitted to the condition, hoping his challenger would not desire the advantage of having to do with any man in so weak a condition. 'I replied, continues our author, that by such an argument, he had sufficiently tied my hands, upon condition I might call our seconds to be witnesses of the whole business; which he consented to, and so we parted.' Mr Aston, on their return to London, wrote down every word and circumstance of the whole that had passed, and dispersed it abroad; which being never in the least either contradicted or refuted by Lord Rochester, entirely ruined his reputation as to courage*. So says our author; and the several challenges which were sent to that Lord afterwards, together with his behaviour on those occasions, are a full proof of the truth of the fact in general. However, it cannot escape the reader's notice, that the Earl of Mulgrave condemns himself, at least equally with his antagonist, in this affair in particular (9).

[G] A volunteer under the Duke of York.] The Earl never omitted an opportunity of shewing his regard to the Duke of York, and takes particular satisfaction in mentioning that Duke's kindness to him; yet he confesses, he went not now with half so good a will as before, his heart being engaged violently at this time, so that he could never forget the tenderness of the parting from his love (10). This last expression shews it was at this time that he wrote his Letter from Sea †, which concludes thus:

Remember all those vows between us past,
When I from all I value parted last;
May you alike with kind impatience burn,
And something miss 'till I with joy return.
And soon may pitying heaven that blessing give,
As in the hopes of that alone I live.

After reading these lines, we shall easily believe him, when he tells us, he made all the haste imaginable to return to London, for reasons not hard to guess (11).

[H] He behaved gallantly] It is entertaining enough to observe the several passages in his memoirs, where this behaviour is insinuated. First, he acquaints us with his accepting Lord Ossory's invitation to be aboard his ship, and afterwards, says he, 'I found I could not have been any where else so well, on several accounts, since no man ever did more bravely than he on all occasions (12).' Thus animated by the example of both a kinsman and a friend, he suggests the effect it had, as follows. After taking notice, that, upon retiring from the fight, the whole French-squadron sailed close by the Lord Ossory's ship, 'I well remember, says he, there did not appear so many shot in them all, as in his Lordship's single ship, whose condition therefore was judged too bad to keep the sea any longer (13).' Here he is only included among the ship's company, but what follows relates to his own particular share of the work. 'I found then by experience how much there is of custom in the matter of courage, which makes old troops so formidable; for in the morning, when the enemy's shot came on both sides of us, I thought it impossible to escape, without losing a limb at least, and was accordingly pretty uneasy; but about the afternoon, when the broad-sides came only one way, though without interruption, I began to grow a little less sensible of the danger, which yet I was very glad to see ended at night. By that time I was very sufficiently tired, but had much ado to sleep, by reason of the noise still sounding in my ears, which remained so for some hours, just as if the shooting had still continued.' This last period is very express, but yet in such terms, as put not the exactest modesty to the blush. The image of the noise still sounding in his ears, unavoidably calls to our minds the contrast to it, in the much admired lines of the eighth book of Milton's Paradise Lost.

The Angel ended, and in Adam's ear
So charming left his voice, that he a while Thought him still speaking, still stood fixt to hear.

We shall here take notice of a mistake in Milton's Life prefixed to his prose works, where the author tells us, that the Duke of Bucks, in his Essay on Poetry, prefers both Tasso and Spenser to Milton (14). The lines referred to are in the conclusion of that Essay, where, in describing the arduous task of writing an heroic poem, he observes, the Muse who makes such an attempt,

Must above Tasso's lofty flights prevail,
Succeed where Spenser and ev'n Milton fail.

Where this last is distinguishly preferred to both the former, contrary to what the abovementioned author remarks.

[I] He had the command of the Royal Katharine.] The Earl we find was not wanting to himself in the point of his promotion in the Navy. On the contrary, he tells us, 'That he had made a request to that purpose, before the engagement at Solebay, to the Duke of York, and that he thought it a little hard to be denied. His request was, that if in the next engagement, his Highness perceived any ship to fail of doing it's duty, by reason of the Captain's being killed, which was but too usual, he would then send the Earl an order to go on board, and command her immediately; whereby, continues he, instead of being an insignificant Captain-volunteer, I might have an opportunity of doing the fleet some service, and gaining some honour.' However, he does not forget to turn this denial into a theme of founding the Duke of York's praises, observing, that though the Duke knew the fact, he had mentioned, well, and allowed the reason of his request, as the only way of making the volunteers useful, yet he counted it too great an alteration of the settled orders, which gave the Lieutenant, in such a case, that command his Captain before had, though seldom found to make a good use of it (15). He informs us afterwards, 'That during the engagement of Solebay, the Royal Katharine was once taken by the Dutch,

* Our author observes, he had a very good reputation for courage before.

(9) Memoirs, p. 8, 9, 10.

(10) Ibid. p. 12.

† In the first volume of his Works.

(11) Ibid. p. 17.

(12) Ibid. p. 12.

(13) Ibid. p. 16.

(14) Life of Milton, p. lix. edit. 1753, 4to.

(15) Memoirs, p. 13.

favour which was in the highest degree acceptable to him [K]. But, notwithstanding that, we find him, though at sea, the ensuing year, yet acting in the post, and with the commission, of a Colonel, having himself raised a regiment of foot to serve in the land forces, sent (with the fleet) under the command of Monsieur de Schomberg, with whom he now lived in a good degree of familiarity and friendship (g). These forces being set on shore in the summer, by the command of the Admiral, Prince Rupert [L]; while they lay encamped there, our Colonel, to the great mortification of [Schomberg] his General, was favoured by his Majesty with the promise of a blue ribband, and, upon his arrival at Court, was appointed Colonel of the old Holland regiment, joined to that of his own raising. By this means, he continued in commission after the peace, which was concluded before the expiration of the year (b), when all the other new Colonels were disbanded (i). Soon after his instalment into the order of the Garter, May the 29th, 1674, he was made Gentleman of the Bedchamber to his Majesty; but being still desirous to exercise and improve his military character, notwithstanding nature had formed him particularly for shining in a Court, he went into the French service, having obtained leave of King Charles to make a campaign under the celebrated Marshal de Turenne (k). About this time, he had some expectations of having the first regiment of foot guards; he depended upon the joint interest of the two Dukes of York and Monmouth [M], but

(g) Memoirs of King Charles II. p. 7 and 14. This General had been invited into England the year before. Ibid. p. 5.

(h) It was signed Feb. 9, and proclaimed 23, 1673-4. Salmon's Chron. Hist. p. 149.

(i) Memoirs of King Charles II. p. 15.

(k) The Marshal died shortly after in 1675. See Rapin's History of England, Vol. II. p. 678. col. 1.

was

Dutch, who had sent her Captain and most of her men on board other ships, a few only remaining there, whom they stowed under the hatches, with a guard over them: but the boatswain happening to be among these, with his whistle encouraged the rest to knock down all the centinels first, and then to fall on the Dutch above deck, by which brisk action they redeemed that considerable ship. The reader would scarce guess what sort of man he really was. His name was Small, whom, continues his Lordship, I had an opportunity of knowing well afterwards, when I had the command of the ship. He was a nonconformist, always sober, meek, and quiet, even too mild for that bustling sort of employment, and very often gave me an image of those enthusiastic people, who did such brave things in our late civil war. For he seemed rather a shepherd than a soldier, and was a kind of hero in the shape of a saint (16).'

(16) Ibid. p. 14, 15.

(17) P. 325. Where the same author tells us, the Duke often said, he was never so much delighted by any favour afterwards received from the Court, as he was at that early mark of distinction.

(18) Memoirs, p. 17, 18.

[K] Was very acceptable to him.] The writer of his character tells us he owed this step to the Duke of York (17). The Earl himself takes no notice of that favour, (which sure he would have scarce omitted if it were so) but attributes it wholly to my Lord Ossory, whose kind and partial letters had arrived at Court before him, when the King making some particular compliments, offered him his choice of commanding either the Henry or the Royal Katharine, he chose the latter, and declares he was extremely pleased with the command of a royal ship, better in all respects than my Lord Ossory's, and, continues he, of a rate above what I could have expected; for even he who was so much more considerable on all accounts, had only a third rate ship granted him at first; whereas the Katharine was then the best of all the second rates (18).

[L] By order of Prince Rupert.] The whole forces both sea and land were commanded in chief by that Prince with the title of Generalissimo. We have the following account of the quarrel betwixt the land and sea commanders, which occasioned this order of the latter, whereby the land forces lay idle at Yarmouth, without doing any thing the whole summer. It seems Monsieur Schomberg, by the advice of our volunteer, and the consent of the Captain of the ship where he was, had hung up in the shrouds one of the colours of our Colonel's regiment, as a signal for the land officers to know the ship where their General was, chusing this as more proper for him than any of those which belonged to the sea. But it had not been set up half an hour, when sitting with the Colonel on the quarter-deck, a bullet was heard whizzing over their heads, which was presently followed by another. Upon this they began to think cannon bullets that came so near a little worth the minding, and were surprized to perceive they came from the Admiral. All agreeing this was done to express his dislike of the signal, Clement, Captain of the ship, was dispatched to explain the reason of it. The prince had sent his Lieutenant Whitley with his positive command to pull down the flag. But he arriving on board the Greyhound just after Captain Clement had left it, Whitley was desired to return with this answer, that if his Highness continued in the same mind, after hearing the occasion from Clement, the flag should be taken down immediately. The Prince seeing Whitley's boat come from the Greyhound, and the flag not taken down, and Captain Clement just arrived on board him, in great anger ordered him to be clapt into the bilboes, without so much as hearing either him or his message, and commanded the gunner to sink the Greyhound immediately, if the flag was not taken down. In this extremity, the volunteers of quality * on board the Prince having asked leave, were connived at by him in going to the Greyhound, where they found it easy to persuade them to pull down their flag, rather than be sunk; but all together were not able to pacify the General, who interpreted all this proceeding to come from an old pique in Prince Rupert, who he said was otherwise too well bred to use an old acquaintance and a foreigner in such a brutal manner, as he called it (19).

[M] Joint interest of the Dukes of York and Monmouth.] The scheme was, to persuade the King to buy Russel the Colonel out of it, for this purpose, having before prevailed with Lord Craven, who commanded the second regiment to let our Earl come over his head. But all was quashed by the Earl's unluckily discovering, in the interim, some amour of the Duke of Monmouth, who by way of revenge privately obtained a promise of the King to have that command himself, and that his own should be given to the Earl of Ossory. Accordingly upon the Duke of York's application for the Earl of Mulgrave to his Majesty, he told his brother he had already promised it to the Duke of Monmouth. Our author having his pretensions thus blown up by the sly management of that Duke, his pretended friend, scrupled not to return him the like good office by undermining him with the Duke of York; to whom he represented, that as the Duke of Monmouth's own command of the horse life-guards was better than Colonel Russel's regiment of foot both for honour and profit, he would hardly change it thus without some ill design, to which twenty-four companies of foot might be more useful than a single troop of horse; that disappointing of the Earl of Mulgrave was not his only aim, since he might have had that satisfaction entirely by getting the Earl of Ossory into that regiment. In fine, when no other method would do to satisfy his revenge in keeping the Duke of Monmouth out of this regiment, the Duke of York by his advice persuaded Colonel Russel not to sell †.

Our author makes it a great merit in him to have given occasion to the animosity between these two Princes, and infusing a jealousy of his nephew aspiring to the crown into the Duke of York, which he thinks probable might be the ground of his aiming to get this regiment of guards, which, says he, consisting of 2400 men was a great part of our little army, and was always kept together and quartered in London, when the other few regiments were separated into all the garrisons of England. This he thinks appeared sufficiently at the death of King Charles, when it had not been impossible for the Duke of Monmouth to succeed him, if he had then flourished in court at the head of so considerable a regiment, which by our author's management he never got possession of, being in disfavour at the time of the Popish plot, when Russel renewed his desire to sell, the King then giving that command to his other natural son the Duke of Grafton (20). How far, and in what manner, the Earl of Mulgrave carried

* Among these volunteers was the Earl of Carlisle, a Privy-Counsellor, and a great friend of the Prince's.

(19) Memoirs of Charles II. p. 25, 26, 28. in the second vol. of our author's Works, edit. 1740.

† As Russel was covered, this was effected probably by the charm of money.

(20) Memoirs of Charles II. p. 33 to p. 39.

(1) He likewise kept the old Holland regiment, which made him easy. Memoirs, p. 28.

was disappointed by the latter; upon whose disgrace, however, in 1679, the Earl was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of the county of York, and Governor of Hull, in his room (1). The same year, he wrote his piece, intituled, The Character of a Tory [N]. And the next year, he gave a signal proof of his loyalty, in commanding the forces (m) ordered for the relief of Tangier; having voluntarily offered his service for that command, his honour would not suffer him to recede, notwithstanding he apprehended a design against his life [O], by the appointment of a ship to convey him, which the Captain often declared to be in a condition not able to endure the voyage. But he survived the danger [P], and returning carried his resentment to his Majesty on this disappointment, is represented in the dedication of Aurengzebe, where Mr Dryden takes notice of 'his Lordship's great and manly contempt of popular applause, and his retired virtue then shining only to a few, with whom, continues he, you live so easily and freely, that you make it evident you have a soul which is capable of all the tendernefs of friendship, and that you only retire from those who are not capable of returning it. — From this constancy to your friends, I might reasonably assume, that your resentments would be as strong and lasting, if they were not restrained by a nobler principle of good-nature and generosity; for certainly it is the same composition of mind, the same resolution and courage, which makes the greatest friendships and the greatest enmities *.'

(m) A detachment of 2500 of our best troops. Jacob's Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 180. It was besieged by the Moors. Rapin, Vol. II. p. 716. fol. edit.

* Mr Dryden is generally said to have lent a helping hand in this piece.

It was during this little ill humour that his Essay on Satire was written, in which he has inserted the following remarkable lines.

Nor should the royal mistresses be nam'd,
Too ugly or too easy to be blam'd,
With whom each rhyming fool keeps such a pother,
They are as common that way as the other.
While sauntering Charles betwixt so mean a brace,
Meets with dissembling still in either place,
Affected humour or a painted face. }
In loyal libels we have often told him,
How one has jostled him, the other fold him.
How that affects to laugh, and this to weep,
But who so long can rail as he can keep?
Was ever Prince by two at once misled,
Foolish and false, ill-natur'd and ill bred.

[N] The character of a Tory. The whole title is, The character of a Tory, in answer to that of a Trimmer, written at the same time, but never printed. This piece presents us with a full and distinct view of his Lordship's state-principles. We see here how little credit he gave to the Popish-plot, which he expressly calls a pretended one. He appears in defence of a standing-army, and even of the King's dispensing power; yet he is not so absurd as to vindicate an absolute passive obedience, or a slavish non-resistance; but asserts the legality of resisting, when the public welfare risques less in attempting the change, than it suffers from the abuse of the sovereign power. Upon the whole I suppose it will not be denied, that if he had the worst side of the argument, yet he supports it with a much genteeler spirit than his adversary can pretend to, whose affected quaintness and incessantly flashing witty conceits are turned against himself, being first set to a much finer and more delicate edge. We shall give one instance. 'Another fallacy, says he, is endeavoured to be put upon us, by shewing the great limitation a King lies under, and the extraordinary lessening of his authority, when once he engages for one part of his people towards the destruction of another, which our Trimmer calls sinking from a great monarch into the head of a faction, and therefore he is extremely troubled for such a diminution of his prince's power. Now I confess this appears to me, just as if a highway-man overtaken by a hue and cry should stand at bay, and thus pretend to wheedle the pursuing constable. What! will you reverend magistrates (for it is time to give good words), who are intrusted by the nation with the public peace and tranquillity, and therefore are not only strengthened with ample power, but adorned with staves of authority. What? will you be thus partial to these witnesses, to these shabby fellows who pretend to be robbed, as to follow us who never saw your faces before? This is making yourself the head of a pursuing rabble, who one day

'perhaps may be indicted of a riot for so abusing us. — I need not apply the comparison because the thing speaks itself.' What follows not only gives us the best idea, and conveyed in the most easy and engaging image, not only of this, but in general of all party disputes whatever, in which 'tis manifest each man means chiefly if not solely himself, and the furthering of his own interest. 'Whereas, continues he, our Trimmer * blames people for so monopolizing a Prince's favour, that a poor Trimmer can get none of it, I confess 'tis true, but methinks not very strange. I allow his simile to hold good, that not only these gentlemen [the ministry] but any other men in the world, even Trimmers themselves, would engross the sunshine with the hazard of being burnt, in case there were not enough of it for every body. And for my part, though 'tis a great fault in mankind, I cannot but charitably forgive it, because I am one of that race myself, and bad is the best of us, Whig, Tory, and Trimmer (21).'

[O] He apprehended a design against his life. We are told, that some of the Earl's enemies at court took an opportunity to put King Charles out of humour, by malicious stories of him, relating to some ladies in whom his Majesty was not unconcern'd. That by this and other contrivances all the good ships were otherwise employed, and that when his Lordship represented the unsafe condition of the ship appointed for him, both the Admiralty and the King assured him the ship was safe enough, and that no other could be got ready time enough for his expedition; so that the point being reduced to a struggle between his honour and his life, he preferred the former, and resolved, contrary to the advice of his friends, to venture his life; but at the same time advised several volunteers of distinction to wave the voyage, their honour not being equally concerned. That two days after they set sail, the ship leaked in so many places, that notwithstanding the carpenters on board, they owed their safety to the pumps all the remainder of the voyage, which by the advantage of very fine weather they finished in three weeks. That arriving at Tangier, they met Admiral Herbert, afterwards Earl of Torrington, who lifted his hands and eyes in amazement of their having performed such a voyage in a ship which he had sent home as unfit for service (22). While he was at sea, we find he wrote a poem called The Vision, where though the tender passion is touch'd with his usual delicacy, yet 'tis cast in such a gloomy form as is not common to his Lordship's muse, and therefore may well be thought to be inspired by the sensibility of his present danger, very different from that to the same lady from sea already mentioned. The following lines, with which this piece concludes, are an exact specimen of the temper of the whole, and will both explain and evince the truth of our remark.

The Spirit then reply'd to all I said,
She may be kind, but not 'till thou art dead.
Bewail thy memory, bemoan thy fate,
Then she will love, when 'tis alas too late.
Of all thy pains she will no pity have,
'Till sad despair has sent thee to the grave (23)

[P] He returned with triumph. The Earl it seems obtained this success cheap enough, for the Moors retired at the first approach of the English army. However, as the enemy had been long very troublesome, and had occasioned great sums to be expended in fortifying the place (24), which was part of Queen Katharine's portion; our general examined the works, attended with proper officers and engineers, who all agreed the place could not be put into a good condition of defence without a vast charge, especially considering how much the Moors had been improved in cannon of late.

He

* Savile, afterwards Marquis, then Earl, of Halifax, was the author of The Trimmer, and the greatest stickler against the Exclusion-bill. See some account of him in Sherburne's article, remark [D].

(21) Character of a Tory, p. 65 to 67.

(22) Character of the Duke of Bucks, p. 326 to 328.

(23) The second volume of his Works.

(24) The mole cost 500,000 l. Jacob's Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 181.

returning from the expedition, crowned with success, and his Majesty, not long after, returned likewise to his usual good-nature. This melting away all the Earl's resentment [Q] and chagrin, immediately revived that hearty respect which had continually glowed in the breast of this subject, who remained ever after in high favour with that Prince (n), 'till by his death the Crown devolved upon the head of his brother. By this change, what had before been the Earl of Mulgrave's dutiful allegiance, became now his ardent affection. He had never known King Charles any other than his sovereign, a circumstance that naturally creates somewhat of a distant awe to the most gracious princes; but he had long before lived in a state of familiar friendship [R] with the Duke of York, which therefore as naturally grew into the most affectionate attachment to King James the Second; upon whose accession to the throne, he was immediately sworn of the Privy-Council, and the 20th of October following, was appointed Lord-Chamberlain of the Household. His sincere zeal for his master carried him even so far, as to take a seat in the Ecclesiastical Commission [S]. It was this personal regard likewise, that urged him to oppose all such imprudent

(n) Character of the Duke, p. 9.

He staid a sufficient time to be assured, there could be no other attempt made that year, after which he returned home with this account, and in 1683 Lord Dartmouth was sent with a fleet to blow up all the works, and choak up the mole (25)

[25] All the Earl's resentment] We have a remarkable instance to what a height he carried it during the passage to Tangier. Among the volunteers who had a design of accompanying him, some desisted by his persuasion, but others having spoken their intention to go with him, thought their honour concerned in keeping their word. Among these was the Earl of Plymouth, a natural son of King Charles (26), who 'tis said likewise entered heartily into his General's cause. They had been a fortnight at sea, when one of the company observing his Majesty's health had never once been proposed at the General's table, took the liberty of hinting it to him as an omission occasioned through forgetfulness, especially considering a son of his Majesty sat there every day. The General answered he knew it very well, but must first get out of his rotten ship, before he could make that health go merrily round (27).

[R] He had lived in great familiarity with the Duke of York.] Both his memoirs and his account of the Revolution are so full of expressions of that kind, that one is apt even to think that the pleasure of that part was the principal motive to the writing of them. But there is one passage more conspicuous than the rest, which is related by him as follows. In speaking of the several causes which concurred with the Duke of Monmouth's ambition, he says, 'There was yet one thing more that much contributed to that young man's advancement, I mean the great friendship which the Duke of York had openly professed to his wife, a Lady of wit and reputation, who had both the ambition of making her husband considerable, and the address to succeed in it by using her interest in so friendly an uncle, whose design I believe was only to convert her. Whether this familiarity of theirs was contrived or only connived at by the Duke of Monmouth himself, is hard to determine. But I well remember that after these princes had become declared enemies, the Duke of York told me with some emotion, as conceiving it a new mark of his nephew's insolence, that he had forbidden his wife to receive any more visits from him. To which I could not forbear frankly replying, That I, who was not used to excuse him, yet could not hold from doing it in that case, wishing his Highness might have no juster cause to complain of him (28).' We have already observed, that our author makes himself the cause of the breach between these two Dukes, which he tells us was of the highest importance to King James's safe succession to the crown; this breach taking it's rise from an intrigue of our Earl with one of the Duke of Monmouth's mistresses (29).

[S] A seat in the Ecclesiastical commission.] As this was one of the illegal steps taken by his master, he was in some danger of smarting for it after the Revolution; in which juncture he had the good fortune to find a friend, where perhaps he least expected it, in Dr Tillotson, then Dean of Canterbury, who most generously interceding in his behalf, procured his pardon. In return for so noble an act of goodness, he thought himself obliged to write and print the following letter to that Dean.

VOL. VI. No. 305.

' Sir,

' Nothing in this world is or ought to be so dear to any man of honour as his reputation, and consequently the defence of it is the greatest obligation that one man can lay upon another. There are also some circumstances that render this obligation more acceptable and valuable, as when it is conferred generously, without any self-interest, or the least desire or invitation from the person so defended. All this happens to be my case at this time, and therefore I hope you will not be surprized to find, I am not the most ungrateful and insensible man living; which certainly I should be, if I did not acknowledge all your industrious concern for me about the business of the ecclesiastical commission, which now makes so much noise in the world. You have, as I am told, so cordially pleaded my cause, that it is almost become your own. And therefore unwilling as I am to speak of myself, especially in a business which I cannot wholly excuse; yet I think myself now a little obliged to shew, that my part in this matter, though imprudent enough, yet is not altogether unworthy of so just, and so considerable an advocate.

' The less a man says for himself the better, and it is so well known already, with what great care I was sometimes excluded from knowing the most important designs of the Court, that I need not justify myself or trouble you as to those matters, only I appeal to the unquestionable testimony of the Spanish Ambassador, if I did not zealously and constantly take all occasions to oppose the French interest, because I knew it directly opposite both to the King's and kingdom's good, which are indeed things inseparable, and ought to be so accounted, as a fundamental maxim in all councils of princes.

' This, I hope, will prepare the way a little for what I have to say concerning my being one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of which error I am now as sensible as I was at first ignorant, being so unhappily conversant in the midst of a perpetual court flattery, as never to have heard the least word of any illegality in that Commission, before I was unfortunately engaged in it.

' For though my Lord of Canterbury had very prudently refused to be of it, yet it was told us at court, by the King himself, that his refusal proceeded only from his unwillingness to act at that time, and not from any illegality he suspected in the Commission, having excused himself from it in the most respectful way, only upon the account of his age, and the infirmities he lay under. Being thus ignorant of the laws, and in such a station at Court and Council, I need not desire a man of your judgment and candour, to consider the hardness of my case, when I was commanded to serve in a commission with a Lord Chancellor, a Lord Chief Justice, and two Bishops, who had all of them acted some time already, without shewing the least diffidence of their power, or any hesitation in the execution of it. And perhaps a man of more discretion than I can pretend to, might have been easily persuaded to act in such a conjunction, and to think he might do it safely, both in law and conscience; but I need not say much to shew my desire of avoiding, if possible, a troublesome commission, that had not the least temptation of honour or profit to recommend it, and in which therefore, you know, I continued on no account in the world, (25) See the Life of Admiral Leake, p. 54. edit. 1751. The Admiral's father was chief engineer on this occasion.

(26) Besides him, the two Lords, Mordaunt and Lumley, went also volunteers. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1683.

(27) Character, p. 328. He returned in a strong man of war, which was ordered by Admiral Herbert.

(28) Memoirs of Charles II. p. 12. 4to. edition.

(29) Ibid. p. 14.

imprudent steps, which it was foreseen must unavoidably lead to the ruin of that unfortunate Prince (o) [T]; and the same personal regard kept him at a great distance, from having any share in those counsels, where the measures were concerted for bringing about the Revolution [U]. In establishing the new settlement of the Crown, he yielded to the exigency

(o) See his letter to Dr Tillotson, in the preceding remark [S]. He was one of the twenty seven Peers, selected from the rest by Chancellor Jefferies, then Lord High-Steward, to try the Lord Delamere for high-treason, on January 14, 1685, when that Lord was unanimously acquitted. Peerage, Vol. II. p. 518. edit. 1741.

‘ world, but to serve both the King and Clergy with the little ability I had; in moderating those counsels, which we thought might grow higher, if I left my place to be filled by those who greedily waited for them, in order to their foolish designs. And since I have been forced to mention my good will at least, if not my service, to such learned men of the Clergy who I thought deserved it, it may be allowed me to give this one instance of it, that although in preferring men to all other places of the household, I ever used to ask permission first, (and accordingly was often refused for the sake of Roman Catholics and others, who were recommended by persons more in favour than myself) yet I was so careful of keeping that considerable part of the family unmixed with mean or unworthy chaplains, (whom others I feared would have imposed on his Majesty against his intention) that I constantly filled up those places, without giving him the least notice or trouble about it, and supplied them with the ablest approved Divines I could possibly find, most commonly recommended to me by those Bishops who were not of the Court. This I conceived to be the most proper course in a matter concerning Clergymen with a King of a different persuasion from theirs, and I intended it for his real service, believing it had been better for that unhappy Prince, as well as the kingdom, if the greater Ecclesiastical dignities had been disposed of by others with as much caution. And thus, Sir, I have endeavoured to confirm you in your favourable opinion of me, which must be acknowledged by every body to be an approbation of such weight, that as I hope it may be an example of authority to many, so it is sufficient of itself to ballance the censoriousness of others.

‘ I am,

‘ Sir,

‘ Your obliged humble Servant,

‘ MULGRAVE (30).’

(30) The Duke's Works, Vol. II. p. 123 to 128.

[T] He opposed the measures that led to the ruin of that Prince.] He declares that dislike of the King's measures in following the advice of the Roman Catholics, though at the same time to shew his reluctance to the dislike, he says it spread like an infection. This, says he, reached some of his Majesty's ministers themselves. The Earls of Mulgrave and Middleton never the least tainted with being either false or factious. Yet the first of them not only in execution of his office [Lord Chamberlain] assisted openly all the Protestant Clergy, but absented himself from all the councils, and both of them in their own justification took all occasions of deriding the ill advice of the Papists (31).’

(31) Account of the Revolution, Vol. II. p. 92.

[U] At a great distance from having any share in the Revolution.] Though his Lordship was vexed at the diminution of his salary, and utterly excluded from all power and favour by a few, and those the foolishlest of the Roman party; yet he was far from thinking these, or any other reasons, sufficient to excuse a desertion of his Majesty, of which he expresses the warmest abhorrence, and particularly that of his daughters; and because, says he, this extraordinary desertion of one daughter, as well as the other's sitting on the father's throne afterwards, must needs seem wonderful in two such Princesses, both of strict devotion, and many great virtues, posterity will be glad, perhaps, to have some further account of such unprecedented proceedings, in persons of so unblameable and of so illustrious a character. 'Tis very remarkable, that this Prince was so thoroughly unfortunate, as to be undone by his own children, and the more by their being bred up most carefully and religiously, and their being endued with all virtuous inclinations. These being first deceived by the indefatigable industry of some people, drew in a great part of the nation to be deceived, by the goodness of their disposition, and the nearness of their relation to the person accused: for who could suspect such daughters of wronging their father. It was infused into them severally, by the properest instruments that could be found, that their father was not only resolved to persecute the Protestant religion, but would stick at nothing in order to it; and therefore at once to prevent his eldest daughter's succeeding him, and to secure the throne after him to one of his own religion, he had contrived a supposititious son, who was to succeed, and settle that which his supposed father might not live long enough to fix sufficiently. And though the justice of his mind, and the tenderness of his nature were enough to disperse all such apprehensions, yet the zeal of the Popish religion was brought in to overballance all other considerations. All this was joined with the Prince of Orange's conjugal impositions on the most complying wife in the world, who was at last drawn into the dismal necessity of giving up either her husband, or a father resolved and ready (as she thought) to disinherit her. So that two worthy religious ladies, even because they were so, consented to dethrone a most indulgent father, and to succeed him boldly in their several turns, before an innocent brother then a child.

‘Tantum religio, &c.’

Our author excuses, after this, King James's general distrust of every body, intimates his own dissatisfaction, and even endeavoured afterwards to hinder him from going away. ‘Just as he was stepping into bed, continues the Earl, the night before his going away, the Earl of Mulgrave happened to come into the bed-chamber, which being at so late an hour, might possibly give the King some apprehensions of the world's suspecting his design, with which he was resolved not to trust him, nor any other Protestant whatsoever, he therefore stopt short, and turned about to whisper him in the ear, that his commissioners [the Earl of Halifax, &c.] newly sent him a very hopeful account of some good accommodation with the Prince of Orange; to which that Lord only replied with a question, asking if the Prince's army halted, or approached nearer London. The King owned they still marched on, at which the other shook his head and said no more, only made him a low bow with a dejected countenance, humbly to make him understand, that he gave no credit to what the King's hard circumstances at that time obliged him to dissemble.’ After the King's departure from London, when he was insulted and seized by the populace at Feverham in Kent, and had sent a poor country fellow with a letter to inform the Council of it, in order to procure his rescue, which was likely to come too late; the messenger having waited long at the council door; without any body's being willing to take notice of him; the Earl of Mulgrave happening to be privately advertised of it: The sad account moved him with great compassion, insomuch that no cautions of offending the prevailing party, were able to restrain him from shewing a little indignation at so mean a proceeding in the Council. Upon this their new President, the Marquis of Halifax, hastily adjourned it in order to prevent him. But my Lord Mulgrave earnestly conjured them all to sit down again presently, that he might acquaint them with a matter which admitted of no delay, and which he said was of the highest importance imaginable. Accordingly the Lords did so, when he represented to them what barbarity it would be in such an assembly to connive at the rabble's tearing in pieces any private gentleman, much more a great Prince, who with all his Popery, he asserted, was still their Sovereign. The messenger being called in, after giving them a moving account of the King's distress, delivered the letter (*). Whereupon the Council were prevailed with to send

* It had no superscription, and was to this effect. To acquaint the reader of it, that he had been discovered in his retreat by some fishermen of Kent, and secured at first there by the gentry, who were yet afterwards forced to resign him into the hands of an insulgent rabble.

exigency of the occasion [W], being fully persuaded, that the welfare of his country required such a conduct. In this view it was, that in the Convention Parliament, he both spoke and voted for the conjunctive sovereignty [X]. However, by that step he greatly obliged the Prince of Orange [Y], who had it much at heart to obtain this advantage over the Princess. The Earl had no employ under the new government for some years. May the 10th, 1694, he was created Marquis of Normanby in the county of Lincoln (p). But neither this testimony of King William's kindness, nor even a personal application, with very advantageous offers from his Majesty [Z], could prevail upon him to desist from exerting his utmost vigour, to procure and carry through both the Treason-bill, and that for establishing triennial Parliaments. He also opposed, with great zeal,

(p) Salmon's Chron. Hist. p. 210. col. 2. On the 31st of August, having made Mr Wafely his Chaplain, he sent Col. Fitzgerald to Dr Tillotson, to propose him for a Bishoprick in Ireland, which was refused by Queen Mary. Life of Tillotson, p. 335. edit. 1752.

200 of the Life guards, under their Captain, the Earl of Feverham, first to rescue the King from all danger of the common people, and afterwards to attend him towards the sea side, if he continued his resolution of retiring, which they thought it more decent to connive at than to detain him here by force. Upon the King's return to London, though he blamed all the Council, and among them the Earl of Mulgrave, for assuming what he called an illegal power of acting as they did. Yet he does not forget to mention two things very favourable to the King's private character. When the stout Earl of Craven, says he, resolved to be cut in pieces rather than resign his post at Whitehall to the Prince of Orange's guards; the King prevented that unnecessary bloodshed with a great deal of care and kindness: And amidst all that just apprehension of violence to his person, at the sudden entrance into his chamber, of the three Lords, [Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere] who ordered him from the Prince of Orange to retire, which he chose to do to Rochester; he disguised it so well as to discourse of the setting of the tyde, and other things relating to his removal, as coolly and unconcernedly, as if it had been only a common journey (32).

(32) Ibid. passim.

Some years after the Revolution, when King William told him on a particular occasion, 'That upon hearing his Lordship was not satisfied for some time before his predecessor left England with the measures then taken, a person, whom he had employed to consult and treat with those Lords who invited him to come over, proposed at one of their meetings to bring over Lord Mulgrave, and to communicate their design to him. Upon which the Earl of Shrewsbury said, If you do you will spoil all, he will never join with us. The King asking him with a smile, Pray, my Lord, what would you have done, if my agent had acquainted you with the whole business? Sir, said my Lord Mulgrave, I should have discovered it to the Master I served. The King replied, I cannot blame you? (33).

(33) Character, p. 331.

[W] He yielded to the exigency of the occasion.] No doubt but he included himself among those few persons, who, without intending any good to the Prince of Orange, thought it imprudent to stem a tide to no other purpose except their own ruin, and therefore rather resented that interest, which by their compliance they obtained both with the Prince and people, to secure the public good as much as possible, in a season when almost every body seemed to abandon it. After the King's first absconding, when the rabble had pulled down the house of the Spanish Ambassador, the Earl of Mulgrave, though his master was gone, and his staff laid aside, thought the honour of the nation so much concerned, that he presumed to take upon himself to order an apartment in Whitehall immediately, and a great table to be kept for him twice a day, with Yeomen of the Guard to attend at his outward room, (which they never do but on the King only) for which strain of authority, he tells us, he had the good fortune to be thanked, both by King James and the Prince of Orange.

After the King's last retirement, which our author calls a fatal step that lost him the crown, and was some lessening to the reputation he had before, when the reading of the King's last letter, (wherein he appealed to God and man against that flight forced upon him by so near a relation) was refused by the Council, looking on this as the clearest proof of the Lords intentions to exclude their King, he joined with all the rest, in agreeing that a Convention should be summoned, by circular letters in the Prince of Orange's name; and secondly, that the Prince should be desired to manage all public affairs, as well as the public moneys in the mean time. This was the first step which he took in favour of the Prince of Orange, and his motive for it, if we believe himself, was, that he might, by this compliance, have the greater influence and power in opposing the foolish designs of some of the old Whigs, who having long despaired of Court favour, were now, he says, transported with it, not only out of their old principles, but even out of their very senses also. What he remarks afterwards, has been confirmed since, 'that such a good opportunity was lost, of resetting our old constitution, as perhaps England is like never to have again; which, continues he, I do not observe with any regard to either of the two Princes in competition; but I only mean, that whichever Prince that Convention should set up, our liberties might have been secured, and the government fixed on the best and steadiest foundation, the united interest of King and people (34).' From this last period it appears, that he thought the throne was become vacant by the desertion of King James, and that the Convention had power to set either of the two competitors upon it, as they thought best.

[X] He voted for the conjunctive Sovereignty.] We are told, that some of his friends had heard him declare, he had the following motive for this step; that he thought the title of either person was equal, and since the Parliament was to decide the matter, he judged it would much better please the Prince, who was now become their Protector, and was also in itself a thing more becoming so good a Princess as Queen Mary, to partake with her husband a crown so obtained, than to possess it intirely as her own (35).

(34) Account of the Revolution.

[Y] He obliged the Prince of Orange.] In this step he left the church party, who were inclined to set up the Princess above her husband, and not only from his motives as declared to his friends, mentioned in the preceding remark, but what is related in remark [U] concerning the behaviour of the Princess of Orange, as only suffering the impositions of her husband, one can't help thinking that this vote was owing to his contempt and resentment of her conduct, and we may know from his own words, how much he paid his court to King William by it, who, he tells us, on this account grew jealous of his most intimate confidants among the English, because they had so much regard to his wife. However, the Earl was far from thinking this Prince in earnest, when he gravely endeavoured to make his friends believe, that he would leave them all in the lurch, by returning with his army into Holland, rather than yield the title to his own wife. He tells us the Princess was kept in Holland 'till he had mastered that dispute, which vexed him more than any other (36). If so, this reason of her staying in Holland was luckily favoured by the frost, and contrary winds after the thaw, which Bishop Burnet gives for the causes of that detention (37).

(35) Character, p. 330.

(36) Account of the Revolution, p. 118.

(37) History of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 820. folio edition.

[Z] A personal application from King William.] We have the following account of this application from the penman of his character. King William sent one day for the Earl, and after some little discourse, offered to give him an additional title, with an annual pension of 3000*l.* and to make him of the Cabinet-Council. The Earl gave him many thanks for his intended favours, and asked, with humblest submission, what his Majesty expected from him in return; adding, that he could not deny but that he was engaged in assisting those bills, which his Majesty did not at present approve of; he was sorry his Majesty did not, but whether he had the honour or not of serving him, he could not give them up, but must assist their success to his utmost ability (38).

(38) Character, as before.

[A A] He

the act which took away Sir John Fenwick's life. Yet so high was his reputation at Court, that the King took him into the Cabinet-Council, and gave him a pension of three thousand pounds a year (q). He received with pleasure all these marks of esteem that were paid to his distinguished abilities, though he never had any good liking for that Prince [AA]. But, as soon as Queen Anne came into the possession of the Throne, he entered into her service, with all the warmth of the most affectionate duty, which was accepted on her part with the truest sincerity. She gave him the Privy-Seal, April 21, 1702, just before her coronation, and presently after it, made him Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the north-riding of Yorkshire. In October following, he was also appointed one of the Commissioners to treat of an Union between England and Scotland; and, before the expiration of the year, was first created Duke of Normanby, March 9th, and then Duke of Buckinghamshire, the twenty-third of the same month (r). He was made too one of the Governors of the Charter-house this year. Yet he did not sit long easy in his present advantageous situation. He grew by degrees jealous of his rival the Duke of Marlborough, and not brooking the superior power of that favourite with his mistress, he threw up the Privy-Seal (s), entirely against her mind; so that, to remove his discontentment, and procure a reconciliation, she made him an offer of the Lord Chancellor's place, which was also refused by him (t). During this ill-humour, he suffered party-prejudice to transport him beyond the bounds both of his honour and good sense [BB]. Yet, in 1705, March 21 (u), the Queen readily admitted him to kiss her hand, (q) Character of the Duke, p. 13.

(r) Salmon, ubi supra, under the year 1702.

(s) When he brought it, the Queen desired him to take two or three days to consider; he took it, but the Queen sent for him the next day, and made him the offer of Chancellor.

(t) He was succeeded by the Duke of Newcastle, March 27, 1705. Salmon, for that year.

(u) Note (2), by Tindal, to p. 795. Vol. II. of Rapin's History of England.

[AA] He had no good liking for King William.] In his Feast of the Gods, the character of this Prince, bad enough in itself, is yet rendered more conspicuous, by contrasting it with the very amiable one of his predecessor, the Earl's favourite, King James, as follows. Another Prince [King James] lately deceased in exile, was censured also, yet with great compassion amidst all their [the Gods] mirth; because though he not only meant to govern well, but had talents capable of it, yet notwithstanding all that, he lost three kingdoms, merely for want of being wisely principled in his youth, and instructed that kings should indeed reverence the Gods, and appear decently devout, but never violently zealous for any thing, besides justice and the publick good; which virtue alone, without any other religion, is sufficient to make them heroes on earth, and advance them afterwards to be Demigods in Heaven. Then follows King William: All the Gods admired that odd mixture of which his successor was composed, so very lazy, heavy, and easily imposed on by Favourites, and yet so very ambitious and enterprising; which they attributed to the very different characters of his ancestors, who, on his mother's side, were only Sovereigns, (Henry the 4th of France excepted), but on his father's side such as deserved to be so.

Yet Jupiter himself shewed great esteem of him, but was suspected a little of some partiality on the account of his own proceedings with old father Saturn. He was observed also to kiss Ganymede all the while they were talking of this Prince, which made the Gods whisper to one another a little maliciously (39).

[BB] He acted against his honour and good sense.] He threw up the seals in March, and at the meeting of the new Parliament in November following, Lord Haverham moved the House of Peers, that the Princess Sophia might be sent for into England, as necessary to secure the succession in the House of Hanover. This motion was seconded by the Duke of Bucks and the Earls of Rochester, Nottingham, and Anglesea (40). A late author makes the following remark upon this extraordinary turn of affairs. 'The Tories, says he, very probably looked upon their cause as a party to be in a manner desperate, shut out of power both by a Prince and by Ministers, whom they had always looked upon as of their own principles. Their present situation was bad, the prospect was worse. The very measures they had taken to secure themselves in the good graces of the Queen, had given their opponents an opportunity to represent them as very cool towards the Protestant succession, if this opinion prevailed under the great disappointment of present expectations, they had the misfortune of seeing their hopes blasted as far as human foresight could reach. This it was, continues this author, which, in my poor opinion, determined them to act in the manner related. In which, like all exasperated parties, they forgot that the person against whom their rage was pointed, was their Mistress and their Queen: Some of them forgot more; they forgot the returns of gratitude, and the ties of nature. The Duke of Bucks, who made her the first compliment after her accession, in replying, when her Majesty said that the 8th of March, on which King William died, was a dull cloudy day; for all that, Madam, it is the finest I ever saw in my life, now lost all decency, and said in her hearing, that the Queen might become childish, do nothing of her own head, but be intirely passive under those in whose hands she was or might be (41). The writer of the Duke's character insinuates (42), tho' unwillingly, that he had opposed the Duke of Marlborough's settlement of 5000*l. per Annum* from the Post-Office, and 'tis certain that settlement was not carried 'till this very session, when the just-related motion in the House of Peers was seconded by the Duke of Bucks. 'Tis remarkable, that upon the dis-appointment he met with in the refusal of the first regiment of the foot-guards from the Queen's uncle Charles II. he passed the following censure: The King, says he, though of more wit than most of those who influenced him, had that foible of his family to be easily imposed on (43). He seems to have exercised his satirical genius at this time, as he had done when in a like fit of ill humour in 1675. The production was his last mentioned piece, The Feast of the Gods, in which he has the following severe and unmanly censure of Prince George of Denmark, the Queen's husband: 'They [the Gods] perceived another king hard by, much concerned for the loss of a brother, whom many years ago he had disposed of extremely well, yet nobody since ever heard one word of him. Momus laughing, said the good Prince was not quite dead, though forced to breathe hard to prevent being buried, because nobody perceived any other signs of life in him. Some of the Gods smiled, and said it would be well for the quiet of the world, if all Princes were as dull and insignificant (44). If what is related in a subsequent remark [EE] may pass for truth, that the Duke once aspired to marry the Princess Anne, it furnishes an additional incitement for this malevolent stroke against the Prince of Denmark, who must in that case be treated as (what is scarcely ever felt without rancour) a successful rival. Yet, after all, it may be placed to our author's account, by way of ballance to these enormous effects of pique and resentment, that it was at this same juncture that he penned his excellent Observations on the Statute of Treasons, where he has given such a proof of his judgment and penetration in a most difficult and important point of the Law, as will be a standing monument to justify her Majesty's offer made to him of the Chancellor's place. I can't help thinking but the consideration, as it served his own honour and reputation, was one motive for this exercise, as he calls it, of his thoughts. This conjecture seems to be confirmed (if we remember his Lordship's artful genius) by the concluding words of those Observations. 'I would not have communicated these rambling thoughts to any but a friend, nor to yourself neither, if among the several misrepresentations upon my resigning one great employment, and refusing a greater, you had not suspected me of a little laziness, from which I hope this way of employing my leisure may be some vindication, and I wish it does not prove a much greater, by shewing I needed

(41) Bolingbroke's Memoirs, p. 111, 112.

(42) P. 334.

(43) Memoirs, p. 34.

(44) Feast of the Gods, p. 193, 194.

(39) Feast of the Gods, p. 191, 192.

(40) General Histories of England.

hand, upon the marriage of his third wife, who was a natural daughter to King James the Second [CC]. During this recess from publick business, he finished his house in St James's park [DD], having before obtained a grant of the site of it from the Crown. The Duke continued out of employ 'till the general change of the ministry in 1710; in effecting which he had some share (w), and was presently made Lord Steward of the Household; whence he was advanced the following year to be Lord President of the Council (x). He joined in all the measures of that remarkable ministry [EE] (of which himself was a considerable part), excepting in the affair of the Catalans only, whose lives and liberties he thought too much exposed by that part of the plan of the peace of Utrecht; and he laboured heartily, though without success, to obtain a better security for that ill-fortuned people [FF], who had entirely relied on England for protection. Notwithstanding his disagreement with the Earl of Oxford in this particular, yet he continued his friendship to that minister after his disgrace; and though the Duke, in virtue of his post, became, on the death of the Queen, one of the Lords Justices for governing the kingdom (y) 'till the arrival of her successor in England; yet he never afterwards entered into any of the concerns at Court, and constantly opposed the steps pursued by the administration, spending some of his leisure hours in the most elegant manner with his Muse [GG]. In 1716, his lady brought him a son [HH], whom he left a child of nine years old (z) at his death, which happened February 24, 1720-21, at the age of seventy-one. His corpse

(w) Mr Harley communicated this project to him among others, as soon as he had brought it to a proper degree of maturation. Character of the Duke of Bucks, p. 17.

(x) Boyer's Hist. of Queen Anne, p. 476 and 514. edit. 1735, fol.

(y) Tindal's Continuation of Rapin's History, Vol. XIII. in this year, 1714.

(z) He was born January 11. Pedrage of England, Vol. I. p. 143.

(45) Observations on the State of Treasurers, p. 184.

(46) See his article.

(47) Account of the Duke's pedigree, p. 352.

(48) Character, p. 340.

(49) His Will, p. 364.

needed no other reason besides my disability, for not accepting the highest post in a profession I was never bred to, an honour too much to think any man fit for except a Lawyer (45.)

[CC] His third wife was a daughter of King James II] Her mother was Katharine Sedley, daughter to the ingenious Sir Charles Sedley (46). King James, by a warrant dated December 1683. dignified his daughter by her with the name of Lady Katharine Darnley, gave her the place of a Duke's daughter, and empowered her to bear the royal arms within a border Compose, Ermin and Azure, the Azure charged with Flower-de-lis of France, and for supporters, on the Dexter side, an Unicorn Ermine, his Horn, main, and hoofs, Or, accolloed with a Chaplet of Red Roses, barbed and seeded proper, and on the Sinister, a Goat Ermine, horned and hooped Azure, with a like Chaplet about his neck as has the dexter. She was left very young a widow by James Earl of Anglesey, from whom she was parted at her own suit, though the Earl long opposed it, by the unanimous consent of both Houses of Parliament, for the Earl's cruelty, and causeless ill usage of her. It was thought by some that his Lordship had a tincture of distraction, as was they said plain from his conduct to her. They lived together only one year (47).

His Grace was first married to Ursula, daughter of Colonel Stavel, and widow of Earl Conway. His second wife was Lady Catharine, eldest daughter to Fulk Greville, Lord Brooke, widow of Baptist Noel, Earl of Gainsborough, she died in 1703 4. His Grace had no issue by either of these ladies, to whom, we are told by several, he shewed but little deference (48), and indeed the natural children he had during these marriages, give but too much room to believe the truth of that censure. However his Grace makes a kind mention in his will of all his wives, declaring that 'he had had the most extraordinary blessing of three kind and excellent wives' He also desired to be buried near his second lady in Westminster-Abbey, and intimates, that he would have removed the corps of his first wife to the same grave, had she not lain near her own mother in the country (49).

[DD] He built his house in St James's Park.] In the description of this elegant edifice, he has given his brother Duke incidentally some account how he passed his time, which he declares was spent so for the most, as to be very conjugally at home, confessing himself to be changed enough as to his former delights, as to make his wife's company agreeable: so far he is explicit, no checks of infamy restrained him. He was now at least 59 years old. But in the preceding passage, where he says, that after dinner he drove again to Marybone for air and exercise, observing truly enough, that agitation of the body and diversion of the mind is a composition for health, above all the skill of Hippocrates, he could not be explicit; the diversion he chose for his mind would not bear shewing. However it is too well known to be concealed, and shall be admitted into these memoirs in the view of standing as a sea-mark to others, against that scandalous and penurious vice of gaming. It has been said, and never contradicted that I know of, that by this infamous conveyance, a good part of that garden which he speaks of as his chief delight in this letter, came into the hands of a person, who insultingly grazed his sheep and oxen close under his Grace's window. And, which is still more infamous, he even did not escape the censure of being a false gamester.

VOL. VI. No. CCCVI.

[EE] He entered into the Queen's service with all warmth of the most affectionate duty.] 'Tis said he had made his addresses to her in the way of love before her marriage with the Prince of Denmark. This is hinted by Mrs Manley, in the stile and manner of her Memoirs of the English Court (50). Mr Boyer also takes notice of it in his history of this Queen. Some years, says he, before the Queen was married to Prince George, the Marquis of Normanby, then Earl of Mulgrave, a nobleman of singular accomplishments both of mind and person, and of a plentiful fortune, aspired so high as to [attempt to] marry the Lady Anne. But though his addresses to her were checked as soon as discovered, yet the Princess had ever an esteem for him (51).

[FF] He laboured to obtain a better security for the Catalans.] He procured two Councils, in order to debate that matter before them, when it had been in a manner determined the other way, and when he saw his arguments over ruled, he was never observed to be so much troubled at the ill success of any business of his own (52).

[GG] He passed his leisure hours with his Muse.] Witness his Session of the Poets upon the choice of a Laureat in 1719, and those excellent lines on Mr Pope. 'Twas at this time also that he wrote his two Tragedies of Julius Cæsar, and the Death of Brutus; for the latter of which the just-mentioned Poet composed two Chorusses, which were set to Music by Signor Bononcini, and performed at Buckingham-House. Mr (now Bishop) Warburton, observes, that the two Chorusses were made at the request of the Duke, to adorn a very poor performance of his, and that they have the usual effect of all ill-adjusted ornaments, they make the meanness of the piece more conspicuous (53).

[HH] She brought him a son.] She had brought the Duke several children before this, as first a daughter, christned Sophia, who died very young, and two sons, to the first of which Queen Anne, as a God-mother, gave the name of John, who lived but three weeks; and the year after another son, called Robert, and stiled Marquis of Normanby, born December 11, 1711. On his death his father wrote a tender poem, which ends thus:

But why so much digression,
This fatal loss to shew,
Alas there's no expression
Can tell a Parent's woe.

After this there was another daughter, christened Sophia Catharina Henrietta, who lived 'till she was four Years of age.

(50) P. 85, 86. Vol. I. edit. 1709. Where she ascribes the Duke under the name of Count Orgueil.

(51) Boyer's History of Queen Anne, p. 14. note (a), edit. 1735, folio.

(52) Character p. 338. where this writer tells us, he differed from the Earl of Oxford and the rest of the ministers, except Lord Bolingbroke, who he believes was of the Duke's opinion in this affair.

(53) Notes to the first chorus in Vol. I. of Pope's Works, edit. Warburton.

(54) Account of the Duke's Pedigree, p. 352, 353.

corpse lay magnificently in state for a considerable time at Buckingham-house, whence it was conveyed with the greatest funeral pomp to Westminster-abbey; where being interred according to his own request, a sumptuous monument was erected afterwards to his memory in Henry the Seventh's chapel; for which purpose, he left 500 pounds by his Will, and directed an epitaph written by himself to be put upon it. But one expression was omitted by order of Dr Atterbury [II], then Dean of that church, who would not suffer it to stand there; and indeed the whole, after many declarations of his religious sentiments, which are found interspersed up and down in his writings, too plainly speaks him a Theist [KK], yet not without some mixture of a superstition cast in his composition

[II] An expression omitted by order of the Dean. The expression was, Christum advenor, which, he thought, intended by the Duke in derogation of the Divine Nature of the Son of God; and the next remark will shew he had ground for that opinion, notwithstanding another worthy clergyman (55) has likewise shewn the words otherwise fairly capable of a higher meaning, being used by Varro, to signify even the highest act of religious worship, who says, Venerem & Minervam advenorari. The original epitaph is Dubius sed non improbus vixi.

Incertus morior sed inturbatus.
Humanum est nescire et errare.
Christum advenor, Deo confido
Omnipotenti, Benevolentissimo.
Ens Entium miserere mihi.

[KK] The epitaph compared with his other works speaks him a Theist. Among these passages we shall produce only that in his Ode on Brutus, the rather because it seems to have been written about the same time with the Epitaph.

'Tis said that favourite mankind,
Was made the Lord of all below.
But yet the doubtful (a) are concern'd (b) to find
'Tis only one man (c) tells another so.
And for this great dominion here,
Which over other beasts we claim,
Reason our best credential does appear,
By which indeed we domineer;
But how absurdly we may see with shame:
Reason that solemn trisler light as air,
Driven up and down by censure or applause,
By partial love away 'tis blown,
Or the least prejudice can weigh it down
Thus our high privilege becomes our snare.
In any nice and weighty cause,
How weak at best is reason, yet the grave
Impose on that small judgment which we have.

Note (a) The doubtful.] In which number are comprehended all the Sceptics of both sorts, viz. they who with much consideration are got to slight the Holy Bible, and all religion depending on it, because they have neither the patience nor the parts to examine any thing thoroughly; and others more modest, who on several accounts would accept those doctrines there taught us, if their judgments, informed by a well-meaning and industrious inquiry, which is all that God has given us for our guide, did not perceive, in some of them at least, a manifest absurdity; apprehending also a kind of impiety in believing things inconsistent not only with common sense, but with that received notion we ought to have of the Deity. They conceive it to be one of these absurdities, that a poor animal, called a man, should be invested by God with a despotic dominion over all the rest of the creation, when all the while we are but too plainly sensible of being unable to comprehend the minutest part of it. Should we not say they undervalue and laugh at any of ourselves, for giving a large patrimony to a booby son, without instructing or breeding him up to understand or enjoy it. But when no other answer is to be well made, the reply to all is, that as odd as it appears, yet God has done it, and therefore we ought to believe it well done, and highly prudent, which most certainly is a true consequence if the premises were right, but that will be examined impartially in the following notes.

(b) Concerned.] That is, says he, both interested in it as they claim the dominion, and so are reasonably inquisitive about it, and troubled to find their title to it so very weak, after so much wealth and blood spent in the controversy. 'Tis well too if we are not one day called to account, and made to pay with costs for so contentious a cruelty.

(c) Only one man.] Here now comes properly an examination of the grounds they go upon, who pretend that God has done us this favour, and therefore we ought to believe it well and wisely done, whatever incongruities may appear in it, which is a consequence just enough, if the premises can be as well made out. But alas (say our Sceptics) when we come to that, instead of a proof there is nothing produced, but one poor text in Genesis, whether written by Moses or some other man (for that is now disputed among Divines themselves) is of no importance, since as a man he is still one of our own imperfect, unknowing kind, and if he is to be credited on his single word, against all all our sense and reason, in a thing also which seems so much to derogate from the infinite wisdom of Divine Providence, sure there is need first of proving him infallible, whereas all the proof of that is only derived by tradition from other men, who therefore cannot certify for one another. 'Tis said also by these Sceptics, that 'tis worth our observing, how the author of this text of man's dominion over all other creatures, has written another very extraordinary one, viz. That God walked in the garden of Eden in the cool of the evening, which if excused on the account of being only a figurative expression, yet much invalidates a narration of such vast importance, that tropes and figures seem improper in it. Divines are unwilling to save it's credit by the difficulty of our understanding the Hebrew tongue (though no ill excuse since 'tis allowed to be sometimes unintelligible) for fear of their adversaries making the same objection to other texts as extraordinary, and perhaps to all the Old Testament. Upon the whole matter 'tis probable, the wise author of Genesis, for reasons which might be given, and many more which we now cannot guess at, had found it fit and necessary to infuse this opinion of man's sovereignty into the Jews; and who knows but it was as needful to encourage them against the beasts of a wilderness in which they wandered so long, as against the kings of Canaan, whom Moses, like a wise leader assured them beforehand, the Lord would deliver into their hands (56).

Having thus derided the authority of the Old Testament, and consequently the Jewish religion, we find him in the conclusion of his letter concerning his house, seriously denying that of the New, and consequently of Christianity. Having declared to his brother Peer, that he was often missing a pretty gallery in the old house he pulled down, more than pleased with a salon which he had built in it's stead, though a thousand times better in all manner of respects, he proceeds thus: Pour faire bonne bouche, with a grave reflection. It were well for us, if this incapacity of being intirely contented was as sure a proof of our being reserved for happiness in another world, as it is of our frailty and imperfection in this. I confess the Divines tell us so. But though I believe a future state more firmly than a great many of them seem to do, by their inordinate desires of the good things in this, yet I own my faith is founded not on those fallacious arguments of preachers, but on that adorable conjunction of unbounded power and goodness, which certainly must some way recompence hereafter so many thousands of innocent wretches created to be so miserable here (57). 'Tis true his Lordship calls the former notes a rambling sort of rhapsody; and it must be owned,

(55) Fiddes, in his Defence of the Duke's Epitaph. Lond. 1721, 8vo.

(56) H's Works, Vol. I. p. 146, & seqq. edit. 1739, 8vo.

(57) H's Works, Vol. II. p. 310.

* One of his Works (for so it may fitly be called, though not mentioned hitherto) was, correcting the press for an edition of the Works of G. Villiers Duke of Buckingham, printed in 1712, of which he revised every sheet, and made several corrections and emendations in them. Commended by the person who carried the proofs to him, and stood by while he performed this task, to which he offered himself unasked.

tion [LL]. Mr Pope having declined to write his character [MM], there came out, in 1723, his Works *, pompously printed, with his picture prefixed, curiously engraved from an original painting by Sir Godfrey Kneller, as also a draught of his monument, with the epitaph, and the following inscription: To the memory of John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, these his more lasting remains, the monument of his mind and more perfect image of himself, are here collected by the direction of Katharine his Duchess; desiring that his ashes may be honoured, and his fame and merit committed to the test of time, truth, and posterity. The whole impression being seized at the press by his Majesty's messengers, some pieces in it, which gave offence to the Government, were suppressed (aa) in the publication. However, in 1729, a second edition was published in 8vo. wherein the castrated sheets were inserted, and there was also prefixed, A Short Character of the Duke of Buckinghamshire, together with an Account of the Pedigree of the Sheffield Family, and his Grace's last Will and Testament, written with his own hand, without any assistance. With regard to his character, it is observed, that in his person his Grace was tall; and though not perhaps the most exactly shaped, being thought a little too long waisted, and rather too narrow in his chest and shoulders, yet all together he looked more like a man of quality than most of his rank who were his contemporaries. He was allowed to be handsome, his face being a regular oval, and all the features of it well proportioned. His countenance had an extraordinary sweetness, joined with a lively and penetrating look, which at first sight struck you with an idea of that great understanding of which he gave the world such various proofs. He had one thing very particular, that laughing heartily, which is seldom advantageous to any body, was in him uncommonly agreeable. And as it was generally allowed, that no body exceeded him in person when young, so few if any were ever so agreeable when old. As (aa) These are, the Account of the Revolution, and the Feast of the G. d. See Life of Alderman Barber, p. 10.

to

owned, the censure is just enough. We see him rambling to overturn revelation by the superior strength of reason, and yet decrying this reason as a narrow, misleading, uncertain, guide, and so unworthy to give us a title of dominion over our fellow-creatures, who are also endowed with it *. So then, man is little or nothing better than a brute. But his Lordship's drift is more soberly delivered elsewhere, in the following distich:

The wise and good morality will guide,
And superstition all the world beside (58).

[LL] Though not without some mixture of superstition. I have ventured to assert this from several passages in his works, some of the most remarkable of which shall be laid before the reader for his judgment. In the poem already mentioned, written in his voyage to Tangier, the plan of which is a Vision, he concludes thus:

Amaz'd I wak'd in haste,
All trembling at my doom;
Dreams oft repeat adventures past,
And tell the ills to come (59).

Again, in his memoirs of himself, speaking of the death of the Earl of Sandwich, he makes the following remark. He dined in Mr. Digby's ship the day before the battle, when no body dreamt of fighting, and shewed a gloomy discontent, so contrary to his usual cheerful humour, that we even then all took notice of it, but much more afterwards (60). The next instance is more full to our purpose. It is in the same memoirs where he relates several passages in his first adventure at sea. Our fleet, says he, happening to go near the shore to take in fresh water, Prince Rupert dined with a gentleman who lived thereabouts, and returning on board in a little boat, with only Lord Blaney and myself, there happened so sudden and violent a storm that we did not like it, and Prince Rupert began to talk of Prince Maurice being cast away by a like accident. Upon which, continues our author, I could not but reflect on my family also, since my grandfather and three of his brothers had been drowned. The Lord Blaney hearing all this, made us all laugh in the midst of our danger, by swearing, that though he liked our company, he wished himself out of it, and in any other boat whatsoever, since he feared the ill fortune of our two families would sink him (61). The story of his grandfather and three brothers is in the Peerage of England by Mr Collins, who tells us there were in all five brothers, one of whom was drowned in France, three others lost their lives in the passage of Whitgift ferry, over the river Humber, and the youngest broke his neck in a new riding house, which his father had made out of an old consecrated chapel, according to Sir William Dugdale. This father was the first Earl of Mulgrave in the family, being created by Queen Elizabeth, by whose express command he, among other English Lords, attended the Duke of Anjou to Antwerp. And being in the famous sea fight against the Spaniards in 1558, who had threatened an invasion, was knighted by the Lord Admiral for his gallant deportment and memorable service in that engagement. He was afterwards appointed Governour of the Briel, in Zealand, and made a Knight of the Garter. The title of Lord Sheffield of Butterwick was first given in the 1st of Edward VI. to Edmund Sheffield, our Duke's great-great-grandfather, who was killed in an insurrection of the common people of Norfolk the next year, he being one of the nobles who accompanied the Marquis of Northampton to suppress them, when his horse fell into a ditch near Norwich, whereupon pulling off his helmet to shew the rebels who he was, a butcher slew him with his club. The manor of Butterwick came into the family by the marriage of Sir Robert Sheffield, knighted by Edward I. with Janet, daughter and coheirefs to Alexander Laird of Butterwick. This Robert's father, who was himself also Sir Robert Sheffield, lived in the time of Henry III, and was the first ancestor of this family mentioned in history (62).

[MM] Mr Pope having declined to write his character. In a letter of that celebrated Poet to Dr Atterbury, dated July 1722, he writes thus. 'The Duke's letter concerns me nearly, I must keep clear of flattery, I will, and as it is an honest resolution, I hope your Lordship will assist me in so doing. I beg therefore you would represent thus much to her Grace, that as to the fear she seems touched with, that the Duke's memory would have no advantage, but what he must give it himself, without being beholden to any one friend, your Lordship may certainly, and agreeably to your character both of rigid honour and Christian plainness, tell her, that no man can have any other advantage, and that all offerings of friends in such a case pass for nothing. Be but so good as to confirm what I have represented to her, that an inscription in the ancient way, plain and pompous, yet modest, will be the most uncommon, and therefore the most distinguished manner of doing it, and so I hope she will be satisfied, the Duke's honour preserved, and my integrity also, which is too sacred a thing to be forfeited in consideration of any little (though what people of quality may call great) honour or distinction whatsoever, which those of their rank can bestow on one of mine, and which indeed they are apt to over-rate, but never so much as when they imagine us under any obligation to say an untrue word in their favour.' It appears by the Bishop's answer, that he had wrote to the Duchess just as Mr. Pope desired, but questioned whether she would be satisfied with it. And that she was not, will be seen presently.

(62) Peerage of England, Vol. 11. p. 143, & seqq.

[NN] He

* Note (d).

(58) On Mr Hobbes and his Writings, Vol. I. p. 180. edit. 1740, 8vo.

(59) Vol. I. p. 83. 4to. edit.

(60) P. 13. Vol. 11. 4to. edit.

(61) P. 6, 7, ibid.

to his manners, he was reported not to be good-natured, and to be very haughty and proud; whereas he was really good-natured, and so tender, that upon seeing in the streets any real object of compassion, he has several times been touched to a degree of bringing tears into his eyes. He was affected in the same manner, upon reading a melancholy story or hearing of any friendly and generous behaviour. He was a little passionate, and sometimes quick upon people that had given him no occasion; which was the case sometimes of his most familiar friends, or gentlemen who came freely to visit him. But then he was never easy 'till he had made them some amends. When he was disoblige'd by his equals, or even by his King, to his thinking, not well treated, he carried it pretty high, 'till he had got the better of the first, and prevailed on the other to change his proceedings more to his satisfaction. But except upon such occasions, no man on earth could carry himself with more good breeding and humanity. And in all his conversations with his inferiors, you could not think he judg'd there was any difference betwixt him and them. He would talk as familiarly to his servants as if he was not their master, and often said, I was angry with you a little time ago, but I don't mean half the things I say in a passion. He was by many thought not to have made a very good husband to his first and second wives; yet this second had by a former husband two daughters, whom he always treated with the greatest respect and kindness, as themselves always acknowledged; and after her death, he contributed to marry one of her daughters to one of the best matches in the kingdom. The liberties which he allowed himself in relation to the ladies are well known. Yet this ought to be remarked as a proof of his good sense, that none of his mistresses could ever prevail upon him to marry foolishly, or ever gained too great an ascendant over him. And some years before his death, a good deal of concern for that kind of libertinism, into which an impetuosity of temper, too much neglected in his education, together with the prevailing fashion of that Court in which he lived, had too often hurried him. He was by his worst enemies allowed to have lived always very kindly with his last wife. Whenever she was very ill, or in danger (which generally happened when she was with child, or at her lying-inn), he shew'd all possible marks of concern: and when there was more than ordinary danger, his servants often found him on his knees at prayers; and on those occasions he has made vows, in case she recovered, to give in charities, sometimes two hundred, sometimes three hundred pounds at a time, which he performed punctually. He was thought to be too saving in money matters; but that opinion was occasioned by little trifling accidents, or rather an humour, which indiscreet people knew not how to manage; for in reality he was not to be called covetous. It is certain his affection to his last Duchess over-balanced his disposition that way; for he always paid her pin-money to a day: and notwithstanding some ill accidents in his fortune might have justified an omission or delay, when her pension from the Crown of 1200*l.* a year, part of the provision made for her by King James the Second (the payment of which, by the ill offices of a favourite at Court had been for some time discontinued). And when by a just representation to Queen Anne, by Lord-Treasurer Oxford, that pension began to be repaid, he always brought the money to her, desiring her to take what part of it she pleas'd for her own use; of which she always took one third. But there is a strong indication of his neglecting money matters too much. He lost a great part of his fortune merely through an indolence and unwillingness to take the pains to visit his estates at some distance from London, in the space of forty years. In a word, he was a good husband, a just and tender father, a constant zealous friend, and, one may add, the most agreeable of companions. As to religion, Bishop Burnet tells us (bb), he was looked on as indifferent to all particular professions, and that he was apt to comply in every thing that might be acceptable to King James, going with his Majesty to mass, and kneeling at it; so that, when that Court thought of making converts to Popery, the priests made an attack upon him; he told them, he was willing to receive instructions; that he had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who made the world and all men in it; but it must not be an ordinary force of argument, that could make him believe that man was quits with God, and made God.

(bb) History of his own Time, p. 683, Vol. I. folio edition.

* Communicated by the Rev. Mr Allen, Viceprincipal of Magdalen Hall, from the information of Dr Browne, now Provost of Queen's-college, who was tutor to his Grace.

His Grace's only surviving child, Edmond, was a youth of the greatest hopes. He was left solely to the care of his mother, and being of a weakly constitution, was carried by her, who constantly attended him, soon after his father's death, into foreign parts, on account of his health, which oblig'd him to reside a great part of his time out of his native country. He was admitted, on the 26th of July, 1732, of Queen's-college in Oxford, and resided there about a year and a half, only during the publick Act, in 1733, he retired from the college, his modesty not permitting him to assist at that solemnity, in which it is usual for the academical nobles to pronounce exercises in publick*. Tender as he was, yet, fired with the example of his ancestors, many of whom had signalized themselves in the wars, in 1734 he went a volunteer into the French army, then under the command of his uncle the Duke of Berwick [NN], in Germany, whom he served as

Aid

[NN] He served a campaign with the Duke of Berwick.] This is mentioned by Lord Orrery, now Earl of Cork, a relation and particular acquaintance of this young nobleman, as well as an executor of his father's will, and who after his death published a poem sacred to his memory, where he speaks thus of him:

An

Aid de Camp at the sieges of Fort Kehl and Philipsburgh, 'till the Marshal lost his head by a cannon ball from the walls of the latter. This catastrophe put an end to the nephew's campaign. The next year, intending to try the air of Naples, he advanced in his way thither as far as Rome, where he found his strength so much wasted, that he was not able to pursue the journey any farther. He remained in this city 'till the very last shock of his distemper, which he sustained with admirable fortitude and resignation, saying, he would ride out the storm in the chair where he sat. He died October 30, 1735, at Rome (cc); but his body was brought into England, and after lying in state at Buckingham-house, was conveyed to Westminster abbey, with a like funeral solemnity to that of his father, by whose side he was interred. His effigy, curiously done in wax, lies over his tomb in Henry the VIIIth's chapel. Mr Pope wrote an epitaph for him [OO]. By his death, the Sheffield family became extinct, and the whole estate came into the hands of the old Duke's natural son, Charles Herbert [PP]; who taking the name of Sheffield, in pursuance of his father's Will, entered also, after the death of the Duchefs [QQ] in 1742, into possession of the house in St James's Park, which he enjoys with a fair character.

(cc) Of a hectic consumption. Peerage of England Vol. II. p. 148.

An early wit by justest precepts taught,
By arts improv'd, by solid judgment wrought;
That knew no folly and detested ill,
Whose thoughts were great, whose reason was his will.
To highest titles, honours, fortunes born,
He only look'd on fordid vice with scorn;
Steady in youth, resolv'd, yet not austere;
Humane to failings, but to crimes severe.
Valiant in arms France saw his martial fire
Kindling, where Berwick's did in blood expire.

[OO] Mr Pope wrote an epitaph for him.] In these words:

' If modest youth with clear reflection crown'd,
' And every opening virtue flowing round,
' Could save a parent's justest pride from fate,
' Or add one patriot to a sinking state,
' This weeping marble had not ask'd thy tear,
' Or sadly told how many hopes lie here.
' The living virtue now had shone approv'd,
' The Senate heard him and his country lov'd.
' Yet softer honours and less noisy fame,
' Attend the shade of gentle Buckingham,
' In whom a race for courage fam'd and art,
' Ends in the milder merit of the heart;
' And chiefs or sages long to Britain giv'n,
' Pays the last tribute to a Saint in Heaven.'

This last thought is finely expressed by Lord Orrery, who ends his excellent Poem in an address to the mother thus:

' But thou to whose distinguish'd worth 'twas giv'n,
' To form a son an offering fit for heav'n,
' By whose unwearied toil and boundless care,
' Maternal love and never ceasing pray'r,
' Life's rugged path he learn'd with ease to tread,
' To bear death's mighty shock, yet not to dread:
' Whose wisdom urg'd him like the lark to rise,
' And though with callous wings to reach the skies.
' Bid him to Fame's eternal temple climb;
' Daring in action as in sense sublime:
' Let this console thee, tho' but short the race,
' 'Twas run with ardour and obtain'd with grace.
' And now far hence remov'd from mortal eyes,
' He sits with seraphs and enjoys the prize.'

[PP] His natural son.] The Duke had taken care of his education, and bred him under a Governour, who was with him at Utrecht, and appointed William Bromley, Esq; a gentleman well known and esteemed for his great worth and abilities, to be this son's guardian to the age of twenty-one years. If he, the Duke, happened to die before him, he left him 5000 l. and in case he should survive his heir, who should die without issue, the whole estate, except the house in the Park, which likewise he was to succeed to upon the death of the Duchefs. His Grace also left 1000 l. to Mr Herbert's mother, Mrs Lambert. Besides this son, the Duke had also two natural daughters, Sophia and Charlotte to whom he left 1000 l. each, to be raised to 5000 l. in case Mr Herbert should succeed to the estate (63): But what is more unaccountable, the daughters were to be put into his own house, by the request of his wife, and were carefully educated by her, 'till they were sent also by her direction to a boarding school at Chelsey. One of them was afterwards married to Dr Walker, Dean of Buriem, and afterwards to Jeremiah Griffith, Esq; a Counsellor at Law; and the other to Dr Joseph Hunt, D. D. and Master of Baliol-college in Oxford, and after his death, first to Cole an Apothecary at Oxford, and then to Cox, Esq; of Kent, whose widow she now is, and very lately went to Oxford to discharge all the debts of her first husband, Dr Hunt, who happened to die insolvent (64). A rare instance of generosity and conjugal affection.

(63) See his Will, at the end of the second volume of his Works.

[QQ] At the death of the Duchefs.] This Lady did not only procure to be written a character of her husband, but also wrote her own character, which was published after her death, and is as follows: ' She was daughter of King James II, and of the Countess of Dorchester, who inherited the integrity and virtue of her father with happier fortune. She was married first to James Earl of Anglesea, and secondly to John Sheffield Duke of Bucks and Normanby. With the former she exercised the virtues of patience and suffering, as long as there was any hopes of doing good by either; with the latter, all other conjugal virtues. The man of finest sense and sharpest discernment she had the happiness to please, and in that found her only pleasure. When he died it seemed as if his spirit was only breathed into her; to fulfil what he had begun to perform, what he had concerted, and to preserve and watch over what he had left his only son; in the care of whose health, the forming of whose mind, and the improvement of whose fortune, she acted with the conduct and sense of the father, softened, but not overcome, with the tenderness of the mother. Her understanding was such as must have made a figure had it been in a man, but the modesty of her sex threw a veil over it's lustre, which nevertheless suppressed only the expression, not the exertion of it; for her sense was not superior to her resolution, which when once she was in the right, preserved her from making it only a transition to the wrong, the frequent weakness even of the best women. She often followed wife counsel, but sometimes went before it, always with success. She was possessed of a spirit, which assisted her to get the better of those accidents which admitted of any redress, and enabled her to support outwardly with decency and dignity those which admitted of none, yet melted inwardly, through almost her whole life, at a succession of melancholy and affecting objects, the loss of all her children, the misfortunes of relations and friends public and private, and the death of those who were dearest to her. Her heart was as compassionate as it was great; her affections warm even to solicitude; her friendship not violent or jealous, but rational and persevering. Her gratitude equal and constant to the living, to the dead, boundless and heroic. What person soever she found worthy of her esteem, she would not give up for any power on earth, and the greatest on earth whom she could not esteem, obtained from her no farther tribute than decency. Her good will was wholly directed by merit, not by accident, not measured by the regard they professed for her own deserts, but by her idea of theirs; and as there was no merit which she was not able to imitate, there was none which she could envy. Therefore her conversation was as far from detraction, as her opinion was from prejudice or prepossession. As her thoughts were her own, so were her words, and she was as sincere in uttering her judgment as she was impartial in forming it. She was a safe companion, many were served, none ever suffered by her acquaintance? inoffensive when provoked, when unprovoked not stupid, but the moment her enemy ceased to be hurtful, she could cease to act as an enemy, and indeed when forced to be so, the more a finished one for having been long a making, and her proceeding with ill people was more in a calm and steady course like justice, than in quick and passionate onsets, like revenge. As for those of whom she only thought ill, she considered them not so much as once to wish them ill; of such her contempt was great enough to put a stop to all other passions that could hurt them. Her love and aversion, her gratitude and resentment, her esteem and neglect were equally open and strong, and alterable only from the alteration of the persons who created them. Her mind was too noble to be insincere, and her heart too honest to stand in need of it. So that she never found cause to repent her conduct either to a friend or an enemy.—There remains only to speak of her person, which was most amiably majestic. The nicest eye could find no fault in the outward lineaments of her face, or proportion of her body. It was such as pleased wherever she had a desire it should, yet she never envied that of any other, which might better please in general. In the same manner as being content that her merits were esteemed where she desired they should, she never depreciated those of any other that were esteemed or preferred elsewhere. For she aimed not at a general esteem, or a general love, where she was not known, it was enough to be possessed of both where she was. Having lived to the age of sixty-two years, not courting regard, but receiving it from all who knew her, not loving business, but discharging it wholly where soever duty or friendship engaged her in it; not following greatness, but not declining to pay respect as far as was due from independence and disinterest. Having honourably absolved all the parts of life, she forsook this world, where she had left no act of duty or virtue undone, for that alone where such acts are rewarded, on the 13th day of March 1742 3.

(64) From private information, this year, 1760.

To this extraordinary performance there was subjoined the following memorandum. The above character was written by Mr Pope some years before her Grace's death. This coming out soon after Mr Pope's death, gave occasion to Mr Warburton to publish it in his edition of that poet's works, with the following note. We find by letter xix. of Pope's letters (65), that the Duchess of Bucks would have had Mr Pope draw her husband's character, but though he refused this office, yet having in his Epistle on the Characters of Women inserted these lines,

To heirs unknown descends the unguarded store,
Or wanders Heaven directed to the poor.

Which are supposed to mark her out in such a manner as

SHELDON [GILBERT] Archbishop of Canterbury in the XVIIth century, a most generous and munificent prelate, was born July 19. 1598. at Stanton in Staffordshire. He received the name of Gilbert from his godfather Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury; to whom his father Roger Sheldon was then a menial servant (a), but descended from the ancient family of the Sheldons of Staffordshire (b). In the latter end of the year 1613 he was admitted into Trinity-college in Oxford (c): and November 27. 1617. took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Master May 28. 1620 (d). He was elected Fellow of All-souls college in 1622. And about the same time taking holy orders, he became afterwards domestic Chaplain to Thomas Lord Coventry Keeper of the Great Seal, who gave him a Prebend of Gloucester [A]: and finding him to be a man of parts, recommended not to be mistaken for another; and having said of himself, that he held a lie in prose or verse to be the same, all this together gave a handle to his enemies since his death, to publish the following paper, intitled, The Character of Katharine, Duchess of Buckingham and Normanby, as written by him; to which, in vindication of the deceased Poet, we have subjoined a letter to a friend, that will let the reader fully into the history of the writing and publishing of this extraordinary character. That part of the letter which relates to this affair is as follows:

To James Moyser, of Beverly, Esq;

Bath, July 11, 1743.

I come now to answer your friend's question; the whole of what he has heard of my writing a character of the old Duke of Bucks, is untrue, I don't remember even to have seen it in MS. nor ever to have seen the pedigree, otherwise than after the Duchess had printed it with the Will, and sent one to me, as I suppose she did to all her acquaintance. I don't wonder it should be reported I writ that character, after a story which I will tell you in your ear, and to yourself. There was another character written of her Grace by herself (with what help I know not) but she shewed it to me in her blots, and pressed me by all the adjurations of friendship to give her my sincere opinion of it. I acted honourably and did so. She seemed to take it patiently, and upon many exceptions which I made, engaged me to take the whole, and to select out of it just as much as I judged might stand, and return her the copy. I did so. Immediately she picked a quarrel with me, and we never saw each other in five or six years. In the mean time she shewed this character (as much as was extracted of it in my hand-writing) as a composition of my own in her praise; and very probably it is now in the hands of Lord Hervey (66). By this last passage, compared with what Mr Warburton observes, that the character was published by Mr Pope's enemies, we are led to fix the writing of it upon his Lordship, who, it is well known, was one of the chief of Mr Pope's enemies. The Duchess was interred by her own particular direction, with at least equal funeral pomp to that of her husband and son; and by the same direction, her effigies in wax-work, adorned with jewels, stands in Henry VIIIth's chapel, in a case, which includes that also of her daughter, Sophia Katharina Henrietta Sheffield standing by her side. In the description of his house, the Duke takes notice of the particular care that was taken in contriving it, so as to prevent all noise over his wife's head during the mysteries of Lucina. It has been said, that he retained an eminent Physician, particularly skilled in that part of the art, at a large annual stipend, and at his death erected a most sumptuous monument (67) to his memory in Westminster-Abbey, with an inscription written by himself. 'Tis of his own conduct to this gentleman he speaks in his Essay on Vulgar Errors, where he recommends a salary for life as a better method than fees. I almost doubt whether the whole profession is generally here accused both of want of honesty and skill, only to render the exception more conspicuous. This, says he, is only the case in general, for I doubt not but some Physicians are abler and honestier than the rest; and I have myself had the experience of one, whose skill, honesty, and friendship, has recovered the most valuable part of my family out of dangers in which we have almost despaired of success, and restored her to perfect health.

(66) Pope's Works, by Warburton, Vol. VIII.

(67) It yields to none there, either for invention or execution.

(65) See remark [M M].

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 1162. and Plot's Natural History of Staffordshire, p. 273.

(b) From the Archbishop's Epitaph.

(1) Dr Br. Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. I. p. 741.

[A] Who gave him a Prebend of Gloucester.] He was install'd into it February 26. 1632. (1)—The Lord Keeper exceedingly esteemed him, and used his service not only in all matters relating to the Church, but

(c) Wood, ibid. (d) Idem Fasti, Vol. 1. col. 203, 216.

(e) Wood, Ath. col. 1163.

(f) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. 1. p. 620.

(g) J. Le Neve's Lives of the Protestant Bishops, Lond. 1720, 8vo. Part 1. p. 177.

(h) Wood, Fasti, Vol. 1. col. 243 and 260.

(i) Wood, Hist. & Antiq Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 176.

(k) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753, 8vo. Vol. 1. p. 247.

recommended him to King Charles I. as a person well vers'd in political affairs (e). On the 2d of May 1633, he was presented by his Majesty to the Vicarage of Hackney in Middlesex, void by the promotion of David Dolben to the bishoprick of Bangor (f). He was also Rector of Ickford in Buckinghamshire; and Archbishop Laud gave him the Rectory of Newington in Oxfordshire (g). Having proceeded Bachelor of Divinity November 11. 1628. he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity June 25, 1634, as a compounder (h). In March 1635, he was elected Warden of All-souls-college (i). And being esteemed a learned man (k), was appointed Chaplain in ordinary to the King; became afterwards Clerk of his Closet; and was designed by him to be made Master of the Savoy Hospital, and Dean of Westminster: but his settlement in them was prevented by the civil wars (l). During these, he firmly adhered to the King, and was one of the Chaplains whom his Majesty sent for, to attend his Commissioners, at the Treaty of Uxbridge, in February 1644, for their devotions, and for the other service of the Church, as the management of the treaty requir'd; which could not be foreseen (m). He argued there so earnestly in favour of the Church of England, as drew upon him the envy and resentment of the Parliamentarians, which they made him afterwards sufficiently feel (n). In April 1646, he was attending the King at Oxford, and witness to a remarkable vow made by his Majesty [B], of which an account is given in the note. He also attended in 1647, as one of his Majesty's Chaplains, at Newmarket, and other places (o). The 30th of March, he was ejected from his Wardenship of All souls college, by the Parliamentary visitors; who forcibly took possession of his lodgings, April 13 and imprison'd him (p), with Dr Hammond, in Oxford, and elsewhere; to the end that their eminency in the university might not hinder the intruders and rebels proceedings, and to keep them from attending on the King at the treaty in the isle of Wight (q). He remained confin'd above six months, and then the Reforming Committee set him at liberty, October 24. 1648, upon condition that he should never come within five miles of Oxford; that he should not go to the King in the isle of Wight; and that he should give security to appear before them, at fourteen days warning whenever cited (r). Upon his release, he retir'd to Saelston in Derbyshire, and among the rest of his friends in Staffordshire and Nottinghamshire; whence, from his own purse, and from collections made by him amongst the Royalists, he sent constant supplies of money to King Charles II. abroad, and follow'd his studies and devotions 'till matters tended to a happy Restoration. J Palmer, the intruder into his Wardenship, dying March 4. 1659 60; he became of course Warden again, without however taking repossession, and continued so 'till the January following (s). He became then also possess'd of the Mastership of the Savoy [C], which he kept 'till 1663. On King Charles the Second's return, he met his Majesty at Canterbury, and was soon after made Dean of the Chapel royal; as also, upon bishop Juxon's translation to Canterbury, advanced in his room to the Bishopric of London, and consecrated October 28 1660 (t) [D]. But in effect he governed the whole Province of Canterbury, by reason of Archbishop Juxon's great age and infirmities (u). He was likewise sworn a privy Counsellor (w). In 1661, the famous Conference between some of the Episcopal Clergy and Presbyterian Divines, concerning alterations to be made in the Liturgy, was held at his lodgings in the Savoy [E]. His conduct there and afterwards, is blamed by the Presbyterians [F]. While he

(l) Wood, Ath. ut supras.

(m) Lord Clarendon's Hist. edit. 1731, 8vo. Vol. IV. p. 583.

(n) Cl. G. Richardson's Contin. Gotwini Commentariorum de Præfultibus, edit. 1741, p. 163.

(o) Lord Clarendon's History, Vol. V. p. 20. and Parliamentary History, Vol. XVI p. 34, 40, 42, 49, 50, 65.

(p) Wood, Hist. & Antiq Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 397, 402, 403.

(q) Wood, Ath. col. 1163.

(r) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. L. i. p. 413.

(s) Wood, Ath. col. 1163. and Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. L. ii. col. 176. and Kennet's Register and Chronicle, p. 221.

(t) Le Neve, as above, p. 180.

(u) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719, p. 207.

(w) Wood, Ath. col. 1163.

was

but in many other businesses of importance, in which that Lord was nearly concerned. The Earl of Clarendon, from whom we have this particular, adds †, that when Dr Sheldon was afterwards Warden of All-Souls college in Oxford, he then was looked upon, as very equal to any preferment the Church could yield, or hath since yielded unto him; and Sir Francis Wenman would often say, when the Doctor resorted to the conversation at the Lord Falkland's house, as he frequently did, that 'Dr Sheldon was born, and bred to be Archbishop of Canterbury.'

[B] And witness to a remarkable vow made by his Majesty. It was first made public by Mr Echard (2), who gives this account of the occasion of making it, — 'In the midst of these uncommon difficulties, the pious King, as it were reflecting upon his concessions relating to the Churches of Scotland and England, and being extremely tender in case of sacrilegious encroachments, wrote and signed this extraordinary vow, which was never yet published. I do here promise and solemnly vow, in the presence and for the service of almighty God, that if it shall please the divine Majesty, of his infinite Goodness to restore me to my just kingly rights, and to re-establish me in my throne, I will wholly give back to his Church all those Impropriations which are now held by the Crown; and what lands soever I do now, or should enjoy, which have been taken away either from any Episcopal see, or any Cathedral or Collegiate Church, from any Abby, or other religious house. I likewise promise for hereafter to hold them from the Church, under such reasonable Fines and Rents as shall be set down by some conscientious persons, whom I propose to chuse with all uprightness of heart, to direct me in this particular. And I most humbly beseech God to accept of this my Vow, and to blefs me in the design I have now in hand, through Jesus Christ our Lord Amen.

CHARLES R.

Oxford, April 13. 1646.'

This is a true Copy of the King's Vow, which was preserv'd thirteen years under ground, by me 1660. Aug. 21.

Gilb. Sheldon.

[C] He became then also possess'd of the Mastership of the Savoy. The famous Conference, between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Divines, in 1661, was holden in his lodgings there; and thence came to be distinguish'd by the Name of the Savoy-Conference. See below note [E].

[D] And consecrated October 28. 1660. His Congé d'essire bears date Sepremb. 28. And he was elected October the 9th, confirm'd the 23d and install'd by proxy November 3d (3).

[E] In 1661, the famous Conference—concerning alterations to be made in the Liturgy, was held at his lodgings in the Savoy. At the first meeting of the Commissioners, Bishop Sheldon told the Presbyterian Divines, 'That not the Bishops, but They, had been seekers of the Conference, and desir'd Alterations in the Liturgy; Therefore, there was nothing to be done

(2) Le Neve, &c. as above, p. 180. from the Bishop's Register, and Burnet's Register and Chronicle, p. 393.

† Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, edit. 1759, Vol. 1. 8vo. p. 49 and of the folio edit. p. 25.

(3) In the Appendix to his History of England, p. 5.

(*) Idem, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. L. ii. p. 284.

(y) Wood, Ath. col. 1163, 1164, and Le Neve, as above, p. 182, 195.

(z) Le Neve, p. 87, 194.

(a) Echard's Hist. of England, edit. 1707, fol. Vol. III. p. 142.

was Bishop of London, he gave fifty pounds to Christ's-church in Oxford, towards repairing several damages which it had sustained during the civil wars (x). In 1663 he was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury [G], vacant by the death of Archbishop Juxon. As he had spent large sums upon his episcopal houses whilst he was bishop of London [H], so did he now upon his archiepiscopal; particularly upon his palace at Lambeth, where he rebuilt the Library (y), after having recovered the books belonging thereto from the university of Cambridge. He also made an addition to it of several Books (z). But his most sumptuous and considerable work, was the magnificent Theatre at Oxford [I], erected at his sole expence; which was opened with great solemnity July 9. 1669. In 1665, during the time of the great Plague, he firmly continued at Lambeth, notwithstanding the extremity of the danger, and with his diffusive charity preserved great numbers alive that would otherwise have perished. Also by his affecting letters to all the Bishops, he procured great sums to be return'd out of all parts of his province (a). The same year, he was one of those who promoted the Corporation, or Five-mile-act (b). He is said to have advised, among others, the removal of Lord Chancellor Clarendon (c) [K]: And, in his room, he was elected, December 20. 1667, Chancellor of the university

(b) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 315.

(c) Burnet, Vol. I. p. 354.

'done 'till they had brought in all that they had to say against it in writing, and all the additional Forms and Alterations which they desir'd.' The Ministers moved for an Amicable Conference, according to the Commission, as thinking it more likely to contribute to dispatch, and to the answering the great end: Whereas, writing would be a tedious endless business, and prevent that familiarity and acquaintance with each others minds, which might facilitate concord. But Bishop Sheldon absolutely insisted upon it, 'That no thing should be done 'till all Exceptions, Alterations and Additions, were brought in at once.' And after some debate, it was agreed, 'That they should bring in all their Exceptions at one time, and all their Additions at another time (4).' — During the course of that Conference the Bishop did not appear often, and engag'd not in all the disputation, and yet was well known to have a principal hand in disposing of all such affairs (5).

[F] His conduct there, and afterwards, is blamed by the Presbyterians. They accuse him of too much rigidness; and tell the following stories of him. — 'In the convocation holden in 1661. Dr Allen of Huntingdonshire, clerk in that convocation, laboured with Him, to have the Liturgy so reformed, as that no sober man might make exception. But Bishop Sheldon desir'd him to forbear; "for, what should be, was concluded on, or resolv'd." (6) — Likewise, That when the Lord Chamberlain Manchester told the King, while the Act of Uniformity was under debate, 'He was afraid the terms of it were so rigid, that many of the Ministers would not comply with it;' The Bishop, then present, replied, 'I am afraid, they will.' — Moreover, that he should say, 'Now we know their minds, we'll make them all Knaves if they conform (7).'

Upon its being debated in Council, in August 1662, Whether the Act of Uniformity should be punctually executed on the 24th of that month, or suspended for a while: Our Bishop pressed the execution of it. 'England, said he, was accustomed to obey laws: So while they stood on that ground, they were safe, and needed fear none of the dangers that seemed to be threatened: He also undertook to fill all the vacant pulpits, that should be forsaken in London, better and more to the satisfaction of the people, than they had been before: And he seemed to apprehend, that a very small number would fall under the deprivation, and that the gross of the party would conform. On the other hand, those who led the party took great pains to have them all stick together (8).' — Bishop Parker relates this matter somewhat more fully (9). — 'The Council, faith he, being held, Bishop Sheldon came of his own accord (for he was not yet called to the Privy-Council) and pleaded for the Law, with that sharpness of wit, that copious eloquence, and that weight of reason, that he did not so much persuade, as command, the assent of the King, the Duke, the Council, and all that were present, and almost even the petitioners themselves to his opinion. He told them, that the suspension of the law came almost too late, that by the command of that law he had ejected all who had not obey'd it in his diocese the Sunday before, by which he had so provok'd their anger and hatred, that if they were again restor'd, he should not live henceforward in a society of Clergy, but in the jaws of his enemies; neither could he dare to contradict a law that was passed with so great approbation of all good men, so general a consent of Parliament, and with so much deliberation. And further, that if at that time so sacred a Law should be repealed, it would expose the lawgivers to the sport and scorn of the faction. And lastly, that the State and Church would never be free from disorders and disturbances, if factious men could extort whatever they desir'd by their impudence and importunity.'

Our Prelate is also blamed by the Presbyterians, for a circular Letter sent by him to his suffragans, in 1670, for promoting the execution of the Conventicle-act (10).

But a person highly provok'd, and very much injur'd, as he certainly had been, could not act with that coolness about matters which he thought of the utmost Importance, as his natural temper would have prompted him to. And, after all, are his sufferings to be absolutely forgotten?

[G] In 1663. he was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. The congé d'elire was granted July 14. and he was elected August 11. and confirm'd the 31st of that month.

[H] As he had spent large sums upon his episcopal houses whilst he was bishop of London, &c. He paid to the Lord Petre, for the purchase of London-house in Aldersgate-street, 5200 l. to serve as a Town-house to himself and successors, in the room of his palace at the North-west corner of St Paul's church-yard, which had been destroyed by the great Fire. — And he laid out on the repairs of his houses at Fulham, Lambeth, and Croydon, 4500 l. (11).

[I] But his most sumptuous and considerable work was the magnificent Theatre at Oxford. The learned and ingenious Dr Lowth, justly celebrates his Munificence displayed in that noble edifice, in these elegant words. — 'Quid denique hoc ipsum Theatrum, Viri gravissimi atque sanctissimi Gilberti Sheldoni Cantuariensis Archiepiscopi singulari constructum Munificentia? munus dignum auctore, — quod cum intueor et circumspicio, videor mihi in ipsa Roma, vel in mediis Athenis, antiquis illis et cum maxime florentibus, versari; nisi quod, fidenter hoc dico, neque Roma neque Athenæ tale tantumque Gymnasium Musis et Apollini suo consecratum unquam habuerunt — (12).

[K] He is said to have advised, among others, the removal of Lord Chancellor Clarendon: Our author for this particular, is Bishop Burnet (13); though indeed his words are not very clear, but rather ambiguous. After saying, that King Charles II. had resolved to take the Seals from Lord Clarendon; he goes on thus. — 'The King said to the Lord Lauderdale, that he had talked of the matter with Sheldon; and that he (14) convinced him, that it was necessary to remove Lord Clarendon from his post. And, as soon as it was done, the King sent for Sheldon, and told him what he had done. But he answered nothing. When the King insisted to oblige him to declare himself, he said, "Sir, I wish you would put away this woman that you keep." The King upon that replied sharply, why had he never talked to him of that sooner, but took this occasion now to speak of it. Lauderdale told me, he

(10) See Complete History, Vol. III. p. 281. and Calamy's Abridgment, Vol. I. p. 328.

(11) Le Neve, as above, p. 193.

(12) Lowth Oration Crewiana, inter Prælectiones Academicas, p. 362.

(13) History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 354.

(14) Q. Who, the King, or Archbishop Sheldon?

(4) Calamy's Abridgment of R. Baxter's Life, edit. 1713, Vol. I. p. 153, 154.

(5) Ibid. p. 171. See also Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 251.

(6) Calamy, ubi supra, p. 159.

(7) Calamy, p. 171.

(8) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 268.

(9) Hist. of his own Time, p. 29.

(d) Wood, Ath. col. 1163, and Hist. & Ant. q. Univ. Oxon. L. ii. p. 1144.

(e) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 355.

(f) Le Neve, as above, p. 185.

versity of Oxford (d). The same year, he lost the King's confidence for advising him to put away his mistress Barbara Villiers, and could never recover it again (e). On the 31st of July 1669, he resigned the place of Chancellor of the university of Oxford, and retired from public business; with the inward satisfaction of having served the university with as much affection, and a munificence almost equal to any of his predecessors (f). For the last years of his life, he resided chiefly at his palace of Croydon (g). Having filled the see of Canterbury with great honour and reputation for above fourteen years, he dyed at Lambeth, November 9. 1677, in the eightieth year of his age; and, according to his own direction, was buried in Croydon-church in Surrey (b): where a stately monument was soon after erected to his memory [L], by his nephew and heir Sir Joseph Sheldon, then lately Lord Mayor of London, son of his elder brother Ralph Sheldon of Stanton (i). His works of piety and charity were many [M]. And the rest of his character is given below [N]. He never published any thing but 'A Sermon preached be-

(g) Compleat History, as above, Vol. III. p. 318.

(b) Le Neve, p. 190.

(i) Wood Ath. as above, col. 1163.

' fore

' he had all this from the King: And that the King and Sheldon had gone into such expostulations upon it, that from that day forward Sheldon could never recover the King's confidence.'

[L] Where a stately monument was soon after erected to his memory.] The inscription upon it begins thus.

' Fortiter & Suaviter.
' Hic jacet
' Gilbertus Sheldon,
' Antiquâ Sheldoniorum familiâ
' In Agro Staffordiensis natus;

Then, after giving an account of his education and preferments, it goes on thus to his character.

' Vir
' Omnibus negotiis par, omnibus titulis superior:
' In rebus adversis magnus, in prosperis bonus,
' Utriusq; Fortunæ Dominus.
' Pauperum Parens,
' Literatorum Patronus,
' Ecclesiæ Stator.
' De tanto Viro
' Pauca dicere non expedit, multa non opus est.
' Norunt Præsentēs, Posterī vix credent.'

i. e. a man equal to any business, superior to all titles: Great in adversity, good in prosperity, master of good and bad fortune. The father of the poor, the patron of the learned, the watchman, or defender of the Church, &c.

[M] His works of piety and charity were many.] Besides what he laid out in purchasing London-houses, and repairing his Episcopal houses, as mentioned above in note [H], he gave for repair of St Paul's church, before the fire 2169*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* and after the fire 2000*l.*—He gave, for the augmentation of Vicarages belonging to his see, a hundred and forty pounds a year, for which he abated in his fines to the value of 1680*l.* and all the leases being expired when he was made Bishop, upon the renewal of them, he abated in his fines above sixteen thousand pounds more, for the augmentation of small livings.—He expended upon the building of the Theatre at Oxford 14470*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* and gave the university 2000*l.* besides, to buy land, for keeping it in perpetual repair.—He gave for the finishing of All-souls-college chapel, and Trinity-college chapel in Oxford, and repairing Lichfield cathedral 450*l.*—In his will, he bequeathed to pious and charitable uses 1500*l.* Out of which he appropriated to All souls college 300*l.* Trinity-college 100*l.* both in Oxford. To Canterbury-cathedral 100*l.* To the poor at Lambeth 50*l.* at Croydon 40*l.* To St John's hospital at Canterbury 100*l.* and to that of St Nicolas Hasledean near Canterbury 100*l.*—In short, we are assured, that from the time of his being Bishop of London to that of his death, it appeared in his book of accounts, that upon publick, pious and charitable uses he had bestowed sixty six thousand pounds (15). But, according to others (16), he disposed to publick pious uses, in acts of munificence and charity (in his life, or by his last will and testament) the sum of seventy two thousand pounds, as attested by his Treasurer Ralph Snow Esq; to whom he left a legacy of 1000*l.* under this distinguishing style, To my old and faithful servant.

VOL. VI. No. 306.

[N] And the rest of his character is given below.]

It is thus drawn by Dr Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford, who had been his Chaplain (17). 'He was a man of undoubted Piety; but though he was very assiduous at Prayers, yet he did not set so great a value upon them as others did nor regarded so much Worship as the use of Worship, placing the chief point of religion in the practice of a good life. In his daily discourse he cautioned those about him, not to deceive themselves with an half religion, nor to think that divine Worship was confined within the walls of the Church, the principal part of it being without doors, and consisting in being conversant with mankind. If men led an upright, sober, chaste life, then and not 'till then they might look upon themselves as Religious; otherwise it would signify nothing what form of religion bad men followed, or to what Church they belonged. Therefore having spoken to this effect, he added with a kind of exultation and joy, Do well, and rejoice.—His advice to young Noblemen and Gentlemen, who by their parents commands resorted daily to him, was always this; Let it be your principal care to become honest men, and afterwards be as devout and religious as you will. No Piety will be of any advantage to yourselves or anybody else, unless you are honest and moral men. He had a great aversion to all pretences to extraordinary Piety, which covered real dishonesty; but had a sincere affection for those, whose religion was attended with integrity of manners. His worthy notions of religion meeting with an excellent temper in him, gave him that even Tranquillity of mind, by which he was still himself, and always the same in adversity as well as in prosperity; and neither over-rated nor despised life, nor feared nor wished for death, but lived agreeably to himself and others. From this Tranquillity of Mind naturally arose a courteous behaviour. His Conversation was easy; he never sent any man away discontented; among his domestics he was both pleasant and grave, and governed his family with authority and courtesy.—His Generosity was such, that besides what he did in a private condition, (in which he redeemed the family estate, which his elder brother had wasted, for the children of the deceased,) after he was advanced to the episcopal throne he laid out thirty seven thousand pounds in works of Charity and Piety, and yet managed his own affairs with such prudence, that he left a considerable estate and a great deal of ready money to his heirs, and at the same time bequeathed to every one of his servants large pensions for their lives.'—Bishop Burnet does not give him so favorable a character (18): It is as follows.—'Sheldon was esteemed a learned man before the wars: But he was now engaged so deep in politicks, that scarce any prints of what he had been remained. He was a very dextrous man in business, had a great quickness of apprehension, and a very true judgment. He was a generous and charitable man. He had a great pleasantness of conversation, perhaps too great. He had an art, that was peculiar to him, of treating all that came to him in a most obliging manner: But few depended much on his professions of friendship. He seemed not to have a deep sense of religion, if any at all: And spoke of it most commonly as of an engine of government, and a matter of policy. By this means the King came to

(17) Commentarii de rebus suis temporis; or, History of his own Time, book i,

(18) Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 247.

* Very likely, because he did not care so much about it, as Bishop Burnet, and persons of his cast, (15) Le Neve, as above, p. 192, 193. &c. Wood, Ath. col. 1164.

(16) W. Kennet's Case of Imprescriptions, &c. p. 257.

(k) See Mr Chillingworth's Life by Mr Des Maizeaux, edit. Lond. 1725, 8vo. p. 78—103. and the article CHILLINGWORTH [WILLIAM].

(19) Ibid. p. 192.

'fore the King at Whitehall, upon June the 28th 1660, being the Day of Solemn 'Thanksgiving for the happy Return of his Majesty,' on Psalm xviii. 49. Lond. 1660. 4to. With the renowned Chillingworth he had a great intimacy, and was the chief means of persuading that great man to subscribe the Thirty nine articles of the Church of England (k) [O].

'look on him as a wise and honest Clergyman.'— Elsewhere he intimates (19), that he was a man of no great strictness.

But the Reader will be pleased to remember, That, since our unhappy civil wars, every man of eminence hath born a double character, according to people's Passions and Prejudices.

[O] And was the chief means of persuading that great man to subscribe the Thirty nine Articles of the Church of England] Among Mr H. Wharton's MSS. in the Library at Lambeth, there are minutes of a Letter of Dr Sheldon to Mr Chillingworth, (as is supposed) which though printed already by Mr Des Maizeaux, and in the General Dictionary, we shall here present the Reader with, from an exact copy taken from the original by an ingenious Friend. It is as follows ;

'It was in a third person else. I should not have told you what I did

I must deal plainly with you, I am much afraid it will ruin you here and not advantage you at the last day

God forbid I should persuade any to do against his conscience, be in itself good or bad, it must be a sin to him.—

Accordinge] if not against for 'tis accordinge to Scripture that the church hath power to establish ceremony or doctrine if occasion require, not against the Scripture

The end of these general forms of prayer if capable of any construction true against the papists no evangelical counsells as the papists such as presuppose a fulfilling of the law and going beyond it to satisfy and merit for us that accordinge to Scripture in this sense the article condemns them. consider it well.

No such offeringe of X^e in the Scripture where will you find it once offered for all in that manner they did it against whom the article was fram'd, taken with all aggravating circumstances of corporal preference. — as if another satisfaction for sin the consequences that may be drawn from transubstantiation will amount to little less than blasphemy

Works done by bare nature are not meritorious de congruo. nature of sin they must have if sin be in them and so it is for malum ex qualibet causa unless a downright Pelagian You may give it a fayre and [not legible] true interpretation.

Upon these reasons I presume did that reverend prelate Andrews and that learned Mountague subscribe when they publicly taught evangelical counsells in their writings what you have writ to me in a third person—be not too forward—over possess'd with a spirit of contradiction. — thus you may—

On the back

Sheldon's hand-written (I suppose) for Chillingworth.'

The Reader may observe, that these are only half-form'd, unfinish'd sentences, or rather hints ; out of which, in part, Dr Sheldon might perhaps afterwards have drawn up a letter to Mr Chillingworth.

In the General Dictionary, 'tis said, that 'In the catalogue of the manuscripts of Mr Wharton drawn up by himself, we find that one of the volumes (20) (20) MS. M. p. 933. contained A letter of Dr Sheldon to Mr Chillingworth to satisfy his scruples about subscribing; but 'we can give no account of that letter, having not seen it.' Upon examination, instead of a Letter, it appears to be only those confus'd hints, or minutes, here given.

SHERBURNE [Sir EDWARD] a learned and ingenious Writer in the XVIIth century, was descended from an ancient and genteel family of his name at Stonyhurst in Lancashire. But his grandfather Henry Sherburne becoming a retainer to Corpus Christi college in Oxford (a) settled there, and had issue among other children, Edward Sherburne, who being made Clerk of the Ordnance, resided in Goldsmith's-rents, near Red-cross street, in the Parish of St. Giles Cripplegate, London, where the subject of the present memoir was born, on the 18th of September, 1618. He received the first part of his education from Mr Thomas Farnabie [A] who then taught a grammar-school in Goldsmith's rents:

And

[A] Mr Thomas Farnabie.] This gentleman who we are told was the most noted schoolmaster of his time, deserves, on account of the importance of that laborious employment to the public, some further notice. His life was also chequered with a variety of uncommon incidents. He was the son of Thomas Farnabie, Carpenter of London, (2) where he was born about 1575. He became a student in Merton college in 1590. and being a youth of great hopes was made by one of the Fellows, Mr Thomas French, his postmaster, and consequently his servitor (3); but being very wild he left the college, was seduced by the Jesuits, went into Spain, and was for some time educated in one of their seminaries there; 'till growing weary of their severe discipline, he found a way to leave them, and went with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins in their last voyage in 1595, being in some esteem with the former. He afterwards became a soldier in the Low-Countries, and was reduced to great poverty, but found means to be set on shore in the west of England; where, after wandering about under the name of Thomas Bainrafe (4), he settled at

Martock in Somersetshire, and taught the grammar-school there for some time with good success; as appears from hence, that in the year 1646. there was in that town and neighbourhood, many that had been his scholars, ingenious men and good grammarians, even in their grey hairs, among whom it was then reported, that when he landed in Cornwall, his distresses made him stoop so low as to be an Abcdarian, several being taught their horn-books by him. After he had gotten some feathers at Martock, he took his flight to London, and taught a long time in Goldsmith's-rents, as above mentioned; where he had large gardens and handsome houses, with great accommodations for young noblemen and gentlemen, who at one time made up the number of 300 or more. The school-house was a large brick building, divided into several partitions or apartments, according to the distinctions of the forms and classes under the care of the respective ushers allotted to attend them. While he taught here he was made Master of Arts at Cambridge, and soon after incorporated at Oxford. At length upon some disagreement with his landlords, and frequent sicknesses

(a) Perhaps Butler. Mr Wood tells us, he built a house opposite to Merton college, and probably dwelt in it. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 659.

(1) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 104, 105.

(2) His grandfather was some time Mayor of Turo in Cornwall, and his great-grandfather an Italian musician. Ibid.

(3) It was then the custom for Postmasters to serve these Fellows from whom they received their places. Ibid.

(4) The anagram of Farnabie.

And upon that eminent master's removal to Sevenoak in Kent in 1636, Mr Sherburne engaged his uther, Mr Charles Aleyn (b), a very ingenious gentleman, who had been bred at Sidney college in Cambridge (c), to instruct his son in his own house. But his preceptor dying in 1640, it was resolved to send his pupil, who was now two and twenty years of age, to compleat his education by travelling into foreign parts. Accordingly he went to France about Christmas the same year, and having visited the most considerable places in that kingdom, was preparing to set out for Italy, when the unhappy news of his father's illness brought him home. The old gentleman did not survive his return many weeks. However upon his death, which happened a few days before Christmas 1641, his son succeeded to the Clerkship of his Majesty's ordnance, the patent being granted to him on the 5th of February following (d). But the condition of the times did not suffer his continuance in this post: Upon the breaking out of the civil war he was found too firmly attached to the King's interest for the designs of the opposite party, and being a papist, was ejected by warrant from the House of Lords, in April or May 1642. He was also committed to the custody of the black rod, and lay there at great expence 'till October, when regaining his liberty, he immediately took himself to his royal master, who repaired his loss in the best manner he was then able, by making him commissary-general of the artillery. In that post he served his Majesty at the Battle of Edge-hill the same month, and attending him afterwards to Oxford, was there created master of arts on the 20th of December. This situation was very favourable to Mr Sherburne's taste and turn to letters, and he made use of the opportunity it gave him to prosecute his studies [B] with advantage,

(b) D. Alexander G. L. was an officer in M. Farnabie's, before he succeeded his father as head Master of St Paul School, Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 22.

(c) He wrote two poems, one intitled, The Battle of Gusty and Pouchers, and the other The History of Henry VII. with the Battle of Bosworth. Printed at Lond. 1633.

(d) In Wood's Fasti, col. 18. It is printed Feb. 13 Car. I. which must be a mistake and probably of the press, unless the grant was a revolutionary one.

nesses in the city, he removed about 1616, to Sevenoak in Kent, having purchased an estate at Oxford in that neighbourhood. Here he kept a boarding-school, and taught the sons of several noblemen and gentlemen, was greatly esteemed, grew rich, purchased an estate there also, and another near Hortham in Suffex. Upon the drawing of the civil war he was deemed ill affected to the parliament party (5), and being afterwards suspected to have favoured the rising of the country for the King about Newbridge in 1643, he was imprisoned first in Newgate, and thence put on board a ship, it being then moved in the House of Commons to send him to America; but that motion being at last rejected, he was removed to Ely-house in Holbourn, where he remained for about a year before his death, which happened in 1647. He was buried in the chancel of the church at Sevenoak, with this epitaph over his grave. P. M. Viri ornatissimi Thomæ Farnabii Armigeri. Causæ olim Regiæ, rei que publicæ, sed literariæ, vindicti acerrimi. Obiit 12, 1647.

Vatibus hic sacris qui lux Farnabius olim,
Vate carens saxo nunc sine luce jacet.

By his first wife Susan, daughter of John Pierce of Launcells in Cornwall, he had a son named John, who became a Captain in the King's army; to this son he left his estate in Suffex, where he lived in good esteem, dying about 1673. By his second wife Anne, daughter of Dr John Howson, Bishop of Durham, he had several children, one of which was named Francis, to whom he left his estate at Kippington, in the parish of Sevenoak, where he was living about 1700, in good repute. To him we are indebted for several particulars in this narrative, as Mr. Wood informs us, who gives Mr Farnabie for the chief Grammarian, Rhetorician, Poet, Latinist, and Grecian of his time, and tells us, that out of his school there issued more churchmen and statesmen than from any other school taught by one man in England. His memory is celebrated by several authors, as John Dunbar (6), Richard Bruch (7), and others. He published several books at London, for the use of schools, among which are Notæ ad Juvenalis & Persii Satyras, 1612. 8vo. Notæ ad Senecæ tragædias (8), 1613. 8vo. Notæ ad Martialis Epigrammata, 1615. 8vo. Genev. 1623. 1633. &c. in 12mo. Notæ ad Luciani Pharsalia, 1618, 8vo. Index Rhetoricus scholis & institutioni tenerionis ætatis accommodatus, 1625. 8vo. Phrasæ ora- toriæ elegantiores & poeticæ, 1618. 8vo 8th edit. Hirilegium epigrammatum Græcorum eorumque Latino versu a variis redditorum, 1629. 8vo. Notæ ad Virgilium 1634. 8vo. Notæ in Terentium, 12mo. Notæ in Ovidii Metamorph. libris 12 12mo and again in 1677, &c. Systema Grammaticum, 1641. 8vo. Index Rhetoricus & Oratorius cum formulis Oratorii & indice poetico, 1646. 8vo. Phrasologia Anglo Lat 80 Tabulæ Græcæ linguæ, 4to. Syntaxis in 8vo. Epistola variæ ad doctissimos viros

[B] He prosecuted his studies at Oxford.] As several others did, says our Antiquary, who, among the rest, particularly mentions Captain or Sir George Wharton, as having a place as well as Mr Sherburne in the artillery at Oxford: we shall therefore take this opportunity of supplying what may be thought an omission in the article of Lilly the astrologer, by the following account, in which will be found some entertaining incidents. Mr Wood informs us *, that Sir George was descended from an ancient and gentle family in Westmoreland, and born at Kirby Kendal in that county, April 4. 1617. spent some time as a sojourner at Oxford in 1633, and after; then retiring to his patrimony, he cultivated his genius for astronomy, being assisted by William Milbourne curate at Baussepeth, near Durham, and published almanacks by the name of George Naworth (9); but upon the growing rebellion he turned all his inheritance into money, and raised a gallant troop of horse in his Majesty's service. After several generous hazards of his person in battle, he was at last totally routed in March 1645, near Stow on the Would in Gloucestershire, where the valiant Sir Jacob Astley was taken prisoner, and Sir George received several scars of honour which he carried to his grave. Upon this misfortune he retired to Oxford to his Majesty, who, in recompence of his losses, made him treasurer and paymaster to the artillery under Sir John Heydon. Here at leisure hours he followed his studie, was entered of Queen's college, and might have been created Master of Arts, but neglected it † After the surrendry of Oxford, he retired to London, and, living privately, wrote several small pieces for a livelihood. But these giving offence to the then prevailing powers (10), he was often seized and imprisoned, as in the Gatehouse, Westminster, Newgate, and at length in Windfor Castle, when, being further threatened, he found a friend in Lilly the astrologer, though his antagonist in that art (a) After the Restoration he became treasurer and paymaster to the office of ordnance, generously

(a) Our author began the war with an attack upon Booker, in a piece intitled, Mercurio-calica Massix: or, an Anticaveat to all such as have heretofore had the misfortune to be cheated and deluded by that great and traitorous impostor, John Booker, in an answer to his frivolous pamphlet, entituled Mercurius Cæcicus: or, a Caveat to all the People of England. Oxon. 1644, in 4to. The blow was seconded in his Astrological Judgment upon his Majesty's march from Oxford, 7 of May, 1645, 4to wherein he fell severely both on Booker and Lilly. This piece being sent from Oxford to Sir Samuel Luke (a), Governor of Newport-Pagnel, was presented

(a) This Governor is we know not to be the hero of Hudibras, and perhaps Butler might take the hint of Wharcum's name from Wharton.

(1) When the Protestation was urged in 1641, he said he was better to have one King than five hundred. The design of this Protestation may be seen in Salmon's Chron. Hill. under 1641.

(6) In Epigram. Cent. 6. Lond. 1616. in cent. feat. num. 74.

(7) In libro seu cui titulus est Epigrammatum Hætonoides dox. Lond. 1627.

(8) Owen the Epigrammatist, with whom our author had a friendly acquaintance hath celebrated this piece, in Append. Epigr. num. 10.

* In Ath. Oxon: Vol. II. col. 683 to 686. inclusive.

(9) The anagram of his name. The first six only were printed under that anagram. They were intitled, Hæmonocopies, or Almanacks, and came out in 8vo from 1646 to 1666, and were reprinted in his Works.

† Gadbury by mistake says he actually took that degree. Preface to Sir George's Works.

(10) His Almanacks were seasoned with satirical epigrams, reflecting in the times and persons of the rebels, as he called them. Of the same stamp was his Mercurius Elenchus begun in 1647; and in 1648, he printed a list of those members of the House of Commons, as were officers of the army contrary to the self denying ordinance, &c.

advantage, as far as the duties of his post would permit, in which he continued to serve his royal master with unintermitting fidelity, during the four years of the civil wars. Upon the surrendry of Oxford to the Parliament in June 1646, he went to London, where he was entertained by a near relation, John Povey, Esq; at his chambers in the Middle Temple. He was now reduced to the state of a perfect philosopher, and carried all his possessions about him, his estate being seized by the antiroyalists, his house plundered, and all his personal effects and household goods carried off, among which was an ample and very valuable collection of books. And he was, even in this privacy, still persecuted with frequent midnight searches, and proclamation banishments out of the lines of communication as a malignant. In this distressful condition he felt the use and advantage of his learning; to this dernier resort he recurred, and had now the happiness to meet with his kinsman the learned and ingenious Thomas Stanley, Esq; who was a sufferer in the same cause, and had taken up his residence in chambers near those of Mr Povey. This was the first time they had seen one another (e), and the enjoyment became exquisite, by an unreserved communication and a lucky affinity of studies. Our author had not long finished a collection of poems and translations, upon which this friend wrote an excellent copy of commendatory verses [C]; when Sir George Savile, afterwards Marquis of presented to Lilly, who published an answer to it, together with his Starry Messenger, the same year (b). In return to which, Sir George, in his Almanack for that year, called Lilly an impudent and senseless fellow. Hereupon Lilly, who had been more inclined before to the interests of the King, now devoted himself entirely to the Parliament, and made reprisals upon Sir George, in his Almanack for the same year; wherein, from the King's nativity, he predicted his fatal overthrow at Naseby, in these words: If now [in June] we fight, a victory stealeth upon us (c). Sir George concluded the contest by a general storm, in a piece intituled, Merlini Anglici Errata: or, The Errors, Mistakes, &c. of Mr William Lilly's new Ephemeris for 1647, printed in that year.

(e) Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 284.

(b) Lilly's History of his own Life, p. 45. Lilly is Butler's Sidrophel, who, upon the approach of Hudibras, accosts his man thus:

Whacum, quoth he, look yonder, some generously repaid Lilly's courtesy, and out of the gains of his place having raised money to purchase an estate, he was created a Baronet, by patent dated December 31, 1677, which title descended to his son and heir, Sir Polycarp Wharton. He died at his house in Enfield, Middlesex, August 12, 1681, leaving behind him the character of a most loyal and generous cavalier, says Mr Wood, who further tells us, that Sir George was always esteemed the best astrologer that wrote the Ephemerides of his time, and went beyond Lilly and Booker (11), the idols of the vulgar; was a boon companion, a witty droll, and a waggish poet. Besides his astrological pieces, he published several others: the greatest part of his pieces were reprinted in 1683, 8vo, by John Gadbury, the almanack-maker, who being born at Wheatly, near Oxford, in 1627, and bound apprentice to a Taylor in that city, left his master after the great fire there in 1644, and having a natural genius to almanack-making, improved it at London, under Lilly, and afterwards set up that trade, jointly with it's consort of fortune-telling, for himself (12).
To try or use our art are come. Hud. Part III. Cant. iii. l. 488, 489.

Upon which Dr Grey observes, that Lilly being acquainted with Luke, from thence, and the Knight's figure, he might well know him at a distance.

(c) Ibid. p. 46.

One of our author's astrological pieces, intituled, The cabal of the twelve houses, from Morinus (13), has a recommendation annexed to it, signed William Oughtred, and dated October 16, 1659, in these terms: 'The cabal of the celestial houses, both for the number thereof, and for their signification, most accurately here first described by the learned author, being the grandest science astrological, I do very much applaud and admire, as having not thought that so much reason, and such natural correspondencies, could have been had in divers of these sublime mysteries' We therefore take this first opportunity of acknowledging our mistake in that eminent Mathematician's article (14).

Morinus, or John Baptist Morin, who was born in France, in 1583, was undeniably one of the most infatuated astrologers of his time; he ascribed all kinds of events to the influence of the stars; he even took a disgust to Physic, to which he was bred, because of the uncertainty he found in it, and applied himself to Astrology, as absolutely certain; and it is certain he made a good hand of the trade; for he acquired a fortune of 4000 livres * a year by it, which was a great estate at that time, and had a pension of 2000 livres settled upon him by Cardinal Mazarin. It is worth observing, that he incurred the like ridicule to that of his brother Astrologer Lilly (15). The story is this: Morin having succeeded Mr Sinclair in the post of Regius Professor of Mathematics in 1630, resolved to succeed him in his bed and money also, the widow being left rich. Accordingly he was upon his way to visit the lady, in that design, for the first time; when he was struck with great consternation, on finding the gate hung with black, and learning from the neighbours, that the person he was enquiring after would soon be interred (16). Surely he had not consulted the stars before he set out, or else he had not cast his figure right.

[C] His relation to Mr Stanley was endeared by an affinity of studies, &c. The relation between them probably arose by Sir Edward's mother, Frances, the second daughter of John Stanley, some time of Roydon-Hall in the county of Essex, Esq; descended from the Stanleys of Houghton in Cheshire (17). The affinity of their studies appears from the fruits of them, especially in this interval. Mr Stanley's may be seen in his article; and those of our author are, (1.) Medea, a tragedy. Lond. 1648, 8vo, translated from the Latin of Seneca into English verse, with annotations. (2.) Seneca's Answer to Lucilius his Quære, Why good men suffer misfortunes, seeing there is a divine Providence? Lond. 1648. The translation is in English verse, and was dedicated to King Charles the First, during his captivity in the Isle of Wight, who most graciously approved and accepted it *. (3.) Salmacis, Lyrian and Sylvia, Forsaken Lydia, The Rape of Helen, A Comment thereon, with several other poems. Lond. 1651, 8vo. The first three are translations in verse from the Italian of Preti, the French of St Amand, and the Italian of Morino. The Rape of Helen is from the Greek of Coluthus, and the annotations to it discover an ample fund of learning, which is very ingeniously applied. The Greek poet was a native of Lycopolis in the Thebaide, and flourished under the empire of Anastasius, between 491 and 518. All we have left of him is this poem, and it is no considerable performance (18). However, besides the English version, it has been since translated into French by M. du Molard, and published in 1742, with annotations; and since that, a new edition of the original was printed at Leyden, as I am informed, a few years ago. It was upon these translations, that Mr Stanley complimented his friend, in the verses mentioned above, which begin thus:

Dear friend, I question, nor can yet decide,
Whether thou more art my delight or pride.

(16) Boyle's Dictionary, under his article.

(17) So it is in Wood, but perhaps it should be Lancashire.

* Id. ibid.

(18) Suidas looks on Coluthus as a versifier, rather than a poet; and Rapin observes, that the design is little, the stile trite and languishing, and that the Judgment of Paris is the best thing in it. Reflex. sur la Poetique, Part ii. p. 15.

And

(11) See some account of Booker in Lilly's article.

(12) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 686.

(13) The Latin title is, Abronomicarum domorum Cabala detecta. Which ought to have been rendered thus: The Mysteries of the Astronomical Houses revealed.

(14) Viz. in remark [N], note 13.

* About 180 l. Sterling.

(15) See his article, in remark [N] at the end of Halifax, returning from his travels about the year 1651 or 1652, he was made superintendant of his affairs [D], and by the recommendation of his mother the Lady Savile*,

* The an-...
of the... who was a very extraordinary person, in the life of Dr John Berwick.

And the compliment had been first paid by our author, in some verses to Mr Stanley, on his inimitable poems, which were likewise published in 1651. They end thus :

If 'bove all laurels then thy merits rise,
What can this sprig (which while 'tis offer'd dies)
Add to the wreath that does adorn thy brows ?
No bays will suit with that but thy own bows †.

† Ethica, p. 154.

The rest of Mr Sherburne's book is divided into what he calls Luliera and Ethica, the former of which might have been entitled Love Poems, as well as Mr Stanley's, all the original pieces being such ; and in them he has shewn himself a great master of the rhythmus : in the variety of his measures he even rivals Horace. The rest are translations from Theocritus, Horace, Martial, Ausonius, Marino, and some others. The last part is justly titled Ethica, as consisting of serious poems both moral and divine. It will not be amiss, as the book is somewhat scarce, to give the reader a specimen, by way of taste, of Mr Sherburne's poetry, as follows :

On Chloris eyes and breasts.

Chloris, on thine eyes I gaz'd,
When amaz'd
At their brightness ;
On thy breasts I cast my look,
No less took
With their whiteness :
Both I justly did admire ;
These all snow, and those all fire.

Whilst these wonders I survey'd,
Thus I said,
' In much suspense ;
Nature could have done no less
To express
Her Providence,
Than that two such fair worlds might
Have two suns to give them light.

[D] He was made superintendant of Lord Halifax's, then Sir George Savile's, affairs.] This nobleman, who was as great a Statesman as any of his time ||, was descended from a family of great antiquity in Yorkshire, some of whom had matched with the heirs of Rochelas, Gother, Tankersley, Rochdale, Latham, and Rusworth, and other worthy families, before the reign of Richard II. About which time Sir John Savile, the legal heir in the ninth generation, married Isabel, daughter and heir to Thomas Eland, of Eland, in the same county, by whom he had diverse sons ; but the line of the eldest failing, the descent was continued in Henry his second son, who marrying the daughter and heir of Simon Thornhill, of Thornhill, had issue by her, Sir Thomas Savile, father of Sir John Savile, Lord of Thornhill, Eland, and Tankersley. This Sir John, besides others, had two sons, the eldest of whom was Sir John Savile of Eland, of whom proceeded the Savile Earls of Suffolk. The second son was Thomas Savile of Lupset, whose grandson Henry was Sheriff of Yorkshire, and of the council for the North in the time of Queen Elizabeth. This Henry, by the daughter and heir of William Vernon, of Barrowby in Leicestershire, had issue Sir George Savile of Thornhill, Knight and Baronet, who by Mary, daughter to George Earl of Shrewsbury, had issue a second Sir George, Knight, who dying in his father's life-time, had issue Sir George Savile, who succeeded to the title and estate ; but dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother Sir William Savile. This Sir William marrying Anne daughter of Thomas Lord Coventry, Keeper of the Great Seal, became father to Sir George Savile (19), the subject of the present remark ; who was probably born about 1630, as is conjectured from the time of returning from his travels abovementioned. He contributed all he could to bring about the Restoration, and soon distinguishing himself after that era by his great abilities, was created a peer, in consideration of his own and his father's merits to the crown †. In 1668, he was appointed of that remarkable Committee, who sat at Brook-hall for the examination of the accounts of the money, which had been given during the Dutch war (20), of which no member of the House of Commons was admitted. In April 1672, he was called to a seat in the Privy-Council and in June following went into Holland with the Duke of Bucks and the Earl of Arlington, as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary (21), to treat about a peace with France, when he met with great opposition from his colleagues. In 1675, he opposed with vigour the non-resisting test bill, and was removed from the council board the year following, by the interest of the Earl of Danby the Treasurer, whom he had provoked by a shaft of his wit. In the examinations before the council, concerning the revenue of Ireland, in which Lord Widdrington having confessed that he had made an offer of a considerable sum of money to the Lord Treasurer, and that his Lordship had rejected the offer mildly, in such a manner as not to discourage a second attempt ; Lord Halifax observed upon this, that it would be somewhat strange if a man should ask the use of another man's wife, and the other should indeed refuse it, but with great civility. His removal was very agreeable to the Duke of York, who at that time had a more violent aversion to him, than even to Shaftesbury himself, because he had spoke with great firmness and spirit in the House of Lords, against the declaration for a Toleration †. However, upon a change of the ministry in 1679, his Lordship was made a member of the new council (22). And the same year in the consultations about the bill of exclusion, he seem'd averse to it, but propos'd such limitations of the Duke's authority, as should disable him from doing any harm either in church or state ; such as the taking out of his hands all power in ecclesiastical matters, the disposal of the public money, and the power of making peace or war, and lodging these in the two Houses of Parliament ; and that the Parliament in being at the King's death, should continue without a new summons, and assume the administration. But his Lordship's arguing so much against the danger of turning the monarchy by the bill of exclusion into an elective government, was thought the more extraordinary, because he had made an hereditary King the subject of his mirth, heightened with this witty saw, ' Who takes a coachman to drive him, because his father was a good coachman ? ' Yet he was now jealous of a small slip in the succession, though at the same time he studied to infuse into some persons a zeal for a commonwealth, pretending to these that he preferred limitations to an exclusion, because the one kept up the monarchy still, only passing over one person, whereas the other really introduced a commonwealth, as soon as there was a Popish king upon the throne. And it was said by some of his friends, that the limitations propos'd were so advantageous to public liberty, that a man might be tempted to wish for a Popish king in order to obtain them. Upon this difference of opinions, a faction was quickly formed in the new council, Halifax, Essex, and Sanderland, declaring for limitations, and against the exclusion, while Shaftesbury was equally zealous for the latter. When the bill was brought into the House of Lords, Halifax appear'd with great resolution at the head of the debates against it : This so highly exasperated the House of Commons, that they address'd the King to remove him from his councils and presence for ever. But he prevail'd with his Majesty soon after to dissolve that parliament, and was created an Earl. However, upon his Majesty's deferring to call a new parliament according to his promise to his Lordship, he fell sick through vexation of mind, and expostulated severely with those who were sent to him upon that affair, refusing the post both of Secretary of State, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. A parliament being called in 1680, he still oppos'd the exclusion bill, and gain'd great reputation by his management of the debates, though it occasioned a new address from the House of Commons

† By the title of Earl Savile of Eland.

(20) The chairman was Lord Breton, who spent all his life in search of the Philosopher's stone, by which he ruin'd his affairs ; but was a man of great integrity, and proof against either the flatteries, hopes,
or threatenings,
of the lowering
Court. Burnet's History of his own Times,
Vol. I. fol. edit.

(21) Lewis XIV. was then at Utrecht, and they had some private instructions relating to the war ; but they return'd without doing any thing.
General History of England, and
Sir William
Temple's Memoirs.

† Burnet.

(22) It was upon this occasion,
that he publish'd
the character of a Trimmer, which was an-swere'd by the Earl of Mulgrave, in his Character of a Tory. See his article, remark
[N].

|| For that reason we have taken this opportunity of supplying, in some measure,
the omission of his article in it's proper place.

(19) Baronetage of England, Vol.
1. p. 162, & seq.
edit. 1741.

some time after Mr Sherburne was appointed to attend her nephew Sir John Coventry, as his tutor or governor in his travels abroad. He left England with this charge in the beginning of March 1654, and having visited all parts of France, proceeded to Italy, some part of Hungary, the greater part of Germany, Holland, and the rest of the Low-Countries, and returned about the end of October, 1659, in the dawn of the Restoration. Mr Wood, who seems to have had some personal knowledge of him, tells us, that he made the best use of this tour in improving himself in polite literature, and leads us to infer, that he was a completely genteel scholar. When he put in his claim for his place in the ordnance the next year, the Oxford Antiquary, on this occasion, treats with his usual rudeness (f), Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterwards Lord Shaftesbury, who, he informs us, though a relation of Mr Sherburne's late pupil, had put another into his place, after his old sequestrators were dead, so that he was obliged to be at the expense of pleading his right before the house of peers, before he could get readmittance. The same historian likewise informs us, that after some time of the King's settlement, Mr Sherburne

(f) He calls his Honour a busy meddling fellow. Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 19.

|| Birch's Lives of Illustrious Men, &c. Vol. I.

‡ The Duke of Bucks says, the Prince of Orange had always forbidden his agents ever to trust him with their design. Account of the Revolution, in the Duke's Works, Vol. II.

* This is said to be a sort of trial, before that party would entirely confide in him; and that he was added to the two other Lords, to be at the head of the Commission, by the Prince himself, who could not help smiling, as he owned afterwards, to see him, who came a commissioner to him from the other side, accept to act so low a part so very willingly. Id. ibid.

§ He was offered to be First Commissioner of the Chancery, but refused it. General Histories of England.

(23) Ibid. where we find him to be one of the bail for the Earl, afterwards Duke, of Marlborough, accused of being engaged in the Association plot by Young, in 1692.

† Tindal's Continuation of Rapin's History of England.

to remove him. However, after rejecting that Bill in the House of Lords, his Lordship pressed them, though without success, to proceed to limitations, and begun with moving that the Duke might be obliged to live 500 miles out of England during the King's life ||. In August 1682, he was created a marquis; and soon after made Privy-Seal; and upon King James's accession, President of the Council: but on refusing his consent to the repeal of the tests, he was told by that monarch, that though he could never forget his past services, yet since he would not comply in that point, he was resolved to have all of a piece, and so his Lordship was dismissed from all public employments. He was afterwards consulted by Mr Sidney, whether he would advise the Prince of Orange's coming over, but the matter being opened to him at a great distance, he did not encourage a further freedom; looking on the attempt as impracticable, since it depended on so many accidents †. Upon the arrival of that Prince, he was sent by the King, with the Earls of Rochester and Godolphin, to treat with him, then at Hungerford. In that assembly of the Lords, which met after King James's withdrawing himself the first time from Whitehall, the Marquis was chosen their president; and upon the King's return from Feverham, he was sent together with the Earl of Shrewsbury and Lord Delamere, from the Prince, ordering his Majesty to quit his palace at Whitehall, and retire to Hull*. In the Convention-parliament he was chosen Speaker of the House of Lords, and strenuously supported the motion for the vacancy of the throne, and the conjunctive Sovereignty of the Prince and Princess, upon whose accession he was again made Privy-Seal §; but in the session of 1689, upon the enquiry into the authors of the prosecutions against Lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, &c. the Marquis having concurred in these councils in 1683, now quitted the court, and became a zealous opposer of the measures of the government (23) 'till his death, which happened in April 1695, being occasioned by a gangrene in a rupture that he had long neglected. When he saw death inevitably approaching, he shewed a philosophical firmness of mind, and professed himself a sincere Christian, lamenting the former part of his life, with solemn resolutions of becoming a new man if God would raise him up †. Bishop Burnet characterizes him as follows. 'He was a man of great and ready wit, full of life, and very pleasant, much turned to satire; he let his wit turn upon matters of religion, so that he passed for a bold and determined atheist, though he often protested to me, says the Bishop, that he was not one, and said he believed there was not one in the world. He confessed he could not swallow down every thing that divines impose on the world, he was a Christian in submission, he believed as much as he could, and hoped, that God would not lay it to his charge, if he could not digest iron as an ostrich did, nor take into his belief things that must burst him. If he had any scruples they were not fought for, nor cherished by him, for he never read an atheistical book. In a fit of sickness, continues this prelate, I knew him very much affected with a sense of religion: I was then often with him, he seemed full of good purposes; but they went off with his sickness; he was continually talking of morality and friendship. He was punctual in all his payments, and just in all private dealings: but with relation to the public he went ' backward and forward, and changed sides so often, that in the conclusion no side trusted him. He seemed full of commonwealth notions, yet he went into the worst part of King Charles's reign. The liveliness of his imagination was always too hard for his judgment. A severe jest was preferred by him to all arguments whatever; and he was endless in council, for when after much discourse a point was settled, if he could find a new jest, whereby he could make that which was digested by himself seem ridiculous, he could not hold, but would study to raise the credit of his wit, though it made others call his judgment in question. When he talked to me, as a philosopher, of his contempt of the world, I asked him what he meant by getting so many new titles, which I called the hanging himself about with bells and tinsel; he had no other excuse for it but this, that if the world were such fools as to value those matters, a man must be a fool for company, he considered them but as rattles, yet rattles please children, so these might be of use to his family. His heart was much set on raising his family; but though he made a vast estate for them, he buried two of his sons, and almost all his grandchildren. The son that survived him was an honest man, but far inferior to him (24, and this son dying without issue male Aug. 31, 1700, the dignity became extinct in this family, and the title of Earl of Halifax was revived in the person of Charles Montague the same year (25).'

The Marquis was twice married, first to Dorothy, daughter of Henry Spencer Earl of Sunderland, by whom he had issue Henry, William, George, and Anne. Henry married Esther, daughter and coheir of George de la Tour*, but died in his father's life time, without issue (26). Anne was married to John Baron Vaughan. The Marquis's second wife was Gertrude, daughter to William Pierpoint, Esq; of Thoresby in Nottinghamshire, second son to the Earl of Kingston; by whom he had issue only a daughter, heir apparent to her mother, married to Philip, eldest son of Philip Stanhope Earl of Chesterfield, and father to the present Earl.

His son William succeeded him in the honour and estate, and married also two wives. 1. Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Samuel Grimston of Gorambury in Hertfordshire, Bart. sister and heir to Sir Harbottle Grimston, by whom he had issue George and other children, who died infants in their father's life-time. Also a daughter Anne, sole heir to her mother, and married to Thomas Bruce, son and heir apparent to Thomas Earl of Aylesbury. His second wife was Mary, daughter to Daniel Finch Earl of Nottingham (by Essex, daughter and coheir to Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick and Holland), by whom he left only two daughters, Dorothy, married to the Earl of Burlington, and Mary, married to the Earl of Thanet (27).

Besides the Character of a Trimmer, the Marquis wrote Advice to a Daughter; The Anatomy of an Equivalent; A Letter to a Dissenter upon his Majesty's late glorious declaration of indulgences; A rough draught of a new model at sea in 1694; Maxims of State: all which were printed together after his death, and the third edition came out in 1717, 8vo. since these there was also published under his name, The Character of King Charles II. to which is subjoined Maxims of State, &c. (28) Lond. 1750. 8vo. All his pieces are wrote with spirit and elegance.

(24) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. fol. edit.

(25) See his article.

* Marquis of Gouverneur in France.

(26) As did also George, the youngest, being slain at the siege of Buda in 1688. Mr Wood, in the list of creations of Doctors of Law at Oxford, anno 1683, mentions, by mistake, among others, who were nominated May 23, but never appeared, George Savile, Lord Eland, eldest son of George Marquis of Halifax. Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 223.

(27) Baronetage of England, ubi supra.

(28) These are more in number than those which had before.

Mr. Sherburne met with a discouragement worse than the former: for by the politic reducers of the charge of his Majesty's revenue, he was retrenched from the best perquisites of his office to the value of no less than 500*l. per annum*, and never received any consideration more than what the King was pleased of his own bounty to confer upon him, which was 100*l. per annum*, in compensation of quadruple the loss he sustained. However, being unmarried, and bookishly inclined, he indulged that disposition, and, by degrees, furnished himself with a large collection of curious books, so that his library was esteemed one of the most considerable belonging to any gentleman in or near London (g). 'Twas here that he passed his happiest hours, not without some emolument to the public. In 1675 he published at London in folio, The Sphere of Marcus Manilius, made an English poem, with annotations, and an astronomical index. It was intended chiefly for the use of the young gentry and nobility, to serve as an initiation in the first rudiments of spherical learning, and was thought worthy of a particular recommendation by the Royal Society [E]. In 1679 he printed likewise at London in 8vo, Troades; or the Royal Captives, a Tragedy (b), translated from the Latin of Seneca, with annotations. About this time he suffered many indignities on account of the Popish plot, and several attempts were made to remove him from his place in the Ordnance, as a suspected Papist. These however proved ineffectual, and on the 6th of January 1682, his Majesty, in consideration of his loyalty and sufferings, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, in his private bedchamber at Whitehall. But being at last deprived upon the Revolution, he retired, and passed the remainder of his days in a devout and studious course of life near London, cheerfully spending his time altogether in books and prayer. It appears from Mr Wood's account, that he probably survived the close of the last century, but how long is still unknown (i).

He had a younger brother, Henry Sherburne, who was also created A. M. at the same time with himself, and was soon after made comptroller of the Ordnance in the army of Ralph Lord Hopton. While he resided at Oxford he drew an exact Ichnography of that city, as it was then a garrison for his Majesty, with all the fortifications, &c. It was done for the use of Sir Thomas Glemham, then governour, who shewing it to the King,

(g) Γαλι Οξον. as before.

(b) He had likewise in MS. a translation of Seneca's tragedy of Hippolytus. He was of opinion, and endeavoured to prove it, that these two, with the Medea before mentioned, were all that were genuine of Seneca.

(i) This misfortune happens from the Oxford Antiquary's carrying on his Work no longer than the year 1700. His diligence in procuring dates to facts is one very useful part of that work.

[E] His Manilius was recommended by the Royal Society. Their account is printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 110, in these terms. 'The learned and intelligent author of this work, rightly considering the great importance of the mutual helps which the knowledge of antiquity, and the pleasure of the new discoveries of the present times may afford to one another, thought fit to employ part of his ingenious talent in rendering English this antient poem; the famous author whereof, desirous to inculcate knowledge with delight, was pleased to exhibit to the age wherein he lived, the principles of astronomy in a poetical dress, in which several particulars occur, touching the nature of the heavens and the celestial bodies, that agree with the assertions of some of the most eminent modern astronomers: as the fluidity of the heavens against the Aristotelian solidity of the orbs (28), the position of the fixed stars not in the same concave superficies equally distant from the center of the universe, but at unequal distances in the ætherial region (whence the difference of their apparent magnitude and splendor) (29), the fiery nature and substance of the fixed stars, and consequently their being endued with native lustre (30), and the galaxy's being an aggregate of numberless small stars (31). The poem begins with a succinct indication of the original and progress of arts and sciences, more particularly of Astronomy; of which last, besides what the Englisher hath noted in his not common marginal illustrations, he hath added for the satisfaction of the more curious, a compendious history continued to the time of Manilius, together with a most instructive catalogue of the most eminent astronomers, from the first parent of all arts and mankind itself to this present time. Secondly, the poem being carried on with a description of the mundane system, and the celestial signs and constellations; the former of these our interpreter hath explained according to the various hypotheses both ancient and modern, the latter he hath described by the number of the stars that compose them, their several denominations in most of the learned languages, and as they are distinguished into sacred and profane figures, according to the different uranography of the ancient heathens, and some late christian astronomers. The third part of the poem containing a description of the celestial circles, for the better understanding of these, besides the explanations in the marginal notes, our author hath added a cosmographical astronomical synopsis mostly from Merfennus, to which is annexed the twelve propositions of Theodosius de Habitationibus in English. And Manilius having touched upon the fiery nature of the fixed stars, this interpreter hath made some further and more curious inquiries about their substance, light, colour, scintillations, number, figure, magnitude, place, and distance from the earth, or rather the sun. In the next place, the planets are enumerated, and the several denominations by which they were known and distinguished by the Ancients. The interpreter hath given in his notes, further enlarging about the nature and substance of the sun, his maculæ and sæculæ (which are likewise represented in a particular scheme) something also being said of his vertiginous motion, magnitude, and distance, as also of the moon and her spots, adding thereto the selenographical schemes of Hevelius and Grimaldi, with their respective nomenclatures; and withal exhibiting a brief account of the nature, substance, structure, figure, magnitude, and distance of the other planets. And because this poem concludes with a corollary of fiery meteors and comets, our author hath in part explained them also in his notes, more fully discoursing in the appendix, of their names, kinds, and several species, their matter, place, and efficient causes, adding in the close a chronological historical table of the most remarkable comets that have appeared since the Flood to this present. Having in the illustration of the whole observed the method expressed by Justinian. Ita omnia videntur tradi commodissime, si primo levi ac simpliciter via, deinde diligentiori atque exactiori interpretatione singula tradantur (32). Nor hath the interpreter omitted to inform his reader touching Manilius's life, country, quality, studies, writings, &c. In the doing of which, as well as in composing the whole work, he hath given sufficient proof of his more than ordinary acquaintance both with ancient and modern writings.

He adorns the whole as with many other very fair schemes, so with those of the two hemispheres of the stars, one for the northern and the other the southern constellations, wherein the stars are expressed according to their magnitude, as appears in the scale thereof, inserted in the Southern hemisphere. And the constellations are only pricked out, wherein with Gallucius, the middle way is taken between not placing them in any, or representing them in too dark shadowed figures, as some have done.'

[A] He

(28) This being embraced and demonstrated by Tycho, Galilæo, Scheinerus, and others, paved for a modern discovery.

(29) Many had taken this also for a novel opinion, as being lately asserted and maintained by the famous Kepler, Epic. Astron. l. b. i. and other modern Astronomers.

(30) The proof of this is particularly laboured by Galilæo, who first of the Moderns maintains them to be so many suns, convincingly to our fan.

(31) This was generally thought to have been a discovery owing to the telescope, from the observations made therein by the said Galilæo, Kepler, and others.

(32) Instit. lib. i. tit. 1.

King, his Majesty approved of it, and wrote in it the names of the bastions with his own hand; and as a mark of his favour was pleased to confer upon him the post of his chief engineer, then void by the death of Sir Charles Lloyd. But he did not enjoy this favour long, being killed in a mutiny that happened among some of the soldiers in Oxford, on the 12th of June 1646; whereupon his body was interred the next day, in the church of St Peter in the East in that city (k).

P

(k) Fasti Oxon. col. 19.

(a) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1707; where it is recorded, that he died that year in the 67th of his age.

(b) Preface to Dr South's Animadversions, &c. p. 3. edit. 1693.

(c) Monthly Miscellany, or Memoirs for the Curious, Vol. I. p. 298.

(d) From the College Register. His tutor was John Standish, B. D. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1110.

(1) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 461, 462. fol. edit.

(2) See Archbishop Whitgift's article.

SHERLOCK [WILLIAM] an eminent Divine, was born in the year 1641 (a), in Gravel-lane, Southwark (b), where his father was a tradesman of good repute, and having a competent fortune, sent his son, a boy of a promising genius, to Eton school, where, being very industrious, he became remarkable for the strength and vigour of his parts (c), so that at the age of fifteen years he was judged fit for the university, and was accordingly admitted into Peter-house college in Cambridge in 1650 (d), where he behaved so well as to receive a particular encouragement in a benefaction arising from a scheme of Matthew Pool's, for maintaining young men of eminent parts at that university in the study of divinity (e). With this advantage he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in the year of the Restoration (f), and entering into holy orders not long after, he exercised his faculty as a curate (g) and commenced Master of Arts in 1663 (h). He continued in the station of a curate till 1669, when he was preferred to the rectory of St George's Botolph-lane, London (i). In this parish he discharged the duties of his function with a commendable zeal and piety, and was esteemed one of the ornaments of the London Clergy [A], but being ambitious to make his character and talents more extensively useful to the Church, he resolved to expose in print the absurdities of the Solifidian and Antinomian Doctrines, which at that time still prevailed among the sectaries. To this purpose he published in 1673 (k), a treatise entituled, A discourse concerning the knowledge of Christ, and our union and communion with him, &c. [B]. This attack upon their darling notions

(e) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 256. edit. 1753.

(f) From the University Register.

(g) South's Animadversions, as before.

(h) Birch, as before.

(i) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 354.

(k) The imprimatur is dated May 30, 1673. The second edition came out in 1674.

[A] He was one of the ornaments of the London Clergy.] Bishop Burnet, speaking of the different behaviour of the clergy in those times, observes, that as there were many of that order, whom the heat of their temper and the hope of preferment drove to extravagancies [against the Dissenters]; so there were still many worthy and eminent men among them, whose lives and labours did in a great measure, rescue the Church from those reproaches that the follies of others drew upon it. Such, continues he, besides those whom I have often named, were Tenison, Sharp, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Calamy, Claget, Cudworth, the two Mores, Williams (1).

[B] Was executed with that boldness which was natural to our author.] The solifidian and antinomian principles, from their first appearance in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (2), took such deep rooting, and spread so wide under Cromwell's usurpation, that they were espoused by great numbers, when our author undertook this treatise, where having shewn wherein the knowledge of Christ consists, the sum of which is, that to know Christ is to understand his gospel, which contains all the revelations he made of God's will; he proceeds to examine another notion of the knowledge of Christ, very distinct, he says, from the former, and that is an acquaintance with the person of Christ, particularly as it is stated in Dr John Owen's book intituled, Communion with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, each person distinctly. He declares, that in the management of it he had carefully avoided all personal reflections; while his adversaries pretended to argue gravely, he had examined their arguments with all possible gravity and solemnity: But however where they plainly toy and trifle, he had so far complied with their humour as to smile sometimes, though as modestly as any man could desire. The drollery of his manner is somewhat entertaining, and therefore we shall give a specimen of it as follows. In order to give his reader a clear understanding of the whole design and contrivance of this doctrine concerning an acquaintance with the person of Christ, he puts every thing into what he calls it's just and natural order. God then from the beginning designed to glorify his justice, and his mercy, and because there had been no occasion either to punish or pardon unless man had sinned, he appointed and ordained sin for the glory of his vindictive justice, and pardoning grace, and accordingly since nothing can withstand the decrees and appointment of God, it pleased God that man should sin; but when he had sinned, God is extremely displeas'd with it, and now his justice must be satisfied; for it is impossible for God to forgive the least sin, without a complete and perfect satisfaction. This falls hard upon those miserable wretches whose ill fortune it was, without any fault of theirs, to be left out of the roll of election, and who have no way to satisfy the divine justice but by their eternal torments. By this it appears how rigorously just God is, that he will never pardon the least sin, when he can serve his own glory by the misery and confusion of sinners

But this is but one part of the glory of God, to be just in punishing sin; the other is, to shew mercy in sparing and rewarding the sinners. Now here was the great difficulty, how God should be just and merciful too, when justice requires a full satisfaction, and mercy excludes all desert; for the demerit of sin being infinite, no creature can expiate sin but by enduring infinite, that is endless, torments; and those who must be always miserable, can never be the subjects of God's mercy.

To unite these two extremes, and reconcile such contradictions, was a work of infinite wisdom as well as goodness, and it was effected thus: God sends his only begotten son, our Lord Jesus Christ, into the world, to fulfil all righteousness in his life and to make a full satisfaction for sin by his death; for his blood being of infinite value, (as being the blood of the Son of God) would expiate an infinite guilt, and so make a compleat satisfaction to justice, which is more glorified by the death of Christ, than by the eternal miseries of all the sinners in the world, because it discovers the naturalness of justice to God, which is the position to be maintained, that he would not pardon without full satisfaction; that is, that he is so just that he hath not one dram of goodness in him 'till his rage and vengeance be satisfied, which, says he, is, I confess, a glorious kind of justice. But now the justice and vengeance of God having their actions assigned them to the full, that is, (for I can make no better of it) being glutted and satiated with the blood of Christ, God may pardon as many and great sins as he pleases, without fear of the least imputation of injustice; and now a glorious and more comfortable scene of mercy begins to appear, now God embraces sinners as a kind father, and accounts them perfectly innocent in virtue of that satisfaction Christ hath made for their sins; but this is not enough, the law of God must be fulfilled as well as his justice satisfied, we must be righteous as well as innocent, otherwise we may escape punishment but can expect no reward, though I confess I should have thought that Christ had satisfied for sins of omission, together with sins of commission, and as by his satisfaction for our doing what we ought not to do, we are reputed by God as having never done any thing amiss, so by his satisfaction for our neglecting what we ought to have done, we might by the same reason be reputed by notions being executed with that boldness which was natural to our author's temper, presently

by God perfectly righteous to have done all that we ought to have done, to have kept the whole law; but it seems this was not sufficient, and therefore the satisfaction of Christ is imputed to us to make us perfectly righteous, and this makes the grace of God perfectly free, without any suspicion of merit or desert in us. And now God and sinners may agree very well and walk comfortably together, for though they have guilt enough, and he justice enough to destroy a world, yet there is no danger, since Christ hath satisfied justice: and though he be infinitely holy and pure perfect light, and sinners abominably filthy, yet there is no fear he should loath and abhor them, when they are cloathed with the white and spotless robes of Christ's righteousness; and they are so well acquainted now with the design of God to advance the glory of his free grace in their salvation, that they are very secure that neither their past sins nor present habitual impurities can do them any hurt, but they shall be saved with a notwithstanding their sins (3).

This is in his grave way, but his pleasantry will perhaps be more entertaining to some people. Let us take that instance of it, where he rallies Dr Owen's manner of explaining the notion, that the personal righteousness of Christ becomes our personal righteousness, where though there be an union of persons, yet is there no personal only a legal union; Christ as our Mediator having fulfilled for us all that righteousness which is required of us (4). In shewing what this righteousness is, the Doctor [Owen] having first excluded the habitual inherent righteousness of Christ, or his perfect conformity to the law or will of God, and also his actual obedience to any peculiar law of the Mediator which respected himself inereely, declares this righteousness is that which concerns Christ in a private capacity as a man subject to the law, that is, whatever was required of us by virtue of any law, that he did and fulfilled; which is that actual obedience of Christ which he performed for us. In answer to this, our author remarks first, that it is strange Christ should do whatever is required of us by virtue of any law, when he was neither husband nor wife, nor father, merchant, or tradesman, seaman or soldier, captain or lieutenant, much less a temporal prince or monarch. However, continues he, setting aside this difficulty of proving that Christ did what he never did. Let us consider how the Doctor proves that what Christ did, he did for us and in our stead. And here he makes use of a little reason and a great deal of scripture to as little purpose (5). And to prepare the way for his reasoning, I find, says he, the Doctor much puzzled, and don't wonder at it, to prove that Christ acted as Mediator in those things which did not concern the law of his mediation, and which he did as a private man subject to the law. For he tells us, that of this expression 'as Mediator' there is a double sense, it may be taken strictly as relating solely to the law of the Mediator, and so Christ may be said to do as Mediator only, what he did in obedience to that law (that is only what he did as Mediator, which is a pretty observation) but in the sense now insisted on (that is not strictly as Mediator but as not Mediator). Whatsoever Christ did as a man subject to the law, he did as a Mediator, because he did it as part of the duty incumbent on him who undertook so to be; the meaning of which is, that he who was Mediator, being bound to do such things though not as Mediator, but as a man subject to the law, yet he did them as Mediator, because he was a Mediator who did them; which is just as good an argument as it would be to prove, that every Ambassador eats, and drinks, and sleeps as an Ambassador, because though this be no part of his Embassy, yet he is an Ambassador who does it; which is such an exposition of Christ's mediatorial office as the subtletest schoolmen of them all never yet thought of. This difficulty of Christ's doing the things as Mediator, which did not belong to the laws of his Mediation, required great skill in logic to get rid of: but however it was wisely done to make a shew of saying something to that which cannot be answered. For he was sensible that what Christ did as Mediator, could not be imputed to us as though we had done it, though the fruits of it are; because we were never designed to be Mediators, and the righteousness of a Mediator is as improper to be imputed to those who are not Mediators, as it is to impute the righteousness of a prince to a beggar; and therefore that the righteousness of Christ might be fit to be imputed to us as our righteousness, he was forced to consider him not as a Mediator, but as a private person subject to the law, who did whatever was required of us by virtue of any law; though this too was impossible, for he could not at the same time act so many different and opposite parts as there are relations and conditions of men in the world. And yet when he thought on it again, he found, that it was not the righteousness of a private person that would avail us, though it were never so perfect, (because we have no way to come at it to make it ours) but only the righteousness of a Mediator, who did whatever he did, for us and in our stead. And so he wheels about again, and tells us, that though what Christ did as a man subject to the law, did not belong to the law of his mediation, yet he did it as Mediator, because he was a Mediator that did it. And thus he is caught in the net and labyrinth of his own making, and the more he turns and winds himself the faster it holds him. 'A Mediator who acts as a Mediator in a private capacity as a man subject to the law.' I shall certainly believe, as they say some country people do, that Logie is conjuring, if it can reconcile such palpable contradictions (6). Our author, while he thus pursues Dr Owen, the then Captain of this new way of salvation, through all the shifts and sophistries of an evasive Logie, with all the nerves of reason and rhetoric, fails not up and down to throw a slight smile upon the under-workmen, who rise not above the character of verbal triflers. These were very numerous, as we have seen above. One of these explaining the riches of Christ in Ephes. iii. 8. sports and toys with words and metaphors in the following manner: That he is rich, because he hath a rich dowry, having all the world given to him as his proper inheritance: 'That he keeps open house, and maintains all the creation at his own charge, and that he hath done this six thousand years, which would have broken him long time since had he not been very rich, and that he does not enrich all the saints, but all of the saints, their understandings with glorious light, their consciences with quickness, pureness, &c. And that after all this vast expence he is never the poorer, that he is not a penny the poorer for all that he hath laid out for the relief of those that have their dependence on him. And that Jesus Christ is generally rich, rich in houses and lands, though he had not a place whereon to lay his head; in gold and silver, in cattle, in all temporals as well as spirituals, and that he hath a great tribute and rent due to him, that is the great Landlord and Owner of all that men possess above and below (7).' Another of the same stamp having published an invitation of young women to Christ, exhorts them to chuse Christ for their husband. 'You must be sick of love, says he, of love to Christ, and let him be always as a bundle of myrrh between your breasts. Christ is maxime deligibilis, as the schoolmen speak. He is the very abstract and quintessence of beauty. He is a whole paradise of delights. He is the flower of Charan, enriched with orient colours, and perfumed with the sweetest favour; O! carry this flower not in your bosoms but in your hearts, and be always smelling to it, and shew your love to this lovely Saviour.' These, says our author, are very fine things to persuade young women to accept of Christ for their husband, since they can never expect so rich and advantageous a match any where else. The doctor smiles at these pretty spiritual conceits, as modestly, to use his own words, as a man can desire; so much at least will be allowed, that these precious saints made as bold with their Saviour, as our author has done with them, and upon that account he was induced to give way to the natural bent of his genius with less reserve, in a view of flaming them, if possible, out of that audacious confidence to which the doctrine of an intimate familiar acquaintance with Christ's person, of coming to and closing with him, and leaning, and resting, and rolling their souls upon him, for salvation, had carried them. 'To be a match for such men, required a suitable degree of hardness, and he did not spare to rouse the whole nest of them, with their captain, Dr Owen, at their head, from whom, who he allows to write with learning and subtilty, he descends to the inferior tribe, as Shephard's Sincere Convert, as also his Sound Believer; Wafson's Tracts, viz.

