antagonist, being prevented probably by the sudden catastrophe of the project, the iniquity of which became a parliamentary enquiry before the end of the year (v). Upon the whole, it was very lucky for Sir Richard's character, that he was thrown into the opposition both against the Peerage bill and the South-sea scheme. The reputation he gained thereby as a patriot may be deemed a sufficient ballance for whatever loss he sustained as a patentee.

[FF] The suit ended to his disadvantage. Mr Cibber is here again our authority, who begins his account thus. In all the transactions of life there cannot be a more painful circumstance than a dispute in law with a man with whom we have long lived in an agreeable amity. But when Sir Richard, proceeds he, to get himself out of difficulties, was obliged to throw his affairs into the hands of lawyers and trustees, upon that consideration the friend and the gentleman had no more to do in the matter. Thus, whilst Sir Richard no longer acted from himself, it can be no wonder if a flaw was found in our conduct for the law to make work with. About three years before the law-suit commenced, upon Sir Richard's total absenting himself from all care and management of the stage, which by our articles he was equally and jointly with us obliged to attend, we let him know that we could not go on at that rate; but that, if he expected to make the business a sinecure, we must be paid for our extraordinary care of it: we therefore intended to charge for it a salary of 1l. 13s. 4d. every acting day for our management. To which in his composed manner he answered, that to be sure we knew what was next to be done better than he did; that he had always taken a delight in making us easy, and had no reason to doubt of our doing him justice; and he never once objected to, or complained of, this for near three years together. But, though no man alive can write better of economy, yet perhaps no man is more fond of the drudgery of practising it. He was often in want of money; and, while we were in friendship with him, we assisted his occasions: but this compliance had so unfortunate an effect, that it only heightened his opportunity of borrowing more; and the more we lent, the less he minded us, or shewed any concern for our welfare. Upon this we stopt our hands at once, and peremptorily refused to advance another shilling, till, by the ballance of our accounts, it became due to him. This treatment, though we hope not in the least unjustifiable, we have reason to believe so ruffled his temper, that he at once was as short with us as we had been with him; for from that day he never came near us: nay, he not only continued to neglect what he should have done, but did what he ought not to have done; he made an assignment of his share without our consent, in manifest breach of our agreement. Our part suffered by this neglect, since his rank and figure in the world were of extraordinary service to us. The cause was heard before Sir Joseph Jekyl; and the issue was, that, Sir Richard not having made any objection to what we had charged for management for three years together, as our proceedings had been all transacted in open day, without any clandestine intention of fraud, we were allowed the sums in dispute abovementioned, and Sir Richard not being advised to apply to the Lord Chancellor, both parties paid their own costs, and determined this should be the last law-suit between them (67).

[GG] He shewed himself a guardian of Addison's fame against Tickel. Instances of this friendship to the memory of Mr Addison have been already mentioned, and sufficiently enlarged upon in this work, to which places we must refer the reader (68), who, it is hoped, will excuse some inaccuracies there too hastily dropt, to the prejudice of Sir Richard's account of this friendship, which our Author ascribes to the persuasions of Lord Halifax (69), and proves it against Mr Tickel, who had imputed this charge to Mr Addison's seriousness and (*) Mary died in her infancy.

(67) Cibber's Apology, p. 308.

(68) Vol. I. under Mr Addison's article.

(69) In the dedication of the Drummer, p. 17, 2d edition, published by Sir Richard.

(r) On the 15th of May, 1721. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

(s) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, as before.

(t) Memoirs of Sir Richard Steele, as before.

(u) So Sir Richard called his great room there.

(w) Gen. Dict. under Sir Richard's article.

(x) Collins's Peerage, under the article of Lord Trevor.

(v) Which met Dec. 8th, and on the 12th, the Commons ordered, that the Directors of the South-sea company should forthwith lay before the House an account of all their proceedings. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

(9) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, as before.

Error was want of Oeconomy. However, he was certainly the most agreeable, and (if we may be allowed the Expression) the most innocent rake, that ever trod the rounds of indulgence (9).

and modesty, which represented the duties of the priestly office as too weighty for him, without taking notice of any other reason, and thereby manifestly insinuating, that this, at least, was the principal if not the sole cause of the change. But this is utterly inconsistent with Sir Richard's account of it, which as plainly implies, that the principal if not the sole cause of it came from Lord Halifax. Whence it is evident, that both the accounts cannot be true (70) in the full sense and meaning of their respective Authors. In justice therefore to Sir Richard let it be allowed, as candour requires it should, that his remark is not ill-grounded; and then we hope the charge of ill-nature in it may not be turned upon the critic, by reflecting too severely, that the seriousness of the visage may fairly be understood to imply the seriousness of the temper from which the visage naturally takes its air.

(70) Addison's article, remark
[E].

STILLINGFLEET [EDWARD], the late very learned Bishop of Worcester, was the seventh son of Samuel Stillingfleet Gent. descended from an ancient family [A], by Susanna his wife, the daughter of Edward Norris of Petworth in Suffex Gent. who was his godfather as well as grandfather, and from whom he received his name. He was born April the 17th 1635, at Cranbourn in Dorsetshire; and educated from his tender years, in the grammar-school of that place by Mr Thomas Garden, a man of eminence and character in his profession: Under whom he made so considerable a progress, that he continued there till the time drew on, that it would be proper to settle him in the university. In order whereunto, he was removed for a while to Ringwood in Hampshire, with the view of an exhibition, given for such Scholars as should be elected thence to either of the Universities, by William Lynne Esq; founder of that school. From hence he was chosen at Midsummer 1648, and admitted the Michaelmas following into St John's college in Cambridge: and about six weeks after, on November the 8th, was admitted a Scholar of the house, at the nomination of the Earl of Salisbury. In this station he acquitted himself with such applause, and was taken so much notice of for his singular ingenuity, and constant improvement of it by a diligent application to his studies (a); that no sooner had he commenced Bachelor of Arts, which was in 1652 (b) [B], but the very next election, he was chosen Fellow of the college, and admitted as such March the 31st 1653. About the year 1654, he withdrew a while from the university to live at Wroxhall in Warwickshire with Sir Roger Bourgoine, or Burgoigne, Bart. [C], a person of great piety, prudence, and learning, to whom he had been recommended by Dr Paman, one of the Fellows of his college. But, the year following, he removed to Nottingham, to be tutor to Francis, eldest son of the honorable Francis Pierrepont Esq; brother to the Marquis of Dorchester. Here he began his Irenicum (c), which was published in 1659 [D]. Mean time,

(a) Life and Character of Dr
Edward Stillingfleet, Bishop of Worcester.
Lond. 1710. 8vo.
p. 8—10.

(b) From the University Registers.

(c) Life &c, as above, p. 11—
14.

[A] Descended from an ancient family. He was descended from the family of the Stillingfleets of Stillingfleet, about four miles from York, where his [namely Samuel's] grandfather John Stillingfleet Esq; brother to Cuthbert Stillingfleet Abbot of York, had a fair estate (1).

(1) Life, &c. as above, p. 8.

[B] That no sooner had he commenced Bachelor of Arts. Whilst he was Bachelor, he was appointed Tripes, and much applauded for his witty and inoffensive speech on that occasion. But this did not take him off from his severe and more useful studies (2).

(2) Life, &c.
p. 10.

[C] To live at Wroxhall in Warwickshire with Sir Roger Burgoigne Bart. In what station Mr Stillingfleet was there, whether as a Companion or Chaplain, we are not informed. However, he behaved himself extremely well, as appeared not only from Sir Roger's kindness to him whilst in his family, but always by his unusual respects to him when he made him visits, and afterwards especially by his presenting him to the considerable Living of Sutton [3].

(3) See Life,
p. 11.

[D] Here he began his Irenicum, which was published in 1659. The whole title of this Book, is, 'Irenicum. A Weapon-Salve for the Churches Wounds, or the Divine Right of particular Forms of Church-Government discussed and examined according to the Principles of the law of Nature, the positive Laws of God, the practice of the Apostles, and the Primitive Church, and the judgment of reformed Divines. Whereby a Foundation is laid for the Churches peace, and the accommodation of our present differences. Humbly tendered to consideration.' In 1662 he put out a second Edition, 'with an Appendix concerning the power of Excommunication in a Christian Church.' 4to. The running title is, 'The divine Right of Forms of Church-Government, examined.' He hath divided it into two books. And, after having enquired, in the first, How far Church-Government is founded upon the Law of Nature; He proceeds in the second to lay down these positions; That, of divine right, there must be some form of Government in the Church; and, That Church-government must be administered by officers of divine appointment. And then he shews, That Christ did not determine the Form of the Government of his Church by any positive Laws; That the Apostles, in settling the government of it, copied the Model of the Jewish Synagogue; That Episcopacy is owned as a human Institution by the sense of the Church; That, in all probability, the Apostles did not observe any one fixed course of settling Church-government; but settled it according to the several circumstances of time, places, and persons; That there is no foundation for Lay-Elders, either in Scripture or Antiquity; That Episcopacy is lawful; That no certain unalterable Form of Church-Government was observed in the primitive Church, as delivered down to them either by a law of Christ, or an universal Constitution of the Apostles; That the most eminent Divines of the Reformation did never conceive any one form necessary; Those who look upon equality as the primitive Form, yet judge Episcopacy lawful; Those who judge Episcopacy to be the primitive Form, yet look not on it as necessary. . . . 'The book is written with a great deal of Learning, Moderation, and wit in some parts, especially the preface. It was esteemed a master-piece (4):' and well it might be so, when it is considered that the Author was only twenty-four years of age at the time of its publication (5). Bishop Burnet tells us, that it 'took with many; but was cried out upon by others as an attempt against the Church. Yet the argument was managed with so much learning and skill, that none of either side ever undertook to answer it. . . . The writing of it was a great snare to the Author: For, to avoid the imputations which that brought upon him, he not only retracted the book, but he went into the humours of a high sort of people, beyond what became him, perhaps beyond his own sense of things.' He was obliged more than once to make a kind of Apology for it. Thus, in one place (6), he 'professes to have published it, hoping by it to bring over those to a compliance with the Church of England (then like to be re-established) who stood off upon the supposition that Christ had appointed a Presbyterian Government to be always continued in his Church, and therefore thought Prelacy was to be detested as

(4) Burnet's History of his own Time,
Vol. I. p. 265

(5) Life, p. 1

(6) Ep. Ded.
an Ordination Sermon preach'd at St Peter's Cornhill,
March 15,
1634-5.

an

time, he took his Master of Arts degree in 1656 (d), as soon as he was of proper standing; and was incorporated in the same at Oxford, June 14, 1677 (e). He had not been above two years at Nottingham, when he was called back from thence by his worthy patron Sir Roger Burgoigne, who presented him, in 1657, to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordshire [E]. Before he was instituted to it he received episcopal orders from Dr Brounrig, the then ejected Bishop of Exeter. In this cure he performed all the duties of a most diligent and faithful Pastor; and there he composed his very learned book intituled Origines Sacrae, printed in 1662 (f) [K]: Which so recommended him to the favour of his diocesan, Bishop Sanderson, that he granted him, October the 16th 1662, the singular privilege of a License to preach the word of God throughout his diocese of Lincoln (g). It also procured him such esteem amongst the rest of the learned world, that Dr Henchman Bishop of London employed him to write a Vindication of Archbishop Laud's conference with Fisher the Jesuit [G]. The reputation of these excellent performances was the occasion of his being chosen by Sir Harbottle Grimston Preacher at the Rolls-Chapel; which obliging him to be in London in Term-time, was a fair introduction to his settlement in that noble city (b). And it followed soon after; for in January 1664-5, he was presented by Thomas Earl of Southampton to the great living of St Andrew's Holbourn; to which he was instituted the 21st of March (i). He kept notwithstanding his office of Preacher at the Rolls: And was chosen Lecturer at the Temple, where for several years he preached in the afternoon before those learned and venerable Societies; which procured him the acquaintance and friendship of the most eminent men in the law (k). On the 9th of February, 1666-7, he was collated by Bishop Henchman to the Prebend of Isledon, or Islington, in the church of St Paul's (l). Having taken in 1663 the degree of Batchelor of Divinity, he commenced in 1668 Doctor in that faculty (m); at which time he was persuaded to keep the public Act [H]. And having been for some time Chaplain to King Charles II, an unlawful Usurpation: . . . and it did not want success that way both here and in a neighbour kingdom. . . . In another place (-), he speaks of it thus, in the person of P. D. . . . 'I believe there are many things in it, which if Dr Stillingfleet were to write now, he would not have said: For there are some which shew his Youth and want of due consideration; others which he yielded too far, in hopes of gaining the Dissenting Parties to the Church of England; but upon the whole matter, I am fully satisfied the Book was written with a design to serve the Church of England. . . . He says further, I dare challenge any man to produce one passage in the whole Book that tendeth to encourage Faction or Schism, or opposition to the Church of England, but on the contrary, I endeavoured to recommend the Episcopal Government, as having the advantage of all others, and coming nearest to Apostolical practice.' Upon the whole, it must be acknowledged by ail, to contain a mass of Learning abundantly beyond what could have been expected at his years, and which few, if any, of his contemporaries, could pretend to equal (8).

his

[E] Who presented him, in 1657, to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordshire. One of the Seats of Sir Roger's family being here, might make him the more sollicitous to place a serious, ingenious, pious, and prudent person there, to be both a good neighbour, and suitable companion for himself, as well as a watchful and skilful guide of souls. And of whom could he more fitly make choice upon such an occasion, than of Mr Stillingfleet, whom he had so thoroughly known, and of whose character and abilities he was so fully satisfied, by his own conversation with, and experience of him, at Wroxhall (9)?

[F] Origines Sacrae, &c.] The whole title of it is, Origines Sacrae: Or a rational Account of the Christian Faith, as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures, and the matters therein contained. Lond. 1662. 4to. The compiler of his life justly observes (10), that this was 'a work of great extent, and variety of admirable learning, and written with such perspicuity of expression, such solidity of judgment and strength of argument, that it would have been deservedly esteemed a most compleat performance for one of more than twice his age: And so it was thought by a most excellent judge; for when he appeared at a Visitation before his diocesan, Bishop Sanderson, the Bishop seeing so young a man, could hardly believe it was Mr Stillingfleet, whom as yet he only knew by his Books; and afterwards, when he had embraced him, said, "He much rather expected to have seen one as considerable for his age, as he had already shewn himself for his learning;" It having always been justly esteemed one of the best Defences of revealed Religion that ever was extant in our own or any other Language. And it shewed the early ripeness of his Understanding, and that he had attained to the Knowledge of the Aged, when himself was yet but very young, he being but about twenty-eight years old at the time of its publication. An excellent work in its kind! but which would have been still much improved, had God granted him a longer life: A large Specimen whereof is to be seen in the Folio editions of that work, printed since his decease, which was to have made part of the First Volume; for he designed to have published it in several parts in 8vo, and had so well considered it, as to have gone on writing and printing as fast as ever health and business would have permitted him.' The Specimen here referred to, is printed at the end of the folio Editions of Origines Sacrae; and bears this further title. "Or, a Rational Account of the Grounds of Natural and Revealed Religion: wherein the Foundations of Religion, and the Authority of the Scriptures, are asserted and cleared. With an Answer to the modern Objections of Atheists and Deists. In five Books." But it contains only Two Chapters of Book I. of the intended work; and pages 116.

[G] A Vindication of Archbishop Laud's Conference with Fisher the Jesuit.] The book written against Archbishop Laud's Conference was intituled, 'Labyrinthus Cantuariensis, or Dr Laud's Labyrinth.' By T. C. It was said to be printed at Paris, 1658, but did not appear abroad till 1663 — Mr Stillingfleet's Answer was named, I. 'A Rational Account of the Grounds of the Protestant Religion; being a Vindication of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's Relation of a Conference between him and John Fisher, from the pretended Answer of T. C.' Lond. 1664. fol. In this book, he so evidently manifested what are the true Grounds of Faith, and where, and on which side, the Schism between us and the Church of Rome lies; and what Corruptions have been introduced by, and are constantly maintained among those of that Communion; as effectually silenced the Adversary, and did not a little advance Mr Stillingfleet's reputation. He wrote his Answer at Sutton, and made such dispatch, that, besides constant attendance on the duties of the place, he sent up of that elaborate work six or seven sheets a week to the press (11). Dr Tillotson gives this just and true character of it, that he found it in every part answerable to its title, viz. A Rational Account, &c. (12).

[H] At which time he was persuaded to keep the public Act.] And he did it with universal applause, on account of his fluency in the Latin tongue, his quickness of reply, and his powerful vindication of the positions he undertook to maintain: which were these, 1. Ratio secundi Praecepti in Decalogo est immutabilis, i. e. The reason or ground, of the second Commandment in the Decalogue is immutable. 2. Existentia τῷ λόγῳ ἢ αὐτῶν constat ex

(11) Life, p. 18, 19.

(12) Dedication of the Rule of Faith to Dr Stillingfleet.

his Majesty constituted him, in 1670, Canon Residentiary of St Paul's [I]. On the 11th of October 1672, he exchanged his Prebend of Islington for that of Newington in the same church (n). And, to bring some of his other preferments together, May the 4th 1677, he was made by King Charles Archdeacon of London, upon the promotion of Dr Lamplugh to the See of Exeter: Moreover, being nominated Dean of St Paul's, he was elected January 16, 1677-8 (o). But to return to his learned writings; he published in 1669 some Sermons: one of which being 'concerning the Reason of Christ's suffering for us,' engaged him in a controversy with the Socinians [K]. He was also engaged soon after in a controversy with the Papists [L]. And he moreover exerted himself in writing against them in King James the Second's reign [M]; which he did with such an exactness and liveliness, that initio Evangelii secundum S. Johannem, i. e. The eternal Existence of the Logos, or Word, is plainly manifest from the beginning of St John's gospel (13).

no

[I] His Majesty constituted him, in 1670, Canon Residentiary of St Paul's. The recommendation sent by his Majesty, on that occasion, to the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, is so much in the Doctor's praise, that we shall mention part of it. It begins thus. 'Cha. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Our well-deserving and well-beloved subject and chaplain Edward Stillingfleet, Doctor in Divinity, hath by his learned writings done such eminent service for the Church of England in particular, and the defence of the Christian Truth in general, that we think ourselves bound to give him all fitting encouragement, and therefore we are graciously pleased to recommend [him] unto you in very especial manner, and further to will and require that you elect and admit Him the said &c. Given at our Court at Whitehall the 9th of June 1670 (14).'

[K] Engaged him in a controversy with the Socinians. One of them having reflected upon the doctrine of this sermon, and made at the same time unworthy reflections upon the rulers of our Church, as if they had countenanced and encouraged the Socinian doctrine; our learned Author published, II. 'A Discourse concerning the true Reason of the Sufferings of Christ, in confutation of Crellius's Answer to Grotius.' Wherein he justly exposes the Socinian method of interpreting Scripture, particularly by a witty parallel between the first chapter of Genesis, and the first of St John's gospel. He also seriously considers the nature and end of our Saviour's sufferings, and removes the Socinian objections against their merit, and the reason we have to expect Salvation by them. After his death there was published, III. A second part to this book of Satisfaction; occasioned by an Appeal from the Dissenting Ministers to him, touching some Differences among themselves about that point. There are in this several of their Letters, with his Answers, and then a fuller examination of the grounds of the controversy (but not quite finished) wherein he judiciously states and explains the points between them, and as strenuously vindicates that necessary doctrine of satisfaction from the Antinomian notion and consequences of it, as he had before done from the Socinian (15).—The first of these Discourses was reprinted in 1696, with this title, 'A Discourse concerning the Doctrine of Christ's Satisfaction; or the true Reasons of his Sufferings; with an Answer to the Socinian objections. To which is added a Sermon concerning the Mysteries of the Christian Faith; preached April 7, 1691. With a Preface concerning the True State of the Controversie about Christ's Satisfaction.' Lond. 1696. 8vo. The Sermon was preached at the Tuesday Lecture at St Lawrence Jewry, upon 1 Tim. i. 15.—He published also a Defence of it, or IV. 'A Discourse in Vindication of the Trinity: with an Answer to the late Objections against it from Scripture, Antiquity, and Reason. And a Preface concerning the different Explications of the Trinity, and the tendency of the present Socinian Controversie.' The Preface is dated Worcester, Sept. 30. 1696 (16). . . . And some Reflections being made on this last Treatise, he wrote an Answer to them (17).

[L] He was also engaged soon after in a Controversy with the Papists. The several pieces he now writ against them, were, V. 'A Discourse concerning the Idolatry practised in the Church of Rome, and the hazard of Salvation in the Communion of it: in answer to some Papers of a Revolted Protestant. Wherein a particular account is given of the Fanaticisms and Divisions of that Church.' Lond. 1671. 8vo. VI. 'An Answer to several late Treatises occasioned by a Book entitled, A Discourse concerning the Idolatry practised in the Church of Rome, and the hazard of Salvation in the Communion of it. Part I.' 8vo. VII.

'A Second Discourse in Vindication of the Protestant Grounds of Faith against the pretence of Infallibility in the Roman Church, in Answer to The Guide in Controversie, by R. H. and against Protestancy without Principles, and Reason and Religion; or the certain Rule of Faith, both written by E. W. with a particular Enquiry into the Miracles of the Roman Church.' Lond. 1673. 8vo. VIII. 'A Defense of the Discourse concerning the Idolatry practised in the Church of Rome, in Answer to a Book entitled Catholics no Idolaters.' 8vo. IX. 'An Answer to Mr Cressy's Epistle Apologetical to a Person of Honour, touching his Vindication of Dr Stillingfleet.' Lond. 1675. 8vo. The Epistle Ded. is dated London, Nov. 14, 1674. The Person of Honour here mentioned, was Edward Earl of Clarendon, who wrote Animadversions on a Book intit. Fanaticism fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church by Dr Stillingfleet, and the imputation refused and retorted, by Ser. Cressy. Lond. 1674. 8vo. X. 'Several Conferences between a Romish Priest, a Fanatick Chaplain, and a Divine of the Church of England, concerning several Points both of Doctrine and Practice, chiefly relating to the Sin of Idolatry; and more especially these four, The Idolatry of the Church of Rome, and the Consequences of the Charge of Idolatry; the Nature of Idolatry, and a Parallel between the Heathen and Romish Idolatry; being a full Answer to the late Dialogues of T. G. (18).' Lond. 1679. 8vo. XI. 'A Letter to Mr G. giving a true Account of a late Conference at the D. of P's.' [i. e. Dean of St Paul's.] XII. 'A Second Letter to Mr G. in Answer to two Letters lately published concerning the Conference at the D. of P's.' He also published at the end of Dr Tillotson's Rule of Faith, XIII. 'A Reply to Mr J. S. [Serjeant] his Third Appendix, containing some Animadversions on our learned Author's Rational Account &c.' . . . XV. And, in another Postscript, he examined a Treatise called Diaphanta, said to have been written by the Author of Fiat Lux. . . . Likewise he republished, with a learned Preface, XVI. 'The Jesuits Loyalty manifested in three several Treatises, lately written by them (19) against the Oath of Allegiance.' From which it appears, that the Government can have no real security from them, so long as they refuse to renounce the Pope's power of deposing Princes, and absolving subjects from their Allegiance. To which are subjoined three other Tracts, viz. 1. The Execution of Justice in England, not for Religion, but for Treason. Dated Dec 17, 1583, and penned by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh. 2. Important Considerations; tending to prove, that Queen Elizabeth's proceedings against the Catholics, since the beginning of her reign, were both mild and merciful. 3. The Jesuits Reasons unreasonable: or Doubts proposed to the Jesuits upon their Paper presented to divers Persons of Honour for Non-exception from the common Favour voted to Catholics. This last had been printed at London in 1662. 4to.—One of the chief Pieces written by the Catholics against Dr Stillingfleet, was printed at Paris, with this title, 'A just Discharge to Dr Stillingfleet's unjust Charge of Idolatry against the Church of Rome. With a Discovery of the Vanity of his late Defence, in his pretended Answer to a Book intituled Catholics no Idolaters. By way of Dialogue between Eunomius, a Conformist, and Catharinus, a Nonconformist. In three parts.' 1677. 8vo.

[M] And he, moreover, exerted himself against them in King James the Second's reign. He published then, XVII. 'An Answer to some Papers lately printed, concerning the Authority of the Catholick Church in matters of Faith, and the Reformation of the Church of England.' Lond. 1686. 4to. The Papers answered in this Tract, were said to be written by King Charles II, and found in his strong box. J. Dryden the poet, newly converted to Popery, writ a Defence

(n) Newcourt, as above, p. 189.

(o) Idem, p. 64, 53.

(13) Life, p. 24, 25.

(14) Life, p. 22.

(15) Life, p. 26, 27, 28.

(16) See his Life, p. 78, &c.

(17) See below, note [W].

(18) i. e. Goden.

(19) In K. James the First's time.

(p) Bishop Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. I. p. 265.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Life, p. 48, 49.

no books of controversy were so much read and valued, as his were (p). In the opinion of Bishop Burnet (q), 'he wrote against Infidelity beyond any that had gone before him.' One of his pieces in that kind, was, 'A Letter to a Deist, in answer to several Objections against the Truth and Authority of the Scriptures [N].' The Dissenters having attacked a Sermon of his, preached in 1680, it occasioned his publishing The Unreasonableness of Separation [O]. And, about the same time, upon the contest that arose in the House of Lords, about the Bishops Right of voting in capital cases; he wrote his very learned treatise of The Jurisdiction of the Bishops in capital cases (r) [P]. In 1685, he published, of them. Whereupon, our learned Author wrote XVIII. 'A Vindication of the Answer to some late Papers concerning the Unity and Authority of the Catholick Church, and the Reformation of the Church of England.' Lond. 1686. 4to. XIX. 'The Doctrines and Practices of the Church of Rome truly represented, in answer to a Book intituled A Popish misrepresentation and misrepresented.' Lond. 1686. 4to. XX. 'The Doctrine of the Trinity and Transubstantiation compared as to Scripture, Reason, and Tradition, in a new Dialogue between a Protestant and a Papist. Part I. wherein an Answer is given to the late Proofs of the Antiquity of Transubstantiation in the books called, Consensus Veterum, and Nubes Testium.' XXI. 'The Doctrine of the Trinity and Transubstantiation compared as to Scripture, Reason, and Tradition. Part II. wherein the doctrine of the Trinity is shewed to be agreeable to Scripture and Reason, and Transubstantiation repugnant to both.' XXII. 'Scripture and Tradition compared, in a Sermon preached at Guildhall-Chapel, the 27th of November, 1687.' XXIII. 'A Discourse concerning the Nature and Grounds of the Certainty of Faith; in answer to John Serjeant's Catholick Letters.' Lond. 1688. 4to. XXIV. 'The Council of Trent examined and disproved by Catholick Tradition in the main points in controversy between us and the Church of Rome; with a particular Account of the Times and Occasions of introducing them. Part I. To which is prefixed a Preface, containing the true sense of the Council of Trent and the notion of Transubstantiation.' Lond. 1688. 4to. XXV. 'An Appendix, in answer to some passages of J. W. of the Society of Jesus concerning the Prohibition of Scripture in vulgar Languages in the Council of Trent.' Lond. 1688. 8vo. XXVI. 'No Catholick Tradition for Seven Sacraments.' XXVII. 'Against the Doctrine of Indulgences.'—On account of our learned Author's zeal against Popery, and his unanswerable confutation of it; we are told, that he received several threats, and more than once had notice of barbarous designs formed against himself; notwithstanding which, he undauntedly went on doing what he thought his duty (20).

Origines

[N] A Letter to a Deist, in answer to several Objections against the Truth and Authority of the Scriptures. He styles it otherwise, 'A Letter of Resolution to a Person unsatisfied about the Truth and Authority of the Scriptures.' And he says in the Preface, that it was written for the satisfaction of a particular Person, who owned the Being and Providence of God, but expressed a mean Esteem of the Scriptures, and the Christian Religion.' 'Tis dated at the end, June 11, 1675, but was not published till 1677. Lond. 8vo. without the Author's name.

[O] The Dissenters having attack'd a Sermon of his, preached in 1680, it occasioned his publishing The Unreasonableness of Separation. That Sermon was preached at Guildhall-Chapel, before the Lord Mayor &c. the first Sunday of Easter-term, on Phil. iii. 16. And the occasion of it, as he tells us himself (21), was this. The Dissenters growing loud in their groundless clamours against the Church of England, as Popishly affected; and one of the principal leaders of them (Mr Baxter) having published two pernicious books, the one called A Plea for Peace, but which far better deserved the title of a Plea for Disorder and Separation; the other, The true and only way of Concord of all Christian Churches, but fraught with such impracticable notions, and dividing principles, as though his whole design had been to prove, that there is no true way of concord among Christians: . . . 'Since by the means of such books, (adds he) the Zeal of so many people was turned off from the Papists against our Church, I saw a plain necessity, that either we must be run down by the impetuous Violence of an enraged, but unprovoked Company of Men; or we must venture ourselves to try whether we could stem that Tide, 'which we saw coming upon us.' . . . He thought it therefore neither improper nor unseasonable to persuade Protestants to Peace and Union at any time, especially at such a time as that when things were in such a dangerous fermentation (22): And the whole drift of his Sermon was, to dissuade the Dissenters from the established Church to quit their needless and destructive Separation; shewing, that according to the judgment of divers even amongst themselves, a Conformity to our Church's worship was not unlawful, and by consequence their Separation must be sinful and dangerous, and what they ought therefore all to desist from, as they would consult the honour of God and Religion, the Peace and Tranquillity of the Church, and would prevent the great Designs of our other Enemies, and leave the Protestant Religion established here to posterity. But several of the Dissenters, especially those three of principal note among their leaders, Dr Owen, Mr Baxter, and Mr Alsop, instead of a thankful acknowledgment for his intended kindness, set themselves to write against him (23), and some of them in a very indecent manner. Which unsuitable return of theirs had only this effect, that it produced his excellent Vindication of our Church, intituled, XXVIII. 'The unreasonableness of Separation: or an impartial Account of the History, Nature, and Pleas of the present Separation from the Communion of the Church of England. To which several late Letters are annexed of eminent Protestant Divines abroad, concerning the Nature of our Differences, and the way to compose them.' Lond. 1681 and 1683. 4to.

[P] And, about the same time, upon the contest that arose in the House of Lords, about the Bishops Right of voting in capital cases, he wrote his treatise of The Jurisdiction of the Bishops &c. That contest was occasioned by the prosecution of Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby, as is abundantly manifest from our Historians, to whom the reader is referred (24). Many books were then written on both sides, concerning the point, whether the Bishops ought to be permitted to attend at that trial; and whether they can vote in the preliminaries in trials of treason. Denzil Lord Holles, in particular, wrote 'A Letter, . . . shewing that the Bishops are not to be Judges in Parliament in Cases capital.' Printed in 1679. 4to. In opposition to whom Dr Stillingfleet published, XXIX. 'The grand Question concerning the Bishops Right to vote in Parliament in Cases capital, stated and argued from the Parliament-Rolls and the History of former Times; with an Enquiry into their Peerage, and the Three Estates in Parliament.' 8vo. (25). . . Bishop Burnet rightly observes, that 'Dr Stillingfleet gave upon this occasion a great proof of his being able to make himself the master of any argument which he undertook: For after the lawyers, and others conversant in parliament-records, in particular the Lord Hollis, who undertook the argument with great vehemence, had writ many Books about it, he published a treatise that discovered more skill and exactness in judging those matters than all that had gone before him. And indeed he put an end to the controversy in the opinion of all impartial men. He proved the right that the Bishops had to vote in those preliminaries beyond contradiction in my opinion, both from our records, and from our constitution (26).'. . . The writer of our Author's Life also observes, that this 'Anonymous Answer much surprized the world upon a double account. For first, it was not expected that a Divine, and one who, besides the business of a great parish, had been long engaged in Controversies of Divinity, and had his time thereby taken up in writing many excellent Books in his own profession, should have been so perfectly well versed in the ancient Constitution and Usages of Parliament, as well as the common and statute Laws of the land, as he here shewed himself to be. As neither in the second place, was it to be thought, he could have so dextrously changed his style, which

(22) On account of the discovery of the Popish Plot.

(23) J. Troughton wrote also against him. See Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 687. and 952.

(24) See History of England by Echard, Kennet, Oldmixon &c. particularly Burnet's History of his own Time, ed. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 90. &c.

(25) It is inserted in the Second Part of his Ecclesiastical Cases, ed. 1704. 8vo. p. 225, &c.

(26) Burnet's History of his own Time, ed. 1753. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 93.

(20) See his Life, p. 143.

(21) Preface to the Unreasonableness of Separation &c. p. 36. &c.

Origines Britannicæ, or, The Antiquities of the British Churches [2]; a book full of his usual great Learning, and very extensive reading. Having been summoned to appear before King James's Ecclesiastical Commission, he drew up a Discourse concerning the Illegality of that Commission [R]; which however he did not publish till 1689 (s). Besides his other preferments, he was Canon of the twelfth stall in the church of Canterbury (t); and Prolocutor of the lower House of Convocation, for a long time together, in the reigns of King Charles and King James the Second (u). At the Revolution, due regard was paid to his merit: For he was advanced to the Bishopric of Worcester, vacant by the death of Dr William Thomas; to which he was consecrated October 13, 1689 (w). In this eminent station he behaved in the most worthy and exemplary manner; and endeavoured to reform and instruct his whole Diocese by his learned Charges [S], and to correct all Abuses in his Courts, wherein he often presided (x). As a member of the Upper House of Parliament, he appeared to great advantage in several Debates there [T]. Soon after his promotion to his Bishopric, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy; and he examined every word in the new Collects, then composed with the exactest judgment (y). In 1694, there was an intention of advancing him to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, vacant by the death of Archbishop Tillotson [V]. His old adversaries the Socinians spreading about their pernicious pamphlets [W], he thought it his duty

(s) It is printed in the Second Part of his Ecclesiastical Cases, p. 61, &c.

(t) N. Battely's Edition of Somner's Antiquities of Canterbury, or Cantuarua Sacra, Part II. p. 128. edit. 1703. fol.

(u) Life, p. 76. and Kennet's Compl. Hist. of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719. p. 348.

(w) Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. by Br. Willis Esq; Vol. I. p. 654.

(x) Life, p. 108, 111; &c. 129.

(y) See Kennet's Compl. History, as above, p. 590. and Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. II.

' is naturally much larger and more copious, into one ' so concise, and yet withal so substantial and argumentative as this was written in (27).'

[2] Origines Britannicæ &c.] The whole title is, XXX. 'Origines Britannicæ, or, The Antiquities of the British Churches. With a Preface concerning some pretended Antiquities relating to Britain, in vindication of the Bishop of St Asaph.' Lond. 1685. fol. The design of that book is to give as clear and distinct a view of the state and condition of the British churches, from their first plantation to the conversion of the Saxons, as could be had at so great a distance, and by such a degree of light as is left us concerning them (28). He hath divided the whole into Five Chapters. And in the first he treats of the first planting a Christian Church in Britain by St Paul. Wherein he observes, that there was no Christian Church planted in Britain during the reign of Tiberius; and that Gildas's words, which have been brought to prove it, are misunderstood. Next he examines and confutes the Tradition, concerning Joseph of Arimathea and his brethren coming to Glastonbury, to plant Christianity. And, after having proved, that there was a Christian Church planted here in the Apostles time; he shews the great probability of St Paul's having been its founder. At the same time, he intermixes a great many curious observations, about the Antiquity of Seals in England; the Saxon Charters, which he affirms to be all suspicious till the end of the seventh century, &c. In Chap. II. he treats of the succession of the British Churches to the first Council of Nice. And, among other things, proves that the national conversion of the Scots under King Donald is fabulous, and that Prosper speaks not of the Scots in Britain, but in Ireland. That Lucius was King of the Regni, part of Surrey and Suffex. Of Dioeclesian's persecution in Britain; the stopping of it by means of Constantius; and the flourishing of the British Churches under Constantine. The reason of three Bishops of Britain only being present at the Council of Arles; and of the great Antiquity of episcopal government here. Chap. III. is of the succession of the British Churches, from the Council of Nice to the Council of Ariminum. Wherein he clears, the testimonies of Constantine's being born in Britain; and also the just Rights of the British Churches: There being no evidence that they were under the Roman Patriarchate. In Chap. IV. he enquires into the Faith of the British Churches; and clears them from the charge of Arianism and Pelagianism: Giving at the same time some account of Pelagius, Faustus, Germanus and Lupus, Banchor-monastery, the Liturgy of the British Churches &c. Chap. V. treats of the Declension of the British Churches; of the Picts and Scots; of the fabulous Antiquities of these; of the Roman Walls, King Arthur &c. . . . To the whole is prefixed a long and learned Preface, wherein he rebukes the confidence of Sir George Mackenzie; for charging Bishop Lloyd, with 'a degree of Lese Majesty, in injuring and shortening the Royal Line of the Scottish Kings:' because his Lordship had rejected the long fabulous bead-roll, or succession of the Kings of Scotland, from Fergus I. till the fourth century (29).

[R] He drew up a Discourse concerning the Illegality of that Commission.] The whole title of it was, XXXI. 'A Discourse concerning the Illegality of the Ecclesiastical Commission, in Answer to the Vindication and Defence of it: wherein the true notion of the ' Supremacy is cleared; and an Account is given of ' the Nature, Original and Mischief of the Dispensing ' Power.' In an advertisement prefixed to it, he says, that ' this Discourse concerning the Illegality of the ' late Ecclesiastical Commission, was written when the ' Author of it was summoned to appear before it; and ' was in continual expectation of undergoing its censure, for not complying with the orders of it.'

[S] By his learned Charges.] They are printed in the First Part of his Ecclesiastical Cases, and divided into XXXII.—Five Discourses; wherein he treats of the duties and Rights of the Parochial Clergy; of the nature of the Trust committed to them; of their particular duties; of their maintenance by Law; and of the Obligation to observe the Ecclesiastical Canons and Constitutions. To them is annexed, in the same volume, XXXIII. 'A Discourse concerning Bonds of Resignation of Benefices, in point of Law and Conscience.' The Preface to which is dated Westminster, July 10, 1695. This last Discourse was for the most part the substance of his Charges at his Triennial Visitation in the year 1693 (30).

[T] He appeared to great advantage in several Debates there.] But there are in print, only two of his speeches made in the House of Lords: namely, XXXIV. 'The Case of Visitation of Colleges:' occasioned by the proceeding of Dr Jonathan Trelawney, Bishop of Exeter, as Visitor of Exeter college; in the affair of Dr Arthur Bury Rector of that college, which by Appeal, or writ of Error was brought from the King's Bench before the House of Peers. The other is, XXXV. 'The Case of Com-mendams, A. D. 1694-5.' relating to a Grant ad retinendum, made to Dr Thomas Tenison, Bishop of Lincoln, for holding the Vicarage of St Martin's in the fields together with his Bishopric, only for a certain term. Upon the expiration of which, it was debated, whether the right of presentation was in the Crown, or in the proper patron the Bishop of London. These two are printed in the Second Part of his Ecclesiastical Cases (31): And in the same Volume are inserted also XXXVI. 'A Discourse of the Nature of our Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and the Law on which it stands.' And XXXVII. 'A Discourse of the true Antiquity of London, and its State in the Roman Times.'

[V] In 1694 there was an intention of advancing him to the Archbishopric of Canterbury.] 'Many, says Bishop Burnet (32), wished that Stillingfleet might have succeeded, he being not only so eminently learned, but judged a man in all respects fit for the post. The Queen was inclined to him; she spoke with some earnestness, oftener than once, to the Duke of Shrewsbury on that subject: She thought he would fill that post with great dignity: She also pressed the King earnestly for him: But as his ill health made him not capable of the fatigue that belonged to the Province; so the Whigs did generally apprehend, that both his notions and his temper were too high.'

[W] The Socinians spreading about their pernicious Pamphlets.] They were commonly printed in Quarto, upon indifferent paper, and with a small and close letter; and were published from the year 1691 to 1696, or later. The first of them are some tracts of John Bidle. Usually they are bound in three small quarto volumes. . . . What made the Socinians renew their attacks against

(27) Life, p. 48, 49.

(28) See the beginning of the Preface.

(30) See his Life, p. 95.

(31) P. 411. 437.

(32) History of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. III. p. 187. 188.

(29) See Bishop Lloyd's History of Church-government in Britain; and the article LLOYD (WILLIAM) above.

duty to caution the world against the dangerous tendency of their doctrine (z): But having, in one of his Discourses against them, reflected upon some passages in Mr Locke's Essay concerning Human Understanding, it occasioned a Controversy between him and that great man, of which some Account is given below [X]. Besides his Works already mentioned, he published a great many occasional Sermons, preached before the King, the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor, &c. [Y]. And likewise other small pieces [Z]; some without his name [AA]. He was naturally of a strong constitution, and in all probability might have enjoyed his health much longer, had he not impaired it by constant hard study; which at length brought the gout upon him, the common disease of a studious sedentary course of life; and, after above twenty years struggle, fixing in his stomach, it proved fatal. He died at his house in Park-Street, Westminster, March the 27th 1699, and his body being carried to Worcester, was interred among his predecessors behind the Choir in that Cathedral: where a handsome monument is erected to his memory (aa) [BB].

Of

against our learned Prelate, was his reprinting, in 1696, his Discourse concerning the true Reason of the Sufferings of Christ; with a Sermon on 1 Tim. i. 15. Whereupon they published, Considerations and Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. in which they assert, That the Bishop was utterly mistaken, in thinking, that they deny the Articles of the new Creed, or Athanasian Religion, because they are Mysteries, or 'because (say they) we do not comprehend them: We deny them, because we do comprehend them. We have a clear and distinct perception that they are not Mysteries, but Contradictions, Impossibilities, and pure Nonsense.' . . . They attacked afterwards his Vindication of the Trinity, in a Tract of theirs, intitled, 'The Agreement of the Unitarians with the Catholick Church.' Wherein, they say, that 'He has heartily chode with the Socinians, for the Terms: and has entirely yielded the things, in question to the Unitarians (33).'

[X] But having, in one of his Discourses against them, reflected upon some passages in Mr Locke's Essay concerning Human Understanding, it occasioned a Controversy between him and that great man &c.] The Discourse wherein Bishop Stillingfleet attacked Mr Locke, was that in Vindication of the Trinity. And the faults he found in his Essay, were, his definition of Substance, and his notion of Ideas; thinking that they were prejudicial to the doctrine of the Trinity. Whereupon Mr Locke, who was impatient of opposition, and uneasy at having his favourite Essay censured, published, in a sort of heat, A Letter to the right Reverend Edward Lord Bishop of Worcester, concerning some Passages relating to Mr Locke's Essay of Human Understanding: in a late Discourse of his Lordship's, in Vindication of the Trinity. Soon after, our Prelate published, XXXVIII. 'The Bishop of Worcester's Answer to Mr Locke's Letter, concerning some Passages relating to his Essay of Human Understanding, mentioned in a late Discourse in Vindication of the Trinity. . . . With a Postscript in answer to some Reflections made on that Treatise in a late Socinian Pamphlet.' The Letter is dated, at the end, Worcester, March 27, 1697, and the Postscript, April 27, 1697.—Next Mr Locke came out with a Reply to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Worcester's Answer to his Letter, concerning some Passages relating to Mr Locke's Essay of Human Understanding: in a late Discourse of his Lordship's, in Vindication of the Trinity. Dated at the end, June 29, 1697. His Lordship rejoined, in XXXIX. 'The Bishop of Worcester's Answer to Mr Locke's Second Letter; wherein his Notion of Ideas is proved to be inconsistent with itself, and with the Articles of the Christian Faith.' This is dated at the end, Sept. 22, 1697. Mr Locke had the last word, in his long Reply to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Worcester's Answer to his Second Letter: Wherein, besides other incident matters, what his Lordship has said concerning Certainty by Reason, Certainty by Ideas, and Certainty of Faith; the Resurrection of the same Body; the Immateriality of the soul; the Inconsistency of Mr Locke's Notions with the Articles of the Christian Faith, and their Tendency to Scepticism; is examined.

[Y] He published a great many occasional Sermons &c.] XL. One of the first he published, was a most excellent and eloquent Sermon, preached before the House of Commons, at St Margaret's Westminster, Oct. 10, 1666, being the Fast-day appointed for the late dreadful Fire in the city of London; upon Amos iv. 11. . . . In 1673, what he had published to that time, were collected into one Volume folio. After that, he printed about Twenty more, which were also collected into volumes; so that they made four volumes 8vo in 1696. An edition of Fifty of his Sermons came out in 1707, fol.

VOL. VI. No. CCCXXI.

[Z] And likewise other small pieces.] Among these we must reckon, XLI. A Preface to a Sermon of Dr Ford, Rector of Old Swinford, intitled, 'The Restoring of Fallen Brethren &c.' preached on Mid-lent-Sunday, 1695, at the publick Censure of some Offenders (34).

[AA] Some without his name.] Namely, XLII. 'A Discourse concerning the Unreasonableness of a new Separation on account of the Oaths.' With an Answer to the History of Passive Obedience so far as relates to them. Lond. 1689. 4to. XLIII. 'An Answer to a Paper delivered by Mr Ashton, at his Execution to Sir F. Child, Sheriff of London.' Lond. 1690. 4to. XLIV. 'A Letter to Dr. B. [everidge] on refusing the Bishoprick of B. and W.' [Bath and Wells] Lond. 1691. 4to. (35).

In 1735, his son Dr James Stillingfleet published XLV. 'Miscellaneous Discourses on several occasions.' Written by his father the Bishop.—Whose Works, before that had been collected into Six Volumes fol. Lond. 1710, with his Life prefixed. The contents of the Miscellaneous Discourses, are, 1. Letter of Dr [Barlow] Bishop of [Lincoln] concerning a vow of resignation of his Bishoprick in 1676. 2. Bishop Stillingfleet's Answer to him, on that subject. 3. Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in answer to the Bishop of S. . . . about Bonds of Resignation. 4. About the power of dissolving a contract de presenti, made without consent of Parents, Dec. 7, 1677. 5. Speeches—at Serjeants-inn, in the great cause of Emerton and Hyde, July 12, 1682.—6. At the same place, about the Bishop of Waterford's will, February 26, 1692-3.—7. In the House of Lords, in the great cause of the Earls of Montague and Bath, February 17, 1693-4.—8. At the opening a Commission of charitable uses, at the Town-hall in Worcester, August 14, 1694.—9. At the opening a second commission there, Sept. 26, 1695.—10. Answer to Sir F. W's Objections at the Town-hall there, October 17, 1695.—11. Reasons for the Decree, June 25, 1696. 12. Letter to Dr Barlow Bishop of Lincoln, about the ancient Codex Canonum Ecclesie Romanæ, November 14, 1674. 13. Letter to the Bishop of London, concerning the Right of Jurisdiction during the Suspension of the Archbishop of Canterbury, August 19, 1680. 14. Of the Antiquity and Legality of Archdeacons Visitations. 15. Discourse at the Visitation of the Cathedral at Worcester, Nov. 26, 1695. 16. Letter to the Archbishop about the Power of the Universities to judge of Heresy, Dec. 28, 1695. 17. Letter to John Evelyn Esq; about the Invocation of Saints, 1668. 18. Letter to a Lady concerning Vows of Virginity, May 8, 1670 (36). 19. Answer to a Letter about Merit, Veneration of Images &c. Invocation of Saints, Adoration of Christ in the Eucharist, 1687. 20. To his brother G. in answer to a Nonconformist's Paper proving Kneeling at the Sacrament to be Idolatry. 21. Dr Burthogge's Letter to him. 22. His Answer to Dr Burthogge about Original Sin, and the Covenant with Adam, and the meaning of Genesis iii. 23. Dr Whitby's Letter to him. 24. His Letter to Dr. Whitby at Sarum, of the Doctrine of the Millennium as held by the Fathers. 25. Case of reading King James's Declaration in 1688. 26. Letter to the Archbishop about the King's Injunctions, 1694. 27. Notes on the small Tithe bill, 1694. 28. A Sermon designed for the Thanksgiving-day A. D. 1694, but not preached by reason of his falling ill. 29. Epistola de Prophetia Danielis, ad J. Marsham Eq. 1681.

[BB] Where a handsome monument is erected to his memory.] The inscription upon it was composed by his chaplain, the learned Dr R. Bentley, and is as follows:

(m) See above, note [K].

(aa) Life, p. 147, 148.

(33) P. 49.

(34) See his Life, p. 104.

(35) Life, p. 92.

(36) This is also printed in the Universal Magazine for November 1748.

Of his great and extensive Learning he hath left such evident and lasting Proofs, that it need not be further mentioned. And as to his other qualifications, he was tall, graceful, and well-proportioned; his countenance comely, fresh, and awful; in his conversation chearful and discreet, obliging and very instructive, always procuring esteem and respect from those who conversed with him. His Apprehension was quick and sagacious; his Judgment exact and profound; his Memory very tenacious; no man sooner discerning the strength of a cause, or determining truer as to the merits of it: Nor was his insight into persons less quick and just, he soon perceiving their capacities and abilities, as well as their designs and interests (bb) [CC]. He had a noble Library, collected at a vast expence of time, pains and money: After his decease, it was purchased by Dr Narcissus Marsh, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland, to make a public Library in Dublin; and he built a handsome Edifice for that purpose. But a considerable number of MSS. relating chiefly to our own Nation and Constitution, in the Bishop's possession, were bought by the late Earl of Oxford, and are now part of the most valuable Harleian Collection (cc). Whilst our Prelate was Rector of Sutton he married Andrea, eldest daughter of William Dobyns of Wormington in Gloucestershire Esq; by whom he had two daughters, which both dyed in their infancy, and a son named Edward [DD]. After her decease, (for she lived but a little while) he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Pedley of Huntington, Serjeant at law, by whom he had seven children, of which two only survived him, namely James Rector of Hartlebury and Canon of Worcester, and Anne married afterwards to Humphrey Tyshé of Gray's Inn Esq; (dd).

(bb) Life, p. 133.

(cc) Ibid. p. 135, 136.

(dd) Ibid. p. 23, 24.

H. S. E.
 Edvardus Stillingfleet S. T. P.
 Ex Decano Ecclesiæ Paulinæ Episcopus Vigornienfis,
 Jam tibi quicumque hæc legis
 Nisi et Europæ et literati Orbis hospes es
 Ipse per se notus
 Dum rebus mortalibus interfuit
 Et sanctitate morum et oris staturæque dignitate
 Et consummatæ eruditionis laude
 Undique venerandus
 Cui in humanioribus literis Critici in divinis Theologi
 In recondita Historia Antiquarii in Scientiis Philosophi
 In Legum peritia Jurisconsulti in civili prudentia Politici
 In Eloquentia universi
 Fasces ultro submiserunt
 Major unus in his omnibus quam alii in singulis
 Ut Bibliothecam suam cui parem Orbis vix habuit
 Intra pectus omnis doctrinæ capax
 Gestasse integram visus sit
 Quæ tamen nullos Libros noverat meliores
 Quam quos ipse multos et immortales edidit
 Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Defensor semper invictus
 Natus est Cranborniæ in agro Dorcestrensi
 XVII Aprilis MDCXXXV patre Samuele Generoso
 In matrimonio habuit Andream Gulielmi Dobbyns Gen. Filium
 Atque ea defuncta
 Elizabetham Nicolai Pedley equitis
 Eodem hic secum sepulchro conditam
 Foeminas quod unum dixisse satis est
 Tanto marito dignissimas
 Obiit Westmonasterii XXVIII Martii MDCXCIX
 Vixit annos LXIII. menses undecim
 Tres liberos reliquit sibi superstites
 Ex priori conjugio Edvardvm ex secundo Jacobum et Annam Quorum Jacobus Collegii hujus Cathedralis Canonicus
 Patri optimo bene merenti
 Monumentum hoc poni curavit.

[CC] As well as their designs and interests] To which may be added these further particulars of his character from Bishop Burnet (37) . . . 'Stillingfleet was a man of much more learning [than Tillotson] but of a more reserved, and a haughtier temper. . . . He was a great man in many respects. He knew the world well, and was esteemed a very wise man. . . . He applied himself much to the study of the law and records, and the original of our constitution, and was a very extraordinary man.' . . . And Archbishop Tillotson, in a Letter to Frederick Spanheim, calls him the Glory of our Church . . . De quo Ecclesia nostra merito gloriatur . . . (38).

[DD] Edward] He was born at Sutton in 1660, and educated at St Paul's school in London. From thence he was sent to St John's college in Cambridge, of which he became Fellow. Nov. 30, 1688, he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, and on the 21st of June, 1692, he was created Doctor of Physic at Cambridge, and practised for some time at King's Lynne. But marrying in 1692, he lost both Fellowship and Professorship; and, what was worse, his Father's favour. However, going into orders, he obtained from him the Rectory of Newington-Butts, which he exchanged for the Rectories of Wood-Norton and Swanton in Norfolk, in 1698. He dyed in 1708, leaving a son named Benjamin, who was afterwards of Trinity college in Cambridge; and three daughters, of whom the eldest is married to John Locker, Esq; Barrister at law. In his person he was crooked, but had a lively and ingenious countenance, and an easy temper, free from ambition: though he wanted not abilities either of parts, or of learning, to have made a more conspicuous figure. But the misfortune of losing his father's favour, hindered his advancement (39).

(37) History of his own Time, Vol. 1. 8vo. P. 264, 265.

(38) Life of Abp Tillotson, by Dr Birch, p. 256.

(39) Lives of the Professors of Gresham-College by J. Ward, LL. D. edit. 1740. fol. p. 282, 283.

STOW [JOHN], this industrious man, who hath preserved so many things from oblivion, must not be forgotten in a work of such a nature as this. He was the son of Thomas Stow, of St Michael's Cornhill in London [A], merchant-taylor, and born there about the year 1525 (a). We have no account of the place of his education, nor of the manner in which he spent the younger part of his life; only find that he was brought up to his father's business of a taylor (b). In 1544, he came into great danger, from an unjust accusation given against him by a priest: but the falsehood of it was happily discovered, and the accuser deservedly punished. He probably lived at first in Cornhill: but in 1549, we find him dwelling within Aldgate, where now stands a pump, between Leadenhall-Street and Fanchurch-Street (c) [B]. He afterwards removed into the parish of St Andrew's Undershaft, in (a) The Life of John Stow, prefixed to his Survey of London by J. Strype. Lond. 1720.

(b) Ibid. p. 2.

(c) Ibid. p. 3.

[A] He was the son of Thomas Stow of St Michael's Cornhill, &c.] This Thomas Stow was buried at St Michael's in Cornhill, in 1559. His wife Margaret dyed about October 1568, and was buried in the cloister of the said church by her husband. They had four sons, our John the eldest, another John, Thomas, and William; and three daughters, Johan, Margaret, and Alice (1).—Our Author's grandfather, named also Thomas, was a citizen and tallow-chandler of London; who dying about 1526, was buried in the little green Churchyard of St Michael aforesaid, by his father and mother, sisters and brothers, and also his own children; as mentioned in his will (2). By that will it appears, that he was a person of good substance and credit; as was also his Son, our John's Father.

[B] Between Leadenhall-Street and Fanchurch-Street.] This we learn from the following story, which he pleased to take in his own words. . . . In the reign of King Edward VI, there was a Commotion of the Commons in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and other shires. By means whereof streight orders being taken for the suppression of rumours, divers persons were apprehended

(2) See our Author's Survey of London, edit. 1720. Book 1h p. 145. where this will is inserted.

(1) Life, p. 2.

in Lime-Street Ward: and, by his knowledge in the history and antiquities of that city, was very serviceable to his own Ward, in settling the bounds of it, when they had been incroached upon by that of Bishops-Gate (d) [C]. Very early he applied himself to his most beloved study of the History of England; and so wholly devoted himself to it, neglecting his business and the care of his family, that at last he brought himself into some straits.

About the year 1560, he formed the design of composing his Annals (e) [D]; and forsaking his trade (f), employed himself intirely in collecting materials for that work. He therefore diligently perused all writers fit for his purpose, whether printed or manuscript; and became an unwearied searcher into records, registers, charters, and other original instruments: travelling on foot to several cathedral churches, and other chief places in the kingdom, to search and examine records (g). Not contented with having the perusal of such things, he was greedy of making himself possessor of them, as of a great treasure. So that, by the year 1568, he had amassed together a great quantity of old Books, and Manuscripts, of all sorts; especially Chronicles, and Histories, both on parchment and paper (h).

And, what added much to the value of his library, it was not only stored with antient Authors, but original charters, registers, and chronicles of particular places (i) [E]. Such books as were necessary for his purpose, and that he could not purchase, or otherwise obtain, he took the pains of transcribing himself; particularly Leland's Collections, whose Description of Britain, or Itinerary, he appears also to have been possessed of (k).

He lived indeed in a season, when he had the best opportunity of making such collections; namely, upon the dispersion of the Libraries of Religious Houses, when valuable Books could be plentifully picked up, and at a cheap rate. But after he had eagerly prosecuted for some time the study of our English History and Antiquities; finding, how little present advantage it was like to bring him, and urged by the necessity of procuring a maintenance and provision for his family, he began to return to his trade, and laid aside his books. He had now much lessened his paternal estate, neglected his business; and, instead of meeting with applause and rewards, found himself only exposed to the censures of critics, and other evil-disposed persons (l).

His case being made known to Dr. Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was not only a great lover and judge, but also a generous patron, of all Antiquarian studies, he persuaded our Author to continue them, and encouraged him by several benefactions [F]. In the unsettled times he lived in, when great dangers were perpetually apprehended from Papists; he, being looked upon as no great friend to the Reformation, but an admirer of Antiquity in Religion as well as in History, came into some trouble, in 1568. For, an information being given against him to the Council, as if he was a suspicious person, and had many dangerous Books of Superstition in his custody; Dr Grindal, Bishop of London, his diocesan, was ordered to cause his study to be searched. There were found in it, great collections of his own for the English hended and executed by marshal law; amongst the which the Bayliff of Rumsford in Essex was one, a man very well beloved: He was early in the morning of Mary Magdalen's day (then kept holiday) brought by the Sheriffs of London and the Knight-Marshall, to the Well within Ealdgate: there to be executed on a gibbet set up that morning, where being on the ladder, he had words to this effect; 'Good people, I am come hither to die, but know not for what offence, except for words by me spoken yesternight to Sir Stephen, Curate and Preacher of this parish [St Katharine Cree-church] which were these: He asked me, What news in the country? I answered, Heavy news. Why, quoth he? It is said, quoth I, that many men be up in Essex, but, thanks be to God, all is in good quiet about us: And this was all, as God be my judge &c.' Upon these words of the prisoner, Sir Stephen, to avoid reproach of the people, left the city, and was never heard of since amongst them to my knowledge. I heard the words of the prisoner, for he was executed upon the pavement of my door, where I then kept house (3).

[C] Was very serviceable to his own Ward, in settling the bounds of it, &c. Bishops-gate-ward had encroached upon it, by taking in three houses, and some land near London-wall, that lay west of the chapel of St Augustine Papey. But Mr Stow proved, that they were neither in the Ward of Bishops-gate, nor Aldgate, but in that of Limestreet: And that he did, by old Leases, and Grants; and especially by the Register-book of the Fraternity of St Augustine de Papey (4), from whence it appeared, That the Maior and Aldermen of London, 6 Ed. VI. had granted to that Fraternity, 'certain grounds, both East and West, of a brick wall that the Master and Wardens of the same had made, to close in the chapel of St Augustines, called Papey Chapel, situate in the parish of All-saints in the Wall, in the Ward of Limestreet; for which they were to yield to the city 4d. sterling every Michaelmas.'—And again, when once Aldgate-ward had claimed this plot of ground, Mr Stow shewed them a fair Ledger-book, some time belonging to the Priory of the Holy Trinity within Aldgate, wherein that ground was not set down as belonging to Aldgate, but to Limestreet ward (5).

[D] He formed the design of composing his Annals.] The reason he assigns, for falling upon the study and pains of examining and collecting of his English History, was the confusedness of our late English Chronicles (6), and the ignorant handling of antient Affairs; which made him leave his own peculiar gaines, and consecrate himself to the search of our famous English Antiquities (7).

[E] It was not only stored with antient Authors, but original Charters, Registers, and Chronicles &c.] He was possessed of the Registers of Bermondsey, St Edmundsbury, of the New Abbey near the Tower, of St Bartholomew Smithfield, of the Friars Minors of London; in Latin. And he had, in English, a Register of the Knights of the Garter, a Register of the Maiors of London. He had also old Records of London, Records of St Asaph, Chronicles of St Albans, Arnold's Chronicles, Annals of the Monastery of Hyde. . . . Besides the following Chronicles, and old English Historians, Gildas, Nennius, Henry of Huntindon, William of Malmesbury, Marianus Scotus, Ralph of Coggeshall, John Everden, Nicolas Trivet, Florence of Worcester, Simeon of Durham, Roger de Houeden, and others; which all then remained in manuscript (8).

[F] And encouraged him by several benefactions.] This he acknowledges, in the following passage of the dedication of his Annales, to Archbishop Whitgift. . . . 'Neither doe I doubt but they may have free passage in the world, if they be countenanced under your honourable name and protection. Unto whom I offer, and with all dutifull affection I dedicate both myselfe and them: being hereunto induced, both for that your worthy predecessor, and my especial benefactor Archbishop PARKER animated me in the course of these studies, which otherwise I had long since discontinued; and also that your great love and entire affection to all good letters in generall, and to the Antiquities in particular hath been so singular, that all which like and love good studies, doe justly esteem you their principall and gracious patrone.'

Chronicles;

Life, p. 3.

Ibid. p. 3. 9.

Ibid. p. 14.

See his Annals, edit. 1632. p. 1. It seems, could never

See Life,

Ibid. p. 14.

Ibid. p. 15.

Ibid. p. 4.

(5) Life, p. 3. and Survey of Lond. Book II. p. 88.

(6) Especially R. Grafton's.

(7) Preface to his Summary; and Annales.

(8) Life, p. 14, 19.

(3) Survey of London, ed. 1720. Vol. I. book. 2. p. 66.

(4) See his Survey of London, Book II. p. 73, 87. and Cotton. Libr. Vitellius, F. 16.

Chronicles; 'wherein he seemed to have bestowed much travel.' There were also found in it, many MS. Chronicles; a great quantity of curious Miscellaneous Tracts; old printed Popish Books; and others more modern (m). What was done to him, we do not find. But, being looked upon with a jealous eye, he was very near being entirely ruined, in 1570. For his younger brother Thomas, who had been his servant; and, after having defrauded him of his goods, sought also to deprive him of his life, preferred above a hundred and forty articles against him, before the Ecclesiastical Commission. A far less number would have served to have dispatched a man out of the world, if they could have been proved. But the witnesses against him could not prove any of them; and, withal, they were persons of a most infamous character, some having been detected of perjury, others burnt in the hand for felony, and the like: so that he was acquitted (n) [G]. His troubles did not abate his ardor for his beloved studies; wherein he was assisted and encouraged not only by the Archbishop abovementioned, but also by the greatest men of his time in that way: Particularly William Lambarde Esq; Robert Bowyer Esq; Keeper of the Records in the Tower, and the first digester of them into some order; the learned Camden, who allowed him an annuity of 8 l. a year during life, for a copy of Leland's Collections; and others, the most eminent persons in his time (o). In 1565, he first put out his 'Summary of the Chronicles of England [H], from the coming in of Brute unto his own time;' which, with additions and improvements, was reprinted several times since [I]. In 1575, he lost his best patron Archbishop Parker; notwithstanding which he prosecuted his studies; and among other things, assisted Dr David Powell in his History of Wales, published in 1584, as the learned Doctor acknowledges in his preface. About the same time he was engaged in another laborious work, his Survey of London, of which we shall give an account below. He was, in 1585, one of the two collectors for a great muster in Lime-Street Ward; which, as our Author observes (p), shews him to have been a man of good esteem in the place. But he was then beginning to be poor: For, we find him the same year presenting a petition to the Mayor and Court of Aldermen, wherein he set forth, 'That he had for the space of twenty-five years past (besides his Chronicle, dedicated to the Earl of Leicester,) set forth divers Summaries, dedicated to the Lord Maior, Aldermen and Commoners of that city: In all which he had especially noted the memorable acts of famous citizens, by them done, to the great benefit of the commonwealth, and honour of the same city. . . . That he minded shortly to set forth a far larger Summary, or Chronicle of that city and citizens thereof, than before had been published. And forasmuch as the search of Records could not but be chargeable to him; as heretofore for many years it had been altogether of his own charges; besides his other travails and study; he now humbly craved their aid, in consideration of the premises, to bestow on him the benefit of two Freemen, such as they should like, to be admitted into the Freedom of the city. Whereby he might be helped somewhat towards his charges.' Undoubtedly, this request of his was complied with. Such another petition he presented to them, in 1589, wherein he said, that he was of the age of threescore years and four; and had for the space of almost thirty years last past, besides his Chronicles, set forth divers Summaries, dedicated to them &c. He therefore petitioned them to bestow on him some yearly Pension, or otherwise; whereby he might reap somewhat towards his great charges (q). Whether he had a pension granted him, we do not find; unless it was in consideration of his being the City's Chronicler, a place which he appears to have enjoyed (r). But to proceed to the rest of his learned labours: He had a great hand in the improvements made to the second edition of the large Chronicles, published by Raphael Holinshed in 1587 [K]. Our most famous poet, Geoffrey Chaucer, was also (n) Ibid.

(m) Life, p. 4.

(o) Ibid. p. 5,
6, — 11.

(p) Strype, Life,
p. 3.

(q) Life, p. 7.

(r) Ibid. p. 12.

[G] So that he was acquitted. At this juncture, malecontents, persons disaffected to the Protestant religion, and great numbers of Popish emissaries, swarmed in this kingdom; being sent over from Rome, to cause disturbances here; and had actually raised a dangerous rebellion in the north. This is the reason, why so many innocent persons, suspected to be of the Romish religion, were brought into trouble; and among the rest Mr Stow: it behoving the government to stand upon their guard, and to take all proper measures to secure themselves.

[H] He put out his Summary of the Chronicles of England. The title of it was, 'Summarie of Englishe Chronicles, conteyning the true Accompt of Years, wherein every Kyng of this Realme of England began their Reigne, how long they reigned, and what notable Thynges hath been doone duryng their Reynes, wyth also the Names and Yeares of all the Baylyffes, Custos, Maiors, and Sheriffes of the Citie of London sens the Conqueste,' 8vo. He undertook it, at the instance of Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester; and how he came to be first known to him, he informs us in the following words. . . . 'Edmond Dudley, in the time of his imprisonment in the Tower, compiled one notable booke, which he intituled The Tree of the Commonwealth, dedicated unto King Henry VIII. but never came to his hand. A copie whereof faire written (reserving the original to my selfe) I gave unto the honourable Lord Robert Earle of Leicester, about the year 1562. At whose request and earnest perswasion I then first collected my Summary of the Chronicles of England, and dedicated the same, with the continuation and encrease thereof, from time to time, to my great charges to his honor, in reward whereof I alwaies received his hartly thanks, with commendations (g).' His inducement for dedicating it to that Earl, was, as he tells him in the Dedication, 'because of his usual generous acceptance of many Works presented unto him by others as well as himself; and because of his Lordship's goodly Inclination to all sorts of Knowledge, and especially the great Love he bore to old Records of Deeds done by famous and noble Worthies.'

[I] Which, with additions and improvements, was reprinted several times since. Namely, in the years 1570, 1575, 1590. Continued by Edmond Howes, and reprinted in 1607, 1610, 1611, and continued with matters foreigne and domestical unto 1618.—There was also his Summarie of Chronicles abridged, printed in 1566. Continued to, and reprinted in 1567, 1573, 1579, 1584, 1587, 1598, 1604. These several editions were in the late Earl of Oxford's noble collection.

[K] He had a great hand in the improvements made to the second edition of Holinshed's Chronicles. This is fully manifest from the margin of those Chronicles, where the name of John Stow so frequently appears. But from page 1268 to the end, was chiefly continued by him and Abraham Fleming &c.—He acquaints us particularly (10), that he had caused several curious Pieces to be inserted therein. Namely, 'A Declaration

(g) The Annals of England, ed. 4to. 1605. p. 818.

(10) See his Annals of England, ed. 1605. 4to. p. 1177, 1180, 1184, 1186.

of

also 'corrected, and twice increased, through Mr Stow's painful labours, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth: first in the year 1561; and again beautified with notes by him, collected out of divers records and monuments, which he delivered to his friend Thomas Speight (s), the editor of that ancient bard, in 1597 (t). His curious and valuable Survey of London, after having cost him many years of close application, was first published in 1598, and reprinted in his life-time in 1603 [L]. He had much set his heart on the publication of his large Chronicle or History of England, which he had been above forty years collecting out of some hundreds of ancient Authors, Registers, Chronicles, Lives, and Accounts of particular Cities and Towns. But he lived only to publish an Abstract of it (u), under the title of Flores Historiarum, or Annales of England [M], besides his Summaries above-mentioned. From his papers, Edmond Howes published afterwards that folio Volume, which goes under the name of Stow's Chronicle [N]. But, even this doth not

'of the favourable dealing of her Majesty's commissioners appointed for the examination of certaine traitors, and of tortures unjustlie reported to be done upon them for matters of religion (11). A true and perfect declaration of the treasons practised and attempted by Francis Throckemorton (12). A true and plaine declaration of the horrible treasons practised by William Parie (13). A true and summarie report of the declaration of some of the Earle of Northumberland's treasons (14). The Dutch Embassador's speech to Queen Elizabeth (15). A declaration of the causes mooving the Queene of England to give aid to the defense of the people afflicted and oppressed in the Low Countries (16).'

[L] His Survey of London . . . was first published in 1598, and reprinted in 1603] He intituled it, 'A Survey of London, contayning the originall, antiquity, increase, moderne estate, and description of that citie, written in the yeare 1598 by John Stow citizen of London. Also an Apologie (or Defence) against the opinion of some men concerning that citie, the greatnesse thereof. With an Appendix containing in Latine Libellum de situ & nobilitate Londini, written by William Fitz-Stephen in the raigne of Henry II.' 4to. He says, in the Dedication, that He' had attempted the Discovery of London, his native Soil and Country, at the desire and persuasion of some of his good Friends; as well because he had seen sundry Antiquities himself touching that place, as also for that, through search of Records to other purposes, divers written helps were come to his hands, which few others had fortun'd to meet withal (17). —The second edition, also in quarto, came out in 1603. In the dedication to which, he confesses, that, in the former edition, he 'lacked his desire to the Accomplishment of some special parts, which some others of better ability promised to perform:' [viz. James Dalton Esq;] but he dying before he could accomplish his promise, our Author 'out of his own old Storehouse added to this work many rare notes of Antiquity;' chiefly about the Politick government of the city. He intended to have made greater improvements, but complains of his being then visited with much sickness; so that his feet, which had been wont to bear him many a mile, refused once in four or five months to convey him from his bed to his study.

—After his decease, one A. M. i. e. Antony Monday, some time the Pope's scholar at Rome, but who had turned Protestant; undertook to make additions to the Survey, from Mr Stow's papers and best Collections, which he pretended He had delivered to him in his life-time; and used importunate persuasions with him to correct what he found amiss, and to proceed in perfecting so worthy a work. Having been twelve years about it, he put out a new edition in 1618, 4to. But his additions were chiefly of some epitaphs, a continuation of the lists, and little more, except transcripts out of our Author's Summary and Annals. —In 1633, a fourth edition came out, in folio, 'completely finished by the study and labour of A. M. H. D. (18) and others. Whereunto, besides many additions, were annexed divers alphabeticall tables.' —This was much outdone by the Edition published by the most industrious Mr Strype, in 1720, in two very large volumes folio; and reprinted in 1756, with very great improvements. —On this Survey were founded the subsequent Accounts of London, by Edward Hatton, R. Seymour, and W. Maitland.

[M] He lived only to publish an Abstract of it, under the title of Flores Historiarum, or Annales of England.] It was first published in 1600, in a thick quarto in black letter (*), being nothing else but his Summary greatly enlarged: and dedicated to Archbishop Whitgift.

VOL. VI. No. 321.

The dedication is dated the 24th of November, 1600; and remains in the subsequent edition of 1605, though the Archbishop was then dead.—His earnest Desire of seeing his large Chronicle in print, before his death, he could not forbear expressing, at the conclusion of the last mentioned edition, in these words (19) . . . 'I desire thee to take these and other my labours past in good part, like as I have painfully (to my great costs and charges) out of old hidden histories, and records of Antiquitie, brought the same to light, and for thy great commoditie bestowed them upon thee: so shalt thou encourage me (if God permit me life) to publish or leave to posteritie, a farre larger Volume, long since by me laboured, at the request and commandment of the reverend Father Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury; but he then deceasing, my worke was prevented, by printing and reprinting (without warrant, or well-liking) of Raigne Wolfes collection, and other late commers, by the name of Raphael Hollingshead his Chronicles.' By which it appears, that he was forestalled by Holinshed's Chronicles, and did not a little resent it.—Mr Strype informs us (20), that if Mr Stow "had lived but one year longer, he intended to have published his long labours: But after his death, there was not a man to be found, to take the small pains to review his papers, and fit them for the press: Many indeed were talked of to do it, both persons of Quality among the laity and clergy, (for the world had great and earnest expectation to see Stow in print) but when they were spoke to, to take the good work in hand, some of them said, That they thought the giving out of their Names was rather done by secret enemies, on purpose to draw them into capital displeasure, and to bring their names and lives into a general question. Others said, That they who did such a work, must flatter, which they could not, neither wilfully would they leave a scandal unto their posterity. Another said, he could not see, how in any civil action a man should spend his travel, time, and money worse, than in that which acquires no regard or reward, except backbiting and detraction. And one amongst the rest swore an oath, and said, He thanked God that he was not yet mad, to waste his time, spend two hundred pounds a year, (which it seems Stow had done) trouble himself and all his friends, only to gain assurance of endless reproach, loss of liberty, and bring all his days in question. Yet at last one Edward (21) Howes undertook it, and effected it: But it happened just so to him, having been intolerably abused and scandalized for his labour."

[N] From his papers, Edmond Howes published afterwards that folio Volume, which goes under the name of Stow's Chronicle.] He published it first in 1615; and put out another edition in 1631; both in black letter, and the latter especially upon very bad paper. Who first set him about it he thus mentions in his Dedication of the last edition to King Charles I. . . 'May it therefore please your Majesty to pardon my defect, and graciously accept into your most royall Patronage, these my thirty years labours of impartiall Truth, which with all faithfulness I have composed, according to my oath and promise made to the late most reverend Prelate, Dr Whitgift, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; by whose especial instruction and encouragement I undertooke this general Worke, in honor of my Prince and Country.' —In his Preface, he hath one particular relating to the dissolution of the Abbeyes, which we shall lay here before the Reader, because it is very little known.—'The generall plausible project, (says he) which caused the Parliament consent unto the Reformation or alteration of the Monasteries, was that the King's Exchequer should for ever be enriched, the kingdome and Nobility strengthened and increased,

42 T

(1) So Mr Stow himself informs us, in his Survey of London, edit. 1720. Vol. II. Book VI. p. 15.

(2) See above, the article CHAUCER.

(3) The Printer was unwilling to publish the whole Work. See Dedication of this Abstract.

(11) Holinshed's Chronicles, p. 1357, &c.

(12) Ib. p. 1370.

(13) p. 1382.

(14) p. 1404.

(15) p. 1411.

(16) p. 1414.

(17) He spent eight years in searching out of ancient Records concerning Antiquities both for London and Southwark. Life, p. 13.

(18) Antony Monday, Henry Dyson.

(*) There was an edition of the Summary, under the title of Annales, &c. 1552. 4to.

(19) p. 1438.

(20) Preface to his Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. XI. See Ed. Howes's Epistle to the Lord-Maior and Aldermen of London, before the Index to Stow's Annales, ed. 1631.

(21) His name was Edmond.

(w) Epistle Dedicatorie, and Preface, to his Annales, edit. 1600.

(x) See Stow's Annales, edit. 1631. p. 811. b.

(y) Life, p. 8. 15. 20.

(z) Life, p. 12, 13.

(aa) See a print of it in his Life.

(bb) See Stow's Annales, edit. 1631. p. 811.

(cc) Life, p. 16.

(dd) Ibid. p. 23.

(ee) Life, p. 27, 22.

not contain all that 'farre larger work' which Mr Stow mentions (w), and intended to have published; leaving it in his study, orderly written, ready for the press (x). It came into the hands of Sir Symonds Dewes (y), and afterwards (as one might suppose) into the possession of the late Earl of Oxford; but it is not in the British Musæum, with others of our Author's manuscripts [O]. Having spent his patrimony, and the best part of his estate in these studies and labours; he was forced, in the latter part of his life, to have a collection made for his relief. And, for that purpose, King James I. granted him a license, or brief, dated the 8th of May 1603, which was renewed the 26th of November 1604, authorising him, or his deputy, to repair to churches, or other places, to receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of well-disposed people [P]; in recompence of his painful labours, and for encouragement to the like (z). Together with his poverty, he was very much afflicted with pain in his feet, probably the gout, and also the stone. At length having arrived to eighty years of age, he departed this life April 5, 1605, and was buried the 8th in his parish church of St Andrew's-Undershaft, where his widow erected a decent monument to his memory (aa). Mr Stow's Person and Temper are thus described by Mr Edmond Howes (bb), who perfectly knew him. 'He was tall of stature, leane of body and face, his eyes small and cristalline, of a pleasant and cheerefull countenance, his sight very good, his memory excellent; very sober, mild, and courteous to any that required his instructions; and retained the true use of all his senses unto the day of his death. He always protested, never to have written any thing, either for malice, feare, or favor, nor to seek his own particular gaine, or vaine glory, and that his only pains and care was to write Truth.' As he was a great Lover of Truth, so he was very inquisitive to find it out: And his good Judgment, Learning, and Skill in History and Antiquities, qualified and enabled him not to be put off with Frauds and superstitious Fables, commonly believed and related by men of less accuracy; as is plain from many instances in his writings (cc). On all occasions he expressed a great dislike for immorality of every kind, injustice, wrongs, frauds, unfaithfulness, falshood, and treachery; which shewed an honest and good mind. And he spared not to expose the more scandalous sorts of men that fell in his way; as lewd and unclean Priests, unfaithful Executors, abusers of charitable Donations, false Jurymen, counterfeit Physicians, and other Cheats, and Impostors, Extortioners and cruel Oppressors, violators of the Monuments of the dead, and exalters of themselves above their neighbours (dd). As to his Religion, he was undoubtedly at first, a favorer, as well as a professor of Popery: but these words of his, under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 'That Doctrine is more pure, now, than it was in the Monkish world,' imply that he had then altered his mind. Perhaps being a lover of Antiquity, and an admirer of the old Religious buildings and monuments, he was prejudiced against the Reformed Religion, because of the horrible havock and destruction those that pretended to it, made of them in his days. And indeed it might render him the less affected to the Religion in his time reformed, while he took notice how ignorantly, nay ridiculously, some that professed and preached it, shewed their zeal (ee) [2]. Upon the whole, he appears throughout to have been an honest and well meaning man; and his Chronicle, or Annales, as far as they go, are still the best and exactest we have extant.

'and the common subjects acquitted and freed from all former Services and Taxes; to wit, that the Abbots, Monks, Fryers and Nunnes, being suppressed, that then in their places, should be created forty Earles, threescore Barons, and three thousand Knights, and forty thousand Souldiours, with skilful Captaines, and competent maintenance for them all, ever out of the ancient Churches revenues, so as in so doing, the King and successors should never want of Treasure of their owne, nor have cause to be beholding to the common Subjects, neither should the people be any more charged with Loanes, Subsidies, and Fifteenes. Since which time, there have been more statute Lawes, Subsidies, and Fifteenes, than five hundred yeeres before. And not long after that, the King had Subsidies granted, and borrowed great sums of money, and dyed in debt, and the forenamed religious houses were utterly ruined (22).'

[O] With others of our Author's manuscripts. He translated Giraldus's Itinerary of Wales, Florent. Wigorn. After Meneven, with continuation, Alured Rievall. Nic. Trevet, &c. which were all in Sir Symonds Dewes's library, in Mr Stow's own hand-writing (23).

[P] To receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of people.] But even upon this there was but little gathered, if we may judge by the collection made in the one parish of St Mary Woolnoth, which amounted only to 7s. 6d. Besides, that he hardly lived long enough to have the collection compleated. It is strange, as Mr Strype observes (24), that the city of London, to which he had done such service and honour, in writing such an elaborate and accurate Survey thereof; nor the wealthy Company of Merchant-Taylors, of which he was a worthy and creditable member; nor lastly the State, in grateful remembrance of his diligent and faithful pains, in composing an excellent History of the Kingdom; neither of them had allotted him some honorary pension during his life.

[2] How ignorantly, nay ridiculously, some that professed and preached it, shewed their zeal] He gives us some instances of it, in Sir Stephen, already mentioned (25), Curate of St Katharine Cree-church parish, where Mr Stow then lived. That Curate, in a Sermon at St Paul's, inveighed severely against a long Maypole, called a Shaft, in the next parish to his, named thence St Andrew Undershaft, calling it an Idol. Which so inflamed the zeal of many of the hearers, because all Idols were ordered by publick authority to be taken away; that a great number of the neighbours went, the same afternoon, and violently pulled it down from the place where it hung upon hooks, and then sawed it into divers pieces, each housekeeper taking a piece, as much as hung over his door or stall, and afterwards casting the pieces into one common heap, burnt them. Mr Stow heard this Sermon, and saw the effect of it. —The same preacher, taking occasion from that Church's name, Undershaft, as superstitiously given to it, declared it as his judgment, that the names of Churches should be altered; nay and that the names of days in the week might be changed, the fifth-days to be kept on any days except Fridays and Saturdays. And further, that Lent should be observed at any other time, than between Shrovetide and Easter. —Another practice of this Sir Stephen was, oftentimes to forsake the pulpit, and getting up into a high elm that grew in the middle of the church-yard, to preach from thence to the people; and returning into the church, he would say or sing the English service, not at the altar as was usual, but upon a tomb on the north side of the church (26). Such were the irregular practices of the Methodists, or Zealots, of those times, which served only to expose the Reformation.

(25) Note [B]

(26) See his Survey of London, Book II p. 66. and I p. 22.

STRYPE [JOHN], Author of several Volumes relating chiefly to the Ecclesiastical History of England: a most faithful and industrious Writer; was of German extraction, but born in Stepney-parish near Spital-Fields in London (a) November 1, 1643 (b). After having had his Education in Grammar learning for near six years, in St Paul's School (c), he was admitted, in 1661, in Jesus-college, but removed soon after to Catharine-hall, in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1665, and that of Master in 1669 (d). His first preferment, was the Donative, or perpetual Curacy, of Theydon-Boys in the county of Essex; conferred upon him the 14th of July 1669: But he quitted it a few months after, upon his being appointed Minister of Low-Leyton in the same county, where he made several improvements [A], and which he kept as long as he lived (e) By his being seated here, he came to have an opportunity of procuring the valuable Manuscripts of Sir Michael Hickes Knight, once of Rokholt's in this parish, and Secretary to William Lord Burleigh; which were afterwards the foundation of most of his Books (f). They are very numerous; he having published no less than Thirteen Volumes in folio; full of deep and laborious researches: besides three Volumes in octavo &c. And as he rendered himself chiefly considerable as a Writer, therefore we shall view him almost entirely in that light. His works relate more especially to the History of the Reformation of the Church of England; as will appear by the following particular account of them, in which we shall have more regard to the order of time they belong to, than the order in which they were published. The first, in that respect, were his 'Ecclesiastical Memorials; relating chiefly to Religion, and the Reformation of it, and the Emergencies of the Church of England, under King Henry VIII, King Edward VI, and Queen Mary the First [B].' The next Books

[A] Upon his being appointed Minister of Low-Leyton, . . . where he made several Improvements.] There was something very singular in this case, which we shall present the Reader with, from original Papers, that have been kindly communicated to us by a friend. Though he enjoyed this preferment above sixty-eight years; and, what is very remarkable, administered the sacrament in this church sixty-six Christmases-days successively; yet he was never instituted nor inducted thereto. For the living being very small, the three patrons complimented the Parish with the choice of a Minister. Accordingly, by the direction of the Inhabitants, Mr Strype preached to them, in order for their approbation to be chosen their Lecturer, Preacher, or Curate; and being approved of by the majority of the Parishioners, was, in 1669, elected to be their Lecturer or Curate: as his predecessors from time immemorial had been: so it is expressed in those Papers. Soon after Mr Strype's election, the Parishioners entered into a subscription for his maintenance, which was found among his books, and began thus. 'Dec. 9, 1669. We the Inhabitants of the Parrish of Lowe-Leyton, having made Choice of Mr John Strype to be our Minister to succeed Mr Cox, doe hereby promise to pay him yearely and every yeare (dureing our tyme heere as parishioners belonging to the said parrish) the following somes subscribed to our names to be paid him quarterly, or other wayes as he shall thinke more convenient to demand it, provided he continues the usual Custom of his Prediccessor in preaching twisse every Sunday. I William Hickes doe promise to pay eight pounds.' Then follow sixty-one others, who promised to pay, some 3l. some 2l. some 1l. and others lesser sums; to the amount in all of 69l. 0s. 10d.—The 11th of November, 1674, he was licensed by Dr Henchman, bishop of London, to preach and expound the word of God in the parish church of Low-Layton, and to perform the full office of Priest and Curate there, during the Vacancy of the Vicarage: which License, and no other Instrument, was exhibited at the Episcopal Visitations, Sept. 11, 1674, Oct. 12, 1715, and Aug. 11, 1720.—It is somewhat unaccountable, that Mr Strype could escape the Sagacity of the Officers, and enjoy a Living so many years as he did, so near London, without disturbance or molestation; especially at a time when a Compliance with the Rules, Orders, and Discipline of the Church was so strictly enjoined, and so carefully enquired into, as it was during the reign of King Charles II. Indeed, in his latter days, his uncommon Merit might be his Protection with the Bishops of London, if he could remain unnoticed by the Lord Chancellor's officers, or some hungry Clergyman; which he luckily did to the last.

As to the great Repairs and Improvements made by him. The House belonging to this Living was in the most ruinous condition, and inhabited only by the meanest of people. Wherefore, at Easter 1677, Mr Strype applied to the general Vestry of the Parish, and acquainted them with a Promise they had made him at his first coming among them, which was, to rebuild the Preacher's house at the Charge of the Inhabitants: Whereupon the Vestry appointed Matthias Goodfellow and Thomas Harvey, Gentlemen, to take a view of the old House, and to consider the charge of rebuilding it; which being done, the view was at the next vestry presented to them, with a plan for erecting the intended new house. Upon which a voluntary subscription was agreed on, and made by several of the Inhabitants towards the rebuilding of the House, which amounted to the sum of 79l. 19s. besides the timber and utensils that belonged to the old House, and new materials presented and sent in by the Inhabitants, and a license granted from the Crown for cutting Timber in Walwood in the same parish for the use of the house and buildings, obtained at the request of the Inhabitants. Thus furnished with materials, Mr Strype undertook to rebuild the House; the charges of which, with the out-houses and fencing the ground belonging to the same, amounted in the whole to 216l. 9s. 3d. That is, he expended, out of his own pocket, 140l. 10s. 3d. besides the contributions aforesaid; as appears by an account entered by himself in one of this Parish's Registers. The House is of Brick, containing thirty feet in front, and twenty-four in depth; with an additional building on the East side for Offices, being twenty feet in front, and twelve in depth. And in the yard a stable and straw-house, containing sixteen feet in front, and twelve in depth; with a wood-house and loft over it, seventeen feet in length, and thirteen feet, and a half in depth. —Also in 1679, Mr Strype, by a collection in the parish, and his own expence, did repair the roof of the upper Chancel of the Church, which was ready to fall down, the two arches that then were there being very defective: They being taken down, the raising piece was also found to be rotten; whereupon two new pillars were erected, on which rested a new raising piece. For these pillars and raising piece, were obtained three strong oaks out of Walwood, in this parish. The charge of these repairs, besides the timber, amounted to about 70l. In consideration of which, he was allowed what advantage could be made by the Pews and Burials in the Chancel; and enjoyed the same till some dispute arose between him and the lord of the manor, touching the nominating a Parish-Clerk. Mr Strype also repaired the Chancel-porch at his own charge (1). . . . Notwithstanding which, his Executors were sued by his Successor for Dilapidations: But very little or nothing could be recovered, the Plea being, That he had never been Instituted, nor Inducted; and that the House was built, and ought to be repaired by the Parish.

[B] Ecclesiastical Memorials, &c.] The rest of the title of Vol. I. is as follows. . . . 'All which being new, and such as have hitherto escaped our Writers and Historians, will communicate much more light to those great Transactions in this Kingdom: And more over discover further the Inclinations and Influences of the respective Princes: The Embassies and Correspondencies with foreign Potentates and States, chiefly with respect to Religion: The Oppositions made

(f) See N. Salmon's History and Antiquities of Essex, p. 5. and Mr Strype's numerous References in the margins of his Books; with his Preface to the Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 7.

(1) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 331.

(a) From a MS. Letter of his.

(b) Wood Fasti, edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 187. and Mr Strype's Picture, prefixed to Vol. I. of his Ecclesiastical Memor.; and Letter from Dr H. Newcome.

(c) See his edition of J. Stow's Survey of London, Book I. p. 164. col. 2.

(d) From the University Registers.

(e) Newcourt, Repertorium, Vol. II. p. 583, 555, 582.

Books of his we shall mention, according to our method, are the Lives of the four first Protestant Archbishops; Archbishop Cranmer [C]; Archbishop Parker [D]; Archbishop Grindal [E]; and Archbishop Whitgift [F]. We have placed these four Lives together, as made to it: The Troubles and Persecutions of the Professors of it: The Tempers, Practices, and Events of the Two Cardinals, Wolfey and Pole, and other Prelates and Great Men of both Parties, in the respective reigns: Besides, Accounts of Convocations, Royal and Episcopal Visitations, Ecclesiastical Constitutions, Books from time to time set forth; with various other Matters worthy of Note and Observation. In Three Volumes. With a large Appendix to each Volume, containing Original Papers, Records, &c.' The Title of Vol. II. is, 'Historical Memorials, chiefly Ecclesiastical, and such as concern Religion and the Reformation of it, and the Progress made therein, under the Reign and Influence of King Edward VI. containing also many new Discoveries of the Life, Acts, and Government of that Prince.' With a Repository of Originals. And the Title of Vol. III. is, 'Historical Memorials, Ecclesiastical and Civil, of Events under the reign of Queen Mary I. Wherein are brought to light various Things concerning the management of Affairs, during the Five Years of her Government. And, more particularly, The Restoring of the Pope's Authority, and the Popish Religion in this Kingdom: And the rigorous Methods of Burning, and other Severities, for the Replanting of it, used towards such as adhered to the Religion Reformed under King Edward VI.' With a Catalogue of Originals. Lond. 1721. fol.—Mr Strype informs us, in his Preface, that 'These Memorials, respecting chiefly Religion, and the Reformation of it in this kingdom, had been composed by him and fitted for the press divers years before. But he thought fit to lay them aside for a time; and to begin rather with what he had writ of the Lives and Acts of the Four First Protestant Archbishops of Canterbury; as shewing therein, the beginning, progress, opposition, and establishment of the said happy Reformation in a continued History, under the influence of those most worthy Prelates. Nor did he think it convenient to burden those Books, which were large enough of themselves, by inserting those Memorials into them, which would have rendered them too bulky: But rather to compile them into other Volumes by themselves, in due time to follow the rest. This gave occasion to their being suppressed till then. But they being a faithful Collection of many important matters which went before, accompanied, or immediately related to, that great work, [the Reformation] and well worthy to be known, He was willing and desirous, that they might now be recommended to the world; and that they might be the more correctly set forth by himself, and have his review, before his death, which his great Age suggested could not be far off. . . . He did not intend, when he took this work in hand, to write a compleat Ecclesiastical History under those Three of our Kings, and of all the occurrences and events of Religion and the Church in their reigns. For that had been done, or endeavoured, by some Historiographers already. His were only Ecclesiastical Memorials; and intended but to supply what had been omitted by them, or to rectify some Mistakes, or Misrepresentations of Persons and Things: Or to fill up and enlarge matters, more briefly or imperfectly related in our published histories. His design was only to communicate to the world what he had of this sort of History, out of his store, and to digest these notices in their proper places chronologically from year to year, as they occurred. And chiefly to bring to light such further particulars, as he had found in State-papers, and Letters, and Records, and many original MSS of the best sort, after long and diligent converse with them.' They were compiled from Transcripts by him taken, out of the Cotton, Bennet-college, and Bishop More's Libraries; out of the Paper-house at Westminster; out of the Earl of Oxford's Library, and that of the Inner-Temple; the Herald's Office; numerous MSS of Ecclesiastical Affairs, some time belonging to the famous Martyrologist, John Fox; divers notable State-letters; or of more private correspondence between persons of the highest rank and quality in Church and Court, preserved in the house of Sir William Hickes, Bart. . . . Our Author gives the following Account of his Exactness and Industry (2). . . 'My Diligence will in part appear, in that I have made no use of Transcribers and Amanuenses: or, that I saw not the Originals myself, but left it to the Care of others to take-out thence: who oftentimes make Mistakes, Omissions, and false Writing of Letters and Words, to the spoiling and corrupting of the true Sense, sometimes by Negligence or too much Haste, and sometimes for want of skill, and not knowing well the Manner of old Writing in the Shape of the Letters, or the Abbreviations commonly used in times past. For the prevention of which Inconveniences, I writ all from the MSS with mine own pen, and with as much care as I could; that whatsoever I transcribed might be exactly taken, both as to the Letter and Spelling.' He also declares, that he had avoided partiality and prejudice, and set down things as he found them.

[C] The Life of Archbishop Cranmer.] This was published at London, in 1694. fol. with this title, 'Memorials of the most Renowned Father in God, Thomas Cranmer, some time Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. Wherein the History of the Church, and the Reformation of it, during the Primacy of the said Archbishop, are greatly illustrated; and many singular Matters relating thereunto, now first published. In three Books. Collected chiefly from Records, Registers, authentick Letters, and other Original Manuscripts.' At the end, is an Appendix of original Papers; and Observations of Mr Henry Wharton on the Memorials.

[D] The Life of Archbishop Parker.] This came out in 1711. fol. and was intituled, 'The Life and Acts of Matthew Parker, the first Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Under whose primacy and influence the Reformation of Religion was happily effected; and the Church of England restored, and established upon the Principles whereon it stands to this day. Wherein are related the said Archbishop's Actions in ecclesiastical Commissions and Synods: His Visitations of the Dioceses, Colleges, and Hospitals within his Province, with his Injunctions and Regulations: Characters and Accounts of Bishops by him consecrated: His Endeavours for Uniformity: His diligence in retrieving and publishing many Saxon, and other ancient historical MSS of this Nation: His procuring a more correct Translation of the holy Bible: His Government of his own Diocess of Canterbury: His sober thoughts, counsels and cares for Religion and this Church: And many particulars of the Ecclesiastical History of those Times, hitherto unknown, or very obscure, are discovered and brought to light. Compiled faithfully from Records, Registers, State-papers, Orders of Council, Authentic Letters, and sundry other original MSS. In four Books. To which is added, An Appendix, containing various Transcripts of Records, Letters, Instruments, Ordinances, Commissions, Discourses, Relations, Intelligences, and other secret Papers, above an hundred in number; for the asserting or illustrating the foregoing History. Among which will be found the Latin Life of this Archbishop, entitled Matthæus, so much and so long wanted in the Editions of the British Antiquities.'

[E] Archbishop Grindal.] The title of this Archbishop's Life, is, 'The History of the Life and Acts of the most Reverend Father in God Edmund Grindal, the first Bishop of London, and the second Archbishop of York and Canterbury successively, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Wherein is shewed, that most Reverend Prelate's pious and useful Labours, both in the Reformation and Government of the Church of England, while he presided over it, and how well he merited of it &c. To which is added an Appendix of original MSS.' Lond. 1710. fol.