(3) Union and Communion, p. 40, & seq.

(4) Ibid. p. 178.

(5) Ibid. p. 182.

(6) Knowledge of Christ, p. 207, & seq.

(7) Brooke's Riches of Christ, p. 73.

(1) i. e. The Independents; These tenets were generally rejected by the Presbyterians, and Mr Baxter particularly had wrote against them before this, as our author takes notice in the preface to this book.

(8) So he is called by Mr Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 893 to 896. but his true name (which he concealed) was Vincent Alfop. Our author contemptuously calls him the looking-glass maker; but he was undeniably a man of wit and learning. See his article, in this Work.

(9) In the conclusion, p. 534, 535. he excuses himself for taking no notice of Mr Polhill and Alfop, as not worth notice.

presently drew upon him the rage of all those who were writers among the Saints (1) [C]. In answer to whom, he published, in 1675, 8vo. A Defence and Continuation of the Discourse, &c. with a particular respect to the Doctrine of the Church of England [D], besides some other pieces the following year, which are mentioned below [E]. Having silenced these Antimoralists (m), it was not long before he engaged in the dispute against the Non-conformists [F]; who taking advantage, from the situation of public affairs, began to be very

(m) He asserts this expressly in his defence of his notions of a Trinity, p. 98.

(1) Christ's Loveliness; (2) The Christian Character; (3) The Spiritual Vine; (4) The True brazen Serpent; (5) The Mystery of the Lord's Supper; to which must be added, The Saint's Jewel; and Dr Jacomb's Discourse on Romans the viiith; W. B's. Christ's personal excellency the object of our love, &c.

[C] The Rage of all the writers among the saints. These were, (1) Dr Owen, in his Vindication of some passages in a discourse concerning communion with God, from the exceptions of William Sherlock. (2) Mr Robert Ferguson, a Scotch minister and schoolmaster at Irlington, in his Interest of reason in religion. (3) Edward Polhill of Burwash in Suffex, Esq; in his Divine will considered. (4) Mr Benjamin (8) Alfop, a nonconformist minister, in his Antifozzo, or Sherlocismus eneruatus. (5) An anonymous author, supposed to be Mr Henry Hickman in Speculum Sherlockianum. (6) Mr Samuel Rolle, in his Prodromus, or a character of Mr Sherlock's book called a Discourse, &c. all printed in 1674, 8vo.

[D] A vindication of his Discourse, &c. This vindication was levelled chiefly against Mr Ferguson and Dr Owen (9), who, among other expressions in that discourse, had produced this as strongly favouring Socinianism, viz. That the natural notions which men have of God assure them, that he is very good, and that it is not possible to understand what goodness is, without pardoning grace; whence he infers, that God could have pardoned sin without satisfaction, and consequently that the satisfaction of Christ was not absolutely necessary in respect to God's justice. But that method of proceeding was chosen by him for other wise reasons; several of these are mentioned, in which he observes he has pitched upon such as are most suitable to the design of a treatise against the Antinomians: And in answer to the charge of his adversaries, who had argued from this, that the Satisfaction of Christ could not be the meritorious cause of God's pardoning our sins, if he was obliged to it by his essential goodness; our author asks which of these he will reject, whether he will deny that the natural notion of a Deity, includes infinite goodness, or that the natural notion of infinite goodness includes pardoning grace, when there is a just and honourable occasion for it, or that the merits of Christ's satisfaction, had purchased the grace and mercy of the gospel. The denial of these he declared to be either Atheism, or Socinianism; and blaming his antagonist for charging him with asserting that God's essential goodness obliged him to pardon sin; whereas, he says, that the essential goodness of God, only proves that he may pardon sin without a sacrifice; but not that he either will, or must. As to the nature of justification, he maintains, that our justification and acceptance with God, depends wholly upon the gospel-covenant, which does not exact from us a perfect and sinless obedience, but promises pardon of sin and eternal life, upon the conditions of faith and repentance, and new obedience; that this gospel-covenant is wholly owing to the merits of Christ, who by the sacrifice of his death, hath wholly expiated our sins, and both in his life and death hath given a noble demonstration of his entire obedience and submission to the divine will: For God being well pleased with the obedience of Christ's life, and with the sacrifice and expiation of his death, entered into a new covenant of grace and mercy with mankind; that the only way to partake of the blessings of this new covenant, is by believing and obeying the gospel of Christ; that is, in other words, by acknowledging the divine authority of our Saviour, believing his revelations, obeying his laws, trusting to the merits of his sacrifice, and the power of his intercession, and depending on the supplies and influences of his grace. So that, continues he, the righteousness of Christ is not the formal cause of our righteousness or justification, but the righteousness of his life and death is the meritorious cause of that covenant, whereby we are declared righteous, and rewarded as righteous persons. And as for the meaning of Christ's righteousness being imputed to us, he asserts that our righteousness is wholly owing to the righteousness of Christ, which in this sense may be imputed to us, because without this covenant of grace, which is founded on the righteousness of Christ, the best man living could lay no claim to righteousness or future glory; and the righteousness of Christ is our righteousness, when we speak of the foundation of the covenant, by which we are accepted: but if we speak of the terms of the covenant; that is, what it is that will intitle us to all the blessings of the covenant; then we must have a righteousness of our own, for the righteousness of Christ will not serve the turn. Dr South, speaking of our author's treatise of the knowledge of Christ, says, it is a book fraught with reflections upon God's justice, with reference to Christ's satisfaction; and that it may deservedly pass for a blasphemous libel upon both. However our author, speaking of this controversy some years afterwards, intimates, that he had confuted his antagonists, and put them to silence; and assures Mr Baxter, that if he had a mind to revive that then old controversy, which his other adversaries had been pleased to forget, he is content to enter the lists once more (10).

(10) Preface to his Continuation and Vindication of Dr Stillingfleet, p. 4, 5.

[E] Other pieces the following year. After his Vindication was finished, Mr Danson attacked his former book, in a piece, intitled, A friendly debate between Satan and Sherlock, containing a discovery of the unsoundness of Mr Will. Sherlock's principles, in a book, intitled, A discourse concerning the knowledge of Jesus Christ, in 1676. Our author replied to it the same year, in his Answer to a scandalous pamphlet, intitled, A friendly debate between Satan and Sherlock. He also wrote An account of Mr Ferguson's common-place-book, in two letters to Mr Glanvil: and Mr Danson publishing, A defence of the late friendly debate, &c. against Mr Sherlock's exceptions, 1677, 8vo. our author was defended in a piece, intitled, A vindication of Mr Sherlock, against the calumnies of Mr Danson, &c. 1677, 4to.

[F] He engaged in the dispute against the Non-conformists. Our author in this dispute, being only Dr Stillingfleet's second; his first design, if we may believe himself, was no more than a short rebuke to some such skulking pamphleteers as those who don't fight with the Doctor's book, but with his reputation, and have no other way of answering arguments, but with picking up some by-sayings, which, with the help of an ingenious comment, may expose the author, and then there is no need of answering his book. Among others, he takes notice of one whom Dean Stillingfleet had charged with having in the first edition of a tract, published in 1675, pleaded for an universal toleration, so as to have it granted to Papists, as well as other Dissenters; but printing it again in 1680, he denied them the liberty of that toleration, because they were idolaters, and only allowed them the private exercise of their religion. The reason of which difference, the Dean supposes to be, that in 1675, they were willing to consent to a toleration, tho' Papists reaped the advantage of it, as well as themselves; but after the Popish plot broke out, they thought it unseasonable to make such a proposal. The passage in the edition of 1675, runs thus; The Papists in our account, are but one sort of recusants, and the conscientious and peaceable among them, must be held in the same predicament with those among ourselves that likewise refuse to come to common-prayer. Again, but as for the common Papist, who lives innocently in his way, he is to us as other separatists, and so comes under the like toleration. Again, He is to us, in regard of what he does in private, in the matter of his God, the same as those who likewise refuse to come to common prayer. Whereas in the edition of 1680, the words are, The Papist is one whose worship is to us idolatry, and we cannot therefore allow them the liberty of publickly assembling themselves as others of the separation. Stillingfleet, in his animadversions on this alteration, was very sedate, and indeed cooler than his usual temper. 'Now,' says he, if there be any difference between the public and private exercise of religion. Here seems to be a plain alteration of his opinion; but he says, he explains himself therefore by way of supply, signifying, that (*) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 461. fol. edit.

(o) Life of Tillotson, as before.

(p) His eldest son was born before this time.

(q) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 297.

very troublesome in defending their separation (n). In answer to those principles, our author published Reasons for non-conformity examined, in 1679, 4to. which was followed by A defence of Dr Stillingfleet's Unreasonableness of separation in 1681, and A vindication of that defence in 1683, both in 8vo. In the mean time he had taken the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1680 (o), and been married some few years before (p). He had also been collated to the Prebend of St Pancras in the cathedral of St Paul London, November 3, 1681 (q). After the discovery of the Rye-house plot in 1683 (r), the Doctor observing, that the principles of resistance to a Popish Prince were warmly abetted by some eminent persons, and were also frequently urged in vindication of rebellious practices against the government (s), drew up a set of arguments in support of the court doctrine of absolute non-resistance, which he published the following year under the title of The case of resistance to the supreme powers stated and resolved, according to the doctrine of the holy scriptures [G], and he continued to preach the same doctrine after King James II's accession

(r) In a sermon preached at St Paul, h's this year in that occasion, he lays this plot to the charge of the Dissenters but at the same time appears full in the belief of the truth of the Popish plot likewise.

' that what he said at first, should be taken in regard as his meaning really was then, and now is, but fuller expressed (11). We have no way, continues our author, to disprove what his meaning was, but by his words; and if they desired a public toleration for themselves, they did so for the Papists, who were to come under the like toleration; and I think Mr H— might as well have let it alone, unless he could have made a better defence.'

[G] The case of resistance.] Our author in defending this doctrine, did no more than concur with the general voice of his order; Burnet and Tillotson, both gave into it (12): And as we have seen, he was not of a disposition to be sparing of his pen; he slept out boldly and confidently, as his manner was, in the open defence of this principle. It will not be amiss, for a reason we shall see presently, to give a sketch of his way of arguing upon the subject. After a short essay to prove it by the common arguments then in vogue, he proceeds to answer objections. The first is, of those who urging, that 'they are bound by no law to suffer against law, suppose, as a late author (13) does, that a Popish Prince should persecute his Protestant subjects in England, for professing the Protestant religion, which is established by law, by what law must he die? not by the law of God, for being of that religion which he approves, nor by the laws of our country, where Protestantism is so far from being criminal, that it is death to desert it, and turn Papist. By what law then? by none that I know of, says the author; nor do I, says the Doctor, know of any, and so far we are agreed: but then both the laws of God and of our country, command us not to resist; and if death, an illegal and unjust death, follow upon that, I can't help it; God and our country must answer for it.' Agreeable to this is his answer to the next objection; that a Prince has no authority against law; 'that is true, says he, but then 'tis as true, that he is accountable only to his superior, that is God alone, and not to his inferior; that being a principle which is contradictory to the very notion of power, and destructive of all order and government.' In the further prosecution of this argument, he maintains that the authority of the Sovereign is in his person, and not in the law: that there must be in him a personal power and authority antecedent to all civil laws, since the law is nothing but the public declaration of the law maker, whether sovereign Prince, or the people. Hence it necessarily follows, that the sovereign Prince does not receive his authority from the laws, but laws receive their authority from him; and this he will have to be the constitution of England, against Bracton's rule, that Lex facit Regem, The law makes the King; by which he tells us, that the author means only that he is no King, as King signifies a just and beneficent power and authority, who governs by arbitrary will, and not by law, as appears from his own words, non est enim Rex ubi dominatur voluntas & non Lex; not that he is no sovereign Prince, but he is a tyrant and not a King. And hence, continues he, it evidently follows, that the being of a sovereign power, is independent on laws; and the same is evident from the allowed maxim, that the person of the king is sacred and inviolable; but what makes his person so, but his inviolable authority? In a word, says he, it does not become a man who can think three consequences off, to talk of the authority of laws, in derogation to the authority of the sovereign power. In the further prosecution of this argument, he declares, that of the long succession of Princes in this kingdom, there had been no Prince that had cast off the authority of laws, or usurpan absolute or arbitrary power; whence he shews how vain the fears of those are, who pretend this, only to disturb the public peace. Lastly, in answer to the objection, that granting absolute non-resistance, the mischiefs and inconveniencies to mankind may be intolerable: he declares that no mischiefs, even of the most merciless tyrant, can be so bad as those of confusion and a civil war. And in reconciling the doctrine of absolute non-resistance to a limited monarchy, he observes very curiously, that tho' a Prince may break the laws, yet he cannot make or repeal them, and therefore can never alter the frame and constitution of the Government; tho' he may at present interrupt the regular administration of it: and this, says he, is both a great security to posterity, and a present restraint upon himself; comfort enough (for so he intimates by his silence) for whatever miseries the present race of his subjects may groan under, who must still lie fast bound by the indissoluble iron chain of passive-obedience. Sam. Johnson, a writer well matched for hardiness to the Doctor, in his remarks upon this piece, very shrewdly observes, that the lawfulness of defending ourselves against illegal violence, is a truth so obvious, and so agreeable to the common sense of mankind, that even those men who set themselves to oppose it, do oftentimes assert it unawares, and give unanswerable reasons for it. He then proceeds to set down those concessions, which the force of truth has extorted from our author. (1) No man wants authority to defend his life against him, who has no authority to take it away, p. 96. But no man whatsoever has any just and legal authority to take it away contrary to law, p. 190, 191. (2) He that resists the usurpations of men, does not resist the ordinance of God, which alone is forbidden to be resisted. But acts of arbitrary and illegal violence are the usurpations of men, p. 128, and 211; and in p. 212, he acknowledges, that the assuming of an absolute and arbitrary power in this kingdom, would be usurpation; tho' he says at the same time, that no Prince in this kingdom, ever usurped such a power, which, says Johnson, is notoriously false, for Richard the second by name did, not to mention any other. (3) A third argument, which the Doctor furnishes against himself, is this, p. 164, 165. The reason why we must submit to Governors, or subordinate Magistrates, is, because they are sent by our Prince, and act by his authority; and we must never submit to them in opposition to our Prince. Now, says Johnson, nothing is better known in this kingdom, than that those who commit illegal violence, do not act by the Prince's authority; for, as our author says, p. 190. he himself has no just nor legal authority to act against law, and therefore we need not submit to them in such acts. Nay, further, according to this author, we must never submit to them in this case, because they are in opposition to our Prince; for they act against the peace of our sovereign Lord the King, his crown and dignity, as the law has evermore interpreted such acts. (4) Our author, p. 126. has these words, Every man has the right of self-preservation, as intire under civil Government, as he had in a state of nature. Under what government I live, I may still kill another man, when I have no other way to preserve my life from unjust violence by private hands. Now the hands of subordinate magistrates, employed in acts of illegal violence, are private hands, and act with no manner of authority at all; of which this is a most convincing proof, that they may be hanged by law for such acts; which no man can or ought to suffer for what he does by authority: they are no officers at all in such acts; for illegal violence is no part of their office. This, concludes Mr Johnson, is sufficient

(11) Answer to Dr Stillingfleet, p. 7.

(12) See the article of William Lord Russell.

(13) Sam. Johnson, in his Julian.

accession to the throne [H]. However, though he maintained that neither Popery nor tyranny in the Prince could excuse the subject from the duty of passive-obedience, yet he entered with the first into the controversy against the Papists, and distinguished himself by a great variety of performances published on that occasion [I], and he is allowed by his warmest cient to shew, that this author holds so much truth, as would have led him to his own conviction, if he had but attended to the immediate consequences of it, instead of blending it with a great many falsehoods (14). These remarks, tho' written in 1683, were not published 'till 1689; and it is observable, that if Mr Johnson had happened to defer the publication a very little longer, he would have seen the Doctor actually led to his own conviction.

(14) Remarks on Dr Sherlock's Case of Resistance, printed among Johnson's Works, p. 257, 752. edit. 1710, fol.

We must not conclude this remark, without informing the reader, that The Case of Resistance had the honour of being translated into French, by Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roscommon; whose father James Dillon, being reclaimed, when young, from Popery, by Primate Usher, was sent by him into England, and committed to the care of Dr George Hakewell, who placed him in Exeter College, Oxford, under the tuition of Lawrence Bodley, B. D. a nephew of Sir Thomas Bodley: here he continued some years, became a person of several accomplishments, and afterwards Earl of Roscommon in Ireland, his native country. He was succeeded in that dignity by his son Wentworth Dillon, who was educated in all kinds of polite literature: and about the time of the Duke of York's marriage to the Princess of Modena, was made Captain of the band of Pensioners to King Charles the second, and afterwards Master of horse to the said Dukes of York. He published several pieces of poetry, among which his Essay on translated verse is esteemed a master piece; it has gone thro' many editions; to one of which he added a specimen of blank verse, being the battle of the Angels in Milton's Paradise lost. He also translated Horace's Art of Poetry, into English blank verse, printed at London, 1680, 4to. Besides several Prologues and Epilogues to plays, printed with the respective plays; as also divers copies of verses and translations, printed in the Miscellanies, by Jacob Tonson, in 1684; and in the collections of Poems, in 1693, 1694, 8vo. Since which, his works have been printed together, among those of the minor poets, in 1749, and 1750, vol. i. and iii. This ingenious nobleman paid his last debt to nature, in his house near St. James's palace, Jan. 1684, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. To the dignity succeeded his uncle, Cary Dillon, Colonel of a regiment, in the war between King James the second, and William the third in Ireland; from whence going into England, he was seized with a distemper which brought him to his grave at Chester, in Nov. 1689*: And the title has been extinct many years.

* Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 223.

[H] He continued to preach the same doctrine after the accession of King James the second.] In a sermon before the house of Commons, May 29, 1685, he has these remarkable words upon the duty of loyalty. 'To this, says he, we owe the present security and protection of the Church of England: For if there were nothing else to be looked on, yet a jealous Prince cannot but look on and reward it's loyalty; and it would seem very harsh for any Prince, to desire that a religion should be turned out of the Church, which secures him in a quiet possession of his throne; and therefore to conclude, I desire you to observe, that it is a Church of England loyalty which I persuade you to. This the King relies on as a tried and experienced loyalty, which has suffered with it's Prince, but never yet rebelled against him; a loyalty upon firm and steady principles, and without reserve: And therefore to keep us true to our Prince, we must be true to our church and our religion, and it's legal security. It is no act of loyalty to court and compliment away our religion and it's security. For if we change our religion, we must change the principles of our loyalty; and I am sure the King and the crown will gain nothing by it: for there is no such lasting and immovable loyalty as that of the Church of England. I deny not, but some of our Papists, in some junctures may, and have been very loyal; but I am sure the Popish religion is not. The Englishman may be loyal, but not the Papist: And yet there can be no security of those men's loyalty, whose religion teaches them, in any case, to rebel.' Soon after there came out a humorous remonstrance, by way of address from the Church of England to both houses of parliament, upon the account of religion, together with some remarks upon Dr Sherlock's sermon, preached May 29, 1685. Wherein the author animadvertes upon this last charge upon Popery, as groundless and uncharitable. In answer to which, Dr Sherlock published, A vindication of a passage in a sermon before the House of Commons, where he asserts the doctrine of deposing Princes, on account of their religion, to be maintained by the Church of Rome in her public instruments as a Church.

†

[I] A great variety of performances on that occasion.] He published more treatises in the Popish controversy, than perhaps any other of the disputants, as will appear from the following list of them. (1) A Discourse of the object of religious Worship. (2) A vindication of the Rights of ecclesiastical Authority, in answer to Dr Whitby's Protestant Reconciler, both in 1685; 8vo. before the death of King Charles the second. After the accession of King James the second, his pieces are, (1) Notes on Lucilla and Elizabeth, 1686. (2) A Discourse of a judge of Controversies in Matters of Religion. (3) Protestant Resolution of Faith. (4) A Papist not mis-represented by Protestants, being a Reply to the Reflections upon the answer to a Papist mis-represented, and represented. (5) An answer to a Discourse, intituled, Papists protesting against Protestant Popery; being a Vindication of Papists not mis-represented by Protestants; and containing a particular Examination of Mr de Meaux, late Bishop of Condom, his Exposition of the Doctrine of the Church of Rome, in the Articles of the Invocation of Saints, and the Worship of Images, occasioned by that Discourse, all these in 1686, in 4to. (6) An answer to the Request of Protestants, to produce their plain Scriptures, directly authorizing their tenets. (7) A short summary of the principal Controversies between the Church of England, and the Church of Rome; being a Vindication of several Protestant Doctrines, in answer to a late Pamphlet, intituled, Protestantism destitute of Scripture Proofs. (8) An answer to a late Dialogue between a new Catholic Convert, and a Protestant, to prove the Mystery of the Trinity to be as absurd a Doctrine as Transubstantiation; by way of Notes on the said Dialogue. (9) A brief Discourse concerning the Notes of the Church, with some Reflections on Cardinal Bellarmine's Notes. (10) A Vindication of the brief Discourse, concerning the Notes of the Church, in answer to a late Pamphlet, intituled, The Use and great Moment of the Notes of the Church, as delivered by Cardinal Bellarmine; these all in 1687, 4to. (11) An answer to the amicable Accommodation of the Difference between the Representers and the Answerer. (12) A Vindication of some Protestant Principles of Church Unity, and Catholic Communion, from the charge of Agreement with the Church of Rome, in answer to a late Pamphlet, intituled, An Agreement between the Church of England, and the Church of Rome; evinced from the concertation of some of her Sons, with their Brethren the Dissenters. (13) A Discourse concerning the Nature, Unity, and Communion of the Catholic Church, wherein most of the Controversies relating to the Church, are briefly and plainly stated, part i. (14) The same, part ii. (15) A Preservative against Popery, being some plain Directions to unlearned Protestants, how to dispute with Romish Priests, part i. (16) The second Part of the Preservative against Popery; shewing how contrary Popery is to the true ends of the Christian Religion; fitted for the Instruction of unlearned Protestants. (17) A Vindication of both Parts of the Preservative against Popery, in answer to the cavils of Lewis Sabran, a Jesuit. The Jesuit hereby procured himself an antagonist that he will be always famous for, who made him this following reply; 'A defence of Dr Sherlock's Preservative against Popery, in reply to a Jesuit's answer, wherein the rev. father's reasonings are fully confuted, by William Gyles, a Protestant footman †.' We are assured by the editor of this piece, that it was brought to his hands by the young man himself, who wrote it, and to remove all suspicion of fraud, or foul play, he professes upon the word of a Christian, that he has committed it to the press, as it was delivered to him by the young man himself, in his own hand-writing, without the addition or taking away of one word, or altering

† In the second edition there is added, living with Madam H. in Mark-Lane.

(1) Dr South who observes that there is hardly any one subject which he has wrote upon, that of Popery only excepted, but he has wrote to him for it and against it. Preface to South's Animadversions, p. 18.

(2) Bishop Burnet observes, that he was one of the most considerable and eminent among the Non-jurors. Ibid. Vol. II.

warmest adversary (s) to have wrote well upon this subject. After the Revolution he remained for some time under the influence of his former principles, and refusing to take the new oath of allegiance to King William and Queen Mary, was, with other Non-jurors (t) suspended in 1689 from all his preferments: The chief of these was the Mastership of the Temple, which had been conferred upon him in 1685. During his suspension he published his celebrated treatise intituled, A practical discourse concerning death [K] in 1690. But before the expiration of the year he complied with the new-established government, and taking the oaths, was reinstated in all his preferments; of which, though forfeited, yet by the lenity of the administration he had not been deprived. Great clamours were raised against this step in his conduct by his old friends whom he had left: Whereupon he thought proper, for the satisfaction of the whole party, to publish his reasons for it, and the piece came out the same year (u), intituled, The case of the allegiance due to Sovereign Powers, stated and resolved according to Scripture and reason, and the principles of the Church of England; with a more particular respect to the Oath lately enjoined of allegiance to their present Majesties, King William and Queen Mary [L]. The Doctor having in this book

(2) The title page says 1691, but the Printers begin the year at Michaelmas. And it is remarkable that a piece intituled, a True Vindication of the Rev. Dr Sherlock's Case was published in 1690, against five or six pamphlets; and this imprimatur to his Vindication by himself is dated Jan. 14, 1690 91.

ascribed

altering one sentence or line; so that, continues he, the reader will have it just as I had, excepting the falseness of the English, which is pardonable enough in a poor servant, that was very young deprived of his parents, and never had more learning than to read English. However, upon this, I ordered the bookseller to speak to his compositor at the press, to correct the English as he set it.

[K] He wrote his Practical Treatise on Death. It has been observed, that our author was as remarkable for his writings in controversial Divinity in his own time, as he will be eminent for his practical treatises in all times; and it may with equal truth be said, that if he had wrote none but this upon Death, it would have been enough for his fame, satis pro fama. All his practical pieces were well received by the publick, but they all fall greatly short of this on Death, which has gone through almost thirty editions. I fancy the reader will be beforehand with me, in observing the suitability of the subject to the then present state of the Doctor's affairs, as well as the melancholy prospect he had for the future in this world. Such a situation would naturally inspire thoughts of another world; but such thoughts, and cloathed in such expressions, are then only produced, when a genius happens to be luckily hit with his subject. The whole piece is a compleat instance of the true sublime in writing: And nothing but a genius too could have produced the following, I had almost said, equally sublime description of it:

Thy even thoughts with so much plainness flow,
Their sense, untutor'd, infancy may know;
Yet to such height is all that plainness wrought,
Wit may admire, and letter'd pride be taught.
Easy in words, thy stile, in sense sublime,
On it's blest steps each age and sex may rise;
'Tis like the ladder in the Patriarch's dream,
It's foot on earth, it's height beyond the skies.
Diffus'd it's virtue, boundless is it's power,
'Tis publick health and universal care.
Of heavenly manna 'tis a second feast,
A nation's food, and all to every taste (15).

(15) Commendatory verses by Mr Prior, prefixed to every edition of this piece.

Another genius, speaking of this treatise, writes thus: Dr Sherlock has represented, in very strong and lively colours, the state of the soul on it's first separation from the body, with regard to that invisible world which every where surrounds us, though we are not able to discover it through this grosser world of matter, which is accommodated to our senses in this life; and observes, that our leaving this world is nothing else but the putting off this body (16).

[L] The Case of Allegiance, &c. In the preface he declares, 'That he had some of the thoughts contained in the book long before, which he drew up in writing, and shewed them to some of his friends, and discoursed with others about them, and told them where he stuck. But, continues he, stick I did, and could find no help for it; and there I should have stuck to this day, had I not been relieved by Bishop Overal's Convocation book, which not only confirmed my former notions, and suggested some new thoughts to me which removed those difficulties I could not conquer, but also, by the venerable authority of a Convocation,

VOL. VI. No. 307.

gave me greater freedom and liberty of thinking, which the apprehension of novelty and singularity had cramped before.' As the Doctor ascribes his conviction to Bishop Overal's Convocation-book, it will not be amiss to give the following account of that book from Bishop Burnet. 'There was a book, says this author, drawn up by Bishop Overal, fourscore years ago, concerning Government, in which it's being of a divine institution was positively asserted! It was read in Convocation, and passed by that body, in order to the publishing it, in opposition to the principles laid down in that famous book of Parsons the Jesuit, published under the name of Doleman*. King James I. did not like a Convocation's entering into such a theory of Politics, so he wrote a long letter to Abbot, who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, but was then in the lower house. I had the original wrote all in his own hand in my possession: By it he desired that no farther progress should be made in that matter, and that this book might not be offered to him for his assent; there that matter slept. But Sanctus, Archbishop of Canterbury, had got Overal's own book into his hands; so in the beginning of this [K. William's] reign, he resolved to publish it, as an authentic declaration that the Church of England had made in this matter, and it was published || as well as licensed by him a very few days before he came under suspension for not taking the oaths †. But there was a paragraph or two in it that they had not considered, which was plainly calculated to justify the owning the United Provinces to be a lawful Government; for it was there laid down, that when a change of Government was brought to a thorough settlement, it was then to be owned and submitted to as a work of the providence of God, and part of King James's letter to Abbot related to this. The Bishop then goes on to tell us, that when this was observed by Sherlock, he had some conferences with the [Jacobite] party, in order to convince them by that, which had convinced himself (17). What his Lordship here asserts we have seen confirmed by Dr Sherlock, but he has not informed us of the exact time when he thought such a settlement as Bishop Overal mentions, was made by the Revolution: indeed he tells us, he was always disposed to receive satisfaction in his scruples, and wished he could have got over them; nay, that he complied with the new government so far, as not only to live quietly and peaceably, but even prayed for King William and Queen Mary by name, according to the Apostle's direction, to pray for all that are in authority, which they visibly were in: that he likewise always opposed a separation, and advised not a few, who thought fit to consult with him, to keep to the communion of the Church, and not to entertain prejudices against their Ministers for taking the oaths; 'for, continues he, I did not refuse the oaths out of any fondness for the government of King James, nor zeal for his return, which the present prospect of affairs gives no man who loves the Church of England, and the liberties of his country, any reason to wish; nor yet out of any aversion to the government of King William and Queen Mary: But against my own inclinations and interest, out of pure principles of conscience to comply with the obligations of my former oaths, and that duty which subjects owe to their Prince, which I then apprehended irreconcilable with the new oath.' In all this there is not the least hint that any new advantage lately obtained by the Prince of Orange had any share in his conversion, but rather the contrary; it being insinuated,

* See an account of it in his article.

|| In the title-page it is said to be published by the New Observer.

† He was suspended October 13, 1689. Salmon's Chron. Hist. for that year.

(17) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 212, folio edition.

(16) Mr Addison in Spectator No. 111. the October 13, 1713.

ascribed the change of his political opinions chiefly to a passage which he had not before observed in Bishop Overal's Convocation-book. There was printed the following year, ated, that, in settling his conscience, he never looked any further than to King James's first leaving the kingdom; and that this was actually the case, we have his own express words in the body of the book, where he asserts, that Allegiance was no longer due to King James when he had withdrawn his person and left his Crown (18). So that what the forementioned Right Reverend historian tells us, must rest on his sole authority, concerning our author's declaration, which is, that 'upon King James's going out of Ireland, Dr Sherlock thought that this gave the present Government a thorough settlement, and, in that case, he thought it lawful to take the oaths, and not only took them himself, but justified what he had done.' This historian had, however, undeniable authority for what he asserts afterwards, viz. 'that upon this account our author was severely labelled by those from whom he withdrew (19).' An anonymous author, remarking the words above-cited, that 'twas not out of fondness for King James, nor desire of his return, &c. that the Doctor so long refused the oaths, interprets them thus: That is, says he, that he [the Doctor] did not swear all that while, because he had hopes of King James's return; but how justly this pamphleteer may be called a libeller, appears from his idle story of the Doctor's conversion being the meer effect of his wife's ill usage, in respect to his table, 'till he had complied (20). In the same licentious spirit, another of these libellers observes, that it was the battle of the Boyne that satisfied the Doctor's conscience (21). However, the Doctor found a vindicator of himself from these aspersions, who shews that he takes allegiance to be due to King William as soon as he was in possession (22). Finally, our author soon after expressly, and at large, declares against this ill-natured censure of Bishop Burnet in these words: (1) The Prince of Orange undertook to settle the Government upon the ancient bottom, not disliked by the Nonjurors at that time. The great body of the nation stood still looking on, and wishing well to the Prince, without wishing ill to the King's person, or to the just exercise of his authority. Very few of the active ones thought of any thing more than to obtain a free Parliament; but the King would not stand this trial, disbands his army, withdraws his person, without leaving any authority behind him to administer the Government: Nobody ever thought that this was a perfect free and voluntary act; but however gone he was, and had left nobody behind him to govern by his authority: and then the Government was either dissolved, or the power must rest in the States of the realm. The States upon this exigency assembled, but did not pretend to assert the authority of the People over the King, and their power to judge, depose, and banish him; they only undertook to judge what properly falls under their cognizance in such cases, viz. Whether the Throne were vacant? and if it were, how it must be filled? And when those who were the sole and proper judges had once determined it, private subjects (according to the forementioned rules of all Governments) were bound to acquiesce, whatever their private opinions were; or else such state disputes can never be determined, but we must necessarily dissolve into anarchy and confusion. Where there is no determination of the law of nature, or the law of God against it (as there is none about meer legal rights) the resolution of Governors must determine the consciences of private subjects; for the power of judging must extend as far as the power of governing goes (23). By this time we see the Doctor convinced of the parliamentary right which was then the Court doctrine: the great difficulty was to support the reputation of his having changed his former principles of indefeasible hereditary right in the Stuart family, our natural Princes (24); in respect to which family, he had carried these principles to the greatest height, and pressed them, as his manner was, with a contemptuous confidence of all opposers. But here he acted ingenuously and openly, confessing himself mistaken in that point. 'I must,' says he, add one thing more, that I have renounced no principle that ever I taught excepting one, in the case of resistance, which is the only material passage I know any reason to retract in that book, viz. 'That when St Paul says, All power is of God, he ' means only legal powers, but that in an hereditary monarchy, where the right heir is living, usurped powers are not of God, nor the ordinance of God, as I proved by the example of Joash: The reason and the example you will find sufficiently answered in the following discourse, and the doctrine itself rejected by the Convocation. Though it has been of late years so prevailing a mistake, and imposed by such great authorities, that it is very pardonable, especially when it is so freely acknowledged (25). It will perhaps be thought by some the most surprising effect of this change, that it should even carry him into an attempt to reconcile it with what he had before taught, viz. the doctrine of absolute Non-resistance: but this task was now for the ease of it become irresistible to let it pass unperformed; for since a de facto King was the ordinance of God, he must derive his authority from the same divine fountain, which consequently must not be resisted. Upon this principle he has these words in the discourse already cited: 'So that whatever dispute there may be about other matters, the late Revolution has made no alteration in the principles of Government and obedience; it does not oblige us to own the superior power of the People over the King, which would be a very tottering foundation for monarchy, and could never support it long. Those who believed the doctrine of Non-resistance and passive Obedience to be a good doctrine before, may think so still, and be never the worse friends to the present Government. And I have often thought it a wonderful Providence of God, that in an age wherein the strictest loyalty and obedience had been so earnestly pressed on men, so great a Revolution should be brought about, while the generality of the subjects were merely passive, and surprized into a deliverance (26). Whence it is evident, that, in his opinion, the wonder at last of this providence consisted in secretly inspiring King James with a resolution to withdraw his person, disband his army, and leave nobody in authority to administer the affairs of the Crown. Otherwise, that the active party should prevail over the other who were merely passive, is so far from being wonderful, that the contrary would have been the only, and indeed a most surprizing wonder.

An

As this revolution, in the Doctor's principles, was so wonderfully wrought by Bishop Overal's book, the reader will naturally be inquisitive after some further account of that Prelate; which curiosity we are able to gratify so far as to inform him, that Dr John Overal was bred at Cambridge, where, from being a Fellow of Trinity-college, he became Master of Catharine hall, and Regius Professor of Divinity. In 1601-2 he was promoted to the deanery of St Paul's * by Queen Elizabeth, at the recommendation of Sir Fulke Greville, afterwards Lord Brooke, his patron; and in the beginning of King James's reign he was chosen Prolocutor of the lower House of Convocation. In April 1614, he was advanced to the bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield, from which he was translated in 1618, to that of Norwich, where he died on the 12th of May following, and was interred in that church; where Dr Cosins, Bishop of Durham, who had been bred under his counsels †, in gratitude erected an elegant monument to his memory, after the Restoration †. He is ranked amongst the best Divines of his time, and particularly excelled in scholastic Theology. He held a correspondence with Gerard Vossius, and Hugo Grotius, to whom several of his letters are published in that useful Collection, intitled Præstantium & eruditorum Virorum epistolæ ecclesiasticæ & theologicæ †, in which he declares himself in favour of Arminianism; however, he thinks St Austin's opinion of the irresistibility of Grace may be tolerated, but absolutely condemns the doctrine of confining Grace to the Elect alone. He laboured heartily to accord the disputes in Holland upon the points of the quinquarticular controversy, and expresses great concern for the ill treatment which the studies and proposals of Grotius, for peace, met with. Lastly, in the same spirit of peace, he held the expediency of an hypothetical re ordination, in the case of admitting foreign Protestant Divines to the benefices of the Church of England; wherein his opinion very probably influenced Archbishop Tillotson § several years afterwards.

(25) Case of Allegiance, sect. iv. in particular; but, indeed, as this principle is the grand pillar on which the whole edifice stands, the force of it spreads itself through every part of that treatise.

(26) Sermon preached before the House of Commons, July 30, 1691.

* In this Deanery he succeeded the famous Alexander Nowell.

† See his article.

‡ Smith's Life of Bishop Cosins. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 702. and Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 170. 2d edition.

§ This collection was published by Limborch and Hartfoeker, as an Historical Account and Defence of Arminianism. Moretti's Diction. under Limborch's article.

§ See his article.

(18) P. 43. the first edition, in 1691, 4to.

(19) The titles of some of these were, 1. A Letter to Dr S. 2. Modest Remarks, &c. 3. Remarks on the Doctor's Case, &c. 4. The Two Kings of Brentford. 5. Sherlock upon Sherlock. 6. Another that printed part of his own Book, to put a Cheat upon the World.

(20) Answer to Dr S——'s Case of Allegiance, &c. by a London Apprentice, in a single sheet, 1691.

(21) Modest Remarks, &c. p. 21.

(22) True Vindication of the Rev. Dr Sherlock, being a Reply to the printed Answers of his late Book, intitled, The Case of Allegiance, &c. p. 17, 18.

(23) Case of Allegiance.

(24) Case of Resistance, p. 128, & seqq.

An answer to a late pamphlet, intituled, Obedience and Submission to the present government demonstrated from Bishop Overall's Convocation-book, with a Postscript in an answer to Dr Sherlock's case of allegiance (20). To this our author replied, in his Vindication of the case of allegiance to Sovereign Power, in reply to an answer in a late Pamphlet, &c. with a Postscript, &c. [M] In 1691, he published his Vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever-blessed Trinity [N]. In this book he started a new method of explaining that mystery [O], the danger of which novelty was taken notice of the same year. However,

(20) This was supposed to be writ by Bishop Ken, to whom, according to his usual warmth, he has once said he would be crucified before he would take the oaths. South's Animadversions, &c.

[M] Vindication of the Case of Allegiance.] A copy of King James's letter to Abbot, mentioned by Bishop Burnet, as above cited, was published in the New Observer of Friday December 5, 1690 (27), where that writer declares, that the original was communicated to him by an eminent person in whose hands it was. If this be the Bishop, he differs from his Lordship with regard to it's being writ all in the King's own hand, whereas the author says this only of the four last lines, the rest, as he conjectures, being writ by the then Secretary of State. The words alluded to by the Bishop are these, 'You have dipped too deep in what all Kings reserve as the Arcana Imperii, and whatever aversion you may profess against God's being the author of Sin, you have stumbled upon the threshold of that opinion, in saying upon the matter, that even tyranny is God's authority, and should be revered as such. If the King of Spain should return to claim his old pontifical right to my kingdoms, you leave me to seek for others to fight for them, for you tell me, upon the matter before-hand, his authority is God's authority if he prevail.' In this vindication Dr Sherlock supposes King William's authority to be unjustly gotten, and that the means of bringing about the Revolution were wicked and unjustifiable, but he changed this opinion soon, as appears from his sermon abovecited in 1691.

The Doctor's picture, as drawn by S. Johnson, on this occasion, is not a little entertaining. The reason, says that writer, why the Clergy were so zealous for tyranny in King Charles II's time, was, because it was a tyranny on their side: That made them so very liberal of the English rights, and to sacrifice them all at once in a peace-offering to Moloch; and it was a true act of worship, for it signalized their loyalty. But when Judgment began at the House of God, as Dr Sherlock preached upon the Bishops being sent to the Tower, then their note was quite altered. King James had forfeited and ought to be deposed, with a great deal more to that purpose. But afterwards, when they grew jealous of this Revolution, and could not tell what to make of it, having missed two hits, both of having King James, and afterwards of having his intended Deputy the Prince of Orange, in their hands, and wanted a third hit; then the words were these, Well, will not the Convention fetch the King back again? If they will not we have forty thousand Men to fetch him back. Dr Sherlock best knows where those forty thousand men now are, but I believe King James would be very glad of half the number. To proceed in my story, the very man that had asserted that King James had forfeited, and ought to be deposed long before he was, or even before the Prince of Orange was expected, began with change of interest to have change of thoughts; and then he could not allow King James to be lawfully set aside, nor would swear to this present Government, and his forfeited place at the Temple was supplied by I know who. At last, after he had stuck as himself says, a great while, for stick he did, he was happily relieved by a lucky coincidence of Bishop Overall's canons, and the victory of the Boyne; and then he settled the Government upon it's own settlement, which we that pretend to dull reason, do say is a circle, and proving a thing by itself. It is true he called Providence in aid of this settlement; but they have talked of late as meanly of Providence, as ever mankind did of the Swiss, who are of all sides, and in French and Dutch service both at once; he then proceeds to harangue in proof of that maxim as he calls it, that Providence thus divided against itself cannot stand. After which, returning to his preaching, he maintains that Judgment began at the House of God, not when the Bishops were in the Tower, but when Stephen College was murdered, who was a true first martyr Stephen.

But for quietness sake, continues Mr Johnson, it shall be his own House of God, the Bishops; for I grant that that word, and the true Religion, and the like, are doubtful words, and signify nothing till we know of what religion the man himself is. These are by-matters; but the question is, how a man that had a right notion before, came to lose it the next year, and has not been able to recover it to this day? For if he had stuck to his own occasional English principle, (but then was then, and now is now) That King James, being a Tyrant, had forfeited, and, having broke with the nation, ought not to reign, he had not stuck at all among Jacobite principles, which however are forty times better than his own hypothesis of usurpation: for the Jacobites, though mistaken, pretend to right, but he proceeds upon avowed, barefaced, open, impudent, outrageous wrong; as usurpation either is, or there is no such thing in the world: it is all that either the giants or the devils ever attempted against heaven. But he had no other way to make a Case of Allegiance to King William, to chime in with his unretracted Case of Resistance, written heretofore in favour of Tyranny: For though passive obedience had no hand in the Revolution, yet perhaps he was informed it might be a grateful present to a Settlement. However, I must tell him, that passive obedience must be crooked and bent like a ninepence, and look contrary ways, before he can make a token of it to this Government; for actual resistance of Tyranny gave this Government it's birth and being, and it stands, and can stand, upon no other bottom (28).

[N] Vindication of the Trinity.] Bishop Burnet (29), as it should seem for the sake of an opportunity to indulge his ill-nature in party matters, has antedated the time of our author's publishing this treatise. That historian asserts, that it was writ while our author was under suspension for refusing the oath of allegiance; that tho' his doctrine was looked on as plain Tritheism, yet all the party applauded him and his book; that upon his taking the oath of allegiance soon after, and publishing an account of his reasons for it, his former party being highly exasperated, pursued him with the clamour of Tritheism, which, says he, was done with much malice by the same persons who had highly magnified the performance while he was of their party. That the Bishop has antedated this treatise is manifest, by comparing the Imprimatur of it, January 9, 1690-1, with that of his Case of Allegiance, which is dated October 17, 1690, so then he must have taken the oaths before he published his Vindication of the Trinity; what then must we think of the Bishop's aspersions, which is pointed at the end too with this virulent exclamation, So powerful is the bias of interest and passion in the most speculative and most important doctrines. I own the mistake in the date is small, but not so is the wound given by it; the point of a dagger too is small, but for that very reason it pierces more surely to the heart.

[O] A new Method of explaining that mystery.] His explanation was thus: He thought there were three eternal Minds, two of these issuing from the Father, but that these three were one by a mutual consciousness in the three to every of their thoughts. The opinion was generally censured, as tending to Tritheism. We shall give what Dr Wallis says, as it is spoken with candour in a letter to Mr William Jane, with whom the Doctor had then a controversy upon this subject of the Trinity. 'Now, says he, as to what you observe, concerning the learned author, Dr Sherlock, I shall begin where you end, and agree with you that the treatise to which you refer contains many excellent things; the strength and weight of his arguments, as to those whom he undertakes to answer, does not depend upon those expressions to which you object, but his arguments are of equal force, though these expressions were spared. As to those expressions of his by you noted, that the three divine persons are three beings, three intelligent beings, three substantial beings, three Holy Spirits really distinct as Peter, James, and John, and one God only as they are mutually conscious: I was I confess dissatisfied there-

(28) Notes on the Phoenix edition of the [Burnet's] Pastoral Letter, p. 307, 308. among S. Johnson's Works, as before.

(29) In the History of his own Times, p. 218.

(27) No. 12 in Vol. III. This paper was taken up in contrast to one published by Sir Roger L'Estrange, under the same title, in the preceding reign.

in

(z) Life of Tillotson, as before.

ever, upon the promotion of Dr Tillotson to the see of Canterbury, our author succeeded him, by his Grace's recommendation and interest (x), in the Deanery of St Paul's, and was installed into that dignity on the 15th of July this same year [P]. So considerable a preferment in the Church, treading as were upon the heels of his compliance to the State, furnished an inexhaustible fund of common-place wit to his adversaries, and particularly Dr South was too liquorish of sarcasm (y) not to hitch upon it [Q], as he too frequently, for

(y) He was as severely handled by South, who complied with the new government, as he was either by Hickey or Collier, both Nonjurors. Burnet.

' in (as you are) from the first, looking upon them as expressions too hardy for him to venture upon, (and so I find are most others with whom I have discoursed about them) and wish he had declined them; yet I did not think it necessary for me to write against them (though I did not like them) but chose rather to wave them, and express myself otherwise; nor shall I aggravate the objections which you have urged against them, but leave them as they are. That learned author may, if he think fit, so vindicate or explain those expressions as he shall judge convenient; or he may (which I had rather he should) decline them, without prejudice to his main cause, which (in my opinion) he may as well defend without them, and thereby less expose himself to the cavils of the Anti-Trinitarians, who are catching at every colourable pretence of objecting, though not against the main cause concerning the Trinity, if but against some expressions of those who maintain it. Now, Sir, if you look back upon your own discourse, you will find that the whole edge of your arguments is directed against those expressions, three Beings, three Substances, three Spirits: and I do acknowledge, that as to these, the arguments seem to me sharp enough and to do their work: but if, instead of these, he say, as I think he should, that the three Persons are one Being; one Substance, one Spirit, like as he says they are one God, the edge will be taken off. That which I conceive did impose upon him in this point, is the forced sense which, in our language, we sometimes put upon the word person (for want of another English word answering to homo) which might indifferently respect man, woman, or child, and a like forced sense put by the schoolmen upon the word persona, for want of a Latin word which might equally relate to men and angels, as signifying an intelligent Being; whence he was induced to think that three persons must needs be three intelligent Beings: Whereas persona in it's true and ancient sense, before the schoolmen put this forced sense upon it, did not signify a man simply, but one under such and such and such circumstances or qualifications; so that the same man, if capable of being qualified thus, and thus, and thus, might sustain three persons, and these three persons be the same man.'

Now, if (as he says himself elsewhere in a like case) he have not been taken to be a fool, yet a wise man may sometimes, upon second thoughts, see reason to change his opinion (as in that case he did) or rectify his expressions; and it then be considered how much easier it will be, and less obnoxious to exceptions, to maintain his hypothesis thus rectified, he may think I have done him no ill offices thus to suggest (30).'

N.B. Dr Wallis is generally censured for running into the other extreme of Sabellianism, and we need not observe that the latter part of the passage here cited, is an instance of it.

[P] He was made Dean of St Paul's by the interest and recommendation of Archbishop Tillotson.] Dr Birch, to whom we owe this particular, has likewise given us an instance of our author's gratitude. Every body knows in what indifferent circumstances that excellent Archbishop left his family, and the following letter is at once both a proof of it, and of this friend's endeavours to procure a proper relief; The design of the letter is sufficiently explained in the contents, which run thus.

Deanery, Sept. 25, 1697.

' Dear Hobbs *,

' That kindness which was designed to Archbishop Tillotson's nephew, for maintaining him at the University, and was then refused, is now become necessary; and your respect for the Archbishop's memory, which was your motive then, I hope continues still, especially considering the nephew was in no fault. Mrs Tillotson had such a regard for the honour of my Lord, and such a kindness for his relations for his sake, that she would gladly maintain him if she could, but she is reduced herself to those narrow circumstances, by the unexpected death of Mr Chadwick †, and that less expected condition he has left his family in, that she is utterly disabled. She came to me before I went to Tunbridge, to desire me to recommend him to some family to be tutor to some young gentleman, where he might support himself; and upon that occasion acquainted me with her condition: that Mr Chadwick had spent all his estate, but what was settled upon his wife in marriage, which comes to her eldest son; that the younger son and daughter had not one farthing to maintain them, but depended wholly upon her; that he had put a thousand pounds of her money into the bank in his own name. and had given her no declaration of trust, though she had often desired it of him, which by this means is lost to her, and must pay his debts; that his estate in the Forest*, where she has built her house, and which I think is copyhold, was purchased for his life at 300l. which must now be paid again; that upon his great importunity she built that house at great expence, which is now much too big for her. I was extremely concerned to hear this sad account, and promised I would do what I could to maintain her nephew in the University; for to take him so young from thence would be his ruin; and for this reason have represented the case to you, presuming upon your old friendship, but have not the confidence to do so much to some great men you know, for it must be great kindness or great virtue that recovers a baulk'd charity. But this good Lady's condition is so very pitiable, that I with you could persuade my Lord Chancellor || to represent it to his Majesty, who, I am persuaded after all his generous behaviour to her, would still be inclined to compassionate her new misfortunes.

I am,

Dear Sir,

Your most affectionate friend and servant,

W. Sherlock (31). (31) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 346 to 348.

The Archbishop's nephew mentioned in this letter, Mr Robert Tillotson, son of his brother Joshua, was educated at Clare-hall, in Cambridge, and became afterwards a Fellow there. During the course of his education he was honoured with the favour of Lord Somers, out of regard to his uncle's memory, which was acknowledged by him in a Latin letter to his Lordship still extant. Upon entering into Orders, he was presented to the sine-cure of Elme of considerable value in the isle of Ely, by the executors of the Archbishop, to whose disposal that option was left (32). He lived, being unmarried, in private lodgings at Cambridge, in 1724 (33).

(2) Dr South hitched upon it.] We shall give the following instance for a specimen of the Doctor's manner in this way. 'The fable, says he, tells us of a cat once turned into a woman, but the next sight of a mouse quickly dissolved the metamorphosis, cashiered the woman, and restored the brute; and some virtuosi skilled in the philosophy of alterations, have thought her much a gainer by the latter change, there being so many unlucky turns in the world, in which it is not half so safe and advantageous to walk upright, as to be able to fall always upon one's legs.' The unpleasing coarseness in the thread of this sarcasm, immediately gave my eyes a turn from it to those lines in the Duke of Buckinghamshire's Essay on Satire, where this fable, a little differently couched, is applied with a much more stabbing keenness, as it is pointed with such a genteel spirit and delicacy as cannot but be admired. The subject of it is a statesman of distinguished abilities for business, but too fond of mirth and wit, as follows:

When

† He had married the Archbishop's eldest daughter. See his article.

* Valentines near Wanstead in Essex.

|| Lord Somers.

(32) Ibid.

(33) From my own knowledge.

(30) Letters concerning the Trinity, Letter 7. p. 17, & seqq. by Dr Wallis.

* A Physician and intimate friend of Lord Somers.

(z) Dr South, however, declares, that in this apology he had changed his opinion in some things. Preface to Animadversions.

(aa) It was writ in answer to an earnest and compassionate suit for forbearance to the learned writers of some controversial papers, by a melancholy stander by. Our author observes, that Dr Wallis and himself were immediately concerned in this suit. Apology, p. 2. and in 1694 he published a defence of this Apology.

(bb) In the beginning he appeals to his friend, that he had not been idle; and it appears, that he published his Practical Discourse concerning a Future Judgment, in 1692, in 8vo. and A Discourse concerning Providence, in 1694, in 4to.

for his own credit does in his Animadversions upon Dr Sherlock's book intituled, a Vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever-blessed Trinity, &c. humbly offered to his admirers and to himself, (so the title concludes) the greatest part of them. This was published in 1693, after our author had printed his Apology for writing against the Socinians in defence of the doctrines of the holy Trinity and Incarnation, in which he asserts his first opinion (z), and declares his resolution to proceed in defence of those important articles (aa). Accordingly in 1694 he published A defence of Dr Sherlock's notion of a Trinity in Unity, in answer to the Animadversions upon his vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever blessed Trinity, with a Postscript relating to the calm discourse of a Trinity in the Godhead. In this piece he explained his opinion in the generally received terms, so as there appeared no material difference from what was called the orthodox faith (bb) [R]: But the affair was not so determined. For in answer to this last-mentioned piece, Dr South published his Tritbeism charged upon Dr Sherlock's new notion of the Trinity, and the charge made good, &c. in 1695. and the same year the Doctor's notion being asserted in a sermon preached at Oxford, by a Fellow of University-college, was censured by an express decree of that learned body, as false, impious, and heretical, and all persons under their jurisdiction warned not to preach or maintain any such notion [S]. This decree of the University being published in the weekly news-papers, with a Postscript, signifying, that the doctrine so censured was that of Dr Sherlock, in his Discourse on the Trinity. Our author, by way of reply, printed in 1696 (cc), A modest Examination of the authority and reasons of the late decree of the Vice-chancellor, and some heads of Colleges and Halls, concerning the bery of three distinct infinite minds in the holy and ever-blessed Trinity. This piece producing another, intituled, Remarks upon a book lately published by Dr William Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, &c. intituled, A modest examination of the Oxford decree, &c. (dd). And the whole controversy being managed with unbecoming heat and acrimony on both sides, his Majesty, at the motion of the Bishops (ee), thought fit to interpose, by putting out Directions to the Archbishops and Bishops, for the preserving of unity in the Church, and the support of the Christian Faith concerning the holy Trinity, wherein it was ordained, that in the explication of the Trinity, 'all preachers should carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themselves to such ways of explication as have been commonly used in the church (ff).' So that our author's conduct in this point was finally condemned [T]. Before

(cc) So it is in the title-page; apparently in the custom of the London-Printers, in beginning the year at the Michaelmas preceding the established era; but it must be printed before March 25, 1696, as is plain by the date of the King's direction, Feb. 3, 1695; and the answer to it is also printed, according to the title piece, in 1695, at Oxford, where the Printer follows the established era.

(dd) The author was supposed to be Dr Jonathan Edwards, Principal of Jesus-college in Oxford, where the book was printed.

(ee) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 213.

(ff) The directions are printed at length in Burnet, and the general histories of England.

When serious, few for great affairs more fit,
But shew him mirth, and bait that mirth with wit,
'That shadow of a jest shall be enjoy'd,
Though he left all mankind to be destroy'd.
So Puffs transform'd fat like a mumping bride,
Pensive and prudent till the mouse she spy'd,
But soon the Lady had him in her eye,
And just as oddly from the board did fly.

[R] No material difference from the Orthodox faith.] He followed the advice suggested, as we have seen, by Dr Wallis. For, in speaking of the word person, he observes, 'that it is not in the Trinity taken in the common sense of the word, as three persons who subsist apart, but three subsistences are three persons who subsist distinctly without separation; for subsistence necessarily signifies a distinct and real, but not separate subsistence, and the usual orthodox way, if I mistake not, is, that the person is really distinct from the modus subsistendi; and thus the orthodox faith is distinguished from Sabellianism, according to which the person is nothing else but the modus existendi. Now, continues he, what I have said of the word person, is with equal reason applicable to the word mind.' The animadverter objects against the Dean, 'That a mind or spirit is an absolute Being, Nature, or Substance, and I grant it is so in the common use of the word, as applied to created minds and spirits, but so is person also as much as mind; and if we allow of a theological use of the word person, why not of mind too to signify an intelligent subsistence? which is a mind too, but not a separate mind, and therefore not such an absolute Being, Nature, and Substance as a created mind is.—And when the Dean speaks of three distinct infinite minds, which are essentially and independently one, he could mean nothing more than three distinct, intelligent, but not separate subsistences; and I need ask no other pardon for the use of a term which the schools have not consecrated (34).

[S.] Was censured by a Decree of the University of Oxford.] The decree was drawn up in these terms: In Conventu D. Vicecancellarii & Præfectorum Collegiorum & Aularum Universitatis Oxon. die vicefimo quinto Novembris, 1695. Cum in concione nuper habita coram Universitate Oxon. in Templo S. Petri in Oriente, in festum SS. Simonis & Judæ proxime elapsam, hæc verba inter alia publice prolata & asserta fuerunt, viz.

There are three infinite distinct Minds and Substances in the Trinity.

Item. That the three Persons in the Trinity are three distinct infinite Minds or Spirits, and three individual Substances.

Quæ verba multis justam offensionis causam & scandalum dedere.

Dominus Vicecancellarius & Præfeti Collegiorum & Aularum in generali suo Conventu jam congregati judicant, declarant & decernunt, prædicta verba esse falsa, impia, & heretica, dissona & contraria doctrinæ ecclesiæ catholicæ & speciatim doctrinæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ publice receptæ.

Quapropter præcipiunt & firmiter injungunt omnibus & singulis eorum fidei & curæ commissis, ne tale aliquod dogma in Concionibus, aut alias, in posterum proferant.

Ex decreto Domini Vicecancellarii & Præfectorum.

B. Cooper, Not. Pub. & Regist. Univ. Oxon.

[T] Our Author's doctrine was finally condemned.] Bishop Burnet in the place cited above, tells us, that these directions put a stop to the debates upon this subject, and that Mr Firmin's death [in 1698] put a stop to the printing and spreading of Socinian books. This last remark must not be understood absolutely, and can only mean that Mr Firmin was the chief propagator of Socinianism; for that it continued afterwards in a high degree is apparent from this among other instances, that notwithstanding this, our author in 1696 published a piece, intituled, The Distinction between real and nominal Trinitarians; & considered; and the following year, Vindication of a Sermon concerning corrupting Faith by Philosophy, to which he added, The present State of the Socinian Controversy in 1698, all in 4to; and in 1701 he preached a Concio ad Clerum before the Convocation (35), where he earnestly and warmly, as his manner was, exhorts and invites his brethren to oppose those heretical, as he calls them, and viperous tracts, which then threatened so much danger to the Church. In the same view he likewise published Proofs of Christ's Divinity, in 1706, 8vo.

† The Doctor was called a real Trinitarian.

(35) It was preached on the 30th of December that year.

(34) Defence of Dr Sherlock's Notion, &c. p. 15, 16. edit. 1694, 4to.

fore this, in the same year, he preached a remarkable sermon in the Temple-church, on the death of Queen Mary, by which it appears that he did not disapprove of the then intended Comprehension [U]. But this did not hinder him from employing his pen to reconcile Dissenters to the Church upon the present state of its establishment [W]. In 1704. he published the The distinction of high and low Church considered, in 4to. And the same year came out his discourse upon the Immortality of the Soul, in which he attacked Mr. Locke's opinion concerning innate ideas [X]. He was presented to the rectory of Therfield in Hertfordshire some time before his death, which happened on the 19th of June, 1707, in the 67th year of his age (gg). He died at Hampstead, near London, and was interred in the Cathedral of St Paul's. Besides the numerous books already mentioned in the course of this memoir, he printed several sermons, which after his decease were collected and published in two volumes, 8vo. (bb). He was survived by two daughters, and as many sons, to the eldest of which, Thomas, he left a considerable fortune; having in his life-time resigned the Mastership of the Temple in the view of procuring it for him. Accordingly this gentleman succeeded his father in that honourable post, which he discharged to the great satisfaction of those societies a great number of years. He was likewise made Dean of Chichester, and afterwards promoted successively to the sees of Bangor and Salisbury, and, upon the death of Dr Edmund Gibson, in 1748, succeeded him in the Bishopric of London; to which high and arduous province he does honour, and, though upwards at present of fourscore years of age, enjoys the full vigour of his excellent parts. Having lately (ii) published a most excellent charge to his Clergy, wherein that masterly knowledge in the laws of both Church and State, for which he is eminently distinguished, is applied with a paternal affection to their use and service (kk).

(gg) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1707; and Le Neve's Fasti, p. 185.

(bb) He had also a share in Archdeacon Gregory's pompous edition of the Greek Testament; printed in 1703, at Oxford, in folio. Advertisement prefixed to that book. Mr Wood also mentions some controversial writings between him and one Thomas Vincent a Nonconformist Conventicler at Hogden, near London. Athen. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 623.

(ii) In July, 1759.

(kk) Since the preceding sheet was printed off, there hath come to our knowledge these two particulars concerning Bishop Overal, viz. That he was first admitted of St John's college in Cambridge; and that he died in the sixtieth year of his age. Carter's History of Cambridge; and the Bishop's epitaph, printed at the end of Bishop Cosins's life, by Dr Smith.

[U] He did not disapprove the intended Comprehension with the Dissenters] The Doctor, it seems, run with the current of his friends at different times, in respect to this project. In the reign of King Charles the Second, he treated the Dissenters roughly and rudely, with disdain and contempt: speaking of Baxter, the head then of that sect, and, as he declares, the wisest head amongst them, he says, 'As for Mr Baxter, I am mightily inclined to pity him, he has disputed himself out of all sense and all good manners, and I think there is the least reason to answer any of his books, of any man's I know; for I believe very few people understand what he would have himself (36):' Thus it is evident he had at that time no opinion of a Comprehension. But in the succeeding reign, when a scheme was laid for one by Archbishop Sancroft in 1687, he preached a sermon, wherein, to use Dr South's expression, he opened both his arms to embrace the Dissenters. And how much he approved of Archbishop Tillotson's design of introducing it after the Revolution, appears from a passage in the above-mentioned sermon on the death of Queen Mary, where, speaking of her Majesty's piety, and noble designs for the Church of England, he proceeds thus: 'I have reason to say this from those frequent intimations I have had from our late admirable Primate [Tillotson] who had great designs himself to serve the Christian Religion and the Church of England, in its truest interest; and had interested their Majesties, and particularly the Queen, who had more leisure for such things, with the same great and pious designs. It may be no churchman ever had, I am sure none more deservedly had, a greater interest in his Prince's favour; and the great use he made of it was to do public service to religion; and, whatever some men may suspect, to the Church of England, though it may be not perfectly in their way (37).'

(36) Preface to the Continuation and Vindication of the Defence of Dr Stillingfleet, &c.

(37) Sermon on the Death of Queen Mary, preached at the Temple church, p. 6, 7. the 3d edition, 1694, 4to.

[W] The present state of its establishment.] It was with this view that he published the following pieces. (1) Cases about Church Communion, &c. in 1698, folio, which being attacked by Mr N. Taylor, was defended in a piece intituled, A Vindication of Dr Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, in Answer to Mr Nathaniel Taylor's Treatise, intituled, Dr Sherlock's Case of Church Communion and his Letter to Anonymous, considered, &c. Together with a Reply to his Vindication of the Dissenters from the Charge of Schism, 1702, 4to. (3) New Danger of Presbytery. Lond. 1703, 4to. (4) Of Religious Assemblies, the same year, in 8vo, to which may be added, (5) Distinction of High and Low Church considered, in 1704, 4to.

[X] Innate ideas, against Mr Locke.] It is introduced by way of digression into his third section of the third chapter, where he endeavours to prove the natural Immortality of the Soul, from universal consent, which he thought irreconcilable to the opinion maintained by Mr Locke, that we have no innate ideas; for so he argues, 'if the soul of man has no inbred knowledge, it is in vain to talk of the light, and voice, and sense of nature; if it has, then the universal consent of mankind, can be reasonably attributed to no other cause'. He then observes, that 'Mr Locke's hypothesis that all our ideas come from without, is the same with the old atheistical hypothesis that nihil est in intellectu, quod non sit prius in sensibus,' yet he does not charge Mr Locke with those principles because that writer disowns them, but he asserts that the hypothesis can serve no other end. In order to prove these ideas connate, and that there is some inbred knowledge in the mind, our author argues thus against Mr Locke, upon his own concession that there is a God, and that he made the world. '1. Knowledge is before the things known, and is the maker of them; for God knew what he would make before he made the world, and therefore the ideas of all things were originally in the divine mind, before any thing was made. Hence it follows, that ideal knowledge is essential to a mind. It is found nowhere originally, but in the eternal mind, and it is essential to the very notion and idea of a mind, for what is a mind without the images and ideas of things, which is a good argument that created minds, as far as they partake of the eternal mind, have the natural ideas of things interwoven in their frame and constitution, if I may so speak, for a mind is a mind whether created or uncreated, and if created minds are made after the pattern of the divine mind (and there is no other pattern for minds) natural ideas must be as essential to created minds, as they are to the uncreated mind, for there is no notion of a mind without them.' Every body sees the ridicule our author lies open to, in begging the question that the soul always thinks, which is controverted by Mr Locke; as also, that God must make minds after a pattern, and that too of his own mind. Accordingly Mr Locke made himself very merry with it (38). It must not be denied that our author's reasoning upon this point, is contemptibly weak, and much beneath his character, being built upon a mistake, in confounding truth itself with our perception of it. But how much soever he falls short in the philosophical part, his motives for opposing Mr Locke were pious and not unbecoming the Divine. He was apprehensive, with many others, that the modern Atheists would espouse and magnify Mr Locke's hypothesis, and, whether he would or no, make use of it, or as much of it as they pleased, to confute those principles of religion and virtue which he owned. The objection that mankind were made without any connate ideas of good and evil seemed very formidable to him, for he observes, that the general reason why men are so zealous against these ideas being innate, is to deliver themselves from the necessity of believing any thing of God or Religion.

(38) See his article.

P

SHOVEL [Sir CLOUDESLEY], one of those brave Admirals, who, from the lowest birth and beginning, raised himself, by the sole weight of personal merit, to the first honours of his profession. He was born at a small town near Clay in Norfolk (a), in 1650 (b); and, after such an education as was suitable to the circumstances of his family, was bound apprentice, it is said, to a shoemaker, or some such mechanic trade (c). However that be, it is certain the youth had always a strong inclination for the sea; and happening to be sent upon some business to one of the maritime towns upon the Norfolk-coast; the sight of the shipping, &c. fired his fancy to such a degree, that he never ceased intreating his parents to let him try his fortune in the Navy, 'till he obtained their consent (d): one principal motive to which seems to have been, the consideration how little they were able to do for him in any way. 'Tis said, they had directed him to be christened Cloudesley, in the view of recommending him to the notice of a relation of that name (e); and, perhaps, this kinsman might now be a means of procuring a recommendation to the famous Sir John Narborough, who thereupon presently made him his cabin-boy (f). Thus were fulfilled the fondest wishes of his heart. This was a very promising way of entering into the Navy; the birth gave him all the opportunities he could desire of engaging his master's regard, and he did not fail to make the best use of them. Sir John had raised himself from the same station, and was a generous patron of all who discovered any extraordinary symptoms of maritime worth (g). He saw with pleasure the fidelity and affection which the boy expressed towards his person upon all occasions; and after some time, having had sufficient proofs of his talents and assiduity, he ordered him to be thoroughly instructed in Navigation, and in every other requisite to make a compleat seaman, and then procured him a Lieutenant's commission (h). He was in this rank at the close of the second Dutch war, when our trade to the Levant being distressed by the corsairs of Tripoli and Algiers, a Squadron was ordered to suppress their insolence, under the command of Sir John Narborough; who, arriving before Tripoli in the spring of 1675 (i), found every thing ready to give him a warm reception. The Algerines, upon his first appearance, drew up their ships of war under the cannon of their mole, and the pirates of Tripoli following the example of their confederates, had brought their ships under the walls of their town, and the artillery of a fort that commanded the harbour (k). The appearance of the enemy's strength, joined to the tenor of Sir John's instructions, by which he was directed to try negotiation rather than force, determined him to send a person in whom he could confide to the Dey of Tripoli, to propose an accommodation, upon receiving satisfaction for what was past, and security for the future. The Admiral pitched upon our Lieutenant, who attended this expedition, to carry the message. Accordingly he went on shore, and delivered it with great spirit. But the Dey despising his youth, treated him with much disrespect, and sent him back with an indefinite answer. Mr Shovel, on his return to the Admiral, acquainted him with some remarks he had made on shore: Sir John sent him back with another message, and well furnished with proper rules for conducting his enquiries and observations. The Dey's behaviour was worse the second time; but Mr Shovel bore it with patience, and made use of it as an excuse for staying some time longer on shore: And when he returned, he assured the Admiral that it was very practicable to burn the ships in the harbour, notwithstanding their lines and forts. Accordingly, in the night on the fourth of March, Lieutenant Shovel, at the head of all the boats (l) in the fleet filled with combustible matter, went boldly into the harbour, and destroyed the enemy's ships, with a degree of success scarce to be conceived [A]; and Sir John Narborough gave so honourable an account of it in all his letters, that the next year our Lieutenant was rewarded with the command of the Sapphire, a fifth rate; from whence he was not long after removed into the James Galley, a fourth rate, in which he continued 'till the death of King Charles the Second; who first raised and had always a great kindness for him (m). Whatever grateful sense he might have of this kindness, yet he did not think it sufficient to justify a compliance with the arbitrary and illegal measures of the succeeding reign. He appeared among those sea commanders, who, at the risque of their posts, bravely rejected every attempt that was made upon them in that design; and the event is a remarkable proof of the high esteem he was then in. When threatenings failed, it was resolved to try what favours would do; in that view

King

[A] A degree of success scarce to be conceived] The vessels burnt, which were all that lay in the harbour, were the White Eagle crowned, of 50 guns, the Looking-glass, of 36, the Santa Clara, of 24, and a French vessel, of 20: After which he returned safe to the fleet, without the loss of so much as a single man (1). This extraordinary action struck the Tripolines with amazement, and made them instantly sue for peace. Yet when they came to treat, refusing to make good the losses sustained by the English, Sir John cannonaded the town; and finding that ineffectual, landed a body of men about 20 leagues from the town, and there burnt a vast magazine of timber, provided for building ships. When all this failed of reducing these people, Sir John failed to Malta; and after remaining there for some time, returned suddenly upon the enemy, and distressed them so much, that they were glad to conclude a peace on the terms prescribed. Yet soon after the conclusion of the peace, some of their corsairs returning into port, not only expressed a great dislike thereto, but actually expelled the Dey for making it, and began to take English ships as before. Sir John being still in the Mediterranean, and having notice of what passed, presently appeared with eight frigates before Tripoli, and began with such violence to batter the place, that the inhabitants were glad once more to renew the peace, and to deliver the authors of the late disturbances to condign punishment (2). Tho' our young hero is not particularly mentioned in these subsequent actions, yet no doubt he had a good share in them, as he was all the while in the Squadron with Sir John.

(a) Secret Memoirs of the Life of Sir Cl. Shovel, &c. p. 1. edit. 1738, 8vo. By a gentleman who was several years under the command of that Admiral.

(b) Inscription on his monument in Westminster abbey, where his shipwreck is dated October 22, 1707, in the 57th year of his age.

(c) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 266. Lond. 1750, 2vo.

(d) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 4, 5.

(e) Lives of the Admirals, as before.

(f) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 7: Mr Campbell, indeed, tells us, he was cabin boy to Sir Christopher Mynns, but gives no authority; and the author of the Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 8. observes, that Sir John Narborough served Sir Christopher Mynns in that station.

(g) See his article in the appendix.

(h) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 8, 9, 10.

(i) I. e. according to the new style, or in the latter end of 1674 of the old style.

(k) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 10.

(l) Ibid. where it is observed, that he commonly led the van in all the engagements of which he had a share afterwards.

(m) Compleat History of England; and Burchet's Memoirs.

(1) Sir John Narborough's Letter to Sir Paul Rycaut.

(2) Burchet's Naval History.

(n) Burchet's
Memoirs.

(o) So called from that King, who first asserted the English dominion on the Narrow Seas, as 'tis said, in this very ship, which had continued the same, according to the rule of preserving one plank at least of the old ship, as often as it becomes necessary to rebuild her. I need not observe, that she is still existing in the navy.

(p) The number killed on both sides was pretty much upon a par; but the loss sustained by the Edgar, which bore the hottest brunt of the engagement, was nearly equal to the whole number slain on board all the other English ships. Secret Memoirs, p. 19.

(q) Ibid. p. 20. Captain Ashby of the Defiance was also knighted at the same time.

(r) Secret Memoirs, p. 21 to 25.

(s) Ibid. p. 27. and Burchet's Naval History.

(t) Burchet.

(3) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 201.

King James preferred him to the command of the Dover, a fourth rate (n). He accepted the commission, without changing his principles; by which means, he was luckily possessed of this command at the Revolution: When, closing heartily with the new government, he was very active in the service, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that his rise in the Navy was as quick as he could wish. We find him in the command of the Edgar (o), a third rate, at the battle of Bantry Bay, in 1689; where he gave such signal marks of his courage and conduct (p), that, when King William went to Portsmouth, in order to reward the seamen for their service in that action, he dined on board the Elizabeth with Admiral Herbert; and having created him Earl of Torrington, he conferred the honour of knighthood upon Captain Shovel (q). During the winter of the year 1690, he was employed in cruising in the Soundings, and on the coast of Ireland, to prevent the enemy from landing any recruits. He had not been long upon this station, when he received advice, that there were several ships of war, French and Irish, which at low water lay dry on the sand in Dublin Bay. Sir Cloudesley immediately stood into the Bay, and soon discovered, a considerable way in, an English ship of good force, a small French man of war of twelve guns, and two or three other ships filled with soldiers, thought to be a sufficient guard to secure them from any danger. But all these precautions were not proof against the resolution of Sir Cloudesley; he determined to reduce them to ashes, in the sight of King James's capital, and in the presence of a numerous garrison. To carry this project into execution, he left his flag, and went on board the Monmouth yacht; and at a little more than half flood, the wind being northerly, with that yacht, two hoys belonging to men of war, a ketch, and the pinnaces, he passed the bar with a surprizing bravery. The small armada of the Irish seeing this, and perceiving his intention, cut their cables, and sailing as close to the shore as the bank of sand would permit, fired several guns at him, and called for assistance from the garrison at Dublin, and did all that was possible to secure themselves from so unexpected an attack. Sir Cloudesley pressed forward, in spite of all opposition, exposed to the fire of the ships, and of the small-shot, which flew very thick from King James's militia. As soon as he was near enough, he gave a signal for a fireship, which waited his orders to come in: this being obeyed, the soldiers in the largest ship, which Sir Cloudesley first attempted, deserted her, and the others ran themselves aground. Hereupon he ordered the largest ship to be boarded; which being executed with all imaginable briskness, every thing, that might retard her being conveyed away, was thrown overboard, and the sailors, with the assistance of their pinnaces, towed her off; to the inexpressible confusion of the persons who stood on shore, sad spectators of this daring action [B]. But Fortune had cut out more work for the courage of Sir Cloudesley, before she permitted him to return to his squadron. In turning out of the Bay, the wind veered from the sea, and drove one of the hoys aground; so that it was impracticable to bring her off, before the water fell away from her. Sir Cloudesley was unwilling to leave her behind him; he ordered her to be lightened as much as possible, and all the vessels and boats that went in to take her, remained as her guard, till the return of the tide should admit the carrying of her away. All this while he continued in the Monmouth yacht. At the lowest ebb, the hoy was upon dry ground, and many thousand people crowded upon the strand, where was also King James and his guards. The English lay in their boats armed, and ready for the rencounter. The Irish battalions advanced with a pretended bravery, and made a discharge or two, but quickly retired, and permitted the English to do the same with their prize, as soon as a sufficient quantity of water gave them leave (r). In June this year, 1690, Sir Cloudesley was pitched upon to convoy King William and his army into Ireland. With this important charge, he set sail on the 11th from Highlake, attended with five men of war, six yachts, and a great number of transports. The wind and weather was scanty favourable at first, but soon after a fresh gale sprung up, and he set his Majesty safe a shore at Carrickfergus, on the 14th (s). In matters of this nature, Sir Cloudesley, without question, was one of the ablest commanders that ever put to sea; and the King was so highly satisfied with his diligence and dexterity on this occasion, that he made him Rear-Admiral of the Blue, with this particular mark of esteem, that he delivered him the commission with his own hands (t). After performing this service, it was intended he should join the grand fleet [C]; but on the 10th of July, King William receiving information, that the enemy intended to send upwards of twenty small frigates, the biggest not above thirty-six guns, into St George's-Channel, to burn the transport-ships, he was ordered to cruise off Scilly, or in such a station as he should judge most proper to prevent such a design; and to send frigates to ply eastward and

[B] Spectators of this daring action.] This frigate, which Sir Cloudesley brought away with him, was the Pelican, she carried 20 guns, and was the largest man of war then in King James's possession; she had been taken from the Scotch the preceding year, by the French, when they conducted some forces to Scotland, for the assistance of the Highlands, then in rebellion (3).

[C] It was intended he should join the grand fleet.] Accordingly, Lord Torrington was waiting for him with the Plymouth squadron, and some other ships, when he received the news of the Brest fleet's arrival upon our coast, which brought on the battle of Beachy-head. As this was one of the most disgraceful actions in our naval history (4); the writer of the secret Memoirs, having given a particular account of it, observes, that Sir Cloudesley was very fortunate in being absent from an engagement, where his obeying orders, would have exposed him to the hazard of his reputation, or the disobeying them, called him to a court-martial. This then must be ranked among those lucky incidents which necessarily concur in the raising and forming of an illustrious character.

(4) It is well known, that Lord Torrington was tried, and tho' cleared by the Court, yet he was soon after dismissed the service. General Histories of England.

[D] To

and westward, to gain intelligence of the body of the French fleet, so that he might be the better able to provide for his own safety. And they, upon meeting with Vice-Admiral Killigrew in his return from the Streights, were to give him notice of all circumstances, that so he might likewise take care not to be intercepted. Sir Cloudefley cruized up and down in the aforesaid station, 'till the 21st of July, without meeting any thing remarkable; and then the Dover and Experiment joined him from the coast of Ireland, with a ketch that came out of Kingsfale, on board of which was Colonel Hacket, Captain John Hamilton, Archibald Cockburn, Esq; Anthony Thompson, Esq; Captain Thomas Power, Mr William Sutton, and six servants, who were following King James to France, in order to accompany him in his intended expedition to England. They gave Sir Cloudefley an account, that King James took shipping at Duncannon, and sailed to Kingsfale; but after staying there a little above two hours, he proceeded to France, with two Spanish Frigates, that had lain there for that purpose a considerable time; and that he carried with him the Lord Powis, Sir Roger Strickland, and Captain Richard Trenavon (u). Hereupon Sir Cloudefley returned to Plymouth, where he found the Mediterranean Squadron just arrived from Cadiz, under Vice-Admiral Killigrew; who having there received letters from the Lords of the Admiralty, informing him that the French, after an engagement [at Beachy-head], had obliged our fleet to retire, and were with their own about Rye, Dover, and those parts, and that therefore he was to take care of his squadron, he called a council of war, at which were present the Dutch Admirals, Allemonde and Evertzen, and Sir Cloudefley Shovel; when it was determined, as the safest course to secure them from any attempts of the French, to proceed with the ships into Hamoze, within Plymouth Sound (w). But here our Rear-Admiral received orders to proceed, with the ships under his command, for Kingsfale, to intercept some French frigates, that were said to be on that coast. Arriving at Waterford-river, he received the agreeable news of General Kirke's having made himself master of the town of Waterford; but was at the same time informed, that Duncannon-castle, which by it's situation commanded the river, still held out, and that the General, for want of cannon, was not likely to take it. Upon this, considering the importance of the place, and that no use could be made of the port of Waterford, while this castle remained in the hands of the enemy, he sent the General word, on the 27th of July, that he was ready to assist him, by sending some frigates up the river, and landing all the men he could spare out of his squadron, under the protection of their guns: accordingly the next day he sent in the Experiment and the Greyhound, two small ships, to batter the castle, and under their fire landed between six and seven hundred men, all the boats of the fleet being employed in this service. The castle all this time thundered upon them, though to little purpose; but when once General Bourk, who commanded there, saw the men landed, he thought fit to capitulate (x), and marched out of the castle, with 250 men, with their arms and baggage; leaving to the English the fortress, which was furnished with forty-two pieces of cannon, a noble reward for one day's hard duty (y). After this success, the Rear-Admiral sailed for Limerick, where he was informed the French had a considerable number of ships; but finding soon after that the enemy was retired, and that his own squadron began to be in want of provisions and sea-stores, he came to a resolution of retiring to Plymouth, where he received a considerable reinforcement, with orders to proceed in quest of the enemy; but these orders, which came from the Lords of the Admiralty, were countermanded, on the 18th of September, by a fresh order from the King (z), directing him to detach ten ships into the Soundings for the protection of the trade, and to sail with the rest for the Downs; which he accordingly did. The remainder of the year 1690 was spent by Sir Cloudefley for the most part in cruising, 'till he was ordered to make part of Sir George Rooke's squadron, which escorted the King from Holland, and from which service he did not return into the Downs 'till Jan. following. The naval operations of the year 1691, ended very little to the profit, honour, or satisfaction, of the nation, which occasioned attempts in the House of Commons, to fasten upon Ruffel the miscarriages, as they were called, at sea (aa) [D]. But it was Sir Cloudefley's felicity, that as his services were well intended, so, generally speaking, they were well received; and if Sir Cloudefley Shovel at any time missed of success,

(u) Lives of the Admirals, as before, p. 270.

(w) Burchet's Memoirs, and Naval History.

(x) Bourk had declared his resolution to defend both town and fort, as long as one stone remained upon another, but surrendered before there was so much as one stone beat from another. Burchet's Naval History.

(y) Ibid. p. 432.

(z) Who after raising the siege of Limerick, had returned to England on the 5th of September. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

(aa) Lives of the Admirals, p. 271.

[D] To fasten upon Ruffel the miscarriages as they were called at sea.] Upon the dismissal of the Earl of Torrington, Ruffel, afterwards Earl of Orford, was appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief: who, in pursuance of his instructions, assembled a fleet, consisting of ninety-one ships, of which fifty seven were of the line of battle; and the whole being divided into two squadrons, commanded by the Admirals of the red and blue flags, Sir Cloudefley was consequently included in it. The grand design was to attack the French fleet under Tourville. Accordingly, Ruffel being joined, tho' late, by the Dutch, bent his course to the French coast, in pursuit of their fleet; and arriving in that station in July, he sent Sir Cloudefley Shovel to look into Brest, where he saw about forty sail coming out of that port; which proved to be a fleet of merchant-ships from Bretagne, escorted by three men of war.

Sir Cloudefley to decoy these ships into his hands, made use of an excellent stratagem: He knew the French had intelligence that a small squadron of their fleet had made prize of several English merchantmen; laying hold therefore of this piece of false news, he ordered part of his squadron to put out French colours, and the rest to take in theirs. By this method he thought to deceive the French, who might naturally suppose it to be that squadron with their prizes. This succeeded in part, tho' the enemy discovered the trick before he was near enough to do much mischief. Admiral Ruffel being ordered to keep abroad later than he wished, for the safety of the fleet, met with a storm, in September, by which several capital ships were greatly damaged. He came to an anchor in the Sound, gave orders for repairing these damages, and left Sir Cloudefley at Plymouth, to see it performed (5).

(5) Burchet's Memoirs, p. 87. N. B. Here we have another attestation of what has been before observed, that Sir Cloudefley excelled in such kind of services.

success, no body ever pretended to fix imputations upon his conduct; his courage and his sincerity were alike unquestionable; and though this was not the most credulous age, yet there was never heard of such an infidel, as one who did not believe Shovel had both. On this account, most people were very well satisfied, when the King, just before he set out for Holland (bb), in the spring of the year 1692, declared him Rear-Admiral of the Red, and at the same time commander of the Squadron that was to convoy him thither (cc). On his return from thence, he joined Admiral Ruffel [E] with the grand fleet, and had a great share in the glory of the famous victory at La Hogue. For the French, after an engagement for some hours, breaking their line, and Tourville being discovered to tow away northward, when the weather cleared up, the English Admiral gave the signal for chasing, and sent notice to all his ships, that the enemy was retiring. At the same time, several broadsides were heard to the westward; and though the ships that fired could not be seen, it was concluded they were the blue squadron, that by a shift of wind had weathered the French. It proved, however, to be the brave Sir Cloudesley Shovel, Rear-Admiral of the Red, who had with wonderful pains and diligence weathered their Admiral's own squadron, and got between them and their Admiral of the Blue; but after he had fired upon the French for some time, Tourville, as well as the Admiral of that squadron, came to an anchor, with some of the ships of their division, but could not discover one another by reason of the thickness of the weather (dd) [F]. In 1693, the heat and animosity of parties produced an extraordinary change in the command of the fleet; when, instead of appointing an Admiral, the King, by way of compromise, granted a commission to Henry Killigrew, Esq; Sir Ralph Delaval, and Sir Cloudesley, to execute that office. The two former were declared Tories, and Shovel a determined Whig, though without any party spirit; yet this proved a bad expedient. They were indeed all good seamen, and probably meant their country well; but not agreeing in the manner of serving it, the consequence proved the destruction of the Smyrna fleet, which so much disgraces our annals of this year [G]. However, upon the enquiry of the Parliament into that affair,

Sir Cloudesley,

(bb) He embarked on the 5th of March, 1691-2. Salmon's Chron. Hist.

(cc) Lives of the Admirals, as before; and Secret Memoirs.

(dd) Ibid. p. 271, 272.

[E] He joined Admiral Ruffel.] At this time a report was bruited about, that the officers of the navy were bribed by the emissaries of France, to betray the fleet into the possession of King James; and the forces which now began to draw together, and were to be commanded by him, gave further uneasiness to our Court; whereupon the following address was presented to her Majesty, signed by Sir John Ashby, Admiral of the Blue, Sir Ralph Delaval, Vice-admiral of the Red, Mr Rooke, Vice admiral of the Blue, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, Rear-admiral of the Red, and Mr Carter, Rear-admiral of the Blue, besides several Captains. 'We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, Flag-officers and Captains of your Majesty's fleet, out of that deep and grateful sense we have of your Majesty's good and just opinion of our loyalty, and fidelity, imparted to us by the Right honourable the Admiral Ruffel, in a letter to to him from the Earl of Nottingham, in behalf of ourselves, and all the other officers and seamen; humbly presume to address ourselves to your Majesty at this juncture, to undeceive the world in those false and malicious reports that have been lately spread, in prejudice of your Majesty's service, by people of unreasonable disaffection to your Majesty's government, and an absolute aversion to the quiet, and good of their country; that there are some among us, who are not truly zealous for, and entirely devoted to your Majesty's service (6): We therefore must humbly beg leave to add to our repeated oaths, the assurance of our fidelity, that we will with all imaginable alacrity and resolution, venture our lives in defence of your Majesty's undoubted rights, and the liberty and religion of our country, against all foreign and Popish invaders whatsoever; most heartily beseeching the great God Almighty, to preserve your Majesty's most sacred person, direct your councils, and prosper your arms both by sea and land (7).'

Sir Cloudesley was as forward to promote this address as any gentleman in the navy, tho' he was far from being suspected either by the Queen or Ministry. Admiral Carter was the person particularly struck at; but without any foundation.

[F] By reason of the thickness of the weather.] King James bore the loss of all his hopes, in this defeat, with inconsolable grief, as appears by the following letter which he wrote to his Most Christian Majesty.

'Monsieur, my Brother;
'I have hitherto, with some constancy and resolution, supported the weight of all the misfortunes, which it has pleased Heaven to lay upon me, so long as myself was the only sufferer; but I must

'acknowledge this last disaster utterly overwhelms me,
'and I am altogether comfortless, in reference to what 'concerns your Majesty, thro' the great loss that has be'fallen your fleets. I know too well, that my unlucky
'star it is, that has drawn down this misfortune upon 'your forces; always victorious, but when they fought
'for my interests: And this is that which plainly tells me,
'that I no longer merit the support of so great a Mo'narch, and who is always sure to vanquish, when he 'fights for himself; for which reason it is, that I re'quest your Majesty no longer to concern yourself for
'a Prince so unfortunate as myself, but permit me to 'retire with my family, to some corner of the world,
'where I may cease to obstruct the usual course of your
'prosperities and conquests, which only my misfor'tunes could interrupt. It is not just that the potentest
'Monarch in the world, and the most flourishing above
'all others, should share in my disgrace, because you 'are too generous: 'tis better much that I should re'tire, 'till it shall please omnipotent Providence to be 'more propitious to my affairs. But, howsoever it please
'over-ruling Heaven to dispose of me and mine, or into 'whatsoever recess I may be thrown, I can assure your 'Majesty, that I shall always preserve to the last gasp
'of my expiring breath, that due acknowledgment,
'which I still retain for your favour and constant friend'ship; nor can any thing contribute more to my con'solation, than to hear, as I hope to do, when I have 'wholly quitted your dominions, of the quick return
'of all your wonted triumphs, both by sea and land,
'over your enemies and mine, when my interest shall
'no longer be intermixed with your's.

I am,

Monsieur,

my Brother,

your's, &c.

J A M E S Rex (8).'

[G] Which so much disgraces our annals.] The Dutch upon this occasion played off their wit in a picture, wherein the taking of the Smyrna fleet was represented at a distance, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel on board his own ship, with his hands tied behind him, the two ends of the cord being respectively held by his colleagues; to insinuate that he would have prevented this misfortune, if the Admirals Killigrew and Delaval, had not hindered him.

[H] The

(6) The Queen declared, she did not believe these reports, and that she would displace no body from their posts on that account. General Histories of England.

(7) The Gazettes for this year.

(8) From a copy preserved in the Secret Memoirs of our Admiral, p. 55, 56.

Sir Cloudesley, at the bar of the House, defended his colleagues as well as himself, and gave so clear and plain an account of the matter, that it satisfied all people, who were capable of being satisfied, of the innocence of the commanders; that is, in point of treachery, which, though it had been asserted by a vote of the House of Commons, yet the proposed resolution to censure them passed in the negative (ee). In the year 1694, Admiral Russel was replaced in the chief command of the fleet; and the character of Sir Cloudesley remaining absolutely unimpeached, we find him again at sea this year, acting in the Channel, and on the French coast; where he had the honour to command as Vice-Admiral of the Red, under Lord Berkeley Admiral of the Blue, in the famous expedition to Camaret-Bay, which, unfortunate as it proved *, yet Sir Cloudesley distinguished himself, by his speedy and dextrous embarkation of the land-forces, when they failed upon it: as he did also, when, on their return to England, it was thought necessary to send the fleet again upon the coast of France, to bombard Diep and other places (ff). On the 27th of August, Lord Berkeley returning to London, the command of the squadron, which consisted now only of frigates and small ships, devolved upon Sir Cloudesley, who received express instructions to undertake the bombardment of Dunkirk at all events. Accordingly he attempted it, though without any good effect, through the fault of the engineer, who probably, for want of sufficient intelligence of the preparations which the French had made against this design, had promised more than either he or any other man could perform [H]. Sir Cloudesley, however, took care to demonstrate from his conduct, that no fault lay in him; for he went with a boat within the enemy's works, and so became an eye-witness of the impossibility of doing what his orders directed to be done; and therefore, on his coming home, he was perfectly well received, and continued to be employed, as a man who would command success where it was possible, and omit nothing in his power where it was not (gg). The remaining part of this war was carried on at sea, chiefly by bombarding the towns and forts on the French coast; in which Sir Cloudesley had his share: and after the peace of Ryswick he was always consulted by his Majesty, whenever maritime affairs were under consideration †. After the declaration of war against France and Spain by Queen Anne, the ministry setting their eyes upon the galleons, a squadron consisting of twenty men of war was fitted out, in order to intercept them, under the command of Sir Cloudesley, then Admiral of the White. And when this design had been luckily anticipated (bb), he was sent to Vigo, after the taking that place by Sir George Rooke, to bring home the spoils of the Spanish and French fleet. This was in the latter end of the year 1702, and he performed all that was expected from him with that zeal and expedition which he had formerly shewn upon all occasions: for, arriving at Vigo on the 16th of October, he got things into such forwardness, that he carried off whatever could possibly be brought home, burnt the rest, and notwithstanding the stormy season of the year, the foulness of his ships, and his being embarrassed with prizes, arrived safely in the Downs on the seventh of November [I]; which the Court considered as so remarkable a service, (ee) Chandler's Debates.

* General Histories of England.

(ff) Admiral Bebbow was constantly employed in executing the bombardments. See his article.

(gg) Trenchet's Naval Memoirs.

† Upon Lord Berkeley's resigning in Feb. 1697, his regiment of marines was given to Sir Cloudesley. Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, Vol. I. p. 330. note (6).

(bb) See Sir George Rooke's article.

[H] The engineers promised more than they could perform] This attempt had been resolved on before Lord Berkeley's departure, and Mr Meesters, who is said to be the inventor and manager of the machines, called infernals (g), went to Flanders, in order to procure such pilots as were able to carry the squadron into the harbour of Dunkirk, or at least so far into the road, as might enable them to destroy the enemies ships. Sir Cloudesley sailed to the Downs in the beginning of September, and on the 7th was joined by Mr Meesters, with twenty-six pilots; when Captain Benbow was appointed to command the small ships, and to follow the directions of Mr Meesters, whose pilots did not perform what was expected from them. On the 12th however, Sir Cloudesley Shovel appeared before Dunkirk, with thirteen English, and six Dutch men of war, two bomb-vessels, seventeen machines, and other small craft. In the evening, Capt. Benbow went in and founded the western channel, between the Brake and the Main, notwithstanding a prodigious fire from the ships and the citadel. The next day all the boats and small vessels were sent in again, with the Charles galley, two bomb-vessels, and some of the machines. In the afternoon, two of the machines were sent in. The first took fire before she was near enough to do execution; whether it was that the cannon of the place set fire to it, as some of the French writers say, or that those on board finding it impossible either to bring it nearer, or to get it off, were obliged to let it burn there. The other, which was the biggest, went in boldly, and advanced very near the mole-head; but the tide set her on one side, so that she drove a cable's length, and then blew up (io). It was found, that the French had, according to custom, early intelligence, and by driving piles before the pier-head, and sinking ships on the back of the westernmost pier, had secured themselves against all attempts of this nature. Sir Cloudesley being informed of this, and knowing that the spring tides were over, failed away for Calais, and on the 17th sent the bomb-vessels in, and threw so many shells into the town, that about forty houses were ruined; but the wind blowing hard that night, and a great swell of the sea happening, the Admiral was forced to bear away: And the storm continuing two days, he thought it not convenient to stay any longer, but returned with his whole squadron into the Downs, from whence the bomb-vessels and machines were sent into the river Thames (ii).

[I] He arrived in the Downs on the 7th of November.] Sir Cloudesley, in the space of a week, put the French men of war and other prizes, into the best condition possible; took out all the lading from a galleon, which was made prize by the Mary, and brought along with him the Dartmouth, which had been taken from us in the last war, and was now made prize by captain Wyvill; but as there was another ship of that name in the navy, the prize was called the Vigo. He also took out of the French ships that were run on shore, fifty brass guns, and brought off sixty more from the forts and batteries; after which, on the 24th of October, he set fire to the ships he could not bring away. The next day he left Vigo, but it proving calm, he anchored in the channel between that port and Bayonne, where he sent several prisoners on shore, with a flag of truce, and had ours returned in their stead. On the 27th of October he was again under sail, intending to have passed thro' the north channel; but the wind taking him short, he was obliged to pass thro' that which leads to the south, where the galleon which was the Monmouth's prize struck upon a rock and foundered; but there being several frigates on each side of her, all her men were saved except two. He was this day joined by the Dragon, a fifty gun ship, commanded by Captain Holyman, which had been attacked by a French man

(g) See an account of these machines in Admiral Benbow's article. But Stephen-Martin Leske, in the Life of Sir John Leske, ascribes this invention to that Admiral's father. See Sir John Leske's article.

(io) Campbell's Naval History of King William III. from the French accounts, in Histoire Militaire, Tom. III. and Journal Historique de Louis XIV. p. 197.

(ii) Life of King William.

(i i) The Queen had before made a promotion of sea-officers, in which Sir Cloudefley was left out. General Histories of England.

(k k) The Dutch were well contented with what was done, imagining the protection of their own trade was a matter of as great importance, at least to them, as the support of King Charles's title to the Crown of Spain, which the Court of Vienna at this time left entirely to the Confederates. Ibid.

(12) London Gazette, No. 3683, where it is said, the remainder of the fleet came in under the command of Sir Stafford Fairborne.

(13) Burnet commends him for it, Hist. of his own Time, under this year; but he had censured another Admiral for the same thing. Such is party-spirit.

* Upon his arrival there, the Governor refusing to give him a royal salute, he exerted himself in honour of the Union Flag, and used such means, as soon brought the haughty magistrate to a compliance. Tindal's Continuation, &c. under this year 1703.

service, that it was immediately resolved to employ him in affairs of the greatest consequence for the future (i i). Accordingly he commanded the grand fleet up the Straights in 1703, where he did every thing that was possible for an Admiral to do, whose instructions were very large, and who yet wanted force to accomplish almost any part of those instructions [K]; so that, notwithstanding the management of our affairs at sea was very severely censured that year in the House of Commons (k k), yet all parties agreed, that Sir Cloudefley Shovel had done his duty in every respect, and very well deserved the high trust and confidence that had been reposed in him *. In 1704, Sir George Rooke commanded the grand fleet in the Mediterranean; to reinforce which, Sir Cloudefley Shovel was sent with a powerful squadron, and he took such care, not only to execute his orders, but to distinguish in what manner they ought to be executed, that by joining the fleet in the middle of June, he was very instrumental in the success that followed [L]; as by that very action, he effectually disappointed all the French schemes, though that Court had boasted, they should be able to restore their maritime power, and give law to the confederates at sea this summer. He assisted in the reduction of Gibraltar (ll), and had a very considerable share in the action off Malaga, in which he behaved with the utmost bravery [M]. But he was very far from taking to himself what some afterwards endeavoured man of war of much greater force, and the captain and twenty five men killed; but his lieutenant fought her bravely, and at last brought her safe into the fleet. In their passage they had extreme bad weather; and tho' the Nassau had the good fortune to make a very rich prize, which was coming from Morlaix, yet it foundered the next morning; and the weather was then so bad, that the squadron separated, every ship shifting for itself; tho' all had the good luck to get safe to England, but in a very shattered condition (12).

[K] He did all that could be done in his circumstances.] The fleet consisted at first of twenty-seven ships of the line, and the Admiral had under him, Rear-admiral Byng, and Sir Stafford Fairborne; and being afterwards reinforced with eight ships more, these were commanded by Vice admiral Leake. His instructions were very large, but all of them might be reduced to these three heads, viz. annoying the enemy, assisting our allies, and protecting our trade. He waited 'till the middle of June for the Dutch, and then was joined only by twelve ships of the line, carrying three flags; and it is certain, that if the force he had with him had been better adjusted than it was to the things he had orders to perform; yet the time allowed him, which was only to the end of September, was much too short, so that it was really impossible for him to execute the services that seemed to be expected. He represented this (13); but being however ordered to obey, he did so, but was not able to get clear of the land 'till the middle of July, having also a fleet of upwards of 230 merchant-men under his convoy. On the 24th he arrived off the rock of Lisbon, where he called a council of war, at which the rendezvous was appointed to be held in Altea bay. He pursued his instructions as far as he was able; and having secured the Turkey fleet, he intended to have staid some time upon the coast of Italy. But the Dutch Admiral informed him, that both his orders, and his victuals required his thinking of a speedy return; and it was with much ado that Sir Cloudefley prevailed upon him to go to Leghorn *. In the mean time, the instructions he had to succour the Cevennois, then in arms against the French King, were found impracticable; and therefore the Admiral contented himself with doing all that could be done, which was to send the Tartar and the Pembroke upon that coast, where they found it impossible to do any thing. The Admiral then detached Capt. Swanton to Tunis and Tripoli, and sent Rear-admiral Byng to Algier, to renew the peace with those states, and on the 22d of September arrived off Altea, from whence he soon after sailed for England. On the 27th, in the Straights mouth, he met with an Algerine man of war becalmed, which he immediately took under his protection, 'till all the Dutch ships were passed; in which he certainly performed the part of an English Admiral, preserved the reputation of our Flag, did great service to our trade, and put it out of the power of the French to practise upon those piratical states, as they had done formerly. Having intelligence that a fleet of merchant-ships waited for a convoy from Lisbon, he sent Sir Andrew Leake thither with a small squadron, who convoyed them safe into the Downs. On the 16th of November, the fleet being off the Isle of Wight, the Dutch crowded away for their own ports, and left the Admiral to steer for the Downs, which he did; but before he he made land, Captain (afterwards Sir John)

Norris, in the Orford, a third rate, together with the Warsprite of 70 guns, and the Litchfield of 50, being a-head of the fleet, gave chase to a French ship of war, and beginning to engage about eight at night, the dispute continued 'till two in the morning, when, having lost her fore-top-masts, and all her sails, and her standing and running rigging being much shattered, she struck. This ship came from Newfoundland, was commanded by Monsieur de la Ruë, was named the Hazardous, and had fifty guns mounted, with 370 men; but had more ports, and was larger than any one of our sixty gun ships, so that she was registered in the list of our royal navy (14).

Sir Cloudefley had been only a few days in the Downs, when the great storm happened, which began on the 26th of November, this year, 1703, about eleven in the evening, the wind W. S. W. and continued with dreadful flashes of lightning 'till about seven the next morning. Sir Cloudefley cut his main mast by the board, which saved the ship from running on the Galloper, of the breach of which she was then in view. Sir Stafford Fairborne had his flag as Vice-admiral of the Red flying in the Association, in which he was driven first to Gottenburgh, and then to Copenhagen, from whence he did not get home 'till the next year. The Revenge was forced from her anchors, and with much ado, after driving some time on the coast of Holland, got into the river Medway; the Russel, Capt. Townsend, was forced over to Holland; and the Dorset, Captain Edward Whitaker, after striking twice on the Galloper, drove a fortnight at sea, and then got safe to the Nore (15).

[L] He was very instrumental in the success that followed.] After Sir George Rooke was failed, the Court received intelligence, that the French were very busy in fitting out a great squadron at Brest. Upon this news it was thought proper to equip, with the utmost expedition, a good fleet; which was put under the command of Sir Cloudefley, Admiral of the White, who had under him Sir Stafford Fairborne, Vice-admiral of the Red, and George Byng, Esq; Rear-admiral of the same squadron. The Admiral was instructed, if he found the Brest squadron still in port, to send away the trade, storeships, and victuallers, under a proper convoy to Lisbon, and to remain before Brest himself, to endeavour to keep in the enemy; or if that was found impracticable, to burn and destroy them if they came out. But in case he found the Brest squadron failed, then he was to call a council of war, in order to judge what strength might be necessary to be sent to Sir George Rooke, and if it amounted to twenty-two ships, then he was to sail with them himself; that our fleet might at all events be stronger than that of the enemy. Sir Cloudefley executed his instructions punctually; and finding the Brest squadron were gone, and therefore that a great strength was necessary in the Mediterranean to oppose the French, he sailed thither about the latter end of May, and on the 16th of June joined Sir George Rooke, with his squadron off Lagos. When a council of war being called to consider what service should be proceeded on, it was at length, after a long debate, carried, to make a sudden and vigorous attempt upon Gibraltar (16).

[M] He behaved with the utmost bravery in the action off Malaga.] In order to a clear understanding of Sir Cloudefley's

* The blame fell upon those who framed the project, and gave the Admiral his instructions. Ibid.

(11) See the account of that action in Burchet's Memoirs, &c.

(14) Burchet's Naval History, p. 656.

(15) Gazette, No. 3928.

(16) The writer of the Secret Memoirs, &c. says, the Council was determined to this resolution by Sir Cloudefley's arguments, p. 90, 91. See some account of the affair in Sir George Rooke's article.

endeavoured to confer upon him, the glory of beating the French fleet, while Sir George Rooke only looked on, or fought at a distance (m m). This was not at all Sir Cloudesley's nature; he would no more be guilty of an action of that sort, than he would have been patient in bearing it. He knew very well his own merit, and his Admiral's; and he did justice to both in the letter he wrote on that occasion, a copy of which is inserted below [N]. Upon his return home, he was presented to the Queen by Prince George, Lord High-Admiral of England, and met with a very gracious reception. As Sir Cloudesley had no concern in the arts made use of to lessen the reputation of Sir George Rooke, in order to pave the way for laying him aside; so, after this was done in 1705, being made Rear-Admiral of England, and Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Fleet, he made no scruple in accepting a commission to act jointly with the Earl of Peterborough, as Admiral of the fleet destined for the Mediterranean. Accordingly he arrived at Lisbon with this fleet, consisting of twenty-nine line of battle ships, on the 22d of June. From thence he sailed to Altea-Bay, and there took in his Catholic Majesty; who pressing the Earl of Peterborough to make an immediate attempt on the city of Barcelona, and the province of Catalonia, where he was assured the people were well affected to him, it was agreed to, and the fleet sailed accordingly to Barcelona on the 12th of August; where after some disputes the siege was undertaken, and the city surrendered in the end of September [O].
On

(m m) They are the words of Bl- shop Burnet, in the History of his own Times.

Sir Cloudesley's part in this important action, it will be necessary to give a short account of the strength of the two fleets, and the form in which they were drawn up. The French line, which consisted of fifty-two ships, and twenty four galleys, was very strong in the center, but weaker in the van and rear; to supply which most of their galleys were placed in those squadrons. In the center was the Count de Toulouse, High-Admiral of France, with the white squadron, having behind him the Marquis du Roy with four galleys. In the van was the white and blue flags, commanded by the Marquis de Vilette, with seven French, and five Spanish galleys, and the blue squadron formed the rear, commanded by the Marquis de Langeron, having behind him eight French galleys, under the command of the Marquis Fervisse. The line of the confederate fleet consisted of fifty-three ships, Sir George Rooke, the Rear-Admirals Byng and Dilkes, being in the center, Sir Cloudesley Shovel and Sir John Leake, leading the van, and the Dutch ships forming the rear. A little after ten o'clock, Admiral Shovel, with the van, bore down upon the enemy, and was at some distance from our center; which the Marquis de Vilette observing, thought he might get a-head of that squadron with his foremost ships; and in that view made a signal to the head most ships of the French line, to crowd all the sail they could. Admiral Shovel still bearing down upon the enemy, insensibly found himself in their line a-head of them; which the French judging to be a favourable opportunity, resolved to make their advantage of it, by keeping their wind, and crowding all the sail they were able, in order to cut off our van from the rest of the fleet; hoping with reason, that if it grew calm, which usually happens in a sea-fight, their galleys might tow them off, so that they might make a double, and weathering Sir Cloudesley, might put him between two fires. But the Admiral perceiving the design, immediately elapt upon a wind; and Sir George Rooke foreseeing what would be the consequence, if his van was intercepted, bore down upon the enemy with the rest of the confederate fleet, and put out the signal for the fight, which was immediately begun by Admiral Shovel, and was continued with equal resolution on both sides, 'till about two in the afternoon; when Sir Cloudesley having disabled several ships of the enemy's van, obliged them to make out of the reach of his cannon. But Sir George Rooke had not the like success in the center, where the enemy being very strong, and several of our ships forced to go out of the line for want of shot, the battle fell hard upon the Admiral's ship the St George, and the Shrewsbury. This being observed by Sir Cloudesley, he immediately tacked a-stern, and reinforced the Admiral, by closing the line of the center; which excellent piece of seamanship decided the fate of the day (17). The Count de Tholouse shared the like fate with his van, and about seven o'clock was obliged to tow out of danger. The Dutch in the rear, continued indeed firing somewhat longer than the rest, but night coming on put a period to that dispute also.

[N] The letter is inserted below. This most admirably honest plain letter, which gives us a true picture of our Admiral, is as follows. This brings the news of my health, and that we are in our way homeward: That which sends us home so soon, is a very sharp engagement we have had with the French. Our number of ships that fought in the line of battle, were pretty equal, I think they were forty-nine, and we fifty three; but Sir George Rooke reserved some of the fifty gun ships, to observe if they attempted any thing with their galleys, of which they had twenty-four. Their ships did far exceed in bigness; I judge they had seventeen three deck ships, and we had but seven. The battle began on Sunday the 13th instant, soon after ten in the morning; and in the center and rear of the fleet, it continued 'till night parted them: But in the van of the fleet, where I commanded, we having the weather gage, gave me an opportunity of coming as near as I pleased, which was within pistol-shot, before I fired a gun; thro' which means, and God's assistance, the enemy declined us, and were upon the run in less than four hours; by which time we had little wind, and their galleys towed off their lame ships, and others as they pleased: For the Admiral of the white and blue, with whom we fought, had seven galleys attending upon him. As soon as the enemy got out of the reach of our guns, and the battle continuing pretty hot a-stern, and some of our ships in the Admiral's squadron towing out of the line, which I understood afterwards was for want of shot; I ordered all the ships of my division to slack all their sails, to close the line in the center. This working had that good effect, that several of the enemies ships a-stern, which had kept their line, having their top-sails and foresails set, shot up a-breast of us, as the Rear Admiral of the white and blue, and some of his division, and the Vice-Admiral of the white and some of his division; but they were so warmly received before they got a-broadside, that with the boats a-head, and their spritsails set, they towed from us, without giving us the opportunity of firing at them.

VOL. VI. No. 308.

The ships that suffered most in my division, were the Lenox, Warsprite, Tilbury, and Swiftsure, the rest escaped pretty well, and I the best of all, tho' I never took greater pains in my life to be soundly beaten; for I set all my sails, and rowed with three boats a head, to get along side with the Admiral of the white and blue, but he out-sailing me, would not fight, and lay along side of the little ships.

Notwithstanding the engagement was very sharp, and I think the like between two fleets never hath been in any time, there is hardly a ship that must not shift one mast, and some must shift all: A great many have suffered much, but none more than Sir George Rooke, and Captain Jennings, in the St George. God send us well home; I believe we have not three spare top-masts, nor three fishes in the fleet; and I judge there is ten jury-masts now up. After the fight, we lay two days in sight of the enemy, preparing for a second engagement, but the enemy declined, and stood from us in the night (18).

[O] Barcelona surrendered in the end of September, 1705. The reduction of Barcelona has been always considered as one of the most extraordinary events of this war, and one may venture to affirm that nothing but the assistance of the fleet could have reduced it. In support of this assertion, we shall lay before the reader part of a letter written by Sir Cloudesley to his Royal Highness the Lord High-Admiral, dated October 12,

41 D

1705,

(18) From a copy in a piece intitled, The Other Side of the Question, wrote in an Answer to the Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough. This letter was also printed in Compleat History of Europe, for 1704.

(17) See more of this in Sir John Leake's article.

(17) This was owing to the great things performed by Sir John Leake, for an account of which we refer to his article.

(18) Being in the Soundings on the 10th, the Barfleur, a second rate, sprung a dangerous leak, which obliged the Admiral to send her home, and to take the Earl Rivers and his principal officers into his own ship the Association. Burchet.

(19) The trenches were opened on the 9th of September. Burchet.

(20) Burchet.

On the first of October, it was resolved in a Council of War, that Sir Cloudesley should proceed for England, with the best part of the fleet. In pursuance of which resolution, he passed the Streights, with nineteen ships of the line, and part of the Dutch fleet, on the 16th of October, and arrived happily at Spithead on the 26th of November following, after as glorious a sea-campaign as either ourselves or our allies could expect (17). The next year, 1706, Sir Cloudesley again commanded the fleet which sailed from St Helens on the 10th of August, with ten thousand land-forces, in the design of making a descent somewhere on the French coast; but not being joined time enough by the Dutch, this project proved abortive [P], and it was resolved that the fleet should proceed to Lisbon, with these forces on board, and that they should be employed in the service of his Catholic Majesty. But not sailing 'till the sixth of September (18), and meeting with very bad weather, it did not reach the river of Lisbon 'till the month of November; and even then, the disputes which arose in King Charles's Council, with the delays of the Portuguese, who were far from being hearty in his cause, disappointed all the designs of the maritime powers. In this uneasy situation, Sir Cloudesley did all that could be expected from a wise and vigilant commander. He sent Colonel Worsley to Valencia [Q], in order 1705, containing an account of what passed in the last days of the siege (19), in the following terms: 'The 17th, our battery of thirty guns was opened, and fourteen of them began to play with very great execution upon that part of the wall where the breach was designed; the Earl of Peterborough came a-board and represented to us the great necessity he laboured under for want of money for subsisting the army, and carrying on the siege of Barcelona, and the services in Catalonia, and, in very pressing circumstances, desired the assistance of the fleet; upon which our flag-officers came to the inclosed resolution, to lend the Earl of Peterborough forty thousand dollars out of the contingent and short-allowance money of the fleet. The 19th, we came to these resolutions, viz. to remain longer before Barcelona than was agreed on at the first, to give all the assistance in our power, and to lay a fire-ship ashore, with two hundred barrels of powder; and a further demand being made for guns for the batteries, we landed fourteen more, which made up in all seventy-two guns, whereof thirty were twenty-four pounders that we landed here, with their utensils and ammunition. We continue to bombard the town from the sea as our small store of shells, and the weather will permit. The 20th a demand was made for more shot, and we called together the English flag-officers, and came to a resolution to supply the batteries with all the twenty-four and twenty-eight pound shot, except a very small quantity, which was accordingly done.

'The 22d the Prince of Lichenstein, and the Earl of Peterborough having desired, at the request of his Catholic Majesty, that the town of Lerida might for its security be furnished with about fifty barrels of powder; and a further supply of shot being demanded for the batteries ashore, it was considered at a council of war, and we came to the inclosed resolutions, viz. To furnish fifty barrels of powder for Lerida, and to send so many more twenty-four and twenty-eight pound shot ashore, as would reduce the English to thirty rounds; as likewise to be further assistant upon timely notice.

'The 23d at night, our breach being made, and all things prepared for an attack, the town was again summoned, and they desired to capitulate, and hostages were exchanged; on our side Brigadier Stanhope, and on the enemy's the Marquis de Rivera; and all hostilities ceased (20)'

It must be confessed that Don Velasco, Governor of Barcelona for the Duke of Anjou, and the garrison, submitted to the arms of Lord Peterborough, but it was to the clemency and good-nature of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, that the same gentleman, the Duke of Popoli, the French and Italian soldiers who had served against the Allies in that siege, confided their lives, fortunes, and their honours; from his goodness they sought a protection, when even heaven and earth, the miquelets, the remainder of the garrison, and the burghers of Barcelona had declared against them; and 'twas by his justice and strict observance of the capitulation, they enjoyed a freedom, of which they had criminally deprived several persons who expressed their zeal a little too warmly for the house of Austria.

After the town had surrendered, a quarrel happened between the townsmen and the Viceroy, which had near proved fatal to the latter. He had used the burghers both before and during the siege with an unreasonable severity, especially those that were the least inclined to favour the cause of King Charles the Third; he preserved the same austerity even in the reverse of his fortune, and to his four and morose deportment gave a further suspicion to the inhabitants, that he designed to carry along with him some prisoners of the state which were of their number: His haughty carriage, and these surmises, true or false, and the general odium he lay under, incited some of the meaner sort of citizens to draw into a body, who, being assisted in a little time by others of the better sort, and several hundred miquelets, violently broke open the prisons, and boldly charged the garrison, who were then issuing out at the breach, and threatened to sacrifice the Governor to their resentment; the tumult was at length appeased, by the prudence of his Excellency. In the mean time, the chiefest of the garrison, with their ladies, and the Governor himself, had taken sanctuary in a monastery, and at their earnest request, in the close of the evening they were carried on board Sir Cloudesley Shovel, from whom they received a treatment civil and honourable, attended with all the offices of compassion and humanity (21).

[P] The project proved abortive.] The design was framed upon the representation of some French Hugonots, particularly of the famous Marquis Guiscard, who was afterwards engaged in a design to assassinate the Queen. The land-forces for this service consisted of very near ten thousand men, which were to be commanded in chief by the Earl Rivers, and under him by the Lieutenant-Generals Earle and de Guiscard; the Earl of Effex and Lord Mordaunt, eldest son to the Earl of Peterborough, were to serve as Major-generals (22.)

[Q] He sent Col. Worsley to Valencia.] While this gentleman was gone, and before the Admiral had it in his power to take any settled resolution, the King of Portugal died; which threw the affairs of that kingdom into some confusion; and that could not happen without affecting us. We have observed already (23), that the Portuguese Ministry acted in a manner no ways suitable to the strict alliance which then subsisted between our Court and theirs. But now things grew worse, and whatever sentiments the new King might be of, his Ministers ventured to take some such steps as were not to be borne with patience by an Admiral of Sir Cloudesley Shovel's temper, of which we shall give the following instance.

In the beginning of December, the Admiral having appointed some cruising ships to proceed to sea, as they were going out of the mouth of the river, the Portuguese fired first at least threescore shot at them to bring them to an anchor, which he perceiving, sent orders to our captains to push their way through; and accordingly they did so without so much as returning a single shot at the forts. The Court of Portugal, upon his representation of this usage, pretended, that the officers of the fort had done it without orders, being only directed to fire at and detain a Genoese ship, whose master was indebted to the King. But the Admiral being certainly informed, that this very ship was at the same time lying before the walls of Lisbon, and that the master of her was ashore transacting his business, he let them know, in a manner which became a person in his post, thus affronted,

(21) Secret Memoirs, &c. p. 108, 109.

(22) Campbell's Naval History, Vol. III. p. 444.

(23) In Sir John Leake's article.

order to receive from the King himself and the General a certain account of their affairs, and a true state of the services they expected from him (pp). The Colonel returned with letters from the King and the Earl of Galway, informing him, that unless he could bring the forces, and land them so as that they might come to their assistance, things were likely to fall into as great confusion as they were in the winter before; whereby all the advantages would be lost, which had been procured at so vast an expence both of blood and treasure by the maritime powers. These advices gave the Admiral so much more concern, as he knew the ships were so much damaged by the rough weather they had met with in their passage, that it was impossible to fit them speedily for the sea; and that the land-forces were likewise so much reduced by sickness, death, and other accidents, that instead of ten there were scarce six thousand effective men. He resolved, however, to do the best he could to comply with the King's and the General's desires, the rather, because he saw that nothing but spirit and diligence could possibly recover those advantages, which had been lost through divisions and neglect of duty. He gave orders, therefore, for repairing with the utmost diligence the mischief that had been done to his ships, ordered the transports to be victualled, and made the other necessary dispositions for proceeding with the fleet and army for the Spanish coast, and was on the very point of embarking the troops, when he was restrained by an order from England. This order was obtained by the pressing instances of the court of Portugal, representing, that the forces might be more effectually employed in conjunction with their army. Orders were sent to this purpose, and a memorial was drawn up, containing the terms upon which her Britannic Majesty would consent to the propositions made by the Portugueze minister. But notwithstanding this application, the Portugueze being either unwilling or unable to comply with those demands, it was resolved, in a Council of War, to resume the former project, and to land them at Alicant; for which orders arrived soon after from England. Accordingly the Confederate fleet, on the seventh of January, 1707, sailed with the land-forces from Lisbon to Alicant, where they arrived on the 28th, and were actually landed (qq). But through the delays the expedition met with, and the reduction of the troops already mentioned, Sir Cloudesley, finding that his presence would be of little use there, and that the fleet stood in need of repairs, left Alicant on the 17th of February, and returned to Lisbon, where he arrived the 7th of March following [R]. There he received orders for the expedition against Toulon. In obedience to his instructions relating to that important affair, which, if it had succeeded, must have put an end to the war (rr), our Admiral made such dispatch, that on the 10th of May he sailed for Alicant; where having joined Sir George Byng, he proceeded to the coast of Italy, and on the fifth of June came to an anchor before Final, with a fleet of forty-three men of war, and fifty-seven transports. Prince Eugene went thither to confer with the Admiral, and soon after the fleet sailing for Nice, came to an anchor at the latter end of the month, between that city and Antibes; where, on the 29th, he had the honour to entertain the Duke of Savoy, Prince Eugene, and most of the general officers, together with the English and Dutch ministers, on board his own ship the Association [S]. After dinner they held a Council of War, where it was resolved to force a passage over the Var, in which the English Admiral promised to assist. Accordingly, two days after, this daring enterprize was undertaken, to the great astonishment of the French, who believed their works upon that river to be impregnable; and so indeed they had proved to any forces in the world except English seamen, as will appear by perusing the account of that action; which, with the rest of the proceedings of the fleet in this affair against Toulon, may be seen below [T]. Upon the Duke of Savoy's raising

(pp) He had, on his first arrival in the river of Lisbon, sent two ships of Sir George Byng's squadron to Alicant, with money and necessaries for the army then under the command of the Earl of Galway. Ibid.

(qq) When the Earl Rivers and the Earl of Essex returned to England. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1706.

(rr) See the General Histories of England.

affronted, that if they offered to attempt any such thing again, for they had done it before to Sir John Leake (24), he would not stay for orders from his mistress, but take satisfaction by the mouth of his cannon. This declaration had a very proper effect, and though it might not mend the principles of the Portugueze Ministry, it contributed however greatly towards teaching them better manners (25).

[R] He arrived at Lisbon on the 7th of March, 1706-7. The great defeat at Almanza happened on the 14th of April following. After which the Earl of Galway retired with the broken remains of his army, which nothing could have saved but the timely appearance of our fleet. Sir Cloudesley, knowing the distress our army was in through want of almost every thing necessary, sent Sir George Byng with a strong squadron to the coast of Spain for their relief. Sir George sailed on the 30th of March, and coming off Cape St Vincent on the 15th of April, he received there the news of our defeat; soon after which he received a message from Lord Galway acquainting him with the distress he was in, and desiring that whatever he brought for the use of the army might be carried to Tortosa in Catalonia, to which his Lordship designed to retreat, and that, if possible, he would save the sick and wounded men at Denia, Gandia, and Valencia, where it was intended the bridges of boats, baggage, and all things that could be got together should be put on board. Accordingly he took care of the sick and wounded men, and sent them to Tortosa, where the Lord Galway proposed to make a stand with the poor remains of the army. This service employed Sir George Byng almost the whole month of April, and then he was in daily expectation of being joined by Sir Cloudesley from Lisbon, either on that part of the coast of Spain, or at Barcelona, whither he was designed (26). Accordingly we see above that Sir Cloudesley joined him at Alicant.

[S] He entertained the Duke of Savoy, &c. at dinner. Though Sir Cloudesley was not one of the politest officers we ever had (27), yet he shewed a great deal of prudence in the magnificent entertainment he made upon this occasion. The Duke, when he came on board the Association, found a guard of halberdiers in new liveries at the great cabin door. At the upper end of the table was set an armed chair with a crimson velvet canopy. The table consisted of sixty covers; and every thing was so well managed, that his Royal Highness could not forbear saying to the Admiral, at dinner, 'If your Excellency had paid me a visit at Turin, I could scarce have treated you so well (28).'

[T] The proceedings against Toulon may be seen below. The enemy's entrenchments on the Var, were extended above four miles into the country, and were defended by eight hundred horse, and six battalions of foot,

(26) Eurchet, as before, and Boyer's Life of Queen Anne.

(27) He is generally ranked with Admiral Benbow in this particular, and was equally the favourite of the sailors. See Benbow's article, (28) Boyer's Life of Queen Anne.

(24) See his article.

(25) Burchet's Naval History, p. 729.

raising the siege, and repassing the Var, there happened some new disputes, in which Sir Cloudefley had little or no concern. Her Britannic Majesty's minister laboured to persuade Prince Eugene to take upon him the command of all the forces in Spain, in which the Duke of Savoy likewise concurred; and Sir Cloudefley offered to transport his Royal Highness, with a body of troops under his command; but this proposition being rejected, his Excellency, not a little chagrined at the miscarriage of an expedition upon which he had set his heart, bore away for the Streights (s s), and soon after resolved to return home, which was the last act of his life. He left Sir Thomas Dilkes at Gibraltar, with nine ships of the line, three fifth-rates, and one of the sixth, for the security of the coasts of Italy, and then proceeded with the remainder of the fleet, consisting of ten ships of the line, five frigates, four fire-ships, a sloop, and a yacht, for England. On the 22d of October he came into the Soundings, and in the morning had ninety fathom water. About noon he lay by; but at six in the evening he made sail again, and stood away under his courses, believing, as is presumed, that he saw the lights on Scilly. Soon after which he made signals of danger, as several other ships did. Sir George Byng, who was then within less than half a mile to the windward of him, saw the breaches of the sea, and soon after the rocks called the Bishop and his Clerks, upon which the Admiral struck, and in two minutes there was nothing more of him or his ship seen [U]. There were near nine hundred persons with him on board (t t) the Association, among whom were his sons-in-law Sir John Narborough and James his brother, Mr Trelawney, eldest son to the

(s s) Burchet.

(t t) Not a soul of which escaped. The Chaplain happened to go on board another ship that morning, to administer the Sacrament to some dying people, and so saved his life.

foot, and a reinforcement was daily expected of twelve battalions more, under the command of Lieutenant-general Dillon, but before his arrival, Sir Cloudefley having observed to the Duke, that part of the French lines were so near the sea, that it was in his power to cannonade them, and that he would land a body of seamen who should attack the highest and strongest of their entrenchments, his Royal Highness consented to it. Accordingly on the first of July, Sir Cloudefley ordered four English and one Dutch man of war to enter the mouth of the river Var, where they began to cannonade the French lines; soon after which 600 English seamen landed in open boats, under the command of Capt. (afterwards Admiral) Norris, who was quickly followed by the Admiral, and having begun the attack, the enemy were so terrified with such an unexpected salutation, that they threw down their arms after a short dispute, and abandoned their works (29). They had scarce quitted their entrenchments, but they met in their retreat Lieutenant-general Dillon, at the head of his twelve battalions, and he was so astonished, that he suffered himself to be persuaded to abandon the town of St Paul, and continue this retreat (30). On the 2d of July, his Royal Highness and Prince Eugene, with the British Envoy and Sir John Norris, dined again on board the Admiral, and after dinner entering into a conference, the Duke of Savoy resolved to march directly to Toulon, hoping for a good conclusion of the affair. But the Duke having observed that even after Toulon was taken, himself and his army might find it impracticable to retreat. The Admiral replied, 'I hope better things from your Royal Highness's fortune; but if there should be any appearance of such a thing's happening, your Highness may rely upon me, I will take care to supply a sufficient number of transports to embark all your troops.' The Duke thanked him for his generous offer, told him he relied chiefly on the assistance he expected from him, and that if he would repair to the islands of Hieres, he should not long remain there before he should hear of the army's being in the neighbourhood of Toulon, and that then he should expect to see the fleet in the road. The Duke marched from the Var on the 3d, but did not arrive before Toulon till the 15th (31). The Admiral however sailed immediately with his fleet for the islands of Hieres, leaving ten or twelve frigates to interrupt the enemy's correspondence with Italy. On the 17th of July, he landed and assisted at a council of war, in which many demands were made on the fleet, and the Admiral promised all that was in his power, which he accordingly performed. A hundred cannon were landed from the fleet for the batteries, with two hundred rounds of powder and shot, and a considerable number of seamen to serve as gunners; and cordage, nails, and spikes, with all other things wanting for the Camp (for indeed they were but poorly furnished) were supplied from the ships: So that affairs had a very good face till the 4th of August, O. S. when, early in the morning, the enemy making a vigorous sally, drove the confederates from their works, and killed and wounded above 800 men, among whom were the Prince of Saxe-

(29) Sir John and his seamen scampered over the works so suddenly, that the French were struck with a panic.

(30) London Gazette, No. 4352. where there is an account of this expedition by authority.

(31) This dilatory march defeated the attempt, by giving the French time to strengthen the fortifications, as also for the arrival of the troops under de Fesse.

Gotha, and some officers of distinction. The next day, being the 16th of August, N. S. the fleet began to cannonade the town, and threw bombs in the night, which was continued till the siege was raised, and which obliged the French to sink all their capital ships, a distress that more than counterbalanced the whole expense of this service, great as it was (32). On the 6th his Royal Highness desired the Admiral would immediately embark the sick and wounded, and withdraw the cannon, in order to his raising the siege; his Royal Highness also informed him, that he purposed to decamp the 10th in the morning, and desired that the fleet might accompany the army as far as the Var. Accordingly, the very day the army began to march, the fleet drew as near the place as possible, and five bomb-vessels supported by the lightest frigates, and all the boats of the men of war, under Rear-admiral Dilkes, advanced into the creek of fort St Lewis, and notwithstanding a prodigious fire from the place, bombarded the town and harbour from noon till five the next morning, and this with all the success that could be expected; by this means the land-army had time to quit their camp at La Vilette; which they did in five columns in great safety, the enemy having something else to do than pursue them: And as to any attempt afterwards, his Royal Highness put it pretty much out of their power, by marching in two days as far as in his approach to the place he had marched in six (33). Thus ended the famous siege of Toulon, from whence the Confederates hoped, and the French feared so much. Various reasons are alledged for the miscarriage of this enterprize, by the writers of those times, to whom we must refer, mentioning this one only, which particularly concerns our Admiral. It was said that Sir Cloudefley disgusted the Duke of Savoy, by detaining the payment of his subsidies, which were due on his passing the Var. But this report is apparently groundless, since the Admiral sailed the next day; and consequently he must either have paid the money, or his Royal Highness would not have stirred a foot further. Bishop Burnet too says *, that the Duke was afraid of getting to Toulon before the fleet; and in that case he would have wanted provisions: all our gazettes contradict this, and say, that if he had arrived there sooner he must have taken the place, and all the French magazines.

[U] Nothing more of his ship seen.] Besides the Association, the Eagle, Capt. Robert Hancock of 70 guns, and the Romney, Capt. Will. Coney of 50 guns, perished; the Firebrand fire-ship was lost likewise, but Capt. Piercy, the Commander, and most of the company were saved: The Phoenix fire-ship, Capt. Samson ran ashore, but was happily got off again. The Royal Anne in which Sir George Byng bore his flag, was saved by the presence of mind of the officers and men, who, in a minute's time set her topsails, when she was within a ship's length of the rocks. Lord Durley in the St George ran as great hazard, and was saved by meer accident; he struck on the same rocks with Sir Cloudefley, and that wave which beat out the Admiral's lights, set his ship afloat (34.)

(32) They had 46 of these then in the harbour, from 110 to 50 guns. London Gazette, No. 4357. where there is a list of them.

(33) London Gazette, as before.

* In the Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 11.

(34) London Gazette.

[W] His

the Bishop of Winchester, and several young gentlemen of quality. There is no saying how this unhappy accident fell out, or to whose fault it was owing; a report, indeed, prevailed, that a great part of the crew had got drunk for joy that they were in sight of land (uu). Sir Cloudesley's body was thrown ashore the next day upon the island of Scilly, when some fishermen took it up, and having stolen a valuable emerald ring from the finger, stripped and buried it. This ring being shewn about, made a great noise all over the island, and coming to the ears of Mr Panton, who was purser of the Arundel, he found out the fellows, declared the ring to be Sir Cloudesley Shovel's, and obliged them to discover where they had buried the body; which being done, he took it and carried it on board his own ship, in which it was transported to Portsmouth [W], conveyed from thence by land to London, and buried with great solemnity from his house in Soho-Square in Westminster-abbey (vv), where a fine monument of white marble was afterwards erected by the Queen's appointment, in order to do honour to the memory of so great a man and so worthy a subject (xx). Sir Cloudesley Shovel, at the time of his death, was Rear-Admiral of England, Admiral of the White, and Commander in Chief of her Majesty's fleet; one of the Council to Prince George of Denmark as Lord High-Admiral of England, Elder Brother of Trinity House, and one of the Governors of Greenwich-Hospital; in all which stations he discharged his trust with the greatest honour and integrity. And as in his publick character he was an accomplished sea-officer, one who had the glory of his Queen and the good of his country at heart; so, in all relations of private life, as husband, parent, or master of his family, he conducted himself with such prudence, wisdom, and tenderness [X], that few men lived more beloved, or died more lamented. Her Majesty expressed a very particular concern for the loss of him, and was pleased to tell Sir John Leake, when she made him Rear-Admiral of England, that 'she knew no man so fit to repair the loss of the ablest seaman in her service (yy).'

Sir Cloudesley married the widow of his friend and patron Sir John Narborough, by whom he left two daughters, coheiresses; the eldest of which married Lord Romney, and the other Sir Narborough d'Aeth, Bart.

[W] His body was transported to Portsmouth.] So Dr Campbell; but the writer of the Secret Memoirs tells us, p 121. that after being embalmed, it was conveyed to Plymouth in the Salisbury, where it lay in the citadel in state, 'till by Lady Shovel's orders it was carried for London; when the hearse was attended by the Mayor and Aldermen in their formalities to the limits of the corporation, the soldiers of the garrison being under arms, the cannon of the place fired minute-guns, and all other honours were done to his memory which his worth and merits could deserve from a grateful people; and that upon it's arrival in London, it lay in state at his house in Soho Square.

[X] In all relations of private life, as husband, parent, &c. he conducted himself with tenderness.] The writer of the Secret Memoirs observes, that the friendship he lived in with his Lady, and the regard he always shewed her was almost without a precedent, that he used her sons by Sir John Narborough with the same tenderness as if they had been his own; that as he acquired his fortune by just and honourable methods, so he behaved himself piously in the disposal of it; that his mother and sister shared his happiness, and that the former, who long survived her husband, was alive in her own country, when these memoirs were written in 1708, attended with an equipage agreeable to the mother of Sir Cloudesley Shovel. That his liberality was not confined only to his near relations, the most remote branches of his family were sensible of the happiness of being allied to him; his friends, his domestics, his dependants, were very often obliged to his bounty; and merit, honour and courage always found in him both encouragement and protection; that the presents he made were so considerable, and conferred with that greatness of mind, as deserved the name of magnificences; and that proportioning his gifts to his own generosity, he often exceeded the expectations of the suitors (35).

(xx) The inscription is drawn up in a becoming plainness and dignity of stile; but her Majesty was very ill used as to the rest, especially in the figure of the Admiral, who, besides an intolerable nonchalance in the limbs, is represented with a full bottom periwig on his head, and his body in armour, an absurdity which is handsomely animadverted on by the Spectator, No. 26.

(yy) Burchet, Oldmixon, and the London Gazette.

(35) Secret Memoirs, p. 4, 126, 137.

S L O A N E [Sir HANS], Bart. an eminent Physician and Naturalist, and founder of the British Museum, was of Scottish extraction; his father, Alexander Sloane, being at the head of that colony of Scots which King James the First settled in the north of Ireland, where our author was born, at Killileagh*, April 16, 1660 (a). He discovered a strong inclination for the study of Natural History even in his infancy (b); which being encouraged by a suitable education, he applied those hours, which youth is apt to squander in trifling amusements, to the study of Nature and admiration of her works. At the age of sixteen he was seized with a spitting of blood, which interrupted the regular course of his studies, and confined him to his chamber for three years. He had already learned enough of Physic to know that such a malady was not to be suddenly cured; and his prudence directed him to abstain from wine and other liquors that were likely to increase the disorder. By this severe regimen, which he constantly observed, in some measure ever after, he was enabled to prolong his life beyond the ordinary bounds prescribed for the age of Man; being himself an example of the truth of his favourite maxim, that sobriety, temperance, and moderation, are the best preservatives, and the most powerful that Nature has vouchsafed to mankind (c). He had hardly recovered this first attack, when his desire of perfecting himself in the several branches of Physic, which he had chosen for his profession, led him to London; where he might receive those helps, that he could not hope to obtain in his own country. With this view, presently after his arrival in that metropolis, he entered himself as a pupil to the great Stafforth, an excellent Chymist, bred under the illustrious Stahl; and by his instructions he gained a perfect knowledge of the composition and preparation of the different medicines of that kind, which he was to make use of in the course of his future practice. At the same time, he studied Botany at the famous garden at Chelsey (d). He likewise assiduously attended the public lectures of Anatomy and Physic in London; and, in short, neglected nothing which

(a) Eloge de M. Sloan, in the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, for 1753.

(b) See his Last Will, and preface to his Natural History of Jamaica, Vol. 1. ed t. 1707, fol.

(c) His Eloge.

(d) The garden had been then lately, viz. in 1673, prepared for this use by the Company of Apothecaries in London. Abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, Vol. VI. at the end

(uu) It is very remarkable, that he called a Council at this day, and lay by, the weather being hoary, and yet sailed at night. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year.

(vv) Dr Butler preached his funeral sermon, which was afterwards printed in 4to.

* In the county of Down, of which his father was collector of the taxes both before and after the Irish rebellion, and after the Restoration was a Commissioner of Arroy. He died in 1666, at Killileagh. Baronetage of England, Vol. IV. under the article Hans Sloane.

had the least relation to his profession. But his most distinguished merit was that of a Naturalist; and it was this part of his character that introduced him early into the acquaintance of two, the most eminent persons in that way of the age, Mr Boyle and Mr Raye, and he was very careful to improve their friendship, by communicating to them every striking object of curiosity or use that fell under his observation. His intimacy with these two great men continued 'till their death; and his observations often excited their wonder, and obtained their applause (e). After four years severe study at London, Mr Sloane resolved to visit foreign countries for further improvement. In that view, he set out for France, in company of two other students [A]. Having crossed the water to Dieppe, they set out for Paris. In the way, they were elegantly entertained by the famous Mr Lemery [B], the father; and, in return, Mr Sloane obliged that eminent Chymist

(e) Letters between Mr Raye and his Correspondents.

[A] He set out with two others.] One of these companions was Mr (afterwards Sir) Tancred Robinson, M. D. and Physician in ordinary to King George I. whose life for some time run on in a parallel course to that of our author. While he was at Montpellier, he wrote a letter to Dr Martin Lister, dated August 4, 1683, concerning the fabric of the remarkable bridge, called Pont de S. Esprit, on the Rhine, which was read to the Royal Society, November 7. and afterwards printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 160, for June 1684; after his return, he was proposed a candidate, Nov. 12, 1684, and elected a member of the Royal Society on the 19th (1). In March 1685, he communicated to the Society, several Observations on some boiling Fountains at Peroufa in Languedoc, and others in the kingdom of Naples, which was also printed in their Transactions (2). He was intimately acquainted with Mr. Raye, with whom he kept a correspondence by letter (3). On the 25th of March, 1685, was one of the committee appointed to consider about engraving a new set of prints of birds and fishes, in the books of Mr Raye, and Willoughby, which were very ill done (4). The same year, on St Andrew's day, when the annual election is made of their officers, Dr Tancred Robinson, was chosen Secretary to the Royal Society, and elected into the Council (5). His continuance in the first post, happened by reason of some disturbances among themselves to be short (6); but he held his seat in the council several years, and communicated several useful papers to them. He became one of the Fellows of the college of Physicians, and practised in his profession with great applause in London; being at length knighted by King George I. who made him one of his Physicians in ordinary, as abovementioned (7).

[B] He gave four phosphi to Mr Lemery, &c.] That the reader may form a better judgment of our author's merit, at these early years; it will be necessary to give some account of Mr Lemery, as follows. This celebrated Chymist was born Nov. 17, 1645, at Rouen in Normandy, of which parliament his father was a Proctor, and of the reformed religion. His son, whose name was Nicholas, having received a suitable education in the place of his birth, was put apprenticethere to an Apothecary, who was a relation. But finding in a short time; that his master knew little of Chymistry, he left him, in 1666, and went to improve himself in that art at Paris, where he applied to Mr Glazer, then Demonstrator of Chymistry in the royal gardens. This however did not answer his purpose. Mr Glazer was one of those professors who are full of obscure ideas, and was also far from being communicative: Lemery therefore staid with him only two months; and then leaving him, resolved to travel through France, in quest of some better masters. In this resolution he went to Montpellier, where he continued three years with Mr Vernant, an Apothecary, who gave him an opportunity of performing several chymical operations, and of reading lectures also to some of his scholars. These lectures were very useful to him, and he made such advances in Chymistry, that in a little time he drew all the professors of physic, as well as other curious persons at Montpellier, to hear him; having always some new discoveries to instruct and entertain the most able among them. This raised his reputation so high, that he practised physic in that university without a Doctor's degree. In 1672, having made the tour of France, he returned to Paris, where he commenced an acquaintance with Mr Martyn, Apothecary to Monsieur the Prince, and making use of the laboratory which this Apothecary had in the Hôtel de Condé, he performed several courses of Chymistry, which brought him into the knowledge and esteem of the Prince. At length he provided himself with a laboratory of his own; and might have been made a Doctor of physic, but he chose to be an Apothecary, by reason of his attachment to Chymistry, in which he presently opened public lectures, and had so great an affluence of scholars (8) that he had scarce room to perform his operations. Chymistry had been, 'till this time, a science in which there was little truth, and that so buried under a multitude of falsities, as to be utterly undiscernable. Mr Lemery was the first that dissipated these affected obscurities, reduced the science to clear and simple ideas, abolished the senseless jargon of barbarous terms, and promised nothing which he did not actually perform. At the same time he found out some chymical secrets, which he sold to good profit (9). But in 1681, his life began to be disturbed on account of his religion, and he received orders to quit his employ. At this time the Elector of Brandenburg, by Mr Spanheim his Envoy in France, made him a proposal to go to Berlin, with a promise of erecting a Professorship in Chymistry for him there; but the trouble of transporting his family to such a distance, added to the hopes of some distinction that would be obtained in his favour, hindered him from accepting that offer, and he was indulged to read some courses after the time limited by the order was expired. But at length this not being suffered, he crossed the sea to England in 1683, where he was well received by King Charles II. who gave him great encouragement (10). Yet as the face of the public affairs there appeared not more promising of quiet than in France, he resolved to return thither, tho' without being able to determine what course he should then take. In these difficulties, imagining that the quality of a Doctor of physic might perhaps procure him some tranquillity; he took that degree at Caen about the end of the year; and repairing to Paris, had a great deal of business for a while, but did not find that tranquillity which he desired; on the contrary, the state of the reformed religion grew daily worse; and at last the edict of Nantz being revoked in 1685, he was forbid to practise his profession, as well as other Protestants. However, he read two courses of Chymistry afterwards, under some powerful protections; one course being for the two younger brothers of the Marquis de Ségnelar, Secretary of State, and the other for my Lord Salisbury. At length he sunk under the persecution, and entered into the Romish Church, in the beginning of the year 1686. This change procured him a full right to practise physic, but he was obliged to have the King's letters for holding his courses of Chymistry, and for the sale of his medicines, as he was not now an Apothecary: However, these letters were easily obtained, and what with his pupils, his patients, and the sale of his chemical secrets, he made considerable gains. Upon the revival of the Royal Academy of Sciences, in 1699, he was made Associate-Chymist; and at the end of the year became a Pensionary, by the death of M. Bourdelin. In 1707, he began to feel the infirmities of age, and had some attacks of an apoplexy, which were succeeded by some degree of an hemiplegia, but not so severe as to hinder him from going abroad, so that he attended the academy for a considerable time; but at length was obliged to discontinue his attendance; and being confined to his house, he resigned his Pensionary's place. He was struck with the last stroke of the apoplexy in 1715; which after seven days put a period to his life, on the 19th of June that year, at the age of seventy (11). We have the following books published by him. (1) A Course of Chymistry. (2) An universal Pharmacopœia. (3) An universal Treatise of Drugs. (4) A Treatise of Antimony, containing the chemical analysis of that mineral.

(8) Among other auditors, were Rohault, Bernier, Auzout, Regis, Tournefort, &c. all persons well known in the learned world. Dict. Portatif. by M. L'Advocat, second edit. Paris, 1735, under Lemery's article.

(9) Among others, he discovered a pleasant emetic, which worked more surely than the ordinary ones in use, as also a mesenteric opiat, with which he pretended to perform surprizing cures. He was also the only person who knew at this time how to make the blank d'Espagne, of which he made a great deal of money. Moreri, and L'Advocat.

(10) No doubt Sir Hans Sloane saw him at this time, and perhaps it was then too that he shewed him the phosphori mentioned above. It is certain the writer of the Eloge is far from being correct, especially in dates.

(11) Nicéron Mémoires les Hommes Illust. Tom. IV. p. 212 to 220. and Histoire de l'Académie des Sciences, for 1715.

[C] He

(1) Birch's Hist. of the Royal Society, Vol. IV.

(2) In No. 169.

(3) See Letters between Mr Raye and his Correspondents.

(4) Birch's Hist. as before.

(5) Ibid.

(6) See the article of W. Molyneux, remark [H].

(7) Annals of King George I.

Chymist with a specimen of the four different kinds of phosporus; of which, upon the credit of other writers, Mr Lemery had treated in his book, but had never seen any of them before. At Paris, Mr Sloane lived as he had done in London; he attended the hospitals, heard the lectures of Messieurs Tournefort [C], Du Verney [D], and other eminent masters; visited the learned of every faculty, who received him with particular marks

[C] He heard the lectures of Mr Tournefort.] With this celebrated French Botanist, Sir Hans had some connections, which are greatly to his honour, as will be seen by the following narrative. Joseph Pitton de Tournefort, was descended of a noble family (12), born at Aix, in Provence, on the 5th of June, 1656. Like Sir Hans, he discovered in his infancy an extraordinary passion for the knowledge of plants, and often truanted from the Jesuits college at Aix, where he was put to learn Latin, in order to go a simpling in the fields; so that he soon knew all the plants about that place. However, his parents designing him for the Church, put him to study divinity, and placed him in a seminary. But the destination of nature prevailed (13), and by the death of his father, which happened in 1677, becoming his own master, he quitted Divinity, and applied himself entirely to the study of Botany, Natural History, and Medicine. In this disposition, he run over the mountains of Dauphiné and Savoy, in search of the most curious plants; with these it was that he laid the foundation of his Herbal in 1678, and the following year he went to Montpellier for further improvement in Botany and Physic. Besides the excellent physic garden there, he went all about the country as far as the distance of ten leagues, often bringing back such plants as were unknown at Montpellier. From which university, he passed, in April 1681, to Barcelona, and ran over the mountains of Catalonia, and the Pyrenees; whither he was followed by the Physicians of the country, as well as young students, to whom he read lectures upon plants. This was a dangerous tour; he was often robbed by the Spanish miquelets, and had some very lucky escapes (14); to which purpose he used to hide his ryals in his bread, which being very black and hard, was left untouched, through contempt, by the rogues, who searched him very narrowly. In these wanderings he had once also a very narrow escape of losing his life. In a village of Perpignan, the house where he lay fell so suddenly, that he was buried in the ruins, and lay there two hours before he could be got out, and then much hurt. He returned to Montpellier before the end of the year; and making a visit to his own house at Aix, he placed in his Herbal all the plants he had collected in Provence, Languedoc, Dauphiné, the Alps, and the Pyrenees. In 1683, Madame de Venelle, sub-governante to the children of France, engaged him to go to Paris, where she introduced him to Mr Fagon, first physician to the Queen, who procured the place of Professor of Botany in the royal garden of plants, for him. This employ did not hinder him from making new excursions: He went again to Spain, and passed thence to Portugal (15); he also went to Holland, and even to England, where he acquired the esteem and friendship of the greatest Botanists at that time. During the course of these travels, Mr Herman, the celebrated professor of Botany at Leiden, being very aged, offered to resign that chair to him, with a promise of obtaining from the States of Holland a pension for him of 4000 livres; but Mr Tournefort declined it, and returned to France, where he was enrolled a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1691, by Mr Bignon the inspector of that Academy, who knew him only by fame (16). In 1694, he published his Elemens de Botanique, &c. which was printed at the Louvre, in 3 vol. 8vo (17). This piece, containing a new system of Botany, was attacked by Mr Ray (18), to whom Mr Tournefort replied in a Latin dissertation in 1697. The controversy was carried on with great politeness on each side; and the French Botanist in a piece subsequent to the dispute, made Mr Ray some high compliments, even upon his system of plants. In 1697, Mr Tournefort was admitted Doctor of Physic of the faculty at Paris, and the following year he published his Histoire des plantes qui croissent aux environs de Paris, avec leur usage dans la médecine (19). In 1700, by the express command of Lewis XIV. he went into Greece and Asia, where he observed a great number of plants; he designed to have passed into Africa, but the plague being then in Egypt, he returned from Smyrna to France, in 1702. In this voyage he was accompanied by Mr Aubriet, an able Painter, and Mr Gundelscheime, an excellent German Physician (20), who had been sent by him from Paris, to Sir Hans Sloane, to view what he had brought from the West Indies; and Sir Hans sent him back with an account of the whole, together with a present, containing among other things, sixty very extraordinary ferns, of which he had duplicates (21). This was the occasion of Father Plumier's being sent to the West-Indies, as appears by the following passage in Labat. 'An English physician having published a book of the plants in America, in which were plates of more than sixty species of ferns, it was thought for the honour of this nation, [France] to send somebody who should make further discoveries; accordingly Father Plumier was pitched upon for this design (22).' The discoveries which Mr Tournefort had made in his travels in the East, furnished materials for his Corollarium Institutionum reiberbaricæ, which was published in 1703. After his return to Paris, he resumed the practice of physic, and followed it as much as his other employments would permit; but his business at the royal garden, together with that of the royal college, where he held the physic Professor's chair, added to the necessary attendance in the royal academy, took up a great deal of his time. He resolved also to write an account of his last grand voyage. So many employments were too much for his health, of which he was not sufficiently careful. And whilst he was in this bad way, he received a violent blow upon his breast, which he thought would prove fatal to him, as it actually did; and after languishing for some months, he died on the 28th of December 1708. Besides his collection of plants, he had got together a prodigious number of other curiosities of art, as well as nature, as figured stones, rare marcasites, extraordinary petrifications and crystallizations, metals, habiliments, arms, and instruments of war of foreign nations; so that the whole made a superb cabinet, which he bequeathed to the King, for the use of the learned. His books he left to the Abbé Bignon: The two volumes of his travels were printed at the Louvre in 4to, the first before his death, and the second after it, from the manuscript which was found entirely finished. We have also of his writing an answer to two letters written upon the subject of Botany, by Mr Philip Collet (23), besides three memoirs inserted in the History of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris (24).

[D] Du Verney.] This famous Anatomist, whose name was Guichard Joseph du Verney, was born Aug. 15, 1648, at Feurs en Forés, where his father being a Doctor of Physic, followed the business. Having gone thro' the usual classes of grammar learning and philosophy, he studied physic five years at Avignon, where he soon became noted for his skill in anatomy, and read lectures in it with great accuracy and perspicuity. In 1676, he entered into the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris; and applying himself to study the natural history of animals, he had a good share in the history published by Mr Du Hamel in Latin. He was chosen to instruct in Anatomy that Dauphin, who was grandfather to the present Monarch, Lewis XV. And in 1679, was appointed anatomy professor to the royal garden; when he travelled into Low Brittany, to make dissections of fishes, and the following year he was sent to the coast of Bayonne on the same business. On his return to Paris, he had a prodigious concourse of pupils to attend his lectures *. When he began to decline thro' age, he petitioned to be a Veteran, and his place was filled by Mr Petit, M. D. He died Sept. 10, 1730, aged 82 years. He never published any more than one piece, intitled, Traité de l'organe de l'Ouïe; A Treatise of the Organ of Hearing; which was enough for his fame: and immediately after it's first appearance in French, was translated into Latin, and printed at Nuremberg. He held a correspondence with several eminent foreign anatomists, by whom he was much esteemed. By his last will, he bequeathed all his anatomical preparations to the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris (25).

(20) He was afterwards Physician to the King of Prussia.

(21) Sloane's Natural History of Jamaica, &c. Vol. II. in the introduction, p. 16, 17.

(22) Tom. IV. p. 24. in his Journal for the year 1697. Sloane's History of Jamaica, Vol. II. in the introduction, p. 16, 17.

(23) It is inserted in the Journal des Sçavans, for 27 of May, 1697, under the name of M. Chomel.

(24) Niceron, Tom. IV. p. 354 to 371. and Tom. X. p. 154, 155. and Hist. de l'Acad. des Sciences, for the year 1708.

* One year, besides natives, there was reckoned 140 foreigners.

(25) Hist. de l'Academie Royale, de l'an. 1730.

(12) His father was Eroyer Seigneur de Tournefort, & d'Aimare de Fagoue.

(13) He was encouraged in it by the example of his paternal uncle, who was an able Physician in great esteem.

(14) For instance, these robbers once being moved with his tears, restored his coat, where there was some money tied up in a handkerchief; which having slipped within the lining, was saved, as one may say, out of the fire.

(15) In Andalusia, which is a country that abounds with palm trees, he tried to verify the common story, concerning the love between the male and female tree, but could find no certainty in it.

(16) Mr Homberg was entered a member at the same time; that celebrated Chymist was then First Physician to Philip grandson of France, and Duke of Orleans.

(17) Elements of Botany, &c. He published a Latin translation of it, intitled, Institutiones Rei Herbaricæ, in 1700, in 3 vols, 4to.

(18) See his article.

(19) I. e. The History of the Plants which grow in the Neighbourhood of Paris, together with their medicinal use. It was translated by Dr Martyn, and published in 1732, 2 vols, 8vo.

marks of esteem; and employed himself wholly in improving his studies. From Paris he went to Montpellier, and having letters of recommendation from Mr Tournefort to Mr Chirac (f), then Chancellor and Professor of that University; he found an easy access, through his means, to all the learned men of the province; particularly to Mr Magnol; whom he always accompanied in his Botanical excursions about the neighbourhood of that famous city, where he beheld, with pleasure and admiration, the spontaneous productions of nature in that happy climate; and he learned, under the instructions of Mr Magnol (g), to class them in their proper order. Here, having found an ample field for contemplation entirely suited to his taste, he took leave of his two companions, whom a curiosity of a different kind led into Italy, and spent a whole year in collecting plants (b). At the end of which, he travelled through Languedoc, with the same view, and passing through Tholouse and Bourdeaux, returned to Paris, where he made a short stay, and set out for England, in the latter end of the year 1684, with an intent to settle and follow his profession. Upon his arrival at London, he made it his first business to visit his two illustrious friends, Mr Raye and Mr Boyle, in order to communicate to them the discoveries he had made in his travels. Mr Boyle he found at home, but Mr Raye was retired into Essex; to which retirement, however, he transmitted a great variety of plants and seeds, which Mr Raye has described, in his Historia Plantarum, with proper acknowledgments. He continued his correspondence with Mr Raye, as has been already said,—till that gentleman's death [E], which happened in 1705-6. About this time our author became acquainted with the celebrated Dr Sydenham, who soon contracted so warm affection for him, that he took him into his house, and recommended him in the most earnest manner to his patients (i). He had not been long in London, before he was proposed, by Dr Martin Lister, for a candidate, to be admitted a member of the Royal Society, on the twenty-sixth of November 1684; and being approved was accordingly elected, January the twenty-first following. After which, we find him communicating several curiosities to the Society in 1685 (k). And in July, the same year, he was a candidate for the place of their Assistant-Secretary, but was obliged to give way to the superior interest of his competitor, Dr Halley (l). On the twelfth of April, 1687, the Doctor was chosen a Fellow of the College of Physicians in London [F]. And the same year his friend and fellow-traveller, Dr Tancred Robinson, having mentioned to the Royal Society the plant called Star of the Earth, as a remedy newly discovered for the bite of a mad dog; Dr Sloane acquainted them, that this virtue of the plant was to be found in a book called De Grey's Farriery; and that he knew a man who had cured twenty couple of dogs therewith. This was observed by him the thirteenth of July, this year, 1687 (m); and on the twelfth of September he embarked at Portsmouth (n) for Jamaica, with Christopher, Duke of Albemarle, who had been lately appointed Governor of that island (o): The Doctor attended his Grace in quality of his Physician (p), and they arrived at Jamaica on the nineteenth of December following (q). Here a new field was opened for fresh discoveries in natural productions, the prospect of which probably might be one motive for his undertaking the voyage. The medical world, however, had been deprived of the fruits of it, had not our author, by incredible application, converted, as we may say, his minutes into hours (r). The Duke of Albemarle (f) At a meeting of the Royal Society, May 6, 1685, our author, then a member of that Society, observed to them, that all the cerebrum, and not the cerebellum, of a dog, had been cut out at Montpellier by Mr Chirac, and the cranium filled with earth, and the dog had lived 24 hours; but another dog, by cutting out the cerebellum, presently died. Birch's History of the Royal Society, Vol. 1V.

(g) Dr Sloane, at another meeting, Feb. 9, 1686-7, presented them from the author, Dr Magnol's Botanicum Montspelianse, lately published. Ibid.

(b) He seems to have been created M. D. at Montpellier.

(i) His Eloge, as before.

(k) Birch's History of the Royal Society, Vol. 1V.

(l) See an account of this election in the article of W. Molyneux, Esq; remark [H]. Dr Sloane had nine voices, and Dr Halley 25. Birch.

(m) Birch, ubi supra.

(n) On board the Assistance frigate of 44 guns; but going thence to Plymouth, weighed anchor there October 5. Sloane's Voyage to Jamaica, prefixed to the first volume of his Natural History, &c. p. 1.

(o) See his article, in this Work.

(p) In their passage they called at Madeira, where the doctor was consulted, and, among others, prescribed for one of the nuns in the abbey of Santa Clara, who had a small tumour upon the os pubis. Voyage to Jamaica, as before, p. 13. He also collected some curious plants here. See his Catalogue of Plants, &c.

(q) Sloane's Voyage, &c. as before.

(r) Eloge de M. Sloane.

[E] He kept a correspondence with Mr Raye, 'till the death of that gentleman.] Several of these letters are printed in the collection already referred to (26), and there are others among our author's MSS. deposited in the British Museum. The last from Mr Ray, which was written ten days before his death, closed the correspondence in the following terms.

Dear Sir,

The best of friends: These are to take a final leave of you in this world. I look upon myself as a dying man. God require your kindness expressed any ways towards me, an hundred fold: blefs you with a confluence of all good things in this world, and eternal life and happiness hereafter: Grant us an happy meeting in heaven.

I am, Sir,

eternally your's,

JOHN RAY.

Black-Notley, Jan. 7, 1704 †.

Postscript. When you happen to write to my singular friend Dr Hatton, I pray tell him, I received his most obliging and affectionate letter, for which I return thanks, and acquaint him, that I was not able to answer it, or. — Here his strength failed him, and he was obliged to break off abruptly.

[F] He was chosen fellow of the College of Physicians.] This election happened upon a very extraordinary occasion, the history of which is as follows.

At a meeting of the Society 19^o Octobris 1685^o.

The President, Sir Thomas Witherley, Knt. and one of the King's Physicians, having acquainted them, that of his knowledge a Quo Warranto was to come forth against their charter in the beginning of the next term. It was put to the vote, and carried nem con. that the college should themselves deliver up their charter, &c. into his Majesty's hands; which surrendry was subscribed by all the fellows present, and afterwards by others that were then absent; and an instrument was produced and sealed with the college seal, by the President, in the view of all present.

29^o March 1686^o.

The President acquainted the college, that it was the pleasure of their superiors, that the number of the fellows of the college, should instead of forty, be henceforth sixty, nay eighty.

12^o Aprilis 1687^o.

The Diploma of King James II. was brought to the college, and solemnly accepted by the President and Fellows, and thirty new Fellows were that day admitted; among whom were Dr (afterwards Sir) Hans Sloane, and Dr John Radcliffe (27).

Sir Hans afterwards took an opportunity of testifying his good opinion of Dr Radcliffe's merit. In order to express more emphatically his contempt of such persons as spend the best part of their time in 'niceties of language, and verbal criticisms, he observes, that one of this turn, would once needs persuade him that Dr Radcliffe could not cure a disease, because he had seen a recipe of his, where the word Pilula was spelt with // ||.

(27) From the college register. N. B. The reader is desired hence to supply an omission in Dr Radcliffe's article, where no mention is made of his being a Fellow of this college.

|| Introduction to the second vol. of the Natural History of Jamaica, p. xiv.

[G] Mr

(26) Viz. in note (e) above.

† Mr Raye died Jan. 17, 1704.

died almost as soon as he landed, and the Duchefs his consort determined to return to England, as soon as answers could be received to the letters she had sent to Court on that melancholy occasion. Dr Sloane could not entertain a thought of leaving her Grace in her distress, but whilst the rest of her retinue spent the time in preparing for their departure, he improved it in making his collections of natural curiosities; insomuch that, though his whole stay at Jamaica was scarce fifteen months (s), yet he brought together such a prodigious number of plants, that, at his return to England, Mr Raye was astonished, that one man could procure in one island, in so short a space, so vast a variety (t) [G]. On his arrival at London, he applied himself to the practice of his profession, and soon became so eminent, that he was chosen Physician to Christ's Hospital, on the 17th of October, 1694 (u), on the first vacancy, which he held 'till the year 1730; when, by his great age and infirmities, he found it necessary to resign. What is singular, and deserves the highest commendation, is, that though he received the appointments of his office punctually, because he would not set a precedent that should hinder those who might succeed him, yet he constantly applied the money to the relief of those who were the greatest objects of compassion in that hospital, that it might never be said he enriched himself, by the gains he made of giving health to the poor (w). He had been elected Secretary to the Royal Society, on the 30th of November 1693 (x), and entered upon the business of that office, by reviving the publication of the Philosophical Transactions, which had been omitted for some time. He continued to be editor of them 'till the year 1712 (y), and the volumes which were published in this period are monuments of his industry and ingenuity, many of the pieces contained therein being written by himself. In the interim, he published Catalogus Planterum, quæ in Insula Jamaica sponte proveniunt, &c. ceu, Prodromi Historiæ Naturalis pars prima [H]; which he dedicated to the Royal Society

(s) He embarked for England in Port Royal harbour, on board the Athlone frigate, March 16, 1688 9.

(t) See remark [U].

(u) From the register of that hospital.

(w) His Eloge.

(x) Communicated by Dr Birch, the present Secretary to that Society.

(y) He resigned the Secretary's place on St Andrew's day, 1712, and was succeeded by Dr Hally. 1b d. N. B. The festival of St Andrew, November 30, is appointed by the Society for the annual election of their officers.

[G] Mr Ray was astonished at the vast variety]

'When I first saw, says that gentleman, the author's stock of dried plants collected in Jamaica, and some of the Caribbee Islands, I was much surpris'd, and even astonish'd at the number of the capillary kind, not thinking there had been so many to be found in both the Indies.' Not Mr Ray only, but all the world here, was affected with the same astonishment; and surely every heart must burn with disdain at the injuries which this astonishment carried some selfish admirers to commit. 'When I returned, says Sir Hans, from Jamaica, I brought with me a collection of dried samples of some very strange plants, which excited the curiosity of people, who loved things of that nature, to see them, and who were welcome; 'till I observed some so very curious as to desire to carry part of them privately home with them, and injure what they left'. This made me upon my guard with them (28).'

[H] Catalogus Plantarum, &c.] To understand the full extent of this catalogue, it will be necessary to give the title at length, as follows: Catalogus Plantarum quæ in Insula Jamaica, sponte proveniunt, vel vulgo coluntur, cum earundem synonymis et locis natalibus: Adjectis aliis quibusdam quæ in Insulis Maderæ, Barbadoes, Neves, & Sancti Christophori nascuntur; ceu Prodromi Historiæ naturalis Jamaicae pars prima. We shall be able to form some judgment of the true merit of this piece, from the following account, with remarks upon it, communicated to the Royal Society, by Mr. Ray.

The author of this catalogue, says that gentleman, doth not present the reader with titles of plants collected out of other men's writings, or of which he had only seen dried specimens, but of such as himself saw growing in their native places: Among which, there are a great multitude of new and non-descript species, in one genus alone, viz those called capillaries no less than sixty; besides those lately published by Fa. Plumier, in his first volume of the description of American plants, which our author had observed and described long before that book came out †: and these not small and contemptible ones, such as are hardly distinguishable from plants of that kind already described, but of eminent stature and beauty; and some of them of so strange and exotic a form, that if delineated, they could not but invite and greatly entertain the spectator's eye. For first, he would be entirely delighted to see an arboreseent fern of a single woody stem, streight and undivided, bearing leaves only at the top, like a palm tree. Secondly, capillaries of all kinds, creeping on trees, or rocks on the ground, with wires, after the manner of Strawberries; or thirdly, capillaries, the top of whose leaves turning downwards, and touching the earth, take root, and put forth a new plant, so propagating their kind: or, fourthly, capillaries putting forth from the middle stem of their leaves, two shoots, each bearing a spike of flowers and seeds.

Secondly, the author in this catalogue, hath done great service at least to the inferior rank of Herbarists, in reducing and cutting short the number of species, which were unnecessarily multiplied. For observing that those who have published accounts or descriptions of America, for want of sufficient skill in Botany, and not being versed in describing plants, have given us such lame, imperfect, and obscure descriptions of such as they took notice of, and of the same tree or herb, many times under different names, that the compilers of general histories of plants, meeting with these descriptions, and having no other knowledge of such plants, than what they derived from them, have repeated one and the same species (found in far distant countries, by various observers, and differently described) once, twice, and thrice (nay some great authors sometimes even nine times) over, for different kinds. Now the number of plants being in nature so vast, 'tis pity to add to it more than there are in nature, making two or three of one, thereby both deterring and confounding the learner. To clear up these difficulties, and to reduce all to their proper kinds, no man can be well qualified, but he that hath a comprehensive knowledge of such plants as grow wild, or are commonly cultivated in gardens, here in Europe, and hath seen the non-descript Americans, or such as are here also known, growing in their natural places; and hath read, considered, and compared, what hath been written of them, either by such who have lived some time in those countries, and and published descriptions or natural histories of them, or by such as have made voyages thither, and given relations and accounts of their travels, and what they observed during their short stay there: All which qualifications concur in our author.

Thirdly, this work is of great use to those that are delighted in reading the relations and accounts of navigators and travellers to and in these parts, to inform them concerning the names of American and Indian plants; they will therein meet with, to what plants they belong, and where they may find exact descriptions, or characteristic notes of them; the author having with infinite pains and patience, read most part of the books of voyages and travels extant, referred to plants he met with therein, named or referred to their proper genera, or places under which they are ranked, and by which they are denominated and characterized by the most skilful and learned harbarists of the present, or immediately precedent age.

Fourthly; the author in this work hath cleared up and resolved many doubts and difficulties, and informed us of what plants are signified by many names, frequent in the mouths and writings of our own countrymen; of which before we were either ignorant, or in some doubt *.

Besides we are assured by this work, that there are some plants common to England and Jamaica; but the greatest

* Of this he gives instances in the dumb cane, logwood, the dilldoe-tree, the toddy tree, the prickly pear, the four-top, bonavists, and many others.

• Philosophical Transactions, No. 221. for June, July, and August, 1696.

(28) Natural Hist. of Jamaica, Vol. II. in the introduction, p. 16, 17.

† This Fern, who long since Botany has chief study, was sent by order of the French King, who gave him a pension, three voyages to the Antilles, and set out on a fourth, to examine the tree which bears the quinquina, or Jesuit's bark, but died in his passage at Port St. Mary near Cayenne, in 1706. Besides the piece here mentioned, he published another of the American ferns in 1703, in Latin and French, as also a third, intitled, L'Art de Tourner. After his death were found among his papers materials sufficient for six volumes, which were to be printed with his life prefixed, Marten.

(z) His Eloge. See also Dr Garth's article, remark [A].

(a a) Sir Hans's Last Will.

(b b) His Eloge.

(c c) In the preface he gives several excuses for this delay, one of which is, the trouble and time spent in ranging and cataloguing the dried specimens of plants collected by Mr Pettiver, which he says was the largest of any at that time, but greatly damaged for want of due care in preserving them.

(d d) His Eloge.

(e e) Baronnetage of England, as before.

* His Eloge.

(f f) Ibid.

(g g) He was chosen in the room of Dr Dawes, who resigned. From the college register.

(h h) In the room of Dr John Bate-man, who resigned. Ibid.

Society and College of Physicians. About the same time, he laid the plan of a Dispensatory, where the poor might be furnished, at prime cost, with such medicines as their several maladies should require; which he afterwards, with the assistance of the President and other members of the College of Physicians, carried into execution (z). Our author's thirst for natural knowledge seems to have been born with him, so that his cabinet of rarities may be said to have commenced with his being. He was continually enriching and enlarging it, and the fame, which in a course of years it had acquired, brought every thing that was curious in art or nature to be first offered to him for purchase. But these acquisitions increased it but slowly, in comparison of the augmentation it received in 1701, by the death of William Courten, Esq; a gentleman who had employed all his time, and the greatest part of his fortune, in collecting rarities, and who bequeathed his whole collection to Dr Sloane, on condition that he should pay certain legacies and debts with which he had charged it (a a). Our author accepted the condition, and performed the Will of the donor punctually; on which account there are some who do not scruple to say, he purchased Mr Courten's curiosities at a dear rate (b b). In 1707, the first volume of his Natural History of Jamaica appeared in folio, though the publication of the second volume was delayed 'till 1725 (c c). By this very useful as well as magnificent work, the Materia Medica was enriched with a great number of excellent drugs, not known before [I]. In 1708, the Doctor was elected a foreign member of the Royal Academy at Paris, in the room of Mr Tschirnaus [K], an honour of so much the more estimation, as we were then at war with France, and the Queen's express consent was necessary to his acceptance of it. In proportion as his credit rose among the learned, his practice increased with persons of condition: Queen Anne frequently consulted him, and in her last illness was bled by him (d d). On the advancement of King George I. to the throne, that Prince, on the third of April 1716 (e e), created the doctor a Baronet, an hereditary title of honour, to which no English Physician had ever arrived before*; and at the same time made him Physician-general to the army, which he enjoyed 'till 1727, when he was appointed King's Physician in Ordinary to his present Majesty King George the Second, and prescribed for the Royal Family 'till his death. He was particularly favoured by Queen Caroline, who placed the greatest confidence in his prescriptions (f f). In the interim, he had been chosen unanimously one of the Elects of the College of Physicians, June 1, 1716 (g g), and he was elected President of the same college, September 30, 1719 (h h); in which station he continued sixteen years (i i). In which time, he not only gave the highest proofs of his zeal and assiduity, in the discharge of his duty, but also, in 1721, made a present to that society of a hundred greatest part of these common plants, are such as grow in the water, or watery places; there being it seems a greater agreement between the temperature of the water than of the air, in these remotely distant countries †.

(i i) He resigned on the 30th of September, 1735, and was succeeded by Dr Thomas Pellet. Ibid.

† Philos. Transf. No. 221. for the months of June, July, and August, 1696.

[I] The college was enriched, &c.] Dr Freind speaking of the particulars of which the history of physic carried down to the last century should consist, having directed the historian, who shall undertake that work, to observe some modern improvements in medicine and surgery, proceeds thus: 'On the former head, he should describe the famous composition of Fracastorius's Diacordium, and give a detail of the American drugs, which began to be improved among us in this period, and which have so much enriched the materia medica. Monardes, Piso, and Margrave, will furnish him with great supplies in this kind; but the most accurate description of the simples themselves, as well as of the things relating to their virtues in curing distempers, we shall find in that most elaborate work, lately published, for the honour of our country, by Sir Hans Sloane (29).

(29) Freind's History of Physick, Vol. 11. p. 388, 389. 5th edit. 1758.

[K] In the Academy of Paris, he succeeded Mr Tschirnaus.] This extraordinary person being frequently mentioned in the dispute about the mention of the method of fluxions (30), we shall, for the sake of such as are curious in those matters, give a succinct account of him. Enfrei Walter de Tschirnaus, for this was his name, was descended of a noble and ancient family, and was Lord of Kisslingwald and Stolzenberg, in Luface, where he was born on the 10th of April, 1651. His education was suitable to his birth; and after being instructed at home, having held a correspondence with Mr Oldenburg, Secretary to the Royal Society, and the best masters in all the branches of literature, proper for a youth, he was sent by his father, at the age of seventeen, to finish his studies at Leyden, in Holland, where he distinguished himself by his genius for the mathematics, and natural history; but upon the breaking out of the Dutch war in 1672, he entered a volunteer in that army, and served in that quality for the space of eighteen months; when he was recalled home. Not long afterwards, a resolution being taken to compleat his education by travelling abroad; in that design he made the tour of England, Holland, France, Italy, and went as far as Malta; and was at Paris the third time, in 1682, when he opened the discovery of those caustics which go by his name, to the Royal Academy of Sciences; whereupon he was admitted a member of that society. He then made another visit to Holland, and finishing his treatise de medicina mentis & corporis (31), he left the manuscript with some friends there, and it was printed at Amsterdam in 1687, 4to. After his return to Saxony, he turned his thoughts upon improving optics: to that end, he obtained a grant of the Elector of Saxony King of Poland, to set up three glass works; which produced some extraordinary curiosities in dioptrics and natural philosophy, an account of which were inserted in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, for 1699, and 1700. Among others, he made a large burning-glass, which was purchased by the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, during the minority of Lewis XV (32). He also presented another to the Emperor Leopold, who thereupon offered to create him a free Baron, which honour he declined, and only accepted a present of his Imperial Majesty's picture, together with a chain of gold. In 1701, he went the fourth time to Paris, where he gave his attendance at the Academy, and read to them several new methods for improving the sublime geometry, or the geometry of curves, different from that of Mr Leibnitz's infinitesimals. He even produced an example of his new method in the evolution curves, but he never gave any demonstration of it, and it was universally rejected, as having no solid foundation. However, before his departure from Paris, he hinted to Mr Homberg his secret of making Porcelain ware, which has been since brought to so great perfection in his own country, and is at this day well known, and in the highest esteem, by the name of Dresden China. Upon his return home he became very uneasy in his domestic affairs, and continued so 'till his death, which happened on the 11th of October, 1708, occasioned by the gravel and stone. His last words were triumph, victory, apparently declaring death to be the great conqueror of all human evils (33).

(30) See Commercium Epistolicum D. Johannis Collins, &c. Lond. 1722, 8vo.

(31) The chief object of this piece is the criterion of truth, which he makes to consist in clear ideas.

(32) There is a description of this glass in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, for 1709, p. 143. Dutch edition.

(33) Ibid. and Memoirs de Trevoux, for 1710.

[L] He

a hundred pounds *, and remitted a very considerable debt, which the corporation owed him, so far at least as to accept by little, and in such small sums, as was least inconvenient to the circumstances of their affairs (kk). Sir Hans was no less liberal to other learned bodies; he had no sooner purchased the manor of Chelsey, than he gave the Company of Apothecaries the entire freehold of their botanical garden there, in 1721 †, upon condition only that they should present yearly to the Royal Society fifty new plants, 'till the number should amount to two thousand [L]. He gave besides several other considerable donations for the improvement of this garden, the situation of which, on the banks of the Thames, and in the neighbourhood of the capital, was such as to render it useful in a twofold degree; first, by producing the most rare medicinal plants, and secondly, by serving as an excellent school for young Botanists, an advantage which he himself had drawn from it in the early part of his life. The death of Sir Isaac Newton, in 1727, made way for the advancement of Sir Hans to the Presidency of the Royal Society (ll). He had been Vice-President, and frequently sat in the chair for that great man; and, by his long connection with this learned body, he had contracted so great an affection for it, that he made a present to the Society of a hundred guineas, caused a curious bust of King Charles the Second, it's founder, to be set up in the great hall where it met, and, it is said, was very instrumental in procuring Sir Godfrey Copley's benefaction of a medal of five guineas value, which is continued to this day, to be annually given, as an honorary mark of distinction to him, who shall communicate the best experiments to the Society (mm); and being now placed at the head of it, he laid aside the thoughts of all further promotion, and applied himself wholly to the faithful discharge of the respective duties of the places he enjoyed; to answer, like an able Physician, the high opinion which the publick had conceived of him; to improve his mind with useful knowledge, and his cabinet with new curiosities, which he now found much easier to do than formerly, since he had taught feasting people to regard, as an object of commerce, those marine productions, which before they despised as useless and not worth notice. Add to this, the universal correspondence which he held with the learned in every part of the known world, who were fond of transmitting to him whatever they thought rare or curious, as they were sure that such kind of presents would always find from him a favourable acceptance (nn). In these laudable occupations, Sir Hans employed his time from 1727 to 1740; when, at the age of fourscore, he formed a resolution of quitting the service of the publick, and living for himself. With that view, he resigned the Presidency of the Royal Society, much against the inclination of that respectable body, who chose Martin Folkes, Esq; to succeed him, and in a publick assembly thanked him for the great and eminent service he had done them, and begged his permission, that his name might remain enrolled among the members of their Council as long as he should live (oo). In the month of January, 1741, he began to remove his library, and his cabinet of rarities, from his house in Bloomsbury, London, to that at Chelsey; and on the 12th of May following, having settled all his affairs, he retired thither himself, to enjoy in a peaceful tranquillity the remains of a well-spent life. He did not, however, pass into that kind of solitude, which excludes men from society: he received at Chelsey, as he had done at London, the visits of people of distinction; of all learned foreigners; of the Royal Family, who sometimes did him that honour; and, what was still more to his praise, he never refused admittance or advice to rich or poor, who came to consult him concerning their health (pp). Moreover, not content with this contracted manner of doing good, he now, during this retreat, presented to the publick such useful remedies, as the success had warranted during the course of a long continued practice. Among these is an efficacious receipt for distempers in the eyes [M], and his remedy for the bite of a mad dog (qq). Hitherto the great temperance of Sir Hans had preserved him from feeling the infirmities of old age; but in his ninetieth year he began to complain of pains, and to be sensible of an universal decay. He was often heard to say, that the approach of death brought no terrors with it; that he had long expected the [L] He gave the physic garden at Chelsey to the Apothecaries company, &c. This garden was first established by the company in 1673, and having since that time been furnished by them with a great variety of plants, for the improvement of their members in the knowledge of Botany, Sir Hans, in order to encourage and promote an undertaking so serviceable to the public, generously granted to the company the inheritance of the said garden, being part of his estate and manor of Chelsey, on condition that it be for ever kept up and maintained by the company as a physic garden; and as an evidence of it's being so maintained, he directed and obliged the company, in consideration of the said grant, to present yearly to the Royal Society, in one of their weekly meetings, fifty specimens of plants that had grown in the said garden the preceding year, which were all to be specifically distinct from each other, until the number of two thousand plants be completed; which specimens, together with those that are to follow them in subsequent years, shall, by order of the Royal Society be carefully preserved for the satisfaction of such curious persons as may have recourse to them. Accordingly the grant was accepted, and the condition has been faithfully performed by the company ever since (34). And in 1733 they erected, in the center of the garden, a marble statue of him, supported by a pedestal, on which is a Latin inscription, expressing his donation, and the design and advantages of it*. He is represented in full proportion, in a full bottomed peruke, and his Doctor's gown; and the likeness is striking. The whole was performed by Mr Rysbrack, and is admirably well executed.

[M] A receipt for distempers in the eyes.] The recipe is intituled Unguentum Ophthalmicum Sloanii, and is as follows.

R Tutii pp ʒj. Lapid. Hematit. pp ʒij, Aloes pp xii gr. Margarit. pp 4 gr. rub them in a mortar c. q. s. of viper's grease. To be used night and morning.

N. B. All cathartics, especially mercury, is hurtful in this case.

* See the table of benefactors, in the college.

(kk) The sum was 700 l. lent to the college, at 6 l. per cent. but half being paid off, a new bond was taken in 1716, at 5 l. per cent. for 350 l. which being also paid off in a very few years afterwards, Sir Hans on that occasion gave the college a noble treat, which cost him upwards of 40 l. From the college books, and private information.

† The title-deed bears date Feb. 20th that year. Communicated by Mr Denison, the present Cleric of the Company.

(ll) From the register of that Society.

(mm) His Eloge. See also the introduction to his History of Jamaica.

(nn) Ibid.

(oo) From the books of that Society.

(pp) His Eloge.

(qq) It is inserted in the London Dispensatory, under the title of Pulvis antilyssus Sloanii.

(34) Communicated by Mr Miller, the present keeper of the garden. See also the Abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, Vol. VI. Part ii. by Eames and Martyn, at the end. N. B. The number of 2000 will be completed next year, 1761.

* A lecture is read in the garden, upon the medicinal plants, on the last Wednesday in every month during the six summer months. The present lecturer is Dr Wilmore. Communicated by Mr Miller.

[N] His

the stroke, and was prepared to receive it, whenever the great author of his being should think fit. The long expected moment at length arrived; after a short illness of three days he gave up his last breath, January 11, 1752. He was interred on the 18th at Chelsey, in the same vault with his lady (rr), the solemnity being attended with the greatest concourse of people of all ranks and conditions, that had ever been seen before on the like occasion [N]. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr Zachary Pearce, then Bishop of Bangor (ss), who forbore to enlarge upon the exalted qualities of the deceased, by reason of an express prohibition received from his own mouth before his death. Such was his piety, that he thought it a degree of profanation to debase, with the praises of human excellencies, the pulpit, which should be devoted to display to men the greatness of the Supreme Being, and to instruct them in his laws (tt). The writer of his Eloge having observed, that in his person Sir Hans was tall and well proportioned, proceeds to represent his character in the following colours; and tells us, that not only ‘ His manners ‘ were easy, free, and engaging, but that his conversation was sprightly, familiar, and ‘ obliging; that nothing could equal his courtesy to strangers; he was always ready upon
 ‘ the least notice to shew and explain to them his whole cabinet: once a week he kept ‘ open house for gentlemen of all ranks, particularly for his brethren of the Royal Society, ‘ who thought fit to visit him. The sad consequences of his death were severely felt by
 ‘ the poor, to whom he was every way a liberal benefactor. He was a Governor of ‘ almost every hospital in and about London. To each he gave a hundred pounds in his ‘ life-time, and at his death a sum more considerable. That whatever proposal had for ‘ its object the publick good might command his most zealous endeavours to promote it,
 ‘ he did all that he could to forward the establishment of the colony in Georgia of 1732, ‘ Foundling Hospital in 1739, and formed the plan for bringing up the children, which ‘ experience has shewn to be the best that could be devised. If he found duplicates of any ‘ book in his study, his manner was, to send one of the copies to the college of Physi‘ cians, if the book was medical, or to the Bodleian library at Oxford, if it treated on ‘ other subjects. He was the first in England who introduced into general practice the ‘ use of the Bark, not only in fevers, but in a variety of other distempers, particularly in ‘ nervous disorders, in mortifications, and in violent hæmorrhages. He frequently took ‘ it himself for the spitting of blood, to which he was always more or less subject. He ‘ likewise gave a sanction to the practice of inoculation, by inoculating two daughters of ‘ the Royal Family, which did more to establish that salutary discovery, than all the ‘ treatises that ever were written on the subject.’ Whatever censure may be passed upon some particulars, as so far drawn of this character, which the reader will bear in mind is the last finishing of Sir Hans’s Eloge, all the world must agree to the conclusion of it, wherein that writer observes, that he was extremely solicitous, lest his cabinet of rarities, which he had taken so much pains to collect, should be again dissipated at his death; yet was unwilling that so large a proportion of his fortune should be lost to his children, and he was equally grieved that his country should be deprived of the use of so valuable a treasure. He therefore bequeathed it to the publick, on condition that twenty thousand pounds should be made good by Parliament to his family: a sum, which, though large in appearance, was scarce more than the intrinsic value of the gold and silver medals, the ores and precious stones, that were found in it (uu) [O]. There was, besides his library, consisting of more than fifty thousand volumes, three hundred and forty seven of which were illustrated with cuts, finely engraven and coloured from nature, three thousand five hundred and sixty-six manuscripts, and an infinite number of rare and curious books.
 The Parliament accepted the legacy and fulfilled the conditions [P]. It is easy to perceive
 the

(rr) But there is no new monument for him, nor any additional inscription upon that of his lady.

(ss) Now Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster, 1760.

(tt) His Eloge.

(uu) In his Last Will he declares, the first cost of the whole collection amounted at least to 50000 l.

(35) In the first paragraph of his Will, as printed in 1753, 8vo.

[N] His funeral was attended with an extraordinary concourse of people. In his last will he gives the following directions concerning his funeral. ‘ I will, that my body shall be buried in a decent manner in the church-yard at Chelsey, about noon, or at a convenient time of the day: And I will, that there be invited to my funeral all such persons as I shall leave in a list by me signed; or if no such list be left, then such persons as my executors shall know to have been my most intimate friends and acquaintance; and that they shall have rings of twenty shillings value given to each of them (35).’

[O] Not more than the intrinsic value of the gold and silver medals, ores and precious stones in it. The following list of these and his other rarities has been communicated to me.

Medals and coins, ancient and modern	—	22000
Antiquities, viz. ruins, instruments, &c. about	—	1125
Seals, &c.	—	268
Camea’s and intaglio’s, &c. about	—	700
Precious stones, agates, jaspers, &c.	—	542
Crystals, spars, &c.	—	1864
Fossils, flints, and stones, &c.	—	1275
Metals, mineral ores, &c.	—	2725
Earths, sands, salts, &c.	—	1035
Bitumens, sulphurs, ambers, ambergrease, &c.	—	399

Talcs, mica, &c.	—	—	388
Testacea, or shells,	—	—	5834
Corals, Sponges, &c.	—	—	1421
Echini, Echinites, &c.	—	—	659
Asteriæ, Trochi, Entrochi, &c.	—	—	241
Crustacea, or Crabs, &c.	—	—	363
Stellæ marinæ, &c.	—	—	173
Fishes and their parts,	—	—	1555
Birds, and their parts, of different species,	—	—	1172
Vipers, Serpents, &c.	—	—	521
Quadrupeds, &c.	—	—	1886
Insects.	—	—	5439
Humana & Calculi Anatom. prep. &c.	—	—	756
Vegetables, as seeds, gums, wood, roots, &c.	—	—	12506
Hortus ficcus, or volumes of dried plants.	—	—	334
Miscellaneous things natural, &c.	—	—	2098
Pictures and drawings, &c. framed.	—	—	310
Mathematical instruments.	—	—	55

[P] The Parliament purchased it, and fulfilled the conditions. The act for this purpose, which passed in 1753, is intituled, ‘ An act for the purchase of the Musæum or Collection of Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. and of the Harleian collection of MSS. and for procuring one general repository for the better reception and more convenient use of the said collection, and of the Cottonian library, and the advantage that will result to the publick from this immense collection. To have access to such a cabinet as this, is, in effect, to men of taste, like making the tour of the world, and

and additions thereto. In pursuance of this act, the sum of 300,000 l. was raised by a lottery, which abundantly enabled the parliament to compleat their whole design. According to which, besides the required sum of 20,000 l. paid for Sir Hans's collection; the Harleian manuscripts were purchased at the rate of 10,000 l. and the trustees of Sir Hans giving their consent to have his collection removed from his manor house at Chelsey, to any proper place within the cities of London or Westminster (36), that magnificent edifice, called Montague-house (37), in Russel-street, Bloomsbury, was also purchased at the rate of 10,000 l. To this house, not only the two last mentioned collections, but the Cotton library, with all the additions thereto, including that of Arthur Edwards of Hanover-square, London, Esq; bequeathed by his will in 1738 (38), were removed. By the said act, the following great officers of state and bishops, for the time being, are appointed trustees. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord high Chancellor, or Keeper, President of the Council, Privy-seal, Steward, Chamberlain, Lord-Treasurer, or first Commissioner of the Treasury, Lord High Admiral, or first Commissioner of the Admiralty, Bishop of London, the two Secretaries of State, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the two Chief Justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, Master of the Rolls, Attorney and Solicitor General, the Presidents of the Royal Society and College of Physicians, besides two of the trustees for the Cotton library (39), the Duke of Portland and the Earl of Oxford; and upon their decease the Countess of Oxford and Duchefs of Portland, and their heirs: On the account of the Harleian manuscripts, Charles Lord Cadogan, and Hans Stanley, trustees for Sir Hans Sloane's collection, and their heirs after their decease, and some other noblemen and gentlemen who are incorporated by the name of Trustees for the British Musæum; the major part of whom, including the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord High Chancellor, or Keeper, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, are a quorum; and these three, or any two of them, are empowered to make statutes and to chuse officers (40), and appoint their respective salaries; for and towards the payment of which, the sum of 30,000 l. is to be placed out to interest in the public funds; as also for the necessary expences, and repairs, and alterations of the Repository. In pursuance of these powers, the said trustees appointed the following officers, with their respective salaries, viz. Principal Librarian, salary 200 l. per ann. three under Librarians, salary 100 l. each, three Assistants, salary 50 l. each, and a keeper of the reading room, salary 50 l. besides a porter and a messenger, salary 40 l. each; one man, salary 30 l. and four women servants; and the whole collection being placed in proper order, the Musæum was opened for public use in 1759, when several statutes and rules relating to the inspection and use of it, were published by order of the said trustees; the substance of which is as follows.

The Musæum will be kept open every day, (except Saturday, Sunday, Christmas-day, and one week after; one week after Easter-day and Whitsunday; Good-Friday, and every public fast and thanksgiving day) from nine in the morning 'till three in the afternoon; but on Mondays and Fridays in May, June, July, and August, only from four to eight in the afternoon.

Persons desirous to see the Musæum, must, in writing, give in their names, condition, and places of abode, as also the day and hour they desire to be admitted, to the porter, before nine in the morning, or between four and eight in the evening, on some preceding day, which he will enter in a register, to be laid every night before the principal librarian, or, in his absence, before the under librarian officiating for him, and, if he shall judge them proper, he will direct the porter to deliver tickets to them, on their applying a second time for tickets.

No more than ten tickets will be delivered out for each hour of admittance; which tickets being shewn to the porter, he will direct the spectators to a room appointed for their reception, 'till their hour of seeing the Musæum be come; at which time they are to deliver their tickets to the proper officers of the first department. Five of the spectators will be attended by the under librarian, and the other five by the assistant, in each department.

The tickets are for the admission of company at nine, ten, eleven, or twelve, in the morning; and at four or five in the afternoon of those days in which the Musæum is to be open at that time.

If application be made by more than can be accommodated on the day and hour they had named; the persons last applying will have tickets for any other day and hour within seven days.

If not more than five produce tickets for any particular hour, they will be desired to join in one company.

Persons prevented from making use of their tickets are desired to send them back to the porter in time; that others may not be excluded.

That the spectators may view the whole Musæum in a regular order, they will first be admitted to see the manuscripts and medals; then the natural and artificial productions; and afterwards the printed books.

One hour only will be allowed to the several companies, so that the whole may be inspected in three hours. Notice of the expiration of the hour will be given by the ringing of a bell. Each company must keep together in that room, in which the officer who attends them shall then be.

A catalogue of the printed books, manuscripts, and other parts of the collection, with proper references, will be deposited in each department.

If a spectator desires to see any book, or other part of the collection, it will be handed to him by the officer, if he shall think it consistent with safety; and it must be restored to its place before the spectator leaves the room; but no more than one such book, or other part of the collection, will be delivered at a time to the same company. The officer that attends the company, will give them any information they desire, relating to the part of the collection under his care.

The coins and medals, except such as the standing committee shall order, from time to time, to be placed in glass cases, are not to be exposed to view, but by leave of the trustees in a general meeting, or of the standing committee, or of the principal librarian; and will be shewn between the hours of one and three in the afternoon; but no more than two persons will be admitted to see them at the same time, unless by particular leave of the principal librarian; who in such case is required to attend, together with the officer in ordinary, the whole time: and but one thing will be taken or continue out of the cabinets and drawers at a time, which must be done by the officer, who must see it replaced before any person present goes out of the room.

If any person who hath a ticket, come after the hour marked in his ticket, but before the three hours allotted him be expired, he will, if he desire it, be permitted to join the company appointed for the same hour, on his removing into another department.

Any person may apply for a ticket in the manner abovementioned, as often as he pleases, provided that no one person have tickets at the same time for more days than one.

No children will be admitted.

No officer, or servant, must take any fee, reward, or gratuity.

With regard to Persons who desire to make use of the Musæum for study.

No one will be admitted to make use of the Musæum for study, but by leave of the trustees in a general meeting, or of the standing committee; and that for half a year only, without a fresh application. The names of such persons, with the dates of the orders, and their duration, will be entered in a book.

A particular room is allotted in which they may sit, and read, or write, without interruption, during the time the Musæum is kept open; a proper officer constantly attending in the room. They must give notice, in writing, the day before, what book or manuscript they shall desire to peruse the following day; which will be lodged in some convenient place in the said room, and will from thence be delivered by the officer of the said room; excepting, however, some books and manuscripts

(36) The Parliament gave the manor-house at Chelsey, which by the Will was included in the purchase, to Sir Hans's trustees, to be disposed of as part of his other estates. It has been since pulled down, and a row of handsome houses built upon the site.

(37) So called, because built by the Earl of Montague, upon a lease of the site from the Earl of Bedford, who on this occasion sold to the Parliament the perpetuity of the whole premises, except a small corner of the yard adjoining to that of his own house, which he reserved to himself.

(38) He also left 7000 l. after the death of Eliz. Miles, to be laid out in the purchase of books and manuscripts, as a further addition to the Cotton library.

(39) Viz. Sam Burroughs and Tho. Hart, who had been appointed by the heirs male of Sir Rob. Cotton; and, upon their decease, the trust devolved upon France, widow of Francis Hanbury, Esq; heir-general to the said Sir R. Cotton.

(40) They are to present the person they chuse to the King, to be approved or rejected by him.

and having for their tutor a catalogue of thirty-eight volumes in folio and eight in quarto, containing a short description of each curiosity, with a reference to the authors that treat of it more at large. Sir Hans Sloane married, in 1695, Elizabeth, daughter of Alderman Langley of London, who died in 1724, after she had brought him one son, who died young, and three daughters, the youngest of which died also in her infancy. Sarah, the eldest, married George Stanley, Esq; of Poultons in the county of Hants; and Elizabeth, the second, married the Right Honourable the Lord Cadogan, Colonel of the second troop of Horse-Guards, and Governor of Tilbury-Fort and Gravesend.

manuscripts of great value, or very liable to be damaged, and on that account judged by the trustees not fit to be removed out of the library to which they belong, without particular leave of the trustees; a catalogue whereof is kept by the officer of the reading room.

Such persons will be allowed to take one or more extracts from any printed book or manuscript; and either of the officers of the department may do it for them, upon such terms as shall be agreed on between them. The transcriber must not lay the paper, on which he writes, upon any part of the book, or manuscript, he is using.

No whole manuscript, nor the greater part of any, must be transcribed, without leave from the trustees.

Every person intrusted with the use of any book, or manuscript, must return it before he leaves the room.

Any person engaged in a work of learning, who shall have occasion to make a drawing of any of the natural or artificial productions, or to examine it more carefully than can be done in the common way of viewing the Musæum, must apply to the trustees for particular leave for that purpose.

On any person having occasion to consult or inspect any book, charter, deed, or other manuscript, for evidence or information, other than for studying, must apply for leave to the trustees. But if the case should require such dispatch as that time cannot be allowed for such application, the principal librarian, or the under librarian officiating for him, may grant such leave.

No part of the collections belonging to the Musæum must at any time be carried out of the general repository; except books, charters, deeds, or other manuscripts, to be made use of in evidence: And these must be carried by the under librarian or assistant of the department to which they belong, or by such other of the under librarians or assistants, as the trustees shall appoint; and he must attend the whole time, and bring it back with him; for which extraordinary trouble and attendance it is expected that a proper satisfaction be made him.

If any person shall behave in an improper manner, and contrary to the rules prescribed by the trustees, and shall continue such misbehaviour, after having been admonished by one of the officers, such person will be obliged forthwith to withdraw from the Musæum; and his name is to be entered in a book kept by the porter; who is ordered not to deliver a ticket to him for his admission for the future, without a special direction from the trustees in a general meeting. P

SMALRIDGE [GEORGE], a polite Scholar, a learned Divine, and a pious and devout Prelate, was born in the year 1663, at Litchfield in Staffordshire (a), where his father, Thomas Smalridge, followed the business of a Dyer with distinguished reputation (b); but his fortune not being sufficient to give his son that education, which his promising parts deserved, these found a patron in Elias Ashmole, Esq; his fellow-citizen, by whose direction the young genius was sent to Westminster-school [A]; where being chosen into the college, he presently became the delight and admiration of his school-fellows, by the sweetness of his temper, and the delicate turn of his exercises. At the age of seventeen, he repaid the kindness of his benefactor, in two elegant elegies upon the death of his friend William Lilly, the famous Astrologer [B]. On the 17th of May the following

(a) Inscription on his monument, where 'tis said, that he died in 1719, in the 57th year of his age.

(b) From private information.

[A] By whose direction he was sent to Westminster-school.] For this we have the same authority as for the foregoing particular, and it is countenanced, or we might say confirmed, by Mr Ashmole's Diary of his own life, where nothing is set down but such things as he had some especial concern in. There we find p. 66, the following independent article, 'May 17, [1682] George Smalridge was elected out of Westminster-School to go to Christ-Church in Oxford.' And if such a circumstance could stand in need of any further proof, the reader will find it in the motive for Mr Smalridge's writing verses upon the death of William Lilly the Astrologer, for whom it is well known Mr Ashmole had a particular friendship (1).

[B] He wrote two elegies upon the death of Lilly.] As these are the first fruits of our author's poetical talents in print, we should not do justice to his memoir if they were omitted.

In mortem Viri doctissimi Gulielmi Lilly Astrologi nuper defuncti.

Occidit atque suis annalibus addidit atram
Astrologus, qua non tristior ulla, diem.
Pone triumphales, lugubris Luna, quadrigas,
Sol mœstum picea nube reconde caput.
Nlum qui Phœbi scripsit, Phœbesque labores
Eclipsi docuit stella maligni pati.
Invidia astrorum cecidit qui sidera rexit;
Tanta erat in notas scandere cura domos.
Quod vidit, visum cupiit, potiturque cupito
Cœlo, et siderea fulget in orbe decus:

Scilicet hoc nobis prædixit ab aëre cometa;
Et fati emicuit nuncia stella tui.
Pallentem vidi faciem, gemuique videndo;
Illa fuit vati mortis imago sui.
Civiles timuere alii primordia belli,
Jejunam metuit plebs stupefacta famem.
Non tantos tulerat bellumve fameve dolores,
Auspiciis essent hæc relevanda tuis.
Incautum subito plebem nunc opprimit ensis,
Securos fati mors violenta trahit.
Nemo est qui videat moneatque avertere fatum;
Ars jacet, in Domini funera, merfa, sui.
Solus naturæ arcana reservare solebat,
Solut et ambigui solvere jura poli.
Lustrasti errantes bene fida mente planetas;
Conspectum latuit stellaque nulla tuum.
Desectos oculos pensarunt lumina mentis;
Tiresias oculis, mente sed Argus eras.
Cernere Tiresie poteras ventura, sed Arge
In fatum non poteras fat vigilâsse tuum.
Sed vigeat nomen, semper cum sole vigebit:
Immemor Astrologi non erit ulla dies.
Sæc'la canent laudes, quas si percurrere tentes,
Arte opus est, stellas qua numerare solet.
Hæreat hoc carmen cinerum custodibus urnis.
Hospes quod, spargens marmora rora, legat.

following year, 1682, he was elected from the school to a student's place at Christ-Church-college in Oxford (c); where having taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts at the regular time (d), he became a tutor (e), and was the next year pitched upon, though so young, as very capable of taking a part, together with his fellow-collegians, Dr Aldrich and Mr Atterbury, in the Popish controversy against Obadiah Walker, Master of University-college [C]. In this engagement, he published, in 1687, Animadversions on the

(c) See the article of Arthur Maynwaring, Esq;

eight

(e) See below, in remark [d].
(d) Viz. June 15, 1686. Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 228.

' Hic situs est dignum nunquam cecidisse Propheta.
' Fatorum interpres fata inopina subit.
' Versari æthereo dum vixit in orbe solebat;
' Nunc humilem jactat terra superba virum.
' Sed cælum metitur adhuc refupinus in urna,
' Vertitur in solitos palpebra clausa polos.
' Huic busto invigilent solenni lampade musæ.
' Perpetuo nubes imbre sepulchra rigant.
' Ille oculis movit distantia sidera nostris,
' Illum amotum oculis traxit ad astra Deus.'

Which long expected was, and might have still Expected been, had not our nation's ill
Drawn from the heavens a sympathetic tear.
England has cause a second drought to fear.
We have no second Lilly who may die,
And by his death may make the heavens cry.
Then let your annals, Coley, want this day,
Think ev'ry year Leap-year, or if't must stay,
Cloath it in black, let a sad note stand by,
And stigmatize it to posterity (2).

(2) Both copies are printed in Lilly's Life.

To this he likewise added the following elegy in English, on the same occasion.

Our Prophet's gone, no longer may our ears
Be charm'd with music of th' harmonious spheres:
Let sun and moon withdraw, leave gloomy night,
To shew their Nuncio's fate, who gave more light
To th' erring world than all the feeble rays
Of sun or moon; taught us to know those days
Bright Titan makes; follow'd the hasty sun
Through all his circuits; knew th' inconstant moon,
And more inconstant ebbings of the flood,
And what is most unconstant, th' factious brood,
Flowing in civil broils. By th' heav'ns could date
The flux and reflux of our dubious state.
He saw th' eclipse of sun, and change o'th' moon,
He saw, but seeing, could not shun his own.
Eclips'd he was that he might shine more bright,
And only chang'd to give a fuller light.
He having view'd the sky and glorious train
Of gilded stars, scorn'd longer to remain
In earthly prisons: Could he a village love,
Whom the twelve houses waited for above?
The grateful stars a heavenly mansion gave
This heav'nly soul. Nor could he live a slave
To mortal passions, whose immortal mind,
Whilst here on earth, was not to earth confin'd;
He must be gone, the stars had so decreed,
As he of them, so they of him had need.
This message 'twas the blazing comet brought,
I saw the palefac'd star, and seeing thought
(For we could guess, but only Lilly knew)
It did some glorious hero's fate foreshew;
A hero's fallen whose death, more than a war
Or fire, deserv'd a comet; th' obsequious star
Could do no less, than his sad fate unfold,
Who had their risings or their settings told.
Some thought a plague, and some a famine near,
Some wars from France, some fires at home were fear'd.
Nor did they fear too much, scarce kinder fate,
But plague of plagues besel th' unhappy state,
When Lilly died. Now swords may safely come
From France or Rome, Fanatics plot at home.
Now an unseen and unsuspected hand,
By guidance of ill stars may hurt our land,
Unsafe because secure. There's none to shew
How England may avert the fatal blow.
He's dead, whose death the weeping clouds deplore,
I wish we did not owe to him that shower

[C] He took a share in the Popish controversy.] Mr Wood, speaking of the publication of Church Government, P.V. observes, that the zealous men of the Church of England, then in the University, perceiving that Mr Walker would cut their own throats at home (as they said) were resolved to answer whatever he published (3). In pursuance of this resolution, extraordinary diligence was used by Dr Aldrich (4) and Mr afterwards Dr Atterbury, in executing that design, and in the same spirit Church Government, Part V. coming out, in May 1687, Mr Smalridge published his Animadversions upon it, in June following; in the introduction to which, having mentioned the Answer of Dr Aldrich, he gives the following reasons for his own undertaking this task. 'I should not, says he, have thought myself obliged to answer the extravagant singularities of a private fancy, such especially as are not likely to do any mischief to the public, and such I esteem the notions of this pamphlet, which is too perplexed for a common reader's understanding, and too sophistical to impose upon the more intelligent. But considering the false and scandalous reports that are of late so industriously spread about the nation, as if Oxford converts came in by whole shoals, and all the University were just ready to declare [in favour of Popery]. I have just reason to believe that this pamphlet was designedly printed at Oxford to countenance those reports, for no doubt the Popish presses were at the editor's service. The secret is, these papers are to pass, with unwary people, for a specimen of the University's government; much such a one indeed as the tile was, which Hierocles's scholars brought to market, for a sample of the house he had to sell. Now there are divers aggravations of this foul play, which make it yet more insupportable; as where 'tis said, Why is this question now revived, which the members of our Church have of late so carefully declined, out of pure respect to those ears, which, if it be possible, they are not willing to offend. Or why are we of the University attacked in our own quarters, and so desir'd to own a truth, that we can neither in honour nor honesty decline an answer, tho' we are well aware with what design the scene of the Controversy is laid in Oxford. Or how can we brook this usage from our companions, our own familiar friends, with whom we have taken sweet counsel together, and walked in the House of God as friends (5). This piece was published, as has been said, in May (6), and how exactly our author, whose tract followed it in June, has kept to the same lore, appears from his epistle addressed to the University reader, where he observes, 'that the hopes of our enemies abroad have been entertained, and the sollicitude of our friends awakened, by the news of our Oxford converts daily flocking into the bosom of the Romish Church. But we hope all men are by this time convinced, that they deserve as little consideration for their number, as they do regard for their accomplishments. No one needs to be alarmed at the desertion of six or seven members, who shall consider their dependance on one, who, by the magazines which he had stored up against us, shews that he has not now first changed his complexion, but only dropped the vizor.' This is sufficient for a sample, for to trace him through every instance of the contrast, would be to transcribe both. Mr Atterbury's piece followed

(3) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 616.

(4) See his article; as also that of Dr Wake, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

(5) Psalm lv. 14, 15.

(6) The imprimatur is dated May, 19, 1687.

eight Theses laid down, and the Inferences deduced from them, in a Discourse intituled, Church-Government, Part V. lately printed at Oxford [D]. Thus early did he distinguish himself in a point of so much serious study, as was the defence of his Prince's supremacy against the papal usurpations, when urged to it by his regard for the honour of the university. Neither did he fail of giving the highest entertainment to that elegant feat of the Muses, by his admirable poetical talents, when a suitable occasion invited him. The Musæ Anglicanæ cannot boast a more exquisite performance, than the Austro Davisiana of Mr Smalridge, published first in 1689, 4to. The same year, July 4th, he proceeded Master of Arts (f); not long after which, he entered into Holy Orders, and about the year 1692 was appointed Minister of Tothil-Fields-chapel, Westminster (g). In 1693, he was collated to a Prebend in the church of Litchfield (h). In 1700, he took his Doctor's degree in Divinity (i), and frequently supplied the place of Dr Jane, then Regius-Professor of Divinity at Oxford, with great applause [E], 'till the Professor's death in February

(f) Wood's Fasti, col. 223.

(g) It is in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of the abbey.

(h) He was admitted June 12. Willis's Cathedrals, Vol. I. p. 442. Dr Lloyd was then Bishop of that see. Mr Whiston was ordained Priest the same year by his Lordship, when Dean Addison, Dr Chandler, afterwards Bishop of Durham, then his Lordship's chaplain, and Mr Smalridge, laid their hands upon him, jointly with the Bishop. Whiston's Memoirs, &c. p. 28. edit. 1753.

(i) Rawlinson's Catalogue of Oxford Graduates.

(7) It was intituled, A Vindication of the Spirit of Martin Luther, &c.

followed in the beginning of August (7), in the preface to which the same particulars are touched upon, but in such a taste and manner as makes them his own. By this last piece there seems to have been a fourth person engag'd in the common design, whose part was the defence of the Reformation, as appears from these words of the author. 'In the defence of our Reformation to come, it will be found, that the Considerer is no good historian; the Reasoner has proved him no good Catholic; the Animadverter no good subject; and all together no good Disputant; so that I have no new side of him left to entertain the reader with.'

[D] Church Government, Part V. The whole title runs thus: Church Government, Part V. A Relation of the English Reformation, and the Lawfulness thereof examined by the Theses delivered in the four former Parts. But it seems these four had not been published. This was a very extraordinary mystery, which lay fully open however to ridicule and raillery, and did not escape our Animadverter's notice. 'Nor is it, says he, any wonder, if that arguer does not convince, who uses, for principles, conclusions drawn from premises which the world never saw, and then assumes such things as every one acquainted with history is able to contradict. Certainly his University readers will not be very fond of the conclusion of that syllogism whose major proposition is a petitio principii, and minor, a downright falsehood in matter of fact; they no doubt are surprised to find consequents come before their antecedents, and Church Government, Part V. to have slipped into the world somewhat immaturely, methinks, before the other four (8).' Mr Wood, who informs us (9), that this piece was wrote by Abraham Woodhead, and was the first that was printed at the press which Obadiah Walker had set up in the back part of his lodgings, as Master of University college, observes that it had the print of King Alfred cut in a wooden border prefixed to the title. So minute a particular appears to be trifling and contemptible at first sight, but upon looking into the book will be found very pertinent. The Antiquary therein apparently had his eye upon that part of our young animadverter's piece, where he urges the editor with the authority of Mr Spelman's book de Vita Ælfridi, written as he observes by the author in English, but published in Latin by the Master of University college in Oxford, in the name of the Alumni of that society. This author, speaking of the laws made by King Ælfrid in causes ecclesiastical, makes the following inference from them. These laws do therefore deserve our particular observation, because from them it is evident that the Saxon Kings, Ælfrid and Edward, were of opinion that they had a supremacy as well over ecclesiastical persons as laymen, and that the Church which was within their dominions, was not out of their jurisdiction, or subject to a foreign power, and exempted from the laws of their country, as Becket, Anselm, and others afterwards, fiercely contended (10). Again, from King Alfred's laws it is evident, either that the Roman supremacy was not yet risen to that height as in after-ages, so as to lessen the jurisdiction of Christian Princes, or if it was, yet King Alfred did not subject himself so far to it (11). Nay, so far was King Alfred from paying any such subjection, that we are told he found out a way to ruin and destroy that universal empire which the Ro-

(8) Animadversions, p. 4.

(9) In the article of Abraham Woodhead, as before.

(10) Vita Ælfrici, lib. ii. paragr. 12.

(11) Ibid. lib. ii. par. 98.

manists in those dark ages had newly founded, and were hastening to finish, which is spoken in reference to his restoring the second commandment expunged out of the decalogue according to the canons of the second Nicene council (12). From which one instance it is plain, that, contrary to the pretensions of our author, King Edward the Sixth was not the first that took upon him to reform liturgies. Mr Smalridge concludes thus, 'These passages cited I take to be some of the perperam scripta which the publisher of that life mentions in the preface (13). And accordingly we find that whatever is advanced against the papal authority in the text, is qualified in the comment; and it is plain that King Alfred was a greater adversary to the power of the Pope, than his Alumnus, the Annotator. So that it is matter of great surprize to find him appear in the frontispiece of this treatise of Church Government, who was so great an enemy to the anti-regal designs of it.'

[E] He supplied the place of Divinity Professor with applause.] As to one principal part of this office, presiding in theological disputations, his epitaph is full evidence, and we have the following instance that he performed another part, of presenting and creating Doctors in that faculty, with no less merit. May 6, 1706, he presented the famous Dr Grabe, with this elegant speech.

'Insignissime Vice-cancellarii vosque egregii Procuratores!

'Præsento Vobis Reverendum hunc Virum Dominum Johannem Ernestum Grabe, Patre, Avo, Abavo, Theologiæ Professoribus, prognatum; gente atque educatione Borussia; diuturni apud nos hospitii necessitudine, ac propensissimo erga Ecclesiam Anglicanam studio, nostratem; Eruditionis suæ fama ac nominis celebritate Universi literati Orbis, Civem. Verum iis ingenii doctrinæ, et virtutis, ornamentis insignem, ut ex Absentis laudem nulla satis longa foret oratio; Ea vero animi modestia ut præsens reformidet etiam brevissimam. Id sane nec absque singulari Dei Opt. Max. providentia ornatissimo huic homini evenit, ut quo olim die illum philosophiæ magistrum & doctorem summo omnium applausu salutavit Academia Regiomontana, eodem jam die post emensas unum et viginti annos in celsissimo hoc theologiæ dignitatis gradu pari studio collocaret Academia Oxoniensis. Nihil in laudem vestrum magis cessurum; Nihil Academiae Francofurtensis, cui solennem hunc instauratis diem, magis gratum, a Vobis proficisci potuit, quam eximius hic honos in eum virum collatus, quem illa, utpote regi suo præ cæteris egregie charum, maximi habet, quem ad professoriam suam cathedram haud semel vocatum nobis pœne invidet, quem hodierno præcipue die absentem requirit, minores aliquanto agens triumphos, quod hoc tantum ingenii lumen desideret.

'Quæ vero lætissimum hunc virum ad Angliam invensam primum impulit, eadem adhuc apud Nos detinet, amicissima erga ecclesiam nostram voluntas, & summa Episcopalis Ordinis Reverentia. Primævæ nimirum Antiquitatis Indagator sagacissimus, eam divini cultus solemnitatem, quam sùs descripsit Justinus, eam doctrinæ puritatem quam ab omni heresæos

(12) Lib. ii. par. 5.

(13) His words are, Errores auctoritatis retinimus, & perperam scripta medicari potius quam tollere malimus.

labe

February 1706-7, when his worthy deputy was strongly recommended to the Queen for his successor by the university, who had been witnesses of his just pretensions to it, but he was obliged to yield to the tide of party, which carried it to his competitor [F]. He had now long been distinguished by his discourses from the pulpit; and in consequence thereof, on the twenty-ninth of January 1707-8, he was chosen Lecturer of St Dunstan's in the West (k), London. He had entered very early into an intimacy with Dr Francis Atterbury at school; and this, by a concurrence of sentiments and studies, afterwards grew into the most sincere and hearty friendship; of which he gave an illustrious proof in 1710, when being a Member of the Lower-House of Convocation, he steadily promoted his friend's advancement to the Prolocutor's chair, and presented him to the House on that occasion in a remarkable elegantly turned panegyric (l) [G]. He continued also

(k) From the vestry book of that parish.

(l) It was printed soon after.

• labe vindicavit suis itidem Irenæus; eam denique
• ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ formulam quam sapissime in
• Patrum monumentis expressam legerat, nativa sua
• puritidine apud nos etiamnum vigere facile per-
• spexit. Et cum antiquam matrem diu diligenterque
• quæsitam hic tandem invenerat, in illius sinum recipi
• vehementer gessit; in illius amplexu lubens hæret.
• Erit autem aliquando dies, nisi vana nos spes fallat,
• & quod ardentissimis votis optamus, id etiam futurum
• credulimur auguremur; erit, inquam, aliquando
• dies, cum optimus hic Vir in patriam redux primi-
• tivam ecclesiæ hierarchiam apud suos hæud ulterius
• desideraverit; cum augustissima nostra regina, eccle-
• siam Anglicanam, quam domi materno affectu mover,
• quam sanctissimis moribus exornat, quam amplissima
• munificentia locupletat, quam assiduis precibus Deo
• commendat, quam adversus omnes omnium undequa-
• que holum impetus incolumem, & dum ipsa fuerit
• sospes, sospitem usque & gloriosam fore, eccei sponde-
• mus; in Confederatas etiam gentes præpollenti sua
• apud illos gratia hæud frustra commendatam transmi-
• tere studuerit. Cum, Anna hortante, Augustus Bo-
• rufforum Rex, pro summa sua adversus ecclesiæ re-
• formatas benevolentia, ad augendum ipsarum decus
• et robur, venerabilem Episcopatus ordinem intra sua
• regna stabilierit; ad quæ regiam ipsius majestatem
• in hunc ipsum fortasse finem divina evexit Providentia.
• Cum Frederico, inter cæteras ab ipso pace & bello
• præclare gestas, quas & præfens ætas laudat, & sera
• laudabit posteritas, id etiam in non exiguum ipsius
• gloriam cesserit, quod antiquam Apostolicam Episco-
• porum in Ecclesiâ gubernanda prærogativam suis au-
• spiciis restituerit; cum eruditissimum hunc virum,
• singulari ipsius favore jam pridem insignitum, Episco-
• pali Mitra ornaverit: Vestra interim laurea, Acade-
• mici, in præludium tantæ dignitatis hodie ornandum,
• eam vicissim eximia sua pietate et sere incredibili
• doctrina magnopere ornaturum.

[F] He yielded to the tide of party, &c.] We have already shewn (14), that the carrying of this matter against our author, was made a point by the Duke of Marlborough and his Duchefs also, at the head of the Whigs*. The Duchefs expressly tells us, that Dr Smalridge was put up by the Tories, a blot it seems that entirely obliterated all his pretensions to a right of expectation superior to his competitor, by having supplied the place many years with great applause, as Deputy to Dr Jane, which in reality was so far from being now of any service to him, that it even help'd to aggravate his crime, the memory of Dr Jane being particularly odious to the Whigs at this time on many accounts, as will appear from the following sketch of his life. This Gentleman was son of Joseph Jane of Lelkard in Cornwall, Esq; Member for that borough in the long Parliament under Charles the First, but upon their violent proceedings against his Majesty, he retired to Oxford, sat in the Parliament there in 1643, and was one of the Commissioners in Cornwall for the King the following year (15). Upon the decline of his Majesty's affairs, he was a great sufferer, compounded, as is thought, for his estate, and went abroad, where he wrote ΕΙΚΩΝ ΑΚΑΛΑΣΤΟΣ, or, the Image unbroken, A Persepective of the impudence, falsehood, vanity, and prophaneness, published in a Libel, intituled ΕΙΚΩΝΑΚΑΛΑΣΤΗΣ against ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ; printed in 1651, in a small character 4to. His son Dr William Jane was born at Lelkard about the year 1644, and, being bred at Westminster-school, was thence elected student of Christ Church College, Oxford, in 1660; proceeding regularly to take his degrees in arts, he entered into holy orders, became Lecturer of Carfax church in Oxford, Chaplain to Dr Compton, Bishop of London (16), Prebendary of St Paul's, Bachelor of Divinity in 1674, and installed Canon of Christ Church in 1678. The following year he proceeded Doctor of Divinity as a Compounder, and on the 19th of May, 1680 was admitted Regius Professor of Divinity. In 1685, he was nominated, by King James the Second, Dean of Gloucester (17), with which he held the Precentorship of Exeter (18). Upon the arrival of the Prince of Orange at Hungerford, in his march to London, he was one of the four Delegates sent by the University of Oxford, to offer his Highness their plate, which, though refused by the Prince, yet the Doctor took that opportunity of asking for the bishopric of Exeter, void by the translation of Dr Lamplugh to the see of York, but was prevented by a promise before made of Exeter to Dr Trelawney, Bishop of Bristol (19). However, Mr Wood tells (20), us he was made Chaplain to King William, and it is certain was one of the Commissioners appointed on the 13th of September 1689, by his Majesty, to review the Liturgy in order to a Comprehension, tho' he never sat in it; and November 21 following, he was elected Prolocutor of the lower House of Convocation against Dr (afterwards Archbishop) Tillotson, then Dean of St Paul's (21). It was said that he was much disgusted at the ill success of his application for a bishopric, and ranged among the malcontents of King William's reign (22). However that be, it is certain that he lived some years after Queen Anne's accession to the throne without being advanced higher in the Church, dying on the 5th of February, 1706 7 (23). Mr Wood gives us the titles of two sermons of his, besides those already mentioned in print, all in 4to. As also another piece intituled, The present Separation self-condemned and proved to be Schism, &c. London 1678, 4to. He is the supposed author of A Letter to a Friend, containing some Queries about the new Commission for making Alterations in the Liturgy, Canons, &c. of the Church of England, published in October 1689, in a single sheet 4to. He is likewise said to have viewed before it went to the press, and made some corrections in a piece of Abraham Woodbead, intituled, An historical Narration of the Life and Death of our Saviour Jesus Christ, &c. Oxon, 1685, 4to. published by Obadiab Walker, who struck out Dr Jane's corrections when it was in the press (24). Dr Jane is charged moreover with having a chief hand in penning the Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford, passed in that Convocation in July 1683, then presented to and approved by King Charles II, but burnt by the hangman in pursuance of an order of the House of Lords, in 1710 (25).

[G] In an elegant panegyric.] Having represented his friend as a person fit for the post in every respect, he begins with his character as a scholar; in which respect he recommends him to their choice as one that was a stranger in no branch of literature; had been long and success fully exercised in most arts and sciences, and was most accomplished and perfect in the most perfect kinds of learning: Vir in nullo literarum genere hospes in plerisque artibus & studiis diu et feliciter exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum disciplinis perfectissimus. He then proceeds to his conduct in controversy, a delicate point, and it is touched with a delicate hand, duely balanced between his friend's honour, and his own integrity. He allows him to have been too severe in treating his antagonist; but alledges, that this was not to be imputed to any principle of ill nature, envy, or pride, but to a temper of itself too warm, or perhaps to a degree of passion, easily pardonable in a soldier, who fought for every thing that was dear to him, in a son endeavouring to rescue his mother from injury and violence. But, adds he, if there be a greater number of excellencies in his writings; if he has treated of sub-

(17) Ath. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 1049, 1050.

(18) Birch's Life of Tillotson.

(19) Life of Dean Prideaux, p. 65, 66. Lond. 1748, 8vo.

(20) Ubi supra. And there is a sermon of his preached before the King and Queen at Whitehall, in Novemb. 1692. printed at Oxford, 1692, 4o.

(21) The writer of Dean Prideaux's Life tells us, he was supported by the interest of the Earls of Clarendon and Rochester. p. 55. as before.

(22) Id. ibid.

(23) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 174.

(24) Ath. Oxon. col. 615.

(25) Gen. Hist. of England.

(14) Under the article of Dr Potter, Archbishop of Canterbury.

* Dr Smalridge had particularly incurred their displeasure, by signing, with Sir T. Croffe and Paul Jodrell, the paper mentioned in the article of Mr Maynwaring.

(15) The King lodged six nights together in his house at Lelkard, in Aug. 1644. and one night in Sept. following; at which time the Earl of Essex was defeated and forced to fly to Plymouth. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1030.

(16) He preached the sermon at the consecration of Dr Compton to the see of Oxford, on the sixth of December, 1674, which was printed immediately at London in 4to. in 1675, according to the Printers computation.

also firm in the same connexions the following years, but without suffering himself to be drawn into the violence and rage of party disputes, either upon State or Church subjects [H]. In this amiable disposition of pursuing mild and persuasive methods, he entertained a friendly correspondence with Dr Samuel Clarke and Mr Whiston [I]; and was very serviceable in moderating the heat of the proceedings in Convocation against them [K]. In the same spirit he proposed a conference with the former upon the subject of the Trinity, which was accordingly held at the seat of Thomas Cartwright, Esq; of Aynho, in Northamptonshire, about the year 1712 [L]. But, however commendable so peaceful a conduct jects in themselves arduous, useful, and agreeable; if he has confirmed them with the strongest arguments; if he has pressed them upon the minds of his readers, by a pure and perspicuous style: it is reasonable that he should receive the applause due to learning, from men of letters; from the eloquent, the honour due to eloquence; Si quid forte asperius, si quid ardentius, si quid liberius effuderit, Lector paulo humanior, id non odio, non livori, nec arrogantiae, tribuet; sed aut ingenio suapte natura aliquantulum preferendo, aut fortasse iracundiae, in milite pro aris focusque acriter dimicante, in filio ab injuria et vi matrem suam eripiente, facile ignoscenda. Quod si plures in illius scriptis effulgeant virtutes; si res tractaverit cognitu difficiles, utiles, jucundas; si eas validissimis argumentis firmaverit; si puro et dilucido sermone in ipsis legentium animis inscripserit; eruditorum apud eruditos, eloquentiae apud disertos, suus constet honos.

[H] Without the rage of party disputes] For this we have the authority of the famous Sir Richard Steele, who cannot be suspected of partiality to him. We find that justly admired writer, thus describing Dr Smalridge in the Tatler (26), under the feigned name of Favonius. He introduces it according to the affecting turn and manner of those papers, by an account of a visit he made to a friend of his, a Lady of great worth, who lay then on her death-bed. 'At the door I met Favonius, not without a secret satisfaction to find, that he had been there. I had formerly conversed with him at this house; and as he abounds with that sort of virtue and knowledge, which makes religion beautiful, and never turns the discourse into the violence and rage of party disputes, I listened to him with great pleasure. The discourse chanced to be upon the subject of death, which he treated with such a strength of reason, and greatness of soul, that instead of being terrible, it appeared to a mind rightly cultivated altogether to be contemned, or rather to be desired. As I met him at the door, so I saw in his face, a certain glowing of grief and humanity, heightened with an air of fortitude and resolution; which, as I afterwards found, had had such an irresistible force, as to suspend the pains of the dying person, and the lamentations of the nearest friends, who attended her.'

[I] He held a fair correspondence with Dr Samuel Clarke and Mr Whiston.] The latter of these, in his Historical Memoirs of the former, tells us (27), that his acquaintance with Dr Smalridge commenced about the same time as it did with Dr Clarke, that is, about the year 1697. How soon our author became acquainted with Dr Clarke, is not certain, but it must have been some time before the year 1709; when Mr Whiston having translated the Apostolical Constitutions into English, desired Dr Clarke to revise it; who having done so, and corrected the whole, finding about ten or twelve places, which he hesitated about, recommended it to the translator, to go to their great and common friend Dr Smalridge, (they are Mr Whiston's words) for the last correction of the more difficult places; who accordingly examined and corrected the version in every one of those places. Mr Whiston further informs us here, that in the advertisement to the first volume of his Primitive Christianity revived, where this fact is mentioned without naming the two persons, Dr Smalridge is understood by a very learned and judicious person. He also intimates afterwards (28), that all the four volumes of the last-mentioned book, were communicated to our author before they were printed, and expressly declares, that upon committing his fourth volume to him, he was pleased to peruse it with great care, and confessed, says Mr Whiston, that I had therein acted very uprightly, and that my quotations were fair and just; and that whereas a friend of his had suggested to him, that he thought some passages were omitted in antiquity, that seemed to make against me; he upon comparing, found that I had not omitted them, but that they were all in my papers.'

[K] He was serviceable in moderating the heat of the proceedings in Convocation against them] We shall begin according to the order of time, with Mr Whiston, who informs us, that about the same time that Dr Smalridge had his manuscript papers [of Primitive Christianity revived] he once went down to him [at Westminster] and desired him to go with him to the Archbishop of York, Dr Sharp, in order to try whether they could not find out some way for a fair examination of his papers before they were printed; 'which, says Mr Whiston, I earnestly endeavoured.' He replied, 'that there was nothing to be said against examination, nothing to be said against it; and, accordingly, he went along with me to the Archbishop's house in Petty-France, Westminster, immediately. But the Archbishop not happening to be at home, there were no further steps taken at that time (29).' After Mr Whiston's affair came before the Convocation, Dr Smalridge, being appointed one of the committee for that purpose, was not wanting to give intimations of his good intentions towards his deliverance, by declaring openly, upon the reading of his letter to the Convocation, in that committee, that it would be harder to come at him now than before; and, by declaring openly, in Convocation, against the current of the House (30), that it was his private opinion, that he should be heard before he was censured. With regard to Dr Clarke, the same hand informs us, that Dr Smalridge, then a Bishop, and in the Upper-House, dropped some words before-hand, that as to other of Dr Clarke's metaphysical notions about the Trinity, he did not think it necessary to proceed to their condemnation; provided he would but truly declare he believed the real eternity of the Son of God. That as the Bishop's opinion was chiefly regarded by that House, so Mr Whiston thought it had great weight with Dr Clarke, in inducing him to draw up that declaration of his opinion, which he had laid before the Bishops, on the second of July, 1714. The first article of which runs thus: 'My opinion is, that the Son of God was eternally begotten by the eternal, incomprehensible, power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit was likewise eternally derived from the Father, by or through the Son, according to the eternal, incomprehensible, power and will of the Father.' Which produced a resolution in that House to proceed no farther upon the extract laid before them by the Lower-House; so that, concludes Mr Whiston, as Dr Smalridge in some measure assisted my escape from that Convocation, so was Bishop Smalridge the principal occasion of Dr Clarke's escape from the other (31).

[L] A dispute about the Trinity with Dr Clarke, &c.] Mr Whiston, who is still our informer, tells us, that the conference was proposed by our author in order to the conviction of Dr Clarke; and, continues he, if any person was able to convince upon that head, it must have been Dr Smalridge, who had fully considered my fourth volume, and was a thorough master of those original books of Christianity whence the arguments were to be taken, and who wanted no sagacity or good will to enforce them. However adds he, the Doctor failed of success; and, on the contrary, the company were generally satisfied, the evidence on Dr Clarke's side was greatly superior to the other (32). Now granting this to be a fair representation of the issue of this dispute; our author's reputation is in no danger of being hurt by it, when it is considered who made up the generality of this company, probably Mr Wals, then Rector of the parish, and Mr Cartwright's chaplain, and Mrs Cartwright, who we are assured was never absent nor unconcerned at such conferences, both of them prejudiced

(26) No. 110. In the preface to the 4th volume, he expressly tells us, that Favonius is intended for Dr Smalridge.

(27) P. 16. edit. 1748, 8vo.

(28) In p. 140, 141.

(29) Ibid. p. 141.

(30) Ibid. p. 56.

(31) Ibid. from p. 56 to 65.

(32) Ibid. p. 5

a conduct might be in the eyes of all the sober part Christians, yet there were not wanting those who took great offence at it, and some of these even carried their resentments so far as to charge him with leaning towards Arianism [M], inasmuch, that a little before his death he was brought under a necessity of vindicating himself from that calumny [N].
In

judged greatly in favour of Dr Clarke's notions; and as to the Doctor himself 'tis well known how utterly inconvincible he was, maintaining his doctrine to the last, against all conviction.

[M] He was charged of leaning towards Arianism. Mr Whiston was apparently a great means of bringing him under this character, since he every where represents him, throughout his memoirs of Dr Clarke, in this light; upon too fond a desire to have one, whom he looked on as the most excellent man in the nation, of his side. The strongest proof he offers for his conjecture, is seen at the conclusion of his account of the just mentioned conference at Aynho; which, after declaring the allowed superiority of Dr Clarke's evidence, runs thus: 'And whether Dr Smalridge did not himself something feel it, I cannot certainly tell. So far I think will appear hereafter, that excepting his condemnation of the gross Arians, whom neither Dr Clarke nor I ever supported, he after this chose rather to refer to others, who had managed the Athanasian cause, than ever to enter directly into it's vindication. Nor did he escape the suspicion of being himself inclinable to what has been of late called Arianism, especially at Oxford, as will hereafter appear (33).'

By these last words, Mr Whiston refers to a postscript at the end of these Memoirs; where he tells us, that when in his second appendix to the Historical Preface, p. 33, 34, 35. he said, 'that proposition from the Upper-House of Convocation, which condemns, as hereby, his affirming, that the one God of the Christians was not the three Persons taken together, but God the Father only, was owned not to be heretical by more than one of the Lower-House, he meant by Dr Smalridge and Dr Cannon; and agreeable to this, we are afterwards told, that when his first volume of Primitive Christianity revived had been perused by Dr Smalridge, he confessed to Mr Whiston, that he had proved, that so far as our present records go, the Holy Ghost was not called God, nor invocated in the three first centuries; though he thought Basil had given good reasons, why we might venture farther. Our author's sentiments of this performance of Mr Whiston's, he frankly declared, in the following most friendly letter to himself.

' Sir,

' I did not send for the books sooner, because I had rather have them bound than in sheets. I pray God the publication of them may not do that disservice to our holy religion, which I am persuaded you are far from intending. It seems to me much more likely, that unbelievers should thereby be strengthened in their infidelity, than that those whom you suppose mistaken, should be induced to reform the opinions which you take to be erroneous. There is one suffrage in our Liturgy in which you will heartily join with us. That it may please God to bring into the way of truth all such as have erred and are deceived. This is the prayer of

' Your faithful friend,

Nov. 22, 1711.

' and servant,

' George Smalridge (*).

Again, says Mr Whiston, ' some time after the publication of the then Bishop of Bangor's famous sermon, and about the time of the publication of my Scripture Politicks, I waited upon Bishop Smalridge; and, among other things, desired, that his Lordship, of whom both parties had so good an opinion, would do something to bring us out of that disorder in which we then were; and particularly, that he would please to write a little book, to recommend a fair and impartial review of Christian Antiquity to the world, in order to the correction of such errors and practices as might have crept into the Church, since the first settlement of Christianity, which recommendation would, I believed,

' have a very good effect. His Lordship's answer, as near as I can remember the words, and that with great emotion of mind, was this: Mr Whiston, I dare not examine; I dare not examine; for if we should examine and find that you are in the right, the Church has then been in an error so many hundred years; yet, as Mr Whiston concludes, when I asked him how he could say so and still be a Protestant; he replied, Yes, he could (34). Thus we see how ill the parts of this story hang together; and such trash would not have found a place here, but as it gives an opportunity of satisfying such as perhaps may be unacquainted with that odious part of Mr Whiston's conduct, in retailing and misrepresenting private conversation in favour of his own principles; a most mischievous kind of falseness and treachery, of which no man was universally esteemed less capable than he, at the time when these tales, concerning Dr Smalridge, have their date; and, consequently, no man more capable of doing mischief by them. For which reason, it will not appear incredible, that he was a great means of bringing the suspicion of Arianism upon the Bishop; which, however, in the issue turned to his advantage, as will be seen in the following remark.

[N] Under a necessity of vindicating himself from that calumny. To set this part of our author's life in a full light, it is necessary to observe, that in 1719, there was a design among the Anti-Athanasians, as they called themselves, to petition the Parliament for a legal Toleration. Dr Clarke was consulted, and approved the design, and Mr Whiston was the chief promoter of it. Upon this occasion, a paper was drawn up and printed in order to be distributed to the Members of Parliament, to the following purport:

' Whereas, in an Act of Parliament, 1. Gul. & Mary, for the exempting Protestant Dissenters, &c. from diverse penalties, &c. there are several restrictions and limitations, by which many of his Majesty's peaceable Protestant subjects are still left incapable of receiving the benefit of such exemption, &c. Therefore, for the quieting the minds of all such his Majesty's good Protestant subjects; be it enacted, &c. That every Protestant Dissenter from the Church of England by law established, who shall make and subscribe the declaration against Popery, and take the oaths in the said Act mentioned; and who shall, instead of any other declarations and subscriptions therein required, declare and subscribe his unfeigned assent to, and his belief of, the Holy Christian religion, as contained in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and in the Creed, commonly called the Apostle's Creed, shall have the full benefit of the said exemptions, as if he had made all the declarations and subscriptions therein hitherto required; any thing in the aforesaid Act, or in any other Act, to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding (35).'

This attempt, though abortive, yet made a very great noise, and being particularly disgustful to the generality of the Clergy, who were most zealous for preserving the present establishment unaltered, in this respect, some of these judging, that such a bold attempt could not be thought of without some particular encouragement, were prompted to look whence it might possibly come, and in that humour presently cast their eyes upon Bishop Smalridge, who, it was well known, had often expressed a good opinion of Dr Clarke and Mr Whiston, especially as to the piety and uprightness of their intentions for the service of religion, and frequently declared his dislike of all violent measures against them. These murmurings reaching the ears of Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Bishop of Winchester, who had a great respect for his brother of Bristol, his Lordship took the liberty of acquainting him with them: in answer to whom, Bishop Smalridge wrote the following remarkable vindication of himself, in a letter to that friend, dated from Christ-Church in Oxford, September 23, 1719.

' My

(34) Ibid. p. 140, 141, 142.

(33) Ibid. p. 52.

(35) N. B. No preachers or teachers, except Quakers, are at present tolerated by Law in England, without subscribing the 18, 11d, Vth, VIIIth, IXth, XIIIth, and XVIIth, of the XXXIX Articles of Religion.

* Ibid. p. 138.

(m) This, with eleven more, were printed and published by himself, in 1717, 8vo. addressed to the Vestry, &c. of this church, in Tothil-Fields, Westminster.

(n) Willis's Cathedral, Vol. I.

(o) See his letter to Bishop Trelawney, in remark [IV].

In 1711, he preached his farewell sermon at St Dunstan's (m), upon the resignation of that Lecturehip [O], being made Canon of Christ-church in Oxford, into which he was installed the fourth of September that year. Dr Atterbury was made Dean of that church the same day; and resigning the Deanery of Carlisle, Dr Smalridge succeeded him in that dignity, into which he was admitted on the third of November, and installed by proxy on the twenty-ninth of the same month. Upon the promotion of this friend to the Deanery of Westminster and Bishopric of Rochester, he succeeded him also as Dean of Christ-church, into which he was admitted on the eleventh of July 1713. To this Deanery, upon the translation of Dr John Robinson to the See of London, was added that of Bristol, of which Dr Smalridge was consecrated Bishop, the fourth of April 1714; and her Majesty appointed him her Lord-Almoner soon after (n). In this post he likewise served her successor, King George the First, the first Christmas after his Accession to the Throne (o). But still preserving that benevolent principle which constantly directed his conduct in all public affairs, never to join in the exasperating measures of any party, he became disagreeable to the Ministry, by refusing to sign the Declaration, which the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other Bishops, then in and about London, had drawn up on occasion of the rebellion in 1715 [P]; and soon after

was

‘ My very good Lord,

‘ Among the many proofs your Lordship has given me of your favour and friendship to me, none could be greater or more obliging than the generous concern you have shewn for my injured reputation; and I am very much surprized to hear that I should be suspected of Arianism, having never given, as I know of, the least ground for such suspicion. I have, from the chair (while I supplied Dr Jane's place) from the pulpit; when I have preached at the New Chapel [in Tothil-fields, Westminster]; and here at Oxford, on Christmas-day was twelve month; and on the same day at Court, when I was Almoner, the first Christmas after the King's accession; and in Convocation, when a censure past on Mr Whiston's doctrines, (whilst I was presbyter and a member of the Lower-House); and upon all other proper occasions expressed my sentiments about the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour, in opposition both to the Socinians and Arians. I did on Sunday last ordain some clergymen, and I examined them particularly as to the points controverted betwixt the Catholic Church and the Arians, and said what to me seemed proper to confirm them in the Catholic faith, and to arm them against the objections usually brought by the Arians. I have read over more than once, and, as well as I was able, have considered Dr Waterland's late book, and have in conversation signified my approbation of it, and recommended it to my friends as a substantial vindication of the received doctrines and confutation of Arianism.

‘ Trelawney, Nov. 16, 1719.

‘ This is a true copy of part of the Bishop of Bristol's letter to me; and without going deeper into it, is a sufficient vindication of him from the damnable but thriving heresy of Arianism.

‘ Witness my hand,

‘ Jonathan Trelawney.’

(36) Memoirs of Dr Clarke, p. 138, 139.

Mr Whiston, from whom we transcribe this (36), makes the following extraordinary remark upon it: N. B. Whether Bishop Smalridge meant by Arianism the Eusebian doctrine, of late revived, is not here expressly said. He must mean not explicitly or in totidem verbis, for surely, the Bishop's approbation and recommendation of Dr Waterland's book, as a confutation of Arianism, is clearly expressive of that meaning; but Mr Whiston was resolved not to see that meaning. A prejudice so obstinately blind is enough to make us read with caution, what he tells us afterwards he had from the Earl of Nottingham; viz. that in the other part of this letter, suppressed by the Bishop of Winchester, his friend, Bishop Smalridge, declared, the regard he had for some persons not of the Athanasian opinion; and his little approbation of at least the damnatory clauses in the Athanasian Creed; as also, this other N. B. That our Bishop seemed always to him [Mr Whiston] ready enough to give up the Athanasian creed; only he loved to put it upon another foot, says Whiston, than I should have done;

I mean, that it should be given up to the clamours of the Dissenters, who still made it's damnatory sentences an argument against Conformity to the Church of England. This, however, is much less incredible than what follows: ‘ I was also informed, continues this bigotted Anti-Athanasian, by an eye-witness, Sir Robert Clarke, that when he was once at Bristol cathedral on an Athanasian-Creed day; and not believing that Creed himself, had nothing else to do but to watch Bishop Smalridge's behaviour; he took notice, that he did not repeat that creed any more than himself (37).’ This carries an insinuation so injurious to the Bishop, and so utterly inconsistent with his constant behaviour at divine service at Oxford, where he made it his particular care to join with a full and audible voice in every part of the service requiring it, and often complained of a bad custom that had crept into the university, of not joining in the psalmody, (there being only a sermon besides) under a pretence of being more moved by listening to the sweet performance of the choristers in that part of the duty (38); that no excuse can be made for it.

(37) Ibid. p. 140.

[O] His farewell sermon at St Dunstan's, &c. This sermon was printed together with eleven more, by himself, in 1717, 8vo. and the volume is not scarce; yet there is one passage in it which it would be a kind of injury to the parish as well as to his memory, if this opportunity of doing justice to both was neglected. In the conclusion of his discourse, he addresses himself to the inhabitants thus: ‘ And now, my dearly beloved brethren, I most earnestly beseech you to call to remembrance all the dissuaves from impiety and sin, all the exhortations to holiness and virtue, which I have, through the course of my ministry, with much weakness and infirmity, but with an honest mind and a hearty concern for your eternal welfare, made unto you. That having by your own free choice set me to be your watchman, you would hearken to this last voice of the trumpet, this plain, this repeated, this final, declaration of one, who sincerely loves and regards you, and who has all the testimonies he could wish, more than he could expect, of affection and esteem from you, have it's due weight.’

(38) From my own knowledge.

[P] He refused to sign the Declaration, &c. 1715. The passage in that Declaration which he excepted to was this, ‘ We are the more concerned that both the Clergy and People of our communion should shew themselves hearty friends to the Government, on this occasion, to vindicate the honour of the Church of England, because the chief hopes of our enemies seem to arise from discontents, artificially raised amongst us; and because some who have valued themselves, and been too much valued by others for a pretended zeal, have joined with Papists in these wicked attempts, which as they must ruin the Church if they succeed, so they cannot well end without great reproach to it, if the rest do not clearly and heartily declare our detestation of such practices.’ This, he thought, was an unjust and invidious party-reflection upon some, whose loyalty was unquestionable. It has been said, that he was persuaded to take this step by Bishop Atterbury; but it is manifestly agreeable to his own principles and judgment. Though very probably they might act in concert upon this interesting affair, was removed from the Almoner's place (p). However, it was not long before his true merit was particularly marked by her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, with whom he continued from that time in high favour till his death, which was occasioned by an apoplexy, on the twenty-seventh of September 1719, to the affair, as they always lived in the closest communication of counsels and friendship in points which nearly concerned either of them. The following letter is a conspicuous instance of this intimacy, in regard to Dr Atterbury's dispute with Hoadley, and is no less remarkable in it's contents.

(p) Tindal's Continuation of Rieu's History of England.

To the Reverend Dr Smalridge.

Dear George,

I happened about a fortnight ago to dine with Mrs Astel. She spoke to me of my sermon (39), and desired me to print it; and after I had given her the proper answers, hinted to me, that she would be glad of perusing it. I complied with her, and sent her the sermon next day. Yesternight she returned it, with this sheet of remarks, which I cannot forbear communicating to you, because I take them to be of an extraordinary nature, considering they come from the pen of a woman. Indeed, one would not imagine a woman had written them. There is not an expression that carries the least air of her sex from the beginning to the end of it. She attacks me very home, you see, and artfully enough, under a pretence of taking my part against other Divines, who are in Hoadley's measures. Had she as much good breeding as good sense, she would be perfect. But she has not the most decent manner of insinuating what she means, but is now and then a little offensive and shocking in her expressions; which I wonder at, because a civil turn of words (even where the matter is not pleasing) is what her sex is always mistress of: she, I think, is wanting in it: but her sensible and rational way of writing makes amends for that defect, if indeed any thing can make amends for it. I dread to engage her, and leave the rest to an oral conference. Her way of solving the difficulty about swearing to the Queen is somewhat singular. You'll bring this with you to Henry Bridges's to-morrow. Perhaps I may call upon you between twelve and one, in order to our going thither together; if I were sure of your being at home, I would. But if I do, and find you are abroad, there is no inconvenience in it. I can follow you alone.

Friday noon.

Your's, adieu.

By the way, the Bishop's censure of Mrs Astel's rude way of expressing herself has happened to give much offence to the writer of her life (40), who has ranked her among the chief heroines of the three kingdoms; and, therefore, according to the general rule of such undertakers, who think it their business to assume the character of a Champion Knight, to defend their heroine's spotless worth against all opposers, will by no means allow her to be capable of such a defect; and even scruples not to retort the reflection upon the Bishop. So redoubted a champion, who enters the lists in defence of his mistress, professedly without knowing any thing of the particulars upon which the justice of her cause depends, needs not fear having any opponent. However, as Mrs Astel was undoubtedly an ornament to her sex, and has been mentioned as such before in the course of this work (41), the reader will naturally have a curiosity to know something more of her, which he may take as follows: She was born about the year 1668, at Newcastle in Northumberland, where her father, being a merchant, took care to give her a genteel education. Among other accomplishments, she was taught the French language, but having an uncommon bent and genius for literature, she afterwards learned Latin without a master. This being observed by an uncle, who was a clergyman, he undertook to be her preceptor, and by the help of his instructions she made a considerable progress in Philosophy and Mathematics as well as the languages. With this foundation, at the age of twenty, she left Newcastle, and went to London; where, and at Chelsea, she spent the remaining part of her life; prosecuting her studies very assiduously; so that, in a little time, she made great acquisitions in the fore-mentioned sciences; and turned over the best heathen moralists, and made herself mistress particularly of Xenophon, Plato, Hierocles, Tully, Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Antoninus. Being now sensible of her own talents for learning, and feeling the advantage of it, in regard to the world's esteem, she ambitioned to raise the whole sex above their ordinary level, and endeavoured to inflame their minds with an ardor for knowledge as well as religion. In this view, she first published A serious proposal to the Ladies for the advancement of their true and greatest interest: to which she added, some time after, A serious proposal, &c. the second part; wherein a method is offered for the improvement of their minds. These books wrought so far upon a certain great lady, that she had a design to give ten thousand pounds towards erecting a sort of college for the education and improvement of the female sex. But the matter coming unluckily to the ears of Dr Burnet, he immediately went to the lady, and so powerfully remonstrated against it, telling her, it would look like preparing a way for the Popish religious orders, and would be reputed a nunnery, &c. that he intirely frustrated that noble design (42). We have already mentioned, under Mr Norris's article, her letters to him concerning the love of God, wrote in 1695, which were first occasioned by her meeting with his peculiar notions upon that subject in his Practical Discourses upon various Subjects. In 1696, she published An Essay in defence of the female sex, in a letter to a Lady, written by a Lady. This is a witty piece, and was reprinted soon after. In 1700, she published Reflections upon Marriage; in which she is thought to carry the birth-right and privileges of her sex a little too far. But in her excuse, this piece is said to derive it's birth from a disappointment which she met with in a marriage, not long before she undertook it; and as it did not please some nice palates, she printed a second edition, with this title, Reflections upon Marriage: To which is added, A preface, in answer to some objections, Lond. 1705, 8vo. As she was a great enemy to the sectaries, she took up the cudgels against Davenant's Moderation a Virtue, &c. And his Essays on Peace and War; in answer to which she wrote Moderation truly stated; in a review of a late pamphlet entitled, Moderation a Virtue: or, The occasional Conformist justified from the imputation of Hypocrisy; wherein this justification is further considered; and, as far as is capable, justified. As also, A fair way with the Dissenters and their patrons; not written by L---y or any other furious Jacobite, whether Clergyman or Layman, but by a very moderate Person and dutiful Subject to the Queen;* both in 1704, 4to. (43). She also wrote An impartial enquiry into the causes of the Rebellion and Civil War in this Kingdom; in an examination of Dr Keune's Sermon, January 30. 1703-4; and vindication of the Royal Martyr, Lond. 1704, in 4to. But her chef d'œuvre or master-piece is, The Christian Religion as professed by a Daughter of the Church of England, Lond. 1705, 8vo. (44). For several years before her death she constantly walked from Chelsea to St Martin's church in the Fields every Sunday, to hear a celebrated preacher †. She led a holy, pious, and evangelical life, and enjoyed a perfect state of health 'till a few years before her death, when having one of her breasts taken off for a cancer (45), this impaired her constitution, and she did not long survive it. After she was confined to her bed, she ordered her coffin and shroud to be made and brought to the bedside, and earnestly desired, that no company might be admitted to her, refusing even to see Lady Katharine Jones, her dearest friend. She died about the 11th of May, and was buried at Chelsea on the 14th, 1731. Her fortune was never large, and in the latter part of her life was so much reduced, that she was obliged to her friends for a great part of her support. Among others, Lady Elizabeth Hastings especially was very kind and generous to her, and once gave her a purse of no less than fourscore guineas (46).

VOL. VI. No. 310.

(42) Ballard's Lives of Illustrious Women, under her article.

* L. fleay.

(43) While this was in the press, Davenant came out with a new edition of his Moderation still a Virtue; whereupon she returned immediately a very smart answer, afterwards added by way of preface to this book, which is very scarce.

(44) In this piece, she has taken to task Locke's notion of thinking matter, and shewn the mischievous tendency of his Reasonableness of Christianity, and the Lady's Religion. She has also made some remarks on Dr Tillotson's sermons upon the Eternity of Hell torments, which is mentioned by Dr Waterland, in his Advice to a Young Student.

† Probably Dr Trapp.

(45) The operation was performed by one Johnson a clergyman, and for that reason Lady Elizabeth Hastings had her breast cut off, in the same case by the same operator. Ballard, as before.

(46) Ibid.

(19) Apparently that sermon preached before the Sons of the Clergy, against Henry's measures of Submission.

(40) Mr Ballard, who has given a copy of this letter.

(41) Under Mr Norris's article.

the great grief of his college, and the whole university of Oxford. He died at Christ-church, and his corps was interred in the isle, on the north side of the choir of that cathedral, where some years afterwards a handsome monument of white marble was fixed to a column, with an inscription in elegant Latin, as may be seen below [2]. He was united to Mr Nelson (whose epitaph he wrote) in a kind of congenial worth, especially in works of charity; wherein he so much abounded, that his widow and two children, a son and daughter, had been destitute of a support if the forementioned generous patroness, the Princess of Wales, had not provided for them, by giving the first a pension of three hundred pounds a year, and conferring a good benefice in the Church for the son, Mr Henry Smalridge, who having been bred at Westminster-school, was then a student of Christ-church and Master of Arts, and took Orders to qualify himself for receiving his worthy patroness's bounty (q). In 1724, the widow took an opportunity of expressing her grateful sense of these favours in a dedication to her Royal Highness [R], prefixed to a collection of sixty of the Bishop's sermons then published in folio; the second edition of which came out in 1727.

(q) Communicated by a gentleman well known to the family.

[2] An elegant Latin inscription. After giving an account of his birth, education, and preferments, it proceeds with his character, which being faithfully and impartially done, we shall insert as follows:

Erat vultu apertus & gravis; moribus simplex;
 In precibus fervens; in rostris disertus.
 Affuit ei in totius vitæ tenore constantia,
 In verbis fides; in colloquiis suavitas;
 In reprehendendo candor; in præcipiendo autoritas;
 In discernendo quid in quaque re statui oporteret
 Tam subactum iudicium,
 Ut alios facile secum ducere potuerit;
 Tanta vero modestia, haud raro ut maluerit sequi;
 Tanta in erratis aliorum ignoscendis humanitas,
 Ut etiam in iis, quibus maxime adversabatur,
 Quæsierit semper, quod laudaret.
 Talis cum esset,
 Quot sibi cognitos,
 Tot sui amantes, tot prope amicos habuit;
 Inimicum certe neminem.
 Lichfieldiæ natus est
 Oxonii obiit Ann. Dom. MDCCXIX. Ætat. LVII.

Maria
 Vidua ab illo relicta
 Marmor hoc
 Viri sui memoriæ
 Semper charæ, semper honorandæ,
 M. P.

[R] A dedication to Her Royal Highness. It begins thus: 'Your Royal Highness having so graciously taken into your protection, those whom the author of these sheets, now with God, hath left behind him; and having shewn a royal regard to his memory, when, with an unusual degree of goodness and tenderness, you condescended to comfort and cherish me, his desolate widow, in the extremity of my grief, I have been encouraged to hope you will descend to receive his works also under your patronage; and do now, therefore, offer them with this address to your royal hands. He never designed them for the press; and, therefore, I kept them concealed, till pressed by persons of judgment in these matters, I consented to make them public; and having done so, I am sure I should have been wanting in duty and gratitude, had I slipt such an opportunity of publishing at the same time, the great, the many, the various, obligations laid upon me and mine for benefits valuable in themselves, and more valuable as coming from your royal hands.'

P

SMITH [Sir THOMAS], Secretary of State to King Edward VI, and afterwards to Queen Elizabeth, was born March 28, in the year 1514 [A], at Saffron-Walden in Essex. His father was John Smith of that place, Gent. [B] and his mother Agnes Charnock, of an ancient family in Lancashire. He received his school-education, in all probability in his native town of Walden [C]; and in 1526, at the age of twelve or

(1) In the Commonwealth of England, near the end.

(2) Life, &c. as above, p. 2.

(3) AEs and Monuments.

(4) Annal. Eliz. ad ann. 1577.

[A] Was born March 28, in the Year 1514. That he was born March 28; we learn from the inscription under his picture, at the beginning of his Life by Mr John Strype. And that it was in the year 1513 or 1514, we learn from himself. For he says (1), that 'the eight and twenty of March 1565, he was in the one and fiftieth yeere of his age.' From whence Mr Strype wrongfully infers, 'that he must have come into the world in the year 1512 (2).' J. Fox is also mistaken, in assigning his age to have been three and thirty in 1551, according to which he must have been born in 1518 (3). Mr Camden is nearest the truth, when he says, that he dyed in 1577, in his grand climacteric (4). And therefore the inscription on his monument is wrong, which says, he had completed the 65th year of his age.

[B] His father was John Smith of that place, Gent. He was a person of good rank and quality, being High-Sheriff of the Counties of Essex and Hertford, in the year 1538. And he was also a man of considerable wealth, for the time he lived in; for, in one year, a° 1549, he purchased a Chantry in the Church of Long Ashton in Somersetshire, with other lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester, which cost him 293l. 16s. 8d. And also the Guild or Fraternity in Great Walden lately dissolved, with divers other lands and tenements in Essex and London; for which he, with another joint-purchaser, paid 531l. 14s. 11d.—In 1545, his coat of Arms was granted him by the principal King of Arms; or rather confirmed: For the patent specifies, That he was descended of honest lineage, and his ancestors had long continued in nobility and bearing of arms; and that it was Mr Smith's desire, that the King of arms would ratify unto him his former coat, and register it in the records of his office.—He was an old favourer of the Reformed Religion, in which he brought up his son Thomas from his youth. He lies buried in Walden church. By his wife, Agnes Charnock, he had four daughters, Agnes, Margery, Alice, and Jane, which two last married; and three sons, Thomas the subject of this article; John and George. John was the chief instrument and procurer of the new erection of the Corporation of the town of Walden, a° 1549, and of the foundation of King Edward's Almshouse there. George was a merchant in London; and his posterity inherit the seat of Hill-Hall, and other estates acquired by Sir Thomas (5).

[C] He received his school-education, in all probability in his native town of Walden. There was an old School there; which, after his advancement at Court, he got erected into a royal foundation by K. Edward VI. and endowed with two Mills, and an annuity of twelve pounds per ann. payable out of the manor of Willingale-Spain's in Essex (6).

(5) Life of Sir Thomas Smith by J. Strype, p. 2—7.

(6) Ibid. p. 7.

[D] And

or thirteen, was sent to Queen's-college in Cambridge: where he became so eminent for learning, that King Henry VIII. chose him one of his scholars; and, for his encouragement and better maintenance, allowed him a yearly pension, as was then customary (a). In 1531, he was chosen Fellow of his college; about which time, being incited by a laudable emulation, on account of the great honor and respect paid to Dr John Redman, newly returned from foreign universities with a thorough knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages, he closely applied himself to the reading of the best authors, such as Plato, Demosthenes, Aristotle, and Cicero. By his great diligence he acquired, in about two years time, a perfect skill in Greek, and was appointed, in 1535, to read the publick Greek Lecture in the university. Upon which occasion, observing the vicious Pronunciation of that elegant and harmonious language, he and John Cheke (b) consulted about reforming that error; and brought up a new way of pronouncing Greek, which at length came to be universally received (c) [D]. Besides his public Lecture, he also read privately in his college upon Homer's Odyssey. In 1536, he was made University-Orator, which place he filled with great applause. But, not satisfied with what improvements he could make at home, he set out upon his travels in 1539; in order not only to learn the foreign languages, but also to study in the universities of France and Italy, which then abounded with very learned Professors.

(a) The Life of Sir Thomas Smith, by J. Strype, edd. 1693, 8vo. p. 1—10. T. Fuller add., that it was by that King's direction Mr Smith was sent over, and brought up beyond the seas. Worthies, in Essex, p. 328.

(b) See above, the article CHEKE [JOHN].

(c) Strype, as above, p. 12, &c.

At

[D] And brought up a new way of pronouncing Greek, which at length came to be universally received.] Custom had established a very improper and false manner of sounding some of the Greek vowels and diphthongs: For, i, u, e, ei, o, ui, were all then pronounced as ie ue. This disparaged extremely the pronunciation of that fine language: 'When the reader had almost nothing else to speak, but mournful sounds, and that sniveling i (7).' He therefore and Mr Cheke conferred seriously about this matter. They perceived, that the vulgar method of pronouncing Greek was evidently false; it being absurd, that so many different letters and diphthongs should have but one and the same sound. And they found it difficult to teach that language well, by reason of this great confusion. They proceeded to search Authors (not having seen yet Dionysius Halicarnassens), in order to arrive at a certainty. But the modern writers little availed them: For they had not yet perused Erasmus's Book, De reſta Latini Græcique Sermonis pronuntiatione. Tho' they both observed these palpable errors, they could not agree among themselves; especially concerning the pronunciation of the letters ii ue and u ψιλον. They dreaded the Effects of an unusual Sound, which, by reason of its Novelty, would be both difficult and disagreeable. Soon after, having got Erasmus's Book, and Terentianus de Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus, et Metris, they began to reform privately the Pronunciation of the Greek, but did not venture to communicate it to any but their most intimate and familiar friends. When they had sufficiently accustomed themselves to this new method of Pronunciation, which they liked more and more by reason of its fulness and sweetness, they determined to make trial of it publickly. It was agreed that Mr Smith should begin. He read at that time Aristotle de Republicâ, in Greek, as he had done some years before. And that the Novelty of the pronunciation might give the less offence, he used this artifice; viz. Of letting, in his reading, now and then a word fall, uttered in the new correct sound: 'To the end, that if his Auditors utterly disliked it, he might defer his project for a while; or if they approved of it, he might briskly go on. At first no notice was taken of it; but when he repeated it oftner, they began to listen more attentively. Especially his pronouncing ii and oi, as e and oi, being frequently observed, they could not think it a slip of the tongue, but design; and laughed at the unusual sounds. He again, as though his tongue had slipped, would sometimes correct himself, and say the word again after the old manner. But when he did this daily, some of his friends came to him, and told him what they had observed in his Lectures. He owned to them, he had been thinking of something privately, but that it was not yet sufficiently digested, and prepared for the publick. Upon the rumour of this, many others came to him; whom he desired to have patience, 'till their ears were accustomed to the new sounds, and the prejudice of novelty worn off. And so by degrees he explained to them the whole reason of his new pronunciation. In his private readings upon Homer's Odyssey, he more plainly and openly shewed and determined the difference of the sounds. Many came, that they might learn from him how to frame their mouths to utter those new and true sounds. And it is not to be expressed, with what greediness and affection this was received among the young scholars. The following winter, there was acted in St John's college the Greek play of Aristophanes called Plutus, in this new pronunciation, and one or two more of his comedies; when it was observed, that none of those who understood Greek thoroughly, or were accounted learned, shewed any dislike or opposition. This method of pronouncing was followed by John Ponet, Mr Smith's pupil, and successor in his lecture, afterwards bishop of Winchester; and also by Mr Roger Ascham, another of his successors, tho' he disliked it for a while; and even by Dr John Redman, public Professor of Divinity, a man of great learning and reputation (8). Thus by Mr Smith's unwearied pains and endeavours, was the Greek language restored to itself, as it was spoken when Greece was in its most flourishing condition. And by undeniable Authorities from Plato, Dionysius, Thucydides, and Demosthenes, he made out that he was in the right (9). Cheke, when he was appointed Professor of the Greek tongue, proceeded in the same method. But Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and Chancellor of the university of Cambridge, dreading all Innovations, and observing that these endeavours of bringing in a new pronunciation of the Greek, came chiefly from persons suspected to be no friends to Popery; he made a solemn Decree against that way (10). Some time after, Mr Smith waiting upon the Bishop, entered into discourse upon that subject; and finding him immoveable, told him, in a mild and ingenious way, that for his part he could read both ways, the new and the old, that he might offend none for a matter of so small importance. Adding, that 'even Stammering deserved praise, if he that did so, would speak plainly, when there was occasion (11) according to that of the Apostle, I am debtor both to fools and wise.' Thus pleasantly did Mr Smith comply with the Bishop, and yet tacitly gave him a severe reproof for his obstinacy.—During the course of his Travels abroad, he recommended to all the Learned, with whom he conversed, his new way of Pronunciation, and endeavoured to establish it to the utmost of his power.—And, after his return home, in 1542, he wrote a long and eloquent Latin letter to Gardiner, wherein he argued with much freedom the points in dispute between them. In this letter, he shewed 1st what was to be called true and right in the whole method of Sounds and Pronunciation; retrieving it from the vulgar and current use, and proposing the Antients as the best and only pattern to be imitated in this case. 2. He compared the old and the new pronunciation with that pattern; that a judgment might be formed, of what was to be corrected, and what followed. 3. He explained and vindicated his past conduct in the whole affair of the reading of Greek.—During his embassy in France, in 1568, he caused this letter to be printed at Paris by Robert Stephens, under this title, De reſta & emendatâ Linguae Græcæ Pronuntiatione, 4to, together with his other Tract concerning the correct writing and pronouncing the English Tongue: Of which an account is given in the next note (12).

(8) This is our learned author's own account, in his book De Linguae Græcæ Pronuntiat. fol. 40, 41, 42.

(9) Life, by Strype, &c. p. 13—18.

(10) See the article: CHEKE [JOHN].

(11) Balbutire, modo idem, si quando usus sit, expedite loquatur, etiam laudi dandum est.

(12) Strype, as above, p. 20—34.

[E] S,

(7) Nihil fere aliud habet ad loquendum, nisi lugubres sonos, & illud flexibile i; as Mr Smith's own words are. De reſta Pronuntiat. fol. 47, 48.

At Padua he studied the Civil Law, and went out Doctor in that faculty. During the course of his travels he grew more and more confirmed in the truth and propriety of that Pronunciation of the Greek, which he had revived, and recommended it to several learned men (d). Coming home, a very accomplished person, he retired to his college: and in 1542, having taken the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law in Cambridge, he was made the King's Professor in that faculty. In which, as well as in other branches of literature, continuing to improve himself, he came to be reckoned the best scholar in the university, not only for Rhetoric and the learned Languages, but for Mathematicks, Arithmetick, Law, Natural and Moral Philosophy, &c. And in order to communicate his knowledge, he took pupils; among whom were, Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, and John Ponet, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. About this time, Thomas Goodric, Bishop of Ely, made him Chancellor of his diocese. As he had undertaken to reform the pronunciation of the Greek, so did he also make it his business to refine and polish the English, tongue; and wrote a treatise concerning the correct writing of it, and the true founding of the letters and words (e) [E]. Moreover he endeavoured to promote true Religion in the university, having been trained in the Protestant doctrine from his youth; and secured to the utmost of his power such as were exposed to persecution, in the latter end of King Henry the Eighth's reign (f). He was at least in Deacon's Orders, and had the Rectory of Leverington in Cambridgeshire of considerable value (g); and soon after the Deanry of Carlisle (b). A man of so good a disposition, and of such bright parts as Dr Smith was, could not but be welcome and necessary, to any Court; accordingly, upon the Accession of King Edward VI. he was taken into the Lord Protector Seymour's family, and made one of his Masters of Requests: And likewise Provost of Eaton-college; and Steward of the Stannaries, he being an excellent Metallist and Chemist. Growing rich from the profits of those many gainful employments, he purchased about that time several estates [F]. In 1548, he was advanced to the important office of Secretary of State; and knighted. The same year, in the month of July, he went Embassador with Mr Thomas Chamberlayne to Brussels (i), to the Emperor's council there [G]: and returned to England, in September, leaving Chamberlayne resident at (d) Life, by Strype, &c. as above, p. 19—24.

(e) Strype, as above, p. 24, &c.

(f) Ibid. p. 35.

(g) Id. p. 37.

(b) Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. by Er. Willis, E^q; Vol. I. p. 302.

(i) Mr Chamberlayne was his brother-in-law; having married his first lady's sister, Strype, Life, &c. p. 42.

[E] So did he also make it his business to refine and polish the English tongue, and wrote a Treatise concerning the correct writing of it, &c. He maintained, that the manner of Writing many of our English words, was both absurd and improper. As for instance; in these words, Please, Sonne, Moone, To, Toe, Meane, he said, those sounds are not comprehended, which we would express; and, in some of them, the syllables are stuffed with needless letters: Which letters by themselves have their certain natures, as he observed, and being joined after that manner, have not that force which they ought to have. And again, in other words, he took notice we had no Letters that expressed what we spake, and therefore he thought it necessary to have more Letters (13). So he framed twenty-nine Letters; whereof Nineteen were Roman, Four Greek, and Six English or Saxon. The Five Vowels he augmented to Ten, by distinguishing them into Long and Short, and making certain accents over, or on the side of, those that were to be pronounced long. He allowed no Diphthongs, nor double Consonants, nor any E's at the end of words not being founded. He was for throwing out entirely, and banishing from the Alphabet, the Letter Q as useless; Ku expressing the full power of Qu. for, without the vowel U. the letter Q is never written. And the same uselessness he found to be in the letter C. for it is always expressed either by K. or S. but he retained it in his Alphabet to serve instead of Ch. (14). Mr Strype caused this Alphabet to be engraved on a copper-plate, and placed it in the Appendix to Sir Thomas's Life (15). But, in all such pretended Reformatations of our Language, the best, and indeed only certain, Method, is, To trace back the several Words wherewith it is composed, to their Primitives, in the Anglo-Saxon, and other tongues; and to spell, or write them, as near as may be, according as they are in their respective Originals. But as for the writing of them as they are pronounced, it may perhaps suit the vulgar, and the pretty fellows of the age, but is really unworthy of persons that pretend to any literature, and understand more languages than one.

[F] He purchased about that time several estates. Namely, the manor of Yarlington in Somersetshire, then worth 30 l. per ann. which cost him 300 l. and the college of Darby worth 33 l. a year, which cost him 1000 marks. He also bought a house in Channon-row, Westminster; and one in Philpot-lane, London (16): And a house in Fleet-lane, with several other tenements. Afterwards he purchased also the manor of Ankerwic in Buckinghamshire: and the reversion of Mont-halt, or Hill-hall, in Essex, which was the jointure of his second wife, made her upon her marriage with Sir John Hamden, Kt. her first husband (17).

[G] He went Embassador with Mr Chamberlayne to Brussels, to the Emperor's Council there. The design of that embassy, was, to provide against the Dangers apprehended from the French; who had possessed themselves of Scotland, and were a formidable enemy, and the more for being so near. Our Court therefore endeavoured to deprive them of the conveniency of the Ports of the Low-Countries, which were most commodious for Scotland. Sir Thomas obtained a promise from the Emperor's council, that they would not permit them to make use of those ports. But the promise was not duly observ'd; for in the latter end of the same year, both French and Scots came from Scotland, and landed at Dunkirk. This was one of the businesses of that embassy; but the chief end of it, was for raising soldiers in those parts, which they did to the number of 2000, and obtained the Emperor's leave to bring them over. There is in the Cottonian library (18), a letter of Sir Thomas to the Lord Protector Somerset, written during this embassy, which gives some account of it, and of the state of affairs in other parts, and may be acceptable to the reader. 'Tis as follows. Pleaseth it Your Grace to be advertised, That We received Your Grace's Letters the xiith of July, with the good news of the state of our Things in Scotland; for the which We most highly thank Almighty God, and your Grace. And as we do not a little rejoice at them ourselves, so we shall not fail to communicate them, as occasion shall occur, where it shall be convenient. And surely, they here have espials in Scotland as well as we, and be not ignorant of our affairs there. Nevertheless, as they pretend at the least, they be very glad to hear them of us. The rumour runneth here still, that Mr Chamberlain, and an Ambassador, came hither to take up men: And hereupon hath some offer been made unto us; but such as we could not like. Yesterday came to us a certain Almain, who brought to Yarmouth, I suppose, an ensign of footmen in the King's days that dead is: He liked so well his pay then, as he saith, he would gladly serve the King before any other Prince. We said, winter was now very near: Nevertheless, if he would write his offer, we would advertise your Grace, and know further your pleasure. He is, one Groning in Frizeland. What your Grace's pleasure shall be, that we shall

(17) Ibid. p. 226, 228.

(18) Galba, B. 12.

(13) De rella & emendata Linguæ Anglicæ Scriptione, fol. 2.

(14) Ibid. fol. 30—21, 29, 42. Strype, Life, &c. p. 27, 28.

(15) P. 5.

(16) Life, &c. p. 41, 225, 226.

at Brussels (k). About that time, he was concerned in the Reformation of Religion; and in redressing the Coin, which had been embased by the late prodigal tyrant King Henry the Eighth. In 1549, he was employed in an ecclesiastical commission, for the examination of Anabaptists and Arians; and in other commissions: and also appointed one of the Visitors of the university of Cambridge. Towards the end of that year, he seems to have been involved in his master the Duke of Somerset's troubles. He faithfully adhered to him as long as he could; and, to all appearance, lost his place of Secretary of State: for it is said in the King's Journal (l), that Mr Wotton was made Secretary: however, Sir Thomas was soon after restored again to that place. For, on the 30th of April 1551, under the name of Secretary, he was one of the persons appointed to go in the great and splendid embassy to Henry the Second of France, to treat of a marriage between that king's eldest daughter and King Edward VI (m). Thus he passed the too short reign of this amiable Prince in great reputation and prosperity. But upon Queen Mary's coming to the Crown, he was deprived of all his offices and preferments, and charged not to depart the kingdom. However, he behaved with so much address and prudence, that he had 100*l.* a year allowed him for his subsistence, and was shelter'd under the Pope's Indulgence [H]; being favoured by Bishop Gardiner of Winchester, and not molested by Boner Bishop of London. At Queen Elizabeth's happy Accession to the Throne, Sir Thomas was invited again to Court, and employed in settling the public affairs both in Church and State; particularly in revising and amending the book of Common-Prayer (n) [I]. He was likewise reinstated in his Deanery of Carlisle (o): but not in his late office of Secretary of State. In 1559, he was sent into France, with other Commissioners, when a peace was concluded between that Crown and England. And in 1562, he was sent ambassador into that kingdom, jointly with Sir Nicolas Throckmorton, where he demanded the restitution of Calais; but at length, without obtaining it, concluded a peace with France, in the beginning of the year 1564 (p). After the conclusion of that peace, he still resided in France, where he reviewed and corrected, and caused to be printed, Dr Haddon's Answer to Hierom Oforio's letter to Queen Elizabeth, admonishing her to return to Popery (q). He also finished there, or perhaps entirely composed, his treatise of 'The Commonwealth of England [K].' And, in the beginning (k) Life, by Strype, as above, p. 44, 48. and his Historical Memorials chiefly Ecclesiastical, &c. Vol. II. p. 108, 109.

(l) See that Journal, in Collection of Records, at the end of Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, Part. ii. p. 9.

(m) Strype, Life, as above, p. 48, 58.

(n) Idem, p. 59—73.

(o) Br. Willis, ubi supra, p. 303. and Strype's Annals of the Reformation, Vol. I. edit. 1725. p. 545, 546.

(p) Life, by Strype, &c. as above, p. 85—110. and Annals, Vol. I. p. 369.

(q) Life, p. 99—105, 119. and Strype's Annals, Vol. I. p. 422, &c.

' shall answer him, and all such, we require your ' Grace to know, so soon as conveniently you may.
' This man saith, If his request be too much, he will ' be content your Grace shall mitigate it as shall please
' you. He is of the land of Conte de Bury; and ' saith, He hath communicated the matter with Scep-
' perius [the Emperor's Admiral;] and he giveth him
' good comfort, that the Queen [Regent of Flanders]
' will give him license. Two Merchants of Antwerp,
' lately coming from August, [Augsburg.] saith, That
' there the Emperor compelleth every man to this In- ' terim; and that some of the cities grudging at it, he ' hath referred the Answer to Norenburgh: But that it ' is not doubted there, but that Norenburgh will do as
' the Emperor will have them. They shewed further,
' that the Emperor would have them build up their
' Monasteries again, and Abbeys, and all such things:
' And all standeth upon that answer of Norenburgh.
' Further, the Emperor hath already sent 4000 horse' men to lie about Strasburgh; and that he doth in' tend shortly to come thither, and to assay the Swit-
' zers. Nevertheless, they said, That at this Council ' was none of the Switzers, but only of B. [Berne or
' Basil.] They shewed also, that there was a saying,
' that the Emperor and the French King intended to ' part the Switzers between them, of agreement, as ' they said. But if that be, it is more like to make
' wars, than to have any long amity after that sort,
' &c. Thus having none other thing worthy of ad' vertisement to write to your Grace, I commit the ' same to Almighty God.

' Your Grace's

From Brussels,
July xixth

' Most bounden Orator

' and Servant,

' T. Smith.'

[H] And was shelter'd under the Pope's Indulgence.] For, in 1555, William Smythwick of the diocese of Bath, Esq; had obtained a very large Indulgence from Rome: Importing, that he, and any five of his friends he should nominate (excepting regulars), such as were married, and their children of both sexes should enjoy many extraordinary Indulgences, upon his petition to the then Pope, Paul IV. And the Bull ran for Indulgence to Smythwick, and his five friends and their children, as was petitioned, a quibusvis excommunicationis, suspensionis, & Interdicti, aliisque ecclesiasticis Sententiis, Censuris & Poenis, a jure vel ab homine quavis occasione vel causa latis, &c. i. e. ' From all sentences of Excommunication, Suspension and Interdict, and other Censures ecclesiastical upon whatever occasion or cause inflicted, Transgressions of any Vows or Commands of the Church, guilt of Perjuries, and of Homicide, whether casual or mental, laying violent hands upon any ecclesiastical persons, except Prelates de præterito, omissions in whole or in part of Fasts, Canonical Hours, Divine Offices, Penances enjoined: Also from all and singular their Sins, whereof they are contrite and confessed; altho' they were such for which the Apostolick see were to be consulted.' Many other Indulgences were granted by virtue of this Bull, ' as to have a portable altar, to receive the sacrament privately; in Lent, and in other fasting-times of the year, to eat eggs, butter, cheese, and other milk-meats, and flesh without scruple of conscience.' Smythwick chose Sir Thomas Smith for one of his five friends specified in the Bull, to be partaker of these privileges. And so it is expressed in an instrument, drawn and attested by Thomas Willet, publick notary; still remaining at Hill-hall. This, unquestionably, was a good protection to Sir Thomas, in those evil days*.

[I] Particularly in revising and amending the book of Common-Prayer.] Mr Strype thinks, that Sir Thomas was author of the Device for the Alteration, or Reformation, of Religion, drawn up in December 1558 (19): And which is printed in the Collection of Records, at the end of Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, Part ii (20).

[K] He also finished there, or perhaps entirely composed, his treatise of The Commonwealth of England.] So we learn from the following passage, near the conclusion of that work (21).—' I have declared summarily as it were in a Chart or Map, the forme and manner of government of England, and the policy thereof, and set before your eyes the principall points wherein it doth differ from the policie and government at this time used in France, Italy, Spaine, Germany, and all other countries, which doe follow the civill law of the Romanes, compiled by Justinian into his Pandects and Code, not in that sort as Plato made his Commonwealth, or Xenophon his Kingdom of Persia, nor as Sir Thomas Moore his Utopia, being fained Commonwealthes, such as never

* Life, &c. p. 60, &c.

(19) Annals of the Reformation, Vol. I. edit. 1725. p. 51.

(20) P. 327, &c

(21) P. 272, edit. 1635, 12mo.

(r) Life, &c. p. 115, 124.

(s) Ibid. p. 125, 126. and Camden Annal. Eliz. ad ann.

(t) Life, &c. p. 127—133. and Compleat Ambassador, p. 54.

(u) Annals of the Reformation, by J. Strype, Vol. II. p. 25. and Compleat Ambassador, &c. p. 51.

(v) Annals, &c. p. 351, &c. and Life, by Strype, p. 133—140.

ning of the year 1566, returned to his native country (r). In March 1566-7, he went again embassador extraordinary to France, to make a formal demand of Calais from the French (s). Returning to England in the beginning of May 1568, he made interest for the place of Chancellor of the Dutchy vacant by the death of Sir Ambrose Cave; but he did not succeed, it being given to Sir Ralph Sadleir. Vexed, it may be supposed, at this disappointment, and expressing too plainly his uneasiness, Sir Thomas was not employed the three years following: But retired to his country-seat, where he busied himself in rural diversions, and in acting as a Justice of Peace, particularly in punishing of witches; which was not much to his honour. In the beginning of the year 1571, he returned again to Court, and was admitted into the Privy-Council (t). The 24th of June following he was appointed Assistant to William Lord Burghley, in his office of Secretary of State (u). About this time, he was engaged in a project for transmuting iron into copper [L], which proved very expensive to him, and at last unsuccessful (w). In December 1571, he was commissioned to go Embassador into France, to make a firm Alliance offensive and defensive between that Crown and England; and also to treat privately about the match, between Queen Elizabeth and Francis Duke of Alençon. He went over to France about February 1571-2, and having successfully concluded his negotiation, returned to his native country in June 1572 (x). His Instructions are printed in the Compleat Ambassador (y). In April 1572, whilst he was abroad, the Queen conferred upon him the place of Chancellor of the Order of the Garter; and, the 24th of June following, he was constituted Secretary of State, in the room of William Lord Burghley, made Lord High-Treasurer. Having obtained, the year before, a grant of a rich parcel of land called the Ardes in Ireland, he sent a colony thither in 1572, and endeavoured to settle it, at the expence of several thousand pounds [M]. The next, and indeed the last, memorable

(x) Anna's, p. 43, 48, 87, 89, 90, 105, 142, 164. Life, p. 141—156. and Compleat Ambassador, p. 152—159, 166—172, 180, 191—211.

(y) P. 154, &c.

‘ was nor shall be, vaine imaginations, fantasies of Philosophers, to occupy the time, and to exercise their wits: but as England standeth, and is governed at this day the eight and twenty of March, Anno 1565, in the seventh yeere of the Raigne and Administration thereof by the most religious, vertuous, and noble Queene Elizabeth, daughter to King Henrie the eighth, and in the one and fiftieth yeere of mine age, when I was Embassadour for her Majesty in the Court of France, the scepter whereof at that time the noble Prince of great hope Charles Maximilian did hold, hauing then raigned foure yeeres.’ This work is divided into three books. The 1st treats of the diversities of Commonwealths, or Governments; of the King, and the several ranks and orders of men. The 2d of the Laws of this realm in general; and of the Parliament, and Courts of Justice, &c. And the 3d of Appeals, Courts of Starre-Chamber, Wards and Liveries, Dutchy-Court, Court of Requests; of wives and children; Ecclesiastical Court, &c. It was first published in 1584, 4to, and again in 1621, 4to. in the old black Gothick character: and again in 1624, and 1635, 12mo. He wrote it in Latin, as well as English; and it is comprised in one of the Volumes of the Republicæ.

[L] About this time, he was engaged in a project for transmuting iron into copper. Being of a working brain, and a philosophical head, he engaged into a project of Alchimy, hoping to transmute iron into copper. Into this chargeable, but, as was hoped gainful business, he brought Secretary Cecil, who had also a philosophical genius, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Humfrey Gilbert, and others. The first occasion of this business was from one Medley, who had by vitriol changed iron into true copper at Sir Thomas Smith's house at London, and after at his house in Essex. But this was too costly, as Sir Thomas saw, to reap any benefit from it. Therefore he proposed to find out here in England the primum Ens Vitrioli, and therewith to do the same work at a cheaper rate. Upon which, Sir Thomas, Sir Humfrey Gilbert, and our Medley entered into a company under articles to find this out: namely, That Medley should be employed in this business, at the charge of the two others, 'till by the profit he should reap from the thing found out he might bear his proportion. The place where this was to be attempted, was in the isle of Wight, or at Pool, or elsewhere. But at Winchelsey he had made the first tryal, because of the plenty of wood. He received of Sir Thomas, and Sir Humfrey 101 l. a piece, for the buying of vessels and necessaries. They removed to Pool, thinking this Ens of vitriol to be there, and took a lease of land belonging to the Lady Montjoy of, of 300 l. per annum. For the payment of which, Sir Thomas with the other two entered into a bond of 1000 l. While these things were in this state, Sir Thomas went em-bassador to France in 1572, and a quarrel then happening between Medley and Sir Humfrey (and Medley, gone to Ireland, being reported to be run away) the business lay asleep for some time. But Sir Thomas revived it at his return; tho' he found arrears of rent, and wages due to workmen, &c. to the amount of 200 l. and no copper nor any crocus of copper made. About December 1574, he persuaded the Lord Treasurer Burghley, and the Earl of Leicester, to enter into the Society; which they did, after due examination, and deposited each 100 l. towards carrying on the business. Medley was now removed to Anglesey, where was proper fuel, earth, and water, sufficient to do it for ever, or at least for a very long time. The things he undertook to do, were these: To make of raw iron good copper, and of the same weight and proportion, abating one part in six; as 600 tun of iron should by boyling make 500 tun of perfect copper. The liquor wherein the iron was boyled, to make copperas and allom ready for the merchant: which, keeping the price they then bore, should, of the liquor of 500 tun of copper, be worth 10000 l. that is, for every tun 2000 l. There appearing a great probability of success in the undertaking, Sir Thomas got a patent signed, in January 1574, for the Society, which was therein styled, ‘The Society of the new Art.’ But, after many delays and disappointments, all the hopes and prospects of great Gains vanished into smoke. Sir Thomas smarted in his purse for his chymical covetousness; Gilbert seems to have been impoverished by it; and Medley was beggered: the common end of most alchymists, and projectors (22).

[M] Having obtained—a grant of a rich parcel of land called the Ardes in Ireland, he sent a colony thither, &c. This is a rich and pleasant country, or peninsula, on the eastern coast of Ulster, and of considerable extent, lying well for trade by sea. It was formerly the estate of the Savages, an English family; one of which is famous for that stout and witty saying, ‘That he would not rely upon a castle of stones, but a castle of bones,’ meaning his own body. Afterwards the O'Neals took it out of their hands; but they being attainted of treason, Sir Thomas got a grant of that district from Queen Elizabeth (23): whereby he was to be Lieutenant-general there for war, and for the distribution of lands, orders, and laws in the matters pertaining thereunto. In a word, to obtain and govern the country to be won, following instructions and orders to him to be directed from the Queen and her council; and this for the first seven years. Afterwards the government of the country to return to such officers as the customs and laws of England did appoint, except the Queen should think him worthy to be appointed Governor thereof, as being a frontier-country. The right to remain only in him, as to the inheritance; the authority to muster and call together

(22) Life, &c. p. 133—140.

(23) Camden Britannia, Vol. II. col. 1403.

memorable action of his, was in 1575, when he procured an Act of Parliament for the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the two colleges of Eaton and Winchester; importing, that, in all college-leases, a third part at least of the old rent should be reserved and paid in corn [N]; that is to say, in good wheat at the rate of six shillings and eight pence the quarter, or under, and good malt at the rate of five shillings the quarter, or under. About the year 1576, he began to be afflicted with a violent defluxion upon the glands of his mouth and throat; which having kept him in a decaying, consumptive, and wasting condition all that year, and part of the next, put an end to his life on the 12th of August 1577, in the 63d year of his age. During his lingering illness, he diverted part of his melancholy hours in looking over his papers and manuscripts [O], of some of which an account is given below. He was buried in the chancel of the church of Theydon-Mount, in which parish Hill-hall stands: and a handsome monument was erected to his memory [P]. By his will he gave all his Latin and Greek books to Queen's college in Cambridge, the place of his education; with a great globe of his own making: and a rent-charge of 12*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* [Q]. Notice is taken below, of the several pieces of his own composition [R]. Sir Thomas Smith was of a fair sanguine complexion; and had a calm together his soldiers throughout the same country, and to dispose of them upon the frontiers, as he should see cause for the better defence of the country. His natural, and only, son Thomas Smith was joynd with him in the patent; and, under his conduct, he sent a colony thither, which did good service against one Sarleboy, and other Irish rebels. But Mr Smith being intercepted, in the beginning of the year 1573, by a wild Irishman, was thrown alive to the dogs, and destroyed (24). The settling of this colony cost Sir Thomas above 10000*l.* without his reaping any benefit from it. After his death the Ardes were lost to his heirs, being begged of King James I. by some of his Scottish favourites, particularly one Hamilton. And in vain did Sir Thomas and Sir Edward Smith petition the crown, after the Restoration, and the Revolution, for the recovery of so valuable an estate (25).

[N] He procured an Act of Parliament for the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the two colleges of Eaton and Winchester; importing, that in all college-leases, a third part at least of the old rent should be reserved and paid in corn.] This is further explained in the act, thus. — 'To be delivered yearly upon days prefixed at the said colleges, &c. And for default thereof to pay the said Colleges in ready money at the election of the said Leases, after the rate as the best wheat and malt in the market of Cambridge, and in the market of Oxford, and of Winchester and Windfor, for the rents that were to be paid to the use of the Houses there, were, or should be, sold the next market-day before the said rent should be due, without fraud or deceit.' — T. Fuller saith (26), that 'Sir Thomas Smith was the chief procurer of the passing of this act, and is said by some to have surprized the House [of Commons] therein, where many could not conceive how this would be at all profitable to the Colledge, but still the same on the point, whether they had it in money, or wares. But the politick Knight took the advantage of the present cheap year, knowing thereafter grain would grow dearer, mankinde daily multiplying, and licence being lately legally given for transportation. At this day, much emolument redowndeth to the antient Colledges in each University by the passing of this Act, so that though their Rents stand still, their Revenues doe increase.'

[O] He diverted part of his melancholy hours in looking over his papers, and manuscripts.] Particularly, his book Of the Value of the Roman Coins according to the English Standard. This he had composed, when he was Secretary to King Edward VI; upon a question put to him by his fellow-secretary Sir William Cecil, viz. 'What was the ordinary Wages of a Soldier at Rome.' But he had lost it, as well as several others written by him in his youth. He remembered, he had sent one copy of it to Sir Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester, and another to Sir William Cecil. Upon searching the Earl's study, the copy sent to him could not be found. Wherefore Sir Thomas requested the Lord Treasurer Cecil, to look for his copy: especially he desired the Tables, which were exactly and plainly drawn up. For, searching among his old Papers, he could find the first draught of that Book, and the Adversaria; whereby he was able to fill up all the Chapters in a manner as they were at first: But the Tables, or any Draughts of them, he could not find. Therefore he prayed the Lord Treasurer, in his letter dated April 22d, 1576, to look out the 'Book, especially the Tables.' His Lordship having found the book and Tables among his papers, sent them to Sir Thomas. Mr Camden, in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, calls this Treatise an exact commentary, worth publishing (27). The industrious Mr Strype made great enquiry after the compleat Book, but without success: at length he met with Sir Thomas's rude draught of it, in several Tables of his own hand-writing; of which he hath published a true extract, at the end of his Life of Sir Thomas Smith (28).

[P] And a handsome monument was erected to his memory.] At the top of it is this English Stanza

What Earth, or Sea, or Skies contain,
What creatures in them be,
My mind did seek to know;
My foul the heavens continuallie.

The rest of his Epitaph is in Latin, and so much of it as contains his character, is in these words. — Juris civilis supremo titulo etiamnum adolescens insignitus; Orator, Mathematicus, Philosophus excellentissimus; Linguarum Latinæ, Græcæ, Hebraicæ, Gallicæ etiam & Italicæ callentissimus: Proborum & ingeniosorum hominum Factor eximius; Plurimis commodans, Nemini nocens; Ab injuriis ulciscendis alienissimus: Denique Sapientia, Pietate, Integritate insignis: Et in omni Vita, seu æger seu valet, intrepidus mori. — i. e. 'Adorned with the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law, when he was but very young; A most excellent Orator, Mathematician, and Philosopher: Well skill'd in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, and Italian languages: A great favourer of good and ingenious men; Lending to many, hurting none; Free from all inclination to Revenge: In a word, remarkable for Wisdom, Piety, and Integrity: And all his life, whether well or ill, not afraid to dye.' —

[Q] And a rent-charge of twelve pounds seven shillings and four pence.] Payable out of the maner of Overston in Northamptonshire. Which he appointed to be thus disposed of; viz. Four pounds for a Lecture in Arithmetick: Three pounds for a Coemetry-Lecture: Four pounds seven shillings and four pence for two Scholarships; directing, that his own relations, or the Scholars from Walden-School, cæteris paribus, should be made his Scholars before any others: And the Twenty shillings remaining, for a yearly commemoration (29).

[R] Notice is taken — of the several pieces of his own composition.] Besides his two Treatises, De rellâ & emendata Linguæ Græcæ Pronunciatione; and, 'of the correct Writing and Pronouncing the English Tongue:' as also his book 'Of the Commonwealth of England;' mentioned above in Notes [D] and [E] — he wrote, four Orations, for and against Queen Elizabeth's marriage; thus intituled, 1. Agamem, or Wedspite, his Oration for the Queen's single Life. 2. Philoxenus, or Love-Alien, his Oration for the Queen's marrying with a Stranger. 3. Another Oration upon the same subject. 4. Jenius, or Home-friend, his Oration for the Queen's Majesty's Marrying with an English Nobleman, rather than any foreign Prince. Published in the Appendix to Sir Thomas's

(27) Annal. Eli-
zab. ad ann.
1577.

(28) Appendix,
No. V. p. 128,
&c.

(29) Life, &c.
p. 224.

(24) Camd. Britannia, ibid. and Life, as above,
p. 176, &c.

(25) Life, p.
276—183, and
Appendix, p.
224.

(26) Hist. of the Universitie of Cambridge, p.
244.

a calm ingenious countenance, as appears by his picture hanging in the parlour at Hill-hall, said to have been done by Hans Holbein: which represents him with a round cap on his head, and in a Civilian's gown; a great ruby-ring upon his fore-finger, with a curious seal; (which ring is still preserved in the family,) laying one of his hands upon a globe (z). Mr Strype informs us, that he was one of the best scholars of his age; a great admirer of the Platonick Philosophy; a good Physician and Chymist; an excellent Mathematician, Astronomer, and Arithmetician; a cunning Politician; master of the Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and English languages; a great Historian, especially in the Roman History; a compleat Orator; well skilled in architecture, gardening, &c. And, as to his Virtuous accomplishments; he was a sincere Protestant; exemplary, for Truth and Integrity, for an inviolable love to Justice and Uprightness, a most unchangeable Faithfulness and Zeal to the concerns of his Queen and country. His life and manners were unreprouable; he was of a grave and yet obliging behaviour; a perfect stranger to the too common practices of Courts, Fraud and Falsehood, Flattery and Treachery, Vice and Debauchery. He was likewise of a resolute and active mind; and of universal Charity and Benevolence towards all mankind (a). He had two wives; the first was, Elizabeth daughter of William Karkek, or Carkyke, of London, Gent. and the second, Philippa, widow of Sir John Hamden: but leaving no issue by either of them, and his natural son being killed in Ireland as is above related, his estates descended to his brother George's son, Sir William Smith, who dyed in 1626, and whose posterity have enjoyed them ever since (b).

(z) Life, &c. as above, p. 176—204.

(a) Life, p. 211, &c.

(b) Life, by Strype, p. 42, 203, 211—236.

(30) No. III. P. 7, &c.
(31) P. 154, 166, 169, 176, 191—202, 230, 236, 238, 252, 253, 262, 274, 282, 299, 310, 315, 324, 333, 346.
(32) Edit. Oxon. 1703, p. 423.

mas's Life, by Mr Strype (30). — Several of his Letters to the Lord Burleigh, and Sir Francis Walsingham, are printed in the Compleat Ambassador, &c. (31). — One of his Letters to Roger Ascham, is printed among that learned and polite Writer's (32): who frequently makes mention of him in the most obliging and respectful terms. — Great many of his Dispatches and Letters are preserved in the Paper-Office: and some of his MSS. are dispersed, and remain in private hands. — Mr Strype says, that 'there ' is a Book printed in 1685. which some make him ' the Author of, namely, The Authority, Form, and ' Manner of holding Parliaments.' But, upon inspection, it appears only to be the second and third Chapters of the second book of his Commonwealth of England; prefixed to a little book, intit'led, Arcana Parliamentaria: ' or Precedents concerning Elections, ' Proceedings, Privileges, and Punishments in Parliament.' Lond. 1685. 12mo. C

SMITH [THOMAS], a learned English Divine, and author of several books, in the beginning of this century, and part of the last, was the son of Mr John Smith of Ail-hallows Barking, London (a), and born in that parish June 3, 1638 [A]. In the year 1657, he was admitted Battler of Queen's-college in Oxford, and soon after Clerk of the fame. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts March 15, 1660 [B], and that of Master October 13, 1663 (b), he was chosen, in 1663, Master of the free-school adjoining to Magdalen-college: and, in 1666, he was made perpetual Fellow of that college. He was then remarkable for his great skill in the oriental languages [C]. In August 1668, he went as Chaplain to Sir Daniel Harvey, Embassador to Constantinople [D], and returned thence in 1671. Five years after he travelled into France; and, after a short stay there, became Chaplain to Sir Joseph Williamson, one of the Principal Secretaries of State, with whom he continued many years, and was very serviceable to him, but at length was dismissed without any preferment, or reward (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, October 29, 1671 (d). In 1677, he was solicited by Bishop Pearson, Bishop Fell, and Dr Lloyd then Dean of Bangor and afterwards successively Bishop of St Asaph and Worcester, and others; to return into the East by the way of Venice, in order to collect antient Manuscripts, especially of the Greek Fathers [E]; but the

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 1020.

(b) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 127, 151.

(c) Wood, Ath. ut supra.

(d) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 195.

(1) No. V. p. 296.

(2) Vol. III. p. 128. note. and Vol. V. p. 138.

(3) Wood, Fasti, col. 127.

(4) Idem, Ath. col. 1020.

(5) No. 230. p. 527.

(6) Vol. I. of the 8vo edition, p. 21, &c. and of the folio edit. p. 11, 12.

[A] And born in that parish, June 3, 1638.] The time of his birth he expressly mentions in a letter to Mr Hearne, published by the latter in the Appendix to his Collection of curious Discourses (1). See also Mr Hearne's edition of Leland's Itinerary (2).

[B] Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, March 15, 1660.] He was recommended to the Chancellor of the university, by Dr Barlow the Provost of his college, for his progress in learning far beyond his age and standing, and therefore would be capable of a place designed for him towards his subsistence, if he had taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, for which he wanted a little time. Whereupon the Chancellor desired that he might be dispensed with, for the want of two terms, which was accordingly done (3).

[C] He was then remarkable for his great skill in the oriental languages.] And therefore was commonly called Rabbi Smith, and Tograï Smith; to distinguish him from others of his name in the university (4).

[D] In August 1668, he went as Chaplain to Sir Daniel Harvey embassador to Constantinople.] He wrote a journal of his voyage, which is inserted in the Philosophical Transactions (5). — Of Sir Daniel Harvey there is a good account, in the Earl of Clarendon's Life (6).

[E] In 1677, he was solicited ——— to return into the East by the way of Venice, in order to collect antient Manuscripts, especially of the Greek Fathers.] He hath given an account of that Proposal, in a Latin Letter to Mr Hearne; published by the latter in the Appendix to John of Glastonbury's Chronicle (7), an extract of which is as follows:

' ——— D. Pearsonus ——— consilio communicato
' Viris plurimum reverendis et doctissimis, D. Joanni
' Fello, Episcopo Oxoniensi, et D. Guilielmo Lloydio,
' Decano Bangoriensi, mox Episcopo Asaphensi, et
' jam Wigorniensis, aliisque, pari vetustissima primæ
' mæxæ Ecclesiæ monumenta, quorum meminerunt
' Eusebius, S. Hieronymus, et Photius, quæ hæcenus
' desiderantur, recuperandi, inque publicam lucem
' è reconditis recessibus, si forte ibi occulerentur,
' afferendi zelo, amore, et desiderio incensis, apud
' hosce præclarissimos Triumviros de idoneo homine in
' Orientem hac de re mittendo anno M.DC.LXXXVII.
' ferio deliberatum erat. Spes enim bonas alebant,
' S. Clementis * Romanas binas Epistolas integras,
' Epistolarum S. Ignatii Syllogen. à S. Polycarpo
' factam, una cum hujus ad Philippenfes Epistola,
' Acta Martyrii tum S. Ignatii, tum S. Polycarpi,
' Hegeppi Historiam Ecclesiasticam, Græcum librorum
' S. Irenæi

(7) Vol. II. p. 470.

* Qu. Romani.

the dangers of the voyage, and other considerations, made him decline that otherwise advantageous proposal (e). Having already given the world some monuments of his extensive learning [F], he published, in 1678, Remarks upon the Manners, Religion, and Government of the Turks: with a Survey of the Seven Churches of Asia [G]. And, in 1680, An Account of the Greek Church [H]; as also some other pieces soon after

(e) Vide Append. ad Johann's Constantinensis Chronica, Vol. II. p. 470, &c.

S. Irenæi adversus hæreses exemplar, Origenem, præsertim ἐπι ἀρχαῖς, aliosque quamplurimos incorruptæ antiquitatis libros, ex quibus ingens rei Christianæ lumen esset affulsurum, illic adhuc latere, idque quidem verisimillimum videri antea suggesteram. Ita autem de me bene sentiebant, quasi huic negotio qualiquammodo præstando non plane impar fuissem, me, tunc temporis sacro munere facellani apud D. J. W. [Williamson] alterum à primariis, uti pro more vulgari loquimur, Statûs Secretariis fungentem, propolitis lautis conditionibus, amplexu comæatu, invitarunt, ut Constantinopolim, unde ante sexennium redieram, remigrare vellem, si ex Venetiis compendiosam viam versus montem Athon, adscito in socium itineris aliquo Græco sacerdote, ingredi non liceret: deinde ut ad celeberrimas Asiæ Minoris urbes, puta Smyrnam, Nicæam, Nicomediam, et Ancyram, et denique in Ægyptum, tanquam hujus peregrinationis metam, me conferrem, Græcos codices supradictos, aliosque supparis ævi, si qui occurrissent, inspecturus, assignatis duobus tribusve pro mora extra patriam annis: interim se omnia fidei, industriæ, prudentiæ, imo et arbitrio meo relicturos lubentes profiterentur. Sed in hac re gravissima maxime momenti nihil erat subito et temere statuendum videbatur: imo longa et matura deliberatione opus erat. Stimulabant quidem ab una parte de re Christiana et literaria bene merendi desiderium; virorum clarissimorum, qui mihi optime volebant, consilia et suasiones; et insita quædam regiones, quas olim levi pede præterieram, iterum visendi, tum in novas, aliasque longinquiores, penetrandi curiositas: Sed ab altera parte multa intercessere, quæ singulas circumstantias sedatori animo perpendentem ab hoc incepto dimoverunt: cujusmodi erant, certa, in quæ me conjecturus essem, pericula; incommoda, eaque fere innumera, quasi ineluctabiliter subeunda, quibus sustinerendis, an vires suppetere, plane animo dubius hærerem; discrimen, idque non vanum, si qua ægritudine fatiscerem, mortis vix evitandæ, contra quam nulla ex arte medica remedia in media ista barbarie, quacum mihi conflegendum erat, peti possent; justa potius cujuspiam Ecclesiasticæ dignitatis, quæ me lætabat vir ille amplissimus, cui, neglectis aliorum patrocinii, me totum dederam, et ad quam, posthabito omni illicito indebitoque ambitu, aspirare fas erat, expectatio; importunæ Propinquoꝝ preces, ne me, qui tot pericula tam mari quam terra ex summa divina benignitate ægre evasissem, in extremum discrimen iterum dare præcipitem; maxime vero viri optimi et sapientissimi D. P. W. cujus consulta et responsa, tanquam oracula, revererebar, objurgationes, imo et exprobrationes, quod tam facilem patientemque aurem istiusmodi blandis compellationibus adhiberem: hæc omnia meditantem plane absterruerunt, magnumque ad deprimendam lancem, in æquilibrio pendentem, momentum et pondus attulerunt, ne huic honorificæ legationi suscipiendæ consentirem (8).

The substance of this relation is. That it was proposed, he should visit mount Athos, accompanied with a Greek Priest; and thence proceed into Asia-Minor, to Smyrna, Nicæa, Nicomedia, Ancyra, and into Egypt; in order to find out the two entire Epistles of Clemens Romanus, the Collection of St Ignatius's Epistles made by Polycarp, Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians, Hegesippus's Ecclesiastical History, the Greek original of Irenæus against Heresies, several pieces of Origen, especially his treatise concerning Principles, &c. But the difficulties and dangers of the voyage, among barbarous nations, who had no physicians if he should have fallen ill; the discouragements and persuasions of his friends and relations; and the just expectation he had of good preferment from his patron Sir Joseph Williamson, prevailed upon him not to accept of this advantageous offer: tho' he was well disposed to serve in that respect the Christian world. — What he did not think fit to undertake, was afterwards effected by the late learned Archbishop Wake; who kept a Grecian Gentleman in pay, to search for Manuscripts in the East. By that means, his Grace procured several valuable ones, particularly a curious old Lectionary on vellum, containing the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles: and many others.

VOL. VI. No CCCXI.

[F] Having already given the world some monuments of his extensive learning. He published, I. Diatriba de Chaldaicis Paraphrasis, eorumque versionibus, ex utraque Talmude & scriptis Rabbiorum concinnata. Oxon. 1662, 8vo. i. e. A Dissertation upon the Chaldeæ Paraphrasts, and their versions, taken from both Talmuds, and the writings of the Rabbins. II. Syntagma de Druidum Moribus ac Institutis. Lond. 1664. 8vo. i. e. A Treatise concerning the manners and customs of the Druids. III. Sermons. 1. A Sermon preached before the Company of Merchants trading into the Levant, at St Olave's Hart-street in London, June 2, 1668, on 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20. Lond. 1668, 4to. 2. A Sermon of the Credibility of the Myteries of the Christian Religion, preached before a learned audience, on 1 Tim. iii. the former part of the 16th verse. To which is added, An Appendix containing a Dissertation about the Authenticalness of that famous Text in St John's first Epistle. [Chap. v. 7.] Lond. 1675, 4to. — And, to bring in one view all the Sermons made public by him; he published, 3. A Sermon concerning the Doctrine, Unity, and Profession of the Christian Faith, preached in St Mary's Church in Oxford, on Ephes. iv. 5. To which is added An Appendix concerning the Apostles Creed. Lond. 1682. 4to. 4. A Sermon about frequent Communion, preached before the University of Oxford, Aug. 17, 1679, on 1 Cor. xi. 26. Lond. 1685, 4to. IV. De Causis & Remediis Dissidiorum quæ orbem Christianum hodie affligunt, exercitatio Theologica in Rom. cap. iv. ver. 19. Oxon. 1675. 4to. Printed afterwards among his Miscellanea, mentioned below: And translated by him into English, under this title, 'A Pacific Discourse: or, the Causes and Remedies of the Differences about Religion, which distract the Peace of Christendom.' Lond. 1688, 4to.

[G] Remarks upon the Manners, Religion, and Government of the Turks, &c. This book he wrote first in Latin, and published it in two Letters; with this title, V. Epistolæ duæ, quarum altera de Moribus & Institutis Turcarum agit, altera Septem Asiæ Ecclesiarum notitiam continet. Oxon. 1672, 8vo. Afterwards he added two Letters more, and made the title thus, Epistolæ quatuor, quarum duæ de Moribus ac Institutis Turcarum agunt; & duæ Septem Asiæ Ecclesiarum & Constantinopoleos notitiam continent. Oxon. 1674, 8vo. And understanding that a person was about translating them into English, he was necessitated to do it himself, with some few enlargements (9). The title of his book thus translated, is, 'Remarks upon the Manners, Religion and Government of the Turks. Together with a Survey of the Seven Churches of Asia, as they now lye in their ruins: And a brief Description of Constantinople.' Lond. 1678, 8vo. It is very entertaining, and he has inserted several Greek Inscriptions in his Survey of the Seven Churches of Asia.

[H] And in 1680, An Account of the Greek Church. This also was written at first by him in Latin, and published under this title, VI. De Græcæ Ecclesiæ bodierno Statu. Oxon. 1676, 8vo. Reprinted, with additions and corrections, at London 1678, 8vo. There was inserted, at the end, An Account of the State of the Greek Church, under Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Constantinople, with a Relation of his sufferings and death: and Hymnus Matutinus, taken from the Alexandrian MS. Gr. and Lat. He translated it afterwards himself into English, and intitled it, 'An Account of the Greek Church, as to its Doctrine and Rites of Worship: with several Historical Remarks interspersed, relating thereunto. To which is added, an account of the State of the Greek Church, under Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Constantinople, with a Relation of his Sufferings and Death.' Lond. 1680, 8vo. In the Preface he observes, 'that you will here clearly see, with what great difficulties

(9) See his Preface.

(f) See above the article ROE [Sir THOMAS.]

(g) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 1020.

(h) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 221.

(i) Ath. ut supra. It is a very low and watry situation.

(k) An impartial Relation of the whole Proceedings against St Mary Magdalen College in Oxon. Printed in 1688, 4to. p. 2, 24, 36, 37, 39.

(l) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 1020.

(m) Vide Præfat. ad Catalogum Librorum MSS. Bibliothecæ Cottonianæ.

after [I]. In 1679, it was designed that he should be employed, in transcribing and publishing the Alexandrian Manuscript of the Greek Bible, in the Royal Library (f), and to have for his reward, as King Charles II. had promised, a Prebend of Westminster, or Canonry of Windsor; but that good design came to nothing (g). He proceeded Doctor in Divinity June the 22d, 1683 (h); and, on the 20th of December 1684, was presented by the President and Fellows of his college to the Rectory of Stanlake in Oxfordshire; which not liking, he resigned within a month (i). In 1687, when King James II. was endeavouring to compel Magdalen-college, in an arbitrary manner, to admit Antony Farmer for their President: our author and Captain Bagshaw, two of the Fellows, presented, April the 10th, a petition to the Earl of Sunderland President of the Council, wherein the college did humbly beseech his Majesty, either to leave them to a free election, or to recommend a qualified person. To which the only answer was, That his Majesty having sent his letter to the college, expected to be obeyed. Whereupon Dr Thomas Smith, with Dr Fairfax and Dr Pudsey, were for presenting a second address to his Majesty, before they proceeded to the election. And on the 16th of November, Dr Smith, and Mr Cheronock, were the only two Fellows, that submitted to the authority of the royal Commissioners and Visitors of the college, and acknowledged the justice of their proceedings. With whose behaviour therefore King James II. was so well satisfied, that they remained unmolested, when the rest of the Fellows were deprived (k). In January 1687-8, Dr Smith was presented to the Prebend, or Church, of Heytesbury in Wiltshire, by Dr Thomas Pierce Dean of Sarum. Notwithstanding his compliance hitherto with the Court, he would not sacrifice his Religion to them; for, in August 1688, he was deprived of his Fellowship by Bonaventure Gifford, the Popish President of Magdalen-college, because he refused to live there with the new set of Popish Fellows, being then senior Bursar. He was restored to his Fellowship, in the October following. But he lost it again July 25, 1692, as well as his preferment at Heytesbury, because he would not take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary (l). From that time, he lived chiefly in Sir John Cotton's family (m), in a studious and retired manner, and employed himself in publishing several books [K]. He

‘ the poor Eastern Christians struggle; against what ‘ mighty opposition they still maintain the profession of ‘ Christianity; and how the cross of Christ triumphs, ‘ notwithstanding the cruel mockings and insultings of
‘ the profest enemies of it; though it must be most ‘ sadly confessed, that several corruptions and errors
‘ in point of doctrine and superstitious rites and prac‘ tices in worship have crept in among them, to the ‘ great disadvantage, scandal, and dishonour of our ‘ holy Religion, which is hereby continually exposed ‘ to the censure and contempt of the Mahometans, ‘ who, dull and stupid as they are, do not pretend to ‘ examine the grounds and reasons of the Christian be‘ lief, but judge of the whole by such odd phantastick
‘ misrepresentations, and fortify their old prejudices
‘ every day more and more with fresh matter of dislike.
‘ ——— Though it is manifest to all, who understand
‘ antiquity, how much the present Greeks have in se‘ veral Points of Doctrine varied from the belief of ‘ their ancestors, and have corrupted the simplicity
‘ and purity of Religion by a mixture of odd Opinions
‘ and Fancies, they pretend notwithstanding, that ‘ their Tenents are agreeable to the Fathers, and that ‘ they follow the Traditions of the ancient Church.
‘ But without looking back much beyond this last ‘ century, whoever will compare the answers of the ‘ Patriarch Jeremias to the letters of the Divines of ‘ Wittenberg in the year 1576, with their Confession
‘ of Faith published in the year 1662, and with the ‘ Bethleemitick Synod held in the year 1671, will find ‘ such a vast difference between the modesty of that ‘ Patriarch, and their bold determinations, as will en-‘ cline any sober and considering man to believe, that ‘ they have of late more than ever been wrought upon ‘ by the sly artifices and insinuations and under-hand
‘ dealing of the subtle emissaries of Rome, who watch ‘ continually over the poor Greeks, and take advan‘ tage of their Poverty and Distress to bring them to a ‘ further compliance, and in time, to a downright ‘ subjection. [viz. to the Church of Rome.]——
‘ This design of the Romanists, which has been carry‘ ing on for so many years, was soon discovered by ‘ Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Constantinople, a man ‘ of great parts, and of an extraordinary courage, who ‘ was resolved to give a check and put a stop to it, as ‘ much as in him lay, and by degrees to reform those ‘ abuses and errors, that had prevailed among the ‘ Greeks, and introduce a stricter alliance and union
‘ of the Eastern Church with the Reformed Churches
‘ of Christendome. This drew upon him the indigna‘ tion of Urban the eighth, then Pope, and the Con‘ gregation of Cardinals de propagandâ Fide, as they ‘ speak at Rome, who knew no good could be done, ‘ while he sat upon the Patriarchall throne. And ‘ therefore finding, after several attempts to bring him ‘ over by fair means to relinquish his pretensions, that ‘ he was too stout and too honest to submit to their ‘ overtures and proposals, they made use of several ‘ evil arts to dethrone him; and in order thereunto

‘ blackened and defamed him with a thousand calum‘ nies, and pursued him with unwearied diligence
‘ and malice, and never desisted ’till they had got him ‘ strangled.’

[I] As also some other pieces soon after.] Namely,
VII. ‘ A Voyage from England to Constantinople.’
Printed in the Philosophical Transactions (10). VIII (10) No. 230, ‘ Historical Observations relating to Constantinople.’ P. 527.
Printed in the same Transactions (11). IX. ‘ An (11) No. 152, ‘ Account of Prusa in Bithynia; and the Observations P. 335. Octob.
‘ in Turkey continued.’ Printed in the same Transac- 1683.
tions (12). X. Conjectures about Under-Currents in (12) No. 155, the Downs, at the Streights of Gibraltar’s mouth, and P. 431. Jan.
in the Baltick. Printed in the same Transactions (13). 1683 4.
XI. Miscellanies; Miscellanea, in quibus continentur, (13) No. 158,
1. Præmonitio ad Lectorem de Infantum Communionem apud P. 564. 1684.
Græcos. 2. Defensio Libri de Græcæ Ecclesiæ Statu
contra Objectiones Authoris Historiæ Criticæ, &c. 3.
Brevis & Succincta Narratio de vitâ, studiis, & martiryrio D. Cyrilli Lucaris, Patriarchæ Constantinop. 4.
Commentatio de Hymnis matutinis & vespertinis Græcorum. 5. Exercitatio Theologica de causis remediisque Dissidiorum, &c. Lond. 1686, 8vo. Some of these had been printed before. See Note [F] XII. ‘ The ‘ Life of St Mary Magdalen of Pazzi, a Carmelite ‘ Nunn. Newly translated out of Italian by the Reve‘ rend Father Lezin de Sainte Scholastique, Provincial ‘ of the Reformed Carmelites of Touraine.’ Printed at Paris 1670. And now done out of French: With a preface concerning the nature, causes, concomitants, and consequences of Ecstasy and Rapture, and a brief discourse added about discerning and trying the Spirits, whether they be of God. Lond. 1687, 4to.

[K] And employed himself in publishing several Books.
After the Revolution, he published, XIII. V. Cl. Gu-lielmi Camdeni, et illustrium Virorum ad G. Camdenum Epistolæ. Cum Appendice varii argumenti. Accesserunt Annalium regni Regis Jacobi I. Apparatus, et Commentarius de Antiquitate, Dignitate, & Officio Comitum Mar-rescalli Angliæ. Præmittitur G. Camdeni Vita. Scrip-tore, Thoma Smitho, S. T. D. Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Presbytero. Lond. 1691, 4to. i. e. Letters to and from Mr Camden, with an Appendix. To which are added
Annals,

He died at London May the 11th, 1710 (n), and was buried, two days after, in St Anne's Church. His writings sufficiently manifest his universal learning; but his style, especially his Latin style, is somewhat intricate, and too full of long periods.

(n) Mr Hearne's edition of Leland's Itinerary, Vol. III. p. 128. In note.

Annals, or rather Memorials, of the reign of King James I. And a Treatise of the Antiquity, Dignity, and Office of the Earl Marthal of England. With verses and epitaphs composed by Mr Camden. To the whole is prefixed Mr Camden's Life. XIV. Miscellanea, in quibus continentur Responso ad nuperas D. Simonii in libro super fide Græcorum de dogmate Transubstantiationis cavillationes. Dissertatio, in qua integritas illius celeberr. loci 1. Epist. S. Johannis cap. 5. ver. 7. vindicatur. Defensio superius Dissertationis contra exceptiones D. Simonii in Criticâ Historiâ Novi Testam. Commentar. in 2 S. Petri. Lond. 1692. 4to. XV. Catalogus Librorum Manuscriptorum Bibliothecæ Cottonianæ. Cui præmittuntur Illustræ viri, D. Roberti Cottoni, Equitis Aurati & Baronetti, Vita: et Bibliothecæ Cottonianæ Historia & Synopsis. Scriptore Thoma Smitho, Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Presbytero. Oxon. 1696. fol. But had this Catalogue of the Cottonian Library been more particular than it is, it would have been much more useful; as Mr D. Casley has shewn, in his Catalogue of the Royal Library. XVI. Inscriptiones Græcæ Palmyrenorum, cum Scholiis & annotationibus Edwardi Bernardi & Thome Smithi. Utrecht, 1698, 8vo. i. e. The Greek Inscriptions at Palmyra, &c. XVII. Clarissimi ac doctissimi Viri, Joannis Gravii, olim Astronomiæ in Academia Oxoniensi Professoris Savilianii, Vita: in qua de illius Studiis, Itineribus in Italiam, ad Constantinopolim, & in Ægyptum susceptis, et Libris editis ineditisque, fuscè disseritur. Scriptore Thoma Smitho, &c. Lond. 1699. 4to. Reprinted afterwards in his Collection of Lives mentioned below. XVIII. Admodum Reverendi & doctissimi Viri D. Roberti Huntingtoni, S. Theologiæ Doctoris, et Episcopi Rapotensis, Epistolæ. Præmittitur de ejusdem D. Huntingtoni vita, studiis, peregrinationibus, & obitu Γραμμματα. i. e. The Letters, and Life, of Dr Robert Huntington, Bishop of Raphoe. At the end of which is printed, Vita clarissimi & doctissimi Viri, Edwardi Bernardi, S. Theologiæ Doctoris, et Astronomiæ apud Oxoniensēs Professoris Savilianii. Subnectitur Veterum Mathematicorum, Græcorum, Latinorum, & Arabum Synopsis. Collectore D. E. Bernardo. Lond. 1704, 8vo. i. e. The life of Edward Bernard, D. D. Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford. To which is subjoyned a Synopsis of the antient Mathematicians by Dr Bernard. XIX. Vitæ quorundam eruditissimorum et illustrium Virorum. Lond. 1707. The Lives of certain very learned and illustrious Men. This Volume contains, The Lives of James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh; John Cosin, Bishop of Durham; Henry Briggs, Savilian Professor of Geometry in Oxford; John Bainbridge, and John Greaves, Savilian Professors of Astronomy in Oxford; Peter Young, Preceptor to King James I; Patrick Young, Library-keeper to King James, and King Charles the first; and John Dec, the mathematician. XX. Ignatii Epistolæ. Oxon. 1709, 4to. A new Edition of Ignatius's Epistles.

XXI. He kept a great correspondence with Mr Tho. Hearne; having writ to him, between Novemb. 9, 1703, and April 1, 1710, no less than a hundred and sixty eight Letters; the last of which hath been published by Mr Hearne, in the Appendix to his Collection of Curious Discourses (14), and is as follows.

(14) No. 5. p. 296.

' S I R,

' I write this to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter of the 25. March. The Inscription in it I do not beleive to bee genuine (15): but of this I am not able to write more, by reason of the utter extinction of my right eye, and the weakness of my left: which forbids me to make use of it either in reading or writing for above four or five minutes at a time: which together with an inflammation in my other uselesse eye gives mee extreme great paine, and that continued: so that I am forced, to obtaine some kind of ease, to lye upon my bed a great part of the day. God grant mee patience under, and submission to his heavenly will. So that now at last there is like to bee a fatall interruption put to our correspondence, on my part at least: and therefore I would not have you give yourselfe the trouble of writing to mee, til you heare from me first, either by a short letter of my owne, or by the hand of a friend. In the midst of all my paine and anguish, I thanke God, I am not sick, and find no symptoms of approaching death upon mee: yet considering my great age, having now almost run out the threescore and twelvth yeare of my life (for I was borne 3. June 1638) I conclude I have not long to live, and that there may bee some unforeseen suddain change, which may carry mee off. My Br. told mee this weeke, that Mr Fisher acquainted him, that his kinsman, Dr Hudson, would bee in London very speedily. If so, desire him to come and visit mee: for I heartily desire to see him and discourse with him. I cannot hold out any longer. I conclude this, I feare my last, letter to you with my prayers to our gracious and mercifull God to blesse you with long life, vigorous healthe, and a perpetual use of your eyes. Disce meo exemplo.