[F] The Life of Archbishop Whitgift.] This was published in 1718. fol. and bears this title. 'The Life and Acts of the most Reverend Father in God, John Whitgift D. D. the third and last Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; who, under her Majesty, in that Station, governed the Church of England for the space of twenty years. Wherein is interwoven much of the History of the Affairs of this Church; viz. Nominations and Consecrations of Bishops; Bills and Petitions in Parliament about Religion, and for Reformation of corruptions and abuses in the Church; Transactions in Convocaas naturally following one another. But, to return to some other works of our Author, which are partly anterior in point of time to the two last mentioned Primates: His ‘Annals of the Reformation of the Church of England,’ are in four Volumes folio: The first of which was published in 1709, and reprinted in 1725, with large Additions both in the History and Appendix [G]. The second came out in 1725 [H], the third in 1728 [I], and the fourth in 1731 [K]. Another very large and laborious work of our most industrious Author, was a new edition of J. Stow’s Survey of London, in two Volumes in folio [L]. The three Volumes in octavo published by him, as abovementioned, were, The Lives of Sir John Cheke [M], Sir Thomas Smith [N], and Dr John Ælmer, Bishop of London [O]. He also published, A Sermon preached at the Assizes at Hertford, July 8,

1689,

‘Convocations, and ecclesiastical Commissions; the Diligence of Popish Priests and Jesuits; Methods for the restraint of them; the endeavours of those they called Puritans, to set up a new Church-discipline; and the prosecution of some of them; Notices of the first Separatists; Visitations of Dioceses, and the state of them; Matters of the civil and ecclesiastical Courts; Occurrences in the Universities, and observations upon divers Heads and Members thereof; Accounts of Prelates, and other learned Clergymen and Writers in those times; Books and Writings of note; some further discovery and account (besides what hath been printed) of that memorable Conference at Hampton-Court before King James the First, with the issue thereof, and the effects it produced. The whole digested, compiled, and attested from Records, Registers, original Letters, and other authentick MSS, taken from the choicest Libraries and Collections of the kingdom. In four Books. Together with a large Appendix of the said Papers, to the number of cxxix.’

[G] His Annals of the Reformation of the Church of England are in four Volumes folio: The first of which was published in 1709, and reprinted in 1725. The title will inform the Reader of the contents of this Volume; being as follows. ‘Annals of the Reformation and Establishment of Religion, and other various Occurrences in the Church of England; during the first twelve years of Queen Elizabeth’s happy reign. Wherein account is given of the restoring of Religion from its Corruptions introduced under Queen Mary; of filling the Sees with Protestant Bishops; of the famous Synod assembled in the year MDLXII; of the workings and endeavours of the Papists; and of the first appearances of the Dissension from the Church established. Compiled faithfully out of Papers of State, authentick Records, publick Registers, private Letters, and other original Manuscripts. Together with an Appendix or Repository, containing the most important of them.’

[H] The Second came out in 1725. This Volume commences at the thirteenth year of Queen Elizabeth’s reign: And endeth at the conclusion of the year of our Lord MDLXXX. Besides an account of the Reformation, it comprehends other matters, relating to the state of Learning, and civil Affairs of remark, happening in this kingdom within that period: Tending to the rectifying Mistakes, and supplying Defects in our History of those times. All taken from original Letters and Papers of State &c. With an Appendix of original Papers &c.’

[I] The third in 1728. It reaches from the year 1581 to 1588, and contains Accounts of the Government and Inspection of the Bishops in their respective Diocesses; as matters requiring their care, fell out each year: Ecclesiastical Commissions: The busy actions of Papists and Puritans: The Difficulties and Dangers the State as well as the Church met with from time to time: occasioned chiefly from the endeavours to overthrow both, by the power and practices of such as favoured Mary Queen of Scots: Of whom many special transactions; and chiefly of her sentence and death; and the consequences thereof, are shewn: And the Spanish Invasion in 1588. Both serving to enlighten those two great Crises of Queen Elizabeth’s reign. Together with divers other political Affairs of note interspersed. The History is also improved by notices given concerning the state and events of the Church of Ireland; Occurrences and Differences that fell out in our Universities; Remarks of many persons of rank and quality in Church and State: Books of learning and note, Libels, Pamphlets &c. published yearly. Collected diligently and faithfully from Records, Papers of State, Original Letters of Privy Counsellors, Ambassadors, Bishops, learned men in the Universities, as elsewhere:

VOL. VI. No. 321.

‘And from other choice MSS. reserved in our publick Libraries, or more private Archives. Together with an Appendix: Containing many choice Records, and Papers of value; transcribed from originals: Referred to in the work; in order to the vindication, proof, and illustration of the History.’

[K] And the fourth in 1731. At the conclusion of the Preface to his Third Volume, he had said, that he must call that Volume his last (though indeed it reached not by divers years to the end of Queen Elizabeth’s reign) because it was the last Conclusion of his Labour therein; his great Age and frequent Infirmities disabling him from going further in that work. . . . However, he lived to publish the Fourth Volume, in 1731; but being then arrived to the Eighty-eighth year of his age, his Weakness and Infirmities hindered him from digesting it even in the same manner as the former Volumes. So that it is only a Collection of Original Papers.

[L] A new Edition of J. Stow’s Survey of London, in two Volumes in folio. It was published in 1720, and what improvements our Author made in it, we may learn from the Title, which is as follows. ‘A Survey of the Cities of London and Westminster: Containing the Original, Antiquity, Increase, modern Estate and Government of those Cities. Written at first in the year MDXCVIII. By John Stow, citizen and native of London. Since reprinted and augmented by the Author; and afterwards by A. M. H. D. and others. Now lastly, corrected, improved, and very much enlarged: And the Survey and History brought down from the year 1633, (being near Four-score years since it was last printed) to the present time; by John Strype, M. A. a native also of the said City. Illustrated with exact Maps of the City and Suburbs, and of all the Wards; and likewise of the Out-parishes of London and Westminster: Together with many other fair Draughts of the more eminent and publick Edifices and Monuments. In Six Books. To which is prefixed, the Life of the Author, writ by the Editor. At the end is added, An Appendix of certain Tracts, Discourses and Remarks concerning the State of the City of London. Together with a Perambulation, or Circuit-walk four or five miles round about London, to the Parish Churches: Describing the Monuments of the Dead there interred: With other Antiquities observable in those places. And concluding with a Second Appendix, as a supply and review.’

[M] The Life of Sir John Cheke. It has this title, ‘The Life of the learned Sir John Cheke, Knight, first Instructor, afterwards Secretary of State to King Edward VI, one of the great Restorers of good Learning and true Religion in this Kingdom. A Work wherein many remarkable points of History, relating to the State of Learning and Religion in the times of King Henry VIII, King Edward VI, and Q. Mary I, are brought to light. To which is added, A Treatise of Superstition writ by the said learned Knight, and now first published.’ Lond. 1705. 8vo.

[N] Sir Thomas Smith. And this has the following title. ‘The Life of the learned Sir Thomas Smith Knight, Doctor of the Civil Law; Principal Secretary of State to King Edward the Sixth, and Queen Elizabeth. Wherein are discovered many singular Matters relating to the State of Learning, the Reformation of Religion, and the Transactions of the Kingdom, during his time. In all which he had a great and happy Influence. With an Appendix, wherein are contained some Works of his, never before published.’ Lond. 1698. 8vo.

[O] And Dr John Ælmer, bishop of London. This he intitled, ‘Historical Collections, relating to the Life and Acts of Bishop Aylmer.’ Lond. 1701. 8vo. It contains a particular account, of the Puritans book,

42 U

Of

(g) Wood Fasti, ut supra, col. 187. He also published his Genuine Remains, and Opera posthuma.

1689, on 1 Sam. xii. 7. Lond, 1689. 4to. and two other Sermons [P]: and collected together the Second Volume of Dr Lightfoot's Works, translating several pieces therein from the original Latin, and making large Additions to the Doctor's Life, written by the publisher of the first Volume, Dr George Bright (g). Besides his preferments already mentioned, he had the Sine-Cure of Terring in Suffex, given him by Archbishop Tennison; and was Lecturer of Hackney till about the year 1724, when he resigned that Lecture. In the latter and infirm part of his life, he lived with Mr Harris an Apothecary at Hackney, who had married his grand-daughter; where he died December 13, 1737, at the uncommon age of ninety-four. So that his intense application to his studies did not shorten his days! His Faithfulness was equal to his industry [Q], and the world is greatly indebted to him for preserving several valuable Materials, which would otherwise have been lost. He kept a literary correspondence with the most learned and eminent persons in his time; particularly with Archbishops Tennison, and Wake; the Bishops Atterbury, Burnet, Nicolson &c. as appeared by an exact Diary he had made of his own life, and which was in the hands of Mr Harris. But that Gentleman being dead, and the family dispersed, This, with many other curious Papers, is either lost or mislaid.

(3) See Preface to his Life of Archbp Parker.

Of Discipline; of Thomas Cartwright, the first broacher and head of Puritanism; of Campion the Jesuit, and other civil and ecclesiastical Affairs, which were more slightly treated of in other works of our Author (3), and by the rest of our Historians.

[P] And two other Sermons.] The one intituled, 'Lessons proper for fallible men, in a Sermon preached at the Lecture of St Augustin's Hackney, Sept. 21, 1707, on Prov. xiv. 12.' Published at request, Lond. 1708, 8vo.—The other, 'Short Rules for Christian Practice, delivered at Hackney-Church on Sunday May 31, 1724, on Phil. iv. 8. The Farewell Sermon of the Lecturer there.' Lond. 1724, 8vo. Published at the desire of the Parishioners.

[Q] His Faithfulness was equal to his Industry.] We may judge of his Faithfulness, by the following Account he gives (in the Preface to Vol. I. of his Annals) of the Method he had pursued in that work.—'I have chosen, says he, commonly to set down Things in the very words of the Records and Originals, and of the Authors themselves, rather than in my own, without framing and dressing them into more modern language. Whereby the Sense is sure to remain entire as the Writers meant it. Whereas, by affecting too curiously to change and model Words and Sentences, the Sense itself, I have observed, often to be marred and disguised.' And he further declares, That 'in this Work he had pursued Truth with all Faithfulness and Sincerity (4).—Thus also, in the Preface to Vol. II. he says, . . . 'In this whole Undertaking I have used all Faithfulness and Impartiality: and set down things according as I found them in the Originals, whether Letters, Records, Registers, Papers of

(4) Preface to Vol. 1. p. 2 and 3.

(a) Which bears for Arms; Or, on a Cheveron between three annulets, Gules, as many crescents, Or. Camden's funeral certificates in the Heralds office.

(b) By the advice and direction of Dr Cox, Preceptor to King Edward VI, and not long before Chief School-master of that school.

(1) In a Commemoration sermon preached that year, entitled The English Centurion, &c. a copy of which, and perhaps the only one remaining, is in the Bodleian Library.

(2) Then Preacher at Charter-house.

SUTTON [THOMAS], Esq; Founder of Charter-house Hospital near London, was descended of an ancient and genteel family (a) of his name in Lincolnshire; in which County he was born at a place called Knaith, in the year 1532. He received the first part of his education at Eton School (b), whence he was probably sent to Cambridge, and matriculated as a member of St John's College on the 27th of November 1551 [A]. However, without taking any degree (c), he removed thence to Lincoln's-Inn with a view, as it should seem, of studying the law (d). But finding a sedentary way of life not agreeable to his active genius, he resolved to form the compleat gentleman, by travelling abroad. In the execution of this design, he spent the whole time of Queen Mary's reign in foreign parts, and making the tour of Holland, France, Spain, and Italy, he became a master of the languages of those several countries. Returning home in 1562, he entered into the possession of a handsome fortune, which had been left to him by his Father [B], who died during his absence.

[A] He was matriculated of St John's college, Cambridge.] That he was some time at one of the Universities appears from the testimony of Percival Burrel, Preacher at Charter-house in 1629 (1). Mr Wood's silence upon the Article is a strong presumptive proof Mr Sutton was not of Oxford; and that worthy Antiquarian, the late Mr Thomas Baker, of St John's college in Cambridge, being applied to by Dr Philip Bearcroft (2), returned the following answer, 'I have turned our matriculation book very carefully from the year 1544, where it first begins, to the year 1551, and cannot meet with your Founder, Thomas Sutton, either at Magdalene or Jesus college, or indeed at any college except St John's, where I find Thomas Sutton matriculated, Nov. 27, 1551, thus; Thomas Sutton coll. Job. Quadrantarius (census) Nov. 27, 1551. The time agrees pretty nearly with his age, for he might have been admitted a year or two-sooner;

State, or other MSS, being the imports of them, and often the same words. So that the Reader may the readier depend upon the Truth of what I offer (5).—And to the same purpose in the Preface to Vol. III. . . . 'What I have entred in my Copies, and prepared Writings for the press, were always reviewed by me, and carefully compared with the Records and Originals by me transcribed. And moreover I have ever been very careful and punctual in all my Collections thence. Whereof I have many Volumes (now bound up) taken by my own pen, and with mine own eyes, and made use of no other Transcribers or Amanuenses. Unless what some learned Friends abroad, and in the Universities, had communicated to me.' . . . He adds, 'I have for many long years together, conversed with Historical MSS (falling within the Sæculum Reformatum) whether Records, Registers, Instruments, Letters of Statesmen, as well as other private Letters of the Court and Nobility, together with very many antient printed Books of those Times (having met with some special Advantages that way) more than many men alive have done. And when afterwards I was proposed, for the publick Good, to digest and publish some of these Pains of mine, I ever made it my Resolution to be just, faithful and impartial in what I should deliver, and recommend unto the World from thence.'—See also the Prefaces to his Lives of the four first Protestant Archbishops.—Upon the whole, as Dr Birch rightly observes (6), 'His Fidelity and Industry will always give a value to his numerous Writings, however destitute of the graces, and even uniformity of style, and the art of connecting facts.'

(5) Preface to Vol. II, p. 3.

(6) Life of Abp Tillotson p. 329.

(c) He probably quitted the University on the accession of Q. Mary in 1553.

(d) Stow's Survey by How, p. 10.

(3) Historical Account of Thomas Sutton, Esq; and of the foundation Charter-house in the preface p. 11, 12, Edit. 1737.

(4) And therefore probably of the profession of the common law.

they are not always matriculated the first year. But Quadrantarius is a greater objection, which suits not well with his birth and quality; and yet we have had Gentlemen admitted Sizar.' After these objections, Mr Baker proceeds to shew, that, if he were not of this college, he was not of that University, being neither of Magdalene nor Jesus, notwithstanding he was a benefactor to both. This being confirmed by express informations from those colleges, induced Dr Bearcroft (3) to assign him to St John's college, wherein we have followed him.

[B] He became possessed of a handsome fortune left him by his Father.] His Father's name was Richard; he died at his house in the parish of St Swithin in Lincoln, having been steward of the courts to that city (4). Though his death happened July 27, 1558, yet his will, wherein he left his wife and son joint executors, was not proved till the 22d of February, 1562. The will

absence. He was now about thirty years of age, and being in all respects an accomplished gentleman, he was first retained by the Duke of Norfolk [C], and after some time became Secretary to the Earl of Warwick [D], and occasionally also to his brother the Earl of Leicester. In 1569, the former of these Noblemen being Master-General of the Ordnance, appointed his Secretary Master of the Ordnance at Berwick [E], in which post he distinguished himself greatly upon the breaking out of the Rebellion in the North by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, so that by the recommendation of his two just-mentioned noble Patrons, he obtained a Patent the same year for the office of Master-General of the Ordnance in the North for life; and in 1573 he commanded one of the five Batteries, which obliged the strong castle of Edinburgh to surrender to the English [F]. While he was thus acquiring that glory which is the peculiar purchase of military exploits, he grew not less distinguished by an extraordinary access of wealth: soon after his arrival in the North, he had purchased of the Bishop of Durham the manors of Gateshead and Wickham, famous for coal-mines in that bishopric; and in 1570 obtaining a lease from the Crown for the term of seventy-nine years, these prospered so fast, that on his coming up to London in 1580, he brought with him the quantity of two horse-loads of money, and was reputed to be worth fifty-thousand pounds (e). About the middle of the year 1582 he married Elizabeth daughter of John Gardiner Esq; of Grove-place in the parish of Chalfont-St Gyles in Buckinghamshire, and widow of John Dudley of Stoke-Newington in Middlesex Esq; a near relation of the Earl of Warwick; this Lady brought him a very considerable estate, and among the rest a moiety of the manor of Stoke-Newington (f), which being near London, he made that house his country seat, and purchasing in the city a large house near Broken Wharf, in the parish of St Mary Somerset [G], he took up the business of a merchant, which his ready cash enabled him to follow with such great credit, and so much to his advantage, that he soon became one of the chief merchants of London, and is said to have had no less than thirty agents abroad, and his riches flowing in with every tide (g). Mr Sutton was likewise one of the chief victuallers of the Navy (h), and seems to have been master of the Barque called Sutton, of seventy tons and thirty men, in the list of volunteers attending the English fleet against the Spanish Armada (i) in 1588 [H]. He is likewise said will was nuncupative, and thus reduced for the probate to writing: 'Be it known to all men by these presents, that Richard Sutton, of the parish of St Swithin within the city of Lincoln, gentleman, the 27th day of July in the year of our Lord God 1558, being of perfect remembrance, made his last will and testament nuncupative, in manner and form following: First he bequeathed his soul to Almighty God his Maker and Redeemer, and willed his body to be buried in the parish-church of St Swithin aforesaid. Item, he bequeathed to Thomas Sutton, his son, his lease of Cockrington, and all the years which were then to come and undetermined in the same. Item, the residue of his goods, not bequeathed, he gave to Elizabeth Sutton, his wife, and Thomas Sutton, his said son, whom he made his executors, these being witnesses, John Hall, William Wilson, Joan Cook, and Joan Ryall, with others. Probatum fuit apud Lincoln (5). By the probate it appears, that the execution was granted to Mr Sutton alone, the whole being trusted to his management by his good mother. She was a daughter of the honourable family of the Stapletons in Yorkshire, whose lineal Ancestor was Sir Bryan Stapleton of Carleton, Knight of the Garter in the time of King Richard II. Also Sir Miles Stapleton, created at the foundation of that order, was of this family (6). The lease of Cockrington, which was held of the bishopric of Lincoln, was of very considerable value, and besides this, Mr Sutton, we see, had a moiety of the personal estate.

[C] Retained in the service of the Duke of Norfolk. Mr Sutton makes a grateful acknowledgment of the favours he received from this Patron in his last will, wherein he leaves him a legacy of 400l. Besides which, he bequeathed his manors of Littlebury and Hadstock in Essex to his Grace's son, the Earl of Suffolk, on the payment of 10000l. (7). These manors lie contiguous to that of the Lord Audley, whose daughter and heir the Earl of Suffolk married, and built that remarkably magnificent house, called Audley Inn (8).

[D] He was secretary to the Earl of Warwick. Among the papers in the Charter-house evidence-house, there appears a grant, on the 12th of November, 1569, of an annuity of 3l. 6s. 8d. out of the manor of Walkington in Yorkshire, from Ambrose Earl of Warwick, and dame Anne, his wife, to their well-beloved servant, Thomas Sutton, for life; and they afterwards leased the whole manor to him for twenty-one years, at the rent of 26l. per annum.

[E] Master of the ordnance at Berwick. This was a post of particularly great trust at this time, Berwick being a frontier-garrison to Scotland, then in confusion through intestine broils, on account of Mary Queen of Scots and the Romish religion (9). How well Mr Sutton filled his post Mr Camden will inform us; whose account of Berwick from his own survey, during Mr Sutton's master-generalship of the ordnance in the North, is this; 'The Kings of England, says he, have several times fortified it with new works; but especially Queen Elizabeth, who lately, to the terror of the enemy, and the security of the burghers, hath drawn it into a less compass than before, and surrounded it with a firm wall of Asler work; which is again strengthened with a deep ditch, bastions, and counterescarp; so that its fortifications are so strong and regular, that no besiegers can hope to carry it hereafter, not to mention the valour of the inhabitants, and the surprising plenty of all warlike stores (10).' Wherever Mr Sutton's eye and purse were concerned, there was plenty; and they were of service to his Sovereign, in furnishing the Northern garrisons; and to himself, in the conclusion, by an ample recompence from the Crown (11).

[F] Edinburgh castle surrenders to the English. It is probable, that, as Master-General of the Ordnance, he attended the Earl of Suffex, President of the North, into Scotland, with an army in 1570, though he is not expressly named in Camden's Annals for that year. But in the year 1573 he is named (12) as one of the chief of those fifteen hundred men, who marched into Scotland to the assistance of the Regent, the Earl of Morton, by order of Queen Elizabeth, and laid siege to Edinburgh castle.

[G] His house near Broken Wharf. It is thus described by Mr Stow (13): 'By this Broken Wharf remaineth one large building of stone, with arched gates, which messuage I find in the forty-third Year of Henry III. pertaining to Hugh Bygot, and in the eleventh of Edward II. to Thomas de Brotherton, the King's brother, Earl of Norfolk, &c.'

[H] He attended the English fleet against the Spanish Armada. It is very probable that he was the principal instrument in the defeat of that Armada. For Sir Francis Walsingham having, by the help of a Popish Priest, his spy, procured a copy of the King of Spain's letter, giving an account of his mighty preparations to the Pope; the Invasion was hindered for a whole year by our merchants, who, at the instance of Sir Francis, gathered up the chief bills of the Bank of Genoa, and drawing their money out of it just as King Philip had ordered bills upon that bank to set his fleet out to sea; those bills were through necessity protested, so that patience became the only remedy; his Majesty was obliged to wait the arrival of his Plate-Fleet from the Indies for the necessary supplies; and

England

(e) The deposition in Chancery, after his decease, of his servant John Thompson. Causa Franciscæ Popham et Execut. Thomæ Sutton.

(f) Mr Dudley had left her Executrix and co-partner in his fortunes with their sole child, a daughter. Charter-house, evidence-house.

(g) Dom. Carthuf. p. 50. by Sam. Herne. edit. 1677. Svo.

(h) This was by private contract, no public office nor commissioner for this purpose being at that time established.

(i) Cotton Library, Julius, F.VI. 107.

(9) Gen. Hist. of England.

(10) Camden's Britannia, in Northumberland.

(11) Bearcroft's Hist. Account, &c. p. 3.

(12) Camden and Stow's Annals for 1573, and Churchyard's Poems.

(13) In his Survey of London, edit. by Strype, Vol. 1. p. 3. and 17.

(5) Register of the bishopric of Lincoln.

(6) Mr Sutton's legacy, in his will, of a hundred marks to his cousin William, son of Sir Richard Stapleton, and letters of the widow of this Sir Richard, dated from Carleton. Charter-house evidence-house.

(7) Historical Account, p. 106.

(8) Gen. Hist. of England.

(*) Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, Mr Sutton's first master.

(1) Mr Herne in Domus Carthusiana, p. 52. makes Mr Sutton to have married the Lady Popham, (and so to have enjoyed the wealth of the great rich Popham,) which mistake was apparently occasioned by this marriage of his wife's daughter to Lord Chief Justice Popham's son.

(14) Welwood's Memoirs, p. 9, 10. and Burnet's Hist. of his own times, Vol. I. p. 313.

(15) In this Work, under Sir Tho. Gresham's article, Vol. IV. p. 2385, in remark [G].

(16) Historical Account, p. 12.

(17) Stow's Survey, Vol. I. B. p. 217.

(18) Historical Account, &c. p. 14, 15.

(19) Camden's Britannia, in Cambridgeshire.

said to have been a Commissioner for Prizes under Lord Charles Howard (k), High Admiral of England, and going to sea with Letters of Marque, he took a Spanish ship worth twenty thousand pounds. In 1590 having married his wife's daughter, by Mr Dudley, to Francis Popham Esq; son and heir to the Lord Chief Justice of that name (l), being himself without issue, and past all hopes of children by Mrs Sutton, he contracted his great dealings into so narrow a compass as permitted him to quit London [I], and to reside at one or other of his country seats, for he had purchased several good estates. On the 27th of May, 1594, he surrendered his Patent of Master of the Ordnance in the North (m), and on the 20th of June following he conveyed in trust all his estates in Essex to found an Hospital at Hallingbury-Bouchers in that county, but with a power of revocation during his life. On the 17th of December the same year he also made his Will [K], wherein, among other dispositions, he bequeathed to Queen Elizabeth two thousand pounds, 'in recompence of his oversights, careless dealings, and forgetfulness in her Majesty's service;' and there is a remarkable instance of his charity to his poor neighbours the following year [L]. On the 17th of June, 1602, he buried his Lady, who died at Balsam in Cambridgeshire [M]. Hitherto he had lived in a munificent open hospitality [N], but this loss depriving him of England had thence time to prepare for the reception of the Invincible Armada (14). Mr Sutton was at this time the chief and richest merchant in London, and, considering his obligations to the Crown, together with his known loyalty, no doubt can be made but he was also the chief of those merchants who drained the bank of Genoa, according to a strong tradition which prevails at Charter-house. The truth of this story has indeed been called in question (15), as being inconsistent with the account that the storeships provided for this expedition by the Spaniards were burnt on their coasts by a fleet sent for that purpose under the command of Sir Francis Drake. But this is far from being irreconcilable to the former account; and it is hoped the Reader will excuse a censure, which he must needs see has been too hastily passed, though certainly not with any thought of heightening the just renown of the Founder of the Royal Exchange, by an insinuation that he had not a rival in the Founder of the Charter-house, in making his wealth serviceable to the Crown and Kingdom by draining the foreign banks.

[I He quitted London] Though the lease of his large house at Broken Wharf did not expire till 1599 (16), yet it is certain he had quitted it in 1594. For Stow thus continues the description of it; 'Within the gate of this house (now belonging to the city of London) lately, to wit in the years 1594 and 1595, is builded one large house, of great height, called an engine, made by Bevis Bullmar, gentleman, for the conveying and forcing of Thames-water, to serve in the middle and west parts of the city (17).'

[K He made his will.] In this will he gave 3000 l. to build his intended hospital and free-school, as also twenty scholarships to Peter-house, and twenty scholarships to Jesus-college in Cambridge, of 50 s. per annum each, and ten fellowships to each of them, of 5 l. per annum each, and as to the rest, much the same legacies as in his last will. The reason of Mr Sutton's favour to Peter-house in this will was his friendship with Dr Perne, Master of that college, who was also Rector of Balsam, the manor of which Mr Sutton at that time held by a lease from his friend, Bishop Cox. And though this benefaction never took place, yet from these words of Dr Perne's Will, dated Feb. 25, 1588, 'Item, I give 20 l. towards building the East end of Peter-house, with a fair gate in the middle, like unto St John's gate-house, with the help of my Lord of Canterbury (Dr Whitgift), Mr Smith, Mr Sutton of Asheton, Sir Walter Dixie, and Sir Thomas Ramfaye.' Mr Sutton, I say, by this passage, appears to have been a benefactor to Peterhouse, since we find him in deeds about this time styling himself of Asheton, as he did afterwards of Balsam, and lastly of Castle-camps, after the purchase of that noble manor (18), which was the ancient seat of the Veres, Earls of Oxford, held by Hugh Vere (says the old Inquisition record) that he might be Chamberlain to the King. However it is most certain, that Henry I. granted this office to Aubrey de Vere in these words, 'Chief Chamberlain of England in fee, and hereditary, with all the powers, privileges, and honours belonging thereto, with as much freedom and worship as Robert Mallet had it (19).'

[L A remarkable instance of his charity.] This year, 1595, our Historians observe, that grain was sold at such an excessively dear rate, as occasioned several commotions among the people. In this exigency, Mr Sutton took order to have such of his poor neighbours as were industrious supplied with corn for their families, very much under the market price. As a proof of this, his historian has given us the following note of his own hand-writing to his steward.

Corn to be sold to the labouring poor of Balsam, now barley is at 2 s. 8 d. per bushel, for thirty weeks.

John Symonds, by the Week, half a bushel, 6 d.

And thus did he proceed through all his poor neighbours, to the number of forty-nine, allotting to each their portion according to their family wants (20).

[M He lost his lady.] In a letter to Mr Sutton from Balsam, May 30, this year, she complained of a violent cold, and that she was never worse in her life (21). Her bowels were buried at Balsam, and the corpse, embalmed, brought to their house at Stoke-Newington, and thence carried in a handsome funeral procession to the parish-church, attended by her relations, and forty poor women, housekeepers in Newington and Hackney, and sixteen servants, all in mourning (22). It was deposited with her first husband, Mr Dudley, in a vault near which, against the South wall of the church, she had raised a noble marble monument, with the figure of Mr Dudley in armour, and of herself, and, behind her, of her daughter, all on their knees, with Latin epitaphs, to be seen in Stow (23). As there are several evidences in Charter-house of her good-nature, charity, and discretion, so Mr Sutton appears to have had a great value for her. In his first will, executed in her lifetime, he made a very large and ample provision for her, and addresses himself to Queen Elizabeth, 'humbly beseeching her to stand a good and gracious Lady to his poor wife.' She had the honour, in the time of Mr Dudley, to be well known to, and even to have received visits from the Queen: in one of which her Majesty, taking a jewel of great value from her hair, made a present of it to their daughter, Miss Anne Dudley (24). Mr Sutton also, in his last will, bequeathed to this daughter's husband, Sir Francis Popham, Knt. the sum of two thousand marks. As also to Frances, Mary, Elizabeth, Jane, and Anne, daughters of the Lady Anne Popham, 100 l. a-piece, to be paid at the day of their marriage, or when they should accomplish the age of eighteen years. He also left to the wife and children of John Gardiner, his late wife's nephew, 100 marks, to be equally divided amongst them.

[N] Mr Burrel observes, that Mr Sutton's house was an open hospital while his wife lived; and, as an instance of it, Dr Bearcroft has given us a transcript of the following letter from her to Mr Sutton.

' Good Mr Sutton,
' I send you here inclosed a letter from John Hutton, which came by the Carrier; and all is well at Balsam,
' I thank God: and here is another letter, which I opened before I looked on the superscription, which came by another; it toucheth a widow, wherefore I need not to write to you in her behalf, for I know you have great care of the poor for God's cause, though she were a meer stranger. I send here a Note for Lenten stores; if you intend to stay here this Lent, you must increase it for Haberdeen and Lynge; and so praying God blefs us both, I commit you to his keeping.

' Your Loving

' Obedient Wife,

' Elizabeth Sutton.'

Newington,
Jan. 27,
1600.

*Twenty great Eeles.
Four Salmons, good and great.*

A barrel

(m) The resignation was made in the Court of Chancery. Sexta pars Patentium, &c. in the Appendix to the Hist. Account, &c. p. 214.

(20) Historical Account, p. 16.

(21) Charter-house evidence-house.

(22) Historical Account, p. 17.

(23) Stow's Survey, by Strype, Vol. II. Circuit walk, p. 131.

(24) Mr Dudley was apparently a relation to the Earl of Leicester, for whom Queen Elizabeth is said to have had a particular affection. Gen. Hist. of England.

(a) Mr Burrel calls it the loss of his most valuable Jewel in the world. Commemoration Sermon, P. 23.

that which gave every thing else its chief relish (n), he retired more from the world, and lessening his family by the dismissal of several of his servants (o), he lived in a private frugal manner, being resolved to dispose of his great estate in some important Charity [O]. But before he had fixed upon any particular plan for carrying that design into execution, he was greatly alarmed in the year 1608 with the news of a design to raise him to the Peerage, in the view of laying him thereby under an obligation to make King Charles I, then Duke of York, his Heir. Upon the first notice that came to his ears of this project, he immediately put a stop to it [P]; and having received a letter from Mr Joseph Hall (afterwards Bishop of Norwich) exciting him to come to some determination in his intended Charity [Q],

(o) No less than sixteen attended the Funeral of his Wife in mourning. Hist. Account, p. 154.

*A barrel of Lowborne Herrings, of the bigger boyle.
Forty Stockfish, good, and ready beaten.
A cade of Sprats and a cade of red Herrings, them that be good.*

Six pounds of Figs, and three pounds of Jordan almonds (25).

[O] He resolved upon some important charity.] To this purpose it is attested by Dr Fuller, as what he could confidently affirm from the mouth of one that heard it of a credible witness, who heard it himself, and told it the Doctor; 'That Mr Sutton used often to repair into a private garden, where he poured forth his prayers to God, and was frequently overheard to use this expression; Lord, thou hast given me a large and liberal estate, give me also a heart to make use thereof (26).'

We have already mentioned his resolution to be bountiful before the death of his wife: and from the year 1594 to the act of parliament for an hospital in 1610, there was a deed of gift always subsisting for one, but with a power of revocation: and his constant reply to them that asked him, how he would dispose of his great estate, was, that his bread must be cast upon the waters (27), but he could not easily determine when or how; he had various projects of his own and of his friends to ruminate on (28).

[P] He immediately put a stop to it.] The project was laid before King James by Sir John Harrison, who had proposed it to Mr Sutton; but as soon as he heard what was doing at court, he dispatched the following letter to the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, and the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, both feoffees for his intended hospital.

' May it please your Lordships,

' I understand that his Majesty is possessed by Sir John Harrington, or by some other by his means, that I intend to make his Highness's son, the Duke of Yorke, my heir; whereupon, as it is reported, his Highness proposeth to bestow the honour of a Baron on me; whereof as I am most unworthy, so I vow to God and your Lordships, I never harboured the least thought or proud desire of any such matter. My mynde, in my younger times, hath been ever free from ambition; and, now I am going to my Grave, to gape for such a thing were meer dotage in me, so unworthie also, as I confesse unto your Lordships. That this Knight hath been often tampering with me to that purpose, to entertayne honour, and to make the noble Duke my heire, is true; to whom I made that answer, as, had he either wit or honestie, (with reverence to your Lordships be it spoken) he never would have engaged himself in this business, so egregiously to delude his Majesty, and wrong me. My humble suite unto your Lordships is, that, considering this occasion hath brought me into question, and in hazard of his Highness's displeasure, having never given Sir John Harrington, or any man lyvinge, either promise or semblance to do any such act, but upon his motions grew into utter dislike with him for such idle speeches, your Lordships will vouchsafe me this favour, to informe his Highness aright, how things have proceeded directly without my privitie; and withall, that my trust is in his gracious disposition, not to conceit the worfe of me for other men's follies; but that I may have free liberty, with his Princely leave, wherein I rest most assured, to dispose of my own, as other his Majesty's loyal subjects. And so, most humbly recommending my duty and service to your Lordships, for the increase of whose honours and happiness I shall ever pray, I rest,

' Your Lordship's
' Poor Beadesman,
' Thomas Sutton.'

Dr Bearcroft has likewise given a transcript of the following letter to Mr Sutton from Sir John Harrington, VOL. VI. No. CCCXXII.

which both fixes the time of the affair, and throws full light into it. It is dated June 13, 1608, and runs thus:

' Sir,

' Your strange message, first by my Man, after by my Son, now seconded with your speech to myself, did greatly trouble me, That I have undone you, overthrow your estate, disturbed your designs; that no man dare buy any land of you, be your Feoffee, nor take any trust from you, so as that which you had ordained to good uses, and to redeem your sins, was now so incombered, as you were skant master of your own; and all by means of a bruit among your friends, raised, as you suppose, by me, that you have made Duke Charles your Heir, and the King your Executor.

' Far be it from me to abuse or misreport either so princelie and pious an intention, as I know his Majestie hath to further all good works, or so godlie a purpose, as you pretend to do some; but God cannot be mocked, though we may dissemble with men.

' The letter is still extant, which was my warrant. I have spoken nothing but within compass of that, and that very sparinglie to your private friends. In which letter, seeing you yourself would needs in your sense read a Caveat, to refuse honour because of age, which, in my construction, was an encouragement to take the honour due to your abilities and years; I have been since, and will be silent about it. For the suite you would make to his Majestie, which I shall not so much as guess at, I will say what I thinke: you will make no suite but such as will find favour and expedition; and, seeing you suppose I wronged you before, I would be glad to make you any amends now, by any endeavour of mine. Onlie my old suite you may not forget, to be a Benefactor to Bath (*) Church in your life time; for Almes in one's life time is like a light borne before one, whereas Almes after death is like a candle carried behind one. Do somewhat for this church; you promised to have seen it e're this: Whensoever you will go to bathe, my lodgings shall be at your commandment. The Baths would strengthen your sinews; the Alms would comfort your soule.

' The Tower, the Quayre, and two Isles are already finisht by Mr Billet, Executor to the worthie Lord Treasurer Burleigh. The walls are up ready for covering.

' The leade is promised by our bountiful Bishop, Dr Montagu. Timber is promised by the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Hartford, the Lord Say, Mr Robert Hopton, and others.

' There lacks but monie for workmanship, which if you would give, you should have many good prayers in the Church now in your life time, when they may indeed do you good, and when the time is to make friends of the mammon of iniquity, as Christ told us, that we may be received into everlasting tabernacles, to which God send us; to whose protection I leave you, &c.

' From Greenwich this
' 15th day of June,
' 1608.'

' John Harrington (29).'

(29) Charter-house evidence-house.

I don't find that Mr Sutton complied with this last request; which indeed could not be expected by Sir John Harrington, who had given him so much offence by his impertinently forward application to the King.

[Q] A Letter from Bishop Hall, &c.] This letter is penned with such admirable force, and masterly spirit, as will amply reward the Reader's patience for the length of it, as follows:

' Sir,

' I trouble you not with reasons of my writing, or with excuses; if I do ill, no plea can warrant me; if 42 X
' well,

(p) Historical Account &c. p. 34, in the Appendix to which the Act is inserted, p. 215 to 228.

he soon after, on the 10th of March 1609, petitioned the King in Parliament for an Act to empower him to erect an Hospital at the aforementioned Hallingbury-Bouchers (p) in Essex.

well, I cannot be discouraged with any censures. I crave not your pardon, but your acceptation: it is no presumption to give good counsel, and presents of love fear not to be ill taken of strangers: my pen and your substance are both given us for one end, to do good: these are our talents, how happy are we if we can improve them well! suffer me to do you good with the one, with the other you may do good to many, and most to yourself. You cannot but know, that your full hand, and worthy purposes, have filled the world with much expectation: what speak I of the world, whose honest and reasonable claims yet cannot be contemned with honour, nor disappointed without dishonour! The God of Heaven, who hath lent you this abundance, and given you these gracious thoughts of charity, of piety, looks for the issue of both; and will easily complain of too little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are both good; but the first is only made good by the second; for if your hand were full and your heart empty, we who now applaud you, should justly pity you; you might have riches, not goods, not blessings; your burthen should be greater than your estate, and you should be richer in sorrow, than in metals. For (if we look to no other world) what gain is it to be keeper of the best earth? that which is the common Coffer of all the rich Mines, we do but tread upon, and account it vile, because it doth but hold and hide those treasures; whereas the skilfullest metallist, that findeth and refineth those precious veins for public use, is rewarded: the very basest element yields gold. The savage Indian gets it; the servile Apprentice works it; the very Midianitish Camel may wear it; the miserable Worldling admires it; the covetous Jew swallows it; the unthrifty Russian spends it; what are all these the better for it? Only good use gives praise to earthly possessions: herein therefore you owe more to God, that He hath given you a heart to do good; a will to be as rich in good works as great in riches; to be a friend to this mammon is to be an enemy to God; but to make friends with it is Royal and Christian: His enemies may be wealthy, none but his friends can either be good, or do good: Do et Accipe, saith the Wise Man.

The Christian, who must imitate that high pattern of his Creator, knows his best riches to be bounty. God who hath all, gives all; and reserves nothing: and for himself, he well considers, that God hath not made him an Owner, but a Servant; and a Servant of Servants, not of his Goods, but of the Giver: not a Treasurer, but a Steward, whose praise is more to have laid out well, than to have received much. The greatest gain therefore that he affects, is an even reckoning, a clear discharge: which since it is obtained by disposing, not by keeping, he counts reservation loss, and just expence his trade and joy. He knows that Well done faithful servant is a thousand times more sweet a note, than Soul take thine ease; for that is the voice of the Master recompensing, this of the Servant presuming; and what follows to the one but his Master's joy? and what to the other but the loss of his soul? Blessed be that God who hath given you a heart to forethink this, and in this dry and dead age, a will to honour him with his own, and to credit his Gospel with your beneficence. Lo! we are upbraided with bareness: your name hath been publickly opposed to these challenges, as in whom it shall be seen, that the truth hath friends that can give. I neither distrust nor persuade you, whose resolutions are happily fixed on purposes of good; only give me leave to hasten your pace a little, and to excite your Christian forwardness to begin speedily, what you have long and constantly vowed. You would not but do good, why not now? I speak boldly, the more speed the more comfort; neither are the times in our disposal, nor our selves.

If God had fet us a day, and made our wealth inseparable, there were no danger in delaying; now our uncertainty either must quicken us, or may deceive us. How many have meant well, and done nothing, and lost the Crown with lingering? whose destinies have prevented their desires, and have made their good motions the Wards of their Executors, not without miserable success: to whom that they would have done good is not so great a praise, as it is dishonour, that they might have done it: their wrecks are our warnings; we are equally mortal, equally fickle. Why have you this respite of living, but to prevent the imperious necessity of death? It is a woful and remediless complaint, the end of our days hath overrun the beginning of our good works. Early beneficence hath no danger; many joys: for the conscience of good done, the prayers and blessings of the relieved, and the gratulations of saints, are so many perpetual Comforters, which can make our life pleasant, and our death happy; our evil days good, or good better: all these are but loss with delay; few and cold are the prayers for him that may give, and in lieu our good purposes forefolded, are become our Tormentors. Upon our death-bed, little difference is betwixt good deferred, and evil done: good was meant, who hindered it? will our conscience say; there was time enough, means enough, need enough, what hindered? Did fear of envy, distrust of want? alas! what bugs are these to frighten men from heaven; as if the envy of keeping were less than bestowing; as if God were not as good a Debtor, as a Giver. He that gives to the Poor lends to the Lord, says Solomon. If he freely gives us what we may lend, and grace to give, will he not much more pay us what we have lent? and give us because we have given? That is his bounty, this is his justice. O! happy is the man that may be a Creditor to his Master! Heaven and Earth shall empty, before he want a royal payment. If we dare not trust God while we live, how dare we trust men when we are dead? Men that are still deceitful, light upon the balance, light of truth, and heavy of self-love: how many Executors have proved the Executioners of honest Wills? how many have our eyes seen, that after most careful choice of trusty Guardians, have had their children and goods so disposed, as if the parent's soul could return to see it, I doubt whether it would be happy? how rare is that man, who prefers not himself to his dead friend, profit to truth? who will take no advantage of the impossibility of the account? Whatever therefore men either shew, or promise, happy is that man, that may be his own Auditor, Supervisor, Executor: as you love God and yourself, be not afraid of being happy too soon.

I am not worthy to give so bold advice, let the Wise Man of Sirach speak for me; do good before thou die, and according to thine ability stretch out thine hand, and give: defraud not thyself of thy good day; and let not the portion of thy good desires pass over thee. Shalt thou not leave thy travels to another, and thy labours to them that will divide thy heritage? Or let a Wiser than he speak, viz. Solomon: Say not to morrow I will give, if thou now have it: for thou knowest not what a day will bring forth. It hath been an old rule of liberality, he gives twice, who gives quickly; whereas slow benefits argue uncheerfulness, and lose their worth, who lingers his receipts, is condemned as unthrifty; he who knoweth both saith, It is better to give than to receive. If we are of the same spirit, why are we hasty in the worst, and slack in the better? Suffer yourself, good Sir, for God's sake, for the Gospel's sake, for the Church's sake, for your Soul's sake, to be stirred up by these poor lines to a resolute and speedy performing of your worthy intentions: and take this as a loving invitation sent from Heaven by an unworthy messenger. You cannot deliberate long of fit objects for your beneficence, except it be more for multitude than want: the streets, yea the world is full. How doth Lazarus lie at every door? How many sons of the Prophets in their meanly provided colleges, may say not mors in olla, but fames? How many Churches may justly plead that which our Saviour bad his disciples, The Lord hath need? And if this infinite store hath made your choice doubtful, how easy were it to shew you, wherein you might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and make your memorial both eternal and blessed, or if you had rather, the whole commonwealth.

But now I find myself too bold, and too busy, in thus looking to particularities. God shall direct you, and if you follow him, shall crown you. Howsoever, if good be done, and that betimes, he hath what he desired, and your soul shall have more than you can desire. The success of my weak, yet hearty counsel,

Essex [R]. The Petition was accordingly granted, but in a little time changing his mind as to the situation, he purchased of the Earl of Suffolk Howard-house, or the late dissolved Charter-house near Smithfield [S], for the sum of thirteen thousand pounds, where he founded the present Hospital of Charter-house in 1611 (q). He designed to be himself the first Master of it; but soon after the grant, being seized with a slow fever, and perceiving his end to approach, he hastened, and by a deed, dated on the 30th of October that year, nominated the Reverend John Hutton, Master of Arts, and Vicar of Littlebury in Essex, to ‘ counsel, shall make me as rich, as God hath made

‘ you with all your abundance.

‘ God bless it to you, and make both our reckonings clear-
‘ ful in the day of our common Audit.’

Dr Bearcroft observes (30) that Mr Sutton received this truly Christian letter most kindly, and when he had well considered it, thinking he perceived the finger of Heaven in it, he blessed God for the return of his prayer, in the garden, and determined to quicken his pace; and soon after, viz. on the 10th day of March, 1609, petitioned the King, as is mentioned above, which date is certainly right; but the Doctor did not sufficiently advert, that Mr Hall's letter, which preceded it, could not therefore be written, as he had said before, when that worthy Divine was of Waltham in Essex, who was not presented to that living till the year 1612 (31).

[R] Hallingbury-Bouckers, in Essex.] It is sometimes called Little Hallingbury, and is now part of Charter-house possessions. It is twenty-five miles from London, and three from Bishop-Stortford, on the borders of Hertfordshire, from which it is divided by the Lesser Stower, a very pleasant and healthy situation. Dr Fisb, who was presented by Mr Sutton to the Rectory in 1610 (32), lived to have it put under sequestration for malignancy, by the House of Commons, in 1644, and to enjoy it again on the Restoration, and died possessed of it, in 1669, in a good old age.

[S] The late dissolved Charter-house near Smithfield.] The first foundation of this house may be said to have had its rise from Dr Ralph Stratford, Bishop of London, who, upon the breaking out of the plague in the year 1347, purchased three acres of land, lying without the walls of London on the North part, between the lands of the Abbot of Westminster and of the Prior of St John of Jerusalem, and inclosed them with a brick wall, and consecrated the ground for a burial-place for the poor and needy. Whereupon, as the plague raged with greater violence in 1349, Sir Walter de Manny, in imitation of the Bishop's pious example, purchased, of the Master and Brethren of St Bartholomew Spittle, a piece of ground called Spittle-croft, containing thirteen acres and a rod, contiguous to those three acres lately dedicated for a burial-ground by the Bishop of London, and caused it to be consecrated by that Prelate to the same use; and there were buried in that year more than fifty thousand corpses in these thirteen acres and a rod of ground (33). Sir Walter built a chapel soon after, called New Church Haw, for masses for their souls, intending to add a college, with a Superior and twelve Chaplains, and obtained a bull of Pope Clement VI. for the uniting of three ecclesiastical benefices, not exceeding the value of 100l. sterling in the book of tenths, for the more ample endowment thereof. But, going abroad soon after to the wars, these thirteen acres and a rod, together with the chapel, were purchased of him by Dr Stratford's successor in the see of London, Michael de Northburgh, who also at his death bequeathed 2000l. for the founding, building, and finishing a convent of Carthusians there, and all his leases whatsoever, for the space of four years, and all his rents and tenements within the city of London, some few excepted, and all his reversions there whatsoever for ever, for the better endowment thereof; and to the Convent, when finished, his two best silver basons for the service of the altar, and a silver pyx enamelled for the host, as also a silver vessel for holy water, and a silver bell, together with his two best vestments to officiate in, and all his divinity books. In the mean time Sir Walter de Manny advancing in years, the hero reassumed the saint, and, with the consent of the Bishop of London, to whom Michael de Northburgh bequeathed the patronage and care of his foundation, took on him the care of erecting and endowing a double monastery of Carthusians in New Church Haw in 1371, to be called The House of the salutation of the mother of God (34). He likewise gives the three acres adjoining, consecrated by Bishop Stratford, for the burial-ground, of which it seems he had obtained a grant. The donation was confirmed by a bull of Pope Urban VI. on the 12th of December, 1378 (35). The words of the bull are, Bonæ memoriæ Michael Episcopus Londinensis & idem miles [Walter de Manny] conventum duplicem monachorum ordinis Carthusiensis fundaverunt. The Reader may see an account in Frofsard of Sir Walter de Manny, who was a native and Lord of the town of Manny in the province of Hainault, and attended Philippa of Hainault into England, on her marriage with King Edward III; who in the fifth year of his reign knighted him, granting him robes out of the great wardrobe as a Banneret, and afterwards made him a Peer of the realm, and a Privy Counsellor, and Knight of the Garter (36). He died in the latter end of the year 1371: King Edward and his royal family of heroes, with the nobility, honoured the funeral with their presence, attending the corpse to the chapel of the new erected Carthusian monastery (37), where it was solemnly interred in the midst of the choir, and an alabaster tomb, like that of Sir John Beauchamp's at St Paul's, by his own appointment erected for him: by his will, bearing date Nov. 30, 1371, he bequeathed an old debt of 1000l. due to him from the King, and the moiety of 100l. per annum, due to him for many years past from the Prince of Wales, as Governor of Hardelagh-castle, for the better endowment of the monastery. The co-founder of which, Michael de Northburgh, was originally a Dominican Fryar, and became Chaplain and Confessor to King Edward III, as also one of his Council, and attended on his Majesty at the taking of the city of Caen, the famous battle of Cressy, and the taking of Calais (38). On the death of Dr Stratford in 1354, he was advanced to the see of London, which he enjoyed till the ninth of September, 1361, when he died of the plague at Coptford in Essex (39); and in his will, bearing date May 23d preceding, besides his legacy already mentioned for the foundation of the monastery, he bequeathed a thousand marks, to be put into a chest standing in the Treasury of St Paul's, London, out of which any poor man might, for a sufficient pledge, borrow 10l. the Dean and principal Canons 20l. or as far as forty marks, the Bishop of London 40l. a nobleman or citizen 20l. for one year: but if the money was not then returned, the preacher at St Paul's cross was to give notice, that the pledge for it would be sold within fourteen days, if not redeemed in the mean time, and the surplusage, if any, to be returned to the owner (40). Mr Sutton's gift of 1000l. to the chamber of London (41) seems to be done in imitation of this bequest of his predecessor in the first foundation of Charter-house; which being dissolved by Henry VIII, the site was granted on the 12th of June, 1542, unto John Bridges and Thomas Hall for their joint lives, in consideration of the safe keeping of the King's tents and pavilions, &c. which had been then for some time there; but on the 4th of April, 1545, it was given to Sir Edward North, Chancellor of the court of Augmentations in perpetuity, and valued in the grant at 50l. per annum (42). Sir Edward was made a Baron by Queen Mary in the first year of her reign, and Queen Elizabeth, on her accession to the throne, did his Lordship the honour to reside for some days at Charter-house, where his Lordship died Dec. 31, 1564; whereupon his son Roger, Lord North, sold Charter-house to the Duke of Norfolk for 2500l. on the 31st of May following, except that part on the East side of the chapel, which was then the mansion-house of Lord North, and is now Rutland-court, and the houses adjoining on to Goswel-street. The Duke of Norfolk made Charter-house his residence in town, till his commitment to the Tower in 1569 (43), whence being enlarged in 1570, he was remitted to Charter-house, but under custody; and being sent again to the Tower in 1571, was tried, condemned, and beheaded in 1572, for high-treason (44); but, his family being restored in blood and to the estate, Charter-house came again to the share of Lord Thomas Howard, the Duke's second son, but eldest by his second Dutches, Margaret, daughter of Lord Audley. On the accession of King James II, this Lord Thomas Howard was created Earl of Suffolk; and of him Mr Sutton bought Charter-house.

(35) Mr Herne, in Domus Carthusiana, Mr Newcourt, in his Repertorium, and Mr Stevens in Continuation of the Monasticon, mistaking the author of this bull to be Pope Urban V, ascribe the foundation entirely to Walter de Manny, without mentioning Bishop Michael.

(36) Dugdale's Baron. Vol. II. p. 149.

(37) Weaver's Funeral Monuments.

(38) Robert de Avesbury, who recites letters of Michael, giving an account of these three actions, p. 136, et seqq. the last letter bears date Sept. 14, 1346.

(39) Godwin de Presul, p. 244.

(40) Dugdale's Hist. of St Paul's, p. 34.

(41) See remark [U]

(42) The annual revenues at the dissolution amounted to 642l. 4s. 6d. 13 Ma. pars patentium 36 Henry VIII. m. 29.

(43) Camden's Annals, Eliz. 1569.

(44) State Trials, Duke of Norfolk, Vol. I. p. 104.

(1) The Letters Patents with licence of mortmain bear date June 22 that year. It is inserted in Hist. Account, p. 37 to 72.

(30) Hist. Account, p. 34.

(31) See Bishop Hall's article.

(32) With these memorable words: What I desire in return is your prayers, and the due performance of your office. Hist. Account &c. p. 35.

(33) This appeared from a Stone Cross, some time standing in Charter-house yard, with this inscription, A. D. MCCCXLIX. Regnante magna pestilentia consecratum fuit hoc Cæmeterium in quo & infra septa præsentis Monasterii sepulta fuerunt mortuorum corpora plusquam quinquaginta millia; præter alia multa abhinc usque ad præsens, Quorum animabus propitiatur Deus. Amen.

(34) His charter bears date March 28, anno regni Edwardi Tertii 45. It is preserved in Charter-house evidence-house, from which a copy is printed in the Hist. Account, p. 167, et seqq.

that Post. On the first of November he signed an irrevocable deed of gift of the Estates specified in the Letters Patents to the Governors in trust for the Hospital [T]. On the second of that month he made his last Will, wherein he bequeathed several other considerable benefactions [U]; after which, his fever still encreasing, put a period to his life on the 12th of December following, in the seventy-ninth year of his age (r). He expired at his house in Hackney near London, and his bowels were buried in that parish church; but his body was embalmed and kept in his house till the 28th of May, 1612, when it was conveyed with the most solemn procession to Christ-Church in London [W], and deposited there, whence it was brought, on the shoulders of the poor brethren of his foundation, to Charter-house chapel, the building and all other things being ready for the complete establishment of the Hospital (s), on the 12th of December, 1614, the Anniversary of Mr Sutton's birth, and

(s) Which consisted of a Master, a Preacher, a Schoolmaster and Usher, forty Scholars, eighty Pensioners, with a Steward, Receiver, Register, Porter, Gardiner, and other necessary inferior servants. Hist. Account, p. 155 to 160.

(r) The Inscription on his monument in Remark [X].

[T] The Estates settled upon the Hospital, &c. We shall give a list of them as follows. In Cambridgeshire, the manors of Balsam and Castle-Camps. In Essex, the manors of Southminster, Hallingbury-Bouchers, Cold-Norton, and Much-Stumbridge. In Lincolnshire, the manors of Dunsby and Buslingthorp. In Wiltshire, the manors of Salthrop, Blackgrove, Chilton, Elcombe, Watlescote and Uffcot. In Middlesex, a messuage and lands in Hackney and Tottenham. No exact rental of these lands of that time, is now to be found; but if we will take the word of Lord Chief Justice Coke (45), a Feoffee, and a chief Director of the foundation of the Hospital, these lands, now part of its possessions, produced then per ann. 3500 l.; to which, if we add, in Essex, the manors of Littlebury and Hadstock bequeathed to the Earl of Suffolk, on the payment of 10000 l. In Lancashire, the manor of Tarbocke, and the impropriate Rectory of Huyton, left by Mr Sutton to descend to his Heir at Law, and which cost 9300 l. In Lincolnshire, the impropriate Rectory of Glentham, a Lease bequeathed to the Poor of the City of Lincoln. In Yorkshire, Lands in Cottingham, a Lease bequeathed to the Poor of the town of Beverly. Which computed together, at 1500 l. per ann. make Mr Sutton's Estate in land at his death to amount to 5000 l. per ann. To which add, paid for Charter-house, 13000 l. Received from the personal estate, 47410 l. 9 s. 9 d. We have a view of Mr Sutton's whole fortune. In land, per ann. 5000 l. Total in money, 60410 l. 9 s. 9 d. The greatest Estate in the possession of any private Gentleman, till these present times, when the Indian wealth dispersed through Europe, the public funds, Paper credit, and other modern methods, have given some persons opportunities of amassing prodigious riches.

[U] His last Will. It is very long, occasioned by the prodigious number of legacies bequeathed in it. The first of which is 10 l. to each of Bishop Cox's children, then living, manifestly in gratitude for the kindness of that Bishop, who, as is observed above, was the worthy Patron of his youth. And this was apparently the true reason of another, of 500 marks to Jesus College in Cambridge, which bears a particular relation to the Bishopric of Ely. Besides that, Dr Dupont, son-in-law to Bishop Cox, was then Master thereof. The College purchased with this legacy the impropriate Rectory, with the perpetual advowson of the Vicarage of Elmstead (46) near Colchester in Essex. Mr Sutton left another legacy of 500 l. for the promotion of learning, to Magdalen-College, in the same University. This being a Lincolnshire College, the county in which he was born, the benefaction is thus entered in the College-register, "A. D. 1615. Thomas Sutton Esquire, Founder of Sutton's Hospital in London, gave the College 500 l. towards the purchasing an Inn in Cambridge, which, with the addition of 160 l. from the College, was laid out in the purchase of the White Bull Inn, then valued at 40 l. per ann." He likewise bequeathed 1000 l. to the Treasury, or chamber of the City of London, to be lent yearly to ten young merchant men, not having any great stock of their own; that is, to each 100 l. without paying any thing for the same, to be chosen by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and the Dean of St Paul's, for the time being; so that none have, or continue the said 100 l. above one year. There is another legacy of 100 l. to the poor Fishermen of Ostend. The motive to which would have been very puzzling, had not Dr Bearcroft cleared it up from a passage in Mr Sutton's former Will, made in 1695, in which are these words: Also I give to the Fishermen of the town of Ostend in the Low Countries, in recompence of two prizes, viz. fly-boats laden with barrelled cod, salt, and other things, which I bought at Newcastle upon Tyne about the sixteenth year of the Queen's Majesty's (Elizabeth's) reign, of the Prince of Orange's

Captains, two hundred pounds. I desire the same men, or their children, to have the same, if the true Owners may be found out, if not, then I will the same two hundred pounds to be given among the poorest Fishermen of that town. Mr Sutton, it is plain from this account, came fairly by these prizes, having bought them of the men that had taken them in open war; but however, he was now willing the poor sufferers, if it might be, should taste of his bounty, and have some amends for their loss: The Doctor also observes, that the sum is lessened to 100 l. in his last Will, by reason that Ostend had then been lately reduced to almost an heap of rubbish and sand in the famous three years siege thereof, and so many of the inhabitants destroyed, that Mr Sutton doubted, that there were but a very few of the poor Fishermen left, and therefore ordered, that if there should not be found a competent number of them to receive the 100 l. some other of the poorer sort of inhabitants should come in for shares. We must not omit another legacy of 20000 l. which was bequeathed to his Trustees to be disposed of according to their discretion. Whereupon these Trustees (Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, and Andrews Bishop of Ely) by a letter (47) dated at Lambeth, June 26, 1613 (48), directed his Executors (Richard Sutton of London Esq; and John Law a Proctor in the Arches) to pay 10000 l. into the receipt of the King's Exchequer, towards repairing Berwick bridge, by the help of which, that bridge, then intirely decayed, was rebuilt. Mr Sutton also bequeathed 100 marks to the town of Berwick, to be distributed among the poor there, by the discretion of the chief Governor and Preacher for the time being, to be paid within one year after his decease. These, with the rest of the legacies to the number of upwards of threescore, amount at least to the sum of forty thousand pounds.

[W] A solemn procession, &c. The ceremonial was as follows. The Governors of the hospital; the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, George Abbot; the Lord Ellesmere, Lord Chancellor; the Bishop of London, Dr John King; Bishop of Ely, Dr Launcelot Andrews; the Lord Chief Justice Coke; Sir Henry Hobart, Attorney-General; Dr John Overall, Dean of St Paul's; Dr George Montaigne, Dean of Westminster; Henry Thoresby, Jeffery Nightingale, Richard Sutton, Esqrs; John Law, Thomas Browne, Gent. the Rev. Mr John Hutton, Master of the hospital; being met at the house in Hackney, where the corpse lay, elected Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, Lord Privy Seal, and Sir George Altham, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, Governors of the hospital, in the place of Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, Lord High Treasurer, and Sir Thomas Forster, one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, deceased; and Mr Thomas Heyward, a gentleman much employed by Mr Sutton in law matters, and whose wife is a legatee in his will, the Register of the hospital; and then, joining the Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir James Altham, Sir John Croke, Sir Francis Popham, and many other knights and gentlemen assembled there, after a handsome collation, they honoured the funeral with their presence. The procession was under the direction of Mr Camden, Clarencieux King at Arms (49). A hundred old men in black cloaks preceded the corpse; Mr Simon Baxter, Mr Sutton's only sister's eldest son, was chief Mourner; and then followed the Lords and Gentlemen, with their Attendance, all in mourning, through a vast croud of spectators, to Christ-Church, adjoining to Christ's hospital, in London, where the corpse was deposited, with the funeral service, to be removed to Charter-house when the chapel should be finished, and a vault and tomb prepared for it. The whole funeral expences, as appears from the executors accounts, amounted to 2228 l. 10 s. 3 d. of which the mourning cloth cost 1355 l. 2 s. 4 d. and the tomb 514 l. 19 s. 10 d. and 30 l. was given at the burial to the poor (50).

(47) The letter is in Charter-house Assembly-book, A. p. 347.

(48) That is, two years after his decease, he having desired in his Will, that every thing in it should be performed within that time.

(49) Who attended thereat with John Raven, Richmond Herald. Fun. Cert.

(50) Charter-house evidence-house.

there

(45) In the Preface to the Tenth Volume of his Reports.

(46) It is recorded by Dr Sherman thus: Thomas Sutton (Crassus ille Ar-miger) Fundator Domus Hospitalis vocate, The Charter-house, London, Rectoriam improprietam de Elmstead (Olim Portionem Monasterii S. Osi-thæ) juxta Colchesteriam Collegio dono dedit una cum perpetua advocacione Vicarii. Latin History of Jesus College, MS.

there interred in a vault on the north side, under a magnificent tomb, with an inscription [X], which is inserted below. In regard to his character: as to his person, he was strong-built and compact, of a middle stature, with a good complexion and agreeable mien; neither nice nor negligent in his apparel, but modest and clean, enjoying a good state of health till the decays of old age broke in upon it. His public character is seen in the course of this memoir. In his private character he was a very affectionate tender husband, an exact but kind master, a good natured honest man, sober and religious both at home and abroad, very compassionate and very grateful (t).

(t) Histor. Account, p. 207.

After his death his heir at law, Simon Baxter, Esq; [Y], attempted, by a forcible entry, to take possession of Charter-house, and laying claim to the whole Estate settled upon the Hospital, endeavoured to set aside the Donation: but after many proceedings at law, it was at length, by the verdict of the Grand Jury of the Judges of England, in 1613, found that the Foundation, Incorporation, and Endowment of the Hospital, was sufficient, good and effectual in law (u). The odium of this suit fell heavily upon Sir Francis, afterwards Lord Bacon [Z], who was then Solicitor-General, and the chief promoter of it (w): notwithstanding which, he was elected a Governor not many years afterwards (x).

(u) The case is in the tenth Vol. of Reports by Lord Coke.

(w) Perhaps in opposition to his Rival Lord Coke, who excited himself greatly in favour of the Donation.

[X] With an inscription. In these terms:

Sacred to the glory of God,
In grateful memory of
THOMAS SUTTON, Esq;

Here lieth buried the body of Thomas Sutton, late of Castle-Camps in the county of Cambridge, Esq; at whose only costs and charges this hospital was founded, and endowed with large possessions, for the relief of poor men and children: he was a gentleman born at Knayth in the county of Lincoln, of worthy and honest parentage; he lived to the age of seventy-nine years, and deceased the 12th of December, 1611.

The 12th of December is now, by order of the Governors, the commemoration-day, when, after morning service and a sermon in the chapel, there is a Latin oration in the hall, by one of the scholars, in praise of the founder.

[Y] Simon Baxter, Esq; He was Mr Sutton's nephew, being the eldest son of his only sister Dorothy, and therefore attended his funeral as chief Mourner. Mr Sutton by his will had left him an estate in Lancashire, which cost him 9300l. (51), besides a legacy of 300l. in money: but being soon reduced, partly by the expences of the law-suit, he sold the land estate to Sir Richard Molyneux, Bart. (52) of Seston in Lancashire, for 15000l. on the 20th of July, 1615, having received his legacy of 300l. before, viz. on the 16th of February, 1614.

[Z] Falls heavily upon my Lord Bacon. Mr Baxter, in a petition to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to procure him the payment of his legacy, declares, That, being seduced by wicked counsel, he yielded his consent to have his name used to bring an action against the hospital; by means whereof he had spent a great part of his estate, and was likely to pay great sums of money, for his seducers, in a manner to his undoing. And that Sir Francis Bacon was chief counsellor of Mr Baxter, is gathered from his being a professed enemy to this design of Mr Sutton, as is evident from a letter of advice which that great Lawyer wrote to King James on the breaking out of the dispute in law, which is very artfully calculated to interest his Majesty on his client Mr Baxter's side, by insinuating, that if he succeeded in his suit, all would be referred to his Majesty's good pleasure in these words: But if there be right and birthright planted in the heir, and not remediable by the courts of equity, and that right be submitted to your Majesty, whereby it is in your pleasure and grace what to do: then do I wish, that this rude mass, and chaos of a good seed, were directed rather to a solid merit and durable charity, than to a blaze of glory, that will but crack a little in talk, and quickly extinguish. Dr Tenison indeed remarks (53), that, as his Lordship did not manifest himself in this advice against the charity, but the manner of disposing it, so it was not well done of those who have publicly defamed him, by declaring their jealousies of bribery by the Heir. But, in answer to this, it is obvious, that in this address common prudence made such a conduct absolutely necessary, since otherwise it would have been too plain a discovery of his own mal-practice, and an exposing of himself to his Majesty. The Doctor observes, that the event shewed that his Lordship was mistaken, when he called it a sacrifice without fault: and it has been further vindicated against every particular article of the charge by Dr Bearcroft, who justly answers the conclusion of this advice, which is couched in these words: 'Thus have I briefly given my opinion touching the employment of this charity; whereby that mass of wealth, which was in the owner's hands little better than a stack or heap of muck (*), may be spread over your kingdom to many fruitful purposes, your Majesty planting and watering, and God giving the increase. If Mr Sutton's mass of wealth, says Dr Bearcroft, was a heap of muck (which by the way is but a coarse unfavourable expression to his Majesty, and very justly found fault with by an eminent critic) (54), how much more decent, and to what great advantage, does the thought appear in these beautiful lines of Mr Pope (55), (53) Introduction to Bacon's Remains, p. 68.

(*) Dr Tenison seems, for the sake of his Hero, to have slipped into the like abusive language against this benefaction, calling it an heap of alms.

(54) La maniere de bien penser dans ouvrage d'esprit.

(55) In his Poem on Riches.

' In heaps, like ambergris, a stink it lies;
' But, well disposed, is incense to the skies.

' It produced very good corn in that most judicious charity of furnishing all his poor neighbours at less than half price (56).' However, no doubt Mr Sutton, as a man, had his failings, of which the insinuation, in the close of this advice, of his being somewhat of a miser, may perhaps be thought not altogether without grounds, from his great privacy of life after the death of his Lady; which is not sufficiently palliated by saying he practised self-denial to give the more nobly away (57); since it may as well be retorted, that the self-denial proceeded from no such principle; it being evident that he was always much disposed to a sparing frugality; appointing his ordinary expences at first to the half of his income, and when that was much increased, to a third, and giving about an eighth in charity (58).

(56) See remark [L].

(57) Histor. Account, p. 154.

(58) Ibid. p. 153.

SWIFT [Dr JONATHAN], a polite writer of exquisite humour, in the present century, was descended from a younger branch of an ancient family of the name in Yorkshire [A], the last heir of which, Bernam Swift, Esq; was created, by King Charles I, a Peer of Ireland, with the title of Viscount Carlingford (a), on the 20th of March 1627; but dying without male issue, the title became extinct, and the family inheritance descending to his daughters [B], was thereby divided from the name of Swift for ever. Some of the younger branches,

[A] Descended from an ancient family in Yorkshire. We have this account of the family in Guillim (1). 'Godwin Swift, of Goodridge in the county of Hereford, Esq; of the society of Gray's-Inn, descended of the family of the Swifts in Yorkshire. The arms are, Or, a chevron nebule, argent and azure, between three bucks in full course, vert.' This bearing puts me in mind of the history of the family of the Greenbats in the Tatler (2), where the Dean's particular turn of wit and humour is so exactly hit off. One is the more apt to think that Mr Obadiah Greenhat had the three bucks vert in his eye, when Lord Orrery (3) is found observing, that our Dean had been himself the herald to blazon the dignity of his coat.

[B] By his daughter. There were two of these; one of whom married Robert Fielding, Esq; commonly

(2) Vol. II. No. 59.

(3) In his Remarks, p. 5. edit. 1752. 8vo.

(c) Lord Orrery's (now Earl of Cork) Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr Swift, p. 5. edit. 1753.

(d) Hawkesworth's Account, &c. p. 2.

(f) Her family was descended from Erick the Forester, who raised an army to oppose William the Conqueror, by whom he was vanquished, and afterwards made Commander of his Forces. Hawkesworth, p. 3.

(l) Hawkesworth, p. 3.

(4) Hawkesworth's account of the life of Jonathan Swift.

(5) Dr Swift's sketch of his own life.

(6) Hist. of the rebellion and civil wars, &c.

(*) He died in 1658.

(7) The grandmother of this gentleman, one of the wives of Godwin Swift, was heiress to Admiral Deane, whence Deane became a Christian name in the family. Hawkesworth, p. 2. in note *.

branches, from the same stem, distinguished themselves by their loyalty in the grand rebellion of 1641 (b), among whom was our Author's grandfather, the Reverend Mr Thomas Swift [C], who was possessed of a paternal estate near Ross at Goodrich in Herefordshire, of which place he was Vicar (c), and held also another Church-benefice (d). He married Mrs Elizabeth Dryden, aunt to John Dryden the Poet, and by her had ten sons and six daughters. Of the sons six survived him, Godwin, Thomas, Dryden, William, Jonathan, and Adam, who were all, except Thomas, bred to the law. Godwin, who was a Barrister of Gray's Inn, having married a relation of the old Marchioness of Ormond, was made Attorney-General to the old Duke in the Palatinate of Tiperary in Ireland. That kingdom was then nearly without Lawyers, by reason of the rebellion which had forced almost every man, of whatever condition, to take up arms, and made him a soldier. Godwin therefore resolved to attempt the acquisition of a fortune there, and the same motive induced his four brothers, who were Attorneys, to go with him. Godwin soon became wealthy, and the rest obtained somewhat more than a genteel competence, though Dryden and Jonathan (e), who died soon after their arrival, had little to bequeath. This last, at the age of about three and twenty, and before he went to Ireland, had married Mrs Abigail Erick of Leicestershire (f), who, about two years after, was left a widow, with one child, a daughter, and pregnant with another. She had brought her husband but a small fortune, and now her whole subsistence was an annuity of twenty pounds, which he had purchased for her in England, immediately after his marriage (g). In this distress, she was taken, with her daughter, into the family of Godwin, her husband's eldest brother; and on the 30th of November, 1667, about the seventh month of her widowhood, she was delivered at Dublin of a son (h), whom she called Jonathan, in memory of his Father (i); and who became afterwards the celebrated Dean of St Patrick's, the subject of the present memoir. It happened, by whatever accident, that he was not suckled by his mother, but put to a nurse, who took so strong an affection for him, that when he was about a year old, finding it necessary to visit a relation, from whom she expected a legacy, and who lay dangerously sick at Whitehaven in Cumberland, she crossed the sea to that place of her nativity; and having contrived a way of conveying the child on shipboard unknown to his mother and his uncle, she carried him with her. Here he continued three years (k): for when the matter was discovered, his mother sent orders not to hazard a second voyage till he should be better able to bear it (l). And the woman gave other testimonies of her affection to her nursing, having taught him to spell before her return [D], so that at five years of age he was able to read any chapter in the Bible (m). In the mean time, Mrs Swift, about two years after her husband's death, had quitted Ireland, and retired to Leicester, leaving her children to the care of their uncle aforementioned [E], who kindly undertook the charge, and sent his nephew, ly called handsome Fielding, and the other the Earl of Eglington in Scotland. Fielding soon dissipated his wife's patrimony; and that of her sister being transferred to the family of Lord Eglington (4), the principal estate of the Swifts was finally separated from the name, as is mentioned above.

[C] His grandfather Mr Thomas Swift. This gentleman's father, William Swift, was rector of St. Andrews in Canterbury, and married the heiress of Philpot, who contrived to keep her estate, which was very considerable, in her own hands. She is said to be extremely capricious and ill-natured, and to have disinherited her son Thomas, an only child, merely for robbing an orchard when he was a boy. However this be, it is certain, that, except a church or chapter lease which was not renewed, Thomas never possessed more than a hundred pounds a year. This little estate, which lay at Goodrich, he mortgaged for three hundred broad pieces of gold, and, having quilted them into his waistcoat, he set out for Ragland Castle, whither his Majesty King Charles I. had retired after the fatal battle of Naseby. The governor, who knew him well, asked what was his errand: I am come, says Swift, to give his Majesty my coat, at the same time pulling it off and presenting it: The governor told him his coat was worth little; why then, said Swift, take my waistcoat (5); this was soon found to be an useful garment by its weight; and it is remarked by Lord Clarendon, that the King received no supply more seasonable or acceptable than these three hundred broad pieces during the whole war, his distress being then very great, and his resources cut off (6). The zeal and activity of this gentleman for the royal cause exposed him to much danger and many sufferings; he was plundered more than thirty times by the parliament's army, he was ejected from his church livings, his estate was sequestered, and himself thrown into prison (*). His estate however was afterwards recovered, and part of it sold to pay the money due upon the mortgage, and some other debts; the remainder, being about one half, descended to his heir, and is now possessed by his great grandson, Deane (7) Swift, Esq; eldest grandson of Godwin, eldest surviving son and heir of Thomas, whose second son, named also Thomas, was bred at Oxford, and took orders. He married the eldest daughter of Sir William Davenant, but died young, and left only one son, whose name also was Thomas, and who died in 1752, rector of Puttenham in Surry, a benefice which he had possessed threescore years (8).

[D] Taught him to spell before her return. The incident of his being carried into England soon after his birth gave rise to a general opinion that he was born there, a mistake to which some other incidents have contributed. He had been frequently heard to say, when the people of Ireland displeased him, 'I am not of this vile country, I am an Englishman.' Mr Pope (*) also, in one of his letters to him, mentions England as his native country: but the account here given of his birth is taken from that which he left behind him in his own hand-writing; and, while he lived, he was so far from seriously denying or concealing his being a native of Ireland, that he often mentioned, and even pointed out the house in which he was born (9).

Another mistake too has been grafted upon this, that he was a natural son of Sir William Temple. In answer to which Lord Orrery observes (10), that such a relation appears to be impossible, since that statesman was resident abroad in a public character from the year 1665 to 1670, as may be proved by his letters to the Earl of Arlington and the rest of the ministry. The Dean was born in November, 1667, and his mother was never out of the British dominions. His Lordship is herein followed by Mr Hawkesworth (11); and the remark indeed is enough of it true for the purpose to which it is made, though it is not altogether true; for Sir William appears to have been five days in England in the year 1668 (12).

[E] To the care of their uncle Godwin. It is said, that, of all the brothers of Mrs Swift's husband, Godwin only had sons (13); which must be understood only of those brothers who went to Ireland; otherwise the remark will be but ill defended by using the word sons in the plural number, since, as has been shewn from the Dean's own account (14), his uncle Thomas had one son. However this slip ought not to impeach the truth of Mr Deane Swift's account (15), that our Author's mother

(b) One of these was Sir Edward Swift, from whom there is no descendant of the name. Hawkesworth's Account of the Life of Dr Swift, p. 1, 2, prefixed to an edition of his Works in 1755, in six volumes, 4^{to}.

(e) Jonathan was an agent at Dublin. Lord Orrery as before.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Ibid.

(i) Lord Orrery p. 6.

(k) Ibid. p. 4.

(m) Idem, ib.

(8) Dr Swift's sketch and .

(*) Letter LXXXVII to Swift, date March 23, 1736-7.

(9) Lord Orrery and Hawkesworth.

(10) Rem. p. 5.

(11) Account of the Doctor's life, p. 4. ubi supra.

(12) See Article.

(13) Hawkesworth, p. 13.

(14) In manuscript [C].

(15) p. 1.

nephew, at six years of age, to school at Kilkenny. He must have been one of those geniuses which don't begin to flower early, since he passed eight years at this school without giving any proofs of extraordinary talents (n). However, he was thought fit for the University at the age of fourteen, and was accordingly removed to Trinity-college in Dublin, under the tuition of that learned and ingenious gentleman, Mr George St Ashe, in 1681 [F]. Here he behaved with strict regularity and order, but discovered the utmost dislike of the academical exercises, which were frequently made the subject of his ridicule. History and Poetry were the studies that suited his taste: to these he bent his whole application, and made great progress in them; but all other branches of science, especially Logic and Metaphysics, were so much disregarded by him, that when he stood a candidate for his first degree in arts, in 1685, he was set aside on account of insufficiency. At the same time, the austerity of his temper made him a disagreeable companion, so that he was little regarded, and less beloved (o). He did not obtain the favour of his degree till he had been at the college seven years, nor then neither without a special mark of disgrace, signified in the words speciali gratia. This seems the more extraordinary, as we are assured, that for three years past he had been so far from an idler, that he spent eight hours a day at study (p); but the wonder vanishes as soon as we know which way the bent of his application is turned. During this time he drew the first sketch of his Tale of a Tub (q). In 1688, his guardian uncle fell unhappily into a lethargic disorder, which totally depriving him of his speech and memory, unavoidably put a stop to the current of his kindness to his nephew, who, till this time, had been supported by him. In this exigence, Swift, who was now twenty-one years of age, took a journey to Leicester [H], to consult with his mother what course of life to pursue. At this time Sir William Temple was in high reputation, and honoured with the confidence and familiarity of King William. His Father, Sir John Temple, had been Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and contracted an intimate friendship with Godwin Swift, which continued till his death; and Sir William, who inherited his title and estate, having married a Lady, to whom Mrs Swift was related, she therefore advised her son to apply to him. This advice, which perhaps only confirmed a resolution that Swift had secretly taken before he left Ireland (r), he immediately resolved to pursue. Sir William received him with great kindness, and our genius had been perhaps lost to the world, had it not been for this lucky step. This great Statesman and Scholar was then at Moor-Park near Farnham in Surry, a seat which he had purchased a few years before, in the view of retiring from business, and living to himself and his studies (s). Swift, who had led a studious life for some years, and must have acquired a good stock of knowledge in history, was therefore a welcome guest to him, and accompanied him to Sheene, whither he returned upon the approach of the Revolution, Moor-Park lying in the way of both armies (t). Sir William had been well known, and treated with confidence by the Prince of Orange abroad, before his accession to the crown of England, who afterwards frequently visited him at Sheene, and took his advice in affairs of the utmost importance. In these visits, Sir William being lame with the gout, Swift used to attend his Majesty in his walks about the garden, who admitted him to such a familiarity, that he shewed him how to cut asparagus after the Dutch manner. Thus agreeably did he pass the time, not less to his improvement, than his satisfaction, in the company of a beneficent Patron, who was both an elegant author, and a polite gentleman, who likewise extended his friendship to the care of his fortune; and obtained for him an offer from the King to make him a Captain of Horse; and when this offer was declined by our Author, who appears to have fixed his mind very early upon the Church, the same Patron obtained a promise of preferment in that way of life (u). In the latter end of the year 1689, Sir William went back to Moor-Park (w), with his companion. Soon after this, a bill was brought into Parliament for triennial elections, against which the King was very averse, by the advice, as is said, of some people who had persuaded the Earl of Portland, that King Charles I. lost his Crown and Life by consenting to such a bill. Upon this occasion, the Earl was dispatched to Moor-Park by his Majesty, for Sir William's advice, who said ther was subsisted by the sons of Godwin in her old age, as she had been before by their father and their uncles with such liberality, that she declared herself not only happy, but rich.

[F] Mr George St Ashe.] It happened a little unluckily for our young student, who had no turn to philosophical studies, that he was put under a tutor whose particular talents lay that way. Mr St Ashe, not unacquainted with polite letters, yet was particularly fond of the mathematics, and a great promoter of that science, the study of which he not only introduced and encouraged in the college or university, being professor of it there, but he had likewise a considerable share in erecting a philosophical society in the city whilst Swift was his pupil (16).

[G] Logic and metaphysics were much disregarded by him.] Lord Orrery (17) says, that he was little acquainted with the mathematics, and never considered the science but as an object of ridicule. But the Author of the Observations (18) affirms, that he had acquired considerable mathematical knowledge, and that he had seen him more than once undertake to solve an algebraic problem by arithmetic. It is very possible, that the same degree of mathematical knowledge might be meant by the words little and considerable, according to the different conceptions of these two writers of that knowledge or science in general, of which neither of them perhaps knew more, if so much as the Dean himself did.

[H] He took a journey to Leicester.] He constantly made a visit to his mother almost every year as long as she lived. His manner of travelling was very singular. He always went on foot, except the weather was very bad, and then he would sometimes take shelter in a waggon; he chose to dine at obscure alehouses, among pedlars and ostlers, and to lie where he saw written over the door, lodgings for a penny; but he used to bribe the maid with a tiler for a single bed and clean sheets (19). The dialect he met with in low life was not only a fund of humour for him, but he seems to have considered himself now as serving his necessary apprenticeship to the obtaining an independent fortune (20). It appears, from all the accounts of his temper, that he was fearful of expences, and undeviatingly observed that rule himself which he prescribed for his friend Gay, to look upon a shilling as a serious thing (21).

much

(n) Lord Orrery, p. 6. And the Dean himself declares, that his parts did not burst out till he was middle aged. See note 27 below.

(o) Lord Orrery, p. 7.

(p) Observations on Lord Orrery's Remarks ascribed to Dr Delany, written in the form of letters signed J. R. p. 50. Deane Swift extends it to nine years, and ten hours a day, p. 271.

(r) Hawkeforth, p. 4.

(s) See his Article.

(t) Ibid.

(u) See his Article.

(16) See the article of William Molyneux.

(17) Letter VII. p. 28.

(18) Letters, signed J. R. p. 101.

(q) Wessendra Warren, Esq; a gentleman of fortune near Belfast, in the North of Ireland, who was his chamber-fellow, declared, that he then saw a copy of the Tale of a Tub in Swift's own hand-writing. Deane Swift, p. 31.

(u) Our Author's letter to his uncle in Remark [K].

(19) Lord Orrery, p. 21. and Deane Swift, p. 99.

(20) Letter to Pope of Dec. 5, 1726.

(21) Letter to Gay, Nov. 23, 1727.

much to shew him his mistake, but without effect; and therefore he soon after dispatched Swift to Kensington with the whole account in writing, to convince the King and the Earl how ill they were informed. Swift, young as he was, yet was well acquainted with the English history, and gave the King a compendious account of the matter, which he amplified to the Earl, but the measure was at last rejected; and thus ended Swift's first embassy to court so much to his dissatisfaction, that he then declared it was the first incident that helped to cure him of his vanity (x). Soon after this, he was seized with the return of a disorder, which he had contracted in Ireland by a surfeit upon fruit. This drew him back thither, by the advice of his physicians, who hoped that his native air would contribute to the recovery of his health; but he received no benefit from the journey, and therefore in a short time returned to Sir William (y), being ever afterwards subject to that giddiness, which gradually increased, though with irregular intermissions, till it terminated in total debility of body and mind. But he was still indefatigable in his studies [I], and by way of exercise for his health's sake, it was his constant practice to run up a hill, that was near the house, and down again, every two hours (z). About a year after his return from Ireland, he thought it expedient to take his degree of Master of Arts at Oxford. With this view, he appears to have written to his uncle, William Swift, to procure and send him the testimonium of his Bachelor's Degree in the University of Dublin. With this testimonium, which is dated May 3, 1692, he went to Oxford, entered himself of Hart-hall, now Hertford-college, and having received many civilities, was admitted ad Eandem on the 14th of June, and took his Master's Degree on the 5th of July following [K]. From Oxford he returned again to Moor-Park, where he assisted Sir William Temple to revise his works, corrected and improved his Tale of a Tub, and added the digressions (aa). From the conversation of Sir William, who was minutely acquainted with all the intricacies of Party, and the secrets of State, during the reigns of King Charles and King James the Second, Swift greatly increased his political knowledge. But having long suspected his Patron of neglecting to provide for him, merely that he might keep him in his family, he at length resented it so warmly, that in the year 1694 a quarrel ensued, and they parted. Sir William having offered to make him his Deputy, as Master of the Rolls in Ireland, which he refused with this reply, that since he had now an opportunity of living without being driven into the Church for a support, a scruple which had hitherto kept him out of it, he was determined to go into Ireland and take orders (bb). Accordingly, upon Lord Capel's appointment to be Lord Deputy of that Kingdom, in 1695, Sir William gave him a recommendation to his Lordship (cc), who collated him to the Prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Conner, a northern district, worth about a hundred pounds a year. But Sir William, who had been used to the conversation of Swift, soon found that he could not be content to live without it, he therefore urged him to resign his Prebend in favour of a friend, and promised to obtain

(x) Swift's Sketch of his own Life, sect. XXIII. and XXIV.

(y) Ibid. sect. XXIII. Lord Orrery intimates that the surfeit was contracted by eating too much of Sir William Temple's fruit. Letter II.

(aa) Hawkefworth, p. 7.

(bb) Sketch, sect. XXV. and note.

(cc) Lord Orrery's Letters.

(z) Deane Swift, P. 272.

[I] He was indefatigable in his studies. By what books these studies were principally directed, is not certainly known; but several copious extracts from Cyprian, Irenæus, Sleidan's commentaries, and Padre Paulo's history of the council of Trent, were found among his papers, which appear by memorandums in his own hand writing to have been made while he lived with Sir William Temple (22).

[K] He proceeded A. M. in 1692. To prepare for this degree, he first wrote to his uncle, William Swift, then at Dublin, to procure and send him a testimonium of his bachelor's degree from that college (23). Nothing but the absolute necessity of it could have forced him to take this step. The disgrace couched in the words speciali gratia stuck still in his stomach, nor did he digest it well ever after. In a letter, dated November 26, 1725, he writes to Mr Pope: 'I desire you and all my friends would take especial care that my disaffection to the world may not be imputed to my age; for I have credible witnesses ready to depose, that it has never varied from the twenty-first to the forty-eighth year of my life (24). Hercules (says Lord Orrery upon the occasion) found himself set aside for want of strength; or, if admitted among the wrestlers, admitted only by favour and indulgence; yet still he must be conscious that he was Hercules (25).' Our Author was strongly affected with any disappointments, and retained a lasting sensibility of them. 'I remember, (says he to Lord Bolingbroke in the year 1729) when I was a little boy, I felt a great sigh at the end of my line, which I drew up almost on the ground, but it dropt in, and the disappointment vexes me to this very day; and I believe it was the type of all my future disappointments (26).' However, pungent and lasting as was his resentment of the rebukes he met with at Dublin, it seems to be suspended for a while by the contrary treatment he found at Oxford. In a letter to his uncle William, dated at Moor-Park, Nov. 29, 1692, he writes thus:

'Sir,
'My sister told me you was pleased, when she came here, to wonder I did so seldom write to you, I (* been so kind to impute it neither to ill

'mann respect. I always 'thought that sufficient from me, who have al'ways been but too troublesome to you: besides your
'aversion to impertinence, and, God knows, so very 'private a life as mine, can furnish a letter with little 'else; for I often am two or three months without 'seeing any body besides the family, and now my sister
'is gone, I am likely to be more solitary than before.
'I am still to thank you for your care in my TESTIMO-
'NIUM, and it was to very good purpose, for I never
'was more satisfied than in the behaviour of the Univer'sity of Oxford to me. I had all the civilities I could 'wish for, and so many favours, that I am
'ashamed to have been more obliged in a few weeks
'to strangers, than ever I was in seven years to Dublin
'College. I am not to take orders till the King gives 'me a Prebendary: and Sir William Temple, though
'he promises me the certainty of it, yet is less for'ward than I could wish; because, I suppose, he be'lieves I shall leave him, and upon some accounts he 'thinks me a little necessary to him
'If I were entertainment, or of doing
'you any satisfaction by my letters, I should be very 'glad to perform it that way, as I am bound to do it
'by all others. I am sorry my fortune should sling me
'so far from the best of my Relations; but I hope I 'shall have the happiness to see you some time or other.
'Pray my humble service to my good Aunt, and the 'rest of my Relations, if you please (27).'

Both Lord Orrery and Mr Deane Swift are of opinion, that the civilities which he received at Oxford proceeded from a misunderstanding of the phrase speciali gratia, which was there supposed to be a compliment paid to uncommon merit (28); and the same is confirmed by our Author himself; yet all this evidence does not satisfy Mr Hawkefworth, who observes that these words are not inserted in the congregation-book at Oxford (29), and not to have inserted them there, when they were thought a compliment, would have been an affront: it is therefore probable, continues this writer, that by the influence of Swift's

(* The original was torn and imperfect in these places which are left blank.

(27) This letter is preserved by Lord Orrery, in Remarks, p. 12. who observes that there does not appear in it the least symptoms of that peculiar turn of phrase which afterwards we see in all his writings, and even in his most trifling letters. This however admits of some exceptions, though our Author himself intimates that his Genius did not ripen till he was middle aged. Compare letter 17 with 83 in Pope's Works, Vol. IX.

(28) Lord Orrery's Remarks, p. 8. and Deane Swift's Account of the Doctor's Life, p. 30 and 44.

(29) It is not usual to transcribe the whole form of such foreign testimoniums, but only to insert the substance of them.

(22) Deane Swift, p. 276.

(23) This appears from his letter of thanks for it to that uncle cited below.

(24) Pope's Works, Vol. IV. Part 3d, p. 45. edit. 1742. 8vo.

(25) His Lordship's Remarks, p. 7.

(26) Letter 37th in Pope's Works, as before.

14) Advertisement entitled
The Bookeller to the Reader, referred to that piece.

rain preferment for him in England, if he would return [L]. Swift, without any difficulty, consented; and Sir William was so much pleased with this act of kindness, that during the remainder of his life, which was about four years, his behaviour was such, as produced the utmost harmony between them: Swift, as a testimony of his friendship and esteem, wrote The Battle of the Books, of which Sir William is the Hero (dd); and Sir William, when he died, left him a pecuniary legacy, and his posthumous works [M].

Having

Swift's uncle, they were omitted in the copy, which he procured and sent, especially as some such favour seems to be intimated in the words put into Italics of Swift's letter to him, above cited (30). But these words will by no means warrant such a construction against the express testimony of Swift himself, which is but poorly evaded by saying, that though the civilities which he received at Oxford might indeed, according to the remark of Lord Orrery, proceed from his known connexion with Sir William Temple; yet Swift might reasonably impute them, also, to the suppression of a reproach, against which there was good reason to fear this connexion would not have supported him; that it is not strange that Swift, after his reputation was established, should, while he was sporting with this incident in the gaiety of his heart, pretend a mistake, which never happened; or that what he meant as a jest upon the University, should be seriously remembered as an event of his life. However, in justice to this Vindicator, let it be recorded, that he has pointed out a manifest slip in Lord Orrery (31), in saying, that Swift, upon his disgrace at Dublin, resolved to pursue his studies at Oxford, where he almost constantly resided during three years, and was avowedly supported by Sir William Temple; whereas, the contrary is incontestably true, since there are not quite two months between the date of his testimonium and his taking his Master's Degree, not to mention that passage in the letter to his uncle, where he says, I am ashamed to be more obliged in a few weeks to strangers, than in seven years to Dublin College. This remark is farther supported, by observing that Swift went to that College at the age of fourteen, in 1681; continued there seven years as appears by his letter, so that he did not leave Ireland till 1688: he was some months with his mother before he went to Sir William, and two years with him before he went to Ireland for his health, which must therefore be in 1691; he returned from Ireland, and continued sometime longer with Sir William before he went to Oxford, which must therefore be in 1692, and in that year he took his Degree. The fact therefore (continues this Vindicator) which, Lord Orrery says, was immediately construed, to favour an opinion that Swift was Sir William's natural son, appears never to have happened (32).

10) Hawkeworth's Account, p. 6.

31) Remarks,
p. 9.

12) Hawke-
worth, p. 6. and
p. 7.

13) Deane
Swift's Account,
p. 66.

[L] If he would return to Ireland.] This appears by a letter from Swift's sister, then in Ireland, to her cousin Deane in Portugal. 'Sir William Temple, says she, was so fond of him, that he made him give up his living in this country, and promised to get him one in England (33).'

[M] He left a pecuniary legacy, and his posthumous works.] One of the reasons produced in support of the opinion, that he was a natural son of Sir William, was, that this supposed Father had given him such marks of his bounty, as it is not likely he should bestow upon a person to whom he was not so related. How far this bounty extended, and what were the favours bestowed by Sir William, cannot certainly be known; that pretended one of his supporting Swift three years at Oxford, has been shewn to be a great mistake. And it is certain, Swift never acknowledged any besides those which have given occasion for the present remark; and we need not say, that the acknowledged relation between Swift's mother and Sir William's Lady, is sufficient to account for even much greater than those. In short, we have a letter from our Author to Lord Palmerston, nephew and heir to Sir William Temple's family and estate, which is decisive in the point. It is wrote with great spirit, and will well reward the reader's attention in perusing it; we shall therefore present him with a transcript.

The original is endorsed, 'An Answer to Lord Palmerston's civil polite letter,' and runs thus:

'My Lord,
Jan. 31, 1735-6.
'I desire you will give yourself the last trouble I shall ever put you to. I do entirely acquit you of any injury or injustice done to Mr Curtis (34), and if you had read that passage in my letter a second time, you could not possibly have so ill understood me. The injury and injustice the young man received, were

14) A resident teacher in Trinity-college, Dublin, whom the Dean made one of the four minor sons of St Patrick's Cathedral.

from those, who, claiming a title to his chambers, took away his key; and reviled and threatened to beat him, with a great deal of the like monstrous conduct: whereupon, at his request, I laid the case before you (35), as it appeared to me. And it would have been very strange, if on account of a trifle, and a person for whom I have no concern further than as he was once employed by me on the character he bears of piety and learning, I should charge you with injury and injustice to him, when I know from himself and Mr Reading, that you were not answerable for either.

'As you state the case of tenant at will, I fully agree, that no law can compel you; but law was not at all in my thoughts.

'Now, my Lord, if what I writ of injury and injustice were wholly applied, in plain terms, to one or two of the College here, whose names were below my remembrance, you will consider how I could deserve an answer in every line full of foul insinuations, open reproaches, jesting flirts, and contumelious terms; and what title you claim to give me such treatment. I own my obligations to Sir William Temple for recommending me to the late King, although without success; and for his choice of me to take care of his posthumous writings. But I hope you will not charge my being in his family as an obligation. For I was educated to little purpose, if I had chosen his house on any other motives, than the benefit of his conversation and advice, and the opportunity of pursuing my studies. For being born to no fortune, I was at his death as much to seek it as ever, and perhaps you will allow that I was of some use to him. This I will venture to say, that in the time when I had some little credit, I did fifty times more for fifty people, from whom I never received the least service or assistance; yet I should not be pleased to hear a relation of mine reproaching them with ingratitude, though many of them well deserve it. For, thanks to party, I have met in both Kingdoms with ingratitude enough.

'If I have been ill informed, you have not been much better, that I declared no great regard to your family; for so you express yourself: I never had occasion or opportunity to make use of any such words. The last time I saw you in London, was the last intercourse that I remember to have had with your family. But having always trusted to my own innocence, I was never inquisitive to know my accusers. When I mentioned my loss of interest with you, I did it with concern: and I had no resentment; because I supposed it only to arise from different sentiments in public matters.

'My Lord, if my letter were polite, it was against my intention, and I intreat your pardon for it. If I have wit, I will keep it to shew when I am angry; which at present I am not, because although nothing can excuse those intemperate words your pen hath let fall, yet I shall give allowance to a hasty person, hurried on by mistake beyond all rules of decency. If a first Minister of State had used me as you have done, he should have heard from me in another style; because, in that case, retaliating would be thought a mark of courage. But as your Lordship is not in a situation to do me good, nor, I am sure, of a disposition to do me mischief; so I should lose the merit of being bold, because I incurred no danger. In this point alone we are exactly equal, but in wit and politeness I am as ready to yield to you, as in titles and estate.