(15) This inscription is printed in Vol. V. of Leland's Itiner. p. 137.

' I am,

' S I R,

London, 1 April,
1710.

' Your affectionate Friend,

' and humble Servant,

' Tho. Smith.'

C

SMITH [Dr JOHN], an orthodox Divine of distinguished learning, in the latter end of the last and beginning of the present century, was descended of an ancient family [A] of his name, originally seated at Durham (a) and was the eldest son of William Smith, Clerk, Rector of Lowther in Westmoreland (b), by Elizabeth his wife, the fifth and posthumous daughter of Giles Wetherell, of Stockton near Durham [B]. Our author was born at Lowther in 1659, on the tenth of November, and baptized the next day. As soon as he was fit to receive the rudiments of learning, his father took the pains himself of instructing him, and he had so happy a genius, that, in the fifth year of his age, he learned his Latin Grammar, and his Greek in the ninth. After which, by the unlucky advice of some friends, he was sent to Bradford in Yorkshire, to Mr Christopher Nefse, a leading man among the Presbyterians; where he mis-spent two years, having forgot almost

(b) His father, our author's grandfather, Matthew Smith, was a Counsellor at Law, and eminent both for his skill in the Law, and for his genius in Poetry, as appears by what he published that way. He suffered much in his estate, in defence of the royal cause. Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. I. p. 223.

[A] Descended of an ancient family.] The first person we meet with of this family, which is recorded in the Herald's office, is Thomas Smith, who lived in the reign of Henry VI. he behaved with great valour in that King's expedition to Scotland, and in one of his engagements with the Scots broke his sword, which gave occasion to him and some of his posterity to assume for their crest the broken falchion (1).

[B] Daughter of Giles Wetherell of Stockton.] She was also niece to Sir George Marwood, Bart. (2), and to Barbara Marwood, who married the grandson of Toby Matthews, Archbishop of York; families not only of good antiquity, but of considerable repute for their learning (3). N. B. Robert Wetherell, son of Henry and grandson of the abovementioned Giles, settled in Ireland, and was some time Mayor of Dublin, and possessed of a good estate there, his son Captain Wetherell was killed at the battle of Falkirk, January 17, 1745 (4).

(3) Thoresby's Topography of Leeds, &c. p. 21, and 515.

(4) Ray's Hist. of the Rebellion in Scotland, p. 252. in 12mo. His patron, Sir John Lowther, was buried there also the same day,

[C] His

(a) Dr Smith was descended of a younger branch at Knaresborough in Yorkshire. Blome's Britannia.

(1) Blome's Britannia, in the list of gentry for Yorkshire and Durham; Warburton's Book of Arms; and Map of London and Middlesex illustrated, edit. 1740. 8vo.

(2) Baronetage of England, under Marwood.

(c) See a further account of this gentleman, in the article of Dr Joseph Smith.

(d) This was an extraordinary Quaker, and did not hold human learning in such contempt as that sect generally do by principle.

* The family looked on this as a providential escape from the Scottish religion, to which his intended companion was proselyted, and became a Pastor to proselyte others.

(e) Carter's Hist. of Cambridge, under that college.

(f) Dr Smith wrote some memoirs of his Lordship, which are still extant in the family.

* Lord Lonsdale has since built a new church at a little distance from the site of the old one.

(5) See an account of him in Harris's Hist. of the Irish Bishops.

(6) His first wife was Margaret, fourth daughter of Conyers Lord D'Arcy.

almost all his Grammar rules. This loss, however, though not without some difficulty, was repaired by the care of Mr William Lancaster, some time Provost of Queen's-college Oxford (c); but he going, by the recommendation of Mr Smith's father, with Sir John Lowther's son, afterwards Lord Viscount Lonsdale, to Oxford, as his Preceptor, advised that this his young scholar should be committed to the instruction of Mr Thomas Lawson, by sect a Quaker, but an excellent schoolmaster, who grounded him well in the three learned languages (d). An early foundation of classical learning being thus laid, his father had some thoughts now of sending him to the university, but which he could not for some time determine. The nearness of the place, and the company of a young student who was going thither, recommended Glasgow in Scotland, and the day was fixed for the journey; but it proved so rainy and tempestuous a season, that his father would not then venture him from home. Thus the design of a Scotch education being laid aside *, Queen's-college in Oxford (where generally the youth of the two northern counties are admitted) seemed to bid fair for him. He was therefore sent for a short time to Appleby-school, and Dr Thomas Smith, then Bishop of Carlisle, as well as Archdeacon Musgrave, who had been both Fellows of this college, promoted his going thither. But neither did this scheme take effect; for a neighbour telling his father, that he was sending up two of his sons to St John's-college Cambridge, he was at last prevailed on to yield to the great desire of his own son to go with them [C]. Accordingly our author was admitted in St John's-college, June 11, 1674 (e). From his first entrance, he was much esteemed for his learning, his strict and exemplary life, and close application to his studies; by which means, he made so good a proficiency in the Sciences, that he more than equalled most of his contemporaries. He took his degree in Arts at the regular times, and, being always destined for the Church, was ordained both Deacon and Priest by Dr Richard Stern, Archbishop of York, probably as soon as his age would permit. In the latter end of 1681, he was called to Durham by the Dean, Dr Denys Granville, who had a great regard for his family, and esteemed him highly for his excellent endowments. He was first admitted a Minor Canon of that church, on the 20th of July, 1682, and on the 29th collated to the curacy of Croxdale; and to the living of Witton-Gilbert, July 1, 1684. He went in 1686 to Madrid, by the recommendation of Dr Granville, Chaplain to his nephew Charles Lord Lansdowne, afterwards Earl of Bath, on his Lordship's being made Ambassador to the Court of Spain. He returned home soon after the Revolution: when he had the misfortune to lose a curious collection of books, he had bought while abroad, which were cast away in their passage by sea, together with some sermons he had taken no little pains to compose, by which he was obliged to go to work again. In 1694, Dr Crew [afterwards Lord Crew], Bishop of Durham, who was a very good judge of men, and a great encourager of learning, constituted him his domestic chaplain, and ever after had a high sense of his discretion and prudence, insomuch, that he generally consulted him in all ecclesiastical affairs of moment. His Lordship also collated him to the Rectory and Hospital of Gateshead, on the 12th of June, 1695, and to a Prebend of Durham, September the 25th following, into which he was instituted the next day. Upon this promotion, he was created Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge in 1696, and was Treasurer of the church of Durham in 1699. His munificent patron (f) gave him also, July 28, 1704, the Rectory of his own parish, Bishop's-Wearmouth; where he not only repaired the chancel in a handsome and substantial manner, but built a very spacious and elegant parsonage-house, entirely at his own expence, besides what he laid out upon his prebendal house,

[C] His father went with him as far as York.] Here he took leave of his father, not expecting to see him in this world any more as he was then under a regimen for a dropsy and jaundice, occasioned by too hard study. He died soon after on St Andrew's day 1675 aged forty-five years, and was buried in the chancel of the old church * the 5th of December. He was a person of probity and piety as well as learning. The foundation of which he laid at Clare-Hall in Cambridge, where he was admitted July 15, 1649, under Mr David Clarkson, and so became a fellow-pupil with Archbishop Tillotson, who had a great regard and friendship for him. He was an excellent Grecian, and wrote, among other things, learned and useful notes upon Homer's Iliad and Odyssey. He was ordained Priest (being a Deacon before) April 17, 1654, at Southill-Hall in Yorkshire by Dr Henry Tilson, then Bishop of Elphin in Ireland (5), who being a native of Yorkshire, had retired thither upon the breaking out of the rebellion. In 1655 he was presented to the Living of Lowther, by Sir John Lowther, at the request of his kinsman and quondam pupil Sir Henry Marwood, Bart. of Bussy-Hall, in the county of York, who was then to have married a daughter of the said Sir John Lowther, to which family Sir Henry Marwood was nearly allied by Dorothy his second wife (6) daughter of Sir Henry Bellingham, Bart. and by the issue of Sir Henry's only son George Marwood, who married Constance second daughter and coheir to

Sir Thomas Spencer, Bart. of Yarnton in Oxfordshire, he had only one daughter and heiress Jane Marwood, the wife of Cholmley Turner of Kirkleatham, Esq; who became heir general to the considerable estate of the Marwoods. But the title was not extinct 'till the death of her kinsman Sir William Marwood, who died February 22, 1740, and was buried in the chancel of the church at Paddington in Middlesex, with two of the children of Joseph Smith, Esq; LL D. of Kidlington in the county of Oxford. A handsome marble monument is erected for them, and to the memory of the said Sir William. To return to Mr Smith. He was ejected from his living of Lowther among other loyalists, under the usurpation of Cromwell; but in consequence of the Bartholomew Act was instituted on the 10th of October 1662. After his death his widow removed with the family to Guisborough in Yorkshire, where she entered into a second marriage with Mr John Bell, a worthy Clergyman, who had been bred at St John's college in Cambridge, and was now Rector of Stainton, and afterwards of Horkstow in Lincolnshire. But unfortunately she did not survive this marriage above nine months, for being on a visit at her cousin Turner's, at Kirkleatham in Yorkshire (7); she died in August 1680, at the age of forty-three years, in childbed (8) of a daughter Elizabeth Bell, who afterwards married Mr Coulson, a gentleman of a good estate at East-Halton in Lincolnshire.

(7) Some time Knight of the Shire for that county.

(8) She was buried at Stockton.

house, and other instances which might be mentioned of a truly liberal and noble spirit. But his chief delight was in his books and in his study, by a too assiduous and indefatigable application to which, he greatly impaired his health, so that he began to decline about two years before his death, which happened July 30, 1715, in the 56th year of his age, after a fortnight's illness, occasioned by a weakness of stomach, grown unable to do it's office. He died at Cambridge, where he had been for some time, in order to finish an edition of the Historical Works of Venerable Bede; and his remains were deposited in the chapel of St John's college in that university, where a handsome marble monument is erected for him, with an elegant Latin inscription (g), wrote by his learned friend and Antiquarian Mr Thomas Baker, then Fellow of that college (b). But his character appears at length to advantage, in the following terms, by a friend; who observes, that he was very modest in striving for his secular interest, studying to deserve favours rather than solicit for them; that he took great delight in reading the Sacred Code, and took much pleasure in weighing and penetrating into the full force and true meaning of them, in which he paid always a religious regard and veneration for Primitive Antiquity. He was also a good Historian, and would talk of the most remarkable passages with great acuteness. He was well versed in the septentrional literature, and was likewise a good master of the French and Spanish tongues. The most considerable Antiquaries, both in England and Scotland, courted his correspondence upon the subject of Antiquities. In short, he was acknowledged a general scholar, having a fertility of genius, joined to an uncommon penetration and solidity of judgment, with a surprizing memory; so that he seemed to be born for promoting literature. He could say as pleasant things as any person when disposed to be facetious, and his mirth was always seasoned with gravity, and innocence. He delighted to converse with scholars, and was likewise of a communicative temper, the peculiar excellency of a learned man. He was a great encourager of young divines; so obliging to them, so ready to assist them, and so disposed to resolve their doubts, and scruples, that none went from him but with pleasure and satisfaction. In argument and disputation, no one less passionate or dogmatical; no one more happy in delivering himself in a way that both convinced and entertained. He was in all respects an ornament to the Church, and a blessing to the neighbourhood, especially to his brethren the Clergy, his whole conversation being sincere, honest, discreet, and profitable, and his whole life one entire piece and continued testimony of his piety and devotion towards God, and his friendship and charity to men, and of his humility and sobriety towards himself. His labours in preaching, catechizing, and other duties of his function, were extraordinary, and beyond most examples; and such a God-like disposition appeared in every thing he said or did, that he commanded respect and veneration from every one. He was never wanting in any of the duties or good offices of charity, being of a kind and sympathizing disposition to all under any calamity or necessity; and he was a very rare example of temperance, abstaining from all sorts of strong liquors, and a strict observer of the days of fasting and abstinence appointed by the Church. He imagined this great abstemiousness made his head clearer and better prepared for study, and which he thought too his constitution required: but in this he was mistaken; for by that, and too intense study, he broke the vigour of it. He left by Will several generous legacies; besides a kind remembrance to his surviving brothers [D], which, to use his own words, he bequeaths to them

(g) It is inserted in Stanton, and Le Neve, as also in Blome's Cambridge.

(b) He was ejected soon after.

as

[D] A kind remembrance to his surviving brothers.

He was at the head of ten brothers, six of whom besides himself lived to the age of maturity.

The second, William, was bred to Physic, which he studied at Edinburgh, and afterwards settling at Leeds in Yorkshire, practised there with great reputation and success. He died April 7, 1729, and was buried in St Peter's church at Leeds *

The third, Mathew Smith, of Newcastle Underline, was a Blackwell Hall Factor. He died February 21, 1721, and was buried at Bettley in Staffordshire.

The fourth, George Smith, B. D. who was much admired for his knowledge in polite literature, as also for his integrity and christian conduct of his life; was bred at St John's college in Cambridge, of which he was some time Fellow, and while Chaplain to Brigadier Meredyth's regiment in Flanders, he became acquainted with General [afterwards Earl] Cadogan, he staid a considerable time with his Lordship, who upon his being appointed Envoy and Plenipotentiary to the States-General in 1706, made him his Chaplain. He also attended his Lordship in the same character when he was sent Ambassador thither in 1716, and his Lordship being constituted General of all His Majesty's forces the year following, in the room of the Duke of Marlborough, appointed Mr Smith to succeed Dr Hare, afterwards Bishop of Chichester, as Chaplain-General to the army (9). While he resided at Ghent in Flanders, he married Anne, daughter to Colonel John Reddish of Skains, by Edenbridge in Kent, by whom he had issue Richard Smith, who was bred at Jesus college in Cambridge, and is now Rector of Burmarsh and Alkham in Kent, and George Smith, a merchant, who died at Bengal in 1735. Their father died at Kensington, April 17, 1725, and was buried at his living of Higham in Kent, in the church-yard adjoining to the East window, according to his desire where a handsome tomb is erected for him.

VOL. VI. No. 311.

Fifth, Joseph Smith, the fifth surviving brother, went to Queen's-college in Oxford, where he became Provost, of whom hereafter.

Sixth, Benjamin Smith, a Student in the Inner-Temple, died in the twenty-seventh year of his age, December 6, 1699, by too assiduous application to the Law, and was buried in St Andrews Church, Holborn, London.

Seventh, Posthumus Smith, L.L.B. his youngest brother, became so eminent a Civilian, that he was early appointed Auditor to Lord Crew, and principal Register to the Dean and Chapter of Durham, as also Surrogate to Dr Brookbank Chancellor (10), and Commissary, and Official-General of that Archdeaconry. He died October 5, 1725, and was buried in the Cathedral of Durham behind the altar. He left issue one son John Smith of Durham, Esq; † and three daughters, Grace, Mary, and Elizabeth, by Mary, his wife, daughter to Sir George Wheeler, of whom a further account is given in remark [H]. Grace, the eldest, married her cousin-german, Francis Middleton, Esq; son of Ralph Middleton of Olferton, in the county of Durham, by Frances, his wife, daughter to Sir George Wheeler; Mary married Breams Wheeler of Durham, Esq; nephew to Sir George Wheeler; and Elizabeth, married John Bedford, M. D. of Durham.

(10) This gentleman was also Fellow of Trinity hall in Cambridge, where he died in 1723.

† He died unmarried, December 13, 1744; whereby his sisters became his heirs, and he was buried with his father.

* He married the daughter of John Harrison, Alderman of Leeds, and left issue one surviving son, William, now of Richmond in Surrey.

(9) Supplement to Pointer's Chronological History, p. 1058.

(i) By this marriage the families were again united.

(k) In his Historical Library, Part ii. p. 131. 8vo. edition.

(l) The writer of Vitæ quorundam illustrium Virorum, &c. See his article.

(11) The inscription is printed in Gent's History of Hull, and Le Neve.

(12) Masters's History of Corpus-Christi-college in Cambridge, in the Appendix, No. LIX. p. 84. edit. 1753. 4to. in note, by Browne Willis, Esq;

(13) Carter's History of Cambridge, p. 273. who tells us, Mr Baker had a good picture of Dr Ashton, which he much valued.

(14) He always bore a quick resentment of his ejection, and would never believe, but that the master, Dr Jenkins, might have screened him by connivance, as he had done in the preceding reign. This he expressed particularly, by writing in the blank leaves of all the books he gave to the college himself, Socius ejus.

(15) Browne Willis, as before.

(16) Jortin's Life of Erasmus, Vol. I. p. 550, 551. edit. 1758, 4to. Vol. II. came out this year, 1760, 4to.

as a token of the brotherly love he had for them from their cradle, and which he leaves with them at his grave. He married Mary, eldest daughter of William Cooper, of Scarborough, Esq; by his wife Philadelphia, fifth daughter of Henry Smith (i), of West-Herrington and Moreton-house; which Henry was half-brother to Sir George Baker, of Crook near Durham [E], by their mother Mary, daughter to Lionel Heron, of Chipchase-castle, Esq; who was married first to Oswald Baker, Esq; and after his death to William Smith of Durham and West-Herrington, Counsellor at Law; whence the said Mary Cooper was allied in blood to George Baker, Esq; the founder of six exhibitions in St John's-college Cambridge. By his marriage to this lady, who died in August 1728, Dr Smith had a very considerable fortune, and a fair issue to enjoy it: as 1. George Smith of Burnhall, Esq; of whom hereafter. 2. John, a Blackwell hall Factor, who died at Durham November 22, 1731. 3. Joseph Smith, Fellow of Trinity-college Cambridge, who died July 13, 1734, and was buried in All-Saints church at Cambridge. 4. William, who died very young a sudden death, being choaked with the core of an apple. 5. Another William, who was bred to the Common-Law, and settled at Newcastle; he died November 2, 1730, and was buried with his mother and brother John, in the church-yard of Durham cathedral, where a handsome tomb is erected to their memories. Besides his compleat and accomplished edition of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, which will be mentioned in the next article, our author published several Sermons, the titles of which are inserted below [F]; and several manuscript sermons of his were in possession of his son Joseph, which since his death have not been found. He had also made some progress in writing the Antiquities of Durham, for which undertaking Bishop Nicholson observes (k), he was the most proper person. He likewise furnished Dr Gibson with the additions to the Bishoprick of Durham, which are inserted in the last edition of Camden's Britannia by that prelate. He also supplied Mr Anderson with materials in the publication of his Historical Essay; wherein he shews, that the crown and kingdom of Scotland is imperial and independent [G]. Lastly, he communicated to Dr Thomas Smith (l) two manuscripts

[E] Sir George Baker of Crooke.] This gentleman, after having done and suffered much for his King and country, especially for gallantly defending Newcastle against the rebellious Scots, at last submitted to an unequal fate, unworthy of his great deserts on the fourth of August 1662, and was buried in the chancel of the great church at Kingston upon Hull in Yorkshire, where a monument (11) was erected for him in 1710, by his nephew Thomas Baker before mentioned.

This learned, ingenious, and industrious Antiquarian, was born September 14, 1656, at Lanchester in the county palatine of Durham (12), and being sent to St John's-college in Cambridge, was chosen Scholar and afterwards Fellow upon Dr Ashton's foundation (13), which he held 'till the accession of King George I. soon after which he was ejected for refusing to take the oaths to the government (14). However he kept his chamber in the college, and resided there as a Commoner-Master 'till his death, which happened on the second of July 1740 (15). He was buried in the ante-chappel of the college, and his various works printed and manuscripts supply the place of a monument. These are, 1. Reflections upon Learning, &c. which has gone through several editions, and is generally much esteemed, notwithstanding the censure passed upon it by a late ingenious writer. 'Baker, says he, in his Reflections upon Learning defended Erasmus, and attacked Le Clerc with a virulence, which one would not have expected from a man, who, as I remember was accounted, and who desired to be accounted a candid, genteel, and polite person. But party zeal guided his pen: Tantum religio potuit! Le Clerc gave him a short answer in the Index to the fourth edition of the Ars critica under the word Erasmus. — Baker hath one chapter upon Metaphysics, in which he hath made no mention of Locke; just as if a man should write the lives of the Greek and Latin poets, and only omit Homer and Virgil! He observed cap. 16, that there was little or nothing left for the sagacity and industry of modern critics; and thereby he shewed that he was no critic himself, and not at all acquainted with the true state of classical books, and particularly of Greek authors (16). There are several other shafts occasionally lanced at Mr Baker's book in the Life of Erasmus, which is confessedly formed upon the plan of Le Clerc, the writer's guide and master. Will not then his own words be retorted upon him? but party zeal guided his pen: Tantum religio potuit. 2. Mr Baker reprinted Bishop Fisher's funeral Sermon of Margaret Countess of Richmond, with a preface containing some account of the history of learned men of his own college, which is observed to be excellent in it's kind, and makes us wish the remainder of it had come forth, as he seemed to give us hopes of in page 55, finished by the same masterly hand. He did however, carry on it's history through a succession of it's masters, from the foundation to the end of Bishop Gunning's mastership, which together with many other volumes (17) of those valuable collections he made towards a history of the University in general, he presented to his great friend and patron the late Lord Oxford (18), in whose Lady's custody they remained with many others of extraordinary value, to the no small regret of the learned, inaccessible, 'till they were lately purchased with the Harleian manuscripts, by the Parliament in 1753, and make now a very considerable part of the British Museum. The residue of his collections (19) Mr Baker bequeathed to the university, in hopes that a more favourable opportunity might offer, and more suitable encouragement be given to some other, for setting about so great a work (20).

[F] His Sermons in print.] These are, 1. A Sermon preached before the university of Cambridge, on Proverbs iv. 13. Lond. 1700, 8vo. 2. An Apology to Christians for the gospel and it's ministers, &c. on 1 Cor. xv. 1, 2. Lond. 1709, 4to. 3. A Sermon preached before the Sons of the Clergy upon their first solemn meeting at St Nicholas church in Newcastle, Sept. 10, 1711, on Exod. xx. 12. Lond. 1711, 4to. and reprinted the same year. N. B. He was the chief instrument in setting on foot this branch of charity. 4. A Sermon preached at the consecration of the chapel of Stockton, &c. on Math. xxi. 9. ibid 1712, 8vo. and reprinted the same year.

[G] Anderson's Historical Essay, &c.] Our author supplied him with the chief part of the large appendix to this book, containing copies of charters, and other writings relating to Scotland, in which, as he observes, that nation is much obliged to Dr Smith for letting them know where so many of their valuable deeds and writings are, which by their being carefully lodged at Durham, have escaped the repeated miserable fate, that most of their ancient charters and records have undergone, first, by the general havock and designed extirpation of their memory by Edward I. who carried off or destroyed all the marks of their antiquity and independency, as well as the rights of their lands that came into his clutches, with the famous library kept at Reslennet (21); next, by the burning of the city of Edinburgh by the English, under the command of the Duke of Lancaster; and afterwards by the destruction or transportation

(17) Viz. 23 vols in folio.

(18) The Treasurer's son, who gave him, if I mistake not, yearly for his life, an annuity of 60 l. Bishop Burnet also was a friend to him in the like way.

(19) Viz. 16 vols fol. and 3 4to. with several valuable printed books noted in his own hand.

(20) Masters's History of Corpus-Christi college, in the Preface, p. i, ii. and Sir Hans Sloane's article, in this work.

(21) See Spottwood's Church History, ad ann. 1300.

scripts of Bishop Cosins [H], one intituled, A Vindication of the Orders of the Church of England, against the exceptions and cavils of a certain Romish Priest of our nation; and the other, containing an Answer to A Letter inscribed to a Noble English Lady, in Defence of administering the Eucharist to the Laity in one Kind only, together with a learned Epistle concerning the Sabbath, of Dr Cosins, then Master of Peter-House college in Cambridge, to Dr Samuel Collins, Provost of King's college there in 1635, when there was a warm controversy in England upon that subject. All which, says Dr Smith, will deserve to be inserted in a new edition of Bishop Cosins's English Works, whenever such a one shall be published (m). In return for these favours, Dr Thomas Smith gave our author a manuscript, in his own hand-writing, of the proceedings against Magdalen-college, in King James the Second's time, and his opposition in that affair drawn up by himself: and it contains a more particular and authentick relation than has hitherto been published (n) [I].

(m) Preface to the last mentioned book, p. vii, viii. edit. 1707, 4to.

(n) Which monument is still in the family, and, as I am informed, a copy of it is in the hands of his nephew, Joseph Smith, Esq; B.L.D. of E. d. bington near Oxford.

portation of most of what was left by the Popish clergy at the Reformation; and lastly by the carrying of their records to London, in the late civil wars, and the disaster that befel them in their return.

[H] He gave Dr Thomas Smith two manuscripts of Bishop Cosins. This favour was procured from our author, by the intercession of Sir George Wheeler, his relation, and much esteemed and respected by him. This reverend and pious Knight was son to Colonel Charles Wheeler of Charing in Kent (22), whose father Thomas Wheeler, married the daughter of Sir Nicholas Gibbons of Charing. Sir George was born in 1650, at Breda in Holland *, and educated in Lincoln-college, under the learned Dr George Hickes, the deprived Dean of Worcester, but before he had a degree conferred on him he went to travel, and in the company of Dr James Spon of Lyons took a voyage from Venice to Constantinople through the lesser Asia, and from Zant to several parts of Greece to Athens and thence to Attica, Corinth, Boethia, &c. Some time after his return he made a present to the university of Oxford of several pieces of antiquity, which he had collected in his travels, whereupon the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him being then a Knight. Soon after he took holy orders, and about December 12, 1684, was installed into a prebend of Durham (23), on the promotion of Dr Denys Granville to the Deanry of that place. He was made Vicar of Basingstoke, and was afterwards presented to the rich rectory of Houghton le Spring by Bishop Crew his patron. He was created, D. D. by Diploma, May 18, 1702 (24). He published an account of his journey into Greece, in six books, in 1682, folio. He also published, An account of the churches and places of assembly of the primitive Christians from the churches of Tyre, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, described by Eusebius, and ocular observations of several very edifices of churches, yet remaining in those parts, with a seasonable application. Lond 1689, and we have a third piece of his, intituled, The Protestant Monastery, or Christian Oeconomicks, containing directions for the religious conduct of a family. It appears by this treatise, that he was remarkably pious and devout. It contains his thoughts on that subject of near twenty years before, being penned soon after his entrance (they are his own words) into the conjugal state, and he supposes seven years before his entrance into holy orders; though now much abbreviated and somewhat altered. He married Grace Higgons, daughter of Sir Thomas Higgons of Odiham in Hampshire, Ambassador to Venice, Leghorn †, &c. She died 1703, and was interred at Charing. Sir George died February 18, 1723-4, aged seventy-four (25), and being a true admirer of Venerable Bede, had several of his children buried hard by him, and ordered his own corps to be interred as near Bede's tomb as it conveniently could, without violating the sacred ashes. A marble monument with a long inscription in Latin is erected for him, by his son Granville Wheeler, in the body of the church, contiguous to the wall, behind which the body lies buried. Sir George built the chapel in Wheeler's street, Spittlefields, London, commonly called Wheeler's chapel, which is for the use of Mr Wheeler's tenants and inhabitants thereabouts. He died possessed of a considerable estate and fortune, and had a numerous issue of which four sons Thomas, George, Granville, and Charles, lived to maturity, besides seven daughters who all married. Thomas the eldest son married the daughter of Sir George Curtis, Lord of the manor of Otterden-place and Monkton in Kent, and dying in the life time of his father without issue, as did also George the second son, who was a Counsellor at Law, Granville the third son, some time of Christ college in Cambridge, and now D. D. became heir to his father. He has distinguished himself as a learned member of the Royal Society (26), and is no less esteemed for his abilities as a Divine, than for his great piety, which was the motive of his going into Orders. He is now Rector of Lake in Nottinghamshire. He married first, Katharine Maria, daughter to Theophilus, Earl of Huntington, and to his second wife Mary daughter of John Dove, Esq; by Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheir of John Bridgeman, younger brother to Lord-Keeper Bridgman, but has issue only by his first marriage.

[I] A manuscript, containing a particular account of the proceedings against Magdalen-college, &c] A copy of this MS. being communicated to me, I shall gratify the reader with some extracts from it, wherein Dr Thomas Smith, the author, vindicates himself from several misrepresentations in the printed account of this affair. He begins his account thus:

'Hearing from Dr Ironside, then Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and others, that they had met with a report, that I had endeavoured to get the King's mandate for the Presidentship of the college, then vacant by the death of Dr Clerke; I replied, that I had as good a pretension (it may be without the least guilt of immodesty) as any other, and that I knew so well how the Presidentship had been disposed of by the Kings and Queens of England, that I saw no ill or indecency in such an application.'

He then proceeds to give a detail of the affair; that his friend and colleague, Dr Younger, came to his lodgings at Charing Cross, London, on Easter-Eve, March 26, 1687, and told him, he had received a message from Lady Shuttleworth in Lancashire, that her father Dr Clerke died at her house a few days before, and that this was a secret, and to be made use of accordingly; that Dr Smith told him, that the lady intended him, by this quick message, a particular kindness, and that he should by all means procure, by the interest of the Princess Anne, whose domestic chaplain he was, and is still, the King's recommendatory letters to the college, which would put the matter out of all doubt and question; but this being declined by Dr Younger, who advised him to use his interest in Court to procure it, and to take time by the foretop, he thereupon went to Thistleworth on Monday morning, March 28, to Dr Parker, Bishop of Oxford, with whom he had then, and several years before, an intimate acquaintance, to beg his interest with his Majesty. That the Bishop wrote a letter, which he gave him inclosed in another directed to his landlord, where he had lately lodged, dwelling in the Haymarket, telling him, that he must not know or enquire to whom it was directed. This, says he, if any thing, will be effectual. Nor, continues Dr Smith, would he ever tell me afterwards who the person was to whom he wrote, tho' I learned it not long after by a meer accident. After three or four days I went to Thistleworth a second time, to know what answer he had to his letter; for I was not to stir, or say any thing of the business, 'till I heard from him. He then told me, that he was not my competitor, notwithstanding the noise of the town, that the King would make him President. That the King expected the person recommended should be favourable to his religion, and then asked me what I would do, or could do therein? I replied, My Lord, I pray acquaint the King that if his Majesty shall please to recommend me to the College, I will make it my business to advance piety and learning, to make men dutiful and obedient to his person, and to promote true Catholic Christianity, and I hope, said I, the King will

(26) Some of his papers are printed in the Philosophical Transactions.

(22) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. p. 1004.

* His parents were then exiles there, on account of the rebellion. See his epitaph. The words are, ex stirpe generosa inter Cantuani oriundus, Bredæ tamen inter Batavos natus, parentibus ex regni causam exulanti-bus.

(23) Willis's Cathedrals, Vol. I.

(24) Catalogue of the Oxford Graduates.

† She was grand-daughter to Sir Bevil Granville, whose son was created Earl of Bath.

(25) From his epitaph in the Antiquities of Durham-abbey, printed in 12mo.

will require no more of me, for this is all I can do. He answered me, this I assure you will not do. I said to him, then let who will take the Presidentship for me. I will look no more after it. After this I made no address in the least to any person, either in the Court or out of it, about this matter, as having been fully convinced by the discourse which I had with Bishop Parker, that all future attempts, as things then stood, would be vain and to no purpose.

April 5, I went over to wait upon my Lord Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. After dinner his Grace came to me standing by the window, and spake to me in these words. Doctor, will the Presidentship of your college fall into your hands? I answered, no my Lord, I don't expect it. I shall never agree to the conditions. He replied, what conditions? I said again in general terms only (without mentioning the discourse I had a few days before with Bishop Parker) I know very well what I say to your Grace; then said he, without asking any further question, well Doctor, I know you are an honest man, may you have your reward: if not in this world, yet God is a good paymaster.

Dr Smith then proceeds to give what he calls An Impartial Relation of the election of a President of St Mary Magdalen-college, Oxon. in April 1687, and the following visitation. In which he continues to vindicate his conduct from some misrepresentations in the printed account of that affair. In order thereto he observes, that when the college sent Mr Bagshaw to him at London, with their request to deliver their petition against the King's mandate, to admit Mr Farmer to the Presidentship. He was directed to deliver it to the Earl of Sunderland, which he complied with, though against his own opinion, being desirous to have delivered it to the King immediately*. That afterwards, upon the college citation of the Fellows to proceed to an election on the 15th of April, he went to Oxford, where at a meeting of the Fellows on the 15th in order to proceed to an election immediately, he declared his opinion for petitioning the King again as most prudent and dutiful, before they proceeded to an election, the King having interposed his royal pleasure and authority, which if it had not been done he readily acknowledged, that they not only might but ought to proceed to the election that very instant, according to the express letter of the statute in every particular. That the Vice-president as well as Dr Fairfax and Dr Pudsey, concurred with him in this opinion, but the majority appearing on the other side against such second petition, the election was made, and Dr Hough chosen President, and confirmed afterwards by the Bishop of Winchester their local visitor, though he, Dr Smith, did not give his vote for him. That it was thought necessary, in order to maintain this election, and to keep off the King's displeasure, to address the Duke of Ormond, whose chaplain Mr Hough, had the honour to be, that he would use his interest with the King, and intercede for the college. That a letter was accordingly drawn up, dated April 19, 1687, and sent to him in the country, of which, continues Dr Smith, I was wholly ignorant, much less did I subscribe it, though it appears by the very letter which the Duke of Ormond sent up to Court, that they very knavishly and basely foisted my name into the subscriptions of the Fellows, which forgery I did not discover 'till I read the letter with the subscriptions, printed by Dr Johnston in his vindication of the King's visitatorial power (27) about a year ago, which was matter of amazement to me. Besides they all knew if I had been spoken to, I should never have consented, several things contained in it being contrary to my express declaration and judgment. I did not vote for Mr Hough at all, either in the first nomination or after-scrutiny: but first named two others, and when the majority elected Mr Maynard and Mr Hough to be returned to the thirteen Seniors to chose one of them, I voted for Mr Maynard.

That about the 23d of April a letter written two days before the twenty-first, came from my Lord Sunderland, directed to the Fellows of the college, requiring us to give an account of what had passed at the election the week before, and whether the King's letter mandatory had not been delivered before the election of Mr Hough; to this an answer was framed, to which I told them I could not subscribe, nor approve of the case drawn up in several particulars alledged in it, and therefore I desired to be wholly unconcerned in it for the future as I really was in this troublesome business, which might have been prevented by our petitioning the King a second time; and upon the reading both of the letter and case, I bid Mr Almont, our Steward and public Notary, take notice, that I disliked several things both in the one and the other; and before him, and in the presence of the Fellows in the Chequer publicly interposed my dissent. After this I refused to be present at other meetings which were had about petitioning the King, and the President accompanied by three or four of the Fellows went up on Wednesday the 27th of April to deliver it. Upon the 6th of June I desired leave of absence for some time and went to London.

Hearing of the intended visitation by the King's Commissioners, he returned to the college on the 14th of October. On Tuesday the 25th the Commissioners having received the King's letters mandatory for the admission of Dr Parker Bishop of Oxford into the Presidentship; they first asked Dr Pudsey whether he would install the Bishop by his proxy, and upon his refusal the question was put to Dr Smith, who read his answer as follows:

My Lords Commissioners, I answer with all humble and dutiful submission to the King's Majesty's authority and your Lordship's visitatorial power, that it is not in my power to do this. Your Lordships, who have deprived Dr Hough, and declared the Bishop of Oxford President, may install him. This method being altogether new and extraordinary, I cannot be satisfied how I can or ought to be the executioner of your Lordship's sentence. Besides, I beg leave to propose a short case to your Lordships, whether, and how I can install or give possession, without being impowered and authorized by a rule out of the High Court of Chancery or King's-bench for my security, if there were nothing of conscience in the case. The Chief Justice answered, that they, acting by authority under the Broad-Seal, had the power of those Courts. I humbly begged their pardon and demurred. Then the Commissioners installed the Bishop, after which, returning to the common room, they proposed this question to every Fellow, will you submit to the Bishop of Oxford now installed President, by virtue of the King's mandate, to which Dr Smith's answer was: I own from my heart, and acknowledge the King's supremacy; I do now, and always will pay all dutiful and humble obedience to his Majesty's authority, and this out of a principle of conscience and loyalty, as becomes a Priest of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of England established by Law. I have made no exception to the legality of your Lordship's commission, nor to the exercise of it in this present visitation. I am ready and willing to obey in licitis et honestis, the President, whom the King has been pleased to constitute President, whenever he shall come and reside in the college (28).

Friday October 28. The Commissioners telling the Fellows that they had received an express that morning from London, wherein the King required, that the Fellows should acknowledge their disobedience, in contesting his authority, ordered that they should make this acknowledgment in a writing under their hands. In this affair, says Dr Smith, I was wholly unconcerned, as to any kind of obligation lying upon me, to join in such an address, who had been absent from the college, with statutable leave, during the heat of the contest (the Fellows refusing my advice for deferring the election, 'till the King had been petitioned a second time: which method, if it had been followed, had prevented all the troubles which fell upon the college). The Commissioners, upon my saying thus much, acknowledged that I was not obliged, nor was a subscription required of me (as is subtilly, but most falsely suggested, in the printed relation) (29); who was so far from being press'd, as is there said, that I was not so much as spoken to. But, however, after some little demurr, I went up to the hall, where the Fellows were retired to discourse with several of them, and interpose my advice. I told them, they might make their acknowledgment in such a form, as might neither displease the Commissioners, nor prejudice themselves; as that we are heartily sorry to have incurred your Majesty's displeasure; and that if, in the management of this cause, we have done any thing amiss tending that way, we humbly beg your Majesty's pardon; or to this purpose. I told them, moreover, that I would not accuse them, but that I was to defend myself; that in the management of the best cause, there might be misbehaviour and miscarriage, and therefore

* The reason for this will appear presently.

(27) P. 11, 12, 13.

(28) He says that, foreseeing what would happen, he had wrote these answers down in his pocket-book.

(29) P. 37, 38.

therefore I begged them, for God's sake, very earnestly, that they would consider what they had to do. But I not prevailing, they drew up a paper, which being subscribed, they went down with it to the common room, to present it to the Commissioners. As soon as it was read, the Commissioners said, it was not a paper to be offered: that they had offered more in a former address, which was read: and that it was not agreeable, but directly repugnant, to the submission made on Tuesday. The Bishop of Chester adding, that it was protestatio contra factum, Dr Bailey desired to explain himself as to the paper, that by the word submit, they only meant, that they would not oppose; and that as to owning the Bishop of Oxford President, they had no such design or meaning. This appeared to me, says Dr Smith, matter of astonishment, for that the submission was made after the Commissioners had installed him.

Reflecting upon this interpretation, I have said, continues he, several times to them, If we may fasten an interpretation upon words, contrary to their plain, obvious, and common sense and meaning, let us henceforward cease to condemn and preach against the jesuitical wicked doctrine of equivocation and mental reservation: and that if we now thought ourselves bound to observe the founder's statutes ad literam in every particular, and that we could not be dispensed with from them, as we have been dispensed with formerly in diverse instances, and especially about elections, we ought to take shame to ourselves, by a publick acknowledgment, that we have lain so long under those fatal errors, and do penance for our manifest and wilful perjuries.

After the general submission made by all the Fellows except, Dr Fairfax, and all the college besides, except the under-porter, both of whom were expelled, I observed, that there was great dissatisfaction taken by several at this their compliance, blaming them for leaving Dr Fairfax in the lurch; and besides, they were piqued by Mr Obadiah Walker and his party's upbraiding them, that they durst not stand it out: and it being commonly said in the town by the ordinary people, Here is your Magdalen-college conscience, besides other motives, they thought fit to evacuate their submission, by this equivocal interpretation.

Tuesday November 15 The same Commissioners came to town, being brought in by three troops of horse, and were lodged in the college.

That night I was sent for to the President's lodgings by the Bishop of Oxford, not knowing in the least that the Commissioners were with him, forbearing to visit him above once or twice at most, upon his taking possession of the lodgings, notwithstanding our intimate friendship many years before, which I then chiefly waded, to avoid all possible umbrage of me. I was surprized at the sight of them, where we had but little discourse, and that of indifferent things; only, before I took my leave, Baron Jenner took me aside, and asked me very seriously, Doctor, I pray tell me, when you delivered the petition of the college to my Lord President? I told him, upon the faith of an honest man and a Christian, that it was on Sunday the 10th of April. Afterward, the Bishop of Chester invited me to his chamber, and asked me the same question, which I answered word for word as before I did to Baron Jenner. He further asked, when I had my answer? I told him, on Wednesday the 13th of April, and that I would attest it upon oath, if there was any doubt or denial of it. This brought into my mind what the Vice-Chancellor, Dr Ironside, told me, that in a discourse the King was pleased to have with him, when he was in Oxford, in September, about our college, his Majesty aggravated the undutifulness and rudeness of the Fellows, in not petitioning him, and representing our case to him before the election. The Vice-Chancellor interposing, said, that he had heard we had done it: the King answered, Ay, after the election was over. This, continues our author, seemed demonstration, that the Earl of Sunderland did not deliver our petition in good time (30), and which I concluded fully was the reason, why Baron Jenner and the Bishop of Chester were so inquisitive to know the exact time from me.

The Bishop of Chester told me, that I had a great enemy in the Cabinet-Council, called just before they came away. I asked him who were present? He said, the Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Lord Privy-Seal, the Marquis of Powis, Father Peter, the Earl of Castlemain, and I think he said Bishop Leybourn. He would not tell me who the Lord was, but left me to guess, as I did easily; but he said the King was pleased after all to say, that he was fully satisfied as to my behaviour.

In the interval between the Commissioners going away and return, I was soon convinced, that the Fellows were encouraged to persist in their opposition to the King by several great men at London; that they should be taken care of, in case they were expelled; that they would be looked upon as confessors for the Protestant religion, and such like plausible arguments, with which they were wrought upon; so that it was very easy to foresee, that, upon their non submission, the Commissioners came with full power to expel them.

Wednesday November 16. The Commissioners met in the common room, and the buttery-book being sent for afterwards, upon reading the King's mandate for the admission of Mr William Joyner, who had been Fellow of the college about forty years before, and lost his Fellowship by turning Papist, and Mr Job Allibon, brother to the Judge of that name, they were admitted and their names registred, both of them taking only the oath required by the founder. The names of all the Fellows were called over, and certificates were produced in behalf of several of the absent Fellows, which were read and allowed. Dr Younger was excused, upon the account of his attendance upon the Princess of Denmark. The names of the rest, who had not taken the like care to get themselves excused, were noted down. Soon after, the Bishop of Chester made a long speech, recapitulating the whole affair. All being ordered to withdraw but the Fellows, the Commissioners required such of them, and only such, as had contended with the King (for I was not so much as spoken to, much less pressed, as is basely and falsely suggested (31) in the printed pamphlet, intituled, (31) P. 37, 38. An Impartial Relation of the whole Proceedings against St Mary Magdalen college in Oxon. which is very partial and faulty in several particulars relating to me), to subscribe the following paper.

Here follows the petition, &c. as in p. 37. of the printed account. The expulsion being read soon after, Dr Smith then proceeds.

After the expulsion of my colleagues, which they had brought upon themselves, I being extremely concerned for them, resolved that very minute to go to London, and live there.

Accordingly he set out on Friday November 18, and staid at London all that winter, and part of the following year (32), till he was expelled from his Fellowship by Bishop Giffard, the then President, and Popish Fellows, and went down to Oxford a few days after, to remove his books, bedding, and other furniture of his chamber.

Upon my coming to town, continues he, I found the whole transaction of the affair relating to the college generally condemned, the King arraigned, as guilty of arbitrary government, in turning men out of their freeholds, the Commissioners loaded with calumnies, for executing the King's pleasure, and acting, as they said, against Law, in defence of a prerogative, which those revilers would not acknowledge due to the Crown, and myself bespattered with horrible, scandalous, and diabolical reflections; as that I was a Papist, or at least would soon declare myself such; that I had perjuriously violated my founder's statutes; and that by this compliance I was making my court to get preferments, and such like stuff. I confess it troubled me extremely to be thus calumniated, knowing that in the whole affair I acted according to my judgment and conscience; upon which I did not chuse to rely wholly, though I might have done it safely, knowing, from the registers of the college, what had been done in the like cases by our predecessors, and especially in Dr Walter Haddon's case, who was a lay-gentleman, and bred up in the university of Cambridge in the time of King Edward the Sixth; in that of Dr Bond, under Queen Elizabeth; of Dr Oliver, who was recommended by King Charles the First (though the King, then in Oxford, was assured, that the election would light neither upon Dr Oliver, or another of his Majesty's chaplains; the King saying, as I have been most credibly informed, that he would send his letters however); and in those of Dr Pierce and Dr Clerke, at which latter I was present*; and in the elections and admissions of Fellows (to the formalities of which we were as much obliged by statute), whenever the King thought fit to interpose his royal authority. Besides, I

(32) A letter dated January the nineteenth, had been sent to him by Mr Char-nock then Vice-President, citing him to come to the college; but he slighted the citation, and did not think fit to answer the foolish letter, (so he calls it) and left them to proceed against him as they pleased.

* In the case of Haddon the statutes were overruled, on account of the Reformation, as then established by act of Parliament. Life of Walter Haddon, prefixed to his Poemat. Lib. duo, Lond. 1592, 8vo. and as to Bond, Oliver, Pierce, and Clarke, they were or had been all Fellows of the college, and statutorily qualified. See Impartial Relation, &c. p. 21. Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 280. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 858. So that none of these cases are like the present one, as is alleged by Dr Smith.

(31) This he had apprehended from the first, which was the reason of his insisting so much as he did, upon petitioning the King a second time, before they proceeded to an election.

say, not relying upon my own understanding, I consulted both divines and civilians as to my behaviour in this perplexed affair, whose judgment, which could be no ways biased, agreed with mine. Hereupon, to do myself right, and to vindicate my injured fame and credit, I found myself obliged to give a particular relation of my behaviour in the whole transaction, so far as I was concerned, either at the election or visitation, which I sent to my friend Dr William Lloyd, Lord Bishop of St Asaph, in a letter dated November 24; which satisfied his Lordship; who, as much as he disliked the exercise of the King's visitatorial power at that time, and the behaviour of the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical affairs, and for visiting the Universities either at London or Oxford, did me the justice to vindicate me in the midst of all the clamours raised upon me (as did several other persons), whenever a discourse happened to be started about me. I, finding that the case was either through ignorance misunderstood, or through malice and design perverted, to run down the King and his authority royal, in interposing in college elections, and that not one in a thousand has a right notion of it, designed to publish that letter, to satisfy my friends, that I was not so black a criminal as some of my maligners represented me to be; and therefore consulted and advised with Bishop Lloyd, whether I ought not to lay open the whole affair to the view of the world, at least to publish the letter written to him; which he would by no means give way to, or advise me to do, adding, among other reasons, that hereby I should but gratify the Jesuits; and this afterwards was the opinion of Dr Thomas Tenison (33), whom, in Bishop Lloyd's absence, and by his particular desire, I now and then consulted upon some emerging difficulty.

(33) Afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

I can justly say it, and I appeal to God Almighty, the searcher of all hearts, that in the course of my life, in matters relating to the publick, I have endeavoured to discharge a good conscience; and that, the Grace of God assisting me, I have abhorred, and, the same Grace assisting me, shall continue to abhor, a wilful and designed contradicting the lights and directions of my conscience, or doing any thing contrary to it, though it were to gain the best preferment in the Church, or to save my life. And as to the other crimination, of my being a Papist, or would at least become such, I need only appeal to all who know me intimately, both before and since, and to the several theological writings which I have published in Latin and English, in which I have defended the doctrine of the Church of England against the Papists, to render it absurd, false, and incredible. It was a grievous affliction to me, to be so unworthily reproached by my brethren of the Clergy: one of whom brake out in a coffee-house into scurrilous language against me, such as was fitter for a rude, ill-bred, and hair-brained porter, than a scholar, a gentleman, or priest. But I have lived to see this man especially (with several other of my severe censurers), notwithstanding their pretended zeal at that time, in the defence of the Church of England against Popery (which certainly is the duty of every honest and conscientious clergyman of this Church), renounce his oaths, faith, declarations, and formerly avowed principles, and swear allegiance to an usurper, and justify all the villainies of the late Revolution.

Our author then takes notice, that collections were not long after made for the expelled Fellows, and the news being sent over into Holland, with many aggravating circumstances, the Princess of Orange sent over 200*l.* to be distributed among them, as one of the Fellows afterwards told him. After which he proceeds thus:

That night [of November 24] having sent away my letter, by a sure hand, to Bishop Lloyd: in the morning a gentleman came to me to my lodging, telling me, that the King hearing I was in town, commanded me to come to his levee the next morning: which was extremely surprizing to me. Friday morning, November 25, I went to Whitehall. The King was then under the Barber's hand; several lords and gentlemen attending, as is usual. Soon after, the King admitted me to the honour of kissing his hand, and called me into his closet; where he said, he had heard well of me, and that I was a loyal and honest man. I answered, that I had endeavoured to do my duty to his Majesty, as became a loyal and honest man, for which I suffered a thousand reproaches. He bid me not to value them; and then he was pleased to tell me, that he had a letter from the Bishop of Oxon, that the demies were mutinous. I said, that I had endeavoured to satisfy some of them, but I feared they were not to be wrought upon. The King was pleased to add these very words, The college has been mutinous and factious ever since my brother was restored. Some little discourse happened, about my having lived some time at Constantinople; and I thought fit to acquaint the King, that of late I had not been constantly resident in the college, but lived in London; which I thought proper to say, because I resolved to go down no more, while things continued in this disorderly condition. After this short stay, the King said, Doctor, I thank you, I will stand by them who stand by me, you shall find it so, or words to that purpose. I most humbly thanked his Majesty, and was dismissed (34).

(34) When he returned to his lodging, he set down this discourse while it was fresh in his memory.

Notwithstanding the King's gracious intentions, proceeds he, towards me, I never made any kind of application to his Majesty, either by Protestant or Romanist; and at that time dreaded preferment, as much as others were ambitious of it, and courted it; and scorned to make a visit to my Lord Sunderland, who, to make his court the better, had renounced his religion, and was premier minister (35); much more to the Jesuit Peters, whose face I never saw, but once en passant, though invited thereunto by one who had a considerable interest in them both; for though I might have pretended, with some tolerable kind of allowance, to a Prebend in the church of Windsor, which King Charles was pleased to promise me, or to a Prebend in Westminster, for which Archbishop Sancroft, of his own accord, without my request or suggestion, told me, that he would speak to the King [James] in my behalf; his Grace thinking it most agreeable for me to live in London, as well as others, who I saw advanced to great dignities in the Church: yet after that the troubles in the college had happened, I made it my business and endeavour to avoid it; and I thanked God heartily, that no preferment was forced upon me. So much do I prefer the credit and reputation of having acted according to my judgment in the affair of the college, before the best preferment which fell afterwards in the King's gift, though it had been the Bishoprick of Oxford, which not long after was vacant by the death of Bishop Parker; who being succeeded by Dr Giffard, titular Bishop of Madaura, in the Presidency, the college began to fill with Papists, and our author was expelled the third of August, 1688 (36).

(35) The Doctor intimates his opinion, that his Lordship influenced Father Peters in sending the twelve Popish Fellows to Magdalen, and expelling the Protestants, in the general design to embarrass the King's affairs, and render him more odious to his Protestant subjects. In which last sentiment our author was not singular.

But upon the address of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several other Bishops, October 3, to the King to restore the President and Fellows. His Majesty, on the 12th of that month, ordered the Bishop of Winchester to settle the Society regularly and statutablely, which that Bishop shewed to our author and Dr Younger. In pursuance hereof, a citation was set up on the chapel gate, October 16, warning the President, Fellows, and all persons concerned to meet the Visitor there on the 2d of November following, by which time the Popish Fellows were ordered to be gone, which was a strain of the Bishop's civility to them. My Lord of Canterbury, and several others of great quality hearing of this delay, signified their just displeasure at it. Of which, the Bishop being sensible he hastens to Oxford on Saturday the 20th of October, anticipating the time prescribed by him in his instrument almost a fortnight, upon the security of which, continues our author, I staid in London. He was extremely blamed for deferring it, and might if he had pleased at first have gone directly to Oxford, where a great many of the Fellows upon the news of the designed restoration were come already, and the King knew nothing, but that he had before this time obeyed his orders, and restored the college.

(36) Upon this occasion, he went to the college, removed his books and furniture, and after staying three or four days in a private lodging in the town, returned to London, without taking any notice of any of the Popish Fellows.

But thus it happened. The King designing to have, on Monday the 22d of October, a great assembly of the Lords, Bishops, and Personages of great quality, dignity, and office, to satisfy them, and by them the whole nation, about the legitimacy of his son the Prince of Wales, and to obviate and confound the villainous and diabolical slander, which was most maliciously spread abroad among the people, by his implacable enemies, who were then designing his overthrow and deposition, that it was a supposititious child, among others, took particular care, that the Bishop of Winchester, of whose loyalty at that time his Majesty had a very good opinion, should be sent for to be present, and an express was sent to him accordingly to Farnham. But he being gone thence to Oxford, the express went after him, and delivered him the King's letter letter

letter for his appearance in the council chamber on Monday. He not knowing the meaning and reason of the King's order delivered to him on Saturday night, was resolved to be gone early the next morning for London, without retorning the college. The Fellows hearing of his intended sudden departure went to St John's-college, where his Lordship lodged, and importuned him to restore them that morning, urging that the whole might be done in an hour or two's time; and upon his refusing to comply with their earnest request, they used very rude expressions towards him, which put my Lord into a very grievous passion, and he made his coachman drive away, as some of the Fellows told me.

On Monday about one o'Clock in the afternoon, I spoke to him in the gallery at Whitehall, and asked his Lordship when he would return to Oxford, he said on Wednesday. That afternoon I hired a couple of horses and a man, and went to Beconsfield that night, and the next day to Oxford. The Bishop got thither on Wednesday the 24th, and restored and resettled the college the next day in the morning, being the 25th.

In the pamphlets, which were soon after published, giving an account of the Revolution, and in order to the justification of the wickedness and villany of it, this accidental delay of our being restored, which is wholly to be imputed to the Bishop of Winchester, is horribly misrepresented, particularly by Mr Bohun, and afterwards by Mr Tirryl, and by the whole litter of envenomed lying scriblers, upon this idle, absurd, and forged pretence, that by the post just before the Bishop was sent for back, there came news, that the Dutch had on the 16th of the said month suffered much in a storm, and that they would not be able to sail 'till the spring, and that therefore the Bishop of Winchester was commanded to desist, and the order given to him for restoring the college was revoked, which was a horrible lye. The King knowing nothing all the while, but that the college had been restored, before he sent for the Bishop to be present in that august assembly, which was the only reason he was sent to, and not in the least to hinder or defeat the restoration of the college, as those villainous writers have most falsely and wickedly asserted. The Visitor returning in four or five days to Farnham, our author designed to return to London. But the President desiring him to stay to help settle the college, and make up the perplexed accounts of it, he complied. And, continues he, upon a diligent search and inspection, we found our writings and muniments safe the old gold in the Tower which we wanted, untouched and entire, the plate left as we left it, and nothing as I remember missing. But after the Visitor's departure I quickly found that I was an eye sore to several of my colleagues, who neither would nor could, it seems, forgive me for my behaviour at the election and visitation, which cast such a reflection upon them. And the King's affairs being now more and more embroiled, they grew insolent, many of them having gotten the victory over the King, and the whole nation, as they fancied, on their side; and being thus got again into possession of the college, some of the junior Fellows especially began to shew their malice and revenge upon me, taking occasion in the common room, or in the cloysters, to assault and abuse me with base, dirty, and opprobrious language, for my not joyning with them. All this I could easily have digested, 'till my old friend Mr Dodwel acquainted me, that he had just then heard that both President and Fellows, endeavoured to prepossess the Visitor when lately in town, with a design to expel me. This, I confess, put me out of all patience, and filled me with equally great trouble and indignation, and made me almost resolve, whatever the effect of this barbarous usage might be, to quit the college, (as the lesser evil of the two) where I had so many open maligners, and others, who seemed to carry all things fair with me, and treated me outwardly with respect, thus secretly to envy me*. Though I could not give an entire credit to Mr Dodwel's information, especially as to what concerned the President, whose pretensions of respect and friendship were never greater than at that time, and who, I hoped and believed, abhorred the very thought of being in that black design against me; yet I thought fit not to slight it, but the same day, October 31, I wrote to my friend the Bishop of St Asaph; it concerning me, both in point of reputation and interest, to prevent the mischief from falling upon me.

The pretence was that I had assisted Dr Johnston in the composition of his book, intitled, The King's visitatorial power asserted, &c. He mentioning me there with honour, and citing my diary (37) in three or four places. The case in short lies thus. I had made an acquaintance with this worthy, honest, and learned gentleman in the year 1671, at Pontefract in Yorkshire, where he then lived, and where I continued several days, taking a progress that summer with one of our Yorkshire Fellows into the north parts of England, which in all my perambulations I had not seen before, and whose friends lived in that town. This acquaintance quickly grew up into a strict and dear friendship, which was afterwards kept up by a correspondence of letters, during his stay in Yorkshire, and after his coming to live in London. The King being made acquainted with the loyalty and worth of this gentleman, and his great skill in the history, antiquities, and laws of England, and his industrious researches into old records, gave him a considerable pension, to render the loss of his practice as a Physician, (and certainly a learned and judicious one) which he could not if otherwise employed, attend with constancy and assiduity, less uneasy: and his chief province was to defend the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, which were then attacked by several little writers, with design to inflame the nation, under the pretence of liberty and property, against the encroachments of arbitrary power. These calumnies were levelled against the King, not so much for his being of the Roman communion (though of this they made great advantage, in order first to lessen him in the minds of the people, and turn their minds against him, and afterwards to abdicate and dethrone him) as for his being a King. For they were the same with which they had aspersed the King his father of blessed memory, who died a martyr for the Church of England. This gentleman then was to give a true and impartial relation of the Visitation of our college, and to that end had all the papers and register of the Commissioners, both in London and at Oxford, which related to that affair, put into his hands. He was so civil as to consult me about what concerned myself merely as matter of fact. I read several things out of my diary to him, and at the same time acquainted him particularly with what the Lord Chief Justice said, as I had put it down in my note-book; whose words I found in the prints, and in common discourse, to have been horribly perverted to his great prejudice and dishonour; and for the Doctor's further satisfaction afterwards, I gave him a copy of a declaration or two I made, which only concerned myself, which he has printed. But as to any matter of arguments, statutes, customs, usages, and practices of the college in other visitations, and the like, I never communicated to him one syllable, or gave him the least light: for if I had designed it, things had been urged in several particulars with greater strength and authority. But he mentioning in the close of his book, that a member of the college had written a tract upon that subject; it was presently concluded that I was the person. Tho' when I challenged the Doctor upon it, and desired him to acquaint me who that Fellow was, he told me that it was Mr Charnock, some of whose papers he had seen, whose name I told him he ought to have mentioned to take off all possible umbrage and suspicion from me. This silly and false suggestion was the only ground of the accusation secretly managed against me; which soon after fell, and I heard no more of it (38).

Our author proceeds to mention several particulars relating to Oxford, after the arrival of the Prince of Orange, and among the rest observes, that an association paper was signed by the Vice Chancellor, several Heads of College, and some of the Canons of Christ-Church (39), to stand by that Prince. But that Dr Turner, Dr Adams, Dr Bury, Dr Halton, Dr Mills, Dr South, &c. refused to subscribe it, as he was told by one of the non subscribers. Reflecting, says he, upon the horrible defection of these very heads of college, and others, who had been so zealous for the passing of the famous Decretum in a full Convocation 21 July 1683, and now renouncing that doctrine and their loyalty, and entering into a confederation or association in defence of the Prince of Orange, who came to pull the King his uncle and father-in-law out of his throne, and usurp his crown. I soon after vented my just indignation against such baseness and wickedness, in these following lines:

(37) So he calls this MS.

(38) He staid at Oxford 'till August 1, and then went to London. His suspension from his preferments, for refusing the oaths, taking place on that day, by the Act of Parliament for that purpose.

(39) Viz. On Wednesday, December 12. Prince George came to Oxford the same day; and the Princess [afterwards Queen] Anne, came thither on the fifteenth.

* So in the MS.

In associationem a quibusdam Academia Oxoniensis Doctoribus initam.

Nuper sacrilegos infandi schismatis ausus,
Atque monarchomos, perculit Oxonia:
Oxonia antiquæ fidei, verique Magistra,
Regibus effuso sanguine fida suis
Unde hæc fluxa fides? hæc inconstantia morum?
Scottorum fœdus sic revocare decet?
Fallimur. En matrem non hæc infamia tangit,
Dediscunt pauci, quam docet illa, fidem.

The accounts of the college being pretty well settled, the Doctor went with leave to London about the middle of January, and soon after visited Lord Preston, to ask his advice about going to the King in France, in which he was discouraged by his Lordship. On the 12th of April, the day after the coronation, he went to Oxford, to preach before the university on Sunday following; and he did accordingly, and his sermon was printed soon after the news came of the dismal earthquake at Jamaica, under the title of, A Discourse concerning Divine Providence, in relation to National Judgments. London, 1693. But the licence could not be obtained from the Bishop of London's chaplain, before he had struck out two or three passages, which he said reflected upon the government. Our author had been ejected from his Fellowship at Magdalen-tide, 1692, but not before the following letter from Dr Hough, the President, and now Bishop of Oxford, was put into his hands on July 4, 1692, by Mr Shaw, to whom it was thus directed:

To William Shaw, Esq; at his house in St James's street.

' My dear brother,
' You have a neighbour on the other side of the street, Dr Thomas Smith, Fellow of this college, to whom I must beg the favour of you to deliver a message in the name of myself and this society, viz. that we desire he will come down to Oxford and take the oaths, or send us a certificate of his having done some time before the 22d of this month, otherwise we can no longer forbear to elect another person into

' his place. You may assure him, it is not without a great deal of reluctance we proceed to this extremity; but we have received a fresh command from the Queen, by the Judges of the Assize, requiring us to tender the oaths again to all such as have not taken them, and to execute the laws immediately upon such as refuse. I am,

' Dear Sir,

' Your most affectionate friend,

' And faithful servant,

' J. O. OXON.'

To this Dr Smith returned an answer the next day, in these terms:

' S I R,

' I desire you to give my thanks to the President for his civilities, which I shall always acknowledge; and withal to acquaint him, that I cannot come down to Oxford upon the account for which I am summoned; much less can I or shall I send a certificate, as I am required, preferring the peace of my mind and the satisfaction of my conscience before the enjoying of my Fellowship, which, for the sake of my principles, I am ready to lose and be dispossessed of: and that with the same (not to say a greater) willingness and alacrity as I was first chosen and admitted to it. That I wish all happiness and prosperity to the college: and that I shall, during the remainder of the time, which, by the good providence of God, I have to live, endeavour to serve it, as I may, and as I ought, to the utmost of my power.
July 5, 1692.

(40) N. B. To note (a) add, And Thoresby's Leeds, &c. who says, this family is remarkable for eminent men and learned writers. And to note (1) prefix, From tradition in the family. In note (3) dele families remarkable, &c. And in remark [C], note (8), for Stockton read Stainton.

The reader sees in this extract, several instances of those long periods that render this writer's style a little intricate, as is remarked under his [preceding] article. In which we shall take this opportunity of supplying some particulars there omitted. As that the Doctor was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and some time Keeper of the Cottonian Library. As also, that he left all his manuscripts, and some printed books, to Mr Hearne, who bequeathed them, by his Will, to Dr William Bedford, son of Hilkia Bedford, mentioned in remark [B] of the subsequent article (40).

(a) This name was given him in respect to his godfather, Sir George Wheeler, Knt.

(b) In 1736, he was a benefactor to the new buildings, then carrying on by his uncle at the college.

SMITH [GEORGE] (a), of Burnhall in the county of Durham, Esq; eldest son of the preceding, was born at Durham, May 7, 1693; and after laying a good foundation of classical learning at Westminster school, was sent to St John's-college in Cambridge. But he continued there only about two years, being removed to the sister university, and entered May 1, 1711, of Queen's-college, as well in regard to this being his uncle's college (b), as also for the sake of having the learned Mr Edward Thwaites [A] for his tutor, who was a friend and correspondent of his father; and being well skilled in the septentrional literature, was the means of this his pupil's becoming a perfect master of the Saxon language, in which his father also took some pains to instruct him. He afterwards removed to the Inner Temple in London, in the view of studying the Law; and he made a great proficiency in it, especially in the more genteel and historical branch, his fortune setting him above pursuing the lucrative part by practice, for which he also became disqualified by not complying to the government. This principle carried him into the Nonjuring Church, in which he took Holy Orders, and was made titular Bishop of Durham. He imbibed these notions from his uncle, the learned Mr Hilkia Bedford [B], whose daughter

[A] His Tutor Mr Edward Thwaites.] This gentleman, then Fellow of Queen's-college, was likewise Regius Professor of Greek in the university. Besides his accurate skill in the Greek and Latin tongues, as appears by his editions of Longinus and Ephraim Syrus, made himself a master of the ancient Septentrional languages. He supervised not only Dr Hickeys two books of those languages for seven years successively, while they were printing at the Theatre in Oxford, but gave the world the Saxon Heptateuch with King Alfred's preface, in a correct and beautiful edition, and encouraged Christopher Rawlinson, Esq; a gentleman of the college to publish King Alfred's Saxon version of Boethius de consolatione philosophiæ. Our Professor also published a short critical grammar, entitled Grammatica Anglo-Saxonica ex Hiccesiano linguarum Septentrionalium Thesaurò excerpta, which is much esteemed. He did not long survive the publication of this ingenious performance. He had the misfortune by a fall from his horse to break his leg, which being cut off by a surgeon, who had not properly secured the stump, an effusion of blood ensued in the night, when having no person with him, he with much ado got out of bed, and had the courage and resolution to sear it with his poker then in the fire. He died December 12, 1711, at the age of forty-four years, and was buried in Isley church near Oxford (1).

[B] Hilkia Bedford.] This famous Nonjuring writer was the second son of Helkia Bedford of Sibsey near Boston in Lincolnshire, (an ancient seat of the family) some time a merchant of London, by Mary his wife, eldest daughter to Richard Gardiner, Esq; of Thame in Oxfordshire, whose wife Anne was second daughter to William Plat of Highgate (2). The founder of several Fellowships and Scholarships in St John's-college Cambridge, Mr Bedford was born in Hosier-lane, London, July 23, 1663, and was burnt out of his father's house by the great fire in 1666. He was admitted of St John's college, Cambridge, November 4, 1679, the first scholar of Mr Plat's foundation, of which he likewise became a Fellow. He was afterwards introduced to the patronage of Heneage Finch, Earl

(1) See his monument, in Le Neve, Vol. V. p. 226.

(2) Son and heir of Sir Hugh Plat of Kirkeley castle and Bednal-green, author of a famous piece, intitled, The Garden of Eden, of which see some account in Sir Walter Raleigh's article.

daughter Christian, by Ellis his wife, second daughter to William Cooper, of Scarborough, Esq; he afterwards married; and she brought him a numerous issue, whereof only two daughters survived his death [C], which happened, after a very short illness, on the fourth of November, 1756. He was buried, according to his own request, in the church-yard joining to the chancel-wall of the church at Elwick, in which parish his seat of Burn-hall is situated. He is represented as an universal scholar. The Philosopher, it is said, found no science out of the reach of his comprehensive genius, nor the masters of polite literature any graces in the classics, which had escaped his observance. He was particularly knowing in Antiquities, and had a curious collection of that kind [D]. But he applied himself much to the study of controversial points, as appears by several excellent tracts which he published of that kind, to which, through his great modesty, he never put his name. One of the latest of these pieces is intituled, Britons and Saxons not converted to Popery, in answer to a Popish book, bearing the title of England's Conversion and Reformation compared. He also supplied Mr Carte with some materials for his History of England. But he is chiefly known in the republick of letters, by the edition of Bede's Historical Works (e), which was prepared for the press by his father, and published by this son at Cambridge, in 1722, folio, in a pompous manner, comprizing the venerable Father's Latin and King Alfred's Saxon version, compared with ancient manuscripts; as also all his other historical works, with variety of remarkable readings, and brief but learned and useful notes; to which is added, his Life and Character, with curious remarks, &c. according to his father's direction, and some few additions prefixed by himself. An Abridgment of Bede, with his Life and explanatory notes, translated into English from this edition, was published the following year in 8vo.

(e) See an account of this work, in Dr Hickes's Dedication to his Sermons, Vol. I. as also in Thoresby's Catalogue of MSS. in his Topography of Leeds, &c.

(1) Carter's History of Cambridge, as before.

(4) Salmon's Chronological Historian, under the year 1714. The real author of this piece was one Harbin, a nonjuring clergyman, and the preface was written by Theoph. Downes, once a Fellow of Balliol-college in Oxford. Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 317. note (x), edit. 1753.

(5) Leland's Itinerary, by Hearne, Vol. II. p. 122. Mr Bedford also wrote the preface to Dr Hickes's Defence of the Miracle of the Thurnham Legion, published in 1714.

(6) He was appointed Nov. 27. 1726. From the register of that Hospital.

(7) From private information.

(8) The author of this book, Simon Dunelmensis, was a Monk, and Precentor of Durham, anno 1164. See Selden's article.

* Of a daughter that died soon after.

Earl of Winchelsea, to whom he was a constant companion and friend; but was deprived of his preferments in 1689, upon refusing to take the oaths to the new government (3). In April 1714, being tried in the Court of King's-Bench, before Lord Chief-Justice Parker, for writing, printing, and publishing, The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted, in answer to Dr Higden's View and Defence, he was sentenced to pay a fine of a thousand marks, to remain a prisoner three years, and to give security for his good behaviour during life (4). He likewise published an English translation, done by himself, from the French, of an answer to Fontenelle's History of Oracles; with a continuation of the same, in which is inserted a letter of Mr Baker, the Antiquarian and his fellow-colleague, to him; wherein that gentleman observes, that the translator had scarce finished one laborious task, when he found himself obliged to undertake another of more labour and less satisfaction. Mr Bedford also published the Latin life of Dr Barwick, which he likewise translated into English, with additions, and published it in 1724, 8vo. He also supplied Mr Hearne the Antiquary with Bishop Fisher's oration before King Henry VII. at Cambridge, anno 1507 (5). Our author had by his wife abovementioned, 1. Dr William Bedford, late Physician to Christ's hospital London (6), and register of the College of Physicians there, of which he was a Fellow and Censor, when he took the oaths as a qualification for that office (7). 2. Mr Thomas Bedford of Ashburn in Derbyshire, the editor of Historia Ecclesie Dunelmensis (8), published, with his notes, in 1732, 8vo. 3. Dr John Bedford, a Physician at Durham, who married to his first wife a daughter of William Davison, of Bemish in that county, Esq; sister to the lady of Sir Robert Eden of Westaukland. His second wife was Elizabeth, third daughter of Posthumus Smith, Esq; Commissary and Official-general of the Archdeaconry of Durham. He had also a third wife, Dulubella Horseman, one of the co-heiresses of Edward Horseman, of Stretton in Rutlandshire, Esq; but has issue only by his second marriage.

[C] Whereof only two daughters survived him. These were, 1. Anne, who married Anthony Salvin, Esq; of Croxdale and Sunderland-bridge in the county of Durham. 2. Elizabeth, who married Rowland Burdon of Newcastle in Northumberland, Esq; who was heir to his uncle John Reeve, Esq; of Great-Milton in Oxfordshire; she died in childbed * April 8, 1758, and was buried at Sedgfield, leaving issue a son, Rowland Burdon, born December 8, 1756. His grandfather, Rowland Burdon, married Martha, daughter of John Reeve, who was son to Mr Reeve of London, by Anne his wife, sister to Francis Nourse, Esq; of Woodcote in the county of Oxford, and became heir to his uncle Reeve, a rich Spanish merchant, who dying in November, 1757, worth about 100000l. left the best part of it to the said Rowland Burdon, his nephew, and the rest to his youngest nephew, John Burdon, Esq; of Great-Milton. This family of Burdon, which came from Stockton near Durham, took the name of Rowland for three successions, from a marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Rowland Wetherell of Stockton; by which marriage there was a prior alliance to the family of the Smiths.

Our author, George Smith, Esq; had also a son, John Smith of Durham, M. D. who lived to the age of maturity. He was educated at Edinburgh, where applying himself to the study of Physic, he gave very extraordinary proofs of his abilities, of which he left a specimen, in a book he published, intituled, Commentarius Medicus de aphthis nostratibus, seu Belgarum Spruv. Lond. 1749, 8vo. He also published an elegant Latin thesis upon the theory of Physic, an exercise for his degree of Doctor in that faculty, which he took in November, 1747. He died in the twenty-ninth year of his age. 1752, at Durham, and was buried in Little St Mary's church there, leaving issue an only son George, a minor, by his wife Anne, daughter of Nicholas Shuttleworth of Durham, Esq; a near relation of Richard Shuttleworth, Esq; of Gawthorp-hall in Lancashire, some time Member of Parliament for that county. The said Dr John Smith was a person of great merit, virtue, and skill in his profession, which skill was never more readily and attentively employed, than towards the comfort and relief of the poor. His sole delight, indeed, was in acts of benevolence and charity towards his fellow-creatures. But the character of this ingenious young gentleman is with great truth expressed in the following epitaph:

Would'st thou be told, O reader! whose remains
This peaceful grave in sacred trust contains,
Know it is one whose inoffensive plan
The good approv'd, and dignified the man.
Thro' whose just ways one gentle spirit mov'd,
In all respect'd, and in all below'd.
So in those lights that vary human life,
His duty pleas'd to parent, sister, wife;
To these a friend, to no man else a foe;
His humble mind ev'n merit blush'd to shew:
Thus lov'd enough, tho' not enough enjoy'd,
He hail'd those mansions oft his thoughts employ'd.
In life's gay spring bid the vain world adieu,
And left it's cares and fleeting joys to you (9).

(9) London Magazine, for 1752, p. 288, 331.

[D] He had a curious collection of antiquities. Among others, he was possessed of a curious antique pot, found in February 1756, in a field belonging to his estate. It contained 142 pieces of Scottish silver coin, about 300 years old, with which he was much delighted.

(a) This name was given him by Sir Joseph Williamson, who stood godfather at the font, being then on a visit to his friends at Bridekirk, where he was born.

(b) See his article.

(c) See his article.

(d) At this time he had a proposal of marriage made to him from Mrs Sidney, a maiden lady of good birth and fortune; but he declined it then, and she died of the small-pox soon after.

(e) The same favour had been granted to Sir Joseph Williamson, as it was also to Mr Tickel the poet, both some time Fellows of the college.

SMITH [Dr JOSEPH] (a), younger brother to the preceding Dr John Smith, became also an eminent Divine, and was likewise born at Lowther on the 10th of October, 1670, though not baptized 'till the 30th of that month. Losing his father at five years of age, his mother took him, with the rest of her family, to Guisborough in Yorkshire, where he received the first rudiments of Grammar learning: but in the latter end of the year 1681, by the advice of his eldest brother, who had been lately preferred at Durham (b), he was removed to the publick school in that city [A], under Mr Thomas Battersby, some time of Queen's-college in Oxford, a very diligent master; and, as the scholar had two qualities, inclination and genius, which can hardly fail of success, he made a suitable proficiency, and was thought very fit for the university at the age of fifteen. However, for further improvement, he was put under the tuition of Mr Francis Woodmas, then Minor Canon of that cathedral, a gentleman of distinguished learning, and a compleat master of the classics. This step, as well as his removal to Durham, was taken in compliance to the Dean, Dr Denys Granville, who now kindly invited him to his house, which he with pleasure accepted of; and it was of no small advantage to him in his future conduct: for here he received many useful instructions from this worthy patron, in whom he had also an excellent pattern of piety and learning set daily before his eyes. He continued at the Deanery 'till the Revolution; when Dr Granville, not being able to reconcile his conscience to the new government, followed his master King James into France (c). At his departure, he pressed this favourite youth to share his fortunes, giving him the strongest assurances to continue his kindness after their return (for that party much depended upon being recalled). But the young gentleman not being willing to run this risk, nor to lose the opportunity of an university education, which was become his most ardent desire, he resolved now to pursue it; and receiving an account of the arrival of his eldest brother from Madrid soon after, he went with this design to meet him at London. During his short stay at the metropolis, he found, in the room of Dean Granville, another patron in his godfather Sir Joseph Williamson; to whom being now first introduced, he met with a very kind reception. After a short stay (d), he took his leave of his godfather, and departed with his recommendation to Oxford, where he was admitted, May 10, 1689, a scholar upon the foundation at Queen's-college; and being placed under the care of Mr William Lancaster aforementioned, who was now become a noted tutor there, he imbibed such salutary instructions, and acquired such a fund of erudition both in divine and human literature, as rendered him an honour to the College and an ornament to the Church [B]. In 1693, being chosen a Taberder [C] of his college, he took his first degree in Arts in Michaelmas-term that year, and was intent on his studies, when Sir Joseph Williamson took him from the college, by constituting him his Deputy-Keeper of the Paper-office at Whitehall; and Sir Joseph being sent soon after a Plenipotentiary to Ryswick, Mr Smith accompanied him to that treaty [D] as his secretary. While he was abroad in this employ, the University created him Master of Arts by diploma, March 1, 1696. He was likewise elected in his absence Fellow of his college, October 31, 1698, though not in Orders; the want of which qualification, though ordinarily requisite, was dispensed with (e). He continued abroad some time longer with his godfather, making excursions, and visiting several foreign Courts, and observing the constitution and policy of each; upon which he left some memoirs in manuscript, as he did also of the Ryswick treaty: and he had a share in the publication of The Acts and Negotiations, with the particular Articles at large of that Peace. In the interim, he kept up a correspondence with several persons of high character and eminent learning, who were of his acquaintance, both at home and abroad, having an excellent talent at the easy and familiar epistolary style, as he was also peculiarly happy in expressing himself in conversation. These extraordinary accomplishments procured him an offer of being promoted in the Secretary's office, by his godfather, which his old friend and associate Mr Prior much persuaded

[A] He was removed to Durham.] Soon after his coming thither, an unlucky accident happened to him, which had like to have proved fatal. Being at play with some of his schoolfellows, jumping from one tomb stone to another, in the church-yard, he fell against one of the stones, and cut his skull near the temple very deep. That it was the cause of his left eye sinking a little ever after, which, as he advanced in years, became more perceptible.

[B] An ornament to the college.] He had the good fortune to be contemporary with Mr Tanner and Mr Gibson, both afterwards Bishops, and well known in the learned world; and an intimacy was now contracted between the three, which subsisted ever after. Bishop Tanner, in his Will, directed his executor to consult with Dr Smith and Dr Gibson, in conjunction with Dr Conybeare Bishop of Bristol, about a proper person to finish his edition of Leland de Viris Illustr. & Bostonus Buriensis; and Dr Gibson, in the publication of his Quintilian, and some other authors, engaged the assistance of Mr Smith, who afterwards reaped the fruits of his friendship, as will be seen in the course of this memoir.

[C] He was now a Taberder.] The name of Taberder, though lost every where else, still continues in use at Queen's-college, where part of the members of that foundation (1) were usually elected under twelve years of age, and distinguished by that name, from taberdum, a short gown they formerly wore, which was a coat without sleeves, or a coat of mail, not unlike that worn by the Heralds of Arms; the coat of arms of the wearer was embroidered on it, on which account vanity brought it into much vogue among the nobility and gentry. The famous Jeffery Chaucer takes notice, in his prologue to the Canterbury Tales, of a well known inn on St Margaret's-hill, Southwark, noted by the sign of the Taberd.

[D] He went with Sir Joseph Williamson to Ryswick.] In the passage there happened such a storm, as put them into imminent danger of being shipwrecked in the river Maes. This incident is related, because it proved an occasion of Mr Smith's manifesting an extraordinary firmness of mind; while most of the company were trembling under the apprehensions of being every moment swallowed up in the gulph, he remained quite composed and resigned.

[E] Dr

(1) From a MS. of Dr Langbain, Provost of the college, in the Museum at Oxford. See also Langtoft's Chron. by Hearne, Vol. II. p. 656.

persuaded him to accept. He had also an offer from the Earl of Manchester, Charles Montague, to go with his Lordship as his secretary in his embassy to the Court of France, and another from Sir Philip Meadows, to accompany him in the same character, on his being appointed Envoy to the Court of Vienna. But he gave up all these hopeful prospects for the sake of the Church, to the service of which his pious disposition determined him to dedicate himself. In this resolution, soon after his return in 1700 to Oxford, where he was most welcome received by his friends, and much courted and admired by the politest persons of the university, he took Deacon's and Priest's Orders at Christ-Church, from the hands of Dr William Talbot, then Bishop of that see; upon which occasion he was often heard to say, that when he laid aside his lay-habit, he did it with the greatest pleasure, as looking upon Holy Orders to be the highest honour that could be conferred upon him; and it was not long before he had an opportunity of exercising his new function. Dr Timothy Halton, then Provost of his college [E], being also Archdeacon of the diocese, gave him the donative of Ifley near Oxford, which belongs to the Archdeaconry. At the same time, he appointed him Divinity-lecturer in the college; and how acceptable those favourite discourses, (for so they were called) which he read in the discharge of that office, were to his auditors, is still remembered to his praise. Upon Queen Anne's visiting the university in 1702, Mr Smith was pitched upon to address her Majesty with an oration; and in 1704, being elected Senior-Proctor of the university, he discharged that office with remarkable prudence and diligence, and constantly attended the disputations, and other exercises in the publick schools [F]. Dr Halton dying on the 21st of July this year, Mr Smith's friends proposed him for a candidate to the Provostship, but he declined it, and employed his interest, which was very great, in the behalf of his quondam tutor Dr Lancaster, who by that means carried the election, notwithstanding he had quitted his Fellowship some time before [G]. This gentleman, as well

as

[E] Dr Timothy Halton, Provost of Queen's-college. This gentleman was the son of Miles Halton, of Grey-stock in Cumberland, Esq; High-Sheriff of that county, and younger brother to Emmanuel Halton, of Wingfield manor in Derbyshire, Esq; a very good Mathematician and Algebraist (2). Dr Halton was extremely well qualified for so important a post as the Provostship of his college, as also for that of Vice-Chancellor of the university, which he filled with great honour in the most troublesome times, though upon that account he was very hardly prevailed on to undertake it; as appears by some letters from his friends, particularly Bishop Fell, Sir Leoline Jenkins, and Bishop Compton. We shall insert a copy of this last, which is in substance the same with the rest.

Dear Sir,

Give me leave, for the sake of the publick, to make a most unwelcome proposition to you, that you would be content to be Vice-Chancellor one year more; as you are, without a compliment, the most fit and able person. In good truth, this is not very kindly proposed; but the present juncture of affairs seems so earnestly to require it, that I could not contain. This request I hope you will oblige me in, and let me beg of you, in the freedom of friendship, and under the seal of it, to let me know, if any thing may be more particularly grateful to you than another, as some recompence for so great a trust and trouble. And in all things I would desire you to believe me,

Dear Sir,

Your very affectionate friend and brother,

May 2,
1685.

Hen. London.

Dr Halton had very considerable preferments besides the Provostship, being Canon of St David's, Prebendary of Brecknock, and Archdeacon of Llanvais in the said county; as he was likewise Archdeacon of Oxford, he was Rector too of Charleton * upon Otmore, and many years Justice of Peace for Oxfordshire. His first step to preferment was his being made chaplain to Dr Lucy, Bishop of St David's, by whom he was promoted to the dignities in Wales, and he obtained the Archdeaconry of Oxford by the interest of Sir Joseph Williamson. As to his character, he was not only learned in his own profession as a Divine, but well skilled in the Common as well as Canon Law, and no less eminent for keeping up a strict regularity and discipline in the several publick stations to which he was advanced, without regarding persons, or courting favour or rewards †. He had something awful and austere in his look, but was of a humane, friendly, and generous, disposition. He was a considerable benefactor to his college in his life-time, as well as at his death (3). His corpse was deposited in the old chapel, but has been since removed into the vault under the new one.

[F] He was a prudent and diligent Proctor. While he was in this office, he had the appellation of the handsome Smith, being tall and genteel, and of a comely and engaging countenance, in opposition to his colleague Mr Smith, of St John's-college, the junior Proctor, who had a swarthy complexion. Their diligence in attending the publick disputations provoked Mr Tickel's wit, who observed, there was warm work at the schools, for that the two Smiths made his sparks fly. In the exercise of this office, coming once to a tavern, he stepped into some company, one of whom happened to be a relation of Prince George of Denmark: upon our magistrate's admonishing them for some irregularity, they began to speak to one another in French disgracefully of him, for so abruptly intruding upon them. Hereupon Mr Smith acquainted them, in the same language, with the nature and duty of his office, which, with his polite address to them, as being foreigners, brought them to behave with much complaisance; so that they prevailed upon him to stay some time with them, and were so much pleased with his conversation, that they gladly complied with his invitation to spend the next evening with him in his college; and always after treated him with great respect.

[G] Dr Lancaster had quitted his Fellowship some time before. Upon that account, the election was disputed by his competitor Mr Thompson, who being an actual Fellow, appealed to the Archbishop of York, their Visitor (4). But his Grace confirmed the election, upon the opinion of his commissary, Dr Thomas Bouchier, who heard the cause. Dr Bouchier was likewise Regius Professor of Civil Law in the university, and had the reputation of being one of the ablest and most eminent Civilians of his time. This Provost, Dr Lancaster, was born at Bampton in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's-college; was some time master of Barton school near Lowther (5), and afterwards became chaplain to Dr Compton, Bishop of London, whose kinswoman he married (6), and was promoted by him to the archdeaconry of Middlesex, as also to the vicarage of St Martin's in the Fields (7). But the Bishop's right of presentation being contested, Dr Gouch was nominated by the other claimant, pendente lite. However, the cause being determined in favour of Dr Lancaster, he was confirmed in the vicarage (8). He was some time Vice-Chancellor of the university (9), and had the offer of the Bishoprick of St David's, which he refused, being fond of a collegiate life, and intent upon carrying on the buildings of his college. He had been very early sent abroad, by the order and

(3) Particularly in his donation of an estate at Llanvais, which dropped to him while Archdeacon of Brecknock.

(4) See Mr Thompson's State of his Case, published in 1704, 4to.

(5) See the article of Dr John Smith.

(6) She was a daughter of — Wilmer of Sywell in Northamptonshire.

(7) On the promotion of Dr Tenison to the see of Lincoln.

(8) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. 1. p. 692.

(9) While he held this office, Clarendon's printing-house happened to be finished, and was leased out, together with the privilege of the university to print Bibles, &c. to Mr Basket, who obtained it chiefly by Dr Lancaster's procurement.

at

(2) See Flam-Head's article, and Foster's Mathematical Miscellanies.

* He rebuilt the greatest part of this parsonage-house in 1691, leaving only one wing standing, which had been erected by his predecessor Dr (afterwards Archbishop) Lamplugh.

† In that spirit he refused to sign the Association paper, to stand by the Prince of Orange, as is mentioned in the extract of Dr Thomas Smith's MS. p. 3731.

(f) This was the relic of that famous portable or moving tabernacle, erected by King James II. on Hounslow-Heath, and afterwards refounded here, for the convenience of the nobility and gentry in the neighbourhood. Maitland's Survey of London.

(g) See the article of GREEN-VILE [Sir JOHN], in remark [P].

(b) Viz. A couple of handsome silver candlesticks, and his pocket-watch of gold, the case chased and set with diamonds, which his Lordship took from his bed's head, and presented it with his own hands.

(i) Catalogue of Oxford Graduates.

(10) This scheme was further pursued, by founding a professorship in modern languages in each university, to instruct young students there, with the same view, by King George I. at the advice of Lord Townshend, then Secretary of State.

(11) Dr Nicolson was sent at the same time to Vienna. See his article.

(12) This lady, Katharine O'Brien, Baroness Clifton, became the widow of Henry Lord O'Brien, in August 1678; and in December following engaged with Sir Joseph Williamson, then Secretary of State. She was sister and sole heir to Charles Duke of Richmond, and brought Sir Joseph large possessions in Kent and elsewhere, besides the hereditary stewardship of Gravesend. But by the match he lost the Secretary's place, thro' the means of Lord Danby, who had intended the Baroness for his son. Rapin's History of England, Vol. VII. p. 497. and Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 114.

(13) See an account of him in Phillips's Grandeur of the Law, 8vo. p. 173.

as his predecessor, proved a considerable benefactor to the college-buildings. In which spirit, he began to raise those on the south side, upon the benefaction of six thousand pounds left by Sir Joseph Williamson for that purpose; in procuring which considerable donation, Mr Smith had been very instrumental [H]: and, in return, Dr Lancaster, in 1704-5, presented him first to Russell-Court-chapel, and then to the Lectureship of Trinity-chapel, in Conduit-street Hanover-square (f); which were both at that time in his gift, as Vicar of St Martin's in the Field's Westminster. These promotions brought Mr Smith to town, and he was soon after appointed chaplain to Edward Villiers Earl of Jersey, Lord-Chamberlain, to whom he had the honour of being known at Ryswick, where his Lordship was one of the Plenipotentiaries. My Lord now took him into his friendship and intimacy, not only introduced him to the Queen, and gave him an opportunity of preaching several times before her Majesty, but obtained an actual promise of the first Canonry that should become vacant in the church of Windsor; which he most desired, as being nearest to his other preferments. But this and all other prospects in view from the same quarter were cut short by his Lordship's death. Mr Smith had also the misfortune to lose another view of promotion, by the death of William-Henry Granville, nephew to Dean Granville, and the last Earl of Bath of that family; to whom he was some time tutor, and read a course of lectures, some of which were upon points of religion, while his Lordship resided with his aunt, the Lady Auverquerque, sister to the Earl of Grantham. But having made two campaigns in Flanders, he died of the small-pox in May 1711 (g). Mr Smith attended him during his illness to the last moments, and received a token from him, as a memento of his esteem and affection (b); of which his Lordship had also, on many occasions, before given distinguishing proofs. The death of these two great and valuable friends, which happened so near together, was a very great concern, as well as disappointment, to our author. However, in the interim, having accumulated his degrees in Divinity, November 2, 1708 (i), he had been presented by his college, on the 29th of the same month, to the Rectory of Knights-Emham, and the Donative of Upton-Grey, both in the county of Southampton: soon after which, he resolved to perform his engagement, to marry Mrs Mary Lowther [I], niece to the late Provost Dr Halton, having at the expence of King Charles the Second, upon the advice of Sir Joseph Williamson, then Secretary of State, to send some young gentlemen of parts and abilities to the courts of France, Germany, &c. in order to qualify them for ministerial offices abroad (10): Dr Lancaster was sent to Paris (11). He sided with the High-Church party in Queen Anne's reign, and was one of the bail for Dr Sacheverell. He died February 4, 1716, of the gout in his stomach, and was buried in the old church of St Martin's in the Fields. We have a sermon of his preached on Lam. v. 16. before the House of Commons, and printed in 1696, 4to. as also a Latin speech, spoken upon presenting Dr Jane, Canon of Christ-Church, to be Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, when that divine was chosen against Dr Tillotson in 1689.

[H] Dr Smith was instrumental in procuring Sir Joseph Williamson's benefaction. Upon some slight shewn by the college, Sir Joseph had made a Will, wherein he had given but little to his alma mater, having disposed of this intended benefaction there, towards erecting and endowing a college at Dublin, by the name of Queen's-college, the provosts whereof were to be chosen from Queen's-college in Oxford. But soon after his arrival in Holland with Mr Smith, being seized with a dangerous fit of the gout, he sent for his secretary, who had before reconciled him to the place of his education, and calling him to his bed-side, whispered him in the ear to go to his bureau, where he would find his Will in such a drawer, which he should take out, and make the alteration in favour of his own college, as abovementioned. All was done and ready to be executed, when the matter was in some danger of a miscarriage, by the coming in of Sir Joseph's lady (12), before the paper had been read to him. Our secretary, well knowing Sir Joseph had no mind her Ladyship should be acquainted with the affair, endeavoured to conceal it; which she perceiving, said briskly, Mr Smith, What have you got there? To which he readily replied, Nothing but news, Madam; meaning such news as she was not to know: and she was put off by this seasonable and ready turn from enquiring any further.

[I] He married Mrs Mary Lowther. This gentleman was the fourth and youngest daughter, and co-heir, of Henry Lowther, Esq; of Ingleton-hall in Yorkshire, of Cocker-mouth in Cumberland, and of Lowther in the county of Fermanagh in Ireland (13); which last estate is very considerable, and came into his possession by the Will of his uncle, Sir Gerard

Lowther (14), Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas in Ireland; who married first Anne, daughter of Ralph Bulmer, Esq; of Wilton in Yorkshire, widow of John Welbury, of Castle-Eden in Durham, Esq; His second wife was Anne, daughter of Sir Lawrence Parsons, ancestor to the Earl of Rosse, to which family Sir Gerard left his manor of St John's Enniscorthy, in the county of Wexford, with the rectory and tythes in the territory of Murroughs in the said county; which, after thirty-one years, he bequeaths to the church †, and gives to the said family his manor of Dunamore in the county of Meath. His third wife was Margaret, daughter of Sir John King of Abbey-Boyle (from whom proceeds Lord Kingston). But Sir Gerard dying without issue, entailed by his Will his said estate and manor of Lowther on the issue male, first on his nephew Henry Lowther aforesaid, of Ingleton-hall, &c. and then on the younger brothers of Henry, viz. Thomas and George Lowther, Esqrs, of Skreen-abbey in the county of Meath, and on Edward, son of the said George Lowther; and in case of failure thereof, then to the right heirs of the said Henry Lowther, which were four daughters, co-heirs. 1. Dorothy, who married Christopher Dalton, Esq; of Acorn bank, and of Lorton in Cumberland. 2. Barbara, who married Mr Wilson of Aldermaiston in Berkshire. 3. Margaret, the wife of Abraham Tudor, Esq; of Glamorganshire in Wales, who commanding a ship of war in the British fleet, was, after several victorious attacks for the liberty of his country, mortally wounded, in the destroying and taking the Spanish galleons in 1708. 4. Mary, who married Dr Joseph Smith, the subject of the present memoir, and was allied to Lord Viscount Londale *,

* This Lord rebuilt the family-seat at Lowther in an elegant manner, but it was destroyed by fire about 1720. After which, the two wings, being offices detached from the house, were repaired and altered for the residence of the family, and so of the last Lord Londale; upon whose death, March 11, 1751, the peerage title became extinct, and the real estate descended to his heir, the present Sir James Lowther of Lowther, Bart. who, besides a considerable fortune from his father (Robert Lowther of Meburn in Westmoreland, some time Governor of Barbadoes), is also possessed of all the real and a great part of the personal estate of the late Sir James Lowther, of Whitehaven in Cumberland, Bart. who died Jan. 2, 1755, the richest commoner (as was said) in Great-Britain. Besides him, there are two other Baronets of the Londale family, viz. Sir William Lowther of Swillington in Yorkshire *, and Sir William Lowther of Marsh and Holker in Lancashire †; which last dying a Bachelor April 15, 1756, this title became extinct. He was Knight of the Shire for Cumberland, and being also Custos Rotulorum for Westmoreland, he was succeeded in that post by the aforesaid Sir James Lowther, of Lowther in the same county.

(14) This Sir Gerard Lowther was second son to Sir Richard Lowther of Lowther in Westmoreland, and brother to Sir Lancelot Lowther, one of the Barons of the Exchequer in Ireland.

† Lodge's Irish Peerage, Vol. II. p. 63.

* Son of Sir W. Lowther, by his wife Arabella, daughter of Bannister Lord Maynard.

† Son of Sir Tho. Lowther, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter to the Duke of Devonshire.

having contracted a friendship with her while resident in the college. In 1716, the Doctor exchanged the donative of Upton-Grey with Dr Grandorge [K], Prebendary of Canterbury, for the rectory of St Dionis Lime-street, London, to which he was presented by that Dean and Chapter, on the 10th of February this year. While the cure of souls committed to his charge was chiefly confined to the parishes he was concerned in, it was amiable to see with what labour he applied himself to the discharge of his ministry, how orthodox in his doctrine, how warm and affectionate in his private exhortations; and as he was zealous in all the spiritual exercises of his parochial function, so was he happy in such a force and readiness of expression, and command of reading and judgment, that even in the most difficult cases he convinced at the same time that he informed. Upon this account he was much followed by persons of rank and character, in points of conscience. He reclaimed some persons of distinction *, among others, from Popery, and being applied to by the Methodist party, about some points of their doctrine and tenets, he gave a full and unanswerable solution. These are evidences how much he was held in esteem as a skilful divine; and that sense of God and religion, which was blended with his scholarship, gave a lustre to his knowledge and accomplishments. At the same time, he kept a careful and tender eye upon the state of his parish at St Dionis, of which he was incumbent above forty years. The church, in his time, was not only greatly beautified, but improved with a very valuable organ, a new ring of bells, and a clock, &c. by subscriptions in the parish, raised through his application

Particularly Lord Waldegrave and Lady Charlotte Herbert who was sole daughter and heir to Philip Earl of Pembroke, and widow of John Lord Jellies, whose daughter, Lady Pomfret, was the donor of a curious collection of antique statues (part of the Arundelian marbles given before) to the university of Oxford; which noble benefaction is celebrated in a poem intitled Gratitude, by Mr William Thompson, late Fellow of Queen's college, author of a Collection of Poems in 8vo.

both by consanguinity and affinity. Her grandfather, Sir Richard Lowther of Ingleton, Knt. having married Isabella, second daughter of Sir Richard Fletcher, of Hutton in Cumberland, Bart. whose third daughter, Mary, was the wife of Sir John Lowther, of Lowther in Westmoreland, brother to Sir Richard Lowther aforementioned, and father to the first Lord Viscount Lonsdale. Her said grandfather served his Majesty King Charles the First in the post of Colonel of Horse, and was also Governor of the town and castle of Pontefract in Yorkshire, at the first siege of that garrison, December 25, 1644, when he, with his brother Chancellor Lowther, then adjutant, and Gerard his son, with several other of his kindred, behaved valiantly, and at length became great sufferers in the royal cause, besides his whole estate being confiscated for his loyalty (15).

Mrs Mary Lowther was endowed with many amiable qualities and Christian graces; she died April 29, 1745, and was buried where several of the family lie, in the church of Kidlington near Oxford; she brought Dr Smith three children, Joseph, Anne, and William. This last died young, and was buried in the north church-yard of St Dionis London.

The first, Joseph Smith, Esq; LL.D. of Kidlington near Oxford, is still living, and has issue one son, Joseph Bouchier Smith, and a daughter, Mary Smith, by his second wife, Elizabeth, only daughter of Dr James Bouchier, of Hanborough in Oxfordshire, who succeeded his father, Dr Thomas Bouchier above-mentioned, in the Regius Professorship of the Civil Law at Oxford, and as Commissary of the diocese of Canterbury; and was esteemed for the quickness of his parts and knowledge in his profession. By his father's marriage to Mrs Astell, who was niece to Sir Thomas Millington, of Gadfield in Hants (Physician in Ordinary to King William and Queen Mary, as also to Queen Anne, and President of the College of Physicians †), this family came into a very considerable fortune, which, after some years contest at Law, was recovered, by the extraordinary assiduity of Dr William Bouchier, a Physician of great abilities, now living at Charleton-house near Sunbury in Surrey, who is another son of Dr Thomas Bouchier.

2. Anne Smith is also still living, the wife of Major James Hargrave, by whom she has issue one son, Joseph-Smith Hargrave, a minor. She was first married to the Reverend Mr William Lamplugh, once Fellow of New-college in Oxford, and presented by that society to the rectory of Alton-Barnes in Wiltshire, and at the same time he became Rector of Sutton Mandeville in that county, by an exchange for the rectory of Soham in Suffolk, which had been procured for him by his father-in-Law Dr Smith *, by whose interest he also obtained a Prebend of Lincoln, and the lectureship of Conduit-street chapel near Hanover square. Dr Smith also would willingly have resigned the donative of Paddington to him, but the Bishop of London, Dr Gibson, did not approve of the proposal, without a resignation of Soham; which being equal in value to Paddington, the design did not take place. Mr Lamplugh's life was cut short by the stone in 1737 ‡, after a short enjoyment of his rectory of Alton-Barnes, where he had laid out about 600 l. in rebuilding the parsonage and outhouses; which benefaction is recorded in a memorial of him in that church. He was grandson to Dr Thomas Lamplugh, Archbishop of York, of whom we have some account by Le Neve §; to which we shall add the following remarkable anecdote, from the manuscript already cited of Dr Thomas Smith, who relates, that, 'January 27, 1688-9, the Archbishop told him, the Bishop of London [Dr Compton] shewed him the original Association-paper, which he would have had him to subscribe. But he refused, asking London, How he could do it? The Bishop of London replied, among other things, that it was a just revenge.' Dr Smith proceeds thus: 'My Lord of York said, that upon his waiting upon the King, after he came from Exeter, having kissed his Majesty's hand, the King was pleased to take him into his closet, and then thanked him for coming up, saying, that he was an old cavalier, and further adding, that he would reward him: the Bishop replied, that his duty was his reward. The King then told him, that he would make him Archbishop of York: upon which he fell upon his knees, desiring his Majesty not to do it. Sir, said he, I can serve your Majesty better in the West, where I am known. The King bid him rise, that it should be so. Upon his coming into his dressing-room, the King ordered my Lord Preston, then President, to draw up a warrant immediately for it.—That upon his doing homage, the King said, Remember, my Lord, what you have promised me: he answered, Ay, Sir, as long as I live. That upon the morning of the King's departure, the King was pleased to tell him, that he was chafed away from his own house by the P. of O. and desired him to pray for him. The Archbishop prayed God to bless his Majesty, saying, that he was an old man, and that if he saw his Majesty's face no more, he hoped they should meet together in Heaven. The Archbishop told me further, says Dr Smith, that he had heard that the P. of O. should say of him, that he had left his stock, and committed the care of it to him, somebody replying (but he could not learn the name of the person), that he had got an Archbishoprick by it. But, says the Archbishop to me, Doctor, I did my duty in coming away, without any design or expectation; besides, if I had staid at Exeter, I might have been suspected to have been of the Spiritual Lords, whom the P. of O. mentions to have invited him into England.'

[K] Dr Grandorge.] This gentleman was some time Fellow of Magdalen-college in Oxford, and chaplain to the Earl of Thanet, who presented him to the rectory of Hothfield in Kent; when he resigned the rectory of St Dionis, as not within statutable distance, to Dr Smith, for Upton Grey, which being a donative, was not within the statute. Dr Grandorge was, not improbably, of the family of Andrew Grandorge, of Caen in Normandy, the inventor of weaving figures in linnen cloth, called damask, in the XVIIth century (16). The doctor died January 19, 1729-30, and was buried in Magdalen-college-chapel, under a stone marked only with his name, and date of his death.

(16) Elog. Cæsarii Codomenisum.

(15) See a MSS. in the Ho. of Commons, of those merchants who compounded for their estates in the time of the Rebellion.

As also in the principality of Alban-hall, where he expended 500 l. in the improvement of the lodgings.

† A further account of him may be seen in Carter's History of Cambridge.

* From Lady H. reform, another to the present Dukes of Beaufort, by her second husband James Berkeley, of Stoke in Gloucestershire, Esq; whose son, Norborne Berkeley, Esq; is now member for the county.

‡ At Bath, whither he went for the recovery of his health; and he was buried in St James's church in that city.

(k) Which, as the inscription on it shews, he gave in 1740.

(l) This noble Lord gave very considerable sums annually to the poor, and Dr Smith, whom he frequently consulted, received from him at different times some hundreds of pounds, to be distributed according to his own discretion.

(m) This Prebend being held on nine lives, was usually called the Kit-Kat Prebend. Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. II. p. 181.

(n) Communicated by the incumbent.

* He was already possessed of St Dionis and Paddington, and it was a rule with the Bishop not to allow any of his clergy to hold three such benefices.

† Dr Smith had before resigned the lecture of Trinity-chapel in Conduit-street to Mr Osborn Medlicott, one of the King's chaplains, and now endeavoured to serve him in that of St George's. N. B. This Mr Medlicott, of Tyschurst in Suffex, who came from Ireland, married first the daughter of General Pepper, a native of St Clement's in the suburbs of Oxford, and had to his second wife Mrs Pakenham, mother to Thomas Pakenham, Esq; now Lord Longford of Ireland.

application and influence, and his own generosity, in setting a good example, besides a handsome chased brass chandelier, pendant on iron-work, which he put up at his own expence (k). He likewise annually bought a great number of religious tracts, and distributed them among his parishioners, and he left there a handsome legacy to the poor. He was also a considerable benefactor to the parsonage and glebe houses [L]. After the accession of King George the First, he was again introduced to Court by the Earl of Grantham, Lord-Chamberlain to his late Majesty (l) King George the Second, then Prince of Wales, and was made chaplain to the Princess, by whom he was very graciously received; and he constantly attended in his turn of waiting, 'till her Royal Highness's accession to the Throne, when, notwithstanding the interest he had at that time, yet, as he never made any application for himself, and was too much inclined to the high-party, being called the Hanover Tory (though in reality no person more moderate than he in his political principles, nor better attached to the constitutional establishment), a stop was thereby put to his farther promotion from the Court, though he continued still her Majesty's chaplain, and was frequently invited to preach at the royal chapel of St James's. However, this disappointment was made up by his good friend Bishop Gibson, who, from the time of their being chums, or chamber-fellows, at Queen's-college, to his Lordship's death, ever retained a very great esteem and affection for him, and gave very early proofs of it; particularly in recommending him to Archbishop Tenison, to succeed himself as his Grace's chaplain; which, though prevented by a pre-engagement, yet this friend's kind intention was the same: and he was under very great obligations to him on many other accounts, and might have been under much greater, at the time when his Lordship was in high favour with the Ministry, could he have prevailed upon him to distinguish himself in his political principles, to which his Lordship took some pains to persuade him. But nevertheless, after the Bishop's advancement to the see of Lincoln, he promoted the Doctor to the Prebend of Dunholm (m) in that church; and, upon his Lordship's translation to London, he gave the donative of Paddington in Middlesex to this friend, who appointed an afternoon lecture, at the request of the inhabitants, and procured two acts of Parliament, wherein he was at a considerable part of the expence, for twice enlarging the church-yard, which before was too small for the large number of burials there [M]. The same patron also promoted him, on the 8th of May, 1728, to the Prebend of St Mary Newington, in the cathedral church of St Paul's, on the demise of Dr Millington; which Prebend proved very advantageous to him: notwithstanding, at the Bishop's request, he gave the rectory of Newington annexed to the prebend, to the present incumbent Dr Ralph Thoresby, son to the Antiquarian of that name (n). This request was very readily granted, Dr Smith not being desirous to hold a third benefice with cure of souls *. In the interim, as soon as the new church of St George's Hanover-square was finished, he was chosen lecturer, in March 1724-5, without any personal suit, being then confined by a fistula, occasioned, as was thought, by too intense an application to his studies. He had been some time, as is already observed, Lecturer of Trinity-chapel, now belonging to this parish, and in that station had gained a popularity without courting it. In reality, by his clear pathetic elocution, and graceful gesture, added to the matter and method of his performances in the pulpit, he might be justly reckoned one of the most eloquent and instructive preachers of his time, and even to the extremity of old age, that flowing stream of eloquence did not cease. The fistula having brought him into some danger of a consumption, he went to Bath, where he received great benefit; but his eyes remained in such a weak condition [N], that he was incapable for a time of much application to study. In 1731, he resigned his lectureship, and was succeeded in it by Dr Savage, then Rector of Clothall in Hertfordshire †. This resignation was the consequence of his promotion to the Provostship of his college in Oxford, to which he was elected on the twentieth of October, 1730, without his privity or knowledge, on the demise of Dr John Gibson, a near relation to the Bishop. As he had a particular affection for the college, he was much pleased with this

[L] He was a benefactor to the glebe houses.] The leases of these expiring in his time, he proposed, upon the renewal, to give them to Queen's college; but this design coming to the knowledge of the Dean and Chapter, they refused to renew the leases to him, tho' that privilege had never been denied to his predecessors; resolving to make use of this opportunity, as he was now far advanced in years, of letting the houses go at a rack-rent, 'till his death at least, for the augmentation of the living to the benefit of his successors.

[M] He procured two acts of Parliament for enlarging the church-yard.] He built some houses here, particularly one for himself, to which he was obliged afterwards to retire with his family for his health. The parsonage house, by his predecessor's neglect, was lost for want of being at the expence to keep it up. It adjoined to the church-yard, and is now, since the rebuilding of it, converted into a farm-house.

[N] His eyes were then in a weak condition.] Upon that account, he was obliged to have his sermons transcribed, which, by frequent alterations, were much interlineated. This office was performed, partly by Mr Alan Fisher, a while domestic tutor to his son, and afterwards, by Dr Smith's nomination (17), master of St Bee's school in Cumberland; and partly by Mr Anthony Thompson, who was born at Shap in Westmoreland, and being sent to Queen's-college, was recommended by the doctor to the Earl of Waldegrave, to be tutor to his two sons, the present Earl and his brother, and who afterwards going chaplain to that noble Lord, on his embassy to France, was, on the sudden death of his Lordship, in April 1741, appointed to act as Minister for the English Court there; in which post he continued, 'till the breaking out of the last war with France, when returning home, he was, by the interest of the Duke of Newcastle, promoted to the rich Deanery of Raphoe in Ireland (18), where he died in November 1756; but his son and family are settled there.

|| He renewed four or five times the lease of an estate of 1000 l. per annum, held of him as Prebendary by Sir Thomas Abney and his heirs, and raised the fine considerably, upon comparing the Parliament survey with the improvements made since. And he refused renewing the last time, except on the usual terms, not withstanding his great age and infirmities, saying, that unless he renewed on such conditions as were not prejudicial to his successors, he would sooner lose the benefit of it to himself, which was the means of his bringing them some time after to a compliance.

(17) As Provost of Queen's, in whom it is vested. He also procured for him, of his good friend Bishop Tanner, the living of Brockdish in Norfolk.

(18) He had merited this favour from his Grace, having constantly remitted to Mr Pelham of Lewes, who was Secretary to the Embassy, the profits of this post, without giving him the trouble of a letter. Communicated by Mr Thompson himself at Paris.

[O] The

this election, especially with the honourable manner of it, and he took great delight in satisfying all the demands of so important a post. How solicitous he was in keeping good order and discipline, with what gravity he presided, with what lenity he admonished, and with what justice and impartiality he behaved to all, shewing an example of piety and all social virtues, is well remembered, and needs not be mentioned. He was not only an encourager of learning and all liberal sciences, but the greatest enemy to vice and all heretical doctrines. In this spirit, he drew up an excellent collection or series of questions in Divinity, which he instituted for the use of the students of his college, and they were of infinite service in grounding them early in their religious principles: so that the college now flourished extremely, and many persons of quality and fortune were educated under his mild and prudent government (o); and as he was always zealous in promoting it's welfare, it was the greatest pleasure to him to find his undertakings successful, and in order thereto, he did, in 1731, draw up a state of the college buildings, with an ichnography of the whole, and had cuts of the several parts of the said buildings engraved in 4to. And when the Prince of Orange came to see the university after his marriage, he presented his Royal Highness with one of the books, as he had done before to the Queen (p). He was particularly obliged to his good friends, the Right Honourable Arthur Onslow, Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons, as well as to Colonel Selwin, Treasurer to Queen Caroline, for their kind offices, at his request, in procuring her Majesty's benefaction of a thousand pounds, which she gave towards finishing the college edifice; and, as it greatly owed it's beauty and ornament to this royal munificence, Dr Smith had her Majesty's statue in marble placed over the gate-way, in an open temple, supported by eight duplicated columns, crowned with entablatures, upon which stand eight arches covered with a tholus; so that the whole together makes a noble appearance (q). After it was finished, the Queen sent for the Provost, and thanking him for the respect he had shewn to her, promised him another purse of equal value with the former [O]; which would certainly have been fulfilled, had her Majesty lived a month longer [P]. The

Doctor

(P) See Ticklell's poem, published in 1733, on her Majesty's rebuilding the front of Queen's college, adjoining to the lodgings of Edward the Black Prince and Henry V. wherein he mentions both of them being educated there. And in the window of the college-hall next the gallery is the following inscription: In hoc Coll. Studuit Henric. v. sub Patro suo Henrico Beaufort Cancellario Acad. postea Episcopo Winton, & Cardinali. Pointer, in his Antiquities of Oxford, mentions an inscription to the same purport, which was in Henry the Vth's chamber in the college, with his picture in brass, [O] The Queen promised him another thousand pounds.

This appears by the college register, and her Majesty's benefaction is particularly taken notice of to her honour, by Dr Thomas Shaw, D.D. and F.R.S. in the dedication of his travels to Barbary and the Levant, inscribed to the King, with a view of the frontispiece of this building at the head, curiously engraved. As the book has been well received by the publick, and, indeed, contains many interesting particulars relating to those countries not before observed, we shall oblige our readers with a succinct account of the worthy author, as follows: He was born about the year 1691 (19), at Kendal in Westmoreland, and having gone through the school there, was removed to Queen's college; and having taken his degrees in Arts at the regular times, he went into Holy Orders, and was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Algiers. During that interval, he spent some part of his time in travelling into several parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa; and on his return home, he was chosen Fellow of his college, took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, and published the abovementioned account of his travels at Oxford in 1738, in folio. He also bestowed some pieces of antiquity in coins, &c. which he had collected in his travels, on that university (20). In 1740, he was nominated by his college Principal of St Edmund-hall, to which he was a considerable benefactor in it's buildings, and was presented at the same time to the vicarage of Bramley in Hants. He was also Regius-Professor of Greek at Oxford 'till his death, which happened on the 18th of September, 1751, at Bramley, where he was buried, and a handsome monument, with an inscription in Latin *, was soon after erected to his memory, by his widow, the relict of Edward Holden, Esq; some time the English Consul at Algiers. His monument assures us, with great truth, that he was a good-natured man, and his book is an evidence of his learning both human and divine; a French translation of which was printed in 1743, 4to. with several notes and emendations, communicated by our author to the editor, who dedicated it to the King of Prussia, and advertized it as a better edition than the original English (21), which was true enough at that time. But Dr Clayton, Bishop of Clogher in Ireland, having attacked the travels, in his Description of the East, &c. our author published A Supplement to a book of Travels and Observations, &c. wherein some objections lately made against it are fully considered and answered, with several additional Remarks and Dissertations. Oxford, 1746, folio. In the preface to which he takes notice, that this supplement, besides other occasional dissertations, contains a greater number of notes and emendations, than were inserted in the French edition, whereby the original will now become more full and perfect than the translation. Accordingly, after the Doctor's death came out a second edition, with great improvements. Lond. 1757, 4to. The contents of the supplement are interwoven in this edition, and the improvements were made, and the edition prepared for the press, by the author himself; who expressly presents the work with these additions, alterations, and improvements, to the reader, as an essay towards restoring the ancient geography, and placing in a proper light the natural and sometimes civil history of these countries where he travelled. The doctor was succeeded at St Edmund hall, as also at Bramley, by Dr Fothergill, who was likewise some time Fellow, and an eminent tutor at Queen's college; where, on the death of Dr Joseph Smith abovementioned, he was invited by some of the members of the college to stand for the Provostship against Dr Joseph Browne, the present Provost, who carried the election by a majority of only one vote. Dr Fothergill died Octob. 12, 1760, of a dropsy (under which he had for some time laboured), two days after his return to Oxford from his native place at Ravinstandale in Westmoreland, where he had been for the recovery of his health. He was buried in the chapel at St Edmunds-hall there, leaving the character of a person of great parts and understanding, and of a most faithful and exact memory: he was also eminent for his learning and for his performances in the pulpit, several of which are published (22). His natural disposition was tender and humane, modest and humble; his heart was animated with a sincere and truly Christian piety, and the whole tenor of his words and actions such as denoted his being always attentive to this awful truth, that he must one day be accountable to God for them.

[P] Had her Majesty lived a month longer.] The following lines were intended by Dr Smith to be inserted, in gratitude to her memory, among the Oxford verses on her death †.

Above all empire, in her early youth,
True piety she priz'd, and facted truth.
Oft have I seen her, with submissive ear,
The oracles of God unfolded hear.
Oft have I seen her, with seraphic love,
Her prayers preferring to the throne above:
Where now the praises to the King of Kings,
Triumphant, with angelic notes, she sings.
Of British freedom she approv'd the cause,
Nor wish'd for power to rule above the laws;

Science

† In the Oxford verses on Queen Caroline's death, is a Latin poem on that occasion, inscribed to Dr Smith by Mr Hobson, some time Fellow of Queen's college, and author of a poem intitled, Christianity the Light of the Moral World, in 4to. 1745.

(18) Particularly the last Duke of Buckinghamshire, who came thither on Dr Smith's account, who recommended Dr Browne, then Fellow of the college, to be tutor to his Grace.

(19) A model was first projected by Dr Lancaster, but improved and executed according to the style of the Luxemburg palace at Paris, by N. Hawkshaw, a disciple of Sir Christopher Wren; and the statue was performed by Mr [now Sir Henry] Chertie, of Westminster, Kent.

(20) In his epitaph the words are, obit aetate sexagenarius annis cal. Sept. 1757.

(21) He had before presented a curious collection of butterflies to the Museum.

* By Dr Joseph Browne, Provost of Queen's college. A transcript of it is annexed to the last edition of Dr Shaw's Travels, in 1757, 4to.

(22) In the Bibliotheca Rationae, and in the Lætic Acts, (*) Viz. Six of seven of 20 l. per ann. each, as the income of the estates to be purchased would admit. The sum was about 4500 l. besides 500 l. to the college buildings, and 250 l. for costs of suit, and a licence of mortmain, which he obtained. Whence the college was also enabled to take and hold Mr Michel's donation. All which he completed May 25, 1734.

Doctor had the honour of being acquainted with the Lady Elizabeth Hastings, who, out of respect to him and his recommendation, had settled some considerable exhibitions on St Edmund-hall, an appendant to Queen's-college; but, on his advancement to the Provostship, she chose on that account to remove them thither, when he drew up rules and orders, at her Ladyship's request, for the regulation and good government of the said exhibitioners [Q]. Lastly, our Provost was more than ordinarily solicitous, to procure the payment of Sir Francis Bridgeman's large donation for exhibitions (r), which was at a stand for some years, and given up for lost; but by his diligence and penetration, he did with great difficulty gain his point, though there were so many parties concerned to be brought to agreement, some of which he happened to be well acquainted with. Accordingly he obtained a decree in Chancery, to oblige Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Bart. [R] in whose hands it lay, to pay the money just before he absconded, otherwise it would absolutely have been lost. Dr Smith was likewise instrumental in obtaining the donation of John Michel of Richmond in Surrey, Esq; towards the buildings, and his founding eight additional Fellowships and four Scholarships there [S]. He did also, by his own personal interest and sollicitation,

Science and letters were her favourite care,
And high attainments grac'd the royal fair;
She could each hour in doing good employ,
And caus'd the widow's heart to sing with joy.
But these are themes my weak essays refuse,
Fit for the labours of a nobler muse:
Had Addison, reserv'd by milder fate,
Surviv'd to see our heroine's course compleat,
Amidst the foremost, in the rolls of fame,
Fix'd would have stood great CAROLINA'S name.

[Q] Rules for the conduct of the said exhibitioners.

For these uses her Ladyship left her manor and estate of Whetdale in Yorkshire, of about the value of 160 l. per annum; and the exhibitioners are to be elected by lot, from eight principal schools in that county, and from two in Westmoreland and two in Cumberland. This eminently pious and charitable lady was daughter to Theophilus, the seventh Earl of Huntingdon, by Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of Sir John Lewis, of Ledstone in Yorkshire, Bart. from whom descended the several manors and estates she was possessed of in that county (23). She was pleas'd often to consult Dr Smith in many of her charitable donations, which were very large and extensive. He had a frequent correspondence with her on this and other subjects, particularly upon the abjuration oath, and his opinion of the Methodists. The doctor had also a correspondence upon divine and moral subjects, with the celebrated Mrs Astell, and communicated some particulars concerning her to Mr Ballard, who wrote her life or memoirs (24).

[R] Sir Orlando Bridgeman. This unfortunate gentleman was possessed of an estate of 4000 l. per annum, but that revenue not being sufficient to answer all the demands of his expensive way of life, he contracted very large debts, as well by mortgages as life annuities; 'till being reduced and distressed by his creditors, in order to defeat all their power, he had recourse to the not uncommon method of absconding from his family and friends, and not being heard of for some time, a rumour was spread, by some means or other, that he had come to an untimely end; which was further confirmed, by the finding of a drowned body, that from some particular marks, as of a bent finger, or the like, was believed and attested to be his, by persons of credit who had personally known him*. The truth of this account was so firmly believed, that his lady with the children went into deep mourning, as for a dead husband and parent (25), and his eldest son Francis assumed the Baronet's title. Thus every thing succeeded to his wish, 'till he happened to betake himself to an inn upon the great road to Bath, not far from Windfor; where sitting, in company of the innkeeper, upon a bench before the door, he took notice of the noblemens and gentlemens coaches that pass'd by, reading the arms, and telling his companion the names and titles of the several owners. This unseasonable piece of vanity betrayed him. The innkeeper was presently struck with surprize, that a person of such an ordinary appearance (for he was disguised in a mean habit) should be so knowing in families of rank and distinction; and, as the story of his absconding was no secret, the man began to suspect the truth, and acquainting his wife with what had pass'd, she came into the same opinion; so that it was resolv'd to give information to some of their guest's annuitants, whom they knew. These being particularly concerned in the discovery, immediately dispatch'd a proper person to the inn, who easily discerning the Baronet under his disguise, after some expostulations insist'd on his subscribing a paper, by way of certificate, that he was alive and in good health. This being all that was necessary for the concerns of the annuitants, he was left at liberty to behave as he pleas'd in regard to the report of his death, which still pass'd current for some time. But being seen afterwards by several persons who knew him, notwithstanding his disguise, the truth began to get ground, and at length prevail'd so much, that one of his principal creditors, who had a large mortgage upon his estate*, making strict search after him, he was apprehended and secur'd in Gloucester jail, where he continued in confinement † some years, 'till death, that general jail-deliverer, released him from all the troubles of this world, in the year 1746 ||. So notorious a part, acted in the last period of life, naturally raises a curiosity to know something more concerning the actor. And we can assure the reader, that Sir Orlando was a descendant, by a second venter, of Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, in the reign of King Charles the Second; that he was bred a courtier from his youth, being Groom of the Bedchamber to the late King George the Second, when Prince of Wales; after whose accession to the throne, he was made a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations. He was also nominat'd Governor of Barbadoes, and received 1500 l. as equipage-money for that post, just before he absconded. As to his person, he was of a fair complexion, and low of stature, but strong built and full bodied, fleshy though not fat. Lastly, that vanity was his predominant passion, which prov'd his ruin. He was a beau at the age of sixty-five ‡.

[S] He was instrumental in procuring Mr Michel's donation] As this was a very extraordinary benefaction, we shall gratify our readers with the particular circumstances and conditions of it, by laying before them an abstract of the Act pass'd in 1751, for the better effecting the purposes mentioned in the Will; where it appears, that by his last Will, dated December 21, 1736, excluding all claimants of kindred, he bequeath'd his manor and lands of Horton-Kirby, and all his manor lands and marsh lands in Plumstead, and all his lands and marsh lands in Sandwich and Worde in the county of Kent, and his lands and tenements in Old Windfor in Berks, to Queen's-college in Oxford for ever, for eight Master-Fellows and four Bachelor-Scholars, at 50 l. a year for the first, and 30 l. a year for the last; after the payment of whom, a fund should be reserv'd to answer extraordinary occasions, not exceeding 200 l. that the surpluse should be laid out in the purchase of advowsons and presentations to livings, above the yearly value of 120 l. to be annexed for ever to the Fellowships of his donation. That the said Masters and Scholars should be elected by the Provost and Fellows of Queen's-college, out of any other colleges or halls within the said university, and that such only should be capable of being elected, as should within one year past have taken the degree of Master of Arts, or should be within one year of taking the same; and that the same qualifications should be observed

* Mr Glanville. The mortgage was for 10000 l.

† The confinement was made easy by an allowance from his creditors of 150 l. per annum, and liberty to walk out any where in the town in the day time.

|| London Mag. Vol. XV.

‡ Most of the particulars of this remark were communicated by Mr Wheeler, who is always ready to oblige his friends in such matters of historical occurrences, of which he may be justly called a living store-house.

(23) A farther account of her Ladyship and her benefactions may be seen in Barnard's Life of her in 12mo, and in Wilford's Memorials of eminent Persons, and in Ballard's Lives of Illustrious Ladies.

(24) The substance of which is insert'd in Bishop Smailridge's article.

* The body was found in the Thames a little below Limehouse, where it was view'd, among others, by Sir Francis Dashwood, who believed it to be that of Sir Orlando. Communicated by Mr Glanville, Member of Parliament for Hythe in Kent.

(25) Communicated by Dr Martyn of Chelsey, where his lady and daughter then resided.

solicitation, procure a charter of mortmain, in May 1732, to enable the college to take these several benefactions (s), not to mention what he gave himself by his Will, which served as to the Bachelor Scholars, and that the Bachelors should undergo, as near as might be, the same examinations as are required upon elections at All-Souls college. And that after such first election, the Fellowships should be filled up by such Bachelor-Scholars, as had taken the degree of Master of Arts, or should be within one year thereof, and that other Scholars should be chosen in their places, &c. That both the Masters and Bachelors should be subject to the statutes and government of the college, as to all conformity, discipline, and obedience to superiors (taking Orders by the Masters, or the exercise of tendering by the Bachelors, only excepted). That there should be a building erected for the reception of the said Masters and Bachelors, consisting of two entire and regular stair-cases, uniform both within, and conformable to the new building without, to begin from the east corner of the college next to the high-street, and go on northwards towards the chapel; wherein should be eight chambers for the middle story for the Fellows, and four chambers for the Scholars in the upper or lower story, and the other story to be filled with such undergraduates of the college, as they should think fit to place therein, to be their attendants. That their allocations in the chapel and hall should be appointed suitable to their rank and degree, and their commons allotted, as near as might be, in the same proportion as their Fellows and Taberders. That the rents and profits of his estates, from the time of his death, should be received by the Bursar of the college, that the first receipts should be applied to erect the said buildings, and Robert Shippen, D. D. Principal of Brazen-nose-college, John Mather, D. D. President of Corpus-Christi college, and John Coxed, B. C. L. Warden of New college, together with Joseph Smith, D. D. Provost of Queen's-college, to be supervisors or directors of the said buildings; after the finishing of which, the society to proceed to an election of Fellows and Scholars, as abovementioned. He also appointed Dr Shippen, Dr Mather, and Dr Coxed, Visitors of his small society, to determine finally all grievances and complaints, which Visitors are to meet annually upon St Bartholomew's-day, at the college, to audit the accounts of the Bursars, and to give directions to the Bursars for the application of the rents; and that upon the demise of one of the present Visitors, another should within one month be chosen by the senior of the two surviving, to be a Doctor of Divinity or Doctor of Civil Law, and Head or Fellow of some other college or hall, resident in Oxford. That the clear yearly rents and profits of the said estates amounted to the sum of 500*l.* or thereabouts, upon an average. That the money received by the Bursars, since the testator's death, amounted to the sum of 5241*l.* 11*s.* 0*d.* $\frac{1}{4}$, of which 1265*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* had been paid to Queen's-college, to reimburse them for building the half-stair-case next the street, and 3825*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.* had been laid out in the purchase of 4116*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* three per cent. Bank annuities, in the name of the said college; and the remainder, being 524*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* $\frac{3}{4}$, remained in the hands of the Bursars. Moreover, it is hereby enacted, that the sum of 2000*l.* shall be paid out of the rents and profits of the above bequeathed estates, to the society of Queen's college, in satisfaction for the inheritance of the ground on which the aforementioned chambers stand, and for all claims of ground-rent, as also for all the immunities, privileges, and advantages, which the Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation shall have and enjoy, in the use of the publick library, chapel, hall, kitchen, buttery, and cellars, of the said college, and by the use of the furniture and goods, in common use in the said college, and in the attendance and service of all the officers, lecturers, readers, moderators and servants, and the use of the garden, quadrangles, courts, and other publick places, in the said college, and all other common advantages and emoluments, the said Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation respectively paying, in respect of any of the same, only such fees, and so much for decrements, as the Fellows and other members of like rank and degree, of Queen's-college, do or shall pay; as also, as in full compensation and satisfaction for repairing the buildings for the Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation, and their attendants, which the said Provost and Scholars are for ever hereafter to support and maintain, both within and without, at their own proper costs and charges.

Mr Michel also gave, in his life-time, a large picture of Queen Mary, to the college-hall, and presented the college with his own pedigree, very curiously done, at the expence of 100*l.* and is rolled out. He gave them likewise a valuable collection of coins, and some books upon that subject, which are repositied in the library, as appears by the following inscription in Latin:

Eleganti huic & copioso universæ literaturæ repository (a) non solum libros aliquot selectos de re nummaria sed cimeliorum etiam archivis Seriem unam æstimabilem Numismatum Romanorum, viz. Imperatorum capita aliaque numero 175 are majore incisa: Alteram vero argenteorum ejusdem fli circa 298. Industria collecta, impensis perquisita, & cura conservata

Donat Dicatque

Johannes Michel, de Richmond in com. Surrey, Arxigier. Hujus collegii generoso-commensalis, anno Domini 1676—1680.

Cujus pater Johannes, patruusque Humsfredus (uterque ejusdem ordinis), in sæculo rebellionis nunquam satisfendæ sedem quietam per 14 annos hic invenerunt.

Oxonia obsessa Prior ad Carolum Regem ultro se contulit, & ab ipso, inter alia fiduciæ negotia, commissionem de armandis scholaribus ad aras & focos defendendos tuto reportavit anno 1644.

Alter vero cælibem vitam agens procul ambitu procul negotiis Deo & studiis solum vacavit. Hospitium decem senibus alendis Richmondia fundavit; nepotemque hunc unicum (a cunis orphanum) & vivens & moriens (26) filii loco habuit.

(26) He died Nov. 16, 1696

The alms-house here mentioned stands upon the declivity of the hill, it was built in 1695, and was endowed by the uncle with upwards of 100*l.* per annum, which afterwards was considerably increased by the nephew

(s) This library, which is of the Corinthian Order (1), was built by Dr Halton, a great part at his own expence, besides his study of books. The sum of 600*l.* was given also by his tutor, Dr Thomas Smith, some time a fellow of the college, and then Bishop of Carlisle (2), which Bishoprick he obtained by the interest of Sir Joseph Williamson (3); who was his pupil, and gave also to the library a curious and valuable collection of manuscripts, especially in Heraldry, and Memoirs of his foreign Negotiations. To these Sir John Floyer, an eminent Physician at Lichfield in Staffordshire, added his library, containing many excellent books. The building was begun in 1693, on account of the legacy of Dr Thomas Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, some time Provost of the college, who bequeathed the greatest part of his books and manuscripts to it, leaving the rest to the Bodleyan library, of which he had been Keeper.

(1) See a description of it, in a poem intitled Oxford, by Mr Tickell, in 1707, with a dedication to Lord Londale.

(2) The Bishop married the widow of Sir Richard Fletcher of Hutton, great grandfather to the wife of Dr Joseph Smith, See a further account of this prelate in Willis's Cathedrals, under Carlisle.

(3) Whom Dr Halton attended as chaplain in his embassy with Sir Leoline Jenkins, to Cologne, in 1673.

(t) Not less than 7000, as I am inform'd, besides what he gave to the college buildings in the Provostship of Dr Lancaster, &c.

* See the particulars in the dedication to Dr Smith of Mr Simpson's elegant edition of Epicurus, &c. 8vo.

(u) Viz. to the society for the propagation of the Gospel, that for promoting Christian knowledge, St George's hospital London, the Westminster infirmary, the small-pox hospital, and likewise to the Protestant schools in Ireland, as well as to those at Oxford and at Kidlington, where he not only subscribed handsomely himself, but applied for an annual subscription in the neighbourhood, for settling and endowing a school, according to the proposals he drew up for the purpose, tho' it did not succeed to his expectations.

which was very considerable (t). Such extraordinary services will always stand as so many memorials of his paternal affection for the college *, and of his generous principle in employing that interest for the society, which might have been of service to himself. He declined the office of Vice-Chancellor, on account of the infirm state of his health, through a tenderness of constitution, which, as he advanced in years, occasioned frequent confinement; otherwise no person was better qualified to support the dignity of that post. However, as long as he was able, and the statutes of the college would admit, he discharged the duty of his parish at St Dionis; the cure of mens souls being the principal ingredient in his character. He used frequently to retire for his health, in the summer season, to his villa at Kidlington, where he purchased a manor and estate, now in the possession of his family, which though near Oxford seem'd formed for such a retirement, as he grew latterly very fond of: It gave him a singular pleasure in the enjoyment of a few select friends, and those whom he liked; in whose company he would be very chearful and diverting, without scandal or reflecting on others. He was obliging, humble, and sincere, ever friendly and generous in his temper, and more ready to serve others than himself; in which respect he had by his interest an opportunity of doing many kind and generous offices. He was a kind and loving husband, a tender and indulgent father, and a good master, taking care of the spiritual, as well as temporal concerns of all that belonged to him. His liberality to the poor was extensive, and distributed without ostentation, and besides the many publick charities to which he was a constant subscriber (u), he was a trustee to others. About four years before his death he was greatly afflicted with the strangury, which he bore with true Christian fortitude and resignation; but this obliging him to use frequent bleeding and evacuations, the decays of nature came thereby fast upon him, 'till at last by a numbness of his limbs, and a total loss almost of his sight; he found death approaching, and took to his bed in the college on the Founder's day (w), August the fifteenth. He lived a dying life in this languishing condition for upwards of three months; during which interval he employed the time in divine contemplations, making frequent ejaculations and repetitions out of the Psalms. On the day of his departure, being quite emaciated and worn out, he took a solemn leave of his family, and after recommending himself to the Almighty in fervent prayer, he cried out in the words of the burial service, O death where is thy sting! &c. and expired. Thus died this venerable good man on Tuesday November 23, 1756, aged eighty-six years. His remains were deposited on the twenty-ninth, according to his own appointment, in the vault under the altar of the new chapel at the college; all the members thereof, as well as some of the heads of other colleges, attending him to the grave. An elegant Latin speech was spoken on the occasion, by Mr Thomas Hodgson, some time a Fellow, and a handsome copy of verses to his memory was afterwards inserted in the London Magazine in 1757, by Mr John Hodgson of the same college, whose poetical genius has on several occasions been displayed to his honour [T]. We have two sermons published by

(w) Which was always a memorable day with him, and particularly in 1740; which being the 400th year from the founding of the college, a grand jubilee was kept (the same being observed there once in 100 years), when the celebrated Mr Powell sung there a Te Deum, accompanied with the choir from Magdalen college

(27) Aubrey's Antiquities of Surrey, Vol. V. P. 342 to 347.

(28) He had been a member in several parliaments for Sandwich in Kent.

(29) See the inscription over the gateway.

* See also Dr Smith's character in a book of poems, &c. published in 8vo. p. 250. by the ingenious Mr Thompson aforementioned, son to the said Mr Francis Thompson, who published the State of the Case relating to the election of a Provost of Queen's college.

nephew (27), who died September 5, 1739 (28), and was buried at Old Windfor with his ancestors, who had a large seat and estate there, whereof a considerable part descended to him (29).

[T] Mr Hodgson's poetical genius has been displayed to his honour. They are wrote in a true poetical spirit, and therefore we shall oblige the reader with a transcript of them, as follows *:

I.

Not in oblivion's gloom expire,
The breasts that glow with sacred fire.
Ordain'd by heav'n their worth to save,
The hallow'd Muse receives the hearse,
And bids them live in endless verse,
Triumphant o'er the withering grave.

II.

Thee, SMITH, the mark'd, when, from it's clay,
Emerg'd thy pure ethereal ray,
To mix with fainted souls on high;
And, while Philippa's fons the tear
Of gratitude pour'd o'er thy bier,
Entun'd thy heart-felt elegy,

III.

Ah me, she cry'd! the good and wife,
In Death's cold arms extended lies;
See Virtue mourn th' afflicting blow!
His was the courtly grace and ease,
That taught her harsher voice to please,
And sooth'd the roughness of her brow.

IV.

Say ye, who all attention hung
O'er the sweet accents of his tongue,
Whene'er he pour'd th' instructive lore;
How, taught in holy hope to rise,
Ye burn'd impatient for the skies,
Allur'd by fading earth no more.

V.

Nor did persuasive speech alone
Fix on his lips her sacred throne;
More strong his fair example taught.
The laws he preach'd his steps pursu'd,
While every eye with wonder view'd,
And emulative ardour caught.

by our author (x). One on the death of Queen Anne, intituled, The duty of the Living to the Memory of the dead. The other preached before the Sons of the Clergy, printed under the title of the faithful Stewardship. He also published in 1754, 8vo. A clear and comprehensive View of the Being and Attributes of God, formed not only upon the Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures, but the solid Reasonings and Testimonies of the best Authors, both Heathen and Christian, which have writ upon that subject [U]. The author's principal

design

(x) See Lett- come's Preacher's Assistant, and Historical Register, 8vo. both the sermons went through two editions, and several copies of the latter were sent to the West Indies by Sir George Wheeler, and dispersed there.

VI.

Oft' has the drooping head of care,
Rais'd by his hand from fell despair,
View'd days of brighter tenour flow.
Oft' has his judgment's piercing rays
Urravell'd doubt's perplexing maze,
And giv'n the heart new peace to know.

VII.

Smit with the charms of varied good,
Each virtuous breast his friendship woo'd.
Oh WILLIAMSON ||! thy favourite boast;
Ev'n the fair pride of sovereign power †,
Call'd him to share the social hour,
And pomp in grateful converse lost.

VIII.

But chief for long try'd wisdom known,
Fair learning mark'd him for her own,
Exulting in his generous sway:
Kind gentle warmth his influence shed,
Each science rais'd it's laurell'd head,
Each latent genius sprung to day.

IX.

Now, whilst he soars to purer light,
The Muse, he nurs'd, pursues his flight,
Far as the confines of the sky:
There harps angelic take the strain,
And hail him to th' ethereal plain,
Whilst his hands reach th' immortal prize.

[U] A clear and comprehensive View, &c. The greatest part of the impression being sold off very soon, and the remainder sent to the British plantations and factories abroad, he afterwards made considerable additions to it (for he still preserved the solidity and quickness of his judgment surprizingly), and published a second edition with his name to it (30), and a dedication to the Prince of Wales, now King George the Third, and Prince Edward, now Duke of York. Our author was very assiduous to the last in employing his time to some general good, and it is to be wished that he had begun earlier in life, to give us other specimens, as well as this, of his valuable compositions, of which he left a considerable number in manuscript. However, we have some ground to hope that some of them will be published by his friends, though, as he had not such a design, they must needs appear to a disadvantage.

We must not conclude this memoir, without mentioning the application that was made to Dr Smith, after the death of Bishop Beveridge in 1707, to look over his Lordship's manuscripts, and chiefly those on the XXXIX Articles, and his Private Thoughts on Religion, which he revised and published (31); but the last being very imperfect, he was obliged to make large additions, and he took a great deal of pains to finish it, according to the mind and sentiments of the learned and pious author, of whom he gave an excellent character in the preface (32); and the work has gone through several editions.

To this must also be added, that, in 1742, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. gave the university of Oxford the benefit of the impression of his manuscript of Shakespeare, occasioned by an intimation given him by Dr Smith, that such a present would be acceptable to them; and the affair was afterwards conducted by him and Dr Shippen, Principal of Brazen-nose-college, for they were both particularly consulted in the publication of this beautiful edition of Shakespeare, as appears by the correspondence Sir Thomas had with Dr Smith on that occasion. The edition was printed at Oxford in 4to. 1744, on the finest royal paper, to which is prefixed a good cut to every play, done (by Gravelot) at the expence of Sir Thomas. This worthy gentleman, who died at his seat in Suffolk in May 1746, had been Knight of the Shire for that county, as also for Flintshire, and some time Member for Thetford. He was unanimously chosen Speaker of the House of Commons on the 12th of Queen Anne.

In a letter to Dr Smith, dated March 18, 1741-2, he writes as follows:

' Dear Sir,

' I have received the favour of your letter, by which you desire me to open a little the plan I would propose for a new impression of Shakespeare, upon which subject, if I speak unskilfully or improperly, I may well be forgiven, it being so new to me.

My aim in general is to promote a correct and a beautiful edition of his dramatic works, more worthy of the author than any of those which have hitherto been bestowed upon him. It must be in six volumes in quarto, in as large a letter at least as that published by Mr Pope, but upon much better paper, for it ought to be the finest royal, as good as the large paper of Dr Middleton's late Life of Cicero. I propose to have a good cut prefixed to every play, done by the very best designer and engraver; which copper plates are now under hand, and in pretty great forwardness: and these I design shall be at my expence. I will give them freely to the publick, that the book may be brought within the compass of a reasonable price, which I would not have exceed four pounds at the most: if it can be afforded cheaper I shall be glad (33), nor do I desire more copies for myself than ten or twelve to give to my particular friends.

He then recommends the strictest care in correcting the press, for which it would not be ready 'till the beginning of next winter. ' However, continues he, I should be glad to be favoured with an answer, that I may know how it relishes, and whether any objections are made. I should be glad to have it in my power to oblige the university, to which I had the honour to belong, and for which I have always retained the greatest respect.

I am,

S I R,

Your most humble

and obedient servant,

Tho. Hanmer.'

In

(32) It has been already cited more than once under that prelate's article, in this Work.

(33) The subscription price was three guineas, but the book now sells for ten, being grown very scarce.

† Sir Joseph Williamson.

† Queen Caroline, to whom he was Chaplain.

(30) The first edition came out 1740.

(31) See Carter's History of Cambridge, for Bishop Beveridge, &c.

design of communicating this compendious summary of Christian morality to the press (for which he was solicited by some of his friends) was to instil the fundamental principles of religion into the minds of our growing youth, and guard them as far as possible against the prevalent attacks of infidelity and free-thinking. The subject itself is common by being so frequently treated on, but our author's method of handling it with regard to the arrangement of the several arguments and solutions, which are enlarged upon under each head, and his tender and affectionate manner of applying them to excite a suitable practice, are in a great measure new, and different from any other treatises that have yet appeared of the like sort.

Difficile est proprie commutia dicere.

HOR.

Dr Smith was succeeded in the Provostship of Queen's-college by Dr Joseph Browne, Canon-Residentiary of the church and Chancellor of the diocese of Hereford, and in his Prebend of Stoke-Newington, in the church of St Paul, London, by Dr Nicholls, Master of the Temple, and now also Rector of St James's, Westminster.

In another letter, dated May 19, 1742, Sir Thomas expresses himself in these terms:

Dear Sir,

I ought to acknowledge the favour of your letter, though, as it found me here under the affliction of my nephew's death, I have had no opportunity since of knowing from you or Dr Shippen, what further information or satisfaction is desired from me. This in general may be depended on, that since the university is pleased to accept so small a present from me, they shall make what use of it they please; I will prescribe in nothing to them. The edition must be in quarto, because the plates are prepared for a volume of that size; but whether a small number only shall be upon the best royal paper, and the rest upon less, shall be left with them to determine. I wish only the purchase may not be too dear: nor would it be the interest of the university to have it so, because it would be an obstruction to the sale of the book. If you have any further commands for me upon this subject, or any other, please to direct to me at Hanmer, near Whitchurch in Shropshire, for thither I am removing to-morrow.

I am,

S I R,

Your most humble

and most obedient servant,

Tho. Hanmer.
P

(a) Memoirs of the Life of John Lord Somers, &c. p. 10. edit. 1716. The writer of his Life, in the General Dictionary, tells us, he was educated at a private school in Staffordshire, but gives no authority for it.

(b) Ibid. p. 10.

(c) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 960.

(d) Life, as before.

• Ath. Oxon. as before.

(e) Life, p. 10.

(f) They were both printed by Mr Tonson, who had the honour to be intimately acquainted with him while he was a young barrister. Id. p. 11.

(1) Life of Lord Somers, &c. p. 9, 10. edit. 1716, 8vo.

(2) Id. p. 10.

SOMERS [JOHN LORD], an illustrious statesman, of consummate abilities and irreproachable integrity, was descended of reputable parents in the city of Worcester [A], where he was born in the year 1652; and being put to the college school there (a), was soon taken notice of for the quickness and solidity of his parts, and had the character of being the brightest boy in it; when he was removed to Oxford (b), and admitted a gentleman-commoner of Trinity-college (c). In the university, the same good sense grew into a judicious and elegant taste of classical learning, and he would certainly have become equally the delight and boast of that eminent seat of the Muses, had he staid longer in it (d); but he left it without taking any degree*. His father having always intended to breed him to his own profession, the Law, had entered him a Clerk to Sir Francis Winnington [B] for some time; after the expiration of which he was removed to the Middle Temple (e). Here two different talents were observed to concur in his genius, which are almost certain indications of the possessor's becoming a great man: to an exquisite taste of polite literature, was joined a turn to business in the practice of the Law. This implied solidity of judgment, and prompted an industrious application; whilst the other furnished delicacy of sentiment, and an elegant diction. Accordingly we find an unwearied diligence following Mr Somers through all the stages of his life, which gave him such a thorough insight into the laws of the land, that he passed for one of the greatest masters of his profession, at his first appearance in it [C]: At the same time, he found leisure to read and digest the finest authors both of the learned and modern languages, and was engaged with several of the politest writers of the age, in the English translation of Plutarch's Lives in prose, and Ovid's Epistles in verse; in the first, he performed the Life of Alcibiades, and in the other Dido's Epistle to Æneas, and that of Ariadne to Theseus (f). Neither in his profession could such accomplishments be confined wholly to the lucrative part of it. On the contrary, he was not satisfied with occasionally looking into the history and original of such particular laws and customs, as his practice led him to, he made the knowledge of the constitution in general a distinct branch of his studies; so that he became a master

[A] Descended of reputable parents, &c. His father, Mr John Somers, was an Attorney-at-Law, possessed of a good estate, which his Lordship inherited; and his mother, Mrs Catherine Ceaverne, was a gentlewoman of a good family in Shropshire. His grandfather was also a citizen of Worcester of good substance (1).

[B] He was Clerk to Sir Francis Winnington. This eminent Lawyer we are told, from being a Servitor in Trinity-college had raised a great estate by the Law, though his talent consisted rather in speaking fluently than eloquently, knowing how to wrangle better than to argue (2). He was Solicitor-General to King Charles the Second, in which post he was succeeded by Heneage Finch, second son to Chancellor Finch, and younger brother to Daniel Earl of Nottingham (3).

[C] One of the greatest masters of his profession at the time of his first appearance in it. Mr Addison observes, that though he had made a regular progress through the several honours of the Long Robe, he was always looked upon as one who deserved a superior station to that he was possessed of, 'till he arrived at the highest dignity to which these studies could advance him (4).

[D] He

(3) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 720 and 1055.

(4) Freeholder, No. 39.

a matter in it †: and, siding against the Court, he early published several pieces in the political way, which were universally esteemed [D]. As in pleading at the bar, his oratory was masculine and persuasive, free from every thing trivial and affected. So his style in writing was chaste and pure, but at the same time full of spirit and politeness, and fit to convey the most intricate business to the understanding of the reader with the utmost clearness and perspicuity †. One of the first of these tracts was, his History of the Succession of the Crown of England [E]: written in favour of the attempt to exclude † Freeholder, 27 before.

|| Freeholder.

[D] He wrote several pieces in the political way, &c.] Bishop Burnet mentioning the return of the bill against the Earl of Shaftesbury Ignoramus, by the Grand-Jury; and observing, that in defence of these Ignoramus juries it was said, that by the express words of their oath, they were bound to make true presentments of what should appear true to them; and, therefore, if they did not believe the evidence, they could not find a bill though sworn to, proceeds thus: 'A book, says he, was written to support that, in which law and reason were brought to confirm it. It passed as writ by Lord Essex, but I understood afterwards it was writ by Somers, who was much esteemed and often visited by Lord Essex; and, who trusted himself to him, and wrote the best papers that came out at that time (5).' Mr Walpole tells us, that he had met with a small piece, said to be written by Lord Somers, which, perhaps, says he, was one of the tracts hinted at here. It is intitled, The security of Englishmens lives: or, The trust, power, and duty of the Grand-Juries of England, explained according to the fundamentals of the English Government, &c. I believe the reader will be before-hand with me, in concluding this to be the very book mentioned by Burnet. As this, as well as the other pieces here intimated were published without his name, Mr Addison makes this remark upon it (7). 'It is to be lamented, says he, that this extraordinary person, out of his natural aversion to vain-glory, wrote several pieces as well as performed several actions, which he did not assume the honour of: though, at the same time, so many works of this nature have appeared, which every one has ascribed to him, that I believe no author of the greatest eminence would deny my Lord Somers to have been the best writer of the age in which he lived.' Thus this author, out of gratitude to his benefactor, who first brought him into the eye and notice of the world; and, therefore, such a stroke of panegyric is excusable, especially in a funeral oration, as that may well be called whence this passage is cited (8). But to speak impartially, may it not, without breach of candor, be said, that in Mr Somers's conduct, in forbearing to set his name to the political pieces he wrote in the reign of King Charles the Second, there was at least a mixture of self-security with that of self denial. A prudent regard to his own interest cannot fairly be denied to have its weight in this restraint, from appearing publickly against the Government; which was the side he took in these tracts. At the same time, I agree with Mr Walpole, that 'such deathless monuments of his parts and virtue as Lord Somers erected during the course of his life, diminish the regret we should otherwise feel; that though his Lordship wrote several pieces, we are ignorant even of the titles of many of them (9);' and how little any fame of this kind was his object may be inferred from hence, that 'tis not known he ever, upon any occasion, laid his claim to them, even after the Revolution, which was a compleat sponge of the motive of self-preservation. However, he did not always keep the same absolute reserve with regard to his other pieces; at least, if any credit may be given to the writer of his life, who gives us the following, as he calls it, pleasant story, concerning a small piece of poetry which his Lordship writ, and which was owned with great impudence by a man now [in 1716] living. 'This person being introduced to my Lord when he was Chancellor; his Lordship took occasion to ask him, whether he writ such a paper of verses? Yes, my Lord, replied he, 'tis a trifle; I did it off hand. Upon which, his Lordship laughing pretty heartily, the pretended Poet withdrew in the utmost confusion, cursing the gentleman who had contrived to bring him to my Lord, to shew an instance of uncommon effrontery (10)' land.] The whole title runs thus: *A brief History of the succession of the Crown of England, collected out of records; written for the satisfaction of the Earl of H. . In this curious piece he endeavours to prove the Parliament's power to settle the descent of the Crown, by the constitution of our kingdom. To which purpose he produces all the remarkable instances from the earliest ages to the reign of King James the First, wherein the succession by proximity of blood was broken and over-ruled by the States by of the Realm (11). He proceeds to declare, that it was as easy to shew, that in all other kingdoms the next in blood hath been frequently excluded from the succession. As an illustrious instance, instar omnium, (the reasoning in it being such as in his sentiments extends to all), he recites the speech, which the Ambassadors sent from the States of France, made to Charles of Lorraine, when they had solemnly rejected him, and placed Hugh Capet upon the Throne: notwithstanding Charles was the son of Louis the Fourth, d'Outremer; and after the death of his nephew, Louis the Fifth, Le Faincant, without issue, was next in blood to the Crown (12). 'They told him, that every body knew the right of succession to the Crown of France belonged to him, and not to Hugh Capet; but yet, say they, the very same laws which give you the right of succession, do judge you also unworthy of the same; for that you have not hitherto endeavoured to frame your manners according to the prescript of the laws, nor according to the usages of your country, but have rather allied yourself with the German nation, our enemies, and have loved their vile and base manners. Wherefore, as you have forsaken the ancient virtue and sweetness of your country; we have also forsaken and abandoned you, and have chosen Hugh Capet for our King (13), and put you back; and this without any scruple of conscience at all, esteeming it better and more just to live under him, enjoying our ancient laws, customs, privileges, and liberties, than under you, the heir by blood, in oppression, strange customs, and cruelty. For as those who are to make a voyage at sea don't much consider whether the pilot be owner of the ship, but whether he be skilful and wary. So our care is to have a prince to govern us gently and happily; (which is the end for which princes were appointed) and for these ends we judge this man fitter to be our king. Our author then proceeds to answer the objections, which he reduces to four. In speaking to the third, which is of those who maintain, that as William the Conqueror subdued the kingdom, the descent being settled by him becomes unalterable; he observes, 'That granting for argument sake, the absolute conquest by King William, yet that prince did not institute a succession by proximity of blood; and 'tis plain he never designed the Crown should so descend, but gave it to his second son; and thereby gave an example of excluding and pretermittting the unworthy. To the fourth objection, that the fundamental laws of the land, against which no Act of Parliament can be of force, had so established the succession, that the course of it cannot be altered; having first observed, that this argument is answered by the foregoing history, he turns it against the objectors, in asking them, by what authority those laws were made? If by the king alone, then no doubt but he may change them too; if by the people, they run before they are aware, into the guilt of worshipping that idol, the multitude; and make a great step towards placing the government upon contract and consent. He then challenges them to shew this law; and when the maxim, that the descent of the Crown purges all defects whatsoever, is alledged to be a part of this law, he remarks, that the first mention of that maxim is in the Year Book of Henry

* In the original copy there were several additions, in Lord Somers's hand writing, from whence the editor ascribes it to his Lordship. Vid. Somers's Tracts, 4th Collection, Vol. 11. p. 167.

(11) It must be owned, that this task was become less difficult by the conference about the succession, wrote by Parsons the Jesuit.

(12) Louis IV. fil-d'Outremer, left two sons, Lotharius and this Charles. Lotharius, the eldest, succeeded Louis IV. and then Lotharius's son, Louis V. le Foinant. It is remarkable, that Charles did not share the kingdom with his brother Lotharius, as had been the custom in France. See the Hist. of that kingdom.

(13) This seems to favour Lord Rochester's argument, in the conference about the word abdicated, where his Lordship alledged, that the placing the Prince of Orange upon the Throne would make the monarchy elective. See his article.

[E] History of the succession of the Crown of England. VOL. VI. No. CCCXIII.

(5) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. 11. p. 153. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(6) A Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, &c. Vol. 11. under the article of Lord Somers.

(7) In the before cited Freeholder.

(8) His Lordship died on the 26th of April, 1716; and this panegyric was published in the Freeholder for May 14th following.

(9) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, as before.

(10) Life of Lord Somers, p. 214.

clude the Duke of York: the great political subject from the year 1678, 'till the dissolution of the Parliament in 1681; which year he had a considerable share in another piece, intituled, A just and modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments; in answer to King Charles the Second's Declaration to all his loving Subjects, touching the causes and reasons that moved him to dissolve the two last Parliaments [F].

And

' Henry the Seventh, where the Judges declare, ' that the king is a person able and discharged from ' any attainder, eo facto, that he took upon himself ' the government, and to be king. He remarks ' shrewdly, that Henry the Seventh was then king, ' de facto, and in possession of the Throne; and it ' was somewhat of the latest to consider, whether ' he was qualified or not. Certainly, says he, it ' would have been strange self denial in the Judges, ' and a neglect of themselves, which is not usual ' with them, to have alledged an incurable disability ' in the king, from whom they had their patents ' and authority. That not above three years before ' this opinion of the Judges, in the first of Richard ' the Third, the whole Parliament did not only give ' their opinion, but assured Richard, that all learned ' men of that time held clearly, that an attainder ' did hinder the descent of the Crown, and incapacitate ' the attainted person to take it; and in the ' following words of the Act of the seventh year of ' Edward the Fourth, George Duke of Clarence ' was attainted of treason; by reason whereof all the ' issue of the said George, was, and is, disabled, and ' barred of all right and claim, that in any case he ' or his issue might have or challenge by inheritance ' to the crown and dignity royal of these realms. ' After that, continue they, we consider, that you ' [Richard] be the undoubted heir, &c.; and so ' they proceed, in affirming, that all learned ' men in the laws do approve his title (14) He ' concludes his answer with observing, ' that either ' the Judges intended no such thing by their opinion, ' or else at least, that extra-judicial opinions were ' then as apocryphal as they have been since.' This ' thing at the Judges will perhaps be better understood, ' when we consider the complaisance paid by the Bench ' to the Crown at this time, when the Commons voted an ' impeachment against three of them (15), for drawing the ' proclamation against petitioning for a Parliament. ' But when, continues ' our author, I reflect what sort of men I am arguing ' with, and how willingly they used to submit to ' authority, I think I shall convince them best by ' citing the opinions of two great men, the one a ' Cardinal, the other a Lord-Chancellor, both of ' them martyrs for the Papal Supremacy! I mean ' Fisher and Sir Thomas More. 'Tis well known ' how resolutely, even to death, they refused the ' Oath of Succession, which the Parliament had ' framed, because therein the King's Supremacy was ' avowed; and, therefore, they cannot be suspected ' to dissemble, when, at the very same time, they ' declared, that if that of Supremacy was left out, ' they would willingly swear an oath to maintain the ' succession of the Crown to the issue of the King's ' present marriage, as it was then established by ' Parliament, for which they gave this reason, that ' this was in the power of a Parliament to determine, ' but not who was supreme head of the Church. ' Sir Thomas went farther, and owned a very strange ' opinion of their power in this point, but he says ' it expressly at the same time, that the Parliament ' had unquestionable authority, in ordering of the ' succession; and that the people were bound to ' obey them therein.' In answer to the objection, ' that an Act of Parliament to disinherit the next ' heir, is unjust and without a sufficient ground. ' Mr Somers writes thus: ' I will not at present enter ' into a dispute, how far the difference of religion, ' which will also necessarily draw on a change in ' the government, does justify men in seeking to ' preserve the two dearest things on earth in an ' orderly and lawful way. I will not, though ' I safely might, challenge those men to tell me, ' whether ever any settled nation, which had laws ' of their own, and were not under the immediate ' force of a conqueror, did ever admit of a king ' of another religion than their own (16). I will ' not insist on it, that the Crown is an inheritance, ' accompanying an office of trust, and that if a man's ' defects render him incapable of the trust, he has ' also forfeited the inheritance. I need not say ' how far a nation is to be excused for exercising ' justice summarily and without the tedious formality ' of law, when the necessity of things requires haste, ' and the party flies from justice, and his confederates ' are numerous and daring, and the prince's life ' in danger. But this I will say, that if the Parlia- ' ment has power in this thing, which I need not ' prove by shewing, that the ordinary course of law ' allows heirs to be disinherited by fines and re- ' coveries; and that the Parliament in all ages has ' frequently done it, by making the strongest settle- ' ments, where equity has dictated it, though the ' heirs were never in any wise criminal. These, ' according to Sir Thomas More's opinion, the people, ' are bound in conscience to obey; and must not ' pretend to enquire whether they were made upon ' just grounds. For by the same reason, they may ' pretend that all other laws were made without just ' cause, and refuse obedience to any of them; ' and surely those that should do so, would be an ' excellent loyal party. God defend the nation from ' such loyalty as opposes itself to the king and the ' laws; and God defend the king from the pre- ' tended duty and submission of those men, who, ' whilst they talk of his power, so much renounce ' it openly, and oppose what would be the greatest ' security of his person, and in effect set up his ' successor above him, even in his life time.'

This piece was reprinted in 1714 (17), under the ' title of A brief History of the succession of the Crown ' of England; wherein facts collected from the best ' authorities are opposed, to the novel assertion of in- ' defeasible hereditary right. To which is subjoined ' the following preface. ' The great noise that has ' been of late revived about hereditary right, which ' the next of blood in the royal family has to the ' Crown of Great-Britain, makes me believe, that ' the reprinting of the following history at this time ' may be of service, especially to such as have not ' opportunity or leisure to peruse our history at large. ' It was collected and first published in King Charles ' the Second's time, when the endeavour was made ' to set aside the Popish heir; and afterwards re- ' printed at the time of the Revolution; to shew in ' a short compass, what notion our ancestors, as well ' as princes as people in all times, had of this matter; ' by which I think it does sufficiently appear, that ' even our Princes themselves have all of them ' esteemed that the best title that came by acts of ' settlement. And those who received the Crown, ' have seldom thought themselves rightly fixed until ' they had obtained some act of recognition.'

[F] He had a share in the just and modest Vin- ' dication, &c.] This piece was first written by Alger- ' noon Sydney, but new drawn by Somers, and cor- ' rected by Jones*. In it, among other things, it is ' suggested, that dissolving the Parliament was an ' arbitrary act, wherein the king had exceeded the ' power of his prerogative in breach of the constitution, ' diverse statutes having provided both for the holding ' of annual Parliaments, and that they should not be ' prorogued or dissolved 'till all the petitions and bills ' before them were answered and redressed. ' That ' Parliaments should thus meet and thus sit, continues ' he, is secured to us by the same sacred tie, by ' which the King, at his Coronation, does oblige ' himself to let his Judges sit to distribute justice ' every term, and to preserve inviolably all other ' rights and liberties of the subjects.' The author ' afterwards remarks, ' that though, to the dishonour ' of our country, it does appear that some English- ' men were concerned in the unhappy advice of ' breaking the two last Parliaments, and setting out ' this present defence of it; yet the Gallicisms, ' which are found in the paper, shew the writer to ' have been of another nation, or at least to have ' had his thoughts so much taken up for the interests ' of France, (whilst he was labouring this way to ' heighten

(14) Cotton's Records, fol. 709.

(15) These were, Lord Chief Justice North, Sir William Jones, a Puisné Judge of the King's Bench, and Sir Richard Weston, a Puisné Baron of the Exchequer. Gen. Hist. of England.

(16) These words refer to a practice of Parliament, protested against in the King's declaration for dissolving it. Vide the subsequent remark.

(17) By way of answer, as it should seem, to a piece intituled, The Old English Constitution, in relation to the hereditary succession of the Crown, antecedent to the Revolution in 1688, printed the same year, 1714.

* Attorney General to King Charles. Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. fol. edit.

And the same year he was the reputed author of another, written in defence of the Grand Jury, for not finding the bill of indictment for High-Treason against the Earl of Shaftesbury (g). In the same spirit he appeared Counsel for Pilkington and Shute, Sheriffs of London, Cornish and Bethel, Aldermen, together with Ford, Lord Grey of Werk, Sir Thomas Player, Mr John Jekyl, father of Sir Joseph Jekyl (b), and several others, who were tried on the 8th of May, 1683, for a riot in the city at the election of the Sheriffs the precedent year [G]. As he foresaw a change in the government established by Law would unavoidably follow a change in the religion of the governor (i), and upon that account had promoted every orderly and legal way of compassing the exclusion of the Duke of York; so he continued to oppose all the illegal and arbitrary proceedings of King James the Second: and being employed as Counsel in the trial of the seven Bishops in 1688, he argued with great firmness of speech, and perspicuity of reason, against the dispensing power usurped by that unfortunate Prince [H]. With these principles, and such abilities, it is no wonder that he was admitted into the most secret counsels of the Prince of Orange, and was one of those who concerted the measures for bringing him over (k). After his arrival in England, he was chosen representative for his native city of Worcester, in the Convention which met upon the summons of that Prince, January 22, 1688-9 (l); and, in the conference between the two Houses about the word abdicated, he was appointed one of the managers for the House of Commons [I], whereby the Lords were induced heighten and perpetuate the differences between the King and his people) that he could not express himself in any other idiom than theirs; he would not otherwise have introduced the King, saying, that it was a matter extremely sensible to us; a form of speech peculiar to the French, and unknown to any other nation. The reader, who understands that language, will observe so many more of this kind, as will give him just cause to doubt, whether the whole paper was not a translation, and whether the English one, or that which was published in French, was the original. Let us then no longer wonder, that the time of dissolving our Parliaments is known at Paris sooner than at London, since it is probable the reasons now given for it were formed there too. The Peers at Oxford were so totally ignorant of the counsel, that they never once thought of a dissolution, 'till they heard it pronounced; but the Dukes of Mazarine had better intelligence, and published the news at St James's many hours before it was done. This declaration was not communicated to the Privy-Council 'till Friday the eighth of April, when his Majesty, according to his late method, did graciously declare to them his pleasure to set it forth, without desiring from them any advice in the matter. But Monsieur Barillon, the French Ambassador, did not only read it to a gentleman the fifth of April but advised with him about it, and demanded his opinion of it, which his Excellency will the better remember, because of the great liberty which the person took in ridiculing it to his face (18).

(i) See his History of the Succession of the Crown, &c. towards the end.

(k) Tindal's Continuation of Rapin's General History of England, Vol. I.

(l) His Life, p. 17.

Some of the reasons given for this dissolution were their intire neglect of the public, and falling into factions; their issuing arbitrary orders for taking his Majesty's loyal subjects into custody for matters that had no relation to privilege of Parliament; their declaring many eminent persons enemies to the King and kingdom without any order or process of Law, any hearing of their defence, or any proof so much as offered; their resolves against any persons that lend his Majesty money, or buy any tally of anticipation, thereby endeavouring to reduce him to a more helpless condition than the meanest of his subjects; their taking upon them to suspend the laws and acts of Parliament, by voting against the prosecution of Dissenters (19).

[G] He was Counsel for Pilkington, &c.] The two Sheriffs had continued the poll for new Sheriffs after the Common-Hall was adjourned by the Lord-Mayor, for which they were committed to the Tower, June 26, 1682, but were admitted to bail on the 30th of that month. And being brought with the rest to their trial abovementioned, they were all convicted and fined. Pilkington, 500 l.; Shute, 1000 marks; the Lord Grey, Bethel, and Cornish, 1000 marks each, and the rest in lesser sums (20). Their Counsel were Mr Holt, Mr Thompson, Mr Williams, Sir Francis Winnington, Mr Wallop, Mr Freke, and Mr Somers (21).

[H] He was Counsel for the Bishops, and spoke admirably well against the dispensing power.] Being the youngest Counsel employed on that side, his turn was to speak last of all. But this, which is ordinarily a great disadvantage (especially where some of the most eminent Lawyers are retained, as in the present case) (22), our young Barrister by the force of his excellent parts, converted it into an occasion of displaying his superior merit. Among other things, he produced the case of Thomas and Sorrel in the Exchequer-Chamber, upon the validity of the dispensation of the statute of Edward the Sixth, touching selling of wine, arguing, that there it was the opinion of every one of the Judges, that there never could be an abrogation or a suspension (which is a temporary abrogation) of an Act of Parliament but by the Legislative power: That indeed it was disputed, how far the King might dispense with the penalties in such a particular law, as to particular persons; but it was agreed by all, that the King had no power to suspend any law; of which there could be no dispensation, but by an Act of Parliament. That by the laws of all civilized nations, if the Prince does require something to be done, which the person who is to do it takes to be unlawful, it is not only lawful but his duty, rescribere Principi; which is all the Bishops had done here, and that in the most humble manner. That the matter of fact, alledged in the Bishops petition, had been proved perfectly true, by the Journals of both Houses; that there could be no design to diminish the prerogative by it, because the King has no such prerogative: that the petition could not be seditious, because it was presented to the King in private, and alone; nor false, because the matter of it was true; nor malicious, for the occasion was not sought, the thing was pressed upon them; nor in short a libel, because the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds set by Act of Parliament, that gives the subject leave to apply to the King when he is aggrieved.

The writer of his life observes (23), that what Mr Somers urged in this short, but very just argument, made more than ordinary impression on the jury, and was more taken notice of than the argument of the elder lawyers, who pleaded the Bishop's cause before him. It has been often said that this cause was the first event that produced him into the world (24). But the same writer assures us, not without great appearance of truth, that from the time of his being engaged for the Sheriffs Pilkington and Shute, &c. his practice increased daily: and continues he, 'tis said, he got 700 l. per annum by it in King James the Second's reign.' If this was an extraordinary gain at that time, it must be allowed that the times are much altered since in favour of the lawyers. The same writer having observed afterwards, that Mr Somers inherited a good estate after the death of his father, declares, that he was looked upon as one of the most rising Counsel in England, before he appeared at the trial of the Bishops (25).

[I] One of the managers for the House of Commons, &c.] The speech he made on this occasion is too well known,

(22) The other Counsel were Sir Francis Pemberton, Sir Robert Sawyer, Henage Finch, Esq; Serjeant Levinz, &c. See the trial, in the State Tryals.

(23) P.

(24) Swift's History of the four last years of Queen Anne, p. 10. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(25) P. 15.

(g) It was published in 1681, 4to. Baldwin's Catalogue of Pamphlets, in the Reign of King Charles II. See Lord Shaftesbury's Article, Vol. III. p. 1468.

(b) Who afterwards became his brother-in-law. They were intimately acquainted when young students in the Temple. Life, p. 10.

(18) P. 2.

(19) This declaration was ordered to be read in all churches and chapels throughout the Kingdom. Somers's Chron. H. 2. under this year.

(20) Gen. Hist. of England.

(21) Life of Lord Somers, p. 15.

(m) In the room of George Treby, made Attorney-General in the room of Pollexfen, advanced to be Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 960.

(n) Again in the room of Treby, who, upon the death of Pollexfen, succeeded him as Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas. Ibid. col. 961.

* Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

induced to agree to make use of that term against their own amendment. In the beginning of May, 1685, he was made Solicitor General (m) [K], and knighted. While he held this post, came on the tryals of the Lord Preston, Mr Ashton, and Mr Elliot, for high-treason; and in that of the Lord Preston, the Solicitor made a very distinguished figure [L]. And when the legality of the act, in the Convention for recognizing their Majesties, was called in question by one of the Members of the House of Commons, as not being summoned by writ, he spoke with remarkable spirit in defence of it [M]. On the second of May, 1692, he was made Attorney General (n), and was advanced thence to the post of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, on the twenty-third of March ensuing*. He had now an opportunity of displaying all those extraordinary improvements in learning and knowledge, which he was eminently possessed of, in the business of his profession; yet the temper which he invariably preserved upon all occasions, whilst he sat on this Bench, rendered him more particularly conspicuous. He was fair and gentle almost to a fault, considering the dignity of his post, and had all the patience and softness, as well as the justice and equity, becoming a great magistrate. However, it was not the ability and unblemished integrity of the Judge, that recommended him to that confidence, which King William expressed for him on all occasions: it was the uncommon reach of his known, and has been so often printed, that it would be abusing the readers patience to insert it here at length, notwithstanding it is acknowledged to be one of those deathless monuments of the important services done by his Lordship to his country. It is sufficient to give the purport of it as follows:

The Lords had changed the word abdicated for deserted for these two reasons, first, because abdicated was a word not known to the Common Law, and secondly, because the common acceptation of the word, amounts to a voluntary express act of renunciation, which was not in this case, nor what would follow from the premises. To this first objection our manager replies, that their first reason had the same force against their own word deserted, which had no determined sense given to it in the Common Law. That they were both Latin words, and that the word abdicate doth naturally and properly signify, entirely to renounce, throw off, disown, relinquish any thing or person, so as to have no further to do with it, and that, whether it be done by express words or in writing, (which was the sense put upon it by their Lordships, and is properly called resignation or cession) or by doing such acts as are inconsistent with holding or retaining of the thing, which the Commons take to be the present case, and therefore made choice of the word, as that which did above all others most properly express their meaning. This he proceeds to shew was the bare signification of the word from the authorities cited in the margin (26). He further observes, that Grotius seems to expound the word to mean, that he who hath abdicated any thing hath so far relinquished it, that he hath no right of return to it, which is the sense the Commons put upon it. On the other hand, the word deserted in the common acceptance, both of Civil and Cannon Law, signifies only a bare withdrawing, a temporary quitting and neglect only, which leaveth the party at liberty of returning to it again (27), which as the Commons do not take to be the present case, so neither can they think that their Lordships do, because it is expressly said in one of their reasons given in defence of the last amendment, that they had and were willing to secure the nation against the return of King James. He was answered among others by the Earl of Nottingham, who acknowledged that he had fully made out the signification of the word abdicate in the Civil Law; but insisting upon it that it was a word not known to the Common Law, our manager in his reply evaded that argument, by observing, that the same objection however did not lie against the word vacant, which had been applied in a parallel case, in 1 Henry IV. upon record the words which he produced.

[K] He was made Solicitor-General. While he was in this post 'tis said he had some thoughts of marrying, and made his addresses to a young lady, Mrs Anne Bawdon, daughter of Sir John Bawdon, an Alderman of London. That he went so far in it as to deliver in a rental of his estate towards making a settlement, and had several meetings with the young lady's friends to treat of it; but the treaty broke off on account of a difference about the marriage portion and settlement, to the great regret of the lady, when she found him made Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal in two

[L] He made a distinguished figure at Lord Preston's tryal. The tryal was held January 17, before Lord Chief Justice Holt, at the Old-Bailey. All our Solicitor's speeches on this occasion are well worth the perusal of such readers as have any curiosity of this kind (29). But as they are too long to be inserted here, we shall only give the following specimen from that spoken at the opening of the charge. In which having informed that jury, that the general design of the conspiracy was to depose the King and Queen, which was to be effected by a French army and a French fleet, he proceeds in these terms. 'It will be easily granted, that nothing more dreadful can enter into the imagination of an Englishman, than the destruction of our fleet, and the conquest of the kingdom by the arms of France. But yet it will be part of the evidence that we shall offer to you, that the prisoners and others of the conspirators seem to be of another mind; for among the papers which were taken with the prisoners, you will see one which is filed, The result of a conference, wherein they pretend to shew the possibility of restoring King James by the power of the French King, and yet to preserve the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom. They themselves went no farther than to think it possible, and I believe it will be hard, to persuade any other Englishman that it is possible; unless some one instance could be given that the French King ever employed his arms for setting up any body but himself, his own religion, and his own government. I never heard, that he did pretend to form any part of his glories upon the virtue of moderation or self-denial: and there can hardly be imagined a greater instance of self-denial, than for the French King, after he had destroyed the Dutch and English fleets, and subdued our forces at land, not to make use of his success, so as to add these three kingdoms to his conquests, and possess himself of the uncontested dominion of the sea forever, but only to intitle him, at so great a hazard and expence, to become a mediator between King James and the people of England, and by his mediation to establish the Protestant religion, and the liberties of the people. And yet as absurd as this seems, you will find this to be the result of one of their conferences, &c.'

[M] He spoke in defence of the legality of the Convention. Bishop Burnet, who furnishes this particular, gives us the substance of his speech, and tells us, he said, if that was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high treason; the laws repealed by it were still in force; so they must presently return to King James: all the money seized, collected, and paid, by virtue of that act of parliament, made every one that was concerned in it highly criminal. This, continues the Bishop, he spoke with much zeal, and such an ascendant of authority, that none were prepared to answer it. So the bill passed without any more opposition. The Right Reverend historian concludes with a remark, that this was a great service done in a very critical time, and contributed not a little to raise Somers's character (30).

(29) The tryal is inserted among the State Tryals, and the Solicitor's speeches, both at the entrance and the opening, are printed in the Memoirs of his Life, p. 26 to p. 38.

(30) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. III. p. 57. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(26) Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, L. ii. c. 4. §. 49. Calvin's Lexicon. Jurid. Brissonius de Verbor. Significatione. N. B. Sam. Johnson cites a passage from Tully's third Philippic, where the word is used in the same sense. Johnson's Works, p. 274. edit. 1710, fol.

(27) For this he quotes Spigelius's Lexicon, and Bartolus, upon Law 8. tit. 58. cod. lib. xi. as also cod. lib. xii. and Calvin's Lexicon. verb. desert secundum Canonos.

(28) Life, p. 25. years time (28).

[N] Several

his capacity for all affairs of publick concern, that made that prince consider him above all his ministers (o); and several persons of real worth felt the happy effects of the share he had in the royal favour [N]. After the death of Archbishop Tillotson, in 1694, Sir John Somers,

(o) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 108. fol. edit.

[N] Several persons felt the effect of this favour.] When he did not think it proper to countenance some persons, whose learning he admired, though he did not like their characters, he was very bountiful to them at the same time, that he gave them to understand, he could excuse their visits. For instance, he gave a certain person 100l. and directed one, whom he entrusted with that commission, to let him know, it was on condition he should give no more attendance upon him: the person, though a Clergyman, having no good reputation for his morals. This particular comes from the writer of his Memoirs (31), who having observed that his Lordship did not confine his protection of men of letters to his countrymen only, but that foreigners also shared of his favour and bounty, and Mr Le Clerc in particular, goes on to Mr Bayle, as follows: 'About the time that Mr Bayle's Historical and Critical Dictionary was much talked of as a work which was ready to be published, my Lord Somers had such a character of it, that he was desirous to do something for the author. Accordingly he wrote to a friend in Holland, intimating, that if Mr Bayle accepted of his patronage for his dictionary, he had one hundred and fifty guineas at his service. Mr Bayle, continues this writer, had been suspected of caballing with persons in the French Interest, and it was so far proved upon him, that King William ordered him to be removed from his Professor's place by the magistracy of Rotterdam. This highly disgusted that gentleman, and on many occasions he expressed his resentment against King William, but in none more than this. For when a friend of his communicated to him my Lord's generous disposition towards him, and represented how much it would be for his honour and advantage, Mr Bayle answered, It was true; but he could not, bring himself to pay that compliment to a Lord, who was Minister to a Prince, of whom he had reason to complain. That King William, concludes this writer, had reason to complain of him, we may very well imagine, when he was so well with the French Court, that Count Guiscard offered him 1000 crowns a year, and the liberty of his religion, if he would return to France, and be tutor to his sons, the King having given him permission to do it (32).' Mr Walpole calls this life of Lord Somers a poor performance (33), and the notorious weakness of this last remark is one egregious proof of the justice of his censure. However, the truth of that part of the passage here cited, which precedes this remark, is countenanced by the history of Mr Bayle's life. In which we have a letter of that author to Mr Naudis, his cousin, upon the subject of his removal from his Professorship, wherein he expresses his resentment of it in these terms. 'You must know, says he, that the 30th of October last (34) I was deprived of my yearly pension of 500 guilders, and of the leave I had of reading public and private lectures. This was done by the Council of this city, which is composed of twenty-four persons, and is called in Dutch Vroedschap. The Burgomasters, who are four in number, chosen out of that council, notified this resolution to me [on the second of November] without acquainting me why they now deprived me of what they had granted me in 1681. I have been told that several members of the Council vigorously opposed this injustice, but the majority carried it. Let us distinguish the cause of this proceeding from the pretence of it. The pretence, with which they disguise this conduct in private conversation, and which was even alledged by some the day in which this resolution was taken, is, that the book which I published in 1682 concerning comets, contains dangerous propositions, and such as a Christian magistrate ought not to suffer young persons to be infected with. The better to colour this pretence, the authors of this conspiracy against me have obtained, by a long series of intrigues, that some Dutch Ministers, oblique men, great enemies of foreigners, and of the new [i. e. Des Cartes] philosophy, passionate and seditious men, should examine the book concerning comets, and report, that it contains a dangerous doctrine. All this has been done with ' great secrecy, without giving me the least notice of it; without any regard to the declarations, which I have an hundred times made to the magistrates and ministers, &c. either publicly or in conversation, that I was ready to shew, that my book concerning the comets, contained nothing, which was repugnant either to right reason, or the confessions of faith of the Protestant churches. An infinite number of honest men here are filled with indignation at such a conduct, which is not practised even in the church of Rome. If an author be accused there of heresy, he is heard in own defence, and permitted either to explain his words, or retract his errors. This, my dear cousin, ought to lessen your sorrow for continuing to live in France. You will be a much better Protestant, if you see our religion only where it is persecuted: you would be scandalized, if you was to see it where it is established by Law. But let us come to the real cause of my misfortune. You must know, that under a republican government, every city and every town is usually divided into two or more factions. In Holland there are every where two parties, the one weak and of little credit, but composed of men of merit; the other powerful, which proudly abuses it's superiority and power. When I came here, I had my patrons and benefactors among the weak party, which was not then so weak as it is now. I have always cultivated their friendship, and could never follow the maxims of the courtiers. I never endeavoured to insinuate myself into the favour of the other party, which is daily gaining the ascendant. This I thought would be safe and mercenary; so that when, above a year ago, several of our magistrates were deposed, and others of the reigning party chosen in their stead, the ballance could no longer be even; and the new comers have deprived me of my place, in order to shew what they could do against those, who do not stoop before them, and dare to keep a correspondence with their ancient friends; and as the pretence was my teaching the youth dangerous doctrines, they were obliged to forbid me to teach privately, as well as publicly. Thus the two springs of my maintenance are shut up. I never had one penny of my father's estate; I never was inclined to hoard up money; nay, I never was in a condition to do it. I depended upon my pension, which I thought was to continue all my life-time, but I find now that there is nothing lasting in this world. You may easily guess that I have strong reasons to be uneasy with regard to the time to come, being in a country where living is expensive. But, thank God, I have not yet felt any uneasiness, and am perfectly resigned to the will of heaven, &c.'

M. Des Maizeaux remarks upon this letter, 'that Mr Bayle was not well acquainted with the real cause of his misfortune. It was a secret which the magistrates did not think fit to let him know: but it was owing to the situation of public affairs at that time. The King of France desiring to put an end to the war, of which he could hardly bear the expence any longer, employed Mr Amelot his Ambassador in Switzerland, to make proposals to some persons of credit in Holland. He promised to yield a strong barrier to the Dutch to cover their country, to grant them a full liberty for their trade, and all other advantages they could desire. Mr Halewin, a Burgomaster of Dort, being charmed with those promises, entered into a negotiation with Mr Amelot, without the knowledge of the States. King William, being informed of it, caused Mr Halewin to be arrested, and being found guilty he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and all his estates forfeited. As soon as this gentleman was arrested, Mr Jurieu (35) conceived great hopes, that the whole Geneva cabal would now have been discovered; and that Mr Minutoli, Goudet, Bafnage, de Bauval, and Bayle, would be accused by Mr Halewin: he boasted already that he was the first who discovered the dangerous plot, which was carrying on in Switzerland. But all his hopes soon vanished, and it appeared that none of these gentlemen were in the least concerned either with Mr Halewin or Mr Amelot. Yet, (35) Who was Bayle's mortal enemy.

(31) P. 116.

(32) P. 48.

(33) A Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, as before. Yet this honorable author has not scrupled to cite his authority for some facts, which has encouraged us to do the same, though not without some a discretion in the choice.

(34) This letter is dated December 23, 1693.

(p) Life of Tillotson, by Birch, p. 346. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(q) See his article in this work, Vol. I. To which we shall add, that Lord Somers took him into his protection and favour, when he came first to town, and recommended him to Lord Halifax. Memoirs of Lord Somers, p. 110.

Somers, who had held the strictest friendship with him for many years, made use of his interest to procure an additional annuity for his widow from the King (p); and a few years afterwards, he obtained a handsome allowance, to enable Mr Addison to complete his education, by making the tour of Italy (q). From 1695, the first year after the death of Queen Mary, he was constituted one of the Lords-Justices of the kingdom, during his Majesty's absence abroad, every year as long as he held the Great Seal. This honour was, indeed, nothing more than an appendage to his place [O]. In the mean time, the title of it was raised into that of Lord High-Chancellor of England, on the 22d of April, 1697, when he was also called to the Peerage, by the title of Lord Somers, Baron of Evesham in the county of Worcester (r). For the support of these honours and dignities, his estate not being sufficient, his Majesty made him a grant of the manors of Ryegate and Howlegh in Surrey [P], and another grant of two thousand one hundred pounds per annum, out of the fee-farm rents (s). He was now at the head of the Whigs, and it was reckoned, that the chief strength of that party lay in his credit with the King [Q], and the

(r) Ibid. p. 41, and Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

(s) See his answer to the 8th article of his impeachment.

though Mr Bayle was innocent, he suffered by these secret negotiations; they were the true cause of his misfortune. The secret practices of France put King William in mind of the project of peace; about which Mr Jurieu had made so much noise; and as the peace of Nimeguen had been procured by such pamphlets dispersed at Amsterdam and other places, the king thought the same practices were now revived at Rotterdam. This great prince, who had not leisure enough to examine that project, was alarmed by the notion of a peace negotiated in the manner just mentioned, and thought there really was, as Mr Jurieu pretended, a party endeavouring to procure it, of which Mr Bayle was at the head; whereupon he ordered the magistrates of Rotterdam to dismiss him from his professorship and his pension. The magistrates obeyed the command, but concealed the cause of his deprivation from Mr Bayle (36). By the by it is observable, that this politic conduct of the magistrates proved a touch-stone of Mr Bayle's spirit and temper.

(36) Vie de M. Bayle, par M. Des Maizeaux, p. lxi, lxii. prefixed to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

(37) Life, p. 77, 78.

(38) Ibid. p. 41.

(39) 'Tis the 13th article of his impeachment.

(40) Life, p. 42.

[O] Was nothing more than an appendage of his place.] The same may be said of his being appointed one of the governors of the Charter-House upon the first vacancy (37), and one of the trustees or commissioners of Greenwich-Hospital (38). But the year proved unlucky to him in another respect. It was this year that the Earl of Bellamont informed him of the great spoil committed by some pirates in the West-Indies, and represented the absolute necessity of redressing them. The Lord-Keeper communicated it to the King, who commanded the Lords of the Admiralty, to examine the affair and provide a ship for that service. But that board declaring, there was not one to be spared from the occasions of the war; rather than such a necessary service should be lost, the Lord-Keeper consented to be at part of the charge of fitting out a ship called the Adventure Gally, on purpose of which Captain Kidd was made commander, who turned pirate himself. This public-spirited act was afterwards made an article in his Lordship's impeachment by the House of Commons (39).

[P] He obtained a grant of the manors of Ryegate and Howlegh, &c.] These manors formerly belonged to the Lord Munson, who forfeited them for his siding with Cromwell, and being concerned in the death of King Charles the First. After the Restoration they were given to the Duke of York, and he having forfeited them by his Abdication, they merged in the Crown. The yearly value of both was not above 600*l.* per annum. The grant was made to Joseph Jekyll, Esq; in trust for his Lordship, who by this means came to have great influence in the election of Members of Parliament for that borough; which before this was intirely under the direction of Sir John Parsons a [wealthy] Brewer in London. Thus the writer of his life (40), and so far may pass without censure; but when he proceeds to tell us, that in carrying these elections his Lordship met with great opposition from the neighbouring gentry, insomuch that several of his friends in London became freeholders in this manor, as Mr Congreve, Mr Tonson, and others, to strengthen that interest; it must occur to every reader, that this busy management, which is related in the view of doing honour to his Lordship, is really one of those few blemishes that appear in his character. But who can help smiling at this writer's weakness, when he finds him afterwards, by way of defence of his Lordship against that part of his impeachment by the House of Commons, which relates to the grant of Ryegate, observing, 'that this manor was cried up to be of great value, whereas, indeed, it is not 500*l.* a year. What the party disliked most in it, was the influence it gave the proprietor, in elections for Members of Parliament; in which, however, my Lord Somers did never carry above one Member, except in one election, when Mr Thurland and Mr Harvey (41) turned out Sir John Parsons and his son; but Thurland, forgetting by whose favour he was chosen, fell in with the opposite party; and ever after that, my Lord Somers compounded the matter with Sir John Parsons, who was constantly chosen with a friend of his Lordship's. It is said, continues he, that this agreement was made when Sir John Parsons gave his vote for Sir Thomas Abney to be Lord-Mayor, in opposition to Sir Charles Duncombe, and that it was my Lord Somers, who engaged Sir John to vote for Sir Thomas, which vote carried the election.'

(41) Stephen Harvey, Esq; whose translations of the Passion of Byblis and a Satire of Juvenal, were inserted in Tunson's Collection of Poems.

[Q] His credit with the King.] We have a remarkable instance of this credit and confidence of the King related by Burnet, who, in his account of Charnock, one of the chief conspirators in the Assassination-Plot, in 1695, tells us, 'that endeavours were used to persuade him to confess all he knew, for he had been in all their plots from the beginning. His brother was employed to deal with him, and he seemed to be once in a suspense; but the next time that his brother came to him, he told him, he could not save his own life without doing that which would take away the lives of so many; that he did not think his own life worth it. This shewed a greatness of mind, and had been very valuable, if it had been better directed. Thus, continues the Bishop, this matter was understood at the time. But many years after this, the Lord Somers gave me a different account of it. Charnock, as he told me, sent an offer to the King of a full discovery of all their consultations and designs, and desired no pardon, but that he might live in some easy prison, and if he was found to prevaricate in any part of his discovery, he would look for the execution of the sentence. But the King apprehended that so many persons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered desperate, that he was afraid to have such a scene opened, and would not accept of this offer' (42). We have another instance of his credit with the King, related by the same historian, as follows: 'His Lordship, [in 1695] proposed that which would have put an effectual stop to clipping for the future. It was, that a proclamation should be prepared with such secrecy, as to be published over all England on the same day, ordering money to pass only by weight, but, that at the same time, during three or four days after the proclamation, all persons in every county that had money should bring it in to be told and weighed; and the difference was to be registered, and the money, to be sealed up to the end of the time given, and then to be restored to the owners; and assurance was to be given, that this deficiency in weight should be laid before the Parliament, to be supplied another way, and to be allowed them in the following taxes. But though the King liked this proposition; yet all the rest of the Council were against it. They said, this would stop the circulation of money, and might occasion tumults in the markets: that, those whose money was thus to be weighed, would not believe the difference between the tale and the weight would be allowed them, and

(42) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. III. p. 235, 236 8vo. edition.

the prudent methods he took to govern the party, and to moderate that heat and those jealousies, with which his Majesty had been so long disgusted in the first years of his reign (1). However, his conduct did not escape the censure of some of his own party, for being too compliant with his royal master's humour and notions, or at least of being too soft or too feeble in representing his errors to him (u). Upon the discovery of the Assassination plot in 1695, such an alteration was made by him in the commission of the Peace, as gave great disgust to many people [R]; and, not long after the conclusion of the treaty of Ryswick, his influence in Parliament began visibly to decline, his Majesty being not only obliged by the new Parliament, which met in December 1698, to reduce his army to a very low state both in England and Ireland, but also to send home his Dutch guards, notwithstanding the great reluctance he expressed on that occasion (w). The King, before his departure for Holland the preceding summer, communicated to the Lord Chancellor a proposition made by Count Tallard, to prevent a war about the succession of Spain, upon the death of the then feeble monarch of that kingdom; and the Chancellor received, in August following, a letter from his Majesty, then in Holland, informing him, that fresh offers had been made to the same purpose, and requiring him privately to dispatch full powers, under the Great Seal, with the names in blank, to empower his Majesty to treat with the aforementioned Count. The order was punctually complied with, and the negotiations being immediately entered upon, a treaty was concluded. This was the first Partition treaty; and in the next session of Parliament, which began November 16, 1699, great complaints were made in the House of Commons against the Chancellor: and the House having resolved, on the sixth of December, to push the resumption of the grants of the Irish forfeited estates, by tacking it to the land-tax bill; an address was concerted, April 10, 1700, praying, that John Lord Somers, Lord Chancellor of England, should be removed for ever from his Majesty's presence and council (x), which was then passed in the negative (y). The Parliament being prorogued the next day, his Majesty, on the 19th, retired to Hampton-Court, where, in a few days, sending for the Lord Chancellor, he wished him to surrender the Seals voluntarily; which being declined by his Lordship [S], the King sent to demand them, and they were accordingly delivered up at the close of that month. This step was the occasion of his Majesty's losing many of his friends, especially of the Whig party; but though his removal displeased numbers, yet it seemed not to affect his Lordship, who retired with content and temper, and upon all occasions in Parliament served the King, as if he had not lost his place (z). On the 14th of April, 1701, the House of Commons having first, at his own request, admitted him to speak before them in his own defence, sent up an impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors against him to the Lords; and, in consequence

(1) Burnet, p. 218. fol. edit.

(u) Ibid. p. 247.

(w) One of these was his message to the Commons, written with his own hand, in which he assured the House, that he intended to send the Dutch guards away, unless, out of consideration to him, the House be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in his service, which his Majesty would take very kindly. London Gazette, for March 18, 1698.

(x) Several complaints being made against this motion in the debates, Sir Edward Seymour expressly declared, that the original mischief proceeded from the Ministers, and from the chief of them the Chancellor. Life, p. 170.

(y) Prior's Letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated Decemb. 7, 1699, O. S. in the History of Mr Prior's Negotiations, p. 142. edit. 1740, 8vo.

(z) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III.

and so might grow mutinous. Therefore, they were for leaving this matter to the next Parliament. So this proposition was laid aside, which would have saved the nation above a million of money. For now, as all people believed, that the Parliament would receive the clipped money in its tale, clipping went on, and became more visibly scandalous than it ever had been (43). We have given the King's approbation of this proposal as an instance of Lord Somers's credit with his Majesty, who otherwise could not, 'tis apprehended, have gone into a project that lay open to such unanswerable objections. In short, what superior abilities soever in other parts may be allowed to Lord Somers, 'tis certain, in this most arduous one, arising from the bad state of the coin, he must yield the palm to Lord Halifax, who was the only person that appeared equal to the task (44).

[R] He made an alteration in the commission of the Peace, which gave great disgust to many people] The fact was thus: When the design of the Assassination and Invasion Plots, in 1695, and the following year, were discovered, a voluntary association being entered into by both Houses of Parliament, it was sent round the nation. In such a time of danger, it was thought, that those who did not enter voluntarily into it were so ill affected, or at least so little zealous for the public good, that it was not fit they should continue Justices of the Peace. Whereupon, an order passed in Council, that all those, who had so refused, should be turned out of the commission. Lord Somers had obeyed this order, according to the representations made to him by the Lords Lieutenants and Custodes Rotulorum of the several counties, who were not equally discreet. However, he laid those representations before the Council, and had a special order for every person that was so turned out. But it was now charged upon him, that he had advised and procured those orders (45).

[S] He refused to deliver up the Seals voluntarily.] The writer of his life tells us (46), that 'it was said by some who where no strangers to the Lord Somers, that his Lordship represented to his Majesty at Hampton-

Court, that though he was very willing to resign the Seals and retire from business; yet, being convinced that those who had advised his Majesty to take them from him, did it with a view rather to serve themselves than the government; if his Majesty would consent, that he should continue in his post, he doubted not to be able to vindicate himself against all the calumnies of his enemies, and maintain himself in it with the reputation due to his zeal and integrity.' The garb in which this story is exposed by our life-writer, is another glaring instance of his poor talent that way. The last expression especially is apparently irreconcilable to that modesty which was a most distinguishing part of Lord Somers's character. Yet the simple fact itself may deserve notice, and is confirmed by Mr Oldmixon (47), who told the same story many years afterwards, with somewhat better judgment, as follows: 'The King, says he, some time before the prorogation, which was April 11, had given his Lordship a hint of the necessity he should be under to part with him, in order to accommodate matters with those in the opposition to the measures of the administration. His Lordship, upon this, told his Majesty, that he knew very well what his enemies aimed at, by their abusing and persecuting him as they had of late done. That the Seal was his greatest crime, and if he quitted it, he should be forgiven; but knowing what ill use would be made of it, if it were put into their hands, he was resolved, with his Majesty's permission, to keep it in defiance of their malice, and to stand all the trials they should put upon him with the support of his innocence, and the hopes of his being serviceable to his Majesty. That he feared them not, but if he would be as firm to his friends as they would be to him, they should be able to carry whatever points he had in view for the public welfare, in a new Parliament. The King shook his head, as a sign of his diffidence, and only said, it must be so. Mr Oldmixon tells us also, that the gentleman who was his informer had it from Lord Somers himself.'

[T] He

(43) Ibid. p. 237. fol. edit.

(44) See his article.

(45) Burnet.

(46) P. 54.

(47) History of England, during the reigns of King William and Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King George I. p. 208. edit. 1735, in fol.

quence thereof, an address was presented on the 23d to his Majesty, to the same purpose with that which miscarried in the preceding session, and on the 19th of May, the articles of his impeachment were exhibited to the Lords; but, upon a quarrel between the two Houses, he was acquitted by the Lords, on the 17th of June, without any further prosecution of the Commons [T]. King William dying not long after, his Lordship being in no favour at the new Court, withdrew to a private way of life, passing his time with universal esteem in the most polite and useful studies [U]. During this retirement, he was chosen President of the Royal Society, of which he had been long a member (aa); yet he attended in the House of Lords, and, persevering in his principles, he opposed the bill to prevent Occasional Conformity [W], and was one of the managers for the (aa) He was also chosen Recorder of Gloucester. Life, p. 110.

[T] He was acquitted, &c.] The whole account of this prosecution is so largely set forth in the general histories of England, that to repeat them here would be deviating from the design of this work. Therefore, referring the reader to those histories, we shall only mention some particulars scarcely taken notice of in them. The first relates to Kidd's affair, and is, if true, an undeniable testimony of the innocence of Lord Somers, as well as of the other Lords and gentlemen concerned in it. 'When the Parliament, that debated this matter, was risen, his Majesty was pleased to honour a noble Lord with his company at dinner. While they were at table a discourse arose concerning Kidd, and the trouble occasioned by that business to the persons concerned in the grant. Upon which his Majesty said, that if by the law of England he could be witness, he could of his own knowledge justify the Lords concerned, in all they had done in that affair (48). Another particular which more properly falls under the plan of this work, relates to Lord Haversham's speech, in the conference between the two Houses, on the twenty-fourth of June, when his Lordship declared his opinion of the prosecution in the following terms: 'One thing there is, though I cannot speak it, being bound by the orders of the House. Yet I must give some answer, that is, as to the Lords voting in their own case. It requires an answer, though I cannot go into the debate of it. The Commons themselves have made this precedent. For in these impeachments they have allowed men, guilty of the same crimes, to vote in their own House; and, therefore, we have not made any distinction in our House, that some should vote and some not. The Lords have so high an opinion of the justice of the House of Commons, that they hope justice will never be made use of as a mask for any design: and, therefore, give me leave to say, though I am not to argue it, 'tis a plain demonstration, that the Commons think these Lords innocent, and I think the proposition is undeniable, for there are several Lords in the same crimes, in the same facts, there is no distinction; and the Commons leave some of these men at the head of affairs, near the King's person, to do any mischief, if they were inclined to it, and impeach others; when they are both alike guilty, and concerned in the same fact. This is a thing I was in hopes I should never have heard asserted, when the beginning of it was from the House of Commons.' This was spoken with an eye to the Earl of Jersey, who was Plenipotentiary with the Earl of Portland, and signed the Partition Treaty; he was then Lord Chamberlain, and though he was much more concerned in the affair of the treaty than Lord Somers, yet he was left near the King's person a Privy-Counsellor, and no vote to remove him. In return for that complacency his Lordship gave his vote against Lord Somers (49). Sir Joseph Williamson signed the Partition Treaty as a Plenipotentiary, was then a Privy-Counsellor, and unimpeached. Thirdly, the Lord Somers was accused for asserting the Irish grants. Sir Edward Seymour and Sir Stephen Fox did the same when they were Lords of the Treasury; but not a word was said of them. Fourthly, the Lord Somers was charged for being concerned in the setting out the Adventure Galley, which Kidd ran away with; the Duke of Shrewsbury and the Earl of Romney lay open to the same charge, yet no notice was taken of them. These are glaring instances of the rage of that party which pushed on this prosecution; and they are set up here as so many sea-marks for the direction of others, to avoid ship-wrecking honour and conscience against the same rocks. Such things indeed are generally laughed off as a game between the ins and outs, necessary to be played upon some occasions, by every gentleman of fortune, who is actuated by a be-

(48) Life of Lord Somers, p. 90.

(49) See Mr Prior's article on this particular, in remark [L] and [M].

coming ambition not to lead the life of a drone in contemptible obscurity. But may it not be justly styled the worst sort of gaming? 'Tis remarkable in the game, (if we must give it that name) now under consideration, many of the gamblers lived to see and condemn their own folly in playing it: to which reflection the late Lord Bolingbroke in particular, one of the ablest and most active of the party concerned, was brought by sad experience (50).'

(50) See his reflections on the use and abuse of History.

[U] He passed his time in the most polite and useful studies.] No pains has been wanting to do justice to this part of his character. We are told by one writer, 'that his Lordship now gave himself up intirely to the studies of History, Antiquities, and other curious parts of learning. That he took a particular pleasure in prints and medals, and was a masterly judge of their genuineness and excellence. He also delighted himself in his retirement, at his seat near Chessunt in Hertfordshire, and the sweets of solitude and the Muses soon made more than amends for the loss of the fatigues and honours of his office of Chancellor *.' Again, all the leisure his Lordship had, by being out of the ministry, he employed in entertaining himself with medals, prints, and books, of which he had a collection equally large and well chosen (51). This is evidently nothing else but a copy (and a clumsy one it is) of Mr Addison's original, expressed in the following terms: 'This great man, says that excellent author, 'was not more conspicuous as a Patriot and a Statesman, than as a person of universal knowledge and learning. As by dividing his time between the public scenes of business and the private retirements of life, he took care to keep up both the great and good man; so by the same means he accomplished himself not only in the knowledge of men and things, but in the skill of the most refined arts and sciences. He enjoyed, in the highest perfection, two talents, which do not often meet in the same person, the greatest strength of good sense and the most exquisite taste of politeness. Without the first, learning is but an incumbrance, and without the last is ungraceful. My Lord Somers was master of these qualifications in so eminent a degree, that all the parts of knowledge appeared in him with such an additional strength and beauty, as they want in the possession of others. If he delivered his opinion of a piece of poetry, a statue, or a picture, there was something so just and delicate in his observations, as naturally produced pleasure and assent in those who heard him (52).'

* Life of Lord Somers, p. 52.

(51) Ibid. p. 216

(52) Freeholder, No. 39.

[W] He voted against the Occasional Conformity bill, in 1703.] However, there is good reason to believe that he promoted the bill for settling the first-fruits and tenths, towards augmenting the poorer benefices of the Clergy. The writer of Bishop Burnet's life, having mentioned that Prelate's designs in this particular, in the year 1696 and 1697, proceeds to inform us, that he had concerted his measures, in 1701, with Lord Godolphin and Lord Somers; and in confirmation of it, has inserted a letter of this last, wrote in answer to one from the Bishop, as follows:

' November 22, 1701:

' My Lord,
' I acknowledge the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 17th with great thankfulness. I wish it may lie in my power to contribute to the excellent design. I promise you no man shall enter into it more willingly, and shall labour in it more heartily. The point of the first-fruits and tenths is what I have proposed several times with much earnestness, but without success. When I have the honour of seeing your Lordship, we shall, I hope, discourse at large upon the Lords, in the conference between the two Houses upon it in 1702; and, when it was brought into the House the next year, 1703, he gave his vote in the negative (bb). In 1706, though unpossessed of any publick employ, he projected a plan for uniting the two kingdoms, which was generally approved; and this being a point which Queen Anne had greatly at heart, her Majesty took notice of his merit, and appointed him one of the managers of the Union [X]. The same year he proposed a bill for preventing delays and expences in the proceedings at Law, as also some regulations with regard to passing private Acts of Parliament [Y]. Upon a change of the ministerial measures in 1708, he was placed at the head of the ministry, in the post of President of the Council [Z]; and he concurred in rejecting the proposals for a general peace, offered by the French in 1709 at Gertruydenberg [AA], and in the resolution for carrying on the war (cc). The same year

(bb) Ibid.

(cc) The same year he was appointed one of the trustees for the poor Palatines. Life, p. 114. where it is also said, that the Duke of Montague dying this year, Lord Somers was appointed a trustee for his son, the last Duke, then a minor.

' upon the whole subject. In the mean time, allow me to assure you, that I am, with great and sincere respect,

' My Lord,

' Your Lordship's most obedient

' Humble servant,

' Somers (53).'

' general complaint made of the private Acts of Parliament, that passed through both Houses too easily, and in so great a number, that it took up a great part of the session to examine them, even in that cursory way that was subject to many inconveniences. The fees that were paid for these to the speakers and clerks of both Houses inclined them to favour and promote them. So the Lord Somers proposed such a regulation in that matter as will probably have a good effect for the future (57).'

[Z] He was made President of the Council, and voted against accepting the terms of peace at Gertruydenberg, &c.] It is not unentertaining to hear the same Historian descanting upon this promotion of Lord Somers. The great capacity and inflexible integrity of this Lord, says the Bishop, would have made his promotion to this post very acceptable to the Whigs at any juncture, but it was most particularly so at this time: for it was expected, that propositions for a general peace would be quickly made; and so they reckoned, that the management of that upon which not only the safety of the nation, but of all Europe depended, was in sure hands, when he was set at the head of the councils, upon whom neither ill practices nor false colours were like to make any impression. Thus the minds of all those who were truly zealous for the present constitution were much quieted by this promotion, though their jealousies had a deep root, and were not easily removed (58). In the former remark, we are taught to ascribe to Lord Somers the projection of those plans which were necessary for the safety and welfare of the kingdom, and here we are directed to look upon him as the Palladium, the virtue of whose presence was sufficient to secure the possession of those blessings. The use of this will appear presently.

[AA] He concurred in rejecting the French proposals at Gertruydenberg.] 'Tis well known what use the Tories made of the Ministry's rejecting these proposals at Gertruydenberg, to effectuate a change of hands; and in the General Dictionary there are extracts from two letters (59) of his Lordship, written at the breaking up of the negotiations, to the Earl of Wharton, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which discover our President's temper upon this occasion. The first of these extracts is as follows: 'As for news, I never was so little able to answer your demands. It is avowed, that no resolution is yet taken as to the continuing or determining the present Parliament. But the falling of stocks here, and the uneasiness occasioned in Holland, while the uncertainty continues, seems to make it absolutely necessary to have this matter remain no longer in suspense. In the mean time, our late disturbances, and the unsettledness of our affairs, give courage to our enemies; for the French Ambassadors at Gertruydenberg have sent a very insolent letter, or rather manifesto, to the pensioner, in order to justify their breaking off the negociation. I hope so unnecessary and so insolent a provocation will give the Dutch courage enough to resent it as they ought, but I have not the resolution taken upon it. It breaks my heart to think what a noble game we are unnecessarily throwing away.'

This letter was dated July 15, 1710, and the negotiations were accordingly broke off on the 20th, after all the preliminaries for a treaty of peace were agreed on, only the Dutch insisted, that the French King should take upon himself to compel his grandson, Philip, to quit the throne of Spain, and not leave the allies engaged in a war with Spain, when France should be in peace. This the French King absolutely refused

(57) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 140. 8vo. edition.

(8) Id. p. 249, 250.

(59) Under his Lordship's article.

(53) Life of Bishop Burnet, prefixed to the History of his own Time, p. Revu. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(54) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, ubi supra.

(55) History of his own Time, p. 213. 8vo. edit. Vol. IV.

(56) Freeholder, as before.

(57) History of his own Time, Vol. IV. p. 53, 54.

[X] He was one of the managers of the Union] Mr Walpole declares it was projected by him. Bishop Burnet says he was the chief manager of the treaty. Mr Addison goes further, and insinuates a probability of his projecting not only that plan, but the bill of Regency. These are his words: 'As he [Lord Somers] was admitted into the secret and most retired thoughts and counsels of his royal Master, King William; a great share in the plan of the Protestant succession is universally ascribed to him: and if he did not intirely project the Union of the two kingdoms, and the bill of Regency, which seem to have been the only methods in human policy, for securing to us so inestimable a blessing, there is none who will deny him to have been the chief conductor in both these glorious works. For posterity are obliged to allow him that praise after his death, which he industriously declined, while he was living (55).' And to the same purpose, Burnet observes, speaking of Ferguson's plot for a rebellion in Scotland, to be assisted from France, that the Lords concluded the whole matter with voting, that the encouragement of this plot came from the not settling the succession of the Crown of Scotland in the House of Hanover. That they laid this vote before the Queen, and proposed, that when this was done they would promote the Union of the two kingdoms upon just and reasonable terms. This being ended, they made a long and vigorous address, in answer to that which the Commons had made against them. This address was penned with great care and much force. Both the addresses were drawn up by the Lord Somers (56).

[Y] A bill for the amendment of the proceeding at Law, and in passing private Acts of Parliament.] Bishop Burnet, who is again our informer, gives us the particular circumstances of these two facts, as follows: 'His Lordship, says the Prelate, made a motion in the House of Lords to correct some proceedings in the Common Law and in Chancery, that were both dilatory and chargeable. He began the motion with some instances that were more conspicuous and gross, and he managed the matter so, that both the Lord Keeper and the Judges concurred with him: though it passes generally for a maxim, that Judges ought rather to enlarge than contract their jurisdiction. A bill passed the House, that began a reformation of the proceedings at Law, which, as things now stand, are certainly amongst the greatest grievances of the nation. When this went through the House of Commons, it was visible that the interest of under-officers, clerks, and attorneys, whose gains were to be lessened by this bill, was more considered than the interest of the nation itself. Several clauses, how beneficial soever to the subject, which touched on their profit, were left out by the Commons. But, what fault soever the Lords might have found with these alterations, yet, to avoid all disputes with the Commons, the amendments were agreed to. There was another

(c) See the Doctor's trial.

(ee) See those Debates, and the writer of his Life.

(ff) Yet, upon the change of the Ministry, a few days before the Queen's death, his Lordship went to the Council. Life, p. 117.

(gg) Ibid. 118.

(bb) Collin's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 28. edit. 1756.

year he also voted for the condemnation of Dr Sacheverell (dd), and the next year, 1710, upon the new change of hands, he was dismissed from the President's post, and succeeded by the Earl of Rochester, the Queen's uncle. After this removal, he made a distinguished figure in the debates of the House of Lords for some time (ee); but it was not long, before he grew very infirm in his health, which impaired his understanding so much, as rendered him incapable of executing any office under King George the First (ff); after whose accession, therefore, he had no other post than a seat at the Council-table, and he attended there upon some occasions 'till the year 1716, when he was seized with an apoplectic fit, which carried him off the stage of this world, on the 26th of April that year (gg). His Lordship was never married, so that his estate fell to his two sisters, the youngest of whom was married, as beforementioned, to his friend Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls; and the eldest, Mary, was wife to Charles Cocks, Esq; of Worcester, whose daughter by her is the Lady of the Earl of Hardwick, Esq; late Lord-Chancellor of England, who is her second husband (bb). His Lordship's character has been represented by two very eminent pencils; but under very different principles, Dean Swift and Mr Addison; and as they bid fairest for dividing the truth between them, we shall lay the Dean's draught intire before the reader [B B], to contrast it with that of Mr Addison,

a great to engage for, and the French Ministers returned to Paris the 25th instant.

On the twenty-eighth, his Lordship writes thus to the same friend:

'I am not able to send you any certainty as to the dissolution. 'Tis a strange uncertain state we are in; and perhaps we may have this good effect of the present irresolution, as not to be without hopes of a good Parliament, in case they will put us upon a new election, that is by your Lordship's help and not otherwise.

'Your Lordship has heard that Mr Cresset was going for Hanover. After his dispatches were finished, and he had his last instructions from the Queen, he was taken ill on Tuesday, and died on Thursday morning. His death has given much disturbance to our great men, and has disconcerted their affairs. I cannot find that all the endeavours possible have succeeded to shew a way to preserve credit, or to furnish the necessary sums for the army, unless the present Parliament be continued. This article, and the French presumptions in breaking off the conferences, are the grounds of our hope. And we are apt to add to these two, that there is no certainty what the complexion of the new Parliament will be, nor what will be the turn they will take, since they are not Whiggs only, who will be affected by the dissolution.' Whoever reads these extracts, together with Bishop Burnet's observation in the preceding remark, will be apt to infer, that his Lordship, with his party, came to Court in 1708, in the same dispositions as all parties have done, and as Lord Bolingbroke confesses, the Tories, who succeeded in 1710, actually did. That the principal spring of their actions was to have the government of the State in their hands, that their principal views were the conservation of this power, great employments to themselves, and great opportunities of rewarding those who had helped to raise them, and of hurting those who stood in opposition to them. Though it was true, at the same time, that with these considerations of private and party interest, there were others intermingled, which had for their object the public good of the nation, at least, what they took to be such (60). Thus that active and leading man in the Tory ministry frankly and ingenuously gives us, and so much is certain that in it we see, the true reason of Lord Somers's dismissal from the Presidency of the Council abovementioned.

(60) Bolingbroke's Letter to Sir W. Windham, p. 19. edit. 1753, 8vo.

[B B] His character by Dean Swift.] This occurs in the Dean's History of the four last years of Queen Anne, a posthumous piece; in the entrance upon which he prepares his readers for what follows, by giving the characters of those in the opposition in 1710. Wherein he seems to have set Lord Clarendon's method for his pattern. 'It may not be improper,' says he, to describe those qualities in each of them, which few of their admirers will deny, and which appear chiefly to have influenced them in acting their several parts upon the public stage. For I don't intend to draw their characters entire, which would be tedious, and little to the purpose, but shall only single out those passions, acquirements, and habits, which the owners are most likely to transfer into their particular schemes, and which were most subservient to the designs they seemed to have in view.' He then proceeds in these terms: 'The Lord Somers may very deservedly be reputed the head and oracle of that party. He hath raised himself by the co-incidence of many circumstances to the greatest employments of the State, without the least support from birth or fortune: he hath constantly, and with great steadiness, cultivated those principles under which he grew. That accident, which first produced him into the world, of pleading before the Bishops whom King James had sent to the Tower, might have proved a piece of merit, as honourable as it was fortunate; but the old republican spirit, which the Revolution had restored, began to teach other lessons, that since we had accepted a new King from a Calvinistical commonwealth, we must also admit new maxims in religion and government. But since the nobility and gentry would probably adhere to the established Church, and to the rights of monarchy, as delivered down from their ancestors, it was the practice of these politicians to introduce such men as were perfectly indifferent to any or no religion, and who were not likely to inherit much loyalty from those to whom they owed their birth. Of this number was the person I am now describing. I have hardly known any man with talents more proper to acquire and preserve the favour of the prince, never offending in words or gesture, which are in the last degree courteous and complimenting, where he set an excellent example to others his colleagues, which they did not think fit to follow. But this extreme civility is universal and undistinguished, and in private conversation, where he observeth it as inviolably as if he were in the greatest assembly, it is sometimes censured as formal. Two reasons are assigned for this behaviour; first, from the consciousness of his humble original, he keepeth all familiarity at the utmost distance, which otherwise might be apt to intrude; the second is, that being sensible how subject he is to violent passions, he avoideth all incitements to them, by teaching those whom he converseth with, from his own example, to keep a great way within the bounds of decency and respect: and it is indeed true, that no man is more apt to take fire upon the least appearance of provocation, which temper he strives to subdue with the utmost violence upon himself; so that his breast has been seen to heave, and his eyes sparkle with rage, in those very moments, when his words and the cadence of his voice were in the humblest and softest manner. Perhaps that force upon his nature may cause that insatiable love of revenge, which his detractors lay to his charge; who, consequently, reckon dissembling among his chief perfections. Avarice he has none, and his ambition is gratified by being the uncontested head of his party. With an excellent understanding adorned by all the polite parts of learning, he hath very little taste for conversation, to which he prefers the pleasure of reading and thinking; and in the intervals of his time amuseth himself with an illiterate chaplain, an humble companion, or a favourite servant. These are some few distinguishing marks in the character of that person, who now presideth over the discontented party; although he be not answerable a great part of which he will find in the course of this memoir, and the rest will be produced, in reciting the criticism passed upon both by Mr Walpole, who has dashed out the chief features of his Lordship's character, in the following terms: ' Lord Somers, ' says that sprightly and spirited writer, is one of those divine men, who, like a chapel in ' a palace, remain unprofaned, while all the rest is tyranny, corruption, and folly. All ' the traditional accounts of him, the historians of the last age, and it's best authors, ' represent him as the most uncorrupt Lawyer and the honestest Statesman, a master ' Orator, a Genius of the first taste, and as a patriot of the noblest and most extensive ' views; as a man who dispensed blessings by his life, and planned them for posterity. ' He was at once the model of Addison and the touch-stone of Swift; the one from him ' and the other for him. The former, however, has drawn a laboured, but diffuse and ' feeble, character of him, in the Freeholder for May 14, 1716, neither worthy of the ' author nor his subject. It is known that Lord Somers survived the powers of his under- ' standing. Mr Addison says, his life, indeed, seems to be prolonged beyond it's natural ' term, under that indisposition which hung upon the latter part of it, that he might ' have the satisfaction of seeing the happy settlement take place, which he had proposed ' to himself as the principal end of his publick labours.—A very wise way, indeed, of ' interpreting the delay of Providence! as if a man was preserved by Heaven in a state of ' dotage, 'till an event should arrive which would make him happy, if he retained his ' senses! Equally injudicious is another passage intended for encomium, where we are ' told, that he gained great esteem with Queen Anne, who had conceived many unrea- ' sonable prejudices against him. Mr Addison might as well have said, that the Queen ' had at first disbelieved, and was afterwards converted to, Sir Isaac Newton's system of ' comets. Her Majesty was full as good a judge of Astronomy as of Lord Somers's ' merit [CC]. In truth, Mr Addison was sometimes as weak a writer, when he wrote ' seriously,

' answerable for all their mistakes; and if his precepts ' had been more strictly followed, perhaps their power ' would not have been so easily shaken. I have been ' assured, and heard him profess, that he was against ' engaging in that bloody persecution of Dr Sacheve- ' rell, as what he foresaw was likely to end in their ' ruin, and he blamed the rough behaviour of some ' persons to the Queen, as a great failure in prudence; ' and that, when it appeared, her Majesty was firmly ' resolved upon a treaty of peace, he advised his ' friends not to oppose it in it's progress, but find fault ' with it, after it was made; which would be a copy ' of the like usage they themselves had met with after ' the treaty of Ryfwic; and the safest as well as most ' probable way of disgracing the promoters and ' advisers. I have been the longer in representing to ' the reader some idea of this extraordinary genius, ' because whatever attempt hath hitherto been made, ' with any appearance of conduct or probability of ' success, to restore the dominion of that party, was ' undeniably contrived by him. And I profess the ' same for the future, as long as his age and infirmities ' will leave him capable of business (61).'

Mr Walpole has made this attempt of Swift not less than that of Addison the subject of his ridicule. He observes, that it is a character of Lord Somers very different from what he had given in his Catalogue, &c; and from the picture drawn of him in the dedication of A Tale of a Tub. Yet, continues he, distorted as the features are in this new history, it is a pleasure to find that party malice attempting to discolour rather than to alter them. How lovely does a character burst forth, when the greatest objections to it are, that it was steady to it's principles, of universal civility, conscious of an humble birth, of no avarice, of satisfied ambition, that the person so accused did violence to himself to govern his passions, and (one can scarce repeat seriously such a charge) preferred reading and thinking to the pleasures of conversation. How black a Statesman not to be fickle! How poor a Philosopher to master his passions, when he could not eradicate them! How bad a man to endeavour to improve his mind and understanding! Can one wonder that Bolingbroke and Pope always tried to prevent Swift from exposing himself, by publishing this wretched ignorant libel (62); and could it avoid falling, as it has, into immediate contempt and oblivion. However, as the greatest character cannot be clear of all alloy, Swift might have known that Lord Somers was not intirely justifiable in obtaining some grants of Crown lands, which though in no proportion to other grants in that reign, it would have become him to resist, not to countenance by his example (63).'

[CC] The Queen was no capable judge of Lord Somers's merit. I cannot help thinking this censure a little too severe. The criticised passage concludes a display of his Lordship's personal qualities and accomplishments, in distinction to his abilities, either as a Lawyer or a Statesman. Let us take a view of the whole. ' His [Lordship's] life was in every part ' of it, says Mr Addison, set off with that graceful ' modesty and reserve, which made his virtues more ' beautiful the more they were cast in such agreeable ' shades. His religion was sincere, not ostentatious, ' and such as inspired him with an universal bene- ' volence towards all his fellow-subjects, not with ' bitterness against any part of them. He shewed his ' firm adherence to it as modelled by our national ' constitution, and was constant to it's offices of devo- ' tion both in public and in his family. He appeared ' a champion for it with great reputation in the cause ' of the seven Bishops, at a time when the Church ' really was in danger. To which we may add, that ' he held a strict friendship and correspondence with ' the great Archbishop Tillotson, being acted by the ' same spirit of candour and moderation, and moved ' rather with pity than indignation, towards the persons ' of those, who differed from him in the unessential ' parts of Christianity. His great humanity appeared ' in the minutest circumstances of his conversation. ' You found it in the benevolence of his aspect, the ' complacency of his behaviour, and the tone of his ' voice. His great application to the severer studies ' of the Law had not infected his temper with any ' thing positive or litigious. He did not know what ' it was to wrangle on indifferent points, to triumph ' on the superiority of his understanding, or to be ' supercilious on the side of truth. He joined the ' greatest delicacy of good breeding to the greatest ' strength of reason. By approving the sentiments of ' a person, with whom he conversed in such particulars ' as were just, he won him over from those points ' in which he was mistaken; and had so agreeable ' a way of conveying knowledge, that whoever con- ' ferred with him grew the wiser, without perceiving ' that he had been instructed. We may probably ' ascribe to this masterly and engaging manner of ' conversation the great esteem which he had gained ' with the late Queen, while she pursued those measures ' which had carried the British nation to the highest ' pitch of glory, notwithstanding she had entertained ' many unreasonable prejudices against him, before ' she was acquainted with his personal worth and ' behaviour.' Surely, the Queen may be allowed to be a better judge of this kind of merit than she could be of Sir Isaac Newton's system of comets.

[DD] Chancellor

(61) Swift's History of the four last years of Queen Anne, p. 944. edit. 1758, 8vo.

(62) See Dean Swift's article. However, he yielded to their advice, so that this piece being published, must be read with that consideration in the author's favour.

(63) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, two papers.

seriously, as he was admirable in touching the delicacies of natural humour. He says that my Lord Somers was often compared with Sir Francis Bacon, and gives the preference to the former, because he, all integrity, did not behave so meanly, when persecuted by the House of Commons, as the other under the confusion of guilt. This argument is as poor as the panegyric. To argue from their behaviour, they should have been in similar circumstances. If they are to be compared, the superior penetration of genius cannot be denied to Bacon; the virtue will all be Somers's. If he must be compared with another Chancellor, it must not be with Clarendon, who was more morose and severe, and had less capacity and a thousand prejudices. The great Chancellor de l' Hospital seems to resemble Somers most in the dignity of his soul and the elegance of his understanding [DD]. The momentous times in which he lived gave Lord Somers opportunities of displaying the extent of his capacity, and the patriotism of his heart, opportunities as little sought for by the former, as they were honestly courted and pursued by the latter. The excellent ballance of our constitution never appeared in a clearer light, than with relation to this Lord, who, though impeached by a misguided House of Commons, with all the intemperate folly that at all times disgraced the free States of Greece, yet had full liberty to vindicate his innocence and manifest his integrity; which could never have shone so bright, unless it had been juridically aspersed. In our constitution, Aristides may be traduced, clamoured against, and, when matter is wanting, severe addresses may be made, proposed, or voted, for removing him for ever from the service of the Government*; but, happily, the factious and the envious have not a power to condemn by a shell, which many of them cannot sign (i i). It was no inglorious part of this great Chancellor's life, that, when removed from the administration, his labours were still dedicated to the service of the government of his country. In this situation, above all the little prejudices of a profession (for he had no profession but that of Solon and Lycurgus), he set himself to correct the grievances of the Law, and to amend the vocation he had adorned (k k). The union of the kingdoms too was projected by him; and it was not to his disgrace, that the Princess, whose prejudices he had conquered, and whose esteem he had gained, offered him up as one of the first sacrifices on the altar of Utrecht. Such deathless monuments of his parts and virtue diminish the regret we should otherwise feel, that though Lord Somers wrote several tracts, we are ignorant even of the titles of many of them. So little was fame his object! He concludes with doing justice to Mr Addison, in observing, that this modesty is particularly mentioned in the Freeholder he had quoted [EE].

Mr Walpole

* As happened in the case of Lord Somers. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 263.

(i i) Alluding to the ostracism among the Greeks.

(k k) Ibid. p. 439.

[DD] Chancellor de l' Hospital seems to resemble Somers most.] Every one will allow the happy choice of this comparison, after reading the account which the French writers give of the Chancellor de l' Hospital; who, according to them, was one of the greatest men in the sixteenth century. He was born at Aigueperse in Auvergne in 1505, and learned the languages, polite literature, and the Law, in the most celebrated universities of France and Italy. He had a solid judgment, great eloquence, together with an extraordinary delicacy of manners, and an inviolable integrity. He distinguished himself easily among the first and most eminent persons of his profession; and passed, by the force of his merit, through all the honourable posts of the Long Robe. He was made Counsellor to the Parliament of Paris in 1524; afterwards became President of the Chamber of Accounts, Master of Requests, Counsellor to the Grand Council, Chancellor to the Princess Margaret, sister to Henry the Second; and at last, Chancellor of France in 1560. There had not been of a long time a person in this post that was more worthy of it, nor more capable of displaying the evils which then threatened the kingdom. He assisted at the assembly of Fontainebleau the same year, as also at that of Orleans in the beginning of the reign of Charles the Ninth; at those of St Germain en Laye in 1561; at the conference held at Poissy the same year; at the assembly of Moulins in 1566; and had a share in all the important affairs of State till 1568. He made the public good of the kingdom and the true interest of his master, the King, the rule of his actions. He prevented the inquisition from being introduced into France, by consenting to the edict of Romorantin, published in 1560, against the Protestants; and did all that lay in his power to prevent the civil wars of France. After the affair of Vassy, seeing both sides prepare to take up arms, he opposed it with all his power; and when the Constable meant to check him, by telling him, that it was not the business of the gentlemen of the Long Robe to give their opinion upon points of war, he replied, though such people are not skilled in the handling of arms, yet they may know when it is proper to make use of them. But his pacific views caused him to be excluded from the Council of War, and occasioned his disgrace. Queen Catharine of Medicis, who had contributed to raise him to the Seals, disliked his conduct; and, by representing it as the effect of disloyalty, procured him to be dismissed in 1568. After this he retired to Vignay, a manor-house, which he had in Beauce, where he passed the rest of his life, he died March 13, 1573, aged sixty-eight years. It was observed, that in his countenance he resembled Aristotle. There are some speeches of his besides a collection of Latin poems which were printed after his death, and are in good esteem. In religious matters he was acted by the same spirit of moderation as Lord Somers, rather inclined to shew favour to, than to persecute, the Huguenots, upon which account he underwent the same fate with Lord Somers, in that article; and in spite of the gravity of his aspect (65), and the strictness of his morals, he is charged with being neither Calvinist nor Catholic, with having no religion of any kind, and being really an infidel; inasmuch that it was a common saying among the people, Dieu nous garde de la messe du Chancelier; God preserve us from the Chancellor's mass; and we have seen already that he was accused of disloyalty as well as Lord Somers.

(64) Moreri & l'Advocat.

(65) The courtiers used to call it: St Jerome's visage. Moreti.

[EE] This modesty is particularly mentioned in the Freeholder.] The words in that paper are as follow: 'It is to be lamented that this extraordinary person, out of his natural aversion to vain glory, wrote several pieces as well as performed several actions, which he did not assume the honour of; though, at the same time, so many works of this nature have appeared, which every one has ascribed to him, that I believe no author of the greatest eminence would deny my Lord Somers to have been the best writer of the age in which he lived.' This modesty is extended to his actions also afterwards. Having mentioned his impeachment, his urgently pressing the prosecution of it, and that he would not let the matter rest till it was brought to an issue; Mr Addison proceeds thus: 'For the same virtue and greatness of mind, which gave him a disregard of fame, made him impatient of an undeserved reproach. There is no question, continues he, but this

Besides the pieces already mentioned in the course of this memoir, Mr Walpole mentions some others; as (1.) Dryden's Satire to his Muse (11). Which, however, he observes has been disputed, and thinks that the gross ribaldry of it cannot be believed to have flowed from so humane and polished a nature as that of Lord Somers. 2. The Argument of Lord Keeper Somers, on his giving Judgment in the Bankers case, delivered in the Exchequer-chamber, June 23, 1696. (3) He was supposed too, but on what foundation he does not know, to write the preface to Dr Tindal's Rights of the Christian Church (mm). A few years ago came out a collection of scarce pieces, in four parts, each consisting of four volumes in 4to. from pamphlets chiefly collected by Lord Somers. But a much more valuable treasure, his Lordship's collection of original papers and letters, was lost by a fire in the chambers of the honourable Charles Yorke, Esq; his Majesty's Solicitor-General, which happened in Lincoln's-Inn-square, on Saturday morning, January 27, 1752.

(11) It is printed in the Minor Poets, Vol. III.

(mm) Harley's Catalogue, Vol. II p. 378.

'this wonderful man will make one of the most distinguished figures in the history of the present age, but we cannot expect that his merit will shine out in its proper light, since he wrote many things which are not published in his name; was at the bottom of many excellent counsels, in which he did not appear; did offices of friendship to many persons who knew not from whom they were derived; and performed great services to his country, the glory of which was transferred to others; in short, since he made it his endeavour rather to do worthy actions than to gain an illustrious character.' The concise Latin of which is his Lordship's motto, Prodesse quam conspicui, perfectly, elegant, and comprehensive, truly characteristic of the noble turn and temper of his mind, both in the sense and expression; and the force of it is rather extenuated and enfeebled, as Mr Walpole justly observes, by dilating and running it into an infinite number of words, a great fault in the Freeholder. It were to be wished that Mr Addison had exerted his poetical talents in an epigram on the subject; which, perhaps, is the best form for casting a motto into a translation. In that cast I have met with the motto of Lord King, a successor of Lord Somers in the Great Seal. The motto was, Labor ipse voluptas, as aptly chosen for the person as that of Lord Somers; and is thus turned,

'Tis not the splendor of the place,
The gilded coach, the purse, the mace;
Nor all the pompous train of state,
With crowds, that at your levee wait,
That make you happy, make you great. }
But whilst mankind you strive to bless,
With all the talents you possess.
Whilst the chief joy you do receive,
Arises from the joy you give.
This takes the heart, and conquers spite,
And makes the heavy burden light.
For pleasure rightly understood,
Is only labour to be good.

P

SOMNER [WILLIAM], a man of great knowledge in the History and Antiquities of this country, and Author of the valuable Saxon Dictionary; of which Language he was one of the first revivers in this kingdom; was the son of Mr William Somner, Registrary of the Court of Canterbury under Sir Nathanael Brent, Commissary: and descended from an honest and creditable family (a) [A]. He was born, the 30th day of March, 1606, within the parish of St Margaret's in Canterbury (b), and educated in the free-school of that city; where, if one may judge from his subsequent works, he made considerable improvements [B]. Without proceeding further in his learning, or having the benefit of an university-education, he was taken as Clerk to his father, in the Ecclesiastical courts of that diocese. And, in a proper time, preferred to a creditable office in those courts by Archbishop Laud (c) [C]. His employment leading him in some manner, and his thoughts and affections having ever much inclined him, to the study and search of Antiquities, he made them the amusement of his leisure hours. More particularly, as bound in duty and thankfulness [to use his own words (d)], he applied himself to the Antiquities of Canterbury, the place of his birth and abode [D]. But, at the

(a) The Life of Mr Somner by White Kennett; prefix'd to Mr Somner's Treatise of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent, printed Oxford, 1693, 8vo. p. 4.

(b) Ibid. p. 2.

(c) Ibid. p. 5, 6.

(d) Preface to his Antiquities of Canterbury.

[A] Descended from an honest and creditable family.

Mr Kennett in his Life of our Author (1), observes, That the name of Somner hath been eminent in other ages, and in other counties. John Somenour of Multon near Croyland was a commoner of some figure in the reign of King Henry V. (2). There was a publick Hall or Inn in Oxford, called from the first owner of it, Hospitium Somneri, or Somenorsbyu (3). And there is now, or lately was, a gentile branch of this ancient name in the county of Bucks.

[B] He made considerable improvements. Mr Kennett conjectures, that he here imbibed the inclinations to Antiquity from the fresh memory of the late master John Twine, L.L.B. who dying in 1581, had been very inquisitive into former ages; had left a public monument of such knowledge, in his book, De rebus Albionis, &c; and had made particular Collections of the Antiquities of this City: whose fame in this part of learning might well incite an emulous youth, and raise that spirit, which carried him at last beyond this great example (4).

[C] Preferred to a creditable office in those Courts by Archbishop Laud What office in particular it was, is not specified; only, that in virtue of it, he was entrusted with the Records of that Metropolitane

Church. Undoubtedly it was the place of Register of the Archbishop's Court. He expressed his gratitude to the Archbishop, in the Dedication of his Antiquities of Canterbury to him; wherein he acknowledges his Grace's interest both in the Author, and in the Work. In the author, as subsisting in his place and profession, under God, chiefly by his Grace's Favour and Goodness. In the Work,——as it is a Discourse of Antiquities; His Grace's transcendent and unpatterned care and cost for the Collection whereof, of all sorts, from all parts, crowned by his singular Piety and Nobleness in disposing them to the good and service of the publick; as they were thankfully acknowledged and worthily celebrated by all the Lovers of Antiquities; so did they give his Grace an especial interest to the fruits of all their Labours who were that way inclined.

[D] The Antiquities of Canterbury This work Mr Somner finished in the thirty-third year of his age (5); and it was published in 1640, 4to. under this title, 'The Antiquities of Canterbury; or, A Survey of that ancient Citie, with the Suburbs and Cathedral; containing principally Matters of Antiquity in them all; Collected chiefly from old Manuscripts, Leiger-books, and other like Records, for the most part never as yet printed: With an Appendix here annexed;

(5) Mr Baintly's Preface to the second edition, p. 2.

(1) P. 4.

(2) Hist. Croyland. Continuat. p. 502.

(3) Wood, Hist. & Ant. Univ. Oxon. L. II. p. 153.

(4) Life, p. 5.

(e) As is abundantly plain, from his frequent quotations from them in his writings.

(f) Life, p. 11.

the same time, his constant delight was in the Classic Authors (e); as well as in old Manuscripts, Leiger-books, Rolls, and Records. His Learning in the most useful points, made him so quickly known to be a man of use and service to his country, that upon the great questions, in descents of families, tenure of estates, dedication of churches, right of tithes, and the like, he was consulted as an oracle (f). In the course of his studies, and his search after Antiquities; finding, at every step, how necessary was the knowledge of the Languages of the first Inhabitants of this country, the Britans and Saxons, he set himself in good earnest about learning of them. For the first, the British or Welch, there were rules of Grammar, Dictionaries, and other sufficient memoirs, beside the living dialect, to guide a man of industry and resolution. But the Saxon language was diffus'd, and the monuments of it so few and so hidden, that it required infinite courage and patience, to attempt and prosecute the knowledge of it [E]. However, being sensible

(6) J. Bale Scriptorum Brytanniae Catalog. p. 326. edit. 1559. W. Thorne copied it. Idem, p. 487.

(7) See his preface.

(8) Comm. on Antoninus's Itinerary, p. 175, 176.

(9) Villare Cantian. p. 93.

(10) Monast. Anglican. Tom. I. p. 18.

(11) De Ling. Saxon. p. 141.

(12) Survey of Kent, p. 300.

(13) Life, &c. p. 24—29.

(14) Monast. Anglic. Tom. I. p. 89.

(15) Ingulphi Histor. edit. Oxon, 1684. p. 62.

‘annexed; wherein (for better satisfaction to the Learned) the manuscripts and records of chiefest consequence are faithfully exhibited. All (for the honour of that ancient Metropolis and his good affection to Antiquities) fought out and published by the industry and good will of William Somner.’— This accurate performance is the more laudable, because he could find no way but what he made. There had been indeed two discourses of the like kind, namely, Tho. Spotte's History of Canterbury (6); and Collections of the Antiquities of Canterbury, by John Twine; to which he refers in his Comment. de Rebus Albionicis, but both these were lost to the use of our Author (7), and we do not hear they are yet recovered. So that he had no one writer to transcribe or imitate, but all the labour and glory were his own. It was done in such a juncture as preserved the memorial of many Epitaphs, Inscriptions, and proper observations, which otherwise had been lost to all succeeding ages, during our unhappy civil wars. The greatest encomiums have been given to it, by Mr William Burton (8), Mr Philpot (9), Mr Fotherby (10), and especially by Dr Meric Casaubon (11), and Mr Kilburne (12): The former of whom styles it ‘a pious and laborious work, and highly useful, not only to those who desir'd to know the state of that once flourishing city, but to all that were curious in the ancient English history;’ and the latter says, that he ‘only briefly touches upon the City of Canterbury, because Mr William Somner had so elaborately, judiciously, and fully wrote of the same, that there was left but little (if any thing observable) which he had not there set down.’ A new Title-page to it was printed in 1662, but it was not a new edition. — It was reprinted in 1703, fol. with very great Additions; particularly a Second Part, treating of the Cathedral Church, Archbishoprick, Priory of Christ-Church, and Collegiate Church, with a catalogue of the Deans and Canons, the Archdeaconry, Monastery of St Augustin, Parish churches, &c. by Nicolas Battely, Vicar of Beakborn. Illustrated and adorned with several useful and fair Sculptures, particularly of the Monuments. But the fine Font, given by John Warner, Bishop of Rochester, is omitted in this edition.

[E] That it requir'd infinite courage and patience, to attempt and prosecute the knowledge of it.] The learned Mr Kennett (13) hath made very curious observations upon that occasion, which we shall lay before the reader.— ‘When the Saxons had made the Britans strangers in their own land, then the language which the Conquerors brought with them, soon grew into contempt among themselves. Even so early as the year 652, “Many out of this island were sent to the Monasteries of France for Education, and to bring back the manners and language of those parts (14).” In the reign of Edward the Confessor, “by the great resort of Normans to his Court, the whole island began to lose their English rites, and to imitate the manners of the Franks; especially it was esteem'd a piece of breeding for all the great men to speak the Gallic idiom, and to despise the language and customs of their own country (15).” This inglorious affectation is confess'd by an Historian who liv'd in that age. It lookt like an omen of being shortly to be conquer'd by that nation, of whose tongue and fashions they were so industriously fond. The event was so. Three and twenty years after came in the Norman Lords, who threatened an extirpation to that language of which the Natives began to be ashamed. For these new Masters “hated the English, and so much abhorred their Language, that the Laws of the land were managed in the French tongue; the children were taught French in the Schools, and not English; and even the English manner of writing was left off, and the French manner came to be used in books and all manner of writings (16).” (16) Idem, p. 71. The ignominious marks of a conquered people. The same Author from his own experience does again lament, that “the Saxon Hand, which had been us'd in all writings, grew into disgrace, and the French hand, because it was more legible and more pleasing to the eyes, did every where obtain (17); so as, in the very next reign, the Saxon Letters were so obsolete and so unknown, that none but few of the elder people were able to read them (18).” Nay, in the year 1095, Wulfstan, Bishop of Worcester was depos'd, when scarce any other thing was objected against him, but that “he was an old English idiot, who did not understand the French tongue (19).” ‘It is true, the next successor Henry the First, gave a Charter to William Archbishop of Canterbury, confirming to him the possessions of his See, in the Saxon language and characters (20). This was but a single instance, and perhaps done to oblige his Queen of the Saxon line, and to ingratiate himself with the English Subjects, who might hope by this marriage they had a better title in him. And therefore it is a mistake in the learned Mabillon (21), and some other Authors, who assert, the Saxon way of writing was lost from the very time of the Norman Conquest. It was with the Saxon characters as with signs of the Cross in public deeds, which were for the most part chang'd into the Norman way of seals and subscriptions, yet some Charters were with the old form of Crosses. The Saxon Dialect obtained no doubt in Country Vills, with some borrowed variation from the French, and some remains of it did intermix with the Court language. But the Barons and Knights, who were most of them Norman, were so afraid of their children's talking the old English, that in the reign of Henry the Second, “They sent them over into France for education, to wear off the barbarousness of the native tongue (22).” ‘At the beginning of the reign of Edward the third, Robert Holcot, a Dominican, confesses, “there was no institution of children in the old English, but they first learn'd the French, and from the French the Latin tongue, which he observes to have been a practice introduc'd by William the Conqueror, and to have ever since obtain'd (23).” ‘Tho' from the first decline of the Barons, and advance of the Commons who were more of English blood, the Country language grew more into request; till at last the Commons in Parliament at Westminster the 36. of Edw. the third, shewed so much of the English spirit, as to represent to the King “the great mischief which would happen to divers of the Realm, if that the Laws were pleaded, shewed, and judged in the French tongue, which is much unknown in the said Realm, &c. Upon which it was ordain'd and stablished, that all Plees, &c. should be pleaded, shewed and defended, answered, debated, and judged in the English tongue, &c. (24).” ‘Yet this law did by no means restore the Saxon, either in the Alphabet or in the prime Dialect: It only redeemed the kingdom from an old token of subjection, and did honour to the then compound language, much vitiated by imported words and phrases. And still there seem'd a dash

(16) Idem, p. 71.

(17) Id. p. 85.

(18) Id. p. 98.

(19) Mat. Paris sub anno.

(20) H. Wharton Auctar. Hist. Dogm. p. 388.

(21) De Re Diplom. p. 52.

(22) Gervaf. Tilbur. de officiis Imper. MS. in Bibl. Bodl.

(23) Rob. Holcot, Lect. 2. super Sapient.

(24) Pulton Stat. 36 Edw. III.

sensible of what Sir Henry Spelman had found by his own experience, 'that the knowledge of the Saxon language was so far necessary, as without it the Antiquities of England could not be discovered, or must be but imperfectly known (g);' he earnestly set about it, through the advice and encouragement of his constant friend Dr Meric Casaubon. When he began, he had a hard task; since he was in a manner to invent the language as well as to restore it. For upon his first essays that way, he had but two poor Manuscripts, and one of them on so obscure a subject, as might have exercised a critic, sooner than instructed a novice. But, animated rather than discouraged by difficulties, he prosecuted the study of the Saxon tongue, with such industrious perseverance, and proportionable happy success, that he surpassed not only those that went before, but also most of those that have come after him (b). Having thus made himself master of the Saxon tongue, his next work was, to write large and learned Notes and observations on the Laws of King Henry I. published by Sir Roger Twisden in 1644, fol. with a very useful Glossary (i), in the room of the old one, which was faulty in many places (k). From the time of his engaging in the Antiquities of Canterbury, he laid the foundation of a larger design, namely, to collect materials for a just and perfect History of the county of Kent (l). But, as he complains, 'being soon after overtaken by that impetuous storm of civil war, he was necessitated to betake himself to other thoughts (m).' His Treatise of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent is supposed to have been part of that intended work [F]. At the same time, his Enquiries into the Customs and Tenures of his native County, produced his excellent Treatise of Gavelkind [G]. It was finished about (g) See our author's Epistle Dedicatory to his Saxon Dictionary.

(b) Life, p. 22 — 30.

(i) Casaubon de Lingua Saxonica, p. 141.

(k) See our author's Glossary, at the end of Decem Scriptores.

(l) Life, p. 32, &c.

(m) Preface to his Treatise of Gavelkind.

'of the Norman spirit, which by the same law provided "that all such Pleas should be entred and enroll'd in the Latin." 'If there were any conveyance of the true Saxon tongue, it was in the Monasteries; but in those only which were founded before the Norman Conquest; for in such, interest did oblige them to understand the language of their original Charters. It was for this reason, that in the Abbey of Croxland, "a Tutor was appointed "to teach Saxon to some of the younger brethren, "that in their old age they might be more fit to "alledge the Records of their Monastery against their "adversaries (25)." 'And it was no doubt for the like reason, that in the Abby of Tavistoke, which had a Saxon Founder about 691, "there were "solemn Lectures in the Saxon tongue, even to the "time of the suppression of the Abbeyes, that the "knowledge of that language might not fail, as it has "since well nigh done (26)."

When Mr Somner began to learn Saxon, there were very few Saxon Books in print; except King Alfred's Translation of the New Testament, published by John Foxe in 1571. and W. Lambard's Saxon Larvs; the first volume of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, &c. But he himself greatly facilitated the knowledge of it by his most valuable Saxon Dictionary, as it hath been since by the labours of Abr. Weloc, Will. Lisse, Dr Tho. Marshall, Francis Junius, Bishop Gibson, Edward Thwaites, Tho. Rawlinson, Esq; Tho. Benson; especially the learned Dr Hickes. And the beneficent Dr Richard Rawlinson hath encouraged the study of it as much as possible, by founding a Lecture for the teaching of it at Oxford.

[F] Treatise of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent.] It remained in manuscript 'till 1693, when it was published by James Brome, M. A. Rector of Cheriton, and Chaplain to the Cinque-Ports. Oxford 1693, 8vo. with notes by Mr Edmund Gibson, afterwards the late learned Bishop of London; and the Life of Mr Somner, prefix'd, by Mr White Kennett, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough.

[G] His excellent Treatise of Gavelkind.] That it was finished about the beginning of the year 1647, is manifest from this Testimonial, inserted in the Appendix.

'I have perus'd this learned treatise of Gavel kind, and judge it very fit to be published.
'Apr. 7, 1647. Ja. Armachanus.

But there were two reasons, that hindered the publication then. Namely, the distress and persecution of the writer, which might take from him the desire and ability of printing. And, the ignorance and affectation of those times, that hated all Antiquity ecclesiastical and civil; and doted on a new Gospel, and new Laws: so that 'till the nation was dispossess'd of this spirit, it was not fit to cast the pearl before them. At last, upon the Nation's returning to their senses at the Restoration in 1660, the book came out, with this title: 'A Treatise of Gavelkind, both Name and Thing; Shewing the true Etymology, and Derivation of the one; the Nature, Antiquity, and Original of the other: With sundry emergent Observations, both pleasant and profitable to be known of Kentish men and others, especially such as are studious either of the ancient Custom, or the common Law of this Kingdom. By (a well-wisher to both) William Somner.' Lond. 1660. 4to. The Treatise is divided into these five heads. 1. The true Etymologie and derivation of the name, where he refutes the fancy of Lambard, Coke, Camden, Verstegan, Cowell, Spelman, Dodderidge, and many other Lawyers and Antiquaries, who would derive it from the Saxon gafel or give to all kindred, or to all alike. Whereas he proves the name is by no means borrowed from the partible nature of the land; but from gafel or gavel a tribute or customary rent, and gecynde nature, sort, or kind; implying it to be land not held in fee, as Knights service; but chargeable with such rents as made it Socage tenure. 2. He enquires into the nature of Gavelkind in point of partition, and proves it was neither from the name, nor bare nature of the land; but partly from the nature of the land, and partly from a general custom extended through the whole county in such censual land. 3. He searches into the Antiquity of Gavelkind-custom (in point especially of partition) and why more general in Kent than elsewhere. 4. Whether Gavel kind be properly a tenure or custom? where he treats with incomparable learning of all feudatory right, and all menial service. 5. Whether before the statute of Wills (32, and 34 Henry VIII) Gavelkind-land in Kent were devisable or not? which he resolves in the negative, and answers all arguments of those who held the contrary. At the end, is an Appendix of Charters, and other original Papers, referred to, in the Treatise.— "In this elaborate work, the learned Author is most happy in the Etymology and description, not only of Gavelkind, but also of Socage, of the Normans Fief de Haubert, and Fief de Roturier; of the Saxons Bocting and Foleland; of the Feudists Allodium and Feudum, &c. wherein he is singular and dissenting from all precedent writers, with such a vein of modesty, and such a strength of reason and authority, as has yet satisfied all readers, and silenc'd all Critics. He has farther explain'd all the different tenures In capite; Knights service; Fee farm; Frank-almoign; Divine service; Escuage certain; Burgage; Villenage, &c. with all lands denominated from their service, as Work land; Boc land; Averland; Drof-land; Swilling-land; Mol land; Berland; Ware land; Terra-Sufanna; For-land; Bordland; Scrudland; Over-land; Monly-land, &c. Wherein he supplies and corrects Littleton, and his oraculous Commentator, Sir Edward Coke: He fills up the defects of Spelman, and prevents the industry of future Glossographers. By this one performance he indeed shew'd himself an absolute Civilian, and a complete common Lawyer (27)." Mr Battely says

(27) Life, p. 43 — 50.

(28),

(25) Inqul, b, ut supra, p. 98.

(26) Camden Britann. in Devonshire.

(n) Preface to the same Treatise.

(o) Ibid.

(p) John, who was afterwards Wood-rove to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and George, Major of the militia in Kent, slain at Wye in 1648. Life, p. 90.

about the beginning of the year 1647; but the publication of it was retarded by the want of Peace in this country, 'Peace that mother of Arts,' as he calls it (n). At length, after it had lain by him above twelve years, he published it in 1660; upon the encouragement of some worthy and judicious friends (o). During our unhappy civil wars Mr Somner adhered inviolably to the Royal cause, with two of his brothers (p): and, after the King's murder, he bewailed his death in two Poems [H]. In the mean time, he employed himself in his beloved study of Antiquity, and composed, 'A discourse of Portus Iccius, wherein the late conceits of Chiffetius, in his Topographical discourse, are examined and refuted: the judgment of Cluverius concerning the same Ports asserted and embraced, and the true site thereof more clearly demonstrated [I].' His skill in the Saxon tongue, obliging him to enquire into most of the European languages ancient and modern; this made him run through the old Gallic, Irish, Scotch, and Danish dialects; especially the Gothic, Slavonian, and German. Of his perfection in the latter, he gave the world a public specimen, in his curious Observations on some old German words, that had been collected by the learned Lipsius: which Observations were published by Dr Meric Casaubon [K], at the end of his Commentary on the Hebrew and Saxon languages in 1650. His next opportunity of serving the world, was in drawing up the learned Glossary, printed at the end of the Ten Writers of the English History [L], published by Sir Roger Twifden in 1652. Mr Somner's reputation was now so well established,

(28) Preface to Antiq. of Canterbury.

(28), that 'this Treatise came abroad so compleat, as it did not afterwards admit of one correction (the Errata of the pres being excepted) from his own pen, nor of any one Alteration or Addition, tho' he lived several years after he published it.' But, notwithstanding this supposed correctness, in 1726, there came out a second edition, corrected from the many errors of the former impression; with Mr Somner's Life, written, newly revised, and much enlarged, by Wh. Kennett, Bishop of Peterborough, 4to.

[H] He bewailed his death in two Poems.] The first is intituled, "The Insecuritie of Princes considered in an occasional Meditation upon the Kings late Sufferings and Death." Which begins thus:

"O how doth sad experience verifie
 'His perilous estate, that sits on high!
 'The lowly shrub stands ever firm and fast,
 'Whilst lofty cedars shake with every blast.
 'No stormy winds disturb the humble vale,
 'Whilst the proud mountain feels the smallest gale.
 'Safety but seldom at the Court resides;
 'It flies the Prince, and with the peasant 'bides."

The other Poem hath prefixed to it the Pourtraiture of King Charles I. before his ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ, with this title; "The Frontispiece of the King's Book opened; with a Poem annexed, The Insecuritie of Princes, &c." Both printed in 4to.

[I] A discourse of Portus Iccius, &c.] This discourse remained in manuscript 'till 1694, when it was translated into Latin by Mr Edmund Gibson, afterwards the late excellent Bishop of London; and printed at Oxford, with this title, 'Julii Caesaris Portus Iccius illustratus: sive 1. Gulielmi Somneri ad Chiffetii Librum de Portu Iccio, responsio; nunc primum ex MS. edita. 2. Caroli Du Fresne Dissertatio de Portu Iccio. Tractatum utrumque Latine vertit, & nova Dissertatione auxit Edmundus Gibson, Art. Bac. è Coll. Reg Oxon. 1694. 8vo.' Mr Battely observes (29), that 'the Translator has faithfully done his part, and has given much credit to the discourse, by attiring it in the old Roman dress, a garb most suitable to a discourse upon such a subject.'

(29) Preface, as above.

[K] Observations upon some old German words, &c.] Dr Casaubon, whilst he was employed in his Essay on the Saxon tongue, hapned upon an epistle of Justus Lipsius to Schottus, which contain'd a large catalogue of old German words, in use with that nation, about eight or nine hundred years before. The Doctor thought many of them had a great affinity to the Saxon; and therefore, being then at London, sent down the Catalogue to Mr Somner at Canterbury, and desir'd his opinion of them. Who within few days return'd his Animadversions, and shew'd the relation of the German with the Saxon tongue. But because they were too long to be inserted by Dr Casaubon, in the body of his discourse; he plac'd them as an Appendix under this title Gulielmi Somneri Cantuariensis ad verba vetera Germanica a V. Cl. Justo Lipfio Epist. Cent. III. ad Belgas Epist. XLIV. collecta, Notæ (30).

[L] The Ten Writers of the English History] That valuable collection came out in 1652, fol. with this title, 'Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores X. Simeon Monachus Dunelmensis. Johannes Prior Hagustaldensis. Richardus Prior Hagustaldensis. Ailredus Abbas Rievallensis. Radulphus de Diceto Londoniensis. Johannes Brompton Jornallensis. Gervasius Monachus Dorobornensis. Thomas Stubbs Dominicanus. Guilielmus Thorn Cantuariensis. Henricus Knighton Leicestrensis. Ex vetustis Manuscriptis nunc primum in lucem editi.'

This great work may be said to have been the joint undertaking of Sir Roger Twifden, Archbishop Usher, John Selden, Esq; and the amanuensis Mr Ralph Jennings. These learned men being sensible, that the obscure and obsolete words, which often occurred in those monkish historians, wanted an explanation; and knowing none so well qualified for giving the just and true meaning of them as Mr Somner, they committed the business to him, which he discharged with great abilities and integrity. Sir Roger Twifden takes from thence occasion to give this good character of our author. "De Glossario verbum. Sine quo hoc junum & parum utile prorsus extitisset opus, illud a Guilielmo Somnero, pristinae probitatis & candoris viro, patriarumq; antiquitatum indagatore sagacissimo, & ad hoc linguæ Anglo-Saxonicae peritissimo, in tuam gratiam elaboratum intelligas." And, a little lower, he styles him, a man "summæ modestiæ & ingenuitatis, &c." i. e. 'of the greatest modesty and ingenuity; and of primitive candor and probity; a most industrious searcher into the antiquities of his country, and withal extremely well skill'd in the Saxon language.—This Glossary, being a key to reclude and antiquated words, improv'd whatever of this nature had been done before: it amends and supplies the old Gallic Glossary of Pentanus; the Signification of words by Skenæus; the explanation of Terms prefix'd by Mr Lambard to his Saxon Laws; the Onomasticon of Clement Reiner, in his Apostol. Bened. in Anglia; the Glossography to the Works of Chaucer; the Etymologicon of Jo. Ger. Vossius; the Glossary of Dr Watts, adjoin'd to his noble edition of Mat. Paris; and above all the excellent Glossary of Sir Henry Spelman, then only publish'd to the letter N. Nor has Mr Somner, like the former Glossographers, confin'd himself to the antiquated names of things; but with happy learning has commented on the name of this island, and several parts of it; to which he has affixt such new and apposite derivations, as delight and satisfy all judicious readers. It is indeed a work of that extent, as may serve for a clavis [key] to all other Historians, and to all Records (31).' But it might be greatly improved, from our Author's subsequent Collections which remain in the Arches of Canterbury; from Fr. Junius's Etymologicon Anglicanum; and from Dr Wilkins's Glossary at the end of his edition of the Saxon Laws, &c.

(30) Life, p. 57.

(31) Life, p. 62.

[M] The

blished, that no monuments of Antiquity could be further published without his advice and assistance. Therefore he helped Mr Dugdale and Mr Dodsworth in compiling the Monasticon Anglicanum [M]. And, through the importunity of his friends, he undertook, about the same time, to collect a Saxon Dictionary. For his support during that laborious work, Roger Spelman, Esq; granted him the Salary, settled on the Saxon Lecture founded by his grandfather Sir Henry Spelman [N]. He used such expedition, that the Dictionary was printed off, and published in 1659, fol. [O]. As he had been always a zealous Royalist, so, at the dawning of the Restoration, he joined those Noblemen, and Gentlemen of the county of Kent (q), who were promoting a Declaration, and getting hands to a Petition, for a full and free Parliament; for which he was imprisoned in the castle of Deal, or Dover; but released upon the King's coming (r). By way of reward for his services and sufferings, he was promoted, in 1660, to the Mastership of St John's Hospital in the suburbs of Canterbury; of which he recovered some part of the Endowment: and also appointed Auditor of Christ-Church, in the same city, by the Dean and Chapter, to whom he was a father and friend, more than an honorary servant (s). He continued happy in the friendship and acquaintance of the greatest men that were his contemporaries [P], 'till the time of his death; which happened March 30, 1669. He was buried April the 2d, in the church of St Margaret's in Canterbury, where many of his ancestors lay (t). In the beginning of his last illness, he took an opportunity to tell his

(q) Namely, Sir William May, Sir John Boy, Mr Ingham, Mr John Boye, Mr Lovelace, and Mr Masters, &c. Mercurius Politicus No. 606, p. 1072.

(r) Life, p. 91. Publick Intelligence, No. 609.

(s) Life, p. 99.

(t) Life, p. 102.

[M] The Monasticon Anglicanum] Of this work, the first volume was publish'd in 1655, fol. And the parts furnished by Mr Somner, were the Charters of Christ Church and St Augustin's in Canterbury, the Ichnography of the Cathedral, the draught of the Monastery, and other sculptures; with the original Charter of the Abbey of Feverham, then in his possession. He likewise gave information of several particulars relating to the city and county. And translated all the Saxon originals, and the English transcripts from the Itinerary of Leland, and other records, into plain and proper Latin; as Sir John Marsham acquaints the reader in the Propylaeum.—In the library of the Cathedral church of Canterbury, there is a copy of this first volume; wherein is inserted after the Propylaeum a printed leaf, containing six copies of verses made by Kentish-men, in commendation of Mr Dodsworth, Mr Dugdale, and Mr Somner, who are there said to be the joint collectors of that glorious work (32).

[N] Roger Spelman, Esq; granted him the Salary, settled on the Saxon Lecture, &c.] Mr Kennett gives us the following account, of the occasion of founding that Lecture. "The great Sir Henry Spelman, while he was at Cambridge with Mr Jeremy Stephens, to search the Libraries there, and collect materials for his designed Volumes of British Councils, finding many Saxon Manuscripts, and very few that understood them; resolved to found a Lecture in that language, in order to restore and improve the study of it. This generous act was soon done by him, and he first conferr'd that office on Mr Abraham Wheelock, of King's college Cambridge, that had assisted him in some transcripts of that tongue; and, for endowment, settled on him and his successors a sufficient yearly stipend, with presentation to the Vicarage of Middleton, nigh Linn Regis in Norfolk (33). By the death of Mr Wheelock in 1657, the disposal of that Lecture fell to Roger Spelman, Esq; son of Sir John, son of the Founder, who design'd to bestow it on Mr Samuel Foster, a learned and worthy Divine. But Archbishop Usher, a friend to Antiquities and Mr Somner, recommended him to the patron, 'that he would confer on him the pecuniary stipend, to enable him to compile a Saxon Dictionary, which would more improve that tongue than bare Academic Lectures (34)."

Upon this occasion, Mr Kennett makes the following proper Reflections. "And herein that Prelate was like himself, judicious. For the endowment of public Lectures has often met with this ill success; to make the Readers neglect, and the Hearers despise them. Whereas if the same rewards were given, on condition of printing those Lectures, or publishing some other remains of that Art or Science: mens industry would be greater, and the republic of letters much better serv'd. This seem'd the intention of the wife and pious founder Sir Henry Spelman, in establishing this lecture: The words of his foundation being, 'to promote the Saxon tongue, either by reading it publicly, or by the edition of Saxon Manuscripts, and other books (35).' Which last design Mr Wheelock had most answered, by publishing the Ecclesiastical History of Bede, with the Saxon Paraphrase of King Alfred. The Saxon Chronology with his own Latin version, and Mr Lambard's Saxon Laws, with some Additions. Cambr. 1644, fol.

This reason of the thing, and the will of his grandfather, inclin'd Mr Spelman to comply with the advice of Archbishop Usher, and to prefer Mr Somner to the annual salary of that Lecture. Which this man of tenderness and modesty would not accept, without the free consent of Mr Foster, before nominated to the place: who prefer'd the public before his own interest, and Mr Somner before himself. Therefore content with the ecclesiastical benefice, he left the annual portion of money to Mr Somner, who receiving this reward, would not omit the duty for it (36)."

[O] The Dictionary was printed off, and published in 1659.] Mr Battely justly styles it, 'the true and lasting Monument of his praise: a work of incredible Labour to himself, and of singular Benefit to the world (37).' The previous assistances of the like kind, which came into the hands of Mr Somner; were, 1. Archbishop Ælfric's Glossary, transcrib'd by Fr. Junius, from a very ancient copy in the library of Sir Peter Paul Rubens of Brussels. 2. Two ancient Saxon Glossaries in the Cotton Library, the one a thin folio, the other a more thick octavo. 3. Laurence Norwell's Saxon Vocabulary, procur'd and lent by Mr Selden. 4. John Fosceline's collections, transcrib'd and communicated by Sir Symonds Dewes, Bart.—From these, and all other Saxon books then extant, Mr Somner made immense Collections, in two large Volumes folio, for the compiling of his Dictionary. When it was finish'd, he sent it to Oxford, where it was printed; and came out in April 1659, with an elegant inscription to all Students in the Saxon tongue; a grateful Dedication to his patron Roger Spelman, Esq; and a proper Preface. The Author and his work recommended by verses, both English and Latin: With an Appendix of the Grammar and Glossary of Ælfric. And at the end of all, is a Catalogue of those worthy persons who contributed to the great charge of the Impression: for it was printed by subscription.—Mr Somner made afterwards several additions and corrections to it, from notes and observations sent him by Mr George Davenport a great proficient in that language. And Fr. Junius left a copy with his own curious collections and illustrations (38).—In 1701, Mr Tho. Benson of Queen's college, Oxon. publish'd, Vocabularium Anglo-Saxonicum, Lexico Gul Somneri magna parte auctius. Large 8vo. But if every Saxon word had begun a new line, the work would have been more distinct and usefull.

[P] He continued happy in the friendship and acquaintance of the greatest men] Particularly, of Archbishop Laud, Archbishop Usher, Sir Thomas Cotton, Bart. Sir Roger Twisden, Bart. Sir William Dugdale, Mr Roger Dodsworth, Sir Simonds Dewes, Bart. Mr William Burton, Sir John Marsham, Sir Edward Boffe, Clarenceux, Elias Ashmole, Esq; Dr Thomas Fuller, Dr William Watts, Mr George Davenport, and especially Dr Meric Casaubon, &c. (39).

(36) Life, p. 72—74.

(37) Preface.

(38) Life, p. 75—86.

(39) Life, &c. p. 105—115.

(31) Life, p. 67—69.

(33) Wheelock, Prefat ad Bedam, a se editum.

(34) Somneri Epist. Ded. ad Saxonic. Diction.

(35) Wheelock Dedicat. ut supra.

his wife, that he had never been let blood, nor taken any physic; which was a just argument, not only of his happy constitution, but of his exact temperance and sobriety. He was twice married. His first wife was Mrs Elizabeth Thurgar, of a good family in Cambridgeshire, who lived with him about thirty years: and by her he had three daughters, and one son, which all dyed young. His second wife was Barbara, daughter of Mr John Dawson, a great Royalist in Kent, by whom he had, one daughter that dyed unmarried; William educated at Merton-college, and Vicar of Liminge in Kent; John, a Surgeon; and another son. He left but a small competence, which if not frugally managed, could never have answered the support of his widow, and the education of his children. However, by his last Will he gave several Legacies to the poor. His many well chosen Books, and curious Manuscripts, were purchased by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, and deposited in the publick Library of that church (u) [2]. Mr Somner's whole life was, like his writings, void of prejudice and passion. He was courteous, without design: wife, without a trick: and faithful, without a reward. Humble, and compassionate: moderate, and equal: never fretted by his afflictions: nor elated by the favours of heaven, and good men (w). His profession was, that 'he loved truth (the end of all science) for itself; and was all together unbiaſt with any by-respects, whether of vain-glory, singularity, or the like: making it his constant endeavour, that Truth alone might triumph over falshood, Antiquity over Novelty (x).

(u) Life, p. 101, 103.

(w) Life, p. 98.

(x) Pref. to his Treatise of Gavelkind.

[2] His curious Manuscripts were purchased by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury.] They were, I. 'Observations upon the Commissary of Canterbury's Patent. This Discourse, it is supposed, was the first-fruits of his labours, the beginnings of his study of Antiquity. It was composed in the time of Archbishop Abbot, a little after the death of King James the First, upon the patent of Commissariſhip granted to Sir Nathanael Brent. Great part of it was inserted by the Author into his Antiquities of Canterbury, and the rest is not fitted for public use (40). II. 'Collections out of ancient MSS. and Records, relating to the City and Church of Canterbury, and to other Towns and Churches in Kent.' Many of them are published in W. Thorn's Chronicle. III. 'Large Extracts out of the Chronicle of William Thorn, with other extracts out of the Obituary of Christ-Church Canterbury; and out of the Registers of the Churches of Canterbury and Rochester, with Collections out of the Saxon Annals.' The greatest part of these Extracts have since been published in the First Part of Anglia Sacra (41). IV. 'His Antiquities of Canterbury interleaved.' With some Corrections and Alterations. V. 'Chartham News; or, A brief Relation of some strange Bones there, lately digged up, in some Grounds of Mr John Somner's of Canterbury.' Printed at the end of the first Part of his Antiquities of Canterbury, 2d edition. It was first published by his brother in 1669. V. 'Some Emendations upon his Treatise of Gavelkind.' VI. 'History of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent.' Published in 1693-4. VII. 'A Discourse of Portus Iccius; translated into Latin by Mr Gibson, and publish'd in 1694, as is above related. VIII. 'Littus Saxonicum per Britanniam. IX. Scholia & Animadversiones in Leges Henrici primi, Regis Angliæ, subnectitur Glossarium rerum & verborum difficultium in dictis Legibus. Dedicated to Sir Robert Twisden. X. 'Marginal notes upon Mr Selden's Spicilegium ad Eadmerum; especially an Emendation of Selden's translation of the Laws of William the Conqueror, published by him, p. 173, &c. XI. Some marginal

(40) N. Eattely's Preface.

(41) Ibid.

'Notes upon the Grand Coustumier of Normandy.' XII. Adversaria in Spelmani Glossarium; in Watsoni Glossarium Matthæo Paris additum; in tractatum Ger. Voffii de vitio Sermonis. In one volume. XIII. 'A large Collection, in order to the compiling his Saxon Dictionary, in two volumes. XIV. 'A transcript of a large Saxon theological Treatise.' XV. 'Collections out of Transcripts of several ancient Saxon MSS. in two volumes.' XVI. 'His emendations upon Sir Henry Spelman's two Volumes of the Councils (42); where he has collated the text with the MSS. and amended the Translation with the Saxon originals; having gone through the whole work.' These emendations were made use of by Dr Wilkins, in his subsequent edition of the Councils. XVII. 'His large Notes upon Spelman's Glossary. XVIII. Some marginal Emendations on Ch. Spelman's Saxon Psalter. XIX. Marginal Emendations on J. Foxe's Saxon Gospels. XX. Marginal Emendations on Lisle's Saxon monument. XXI. Large marginal Notes upon Meric Casaubon's book, De quatuor Linguis. XXII. Large Marginal Notes upon Verstegan. XXIII. Marginal Notes upon Brañon de Legibus Angliæ. XXIV. Marginal Notes upon Horne's Mirrour of Justice. XXV. Marginal Notes upon the old Collection of English and Latin Statutes, printed in 1556. XXVI. Marginal Notes upon Mr Silas Taylor's History of Gavelkind, correcting his mistakes. XXVII. Some Collections towards his intended History of Kent. XXVIII. Lamberti Leges Saxonicae. Where he has amended the translation. XXIX. 'Another copy of Αρχαιονομια, full of Emendations and Annotations throughout.' XXX. Leges Anglo-Saxonicae, a V. C. Guil. Lambardo olim editæ, ex integro Latine datæ. He justly thought the former translation too elaborate, affected, and paraphrastic; which made him undertake this new one, and do it in a more plain, and, as near as could be, in a literal manner: Adding some Laws that were omitted in Mr Lambard's collection. He also translated these Laws into English (43).

(42) He assisted in the publication of the 2d volume. Life, p. 88, 89.

(43) Life, p. 51, 52.

SOUTH [Dr ROBERT], a learned and witty Divine, was of a genteel extraction, being descended from the Souths of Kelstone and Kielby in Lincolnshire (a); but his father, Mr William South, settling in London, became an eminent merchant there, and marrying a gentlewoman of the name of Berry, descended from the Berrys in Kent [A], had this son, born at his house in Hackney, in the year 1633. He early discovered an extraordinary genius for letters, and having gone through the first rudiments of Grammar with uncommon success, was sent to Westminster-school, where he was entered King's scholar in 1647. And he made himself remarkable the following year, by reading the Latin prayers in the school, on the day of King Charles the First's martyrdom, and praying

(a) Sir Francis South was at the head of the family. Memoirs of the Life of R. b. South, &c. p. 4. edit. 1717, 8vo.

[A] Descended from the Berrys in Kent.] This family is celebrated for the production of many eminent men, among whom was Sir John Berry, Admiral in King Charles the Second's reign, who commanded the Gloucester man of war, wherein King James the Second, then Duke of York, very narrowly escaped a shipwreck (1). Our author had a picture of this gentleman, which by his last will he bequeaths to Dame Phœbe Hardres, of Kent, together with those of her grandfather and grandmother at large, as likewise a gold ring with her grandfather's arms, neatly engraven upon it. 'Things, he observes, very proper (if as friendly accepted as they are offered) to remember her worthy family and relations by (2).'

(1) Gen. Hist. of England.

(2) The second codicil of his Will, dated June 2, 1714, annexed to Memoirs of his Life, &c.

[B] Verses

(d) 1653.

(e) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1042. The famous John Locke was chosen at the same time.

(d) 30 l. a year.

(e) He was also Prebender of the church of Salisbury, and Vicar of Writtle in Essex. Ibid. p. 5.

(f) Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 105.

praying for his Majesty by name (b). After the famous Dr Busby had cultivated and improved so promising a genius with particular industry and encouragement for four years, he was chosen a student to Christ-Church-college in Oxford in 1651 (c); where having the advantage of a handsome allowance from his mother (d), and the countenance of his relation, Dr John South, of New-college, Regius-Professor of the Greek tongue (e): he obtained those acquisitions in literature, that made him the admiration and esteem of the whole university, and drew upon him the eyes of the best masters of humanity, and other studies, by the quick progress he made through them. He took his first degree in Arts, February 24, 1654-5 (f), having wrote an elegant copy of Latin verses, congratulating Cromwell, then Protector, upon the peace concluded that year with the Dutch [B]. In 1655, he wrote his famous Latin poem, intituled, Musica Incantans: sive Poema exprimens musicae vires, juvenum in insaniam abigentis, & musici inde periculum *. He commenced Master of Arts on the 12th of June, 1657, after performing all the preparatory exercises for it with the highest applause [C], and such a peculiar turn of wit and humour, as justly entituled him to represent the Terræ Filius, in which character he spoke the usual speech at the celebration of the Act the same year (g). In 1658, he entered into Holy Orders, being ordained by one of the deprived Bishops, according to the rights and ceremonies of the Church of England (b). He distinguished himself in the pulpit as much as he had done in the rostrum, and the following year he was pitched upon to preach the assize sermon before the Judges, in which he expressed such a warm zeal against the Independents, as highly pleased the Presbyterians; and Dr Edward Reynolds, who had been some years before Dean of Christ-Church, happening to be one of his auditors, did, in going

* It was then highly applauded for the beauty of the language and the quickness of its turns, and was printed, at Dr Fell's request, in 1657; but our author, in his dying day, regretted the publication of it, as a juvenile and trifling performance, Ibid. p. 19. Mr Wood mentions an edition in 1655. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1045.

(g) It is printed in his Opera Posthuma, &c. p. 21, & seq.

(b) Mr Wood thinks he preached some time without Orders.

[B] Verses upon the peace with the Dutch in 1654.] These stand at the head of his Opera Posthuma Latina, &c. printed in 1717, 8vo. which contain several other Latin compositions of his in verse, besides one in prose, all written while he was an undergraduate. Besides these, we have an account of another composition in the Athen. Oxon. where Mr Wood, whose temper and talents were naturally at variance with those of Mr South, having told us, that 'ne obtained under Dr Busby a considerable stock of grammar and philological learning, but more of impudence and sauciness, proceeds in the same strain, from the scandalous Chronicle, to retail the following story: That before or about the time that our Wit took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was appointed to do some exercise in the public hall of his college, which was to speak a speech upon some great and signal occasion; and that, when he had prepared it, and made it proportionable to the transcendency of his parts and abilities, he gave out to several of his acquaintance, that he intended severely to lash the sectaries of his House, and of the University. This being known abroad, there flocked into the hall, on the appointed day, a great concourse of the younger students, who were the greatest wits, but esteemed by the sectaries to be of the most profligate principles, both in that House and other Houses in the university. These last are the words of the Chronicle; after which the Antiquary goes on thus: In the resolution to satisfy all their expectations, our author, South, came forth, and addressed himself with a sufficient measure of confidence (whereof there was no want in him) to speak to this ingenious auditory; and, indeed, the whole scope of his oration was (if you will believe a rank Fanatic) (3), little other than a most blasphemous invective against godliness, and the most serious and conscientious professors of it. But before he had proceeded far in it, my author (says Wood) tells me, that the band of the Lord was stretched out against him, and he was suddenly surprized with such a qualm as did disturb him afterwards at Whitehall, as I shall tell you anon. Whereupon, being constrained abruptly to break off, it was so great a discomfort to him, that he was scarce able to bear it, because, first, that he esteemed himself a person of great fame in the university; and, secondly, that it would be a great disparagement to him among the wits of his acquaintance. However, this influence it had upon him, as it was observed by some persons then living in the university, that from that time he lay under some convictions of the evil of abusing those good parts which God had given him, in defaming those persons and things which the Lord doth testify his greatest approbation of (4); and so from henceforward he seemed to be much more serious than before, and by degrees insinuated himself into the good opinion of the then present Dean of his House, Dr Owen, as also with those of the Presbyterian and Independent party thereof (5). Thus far the Oxford Antiquary, who we see has taken care to draw up the story in such a manner as to leave a door open to escape from the shame of any charge that might be brought of his vouching for the truth of it. And the conclusion, that he was a favourite of the Dean, Dr Owen, needs no other voucher for its credibility than the merit of those ingenious exercises and other performances, especially the compliment in the verses to the Protector, wrote by our student as already mentioned. This Dean, however blame-worthy in other respects, being a remarkable great encourager of this kind of true merit, of which he was himself not only a good judge but an excellent performer.

[C] He took his degree of Master of Arts after having performed the exercises with great applause.] Notwithstanding what we have seen asserted by Mr. Wood in the preceding remark of our student's being in favour with Dr Owen, when he took his first degree, and is maintained by the writer of his life (6), that this second degree was not obtained without some opposition from the Dean, who having found that he frequented the meeting of those Royalists, among whom were Dr. John Fell, where Divine Service was performed, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, expostulated with him very severely, and even threatened to expel him, if he continued in that practice; telling him that he could do no less in gratitude to his Highness the Protector, and his other great friends, who had thought him worthy of the dignities, he then stood possessed of. To which says this writer, Mr South made this grave, but very smart reply. Gratitude among friends, is like credit among tradesmen, it keeps business up, and maintains the correspondence. And we pay not so much out of a principle, that we ought to discharge our debts, as to secure ourselves a place to be trusted another time. And in answer to the Dean's making use of the names of the Protector, &c. he said, Commonwealths put a value upon MEN as well as MONEY, and we are forced to take them both, not by WEIGHT, but according as they are pleased to STAMP them, and at the current rate of the coin; by which he exasperated the Doctor two different ways, and made him his enemy ever after. This story, it must be owned, smells as strong of partiality as that of the Fanatic does of prejudice, and is greatly discredited by the consequence which is annexed to it, that our student having proved an over-match for the Dean, in obtaining his degree of Master of Arts, made use of the power thereby conferred upon him, to oppose the Dean afterwards, when he stood candidate to serve in Parliament for the University (7). Whereas it has been already observed (8), he was chosen their Representative in 1654. What Mr Wood relates, has a better air of probability; that after the Protector's death, our student sided with the Presbyterians, so far as to condemn, and in a manner, to defy the Dean, who thereupon told him, he was one that sat in the seat of the scornful (9).

(6) P. 7, 8.

(7) Ibid. p. 8.

(8) In Dr Owen's article.

(9) Athen Oxon. ubi supra.

[D] Dr

3) The author of Mirabilis anas secundus: or, the second part of the second year's exercises, numb. 12. p. 34. edit. 1662, 4to.

4) Ibid.

c) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1042.

(i) It is intitled, 'The Scribe instructed,' from Math. xiii. 52. and is one of the best of his sermons.

going out of the church, salute the preacher, very kindly embraced him, and promised to do all that lay in his power for him [D]. But upon the dawn of his Majesty's restoration, in the latter end of the year, he preached with no less warmth against the hypocrisy of the Presbyterians; and, on the tenth of August, 1660, he was chosen publick Orator of the university [E], after he had preached a most excellent sermon (i), on the 29th of July preceding,

(D) Dr Reynolds promised to do all that lay in his power for him.] The text of this Sermon was, Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven; Matt. ch. x. v. 33. 'It was called by him Interest deposed, and Truth restored,' and had this remarkable paragraph in it concerning the Teachers of those days: 'Where such men talk of self-denial and humility, I cannot but think of Seneca, who praised poverty, and that very safely in the midst of his riches and splendid gardens, and even exhorted the world to throw away their gold, perhaps (as one well conjectures) that he might gather it: so these men desire men to be humble, that they may domineer without opposition. But it is an easy matter to commend patience, when there is no danger of any trials, to extol humility in the midst of honours, to begin a fast after dinner (10). In the same spirit he proceeds thus: 'Let Christ and Truth say what they will, if interest will have it, gain must be Godliness. If Enthusiasm is in request, learning must be inconsistent with grace. If pay grows short, the University-maintenance will be too great.' And, in the close of the same Sermon, having applied himself to the Judges with proper exhortations that bespoke his intrepidity of soul, he addressed himself to the audience in these words. 'If ever it was seasonable to preach courage in the despised abused cause of Christ, it is now; when his truths are reformed into nothing, when the hands and hearts of his faithful Ministers are weakened and even broke, and his worship extirpated into a mockery, that his honour may be advanced; well to establish our hearts in duty, let us propose to ourselves before hand the worst that can happen. Should God in his Judgment suffer England to be transformed into Munster; should the Faithful be every where massacred; should the places of learning be demolished, and our colleges reduced not only to (as one (11) in his zeal would have it) three, but to none: yet assuredly, Hell is worse than all this, and is the portion of such as deny Christ. Therefore let our discouragements be what they will, loss of places, loss of estates, loss of life and relations; yet still this sentence stands ratified in the decrees of Heaven.' Cursed be the man that for any of these denies the truth, and deserts his Lord. The compliment paid to the preacher by Dr Reynolds, will not be surprizing, after reading the following account of him by the Oxford Antiquary, who tells us, that he was the son of Austin Reynolds, one of the Customers of Southampton, where he was born in Nov. 1599, and being bred at the free-school there, became Post-master of Merton college in 1615, as also Probationer-Fellow in 1620, in which place (which he got by his skill in the Greek tongue,) as also throughout his Bachelorship, he shewed himself a good disputant and orator. After he had taken the degree of Master of Arts, he went into Orders, and became a noted Preacher, and was made Preacher at Lincoln's-Inn, and Rector of Braynton in Northamptonshire. After the Rebellion broke out in 1642, he sided with the Presbyterian party, and in 1643, was one of the Assembly of Divines, a Covenanter, a frequent Preacher in London, and sometimes before the long Parliament, by whom he was appointed, in 1646, one of the six Ministers to go to Oxford, and preach the scholars into obedience to them. After which he was one of their Visitors in the University, was made Dean of Christ-Church, in the room of Dr Samuel Fell, ejected, and Vice-Chancellor in 1648, when he was created Doctor of Divinity; he was also Vice-Chancellor in 1649. But being ejected from his Deanery in 1650, for refusing to take the Independent Engagement (12), he retired to his former cure for a time. He lived afterwards mostly in London, preached there, and flattered Oliver, &c. after whose death he did the like to Richard, and being then Vicar of St Laurence-Jewry, he was the Orator of the London Ministers, to welcome that mushroom Prince to the Throne, October 11, 1658. After this he struck in with General Monk, to bring in the King, using his interest thereto in London, where he was the pride and glory of the Presbyterian party (13). When the secluded Members were restored to Parliament, they restored him to his Deanery of Christ Church on the 11th of May 1659. And on the 26th of May following, 1660, he, together with Mr Edmund Calamy, was made Chaplain to his Majesty, then at Canterbury, in order to his Restoration. After which he preached several times before the King and both Houses of Parliament; and in the latter end of June, being desired to quit his Deanery (14), he was the next month elected, by virtue of the King's letter, Warden of Merton-College, and was consecrated Bishop of Norwich on the 6th of Jan. the same year (15). He was, concludes our Antiquary, a person of excellent parts and endowments, of a very good wit, fancy, and judgment, a great Divine, and much esteemed by all parties, for his preaching and fluid stile (16): and Sir Thomas Browne, who knew him well, gives him the character of a person of singular affability, meekness, and humility, of great learning, a frequent preacher, and constant resident (17). He wrote several things, which, after their appearance separately in 4to. were printed together, and published with the title of his works, London, 1658, fol. and again, with the addition of thirty Sermons, in 1679, fol. after his death, which happened July 28, 1676. He was buried at the upper end of the chapel which he built in 1662, joining to the Bishop's Palace in Norwich. Over his grave was soon after fixed to the wall, a marble table with his Epitaph engraven on it (18).

[E] He was made Orator to the University.] Mr Wood, who omits no opportunity of exercising his defamatory talents against our author, tells us, 'that he tugged hard, (so he expresses it) such was the high conceit of his worth, to be Canon of Christ-Church, as belonging to the Orator's office, but was kept back by the endeavours of the Dean *.' That this was a great discontent to him, and being not able to conceal it, he clamoured at it, and shewing much passion in his Sermons, 'till he could get preferment, they were therefore frequented by the generality, though shunned by some. This person, continues the Antiquary, though he was a junior master, and had never suffered for the royal cause, yet so great was his conceit, or so blinded he was with ambition, that he thought he should never be enough loaded with preferment; whilst others that had suffered much, and had been reduced to a bit of bread for his Majesty's cause, could get nothing (19), Hinc se. illæ lacrymæ. This was the great offence and grief, Mr South's promotion and favour with the Chancellor, drew upon both the unforgiving anger and resentment of the historian, and against both did he not spare to shoot some of his sharpest bluntly-pointed arrows, even noisy and scolding words. As that 'in the latter end of the year 1659, when it was visible that Monarchy would return upon the success of Monk, he was something at a stand, yet still was accounted a member of the Fanatic Ordinary; but when his Majesty's Restoration could not be withstood, then did he from the Pulpit exercise his gifts against the Presbyterians, as a little before he had done against the Independents, telling his auditory of their wry faces, ill looks, puling tones, &c. All which was to obtain the applause, (and it's consequences) of the prelatical and loyal party; but as it fell out, he missed his ends, for by his too much concernment and eagerness to trample upon them, the graver sort of the said party, would put their hats before their eyes, or turn aside, as being much ashamed at what the young man did utter. Not content with this, proceeds our retailer of scandal, he informed the leading men of the royalists (who were soon after restored to their places in the University) of the behaviour and manners of those that had been the prime men in the interval, and of such

(13) Dr Pierce, in the introduction to his 'Divine Purity defended,' says he was a person of great authority as well as fame among the Calvinists.

(14) For Dr George Morley. See his article.

(15) By virtue of which he became an Abbot (a strange preferment, methinks, says Wood, for a Presbyterian), I mean Abbot of St Bennet in the Holme, which he kept, with great regret to his quondam brethren, whom he then left to shift for themselves, to his dying day.

(16) Mr Wood also says, it was thought by his contemporaries, that he would never have been given to change, had it not been to please a covetous and politic consort, who was Mary, the daughter of Dr John Harding, some time President of Magdalen college, Oxford.

(17) Repertorium of the Cathedral of Norwich, in MS.

(18) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 568, 569, 570. where the epitaph may be seen.

* Whether this shaft is aimed more against the Dean or our Orator, is not easy to determine, since we find our Antiquary observing, that Dr Stredge being chosen Orator in 1629, was installed Canon of Christ-Church in 1638, before which time King Charles I. had settled a Canonry of the said church upon him that should be elected publick Orator; but that pious act hath been since annulled by pretended authority, and now such a thing seems totally to be forgotten among us. Ibid. col. 74.

(19) Ibid. col. 1043.

(10) This is levelled at Unton Croke, a Colonel of a regiment of Horse then at Oxford, who, with his party of Independents, kept a fast after dinner at his house in Grand-pool in the south suburb of the city. Ath. Oxon. col. 1043.

(11) Pointed at the same Colonel, who was the cause of Penruddock's death, and some time after High-Sheriff of Oxfordshire. Dr South's Life, &c. p. 12. note f.

(12) A piece intitled, 'The humble Proposals of sundry learned pious Divines within this kingdom, concerning the Engagement intended to be imposed on them for their subscriptions. London, 1650,' one sheet in 4to. published in December 1649, is ascribed to him by Mr Wood.

preceding, before the King's Commissioners, who were appointed to rectify all the abuses that had been committed in the university during the Usurpation. In the execution of the orator's office, he received, with an elegant Latin speech, the Earl of Clarendon, on his first entrance into the university, on the seventh of September 1661, after his Lordship had been chosen their Chancellor; and in another, introduced him to his investiture into that dignity in the Convocation-House, on the 9th of that month (l). Whereupon, the Chancellor took him into his protection, and made him his Domestic Chaplain [F]. Thus he was put into the road to Church preferments, and was installed Prebendary of Westminster, March 30, 1663 (n); and pursuant to his patron, the Chancellor's letter, was created Doctor of Divinity on the first of October following, though not without a considerable opposition, as being then a Master of Arts of six years standing only [G]. The Chancellor also gave him afterwards the sine-cure of Llanchiadar in Mochnant, in North Wales (o). After the Earls banishment, in 1667, the Doctor was appointed Chaplain to James Duke of York (p); and on the twenty-first of December 1670, he was collated by King Charles to a Canonry of Christ-church, in the room of Dr Richard Gardiner [H] deceased, into which he was installed on the twenty-ninth

(l) His Life, p. 16.

(n) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1045.

(o) Ibid. and his last Will, in rem. [S].

(p) Wood, as before.

of

* such that had kept and occupied the places of those Royalists, and left nothing undone to ingratiate himself with them.

[F] The Chancellor made him his Chaplain. Here his old friend has another sting at him; the Chancellor, says he, being much delighted with a sermon that his Chaplain had preached before him, made way for him to preach the same sermon again before his Majesty: and having passed the scrutiny of so wise and learned a man, and to great and famous a Counsellor, every one's expectation was heightened, and happy was he or she, amongst the greatest wits in the town, that could accommodate their humour, in getting convenient room in the chapel at Whitehall, to hang upon the lips of this, so great an oracle. The day appointed being come, which was the 13th of April 1662, for the acting of this scene over again, our author ascends the pulpit, and the eyes of all were immediately fastned upon him. After he had performed his obeysance to his Majesty, he named his text, which was, Eccl. vii. 10. Say not thou what is the cause that the former days were better then these? For thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this. Then after a witty preamble, he proceeded to the division of the words; and having performed that with great dexterity, he lays by the text for the present; and, according to the ancient and laudable manner, addressed himself to the Bid-Prayer; which being ended, he resumed his text, and attempted to handle the several parts of it. The prohibition in the text, he laboured to enforce by an induction of many particulars. The first was that the Pagan times were not better than these, then, the Popish times were not, &c. But the last insisted on was the times of the great Rebellion, and whilst he was endeavouring to evince that which indeed was the main thing that he intended to handle, it pleased God, as the Fanatic observed*, that he was suddenly taken with a qualm, drops of sweat standing on his face as big as pease, and immediately he lost the use of his speech, only he uttered some few words to this effect, Oh Lord! we are all in thy hands, be merciful unto us; and then came down. The expectations of all being thus sadly disappointed, they were contented with the divertisement of an anthem, and so the solemnity of the service for that day ended. In the mean time great care was taken of Mr South, and by the use of cordials, and other means proper for him in that condition, he quickly recovered his spirits, and was every way as well again as before. To all which, (continues our tale bearer) the Fanatic adds thus †. 'And we should be glad to hear he were more sensible of the hand of God upon him at that time, wherein it is to be feared, he sought his own honour more than Christ's, and therefore met with this rebuke from the Lord, which indeed, we should hope in charity, had some great influence upon him: for the next Lord's day after, he appeared again before the same splendid auditory, and, as we are informed, he did beforehand free his sermon from many of those luxuriances, which before it was attended with, brings it forth in a less whorish attire than he had cloathed it with the day before; and so, according to our best information, he went on and finished his discourse, without the least disturbance or interruption, &c (20)

VOL. VI. No. 314.

[G] He was opposed in his degree of Doctor of Divinity The opposition is taken notice of by the writer of his life (21), but without any such rhetorical strains as it is adorned with by Mr Wood, as follows: On the first day of October 1663, there was a Convocation of the university celebrated, and therein were the letters of his patron, Edward Earl of Clarendon, Chancellor of the said university, read in behalf of his Chaplain Mr South, to be created Doctor of Divinity; which being done, the Bachelors of Divinity and Masters of Arts were so amazed at such a matter, as first, that the said person should venture upon such a degree, being but six years standing in that of Master; secondly, that he should be so impudent to overtop a hundred of his seniors at least; and thirdly, that he had not at all suffered for his Majesty's cause, but rather, that he had preached against it, when he closed with the Independents, they all stiffly denied the passing of those letters, and were so resolute against their taking effect, that the House being in a tumult thereupon, the Doctors of Divinity, who were greatly consenting to the creation (for they were not to be overtopped) did arise from their seats, and went down and mixed themselves among the Masters, to persuade them to yield their consents; but all being done in vain, they went to scrutiny. Which being done, the senior Proctor, according to his usual perfidy, (which he frequently used in his office, for he was born and bred a Presbyterian) did pronounce him the said Mr South virtute juramenti sui, passed by the major part of the House. Whereupon, by the double presentation of Dr John Wallis, he was first admitted Bachelor then Doctor of Divinity (22).

[H] Richard Gardiner This gentleman, who was born in Hereford, and bred at the school there, became student of Christ church about 1607, took the degrees in Arts, entered into Holy Orders, and became a quaint preacher and orator. At length, King James the First being much pleased with a speech that he had spoken before him in the Scotch tone, when he was Deputy Orator, gave him the reversion of the next Canon of Christ-church; into which, upon the death of Dr Thomas Thornton, he was installed in 1629 (23); and, taking his degrees in Divinity the following year, he was made one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to King Charles the First. In 1648, he was thrust out of his Canonry by the Parliamentary visitors, and lived obscurely in Oxford twelve years, 'till the return of King Charles the Second, who restored him to what he had lost. And whatsoever he got from that time to the day of his death, he bestowed on charitable uses, his kindred, and the college which gave him breeding. He published several sermons (24), which are mentioned by Mr Wood; as also a piece intituled Specimen Oratorium, printed at London in 1653, in two sheets 8vo containing, 1. A Letter from the University to King James the First, to thank him for his Works presented to the public Library. 2. Oration in the Convocation when his Majesty's Works were received. 3. Funeral Oration on Dr Budden, 1620. 4. Oration on presenting the Dean of Chichester to be Prolocutor to the Lower House of Convocation, November 11, 1640. 5. Gratulation for the King's safe return from the battle of Edge hill, October 29, 1642. This little book was printed again in 1657, and in 1662, in small 8vo. with the additions

(21) P. 16.

(22) Ibid. col. 1045.

(23) The same year that Dr Strode was chosen publick Orator.

(24) Particularly a volume containing sixteen, preached in Oxford and at Court, printed at London in 1659, 8vo. Ath. Oxon. col. 480.

(l) Both these speeches are printed inter Opera sua Posthumia, p. 68, & sequ. and are followed by another, spoken on the 7th of November following, on the reception of Lawrence Hyde, Henage Finch, J. Berkenhead, and Aegio Strangeways, sent to thank the University, in the name of the Parliament, for their loyalty to the royal cause during the Rebellion.

* In lib. in tit. Mirabilis annus secundus, p. 33.

† Ibid. p. 34.

(20) Ath. Oxon. col. 1044.

(q) So he says in his account of Poland, p. 27. printed in the Memoirs of his Life.

(r) Ibid. p. 106.

of the same month. In 1676, he attended Laurence Hyde, Esq; younger son of the Earl of Clarendon, in the quality of Chaplain, on his embassy to Poland. The Doctor very gladly accepted this offer, which gave him an opportunity of gratifying his naturally curious and inquisitive temper. In order to complete which, he staid behind the Ambassador at his own request (q); and what improvements he made thereby may be best seen in the account of that country, which he sent in a letter from Dantzic, December 16, 1677, to Dr Edward Poccocke [I], then Regius Professor of Hebrew, and one of the Canons of Christ-church, with whom he held a most intimate friendship. Soon after the Doctor's return home, he was presented by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, upon the death of Dr Edward Hinton, in 1678, to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, a living of considerable revenues, out of which he allowed a hundred pounds per annum to the Reverend Mr Penny, a student of Christ-church, his Curate; and expended the rest in educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the parish (r). Moreover, after he had been two years incumbent, in 1680, he caused the chancel of the church, that had been suffered to run to ruin by his predecessor, to be rebuilt at his own expence [K]; and finding of, 1. Art. Bac. ex Æd. Ch. Oxon. Progymnasmata. 2. Epistola nonnullæ à cumulo excerptæ nomine subdecani inscriptæ. 3. Orationes & Epistolæ, &c. The whole was printed again at Oxon. 1668, 1675, &c. He died, and was buried in one of the isles joining to the choir of Christ-church cathedral, on the north side, after his death, which happened December 20, 1670, aged 79, as appears from his epitaph, which was written by Dr South, at the request of his executors, in these terms:

H. S. I.
 Venerabilis Vir,
 Ricardus Gardiner, S. T. P.
 Ecclesiæ hujus primus alumnus.
 Dein Canonicus.
 Quo in munere
 Cum diu se magna cum laude exercuit,
 Majore eodem cessit:
 Fanaticorum furoribus fortunis omnibus exutus,
 Ut fidem, quam Deo & Principi obligaverat,
 Illibatam retineret.
 Postliminio haud tandem restitutus
 Eadem constantia qua ereptas spreverat opes,
 Contemnebat affluentes,
 Munificentia siquidem perenni,
 Et aquæductus quem hic loci struxerat æmula,
 Ecclesiam hanc,
 Patriam suam Herefordiam,
 Cognatos,
 Amicos,
 Pauperes,
 Cumulatissime perfudit.
 Demum
 Meritis juxta & annis plenus,
 Viridi senecta, sensibus integris,
 Piam animam Deo reddidit.
 Decemb. 20.
 Anno salutis 1670.
 Ætatis suæ 79.

[I] In a letter to Dr Poccocke. He had promised to send this account to the Doctor when they parted at Cornbury, the Earl of Carendon's seat in Oxfordshire. He begins with an account that the Ambassador set sail from Portsmouth on board the Tyger man of war, with the Swallow in company, and some merchant-ships under convoy, on the eleventh of June preceding, and after staying some days in the Sound to dispatch messages with compliments to the Courts of Sweden and Denmark, cast anchor before Dantzic on the eleventh of August, where being received under the discharge of the artillery on the ramparts, he was the next day conducted to an audience of the Queen of Poland, (who made a journey thither while the King, her husband, was in the field) wherein he paid her Majesty the usual devoirs in the name of his royal master, and presented the young Princess, her daughter, with a very rich jewel, and a cross of diamonds of great value. He afterwards, with a very magnificent retinue, set forward from Poland, and was received by the King, in his camp, near Leopold in Russia, with demonstrations of respect and kindness suitable to his character and person, where his Majesty did him the honour of sending some of his chief officers to shew him the army and their way of encamping. The peace being happily concluded to the advantage of Poland, between his Majesty and the Turks and Tartans, whereof his Excellency Mr Hyde had no small share in the management; the King returned in November to Zolkiew, his own patrimony, which is a town in Russia, adorned and defended by a castle, and intermixed with several delightful gardens, with a fair church in the middle of it, built with various kinds of marble, and where the Ambassador, waiting upon him, had his public audience in the most solemn manner. He was first carried in the King's coach, attended by six of his own, twenty-four pages and footmen in rich liveries, and sixty odd coaches of the chief nobility. When arrived at the Court, he was received by the Chief Marshal (who is in the nature of a Lord Chamberlain) at the stairs-foot of the palace, and conducted to his Majesty, who received him standing under a canopy. When his Excellency delivered his master's compliments in a Latin speech*, in which he gave assurances of his master's inviolable attachment to that Prince's interests, congratulated him upon the last treaty of peace, brought to a happy conclusion with the Infidels, and made overtures to enter into such alliances with the Crown and Republic of Poland as should be judged most conducive to the honour and safety of both nations. To this his Polish Majesty gave a very agreeable and satisfactory answer in the same language, which he had readily ad unguem (25); and caused the Ambassador afterwards to sit down at the same table with him, where he was attended by the chief officers of State standing, it being a custom in Poland to admit none to that honour but the Princes of the Blood. Our author then describes the person, dress, and accomplishments both of the King and Queen. After which he proceeds with a description of such towns and principal cities as his curiosity led him to visit; these are, Cracow, Vilne (26), Posen, Guesna, Lowitz, Warsaw, Thorn, Marienburgh, and Dantzic; which done, he concludes with an account of the religion, customs, and manners of the Poles; but this last part he acknowledges is taken mostly from Mr Hauteville. He closes the whole with a compliment to Dr Poccocke, whom he now again calls, as he had done at the head of his letter, his best friend and most honoured instructor, wishing to return to Christ-church, in the view of being restored to the happiness of this friend's conversation, than which nothing could be more improving or desired by him (27). Thus, confirming what we have already observed (28) from Mr Locke, upon Dr Poccocke's most improving conversation.

[K] To be rebuilt at his own expence. This appears from the following inscription over the entrance into the chancel:

ROBERTUS SOUTH, S. T. P.
 In Ecclesiam hanc Parochialem
 Inductus anno 1678,
 Propriis sumptibus hanc
 Cancellariam a fundamentis
 Instauravit, extruxitque, anno Domini 1680.

[L] Is

* The speech was written in English by Mr Hyde, and turned into elegant Latin by Dr South. Life, p. 23.

(25) He observes, that, to speak good Latin, is their chief study in the university, which came into vogue from an interview that King Casimir II. had with the King of Sweden, when the latter, with all his Court, spoke the language fluently, which King Casimir, nor his attendants, not being able to do, he was so much ashamed, that he gave great encouragement to that study. Life, p. 34.

(26) These are their two universities, and may be called sisters, he says, from their affinity in ignorance. Ibid. p. 33.

(27) Life of Dr South, p. 21 to 106. inclusive.

(28) Under his article.

finding the mansion-house belonging to the Rector much too mean for the largeness of the stipend, he caused the shattered remains to be totally pulled down, and an edifice erected in a more convenient part of the town, having purchased the scite, with a handsome garden, as a perpetual mansion for himself and successors; so that, it might then, and may still, vie with most parsonage-houses in England [L]. In 1681, the Doctor, who was then one of his Majesty's Chaplains in Ordinary, being in waiting, preached before the King upon these words, The Lot is cast into the Lap, but the disposing of it is of the Lord. Wherein, having spoken of the various changes and dispensations of Providence, and the unaccountable accidents and particulars of life, he introduced three examples of unexpected advancements in the following manner: 'Who, says he, that had looked upon Agathocles first handling the clay, and making pots under his father, and afterwards turning robber, could have thought that from such a condition, he should come to be King of Sicily? Who that had seen Mafinello, a poor fisherman, with his red cap and his angle, would have reckoned it possible to see such a pitiful thing, within a week after, shining in his cloth of gold, and with a word or a nod absolutely commanding the whole city of Naples.—And who, that beheld such a bankrupt beggarly fellow as Cromwell first entering the Parliament-House with a thread bare torn cloak, and greasy hat, perhaps neither of them paid for, could have suspected, that in the space of so few years he should, by the murder of one King and the banishment of another, ascend the throne? At which the King fell into a violent fit of laughter, and turning to Lord Rochester said, Ods, fish, Lory, your Chaplain must be a Bishop, therefore put me in mind of him at the next vacancy (s).' During the remainder of King Charles the Second's reign, the Doctor continued a strenuous assertor of the prerogative against all attempts that were made towards its diminution; and, by the interest of his patron, who on his return from his embassy, was raised to the peerage (t), in conjunction with his own merits, had several offers of advancement into the Hierarchy, but he modestly declined these, as having wherewithal to support himself according to the dignities he stood possessed of in the Church, and the distribution of charities he had already settled and intended to lay schemes for; in order to which, he made some purchases about this time of houses upon Ludgate-hill and Token-house-yard. On the accession of King James the Second to the Throne, his patron's brother, the Earl of Clarendon, going Lord-Lieutenant to Ireland, made him an offer of an Archbishopric of that kingdom, but he continued fixed in his resolves of living privately (u), which these two noble Peers were forced to do soon after, by their dismissal from Court [M]. After the quelling of

(t) Ibid. p. 108.

(r) See his article.

(u) Ibid. p. 109, 110.

[L] It may vie with most parsonage houses in England] Dr White Kennet, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, in his Parochial Antiquities gives a view of it, in a plate inscribed to Dr South, whose coat of arms is engraved over it, in these terms: Viro reverendo Roberto South, S. T. P. Rectori ecclesie de Islip, tabulam hanc, quæ amplum & elegantem, Rectorie Manum, suis impensis constructam representat, D. D. White Kennet. Nos admiremur, imitentur posteris. The writer of his life (29) suggests, that the Rector was the more readily induced to this act of generosity by the honour done to the village in the birth of King Edward the Confessor, which is declared by that King, in his charter or grant of the village and other lands thereto adjacent to St Peter's church in Westminster.

[M] The two Peers were dismissed from Court.] We have already related the occasion of this dismissal in the course of this work (30), where we have also given an account of the Earl of Rochester's dispute introductory to it, in defence of his religion, from Bishop Burnet, as the best authority that occurred at that time. But as that Prelate makes no mention of Dr South, and besides, is not so full as the writer of Dr South's Memoirs, whose account is likewise different in some particulars from that of his Lordship, we shall lay it before the reader as follows: That unhappy Prince [King James] being fully bent upon a general toleration of all Christian dissenters from the Church established, and pushed forward, upon extremities, to obtain liberty for the exercise of the Romish religion, by taking off the Test and Penal laws, took upon him to closet the chief men about him, and either to bring them over to his will by persuasion or threats. Among others, the Earl of Rochester, who was his Majesty's brother-in-law, and therefore very dear to him, was examined concerning his opinion and sentiments, relating to the King's will and pleasure, to which his Majesty was fully bent to have obedience paid by all about him, on pain of removal. Hereupon, the good Earl, after having, like a faithful Counsellor, pointed out the fatal consequences of his Majesty's impolitic resolves, and begged him to desist from an enterprize that would be found impracticable; very submissively and prudently made answer, that he had been bred up in the principles of a religion that taught him that obedience to his Prince which he had never failed in, and that his duty to God, who was the King of Kings, obliged him to continue in the practice of them. However, if his Majesty should be so pleased (so certain was he of the truth of the doctrines he had received from the primitive Church) he was willing to abide by the result of a dispute between two Church of England Divines and two of the Church of Rome, being not fearful of venturing to say, that to which side soever the victory should incline, his Lordship would from that time abide by that which conquered. Hereunto the King very readily agreed, and immediately nominated the Fathers Giffard and Tilden for his two champions, and appointed the rule of Faith to be the subject matter of the controversy. The persons at first proposed by the Earl were, Dr Jane and Dr South, but the latter was so unacceptable to his Majesty, by the bitter invectives he was said to make use of in the pulpit against the Papists and Presbyterians, who then joined in their endeavours for liberty of conscience, that he told his Lordship he could not agree to the choice of Dr South, who instead of arguments would bring railing accusations, and had not temper of mind enough to go through a dispute that required the greatest attention and calmness. Hereupon the Earl chose Dr Patrick, then Dean of Peterborough, and Minister of St Paul's Covent-garden, a very able Divine, in his room, but he would needs have the assistance of Dr South in a consultation held the night before the conference was to commence, wherein were such irrefragable arguments drawn up by him on the subject they were to discourse, as totally obtained a conquest over their two opponents, and made the King dismiss his two pretended advocates with this rebuke, that he could say more in behalf of his religion than they could; and that he never heard a good cause managed so ill, nor a bad one so well. So that, concludes this writer, if Dr South could not be said to be in the battle, he was a very great instrument of obtaining the victory; and Dr Jane has often owned (though a most excellent casuist himself) that the auxiliary arguments contributed by Dr South did more

(29) P. 107.

(30) In the articles of the two Earls of Clarendon and Rochester, father and son, rem. [H B] in the first, and [C] in the latter.

of Monmouth's rebellion, toward the suppression of which, the Doctor openly professed, that if there should be occasion he would change his black gown for a buff coat, the residue of King James's reign being taken up in acts of bigotry and violence gives us no particulars further of our Divine, than that he spent the greatest part of his time at Islip and Oxford, going sometimes to his paternal estate at Caversham in Oxfordshire, near Reading, where he was busied in preparing for the press most of those extraordinary sermons which have since seen the light, and exercised himself in devotions to deprecate the judgments that seemed to hang over the national Church. But as he had imbibed the most generally received opinion of Passive Obedience, so he made that principle the rule of his conduct; and when the invitation to the Prince of Orange to come over and rescue our laws and liberties, signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and other Bishops, was offered to him, he refused it, saying, 'his religion had taught him to bear all things, and howsoever it should please God that he should suffer, he would, by the divine assistance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and unadvised counsels wherewith he was entangled (w).' In the same principle, after the arrival of the Prince of Orange, the Doctor refused to subscribe the Association paper, signed by the Vice-Chancellor and several Heads of Colleges in Oxford, to stand by that Prince [N]. However, after the Revolution was brought about, the Doctor complied with the necessity of the times, and took the oaths to the new government (x). Yet, when offers were made him by some great men at the helm, who had then the benefit of the royal ear, to procure him one of the sees vacated by the Nonjuring Bishops in 1692, he excused himself on this account: 'That notwithstanding he, for his part, saw nothing that was contrary to the laws of God, and the common practice of all nations, to submit to Princes in possession of the Throne, yet others might have their reasons for a contrary opinion; and he blessed God, that he was neither so ambitious nor in want of preferment, as for the sake of it, to build his rise upon the ruins of any one Father of the Church, who for piety, good morals, and strictness of life, which every one of the deprived Bishops were famed for, might be said not to have left their equal (y) [O].'

The same turn of mind disposed the Doctor to dislike the Act of Toleration, nor did he well relish some proceedings at Court, whereby he suspected (how justly it is not our business here to determine) some persons to be countenanced and in great power, who were enemies to the Church established. He laid hold of all occasions to decry their measures and baffle their designs. And as he had vigorously exerted himself with the Commissioners appointed by the King in 1689, for an union with dissenting Protestants, in behalf of the Church Liturgy and forms of prayer, and entreated them by no means to part with any of it's ceremonies that might have endangered the loss of the whole: so he scarce ever preached, but he set before his auditors the mischiefs that would arise by admitting such vipers, as he called them, into the revenues of the Church, that would eat their way through their-adopted, not natural, mother's bowels. In 1693, our learned Divine took up his pen in defence of the Orthodox doctrine, upon that prime article of the Christian Faith, the Trinity, against the misrepresentations of it, by Dr William Sherlock

(w) P. 114.

(x) Bishop Burnet says, he took the oaths with the reserve of an equivocal sense, which he put upon them. Hist. of his own Time, Vol. III. p. 295. 8vo. edition. The Right Reverend Historian has not thought proper to tell us where this equivocation lay, so that all that can be fairly inferred from his censure is, that our author did not take the oaths upon the same principles with his Lordship, that is, upon King William's right of conquest.

(y) Life, p. 115.

(31) Ibid. p. 110, 111, 112.

(32) In p. 373.

(33) P. 373.

more towards flinging their antagonists on their backs than either his or his colleagues (31).

[N] He refused to subscribe the Association, &c.] This has been already observed from the MS. of Dr Smith (32), from whom we have likewise the following particular concerning our author's antagonist, Dr William Sherlock's conduct at the same time. The London clergy, by concert with the Bishop of London, desired him, in their name, to thank the Prince of Orange for the hazard he had run in this expedition, and for his care in protecting our religion; but withal to desire him to have a tender regard for the King. But the Bishop not delivering this in such terms as they expected, they took great offence at it. Dr Sherlock, saying that he and the rest of them would ever maintain the loyal principles of the Church of England, and that if the Bishop of London forsook that, they would forsake him. Thus we see these two divines, however furiously they buffeted one another afterwards, upon the important religious point of the Trinity, were about this time under the influence of the same principles of State, and these principles were found, at last, to be made of the like bending metal in both, upon the interesting point of the Revolution; very contrary to those of the aforementioned Dr Thomas Smith, who we have seen was stiffly resolved to follow King James's fortunes into France, had not the Lord Preton told him he might do his Majesty more service here (33). Whereupon he tells us, that he set himself to consider upon what methods he should enter, to do that little service he was able: And the convention being opened, he went every day to Westminster, to persuade several noblemen and gentlemen, with whom he had the honour to be acquainted, to use their utmost endeavours to hinder the cursed (as he calls it) abdication, which was then visibly designed and addressed to them, in order to the inviting of the King back to England, from whence he had been driven away. 'For my active behaviour, continues he, herein, and my loyal zeal on many rencounters in the Court of Requests, I was taken notice of, and threatened to be complained of and punished. Besides the warm contests I had with several Bishops, and others of the Clergy, who, partly through mistaken principles, partly through fear of losing their preferments in the Church, were now giving up themselves into the hands of the Prince of Orange, in order (as some of them idly and foolishly talked) to the better securing the Church of England from Popery, and maintaining the Protestant interest in Holland, and the other countries beyond sea.'

[O] The deprived Bishops had not their equals.] In the same spirit, Dr. Beveridge, as is well known, refused the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, while Dr Ken was living; and we are told that Dr Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York, declined to accept of any of these bishopricks, out of a particular friendship and esteem for the persons deprived (34). This brings to mind the characters given of them by the author of the history of Faction. These, says that author, speaking of the deprived Bishops, were the meek, pious, and learned Dr Sanerost, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; the seraphic Dr Kenn, Bishop of Bath and Wells; the evangelical Dr Turner, Bishop of Ely; the vigilant Dr Lake, Bishop of Chichester; the resolute and undaunted Dr White, Bishop of Peterborough; the unchangeable Dr Lloyd, Bishop of Norwich; and the irreproachable Dr Frampton, Bishop of Gloucester.

[P] With

(34) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 253. edit. 1753.

Sherlock. The controversy spread itself far and wide, and being carried on by both parties with too much heat and acrimony [P], was at length determined, by the royal authority, entirely to the satisfaction of Dr South, who finding his conduct in it unreasonably impeached afterwards by Dr Stillingfleet, took an occasion in publishing the third volume of his sermons in 1698, to lance some fleches of his wit against that learned Prelate [Q]. Much about this time the Doctor's unwearied application to his studies brought [P] With too much heat and acrimony] 'Tis worth while to hear Bishop Burnet upon this occasion. ' Dr S— (says his lordship) a learned, but ill-natured Divine, —attacked Sherlock's book on the Trinity, not without wit and learning, but without any measure of Christian charity, and without any regard either to the dignity of the subject, or the decency of his profession. He explained the Trinity in the common method, that it was one essence in three Subsistencies. Sherlock replied, and charged this with Sabellianism; some others went into the dispute with some learning, but with more heat. The Socinians divided them into real and nominal Trinitarians. Sherlock they put into the first class; as for the second class, they pretended it had been the doctrine of the western Church, ever since the time that the fourth council in the Lateran sat (35). The Bishop has undeniably here spoken the general sense of the nation at this time, though very unwillingly intimated in respect to our author's superiority in explaining the subject of the dispute. As to the indignity and indecency of his management of it, they are confessedly inexcusable, unless the inexpugnable confidence of his antagonist, added to his own ardent zeal for the established doctrine of the Church of England, may be taken for an excuse; in defending which 'tis remarkable that, his good sense and great learning are constantly made the dupe of his boundless inexhaustible wit; of which the following in his second piece against Dr Sherlock, is one conspicuous instance. ' The soul of Socrates, says he, vitally joined with a female body, would certainly make a woman; and yet, according to this author's principle, (affirming that it is the soul only which makes the person) Socrates with such a change of body, would continue the same person, and consequently be the same Socrates still. And in like manner for Xantippe, the conjunction of her soul with another sex, would certainly make the whole compound a man, and nevertheless Xantippe would continue the same person, and the same Xantippe still; save only, I confess, that upon such exchange of bodies with her husband Socrates, she would have more right to wear the breeches, than she had before (36). The sarcasm is a confirmation of Burnet's remark of our author's ill-nature, as it plainly alludes to the common bruit concerning his antagonist, which represents him as being a little unhappy in this respect with his consort. During the heat of this controversy, out comes a piece, intitled, Archæologia, &c. written by Dr Burnet, master of the Charter-house, impugning the divine authority of the old Testament. Whereupon all the three divines received a not improper chastisement in the following very humorous ballad, to the tune of a soldier and a sailor, &c.

A Dean and Prebendary

Had once a new vagary;
And were at doubtful strife, Sir
Who led the better life, Sir;
And was the better man,
And was the better man.

The Dean he said that truly,
Since Bluff was so unruly,
He'd prove it to his face, Sir,
That he had the most grace, Sir:
And so the fight began, &c.

When Preb. replied like thunder,
And roar'd out, 'twas no wonder,
Since gods the Dean had three, Sir,
And more by two than he, Sir;
For he had got but one, &c.

VOL. VI. No. CCCXV.

Now while these two were raging,
And in dispute engaging,
The master of the CHARTER,
Said both had caught a Tartar,
For gods, Sir, there was none, &c.

That all the books of Moses,
Were nothing but supposes:
That he deserv'd rebuke, Sir,
Who wrote the Pentateuch, Sir,
'Twas nothing but a sham, &c.

That as for father Adam,
With Mrs Eve his madam,
And what the Serpent spoke Sir,
'Twas nothing but a joke, Sir,
And well invented sham, &c.

Thus in this battle royal,
As none would take denial,
The dame for which they strove, Sir,
Could neither of them love, Sir,
Since all had given offence, &c.

She therefore slyly waiting,
Left all three fools a prating:
And being in a fright, Sir,
Religion took her flight, Sir,
And ne'er was heard of since.
And ne'er was heard of since.

Whether this ballad is worded with that decency that the subject of the dispute, or the very eminent and learned persons concerned in it, deserve, we shall not determine. But the reception it met with, being translated into several languages, particularly Latin, by a curious hand, at the University of Cambridge, and the presents sent the author by the nobility and gentry, made it evident, that their sentiments were against having the mysteries of our Holy Religion discussed and canvassed after so ludicrous a manner.

[Q] He exercised his wit against Bishop Stillingfleet.] This Prelate in the preface to his Vindication of the Trinity, quotes the following sentence against the treatment given each other by our antagonist. Oderit Rixas & jurgia præsertimque inter Eruditos, ac Turpe esse dicebat viros indubitate doctos canina rabie famam Vicissim suam rodere ac lacerare scriptis trucibus tanquam vilissimos de Plebe Cerdones in Angipartis sese, luto & stercore conspurcantes *. He ever hated broils and opprobrious language, especially among the learned, and said it was a very odious and unseemly thing for men, who were undoubtedly renowned for knowledge and understanding, to insult and tear to pieces each others reputations in their inhumane writings, with a canine fury, not unfitly compared to cobblers sprung from the vilest dregs of the people, bespattering each other in lanes and narrow passages with dirt and dung. This Dr South took to be levelled at him in behalf of Dr Sherlock, whom he called not only the aggressor but the transgressor too. Therefore, notwithstanding his great deference for his Lordship's unquestionable merit in polemical and casuistical Divinity, joined to his obedience to the royal mandate and the Episcopal order, held his hands from entering the lists with him in a controversial way; yet he could not restrain himself from having a sling at them both in the dedication mentioned above to Narcissus Boyle, Archbishop of Dublin; where among other remarkable passages are to be found these, ' Surely, says he, it would be a very odd way of ridding a man of the plague by running him through with a sword; or of curing him of a lethargy by casting him into a calenture, a disease

* Vie Rigal's
Vita P. Putciani,
p. 48.

(35) Burnet's
Hist. of his own
Time, Vol III.
p. 295. 8vo. edit.