'I have found out one secret, that although you call me a great wit, you don't think me so, otherwise you would have been cautious to have writ me such a letter.

'You conclude with saying, you are ready to ask pardon, where you have offended. Of this I acquit you, because I have not taken the offence; but whether you will acquit yourself, must be left to your conscience and honour.

'I have formerly, upon occasions, been your humble servant in Ireland, and should not refuse to be so still; but you have so useful and excellent a friend in

(35) This Lord, who was nephew to Sir W. Temple, had a right to bestow two handsome chambers in the College of Dublin, upon such students as he and his heirs should think proper, on account of the benefactions of the family towards the College buildings.

Having paid the last duties to his Patron, he removed to London, where he took the first opportunity of presenting a petition to the King for the first vacant Prebend of Canterbury or Westminster, for which the Royal Promise had been obtained by his late Benefactor; and to facilitate the success of this application, he dedicated two Volumes of Sir William's letters to his Majesty, which were published by him not long after. But both these addresses were intirely neglected; nor did the King take any the least notice of him after Sir William Temple's death. Under this disappointment, he accepted of an invitation from the Earl of Berkley (appointed one of the Lord's Justices in Ireland) (ee) to attend him in the character of his Chaplain, to which his Lordship also added the post of his private Secretary; but he was divested of this last office soon after their arrival at Dublin, by the insinuations of one Bush (ff), another of his Lordship's attendants, who succeeded him. This disappointment was soon followed by another: It happened that the Deanery of Derry became vacant; it was the Earl of Berkley's turn to dispose of it, and he intended it for his Chaplain; but, upon an application from the Bishop of the Diocese, his Lordship was diverted from that design, and instead thereof, gave him the two Livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, in the Diocese of Meath, which, though worth about two hundred and sixty pounds per ann. [N], (ee) In August 1700. The Duke of Bolton and the Earl of Galway were the other two. Gen. Hist. of England.

(ff) He remarked, that this office was not consonant to the character of a Clergyman. Lord Orrery, Letter III.

• Mr Reading, that you need no other, and I hope
• my good opinion of him will not lessen yours.

• I am, my Lord,

• Your most humble servant,

• Jonathan Swift (36).²

(36) Swift's Works, Vol. VI. p. 111, 112, 113. edit. 1755. 4to.

[N] The two Livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, not half the value of the Deanery.] As Swift had refused a commission under King William, and a secular employment under Sir William Temple (37), it appears that his attachment to an ecclesiastical life, however early, and however strong, was not the effect of temporary views, but of zeal for the success of the great work, in which he was about to engage; and a consciousness of his own ability to acquit himself with advantage. That religious purposes were at this time predominant in his mind, he used frequently to declare; he hoped, he said, that by diligent and constant application, he should so far excel, that the Sexton might sometimes be asked on a Sunday morning, 'Pray does the Doctor preach to day?' And when he went to reside at Laracor, he gave public notice that he would read prayers on Wednesdays, and Fridays; a labour which he would not have brought upon himself, if he had been principally concerned about the value of his dues, which had been long before customarily paid for much less service (38). The duties of the Church, which he thus rendered more frequent, he performed with the utmost punctuality, and the most rational devotion; he was indeed devout not only in his public and solemn addresses to God, but in that transient act of adoration, which is called saying grace, and which often consists only in a mutter and a bow, in which the speaker appears to compliment the company, and the company each other: Swift always used the fewest words that could be uttered on the occasion, but he pronounced them with an emphasis and fervour, which every one around him saw and felt, and with his hands clasped in each other and lifted to his breast (39). An example worthy to be followed by other wits, in this act of religious decorum.

(38) Delany's Observations, p. 40, 41.

(39) Hawkesworth, p. 8, 9.

(40) Lord Orrery's third letter.

Yet Swift, with all this piety in his heart, could not resist the temptations to indulge the peculiarity of his humour, when an opportunity offered, whatever might be the impropriety of time and place. On the first Wednesday after he had summoned his congregation at Laracor, he ascended his desk, and, having sat some time with no other auditor than his clerk Roger, he rose up, and, with a composure and gravity that upon this occasion was irresistibly ridiculous, he began with one of the introductory sentences from Scripture, and proceeded with the like composure, 'Dearly beloved Roger, The Scripture moveth you and me in sundry places,' and so went regularly through the whole service (40). This instance of his levity, it must be owned, is sufficient to clear Dr King, then Bishop of Derry, from any particular ill-will to him, in trying to prevent his promotion to that deanery. His Lordship indeed intreated the Lords Justices with great earnestness, that the deanery might be given to some grave elderly divine; rather than to so young a man; but it was because the situation of Derry being in the midst of Presbyterians; 'I should be glad, says the Bishop, of a clergyman who could be of assistance to me. I have no objection to Mr Swift: I know him to be a sprightly ingenious young man; but, instead of residing, I dare say he will be eternally flying backwards and forwards to London; and therefore I intreat that he may be provided for in some other place.' Swift was accordingly set aside for youth: but, as if his stars had destined him to a parallel revenge, he lived to see the Bishop of Derry afterwards set aside on account of age. That prelate had been Archbishop of Dublin many years, and been long celebrated for his wit and learning, when Dr Lindfay, the primate of Ireland, died. Upon his death, Archbishop King immediately made claim to the primacy, as a preferment to which he had a right from his station in the see of Dublin, and from his acknowledged character in the church: neither of these pretensions were prevalent; he was looked upon as too far advanced in years to be removed: the reason alledged was as mortifying as the refusal itself: but the Archbishop had no opportunity of shewing his resentment, except to the new primate, Dr Bolton, whom he received at his own house, and in his dining parlour, without rising from his chair, and to whom he made an apology, by saying in his usual strain of wit, and his usual sneering countenance, 'My Lord, I am certain your Grace will forgive me, because you know I am too old to rise (41).' Our regard to impartiality will not suffer this remark to conclude, without taking notice of another mortification which our divine met with this year in the marriage of his sister. She happened to yoke herself with a man in trade, 'an unpardonable offence, says Lord Orrery (42), in his eye.' He saw in it a stumbling-block in the very way of his ambition: his own experience had already furnished some; and he must have observed more instances, where very fair promising hopes had been nipped in the bud by very weak pretences. All the faculties of his soul were extremely quick of apprehension: he therefore grew even outrageous at the thoughts of being brother-in-law to a tradesman. It availed nothing that his fortune, character, and situation, were esteemed by all her other friends suitable in every respect, and that the match was concluded with the consent and approbation of her uncles, and all the rest of her relations. It was done utterly against his will, and he refused all reconciliation with her. In these circumstances recourse was had to his mother, who, from a tender regard for the happiness of her children, came over to Ireland under the strongest hopes of pacifying his anger, having, in every other instance, found him a dutiful and an obedient son. But in this he was not to be conquered. He was deaf even to the intreaties of a parent whom he so much honoured; and he returned to Leicester, leaving him in this point absolutely inflexible. While this incident was fresh in my mind, I took up the second volume of the Tatler, and, turning over the history of Jenny Distaff, felt the delight those papers had formerly given me greatly heightened: I had considered them before as prodigious efforts of a most surprizing wit and humour, brats of a most uncommonly turned brain; but now they seemed to be the dictates of the author's heart (*). Mr Pope somewhere tells him (43), that he had a desperate hand at dashing out a character by great strokes. Here we discover the true source of that peculiar talent, si vis me flere dolendum est primum tibi. Swift's real dolor on this subject we see was as much stronger than that of ordinary men, as his descriptions are more striking than those of any other genius. He wrote many personal satires, which Lord Orrery thinks were drawn from him by particular provocations; and instances in Dryden, who, he imagines, had some way or other offended our Author; otherwise (*) Swift is supposed to have written several letters which never owned (43) Letter V in his Works Vol. IV. par p. 103. edit. 1742.

(41) Ibid. p. 2. 23.

(42) p. 20, 2

did not amount to half the value of the Deanery. However, upon this preferment, he went to England and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity (gg). He also made use of this opportunity of shewing his talents to the public, by commencing Author in print [O]. The subject was political, and though his first production, was universally allowed to be a master-piece, and he laid thereby the first stone of his subsequent promotion. This done, resolving for the present to return to his Living at Laracor, he invited to Ireland a Lady, whom he has celebrated by the name of Stella. With this Lady he became acquainted while he lived with Sir William Temple; she was the daughter of his Steward, whose name was Johnson; and Sir William, by his Will, left her a thousand pounds, in consideration of her father's faithful services. At the death of Sir William, which happened in 1699, she was in the sixteenth year of her age, and it was about two years afterwards, that at Swift's invitation, she left England, accompanied by Mrs Dingley, a Lady who was fifteen years older, and whose whole fortune, though she was related to Sir William, was no more than an annuity of twenty seven pounds (*). Whether the Doctor at this time desired the company of Stella as a wife, or a friend, is not certain (†); but whatever was his attachment, every possible precaution was taken by him to prevent scandal; they never lived in the same house; when he was absent, Mrs Johnson and her friend resided at the parsonage; when he returned, they removed either to the house of Dr. Raymond, Vicar of Trim, a gentleman of great hospitality, and Swift's intimate friend, or to a lodging provided for them in the neighbourhood; nor were they ever known to meet but in the presence of a third person. However, this beloved companion, dear as she was to him, had not power to charm him into a constant residence upon his cures. He made frequent excursions both to Dublin and London, while Mrs Johnson was buried in solitude and obscurity. She was known only to a few of Swift's most intimate acquaintance, and had no female companion except Mrs Dingley (bb). In the mean time, these long absences from his cures, during which he seldom, if ever, appeared in the pulpit, were manifestly inconsistent with his former declared purpose to excel as a Preacher. But he could not bear the thoughts of being buried alive in the North of Ireland, and was solicitous to be near the Court (where he was well received by the principal persons of all parties) in the view of obtaining a more desirable situation in the Church of England, and had certainly succeeded to the height of his wishes, had not he unluckily barred himself out by publishing his Tale of a Tub in 1705 [P]. The drift of this unparalleled

he would have escaped his lash in The Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books (44).

[O] He commenced Author.] The piece is intitled, A discourse upon the contests and dissensions between the nobles and commons in Athens and Rome. The causa τεροκαλιεξινη, as the schools term it, of Swift's becoming an author, he has himself given in the following words:

'I will tell you [Pope] that all my endeavours from a boy to distinguish myself were only for want of a great title and fortune, that I might be used like a Lord by those who have an opinion of my parts, whether right or wrong, it is no great matter; and so the reputation of great learning does the office of a blue ribbon, or of a coach and six horses (45).' The company and conversation of Sir William Temple turned his thoughts upon politics, and he was pleased with the subject. His reading had always lain that way, he had a capacity equal to any undertaking, and was determined in his choice by the particular juncture of affairs at that time, and would not slip the opportunity of pushing his fortune by an artful address to some of the most considerable personages then upon the stage of the public, who had been lately impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours. Portland, Somers, Orford, and Halifax, were all great men, and the three last of remarkable abilities and experience; and we are assured by Lord Orrery, that Lord Somers was the particular friend of our Doctor (46); and he himself has informed us, that he used to meet Mr Addison at Lord Halifax's (47). The characters of these four great Lords are described under Athenian names: Phocion is Portland, Aristides Lord Somers, Themistocles the Earl of Orford, and Pericles Lord Halifax. Its general purport is to damp the warmth of the Commons, by shewing, that the measures they pursued had a direct tendency to bring on that tyranny which they professed to oppose. I believe Lord Orrery's remark will hardly be questioned, that, in parallels of this sort, it is not possible for every circumstance to tally with the utmost exactness; but the whole treatise is full of historical knowledge and excellent reflections. It is not mixed with any improper sallies of wit, or any light airs of humour; and, in point of style and learning, is equal, if not superior, to any of his political works. Thus he did not, as is the ordinary way, creep slowly into fame, but burst out at once into perfection; and from this time he continued, in various branches of writing, to surprize and ravish all hearts, from the prince to the beggar, with strokes of intimitable wit and humour, delivered in an unexampled perspicuity of style.

[P] A Tale of a Tub in 1704.] Scarce any book ever made so much noise in the world as this. It was never absolutely owned by the Dean; yet aut Erasimus est aut Diaboli (48). Thus writes Lord Orrery; who seems to have known nothing of that copy of the edition in 1710, which was revised by the Dean a short time before his understanding was impaired. This corrected copy was lately in the hands of Mr Deane Swift, and the corrections are inserted in the edition of his works in 1750 (49). His Lordship however very justly observes, that, though the Tale of a Tub be one of Swift's earliest performances, yet it has never been excelled in wit and spirit by his own or any other pen. Several censures were passed upon it; and he himself has told us, that he lost an English bishopric thereby; and relates the story of Archbishop Sharp and the Dutchess of Marlborough objecting his want of Christianity, as abovementioned. However that be, it is certain he had other powerful enemies on that account. In the debates in the House of Lords upon the schism bill in 1714, the Earl of Nottingham (†), speaking against that part of the bill which enacted that any person, who should keep any public or private school, or instruct any youth as Tutor, should have a licence of the respective Archbishop or Bishop of the place, &c. expressed himself in these terms: 'My Lords, I have many children; I know not whether God Almighty will vouchsafe to let me live to give them the education I could wish they had; therefore, my Lords, I own I tremble when I think, that a certain Divine [meaning Dr Swift] is in a fair way of being a Bishop, and may one day give licenses to those who shall be intrusted with the education of youth (50).' Lord Orrery imputes this disappointment to his own untractable spirit, which made even his friends with him promoted at a distance: and though he allows the most material censures that passed upon his book, were those which reflected upon the Author in the character of a clergyman and a Christian, yet he is very hearty in his vindication, and imputes these aspersions to the melancholy temper of his accusers. 'Can we wonder then, says he, if a book, composed with all the force of wit and humour, in derision of sacerdotal tyranny, in ridicule of grave hypocrisy, and in contempt of phlegmatic stiffness, should be wilfully misconstrued by some persons, and ignorantly mistaken by others as a sarcasm and reflection upon the whole Christian church (51).' He allows that Swift's ungovernable spirit of irony has sometimes carried him into very unwarrantable flights of wit. 'I have, continues he, remarked such passages with a most unwilling eye; but, let my affections of friend-

(†) The reason given by the ladies for their removal, was the high rate of interest, and the cheapness of provisions in Ireland; but other reasons were suspected by Mr Thomas Swift, Rector of Puttenham, who, in a letter wrote a few years afterwards, enquires whether Jonathan was married, and whether he had been able to resist the charms of both those gentlewomen, who marched from Moor-Park to Dublin with a resolution to engage him. Deane Swift, p. 86, 87.

(48) In his Remarks, ubi supra.

(49) Preface to that edition.

(†) Upon his Lordship's deserting the Tories, Swift published an advertisement, signifying his person and dress, which were both very remarkable, and promising a reward of five shillings, if he would return to his friends. Boyer's Hist. of Q. Anne.

(50) Life of Lord Halifax, p. 235. 2d edition, 1716. 8vo.

(51) Letter IV. p. 29.

(gg) Lord Orrery, Letter III.

(*) The Doctor gave her fifty guineas a year, after her coming to Ireland, as long as he retained his senses, Hawkesworth, p. 14. and left her in his will an annuity of twenty pounds for her life.

(bb) Lord Orrery and Deane Swift.

(44) Remarks in Letter XXIII. 196, 197.

(45) Letter VII. Swift's works.

(46) Remarks, Letter VII. 59.

(47) Letter IV. Swift's letters, Dublin edition.

unparalleled piece of humour was mistaken, and when a Bishopric was intended for him by the Queen, her Majesty was prevailed upon to give it to another by the persuasions of the Dutchess of Marlborough, backed by Dr John Sharp, Archbishop of York, in whom the Tale of a Tub had caused a suspicion of the Author's Christianity. The Doctor had not yet engaged particularly with either party, Whig or Tory. He was equally acquainted, and indifferently conformed, with Pope and Addison, Somers and St John. But this incident determined the future colour of his politics. A persecution from the former, unavoidably threw him into the hands of the latter; and as he never did any thing by halves, the public was presently made sensible of his change by The Sentiments of a Church of England Man, with respect to Religion and Government, which came out upon the change of the Ministry in 1708, and some other pieces of the same spirit in defence of his religious principles [2]. All these were eagerly bought up, and much admired; and he became the Idol of the people in general, by his Predictions for the Year 1708, published under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq; insomuch that Mr (afterwards Sir Richard) Steele assumed the same feigned name, and the real assistance of the same person, as the best expedient to recommend his Tatlers to the world (ii). But our Author had not been long engaged in the support of this universally admired Paper, before a new scene opened to him. In 1710, being then in England, he was empowered by his Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland to solicit the Queen for an exoneration of the Clergy of Ireland from paying the twentieth parts, and first fruits [R]. Upon this occasion, his acquaintance commenced with Mr friendship be ever so great, my paternal affection is still greater; and I will pursue candor even with an aking heart, when the pursuit of it may tend to your advantage or instruction. In the stile of truth therefore, I must still look upon the Tale of a Tub as no intended insult against Christianity, but as a satire against the wild errors of the church of Rome, the slow and incomplete reformation of the Lutherans, and the absurd and affected zeal of the Presbyterians.' He then proceeds to give particular instances of this assertion; and, having blamed the keeness of his satire against Mr Dryden, whom he calls the greatest, though the least prosperous, of our English poets, he concludes thus. 'But although our satirical author now and then may have indulged himself in some personal animosities, or may have taken freedoms not so perfectly consistent with that solemn decency which is required from a clergyman; yet, throughout the whole piece, there is a vein of ridicule and good humour that laughs pedantry and affectation into the lowest degree of contempt, and exposes the characters of Peter and Jack in such a manner as never will be forgiven, and never can be answered.' The freedoms here mentioned allude to that Apology for the Author, which is the best, and was written by himself. It is dated Jan. 3, 1709, from which time it has been constantly prefixed to the work. In this apology the Doctor ingenuously acknowledges, that there are several youthful sallies in it, which from the grave and the wise may deserve a rebuke; but adds, that he will forfeit his life, if any one opinion can be fairly deduced from it, which is contrary to religion or morality.

Harley,

[2] He published several other pieces in defence of his religious principles.] The titles of these are; (1.) An Argument to prove that the abolishing of Christianity in England may, as things now stand, be attended with some inconveniencies, and perhaps not produce those many good effects proposed thereby, in 1708. (2.) A Project for the advancement of religion and the reformation of manners. By a person of quality. Addressed to the Countess of Berkeley in 1709. This most excellent Lady was Elizabeth, the daughter of Baptist Noel, Viscount Campden, and sister to Edward Earl of Gainsborough. (3.) A Letter from a member of the House of Commons in Ireland to a member of the House of Commons in England concerning the sacramental test in 1708. This was reprinted in Ireland in 1735, when the attempt to repeal the sacramental test was revived. There was an explanatory advertisement prefixed, which is said by Lord Orrery (52) to have been dictated or strictly revised by the Dean himself; but Mr Hawkesworth observes, there are in it some inaccuracies which may well be thought sufficient to destroy its authenticity: that which in the first paragraph is called the following treatise, is afterwards said to be an extract of a discourse; and it is immediately added, that this extract is the whole, except some passages of no consequence (53). Whether these instances are sufficient to prove his point against his Lordship's remark, will be easily determined by the reader.

[R] He was empowered to solicit a discharge, &c.] It would be an injury to Dr Swift's just fame to conceal from the reader the following letters, which passed between him and the Archbishop of Dublin on this occasion.

The first is from him to that Archbishop, dated at London, Oct. 10, 1710, and runs thus:

My Lord,
I had the honour of your Grace's letter of Sept. 16, but I was in no pain to acknowledge it, nor shall be at any other time, unless I have something that I think worth troubling you with; because I know how much an insignificant letter is worse than none at all. I had likewise your memorial (54), &c. in another packet. I should have been glad the Bishops had been here; although I take Bishops to be the worst sollicitors in the world, except for themselves. They cannot give themselves the little trouble of attendance that other men are content to swallow: else I am sure their two Lordships (55) might have succeeded easier than men of my level are likely to do.
As soon as I received the packets from your Grace, I went to wait upon Mr Harley. I had prepared him before by another hand, where he was very intimate; and got myself represented (which I might justly do) as one extremely ill used by the last Ministry after some obligations, because I refused to go certain lengths they would have me. This happened to be in some sort Mr Harley's own case. He had heard very often of me, and received me with the greatest marks of kindness and esteem, as I was whispered he would; and the more, upon the ill usage I had met with. I sat with him two hours among company, and two hours we were alone; where I told him my business, and gave him the history of it: which he heard as I could wish, and declared he would do his utmost to effect it. I told him the difficulties we met with by Lord-Lieutenants and their Secretaries, who would not suffer others to solicit, and neglected it themselves. He fell in with me intirely, and said neither they nor himself should have the merit of it, but the Queen, to whom he would shew my memorial with the first opportunity, in order, if possible, to have it done in this interregnum (56). I said the honour and merit next to the Queen would be his; that it was a great encouragement to the Bishops that he was in the Treasury, whom they knew to be the chief adviser of the Queen to grant the same favour in England; that consequently the honour and merit were nothing to him who had done so much greater things: and that for my part I thought he was obliged to the clergy of Ireland for giving him an opportunity of gratifying the pleasure he took in doing good to the Church. He took my compliment extremely well, and renewed his promises. Your Grace will please to know, that, besides the first-fruits, I told him of the crown-rents, and shewed the nature and value of them; but said my opinion was, that the convocation had not mentioned them in their petition to the Queen delivered to the Lord Wharton (57), with the address, because they thought the times would not then bear it; but that I looked on myself to have a discretionary power to solicit it in so favourable a juncture.
I had two memorials ready, of my own drawing up, as short as possible, shewing the nature of the thing, and how long it had been depending, &c. One of these memorials had a paragraph at the end, relating

(ii) See Sir Richard's Article.

(54) Bishops and clergy of Ireland in convocation concerning the first-fruits and twentieth parts.

(55) The Bishop of Ossory and Killaloo. See the third letter.

(52) In Letter

(53) In a note to the title of this tract in Swift's works, Vol. 11. p. 120.

(56) This did not last long after the date of this letter; for the Duke of Ormond was a pointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the room of the Lord Wharton on the 19th of October this year. Salmor Chron. Histoir

(57) Then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford. As soon as he had received the Bishop's letters, instructions, and authority, he resolved to apply to Mr Harley, not only because he was a principal person in the Queen's Ministry, but because by his interest the same favour had been granted to the Clergy of England. That he might not wait upon this Minister, to whom his name was well known, wholly without recommendation, he got himself represented as a person who had been extremely ill used by the last Ministry, because he would not go certain lengths, which they would have had him; this being in some sort Mr Harley's own case. And he received him with the utmost kindness and respect; he sat with him two

' relating to the crown-rents. I would have given him the last; but I gave him the other, which he immediately read, and promised to second both with his best offices to the Queen. As I have placed that paragraph in my memorial, it can do no harm, and may possibly do good. However, I beg your Grace to say nothing of it; but, if it dieth, let it die in silence: we must take up with what we can get.

' I forget to tell your Grace, that when I said I was empowered, &c. he desired to see my powers; and then I heartily wished them more ample than they were; and I have since wondered what scruple a number of Bishops could have to empower a clergyman to do the church and them a service, without any imagination of interest for himself.

' Mr Harley has invited me to dine with him to day; but I shall not put him upon this discourse so soon. If he begins it himself, I shall add it at the bottom of this. He says Mr Secretary St John desires to be acquainted with me, and that he will bring us together. That may be a further help, although I told him I had no thoughts of applying to any body but himself; wherein he differed from me, and desired I would speak to others, if it were but for form; and seemed to mean as if he would avoid the envy of being thought to do such a thing alone. But an old courtier (an intimate friend) advised me still to let him know I relied wholly upon his good inclinations and credit with the Queen, &c.

' I find I am forced to say all this very confusedly, just as it lieth in my memory; but perhaps it may give your Grace a truer idea how matters are, than if I had writ in more order.

' I am, &c.

' Jonathan Swift.'

The Archbishop's Answer is dated Dublin, Oct. 24, 1710, and is in these terms:

' Reverend Sir,

' I thank you for yours of the 10th instant, and send you inclosed a farther power by my Lord Primate (58) and me. My Lord is not able to come to town, which obliged me to wait on him at Johnston, and hindered the joining of two or three Bishops in it, who are yet in town; but I suppose our signing is sufficient. I went in the morning to wait on his Grace, and intended, when he had signed it, to have applied to other Bishops: but he was abroad taking the air, and I could not get it till it was late, and thought it better to sign and send it as it is, than wait for another post. You may expect, by the next, a letter to his Grace of Canterbury, and another to the Archbishop of York. I apprized them both of the business. The latter, if I remember right, spoke to her Majesty about it; I am not sure that her Majesty remembers what I said on that subject; but am sure that she was pleased to seem satisfied with it, and to scruple only the time; I suppose not thinking it fit to confer the favour she designed the Clergy of Ireland by the hands it must then have passed through, but said that in the interval of a change, or absence of a chief Governor, it should be done. I hope now is the proper time, and that her Majesty will rather follow the dictates of her own bountiful inclinations, than the intrigues of cunning covetous Counsellors.

' I thought to have troubled you with a great many things; but such a crowd of visitors have broken in upon me before I could lock my gates, that I am forced to break off abruptly, recommending you to God's care.

' I am, &c.

' William Dublin.'

The inclosed letter, here mentioned, was as follows:

VOL. VI. No. CCCXXIII.

' Sir,

' We directed a letter to the Bishops of Offery and Killaloo last August, desiring and empowering them to solicit the affair of our first fruits and twentieth parts, with her Majesty; which has depended so long, notwithstanding her Majesty's good intentions, and several promises of our chief Governors here, to lay our addresses before her Majesty in the best manner. We were then apprehensive, that those Bishops might return from England before the business could be effected, and therefore we desired them to concern you in it; having so good assurance of your ability, prudence, and fitness to prosecute such a matter. We find the Bishops returned before you came to London, for which we are very much concerned; and judging this the most proper time to prosecute it with success, we intreat you to take the full management of it into your hands, and do commit the care of soliciting it to your diligence and prudence; desiring you to let us know from time to time what progress is made in it. And if any thing farther be necessary on our part, on your intimations we shall be ready to do what is reasonable.

' This, with our prayers for the good success of your endeavours, is all from

' Yours, &c.

' Narcissus Armagh,

' William Dublin.'

Upon the Doctor's sending word, that the Grant was obtained, the Archbishop wrote the following letter to him, dated at Dublin, December 16, 1710.

' Sir,

' This is to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 20th past, which came not to my hands till Thursday last, by reason of winds that kept the packets on the other side.

' I find the matter of our first fruits, &c. is talked of now. I reckon on nothing certain till her Majesty's letter comes in form: and quære, why should not you come, and bring it with you? It would make you a very welcome Clergyman to Ireland, and be the best means to satisfy mankind how it was obtained, although I think that will be out of dispute. I am very well apprized of the dispatch you gave this affair, and well pleased that I judged better of the person fit to be employed, than some of my brethren. But now it is done, as I hope it is effectually, they will assume as much as their neighbours; which I shall never contradict.

' Things are taking a new turn here as well as with you, and, I am of opinion, by the time you come here, few will profess themselves Whigs. The greatest danger I apprehend, and which terrifies me more, than perhaps you will be able to imagine, is the fury and indiscretion of some of our own people, who never had any merit; but by embroiling things, they did, and I am afraid will yet do mischief.

' I heartily recommend you to God's favour,

' And am, &c.

' William Dublin.'

The Grant for exonerating the Clergy of Ireland from paying the twentieth parts, was dated Feb. 7, 1710, as was also the other Grant to Narcissus, Archbishop of Armagh; Sir Constantine Phipps, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland (59); William, Lord Archbishop of Dublin; John, Archbishop of Tuam, and others; of the first fruits payable out of all ecclesiastical benefices in trust, to be for ever applied towards purchasing glebes, and building residentary-houses for poor-endowed vicars. The success of which charitable fund hitherto, may be seen in a printed pamphlet, containing an account of the first fruits of Ireland.

(59) He was knighted and raised to this Dignity on the 26th of Decemb. preceding, having been of Council to Dr Sacheverell.

(kk) Deane Swift,
p. 227, 317.

hours in company, and two hours he was with him alone; he not only engaged in the Doctor's immediate business with the utmost zeal, and soon after accomplished it; but told him he must bring him acquainted with Mr St John, invited him to stay dinner, charged him to come often, and when the Doctor proposed attending at his Levee, told him that was no place for friends (kk). The Doctor became acquainted soon after with the rest of the Ministers, who appear to have courted and caressed him with an uncommon assiduity [S]. And, on his side, he supported from this time the interest of his new friends with all his power in pamphlets, poems, and periodical papers; his intimacy with them was so remarkable, that he was thought not only to defend, but in some degree to direct their measures; and such was his importance in the opinion of the opposite party, that many speeches were made against him in both Houses of Parliament; a reward was also offered for discovering the Author of The Public Spirit of the Whigs [T]. Whatever excellence we possess, or whatever honours we obtain, the pleasure which they produce is all relative to some particular favourite, with whom we are tenderly connected, either by friendship or by love; or, at most, it terminates like rays collected by a burning-glass in a very small circle, which is scarce more than a point, and, like light, becomes sensible only by reflexion. Thus Swift, while he was courted and caressed by those whom others were making interest to approach, seems to have enjoyed his distinction only in proportion as it was participated by Stella; amidst all the business, and all the honours that crowded upon him, he wrote every day an account of whatever occurred,

[S] Courted and caressed with uncommon assiduity. He dined every Saturday at Mr Harley's, with the Lord Keeper [Sir Simon, afterwards Lord Harcourt], Mr Secretary St John, and Lord Rivers: on that day no other person was, for some time, admitted; but this select company was at length enlarged to sixteen, all men of the first class, Swift included. They dined once a week at the houses of each other, by rotation, and went under the general denomination of Brothers. This, and many other particulars, which could have been known no other way, are found in his letters to Stella; which, if they may be credited, incontestably prove, that he was not only employed, but trusted; and that the mysterious Harley, impenetrably reserved to all others, was to Swift open and explicit in affairs of the utmost moment (60). The result of one of their conferences, so early as the year 1710, was to this effect: that the Kingdom was as certainly ruined, as a bankrupt merchant; that a peace, whether bad or good, was absolutely necessary; that the confederacy must soon break, and factions increase; and that the Ministry was upon too narrow a bottom, and stood like an Isthmus, between the Whigs on one side, and the violent Tories on the other; a situation in which they could not subsist. These violent Tories were formed into a Society, called the October Club, of whom Swift says, they are about a hundred Parliament Men of the country, who drink October beer at home, and meet every evening at a tavern near the Parliament-House, to drive things on to extremes against the Whigs (61). But if Swift thought this party too precipitant, it is certain he thought Lord Oxford too slow, and he once told him so, in a manner that shews both his integrity, and the freedom of his conversation with those who have a prescriptive right to servile flattery: he had received a present of a fine tortoise-shell snuff-box, lined with gold, and painted on the inside of the lid with a view of Venice. This present he shewed one day to the Treasurer, who having admired the painting and the workmanship, at last spied a figure studded on the outside of the bottom, which he thought resembled a goose; whereupon, turning to the Doctor, Jonathan, says he, I think they have made a goose of thee. Yes, my Lord, answers the Doctor, but if your Lordship will look a little farther, you will see that I am driving a snail before me; which indeed happened to be the device. To this the Earl coolly replied, that is severe enough, Jonathan; but I deserve it (62).

[T] The public Spirit of the Whigs. The whole title runs thus: The public Spirit of the Whigs set forth in their generous Encouragement of the Author of the CRISIS, with some Observations on the Seasonableness, Candour, Erudition, and Style of that Treatise, printed for John Morphew, near Stationers Hall, 1714. Of all the pieces wrote by our Author in defence of that Ministry, Lord Orrery (63) singles out this to shew of what importance he was then thought to be. The Scotch members in the preceding session, highly incensed at the malt-tax, which was laid equally that year upon both nations, had remonstrated against it to the Queen (64), and, receiving no satisfactory answer, carried their complaint before the House of Lords this session, and, in the debates upon it, even proposed to dissolve the Union. Our Author handles this proceeding with great boldness, and no less severity, and having laid open the history of the Union, compares the conduct of England therein to a person of quality that had been prevailed upon to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a groat to her fortune. He likewise observes, that the pensions and employments possessed by the natives of that country, then among us, amounted to more than the whole body of their nobility spent at home; and that all the money that was raised there among the public, was hardly sufficient to defray their civil and military lists. He also said, he could point out some with great titles, who affected to appear very vigorous for dissolving the Union; though their whole revenues before that period would have ill maintained a Welsh Justice of Peace; and had since gathered more money than ever any Scotchman who had not travelled could form an idea of. Provoked by this keen satire, all the Scotch Lords then in London went in a body, and complained to the Queen of the affront: and, upon the meeting of the next parliament, March 2, 1713, her Majesty, in her speech, having expressed her wishes that effectual care had been taken to suppress seditious papers (65), immediately after the Lords had voted an address of thanks for that speech, Lord Wharton, backed by Lord Halifax, in pursuance of that part of it, made a complaint to the House against this scandalous (so he called it) pamphlet; an enquiry into the author, printer, and publisher, was carried on with uncommon vigour; and when the printer and publisher, Barber and Morphew, insisted upon their not answering any question, the answer to which might tend to accuse themselves, or corroborate the accusation against them, Lord Halifax rose up, and said, 'They had nothing to do either with the printer or publisher, and that it highly concerned the honour of that august assembly to find out the villain, who was the author of that false and scandalous libel, in order to do the Scottish nation justice.' He further added, 'that there were not wanting persons, who had the honour to sit in that house, that were too well acquainted with a certain great man's veracity, not to suspect any thing in him rather than want of knowledge, since it was whispered about, that he who wrote the famous pamphlet had said Grace more than once, and fouled many a plate at a nobleman's table not a mile from York buildings (66).' Hereupon Lord Oxford protested, that he knew nothing of him directly or indirectly. How- ever, in order to conceal him, her Majesty was prevailed on to take the cognizance of the affair into her own hands in one of her courts at Westminster: and, on the 6th of March following, the Earl of Mar, principal Secretary of State for Scotland, had it in command to acquaint the Lords, that orders had been already given for the prosecution of John Barber, &c. Three days after which, the said Barber and Morphew were, on their petition, enlarged from their confinement. The Lords resolving at the same time on an address to her Majesty to issue out her royal proclamation, with a reward for the discovery of the author of the said libel. Accordingly a proclamation was published the same day on which the address was presented, promising a reward of 300l. for such discovery, payable by the Lord Treasurer: notwithstanding which no discovery was made (67).

(65) Which was levelled against Mr Steele's Critis.

(66) Lord Oxford's house was then in those buildings.

(67) Life of Lord Halifax, p. 211, 212, 213.

and

(60) This is levelled at Lord Orrery, who maintains that Swift was employed, but not trusted, which indeed is acknowledged by himself in his Imitation of Horace's Epist. Book I. addressed to this mysterious Minister; inserted in Swift's Works, Vol. III. Part I. p. 41. et seqq. edit. 1755. 4to.

(61) Deane Swift's Account, p. 318, 319, 320. from Letters to Stella. See also the Publisher's Preface to Some Advice humbly offered to the Members of the October Club, written in 1711. Swift's Works, as before, Vol. IV. Part II. p. 224. et seqq.

(62) Ibid. 146.

(63) In Letter VIII.

(64) This was done by a deputation of men of each rank, the Duke of Argyle, and the Earl of Mar, and Mr Lockhart, and Mr Cockburne. Life of Lord Halifax, p. 198. edit. 2d. 1716.

and sent her a journal regularly, dated every fortnight, during the whole time of his connexion with Queen Anne's Ministry. In the summer of 1711, he foresaw the ruin of this Ministry by those misunderstandings among themselves, which at last effected it; and it was not only his opinion, but their own, that if they could not carry a peace, they would not be able to keep themselves out of the Tower, even though they should agree. In order therefore to facilitate this great event, Swift wrote The Conduct of the Allies, a piece which he confesses cost him much pains, and which succeeded even beyond his expectation [U]. He continued to exert himself with unwearied diligence in the service of the Ministry [W], without receiving any gratuity or reward, till the year 1712, when he was offered the Deanery of St Patrick's in Dublin. This was a most grievous balk to his views; he had set his heart upon a Bishopric in England, in which he was undoubtedly qualified to make a figure in the House of Lords; but the Earl of Oxford did not think fit to gratify that inclination, probably from a caution to avoid giving so great an offence as it must have been to the opposite party. But with whatever view, or from whatever cause the Deanery was offered, he thought proper, considering the then precarious state of his friends, to accept it, and immediately crossed the Channel to take possession of his new dignity; but before he had been a fortnight in Ireland, he was urged by a hundred letters to hasten back and reconcile Lord Oxford and Lord Bolingbroke, the consequences of whose misunderstanding were justly dreaded by their friends (ll). Upon his return, he found their quarrels and coldness increased, and having predicted their ruin from this very cause, he laboured to bring about a reconciliation [X], as that upon which the whole interest of the party depended. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he went to Oxford by the coach, and thence to the house of a friend in Berkshire, where he continued till the Queen's death, which happened in about ten weeks. While he was at this place, his mind being still busy for his friends, he wrote a discourse called Free Thoughts upon the present State of Affairs, which he thought might be useful at that juncture, and sent it up to London (mm); but some difference of opinion happening between him and Lord Bolingbroke, the publication was delayed [Z] till the Queen's death, and then he recalled his copy (nn). A few weeks after

(nn) It was afterwards deposited with the late Alderman Barber, and having been since published, is inserted among his Works.

[U] The Conduct of the Allies succeeded beyond his expectation. It was published on the 27th of November, 1711, just ten days before the Parliament met; and before the 28th of January, above eleven thousand were sold, seven editions having been printed in England, and three in Ireland. The Tory Members, in both Houses, who spoke, according to our Author's own account, drew all their arguments from it; and the resolutions which were printed in the Votes, and which would never have passed but for the Conduct of the Allies, were little more than quotations from it (68).

[W] He continued to exert himself for the Ministry. Among other things in that cause, while he was at Windsor, just at the conclusion of the peace at Utrecht, he drew the first sketch of A History of the four last Years of Queen Anne (69). The work would have been published soon after, if his friends in the Ministry had not disagreed about it, and after the Queen's death he spent much time in improving and correcting it (70); to this purpose our Author himself, in a letter to Mr Pope, dated 10th of January 1721, says he had written some Memorials of the four last years of the Queen's reign, with some other informations, which he received as necessary materials to qualify him for doing something in an employment, then designed for him (meaning the place of Historiographer,) 'but as it was, continues he, at the disposal of a person who had not the smallest share of steadiness or sincerity, I disdained to accept of it (71).' Lord Orrery takes notice of this passage, but thinks the Doctor flattered himself too much in this point. 'At least, says his Lordship, it is evident that he remained without any preferment till the year 1713, when he was made Dean of St Patrick's (72).' The noble Author, doubtless, had other grounds for his suspicion, than this remark could suggest, since Dr Swift plainly intimates, that the design of making him Historiographer, did not commence till 1714.

[X] He laboured to bring about a reconciliation. With this view he contrived to bring them to Lord Masham's at St James's, and Lord and Lady Masham, being acquainted with his purpose, left him alone with them; he then expostulated with them both, but to little effect, being only able to engage them to go to Windsor the next day, still hoping, that if he could keep them together, they would come to some agreement. Swift soon after followed them; but was told by Lord Bolingbroke that his scheme had come to nothing; and he had the mortification to observe, that they grew more cold to each other every day. In the mean time Lord Oxford's credit grew daily less, and the Queen's health visibly declin'd. Swift however contrived yet once more to meet them at Lord Masham's, and was again left alone with them; this was the last time they ever met, and he spoke to them both with great freedom; but at length, despairing of his purpose, he told them he would retire, for that all was gone. Bolingbroke whispered him that he was right, but Oxford said all would do well (73). It is no wonder that the Dean's attempt to reconcile his friends were unsuccessful, for Bolingbroke declares, that 'he abhorred Oxford to such a degree, that he would rather have suffered banishment or death, than have taken measures, in concert with him, to have avoided either (74).' But this he did not think fit to declare then to Swift, who thought the reunion might have been effected, if others, who had more concern and more influence than himself, would so have acted their parts (75). He communicated a particular account of the matter to Lord Orrery, who says it was too interesting to be yet made public (76).

[Z] His Free Thoughts were suppressed by Lord Bolingbroke. Notwithstanding he lays the fault entirely upon Lord Oxford's reserve, and backwardness in making a thorough change, by displacing all the Whigs, and even the Whimsicals (77), which could not but be agreeable to Bolingbroke, yet this Minister knew very well, that such a thing was not to be declared openly. But what transgressed all bounds of prudence is this declaration, That the Elector of Hanover, as heir apparent to the crown, ought to have a chapel at Hanover, where divine service may be performed according to the ritual of the church of England, and frequent it too, as King William, he says, did that of the Princess Mary before the Revolution. He likewise proposes as necessary, to have the clause repealed in the act of succession, empowering the Elector to nominate any number of regents to be added to the seven appointed by the Act, &c. Upon this account Lord Orrery, speaking of this piece, says to his son, when you read it, digito confeser labellium (78). Upon the whole, it is evidently wrote in the same spirit, and many of the observations are also the same with what we find in Lord Bolingbroke's letter to Sir William Wyndham. And, if we may believe our Author himself, it was his Lordship, and not Oxford, who had the first place in his heart. 'It is you, says he to Bolingbroke, that was my hero; the other, Oxford, never was: yet if he were, it was your own fault, who taught me to love him, and often vindicated him in the beginning of your ministry from my accusations. But I grant he had the greatest inequalities of any man alive, and his whole scene was fifty times more a what d'ye call it than yours. For I declare yours was uniform; and I wish you would so order it, that the world may be as wise as I upon that article (79).' But we are told, that the Doctor imagined himself a subtle diver, who dextrously shot down into the profoundest regions of politics; yet was suffered only

(73) Hawkeforth, p. 12, 13.

(74) Letter to Sir William Wyndham.

(75) Letter V. in the collection, ubi supra.

(76) Remarks, p. 38. In a letter to Pope, dated July 23, 1737, Swift writes thus: 'Pray let my Lord Orrery see you often; next to yourself I love no man so well.'

(77) Tories, who had been eager for the conclusion of the peace, till the treaties were perfected; they could come up to no direct approbation: in the clamour raised about the danger of the succession, they joined the whigs, declared directly against their party, and affected in most other points a most glorious neutrality. Bolingbroke's letter to Wyndham, p. 48, 49.

(78) Letter XX.

(79) In another letter he writes, that Bolingbroke never deceived him, which seems to insinuate that Lord Oxford sometimes did. Letter LXXXVIII.

(oo) 'I use the Ministry, says he to Stella, like Dogs, because I expect they will use me so.—I never knew a Ministry do any thing for those whom they make companions of their pleasures; but I care not.' Deane Swift's Account, p. 322.

(pp) See his political writings, and his letters to Pope and Bolingbroke.
(qq) Swift's letter to Pope, note (nn).

after this fatal catastrophe, he went back to his station in Ireland, all his connexions with the court being broken, and all his expectations disappointed. It may indeed be truly said, that his disappointment was, in a great measure, the fruit of his own conduct (oo). It is certain, that during his connexion with those of the highest rank, and who in any rank would have been great, he would never suffer himself to be treated but as an equal, and repulsed every attempt to hold him in dependance, or to keep him at a distance, with the utmost resentment and indignation [Z]. As to his political principles, if his own account of them may be believed, he abhorred Whiggism only in those who made it consist in damning the Church, reviling the Clergy, abetting the Dissenters, and speaking contemptibly of Revealed Religion. He always declared himself against a Popish Successor to the Crown, whatever title he might have by proximity of blood; nor did he regard the right line upon any other account than as it was established by law, and had much weight in the opinions of the people. He was of opinion, that when the grievances suffered under the present government became greater than those that might probably be expected from changing it by violence, a revolution was justifiable; and this he believed to have been the case, in that which was brought about by the Prince of Orange. He had a mortal antipathy against standing armies in times of peace, and was of opinion, that our liberty could never be placed upon a firm foundation, till the ancient law should be revived, by which our Parliaments were made annual: he abominated the political scheme of setting up a monied interest in opposition to the landed, and was an enemy to temporary suspensions of the Habeas Corpus act (pp); that he was not at any time a bigot to party, and that he did not indiscriminately transfer his resentments from principles to persons, was so evident by his conduct, that it was an usual subject of raillery towards him, among the Ministers, that he never came to them without a Whig in his sleeve (qq); and though it does not appear that he asked any thing for himself, yet he often pressed Lord Oxford in favour of Addison, Congreve, Rowe, and Steele, with whom, except the last, he frequently conversed during all Lord Oxford's Ministry, chusing his friends by their personal merit, without examining how far their notions agreed with the politics then in vogue; and in particular, his friendship with Mr Addison continued inviolate, and with as much kindness as when they used to meet at Lord Halifax's or Lord Somers's; who were leaders of the opposite party [AA].

This

(80) Lord Orre-ry, Letter V. 11. and XXX. 1.

to found the shallows nearest the shore, and was scarce admitted to descend below the froth at the top. But the same pen intimates, that the reason was because the deeper bottoms were too muddy for his inspection (80). However it is evident, that he had no suspicion of any such muddiness at the bottom, for he declares, that, if he had succeeded in reconciling the two great friends, the public interest both of church and state would not have been the worse, nor the protestant succession endangered: and yet in his conscience he thought himself a partaker in every ill design they had against the protestant succession, or the religion and liberties of their country, and continues he can say with Cicero, that I should be glad to be included with them in all their actions, tanquam in equo Trojano.

[Z] He repulsed every attempt to hold him in dependance, &c. It happened, upon some occasion, that Harley sent him a bank bill of 50 l. by his private Secretary, Mr Lewis, which Swift instantly returned with a letter of expostulation and complaint. Harley invited him to dine, but he refused; the Minister wrote to Lewis to mediate between them, desiring to be reconciled; but Swift sent word, that he expected further satisfaction: Harley replied, that if he would but come and see him, he would make him easy; but Swift insisted, that he should apologize by message; and declared, that otherwise he would cast him off (82). He would not suffer even negative civilities. Having one day dined with Mr St John, then Secretary of State, and remarking that he appeared to be much out of temper, he took the first opportunity of seeing him alone, and warned him never to behave to him with silent reserve; for that he would not be treated like a school-boy. 'I expect, says he, that if you hear or see any thing to my disadvantage, you would let me know it in plain words, and not put me in pain to guess, by the change or coldness of your countenance or behaviour; for it is what I would hardly bear from a Crowned Head, and I think no subject's favour is worth it (83).' The Secretary received the reproof like a friend, as it was given, and apologized for his behaviour, declaring, that business had kept him up several whole nights, and drinking one more; and to make up matters, he pressed the Doctor to stay dinner, which however he declined, being engaged with another friend. It is true, these accounts to Stella lie open to the suspicion of being exaggerated to gratify his vanity, yet they are in some measure justified by a letter of his to Lord Oxford, after the connexion between them was broken. 'When I was with you, says he, I have said more than once, that I would never allow quality or station to make any difference between men—I loved you just so much the worse for your station—In your public capacity you have often angered me to the heart; but as a private man never—I was too proud to be vain of the honour you did me—I was never afraid of offending you, nor am I now in any pain for the manner I write to you in.' In the same spirit, when he was desired by his Lordship to introduce Dr Parnel to his acquaintance, he refused upon this principle, that a man of genius was a character superior to that of a Lord in a high station. He therefore obliged his Lordship to walk with his Treasurer's staff from room to room through his own levee, enquiring which was Dr Parnel, in order to introduce himself, and beg the honour of his acquaintance (84).

(82) Deane Swift, p. 324. from Letter to Stella.

(83) Ibid. p. 327.

[AA] Leaders of the opposite party. Among other persons with whom he was intimately acquainted, during this gay part of his life, was Mrs Vanhomrigh, a Lady of good family, being the daughter of Mr Stone the Commissioner, and niece to the Accomptant-General of Ireland. The history of this family is not a little entertaining, and as the Doctor had no small concern in it, we shall lay it before the reader. Mrs Vanhomrigh was the widow of Mr Bartholomew Vanhomrigh, a Merchant of Amsterdam, who removed thence to Dublin at the Revolution, being appointed Commissary of the Stores by King William, upon his expedition into Ireland; a place which, during the war, was computed to be worth 6000 l. per annum. After the affairs of Ireland were settled, he was appointed Muster-Master General, and a Commissioner of the Revenue, and laid out about 12000 l. in the purchase of forfeited estates: but though he received the produce of this estate, and enjoyed his appointments thirteen years, yet when he died, in 1703, his expences had been so nearly equal to his revenue, that his whole fortune, including the value of his estate, amounted only to 16000 l. This, which however was no small sum, he directed, by his will, to be divided equally between his wife and four children, two sons, and two daughters, Esber and Mary. The sons dying soon after their father, their share fell to the daughters. With this increase of fortune, in 1709 the widow and the two young ladies went to England, where they were visited by persons of the first quality; and Swift lodging within a few doors of their house, in Bury-Street St James's, used to be much there, coming and going without ceremony, as if he had been one of the family. During this familiarity, he became a kind of Preceptor to the young Ladies, particularly the eldest, Esber, who was about twenty years of age, much addicted to reading, and a great admirer

(84) Hawke-worth, p. 14.

of

This removal was the great event which determined the colour of his life, bounded his views, and shewed him at once what he might possess, and for what he might hope [BB]. Upon his first arrival, he seems to have been treated as the Sacheverell of Ireland, being followed by the mob of one faction with execrations, and pelted with stones and dirt as he passed along the streets; while the other mob attended him with shouts of applause (rr). As soon as he was settled at Dublin, Mrs Johnson removed from the country to be near him; but they still lived in separate houses, his residence was at the Deanery, and her's in lodgings upon Ormond Quay, on the other side of the river Liffy (ss). He was in debt at this time (tt); a situation which ill suited his spirit, and which determined him to a severe œconomy. However, he kept two public days a week, and though the circle of his visitors was small at first, yet it soon increased, and always consisted of the best company [CC]. On these days, the dignity of his station was sustained with the utmost elegance and decorum, under the direction of Mrs Johnson, who yet appeared in the circle, without any character distinct from the rest of the company. She was, however, frequently invited with the Dean, whether to entertainments or parties of pleasure, though not so generally as if she had been his wife; she visited and received visits as far as the practice is a meer ritual of good breeding: her friendships were still among the men; but she was treated with great politeness by the Ladies (uu). The Dean's mind had been now so filled with politics, that he found it impracticable to excel as a Preacher, his first and most laudable ambition, and frequently declared, that though he sometimes attempted to exert himself in the pulpit, yet he could never rise higher than preaching pamphlets (*). He was, however, still a good Dean and a good Priest; he applied himself to the care of his Deanery, his Cathedral, its regulations, its income, and œconomy, with great diligence [DD]; he renewed the primitive practice of celebrating the Holy Communion every Sunday;

(rr) The river that runs through Dublin.

(tt) To the depth of 1000 l. as he declares in his Poem to Lord Oxford.

(*) Some years before he died, he gave his Sermons to Sheridan, with this speech: 'Here is a bundle of my old Sermons. You may have them if you please; they may be of use to you, they have never been of any to me.' Lord Orrery, Letter XXII, who declares that some of those three that are printed are excellent compositions.

of poetry: ambitious to be esteemed a wit, excessively vain, full of pertness and gaiety, not without some agreeable accomplishments; but far from being either beautiful or genteel. In a person of this disposition, such a character as that of Swift could not but excite admiration; and that admiration, by frequent converse, at length begot love: in which it is more than probable that vanity had some share, since that passion would have been highly gratified by an alliance with the first wit of the age. Thus goaded on by the united force of love and vanity, she even ventured to make the Doctor a proposal of marriage. It is probable that his connexions with Mrs Johnson at this time were such (†), that he could not with honour accept this proposal: however, it is certain he declined it, though without assigning any other engagement as the reason. He appears first to have affected to believe her in jest; then to have rallied her on so whimsical a choice; and at last to have put her off with an absolute refusal. While he was in this situation, he wrote the poem called Cadmus & Vanessa (85): the principal view of which seems to have been at once to compliment and to rally her, to apologize for his conduct, and soften a tacit denial by leaving the event undetermined. The poem appears to have been written about the year 1713, a short time before he left Vanessa, and the rest of his friends in England, and retired to the place of his exile, which he always mentions with regret. In 1714 Mrs Vanhomrigh, the mother, died, and having lived at a rate greatly above her fortune, she left some debts unpaid. Her two daughters, whose fortunes she had likewise impaired, she appointed joint executrixes of her will; an office, which however troublesome, the situation of their affairs obliged them to accept: they had also contracted some debts in their own right, which they were not able immediately to pay, and therefore to avoid an arrest, they privately followed the Dean into Ireland (86).

[BB] This removal determined the colour of his life, &c.] The Dean was particularly struck by this revolution with the sense of his mortality; a reflection which, whether by the vigour and activity of his imagination, the multitude of his ideas, or the ardour of his pursuits, he had escaped the force of till this time: but now it came upon him with such influence, that after fifteen years, it constantly recurred when he first awaked in the morning, and was not dismissed till he again began to sleep (87).

[CC] He keeps the best company.] Those who were particularly the companions of his choice, were such as would have done honour to any character. For instance the Grattons, seven brothers, the sons of Dr Gratton, a venerable and hospitable clergyman, who gave them all a liberal education. The eldest was a Justice of peace, and lived reputably on his patrimony in the country; another was a physician, and another a merchant, both eminent in their professions; three others were clergymen, who had a competent provision in the church; and the youngest was a fellow of Dublin college, and master of the free-school at Enniskilling. They were all persons of great merit, as much acquainted and as much beloved as any in the kingdom. The Jacksons, a family of which both men and women were genteel, agreeable, and well-bred, such companions as no wise man ever wanted, if they could be had. George Rochford and Peter Ludlow, men of fortune, learning, wit, humour, and virtue; and Mr Matthew Lord, deemed the best lay scholar of his time. These, with the fellows of the college, Dr Walmesley, Dr Holshart, Dr Delany, Dr Stofford, afterwards Bishop of Cloyne, and Dr Sheridan, Lady Enslate, Mrs Moore, Lady Berry Rochford, and Mrs Ludlow, with Mrs Johnson, and her friends, were the persons with whom Swift spent some of his leisure hours from the year 1714 to 1720 (88). However, there was among his companions one person, who could derive no honour from his lineage; a foundling, whom Swift therefore used to call Melephedeek. This gentleman's name was Worrall, he was a clergyman, a master of arts, a reader and a vicar of his cathedral, and master of the song. He was nearly of the Dean's own standing in the college, had good sense, and much humour. He was married to a woman of great sprightliness, good-nature, and generosity, remarkably clean and elegant in her person, in her house, and at her table. But there is another particular in Mr Worrall's character, which greatly contributed to his intimacy with the Dean: he was a good walker. The Dean used that exercise in an immoderate degree, under the notion of its being absolutely necessary, not to health only, but to cleanliness, by keeping the pores of the skin clear, and throwing off impurities by perspiration. Mr Worrall's situation in the church naturally engaged his frequent attendance upon the Dean, this attendance commonly ended in a walk, and the walk in their dining together, either at Mr Worrall's or at the Deanery; the Dean, being a single man, was oftener a guest to Mr Worrall, than Mr Worrall was a guest to him; and this brought on an agreement, that the Dean should dine with him whenever he would at a certain rate, and invite as many friends as he pleased upon the same terms. This gentleman is lately dead, and has left a large sum of money to be disposed of to public charities at the discretion of his executors, except 500l. which was appropriated to the Dean's hospital (89).

[DD] He applied himself to the care of his Deanery with great diligence.] This was the more necessary, as the Archbishop of Dublin, and some of his old friends in the chapter, set themselves against his measures with all their force, and laboured to disappoint him in the exercise of his power, by every art of opposition and delay. This behaviour served only to whet his courage. His maxim was, Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior ita. His first step therefore was to reduce these brethren to reason and obedience; and he succeeded so perfectly and so speedily in it, that, in a short time after his arrival, not one member of that body offered to contradict him, even in trifles. On the contrary, they held him in the highest respect and veneration, so that he sat in the

(85) Hawkef-worth, from Deane Swift, p. 108. and Delany, p. 90. et seqq. The reason of this particular list of his companions was thought necessary to wipe off a censure of Lord Orrery, who says his choice of companions in this period shewed him of a depraved taste. Letter VI.

(89) Ibid. from D. S. 299. and J. R. p. 92. This agreement with Worrall, it is true, suited well with the Dean's being in debt, but what can be said for the want of that hospitality enjoined the superior clergy by the Apostle?

(rr) Hawkef-worth, p. 17. by comparing and reconciling the different accounts of Deane Swift, Lord Orrery, and Dr Delany.

(uu) Deane Swift, p. 92.

(†) 'Tis most likely he had promised to marry her before she left Moor-Park, since he had contrived to break off a treaty of marriage with another, by persuading her to insist upon terms with which the gentleman could not comply.

(85) Signifying Cadmus, the Dean, and Mrs Esther Vanhomrigh, so styled on account of her vanity.

(86) Deane Swift, p. 260. et seqq. Lord Orrery, p. 71. et seqq.

(87) Letter to Bolingbroke. Pope's Works, Vol. IX. p. 105.

Sunday; at this sacrament he was constantly present, and consecrated it with his own hands in a manner equally graceful and devout; he attended at Church every morning, and generally preached in his turn; he also constantly attended the performance of the anthem on a Sunday night, though he did not understand music, to see that the choir did not neglect their duty (ww). As to his employment at home, he seems to have had no heart to apply himself to study of any kind, but to have resigned himself wholly to such amusements as offered, that he might not think of his situation, the misfortune of his friends, and the disappointment of his hope. The first remarkable event of his life, that occurred after his settlement at the Deanery, was his marriage to Mrs Johnson, after a most intimate friendship of more than sixteen years: this was in 1716, the ceremony being performed by Dr Ashe, then Bishop of Clogher, the Dean's Tutor at the College [EE]. But whatever were the motives of this marriage, the Dean and the Lady continued to live afterwards just in the same manner as they had lived before. Mrs Dingley was still the inseparable companion of Stella, wherever she went; and she never resided at the Deanery, except when the Dean was seized with violent fits of giddiness, which sometimes lasted near a month. From this period to the year 1720, is a chasm in his life, which has been found difficult to fill up (xx). Lord Orrery thinks he employed this time upon Gulliver's Travels; and it is highly probable, that having indulged his resentment, which his disappointed hopes had produced, till it could be contained no longer, he conceived the first notion of expressing it in such a manner, as might correct the enormities which he exposed, and with this view began his Travels, the first copy of which was probably finished before the year 1720 [FF]. About this time the Dean, who had already acquired the character of a humourist

(ww) Delany, p. 42.

(xx) Dr Delany, p. 101. thinks he went through a course of Ecclesiastical History, which is hardly reconcilable to a letter of his to Lord Boringbroke, of April 1729, in which it appears that he was then reading Baronius; and Baronius was the only piece of Church History that was found in his library. Hawkefworth, p. 21.

(90) Lord Orrery, Letter V.
(91) Hawkefworth, p. 17.

(92) Among these are reckoned Mr Conolly, the late Bishop of Cloyne, the late Judge Lindsay, and the Lord Chief Justice Marley: all persons of high rank and reputation. Deane Swift, p. 162.

(93) Ibid. p. 263, 265.

(94) Letter IX.

(95) Perhaps it communicated his marriage to Stella, that fatal secret, which at once precluded all her hopes, and accounted for his former conduct. Hawkefworth, p. 20.

(96) It is said that, from the time she was deserted, she devoted herself, like Ariadne, to Bacchus. Delany, p. 123.

chapter-house like Jupiter in the synod of the Gods (90); all their prejudices against him being removed by the disinterested integrity of his conduct (91).

[EE] He married Stella in 1716. Till this time he had continued his visits to Vanessa, who, though she had suffered very great pecuniary losses, had yet preserved her reputation and her friends (92). The Dean appears still to have preserved the character of her Preceptor; but soon after he visited her on another account. He went as an advocate for Mr Dean Winter, whom he took with him, a gentleman who was a professed admirer of Vanessa, and had made her some overtures of marriage; but though he had an estate of 800l. a year, besides 300l. per annum preferment in the church, yet Vanessa rejected the proposal in such terms, that it was never repeated. She was also addressed by Dr Price, afterwards Archbishop of Cassel, but without success (93). From this time the Dean's visits were much less frequent. In the year 1717 her younger sister Mary died, and, the whole remains of the family fortune being then settled in Vanessa, she retired to Selbridge, a small house and estate which had been purchased by her father, about twelve miles distant from Dublin: from this place she wrote frequently to the Dean, and he answered her letters. In these letters she still pressed him to marry her; and in his answers he still rallied, and still avoided a positive denial; till at length, being unable to sustain her weight of misery any longer, she writ, in 1723, a very serious epistle to him, insisting peremptorily upon as serious an answer, and an immediate acceptance or absolute refusal of her as his wife. His reply was delivered by his own hand. He brought it with him, when he made his final visit at Selbridge; and, throwing down the letter upon her table, with great passion hastened back to his horse, carrying in his countenance the frowns of anger and indignation. Lord Orrery observes (94), that the Doctor had a natural severity of face, which even his smiles could scarce soften, or his utmost gaiety render placid and serene: but when that sternness of visage was encreased by rage, it is scarce possible to imagine looks or features, that carried in them more terror and austerity. Vanessa had seen him in all tempers, and from his outward behaviour could not but guess at the inward contents of his letter. She read it with as much resolution as the present cruelty of her fate would permit. She found herself intirely discarded from his friendship and conversation; her offers were treated with insolence and disdain; she met with reproaches instead of love, and with tyranny instead of affection (95). In short, she did not survive this letter many days (96): but, during that short interval, was composed enough to cancel a will made in Swift's favour, and make another, wherein she left her fortune (which by long retirement was in some measure retrieved) to her two executors, Dr Berkley, late Bishop of Cloyne, and Mr Marshall, one of the King's Serjeants at law. She had chosen the latter, not only as he had an excellent character, but as he was her relation. She had little personal acquaintance with Dr Berkley; his virtues and his genius were universally known; yet other motives perhaps induced her to appoint him a joint executor. In such an appointment she not improbably designed to mortify the pride of Dr Swift, by letting him see, that in her last thoughts she preferred a stranger before him. Thus, concludes his Lordship, perished at Selbridge, 'under all the agonies of despair, Mrs Esber Van-homrigh, a miserable example of an ill-spent life, 'fantastic wit, visionary schemes, and female weakness.' As the last gratification of her vanity, she directed, in her will, all the letters that passed between the Dean and her, together with the abovementioned poem, the only copy perhaps of which was in her hands, to be published; and the Poem was published accordingly. But Dr Berkley, upon a careful perusal of the letters, finding the Dean's to consist only of compliments, excuses, apologies, and thanks for trifling presents, while her's were filled with passionate declarations of her love, thought proper to suppress them. Dr Delany and Mr Dean Swift have said every thing that could be thought of to apologize for the conduct of Vanessa in this most ridiculous affair; and in so doing have unavoidably, though tacitly, impeached Cadenus of notorious indiscretion, while they clear him from the imputation of any vicious intercourse: and indeed the Dean's whole conduct in it, not only as a clergyman, but as a man of sense and honour, is absolutely indefensible.

[FF] He finished his Travels before 1720. We have an account of the general plan, which at the same time conveys the spirit and principle of this undertaking, from the Author himself, in a letter to Pope, wherein his view is put under a cover, yet that cover is made of glass, and well answers his intention thereby, which was to shew his meaning the better. Having given that friend some intimations of his Travels, and his design of coming to England, Mr Pope expresses his joy as follows: 'After so many dispersions, and so many divisions, two or three of us may yet be gathered together, not to plot, but divert ourselves, and the world too, if it pleases; or, at worst, to laugh at others as innocently, and as un hurtfully as at ourselves.' In answer to this, the Dean informs him, that he had prepared his Travels for the press, and declaring that he liked the scheme of their meeting, after distresses and dispersions, goes on thus: 'But the chief end I propose in all my labours, is to vex the world, rather than divert it; and if I could compass that design without hurting my own person or fortune, I would be the most indefatigable writer you have ever seen, without reading. I have ever hated all nations, professions, and communities, and all my love is toward individuals; for instance, I hate the tribe of Lawyers, but I love Counsellor such a one, and Judge such a one. 'Tis so with Physicians. I will not speak of my own trade. Soldiers, English, Scotch, French, and the rest; but principally I hate and detest that animal called Man, although I heartily love John, Peter, Thomas, and so forth. I have got materials towards a treatise, proving the falsity of that definition, Animal Rationale, and to shew it should mourist and a wit, was first regarded with general kindness, as the Patriot of Ireland. He wrote A Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures; a tract which, as it was apparently calculated for the service of Ireland, and zealously condemned a sacrifice of interest to England, first turned the side of popularity in his favour (yy); that popularity rose to the height of adoration in 1724 [GG], when a patent having been obtained by one Wood (zz), to coin a hundred and eight thousand pounds in copper for the use of Ireland, under which, by some iniquitous practices, he would have acquired exorbitant gain, and proportionably impoverished the nation; the Dean, in the character of a Draper, wrote a series of letters to the people, urging them not to receive this copper money (aaa) [HH]. These letters united (zz) He was brother-in-law to one Molyneux, an Ironmonger in Dublin.

‘ should be only ratiōnis capax. Upon this great foundation of misanthropy, though not in Simon's manner, ‘ the whole building of my Travels is erected, and I ‘ never will have peace of mind, till all honest men ‘ are of my opinion (97).’ In these few strokes we have the key to that work perfectly formed, though unhammered. That part has been done since by the noble Author, so often mentioned, who has likewise both filed and polished it. His reflexions are admirable. And if I differ from his Lordship in one remark, let the mentioning it be taken as it is intended in the sentiment of that maxim in the civil law, which declares that Exceptio confirmat regulam. The remark I mean is in the XIth Letter, where from Swift's raillery upon the structure of the human body in the seventh chapter of the voyage to Brobdingnag, which his Lordship thinks unpardonable, he ventures to pronounce the lunacy and ideocy, which Swift fell into before his death, to be providential judgments, whereby he was punished for his wickedness in kind. It will hardly be denied, since it is evident from many of Swift's letters, that satire, when he wrote these travels, was, in his opinion, trifling, and of no use, unless it run into a libel. This principle necessarily requires strong exaggerations; in working which up, if he was carried sometimes into a faulty excess, yet the design of reforming his fellow creatures was still in view, and the principal point in view. Prudence, in his present situation, with regard to his governors, kept him from throwing himself into their hands; he therefore substituted human nature in general in the room of particular persons: whence, in keeping to his first principle, his satire unavoidably grew into a libel upon human nature, in the execution of which, some sallies of wit may indeed have been indulged a little too far, without any deliberate purpose of debasing and ridiculing his own species. In this light I own I cannot see such a degree of impiety and profaneness in any of his travels, as will justify a particular application of God's judgments upon the Author for them in this world. His Lordship's conjecture, that this work was the employment of Dr Swift's mind, while bleeding from the wound given it by the death of the Queen, is very consistent with this, as well as his other particular remarks upon it; but, after all, it is no more than a conjecture, though a very probable one; and it is certain that the whole was at least revised, perfected, and published, at a time when he was far from having any reason to be out of humour with his own species (98).

[GG] Made him very popular.] This service perhaps would not have been so long and so zealously remembered, if a prosecution had not been commenced against the printer. The piece being observed to spread very fast, a person in great office sent in haste for the Chief Justice Whitshed, and informed him of a seditious, factious, and virulent pamphlet, lately published, with a design of setting the two kingdoms at variance; he directed, at the same time, that the printer should be prosecuted with the utmost vigour. The Chief Justice had so quick an understanding, that he resolved, if possible, to outdo his orders. The printer was seized, and forced to give great bail. The jury brought him in not guilty, although they had been culled with the utmost industry. The Chief Justice sent them back nine times, and kept them eleven hours, until, being tired out, they were forced to leave the matter to the mercy of the Judge, by what is called a special verdict (99): but the cause being so very odious and unpopular, the trial of the verdict was put off from term to term, till, upon arrival of the Duke of Grafton, Lord Lieutenant, his Grace, after mature advice and permission from England, was pleased to grant a Non prosequi (100). No public notice however was taken of the Dean (101), who did not spare to embellish his satires at the expence of the Chief Justice the same year (102).

[HH] The Draper's letter.] Upon the arrival of Lord

Carteret, as Lord Lieutenant, soon after the publication of the fourth letter, several passages were selected as sufficient ground for a prosecution; and his Excellency and council published a proclamation, offering 300*l.* reward for a discovery of the author. This proclamation gave the Dean a remarkable opportunity of illustrating his character. It happened that the Butler, whom he had employed as his amanuensis, and who alone was entrusted with the secret, went out in the afternoon of the day of the proclamation without leave, and staid abroad the whole night, and part of the next day. There was great reason to apprehend that he had made an information, and, having received the reward, would never return. The man however came home in the evening, and the Dean was advised by his friends to take no notice of his fault, lest he should be provoked to a breach of trust, the fear of which was now removed by his return. But the Dean rejected this counsel with the utmost disdain; and, commanding the man into his presence, ordered him immediately to strip off his livery, and leave the house. ‘ You villain, said he, I know ‘ I am in your power, and for that very reason I will ‘ the less bear with your insolence or neglect.’ The man, in very submissive terms, confessed that he had been drinking all night, and intreated to be forgiven; but Swift was inexorable. He then begged that he might be confined in some part of the house so long as the proclamation could entitle him to any reward, lest, when he was driven from his service, and destitute of another, the temptation might be too strong for his virtue, and his distress might involve him in a crime which he most abhorred. His master continued still inexorable, and the man was dismissed. During all the time of danger, Swift obstinately refused to contribute one farthing towards his support; nor could he be persuaded to see his face: but, when the time limited in the proclamation was expired, he was permitted to return to his service; soon after which he was called hastily up by the Dean, who, without any preface, again ordered him to strip off his livery, put on his own cloaths, and then come to him again. The poor fellow, though he was greatly astonished at the proceeding, knew Swift too well to expostulate; and therefore, with whatever reluctance, did as he had been commanded. When he returned, the Dean ordered the other servants to be called up, who immediately attended, expecting to see the Butler dismissed in terrorem, and to hear themselves warned, in very severe terms, of his offence. Swift, as soon as they had ranged themselves in order before him, ordered them to take notice, that Robert was no longer his servant; ‘ he is now, said the Dean, Mr Blakely, ‘ the Verger of St Patrick's cathedral, a place which I give ‘ him as a reward for his fidelity.’ The value of this place is between thirty and forty pounds a year. However, Robert would not quit his master, but continued to be his butler some years afterwards (103). As to Lord Carteret, now Earl Granville, it appears, by many of Swift's writings, that he lived in good friendship with him during his Lieutenantancy, notwithstanding his Lordship had signed the proclamation. Swift once asked him how he could concur in it; to which his Excellency replied, in the words of Virgil,

Regni novitas me talia cogit Moliri.

He was equally diligent to recommend his friends to Carteret as he had been to Oxford, and with the same dignity and freedom ‘ Pray, my Lord, said he one day, have you ‘ the honour to be acquainted with the Grattoons?’ My Lord answered he had not. ‘ Why then pray, my Lord, says ‘ Swift, take care to obtain it; it is of great consequence: ‘ the Grattoos, my Lord, can raise ten thousand men.’ He obtained a living for his friend Sheridan, and recommended others, of whom he knew nothing but that they were good men. He used also to remonstrate with great freedom against such measures as he disliked; and, (yy) Lord Orrery, p. 44.

Lord

(aaa) The patent did not empower him to force the reception of the money without their consent.

(97) Pope's Works, Vol. IX. Letter XI. edit. 1752. 8vo.

(98) The first edition was published in 1726.

(99) During the trial, the Chief Justice, among other singularities, laid his hand on his breast, and protested solemnly, that the author's design was to bring in the Pretender.

(100) Pope's Works, Vol. IX. Letter V.

(101) Hawke's worth, p. 22.

(102) See three epigrams upon him in Swift's Works, Vol. IV. p. 63, 64. edit. 1755. 4to.

(103) Deane Swift, p. 190.

(bbb) Being thus refused in Ireland, it was afterwards surreptitiously uttered in England, where it now passes without much difficulty, by the advantage of surpassing, in real value, other coin of the same denomination, which is spread about, though of no real value at all.

(ccc) Lord Orrery, Letter VI.

(ddd) Swift's Letters to Dr Sheridan, No. XX, dated July 8, 1726, in the Sixth Volume, Part II. p. 115. of his Works, edit. 1755. 4to.

(ggg) Letters to the same, No. XXIV.

united the whole nation in his praise, filled every street with his effigies, and every voice with acclamations; and Wood, though he was long supported by his friends, who procured the patent, was at length compelled to withdraw it, and his money was totally suppressed (bbb). Whereupon the Dean came out with A full and true Account of the solemn Procession to the Gallows, at the Execution of William Wood, Esq., and Hard-ware Man [II]. From this time the Dean's influence in Ireland was almost without bounds; he was consulted in whatever related to domestic policy, and in particular to trade. The weavers always considered him as their Patron and Legislator after his Proposal for the Use of Irish Manufactures, and came frequently in a body to receive his advice in settling the rates of their stuffs, and the wages of their journeymen; and when elections were depending for the city of Dublin, many corporations refused to declare themselves till they knew his sentiments, and inclinations, which were always followed. Over the populace he was the most absolute Monarch that ever governed men, and he was regarded by persons of every rank, with veneration and esteem. Thus he lived as the Tutelar-patron of that kingdom, in an unexampled state of power and influence, as long as his health permitted him to enjoy it (ccc). No wonder then, that in the midst of this splendor in Ireland, he refused an offer that was made to him while he was in England, in a visit to Mr Pope in 1726, of a settlement in the midst of his friends, within twelve miles of London (ddd). The same year he had also an invitation from Lord Bolingbroke, to spend a winter with him at his house on the banks of the Loire in France; and this he would have accepted, but that he received an account from Ireland, that Mrs Johnson (for she still went by her maiden name) was dangerously ill (ccc). Her constitution was tender and delicate, and as the Dean himself says, she had not the flamini vitæ (fff). In the year 1724, she began visibly to decay, and in the year 1726, was thought to be dying. The Dean received the news with agonies not to be felt, but by the tenderness and most ardent friendship; nor conceived, but by the most lively imagination [KK]; and immediately hastened back into Ireland. It happened, however, that she recovered a moderate state of health, and the Dean returned again to England, in 1727, to finish the Miscellanies, in concert with Pope and Arbuthnot (ggg). From England, he was once more about to set out for France, upon Lord Bolingbroke's invitation, when news arrived of the King's death. He had attended the late Queen Caroline, while she was princess, in his former excursions to England, and he had seen her twice in one week by her Royal Highness's command in this (bbb) [LL]. She had always treated the Dean with (ccc) Swift's Letters to Sheridan, No. XX. p. 116.

(fff) Ibid. No. XXI.

(bbb) Ibid. Letter XXII.

(104) Deane Swift, p. 270. Delany, p. 25 and 95.

(105) Letter XVI.

(106) There are no less than threescore and eleven of them.

Lord Carteret having gained the advantage of him in some dispute concerning the distresses of Ireland, he cried out in a violent passion, 'What the vengeance brought you among us? Get you gone, get you gone. Pray God Almighty to send us our boobies back again (104).

[II] A full and true account, &c.] This paper is one of the Dean's nonpareils in the jocose way. The dangerous consequence of Wood's patent was a most serious affair, and accordingly is handled as such in the Drapier's letters. The noble author, to whom we are so much indebted in this memoir, having recommended them (105) to the perusal of his son for the stile and conduct of their manner, proceeds thus; 'But, if they appear too grave for so young a man, and one who is so little interested in the present, and much less in the past affairs of Ireland, you will find a paper at the end of them that will excite your risibility, or I am mistaken.' His Lordship then goes on to give the title of A full and true Account, &c. and observes, 'that the Author makes the several artificers attend William Wood (represented by a log of timber) to the gallows, and each tradesman expresses his resentment in the terms of his proper calling. The COOK will BASTE him, the BOOKSELLER will TURN OVER A NEW LEAF WITH HIM, the TAYLOR will SIT IN HIS SKIRTS; and so on through a number of people (106) of different conditions. Then follows the procession, most humorously described. The whole is a piece of ridicule too powerful for the strongest gravity to withstand.'

[KK] He received the news with the greatest agonies.] A character so extraordinary as that of Dean Swift naturally raises a curiosity to see him in every circumstance and change of life, and the more especially when exhibited by himself, as it is in the present case, in a letter to Dr Sheridan, dated July 27, where he pours forth his grief as follows. 'I have yours just now of the 19th, and the account you give is nothing but what I have some time expected with the utmost agonies; and there is one aggravation of constraint, that, where I am, I am forced to put on an easy countenance. It was, at this time, the best office your friendship could do, not to deceive me. I was violently bent all last year, as I believe you remember, that she should go to Montpelier, or Bath, or Tunbridge. I intended, if there was no amendment, they might both come to London. But there was a fatality, although I indeed think her flamina could not last much longer, when I saw she could take no nourishment. I look upon this to be the greatest event that can ever happen to me; but all my preparations will not suffice to make me bear it like a philosopher, nor altogether like a Christian. There hath been the most intimate friendship between us from her childhood, and the greatest merit on her side that ever was in one human creature towards another. Nay, if I were now near her, I would not see her; I could not behave myself tolerably, and should redouble her sorrow—Judge in what a temper of mind I write this—The very time I am writing, I conclude the fairest soul in the world hath left its body—Confusion! that I am this moment called down to a visitor, when I am in the country, and not in my power to deny myself—I have passed a very constrained hour, and now return to say I know not what. I have been long weary of the world, and shall, for my small remainder of years, be weary of life, having for ever lost that conversation which could only make it tolerable—I fear, while you are reading this, you will be shedding tears at her funeral; she loved you well, and a great share of the little merit I have with you is owing to her solicitations (107). Perhaps no one part of Swift's life is more picturesque of the singularity of his character than this. Could it be imagined, did not the facts shew it, that he was at this very time engaged in publishing and writing some materials of the Miscellanies in concert with Pope and Arbuthnot, particularly the Memoirs of Scriblerus, notes upon the Dunciad (108)?

[LL] He visited the Princess of Wales.] The state of that court at this time is well known, and represented with exquisite wit and humour in Gulliver's travels; where the Prince is represented wearing shoes with one heel higher than the other, which gave him a hobble in his gate. In his letter to Sheridan, cited in the text, speaking of the Princess, he says, 'She charges me, without ceremony, to be the author of a bad book (*), though I told her how angry the ministry were; but she assures me, that both she and the Princess were very well pleased with every particular; but, continues he, I disowned the whole affair, as you know I very well might (109), only gave her leave, as she liked the book, to suppose what author she pleased (110). He had before, in the same letter, informed this intimate friend, that there was a settled resolution to assault Sir Robert Walpole (†); and declares he himself was highly displeased with him and his partisans.—That he was advised by all his friends not to go to France (as he

(107) Letters Sheridan, No. XXI.

(108) See Po article in Vol.

(*) Gulliver's travels.

(109) See (124).

(110) Letter Sheridan, No. XXII.

(†) Meant particularly by his friend Bolingbroke who acted in all his misdeeds against Walpole. See his art.

with great civility; and the Dean had treated her with his usual, and peculiar frankness. The third day after the death of King George I, he attended at court, and kissed the new King and Queen's hands, upon their accession, and was blamed by his friends for deferring it so long. What prospect he had of a change in public affairs on this event, or of any advantages which such a change might produce to himself or his friends, does not appear; but he was earnestly intreated to delay his journey; and when he had again determined to set out, he was, upon some new incidents, again prevailed upon not to go, by the persuasions of some persons whom, he says, he could not disobey. Many schemes were proposed, in which he was eagerly solicited to engage, but he received them coldly; not because he was determined to enter no more into public life, but because the schemes were such as he did not approve (iii). He was soon after seized with one of his fits of giddiness and deafness; a calamity which was greatly aggravated by the news that Mrs Johnson was again so ill, that the Physicians despaired of her life. Upon this occasion, he relapsed into the agonies of mind, which he had felt the year before: he expected, by the next post, to hear that she was dead, and intreated that he might be told no particulars, but the event in general; for that his age being then within three months of sixty, his weakness and his friendship would bear no more. As he despaired of seeing her alive, he determined not to return to Ireland so soon as he had intended, but to pass the winter either near Salisbury-Plain, or in France. And that he might not be interrupted by company, and condemned to the torment of suppressing his sorrow to preserve the rules of good breeding, he quitted the house of Mr Pope at Twickenham, and retired to a village near London, with a female relation for his nurse. The next letter that he received he kept an hour in his pocket before he could sufficiently fortify himself against the shock which he expected when he should open it (kkk): however, as Stella's life ebbed by slow degrees, and sometimes seemed at a stand, if not to flow, his hope of a parting interview revived, and he set out for Ireland as soon as he was able to travel. He found her alive (lll); but after languishing about three months, she expired on the 28th of January, 1727, in the forty-fourth year of her age, regretted by the Dean with such excess of affection and esteem, as the warmest sensibility only could feel, and the most excellent character excite [MM]. From the death of Stella, the Dean's life be-

(iii) Letters to Sheridan, No. XXIII.

(lll) He composed two prayers for her, one on the 17th of Oct. and the other on the 6th of Nov. inserted in his Works, Vol. VI, p. 2. 4to edition.

he intended for two months) for fear of their vengeance, 'in a manner which, says he, they cannot execute here.' However he was resolved not to engage against the ministry. 'I reckon, continues he, there will be a warm winter, wherein, my comfort is, I shall have no concern (111).'

[MM] Stella's death was lamented by Swift with an affection excited by her character. Stella must needs have been a woman of a most excellent character: the writers of Swift's life have vied with each other in setting forth that excellence. 'STELLA, says Lord Orrery, was a most amiable woman in mind and person. She had an elevated understanding, with all the delicacy and softness of her sex. Her voice, however sweet in itself, was still rendered more harmonious by what she said. Her wit was poignant without severity: her manners were humane, polite, easy, and unreserved. Wherever she came, she attracted attention and esteem. As virtue was her guide in morality, sincerity was her guide in religion: she was constant, but not ostentatious, in her devotions. She was remarkably prudent in her conversation. She had great skill in music, and was perfectly well versed in all the lesser arts that employ a lady's leisure. Her wit allowed her a fund of perpetual cheerfulness: her prudence kept that cheerfulness within proper limits. She exactly answered the description of PENELOPE in HOMER:

'A woman loveliest of the lovely kind,
'In body perfect, and complete in mind.

'Such was STELLA: yet, with all these accomplishments, she never could prevail upon Dr Swift to acknowledge her openly as his wife. A great genius must tread in unbeaten paths, and deviate from the common road of life; otherwise, surely a diamond of so much lustre might have been publicly produced, although it had been fixed within the collet of matrimony: but the flaw which, in Dr Swift's eye, reduced the value of such a jewel, was the servile state of her father, who, as was said before, was a menial servant to Sir William Temple. Ambition and pride will at any time conquer reason and justice; and each larger degree of pride, like the larger fishes of prey, will devour all the less: thus the vanity of boasting such a wife was suppressed by the greater vanity of keeping free from such an alliance (112). His Lordship here plainly uses the words pride and vanity to express the same quality; but, in describing Swift's character, he is more accurate in distinguishing the two qualities, and tells us, that Swift himself used to say, that his pride kept him from being vain. However, his Lordship's rival in drawing Stella's character makes this inaccuracy in his Lordship's draught a handle to animadvert upon VOL. VI. No. 323.

him. 'Why the Dean, says he, did not sooner marry this excellent person, why he married her at all, why his marriage was so cautiously concealed, and why he was never known to meet her but in the presence of a third person, are enquiries which no man can answer, or has attempted to answer, without absurdity; and are therefore unprofitable objects of speculation (113).' In this disposition the same writer, not satisfied with his Lordship's character of Stella, has supplied what he thought the defects therein as follows. 'Her stature, says he, was tall, her hair and eyes black, her complexion fair and delicate, her features regular, soft, and animated, her shape easy and elegant, and her manner feminine, polite, and graceful. As to her wit, it was confessed by all her acquaintance, and particularly by the Dean, that she never failed to say the best thing that was said, whenever she was in company, though her companions were usually persons of the best understanding in the kingdom (114). Neither was her wit merely of the colloquial kind; she had great force of poetical fancy, could range her thoughts in a regular composition, and express them in correct and harmonious verse.' We have a beautiful instance of this in a poem addressed to Swift on his birth-day, 1721, which concludes with the following lines:

'Long be the day that gave you birth,
'Sacred to friendship, wit, and mirth;
'Late dying, may you cast a shred
'Of your rich mantle o'er my head;
'To bear with dignity my sorrow
'One day alone; then die to-morrow (115).'

Lord Orrery, in speaking of the Dean's conduct to Stella, observes, that a woman of her delicacy must needs repine at such an extraordinary situation. 'The outward honours, says his Lordship, which she received, are as frequently bestowed upon a mistress as a wife. She was absolutely virtuous, and yet was obliged to submit to all the appearances of vice, except in the presence of those few people, who were witnesses of the cautious manner in which she lived with her husband, who scorned even to be married like any other married folks. Inward anxiety affected by degrees the calmness of her mind, and the strength of her body. She began to decline in her health in 1724, and, from the first symptoms of decays, she rather hastened than shrunk back: in the descent, tacitly pleased to find her foot-steps tending to that place, where they neither marry nor are given in marriage. She died towards the end of January, 1727 or 1728, absolutely destroyed by

(113) Hawke's worth, p. 26.

(114) Ibid. See instances of this, under the name of Bons mots de Stella, in Vol. XII. of Swift's Works, in 8vo, and two specimens of her poetry are inserted in the appendix to his life.

(115) Hawkins, in the Appendix to Swift's life, p. 42.

(114) Ibid. Letters XXIV, XXV, and XXVI.

(111) Letters to Sheridan, No. XXII.

(112) Orrery's remarks, Letter II.

came much more retired, and the austerity of his temper daily encreased; he could not join in the social cheerfulness of his public days; these entertainments therefore were discontinued, and he sometimes avoided the company of the most intimate friends. In this solitary life, he frequently amused himself with writing, as appears by the dates of many of his pieces, which are subsequent to this time; and it is very remarkable, that although his mind was doubtless greatly depressed, and his principal enjoyment at an end, when Mrs Johnson died, yet there is an air of trifling and levity in some of the pieces, which he wrote afterwards, that is not to be found in any other [NN]. However, in 1733, when an attempt was made to repeal the Test Act in Ireland, he wrote a copy of verses (mmm) against that attempt, with so much boldness, as even brought his life in some danger [OO]. But the fits (mmm) Inserted in Vol. IV. Part I. p. 18. et seqq. of his Works, edit. 1755. 4to.

(116) Lord Orrery's letter, as before.

(117) Delany, p. 63.

(118) Id. p. 56, and 288.

(*) It is inserted in his Works, Vol. III. Part II. p. 121. edit. 1755. 4to.

(119) Hawkesworth, p. 27.

(†) What the French call de l'Esprit (wit) is a talent for writing trifling pieces with vivacity.

(120) Lord Carteret, being present at the acting of an old Greek tragedy by his boys, was so pleased with the performance, that he gave the master a living, worth near 100l. per annum. Vindication of his Excellency Lord Carteret, &c. in Swift's Works, Vol. V. p. 2. edit. 1755. 4to.

(121) In his way to his living he stop at Cork to wait upon his Bishop, and, preaching there on a Sunday, which happened to be the first of August, the Anniversary day of King George I's Accession, on this text, sufficient to the day is the evil thereof, such a clamour was raised against him (though the choice of the text was pure accident, and no politics in the sermon) that the Lord Lieutenant was obliged to withdraw his presentation. Whereupon, says Swift, Sheridan shot his own fortune dead by meet chance-medley with a single text. Vindication of his Excellency Lord Carteret, &c.

' the peculiarity of her fate, a fate which perhaps she could not have incurred by an alliance with any other person in the world (116). Here again his Lordship's rival interposes, and tells us, that 'the Dean's peculiar connexion appears to have been suspected, if not known, by his particular acquaintance, one of whom had the courage, indirectly, to blame his conduct several times, by setting before him the example of a clergyman of distinguished merit, who married nearly in the same circumstances; but, instead of concealing his marriage, retired into thrifty lodgings, till he had made a provision for his wife, and then returned to the world, and became eminent for his hospitality and charity (117). The Dean, whether moved by these representations, or some other motive, did at length earnestly desire that she might be publicly owned as his wife; but, as her health was then declining, and his œconomy became more severe, she said it was too late, and insisted that they should continue to live as before: to this the Dean in his turn consented, and suffered her to dispose entirely of her own fortune by her own name to a public charity, when she died (118). It appears, continues this writer, by several little incidents, that Stella regretted and disapproved the Dean's conduct, and that she sometimes reproached him with unkindness; for to such regret and reproach he certainly alludes in the conclusion of his poem on her birth-day in 1726 (*): Thus we see this writer agrees with his Lordship in the point of Stella's regret and resentment; and he observes, that it seems to be generally agreed, in concurrence with his Lordship, that Stella was destroyed by the peculiarity of her circumstances; and that the fabric, however weak by the delicacy of its composition, would not have fallen so soon, if the foundation had not been injured by the slow minings of regret and vexation.

In so flagrant an instance of the most inhumanly savage cruelty (I had almost said murder) what can be said for the author of it? Mr Hawkesworth indeed has told us (119), that it is generally agreed, that in this instance, as in every other, the Dean's intention was upright, though his judgment might be erroneous. But he had better have said nothing.

[AN] A greater air of trifling in some of his pieces after this time than in any before.] He had established his principle of Vive la bagatelle (†), and was resolved to put it in execution. Among these trifling pieces are his directions to servants, and several of his letters to Dr Sheridan stand foremost. In the last remark we gave the picture of Swift's wife, and we shall here give some sketches of this friend, done by the same hands. 'Dr Sheridan, says Lord Orrery, was a schoolmaster, and, in many instances, perfectly well adapted for that station. He was deeply versed in the Greek and Roman languages, and in their customs and antiquities. He had that kind of good-nature, which absence of mind, indolence of body, and carelessness of fortune, produce; and, although not over strict in his own conduct, yet he took care of the morality of his scholars, whom he sent to the University remarkably well founded in all classical learning (120), and not ill instructed in the social duties of life. He was slovenly, indigent, and cheerful. He knew books much better than men: and he knew the value of money least of all. In this situation, and with this disposition, Swift fastened upon him as upon a prey, with which he intended to regale himself, whenever his appetite should prompt him. Sheridan therefore was kept constantly within his reach; and the only time he was permitted to go beyond the limits of his chain, was to take possession of a living in the county of Cork, which had been bestowed upon him by the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the present Earl of Granville. Sheridan, in one fatal moment, or by one fatal text, effected his own ruin (121); and this ill-starred, good-natured, improvident man returned to Dublin, unhinged from all favour at court, and even banished from the castle. But still he remained a punster, a quibbler, a fiddler, and a wit: not a day passed without a rebus, an anagram, or a madrigal. His pen and his fiddle-stick were in continual motion, yet to little or no purpose (122). Mr Hawkesworth, apparently thinking his Lordship too severe upon this friend of Swift, sets him in a more favourable light. 'As Swift, says he (123), was, undoubtedly, much more tenderly and strictly connected with Stella than with any other woman, so his friendship seems to have been more intimate and unreserved with Sheridan than with any other man; his letters to him are evidently the spontaneous effusions of his heart, whether he was cheerful or sad, and seem to imply a perfect acquaintance with every peculiarity of his circumstances.' This writer, in proceeding, agrees with his Lordship in other particulars; but, passing over Sheridan's ill conduct in silence, he observes, that this gentleman was by nature suited to Swift as a companion in the highest degree: he had a vein of humour that was a constant occasion of merriment, he had an absence of mind which rendered him a perpetual object of railery, and an indolent good-nature which made him unapt to take offence; he was always disposed to be cheerful, and therefore readily concurred in the entertainment of Swift's hours of pleasantries; and could, without much pain or displeasure, give way to his petulance or his coldness, in his paroxysms of fretfulness or reserve: he also greatly contributed to Swift's amusement by little sprightly pieces of the inferior kind of poetry, which he was always writing; and yet more to his employment, by hints and materials which he was every moment throwing out (124). This writer concludes his account, in a further defence of Sheridan against his Lordship's insinuation, that he was held in contempt by Swift, as follows: 'With this easy, negligent, contented creature, Swift passed much of his time, as well during Mrs Johnson's life as afterwards; and though there is in general an air of superiority in his letters, and might be sometimes in his behaviour a want of that complacency which no familiarity should exclude, yet it appears, that the Dean did not hold Sheridan cheap. Sheridan he loved for his own merit, and was content to have deserved his love by the interest of another. Stella, says he, loved you well; and a great share of the little merit I have with you is owing to her solicitations (125).'

[OO] His life was in some danger.] The Dissenters often affected to call themselves brother Protestants and fellow Christians with the members of the established church, an affectation which is rallied by the Dean with his usual spirit. Among other instances, to expose the absurdity of it, he has the following:

*Thus at the bar that blockhead Bettsworth,
Though half a crown o'erpays his sweat's worth,
Who knows in law nor text nor margin,
Calls Singleton () his brother serjeant.

These lines so provoked Bettsworth, who was also a member of the Irish parliament, that he swore, in the hearing of many persons, to revenge himself, either by murdering or maiming the Author: and for this purpose he engaged his footman, with two ruffians, to secure the Dean wherever he could be found. As soon as this oath and attempt were known, thirty of the nobility and gentry of the liberty of St Patrick waited upon the Dean in form, and presented a paper, subscribed with their names, in which they solemnly engaged, in behalf of themselves and the rest of the liberty, to defend his person and fortune, as the friend and benefactor of his country. When this paper was delivered, Swift was in bed, giddy and deaf, having been some time before seized with one of his fits: But, with all the dignity of habitual preëminence, he dictated the following answer.

'Gentlemen,

(122) Lord Orrery, Letter VII.

(123) p. 27.

(124) It was this that justified Swift in disowning Gulliver's travels to the Princess, afterwards Queen Caroline, as mentioned in remark [LL].

(125) See remark [MM].

(*) This gentleman was long the boast of Ireland for his extraordinary fluency in the law.

fits of giddiness and deafness became more frequent and violent, as he grew into years; and in 1736, while he was writing a satire on the Irish Parliament, which he called The Legion Club, he was seized with one of these fits, the effects of which were so dreadful, that he left the Poem unfinished, and never afterwards attempted a composition of any length, either in verse or prose. From this time his memory was perceived gradually to decline, and he appeared every day more fretful and peevish (*), and even grew weary of life [PP]; yet his conversation remained still lively and severe, but the satire more frequent and more bitter. He also continued to correspond with his friends in England, particularly Mr Pope. In the beginning of the year 1741, his passions grew so violent, his memory so decayed, and his reason so depraved, that the utmost precautions were taken to keep all strangers from approaching him, and his friends found it necessary to have guardians appointed of his person and estate. Early in the year 1742, his reason was wholly subverted, and his rage became absolute madness. In October, after his phrenzy had continued several months, his left eye swelled to the size of an egg, and the lid appeared to be so much inflamed and discoloured, that the surgeon expected it to mortify; several large boils also broke out on his arms and body. The extreme pain of this tumour kept him waking near a month, and during one week it was with difficulty that five persons kept him by meer force from tearing out his own eyes. However, when the tumour subsided, and the pain left him, he appeared so far to have recovered his understanding and temper (mm), that the surgeon was not without hopes that he might once more enjoy society, and be amused by the company of his old friends (oo). But this hope was but of short duration; for a few days afterwards, he sunk into a state of total insensibility [QQ], slept much, and could not, without great difficulty, be prevailed upon to walk cross the room. After he had continued speechless a whole year in this state of helpless ideocy, his house-keeper went into his room on the 30th of November, 1743, in the morning, and telling him it was his birth-day, and that bonfires and illuminations were preparing to celebrate it as usual, he immediately replied, 'Tis all folly; they had better let it alone (ppp). This, and some other instances of sense and reason shewn afterwards, prove that his disorder had not totally destroyed, but only suspended the powers of his mind (qqq). But from the year 1744, he was perfectly silent to his death, which happened in the latter end of October, 1745, without the least pang or convulsion, in the seventy-eighth year of his age (rrr). Lord Orrery thinks he certainly foresaw his fate [RR]; that his frequent attacks of giddiness, and his manifest decay of memory, gave room for such apprehensions; and this seems to be countenanced by his last will, which is dated May 3, 1740, just before he ceased to be a reasonable Being. In it having left about twelve hundred pounds in specific legacies [SS], he bequeathed the rest of his fortune, which amounted to about eleven thousand pounds, to erect and endow an hospital for ideots and lunatics. He was buried in the great isle of St Patrick's Cathedral, under a stone of black marble, inscribed with an epitaph written by himself [TT]. His character was very singular,

‘Gentlemen,

‘I receive, with great thankfulness, these many kind expressions of your concern for my safety, as well as your declared resolution to defend me (as far as the laws of God and man will allow) against all murderers and ruffians, who shall attempt to enter into the liberty with any bloody and wicked designs upon my life, my limbs, my house, or my goods. Gentlemen, my life is in the hands of God, and, whether it may be cut off by treachery, or open violence, or by the common way of other men, as long as it continues, I shall ever bear a grateful memory for this favour you have shewn, beyond my expectation, and almost exceeding my wishes. The inhabitants of the liberty, as well as those of the neighbourhood, have lived with me in great amity for near twenty years; which I am confident will never diminish during my life. I am chiefly sorry that, by two cruel disorders of deafness and giddiness, which have pursued me for four months, I am not in a condition either to hear or to receive you, much less to return you my most sincere acknowledgments, which in justice and gratitude I ought to do. May God bless you and your families in this world, and make you for ever happy in the next (126).’