(36) Tritheim, charged upon Dr
Sherlock, &c. p.
129.

brought upon him the bloody-flux, which was followed by the strangury, that excepting some transitory releases, scarce left him to his last moments. Yet notwithstanding these pains, he still kept the sprightliness and vivacity of his temper with the few friends he conversed, which were always well chosen. During the greatest part of the reign of Queen Anne, he was in a state of inactivity, and the infirmities of old age growing fast upon him, he performed very little of the duties of the ministerial function, otherwise than when his health would allow of his attending the divine service at Westminster Abbey; though he would take a journey to his seat near Reading, having always two chairmen attending his coach to take him out when he was uneasy, through his indisposition before-mentioned, and carry him in the chair. Notwithstanding his ill state of health, he continued his wonted recourse to books, and the improvement of his mind almost to the day of his death; and it was with great difficulty that his Surgeon, who had the cure of a fore leg under hand, prevailed on him not to creep into his study too often; which yet he could not refrain. Yet, notwithstanding all these impediments to activity and motion, none shewed a greater concern for the Church, when he judged it to be in danger. In this spirit he was unwearied in his application to many of the Lords spiritual and temporal, to be mild and gentle in their sentence against Dr Sacheverell, who was highly indebted to him for a very successful advocate. Upon the change of the ministry, in 1710, the Doctor was again solicited and courted (z) to accept of some higher dignities of the Church, and particularly to succeed Dr Sprat in the Bishopric of Rochester and Deanery of Westminster in 1713, but he returned for answer, 'That such a chair would be too uneasy for an old infirm man to sit in, and he held himself much better satisfied with living upon the eves-droppings of the Church (a a) than to fare sumptuously, by being placed at the pinnacle of it.' In the same humour, upon the promotion of Dr Atterbury, to those most desirable dignities, being asked by a gentleman concerning the state of his health. 'Within an inch of the grave, no doubt, says he, since I have lived to see a gentleman, who was born the very year in which I was made one of the Prebendaries of this church, appointed to be Dean of it [R].' On the death of the Queen, telling a particular friend, who usually visited him once or twice a week, 'that it was time for him to prepare for his journey to a blessed immortality; since all that was good and gracious, and the very breath of his nostrils, had made it's departure to the regions of bliss and eternal happiness.' Accordingly, he began thenceforward to set his house in order, and to provide for the further good of posterity, as appears by the benefactions in his last Will [S]. In 1715, he published a fourth volume of sermons, which

(z) Apparently by Mr Bromley.

(a a) Alluding to his Prebendal house, that was adjoining to the abbey.

'of a contrary nature indeed, but no less fatal to the patient, who equally dies, whether his sickness or his physic, the malignity of his distemper, or the method of his cure dispatches him. And in like manner must it fare with a Church, which feeling itself infected with the poison of Socinianism, flies to Tritheism for an antidote. But at length steps in the royal authority to the Church's relief, with several wholesome injunctions in it's hands, for the composing, healing, and ending the disputes about the Trinity then on foot, and these indeed so wisely framed, so seasonably timed, and by the King at least so graciously intended, that they must in all likelihood, without any other Ireuicon (37), have restored peace to the Church had it not been for the importunity and impartiality of some, who having by the awe of these injunctions endeavoured to silence the opposite party, which by their arguments they could not do, and withal looking upon themselves as privileged persons, and so above these ordinances, which others were to be subject to, resolved not to be silent themselves: but renewing the contest, partly by throwing Muggleton and Rigaltius, with some other full stuff in their adversaries faces; and partly by a shameful reprinting (without the least reinforcing) the same tritheistic notions again and again, they quite broke through the royal prohibitions, and soon after began to take as great a liberty in venting their innovations and invectives, as ever they had done before: so that he who shall impartially consider the course taken by these men, in reference to those who are engaged on the other side of the controversy, about the Trinity, will find, that their whole proceeding in it, resembles nothing so much as a thief's binding the hands of an honest man with a cord much fitter for his own neck. But blessed be God, matters stand not so with you in Ireland, the climate there being not more impatient of poisonous animals, than the Church of poisonous opinions, an universal concurrent orthodoxy shining all over it, from the superior Clergy who preside, to the inferior placed under them, so that we never hear from thence of any Presbyter, much less of any Dean, who dares innovate upon the faith received, and least of all (should

(37) Alluding to Dr Stillingfleet's book, under that title.

'such a wretch chance to start up among you) can I hear of any Bishop likely to debauch his style and character so low, as either to defend the man, or colour over his opinions. Nor lastly, do we find that in the judgment of the Clergy there, a man's having wrote against one sort of heresy, or heterodoxy, ought to justify or excuse him in writing for another, and much less for it worse.'

[R] Appointed to be Dean of it.] This answer gave occasion to several persons that were not acquainted with the Doctor's way of talk, to suggest that he took the gift of this preferment away from him in disgust. But the truth is on the contrary side; for he had a great esteem for the new Dean's parts and person, received visits from him to his dying day; and made it one amongst his other requests, that at his burial my Lord of Rochester might perform the last office (38).

[S] The benefactions by his last Will.] This bears date March 30, 1714, and was drawn up by himself. Thereby the Doctor, besides his church preferments, appears to have been possessed of several good temporal estates, hereditary and acquired, which he disposes of in the following manner. In the first place, he bequeaths his estate of inheritance, rented at 75 l. per annum, in the Hamlets of Whitley, in the parish of St Giles, Reading, in Berkshire, to Robert South, his nephew by half blood, charged with the payment of 900 l. to his three nieces the said Robert's sisters, and 400 l. to two of the daughters of his sister Joan Hall, deceased. After which he bequeaths to Mrs Margaret Hammond, his house-keeper, relict of Mr Edward Hammond, Clerk, all the residue of his lease of his messuages and tenements in or near Holyday-yard in London, held for a term of years from the Chapter of St Paul's; though, says he, I could, and do most heartily, wish, that at, or before her death, she would give and settle the same to some charitable use for ever: and this to the great honour of Almighty God, the benefit of the publick, to my own great satisfaction, the good of her own soul, and the just reputation of us to all posterity. He also bequeaths to the same Mrs Hammond one estate in the parish of Caversham in Oxfordshire, and another in the manner of Cantlers or Cantlow, in Kentish town in Middlesex, during her which he inscribed to Mr Bromley, as a testimony of his high esteem, and sincere affection to that friend, though at that time in disgrace at Court; and in the same steady zeal to his first connections, he proceeded to shew his regard to the family of the Duke of Ormond, (who had unhappily forfeited his title by a bill of attainder in Parliament) in causing himself to be brought in a chair to the election of a new High-Steward of Westminster, vacant upon the forfeiture of his Grace. The candidates were the Duke of Newcastle and the Earl of Arran, the late Duke's only brother, who had lost his election, had not Dr South, though in a manner bed-ridden, made the voices of the Prebendaries equal, by saying very briskly, when he was asked whom he would vote for, her life, and after her death he gives them both to the Chapter of Christ Church, in Oxon. for ever, in trust, that out of the clear profits, they shall pay to and among the following Vicars, Curates, and Incumbents, for the time being, ten pounds a piece yearly for ever, free from all deductions of taxes, or any other duties, chargeable upon the said premises, to be paid half yearly, viz. the Vicar of Southstoke cum Capellis, and the Vicar of little Compton, the Curate of Drayton, the Curate of Stratton Audley, and the Vicar or Curate of Dorchester, all in Oxfordshire. To the Vicars of East Garfden and of Ardington, both in Berkshire. The Curates of South Littleton and of Offenham in Worcester-shire; to the Vicar of Netherfoll in Gloucestershire, and the Vicar of Cereton in Wiltshire. And in case the said yearly rents and profits should happen to fall short of satisfying the said sum of ten pounds to each of the said Vicars, &c. then there should be an equal and proportionable deduction out of every one of the said salaries. But if it should happen in any following year (as no doubt it will) that more should accrue out of the yearly rents, than is sufficient to answer the said yearly stipends, then he wills, that all deficiencies so happening in any former year or years shall be made up and supplied to the said Vicars, &c. out of such overplus. And my further Will, proceeds he, by all means is, that if any of the Vicars, &c. receiving this my charitable benefaction, shall be convicted at the mouth of two or more witnesses, or generally noted for, though not formally convicted thereof by witnesses, of any thing grossly immoral, as whoredom, fornication, drunkennets, or common swearing, or any thing scandalous, or against the act of uniformity, or rule of the Church of England, such as are preaching in, or going to, any conventicle or meeting of the Dissenters from the Church of England, for religious worship; that then, and in every such, and the like case, the stipend allotted to such Vicar, &c. shall forthwith cease, and the person or persons so guilty be utterly deprived of the same for ever. And that it be from time to time paid to such Vicars, &c. as shall be so qualified as in the premises has been expressed, and known to the Dean himself, or to any one or more of the Prebendaries of Christ-Church in Oxon. for the time being, to be of a sober unblameable life, and of strict conformity to the Church of England, as now by Law established.' He further bequeaths all the overplus of the money remaining of the yearly profits of the said two estates, to six poor scholars for ever, twenty nobles a piece yearly, to be all of Christ-Church, and bred in Westminster school, to be at the nomination of the said Chapter of Christ-Church, and the remainder of the said profits to be applied towards the finishing of the new buildings then carried on in Christ-Church. He then confirms a deed of settlement, formerly made to the Dean and Chapter of St Peter's Westminster, for erecting and endowing at his sole charge a charity-school at Islip. He proceeds to give further to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church the sum of 500 l. to be laid out in purchasing the perpetual advowson of a good living, for one of the students of that College, who shall profess the study of Divinity, the said 500 l. to be paid by his executrix within five years after his decease. In the next place, he gives to the Dean and Chapter of St Asaph, &c. in North Wales, the sum of 100 l. in trust, to be laid out for the apprenticing out twenty poor youths, born in the parish of Llanchiadar in Mocknant aforesaid, to good honest trades, by 5 l. a piece to be paid by his executrix, when she shall have received of his tenant for the tythes of Llanchiadar, all that shall be due from him on that account, and not otherwise, and before the full receipt thereof. He further gives the sum of 100 l. to the public library of Oxford, for the buying into it such modern authors of principal note, as the Vice-Chancellor and Head Librarian, for the time being, shall judge to be most useful, and most wanting there. He further gives the sum of 200 l. to twenty poor ejected Clergymen, Nonjurors, at the choice and nomination of his executrix, to be distributed to them by ten pounds a piece. He likewise gives the sum of 200 l. to forty poor widows of Ministers, at the choice of his executrix, to be distributed at five pounds a piece, both to be paid within two years after his decease. He also gives the sum of 100 l. towards the maintenance of the poor children, taught and bred in the Grey-Coat Hospital in Tothill fields. He likewise gives 100 l. to fifty poor house-keepers or widows, those of Clergymen excepted as having been provided for in his Will before, within the city of Westminster, to be distributed by his executrix, at forty shillings a piece, and to be at her nomination, but still such as shall be truly conformable to our Church as now by Law established, and diligent attenders upon the service and worship thereof, either at Westminster-Abbey (which says he I most like) or in some parish church thereabouts, and this to be done as speedily, as it can with any tolerable convenience, be after my funeral. 'Also to the poor of the parish of Cavesham or Caversham in Oxfordshire, where, says he, I have dwelt for many years last past, I give ten pounds, having been all along very liberal to that place, and the poor thereof during all the time I spent there. And ten pounds to the poor of the town and parish of Islip in the county of Oxford also, to which I have been a constant, and (as they themselves very well know) no ordinary benefactor, I give five pounds to the poor of the parish of Hackney in Middlesex, near London, where I was born and baptized. I give five pounds also to the poor of the place where I shall happen to be buried, in case it proves to be none of those three places already mentioned, but not otherwise. He concludes with appointing Mrs Hammond his sole executrix and residuary legatee. Further in a codicil annexed, dated June 2, 1714, he bequeaths 500 l. towards carrying on the new buildings at Christ-Church, to be paid out of a deed or deeds of assignment for 977 l. to his said executrix, as security for the repayment of 617 l. lent by him to William Vernon of Westminster, gentleman. He also, as a pledge of respect, gives to the Honourable William Bromley, then Secretary of State, to Francis Gastrel, Bishop of Chester, to Dr John Hammond, and Dr William Stratford, both Canons of Christ-Church, five Carolus pieces of gold each for a ring. In another codicil, dated the same day as the former, he gives to Robert South, Attorney at Law, in Northampton, son to his half brother Mr James South, deceased, his the Doctor's father, drawn by the excellent hand of Vanzoeft, then hanging in his lodgings at Christ-Church, as also a gold ring set with an amethyst, with his father's arms, curiously engraved upon it; likewise a pebble stone artificially set in a gold ring (to be used as a seal) with the same coat of arms cast or engraven on it; moreover an agate of a pretty large size, and handle tipped with silver, and bearing his father's arms also upon it, intended chiefly for the smoothing of writing paper; and together with this a small silver seal, with the same engravement upon it, commonly used by himself in sealing his letters. 'Which said legacies, continues the Doctor, whether he shall pass a due value upon them or no (for I have heard of his character) I have thought fit to leave him as the properest things to remind him of the worthy father, whom he is descended from, and the family which he belongs to, and deserves with the utmost respect to be remembered by him.'

(38) Life, p. 1

Heart

Heart and hand for my Lord Arran.

(bb) From his epitaph in Westminster-abbey.

(cc) It is printed at the end of the Memoirs of his Life, together with an English translation of it.

(dd) The same which was sung at the interment of the Queen [Anne], composed by Dr Will. Croft. Ibid. p. 140.

(ee) P. 141.

(ff) p. 354, edit. 1753.

So that the Dean, who had the casting vote, determined the choice in his Lordship's favour. This being the last time he went abroad, it is easy to imagine, that weakness, the attendant upon old age, made quick advances towards his dissolution, which happened on Sunday the 8th day of July, 1716 (bb). Four days after his decease, the corpse having for some time lain in a decent manner in the Jerusalem-chamber, was brought into the college-hall, where a Latin oration (cc) was spoken by Mr John Barber, Captain of the King's scholars. Thence it was attended by the Bishop of Rochester, with the Prebendaries who were in town, the masters, the scholars, the whole choir, and all the servants belonging to the royal foundation, with many members of the university and college of Christ-Church in Oxford. Upon their entrance into the abbey, the choir performed the part of the funeral service, 'till the body was placed in the area of the church; after which followed evening prayers, and an anthem suitable to the occasion (dd). Prayers being ended, the corpse was attended in the same manner to the grave, near the steps of the altar, adjoining to the late Dr Busby's, where the choir performed the last part of the service, the Right Reverend the Dean reading the burial office, with such affection and devotion, as shewed his concern for this loss to the Church (ee). A sumptuous marble monument, after the model of Dr Busby's, and adjoining to it, was erected to his memory with a Latin epitaph by Dr Freind, then Head-Master of Westminster-school, containing his eulogy. The purport of which is, that he did honour to his age and country; his judgment was penetrating, and his knowledge extensive. He possessed at once all those extraordinary talents, that were divided amongst the greatest authors of Antiquity; he had the sound, distinct, comprehensive, knowledge of Aristotle, with all the beautiful lights, graces, and embellishments, of Cicero. One does not know which to admire most in his writings, the strength of reason, force of style, or brightness of imagination. As to his moral and religious conduct, he was not only a son, but a father to the Church of England; sincere and hearty to her friends, and ever bold and undaunted in the defence of truth and loyalty; wherein his arguments were so solid and nervous, that as few have come near him, so none have excelled him. Inasmuch, that while he was possessed of Tertullian's oratory and force of persuasion, he was invested and clothed with St Cyprian's devotion and humility. He was a true friend to Monarchy, even when rebellion was successful and faction meritorious. His charity to the poor was very liberal, and the greatest part of it industriously concealed, having our Saviour's rule not to let our light shine before men always upon his mind, whereby we may be assured, that he found greater satisfaction in the duty than he could propose from the title of a generous benefactor. To describe him fully, ought only to be attempted by a person that is blessed with such a share of wit and devotion as he enjoyed. Here we see the bright side of the Doctor's character, which is represented as all pure gold without any alloy. Nevertheless an alloy it undeniably had mingled in it's composition, and which therefore, as it becomes an impartial historian, we shall lay before the reader, in the words of a late writer, who in a panegyric, intitled, The life of Archbishop Tillotson (ff), recounting such Protestants as had attacked his Grace's Sermons, sets our Divine at the head of them. 'One of the most forward and petulant, says he, was Dr South, whose learning and genius, were accompanied with an unrestrained acrimony of temper, and a boundless severity of language, mixed with the lowest and falsest, as well as the truest wit, both in his conversation and writings, against those, who differed in the least from him, especially in matters, which he imagined or represented, to concern the interests of the Established Church, for which, after the Restoration, he appeared the most zealous champion on all occasions, though before that event, he had insinuated himself into the good opinion of Dr John Owen, Dean of Christ-Church, where he was educated, and of the Independent party, whom he afterwards abandoned, and joyned with the Presbyterians [T].' The Doctor is also represented

(39) Life of Tillotson, p. 354.

(40) In Archbishop Tillotson's article.

[T] He berded first with the Independents and afterwards with the Presbyterians.] In order to confirm the justice of this representation, it is observed, 'that the circumstances are related by Mr Wood, who has drawn his character in a manner not at all favourable to his memory, and has the more weight from his own conformity to the Doctor's professed principles, both in Church and State (39). Enough has been said already to evince Mr Wood's prejudice against our author, where the root from whence it sprung is now laid open. And we shall have occasion to shew hereafter, that his Grace of Canterbury was handled with little less severity by him (40); a circumstance, which is sunk into a dead silence in the account of his life, the greatest blemish of which, is the blackning and blanching of characters, as best serves the purpose of heightning the otherwise sufficiently confessed merit of the subject. In this design we see the writer raking up, and retailing every little tale in disparagement of Dr South. Thus, for instance, to set off the moderation of the Archbishop's temper and principles, having remarked,

'that he was stigmatized with the name of Latitudinarian, by persons of very opposite characters, is introduced a piece, intitled, The Principles and Practices of certain moderate Divines, &c. written (41) by Dr Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, who is dignified with the epithet of pious and rational, because in it he complains, that this term of reproach, this word, as he calls it, of a foot and a half long, Latitudinarian, was frequently thrown out at that time, not only in conversation, but from the pulpit; and that it accompanied good store of other bombasts and little witticisms, in seasoning, not long ago, the stately Oxonian theatre. Which passage evidently refers to the speech of Dr South, then Orator of the university of Oxford, in which he treated not only the new Philosophy and the Royal Society, but likewise moderation, comprehension, and other topics of that kind with his usual virulence and buffoonry, so justly complained of by Dr Wallis in a letter to Mr Boyle (42), as unsuitable to a learned body, on so solemn an occasion.' Again for proof of the vivacity of the Archbishop's

(41) In 1669, as appears by the dedication in the beginning of July that year, tho' not published 'till 1670.

(42) Dated at Oxford, July 17, 1669. See Boyle's Works, Vol. V. p. 514.

represented by another author, as of a morose and reserved person, who declares, that it was the sourness of his disposition, which made him unfit for conversation, that made him a scholar; on the contrary, the writer of his life maintains him to be so far from deserving this character of moroseness and a sour wit, that whoever was once in his company went off with such a relish of his wit and good humour, as to covet the coming into it, though at the expence of bearing a part in the subject of his gallery, so that what was said of Horace, might, on as just grounds be worked into his character,

Ridentem Flaccus amicum

Tangit, & admissus circum præcordia ludit.

Whatever may be thought of this comparison in favour of the Doctor's conversible wit in particular; the use, which he is observed to make of his wit in general, by the author of the Tatler (gg), will hardly be disputed. That ingenious writer, an acknowledged wit of the first rank, who cannot be suspected of partiality on the Doctor's side, in a paper, the subject of which, was confessedly suggested by reading one of his sermons, having inculcated the practice of virtue from the contemptibleness of vice, proceeds thus. 'I have oftner wondered, considering the excellent and choice spirits, that we have among our Divines, that they don't think of putting vicious habits into a more contemptible and unlovely figure, than they do at present; so many men of wit and spirit as there are in sacred Orders, have it in their power to make the vogue on their side. The leaders in human society are more effectually prevailed upon this way, than can easily be imagined. I have more than one in my thoughts, at this time, capable of doing this, against all the opposition of the most witty as well as the most voluptuous. There may possibly be more acceptable subjects, but sure there are none more useful. It is visible, that though mens fortunes, circumstances, and pleasures, give them propensions too strong to regard any mention, either of punishments or rewards. They will listen to what makes them either inconsiderable or mean in the imagination of others, and by degrees in their own. It is certain, such topics are to be touched upon in the light we mean, only by men of the most consummate prudence, as well as excellent wit; for these discourses are to be made, if made to run into example, before such as have their thoughts more intent upon the propriety than the reason of the discourse. What indeed led me into this way of thinking is, that the last thing I read was a sermon of the learned Dr South, upon The ways of pleasantness. This admirable discourse was preached at Court, where the Preacher was too wise a man not to believe the greatest argument in that place, against the pleasures then in vogue, must be, that they lost greater pleasures by prosecuting the courses they were in. The charming discourse has in it whatsoever wit and wisdom can put together. This gentleman has a talent of making all his faculties bear to the great end of his hallowed profession. Happy Genius! he is the better man for being a wit.'

(gg) No. 205, in the 4th volume.

bishop's wit, we have the following instance of his talent at repartees, drawn from him on occasion of Dr South's Animadversions on Dr Sherlock's Vindication of the Trinity, in 1693. Dr South being desirous 'tis said with what probability is left to the reader's judgment) to know the Archbishop's opinion of his performance, wherein he had occasionally reflected upon his Grace, for his signal and peculiar encomium, as he calls it, of the reasoning abilities of the Socinians, procured a friend of his to draw it from his Grace, who gave it to this effect, that the Doctor wrote like a man, but bit like a dog. This being reported to the Doctor, he answered, that he had rather bite like a dog than fawn like one. To which the Archbishop replied, That for his own part, he should chuse to be a spaniel, rather than a cur (43). Thus his Grace must needs be a match for Dr South as a wit, and that too in a species of wit, which is undeniably the spawn of ill nature and malevolence, and which, as such, is allowed to be a foul disgrace to the universal wit of his rival, who is however, here, insinuated to bring this rebuke upon himself, by paying a kind of homage to his Grace's judgment. It would be running into the like ridicule, to set Dr South upon a level with Tillotson as a preacher, though some of his performances that way are indisputably excellent. Yet he characterised them, in general, most aptly, who called them not Sunday, but week day sermons. The peculiar turn and temper of these, as well as his other writings, were undeniably the produce of the idiosyncrasy of his nature, to use a term of Dr Henry More, and the same may be said of other writers and preachers, Dr Tillotson not excepted, who on that account, incurred the imputation of a Laticudinarian, from a spirit of the same kindred with that which branded Dr South as an intolerant (44).

(44) Consult the same Life, p. 295, 354. 355. P. 428, 429.

SPEED [JOHN], author of the History and Maps of Great Britain, a man of wonderful industry, abilities, and ingenuity, considering his education and profession, was born at Farrington in Cheshire (a) [A], in the year 1552 (b). He was brought up a taylor, and free of the Merchant-taylors company in the city of London. But Sir Fulk Grevile, a great encourager of learning, observing his natural disposition, took him off from his servile employment, and by a proper allowance enabled him to follow entirely his studies [B]. The first fruits of them was his 'Theatre [or Maps] of the Empire of

(a) Fuller's Worthies of England, in Cheshire, p. 181.

(b) This is inferred from his age at the time of his death. See his Epitaph below.

[A] Was born at Farrington in Cheshire.] So Dr Fuller was informed by Mr Speed's own daughter, Mrs Blackmore, a stationer's wife in St. Paul's Church-yard (1).

[B] But Sir Fulk Grevile—enabled him to follow entirely his studies.] This Mr Speed thankfully acknowledges, in these words. Sir Foulk Grevil,— 'in whose person shineth all true vertue and high Nobility.—Whose merits to me-ward, I do acknowledge, in setting this hand free from the daily im-

(43) Life of Tillotson, p. 323.

(1) Worthies, ubi supra.

of Great Britaine [C]. Which was followed with his History of Great Britaine [D]; a work of infinite labour, and, allowing for the author's want of a learned education, well executed. For it is digested in a much better manner than the chronicles of Fabian, Grafton, Holinshed, and Stow, and elegantly printed. The account and character given of it by Bishop Nicolson, and others [E], is set down below. Mr Speed was also author of

(2) Theatre of Great Britaine, in the Description of Warwickshire.

ployments of a manuell Trade, and giving it full liberty thus to exprefs the inclination of my mind, himself being the procurer of my present Estate (2).

[C] Theatre [or Maps] of the Empire of Great-Britaine.] The title of this work is, 'The Theatre of the Empire of Great-Britaine: presenting an exact Geography of the Kingdome of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Isles adjoining. With the Shires, Hundreds, Cities, and Shire-Townes within the Kingdome of England, divided and described by John Speed.' Lond. 1606 fol. These Maps are the best that had till then been made of the British Dominions. The corners of them are ornamented with coins, and the ichnography of the most considerable cities and towns in the respective counties. They were designed to go along with his History; and, in the Contents, are made the Four first Books of that work.—Bishop Nicolson's judgment and opinion of these Maps is as follows (3). 'His Maps, says he,

(3) English Historical Library, edit. 1714, fol. p. 5, 6.

are extremely well; and make a noble Apparatus (as they were designed) to his History. But his Descriptions of the severall Counties are mostly short abstracts of what Camden had said before him, having only that of Norfolk, which (he owns, tho' he is not always so civil to his chief benefactor) he had from Sir Henry Spelman.' Is not this a little too Severe? Our author makes a due acknowledgment of his Benefactors, particularly with regard to his Maps, in these words (4).—'So plenteous is our Story, and so largely requires it to bee writ. Through all which my weake body with many yeeres labour hath alone trauelled, as well in the reviewing of the Geographical parts of the Land, as in the compiling of the succeeding History, though far vnable to perfect either, according to their owne worths. But lest the waight of the whole should rest vpon so slender a proppe as my selfe: I have laid my buildings vpon far stronger arches, as by the many alleaged authorities may appeare. For first the Charde for the most part traced by others(5), and most of them divulged unto view, were the foundations of my begunne paines; in supplying their wants with my many additions, and dimensions of the Shire-townes, and Cities true platformes. The further descriptions of sundry provinces, I have gleaned from the famous workes of the most worthy and learned Camden, whose often sowed Seedes in that Soile hath lastly brought forth a most plenteous harvest.' An Epitome of it was published in 1676.

(4) See the conclusion of his History.

[D] Which was followed with his History of Great-Britaine.] This is intituled, 'The History of Great-Britaine under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans. Their Originals, Manners, Warres, Coines, and Seales: with the Successions, Lives, Acts and Issues of the English Monarchs from Julius Cæsar, to our most gracious Sovereigne King James.' First printed in 1614, large folio. Reprinted since, with some pretended additional decorations, but much inferior, in print and paper, to that first and best edition. In this History, our Author had the Assistance of several persons of the greatest learning. The reign of King Henry V. for instance, was compiled from collections, notes, and extracts made by George Carew Earl of Totness. That of Henry VII. is almost wholly the Lord Viscount St Albans, Sir Francis Bacon's. The notes and collections of Sir Robert Cotton, were made use of in the reign of King Henry VIII. Those of Sir Henry Spelman, in another. The life of King John was written by Dr Barkham, Dean of Bocking; who also drew up the life of King Henry II. in opposition to, or for supplanting, one written by the learned Edmund Bolton (6); who being a Roman Catholic was thought to favour too much the haughty carriage of Thomas Becket (7). The Catalogue of the religious Houses, at the end of King Henry the eighth's reign, was composed by William Burton, Esq; (8) But let us hear Mr Speed's own account of his chief assistants.—'For the body of the Historie, saith he, many were the manuscripts, notes and Records, wherewith my honoured and learned

(5) L. Har. Christ. Saxton. John Norden. Wil. White.

(6) See the articles BAR-CHAM, and BOLTON, above.

(7) The Surfeit to A. B. C. Lond. 1656. 12mo. p. 22. Wood Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. 11. col. 19.

(8) Bishop Nicolson's English Historical Library, edit. 1714, fol. p. 73, 143.

friends supplied me; but none more (or so many) as did the worthy repairer of eating times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet, another Philadelphus in preserving old Monuments, and ancient Records: whose Cabinets were unlocked, and Library continually set open to my free acceffe: and from whence the chiefeft garnishments of this worke have bene enlarged and brought: such as are the antique Altars, and Trophies in Stone, by him preserved from perishing oblivion: The Coins of gold, silver, alcumy, and copper, of the Britaines, Romans, Saxons, Danes and English, with the Broade Seales of those Kings since the same were in use: all of them so followed from the originall moddies, and moneyes, by the most exquisit and curious hand of our age (9), as any eye may witness they are the true prints from those stamps. The like most acceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, (especially in matters remoter from our times) I continually received from that worthy Divine, Master John Barkham, a gentleman composed of Learning, Vertue, and Curtesie, as being no lesse ingenuously willing, then learnedly able, to advance and forward all vertuous endeavours. Besides these, some other supply I have had: for my disease growne dangerous, and life held in suspence; it behoved him who had towards the publishing bestowed so great cost, to forward the finishing; and to that end hee procured mee to his further charges an assistant

(10) in the lives of our middle English Kings: whose Stories and raignes (by the Judicious) may by their files bee knowne to bee writ with another penne. Lastly for the matters of Heraldrie, the willing and ready paines of Master William Smith, Rough * Dragon (an officer at Armes) was ever at hand: and by these hands this building is mounted to such an height as thou seest (11).—But Dr Thomas Smith affirms, that Sir Robert Cotton had the revising, correcting, and polishing of the whole work. His words are these. 'Hanc benevolentiam, si quis unquam, sapiissime expertus est Joannes Speedus, Civis Londinensis, ob industriam saltem maxime commendandus, qui generalem magnæ Britannix historiam qualem qualem vernaculo idiomate pro captu, modulo, viribusque suis scribere aggressus, tanto oneri plane succubuerat, nisi Cottonus subsidiariam laboranti operam præstitisset: ejus consiliis monitisque tanquam filo Ariadneo sese ex ista labyrintho tandem feliciter extricavit. Cottonus enim schedas incultas scabraeque ingenio, tanquam lima, perpolivit; ubi necessitas postulerat, recoctas denuo reformavit, & insigni observationum supplemento è penu suo auxit, ut opus illud quaecunque, quod longe alium auctorem in vetustis Scriptoribus tabularisque publicis versatissimum desideraret, si non cum laude, saltem cum venia & fructu legeretur (12).'

(9) Christ. Saxton.

(10) M. Ed. Bolton.

* Rouge.

(11) Conclusion of his History.

[E] The account and character given of it by Bishop Nicolson and others.] 'John Speed, says the Bishop, must be acknowledged to have had a head the best disposed towards History of any of our writers; and would certainly have outdone himself, as far as he has gone beyond the rest of his profession, if the advantages of his Education had been answerable to those of his natural genius. But what could be expected from a Taylor (13)? However, we may boldly say that his Chronicle is the largest and best we have hitherto extant: It begins with the first Inhabitants of the Island, and ends with the union of the Kingdoms under King James, to whom it is dedicated. Tho' some say (14) he spent twice seven years in compiling the whole, he himself owns he made more haste than he ought to have done; and that he was forced to trust a deal of his work in the hands of his friends and journeymen. And the Truth of this honest acknowledgement and confession is obvious enough to a discerning Reader; who will easily find a mighty Difference in the style, as well as matter, of several of the reigns (15).—Degory Whear * commends this History in the First place; and bestows upon it; the highest praises that can be

(12) Vita D. Roberti Cottoni, præfixa Catalog. Biblioth. Cotton. p. xxiv.

(13) An injurious reflexion! He was undoubtedly a man of a pretty good education, and certainly of very good sense.

(14) Deg. Whear, Method and Order of reading Histories, Sect. 31.

(15) English Histor. Library, as above, p. 73.

Adding,

of, 'Cloud of witnesses, viz. the Genealogies of Scripture, confirming the Truth of holy History and Humanity of Christ:' prefixed to the new translation of the Bible in 1611, and printed afterwards in most of the subsequent antient editions of the same: Published likewise by itself in 1616, 8vo. (c). King James the First granted him a patent, for securing the property of this to himself and his heirs (d). After a useful and industrious life, and having lived fifty-seven years in marriage with one wife, by whom he had twelve sons [F], and six daughters, he dyed at London July 28, 1629, and was buried in the church of St Giles Cripplegate, where a monument is erected to him on the south side of the chancel [G]. Dr Fuller, in his quibbling manner, says, that Father Speed truly answered his name in both the acceptations thereof for Celerity and Success (e). Bishop Nicolson gives him this character (f): That he was a person of extraordinary Industry and attainments in the study of Antiquities; and seems not altogether unworthy the name of 'a very great and learned Antiquary (g), given him by one who was certainly so himself.'

(e) With this title, 'The Genealogies recorded in the sacred Scriptures, according to every Family and Tribe. With the Line of our Saviour Jesus Christ, observed from Adam to the blessed Virgin Mary.'

(c) Worthless, as above.

(f) English Historical Library, as above, p. 5.

(g) Summus & eruditus Antiquarius. Sbering-bim de Anglorum Gentis Origine, Cantab. 1670, 8vo. p. 42.

Adding, that our Author 'having travelled over all Great Britain, read diligently all our own Historians, and those of our neighbour Nations, together with a diligent Search in the Publick Offices, Rolls, Monuments, and ancient Charters, built up a splendid and admired Theatre of the British Empire; which, with great expedition and labour, he perfected in fourteen years, in Ten Books.—Wherefore I do most earnestly exhort young Men, and especially those who are of Noble birth, and intend to travell, that they would first peruse this beautiful Theatre of Great-Britain, and run over all the parts of it, before they travell into foreign countries, or visit strange Nations (t6).—'James Tyrrell, Esq; gives this character of it.—'It must be confessed, says he, that Mr Speed was the first English writer, who slighting Geoffrey's tales, immediately fell upon more solid matter; giving us a large Account of the History of this Island during the Time of the Roman Emperors and English Saxon Kings; and had he not, by making his Reader follow those Emperors in all their foreign wars and expeditions, wherein Britain was no way concerned, he had rendered his work less irksome, and more profitable than now it is. But notwithstanding He and Stow, had many choice Collections of noble Manuscripts relating to our English History, and might have had the view of several others if they would have been at the pains of seeking after them; yet it must be owned that they did not make that improvement of those opportunities as might have been expected from such great assistances; there being not much to be found material in either of them, but what was in the other Historians before published: though this must be allowed in their Commendation, that they are both of them (especially the former) commonly right in their Chronologies, and the latter has given us a choice Collection of the Antient Coins of the Roman Emperors, as well as of the English Saxon Kings; and has also been more exact than any other Writer, in his account of their Wives and Issue (17). But as to this last particular, he hath been much outdone by Mr Sandford's and Stebbing's Genealogical History.—Finally, Mr Wood observes (18), that Mr Speed's part in this History, is such for Style and Industry, as is perhaps without many fellows in Europe.

(t6) Whear, as above.

(17) General History of England, by James Tyrrell, Esq; Vol. 1. Preface, p. 5, 6.

(18) Ath. Vol. 1. col. 530.

[F] By whom he had twelve sons.] One of them named John was born at London in 1595, educated at Merchant-Taylors School, and St John's college Oxford, where he took the degrees in Arts and in Physic. He dyed in May 1640, and was buried in the chapel of that college (19). Having married a daughter of Bartholomew Warner, M. D. (20), he had by her two sons: Samuel, Student of Christ-Church Oxon. installed Canon of that church May 6, 1674 (21), who dyed at Godalmin in Surrey January 22, 1681, of which he was Vicar (22). The other son, named John, was born at Oxford, elected Scholar of St John's college about the year 1643, but ejected thence by the Parliament-visitors in 1648, he being then Bachelor of Arts, and Fellow. At the Restoration he was reinstated into his Fellowship, and June 19, 1666, took the degree of Doctor in Physic (23); and afterwards quitting his Fellowship, he practised his faculty at Southampton. He wrote, 'Batt upon Batt. A Poem upon the Parts, Patience, and Pains of Bartholomew Kempster, Clerk, Poet, and Cutler of Holy-Rood parish in Southampton.' And, 'The Vision, wherein is described Batt's Person and Ingenuity, with an account of the ancient and present State and Glory of Southampton.' Both printed at London in two Sheets in folio, and quarto (24).

(19) Wood Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. 1. col 631.

(20) Idem, col. 300.

(21) Idem, col. 631.

(22) Id. F. 11. col. 197.

(23) Idem, ibid col 165.

(24) Idem, Ath. Vol. 11. col. 1083.

[G] Where a monument is erected to him.] The inscription upon it, is in these words. 'Pia memoriae charissimorum Parentum: Jobannis Speed civis Londinensis, Mercatorum Scissorum fratris, servi fidelissimi regiarum Majestatum, Elizabethæ, Jacobi, & Caroli nunc superstitis. Terrarum nostrarum Geographi accurati, & fidi Antiquitatis Britannicæ Historiographi, Genealogiæ sacre elegantissimi Delineatoris. Qui postquam annos 77 superaverat, non tam morbo confectus, quam mortalitatis tædio lassatus, corpore se levavit Julii 28, 1629, & jucundissimo Redemptoris sui desiderio sursum elatus, carnem hic in Custodia posuit, denuo, cum Christus venerit, recepturus.'

On the other side of him.

'Sufannæ suæ suavissimæ, quæ postquam duodecim illi filios, & sex filias pepererat, quinquaginta septem annos junctis utriusque solatiis, cum illo vixerat; liberos, gravi & frequenti hortamine, ad Dei cultum sollicitaverat; Pietatis & Charitatis opere quotidiano præluxerat, emori demum erudit suo exemplo. Quæ septuagenaria placide in Christo obdormivit, & Fidei suæ mercedem habuit, Martii vigesimo octavo, Anno Domini M DC XXVIII (25).'

(25) Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's additions, Vol. 1. book 3. p. 85, 86.

SPELTMAN [Sir HENRY], Knt. was descended from an ancient family of his name, which, as he himself hath shewn (a), flourished in the time of Henry the Third, at Be-kington in Hampshire; and in the following century, removing thence into Suffolk, came at last to settle in Norfolk, where our author's great-grandfather was possessed, in the XVth century, of a considerable estate, being Lord of Stowe, Breclys, Magna & Parva Wotton, Colny, Welinge, Roclond, and Crowis; and marrying the heiress of the Narburgh family, his eldest male issue became Sir John Spelman, Knt. of Narburgh; who having several children, his fourth son, Henry Spelman, Esq; was seated at Cong-ham (b), a small village near Lyn-Regis in that county; at which place his wife Frances, daughter of William Sanders of Ewel in Surrey, brought him this his eldest son [A],

(a) In the pedigree of his family, adjoined to the account of his life prefixed to his English Works, by Dr Gibson, p. 112, 2d edition.

(b) He was Lord and Patron of that place Preface, by Jer. Stephens, to Sir Henry's treatise concerning Tythes.

[A] Brought him this eldest son.] Dr Gibson, the late Bishop of London, speaking of our author's family, relates it thus (1). 'His father's name was Henry Spelman, Esq; as we learn from a pedigree of the family under Sir Henry's own hand, and not John, as a certain writer has affirmed. Referring in the margin to the Life of Sir Henry Spelman in Latin, prefixed to the third edition of his Glossary; where that writer, who

(1) In his Life of Sir Henry Spelman, prefixed to his English works.

(c) His Life, prefixed to the third edition of his Glossary, printed in 1684, fol.

(d) He expresses it thus: E schola rapior Cantabrigiam tenellus adhuc & Academicæ disciplinæ omnino inidoneus. Præfat. ad Archæolog. published in 1626, fol.

the subject of our present article (c), who was born in the year 1562 [B]; and, as soon as he arrived at a proper age, was put to school at the neighbouring town of Walsingham [C]; whence he was hurried away to Trinity-college in Cambridge, when he had scarcely passed six months in the fourteenth year of his age [D], and, according to the modest opinion which he had of himself, before he was ripe for entering into academical studies (d). However, he applied himself closely to his books, and was greatly pleased with this situation: but was unhappily torn from it by the death of his father, being called home on that occasion by his mother, to give her such assistance as he was capable of, in managing the affairs of the family. He had not spent two years and a half in the university, and was not yet quite seventeen years old. After he had continued with his mother about twelve months, she sent him to London, and had him admitted of Lincoln's-Inn, with a design of breeding him to the Law [E]. Having now again obtained his liberty with his books, he gave his attention chiefly to polite literature, and the more liberal branch of the study he was intended for, in which branch of it he took a singular delight; but having an aversion, too often seen in young minds, to the flat drudgery necessary for attaining to the lucrative part of that profession, he made no extraordinary progress therein, satisfying himself probably with a general knowledge of such laws and customs, as are of common and ordinary use in practice. When he had spent near three years in these studies, being almost of age, he went down into Norfolk, and was soon after married to Eleanor, the eldest daughter of John le Strange, a gentleman of an ancient family [F] in the who subscribes himself J. A. in the first page of his account, has, indeed, these words, nomen patri Johannes erat. But turning over the leaf, I was not a little surprized, to find in the very next page Sir Henry's pedigree traced after Sir Edward Bythe, in these words: 'Henricus Spelman Elizabetham duxit filiam & heredem Gulielmi Narburgh; ex qua genuit Johannem Spelman, qui uxorem habuit Elizabetham, filiam & heredem Henrici Fowick, Equitis Aurati. Ex iis natus Henricus hunc autorem nostrum Henricum cum dedit.' Reflecting upon these two most extraordinary accounts, there was no avoiding this plain inference, that the inexcusable oscitancy of Mr J. A. was a proper bait for the little less blamable promptness of his censurer, in finding fault. In the mean time, great allowance is to be made for the author of the General Dictionary (2), who has very faithfully transcribed this notable remark of Dr Gibson, the then [viz. in 1739] actually Bishop of London.

[B] He was born in 1562. Dr Gibson observes (3), that Sir Henry was about eighty years of age when he died in 1641; whence the author of the General Dictionary infers, that he was born in 1561; and Mr J. A. (4) had before expressed the age at which he died, in these terms: obiit octagesimo ætatis anno & quod excurrit. This may [possibly] either mean that he died some time after his birth-day, in the year that he arrived at the age of fourscore, or else that he died in his eightieth year current. This last author honestly declares, that he had no acquaintance at all with the Spelmans family, but had his information chiefly from Anthony Wood, the Oxford Antiquary; and Dr Gibson, no doubt, not caring to enter into such minutiae, has here apparently given a loose translation of the Latin writer, leaving it undetermined, as a matter of no moment; which is certainly well judged: but here the copyer, willing to squeeze something out of his words, infers from them, that Sir Henry was born about 1561. This remark, it is hoped, will excuse the following, otherwise intolerable, diligence. Sir Henry, in his letter to Mr Richard Carew, printed at the end of his larger work upon Tythes, and dated September the 18th, 1615, writes thus: Denuo otii desiderio captus Londinum tertio hinc anno veni. And in the preface of his Glossary, speaking again of his coming to settle in London, he says, Provectus itaque ad senectutis confinia annum nempe quinquagesimum. Londinum transfero. If these two passages be compared, take them in what sense you please, the inference is unavoidable, that he could not be born before the year 1562; and, on the other hand, if he died in his eightieth year, that is, when he was full seventy-nine years old, it is equally evident, that he could not be born after 1562, in which year we have therefore ventured to place his birth.

[C] He was put to school at Walsingham. Mr Wood, it seems, could give his friend J. A. * no information concerning this particular; Sir Henry being bred at Cambridge, did not lye directly in the road of the Oxford Antiquary; but it is something remarkable, that Dr Gibson should tread in the same steps, and pass it over in a dead silence, since the treatise where it is expressly declared must in some manner have been perused by him. He gives us his word for it, and, in further proof, has drawn up a very faithful general plan of it; in which he has given us the title at length of the very chapter where it is found, and concluded the whole with a very pertinent remark in favour of the author, which seems chiefly taken from a passage in this chapter. I mean Sir Henry Spelman's History and Fate of Sacrilege. In which treatise (5), in speaking of Walsingham-abbey, he has these words. 'One Sydney, Governour of the Spittle there, as was commonly reported when I was a scholar at Walsingham, was by the townsmen employed to have bought the site of the abbey,' &c. A sufficient apology has been already offered for the author of the General Dictionary, who here again hath diligently followed the then Bishop of London.

[D] When he had scarcely passed six months in the fourteenth year of his age. This precision was incidentally occasioned by our being drawn into the enquiry under the note [B], in the manner there related; when we could not avoid observing, that Sir Henry, in the preface to his Glossary, says, Nondum xv annorum Puer è schola rapior Cantabrigiam; and finding him likewise complaining to his friend Mr Carew in these terms, Cantabrigia (miserum me) mater exiit cum 17 ætatis non salutaveram, we became irresistably pushed into the exactness here marked.

[E] With a design of having him bred to the Law. Dr Gibson (and his transcriber) tells us, that he was sent to study the Common Law at Lincoln's-Inn, either with a design to practise it, or (which is more probable) as an useful accomplishment of an English gentleman. Sir Henry's own account of it is thus expressed: 'Emissit [mater mea] me tamen sub anno altero Londinum juris nostri capeffendi gratia, cujus cum vestibulum salutastem, reperissem linguam peregrinam, dialectum barbaram, methodum inconcinuam, molem non ingentem solum, sed perpetuis humeris sustinendam. Excidit mihi fateor animus, blanditoribusque subridens musis rigidam hanc Minervam ferreis amplexibus coercendam leni molimine delibavi. Excussit me interea (O infelicem!) e clientela sua, gratiæ, potestatis, dignitatis, immensæque apud nos largitrix opulentæ, illa inquam vestitu simplici & inculto, sed jurium omnium municipalium (abiit dictis invidia) nobilissima Domina, omni utpote justitia moderamine prudentia sublimique acumine (temere licet eum pertrinxerit Hotomannus) refertissima! We must leave it to the learned reader to judge, whether the words (which we have relied on), Juris nostri capeffendi gratia, cujus cum vestibulum salutastem, Excidit mihi animus, Excussit me immensæ apud nos largitrix opulentæ illa—Domina, are sufficient to justify what is here asserted in the text, against the opinion of the late Bishop of London.

[F] A gentleman of an ancient family. Sir Henry drew up the pedigree of this family under the following title: Familia Extraneorum, sive Le Strange, accurata descriptio. He found something very particular in

(5) History of Sacrilege, p. 253.

(2) Under the article SPELMAN [Sir HENRY].

(3) Ubi supra.

(4) In Vita Henrici Spelmani, prefixed to the third edition of his Glossary, in fol. 1684.

* His words are, De puerili nostri Equitis ætate perpaucissima habeo quæ dicam.

the same County. Being thus, agreeably to his affections (e), settled in the country, he applied himself immediately to rural affairs, and the particular care of his domestic. He kept his land in his own hands, and took pains to manage it to the best advantage; and notwithstanding his family increased apace, yet he found wherewithal to make some new purchases (f). In the mean time the match he had entered into brought another care upon him in the guardianship of his brother-in-law Sir Haimon le Strange, during whose minority he resided at Hanstanton, the seat of his ward. However, though the greatest part of his time was spent in attending to these engaging duties, yet did he not neglect to make a proper use of his education, and found some spare hours to improve those beginnings which he had made in the knowledge of the constitution, and laws, both ecclesiastical and civil, of his country. While he was yet a young man, he wrote a Latin treatise intituled Aspilogia (g), wherein he discourses with great variety of literature concerning those marks of honour now called Arms. It was likewise in his younger years that he collected the transcripts of several foundation-charters of the monasteries in Norfolk and Suffolk. In 1694, being thirty-four years of age, he likewise wrote A Discourse concerning the Coin of the kingdom, particularly to shew what great treasures were exhausted from England by the usurped tyranny of Rome [G]. Before this he had been admitted a member of the Society of Antiquaries [H], which brought him intimately acquainted with Sir Robert Cotton, Mr Camden, and several others, the most eminent men in England for that kind of literature. In 1604 he was appointed High Sheriff of Norfolk, and probably about the same time it was that he wrote a description of that County, which he communicated to John Speed, who printed it in 1606 [I]. Thus he began by degrees to be taken notice of, distinguishing himself, upon all occasions, by his great prudence and abilities; insomuch that in 1607 he was pitched on by his Majesty [K. James I.] to be one of the Commissioners for determining the unsettled titles to lands and manors in Ireland [K]. This Post carried him three times

(e) He says of this marriage, Latissimi sulceptis hymenei vinculis. Id.

(f) He purchased the lease of Blackburgh and Wronge Abbies in Norfolk. Hist. of Sacrilege, p. 257, where it is called Mr Fisher's Great Lease, p. 129, as being apparently somewhat considerable.

(g) Mr J. A. says of it, Hoc ab Eo etiamnum Juvene scripta. ubi supra. It was published in 1650, with notes, by Sir Ed. Bysshe, together with two other pieces, one by Nic. Upton, De re Militari, and another, De Armis, by Johannes de Bado Aureo.

in tracing this pedigree, which led him to write another piece, intituled Historia Familiae de Shereburn. This last family he traces up as far as to one Thokas, who was converted to Christianity, and baptized by St Felix, at this time with Honorius Archbishop of Canterbury, at whose request that Saint came to England from Burgundy. From this Thokas he traces it without a single hiatus down to Christopher Shereburn, who died July 6, 1676. This Christopher married first Anne Veer, of the family of the Earl of Essex, and afterwards Duke of Norfolk, and had Frances, who married into the family of Le Strange. Sir Henry, it seems, was quite struck with this singular pedigree, and has expressed it in a distich prefixed to the Reader.

Non Vulgare vides monumentum, forte videbis
Haud dico præterea talia, si qua vides.

No Vulgar monument you see; scarce two
The like you'll find, if any one you do.

[G] A Discourse concerning the Coin of the kingdom.] This was wrote in the thirty-sixth year of Queen Elizabeth, as appears from the following passage in the Conclusion of it to that Queen. 'Most Royal, therefore is the prudence and expediting of your excellent Majesty, who (as it were with Lynceus Eye,) looking into the lowest secret of the practices of your Enemies, have not only for these thirty-six years entirely cancelled and made them frustrate, but foreseeing also what mighty consequences might depend on mean beginnings, spareth no diligence to defeat them, whilst they are yet in the shell; or so to shoot the mark at which they are levelled, that being hatched, they will be able to perform nothing.' We must not omit to inform the Reader, that the Editor of this piece tells us, he dares not positively assert it to be Sir Henry's; 'but my finding them, says he, among his other papers, and the accurate knowledge of our English affairs which appears in them, inclined me to believe that he was really the Author of it (6).'

[H] He was admitted a member of the Society of Antiquaries before 1694.] This appears from the account which he gives of it in the Introduction to his Discourse concerning the original of the four Law Terms, as follows. 'About forty-two years since, says he, divers gentlemen of London studious of Antiquities, formed themselves into a College or Society of Antiquaries, appointing to meet every Friday weekly in the Term at a place agreed of, and for learning sake to confer upon some questions in that faculty, and to sup together. The place, after a meeting or two, became certain at Derby-house, where the Heralds Office is kept, and two questions were propounded at every meeting to be handled at the next that followed; so that every man had a seven-night's respite to advise upon them, and then to deliver his opinion. That which seemed most material was by one of the Company (chosen for the purpose) to be entered in a book, that so it might remain unto Posterity. The Society increased daily; persons of great worth, as well noble as learned, joyning themselves unto it. Thus it continued divers years; but as all good Uses commonly decline, so many of the chief Supporters thereof either dying or withdrawing themselves from London into the Country, this among the rest grew for twenty years to be discontinued. But it then came again into the minds of divers principal gentlemen to revive it, and for that purpose upon the day in the year 1614, there met at the same place, Sir James Sey, Knight, then Attorney of the Court of Wards, since Earl of Marlborough, and Lord Treasurer of England; Sir Robert Cotton, Knight and Baronet; Sir John Davies, his Majesty's Attorney for Ireland; Sir Richard St-George, then Norroy; Mr Hackwell, the Queen's Solicitor; Mr Camden, then Clarendieu; myself, and some others: Of these, the Lord Treasurer, Sir Robert Cotton, Mr Camden, and myself, had been of the Original Foundation (7).'

What Persons his admission into this Society brought him acquainted with, will be seen in the Catalogue of some of their names, viz. Thomas Earl of Dorset; Henry Earl of Northampton; Fitz-Allen, the last Earl of Arundel; William Lord Burleigh; the Herberts, Earls of Pembroke; the learned Lord Lumley; Sir Phillip Sidney; Sir Henry Billingsley; Sir Gilbert, and Sir William Dethicke; Sir Henry Fanshaw; Dr Bartholomew Clerk, and Dean Coufins; Sir Walter Cope and Raleigh; Dr Cowell; Francis Thynne, Esq; Lancaster; Mr Glover, Somerset; Hencage, Keeper of the Records; Benefield; Erdswick; Lambert Valence, Esq; Mr Talbot; and Mr John Stowe, &c. (8).

[I] A description of Norfolk, communicated to John Speed, Esq;] The title of Speed's book is The theatre of Great Britain. Mr Archdeacon Nicolson not only suggests that this description of Norfolk by Sir Henry Spelman is a good one, but affirms that his book is the only good one. Sir Henry it appears was a great Encourager of Mr Speed, and furnished him afterwards with notes and collections for the life of one of our Kings, which he printed in 1614, in his History of Great Britain, &c. before which work there appears, among others, a Recommendatory Poem by Sir Henry (9).

[K] One of the Commissioners for determining the unsettled titles to lands and manors in Ireland.] The several Manors and Estates within the Counties of Roscommon, Sligo, Mayo, and Galway, being unsettled as to their titles, K. James I. by Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Second of March, in the fourth Year

(7) A Discourse concerning the original of the four law terms. In the Introduction.

(8) Life of Sir Walter Raleigh by Mr William Oldys, prefixed to the last Edition of his Works in fol. 1735, p. 136.

(9) English Historical library, part 1, pag. 13. edit. 1696. And Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 530. 2d Edit.

(6) Mr Gibson in Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, published in 1698.

times into that kingdom; and, as he discharged his share of the trust with great reputation, so, in the course of it, he must needs feel the advantage of the progress he had already made in searching into the originals of the ancient usages and customs. No wonder then that we find him resolved soon after to push that study. The natural bent of his genius had always apparently lain more this way than to business of any kind. Besides, the occupation of farming, and a country life, in which his love and concern for his family had so long engaged him, contrary to the constitutional turn of his temper, had, for some time, begun to grow exceedingly tedious and irksome to him, and he had met with some remarkable disappointments in it [L]. He therefore determined to live no longer under that restraint, but to pass the remainder of his life amongst books, and in the society of his learned acquaintance. With this resolution, in the year 1612, he sold the stock upon his farms, let out his estate to tenants, quitted the country, and settled in London with his wife and family. He was now in the fiftieth year of his age, and the time he had hitherto passed in his study seems to have been laid out chiefly for his own gratification; though not without being sometimes of service both to his friends and country, but without an eye to any particular great undertaking. He now fixed his choice upon a most useful and important subject, the grounds of the Law from original records [M]. With this design he made it his first business to collect all such books and manuscripts as related to that Article. And with indefatigable diligence he read over the Fathers, Councils, and as many of the historians of the middle age as he could meet with, whether foreign or domestic (b). He had not been long engaged in this study, when he was interrupted, in some measure, by an incidental discourse with his Uncle, Mr Francis Saunders, who complained to him of many crosses and disappointments that he unexpectedly met with in a building he had then in hand upon the Glebe of his Appropriate parsonage at Congham. The Nephew was glad of so favourable an opportunity, and presently took occasion to declare his sentiments freely upon it, which were, that God was not pleased with his Uncle's design, since it tended to the defrauding of the Church; adding moreover some reasons which induced him to think it utterly unlawful to keep Appropriate parsonages in Lay hands. He had the satisfaction to find that what he said, notwithstanding it so nearly touched his Kinsman in point of Interest, had made some impression upon him (i). Wherefore, while he was in a disposition to listen to such arguments, our Author drew up his Thoughts in writing, and sent the paper to Congham. But his Uncle dying upon the same day, August 16, 1613, that the Messenger arrived there, gave occasion to its being printed that year (k) (though without any design of publishing it) (l)

(b) Prefat. ad Archæolog. ubi supra.

(i) See a letter to his Uncle, prefixed to the tract De non temerandis Ecclesiis.

(k) Epilogue to the same tracts, p. 105, 106.

(l) Ibid. in the Appendix, p. 115.

of his reign, did authorize certain Commissioners (among whom our Author was one) by Letters patents to make grants of the said lands and manors to the respective owners. This Commission held several Years, and our Author tells us himself that he was three times in Ireland, twice in the remote Counties, and once in the nearer parts of that Kingdom. Several Letters patents passed under his Majesty's great seal by virtue of the commission for the strengthening of such titles as might otherwise seem defective; and Sir Henry himself intimates that he had been of service to the Owners of those Estates, his Hiberniæ tractum ultimum, propinquiorum tertio ex re lustro aliena, fideique multa credita per annos plures satis (si et mibimet) auspicate sequor. These are his words in the preface to his Glossary, where he expressly intimates, that his attendance on this public affair had been some disadvantage to his private affairs; immediately after which he relates how, grown weary of a country life, he therefore went to settle in London; nor do I see any thing in this preface to ground such an observation upon as is made by Dr Gibson (10), and that in it Sir Henry seems to complain of the like prejudice to his family, occasioned by his attendance on the other commission he was afterwards engaged in, which was to enquire into the oppression of Exalted fees.

(10) In the Life of Sir Henry, ubi supra.

[L] He had met with some remarkable disappointments in it.] This had happened in his purchase of Blackburgh and Wrongey Abbies, mentioned in the text, his right to which was, it seems, about this time, called into question. The case was thus: These two Abbies had been granted and annexed to the Bishopric of Norwich, where Edmund Sclater, being made Bishop 27 of Eliz. made a lease of most of the manors and lands thereof, and amongst them of these two Abbies to the Queen for twenty-nine Years at the lowest rent he might. Queen Elizabeth assigneth this lease to Sir Thomas; he leaseth it to his Lady, afterwards Countess of Southampton; she selleth her term in these Abbies, with the manors and lands belonging to them, to one Fisher, a Skinner in London, by the procurement of one Wrenham her Servant; Fisher entereth and enjoyeth them as undoubtedly his own, leaseth them for twenty-one Years to one Harpley at a great encreased rent. Wrenham dieth without contradicting any thing; his Son, John Wrenham, pretending that Fisher had the grand lease but in trust for his Father, exhibits one bill in Chancery against Fisher; another against his Son, Sir Edward Fisher, as having it from his Father; and a third against Harpley the Underleaser. Lord Chancellor Egerton by a decree declareth Harpley's lease to be good, who thereupon enjoys it quietly, and dieth; his Executrix selleth it to Sir Henry Spelman, and Wrenham exhibits a bill against him. It is true, it does not appear, by any thing here produced, that this Law-suit commenced before Sir Henry's settling in London; but as the same Author [Mr. Jeremy Stephens] afterwards informs us, that by this affair Sir Henry first discerned the Infelicity of meddling with consecrated places, and it will appear presently, that he had been of this opinion for some time before he came to London; thence I have ventured to place it here.

[M] The grounds of the Law from original records.] We have already taken notice, from Sir Henry's own words, that he had some knowledge of the laws and customs of the kingdom then in use before he left Lincoln's-Inn; and there can be no doubt but that knowledge had been continually improved as his Occasions required, especially as we find him afterwards very pathetically regretting the distaste he had to that study in his Youth. But such a general knowledge would not satisfy a mind so curious, and a Judgment so solid, as his appears to have been in all his Writings. These inclined him to search into the reasons and foundations of the law, which he knew were not to be learned but from the customs and histories of our nation in Elder Ages, nor these usages to be traced but by a strict Examination of the most ancient records. Upon this Dr Gibson makes the following remark: It is very much, says he, to the disadvantage of the law, that they, who by their abilities are best qualified to improve the knowledge of it from original records, are so much taken up with the business of their profession, that they have little time to bestow upon such enquiries. As, on the other hand, Men who are born to leisure and Estates, however inclinable they may be to the polite parts of learning, do seldom care to engage in a study which, at first sight, seems to be so rough and tedious; but it was the Happiness of Sir Henry Spelman (and much more of the English nation) that he had both time and inclination to it, I mean to examine the ancient laws and monuments, not only of our own, but also of most other Northern kingdoms.

with

with the title De non temerandis Ecclesiis. The meeting of the Society of Antiquaries, having been discontinued for twenty years, was revived in 1614 by Sir Henry, together with some others, particularly such as had been of the old Society. Upon this occasion our Author wrote A discourse concerning the original of the four Law terms of the year [N]. And an unforeseen accident gave occasion to the reprinting and publishing his tract De non temerandis Ecclesiis in 1615, 8vo [O]. About the same time he wrote an Apology for this treatise

(N) A discourse concerning the original of the four Law terms. Upon the revival of the Society of Antiquaries, Sir Henry says (11), 'at their first meeting several rules for their government and limitation being drawn up, and Mr Hackwell chosen their Register and Con-vocator (it is his expression) of their Assemblies for the present, they agreed upon two questions for the next meeting, and so supping together, departed. One of the questions was touching the original of the terms, about which, as being obscure and generally mistaken, I bestowed, says he, some extraordinary pains, that coming short of others in understanding, I might equal them, if I could, in diligence. But notwithstanding one of their rules was, that they should neither meddle with matters of state, nor of religion, yet before their next meeting, they had notice that his Majesty took a little dislike of their Society, not being informed that they had resolved to decline all state affairs. Hereupon they forbore to meet again; and so, says Sir Henry, all our labours lost. But mine lying by me, and having been often desired of me by some of my friends, I thought good, upon a review and augmentation, to let creep abroad in the form you see it, wishing it might be rectified by some better judgment.' As to the Society of Antiquaries, it appears by a manuscript supposed to be printed in 1619 (12), that there was a design to revive it, and some attempts made to procure a grant from King James I. to constitute it a royal corporation, under the title of King James's Academy or College of Honour, but it came to nothing. What Mr Hearne observes (13) of them, is seen by what is related of them in Remark [H] to be very just, that this Society, in the time of Queen Elizabeth and King James, was made up of right learned Antiquaries, who as they undertook great matters, so their performances were answerable to their undertakings; and had they gone on, there is no doubt but we had had a complete account published of the most material things in our history and antiquities. What follows is an account of their dissolution, which, because it is something different from that of Sir Henry, we shall give it in Mr Hearne's own words, thus. 'But it being suggested, that the said Society would be prejudicial to certain great and learned bodies, for that reason the members thought fit to break it off. Nor were there wanting powerful men that proved enemies to them, and among other things they were pleased to alledge, that some of the Society were persons not only disaffected to, but really of a quite different persuasion from the Church of England (14).'

[O] Occasion to the reprinting and publishing his tract De non temerandis Ecclesiis in 1615 The whole title runs thus: De non temerandis Ecclesiis, Churches not to be violated. A Tract of the rights and respects due unto Churches, written to a Gentleman who, having an appropriate Parsonage, employed the Church to profane Uses, and left the Parishioners uncertainly provided of divine Service in a parish there adjoining. There can be no better proof of Sir Henry's Sincerity in this advice to his Uncle, than that which he gave from his own practice. For, being possessed of the Impropriation of Middleton in Norfolk, he took a Course to dispose of it for the Augmentation of the Vicarage, and also some additions to Congham which lies near it. He never put up any of the rent to his own private uses, but disposed of it by the assistance of Mr Thorowgood, a neighbouring Clergyman, to whom he gave a power to augment the Vicar's portion, which was carefully performed; and, having a surplussage in his hands, he waited an opportunity to purchase the Appropriation of Congham, to be added to the Minister there, where himself was Lord and Patron. The same Author informs us likewise, that, while Sir Henry Spelman lived, there came some unto him, almost every term at London, to consult him how they might legally restore and dispose of their Impropriations to the benefit of the Church; and there wanted not others that thanked him for his book, promising they would never purchase any appropriate parsonages to augment their Estates. Sir Ralph Hare, in particular, who was an intimate friend to Sir Henry, upon reading this book offered to restore a good Parsonage (the only one he had in his Estate) which he presently performed, and, procuring a licence from the King, gave the perpetual advowson to St John's college in Cambridge. Then follows the particular instance of Sir Roger Townsend, and several others, to which Dr Gibson has added (15) what was then, in 1695, a late benefaction of this kind, made by Mrs Anne Saville, then living, and daughter of John Saville of Medley, Esq; which Lands purchased the rectory of Ardwick in the West riding of Yorkshire, for which she gave about 900l. and settled it in the hands of Trustees for the use of the Church for ever, and this from a generous and pious principle, upon the reading of Sir Henry Spelman's treatise De non temerandis Ecclesiis. Mr Jeremy Stephens takes notice of several colleges in Oxford, who, being possessed of Impropriations, had taken a Course, by lessening their fines upon renewal of the leases, to reserve a good portion of their tythe Corn from their tenants, thereby to increase the Vicar's maintenance. But it may be questioned whether this was occasioned by what Sir Henry Spelman had said, so much as by K. James I's letter, sent for this purpose, to the Universities in 1603 (16), and more particularly to the disposition shewn by K. Charles I. to restore all such Impropriations to the Church as were then in possession of the Crown. The occasion of reprinting and publishing this piece in 1615 is declared by the Printer, who, having printed it for the Author above two Years before, with no Intent to have it published, found it to be lately printed in Scotland (contrary, says he, both to the Author's and my Expectation) and dedicated by another man to the Bishops and Clergy there, which I suppose, continues he, had the Author known, or once misdoubted the sequel, instead of De non temerandis Ecclesiis, he would have put another title, De non temerandis Scriptis alienis; wherefore I have, in the right as well of the Author as of myself, to whom the right of the sole printing belonged, caused it to be reprinted (17). As Our Author omits no opportunity of doing honour to his Countryman Lord Chief Justice Coke, so in this tract [page 98. Edit. Ox. 1668.] he inserts a passage from the second part of his reports (18), where that Great Lawyer observes, that it is recorded in history, that there were, amongst others, two grievous persecutions; the one under Dioclesian, the other under Julian named the Apostata; for it is recorded, that the one of them (19) intending to have rooted out all Professors and Preachers of the Word of God, occidit omnes presbyteros. But, this notwithstanding, religion flourished, for sanguis Martyrum est semen Ecclesiae, the blood of the Martyrs is the seed of the Church, and this was a cruel and grievous persecution. But the persecution under the other (20) was more grievous and dangerous, quia, as the history saith, ipsum occidit presbyterium, he destroyed the very order of priesthood, for he robbed the church and spoiled spiritual persons of their revenues, and took all things from them whereof they should live. And upon this, in a short time ensued great ignorance of true religion and the service of God, and thereby great decay of Christian profession. For none will apply themselves or their sons, or any other that they have in charge, to the study of Divinity, when after long and painful study, they shall have nothing whereupon to live. The contrast between these two persecutions has been lately set in the strongest light by Mr Warburton (21), now Bishop of Gloucester, who endeavours to shew, that the defeat of the less violent attempts of Julian to ruin Christianity was a more signal attestation of its divine original, than that of turning the blood of the Martyrs into the seed of the Church, since the disappointments that the Apostate continually met with in the pursuit of that, as he calls it, more artful method, threw him upon the daring and desperate attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem, which gave occasion to the most remarkable miracle that had been wrought since the destruction of that

(11) In the Introduction to this Discourse.

(12) Intituled an Address for a Corporation Royal to be founded, under the title of King James his Academy, or College of Honour, in the possession of the late Mr Vertue, the Engraver.

(13) In his Preface to A Collection of curious Discourses, written by eminent Antiquaries upon several heads in our English Antiquities. Oxford 1720, 8vo.

(14) See a further account of this Society in Abp Whiggist's Article.

(15) From his own Edition of Camden's Britannia, p. 724, and Edit. 1722, p. 848.

(16) That to Oxford is dated from Windsor, the 10th of July, 1603.

(17) The Scotch man made it his pretence, that he did it purely to encourage Sir Henry to print his larger work.

(18) L'Evesque de Winchester's case, fol. 44. b.

(19) Dioclesian. See Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. 7. cap. 3. and Nicephorus, lib. 7. cap. 3.

(20) Julian. See Theod. Hist. lib. 3. cap. 6. and Niceph. lib. 10. cap. 5.

(21) In a treatise intituled Julian: or A Discourse concerning the Earthquake and fiery Eruption which defeated that Emperor's attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem.

treatise [P]; and a Latin Epistle to Mr Richard Carew, who had expressed his dissatisfaction at some particulars in that piece [Q]. And it was either this or the next Year that, in the prosecution of the same subject, he struck a remarkable Circle in the map of Norfolk [R], with a view

that Temple in the defence of the Christian religion. However, in justice to this writer it ought to be observed, that as he declares he has taken more pains than any writer had before him to prove Julian's defeat to be a miracle, so he acknowledges it was not the general opinion. We gladly also take this first opportunity of doing another piece of Justice to this Bishop, by declaring, that since the letter at the end of Dr Joseph Smith's Article was printed off, where it is said, that his Lordship [then Mr Warburton] was introduced by the Bishop of Salisbury to Sir Thomas Hanmer, we have been since shewn a passage in his Lordship's preface to his edition of Shakespeare, where he asserts that Sir Thomas was introduced to him as a poor Critic, which, if we had then known, should have been inserted as a marginal note to the aforesaid letter of Sir Thomas Hanmer. However, the difference between them may be easily adjusted. We need only suppose (what is highly probable) that the ceremonial was conducted by the Bishop of Salisbury with such a respectful address to both, that each might well enough look upon the introduction to be made to himself.

[P] He wrote an Apology for this treatise. This was written in answer to some reflections upon his book De non temerandis Ecclesiis by an unknown Author, who had called upon Sir Henry for a further explanation and defence of his opinion concerning the right to the set portion or quantum of Tythes, as also with respect to such Parsonages as have Vicarages well endowed. Both those articles Sir Henry excuses himself from entering into at present. Though he had declared in the Epilogue to that work, that he then designed to shew his mind further, particularly on these two passages, having already spoke to both of them in his larger work of Tythes, to which he had referred in an advertisement before this De non temerandis Ecclesiis. In the Appendix to the second edition of which book, written about the same year with this Apology, he observes 'that the argument had many adversaries, not only of the Laity, but of the Churchmen themselves. All were not pleased with this form of maintenance, others not satisfied how it is due. Some take Scripture in one sense, some in another. Thus he that cometh upon the stage is the object and subject of every man's opinion. To satisfy all I labour not, says he, but to the worthier sort I would perform what I could. To these latter sort, some of whom had objected to his application of the 12th verse of the 83d Psalm only to the sanctified things of the Jews, which they said were spoken of all the houses and cities in general, he had given his reason et fidei et facti, which because it had satisfied them, he printed it in this Appendix.' The Author, to whom the Apology now under consideration is directed, was, it seems, displeased with him for paying so much respect to Churches, and particularly for applying the word Ecclesia to a material Church, urging that the term belongs to an assembly or congregation: this Sir Henry takes notice of in his Glossary, under the article Ecclesia, producing some instances of the use of that word in ancient Authors, to defend his acceptance of it.

[Q] A Latin Epistle to Mr Carew. That Gentleman had objected to Sir Henry's arguments against Impropriations, that the Clergy themselves [in the Bishops] had consented to it in passing the Act of the 27th year of Henry VIII; to which he answers in this Epistle, that in the first place he could not but agree with Baronius, who in his answer to Cardinal Ascham, had maintained, that the Church had no power to ordain any thing against itself, Ecclesiam nihil posse in se statuere h. e. in suam perniciem cum Baronio Ascanio Cardinali respondente in sententiam iniero. However, he endeavoured to prove that it was his opinion the Bishops did not consent in that Act to the taking away of parochial tythes, which was not the intent of the Act. Mihi autem videtur cum de abolendis monasteriis cogitaret Senatus ille Consultus (an. 27 Henrici Octavi) nihil etiam tunc in animo habuisse de tollendis parochianis decimis prædiorum, sed de his tantum egisse, quæ ipsis cænobiiis inhærebant. Et si quis id in cornu haberet fæni, latuisse hoc opinor sanctos Patres, qui Concilio aderant. In illo enim Actu ne verbum quidem de parochianis decimis, nec de Ecclesiis prædiorum parochialibus, sed nec de ipsis quas vocant appropriatis.

Cum vero in vulgus jam exisset Actus ille Parliamentarius, reperintque omnia demoliri et vi eripi, e Jurisconsultorum prodiit interpretatione ut præda hoc etiam in casses Regios redigeretur: Partita ergo Ea demum inter regni Nobiles, necessario tandem habitum est, ut subalternis corroboraretur legibus.

[R] He struck a remarkable Circle in the map of Norfolk.

This is in the eighth chapter of his History of Sacrilege, where he tells us he described with a pair of compasses, in the map of Norfolk, a circle of twelve miles in the semidiameter, according to the scale of the map, placing the center about the chief seat of the Yelvertons. Within this circle and the borders of it were inclosed the mansion-houses of about twenty-four families of gentlemen, and the site of as many monasteries, all standing together at the time of the dissolution. He then observed, that the gentlemen's seats continued at that day in their own families and names. But the monasteries had flung out their owners, with their names and families (all of them save two) thrice at least, and some of them four, five, or six times, not only by failure of issue or ordinary sale, but very often by grievous accidents and misfortunes. He observed yet further, that though the seats of these monasteries were in the fattest and choicest places of all that part of the country (for our ancestors, says he, like Abel, offered the best unto God,) yet it hath not happened, that any of them, to my knowledge, or any other in all this country, hath been the permanent habitation of any family of note; but, like desolate places, left to the Farmers and Husbandmen. No man almost adventuring to build or dwell upon them, for dread of infelicity that pursueth them. Among the Abbies contained in this remarkable circle, are those of Blackborough and Wrongey, the lease of which was purchased by Sir Henry, and it is not improbable that purchase gave occasion to this his so uncommon a curiosity. What makes it still more credible is, that about the time of drawing it, there seems to have been a hearing of his cause before my Lord Chancellor. For after Wrenham had exhibited a bill against him, as is mentioned in Remark [L], the suit proceeded to a hearing between Wrenham and the Fishers, when the Chancellor decreed it against the Fishers, and all claiming under them. This explains an expression of Sir Henry, in his Epistle to Mr Carew, written in 1615. Otti desiderio captus Londinum veni pace vero mihi videbar exoptatissima fruiturus, qua Musarum limina ex voto delibarem. Sed Eu! nova in me rerum tempestas, nova licetium moles inopinata proruit, qua luctantem adhuc varieque agitatum nescio quousque detinuerit: Poetæ autem illud teneo, Dabit Deus his quos finem. Here he alludes to the two contrary decrees of Lord Chancellor Egerton; by the first Sir Henry was encouraged to purchase this lease, which was taken from him by the last. Yet his fortune was still harder afterwards by the next decree. For the Lord Chancellor Egerton going out of his place, is succeeded by Sir Francis Bacon, who reverseth the former decree, and decreed it back again to Sir Edward Fisher; and by another decree giveth to him Sir Henry Spelman's lease, without calling or hearing Sir Henry. This, it must be owned, was singularly unlucky, to lose his lease in consequence of a decree made in favour of it. But the matter did not end here: Wrenham complaineth in a petition to King James, and taxeth the Lord Chancellor Bacon with corruption and injustice. The King himself peruseth all the proceedings, and approveth the Lord Bacon's decree; and Wrenham is censured for his scandal to lose his ears in the pillory, &c. A parliament followeth in the nineteenth year of King James; both Wrenham and Sir Henry Spelman severally complain there. It is found that the Lord Chancellor Bacon had, for these decrees, of Sir Edward Fisher a suit of hangings of eighty-nine pounds. The Lord Chancellor for this, among other such crimes, is deposed. The Bishop of Lincoln is set in his room. The suits are again in agitation before him, between Wrenham and Fisher; and Sir Henry Spelman, by a petition to the King, obtaineth a review of the proceedings against him, upon which a recompence is given him by a decree against Sir Edward Fisher. The Bishop of Lincoln is removed by King Charles I, and the Lord Coventry made Lord Keeper, by a view of shewing the unhappiness that attended the Lay Possessors of Abbey Lands (m). In 1621, an Apology for Archbishop Abbot, touching the death of Peter Hawkins the Keeper, wounded in the Park of Bramsil, July 24, came into the hands of Sir Henry on the 28th of October, and he wrote an answer to it on the 19th, wherein he endeavours to shew, that the Archbishop not only contracted an irregularity by that Act, but also intimates, that he could not be effectually reinstated without some extraordinary form of a new consecration (n) [S]. All this while he continued in the eager pursuit of his grand Inquiry into the foundation of our laws. The chief discouragement he found in these studies was the vast number of obsolete words which were hard to be understood, and yet are so important, that the drift and meaning of the whole sentence depends upon them. However he went forward, and whenever he met with any such word, he set it down in its proper order, with a distinct reference to the place, till by degrees he had collected a variety of instances, and, by comparing the several passages where the same word occurred, he was able to give a tolerable conjecture of the true signification of it. After he had made a considerable collection of this kind, and observed how by this means the reading of the old historians became every day more easy, he began to digest his materials, and from the several quotations to draw a judgment of the strict acceptation of each word in the respective ages when it was used. But, though a number of instances gave him good satisfaction as to the words or terms, yet, finding that many of our laws since the conquest were taken from the constitutions of the Saxons, and that many obsolete terms in our Latin historians are (m) An Account of it is printed at the end of his History of Sacrilege, p. 243, et seqq.

(n) This is in Reliquiæ Spelmanianæ by Mr Gibbon, who has also inserted the letters and instruments relating to the killing of Hawkins by the Archbishop.

by whom the other differences are at last compounded, and the grand lease divided into many parcels. Wrenham, that raised this tempest, is never the richer by it, but liveth a Projector. Sir Edward Fisher, of 8000 l. (as Bedon, his servant, protesteth) spent in the suit, is consumed, and not to be seen of every man. Sir Henry Spelman, a great Loser, and not beholden to Fortune; yet happy in this, that he is out of the briars; but especially in this, that he hereby first discerned the infelicity of consecrated places.

[S] An Answer to the Apology for Abbot.] Our Author's zeal for the sacred honour of the Church flames out no where with so much warmth, as in this piece. He produces several canons which absolutely forbid hunting to the clergy, and particularly the use of the cross-bow (used by the Archbishop in this action,) 'that deadly engine, says he, which imagineth mischief as a law, whose force a man cannot mitigate, as in other weapons, and is properly numbered among the instruments of war, and therefore by a multitude of canons prohibited to clergymen.' He observes, likewise, that the use of this engine has not the advantage of exercise common to all others, since every limb and feature in the body, even the eye itself, the minutest of all others, is kept absolutely without any motion at all. He likewise takes notice, that Archbishop Abbot must needs have been very unskilful in handling the cross-bow, otherwise this misfortune could not have happened to him, as appeared by the situation of Hawkins with respect to him, and the deer; which he takes to be an aggravating circumstance in the offence. The Apology having alledged the Charta de Foresta in the Archbishop's favour, our Author very tartly, in his Reply, observes, that the Charta de Foresta is Clevo lachrymabile nomen; for the first breach that ever was made on the freedom of Clergymen, and which gave passage to all that followed, arose from the occasion of Clergymen's hunting in Forests, which Henry II, greatly discontented with, never rested till, by assent of the Pope's Legate, Hugo Petreleonis, he obtained a law, in the twenty-first year of his reign, ann. 1157, to convene them before secular Judges, and there to punish them. The statute of Richard II. had been likewise alledged by the Apologist, which only forbids persons not possessed of 10 l. per ann. from keeping a greyhound, and thence concludes, that Clergymen of that worth are not excluded, and consequently may legally hunt, at least, with greyhounds. In consequence of this argument, Sir Henry distinguishes three faculties in the person of a Bishop; 1. his spiritual function, wherein he is a Bishop; 2. his legal ability, wherein he is a Layman, and has liberty to contract; 3. his temporal dignity, wherein he is a Baron and Peer, and possesseth their privileges. Hence it appears what portion the Church had in the Bishops, what the Commonwealth, and what the King. When the King granted temporal lands, they take them as Lay-Barons do; yet they could not use them otherwise than might consist with their spiritual function. Hence notwithstanding they are not forbid, if possessed of 10 l. per ann. to keep a greyhound by the statute law, yet they are forbid to hunt by the canon law. The Apologist had further urged an ancient record, whereby the Bishop of Rochester, at his death, was to render the Archbishop of Canterbury his kennel of hounds as a mortuary, whereof, as he was credibly informed, the law taketh notice for the King sede vacante under the name of muta canum, or mulçura. For the Record, says King Harry, that relateth, &c. I must, says Sir Henry (as it is in the law,) demand oyer of the record, we shall otherwise spend many words in vain: but that dogs should be given for a mortuary, is against all likelihood; for a mortuary is an offering given by him that dieth unto the Church, in recompence of his tythes forgotten; and it is a plain text, Deut. xxviii. 18. Non offeres mercedem prostibuli nec pretium canis in domo Domini. But if there be no other words to signify a kennel of hounds, than muta canum and mulçura, the exposition may be doubtful, though it comes really near it. Frederic II, Emperor, in the prologue to his second book De venatione, speaking of a hawk's mew, says, Domicula quæ dicitur muta, following the Italian vulgar, which cometh a mutando, because the hawk doth then change her coat (21); and for the affinity between dogs and hawks, it may be κατακρησικως, transferred to a dog-kennel. But all that may have dogs, may not use them; as I may have a coat of cloth of gold, but not wear it, notwithstanding the statute of Apparel. Besides, religious persons were in ancient times driven to keep dog-kennels for the King's hounds. For Rad. Niger in Ann.—saith, that King Henry II. Abbatēs Hippodromos & canum Custodes fecit. Lastly, whereas the Apologist would justify the Archbishop from the practice of his Predecessors, especially Cramer and Whitgift, and more particularly the latter of these, who, says he, killed twenty bucks in Lord Cobham's park, near Canterbury, in one Journey, using hounds, greyhounds, or his bow at his pleasure, although he never shot well. Sir Henry very alertly replies, that this argument only proves the offence to be grown inveterate, and therefore God had now sent this misfortune to remind them of it. After all, he concludes, that the case of that reverend and most worthy person deserved commiseration and most tender handling, for who can prevent such unexpected casualties? Yet may the consequence prove so mischievous, both to himself, and those that are to receive their consecration from him, as of necessity it must be carefully lookt into, and provided for. And because, says he, we are fallen into a case, wherein perhaps some extraordinary consecration may be required, I will relate two which I have met with. The first is of Eadmer, a monk of Canterbury in the time of Henry I, who being elected to be Bishop of St Andrew's in Scotland, then in the diocese of York, was consecrated by taking the Staff from the Altar, which had been laid solemnly thereon; and William Wallaston, the good Bishop of Worcester, both resigned his Bishopric, by laying the Staff thereof upon the Shrine of St Edward the Confessor, by the agreement of a Council holden under Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, in ann. 1095, and in like manner received the same from thence in the presence of King William, Lanfranc, and many others; if we may believe Matthew Paris * not without a miracle.

(21) Sir Henry refers to this passage under the words Muta Canem in his Glossary.

* In anno 1095.

of Saxon original, he despaired of accomplishing his design for want of understanding that language; at least he was certain, that the knowledge of it must needs lead him to a clearer interpretation of many obscure passages, and enable him, throughout the whole work, to deliver his opinion with greater perspicuity and certainty. This language was not to be learned at that time without great difficulty; little assistance was to be expected in that age upon the subject of a language which few people regarded [T]. However he set about the task, and made himself a tolerable master of it. And thus, after he had made large collections, and acquired a pretty good knowledge of the Saxon tongue, he resolved to go on with his undertaking. But his modesty not suffering him to rely upon his own judgment, he printed one or two sheets by way of specimen about the year 1621 (o). These he communicated to his friends to have their opinion of his design. And he was encouraged in it by the most learned persons of that age; at home, by Mr Camden, Archbishop Usher, Bishop Williams, then Lord Keeper, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr Selden; abroad, by Peireskius, Rigaltius, Salmassius, and others. He was likewise assisted in it by Cowel, Skene, and Lydia at home; and abroad by Bignonius, Meursius, and Lindenbrogius; whose favours he gratefully acknowledges. Upon these encouragements he prepared part of it for the press, and offered it to Mr. Bill the King's Printer. He was very moderate in his demands, desiring only five pounds in consideration of his labour, and that sum too to be paid him in books: but the Bookseller refusing to give that small rate for the copy, he ventured to print part of it, to the end of the letter L, at his own charge (p). This he published in 1626, under the title of Archæologus, &c. [U]. In 1627, he compiled a history of the civil affairs of the kingdom from the conquest to Magna Charta, taken from our best historians, and generally set down in their own words [W]; and the following year he was very active

(o) Among the friends who encouraged him, on seeing this specimen, he mentions Bishop Williams, Johannem Lincolniensem antistitem, Magistram Sigilli Custodem, Prefectum ad Archæolog. and this Bishop was made Lord Keeper of the great seal in 1621.

(p) Answer to Petit's Jani Anglorum facies nova, by Dr. Brady, p. 229.

(22) In his Life of our Author, ubi supra.

(23) Brother to Alexand. Nowel, the famous Dean of St Paul's. Ath. Oxon. V. 1. col. 185. It came at last into the hands of Sheldon, and thence into the Bodleian library, whence Somner made use of it in compiling his Saxon Dictionary.

(24) In his Description of Cornwall.

(25) This dedication being omitted in the editions of 1664 and 1687, we thought proper, with Mr Gibson, to preserve it, as a mark of our Author's modesty and love of truth.

[T] Few people then regarded the Saxon Language.] The Bishop of London tells us (22); that Sir Henry had neither the directions of grammar or dictionary, as we, says he, at this day are accommodated with, both very accurate in their kinds. By which he must mean, that Sir Henry had not so good helps in this kind, as were to be had at the time of writing his Life by Mr Gibson. For it is certain, and could not but be well known to that writer, who was so great a proficient in the Saxon language, that something of this kind had been wrote in Sir Henry's time, as particularly a Vocabularium Saxonicum, or A Saxon English Dictionary, by Laurence Nowel (23), and could have hardly escaped the diligence with which Sir Henry applied to this Study. For though this manuscript, which was written in 1567, lay in private hands in the time of Sir Henry Spelman, yet the author, Mr Nowel, must have come to his knowledge, as he was Tutor to the famous William Lambard in the Saxon language, and particularly because Mr Camden (24), our Author's old acquaintance, in his Britannia, the last edition of which by himself was published in 1607, mentions this Laurence Nowel, and says, that he was a man of good note for his singular learning, and was the first in our age that brought into use again and revived the language of our Ancestors, the Saxon, which through disuse lay forlorn and buried in oblivion. It is true, it is not hence certain that this manuscript did ever come to the knowledge of Sir Henry Spelman; neither, I presume, did Mr Gibson mean to take upon him to assert, it did not, notwithstanding his words seem to imply so much; and for that reason it is, that the above stricture is made upon them, to prevent the Reader of them from being led thereby into too hasty a conclusion. The remark which Mr Gibson makes afterwards, though I think, says he, Sir Henry never perfectly conquered it [the Saxon tongue], may undoubtedly be depended upon, and is closed with a very pertinent and just observation, that yet under so many great inconveniencies, it is a greater wonder, that he attained so good a knowledge in it, than that he did not make himself absolute master of it.

[U] He published under the title of Archæologus.] In an advertisement prefixed to the book, he gives the reason of his chusing this title rather than Glossarium, as we commonly call it: a glossary, strictly speaking, being no more than a bare explication of words, whereas this treats more especially of things, and contains entire discourses, and dissertations upon several heads. Before this edition is the following remarkable dedication:

Deo, Ecclesie, Literarum Republice
Sub protestatione de addendo, retrahendo, corrigendo, poliendo,
Prout opus fuerit, et consultius videbitur,
Deo clementissime annuente,
HENRICUS SPELMANNUS
Omni supplex humilitate, D. D. (25).

Mr Gibson tells us why Sir Henry went no farther than the letter L, is not known, nor, says he, has Sir Henry so much as hinted the cause of it, either in his Preface, or in any part of his works, as we know of. M. du Fresne, who very much laments that he did not publish the second part himself, fancies that his design of publishing the English Councils, might be the occasion of his breaking off in the middle of his Glossary; and it has been affirmed by others, that he stopt at the letter M, because he had said something under Magna Charta and Maximum Consilium, that his friends were afraid might give offence. This opinion the Bishop of London, Dr Gibson, agrees with, and observes further, that it was not a season to speak freely, either of the prerogative of the King, or the liberty of the subject, both which would, upon many occasions, fall in his way. Yet after all, the true reason why Sir Henry went no further in the impression, was very plainly hinted by him (though not in any of his works) to Sir William Dugdale afterwards, who about the year 1637 acquainted him, that many learned men were very desirous to see the second part published, and requested of him to gratify the world with the work intire. Upon which Sir Henry shewed him the second part, as also the improvements which he had made in the first, which was interleaved with blank leaves, wherein he had added and altered much, as also in the second part in manuscript; but withal told him the discouragements he had met with in publishing the first part, mentioned in the text; and indeed so little was the work regarded at its first coming out, as the printer Bill had rightly presaged, that eleven years after, the greatest part of the impression remained unfold, till in the year 1637 two bookfellers, viz. Stephens and Meredith, took it off his hands. Upon his death all his papers came into the hands of his eldest son, Sir John Spelman, a gentleman who had sufficient abilities to complete what his father had begun, if death had not prevented him. After the restoration of King Charles II, Archbishop Sheldon and Lord Chancellor Hyde inquired of Sir William Dugdale what became of the second part of the Glossary, or whether it was ever finished. He told them, that it was finished by the Author, and that the copy was in the hands of Mr Charles Spelman, grandson to Sir Henry. They expressed their desire that it might be printed, and that he would prevail upon Mr Spelman to do it, which he did, and Mr Spelman offered it to the Bookfellers; but finding they would give nothing for the copy, and not being willing to do it at his own expence, the two Lords procured a good number of subscriptions, and referred it to Sir William Dugdale to agree with the Printer to perform the work, who willingly undertook the management of that part.

[W] A History of the Conquest, &c.] The manuscript in the Bodleian library is intituled Codex legum veterum et statutorum Regni Angliæ quæ ab ingressu Gulielmi usque ad annum nonum Henrici III. edita sunt. h. e. ante primum statutum omnium impressorum in libris Juridicis quod Magna Charta appellatur ab Edwardo I. confirmata. Evaris monumentis, authoribus, manuscriptis, et antiquis paginis concinnatum. Opera et studio Hen. Spelman, collecta Ann. Dom. 1627, with the Imprimatur of Sir John Bramston, active in inquiring into the oppression of exacted fees; upon which occasion he wrote his treatise De sepultura (q), or of Burial fees [X]. He had been appointed, by the recommendation

(q) It was published in 1640. Mr J. A. tells us it was only two leaves, but Mr Gibson rightly observes it was five sheets in 4to.

(27) April 25, 1628.

July 7, 1640. Many of these instruments are printed in the second volume of the Councils, and it has been since printed by Dr David Wilkins, at the end of his edition of the Saxon Laws.

[X] Upon which occasion he wrote his treatise De sepultura. The particular fact that immediately gave occasion to it, was this. A complaint was brought before the Commissioners, of a Churchman, since deceased, and his Clerk, that came together to the house of a person in their parish, then newly dead, and speaking with the executors, would not suffer the body to be brought out of the house till he had 14 l. paid to him and the parish-officers, according to the bill of particulars then shewed unto them; nor could the executors compound with them for any abatement more than 10 s. in the Clerk's share, and paid them thereupon 13 l. 10 s. We here see several such corrupt practices of the Clergy in those times in extorting their fees, which our Author has not spared to censure very severely. He shews, from the Canon-law, that the Clergy had no claim to any money, either for the grave, or for the office of burial. For this he alledges seven different Councils, where it is declared, 1. To be a vice, and a vice of Covetousness; a bad custom that may be said to be most irreligious, as a selling of the Church; a cause of joy to the Parson when men die, a reaping of commodity out of the carcasses of the dead, and the sorrow of the living. 2. A discourtesy to the dead by him that must die, a selling of earth by him that is earth, a selling of that is none of his own, a selling of what was given freely to give freely, a denying of burial. 3. A thing too horrible, that bringeth the portion of Gibazi upon the offender, that is, the brand of Simony, as the Glossary expounds it; a Curse, an uncleanness, and cause of separation from common Society. And, lastly, as maladies are the most grievous and contagious that continue longest, so in these Councils the Fathers conclude this to be so much the more grievous, by how much the longer it hath continued, and declare it to be abolenda consuetudinis perversitas, the perversity of a custom that must be abolished. He then proceeds to give the sum of their censure, which is, 1. That nothing be exacted, or required for any sepulture; which words the Glossary declares to comprehend the ground or place of burial, and the ministry of the Priest or Parson about the same: and in some of the Councils it is particularly so expressed. 2. That all customs for such taking, are evil, impious, and void. 3. That the offence in taking is Simony. 4. That the cognizance thereof belongeth to the Bishop of the place. 5. That gifts of piety for the use of the Church may notwithstanding be taken. 6. That none shall be buried in the body of the Church. He distinguishes ground into three kinds, 1. Locus purus, secular ground, never used in burial, for which a fee may be taken; 2. Locus religiosus, when once any corpse has been buried in it, after which, by the Canons, nothing may be taken for burial. Some such places, says he, I suppose are about this city, adjoining to Churchyards for enlarging thereof: and some of them, for which the Owners do take a yearly rent of the parish that useth it, let it unto them to sow dead men's carcasses in, as they were to sow corn, and as though the carcasses would grow, like the Fable of Cadinus, and bring them a crop to pay the rent with: this the Canons do merely forbid, as doth also the Civil law and law of humanity, the Fathers, the Councils, and St Jerome, in the case of Ephrem. For my own part, continues he, I take it to be a kind of usury, to let that for money, whereof the hirer can make no kind of profit. 3. Locus sacratus, is that which is settled by the Donor upon God and the Church, as Churches and Churchyards, the fee simple of which is in nabibus and abeyance. He then proceeds to shew several instances of the exaction of these fees, as follows. Give me leave, says he, to present unto you what I find in a Vestry constitution, lately made (26), and subscribed by the Churchwardens, with twenty-three more of the assembly, confirmed by the Bishop, approved by his Chancellor, declared to be a laudable custom of that parish, and in testimony thereof, entered as a solemn Act in the principal registry of the Lord Bishop of the diocese, and finally ratified with the Chancellor's hand and seal of office, I may say, vidi pudetque vi-

dere (27). Whosoever will be buried in the chancel shall pay to the Parson as shall be agreed . . . for interring the corpse. In the isles of the chancel. To the Churchwardens for the ground, 2 s. 8 d. To the Parson for interring the corpse, 6 s. 8 d. In the body of the Church, 20 s. To the Parson, &c. 6 s. 8 d. In the Churchyard. To the Parson, 26 s. 8 d. and the same for every child under seven years. These if coffined, if uncoffined, 2 s. 4 d. each. All these double to every stranger. In another parish I find 6 s. 8 d. to the Parson for the duty of burial in the Church, when himself doth it, not, but his Curate, who for his pains, by the same certificate, 10 s. besides other, 10 s. for a sermon, though there be none. Upon this Sir Henry thus exclaims. The grave is the only inheritance that we are certainly born to, the inheritance which our grandmother hath left to descend to us in gavelkind among all her children; shall one enter and hold another out, and drive him to pay a fine pro adeunda hereditate, as they say in the Feudal Law, or pro ingressu habendo, as we now say in the Common Law? Is our tenure base, like a Copy-hold, ad voluntatem Domini, or not rather noble by frank almoigne, free from all payments and services? And how do the dead rest from their labours, if they be taxed with payments? how go they to their grave in peace, if they pay for their peace? laborat are alieno qui debito tenetur; and his peace is not worth thanks, if he must pay for it; he payeth for his peace, if he payeth for the place where his peace cannot otherwise be had; he payeth for his rest, if he may not enjoy it without payment; he payeth for his inheritance, if he cannot enter into it without paying a fine pro ingressu, his inheritance settled upon him by the great charter, terram dedit filiis hominum, a royal gift, but as it is used, male collocatum, ill distributed; the poor man, alas! hath nothing of all this but the grave, and may not now have that, unless he pay for it. Well, to whom should he pay? reason answers, if to any, to the Owners of the land; true; but the Owner of the soil was the founder of the Church, and he, out of piety and charity, gave the Church freely for prayer, the Churchyard freely for burial, absque allo tenemento, without any rent, any service, any reservation; nor could he if he would have done otherwise, for the Canons would not suffer him; not, though he were the absolute Owner, yet if he had reserved but a pepper-corn out of a grave, it had been not only void, but execrable. A pepper-corn? what talk we of a pepper-corn? no ground in the kingdom is now sold so dear as a grave, that poor little Cabinet, that is not commonly above six feet long, and a foot and a half in breadth, where is no room to stir either hand or foot, and the roof (as St Bernard says) laid so low, as it toucheth the nose: this silly cabinet is sometimes in the Churchyard sold to the priestman for 16 d. sometimes for 2 s. 8 d. sometimes 3 s. sometimes 6 s. In the Church it is at 10 s. 20 s. 40 s. 3 l. 4 l. 5 l. yea 10 l.; and yet the purchaser has no assurance of it, but is constrained to hold ad voluntatem Domini, or is a tenant for seven or ten years, within which term, he is sometimes cast out, and another put into his room; no writ of quare ejecit infra terminum lieth for him. Shall I tell what I was ashamed to hear. A grave or burying place, let to farm at 20 s. a year, the rent duly paid for divers years, and being then behind, the Parson threatened to uncase the corpse, by pulling down the monument, if he were not satisfied, and shame was so far from him, as he spared not to defend it even before the Commissioners; to whom it was testified, that another had paid 40 l. for one grave in ten years, by 10 l. at a time; a strange thing to me, what to others I know not: but I suppose cinclutis non exaudita Cethegis, the oldest living has not heard the like. Is it not time that his Majesty should do as he doth? that, like Josias, he should reform the Temple, the House of God? God be blessed, that put it into his heart, and grant him well to finish the work in hand, being so noble, so pious, and so full of necessity. He observes, that the Clergy grounded themselves much upon a law of Canutus the Dane, cited by Mr Fox, which would be a very good voucher, if true; but Mr Fox, he shews, has given a wrong translation of that law in these words. It is meet and right that no funeral money be given for opening the earth; therefore if any body or corpse be carried from his own parish unto another, tion of Bishop (afterwards Archbishop) Laud; one of the Commissioners for that purpose, and their power extended to all the Courts and Offices of England. To this business he gave his constant attendance for many years with great integrity as well as application; and the Government was so sensible of his good services, that the Council procured his Majesty's writ of Privy seal for three hundred pounds to be presented to him, not as a full recompence (for so they declared) but only as an occasional remembrance, till they should have an opportunity of doing something for him, that might be a more suitable consideration for his diligence in that and other public affairs. In reality, this Attendance obliged him to neglect his own private affairs, to the great prejudice of his family; and his eldest Son, Sir John Spelman, represented to the Privy Council, how much his Father's estate had suffered by it, appealing, for a proof of his great pains therein, to the knowledge of several of their Lordships, to the Journals of that commission, and to his papers and collections relating to the same (r). In the mean time Sir Henry spared no pains in carrying on and improving his Glossary; and before that work was quite finished he entered upon another, which was The History of the English Councils. To this he was particularly encouraged by Dr George Abbot and Dr William Laud, successively Archbishops of Canterbury, and above all by the most learned Primate of Armagh, Archbishop Usher. He was likewise much incited in this design by what he had heard from Dr Matthew Wren, first Bishop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, who told him, that Dr Andrews, the then late Bishop of Winchester, had been reflecting with great concern upon the diligence of the Germans, French, Italians, and other nations, in publishing the histories and decrees of their respective synods, whilst the English, who had greater plenty of evidences, both in Ecclesiastical and Civil affairs, than any of their neighbours, had not so much as attempted any thing of that kind. Upon this occasion he desired Dr Wren, that, for the honour of our religion and the service of our nation, he would think of such an undertaking; and, lest it should prove over tedious for any single hand, to engage a competent number of persons of sufficient Learning and Judgment to assist in the work. That thereupon he [Dr Wren] promised to consider of it; and had proceeded in it, but that the Bishop excused him, upon an assurance that Sir Henry Spelman was engaged in the same design. Sir Henry, having been told this passage by the Bishop of Norwich, did with great modesty express his concern at taking the work out of much abler hands: but, since it had happened so, he did not any longer look upon it as a matter of choice whether he should go forward or no, but thought himself bound in justice to make the best satisfaction he was able, for depriving the Church of the joint labours of so many learned men (s). As soon as he had digested the materials into some form, he communicated the manuscript to Archbishop Abbot a little before the death of that Prelate [Y], who earnestly desired him to prepare the work for the press

another, the money of the burial shall be due to his own parish Church, whereas the sense is: It is just that the soul-shot, or money given for praying for the soul, be always paid at the opening of the grave, and if the corpse be buried elsewhere than in its own parish, yet let the soul-shot be paid to the Church to which it belongeth. Hence it appears how this grave silver, or money for graves, grew up to be taken. It was first given for praying for souls, and such like; but that being abolished, and given to the King, the Parson, it seemeth, taketh it for the grave: and to say what I think, do now take that which was given for praying for the soul, under their fee for their office of burying the corpse, and those for the grave besides; for they take them both. After all, he asserts the Parson's right to a fee in the following words. Somewhat, says he, doubtless, may be due to the Parson upon the burial of the dead; for why else should the Canons provide; that the bodies of those which die be not carried to burial out of their parishes, lest the Priest should thereby lose what is due unto him; and the Canon ad Apostolicum approves of godly and laudable customs, these are not usually defined, but according as devotion hath begotten them in any parish. My drift is only to shew, that they must not be those now in use, to take money for the grave, or office of burial; for those cannot be said to be godly and laudable customs, since so many Canons have declared them to be vicious, impious, injurious, irreligious, too too horrible, and the more grievous by their longer custom and continuance, and therefore damneth and annulleth them by express words, how ancient and how general soever they be; yet laudable customs are due, such as this, that for every one that dies there, so much as hath usually been given unto the Parson or the Church. This it is will hold water. But, I fear me, none of our Parsons can maintain it in this form. It cannot be a mortuary, for that is provided for by express statute of the twelfth year of Henry VIII. c. 6. turning them into a certain sum of money, and forbids any thing to be taken otherwise, either for mortuary or corpse. Other laudable customs, 1. for lights in the Church; 2. praying for the soul; the Parson, it may be, doth enjoy it, not mentioning the original, and so it behoveth him to do, lest the King be intitled to it by the statute of superstitious uses. But I say no more. It hath fallen upon me to be an unworthy member of that most noble and most gracious commission of exalted fees and innovated offices, and thereby to have notice by certificate of divers Persons of worth, and chief Parishioners of the greatest parishes in London; yet none of them hitherto, to my remembrance, hath made any such claim, nor know I how they should approve it, if they did. It is hatched of late within this city of London against the Canons of the Church. Upon the whole it is observable; that Sir Henry at last comes to this conclusion; that they may take this money as a custom to be given for the use of the Church, and that is the footing upon which it stands at this day.

[Y] A little before that Prelate's death.] To the first volume of the Councils is prefixed, the following attestation. Attestatio Cl. Viri Edm. Scot. Eq. Aurat. Rev. in Christo Patris Dom. Gulielmi nunc Archiepisc. Cant. Seneschalli Domestici. Memini me adfuisse, quum Cl. Vir D. Hen. Spelman. Eques Aurat. (28) duos libros manuscriptos D. Georgio Abbot nuper Cant. Archiep. volvendos obtulerit, quorum titulus fuit Decreta et Consilia Ecclesiarum Orbis Britannici. Multas horas in eis legendis impendebat Rev. Pater, et frequenter, me audiente, magnis encomiis honestabat. Presensque fui, quum sermo D. Henricum Spelmanum hortaretur, ut limatos ab Ipso et ultimam manum passos in lucem exire sineret, nonnihil enim in eis impolitum adhuc erat et imperfectum, et seposita mora, quanta poterat festinatione prælo daret, totum enim opus magni æstimandum duxit, quodque publico et posteritati donare jure suo videbatur meruisse. Ita testatur Ed. Scot. 13 Feb. 1633. Here we find the Archbishop both saw and approved this work before it was finished; and hence, by a passage in another work of Sir Henry, it seems not improbable that this happened in 1632. In which year he was at Lambeth with the Archbishop, as appears from his History and Fate of Sacrilege, where he tells us (29), that he dined with the Archbishop at Lambeth, Nov. 13, 1632, and had much discourse with him. Hence, by the bye, likewise, we see the Archbishop either knew nothing of Sir Henry's answer to the

(r) Gibbon's life of Sir Henry, ubi supra.

(s) Prefat. ad Concilia, Tom. 1.

(28) This is a mistake, for Sir Henry's title of honour was miles.

(29) P. 287, edit. 1698. 8vo.

press as soon as possible, that the public might speedily be possessed of such a valuable treasure. Thus encouraged, he proceeded, and branched his undertaking into three parts, alligning an entire volume to each division: (1) From the first plantation of Christianity to the coming in of the Conqueror in 1066; (2) From the Norman conquest to the casting off the Pope's Supremacy by K. Henry VIII. (3) The History of the Reformed English Church from Henry VIII. to his own time. Every one of these Sir Henry expressly and separately declares that he had completed; and the first volume, containing the first of these heads, was published by him in 1639 [Z], about two years before his death, with his own annotations upon the more difficult places. He had been brought, about a year or two before, into the acquaintance of Mr (afterwards Sir William) Dugdale, who then, at the request of several learned men, informed him, that the second part of his Glossary was much desired by them; whereupon he shewed Mr Dugdale the second part, as also the improvements which he had made in the first; but withal told him the discouragements he had met with in publishing that which we have already mentioned. However, Messrs Stephens and Meredith, two booksellers in St Paul's church-yard, did this year, 1677, purchase the remainder of the impression then lying upon his hands (t). In prosecuting that work [the Glossary] he went to Cambridge, in order to consult several Saxon manuscripts in that University, especially some in the public Library. In this business the Principal Librarian, Mr Abraham Wheloc of Clarehall, very readily gave him all the assistance that lay in his power (u). This gentleman was Professor likewise of Arabic, and knew so much at least then of the Saxon, that he could read it to Sir Henry, which was of great use to him, being now almost fourscore years old; and he was the more sensible of this help, as he met with very few that were capable of doing even so

(t) Our Author's life, by Mr. J. A. It is not improbable, that these Booksellers were induced to make this purchase by a promise of the Copy of his Councils, which I find was printed by them.

(u) Wheloc's edition of Bede's history in Saxon, in the Preface.

the Apology abovementioned, or else had excused it. The forementioned conjecture is favoured by what Mr Wood relates (30), that it was in 1633 that Jeremy Stephens was joined with Sir Henry to assist in compiling the first volume of his Councils.

[Z] He published the first volume in 1639.] The drift of the Author's design in this work is seen in the Dedication, which is addressed to King Charles I, to whom he expresses his great dislike of the humour that then began to run high against the hierarchy. In opposition to which, he takes notice how much the Bishops and Clergy had been always honoured and esteemed, from the first foundation of the English monarchy by Alfred, and shews that the Clergy, in the reigns of the Saxon Kings, sat with the Lay-Judges in all the courts, from the King's Council in his palace, to the Hundred-Courts. He observes, that the Conqueror (who first introduced the slavish part of Feudal Tenures) though he promised not to diminish the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, yet the ancient immunities of the Church began to be attainted under him and the rest of the Norman race; that Henry II. absolutely cut the sinews of it in the Council of Clarendon, by enacting, among other things, that the Clergy should answer to the Court of King's Bench what was done, to use his own words, Justo licet haud felici tamen auspicio, ex illo enim die usque ad nostra tempora in sequentibus plerisque Parliamentis coevertetur aequaliter res Ecclesiae. But that they were still employed in all the highest offices of the kingdom. That of them there had been seven Regents, and twelve chief Justiciaries, at a time when that office was superior to all others in honour and extent of Jurisdiction, holding the precedency of the King's Council, and comprehending the several posts of Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Master of the Wardrobe, and several branches of the Lord High Chancellor, and Treasurer of England. That there had been of the Clergy a hundred and sixty Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal, eighty Lord Treasurers, all the Keepers of the Privy Seal, and Masters of the Rolls, to the twenty-sixth year of Henry VIII, and a great number of the itinerant Judges to the time of Edward III. In the thirty-ninth of whose reign, he observes, that the Lord Chancellor, Treasurer of the Privy Seal, Master of the Rolls, ten Masters in Chancery, Chief Baron, Lord Steward, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Clerk of the Privy Seal, Treasurer of the Household, Master of the Wardrobe, the Puisne Barons of the Exchequer, the Treasurer of Aquitain, as also of Calais and Ireland, were all Clergymen. He afterwards takes notice, that the authority of the Ecclesiastical Law had always prevailed in England, not by virtue of the Papal Power, against whose usurpations the Clergy had often asserted their liberty; that thus these laws being often purged from the Roman leaven, were at last intirely freed from the Yoke by Henry VIII, ann. 25, by the third of Edward VI, and by the first of Queen Elizabeth; and if that part of the regal authority hath hitherto slept, or been too lukewarmly put in execution, it is a part, says he, of your Majesty's royal power and wisdom to define it as may be requisite, and put the finishing hand to that affair. Aurem mihi vellit Cynthius; non defuerunt autem qui residuos vellicare palmites aggressi sunt et integrum Ecclesiae jurisdictionem sic impetere, ut Excessa cruce (Ecclesiae simbolo) e Corona Regia, emblema seculi solum radiaret Lilium; there have been those amongst us, who have not spared to deny the King's supremacy ecclesiastical, and attempted to deprive the Crown of that Jewel, cobibuit hoc molimen Princeps Optima Regina Eliz. ann. 39, et alias; oppressitque Pater vester Prudentissimus Jacobus Rex, qui neutrum e sororibus columnis arcam et Coronam regni sui sustententibus violari passus est aut temerari; florentes autem ambas pariter, pariter ambas simul exercitio Regio vestro porrexit, uti acceperat, patrocinio, sub quo laeta et quiescens Anglicana Ecclesia, posthabitis tum externorum quam Indigenarum calumniis, hodie orat, et ovet, precor, in perpetuum, Pia Humilis, et Sincera. In the Preface, our Author honestly tells us, that in such a confusion of thoughts and papers, he had omitted the accounts of some Synods, which he had ready by him; that he had received observations from many learned persons, after the press was gone too far, to have them inserted; and that, particularly, the learned Primate of Armagh had communicated his animadversions upon the whole volume. To which purpose the late Bishop of London informs us, that he had seen among Sir Henry's papers, the remarks of Salmasius and De Laet, but could not tell where the rest were to be found. Out of these, and the corrections and additions that Sir Henry had made, he resolved to publish an Appendix to this first Tome, but probably was prevented by death. However, to incline the reader to a favourable interpretation of the omissions and imperfections of his work, he desires him to consider, that most of his materials were fetched from manuscripts, of which indeed there were great numbers, both in the universities, and in other parts of the kingdom, but being neglected by the generality of scholars, they lay in great confusion, and were in great measure useless, either to his, or any other, design. As it is, he confesses it would have been impossible for him to finish it without the assistance of his own son, and Mr Jeremiah Stephens. Of the first of these, we have him speaking at large in the conclusion of this article; but as to Mr Stephens, to whom our Author left the care of some of his papers, it may not be amiss to observe in this place, that he was bred at Brazen-nose College in Oxford, and had the rectory of Quinton in 1621, and five years afterwards that of Wotton, both in Northamptonshire, conferred upon him by King Charles, and Archbishop Laud procured him a Prebend in the Church of Lincoln (31), for his assisting in the publication of the first volume of the Councils; and Sir Henry does, in effect, recommend him for preparing the second and third volume, as a person every way qualified to complete the design. Sir Henry's words are: Quo autem auspicio in lucem prodibunt (me jam sane propemodum exhausto) secundus et tertius Tomus, haud ausim polliceri, nisi illos vir dilectus et bono natus publico Jeremias Stephens typis curaverit mandandos, cujus opera primus hic Tomus (me adhuc tantum non invito) in lucem prodit.

(31) Wood informs us it was the Prebend of Biggleswade in that Church. Aih. Ox. Vol. II. col. 341.

(w) Mr Wheloc tells us he was first recommended to Sir Henry by his eldest Son. Hæres me huic muneri commendaverit. Ibid.

(x) Mr Wheloc tells us it was first signified to him by the Rev. Mr Thorowgood, which we the rather take notice of, as that Divine had the disposal of the profits of the improper rectory by Sir Henry's desire. See an Account of it in his treatise De non temerandis Ecclesiis.

(y) P. 35, 38.

(z) Vide Spelman. Glossar. Verbo feudum.

(aa) It is the first piece in Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, ubi supra.

much for him. He had himself found the excellent use of that language in the whole course of his studies, and much lamented the neglect of it both at home and abroad, which was so general, that he did not then know one man in the world who perfectly understood it. Hereupon, this same year 1639, he settled a Saxon Lecture in the University of Cambridge [AA], and appointed Mr Wheloc his first Professor (w), allowing him an annual stipend of ten pounds, and presenting him to the Vicarage of Middleton, near Lynn in the county of Norfolk, giving him likewise the improper Rectory of the same (x), both which were intended by him to be settled in perpetuity as an endowment of that Lecture; but this design was defeated. Our Author had likewise at this time an opportunity of displaying his profound knowledge in our old Feudal law, in the great case of Tenures upon the commission of defective titles, argued by all the Judges of Ireland, published, after their resolution, by order of the Lord Deputy Viscount Wentworth this year. It fell out, upon the fourth point of the case, to be affirmed, that Tenures had their original in England before the Norman conquest; and, in pursuit of this assertion, it was concluded, that Feuds were then and there in use. In proof whereof divers laws and charters of the Saxon kings, and some other authorities, were alledged, which being conceived to have cleared the point, it was followed in the report. And therefore it was said that Sir Henry Spelman was mistaken, who in his Glossary (verbo feudum) refers the original of feuds in England to the Norman conquest, to which their corollary (y) adds these words; neither is the bare conjecture of Sir Henry Spelman sufficient to take away the force of those laws (z). Being thus, by way of Voucher, made an Antagonist, as he himself observes, to the reverend opinion of those learned Judges, he humbly desires them to pardon his mistakings where they fall, and to hear without offence what may lead him to his conjectures, which they speak of. To this purpose he published a piece, intituled, The original growth, propagation, and condition of Tenures by knight service in England (aa) [BB], wherein he confirms what he [AA] He settled a Saxon Lecture at Cambridge. As there is no such lecture at present in that University, it will be proper to give some account how so worthy a design came to be defeated. Dr Gibson's account is, that Sir Henry and his eldest son both dying in the compass of two years, and the civil wars breaking forth, and their estates being also sequestered, the family became incapable of accomplishing the design. But we have another account of this matter from Mr Somner, who, in the Dedication to his Dictionarium Saxonico-Latino-Anglicum, takes notice, that when by the death of Mr Wheloc, in 1657, the disposal of that lecture fell to Roger Spelman of Hulm, Esq; eldest son of Sir John, and grandson of the Founder, he had designed to bestow it upon a learned Divine, named Mr Samuel Foster, but that Archbishop Usher recommended [Mr Somner] to the Patron for the stipend of ten pounds, to enable him to prosecute his Dictionary (in which he had then made a considerable progress) which would more improve the Saxon language, than bare Academic Lectures. Mr Spelman, who had not before heard of Mr Somner, being thus informed of his particular merits in the Saxon tongue, was prevailed on to comply with Archbishop Usher's recommendation, which was likewise consented to by Mr Foster; who, upon Mr Somner's application to him, was content to enjoy the living without the lecture. How long the stipend was paid to Mr Somner after he had finished the Dictionary, I know not; but the lecture being thus unfortunately separated from the endowment, was never heard of afterwards. Dr White Kennet (32), in relating this affair, observes, that herein the Prelate [Usher] was, like himself, judicious; for the endowments of public lectures, says he, has often met with this ill success, to make the Readers neglect, and the Hearers despise them: whereas, were the same rewards given on condition of printing those lectures, or publishing some other remains of that Art or Science, men's industry would be greater, and the republic of letters much better served. 'This, continues he, seems to be the intention of the Founder, Sir Henry Spelman, in establishing his lecture, the words of his foundation being to promote the Saxon tongue, either by reading it publicly, or by the edition of Saxon manuscripts and other books.' This writer tells us likewise, that the reason of the thing, and the will of his grandfather, inclined Mr Spelman to comply with the advice of Archbishop Usher. We have seen what this conclusion is grounded upon, viz. a passage in Somner's Dedication of his Dictionary, and another in Wheloc's Preface to Bede; but the reflection herein occasionally raised against the Universities, has no other ground to support it, except the writer's ill-will to those learned Bodies. In the mean time it is observable, that he could not be ignorant, that the case of this lecture of Sir Henry Spelman was, among others, a remarkable exception to his general censure, since what he has turned, at the expences of the Universities in favour of Mr Somner, whose panegyric he was writing, is borrowed from the Preface to Bede, a Saxon book, which Mr Wheloc, the Editor, assures us was undertaken and published in pursuance of Sir Henry Spelman's Will in the foundation of his lecture, to say nothing of Mr Wheloc's appeal in that Preface to Archbishop Usher, who, he there assures us, had actually heard him read lectures upon the Saxon language in the University. Neither can it well be supposed, that though Sir Henry's first and principal intent in this foundation, was to promote the knowledge of our Saxon Antiquities, yet that he had not an eye in the next place to advance the honour and interest of the University; or at least that he judged his design was most secure from being, either dropt, or diverted to other uses, by being committed to the trust of that Community. And I hope I may observe without offence, seeing it is remarkably to the present point, that in the larger work of the Tythes, Sir Henry declares his opinion very warmly against changing that way of support for the Clergy into any other whatsoever, though never so fair seemingly, and promisingly advantageous. And one of the principal reasons he gives for it, is the danger thereby of having that support diminished by degrees, till at last the Clergy would be left with very little, or even no support at all, which he saw would be a sure way of ruining that religion itself, of which they are the Teachers and Professors. Dr Gibson seems to have been sensible of the objections to which Mr Kennet's opinion lay exposed, and therefore gave that aforementioned; and it is certainly much more candid and unexceptionable, and for that reason alone, if he had no other, deserves, in my mind, the greater credit.

(32) Afterwards Bishop of Peterborough.

[BB] The original of Tenures by knight service in England. The particular case that gave occasion for this treatise was, that Lord Dillon, in the county of Mayo, upon inquiry at this time into the title of his Majesty King Charles I. to that county, found there was an Act of State published, commanding all those who had any lands therein by letters patent from the Crown, in pursuance of the commission granted by James I, as abovementioned (33), to produce the letters, or an enrollment thereof, before the Lord Deputy and Council, by a certain day, to the end that they might be secured in the quiet possession of those Estates, in case the said letters were allowed by that board to be good and effectual in law. In pursuance of these orders, several letters patents were produced, and particularly those granted to the Lord Viscount Dillon, which last, upon the perusal and consideration thereof by his Majesty's Council, were thought to be void in law, and therefore it was ordered by the Lord Deputy and Council, that the doubt should be drawn up into a Case, and that Case to be openly argued at the Council board. It was drawn up accordingly in these words: 'King James, by (33) In reman- [K].

com-

he had asserted in his Glossary; but observes, that the mistake was committed by the person that drew the breve for the judge; for that he himself had no where referred the original of feuds in England to the Norman conquest. On the contrary, in speaking of them he said, habentur plurima, quæ huc apprimè conducunt, in Anglo-Saxonum nostrorum legibus, which he still affirmed, and that the passage in his Glossary had been much perverted. It being ‘ commission under the great seal, did authorize certain ‘ Commissioners to grant the manour of Dale, by ‘ letters patents under the great seal of the kingdom,

 ‘ to A. and his Heirs; and there is no direction given
 ‘ in the said commission touching the tenure to be re‘ served.—There are letters patents, by colour of the ‘ said commission, passed unto A. and his Heirs, to ‘ hold by Knight Service, as of his Majesty’s castle of ‘ Dublin.’ Here it was agreed on all hands, that the letters patents were void, as to the tenure; and that the Commissioners had acted beyond their commission, in reserving a mean tenure to the prejudice of the Crown; when they ought, either to have reserved an express tenure by Knight Service in Capite, or have mentioned no tenure at all, but have left the law to imply a tenure in Capite. The question therefore was, whether the deficiency of the tenure did so far affect the grant, as wholly to destroy the letters patents, or whether the letters patents might not be good as to the land, and void only as to the tenure. The case was argued several days by Council on both sides, and was afterwards referred to the Judges, who were required by the Lord Deputy and Council to consider of it, and to return their resolution. But they, upon a private conference, not agreeing in their opinions, it was thought necessary, for the public satisfaction, to have it argued solemnly by them all; which was accordingly done:
 and when it came to be debated, whether the reservation of a tenure, so different from that intended and warranted by the commission, could make void the whole grant, this led them to a more general inquiry, what the reservation of a tenure is to the grant? whether it be part of the grant, and the modus concessio-nis, or whether it be a distinct thing, aliud, from the grant; for (as the printed case represents their opinion,) if the reservation of the tenure, and the grant of the land, be aliud et aliud, two distinct things in the consideration of the whole grant made, and the authority given by the said commission for the making thereof, then the letters patents may be void as to the tenure, and yet good for the grant of the land; but if the reservation of the tenure be incident unto the authority, and inseparably joined with it, and the reservation of the tenure, and the grant of the land, make up but one intire grant, so that the one is a part of the other, and the reservation of the tenure be modus concessio-nis; then the grant of the land reserving a diverse and contrary tenure to that which their [made] authority did warrant them to reserve, is a doing of idem alio modo, and so the whole Act is void. They who pleaded for the validity of the letters patents as to the land, and their being void as to the tenure, urged, among other arguments, that tenures in Capite were brought into England by the conquest; but grants were by the Common Law, and therefore grants being more ancient than tenures, these must of necessity be aliud, from the thing granted: and to prove that these tenures came in with the Conqueror, they cited Mr Selden in his Spicilegium ad Eadmerum, p. 194, where he has that out of Bracton
de acquir. rerum domin. b. 2. forinsecum servitium dicitur regale servitium, quia spectat ad Dominum Regem et non ad alium, et secundum quod in Conquestu fuit adinventum.
 But this argument, and the authority, were both overruled; and it was affirmed, that tenures were not brought into England by the Conqueror, but were common among the Saxons. As to Selden, it was answered, that in that place, he barely recites Bracton’s words, not delivering his own opinion; for in that book cited, p. 170, and in his Titles of Honour, last edition, p. 612, we find he was of another opinion.
 What were the Thani Majores, or Thani Regis, among the Saxons, but the Kings immediate Tenants of lands, which they held by personal service, as of the King’s person by Grand Serjeanty, or Knight’s Service in Capite?
 The land so held, was in those times called Thane-land, as land holden in socage, was called Reve-land, Coke’s Instit. § 117. Sometime after the coming of the Normans, the title of Thane grew out of use, and that of Baron and Barony succeeded for Thane and Thane-land. Hence the true reason of Coke in Lord Crom-well’s Case, p. 81. That every Barony of ancient times was held by Grand Serjeanty. It is true, the possessions of Bishops and Abbots were excepted by the Saxons, and turned into Baronies by the Conqueror, and so their tenure may be said in Conquestu adinventum:

 but Thane lands were held by that tenure before. What was that Trinodia necessitas, which so often occurs in grants of the Saxon Kings, under this form, Excerptis istis tribus, Expeditione, Arcis, & Pontis extruentione (34), but that which was afterwards expressed by salvo forin-secu in Bracton (35)? It is most manifest, that Capite tenures, Tenures by Knight Service, Tenures in socage, Frank almoigne, &c. were frequent in the time of the Saxons: and if we will believe what is cited out of an old French Customary, in a manuscript treatise of the Antiquities of tenures in England (36), many, if not all these tenures, were in use, even in the time of the Britons. There, it is said, the first British King divided Britain into four parts, and gave one part to the Arch-Flamines, to pray for him and his posterity. The second part he gave to his Earls and Nobility, to do him Knight’s Service. The third he divided among Husbandmen, to hold of him in socage. The fourth part he gives to mechanical persons, to hold of him in burgage. But that testimony was waved, there being little certainty or truth in the British Story before the time of Cæsar. Neither did they make use of that, which we are taught by William Rovinge of Alençon in his Preface to the Grand Customary of Normandy, that all these customs (among which are these tenures) were first brought into Normandy out of England by Edward the Confessor. Besides what hath been said, they found feuds, both name and thing, in the laws of these times. Among the laws of Edward the Confessor, cap. 5, where it is thus provided, debent enim universi liberi homines, et secundum fœdum suum et secundum tenementa sua, arma habere, et illa semper in promptu conservare, ad tuitionem regni et servitium dominorum suorum (37). This law was afterwards confirmed by William the Conqueror (38). As these tenures were common in those times, so were all the virtues of them, homage, fealty, socage, relief and wardship for relief, &c. (39). That wardships were then in use, and not brought in by the Normans, as Camden in his Brit-tannica (40), nor by Henry III, as Ranulph Higden in his Polychronicum (not understanding him) had persuaded. Among the privileges granted by Edward the Confessor to the Cinque Ports, that their Heirs shall not be in Ward (41), and in the customs of Kent, which are in Magna Charta of Tottel’s edition, and in Lambard’s Perambulation, there is a rule for the Ward-ship of the Heir in Gavelkind, and that he shall not be married by the Lord; and these customs say of themselves, that they were devant le conquest et en le conquest.
 For the Antiquity of Wardship in England and Scotland, see also Hector Boetius, lib. 11. Buchanan Rerum Scoticarum, lib. 6. and the Laws of Malcolm, 11. which prove the Antiquity of Wardship in Scotland, and therefore in England, before the Norman Conquest; for in those times, it is probable the laws of both nations did not much differ, as for the times after, it appears they did not by comparing their Regiam Ma-jestatem with our Glensvil. Upon these, among other reasons, they did conclude, that upon consideration of the Authority given, and grants thereupon made, the reservation of the tenures cannot be said to be aliud, i. e.
 a separate and distinct thing from the authority of granting the land, but rather concluded within it; and that the reservation of the tenure, though it be not ipsa concessio, the grant itself, yet it is modus concessio-nis, and a part of the grant; and therefore the authority being not pursued in that, the whole grant is void.
 These were the arguments, which our Author has considered severally, both as to the truth and force of them; not strictly confining himself to their reasons and reflections, but taking occasion from thence to draw up a very elaborate treatise of the nature and origin of feuds and tenures; wherein he has clearly shewn, that these tenures, such as were granted in the letters patents by himself and the other Commissioners in Ireland, were not in use before the Conquest, and therefore the grants being made before that time, the tenures must of necessity be aliud from the thing granted, and consequently the Patents were good, as to the lands.

(34) Coke’s 6th Report.

(35) Lib. 2. c. 26. in the 35th year of Edward I.

(36) Selden’s A-nalect. Anglo-Brit. 78.

(37) Lambard’s Archion. p. 35.

(38) Coke’s Instit. sect. 103.

(39) Ib. p. 178.

(40) Selden’s Notes on Fortescue de Laudibus, Leg. Angliæ.

(41) Lambard’s Perambulations of Kent, p. 181. See the laws of K. Canutus, cap. 66. and 69. Of Edward the Confessor, cap. de heterochiis. And from Doomsday book in Coke’s Instit. sect. 103. Camden in Berkshire, and Selden in Eadmer, p. 154.

neither his words, nor his meaning to say, that William the Conqueror first brought in the feuds or military service, in a general sense: but that he brought in the servitudes and grievances of feuds, as wardship, marriage, and such like, which to this day were never known to other nations that are governed by the feudal law. He observes there is a great difference between servitia militaria and servitutes militares. The one noble, heroic, and full of glory, which might not therefore be permitted to any that was not born of free parents, no not to a king's son (as appears in Virgil), wherein our Saxon laws were very cautious, and wanted a soldier's shield to be insigne libertatis. The other not ignoble only and servile, but derived even from very bondage (bb). This seems to have been the last of our Author's performances in his study; and it is an illustrious instance of the vigour both of his spirits and understanding, such as is not ordinarily met with at his years, being then upon the verge of fourscore. He had passed the latter part of his life very agreeably with his son-in-law Sir Ralph Whitfield in Barbican (cc), at whose house he died in 1641, having passed the eightieth year of his age (dd). From this place his corpse was carried with great solemnity, by order of K. Charles, to Westminster Abbey, where it was interred in the South isle, near the door of St Nicholas's chappel, at the foot of the pillar, opposite to the monument of his ancient friend Mr Camden. The late bishop of London gives the following short sketch of his character: 'A gentleman, says he, of great learning, and a hearty promoter and encourager of it. In his temper calm and sedate, and in his writings grave and inoffensive; a true lover of the established church, and a zealous maintainer of her rights and privileges;' to which I will venture to add, that he was not less hearty in wishing well to the rights and liberties of his country in general. The first article of this character, which is taken upon a perusal of his works, will be abundantly confirmed by the general voice of the nation in particular. Since every one that looks into the history of his own country, cannot but observe, from the several quotations from Sir Henry Spelman, that his works have been, and to this day continue to be, a necessary storehouse to every writer of the English history since his time [CC]. How much he had the advancement of learning at heart is seen, as in other instances, so particularly by his foundation of a Saxon lecture at Cambridge, by which he merited the title of being The Reviver and Restorer of that branch of literature; and the encouragement he gave to men of letters, besides what has been already taken notice of in regard to Mr Speed, both in the supplies which he furnished to that collection of records made by Mr Dodsworth relating to the foundation of monasteries in the Northern parts of England, and especially afterwards, when, becoming sensible that those might be improved into a monasticum Anglicanum, lest that design should miscarry by Mr Dodsworth's death, he prevailed with Mr Dugdale to join Mr Dodsworth in so commendable a work, promising to communicate his transcript of foundation-charters belonging to several monasteries in Norfolk and Suffolk, and, for Mr Dugdale's further encouragement, recommended him to Thomas Earl of Arundel, then earl marshal of England, as a person well qualified to serve the King in the office of arms; by means of which recommendation, seconded by Sir Christopher Hatton, Mr Dugdale arrived to a good skill in them, was settled in the Heralds office (ee), which gave him an opportunity to fix in London, and, from the many assistances there, to compile those and the other laborious volumes afterwards published by him. Sir Henry likewise not only first advised Dr Watts (the celebrated editor of Matthew Paris) to the study of Antiquity, but was the principal Author of the Doctor's undertaking a new edition of that valuable historian (ff). His zeal for the honour and interest of the clergy does not stand so much in need of an illustration, as some humanities that were incident to it seem to do of an apology. But, on the other hand, he was so much distinguished by the steadiness of his loyalty both to K. James and K. Charles I, and was so highly in their favour (gg), as might have given room for some persons to think him not so hearty, as he really was, in the cause of liberty, did not that heartiness appear to be a just part of his character from a letter of his to Archbishop Usher, which has been preserved by Dr Richard Parr [DD]. Upon Sir Henry's death, all his papers fell into the hands of his eldest son, Sir John Spelman, after whose decease Sir Ralph Whitfield had them in his possession (bb). In 1647, Mr Jeremiah Stephens, in pursuance of his trust, printed a piece upon tythes, under the following title, Sir Henry Spelman's larger treatise concerning tythes [EE]:

whereunto

[CC] A storehouse to every writer of the English History since his time. We have a late instance of the truth of this observation in Mr Carte's History of England. That Historian makes frequent use of Sir Henry's works; but he seems to have neglected this store, in speaking of the unktion, and rejecting the common opinion, that our Kings were endowed with their ecclesiastical supremacy by virtue of their unktion, he declares, that such a power is inherent to Royalty, which, though true enough, yet is not so much to the purpose of an historian, as what Sir Henry observes, that our Kings actually exercised that authority before the unktion was performed in England, or before King Alfred, viz. in the year 850, whereas Alfred was not crowned at Rome by Pope Leo, who gave him the unktion, till the year 860 (42).

[DD] In a letter preserved by Dr Parr. This letter is dated from Barbican, July 1, 1628 (43), and begins thus: 'I here present your Grace with the first printed Copy of the Petition of Parliament to his Majesty for their ancient rights and liberties, with his Majesty's gracious answer thereto: and by much instance I have got, even in this hour, from Mr Bill, before they are yet become public, and to the laming of the book from whence it is taken.' This shews his zeal to serve his friend, who had desired the petition to be sent. And his zeal for the cause of liberty further appears from another letter [Numb. CXXVIII], dated May 26, the same year, wherein Sir Henry acquaints him, that the House of Commons had admirably evinced the rights of the subject in every part of that petition.

[EE] His larger treatise concerning Tythes. This piece had been long expected, and was much desired in Sir Henry's life-time by his friends, to whom he constantly excused himself (44) upon one account or other. In his Apology for the tract De non temerandis Ecclesiis, he writes thus: 'As to asserting Tythes to be due Jure divino, and his answers, my purpose is not here to meddle with them. They require a more spacious discourse than either that volume admitted, or I now mean to enter into, it being not a question between him and me only, but long controverted by greater Clerks, and left at

this

(bb) The Introduction to this treatise.

(cc) Mr Wheloc, ubi supra, expresses it thus: Quorum [Rad. Whitfield] ætatem suam suavisissimam agebat Heros. That the house was in Barbican, I gather from a letter of Sir Henry's to Archbp Usher, dated from thence in 1628.

(dd) See Remark [B] compared with the expression employed in the entrance of his life: Jam anni bis deni sunt & quod excurrit, ex quo, &c. where he evidently means upwards of twenty years.

(ee) Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 8.

(ff) Watt's preface to his edition of that History. Sir Henry had a MS. of Matthew Paris, which contained several things not then in the printed copies. History of Sacrilege, p. 135.

(gg) He was knighted by K. James I.

(bb) Wheloc's preface to Bede, ubi supra.

(42) Councils, p. 153.

(43) Numb. CXXX.

(44) See the Appendix to De non temerandis Eccles. p. 114. 115. Edit. 1668

whereunto is annexed, An answer to a question of a gentleman of quality, by a reverend and learned divine living in London, concerning the settlement or abolition of tythes by the parliament, which caused him to doubt how to dispose of his son whom he had designed for the ministry; (2) Some animadversions on a late pamphlet called The country's plea against tythes, discovering the ignorant

' this day as questionem vexatam non judicatam. The ' truth is, the course of my argument led me upon it,
' and I therefore produced some arguments tending to
' the maintenance thereof, but referring the point unto
' a greater work (45), and forbearing to deliver myself
' therein without ample, and more laborious examina' tion of so great a controversy (46). But perhaps no' thing had raised the curiosity of his friends (such I mean
' as were inclined to reverence his judgment) more than
' what he had there dropt concerning Tythes, in quoto.
Upon which point, having declared that he could not say the law of nature had determined the set portion of a tenth, he subjoins the following note. ' Yet there
' be diverse natural reasons that commend this number ' (for this purpose) above others.' We have already observed, that he expressed an inclination to have explained the words in this note, had it consisted with his designed brevity in that piece. This therefore appears in the fourteenth chapter of his large work, now before us, which being not a little curious, we shall give the substance of. He sets out with an honest declaration, that in all his inquiries upon this article of tythes, he had never met with any thing concerning this point of limitation to the number ten;
' from the nature of it therefore, says he (47), wanting
' a guide to direct me, I shall walk this way the more ' respectfully. He then proceeds to declare, that in ' his apprehension there are two reasons thereof, one
' mystical, the other political. First, Reason teacheth
' that God should have the best and the chiefest, and ' that is mystically contained in this number ten. For ' it is the number appointed in Scripture, and St Austin
' teacheth, that we do not perfectly understand many ' things there for want of having the mystery of num' bers; and both he and St Jerom observe, that in ' numbers there are great secrets. The number ten is ' said to signify the first and the last, the beginning and
' the ending. It is, finis simplicium et initium composi-
' torum, the first radical number, and the last number
' of single dimension; the number wherewith the pro' gress of numeration, running as it were circularly,
' always endeth and beginneth again: representat,
' saith Bartholomæus, merito ipsum Christum, qui est et
' ALPHA ET OMEGA, PRINCIPIUM ET FINIS. In this,
' and such other respects, it is also said to be like a
' circle, the greatest and the perfectest body in Geo' metry, having neither beginning nor ending, as in ' the attributes of God. Hermes, justly stiled Tref-
' megist, labouring to describe God by the most signi' ficant resemblance that man's wit could attain unto,
' said, God is like an imaginary circle, whose cen' ter is every where, and circumference no where;
' and as the circle or sphere of all forms, is most
' spacious and of the greatest capacity, comprehending
' all other, and itself comprehended of none;
' so the number ten comprehends all numbers, and is ' itself comprehended of none of them; neither is there ' any number beyond it, but that ariseth out of it. It ' is the foot and basis whereon all of them are founded,
' and it containeth not only all dimensions, but, to be ' short, all the reasons of arithmetick, geometry, and ' musick; therefore Philo Judæus saith, they who first ' gave names unto things, seemed to me to have ' named decadem quasi δεκάδα, i. e. capacem àπὸ τῶ δέ-
' καδα, quod capiat et amplectatur omnia genera numerorum
' reliquorum ex numeris collectorum proportione harmoniarum
' rursus et concentuum proprie appellasse. In this manner
' the number ten represents to us (as such things may)
' the nature of God, the most perfect and greatest,
' comprehending all, and comprehended of none, the ' beginning and the ending, yet infinite and without ' beginning or ending. So that the number ten, this ' tribute money in question, hath in all these respects
' the apparent image of God; and therefore let us see ' whether it hath his inscription or not. For sure if it
' hath his image and inscription, it is due unto him
' by his own word, and his own argument. First then;
' the Hebrews and the Greeks express this number by
' ' and ' , the first letter of his greatest, and most essen' tial name. The Romans, and other Western nations,
' by the letter X, which stands always for the name of ' Christ. The arithmetical figures 1 and 0, 1 signifies
' the same that alpha does in Greek, and 0 omega;

VOL. VI. No. 316.

' therefore the figure of the number signifies the first
' and the last, the beginning and the ending; but as the ' cypher 0, in this respect, signifies the end, we must
' mark, that it is a circle, and hath no end; being
' therefore joined to the figure of one, which signifieth
' the beginning, it sheweth unto us, that the beginning
' is without end, and the end itself without beginning
' or end, both infinite, and without any limit. The ' first character in the figure of 10, viz. 1, begetteth
' all numbers, for it is semen numerorum, and is be' gotten of none, so that it is Unus et Omnis, one and
' all, and so the very figures signify in notis Antiquorum,
' according to Valerius Probus and Paulus Diaconus.
' Therefore to conclude, it hath both the image of ' God in signification of his Essence, and the Inscrip' tion of his name in the form of the characters and fi' gures in all languages, and in all nations, after one
' manner or other; so that nature herself had taught
' them, that this part belongeth to God, which by no
' wit, or any learning, can be applied to, or found in ' any other number between one and millions of thou' sands.—God will have such a part as comprehendeth
' all; therefore, as in the sacrifices, he especially did ' require the head and tail, as comprehending all the ' rest; so the laws of our land did anciently reckon
' these parts for all; for that the whole fish-royal be' longs to the King, yet Bracton saith it sufficeth if ' he had the head and tail, for that in these parts the ' whole is implied: and, consequently, when we give
' God the tenth part, we put him in possession of all.
' This number is the number of fulness, and expresseth
' the greatest things; and it has been of old observed,
' that in natural things the tenth is usually the fullest
' and greatest. Vastius insurgens decimæ ruit impetus
' undæ (48), and Valerius (49) Flaccus terms it, decimæ
' tumor ardens undæ. So likewise it is noted by Silius
' Italicus, Lucan (50), and Seneca (51). And this ' observation among the Ancients hath been so noto' rious and remarkable, that they commonly used the ' word Tenth in Latin, to express the greatest things—
' decumanum limitem, decumanam portem ferte fluctus
' ova, as Cicero in Verrem et accipenserum; and for ' the like reasons they used the word decimare for
' chusing and culling out the choicest and principal ' things, as Perrot observeth. And because in the ' procreation of man and other living creatures, the ' number ten is most happy and most effectual, as the ' tenth month in some, and the tenth week in others,
' the Romans admired the secret virtues of this num' ber so superstitiously, as they canonized it among ' their Gods by the name of Decima, as Tertullian and
' Gellius inform us; and for this cause Romulus closed
' the year within the compass of ten months, as the ' time of fulness and perfection. Lastly, therefore, for ' more of this sort of observations, de ratione decima-
' rum et denarii numeri, he refers to Philo (52), and ' concludes with this smart epigram upon the letter X.

' Exprimit antiquis hæc Xium litera scriptis,
' Exprimit et partem quam petit Ille suam.
' Ergo citus Xti, quæ sunt dato, munera, Xto;
' Cæsaris accipiat Cæsar; uterque suum.

' This X of old express'd Christ's holy name,
' And eke the sacred tenth which he doth claim.
' Give then to Christ what's his without delay;
' To Cæsar Cæsar's due; and both their pay.

We have given this reasoning as an instance of a very great weakness in a truly great mind. Whoever considers how full the Canon Law abounds with such flowers, and how much Sir Henry read and admired the sanctity of that law, and the makers of it, and at the same time reflects how much real service and honour his country reaped from his studies in this law, will easily excuse one failing. Besides, we are assured by Mr Stephens (53), that this piece was left imperfect by Sir Henry; and moreover, that he had been plundered of some of the papers: upon which account, he was forced to omit divers additions material to the argument committed to him by the learned Knight.

(48) Ovid. Me-
tamorph. lib. 4.

(49) Id. lib. 14.

(50) Pharf. 5.

(51) In Agam-
emna.

(52) Liber de
congr. eruend.
gratia.

(53) In the De- dedication to Mr Crew and Knightly of Northamptonshire.

mistakes of the authors of it touching the maintenance of the ministry by such means; (3) Animadversions on the Kentish petition, published by Jeremiah Stephens, B. D. according to the appointment and trust of the Author. In this treatise Sir Henry shews the danger of changing tythes for any other way of maintenance, as of a pecuniary stipend, from the alteration in the value of money; and observes, that the change of the laws, which have continued for above a thousand years, and of a right settled by common law, will produce many mischiefs, especially to the crown, in payment of tenths and first-fruits. He likewise takes notice of the peculiar fitness of this way of support above all others, from the Clergy's sharing the same fortune with the people, according to the times of plenty or scarceness. In 1656 came out a piece, intituled Villare Anglicanum, or A view of the towns of England, collected by the appointment, at the charge, and for the use, of that learned antiquary Sir Henry Spelman [FF]. In 1663, the same trustee, Mr Stephens, entered upon the execution of the other part of his trust, and began to print The History of Sacrilege [GG]; but, being forbid to [FF] Villare Anglicanum.] By the title it does not appear, whether our Author had any, or what share he had in this work; but the point is, in some measure, cleared up by Bishop Nickelson, who tells us (54) it was said to be composed by Mr Henry and Mr Dodsworth: though he thinks the greatest part of it was drawn out of the alphabetical tables on the back of the maps in Speed's Theatre of Great Britain.

[GG] The History of Sacrilege was burnt in the fire of London.] Mr Wood tells us, that both the whole Copy, and all the sheets printed off, were then destroyed. That account, it seems, made it generally believed at Oxford that the whole book was irrecoverably lost, till the manuscript given by Bishop Barlow came into the Bodleian library in 1693; not long after which, Mr Gibson, then of Queen's College, upon examining those manuscripts, happened to meet with a part of it among them, which putting him upon a further enquiry, he found other parts in other places, and throwing all together into order, brought the work, as seemed to him, to be pretty intire; and in 1695 printed a kind of plan of it, as we have already mentioned, when he published our Author's posthumous works, amongst which he tells us, this might have appeared, had not the same reason still continued in force, which he had been told by a learned Bishop put a stop to the first attempt for publishing it, still subsisted, since some persons, says he, in the present age would be apt to interpret the mention of their Predecessors in such a manner, and upon such an occasion, as an unpardonable reflection upon their families (55). But three years afterwards, in 1698, it happened, that the copy of the manuscript fell into the hands of (it seems) a less discreet person (56), who resolved to let the world make what use of it they pleased. And, at the same time, to prevent all suspicion of any indirect dealing with Mr Gibson, does him the justice to aver, that he was no way, either by advice or consent, or so much as connivance, privy to the publication of it. The Editor likewise pays another office of respect due, he says, to the ashes of the author, which is, that his rare talents and pen are not to be measured by this one performance; for indeed, says he, this History of Sacrilege seems to be the most abortive of all his posthumous works. This is so amply true, and it is so very rude a draught, that I cannot forbear thinking it might be one, if not the chief reason why Mr Gibson contented himself with giving the general plan of it, by which his Reader might form some idea what the structure would have been, had Sir Henry found leisure to compleat it, or had not Mr Stephens, to whom it was left to perfect and complete, been prevented in the execution of his trust. As it is now printed, the Author having first laid down a general definition of sacrilege, then reckons up the various kinds of it, as to places, persons, and things, and thence enumerating at large the many signal punishments of it in Heathens, Jews, and Christians, in general, proceeds afterwards to the History of England in particular, beginning ann. 996. with Egbert, the third King of Kent from Ethelbert, and so proceeds through the Saxon, and then the Norman race, sufficient to incite the curiosity of Persons of the same turn with the Author to peruse it, without exposing him to the derision of the generality. He gives an account of Edward I's seizing the revenues of the Priories aliens, and the riches of the Monasteries, for the support of his wars, as also the same of Edward III; and afterwards he relates the attempt, together with the defeat of it, upon the lands of those Priories, made by Henry IV, which, he takes notice, was at the time of Wickliff's attempt to introduce a change in the religion. From thence he descends to the actual suppression of those Priories by Henry V, and so to the general dissolution under Henry VIII (57), which, in respect of the rest, (stiled rivers) he calls the ocean of iniquity, and mentioning the calamities that ensued upon that King and his Posterity, he makes this singular remark, that as the Issue of Nebuchadnezzar was extinct, and his kingdom given to another nation the Sixty-Sixth year after he had rifled the Temple of Jerusalem; so about the same period that King Henry VIII. began to sack the Monasteries, with their Churches, was his whole issue extinct, male and female, legitimate and illegitimate, and his kingdom transferred to another Nation. However, that section is not concluded without declaring, that the extinguishment of Henry's issue by the immortally renowned Queen Elizabeth, was a golden period. This affinity dwelt much upon our Author's mind. He takes notice of it, both in his Great work of Tythes, and in the tract De non temerandis Ecclesiis (58), with the same application of it to King James, in these elegant Latin words; Nescio quo fato ut eadem temporis periodo, viz. ann. 68, post ereptas a Nebuchad. et Hen. VIII, res templorum stirps utrisque regia extincta sit, imperium sublatum et ad aliam gentem devolutum. Uterius igitur speremus Cyrum nostrum Jacobum Regem, qui Sceptra dissidentia comescuit, restitutionis etiam munus aliquando aggressurum (59). After relating the fate of the King and Royal Family, he extends his remarks to the principal Agents in that affair, and so to the new Owners of the lands, and to the Lords who promoted and passed the Dissolution Act (60). Whereupon Mr Gibson justly observes, that he is far from affirming that the Persons being concerned in the affair (either as Promoters of the alienation, or Possessors of the lands) was directly the occasion of the calamities that ensued. On the contrary, he declares more than once, that he will not presume to judge, but only relates plain matters of fact, and leaves every man to make his own application. But though he was wise enough not to wade so far out of the depth of human reason, in attempting to convince the understanding by a method liable to unanswerable difficulties; yet his professed design is to incline the will, and govern the actions, by possessing the mind with a fixt belief and persuasion, without such conviction. This is a common weakness, and indeed the bulk of mankind in most things are, and must unavoidably be, governed by these kind of reasonings. In the mean time, it is through this weakness, that the corruptions of the Church of Rome crept in, and took sure hold of the people. And it is owing to the same weakness (inherent to human nature) that in England we are not yet, and perhaps never shall be, purged from a fond belief of the continuance of miracles, even to the third and fourth centuries. An illustrious instance of this has been lately given by a very celebrated Author, who, though purged from the lump, yet retains some crums of the old Leaven. The late Bishop of London, Dr Gibson, likewise has not omitted to push this engine of government, in the case now before us. After he had taken notice, that our Author relates rem gestam only, without making particular applications, he proceeds in these words. 'Though it must be granted, that many of the Instances, and those too well attested, are so terrible in the event, and in the circumstances so surprizing, that no considering person can well pass them over.' The mischief that has formerly, and may still accrue from this method of leading the people by that mixture of enthusiasm, which enters into the composition of every Englishman, has extorted these animadversions. Otherwise it must (if ever) be excusable in the case of restoring tythes to the Church, the right being asserted by so many much better, not to say convincing, arguments. In the last chapter of this History of Sacrilege containing an account of some Monasteries in Norfolk, our Author observes (61), that having

(57) Here he gives a particular detail of the succession to Sherburn castle in Dorsetshire, observing that it was given by King James to Prince Henry, but the King would not suffer Prince Charles to have it because of the ill success. Received from the Lord Keeper, May 9, 1626, p. 128.

(58) In a note at p. 92, fourth Edit. in 1668.

(59) In the History of Sacrilege he takes notice of King James's promise to this purpose in his letters to the Universities, on his first coming to the Crown, in 1603.

(60) Among these are the Bishops, notwithstanding he had elsewhere offered an argument to clear them from any guilt in this matter. See Remark [Q].

(61) P. 262, 263.

(54) In his Historical Library, part 1. p. 13. Edit. 1696.

(55) Mr Stephens made several additions long after Sir Henry's death, as appears in the printed Copy, p. 48. et seqq. p. 129. et 177.

(56) Dr White Kennet, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough. See in his Article, p. 2823. and Remark [L].

to proceed, lest it should give offence to some of the nobility and gentry (ii), the work stuck in the press till the fire of London, when it was burnt. And the second volume of The Councils [HH] being put to the press about the same time, the greatest part of the impression suffered the same fate in that dreadful conflagration (kk). The copy had been put into the hands of Sir William Dugdale by Archbishop Selden and the Lord Chancellor Hyde, after the Restoration of K. Charles II. And those Lords at the same time enquired of Sir William, what became of the second part of the Glossary [II], or whether it was ever finished.

He

(ii) So says Mr Gibson, see Rem. [GG]. But Mr Wood mentions no such hindrance. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. ed. 341.

(kk) Gibson's life of our Author.

having gotten his information privately, many things, no doubt, had been mistaken by his Informers, and therefore he desires, that wherever it so falleth out, his credit may not be engaged on it. I shall therefore take the liberty to mention one notorious mistake, which however, by the account of it, could not well be wilful, and that is, in the Instance of Walsingham Abbey, which, says our Author, was Sir Thomas Gresham's, who died (as was said) suddenly in his kitchen, without Issue male, which is confirmed by Holingshead (62). But what follows, that his daughter and heirs was married to Sir William Read, who had this Abbey, wants correction. For this William Read, who was first husband to Sir Thomas Gresham's wife, had by that Lady Issue William Read, Esq; who was knighted in the beginning of King James's reign, and was heir to his mother, Lady Gresham, whence his son, Sir Thomas Read, became possessed of Osterley-park, and died without Issue, having married Mildred, second daughter of Thomas Cecil Lord Burleigh (63), as is related by our Author.

[HH] The second volume of his Councils.] This, together with the second part of his Glossary, was put, by the direction of Archbishop Selden and Lord Chancellor Hyde, into the hands of Sir William Dugdale, who made considerable additions to it out of the Archbishop's Registers, and the Cottonian Library; inasmuch, that he affirms, in a letter to Mr Spelman, Sir Henry's grandson, that of the two hundred sheets in that book, not above fifty-seven were of his grandfather's collection. And it appears from some papers in the Bodleian Library, under the hands of Sir William Dugdale and Sir Henry Spelman, that the latter had left little more towards the second volume, than hints and references, where the Councils were to be met with. In this edition of 1664, there are abundance of faults, occasioned by the negligence, either of the Copyer, or Corrector, or both. Mr Somner, sensible of this, took great pains in collating the printed copy with many of the original records, and corrected the errors in the margin of his own book (64). This book is now in the library of the Church of Canterbury, and will be a good help, as Mr Gibson observes (65), towards a more accurate edition, as well as those collections of Mr Junius, which were in the possession of the Reverend Mr Jones, Rector of Sunningwell, not far from Oxford. Accordingly, a complete edition of the English Councils was published by Dr David Wilkins, in 1737, in four volumes folio. To which he was further encouraged, doubtless, by what Archdeacon Nicholson observes (66) concerning such an undertaking. 'The truth is, says he, we much want a new edition of that volume [of Sir Henry Spelman,] the greatest part of the impression having been burnt in the Fire of London, so that the book is hardly to be met with, and incorrect as it is, hath ever since borne an immoderate price. I know no work, that would be a greater service to our Church, than an intire History of all the Councils before the Reformation, (for the account of them which we have already, is far from being intire) with the addition of a Third Volume, to contain the public affairs of our reformed Church. The great discoveries of manuscripts, the many observations made by the learned Bishop of Worcester [Dr Stillingfleet], and others upon the constitution of the British and Saxon Churches, and the general approbation that the work must needs meet with, are all of them very good assistances, as well as encouragements to such an undertaking. It is probable, that toward the last part, some assistance may be had from that manuscript of Sir William Dugdale, intitled Papers to be made use of for a Third Volume of Councils, in Musæo Ashmoleano Oxon. Though I fear not so much as the title promifes.'

[II] The second part of his Glossary was published by the care of Sir William Dugdale.] The share that Sir William had in the publication of this second part, has been made the ground of a suspicion, that he inserted many things of his own, which were not in Sir Henry

Spelman's copy, and particularly some passages which tend to the enlargement of the prerogative, in opposition to the liberties of the subject. The objection was raised on occasion of a controversy between Mr Petyt and Dr Brady, about the Antiquity of the Commons in Parliament. The authority of Sir Henry being urged to prove, that there was no such thing as a House of Commons till the time of Henry III. it was agreed on both sides, that this learned Knight was a very competent Judge of that Controversy; that as he had thoroughly studied our Constitution, so he always wrote without partiality or prejudice; and that he was not engaged in a party, nor had any other design, but to publish the truth fairly and honestly, as he found it asserted by the best historians. Upon these grounds his opinion in matters of this nature has ever been thought considerable, and his bare judgment will always be valued, when we can be sure that it is his own. And there can be no doubt but that his assertions under the word Parliamentum, upon which the controversy was raised, are his own, and not an Interpolation by Sir William Dugdale. For the very copy, from which it was printed, is now in the Bodleian Library, in Sir Henry Spelman's own hand-writing, and agrees exactly with the printed book; particularly in the passages under that dispute, they are the same word for word. So far then as that copy goes (for it ends at the word Rieta) it is a certain testimony, that Sir William Dugdale did no more than mark it for the Printer, and transcribe here and there a loose paper. And though the rest of the Copy was lost before it came to the Oxford Library, and so we have not the same authority for the Glossary's being genuine after the letter R; yet it is not likely that Sir William had any more share in these last letters of the alphabet, than he had in any of the rest; for all the parts of such a work must of necessity be carried on at the same time; and therefore the Author could not but leave nearly equal materials for the whole. But what puts it beyond all doubt is, that Dr Brady, who was concerned to prove the second part all genuine, appealed for the truth of this assertion to Sir William Dugdale himself, who was then alive. Moreover, Mr Gibson assures us (67), 'that he had seen a letter from Sir William to Mr Charles Spelman, giving him an account of the great losses which he had sustained by the Fire of London, and the pains he had taken in the publication of the Councils and Glossary: as to the first, he expressly lays claim to the better half of it, as his own work and collection; adding, that if the impression had not perished, in all right and reason he ought to have had a consideration for the same; and also, continues he, for my pains in fitting the copy of the Glossary for the Printer, by marking it for the difference of letter, and introducing and transcribing those loose papers, left by your Grandfather without his directions where they should come in. This is all that he claims as to the Glossary, and if he had had any further share in it, it is likely he would have insisted upon it on this occasion, to convince Mr Spelman more effectually of the good services he had done him in that affair.'

It was necessary to be more particular in this matter, because if it should appear, that Sir William Dugdale had taken the liberty of adding, or altering; every single page would be liable to suspicion, and the whole much weakened: for though he was extremely well versed in our English affairs, yet it must be owned, that Sir Henry Spelman was a better Judge of our ancient Customs and Constitutions, and consequently whatever he delivers as his opinion, will always be allowed a proportionable authority. 'Had he put, says Mr Gibson, his last hand to the second part, the Glossary, as it is now printed together, would have made a much nobler work; but the latter part, in comparison of the other, is jejune and scanty, and every one must see, that it is little more than a collection of materials, out of which he intended to compose such discourses, as he has all along given us in the first part, under the words of greatest import

and

2) In his Chr. 1310.

3) See Sir Tho. Spelman's Art. at the End.

64) Life of Mr N. Somner, by White Kennet, D. D. Oxford 693, p. 39.

65) In his Life of Sir Henry Spelman.

66) In his Historical Library, part 2, p. 36.

(67) In the Life of Sir Henry, ubi supra.

He told them that it was finished by the Author, and that the copy was in the hands of Mr Charles Spelman, Grandson to Sir Henry. They expressed a desire to have it printed, and that he would prevail upon Mr Spelman to do it; but the grandson excusing himself on account of the expence, the two Lords procured a good number of subscriptions, and referred the management of printing it to Sir William Dugdale, and the work was published in 1607, with a dedication to Lord Chancellor Hyde, by Mr Charles Spelman. This part, as was likely, met with a much better reception from the public than had been given to the first; and in some years was become so scarce (ll), that it was thought worth while to print another edition. Our Author also left in manuscript, A scheme of the abbreviations, and such other obsolete forms of writing, as occur in our ancient manuscripts, to facilitate the reading of ancient books and records; and another Of ancient deeds and charters; a third also Of the original of testaments and wills, and of their probate to whom it anciently belonged; a fourth, Of the admiral's jurisdiction and the officers thereof. There was likewise found among his papers, A discourse of the ancient government of England in general, and another of parliaments in particular; and lastly, A catalogue of the places and dwellings of the Archbishops and Bishops of this realm, now or of former times, in which their several owners have ordinary jurisdiction, as of a parcel of their diocese, though they be situate within the precinct of another Bishop's diocese. This appeared to be drawn up in the reign of K. James I, for the use of the then Archbishop of Canterbury (mm). In 1625 there was published in folio, by Mr Edmund Gibson, afterwards Bishop of London, a collection of tracts, intitled The English works of Sir Henry Spelman. This was followed by another collection from the same hand, intitled Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, The Posthumous works of Sir Henry Spelman, Knt. relating to the laws and antiquities of England, published from the original manuscripts in 1698, folio. These two collections were reprinted together in 1723, in one volume folio. In relation to Sir Henry's children, already mentioned, we have only to add, that Mr Wheloc (nn) assures us, the daughter, who was married to Sir Ralph Whitfield, was a Lady of uncommon talents, and every way worthy of her father; of his sons, the youngest, named Clement, being bred to the law, was made a puisne baron of the Exchequer upon the restoration of K. Charles II; and Mr Wood informs us (oo), that he published some pieces relating to the government, besides a large preface to his father's book De non temerandis Ecclesiis [KK]. He died in June, 1679, and was interred in St Dunstan's Church in Fleetstreet, London. Our Author's eldest son, Sir John Spelman, was a gentleman of great learning, inasmuch that we are told (pp), if he had lived, he would have excelled his father, who seems to have taken extraordinary care of his education, and expressly left him the heir of his studies. He was bred at Trinity college in Cambridge, and travelled abroad afterwards for further improvement (qq). It was at his father's request, that he published Alfred's Saxon Psalter, under the title of Psalterium Davidis Latino-Saxonicum vetus in 1640 in 4to (rr). He had great encouragement and assurance of favour from K. Charles I, who, having sent for his father, offered him the mastership of Sutton's hospital, with some other advantages, in consideration of his good services both in church and state: but, after his humble thanks to his Majesty, Sir Henry told him, that he was very old, and had one foot in the grave, and that it would be a much higher obligation, if his Majesty would please to consider his son. Accordingly, very soon after Sir Henry's death, the King sent for Mr Spelman, and immediately conferred on him the honour of knighthood at Whitehall, December 18, 1641 (ss). After the civil war broke out, his Majesty, by a letter under his own hand, commanded him from his house in Norfolk to give his attendance at Oxford, where he was often called to private council (tt), and employed to write several pieces in vindication of the proceedings of the court, among which one was A view of a printed book, intitled Observations upon his Majesty's late answers and epistles, printed at Oxford, 1642, in six sheets 4to (uu). He was the author likewise of another piece, intitled The case of our affairs in law, religion, and other circumstances, briefly examined, and presented to the conscience, printed in 1643, in five

‘ and usefulness. It was my good fortune to find, ‘ among others of his papers, two of these dissertations, De Mareschallo Angliæ, et De Milite.’ Accordingly, he published them in Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ.

[KK] A Preface to De non temerandis Ecclesiis.] Mr Gibson rightly observes (68), that it contains many things relating to Improvements, and several things relating to the Judgments of God upon Sacrilege, which seems to be taken from his Father's History and Fate of Sacrilege; and hence it appears, that Mr Gibson had perused that treatise thoroughly, which makes it still more unaccountable, that he should take no notice of that passage in it, where Sir Henry mentions his being a boy at Winchelsea (69) School. The son, in this Preface, adds another Instance to those of the destruction of the families of Nebuchadnezzar, and Henry VIII, within the fatal period of sixty-eight years; observing, that what the Author notes of Nebuchadnezzar and Henry VIII, is also true of William the Conqueror; for that in the sixty-eighth year after his destroying St Peter's Church at York, which was in his second year, his name is extinct, and his kingdom devolved to another nation, Plantagenet takes his Crown (70).

Mr Spelman lived in great friendship, and was much respected by Dr John Berwick, who upon the dawn of the Restoration, having a correspondence with Chancellor Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, took an opportunity to mention him in one of his letters to that Minister, then in the highest favour with King Charles II, and the Chancellor returned the following answer, in a letter dated February 20, 1660. ‘ I do thank you with all my heart, for giving me an opportunity of sending my service to Clement Spelman, whom I know to be a very worthy person, and whose affection the King is obliged to reward, which he resolves to do. I pray remember my service very kindly to him, and let him know, that I did receive the books long since, with a very great sense of the obligation, and did return my acknowledgments by the last three letters to Dr Ryves, which it seems he never received. I have had froward fortune with respect to Clement Spelman, to whom I heard, a gentleman without any authority from me did very impertinently and absurdly deliver a compliment in my name; and all those ways by which I did, in truth, endeavour to let him know how much I am his servant, have been disappointed.

‘ I pray know of him, whether his father left any advance in the Glossary (71).

(ll) In the preface to the edition in 1687, by J. A. that editor tells us the former impression was quickly bought up, and the book for several years before grown so scarce, as not to be had at any rate.

(mm) It was found in Sir Henry's library, and therefore judged by Mr Gibson to be of his writing. Life of Sir Henry.

(nn) In his preface to Bede, as before.

(oo) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 685.

(pp) In the preface to the Latin translation of the life of Alfred.

(qq) His life of K. Alfred, lib. 3. § 60.

(rr) In a letter to Mr Camden, Sir Henry expresses a great sense of that author's favour, with many expressions of kindness, to his son, in a recommendation given him on his travels into France. Camden's letters, No. 226.

(ss) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 32.

(tt) Mr Obad. Walker intimates, that the King had it in his thoughts to make him Secretary of State. Pref. to Ælfred.

(uu) This was given by Mr Spelman to bishop Barlow, who told Mr Wood of it. Ath. Ox. as before.

(68) P. 24. Edit. 1688.

(69) Upon enquiry, I am assured there is no town in Norfolk of this name; whence it is probably an Error of the press for one of those, whose first syllable is Winch, of which there are many in the county. However, this uncertainty may account for Dr Gibson's silence.

(70) Speed's History of Great Britain, fol. 46.

(71) Life of Dr John Berwick, &c. p. 457. Edit. 1721, 8v

(72) See more of this article in the Supplement, communicated too late for a place here by Edward Spelman, Esq; a gentleman of an ample fortune, and distinguished learning, and great grandson of Clement, the youngest son of Sir Henry.

sheets 4to. But while he was thus attending the affairs of the public, and, when those would give him leave, his own private studies, he was seized with the camp-disease at Brazen-nose college, where he had resided while he was at Oxford, which put an end to his life, July 25, 1644. He was interred in St Mary's, the university church, Archbishop Usher, an intimate acquaintance both of father and son, preaching his funeral sermon by his Majesty's especial order (xxx). He left a manuscript of The life of K. Alfred the great [LL], in English, which was translated into Latin some time after the Restoration by Mr Christopher Wase, superior beadle of the civil law at Oxford, which translation, with notes and cuts by Mr Obadiab Walker, master of University college, was published from the theatre prefs in 1679, folio. The original English was also published from the same prefs by Mr Thomas Hearne in 1709, 8vo (xx).

(xxv) Wood, ubi supra.

(73) See lib. ii. §. 66.

[LL] The Life of King Alfred. It is dedicated to the Prince, afterwards King Charles II, and divided into three books. The Author intended to put some additions by way of Appendix; as particularly the Preface to Ælfred's translation of Gregory's Pastoral, directed to Wicfort, then Bishop of London (72); but as no such thing appeared in the manuscript, Mr Obadiab Walker put it to the end of his Latin translation, as also a pedigree from that King to King Charles II, in two parts; one from Ælfred to Henry II, of the English line; and the other from Henry II, to King James I, of the Scottish line, and thence to King Charles II: of which descent Mr Spelman had taken notice, both in his Dedication to the King, then Prince of Wales, and at the end of his History. Mr Hearne, speaking of these additions by Mr Walker in the Appendix, says (73) he had seen them quoted by some learned men, as being the addition of Sir John Spelman himself. This history occasioned several things to be wrote, and one especially by Anthony Wood, in his Hist. et Antiquat. Univ. Oxon. in defence of the Antiquity of the University of Oxford, which he will have (as well as Mr Hearne) to have been a Nursery for Academical Learning before the time of King Alfred, who, they both say (74) after Mr Camden, was orly the Restorer of it: contrary to what is here largely argued by Sir John Spelman (75), who maintains that Ælfred was not the Restorer (there being no such thing as an University before him) but absolutely the First Founder of it. Our Author struts up his history with these elegant Latin Verses, well worthy of a place here, as follows.

Auctoris ad Ælfredem suam.

Dum Te perpetuo Gens barbara Marte fatigat,
Nec vacat (Armipotens Ælfred) ab hoste manus;
Et dum barbaries (belli comitata furem)
Corripit heu! Sacri quicquid in Orbe fuit;
Jura, Dei cultus, Mores, bona dulcia pacis,
Musæ, Artes, Merces, Te faciente, vigent.
Magne Pater Patriæ Regum Regnique Britanni
Quantus eras, vetitum jam fore scire dolet.
O quam mente capax! O quam virtute coruscus!
Exsuperant nostram quam tua facta fidem!
Culmina summa tenus diadema Nepotibus auctum
Tradis, permodicum quod fuit ante Tibi.
O qui fit (virtute parem quum vix tulit Orbis)
Te mundo tantum delituisse tenus!
Maluit hoc siquidem fatum ignorare Nepotes,
Res potius quam non credere posse tuas.

(73) At the end of his Edition of this history.

(74) See Mr Hearne's long note upon this point at § 34.

(75) He spends almost the greatest part of the third book upon this Argument, from § 20. to § 64. the whole book containing 121 sections.

SPENCER, [Dr JOHN] a learned Divine in the XVIIth Century, was a native of Bocton under Bleane in Kent, where he was baptized October 31, 1630 (a). While an infant, he lost his father, who leaving him in very narrow circumstances, the care and expence of his education was undertaken by an uncle; and being sent to the free-school at Canterbury, he made a very quick proficiency, became King's scholar, and, at the age of fourteen, was recommended by Mr Jackson, then the only Prebendary of that church, to a scholarship of Archbishop Parker's foundation in Corpus-Christi college in Cambridge [A], into which he was admitted on the 25th of March, 1645 (b). He applied himself diligently to his studies, under his Tutor, Mr Richard Kennet [B]; and, having taken both his degrees

(a) Lewis's Antiquities of Feversham, &c. p. 17. edit. 1727. 4to; and Jones's school-feast sermon, p. 17. edit. 1728.

(b) History of Corpus-Christi college in Cambridge, by Rob. Masters, p. 163. Camb. 1753, 4to.

[A] He was recommended by Mr Jackson, &c.] The letter was drawn up in these terms.

To the right worshipfull my reverend good friend,
Richard Love, Doctor in Divinitie, and Master of Benet Colledge in Cambridge. These presents.

Reverend Sir,

This great storme hath so scattered the members of this society, that my poore self hath long been left alone, to the great prejudice of the church, both in domestick and forrein occasions; among others, we have heard, (though not after the wonted legall and loving respect) that there is a Scholar's place voide in your college (to present whereunto you have been pleased to afford the Dean and Prebendaries of this Church the honour and respect.) If so, I cannot but humbly commend to your pious and charitable consideration this Bearer, John Spencer, a King's Schollar in this our Cathedral Schoole; wherein, as he hath bene commendably proficient, so his Parents and Friends are of that worthe and respecte, that they help concurring, may afford him a competencye to traine him up for that he most desyreth. And this I presume the rest of my brethren, if at home, would have subscribed.

Your true Friend and Servant,

C. C. C. Nov. 3,
1644 (1).

Thomas Jackson.

[B] Under his Tutor, Mr. Richard Kennet.] Our Author always retained a great regard for this gentleman. VOL. VI. No. CCCXVII.

man, and not without good reason. In reality his personal worth, though an Antiroyalist, was such as deserves some memorial of it. He was a native of Kent, and educated at the King's School at Canterbury, was admitted a Sizer of Bennet College, 3 Feb. 1636, and nominated to a scholarship belonging to that school by Archbishop Laud, 7 July, 1640, with the character of a studious and towardy young man (2). He took the degree of A. B. soon after, and proceeded to A. M. in 1644, being about that time put into a fellowship upon the ejection of one Tonstall by the Assembly of Divines, when he commenced Tutor, and had Dr Spencer for one of his Pupils. He was Taxer of the University, and one of their Preachers in 1648, but was removed from his fellowship in 1650 for refusing the engagement, telling the Visitors he had always been faithful to the Parliament, and was preferred by them, and is now of the same principles he was, but could not satisfy himself in this particular (3). However, he was restored to his fellowship in 1654, by an Ordinance of Parliament (4). He commenced B. D. the following year, and presented Buxtorf's Hebrew Lexicon and Concordance to the Library of the College, which he probably left upon his institution to the vicarage of East-Hatley in Cambridgeshire; from whence, upon another change of times, he was ejected, by the Bartholomew Act, in 1663. Whereupon his friend Mr Stillingfleet (afterwards Bishop of Worcester, but) then Rector of Sutton in Bedfordshire assisted him in taking a large house in his parish, where having provided a Conformist Teacher, he set up a private school, and had many Gentlemen's sons committed to his care. And so well was he respected by them, that upon his

(2) From the Original, under the Archbishop's seal. Printed in Grey's Answer to Neal's History of the Puritans, Vol. III. p. 147.

(3) Calamy's Account of ejected Ministers, Vol. II. p. 118. and Vol. III. p. 151.

(4) Masters, as before, p. 151. who observes, that Calamy, according to his usual dissingenuity, takes no notice, either of his being put in, or of his being restored, p. 325.

(1) Masters. Hist. of C.C.C.C. as above, in the Append. No. 4.

(c) Viz. That of A. B. in 1648, and A. M. in 1652. Ibid.

in Arts at the regular periods (c), he was chosen Fellow of his college about the year 1655. In this station, the straitness of his fortune still requiring industry to provide a competent support [C], he undertook the instruction of pupils; and, entering into holy orders, he served the cures, first of St Gyles, and then of St Benedict, in Cambridge. These employments put him upon exerting his talents in the pulpit, and he distinguished himself so much there, that, after some time, he was appointed University Preacher. In 1659 he proceeded Bachelor of Divinity; and, as I do not find that he met with any disturbance in the possession of his Fellowship, it is probable that he followed the example of Dr Love, then Master of the College (d), who is said to have acquiesced in most of the measures that were taken during the Usurpation, without any wise approving them [D]. Accordingly, Mr Spencer joined heartily in the general joy at the Restoration, and June 28, 1660, being appointed a Day of Thanksgiving for it, he preached the sermon on that occasion before the University, which was printed the same year at Cambridge in 4to, under the title of The Righteous Ruler. In the same spirit he drew up a Preservative against the malicious attempts of the Nonconformist Fanatics, who, in a periodical paper, entitled Mirabilis annus, printed in 1660, and the two following years, with a design to overturn the newly restored ancient establish-

(d) See the account of him in the article of Abp Tenison.

ment's leaving him, he was connived at in taking the whole charge upon himself, with only his Wife's son for an Usher. He was excellently fitted for this employment, and his death, which happened on the 23d of January, 1670, was accordingly lamented. He was buried in the chancel of Sutton Church, and Mr Stephens, the Minister thereof, preached his funeral sermon, wherein he gave him the character of a moderate man, both in principles and practice, who was generous in his temper, free and communicative in his conversation, and although he did not chuse to conform in all things, yet was a constant attendant upon the public service of the Church. He bore his last sickness, which was a fever, with great patience and submission to the Divine Will; and as his life had been upright, so his end was peace. He was nearly related to Mr Basil Kennet, Vicar of Postling in Kent, the Father of White Kennet, Bishop of Peterborough, and of Basil Kennet, President of Corpus Christi College in Oxford. He left a widow behind him in low circumstances, to whom Dr Spencer was very kind for his sake, having frequently visited her as long as she lived (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 167.

[C] His narrow fortune required industry to provide a support. This is not said with any view of detracting from the just merit of his industry, of which it is certainly no disparagement to suppose it to be quickened by the spur of necessity, arising from the extraordinary crisis of his affairs at this juncture. We have already observed, that his Father leaving him young, and in very narrow circumstances, he was brought up at the expence of an Uncle. But this Uncle, who had kept an exact account of all the disbursements for his education, dying soon after he was chosen Fellow, and in a way of getting his own living, without having cancelled this legal demand upon him, it was made by the Uncle's Sons and Executors in so rigorous a manner, that not being able to raise the money himself, he was forced to communicate his distress to his friends in the Society (among whom was Dr Tenison, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) who generously made a loan, which discharged the debt (6).

(6) Ibid. p. 168. note (k).

[D] He submitted to the Usurpation, without approving it. We have already given one remarkable instance of our Author's conduct, which shews that no change was made in his first friendships to deserving persons, by their differing from him in the subject of Conformity to the Ecclesiastical Establishment. And as this is not the least amiable part of his character, we shall here produce another proof of it in the person of one Mr Thomas Hill, of whom we have the following account. That he was educated at Repton School in Derbyshire, his native country; was sent thence to Bennet College, and admitted a Sizer in September 1645, where after performing the office of Chapel-clerk, and a continuance of four years, he proceeded A. B. But upon the Engagement, which he did not approve, being imposed upon scholars, he chose to leave the University to avoid it, and became Chaplain to the Countess of Chesterfield at Tamworth-Castle. He was ordained by the classical presbytery at Wirksworth in 1652, commenced a Preacher first at Elvaston in Derbyshire, from whence he was called to Orton on the Hill in Leicestershire, where he continued (allowing the fifts to the sequestered Minister, Mr Porter) till the Restoration, when the latter was again put into possession by an Order from the House of Lords. But the small Living of Sbatington in Warwickshire being vacant about that time, he was presented to it by the son of his Patroness abovementioned; which, although the five miles Act and some others soon rendered him incapable of serving personally, yet he got it supplied by another, of whose nonconformity no notice was taken whilst his Patron continued to him the Cornthythes belonging to himself, and all other profits. He removed however to a house of his own at Lee-Grange, near Orton, where he frequently preached to a crowded audience; and by using prudence, gained an opportunity of exercising his ministry, without disturbance; whilst some others were molested, and met with such treatment as discouraged both them and their people. His labours of this kind after his ejection, (which happened when his parts were well ripened and strengthened) were supposed to hasten his death (although otherwise of a firm and healthy constitution) which overtook him about the fiftieth year of his age. In his person he is described of stature somewhat low, with black hair, a graceful countenance and features, seeming indications of the capacity and virtues of his mind; wherein he was distinguished by a profound judgment, and a general knowledge in literature: at his first admission in the College, his skill in the learned languages was superior to most, and afterwards the errors in philosophy, since insisted on by Mr Lock and others, did not escape his observation. Nor was he unacquainted with the Mathematics, although Metaphysics was his favourite study. He was well versed in History in general, and Ecclesiastical Antiquity in particular; and such a thorough knowledge had he of the Scriptures, that in his Sermons (wherein was nothing ordinary, but something always new) he had a mighty felicity in unfolding its more recondite parts, to the no small Entertainment as well as Edification of his Auditors. But his Labours were not confined to the pulpit, for being desirous of doing all the good he could, he also instructed his people privately and personally, which he thought the duty of every Overseer of a flock. He was much respected by his neighbours and many other considerable persons, whether Conformists or Nonconformists, who all agreed in acknowledging his worth, and always paid the greatest deference to his opinion. He never indeed printed any thing himself, but he frequently gave his sentiments upon the writings of others; and so much was he admired for the masculine and unaffected eloquence in his discourses, as well as for his clear and pleasing voice, that he was invited to succeed Mr Blake at Tamworth, which however he thought fit to decline: and so great a contempt had he for the world and its emoluments, that when he was solicited to preach before the Protector, and offered to be recommended to his favour, he refused it. In short, he was a person of true piety, candour, and sincerity; who to an indefatigable industry in his Studies and the business of his Calling, added an universal charity (7).

(7) Calamy, as before, Vol. II. p. 745. and Continuation, Vol. IV. p. 845. Kennet's Histor. Reg. 896, 917.

With this gentleman, who was admitted of Bennet College about the same time with himself, Dr Spencer contracted an early and intimate acquaintance, which, notwithstanding their differing notions about Conformity, continued to the end of Hill's life; as appears by a correspondence of Letters referred to by Calamy, wherein the Doctor expresses a high regard and affection for him: and made him some kind and generous offers, whenever he should have a son fit to send to the University. His charity indeed to Nonconformist ministers, if good and pious men, was, it seems, so extensive, that he, with the learned Dr Henry More, made one of them [Mr Robert Wilson] their Almoner, in this branch of it (8).

(8) Masters. Hist. &c. p. 267.

ment of the church and state, as a scheme which was bringing down God's judgments on the Nation. Dr Spencer's preservative was published under the title of, A discourse concerning prodigies: wherein the vanity of presages by them is reprehended, and their true and proper use asserted and vindicated [E], in 1663, 8vo; and, to complete this view, he added

a further

[E] A Discourse concerning Prodiges, &c. However mouldy with age this vulgar error may be grown at present, so as to have lost every inducement to handle it; yet that was far from being the case, when it was exposed in this piece, by our Author. He declares, that his thoughts were engaged upon the argument by a consideration of the seasonableness thereof. 'We have of late, says he (9), been persuaded by three or four several impressions of books (more than were ever vented in any ethnick or Christian Commonwealth, in a much longer period of time) that England is grown Africa, and presents us every year, since the return of his Majesty, with a new scene of monstrous and strange sights; and all held forth to the people, like black clouds before a storm, the harbingers of some strange and unusual plagues, approaching to the state. And this by Persons (for the Prefaces speak in the plural) pretending an intimacy with Scripture, Fathers, Greek and Latin, Ancient and Modern Writers; an example more justly meriting the public wonder, than any those books contain; but that the nation (like the womb of Rebeckah) carries such striving and contesting parties therein. The Poets (proceeds he) feign the Giants, the Sons of Earth, to have bidden battle to the Gods, and to have perished by a thunderbolt, in the confidence of that attempt; and the Earth, their mother, to revenge the death of her sons, to have brought forth their last sister, Fame. A fable expounded by the excellent Verulam, of unquiet and seditious persons (a kind of Fili Terræ, the creatures of the people, usually envious against their Rulers, and soon weary of the present state of things) who when crushed and ruined in their attempts against the Gods on earth, their rightful Governors, their fall is avenged by a Fama querula et seditiosa (a feminine sedition), popular clamours, libels, odious representations of them to derive upon them the common envy; with which may be numbered the report of strange prodigies or prophecies, giving hopes of some approaching change of affairs: an observation which I am sure will offend none that are studious of that sacred character, Personas quibus est quiet in the land. Here we see the treatises, mentioned above, plainly intimated; but they are expressly named in the body of the work, which he opens with a division of prodigies in general, into signal and penal; after which, entering into particulars, he begins with Comets, as generally thought the most plausible pretenders to the honour of prophetic symbols, especially with regard to public calamities, as the deaths of sovereign Princes, &c. And having shewn this to be a very unsafe pretence, he proceeds to maintain, that it is also a very false one. 'For, says he, there sure have happened many deaths of Princes never honoured with the solemnity of any precedent Comet, or other objects of wonder, and many Comets which never seemed to blait the affairs of the world by any envious and malignant aspect thereupon: Almost four years and a half, continues he, are passed from us since the Nation was first alarmed with the dreadful news of strange sights in heaven and earth, and yet (with all due thankfulness to God be it spoken) never did these three national felicities, PEACE, HEALTH, PLENTY, more bless our habitations in any much longer period of time: so that we have almost seen the ANNUS MIRABILIS happily refused by a SECVLUM MIRABILE (10).'

In pursuing the subject, alluding to the story of Samson, he observes, that it was much more difficult to find out the lock in which the strength of this error lay, than it was, when found, to cut it off (11). To make this discovery is therefore his first and principal task; and, in that inquiry, having, with no ordinary sagacity and insight into human nature, laid open the several weaknesses and foibles therein, which give root to this pernicious weed, he proceeds to shew how abundantly it is watered from the spring of Authority. In which respect he observes, that it may be called the error of the world, having been justified by the united suffrages of Jews, Gentiles, Christians, ancient, modern, learned, and simple. 'As for the Jews, says he, if a good law be any indication of bad manners, we may conclude them not free from the infection of this error. God enjoyed that there should not be found among them any that used divination, or an observer of times (12), 'עֲוֵי, which the LXX renders by τεραθροσκοποι, a regarder of prodigies and strange accidents. And we find them, upon the appearance of armed troops in the air, a little before the approach of Antiochus, praying that the omen might be turned to good (13). However the Heathens were leavened with this fond notion, the very names and titles, Monstra, Offenta, Prodigia, Portenta, whereby they used to express any anomalous instances of nature, are, but too pregnant a demonstration, all of them carrying in their original a promise of foreshewing somewhat future (14). Among these he expressly cites Herodotus (15), Livy (16), Valerius Maximus (17), Plutarch in his Lives (18), Dio Cassius (19), Pliny (20), Tacitus (21), Ammianus Marcell. (22), and affirms it of all the other Historians, Polybius only excepted; and he too, upon the expectations of an encounter with Hannibal, tells us (a matter not usual with him) that every temple was full of signs and prodigies (23): as also of Virgil (24), Lucan (25), Ovid (26), among the Poets. Of the Christians he produces Tertullian, who calls a Vulcano testimonium igni æterni; and St Austin (27), though, to do him right, says he, I find none so express as Origen, who, speaking concerning Comets, tells us, it hath been observed, ἐπι μεγάλαις ταραχαῖς ἐπέστυον, &c. that so often as any eminent changes happen in the earth, such stars have been known to arise; foreshewing the translation of kingdoms, or wars, or whatever may happen of force sufficient for any great commotions here below (28). Among learned, modern Authors, to pass over some of our first Reformers, as Luther, Melancthon, and others, he finds Grotius himself speaking of Comets, Vulcans, and the like, as signs which usually precede great changes of affairs (29). Nay even Machiavel and Pomponatius (the latter an avowed Atheist, and the former generally thought a more fast retainer to Atheism than Superstition) both abetted the observance of prodigies (30). Lastly, as to the simple and common sort of people, Prodigy hath always appeared to them as a word clothed about with Death, and a Comet creates them more solemn thoughts than Hell. With these may be ranked the Compilers of the Sibylline Oracles, whose heads are for the most part so full crammed and stuffed with reading, as to leave no room for common Judgment (31); but are occasionally mentioned by our Author, without, as not worthy of, any further notice: of the same stamp are also the Authors cited in the margin (32). But being apprehensive that the authority of a Divine of our own Church, Dr Jackson, on account of his signal piety and great learning, might have a greater influence, than all the rest put together, upon the people, whom he was endeavouring to undeceive, he tasks himself to discuss the reasoning at large of that worthy Author, who so far received prodiges ὡς Θεῶν κηρύγματα, as God's visible Sermons of Repentance, that we are informed he wrote a just treatise (lost in his life-time) concerning Prodigies, or Divine Forewarnings betokening Blood (33). 'As to which, says Dr Spencer, I profess myself not greatly tempted to follow its casual loss with any deep sighs, and that not only because men's understandings have been too much undervalued by books of that nature, already extant, to a number sufficient to a cure of the most troublesome curiosity in such inquiries. But because the few prodigies and signs of the times, commended with great seriousness to our notice in his Sermons on Luke (34) (taken for the most part out of Herodotus, Livy, Valerius Maximus, and Machiavel) will appear to any man that does not use to start at shadows, too thin and weak to bear up any such weighty and serious conclusions, as he teacheth his Reader to build upon them (the knowledge whereof I had rather should be owing to the Reader's curiosity, than to my rehearsal.) Now, I think, we may make some judgment of the value of the whole piece, by the coarleness of the remnant thereof (35). Because it designed an Errorum Apoteosis, a kind of consecration of the greatest part of the errors and follies of the Gentile Superstition, as appear, in a high degree of probability, from those words which fall from him in the forecited papers; where (speaking of such kind of portenta and signs of heaven, at which the Heathens used to be dismayed)

- (12) Deut. xviii. 10, 11.
- (13) 2 Maccab. v. 4.
- (14) Monstra a monstrando quod aliquod significando demonstrant, Offenta ab ostendendo, Portenta a portendendo id est praestendendo, et Prodigia quod futura predicant. S. August. De Civit. Dei lib. 23. c. 8. and Cicero, de Divin. lib. 1.
- (15) L. 6. c. 27. & l. 7. c. 57.
- (16) Ubique.
- (17) De prodigiis.
- (18) Frequenter. (19) Lib. 3. p. 262.
- (20) Nat. Hist. l. 2. c. 84.
- (21) Hist. l. 5.
- (22) Lib. 21.
- (23) Hist. l. 3.
- (24) Geog. l. 1. sub fine.
- (25) Phars. l. 1. c. 12.
- (26) Metam. l. 15.
- (27) De Civit. Dei, l. 3. c. 23.
- (28) Origen in Celsum, l. 1. p. 45.
- (29) Notes in Prophet Joel. c. ii. 30.
- (30) Machiav. Disp. l. 1. c. 56. Pompon. de Incant. c. 12. Also the French Historian relates several strange events in nature precedaneous to the assassination of Henry IV. of France. Hist. de Henry le Grand, p. 515. See (31) See Remarks on Eccles. History, by Mr Jortin, p. 283, 328. Vol. I.
- (32) Kircher's Musurgia. Cornelius Gemma de natura charact. Gafpar Schottus Physic. curios. Paganus de penitentia et confess. Nebusius's Fatidica Sacra. Job. Polycarp. tract. tragic. Camerarius de Offentis. Penter's Teratoscop. Nuncius Prophet. Crollius in praef. ad Basilic. chym. Lavater de Spectris. Cornelius a Lapide Comment in Maccab. l. 2. Gaffarel's Usurbeard of Curiosities, passim. Christoph. a Castro de Vatic. Natural. Catech. Meteor. Johnston Thaumaturg. Synesius επι ταραχαῖς.
- (33) Vid. Preface to his book of the Eternal Truth of Scripture, Edit. 1653.
- (34) Ch. xiii. 5. and c. xxi. 25.
- (35) P. 26.

(9) In the Pref. towards the conclusion, second Edition.

(10) P. 102.

(11) Chap. V. Sect. 1. p. 525.

a further reproof of their pretended Prophets in A short treatise concerning Vulgar Prophecies [F], which was subjoined to the second edition of the former piece in 1665, 8vo. He he thus delivers himself. Though to believe as much concerning the signs of the times as the Heathens did; though to make as good, or better use of them than they did, be not sufficient to acquit us from ruin and destruction forefignified; yet not to believe as much as they did, not to make so good use as they did, not to be so much affected as they were, is enough, and more than enough, to condemn us, enough to bring that ruin and calamity, which they portend or forefignify, inevitably and in full measure upon us. A strange speech! What is this at best, but to fet Christians aurum colligere ex stercore (36), to gather the gold of devout fears, and christian foresights from the dung and drofs of all the ethnic Ostenta, and auspicious observations, wherever occurring? In proceeding, our Author enumerates the many bad uses, instead of any good ones, which the Heathens made of these things, and then asks, Where did we ever find that these pretended alarms from heaven did waken them out of that profound sleep, into which in the darker times of Gentilism they were fallen, and persuade them, or any others into a correction of their lives and manners? Upon these accounts, continues our Author, were I inclined to an observation of Omens and Prodigies, I should (as Prodigies used to be differently interpreted) make an inverted use of the Reverend Publisher of the Doctor's Work, [Reader, write this Prodigy, That this treatise alone concerning Prodigies should be lost, and that in the Author's life-time (37),] and conclude, that God in favour to the understandings of men, provided that, like the dead body of Moses, it should lie buried, none knowing where, that so it might not be made an Idol of, which perhaps the reverence of so great a name, might have inclined some unto. For the prevention of which mischief, having declared further, that the Doctor's Error might be easily pardoned to his singular piety and learning, the light and lustre of which, like that of the sun, may easily hide any of his spots and blemishes from the feverer eyes and notices of the world; he observes, that great minds, like the heavenly bodies, though they are moved, for the main, with the force of the primus mobile, the weight and evidence of truth; yet they appear sometimes to have their declinationes proprias, some private motions and declinations of their own, to which their peculiar genius, impressions from the age, or their education, may very fatally betray them. This opinion of Prodigies and Signs of Events future, which the general strain of his writings speaks his mind hugely possessed and dyed withal, I am ready to reckon among those Idola specus, false notions, which the black and melancholy mansion his excellent soul appears to have dwelt in, did abuse his mind withal. Any Events extraordinary in the world, seem all along to have had a great impression upon his soul, and seem expounded sometimes with a little more solemnity, than their just value and moment will well warrant and allow. Melancholy is of a very impressive temper, and poetick nature, and is apt, like a dark room, to receive in the images of objects without, in very monstrous and antick figures, and representations. The Greek Physician (38) hath noted of persons acted by it, that εις δεισδαμονίαν τρέπονται, they are easily turned to superstition. Our Author concludes these animadversions with the following Apology. 'I should not have here spoken so much, not to his, but my own prejudice, of so reverend a Person, but that I am desirous to cut off all the locks, wherein I can but conceive the strength of this superstitious persuasion may lie, which (as weeds do by good grounds) tends but to eat out the heart and strength of that devout fear, from which it seems to spring (39).' In like manner, this extract of it, long as it is, may, it is hoped, not be thought tedious or impertinent, as it supplies an omission in Dr Jackson's Article, where this weakness or defect in that great and good man's Judgment being passed over in a dead silence, might serve to impeach our work of want of impartiality in respect to his character. At the same time, to avoid the like imputation with regard to the subject of this Article, let it be observed, that Dr Spencer himself, while he is labouring to shame this species of superstition, will seem, to some persons at least, not to have purged his mind wholly from the leaven of every tincture of it, whilst he is found, for instance, in speaking of the Appearances of Good Angels (40), which he maintains to be rarely given; 'I say, continues he, rarely, not never, lest I should speak without book. To omit some very probable relations of this nature, that apparition is usually thought an Herald from heaven, which amidst a great attendance came and advised James the Fourth of Scotland, in whose Councils at that time the concerns of a nation were wrapt, to forbear some evil practices, but especially the fighting of his intended battle with the English, in these words, Rex ego ad te missus sum, ut te admoneam ne quo instituisi progrediaris; quam admonitionem si neglexeris, non erit e Re Tua nec Eorum qui te comitabuntur, which council he neglecting, himself with most of his Nobles and Army fell in that fatal battle (41). Neither will that opinion, although espoused and defended painfully by a late learned and ingenious writer (42), pass altogether without the censure of a too easy credulity from some, where he asserts, that when the Jews, in the assistance of Julian the Emperor, assayed the restoring of their ruined Temple, and so to oppose Moses to Christ, God miraculously determined the controversy. It is supported too by the same argument, which is chiefly insisted on by his Follower in answer to some other alledged instances of a like Divine Interposition, viz. 'that none of these (to use our Author's own words) reach this singular one in any points and angles of similitude, and that the dispute at Jerusalem was not (as in those) between Paul and Cephas, but between God and Belial; and thirdly, that Judaifm and Gentilism were causes evidently devoted to Scripture, and the Judgments following them, were but the accomplishments of its predictions, and the executions of a Scripture Sentence upon them (43).' To the like charge of credulity in our Author is liable his assertion, that the Earthquake, Thunder and Lightning, by which the Heathen Temple was destroyed, were produced by a miraculous Divine Interposition, as also that terrible fire, as he justly calls it, which issued out of the ground in the second year, not long after the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish Temple, and laid in ashes the Temples of Jupiter Capitolinus, Neptune, Isis, Serapis, the Pantheon, and their other devoted places; 'so strange an instance, says he, that the Ethnick Historian makes this Judgment thereupon Malum id Divinum potius quam humanum videtur fuisse (44).' However, these slips, if they are such, may be easily pardoned upon so arduous a subject as that of tracing the various steps of Providence in the moral government of the world. Whilst we see the general, the pernicious error, so incident to human nature, of presaging by Prodigies, completely hunted through all its mazy windings, and ferretted out of every cover, which either a perverse wit, or an abused learning, could suggest to screen it. To do this effectually (as it is done by our Author) required a larger stock of Learning, directed by a more solid Judgment, and pointed with a brighter Wit. And in doing this, he has also occasionally interspersed the work with several collateral remarks, and dropt such excellent hints, as have proved highly serviceable to the reputation of those who have prosecuted them. For instance, in speaking of the several strange alterations consequent to the murder of Cæsar, and precedent to the battle at Philippi, recorded with the most solemn regards of the Heathen Poet (45); he observes; that these Prodigies as much commanded the serious fears, and solemn observations of many Christians, at the time of his writing this book, as they did of the Heathens heretofore; and having ascribed this to the great power and authority of a traditional superstition, as the most easy and natural account of it, he proceeds thus: 'But that which might possibly much assist this tradition, was the succeeding of Rome Christian as into the place, so into very many of the rites and usages of Rome Pagan, as might be easily made appear at large, were that our business (46).' I doubt not but the Reader's eye is already cast upon Dr Conyers Middleton's Letter from Rome, shewing an exact conformity between Popery and Paganism, &c. which is esteemed the best performance of his upon the subject of Religion (47).

[F] A Discourse concerning Vulgar Prophecies, &c. The whole title runs thus, A Discourse concerning Vulgar Prophecies, wherein the Vanity of receiving them as the certain Indications of any future Event, is discovered, and some Characters of distinction between true and pretended Prophets, are laid down. In the Preface he observes, 'that among the many giddy fancies and errors of the late

(36) As Virgil said he did when reading Ennius.

(37) In the Preface before-cited.

(38) Aretæus Cappadox, c. De Melanch. which, by the bye, is generally reputed the best chapter in the book.

(39) Discourse concerning prodigies, Chap. II. Sect. IV.

(40) Chap. III. Sect. IV. 230, 231.

(41) See the story more fully related by Dr Jackson in his Sermon on Luke, from the Historian.

(42) In Julian: or A Discourse concerning the Earthquake and fiery Eruption which defeated that Emperor's attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem, &c. by William Warburton, Preacher to the Hon. Society of Lincoln's-Inn, Lond. 1750, and again in 1752, 8vo. In the conclusion however, it is confessed, that some friends to Religion had privately intimated their disbelief of it: and it may be added, that some still continue incredulous.

(43) Chap. VII. Sect. IX.

(44) Dec. Cassius lib. 66.

(45) Virgil. Georg. lib. 1.

(46) Chap. II. Sect. III. p. 63, 64.

(47) It will scarcely admit of a question that he had read this, as well as the other pieces of Dr Spencer, since he cites his grand work, De leg. Heb. in the Pref. to this very Let. as well as in several other of his Works, as he does also the Discourse of the Vanity of Vulgar Prophecies at the end of the Discourse upon Prodigies of near affinity to it.

He proceeded Doctor of Divinity the same year, and was presented by his College to the rectory of Landbeach All-saints in Cambridghire, July 22, 1667. In this presentation he succeeded Dr Wilford, then Master of the College, who, dying on the 18th of July this year, was also succeeded in that post by Dr Spencer, after a long succession by Royal Mandamus, who was unanimously elected by the Society to preside over them on the 3d of August following, as he did with great prudence and reputation for twenty-six years. In September the same year he was preferred by the King to the Archdeaconry of Sudbury in Suffolk, upon the promotion of Dr Sparrow to the Bishopric of Exeter, as he was in like manner to a Prebend in the church of Ely, upon that of Dr Pearson to the see of Chelster in 1672, and to the Deanery thereof about five years after, upon the death of Dr Mapletoft, into which he was installed on the 29th of September, 1677 (e). He published a Latin dissertation concerning Urim and Thummim the following year. In the interim he had been chosen Vice-Chancellor of the University in 1673 (f); and being in that office when the Duke of Monmouth was elected their Chancellor, his Grace was received, upon his instalment at Worcester-house, September 3, 1674, with a speech by Dr Spencer, which is inserted below [G]. In September, 1683, the Doctor resigned the rectory of Landbeach in favour late times, bred like the worms in the manna, out of the body of our government and discipline, this was the σφόδρον φέρον, leading imposture, that the true seculum spiritus sancti was now coming upon the world, wherein the immediate Teachings of God should antiquate the more dead and obscure Teachings of the Gospel, as those did the more weak and cloudy Instructions of the Law; that the minds of Holy Men should conceive, like the Virgin Mary, by the sole overshadowing of the Holy Ghost, without any assistances from Man, or human Literature. That men should be authorized and assisted to the due performance of the duties of publick preaching and praying by the incitements of God upon the place. That God was about no new work, but his secrets were still made known to the Faithful. That the mighty impressions and propensions upon the spirits of the Faithful, was an interpretative voice from Heaven, a kind of Bath-Col to supply the defect of Scripture-Prophecy, in dispensations more dark and enigmatical. Whence it came to pass, that every morbid heat of passion, and blind zeal, was christened by the name of Ignis Sacer, the facted imprefs and discovery of the Holy Ghost, and every crazy fancy and dream, dubbed a Prophetick Vision. In the conclusion he intimates, that his design in this piece was to further and facilitate a dutiful obedience to the penal statutes, enacted to prevent the spreading of seditious prophecies. Since while good laws are the best security of the peace, sober principles laid down in the minds of the people, are the best security of the laws. This professed loyal motive for the undertaking, is specified as being another instance, added to that of the preceding discourse, of that particular merit, which drew upon him the regards of his Majesty, who rewarded it shortly after with the preferments mentioned in the Text. In general, the reasonableness of both these discourses at the time of publishing them, is manifest; and there is one remark, at least, that may be thought not unseasonable in the present time, in this latter piece, only by taking the word Prophecy in its larger sense, as it denotes teaching and instructing the people in sacred matters, our Author's Observations may be truly applied to the Methodist Teachers and their Followers, where he observes, that Prophecy had been wisely reserved to the cognizance of Persons of more exercised minds; 'because human nature un-disciplined, is so extremely prone to meet things pompous and vehement with very sacred and solemn thoughts, and to think (as the Frogs in the Fable by the block which fell upon them) if the Person make a great noise and bustle, come attended with flaming expressions, pathetic devotions, singularities of gesture and phrase, affected silences and severities, that he is ἀλλοθι, sent from God extraordinary to rule their minds and lives (48).' To the same purpose is the remark he makes in his former discourse, that 'it had been the great error of most times, that because men saw the people to be weak and easy; therefore they chose to instruct them to piety, either by pictures and rites, or else by fantastical fears, legends, pathetic orations, odious or fashionable phrases, tones and gestures, all which made them worse fools than they found them, giving them furious zeal, ungovernable spirits, stultic religions, talkative tempers, giddy and unsettled heads (49):' which the Methodists and their Followers would do well to consider.

(e) Masters, as before.

(f) It is something remarkable, that, whilst he was in this office, he was suspended by Dr Bude, Surrogate to the Official, for not appearing at the Archdeacon's visitation; but how it ended is unknown. lb.

[G] His Speech to the Duke of Monmouth, &c. We are obliged for this to Mr Hearne, who has given a transcript of it (50), as follows.

'May it please your Grace,
'We come not hither in confidence of so vain a thought, that all our address and ceremony can derive any honour upon your Grace's person; your own great actions have put such a glory about your head abroad, and your excellent virtue and temper have given your Grace so great a place in the hearts of men at home, that we can have as little design, as we have power, to add lustre to so great a name; nor do we approach this presence to give any assurances to your Grace's fortune, that in the credit of our numerous and united suffrages, your Grace might bear yourself the better against the zeal and envy of a mistaken multitude. It is your Grace's happiness, that your fortune is solid as your virtue, and that, like the sun, though moving in so high an orb, you have no angry creatures to open their mouths against you; but numbers that rejoice in your rising, and pay you a hearty worship and observance; nor do we come to barter our praises, or that by the arts and enchantments of a little oratory, we might possess your Grace with a good opinion of us; for we need no charms to provoke a flaming and an easy love, and it is our happiness, that we have a Chancellor now, whose mind is great as his place, as liberal and ingenious as the arts and sciences he is pleased to patronize; and in this assurance, we approach your Grace's house as we do a temple, not to crouch and flatter, but to pay a Debt, and express our Joy; and because we have nothing better, we present ourselves to your Grace in a great and just resentment of your goodness in receiving us to the honour of your care and patronage, and pawning your virtue and interest for our future happiness, which toucheth us already with the better and more affecting pleasure, because we have the fresh remembrance of an Iliad of evils to endear it to us. Those unhappy days are not far removed from our thoughts, in which as the other eye of the nation was blood-shot, so this, which your Grace secures, was clouded, and in danger of being put out. We can easily remember, when our gowns were antichristian, our charters and privileges the easy triumph of our envious neighbours, when to profess ignorance was not only a piece of philosophy (as of old) but of religion, and when to speak reason, was suspected; but to defend it, was heretical. But your Grace's particular affection and concernment have placed us above the fear of a returning cloud, and assured our Mother, the University of Cambridge, that it shall be difficult now for her Adversaries to foresee her end, as it is for her friends to discover when she did begin. Nor can we have cause to doubt but we shall hold these privileges in effect and truth, which we have often held before but in parchment and imagination; and we can as little doubt, but knowledge shall thrive and flourish, while your Grace (like Pallas) is the great Patron of Arts as well as Arms. The advancement of learning and ingenuity, is the most noble and humane work, and useful study and business of all civil nations in a time of a peace; and your Grace's charter makes us easily believe, you'll acquit yourself as a great master of the arts of Peace, as you have of War, and as fit to design and conduct the conquest of the intellectual world, as you are of the sensible and material. In

(50) In the Appendix to his Vindiciae Thomae Cæii, No. X, p. 86.

(g) Dr Middleton observes, that it was greatly and justly admired in all Christian countries. Works, Vol. II. p. 260.

of his kinsman, Mr William Spencer, A. M. and Fellow of the college*; and in 1685 he published at Cambridge, in two Tomes Folio, his famous Work, intituled De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus, & earum rationibus libri tres (g) [H], which met with such general approbation, that it was reprinted, cum Indice rerum et verborum, at the Hague, 1686, 4to, and again in 1705 at Leipzig [I]. That, after a life spent in the closest application to his studies [K], the asthma, to which he had been mostly subject, put a period to it, at his (*) Ibid. in the Appendix, No. IX. p. 23.

‘ an easy prospect of such great felicities, we could not rest assured of your Grace’s pardon, nor of our own, if we should not bow our heads, and kiss the hands which conveyed them to us; we think it a less trespass against good manners to trouble your Grace a little further, than to say nothing of the fountain of our and your Joys, though we can never say enough. His Majesty’s letter is the charter whereby we hold our present happiness, and have an honour equal to the biggest ambition we could conceive: it is his royal favour, to which we must intitle the advantages we can promise ourselves from your Grace’s power and goodness; by which eminent and surprizing favour, his Majesty hath made a great and wise provision for the advantage of learning and knowledge in his kingdoms, and hath given us a full assurance, that he hath no design to serve upon an ignorant and underserving people; that he desires to be King of Men, and to appear the Defender of Reason, as well as Faith, and professes a religion that dares come, not only where men can believe, but where they can discern, and judge. For ourselves, we can return so great a grace and favour only with our thankfulness, and most hearty wishes, that your Grace may long enjoy this office amongst us, with a satisfaction (if it were possible) equal to that with which you were elected to it; and that your Grace’s government may have so kind an influence upon our minds and studies, that his Majesty’s reign may be blessed like that of Solomon’s, with a general peace, and men of wisdom and learning, eminent beyond all the examples of foregoing times.’

[H] De legibus Hebræorum.] His design, in this elaborate work, is to prove, by a detail of the particulars, that all the rights and ceremonies of the Jewish religion were instituted in opposition to the practices of the idolatrous nations round about them. The subject had been long upon his mind, as appears from several passages in his discourse concerning prodigies; in one of which he expressly declares, ‘ that many of the critical rites and usages appointed the Jewish nation will be found to resolve into the Divine purpose to cross and thwart, by his commands, the rites of the Zabii, the Egyptians, and other neighbouring nations, which had the Devil for the great master of their religious ceremonies (51).’ The opinion is entirely speculative, in which the essentials of the religion being no way concerned, it has been argued pro and con by various learned writers, particularly Huetius (52), Sir John Marsham (53), Calmet (54), as also incidentally by Dr Conyers Middleton (55) on the same side with our Author, and Mr Samuel Shuckford (56) on the other side, as best suited their present design. However, it is agreed, I think, on all hands, that Dr Spencer has examined the question with more diligence, and treated it with more learning and judgment than any author whatsoever.

[I] An edition published at Leipzig in 1705.] Our Author continued all his life-time to make improvements to this capital work, and by will left such of his papers and writings, as were indifferently perfect, to be added in their proper places, if ever there should be occasion to reprint it; with the full right and property therein to his executor, Bishop Tenison, afterwards Archbishop, who bequeathed them to the university of Cambridge, after having caused them to be prepared for the press, with fifty pounds for the advancement of printing there. These the senate by grace gave leave to the learned Mr Chappelow to publish; and, for his encouragement therein, bestowed upon him the Archbishop’s benefaction likewise. Accordingly the work was executed, and published in four books, wherein Edita et manuscripta cum testimoniis auctorum laudatis recensuit et indices adjecit Leonardus Chappelow, S. T. B. coll. S. Johan. soc. et Arab. Professor acad. Cant. in 2 Tom. fol. Cant. 1727. To which Bennet College was at the expence of prefixing an elegant copper-plate of the Author, as a small testimony of gratitude to their magnificent benefactor (57).

[K] A life spent in the closest application to his studies.] In a letter from Cambridge, dated Feb. 25, 1738, we have the following account of the Doctor’s way of life, as related by one Mrs Trevor, who had been a servant to him: That he used to rise by five or six at farthest in a morning, and go to bed at ten; that his chief time for study was in the forenoon. He had not much acquaintance; but the chief that she remembered were Bishop Tenison, Bishop Moore, and Bishop Greene. That he was a plentiful eater himself, and lived in a very hospitable and charitable manner. The only exercise he used was the dumb bell. He bought a horse some time before he died, but never used him. That he died of the asthma, to which distemper he was chiefly subject. This letter was sent to Dr Alured Clerke, who had been bred at Bennet College, and apparently had made the inquiry, since he had some connection with our Author’s familiar friends, as will be seen in the account we have of him, which, because he was a Divine of merit, cannot be deemed unworthy of a place here; as follows: He was the son of Alured Clerke, Gent. of Godmanchester in Huntingdonshire, by Anne, the fourth daughter of Charles Trimmell, Rector of Abbots-Ripton in Hampshire, and a sister of Charles Trimmell, Bishop of Winchester; and having gone through St Paul’s school (58), under Mr John Postlethwayte, he was admitted Pensioner at Bennet College, April 1, 1713, where, after taking the degree of A. B. he was made Fellow in 1718, and proceeded A. M. two years after, when he became a candidate for the Rhetoric Professor’s place at Gresham College, with Mr Ward, who carried the election. In May, 1723, he was collated to the rectory of Chilbolton in Hampshire, and installed Prebendary of Winchester on the 23d of the same month (59). He was appointed one of the chaplains to K. George I, and so continued to the late King, who, upon his visit to the University in April, 1728, honoured him with the degree of D. D. and promoted him to a Prebend in the church of Westminster, in which he was installed May 8, 1731, being then one of the Deputy Clerks of his Majesty’s closet. He was also further advanced to the Deanery of Exeter, May 12, 1740. But, being always of a very weak and infirm constitution, after a short enjoyment of it, he quitted this life for a better, before he had completed the forty-sixth year of his age, upon May 31, 1742, and was interred, without any monument, in Westminster-abbey. His benevolent and generous disposition was such as rendered him truly worthy of these and much greater preferments, which he seemed even not to desire with the mean view of heaping up wealth to raise a family (for this he held in utter contempt) but only for the sake of enlarging his sphere of doing good: which he had so much at heart, that he spared neither labour nor expence in getting a county-hospital for sick and lame persons, erected at Winchester in 1736 (60), the first of the kind that was set up any where out of London; and he afterwards began the like upon his removal to Exeter (61) (where he had expended a large sum of money upon the repair of his deanery-house) but lived not long enough to see his laudable design fully executed. So little value had he for money, that he spent the whole surplus of his annual income in works of charity or hospitality; and determined with himself never to have in reserve (how great soever his revenue might be) more than a sum sufficient to defray the expences of his funeral. Besides, the sermons mentioned in the margin, we are assured, that in 1738 he published, in 8vo, (though without his name, and by some ascribed to Lord Hervey) An essay towards a character of Queen CAROLINE, whom he highly revered, and with whom he had long been a considerable favourite. The Dean had a brother, who was admitted at the same college under his care in 1719, and, applying himself to the Law in Lincoln’s-Inn, became an eminent Counsellor, and was enabled by his practice to enlarge his paternal inheritance, and rebuild the house at Godmanchester in an elegant manner. He was chosen Recorder of Huntingdon in 1731, and member of parliament for that borough in 1740. The following year he was elected for Whitchurch in Hampshire, upon the recommendation of his patron, the Earl of Portsmouth, and

(58) The first sermon he printed was preached before the Gentlemen educate at St Paul’s school, in that cathedral, Jan. 25, 1725, 4to

(59) He printed another sermon preached before the House of Commons at Margaret’s, Westminster, Jan. 31, 1731 in 4to.

(60) He printed a third sermon preached at Winchester cathedral on St Luke’s day, 1736, before the Governors of the County-hospital to which is added a collection of papers relating to the hospital, rules, orders, &c.

(61) He printed a fourth sermon preached at Exeter cathedral, before the Trustees of the Charity schools, Oct. 1741.

(51) Chap. XI. Sect. 1. P. 23.

(52) Demonstr. Evang. Ch. XI.

(53) In his Canon. Chron. passim.

(54) Comment. Præfat. in Genesis vi. and x.

(55) In his Works, Vol. III. passim.

(56) In his sacred and profane History of the world connected, Vol. I. p. 216. Lond. Edit. 17. Fol. 33.

(57) Masters. Hist. &c. p. 170.

his lodge in the college, on the 27th of May, 1695, in his grand climacteric. As to his funeral, his express orders were, that it should be only decent, and not pompous, and that the whole expence should not exceed two hundred pounds. Accordingly, the respects shewn thereby to his memory were nothing more than what became his character and station in life. The chief rooms of his lodge, with the hall and chapel, were hung with mourning; and his corpse was attended to the grave by the Bishops of Ely and Lincoln, by fourteen Heads of Houses, by ten Doctors of Divinity, by four Doctors of Law, two Physicians, two Professors, by the Master elect, and Fellows of the College, and by the Officers of the University, with many others, who had all of them rings, scarves, and gloves. The whole solemnity ended with a funeral Oration by the learned Dr Joseph Beaumont, Master of Peter-house, and Regius Professor of Divinity. He was also, according to his own directions, interred in the College-chapel, near his immediate predecessor, Dr Wilford, by the ascent to the altar (b), under a plain stone of black marble, with a Latin inscription upon it, which may be seen in remark [L]. He married Hannah, the daughter of Isaac Puller, of Hertford, who, dying in 1674, left him only one daughter, named Elizabeth, and one son, John; the former of whom lived till the year 1688, when she was buried by her mother, in the chancel of the church of St Benedict in Cambridge. But the latter, his son, probably died before. The Atchievement, wherein his arms are impaled, with those of the church of Ely, the college, and his wife, viz. Azure a chevron or, between three eagles displayed argent, is still remaining in the antichapel of this college. But he stood not in need of such means as these to preserve his memory, since the many Acts of benevolence, performed both in his life-time and by his last will [M], will be so many lasting and was nominated a Baron of the Exchequer in 1742, in the execution of which office, sitting as one of the Judges, upon the trials of the prisoners in Newgate, at the Old-Baily in 1750, he and the Lord-Mayor, Sir Samuel Pennant, Sir Daniel Lambert, Sir Thomas Abney, Mr Cox the Under-sheriff, with some others, are supposed to have caught an infectious distemper, which put a period to their lives. He died in May, and was buried at Godmanchetter, where his father, after having lived with his second wife upwards of fifty years, had been interred not long before. He married Anne, a daughter of Bishop Green, by whom he had one son, Thomas, who was a student in Bennet College, but quitted it for the army in the time of the rebellion in 1745, and has now a commission in the guards (*). The Baron's second wife was Jane, a daughter of Major Mullins, of Winchester, who, with four of her sons, and two daughters, survived him. He raised a lasting monument to his memory in the causeway leading from his native town to Newmarket, whereof he was not only the first designer, but the principal agent in putting it in execution, to the no small emolument both of that and the neighbouring counties (62).

(L) In the Appendix, No. IX, p. 168, 169.

[L] An inscription upon his grave-stone.] It is in these terms:

Hic Jacet
 Qui magnum adeo sui
 Apud Bonos & Rempub. Literarium Reliquit Desiderium, Vir Rarissime Munificentiae
 Pariter ac Eruditionis,
JOHANNES SPENCER, S. T. P.
 Ecclesiae Eliensis Decanus,
 Archidiaconus Sudburienfis,
 Et hujus Collegii Praefectus,
 Qui obiit 27^o die Maii
 Anno { Dom. 1693
 { Aetat. 63
 { Praefecturae 20

[M] Acts of Benevolence and Charity in his life-time, and by his last Will.] Mr Masters observes, that in the point of liberality to the Colleges, he far exceeded all former Benefactors; for in 1687 he purchased an estate at Elmington, a Hamlet belonging to the parish of Oundle in Northamptonshire, which cost him 3600 l., in yearly value being upwards of 200 l. This he settled upon the College by a deed of gift, dated 1693. In which he appropriated, first 20 l. per ann. to the Master, and 6 l. more for keeping the Accounts, and visiting the Estate at least twice in three years, with the nomination of a scholar, to be called the Master's Scholar, and to have 10 l. per ann. paid him quarterly, so long as his behaviour shall be approved by the Master. Dr Spencer also doubled the stipends of the three scholars of Archbishop Parker's foundation, to be named by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury; and gave besides, 5 l. per ann. to the Pincerna (one of the Bible Clerks) with 40 s. to the Puer Cubiculi. The yearly payment of 10 l. is moreover ordered to his Niece, Mrs Elizabeth Spencer, during her life, with 10 l. each to two of his servants; after whose decease, the whole 40 l. to be equally divided every year upon All-Saints day among so many of the Fellows as should have been statutely resident in the College the foregoing year, and who have not discontinued from the College, except in case of sickness, above sixty-three days in that year. And at the Audit, which is to be distinct from that of the College, within ten days before or after the first of March, every Fellow present is to receive 10 s. for his attendance, at which time 10 s. per mess is to be spent in exceedings.

2. The Butler, Pincerna, Cook, and Porter, 5 l. per ann. each (63). And the Overplus of the rents and profits to be put into a strong chest, with three locks and keys, and afterwards to be disposed of at the discretion of the major part of the Master and Fellows (whereof the Master to be one) in some pious or charitable Acts in relieving the sick and indigent scholars, in repairing the houses, in buying books for the College-Library, &c. with this restriction only, that there shall be never less than 40 l. remaining in the chest. He ordered, that upon any doubts or disputes which might arise, the determination of the Vice-Chancellor, and the two senior Doctors of Divinity, should be final, and that each of them should have 13 s. 4 d. for his labour therein.—The Estate was vested in the hands of five Trustees, two of which, after the death of the others, were to convey the premises to three other persons, being Doctors of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and two of them at least Masters of Colleges (64). Besides this Deed, the Doctor made a Will, dated the 20th of April, 1693 (65), wherein he appointed his old friend, Dr Tenison, then Bishop of Lincoln, his sole Executor: and in this he bequeathed 50 l. to ten of the most indigent and industrious Lads of the College, with the like sum toward repairs (66), above what he had given in his life-time, and such books as his Executor should think proper for the Library, with the furniture of the parlour and lobby (before the little East-chamber abutting upon the School-lane) to the lodge, if his Successor would accept of them, and 20 l. to each of the Fellows for a funeral ring. He left likewise 100 l. to the University, to be laid out in books for their use; for which he has been since enrolled among their Benefactors. And indeed every place, to which he had borne any relation, had some share of his bounty. For he gave 200 l. to the Church of Ely, half of which he ordered to be laid out upon a Font, which was accordingly executed in fine marble, curiously wrought, with this inscription round it, Legatum Johanni Spencer, S. T. P. Decani hujus Ecclesiae. Also 50 l. and the furniture of his Deanery-house to the petty Canons and singing Men, with some small legacies to the Vergers, Choristers, &c. He gave moreover to the poor of the parishes of St Mary and Trinity, in Ely, 20 l., and to each of those where he had been a preacher, viz. Landbeach, St Benedict's, and St Gyles's, Cambridge, 5 l. To manifest his kindness and tenderness toward his servants, he left them all handsome Legacies, and to some Annuities for life. And for his Relations and Friends, he likewise made such provision, as either their circumstances or defects called upon him to do (67). And

(63) The liverys which used to be given to them, were discontinued from the year 1710, on account of this augmentation of their Salaries. Ib. p. 181.

(64) Ib. in the Appendix, No. LIII. p. 79, 80.

(65) Proved before the Vice-Chancellor, July 13, 1693, and afterwards in the Prerogative Office, where it is deposited. Sel. Box XX. 1664.

(66) This was laid out the year following in new paving the Chapel by the consent of his Executor. Masters, p. 167, note (1).

(67) He left only fifty guineas to his own Cousin, William Spencer of Boughton in Kent, Esq; and Barrister at Law, which is traditionally accounted for by this gentleman's behaviour, mentioned in Remark [C].

(*) This was written in 1753.

(62) Masters. Hist. &c. p. 267. to 269.

lasting testimonies of his charitable and munificent disposition, whilst his writings will ever bespeak him one of the greatest scholars and divines of the age in which he lived. He was succeeded in his Fellowship by Mr Daniel Scargill, and in the mastership by Dr William Stanley, of whom some account is given below [N], for the reason therein contained.

And directed further, that if there were any surplus of his personal Estate, after discharging his funeral expences, debts, and legacies, it should be distributed among his legatees: or disposed of in other Acts of Charity at the sole direction of his friend and executor, to whom he bequeaths a hundred guineas, with his small repeating-watch, for his trouble.

[N] Some Account of Scargill and Stanley. To begin with Scargill, who succeeded our Author in his Fellowship in 1667. He was suspended the year following from his degree of A. B. and expelled both the College and University for Hobbism and Atheism, although afterwards restored by the latter, upon his public Recantation, which being somewhat scarce, we shall insert as follows.

‘ December 7, 1668. Dr Boldero, Vice-Chancellor, with eight Heads present. Scargill is permitted to make a publick Recantation in the Batchelors Schools, on Friday next, and to bring a true Copy thereof to the Vice-Chancellor, and his Suspension is continued till after the Commencement next. But I imagine, upon his refusal to comply with this, they proceeded to expell him.

‘ March 12, 1668. Whereas Daniel Scargill, late B. A. of this University, and of Corp. Christi Coll. hath been convented, and legally convicted in the Consistory, before the Vice-Chancellor and the major part of the Heads, to have asserted several Impious and Atheistical Tenets, to the great Dishonour of God, the Scandal of the Christian Religion and of the University, it is unanimously assented to by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads, that he be forthwith expelled the University—He was actually expelled at the same time—However upon his shewing a Disposition to retract his Errors, he was commanded to draw up a Recantation, which after being perused by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads, and some Alterations made therein, was spoke as follows, and afterwards printed at the University Press.

‘ The Recantation of Daniel Scargill, publicly made before the University of Cambridge, in Great St Marie’s July 25, 1669.

‘ Whereas I Daniel Scargill, late Batchelour of Arts, and Fellow of Corpus Christi Colledge, in the University of Cambridge, being, through the instigation of the Devil, possessed with a foolish proud conceit of my own wit, and not having the fear of God before my eyes: Have lately vented, and publickly asserted in the said University, divers Wicked, Blasphemous, and Atheistical positions, (particularly, That all right of Dominion is founded onely in Power; That if the Devil were omnipotent, he ought to be obeyed; That all moral Righteousness is founded onely in the positive Law of the Civil Magistrate; That the Scriptures of God are not Law further than they are enjoined by the Civil Magistrate; That the Civil Magistrate is to be obeyed, though he should forbid the worship of God, or command Theft, Murder and Adultery, professing, that I gloried to be an Hobbist and an Atheist; and vaunting, that Hobbs should be maintained by Daniel, that is, by me: Agreeably unto which principles and positions, I have lived in great licentiousness; swearing rashly; drinking intemperately; boasting my self insolently; corrupting others by my pernicious principles and example: To the high dishonour of God; the Reproach of the University; the Scandal of Christianitie; and the just offence of mankind. And whereas, the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of the said University, upon notice of these my foul enormities, upon a full examination and clear conviction of these premised offences, after suspension from my degree, did expel me out of the said University: Now I the said Daniel Scargill, after frequent consideration, strict examination, and serious review of the said Positions, do finde, by the grace of that God, whom I had denied, that they are not onely of dangerous and mischievous consequence, inconsistent with the being of God, and destructive to humane society; but that they are utterly false, the suggestions of a lying spirit, wholly against my own judgement, resolved upon, better consideration,

‘ as well as against the common sense of mankind: And I do freely acknowledge the proceedings and sentence of my Governours, the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of the Universitie, to be just and equal, agreeable to the Duty of their place, and the Trust reposed in them; That they could not have done less to vindicate the Divine honour, and suppress that mischief growing up in this age, which no former hath known.

‘ And now I Adore and Bless the highest Majesty of God in his infinite mercy to me, that he hath not suffered me to go on unreclaimed in my enormous principles and practices; but hath made my face to be ashamed, that I may seek his name. Righteousness belongeth unto thee O Lord, but unto me, and to those who have seduced me, and to those who have been seduced by me, shame and confusion of face. Oh what height of wickedness had I arrived unto! For I mult confess my self guilty of impleading the Divine Majesty at the Tribunal of humane wit, making man judge whether God should be God or no. Nay, whereas the Devil, my tempter, to whom I had harkned, doth beleieve and tremble, I, vile wretch, have been void of the Faith and Fear of God in the manifold manifestations of him. Wherefore I humbly ask pardon of God above all, whom I have blasphemed; of my Governours in the Universitie, whom I have disturbed; of all Christians, and all men, for the great offence I have given unto all; more especially of so many as have been misled into any error or vice by me. And I do also humbly and earnestly beseech all men, especially so many of the younger Scholars as have been seduced by me (who now abhor what I formerly boasted to assert) that they beware by my example of the most subtle insinuations of the Devil, in the vain ostentation of their own wit. That they lean not to their own understanding, but consult the Holy Scriptures, the lively Oracles of God; that from thence they may learn ῥησιν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, to be wise unto sobriety, as the holy Apostle with great wisdom requires. And now I humbly hope and trust in the infinite mercy of that God, against whom I had audaciously opened my unhallowed mouth, that He who hath promised that all sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men (excepting onely that resolved malicious blasphemy against the Holy Ghost) will be graciously pleased to glorifie his mercy in the forgiveness of my most detestable errors, and abominable sins. And I thank God that he hath awakened me in good measure to a just detestation of the accursed Positions asserted by me, and of all other like wicked principles.

‘ Wherefore, I do here in the presence of God, Angels and Men, cast my self down in a deep dread of the just Judgements and Vengeance of God upon the accursed Atheism of this age, acknowledging my self to be highly guilty of the growth and spreading thereof, having contributed what my profane wit could devise, or my foul mouth express, to instill it into others, or confirm them therein. And I do profess, I beleieve (and judge it most reasonable so to beleieve) that the openly professed Atheism of some, and the secret Atheism of others, is the accursed root of all that abounding wickedness, perjury, sacrilege, debauchery and uncleanness in this present age: That in a deep sense of that wretched part I have acted in the propagating thereof, I do now abhor my self in dust and ashes, and that from the bottom of my heart, I do disclaim, renounce, detest and abhor those execrable Positions asserted by me or any other: particularly,

‘ 1. That all right of Dominion is founded onely in power.

‘ 2. That all moral Righteousness is founded onely in the Law of the Civil Magistrate.

‘ 3. That the Holy Scriptures are made Law onely by Civil Authority.

‘ 4. That whatsoever the Civil Magistrate commands, is to be obeyed, notwithstanding contrary to Divine moral Laws.

‘ 5. That there is a desirable glory in being and being reputed an Atheist; which I implied when I expressly affirmed, that I gloried to be an Hobbist and an Atheist.

For these unhallowed assertions and expressions, I now find such inward contrition and remorse, that I pray God his mercy may withhold me from Relapse, or his judgements prevent it. But do I think that a bare Recantation can satisfie for my prodigious offences? No, Let me do penance all my days, submitting my self to God's will, and the charity of pious minds: And whatsoever my portion may be in this world, let me live and die in the fear of God, and the faith of Christ. Amen.

Now lest any one should mistake, or suspect this confession and unfeigned renunciation of my sinful and accursed errors, for an act of civil obedience or submission in me, performed according to my former principles, at the command of my Superiours, in outward expression of words, though contrary to my judgement and inward thoughts of my heart; or that I have not now expressed the most sincere and secret sense of my soul; I call the Searcher of all hearts to witness, that I loath and abhor such practices as the basest and most damnable hypocrisie: That from my heart and soul I detest such principles in all persons, as worse than the basest villanies and reservations, which the Jesuites are said to practice or allow. And I openly avow, that I do acknowledge, that all persons so principled, ought to be held by all mankind as the most dangerous and declared enemies of the common faith amongst men. That they are not to be trusted upon any obligation of their faith, or pretensions to piety, loyalty, or common honesty, in any Corporation, Colledge, Univerfity, City, Common-wealth or Kingdom: but, that by those principles, destructive to all society and commerce amongst men, they may and do delude and defeat all Oaths and Proteftations, all faith given to God or man: They may and will comply, if their own Interest or Advantage prompt them to it, with any Invader or Ufurper; with any Faction or growing Sect, however destructive to all order and the very being of humane society in the world. I beleve also, and openly avouch, That no power upon earth; no persuasion or imagination about natural Right; no opinion in pretended Philosophie concerning self-preservation, can free me from the obligation that is now upon me, in this my open profession of Repentance for my accursed errors and grievous sins, to speak the truth in sincerity before God and man.

This Recantation and sincere Profession I make willingly and freely, of my own minde and choice: not in compliance with the command or will of any other; not upon design to gain a better opinion amongst men in the world; nor for any worldly advantage, profit, or self-end of my own: but out of a hearty detestation of my soul errors and sins; and I am glad of this opportunity to disburden my soul, oppressed with the weight of the same.

So help me God.

DANIEL SCARGILL.

After the Performance of this Recantation, he was to be absolved by the Vice-Chancellor, when and where he pleased, and was accordingly absolved, as the following Certificate testifies.

These are to certify whom it may concern, that whereas D. S. B. A. late Fellow of C. C. C. C. was suspended of his Degree, and expelled the Univerfity, for asserting erroneous Tenets, tending to Atheisme, and the said D. S. was absolved from his Suspension, and restored to the Univerfity upon his Recantation in Great St Marie's Church, July 25, 1669, by Dr Edm. Boldero, Vice-Chancellor.

Sept. 1, 1671.

Ita testor Matt. Whinn, Regl.

He was a native of Cambridge, and after leaving the Univerfity, presented by Edwin Rich to the Rectory of Mulbarton in Norfolk, where he married Sarah, the daughter of Thomas le Neve of Aflaſton, Gent. a woman, as he tells us in her Epitaph, remarkable for her Piety and Devotion. His Arms impaling her's, upon the Monument erected to her memory, are Erm. a Saltire Gul. (68). In 1690 Dudley Seargill, Gent. presented him to the Vicarage of Swerdeston, which he held by union with Mulbarton: but how long he continued possessed of these, or what afterwards became of him, I could never learn (69).

VOL. VI. No. 317.

Dr Stanley, who succeeded our Author in the Mastership of Bennet College, was the son of William Stanley, Gent. of Hinkley, in the county of Leicester; but his father dying while he was very young, he was left to the sole care of his mother, who put him to school at Ashley in Lancashire, and afterwards sent him, in 1663, at the age of sixteen (70), to St John's College in Cambridge, where he staid till he was chosen into a Fellowship of Bennet College, upon the expulsion of Scargill, upon the joint recommendation of his tutor and Bishop Gunning, then Master of St John's, where his County was at that time full. His first step out of the Univerfity, and that a very fortunate one, was to the curacy of Much-Hadham in Hertfordshire, as it placed him not only under the eye and direction of that excellent Divine, Dr Goodman (71), but as it gave him an opportunity of being known to the Earl of Essex (whose seat was there) who made him his Chaplain, and then presented him, October 29, 1681, to the Rectory of Raine-parva in Essex (72); but this he voided soon after, viz. October 30, 1682, by cession, for St Mary-Magdalen in Old Fish-Street, London, which he quitted in like manner for that of Much-Hadham, beforementioned; being collated thereto, August 30, 1690, by Bishop Compton, upon the death of his friend Dr Goodman. These were the only parochial benefices he ever had. But on the 18th of September, 1684, he was preferred to the Prebend of Colington-Major, in the Cathedral of St Paul London, whereof he became a Cathedralian in 1689, as also Archdeacon of London March 5, 1692, upon the promotion of Dr Tenison to the See of Lincoln; and he was made Dean of St Asaph December 7, 1706, which he rather accepted to set his Uncle, Bishop Beveridge, at liberty from the powerful solicitations of others, than that he either sought for, or desired it. He went over, about 1687, to be Chaplain to the Princess of Orange, upon the Dismissal of Dr Covel, when a Clergyman of an unexceptionable Character in every respect, was to be provided by express orders from Holland. Accordingly the Bishop of London had it in Charge to recommend two such persons to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was to have the final approbation of one. The two thus recommended, were Dr Burnet, Master of the Charterhouse, and Mr Stanley; to the latter of whom his Grace gave the preference, for this pleasant reason, that although the former was a deserving man, an ingenious divine, and a good Scholar; yet as Moses and the Doctor could not agree about making worlds, he thought it was better to chuse Mr Stanley; who after being further favoured by his Grace about this time, probably with his faculty for a Doctor of Divinity's degree, was forthwith sent over, and soon became a favourite both at Court and with her Highness. He likewise contracted there a particular acquaintance with the two Huygens, as well as with other persons of learning and character; being without doubt recommended and supported herein by his old friend and fellow-collegian, Mr Villiers, who had attended the Princess, upon her marriage, into Holland, and continued there till the Prince's coming over to England in 1688. As soon as his royal mistress was seated upon the throne, she advanced him to be Clerk of the Closet, with a Salary of 200l. per ann. settled upon him for life, and always had him in such credit and esteem, that most of her charities passed through his hands. She moreover offered him one or two Bishoprics, which he then declined, as he did also the See of Lincoln, which was offered him upon Dr Tenison's promotion to that of Canterbury; being content with the preferment he had, and his own private fortunes. He found a station of less dignity and eclat, more agreeable to his inclinations, and suitable to his scheme of happiness in life. However, the death of his old friend, Dr Spencer, brought him (though much against his will) into a more public scene of it in this Univerfity, being elected thereupon (but without his knowledge) into the Mastership of Bennet College, which yet, upon the first notice of his choice, he positively refused to accept, and persevered in it till the whole Society, for the sake of preventing an irreconcilable division among them, as they should not be unanimous in their votes for any other person besides himself. This motive had its desired effect, even though he foresaw the trouble that would follow, in being elected Vice-Chancellor the same year by the Univerfity, who passed an extraordinary grace for admitting him to the degree of D. D. with all its privileges, among them, to which an Archbishop's faculty could not intitle him. Considering upon what motive, and with what reluctance he took the Mastership, it might be expected he

(70) Bishop Beveridge, who married his Aunt, was of that College, and which was perhaps a stronger motive, Mr Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jersey (of a Leicestershire family in his neighbourhood) went thither about the same time under the tuition of Dr Gower, who is said never to have had any other pupils but these two.

(71) The celebrated Author of the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and the Winter Evening Conference, and some other excellent pieces.

(72) He had been ordained Priest by Bishop Compton in 1672, became an Univerfity Preacher in 1676, and commenced B. D. in 1678.

(73) The title is Catalogus librorum manuscriptorum in Bibliotheca Coll. Corp. Christi in Cantabrigia, quos legavit Matthæus Parkerus, Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis. Fol. Lond. MDCCLXXII. This being the first attempt, is not without defects, which Mr Maisters gives us reason to hope will be supplied in a second edition.

would resign it, as he did in 1698, because he could not be more constantly resident. However, while he held it, he made that valuable catalogue (73) of their manuscript library, which he afterwards printed at his own expence. The college, during his Mastership, being robbed of their communion-plate, he presented them with a set of silver gilt; which are still in use, with the Arms of the Orange family upon it, having belonged to the private chapel of Queen Mary, when Princess, who on her coming to the English Crown, gave it to him as a memorial of her favour and esteem. It pleased God to give him a very healthful, happy, and long life; for he did not die till October 9, 1731, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. When, according to his own directions, he was buried in the Vaulting of St Paul's Cathedral, under the south wing of the choir, among his old Friends, Bishop Beveridge, Dean Sherlock, Dean Younger, Dr Holder, and Sir Christopher Wren, who have none of them, except the last, any monument-stone, or even inscription over them. He married Mary, second daughter of Sir Francis Pemberton, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, who was living in 1753, by whom he had three sons, all educated at Bennet College. Thomas, the youngest, is dead; William, the eldest, is LL. B. and Official of the Archdeaconry of London, and is settled at Warwick; Francis, the second, was Fellow of Bennet College, and afterwards Vicar of St Leonard, Shoreditch, till his father resigned in his favour the Rectory of Hadham, September 30, 1723. Dr Stanley was engaged in many good and useful designs. Among which, was that of printing an Edition of the Councils, in 1692, with Protestant Annotations, by an annual subscription. Several sums were accordingly subscribed, by the two Archbishops 10 l. per ann. each, and by twelve Bishops 5 l. each; Dr Stanley not only did the same, but also, by his interest then at Court, was chiefly instrumental in obtaining a grant to import what papers should be wanting, custom free. Dr Allix undertook the care and management of this edition, and had great quantities of paper imported for it, which, when the design was laid aside, was sold to the Stationers for private gain, to the offence of the public, and regret of the learned world. The Doctor, before he went abroad, was concerned with several others in the scheme of printing an English Bible, with a plain and practical commentary, but more especially levelled against the errors and corruptions of Popery. His own province was to write that upon the Minor Prophets; a scheme that was superseded by the happy establishment of our Church and Nation at the Revolution. The Doctor, when Dean of St Asaph, was at the sole expence (74) of that Act of Parliament, ann. XII. of Queen Anne, which annexed Prebends and Sinecures to the Bishoprics of Bangor, Landaff, St David, and St Asaph, in order to relieve the widows and fatherless of the Welsh Clergy from the fore distress of paying Mortua-

(74) Willis's Survey of the Cathedral of St Asaph, p. 107, and of Bangor, p. 345.

(1) Collins's Peerage of Eng. under Spencer Duke of Marlborough.

(2) Colin Clout come again.

SPENSER [EDMUND], frequently stiled the Father of the English Heroic poem, was descended from the ancient family of the Spencers in Northamptonshire [A], but born in London (a), probably about the year 1553 [B]. It is not known where he had the first part of his education;

[A] The family of the Spencers in Northamptonshire. The present Duke of Marlborough is at the head of this family, which was first raised to the peerage in the first year of Jacob. I. in the person of Sir Robert Spencer, by the title of Baron Spencer of Wormleighton in the county of Northampton, who was then reputed to be the richest moneyed man in England (1). It is three of the daughters of his grandfather, Sir John Spencer, Knight, of whom our Poet sings in the following lines.

*No lesse praise-worthy are the Sisters three,
The honour of the noble family,
Of which I meanest boast my self to be,
And most that unto them I boast my self so nere,
Phyllis, Charillis, and sweet Amaryllis* (2).

Their real names were Elizabeth, Anne, and Alice. Elizabeth is the Lady to whom our Poet wrote that Sonnet, which appears before the Fairy Queen, addressed To the most vertuous and beautiful Lady, The Lady Carew. To the same Lady he also dedicated his Muopotamos. She was married to George Lord Hunsdon. Anne was first the wife of Henry Lord Monteagle, next of Henry Lord Compton, and thirdly of Robert Sackville, Esq; son and heir of Thomas Lord Buckhurst, High Treasurer of England, from whom descended ries to the Bishops, upon the death of every Incumbent, within their respective Dioceses and Jurisdictions; which Mortuaries (as the preamble to that Act sets forth) consisting of several of the best goods of the deceased, did oftentimes amount to a very considerable part of his estate, and the payment thereof did very much lessen that small provision, which generally the Clergy of those Dioceses were able to make for the support of their families, and tended to the great impoverishing of the same. He likewise rebuilt what is now the best part of his Deanery-house, and made the whole of it habitable, convenient, and decent; where he often resided, and lived hospitably, so long as he was able to take such a journey. He settled a leasehold estate on a Charity-school in that town, and joined with Mr Carter in augmenting the perpetual Curacy of St George, in its neighbourhood. But his gifts towards the Augmentation of small livings by one or two hundred pounds at a time, with the aid of Queen Anne's bounty, were not confined to one County, but extended into different parts of the kingdom, as may be seen in Eton's List, &c. He was not only a Contributor to the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, and a zealous Promoter of it; but was also the first Mover in the business of their charter (75). To his own church at Hadham he gave a clock, and to the building of the Regent-house at Cambridge, 100 l. Such gifts and benefactions as these could not be hid, though he was as secret, upon Christian principles, as he could be in doing his Alms. What charities therefore he distributed with his own hand, cannot be discovered, as he left no account of them. But so far is known of him, that it was his constant rule, all his life long, to bestow in good works a clear tenth part of his whole Income, whether from spirituals or temporals. Considered as an Author (76), though he published but few things, yet he entered early to take a share in the Popish Controversy, in an Anonymous Discourse concerning The Devotions of the Church of Rome, wherein they are compared with those of the Church of England. London, 1685, 4to. He published also another Anonymous Discourse, intituled The Faith and Practice of a Church of England-man. London, 1706, 12mo. Besides the following Sermons with his Name: 1. A Sermon preached at Lambeth-Chapel, on the Consecration of Dr Tenison, Bishop of Lincoln, January 10, 1691; 2. Another, preached at St Mary le Bow, before the Society for propagating the Gospel, February 20, 1707; and a third, to recommend A Public Collection for the Redemption of Captives. Such was the Character and History of Dean Stanley, which we were the rather inclined to insert here, in order to take off any prejudice that will be apt to arise in reading a paper in the Tatler, where that ingenious writer takes occasion, from the remarkably loud natural tone of the Doctor's voice, to exercise his wit upon him, under the name and character of Stentor.

(75) Humfrey's Hist. Account, &c. p. 12.

(76) The Editor of the Bodleian Catalogue have placed among his writings The Romish Horfe-Leach, &c. But probably by mistake, since his friends know nothing of this piece, and came out so early in his life as 1674.

the present Duke of Dorset. She was a widow when Spenser printed his Colin Clout and his Fairy Queen; in both which, by Amintas, is probably meant Henry Lord Compton, her second husband (3). And the verses addressed to the Author of the Fairy Queen, signed R. S. seem to be written by her third Consort, Robert Sackville. Lastly, Alice is the Lady to whom Spenser dedicates The Tears of the Muses. She was first married to Ferdinando Earl of Derby, Ancestor to the present Earl, and afterwards to Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great-Seal of England, from whom is descended the present Duke of Bridgewater (4). Hence it appears, that our Poet was related to many that were then, or are become since, some of the greatest families of the Nation. Not to mention his alliances by the three other Sisters. Margaret married first to Giles Allington, Esq; of Herfeath in Cambridgeshire, of the family of Lord Allington, whose estate descended to Charles late Duke of Somerset, as heir at law (5). Katharine married to Sir Thomas Leigh of Stonely, in the county of Warwick, Knt. from whom is descended the present Lord Leigh (6). And Mary married to Sir Edward Aston, of Tixall in Staffordshire (7).

[B] He was born probably about 1553. This is fixt for the epocha of our Poet's birth by Mr Fenton (8), who, from the most general time of youths going to the

(3) Upton's Notes to Stan. 45. c. 1. B. 1 of the Fairy Queen.

(4) Peerage of Eng. as before.

(5) MS penes der Lord Leigh.

(7) I do not that our Poe takes any particular notice his works of these Ladies, bably becaus they made n gure at cour

(8) In his O vations upon Waller's Po p. LI. edit. 1744. 12mo.

education; but after that we find him at Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, where, his Parents being in low circumstances, he was admitted a Sizer, and matriculated in 1569 (b). Without neglecting the necessary branches of Academical learning, he particularly followed the bent of his poetical genius, and became acquainted with Mr Gabriel Harvey, of Trinity-hall, a gentleman of distinguished wit and good sense, as well as a Brother Poet [C], with whom he cultivated an intimate friendship, which proved very serviceable to him afterwards. However, having continued in the University till he had taken both his degrees in Arts, he left it unwillingly, soon after completing that of A. M. in 1576 (c), not having a competency to support himself there any longer, without some assistance from the College, which he had in vain expected [D]. In these unhappy circumstances, it is said, he retired for relief to some relations in the North of England (d). But, whatever was the occasion of his journey, it is certain he had not been long there, before the tenderness of his nature drew him into a fresh misfortune; having the ill luck to fix his love upon a mistress, who, though a country lass (e), did not want the art of leading him into the Lover's paradise, in order to make an offering of him as a victim to a more favourite passion for his rival (f). For this cruel distress, finding no other remedy, he sought a resource in his Muse, which naturally suggested to him the thoughts of venting his grief in pastoral poetry, and thereby proved an occasion of immortalizing both his mistress and himself, under the apposite names of Colin and Rosalinde [E]. In the mean time he continued still happy in the friendship of Mr

(d) His life, prefixed to the edition of his works in 1679, folio.

(e) He calls her the widow's daughter of the gen, i. e. hamlet or borough. Eclogue April, and Glossary by E. K.

(f) This rival is satirized by him under the name of Menalcas in his sixth eclogue.

University, supposes his admittance at Cambridge, in 1579, to have been at the age of sixteen. The opinion has been followed by all Authors since, and indeed is sufficiently grounded for a matter of no great moment. It is well known, that we owe most of the circumstances of Spenser's life to himself, and this point would be ascertained from his Sixtieth Sonnet, where he speaks of himself as forty years old, if the time of his writing that Sonnet were certainly known, but this is at least equally uncertain with the time of his admittance at Cambridge. Dr Birch tells us (9), that the Sonnets were written about 1692, and Mr Ball (10) says, they were printed that year. It is true, Mr Church's (11) friend observes, that in either case, Spenser must be born in 1550, that is, if the whole of them was either written or printed in 1692. But then, he supposes this to be a mistake, since he agrees with Mr Fenton in the date of our Poet's birth in 1553.

[C] He became acquainted with Mr Harvey. This gentleman, who was one of the prime Wits of his time (12), was born at Saffron-Walden in Essex, of mean parentage, but great alliances, like his friend Spenser; his Father being a Ropemaker, and himself nearly related to Sir Thomas Smith, the great Statesman. Mr Wood says (13), his first academical breeding was at Christ-Church in Cambridge (14), where in a short time he made such a proficiency, as astonished his Tutor: taking both his degrees in Arts, he became Proctor of the University, and grew to be an excellent and learned Poet and Orator. In which way he wrote the following pieces. 1. Rhetor; sive duorum digrum oratio de natura arte et exercitatione rhetorica; Lond. 1577, 4to. 2. Ciceronianus, vel Oratio post reditum habita Cantabrigiæ ad suos Auditores; ibid. 4to. 3. XAIPE vel gratulationem Valdenensium libri iv. ad Eliz. Reginam; Lond. 1578. in Latin Verse, presented to Queen Elizabeth in her progress at Audley-End in Essex. 4. Smithus; vel Musarum Lacrymæ pro obitu honoratiff. viri Thomæ Smith. 5. Tyrannomastic. 6. Ode Natalitia. 7. Rameidos. 8. Philomusos. 9. Anticosmopolita. 10. A copy of English Verses, signed Hobbinol, and prefixed to Spenser's Fairy Queen, which Mr Upton declares are enough, if he had written nothing else, to render his name immortal; and Spenser particularly takes notice how highly he was esteemed, both by Sir Philip Sidney, and his Friend Mr Dyer. Several pieces of Oratory and Poetry were also dedicated to him. After some time he was elected a Fellow of Trinity-hall in Cambridge, and applying himself to the study of the Civil Law, he obtained his Grace for a degree in that faculty, and was admitted LL. D. at Oxford, October 13, 1585, to complete which, he stood in the Act, July 11, the following year, and practised as an advocate in the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, at London. However, in his elder years, it seems, he turned his mind to Astrology, in which also he became eminent, and wrote Almanacs that were much esteemed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. But in this way he had the ill luck to fall under the lash of that noted and wrestles Buffoon, Thomas Nash, in his Apologie of Pierce Penniless, and Have with You to Saffron-Walden, which occasioned Dr Harvey to publish A new Letter of notable Contents: with a strange Sonnet, intituled Gorgon; Lond. 1593, 4to. 2. Pierce's Supererogations; or a New Praise of the Old Ass. 3. A Preparative to certain large Discourses, intituled Nalhes

S. Fame; Lond. 1593, 4to; with several letters and sonnets by the Poets of that time in praise of the Author. 3. An Advertisement for Pap Hatchet, and Martin Marprelate, printed with the former with other things, wherein he tramples much (15) upon Robert Green, who had reflected upon him, and was a Poet, and maker of Ballads, much valued for their mirthful and jocund turn, the titles of which may be seen in Mr Wood; who informs us, that Green died about 1592, of a surfeit taken by eating pickled herrings, and drinking Rhenish wine with them: at which fatal banquet Thomas Nash was present, who, in his Apologie of Pierce Penniless, makes excellent sport with him (16). Dr Gabriel Harvey had a brother Richard, who was also of Trinity-hall, and became a Divine of note (17); but giving into Astrology, suffered likewise the scourge of Nash who called them both False Prophets, Weather-Wizards, Fortune-Tellers, Mountebanks, Ballad-Makers, &c. Dr Gabriel lived to a great age, dying in the year 1630 (18).

[D] He expected assistance from the College in vain. The story of his standing for a Fellowship against Mr (afterwards Bishop) Andrews, and losing the election, related in one account of (19) his life, has been long universally rejected (20); and perhaps he left Cambridge, as some think, before that election happened (21): however, it can hardly be supposed, that in his circumstances, he did not push for some assistance, as an exhibition or the like, either in his own or some other College, unless he was overruled by his Tutor, or the Master of the College, which perhaps will not be thought incredible, if that Governor is meant in the following passage of a Letter from his Friend Mr Harvey (22). 'And will you, says this severe Wit, needs have my Testimonial of your old Controller's new behaviour. A busy and dizzy head, a leaden brain, a wooden wit, a copper face, a fatten breast, a factious and elvish heart, a founder of novelties, a confounder of his own and his friends good gifts, a morning book-worm, an afternoon malt-worm, a right Juggler, as full of sleights, wiles, fetches, castes of legerdemain, toys to mock apes with, odd shifts and knavish practices, as his skin can hold.' But

— Vivendum est recte
Tum propter plurima, tum his præcipue causis,
Ut lingua mancipiorum contemnas.

Whatever may be thought of this conjecture, our Poet seems to have left Cambridge without any bitter spirit of disappointment. See with what filial piety he remembers his Alma Mater (though to him she proved a Stepmother) where he celebrates the river that runs by her.

There doth by Huntingdon and Cambridge sit,
My mother Cambridge, whom as with a crown,
She doth adorn, and is adorn'd by it,
With many a gentle Muse, and many a gentle Wit (23).

Yet it is not impossible, as Mr Upton (24) conjectures, that this disappointment might prevent Spenser's taking holy orders, as was the case of Milton; and it is observable, that they both afterwards inveighed bitterly against the Pride and Luxury of the Clergy.

[E] He fixed his Love upon his Rosalinde. This Lady's real name is still a secret, as well as her family. Spenser, (15) And inhumanely, after Green's death, as Mr Wood tells us in Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 136.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 217. where may be seen a list of his works in Astrology and Divinity.

(18) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 128. as before.

(19) Viz. That prefixed to the edition of his works in 1679, fol.

(20) See the Art. of Bishop Andrews, Remark [B], adding to it, that Mr Dove, the Bishop's opponent, was an excellent Preacher, and became afterwards Bishop of Peterborough.

(21) Fenton's Notes upon Waller, ubi supra.

(22) Prefixed to the last mentioned edition of Spenser's works.

(23) Fairy Queen, B. IV. Canto II. St. 34.

(24) In his Life of Spenser, ubi supra.

(b) Mr Fenton's notes to Waller's poems, p. LI. edit. 1744. 8vo. from the information of the late learned Antiquary, the Rev. Mr Thomas Baker, of St John's college, Cambridge.
(c) He proceeded A. B. in 1572. Id. ibid.

(9) In Spenser's Life prefixed to Kent's Edition of the Fairy Queen, 1751, 3 vol. 4to. with cuts.
(10) In his edit. of Spenser's Calendar, 1732, 8vo.

(11) See Spenser's Life prefixed to Church's Edit. of the Fairy Queen, in 1758, in 4 vol. 8vo.

(12) See his Musarum Lacrymæ, &c.

(13) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 128.

(14) Others say at Pembroke Hall. See Tanner's Biblioth. Britannico-Hibernica, under his Article.

(g) Mr Ball, in vita Spenser, &c. prefixed to his edition of the Calendar in 1732. 8vo. dates this removal in 1578.

Mr Harvey, who, having a true sense of his admirable genius, prevailed upon him to quit an indolent and hopeless life in the country, and remove to London (g), where that friend introduced him to Mr (afterwards Sir) Philip Sidney [F]. This fortunate step answered his fondest wishes: that generous patron of real merit of every kind, and of poetry in particular, presently took him into his favour and protection, and introduced him to Queen Elizabeth, who made him Poet Laureat [G]. After this, he was frequently invited to Penshurst, where, in company with Sir Philip, he studied poetry and philosophy, especially the Platonic, which he made good use of in his writings. During this interval he finished his fer, it seems, kept it so from every body, except his two intimate friends, Mr Kerke and Harvey, who kept their trust with inviolable fidelity. We are informed indeed by the former, that she was a gentlewoman of no mean house, nor endued with any vulgar or common gifts, both of nature and manners, but such as needed neither Colin [Spenser] be ashamed to have her made known by his verses, nor Hobbinol [Harvey] be grieved, that so she should be commended to immortality for her rare and singular virtues: especially deserving it no less than either Myrto, the most excellent poet, Theocritus's darling; or Lauretto, Petrarchi's goddess; or Himera, the worthy Poet Stenchorus's Idol (25). We see it is here hinted that her name was known to Mr Harvey, which indeed is evident from a Letter of Spenser to him (26), where having assured this friend, that by his advice, he had consented to address his Pastorals to Sir Philip Sidney, he mentions the reasons, which had till then hindered him from doing it, one of which is as follows. 'Then also becometh the work too base for his excellent Lordship, being made in honour of a private person unknown, which by some well-willers might be upbraided not to be worthy, as you know she is.' Mr Kerke (27) goes so far as to tell us, that Rosalinde is a feigned name, which, if well ordered, will betray the very true name of his love and misfortunes; and Mr Upton thinks (28), that by well ordered is meant the replacing the letters in their true order, by resolving the Anagram of which, according to the frequent practice of our Poet, the name of Rosalinde is fabricated. The conjecture is ingenious, and indeed naturally suggested by Mr Kerke's words. The worst of it is, that it leaves us as much in the dark as ever. The knot is still inextricable, it is true some of Spenser's Anagrams, as Algrind for Grindal (29) the Archbishop, are obvious enough, where he did not aim at a poetical name: but who could have unlocked Hobbinol into Gabriel Harvey, except Spenser himself, who made the Anagram, or his Friends Kerke and Harvey, to whom he revealed it, as he did this of Rosalinde, which, like that of Hobbinol too, was probably not made by a simple derangement of the letters of her true name, without the variation and addition of some others, as were necessary to reduce it to the true poetical name of Rosalinde, under which he wished and intended his Mistress's true name should be concealed. In so forlorn a state, Mr Church's friend ventures a conjecture, with a modesty and diffidence suitable to it. He thinks it not impossible, that the true name of Rosalinde, which was invented in Kent, might after all be merely Rose Lynde, Rose being a common Christian name; and among the country names in Fuller's Worthies, under Henry VII, there appears at Canterbury the name of John Lynde.

[F] Mr Harvey introduced him to Sir Philip Sidney.] Mr Fenton supposes his introduction to be made by dedicating his Shepherd's Calendar to Sir Philip, and the same opinion is espoused by Dr Birch, notwithstanding the notorious inconsistency of it with several passages in the Calendar itself, explained in the notes upon them by Mr Kerke. For instance, in the Fourth Eclogue, Hobbinol says,

*Colin, thou ken'st the southern Shepherd's boy,
Him love hath wounded with a deadly dart.*

To which lines E. Kerke hath the following note. 'It seemeth that Colin appertaineth to some southern nobleman, and perhaps in Surrey or Kent, the rather, because he often mentions the Kentish Downs.' Again, in the Sixth Eclogue, Hobbinol thus speaks of Colin,

*Then if by me thou list advised be,
Forsake the soil that so doth thee bewitch,
And to the dales resort, where Shepherds rich,
And fruitful vales been every where to see.*

'This is no poetical fiction, says E. Kerke, but unfeignedly spoken of the Poet's self, who for especial occasion of private affairs (as I have partly of himself been informed) and for his more preferment, removed out of the partes, and came into the South, as Hobbinol indeed advised him privately.' The point is still more evident from Spenser's Letter, before cited (31); to Mr Harvey, where, besides the reason there mentioned, he sets forth the following. 'My principal doubts were, first, I was minded for a while to have intermitted the address of my writing, lest by overmuch cloying their noble ears, I should get a contempt of my self, or else seem rather for gain and commodity, to do it for some sweetness that I had already received—Your desire to hear of my last being with her Majesty, must die of itself. As for the two gentlemen, Mr Sidney and Mr Dyer, they have me, I thank them, in some use and familiarity.' However, Mr Fenton's conjecture is much more tolerable, than the story that Spenser was a stranger to Sir Philip when he had begun to write his Fairy Queen, and that he took occasion to go to Leicester-house, and to introduce himself by sending into Sir Philip a copy of the ninth Canto of the first Book of that poem. Sir Philip was much surprized with the description of despair in that Canto, and after reading some Stanzas, turned to his Steward and bid him give the person who brought those verses, 50 l.; but upon reading the next Stanza, he ordered the sum to be doubled. The Steward was no less surprized than his master, and thought it his duty to make some delay in executing so sudden and lavish a bounty; but upon reading one Stanza more, Sir Philip raised his gratuity to 200 l. and commanded the Steward to give it immediately, lest as he read further he might be tempted to give away his whole estate. To shame this idle tale (32), we need only observe, that the Fairy Queen may be said even to owe its birth to Sir Philip Sidney, who quickly after his acquaintance with our Poet, discovered his genius to be formed for higher subjects, than those lesser pieces which he had then wrote, and persuaded him

For Trumpets sterne to change the oaten reed.

To the same purpose also we find him in the verses to the Countess of Pembroke, sent with a copy of the first edition of the Fairy Queen, acknowledging that it was her Brother, Sir Philip Sidney,

Who first did lift his Muse out of the floor.

And in the same strain sings another Poet more expressly (33), who speaking of the early part of Spenser's life, has these lines:

*To seem a Shepherd then he made his choice;
But Sidney heard him sing, and knew his voice (34).
And as Ulysses brought fair Thetis' son
From his retired life to menage Arms;
So Spenser was by Sidney's speeches won
To bless her Fame, not fearing after harms.*

[G] Queen Elizabeth made him Poet Laureat.] This laurel however is said to have proved a barren one to him, at least for some time, through the ill humour and opposition of the Treasurer Burleigh, who not only withheld the pension, but intercepted some other fruits of the Queen's bounty to him. We are told, that her Majesty, upon Spenser's presenting some Poems to her, ordered him a gratuity of a hundred pounds. But that Burleigh objecting to it said, with some scorn of the Poet, What! all this for a Song. The Queen replied, Then give him what is Reason. Spenser waited for some time, but had the mortification to find himself disappointed of the Queen's intended bounty. Upon this, he took a proper opportunity to present a paper to her Majesty, in the manner of a petition, wherein he reminded her of the orders she had given, in the following lines.

I was

(25) Notes on Eclogue.

(26) Letter the third, prefixed to the edition of his works, in 1629, fol.

(27) In his notes upon Calendar Eclogue.

(28) Spenser's Life prefixed to his edition of the Fairy Queen.

(29) See the Fifth Eclogue.

(30) Spenser's Life prefixed to that edition of the Fairy Queen.

(31) In Remark preceding.

(32) It seems to be first retailed by the writer of his Life prefixed to the edition of his work in 1679.

(33) In the verses signed W. L. prefixed to the first edit. of the Fairy Queen.

(34) That is, found out the strength of voice.

(b) Mr Bull says they were first printed in 1577, but this seems to be a mistake.

his Shepheard's Calendar [H], and printed it in 1579 (b), with a dedication in verse to this patron, who had recommended him to the Earl of Leicester, and procured him to be appointed Agent for that Minister in France and other foreign parts. And though this design, by some means or other not known, happened to prove abortive [I], yet he attended

*I was promised on a time
To have Reason for my rhyme,
From that time unto this season,
I received nor Rhime nor Reason.*

(15) Fuller's Worthies in London.

(16) It is pretended to that edition.

This paper produced the desired effect, and the Queen, not without some reproof of the Treasurer, immediately directed the payment of the hundred pounds, which she at first ordered (35). Our Poet however sent the three first books of his Fairy Queen, when printed, to Burleigh, with a sonnet complimenting him as the Atlas of the State (36), yet at the same time shewing some diffidence of his Lordship's regard for Poetry, in excusing his unfitly presenting those dull rhimes

*The labours of last time and wit untaid,
Yet if their deeper sense be duly weigh'd,
And the dim veil, with which from common view
Their fairer parts are hid, aside be laid,
Perhaps not vain they may appear to you.
Such as they be vouchsafe them to receive,
And wipe their faults out of your censure grave.*

And it should seem, that the present was not received in an agreeable manner to our Author, since in the Introduction to the fourth book, he reflects upon that Statesman's dislike of his Poem as follows.

*The rugged forehead that with grave foresight
World's kingdom's, causes, and affairs of state,
My looser rhimes, I wot, doth sharply write,
For praising love.—*

He also plainly alludes to this misfortune at the end of the sixth book, where speaking of detraction described as a monster, he concludes with the following Stanza.

*Ne may this homely verse of many meanest
Hope to escape his venomous despite,
More than my former writs, all were they clearest
From blameful blot, and free from all that write,
With which some wicked tongues did it backbite,
And bring into a mighty Peer's displeasure,
That never so deserved to indite.
Therefore do you my rhimes keep better measure
And seek to please, that now is counted wise men's treasure.*

Among his other writings here mentioned, the most remarkable perhaps is his Poem intituled Mother Hubbard's Tale, where he has painted the misfortune of dependence on Court favour in the most lively colours, particularly in the following lines.

*Full little knowest thou who hast not try'd
What hell it is in suing long to bide,
To lose good days that might be better spent,
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to day, to be put back to morrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with fear and sorrow;
To have thy Prince's Grace, yet want her Peers;
To have thy asking, yet wait many years;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares;
To eat thy heart thro' comfortless despaire;
To fazon, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run;
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.*

This, and the other reflections in the same Tale, are said to be resent'd by the Treasurer, in the apprehension that he was struck at in them. However that be, it is certain there are other parts of our Poet's works, where this discouragement by the Treasurer is as strongly marked. For instance, in the Ruins of Time, written some time after Sir Philip Sidney's death, he pours forth his complaints in the full bitterness of his soul.

*O grief of griefs! O gail of all good hearts!
To see that Virtue should despised be
Of such as first were raised for Vertue's parts,
And now broad spreading like an aged Tree,
Let none see up that nigh them planted be.*

O let not those of whom the Muse is scorned, Alive or dead be by the Muse adorned.

Mr Church's friend observes (37), that in what Spenser wrote after 1590 he seems never to have spared Burleigh. On the other hand, it has been urged in behalf of that Minister, that his usage of our Poet might not proceed, either from a personal prejudice in particular, or a contempt of Poetry in general; but from the influence of party, Spenser being attached first to the Earl of Leicester, and then to the Earl of Essex, both successively heads of a party opposite to the Treasurer (38). And indeed, after the Irish Grant, Spenser's complaints were sure somewhat unseasonable, and might have been hushed by her Majesty's bounty to him. In respect to Lord Burleigh, may it not be retorted upon him, That they were then Rhimes without Reason; and as such, stood in need of the excuse which has been made for them (39), that 'The most elegant minds have the quickest sense of repulses from the great and powerful, who should countenance and protect them, and that therefore it is no wonder that the misfortune sunk deep into his spirit, and even dwelt upon him for a great space of his life.'

[H] He printed the Shepheard's Calendar in 1679.] Spenser is universally allowed to be the Father of the true Pastoral Poem in England. The true reason of his succeeding so well was unquestionably, that he felt and saw what he described Love and the Country, as is observed by Mr Hughes (40); though that Critic has made a slip in remarking, that in this work our Author was not mist'd by the Italians, notwithstanding Tasso's Aminta might have been as good an Authority to him in the Pastoral, as Ariosto in the greater kind of Poetry (41). Whereas, the Aminta, though composed in 1674, was not published till 1581, as we are informed from Nicéron by Dr Birch (42), who likewise takes notice, that some faults in this Calendar were shewn by Mr Pope in his Discourse of Pastoral Poetry, which was written at sixteen years of age. That excellent Bard, however unparalleled as he is in some other species of Poetry, it is certain did not excel in this. It is true, he aimed, after Virgil, at the more elevated kind of Pastoral, which would exhibit the charming scenes of rural simplicity and innocence, without sinking into the rustic. But in the attempt he carried it to excess: he was made sensible of his mistake, and conscious, as it should seem, that the bent of his nature and genius did not lead him to stretch with equal wings after Spenser in the rustical way, he gave a proof at once, both of his good sense and discernment, in putting upon that task his friend Gay, who thereby became Spenser's second; et Primo vix, aut ne vix quidem, Impar (43).

[I] The design proved abortive.] The writer of his Life, prefixed to Mr Church's Edition of the Fairy Queen, thinks it probable, that the scheme never took place; in support of which opinion he observes, that Spenser in his Letter to his Friend Mr Harvey, dated at Leicester-house, October 5, 1579, having complained, that whereas he had hitherto lived in a manner agreeable, and not profitable to himself, he had now obtained a station, which was profitable, but not agreeable; but that he was now grown weary of wasting any longer his youthful years in fruitless expectation, or mean complaints; and therefore had submitted to the seeking of his fortune, by leaving his country for long and tedious journeys in foreign parts. He adds in the postscript, that he expected to set out the week following, 'If I can, says he, be dispatched of my Lord. I go thither as sent by him, and maintained most what of him; and there am to employ my time, my body, my mind, in his Honour's service.' And yet, in the conclusion of another Letter to the same Friend, dated October 16, which, from many circumstances, must be the same year, he writes as follows. 'Thus much was written at Westminster yesternight; but coming this morning, being the 16th of October, to Mrs Kerkes (44) to have it delivered to the Carrier, I received your Letter sent me the last week, whereby I perceive you continue your old exercise of versifying English, which glory I had now thought should have been ours at London, and at the Court.' It is true, this is not decisive. However, it is certain,

(37) In the Life of Spenser, prefixed to his edition of the Fairy Queen, edit. 1758. 8vo.

(38) Birch's Life of Spenser, prefixed to the edit. of the Fairy Queen, published in 1751. 4to.

(39) Hughes in his Remarks upon Spenser's Writings prefixed to his edition of his Works.

(40) Ibid,

(41) Remarks on the Shepheard's Calendar, p. 98.

(42) Nicéron's Memoires des Hommes illustres, vol. 25. p. 71. quoted in Birch's Life of Spenser, ubi supra.

(43) See Gay's Article.

(44) Hence it is conjectured, that Kerke is the name of Spenser's friend, marked by the initial letters E. K. in his Notes on the Shepheard's Calendar, and elsewhere.

(i) His Lordship was appointed Aug. 12, 1680, and sworn into it Sept. 7. Ware's Hist. of Ireland.

attended the Lord Grey of Wilton, appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland (i), in the quality of his Secretary, the following year [K]. Spenser discharged the duties of this post with great abilities that if he did go abroad at all, his stay was so short, that the main design must have proved in a great measure abortive, since another Letter shews him to be in London when the Earthquake happened there, in the beginning of April, 1580; and in July or August the Lord Grey set out for Ireland. Perhaps this traverse might be owing to that unlucky mistake, which threw him for a while under Leicester's displeasure, though it was committed unwillingly; and to shew emblematically, that with honest intention, he erred like Virgil's harmless gnat, he sent his Lordship a hasty translation of that Poem, with a sonnet prefixed, by way of dedication, in which he expresses himself thus.

*Wronged, yet not daring to express my pain,
To you, great Lord, the Cause of my care,
In cloudy tears my case I thus complain,
Unto your self that only privy are.*

(44) See his Life of Spenser, ubi supra.

Mr Upton (44) thought this Lord's displeasure was owing to some kind of officious sedulity in Spenser, who much desired to see his Patron married to the Queen of England. Whatever it were, it seems to have been blown over before the writing of the Fairy Queen, if, as Mr Upton conjectures, the Earl is meant by Prince Arthur in that Poem. It is certain, that our Poet had early framed some scheme of an heroic Poem, of which his Lordship was to have been the Hero, as appears from the following lines.

*Abandon then thy base and wiler clowne;
Lift up thy self out of the lowlie dust,
And sing of bloodie Mars, of Wars, or Gifts:
Turn thee to those that wield the awful Crown,
To doughty Knights whose woundles armour rusts,
And helms unbruised waxen daily brown.
There may thy Muse display her fluttering wing,
And stretch her self at large from East to West.
Whether thou list on fair Eliza, rest;
Or if thou please in bigger notes to sing,
Advance to Worthy (45). Him see loveth best;
That first the white bear to the stake did bring.*

(45) So he often files that Lord.

(46) See Spenser's Lat. Verses to Harvey, dated Octob. 5, 1579, which verses, as Mr Upton observes, were certainly written in haste, and not intended to be published, having several faults in them.

This our Poet writes in his tenth Eclogue, which therefore is another convincing proof, that it was not the Dedication of the Shepherd's Calendar that first introduced him to Sir Philip Sidney. Though, at the same time, it is more than probable, that so much of the Poem as was (and it is evident that some of it was) (46) written before the Author left the North, might be shewn on his Introduction by Mr Harvey to that gentleman.

[K] He was made Secretary to Lord Grey. Among Sidney's papers, there is a Letter of Sir Henry Sidney to the Lord Grey, on his appointment to Ireland, dated September 17, 1580, where he particularly mentions, that his son Philip had pressed him much to send him a letter of advice as to that government, which he had administered himself about eleven years either as Lord Justice, or Lord Deputy. And since Sir Henry married Lord Leicester's sister, and Lord Grey was allied to Sir Henry, it is easy to conceive how cordially Spenser might be recommended to him, and accepted by him. And our Poet omitted no fitting opportunity of testifying his gratitude. For instance, he sent his Lordship a copy of the first edition of the Fairy Queen (47), with the following Sonnet.

*Most noble Lord, the pillar of my life,
And Patron of my Muses pupillage;
Through whose large bounty poured on me rife,
In the first season of my feeble age,
I now do live, bound your's by vassalage,
Sith nothing ever may redeem nor reave
Out of your endless debt so sure a gage.
Vouchsafe in worth this small gift to receive,
Which in your noble hands for pledge I leave
Of all the rest that I am ty'd t'account;
Rude rymes, the which a rustic Muse did weave
In savadge soile, far from Parnasse Mount,
And roughly wrought in an unlearned loome,
The which vouchsafe dear Lord your favourable doom.*

(47) They are prefixed to that Poem.

But he raised afterwards a much larger monument of his gratitude, in his Review of the State of Ireland, where he undertakes to defend his Lordship's Government there, with the warmest zeal. The Queen was displeas'd with some parts of his conduct, which occasioned his recall in the short space of two years. Particularly he had been represented to her Majesty, as exercising so much cruelty, as drove the Rebels to desperation; and to prevent the ill consequences arising from such a distemperature, a general pardon was granted soon after the death of the Earl of Desmond. Our Author's piece is drawn up in the way of a dialogue, between Eudoxus and Irenæus. And Eudoxus having mentioned these reports of Lord Grey's misconduct, Irenæus answers:

' Too true, Eudoxus, the more the pity; for I may not forget so memorable a thing, neither can I be ignorant of that perilous advice, and of the whole means by which it was compassed, and very cunningly contrived, by sowing dissention between him and another noble personage, wherein they both at length found how notably they had been abused, and how thereby underhand, this universal alteration of things was brought about; but then too late to stay the fame. For in the mean time, all that was formerly done with long labour and great toil, was, you see, in a moment undone; and that good Lord blotted with the name of a bloody man, whom we that well knew, knew to be most gentle, affable, loving, and temperate: but that the necessity of that present state of things enforced him to that violence, and almost changed his natural disposition. But otherwise he was so far from delighting in blood, that oft times he suffered not just vengeance to fall where it was deserved; and even some of them, which were afterwards his Accusers, had tasted too much of his mercy, and were from the gallows brought to be his Accusers. But his course indeed was this, that he spared not the heads and principals of any mischievous practices, or rebellion; but shewed sharp judgment on them chiefly for example's sake, that all the meaner sort, which also were generally infested with that evil, might by fear thereof be reclaimed and saved, if it were possible. For in the last conspiracy of some of the English Pale, think you that there were not many more guilty than those that felt the punishment: yet he touched only a few of especial note, and in the trial of them also, to prevent the blame of cruelty and partial proceedings, and seeking their blood, which he, as in his great wisdom it seemeth, did foresee would be objected against him, for the avoiding thereof use a singular discretion and regard; for the Jury that went upon their trial, he made to be chosen out of their own nearest kinsmen, and their Judges he made of some of their own Fathers, others of their Uncles and dearest Friends, who when they could not but justly condemn them, yet he uttered their judgment in abundance of tears; and yet he even herein was called bloody and cruel.

' Eudoxus. In that sharp execution of the Spaniards at the fort of Smerwick, I heard it especially noted, and if it were true, surely it was a great touch to him in point of honour, if he promised them life, or put them in hopes thereof.

' Iren. Both the one and the other is most untrue. For this I can assure you myself, being as near them as any, that he was so far, either from promising, or putting them in hopes, that when their Secretary, called, as I remember, Signor Jeffery, an Italian, being sent to treat with the Lord Deputy for grace, he was flatly refused; and afterwards their Colonel, named Don Sebastian, came forth to intreat, that they might part with their arms like soldiers, at least with their lives according to the custom of war, and law of nations; it was strongly denied them, and told to him by the Lord Deputy himself, that they could not justly plead either custom of war, or law of nations; for that they were not any lawful enemies, and if they were, he willed them to shew by what commission they came thither into another Prince's dominions to war, whether from the Pope, or the King of Spain, or any other; to which, when they said they had not, but were only Adventurers, that came to seek foreign bread, and to serve in the wars among the Irish, who desired to entertain them, it was told him, that the Irish themselves, as abilities and integrity, equally respectful of and respected by his Lordship, who being recalled in 1682 (k), our Secretary returned with his Master to England, where he seems to have continued till the much lamented death of his patron, Sir Philip Sidney, in 1586, a loss which he felt and grieved for all his life afterwards (l), and which would perhaps have sunk him beyond the hopes of a recovery, had it not been very much alleviated a few months before (m), by receiving, as a reward for his services, and in honour of his excellent talents, a grant from the Queen of upwards of three thousand acres of land (n) in the county of Cork in Ireland. This royal bounty carried him again, in 1587, to that kingdom, where he entered upon his estate, and passed his days in a happy tranquillity, having for his house the castle of Kilcolman, a feat of the Earl of Desmond, whose rebellion had been lately quelled (o), and the pleasant river Mulla running through his ground [L]. In this sweet leisure he resumed his great work, the poem of the Fairy Queen [M], and was thus happily employed in 1580, when Sir Walter Raleigh, with whom he had been several years acquainted (p), touching, in his return from the Portugal expedition, upon Ireland, in order to take a view of his much larger grant (q) from the Crown, made a trip to Kilcolman to see his old friend and brother poet. Spenser had then finished the three first books of his last mentioned work, (n) The whole was 3028 acres; rent 17l. 7s. 6d. Cox's History of Ireland. They were called Undertakers, being obliged by the patent to cultivate the lands granted to them.

(o) The Earl of Desmond and his accomplices had forfeited 574628 acres, partly in Cork.
(p) From the time of Sir Walter's serving in the post of a captain of foot under Lord Grey. See his article.
(q) His grant was no less than 30000 acres.

and, the Earl and John of Desmond, with the rest, were no lawful enemies, but Rebels and Traitors, and therefore they that came to succour them, no better than rogues and runnagates, especially coming with no licence nor commission from their own King. So as it would be dishonourable for him, in the name of his Queen, to condescend to make any terms with such Rebels; but left them to their choice, to yield and submit themselves, or no. Whereupon the said Colonel did absolutely yield himself and the fort, with all therein, and craved only mercy; which it being not thought good to shew them, for danger of them, if being saved, they should afterwards join with the Irish; and also for fear of the Irish, who are much emboldened by these foreign succours, and also put in hopes of more e'er long; there was no other way, but to make that short end as was made. Therefore most untruly and maliciously do these evil tongues backbite and slander the sacred ashes of that most just and honourable personage, whose least virtue, of many most excellent that abounded in his heroic spirit, they were never able to aspire unto (47). We have given this defence at length, as well worthy of it in that light: but there are two other remarks, which may perhaps be thought not less worth notice. First, hereby some light is thrown into the occasion of the quarrel between Lord Grey and Sir Walter Raleigh, which is left so dark by his historian (48), and which we see here, was occasioned by the malicious and injurious misreports of some informers, the not unfrequent bane of the best friendships. The other use to be made of this passage of Spenser, regards himself. For to this faithful attachment to Lord Grey, after he was in disgrace, may fairly be ascribed, in some measure, the small favour he met with at Court by his Fairy Queen, though the original of every Knight was then living in the Court, and he attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought was most conspicuous in them; an ingenious piece of flattery, which turned not much to his account (49).

by reading Spenser; that the great Milton owned him for his original, as Dryden assures us; and that Dryden studied him, and has bestowed more frequent commendations on him, than on any other English Poet. However, these three were all born with such poetical talents, as would have made a figure in the Art, had Spenser never been. The force of whose power, as a Father in begetting poetical children, will perhaps be thought more conspicuously displayed in the instance of Dr Henry More (52), who informs us, that he owed all his Poetry to hearing his Father read the Fairy Queen to his children, in the winter evenings. In this tale a young Critic writes, that 'though the Fairy Queen does not exhibit the œconomy of plan, and exact arrangement of parts, which Epic severity requires; yet we scarcely regret the loss of these, while their place is so amply supplied by something which more powerfully attracts us, as it engages the affection of the heart, rather than the applause of the head; and if there be any Poem whose graces please, because they are situated beyond the reach of art, and where the faculties of creative imagination delight us, because they are unassisted, and unrestrained by those of deliberate judgment, it is this, of which we are now speaking (53). To sum up all in a few words; 'Though in the Fairy Queen we are not satisfied as Critics, yet we are transported as Readers.'

(52) In the Dedication of his Poem to his Father Alexander More, Esq.

(53) Warton's Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser, Sect. I. at the conclusion, p. 12, 13. edit. 1754. 8vo.

But if Spenser may be stiled the Father of our Poets, he has assuredly an equal claim to be the Father of the Critics. The substance of all those who flourished before Mr Hughes, is collected and thrown by him into some continued discourses, prefixed to his edition of Spenser's Works, in 1715. Since that Mr Jortin published Remarks on Spenser's Poems, in 1734. 8vo. which have been well received. Mr Spence, in his Polymetis (54), hath also entered into our Poet's manner of allegorizing, and the conduct of his Allegories, which, as the book is not in very many hands, we shall lay before the Reader. The general plan of the Polymetis is the same with Lord Bacon's Wisdom of the Ancients, being to recommend their simplicity and clearness in symbolical representations. He assures us he had read the Fairy Queen with the particular view of informing himself from the best Allegorists among all the modern Poets, how far they have deviated from the Ancients. He reduces Spenser's faults, in relation to his Machinery or Allegories, under three general heads. 1. Mixing the fables of Heathenism with the truths of Christianity. 2. Misrepresenting the Allegories of the Ancients. 3. From something that is wrong in the Allegories of his own invention. Under the first, he instances in that short view which our Poet gives of the infernal regions (55), where he speaks of Jupiter and Tantalus, and of Pontius Pilate and our Saviour, almost in the same breath. With regard to the second fault, he speaks of Esculapius as being in hell torments (56), in the view of Hell. Under the third fault is ranged, Spenser's introducing a company of Satyrs, as saving a Lady from a Rape (57); and makes Sylvanus, the God or Governor of Satyrs (58), a Dignity which the Ancients never provided for him any more than the Jews girdle, which he gives him round his waste (59). He describes the day, or morning, with purple hair (60). The Syrens as half Fish (61). The figures of the Syrens are not uncommon in Antiques, and are never represented there with a fish's tail, that I know of, but with the upper part human, and the lower like birds: the Poets describe them in

(54) Dialogue XIX. edition 1755. folio.

(55) In B. II. Canto VII. Stanza 62.

(56) B. I. C. V. St. 43.

(57) B. I. C. VI. St. 19.

(58) Ib. St. 15. ver. 4.

(59) Ib. St. 14. ver. 9.

(60) B. I. C. X. St. 20.

(61) B. II. C. XII. St. 37.

[L] A pleasant Seat in Ireland.] A late Author (50) has given us the following description of Kilcolman. 'It is, says he, two miles north-west of Doneraile. It was a castle of the Earls of Desmond, now almost level with the ground. It was situated in the north side of a fine lake, in the midst of a vast plain, terminated to the East by the mountains of the county of Waterford; Bally-howra hills, or, as Spenser terms them, the mountains of Mola, to the North; Nagle mountains to the South; and those of Kerry to the West. It commands a view of above half the breadth of Ireland, and must have been, when the adjacent uplands were clothed with woods, a most pleasant and romantic situation.'

[M] The Fairy Queen.] Notwithstanding the many gross faults that have been found both in the original plan, and in the execution of this Poem; yet Mr Hughes rightly observes (51), Spenser has by it become the Father of more Poets, than any other of our writers in that way; and I believe it will not be disputed, that the same Gentleman has given the true reason for it, which is our Poet's peculiar talent in the embellishments of description, rich and lavish in him beyond comparison. As this is the most striking part of Poetry, especially in young minds, being first engendered in the imagination, and youth most susceptible of these impressions, it will not seem very strange therefore, that Cowley, as himself tells us, first caught this flame

(1) He was succeeded by Archbishop Loftus and Sir Henry Wallop, who were sworn into the office September 6, 1582. 15d.

(2) See several of his poems, and particularly his Adrophel, a pastoral elegy on that occasion.

(3) Sir Philip died Oct. 17, and Spenser's grant is dated June 27, 1586.

(47) View of the State of Ireland, p. 156 — 159.

(48) Oldy's Life of Sir W. Raleigh.

(49) Dryden's Dedication to Jovenal.

(50) Ch. Smith, in an Account of the Ancient and Present State of the County and City of Cork, Vol. II. p. 60—63. See also Fiennes Morison's Itinerary, Part II. p. 4.

(51) In his Life of Spenser, ubi supra.

(r) His Lordship died in 1588. General History of England.

and, resolving to publish them, he gladly accepted his friend's proposal to accompany him to England. On his arrival there, the Earl of Leicester being dead (r), he was introduced to

- (61) Ovid's Met. B. V. ver. 55. ' the same manner (61). Spenser describes Bacchus to be fat (62), a misrepresentation very common among the modern Artists. He makes Clio to be Apollo's Wife (63), and Cupid the Mother of the Graces (64). He represents in one place Orion as flying from a snake into Heaven (65); and in another, as a watry God, and one of the Attendants upon Neptune. Among the faults of this kind noted, the alterations in Spenser's account of the marriage of the Thames and the Medway, in which he has greatly increased Neptune's court, and added several Deities as Attendants upon that God, which were never regarded as such by any of the Ancients (66). These instances may be sufficient to shew, that where Spenser does introduce the Allegories of the ancient Poets, he does not always follow them so exactly as he might; and in the Allegories, which are merely of his own invention (and his invention is one of the richest and most beautiful that perhaps ever was) I am sorry to say, that he does not only fall very short of that simplicity and propriety, which is so remarkable in the works of the Ancients, but runs now and then into thoughts that are quite unworthy of so great a genius. I shall mark out some of these faults to you, which indeed thus separated from the work, and laid together by themselves, will appear very gross; but if they should prejudice you against so fine a writer, read almost any one of his entire Cantoes, and it will reconcile you to him again. The reason of my producing these instances, is only to shew what faults the greatest Allegorists may commit. He then proceeds to observe, that the first sort of faults in the Allegories of Spenser's own invention, is their being sometimes too complicated or overdone; such, for example, are his representations of scandal, discord, and pride. Scandal is what he calls the Blatant Beast, and he has made a very strange beast of him. His mouth was as wide as a peck (67), and he had 4000 tongues in it of dogs, cats, bears, tygers, men, and serpents (68). Again, the Dragon killed by the Knight of the red Cross, in the last Canto of Book I, is described with a tail that wanted very little of three furlongs in length, the blood that gushes from his wounds is enough to drive a water-mill, and his roar like a hundred hungry lions. Another fault is in fixing such filthy ideas to some of his personages, as is enough to turn any stomach to read it, as in that of error (69); to which we may very well retort the Poet's own words on the like occasion, Such loathsome matter were small lust to speak or think. III. His Allegories are sometimes so far stretched, that they appear rather extravagant than great, and sometimes so minute in pointing out every particular, that the object is in danger of becoming ridiculous, instead of being admirable. IV. They are not well invented in some particulars; first, In personifying such things as are not fit to be represented as a person, as in his description of the Cave of Care (70); and in making Gifts or munera a Woman (71). 2. In representing things under a human personage, with somewhat inconsistent with that form and nature. The greatest instance of this kind in him, is that where he turns the human body into a Castle, the Tongue into the Porter that keeps the Gate, and the Teeth into thirty two Warders dressed in white, Appetite the Marshal of the Hall, Digestion the Clerk of the Kitchen, Concoction the Master-Cook, the Stomach the Caldron, the Lungs the Bellows, and the Sink Port-Esquiline (72). 3. In making the Person perform such things and actions as no man in his senses would do. Thus he describes Desire, as holding coals of fire in his hands, and blowing them up into a flame, which last particular is something worse than Ariosto's bringing in Discord with a flint and steel to strike fire in the face of Pride (73). V. His allegorical personages, though well invented, are not well marked out, of which there are many instances. Thus in one Canto, Doubt is represented walking with a staff that shrinks under him (74). Hope with an Aspergeoire (75), the utensil used by the Papists to sprinkle sinners with holy water. Dissimulation as twining two clues of silk (76). Grief with a pair of panniers (77); and Pleasure with a humble bec in a phial (78). And in another, in the procession of the months and seasons, February is introduced in a waggon drawn by two fishes (79). May as riding on Castor and Pollux (80). June is mounted on a crab (81). October on a scorpion (82). And November comes on a centaur all in a sweat, because, as the Poet observes, he had just been fattening his hogs (83). Others may be well ranked under ridiculous imaginations. Such, I think, is that idea of Ignorance, moving with the back part of his head foremost (84); and that of Danger with Hatred, Murder, Treason, &c. on his back (85), as also the sorrowful Lady with a bottle for her tears, and a bag for her repentance, which are running out almost as fast as she puts them in (86). A huge fat Giant swelling into an empty form, like a bladder (87). The horses of the Sun foaming tar (88). Sir Guyon's putting a padlock upon the tongue of Occasion (89). And Remorse nipping St George's heart (90). There is so much of the ridiculous in the representations of the manners, that I can't help thinking this excellent Poet might possibly have formed some of his ideas in it, even from so low a thing as the old Pageants, which were in great vogue about the time he lived (91). Had Spenser formed his Allegories on the plan of the ancient Poets, and reformed such as he had from Ariosto, and the Italian Allegorists, he might have followed nature much more closely, and would not have wandered so often into such strange and inconsistent images. I am apt to believe, that Spenser considered Ariosto's Orlando Furioso as a Poem wholly serious, though the Author certainly wrote it partly in jest. It is a work of a mixed nature, between the gravity of Tasso, and the broad laugh of Berni. Perhaps Spenser taking some things serious, which Ariosto meant for ridiculous, may have led him now and then to have said things that are ridiculous, when he meant to be very serious. However that be, we may reasonably conclude, from so great faults as I have mentioned to you, from so great a man (whether they arise from his too much indulging the excellence of his own fancy, or from his copying after so singular a pattern) that it would be extremely useful for our Poets in general to follow the plan of Allegories so far as it is settled to their hands by the Ancients. At least till some Modern may have invented and established some better plan for them to go upon.
- A little before Mr Spence, there appeared a piece, intituled Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser, by Thomas Warton, A. M. Fellow of Trinity-College, Oxford, wherein that Critic speaks more largely than is seen in some of his Brother Oxonian's Remarks (92). Among other things, he takes notice, that though the Fairy Queen was formed upon Ariosto; yet the adventures of his Knights are a more exact and immediate copy of those which we meet with in old romances and books of chivalry. They are particularly engaged in revenging injuries, and doing justice to the distressed. That his first book is a regular and precise imitation of such a series of action as we frequently meet with in those books: for instance, a King's daughter applies to a Knight, that he would relieve her father and mother, who are closely confined to their castle upon account of a vast and terrible dragon, that had ravaged their country, and perpetually laid in wait to destroy them. The Knight sets forward with the Lady, encounters a monster in the way, is plotted against by an Enchanter, and after surmounting a variety of difficulties and obstacles, arrives at the country which is the scene of the dragon's devastations, kills him, and is presented to the King and Queen, whom he has just delivered; marries their daughter, but is soon obliged to leave her on account of fulfilling a former vow. He then observes, that the circumstance of each of Spenser's twelve Knights setting out from one place, by a different way, to perform a different adventure, exactly resembles that of the seven Knights proceeding forwards to their several expeditions in the well known Romance, intituled The Seven Champions of Christendom. That in fact, these miraculous books were highly fashionable, and the chivalry in them was still practised in the age of Queen Elizabeth (93). Another Romance particularly made use of by Spenser, is that intituled Morte Arthur. The Lyl of King Arthur, of his noble Knightes, of the round Table, and in th'ende the dolorous Death of them all. Of this he gives many instances in his second Section, particularly in regard to the names, especially that of Sir Tristram,
- (62) B. III. C. I. St. 51.
(63) B. I. C. II. St. 5.
(64) B. II. C. VIII. St. 6.
(65) B. II. C. II. St. 46.
(66) B. IV. C. II. St. 15.
(67) B. VI. C. XII.
(68) Ib. St. 28.
(69) Canto I.
(70) B. IV. C. V. St. 38.
(71) B. V. C. II. St. 9, 10.
(72) Ibid. St. 25, 26.
(73) Orland. Fur. lib. 18. St. 34.
(74) B. III. C. II. St. 10.
(75) Ib. St. 13.
(76) Ib. St. 14.
(77) B. III. C. XII. St. 16.
(78) Ib. St. 18.
(79) C. II. of Mutability, St. 43.
(80) Ib. St. 34.
(81) Ib. St. 35.
(82) Ib. St. 39.
(83) Ib. St. 40.
(84) B. I. C. VIII. St. 31.
(85) B. IV. C. IV. St. 16, 17, and 20.
(86) B. VI. C. LXVIII. St. 24.
(87) B. I. C. VIII. St. 24.
(88) B. I. C. V. St. 28.
(89) B. II. C. IV. St. 22.
(90) B. I. C. X. St. 27.
(91) Mr Warton gives many instances of the truth of this remark. In his Observations on the Fairy Queen, Sect. X.
(92) For instance, to Spence's three general heads of our Author's faults in allegorizing, he has added a fourth that he frequently introduces a Allegory under which no meaning is couched, in B. II. C. IX. St. 21. Observations &c. p. 222, 223. i. the note †.
(93) See Hollinghead's Ch. Vol. III. p. 1315.

to her Majesty by Sir Walter, who was at that time in high favour at court. The sense of this kindness made a lasting impression upon Spenser's mind; and he took the first opportunity of testifying his gratitude by such ways as he knew would be best accepted by his friend. In this spirit he addressed an explanation of the fable of the Fairy Queen to Sir Walter, in the form of a letter, which appeared at the head of the first edition in 1590; and the compliment was accordingly returned by Sir Walter in two copies of verses (5), which usher in several others of the like strain, that are prefixed to that edition. Spenser, we may imagine, was much pleased with so interesting a respect to his fame; and, returning to Ireland the following year, 1591, he gave a fresh testimony that year of his gratitude (1), in a way that must needs have been most sensibly felt by this worthy Friend [N]. In the interim, notwithstanding

(1) They are intituled, A Vision upon the concert of the Fairy Queen, and are marked W. R.

(1) In his letter, prefixed to Colin Clout's come home again, Dec. 27, 1591.

Trilfram, the circumstances of whose birth and education he has copied with much exactness from this book. Spenser informs us, that Sir Trilfram was born in Cornwall, and was Heir of Meliografs, King of that County, &c. And it may be observed, that this name Trilfram is given to the Hero of a Romance, just now published (*). The story of the Mantle made of the Beards of Knights, and Locks of Ladies (94), which he apprehends to be drawn from that Romance, and not, as might be supposed, from Geoffry of Monmouth (95), of whom the same story is borrowed by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, Song 4; Spenser's circumstances tallying more exactly with those in the Romance. Another Romance which Spenser borrows from, is Bevis of Southampton: as in Prince Arthur's combat with the Dragon (96), in which encounter he follows the incidents made use of by the Romance Writers, with all the punctuality of a close copyist. In the same Section, we find that Spenser was Father of several Poets nearer his own age, than those beforementioned (97). In the third Section Mr Warton has added several examples of Spenser's copying from the Classics and ancient Mythology to those which had been collected before by Mr Jortin, and declares his opinion, that in the comparison of the Peacock and the Rainbow (as they occur together B. III. C. XII. St. 23.) Spenser imitated Tasso's Gieruf. Lib. B. XVI. St. 24. He had before (98) apologized for our Poet's following Ariosto, as being, with all his extravagancies, preferred to Tasso at that time, in so much that the superiority of the Orlando Furioso to the Gierusalem Liberata was at length established by a solemn decree of the Academicians della Crusca, who held a solemn court of enquiry concerning the merit of both Poems. In the midst of this bad taste, Spenser began to write his Fairy Queen. In what sense these last words are true, will be seen by the following Remarks. Spenser in his Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, explaining the plan of the Fairy Queen, says, 'In the person of Prince Arthur, I set forth Magnificence.' This Magnificence, it is highly probable, was frequently alluded to in the Cambridge Correspondance. In the few letters that remain of it, we find Mr Harvey, in 158c, using this expression, 'I fear your Magnificence will hold us in suspense so long for your Nine Comedies, &c.' meaning apparently, that Spenser being employed about Arthur, would hinder other things. Again, in Spenser's Latin Verses to Harvey, dated October 5, 1579, he says, 'You banter me, so great is your Magnificence Tu tamen illudis (tua Magnificentia tantu est;)' a good deal of that Letter alludes to this scheme. Lastly, in April 158c, Spenser says, 'I will now in hand forth with my Faerie Queen, which I pray you send me with all expedition, and your friendly Letter and long expected Judgment withal;' so that probably what he had now done of it was in Harvey's hands. Our Poet went to Ireland as Secretary to Lord Grey, in a few months after this; we need not wonder therefore that in the Dedication-Verses, both to that Lord and the Earl of Ormond, he speaks of writing this Poem in Ireland, since he probably wrote most of it there. But from what has been said, it is evident that the plan of the Fairy Queen was not only laid, but some part of it executed, before the Gierusalem Liberata made its appearance in public, that Poem not being printed till the year 1583; which shews the impertinence of all the Apologies that have been offered in behalf of Spenser for not following Tasso.

Besides the three Critics upon the Fairy Queen, already mentioned, we have met with three others, Mr Hughes, Mr Upton, and Mr Church, each of whom have been consulted, and are quoted, as the Reader will observe in the course of this memoir. But one ought not to be surprized that so many gentlemen should have turned their thoughts upon the Fairy Queen, after reading the conclusion of Mr Warton's Observations. 'I cannot, says this Critic, take my final leave of the Reader, without acknowledging that this task has been peculiarly delightful to me; though the business of criticism is generally laborious and dry, yet it has here more frequently amused, than fatigued my attention in its exercises upon an Author, who makes such perpetual and powerful appeals to the fancy. The pleasure which Spenser received in composing the FAIRY QUEEN must necessarily be shared by its Commentator, and the Critic, on this occasion, may venture to exclaim with the Poet,

'The waies thro' which my weary steps I guide,
'In this delightful Land of Faerie,
'Are so exceeding spacious and wide,
'And sprinkled with such sweet varietie
'Of all that pleasant is to ear or eye,
'That I nigh ravish'd with rare thoughts delight
'My tedious travel do forget thereby,
'And when I 'gin to feel decay of might,
'It strength to me supplies, and cheers my dulled ['spright (99).'

(99) B. VII. C. VI. St. 1.

[N] He expressed his gratitude to Sir Walter Raleigh, &c. We need not say, that Colin Clout's come home again is here meant; and it would be more than needless to enter into the display of the excellencies of a Poem so well known. But that is not the case with respect to the æra of its first appearance in public. A late writer (100) has shewn, that the date put to it of 1591 must be a mistake, as the Poem now stands, for the following reasons: first, Amarrillis, that is Alice, daughter of Sir John Spenser, is there mentioned as a widow; but her first husband was Lord Strange, afterwards Earl of Derby, who died in 1595:

(100) The Author of Spenser's life, prefixed to Church's edition of the Fairy Queen.

But Amarrillis, whether fortunate,
Or else unfortunate, may I read,
That freed is from Cupid's yoke by fate;
Since which she doth new bonds adventure dread.

Another unanswerable reason is, that Sir Walter Raleigh, the shepherd of the ocean, is introduced as singing a song, the substance of which is thus represented:

His song was all a lamentable lay
Of great unkindness, and of usage hard,
Of Cynthia the lady of the sea,
Which from her presence faultless him debarr'd.

We have before given a particular account of this disgrace of Sir Walter (101), wherein some of the dates differing a little from those of this writer, the present opportunity is gladly embraced of inserting his account, in which he proceeds to observe, 'that, in the Sydney papers, Vol. I. p. 377. we find Rowland White writing thus: There is great means made for Sir Walter Raleigh's coming to the Court. He lives at London very gallant. His voyage goes forward; and my Lord Treasurer ventures 50cl. in money; Sir Robert Cecil ventures a new ship, perfectly finished, the very hull stands in 80cl.

(101) Under his article.

At Court this Saturday, Decemb. 13, 1595. (102)

Sir Walter certainly sailed on this voyage, which was to Guiana, Feb. 6, 1595-6; and he returned time enough to sail with the fleet the same year on the expedition to Cadiz, where he had a noble share in the action. We imagine therefore, that, as Astrophel was printed in 1595, Spenser was in London in the beginning of that year, when Sir Walter was in high favour, and was introduced by him to the Queen, or that the favours he speaks of were in a former journey to London. The fact must be true of Colin Clout's being printed after his disgrace; and had the disgrace been over, it is likely it had never been mentioned here (102) Camden, in his preface, professes to begin each year on the first of January, and has inserted this expedition in 1595.

Vir. The
e of Trilfram
andy.

B. VI. C. I.
13. and
VI. C. III.
15.

Orig. &
Reg. Brit.
X. XIII.

B. I. C. II.
9.

See Mars Satires, tuled The urge of Vil-r, Edit. 1598.
a Romance,
tuled The
Rose Knt.
Sect. I.

(u) Colin Clout's come home again. It is hinted Rosalinde was dead; and Mr Upton even thinks, that Spenser had begun his addresses to his second mistress in 1589.

(w) This is the most generally received opinion; though Mr Church's friend imagines it not to be before 1596. Spenser's Life, before Church's edition of the Fairy Queen.

(x) He calls this bride a country lass of mean birth, and tells us her name was Elizabeth, a name which was endeared to him by being both that of his mother and of Queen.

(y) His scheme was to place proper garrisons on the borders of those parts where the rebels herded the together.

(z) Camden's Eliz. whose words are, A rebellibus e larius eiectus et bonis spoliatus in Angliam Inops reversus.

notwithstanding the cruelty and ill usage of his first mistress, he presently gave way, upon her death, a second time to the tender passion (u); in which however he proved more successful than he had been with Rosalinde; and he celebrated the happy progress of this last amour in a species of poetry which was then, and long after, esteemed by the greatest masters to be the most consummate in its kind [O]. He was probably married about the year 1592, or the following year (w), upon which occasion he wrote an excellent Epithalamium (x), which no one indeed was so capable of doing as himself. Some time after this new engagement, he made another visit to England, where he printed his Astrophel, and Colin Clout's come home again, in 1595. During that interval he wrote several other small poems, which are printed in his works. The affairs of Ireland were then embroiled again by the Earl of Tyrone, who, after the death of the Earl of Desmond in 1593, broke out into a fresh rebellion, which probably was one, if not the chief, cause of our Poet's coming to England. He must needs have been not a little anxious about the safety of his own settlement at Kilcolman, which, being involved in that of the kingdom, put him upon exerting his political abilities, by laying down a complete plan for reducing that kingdom in the space of two winters at farthest. This too he finished the following year, 1596, under the title of A View of the State of Ireland [P]. The design was undeniably well concerted (y), and is a noble monument, not only of the Author's gratitude, but an illustrious proof, that it is not out of the compass of nature to unite the man of business with the most fanciful poet in the same person. But, feasible as this proposal was, yet it was never carried into execution; and what was the consequence of that neglect will be seen presently. In the mean time, our Poet and Politician was forced to return to his residence at Kilcolman, dubious as ever of his fate. He resolved however to make use of the present moments of quiet; and in that spirit he continued to prosecute his grand work with vigour and spirit; and accordingly we find him in England once more in the year 1596, when the second part of The Fairy Queen, containing the fourth, fifth, and sixth books, was printed at London in 4to, together with the four Hymns of Beauty, dedicated to the Countess of Cumberland. In 1597 he went back to Kilcolman; but had not been there above twelve months, when, after many treacherous submissions, the Earl of Tyrone broke out into open rebellion (z), and, having dispersed the forces which were sent against him by the Earl of Ormond, he ravaged and spoiled the whole county of Cork; so that Spenser was forced to seek his safety, together with his wife, in his native country, leaving his estate in Ireland to be plundered by the rebels [Q], who, it is said (aa), having carried off his goods, burnt his house, and a little child in it. However that be, it is certain he did not long survive this irretrievably ruinous calamity, which, reducing him to a state of absolute dependance, with the additional weight of a family, entirely broke his heart, and he languished under it by Spenser. Upon the whole, this writer conjectures that the Poem was printed in 1595-6. After all, this difficulty is not unconquerable, without charging any mistake in the date of Spenser's letter in 1591. We need only suppose, that either Colin Clout was first written, if not printed, without the particular lines here mentioned; or else, that they were added after the first finishing of the Poem, and before it was printed with Astrophel in 1595.

[O] To be the most consummate in its kind. This is the Sonnet. It is of Italian invention, and consists generally of one thought, always turned in a single Stanza of fourteen lines, of the length of our heroics, the rhyme being interchanged alternately, in which it differs from the Canzone, which is not confined to any number of lines or stanzas. The origin of it is derived from Petrarch, who filled a whole book with it in honour of his Laura, with whom he was in love, as himself tells us, for twenty-one years, and whose death he lamented with the same zeal for ten years afterwards. The uncommon ardour of his passion, as well as the fineness of his wit and language, established him the master of love-verses among the moderns. We find him copied by the wits of Spain, France, and England: and the sonnet grew so much into fashion, that Sir Philip Sidney himself, who had written a great number on his beloved Stella, has pleasantly rallied his contemporaries in one, which is a perfect pattern of this kind. It consists in a natural tenderness, simplicity, and correctness, beauties which are to be found in most of Spenser's sonnets. Milton is the last who has given, in our own language, any examples of the sonnet, which is not much in vogue at present (103).

(103) This was written in the year 1761.

[P] His view of the state of Ireland. It was first printed, 1633, in folio, from a manuscript in Archbishop Usher's library, by Sir James Ware, who, in the dedication to Lord Wentworth, remarks, that the calamities of that kingdom were fully set forth, and to the life, by the Author, with a discovery of their causes and remedies, being, for the most part, excellent grounds of reformation. In the preface he observes, 'that this discourse sufficiently testifies Spenser's learning and deep judgment; but it were to be wished, that some passages had been tempered with more moderation; though the troubles and miseries of the time when he wrote may partly excuse him. That his proofs (though most of them conjectural) concerning the original of the language and customs of the nation, and the first peopling of the several parts of the island, are full of good reading, and shew a sound judgment. And that with respect to the general scope intended by him for the reformation of the abuses and ill customs; though many persons had taken pains on the same subject in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and some before (as the Author of the Salus populi under Edward IV, and Patrick Finglas, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in England in the reign of Henry VIII) yet none came so near to the best grounds of a reformation as our Author, except in a few passages, has done.' But the Editor of Sir James's works in English owns indeed, 'that there are some things in it very well written, particularly as to the main design of reducing Ireland into due obedience of the crown of England; yet, in the history and antiquities of the country, he is often miserably mistaken, and seems rather to have indulged the fancy and licence of a poet, than have shewn the judgment and fidelity required in an historian; besides his want of moderation. And this makes the loss less regretted of another treatise which he proposed to write of the antiquities of Ireland, but was never finished by him.'

[Q] His estate was plundered in the Earl of Tyrone's rebellion. After many years treacherous submission, as above-mentioned, this Earl broke out into an open rebellion on a sudden, and presently besieged Blackwater, near Armagh in Ulster in 1598. The Earl of Ormond, then General, sent a detachment against him, August 14, most of which Tyrone cut to pieces, and dispersed the rest, and Blackwater surrendered. This was a signal to the whole party, throughout Munster especially. The rebels were instantly in arms, and the commander there, being weakly supported, shut up himself in Cork. The fury of the rebellion spread every where; and we are told, that 15000 English were destroyed, in Munster especially, and through all the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond. In the midst of this desolation we have always been assured that Spenser suffered (104).

(aa) By Ben. Jonson the Poet. See his article Vol. IV. note (zo). I may be observed that Jonson then just published his first play, and was of an age to enquire into the particulars concerning Spenser.

(104) Spenser's life by Mr Church's edition as before.

till till his death, which happened this year, or the beginning of the next, 1599 [R]. Thus, after this admirable Poet and worthy gentleman had struggled with poverty all his life-time, he died in extreme indigence (bb) and want of bread [S]. However, some amend

(bb) Camden, as before.

[R] Camden. in his Elizabetha, dates it in 1598, and Sir James Ware (105) in 1599; perhaps it was in 1598-9; for Camden, as has been already observed (106), though he professes to begin the year on the first of January, yet sometimes deviates in his work from that rule. However, if his life was continued till 1599, he must have died early in that year, if the authority of Ben. Jonson may be relied on, who told Mr Drummond of Hawthornden, that Spenser refused, a little before his death, twenty pieces that were sent him by Lord Essex, saying he had no time to spend (107): for his Lordship's patent of Viceroy of Ireland was dated March 12, 1589, and he set out for his government the 27th of that month (108).

[S] Hic tibi vovet poer.] Dr Birch (109) has lately produced a new proof of this from an old play, intituled The returne from Parnassus, or the scourge of Simony (110), publicly acted by the Students of St John's college in Cambridge in 1606, in which is the following passage;

A swiften () swan than ever sung in Poe
A sculler nightingale than ever blest
The tender grooves of self-adoring Rome;
Flies was each walley, and each shepherd proud,
While he did chant his rwall minstrelse;
Attentive was full many a dainty Eare,
Nay Hearers hung upon his melting tongue,
While sweetly of his Fairy Queen he song,
While to the water's fall he tun'd for same,
And on each bark engrav'd Eliza's name;
And yet for all, the unregarding soile
Unlact the line of his desired life,
Denying maintenance for his deare reliefe;
Careless care to provide his execrue,
Scarce deigning to stut up his dying eye.
Ing. Pity it is, that gentler witts should breed
Where thicke skin chuffes laugh at a scholler's need.
But softly may our honours ashes rest,
That lie by mery Chaucer's noble chest.*

Hereupon Mr Church's friend observes (111), that some of these particulars are in the first Canto of the Purple Island, finely touched, by a writer who deserves our acquaintance (112). The Poet having mentioned the discouragements attending virtue and learning in these lines;

That wretched we to whom these iron days (Hard days) afford nor matter nor reward?

proceeds thus;

*Whence our Colin, whom though all the graces
And all the muses nurse, whose well-taught song
Parnassus' self and Glorian embraces,
And all the learn'd and all the shepherd's throng:
Yet all his hopes were crost, all suits denied,
Discouraged, scorn'd, his writings wilfied;
Poorly, poor man, he loved; poorly, poor man, he died.
And had not that great Hart (whose honour'd head Ab! lies full low) pity'd thy weeful plight,
There hadst thou lain unwept, unbury'd,
Unblest, nor grac'd with any common rite:
Yet fealt thou live, when thy great foe shall sink
Beneath his mountain tomb, whose fame shall stink,
And Time his blacker name shall blurr with blackest [ink.*

*Ob! let th' Iambic muse avenge thy wrong,
Which cannot slumber in thy sheets of lead;
Let thy abused honour live as long
As there be quills to write, or eyes to read.
On his cur'd name let thine own notes be turn'd.
Ob may that man that hath the muses scorned,
Alive nor dead, be ever of a muse adorned.'*

The Author of the Purple Island is Mr Phineas Fletcher, son of Dr Giles Fletcher, of whom an account is inserted in this work (113). He was probably a Kentish man, as he lived at Brenckly, within a few miles of Penshurst. He was bred at Eton school, from whence he was chosen to King's College, in Cambridge, and became Fellow there. He had afterwards the living of Hilgay in Norfolk. He seems to have been of Spenser's own turn of mind, passing his days most likely at Hilgay, privately and unambitiously, and with all the modest sentiments with which he every where abounds. We cannot but think of him and love him, when he mentions

*The blushing strawberries,
Which lurk, close shrouded from high looking eyes,
Sberwing that sweetness low and bidden lies.'*

And we cannot but revere and envy him when giving us advice:

*Wouldst thou live honour'd, clip ambition's wing,
To reason's yoke thy furious passions bring;
Thrice noble is the man who of himself is king.'*

His poems were published in 1633, in 2 volumes 4to. Mr Wood tells us (114), he was the author of several books, one of which was intituled, A father's testament, written for the benefit of his particular relations. Lond. 1670, 8vo (115), at which time he had been dead several years. He was nephew to Dr Richard Fletcher, and consequently cousin to John Fletcher the famous playwriter; each of whom have been thought worthy of a particular article in this work (116): to which we shall take this opportunity of making some additional remarks (117). To begin with the father, Dr Richard Fletcher: it is true, he is generally said to have been a native of Kent, and as such is placed by Fuller among the worthies of that county, where the name has been very common: however, there is some room for doubt. It is certain he was one of the first Fellows of Bennet College in Cambridge, upon Archbishop Parker's foundation; according to which he must have been born in Norfolk, to which county those Fellowships are solely appropriated. He was scholar of Trinity College in 1563, where (as he proceeded A. M. and removed to Corpus-Christi in 1569) he had probably been admitted the year before, viz. in 1562. Upon this removal he entered upon the business of pupils, and other offices of Bennet College. He obtained the prebend of Isledon in the church of St Paul, upon the presentation of Matthew Parker gentleman, son to the Archbishop, who probably had the patronage of that turn made over to him by Bishop Grindal, in order to carry on his father's scheme of annexing Prebends to the Fellowships he had founded. Accordingly he held this with his Fellowship, and was made President of the College the year following; but seems to have left the college soon after, with a testimonial of his learning and good behaviour, as well as his having acquitted himself with credit in the offices of the college, in the public schools, and in the pulpit (118). He proceeded however D. D. in 1581, and became Chaplain to the Queen, to whom he had been recommended by Archbishop Whitgift for the Deanery of Windfor; but she rather chose to bestow upon him that of Peterborough, upon the decease of Dr Latymer in 1583. In 1586, he was presented by Sir Thomas Cecil to the church of Barnack, the Bishop having betrayed his right of patronage. He made a very affecting and zealous prayer at the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots (119). Whilst Dean of Peterborough he was chosen, Jan. 27, 1588, Proctor for that church, both in parliament and convocation, tam ad parlamentum quam ad convocationem Cleri (120). Upon his promotion to the see of Bristol in 1589, the Queen made him her Almoner. He stands censured in Archbishop Laud's metropolitain visitation of the church of Peterborough in 1635, wherein an injunction is given to make an enquiry after the executors or administrators of Dean Fletcher, that some satisfaction may be had from them, either by a fair composition or by compulsion of the law, for that great bell, which through his means, and in his name, was taken away. Soon after he had obtained the see of London, he gave out twenty-seven articles of enquiry to the churchwardens upon his primary visitation, whereby, as Neal informs us (121), the prisons, which had been lately cleared, were filled again by Non-conformists, to the

(113) See his Article in Vol. III. p. 1984, et seq.

(114) Fashi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 107.

(115) The titles of two other books, written by him, are in the Bodleian catalogue.

(116) The Bishop's article is in Vol. III. p. 1937. & seq. and his son John in Vol. I. p. 624. jointly with Beaumont's, under which there is also some account of the Bishop in Remark [E].

(117) From the History of Bennet College by Robert Masters, A. M. &c. edit. 1753. 4to.

(118) Bennet College leaf-book, p. 167. ann. 1576. whence it is evident, that he could not have been the same person with the Richard Fletcher ordained by Bishop Ridley in 1550, and soon after Vicar of Bishop Stortford and Ugley, as is supposed both by Strype, in Eccles. Mem. Vol. II. p. 57. and Newcourt, in Repert. Vol. I. p. 896, and Vol. II. p. 615.

(119) It is printed in Gunter's history of Peterb. Cathed. p. 75.

(120) Atterbury's rights, &c. of an English Convocation.

(121) History of the Puritans, Vol. I. p. 576. who adds, that he was one of those who drew up and consented to the Lambeth articles about the Predestinarian controversy, p. 522.

(105) History of Ireland, Vol. II.

(106) In Rem. [N].

(107) See Jonson's article, in Remark [N].

(108) Spenser's life, by Church's friend, as before. p. XL.

(109) In his memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, p. 487. in the note.

(110) It was communicated to the Doctor by David Garrick, &c; who is possessed of a very curious collection of old plays. Ibid.

(*) Sweetest.

(111) In Spenser's life; prefixed to Church's edition of the Fairy Queen, as before.

(112) Mr Warton thinks that Milton's fine description of Phobos in his Latin Poem in Quintum Novembriis is equalled by that of Phobos in the forgotten Poem, as he calls it, of The Purple Island Observations.

was made to his fame at last: his corpse being interred in Westminster, near Chaucer, as he had desired, and his obsequies attended by the Poets of that time, and others, who paid the last honours to his memory. Several copies of verses were thrown after him into his grave: and Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, who had married the widow of Sir Philip Sidney, was at the expence of the funeral (cc). A handsome monument also, with an inscription, was erected in honour of him by Anne, Countess of Dorset [T], a noble-woman, not more illustrious

(cc) Camden, as before.

(122) In Masters's Appendix, No. XXXIX. are two Latin letters, one dated April 12, 1591. and the other, June 6, 1592. from the College to him, expressing their gratitude for his favours, and in the latter particularly for his present of a curious globe.

(123) Dated Oct. 26, 1593. witness the Bp of Worcester, and proved June 26, 1596.

(124) It was sent by the Doctor to Mr A. Bacon, to recommend it to the Earl of Essex, that he might move it to the Queen, whom the Lord Treasurer had undertaken to dispose towards it; but what was done in it is not known.

(125) This copy is, in Master's Hist. in the Appendix LXXII. taken from Dr Birch's Memoirs of the reign of Q. Eliz. Vol. II. p. 113, 159, 224. and Fuller's Church history, B. ix. p. 223.

(126) He was son to the Bishop by his first wife, but who she was is not known.

(*) He was 49 in 1625, and was born in 1576.

number of eighty-nine. Besides the favours conferred in his life-time upon Bennet College (122), by his will (123) he left that society the Eitrick's egg: To the parish of Watford in Hants, 10 l. to those of Cranbroke-Hythe, Chelsea, and some others, 5 l. each: and to his nine children his fortunes, to be equally divided among them, with his books to his sons, Nathaniel and John. But these were found to be scarce equal to his debts, insomuch that his brother, Dr Giles Fletcher, the Civilian, was obliged to have recourse to her Majesty, by means of Mr Anthony Bacon and the Earl of Essex, for her favour and benevolence, who seemed to be inclined to grant them some relief. The petition, where we see an account of the state of his slender circumstances, and the causes alledged for it (124), was drawn up in the following terms:

1. 'That the Bishop was translated from the see of Worcester to that of London within two years, and so entered into new first-fruits, before he had fully paid the old; by which her Majesty's good and gracious meaning for his preferment was rather turned to his great hinderance, and the diminution of his temporal estate, having paid, within three years, or not much more, into the Exchequer, for his first-fruits, tenths, and subsidies, the sum of 1458 l.

2. 'He bestowed, in allowances and gratifications to divers attendants about her Majesty, since his preferment to the see of London, the sum of 3100 l. or thereabouts, without any regard made to himself, as appeared by his state of particulars; which money was given by him, for the most part of it, by her Majesty's direction and special appointment.

3. 'Finding the building and mansion-houses of the see of London greatly decayed, and in a manner ruined, he bestowed great sums of money in reparations upon the Episcopal houses at Wickham, Hadham, London, and Fulham; in which last he was at an extraordinary charge, out of respect as well to his duty and necessary use, as to her Majesty's satisfaction, hoping one day, as himself would say, after the end and pacification of her displeasure, and the recovery of her gracious favour, which of all worldly things he most desired, to see her Majesty in his house at Fulham.

4. 'He employed himself and his whole revenue in hospitality, and all other duties of his vocation, as for conscience, so with a special regard of her Majesty's liking, and to provoke her reconciliation and favour towards him.

5. 'He satisfied the error of his late marriage, with his untimely and unlooked for death, which proceeded especially from a sense of her Majesty's displeasure and indignation conceived against him; bearing a most loving and reverent affection towards her Majesty, as ever subject did towards his Prince, which might move her Majesty's royal heart to some compassion towards his poor and fatherless children, of whom he left eight behind him, divers of them very young. His debts, due to her Majesty and other creditors, were about 1400 l. and his whole estate but one house, in which his widow claimed her thirds: his plate was valued at 400 l. and his other stuff at 500 l. (125).

The Bishop's son, John Fletcher (126), the famous fellow play-writer with Beaumont, is said to have been born in Northampton, whilst his father was Dean of Peterborough, and to have been educated at Bennet College; but as this does by no means correspond with his age at the time of his death (*), so it is more probable he was a native of London, a person of that name and place being admitted pensioner there, October 15, 1591, when he must have been about fifteen years of age, the usual time of admission in those days. He was made one of the Bible clerks in 1593: but whether it was he, or Edward of the same name and place, who proceeded A. B. the following year, and afterwards A. M. cannot easily be determined. How long he staid at the College is equally uncertain, as well as how he disposed of himself after his removal; it is most probable however he went up to London, where he afterwards cultivated an acquaintance with Beaumont; for it could not be at the University, although they were both of the same, by reason of the disparity of their years (127).

[T] A monument was erected by the Countess of Dorset.] This honour to our Poet's memory, was invariably ascribed to the Earl of Essex, till the mistake was rectified by Mr Fenton (128), who not many years ago discovered that it was set up, above thirty years after Spenser's death, by Stone, master mason to King Charles I. (129), as appears from his Diary, which coming into the hands of Mr Vertue the Engraver, the following article was literally transcribed from it. I also mad a monument for Mer Spenser the Poett, and set it up at Westminster. For which the Countess of Dorset payed me 40 l. Mr Fenton further observes, that this Lady about the same time bestowed a monument on Daniel the Poet and Historian. Upon there being an epitaph that begins like Spenser, he was inclined to believe the Lady recommended both the Inscriptions to Stone, and that he undertook to compose them himself, as from the stile and spelling we may reasonably conclude he did, which will account too for the little exactness observed in the dates. The Inscription, as it now stands, is thus.

Heare lyes (expecting the second comminge of our Saviour, Christ Jesus) the body of Edmond Spenser, the Prince of Poets in his tyme, whose divine spirit needs noe other witnesses than the works which he left behind him. He was borne in London in the yeare 1510, and died in the yeare 1596.