[PP] He grew weary of life.] This appears by many passages in his Letters, and expressions to his friends. Among other instances we shall give the following: In 1739, he had been standing with a Clergyman under a very large heavy pier-glass, which, just as they moved to another part of the room, fell down and broke to pieces; whereupon the Clergyman, turning to Swift, said, ‘What a mercy it is that we moved the moment we did; for if we had not, we should certainly have been killed.’ The Dean replied, that as to himself, he was sorry he had changed ground, and wished the glass had fallen upon him (*).

[QQ] He sunk into a state of total insensibility.] This was the effect of another disease, a kind of dropy; his brain was loaded with water. Mr Stevens, an ingenious clergyman of Dublin, pronounced this to be the case during his illness; and, upon opening his body, it appeared that he was not mistaken: but, though he often intreated the Dean's friends and physicians that his head might be trepanned to discharge the water, no regard was paid to his opinion or intreaty (127).

[RR] He certainly foresaw his fate.] ‘I have often,’ says Lord Orrery, heard him lament the state of childhood and idiotism to which some of the greatest men of this nation were reduced before their death. He mentioned, as examples within his own time, the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Somers: and, when he cited these melancholy instances, it was always with a heavy sigh, and with gestures that shewed great uneasiness, as if he felt an impulse of what was to happen to him before he died (128).’

[SS] Specific legacies.] His will, like all his other writings, is drawn up in a peculiar manner. Even in so serious a composition he could not help indulging himself in leaving legacies that carry with them an air of raillery and jest. He disposes of his three hats, his best, his second best, and his third best beaver, with an ironical solemnity that renders the bequests ridiculous. He bequeaths to Mr John Gratton a silver box, to keep in it the tobacco which the said John usually chewed, called pigtail. But his legacy to Mr Robert Gratton is still more extraordinary. Item, I bequeath to Mr Robert Gratton, Prebendary of St Andrew's, my strong box, on condition of his giving the sole use of the said box to his brother, Dr James Gratton, during the life of the said Doctor, who hath more occasion for it.

[TT] An epitaph written by himself.] It is in these terms:

HIC DEPOSITUM EST CORPUS
JONATHAN SWIFT, S. T. P.
HUIUS ECCLESIAE CATHEDRALIS DECANI,
UBI SÆVA INDIGNATIO
ULTERIUS COR LACERARE NEQUIT.
ABI VIATOR,
ET IMITARE, SI POTERIS,
STRENUM PRO VIRILI LIBERTATIS VINDICEM.
OBIIT ANNO [MDCCXLV]
MENSIS [OCTOBRIS] DIE [19]
ÆTATIS ANNO [LXXVIII.]

(nnn) He knew Mrs Whiteway, who was a relation and constantly attended him, took her by the hand and spoke to her with his former kindness. See her Letter, dated April 4, 1743, to Lord Orrery, inserted in his Letters, No. XI. He had taken her as a companion, after the death of Stella. Letters signed J. R. p. 129. Mrs Dingley not being agreeable to him. Letter to Dr Sheridan, No. XXVII.

(ppp) Hawkeforth, p. 31.

(qqq) Ibid. where other instances are mentioned.

(rrr) Ibid. and Lord Orrery, who observes, that even the rattling in his throat was scarce sufficient to give any alarm to his attendants, till within some very little time before he expired. Letter XXI.

(127) Delany, p. 149.

(128) Letter XXI.

(*) Some instances of this are related in Mrs Pilkington's memoirs.

(oo) Lord Orrery and Deane Swift.

(126) Appendix to the account of his life, &c. by Hawkins.

(*) Hawkeforth, p. 30.

lar, and has been attempted by several writers, the substance of which is as follows. In his person, he was large, robust, and masculine; his deportment was commanding, and his walk erect. His voice was sharp and high toned, especially when he read prayers, but not effeminate; and there was a natural severity in his aspect, which even his smiles could scarce soften, nor could his utmost gaiety relax. He was cleanly even to superstition; his nails were always paired to the quick, to prevent the least gathering of dirt under them, and he never dressed without a basin of water by him, with which he carefully cleansed his feet. Among his singularities, were his resolution never to wear spectacles, and his obstinate perseverance in the use of too much exercise (sss). Regularity was peculiar to him in all his actions, even in the greatest trifles. His hours of walking and reading never varied. His motions were guided by his watch, which was so constantly held in his hand, or placed before him on the table, that he seldom deviated many minutes in the daily revolutions of his exercises and employments. His manner was without ceremony, but not rustick; for he had a perfect knowledge of all the modes and variations of politeness and complaisance, which he practised in a manner peculiar to himself; and the respect that was due to him by these rules, he took care to exact, without the least abatement. He had seen the great world, and profited much by his experience. His capacity and strength of mind were undeniably equal to any task whatsoever. His pride, his spirit or his ambition, call it by what name you please, was boundless; but his views were checked in his younger years, and the anxiety of that disappointment had a visible effect upon all his actions. He was sour and severe, but not absolutely ill-natured. He was sociable only to particular friends, and to them only at particular hours. In company his rule was never to speak more than a minute at a time, and then to wait at least as long for others to take up the conversation. His colloquial stile, like that of his writing, was clear, forcible, and concise. He greatly excelled in punning, a talent he said which no man affected to despise, but those which were without it. But his conversation abounded with turns of wit of a higher kind [UU]. The Dean also greatly excelled in telling a story, his sentences were short and perspicuous, his observations piercing; and though in the latter part of his life he was very apt to tell his stories too often, yet his wit, as well as his virtues, was always superior to the wretched expedients of those despicable babblers, who are perpetually attempting to put off double entendre and prophaneness for wit and humour. His conversation was in the highest degree chaste, and wholly free from the least tincture of irreligion. As he was zealous to preserve all the delicacies of conversation, he was always best pleased, when some of the company (ttt) were ladies [WW]. He had not the least tincture of vanity in his conversa-

(sss) It wasted his flesh, and produced a poverty in his blood, of which he was told by his Physicians; and when he was reduced to idiotism, so as not to be able to walk, he recovered his flesh in a short time. Hawkesworth, p. 39.

(ttt) In a letter to Pope, written in 1732, he complains that even his female friends had forsaken him, which was what vexed him most.

It is inserted in his will, after expressing his desire to have his body buried in the great aisle of his Cathedral, on the South side, under the pillar next to the monument of Primate Narcissus Marsh, three days after his decease, as privately as possible, and at twelve o'clock at night, that a black marble of feet square, and seven feet from the ground, fixed to the wall, may be erected, with the inscription in large letters, deeply cut, and strongly gilded. Lord Orrery very justly remarks (129), 'that this monumental inscription serves to confirm an observation which he had made in a former letter, that the Dean was not an elegant writer of Latin. An harsher epitaph, continues his Lordship, has seldom been composed: it is scarce intelligible; and, if intelligible, is a proof how difficult a task it is, even for the greatest genius to draw his own character, or to represent himself and his actions in a proper manner.' The former letter, here referred to by his Lordship, is the tenth, where, in speaking of two Latin poems, Epistola ad Thomam Sberidan, and Carberia Rupes, he observes, that 'our Author was extremely solicitous to have them printed among his works (130): and, what is no less true than amazing, he assumes to himself more vanity upon these two Latin poems than upon many of his best English performances. It is said that Milton in his judgment, continues the noble Author, preferred the Paradise Regained to the Paradise Lost. There possibly might be found some excuse for such a preference; but in Swift's case there can be none: he understood the Latin language perfectly well, and he read it constantly; but he was no Latin poet. And if the Carberia Rupes and the Epistola ad Thomam Sberidan had been the produce of any other author, they must have undergone a severe censure from Dr Swift.'

[UU] Turns of wit of a higher kind.] The following deserves particular notice. He greatly admired the talents of the late Duke of Wharton, and, hearing him one day recount many of his frolics, Aye, my Lord, said he, you have had many frolics; but let me recommend one more to you: Take a frolic to be virtuous; I assure you it will do you more honour than all the rest (131).

[WW] He was best pleased in the company of the ladies.] The particular charm which attached him to their company and acquaintance is excellently set forth by Lord Orrery: 'I have just now, says his Lordship, cast my eye over a poem called Death and Daphne, which makes me relate an odd incident relating to that nymph. Swift, soon after our acquaintance, introduced me to her as to one of his female favourites. I had been scarce half an hour in her company, before she asked me if I had seen the Dean's poem upon *Death and Daphne. As I told her I had not, she immediately unlocked a cabinet, and, bringing out the MS, read it to me with a seeming satisfaction, of which at that time I doubted the sincerity. While she was reading, the Dean was perpetually correcting her for bad pronunciation, and for placing a wrong emphasis upon particular words. As soon as she had gone through the composition, she assured me smilingly, that the portrait of Daphne was drawn for herself †. I begged to be excused from believing it, and protested that I could not see one feature that had the least resemblance: but the Dean immediately burst into a laughter. You fancy, says he, that you are very polite, but you are much mistaken; that lady had rather be a Daphne drawn by me, than a Sacherissa by any other pencil. She confirmed what he had said with great earnestness; so that I had no other method of retrieving my error, than by whispering in her ear, as I was conducting her down stairs to dinner, that indeed I found

* Her hand as dry and cold as lead (132).

You see the command which Swift had over all his females, and would have smiled to have found his house a constant seraglio of very virtuous women (133), who attended him from morning till night, with an obedience, an awe, and an assiduity, that are seldom paid to the richest, or the most powerful lovers; no, not even to the Grand Signior himself. Not any of his Senators presumed to approach him when he signified his pleasure to remain in private, and without interruption. His nightgown and slippers were not easier put on or off, than his attendants. No Prince ever met with more flattery to his person, or more devotion to his mandates (134). To these ladies, proceeds his Lordship, Swift owed the publication of many pieces, which ought never to have been delivered to the press. He communicated every composition, as soon as finished, to his female senate, who not only passed their judgment on the performance; but constantly asked, and almost as constantly obtained a copy of it. You cannot be surprized, that it was immediately afterwards seen in print: and when printed, became a part of his works.

(*) It was written in 1730, and is inserted in his Works, Vol. IV Part I. p. 129. edit. 1755. 4 to.

(†) It is said she was, according to the common expression, as thin as death.

(132) A line that poem.

(133) This is evidently not meant in the strict literal sense of the word; for the animadversion upon it by Hawkesworth, p. 28.

(134) Lord Orrery, Letter X.

(129) Letter XXI.

(130) Where they are inserted in the second volume.

(131) Observation, p. 216.

tion; he used to say he was too proud to be vain. He generally spoke as he thought, in all companies, and at all times. If the conversation turned upon serious subjects, he was neither petulant in the debate, nor negligent of the issue. He would listen with great attention to the arguments of others, and whether he was engaged or not in the argument, he would recapitulate what had been said, state the question with great clearness and precision, point out the controverted particular, and appeal to the opinion, either of some neutral person, or of the majority. It is however true, that he kept his friends in some degree of awe, and was therefore rather an entertaining, than a desirable guest. He was open to adulation, and could not, or would not distinguish between low flattery, and just applause. Yet he was not less open to admonition, if it was offered without arrogance, and by persons of whose ability and honesty he had no doubt [XX]. Such was Swift as a companion; as a master, he was not less remarkable. As he expected punctual, ready, and implicit obedience, he always tried his servants when he hired them, by some test of their humility. Among other questions, he always asked whether they understood cleaning shoes; 'because, said he, my kitchen-wench (uuu) has a scullion that does her drudgery, and one part of the business of my groom and footman, is constantly to clean her shoes 'by turns;' if they scrupled this, the treaty was at an end; if not, he gave them a further hearing. He appeared to be churlish and austere to his domestics in general; but in reality was a good master (www). As a member of civil society, he was a zealous advocate for liberty, the detector of fraud, and the scourge of oppression. In politics, he was neither Whig nor Tory, Jacobite nor Republican; he was Dr Swift. As an Ecclesiastic, he was scrupulously exact, in the exercise of his function [YY], as well with regard to spiritual as temporal things. He was extremely exact and conscientious in promoting the members of his choir according to their merit, and never advanced any person to a vicarage, who was not qualified in all respects in the highest degree [ZZ]. He could never be induced to take fines for any of the chapter-lands [AAA]. He always chose to raise the rents, as the method least oppressive to the present tenant, and most advantageous to all future tenants and landlords; he constantly refused to give charity out of the chapter-funds [BBB], which he alledged were scarce sufficient to maintain the necessary repairs of the cathedral, and he expended more money to support and adorn it, than had been applied to the same use in any period of equal length since it was first built. He was a faithful Guardian of the (uuu) This was his Cook, a wench of a large size, robust constitution, and coarse features, her face very much seamed with the small-pox, and furrowed by age. He always distinguished her by the name of sweet-heart. Hawkeſworth, P. 34.

(www) He gave them board-wages at the highest rate, and if any of them left any part of their wages un-received, he paid them interest for that time. Id. ibid.

(135) J. R. p. 19.

(136) Hawkeſworth, p. 33.

(137) In the Article of Lord Bolognere, Vol. I. p. 3577. Rem. [FF].

[XX] He was open to admonition. As an instance of this, we are told that in his Poem of Baucis and Philemon, which does not consist of quite two hundred verses, Mr Addison made him blot out fourscore, add fourscore, and alter fourscore (135); to this may be added the following instance: It was customary with his friends to make him some little annual present on his birthday: Dr Delany, soon after he was admitted to some degree of intimacy, sent him, with such a memorial of his esteem, some verses, in which he upbraids him, though with great delicacy, for misapplying his talents, and admonishes him to turn the force of his ridicule, of which he was so great a master, upon those who had laboured to employ it against the sacred doctrines of Christianity. The Dean, as he had suffered Addison's correction with approbation, received the admonition with kindness: he sighed, and said, with great appearance of regret, that it was too late, and from that day, took all occasions to distinguish Dr Delany by the name of friend (136). The Reader will find a third instance of this sort, in the course of his work (137), in the case of a most severe reprobation from his friend Pope, which was apparently taken as kindly as it was meant.

[YY] He was exact in the exercise of his function. In this respect he had one very singular practice. As he constantly attended the service of the church, so as soon as the preacher mounted the pulpit, the Dean took out a pencil and a piece of paper, and carefully noted whatever was wrong both in the expressions and the manner in which they were delivered, whether they were too scholastic to be generally understood, or so coarse and vulgar as was unbecoming the dignity and gravity of a sermon: and he never failed to make these the subject of an admonition to the preacher as soon as he came into the chapter-house. We have already observed, that though he did not understand music, yet he always attended at the anthem to see that the choir did their duty; and notwithstanding his want of skill in it, his power of ridicule extended even to music, of which he gave an instance too singular to be forgotten. Dr Pratt, who was the Provost of Dublin-college, had, in his travels, acquired much of the Italian taste for this art, and Tom Rossgrave, a celebrated performer, being just returned from Italy, played a voluntary one day at St Patrick's cathedral: the Doctor happened to dine at the deanery the same day, and was so extravagant in his encomiums on Rossgrave's voluntary, that several of the company said they wished they had heard it. Do you? said Swift; then you shall hear it still; and immediately fung out so lively, and yet so ridiculous an imitation of it, that all the company were kept in continual laughter till it was over; except one old gentleman, who sat with great composure; and, though he listened, yet shewed neither curiosity nor approbation: after the entertainment he was asked by some of the company, how it happened that he had been no more affected with the music? to which he answered, with great gravity, that he had heard Mr Rossgrave himself play it before (138).

[ZZ] He was very conscientious in disposing of a vicarage. He once refused a vicarage to a person; for whom the Lady Carteret was very importunate, though he declared to her Ladyship, that if it had been in his power to have made the Gentleman a Dean or a Bishop, he would have obliged her willingly; because, said he, Deaneries and Bishoprics are preferments in which merit hath no concern, though the merit of a vicar will be brought to the test every day (139).

[AAA] He never raised the fines, but the rents of the chapter-lands. He once resolved never to renew a certain lease belonging to the deanery, without raising the rent 30l. a year. The tenant had often solicited him, instead of raising the rent, to take a larger fine; and this man, a very short time before the Dean had lost his memory, urged him with a very large sum, not doubting of success from the Dean's known fondness for money. But the Dean maintained his integrity, refused the offer with indignation, and fulfilled his purpose of raising the rent, though at this time his memory was so bad, that the next day he did not remember what he had done; and his love of money so predominant over every thing but his virtue, that, though he complained of being deserted, yet he banished his best friends, merely to save the expence of entertaining them, and would sometimes refuse them a single bottle of wine (140).

[BBB] He refused to give charity out of the chapter-funds. When any person solicited such an alienation, he used to tell them that this money was appropriated; but, says he, as you declare, that the person to be relieved is an object of Christian charity, I will give out of my private purse any sum proportioned to my revenue, if you will contribute a sum in the same proportion to yours; my deanery is worth 700l per annum, your income is 200l. if you will give two shillings, I will give seven, or any larger sum after the same rate (141).

(138) Hawkeſworth, p. 37.

(139) Letter signed J. R. p. 19.

(140) Letter signed J. R. p. 245 and 228.

(141) Ibid. p. 192.

(xxx) Letters to Sheridan, No.
XXIII.

(yyy) Hawkef-
worth, p. 37.

rights of his Deanery, and even determined to assert his right of absence against the Archbishop of Dublin, at the expence of several hundred pounds, when he did not believe he should ever again claim the privileges for himself; because he would not hurt his successor by an injurious president (xxx). The poor, in the liberty of his Cathedral, were better regulated than any other in the kingdom: They were all badged, and were never found begging out of their district. For these, he built and furnished a little Alms-house, being assisted by some voluntary contributions, and he preserved among them uncommon cleanliness and decency, by constantly visiting them in person. Nor was his care and kindness confined to his Cathedral; he improved his Living of Laracor, though he continued there but a short time, and left both the house and glebe a convenient and agreeable retreat to his successor, at a considerable expence (yyy). In his private capacity, he was not only charitable but generous, and whatever misanthropy may be found in his writings, there does not appear to have been any in his life. His writings in defence of the poor people of Ireland are well known, and that he might not be wanting himself, while he pleaded their cause with others, he constantly lent out a large sum of money in small portions to honest, industrious, and necessitous tradesmen, upon easy terms [CCC]. Besides this, he frequently gave five and ten pounds, without any parade, when proper objects offered. He was diligent to relieve the poor, and at the same time, to encourage industry, even in the lowest station; he used regularly to visit a great number of poor, chiefly women, as well in the public streets, as in the bye allies, and under the arches of Dublin [DDD]. If he was not exempt from the infirmity of loving money, yet he was clear of the vice. If his œconomy degenerated into avarice, it must be confessed it did not contract his bounty. He turned all the evil of excessive frugality upon himself; it induced him to walk when he had been used to ride, and he would then say, he had earned a shilling or eighteen-pence, which he had a right to do what he pleased with, and which he constantly applied to his usual charities, which by this expedient he could continue, and yet expend less upon the whole than before [EEE]. Whilst he abounded in charity, he was not less diligent in the practice of other virtues, or less devout and constant in the solemnities of religion. He was remarkably temperate, both in eating and drinking. He was not only just but punctual in his dealings, and he had an inviolable regard for truth. As he constantly attended divine worship when he was at home, so he used always to go early to church when he was in London, and never to sleep without assembling his family in his own chamber to prayers. An abhorrence of hypocrisy was a striking particular in his character; he even carried it to such an excess, that it is not easy to determine, whether it was more a virtue than a vice; for it brought upon him the charge of irreligion, and encouraged others to be irreligious. In proportion as he abhorred hypocrisy, he dreaded the imputation of it, and therefore concealed his piety with as much diligence, as others conceal their vices, which custom has not made reputable [FFF]. As his abhorrence of hypocrisy exempted him from affectation, the natural equity of his mind secured him against envy. He cultivated genius wherever he found it, and in whatever degree, with great zeal and assiduity, and would frequently spend much time in correcting and improving any literary composition

[CCC] He lent large sums upon easy terms. The money was repaid, with a small gratuity by way of interest, to the person who kept the account of the disbursements and weekly payment; for he received back these loans by a certain sum out of the weekly profit of the borrower's trade in such proportions as the whole should be repaid in a year (142).

(142) Ibid.
p. 203, 204.

[DDD] He visited the poor in bye allies. Some of these sold plumbs, some hobnails, others tape, and others gingerbread, some knitted, some darned stockings, and others cobbled shoes; these women were most of them old, deformed, or crippled, and some were all three. He saluted them with great kindness, asked how they throve, and what stock they had; if the ware of any of them was such as he could possibly use, or pretend to use, he bought some, and paid for every halfpenny-worth sixpence; if not, he always added something to their stock, and strictly charged them to be industrious and honest (143).

(143) Letters
signed J. R.
p. 132, 133.

[EEE] Yet expend less upon the whole than before. The distribution even of this charity was marked with the peculiarity of his temper; for, that he might proportion his bounty to the necessities and the merit of various objects, and yet give but one piece of money at a time, he constantly kept a pocket full of all sorts of coin from a silver threepence to a crown piece (144). Some of these poor people, to whom he used to give money when he met them in his walks, he named, partly for distinction and partly for humour, Cancerina, Stumpa-nympha, Pull-a-gown-a, Friterilla, Flora, Stumpantba. In a letter to Dr Sheridan he writes thus: 'No soul has broke his neck, or is hanged, or married; only Cancerina is dead, and I let her go to her grave without a coffin and without fees (145).'

(144) Ibid.
p. 13.

(145) His Letter,
No. XXXIII,
dated Dublin,
March 7, 1733.

[FFF] He concealed his piety with diligence. His constant attendance at church when he was at the deanery, he knew would be considered as the duty of his station; but whatever had the appearance of voluntary devotion he always took care to hide: when he went to church in London, it was early in the morning; so that, though he was constantly at prayers and at the sacrament, yet he appeared to neglect both, as he was at home when others were at church; and, when he went to prayers in his family, the servants assembled at the appointed hour as it were by stealth, without notice from a bell, or any other call except the striking of a clock: so that Dr Delany was six months in his family, before he suspected him of this unfashionable practice.

The same principle, upon which he thus studiously avoided the appearance of good, made him frequently incur appearances of evil, especially when an opportunity offered of indulging his peculiar vein of humour. One instance of this has already been given (146); but there are others less excusable. Soon after he was made Dean of St Patrick's, he had dined one Sunday with Dr Raymond, Vicar of Trim; and when the bell had rung, and the people were assembled to evening prayers at the church, which was not above two hundred yards distant, 'Raymond, said he, I'll lay you a crown that I begin prayers before you this afternoon.' Dr Raymond accepted the wager; and they both ran as fast as they could to church. Raymond, being much nimbler than Swift, arrived first at the door, and, entering the church, walked decently towards the reading desk; Swift never slackened his pace; but running up the aisle, left Dr Raymond behind him in the middle of it, and stepping into the desk, without putting on a surplice, or opening the book, began the service in an audible voice, and thus won his wager (147).

(146) The first time of reading prayers on a Wednesday at Laracor.

(147) Hawkef-
worth, p. 38.

that

that had the least appearance of ingenuity [GGG]. As a Writer, he had no equal. His style is masterly, correct, and strong, never diffusive, yet always clear; and if we consider it in comparison of his Predecessors, he has out-done them all, and is one, perhaps the chief, of those few select English Writers, who have excelled in elegance and propriety of language (zzz). In politics, his favourite topic, he appears like a masterly gladiator; he wields the sword of party with ease, justness, and dexterity, and while he entertains the ignorant and the vulgar, he draws an equal attention from the learned and the great [HHH]. When he is serious, his gravity becomes him; when he laughs, his readers must laugh with him. In poetry, he would not take pains to excel; but became, in some measure, superior to it, and assumed more the air and manner of a Critic, than a Poet (aaaa). But what shall be said for his love of trifles, and his want of delicacy and decorum (bbbb)? Forgive him these errors, and draw a veil over certain excrescences of wit and humour; you will then admire him as an honour to the public, and a scourge to all the knaves and fools of his time. Upon the whole, his conduct was greatly variegated, so much as to appear even capricious and contradictory. However, if we look a little deeper than the surface, these seeming contradictions will be found to arise from the same principles. Swift was naturally temperate and chaste, it was therefore easy for him to be frugal; but he was also naturally high-spirited, and therefore as wealth is the pledge of independence, it is not strange his frugality should verge to excess. However, as he acted upon Christian principles of general virtue, he did not deliver himself up to natural propensions, when contrary to his duty; and therefore his love of money did not contract his charity to the poor, or defraud his successors to enrich himself. The same spirit which secured his integrity, by disdaining the meanness of a lye, produced that dread of hypocrisy which concealed his piety, and betrayed him into appearances of evil; and the same want of natural tenderness which made him obdurate and austere, transferred the distribution of his liberality from instinct to religion. Such was Jonathan Swift, whose life, with all the advantages of genius and learning, was a scale of infelicity, gradually ascending, till pain and anguish destroyed the faculties by which they were felt. An instructive lesson to teach the wise humility, and the simple content. The first authentic edition of his Works was printed at Dublin in eight Volumes, 8vo. (cccc); after this several editions were printed at London (dddd), the last of which came out in 1755, in six Volumes 4to, with his life prefixed by John Hawkesworth; and again in twelve Volumes, 8vo, 1761. The Doctor had begun a History of England, and had pursued it through two or three reigns from William the Conqueror; but the contempt which he conceived of our ancient Monarchs, made him soon lay the design aside (eeee).

(zzz) Lord Orrery, Letter VI. who says, he exceeds Tillotson in perspicuity, and Addison in humour.

(aaaa) Lord Orrery declares, that had Swift lived in the same age with Horace, he would have approached nearer to him than any other Poet; which his Lordship has endeavoured to justify by running the parallel through many particulars. Ibid.

(cccc) The four first Volumes came out in 1735, which were followed by the fifth and sixth in our Author's life-time, and the two last Volumes were added after his death: See Lord Orrery, Letter VI. and Hawkesworth's Preface.

(148) Fitz-osborne's letters, Vol. II.

[GGG] He improved the works of others, &c. Nor was this kindness confined to those whose parts could never come in competition with his own; he started many hints to Mr Gay; and he recommended Addison, Congreve, Parnel, Pope, and many others, to those whose favours were most likely to render them conspicuous. [HHH] Mr Melmouth has lately opened the secret. He observes, that Swift's style has this peculiarity, not to have one metaphor in his works. His images are surprizingly unexpected, and exhibited in their true, genuine, native form; this strikes the greatest: and, being fetched generally from common life, they captivate the lowest of the people (148). Hence he appears a Beggar among Beggars, and a King among Kings.

SYDENHAM [Dr THOMAS], a learned Physician, and of very great practice, in the XVIIth century, was the son of William Sydenham of Winford Eagle in Dorsetshire Esq; and born there in the year 1624 [A]. In Midsummer-term, 1642, he was entered a Commoner of Magdalen-hall in Oxford: But leaving the university when it became a garrison for the use of King Charles I, he went to London. There he fell accidentally into the company of Dr Thomas Cox, a noted and eminent Physician, who finding him to be a person of more than ordinary parts, encouraged and put him into a method to study physic at his return to the university. Upon the delivery of that place to the Parliament's forces, in 1646, he retired again to Magdalen-hall (a), and entering on the Physic Line, was created Batchelor in that faculty April 14, 1648 (b), not having before taken any degree in Arts. About that time, submitting to the authority of the Visitors appointed by Parliament, he was, by means of a near relation of his, made Fellow of All-Souls College, in the room of one ejected at the Penbrochian Visitation. Having continued some years there, and studied Physic with the utmost industry and application, he left the university without his Doctor's degree, which he took afterwards at Cambridge; and settling at Westminster, practised his faculty with the utmost success and reputation: so that he was esteemed the chief Physician in that city from the year 1660 to 1670. He was particularly famous for the cool regimen which he prescribed in the Small-pox [B], and

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 839.

(b) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 65. He was created at the Visitation of the University by the Earl of Penbroke.

[A] And born there in the year 1624. That he was born in the year 1624, I infer from hence, because in Midsummer term 1642, the time of his admission in the University, he was aged eighteen years, or thereabouts, as Mr Wood informs us (1).

[B] He was particularly famous for the cool regimen which he prescribed in the Small-pox. When he first began to practise; the common method in fashion among the most eminent Physicians, both of the Court and City, was to use their utmost endeavours to subdue the malignity and putrefaction, which, in their judgment, tainted and dissolved the blood in the confluent kind of small-pox, by the use of the most generous and active medicines; such as Venice-treacle, Virginian snake-root, contrayerva, zedoary, saffron, volatile salt of hartshorn, powder of viper's flesh, and the like. But Dr Sydenham fell upon the cool regimen, and discharged all the train of warm alexipharmic remedies, such as those here enumerated, and instituted a method of practice the reverse to theirs. For he opened not only the curtains round the bed, but often the windows likewise to let in fresh air into the room; took the sick persons out of bed, and plied them constantly with diluting and attempering, or with

(bbb) The trifles are inserted in the last Volume of his Works, and the chief of his pieces charged with indelicacy, is The Lady's Dressing-Room, in Vol. IV. Part I. p. 113. et seqq. in a note to which is offered this apology, that while the Dean writes against delicacy, he teaches it.—And so I have heard it said of a common swearer, that he swore enough to bring swearing out of fashion.

(ddd) Particularly one in thirteen Volumes, 22mo. in 1742.

(eee) Lord Orrery, Letter XXIV.

(1) Ath. at supra.

and that has been almost universally followed since, to the inexpressible benefit of Mankind, as it hath preserved millions of Lives. He was famous also for his method of giving the bark after the paroxysm, or return of the fit, in agues; and for his use of laudanum (c). In the latter part of his life, he was Licentiate of the College of Physicians; and, at the request chiefly of his friends, he communicated at divers times to the world, the useful Observations he made in the course of his practice [C]. Having for a long time been with acid and cooling remedies. In the mean time he often, through the several stages of the distemper, prescribed six drachms or an ounce of syrup of white poppies to be taken in the evening, or at the beginning of the night, and to be repeated, and the dose to be increased, as great wakefulness and inquietude should demand. This account we give in Sir Richard Blackmore's words (2). But we cannot help observing, how injuriously he treats Dr Sydenham, in the same place; when he ascribes this practice of his not to skill and judgment, but to obstinacy, and downright opposition to the rest of the faculty. . . . Our most celebrated Physicians (saith Sir Richard) before Dr Sydenham declared for the hot regimen; but that Doctor having taken a resolution at his first entering upon the practice of Physic, as he himself assured me in conversation, to act directly contrary in all cases to the common method then in fashion among the most eminent Physicians, (and he told me his reasons for it) in conformity to the design, did, in the management of this disease, as well as others, oppose the common method of the Physicians of the Court and City. But it appears from the Doctor's own observations, that he grounded his practice upon more rational principles than opposition. Of which take the following specimen (3) . . . To me, saith he, indeed it seems agreeable to reason, that the longer Nature is in working and perfecting separation, so the ebullition be not quite torpid, so much the more certainly and universally the separation is performed; and upon its being so finished, it is necessary that the success of the following cure must especially depend, as from the contrary method the event of the business must be quite contrary; for from that hot regimen no good comes, as from over-hasty fruit no advantage; seeing it frequently happens, that the patient falls either downright into a phrenzy, or, which is worse, great sweats arise, whereby particles not fit for separation, nor answering the nature of pus (which very pus notwithstanding is the genuine product of this separation) are ejected, or the small-pox being too much forced out, by giving cordials, and by a hot regimen, run all into one, a sad spectacle, and that threatens a fatal event: and these and the like symptoms are usually occasioned by these errors; whereas I never observed any mischief from the other method, for Nature, left to herself, does her work in her own time, and separates, and then expels the matter in the right way and manner. . . . Elsewhere, he lays it down for a rule, Quo sedatior est sanguis, eo melius erumpent pustulae; i. e. The calmer the blood is, the better will the pustules of the small-pox come out (4).

(c) Wood, Ath. ut supra. See our Author's Works.

[C] He communicated at divers times to the world the useful Observations he made in the course of his practice.] They seem to have been mostly drawn, not to say extorted, from him by his friends: some of them being written by way of letter to Gentlemen that desired his opinion, or pressed him to make public what observations he had made; conceiving a very high opinion of his abilities, from what he had already published. They came out in the following order; I. Methodus curandi Febres, propriis observationibus superstructa, i. e. The method of curing Fevers, founded upon his own observations. Lond. 1666. 4to. A second edition, corrected and enlarged, was printed in 1668. 8vo. having an additional section concerning the Plague. This volume contains, Remarks upon acute and epidemick diseases in general. The epidemick constitution of the years 1661, 62, 63, 64. Of the continual Fever of the years 1661, 62, 63, 64. Of the Agues of the years 1661, 62, 63, 64. The epidemick constitution of the years 1665, and 1666, at London; and of the pestilential Fever and Plague in those years. II. Observationes Medicæ circa Morborum acutorum Historiam & Curationem. Lond. 1676. 8vo; i. e. Physical Observations on the History and Cure of acute Diseases. In these the particulars are; Of the epidemick constitution of the years 1667, 68, and part of the year 1669, at London. Of the regular Small-pox, within that period. Of the continual Fever, within the same period. Of the epidemick constitution of part of the year 1669, and of the years 1670, 1671, 1672, at London. Of the Cholera-morbus of the year 1669. Of the Bloody-flux of part of the year 1669, and of the years 70, 71, 72. Of the continual Fever of part of the year 1669, and in 1670, 71, 72. Of the Measles in the year 1670. Of the irregular Small-pox, in the years 1670, 71, 72. Of the bilious Colick of the years 1670, 71, 72. Of the epidemick constitution of part of the year 1673, and of the years 1674, 75. Of the continual Fever of the years 1673, 74, 75. Of the Measles of the year 1674. Of the irregular Small-pox, in the years 1674, 75. Of the epidemick Coughs with a Pleurisie, and Peripneumonia coming upon them, of the year 1675. Of the intercurrent Fevers; viz. Of the Scarlet Fever; Of a Pleurisie; Of a Bastard Peripneumonia; Of a Rheumatism; Of an Erysipelatose Fever; Of the Quinsie. III. Epistolæ responsivæ duæ; prima de Morbis epidemickis ab anno 1675 ad ann. 1680; secunda de Luis Venereæ Historia & Curatione. Lond. 1680. 8vo; i. e. Two Letters written by way of answer; the first, of epidemick Diseases from the year 1675 to 1680, to Dr Robert Brady, Master of Caius college, and the King's Professor of Physick in Cambridge; the second, of the History and Cure of the Venereal disease, to Dr Henry Paman, Fellow of St John's college, and Public Orator in the same University; and Professor of Physick in Gresham-college, London. IV. Dissertatio Epistolaris ad spectatiss. & doctiss. virum Guliel. Cole, M. D. de Observationibus nuperis circa Curationem Variolarum confluentium, necnon de Affectione Hystericâ. Lond. 1682. 8vo; i. e. An Epistolary Discourse to Dr William Cole, containing his new Observations on the confluent Small-pox, and also Observations on Hysterick Diseases. V. Traictatus de Podagrâ & Hydrope. Lond. 1683. 8vo; i. e. A Treatise of the Gout and Dropsy. Dedicated to Dr Thomas Short, Fellow of the College of Physicians in London. VI. Schedula monitoria de novæ Febris ingressu. Lond. 1686; i. e. A Monitorary Schedule, or Short Advice, concerning the new Fever in 1686. Inscribed to Dr Charles Goodall, Fellow of the College of Physicians. VII. 'Of the putrid Fever coming upon the flux Pox.' VIII. 'Of bloody Urine from a Stone in the Kidneys.'—The above several pieces were collected together, and published under this title, Processus integri in Morbis ferè omnibus curandis, a Thoma Sydenham conscripti; quibus accessit graphica Symptomatum delineatio. Lond. 1693. 8vo. Reprinted several times at London, and also at Amsterdam, Leiden, Leipzig, Geneva, &c. J. Pechey, M. D. hath translated them into English, in one volume, 8vo, intituled, 'The whole works of that excellent practical Physician, Dr Thomas Sydenham. Wherein not only the History and Cures of acute Diseases are treated of, after a new & accurate method; but also the shortest and safest way of curing most chronical Diseases.' . . . And another translation of them by J. Swan, M. D. was published in 1749. 8vo.

These "incomparable Treatises, as Dr Goodall rightly observes (5), are drawn (as it were by another Hippocrates) from his most exact and nice observation of Diseases, and their symptoms; to which are added most judicious natural Hypotheses, and curative Indications, deduced from them. He hath given such an exact history of all acute diseases, from the beginning of 1661, to 1680, that there is scarcely a sentence to be found therein, which is not of moment. Several weighty observations are likewise taken notice of by this sagacious Physician, which other Authors have omitted, as particularly the several constitutions of the Air specifically different, which depend not upon the manifest qualities thereof, but upon some inexplicable causes, and produce Diseases as specifically different, which Constitutions, after some time, give place one to another; and are accompanied with a peculiar and specifically different Fever, both as to its symptoms and cure; these Fevers he calls stationary, distinguishing them from the sporadique, or intercurrent Fevers, depending upon the manifest qualities or alterations of the Air; the Ptyalism that attends adult persons, and the Diarrhœa which usually accompanies Children in the Flux-pox; the day when the Ptyalism ordinarily ceaseth,

(5) Proceeding of the College Physicians against Empiric in the Epistle Dedicatory.

(2) Treatise of the Small-pox, edit. Lond. 1723. 8vo. sect. 3. p. 47.

(3) See his works in English, edit. 1701. p. 88, 89. where he treats of the irregular small-pox in the years 1667, 1668, and part of 69.

(4) Epistolary Discourse to Dr Cole.

been troubled with the Gout (d); about the year 1670, he began to be more sorely afflicted with that excruciating distemper; which much hindered his practice, and his great usefulness in the world. After having greatly suffered by it, he died at his house in Pall-Mall, Westminster, December 29, 1689, and was buried in the south isle of St James's Church. He was a learned man, of a solid judgment, and a florid Writer; of a generous and public spirit, great integrity, and very charitable (e). The character given of him by Sir Richard Blackmore, is both false and injurious [D].

(d) See his Treatise of the Gout, about the beginning: When he wrote that Treatise he had been thirty-four years troubled with it.

Dr Sydenham's eldest brother, named William, was engaged, and zealous, in the Parliament's Service; a Colonel; Governor of Weymouth, and of the Isle of Wight; Member of Cromwell's Parliaments, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, &c. (f). His eldest daughter, Mary, was married to Walter Thornhill of Wareham in Dorsetshire, and by him had the late celebrated Painter, Sir James Thornhill Knight.

(f) For a further account of him, see Whitelock's Memorials, edit. 1732. p. 75, 95, 116, 134, 597, 627, 631, 654, 666, 675, 678, 680, 685, 693.

ceaseth, with the danger ensuing thereupon; the great tendency to symptomatical sweats, in the distinct Pox; Convulsions in Children before the eruption of the Small-pox, which he observeth to be the usual prognostick of a mild distemper; the mania or frenzy following Agues, with the different cure it requires; the Jaundice, observable at the going off of the colica hysterica; the limpid Urine, which he asserts to be the most universal and pathognomonick sign of hysterical and hypochondriacal affections; which diseases do frequently assume the shape of nephritick and colical distempers, yet are really different, both in their original and cure; with many of the like kind, dispersed throughout his Book."

It appears from his writings, That he regulated his Practice more by his own Observations and Enquiries, than by the method either of his predecessors or contemporaries.

There was among Bishop More's MSS. 'Theologia Rationalis, by Dr Sydenham the famous Physician:' which we suppose is now, among the rest of his books, in the public Library of the University of Cambridge.

[D] The character given of him by Sir Richard Blackmore, is both false and injurious. It is in his Treatise upon the Small-pox (6) that he gives this character of Dr Sydenham. For, having observed, that 'a man of good sense, vivacity, and spirit, may arrive to the highest rank of Physicians without the assistance of great Erudition, and the knowledge of Books;' . . . This (adds he) was the case of Dr Sydenham, who became an able and eminent Physician, though he never designed to take up the profession till the civil wars were composed; and then being a disbanded officer, he entered upon it for a maintenance, without any learning preparatory for the undertaking of it. And to shew the reader what contempt he had for writings in Physic, when one day I asked him to advise me what books I should read to qualify me for practice, he replied, Read Don Quixote, it is a very good book, I read it still. So low an opinion had this celebrated man of the learning collected out of the authors, his predecessors. And a late celebrated Physician (7), whose judgment was universally relied upon as almost infallible in his profession, used to say, as I am well informed, that when he died, he would leave behind him the whole mystery of Physic in half a sheet of paper. It is true, both these Doctors carried the matter much too far by vilifying Learning, of which they were no matters, and perhaps for that reason.—In this passage there are several mistakes. For it is false, that Dr Sydenham was a disbanded officer—that he never designed to take up the profession of Physic till the civil wars were composed—that he did it for a maintenance; for his father was a gentleman of a plentiful estate (8). And his style and manner of writing plainly shew, that he had all the learning preparatory for any Science. . . . As for the advice, here mentioned, it was plainly a banter; and shews, what low opinion the Doctor had of the then young Mr Blackmore's genius and capacity, and that he thought him fitter to study Don Quixote than Physic. . . . It seems Sir Richard was feverely censured, for the mean Reflexions he had here made upon Learning. For, in another place (9), he is forced to make an apology for himself, in the following words 'Some Gentlemen have been disingenuous and unjust to me, by wresting and forcing my meaning in the Preface to another book, as if I condemned and exposed all Learning, though they knew I declared, that I greatly honoured and esteemed all men of superior Literature, and Erudition, and that I only undervalued false or superficial Learning, that signifies nothing for the Service of Mankind; and that as to Physick, I expressly affirmed, that Learning must be joined with native Genius to make a Physician of the first rank; but if those talents are separated, I asserted, and do still insist, that a man of native Sagacity and Diligence, will prove a more able and useful Practiser, than a heavy notional Scholar, encumbered with a heap of confused Ideas: For I never shall be convinced, that a man, either of a dull Thought and a cloudy Imagination, let his head be ever so much stuffed with undigested notions; nor on the other hand, one who is a meer rattle, and pertly insignificant, or offensive by a strong infusion of the coxcomb in his make, will ever prove a good Physician.'

(9) Preface to A Treatise of Consumptions, &c. ed. 1725. 8vo. p. xiii.

The character given of Dr Sydenham by the learned Dr Sewell (10), in the following lines, is more candid as well as more just.

(10) Prefixed to Sir Richard Blackmore's Treatise of Consumptions. Lond. 1725. 8vo.

SYDENHAM, at length, a mighty Genius, came,
Who founded Medicine on a nobler Frame.
Who studied Nature through, and Nature's Larvs,
Nor blindly puzzled for the peccant cause.
Father of Physick He . . . Immortal Name!
Who leaves the Grecian but a second fame:
Sing forth, ye Muses, in sublimer strains,
A new Hippocrates in Britain reigns;
With every healing Plant his grave adorn,
Saviour of many Millions yet unborn:
Forgive this Tribute to the glorious Dead,
You knew The Man, whom I have only read;
More is his Due who freed me from the Rules
Of tyrant Notions, and pedantick Schools.
Keep him ye humbler Sons of Art in view,
Hopeless to teach, ambitious to pursue.

The great Mr Locke wrote a Poem, in praise of our learned Author's Method of curing Fevers, which is prefixed to his works in Latin. We have reason to wonder, that it is not inserted in the collection of Mr Locke's works, three Volumes folio, together with the same Author's two Poems on the Peace between England and the United Provinces in 1654 (11); since, without them, his works are not complete.

(11) They are inserted in Musarum Oxoniensium 'Ελληνισμοί; and State-Poems continued, Vol. II. p. 8, 13, ed. 1697. 8vo.

SYDNEY, or SIDNEY [Sir PHILIP], the darling of his time, was the eldest son of Sir Henry Sydney [A], by Mary his wife, eldest daughter of John Dudley Duke of Northumberland.

[A] Was the eldest son of Sir Henry Sidney. The Sidney family, anciently seated at Cranley in Surrey, and Kingesham in Suffex, derive themselves lineally from Sir William Sidney, Knt, that came out of Anjou with King Henry II, who then made him his Chamberlain.—From him descended Sir William Sidney, Knt, a brave officer by sea and land in King Henry VIIIth's reign, Chamberlain, and Steward to that King. He died Feb. 11. 1552-3, leaving Henry his son and heir, mentioned above. This Henry was from his infancy bred at Court, being a companion, and many times a bed-fellow to Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward VI, who, when he came to the crown, made him principal Gentleman of his Privy chamber; knighted him in 1549; and sent him ambassador to France, when he was but two and twenty years of age; and, in 1550, constituted edit. 1723. Preface, 1.

Wood, Ath. above; and Pechey's Introduction to his translation of our Author's Works.

Dr John deLille,

See Dr Pechey's Preface to translation of Author's works.

kind of learning (e). Upon his leaving the university, in 1572, he was sent to travel [D]; and, though aged but eighteen, gained reverence and esteem among some of the most learned men abroad (f). Charles IX, King of France, under pretence of being taken with his knowledge and extraordinary merit, made him one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber [E]. But it was justly thought, that this was only one of the treacherous favours heaped by that base Prince on the Protestants, in order to trepan Admiral Coligni and his adherents to Paris, at the King of Navarre's wedding; when the Protestants, fancying themselves secure by that marriage, were barbarously massacred on the 24th of August, 1572 (g). In that extremity of danger, Mr Sidney secured himself by taking refuge in the house of Sir Francis Walsingham (b), Embassador there from the Queen of England. Thence he went through Lorraine, and by Strasburg and Heidelberg, in September or October following, to Francford: where he lodged in the house of the famous Printer Wechel, and by that means became acquainted with the learned Hubert Languet, a lodger in the same house; who conceived the utmost tenderness and affection for him, as appears by his letters [F]. Continuing his travels in Germany, he arrived at Vienna in May 1573, where he met Languet, and stayed with him till September, when he went into Hungary, and parts adjacent. He passed next into Italy, where he remained all the winter following, and most of the summer 1574, and then returned with Languet into Germany. The next spring, he came back by Francford, Heidelberg, and Antwerp, into England, where he arrived about May 1575 (i). In the year 1576, when not above one and twenty years old, he was sent by Queen Elizabeth to condole the death of the Emperor Maximilian II, and to congratulate his successor, Rodolph II, upon his new dignity. But under the shadow of this compliment, he waited, at the same time, upon such of the German Princes, as were interested in the defence and preservation of the Protestant Religion, or their own native Liberties; and prevailed upon them to enter into a religious League with England. He also took an opportunity, to condole with the Elector Palatine's sons on the death of their father, Frederic III; and to demand of Count Casimir, the money Queen Elizabeth had disbursed for the wars in France (k) [G]. The next year, in his return, he waited upon that gallant Prince, Don John of Austria, Governor of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, and William Prince of Orange: by the former of which, though received at first as a youth, a stranger, and an enemy; yet after some conversation, he was so struck with him, that the beholders wondered to see, what tribute that brave and high-minded Prince paid to his worth, giving more honour and respect to this hopeful young Gentleman, than to the Embassadors of mighty Princes (l). In 1579, when a marriage was in agitation between Queen Elizabeth and Francis Duke of Alençon, or Anjou [H], Mr Sidney, though neither Magistrate nor Counsellor, took the liberty humbly,

(e) Fragments Regalia &c. by Sir Robert Naunton, edit. 1653. 12mo. p. 34.

(g) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 48. and Addenda & Corrigena to that Volume, after the Contents.

(i) Wood, Ath. ut supra.

(k) Camdeni Annales Elizabethæ, ad ann. 1576. and Life &c. as above, p. 48, 49, &c.

(l) Wood, ubi supra. And Life &c. as above, p. 37.

[D] In 1572, he was sent to travel.] Sir Fulke Grevil says (4), that he was sent to travel 'at fourteen years old,' which surely must be a great mistake (5). His words are these: 'Are not the Arts and Languages, which enabled him to Travel at fourteen years old, and in his Travail to win reverence amongst the chief Learned men abroad, witnesses beyond exception, that there was great inequality of worth and goodnesse in him? Instance that reverend Languet, mentioned for honour's sake in Sir Philip's Arcadia, learned usque ad miraculum, &c.' But this is not the only mistake in that ill-written Life: For what follows soon after, is equally full of faults. . . . 'So as this reverend Languet, orderly sequestered from his several functions under a mighty King, and Saxonie the greatest Prince of Germany, became a nurse of knowledge to this hopefull young Gentleman, and without any other hire, or motive than this sympathy of affections, accompanied him in the whole course of his three years travail.'—But it is certain, that Languet did not quit his other employments to accompany Mr Sidney in his three years travel.—'The like mistakes, as A. Wood observes (6), are in that Life, concerning Languet's coming into England in February 1573, 'onely to see that excellent plant of his own polishing, at which time, it is said, he was sixty-six years of age, whereas he was but sixty-one; that also he and Sidney parted at the Sea, which could not be, for Duke John Casimire, with whom he came, went away so suddenly, that Languet could not take leave of him.'

[E] Charles IX. . . . made him one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber.] And thereupon, his Majesty certified, to the Great Chamberlain of France, the Masters in ordinary of his household, and the Master and Comptroller of his Chamber for moneys, &c. That considering how great the house of Sidenay was in England, and the rank it had always held near the persons of the Kings and Queens, their Sovereigns, and desiring well and favourably to treat the young Sir Philip Sidenay, for the good and commendable knowledge in him; He had retained and received him in the state of Gentleman in ordinary of his Chamber, to serve him hereafter, and to receive the Honours, Authorities, Wages, Rights, Hostellages, Profits, and customary Emoluments thereunto appertaining, during pleasure. With command to his faithful Counsellor, and first Gentleman of his Chamber, to take of the said S. Baron of Sidenay, the usual oath in such case required, &c. Accordingly he was sworn into that office August 9, 1572 (7). But he enjoyed it a very little time indeed.

[F] As appears by his Letters.] These Letters of Hubert Languet to Sir Philip Sydney, were published at Francfort, in 1633. 12mo. and reprinted in 1646, with the beautiful types of Elzevir, 12mo. and the same year at Groningen. The title of them is, 'Huberti Langueti Epistolæ Politicæ et Historicæ ad Philippum Sydnæum equitem Anglum illustrissimi Proregis Hybernici filium, Vlissingensem Gubernatorem.' In these Letters, are uncommon strains of the utmost Affection, Tenderness, and Esteem for Sir Philip; and they are written in a most pure and elegant Latin style.

[G] The money Queen Elizabeth had disbursed for the wars in France.] In the Castrations to Holinshed's Chronicle (8), it is observed, That Mr Sidney performed all these Commissions 'in such exquisite order, and advised wise course, omitting nothing he should doo, nor suppling any thing he should not doo in ceremonial or otherwise, as he exceedingly therein satisfied his Majesty, both by his letters and report, and wanted to himselfe great credit and singular commendation.'

[H] In 1579, when a marriage was in agitation between Queen Elizabeth, and Francis Duke of Alençon.] Mr Strype hath placed this under the year 1572, which is void of all probability: for, it is not credible that Mr Sidney should thus address the Queen, when he was but a youth of about eighteen. Mr Strype mentions it again under the year 1579, but very imperfectly; and refers to the Letter in the Appendix, No. XIX. which is not to be found there (9). It is at length in the Cabala (10). Perhaps he was misled by the titles of Alençon and Anjou, which belonged to the same person.

(7) Memoirs of the Sidneys, &c. as above, p. 98. from the original at Penshurst.

(8) p. 1554.

(9) See Strype's Annals of the Reformation, Vol. II. p. 147, &c. 567.

(10) p. 363.

(f) Life &c. as above, p. S. &c.

(b) Strype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 146, and 152. Compleat Ambassadors, or Letters of Negotiation of Sir Francis Walsingham &c. Lond. 1655. fol. p. 250.

(4) Letters and Memorials, ubi supra, p. 7.

(5) See Strype's Annals, as above, p. 145.

(6) Athen. ut supra, and Life of Sir Philip Sidney, p. 11.

and privately by letter [I], to offer her Majesty very strong and substantial reasons against that marriage. (m). He was naturally of a warm and high spirit, so jealous of his honour and reputation, that he could not brook the least intrenchment on either, from his equals or inferiors [K], nor even from persons of the highest rank. Of which an instance is given, in a violent dispute between him and Edward Vere, Earl of Oxford [L], who was born great, greater by alliance, as having married Anne, eldest daughter of the Lord Treasurer Cecil, and superlative in the Queen's favour (n). That quarrel occasioned his retiring from the Court in 1580: during which recess, he wrote his eloquent and entertaining

(n) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 100, 101. and Life by Grevil, p. 74, &c.

[I] Mr Sidney, though neither Magistrate nor Counsellor, took the liberty humbly and privately by letter.] The minutes of that letter are printed in Mr Strype's Annals of the Reformation (11). But it is printed at length in the Cabala (12), as I have just now said.—In it, he uses many good Arguments for dissuading her from this Marriage; particularly, the Disadvantage and Danger that would thence redound to her Protestant Subjects; and the great Encouragement it would give to the Papists, and other disaffected persons.—Then he considers the Motives her Majesty had alledged for this sudden change; namely, Fear of standing alone in respect of foreign powers; and Apprehension of Contempt from her own Subjects, from whom she ought to have respect.—But, with regard to the first, 'Truly, saith he, standing alone, with good foresight of Government, both in peace and warlike defence, is the honourablest thing that can be to a well-established Monarchy; those buildings being ever most strongly durable which lean to none other, but remain firm on their own foundation.' Then he shews, how improbable it is, that the Duke of Anjou and She should be united in One Interest, the chief strength and support of Government.—Monsieur's desires, and yours, how they should meet in publick matters, I think no oracle can tell: For as the Geometricians say, that parallels, because they maintain divers lines, can never join; so truly, two, having in the beginning contrary principles, to bring forth one Doctrine, must be some miracle. He of the Romish Religion; and if he be a man, must needs have that manlike property, to desire that all men be of his mind: You the Erecter and Defender of the contrary; and the only sun that dazzleth their eyes. He French, and desiring to make France great: Your Majesty English, and desiring nothing less than that France should grow great. He, both by his own fancy, and his youthful Governours, embracing all ambitious hopes, having Alexander's image in his head, but, perhaps, evil painted: Your Majesty, with excellent vertue, taught what you should hope; and by no less wisdom, what you may hope; with a Council renowned over all Christendom, for their well tempered minds, having set the utmost of their ambition in your Favour; and the study of their souls in your Safety.—As to the Apprehension of Contempt;—'What is there, saith he, either within you or without you, that can possibly fall into the danger of contempt, to whom fortunes are tyed by so long descent of your royal Ancestors. But our minds rejoyce with the experience of your inward Vertues, and our eyes are delighted with the sight of you.' After many other arguments, to convince her Majesty, that she is in no manner of danger of Contempt; he concludes his letter thus:—'As for this man, as long as he is but Monsieur in might, and a Papist in profession, he neither can, nor will greatly shield you: And if he grow to be King, his defence will be like Ajax's shield, which rather weighed them down, then defended those that bare it. Against Contempt, if there be any, which I will never believe, let your excellent vertues of Piety, Justice, and Liberality, daily, if it be possible, more and more shine; let such particular actions be found out (which be easie as I think to be done) by which you may gratifie all the hearts of your people. Let those in whom you find trust, and to whom you have committed trust in your weighty affairs, be held up in the eyes of your subjects. Lastly, doing as you do, you shall be as you be, the Example of Princes, the Ornament of this Age, the Comfort of the afflicted, the Delight of your people, and the most excellent Fruit of your progenitors, and the perfect Mirrour of your posterity.'—A. Wood says, that this letter was written at the desire of Robert Earl of Leicester, as he supposes; and that it was the occasion of the quarrel between Mr Sidney and the Earl of Oxford (13). But there doth not seem to be sufficient ground for either of those assertions.

[K] So jealous of his honour and reputation, that he could not brook the least intrenchment on either from his equals or inferiors.] Arthur Collins Esq; hath published an eminent instance of it, in a letter of his to Edward Mollineux Esq; Secretary to his father as Lord Deputy of Ireland, which is as follows.

' Mr Mollineux,

' Few woordes are beste. My Lettres to my Father have come to the eyes of some. Neither can I condemme any but yow for it. If it be so, yow have plaide the very knave with me; and so I will make yow know, if I have good prooffe of it. But that for so muche as is past. For that is to come, I assure yow, before God, that if ever I know yow do so much as reede any Lettre I wryte to my Father, without his commaundment, or my consente, I will thruste my dagger into yow. And truste to it, for I speake it in earnest. In the meane time farwell.

' From Courte, this last
' of May, 1578 (14).'

See below, note [AA], Mr Walpole's observation upon this Letter.

[L] Of which an instance is given, in a violent dispute between him and Edward Vere Earl of Oxford.] Fulke Grevil, Lord Brook, hath set down a long and circumstantial account of that Dispute (15), of which the substance is this. "One day as Mr Philip Sidney was at Tennis, the Earl of Oxford came abruptly into the court, and wanted the other to give place to him, and depart; 'forgetting to entreat that, which he could not legally command.' Mr Sidney not complying, the Earl began to expostulate more roughly, and at last commanded Mr Sidney and his companion to quit the court. Thereupon Mr Sidney calmly answers, 'That if his Lordship had been pleased to express his desire in milder terms, perhaps he might have led out those, that he should now find would not be driven out.' This answer blowing up the Earl into a flame, made him scornfully call Mr Sidney a Puppy. And the latter, pretending not to understand, caused his Lordship to repeat the epithet of Puppy a second time. Upon which Mr Sidney gave my Lord the lie, saying, 'All the world knows, puppies are gotten by dogs, and children by men.' A crowd gathering about, Mr Sidney, with some sharp words, led the way abruptly out of the Tennis-court; and the great Lord continued his play, not much to his reputation. Mr Sidney expected satisfaction, and sends a Gentleman of worth upon that errand to the Earl; who thereupon resolves to give his young antagonist a challenge. In the mean time the Privy-Council interposed, and endeavoured to reconcile them; but in vain. The Queen therefore undertakes to do it, and lays before Mr Sidney 'the difference in degree between Earls and Gentlemen; the respect inferiors owed to their superiors; and the necessity in Princes to maintain their own creatures, as degrees descending between the people's licentiousness, and the anointed sovereignty of crowns; how the Gentleman's neglect of the Nobility taught the peasant to insult upon both.' To which Mr Sidney replied, with all due reverence: 'That place was never intended for privilege to wrong: witness herself, who, how sovereign soever she were by throne, birth, education, and nature; yet was she content to cast her own affections into the same moulds her subjects did, and govern all her rights by their laws. Again, he besought her Majesty to consider, that although the Earl of Oxford were a great Lord by birth, alliance, and grace; yet he was no Lord over him: and therefore the difference of degrees between freemen could not challenge any other homage than precedence.' These truths did not displease the Queen, though he obeyed not her commands, but chose rather to withdraw from the court."—Edward Earl of Oxford was a man of violent passions, and made a very bad Husband to his wife, Anne, daughter of William Lord Burleigh (16).
Romance,

(14) Letters and Memorials of State, as above, Vol. I. p. 256.

(15) Life &c. as above, p. 74—81.

(16) See Mr Strype's Annals, Vol. III. p. 56

(m) Life &c. as above, p. 53—71. See Cabala, p. 363. and Letters and Memorials of State of the Sidney family, Vol. I. p. 287.

(11) Vol. II. p. 147, 148, 149, 150.

(12) p. 363. and in Letters and Memorials of State of the Sidney family, Vol. I. p. 287, &c.

(13) Athen. col. 227.

Romance, called Arcadia [M]. His noble and generous disposition to relieve all who were in distress, appears from several instances, as well as from his Letters; and he was so universally applauded for it, that his fame spread even beyond the bounds of Europe. For, in 1580, when, upon the death of the King of Portugal, the Spaniards had seized that kingdom; Don Antonio, the chief competitor thereto (o), applied to Mr Sydney for his assistance. His Letter is so remarkable, that we thought proper to insert it in the note (p) [N]. The treaty of marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou being renewed in 1581, Mr Sydney was one of those noble gallants, that performed, in the royal justings, barriers, and turney, for the entertainment of the Duke and his train (q): being very fond of those pastimes [O]. And upon the Duke's departure from England, in the February following, he attended him to Antwerp, with his uncle, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, and the chief of the English court (r). In 1583, John, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, being made a Knight of the Garter, gave his procuration to Mr Philip Sydney, to receive his stall, and take possession of it in his name; and thereupon he was knighted by the Sovereign, at Windsor-castle, January the 13th, the morning before he proceeded to take possession of the stall (s). In 1584, he wrote an Answer to the Libel against his uncle, commonly known by the title of 'Leicester's Commonwealth:' which Answer was first published by Arthur Collins Esq; (t). The year following, he projected an expedition to America, without the knowledge and consent of the Queen or his own relations; wherein he was to be joined by the brave Sir Francis Drake [P]. But when he was got to Plim-mouth, and ready to embark, the Queen, who was unwilling to risk a person of his worth

(o) There were two other Competitors; viz. Philip II, King of Spain, and Don Juan of Portugal, Duke of Braganza.

(q) Stow's Annals, edit. 1631. fol. p. 689.

(s) Ashmole's Order of the Garter, p. 436, 438.

(22) Castrations to Holinshed's Chronicle, p. 1555.

(23) Sir Francis Walsingham.

(24) Life &c. as above, p. 81, 82—90. 131, 132.

(p) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. p. 102. and Letters and Memorials of State, Vol. I. p. 294.

(r) Camdeni Annales Elizab. ad ann. 1582.

(t) In Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sidneys &c. p. 82, &c.

(17) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 108.

(18) Richard Belling, Ware, and W. Harris, Writers of Ireland, p. 165.

(19) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 228.

(20) See Life by F. Grevil, p. 19. and Ed. Leigh's Fœlix Confortium, p. 324.

[M] Called Arcadia.] He dedicated it to his dear sister Mary, Countess of Pembroke; and there is a room at Wilton, the lower pannels whercof are finely painted, with representations of the stories mentioned therein (17). One G. M. (probably Gervase Markham) wrote the second and last part of the Arcadia, printed at London in 1613. 4to. And in the eighth edition, at London, 1633, Sir W. A. Knight, made a supplement of a defect in the third part of the History; and R. B. of Lincoln's-Inn, Esq; (18), added then to it a sixth book. In 1652 the Arcadia was published again in six Books, with several of his other Works added to them (19). It hath borne fourteen editions; and been modernized by Mrs Stanley, in 1725. fol. It hath also been translated into French, Dutch, and other languages. It seems he desired upon his death-bed (but not in his will, as Sir Fulke Grevil says,) that it should be destroyed or suppressed (20).

[N] That we thought proper to insert it in the note.] Arth. Collins hath given the following translation of it.

' Illustrious Nephew, Philip Sidney,
' I write this not only to inclose and forward to you
' Captain Allen's Letters, but also to desire you to ' write to me often, and preserve me in your friendship.
' My affairs (praised be God) go on extremely well.
' The Fleet is ready to sail, fully manned and well
' equipt, and I do expect to receive a considerable ' quantity of stores or ammunition by the ships from
' Flanders, in order to equip a second expedition, on ' board which I intend to go, with about six or seven ' thousand men; which number is getting ready by
' three or four friends, who are willing to risque the ' same fate with me; these are Monsieur de Babue,
' Monsieur de St Luc, Monsieur de Sordiac, and Mon-
' sieur de Belleville (that is, if they can get leave for ' that purpose) there will come also Count Roxafocar,
' who is now in Flanders. Besides the abovenamed,
' there are other Gentlemen that will go in the best
' manner they can: This is to be understood, if they ' continue in the same mind, and do not retract: But ' I am of opinion they will not, or at least the four ' abovenamed; and though many more should go, if
' I did not see you in the company, I shall say, *Nu-
' merum non habet illa suum.* I have received good
' news from Portugal, both in regard to the Natives,
' as well as to Spaniards; the former wishing my pre' sence, and the latter desiring to return into their ' own country. The King of France assists me
' sufficiently, his Mother still better, the States of ' Flanders very well; and only Dominga keeps si' lent, but she is not to be blamed, considering her ' husband's affairs. I remain in health, God grant
' you the same, according to my wishes.

' Tunis, 3d of ' Your greatest Friend,
' May, 1581.

' The King (21).'

[O] Being very fond of those pastimes.] So we are informed by Mr Edmund Molineux, who was secretary to his father.—' For at all such disports he commonlie

' made one; and he would bring in such a livelie gal' lant shew, so agreeable to everie point, which is re' quired for the expressing of a perfect devise (so rich
' he was in those inventions) as, if he surpassed not all,
' he would equall, or at least second the best. Wherein,
' as he rightlie deserved, he ever gained singular com' mendation (22).'

[P] Wherein he was to be joined by the brave Sir Francis Drake] This expedition was of Sir Philip's ' own
' projecting, wherein he fashioned the whole body, with ' purpose to become Head of it himself. As the scope ' of this journey was mixt both of sea and land service;
' so had it accordingly, distinct Officers and Command' ers, chosen by Sir Philip out of the ablest Governors
' of those martial times. The project was contrived ' between themselves in this manner; that both should
' equally be Governors when they had left the shore of ' England; but while things were preparing at home,
' Sir Francis was to bear the name, and by the credit
' of Sir Philip have all particulars abundantly supplied.'

... Accordingly the preparations went on with great vigour and chearfulness; through Sir Philip's interest, nothing being refused Sir Francis that he could ask.
When all was ready, Sir Francis repairs to the fleet at Plimmouth; having promised Sir Philip, that when he staid for nothing but a wind, he would send post for him.
A letter comes, according to agreement: And, in the mean time, our Court having advice that Don Antonio, candidate to the Crown of Portugal, was coming for England, and intended to land at Plimmouth; ' Sir
' Philip, turning occasion into wisdom, puts himself
' into the employment of conducting up that King;
' and under that veil leaves the Court without suspi' cion; overshoots his father-in-law, then Secretary of ' State (23), in his own bow; and comes to Plimmouth,
' where he is received with a great deal of outward
' pomp and compliment.' In the mean time Don Antonio not coming, and Sir Philip's design being found out; he is commanded back again to Court, as is above related.—His Project, it seems, was to plant a Colony upon the main of America, and to possess himself of Nombre de Dios, or some other good Port near; as a fit rendez-vous between the two seas, for the supply or retreat of an army upon all occasions. For this purpose it was, that he had fitted out a Fleet, to which the United Provinces had promised to join one of theirs.
And he had drawn in thirty Gentlemen, of great blood and state here in England, every one of them to sell a hundred pounds a year in land; to second and countenance this first Fleet with a second.—The reason of his keeping it so secret, (besides the utmost point of Prudence with regard to the enemy) was, because he thought it impossible to obtain the Queen's, and his great Relations Consent, for his engaging in an employment so remote, and of so hazardous a nature. His Unexperience would also be a very strong objection.
And while the affair was unknown, he knew it would pass without interruption; or, when it was done, presumed the Success would put Envy and all her agents to silence (24).

(21) Letters and Memorials of State &c. as above, Vol. I. p. 294.

in an employment so remote, and of so hazardous a nature, sent messengers to stay him; or, if he did not readily comply, to stop the whole fleet. By his own management, the messengers being intercepted upon the road, and their letters forcibly taken from them by two soldiers, disguised as sailors; the Queen, thereupon, sent her royal command to him by a Peer of the realm, absolutely to quit the enterprize (u). At his return to Court, he was appointed Governor of Flushing, one of the cautionary towns delivered by the Dutch to Queen Elizabeth; as also General of the Horse under his uncle, Robert Earl of Leicester: in both which employments, he manifested singular wisdom and valour, and brought great honor to his country (w). His first exploit, after being arrived in the Low-Countries, was contriving, in July 1586, the surprize of Axel; in the execution of which, he behaved like a most consummate General, using both such diligence and secrecy, that he surprized the town, before the inhabitants could have intelligence of his coming, and without the loss or hurt of any one of his men. Likewise, upon his entrance into the town, he placed a band of choice soldiers, to make a stand in the market-place, for security to the rest: and, when the service was over, rewarded every one liberally, out of his own purse, according to their respective merits. Soon after, in an attempt to surprize Graveling in the night, he shewed a great deal of penetration, care, and judgment, worthy of an old officer; by venturing only a detachment, and not hazarding the lives and honor, of the whole English army, in that treacherous expedition (x). His fame and high deserts were now so well known and established, that he was put in nomination for the crown of Poland, upon the death of Stephen Batori; but Queen Elizabeth refused to further his advancement, not out of emulation, but out of fear to lose the jewel of her times (y). During those unreasonable discontents and jealousies, that prevailed in the confederate army, between the two Generals, Robert Earl of Leicester, and Count Hohenloe; Sir Philip behaved with that incomparable goodness, prudence, and discretion, as dissipated those clouds; and turned much to the public advantage. So that, by the real proof he gave of his abilities above others, in a very little time his reputation and authority became so considerable in the United Provinces, that it would have been no hard matter for him, to the prejudice of his uncle, and the distraction of the public affairs in those parts, to have raised himself a fortune. But in the whole course of his life, he did so constantly ballance Ambition with the safer precepts of divine and moral Duty, as no pretence whatsoever could have enticed him to break through the rules of a good Patriot (z). Good and happy man! but how short is all human felicity! For, on the 22d of September, 1586, being sent out with a party to intercept a convoy that was coming into Zutphen, he fell into an ambuscade, and had his horse killed under him. Taking another, he returned to the charge, when he received a terrible wound in his left thigh, which broke the bone quite in pieces [2]. He then

(u) Life &c. as above, p. 81—88.

(w) Ibid. p. 135. and Pat. 27. Eliz. p. 13. m. 23.

(x) Life &c. p. 135, 136. Stow's Annales, p. 733. and Camdeni Annales Elizab. ad ann. 1586. and Holinshed's Chronicle, p. 1551, 1552.

(y) Life &c. as above, p. 139, 140, 141.

(y) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, ut supra, p. 35.

[2] Which broke the bone quite in pieces.] The best account of this melancholy accident is comprized in a letter, from Robert Earl of Leicester to Sir Thomas Heneage, published by the ingenious William Oldys, Esq; Norroy, in the British Librarian (25), and also communicated by him to Arthur Collins, Esq; (26), part of which runs thus: 'Sithens my other Letters of the 20th it fell oute, that yesterday morninge some intelligence was broughte, that the Enemie was bringing a Convoe of Victual, garded with three hundred horse. There was sente out to ympeache that, two hundred horse and three hundred footemen, and a number more both horse and foote to second them: Among other young men my nephew Sir Philip Sydney was, and the rather for that the Colonell Norrice himself went with the stande of footemen, to second the rest; but the vanguard of the Prince was marched and came with this convoe, and being a mystie morninge, our men fell into the Ambuscade of Footemen, who were three thousand, the most musketts, the rest pykes. Our horsemen being formoste by their haste indeed, would not turne, but past through and charged the horsemen that fiede at the backe of their footemen so valientlie, as, albeyt they were eleven hundred horse, and of the verie chief of all his troupes, they brake them, being not two hundred. Many of our horses hurt and killed, among which was my Nephewes owne. He wente and changed to another, and woulde needes to the charge again, and onste paste those musketters; where he receyved a fore wounde upon his thighe, three fingers above his knee, the bone broken quite in pieces; but for which chance, God did send such a daye as I think was never many yeres sene, so fewe againste so many.'—Here the Earl proceeds to enumerate the Commanders and other persons of Distinction in this rencounter, whose names were Colonel Norrice, who had the charge of the foot, my Lord of Essex, Sir Thomas Perrot, and my unfortunate Phillip, says he, with Sir William Russel, and divers Gentlemen, and not one hurte, but only my Nephew. They killed four of their enemies chief Leaders, and carried the valient Count Hannibal Gonzaga away with them upon a horse; also took

(25) No. V. p. 271.

(26) See Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sidneys, p. 104. &c.

' Captain George Cresier, the principal Soldier of the camp, and Captain of all the Albanez. My Lord Willoughbie overthrew him at the first encounter, horse and man. The Gentleman did acknowledge it himself. There is not a properer Gentleman in the world towards than this Lord Willoughbie is; but I can hardly prayse one more than another, they did all so well; yet every one had his horse killed or hurt.' And it was thought very strange, 'that Sir William Stanley, with three hundred of his men, should pass in spite of so many musketts, such troops of horse, three several times, making them remove their ground, and to return with no more loss than he did. Albeyt; I must say (continues the Earl) yt was too much loss for me; for this young Manne was my greatest Comfort next her Majestie of all the world, and if I could buy his lief with all I have, to my sherte, I would give yt. How God will dispose of him I know not, but feare I must needes, greatly, the worst; the Blow is in so dangerous a place, and so great; yet did I never heare of any manne that did abide the dressinge and setting his bones better than he did: and he was carried afterwards in my barge to Arnheim, and I heare this day he ys still of good hearte, and comforteth all aboute him as much as maye be. God of his mercie graunt me his lieffe, which I cannot but doubt of greatly. I was abroad that tyme in the fieelde, giving some order to supplie that busines, which did indure almoste twoe Owres in continuall fighte; and metinge Phillip commynge upon his horsebacke, not a litle to my greafe. But I woulde you had stode by to heare his most loyal Speeches to her Majestie; his constant minde to the cause; his lovinge care over me, and his moste resolute determination for deathe, not one jot appalled for his blow; which ys the most grievous that ever I sawe with such a bullet; ryding so a long myle and a halfe, upon his horse, ere he came to the campe; not ceasing to speak still of her Majestie; being glad, yf his hurte and deathe mighte any waye honour her Majestie; for her's he was whilest he lyved, and God's he was sure to be yf he dyed: Prayed all men to thinke that the cause was as well her Majestie's as the Countrie's; and not then rode back to the camp, about a mile and a half, on horse-back; and, after the dressing of his wound, was carried in a barge to Arnheim. For about sixteen days there were great hopes of his recovery; but the ball not being extracted (aa), and a mortification ensuing, he prepared himself for death [R], and at last expired on the 17th of October, in the thirty-second year of his age (bb). The States of Zealand requested of the Queen, and his noble friends, that they might have the honor of burying him at the public expence of their government: But their request was not granted; the Queen, in regard to his great worth and accomplishments, giving order for his burial at her own expence (cc). Whereupon, his body was brought from Arnheim to Flushing; and, after having remained there eight days, was put on board a vessel, the 1st of November, with all military honors, and landed at the Tower-wharf, the 5th day of the same month. Being conveyed to the Minories, it lay there in state a considerable time, till his magnificent funeral (dd) in St Paul's cathedral, the 16th of February following. No monument was erected to him; but, some time after, the Inscription, given below [S], was painted on a wooden tablet, and fastened to a pillar near his grave. James, King of Scots, honoured him with an Epitaph of his own composition [T]. And the universities of Oxford and Cambridge composed verses to (aa) Hollinshed's Chronicle, p. 1552.

(bb) Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 104. &c. and Stow's Annales, p. 739. It appears from the codicil to his will, that he did not die till the 17th. See also Hollinshed, p. 1552.

(cc) Life &c. p. 151—160.

(dd) It was the seventeenth.

(ee) Stow's Survey of London: Strype's edition, book iii. p. 161.

‘ to be discouraged, for you have seen such success as may encourage us all; and this my hurt is the ordinance of God, by the happe of the warre. Well I pray God, yf yt be his will, save me his lieffe; even as well for her Majesty's service sake, as for myne own comforte.’—Fulke Grevil, Lord Brooke, adds the following circumstances (27): Before he set out upon this fatal expedition “ he had compleatly put on his Armour, but meeting the Marshal of the Camp lightly armed, out of emulation, he took off his cuisses [or thigh-armor] and so disarmed that part, where he received his fatal wound. The weather being misty, they fell unawares upon the enemy, who had made a strong stand to receive them, near to the very walls of Zutphen; by reason of which accident, their troops happened not only to be unexpectedly engaged within the level of the great shot, that played from the ramparts, but more fatally within shot of their muskets, which were layd in ambush within their own trenches. After he was wounded, the horse he rode upon, being rather furiously choleric than bravely proud, forced him to forsake the field, but not his back, as the noblest and fittest biere to carry a martial commander to his grave. In which sad progress, passing along by the rest of the army, where his uncle the General was, and, being thirsty with excess of bleeding, he called for drink, which was presently brought him: But, as he was putting the bottle to his mouth, he saw a poor soldier carried along, who had been wounded at the same time, gaffly casting up his eyes at the bottle. Which Sir Philip perceiving, took it from his head before he drank, and delivered it to the poor man, with these words, “ Thy necessity is yet greater than mine.”—Mr Cibber rightly observes (28), That “ this generous behaviour of our gallant Knight, ought not to pass without a panegyric. All his deeds of bravery, his politeness, his learning, and courtly accomplishments, do not reflect so much honour upon him, as this one disinterested, truly heroic action: It discovered so tender and benevolent a nature; a mind so fortified against pain; a heart so overflowing with generous sentiments, to relieve, in opposition to the violent call of his own necessities, a poor man languishing in the same distress, before himself, that none can read it without the highest admiration.—Bravery is often constitutional; fame may be the motive to feats of arms; a statesman and a courtier may act from interest; but a sacrifice so generous as this, can be made by none but those who are good as well as great, who are noble-minded, and gloriously compassionate like Sidney.”

[R] He prepared himself for death.] First, he called unto him the Ministers, who were all excellent men, of divers nations, and before them made such a confession of Christian Faith, as no book but the heart can truly and feelingly deliver: Then, desired them to accompany him in Prayer. Next, he called for his will, which was dated the last day of September, 1586, and to which he then undoubtedly added the codicil that bears date the seventeenth of October (29), the same day he dyed. After that he called for musick, especially that song, which he had made himself, intituled, La cuisse rompuë, or The broken Thigh. The last scene of this tragedy, was the parting between him and his brother Sir Robert; of whom he took his leave in these words, ‘ Love my memory, cherish my friends; their faith to me may assure you they are honest. But, above all, govern your will and affections by the will

‘ and word of your Creator; in Me beholding the end of this world, with all her vanities (30).’ [S] The inscription below.] ‘ A briefe Epitaph upon the Death of that most valiant, and perfect honourable Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, Knt, late Governor of Flushing in Zealand, who received his Death's wound at a Battel near Zutphen in Gelderland, the twenty-second day of September, and died at Arnheim the sixteenth (31) day of October, 1586. Whose Funerals were performed, and his Body interred, within this Cathedral Church of St Paul in London, the sixteenth day of February next following, in the year of our Lord God, 1586.

England, Netherland, the Heavens, and the Arts,
The Souldiers, and the World, have made sixe Parts
Of the noble Sidney; for none will suppose,
That a small Heap of Stones can Sidney inclose.
His Body hath England, for she it bred,
Netherland his blood, in her defence shed;
The Heav'ns have his Soule, the Arts have his Fame,
All Souldiers the Griefe, the World his good Name (32).

[T] James, King of Scots, honoured him with an epitaph of his own composition.] We shall give it here, for the sake of the curious and learned reader, as his Majesty composed it, both in English and Latin.

Thou mighty Mars, the Lord of Souldiers brave,
And thou Minerue, that dois in wit excell,
And thou Apollo, who dois knowledge have
Of ev'ry art that from Parnassus fell,
With all your Sisters that thaireon do dwell,
Lament for him, who duelic serv'd you all,
Whom in you wisely all your arts did mell,
Bewaile (I say) his unexpected fall;
I neede not in remembrance for to call
His race, his youth, the hope had of him ay,
Since that in him doth cruell death appall
Both manhood, wit, and learning, every way;
But yet he doth in bed of honor rest,
And evermore of him shall live the best.

• • • • •
Armipotens, cui jus in fortia pectora, Mavors,
Tu Dea, quæ cerebrum perrumpere digna Tonantis,
Tuque adeo bijugæ, proles Latonia, rupis
Gloria, deciduæ cingunt quam collibus artes,
Vos etiam huc lachrymas conferte Heliconides, istum
Plangite, quo vestri non observantior alter
Nec fuerat vestris insignior artibus alter,
Plangite talem inquam, quem fata inopina tulere
Cujus quid memorem, quid carmine persequar altum Aut genus, aut virides annos, aut quam dederat spem?

Exiit heu rapido mors illætabilis ictu,
Quo Mars, quo Pallas, quòque ipsum ornavit Apollo.
Sed venerandus honor, cineri superinduit urnam
Parte etiam meliore sui super æthera vivit.

(aa) Life &c. as above, p. 165. and Hollinshed's Chronicle, p. 1552.

(dd) See a particular description of it in Arthur Collins's Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 109. and in Stow's Annales, p. 739.

(27) Life &c. p. 143, &c.

(28) Lives of the Poets, in the Life of Sir Philip Sidney, Vol. I. p. 79.

(29) Both Will, and Codicil, are, at length, in Collins's Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sidneys &c. p. 109. &c.

(ee) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 228, 229.

(gg) Ibid. p. 113. and Letters of State, p. 44. and Strype's Annals &c. Vol. III. p. 59.

his memory, which were severally printed (ee) [V]. So general was the mourning for him, that, many months after his death, it was accounted indecent for any Gentleman of quality, to appear at court or in the city, in any light or gaudy apparel (ff). A match was at first proposed between him and Anne daughter of Sir William Cecil, on the recommendation of his uncle, the Earl of Leicester (gg); but he married Frances, the only daughter of the ever-memorable Sir Francis Walsingham, by whom he left an only daughter, Elizabeth, born in 1585 [W]. He was not only learned himself [X], but also a great encourager of learning, and learned men [Y]. His contemporaries agree to give him the highest character possible. They extol his Abilities [Z], his Modesty, his Piety, his Generosity, (ff) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 109.

[V] And the universities of Oxford and Cambridge composed verses to his memory, which were severally printed. The Oxford verses were printed there in 1587. 4to, and some in particular made by the members of New College, under the title of Peplus Sidnei. Oxon. 1587. 4to.—Those made at Cambridge, were published by Alexander Nevill, Lond. 1587. 4to.

(33) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 229.

(34) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 181. and Irish Compendium, under the title Bourk, Earl of Clanrickard. See Lord Lytelton's Dialogues.

[W] Elizabeth, born in 1585. The eminent Civilian, Scipio Gentilis, wrote a Latin poem on her Nativity, intituled, Nereus, sive de natali Elizabethæ, illustrissimi Philippi Sydnei filicæ. Lond. 1585. one sheet in 4to (33). She was married thrice; first, to Roger Manners, Earl of Rutland, by whom she had no issue; secondly, to Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, who had by her one son, and two daughters; and, thirdly, to Richard Bourk, Earl of Clanrickard in Ireland, and of St Albans in England, to whom she brought forth one daughter and one son (34).

[X] He was not only learned himself. Besides his Arcadia, already mentioned; the monuments he left of his learning were as follows: 1. 'Astrophel and Stella; wherein the excellency of sweet poesie is concluded.' Lond. 1591. 4to, said to be written for the sake of one whom he entirely loved, viz. the Lady Rich, by whom was understood Philoclea in the Arcadia. 2. 'An Apology for Poetry.' Lond. 1595. 4to, in prose. 3. 'Ourania, a Poem.' Lond. 1606. published by N. B. 4. 'Sonnetts; Remedy for Love;' printed at the end of the eleventh edition of the Arcadia. Lond. 1662. fol. 5. 'England's Helicon; or a Collection of Songs.' They were not all written by Sir Philip, but only the greatest part of them. Lond. 4to. 6. 'Valour anatomized in a Fancie. By Sir Philip Sidney,' 1581. Printed among Cottoni Posthuma. Lond. 1651. 8vo. Ascribed by some to Sir Thomas Overbury. 7. 'Almanzor and Almanzaida, a Novel.' Lond. 1678. 8vo. This book coming out so long after Sir Philip's death, it is justly questioned whether he was the author. Probably, his great name was set to it, for the sake of promoting the sale. 8. 'Instructions, describing what special Observations are to be taken by Travellers, in all Nations, States, and Countries.' 12mo. The names of Robert Earl of Essex and Sir Philip Sidney are put to this book (35); but it is a question whether either of them had a hand in it. 9. He began to translate from French into English, 'A work concerning the Trueness of Christian Religion, against Atheists, &c.' written by Philip de Mornay. But that translation being left by him imperfect, Arthur Golding finished it, and had it printed at London, 1587. 4to. Afterwards it was revised and corrected by Thomas Wilcocks, a Minister, 1604. 10. Sir Philip turned also the Psalms of David into English verse; which are in manuscript, curiously bound in crimson velvet, in the Library of the Earl of Pembroke at Wilton, being left to it by his sister Mary, Countess of Pembroke (36). One of them, namely the 137th, is printed in the Guardian, No. 18. 11. Ten of his Letters are printed in the First Volume of the Letters and Memorials of State of the Sydney family, published by Arthur Collins, Esq; (37). But most of them are not of a very interesting nature, and seem to have been written in haste.—His works were reprinted in 1725, three Volumes, 8vo.—The Lord Brooke says (38), that 'his end was not writing, even while he wrote; nor his knowledge moulded for tables or schools; but, both his wit and understanding bent upon his heart, to make himself, and others, not in words or opinion, but in life, and action, good and great.'

(35) A letter of his, to his brother beyond the seas, concerning Travel, is among the MSS of University-college, Oxon. No. 152. Catalog. MSS Angliæ.

(36) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 228.

(37) p. 247, 256, 283, 287, 293, 296, 298, 389, 392, 393.

(38) Life &c. p. 21.

[Y] But also a great encourager of learning, and learned men. The Universities abroad, and at home, accounted him a general Mecænas of learning; dedicated their Books to him; and communicated every invention, or improvement of knowledge with him. . . . His heart and capacity were so large, that there was not a curious Painter, a skilful Ingenier, an excellent Musician, or any other Artificer of extraordinary fame, that made not himself known to this famous spirit, and found him his true friend without hire; and the common rendezvous of worth in his time. . . . It will be confessed by all men, that this one man's example, and personall respect, did not only encourage Learning, and honour in the Schooles, but brought the affection, and true use thereof both into the Court, and Camp (39).

(39) Life &c. as above, p. 38, 39, 40.

The ingenious Author of the Life of Mr Edmund Spencer gives a remarkable instance of Sir Philip Sidney's exquisite judgment, and of his great munificence to the truly learned (40). His words are these: "It is said Spencer was a stranger to Sir Philip Sydney, when he had begun to write his Fairy Queen; and that he took occasion to go to Leicester-house, and to introduce himself, by sending in to Sir Philip a copy of the ninth Canto of the first book of that Poem. Sir Philip was much surprized with the description of Despair in that Canto, and is said to have shewn an unusual transport, on the discovery of so new and uncommon a genius. After he had read some stanzas, he bid his steward give the person that brought those verses fifty pounds; but, upon reading the next stanza, he ordered the sum to be doubled. The Steward was no less surprized than his Master, and thought it his duty to make some delay, in executing so sudden and lavish a bounty: But, upon reading one stanza more, Sir Philip raised his gratuity to two hundred pounds, and commanded the Steward to give it immediately, lest, as he read further, he might be tempted to give away his whole estate." . . . No wonder, therefore, that the Poets of his time, especially Spenser, revered him not only as a Patron, but a Master; since he was almost the only person in any age (not excepting Mecænas) that could teach the best rules of Poetry, and most freely reward the performances of Poets (41).

(40) Life of Spenser, prefixed to his works, p. 4.

(41) Wood, Ath. col. 226.

[Z] They extol his abilities. They were observed, at his first appearance into the world, by that wise man, William of Nassau, Prince of Orange; who, having conversed with him, both by word of mouth and letters, about the most important Affairs of Europe, conceived such a high idea of his extraordinary Merit; that he desired Sir Fulke Grevil, (when he waited upon his Highness at Delft) to acquaint the Queen with Mr Sidney's great Abilities. 'Protesting, that, if he could judge, her Majesty had one of the ripest and greatest Counsellors of Estate in that young Man, at that time in Europe: to the trial of which he was pleased to leave his own credit engaged, until her Majesty might employ that Gentleman, either amongst her friends or enemies (42).—Henry King of Navarre, afterwards the great Henry IV. King of France, having found out this Master-Spirit among us, used him like an equal in nature, and a person fit for friendship with a King (43).—His uncle, Robert Earl of Leicester, when he first carried him over to the Low-Countries, not only despised his youth for a Counsellor, but also bore a strict hand over him as a forward young man. But, in a short time, he saw this sun so risen above his horizon, that both he and his stars were glad to fetch light from him. And in the end acknowledged, that he held up the Honour of his casual Authority by him whilst he lived, and found reason to withdraw himself from that burthen after his death (44).—His Father-in-law, Sir Francis Walsingham, that wise and active Secretary, who had influence in all countries, and a hand upon all affairs; often confessed also to Sir Fulke Grevil, that his Philip did so far overshoot him in his own bow, that those Friends, which at first were Sir Philip's for the Secretary's sake, within a while became so fully possessed by Sir Philip, that now he held them at the second-hand, by his son-in-law's native courtesy (45).—And he merited even the Praise and Esteem of his Enemies. Don John of Austria's regard for him hath been already mentioned. And the Spanish Secretary, Don Bernardine de Mendoza, acknowledged openly; That howsoever he was glad, King Philip

(42) Life &c. as above, p. 22—31.

(43) Ibid. p. 36.

(44) Ibid. p. 34. Sir Fulke Grevil had it from the Earl's own mouth.

(45) Ibid. p. 35.

nerosity, his Goodness, his Sincerity, his Honesty [AA], and all those amiable Virtues, which constitute either one of the most accomplished of Men, or the best of Christians. Mr Camden, in particular (bb), styles him, 'the great glory of his family, the great hopes of mankind, the most lively pattern of virtue, and the darling of the learned world. This is, (adds he) that Sidney, whom as Providence seems to have sent into the world, to give the present age a specimen of the Ancients; so did it on a sudden recall him, and snatch him from us, as more worthy of heaven than of earth. Thus, when Virtue is come to perfection, it presently leaves us; and the best things are seldom lasting. Rest then in peace, O Sidney! if I may be allowed this address; we will not celebrate thy memory with tears, but with admiration. Whatever we loved in thee, as the best of authors speaks of that best Governor of Britain (ii), whatever we admired in thee, continues, and will continue in the memories of men, the revolutions of ages, and the annuals of time. Many, as inglorious and ignoble, are buried in oblivion; but Sidney shall live to all posterity. For, as the Greek poet has it, 'Virtue's beyond the reach of fate.' 'But, to speak more of him, were to make him less;' as Sir Robert Naunton rightly observes (kk).

(bb) Britannia, in Kent.

(ii) Tacitus, Life of Agricola.

(kk) Fragmenta &c. ut supra p. 36.

'Philip his master had lost, in a private gentleman, a dangerous enemy to his state, yet he could not but lament to see Christendom deprived of so rare a light in these cloudy times; and bewail poor widow England (so he termed her) that, having been many years in breeding one eminent spirit, was in a moment bereaved of him.—Indeed, as Sir Fulke Grevil goes on, he was a true model of worth; a man fit for conquest, plantation, reformation, or what action ever is greatest and hardest among men.' . . . Souldiers honoured him, and were so honoured by him, that no man thought he marched under the true banner of Mars, that had not obtained Sir Philip Sidney's approbation. Men of affairs, in most parts of Christendom, entertained correspondency with him (46). He was a statesman, Soldier, and Scholar, a compleat matter of matter and language, as his immortal pen shews. Certain it is, he was a noble and matchless Gentleman; and it may be justly said, without hyperbole or fiction, as it was of Cato Uticensis, that he seemed to be born to that only which he went about (47).

[AA] His Modesty, his Piety, his Generosity, his Goodness, his Sincerity, his Honesty.] Fulke Grevil, Lord Brook, testifies, that he was 'such a lover of Mankind, and Goodness, that whosoever had any real part, in Him found comfort, participation, and protection to the uttermost of his power; like Zephyrus he giving life where he blew.' . . . A man of 'such eminence, that he was not only a nourisher of Virtue in Courts, but a reformed Standard, by which even the most humorous persons could not but have a reverend ambition to be tried and approved. . . . Besides which honour of Nature and Education, his very waies in the world did generally adde reputation to his Prince, and country, by restoring amongst us the ancient majestic of noble and True Dealing. . . . His heart and tongue went both one way, and so with every one that went with the Truth; as knowing no other kindred, partie, or end. Above all, he made the Religion he professed, the firm basis of his life: For this was his judgement (as he often told Sir Fulke Grevil) that our true-heartedness to the Reformed Religion in the beginning, brought Peace, Safetie, and Freedom to us; concluding, that the wisest and best way, was that of the famous William Prince of Orange, who never divided the consideration of Estate from the cause of Religion, nor gave the found party occasion to be jealous or distracted, upon any appearance of safety whatsoever. . . . The Greatness which he affected was built upon true worth; esteeming Fame more than Riches, and Noble actions far above Nobility itself (48).—This Gentleman's large, yet uniform, disposition was every where praised; greater in himself than in the world; yet greater there in Fame and Honour than many of his superiors; revered by forrain Nations in one form, of his own in another; easily censured, hardly imitated.—The Ingenuitie of his Nature did spread itself so freely abroad; as who can say he ever did him harm; whereas there be many, that may thankfully acknowledge he did them good. Neither was this in him a private, but a publique affection; his chief ends being not Friends, Wife, Children, or himselfe; but, above all things, the honour of his 'Maker, and Service of his Prince, or Country (49). This further Character is given of him in Holinshed's Chronicle (50). He was 'a gentleman of great hope, and exceeding expectation, endowed with manie rare Gifts, singular Vertues, and other Ornaments both of mind and bodie; one generallie beloved and esteemed of all men.—He greatlie abounded in sundrie good Vertues, which, wherever he came, procured him Love, but chiefly in Justice and Liberality (a worthy and most speciall note in a Governor) which gained him hearty love, coupled with Fame and Honor. For the which, especially those under his late charge and government greatly loved, honoured, and in a sort adored him, when he was alive.—' He was reckoned, for his Modestie, Courtesie, Affabilitie, and other speciall Vertues, amongst the verie prime Gentlemen for his yeares that this age hath bred, or our countrie afforded; and so complet a man to everie Perfection, as the memorie of him ought not to be forgotten (51).

In a modern Life of him (52), he is styled, 'the great Ornament to human Nature, to Literature, and to Britain.'—And the immortal Grotius pays a just tribute to his memory, by taking notice of his learning, and saying, That he was born for every great thing. Juvenis ad maxima quæque nati, ut qui claris natalibus epibusque, rarum decus! literas adjunxisset; hoc major avunculo Leicesterie, cui & fortuna, quantacunque ea futura erat, successor destinabatur (53).

But the Hon. Horace Walpole doth not pass so favorable, and as some may think a more impartial, judgement upon him. His words are, . . . 'No man seems to me so astonishing an object of temporary admiration as the celebrated friend of the Lord Brooke, the famous Sir Philip Sidney. The learned of Europe dedicated their works to Him; the republic of Poland thought him at least worthy to be in the nomination for their crown. All the muses of England wept his death. When we at this distance of time inquire what prodigious merits excited such admiration, what do we find.—Great valour.—But it was an age of heroes.—In full of all other talents we have a tedious, lamentable, pedantic, pastoral romance, which the patience of a young virgin in love cannot now wade through; and some absurd attempts to fetter English verse in Roman chains; a proof that this applauded author understood little of the genius of his own language. The few of his letters extant are poor matters; one to a steward of his father, an instance of unwarrantable violence. By far the best presumption of his abilities [to us who can judge only by what we see] is a pamphlet published amongst the Sidney-papers (54), being an answer to the famous libel called Leicester's Commonwealth. It defends his uncle with great spirit: What had been said in derogation to their blood seems to have touched Sir Philip most. He died with the rashness of a volunteer, after having lived to write with the sang froid (55), and prolixity of Mademoiselle Scuderi (56).—After all, there must have been something very extraordinary in Sir Philip Sydney's Person and Manner, now lost at this distance of time, which could draw such a volume of letters, as Hubert Languet wrote to him, and those very uncommon Commendations of his Cotemporaries, mentioned above.