Mr Church's friend (130) confirms the exactness of the transcript, from Stone's Diary by Mr Fenton, but ascribes the Inscription to the Countess of Dorset; in support of which he observes, that this Lady married Richard Earl of Dorset in February 1628, and he dying in March 28, 1624, she continued his widow till June 1630, when she married Philip Earl of Pembroke, and became his Dowager in January 1644 (131). Now as Stone was paid for Spenser's monument by the Countess of Dorset, that must be before her second marriage, in 1630. So that she could not put up Daniel's monument about the same time, since that was done when she was Dowager of Pembroke. It is agreed, she erected her own monument, and probably composed her own epitaph, leaving a blank for the date of her death; but this begins with much the same words that introduced both Daniel's and Spenser's, viz. Heare lyes expecting the second comminge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (+). With regard to the stile of Spenser's epitaph, this writer observes, that it is full and short, and in a much better manner, than that of ninety-nine epitaphs in a hundred of that time. However, the dates of 1510 and 1696 could not be Lady Dorset's, but must be imputed to the Carver. And we could produce many instances of epitaphs, where Blunders as enormous as these, have been made by Carvers. But this Writer did not sufficiently advert, that what he has said of the other part of the inscription, somewhat invalidates all his reasoning brought to prove that it was composed by the Countess. 'The Inscription, says he, and the table are very fair, yet the rest of the monument is like a honey comb, and indeed several agree that the table seems to have been made afresh, and of late years let into the rest of the monument, after the former Inscription had been much defaced.' We may remember too, that it stands near a door of continual passage, and till lately (when it became defended by the present screen) was much exposed to the weather, and that Spenser, probably in the last and Rebellion, had, on account of his description of the blatant beast, &c. much offended the Puritans, to whom, in B. VII. C. VII. St. 35. l. 8. he compares Barge-men

Bending their force contrary to their face,
Like that ungracious crew, which feigns demurest grace.

Dr Fuller indeed, and others, tell us, that the original Inscription was in Latin, grounding themselves probably

(127) Beaumont was born in 1585, and died in 1615.

(128) In Notes upon Waller.

(129) The same that built the banqueting-house at Whitehall, under the direction of Inigo Jones; but however skilful Stone might be (as Mr Fenton tells us he actually was) in other parts of masonry, it is certain he did not know the true way of beginning the taper of pillars, which therefore appear gouty in this part of that noble Pavilion.

(130) In Spenser's Life, ubi supra.

(131) See an account of her Ladyship in Vol. V. p. 3550. Rem. [N].

(+) The whole inscription is in Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 448.

illustrious by her birth than by her excellent endowments. We have no account of our Poet's widow after this; but she must have brought him one other child at least besides that which perished in the fire at Kilcolman; since, after the restoration of King Charles, his great grandson, Hugolin Spenser, was restored by the court of claims to so much of the lands in Ireland as could be found to have been his ancestor's (dd). And in the reign of K. William III. a person came from Ireland into England to solicit the same affair, and brought with him letters of recommendation as a descendant of Spenser. His name procured him a favourable reception; and he applied himself particularly to Mr Congreve, by whom he was recommended to the Earl of Halifax, who was then at the head of the Treasury, and by that means obtained his suit. This person was somewhat advanced in years, and might be the same mentioned before, having perhaps recovered some part only of the estate at first, or been disturbed in the possession of it. However, he could give no account of the works of his ancestor, which are wanting (cc), and which in some measure favours the opinion of Mr Fenton, that the Fairy Queen was never finished by our Author, and that the story of the six last books being lost in their passage from Ireland is no better than a fiction [U]. Some of his descendants, it is said, are still living in that kingdom; and there is an original picture of him in the possession of John Love, Esq; at Castle-Saffron, in the neighbourhood of Kilcolman (ff). We shall give a list of his works below [W].

bly upon the account given of it in a small Latin tract, describing the monuments of Westminster in the year 1600 (122), and ascribed to Camden, where the words are, EDMUNDUS SPENSER Londinensis, Anglicorum Poetarum nostri seculi facile Princeps, quod ejus Poemata, sacentibus Musis et videro Genio, conscripta, comprobant. Obiit immatura morte, anno salutis 1598. et prope Galfridum Chaucerum conditur, qui felicissimè Poesin Anglicis Literis primus illustravit. In quem hæc Scripta sunt Epitaphia.

Hic prope Chaucerum situs est Spenserius, illi
Proximus ingenio, Proximus ut tumulo.

Hic prope Chaucerum, Spensere Poeta, Poetam
Conderis, et versu quam tumulo propior;
Anglica, te vivo, vixit plaussitque Poesis;
Nunc moritura timet, te moriente, mori.

Here the words obiit immatura morte are used with sufficient propriety, as Spenser, according to our calculation, must have died at forty-five years of age. But though Winstanly and Sir Thomas Pope Blount have transcribed the whole as Spenser's epitaph, yet this is inconsiderately done; for besides that the prose part has not the form of a monumental Inscription, it is an Elogium intended only to guide the curious to that part of the Abbey in which the remains of so famous a person were deposited, for at that time he had no monument erected, of which, says Mr Fenton, the Latin Verses subjoined are an accessory proof, having been probably selected from those, that were written by the Poets who attended his Funeral, as being the most pertinent to inform posterity, that he was buried near Chaucer; which I think is all the merit they can justly pretend, being a servile imitation of Cardinal Bembo's epitaph on Sannazarius, and the immortal painter of Urbino (123).

[U] The story of his losing his last books, &c. is a fiction. Instead of deploring the fate, says Mr Fenton (124), of those six books which are supposed to be lost, I am intirely of opinion with Mr Dryden, that upon Sir Philip Sidney's death, Spenser was deprived both of means and spirit to accomplish his design. The story of their being lost in his voyage from Ireland, seems to be a fiction borrowed from the fate of Terence's Comædes, which itself has the air of a fiction, or at best is but a hearsay, that passed upon the Biographers without due examination. This censure apparently put Dr Birch upon enquiring farther into the matter. And that industrious Biographer having found it asserted, in Sir James Ware's History, that these last books perished by the neglect or abuse of a servant, who was sent to England by Spenser, in 1598, before his own last voyage thither; thereupon remarks, that Mr Fenton, though an ingenious Poet and Commentator, will scarce convince his Readers that the death of Sir Philip Sidney was sufficient to prevent Spenser from finishing his Poem, when it is evident he gave the world, after the loss of that Patron, six books of it, at the same time promising the rest, of which we actually have two Cantoes upon Mutability, equal, if not superior, to any of the rest, besides two Stanzas of another Canto. And the authority of so considerable a writer as Sir James Ware, who lived near the time, and was in a situation of informing himself about the fact, cannot justly be rejected as a mere unsupported hearsay, propagated without due examination. It is true, continues the Doctor, that in the thirty-third Sonnet of his Amoretti, written about 1592, Spenser speaks of the finishing of the Fairy Queen, as prevented by the cruelty of his Mistress, and in the eightieth he requires a little refreshment after so long a work as that of compiling the first six books of that Poem, and leisure to sing of his love's sweet praise, the contemplation of whose beauty would raise his spirit, and enable him to undertake his second work.

With strong endeavour, and attention due.

But these Sonnets, allowing the subjects of them to be real facts, and not poetical fiction, were composed at least five or six years before the last six books of the Fairy Queen are supposed to be lost, an interval long enough for so ready and inexhaustible a genius as Spenser's to compleat them, whose years bear no proportion to the number and perfection of his works. For the loss of those books could not have happened till after 1596, because he mentions in the title-page of the edition of the Fairy Queen that year, that the Poem would contain twelve books (125). I believe the Reader is beforehand with me in his censure of this reasoning, which is so notoriously inconsistent with the fact. The Fairy Queen, as has been already shewn, was begun in 1579 at latest, the first three books were finished in 1590, and the next three in 1596. This last, not to insist on the whole space, is an interval of six years, which is above twice the length of Spenser's life after 1596. Thus the Doctor's argument we see, instead of strengthening the testimony of Sir James Ware, serves rather to weaken it, and at the same time confirms the opinion of Mr Fenton, that they were never finished; which therefore we have embraced.

[W] A list of his Works. We shall mention them in the order of their publication, as follows.

I. The Shepheard's Calendar; Lond. 1579. and Lond. 1586. and again Lond. 1595. all by the Author. Long after these came out an elegant Latin translation, by Theodore Bathurst, Fellow of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, in 1653, 8vo; which was reprinted with the English original, and a short account of Spenser's Life and Writings in Latin, by Mr. John Ball, Lond. 1732, 8vo.

II. The Faerie Queen; disposed into twelve books, fashioning twelve Moral Vertues. Part 1. Lond. 1590. fol. containing the three first books; the second edition with alterations and additions, containing three new books (126), intituled The Second Part of the Faerie Queen; Lond. 1596. both by the Author; after his death came out a third edition, intituled The Faerie Queen, containing two new Cantoes, the only remains of a lost book intituled The Legend of Constancy; Lond. 1609. This edition was republished with a new title only in 1611, and again in 1617, and in 1629; another edition with cuts, by Kent, and an Account of the Author's Life and Writings, by Dr Thomas Birch, came out at London 1751, in three volumes, 4to. There were also three more editions of this Poem printed in the year 1758. One at London, in two volumes 8vo, by Anonymous. Another by Mr Upton, in two volumes 4to, ibid. And a third by Mr Church, at Oxford, in four volumes 8vo. To each of these there is annexed, An Account of the Author's Life and Writings, together with a Glossary.

(125) Birch's Life of Spenser; ubi supra.

(126) Viz. the fourth, fifth, and sixth. The Epitaphium Tbamisti, mentioned in one of his letters to be written in English Hexameters, is thought to be wrought by him afterwards into that beautiful Episode of The Marriage of Ice Thames and Medway, in the Ninth Canto of the fourth book.

(dd) Spenser's Life, prefixed to the edition of his works, in 1679, folio.

(cc) Life of Spenser, by Hughes, prefixed to his edition of our Poet's works in 1715.

(ff) Smith's Account of the present state of the county of Cork.

(122) Keape's Monumenta Westmonast.

(123) The same may be said of Godfrey Neller's epitaph on his monument in Westminster Abbey, Mr Pope.

(124) In notes on Waller, LIII.

III. Muiopotamos; or The Fate of the Butterfly; Lond. by the Author.

IV. Complaints containing sundry small Poems of the World's Vanity, as 1. The Ruines of Time. 2. The Teares of the Muses. 3. Virgil's Gnat. 4. Profopopæia; or Mother Hubbard's Tale. 5. The Ruines of Rome, by Bellaç. 6. Muiopotamos. 7. Visions of the World's Vanity. 8. Belley's Visions. 9. Petrarch's Visions (127): to which is annexed, an Advertisement by the Printer declaring, that the success of his late publication of the Fairy Queen had put him upon using all good means to procure these Poems, which had been dispersed so as not easily to be recovered by the Author himself, some of them having been purloined from him since his departure over sea. Besides these, continues he, the Author had written several others; as A Translation of Ecclesiastes, and Canticum Canticorum; A Senenight's Slumber; The Hell of Lovers; and Purgatory; all dedicated to Ladies, which together with some other Pieces scattered abroad, as The Dying Pellicane; The Hours of the Lord; The Sacrifice of a Sinner; The Seven Psalms; which the Printer, when he could obtain them from the Author, or otherwise, intended to publish. But this design proved abortive, and all these pieces have been long irrecoverably lost, as well as his Pageants; his Stemmata Dudleyana; The Court of Cupid; and A Translation of Mocha's Idyllion on Wandring Love, all mentioned, either in his literary Correspondence, or in other parts of his Works.

V. Astrophel; an Eclogue, or Pastoral Elegy, on the Death of Sir Philip Sidney; Lond. 1595.

VI. Colin Clout's come again; ibid. 1595.

VII. Four Hymns on Love, dedicated to the Countess of Cumberland; Lond. 1596.

VIII. A View of the State of Ireland, 1633; by Sir James Ware. This is the only treatise written by Spenser in prose, except that lost piece, intituled The English Poet, mentioned by his Friend E. K. in his Notes on The Shepherd's Calendar.

IX. The first Collection of his Works came out anonymous, under this title of The Works of that famous English Poet, Mr Edmund Spenser, viz. The Fairy Queen, The Shepherd's Calendar, The History of Ireland, &c. whereunto is added, a short Account of his Life, with other new Additions never before printed. This edition contains, besides other pieces before printed, the following: 1. Daphnaida. 2. An Elegy upon the death of the Noble and Virtuous Douglas Howard. 3. A Vision upon the Concert of the Fairy Queen. 4. A Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, explaining the Author's whole Intention in the Course of this Work, [Fairy Queen] dated Jan. 23, 1589. 5. The Mourning Muse of Thestylis. 6. An Elegie, or Friend's Passion for his Astrophel. 7. The Epitaph upon Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Governour of Flushing. 8. Prothalamion, or a Spousal Verse, &c. 10. Amoretti, or Sonnets, &c. with the Epithalamium on his marriage. 11. Britain's Ida, which is falsely ascribed to him. 12. Calendarium Pastorale, &c. a Theod. Bathurst, &c. with the Dedication to Francis Lane, Esq; by William Dillingham, Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, dated 1 Calend. Julii, 1653. To the whole is prefixed, five letters betwixt our Author and his Friend Mr Gab. Harvey, and another from E. K. to Mr Harvey, by way of a Dedication to him of the Shepherd's Calendar.

X. The Works of Edmund Spenser, Lond. 1715, in six volumes 12mo, by John Hughes, with an Account of his Life, Remarks upon his Writings, and a Glossary. Reprinted in 1750.

XI. A Translation of a Socratic Dialogue, intituled Axiochus; or of Death, is mentioned in the Account of Spenser's Life and Writings, prefixed to the edition of the Fairy Queen, by Mr Upton, who there gave us hopes of seeing it shortly in print, together with his other Works; but this design has proved abortive by the death of that learned and ingenious gentleman, which happened November 9, 1760 (128).

(127) These several Visions were probably the same with his Dreams, mentioned in a letter to Mr Harvey, who says they were in imitation of Petrarch's Visions.

(128) London Magazine for that month and year.

SPRAT [THOMAS], late Bishop of Rochester, generally esteemed one of the most elegant and correct of our English writers, was a clergyman's son, and born at Tallaton in Devonshire, in the year 1635, or 1636 (a). He was entred a commoner of Wadham-College in 1651, and admitted Scholar of the same 25 Septemb. 1652, being aged seventeen years. Under the influence of the most ingenious Dr John Wilkins, then Warden of that college, he made a great progress in all branches of the most valuable Learning, especially Mathematicks; and became a great admirer of Dr Seth Ward, Dr Ralph Bathurst, the incomparable Mr Christopher Wren, and other great promoters of true Philosophy (b). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts January 29, 1654, and that of Master June 11, 1657 (c), and was chosen Fellow of his college. Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell in 1658, he wrote a fine Pindarick Ode to the happy memory of that Ufurper [A]; wherein if

(a) Some Account of Bishop Sprat's Life and Writings; Lond. 1713, 8vo. Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 1096.

(b) Wood, ibid.

(c) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 105, 115.

[A] He wrote a fine Pindarick Ode to the memory of Oliver Cromwell. It was printed at London 1659, 4to. among others, under this title, 'Poems upon the death of his late Highness Oliver Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, written by Mr Edm. Waller, Mr Jo. Dryden, Mr Sprat of Oxford.' Our author's appearing in such good company, is what makes us say, that, 'if he erred, he erred among his Seniors and betters.' This juvenile performance was indeed often objected to him, and exposed him afterwards to frequent censure (1). Even J. Oldmixon (2) observes, that he 'has carried the panegyric on Oliver, in this poem, as far as any of the French panegyrist's have done in praise of the French King.' It is actually carried to a considerable highth, as will appear from these two or three instances.

(1) From Hen. Stubbe, in his Reply, &c. p. 31, &c.

(2) In his translation of F. Bouhours's celebrated piece, which he might with greater propriety have intituled The Art of Criticism, than the Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, p. 112.

'Tis true, great Name, thou art secure
From the forgetfulness and rage
Of Death, or Envy, or devouring Age;
Thou canst the force and teeth of Time endure:
Thy fame, like Men, the elder it doth grow,
Will of itself turn whiter too,
Without what needless Art can do;

Thou fought'st not out of Envy, Hope, or Hate,
But to refine the Church and State;
And like the Romans whate'er thou
In the field of Mars didst mow,
Was, that a holy Island hence might grow.

Thou fought'st not to be high or great,
Nor for a Scepter or a Crown,
Or Ermin, Purple, or the Throne;
But as the Vestal Heat,
Thy Fire was kindled from above alone.

Nor did thy battles make thee proud or high,
Thy Conquest rais'd the State, not thee:
Thou overcam'st thyself in every Victory.

Our Author's Dedication of this Poem to Dr Wilkins, shall be his own Apology. It is in these words: 'Sir, Seeing you are pleased to think fit that these Papers should come into the publick, which were at first designed to live only in a desk, or some private Friend's hands; I humbly take the boldness to commit them to the Security, which your Name and Protection will give them, with the most knowing part of the world. There are two things especially in which they stand in need of your defence: One is, That they fall so infinitely below the full and lofty Genius of that excellent Poet, who made this way of writing free of our nation*: The other, That they are so little proportioned and equal to the Renown of that Prince, on whom they were written. Such great Actions and Lives, deserving rather to be the Subjects of the noblest Pens and divine Fancies, than of such small Beginners and weak Effayers in Poetry as myself. Against these dangerous prejudices, there remains no other Shield than the Universal Esteem and Authority which your Judgment and Approbation carries with it. The right you have to them, Sir, is not only on the account of the Relation you had to this great Person, nor of the general favour which all Arts receive from

* Cowley.

if he erred, he erred among his seniors and betters. The next production of his promising genius, was another Pindarick Ode describing The Plague of Athens, which happened in the second year of the Peloponnesian war [B]. After the Restoration of King Charles II. he entered into holy orders (d), and became Chaplain to George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, whom he is said to have assisted in his witty compositions [C]. He was also made Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty (e): and Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1667, he did due honour to this learned body, by publishing the much admired History of it [D]. And the year following, he very handsomly vindicated the English Nation, against the insolent Reflections of one Sorbriere [E]. He also published Mr Cowley's

(c) Octob. 10, 1660, he was installed in the Prebend of Carleton with Thurlby in the Church of Lincoln, to which he was presented by his Majesty. Br. Willis's Survey, Vol. II. p. 161.

(d) He was ordained Priest March 10, 1660. Bishop Kennet Register and Chron. p. 881.

(3) Some Account of his Life &c. as above, p. 2.

(4) Carminum, Lib. 4. Ode 2.

(5) Some Account of his Life, &c. p. 14.

‘ you ; but more particularly by reason of that Obligation and Zeal, with which I am bound to dedicate myself to your Service : For having been a long time the Object of your Care and Indulgence towards the advantage of my Studies and Fortune, having been moulded (as it were) by your own hands, and formed under your Government ; not to intitle you to any thing which my meanness produces, would not only be Injustice, but Sacrilege.’

[B] Another Pindarick Ode describing The Plague of Athens, &c.] We are told (3), that this ‘ performance stood the test of the severest Criticks, and, without partiality to the author, it was given as the opinion of the best judges, That the manner of his great original was judiciously imitated, and that in the subject he far excelled both the Greek historian and the Latin poet.’ There is, indeed, in this Ode a great deal of the sublime ; the descriptions are strong ; and the painting lively and most affecting. But it sinks, in some places, into the low and the trifling ; particularly in stanza the eighth in these verses.

Next o'er the upper Town it spread,
With mad and undiscerned speed ;
In every corner, every street,
Without a guide did set its feet,
And too familiar every house did greet.

See also stanza the ninth.

Long ago had Horace observed, how difficult it is to imitate Pindar.

Pindarum quisquis studet æmulari,
Iule, ceratis ope Dædalea
Nūtūr pennis, vitreo daturus
Nomina ponto (4).

He that to equal Pindar tries,
With waxen wings he vainly flies
Too near exalted Fame :
And must expect a Fate like his
Who fell, and gave the Sea a name.

Creech.

[C] Whom he is said to have assisted in his witty compositions.] Particularly in his Rehearsal. And we are told, the Duke was often heard to say, ‘ That he never thought any of his compositions perfect, till they had received Mr Sprat's approbation (5).’

[D] By publishing the much admired History of it.] He intitled it ‘ The History of the Royal Society of London, for the improving of Natural Knowledge.’ First printed in 1667, 4to ; a second edition corrected came out in 1702, and another in 1734. It is divided into three parts. The first part treats of the Ancient Philosophy ; the second peculiarly describes the Royal Society ; and the third chiefly contains a defence and recommendation of Experimental Knowledge in general. In the second part are inserted several curious pieces ; as namely, Answers by Sir Philberto Vernatti, resident in Batavia, to certain inquiries sent thither by order of the Royal Society : A method for making a History of the Weather, by Mr Hook : Mr Rooke's direction for the Observations of the Eclipses of the Moon, and his Discourse concerning the Observations of the Eclipses of the Satellites of Jupiter : A proposal for making wine ; and Experiments of a Stone called Oculus Mundi, both by Dr Goddard : A relation of Pico Teneriffe : Experiments of the weight of Bodies increased in the Fire, made at the Tower : Experiments of the recoiling of Guns, by the Lord Brouncker : The history of the making of Salt-peter, by Mr Henshaw : The history of making Gun-powder : An apparatus to the history of the common practices of Dying, by Sir William Petty : And the history of the generation and ordering of Green Oysters, commonly called Colchester-Oysters. — Notwithstanding the Design was noble, and well executed ; it was cavilled at by some, especially by Henry Stubbe, a physician of Warwick, the H— of the last century ; who published, ‘ Legends no Histories : or a Specimen of some Animadversions upon the History of the Royal Society. Lond. 1670, 4to. And, Campanella revived, or an Enquiry into the History of the Royal Society, whether the Virtuosi there do not pursue the projects of Campanella for the reducing England unto Popery. Being an extract of a letter to a person of honour from H. S. With another letter to Sir N. N. relating the cause of the quarrel betwixt H. S. and the Royal Society ; and a Postscript concerning the quarrel between him and Dr Christopher Merrett. Lond. 1670, 4to. H. Stubbe also published, A Censure upon certain passages contained in the History of the Royal Society, as being destructive to the Established Religion and Church of England. To the second edition of which is added, The Letter of a Virtuoso in opposition to the Censure, a Reply unto the Letter aforesaid, and Reply unto the præfatory Answer of Eccobolius (Jof.) Glanville, Chaplain to Mr Rouse of Eaton (late Member of the Rump-Parliament,) Rector of Bath, and Fellow of the Royal Society. Also an Answer to the Letter of Dr Henry More, relating to Henry Stubbe Physician at Warwick.’ Oxford 1671, 4to. — A late author (6) is pleased to style The History of the Royal Society, ‘ a fustian History,’ — and adds, that ‘ it was esteemed an excellent composition by the metaphor — hunting mob of silly writings in Charles the Second's reign.’ A hard, and indeed unjust, censure.

For, much truer, as well as handsomer, is the Character given of it in A. Wood (7) ; that ‘ it is penned in so very fine, neat and graceful a style, as that some account it to be one of the most exact pieces for curiousness and delicacy of Language, that was ever yet extant in our tongue.’ And the ingenious Mr Cowley, in his Pindaric Ode prefixed thereto, and addressed to the Royal Society, pays this fine compliment to the Author.

And ne'er did fortune better yet
Th'Historian to the story fit.
As You, from all old errors free
And purge the body of Pholosophy ;
So from all modern follies He

Has vindicated eloquence and wit,
His candid style like a clean stream does slide,
And his bright fancy all the way
Does like the Sun-shine in it play ;
It does, like Thames the best of rivers, glide,
Where the God does not rudely overturn
But gently pour the chrystal urn,
And with judicious hand does the whole current guide.

'T has all the beauties Nature can impart,
And all the comely drefs without the paint of Art.

[E] Against the insolent Reflexions of one Sorbriere.] Those Reflexions were comprized in a Voyage to England, intitled, ‘ Relation d'un Voyage fait en Angleterre par Samuel Sorbriere.’ 12mo. Paris 1664. Mr Sprat exposes very smartly the pertness, petulance, and ignorance of that trifling Scribbler ; or, as he styles him (8), ‘ pragmatistical Reviler of one of the most powerful Kingdoms in Christendome.’ His answer is in form of ‘ A Letter containing some Observations on Monsieur de Sorbriere's Voyage into England ; written to Dr Wren, Professor of Astronomy in Oxford.’ Lond. 1664, 8vo. In the beginning of which Letter, he gives this character of Sorbriere's performance. ‘ - - Though it be an insolent Libel on our Nation, yet I doubt not, but you will peruse it with delight. For when you have beheld how many errors, and falsehoods, he has committed in this small Relation ; you cannot but be well pleased to find, ‘ that

(6) Cooper, in his Life of Socrates.

(7) Ath. ut supra, col. 2097.

(8) P. 3.

(f) Le Neve's
Fasti &c. edit.
1716. fol. p. 373.

(g) Wood, Ath.
ut supra.

(b) Idem, Fasti,
Vol. II. col. 175,
176.

(i) Le Neve, as
above, p. 387.

Life [F]. On the 22d of February 1668, he was installed Prebendary of Westminster (f): and soon after appointed Minister of St Margaret's (g). July the 3d, 1669, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity (b). And January 14, 1680, was also installed Canon of Windsor (i). The service he did the Court, by drawing up the account of the Conspiracy, known by the title of The Protestant Plot [G], procured him greater preferments. For in 1683, he was advanced to the Deanery of Westminster; being installed September the 21st (k). He was next promoted to the Bishopric of Rochester, and consecrated the 2d of November 1684 (l). And on the 29th of December 1685, was sworn Clerk of the (k) Wood, Ath.

col. 1096.

(l) Lond. Gaz.
No. 1979.

(9) P. 2.

‘ that whoever undertakes to defame your Country, he must, at the same time, forfeit his Wit, and his Understanding, as well as his good Manners (9).’
——So Scandalous were Sorbier's reflexions, that King Lewis XIV. published an arrêt, or order, of his Council, for suppressing that Book in France.

[F] He also wrote Mr Cowley's life. He wrote it first in Latin, and prefixed it to Mr Cowley's six books De Plantis, printed at London 1668. 8vo. Afterwards he drew it up in a fuller manner in English, and placed it at the head of Mr Cowley's Poems, who had recommended to him, in his will, the care of his printed works and manuscript papers. But the pious Mr Edmund Elys, of Exeter-College, Oxford, taking umbrage at some passages in it, published, ‘ An Exclamation to all those that love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, against an apology, written by an ingenious person, for Mr Abraham Cowley's lascivious and profane verses.’ Lond. 4to (10).

(10) Wood, Ath.
Vol. II. col. 943,
1097.

[G] By drawing up the account of the Conspiracy, known by the title of the Protestant Plot. It was printed in 1685. fol. with this title, ‘ A true Account and Declaration of the horrid Conspiracy against the late King, his present Majesty, and the Government: As it was ordered to be published by his late Majesty.’ Reprinted in 1686. 8vo. As this was a most odious talk, and that exposed our Author to the Resentment of persons of great titles and high stations, and indeed of the bulk of the nation; he found it necessary, after the Revolution, to write an Apology for himself, in a Second Letter to the Earl of Dorset: wherein he thus speaks upon the subject of this book.——‘ First, my Lord, as for the book of the Conspiracy, it is true, I have often heard that some noble and eminent persons, whose Kindred or Friends were unhappily concerned in the subject of that History, had entertained a prejudice against me thereupon. But to them I shall make this equitable request, that they would suspend any farther censure of me for what I did write, till they shall be fairly informed how much there is that I have not written.

‘ I will not deny, that it was at the Request, or rather the Command, of King Charles the Second, that I drew up a relation of that Plot: And to that end, I had free liberty to consult the Paper-Office and Council-books, whence I was plentifully furnished with such authentick Materials, either of Papers printed by Authority, or of sworn Depositions and Confessions, as have been always thought the best ground for an Historian to work upon. But now, my Lord, I can still alledg, that though a vast heap of such matter was immediately supplied to my hands; and though I often received earnest Messages, and some sharp Words from that gentle King to quicken my slowness, yet more than twelve months had passed before I could be brought to put pen to paper; out of my natural aversion to any business, that might reflect severely upon any man: my own inclination rather leading me to the other extreme, that is, rather to commend too much what in the least seems well done, than to aggravate what is ill done by others. However, upon King Charles's frequent commands, and continued importunity, I did at length obey; and the rather, because I had formerly somewhat incurred that King's and his brother's displeasure, by my declining to write against the states of Holland, during the time of the first and second Dutch wars. Being thus over-persuaded, I made my Collections, and presented them to that King: Which his Majesty having himself perused, was pleased to direct me to put them into the hands of the Lord Keeper North, who carefully read and corrected what I had done, and added divers matters of fact, which had escaped my observation. Thus the work stood in preparation for the press, when the deplorable death of that King happened. And shortly after King James the Second calling for the Papers; and having read them, and altered divers passages; caused them to be printed by his own authority, as is

‘ to be seen before the Book. But now, my Lord, I can truly declare, that during my composing those collections, I earnestly requested King Charles the Second, that few or no Names of persons should be mentioned, whatever probable suggestions might be against them, but only such, upon whom publick Judgment had passed, which it could be to no purpose for me to conceal. I could indeed have wished, that my Lord Ruffel's, and some other Names of Persons of Honour, might have been of the number to be omitted, upon that very account; but it was none of my fault that they were not. I could not hinder, nor did I in the least contribute to their fall: Nay I lamented it, especially my Lord Ruffel's, after I was fully convinced by discourse with the Reverend Dean of Canterbury, of that noble Gentleman's great probity, and constant abhorrence of falsehood; but that was a good while after. All that I did, was the publishing, or rather indeed the putting together methodically, what before was sufficiently published in printed Papers that were licensed: And out of them to draw the substance of a Declaration of State, in vindication of that which the Authority of the nation, at that time, called, The Publick Justice of the Kingdom. But, my Lord, to return to what I was saying. King Charles having granted my desire of concealing divers Names, according to this allowance I proceeded, leaving out some, and abbreviating others; endeavouring all along to spare Parties and Families, and particular Persons, as much as would be allowed. All which may be demonstrated from the Copies of the Depositions, as they went out of my hands, where there were several Names visibly marked by my own pen, to be passed by in the publication. So that if some indifferent man should now compare the informations as they are in print, with the Originals in the Secretary's, or the Paper-Office, he would, it may be, be apter to suspect me of connivance, than of calumny on that side. If I have now given your Lordship any satisfaction touching my fair dealing in my part of that Book, I doubt not but what follows will give you more; when I shall assure you of my having refused to write a Continuation of the same History. For, my Lord, it was some time after the Duke of Monmouth's overthrow and execution, that King James the Second required me to undertake such another task, and presently to set about a Second Part. To that purpose his Majesty gave me a sight of multitudes of Original Letters and Papers, together with the Confessions of several persons then taken in England and Scotland; who did indeed seem all to outvie one another, who should reveal most, both of Men and Things, relating to the Old Conspiracy, as well as to the Duke of Monmouth's, and the Earl of Argyle's invasion. But finding the Innocence of divers Persons of Worth and Honour touched in those Papers, and by that time beginning vehemently to suspect, things were running apace towards the endangering of our Laws and Religion, I must say, I never could be induced by all his Majesty's reiterated commands, to go on with that work. Instead of that, though I had all the Materials for such a Narrative within my power, for above three years, and might easily have finished it in a month or six weeks space, yet I chose rather to suppress and silence, as much as I could, all that new Evidence; which, if openly produced, would have blemished the Reputation of some honourable persons. Give me leave, my Lord, only to add, That I am confident there are several Original Papers still in being, which would be more than enough to convince all impartial men, how moderate and tender I was in that cause.—There is something very stinging in what he says of the Lord Ruffel; ‘ that he was carried away into this traiterous enterprise, by a vain Air of popularity, and a wild Suspicion of losing a great Estate by an imaginary return of Popery;’—meaning the Abbey-lands (11).

* Dr Tillotson

(11) Account of the Conspiracy,
8vo edit. p. 28.

Closet to King James II (m). In 1686, he was put in the Ecclesiastical Commission, then newly erected (n); and acted under it, in hopes of being translated to the vacant See of York, of which some hints had been given by the Court (o): But he found himself mistaken, and this imprudent compliance exposed him to the contempt and resentment of all good and considerate men. So that, after the Revolution, he was forced to endeavour to take off the bad impressions caused thereby, in two Letters written to the Earl of Dorset [17]. He was one of the persons employed to draw up the Form of Thanksgiving for the

(e) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, ed. 1753, 8vo. Vol. II. p. 371.

[17] In two Letters written to the Earl of Dorset.] The first begins thus, 'My Lord, I think I should be wanting to myself at this time, in my own necessary Vindication, should I forbear any longer to give my Friends a true account of my Behaviour in the late Ecclesiastical Commission. Though I profess, what I shall now say, I only intend as a reasonable Mitigation of the Offence I have given, not entirely to justify my Sitting in that Court; for which, I acknowledge, I have deservedly incurred the Censure of many good Men; and I wish I may ever be able to make a sufficient amends to my Country for it. Yet thus much, my Lord, I can justly alledg for myself, That the Commission was made, and my Name put into it, altogether without my knowledge; when I happened to be at Salisbury, holding an Archiepiscopal Visitation with the Bishop of Chichester, and other Commissioners At my return from thence to London, I found I was appointed to be one in a new Commission: But I could never see a copy of it, nor did I ever hear its contents, or know the powers granted in it, till the time of its being publickly opened at Whitehall; whither I was sent for, on purpose, in haste, that very morning from my house in the country. . . . Upon the first publishing the Commission, I confess through my ignorance in the Laws, I had little or no objection in my thoughts against the Legality of it; especially when I considered, that having passed the broad Seal, it must needs, according to my apprehension, have been examined and approved by the King's learned Council in the law, men generally esteemed of eminent skill in their profession. Besides, I was farther confirmed (though too rashly I grant) in my Error, when I saw two Gentlemen of the long robe, persons of the greatest place and authority in Westminster-hall (12), joined with us; who, I should have thought, would never have ventured their fortunes and reputations, by exercising a jurisdiction that was illegal. And I believed I had reason to conclude, that this very argument might prevail also with some others of the temporal Lords that sat among us: particularly the Earl of Rochester has often assured me, it was that which induced him to accept of the Commission; and that he did it, as I myself did, with a purpose of doing as much good as we were able, and of hindering as much evil as we possibly could, in that unfortunate juncture of affairs. As for my own part, I was startled when I perceived my Lord of Canterbury (13) scrupled to be present with us; whose Example, it is true, I ought rather to have followed than the greatest Lawyers in all matters of Conscience. Yet I hope his Grace will excuse me, if I declare, that I did not at first know he made a matter of Conscience of it. Nor did I understand his Grace took exception at the Lawfulness of the Commission itself, till after my Lord of London (14) was cited, and had appeared and answered, and the unjust sentence was past against him. For it was on the very day the Commission was opened, immediately, as I remember, after it was read, that my Lord of London was informed against for not suspending Dr Sharpe: Which, though it exceedingly surprized me at first, yet observing with what heat the prosecution was like to be carried on against him, that very consideration did the more incline me to sit and act there, that I might be in some capacity of doing right to his Lordship. And whether I did him any service through the whole process of his cause, I leave it to my Lord himself to judge. That I gave my positive vote for his Acquittal, both the times when his suspension came in question, I suppose I need not tell the world. Having thus, in the beginning of that court, and the highest ferment of it, freely discharged my conscience, by endeavouring to clear my Lord of London, I must own I thenceforth unawares took a resolution, which, how hurtful soever it may now prove to myself, yet I am still apt to believe, did the Church of England no disservice in the main, my design, by conti-

VOL. VI. No. CCCXIX.

ning longer among them, was to make sure of one Vote at least, and to do my part, to the utmost of my small interest and ability, to lessen the blow which I feared was coming on the Clergy, since it could not altogether be avoided. And I was the more persuaded to take this course, not only because the Legality or Illegality of the Commission seemed at first rather a moot-case, than a determined point either way; divers of the principal Lawyers, as I was told, being divided in their opinions concerning it; but also because I saw some other persons were ready to fill my chair there, as soon as it should be empty; Men of whose principles and practices I was so well aware, that I knew they would not have the same regard as myself for the Churches preservation. And perhaps I might add this further for the extenuation of my fault, that I was not discouraged by some grave and worthy persons, for this very purpose, to keep in some longer time; but I forbear to name them, that I may not involve any good man in my infelicity. However, upon these motives I acted, and, in pursuance of this design, God knows, I voted as long as I remained at the board; where all my opinions were so contrary to the humour of the Court, that I often thought myself to be really in as much hazard from the Commission itself, by my not complying, as any of my brethren could be that were out of it. I appeal to all that were acquainted with the transactions there, whether ever I gave my consent to any irregular or arbitrary sentence; whether I did not constantly and firmly declare against every extravagant decree. I could almost presume to affirm, that I was, as far as in me lay, some way or other, a common solicitor, or advocate, for all that were unjustly prosecuted before them. And I might exemplify this beyond all contradiction, if I should enumerate every particular cause that came under their cognizance. After my Lord of London was sentenced, his Lordship knows, I was always upon the watch to obstruct all further proceedings against him: Nay, his Lordship well remembers, I had once obtained to have his suspension taken off; if he would but have made an ordinary submission. Then I was zealous for Exeter-College, in their defence against Father Petre, in a business of so great importance, that if the college had been overcome in the suit, that whole Society must soon have been abandoned to Popery. I did my utmost to oppose the violent persecution upon the whole university of Cambridge, when the Vice-Chancellor was suspended his office, and his Mastership of Magdalen-College; because a Popish Priest, who was one of the Missionaries to pervert the Scholars, was denied a degree in their Convocation. I faithfully assisted and served Christ-Church in Oxford, when they were in danger of having new statutes imposed upon them, which would infallibly have laid open that royal College, to the ruine of their good learning and religion. I absolutely resisted all the alterations in the Statutes of Sidney-College, and all other changes and abrogations of Oaths, that were then made or designed in the statutes of either University, for the advantage of Popish Priests and students, and for the freer course of Mandamus's in their favour. I ever gave my advice for all sorts of business, to be returned into the common course of justice; as that all ecclesiastical matters should be referred back to the several Bishops from whose dioceses the complaints were brought; and that all informations against Colleges and Hospitals should be recommitted to their proper visitors. I persisted unmoleable in my dissent from every vote that passed against Magdalen-College in Oxford; from their very first citation before that court, to the cruel incapacitating of the President and Fellows. I could mention many other particulars, wherein I successfully laboured to relieve divers of the inferior and greater Clergy from oppression; to prevent some from being called before us at all; to preserve others after they were accused by malicious sycophants and informers, that swarmed then every where: some in the case of Tythes; some

(m) Wood, ibid. But he was not Dean of the Chapel, as is said in the General Dictionary.

(n) See that Commission in the Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719. p. 453.

(12) L. C. J. Jefferys, and Sir Edward Herbert.

(13) Archbishop Bancroft.

(14) Bishop Compton.

(p) Complete
Hist. as above,
p. 496.

the Queen's being with child of the pretended Prince of Wales (p) [I]. But August 15, 1688, he withdrew himself from the Ecclesiastical Commission [K], and thenceforth concurred

(*) Dr T. Barlow.

(15) Vol. III.
p. 507. note.

some for pressing Churchwardens to take legal Oaths; some for not reading, some for preaching against the King's declaration. But there are two eminent instances, which I cannot omit. The one, that when the Bishop of Lincoln (*), was petitioned against by his Archdeacon, and there was, at that time, inclination enough in the Court to pursue him to extremity, yet our Author says, that he so effectually wrought with the Commissioners, that the prosecution against him was discountenanced and fell to the ground. But the author of the Complete History of England informs us (15), that Bishop Barlow's engaging to write in favour of the Dispensing Power, proved his best security and protection.—The other instance (as our Author's Apology goes on) concerns my Lord of Canterbury; and I am confident his Grace will readily give me this testimony, That I served him honestly and industriously on some occasions, wherein he was like to be embroiled with the Commission; which must inevitably have ended in his Grace's suspension at least, since he was resolved, whenever he should be brought before them, whatever the pretence had been, to deny the whole Power and Jurisdiction of the Court. As for the last scene transacted there, which was in order to censure the whole Clergy, for refusing to read the Declaration: In that I hope I need say nothing in my defence, it being publickly known to the whole Nation, how I then demeaned myself; how I broke loose from the Commission, in a time when I was convinced I could do the Church no farther service there, and when the Popish party was in the height of their power and rage. Then it was that I joined myself again to the common interest of the honest Clergy, just when they were on the very brink of destruction, before we ever dreamt of this glorious Deliverance. . . . Upon the whole matter therefore, though as to the legal part of the Commission, which belonged to Lawyers to judge of, I was mistaken, for acting in it at all: Yet in the conscientious part, which properly concerned me as a Divine, to act in it honestly and sincerely, according to the best of my judgment; in that, if I shall not be thought to deserve thanks, yet I hope I may obtain pardon from all men of candour and ingenuity.—As this Letter contains the most plausible Excuses that could be made for the most exceptionable part of our Prelate's conduct, we thought it a point of justice due to him, to lay this long Extract of it before the Reader.

[I] He was one of the persons employed to draw up the Form of Thanksgiving for the Queen's being with child, &c.] It was upon that occasion, that a ballad was made, beginning with the following stanza.

(16) i. e. Thomas Sprat, Thomas White bishop of Peterborough, and Nathanael Crew bishop of Durham.

Two Toms, and Nat (16),
In Council sat,
To rig out a Thanksgiving,
And make a pray'r,
For a thing in the air,
That's neither dead nor living, &c.

(17) P. 16.
edit. 1711, 8vo.

[K] He withdrew himself from the Ecclesiastical Commission.] In his Second Letter to the Earl of Dorset (17), he declares, that his attendance at the Tryal of the Seven Bishops, was the critical Time when he came to be convinced of the Illegality of the Commission, and took a resolution to abandon it.—For my part, says he, I must own, I was so fully satisfied by the excellent Pleadings of those great Lawyers at that tryal, that I confess I never had till then so clear a notion, what unalterable Bounds the law has fixed between the just Prerogatives of the Crown, and the legal Rights of the Subject. And therefore from that very day I hastened to make what reparations I could for the Errors occasioned by my former ignorance; and to act for the future, what I always intended, as became a true Englishman. Nor was it long after, that I met with a signal opportunity to put this my purpose in practice: For perceiving the rage of the Popish party against the Church of England was rather heightened than abated, by my Lords the Bishops being acquitted; and fearing the Ecclesiastical Commission was next to be employed, to wreak the Papists' revenge on the orthodox clergy, when Westminster-hall could not do it, I presently resolved to desert that commission, from whence I had often before laboured and intreated in vain to be fairly dismissed: And immediately I sent the Commissioners the following Letter, whereof your Lordship may remember I then presented you with a copy; as knowing how much you would be pleased, with my other friends, at my forsaking that board upon any terms.—My Lords, I most humbly intreat your Lordships favourable interpretation of what I now write, That since your Lordships are resolved to proceed against those, who have not complied with the King's commands in reading his Declaration, it is absolutely impossible for me to serve his Majesty any longer in this Commission, I beg leave to tell your Lordships, that though I myself did submit in that particular, yet I will never be any ways instrumental in punishing those my Brethren who did not. For, as I call God to witness, that what I did was merely upon a principle of Conscience; so I am fully satisfied, that their forbearance was upon the same principle. I have no reason to think otherwise of the whole body of our Clergy, who, upon all occasions, have signalized their loyalty to the Crown, and their zealous affections to his present Majesty's person in the worst of times. Now, my Lords, the safety of the whole Church of England seeming to be exceedingly concerned in this prosecution, I must declare, that I cannot, with a safe conscience, sit as Judge in this cause, upon so many pious and excellent men: With whom, if it be God's will, it rather becomes me to suffer, than to be in the least necessary to their suffering. I therefore earnestly request your Lordships to intercede with the King; that I may be graciously dismissed any farther attendance at your board, and to assure his Majesty, that I am still ready to sacrifice whatever I have to his service, but my Conscience and Religion.

Bromley Aug. 15, 1688.

My Lords &c.

Your Lordship seeing what I have said in this letter, concerning my submitting in that business of the Declaration, upon a principle of Conscience, as I then thought, you may expect my reason for doing so. I must frankly confess, I had then a doubt in my mind, arising from a Rubrick in the Common Prayer (which is as much as any other a law in the land) whether a Bishop could lawfully deny the reading of whatever the King should ordain to be read in Churches. And 'twas merely upon that mistaken scruple of conscience, I was induced not to oppose that command of the King in council; I say not to oppose it: Farther than that, I still say, I went not in that business. For it is most true, that the Orders of Council, for publishing that Declaration in Churches, were dispersed through the places of my jurisdiction immediately from the King's printing-house, without my injunction, or so much as my knowledge. And after they were sent abroad, though I did not, 'tis true, revoke them, as not being then well determined in the case; yet I nowhere insisted to have them obeyed. Nay both in my own diocese of Rochester, and in that of London, where I had then very unwillingly some inspection, there is no one Clergyman can upbraid me for urging any man to read, or reproving any for not reading the Declaration. If it shall be objected, that I permitted it to be read in Westminster-abbey, I desire it may be also considered, what dreadful Apprehensions this Royal Church and School were then under, from our neighbours the Jesuits at Court; who lay in wait to take any advantage, whereby they might stir up the King to ruin us. Besides that a Quo Warranto was then actually issued out against us, and we were every day threatened, that as we were the nearest, so we should fall the first prey into the hands of the Popish Priests. But to go on; I need not remind your Lordship what wrath and indignation this Letter to the Commissioners produced against me from the Jesuited Party at Court; for which yet I esteemed myself abundantly recompensed by the Peace it gave me in my own mind, and I hope I may say by the good will it revived towards me in the hearts of good men; especially of my Lord Archbishop, and the other persecuted Bishops, with whom I ever after acted in perfect conjunction for the publick Good.—

Else-

curred with the rest of the Bishops, in such salutary measures as were thought most for the advantage of the nation (q). He was one of the managers in the conference concerning the Abdication of King James II, and one of those who voted against the throne's being vacant (r). Notwithstanding which, he submitted to the new government, and remained unmolested in his See; but undoubtedly he was forced to buy his peace, by giving up to the Court the disposal of his best preferments, as the Bishop of Durham was obliged to do (s). In 1692, a most villainous conspiracy was formed against his life, and the lives of several other persons of honor and distinction; by forging an Association under their hands, to restore King James, and seize the Princess of Orange [L]. But, after a short confinement, and strict examination before the Privy-Council, he was honorably acquitted. From thenceforth he spent the remainder of his days in a happy tranquillity, charitable and generous to all, esteemed by the impartial and disinterested, and beloved by his acquaintance (t). He joined himself to those who were looked upon as best affected to the Church, and voted with them; as in Dr Sacheverell's affair &c. (u). At length he dyed at Bromley in Kent, May 20, 1713, of an apoplexy, in the seventy-ninth year of his age; and was buried in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was afterwards erected to him (v). He left only one son named Thomas, who was Archdeacon of Rochester, Prebendary of the Churches of Rochester, Winchester, and Westminster; and who dyed May 10, 1720, aged forty-one. Our learned Author, besides his several works already mentioned, published some Sermons, and a few other pieces, of which an account is given in the note [M].

Elsewhere, the Bishop more fully explains the great danger he exposed himself to, by thus relinquishing the Commission. 'This is certain (says he) that my leaving and defying the Commission at that time, did apparently exasperate the Popish Priests, and the Ringleaders of the Jesuitical Faction against me, to the highest degree imaginable. Nay, some worthy men have made me almost so vain as to fancy, that my bidding the Commission then farewell in so public and peremptory a manner, was no inconsiderable stroke towards the dissolution of the Commission itself. It is evident, that immediately upon the receipt of my Letter, wherein I renounced them, they adjourned in confusion for six months, and scarce ever met afterwards. Thus far I am sure, my perpetual behaviour therein was so much all of a piece, so directly against the vogue of the Court, and the counsels of Popery then prevailing; and the effects of it did so visibly destroy my former interest with the King, that whereas it is manifest I was, when the Commission began, in as fair a probability as any Clergyman in England, to receive great effects of his Majesty's favour; yet after my opposing my Lord Bishop of London's suspension, and my other votes conformable to that, I fell by degrees under his severe displeasure. I might add moreover, that it is very probable, I was at last in more imminent Danger than any of my Brethren; I say, my Lord, than any of my Brethren, the seven petitioning Bishops, and my Lord of London only excepted (18).'

An Answer to each of these Letters was published in 1689, said to have been written by one Mr Charlton (19).

[L] In 1692, a most villainous conspiracy was formed against his life, and the lives of several other persons of honor and distinction; by forging an Association, &c.] This most wicked Contrivance was formed, by one Robert Young, a Scotchman, (who had insinuated himself into Deacon's orders by forged certificates, and afterwards had forged his Priest's orders, but had been degraded for Bigamy, and other the most heinous of crimes,) and Stephen Blackhead, both prisoners in Newgate; the latter for forging a Bond. They contrived an Association, to which they affixed the forged hands of W. Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, Tho. Sprat Bishop of Rochester, the Earls of Marleborough and Salisbury, Lord Cornbury, Sir Basil Firebrace, and John Wilcox. The substance of the Association was, That they would contribute their utmost assistance towards King James's Recovery of his Kingdoms; would have 30,000 men ready to meet him at his landing; would seize the Princess of Orange dead or alive, &c. It was dated March 20—91. In order to come at the Bishop's hand to counterfeit it, R. Young sends by Blackhead, in April 1692, a Letter to the Bishop then at Bromley, under the feigned name of one Robert Hookes, D. D. Rector of Windgrave in Buckinghamshire; pretending, that one James Curtis had applied to him to be his Curate; but, that having reason to suspect his instruments were forged, he desired the Bishop to send him word, under his own hand, by the bearer his man, whether he had ordained such a one, in such, or such years. The Bishop, after searching his books, writes a letter, importing, that he had never ordained any such person. This letter being brought to Young, he copies thence the Bishop's hand to the Association. And then, in order to lodge it in the Bishop's house, Young sends Blackhead a second time to Bromley; under pretence of telling his Lordship, that Dr Hookes had seized Curtis, and would have him severely punished. In reality, Blackhead's intention was, to leave the Association in the Bishop's Study; and for that purpose earnestly desired to see the House, particularly the Study: But this not being granted him, he found an opportunity of dropping the Association into a Flower-pot in the chimney of the great Parlour, the door of which was without a lock. Immediately after, Young lodged an Information before the Privy-Council. In pursuance of which, May 7, 1692, Mr Dyve, Clerk of the Council, and Mr Knight, one of the King's Messengers, went to Bromley, and arrested the Bishop upon suspicion of high-treason: who being brought to his lodgings in Westminster, was put under the charge of the messenger and a guard of four soldiers night and day; and thus he continued eleven days.—In the mean time, the messenger having omitted searching the room wherein the Association was, Young sent Blackhead a third time to Bromley, on Whitsunday, May the 15th, to try to recover it, being the original. Accordingly, getting privately into the parlour, unseen by the family, he took the Association out of the same Flower-pot where he had laid it, and returned it back to Young.—The Bishop was examined before the Council, May the 8th, and remained in confinement till the 18th, when, upon his petition, he was enlarged, and retired the next morning early to Bromley: But June the 9th he was sent for again, and examined a second time on the 10th, and again on the 13th, and being confronted with Blackhead and Young, his Innocence so plainly appeared, that he was honorably acquitted.—His Lordship published an Account of it under this title, 'A Relation of the late wicked Contrivance of Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young, against the Lives of several Persons, by forging an Association under their hands. Written by the Bishop of Rochester. In two Parts: The first Part being a Relation of what passed at the three Examinations of the said Bishop by a Committee of the Privy-Council. The Second being an Account of the two above mentioned Authors of the Forgery.' Lond. 1692, and 1693. 4to. Upon the whole, it was one of the most horrid scenes of wickedness that ever was invented. And so thankful to Providence was the Bishop for his happy Deliverance, that he kept a Thanksgiving day for it as long as he lived (20).

[M] Besides his several works already mentioned, published some Sermons, &c.] The Sermons were published at several times, as they were preached, and reprinted together in 1710 and 1722, 8vo. They were preached before the King, the House of Commons, at the anniversary meeting of Clergymen's sons, before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, the Artillery-company, &c. The last mentioned, which is on Luke xxii. part of the 36th verse, we are told (21), is almost word for word the same with a Sermon preached by Dr Smallwood in Flanders, upon the same text.—As to his other pieces, they were, A Discourse to the Clergy of his Diocese at his Visitation in the year 1695. Lond 1696. 4to. &c.

(u) See the Doctor's Trial, and History of Queen Anne by Abel Boyer, fol. Lond. 1735. P. 444, 445.

(v) Some Account of his Life, p. 14.

(20) See his Will; and the Conclusion of his Relation of that wicked Contrivance.

(21) N. Salmon's Lives of the English Bishops, 8vo. 1733. P. 328.

(q) His second Letter to the Earl of Dorset, edit. 1711. 3to. p. 16, 17.

(r) See N. Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, fol. Vol. III. in the Summary, p. 162.

(s) From the information of a late Prebendary of Durham.

(t) Some Account of his Life, as above; and the Lives of the Poets by Cibber, Vol. III. p. 239.

(18) First Letter to the Earl of Dorset, p. 8.

(19) Wood, Ath. at supra, col. 1093.

(x) Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 1096, 1097, and Boyer's Annual List, at the end of his Hist. of Queen Anne, p. 60. and Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. IV. p. 406.

As to his Character [N], we are informed, that he was a person of neat and bright parts, a good, charitable, and learned Divine; a commanding and eloquent preacher; an excellent poet; justly esteemed a great master of our language; one of our correctest writers (x); and one who deserves the first rank in history, for his mastery in the art of Oratory [O]; and his raising the English tongue to that purity and beauty, which former writers were wholly strangers to, and those who came after him can but imitate (y). But the right honorable the Earl of Orrery hath passed a very different judgment upon his style and manner of writing [P].

(y) Boyer, ibid. and Some Account of his life, p. 14.

[N] As to his character.] Some say, that 'he bore a dubious character as to his Principles in Divinity and Politicks, being said to accommodate one to the other, and both to the times, and persons in power (22).' And others, that 'his parts were bright in his youth, and gave great hopes; but these were blasted by a lazy libertine course of life, to which his temper and good nature carried him, without considering the duties or even the decencies of his profession (23).' But with some this will only pass for slander.—On the other hand, the late author of his life (24), observes, that 'in the character of a dignified clergyman, he has a claim to be copied in those retired and private virtues, in those acts of beneficence and humility, and that unaffected and primitive piety, for which he was justly distinguished.'

(22) Boyer's annual List, p. 60.

(23) Burnet, as above, p. 406.

(24) Lives of the Poets by Cibber, Vol. III. p. 242.

(25) Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, as above, p. 417.

(26) 8vo. edit. 1752. p. 219.

[O] For his mastery in the art of Oratory.] J. Oldmixon, though otherwise no very equitable judge, owns, that 'in the sublime way, Dr Sprat, and Dr Burnet of the Charter-house, in prose; and Milton in verse, are equally eminent (25).'

[P] The right honorable the Earl of Orrery hath passed a very different judgment upon his style and manner of writing.] It is in his Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr Swift (26); and what his Lordship says upon that occasion, is in these words. 'Among our English writers, few men have gained a greater character for elegance and correctness, than Sprat bishop of Rochester, and few men have deserved it less. When I have read his works, I have always wondered from whence such a piece of good fortune might have arisen, and could only attribute it to Mr Cowley, who, in a very delicate copy of verses, has celebrated his friend Dr Sprat for eloquence, wit, and a certain candid style, which the poet compares to the river Thames, gliding with an even current, and displaying the most beautiful appearances of nature (27). Poets and painters have their favourites, whom they transmit to posterity in what colours and attitudes they please: but I am mistaken, if, upon a review of Sprat's works, his language will not sooner give you an idea of one of the insignificant tottering boats upon the Thames, than of the smooth noble current of the river itself.'—Such is his Lordship's censure: But, on the other hand, it may be observed, That too smooth and uniform a style is apt to lull the reader asleep; whereas a beautiful metaphor, or other awakening figure, well-placed, rouses his attention, and makes him go on with fresh vigour and pleasure. C

(27) See above, note [D].

STANLEY [THOMAS], a very learned person, in the last century, was the son of Sir Thomas Stanley Knight, and born at Comberlow, within the parish of Clothall in Hertfordshire (a) [A]. After having been educated in grammar-learning, in his father's own house, by the ingenious Mr Edward Fairfax [B]; he was admitted a gentleman-commoner of Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, at the age of thirteen, and became an early proficient in all sorts of polite-literature, not without the assistance of Mr Fairfax, as well during his stay in the university, as afterwards. In 1640 he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, having taken before that degree at Cambridge (b). Then he travelled for his improvement into foreign countries, and on his return [C] lived, during part of the civil wars, in the Middle-Temple; where he entered into an intimate friendship, and prosecuted his studies, in the most industrious and successful manner, with the learned Edward Sherburne, Esq; (c), who had retired thither after the Surrender of Oxford to the parliament-forces.

(a) Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire, by Sir Henry Chauncy, fol. p. 51.

(b) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. ed. 1721. col. 284.

(c) See the article SHERBURNE [EDWARD].

[A] Was born at Comberlow.] He was born in the manor-house of Comberlow, a Seat built by John Comberlow. It might seem probable, that he was descended from the noble family of Stanley, Earls of Derby. But all we can learn, is, that, his grandfather Thomas (1) Stanley, Esq; was a citizen and scrivener of London; and his father, Thomas Stanley, was knighted by King Charles I (2). He was born of this Knight's second wife, namely, Mary, one of the daughters of Sir William Hammond, of St Albans in Nonington in the county of Kent, Knt, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter to Antony Awcher of Bourne, in Kent, Esq; which Antony had married Margaret, daughter of Edwin Sandys, Archbishop of York, sister to Sir Edwin Sandys of Bourne in Kent, Knt, and to George Sandys, Esq; the famous traveller and poet (3).

(1) Or, James.

(2) Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire by Sir Henry Chauncy, p. 51. see p. 208, 210. b.

(3) Wood's Ath. as above.

[B] By the ingenious Mr Edward Fairfax.] This gentleman was seated at Newhall in the parish of Oteley in Yorkshire; being the fifth son of Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, Knight, and brother of Sir Thomas Fairfax, created by King Charles I, on the 4th of May 1627, Lord Fairfax of Cameron in Scotland (4). Mr Fairfax was a famous Poet in his time, and translated Tasso's Gierusalem into English verse, &c.

(4) The Peerage of Scotland, by Geo. Crawford, Esq; p. 61.

[C] And on his return.] J. Hall sent the following verses to Mr Stanley, after his return from France.

Bewitched senses, do you lie,
And cast some shadow o're mine eye?
Or do I noble Stanley see?
What! may I trust you? Is it he?
Confess, and yet be gradual:
Left sudden joy, so heavy fall
Upon my soul, and sink unto
A deeper agony of woe.

'Tis he, 'tis he: we are no more
A barb'rous nation: He brought o're
As much humanity, as may Well civilize America;
More learning than might Athens raise
To glory in her prowdest days.
With reason might the boyling main
Be calm, and hoary Neptune chain
Those Winds, that might disturbers be,
Whilst our Apollo was at sea,
And made her for all knowledge stand
In competition with the land.
Had but the courteous Dolphins heard
One note of his, they would have dar'd
To quit the waters, to enjoy
In banishment such melody.
And had the mimick Proteus known,
H'had left his ugly herd, and grown
A curious Syren, to betray
This Ulysses to some stay.
But juster fates denied, nor would
Another land that genius hold,
As could, beyond all wonder hurl'd,
Fathom the Intellectual world.
But whither run I? I intend
To welcome only, not commend:
But that thy Virtues render it
No private, but a public debt.

So that in a short time, He (Mr Stanley) became a very good Linguist and Philologer; an excellent Poet, as manifestly appears, not only by his own original Poems [D], but also by his several translations from the Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, and French [E]; a compleat [D] By his own original Poems. They were printed at London in 1651, 8vo. dedicated to Love. For a specimen of his manner of writing, we shall present the Reader with these two Poems of his.

Delay.

Delay? alas there cannot be
To Love a greater Tyranny:
Those cruel Beauties that have slain
Their Votaries by their Disdain,
Or studied Torments, sharp and witty,
Will be recorded for their Pity.
And After-ages be misled
To think them kind, when this is spread.

Of Deaths, the speediest is Despair,
Delays, the slowest Tortures are.
Thy Cruelty at once destroys;
But Expectation starves my Joys.
Time and Delay may bring me past
The Power of Love to cure at last:
And should'st thou wish to ease my Pain,
Thy Pity might be lent in vain;
Or if thou hadst decreed that I
Must fall beneath thy Cruelty,
O kill me soon! thou wilt express
More Mercy, ev'n in shewing less.—

The Deposition.

Though when I lov'd thee thou wert fair,
Thou art no longer so;
Those Glories all the Pride they wear
Unto Opinion owe.
Beauties, like Stars, in borrow'd Lustre shine,
And 'twas my Love that gave thee thine.

The Flames that dwelt within thine Eye
Do now with mine expire,
Thy brightest Graces fade and dye
At once with my Desire.
Love's Fires thus mutual Influence return,
Thine cease to shine, when mine to burn.

Then (proud Celinda) hope no more
To be implor'd or woo'd,
Since by thy Scorn thou dost restore
The Wealth my Love bestow'd.
And thy despis'd Disdain too late shall find,
That none are fair, but who are kind.

Some of Mr Stanley's Poems were set to music by John Gamble, among his Ayres and Dialogues, to be sung to the Theorbo or bass Viol.—A copy of his verses to Mr Edward Sherburne, is printed among some of that Author's.—And, 'A Register of Friends,' in verse, of his own composition, was preserved in manuscript, in the collection of the late Dr Fr. Bernard (5).

[E] But also by his several translations, &c. The several pieces he translated, and published, were, 1. From the Idylls of Theocritus, Europa; Cupid crucified; Venus Vigils: with annotations. Lond. 1649. 8vo; reprinted in 1651, with a translation of Anacreon, Bion, Kisses of Secundus; and notes on them. 2. From the Spanish, Aurora Ismenia, and the Prince; written by Don Juan Perez de Montalvan. Lond. 3. From the Italian, Oronta the Cyprian Virgin, by Signor Girolamo Preti. Lond. 8vo. 4. A Platonic Discourse of Love, written in Italian by John Picus of Mirandula. Lond. 1651, 8vo. 5. Sylvia's Park, by Theophile; Acanthus Complaint, by Tristan; Orontó, by Preti; Echo, by Marino; Love's Embassie, by Boscan; The Solitude, by Gongora. All printed in 1651. 8vo.

John Hall of Durham highly celebrates him, in the Dedication of his Poems to him in 1646. 12mo, which is as follows. 'To his truly noble and worthily honoured friend Thomas Stanley, Esq;—My dearest friend, since it is the hard fortune of these glow-worms to see day, I wish they might have passed your examination; for I know you to be a severe critick in Poetry, as well as in Philology and the Sciences: but since others importunities, and mine own pressing occasions have denied it, I must present them loaden with their own blemishes, that being sifter objects of pardon, they may draw in pardoning more demonstrations of your candor, and add to my engagements, could they receive augmentation. I will not commit a rape upon your modesty by any praises, though Truth herself might be your Panegyrist, and yet continue naked; give me only leave to tell you from mine own experience, that Love is more than a mere Sympathy: for admiration did first attract my thoughts to you, and after fix them; though it were only your innate Sweetness that received them with an undeserved entertainment. Sir, what I was first indebted to you at Durham, I endeavoured to acquit in part here at Cambridge; for the Totall, though it be rather above my ability than desires, yet should I hate the thought of a generall discharge. Let me only beg of you, that these Cherrystones may draw from you your own Pearls, which cannot but break themselves a day through that darknes, to which you now confine them. Let us once see Fancy triumph in the spoils of the richest Learning; there will many no doubt press to follow the Chariot, yet shall none be more forward than,

' Sir,

' Your most affectionately devoted Servant,

' J. Hall.'

He also greatly commends him, in the following verses.

Who would commend thee (friend) and thinks't may be

Performed by a feint Hyperbole,
Might also call thee but a Man, or dare
To praise thy Mistrefs with the term of Faire.
But I, the choicest of whose knowledge is My knowing thee, cannot so grossly miss,
Since thou art set so high, no words can give
An equal character, but negative.
Subtract the earth and baseness of this age,
Admit no wild-fire in Poetick rage,
Cast out of learning whatsoever's vain,
Let ignorance no more haunt Noblemen,
Nor Humour Travellers, let wits be free
From over-weening, and the rest is Thee.

Thee, noble Soul! whose early flights are far Sublimier than old Eagles soarings are,
Who light'st Love's dying torch with purer fire,
And breath'st new life into the Teian lyre:
That Love's best secretaries, that are past,
Liv'd they, might learn to love, and yet be chaste.
Nay, Vestals might as well such sonnets hear
As keep their vows and thy black ribband wear:
So chaste is all, that though in each line lie
More Amorettoes than in Doris eye;
Yet so they're charm'd, that look'd upon they [prove

Harmless as Charicssa's nightly love.
So pow'rful is that tongue, that hand, that can Make soft Ionicks turn grave Lydian.
How oft this heavy leaden Saturnine
And never elevated soul of mine
Hath been pluck'd up by thee, and forc'd away,
Enlarged from her still adhering clay?
How ev'ry line still pleas'd? When that was o're,
I conceal'd it, and prais'd the other more.

complete master of Philosophy [F]; and, to add to his consummate erudition, a very good Grecian. Of this last, he gave full proof in his beautiful and valuable edition of Æschylus [G], and in his curious Manuscripts which he left behind him [H]. This learned person dyed, on the 12th of April 1678, at his lodgings in Suffolk-street in the parish of St Martin's in the fields Westminster; and was buried in the Church there (d), without any memorial that we can find. As to his character; He was endowed with eminent parts, a nimble fancy, an acute wit, and a facetious and generous humour, which rendered him a most accomplished Gentleman. When he was young, he married Dorothy, eldest daughter, and one of the coheirs of Sir James Enian (e), of Flowre in the county of Northampton, Bart. which brought him the accession of a fair estate to his own. By her, he had Thomas, his son and heir [I], who sold his seat and manor of Comberlow (f). The learned Dr William Wotton wrote an Elogium of our Author, which was published by Mr Henman, at Eysenach, at the end of Scævola Sammarthanus's Elogia Gallorum; but we have not been able to procure it, at any rate.

(d) Idem, col. 285.

(e) Wood calls him, Sir John Enyon, ubi supra.

(f) Chauncy, and Wood; as above.

That if thou writ'st but on, my thoughts shall be Almost engulf'd in an infinity.

But, dearest friend, what Law's power ever gave
To make ones own free first-born to be his slave?
Nay manumise it; for what else wil't be
To strangle, but deny it liberty.
Once lend the world a day of thine, and fright
The trembling still-born children of the night.
That at the last, we undeceiv'd may see,
Theirs were but Fancies, thine is Poetry.

Sweet Swan of silver Thames! but only she Sings not till death, thou in thy Infancy.

As warm in our Author's praises, is Edward Sherburne Esq; in his verses "To Mr Stanley, on his unimitable Poems.

The Stagirite, who Poesie defines
An Imitation, had he read thy lines,
And thy rich Fancy known, he would have then Recall'd the learned Error of his pen,
And have confest, in his convicted State,
Nought those could equal, this would imitate;

Nor can our Art a fitting value fit
Upon thy noble courtesie of Wit;
Which to so many Toungs doth lend that store
Of pleasing sweetness which they lack'd before,
Th'Iberian, Roman, and the fluent Greek;
The nimble French, and the smooth Thuscan,

For severall Graces from thy Pen alone,
Which that affords to all these Toungs, in One.
Whose forraign Wealth transferr'd, improv'd by

Doth with a fair increase of Lustre shine
Like Gems new set upon some richer foyle,
Or Roses planted in a better foyle."

[F] A compleat master of Philosophy. He most eminently shewed himself such, in his very learned Book, intituled, 'The History of Philosophy: Containing the Lives, Opinions, Actions and Discourses of the Philosophers of every Sect. Illustrated with the Effigies of divers of them.' Fol. It was published in three volumes fol. at different times, in the following order. I. The History of Philosophy, containing those on whom the Attribute of Wife was conferred. Lond. 1655. fol. in three parts. II. The second Volume was printed in 1656, containing Five parts more. And, at the end of it, was the Doctrine of the Stoicks, in two parts. III. The third Volume came out in 1660, containing four parts. IV. The History of the Chaldaick Philosophy appeared in 1662, in five parts. All these several parts were reprinted together in 1687; and again in 1700, in one volume fol. and in 1743, in one volume, 4to.—Part 1, comprehends the Wise-men of Greece. Part 2, the Ionick Philosophers. Part 3, the Socratick Philosophers. Part 4, the Cyrenaick, Megarick, Eleack, and Eretrick Sects. Part 5, the Academick Philosophers. Part 6, the Peripatetick Philosophy. Part 7, the Cynick Philosophers. Part 8, the Stoick Philosophers. Part 9, the Italic Sect. Part 10, the Heraclitian Sect. Part 11, the Eleatic Sect. Part 12, the Sceptick, or Pyrrhonian Sect. Part 13, Part 14, and 15; the Chaldaick Philosophy and Doctrine. Part 16, and 17, of the Persians, and their Doctrine. Part 18, and 19, of the Sabæans, and their Doctrine.—He observes, in the Preface, that, 'Although some Grecians have challenged to their nation the Original of Philosophy, yet the more learned of them have acknowledged it derived from the East. To omit the dark traditions of the Athenians concerning Musæus; of the Thebanes concerning Linus, and of the Thracians about Orpheus, it is manifest that the original of the Greek Philosophy is to be derived from Thales, who travelling into the East, first brought Natural learning, Geometry, and Astrology, thence into Greece, for which reason the Attribute of Wise was conferred upon him, and at the same time upon six others for their eminence in morality and politicks. Thus learning in the ancientest times was by the Greeks called Sophia (wisdom) and the professor thereof, who raised his soul to an eminent degree of knowledge, Sophos (wise) Pythagoras first named it Philosophy (love of wisdom) and himself a Philosopher, affirming that no man is wise, but only God.'—The learned John Le Clerc translated the History of the Chaldaick Philosophy into Latin, and published it at Amsterdam, in 1690, 8vo, under this title, Thomæ Stanleii Historia Philosophiæ Orientalis. Recensuit, ex Anglica Linguâ in Latinam transfuit. Notis in Oracula Chaldaica, & Indice Philologico auxit Johannes Clericus. The rest of the History of Philosophy was also translated into Latin by Godfrey Olearius, and published at Leipsic in 1711, 4to.

[G] His beautiful and valuable edition of Æschylus. It was printed, with large and elegant types, at London in 1663, folio, with this title, 'Æschyli Tragoedia VII. cum Scholiis Græcis, deperditorum Dramatum Fragmentis, Versione, & Commentariis Thomæ Stanleii.' The learned John Cornelius de Pauw reprinted it in 1745, in two Volumes 4to. without any omission, as he testifies in these words, 'Editio hæc ad editionem Stanleii typis expressa est, & nihil in ea, quod hic omisum.' He hath added large notes of his own, at the end of the second Volume, wherein he is full petulant against Mr Stanley; but he doth not seem to have known, or at least to have made use of, Mr Stanley's Commentaries on Æschylus, mentioned in the next Note.

[H] And in his curious Manuscripts which he left behind him. The chief of them were in the late Bishop More's possession, and are now in the public Library of the university of Cambridge; Namely, 1. Amplissimi Commentarii in Æschyli Tragoedias, nondum editi; i. e. Very large Commentaries upon the Tragedies of Æschylus. Eight Volumes, fol. 2. Adversaria, in quibus Sophoclis &c. loci plurimi emendantur vel explicantur; i. e. His Common-place-book, wherein many passages in Sophocles &c. are corrected, or explained, fol. 3. Prælectiones amplissimæ in Theophrasti Characteres; i. e. Lectures upon the Characters of Theophrastus. 4. Æschylus: sive Exercitatio philologica de Primitiis ac Decimis Prædæ, ad versum 4. capituli VII. Epistolæ ad Hebræos, &c. i. e. A Dissertation on Hebrews, chap. VII. ver. 4. (6).

[I] By her, he had Thomas, his son and heir. This gentleman was educated at Pembroke-hall in Cambridge; and, when very young, translated from the Greek into English, Claudius Ælianus his Various Histories (7); printed at London in 1665, 8vo. dedicated to his aunt the Lady Newton, wife of Sir Henry Puckering-Newton, Knight and Baronet, to whom the father had dedicated his edition of Æschylus.

(6) Catalog. MSS. Angliæ & Hib. Vol. p. 378.

(7) Wood, ubi supra.

STEELE [Sir RICHARD], famous for his numerous polite writings, was born probably about the year 1676 (a), at Dublin in Ireland, in which kingdom one branch of the family was possessed of a considerable estate in the county of Wexford (b). His Father, a Counsellor at Law, was some time private Secretary to James the first Duke of Ormond (c) [A]. But he was of English extraction, and his son, while very young, being carried to London, he put him to school at the Charter-house (d), whence he was removed to Merton College in Oxford, where he was admitted a Postmaster in 1692 (e). His inclination and genius being turned to polite literature, he commenced Author during his residence in the University, and actually finished a Comedy; which however he thought fit to suppress by the advice of one of his fellow collegians, who, upon the perusal, condemned it as unworthy of his genius [B]. Mr Steele's submission to this censure sets his good sense and modesty in the most amiable light. Accordingly he was well beloved and respected by the whole Society, and had a good interest with them after he left the university [C], which he did without taking any degree, in the full resolution to enter into the Army. This step was highly displeasing to his Friends; but the ardor of his passion for a military life, rendered him deaf to any other proposal. He was absolutely inflexible, so that not being able to procure a better station, he entered a private gentleman in the Horse-guards, notwithstanding he thereby lost the succession to his Irish Estate [D]. However, the turn of his mind was very well adapted to the bent of his inclination: he had a flow of good nature, a generous openness and frankness of spirit, and a sparkling vivacity of wit where there was no want of courage. These qualities rendered him the delight of the soldiery, and procured him an Ensign's commission in the guards (f). In the mean time he had made choice of a profession, which set him free from all the ordinary restraints in Youth to an unthinking gaiety; and he spared not to indulge his genius in the wildest excesses, prostituting the exquisite charms of his conversation-talents to give his pleasures a daintier and more poignant relish (g). Yet these revels did not pass without some cool hours of reflection, and in these it was that he drew up his little treatise intituled The

(f) Memoirs of Sir R. Steele, &c. before.

(g) His Apology, &c. p. 296.

[A] His father was private Secretary to the Duke of Ormond. Our Author dedicates his play, called The Lying Lover, to the late Duke of Ormond, where he makes use of his connexion to that noble family as the best plea for that address. 'Out of gratitude, says he; to the memorable and illustrious Patron of my infancy, your Grace's grandfather, I presume to lay this comedy at your feet.' From the turn of this expression it seems not improbable, that Mr Steele sent his son to the Charter-house school by the direction of this Patron, who was one of the governours of that hospital (1), and consequently, had he lived long enough, might have been of service to him.

[B] He suppressed his play by the advice of a friend. This friend's name was Mr R. Parker, afterwards Fellow of the College, who thought there was nothing extraordinary in it, falling much short of his subsequent theatrical performances, which gained him so great reputation (2). His first appearance as an author in print was in a poem upon the death of Queen Mary in 1695, called The Procession. The subject is sublime, and the execution shews, that the writer's talent did not lie that way so much as to the familiar stile; yet the following lines are truly poetical, and seem not unworthy the Princess whom he strives to adorn.

The poor her first and deepest mourners are,
First in her thoughts, and earliest in her care:
All hand in hand with common friendly woe,
In poverty, our native state, they go.
Some whom unstable terrors did engage
By luxury in Youth to need in Age:
Some who had virgin vows to wedlock broke,
And where they help expected found a yoke:
Others who in their want feel double weight
From the remembrance of a wealthier state.
There mothers walk, who oft despairing stood,
Pierc'd with their infants deaf'ning sobs for food,
Then to a dagger run, with threat'ning eyes,
'To stab their bosoms, and to kill their noise;
But in the thought they stopt, their locks they tore,
Threw down the steel, and cruelly forbore.
The innocents their parents love forgive,
Smile at their fate, nor know they are to live.
These modest wants had ne'er been understood,
But by Maria's cunning to be good.

[C] He had an interest in the Society after he left it. One part of the charge against him, for which he was expelled the House of Commons in 1713, being, that his writings were injurious to the Universities. In answer to this, in his Apology, having quoted a passage from the Englishman, No. 34, where the Universities are mentioned with respect, he proceeds in the following words, 'It appears by these and many other passages in my writings, that I have retained the greatest honour and esteem for those learned bodies; in one of which I received a part of my education, and where I can boast of much personal friendship and acquaintance [3].' This declaration by himself, being a kind of appeal to the world for the truth of what he asserts, and was never controverted, may be fairly deemed sufficient to support what is advanced in the text. But we have a further confirmation of it, which puts it beyond the reach of a doubt: About the year 1712, when Mr R. Breton, the present Archdeacon of Hereford, stood candidate for a fellowship in Merton College, having the honour to be known to our Author, he procured letters of recommendation from him to the then Warden, Dr Holland; as also to the beforementioned Mr Parker, to whom he recommended him as to his old friend and acquaintance. At the same time he likewise sent to the Warden the four volumes of his Tatlers in the large octavo edition, desiring he would give them a place in the library of his College, of which he had once the honour to be a member. To which may be added, that in one of Sir Richard's last journies to Wales, passing through Oxford, he made a visit to that society (4); which shews that he preserved a good respect for it as long as he lived.

[D] He lost the Irish estate. In answer to a calumny thrown upon him by Mr Dennis (5), who, in diminution of his birth and breeding, had derived his descent from a trooper's horse, he defends himself in the following words. 'It may perhaps fall in my way to give an abstract of the life of this man, whom it is thought thus necessary to undo and disparage. When I do, it will appear, that when he mounted a war-horse with a great sword in his hand, and planted himself behind King William III. against Lewis XIV, he lost the succession to a very good estate in the county of Wexford in Ireland, from the same humour which he has preserved ever since, of preferring the state of his mind to that of his fortune. When he cocked his hat, and put on a broad sword, jack-boots, and shoulder-belt, under the command of the unfortunate Duke of Ormond, he was not acquainted with his own parts, and did not then know he should ever have been able (as he has since appeared to be in the Cafe of Dunkirk) to demolish a fortified town with a goose-quill (6).'

(3) Steele's political works, p. 247. edit. 1715.

(4) Communicated by Mr Allch, as before.

(5) In his character and conduct of Sir John Edgar, p. 17. edit. 1720. 8vo.

(6) Theatre, No. XI.

Christian Hero, with a design, if we may believe himself, to be a check upon his passions [E]. For this use and purpose it had lain some time by him when he printed it in 1701, with a Dedication to Lord Cutts, who had not only appointed him his private Secretary, but procured for him a Company in Lord Lucas's regiment of Fusiliers (b). The whole plan and tenor of our Author's book was such a flat contradiction to the general course of his life, that it became a subject of much mirth and raillery: But these shafts had no effect; he persevered invariably in the same contradiction, and though he had no power to change his heart, yet his pen was never made a victim to his follies. Under the influence of that good sense, he wrote his Comedy called The Funeral, or Grief a-la-mode [F], which was brought upon the stage the same year. This play procured him the regards of King William, who resolved to give him some essential marks of his favour [G]; and though upon his Majesty's death the curtain dropt over all those pleasing scenes of hope, yet was it drawn up again in the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, when he was appointed Gazetteer [H]. He owed this Post to the friendship of Lord Halifax and the Earl of Sunderland, and he discharged the duties of it with the exactest fidelity to his Masters. He had been recommended to those Ministers by his schoolfellow Mr Addison (i), and that gentleman lent him also a helping hand in promoting the Comedy called The Tender Husband, or the accomplished Fools, which was acted in 1704, with great success [I]. But his next play, The Lying

(b) Dedication to this book.

(i) Morgan's New Political State, p. 7.

(7) In Remark [C].

[E] A check upon his passions. For this we have his own word, which, from what has been already observed (7), may perhaps pass for no bad authority. He tells us, that 'when he was an ensign in the guards, being thoroughly convinced of many things, of which he often repented and as often repeated, he wrote, for his own private use, a little book, called The Christian Hero; with a design principally to fix upon his mind a strong impression of virtue and religion, in opposition to a stronger propensity to unwarrantable pleasures.' This secret admonition was too weak. He therefore printed the book with his name, in hopes, that a testimony against himself, and the eyes of the world (that is to say of his acquaintance) upon him in a new light, might curb his desires, and make him ashamed of understanding and seeming to feel what was virtuous, and living so quite contrary a life. This had no other good effect but that, from being thought no undelightful companion, he was soon reckoned a disagreeable fellow. One or two of his acquaintance thought fit to misuse him, and try their valour upon him; and every body measured the least levity in his words and actions with the character of a Christian Hero [8]. It will not be impertinent, now we are touching upon this untractable temper of our Author with regard to his moral character, to observe, that he was equally ungovernable in regard to his political conduct, notwithstanding he had a constant check upon it in his friend Mr Addison. Having told us, that there never was a more strict friendship than that between them, he proceeds to declare, that 'they never had any difference but what arose from their different way of pursuing the same thing; the one, with patience, foresight, and temperate address, always waited and stemmed the torrent; while the other often plunged himself into it, and was as often taken out by the temper of him, who stood weeping on the bank for his safety, whom he could not dissuade from leaping into it (9).'

(8) His apology, ubi supra, p. 296.

(9) The Theatre, No. XII.

(10) Apology, as before.

[F] The Funeral, or Grief a-la-mode. He declares, that the rebuffs he met with, instead of encouragements for his declarations in regard to religion, laid him under a necessity of enlivening his character, which was the reason of his writing this comedy; where, though the incidents that move laughter be numerous, yet, virtue and vice appear just as they ought to do (10). The play was levelled at some enormities of the Undertakers, which, in the preface he observes, it is not in the power of any pen to paint better than they do themselves. 'As for example, says he, on a door I just now passed by, a great artist informs us of his cures upon the dead. W. W. known and approved for his art of embalming, having preserved the corpse of a gentlewoman sweet and entire thirteen years without embowelling, and has reduced the bodies of several persons of quality to sweetness in Flanders and Ireland, after nine months putrefaction in the ground, and they were known by their friends in England. No man performeth the like. He must be strangely in love with his own life, continues our Author, who is not touched with this kind invitation to be pickled; and the noble operator must be allowed a very useful person for bringing old friends together. Nor would it be unworthy his labour to give us an account at large of the sweet conversation that arose upon meeting such an intire friend as he mentions.' The other part of the play is aimed at the Lawyers, in speaking of which part he takes occasion to make a handsome compliment to Lord Somers, then in disgrace, 'of whom, he says, he will mention in words that which of all men breathing can only be said of him, It is he that is excellent:

' Seu lingua causas acuit seu civica Jura

' Responsare parat, seu condit amabile carmen.'

After all, the success of this performance was chiefly owing to the zeal of his fellow-foldiers, arising from the Author's interest in the army.

[G] King William had resolved to give him some essential marks of his favour. This we have from himself. 'Nothing, says he, ever makes the town so fond of a man as a successful play; and this, with some particulars enlarged upon to his advantage, (for Princes never hear good or evil in the manner that others do) obtained him the notice of the King. And his name, &c. to be provided for, was in the last table-book, ever worn by the glorious and immortal King William III (11).'

(11) Ibid.

[H] He was appointed Gazetteer. He calls this the lowest Minister of State, and assures us, that he worked in the office faithfully according to order, without ever erring against the rule observed by all ministries, to keep that paper very innocent and very insipid. 'It is believed, continues he, that it was to the reproaches he heard every gazette-day against the writer of it, that the Defendant owes the fortitude of being remarkably negligent of what people say which he does not deserve (12).'

(12) Apology

[I] The Tender Husband was acted with great success. In this comedy, as well as the Funeral, our Author steadily preserved the point of morality, of which he makes his dedication of it to Mr Addison a test, since he should not have dared to offer it as a memorial of their inviolable friendship, had not he been careful to avoid every thing that might look ill-natured and immoral, or prejudicial to what the better part of mankind held sacred and honourable. After Mr Addison's death, he took an occasion of mentioning the assistance that gentleman gave him in this play. 'I remember, says he, when I finished The Tender Husband, I told him [Addison] there was nothing I so tenderly wished, as that we might some time or other publish a work written by us both, which should bear the name of The Monument, in memory of our friendship. When the play abovementioned was last acted, there were so many applauded strokes in it, which I had from the same hand, that I thought very meanly of myself, that I had never publickly acknowledged them (13).'

(13) Preface the Drummer second edition

It is commonly said, that this intimacy commenced so early as when they were schoolfellows at the Charterhouse (14); if so, it is a memorable instance, both of the pregnant parts of the one, and the good-natured condescension of the other. Addison was full ripe for the University, and accordingly left that school in 1687, when Steele, if there, must have been very low in it, as is evident from his not leaving it till 1692, five years afterwards. So great a distance of place in two schoolboys makes the intimacy then contracted, if true, almost unexampled; which likewise becomes more extraordinary, in viewing their very different tempers; the one remarkably gay, the other as remarkably grave.

(14) See Mr Addison's article

Lover, found a very different fate [K]. Upon this last rebuff from the stage, he turned the same humorous current into another channel, and early in the year 1709 he began to publish The Tatler (k). That admirable Paper was undertaken in concert with Dr Swift [L]. Both the general usefulness of the plan, and the inimitable humour and spirit, kept up in full bloom throughout the execution of it, were universally approved and admired [M]. His

[K] The Lying Lover met with a different fate. Sir Richard, in his defence before the House of Commons, mentions the event of this play, as an instance of his suffering for the cause of virtue. 'I have carried, says he, this inclination to the advancement of virtue so far, as to pursue it even in things the most indifferent, and which perhaps have been thought foreign to it. To give you an instance of this, Sir, I must mention a comedy, called the Lying Lover, which I writ some years ago, the preface to which says, Though it ought to be the care of all governments, that public representations should have nothing in them but what is agreeable to the manners, laws, religion, and policy, of the place or nation wherein they are exhibited; yet it is the general complaint of the more learned and virtuous amongst us, that the English stage has extremely offended in this kind. I thought therefore it would be an honest ambition to attempt a comedy which might be no improper entertainment in a Christian commonwealth. Mr Collier had, about the time when this was published, written against the immorality of the stage. 'I was (as far as I durst for fear of witty men upon whom he had been too severe) a great admirer of his book, and took it into my head to write a comedy in the severity he required. In this play I make the spark or hero kill a man in his drink, and finding himself in prison the next morning, I give him the contrition which he ought to have on that occasion. It is in allusion to that circumstance, that the preface further says as follows; The anguish he there expresses, and the mutual sorrow between an only child and a tender father in that distress, are perhaps an injury to the rules of comedy; but I am sure they are a justice to those of morality. And passages of such a nature being so frequently applauded upon the stage, it is high time that we should no longer draw occasions of mirth from those images, which the religion of our country tells us we ought to tremble at with horror. But her most excellent Majesty has taken the stage into her consideration; and we may hope, from her gracious influence on the muses, that Wit will recover from its apostacy, and that, by being encouraged in the interests of Virtue, it will strip Vice of the gay habit in which it has too long appeared, and cloath it in its native dress of shame, contempt, and dishonour. I acknowledge that I cannot tell, Sir, what they would have me to do to prove myself a churchman; but I think I have appeared one even in so trifling a thing as a comedy. And, considering me as a comic poet, I have been a martyr and confessor for the church; for this play was damned for its piety (15).'

[L] He began the Tatler in concert with Dr Swift. This is acknowledged by our Author, first in the dedication to the two first volumes, as follows. 'A work of this nature requiring time to grow into the notice of the world, it happened very luckily, that, a little before I had resolved upon this design, a gentleman had written predictions, and two or three other pieces, in my name, which had rendered it famous through all parts of Europe, and, by an inimitable spirit and humour, raised it to as high a pitch of reputation as it could possibly arrive at.' This passage he refers to in the preface to the fourth volume, where, in pursuance of a promise in the last Tatler to give an account of the assistants he had in the work, he uses the following words. 'I have, in the dedication to the first volume, made my acknowledgments to Dr Swift, whose pleasant writings in the name of Bickerstaff, created an inclination in the Town towards any thing that should appear in the same disguise. I must acknowledge also, that, at my first entrance upon this work, a turn in conversation peculiar to that agreeable gentleman, tendered his company very advantageous to one whose imagination was to be continually employed upon obvious and common subjects, though obliged, at the same time, to treat of them in a new and unbeaten method. His Verses on the Shower in the Town, and the description of The Morning, are instances of the happiness of that genius, which could raise such pleasing ideas upon occasions so barren to an ordinary invention.' Whoever compares this with his acknowledgments to Mr Addison, will see, that the first are exemplified by only two trifling juvenile descriptions, when, as Mr Pope observes, fond description takes the place of sense; while those of the other are instanced in the most sublime and important subjects of the whole work, The discourses on the immortality of the soul, &c. Nay, as if that was not sufficient to eclipse the merit of Dr Swift in the Tatler, he declares, that he thinks 'the finest strokes of wit and humour in all Mr Bickerstaff's lucubrations, are those for which he is also beholden to Mr Addison (16).' But this treatment of his quondam friend, Dr Swift, will easily be accounted for, when we recollect, that not only The Examiner, but The Whig Examiner, by Mr Addison (17), and The Medley, in which our Author had a share (18), were begun some time before the last Tatler, and especially before the preface to the last volume of that work was written; not to mention that the dedication of the first volume is addressed to Mr Mainwaring the Undertaker of The Medley.

[M] Approved and admired. The general purpose of this paper, Sir Richard tells us (19), was to expose the false arts of life, to pull off the disguises of cunning, vanity, and ostentation, and to recommend a general simplicity in our dress, discourse, and behaviour. Nothing more was aimed at while Dr Swift was engaged in it, nor did the papers rise above this design, as it is planned out into its several branches in the first paper, till the change of the ministry, when Mr Addison had leisure to engage more constantly in it, who raised it to a greater thing than our Author had intended it. This advanced its reputation in the view of becoming a more important work. The air of the familiar, which had never been transgressed before, was raised into the sublime, and these subjects were set off with all the elegance, purity, and correctness, which they deserved. But then the inoffensiveness of the first plan was a little broke into. At the same time the change of the ministry was seen in the change of The Tatler, and objected to. The raillery in behalf of Mr Hoadly [the present Bishop of Winchester] was too much pointed to be consistent with that conduct which had been professed and preserved in the two first volumes, in which the amiable parts in the characters of Atterbury and Smallridge are drawn without any such points of offence. But our Author owned [after the just-mentioned change] he could not be cold enough to conceal his opinion in politicks (20). However, as politicks are almost always,

When the bill to prevent duelling was brought into parliament, Sir Richard took that occasion of seconding his blow against the duellists, which at the same time gave him an opportunity of doing justice to one of his correspondents in The Tatler, who was at that time unknown to him. Speaking of this bill in 1720, 'I can hardly conceive, says he, a more laudable act, than declaring an abhorrence of so fashionable a crime [as duelling] which weakness, cowardice, and impatience of the reproach of fools, have brought upon reasonable men. This sort of behaviour cannot proceed but from a true and undaunted courage, and I cannot but have in great veneration a generous youth, who in public declared his assent and concurrence to this law, by saying, that, in spite of the prevailing custom, he triumphed more in being a second to prevent, than he should have been in being one to promote, murder. A speech thus ingenuous could come only from a heart that scorned reserves in compliance to falsehood, to do injury to truth. This was true greatness of mind; and the man who did it could not possibly do it for his own sake, but must be conscious of a courage sufficient for his own defence, who could thus candid-

(16) The last paper of the Tatler.

(17) See Prior's article in remark [P].

(18) See the remark [N].

(19) In the dedication to the first volume.

(20) The Examiner had fallen upon the Tatler in the paper of Sept. 28, 1710. No. 230: The Tatler replied in No. 239.

His reputation became perfectly established by it, and during the course of it, he was made a Commissioner of the Stamp-Duties in 1710. Upon the change of the ministry the same year, he sided with the Duke of Marlborough, who had several years entertained a friendship for him. And upon his Grace's dismissal from all employments in 1711, Mr Steele addressed a Letter of thanks to him for the services done to his Country (l). However, as our Author still continued to hold his place in the Stamp-Office under the new Administration, he forbore entering with his pen upon political subjects. But adhering more closely to Mr Addison, he dropt The Tatler (m); and afterwards, by the assistance chiefly of that steady Friend, he carried on the same plan under the title of The Spectator (n). The success of this paper was equal to that of the former, which encouraged him before the close of it to proceed upon the same design in the character of The Guardian. This was opened in the beginning of the year 1713 (o), and was laid down in October the same year. But in the course of it, his thoughts took a stronger turn to politics (p); he engaged with great warmth against the Ministry, and being determined to prosecute his views that way by procuring a seat in the House of Commons, he immediately removed all obstacles thereto. For that purpose, he took care to prevent a forcible dismissal from his Post in the Stamp-Office by a timely resignation of it to the Earl of Oxford [N]; and at the same time, gave up a pension which had been till this time paid him by the Queen, as a servant to the late Prince George of Denmark [O]. This done, he wrote the famous Guardian upon the demolition of Dunkirk,

(l) The title of it is The Englishman's Thanks to the Duke of Marlborough. It is the first in the Collection of his Political Writings, published in 1715. 8vo.

(m) The last paper is dated Tuesday Jan. 2, 1710-11.

(n) This paper begun March 1, 1710-11, and continued without interruption till December 6, 1712, when it was dropt for a while.

(o) The Spectator was discontinued, but resumed in June 18, 1714, and continued till December 20 the same year.

(p) Mr Congreve and Mr Pope withdrew their auxiliaries on this occasion.

ly, at his time of life, rescue other men from the necessity of bearing contempt, or doing an ill action. The mind usually exerts itself in all its faculties with an equal pace towards maturity; and this gentleman, who, at the age of sixteen, could form such pleasant pictures of false and little ambitions of low spirits as Mr Fuller did, to whom we owe, with several other excellent pieces, The Vain-glorious Glutton, when a secret correspondent of the Tatler, I say such a one might easily, as he proceeded in human life, arrive at this superior strength of mind at twenty-four. The soul that labours against prejudice, and follows reason, ripens in her capacities and grows in her talents at the same time. As therefore courage is what a man attains by thought, as much as he improves his wit by study, it is only for want of opportunity to call one or the other forth, and draw the respective qualities into habit, if ever a man of sense is a coward (21).

(21) The Theatre, No. 26, for Tuesday, March 29, 1710.

[N] By a timely resignation of it to the Earl of Oxford.] The Paper was drawn up in these terms, the uncommon strain of which will repay the Reader's attention in perusing them.

To the Right Honorable the Lord High Treasurer of Great-Britain.

Bloomsbury-Square,
June 4, 1713.

My Lord,

I presume to give your Lordship this trouble to acquaint you, that having an ambition to serve in the ensuing Parliament, I humbly desire your Lordship will please to accept of my resignation of my office as Commissioner of the Stamp-Revenues. I should have done this sooner, but that I heard the Commission was passing without my name in it. I would not be guilty of the arrogance of resigning what I could not hold. But having heard this since contradicted (22), I am obliged to give it up, as with great humility I do, by this present writing. Give me leave, on this occasion, to say something as to my late conduct with relation to the late men in power, and to assure you, that whatever I have done, said, or writ, has proceeded from no other motive, than the love of what I think truth. For merely as to my own affairs, I could not wish any man in the Administration rather than yourself, who favours those that become your Dependants with a greater liberality of heart, than any man I have ever before observed. When I had the honour of a short conversation with you, you were pleased not only to signify to me, that I should remain in this office, but to add, that if I would name to you one of more value which would be more commodious to me, you would favour me in it. I am going out of any particular dependance on your Lordship, and will tell you with the freedom of an indifferent man, that it is impossible for any man who thinks, and has any public spirit, not to tremble at seeing his country, in its present circumstances, in the hands of so daring a genius as yours; if incidents should arise, that should place your own safety, and what ambitious men call greatness, in a ballance against the general good. Our all depends upon your choice under such a temptation. You have

(22) This expression seems to imply, that the design to dismiss him was superseded by the prospect of his getting into Parliament, which would oblige him to resign.

my hearty and fervent prayers to Heaven to avert all such dangers from you. I thank your Lordship for the regard and distinction which you have at sundry times shewn me, and wish you, with your Country's safety, all happiness and prosperity. Share, my Lord, your good fortune, with whom you will; while it lasts you will want no friends: but if any adverse day happens to you, and I live to see it, you will find I think myself obliged to be your friend and advocate. This is talking in a strange dialect from a private man to the First of a nation; but to desire only a little, exalts a man's condition to a level with those who want a great deal. But I beg your Lordship's pardon, and am, with great respect,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient,

And most humble Servant,

Richard Steele.

We see here our Author takes notice of the design to dismiss him, which indeed he had reason to have apprehended long before; for he had frequently attacked this Minister under borrowed names (23), and particularly in The Medley, where the pleasant Narrative of the Ball at Wapping, in the twenty-fifth Number, was written by him (24).

(23) See Remarks [W].

(24) Life of Author Maynaring, p. 19.

[O] He resigned his pension, &c.] When The Examiner afterwards made an attempt to consume him in the fire of Ingratitude, this step furnished him with cold water to throw upon that fire. It is entertaining enough to view the contrast, in the words of each Antagonist: I believe, says The Examiner (25), speaking of The Guardian, then just published, I may challenge all the nations of the world, and all the histories of this nation for a thousand years past, to shew us an instance so flagrant as what we have now before us, viz. whenever a subject, nay a servant under a salary, and favoured, in spite of ill behaviour past, with a considerable employ in the government, treated his Sovereign in such a manner as The Guardian has done the person of the Queen, and went unpunished. If the clemency of the Queen prevails to save such a man; if her Majesty thinks it below her to resent an injury from so contemptible a wretch, by so much the rather should every subject resent it, and shew their duty and respect to their Sovereign, by trampling under their feet the very name and memory of the man, that can have boldness enough to insult his Prince in a printed, and for that reason a scandalous libel, and can have ingratitude enough to do it, while he is eating her bread.' To this very warm charge, our Author makes the following very cool reply: The Examiner, says he, accuses me of ingratitude, as being actually under salary, when I write the Letter to The Guardian; but he is mistaken in that particular; for I had resigned, not only my office in the Stamp-Duties, but also my pension as a servant to his late Royal Highness, which her Majesty hath been graciously pleased to continue to the whole family of that excellent Prince. I divested myself of all that I was so happy as to enjoy by her Majesty's goodness and favour, before I would pre-

(25) In the Pa Aug. 11, 1713.

sume

Dunkirk, which was published Aug. 7, 1713; and the Parliament being dissolved the next day, The Guardian was soon followed by several other warm political tracts against the Administration [P]. Upon the meeting of the new Parliament, Mr Steele having been returned a Member for the borough of Stockbridge in Dorsetshire, took his seat accordingly in the House of Commons, but was expelled thence in a few days after, for writing several seditious and scandalous libels, as he had been indeed forewarned by the Author of a periodical Paper, called The Examiner [Q]. Presently after his expulsion, he published Proposals for (26) Importance of Dunkirk considered, p. 61, 62, in Steele's political Works.

'sure to write any thing which was so apparently an advertisement to those employed in her service (26).'
 [P] The Guardian, and several other tracts against the Administration. In the Guardian of Aug. 7, 1713, our Author had said twice, The British nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk, and a third time, pray Mr Ironside repeat it again, that The British nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. Upon which, in a few days came out, The honour and prerogative of the Queen's Majesty vindicated, and defended against the unexampled influence of the author of the Guardian. In a letter from a country noble to Mr Steele. The writer of which, in speaking to the just-mentioned passage of the Guardian, cries out, "See how the villain treats the best of sovereigns, the best mistress to him, whose bread he has eaten, and who has kept him from a Goal. Read it again. Put it into English, said a neighbour of mine to me, Come make the best of it. Then he reads as follows, The British nation expect, &c. and again, The British nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. And a third time, with a tone of threatening, The British nation expect it.—I would fain have pleaded for you, that this was not to be understood to be spoken to, or pointed at their Queen; but it would not do, they laughed at me. Come, says my neighbour, if you can't put it into words, I'll do it for you: The British nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. We all know her Majesty has possession of Dunkirk; and though the work is to be done by the French, her Majesty may appoint the day. Now, says he, read the words; what is it but thus; Look you, Madam, your Majesty had best take care that Dunkirk be demolished, or else, &c. and again, Madam, We expect, and we would have you take notice that We expect, that Dunkirk be demolished, and that immediately. Just thus an imperious planter at Barbadoes speaks to a negro slave, Look you, firrab, I expect this sugar to be ground; and look to it that it be done forthwith. It is enough to tell you I expect it, or else, &c. and then he holds up his stick at him." This Guardian was reprinted together with The Importance of Dunkirk considered, in a defence of that Guardian, in a letter to the bayliff of Stockbridge, which concludes with the following story, by way of reply to that of his antagonist: "If I might make an abrupt digression from great things to small, I should, on this occasion, mention a little circumstance which happened to the late King William. He had a Frenchman who took care of the gun-dogs, whose business it was also to charge and deliver the piece to the King. This minister once forgot to bring out shot into the field, but did not think fit to let so passionate a man, and so eager a sportsman, as the King, know his offence; but gave his Majesty the piece loaded only with powder; when the King missed his aim, the impudent cur stood chattering, admiring, and commending the King's skill in shooting, and, holding up his hands, said, He had never seen SA MAJESTE' miss before in his whole life. This circumstance was no manner of argument to them (who afterwards found out the fellow's iniquity) against the King's reputation for a quick eye, and shooting very finely."

This piece was preceded by The Englishman, a paper published three days in a week, the first of which is dated October 8, 1713. During the course of this paper came out The Crisis, or a discourse, representing, from the most ancient records, the just causes of the late revolution, and the several settlements of the crown of England, with some seasonable remarks on the danger of a popish successor. Our author tells us (27); that the plan of this treatise was first hinted to him by some incidental discourse in a visit to a friend of his, Mr More of the Inner Temple, a man perfectly skilled in the laws and constitution of this kingdom. This gentleman pressed him likewise to the undertaking, and observed, that he thought Mr Steele, from the kind reception the world gave to what he published, might be more instrumental towards curing this evil [the disaffection to the house of Hanover] than any private man in England; that in conclusion it was agreed for them both to join in writing the book, and share the profits arising from the sale equally between them.

(27) In his A-pology, p. 301, 302.

[Q] He was expelled the house, as he had been forewarned by the Examiner. The warning was published in the Examiner, before his election, in the following words. 'This man [Steele] was never so dear to the Whigs as since he let them know, that he durst assault his Queen. This has made him their favourite, and one of their authors has made his dull panegyrick upon him already for it; while another set of them are to get him chosen for the next parliament, that he may carry on his insults there, and obtain the honour; as another of their haughty leaders has already done, of being expelled the house.' The person here signified was the famous Mr Walpole; and there is room to think that our Author (like some others after him) (28) even courted this honour. Presently after his election at Stockbridge he begun the Englishman, and printed the Crisis, which procured that honour for him. His great care, in drawing up this last treatise, seems to have been not to bring upon himself a heavier punishment. 'When the Crisis, says he, was written hand in hand with that gentleman [Mr More], I, who was to answer for it with my all, would not venture upon my own single judgment; therefore I caused it to be printed, and left one copy with Mr Addison, another with Mr Lechmere, another with Mr Minshull, and another with Mr Hoadly. From these corrected copies the Crisis became the piece it is. When I thought it my Duty, I thank God I had no further consideration for myself than to do it in a lawful and proper way, so as to give no disparagement to a glorious cause from my indiscretion, or want of judgment. I was willing to ripen the question of the succession upon my own head.' When the parliament met, after two or three gentlemen had proposed Sir Thomas Hanmer for Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr Steele took upon him to say he had the same honourable sentiments of that gentleman in the following words:

'At the close of the last parliament, her Majesty was graciously pleased to declare from the throne, that the late rejected bill of commerce between Great-Britain and France should be offered to this house. That declaration was certainly made, that every gentleman, who should have the honour to be returned hither, might make himself master of that important question. It is demonstration that was a most pernicious bill; and no one can have a greater merit to this house, than he by whose weight and authority that pernicious bill was thrown out. I rise up to do him honour, and distinguish myself by giving him my vote for that his inestimable service to his country.'

'It will be impossible for the Reader, continues he, to conceive how this speech was received, except he has happened to have been at a cock-match, and has seen the triumph and exultation which is raised, when a volatile, whose fall was some way gainful to part of the company, has been necked. At the mention of the Bill of Commerce, the cry began; at calling it pernicious, it increased; at the words doing him honour, it grew insupportably loud.' In this state of the house, on March 12, 1713, a complaint was made to them against certain paragraphs in three printed pamphlets; The Englishman, from Saturday January 16 to Tuesday January 19, 1713, wherein is a printed letter to the Englishman, to which is subscribed the name Richard Steele; another, intitled The Crisis, in the title-page whereof it is said by Richard Steele, Esq; and another, intitled The Englishman, being the close of the paper so called; in the title whereof it is also said by Richard Steele, Esq; as containing several paragraphs tending to sedition, highly reflecting upon her Majesty, and arraigning her administration and government. Upon which Mr Steele was ordered to attend. He did so on Saturday 13, and heard the several paragraphs, complained of, read; after which he stood up, and desired time to make his defence, which, after great debates, was granted till Thursday 18. In these debates Mr Auditor Harley moved for having him heard on the Monday following. In answer to whom we are told (29), that

(28) Particularly Mr Poultney, the present Earl of Bath. General History of England.

(29) Boyer's Annals of Queen Anne, ad ann. 1713.

for writing the History of the Duke of Marlborough [R]. At the same time he also wrote The Spinster, and in opposition to The Examiner, he set up a Paper called The Reader, and continued publishing several other things in the same spirit, till the death of the Queen [S].

Imme-

that Mr Steele, out of contempt of his adversaries, who were known, says this Author, to have been rigid Presbyterians, though they now sided with the High-church, assumed their sanctified countenance, and owned, in the meekness and contrition of his heart, that he was a very great sinner, and he hoped the member who spoke last, who was so justly renowned for his exemplary piety and devotion, would not be necessary to the accumulating the number of his transgressions, by obliging him to break the sabbath of the Lord in perusing such profane writings as might serve for his justification. On Monday 15, Mr Steele made the following motion, as of use, he said, to his defence; That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to give directions, that the several representations of her Majesty's engineers, and others who have had the care and inspection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and instructions given thereupon, be laid before the house. It passed in the negative, and from that moment Mr Steele despaired of his cause. On Thursday the 18th, Mr Foley, the Accuser, demanded the matter appointed for the day might be entered upon. This gentleman had, in the first debate, remarked, that the drift of the writings before them was to make a great number of the gentlemen of England appear Jacobites and enemies to their country. Mr Steele chose to make his appearance near the bar of the house, and mentions one circumstance in this scene that he says very much sweetened his affliction, which was, that he had the honour to stand between Mr Stanhope and Mr Walpole (30), who condescended to take upon them the parts of his advocates. He was likewise assisted by his friend, Mr Addison, member for Malmesbury, who sat near him to prompt him upon occasion (31). He began his defence with the usual preface of bespeaking favour to any mistakes that might escape him therein, and, after complaining of the Examiner for abusing him the Friday before, he proceeds to maintain the truth of the observations in the several paragraphs alledged as crimes against him. The first, in No. 46 of the Englishman, concludes thus: 'I own I have nothing to say for the liberty I take now, or the book I put out to-day, when nobody else talks in the same stile, but what the sailor said, when he fired out of the stage-coach upon some highwaymen before they cried, Stand, would you have me stay till they have boarded us;' and the last paragraph from the close of that paper is in these words, 'I wish that his Electoral Highness of Hanover would be so grateful as to signify to all the world, the perfect good understanding with the court of England in as plain terms as her Majesty was pleased to declare she had with that house on her part. This last circumstance, dear Jack, would be very pleasing to all of us who are churchmen, because, if the elector should be any ways disobliged, I am confident her Majesty has given no cause for it. I cannot but attribute any misunderstanding, if such there should be, to the artifices of some new converts, who, for ought I know, may still be Presbyterians in their hearts (32).' After he was withdrawn, Mr Foley said, Without amusing the house with long speeches, it is plain the writings we had complained of were seditious and scandalous, injurious to her Majesty's government, the church, and the universities, and called for the question. Thence arose a very warm debate, which lasted till eleven o'clock at night. The first who spoke for Mr Steele was Robert Walpole, Esq; who was seconded by his brother Horace, Lord Finch, Lord Lumley, and Lord Hinchinbroke; but it was resolved by a majority of 245 against 152, "That a printed pamphlet, entitled The Englishman, being the close of the paper so called, and one other pamphlet, entitled The Crisis, written by Richard Steele, Esq; a member of this house, are scandalous and seditious libels, containing many expressions highly reflecting upon her Majesty, upon the nobility, gentry, clergy, and universities of this kingdom, maliciously insinuating, that the protestant succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under her Majesty's administration, and tending to alienate the affections of her Majesty's good subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them. It was resolved likewise, for his offence in writing and publishing the said scandalous and seditious libels, that he be expelled this house." How much soever he complained afterwards of this resolution, as unjustly depriving him of his property in the house, and his good name in the world, yet there is reason to believe, that he was sensible he deserved more, and expected to have gone to this honour through the Tower, as Mr Walpole had done before him. In his Apology he declares, No man could help plainly seeing, that, in these writings he had gone as far as he could, with any safety to his liberty and life; and that he got into the House of Commons for no other reason but to say more for the good of his deluded country.

[R] The History of the Duke of Marlborough.] He gives an account of his design in the sixth Number of The Reader, where he informs us, that it would be done from proper materials, in his custody; that the relation would commence from the date of his Grace's Commission of Captain General and Plenipotentiary, and to end with the expiration of these Commissions. 'It is not doubted, says he, but his history, formed from the most authentic papers, and all the most secret intelligence, which can be communicated with safety to persons now living, and in the confidence of foreign Courts, will be very entertaining, and put the services of her Majesty's Ministers, at home and abroad, in a true light. The Work is to be printed in folio, and Proposals for the encouragement of it, may be seen at Mr Tonson's, Bookseller in the Strand.' But this Work was never executed; and the materials were afterwards returned to the Dutches Dowager of Marlborough, who by her last Will, left for writing the History of the Duke's Life, under the inspection of Philip Earl of Chesterfield, a thousand pounds, to be equally divided between Mr Glower, Author of Leonidas, and Mr Mallet, Writer of the Life of Lord Bacon, and several Plays and Poems. The former of these Gentlemen having declined the offer, the papers have been many years in the hands of the latter; but what progress is made in the work, does not appear.

[S] He continued writing with the same spirit till the death of the Queen.] One of these pieces is intitled A Letter to Sir Miles Wharton, concerning occasional Peers; written in 1713. In this pamphlet, to prevent the mischiefs that might arise from the twelve Peers newly created, the list of which he says he was told was to be increased with a dozen more, he proposes that a Bill be brought into the House to disable any Peer to vote in any case, till three years after the date of his Patent. This is something like the year of silence enjoined to the Advocates at Doctors Commons, at their first admission, which he not improbably had in his eye; and some such institution, as he proposes, might perhaps not be altogether absurd, as a preservative in such extraordinary cases, which require in the body politic, as well as the natural, extraordinary remedies. In order to recommend it, he makes an observation, which is pointed at the then present conjuncture, 'That when the minds of men are prejudiced, wonderful effects may be wrought against common sense. One weak step, continues he, in trying a fool for what he said in the Pulpit, with all the pomp that could be used to take down a more dangerous and powerful man than ever England yet has seen, cost the most able Ministry that England was ever honoured with, its Being. The Judgment of the House of Lords was by this means insulted and evaded, and the anarchical fury ran so high, that Harry Sacheverell swelling, and Jack Higgins laughing, marched through England in a triumph more than military.'

Another of his pamphlets is called French Faith represented in the present State of Dunkirk; A Letter to The Examiner in defence of Mr Steele, in 1714. It was wrote after the delivery of Dunkirk to the French, who were building a new harbour at Mardyke. 'The Harbour of Dunkirk indeed, says he, was demolished. But they have made a new one, and another sort of harbour than it was before; but not a jot less com- modious to themselves, or less terrible to us;' to evince which, he has given a map of the place as it then stood; whereupon he turns The Examiner's words upon himself, and his Friends the French. 'Your words, says he, are, in No. I. of your current Volume, in speaking of these restless silly Rogues, the Whigs, They have made no discoveries, nor opened any new sluices or streams of Scandal; but

(30) This gentleman particularly distinguished himself on this occasion in behalf of liberty, and added to the popularity he had acquired before among the Whigs. Life of Sir Robert Walpole.

(31) See his Apology.

(32) The substance of this speech, which lasted near three hours, is printed in his Apology.

Immediately after which, as a reward for these services, he was taken into favour by her Successor to the throne, King George I, and appointed Surveyor to the Royal Stables of Hampton-Court, and put into the Commission of the Peace in the County of Middlesex; and having procured a Licence for chief Manager of the Royal Company of Comedians, he easily obtained it to be changed the same year 1714 into a Patent from his Majesty (q), appointing him Governor of the said Company during his life, and to his Executors, Administrators, or Assigns, for the space of three years afterwards [7]. He was also chosen

(q) The Licence bore date October 18, and the Patent January the 19th following.

'but yet, like the ingenious Winstanly and other Masters in Hydraulics, they have laid their pipes so well, and disposed their wheels and machines in such order, that the same mass and body of water, with good husbandry and management, circulates and comes round again at proper periods, as they direct it (33).' He compares this artifice with another, which he had met with in a little treatise in French, the Author of which tells us, that in a treaty with Spain the French obtained an article, that whatsoever should be found within the dominions of either State, at the time of the ratification, shall belong to the respective Sovereign. The French pillaged a wood, and carried the timber out of the bordering territories of Spain into those of France, in order to profit, as they did, by the Article.

A third pamphlet wrote by our Author at this time, was intitled A Letter to a Member of Parliament, concerning the Bill to prevent the growth of Schism, dated May 28, 1714. It was written presently after his expulsion from the House of Commons, and he concludes in these terms: 'This, dear Sir, is all I have to trouble you with upon this occasion; and though you accuse me of being cast down with my Expulsion, you see I have not dunned you to move that the other pamphlets may be examined as well as The Crisis, and The Englishman. Give my service to poor Tom and Ned: I must confess, they were the last I forgave; but I have forgiven them too now: I am thoroughly convinced, since this Bill, that I was not worthy. For now you have taken upon you ecclesiastical matters; and I should not have known how to behave myself among you as a Communion of Saints (34).'

Another treatise of our Author came out in this interval, intitled The Romish Ecclesiastical History of Late Years. This he observes, is no more than an account of some collateral and contemporary circumstances and secret passages, joined to an account of the ceremony of the last Inauguration of Saints, by his Holiness the Pope. 'This account, continues he, gives us a lively idea of the pageantry used in that Church, to strike the imagination of the Vulgar, and needs only to be repeated to give any serious man an abhorrence of their Idolatry.' There is an Appendix, No. I. of which presents us with a list of the Colleges, Monasteries, and Convents, of men and women of several Orders in the Low Countries, with the revenues which they draw from England. No. II. exhibits an extract of the Taxa Camerae seu Cancellariae Apostolicae, the fees of the Pope's Chancery, a Book printed above a hundred years before by the authority of the Pope, being a table or list of the fees paid to him for Absolutions, Dispensations, Indulgencies, Faculties, and Exemptions. No. III. is A Bull of the Pope in 1357, given to the then King of France, whereby the Princes of that nation have received an hereditary right to cheat all the rest of mankind. No. IV. gives us a translation of Pope Sixtus IV's Oration, as it was uttered in the Consistory at Rome in 1589, defending the execrable fact of Jaques Clement, a Jacobine Friar, upon the person of Henry III, King of France, to be commendable, admirable, and meritorious. The fact was the Assassination of that King (35), who in order to crush the Popish Party, then in open Rebellion against him (36), had lately joined the Protestants under the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, who was also assassinated by the Jesuit Ravillac in 1610, which was likewise vindicated as a meritorious fact by that Religious Fraternity. No. V. contains a Collection of some Popish Tracts and Positions, destructive of Society and all the good ends of government.

[7] A Patent for the Play-house] He obtained this by the interest of the Duke of Marlborough, who had long entertained a friendship for him. He first drew the Duke's regards by a pleasant repartee, which he made upon his Grace's preferring his own relations, and which coming to the Duke's ear, had the good luck to be taken as the Author meant it. Upon the great change of the Administration, after the accession of King George I, Mr Collier the former Patentee of the Company in Drury-Lane being no more heard of, and the Licence of the Managers of that House expiring with the late Queen, they therefore applied to Sir Richard to use his interest for the renewal of their Licence, and begged him to do them the honour of getting their names to stand with his in the same Commission. We have a full account of this matter from Mr Colley Cibber, who was then one of the Managers (37), and relates it in the following words, much to the honour of Sir Richard. He assures us, that this application to our Author was not only owing to the high favour he now stood in at Court, but to the obligations the Stage had to his Writings. There being scarce a Comedian of merit in their whole Company whom his Tatlers had not made better by his public recommendation of them, 'and many days, continues he, had our house been filled by the influence and credit of his Pen. Obligations of this kind, from a Gentleman with whom they all had the pleasure of a personal intimacy, the Managers thought could not be more justly returned, than by shewing him some warm instances of their desire to have him at the head of them. This they told him would put it still in his power to support the Stage in that reputation to which his lucubrations had already so much contributed, and that therefore he had better pretensions to partake of its various successes, than any other person whatsoever. He was highly pleased with the offer, and his spirits took such a lively turn upon it, that had we been all his own sons, no unexpected act of filial duty could have more endeared us to him. The Licence being obtained, the Managers agreed to give Sir Richard 700 l. per ann. as they had done before to Mr Collier. Soon after this, the House in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields being finished by the old Patentee who had been silenced, he procured, by the interest of Mr Craggs the younger, his suspension to be taken off: upon which that Play-house being opened, proved at first a great drawback upon the profits of the Old House: on this occasion, the Managers remonstrated to Sir Richard, that as he now stood in Collier's place, his pension of 700 l. per ann. was liable to the same conditions, which was, that it was only payable during their continuance to be the only company permitted to act; but in case another was set up against them, this pension was to be liquidated into an equal share with them, and which they now hoped he would be contented with. While they were offering to proceed, Sir Richard stopt them short, by assuring them, that as he came among them by their invitation, he should always think himself obliged to come into any measures for their use and service; that to be a burthen to their industry would be more disagreeable to him, than it could be to them; and as he had always taken a delight in his endeavours for their prosperity, he should be still ready on their own terms to continue them. Every one, proceeds Mr Cibber, who knew Sir Richard in his prosperity (before the effects of his good nature had brought him to distress) knows that this was his manner of dealing with his Friends in business. Another instance of the same nature will immediately fall in my way. When we proposed to put this agreement in writing, he desired us not to hurry ourselves, for that he was advised upon the late desertion of our Actors (38), to get our Licence, which now subsisted only during pleasure, enlarged into a more ample and durable authority, and which he said he had reason to think would be more easily obtained, if we were willing that a Patent for the same purpose might be granted to him only for his life and three years afterwards, which he would then assign over to us. This was a prospect beyond our hopes, and what we had long wished for. For though I cannot say, continues this Manager, we had ever occasion to grieve at the personal severities of any Lord Chamberlain; yet the several officers under

(37) The other three were Wilks, Dogget, and Booth.

(38) Several of their best Actors went to the New House in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields.

(r) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

chosen one of the Representatives for Boroughbrigg in Yorkshire, in the first Parliament of that King, who conferred the honour of Knighthood upon him, April 28, 1715 (r). And in August following he received five hundred pounds from Sir Robert Walpole, for special services [U]. Thus highly encouraged, he triumphed over his opponents in several Pamphlets wrote in this and the following year [W]. In 1717, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for

(39) This Author tells us too that Lord Cowper, then Lord Chancellor, in compliment to Sir Richard, would take no fee. He was made Chancellor the same day that the Patent was signed, viz. Jan. 19, 1714; Salmon's Chr. Hist. but the Patent appears to be signed, By Writ of Privy-Seal, Cocks.

(40) Cibber's Apology, p. 289, 290. Lond. 1740. 4^{to}.

(41) Communicated by Mr Walpole, Alderman of St Albans.

(42) The present Duke of Newcastle; who was raised from the title of Lord Pelham to that of Earl of Clare on the 26th of October, 1714. Collins's Peerage of England, under his article.

‘ them often treated us with all the insolence of Office. ‘ But a Patent, we knew, would free us from so absolute a state of dependance. Accordingly we desired ‘ Sir Richard to lose no time.—A few days after ‘ Sir Richard told us, that his Majesty being apprized, that others had a joint power with him in ‘ the Licence, it was expected that we should under ‘ our hands signify, that his petition for a Patent should ‘ be preferred by them all; such an enlargement was ‘ immediately signed, and the patent thereupon passed ‘ the Great Seal (39). The form of it was drawn after ‘ that of Sir William Davenant's, in King Charles II's ‘ reign; after relating the abuses of the Stage, both ‘ as to Religion, and Government, it declares, that for ‘ the purpose of redressing, this command is granted to ‘ the Patentee, not only on account of his public services ‘ to Religion and Virtue; but of his steady adherence to ‘ the true interest of his Country: then his power is set ‘ forth in all the particulars of which it consists. After ‘ which it concludes, with an injunction that no representations be admitted, whereby the Christian Religion in general, or the Church of England in particular, may suffer reproach, inhibiting every degree ‘ of abuse and misrepresentations of Sacred Characters, ‘ enjoining the strictest regard to such representations ‘ as any way concern Civil Policy, or the constitution ‘ of the Government. And lastly, commanding that ‘ no new Play, or any old revived Play, be acted, containing any passages of offence to Piety, before such ‘ passages be corrected and purged out by the said Governor. The Patent was received January 19, and ‘ the Patentee set out next morning for Boroughbrigg, ‘ where he was soon after elected Member for the new ‘ Parliament. So that the Managers were forced, that ‘ very night, to draw up in a hurry (till their Council ‘ might more advisedly perfect it) his assignment to ‘ them of equal shares in the Patent, with further conditions of Partnership.’ But this assignment (drawn by Cibber) was so unluckily worded, that it gave Sir Richard as clear a title to their property, as it had given them to his Authority in the Patent. Sir Richard, notwithstanding, when he returned to Town, took no advantage of the mistake, and consented, on their second agreement, to pay 1200l. to be equally intitled to their property, which at his death they were obliged to repay: As they did to his Executors. Our Author, by this moderation, was 300l. per ann. a Gainer; so that his Income from the Play-house amounted now to 1000l. per ann. (40).

[U] He received 500l. for special services.] In the Appendix to the Report of the Secret Committee of the House of Commons in 1741, and 1742. In a table of monies expended by Sir Robert Walpole, among other articles, there is one for special services, in which is the following article; Aug. 27, 1715: 500l. to Leonard Welstead, Esq. But this Gentleman some years afterwards declared, that he received the money for Sir Richard Steele, and paid it to him (41).

[W] He wrote several pamphlets in 1715 and 1716.] In 1715 he collected his pamphlets against the late ministry, and published them in one volume 8vo, with this title, The Political Writings of Sir Richard Steele. In the dedication to the Earl of Clare (42) he writes thus; ‘ The following papers were written to confront ‘ daring and wicked men in the prosecution of purposes ‘ destructive to their country.—The painful struggle ‘ under so great a difficulty as explaining with a ministry ‘ in open contradiction to their proceedings, is what ‘ can be supported by nothing less than the testimony ‘ of a good conscience, and a heart pure from avaricious ‘ ambition; and these are such supports as will keep a ‘ man from languishing in discontent. Should he, ‘ among the prosperities of a cause he has endeavoured ‘ to serve, live to find zeal for the public, of all human ‘ virtues the most exposed to the cool comfort of being ‘ its own reward; and that which was undertaken ‘ against the inclinations to mirth and pleasure, out of ‘ a sense of duty and honour, to have little other effect, ‘ than to become a man's characteristic, and by that ‘ means to give a hortulent air to all his other pretensions, and even to sink the agreeableness of the friend ‘ and companion in the appearance of somewhat supposed to be demanding in the patriot.’—These words intimate, that he did not think his services yet sufficiently rewarded, to obtain which was apparently the chief motive for the publishing his merit with an address to a nobleman then in the highest favour at court.

Among these pieces he now first printed his apology, with this motto, Fabula quanta fui! It is dedicated to Mr Walpole, to whom he observes, that the member accused had not a harsh personal expression used against him; though the minister who brought on the accusation, in the midst of all his power, was treated in a different manner; which confirms what we have before observed, that the heaviest part of his punishment was the lightness of it; he was not considerable enough for any weightier notice. This he seems to resent in the preface, as follows; ‘ The onset was made in the poorest ‘ manner, and the accusation laid with an insipid action ‘ and cold expression. The accuser arraigned a man ‘ for sedition with the same indolence and indifference ‘ as another man pares his nails; what was spoken appeared only a rheum from the mouth, and Mr Foley, ‘ as well as do what he did, might have blown his nose ‘ and put the question. But, though the cholera of my ‘ accusers was corrected by their phlegm, &c.’ In the dedication he celebrates Mr Walpole on the two great talents for which he was eminently distinguished; his admirable talent of speaking in the house, and his happy ability in explaining the most difficult parts of business to men wholly unacquainted with negotiations; and the character of an open honest English gentleman.

Our Author published also this year in 8vo, The State of the Roman catholic religion throughout the world, written for the use of pope Innocent XI. by mons. Cervic, secretary of the congregation DE PROPAGANDA FIDE; now first translated from an authentick Italian MS. never published. To which is added, A discourse concerning the state of religion in England, written in French in the time of King Charles I, and now first translated, with a large dedication to the present pope, giving him a very particular account of the state of religion among the Protestants, and of several other matters of importance relating to Great Britain. The translation of this account was done by Michael de la Roche, author of The Memoirs of literature; and the dedication to the pope was, upon good grounds, supposed to be done by another (*), and not by Sir Richard. In this last he rallies the notion, that the church may err but never does, maintaining, that the power and authority of the protestant church is as strong upon this foundation as that of the pope founded upon infallibility (43). The same year Sir Richard published A Letter from the Earl of Mar to the King before his Majesty's arrival in England, with some remarks on my Lord's subsequent conduct. Our Author also continued his Lover to this year, though it was begun in 1714 (44). The character of Sir Anthony Crabtree, of Goatham in Herefordshire, in No. 14. was designed for the Earl of Oxford (45). About the years 1715 and 1716 he wrote the paper called The Town Talk, and another intitled The Tea-Table, and some of the Pasquins. Also in 1716 he published the second volume of the Englishman. In the preface of which he observes, ‘ that to insinuate ‘ that there are evil purposes in the ministers of any ‘ country is in itself a seditious and unwarrantable practice; but that the apparent tendency of the proceedings in the late times, justified the disrespect with ‘ which the officers of the state were then treated in the ‘ former volume of the Englishman. That volume ‘ alarmed mankind of their purposes, and of the ‘ methods they had taken to accomplish them. It is ‘ incumbent upon one who had treated them so frankly ‘ when they were only suspected, to make good what ‘ he seemed to accuse them of, now their actions are ‘ brought to light.’ In answer to this it was maintained, on the other hand, that the late ministry had never entertained any such evil purposes as they are here charged with, which is evident from the peaceful entrance of the Queen's successor into the possession of the throne; and that the practices and designs to disturb him in that possession afterwards, were entirely owing to the violent proceedings of his ministers against their immediate predecessors in the administration. In reality, the violence on both sides was the genuine effect of that never enough

(*) Who was better versed Ecclesiast. H

(43) The w tenour of th dedication a pears indeed be above Sir chard's reac church mat. Yet the Au whoever he here confou (affectedly p haps) the di rence betwe popish infall ty and prote certainty.

(44) No. I came out o Tuesday Fe that year.

(45) Oldmi life of Artl Maynwair p. 193. wh us; that h courted at time by th Lord to co into his me fures.

for enquiring into the Estates forfeited by the late Rebellion in Scotland. This carried him into that part of the united kingdom, where how unwelcome a guest soever he might be to the generality, yet he received from several of the Nobility and Gentry, the most distinguishing marks of respect (s), inasmuch that he began to turn his thoughts upon the much to be desired, but hopeless project of perfecting the Union between the two kingdoms, by extending it to the policy in Church as well as State. In this view, he had frequent conversations with some of the Presbyterian Ministers [X], concerning the restoration of Episcopacy, the ancient church government of that nation; and often lamented this division in the ecclesiastical administration, which still serves to maintain a kind of alienation between the people. Sir Richard wished well to the interests of Religion, and as he imagined that Union would promote it, he had some thoughts of proposing it at Court; but that, as was likely, proved abortive (t). In 1718 he buried his second wife, who had brought him a handsome fortune, and a good estate in Wales [Z]; but neither that, nor the ample additions lately made to his income, were sufficient to answer his demands. The thoughtless vivacity of his spirit, often reduced him to little shifts of wit for its support [Z]; and the Project of the Fish-pool this year, owed its birth chiefly to the Projector's necessities [A.1]. The following year he opposed the remarkable Peerage bill in the House of Commons, enough to be lamented mischief of party rage. And we shall see our Author himself presently groaning under a persecution from the same cause in some of his now applauded ministry.

[X] He talked with several of the Scotch Ministers. Among these was one Hart, with whom Sir Richard commenced a friendship, and afterwards honoured him with his correspondence. This Hart he used to stile the Hangman of the Gospel; for though he was a facetious good-natured man, yet he had fallen into a peculiar way of preaching what he called The Terrors of the Law, and denounced Anathemas from the Pulpit without reserve. Our Knight also, during his stay in Scotland, indulged his genius in searching into the humours of low life. In which view, he prepared a splendid feast at Edinburgh, and ordered his servants to pick up all the beggars and poor people they could find in the streets for his Guests. The Servants obeyed, and Sir Richard soon saw himself at the head of forty or fifty beggars, together with some poor decayed Tradesmen. After dinner he pled them with punch and wine; and when the frolick was ended, he declared, that besides the pleasure of filling so many empty bellies, he had learned humour enough to make a good Comedy (46).

[Y] He buried his second Wife. She died on the 26th of December this year, at the age of forty years, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Sir Richard had testified his great esteem for her in the Dedication to her, prefixed to the third Volume of The Lady's Library while she was living (47), and after her death he laments his loss of her as the best Woman that ever man had, intimating that she frequently lamented and pined at his neglect of himself (48). The account of her birth and family is given at the close of this Memoir.

[Z] He was often reduced to little witty shifts. Among many instances of Sir Richard's good nature, his kindness to the unfortunate Mr Savage, natural son to Earl Rivers, was none of the least. He declared in this Gentleman's favour with all the ardor and benevolence which constituted his character, promoted his interest with the utmost zeal, related his misfortunes, applauded his merit, took all opportunities of recommending him, and asserted that the inhumanity of his mother had given him a right to call every good man his Father. He proposed to establish him in some settled scheme of life, and to have contracted some kind of alliance with him by marrying him to a natural daughter, on whom he intended to bestow a thousand pounds. But though he was always lavish of his future bounties, he conducted his affairs in such a manner, that he was very seldom able to keep his promises, or execute his own intentions. However, he gave Savage a certain allowance till the said marriage should be consummated (49). During this state of things, he once desired Savage in 1718, with an air of the utmost importance, to come very early to his house the next morning, which Savage did, and found the chariot at the door, Sir Richard waiting for him, and ready to go out. What was intended, and whither they were to go, Savage could not conjecture, and was not willing to enquire, but immediately seated himself with Sir Richard in the chariot. The Coachman was ordered to drive, and they hurried with the utmost expedition to Hyde-Park Corner, where they stopped at a petty Tavern, and retired to a private room. Sir Richard then informed him, that he intended to publish a pamphlet, and that he had desired him to come thither that he might write for him. They soon sat down to the work; Sir Richard dictated, and Savage wrote, till the dinner that had been ordered was set upon table. Savage was surprized at the meanness of the entertainment, and after some hesitation, ventured to ask for wine, which Sir Richard, not without reluctance, ordered to be brought. They then finished their dinner, and proceeded on their pamphlet, which they concluded in the afternoon. Savage then imagined his task was over, and expected that Sir Richard would call for the reckoning; but he was deceived, for Sir Richard told him, that he was without money, and that the pamphlet must be sold before the dinner was paid for. Savage was therefore obliged to go and offer their new production to sale for two guineas, which, with some difficulty, he obtained. Sir Richard then returned home, having retired that day only to avoid his Creditors, and composed the pamphlet only to discharge his reckoning. This was related by Savage himself, who also told another equally uncommon shift as follows: Sir Richard having one day invited to his house a great number of persons of the first quality, they were surprized at the number of Liveries that surrounded the table; and after dinner, when wine and mirth had set them free from the observation of rigid ceremony, one of them enquired of Sir Richard how such an expensive train of domestics could be consistent with his fortune? Sir Richard frankly confessed, that they were fellows of whom he would very willingly be rid. And being then asked, why he did not discharge them, he declared, that they were Bailiffs, who had introduced themselves with an execution, and whom, since he could not send them away, he had thought it convenient to embellish with Liveries, that they might do him credit, whilst they staid. His friends were diverted with the expedient, and by paying the debt, discharged the Attendance; having obliged Sir Richard to promise, that they should never find him again graced with a retinue of the same kind. It will be proper to inform the Reader, before we finish this remark, the substance of which was furnished by Mr Savage, that his marriage beforementioned with a natural daughter of Sir Richard, never took place; for during the delay occasioned by waiting till our Knight could raise the promised Fortune, he was informed, that Savage had ridiculed him, at which he was so much exasperated, that he withdrew the allowance that he had paid him, and never afterwards admitted him to his house (50).

[AA] The Fish-pool. Sir Richard had a patent for this invention (51). By which it appears, that this vessel was intended to carry fish alive, and without wasting, to any part of the kingdom. The project was promising enough in the theory, and he accordingly built himself up with great hopes of such success as would make a handsome fortune. He even comforted himself with the prospect of making up the loss of his patent for the playhouse by the profits of it. 'I shall not whine longer, says he, in the conclusion of The Theatre (†), about the hardships I have suffered, but advertise my friends and others, that, since a late judgment in my favour concerning a certain ridiculed invention, I want nothing but that men will support a design of mine, by which they may divide ten per cent. six times a year, to be in possession of a much greater income than any man living has merit enough to deserve.' But, after all these towering hopes, the

(s) Morgan's Chron. Diary in the Historical Register for this year.

(t) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, under our Author's article.

(46) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. IV. p. 118.

(47) Published in 1714 by him in three Volumes, 8vo.

(48) In the Theatre, No. XII. Tuesday, Feb. 9. 1720.

(49) Plain Dealer by Aaron Hill, Esq;

(50) Life of Richard Savage, p. 13—16.

(51) It was dated June 10, 1718.

(†) In Number XXVIII. which is the last of those Papers.

Commons [BB], and during the course of this opposition to the Court, his Licence for acting Plays was revoked, and his Patent rendered ineffectual at the instance of the Lord Chamberlain. He did his utmost to prevent so great a loss [CC]. And finding every direct the scheme proved a ruinous one to him; for, after he had been at immense expence in contriving and building his vessel, besides the charge of the patent, it appeared upon the trial to be a meer project. His intention was to bring salmon alive from the coast of Ireland, where that fish abounded, to London, where it was very scarce (52). But these fish, though supplied by this contrivance with a continual stream of water in crossing the sea, yet, not brooking the confinement, battered themselves to pieces against the sides of the pool, so that when they were brought to market, they fetched little money. The great cheapness of this fish at present in London, where it is sold for a shilling a pound, is owing to the extraordinary plenty of it caught in the Trent and Severn, especially this last season, whence it is brought to London in the Cirencester and Gloucester stage-coaches (53).

(52) It was usually sold there for 5s. a pound.

(53) This was written in 1755.

[BB] He opposed the Peerage Bill.] Upon this occasion he wrote the following letter to the Earl of Oxford.

‘ My Lord,

‘ I am very glad of the occasion wherein I have the good fortune to think the same way with your Lordship, because I have very long suffered a great deal of pain in reflecting upon a certain virulence with which my zeal has heretofore transported me to treat your Lordship’s person and character. I do protest to you, excepting in the first smart of my disgrace and expulsion out of the House of Commons, I never writ any thing that ought to displease you but with a reluctant heart, and in opposition to much good-will and esteem for your many great and uncommon talents. And I take the liberty to say thus publicly to yourself, what I have often said to others on the subject of my behaviour to you; I never had any other reason to lessen my Lord of Oxford than that which Brutus had to stab Cæsar, the love of my country. Your Lordship will, I hope, believe, there cannot be a more voluntary unrestrained reparation made to a man, than that I make to you, in begging your pardon thus publicly for every thing I have spoken or written to your disadvantage, foreign to the argument and cause which I was then labouring to support. You will please to believe, that I could not be so insensible as not to be touched with the generosity of part of your conduct towards me, or have omitted to acknowledge it accordingly, if I had not thought that your very virtue was dangerous; and that it was (as the world then stood) absolutely necessary to depreciate so adventurous a genius, surrounded with so much power as your Lordship then had. I transgressed, my Lord, against you, when you could make twelve peers in a day; I ask your pardon, when you are a private nobleman; and, as I told you when I resigned the Stamp-office, I wished you all prosperity consistent with the public good; so now I congratulate you upon the pleasure you must needs have in looking back upon the true fortitude, with which you have passed through the dangers arising from the rage of the people, and the envy of the rest of the world. If to have rightly judged of mens passions and prejudices, vices and virtues, interests and inclinations, and to have waited with skill and courage for proper seasons and incidents to make use of them for a man’s safety and honour, can administer pleasure to a man of sense and spirit, your Lordship has abundant cause of satisfaction. In confidence that you will accept of my sorrow and repentance for the unprovoked liberties I have taken in my former writings, I make you my patron in this present discourse on the greatest occasion that has perhaps ever happened in England. Your Lordship will see I write in haste; and the necessity of pressing forward to be time enough to be of any use, will excuse the failures in style and expression. I shall therefore immediately fall into the matter of the bill; which I fear may change this free state into the worst of all tyrannies, that of an Aristocracy. I shall support my reasons for that terror by running through the several parts of it, and making it appear, that this is more likely than any other consequence that can be supposed will attend such a law as this would be. The whole tenour of it is very unfortunately put together, if any thing but an additional power to the peers is intended by it.’

Sir Richard is also said to be the author of a paper, written in opposition to the same bill, called The Plebeian, which was answered by Mr Addison in The Old Whig. Concerning which, we refer to this last gentleman’s article (54), with this remark, that the Plebeian is ascribed by Mr Oldmixon (55) to William Benson, Esq; late one of the Auditors of the Imprest, the great venerator of Milton. (56).

[CC] He did all he could to prevent such a loss, &c.] Our Author’s pen, in every exigence, was an engine which, like Flavia’s fan, was always ready at hand to serve the various purposes of the Engineer, and which, in the present case like that too, in raising a flame in every other breast, gave such a proper degree of coolness, as was necessary for preserving that gaiety of spirit, by which he had constantly procured the attention of the public. He opened his design in a Paper called The Theatre, with a display of the usefulness of the Stage, and the merit of good Actors in general. But he had proceeded on this general plan only a few weeks, when the first step was taken to perplex his government, by suspending Mr Colley Cibber, a principal Actor, and a Fellow-manager with him by the licence; he entered particularly into the defence of his character and merit. But this was cut very short by the succeeding direct measures that were taken to displace him Governor. A particular Account of which was immediately published, in a Letter from himself under his real name, to himself under the feigned name of Sir John Edgar, which he had assumed in this Paper, as follows.

‘ Sir,

‘ Your last Paper having descended to the case of particular men, who are concerned in the Theatre, I hope you will allow me the advantage of being represented to the Town by your means, and of conveying my thoughts to a Noble Person, who has forbid me, without any fault of mine, ever to approach him either by speech or writing, as long as we live; but you will understand me better by reading, what I know not how to convey to him, unless you will please to print it.

‘ My most honoured Lord and Patron,

‘ If your Grace believes that it is as great to undo as to make a man, I am the unhappy instrument in both kinds; and, if it is a gratification to you, I have some consolation in the wretched distinction of being the only man the Duke of Newcastle (*) ever injured. My high obligations to you temper my spirit; and, after some tumult of soul, and agony of the worst passions in it, I behold you in the pleasing light you have heretofore appeared to me. I make you allowance for the disadvantage of youth and prosperity, and my benefactor covers my oppressor; as this last word must needs give offence to a noble nature, it stands upon me to make out my complaint, and shew all the world, for all the world will be curious in this case, as obscure as I am, for I have ceased to be so, since I have been distinguished by your Grace’s displeasure. The patent which I have from his Majesty makes me the sole governor of a company of comedians for my life, and that franchise is to subsist in those who claim under me three years after my death; there is nothing in it, as to the bestowing part from the crown, but what are meer transcripts of the patent given by King Charles II. to Sir William Davenant; and, though I might have had it to myself as well as he, I made a conscience and scruple of asking for my heirs, an office that required a very particular turn and capacity to execute. It is not, my Lord, very common in Courts, for a man to ask less, when he knows he may obtain more; the very night I received it, I participated the power and use of it with relation to the profits, that should arise from it, between the gentlemen who invited me into the Licence upon his Majesty’s happy accession to the throne; and it has flourished in all manner of respects to a degree unknown in any former time. When your Grace came to be Chamberlain (57), from a generous design of making every office and authority the better for your wearing, your Grace was induced to send for me, and the other Sharers, and in an absolute manner offered

(54) In-Vol. I. p. 38. remark [P].
(55) In History of England, &c. p. 675. Edit. 1735. Fol.
(56) See that poet’s article, Vol. V. remark [Y] and in the text, p. 3117.

(*) The Earl of Clare was created Marquis of Clare and Duke of Newcastle August 2, 1715. Peerage of England, as before.

(57) He was made Chamberlain April 14, 1717. Salmon’s Chron. Hist. under that year.

direct avenue of approach to his Royal Master effectually barred against him by his powerful Adversary, he had recourse to the method of applying to the public, in hopes that ‘ offered us a Licence, and demanded a resignation of the Patent, which I presumed as absolutely to refuse; this refusal I made in writing, and petitioned the King for his protection in the Grant, which he had given me: this matter rested thus for many months, and the next molestation we received, was by an Order, signed by your Grace, to dismiss Mr Cibber. The Actors obeyed, but I presumed to write to your Grace against it, and expressed my sorrow, that you would give me no better occasion of shewing my duty but by bearing Oppression from you; this freedom produced a message by your Kinsman and Secretary, whom I treated with as much deference and respect, as any man living could do the Duke of Newcastle coming from the King. This message was in your Grace’s name, to forbid me ever to write, speak, or visit you more. The Gentleman, I dare say, has told you, and will tell you, that I answered him almost in these very words:

‘ Sir, I beg of you to take notice of my Manner, my Voice, and my Gesture, when I answer to this severe Message; and let the Duke of Newcastle know, that with the most profound submission and humility I received it, and protested to you, that I could have no message from any Family, except the Royal one, that could give me half this mortification. If I have not fallen into phrases, that speak me truly sorrowful and humble, use any you yourself can think of, which are more so, and you will then best express my meaning. At the same time you may very truly say, that if any other man were Chamberlain, and should send me such a message, my reply should be as haughty as it is now humble.

‘ He left me with a farther declaration, that my Patent should be prosecuted according to Law. I rested as well satisfied as one who had lost so powerful a friend could, from a security in a still greater Power, that of the Laws of the Land; but I was soon after awakened out of this slumber, which was far from being an easy one, by hearing that your Grace had sent for Mr Booth, and threatened a signed Manual, which must necessarily disable me, as to my defence, before you would proceed against me according to Law. I did your Grace the Justice to think it impossible for you to be prevailed upon to do that. I assure your Grace, the great name on the Top of the Paper, did not give me more Terror, than the name at the bottom did Sorrow. The Minister who subscribes, is answerable for what the King writes. Our Laws make our Prince Author of nothing but favour to his subjects. My Patent cannot be hurt, except it can be proved, it was obtained per deceptionem, as according to my duty, I am to believe this Order, for it does, by an artificial method in its effect, destroy by his signed Manual, what is granted by his Great Seal, which had been impossible to have been brought about, had the matter been fairly represented. All I could do, was to represent it by Petition, which I delivered in your Grace’s presence on Friday Night, the Prayer of which was: Votre Suppliant donc prie très humblement votre Majesté, qu’il ne recoive aucune Molestation, que par la Loye en juste forme de Proces; Your petitioner therefore most humbly prays, he may not be any way molested but by due course of Law. I know not by what Accident it happened, that my Petition was never read, but the next news I heard was the Order of Revocation. But I must take the liberty to say, that his Majesty must grant the Russians, mentioned in the last Proclamation, which is denied unhappy me, a Trial by due course of Law. The Revocation came on the Saturday, your Grace was so good as not to break the Sabbath upon me; but the sufficient evil of this day, being Monday, is an Order of Silence. Your Grace will please to read them both over again, which are to this effect:

‘ Whereas by our Royal Licence, bearing date the 18th day of October, 1714, We did give and grant unto Richard Steele Esq; now Sir Richard Steele Knt. Mr Robert Wilks, Mr Colley Cibber, Mr Thomas Dogget, and Mr Barton Booth, full power, licence, and authority, to form, constitute, and establish a ‘ Company of Comedians. And having received Information of great misbehaviours committed by our Company of Comedians now acting at the Theatre in Drury-Lane: Therefore for reforming the Comedians, and for establishing the just and ancient Authority of the Officers of our Household, and more especially of our Chamberlain, We have thought fit to revoke the abovementioned Licence. And we do further (as much as in us lies, and as by Law we may) revoke and make void all other Licences, Powers, and Authorities whatsoever, and at any time heretofore given by us to the said Sir Richard Steele, Robert Wilks, Colley Cibber, Thomas Dogget, and Barton Booth, or to any of them severally. In pursuance of this your Grace proceeds thus:

‘ Whereas his Majesty has thought fit, by his Letters of Revocation, bearing date the 23d day of January, 1719, (for divers weighty reasons therein contained) to revoke his Royal Licence: For the effectual prevention of any future misbehaviour, in obedience to his Majesty’s commands, I do, by virtue of my Office of Chamberlain of his Majesty’s Household, hereby discharge you the said Managers and Comedians at the said Theatre in Drury-Lane in Covent-Garden, from further acting. Given under my hand and seal this 25th day of January, 1719.

‘ To the Gentlemen managing the Company of Comedians, at the Theatre in Drury-Lane in Covent-Garden, and to all the Comedians and Actors there.

‘ ’Tis observable, that though his Majesty took great care to express himself according to his gracious inclination, with much reserve and care that nothing but the Law should hurt his poor subject, in the words as much as in us lies, and as by Law we may, your Grace has been prevailed upon to supply the defective hardship. I shall not say more, or make stronger observations upon what you have signed; for my Love to you, will not let me call this an act of yours, as my duty to my Prince will not let me call it an act of his: I wish your Grace had been as careful as he in leaving me to the Law. But if you will allow me to ask you one favour, before you have quite broke my heart and spirit; give me but the name of your Adviser, that is to say, your Lawyer on this occasion, and you shall see, that it is not for want of skill in life, that I am subjected to all the pains and punishments, to which those wicked ones are exposed, who are described by the monosyllable, Poor. When I know who has made your Grace thus injure the best Master and best Servant that ever man had, I will teach him the difference between Law and Justice: he shall soon understand, that he who advises how to escape the Law, and do Injustice to his Fellow-subject, is an Agent of Hell; such a man for a larger fee; would lend a Dark-lantern to a Murderer, which would be but the same iniquity practised in a higher degree, that would be more cruel, but not more unjust. When I am sure who he is, I shall with justice use him, as he does with injustice use me: I shall so far imitate him as to be within the Law, when I am endeavouring to starve him; I hope he is Poor, by selling Poyson to get himself food (58). But I fear I grow transported beyond the respect that is due to your Grace’s presence, and protest to you, in the most solemn manner, that rather than never to be well with you more, were myself and family only concerned in it, I would this moment resign my Patent, for any employment of less profit, that you would procure me: but my obligations to your Grace will not discharge those, which I am under to the rest of the world. I would not hurt any man now in India, for the favour of the greatest man in England, or give up a Door-keeper of the Play-house to make myself: therefore your Grace I hope will forgive me, that to gratify you, I do not consign to distress and poverty, above sixty families, who all live comfortably, many of them plentifully, under my present Jurisdiction. When I resign them, they may be governed by your Grace’s Successor in your office, as they have been by your Predecessor, according to humour and caprice, and not reason and justice. In their defence and my own, I deny all Allegations of voluntary neglect imputed to me or them; or undue demands made upon that his complaints would reach the Ear of his Sovereign, though in an indirect course, by that canal. In this spirit he formed the plan of a periodical Paper, to be published twice a week under the title of The Theatre; the first number of which came out on the 2d of January, 1719-20. In the mean time, the misfortune of being out of favour at Court, like other misfortunes, drew after it a train of more. During the course of this Paper, in which he had assumed the feigned name of Sir John Edgar, he was outraged by Mr John Dennis, the noted Critic, in a very abusive pamphlet, entitled The Character and Conduct of Sir John Edgar, called by himself Sole Monarch of the Stage in Drury-Lane; and his Three Deputy Governors, in two Letters to Sir John Edgar. To this insult, our Author made a proper reply in The Theatre [DD]. While he was struggling with all his might to save himself from ruin, he found time to turn the same Engine, his Pen, against the mischievous South-sea Scheme [EE], which had nearly brought the nation to ruin in 1720. And the next year

(58) This Lawyer was Sir Thomas Pengelly, some time Chief Baron of the Exchequer Court, whose name he distorts thus: Pen is the Welsh word for Head, Guilt the Dutch word for Money, which with the English word Ly, express one, who turns his head to lye for money. The Theatre, No. IX and XI.

‘ the subject by me or them; and shall always with ‘ safety to my honour, and duty to the rest of the ‘ world, and no other reserve, be,

‘ My Lord,

‘ Your Grace’s most obliged,

‘ Most devoted and obedient humble Servant,

‘ Villars-Street,
‘ York-Buildings,
‘ Jan 25, 1719-20.

‘ Richard Steele (59).’

(59) The Theatre, No. VIII.

But this application proving ineffectual, he published soon after The State of the Case between the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty’s Household, and the Governor of the Royal Company of Comedians. With the opinions of Pemberton, Northy and Parker concerning the Theatre. In this pamphlet he states the account of his loss by this proceeding, as follows :

	l.	s.	d.
Six hundred pounds a year for life, moderately valued, amounts to	6000	0	0
Three years after my life	1800	0	0
My share in the scenes, stock, &c.	1000	0	0
The profit of acting my own plays already writ, or I may write	1000	0	0
Total	9800	0	0

He then declares he never did one act to provoke this attempt, nor, says he, does the Chamberlain pretend to assign any direct reason of forfeiture, but openly and wittingly declares he will ruin Steele; ‘ which, in a man in his circumstances against one in mine, is as great as the humour of Malagene, in the Comedy, who valued himself upon his activity in tripping up Cripples. All this is done against a man to whom Whig, Tory, Roman Catholic, Dissenter, Native, Foreigner, owe zeal and good-will for good offices endeavoured towards every one of them in their Civil Rights, and their kind wishes for him are but a just return. But what ought to weigh most with his Lordship the Chamberlain, is my zeal for his Master; of which I shall at present say no more than that his Lordship and many others may perhaps have done more for the House of Hanover, than I have; but I am the only man in his Majesty’s Dominions, who did all he could (60).’

(60) State of the Case, &c. p. 39.

It is observable, that our Author’s friend, Mr Walpole, was at this time in disfavour at Court, having resigned his Post of First Commissioner of the Treasury on the 10th of April, 1717 (61), and was not replaced till April 2, 1721, presently after which, viz. on the 18th of May following, Sir Richard was also restored to his Office of Comptroller of the Theatre (62).

(61) Salmon’s Chron. Hist. under that year.

(62) Ibid. under the year 1721.

[DD] He made a proper reply in the Theatre. The impotence of the critic’s attack was a subject justly provocative of mirth, a provocative which was very seasonable to our Author, then groaning under such a persecution from the hand of real power, as had almost sunk his native gaiety: but here he appears perfectly restored. ‘ The Defamer, says he of himself in the character of Sir John Edgar, has this phrase in his first page: Your black peruke and your dusky countenance— ‘ This treatment of a visage so well known is an impudence that transcends all example; and I have ordered new editions of his face after Kneller, Thornhill, and Richardson, to disabuse mankind in this particular. He is painted by the first resolute, by the second thoughtful, and by the third indolent. Sir Godfrey bewailed that Caraccio was not living when he sat to him; and, when he took pencil in hand, repeated this sentence out of Mr Steele’s epistle to the Bayliff of Stockbridge: He is gone but a little way in the course of virtue, who cannot bear reproach for her sake. You may observe a roughness in the portraiture from the rigor of that thought, which has occasioned that most ladies chuse Mr Richardson’s work rather than Sir Godfrey’s (63).’ In the same perfectly good humour he published afterwards the following advertisement. An eminent Turkey-merchant and an ingenious Foreigner do hereby give notice, that if any person will discover the libeller or libellers, who has and have falsely and maliciously insinuated in their writings, that Sir R—d S—le is ugly, so as he or they may be prosecuted by law, shall have all fitting encouragements; the said gentlemen having lost considerable matches by reason of the similitude of their persons to the said injured Knight (64).

(63) The Theatre, No. X.

(64) The Theatre, No. XVIII.

[EE] He employed his pen against the South-sea scheme. Upon this subject he wrote The Crisis of Property; an argument proving, that the annuities for ninety-nine years, as such, are not in the condition of other subjects of Great-Britain; but, by compact with the legislature, are exempt from any direction relating to the said estates; which was soon followed by A Nation a Family; being the Sequel of the Crisis of Property; or a Plan for the Improvement of the South-sea proposals; both published in Feb. 1720. He entered also into this subject in The Theatre for Tuesday February 16, the same year, where having, in defence of his struggle to preserve his patent according to the first plan of this paper, descanted upon the necessity of guarding against poverty by all warrantable means, by displaying the many calamities that were its attendants, he passes, by way of no very unnatural transition, to the unjustifiable means of doing it by the South-sea scheme. This is the subject of a feigned visit from himself, Sir John Edgar, to the injured Knight, Sir Richard Steele. In the conclusion of which, ‘ Sir John Edgar, says he, turned off the discourse, by asking what those papers were upon the table, which he told me, with a very grave face, were a calculation he had made of the difference between a scheme of his for paying the debts of the nation, which he is printing in all haste, and says will be for the advantage of the whole kingdom, and is built upon what he calls his first rule of politics, to wit, A Nation a Family. I told him, says Sir John Edgar with exquisite humour, people would expect great things of him indeed upon that foundation, he had such a reputation for œconomy. He pertly answered, ‘ I would provide for my family as it belongs to the nation, and not for the nation as if it belonged to my family. Let others serve the nation by taking care only of themselves, I will serve it with contempt of any thing for myself, but what I will enjoy in common with others. I suppose we shall see this, and a great deal more, too old-fashioned even for me, in print within a few hours. I left him very much out of humour with him; and, in ridicule of his paying the public debts, before he had recovered his estate to pay his own, I placed the extemporary distich at the head of this present writing. This is

‘ To make his publick spirit better known,
‘ He to the public debts postpones his own.
‘ Confess and avoid

‘ Culprit Civil (65).’

(65) The Theatre, No. XIV.

As the South-sea scheme was not obtained without a proper consideration given to the ministry, our Author’s engine was apparently directed against it by the spirit of opposing the ministry which then oppressed him. The Crisis of Property was attacked in a pamphlet printed the same year under the title of The Crisis of Honesty, being an Answer to the Crisis of Property; in a Letter to Sir Richard Steele. He took no notice in print of this year he was restored to his office and authority in the Play-house in Drury-Lane (r). Of this it was not long before he made an additional advantage, by bringing his celebrated Comedy, called The Conscious Lovers, upon that Stage, where it was acted with prodigious success in 1722. So that the receipt there must have been very considerable, besides the profits accruing by the Sale of the Copy, and a Purse of five hundred pounds given to him by the King (s), to whom he dedicated it. Yet notwithstanding these ample recruits, about the year following, being reduced to the utmost extremity, he sold his share in the Play-house, and soon after commenced a Law-suit with the Managers, which in 1726 was determined to his disadvantage [FF]. Having now again, for the last time, brought his fortune, by the most heedless profusion, into a desperate condition, he was rendered altogether incapable of retrieving the loss, by being seized with a paralytic disorder, which greatly impaired his understanding. In these unhappy circumstances, he retired to his seat at Languanor near Caermarthen in Wales; where he paid the last debt to nature on the 21st of September, 1729, and was privately interred, according to his own desire, in the Church of Caermarthen. Among his papers were found, the MSS. of two plays; one called The Gentleman, founded upon The Eunuch of Terence; and the other intituled The School of Action; both nearly finished.

anta-

Sir Richard's first Wife was a Gentlewoman of Barbadoes, with whom he had a valuable Plantation there, on the death of her brother, who was taken by the French, at sea, as he was coming to England, and died in France. After the death of this wife, without Issue, he married Mary the daughter of Jonathan Scurlock of Languanor in Caermarthenshire, Esq; by whom he had three children, a son named Eugene, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mary (t). His son was some years under the care of Mr Solomon Lowe, of Blythe-House in Hammersmith, who gave him the character of a sprightly lad, of fine parts; but not long after he was taken home to his Father's house in York-Buildings, being indulged (as his genius lay that way) in acting plays in the Censorium (u), his constitution was broke by frequent heats and colds, and the child lost (w). His daughter Elizabeth, being the only one then living (*), was married young, in the end of May 1731, to the honourable John Trevor, then one of the Welsh Judges, and now Baron Trevor of Bromham, who hath Issue by her one daughter, named Diana (x). As Sir Richard was beloved when living, his loss was sincerely regretted at his death. He was a man of undisssembled, and extensive benevolence; a friend to the friendless, and, as far as his circumstances would permit, the Father of every Orphan. His works are chaste and manly; he himself admired Virtue, and he drew her as lovely as she is. He celebrates a generous action, with a warmth that is only peculiar to a good heart. He was a stranger to the most distant appearance of Envy or Malevolence, never jealous of any man's growing reputation, and so far from arrogating any praise to himself from his conjunction with Mr Addison, that he was the first who desired him to distinguish his Papers in the Spectator; and after the death of that Friend, was a faithful Guardian of his Fame, notwithstanding an aspersion which Mr Tickel was so unjust to throw upon him [GG]: Sir Richard's greatest Error