(49) p. 46, 47.

(50) Edit. 1587. Vol. III. p. 1551, 1552.

(51) This last paragraph is taken from the Castrated Sheets of Holinshed's Chronicle, p. 1554.

(52) Lives of the Poets, as above, Vol. I, p. 76.

(53) Grotii Annal. et Hist. de Rebus Belgicis, edit. 1657. fol. p. 98.

(54) In the Introduction, p. 62.

(55) Cool blood.

(56) Noble Authors of England, Vol. I. p. 184.

(6) Life &c. as above, p. 38, 39.

(7) Naunton's Fragmenta, as above, p. 36.

(8) Life &c. as above, p. 38, 41, 42, 45.

SYDNEY, or SIDNEY (ALGERNOON), was the second surviving son of Robert Earl of Leicester, by his wife Dorothy, eldest daughter of Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland. He was born about the year 1621, or 1622 (a) [A]. His noble father was very careful to give him a good education; and in 1632, when he went ambassador to Denmark, took him with him; as also when he was ambassador in France (b) [B]. Upon the breaking out of the rebellion in Ireland, in the year 1641, he had a commission for a troop of horse in his Father's regiment, who was Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom; and went over thither with his brother the Lord Viscount Lisle, where he behaved very gallantly. In 1643, he had the King's permission to come to England, with his brother the Lord Lisle, but, withal, they received express orders on their allegiance to repair to his Majesty at Oxford: which the Parliament hearing of, sent into Lancashire where they landed, and had them taken into custody [C]. The King believing it happened through their own management, was greatly offended with them; and thereupon they entered into the measures of the Parliament (c), under which Algernoon accepted of a command: And 2000 l. was ordered him for his arrears (d). The Earl of Manchester (Serjeant-Major-General of the counties of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, Hertford, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Lincoln) constituted him, May 10, 1644, Captain of a troop of horse, in his own regiment, consisting of one hundred, to be raised for the defence of the King, Parliament, and Kingdom. And, April the 2d, 1645, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Commander in chief of all the forces raised for the defence of the kingdom, made him Colonel of a regiment of horse. He was in the battles of York, and other places; and likewise Governor of Chichester. His brother, the Lord Viscount Lisle, being appointed Lieutenant-general of Ireland, and Commander of the forces there, made him Colonel of a regiment of horse, to serve in the expedition into Ireland, which was in 1646. He became Lieutenant-general of the horse in that kingdom, and Governor of Dublin. But in 1647, that Government was taken from him, and given to Colonel Jones. However, the House of Commons ordered that some recompence might be given to Colonel Algernoon Sydney (e). He came over to England about that time; and, May 7, 1647, had, among others, the thanks of the House of Commons, for his good service in Ireland: and was afterwards made Governor of Dover (f). In 1648, he was nominated one of the Judges of King Charles I, but did not appear in that tragical affair (g) [D]. He was, by inclination and principle, so grounded in his opinion for a Commonwealth, that, when Oliver Cromwell had assumed the government, he refused to act under him; or his son Richard, who succeeded him in the Protectorship: During which time, he lived retired at Penshurst, and other places, when it is conceived he began to write his Discourses on Government, or at least some part of them. But, on the resignation of Richard, and the restoration of the Long Parliament, and their Speaker, Lenthall; they having voted, on the 7th of May, 1659, a Declaration to secure the Liberty and Property of the people, both as Men and Christians, without a single Person, King, or House of Peers, he then came into their measures. Whereupon, on the 13th of the month just now mentioned, he was named by that Parliament one of the Council of State, with the Lord Fairfax, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and others (h). The 5th of June following, he was nominated one of the Commissioners, with Sir Robert Honeywood, and Bulstrode Whitelock Esq; to go and mediate a peace between the Kings of Sweden and Denmark. But Mr Whitelock declining that employment, and Mr Thomas Boone being appointed in his room (i), Sir Robert Honeywood, Colonel Sydney, and Mr Boone, went on that embassy, which was not ended at the Restoration of King Charles the Second (k). They were successful in their negotiations, and obtained a peace between Denmark and Sweden (l).

(a) Memoirs of Algernon Sidney Esq; prefixed to his Discourses concerning Government, fol. edit. 1751. p. 1.

(c) Ibid. p. 148, 150.

(e) Memoirs &c. by Ar. Collins, as above, p. 150, 151, 152. and Whitelock's Memorials, p. 242.

(g) Dugdale's Short view of the Troubles, p. 368.

(b) Memoirs &c. as above, p. 152. and Whitelock, p. 678. and Ludlow's Memoirs, edit. 1699. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 656.

(i) One of the reasons given by Mr Whitelock for his declining that employment, is, because he 'knew well 'the over-ruling 'temper, and 'height of Col. 'Sidney.' Memorials, p. 680.

(1) See Letters and Memorials of State, &c. Vol. II. p. 709.

(2) Memoirs &c. as above, by Collins. See also Letters and Memorials of State &c. Vol. II. p. 445.

[A] Born about the year 1621, or 1622.] He says, in April 1661, that he was 'growing very near forty (1).'

[B] As also when he was ambassador in France.] Whilst he was there, the Countess his mother, in a Letter to the Earl at Paris, dated Nov. 10, 1636, acquaints his Lordship, 'That she hears him [her son Algernoon] 'much commended by all that come from thence, for 'a huge deal of Wit, and much Sweetness of Nature (2).'

[C] And had them taken into custody.] The order of the House of Commons for that purpose was in these words.

' Die Jovis ult. Augusti, 1643.

' A letter was read from the Committee at Liverpoole and Manchester, and an intercepted letter, there taken from Captayne Sidney, newly come out of Ireland, to Orlando Bridgman at Chester, of his intentions to goe to the King, were read:

' Ordered,

' That a letter bee written to the Deputy Lieutenants and Committees in the Countie of Lancaster, to send upp in safe custody the Lord Lisle, Captayne Sidney, and Sir Richard Grinville, guarded with a strong convey: And that the Committees and Deputie Lieutenants in the Counties betwixt this and Lancashire,

' respectively, doe appointe a good convoy with the said persons, through their severall Counties, and that a stay bee made of all their goods and armes, till this Howse take further order. And Mr Ashurst is to prepare this letter, and to write the same accordingly.'

[D] But did not appear in that tragical affair.] The anonymous Author of the Reflections upon Col. Sidney's last Paper (3), says, that 'He was not only named in this execrable commission, but was actually in the Court, and upon the bench as a co-assessor with that villain Bradshaw and the rest at the tryal of that illustrious sufferer; as he was able to make appear from a true transcript of every severall day's proceeding, in the Tryal; the original whereof is attested under Phelps the Clerk of that pretended Court's own hand, and was by him drawn up, and the names of all that were present each day entered by order from the Keepers of the Liberties of England. It is true he was not present when the sentence was passed, nor the execrable warrant for the barbarous execution signed.'—In April 1651, he had a great quarrel with the Earl of Oxford, the occasion not known, which ended in a duel; as appears by this entry in Whitelock's Memorials (4), 'That the Earl of Oxford, and Colonel Sidney, were gone into Flanders to fight a duel with seconds.'

(b) Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sidneys &c. prefixed to Letters of State &c. published by Ar. Collins Esq; Vol. I. edit. 1746. fol. p. 149, &c.

(d) Whitelock's Memorials, edit. 1732. p. 233.

(f) Whitelock's p. 246, 487.

(k) See Thurler's State-Papers, Vol. II.

(l) See Letters and Memorials of State, Vol. p. 686, 687, &c.

(3) p. 5.

(4) p. 492.

But Col. Sydney was so noted a Republican [E], and had acted all along with such earnestness against the King's friends, that he did not think it safe or advisable to return to England, though he was advised to it by General Monk [F]; therefore, according to his father's [E] But Col. Sydney was so noted a Republican. With what eye he was looked upon at the Court of England, appears plainly from the following extract of a Letter of his Father's to him 'Concerning you, what to resolve in myself, or what to advise you, truly I know not; for you must give me leave to remember, of how little weight my opinions and counsels have been with you, and how unkindly and unfriendly you have rejected those exhortations and admonitions, which, in much affection and kindness, I have given you upon many occasions, and in almost every thing, from the highest to the lowest, that hath concerned you: and this you may think sufficient to discourage me from putting my advices into the like danger. Yet somewhat I will say: and, first, I think it unfit, and perhaps as yet unsafe, for you to come into England; for I believe Powell (5) hath told you, that he heard, when he was here, that you were likely to be excepted out of the general act of pardon and oblivion: and, though I know not what you have done or said here or there, yet I have several ways heard, that there is an ill opinion of you, as of any, even of those that condemned the late King. And when I thought there was no other exception to you, than your being of the other party, I spoke to the General in your behalf, who told me, that very ill offices had been done you; but he would assist you as much as justly he could. And I intended then also to speak to somebody else; you may guess whom I mean (6): But since that I have heard such things of you, that, in the doubtfulness only of their being true, no man will open his mouth for you. I will tell you some passages, and you shall do well to clear yourself of them. It is said, that the university of Copenhagen brought their album unto you, desiring you to write something therein; and that you did scribere in albo these words;

. . . . Manus hæc inimica tyrannis
Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem.

And put your name to it (7). This cannot choose but be publicly known, if it be true. It is also said, that a minister, who hath married a Lady Laurence, here at Chelsea, but now dwelling at Copenhagen, being there in company with you, said, "I think you were none of the late King's judges, nor guilty of his death," meaning our King. "Guilty!" said you: do you call that guilt? why, it was the justest and bravest action that ever was done in England, or any where else;" with other words to the same effect. It is said also, that, you having heard of a design to seize upon you, or to cause you to be taken prisoner, you took notice of it to the King of Denmark himself, and said, "I hear there is a design to seize upon me; but who is it that hath that design?" "Efice nôtre bandit (8)?" by which you are understood to mean the King. Besides this, it is reported, that you have been heard to say many scornful and contemptuous things of the King's person and family, which, unless you can justify yourself, will hardly be forgiven or forgotten; for such personal offences make deeper impressions than public actions, either of war or treaty (9).

[F] That he did not think it safe or advisable to return to England, &c. This account he gives us himself: "I chose rather to remaine beyond the seas, then to return into my owne country, though general Monk, upon the account of many obligations received from me, did desire me to returne, with large offers of all the advantages he could procure for me (10)."—He had some thoughts of returning home at first, but suffered himself to be directed by his relations, and at last had reason to think, that he acted wisely by staying abroad. This appears from the following extracts of some of his letters to his father "I did hope, that, by the time I could returne from hence, our Messenger might have met me with an Answer unto my letters at Copenhagen. I now despair of that, and am absolutely uncertaine what course I shall take, unlesse I find somme other letters, at my returne, that may instruct me. I shall conclude what I have to say relating unto my own concernements, in desiring your Lordship, and my Lord of Northumberland, to doe that which you think best, according to the present state of things, and to send me directions how to dispose of myself, which I shall exactly followe. Your Lordship may better know my motions then myself; for I shall take my measures, for staying or returning, just according to what I shall hear from England (11). . . . In the following letter we find, it had been his Father's opinion, He should returne immediately home. . . . But very soon after, he ordered him, 'to remove from Stockholm to Hamburgh, and from thence into Holland, or some place in Germany (12).' He acknowledges in another letter (13), how prudent that course had been. 'I think, says he, the counsell given me by all my Friends, to keep out of England for a while, doth too clearly appeare to have bin good, by the usage my companions have already received, and perhaps will be yet further verified by what they will find. Nothing doth seeme more certaine to me, then that, I must either have procured my safety, by such meanes as Sir Arthur Haselrigg is sayed to have used; or runne the fortune of somme others, whoe have shewed themselves more resolute.'—In another Letter, he expresses himself in a yet more strong and pathetick manner. . . . 'I confess, we are naturally inclined to delight in our own country, and I have a particular love to mine. I hope I have given some testimony of it. I think, that being exiled from it is a great evil; and would redeem myself from it with the loss of a great deal of my blood. But, when that country of mine, which used to be esteemed a paradise, is now like to be made a stage of injury; the liberty, which we hoped to establish, oppressed; luxury and lewdness set up in its height, instead of the piety, virtue, sobriety, and modesty, which we hoped, God by our hands would have introduced; the best of our nation made a prey to the worst; the parliament, court, and army, corrupted; the people enslaved; all things vendible; no man safe, but by such evil and infamous means, as flattery and bribery; what joy can I have in my own country in this condition? Is it a pleasure to see, that all I love in the world is sold and destroyed? Shall I renounce all my old principles, learn the vile court-arts, and make my peace by bribing some of them? Shall their corruption and vice be my safety? Ah! no: better is a life among strangers, than in my own country upon such conditions. Whilst I live, I will endeavour to preserve my liberty; or, at least, not consent to the destroying of it. I hope I shall die in the same principles, in which I have lived, and will live no longer than they can preserve me. I have in my life been guilty of many follies; but, as I think, of no meanness. I will not blot and defile that which is past, by endeavouring to provide for the future. I have ever had in my mind, that when God should cast me into such a condition, as that I cannot save my life, but by doing an indecent thing, he shews me the time is come, wherein I should resign it. And when I cannot live in my own country but by such means as are worse than dying in it; I think he shews me, I ought to keep myself out of it. Let them please themselves with making the King glorious, who think a whole people may justly be sacrificed for the interest and pleasure of one man, and a few of his followers: let them rejoice in their subtilty, who, by betraying the former powers, have gained the favour of this, not only preserved, but advanced themselves in these dangerous changes. Nevertheless, perhaps they may find the King's glory is their shame; his plenty the people's misery; and that the gaining of an office, or a little money, is a poor reward for destroying a nation (which, if it were preserved in liberty and virtue, would truly be the most glorious in the world) and that others may find they have with much pains purchased their own shame and misery; a dear price paid for that, which is not worth keeping, nor the life that is accompanied with it. The honour of English Parliaments hath ever been, in making the nation glorious and happy, not in selling and destroying the interest of it, to satisfy the lulls of one man. Miserable nation! that, from so great a height of glory, is fallen into the most despicable condition in the world; of having all its good depend upon the breath and will of (11) Letters and Memorials of State, Vol. II. p. 690.

(12) p. 691.

(13) p. 700.

(5) His manservant.

(6) Undoubtedly King Charles II.

(7) See Lord Moleworth's Account of Denmark, Preface, near the end.

(8) i. e. Is it our banditti?

(9) Familiar Letters, written by John, late Earl of Rochester, and several other persons of honour, &c. Lond. 1697. 8vo. p. 53, &c.

(10) His Apology, prefixed to the last edition of his Discourses concerning Government.

(m) The same
Volume, p. 691,
695.

father's command, he determined to remove to Hamburgh, and from thence into Holland, or some place in Germany, where he might lie still a while, and see what was to be expected for him (m). In September 1660, he was at Francford (n), and the November following at Rome [G]: But, to all appearance by orders from England, he was forced, about the middle of the year 1661, to remove from thence to Frascati (o) [H]; and next

(n) See the same
Volume, p. 698.

(o) See Letters,
p. 708, 718, &c.
to

' the vilest persons in it! cheated and sold by them
' they trusted! infamous traffic, equal almost in guilt
' to that of Judas! In all preceding ages Parliaments
' have been the palace of our liberty; the sure de' fenders of the oppressed: they, who formerly could ' bridle Kings, and keep the balance equal between ' them and the people, are now become instruments of ' all our oppressions, and a sword in his hand to de' stroy us; they themselves led by a few interested ' persons, who are willing to buy offices for them' selves, by the misery of the whole nation, and the ' blood of the most worthy and eminent persons in it.
' Detestable bribes, worse than the oaths now in ' fashion in this mercenary court! I mean to owe ' neither my life nor liberty to any such means: when
' the innocence of my actions will not protect me, I ' will stay away till the storm be over-passed. In short,
' where Vane, Lambert, and Haselrigg cannot live in ' safety, I cannot live at all. If I had been in Eng' land, I should have expected a lodging with them;
' or, though they may be the first, as being more emi' nent than I, I must expect to follow their example in ' suffering, as I have been their companion in acting.
' I am most in a maze at the mistaken informations,
' that were sent to me by my friends, full of expecta' tions of favours and employments. Who can think,
' that they, who imprison them, would employ me;
' or suffer me to live, when they are put to death?
' If I might live, and be employed, can it be expect' ed, that I should serve a government that seeks such ' detestable ways of establishing itself? Ah! no: I ' have not learnt to make my own peace, by perfe-
' cuting and betraying my brethren, more innocent
' and worthy than myself. I must live by just means,
' and serve to just ends, or not at all. After such a ' manifestation of the ways by which it is intended the ' King shall govern, I should have renounced any ' place of favour, into which the kindness and industry
' of my friends might have advanced me; when I ' found those, that were better than I, were only fit
' to be destroyed. I had formerly some jealousies:
' the fraudulent proclamation for indemnity increased
' them: the imprisoning of those three men, and
' turning out of all the officers of the army, contrary
' to promise, confirmed me in my resolutions not to ' return. To conclude, the tide is not to be diverted,
' nor the oppressed delivered; but God, in his time,
' will have mercy on his people: he will save and ' defend them, and avenge the blood of those, who ' shall now perish, upon the heaps of those, who, in
' their pride, think nothing is able to oppose them:
' happy are those, whom God shall make instruments
' of his justice in so blessed a work. If I can live to ' see that day, I shall be ripe for the grave, and able ' to say with joy, "Lord, now lettest thou thy ser' vant depart in peace &c." Farewel. My thoughts
' as to King and state depending upon their actions,
' no man shall be a more faithful servant to him than I,
' if he make the good and prosperity of his people his ' glory; none more his enemy, if he doth the con' trary ——— (14).'

(14) Letters &c.
as above, p. 62.

[G] And the November following at Rome. In a letter from thence to his Father, he says, . . . ' I hope my ' being here, will in a short time shewe, that the Place
' was not ill chosen, and that, besides the liberty and
' quiet which is generally granted to all persons here, I ' may be admitted into that company, the knowledge
' of which will very well recompence my journey. I ' was extremely unwilling to stay in Hamburgh, or ' any place in Germany, finding my self too apt to
' fall too deepe into melancholy, if I have neither bu-
' sinesse nor company to divert me; and I have such ' an aversion to the conversation and entertainments of ' that country, that if I had stayed in it, I must have ' lived as a hermite, though in a populous city. I ' am here well enough at ease, and believe I may ' continue soe, unless some body from the Court of Eng' land doth think it worth their paines to disturbe me. I ' see nothing likely to arise here to trouble me. I ' have already visited severall Cardinalls; to morrow
' I intend to pay the same respect to the Cardinal
' Gizi, nephew to the Pope. . . . They are all ge' nerally civill, and I ask no more. . . . I doe not

' heare see thoes signes of Ease, Satisfaction, and ' Plenty, that weare in Pope Urban his time, but that
' littell concernes Strangers; the company of persons
' excellent in all Sciences, which is the best thing
' Strangers can seeke, is never wanting ——— (15).'

(15) Letters &c.
p. 700, 701.

In one of his subsequent Letters he gives a very curious account, and characters, of the severall Cardinalls (16).

(16) p. 711, &c.

[H] But, to all appearance by orders from England, he was forced, about the middle of the year 1661, to remove from thence to Frascati. I heare (saith he in one of ' his Letters to his father) of an Irish Priest, one Plunket,

' nephew to Nicklesse Plunket, who is very busy in ' prating and scribbling. I know not the Man, nor
' what exceptions he can have unto me, unless it be
' for being an Englishman, sometimes employed in ' Ireland: But I apprehend nothing but Orders from ' England to my prejudice: He sayeth, such will ' comme, as shall force me to change my station (17).'

(17) p. 708.

' Heare is, saith he in another Letter (18),
' one Plunket, a young Irish Priest, that gives me
' some trouble, by foolish discourses; amongst others,
' he sayes I am an Atheist, and bred up in your Lord-
' ship's house under a Master, from whom I learnt
' thoes opinions. He was answered, that was very ' improbable, and that my life and conversation gave
' testimony of the contrary; but though that weare,
' it concerned no body here ——— (19).'

(18) p. 709.

(19) He came afterwards and made his apology to Mr Sydney.
Ibid.

' The
' other day, as he goes on, I was informed, that
' Orders had bin sent from the Court here, to the ' Internuntio in Flanders, to make the best enquiry
' he could of me, my birth, person, and quality. To ' whom information was given by one White. . . .
' that I was ever found to be violent against Monarchy,
' a friend unto Roman Catholiques, one that in our last
' troubles, meddled littell with private Businesse; and
' that had made my fortune by the warre, with some
' other things like unto this, part true, and part
' false; but none that I can learne which doth me any ' prejudice. They weare put upon this enquiry by
' the foolish prating of some Priests, who spoke of ' me, as the only Enemy the King had left, and that I
' being taken away, his Majesty might reagne in quiet.
' These are but very slight vapours, and if nothing
' comes from England to my prejudice, I will easily
' blowe them away ———. However, he thought fit to remove to Frascati; from whence writing to his Father, he says (20), ' I find myself at present

(20) p. 723;

' as well as I can be, untill the time comme that I
' may conveniently returne into my owne country.
' The Prince Pamphilio, nephew to the last Pope,
' hath given me very convenient lodgings in his Villa
' de Belvedere, which is one of the finest of Italy.
' Here are walks and fountains in the greatest ' perfection; and, though my natural delight in soli' tude is very much increased this last year, I cannot ' desire to be more alone than I am, and hope to ' continue. My conversation is with birds, trees, and ' books. In these last months, that I have had no bu-
' sinesse at all, I have applied myself to study a little ' more than I have done formerly: and though one
' who begins at my age, cannot hope to make any ' considerable progress that way; I find so much sa' tisfaction in it, that, for the future, I shall very un-
' willingly (though I had the opportunity) put myself
' into any way of living, that shall deprive me of that ' entertainment. Whatsoever hath been formerly the ' objects of my thoughts and desires, I have now in' tention of seeking very little more than quietness and ' retirement ———. And again; ' I left Rome,
' where I had made a great deale of acquaintance, to
' avoid the necessity of making and receiving visits,
' and live now as a hermite in a palace.' ' I
' cannot but rejoice a littell to finde, that when I wan' der as a vagabond through the world, forsaken of
' my Friends, poore, and knowne only to be a broken
' limbe of a ship-wracked Faction; I yet finde huma' nity and civility from thoes who are in the height of ' fortune and reputation. But I doe alsoe well knowe,
' I am in a strange land, how farre thoes civillities doe
' extend, and that they are too acry to feed or cloath a
' man (21).'

(21) p. 720.

to other parts of Italy; as also to Germany, and France [I]. In December, 1663, he dates a letter from Brussels (p). And from Ludlow it appears (q), that a prospect of some Troubles in England had brought him thither; 'thinking convenient to draw nearer home, that if an opportunity should offer, he might not be wanting to [what he thought] his Duty and the publick service.' About that time, he had the offer of a commission in a regiment raised in England for the service of the Emperor; and, if he did not obtain it, he proposed to pass the summer following as a volunteer in Hungary (r). He was far from being in his Father's good graces; and, at times, during his exile, was reduced to great streights and necessities [K]. So obnoxious likewise was he to our court, that some persons are said to have been sent to assassinate him at Augsburg; but he escaped, by being then come to Holland (s). Thus he continued for seventeen years wandring from place to place, in indigence, and not without danger sometimes of losing his life; because it was known that he could not be corrupted, as his own words are (t). But, at last, his Father, the Earl of Leicester, desiring to see him before his death, he obtained leave from King Charles II. for his return, in 1677, as also his Pardon; through the interest of the Earl's grandson, Robert Earl of Sunderland [L], who was then a great favorite at court.

(p) Letters, p. 725.

(r) Letters of State &c. Vol. II. p. 725.

(s) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. III. p. 172. and Author's Apology, as our above.

His

'preparative) be an entire one, and shall not be much troubled, though I find, if upon the knowledge of my manner of life, they, whoe the last yeare at Whitehall did exercise their tongues upon me, as a very unruly headed man, doe so farre change their opinion of me, on the sudden, as to believe me soe dull and lazy, as to be fit for nothing. When that opinion is well settled, I may hope to live quietly in England, and then shall think it a feasonable time to returne. I have somme inclinations this autume to goe to Naples, and from thence to Sicily, and Malta, to pass the winter in some of thoes places, and returne to Rome in the Springe. It is not usual for me, to look soe many moneths before-hand, nor possible to extend my sight any farther. I must then knowe from my friends at home, whether it be yet time to returne thither; I have ever had it in my thoughts to choose that before any thing; but if it be still inconvenient for me to take that resolution, I must then think of making another pause at Rome, or somme other place, that may prove convenient (22).'

So much of his Letters we thought necessary, upon this subject, to lay before the Reader; as they shew his circumstances, designs, and motions.

[I] And France.] He had the following Licence from the King of France, to come from Germany to Montpellier. 'To all Governors, and our Lieutenants general, &c. greeting. Mr Sydney, Son to the Earl of Leicester, having desired, notwithstanding the war against England, that he might change his place of abode from Germany, to go to Montpellier; To which We having assented, We command you to let him pass freely through your severall jurisdictions, with his domesticks, to Montpellier, without interruption, and to shew him all the favour, and aid him as far as you can. Given at our castle of Vincennes, August 3, 1663.

'Signed LOUIS (23).'

He tells us, that he 'cast himself into unsuspected retirement in the most remote parts of France, [in Gascogne] where he passed above eleven years; and was drawn out of it only by a desire of seeing his aged father before he dyed (24).'

[K] He was far from being in his Father's good graces; and reduced to great streights, &c.] This is abundantly evident from the following extracts from some of his letters to his father. . . 'I though it is long since I heard from your Lordship, and the contents of the last letter I received were such, as gave me litle expectation of having others, or reason to think mine would be acceptable unto you, I esteeme it my duty to continue writing, untill I doe, by somme more indubitable testimony, find, your Lordship hath soe farre rejected me, as to be unwilling to heare of me, or my concerns (25).'

. . . 'I write to your Lordship sometimes, because I am not forbidden: Not often, because I am neither commandyd, nor have reason to think that diligence would be acceptable unto you (26). . . According to my coustume, I give your Lordship this testimony of my being alive; which I think necessary, since your Lordship gives no signe of remembering I am soe (27).'

. . . 'I heare your Lordship hath somme Suspitions concerning me; if I might knowe in what, I doe upon my word promise your Lordship, to let you know my Thoughts punctually, without either dissimulation, or reservation (28).'

And, that he was reduced to great streights and necessities, the following extracts from two of his letters will plainly shew . . . 'I did intend to have sayed no more; but it is a folly to conceal the Evills that oppress me. I have with difficulty writ this; and the troubled thoughts into which the letters received by the last post have cast me, give me not easily the liberty of saying more. The Misfortunes into which I was fallen, by the destruction of our Party, did not shake me. The cheates and thefts of Servants were too ordinary to trouble me. I suffered my Mother's Legacy, to be drawne from me, upon which I might have subsisted a good while. I was not very much surpris'd to find myself betrayed, and robbed of all that with which I had trusted Lady Strangford, but I confesse, that I am sorely troubled to find, that Sir Jo. Temple is going into Ireland; the agreement which he had soe often said should be made with Strangford broken; from which I might expect somme part of what is due unto me, to live upon. The mortgage to the Earl of Tharret to continue upon Andrewes his land, which is the forest mischief that ever fell upon me since I was borne, and that I was soe often promised should be taken off, and put upon Portling lands, as it ought to be: And by all theis meanes together, I find myselfe destitute of all help at home, and exposed to all those troubles, inconveniencies, and mischiefs, unto which They are exposed, whoe have nothing to subsist upon; in a place farre from home, wheare no assistance can possibly be expected, and wheare I am knowne to be of a quality, which makes all lowe and mean wayes of living shamefull and detestable. Theis are part of the evils, with which I finde myself encompassed, and out of which I see noe issue; nor can I make one step, that is not as likely to prove my destruction, as preservation. It will not, I think, be thought strange, that I am sensible of them, since he that is not, must be an Angell, or a Beast: My only hope is, that God will, somme way or other, put an end to my troubles, or my life (29).'

. . . 'Perhaps, sharp-sighted braines might, in a condition like unto mine, find more occasion of trouble then I doe: I finde stupidity an advantage; Nature hath given me a large proportion of it; and I did artificially encrease it, to that degree, that if I weare not awakened with the bitter sense of somme mischiefs, that the Lady Strangford hath brought upon me (which Sir John Temple ever made me hope he would remove) I should rest well enough at ease, in a dull indolence, and never trouble myself with the thoughts of examining, wheare I should have bread for three moneths: This may shewe your Lordship, into what slate Nature and Fortune have brought one that received life from you (30).'

—However his Father remitted him Money now and then (31).

[L] Through the interest of the Earl's grandson, Robert Earl of Sunderland.] Bishop Burnet says (32), 'That it was the Court of France obtained leave for him to return in 1678, when the Parliament was pressing the King into a war. He did all he could to divert people from that war; so that some took him for a pensioner of France: But to those to whom he durst speak freely, he said, he knew it was all a juggle; that our Court was in an entire confidence with France, and had no other design, in this shew of a war, but to raise an army, and keep it beyond-sea till it was trained and modelled.' Such is the Bishop's account; but it appears from a Letter of our Author's to Henry Savile, Esq; then Embassador in France, that it was that Gentleman

(29) Letters &c. Vol. II. p. 717.

(30) p. 720, 721.

(31) p. 721.

(32) History of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 193.

(7) Memoirs, 2vo. edit. Vol. II. p. 119.

(7) Apology, as above, p. 2.

(22) Letters &c. as above, p. 721.

(23) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 152.

(24) Apology, as above.

(25) Letter, dated Dec. 12, 1660. p. 701.

(26) Letter of Dec. 29, 1660. p. 702.

(27) Letter of Jan. 29, 1660. p. 704.

(28) p. 709. Lett. of April 5, 1661.

(u) Memoirs of the Sidneys &c. as above, p. 153.

(w) Ibid. p. 153—155.

His father left him a legacy of five thousand one hundred pounds (u) [M]. In 1678, he stood candidate for Member of Parliament for the burgh of Guilford in Surry; but the Court opposing him, he lost his election; as he did also in the next Parliament (w) [N]. He was so imprudent, as to resort chiefly with the Duke of Monmouth, and other discontented persons [O], which in the end proved his ruin. For, by being one of their companions, (33) Letters to the Honourable Henry Savile, p. 147, 148.

tleman who obtained leave for him to return. The letter is dated from Nerac in Gasconne, Dec. 18. N. S. 1682 (33), and is as follows. 'I received yesterday, in one and the same packet, three letters from you, of which one had passed through Paris whilst I was there, and that would have spared me a journey of four hundred leagues, if I had then received it. This would have been a convenience unto me; but my obligation unto you is the same, and I so far acknowledge it to be the greatest that I have in a long time received from any man, as not to value the leave you have obtained for me to return into my country, after so long an absence, at a lower rate than the saving of my life. You having proceeded thus far, I will, without any scruple, put myself intirely upon the King's word; and desire you only to obtain a pass to signify it, and that his Majesty is pleased to send for me; so as the officers of the ports or other places may not stop me, as they will be apt to do as soon as they know my name, if I have not that for my protection. I have no other business than what solely concerns my person and family. I desire not to be a day in England unknown to the King or his Ministers; and will lose no time in waiting upon the Secretary as soon as I can after my arrival. I think it no ways reasonable that I should stay in England, if the King do not see I may do it without any shadow or possibility of prejudice unto him; and, unless I can satisfy him in that point, I desire no more than to return on this side the seas after the three months, where I intend to finish my days, without thinking any more of living in England (*).'
[M] His father left him a legacy of 5,100 l. He informs us himself (34), that his father dyed within a few weeks after his coming over; and when he prepared himself to return into Gascony, there to pass the remaining part of his life, he was hindered by the Earl of Leicester, his brother, who questioned all that his father had given him for his subsistence; and by a long and tedious suit in Chancery, detained him in England, until he was made a prisoner; when a favourable decree, obtained in Chancery, gave him hopes of being freed from such vexatious business. I reassumed (continues he) my former designe of returning into France; and to that end bought a small parcell of ground, in a friend's name, with an intention of going immediately unto it: this proceeded from the uneasiness of my life, when I found, that not only the reall discontents, that grew to be too common, were ascribed unto me, but sham plots fastened upon me, soe as I could never think my life a day in safety.'

(*) Letters &c. as above, p. 169, &c.

(34) Apology, p. 2.

[N] He lost his election; as he did also in the next Parliament.] He takes notice of his being elected, in one of his letters to Henry Savile Esq; dated October 29 'I am not able, saith he, to give so much as a guess whether the Parliament shall sit the 26th of January or not, and though I think myself in all respects well chosen, am uncertain whether I shall be of it, or not, there being a double return; and nothing can be assured, until the question arising thereupon be determined, unless it be that as I and my Principles are out of fashion; my inclinations going one way, my friendship and alliance with those that are like to give occasion for the greatest contests drawing another, I shall be equally disliked and suspected by both parties, and thereby become the most inconsiderable member of the House.'

[O] He was so imprudent as to resort chiefly with the Duke of Monmouth, and other discontented persons.] That gave the Court an opportunity of involving him in their guilt: Notwithstanding he protests his innocence, and seems to be conscious that no legal advantage could have been taken against him. His own account is in these words. 'In Aprill last [1683] I was told by a person of eminent quality, virtue, and understanding, that I should infaillibly be made a prisoner. I asked upon what pretence: he alleagued some things that were entirely frivolous, relating unto wild persons, whoes faces and names I did not know; but concluded some or other would be found; and that if I was once taken, it mattered not for what cause; it being impossible to avoid condemnation, before such judges and juries as I should be tried by. About the middell of June the towne was full of rumours of a plot, sayd to be discovered by Keeling, and not long after by West: some persons fled, and a proclamation issued to have them apprehended; my name was in every coffee-house, and severall informations were given me, that I should certainly be seized: I mentioned this to severall persons; but, knowing no reasons why I should absent myself, resolved not to do it; and continued in that minde, though I was told, early in the morning one the 26 of June, that the Duke of Monmouth was retired, and Coll. Rumsy had rendered himself. This concerned me soe littell, that I spent that morning upon my usuall studies, or entertaining such friends as came to see me; and whilst I was at dinner, a messenger came and arrested me in the Kings name, by an order from four Lords of the Privy Councell (35).'

[M] He endeavours to clear himself of that imputation, in the following words: . . . 'but noe man sayd, that any mention was ever made of it in my presence; even the King knowes I am not a man to have any such designe; and I am noe more capable of it then of eating of him, if he were (+) death: I think I may say, I did once save his life; but I am sure I never endeavoured to take it away: if the meetings mentioned were to be taken for conspiracies against his Majestyes life, something must have been there proposed and resolved concerning the wayes, manner, time, place, or persons, by whome it should be effected; of which not one word is pretended, nor that he was so much as named (36).'

But, if the Secret History of the Rye-house Plot, and of Monmouth's rebellion, written by Ford Lord Grey, and lately published (37), is to be credited; Col. Sydney had a greater share in that Plot, than he was willing to own, or imagined could be proved. The share he had in it appears from the following extracts from that History. . . . 'In February at Chester the Duke of Monmouth acquainted me, that my Lord of Essex, Lord Howard, Lord Russell, Colonel Sidney, Mr Hambden, and himself, had been contriving Insurrections in several parts of this kingdom, and designed to engage some in Scotland to do the like; that he was to have a meeting, at his return to London, with the persons above named, but believed it would not be long before they disagreed, for he feared my Lord of Essex, Colonel Sidney, and Mr Hambden intended a Commonwealth, which could not be without the destruction of the King; and if that was their intention, my Lord Russell, and himself were resolved to quit them entirely, and to think of saving themselves; for they would both rather lie at the King's mercy for what was passed, than that his life should be indangered, or his liberty taken away, which was next to death (38).'
[M] Col. Sidney addressing his discourse to me [Lord Grey] began with a long prologue of the necessity we were reduced to of taking up arms, and of the lawfulness of it; and from thence descended to a particular account of their severall proceedings and resolutions, since the first time of their meeting (39).'
[M] Col. Sidney said he had heard, when wise men drew their swords against their King, they laid aside the thoughts of treating with him (40).'
[M] I asked Col. Sidney in what hands they had resolved to place the management of the War; he said, they had not resolved that, but he thought it would not be in any others, than those persons who made up our little Council, and one or two more who might be thought on (41).'
[M] My Lord of Essex and Colonel Sidney had undertaken to draw the Declaration (42).'
[M] The Duke of Monmouth told me, he found my Lord of Essex, Colonel Sidney, and all of them, should agree in every thing; and he was confident, that when we were in arms, and the King saw how strong we were in several places, there would be little

(35) Apology, p. 3. We have retained his own manner of spelling.

(+) Dead.

(36) Apology, p. 10.

(37) Lond. 1754. 8vo.

(38) p. 50a

(39) p. 59a

(40) p. 64d

(41) Ibid.

(42) p. 67.

panions, he was looked upon as one of the accomplices in the Presbyterian Plot, in 1683 (x): 'And though (being admitted into his Majesty's presence) he did truly shew ' unto him, that there neither was nor could be any such plot, as matters then stood (y) [P];' yet, on the 26th of June, a messenger came and arrested him; and one of the Clerks of the Council seized his papers. The same day, by a warrant from the Secretary of State, he was committed to the Tower for high-treason. A little while after, all his effects were likewise secured (z). On the 7th of November following he was brought to the bar of the court of King's-bench, and arraigned upon an indictment of high-treason [Q]. The Court, for fashion-like, allowed him a fortnight for his tryal (aa); to which he was brought the 21st of November [R]. The three first witnesses against him were Robert West, Colonel Romsey, and Mr Keeling; whose depositions not being grounded upon their own knowledge, but upon the report of others [S], were only Hearsay Evidence; and consequently invalid in case of Treason. The single Evidence against him was the Lord Howard of Escrick, a man of an abandoned character; 'whose deposition was very ' rhetorical, but nothing at all to the purpose (bb) [T].' So, to corroborate this lame evidence, Col. Sydney's Discourses on Government were produced; as 'a seditious and ' traitorous libel [V], the design of which was, to persuade the People of England, that it is ' lawful, (x) Account of the Conspiracy by Bishop Sprat, edit. 1686. 8vo. p. 28, 86, 170. &c. and our Author's Apology, p. 2.

(aa) Ibid. p. 5.

(bb) Ibid. p. 7.

' little blood shed, for all would end in an accommodation between the King and a Parliament (43).'

[P] He did truly shew unto him, that there neither was nor could be any such plot, as matters then stood.] His reason for it was, 'because it would cast his Majesty ' into conjunction with the Popish, which they [the ' Nonconformists] did most abhorre.' However, as our Author informs us, 'the sham was continued, as ' appeared by the Meal-tub business: though his name ' was not there found, he was well informed, that if it ' had succeeded, he should have bin involved in it. ' Other wayes were invented to vex and ruin him. ' When he only looked over a balcony to see what ' passed at the election of the Sheriffs of London (44), ' he was indicted for a riot (45).'

[Q] Upon an indictment of high-treason.] The points he was indicted for, were, his ' contriving and intending, to disturb the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom of England; to stir up war against the King; to subvert his government; to depose and deprive him; and to bring and put him to death: For ' which purpose, he had, the 30th day of June, 1683, ' and divers other times, as well before as after, met and consulted with divers traitors; promised, that ' he would be aiding and assisting in their treasons; ' had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland, to invite ' divers evil-disposed subjects of that kingdom to come ' into England, to consult with him and other traitors. And, that in order to persuade the subjects of ' the King of England that it is lawful to make and ' stir up an insurrection and rebellion against him, he ' had composed and written a certain false, seditious, ' and traitorous libell (46), in which, among other ' things, is contained as followeth, viz. "The Power ' originally in the people of England is delegated ' unto the Parliament. He (meaning King Charles II) ' is subject unto the law of God, as He is a man to ' the People that makes him a King, inasmuch as He ' is a King, the Law sets a measure unto that sub- ' jection, and the Parliament judges of the particular ' cases thereupon arising &c."—Col. Sidney makes the following observations upon this indictment. 'The ' meetings to conspire were said to be on the 30th of ' June, and many other days, both before and since; ' whereas he was then, and had been some days before, and ever since, a close prisoner.—He was ' brought into the palace-yard, Westminster, between ' ten and eleven o'clock in the morning, before the ' grand jury was assembled, or the King's counsell ' could know the bill would be found, unless they had ' the faculty of divining, or held such an intelligence ' with the grand jury, as utterly overthrows all justice. ' —Upon his being arraigned, he desired a copy ' of the indictment, leave to make his exceptions, or ' to put in a special plea that he had in his hand ready ' engrossed, which was all rejected: and being threatened, ' that, if he did not immediately plead guilty, a judgment of high-treason should be entered, he was ' forced, contrary to law as he supposed, to come ' to a general issue in pleading not guilty (47).'

[R] To which he was brought the 21st of November.] He complained extremely of the Jury that was impanelled upon that occasion. . . . 'The life, says he, ' I have led might have given me some kind of knowledge of such as reasonably might be thought fit to be ' my judges; but I did not know the face of one, nor ' the names of more than three (48), of the whole pannell, and they last, as did not appear: upon examination I found, that they had not only put in very ' many that weare not freeholders, but picked up a ' rabble of men of the meanest callings, ruined fortunes, ' lost reputation, and hardly endowed with such understanding as is required for a jury in a nisi prius court ' for a business of five pounds (49).'

[S] Whose depositions not being grounded upon their own knowledge, but upon the report of others.] Mr Sydney objected to West's evidence; because he had confessed many Treasons, and was not pardoned. But the Chief Justice Jeffreys replied, That he knew no legal objection against him, and that he was a good witness in my Lord Russel's tryal. What he gave an account of, was only of a general insurrection intended in England; without any thing particular to Col. Sydney, or his indictment. And he declared, that, 'as to him in particular, he ' knew nothing, and did never speak with him till ' since the discovery of the plot. . . . Mr Keeling declared, ' he did not know Col. Sydney (50).'

[T] The Lord Howard of Escrick, . . . whose deposition was very rhetorical, but nothing to the purpose.] Col. Sydney made the following objections against him, and his testimony. 'I have this to say concerning my Lord ' Howard: He hath accused himself of divers treasons, ' and I do not hear that he has his pardon of any: ' He is under the terror of those treasons, and the ' punishment for them: He hath shewn himself to be ' under that terror: He hath said, That he could not ' get his pardon, until he had done some other jobbs, ' till he was past this drudgery of swearing: That is, ' that he having incurred the penalty of High-Treason, ' he would get his own indemnity by destroying others. ' This, by the law of God and man, I think, destroys ' a man's testimony. Besides, he is my Debter, he ' owes me a considerable sum of money I lent him in ' time of his great necessity; he made some covenants ' with me for the payment of that money, which he ' hath broken; and when his mortgage was forfeited, ' and I should take the advantage the law gives me, he ' finds out a way to have me laid up in the Tower. . . . ' Another thing is, when I was a prisoner, he comes ' to my house, and speaks with my servant, and says, ' how sorry he was that I should be brought in danger ' upon this account of the Plot, and there he did in the ' presence of God, with hands and eyes lifted up to ' heaven, swear, he did not believe any plot, and that ' it was but a sham.—[The Earl of Anglesey, the ' Lords of Clare, and Paget, Mr Philip and Mr Edward ' Howard, and Dr Burnet, being produced in Col. Sydney's behalf, unanimously testified, that they heard the Lord Howard declare the same things.]—Col. Sydney depreciated moreover the Lord Howard's character, by alledging, that he endeavoured slyly to get possession of his plate and other goods. . . . 'He was ' desirous to go further (says the Colonel) and he would ' not only pay my debt by his Testimony against me; ' but he would have got my plate and other goods in ' my hands into his hands, and he desired my men, ' as a place of trust, to put them into his hands (51).'

[V] Col. Sydney's Discourses on Government were produced, as a seditious and traitorous libel.] There were only a few extracts of them read (52), though Mr Sydney desired that it might be All read. They were seized, with the rest of his papers, at his house, upon a Table where it was supposed he usually did write. And they were proved to be his hand-writing by several persons with

(49) Apology, p. 6, 7. See also his Petition.

(50) Tryal of Algernon Sidney Esq; printed in 1684. fol. p. 13, 14, 15, 17. and his last Speech. They are both in the State-Tryals.

(51) Tryal, p. 31 & 42.

(52) See Tryal, p. 23.

(17) Apology, p. 2.

(2) Ibid. p. 3, 4.

(43) Secret Hist. as above, p. 69.

(44) Dubois and Papillon, in 1682.

(45) Apology, p. 3.

(46) Discourses of Government.

(47) His Apology, p. 4, 5. and Petition to the King.

(48) Sir Charles Gerard, Mr Burnet, and Mr Hawtry.

‘lawful, may, that they have a right to set aside their Prince, in case it appear to them, ‘that he hath broken the trust laid upon him by the people (cc).’ However, upon this imperfect evidence, the Colonel was brought in guilty of high-treason; and, on the 26th of November, condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered (dd) [W]. Two days before sentence, he sent, by the Lord Halifax (ee), a Petition to his Majesty, wherein he represented the hardship of his Case; and prayed that his Majesty would be pleased to admit him into his presence; and if he did not shew, that it was for his Majesty’s Honour and Interest to preserve him from the said oppression, he would not complain, though he were left to be destroyed (ff). But the King was pleased to refer him to the same Judges of whom he complained (gg). And all the favour he could obtain, was, to have the most ignominious part of his sentence changed into beheading. His Execution was respited for some days [X], the tryal being universally cryed out on, as a piece of most enormous injustice (hh). At length he was beheaded upon Tower-hill, on the 7th of December; at which time he delivered a Paper to the Sheriffs [Y], that was printed about a fortnight after (ii). The next day after his execution, he was buried at Penshurst in Kent, among

(cc) Tryal, as above, p. 12.

(dd) Ibid. p. 62, 67.

(ff) This Petition was printed at the time, upon a half-sheet; and is also inserted in his Apology.

(ii) Ibid.

(ee) Burnet’s History of his own Time, edit. 1753. Svo. Vol. II. p. 238.

(gg) Apology, p. 19.

(hh) Burnet, as above, p. 238.

with whom he had dealings. But Mr Sidney pleaded in his own defence, That ‘Similitude of hands can be ‘no evidence;—that it is nothing. For we know that ‘hands will be counterfeited, so that no man shall know ‘his own hand. . . . But these very papers, such as ‘they are, (added he) do abhor, as much as any one ‘can, such a design [as the plot he was accused of]. ‘Look upon them; you see they are all old ink. These ‘papers may be writ perhaps these twenty years, the ‘ink is so old. But it is a polemical discourse; it seems ‘to be an answer to Filmer, &c.—I say first, it is not ‘proved upon me: and secondly, it is not a crime if ‘it be proved.’ Afterwards he proves, that he never published any part of it; and that no man could say he ever printed a sheet in his life. But, to use his own words, he was ‘not heard.’ And therefore had nothing left but to ‘appeal to God and the world.’ He insisted all along, that, at most, it could amount but to constructive treason. But Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys affirmed, that it was plain treason within 25 Edw. III. Whereupon the Colonel asked, whether writing was an act? ‘Yes, said Jeffreys, it is agere (53).’ . . . It appears from the very beginning and whole drift of the book, that it was intended as an Answer to Sir Robert Filmer’s Patriarcha; and not writ with a design to raise an insurrection at that time. The beginning of it is in these words: ‘Having lately seen a book, intituled ‘Patriarcha, written by Sir Robert Filmer, concerning ‘the universal and undistinguished right of all Kings, ‘I thought a time of leisure might be well employed ‘in examining his doctrine, and the questions arising ‘from it; which seem so far to concern all mankind, ‘that, besides the influence upon our future life, they ‘may be said to comprehend all that in this world ‘deserves to be cared for.’ . . . But, from names mentioned in it, it is undeniable, that some parts of it, at least, had not been written twenty years. As for instance . . . ‘Old Audley, Dog Smith, Bishop Duppa, ‘Brownloe, Child, Dashwood, Fox, &c. are to be ‘esteemed fathers of the people of England (54).’ And this other passage, where he names ‘Hide, Ar- ‘lington, Danby, their graces of Cleveland and Portf- ‘mouth, Sunderland, Jenkins, and Chiffinch;’ immediately after mentioning the ‘bawds, whores, thieves, ‘buffoons, parasites, and such vile wretches as are ‘naturally mercenary, that had too much power at ‘Whitehall (55).’—However this was the first indictment of high-treason, upon which any man lost his life for writing any thing, without publishing it; and it is hoped will be the last.—Sir John Hawles rightly observes, That the evidence in this case, and almost all the circumstances of the Tryal, were originals: and that Col. Sydney was talked to death under the notion of a Commonwealth’s-man (56).

(53) Tryal, p. 66.

(54) Edit. 1751. p. 52.

(55) Ibid. p. 205.

(56) Remarks on Col. Sydney’s, and other Tryals. Lond. 1689. fol. p. 76. &c.

[W] Condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered] At the hearing of this severe sentence, Col. Sydney broke out into these words . . . ‘Then, o God, o God, ‘I beseech thee to sanctify these sufferings unto me, ‘and impute not my blood to the country, nor the city, ‘through which I am to be drawn; let no inquisition ‘be made for it: but if any, and the shedding of blood ‘that is innocent, must be revenged, let the weight of ‘it fall only upon those that maliciously persecute me ‘for righteousness sake.’ Whereupon Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys said to him; ‘I pray God work in you a temper ‘fit to go unto the other world, for I see you are not fit ‘for this.’ But the Colonel, holding out his hand, ‘replied, ‘My Lord, feel my pulse, and see if I am

‘disordered; I bless God, I never was in better temper ‘than I am now (57).’ . . . He tells us in his Apology, That ‘the Chief Justice, having performed this exploit, ‘is said to have bragged unto the King, that noe man ‘in his place had ever rendered unto any King of Eng- ‘land such services as he had done, in making it to ‘passe for lawe, that any man might be now tryed by ‘a jury not consisting of freeholders; and that one ‘witness, with any concurrent circumstance (as that ‘of the buying the knife) was sufficient to convict ‘him (58).’

[X] His execution was respited for some days.] Bishop Burnet, in his inaccurate way, says (59), that it ‘was ‘respited for three weeks.’ But, if we reckon from the time of his conviction, it was but sixteen days; and, ‘from his sentence, only eleven days.’

[Y] At which time he delivered a Paper to the Sheriffs.] It began thus: ‘Men, Brethren, and Fathers; Friends, ‘Countrymen, and Strangers.’—And, after setting forth the Hardship of his Case, and the Insufficiency of the Evidence against him, concluded in these words . . . ‘But I was long since told that I must die, or the ‘Plot must dye. Least the means of destroying the ‘best Protestants in England should fail, the Bench ‘must be filled with such as had been blemishes to the ‘bar. None but such as these would have advised with ‘the King’s Council, of the means of bringing a man ‘to death; suffered a Jury to be packed by the King’s ‘Solicitors, and the Under-Sheriff; admit of Jury-men ‘who are not freeholders; receive such evidence as is ‘above-mentioned; refuse a copy of an indictment, ‘or to suffer the statute of 46 Edw. III. to be read, ‘that doth expressly enact, It should in no case be denied ‘unto any man upon any occasion whatsoever; over- ‘rule the most important points of law without hearing. ‘And whereas the Stat. 25 Ed. III. upon which they ‘said I should be tried, doth reserve unto the Parlia- ‘ment all constructions to be made in points of treason, ‘They could assume unto themselves not only a power ‘to make constructions, but such constructions as nei- ‘ther agree with law, reason, or common sense. By ‘these means I am brought to this place. The Lord ‘forgive these practices, and avert the evils that threaten ‘the Nation from them. The Lord sanctifie these my ‘sufferings unto me; and, though I fall as a sacrifice ‘unto Idols, suffer not Idolatry to be established in this ‘land. Bless thy people, and save them. Defend ‘thy own cause, and defend those that defend it. Stir ‘up such as are faint; direct those that are willing; ‘confirm those that waver; give wisdom and integrity ‘unto all. Order all things so as may most redound ‘unto thine own glory. Grant that I may dye glorify- ‘ing thee for all thy mercies, and that at the last thou ‘hast permitted me to be singled out as a witness of thy ‘truth; and even by the confession of my opposers, ‘for that Old Cause in which I was from my youth ‘engaged, and for which thou hast often and wonder- ‘fully declared thyself.’ . . . The Colonel suspecting the Sheriffs might suppress it, gave a copy of it to a friend. It was a fortnight before it was printed: but when it was understood that written copies of it went about, it was at length printed (60). Several Animadversions were made upon it, particularly one, intituled, ‘Reflections upon Col. Sidney’s Arcadia; the Old Cause, ‘being some Observations upon his last Paper, given ‘to the Sheriffs at his execution.’ Lond. 1684. in four sheets fol.

(57) See the end of his Tryal, p. 67. and his Apology.

(58) p. last but one.

(59) As above, p. 238.

(60) Burnet as above, p. 2:

his noble ancestors (kk). His attainder was reversed at the Revolution [Z]. Such was the end of the famous Col. Sydney; who met death with an unconcernedness that became Him, who had set up Marcus Brutus for his pattern (li). He appears indeed to have been a person of a rough and inflexible temper; and quite an enthusiast for a Commonwealth. He had studied Politics to the bottom, and was thoroughly skilled in the nature of Government. But he shews too great a rancour against certain Persons in the Administration, who were not of his sentiments; and seems even, upon that account, not to have wished well to his Country, as all good men ought to do, in whatever hands it is (mm). But, to judge by his writings, he would not have been sorry to have seen it brought to the greatest difficulties, nay to destruction, that he might have had the pleasure of beholding his enemies involved in its ruins. He was naturally passionate (nn): and a man of low spirits, and weak body (oo). The character given of him by Bishop Burnet, is set down below [AA]. He says himself (pp), that he 'believed he had burned more papers of his own writing, than a horse could carry.' Nothing of his is extant but his 'Discourses concerning Government [BB]; and some Letters to Henry Savile Esq; [CC].' But there remain at Penshurst, in his own hand-writing, Treatises in Latin and Italian; as also an Essay on virtuous Love in English (qq).

(kk) Memoirs of Algernon Sydney Esq; as above, p. 45.

(mm) Polichrum est bene facere republice, etiam bene dicere haud a' furdum est. Sallust. B. II. Catilin. sub init.

(pp) Tryal, p. 44, 45.

(qq) Memoirs &c. as above, by Ar. Collins Esq; p. 161.

[Z] His attainder was reversed at the Revolution.] It was one of the first Acts of the Parliament, which met after the Revolution; being passed Feb. 13, 1688-9. The preamble of that Act runs thus: "Whereas Algernoon Sydney Esq; in the term of St Michael, in the 35th year of the reign of our late Sovereign Lord, King Charles the Second, in the Court of King's-Bench at Westminster, by means of an unlawful return of Jurors, and by denial of his lawful Challenges to divers of them for want of freehold, and without sufficient legal evidence of any Treasons committed by him; there being at that time produced a Paper, found in the closet of the said Algernoon, supposed to be his hand-writing, which was not proved by the testimony of any one witness to be written by him; but the Jury was directed to believe it, by comparing it with other writings of the said Algernoon: And, besides that Paper so produced, there was but one single Witness to prove any matter against the said Algernoon; and by a partial and unjust construction of the Statute, declaring what was his treason, was most unjustly and wrongfully convicted, and attainted, and afterwards executed for high-treason." . . . Therefore it is enacted, that the Records and Proceedings, relating to his conviction, judgment, and attainder, should be cancelled.

[AA] The character given of him by Bishop Burnet, &c.] It is in these words: He was 'a man of most extraordinary courage, a steady man even to obstinacy, sincere, but of a rough and boisterous temper that could not bear contradiction. He seemed to be a Christian, but in a particular form of his own: He thought it was to be like a divine Philosophy in the mind: But he was against all publick worship, and every thing that looked like a Church.'—[Upon this the author of Memoirs of Algernon Sidney Esq; cited above, makes the following note: 'This the reader will understand with some allowance. That our Author was an enemy to all the civil establishments of Christianity, is very certain; but it does not follow from thence, that he was against all public worship (61).']—Whereby we are to understand, He was in the same sentiments upon that point as the late Dr Matthew Tindal; who frequently declared, That even his very notions, if any one should endeavour to establish by Authority, he would for that very reason oppose them to the utmost of his power. His maxim being, That there must be no civil establishment of Religion, but every one is to be left to do what is right in his own eyes.]—But, to proceed with Bishop Burnet's character of Col. Sydney. 'He was stiff to all republican principles; and such an enemy to every thing that looked like a monarchy, that he set himself in a high opposition against Cromwell, when he was made Protector. He had studied the history of government in all its branches beyond any man I ever knew. He had a particular way of insinuating himself into people that would hearken to his notions, and not contradict him (62).'

(62) History, as above, p. 192, 193.

[BB] His Discourses concerning Government.] They were first published in 1678. fol. reprinted in 1704. and a third very beautiful edition of them came out in 1751. To which edition are added, 'Memoirs of his Life, and an Apology for himself, both now first published, and the latter from his original manuscript. With an alphabetical Index of the principal matters.' They are very much admired; and the Earl of Orrery gives the following great character of them: 'Harvington (63) has his admirers, he may possibly have his merits, but they shew not in his style. A later writer, of the same republican principles, has far excelled him; I mean Algernon Sydney, whose discourses concerning government are admirably written, and contain great historical knowledge, and a remarkable propriety of diction; so that his name, in my opinion, ought to be much higher established in the temple of literature, than I have hitherto found it placed (64).' There are some chasms in them, and are very probably those sheets which were taken to be produced at his tryal.

(63) Author of Oceana.

(64) Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr Swift; edit. 1752. 8vo. p. 218.

[CC] And some Letters to Henry Savile Esq;] The title of them is, 'Letters of the Honourable Algernon Sydney, to the Honourable Henry Savile Ambassador in France. In the year 1679 &c. Now first printed from the Originals in Mr Sydney's own hand.' Lond. 1742. 8vo They relate chiefly to the Proceedings of Parliament and the Popish Plot.—Several of his Letters, often cited in this article, are inserted in the Letters and Memorials of State of the Sidney family, published by Arthur Collins Esq; C

SYNGE [EDWARD], the late most excellent Archbishop of Tuam in Ireland, was in a particular manner of an episcopal family [A], being the son of a Bishop [B], the nephew of [A] Was in a particular manner of an episcopal family.] The original name of the family was Millington (1), but changed afterwards into Syngé, or Singe, on account of a sweetness of Voice, and skill in vocal Musick, which some of the Millingtons were possessed of; and the same talent, as we are informed, continues in that family to this day (2).

[B] Being the son of a Bishop.] His father was Edward Syngé, born at Bridgnorth in Shropshire, and from thence removed into Ireland by his eldest brother George Syngé, afterwards bishop of Cloyne; (of whom an account is given in the next note;) under whose care he spent his younger days at the school of Droghedah: and, growing up, was sent to the university of Dublin, where he became exemplary for a diligent application to his studies. He had early some ecclesiastical preferments in the cathedral of St Patrick's, Dublin. Afterwards he became vicar of Inishonane in the county of Cork (3), and was promoted to the Deanery of Elphin. During the usurpation, he constantly used the Common-Prayer in all the public offices of his ministry; being secured from prosecution by his interest with Dr Gorge, the then Auditor-general. After the Restoration, he was advanced to the bishoprick of Limerick, and consecrated January 27, 1660. On the 21st of December, 1663, he was translated to the united bishopricks of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross. He died December 22, 1678. He was a learned and zealous Preacher, very much admired and approved of by all that heard him; and, besides an easy, familiar, correct style to recommend his Sermons, he had one peculiar excellence in his manner of speaking or delivery; that every one of his

(3) Mr Harris is mistaken, when he says, that he had some preferments in the county of Downegall. Vol. I. p. 569. Memoirs communicated to us.

(77) Burnet, 38 above, p. 239.

(mm) Burnet, 88 above, p. 217.

(nn) At least, it is what I should hold him at his tryal, p. 34.

(61) p. 28.

(1) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 167.

(2) Sir James Ware's Works, as published by W. Harris Esq; Vol. I. p. 570.

of another [C], and the father of two Bishops [D]. He was the second and youngest son of Edward, Bishop of Cork &c. and was born April 5, 1659, at Inishonane, a village within ten miles of Cork (a). His father was then Vicar of the parish, and lived there in the time of the Usurpation, using constantly the Common-Prayer, notwithstanding the severe prohibition to the contrary. The father living at Cork from the time he was promoted to that See, the son was educated in the Diocese-school there. From thence he was admitted a Commoner in Christ-Church, Oxford; where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts. Soon after that, he went to Cork to visit his father; on whose death, which happened about that time, instead of returning to Oxford, he chose to finish his studies in the university of Dublin. There he was admitted ad eundem, and at the usual time took the degree of Master of Arts. In what years he was ordained Deacon and Priest, we cannot learn. His first preferment was two small parishes in the diocese of Meath, Laracor and Augher, both together of about the yearly value of 100 l. Some time after, he exchanged these for the Vicarage of Christ-Church in the city of Cork, of about the same value, but one of the heaviest Cures in Ireland. This he served for above twenty years: the greatest part of them without an assistant; his scanty income not allowing him to pay one. During these years he preached Himself twice every Sunday, catechised, and discharged all the other duties of his function. Some benefices of no note, consistent with his great Cure, were at different times given him by the Bishops of Cork and Cloyne, which at last increased his income to about 400 l. a year. In this situation, an offer was made him by the Government, in the year 1699, of the Deanery of Derry. But though this was a Dignity, and double in value to all he had, he declined it. His motive was filial piety: He would not separate himself from an aged Mother, who could not, or would not remove with him. Continuing at Cork, he was chosen Proctor for the Chapter, in the Convocation called in 1702-3. Soon after, the late Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, gave him the Crown's title to the Deanery of St Patrick's in Dublin. This title the Chapter disputed, claiming a right of election in themselves; and, to assert this right, they chose Dr John Stearne, then Chancellor of the Cathedral, who died Bishop of Clogher, their Dean. The title of the Crown being then thought defective, as since on a full discussion it has been found, Dr King, Archbishop of Dublin, proposed an Accommodation, which took place with a full consent of the Government, and the approbation of the Crown-lawyers. By this, Dr Stearne continued Dean, and the Archbishop gave the Chancellorship to Mr Syngé. This brought him to Dublin, without any addition of income, or ease from labour. For, the Chancellor of St Patrick's, as such, has the care of the Parish of St Werburg, one of the most noted in Dublin. This great Cure he served for eight years, preaching almost constantly to a crowded audience. In this time he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity. A new Convocation being summoned in 1713, he was chosen Proctor for the Chapter of St Patrick's. On Dr Stearne's promotion to the see of Dromore, Dr King, Archbishop of Dublin, appointed him his Vicar-general: And he continued so, till he was made Bishop of Raphoe in 1714 [E]. His distinguished zeal for the late Revolution, and the Hanover succession, which had effectually obstructed his preferment in the latter years of Queen Anne's reign, were the cause of his immediate advancement, as soon as that succession happily took place. In 1716 he was made Archbishop of Tuam [F]; presently after a Privy-Counsellor; and in the years 1716, 1717, 1718, congregation thought the discourse particularly addressed to himself, and that the preacher was privately instructing him in his duty, and persuading him to the practice of it (4).

(a) This article is chiefly composed from Memoirs communicated by the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward Syngé, Lord Bishop of Elphin.

(4) J. Ware, and W. Harris, as above, Vol. I. p. 569, 570.

[C] And nephew of another. Namely, of George Syngé, Bishop of Cloyne in the last century. This Dr George Syngé was elder brother of Edward mentioned in the last note, and born at Bridgnorth in Shropshire, in the year 1594; being descended from an ancient and good family. In 1609, he was admitted a Commoner in Balliol-college in Oxford, where he diligently applied himself to his studies for eight years, and in 1616 commenced Master of Arts. Thence passing into Ireland, he was, on the merit of his many eminent virtues, received with singular humanity by Christopher Hampton, Archbishop of Armagh; who appointed him his Chaplain, constituted him Vicar-general of his diocese, and caused him to be promoted to the deanery of Dromore. On the 11th of November, 1638, he was consecrated Bishop of Cloyne. Upon the breaking out of the Irish rebellion in 1641, he was forced to fly to Dublin, and remain some time there for his own safety. In February, 1644, his Majesty appointed him one of his Privy-Council for Ireland; and, on the vacancy of the Archbishoprick of Tuam in 1646, nominated him to that See; of which the national troubles hindered his having any enjoyment. The year following he returned to his native town of Bridgnorth, where he died in 1653, and was buried in the church of St Mary Magdalen in that town. He was a prelate of singular gravity and great learning, especially in polemic Divinity, and in the knowledge of the civil and canon law. He was tall of stature, of a graceful presence, and polite conversation; charitable to the poor, beneficent to all, and in a constant exercise of hospitality and generosity second to none (5).

[D] And the father of two Bishops] Namely of Edward, (the present Lord Bishop of Elphin) educated in Trinity-college, Dublin, of which he was fellow; consecrated by his own father, [assisted by the Bishops of Elphin, Killala, and Achonry] Bishop of Clonsfert and Kilmacduah, June 7, 1730; translated to Cloyne, March 21, 1731; thence to Leighlin and Ferns, February 8, 1733 (6); and again to Elphin in May, 1740—The other son of our worthy Prelate, who is a Bishop, is Nicolas Bishop of Killaloe.

[E] Till he was made Bishop of Raphoe in 1714. He was promoted to that See, by letters patent, dated the 2d of November, 1714, and was consecrated in the church of Dunboyn, in the diocese of Meath, the 7th of the same month. He laid out, in improvements on the castle, or episcopal house of Raphoe, 280 l. of which he made proof to the satisfaction of Primate Lindsay, and had an allowance of it, and was paid two thirds of that sum by his successor, pursuant to the statute of 10 William III. c. 6. (7)

[F] In 1716 he was made Archbishop of Tuam. He was translated to that See, by letters patent dated the 8th of June, 1716. And, very soon after, voluntarily and generously gave up the quarter-archiepiscopal parts, which his predecessors had enjoyed for a long time. These were originally that portion of Oblations, which, before the Institution of Parishes, was reserved to the Bishop for his maintenance; the other three parts being employed for the support of the inferior Clergy, the repairing the fabricks of Churches, and the Sustainance

(5) Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 167. J. Ware, and W. Harris, as above, Vol. I. p. 578, 579.

(6) Ware, and Harris, Vol. I. p. 646, 582, 452.

(7) Walter Harris's improved edition of Sir James Ware's works, Vol. I. Dublin, 1739. fol. p. 283.

1718, 1721, appointed one of the Keepers of the Great Seal in the absence of the Lord High Chancellor (b). This learned Prelate, in the course of his Ministry, composed and published several very excellent Treatises for the promotion of Religion, Piety, and Virtue; of which an account is given below [G]. He died at Tuam, July 24, 1741, with of the poor. After the institution of parishes, the Tythes were distributed for a time in the same way. But when Bishopricks came to be endowed with lands and other firm possessions, then the Bishops, to encourage a quick foundation of Churches, and to establish a better provision for the residing Clergy, did tacitly recede from their Quarter part.—This portion the Archbishop of Tuam, and his suffragan Bishops, were originally intitled to, as well as the rest, in their respective Bishopricks, to make up a sufficient revenue for the support of the dignity of their places. At the Reformation, the Conaught clergy became more poorly provided for than in any other part of the kingdom; which was partly occasioned by lay-impropriations, partly for want of a settled form of tything, and partly by the Quarter-Episcopals, which gave the Bishops a fourth part of the Tythes of most of the parishes in their dioceses; and that, with the Impropiator's right to two parts, left the Clergy but a fourth, a poor and miserable maintenance. The Bishops of that province were not much better provided for; and without the Quarter-Episcopals would have been in as mean a condition as the rest of the Clergy. The Archbishopric of Tuam, for instance, was reduced to 160l. per annum.—In 1636, the then Archbishop of Tuam, jointly with the Bishops of Elphin, Clonsfert, and Killala, petitioned K. Charles I. to grant them such lands as they could by good proof, or strong probability, shew to have belonged to their Sees; or which they had an equitable right to; and that were withheld from them by unjust pretences: to the end they might be enabled to maintain themselves with their own lands, without the episcopal Quarter part of Tythes, any great addition of charge to the King, or the plurality of commendams. This petition, through the hearty concurrence of the Lord Deputy Wentworth, met with a favourable reception. But the ensuing rebellion, in 1641, hindered the final and happy settlement of that affair.—Good Archbishop Synge, at the meeting of the next parliament after his consecration, took care to have an act passed, in 1717, for divesting his See for ever of the said Quarter-episcopal part, and for settling the same on such Rectors, Vicars, or Curates, as do personally discharge the respective cures within the dioceses of Tuam and Enaghdone. He also procured a clause in that act, to enable him to demise a share of the demesne lands of the Archbishoprick, in the same manner as he by law could demise other lands, not demesne, belonging thereto, at the rent of three fourths of the full yearly value (8).

(b) From the same Memoirs. See also The Works of Sir James Ware, with continuation by W. Harris Esq; Vol. II. p. 115, 116.

[G] Composed and published several very excellent treatises. The following is an exact list of them. 1. A peaceable and friendly Address to the Nonconformists, written upon their desiring an Act of Toleration without the Sacramental Test. Dublin, 1697. 4to. 2. A Defence of the peaceable and friendly Address to the Nonconformists, against the Answer lately given to it. Dublin, 1698. 4to. 3. Plain Instructions for the Young and Ignorant, comprized in a short and easy Exposition of the Church-Catechism, adapted to the Understanding and Memory of those of the meanest capacity. Lond. 8vo. 4. Some short and plain directions for spending one Day well, by which (if every day carefully observed) a Man may be much enabled, through God's grace, to spend his whole Life well. Lond. 8vo. 5. An Answer to all the Excuses and Pretences, which Men ordinarily make for their not coming to the holy Communion. To which is added, A brief Account of the End and Design of the holy Communion, the Obligation to receive it, the Way to prepare for it, and the Behaviour of ourselves both at and after it. With Prayers and Meditations suitable to the occasion. Fitted for the meanest capacities, and very proper to be given away by such as are charitably inclined. Lond. 8vo. 6. An Essay towards making the Knowledge of Religion easy to the meanest Capacity. Being a short and plain Account of the Doctrines and Rules of Christianity. Lond. 8vo. 7. A Gentleman's Religion: in three Parts. The 1st contains the Principles of Natural Religion. The 2d and 3d the Doctrines of Christianity, both as to Faith and Practice. With an Appendix, wherein it is proved, That nothing contrary to our Reason can possibly be the Object of our Belief: But that it is no just Exception against some of the Doctrines of Christianity, that they are above our Reason. The first Part was published by itself; and the second and third Parts were added in the second edition. Lond. 1705. 12mo. 8. A Defence of the established Church and Laws, in answer to a book, intitled, 'A Vindication of Marriage, as solemnized by Presbyterians in the North of Ireland.' Dublin. 1705. 12mo. 9. A brief Enquiry into the Original and Power of Ecclesiastical Synods. Lond. 1705. 8vo. Written at the instance of Dr Wake, then engaged in the controversy with Dr Atterbury upon that subject. Lond. 1705. 8vo. 10. The Wisdom of being Religious. A Sermon preached at the Castle-chapel in Dublin, Feb. 20, 1703-4. 8vo. 11. Some Rules for the Conduct of Human Life, shewing the way of living; 1. Wisely. 2. Harmoniously. 3. Peaceably and Quietly. 4. In business. 5. In much business. 6. In the intervals of business. 7. In Travel. 8vo. 12. A true Churchman fet in a just and clear Light: Or An Essay towards the right Character of a faithful Son of the Established Church. To which is added the learned Mr Chillingworth's Demonstration of the Apostolick Institution of Episcopacy. Lond. 1709. 13. The divine Authority of Church-government and Episcopacy stated and asserted upon Principles common to all Christians; in a Sermon preached in the College-chapel, at the consecration of Peter Brown, late Provost of the said College, and Bishop of Cork and Ross, on Sunday April 2d, 1710. Dublin, 1710. 12mo. 14. A Sermon preached at St Andrew's church, Dublin, before the House of Commons, October 23d, 1711. Dublin, 1711. 4to. 15. Dr Synge's Defence of himself against the unjust Aspersions thrown on him, in a late pamphlet, intitled, "A Reply to a Vindication of a Letter published in a pamphlet, called Partiality detested." Dublin, 1711. 4to. Which was answered the same year by William Percival, Archdeacon of Cashel. 16. The value of a good Name; the Way and Duty of getting and preserving it; together with the Sin of depriving another of it, in a Sermon preached in the Parish Church of St. Werburgh's, Dublin, Nov. 1, 1713. 8vo. 17. Eternal Salvation the only End and Design of Religion. A Sermon. 1714. 12mo. 18. The Rule of Self-Examination, or the only way of banishing Doubts and Scruples, and directing the Conscience in the satisfactory Practice of all Christian Duties. 1715. 19. A plain and easy Method, whereby a Man of a moderate Capacity may arrive at full Satisfaction in all Things that concern his Everlasting Salvation: To which is added, A Paraphrase on St Athanasius's Creed. 1715. 20. Unanimity in the present time of Danger, recommended in a Sermon preached before the Lords Justices of Ireland, in Christ-Church, Dublin, on Sunday Feb. 5, 1715. Dublin, 1716. 8vo. 21. The Happiness of a Nation and People. In a Sermon preached at Christ-Church, Dublin, before the Government and House of Lords, May 29, 1716. Dublin, 1716. 8vo. 22. A modest Enquiry into the Danger of the Church. Dublin, 1716. 23. An Abstract of the Church Catechism, briefly containing the Substance of all that is necessary to Salvation. Dublin, 1717. 24. A Convert's Vindication, in a Letter to his Friend of the Church of Rome. Dublin, 1718. 25. A Sincere Convert distinguished from an Hypocrite.—And a Sincere Convert's Vindication of himself. 26. The Reward of converting Sinners from the Errors of their Ways. A Sermon preached in the Parish Church of St Bridget, Dublin, Feb. 8th, 1718, at the Annual Meeting of the Children educated in the Charity-Schools in Dublin. Dublin, 1719. 4to. 27. Universal Benevolence. A Sermon. Dublin, 1721. 12mo. 28. A Sermon against Persecution on account of Religion, preached before the Duke of Grafton, Lord Lieutenant, and the House of Lords, in Christ-Church, Dublin, on Monday, October 23d, 1721. Dublin, 1721. 12mo. 29. An Account of the Laws now in force in Ireland for encouraging the Residence of the Parochial Clergy, and erecting of English Schools; with the good use that may be made of them. With an Appendix, shewing how the Fund of First-fruits settled in Trustees by Queen Anne has been applied. Dublin, 1723. 8vo. 30. De Religionis Christianae Fundamentalibus. 31. A brief Discourse of the Fundamentals of Christianity; and with the character of a gentleman of true piety, an excellent scholar, and a great divine; and lies buried in the church-yard of that cathedral.

(8) Harris, as above, Vol. I. p. 619—621.

and the Use that is to be made of them. With an Appendix, in which, from the Principles laid down or suggested in the Discourse, an Answer is given to three important Questions; the determination whereof would much conduce to the restoring Communion between different Churches. 32. The Case of the Poor of Ireland stated and considered upon the common Principles of Christianity. 33. Short and plain Directions for all that go to Service. 34. Free-Thinking in Matters of Religion stated and recommended. Lond. 1727. 8vo. 35. Religion tried by the Test of sober and impartial Reason. 1713. 36. The Sin of Schism most unjustly and groundlessly charged by the Non-Jurors upon the present established Church of England. 37. Catholick Christianity; or an Essay towards lessening the Number of Controversies among Christians. 38. A Charitable Address to all who are of the Communion of the Church of Rome. Dublin, 1728. 8vo. This was answered by Dr Cornelius Nary. 39. An Answer to two Objections made against the foregoing Tract. Dublin, 1729. 8vo. 40. A Defence of the Charitable Address to the Roman Catholicks, in reply to Dr Nary's Answer. Dublin, 1729. 8vo. To which Dr Nary writ a Rejoinder. 41. Observations on Dr Nary's Rejoinder. 42. The Abstruse Philosophy of Transubstantiation considered. 43. The Authority of the Church in Matters of Religion. Dublin, 1733. 44. A short Dissertation upon eating Blood. Dublin, 1733. 45. The Root and Spring of true Virtue and Piety. A Sermon preached at Tuam. Dublin, 1733. 12mo. 46. The Way to Eternal Salvation plainly pointed out. A Sermon. Dublin, 1734. 47. A Help to the devout Performance of private Prayer. Dublin, 1735. 48. A Persuasive to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, in a Letter to a sober Gentleman of the Church of Rome. Dublin, 1736. 49. The true Nature of an Oath; a Letter to a sober Quaker, occasioned by the Act of Parliament, whereby it is enacted, That the solemn Affirmation of the Quakers shall be of like force with an Oath taken in the common Form of Law. Dublin, 1736. 50. Honesty the best Policy: An Essay concerning the true Way of rendering a Nation happy, and its Government firm and lasting.

Dublin, 1738. 51. An Essay on Foolish Questions: Another on contending for the Faith. Being the Substance of two Visitation-Sermons on Matt. xiii. 25. Dublin, 1738. 52. St Paul's Description of his own Religion opened and explained. 1721. 53. Sober Thoughts for the Cure of Melancholy, especially that which is Religious. Dublin, 1738. 54. Advice to a young Divine concerning Preaching. Dublin, 1738. 55. Two Tracts; the one, Directions to a sober Christian, for the acceptable offering up the Lord's Prayer in his private Devotions; the other, Sober Thoughts on the Doctrine of Predestination. 56. A brief and plain Abridgment of the Christian Religion. 57. A Discourse of Confirmation, in a Dialogue between the Minister of a Parish and a young Servant-maid, containing proper Instructions for such persons as are to be confirmed: Humbly offered to the consideration of all Parents, and others who have the Care of educating Youth. Dublin, 1739. 58. The Necessity and true Nature of Repentance. A Sermon. Dublin, 1740. 59. A Sincere Christian and Convert from the Church of Rome, exemplified in the Case of Daniel Herley, a poor Irish Peasant.

Our learned Author wrote likewise, in 1713, 1714, 1715, some Letters, in answer to Dr Peter Brown, Bishop of Cork, his once famous Books about Drinking to the Memory of the Dead, or against Healths in general.

He also published Two Letters concerning the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords of Ireland. They were writ at the time when it was questioned, and before a British Act of Parliament took it away. They were very well liked (9).

These several Treatises are written in a polite, sensible, easy, and rational manner: and have been so well received by the Public, that many of them have passed through several Editions. The 21st Edition, for instance, of the "Answer to all the Excuses which Men make for not coming to the Communion," was published in 1752, as was also the 13th of his "Essay towards making the Knowledge of Religion easy," in 1754. And some of the other pieces are come to a seventh and eighth Edition. C

(9) This List is taken from the Memoirs, as above communicated to us: and from Mr Harris's edition of Sir James Ware's works, Vol. III p. 297. &c.

T.

ALBOT [CHARLES], Duke of Shrewsbury, well deserves a place in these memoirs, as a patriot Statesman. He was born on St. James's Eve, 1660, and, in respect to his family [A], King Charles II. stood his God-father, being the first to whom that monarch did this honour after his Restoration (a). He lost his father when he was seven years of age (b), and being brought to enquire into the popish religion (in which he had been bred) by the discovery of the popish plot in 1679, he applied to Dr Tillotson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, who having soon reconciled him to the Church of England, he attended the

(a) Life of Charles, Duke of Shrewsbury, p. 4.

Doctor for the first time at the public worship in Lincoln's-Inn Chapel, on Sunday the 4th of May that year (c). However, this change of his religion had not, it seems, a suitable influence upon the moral part of his conduct. His Lordship, among other excellent endowments, was particularly distinguished by a very handsome person, which procuring him an easy access to the Ladies (d), he indulged himself in some excesses with the sex. This reaching the ears of his Converter, Doctor Tillotson, gave occasion to the most elegant and polite letter, that was ever penned by that eloquent Divine [B]. As it was his loyalty that apparently

(c) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 56. Edit. 1753.

[A] In respect to his family.] This family (1) is said to have been in England before the Conquest, but the first mentioned in our records, is Richard Talbot, who is declared to have great possessions in the time of the Conquest (2). From him, after several descents, sprung Gilbert Talbot, who flourished in the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I, and having married Guenthlian, daughter of Rhese ap Griffith, Prince of Wales, his descendants relinquished their paternal arms, a bend of ten peeces argent and gules, and bore a lion rampant, or, in a field gules, within a bordure engrailed of the first, which were the arms of the said Rhese and his ancestors, Princes of Wales (3). Gilbert's great grandson, Richard, was summoned to Parliament by the title of Lord Talbot, July 5, ann. 1330. Edward III, whose grandson of the same name had issue Gilbert, his son and heir, who dying without male issue, his younger brother became heir to Gilbert's only daughter. This younger brother was the famous Sir John Talbot, who makes such a figure in our history for his heroic achievements, especially in France, under Henry V. (4), and was Earl of Shrewsbury, May 20, 1442, in the 20th year of the reign of Henry VI, and in the 24th of that King, ann. 1446, was Earl of Wexford, and created by Patent Earl of Waterford in Ireland. From this great Earl was descended lineally Edward the eighth Earl of Shrewsbury, who dying Jan. 14, ann. 1616, without male issue, the titles came to the heirs of Sir Gilbert Talbot of Grafton, second son to John the second Earl of Shrewsbury, of this house. This Sir Gilbert Talbot being twice married, was immediately succeeded by the eldest son of the first marriage, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Knight, of Grafton, who dying without issue male, his younger brother by their father's second marriage became Sir John Talbot of Grafton, Knight, who being twice married, was succeeded by his eldest son of the first marriage (5), Sir John Talbot of Grafton, whose grandson, George Talbot, by the death of Edward the eighth Earl of Shrewsbury, without issue male, in the 15th year of the reign of James I, became the ninth Earl of Shrewsbury, to whose son, John the tenth Earl, succeeded his son and heir, Francis the eleventh Earl, Father to the Subject of the present article, who was the twelfth Earl, and both first and last Duke of Shrewsbury.

[B] Doctor Tillotson wrote a letter to him.] It was in these terms.

' My Lord,
' It was a great satisfaction to me to be any ways
' instrumental in the gaining your Lordship to our reli' gion, which I am really persuaded to be the truth.
' But I am, and always was, more concerned, that your ' Lordship should continue a virtuous and good man,
' than become a Protestant; being assured that the ig' norance and errors of men's understanding will find a
' much easier forgiveness with God, than the faults of
' the will. I remember that your Lordship once told ' me, that you would endeavour to justify the sincerity
' of your change by a conscientious regard to all other ' parts and actions of your life. I am sure you cannot
' more effectually condemn your own act, than by be' coming a worse man after your profession to have em' braced a better religion. I will certainly be one of ' the last to believe any thing of your Lordship that is ' not good; but I always feared I should be one of ' the first, that should hear it. The time I last waited ' upon your Lordship, I had heard something that af' flicted me very sensibly, but I hoped it was not true, and
' was therefore loth to trouble your Lordship about it.
' But having heard the same from those, who, I believe,
' bear no ill will to your Lordship, I now think it my ' duty to acquaint you with it. To speak plainly, I ' have been told, that your Lordship is of late fallen
' into a conversation, dangerous both to your reputa' tion and virtue, two of the tenderest and dearest ' things in the world. I believe your Lordship to ' have a great command and conduct of yourself; but ' I am very sensible of human frailty, and of the dan' gerous temptations to which youth is exposed in this ' dissolute age. Therefore I earnestly beseech your ' Lordship to consider, besides the high provocation of ' Almighty God, and the hazard of your soul, when' ever you engage in a bad course, what a blemish
' you will bring upon a fair and unspotted reputation;
' what uneasiness and trouble you will create to your' self from the severe reflections of a guilty conscience;
' and how great a violence you will offer to your good
' principles, your nature, and your education, and to
' a mind the best made for virtuous and worthy things.
' And do not imagine you can stop when you please.
' Experience shews us the contrary, and that nothing is ' more vain, than for men to think they can set bounds
' to themselves in any thing that is bad. I hope in ' God no temptation has yet prevailed on your Lord' ship

(1) He died March 16, 1667, a wound received in a duel with George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham. See that Duke's article.

(2) Memoirs of the Noble Family of Talbot, &c. 9. Edit. 1737. vo.

(3) The pedigree of this family being drawn out at length in the Peerage of England, Vol. II. Edit. 1756. we shall only mention a few of the principal heads of it.

(4) Lillie's Pedigree of the Nobility. MS. p. 7. penes Johan. Com. de Egmont.

(5) Register of the Order of the Garter by Anstis, Vol. I. p. 217.

(6) It has been observed of this noble Earl, that he was victorious in forty several battles and dangerous skirmishes. MS. in Bibl. John Anstis Armig.

(7) The present Earl Talbot is descended from the second marriage. See Lord Chancellor Talbot's article.

apparently first prompted a dislike to the religion of his Ancestors, so this principle being embellished (to speak in the courtly phrase of these times) with a turn to gallantry, a sweet temper, and fine address, rendered him very acceptable to the gay Court of Charles. And at the coronation of King James, he was pitched upon to bear the curtana, or pointless sword (e). In this reign, he had also the command of a regiment of horse; but when that unfortunate prince broke into the constitution, by assuming an arbitrary and dispensing power, the Earl resigned his regiment, and went to the Prince of Orange, having first borrowed 12000*l.* to support him, part of which was from Father Peters (f). Bishop Burnet of Shrewsbury was one of the nobles chiefly trusted by his Highness, and on whose advice he governed all his motions, and drew his declaration (g). On the Prince's landing in the West, the Earl was sent by him to take possession of Bristol, and he was principally concerned in promoting the association to revenge any attempt that should be made upon his Highness's person. He was afterwards appointed, with the Earls of Oxford and Clarendon, to treat with the Lords sent by King James, to know what the Prince demanded, and was primarily consulted in all affairs of the Revolution. During the debates about settling the nation, some methods being proposed, which gave the Prince great uneasiness, the Earl of Shrewsbury was one of the three Lords to whom he chose to explain himself distinctly. When the Prince and Princess were declared King and Queen of England, the Earl was sworn of the Privy Council, and made sole Principal Secretary of State (b): he was also one of the Commissioners appointed to hear and determine the claims exhibited, to be performed at the Coronation, in which he bore one of the three swords, April 11, 1689: and on the 18th he was constituted Lord Lieutenant of Worcestershire, and was also Lord Lieutenant of Herefordshire (i). But the Court afterwards taking some measures he did not approve, he resigned the Secretary's place (k) in December, 1690, and was succeeded by the Lord Viscount Sidney (l), but was sworn into the other department of that office on the 4th of March, 1693, in the room of the Earl of Nottingham. On the 25th of April following, 1694, he was elected Knight of the Garter (m), and on the 30th of that month advanced to the dignities of Marquis of Alton and Duke of Shrewsbury (n). May 11, he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Anglesey, as he was also of Flintshire and Denbysire on the 31st of that month. On the 5th of November, 1695, King William did him the honour to dine with him at his seat at Heythrop in Oxfordshire (o), and the same year, as also in 1697, he was one of the Lords Justices of England during his Majesty's absence abroad [C]. In May 1699, he resigned the seals of Secretary of State (p), on account of his ill state of health, occasioned by an unlucky fall from his horse in a fox-chace, when the creature happened to give him a blow upon the breast in rising, which brought on him such a spitting of blood, and shortness of breath, as made him incapable of going through the business of his post. However, on the 25th of October following, he was appointed Lord Chamberlain of the Household (q), as a place of easier management; but the discharge of blood increasing, he was advised by his physicians to go to a warmer climate, as the only means of effecting his recovery (r). Hereupon he resolved to resign his staff and key as Chamberlain, and prepared to go abroad. This happening at the juncture when his friends, the Earl of Orford, the Lord Somers and Halifax, were harassed by the Parliament (s), gave a handle to such as would not believe his illness, to report him for a deserter, who was leaving the Kingdom out of cowardice (t) [D].

(e) Between the Earls of Derby and Pembroke. Account of that Coronation.

(g) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, p. 712. Vol. I. Folio Edition.

(b) The Earl of Nottingham was prevailed on in a few days after to accept the other department in this office on that occasion.

(k) Memoirs of the Noble Family of Talbot, as before.

(n) He was installed at Windsor for the 5th of June following. Peerage by Collins, as before.

(p) He was succeeded by the Earl of Jersey on the 14th of that month. Salmon, under this year.

(q) Gazette, No. 3543.

(s) See Gen. Hist. of England.

(t) His Life, as before.

(f) His Life, page 5; the writer of which says, that a boat for the purpose was provided privately by Mr Ruffel, then one of the Grooms of the Bedchamber to King James, and afterwards Earl of Oxford.

(i) Gen. Hist. of England.

(l) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year.

(m) Id. under the year 1693.

(o) Id. ibid. However, it is certain that he had lately made this purchase; the house in all its branches was not intirely finished. MS. penes me.

(r) Particularly Sir Thomas Millington spoke to King Will am to advise him to go to Montpellier. His Life.

ship so far, as to be guilty of any loose act. If it has, as you love your soul, let it not proceed to an habit. The retreat is yet easy and open, but will every day become more difficult and obstructed. God is so merciful, that upon your repentance, and resolution of amendment, he is not only ready to forgive what is past, but to assist us by his Grace to do better for the future. But I need not enforce these considerations upon a mind so capable of, and easy to receive, good counsel. I shall only desire your Lordship to think again and again, how great a point of wisdom it is in all our actions to consult the peace of our minds, and to have no quarrel with the constant and inseparable companion of our lives. If others displease us, we may quit their company; but he that is displeas'd with himself, is unavoidably unhappy, because he has no way to get rid of himself.

My Lord, for God's sake and your own, think of being happy, and resolve by all means to save yourself from this untoward generation. Determine rather upon a speedy change of your condition, than to gratify the inclinations of your youth in any thing but what is lawful and honourable; and let me have the satisfaction to be assured from your Lordship, either that there has been no ground for this report, or that there shall be none for the future; which will be the welcomest news to me in the world. I have only to beg of your Lordship to believe, that I have not done this to satisfy the formality of my profession; but that it proceeds from the truest affection and good-will, that one man can possibly bear to another. I pray God every day for your Lordship, with the same constancy and fervour, as for myself, and do most earnestly beg, that this counsel may be acceptable and effectual. I am &c.

[C] He was one of the Lords Justices in 1697.] It is said, that the year before, Lord Peterborough promised Sir John Fenwick his life, if he would accuse the Duke of Shrewsbury and the Lord Orford of having a design to bring in King James, and that the first mentioned Lord wrote a book, with the assistance of Dr D'Avenant, and put one Smith's name to it (6), against the Duke, which lost Lord Peterborough, with all honest men, the House of Commons, voting the first a scandalous design to make a difference between the King and his best friends (7), and the House of Peers ordering the second to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

[D] Leaving the kingdom out of cowardice.] The Writer of his life tells us, that he retired to his friend, Mr Mackey's house, at Dover, for two or three days, till the yacht could be got ready, that was to transport him. And that he there received the King's surprizing order from a Secretary of State, to take Paris in his way to Montpellier, and to visit the French King. Accordingly he went to that Monarch at Versailles, who received him coolly, and entertained him with nothing but bagatelles [trifles]; that in coming from the King, he met the Count de Lauzun, who, after the usual civilities, asked him if he would not see the Chevalier St George: to which the Earl answered, that if he was to see him, he should chuse rather to see him there than in England. The same Writer assures us, that he even never visited the Earl of Middleton, who was married to his mother's sister, and with whom he had been for many years in the most intimate and affectionate friendship (*).

(6) It was entitled, Memoirs of Secret Service, by Matthew Smith of the Inner Temple, Esq.

(7) The House ordered the Passage-office to be searched, to see if a pass had slipped his office at the assignation, but all proved clear. Mackey's Characters, p. 65.

(*) His Life, p. 12. where this Writer says, that when it was afterwards told him, that the Earl of Jersey had employed people to know if he had seen the Earl of Middleton, he answered, that he hoped he [Jersey] was so well served, as to know he did not.

He had scarce got to Montpellier, when the King of Spain dying, his Grace concluded we should be drawn into a new war, and therefore hastening out of France, he retired to Geneva, where he passed his time very agreeably for a year; but the fogs from the lake bringing a return of his disorder, obliged him to cross the Alps to Italy. Naples was the place he had designed for his residence; but King Philip having got possession of that kingdom, his Grace went to Rome, took a very handsome palace near the Capitol, and lived there above three years (u). On Queen Anne's accession to the throne, having resigned the Chamberlain's place (w), he received letters both from the Duke of Marlborough and Earl Godolphin, offering him the place of Master of the Horse to her Majesty; and entreating him to come and share in the administration with them (x): but his health would not permit him to think of a return to England; and public business at that time. His enemies there, who had before represented his distemper as a meer state trick, now gave out that he was a Roman Catholic again, and the English Papists, joining in the cry, said, his journey to Rome was to reconcile himself to their Church. But this was so far from being a true state of the case, that the more he saw of Popery abroad, the more he was confirmed in the Protestant Religion and interest [E]; inasmuch, that by exposing the follies of the former, he converted the Earl of Cardigan and his brother from it, even at Rome (y). He conversed indeed indifferently with all sorts of people, especially the Literati, and improved his knowledge in painting and architecture, to which last he applied assiduously; and made a very good collection of the first (z). His evenings he generally passed at the Princess Carpigni's, where he first saw his Dutchess; she was the widow of a Count belonging to the late Queen of Sweden, and daughter to the Marquis Paliotti of Bologna in Italy (aa). As she had a great many engaging qualities, and he of a generous, as well as amorous temper, there grew a strict friendship between them, which at length concluded in a marriage [F]; but was not celebrated till he got into a Protestant country, and she had made an abjuration of the Romish Faith, at Augsburgh in Germany, to which place she followed him, after he had made the tour of Lombardy, Venice, Padua, and Verona. The ceremony being completed, they left Augsburgh, and passing, in their way to England, through Cologne to Francfort (bb), his Grace communicated his marriage in a letter from thence to the Duke of Marlborough [G], then in Flanders. This great general arriving, November the 1st, at Francfort, in order to proceed to Vienna, was entertained, with his retinue, at dinner by the Duke of Shrewsbury, who, on the 22d of that month, arrived at the Hague, and landed in England with the Duke of Marlborough, December 30, 1705. On his arrival, meeting with a cool reception from his old friends, the Whigs, he retired first into Worcestershire and Shropshire, and from thence to his purchase at Heythrop, near Woodstock, in Oxfordshire (cc). During this retirement, the other party left no stone unturned to get so considerable a man on their side, knowing the great regard the Queen had for him, and the reputation he had with the people. And representing to him the ingratitude of a party to whom he had been so useful, he was at last prevailed upon to come to Court, and April 15, 1710, was made again Lord Chamberlain of the Household by Queen Anne, and sworn again of her Privy Council. Also May 10, 1712, his Grace was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum of Shropshire. Afterwards he entered into all the measures of the ministry for obtaining a peace (dd); and to give the finishing stroke to it, he accepted of going Ambassador extraordinary to the French court, in order to complete it, on the 23d of November (ee). However, as he was neither to be flattered nor cajoled, and insisting on several beneficial articles of commerce, which the French would have declined, he soon found a coldness in that court towards him, and thereupon solicited his return, which however he did not presently obtain. When he came to England, he had hardly time to settle his private affairs before he was sent out of the way (as the Writer of his Life relates) Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in September the same year. The uncommon reception he met with at Dublin, where the Recorder complimented him with the great share he had in the Revolution, and the Peers and Clergy complimented him on the great share he had in making the peace, was the genuine effect of party infatuation. However, no man in his post could behave with more care for the Protestant Interest, and the liberties of that country [H], tempering, as much as possible, the (u) His Life, as before.

(w) He was succeeded in it by the Earl of Jersey. Salmon, under the year 1702.

(y) The Duke's mother, Anna Maria, was daughter to Robert Earl of Cardigan. Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 50.

(aa) Her name was Adelhida. She was descended by her mother from Sir Robert Dudley, the supposed son of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, the great favourite of Queen Elizabeth; of which Sir Robert, see an account in the article of Sir Henry Wotton.

(cc) His Life.

(dd) He was the first to treat with Mesnager, whom Prior brought back with him to London. Id.

(9) Ibid. This gentleman, however, followed his sister afterwards to England, where he was executed for the murder of one of his servants. See Matthew Tindal's article.

(10) His Life.

[E] The more he was confirmed in the Protestant Religion and interest. He often said, that all Englishmen ought to travel, to value the more their so happy constitution; for that the more we saw of the soppery of the Romish Religion, and the oppression in despotic governments, the more we should support that easy and happy government in Church and State we are under at home. He abhorred the processions made to the Madonnas, and the worshipping of our Saviour in the shape of a wafer erected on a throne as an earthly King. He was so strict, that he would never enter into their Churches to see any curiosities during the time of any service whatsoever, to avoid any indecency from himself, or scandal to others (8).

[F] Concluded in a marriage. The story which passed current in England, that his Grace was bullied into this marriage by two of the Lady's brothers in Italy, is said to be intirely false and groundless. Since he was gone from her above six months before the marriage; and the Marquis Paliotti, her brother, who was said to be the person that bullied him, he never saw till six weeks after his marriage; when he came to meet them at Cologne, in their way to England from the Palatine court at Dusseldorp, to which Paliotti then belonged (9).

[G] He communicated his marriage to the Duke of Marlborough. His Grace, it is said, discovered, by the stile of this letter, that the Duke of Shrewsbury had done a thing, for which he wanted to make an apology; and his friends in England believed he was ashamed of it, since the notice they had of it, was by his letter to Mr De la Faye, one of the Clerks of the Secretary's Office, who took care of his letters (10).

[H] He maintained the Protestant Interest, and the liberty of that country. Though he was now under the influence of a Tory-Administration, yet the Writer of his Life observes that did not bias him to either party, of which he gives the following instances. He could have had Sir Richard Leving (set up by the Tories) chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, instead of Mr Broderick, set up by the Whigs; but he would, neither (x) His Life, as before.

(z) Many of these adorned his elegant house at Heythrop, near Woodstock.

(bb) During his stay here, he received a letter from Sir Rowland Gynn, inviting him to take the court of Hanover in his way, which he declined. His Life, page 15.

(cc) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year, who also observes, that he arrived at Calais, in his way to that court, on the 27th of Dec. following, but did not take the character of Ambassador before the conclusion of the peace, any more than the Duke d'Aumont did in England. Not making his public entry at Paris till June 11, 1713. The peace had been proclaimed, May the 9th preceding.

(8) His life, ubi pra.

(ff) His Life, ubi supra, p. 54.

(gg) His Dutches was also made one of the Ladies of the Bedchamber to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline. Peerage of England.

(bb) Many of these are mistaken in the Atalantis.

(ii) Memoirs of the Noble Family of Talbot, p. 7.

(kk) His Life.

(kk) Peerage, Vol. II. p. 58.

rage and animosities of both parties. The consequence of which was, as might be expected, that the Whigs feared to trust him, and the Tories suspected him: so that when he returned to England, they had the insolence to print a Satire, and cry it about the streets, before he was on ship-board, intituled Polyphemus, or Ireland's Eye, alluding to his single eye (ff). His coming over was occasioned by the great variance between Oxford and Bollingbroke, and the illness of the Queen, who in the last extremity, took the staff from Oxford, and delivered it, two days after, on her death-bed, to the Duke of Shrewsbury. So that at the Queen's death, he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord High-Treasurer of Great Britain, and Lord Chamberlain, three great places never before in the hands of one person at the same time. His Grace signed the Proclamation for proclaiming King George I, and was one of the Lords appointed by his Majesty to govern the nation till his arrival. After which, on September 26, 1714, he was made Groom of the Stole and Privy Purse (gg); and, on the appointing of a new Privy Council, he was sworn into it. He was also constituted Lord Lieutenant of Worcestershire; and on the 17th of October, declared Lord Chamberlain of the household to his Majesty, in whose favour he stood very well to the last. But his disorder turning into an obstinate asthma, he grew to be frequently out of order, and resigned the Chamberlain's key some months before his death, the immediate cause whereof was a fever, which coming upon his asthma, carried him off on the 1st of February, 1717-18, at his seat at Isleworth, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. On the Monday before he died, he sent for all his servants into his room, and telling them, that let his Physicians say what they would, he was sure he must die soon, desired, if death should carry him off suddenly, they would do that justice to his memory, to declare, as he did, that he died in the communion of the Church of England, of which he had been above thirty years an unworthy member. On Tuesday he received the Sacrament, from the hands of William Talbot, Bishop of Salisbury, his relation, and Dr Chark, his parish Minister. He preserved his judgment, and senses, to the last minute. Even on the day he died, he bid the Dutches and his Physician go to dinner, and come and chat with him when they had done; but before dinner was over, he expired.

As to his Lordship's character, the Writer of his Life assures us, that he was one of the finest gentlemen of the age he lived in, very handsome in his person, of an admirable address, and the charmingest way of speaking; he was the kindest master to his servants, and the justest to his creditors, that ever was known. He was a nobleman of great gallantry, when young, among the Ladies (bb). He might have had many great matches in his own country, and some he liked well enough in that view, if he had not found the Ladies facile. He was always a Courtier as long as he was persuaded the Court acted for the interest of his Country; but whenever a step was taken there, which he thought against that interest, he went out of the great offices with as much ease as he shifted his cloaths. This resolution to join implicitly with no party, brought him under a misfortune which generally attends a true Patriot Spirit, not to be thought steady to any. But though his conduct did not always escape such misrepresentations as are the ordinary effect of mistake or malice, yet, in general, he had the good opinion of all; so that King William used to say, that the Duke of Shrewsbury was the only man of whom the Whigs and Tories both spoke well (ii).

Although his heir at law differed from him in Religion, and was a distant relation; yet for the honour of the family, he left the whole Estate to go together, which from four thousand pounds a year, and in debt, he brought to eight thousand, out of debt (kk). By his will, it was not to be alienated from the honour; and an Act of Parliament has been since obtained for that purpose [I]. On his decease, the titles of Duke and Marquis being only granted to him and his heirs male, became extinct; but the Earldom of Shrewsbury devolved on Gilbert Talbot, the eldest surviving son of Thomas Talbot of Longford, only son of John the tenth Earl of Shrewsbury. But this Gilbert being in Holy Orders, in the Romish Church, died without issue in 1743, whereby the honours descended to his brother George, whose son of the same name, born December 11, 1719, is the present Earl of Shrewsbury, who, November 21, 1753, married Elizabeth, daughter of the honourable John Dormer of Peterly, in the county of Bucks, Esq; (ll).

neither by bribery nor influence, break in upon that liberty, which ought to be sacred in a Parliament's choice of their Speaker. In the same spirit, when General Stewart, at his Levee one morning, speaking of an election with joy that the Tories had carried, made use of the word we, the Duke took him up short, and 'bid him not speak in the plural number, for he came not there to be of any party, but to administer justice impartially to all; to serve his Queen, and to protect the subjects in their liberty.' Moreover, when the election for the city of Dublin came on, and the Tories, as a mark of distinction, wore laurels in their hats, he ordered the yeomen of the guards to deny entrance to every body without distinction, that should come to court with that, or any other badge of dissention. And when the Papists, who were very numerous at Dublin, joined with the Tories to mob the Whigs, he tacitly permitted the guards to disperse them.

[I] The estate was not to be alienated from the honour.] However, he left a handsome provision for his Dutches, bequeathing to her, 1200 l. a year (11), and his house and furniture in Warwick-Street, with 2000 ounces of his plate, for life. His house at Isleworth, finely furnished, he left to his heir, as also his elegant seat at Heythrop: and appointed George Earl of Cardigan, Dr William Talbot, then Bishop of Sarum (12), Sir John Stanley, and Mr Ardern, his Steward, trustees, to see his will executed, with an allowance of 100 l. a year each for their trouble: he also left some other small legacies among his servants.

(11) Which was what his mother had for her jointure.

(12) Afterwards Bishop of Durham, and grandfather to the present Earl Talbot.

TALBOT [CHARLES], Lord High-Chancellor of Great Britain, was descended from a branch of the same family with the preceding Nobleman [A], whose Patriot Spirit he imbibed, with the advantage of a steadier application and greater abilities. He was born in 1684, and after a suitable foundation of Classical Learning at School, was removed to Oxford, and admitted a Gentleman Commoner of Oriel-College in Michaelmas term (a), 1701. He proceeded Bachelor of Arts in 1704 (b), at three years standing, a privilege allowed to him as the son of a bishop [B]; and the third of November, the same year, he was elected a Fellow of All-Souls College in that University (c). But he voided this preferment in a few years (d), by entering into a marriage with Cecil, daughter and heir of Charles Matthews, of Castle-Munich in the County of Glamorgan, Esq; [C]. From his first admis-

(a) From the books of the College.

(c) Register of Admission of the Fellows of All-Souls, who have placed a Bust of him in their new elegant Library among other eminent persons, who have been Ornaments of the College.

(15) Collins's Peerage, ubi supra.

(16) MS. petrae me ipsam.

(17) See article of Sir Leoline Jenkins, remark [A], who was related to this Judge.

(18) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. I.

(19) He accepted this Post purely in respect to the King, who gave him the Patent without paying any fees for it. The salary was only 80 l. per ann. when paid, and it cost him twice as much every year he served, out of his own estate, at the rate of an ordinary and frugal expence. Dedication of his Works to the Society of Grey's Inn, and the other Societies of the Law.

(20) In the last mentioned Dedication he expresses himself thus. I have resolved to tender myself a sacrifice to them [the Laws] as cheerfully, and I hope, by God's assistance, as constantly, as old Eleazer did for the holy Laws of his Nation.

(*) Mr Wood is mistaken in this, if we may believe the Judge himself, who tells us that he was detained a prisoner for fifteen years together. Preface to his Reports.

(†) He tells us himself, that in the times of the Attorneyships of Master Noye and Lord Banks, they were pleased often to make use of him. Dedication to his Works.

[A] Descended from a branch of the same family with the preceding Nobleman.] Having already observed (1), that the Chancellor was sprung from John Talbot of Grafton, by a second marriage, it is our business now to deduce the descent therefrom; in which we shall, for the reason before assigned (2), be very concise, as follows. The issue of this second match, was John Talbot of Salwarp in Worcestershire, whose son, Sherington Talbot of Salwarp and Lacock in Wiltshire, had by a second marriage four sons, of whom the third son, William, was Grandfather to the Chancellor (3).

[B] The son of a Bishop.] His Grandfather marrying Mary, the daughter of Thomas Doughty of Whittington in Worcestershire, Esq; had issue, besides two daughters (4), an only son, William, who was born at Stourton-Castle in Staffordshire, a feat of his Father, a little before the Restoration of King Charles II, and was admitted a Gentleman Commoner of Oriel-College, in the beginning of the year 1674, at the age of fifteen; and the year following spoke a good speech in the Encenia (5). He took the degree of A. B. Octob. 16, 1677 (6), and proceeded to A. M. June 23, 1680 (7), after which he took Holy Orders, obtained a Benefice, and married the daughter of Mr Crispe, an eminent Attorney at Chipping-Norton in Oxfordshire. After the Revolution, by the interest of his Kinman, Charles Talbot, then Earl of Shrewsbury, he was promoted to the Deanery of Worcester, April 23, 1691, in the room of Dr Hicke, ejected for refusing to take the oaths to the new government. In June following, he was diplomated Doctor of Divinity by Archbishop Tillotson (8); and distinguishing himself in the pulpit, he was more than once called to preach before Queen Mary (9). Upon the demise of Dr Fell, he was advanced to the Bishopric of Oxford, to which he was consecrated September 24, 1693, with leave to hold his Deanery in Commendam (10). He held this See till 1715 (11), when he succeeded Dr Earnet in that of Salisbury (12), and upon the Death of Dr Crew, he was translated thence (13), on the 23d of September, 1722, to the Bishopric of Durham, of which County he was Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum. He continued in this See till his death, which happened on the 10th of October, 1730. After the decease of his first wife, without issue, he entered into a second marriage with Catharine, daughter of Alderman King of London, who brought him eight sons and several daughters. Of those who lived to maturity, besides Charles, the Eldest, the subject of the present article, were, 2. Edward, who was born in the city of Worcester, and bred at Oriel-College in Oxford, where, after taking his first degree in Arts, he was chosen Fellow, October 30, 1712. He proceeded A. M. October 14, 1714, and resigned his Fellowship, October 20, 1715, apparently on account of his marriage with Mary, daughter to the Reverend Mr Martin. He died, in 1720, Archdeacon of Berkshire, having issue an only daughter, Catharine. 3. Sherington Talbot, who being bred to the army, became Captain of an independent company of foot, afterwards Lieutenant Colonel, and thence Colonel of a regiment of foot, February 17, 1747. He married a daughter of — Midget, who died September 6, 1749, and has issue two sons, William and Charles, both living in 1756. 4. Henry, a Commissioner of the Salt duty, who married first a daughter of — Lloyd, by whom he has issue a daughter, Elizabeth; and marrying secondly Catharine, daughter of Sir Hugh Clopton of Stratford upon Avon in Warwickshire, hath by her, who died May 17, 1754, no issue. He is still living a Widower. The Bishop's daughters were Henrietta Maria, married to Dr Charles Trimuel, late Lord Bishop of Winchester; and Catharine, married to Exton Sayer, LL. D. who being bred to the Civil Law at Trinity-hall in Cambridge, became a Fellow of that College, and an Advocate in Doctors Commons (14), and after his marriage, was made Chancellor of Durham, Surveyor of his Majesty's Land Revenues, &c. and died Member of Parliament for Toinefs in 1731. His Lady survived him, and died in August 1734 (15). The Bishop was of a magnificent taste and temper, which often run him into difficulties, through expence, from which he was as often extricated by his most worthy son; the Chancellor (16).

[C] He married the heir of Charles Matthews.] She was, by her mother's side, great grand-daughter, and heiress of David Jenkins, Esq; of Hensol in the same County. This was the famous Judge Jenkins, who was descended of an ancient and honourable family (17), and being one of the Justices of South Wales, distinguished himself by his learning and eminency in his profession, and for his steady adherence to the cause of King Charles I. It being a part of his Character, that he could neither be flattered by promises, nor intimidated by threats (18). Such a character is of great use and service to the public, by raising a spirit of emulation. We shall therefore exhibit the principal articles; which constituted it, in the following succinct account of this very worthy Judge. He was born at Hensol, in the parish of Pendylwin, in Glamorganshire, became Commoner of St Edmund's-Hall, Oxon, in 1597; and after taking the degree of A. B. went to Grey's-Inn, studied the Common Law, and when Barrister, had good business in his profession. In the first of Charles I. being a Bencher, he was elected Summer Reader, but refused to read. Being afterwards made one of the Judges for South Wales (19), he continued in that office till the Rebellion broke out, at which time he either imprisoned divers persons in his Circuit, or condemned them to die, as being guilty of High Treason for bearing arms against the King. At length being taken Prisoner at Hereford, when that city was surprized by the Parliament forces, December 18, 1645, he was carried up to London, and sent to the Tower, whence being brought to the Bar in Chancery, he denied the authority of that Court, because their seal was counterfeited, and consequently the Commissioners thereof constituted against law: whereupon being committed to Newgate, he was impeached of Treason, and brought to the Bar of the House of Commons; but denying their authority, and refusing to kneel, he was fined for that contempt 1000 l. remitted to Newgate, and thence removed to Wallingford Castle. About that time he used his utmost endeavour to create a breach between the Parliament and the Army, but without effect. In 1650, an Act passed for his trial in the High Court of Justice, so that expecting to be hanged, he resolved to suffer with the Bible under one arm, and Magna Charta under the other (20). 'But, proceeds my Author, Harry Martin, as it is said, urging to his fellows, that sanguis martyrum est semen ecclesiarum, and that this way of proceeding would do them mischief, they thought good not to take away his life (*). He was afterwards sent to Windsor-Castle, where remaining till January, 1656, he was set at liberty, and then lived a while in Oxford, where he became a constant auditor of the Sermons of Dr Edward Hyde at Halywell, then lately ejected from his Rectory of Brightwell, near Wallingford. After the Restoration, he was designed to be made one of the Judges in Westminster-Hall; but refusing to comply with the usual demands of the perquisites on that occasion, which he thought too much after all his sufferings, he retired to his Estate in Glamorganshire, then restored to him. He died at Cowbridge, in that County, Dec. 6, 1667, aged eighty-one or more, and was buried at the west end of that Church. He died as he lived, preaching with his last breath to his Relations, and those that were about him, loyalty to his Majesty, and obedience to the Laws of the Land. He was a Person of great abilities in his profession, and was often consulted by Sir John Banks, and William Noye (†), in their Attorney-(Register of that University. In 1701, or following year. For he was born in 1684, and his name is not upon the College books for that year. In the preceding article, ask [A], (5). Ibid. note (1). O'Brien's Magazine, Vol. V. p. 176, under Lord Talbot's article. Idem, ibid. informs us at the eldest of his two daughters, Catharine, was first married to Walter Littleton of Chesham, and secondly to Lambert Black, late Bishop of Exeter; and Francis, the other daughter, was married to Samuel Jewkes of Woburn, in Wiltshire. Mr Wood says was not his own composition. Ath. Oxon. vol. II. ch. 965. Fasti Oxon. vol. II. col. 205. Ibid. col. 13. Athen. Oxon. 3 before. See twelve of his Sermons published in 1731, 2vo. In some of which he asserts the notion of Dr Samuel Clarke upon the Trinity. He was strongly attached to that Divine; and I heard him once sorely lament that he could not give the Doctor the best preferment he had in his disposal, by reason of his refusing to subscribe the articles. (10) Le Neve's Fasti Eccl. p. 229. (11) When he was succeeded in it by Dr (afterwards) Archbishop Potter. (12) Le Neve, p. 520. (13) His Successor at Salisbury was Dr Hoadly, which made way for Dr Chandler to succeed him in it. (14) From a MS. penes n. r.

(e) It is said, that this was done through the influence of Lord Chancellor Cowper, to whose advice it was owing that he undertook the study of the law, though extremum rediisse pudet was his own modest apology for not attempting it. The Honour of the Seals; or Memoirs of the Noble Family of Talbot; attempting to do justice to the life, character, and Deserts of the late Lord Chancellor. Edit. 1737.

(b) He took this office with a design of resigning it to his Brother Edward; but his Father, the Bishop, leaving that See before this brother was qualified for the place, the Chancellor held it till this time. From private information, he was succeeded in it by Dr Tho. Tenison. See Archbishop Tenison's article.

(21) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 328, 329, 330.

(22) This, when published, was referred to a Committee of Complaint, who ordered the Printer and Publisher to be tried at the King's-Bench. Wood, ubi supra.

(23) That is, Henry Parker, under whose article, in Athen. Oxon. see more of this tract.

(†) It is a half-length, holding in his left hand his Lex Terræ, which stands at the head of these Editions. The title of which is, Jenkinsus Redivivus: or, The Works of that grave, learned, truly loyal, and courageous Judge, David Jenkins.

tion in the University, he applied himself to the study of the Law, with a design to make it his profession. In which view, he was admitted a member of the Society of Lincoln's-Inn, and in a short time called to the Bar considerably before his course of reading was expired (e). He soon made a distinguished figure in his profession, and growing into the general esteem of the publick, he was chosen, in 1719, Member of Parliament for Tregony in Cornwall. On the death of Sir Clement, Knight, he was made Solicitor-General, April 23, 1726, and became likewise one of the Representatives in Parliament for the city of Durham [D], his Father being then Bishop of that See. On the 29th of November, 1733, his Majesty King George II. delivered to him the Great Seal, and he was thereupon sworn of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, and likewise constituted Lord High-Chancellor, and created a Baron of Great Britain, by the name, stile, and title of Lord Talbot, Baron of Henfol in the County of Glamorgan (f). Upon these promotions, he resigned the following year the Chancellor (g) of the Diocese of Oxford, which had been given him by his Father, when Bishop of that See (b); and in August, 1735, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was conferred upon him by that University (i). He was now grown to be the delight and honour of his Country, both in his judicial and ministerial capacity. But the glory and happiness Britain promised herself under the impartial Administration of this great and good man, was, like all other exquisite pleasures, of a very short duration; for, after an illness of five days continuance, he expired (k) on the 14th of February 1736-7, at his house in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in the fifty-third year of his age (*). When he became sensible that his dissolution approached, he prepared for it with the utmost calmness and serenity, setting his house in order, and becoming a true pattern of dying, as he had always done of living, like a Christian. His Corpse was conveyed to his Estate at Barrington in Gloucestershire, and interred in the chancel of that Church on the 23d of February, in a grave of free-stone cemented (l).

ships. He was also a vigorous maintainer of the rights of the Crown, a Heart of Oak, and a Pillar of the Law. Sole Author in Defence of his Sovereign's Rights, England's Laws, and the People's Liberties, when they were invaded and trampled under foot by restless base men (21). His Writings are these: 1. His Recantation (or rather Protestation) delivered at Westminster, April 10, 1647, to Miles Corbet, Chairman of the Committee for Examinations: a half-sheet. 2. Vindication while he was a Prisoner in the Tower (22); April 29, 1647: one sheet in 4to. 3. The Army's Indemnity, with a Declaration, shewing how every Subject of England ought to be tried for Treason; written June 10, 1647: in one sheet 4to. 4. Sundry Acts of Parliament, mentioned and cited in the Army's Indemnity, set forth in words at large; printed in 1647, 4to. 5. Apology for the Army, touching the eight Queries upon the late Declarations and Letters from the Army touching Sedition, falsely charged upon them. 6. Discourse touching the Inconveniencies of a long continued Parliament, and the Judgment of the Law of the Land in that Behalf: one sheet and a half. 7. His Declaration while Prisoner in the Tower; March 17, 1647: one side of a sheet. 8. A Scourge for the Directory and revolting Synod, which hath sitten these five Years, more for 4 s. a Day, than for Conscience Sake: one sheet. 9. A Cordial for the good People of London: in a Reply to a Thing, called An Answer to the Poisonous Seditious Paper of David Jenkins. By H. P. Barrister (23) of Lincoln's-Inn: three sheets. 10. His Plea delivered to the Earl of Manchester and the Speaker of the House of Commons, sitting in the Chancery at Westminster; February 14, 1647: one Sheet. 11. Answer to the Imputation put upon his Plea in Chancery; February 1647: one sheet. 12. Remonstrance to the Lords and Commons of the two Houses of Parliament; February 21, 1647: one sheet. 13. Lex terræ, The Law of the Land.—To which are added, some seeming Objections of Mr William Pryne, scattered in diverse books, answered, and the Truth thereof more fully cleared; all printed separately in 1647, 4to. And the whole thirteen were printed together at London, in 1648, in 12mo, and went by the name of Judge Jenkins's Works. They were also published in the same manner, in 1681; and again, 1683, in 12mo. To these Editions is prefixed, a Print of him (†), underneath which are these Verses, made by John Birkenhead:

Here Jenkins stands, who thundering from the Tower,
Shot the bold Senate's Legislative Power:
Six of whose words twelve Reams of Votes exceed,
As Mountains moved by grains of Mustard-seed.
Thus gasping Laws were rescued from the snare.
He that will save a Crown, must know and dare.

14. A Preparative to the Treaty [with the King] tendered to the Parliament, Assembly of Divines, and Treators, &c.

printed in 1648. 15. A Proposition for the safety of the King, &c. To which is annexed, 16. A Reply to the Pretended Answer to it. 17. Rerum Judiciarum Centuriæ Octo; Lond. 1661, fol. in English (‡). In the Preface he shews the use of this Collection to the Students of the Law; in which view, having recommended (24) Fitzherbert, Stamford, Lord Broke and Dyer, Croke and Plowden, he observes, that many things in them being grown obsolete, and gone into disuse, and many other points distracted by variety of opinions, it imports, the Student before these, and as soon as he has acquired the rudiments of the Law, diligently to read over the solemn judgments and resolutions of the Judges, to prevent being imposed on by false opinions. For this purpose, continues he, I have written observations upon Perkinson, St Germain, Breke, the old Tenures, Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, and the old Natura Brevium (25), these being the books generally read in the first place, after Littleton. I have also compiled a book of Reports in several divisions, after the example of Fitzherbert and Lord Broke, and have brought them down to our own times, and have made observations upon all the year-books, and upon the rules of Law. So that the Student, by their assistance, may safely steer through the straits of the Law, without any danger of striking upon the Rocks of Error. He then concludes in these terms, Amidst the sound of drums and trumpets, surrounded with an odious multitude of Barbarians, broke with old age, and confinement in prisons, where my fellow-subjects, grown wild with rage, detained me for fifteen years together, I bestowed many watchful hours upon this performance. To the Preface is annexed, several judgments of the Sages of the Law against innovations. Of these, the fourteenth runs thus: 10 Edward IV. 4. The Common Law has been from the beginning of the world, for it is Common Reason; which is here singled out from the rest, because this rule was remarkably always followed, and expressly avowed by the Lord Chancellor Talbot from the Bench, whenever any thing repugnant to it was offered from the Bar (§).

[D] Member for Durham.] At this time he was one of the Voters for the Excise Scheme, which made so great a noise, and created so much disturbance in the nation (26), the Populace being drawn even into insurrections on the occasion in various parts, by the arts and industry of the Anti-courtiers, whose whole aim and design therein appeared not long after to be nothing more than to displace the Minister, Sir Robert Walpole (27). This, no doubt, was discerned and detested, among many others, by the Solicitor General, who without being biased on one hand by their misrepresentations; or, on the other hand, by any undue regards to the obligations of his Post, or the hopes of future favours, followed the pure convictions of his own heart, after a thorough consideration of the matter, and voted strictly according to his conscience (28).

(f) His Pate bears date Dec 1733, in the venth year of the reign of George II. Page of Englan Vol. V. p. 31

(g) In August this year, 1733, he was chosen Governor of Charter-House

(i) From the University Regist of Degrees.

(k) The immediate cause of his death was said to be an inflammation of the lung; but upon opening his body, there was found a growing polyp in his heart.

(*) See a copy the inscription on his coffin, The Honour of the Seals, &c. p. 21.

(l) Idem, p. 2

(‡) Some other pieces came out under the Judge name, in the view of recommending them thereby to the public; but they were disowned by him.

(24) He also commends Hubbard and Coke, especially, says he, if some things were expunged in the latter, in which he seems to bridle the Sovereign, and give the reins to the people.

(25) As also upon the books written by Sir Henry Finch, lately the King's Serjeant at Law and the Law Lexicon and Vocabulary, and Dyer

(§) A second Edition of the Centuries came out in 1734. Soon after Lord Talbot was made Chancellor.

(26) The noise of which would still have tingle in our ears, had not the like been since practised by a subsequent Minister in greater favour with the people.

(27) Who, however, with equal art defeated their purpose, by dropping the bill.

(28) Honour of the Seals, &c. p. 13.

His Lordship was so much the darling of his Country, that his character has been attempted by several hands; among others, by the Author of the Craftsman (m), which being evidently extorted by the meer force of truth, it will not be amiss to give the substance of it. Having mentioned the importance of the Chancellor's Office, both in the judicial and political capacity, and shewn, that by the first the properties of all the people of England are, in a great measure, in his power; he then observes, that the Lord Chancellor, as Keeper of the Great Seal, is not only the second person in the Kingdom, next the Royal Family, but hath, or ought to have, a great influence at the Council Table upon all important deliberations, and no Grant, Patent, or Treaty, can be made without his sanction. In both these respects, he is called in law The Keeper of the King's Conscience; and no body ever discharged that high trust with more capacity and uprightness, than the late excellent Peer, whose death we now lament. His determinations, with regard to private property, met with almost universal approbation; and I don't remember that he ever put the seal to any Grant, Patent, or Treaty, which gave the least offence to the Nation. He rose by merit to the head of his profession, and not only supported himself in it with dignity, but adorned it, and acquired every day new praise and esteem. His prudence, moderation, and patience, in the execution of his office, even amidst the highest provocations, make one shining part of his character, and are hardly to be paralleled by any instances of those who have sat before him upon that bench. Yet, notwithstanding this amiable disposition of mind, he discovered such courage and resolution upon all occasions, as could not be shaken by the tricks of the wealthy, the applications of the powerful, or the tears of the distressed. His only aim was right and equity, which he constantly pursued, on whomsoever the weight of his decrees might happen to fall. He was a great enemy to the chicanery of his profession, and rendered the Court of Justice more easy, as well as less expensive, by preventing all unnecessary delays, especially when they appeared to be merely vexatious, and discountenancing the artifices of those who endeavoured to keep the evil day from themselves, at the expence of their injured Prosecutors. I could give some late notable instance of this, if particular circumstances were proper in a general character. In a word, he possessed all the great talents of his most renowned Predecessors, without any of their frailties, and hath left a noble example to all his Successors; so that he was not only a blessing to the age in which he lived, but may possibly derive the same happiness to his posterity, by exciting those, who follow him in that high office, to an emulation of his virtues. The great increase of business in the Court of Chancery since the seal was put into his hands, is an evident proof of that confidence, which the Suitors reposed in him, and will do immortal honour to his memory, though it proved fatal to his life; for the constant fatigue of his employment was one of the principal causes of his death (n), and therefore he may be truly said to have fallen a Martyr to the Public Good. But I must not forget to mention, that he had no mean, or selfish attachment to any Party, besides that of his Country, and seemed resolved to contribute all in his power towards restoring it to a flourishing condition. Under the influence of such a man, we had reason to hope for a complete coalition of Parties; or, at least, for a re-union of all such as wish well to their King and Country, which neither weak, nor wicked and corrupt men will ever have it in their power to accomplish (o). I shall leave the display of his private virtues to those who had the honour of his acquaintance [E], and will only observe, that no man ever left a more general good character as a Christian, a Father, a Master, and a Friend, than the late

(m) A periodic weekly Paper, well known, to be undertaken, and supported by, at least, an assumed Spirit of Patriotism, in opposition to the then Ministry.

(n) His constitution was delicate and tender, and though pliable, yet far from being robust.

(o) It was generally said, that had the Chancellor lived a little longer, he would have had the lead in the Ministry.

Lord

[E] I shall leave the display of his private virtues to others.] Accordingly this was attempted by a Person, who observes, that his Religion was his governing principle; it was well-grounded, and active; his piety was rational and manly. He was a sincere Son of the Church of England, and ready to maintain her in her just rights, and legal possessions. He was an enemy to persecution, and had a diffusive, general, and Christian Charity, which made him a friend to all mankind. He had a great regard for such of the most worthy of the clergy, as were distinguished for their Learning (*), Sincerity, Moderation, and Charity.

He was a careful and indulgent father, and as no man ever deserved more of his children, no man could be more affectionately beloved by them; there was something so peculiar in this respect, that none seemed to know how to be in such friendship with his sons, as my Lord Chancellor. The harmony which subsisted in his house, was a very great pleasure to all who beheld it; like the precious ointment, to which the Psalmist compares such a union, it did not only refresh and invigorate the superior parts, but ran down to the skirts of his clothing; it was visible among all his domestics; his servants were united in an affection to their Lord, and a friendship for one another; they were kept in their duty, not by any rash and rigorous commands, but by a certain regard to decency and order, that reigned throughout the family; every one was so easy in his situation, that he was insensible of his dependance, and treated as a humble friend. As to Lord Talbot's private Donations, proceeds the same Writer, we have been assured of the truth of the following particulars. There was found in his Lordship's scrutoire, in his own handwriting, a list of no less than one hundred and fifty persons, who were annual Pensioners of his unbounded Charity. And the poor of all the neighbouring villages surrounding his estate at Barrington were, by his Lordship's order, supplied with physick in sickness, and the indigent aged, who were past their labour, provided with necessaries of life. At the same time, the labour of the industrious husbandman always met with encouragement; and, in a word, from his bounteous hand the hungry were sure to be fed, and the naked to be clothed.

As no riches could exceed his desert, so no man ever possessed them, who knew the right use of them more. Every line written by Mr Pope was verified in Lord Talbot's conduct (29). He had, in all respects,

(29) Honour of the Seals, &c. p. 25, 26, 32, 33.

The sense to value riches, with the art
T' enjoy them, and the virtue to impart,
Not meanly, nor ambitiously pursued,
Not sunk by sloth, nor rais'd by servitude;
To balance fortune by a just expence,
Join with œconomy, magnificence,
With splendor, charity, with plenty, health;
O teach us, TALBOT, Thou'rt unspoil'd by wealth!
That secret, rare between th' extremes to move
Of mad good-nature, and of mean self-love,

Who

(*) Of this we have a remarkable instance in Mr Stackhouse, who having published Proposals for printing his Body of Divinity by subscription, was invited to dine with his Lordship, who, after subscribing largely himself, recommended it to several of the most eminent Counsel then at his table, who thereupon followed his Lordship's example: so that our Divine returned with about a hundred Guineas in his pocket. From the information of the Author himself.

Lord Chancellor. He died full of glory, but, to the great misfortune of his Country, not full of years; and the general sorrow which his death has occasioned, will do his noble family more honour, than the highest titles, or the most sumptuous monuments (p). By his Lady, who died in 1720, he had five sons; 1. Charles-Richard Talbot, who died unmarried, in 1733, aged twenty-four (q). 2. William, the present Earl Talbot, of whom hereafter. 3. John Talbot, who from Eton-School was admitted a Fellow-Commoner at Trinity-Hall in Cambridge (r). He removed here to Lincoln's-Inn, and applied himself to his Father's profession, was called to the Bar, and was made Recorder of Brecknock in Wales, for which Town he was chosen a Member in the Parliament summoned to meet June 13, 1734. On the 4th of April, 1740, he was made Second Justice of the Counties of Chester, Flint, Denbigh, and Montgomery, which promotion vacating his seat in Parliament, he was re-elected for the same Town, and was constantly chosen for that Borough, till the last Parliament of the late King George II, when he was elected for Ilchester in Somersetshire (s). He was also Steward to the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, and so continued to his death (t), which happened September 22, 1756 (u). He was twice married; first to a daughter of Sir Matthew Decker of Richmond in Surry, who dying without issue, he married, secondly, the eldest daughter of the Lord Viscount Chetwynd of Ingstre in Staffordshire, by whom he has left several children of each sex (w). The Chancellor's fourth son, Edward, died an infant (x). The fifth, George, being also bred at Eton-School, was there entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College in Oxford (y), where he proceeded regularly to the degree of A. M. as a Grand Com-pounder, June 10, 1737 (z), after his Father's death, who had given him the place of Clerk of the Custodies of Ideots and Lunatics (aa). But entering into the Church, he accepted the Living of Guyting in Gloucestershire (*), and July 9, 1659, on account of his exemplary character, was created LL. D. by his University at the installation of their present Chancellor, the Earl of Westmoreland (bb). On the 17th of January, 1760, he married a sister of the present Lord Folkstone (cc), and still continues only a private Clergyman, having declined the Bishopric of St David's, which was offered to him, on the death of Dr Ellis, January 17, 1761 (dd). We have a sermon of his in print, which was preached on the opening of the Infirmary at Gloucester.

The present Earl Talbot was bred at Eton, and thence entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College, under the tuition of Mr Upton, late Prebendary of Rochester (ee), and had the honorary degree of LL. D. conferred upon him in June, 1736 (ff). He was seated at Hensol in Glamorganshire in the life-time of his Father, and was representative for that County in the Parliament which first met on business, January 23, 1734-5 (gg). He was created an Earl by the title of Earl Talbot, March 21, 1761 (hh), and on the 24th of that month, was appointed Lord Steward of the Household to his Majesty, and sworn of the Privy-Council (ii). In February, 1733-4, he married Mary, daughter, and sole heir of Adam Cardonell, Esq; Secretary to John Duke of Marlborough, whom he attended in all his glorious Campaigns. By this Lady, who is still living, he has a daughter, Cecil, born in July, 1735, and married on the 6th of August, 1756, to George Rice, Esq; Member in the last, and present, Parliament for the County of Carmarthen in Wales (kk). The Earl had also a Son William, born November 5, 1739; but he died shortly after (ll).

Who is it copies Talbot's better part,
To ease th'oppress'd, and raise the sinking heart?
Where'er he shines, O Fortune gild the scene,
And Angels guard him in the golden mean.
At BARRINGTON shall English bounty stand,
And Hensol's honour never leave the land.
His glories in his progeny shall shine,
To propagate the virtue still divine (30).

There was likewise the following Elegy in Latin, printed on occasion of his much lamented death.

*Magnis saepe viros cecinit cum Musa, repente
Obstrepuit miseræ turba maligna lyraë.
Scilicet arguitur carmen, quia displicet heros,
Et mala, quæ jaçtat fama, Poeta luit
At Vos securi Talbotum dicite Vates!
In quo nil Livor, quod male rodant, habet.
Jure humana a se qui nulla aliena putavit (31),
Delicium humanæ gentis habendus erat.
Partium in hoc non est studio locus; omnibus idem,
Ut vixit charus, flebilis interiit.*

TANNER (THOMAS), late Bishop of St Asaph, a very learned Man, especially in the History and Antiquities of the British nation, was born January 25, 1673-4, at Market-Lavington in Wiltshire, being the eldest son of the Rev. Mr Thomas Tanner, Vicar of that parish (a). In November, 1689, he became a Student in Queen's College in Oxford [A]; and being admitted Clerk of the same House in 1690, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1693. Thence he removed to All-Souls College, in January 1694, of which he was then made Chaplain; and elected Fellow, November 2, 1696 (b). He had distinguished himself, ever since his coming to the University, by his diligence and learning, particularly in the study of Antiquities (c); which was cultivated with great zeal and success by many of his contemporaries, especially by Mr Edmund Gibson, his intimate acquaintance, and Fellow-Collegian at Queen's College, afterwards the late most worthy Bishop

[A] He became a Student in Queen's College in Oxford.] Dr Thomas Lamplugh, then Archbishop of York, an acquaintance of his father's (1).

(p) Craftsman, in the Vol. for the year 1737.

(q) Peerage of England, as before.

(r) Under the tuition of Dr Dickins, Professor of Civil Law in that University, by the advice of Dr Exton Sayer, above mention'd.

(s) General Evening Post, &c. and Lond. Mag.

(t) MS. penes me.

(u) Under Mr Upton, the same who had been tutor to his brother, the present Earl Talbot.

(aa) Court Kalendar, or Register.

(*) The whole profits of which, after paying his Curate, he distributes among the poor of the parish. From private information.

(bb) Court Kal.

(dd) Upon his refusal, it was given to Samuel Squire, D. D. Dean of Bristol, April 4, 1761. Lond. Mag. for May that year.

(ff) University Register.

(gg) Collins's Peerage.

(ii) Gazette, No. 10090.

(ll) From the information of the Family.

(30) viz. Charity. Pope's Epistle to Lord Bathurst on the Use of Riches.

(a) Wood, Athen. Edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 984. and Essay towards a History of the County of Norfolk, by Francis Blomefield, Vol. II. p. 458. & Præfat. ad Bibliothecam Britannico-Hibernic. p. 12.

(s) Peerage of England.

(t) This place was given him by the late Dr Joseph Butler, then Dean of the Church, and afterwards Bishop of Durham, both which preferments he owed to the interest of the Chancellor.

(x) Honour of the Seals, &c. p. 21.

(z) From the University Register.

(cc) Lond. Mag. for that month.

(ee) From the information of Mr R. Skinner of CCC. in Oxford.

(bb) Gazette, No. 10089.

(kk) Peerage of England, as before. This Gentleman, who is sprung from the Royal Race of Owen Tudor, is also Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum for that County, and one of the Lords of Trade, Court Calendar for this year 1761.

(31) Alluding to his motto, Humani nihil alienum.

(b) Wood, & Blomefield, ibid.

(c) See his Epitaph below.

(1) Præfat. ad Bibliothecam &c. ut supra.

of London. And our Author gave an early specimen of his great knowledge therein [B], by publishing his Notitia Monastica, in 1695 [C], when he was but about twenty-two years of age (d). The learned Dr John Moore, Bishop of Norwich, having soon after made him his Chaplain, collated him, March the 6th, 1700-1, to the Chancellorship of Norwich; which place he adorned by his universal acquaintance with the Municipal and Ecclesiastical Laws, and occasioned his being frequently consulted by persons in the most eminent Stations [D]. He marrying about the same time Rose, eldest daughter of the Bishop, his Lordship made him, on the 24th of November, 1703, his Commissary in and throughout the Archdeaconry of Norfolk; and, January 1, 1706-7, Commissary also in and throughout the Archdeaconry of Sudbury, and town of Bury St Edmund's. In June 1706, he was instituted to the Rectory of Thorp near Norwich, being presented to it by Duncan Dee, Esq; Common Hunt of the City of London (e). He had taken his Master of Arts degree in 1696; and, in Act-term, 1710, he took that of Doctor in Divinity. By his father-in-law, Bishop Moore, then Bishop of Ely, he was collated, in 1713, to a Prebend in that Church, and installed the 10th of September (f). And Dr Green, Bishop of Norwich, collated him, December 7, 1721, to the Archdeaconry of Norfolk (g), which he was installed into the 26th of the same month. Quitting in 1723 his Prebend of Ely, he was made Canon of Christ's-Church in Oxford, and installed February 3, 1723-4. In the year 1727, the lower House of Convocation shewed their proper respect for his Learning and Abilities, by unanimously chusing him their Prolocutor, however contrary to his inclination (h). And his Majesty further expressed his regard for him, by promoting him to the Bishopric of St Asaph, to which he was consecrated January 23, 1731-2. But he did not long enjoy this dignity; for he died at Christ's-Church, December 14, 1735; and was buried in the Cathedral there, where a monument is erected, containing a just and true character of this worthy Prelate (i) [E]. He had three wives, 1. Rose, eldest daughter of Bishop Moore, which died March 15, 1706, aged twenty-five, by whom he had only a daughter, that died February 17, 1703, aged fourteen months (k). 2. Francis, daughter of Mr Jacob Preston, citizen of London: she died June 11, 1718, aged forty. By her he had two daughters, who died young; and his son and heir, the Rev. Dr Thomas Tanner, Rector of Hadley and Monks-Ely in Suffolk, and Prebendary of Canterbury; who hath married Mary, third daughter of Dr John Potter, late Archbishop of Canterbury. 3. In May 1733, his Lordship married to his third Lady, Mrs Elizabeth Scottow of Thorp, aforementioned, a very considerable fortune. She surviving him, was remarried to Robert Britiffe, Esq; late Recorder of Norwich. What our learned Prelate published, or left ready for the press, is set down below in the note [F]. He made large collections for the History and Antiquities of his native County of Wilts; but as he happened to be preferred at some distance from it, he was by that means hindered from prosecuting and finishing that work (l). Another much larger Collection of his, which he bequeathed to the Bodleian

(d) See Preface to the second edition of Notitia Monastica, &c. p. 42.

(e) From Memoirs communicated to us. See also Blomefield.

(f) From the same Memoirs, and Dr Br. Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. II. p. 381.

(h) Dr Br. Willis's Survey, as above, p. 454.

(i) Fr. Blomefield, as above, p. 459.

(l) See Nicolson, as above, p. 26. and Books and Treatises relating to the Antiquities of England, at the beginning of Camden's Britannia, under Wiltshire.

[B] Gave an early specimen of his great knowledge.] In 1693 he published Proposals for printing all J. Leland's works; but laid that work by, for want of encouragement (2).

[C] By publishing his Notitia Monastica in 1695.] It was printed at Oxford in 1695. 8vo. under this title, 'Notitia Monastica; or a Short Account of the Religious Houses in England and Wales.' As for an account of the second, and greatly improved Edition; see below, note [F]. This Book, as Bishop Nicolson observed (3), 'does not only afford us a short history of the Foundation and chief Revolutions of all our Religious Houses, but presents us also with a catalogue of such Writers (noting the places where we may find them) as will abundantly furnish us with such further particulars [concerning the Monasteries] as we shall have occasion for.'

[D] And occasioned his being frequently consulted by persons in the most eminent stations.] The late Archbishop Wake, after his translation to Canterbury, and even the very learned Bishop Gibson, desired frequently his Thoughts on the Difficulties they met with in the discharge of their respective great offices; and received the most satisfactory Answers from him (4). But it is not so proper in this cavilling age to make any of them public.

[E] Where a monument is erected, &c.] The inscription on it is as follows.

M. S.
Thomas Tanner, S. T. P.
 Qui natus Laingtonia in Agro Wiltoniensi
 In Collegium Reginense admissus,
 Deinde Omniū Animarum Capellanus,
 Mox Socius cooptatus est.
 Optinarum ibi artium Cultor,
 Antiquitatis præsertim studio ita trahabatur,
 Ut in Patriæ Fastis, monumentisque eruendis,
 Nemo illo diligentior,
 Nemo in explicandis peritior haberetur.
 Hinc maturè evocatus
 Ad munus Cancellarii Diocesis Nordwicensis,
 VOL. VI. No. 326.

Audus est insuper Præbenda Eliensi.
 Academia denuo restitutus,
 Hanc Ædem Canonicus ornavit.
 A Clero interim Prolocutor renunciatus,
 Ad Episcopatum tandem evedus est Asaphensem.
 Vir erat
 Ad omne Officium summa Fide et Diligentia,
 Rara Pietate,
 Humanissima erga omnes voluntate,
 Liberalitate in Egenos effusissima.
 Obiit 14^o die Decembris Anno { Domini 1735.
 { Ætatis 62 [5].

[F] What our learned Prelate published, or left ready for the press, &c.] We do not find that he published any thing himself, but, I. His Notitia Monastica, already mentioned. II. The second edition of Wood's Athens, very much corrected and enlarged; with the Addition of above 500 new Lives from the Author's original Manuscript. Lond. 1721. two vols fol. Mr Wood, at his death, intrusted our learned Author with his papers, as appears by the following extracts of a letter from Dr Charlott to Archbishop Tenison (). . . . 'I desired him to lose not a minute in vain complaints and remonstrances, but proceed directly to settle his Papers, that were so numerous and confused. He then asked, "who he could trust?" I advised him to Mr Tanner of All Souls, for whose fidelity I could be responsible. His answer was, "he thought so too, and that he would in this, and all the other particulars, follow my advice." . . . I was extremely glad to find him in so good a temper, and having discouraged him about several things, I told him I never expected to see him again, and therefore took my last farewell, telling him, I should hear contently by Mr Tanner. After I came home, I repeated all that I had said, in a long letter to him, being somewhat jealous of him, and sent it by Mr Tanner. He kept his word punctually, . . . made his will, went into his study with his two friends, Mr Bisse and Mr Tanner, to sort that vast multitude of papers, notes, letters, — about two bushels full he

(5) From his Epitaph in Dr Richardson's Continuation of Godwin de Præfulibus, p. 646. that in Blomefield being incorrect.

(6) Published by T. Hearne, in the Appendix to his edition of Joannis Confratris & Monachi Glastonensis Chronica, &c. Oxon. 1725. 8vo.

(1) Upon the signature of Dr Landon, then Dean of Lincoln.

(2) Fr. Blomefield, as above, p. 423.

(3) Ibid.

(4) English Hist. Library. Edit. 1714. fol. p. 145.

(5) From private Memoirs.

Library [G], consisted of originals and copies of Charters, Grants, Deeds, and other Instruments relating to the History of these Nations, which had occurred to him during the whole course of his life. Of these he was freely communicative; and kindly assistant to all lovers of the Antiquities of Britain, as is acknowledged with honour and gratitude by several Authors [H]. For many years he was a very useful member of the Society of Antiquaries at London, and one of its principal ornaments. He gave many charitable Legacies; among the rest, 100*l.* to the corporation for the relief of widows and orphans of the poor clergy: And his public and private virtues are still in remembrance [I].

‘ he ordered for the fire, to be lighted as he was expiring, which was accordingly done, he expressing both his knowledge and approbation of what was done, by throwing out his hands. . . . He has given his books and papers to the university, to be placed next his friend Sir W. Dugdale’s MSS. which are very valuable to any of his temper. His more private papers he has ordered not to be opened these seven years, and has placed them in the custody of Mr Bisse and Mr Tanner, of whose care, I am told, he makes me overseer. The Continuation of his Athenæ Oxon. in two fol. which he had carried on to the 19th of October last (Dr Merret and Dudley Loftus being the two last) he gave the day before he died with great ceremony to Mr Tanner, for his sole use, without any restrictions.’ III. He drew up Catalogues, of Fr. Junius’s MSS. of Dr. Richard James’s, and of Gerard Langbaine’s: all which are in the Bodleian Library (7).

What he left ready for the press, was, 1. ‘Notitia Monastica: or, An Account of all the Abbies, Priories, and Houses of Friars, heretofore in England and Wales; and also of all the Colleges and Hospitals founded before A. D. MDXL.’ being a large work founded upon his little book with the same title, above mentioned. It was published by his brother, the Rev. John Tanner, A. M. Vicar of Lowestoft in Suffolk, and Precentor of the Cathedral Church of St Asaph. Lond. 1744. fol. The Editor compiled the Preface, from that of the first edition, and the many references and useful hints left by the learned Author for improving it. He moreover digested several parts, which he found unfinished: Peterborough, in particular, and seven other places in Northamptonshire; the latter part of Yorkshire; and all Wales, are of his doing (8). Upon the whole, this is the most useful Repository for the Monastical History of these Kingdoms that could have been contrived; and the learned world is greatly obliged to the industrious Author, for his great pains therein. 2. Another work left by Bishop Tanner ready for the press was, Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica; sive, de Scriptoribus qui in Anglia, Scotia, & Hibernia ad sæculi XVII. initium floruerunt, literarum ordine juxta familiarum nomina dispositis Commentarius, &c. or an Account of the English, Scotch, and Irish Writers; compiled not only from Leland, Bale, and Pitts, but also from numberless other Authorities, both printed and MS. (9), and published at London, 1748. fol. a work of XL years labour and application. The learned Dr Wilkins, Rector of Hadley and Monks-Eley in Suffolk, and Prebendary of Canterbury, fitted it for the press, and prefixed a long Preface, in which is included Boston of Bury *. 3. He left Boston of Bury ready for the press (10); which is included, in the Preface just now mentioned. 4. He supplied, from the Author’s own manuscript, many considerable Passages, all the quotations, and a learned Preface, that had been omitted by B. R. in his edition of Robert Hegge’s Legend of St Cuthbert, with the Antiquities of the Church of Durham (11).

* Leland de Scriptoribus &c. is included in this work, and printed from a new copy taken from the original by our Author, in a much more correct manner than it had been by

[G] Another much larger collection of his, which he bequeathed to the Bodleian Library. It consists of many volumes, bound up; and marked, for distinction-sake, with the several names of Appleton, Atley, Bristol, Hobart, Jackson, Jernegan, Willoughby, &c. As he was removing them by water, some of the boxes, in which they were inclosed, happened unfortunately to fall into the Thames, whereby some of the books were damaged.

[H] As is acknowledged with honour and gratitude by several Authors. Particularly by Archdeacon Knight; in the Introduction to his Life of Dean Colet (12), where he ‘gratefully owns, that he had received good assistance from his special Friend, the Reverend and learned Dr Tanner, Chancellor of Norwich.’ And, in his Introduction to his Life of Erasmus (13), he says, that ‘to the improvement of it, his learned Friend Dr Tanner had in many instances shewn his wonted readines.’

Mr. Fr. Blomefield acknowledges also, with great thankfulness, how much his Lordship had assisted him in his History of Norfolk (14). ‘It is well known, says he, and it would be the greatest ingratitude in me, to forbear acknowledging it, how much I have been assisted in this work, by that Right Reverend Prelate, the late Bishop of St Asaph, whose Kindness was so great, as not only to help me to the sight of vast Numbers of Records, and Manuscripts concerning this County, but also to fix my method, and revise my Collections when put together, town by town, as I compiled them. . . . Gratitude therefore obliged me to dedicate it to his Memory, not doubting but that will ever be valued by all the Learned.’

[I] And his public and private virtues are still in remembrance. The character given of him by the learned Dr W. Richardson (15), is in these words. ‘Vir in Antiquitatibus Britannicis versatissimus, morum simplicitate primæva venerabilis, et propter virtutes tum domesticas tum publicas suis merito charissimus.’ And by others he is stiled, ‘a Prelate of great Learning, exemplary Piety, and universal Benevolence (16).’

Antony Hall; whose edition of this book is full of the greatest errors, as well as large omissions (17).

TAYLOR (JEREMY), Bishop of Downe and Connor in Ireland, and one of the best Divines and Writers, in the last century, was born at Cambridge (a) [A]. Being of very pregnant parts, he was admitted at thirteen years of age in Gonville and Caius College, where he continued till he had taken his Master of Arts degree (b) [B]. Afterwards entering into holy orders, he occasionally supplied three or four times his chamber-fellow Mr. Riffden’s turn, at the Lecture in St Paul’s Church, London: wherein he acquitted himself with such applause above his years, that Archbishop Laud, the great Judge and Patron of Learning, having notice of it, and observing the smartness of his discourses, the quickness of his parts, and the sweetness and modesty of his temper and behaviour, got him elected Fellow of All-Souls College in Oxford in 1636 (c) [C], thinking it would be an

[A] Was born at Cambridge. None of the Memorialists of our Prelate’s Life mention in what year he was born: but, in all probability, it was between the years 1600, and 1610. David Lloyd says, that his Father was a Barber (1).

[B] Where he continued till he had taken his Master of Arts degree. Sir James Ware says, that he was Fellow of that college (2). But it seems to be a mistake.

[C] Got him elected Fellow of All-Souls College in Oxford. Ant. Wood observes (3), that this Election was ‘against the Statutes of that College, in these two respects. First, because Mr Taylor had exceeded the age, within which the said statutes make candidates capable of being elected; and, secondly, that he had not been of three years standing in the University of Oxon, only a week or two before he was put in. However,

(7) Catal. MSS. Angliæ & Hiberniæ, Vol. I. p. 249, 258, 268.

(8) See Preface, p. 42, 43.

(9) See Bishop Nicolson’s Engl. Hist. Library, as above, p. 157.

(b) Dr George Ruff’s Funeral Sermon on Bishop Taylor.

(c) D. Lloyd, as above; and Wood Athen. Edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 400.

(1) Memoirs, as above.

(2) Hist. of the Bishops of Ireland, in Sir James Ware’s Works, with improvements by Walter Harris, Esq; Edit. Dublin, 1759. fol. Vol. I. p. 209.

(10) Blomefield, as above, p. 459.

(11) Nicolson, p. 104.

(12) p. 12, 13.

(13) p. 17.

(14) Introd. p. 1.

(15) Continuation ad Godwini Comm. de Præfulibus, p. 646.

(16) G. Magaz.

(17) J. Aubrey’s Hist. of Surrey, with Dr R. Rawlinson’s Additions, Vol. III. p. 241.

(a) Memoirs, &c. by D. Lloyd. Edit. Lon. 1668. fol. p. 702.

(3) Athen. ut supra.

advantage to the world, if a person of such excellent parts had better opportunities of study and improvement afforded him, than a course of constant preaching would allow of. And thankfully did our Author make the best use of the glorious opportunity that was put in his power. Soon after, endeavours were used by some Romish emissaries to seduce him to Popery; but a Sermon he preached at St Mary's on the 5th of November, 1638 [D], convinced them that they were mistaken in their man. Archbishop Laud made him his Chaplain, and gave, or procured, him the Rectory of Uppingham in Rutlandshire [E]. Undoubtedly he would have given him greater preferment, had not the national troubles so soon ensued. Upon taking Uppingham, he did not immediately leave the University, but continued there a year or two longer, for his further improvement. About 1640, he quitted it and his Fellowship; and marrying, settled at his Rectory, where he was much admired for his excellent casuistical Sermons (d). On the 1st of November 1642, he was created Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (e); being then Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles I, and a frequent Preacher before him and the Court, whilst they were in that city. In the station of a Chaplain, he attended his Majesty in several campaigns: where, though he had not the command of time and books, yet he laid the foundation of many Treatises in defence of the Church of England [F]. Upon the decline of the King's cause, his living being sequestred, he retired into Wales, where he met with a kind reception from Richard Vaughan, Earl of Carbery, of Golden Grove in Caermardhynshire: through whose favour and protection, he was permitted to exercise his Ministry, and keep school, for the support of himself and his children. In this solitude he began to write his excellent Discourses [G], which are enough of themselves to furnish a Library; and have rendered his

‘ However, he being a person of most wonderful parts, and like to be an ornament thereunto, he was dispensed with, and thereby obtained in that house, much of that Learning, wherewith he was enabled to write casuistically.’

[D] Soon after, endeavours were used by some Romish emissaries to seduce him to Popery, &c. For this we have Ant. Wood's authority; whose account is in these words. . . . ‘ About the same time he was in a ready way to be confirmed a member of the Church of Rome, as many of that persuasion have said, but upon a Sermon delivered in St Mary's Church in Oxon on the 5th of November (Gunpowder-treason day), ann. 1638, wherein several things were put in against the Papists by the then Vicechancellor, he was afterwards rejected with scorn by those of that party, particularly by Fr. à Sancta Clara, his intimate acquaintance; to whom afterwards he expressed some sorrow for those things he had said against them, as the said Sancta Clara hath several times told me (4).’ . . . But, as Walter Harris, Esq; justly observes (5), Ant. Wood ‘ gives for it only the Word of Francis à Sanza Clara, a Franciscan Frier, and an intimate acquaintance of Mr Taylor's; who doubtless would be vain enough to boast of such a conquest. But his learned Writings against Transubstantiation, and his Dissuaves from Popery, will for ever defend his Memory from such groundless aspersions.’ . . . We therefore very properly say, that endeavours only were used to seduce him to Popery: for, that he remained notwithstanding firm in the Protestant Religion, not only the Sermon here referred to, but the rest of his Works abundantly testify; there being in them the severest strokes against Popery, and all along a fund of sound sense, quite free from superstition. The Sermon here mentioned was printed at Oxford, in 1638. 4to. It is on Luke ix. 54.

[E] And gave, or procured, him the Rectory of Uppingham in Rutlandshire. That living is in the gift of the Bishops of London. Either therefore Archbishop Laud had the gift of it for that turn, by way of option: or else procured it for his Chaplain, Mr Taylor, from Dr Juxon, then Bishop of London.

[F] Yet he laid the foundation of many Treatises in defence of the Church of England. Namely,—I. ‘ Of the Sacred Order and Offices of Episcopacie, by divine Institution, Apostolical Tradition, and Catholique Practice. Together with their Titles of Honour, Secular Employment, Manner of Election, Delegation of their Power, and other appendant Questions, asserted against the Arians, and Acephali, new and old. Published by his Majesty's command.’ Oxford, 1647, and 1647. 4to.—II. ‘ A Discourse concerning Prayer ex tempore, or, by pretence of the Spirit, in justification of authorized and set-forms of Liturgy;’ Lond. 1626, and 1647. 4to. occasioned by The Directory for Prayer, &c.—III. ‘ An Apology for authorized and set-forms of Liturgie, against the Pretence of the Spirit; 1. for ex tempore Prayer; and 2. Forms of private Composition.’ Lond. 1649. 4to.—IV. . . . He also wrote, about the same time, ‘ The ‘ Titles and Collects, according to the matter of each Psalm;’ printed with the Psalms of David, published by Christopher Lord Hatton. Oxford, 1644. 8vo. and ‘ Devotions for the help and assistance of all Christian people;’ which are at the end of the same book (6).

[G] In this Solitude he began to write his excellent Discourses. Which were as follow.—V. ‘ The Golden Grove: or, A Manual of daily Prayers and Litanies, fitted to the Daies of the Week; together with a short Method of Peace and Holiness.’—VI. Festival Hymns according to the Manner of the ancient Church.—VII. Θεολογία Ἐκκλησιαστικῆ. A Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying. Shewing the Unreasonableness of prescribing to other men's Faith, and the Iniquity of persecuting differing opinions.’ Lond. 1647. 4to. In this book he pleads with great freedom for Liberty of Conscience. ‘ The sum of it, as he saith himself (7), is nothing but the sense of these words of Scripture; That since we know in part, and prophesy in part, and that now we see through a glasse darkly, we should not despise or contemn persons not so knowing as ourselves, but him that is weak in the faith we should receive, but not to doubtful disputations; Therefore certainly to charity, and not to vexations, not to those which are the idle effects of impertinent wranglings. And provided they keep close to the foundation, which is Faith and Obedience, let them build upon this foundation matter more or less precious, yet if the foundation be intire, they shall be saved with or without lesse. And since we profess ourselves Servants of so meek a Master, and Disciples of so charitable an Institute, Let us walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love; for this is the best endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit, when it is fast tyed in the bond of peace. And although it be a duty of Christianity, that we all speak the same thing, that there be no divisions among us, but that we be perfectly joynd together in the same mind, and in the same judgement; yet this Unity is to be estimated according to the unity of faith, in things necessary, in matters of Creed, and Articles fundamentall; for as for other things, it is more to be wished than to be hoped for.’ &c. . . . ‘ These, and thousands more to the same purpose, are the Doctrines of Christianity, whose sense and intendment (saith he) I have prosecuted in the following Discourse, being very much displeas'd that so many opinions and new doctrines are commenced among us; but more troubled, that every man that hath an opinion, thinks his own, and other men's salvation is concerned in its maintenance; but most of all, that men should be persecuted and afflicted for disagreeing in such opinions, which they cannot with sufficient grounds obtrude upon others necessarily, because they cannot propound them both infallible, and because they have no warrant from Scripture so to do.’ . . . And much more to the same purpose he hath, in this excellent, and long, Dedication, which contains no less than forty-eight pages.

(e) Wood, Fasti, Vol. 11. col. 29.

(6) Wood, Ath. Vol. 1. col. 254.

(7) In the Epistle Dedicatory, p. 6. 7, &c.

1 Cor. 13.

Rom. 14.

Eph. iv. 2, 3.

(d) Dr Ruff's Sermon, as above. See also below, note.

(4) Ubi supra.

(5) In his additions inserted among Sir James Ware's Works, as above, p. 209.

his name immortal, on account of the exactness of wit, profoundness of judgment, richness of fancy, clearness of expression, and general usefulness to all the purposes of a Christian,

The Discourse is divided into Twenty-two Sections. In the first he treats, 'Of the nature of Faith, and that its duty is compleated in believing the Articles of the Apostles Creed.' In the second, of Heresy, and the nature of it, 'and that it is to be accounted according to the strict capacity of Christian Faith, and not in opinions speculative, nor ever to pious persons. 3. Of the difficulty and uncertainty of Arguments from Scripture, in Questions not simply necessary, not literally determined. 4. Of the difficulty of expounding Scripture. 5. Of the insufficiency and uncertainty of Tradition to expound Scripture, or determine Questions. 6. Of the uncertainty and insufficiency of Councils Ecclesiasticall to the same purpose. 7. Of the fallibility of the Pope, and the uncertainty of his expounding Scripture, and resolving Questions. 8. Of the disability of Fathers, or Writers Ecclesiasticall, to determine our Questions, with certainty and truth. 9. Of the incompetency of the Church in its diffusive capacity to be Judge of Controversies, and the impertinency of that pretence of the Spirit. 10. Of the authority of Reason, and that it, proceeding upon the best grounds, is the best judge. 11. Of some causes of Error in the exercise of Reason, which are inculcate in themselves. 12. Of the innocency of Error in opinion in a pious person. 13. Of the deportment to be used towards persons disagreeing, and the reasons why they are not to be punished with death, &c. 14. Of the practice of Christian Churches towards persons disagreeing, and when Persecution first came in. 15. How farre the Church or Governours may act to the restraining false or differing opinions. 16. Whether it be lawful for a Prince to give toleration to several Religions. 17. Of compliance with disagreeing persons, or weak Consciences in general. 18. A particular consideration of the Opinions of the Anabaptists. 19. That there may be no Toleration of Doctrines inconsistent with piety or the publique good. 20. How far the Religion of the Church of Rome is Tolerable (8). 21. Of the duty of particular Churches in allowing communion. 22. That particular men may communicate with Churches of different persuasions, and how farre they may do it.'

(8) He gives many substantial reasons, why it cannot be tolerated.

(9) P. 53, 54.

Our learned Author delivers himself with great freedom, in several parts of this Book, upon many important points; particularly about the Athanasian Creed (9). '... If I should be questioned, says he, concerning the Symbol of Athanasius, I confesse I cannot see that moderate sentence and gentleness of charity in his Preface and Conclusion, as there was in the Nicene Creed. Nothing there but damnation and perishing everlastingly, unless the Article of the Trinity be believed, as it is there with curiosity and minute particularities explained. . . . Besides, if it were considered, concerning Athanasius Creed, how many people understand it not, how contrary to naturall reason it seems, how little the Scripture sayes of those curiosities of Explication, and how Tradition was not cleare on his side for the Article itselfe, much lesse for those formes and minutes, . . . and after all this, that the Nicene Creed itselfe went not so farre, neither in Article, nor Anathema, nor Explication, it had not been amisse if the final judgement had been left to Jesus Christ. . . . This Treatise hath been very much admired and praised by all Lovers of Liberty and Toleration; and as much condemned by persons of different sentiments. Therefore, Samuel Rutherford, Professor of Divinity in the university of St Andrew's, animadverted upon it, in his Free Disputation against pretended Liberty of Conscience, &c. Lond. 4to. We are told, that in the writing of this Book, the Author made use of a like stratagem as J. Hales did in writing his Treatise concerning Schism, to break the Presbyterian power, and so countenance divisions between the Factions, which were then too much united against the loyal Clergy. For, in that book, he insists on the same topics of Schism and Heresy, of the incompetency of Councils and Fathers to determine our Ecclesiasticall Controversies, and of scrupulous Consciences; and urgeth far more cogent Arguments than Hales did, but still he had prepared his antidote to prevent any dangerous effect of his discourse. For the judicious reader may perceive such a reserve (though it lye in ambushade, and is compacted in a narrow compass) as may easily rout those troops, which began too soon to cry Victory, and thought of nothing else but dividing the spoil (10). But, to proceed to the rest of our Author's Works he published.—VIII. 'The great Exemplar of Sanctity and Holy Life, according to the Christian Institution, described in the Life and Death of Jesus Christ. In three parts.' Lond. 1645. 4to. Reprinted afterwards several times in folio. The sixth edition is intitled, Antiquitates Christianæ: or, The History of the Life and Death of the Holy Jesus: and printed with Antiquitates Apostolicæ: or, the Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the Holy Apostles of our Saviour, &c. written by William Cave, D. D. (11).—IX. 'Twenty-five Sermons preached at Golden Grove; being for the Winter Half-year; beginning on Advent-Sunday, and continuing till Whitfunday.'—X. 'Twenty-seven Sermons preached at Golden Grove; being for the Summer Half-year, beginning on Whitfunday, and ending on the 25th Sunday after Trinity.' In the edition of 1664, there were added seven Sermons; and in that of 1667, three more: which, with the Sermon on November 5, above mentioned, were, in the edition of 1678, called 'A Supplement of Eleven Sermons, preached since his Majesty's Restoration.' And the general title of the whole Volume, is, Επιτάφιος. 'A course of Sermons for all the Sundays in the year; fitted to the great Necessities, and for the supplying the want of Preaching in many Parts of this Nation. With a Supplement of Eleven Sermons preached since his Majesty's Restoration.' fol.—XI. 'A short Catechism for the Institution of young Persons in the Christian Religion. With an explication of the Apostolical Creed.' Composed for the use of the Schools in Wales. Lond. 1652. 8vo.—XII. 'A Discourse of Baptisme, its Institution and Efficacy upon all Believers. Together with a consideration of the Practise of the Church in Baptizing Infants of believing Parents: And the Practise justified.' 1652. 4to.—XIII. Clerus Domini: or, a Discourse of the divine Institution, Necessity, Sacredness, and Separation of the Office Ministerial. Together with the Nature and Manner of its Power and Operation.' Written by the special Command of King Charles I. Inserted afterwards into his Course of Sermons for all the Sundays in the Year.—XIV. 'The Rule and Exercise of Holy Living: in which are described the Means and Instruments of obtaining every Vertue, and the Remedies against every Vice, and Considerations serving to the resisting all Temptations. Together with Prayers containing the whole Duty of a Christian. And the Parts of Devotion fitted to all Occasions, and furnished for all Necessities.—The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying: in which are described the Means and Instruments of preparing ourselves and others respectively for a blessed Death; and the Remedies against the Evils and Temptations proper to the State of Sickness: Together with Prayers and Acts of Vertue to be used by sick and dying Persons, or by others standing in their attendance. To which are added, Rules for the Visitation of the Sick, and Offices proper for that Ministry.' 1659. 8vo. Both Parts are dedicated to Richard Earl of Carbery; and they have gone through so many impressions, that the nineteenth edition was printed in 1703.—XV. 'The real Presence and spiritual of Christ in the blessed Sacrament, proved against the Doctrine of Transubstantiation.' Lond. 1654. 8vo.—XVI. 'Unum Necessarium: or, the Doctrine and Practise of Repentance rescued from popular errors,' &c. Lond. 1655. 8vo.—XVII. 'Two Answers to the Bishop of Rochester's [Warner] two Letters, concerning the Chapter of Original Sin in the Unum Necessarium.' Lond. 1656. 12mo.—XVIII. 'Vindication of the Glory of the divine Attributes, in the question of Original Sin.' Lond. 1656. 12mo. XIX. 'A farther Explication of the Doctrine of Original Sin.' Lond. 1656. 8vo.—He also wrote, whilst in Wales,—XX. 'New and easy Institution of Grammar, for the use of the Youth in Wales.' Lond. 1647. 8vo. This is commonly said to be Dr Taylor's, but some have ascribed it to his Usher, William Wyatt.—XXI. 'Measures and Offices of Friendship; in a Letter to the most ingenious and excellent Mrs K. P.' [i. e. Mrs Katherine Philipps, the celebrated Orinda, wife of James Philipps of the Priory of Caerdigan, Esq;] Lond. To the second edition of which, in 1657, were subjoined,—XXII. 'Two Letters to Persons changed in their Religion.'—XIII. 'Three Letters to a Gen-

(10) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 402. and T. Long, in the Preface to Mr Hales's Treatise of Schism examined, and censured. Lond. 1678. 8vo. and D. Lloyd, as above. p. 703.

(11) See above the art. CAVE (WILLIAM).

tlewoman

tion, wherewith they abound. But after he had spent some years in this agreeable retirement, a severe illness happening in his family, and depriving him, in two or three months, of three of his sons, young men of great hopes, it so sensibly affected him, that he could no longer live with any comfort in the place. Coming therefore to London, he officiated for a while in a private congregation of Loyalists, to his great hazard and danger. At length, he became acquainted with Edward Lord Conway, a person of great honour and generosity, who invited him into Ireland, and afforded him a pleasant and commodious retreat at Portmore (f), a seat adapted for study and contemplation. There he continued till King Charles the Second's Restoration; when he came over to England, to bear a part in the universal triumph (g). On the 24th of April, 1660, he was one of the persons that subscribed the declaration of the Nobility and Gentry, which adhered to the late King, in and about the city of London (h). And, in consideration of his Merit and Learning, being promoted to the sees of Down and Connor in Ireland, by letters patent, dated January 19, 1660-1, he was consecrated the 27th of the same month in St Patrick's Church in Dublin: A little before which he had been made a Privy-councillor for that Kingdom. And June 21, 1661, the King granted him also the Administration of the Bishopric of Dromore, by way of additional reward, for his sufferings in defence of the Church of England, of which he had been one of the most undaunted Champions. He discharged his episcopal office with the utmost care and faithfulness; and gave excellent Rules and Directions to his Clergy, of which he taught them the practice by his own example. The University of Dublin manifested their particular regard for him, by desiring to have him for their Vice-chancellor [H]; which honourable office he kept to his dying day (i). Having laudably behaved in every station of life, he died at Lisnegarvy, or Lisburne, August 13, 1667, and was buried in the choir of the Church of Dromore, which he had rebuilt at his own expence. He left by will to the poor of the parishes of Dromore, Lisburne, and Ballintobber, 10 l. each. He was esteemed a person of great learning and eloquence; of a piercing wit, and deep judgment; an ornament to the pulpit; exceeding humble and humane; so charitable to the poor, that, except moderate portions to his three daughters, he spent all his income on alms and publick works (k). One, who differed from him both in opinion and practice (l), is forced to own that he was 'a man of admirable wit, great parts, had a quick and elegant pen, was of abilities in critical learning, and of profound skill in antiquity, &c.' But his character is given to greater

(f) In the county of Antrim.

(g) Dr Russ's Sermon, as above, and Wood, Athen. col. 409, 401.

(i) Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 401, and Sir James Ware's Works, with additions by Walter Harris Esq; Publ. 1739. Vol. I. p. 209, 210.

(k) Walter Harris's Additions, ibid.

' a woman that was tempted to the Communion of the Romish Church.'—XXIV. ' A Discourse of Confirmation.'—These three last, with Unum Necessarium; Two Answers to Bishop Warner; and A Dissuasive from Popery, were printed together, in 1674, under the title of, Συμβολα Θεολογικα. Or, A Collection of Polemical Discourses; wherein the Church of England is defended in many material points, &c. Lond. fol. — And Nos 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 15, 21, with the Sermon, mentioned in note [D], had been collected, in 1657, in one Volume, folio, under this title, ' A Collection of Polemical and Moral Discourses.'—XXV. ' A Collection of Offices, or Forms of Prayer, fitted to the needs of all Christians, taken out of the Scriptures and ancient Liturgies of several Churches, especially the Greek. Together with the Psalter, or Psalms of David, after the King's translation, with Arguments to every Psalm.' Lond. 1658. 8vo. This last part is the same as N^o IV. above.—XXVI. ' The Ephe- sian Matron.' Lond. 1659. 12mo.—XXVII. ' Certain Letters to Henry Jeanes, concerning a passage of his [Jeanes's] in the explication of Original Sin.' Oxford, 1660. Published by Jeanes.—XXVIII. ' Ductor Dubitantium: or, The Rule of Conscience in all her generall Measures; serving as a great Instrument for the determination of Cases of Conscience. In four Books.' Lond. 1660. two Vols. fol. Dedicated to King Charles II. The Preface is dated from his Study in Portmore in Kilultagh, October 5, 1659. We are informed (12), that this book is the substance of some Sermons, preached by him at Uppingham, before his sequestration.—XXVIII. ' The Worthy Communicant: or, A Discourse of the Nature, Effects, and Blessings, subsequent to the worthy receiving of the Lord's Supper. With some Cases of Conscience occurring in the Duty of him that ministers, and him that communicates.' Lond. 1660. 8vo. To the second edition, the same year, were added, Devotions fitted to every part of the Ministration.—XXIX. ' Letter concerning Praying with the Spirit, &c. Prefixed to A Discourse of Praying with the Spirit, and with the Understanding also. In two Sermons, preached at Hillsborough, anno 1659, on 1 Cor. xiv. 15. by Henry Leslie, Bishop of Down and Connor. Lond. 1660. 4to.—XXX. ' Rules and Advices to the Clergy of the Dioceses of Down and Connor, &c. Dublin, 1661. 8vo.

—XXXI. ' A Discourse of artificial Beauty in point of Conscience between two Ladies.' Lond. 1662. 8vo. Reprinted in 1701, and called Several Letters between two Ladies: wherein the Lawfulness and Unlawfulness of artificial Beauty in point of Conscience are nicely debated.—XXXII. ' A Dissuasive from Popery. Part I. The Second Part of the Dissuasive from Popery: in Vindication of the first Part. And further Reproof and Conviction of the Roman Errors.' Lond. 1664. 4to. A. Wood thinks (13), this Dissuasive from Popery, to be different from one of our Author's which he had mentioned before (14). But it is one and the same. The words to the People of Ireland, which had made him think they were different, is in the beginning of the First Part, though not mentioned in the Title-page of either part. This work was animadverted upon, by Edward Worsely, a Jesuit, in a piece intitled, Truth will out; or a Discovery of some Untruths smoothly told by Dr Jer. Taylor in his Dissuasive from Popery: And also by John Sarjeant, in one of the Appendices to his Sure-footing in Christianity.—XXXIII. ' A succinct Narrative of the Life of Dr John Bramhall, Archbishop of Armagh; at the end of his Funeral Sermon, preached by our Author, July 16, 1663. Inserted among his Sermons.—XXXIV. ' Contemplations on the State of Man in this Life, and that which is to come.' Lond. 1684. 8vo.—XXXV. ' Moral Demonstration, proving that the Religion of Jesus Christ is from God.' Lond. 1687. 8vo. Put at the end of one of his Letters to a Gentlewoman that was tempted to the Communion of the Romish Church: And which was then reprinted, with some other Tracts of our learned Author. It had been printed before, with one of the editions of his Ductor Dubitantium—XXXVI. ' A Discourse upon the Beatitudes,' was left by him unfinished. [H] By desiring to have him for their Vice-chancellor.] And recommending him for that purpose to their Chancellor, he took the oath of office before Sir Maurice Eustace, Knight; then Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and made an eloquent Latin Speech to the University, upon his admission (15). There is extant of his, ' Via Intelligentie. A Sermon preached to the University of Dublin: Shewing by what means the Scholars shall become most Learned and most Usefull.' Lond. 1662. 4to.

(13) Athen. col. 405.

(14) Col. 403.

(15) W. Harris, ubi supra.

advantage, and more at length, by his successor, Bishop Rust [I]; the conclusion of which is in these words. ' This great Prelate had the good-humour of a Gentleman, the eloquence of an Orator, the fancy of a Poet, the acuteness of a Schoolman, the profoundness of a Philosopher, the wisdom of a Chancellor, the sagacity of a Prophet, the reason of an Angel, and the piety of a Saint. He had devotion enough for a Cloister, learning enough for an University, and wit enough for a College of Virtuosi. And had his parts and endowments been parcelled out among his poor Clergy that he left behind him, it would perhaps have made one of the best dioceses in the world.'

[I] But his character is given to greater advantage, and more at length, by his successor, Bishop Rust.] The chief part of it is in these words . . . ' He was none of God's ordinary works, but his Endowments were so many and so great, as really made him a Miracle. Nature had befriended him much in his Constitution; for he was a person of a most sweet and obliging humour, of great candour and ingenuity; and there was so much of salt, and fineness of wit, and prettiness of address in his familiar discourses, as made his conversation have all the pleasantness of a comedy, and all the usefulness of a sermon. His soul was made up of Harmony, and he never spoke but he charmed his hearer, not only with the clearness of his reason, but all his words, and his very tone and cadences, were strangely musical. But that which did most of all captivate and enrich, was the gaiety and richness of his fancy. For he had much in him of that natural Enthusiasm, that inspires all great Poets and Orators; and there was a generous ferment in his blood and spirits, that set his fancy bravely at work, and made it swell and teem, and become pregnant, to such degrees of luxuriance; as nothing but the greatness of his wit and judgment could have kept it within due bounds and measures. And indeed it was a rare mixture, and a single instance hardly to be found in any age. For the great Trier of Wits has told us, that there is a peculiar and several complexion required for wit and judgment and fancy; and yet all these might have been found in this great personage in their eminency and perfection. But that which made his wit and judgment so considerable, was the largeness and freedom of his spirit. For truth is plain and easy to a mind disentangled from superstition and prejudice. He was one of the Ἐλευθεριοί, a sort of brave Philosophers, that Laertius speaks of, that did not addict themselves to any particular sect, but ingenuously sought for truth among all the wrangling schools. And they found her miserably torn and rent to pieces, and parcelled into rags by the several contending parties, and so disfigured and mishapen, that it was hard to know her; but they made a shift to gather up her scattered limbs; which, as soon as they came together, by a strange sympathy and con-naturalness, presently united into a lovely and beautiful body. This was the spirit of this great man; he weighed men's reasons, and not their names, and was not scared with the ugly vizars men usually put upon persons they hate, and opinions they dislike; nor affrighted with the anathemas and execrations of an infallible chair; which he looked upon only as bugbears to terrify weak and childish minds. He considered, that it is not likely any one party should wholly engross truth to themselves; that obedience is the only way to true knowledge (which is an argument that he hath managed rarely well in that excellent sermon of his (16), which he calls Via Intelligentiæ;) that God always, and only teaches, docible and ingenuous minds, that are willing to hear, and ready to obey according to their light; that it is impossible a pure, humble, resigned, God-like, soul should be kept out of heaven, whatever mistakes it might be subject to in this state of mortality; that the design of heaven is not to fill men's heads, and feed their curiosities, but to better their hearts, and mend their lives. Such considerations as these made him impartial in his disquisitions, and give a due allowance to the reasons of his adversary, and contend for truth, and not for victory. To these advantages of nature, and excellency of his spirit, he added an indefatigable industry, and God gave a plentiful benediction; for there were very few kinds of learning but he was a mythes and a great master in them. He was a rare Humanist, and hugely versed in all the polite parts of Learning, and thoroughly concocted all the antient Moralists, Greek and Roman Poets and Orators; and was not unacquainted with the refined wits of the later ages, whether French or Italian. But he had not only the accomplishments of a Gentleman, but so universal were his parts, that they were proportioned to every thing. And though his spirit and humour were made up of smoothness and gentleness, yet he could bear with the harshness and roughness of the schools, and was not unseen in their subtilties and spinosities, and upon occasion could make them serve his purpose. And yet it is believed he thought many of them very near akin to the famous Knight of the Mancha, and would make sport sometimes with the romantic sophistry, and fantastick adventures of school-errantry. His skill was great both in the Civil and Canon Law, and Casuistical Divinity; and he was a rare conductor of souls; and knew how to counsel and to advise; to solve difficulties, and determine cases, and quiet consciences. . . . He understood what the several parties in Christendom have to say for themselves; and could plead their cause to better advantage than any advocate of their tribe; and when he had done, he could confute them too, and shew that better arguments than ever they could produce for themselves, would afford no sufficient ground for their fond opinions. We shall add only his great acquaintance with the Fathers and Ecclesiastical Writers, and the Doctors of the first and purest ages both of the Greek and Latin Church; which he has made use of against the Romanists, to vindicate the Church of England from the challenge of innovation, and prove her to be truly antient, catholic, and apostolical. But religion and virtue is the crown of all other accomplishments, and it was the glory of this great man to be thought a Christian; and whatever you added to it, he looked upon as a term of diminution. And yet he was a zealous Son of the Church of England; but that was, because he judged her (and with great reason) a Church the most purely Christian of any in the world. In his younger years he met with some assaults from Popery, and the high pretensions of their religious orders were very accommodate to his devotional temper. But he was always so much master of himself, that he would never be governed by any thing but reason, and the evidence of truth; which engaged him in the studies of these controversies; and to how good purpose, the world is by this time a sufficient witness. But the longer and the more he considered, the worse he liked the Roman cause; and became at last to censure them with some severity; but I have so great an opinion of his judgment, and the charitableness of his spirit, that I am afraid he did not think worse of them than they deserve. He was a person of great Humility; and notwithstanding his stupendous parts and learning, and eminency of place, he had nothing in him of pride and humour, but was courteous and affable, and of easy access, and would lend a ready ear to the complaints, yea to the impertinencies of the meanest persons. His humility was coupled with an extraordinary Piety; and it is believed he spent the greatest part of his time in heaven. His solemn hours of prayer took up a considerable portion of his life. . . . But he was not only a good man God-ward, but he was come to the top of St Peter's gradation, and to all his virtues added a large and diffusive Charity. And whoever compares his plentiful incomes with the inconsiderable estate he left at his death, will be easily convinced, that Charity was steward for a great proportion of his revenue. But the hungry that he fed, and the naked that he clothed, and the distressed that he supplied, and the fatherless that he provided for; the poor children that he put apprentice, and brought up at school, and maintained at the University, will now sound a trumpet to that Charity, which he dispersed with his right hand, but would not suffer his left hand to have any knowledge of it.'

(16) See note [H].

TEMPLE [Sir WILLIAM], an eminent Statesman (), and polite Writer, was sprung from a younger branch of the same stock with the late Sir Richard Temple, Lord Viscount and Baron Cobham, who carried up his original as high as to Leoric, or Leofric, Earl of Chester, in the time of King Ethelbald, anno 710 (a); from whom descended the first Earl of Leicester, Leofric, chiefly instrumental in raising Edward the Confessor to the throne, as well as his successor, Harold [A]; and was ancestor to Edwin, sometimes stiled Earl of Leicester and Coventry, who is said to have assumed the surname of Temple, from the manor of Temple in the hundred of Sparken-hall, standing in Welleborough in Leicestershire (b). This stock was divided into two branches by Nicholas Temple, living in 1372, in the forty-sixth year of the reign of Edward III, who had two sons, Robert and Thomas, of whom Robert, the elder, was seated at Temple-hall near Bosworth in Leicestershire (c), and by the gift of his father having lands at Burton under Needwood in Staffordshire, his son, stiled Richard Temple of Burton, siding with Richard III, forfeited most of his estate, and died in 1507, being ancestor to the family of Temple-hall. From Thomas, the youngest son of Nicholas, descended Peter, who became Lord of the manor of Stow in Buckinghamshire, whose posterity settling there, were ancestors to Viscount Cobham, above mentioned. Peter's youngest son, Anthony, was father of Sir William Temple, who being educated at Eton-school, became Fellow of King's College in Cambridge, A. M. and master of the Free-school at Lincoln. He was intended for the law, but having a turn to philosophy, he wrote two treatises upon that subject in very elegant Latin (d). One of which being printed in 1581, with a dedication to Sir Philip Sidney, that Gentleman took him into his patronage, prevailed with him to leave the College, and attend him as his Secretary, when he was made Governor of Flushing and Ramekins. Sir Philip died in the arms of this Secretary, to whom he bequeathed thirty pounds per ann. for life, having also taken care to recommend him to the Earl of Essex, who employed him as his Secretary till his tragical end, in 1600; a stroke which proved fatal to Mr Temple, who not only fell with the Earl from the prospect he had of making his fortune, but was persecuted by Secretary Cecil, from whose resentment being obliged to retire into Ireland, he accepted of the Provostship of Dublin-College, in 1609, at the solicitation of Archbishop Usher (e), and in the Parliament of 1613 was its representative. He was knighted May 4, 1622, by the Lord St John, having been made, January 31, 1609, a Master in Chancery, in which he was continued, April 16, 1625, by King Charles I. He died in January 1626-7, in the seventy-third year of his age, and was buried in his College-chapel at Dublin (f), leaving, besides three daughters, two sons, John and Thomas; the eldest of whom, Sir John Temple, was father to the subject of the present article, Sir William Temple, Bart. who was born in London in 1628, and being first sent to school at Penshurst in Kent, under the care of his uncle, the celebrated Dr Hammond, then Minister of that parish, was removed thence, at ten years of age, to Mr Leigh, schoolmaster of Bishop Stortford in Hertfordshire. Having attained a competency of Greek and Latin there at the age of fifteen, he returned home (g); being hindered, by the disorders of the time, from going to the University, so that he was seventeen years old when he went to Cambridge, where he was placed under the tuition of the learned Dr Cudworth, then Fellow of Emanuel-College (h). His father, being a Statesman (i), seems to have designed his son for the same way of life. In which view, after two years spent at Cambridge, chiefly in acquiring a competency of French and Spanish, the two most useful languages for the purpose, he was sent abroad to compleat the plan of his education. He began his travels into France, in 1648, and chusing to pass through the Isle of Wight, where his Majesty was then Prisoner, he met there with Mrs Dorothy Osborn, second daughter to Sir Peter Osborn of Chickland in Bedfordshire, then Governor of Guernsey for the King; who being then on a journey with her brother to their father at St Maloes, our young Traveller joined them, and there began an honourable amour with the young Lady, which at the end of seven years concluded in a happy marriage. In the interim, Mr Temple passed two years in France, and having learned that language perfectly, he soon after made a tour into Holland, Flanders, and Germany, in which he acquired a compleat mastery of the Spanish. He returned in 1654, and marrying Mrs Osborn, passed his time privately with his father, two brothers, and a sister, then in Ireland, all happy in that perfect harmony, which has been so often taken notice of in their family. As he rejected all solicitations for accepting any employment under the Usurper, the five years he lived here, were spent chiefly in his closet, improving himself in history and philosophy (k). But at the Restoration, in 1660, being chosen a Member of the Convention in Ireland, while every body was trying to make their court to the King, he opposed the Poll-bill with such a spirit, as made a great deal of talk [B], and brought him into more conversation and business, than he had been used to in that country. In the succeeding Parliament, in 1661, he was chosen, with his father, for the County of Caslow, and often turned the house, in their warmest debates, by never entering into any of their parties () Especially for foreign affairs.

(a) Lord Cobham had the pedigree distinct from King John's time, when they were possessed of great estates. Collins's Peerage.

(b) This estate being sold out of the family, Sir William, as well as his father, often endeavoured to purchase it, but in vain.

(d) The title of one is, Pro Mollidupetti de unica methodo definitionis-commentatio. The other is, Nonnullarum e Phisicis et Ethicis explicatio, &c. He also published Epistola de Rami dialectica et Analysis Anglica triginta Praeiorum &c. Lon. 1611. 8vo.

(f) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 122, 123, and Lodge's Peerage of Ireland.

(g) He used to say, he was beholden to his master for all he knew of Greek and Latin. His Life, p. ix. prefixed to his Works, Edit. 1757. in four Vols. 8vo.

(i) See the account of him in Rem. [1].

(k) During this space he had five children, which he buried at Dublin. His Life, as before, p. x.

(b) This manor was given by the old Earls of Leicester to the Knights Templars, who usually gave the name of Temple to their Lands, and they granted it to one whose family was called Temple, of great account and livelihood in those parts. Burton's Leicester-shire.

(a) His Grace had declined the offer of it. See his article. It was a very troublesome and difficult province, on account of the unsettled state of the College at that time; and many years afterwards we find the Archbishop intimating, that Mr Temple was not able to manage it. See P. 114, 115, among the Letters in the Appendix to the Archbishop's Life by Dr Parr. (b) See Dr Cudworth's Article, and Carter's Hist. of Cambridge, under this College.

(1) Irish peerage by Lodge, under the family of Temple.

[A] Leofric the first Earl of Leicester. This earl married the famous Godina, who rode naked through Coventry in the day-time, to regain the citizens their privileges, which they had forfeited by offending their lord her husband, and to free them from the taxes by which they were oppressed. Leofric died August 31, 1057, and was buried in the monastery which he had founded at Coventry, and which he had endowed with twenty-four lordships, besides enriching it with a prodigious quantity of silver utensils, so that it was one of the most magnificent houses of the kind then in England (1).

[B] He opposed the Poll-bill, &c.] Though he and many others thought it to the height of what the nation could bear, the lords justices, whilst it was debating, sent a message to the house to desire it might be doubled, which (among a great many that disliked it) Sir William Temple only opposed, though the rest afterwards joined with him: the lords justices, hearing whence the difficulty arose, sent some to reason with him: his answer was, that he had nothing to say to it out of the house, where they chose a time to pass it in his absence (2).

(2) His Life, p. x. ubi supra.

or factions. In 1662, he was chosen one of the Commissioners to be sent from that Parliament to the King, and took this opportunity of waiting on the new Lord Lieutenant, the Duke of Ormond, then at London. He returned into Ireland soon after, but with a resolution of quitting that Kingdom, and removing his family to England. On his return, he observed a very different countenance in the Duke of Ormond (now at Dublin) (l) from what he had found before, and soon grew to have such a share in his kindness and esteem, that the Duke complained of him, as the only man in Ireland that had never asked him any thing: and when Mr Temple mentioned his design of carrying his family to England, his Grace said, he should at least give him leave to write in his favour to the two great Ministers, the Lord Chancellor [Clarendon], and the Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State; and the Duke did it so much to his advantage, that it was this recommendation which gave Sir William the first entrance into their good graces, and to the good opinion of the King (m), which he made no other use of, than to tell Lord Arlington, that if his Majesty had any employment abroad, which he thought such a man as he capable of serving him in, he should be very happy in it; but desired it might not carry him into the northern climates, to which he had a great aversion. Lord Arlington replied, he was sorry for it, because there was at that time no other undisposed of, but that of going Envoy to Sweden (n). However, in 1665, about the beginning of the first Dutch war, the same Lord sent him a message to come immediately to his house, which he did, and found his Lordship's business was to tell him, the King had occasion to send one abroad upon an affair of the greatest trust and importance, and that he had resolved to make him the first offer of it; but that he must know presently, whether he would accept of it or no, without telling him what it was, and be content to go in three or four days, without saying more of it to any of his friends: after a little consideration, he told that Lord, he took him to be his friend, and since he must consult with no one else, would be advised by him. His Lordship said, his advice was, that whether he liked it or no, he should not refuse it, as an entrance into his Majesty's service, and the way to something he might like better (o). The business was to go with a secret commission to the Bishop of Munster, with which he set out on August 2, and executed it so greatly to the satisfaction of King Charles II. [C], that upon his return from that Prelate's Court to Brussels, his Majesty sent him a commission to take the character of Resident there, with a Patent for a Baronet (p). Brussels being the place he had wished for in his travels so many years before, Sir William, April 1666, sent for his family (q); but before their arrival, was posted again into Munster. For upon the Bishop's listening to terms of accommodation with France, our Resident having wrote two letters in vain to dissuade him from that alliance, went in disguise on the same errand to Munster [D], where, though he came too late to fix that Prince in his first alliance, yet he engaged him for five or six thousand of his best troops into Spanish service. This done, he returned to Brussels, where he passed a year with great pleasure and satisfaction. Two months after the conclusion of the peace with the Dutch at Breda, our Resident's sister, who lived with him at Brussels, taking a strong fancy to see Holland, he was willing to give her that satisfaction, and went thither incognito. But while he was at the Hague, he made a private visit to M. De Witt, in which occasional interview, he laid the foundation of the great intimacy and confidence that grew afterwards between them (r). In the spring of 1667, a new war broke out between France and Spain, which bringing Brussels in danger of falling into the hands of the former, Sir William sent his Lady and family into England, but staid there with his sister till Christmas following, when the King sent for him to come over privately to England, and taking the Hague in his way, there to make De Witt another visit (s). He did so, and then, pursuant to his instructions, (l) The Duke was declared Lord Lieutenant in Oct. 1662, but did not arrive in Ireland till July 1663. See his article, where this last date is omitted, for which we must ask the Reader's pardon.

(n) His Life, p. xi.

(o) Letter to his father of Sept. 6, 1665, which is the first in the Collection of his Letters.

(p) He says, the officers were more easy than he expected in his Patent- fees. Letters to Mr Godolphin, April 1, 1666. In which he mentions that Gentleman's visit to his Lady at Sheen.

(r) Letter to his brother, Sir John Temple, Octob. 10, N. S. 1667.

(3) His perfect knowledge of the Latin (which he had retained) was of no small advantage to him, the bishop conversing in no other language.

(4) The four first of his letters, viz. to his father, alderman Backwell, lord Arlington, and the duke of Ormond.

[C] He executed his commission to the King's mind.] He went, without either train or character, to Coesvelt, where the Bishop then was, and in three nights (for he kept close in the day-time) perfected and signed the treaty (3), and then returned to Brussels, where alderman Backwell made the first and great payment of the subsidies the King was to give the Bishop, and soon after received the news that the Bishop was in the field, by which this negotiation began first to be discovered; but no body suspected the part he had in it, and he continued privately at Brussels, till it was whispered to the marquis Castel Rodrigo, their governor, that he came upon some particular errand, (which he was then at liberty to own) who thereupon sent to desire his acquaintance, to which he easily consented, and, in some private conferences, the marquis representing to him the mutual necessity of a conjunction between England and Spain, upon advice that the French were marching to the assistance of the Hollanders; these overtures the court of England thought fit to entertain, and therefore appointed him resident (4).

[D] He went in disguise on the same errand.] He passed for a Spanish envoy, having twenty Spanish guards to attend him. Thus he went first to Dusseldorp, where the duke of Newburgh, though in the French interest, gave him a guard to Dortmund; but, on his arrival there, the gates being shut, he was forced to go to a village about a league's distance, which being full of Brandenburg troops, he was obliged to eat and lodge in a barn upon straw, with his page for a pillow. The page heard one of the Brandenburg soldiers ask some of his guards after an English envoy who was expected, the fellow said he was upon the road, and would be at Dortmund in a day or two. He was next day entertained, at a castle of the bishop of Munster, by one Gorges, a Scotch lieutenant-general in that prelate's service, with what he calls a very episcopal way of drinking. Coming into the great hall, where stood many flagons ready charged, the general called for wine to drink the King's health. They brought him a formal bell of silver, that might hold about two quarts. He took it, pulled out the clapper, and, giving that to Sir William, to whom he intended to drink, had the bell filled, drunk it off to his Majesty's health, and then asking Sir William for the clapper, put it on, turned down the bell, and rung it out to shew he had played fair, and left nothing in it: this done, he took out the clapper, desired Sir William to give it to whom he pleased, then gave his bell to be filled again, and brought it to Sir William: he, being never used to drink, and seldom would try, had commonly some gentleman with him that would serve for that purpose, when it was necessary; and so he had the entertainment of seeing this health go current through about a dozen hands, with no more share in it than just what he pleased (5).

(m) Sir William always preserved a grateful remembrance of this favour, kept a correspondence with his Grace, and warmly defended him against the attempt of Lord Essex to displace him from the Government of Ireland. Temple's Letters and Memoirs, Part III.

(q) His Life, p. x. He lent his house at Sheen to my Lord Lisle. Letter to that Lord from Brussels, Aug. 1666.

(s) Letter to his father from London, January 2, N. S. 1668, in which he takes notice, that his sister accompanied him to London, and resolved to return with him to the Hague, when his brother Harry resolved also to be of the party.

(5) His letter to his father of May 10, N. S. 1666.

proposed those overtures that produced the Triple Alliance; to perfect which, immediately after his arrival at the English Court, he returned, January 16, 1668, N. S. in five days, with the character of Envoy extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Holland (t), where the conferences being opened two days after, he brought that treaty to a perfect conclusion in five days more. The ratifications of this alliance being exchanged on the fifteenth of February (u) following, he repaired to Brussels, and a treaty being set on foot between France and Spain at Les-la-Cocqelle, he set out for that place on the 24th of April, in quality of his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary, and Mediator. He arrived there on the 27th, and it was chiefly owing to his assistance (v), that the Spaniard was brought to sign the articles of that peace on the 2d of May. This service being compleated, he returned to Brussels on the 9th of that month, without any other thoughts than to remain in that city in his former station of Resident. But upon his arrival there, he met with letters from the Earl of Arlington that brought him the King's orders to continue in the equipage of an Ambassador, in order to serve his Majesty in the same quality in Holland: where, upon occasion of the late alliances, his Majesty was resolved to renew a character which the Crown of England had discontinued since King James's time (*). Sir William being now left at liberty to return to England as soon as he pleased, embraced the opportunity, and returning by the way of Holland, left most of his domestics and equipage at Utrecht. Upon his arrival at London, he was received with all possible demonstrations of favour, both by King and Court. If he had been forward to press his fortune (and he was put in mind of it enough by his friends (†)) he would not have slight the advantage of coming home with so general an opinion of great merits: but he thought himself sufficiently rewarded by the honour of serving his Majesty (x). The Spanish Ambassador, and Baron d'Isola, the Emperor's Envoy, as well as other of his friends, would needs have asked the Peerage for him, and it was with difficulty enough, that he prevented it; but it was what he never coveted, and was resolved, if it were ever offered him, it should either begin with his father, or his son (y). All difficulties being removed for his departure to Holland [E], he set out, and arrived at the Hague with his new character of the King's Ambassador, in the latter end of August, 1668 (z). He was received and distinguished by all the marks of regard and esteem they could express for his character and person, and by the good opinion he had gained, was able to bring the state into such measures, as M. De Witt said, he was sure was not in the power of any other man to do. He lived in confidence with that great Minister, by order from the King, and in constant and familiar conversation with the Prince of Orange, then eighteen years old. He likewise compassed the chief design of his embassy, in engaging the Emperor and Spain in the measures that were then desired (aa). But in the interim happened Madam's journey to England, so well known to have changed them all (bb). And though Sir William had observed a disposition in the Court before, to complain of the Dutch upon small occasions, very unlike what he left it in; yet he suspected nothing till Lord Arlington, in September 1669, hurried him over, by telling him, as soon as he received his letter, he should put his foot in the stirrup. When he came to his Lordship, whom he always saw first, he found he had not one word to say to him, and after making him wait a great while, only asked him several indifferent questions about his journey; and he was received next day as coldly by the King. The secret soon came out, and Sir William Temple was pressed to return to the Hague, and make way for a war with Holland. But he excused himself from having any share in it; which so much provoked the Lord Treasurer Clifford, that he refused to pay him an arrear of two thousand pounds, due from his embassy. All this passed without unkindness from the King (cc); but my Lord Arlington's usage, so unlike the friendship he had professed, was resented by our Ambassador, who now retired to his house at Sheen near Richmond in Surry [F] (dd); and in this interval of his leisure and retreat, he writ his

Observations

[E] All difficulties being removed for his departure.] The chief of these were some new regulations in the Exchequer concerning foreign employments, which brought down the equipage-money of ambassadors from 3000l. to 1500l. in France and Spain, and to 1000l. in all other courts; and their allowance from 100l. a week to 10l. a day in France and Spain, and to 7l. a day in other places. This was pretended to be only a necessary scheme of parsimony; but Sir William took it as aimed at him in spite, and resented it the more, because he found, by the short experience of his last embassy, this would not defray the expence of another with any honour to the King or himself; and though, says he, I do not pretend to make my fortune by these employments, yet I confess I do not pretend to run it neither. He had therefore several times resolved to refuse this embassy, unless it were upon the old terms; but at last yielded to the solicitations and arguments of Lord Arlington, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and especially Sir Robert Long, who observed, that, after a year or two of this embassy, he could not fail of being either secretary of state, or sent ambassador into Spain, 'which, says Sir William, are both certain ways of making any man's fortune (†).'

[F] He returned to Sheen.] How he passed his time there, appears from a letter, dated November 22, 1670, to his father, in which he writes thus (7): 'Sir,

I must make my humble acknowledgments for so great a present as you have been pleased to send me towards that expence I have resolved to make at Sheen; and assure you no part of it shall either go any other way, or lessen what I had intended of my own. I doubt not but to compass what I told you of my Lord Lisle, for enlarging my small territories there; when that is done, I propose to bestow 1000l. upon the conveniencies of the house and garden, and hope that will reach all I care for; so that your 500l. (8) may be laid out rather for ornament than use, as you seem to desire, by ordering me to make the front perfectly uniform.' His father having shewn a dislike of his hasty resolve to retire absolutely from public affairs, and throwing up all his pretensions from the Court, in this letter he lays before him the whole grounds of that resolution, submitting the whole with great duty and respect to his father's censure. These it should seem had brought the old gentleman into his way of thinking; for, in another letter to his father, dated September 14, 1671 (9), wherein he gives him an account of the safe arrival in England of his wife and family: 'All people, says he, are full of the poliicks and expectations of what will be next, which you must expect to hear from Gazettes, and no more from me, who shall not so much as enquire or care to know, but return to my corner at Sheen,

(t) His brother Henry went over with him, as did also Lord Stafford, by way of education for state-business. Temple's Letters, Vol. I. p. 70.

(u) Sir Leoline Jenkins was the other mediator. Gen. List. of England.

(x) After resigning all public business, he declared with much satisfaction, that he never had acted either for Honours, Places, or Money. Memoirs, Part III. sub finem.

(y) A son of Sir Charles Wootley accompanied him in this embassy for education, and Sir William received his father's acknowledgment for his kindness to the young gentleman. His Letters, Vol. III. p. 83.

(z) Who made him a present of the plate belonging to his Embassy, and he put off his house and a good part of the furniture to Sir George Downing, who succeeded him. Letters, Vol. II. p. 310, 311.

(dd) His Life, p. xiv. as before. The Writer of which tells us, p. xv. he had purchased this house some time before, probably soon after his first coming with his family to England, since he appears to be possessed of it before his first employment abroad, in 1665. See his first Letter to his father at the head of his Letters.

(8) He afterwards tells his father, that, in acknowledgment of this present, he had sent over for his Spanish horse, and intended to send a groom with him to Dublin.

(9) Ibid. p. 3021

After leaving Sir William, he all embraced with much satisfaction and joy, and I say upon that occasion, A Breve comme un freres. Letter to Lord Arlington from the Hague, Jan. 4, N. S. 1668.

Letter of Lord Arlington, dated May 8, N. S. 1668.

He esteemed Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir John Trevor, and Sir Robert Long, as his best friends.

Letters to his father from London, July 22, 1668.

Gen. Hist. of England.

The Duke of Buckingham, and some other courtiers of wit and humour, began now to ridicule Sir William's formal gravity, as well as his political capacity, Sir William, as appears from the course of his Letters, being remarkable for understanding the ceremonies of business, and placing a great stress upon them, as of service in procuring success to any negotiations.

Letter to his father from London, July 22, 1668.

Vol. II. of Letters, 1685.

(22) His Life,
p. xvi.

(ff) The other point, of withdrawing the English troops from the French service, was compassed, by private engagements, to suffer them to wear out, without sending any recruits, and send no new ones while the states were permitted to make what levies they pleased in his Majesty's dominions.

(*) Letter to Lord Bolingbroke. See his article.

(10) His letters, Vol. I. p. 125.

(11) In his Essay on the gardens of Epicurus, he boasts of having had the honour of bringing over four sorts of grapes into England.

(2) He was author of a book, entitled, The Ambassador greatly esteemed. He translated this treatise of Sir William's into French.

(13) In Vol. II. p. 316.

(14) In the second volume of his works, edit. 1757, in 4 vols. 370.

Observations on the United Provinces; and one part of his Miscellanies (ee), in the time of the second Dutch war. However, about the end of the summer, 1673, the King growing weary of that war, sent for Sir William, who was always wanted upon that occasion, to go into Holland, and conclude the peace; but powers having been sent at this time from thence to the Marquis de Frefno, the Spanish Ambassador at London, Sir William was ordered to treat it with him, and it was concluded in three days, and the point of the flag carried, that had been so long contested (ff). In June, 1674, he was again sent Ambassador into Holland [G], with offer of the King's mediation between France and the Confederates, then at war, which was not long after accepted, and Lord Berkeley, Sir William Temple, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, were declared Ambassadors and Mediators, and Nimeguen (which Sir William had proposed) was consented to, at last, by all parties to be the place of Treaty. During his stay at the Hague, the Prince of Orange, who was fond of speaking English, and of their plain way of eating, constantly dined and supped once or twice a week at his house, who thereby grew so much in the Prince's esteem and confidence, as gave him the great part he had in that considerable affair of his marriage with Lady Mary,

Sheen, and endeavour to pass the rest of my life as quietly and innocently as I can, and for the rest, like a private man, run the fortune of my country. I have been long enough in courts and public business to know a great deal of the world and of myself, and to find that we are not made for one another, and that neither of us are like to alter either our natures or our customs, and that, in the course and period of public government, as well as private life, quisque suos patimur manes. Every one sees that these strains were the pure effects of peevishness and chagrin, arising from his disappointment by the counsels which then prevailed at court, as is evident from his subsequent conduct. Besides, Sir William had not been in business much above five or six years, and was but little turned of forty, a time of life not very compatible (as his amanuensis Dr Swift pleasantly observes upon another occasion (*)) with settling in a corner to form conclusions de contemptu mundi & fuga seculi. There is no doubt but he always took great delight in improving his situation at Sheen, which he expresses in a letter to Lord Lisle from Brussels, August, 1667 (10), before his first coming over to England. The best on it is, says he, my heart is set so much upon my little corner at Sheen, that, while I keep that, no other disappointments will be very sensible to me; and because my wife tells me she is so bold as to enter into talk of enlarging our dominions there, I am contriving here this summer, how a succession of cherries may be compassed from May to Michaelmas, and how the riches of Sheen vines may be improved by half a dozen sorts which are not yet known there, and which I think much beyond any that are (11). During this retreat, towards the latter end of the year 1672, he writ his Observations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands, as above mentioned, to which he alludes in a letter to Mr. de Wicquefort, dated October 10 that year (12). I will not tell you, says he, that I have succeeded so well in my small country designs, as I have sometimes done in great ones: But if ever any favourable accident (and this age produces strange ones enough) should bring you hither, I would let you see that our buildings are not altogether without neatness: at least I would make you confess, that the fruits of my garden have another taste than those of my closet, and will keep better than those of my embassies (13).

[G] He was sent Ambassador into Holland in June, 1674.] Though this prevented our minister from having an immediate hand in negotiating the famous treaty which was concluded with the Dutch on the 1st of December this year at London, containing the stipulation, that free ships should make free goods; yet, as he was principally concerned in making the former treaty with the States, concluded at the Hague on the 17th of February, 1667-8, containing the same stipulation, it is worth while to see his opinion of it, as it appears in a letter from him to Sir Joseph Williamson, as follows (14):

Sir,
Hague, Nov. 6, N. S. 1674.
I was extremely glad to find by yours of the 20th and 30th past, that his Majesty had resolved to support me, in the claim I had made here, of a free trade for all our ships, and the merchandizes they carry (if not contraband) without any exception of their trading from one Enemy's port to another, which can't, I am sure, be drawn from the words of the articles. This made me confident, even before the arrival of your letters, by a second Memorial to the States General, as demand the restitution of the Rebecca, and to tell them very plainly, that if any disputes might arise from the sense of any articles in treaties subsisting between his Majesty and them, they could not be resolved without his Majesty's consent, and till that was obtained, they could not make themselves the sole Judges, or Interpreters, against the plain common sense of any words, and to the prejudice of his Majesty's subjects. This was the point I put all the weight upon in my Memorial. But having the day after received his Majesty's pleasure, with your account of what had passed here in your return this way, and your arguments upon this subject, I demanded an hour of the Pensioner, and had a very long debate with him upon this matter. The heads of his arguments were, the judgment he pretended of several Authors upon it, and the practice of France, Spain, and Sweden, with them and ourselves in the time of his late Majesty and King James, which he undertook to give me examples of; and lastly, that it could not be the meaning, to drive an Enemy's trade, but only to preserve a friend's. I easily eluded this last, by the answer I made it, and by my own free protestation, that at my signing the confirmation of those articles, I had no such sense of them, as he would now give them; but took the meaning of them to be just the same with the words, that free ships made free goods in all cases, unless that of contraband. For the sense of Authors wrote upon general theories, and for their own credit, and that of their profession, I said they could not be admitted to interpret any particular treaties between Princes and States, who might make what agreement they pleased between themselves, and very different from what Authors call Jus gentium, or general reason, by which I think they commonly mean their own; that for the practice of other Kings, with them it was no rule of theirs with his Majesty, nor any agreement that he should not have justice from them, because they could not obtain it from others; but, on the contrary, though they had it not, yet they ever demanded it, both from France and Spain, which was a certain proof, that they esteemed that just in their own case, which they will not allow to be so in ours; that for the practice he offered to produce on our parts in his late Majesty's time, I should be content to see it, but could not tell how it could square with the present case, since it was granted by articles never in force between his Majesty and the States, till the treaty of Breda. I added, to what I said in my Memorial upon the subject of their pretences to make a forced interpretation of plain words, without his Majesty's consent, that it was not fair to do it at this time, when the advantage of such an article was only cast on our side by the common revolutions of war and peace, which might be in their favour to-morrow, as they were on ours to-day. Whereas, when the advantage was by like accidents cast on their side, as it had been with France and Spain, they had ever insisted on the very same points, that we do now, and never given over their instances upon it, whether they received satisfaction, or no. After a long and warm debate, I gained this from the Pensioner, that for his own part, he was content it should be as I desired it, since the King understood it so, and it was to be reciprocal between us. That he could do nothing upon it in the States General, till the States of Holland assembled, which would be about a fortnight hence; that he would then propose it there, and endeavour their compliance with his Majesty, especially if the Prince, at his return, approved of it: and that in the mean time,

Mary, so well known in the world, and so particularly related in his Memoirs [H]. In July, 1676, he removed his family to Nimeguen, where he passed that year without making any progress in the treaty; and the year after, his son was sent over with letters from the Lord Treasurer, ordering him to return and succeed Mr Coventry in his place of Secretary of State [I]. Sir William came to England in the spring of the year 1667-8; and though the affair of the Secretary's place was dropped at his desire (gg), he did not return to Nimeguen that year. About this time, the Prince having the King's leave to come over, soon after married Lady Mary (hh); and from this happened another occasion of unkindness between Lord Arlington and Sir William [K]. Lord Treasurer [Osborn] (who was related to Sir William's lady) and he, being only in the secret of all that affair after the Prince and Princess were gone into Holland, the inclination at Court always leaning towards France, the King would have engaged Sir William Temple in some negotiations with that Crown, with which he was so ill satisfied, that he offered to give up his pretensions to the Secretary's Place, and desiring my Lord Treasurer to acquaint his Majesty with it, he went to Sheen, in hopes of being taken at his word. But upon discovery of the French designs not to evacuate the Spanish towns, agreed on by the treaty to be delivered up, the King commanded him to go upon a third embassy to the States with whom he concluded a treaty, by which England was engaged, upon the refusal of the French to evacuate the towns in forty days, to declare immediate war with France; but before half the time was run out, one Du Crofs (ii) was sent from our Court into Holland upon an errand that damped all the good humour that treaty had given them there, and the life it had put into all their affairs; and such sudden and surprizing changes in our own, which Sir William Temple had seen too often to be astonished at, gave him a distaste to all public employments (kk). In 1679, he went back to Nimeguen, where the French delayed signing the treaty till the last hour, which, after he

(gg) Upon this occasion, Lord Arlington said a very good thing, though not in very good humour: that some things were so ill in themselves, that the manner of doing them could not mend them; and others so good, that the manner they were done in could not spoil them; and that the Prince of Orange's march was of the last sort.

(hh) Growing weary, as Mr De Witt used to express it, of the perpetual fluctuation he had observed in all our Councils, since Queen Elizabeth's reign.

(ii) By contrasting this letter with the Memorials of both Courts, upon the subject in this war, and our proceeding at law upon it, will be seen how invariably, mutatis mutandis, each side hath been governed by the same rules and reasonings.

(16) His Life, p. xvi.

time, he would endeavour to get the goods in the Rebecca, or the product of them, deposited till the States came to a resolution in this matter, the ship itself being already free, and gone pursuant to the resolutions taken by the States in May last upon this point.

I have been longer in stating this matter, as it stands between me and the Pensioner, that being of so mighty importance to our trade at this time, his Majesty ought to see the right he had on his side, and be the firmer in maintaining it. And that you may please to instruct me in any further arguments, against I enter the lists with Commissioners here, if this should prove difficult, though the Pensioner be satisfied with it (15).

[H] Particulars related in his Memoirs.] One advantage he made of it from an accident that then happened, may be worth mentioning because he reckoned it himself among the good fortunes of his life. There were five Englishmen taken and brought to the Hague whilst he was there, and in the Prince's absence, who were immediately tried, and condemned, by a Council of war, for deserting their colours: some of his servants had the curiosity to visit their unfortunate countrymen, and came home with a deplorable story, that by what they had heard, it was a mistake; and that they were all like to die innocent; but, however, that it was without remedy; that their graves were digging, and they were to be shot next morning. Sir William left nothing unattempted to prevent their sudden execution, and sent to the Officers, threatening them that he would complain, first to the Prince, and then to the King, who, he was sure, would demand reparation, if so many of his Majesty's subjects suffered unjustly: but nothing would do, till he made it his last request to relieve them one day only. This being granted, the Prince happened to come that day within reach of an answer to a message he sent; upon which they were released. The first thing they did, was to go and see their graves, and the next, to come and thank Sir William Temple upon their knees (16).

[I] He returned to England upon a motion to succeed to the Secretary's Place.] He might be more willing to come to England to look after his private affairs upon the death of his father, which happened this year, 1677. Sir John Temple was born in 1600, bred first under his father, in Dublin-College, but went early abroad for further accomplishments, and after his return was finished in the Court of King Charles I; by whom he was knighted, February 23, 1620, constituted Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and sworn of the Privy-Council there, being in particular confidence and friendship with the Earl of Leicester, then declared Lieutenant of Ireland, when the rebellion broke out, in which he was deeply engaged; and upon the changes in the King's counsels and affairs, he was imprisoned for opposing the cessation, which the Duke of Ormond was commanded to make with the Irish rebels. In 1644, he was exchanged, and sent for by the Parliament in England. In 1647, he was made one of the Commissioners in Munster, and one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal in Ireland, in 1648. He was a Member of Parliament, and sat in the English House of Commons, till he was disinfranchised among the Members excluded for voting, that his Majesty's concessions from the Isle of Wight, were a sufficient ground for a treaty of peace. From this time he continued privately in London, till Oliver, the Protector, in 1657, made him one of the Commissioners for settling the titles of the Irish to their Estates, and also their delinquency. He received many other favours from Oliver, and continued Master of the Rolls during the Usurpation, and also by King Charles II, and was sworn again of the Privy-Council. In 1651, he, with his eldest son, represented the County of Caslow; and in 1663, he was made Vice-Treasurer of the Kingdom. In July, 1666, he had a grant of the lands of Palmerston, in the County of Dublin. And dying in 1677, after he had that year given 100l. to be laid out in some additional buildings in the College of Dublin (17), he was buried there at his own request, in the same grave with his father. He wrote the History of the Irish Rebellion, which was published in 1611, 4to. 'A piece (says Dr Borlase in his history of that war) of that integrity few can equal, none exceed, he having as Privy-Counsellor an opportunity to view all dispatches, rarely obvious to others; and being singularly entire and ingenuous, adventured then into the lists, when some dared scarce think on the attempt: never any thing was objected against his account.' He married a sister of the famous Dr Hammond, and by her had four sons, and one daughter, who all, except one son, survived him, viz. William, John, Henry, and Martha. Sir William, in 1663, had a revisionary grant after his father's decease of the Mastership of the Rolls, for which he received a Patent, December, 1677, and enjoyed it till the surrendering thereof on May 29, 1696, to William (afterwards Lord) Berkeley. Sir William's younger brother, Sir John Temple, became the best Lawyer in Ireland (18), and his second son, Henry, was created Baron Temple of Mount Temple, and Viscount Palmerston, in 1722. Martha, Sir William's favourite sister, was married, April 21, 1662, to Sir Thomas Giffard of Cattlejordan, in the County of Kildare, Bart. who was buried at St Audson's Church in Dublin, on the 9th of May, the same year (19).

[K] The unkindness between Lord Arlington and him.] Lord Arlington's coldness to Sir William began from his early acquaintance with the Lord Treasurer [Danby] (they having travelled young together) and his relation to him by marriage, and he being now Chief Minister in Arlington's room, and they two living in the last degree of ill intelligence with one another, it was impossible to keep the favour of both, which was the true reason of Lord Arlington's falling out with him, with whom, from many circumstances, he could not afterwards live well (20).

(gg) Mr Coventry made some difficulties in resigning, unless he had leave to name his successor, which the King refused; therefore Sir William desired it might be left alone till all parties were agreed.

(ii) Sir William, in his Memoirs, Part II. p. 335, characterized Du Crofs in such a style, as provoked him to write an Answer; to which Sir William replied in 1693.

(17) On which account his heirs are empowered to dispose of two chambers in that College. See earl SWIFT'S articles.

(18) Lodge's Peerage of Ireland, ubi lupia.

(19) See more of him in Remark [N].

(20) His Life, p. xvii.

had

(mm) There was a design to impeach him in this Session, which he published in his Miscellanea, to let the world see that he was not a man of such dangerous principles.

(nn) Gen. Hist. of England.

(oo) Nor had he any public employment at home; but his character abroad still continued. Mr Coventry was succeeded in the Secretary's Office by Sir Leoline Jenkins.

(ss) He was thus employed, when happening to be at the Council on his Majesty's ordering the Parliament to be prorogued for a year, Sir William made that bold speech, which is inserted in remark [N].

(tt) His Life and Character, p. xix, xx.

(uu) He was opposed by the Bishop of Ely, who from a chapter in his Observations upon the Netherlands, thought Sir William was for such a toleration as he described to be in Holland. Memoirs, p. 513.

had concluded, he returned to the Hague, from whence he was soon sent for to enter upon the Secretary's Place, which Mr Coventry was at last resolved to part with. Accordingly he came over, and went to Court (ll), as all his friends hoped, with the design of entering upon that post; but he made a difficulty of it, because he was not in the House of Commons (mm), thinking the public business would suffer thereby in so critical a time: in which the contests between the two parties ran so high, that the King thought fit to send the Duke into Flanders, and the Parliament to put my Lord Treasurer [Danby] into the Tower (nn). After this, his Majesty again pressed Sir William to be Secretary of State, using for an argument, that he had now no body to consult with, at a time when he wanted the best advice. Hereupon Sir William, still declining the Secretary's place (oo), advised his Majesty to chuse a Council whom he should wholly trust and advise with: the King in a few days consented, and the choice of the persons was wholly concerted between his Majesty and Sir William; and the old Council, being dissolved four days after, this new one was established, of which Sir William Temple was one (pp). In 1680, the Counsels began again to be changed, upon the King's illness at the end of the summer, and the Duke of York's return privately to Court. In this Juncture, Sir William endeavouring to bring into the King's favour and business some persons to whom his Majesty had a dislike, if not an aversion, met with such treatment from them (qq) [L], as gave him a fresh distaste to Court and Councils, whither he seldom went, residing chiefly at Sheen. Soon after this, the King sent for him again, and proposed his going Ambassador into Spain (rr). Sir William complied, and set himself to prepare for it (ss); but when his equipage was almost ready, and part of the money for it paid, the King changed his mind, and told him, he would have him defer his journey till the end of the Sessions of Parliament, of which he was chosen a Member for the University of Cambridge (tt), in which the factions ran so high, that he saw it impossible to bring them to any temper. The Duke was sent into Scotland; that would not satisfy them, nor any thing but a bill of exclusion, against which he declared himself, saying, his endeavours should ever be to unite the Royal Family; but that he would never enter into any counsels to divide them (uu): and the last thing he did in Parliament, or Council, was on the 4th of January, to carry the King's last answer to the Commons Address of the 20th of December, containing his Majesty's resolution never to consent to the exclusion of the Duke of York [M]. But soon after this the Parliament being dissolved by his Majesty without the advice of his Privy-Council, contrary to what he had promised, Sir William made that bold speech against it, for which he was very ill used by some of those friends who had been most earnest in promoting the last change in the Ministry [N]. Upon this, he grew quite tired of public business, declined the offer he had of serving again for the University in the next Parliament, that was soon after called, and met at Oxford (ww); and seeing his Majesty's resolution to govern without his Parliament, and to supply his treasury another way, he went to Sheen a few days after, whence he sent the King word, by his son, that he would pass the rest of his life as good a subject as any in his Kingdoms, but would never more meddle

(ll) He now found himself above 7000l. in arrears at the treasury, and though with much trouble and delay he recovered the best part of that sum, yet 2200l. remained a desperate debt long after. Memoirs, p. 473.

(pp) Gen. Hist. of England. Lord Chancellor Finch, Lord Sunderland, and Lord Essex, thought it the greatest point that ever was gained by any Minister.

(qq) The particulars of which are published in the third Part of his Memoirs.

(rr) To give credit to an alliance, pretended to be made with that Crown against the meeting of the Parliament: upon which the French Ambassador, much dissatisfied, said, it was enough to give vigour to the Spanish Monarchy. Gen. Hist. of Engl.

(ww) He consulted his Majesty, who told him he might as well let it alone.

[L] Met with such treatment from them.] These were the Lords Essex and Hallifax, who, to the Duke, laid the scheme of the new Council upon Sir William; though after admitting Lord Shaftsbury and the Duke of Monmouth into it, which was done without his consent, he always declared his dislike of the Council. And he soon found an opportunity of defeating their malice, and of securing a good place in the Duke's favour, by assuring him, that whatever befell the King's affairs, or his Highness, he might always reckon upon him as a legal man, and one that would follow the Crown always, as became him; unless things should ever grow so desperate as to bring in Foreigners: at which the Duke laid his hand upon him, and bid him stick there, and he would desire no more of him (21).

[M] He carried the King's message to the House.] Mr Secretary Jenkins had been charged with it the night before at Council, but he was thought too unacceptable to the House for a message which was likely to prove so; and the next morning the King would have had either Sir Robert Carr, or Mr Godolphin to carry it. They both excusing themselves, the King sent for Sir William Temple, who told his Majesty, he did not very well understand why a thing agreed upon last night at Council-table, should be altered in his chamber; but that he was very willing, however, to obey him, and the rather, upon others having excused themselves, and to shew his Majesty that he intended to play no popular Games. Upon this he took the paper, telling the King he was very sensible how much of his confidence he formerly had, and how much he had lost, without knowing the occasion; or else he might have had part in consulting this change of what was last night resolved, as well, as in executing it; and he would confess to his Majesty, that he had not so good a stomach in business, as to be content only with swallowing what other people had chewed. This answer, Sir William says, is the only thing, he could imagine, the King could ever take ill of him. In proceeding, however, he declares his approbation of the message, which was his principal inducement for carrying it (22).

[N] He made a bold speech against it, &c.] The substance of it was, that he desired the King and Council never to lay aside the thoughts and endeavours of agreeing, either with this, or some other Parliament, as a matter of so great necessity to the state of his Majesty's affairs, both abroad, and at home. The Lord Hallifax answered him in a few words, that every body was sensible of the King's agreeing with his Parliament, though not with this: and Mr, afterwards Sir Edward, Seymour said, he perfectly agreed with Sir William Temple. He had, in the same disposition, spoken very freely before, upon the King's declaring his mind in the Council, without previously asking their advice, to prorogue the Parliament for a longer time than he had intended (23); and that he would hear nothing against it, charging the Lord Chancellor to proceed accordingly. Hereupon Sir William, being left out of this secret, stood up, and told the King, that as to the resolution he had taken, he would say nothing, because he was resolved to hear no reasoning upon it; therefore he would only presume to offer his Majesty his humble advice, as to the course of his future proceedings; which was, that his Majesty, in his affairs, would please to make use of some council or other, and allow freedom to their debates and advices, after hearing which, his Majesty might yet resolve as he pleased; that if he did not think the persons, or number of this present Council suited with his affairs, it was in his power to dissolve them, and constitute another of any number he pleased, and to alter them again when he would. But to make Counsellors that should not counsel, he doubted whether it was in his Majesty's power, or not, because it implied a contradiction: and, so far as he had observed, either of former ages, or the present; he questioned whether it was a thing had been practised in England by his Majesty's Predecessors, or was so now by any of the Princes in Christendom (24).

(22) Memoirs, Vol. III. p. 537.

(23) It was called to meet in October, 1679, but did not meet to do business till October, 1680. Gen. Hist. of England.

(24) Memoirs, Part III. By this speech he ruined for a while, his suit for his arrears on account of his Embassies, which had been just before settled to his satisfaction by Lord Sunderland, and agreed to by the King.

with

(21) Memoirs, Part III.

with public affairs: the King assured him that he was not at all angry (xx). And, indeed, the striking of his name out of the Privy-Council (yy), was no more than a necessary consequence of the Duke's returning, and the change of all measures. From this time Sir William lived at Sheen till the end of that reign, and for some time in the next. When having purchased a small seat, called Moor-Park, near Farnham in Surry, which he took a great fancy to for its solitude and retirement, and the healthy and pleasant situation; and being much afflicted with the gout, and broken with age and infirmities, he resolved to pass the remainder of his life there, and in November, 1686, in his way thither, waited on King James, then at Windsor, and begged his favour and protection to one that would always live a good subject, but whatever happened, never enter again upon any public employment; desiring his Majesty never to give credit to whatever he might hear to the contrary. The King, who used to say Sir William Temple's character was, always to be believed, promised him whatever he desired, made him some reproaches for not coming into his service, which he said was his own fault, and kept his word as faithfully to Sir William, as Sir William did to his Majesty, during the surprizing turn of affairs that soon after followed by the coming of the Prince of Orange: which, whatever people may suspect, was so great a secret to him, that there is nothing surer than that he was not only unacquainted with it, but one of the last men in England that believed it (zz). At the time of this happy Revolution, in 1688, Moor-Park growing unsafe by lying in the way of both armies, he went back to the house he had given up to his son at Sheen, whom he had denied leave, though importunately begged, to go and meet the Prince of Orange at his landing. But after King James's abdication, and the Prince's arrival at Windsor, Sir William went to wait upon his Highness, and carried his son. The Prince pressed him to enter into his service, and to be Secretary of State, and said it was in kindness to him that he had not been acquainted with his design (aaa); but his age and infirmities confirming him in the resolution not to meddle any more with public affairs, he was contented his son should enjoy his Majesty's favours. Hereupon Mr John Temple was made Secretary at War, in the room of Mr Blathwayt; but he had hardly been a week in his office, when he resolved to make away with himself, as he did on the 14th of April, 1689 [O]. Mr Temple being a very promising Gentleman, of great natural abilities, as well as personal accomplishments, the public were extremely concerned at this private misfortune. As for Sir William Temple, though as a father he was sensibly affected with the loss of so worthy a son, yet he bore his affliction with a Christian resignation, or rather with the firmness of a Stoic, being of the opinion of that Sect, that a wise man may dispose of himself, and make his life as short as he pleased. About the end of this year, he retired to Moor-Park, where he turned himself wholly to the cares and amusements of a country life, and in his study, saw little company in a place so desolate, yet he had the honour of being often consulted by King William in some of his secret and important affairs, and of a visit from him in his way from Winchester, and he used to wait upon his Majesty at Richmond and Windsor, where he was always very graciously received, with that easiness and familiarity, and particular confidence, that had begun in Holland so many years before. In 1694, he had the misfortune to lose his Lady [P], who was a very extraordinary woman, as well as a good wife. He was then past sixty, at which age he practised what he had so often declared to be his opinion, that an old man ought then to conclude himself no longer of use in the world, except to himself and his friends. He lived four years after, extremely afflicted with the gout, which at last wore out his life, and with the help of age, and a natural decay of strength and spirits, ended it in January, 1698, in his seventieth year. He died at Moor Park, where his heart was buried in a silver box, under the funeral in his garden, opposite to the window whence he used to contemplate and admire the works of nature with his dearly beloved sister, the ingenious Lady Giffard. This was the tenor of his Will. In pursuance to which, his body was privately interred in Westminster-

(xx) Memoirs, Part IV. p. 143.
(yy) The first news of it was brought to him by the Countess of Northumberland, who then lived at Stou House. Till on the Gardens of Leppinus, where he gives a detail of his reasons for this resolution, which proceeded from the prevalence of the French Councils at our Court.

(zz) The King made him several visits at Sheen, and it was during this interval, that Dr Swift came thither to offer his service to Sir William, who took him as an amanuensis. See Dean Swift's article.

His Life & Character, xxii, xxiii.

(†) He threw himself out of a boat, hired for the purpose, in the River London bridge, having put stones in his pocket to sink him.

(25) See also Lambertes Memoires de la Revolution, Vol. III. p. 290, et seq.

(26) Archbishop Sheldon made him this singular compliment, that he had the carte of the Gospel, because all men speak well of him. Lodge's Peerage of Ireland, ubi supra.

(27) Life and Character of Sir William Temple, p. xxii, xxiii.

[O] His son made away with himself. This remarkable catastrophe would well deserve a place in these Memoirs (†), were it not to be found in all our General Histories, to which we refer for the story (25): only observing, by way of supplement thereto, that this young Gentleman had been married about four years before, in France, to Mademoiselle Rambouillet, a rich heiress, and only daughter of Mr Du Plessis, a French Protestant of a very good family: a young Lady very eminent then, for her rare accomplishments of body and mind, and more so since, for her great Piety and Charity. She had by him two daughters, to whom their grandfather, Sir William Temple, at his death bequeathed the bulk of his estate, upon this condition, that they should not marry Frenchmen. Accordingly the eldest of them was married to Mr John Temple, youngest son to Sir John Temple, second brother to Sir William, and esteemed one of the best Lawyers in Ireland, where he was Solicitor, and Attorney-General, many years (26). The youngest daughter became wife to Mr Nicholas Bacon of Strubland in Suffolk. They were both living a few years ago (27).

[P] His wife was an extraordinary woman. She was not only much esteemed by her own friends and acquaintance, some of whom were persons of the greatest figure, but valued and distinguished by King William (*), and especially Queen Mary, with whom she had the honour to keep a constant correspondence, being justly admired for her fine stile and turns of wit in writing letters, and whom she out-lived about a month: the deep affliction for her Majesty's death having hastened her own. Sir William tells the following story as an instance of her courage. In 1671, as she was passing with her children to England in one of the King's yachts, they met the Dutch fleet, which refusing to strike to a yacht, the Captain, in great perplexity, thinking to get clear by her help, asked her what he should do. She told him, he knew his orders best, and what he was to do upon them, and left him to do as he thought fit, without any regard to her, or her children. He pursued his course, and landed her safe; after which she went to Court, where she was much commended for her part in what had passed. And the King extolled her behaviour as much as he blamed the Captain's, saying, she had shewed more courage than he; and then falling upon the Dutch insolence, Sir William, to whom this discourse was spoken, said, that however matters went, it must be confessed there was some merit in his family, since he had made the alliances with Holland, and his wife was like to have the honour of making the war (28).

(*) She carried his proposal to make his addresses to her in two letters, one to King Charles, and the other to her Father, and was charged by the Prince to inform herself the most particularly she could of all that concerned the person, humour, and disposition of the young Princess. Idem.

(28) Memoirs, p. 301, & seq.

(bbb) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 378. where the Bishop sets him off as vain and conceited, and though of good judgment and principles in politics, yet in point of religion an Atheist, who left religion to the rabble, as fit only for them. That he corrupted all that came near him; delivering himself wholly to study, ease and pleasure.

Abbey, and a marble monument [Q] set up after the Lady Giffard's death, in 1722, who resembled him in his genius, as well as in his person; and left behind her the character of one of the best, and most constant friends in the world. His character having been misrepresented by Bishop Burnet (bbb), was lately retrieved by a more favourable account of it, which being said to be done by a particular friend (ccc), we shall insert below [R], for the satisfaction of such as are curious in these matters. For the rest, the short, but comprehensive and impartial, though candid sketch, may be thought sufficient, which we have of him by Mr Boyer, who gives him for 'an accomplished Gentleman, a sound Politician, a Patriot, and a great Scholar; and, continues he, if this great Idea should perchance be shaded by some touches of vanity and spleen, it must be considered, that the greatest, wisest, and best of men, have still some failings and imperfections, which are inseparable from human nature (ddd). His works have been so often published, both separate and (ccc) The Bishop was also censured in the Republic of Letters for January, Art. II, p. 26, 27. (ddd) Memoirs of the Life and Negotiations of Sir William Temple, Bart. p. 418. 2d Edit. 1715. 8vo.

[Q] A monument according to his Will. The words of the Will are, 'I do order my body to be interred in the west isle of Westminster-Abbey, near those two dear pledges, my wife and my daughter, that lie there already; and that after mine, and my sister Giffard's decease, a large stone of black marble may be set up against the wall, with this inscription:

Sibi suisque charissimis
 DIANÆ TEMPLE dilectissimæ filiæ,
 DOROTHEÆ OSBORN conjunctissimæ conjugî,
 Et MARTHÆ GIFFARD optimæ forori,
 Hoc quaecunque Monumentum
 Poni curavit.
 GULIELMUS TEMPLE, Baronettus.

Accordingly the monument, which was set up, and stands there, with this addition to the epitaph, after GULIELMUS TEMPLE, is inserted De Moor-Park in agro Surriensi.

And underneath is inscribed as follows:

Di. T.	} Obiit {	1679	} Ætat {	14
Do. T.					1694	66
Gul. T.					1698	70
Mar. G.					1722	80

[R] His character. It is drawn in very advantageous terms, and begins in the true panegyric style, as follows: I think nothing harder than to write any body's character; and that of a friend is still more difficult: if one tells truth, it is thought partiality; and if one does not, it is a real piece of injustice. I will try, by saying little, to avoid both imputations. Sir William Temple's person is best known by his pictures and prints; he was rather tall than low; his shape, when young, very exact; his hair a dark brown, and curled naturally, and, whilst that was esteemed a beauty, no body had it in greater perfection; his eyes grey, but lively; and his body lean, but extreme active, so that none acquitted himself better at all sorts of exercise. He had an extraordinary spirit and life in his humour, with so agreeable turns of wit and fancy in his conversation, that no body was welcome in all sorts of company: and some have observed, that he never had a mind to make any body kind to him, without compassing his design. He was an exact observer of truth, thinking none that had failed once, ought ever to be trusted again; of nice points of honour; of great humanity and good-nature, taking pleasure in making others easy and happy; his passions naturally warm and quick, but tempered by reason and thought; his humour gay, but very unequal from cruel fits of spleen and melancholy, being subject to great damps from sudden changes of weather, but chiefly from crosses, and surprizing turns in his business, and disappointments he met with so often in his endeavours to contribute to the honour and service of his country, which he thought himself two or three times so near compassing, that he could not think with patience of what had hindered it, or of those that he thought had been the occasion of his disappointments. He never seemed busy in his greatest employments, was a great lover of liberty, and therefore hated the servitude of courts; said he could never serve for wages, nor be busy (as one is so often there) to no purpose; and never was willing to enter upon any employment, but that of a public minister. He had been a passionate lover, was a kind husband, a fond and indulgent father, a good master, and the best friend in the world, and, knowing himself to be so, was impatient of the least suspicion or jealousy from those he loved. He was ever kind to the memory of those he had once liked and esteemed; wounded to the heart by grief, upon the many losses of his children and friends, till recovered by reason and philosophy, and that perfect resignation to Almighty God, which he thought so absolute a part of our duty; upon those sad occasions often saying, His holy name be praised, His will be done. He was not without strong aversions, so as to be uneasy at the first sight of some he disliked, and impatient of their conversation; apt to be warm in disputes and expostulations, which made him hate the one and avoid the other, which he used to say might sometimes do well between lovers, but never between friends; he turned his conversation to what is more easy and pleasant, especially at table, where he said ill-humour ought never to come; and his agreeable talk at it, if it had been set down, would have been very entertaining to the Reader, as well as it was to so many that heard it. He had a very familiar way of conversing with all sorts of people, from the greatest princes to the meanest servants, and even children, whose imperfect language and natural and innocent talk he was fond of, and made entertainment out of every thing that could afford it; when that he liked best failed, the next served his turn. He lived healthful till forty-two, then began to be troubled with rheums upon his teeth and eyes, which he attributed to the air of Holland, and which ended, when he was forty-seven, in the gout, upon which he grew very melancholy, being then Ambassador at the Hague; he said a man was never good for any thing after it: and though he continued in business near three years longer, yet it was always with a design of winding himself out as fast as he could; and making good his own rules, that no body should make love after forty, nor be in business after fifty: and though from this time he had frequent returns of ill health, he never cared to consult physicians; saying, he hoped to die without them; and trusted wholly to the care and advice of his friends, which he often expressed himself so happy in, as to want nothing but health, which since riches could not help him to, he despised them. He was born to a moderate estate, and did not much increase it during his employments, which he tells his son, in his letter to him before the second part of his Memoirs, it is fit should contribute something to his entertainment, since they had done so little to his fortunes; upon which he could make him no excuse, since it was so often in his power, that it was never in his thoughts, which were ever turned upon how much less he wanted, rather than how much more: and in a fine strain of philosophy he concludes; If yours have the same turn, you will be but too rich; if the contrary, you will be ever poor. King Charles II. gave him the reversion of the Master of the Rolls place after his father, who kept it during his life; and the presents made him in his several embassies, were chiefly laid out in building and planting, and in purchasing old statues and pictures, that still remain in his family, which were his only expence or extravagance, but not too great for his income. Those that knew him little, thought him rich; to whom he used to answer pleasantly, that he wanted nothing to be rich, but an estate; and yet no body was more generous to his friends, or more charitable to the poor, in giving often, to true objects of charity, an hundred pounds at a time, and sometimes three hundred. His religion was that of the church of England, in which he was born and bred: and how loose soever Bishop Burnet represents his principles, (from that common place of hearsay that runs through the whole, for he was not acquainted with Sir William) yet there is no ground for such uncharitable reflections given in his writings, in which his excellent letter to the countess of Essex is a convincing proof both of his piety and eloquence; and to that picture, drawn by himself in his works, I refer those that care either to know or imitate him (29).

(29) His Life, p. xxv. to xxix.

collected together, and by that means are so well known, that to give a particular detail of them, would be pains mispent to the abuse of the Reader's patience.'

TENISON [THOMAS], Archbishop of Canterbury, was son of the Reverend Mr John Tenison, B. D. by Mary, the daughter of Thomas Dowson of Cottenham in Cambridge-shire, where she brought her husband this son, September 29 (a), 1630 (b). But his Father, being Rector of Mundesley in Norfolk [A], sent him, at a proper age, to the Free-school at Norwich, which was then in great repute, under the conduct of Mr Lovering, the Master. Thence he was removed to Cambridge, at seventeen years of age, and admitted a scholar upon Archbishop Parker's foundation, in Corpus-Christi, or Bennet-College, April 22, 1653. He took the degree of A. B. in Lent Term, 1656-7, and from the discouragement of the times to profess the study of Divinity, he applied himself to Physic. However, his thoughts continuing fixed upon the Priesthood, he procured a private ordination at Richmond in Surry, by Dr Duppa, Bishop of Salisbury, on the first dawning of the Restoration, in 1659 (c). He proceeded A. M. the following year (d), and being, by virtue of a pre-lection, admitted Fellow of his College (e), March 24, 1661-2, he entered immediately into the province of Tutor, and was chosen one of the University-Preachers, in 1665. Some time before the breaking out of the plague that year, the Dean and Chapter of Ely presented him to the cure of St Andrew the Great in Cambridge, where he conscientiously attended his duty during the whole continuance of that calamity [B], out of gratitude for which, the Parishioners presented him with a handsome piece of plate at his leaving them, in 1667, for the Rectory of Holywell and Nedingworth, in Huntingdonshire (f), given him by Edward Earl of Manchester, who had at that time placed his son Thomas under his tuition, in the College (g), and afterwards appointed him his Chaplain, in which relation he was likewise continued by his successor, Earl Robert. The same year, 1667, he proceeded B. D. and about this time he entered into the conjugal state with Ann, daughter of Dr Richard Love, sometime Master of his College [C]. In 1670, he commenced Author,

[A] Rector of Mundesley in Norfolk.] He was ejected from this living, as his son informs us (1), for his adherence to King Charles I, and a disguised Papist put into his room. Dr. Kennet tells us (2), he became Rector of Bracon-Ash, March 9, 1662, and died there in 1671. Mr. Masters apprehends, that he was Rector of Topcroft in Norfolk in 1646 (3). And we are assured by another hand, that, in 1712, his son, our Archbishop, at the expence of 340 l. rebuilt the chancel of Topcroft church, where his father and mother are buried (4).

[B] He discharged his duty during the plague.] It broke out with such violence, that no body ventured to continue in the college but our Author, two scholars, and a few servants; for whom a preservative powder was bought, and administered in wine, whilst charcoal, pitch, and brimstone, were kept constantly burning in the Gatehouse. Mr. Tenison continued in the college, and attended his cure with perfect safety to himself during the whole time (5). Here then we have an example set to the Bishop of Marseilles in France, so worthily celebrated by Mr. Pope (6), who might, it seems, have found a subject no less worthy of his muse among his own countrymen, though a Protestant. The piece of plate presented him, was a large silver tankard, and upon it St Andrew's cross, with this inscription; Gift of St Andrew's parishioners in Cambridge, Thomas Wiseman, Nicholas Scute, Churchwardens, 1667. In remembrance of his former relation to this parish, a little before his death, in the same year, our minister on the other hand gave the parishioners fifty pounds towards repairing their church and steeple (7).

[C] He married a daughter of Dr Love, &c.] The relation which this Divine bore to our Archbishop, entitles him to some further notice in these memoirs, especially as his story is of itself not uninteresting. He was the son of Richard Love, Apothecary in Cambridge, where he was born in 1596; after his education, probably at the Free-school there, he was admitted, about the year 1612 (8), of Clare-Hall, where he became Fellow in 1618, being then A. B. after which he proceeded to that of A. M. (9), and in 1628 was Proctor of the University. In 1631, he was collated to the Prebend of Tachbrock, in the church of Litchfield; and about the same time, became Rector of Ekyngton in Derbyshire. In 1632, he was created D. D. by virtue of a mandate from the King (10), to whom he was then Chaplain; and, by another royal mandate the same year, he was made Master of Bennet-College. In 1633, he was chosen Vicechancellor of the University, to which he greatly endeared himself by a successful encounter at the commencement with Franciscus de Sancta Clara (11), who had lately published a book at Doway, wherein he had endeavoured to reconcile our articles of religion with the decrees of the council of Trent. At the breaking out of the civil wars the Doctor sided with the Parliament (12), and was so well esteemed by his party, that, in 1649, he was chosen by the University, Margaret-Professor of Divinity (12), and soon after presented to the Rectory of Tevington in Norfolk, which had been given by King James for the augmentation thereof. It was not long however before he was in danger of losing both this and all his other preferments, by refusing to subscribe the Engagement, when the Independents were uppermost (13), although he had subscribed to live peaceably and quietly, and give no disturbance to the public. He found means to extricate himself from these difficulties, (but whether by submitting to the subscription or not is uncertain) and so continued in his Mastership, and, after the Restoration, obtained the Deanery of Ely, into which he was installed in September, 1660; whence it is probable, that though he had been a member of the Assembly of Divines, had taken the protestation, and complied with the changes of the times, yet, as he either withdrew, or seldom appeared there, so he was not over zealous in promoting the measures pursued by the Puritans in opposition to the King and Royal Family. It is certain that, upon the King's return, he published two orations (14); in one of which he compliments his Majesty in a high strain, expatiates upon the calamities of the late times, and appeals to his brethren, who had often heard him, to bear testimony that he had frequently complained of them within those walls (15); although he thought it not prudent to provoke a tyrant's rage to his own undoing, when it could be of no service to the public; for which he would at any time have offered his life a sacrifice.—He adds moreover, that so far was he from approving the measures of the Regicides, that he laboured all he could to persuade the University to protest against taking away the King's life for their own justification, and offered to be the bearer of it himself to the military council, who then governed. And what opinion the University had of him may be collected from the Grace, whereby having agreed to restore to his Majesty the fee-farm rents they had been obliged to purchase, in order to secure their

(a) In this disposition it is intimated, that he forbore to use his interest for the saving of the monuments in St Benet's church, where many of his predecessors, masters of the college, were interred, from being demolished by one William Dowling, who, in 1643, was authorized by the then prevailing powers to go through Cambridge, and eradicate all the reliques of superstition in the parish-churches (†); in which progress he not only deaced all the painted glass he met with in the windows, but destroyed all those inscriptions in brass or stone which had the precatory form [in use till the reformation] before them. He kept a journal of the reformation he made in each church, which was published from the original manuscript by Zachary Grey, B. L. D. in 1739. See an account of Dowling in p. 17, 18, of Querela Cantab. by Dean Betwick.

(a) Le Neve's Fasti, Vol. II. p. 236. from MS. notes of Dr White Kennet, Bishop of Peterborough, taken from the Archbishop's own mouth, or his papers, which therefore we have followed, rather than Rowne Willis, who places it on the 20th of Sept. Survey of Cath. Vol. II. p. 542.

(d) Masters's Hist. of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, p. 392. He was incorporated at Oxford in this degree, June 28, 1664. Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 159.

(f) He gave coals every year to the poor of this parish, as long as he held the living. Le Neve, p. 237.

(g) Masters, p. 392. Le Neve says, he served his father's cure at Pracon-Ash in Norfolk some time. Fasti, as before.

(12) In the room of Dr. Holdsworth, who had been elected about six years before, but never admitted, by reason of his loyalty.

(13) In a letter, dated Nov. 20, 1650, is this paragraph: Dr. Love still holds his place, and hath respite for one week, when it is thought he will be voted out.

(14) Emitted, Oratio habita in Acad. Cantab. in solemn Mag. Com. die 20 1660. paulo post Carolus II. felicissime reduecem, prefatoria ad disputationem Theologicam— cui adjungitur Oratiuncula, qua Aug. Regem allocutus est, cum Legati Acad. Cant. anam Regiam gratulam acciderent. Procer collatio de subito agrotante unde Dr Love ejus vices subivit June 5, 1660.

(15) Of the Divinity-school, where this oration was spoken.

(†) The tenant at Ickleton assisted Dowling in travelling the Chancel there. Masters, p. 150. note (f).

(b) The Writer of his Memoirs says 1634 by mistake, as is evident from his sending him to Cambridge in 1633 at the age of seventeen.
(c) MS. notes of Dr Kennet, which take notice that his orders were then entered into a private book of the Bishop's, and not given out till after the Restoration.
(e) The pre-lection was made Feb. 29, 1659, and he was admitted now into a Norwich Fellowship, upon the demise of one William Smith, Masters, as before; who charges, that this pre-lection was first begun, in order to prevent mandates, p. 137; but were abused afterwards.
(1) In his Dedication to the True Account of his conference with Pelton.
(2) Regist. p. 231.
(3) Hist. of CCC. p. 391. note (d).
(4) Le Neve's Fasti, Vol. II. p. 260, from MS. notes of Dr. Kennet, as above.
(5) Masters, p. 161.
(6) Essay on Critic, Ep. IV. line 127, 128.
(7) Le Neve, p. 137.
(8) In the King's mandate for his degree of D. D. dated 1630, he is commended as being known by the experience of near twenty years in the University.
(9) He kept a philosophical act in the certificate of the Spanish and Austrian Ambassadors, who were created A. M. in 1622. Mr. Sterne afterwards Archbishop of York) was one of his opponents, and the dispute was thought to be warmly handled.
(10) All written by his own hand.
(11) Whose true name was Dawson.

by publishing a piece, in 8vo, intituled, The Creed of Mr Hobbes examined, in a feigned Conference between him and a Student in Divinity; apparently written to obviate a calumny that had been cast upon him of being a favourer of Mr Hobbes's opinion (b). In 1674, the Parishioners of St Peter's Manscroft, in Norwich, chose him their upper Minister, and gave him a salary of 100 l. per ann. (i). In 1678 came out his Discourse of Idolatry, and his Baconiana (k) the year following. He took his degree of D. D. in 1680, and on the 8th of October, the same year, was presented by King Charles II, being then one of his Majesty's Chaplains, to the Vicarage of St Martin's in the Fields, upon the promotion of Dr William Lloyd to the See of St Asaph [D]. This large and important cure extending to Whitehall, and the whole Court, set him in the front of the battle against the Papists, both in the latter end of this, and the whole subsequent reign; and he maintained the dangerous post with undaunted, and exemplary courage. In that spirit, he preached and published, in 1681, A Sermon of Discretion in giving Alms, which being attacked by Andrew Pulton, who was at the head of the Jesuits in the Savoy, the Doctor wrote a defence of it [E]. Upon the 10th of June, 1684, he was abused from the same quarter with a pretended information concerning the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey [F]. This year he also published, The Difference between the Protestant and Socinian Methods: in answer to a book written by a Romanist, entitled, The Protestants Plea for a Socinian. In the mean time he had rivalled the best disposed zealots of the Romish Church in their much boasted grace of Charity; having disbursed upwards of 300 l. in alms for the relief of the poor of his parish, during the severity of the hard frost in 1683; he also laid the plan for endowing a Charity-school, and setting up a public library, both which he afterwards completed [G]. These amiable

(i) Masters, as before.

(k) See an account of this piece in Lord Bacon's article.

(b) Dedication of this piece to his Patron, the Earl of Manchester. The calumny, was raised upon his having been Tutor to Dan. Scargill, of whom see an account in remark [N], under Dr Spencer's article.

yearly pensions from the Crown in the late unhappy times, they commissioned the Doctor, who had been instrumental in buying them, to wait upon the King at the public expence, and make a tender of them. Lloyd calls him (16) The natural wit and orator; and adds, that, when Margaret-Professor of Divinity, he was sure to affront any man, that put up questions against the doctrine or discipline of the church of England in the worst of times, which may serve to support the following character of him. That he preserved the same good conscience, which a prudent and honest man, without party zeal and attachments, might do in those times of civil and ecclesiastical confusion; and that he steered as well and wisely through those storms as any pilot could to save his ship (his college and university) from an absolute wreck, till Providence should see good to calm them, and open that safe and happy passage into the harbour it found in the Restoration, to which he contributed all that was in his power, and may be ranked among those moderate Divines, who, for their tenderness towards Dissenters, came under the denomination of Latitudinarians. In which respect we shall see he was copied by his son-in-law, our Archbishop, who bequeathed to the college an excellent picture of him, which is still remaining in the Master's lodge. He lived not long to enjoy his new preferment, departing this life in January, 1660 (17). His remains were deposited in his own chapel. Besides the orations already mentioned, he published a sermon, preached at Whitehall on the monthly fast, March 30, intituled, The Watchman's watchword, which was printed at Cambridge, 1642, 4to: there is also a long copy of Latin verses by the Doctor, printed in the congratulations of the University upon the King's return, called ΣΩΣΤΡΑ. He gave fifty pounds in his life-time towards rebuilding Clare-Hall, and left a legacy of ten pounds, with the polyglot Bible, to Bennet-College. The Doctor, as is implied above, was a married man: but all that we know of his wife is, that her Christian name was Grace, which gave birth to the following copy of verses upon their marriage, which may serve for a specimen of the humour of those times.

Upon Dr Love and Grace, Mr and Mrs of CCCC.

Is LOVE, that conquers all, o'ercome? must He,
That all doth tye, now himself tyed be?
Who is't that hath this Pow'r? this Art? let's know,
That we to him a Sovereignty may owe?
Who is't that conquers LOVE, dost ask? 'Tis GRACE;
For to none else did LOVE e'er yet give place.
Let LOVE then be the Knot, and GRACE the Tye;
Give LOVE the Onset, GRACE the Victory.
Go, happy Pair, each other's arms embrace,
Live always, like yourselves, in LOVE and GRACE (18).

(18) Masters, from p. 143. to p. 154.

(19) History of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 190. folio Edition.

[D] He succeeded Dr Lloyd in the vicarage of St Martin's. Bishop Burnet declares (19), that Bishop Lloyd did, upon his promotion, find a very worthy successor in his cure, Dr Tenison, who carried on and advanced all those good methods that he had begun in the management of that cure, that he endowed such schools, set up a public library, and kept many curates to assist him in his indefatigable labours among them. Dr Kennet tells us (20), that in this office he had done as much good as perhaps it was possible for one man to do. And the writer of his life assures us (21), there was not above two persons in the parish who turned Roman catholics while he was Vicar.

[E] He wrote a defence of it. The Doctor's sermon being also attacked by the Author of Good Advice to the Pulpits, he annexed it to a piece, intituled, An Apology for the Pulpits, published in 1688, 4to, by Dr. John Williams, Rector of St Mildred's in the Poultry, who was afterwards, by Dr Tenison's interest, raised to the See of Chichester, during the time that the bill of attainder against Sir John Fenwick was depending in the House of Lords, and, being completed Bishop just before the third reading of that bill there, he hastened, on the day appointed for it, to the House, and being in an extraordinary hurry to get himself robed, his patron, then Archbishop of Canterbury, who was putting on his robes at the same time, observed it, and said to him, Brother, brother, you'll overheat yourself; what's the reason of all this potter? Nothing, may it please your Grace, replied the Suffragan, but I was fearful lest the bill against Sir John Fenwick should be read before I could take my place in the house. Eye, my Lord, says the honest Metropolitan, you might have spared yourself that labour, since you had no opportunity of hearing the merits of the case at the first and second reading; but since, as I perceive, you are come to give your vote, pray, Brother, come in with me, that you may hear it once read before you do it (22).

(20) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 676.

(21) in p. 10.

(22) Life of Tenison, p. 6

[F] He was abused by a pretended information, &c.] There was brought to him, directed in a counterfeit hand, an anonymous letter in the following terms: 'This is from an unknown hand, but it is to let you understand that one serjeant Ramfay lies a dying, desires some Divine to come to him, to unburden his conscience about the murder of Sir Edmond Godfrey. He lives in your parish, in Yorke-buildings: Justice Dew can tell you more; he lives in Suffolk-street. If you have courage to own the Protestant cause, shew it; do your duty; visit him.' On the backside of the letter Dr Tenison wrote thus with his own hand: 'I received this letter June 10, 84, by the penny-post in the evening. This morning I sent Thomas Wickens, my chancel-keeper, to Yorke-buildings, that I might be informed whether Mr Serjeant Ramfay was in the house he had usually lived in there. He brought me word, that the people of the house told him, that he had long left that house, and was gone into the country; and that, if at any time he came to town, he came not thither (23).'

[G] Both which he afterwards completed.] The buildings are under the same roof, and are situated opposite the Upper Mews, at the lower end of Castle-street. Having endowed the free-school, and settled a salary for the qualities being accompanied with a grave and moderate deportment, brought him into general esteem, so much, that, in 1685, the Duke of Monmouth chose particularly to be attended by him, both before, and at the time of his execution; and we are told (I); that he spoke to his Grace very plainly, and with a freedom becoming a Minister of the Gospel, in relation both to his public actions, and the course of his private life, yet in so prudent and soft a manner, as not to displease him [II]. In 1687; our Vicar held a conference with Doctor (as he was generally called) Andrew Pulton, above mentioned, in defence of the Protestant Religion [I]; soon after which, he published A Guide in Matters of Faith, with respect especially to the Romish Practice of such a one as is infallible; and another piece the same year, intitled, Mr Pulton considered in his Sincerity, Reasonings, and Authorities: or, A just Answer to what he has hitherto published in his true and full Account of a Conference, &c. his Remarks, and in them his pretended Confutation of what he calls Dr T's [Dr Tillotson's] Rule of Faith. Not long before this, our Vicar had preached a sermon at the funeral of the famous Mrs Eleanor Gwynn, one of King Charles II's Mistresses, whose Character, according to the great moderation and charity of his temper, he had represented (as that of a dying Penitent) in no unfavourable light: this drew upon him the censure of several of his enemies, especially those of the Romish Church; and an abusive counterfeit piece being actually cried about the streets, under the title of his Sermon; in answer to it, he put the following advertisement, at the end of this treatise, against Pulton: 'Whereas, there has been a Paper cried by some Hawkers, as a Sermon preached by Dr T. at the funeral of Mrs E. Gwynn; this may certify, that that Paper is the forgery of some mercenary people.' In 1680 he had, jointly with Dr Simon Patrick, a considerable sum of money deposited in his hands, to be laid out in works of Charity, according to their discretion [K]. He continued this year to publish other tracts against the Popish Religion [L]; yet, at the same time, was so much respected at Court, that we are assured King James II. was induced, chiefly (m) in regard to him, to take off the suspension which two years before had been laid on Dr John Sharp, then Rector of St Giles in the Fields. This concession, however; was undoubtedly more extorted by the exigence of the juncture, than obtained by any personal interest of Dr Tenison (n). But, in the succeeding reign, his moderation to the Dissenters brought him into higher favour with the Crown. He had been employed, with other eminent Divines, by Archbishop Sancroft, to review the Liturgy, upon the long projected scheme of a comprehension with the Dissenters, before the Revolution; and presently after it, being promoted to the Archdeaconry of London, and appointed one of the twenty Commissioners to prepare matters for the Convocation in the same view, he was very active in this Commission [M] while

(23) Idem

(I) In Burret's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 190. fol. Ed. C.

(m) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 488.

(n) Burret's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 677. See also Archbishop Sharp's article.

(*) He is to teach thirty boys of the parish, and has a school adjoining to the school. The Trustees were eight. The Vicar of St Martin's is to be one. (†) Dr Patrick. See Vol. V. p. 3306. (I) Who has an apartment in the end of the library, which is for the use of the Westminster Clergy. (24) In Bishop Ken's article.

(25) Gen. Hist. Vol. VI. p. 231. from Memoirs communicated by Mrs Prowse, daughter of Dr Hooper.

the Schoolmaster (*), by a deed of trust made about 1695 (†). He therein gave 1000l. to be added to 500l. given by the then Bishop of Ely (§), and also the leases of two houses standing on the glebe of the Vicarage, for the maintenance of a Librarian, Usher, and Schoolmaster, who was also to take care of the Library. But there is now a distinct Librarian (||), and no Usher. [H] He spoke to the Duke so as not to displease him. Having referred the Reader to the present article (24), for a further account of Bishop Hooper's behaviour on this occasion, we shall perform that promise here, as follows: In the evening before the Duke's execution, Dr Hooper received, by the Earl of Rochester, a message from the King, immediately to attend the Duke. When he came to the Tower, and acquainted the Duke with his Majesty's order, his Grace received it with some confusion and surprize; but the Doctor assuring him that he was charged with no particular commission, the Duke told him he was very welcome and acceptable to him, and, after much free conversation with him, told him, he would see him in the morning as soon as he was up. The Doctor sat up all night, and in the morning the Duke told him, that he was sure he had made his peace with God. Much time was spent to desire his Grace to consider the nature and foundation of such a full persuasion, which the Doctor very faithfully laid before him with as great plainness and decency, as the Duke's firm adherence to this belief would admit of, in which he persisted to his last moment. The Doctor afterwards attended him to the scaffold, with Dr Tenison, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells, and Ely, where this last Prelate chiefly discoursed him, pressing him to own the truth of the doctrine of non-resistance, and confess himself guilty of rebellion (25). [I] He held a conference with Andrew Pulton, &c.] He afterwards published an account of it under the following title. A true account of a conference held about religion at London the 29th of September, 1687, between Andrew Pulton, Jesuit, and Thomas Tenison, D. D. as also that which led to it, and followed after it. Lord. 1687. The same year came out six conferences concerning the Eucharist, wherein is showed, that the doctrine of transubstantiation overthrowes the proofs of the Christian religion. Translated from the French of Mr de la Placette by Dr Tenison, and printed at London, 1687, 4to. Our Author published likewise this year the two following pieces in 4to: 1. The difference between the church of England and the church of Rome; in answer to a book written by a Romanist, intitled, The agreement between them, Oxon. 2. An examination of Bellarmine's tenth note of Holiness of life. [K] According to their discretion. After a proper disposition of some part of it to several charitable uses, (as urgent occasions then required) they determined at last to settle the remainder in augmenting the insufficient maintenance of poor Vicars. And accordingly, for several years, they distributed the sum of 1000l. among twenty such Vicars; one half of the diocese of Canterbury, the other of Ely, in equal portions of 50l. to each Vicar. And to provide for the security and continual fund of the said Charity, they did, in 1697, assign over the principal stock in mortgages and money, amounting in the whole to 2400l. to Sir Nathan Wright, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and other Trustees, to dispose the mean profits yearly to the said relief, and better (26) support of poor Vicars. [L] He published other tracts against Popery. These are as follow: The Introduction to Popery not founded on Scripture. 2. An Answer to a Letter of the Roman Catholic Soldier. 3. Speculum Ecclesiasticum: or, an Ecclesiastical Prospective Glass considered in its false Reasonings and Quotations. 4. The incurable Scepticism of the Church of Rome; translated from Placette. To which may be added, as published probably the same year, though according to the Bookellers account not till the following, The Protestant and Popish way of interpreting Scripture, impartially compared; in answer to Pax vobis, &c. ann. 1689. All in 4to. [M] He was active in this Commission. His province was to collect the words and expressions excepted against throughout the Liturgy, and to propose others more clear and plain in their room, and less liable to objections. The original Papers of all the alterations proposed by the Commissioners, rested in his hands; and he was always cautious in trusting them out of his own keeping, alledging, that if they came to be public, they would give no satisfaction on either side, but be rather a handle for mutual reproaches, as one side would upbraid their brethren for having given up so much, while the other would justify their nonconformity, because those concessions were too little, or, however, not yet passed into a law (27). The original book came afterwards

(26) Kennet of Impropr. p. 310.

(27) Kennet's Complete Hist. Vol. III. p. 591. note [D].

(o) The piece is intitled, A Discourse on the Ecclesiastical Commission, proving it agreeable to the Word of God, useful to the Convocation, &c. 1689. 4to.

(p) Archbishop Tillotson is said to have been his friend on this occasion. Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 254. Edit. 1753.

(r) Kennet's Improv. p. 317, 318.

while it continued, and wrote a defence of it (o); and his distinguished zeal in this cause, is said to have merited a particular sollicitation from Queen Mary for the Bishopric of Lincoln [N] (p), to which he was nominated on the 25th of November, 1691, and consecrated at Lambeth on the 10th of January following (q). He had not been seated in this See above two years, when, upon the death of Dr Francis Marsh, he was offered the Archbishopric of Dublin; but requested this favour as a motive to his acceptance of it, that the impropriations belonging to the estates then forfeited to the Crown, might be all restored to the respective Parish Churches. The motion was approved reasonable by the King, but the difficulties were found so great, that it never could be carried into execution (r); and instead of being translated into Ireland, the Bishop of Lincoln was raised the following year to the Primacy of England, in the See of Canterbury [O]. Soon after this advancement, Queen Mary being seized with the small-pox, the new Archbishop was chosen by her Majesty to attend her, which he did to the moment of her death, and afterwards preached her Funeral Sermon, which, being printed, gave offence to several, and was severely censured in a Letter to his Grace by Dr Ken, the deprived Bishop of Bath and Wells [P]. Upon the

(q) Le Neve, p. 241. He held six months the Vicarage of St Martin's in commendam, as also the Rectory of St James, which being taken out of it in 1685, a chapel of ease, in King's-Street, New Golden-Square, and a free-school for thirty-six boys of that parish to be qualified for apprentices, were by a deed of Sept. 10, 1700, endowed chiefly at his expence.

(28) Waterland's Hist. of the Ath. Creed. In the Postscript to the Preface, Edit. 1728.

(29) In p. 20.

(30) In his Hist. Vol. II. p. 136. fol. Edit.

afterwards into the hands of Dr Gibson, late Bishop of London (28).

[N] He was made Bishop of Lincoln at the sollicitation of Queen Mary.] The Writer of his Life tells us (29), that this Bishopric was designed for Dr John Scott, Rector of St Giles's in the Fields, by the Earl of Jersey, then Master of the Horse to his Majesty, who therefore, in opposition to Dr Tenison, endeavoured to prejudice him in her opinion. In which view, he represented to her, as she was speaking in respectful terms of the Doctor, that he had preached a funeral sermon, wherein he had spoken favourably of Mrs Eleanor Gwynn, one of King Charles the Second's Mistresses. What then? said the Queen, I have heard as much. This is a sign that that poor unfortunate woman died penitent: for, if I can read a man's heart through his looks, had not she made a truly pious Christian end, the Doctor could never have been induced to speak well of her.

[O] He was raised to the See of Canterbury.] Bishop Burnet insinuates (30), that in his opinion, our Prelate was hardly equal in all respects to this Post. Many, says he, wished Stillfleet might have succeeded, he being not only so eminently learned, but judged a man in all respects fit for the Post. The Queen was inclined to him; she spoke with some earnestness oftener than once to the Duke of Shrewsbury on that subject; she thought he would fill that Post with great dignity. She also pressed the King earnestly for him. But as his health made him not capable of the fatigue that belonged to that province, so the Whigs did generally apprehend, that both his notions, and his temper, were too high, and all concurred to desire Tenison, who had a firmer health, with a more active temper; and was universally well liked, for having served the cure of St Martin's, in the worst times, with so much courage and resolution. So that at this time, he had many friends, and no enemies.

[P] Was animadverted on by Dr Ken, the deprived Bishop of Bath and Wells.] This he published by way of a Letter, dated March 29, 1695, to the Archbishop. The whole is too long to be inserted here: we shall content ourselves with some passages, that more directly strike at our Author's character. Dr Ken's censure turns wholly upon a supposed want of Duty, in not having represented to her Majesty at this time, the great guilt she lay under by her conduct at the Revolution. To aggravate the Archbishop's offence, he takes notice, that he had not only frequent opportunities, but singular encouragements to have done it. As to the first, he observes, from the Archbishop's own account, her Majesty preserved her senses intire for the greatest part of her illness. As to the second, he addresses himself in these words: 'You had to deal with a person, whose knowledge and wisdom you justly commend, p. 3. and who might easily have been convinced, if in any one instance she had mistaken her duty; you had to deal with one, whose piety and humility you, in many respects, deservedly magnify. I only wish you had added her justice also, to have made her character compleat. However, these three virtues were powerful inducements to have used a conscientious freedom with her. You had, as appears by the character you give of her, a pious, charitable, humble soul, under your care, a subject most happily disposed to work on, who had always been very reverent and attentive at sermons, p. 9. who had an averfeness to flattery, p. 12. and who would thankfully have received any piece of charitable or humble admonition you had given her. I now beseech you, Sir, spend a few thoughtful moments in comparing your performance; as you yourself represent it in your own Sermon, with your knowledge, with the opportunities and encouragements you had, and with the rubrick of the Church. You mention a very religious saying that fell from her, that she had learned from her youth a true doctrine, that repentance was not to be put off to a death-bed; p. 26. But it was your duty, considering the deceitfulness of all hearts, and the usual infirmities and forgetfulness, and indisposition of sick persons, to have supplied all her oversights and omissions, and to have examined the truth of her repentance, whether she truly repented of her sins; and where you knew any thing of moment, which had escaped her observation; you ought to have been her Remembrancer. I therefore challenge you to answer before God and the world: Did you know of no weighty matter which ought to have troubled this Princess's Conscience, though at present she seemed not to have felt it, and for which you ought to have moved her to a special confession, in order to absolution? Were you assured, that she was in charity with all the world? Did you know of no enmity between her and her Father, no variation between her and her sister? Was the whole Revolution managed with that purity of intention, that perfect innocence and exact justice, that tender charity and that irreproachable equity, that there was nothing amiss in it, no remarkable failings that might deserve one penitent reflection? You cannot, you dare not say it, and if you should, out of your own mouth I can condemn you; for you yourself, in your serious intervals, have passed as severe a censure on the Revolution, as any of those they call Jacobites could do. You have said more than once, that it was all an unrighteous thing. Why did not you deal then sincerely with this dying Princess, and tell her so? when you must be sensible, that in steering her conscience wrong, you shipwrecked your own. What was it, Sir, that moved you to act thus notoriously against your own conscience? was it the fear you had of losing the favour of the Court, which made you rather venture the indignation of Heaven? Even that fear was vain, for it had been no offence against the government to have persuaded a dying daughter to have bestowed one compassionate prayer on her afflicted Father, had he been never so unnatural. Though the case was here quite contrary; for he was one of the tenderest Fathers in the world. Besides, her illustrious Consort, who manifested so very great and worthy a passion for her, would, I dare say, have had nothing omitted, which might have been conducive to her eternal happiness; and a conscientious Confessor, especially on the death-bed, is one of a thousand, who will always be desired, and followed, and revered. Believe me, Sir, you have given the world reason to conclude, that your own conscience misgave you, being sensible, that in reproving her, you must have reproached yourself. You say she was so judicious and devout a Saint, as that degenerate Church of Rome can by no means shew us, p. 9; but surely it had been prudence in you, to have waved that comparison, for should you chance hereafter to blame that Church for canonizing Thomas a Becket, (for which she is really blame-worthy) it is obvious for her to make this in reply to you, that it is as justifiable in her to faint such a subject, as in you to faint such a daughter. You tell us, she was one, whom You are well assured had all the duty in the world for other relations [besides her husband] which, after long and laborious considerations, she judged the Princess Ann of Denmark's Letter of Condolence to King William (*), on occasion of her sister's death, the Archbishop laid hold of that favourable opportunity of reconciling the Family [2], and was principally concerned in making up the difference between them about the Princess's settlement (s). The several injunctions and circular letters to his Clergy for preserving the order and discipline of the Church, and for healing the animosities that arose in his time about the Trinity, and the distinct powers of the two Houses of Convocation [4], are the subject of general history, as is also his being appointed first of the Lords Justices for the Administration of the Government in his Majesty's absence, every year, during the war, a trust which is naturally incident to the first subject after the blood royal, and as such, is now by custom annexed in a manner to the Primacy (t). But the following particulars are strikingly characteristic of the person, and therefore come indispensably within the plan of these Memoirs. In 1696, our Archbishop gave a signal proof of his zeal for the Revolution in the case of Sir John Fenwick's attainder: when the pious Mr Nelson, who was a particular friend, came to pay him a visit, in order to obtain his vote, if possible, against that bill, he received this answer: My very good friend, give me leave to tell you, that I know not what spirit this man, nor I, am of; I wish for his, nor no man's blood; but how can I do my duty to God and the King, should I declare a man innocent (for my not being on the side of the bill will convince the world that I think him so) when I am satisfied in my conscience, not only from Goodman's evidence, but all the convincing testimonies in the world, that he is guilty. Laws EX POST FACTO may indeed carry the face of rigour with them; but if ever a law was necessary, this is (u). Such a conduct must needs gain the heart of King William; and, accordingly, we find his Grace in so much reputation at Court, in 1700, that he obtained a commission, authorizing him, jointly with the Archbishop of York, and four other Bishops (w), to recommend to his Majesty, proper persons for all the Ecclesiastical preferments in his gift, above the value of 20 l. per ann. in the book of first fruits and tenths. He continued in the same favour till the death of this King, whom he constantly attended in his illness, and prevailed with him to put the last hand to a bill for the better security of the Protestant succession (x). In consequence of his station, he had the honour of crowning Queen Ann; but held no degree of favour in the Court of that Sovereign. He continued the same charitable disposition towards the Dissenters, as he had done before; and in the three first years of her Majesty's reign, he steadily opposed the bill to prevent occasional conformity, and spoke with some warmth in the House of Lords upon that subject, in (*) Bishop Burnet having told us, that the King turned himself much to the meditation of religion, and to secret prayer, observes, that the new Archbishop [Tenison] was often and long with him, and that he entered into solemn and serious resolutions of becoming in all things an exact and exemplary Christian. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 11. Fol. Edition. See an instance of this in the note (1) below.

(w) Viz. Gilbert [Burnet] of Sarum, William [Lloyd] of Worcester, Simon [Patrick] of Ely, and John [Moor] of Norwich. Le Neve's Fasti, Vol. I. where the Commission is printed at length from the original MS. then in the hands of Dr Edward Tenison, Archdeacon of Carmarthen.

(32) This task, however, was undertaken on another occasion by his friend, Dr. John Williams, who, in answer to Mr Jer. Collier's Remarks on some late Sermons, published A Defence of Archbishop Tenison's Sermon on the death of her late Majesty, of blessed memory; and of the Sermons of the late Archbishop [Tillotson], &c.

(1) For this reason, it is not known whether she mentioned her concern at the King's criminal converse with Lady Villiers; but the Archbishop, it is said, took the freedom to represent to his Majesty the great injury done therein to his excellent wife. The King took it well, did not deny his crime, and promised never to see that Lady more. Whiston's Memoirs of himself, p. 100. Ldit. 1757. from the information of Bishop Me re, who added, that his Grace's Sermon concerning holy resolution, preached at the King's judgings at Kensington before he appeared in public, was designed particularly to confirm his Majesty in this resolution.

(1) Complete Hist. of Eng. and, Vol. III. p. 688.

(t) It is observable, that these disputes proved the ruin of the Convocation, so that while the Dissenters of each sect have their Synodical Assemblies, the Synod of the Church established has never met since to any purpose. Godwin de pre. sub. last Edit. under our Archbishop's Article.

(s) See more of him as Diocefan of Canterbury, in Bret's Account of Church Government, and Government, p. 235, 244. 2d Edit.

(u) Memoirs of his Life, p. 62.

(x) Masters, p. 395.

judged consistent with her obligations to God, and to her Country, p. 15: the consideration then, which she used to reconcile her judgment to the Revolution, was, it seems, long and laborious, notwithstanding the assistance of her new associates; it being no easy matter to overcome the contrary remonstrances of nature, and of her own conscience, and to unlearn those evangelical maxims, which were carefully taught her by the faithful guides of her youth. Others might begin to instil opposite principles into her, others might confirm her, but the finishing stroke was reserved for you. But who do you mean, Sir, by other relations? we may guess that you mean her Royal Father, her Mother-in-law, and her Brother; but you are at liberty to say you mean any other relations, if you please. You give us ambiguous and general words only, when you should have given us most express and particular. All the duty in the world is a comprehensive term; but wherein, Sir, did any part of that duty appear? why are you not so just to her, and to yourself, as to give us some of those compassionate and melting expressions of filial duty, which fell from her on that subject? why do you not produce some instances of her mildness and mercifulness to her enemies, p. 16. who, you know, she treated as such, though their crime was their being her Father's friends? It would have been much for her honour, would have given great satisfaction to all good people, would have convinced the world, that the manner of her death had been in all respects truly Christian, p. 23. would have been much for your own reputation, and much for the credit of the Revolution, in which you are as great a zealot, as a gainer. If you were so well assured of all that duty, what dreadful negligence were you guilty of in not putting her in mind of it on her death-bed? Methinks, Sir, you are not just to her, when you give us instances of her charity to several sorts of indigent people, and to strangers, which all the world knew, and give no instances of even her natural affection to her own Royal Father, of which all the world doubted (31). When, had you suggested that doubt to her, as you ought to have done, she would have shewed herself a tender-hearted daughter, and would have been extremely afflicted for having been instrumental in her Father's calamity. It is far from my intention here to dispute the lawfulness of the Revolution; yet I may say, that I never met with any so bigotted to it, who would undertake to justify all the part which she, as a daughter, had in it; and, I am persuaded, that it would mightily puzzle you to tell us what those obligations were, which she had to God, and to her Country, which were inconsistent with her filial duty. —The Archbishop never took any notice of this Letter in print (32), and, indeed, few I believe will blame his conduct therein. The reflections too plainly indicate the Author of them to be, on this occasion, carried out of his natural temper, under the influence of spleen and peevishness; the demands were such as could not, in prudence, be complied with; the Queen had satisfied him, as her Confessor, and it was not his business to reveal any particulars of the confession (1). With regard to the Queen, I say, his silence seems to have been highly commendable, and an exemplary instance of the soundness of his judgment. But his censure of the Revolution is of another nature; the truth of the charge is asserted in the most solemn manner; the piety and integrity of the accuser in great esteem among all parties; the words are challenged to be spoken more than once, and consequently the opinion declared by them, could not but be ordinarily deemed the result of a mature deliberation. What could hinder him then from clearing up this matter, which seemed to be of so much importance to his character? Surely it must be attended with some particular paltry circumstances, that were best treated with disregard. No doubt, he gave his friends all the satisfaction they could desire therein. But any notice he should take of it in public, would have given his Antagonist a clear right to publish an answer, and so have furnished a vehicle for carrying fuel to feed the spirits of the Jacobite party all over the nation; whereas, it was the great policy of those times, to let that cause gradually die away, by a cold neglect of those who were quiet, and putting the laws strictly in execution against such as incurred them.

[2] To reconcile the Royal Family.] Upon this occasion, among other arguments, he represented to his Majesty, both her Royal Highness's, and her Consort's prudent and loyal conduct, during their recess from Court; urging, that by their interest they might have given his Majesty considerable disturbance; but that they were so far from any such design, that those Members of either House of Parliament, who had places under their Highnesses, had always appeared foremost in promoting his Majesty's interest (33).

(33) Boyer's History of Queen Ann, in the Introduction, p. 7.

1) The Duties of Marlborough, speaking her behaviour her first coming to Whitehall the Revolution, tells us, it is too evident, many instances, that she acted bravely, that her Conduct, p. 15.

(y) See Bishop Kennet's article.

(z) Dutcheſs of Marlborough's Conduſt, p. 107.

(aa) Gen. Hiſt. of England.

(*) He is particularly charged with neglecting a favourable opportunity to introduce Episcopacy into the Church of Prussia upon the model of the Church of England. Godwin de præful. p. 167. Edit. 1743. Fol.

But there is room to ſuſpect a miſtake in this account. See Dr Græbe's article, in the Appen.

(bb) Newton's Life of Biſhop Kennet, p. 110.

(cc) His Life, p. 107.

1704 [R]. At the ſame time, he teſtified a true regard for the welfare of the eſtabliſhed Church, by engaging Dr White Kennet, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, to write The Caſe of Improvements, &c. upon the Queen's having graciously given the firſt fruits for augmenting the maintenance of the poor Clergy (y). In 1705, he wrote a Letter to the Princeſs Sophia, acquainting her with his own zeal in particular, as alſo that of her friends, for the ſecurity of the Hanover ſucceſſion; to which he received an answer from that Electreſs, wherein her Highneſs gave ſome intimations of her deſire to come into England at that juncture [S]. Notwithſtanding this part of his conduct muſt needs have been very diſagreeable to her Majeſty, who was always extremely averſe to ſuch a ſtep (z); yet April 10, the following year, he was nominated firſt Commiſſioner in the treaty of Union between England and Scotland (aa). The ſame year, he heartily concurred with the majority of the Lords in their reſolution againſt thoſe who inſinuated, that the Church was in danger. This brought upon him the imputation of being no good Churchman; and, as he obſerved, a chief brother riſing into that honour upon a much leſs bottom, in his opinion, for it, he ſaid to him, Brother, you know I was always a greater Churchman than you (*); but even take the name of the Church, whiſt I keep to the Conſtitution of it (bb). During the ſevere winter, which happened in 1709, he gave a freſh inſtance of his charitable diſpoſition, by an extraordinary liberality to the poor, eſpecially thoſe of his pariſh at Lambeth (cc), where he then kept his reſidence, being much afflicted with the gout. He had laboured many years under that diſtemper, and from this time was ſo much confined by it, that he could not give ſuch attendance in the Convocation, as the great difference between the two Houſes neceſſarily required (†). Upon which occaſion, her Majeſty joined ſome other Biſhops

(†) During this controverſy, one Greenſhields of the Episcopalian Church in Scotland being driven thence, as he ſaid, by perſecution, came hither, and petitioned the Archbiſhop to ſubſcribe to an intended Edition of the Engliſh Liturgy for the uſe of that Church. But his Grace ſuſpected the deſign, and having brought the man to confeſs, that there was not above ten ſuch Churches in Scotland, Then, ſaid he, I ſee no neceſſity for printing a new Edition of the Liturgy; I will ſupply them with ten books at my own expence.

[R] He oppoſed the bill to prevent occasional conformity.]

(34) It was ſaid by a noble Lord, in the debates upon this bill, the preceding year, that the Archbiſhop being asked, what reaſon he had againſt the bill, replied, he had not well conſidered the bill; but that my Lord Somers told him, it ought not to paſs: however that be, it is certain he left that Lord, in his will, a fine picture of St. Sebaſtian.

The laſt time this bill was brought into the Houſe, in 1704 (34), he made the following ſpeech upon the occaſion. The noble Peer that ſpoke laſt, has conſidered the reaſons that are given for the occasional bill itſelf; but, I muſt confeſs, I can ſee none that can ſatisfy me of the neceſſity of it. I think the practice of occasional conformity, as uſed by the Diſſenters, ſo far from deſerving the title of a vile hypocriſy, that I think it the duty of all moderate Diſſenters, upon their own principles, to do it. I think, that however it may be diſapproved by ſome rigid Diſſenters, it ought to be encouraged by all good Churchmen, as a likely means to bring them over. The allowing perſons of a different Religion from the eſtabliſhed, has been practiſed in all countries, where Liberty of Conſcience has been allowed; and we have gone farther already, in excluding Diſſenters, than any other country has done; and whatever reaſons there were to apprehend our Religion in danger from Papiſts, when the Teſt Act was made, yet there does not ſeem the leaſt danger to it from the Diſſenters now. But, on the other hand, I can ſee very great inconveniencies from this bill at preſent. As it is brought in this laſt time, indeed, they have added a plauſible clause, which, though it was in the firſt draught of the bill, was left out in the ſecond, that the Act for Toleration ſhould be always kept inviolable; but the Toleration Act being to take away all the penalties that a man may incur by going to a ſeparate congregation, and the occasional bill being to lay new penalties upon thoſe that do it, how they can ſay that this is not a violation of the other, I cannot very eaſily comprehend. I doubt it will put people in mind of what paſſed in France, where every edict againſt the Proteſtants begun with a proteſtation, that the edict of Nantz ought to be always kept inviolable, till that very edict, in which it was in expreſs words repealed. At a time that all England is engaged in a bloody, and expenſive war; at a time that theſe nations have not only ſuch conſiderable foreign enemies to deal withal, but has a party in her own bowels ready, upon all occaſions, to bring in a Popiſh Pretender, and involve us all in the ſame, or rather worſe calamities, than thoſe from which, with ſo much blood and treaſure, we have been freed; at a time that the Proteſtant Diſſenters (however they may be in the wrong by ſeparating from us, yet) are heartily united with us againſt the common foes of our Religion; what advantage is propoſed by thoſe, who are in earneſt for advancing theſe things by leſſening the number of ſuch as are firmly united in the common cauſe, I cannot for my life imagine. Therefore I am for throwing out the bill, without giving it another reading (35).

[S] That Electreſs intimated her deſire to come to England.] This will be ſeen by reading the letter, as follows:

My Lord,
I received your Grace's letter. You have no reaſon to make any excuſe, that you have not writ to me more often, for I do not judge of people's friendſhip for me by the good words they give; but I depend upon your integrity, and what you tell me of the honeſt men in England. I deſire no farther aſſurance of their good-will and affection to me, unleſs they think it neceſſary, for the good of the Proteſtant Religion, the public liberties of Europe, and the people of England.

I thank God I am in good health, and live in quiet and content here, therefore I have no reaſon to deſire to change my way of living, on the account of any perſonal ſatisfaction I can propoſe to myſelf. However, I am ready and willing to comply with whatever can be deſired of me by my friends, in caſe that the Parliament think that it is for the good of the kingdom to invite me into England. But I ſuppoſe they will do this in ſuch a manner, as will make my coming agreeable to the Queen, whom I ſhall ever honour, and endeavour to deſerve her favour, of which ſhe hath given me many public demonſtrations, by what ſhe has done for me both in England and Scotland, which you can judge of more particularly. And I muſt remember that ſhe ordered me to be prayed for in the churches. I doubt not but her Majeſty is as much inclined at preſent to eſtabliſh the ſafety of the three kingdoms upon ſuch a foot, that they may be expoſed to the leaſt hazard that is poſſible, and that ſhe will begin with England. Mr How has acquainted me with her Majeſty's good inclinations for my family, which makes me think, that her Majeſty ſees this is a proper time for her to expreſs herſelf in our favour. But whether I am right in this point or no, my friends in England can beſt judge. It is but reaſonable that I ſhould ſubmit myſelf to their opinions and advice, and I depend moſt upon what your Grace ſhall adviſe, which will ever have the greateſt weight with me. Therefore I write the more plainly to you, and tell you my thoughts, that you may communicate them to all you think fit. For they will then ſee, that I have a great zeal for the good of England, and a moſt ſincere reſpect for the Queen. This is the beſt proof I can give at preſent of my eſteem for your Grace; but I ſhall be glad of further opportunities to aſſure you, that I am, and ſhall ever be, moſt ſincerely, My Lord,

‘ Votre tres affectionnée

‘ A vous ſervir,

‘ Sophie Electrice.’

This letter was published ſometime after, together with one from Sir Rowland Gwynn to the Earl of Stamford, upon the ſame ſubject of the Princeſs's coming over, the latter being voted by both Houſes to be a ſcandalous libel, tending to create miſunderſtandings between her Majeſty and the Princeſs Sophia; and the Publisher, Mr Charles Gildon, was fined 100l. by the court of Queen's bench, May 12, 1707 (36).

(36) Boyer's Annals of Queen Ann, year IV. p.

with

with him, in a Commission for executing the office of President in that Assembly. This was thought a little derogatory to his Grace's title (dd), and though he continued to distinguish himself in the most memorable debates in Parliament, till the great change of the Ministry, in 1710 (ee), yet that change of the public affairs, together with his growing infirmities, induced him to live in a more retired manner at Lambeth. And, indeed, he had no farther share in the Administration of affairs, either ecclesiastical, or civil, than what was purely due to his Post, during the reign of Queen Ann. But her decease brought him again to Court. He was one of the three State Officers, in whose hands were lodged, by authority of Parliament, one of those instruments, empowering her successor, if abroad at the time of her demise, to appoint such Regents as he should think proper to continue the Administration in his name, till his arrival. His Grace, therefore, notwithstanding his ill state of health, went himself to the Council with this instrument (ff). He had also, afterwards, the satisfaction of crowning King George I, and of being admitted to a private conference with him; when his Majesty was highly pleased with the plainness and sincerity of his conversation, and took an opportunity of expressing his sense particularly of the Archbishop's modesty, in the most striking manner, to one of his Courtiers [T]. This was the last, and only time of our Primate's attendance upon that Prince: whence, after recommending Dr Wake, Bishop of Lincoln, for his successor at Canterbury, and his Chaplain, Dr Gibson, for the See of Lincoln, as he had done with great zeal before, Bishop Fleetwood for the See of Ely, he returned to his Palace at Lambeth, where he continued till his death, which happened on the 14th of December, 1715, in the seventy-ninth year of his age (gg). He was interred privately in the chancel of the Church at Lambeth, and in the same vault with his wife, who died the preceding year (bb), leaving him without issue. He gave very particular directions concerning his funeral, in his will. By which, besides several benefactions bestowed in his life-time, he left an uncommon number of legacies, and he bequeathed several charities, the most remarkable of which, we shall mention in note [U]. The residue of his fortune, which was very considerable, he ordered to be equally divided to the children of his kinsmen, Dr Edward Tenison (*) [W], Mr Richard Tubby, and Mr George Fage (†). As he lived (dd) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. II.

(ee) Masters, as before.

(ff) Political State, Vol. VIII. p. 103. 114.

(gg) His Life, p. 111.

(bb) Viz. on the 12th of Febr. 1714. The Inscription on the grave-stone.

(†) He likewise left Mr Fage 400 l. as one of his Executors, as he did 300 l. to Mr Sam. Bradey, the third Executor. Idem.

[T] In the most striking manner to one of his Courtiers.]

This was a certain nobleman that had been a great solicitor for grants, &c. on all occasions, who asking his Majesty how he liked the Archbishop, he was pleased to answer; to the greatest degree of satisfaction. since that venerable old man had been above an hour and a half with him, and in all that time had not asked one favour of him for himself or friends (37).

[U] His most remarkable charities.] His will is dated April 11, 1715 (38). The first article in it is the inscription over his grave,

Here lyeth
the Body of THOMAS TENISON, late
Archbishop of Canterbury, who departed this life in peace on the 14th day of December,
MDCCXV (39).

Besides the donations already mentioned in his life-time, he founded a charity-school at Lambeth for the education of twelve poor girls; and another at Croyden. He built, anno 1706, the episcopal throne in the church of Canterbury, at the expence of 244 l. 8 s. 2 d. In 1707, he gave books to the library of St Paul's cathedral, London, to the value of 256 l. 17 s. In 1709, he gave seventy guineas to the poor Palatines. In 1710, he gave 30 l. towards beautifying the chancel of the parish-church of Cranbrook in Kent. In 1713, he presented to the church of Lambeth a velvet pall, which cost him 46 l. (40), and he had before been a great encourager of Strype in writing his life of Archbishop Parker, besides bearing the expence of the plate of his Grace's figure prefixed thereto. To these must be added his benefactions to Bennet-College in Cambridge, to the amount of about 3000 l. (41), and to the University 50 l. to advance printing there, besides the copy of Dr Spencer's book De Legibus Hebraeorum. By his will he gave to the Society for propagation of the gospel, 1000 l. toward the settlement of two Protestant bishops; one on the continent, the other on one of the isles in North America. The interest of which sum to be given in the mean time to such disabled missionaries of the province of Canterbury as have discharged their trusts faithfully. To the Governors of Queen Ann's bounty for the augmentation of five small livings in Kent, 1000 l. (42). To the corporation for the relief of clergymen's widows and children, 500 l. To Bromley-College, fifty guineas toward repairing the house, and the like sum to the poor widows thereof. To the French Protestant refugees, 100 l. To the parish of Lambeth, a piece of ground for a burying-place, whereon his school was erected. To Archbishop Whitgift's hospital at Croyden, 100 l. with 400 l. to the school founded there in his life-time. To ten poor Rectors or Vicars in the diocese of Canterbury, 10 l. each. To the poor of Canterbury, Lambeth, and Croyden, 40 l. each. To those of St Martin's in the Fields, London, and St James's, Westminster, 30 l. each. And to those of Topcroft, Tharston, and Bracon-Ash in Norfolk, Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, and Holywell in Huntingdonshire, 10 l. each. He gave his fire-engine, maps, and pictures, in Lambeth-house, to the use of his successors; and many books and papers to the library there. To his chaplains, relations, and servants, &c. he made handsome bequests; and to Dr Lilly Butler, minister of Aldermanbury, who had many children, 50 l.

[W] Dr. Edward Tenison.] As this relation of our Archbishop made some noise in his life-time, we shall give the following account of him. He was a native of Norwich, and son of the Register to the Archdeacon of Norfolk, and nephew to the Lady Dorothy Browne, widow of the famous Sir Thomas Browne the physician. After going through St Paul's school, under Dr Gale, he was admitted of Bennet-College, Cambridge, in 1690, and soon after became a scholar of the house, upon Archbishop Parker's foundation. In 1694, he took the degree of A. B. at Cambridge; but proceeded to that of LL. B. (43) probably at Lambeth, where he was afterwards created D. D. He was ordained both Deacon and Priest by Bishop Sprat in 1697, and collated by our Archbishop the same year to the Rectory of Wittersham in the isle of Oxney in Kent, which he quitted, in 1698, for that of Sundrich, a peculiar of the Archbishop's in the diocese of Rochester, to which the same patron afterwards added the adjoining Rectory of Chidingstone, which he held together for many years. In 1704, he had the Prebend of Tarvin in the church of Litchfield, but resigned this to his kinsman, Mr George Fage, upon his instalment to a Canonry in that of Canterbury in 1708, and to the Archdeaconry of Carmarthen the same year. Upon the first arrival of his late Majesty King George II, then Prince of Wales, in England, the Doctor was appointed one of his Chaplains, and so continued after his advancement to the throne. He had married a lady, whose name was Searle, more nearly related to the Archbishop than himself, she being his niece; he had by her one son and five daughters, to each of whom his Grace bequeathed 1600 l. and made him one of his Executors (44). His Uncle, who had been Steward to the Archbishop, left him all his substance, to the amount of 12000 l. With which, and a great part of his children's fortunes, he embarked in the South-Sea, in 1720; and, when stocks were at the highest, bought an estate of Lord Bulkeley's, in the isle of Anglesea, which (43) Where he took this degree is not certainly known.

(44) In the discharge of this trust, he entered too warmly into a litigation with Archbishop Wake about the dilapidations of the palaces at Lambeth and Croyden: the merits of which he published. Letter to Mr Archdeacon Tenison, &c. by Henry Farrar, Proctor in the Commons. Lond. 1714. 4to.

(37) He also left to this kinsman's son, Thomas Tenison, who was his Godson, 300 l. to each of his daughters 50 l. and to the father, Dr Edw. Tenison, 1000 l. as one of the Executors of his Will. From the Probate in the Prerogative Office.

(38) His Life, p. 111.

(39) The Probate in the Prerogative Office.

(40) It is upon his grave-stone of black marble.

(41) On it was a bible, embroidered with gold and silver, and this sentence: There remaineth a rest for the people of God. Le Neve, under the Archbishop's article.

(42) Besides paving Bennet-college hall with stone, and wainscoting with oak that Norwich fellowship chamber wherein he himself had dwelt, he gave the advowsons of the Rectories of Duxford, St Peter in Cambridgeshire, and of Stalbridge in Dorsetshire, and the interest of 1000 l. for augmenting scholarships and fellowships left by his will. Masters, p. 64, 79, 80.

(43) The Rectories of Hawking, and St James in Dover, and the vicarages of Lidden, Debtling, and St Dunstan's, all in Kent, or the city of Canterbury.

(ii) p. 112.

lived in the times of the severest trial, so his character has been variously represented. The following sketch of it being taken from the Writer of his Memoirs (ii), with some alterations, is submitted to the readers censure. He was a Prelate who ordinarily, through the whole course of his life, practised that integrity and resolution he first set out with: nor was he influenced by the changes of the age he lived in, to act contrary to the pure and peaceable spirit of the Gospel. He adorned his high station with an exemplary Piety, and a munificent Charity, and was happily endued with such a hardiness of temper, as enabled him to steer the Church with steadiness through those violent storms of party, the rage of which too much affected the too tender spirit of his Predecessor. The Primate's character, as a writer, is seen in his performances of that kind. He had the misfortune to be given by Burnet (kk) for a very learned man, who maintained the Protestant cause against Popery, not only with courage, but judgment too. This high-charged colouring, provoked another Writer to darken it, by representing him as losing ground in the controversy with the Church of Rome, maintaining that he was foiled in his conference with Pulton the Jesuit, for want of capacity to defend so good a cause; and had committed too many blunders in his writings, to be reckoned, either a man of good sense, or extraordinary learning (ll). Upon the whole, it cannot be denied, that the Archbishop's writings set his character as a scholar far enough above contempt; and though we should allow, that his manner is rather heavy and clumsy, than elegant or accurate; yet that bitter sarcasm upon him, which is commonly fathered upon Dean Swift, cannot be treated with too much indignation, that he was hot and heavy like a Taylor's Goose. Besides what has been already mentioned, the Archbishop published several other pieces, a list of which is inserted below [X].

(kk) In the Hist. of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 190. fol. Edit.

(ll) Higgons's Rem. on Burnet's History, p. 186.

(45) He agreed to give 3000*l.* and deposited 1000*l.* which was forfeited on his being unable to complete the purchase by the fall of stocks.

(46) This arose from prejudices contracted in its favour, by some books he had met with at school, so that at one breaking-up he travelled on foot through Wales to take a survey of it.

(47) Late Dean of Canterbury.

(48) As was thought for want of bleeding, to which he would not submit.

(49) After burying all her daughters single, except one, who married Mr Peter St Eloy, one of the Deputy-Registers of the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury.

(50) But clogged with such conditions, that the Society refused it, and the clause was afterwards revoked by a codicil. Agriculture was his favourite study; he encouraged and recommended it in his Diocese, by publishing two books of Calumella De Re Rustica, which he gave away to the youth, who were lovers of it. Ware's Hist. of the Irish Bishops, p. 433. Edit. 1739.

(51) A strong instance of this temper we have in his remarkable Protest, made in the Convocation, in 1717, in the height of the Bangorian Controversy, in defence of that Prelate, printed Feb. 1717-18.

which purchase was made void by act of Parliament (45). He retired however to that island, with all his family, in 1723, to which he had a strong attachment (46); but on trial, finding it by no means answerable to his expectations, he was glad to return again to his prebendal house at Canterbury, for which Church he was chosen Professor in Convocation, in 1727. Where, after resigning Sundrich to Dr Lynch (47), and Chidingstone to his son, he resided till 1730, when he went first Chaplain to the Duke of Dorset, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who gave him the Bishopric of Ossory in that Kingdom. Upon which he resided the rest of his life, which was not long, being cut off by a pleurisy (48), in 1735. He died at Dublin, and was buried in St Mary's Church in that city. His wife survived him, and has not been dead many years (49). By will he bequeathed 40*l.* per ann. during life, to Michael Stephenson, a Deacon, to catechise the children of Papists in the parish of Kilkeasy (a wild and mountainous part of his Diocese) where he obliged him to residence, under the penalty of forfeiting the pension.—To the Incorporated Society for promoting English Protestant schools, 20*l.*—To every Incumbent, and Resident Curate in his Diocese, a copy of the latest edition of Chillingworth's Religion of Protestants. To the poor of Kilkenny, Canterbury, Sundrich, and Chidingstone, 20*l.* each. To the parishes of Aghnacart, Rosconnell, Kildemogh, Kilbeacon, Listerling, and Kilkeasy, 10*l.* each, for building and enlarging small oratories within the ruined walls of those Churches. And to Bennet-College in Cambridge, besides a legacy of 200*l.* for the encouragement of the study of agriculture, he bequeathed 40*l.* per ann. for founding a lecture on husbandry (50). The Bishop being ever of a generous hospitable disposition, was likewise liberal in his charities while living; and no man had the propagation of the Protestant Religion more at heart, than himself; but he has been thought, by some, in great measure to have defeated his own good intentions, by too intemperate a zeal, by too unhappy an obstinacy in his temper, and by too inflexible an adherence to his own schemes and ways. In public life, he was indefatigably resolute in the support of the present establishment; and in carrying forward any work of common utility: in private, no one was more loved as a friend, nor dreaded as an enemy; so that nothing could better characterize him, than the motto he made choice of, Petra immobilior (51). Besides his Protest, mentioned in the margin, he published two Letters to the Prolocutor [Dr Stanhope], in 1718; and two Sermons, one called, The Excellency and Usefulness of a Public Spirit, preached before the Gentlemen educated at St Paul's School, January 25, 1710; and the other preached before the Lords at Christ-Church, Dublin, November 5, 1733.

His only son, Thomas, who was born in Kent, in 1700, and bred at the Schools of Croyden and Sevenoak, was admitted, by proxy, at Bennet-College, in May, 1711; but being then of an unstatutable age, that admission was superseded, which his father, for other reasons, so resented, as afterwards to enter him at Clare-Hall, where he resided when he came to the University; but after taking the degree of LL. B. there, in 1724, he removed to Trinity-Hall, being put into a Fellowship by Sir Nathaniel Lloyd, the Master, upon a lapse incurred by the Fellows, and proceeded LL. D. in 1726. His father being uncertain what profession he might make choice of, and that no qualification for any might be wanting, admitted him both at the Temple and Doctor's Commons, at the same time that he did at the University: however, he had like to have eluded all these precautions, and defeated all his father's views, by an imprudent conduct. Provoked by a gentle, though just correction, at Sevenoak School, to which he was removed against his will, he stole away to Bristol, and embarked there on board a vessel in the slave trade, bound to Guinea, where, by his good behaviour, he rose to be Superintendent of the slaves, during their voyage to Barbadoes. Great offers were made him there, on account of his skill in writing and accounts, if he would have staid, and become a Schoolmaster; but being, by this time, desirous of returning to his native country, he rejected these, and after eighteen months absence, and being obliged to work his passage home, as a common sailor, he came to his family and friends, who, having heard nothing of him during all that time, received him gladly, though his habit and complexion, at first, disguised him from their knowledge. After his return, his father grew exceedingly fond of him, and upon his leaving the University, resigned to him, in April 1727, first the Archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and then the Rectory of Chidingstone, which he held with the Vicarage of Lydd in Kent, and the Sinecure of Llandrillo in Wales. He was appointed Chancellor of the Diocese of Oxford, 1734 (*), after having been Commissary in that of Canterbury, of which Cathedral he was installed a Prebendary, February 10, 1738, where, May 7, 1742, he died (52), and was buried, not living to finish the new prebendal house he had begun. His first wife was the eldest daughter of Dr Potter, then Bishop of Oxford, who died in 1729 (53). His second wife, who survived him, was the daughter of Mr Smith of Nottingham, by whom he had one son living, in 1757, and a daughter. The Doctor, from his youth, was of an open, generous, good-natured disposition, but mixed with such a warmth and impetuosity of temper, and that inflamed by a party zeal, as made him impatient of any control, and inclined him to be self-opinionated and wayward (54).

[X] A list of which is inserted below.] These are the following Sermons: 1. Against Self-Love; before the Commons, on a fast, June 5, 1689. 2. On doing Good to Posterity; before their Majesties, at Whitehall, in February, 1689-90. 3. On the wandering of the Mind in God's Service; February 15, 1690. 4to. 4. The Folly of Atheism; before the Queen, at Whitehall, February 22, 1690 (55). 5. Before the Sons of the Clergy, December 3, 1691. 4to. 6. Concerning the Celestial Body of a Christian; before the Queen, at Easter, Lond. 1694. 4to. 7. Concerning Holy Resolution; before the King, December 30, 1694. 8. A Letter to the Archdeacon, and the rest of the Clergy of St David's; Lond. 1703. 8vo.

(*) Upon the resignation of the Lord Talbot, Lord Chancellor of England.

(52) He had laboured some years before his death under an aneurism in one of the Carotid arteries.

(53) In child-bed, at the age of eighteen, and was buried in St Margaret's, Westminster, where a monument is erected to her memory.

(54) Masters, p. 400 to 405.

(55) He also wrote a Preface to a piece entitled, Certain Passages which happened at Newport in the Isle of Wight, Nov. 29, 1648, relating to King Charles, written by Mr Edward Cook of Higham in Gloucestershire, sometime Colonel of a regiment under Cromwell, first published in 1690. 4to. Bishop Kennet from the mouth of the Archbishop, who complained to him, that the Preface was left out in a following edition. Comp. Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 178.

9. A Copy of his Speech; February 19, 1701-2. 10. His Circular Letter; Lond. 1707. 4to. He is likewise supposed to be the Author of The Grievances of the Church of England, which are not in the Power of its Governors to remedy. And there is a Letter of his, relating to the life of Thanet, among Mr Lewis's manuscripts, once in the possession of the late Dr Rawlinson, but is now in Sir Peter Thompson's collections.

And there is a Letter of his, relating to the life of Thanet, among Mr Lewis's manuscripts, once in the possession of the late Dr Rawlinson, but is now in Sir Peter Thompson's collections.

THORESBY [RALPH], (a) an eminent Antiquarian, who flourished in the latter end of the last, and the beginning of the present Century; was descended from a family, whose origin is carried up as high as to the time of King Canute, the Dane [A]; and at the Norman conquest, was seated at Thoresby in Yorkshire. But that branch, from which our Author sprung, having been settled for several generations at Leedes, in the West Riding of that County, where they lived in good reputation as merchants, he was born there on the 16th of August, 1658, and after going through the Grammar-school of that town, was carried, in 1677, for further improvement, to London, and placed in the family of a worthy relation by his Father; who, though a merchant by profession, had a particular turn to the knowledge of Antiquities (b), which being inherited by this his eldest son, he employed his leisure hours in visiting the most remarkable places in and near the great Metropolis, copying the monumental inscriptions, studying their history, and particularly collecting accounts of Protestant benefactions (c). However, his Father designing him for his own business, sent him the next spring, 1678, to Rotterdam, in order to learn the Dutch and French languages, and to be perfected in mercantile accomplishments. The young Gentleman made a good progress in the languages, studying them grammatically: and in the interim, joined in company with some other Gentlemen, (who understood them) in a tour that summer through the principal towns in Holland, when he made several ingenious observations on the manners of the people, and the curiosities of the country. But his stay there happened to be much shorter than was intended; for being seized with a dangerous ague, he was obliged to return in December, the same year, to his native air. The distemper proving still obstinate after his return, he made several small excursions the ensuing summer, in order to clear off the remains of it. These exercises, though undertaken for the sake of his health, furnished him with an opportunity (which he did not let slip) of improving his knowledge in local antiquities. But scarce was he recovered from this disorder, before it pleased God to visit him with another severe affliction in the sudden death of his father [B], on the 31st of October this year, 1679. This melancholy event devolved

(a) The chief particulars of this article were communicated by the eldest son of Mr Thoresby.

(b) He was also possessed of a good share of learning, and superintended every part of his son's education.

(5) The title of which may be seen in Bale's Script. Brit. Cent. 6. p. 493. Some constitutions of his in a provincial Synod, in 1364 and 1367, are among Dodsworth's MSS. at Oxford. And some regulations made by him in Fossegate hospital at York, are in Dugdale's Monast. p. 266. Edit. 1718.

(6) The original MS. is in the Archbishop's Register-office at York, which being transcribed in 1702 by Mr R. Thoresby, is printed in his Vicaria Leodiensis. Append. No. 7.

(7) Wood's Hist. and Antiq. Univ. Oxon. p. 181.

(8) The Chapel, with all its rich furniture, was demolished at the Reformation.

(9) See the article of R. Sutton, Founder of that hospital.

(10) He died at Mackney, and was buried in that Church, where there is a handsome monument to his memory.

(11) Ducat. Leod. p. 71, 72, 73.

(12) He sometimes diverted himself with writing as well as reading poetry, A copy of recommended verses by him is prefixed to Scarborough Spaw, spagyrically anatomized by G. Tomial, M. D. edit. 1670.

(e) Here he also began by the direction, and after the example of his Father, to keep a Diary of his Life, which he continued till near the time of his death.

[A] Whose origin is carried up to the time of Canute.

The pedigree of this family, which is one of the most complete that we have (1), begins with Aykfrith, or Aykfrith, a noble Baron, who in the time of King Kneut, the Dane, was Lord of Dent, Sudbergh, and twelve other seignories, which, in the time of King Edward the Confessor, descended to his son Arkill, whose son, Gospatrick, was Lord of Thoresby at the Conquest; whence the family from that time took the name of Thoresby. From Gospatrick, in the fifth lincal descent, sprung Sir Adam Thoresby, Knight, of Thoresby near Middleham, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, one of whose great grandsons, was the famous Cardinal John Thoresby, who being bred at Oxford, was much esteemed both as a Divine and Canonist (2), and in September, 1347, was consecrated Bishop of St David's, having been made, on the 2d of July preceding, Keeper of the Great-Seal, by Edward III, whom he attended the same year at the siege and taking of Calais, with a retinue of one Banneret, two Knights, thirty Esquires, thirty Archers on horse-back, and thirty-six on foot (3). In 1349, he was translated to the Bishoprick of Worcester, and the same year made Lord Chancellor of England. After which he was created Cardinal of St Peter ad Vincula, and in 1352, nominated Archbishop of York, and being enthronized in 1354, he then resigned the Great-Seal, devoting himself intirely to the duties of his spiritual function with exemplary humility and charity (4). In this spirit, he made an accord with the Archbishop of Canterbury, whereby he waved the right of bearing the cross in his province, a dispute which had long subsisted, to the great scandal of the Church. In 1361, he began the foundation of the choir in York Minster, and, laying the first stone himself, gave 100 l. then, and 200 l. per ann. afterwards, till it was finished. He also beautified the Lady's-Chapel at the east end with images and pictures of costly, and excellent workmanship, and removing the bodies of diverse of his Predecessors, that lay dispersed about the Church, he had them entombed there at his own expence, leaving a place for himself in the middle: he likewise founded a Chantry therein, with a salary of 40s. per ann. Lastly, he gave this Church two mitres of considerable value. Besides these benefactions, he gave the Rectory of Roxby to the Monks of Drax, erected Vicarages in some improper Churches ill served before, and enlarged the endowment of others. Some of which Vicars he defended in an express treatise against the Friars Mendicants, in Latin (5). But his principal glory is his English Exposition of the Ten Commandments, Lord's Prayer, Creed, Sacrament (6), &c. which he ordered all the Clergy to read diligently to their parishioners, a reform justly to be admired for the courage shewn in it in the time of Edward III; and in the same spirit, he was a great favourer of Wickliffe, and is justly named the first of that first Reformer's friends (7). He died November 6, 1373, at his manor of Thorp, and was interred in the middle of his Chapel aforementioned (8). This Archbishop's elder brother, Hugh Thoresby, was father of John Thoresby, who flourished in 25 Edward III, and was Ancestor to three families of his name, seated in Yorkshire, Essex, and Norfolk; from the first of which descended Henry Thoresby, who, removing to London, became one of the first Governors of Charter-house (9), and having no male issue, the above-mentioned manor of Thoresby came into the possession of Sir Thomas Hardress of Great Hardress in Kent, who married Elinor, sole daughter and heir of the said Henry (10); whose younger brother, Ralph Thoresby of Woolham near Barnard-Castle, was father to George Thoresby of West Cottingwith, Com. Ebor. and George's eldest son, John Thoresby, Merchant and Alderman of Leedes, was grandfather to Ralph Thoresby, the subject of the present article, to whom we owe this account of his family (11).

[B] His father died suddenly. The manner of his death must needs have greatly surprized his family. In the evening of the 30th, he went in good health to bed, and in the morning was found dead on his knees and face. It was somewhat remarkable, that in the evening, after reading a portion of Scripture as usual, he insisted in his explication much longer than his ordinary custom, and prayed with the greatest fervency imaginable. In his closet also was found a short pious hymn, written with his own hand, and, no doubt, his own composition (12), beginning with the following lines:

Remember, Mortal, that unlook'd for death
Oft in deep sleep surprizes vital breath;
Then slumber not, for often the most sound,
When he thinks least, next morning dead is found.

(1) Richard Lee Clarendon added this note to it. But, in my opinion, I never saw any descent so well travelled, nor truly set down. Ducat. Leod. p. 75.

(2) Upon which account, John Baconthorp dedicated to him his Commentary upon Aristotle's Ethics. Godwin's Catalogue of the Archbishops of York.

(3) In all ninety-nine, which was more than half a dozen of some of the Barons, and eighteen among the Knights. MS. of the late Mr Warburton. Somerset Herald.

(4) Stubbs de Pontif. Ebor. inter decem Scriptores Anglia, p. 173.

(d) Jeremiah and Abigail.

devolved on him the care of a brother and sister (d); whose education and settlement in the world, he conducted with a paternal tenderness and prudence: In the mean time, he entered into his father's business of a Merchant; and because the foreign woollen trade from Leedes had fallen to decay before the old Gentleman's death, he endeavoured to make up that defect by the linnen trade, in which view he purchased his freedom in the incorporated Society of Merchant-Adventurers, trading to Hamburg. Being now settled in business, he began to think of entering into the nuptial state, and accordingly, on the 25th of February, 1684-5, he married Anna, the third daughter, and coheirs of Richard Sykes of Leedes, Gent. [C]. He was extremely happy in his choice; but this domestic happiness was soon disturbed by the infelicity of the times under James II. He had been bred among the Presbyterians, but never imbibing any of their rigid principles, he had always occasionally conformed (e) to the established Church; and now that Popery began to threaten the ruin of that Church; he more frequently attended its worship, in the view of promoting such an union of the Protestants, as was in this juncture thought necessary on both sides, for their mutual preservation. All this while, though merchandize was his profession, yet learning and antiquities were his great delight, and they took so firm a possession of his heart, that contenting himself with a moderate patrimony, he made those researches the great employment of his life. He had been initiated into these studies by his Father, and the old Gentleman's learned friends (particularly the Fairfax family (†)) observing the son's inclination and genius, turned the same way, transferred their respect to him. But the number was much increased by himself. Two of the earliest and most intimate of these, were Mr Thornton, the Recorder of Leedes, and the celebrated Bishop Nicolson [D], to whom must be added, Bi-

(e) In this too he was trained up by, and followed the example of, his Father.

(13) His Diary, now in the hands of his eldest son.

(14) A funeral sermon was preached the next day at the Presbyterian Meeting-house, by Mr Sharp, the Minister there, who also wrote an account of his life, being assisted therein by Mr Thoresby. Both pieces are in Mus. Thoresb. MSS. in 4to. No. 158.

(15) Vide Phil. Collections for Jan. 10, 1681-2. No. 4. Article 2. by Dr Martin Lister, to whom he was well known.

(*) The Chief Magistrate is styled Alderman by our Author, from the first incorporation of the town, in 1626, to the Restoration; when a new Charter being granted, he gives the title of Mayor to the same Magistrate. Ducat. Leod. p. 265.

(16) Among other benefactions, he built and endowed St John's church, here. Vicaria Leod. p. 79.

(17) Ducatus Leod. p. 34, 263, 266.

(†) This Gentleman wrote an excellent answer to Priestcraft in Perfection; as also Reasons for taking the Oaths to Queen Anne: both in Mus. Thoresb. MSS. in 4to. No. 178.

Such an extraordinary case may serve to confirm the opinion of some Divines and Philosophers, that the soul of man, when near its separation from the body, acts with an extraordinary vigour, and becomes receptive of a kind of prophetic influence: an observation which was remembered on this occasion by his son, who piously added his own assent to it (13). The old gentleman was buried in St Peter's church (14), where there is a decent monument erected to his memory, with an elegant Latin inscription, which, because of the great resemblance it bears to the character of the son, we shall insert as follows:

M. S.
*Juxta in pace requiescit
quod mortale fuit*
JOANNIS THORESBY, Gen.
THORSEBIORUM DE THORESBY Comitatus EBORAC
Antiquæ, qua ortus est, familie Ornamenti;
*Historiarum & Antiquitatum peritissimi (15):
Viri, si quis alius*
*Ob exemplarem & vere primævam pietatem.
Venusitam morum Comitatem
fervidam erga omnes charitatem
Deo & hominibus dilectissimi.*
*Cujus
piissimam & bene præparatam animam
Mors repentina non abripuit, sed
Cælo reddidit*
XXXI O. Tob. Anno { Salutis MDCLXXIX.
 Ætatis suæ LIV.

He was the founder of the Museum Thoresbianum, by purchasing the Lord Fairfax's valuable collection of coins and medals of his Lordship's executors, after it had been enriched with the coins and medals collected by Mr Stonehouse, Rector of Darfield in Yorkshire.

[C] Daughter and co-heir of Richard Sykes. This gentleman was descended from a family of his name at Sykes-dike near Carlisle, whence William Sykes, a younger brother, coming into this country, improved his fortune considerably by the cloathing trade: his grandson, Richard Sykes, was Alderman of Leedes when first incorporated, and one of the most eminent merchants in these parts, whose son, Richard Sykes, Mrs Thoresby's great grandfather, was also Alderman (*) of the town in 1629 and 1636, and first purchased the manor from the crown. But, at the request of Mr Harrison, a grand benefactor to the place (16), let him and half a dozen more come in as joint purchasers with him, on this consideration, that the Lordship, if vested in a single person, would have given him too great a superiority; which the good old gentleman not being ambitious of, reserved only one share for himself, and another for his son, William Sykes, merchant, admitting the rest as he had contracted for it. The old gentleman, as is said, being great grandfather to Mrs Thoresby, our Author in her right became possessed of his share (17).

[D] Mr Thornton, Bishop Nicolson, Gibson, Keimet, &c. To begin with the first of these, Mr Thornton (†). This most intimate and useful friend was possessed of a curious library, in which were many valuable manuscripts, and gave Mr Thoresby the liberty of taking copies of whatever he pleased, who, among other things, transcribed a folio volume of the pedigrees of the gentry of the West-riding of Yorkshire, written by Mr Hopkinson, with which he enriched the Museum Thoresbianum. To this eminent Recorder is joined Bishop Nicolson, with whom our Author held a constant correspondence, and their mutual communications were free and frequent, and ended not till death (18). What gives this learned Bishop a title to a prime place among our Author's correspondents is, that he first of all discovered the value of that famous silver Runic coin, or medal, which is the distinguishing ornament and glory of the Museum Thoresbianum. This most curious piece had lain in the father's collection unnoticed, as being unknown till the son sent it, being not bigger than a silver groat, under the seal of a letter to his friend, Dr Nicolson, then Archdeacon of Carlisle, who returned it with a reading and interpretation of the inscription, as follows, Thur Gut Luetis, i. e. Thoris Dei facies, The Effigies of the God Thor (19). This is literally the greatest curiosity of the kind in the world. This single medal being the only one known to be in any Museum in Europe, with the true Runic letters upon it. On one side it represents the figure of the God Thor, with a glory incircling his head, and a scepter or golden mallet in his hand; on the reverse two crescents, &c. A learned Foreigner has printed a treatise upon it, intitled, De argento Runis seu literis Gothicis insignito, quod delineatum in Camdeni Britannia Anglice nunc loquente, & ampliata literato exhibetur orbi, sententia Nicolai Kederi, Regii antiquitatum collegii, quod Holmiæ est, Assessoris Lipsiæ 1703, 4to (20). This otherwise invaluable piece is more particularly so to the family who possess it, by bearing the God Thor (21), whence the name of Thoresby is derived. The word bye in the Saxon language signifying habitation; so that Thoresby intends the habitation or seat of Thor. In our Author's Museum is a coin of King Edward senior, an. 901 (22,) with this inscription, EDWARD. REX. round the King's head, with a crown and a sort of arched scepter. On the reverse these words, DORR. ON EOFFERIC, i. e. Thor of York (23); and another of King Edward the Confessor, an. 1042, with the same words on the reverse (24). Whence he concludes, that this Thor was probably the very same person who is frequently mentioned in the Domesday-book, as having had a vast estate in the Northern parts of England. However, being disposed thereof by the Conqueror, most of it lay waste at the time of that memorable survey. But to proceed, The new edition of Camden's Britannia in 1695 introduced our Author to Dr Gibson, at whose request he wrote notes and additional observations on the West-riding of Yorkshire, and, for the use of this edition, he transmitted above a hundred of his coins to Mr Obadiah Walker (25), who undertook that province which relate to the Roman, British, and Saxon monies. And, when the Bishop was preparing that work for another and more complete impression, Mr Thoresby sent a great

(1) Mr John Thoresby had merited the Patronage of this family, first by entering into the army under the General in the Parliament's service, and afterwards, in 1659, against the remains of the same Parliament, then called the Rump, and in favour of the King's Restoration; when Mr Thoresby not only engaged himself, but brought a large party along with him. Mr R. Thoresby's Diary.

(18) They were strictly cotemporaries, the Bishop being born in 1655, and dying in Feb. 1726-7; see his Article; and our Author's birth happened in 1658, and his death in Oct. 1725.

(19) The substance of his description is inserted in Dr Gibson's edition of Camden's Britannia, p. 814.

(20) Most Danish Antiquaries being of opinion, that no current monies were ever minted in these Northern Kingdoms before the Runic characters were laid aside, therefore Mr Keder, differing from all others, will have the image, which has a glory round its head, on the face of this coin, to be that of our Saviour.

(21) One of the deities of our Saxon or Danish ancestors, whence that day of the week called Thursday, or Thor'sday, takes its name.

(22) Ducatus Leod. p. 344. * P is the Saxon W.

(23) As explained by our Author: the steps being easy from Eoferwic to Yferwic, Yorwic, and York.

(24) Ducatus Leod. p. 347, 348.

(25) Master of University-College in Oxford in the reign of King James II. See his Article.

many

(g) Besides the Archbishop, he consulted other judicious friends on this important occasion, particularly Mr Thorn, the Recorder above mentioned. He was also more inclined to the Church by the ministry of the Vicar of his parish, Mr Kingbeck, a Clergyman of so excellent a character, that Archbishop Sharp, in a private conversation, professed him to be his Clergyman as an example, both for preaching, and practice. Vic. Leod. p. 725.

shop Gibson, Dr Gale, Dean of York, and his two sons, Dr Hickes, Sir Andrew Fountaine, Mr Wauley, Mr Hearne, Dr Richardson, Mr Ray, Mr Strype, Bishop Kennet [D], and above all, Archbishop Sharp, his Diocesan: who, to his knowledge in Theology, added a good taste for coins and medals, and collected a curious cabinet of them. Their conversation frequently turned upon subjects of that nature, and his Grace presented to him a copy of his Remarks on English, Scotch, and Irish money (f), requesting his additions to them, with his opinion of some particular Saxon coins, which it was difficult to determine to what King they belonged [E]. But, in the interim, there arose an affair more immediately interesting to Mr Thoresby, in which he consulted the Archbishop, and received from him a most affectionate treatment, as well by letters, as personal conversation. We have already observed, that our Author, in the time of King James, frequently attended the worship of the Church of England, in the view of strengthening the Protestant bulwark against the Papists. This compliance, though done with so good a design, happened highly to displease his Presbyterian Pastor, who, how worthy soever in other respects, behaved on this occasion with such an indiscreet zeal, as turned to the prejudice of his own cause. Mr Thoresby was thereby prompted to enter into a closer examination of the arguments on both sides, and, advising with the Archbishop, was settled by his Grace in full communion with the Church established (g). In the mean time, the circle of his acquaintance, already large, kept continually spreading [F], an advantage which naturally grew many queries to Mr Thoresby, which were answered with alacrity, and the desired expedition accompanied with other miscellaneous observations, entirely to his Lordship's satisfaction.

(f) See a particular account of the Contents of this treatise in Mus. Thoresb. No. 95. of the MSS. in folio, Ducat. Leod. p. 528.

The particulars of the mutual communication between our Author and Dr Gale, Dean of York, and his two sons, especially his son, Roger Gale, Esq; are too numerous to insert here (26), but frequently and gratefully acknowledged in the Ducatus Leodiensis. Our Author, speaking of the Armitage family, and their chief seat called Kirklees, observes that it was of old a Benedictine nunnery. Near which the noted Robin Hood lies buried under a grave-stone, that yet remains near the Park, but the inscription scarce legible (27). But he afterwards gives us, from the papers of Dr Gale, Dean of York, the following epitaph:

Here underneath this last stean lais robert earl of Huntingun nea arer ver as hie sa geud an pip kauld im robin heud sick uclaw; as hi an is men wi englant mbr si egen.
 obit 24 kal. decembri; 1247 (28).

Mr Thoresby's correspondence with Dr Hickes was also for some time very frequent. Among other things, the Doctor favoured him with his thoughts upon the inscription of the abovementioned Runic medal. Concerning which he varies a little from Bishop Nicolson, rendering it, Thor Deus Populi, seu Thor Nationis Deus, vel Deus Patrius. Thor the God of the People, Nation, or Country. The reason whereof may be seen in Sir Andrew Fountaine's Dissertatio Epistolaris to Thomas Earl of Pembroke, where it is very well engraved (29).

Mr. Thomas Hearne requested our Author's correspondence, the favour of which he acknowledged often in print. For instance, in his edition of Livy's Roman history, Vol. 6, p. 181, for an inscription relating to the ninth legion (30). Mr Hearne also published a letter of Mr Thoresby at the end of the first volume of Leland's Itinerary, concerning some antiquities found in Yorkshire, with a discourse of his own upon them (31). And to his Sylloge Epistolarum a variis Angliæ Principibus scriptarum, at the end of Titu Livii Fero Juliensis Vita Henrici Quinti, he has subjoined Auctarium Epistolarum ex Autographis in Museo Thoresbiano (*). This celebrated Antiquary published likewise a letter of Mr Thoresby's to Dr Richardson of North Bierly in Yorkshire, giving an account of the hospital of St Mary Magdalen at Baure, in the West riding of Yorkshire (32). Mr Strype thought himself obliged to our Author for communicating some original letters in his collection (33). Mr Ray, among other things, received from our Author a collection of Local words (34), with which he promised to enrich the next edition of that book, if there should be a call for another. Bishop Kennet, in his correspondence with our Author, thankfully acknowledges the receipt of some accounts of benefactions, &c. from him. Besides these persons mentioned above, Mr Thoresby imparted to Dr Edmund Calamy memoirs of several Northern Divines for his abridgment of Baxter's life and times, as he did also of some of the worthy Royalists to Mr Walker for his Sufferings of the Clergy, which was published as an antidote to Dr Calamy's book: esteeming good men of all parties worthy to have their names and characters transmitted to posterity.

[E] The Archbishop desired his opinion of some particular coins, &c. His Grace had begun a most useful work, of collecting the endowments and benefactions belonging to the churches and chapels in his extensive diocese, and desired Mr Thoresby to give him an account of what things had been done of that kind in the parish of Leedes. A more agreeable task could not have been enjoined him; and from the commissions of pious uses, and other manuscripts, he returned so ample and satisfactory an history, that he not only received his Grace's thanks for it, but the thanks also of his successor, Sir William Dawes.

[F] His acquaintance, already large, kept spreading. It would be injurious to the memory of Mr Thoresby, in whose composition gratitude was a most rich and lovely ingredient, to omit mentioning, among his principal friends, his obligations to Mr Boulter, of Gawthorp-hall, a gentleman of ample fortune, and as great munificence; a considerable patron of learning and learned men; the noblest benefactor to his Museum, and for whom he drew up the antiquities of his seat and parish of Harwood. To Mr Boulter must be added that noble benefactress, Lady Elizabeth Hastings, to whom he was indebted for many acts of favour and respect. And to his friends among the Antiquaries must be subjoined Dr Benjamin Longwith, first Fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and afterwards Rector of Petworth in Sussex, and Mr Smith, Rector of Melfonby in Yorkshire. To the former of whom Mr Thoresby's collection was helpful in settling the true standard of the Roman ounce (35) by a very curious Denarius, described in a treatise written by the latter (36), for the use of which, among the rest of his Roman coins, it had been furnished by our Author. In general, Mr Thoresby was well respected by the clergy and gentry of his town and neighbourhood, who had any taste for learning or regard for piety. But it is in particular due to the memory of Mr John Lucas, to acknowledge how kind, affectionate, and serviceable a friend he was to our Author and his family, as well after as before his death, for many years; and though his business was teaching young people to read and write, yet he was a good master of the learned languages, was an excellent historian, and left behind him, in writing, many good collections, and especially a large folio history of War-ton (where he was born), and parts adjacent in the county of Lancaster, which, by interspersing a great variety of observations, ecclesiastical, civil, and natural, he has rendered a useful work (37). Moreover, Mr Thoresby's skill in heraldry and genealogy rendered him a very serviceable correspondent to Mr Arthur Collins in his Peerage of England, and an acceptable one to the principal persons of the college of arms at London, especially Mr Anlis, Garter Principal King at Arms, Mr Le Neve Norroy, Mr Dale, and others. His judicious skill in coins and medals procured him a hearty welcome to the cabinets of other Virtuoses in that way, particularly to that of the famous Earl of Pembroke, who regarded him with an extraordinary condescension and affectionate familiarity, and his knowledge in coins was greatly improved by the Earl's curious collection.

(35) Observations on Dr Arbutnot's book on coins, weights, and measures, subjoined to the second Edition of that treatise.

(36) Entitled De Re Nummaria, where their correspondence is inserted.

(37) Mr Lucas enriched the Museum Thoresbiano with a book, intitled Fasciculus temporum, a great curiosity, printed in or about 1485. Vicaria Leod. p. 75.

(26) In the Index to the Ducatus Leod. are no less than forty-four references to this family.

(27) Ducatus Leod. p. 91.

(28) Id. p. 576.

(29) Sir Andrew Fountaine's Numism. in Dr Hickes's Theaurus. It is also well engraved in the last Edition of Camden's Britannia.

(30) See also Phil. Transf. No. 305.

(31) Ibid. No. 322.

(*) He also prefixed to the fourth Vol. of Leland's Itinerary, a Dissertation upon the Securis Lapidea, or Flint-mallet, in Mus. Thoresb. containing some curious remarks upon the Matter, which, instead of a Scepter, is put into the hands of the God Thor. Ducat. Leod. p. 565, 566.

(32) Appendix, no. XIX. to Langtoit's Chronicle.

(33) Particularly no. of Archbishop Whigge, inserted in his list of that prelate. Appendix, no. XLIV. and LVII.

(34) This letter is inserted in the Philosophical letters of Mr Ray, published Dr Derham.

(b) Out of regard to the memory of Mr Thoresby's modesty, we forbear to enumerate the many Nobility and Gentry, both of our own country, and foreigners, who visited his Museum, and honoured his Album with their names and mottoes.

(k) This Gentleman, in the catalogue of his own collection of coins, occasionally mentions several of our Author's, and particularly extols one as a great curiosity, that obdional piece, which was coined by the Governor of Pontefract for the King, after the death of Charles I, and has this inscription round the Castle, Carolus Secundus, 1648; and on the reverse, a Crown with C. R. Dum Spiro, Spero; being the first monies that bore the name of Charles II.

out of the felicity of his disposition. He was not more diligent to encrease his learned treasure, than communicative of it to others. It would be almost endless to enumerate the assistances which Mr Thoresby gave, in one way or other, to the works of the learned. By these kindnesses, sweetened with the easiness of access to his own Cabinet, he always found the like easy access to those of other Virtuoso's, which gave him frequent opportunities of enlarging his collection far beyond what could have been expected from a private person, not wealthy. And perhaps no private gentleman, beside himself, had so general, and so respectable an acquaintance among persons of the first reputation in the literary republic (b). This, as it did him great honour, so was it a mighty support to him under the several vexations, and some great losses, which he met with in the course of his life. Among other Virtuoso's, he commenced an early friendship with the celebrated Naturalist, Dr Martin Lister. It was to this friend, that he sent an account of some Roman antiquities he had discovered in Yorkshire, which being communicated by him, and Dr Gale, Dean of York, to the Royal Society (i), obtained our Author a Fellowship of that learned body, into which he was unanimously chosen at their anniversary meeting on St Andrew's day, 1697; and the great number of his papers, which appear in their Transactions, shew how deserving he was of that honour [G]. At the same time, this connexion was of use, by enlarging the number of his friends, and gave rise to his correspondence with Sir Hans Sloane, Mr Evelyn, Mr Chamberlayne, and others. He was likewise well known to, and respected by, Mr Folkes (k), Dr Woodward, Dr Mead, Dr Stukeley, and many of those Gentlemen who were afterwards incorporated by the title of The Society of Antiquaries. He had, of a long time, formed a design of doing honour to his native town and its environs, by writing the history thereof, and with this view had accumulated a vast quantity of materials for the work, which came out under the title of Itineras Leodiensis: or, the Topography of Leedes, and Parts adjacent (l). In this piece, he frequently refers to the historical part intended for giving a view of the state of the northern parts of the kingdom, during the dark, and more remote ages of the Britons and Romans; and of the alterations afterwards made by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans; and he proceeded so far, as to bring his narration, in a fair copy, nearly to the end of the sixth Century, illustrating and confirming his history by his coins [H]. The reason of his leaving off there, may be easily conjectured from his

(i) He was recommended by them for a candidate.

(l) To which is subjoined, Museum Thoresbianum: or, a Catalogue of the Antiquities, &c. in the Repository of Ralph Thoresby, Gent. &c. which, though printed as the title-page, declares, in 1712, was first published, together with the Ducat. Leod. in 1714. There is an account of both in Phil. Transf. No. 344.

[G] The great number of his papers in the Phil. Transf. The following is a complete list of them: No. 222, 231, 234, 241, 244, 249, 256, 264, 277, 279, 282, 289, 291, 296, 297, 303, 304, 305, 306, 310, 316, 319, 320, 322, 331, 335, 336, 344, 372, and 377. They relate chiefly to Roman and Saxon monuments of antiquity in the North of England, with notes upon them, and the inscriptions of coins, &c. The rest containing accounts of uncommon accidents, &c.

[H] His Manuscript was left unfinished. This curious piece, which consists of thirty-three pages in quarto, being communicated by the present possessor, was carefully perused, and being found well prepared for the press as far as it extends, and very worthy of the public acceptance, we have obtained his consent to insert it here, in hopes that it may excite some able hand to carry it on and compleat the noble design of its Author in it. In the first leaf is this passage, apparently designed for a motto in the title-page.

Tho' in the North, yet there doth God work.
Job xxiii. 9.

In partibus Septentrionalibus homines et ingenio et moribus cultiores sunt, inter quos et per quos Deus maxima opera præstat.

Poli Synopsis Critic. in locum.

Historical part of the Ducatus Leodiensis.

Though my design be chiefly to collect the memoirs of persons eminent for learning and piety, beneficence and valour, who have adorned these Northern parts in later ages, wherein we have the advantage of more certain and express authorities, yet I shall endeavour to give a view of the state thereof, during the darker and more remote ages of the Britons and Romans, together with the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, only resolving to be more short where positive authorities cannot be had, as none are to be expected in parochial affairs during the first epocha.

For though Jeffery of Monmouth and his followers boast not only of twenty-eight cities, but of twenty-five flamins and three arch-flamins in those cities, in whose places King Lucius, upon the conversion of the nation, appointed the like number of bishops and archbishops; yet it is evident from Cæsar, that, though the Britons were populous, yet their habitations were like those in Gallia (1), woods fortified with ditches and rampires. Nay, the very learned Bishop Stillingfleet argues, that Cæsar takes not a city for a place, but for a people under one government, and that civitas is not once used by him in any other sense (2). This was resented so heinously by the Cambro-Britanni, that the learned Mr James Owen writ an answer thereto, stiled Vindiciæ Britannicæ, which he favoured me with a sight of in manuscript. And upon the whole I am of opinion, that, tho' the cities had their improvement from the Romans, yet their original, even as cities, were from the Britons.

Amongst the twenty-eight cities, which are expressly mentioned by Nennius, a British historian, who flourished eleven hundred years ago, is Caer-Loidcoit or Caer-Luytcoit, as Archbishop Usher found it writ in some of the ancient manuscripts (3), of which he had the opportunity of consulting nine. Geoffrey indeed writes it Lindcoit, and applies it to Lincoln. But the learned Dr Gale, who first published Nennius, in his emendations of that ancient historian, thinks it rather applicable to Leedes, [Leedes in Elmeto (4)] and adds further in a letter to myself, it might be your town, but by no means Lincoln. There are two reasons that, in my opinion, do abundantly confirm the learned Dean's opinion, that it is rather to be applied to Leedes than Lincoln. 1. The name of the place itself, Caer-Loidcoit; now Coit, signifies wood, and, being taken appellatively, what reference can the monosyllable Loid or Luit (and it is never writ Lind by any of the ancient historians) have to Lincoln, but it manifestly has to Leedes, or Loidis, as it is called by Bede, and King Alfred in his Saxon version of that venerable Author (5). So that Caer-Loidcoit signifies, in our modern dialect, the city of Loid in the wood. 2. The circumstances of the actions, wherein the place is mentioned, which I believe any one, who impartially considers them, will acknowledge do more genuinely suit this than that city. The Britons having driven the Saxons out of Lincolnshire northward, we find mention of Caer-Loidcoit as a place further north than Lincoln; and so Caer Coit Celedon, which in the British tongue signifies Hassels, now both Hasselwood, and Bede's Sylva Elmetæ being in this tract, it might well be stiled Loid in the wood. I would not herein argue as a party man, such being apt sometimes to force an argument where it comes not in voluntarily, and as an evidence do freely relinquish what a learned Author hath lately granted concerning the rencounter, anno 1091, betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland, which he says was in the province of Leedes in Yorkshire; because in truth (which is always to be preferred) it was Lothian in Scotland.

As to the signification of the British name Loid or Luyt, Mr Owen beforementioned writes to me that 'it signifies Grey, and is a famous name amongst the Britons to this day (as Gray amongst the English). One of

(2) Stillingfleet's true Antiq. of London and its state in the Roman times, p. 473.

Leedes one of the twenty-eight British cities.

(3) Usher's Brit. Eccl. Ant.

(4) Gale's Hist. Britann. p. 135

(5) Edit. Wheloe p. 146.

(1) Cæsar's Com. lib. 5. cap. 4.

The signification of the British name, advancement in years; he therefore contented himself with committing to the press, his Vicaria Leodiensis: or, the History of the Church of Leedes, &c. which was published at London of them I know, says he (6), to be the eldest house descending from the British Kings; and adds, most of the families of eminency in that his native country were in those ages deduced from colours. When it is writ Lind, it is a corruption of Luyt or Lbwyd, which is the original word; but, because Ll cannot be well pronounced by the English, Fl, being something near it in sound, is substituted in its place, and corruptly writ Floyd or Loid or Lud. It is certain that Coit or Coet signifieth a wood in British, and Kaer a city, and it might be called Caer-Lud or Loidekoit [the city of Lud, or Lud in the wood] to distinguish it from another Caer-Lud, or London: both so called from some great man or men, who built the cities that bear their names, corruptly Lud or Loid, but more regularly Lbwyd. To what my deceased friend has writ let me add, that a place in this town is called Lid-gate to this day, the same which, in some ancient charts belonging to the Lords of this manor, is called the Tower-hill, from some such fabrick built there in former ages, as is probable not only from its situation in the highest part of the town, but from some very large stones, and foundations of such a building, at a considerable depth below those of the late houses (?); but whether of British antiquity, from Tŷr a pile, L. Turris (8), or later ages, will be hard to determine at this distance of time.

(6) Epist. 17
March, 1703.

A tower there.

(7) Ducat. Leod. p. 32.
(8) Lhuyd's Archaeol. Brit. p. 288.

My Lord Almoner obliged me with a curious remark, which cannot be better expressed than in his Lordship's own words, where, having spoken of the Saxon etymology, from Leod populus, (which was my first thoughts) he adds, verum alius (puto) quærenda est origo vocis Britannicum LLWYD (inter alia ejus significata) statum denotat rebus undique prosperis amœnum. Annon igitur Leedes hæc Eboracensis, (ut et illa Cantiorum, altera) Bellostii nomen cum Oxonio aliquando meruit? Huic equidem conjecturæ subblandiri videntur Illa Regii Bede Interpretis on tam laudæ de Loïd 17 hæten (9).

(9) Epist. D. D. W. Nicolson, Episc. Carloli. Dec. 8, 1694.

(10) Ducatus Leod. p. 213.

I have formerly observed (10), that, though the names of the towns and villages in these parts, being of later erection, are generally Saxon, as Hundryfe, Holbec, Ferneleg, &c. yet the rivers and the woods, into which the natives retired, retain the British names. As to Ara, the learned Clarencieux has long since informed us (11), that it is deduced from the British word Ara, which signifies slow, easy, as Araris (Saone) in France, and is very suitably applied to the calm and smooth course of this river Ara; whereas the very next river, Wherfe, is swift and violent, fretful and angry, as the same historian expresseth it, which he inclines therefore to deduce from the British Gner, swift, the Roman Verbeia; for, as the industrious Mr Lhuyd truly observes (12), Gu is common to the Britons, with the French, Spaniards, and Italians, and that the Romans began such words with an V consonant. But we need not go five miles for another instance; there is a nameless water near the town of Leedes, which is of British original from Dour, whence the bridge over it is called Dow-bridg, for Dour-bridge, as Dow-gate at London for Dour-gate. For an example of woods we have Cat-Beefton in this parish, which, in the language of those ages, signifies the Woody Beefton, from Coit Sylva, as the vale of Catmere (13), or the Woody field or ground. I was at a loss for the Etymon of Cat-Beefton, as it is sometimes called in ancient writings, till Mr Owen informed me, that Coed as well as Coit doth in the British signify a Wood. Archæologia Britannica, since published, has also Keed Sylva, p. 160. So also the Salvus, or Sylva Andred, was by the Britons called Coit-Andred. (14). I shall only give one instance more that relates to those times, and it is Bardsley by Rigton near Harwood, which seems to be denominated by the ancient Bards, the historians and poets of those ages when the ancient festivals were little esteemed without the Carmina Bardi chanted to the harp. It is said King Arthur's sepulture at Glastonbury was discovered by one of their historical ballads, and it is certain that Mr Neile, the late Bishop Hopkins's steward, found some gold by a particular description of the place given in another of them (15).

The river Ara British.

(11) Camden's Britan. XXIII. & 710. Edit. 1697.

So Wherfe.

(12) Comp. Etimol. p. 9. col. 3.

(13) Camden's Britan. p. 455.

(14) Somner, of the Roman ports and forts in Kent, (p. 106.) to which the learned Bishop of Lincoln has added instructive and judicious remarks.

Bardsley.

(15) Camden's Britan. p. 1021.

The Brigantes.

While the government of the Britons lasted, the Brigantes, a people stout and numerous, possessed not these parts only, but almost the whole tract between the east and west sea, containing Yorkshire, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and the Bishoprick of Durham, as Sir Henry Savile enumerates them in his Edition of Julius Agricola's Life by Tacitus. These struggled hard with the Romans to maintain their ancient freedom, which brings me to the next Dynasty.

That Julius Cæsar made an expedition into Britain fifty-five years before the incarnation of the blessed Jesus, is evident beyond contradiction, but must be omitted here, because he never penetrated thus far. Augustus was not ambitious of extending the bounds of the Empire. Tiberius followed his example. Caligula indeed, solicited by Adminus (Cunobaline's son) made a ridiculous expedition, of which nothing remains, but the ruins of a Pbarus upon the coast of Holland, and called there Britenbuis. But Claudius, in the third year of his reign, ann. Dom. 44, came in person, and having taken Camelodunum, the King's seat, reduced the fourth part of Britain into the form of a province, which gave a mighty turn to affairs here, where he was four times saluted emperor, and upon his return to Rome, had a glorious triumph, and to perpetuate the memory thereof, called his son Britannicus. London, that noble Emporium, was built in his time, faith the learned Bishop Stillingfleet (16). Aulus Plautius was the first Legatus, or Proprator; for those provinces that were under the immediate care of the Emperor (as Britain was) had a Governor in chief over the whole province sent among them, whose title commonly was Legatus Aug. Proprator Prov. who had his chief residence in the Metropolis. He had power of life and death, which the Procurator Cæsar's had not, except in smaller provinces (as Pilate in Judæa, under the Prefident of Syria.) As the capital causes belonged to the Legatus, so those of the Exchequer belonged to Cæsar's Procurator; whence the Britons complain in Tacitus, that whereas, before they had one King of their own, they had now two put upon them, the Legate, who disposed of their blood, and the Procurator of their estates.

The Roman invasion.

Claudius was the first of all the Romans, who made an attempt upon our Brigantes, and that these very parts were full of men and actions in those times, is evident from the plentiful remains of that nation, which are yet to be met with. Of these, none can be more remarkable, than the great military road upon Bramham-moor; Leland himself confessing, *I never saw yn any part of England so manifest a token as heere, of the large high crest of the waie of Wateling streate, made by hand, as I found it in a transcript of his Itinerary for Lancashire and Yorkshire, lent me by his Grace, the late excellent Archbishop Sharp, with liberty to transcribe both, which I gladly undertook: but the whole Itinerary is since most accurately printed, in nine volumes, with many learned and curious additions by my kind friend, the ingenious and industrious Mr Thomas Hearne, at Oxford. In the sixth volume of which, is published a most judicious account of the four great Roman ways. I formerly intimated (17), that I supposed it to be the performance of the very learned Roger Gale, Esq; and can now assure the Reader that it is so. By which essay it is manifest, that those Authors who called this way Watling-street, are mistaken, and that it is the Erming-street, the course whereof through these parts, I shall give in his own words.*

(16) The Antiqu. of London, p. 535.

These parts full of men and actions. Temp. Claudii, &c.

Their high-ways.

(17) Ducat. Leod. p. 579.

Erming-street.

As soon as you are out of Doncaster, it rises with a high bank, and carries you to Adwick in the Street, and is again visible a little to the west of the Park by Pontfract. Thence it crosses the Ara at Castlesford, and goes by Ollerton and Ledston to Abersford, and appears on several places of Bramham-moor. It is cut by the river Wherfe, at St Helensford, a little below Weiberby, but the Agger shews itself again immediately on the north side of it, and proceeds in a direct line to Aldborough. It is frequently visible in the way thither; but is not the great road now generally used, which lies to the west of it; nevertheless it is well enough known in those parts by the name of the Road-gate, or Road-way. Near Burrowbridge it passed the Eure, and a mile north from that river you have it again, as soon as you are out of Kirby-hill, from whence it scarce ever disappears for near twenty miles together, having been paved, as is still evident. From this place to Cattarick, in a straight line, and about fourteen miles of it being hedged in on both sides, is now called Leeming-lane, from a town of that name standing upon it, and the High-street. Besides this grand road, there were several Via Vicinales from one station to another, particularly one from the great Consular-way upon Bramham-moor, by Thorner and Shadwel, through Street-lane in this parish (so called from the Roman Stratum) by Haw-Caster-rig (so denominated from their Castrum) to Adle-moor, where the

Their Via Vicinales.

Street-lane.

Haw-Caster-rig.

the

the vestigia of a Roman town were discovered, ann. 1702. Some funeral monuments, and other antiquities discovered there, are now deposited in this Musæum by the kindness of Cyril Arthington, Esq; F. R. S. Lord of the Manor (18); thence through the grounds of Thomas Kirk, Esq; F. R. S. (an ingenious virtuoso, since deceased) at Cookridge, over the moors to Ilkly, a known Roman station. Another of these Via Minores, (though these also were large and publick, compared with the more private Agrarian ways) brancheth from another part of the said Erming-street to Berwick in Elmet, where the great Agger, that Camden supposeth to have been the walls of the town, when the Saxon Kings resided there, seems to have been a Roman work, and particularly raised by the Vandals (and from them called Wendal-hill) of whose expedition into these parts more anon. Thence over Whitkirk-moor by Thorpe Stapleton (19) to Leedes; where this very year, 1717, in digging for clay for re-edifying a new Vicarage house, the labourers found a paved causeway, a yard below the present surface of the ground; it was twelve feet in breadth, for this part, being low and moist in those ages, was set with stones, as is another (just as broad) in the parish of Bringley, lately discovered by the learned Dr Richardson, which doubtless, as he says, was a Roman way (20). Upon the ascent of the hill, on the other side of the rivulet here called Sheeps-car-beck, are the remains of a large camp, the Agger, considering its nearness to the town, and the interposition of so many ages, is very great; this, from the single Vallum, and the convenience of water (a thing the Romans always made sure of,) may, I think, be safely pronounced one of the many camps they had in these parts. At the head of the very same beck, is another of them, which being upon the moors, and four miles distant from hence, is intire to this day. It is near the Roman town upon Adle-moor, before mentioned. This camp at Leedes retains somewhat of the Vallum in its present name, Walflat; for it is plain from all Authors who write upon that subject, that the Romans pronounced V consonant as we do W, and Casaubon (21) particularly instanceth in Wall, Vallum, the termination signifies Area, a plat of ground; Area-belli, Barle-ground. Mr Gale, in his curious treatise before mentioned (22), supposeth Walm-gate in York, so denominated from its leading to the Vallum of that City.

That these parts were in those ages of the world full of men and money, may be argued from the great quantities of Roman coins found here. I shall instance only in some discovered since Camden's time, that I may not actum agere. The Right Hon. the Lord Moleworth, obliged me with an account of those that, ann. 1705, were accidentally found near his seat at Edlington, by his own servant's striking his pick-ax into an urn that contained about two gallons; upon further search, another Theca Nummaria was discovered, full of the like money (23), of which his Lordship sent me above a hundred: the probable reason of their concealment will be mentioned in the sequel. These are all of the Basse-Empire: but I have from other places, of an elder date, a Trajan from Peckfeld; another Trajan, with a Severus, from Pontefract; a Geta formerly found at Castleford: but though plenty in old time, not one is to be met with now at the station. Of those found at Cookridge, ann. 1708, an account is already published, Phil. Transf. No. 316; they were mostly of Domitian, Nerua, Trajan, and Hadrian, though I have a rare one of Vitellius, and another of Titus, from the same place; a Domitian from Tadcaster, not that with CALCAPAVC, which Dr N. J. very inconsiderately got inserted in a late noted book, as coined at Calcaria, or Tadcaster: I have the original MS. which led him into the mistake; for it is CAESAR. AVG. upon the coin itself. If it was really designed for the name of a place, it would have been upon the reverse, as LON. for London in the later Emperors, but never round his head, with his name and titles. That many Roman coins were found at this station, as also at York and Aldbrough, is evident from Camden, so not to be repeated here; but the ingenious Dr Richardson mentions (24) several places in this West-riding, not taken notice of by any preceding Author; viz. at Sowerby near Halifax, at Howelodge in the township of Hipperholm, found in a thick glass vessel, others were fallen from a precipice at Stainland, and some nigh Heaton in Burstal parish; to which I shall only add those discovered ann. 1695, upon the moors that bound in Yorkshire, towards Burnley in Lancashire, of which Mr Charles Townley of Townley sent me a score, some of which being consular, and none later than Nerua, argue that these places were frequented in those more early times, when the Roman Empire was in its glory.

Under Claudius, before mentioned, Vespasian laid the foundation of his future glory here in Britain tricies cum hoste confixit, &c. (25), subduing two of the most potent nations; he fought the enemy thirty times, took above twenty towns, and subdued the Isle of Wight. Here also Titus fought as a Tribune under his father. Ostosius Scapula succeeded A. Plautius as Proprætor in Britain, ann. Dom. 50, and behaved himself so fortunately, that Claudius was the twenty-first time saluted Emperor. He is said to have subdued the Brigantes, whose Queen, Cartimandua delivered to the Romans Caractacus, the valiant King of the Silures, whom Tacitus (26) makes the greatest glory of Claudius's triumph, in the year 52 (27); but, as Camden and Lipsius have noted, that is an Anticronisina in that excellent author; for the Brigantes rather surrendered than were subdued; and Tacitus himself owns, that Ostorius after this, having new conquests in his eye, was forced to return, because of the mutinies among the Brigantes, who at best were very impatient of restraint, but at this juncture had an additional provocation; Venutius their King, being supplanted by Vellocatus his armour-bearer, whom Castimandua had married, was necessitated to war upon the Romans, because they assisted her and her paramour with their garriisons, wings, and cohorts; the Brigantes, taking part with the lawful husband, under the conduct of Venutius, reduced the faithless Queen to the utmost extremity.

For these and other provocations, the Brigantes may be safely concluded to have made up a considerable part of the enraged Boadicea's army, with which she slew seventy thousand Romans and their confederates (28), sacked Camelodunum, burnt London, destroyed Verulam, and cut off most of the ninth legion, which came to their rescue under Petilius Cerealis, slaying the foot, and putting the horse to flight. This was in the seventh year of Nero, an. Dom. 62.

So that, for any thing which appears to the contrary, the Brigantes were not subjugated till the reign of Vespasian, who, with the rest of the world, recovered Britain also by his great captains and good soldiers. In the year 73 he sent, as his Proprætor, into Britain, Petilius Cerealis, who, on Boadicea's revolt, neither fled into Gallia, as did Catus the Procurator, nor through cowardice disobeyed the general's order, as the camp-master of the second legion did, only was overpowered in the common calamity; but now struck a terror into the Britons by invading, upon his first entry, the Brigantes, the most populous (to use the very words of that ancient historian) state of the whole province. Many battles were fought, and some bloody, and the greatest part of them either conquered or wasted (29).

Where this victorious ninth legion resided, or that it was stiled Victrix, we cannot learn from any of the ancient historians that have written about the Roman legions, who say nothing about this, but leave us quite in the dark; only from this passage in Tacitus it is concluded, that it must be somewhere in Britain. But both are now evident from two inscriptions found of late years in the very ancient city of York, where it was certainly quartered: the former is a funeral monument for the standard-bearer, which need not here be repeated, having been already thrice printed (30). It was discovered in Trinity-yard, and happily rescued by my honoured friend, Dr Bryan Fairfax, from the brutish workmen, who had broken it in the middle, and were going to make use of it for two Throughs, as they call them, in the wall; but, by that worthy gentleman's directions, it was placed upright, with the inscription, and his statue in basse-relieve placed outwards, and was so justly valued by the proprietor of the place, that it was removed to his seat at Ribston, where the very courteous Sir Henry Goodrick, Bart. shewed it me in his gardens. That this 9th legion was also stiled Victrix (perhaps for its victories over the stout Brigantes) is evident from a Roman brick, upon which is inscribed LEG. IX. VIC. This was found by an ingenious artist, Mr Samuel Smith, the bell-founder, near the same place, in Micklegate, York, and is now in my possession. By these and many other inscriptions, and noble remains of the Roman glory, the great antiquity of that celebrated city is evident; and if we should, with Bishop Stillingfleet, cast aside the British history, yet these would shew it to have been eminent when Rome was in its flourishing state; and there are yet more evident tokens of it's glory in Severus's reign; of which anon.

Only I cannot omit before to take notice how a kind Providence overpowered the struggling Brigantes, and made them happy even against their wills, in becoming early a Roman province; which cannot be better expressed (18) Phil. Transf. No. 282. and Ducat. Leod. p. 158, &c.

Wendal-hill.

(19) At which place I traced above 400 paces.

(20) Dr Richardson's Letter, in the ninth Volume of Leland's Itinerary, p. 146.

Walflat.

(21) De Lingua Saxonica, p. 169. See more in the Ducat. Leod. p. [111].

Walm-gate.

(22) Letter of the four Roman ways, p. 103.

(23) Of which, see Phil. Transf. No. 303.

(24) His Letter in Leland's Itinerary, Vol. IX. p. 145.

(25) Suetonius in Vespasian, c. 4.

(26) Tacitus's Annals, Lib. XII. Cap. VIII.

(27) Savile's Fasti, ad calcem Rever. Angli. Scriptor. N. B. This piece of history has given birth to an excellent Poem, called Caractacus, published a few years ago by Mr Mason.

An. D. 62.

(28) Tacitus's Annals, XIV. 10.

An. D. 73.

(29) Life of Agricola, by Tacitus, Edit. Savil. p. 191.

The 9th legion at York.

(30) In the Phil. Transf. No. 305. in Mr Hearne's valuable edition of Livy, lib. 6. p. 181. and in Mr Gale's accurate edition of Antoninus, where it is also depicted, p. 23.

Stiled Victrix.

Christianity early here.

pressed than in the words of our late excellent Primate (31). Of all the isles of the Gentiles, if any one above the rest hath felt the benign and gracious influences of the Lord's being our King, certainly ours is that island. How wonderfully bountiful has God been to us in a continued succession of publick blessings, even from the first beginning of time that we have had any memorials of events among us? We had the happiness to be early made a province of the Roman empire, and by that means were trained up to civility, and arts; and good manners. That made way for the greatest blessing Heaven could bestow upon us, even the receiving Christianity: and that blessing we had with the most early, being the first among the Nations that embraced it. When, through the just judgment of God, barbarism and ignorance overspread the face of Europe, and by the occasion thereof superstition and idolatry made their way, and all the Western kingdoms gave up their power to a foreign usurper, even then this island made the longest stand; nay, and was never so perfectly subdued, but that Popery was here a different thing from what it was in the Southern climates. When the happy time came, that God thought fit to set on foot the Reformation, having first made way for it by the restoring of learning, such was his particular care of us, that this was one of the first kingdoms that was brought over to it.

But I am transported beyond my present bounds, which concern only the first planting of Christianity. That it was here very early, is acknowledged by all; but by whom first planted, is much controverted. Sanders the Jesuit, and others, contend earnestly for St Peter, that our engagement to the Roman church might become more visible. Others plead for St James, Simon Zelotes, St Philip, and Aristobulus; but the tradition of Joseph of Arimathea and his brethren coming to Glassebury having met with better entertainment, the learned Bishop Stillingfleet hath at large examined it (32), and shews how much more probable it is, that St Paul himself was the first founder of a church here (33), and evinceth that there was a Christian church in Britain even in the Apostle's time, which he proveth from Theodore, Clemens Romanus, and also from Eusebius, whose testimony is the more convincing, being not only a learned and inquisitive person, but a favourite of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, and present at the council of Nice, whither Bishops were summoned from all parts of the empire; and one who, designing an ecclesiastical history, had a particular curiosity to enquire into the original of all churches.

The two most noted converts to Christianity in this age, were Pomponia Gracina, the wife of Aulus Plautius, the Roman Lieutenant in Britain (which put her in a capacity to be a happy instrument of propagating the Christian faith in this country) and Claudia Rufina, so much celebrated by Martial for her wit and beauty. She was certainly a Briton by birth, and wife of Pudens, a Roman Senator, and both rationally concluded to be the same persons mentioned by St Paul (34) himself. The rest of the kindred of this noble family, who were baptized with her, might be the occasion of dispersing Christianity in the British nation, and were probably some of the Saints in Caesar's household mentioned by the same Apostle (35).

Petilius Cerealis before mentioned was succeeded by Julius Frontinus, and he by Cn. Julius Agricola, ann. Dom. 79, who, as he carried his conquests by sea as well as land, to the utmost extent of Britain, the isles of the Orcaides, so, by a notable policy, he sought to induce the natives by pleasures to quietness and rest, exhorting them in private, and assisting them in publick, to build temples and houses; and instructed the noblemen's sons in the liberal sciences, preferring the wits of the Britons before the students of France (36); so that they became curious to attain the eloquence of the Roman language, as well as their habit, sumptuous buildings, and too soon even their luxuries.

Agricola, being recalled by Domitian, delivered up the province in a peaceable condition to his successor, Salustius Lucullus, who had the hard fate to be put to death for no other cause but that, having devised certain spears or lances, he caused them to be called Lucullians. Much cannot be expected concerning these affairs in the short reign of Nerva; but his successor, Trajan, as he brought the empire to its utmost extent, power, and glory, so he is particularly famous for repairing the Roman ways here in Britain (37); which, being toilsome to the labourers therein, might perhaps be one occasion of the revolt in his reign; for it was the general complaint of the natives, as Tacitus confesses, that the Romans put their hands and bodies to the drudgery of ridding out [clearing] woods and paving fens, with a great many stripes and indignities: and the Brigantes are especially noted as impatient of servitude: infomuch that Julius Severus, Hadrian's Lieutenant, being recalled upon an insurrection in Judea, the Britons had certainly freed themselves from the Roman yoke, had not the Emperor himself come in person, an. Dom. 123. But he reduced them, and built that noted wall, eighty miles in length, (not eight only as misprinted in Speed) (38), between Tyne and Solway Frith.

In this revolt it is probable that Adellocum or Bugdunum, the Roman station upon Adel-moor near Leedes, was burnt by the Brigantes in their zeal to retrieve their native freedom. As that station flourished during the height of the Roman glory, so that it was burnt, seems evident by the flag, or adust colour I observed in my survey thereof; and that it was in this very revolt is probable, because that, amongst the Roman coins found in that neighbourhood, since the discovery of the vestigia of that town and the monuments were first published in Phil. Transf. No. 282, there was not one of a later Emperor than Hadrian; not to repeat other reasons; from the form of the letters, which are elsewhere assigned (39).

Upon this expedition of Hadrian, and his success here, the senate ordered medals to be struck, one of which is in this collection, and was probably found in these parts, being paid me in the fee-farm rents belonging to the Lords of the manor of Leedes; but the simple fellow had slipped away, fearing, it is likely, he should have been obliged to exchange it. Upon it is the Emperor's head, inscribed Trajanus Hadrianus Aug. and upon the reverse, Britannia, or perhaps Rome triumphant upon this occasion, sitting upon a shield, with a spear in her right hand, Pont. Max. Tr. POT. COS. III. S. C. Exergue BRITANNIA, which is the more rare, because it has escaped the industrious Occo.

The war broke out again in the reign of his successor, Antoninus Pius, in the year 139; but Lollius Urbicus, his Lieutenant, repulsed the Barbarians, and repaired the wall. In the mean time, a new insurrection was kindled amongst the Brigantes (40), but quashed by the same Legate, who, for his successes here, obtained the surname of Britannicus. He took away some part of their country from the Brigantes, because they had made incursions into Genouma, and recovered the former wall between the two Friths of Bodobria and Glotta (41), (now called Edinburgh and Dunbritton) that had been first built by Agricola, in Vespasian's time, and rebuilt the wall there, to secure it against the Picts.

I have also a very rare medal of this excellent Emperor's, referred to in the learned Bishop of Lincoln's edition of the Britannia (42); whereupon Britzin is represented sitting upon the rocks, those mirifical moles, as Cicero calls them; wherewith she is surrounded, lifting up her right hand to her head, inscribed ANTONINVS AVG. PIVS. PP. TR. P. XVIII. reverse, BRITANNIA COS. III. S. C. which was in the year of our Lord, one hundred fifty-six (43).

Notwithstanding the barbarous Britons were thus driven 100 miles Northward, for so much is the distance between the walls of Hadrian and Antoninus; yet the old grudge at the Roman oppression, made them revolt again with so much violence, in the beginning of Antoninus Philosophus's reign, that Calpurnius Agricola was sent against them with fresh supplies, amongst which was Helvius Pertinax, afterwards Emperor. The very name of Agricola reminding them of their former overthrows, struck such a terror into the Britons, that we read of no disturbance here till the time of Commodus. But there is a matter of greater concernment, not to be omitted in this interval. Though Christianity was planted here, as is before mentioned, very early; yet was there not a crowned head that ever embraced the true faith till the reign of Antoninus Pius, under whom flourished Lucius, ultimus in Britannia regum Paganorum & primus Christianorum, to use the words of our countryman Alured of Beverly, lately published with notes by the most industrious Mr Hearne (44). There are disputes about the precise year, and other circumstances of his reign; but that there was such a one, and that he was also the first Christian King in the world, is owned by all, and fully evinced by the incomparable Archbishop Usher (45), and acknowledged by the learned Bishop Stillingfleet (46). He was converted by Timothy, not he to whom St Paul directs his Epistle, (as some have vainly imagined) but his name-fake, the son of Pudens and Claudia Rufina, before mentioned, who being a British convert, was more proba-

An. D. 123.

(38) Speed's History, p. 97.

(39) Ducatus Leod. p. 197. Phil. Transf. No. 282, and No. 316.

An. D. 139.

(40) Speed's Hist. p. 99.

(41) Bishop Lloyd of St Asaph's Hist. Account, p. 3.

(42) Camden's Brit. p. xxvii.

An. D. 156.

(43) Museum Thoresbican. No. 223, and 369.

An. D. 164.

(44) Aluredi Beverlacen's Annales. Oxon. 1716. p. 30.

(45) Usseri Brit. Antiq. Dublini 1639. c. 3 & 4.

(46) Stillingfleet's Orig. Brit. p. 61.

(31) Archbishop Sharp's Sermons, Vol. I. p. 450.

(32) Bishop Stillingfleet's Originals Brit. p. 6.

(33) Idem. p. 39.

(34) 2 Tim. iv. 21.

(35) In his Epistle to the Philippians, iv. 22.

An. D. 79.

An. D. 86.

(36) Tacitus's Agricola, p. 193.

(37) Camden's Britan. p. lxvi.

An. D. 99.

An. D. 118.

(47) Nennius
inter Script. Brit.
Edit. Gale.
p. 103.
An. D. 169.

bly employed in converting a British King. Nennius makes him [cum universis Regulis totius Britanniae (47)] to be baptized ann. Dom. 164, which others defer till 169, and which is worse, deny the existence of such Reguli under him, the state of the Roman province not permitting it. Bishop Stillingfleet's assigning Surrey and Suffex as the most probable place of his dominion under the Romans, might acquit me from any further prosecution of his story, could I but expect pardon from the Eboracenses for omitting, that this first Christian King made York the seat of an Archbishop, viz. Faganus, whom Eleutherius, Bishop of Rome, sent to confirm him in the Christian Faith, subjacuit Metropolitanano Eboraci Deira et Albania (48). All Scotland, together with the counties of York, Lancaster, Durham, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland (49), being subject to this Primate till later ages.

In the reign of Commodus, there was nothing but wars and seditions throughout Britain: for the barbarous Britains having got over the Wall, wasted the country, and cut off the Roman General. So that Ulpianus Marcellus was sent against them, who succeeded so well, that the jealous Emperor envied and recalled him, assuming to himself the title of Britannicus, as he is stiled in several of his coins in this Musæum; upon one of which is Victory with laurel in the right, and a palm in the left hand (50). After this, weaker Commanders were sent hither by his favourite Perennius, who not only had a design to usurp the Empire, but, as Herodian tells us) had actually coined monies with his own image. These brought all into confusion, inso-much that 1500 soldiers went to complain at Rome; whereupon Perennius was beheaded, and Helv. Pertinax was again sent into Britain. He quieted these broils, but not without great danger, being himself almost slain in appeasing them. He succeeded Commodus in the Empire, but reigned only eighty-seven days, which was more by twenty-one than his successor, Didius Julianus, who purchased the Empire, quod tunc primum venale fuit. For the coins of these short-lived Emperors, see the Catalogue (51): as also of Clodius Albinus, who refusing to resign his government in Britain, which had been committed to him by Pertinax, was at first flattered by Severus with the title of Cæsar, till he had defeated Pesc. Niger (52), and then overcome in battle at Lyons (53) in Gaul, whither Albinus had drawn the flower of his British army; and when they fought so stoutly, that Severus threw off his purple, and was put to the rout, with his whole army, except Lætus, who hearing that Severus was slain, renewed the battle, with his own men that were fresh and untouched, in expectation of attaining the Empire to himself: Severus seeing this, rallied his men, resumed his purple, pursued eagerly, slew Albinus, and became sole Emperor of the world. Hereupon he sent into Britain, as Pro-prætor, Virius Lupus, who not only resided in these parts, but, as appears by an inscription found at Ilkley, in this West-riding, re-edified that place (54). He strengthened the northern parts of the province with many strong castles, restoring several places that had been ruined, either by fire, or the fury of the borderers, particularly the bath at Lavatris, or Lavatra, now Bowes, under Stainmoor in Richmondshire, which having been burnt, he restored for the use of the first cohort of the Thracians, which was quartered there, as appears by an Altar dedicated Deæ Fortunæ: the name of Lavatris, or Lavatra, but by no means Lavat. Ror (as misprinted in Speed, p. 140.) may be deduced from Lavacrum, which the learned Roger Gale, Esq; in his accurate edition of the Itinerary, p. 41, proves from Eutropius to be used for a bath by the Romans in those ages.

But at last Virius Lupus was so overpowered by the Britons, that he was forced to send to Rome for fresh supplies. This so affected Severus, that though aged and gouty, he undertook the journey in person, and arriving safe, he left his son Geta at York to govern the civilized Britons, and marched to reduce the northern Britons and Caledonians, taking his other son, Caracalla, along with him. In this expedition he, with exceeding bravery, encountered great difficulties from the ambuscades of the enemy, who retiring into woods, sallied thence, intercepting their provisions, destroying their carriages, killing their allies, and passengers, and disturbing their garrisons, that he was constrained, with incredible labour, to destroy their woods, drain meers, &c. wherein he lost fifty thousand men. Whether the mosses in this parish (55) were occasioned by this, or rather some preceding actions, cannot be positively ascertained; but that the woods there were destroyed (more Romano) by fire and axe, is evident from the burnt wood found in the turf-pits, and the marks upon others of the very tools that cut down the remainder. His vigorous prosecution forced the enemy to a peace, and the delivery of a considerable part of their country, with all their arms and weapons. And for the better security, he built a famous wall of stone thirty-two (56) miles in length, from sea to sea, upon Adrian's frontier, answerable to the grandeur of the Roman Empire, with a tower at the end of each mile, and pipes of brass in the wall (57) from tower to tower, which speedily conveyed the news of any approach of the enemy over all the borders. Nennius, the ancient British Historian (58), with Speed and others of the moderns, make this wall to be 132 miles in length, but the Scala Mundi (a rare MS in this Musæum) hath it expressly thirty-two. Novissimum bellum in Britannia habuit, et ut Provincias adquisitas omni securitate munit; vallum per xxxii^o. miliaria a mari usque ad mare perduxit (59), which agrees with the best editions of Eutropius, and other Roman Authors. Upon these successes, he assumed the title of Britannicus Maximus, and is stiled Fundator Pacis upon a medal in my collection, which is justly ascribed to these transactions in Britain (60), though by some to his conquests in the East: upon another (61), which was found at Pontefract in this neighbourhood, he is inscribed SEVERVS PIVS AVG. BRIT. reverse, P. M. TR. P. XVIII. COS. III. P. P. (which was ann. Dom. 211.) This has upon it Jupiter cum puerulis; another hath Mars sinistra hastam. After his successes in the North, he retired to York, which seems then to have been in its chiefest glory. Severus had here his Royal Palace, which was honoured with his constant residence, with his Empress and two sons: and here that oracle of the law, Æmilius Paulus Papirianus, happily administered justice. Bellona, the sister and companion of Mars, had here also a temple, by the same token that Severus, through the Augur's mistake, was conducted thereto.

It makes not the least for the fame and glory of York, that this master of the world, Severus, one deservedly equaled with the greatest Martialists of any age, not only had his palace and residence here, but also here breathed his last, not slain by Fulgentius (as the British history affirms) but rather worn out with age and travail, and partly with grief for the irreclaimable conduct of his son Caracalla, who with his own hands had made two attempts upon his life: which Caracalla, being his son by Martia a British lady, was favoured by the Britons, and declared Emperor by the soldiers; the other son hæcete Geta, his mother was of Rome (62). His dying speeches are memorable, and full of brave spirit. I have been all that a man can be, but it is of no use to me now. The empire was declining and languishing in all parts when I received it, yet I leave it in peace even to the Britons, firm and lasting to my sons if they prove good, if otherwise, feeble and sinking; and calling for his urn, wherein his ashes were to be enclosed: Little Urn, said he, thou shalt now contain what the whole world could not before. His corpse was carried out in a military manner to a place near Akebam, which is called Severus-hill to this day, and there committed to the flames. Victor, in his account of this matter, calls York (which is known by all to be a colony) a municipium (63), or free city, which (if the terms be not promiscuously used by the Roman authors) shews somewhat of the old spirit of the Bigentes, the inhabitants having a greater value for their own municipal laws than all the other privileges of Rome.

After Severus there is no express mention of Eboracum for about a hundred years; only that the sixth legion continued their abode there. It is true, that Caracalla is said to be slain by Caracausius, an obscure Briton (64), and it is probable he might receive some wounds in the wars here which might occasion that error; but from the Roman history it is certain, that, as he had slain his brother Geta, he met with the same fate from Macrinus, who, succeeding him in the empire, associated his son Diadumenianus, but both were slain after a short reign of fourteen months and three days, for whose coins see the Catalogue, p. 309 and 627. Amongst some Roman antiquities found at Linguel-yau in this neighbourhood, A. D. 1697, were molds for counterfeiting the monies of Diadumenianus, with others, of which see Phil. Transf. No. 234: but whereas it is there questioned whether the present age could produce a genuine coin of this short-lived Emperor, I must retract that passage; for, since that was printed, the truly noble Earl of Pembroke shewed me one in his inestimable Musæum; and of late, the very obliging Mr St John of London presented a very fair one to this collection.

(56) Usher B. E.
Ecclef. Antiq.
p. 1027.

(57) Eachard's
Roman Hist.
Vol. II. p. 410
N. B. This famous wall is eight feet broad and twelve high with battlements, great parof which is still standing, and well may be reckoned one of the greatest works in the world, as appear by Mr Warbur-
ton's Map, and
Dr Stukeley's
most accurate, a well as latest discovery of a Roman Temple, and other Antiquities in those parts. Ann.
1720.

(58) Nennius,
Edit. Gale, p.
103. Speed, p.
111, or rather 113.

(59) Scala Mun- di, MS. p. 83.

(60) Mus. Thor-
p. 307. No. 475

(61) Idem, p.
493 and 494.
An. D. 212.

(62) Higden's
Polychron. lib.
cap. 18, p. cci

(63) Hist. Rom.
Epitome, Edit.
Plautin. p. 29.

(64) Al. Bevel
Annales, Edit.
Hearne, p. 34
An. D. 213.
An. D. 218.
An. D. 219.

(48) Alur. Bev.
p. 33.
(49) Usher, p. 72.
An. D. 181.

(50) Mus. Thor.
No. 450.

An. D. 193,
194.

(51) Id. p. 306.

(52) A fair medal of Niger's is inserted, No. 460.

(53) Lugdunum
in Eutropius.

An. D. 198.

(54) Camd. Brit.
p. 713.
and Speed's Hist.
p. 139. or rather
p. 111. where it is misprinted
Olinaca and Hekeley in Yorkshire, for Olicana and Ilk- ley.

An. D. 211.

(55) Ducat. Leod.
p. 142.

An. D. 220.

Heliogabalus, the successor of Macrinus, exceeding all his predecessors in wickedness, it is the less wonder we have no memorial of his transactions in these parts of the world, further than that his boundless prodigality consumed all the revenues of Britain, Gaul, Italy, Spain, Germany, Paeonia, Lyryum, Greece, Africa, Asia, Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, with those of other provinces and islands. Of his medals, upon some of which he is stiled SACERDOS DEI SOLIS ELAGABALUS, and represented as sacrificing to his God, the Sun, see the Catalogue (65), and a learned Dissertation upon the curious writing of his name in Selden de DIS SYRIS (66), where the author mentions also (as proceeding from the same original Bel or Baal) the British deity Belatucadrus, which was adored in these Northern parts of Britain. Camden mentions one altar dedicated to this topical God, and Selden another, to which may be added a third, found in the river Irtham, not far from Scaleby, communicated to me by the ingenious Dr Jabez Cuy, of Newcastle upon Tyne; there is a rough draught of it in the additions to the Britannia (67), which is to be read thus, De sancto Belatucadro Aulus Decius Camillus vocis feceravit. By which we see the Romans of later ages had the same notions that the Assyrians had in the former, who, having led away captive the ten tribes, desired the priests of Israel to teach their Assyrian colony the manner of the God of the land. Besides those of Baalam, with Sannius sacerdos, &c. here are those of his wives, Julia Cornelia Paula, and Julia Aquilia Severa (once a vestal virgin) with Julia Mersa his grandmother; to which the learned Dr Ben. Langwith, Chaplain to his Grace the Duke of Somerset, added a very rare medal of Julia Saccennias's, his unhappy mother, who not only ruined her son by the most infamous lasciviousness, but endeavoured by all means to destroy her sister's son, Alexander Severus, who, notwithstanding all her malice, succeeded him in the empire. This repairer of the almost ruined Commonwealth was basely murdered, though not in Britain (as some pretend) (68), but in Gaul (as the judicious Camden (69) has it) at the instigation of the gigantic Maximinus, who, with his son Maximus, had the like fate two years after.

(65) Mus. Thoresb. No. 520 and 527.
(66) Synagoga 21. cap. 1.

(67) Camden's Brit. p. 344.

An. D. 223.
(68) Speed, p. 132.
(69) Britannia, p. lxxi.

An. D. 236.
An. D. 238.

An. D. 243.

An. D. 245.
An. D. 250.

An. D. 254.

An. D. 261.

Under the short-lived Emperors, Balbinus, Pupienus, and Gordian the Elder, we find no account of Britain; but under the young Gordian it appears, by an inscription upon a votive altar found in Cumberland, that Emilius Crispinus commanded that part of the army under Nonnius Philippus, Proprætor of Britain. Gordian was slain by Philip, anno 243, as he and his son Philippus Caesar was in the year 250, when Decius was by the army made Emperor against his will: his successor Gallus, with his son Volusianus, were slain by Emilianus, who enjoyed the government but about three months, being murdered to make way for Valerianus. This Emperor being taken prisoner by Sapor King of Persia, was by that savage monarch made his footstool, whenever he was disposed to take horse; a just punishment for his most barbarous persecution of the Christians. Heaven and earth seem'd to threaten the ruin of the Roman empire, Gallienus his son's reign being the most confused and calamitous of all that were before him, not only by the invasion of the barbarous nations, but by its own intestine divisions: the soldiers, in all parts, electing their own generals, advanced no less than thirty at once, who assumed the title of Emperors, but are generally recorded by the name of the thirty tyrants.

And now we have too much of the British affairs; for Posthumus, Victorinus, Marius, and Tetricus, both father and son, usurped and reigned here, as appears both by the Roman historians, and the great quantity of their monies found in Yorkshire, and elsewhere in Britain. Posthumus, the most illustrious of all the thirty, was called the Gallie's Hercules: I have a medal of his, with a galley upon it, inscribed LÆTITIA AUG. which an author, curious enough in these matters, takes to relate particularly to Britain for some naval victory (70). He associated Victorinus, an excellent commander; but he was slain, together with his son L. Aurelius Victorinus: whereupon his mother Victoria, or Victorina, who for her masculine courage was stiled mother of armies (and is supposed to be designed by VICTORIA upon the reverse of some of his medals) to support herself, procured Tetricus, a Senator of Rome, who had a command in Gaul, to proclaim himself Emperor, and to make his son, C. Pius Tetricus, his Cæsar: of all whose monies found in these parts, see the Catalogue (71). As also for Marius, who some say was born in Britain; he was originally a finith, and, after a short reign of three, or, as others say, seven, days, was slain by a sword of his own making, having first obtained a victory in Britain, as appears by VICTORIA AUG. upon his monies; so that it is rationally supposed, that he reigned a longer time than is assigned him.

Claudius, surnamed Gotbicus, for his memorable victories over the Goths, was a mighty support to the declining empire during these confusions. He generously resolv'd to march first against the Goths, as enemies to the Commonwealth, rather than against Tetricus and the other Usurpers, who were only enemies to himself; a public wrong, as he said, being to be revenged before a private injury. This Emperor, after a short but glorious reign, died a natural death, which was rare in those times. His brother Quintillus was proclaimed Emperor by the senate; but, after seventeen days, was constrained to give place to Aurelianus, whom the Senate had advanced to that dignity.

Tacitus's short reign of six months, and Florianus's of two, will admit of no enlargement in this Breviary. Though, about this time, Bonofus, a Briton, usurping the government, occasioned a disturbance to Probus the Emperor; but being overcome, and despairing ever again to make head, put his own into a halter, of whom it is said, he being an insatiable vassal to Bacchus, there hangs a barrel, not a man. Probus, having subdued the Germans, Vandals, and Burgundians, &c. had nine kings prisoners at the same time. The Vandals he sent to inhabit this country, who, being desirous to leave their names at the place of their settlement, were very probably the raisers of the fortifications at Berwick in Elmet, called to this day Wendall-hill for Vandal-hill (72). The Vandals, though invaders and enemies in Gaul, were serviceable and auxiliaries in Britain. Other places in this neighbourhood seem to have received their names upon the like occasions. So Almonbury is much more probably deduced from the Almanes (who were auxiliaries to the Romans) than from St Albans; and the learned Dr Gale was of opinion, that Mexburgh, Banburgh, and Duisburgh, &c. received their names from other auxiliaries, the sixth legion having many camps in these parts of Yorkshire.

I shall only add, that the great quantities of Roman coins, found of late years near Doncaster in Yorkshire, and at South Holland in Lincolnshire, were probably concealed upon the arrival of the Vandals, by those that had made the insurrection, who being slain in the conflict, their treasure lay hid above 1400 years. There were no less than thirty-six pound weight of these found in the midst of the vastest flat, or level, in England (73); and one of the pots found near Edlington (74), contained about two gallons. I bought sixty of the former, and the Right Honourable the Lord Molesworth sent me a present of near 200 of the latter, and there was not in either parcel one elder than Gallienus, or later than Quintillus; so that they seem to have been concealed in one common calamity about Probus's time.

Carus succeeding Probus, an. Dom. 283, associated his two sons, Carinus, whom he left to govern Britain, and Numerianus. Carinus was slain by Diocelesian, who joined Maximianus to himself in the government, and upon some commotions in the Empire, each made choice of a Cæsar, viz. Galerius and Constantius Chlorus.

Carausius, an Irishman, being deputed by Maximian to guard the coast, became rich by the spoils of the Pirates, which he never returned to the owners, nor accounted for to the Emperor; but assuming that title himself, became so powerful, that Maximian was glad to make peace with him, leaving him the command of the island, upon condition, he should defend it against the Barbarians, which he did for seven years together. Upon this success, he stamp'd money with PAX. AVG. one of which I have, it was found at Aldburch in this West-riding. Upon others are ML. Moneta Londinensis, and SPC. for signata pecunia Cumeloduni. He recovered the outer boundary, and there erected a wall of stone, fortified it with seven castles, and upon the bank of the river Carun, so called from him, built a round house of hewn stone (probably a temple to Terminus) with a triumphal arch in memory of his Victory; but, in the conclusion, was expelled by Constantius, and slain by his own familiar friend, Allectus, perhaps at Carausfield (75), now Caversfield, two miles from Allebeester, so denominated from this Allectus, upon some of whose coins are ML. upon others QL. for Moneta Londinensis, and a Quartarius coined at London, or Quæstor (Treasurer) of London.

Allectus having retained the government three years, was slain by Constantius Chlorus, who scoured the British seas, which had been infested by the Saxons and Gauls, and settled the Kingdom in peace. This excellent Prince married Helena, daughter of Coit, a British King, by whom he had issue Constantine the Great. It is not

An. D. 271.

An. D. 276.

An. D. 277.

(72) I need not repeat, that the Romans pronounced their V as our W, as Vallum, Wallum, (73) See Phil. Trans. No. 279.

(74) Selden, No. 303.

An. D. 284.

An. D. 287.

An. D. 293.

(75) History of Allebeester, annexed to Dr Kennet's Parochial Antiquities, p. 683.

An. D. 296.

An. D. 262.
(70) Ob. Walker, of coins and medals, p. 291.
An. D. 268.

(71) Mus. Thoresb. p. 317, 318, 319.
An. D. 269.

a little for the honour of York, that this pious Emperor, endowed with all moral and christian virtues, had there his Royal Seat. The remains of many valuable Roman monuments are scattered up and down that ancient city, which it is a pity that none of the many learned men thereof have illustrated, as Dr Lifter has done the multangular tower and Roman wall there (76), of which I have the original drawing by the ingenious Mr Lodge, a native of Leedes. Here also Constantius died, and was deified (77), as appears by his medals in this Museum, inscribed DIVO. CONSTANTIO. PIO. round his veiled head. Reverse, MEMORIA FELIX Exergue PLN. Pecunia Londini Notata. A noted Antiquary observes; in respect of this coin, that Rome, in the height of its greatness, had not a more glorious shew to exhibit (78), than the apotheosis of their Emperors hereby represented. At the dissolution of Religious Houses, there was found always burning a lamp in a kind of grot, or vault, where constant fame reported the reliques of Constantius were laid (79): Monies were also coined in honour of his wife, the celebrated St Helen: Camden mentions one that was minted at Triers; but I have one more valuable, as coined at London; which, at her request, was surrounded with a wall by her son Constantine, if not by herself; as Henry of Huntington affirms (80). Of this fabric, and the composition of this ancient Roman wall, there is an accurate description by the learned and ingenious Dr Woodward (81). This medal has her head inscribed FL: HELENA. AVGVSTA. Reverse, SECVRTAS REIPVBLICAE. Exergue P. LON. This excellent Princess was born at Colchester in Essex, which she also walled, and which has for the arms thereof a Cross between four Crowns, in memory of the Cross, which she found at Jerusalem, where she built a Church in the place where our blessed Saviour suffered: she also founded another Church, where the Inn had stood that he was born in. So that in old inscriptions, she is stiled Priissima & Venerabilis Augusta. St Helensford near Tadcaster is generally supposed to be denominated from her, though the learned Dr Gale, late Dean of York, told me he rather inclined to deduce it from the goddess Nebellmia, who was Præses artis calcariæ, seu cretariæ; and I am apt to think it might be so; by the Calcarientes, or heathen Romans employed in burning the lime-stone, wherewith this tract abounds to this day; but by the Christian Romans be afterwards applied to St Helen.

That her son Constantine the Great was born in Britain, is not only affirmed by our own Historians (82), but acknowledged by Baronius himself, and the generality of learned Authors; and though a very few Writers would have it at Colchester or London, yet the most, and most considerable, do assign the honour to York; and to use the words of a very learned man, lately deceased, all those who assert Britain to have been the place of his birth, must needs acknowledge him to have been born at York (83). And that this was the current opinion, not only of private persons, whose works are particularly enumerated by the judicious Bishop Usher (84), but the public also, is evident, because the Embassadors of England asserted it in the hearing of the learned world, both at the Council of Constance, and at Basil: where they condescend to mention the very particular place in York, where he was born. Petræ natum in Eboracensi civitate, by which is indisputably meant Bedern, which is verily thought to have been part of the Imperial Palace in old time, as in after ages it was a College of Vicars; the Saxon name may be deduced either from Beod-erne Refektorium, or from Beod watio and erne locus, their place of prayer; and Trinity, or Christ's Church, in that part of the city, is in his Grace the Lord Archbishop's register, stiled Ecclesia Sæ Trinitatis in Curia Regis. But to proceed, Constantine, who had been many years detained in the Court of Dioclesian, and after of Galerius, as an honourable pledge, finding treachery intended against him, made his escape from Rome, and arrived safe at York, to the great joy of his dying father, who shortly after expired in his arms. By his father's will, and consent of the army, he was unanimously saluted Emperor, which his modesty refused, till prevailed on by their importunity, and especially by Erocius, King of the Almains (85), who had accompanied him in his flight from Court, whose auxiliary forces lay, no doubt, at Almanbury, in this West-riding of the county of York, as is before intimated.

From all this it may justly be inferred, what figure York made in the secular affairs of the world, it being the seat of the Roman Emperors; I shall now add, for the Ecclesiastical glory of Eboracum; that it was adorned with an Episcopal See by Constantine, and that Eborius, the Bishop thereof, was present at the Council of Arles, called to take notice of the cause of the Donatists, wherein were present, to represent the British Churches, Eborius, Bishop of York; Restitutus, Bishop of London; and Adelfus de civitate Colonia Londinensium; Sacerdos, a Priest both by name and office; and Arminius, a Deacon: of what place the third Bishop was, hath been much controverted by learned men; Archbishop Usher thought it was Colchester, Mr Selden, and Sir Henry Spelman, took it for Camelodunum [Malden in Essex]; but Bishop Stillingfleet fixes it most probably at Caerleon in Monmouthshire, from the way of summoning Bishops to Councils at that time, viz. one out of a Province (86); and therefore, that as the other two Bishops were out of the other two Provinces, Maxima Cæsariensis and Britannia Prima, the third Bishop was out of the third Province, Britannia Secunda; his arguments from thence to prove the great antiquity of Episcopal Government in Britain, and that the Pagan Hierarchy was rather in imitation of the Christian, than that the Christians borrowed it from them, may be seen in that very learned Author's Origines Britannicæ, Chap. II. What more immediately appertains to this county, is the note of a Critic upon the name Arminius, the Deacon: 'It is worth taking notice of, says he, that the name remaineth still intire in Yorkshire in a very noble and religious family, after so many ages (87), of which I shall, in the sequel of this History, give an instance in the Memoirs of the no less pious, than Right Honourable Lady; the Lady Mary Armine, whose benefactions to these parts were considerable.

The British Bishops being summoned, and appearing at this Council of Arles before, and at those of Sardica and Arminum afterwards, it is more than probable, that they, and the Bishop of York at the head of them, (as before) were present at the famous, and indeed the first general Council of Nice, which this pious Emperor called to suppress the Arians and Quartodecimani, ann. Dom. 325. It being very unlikely, that Constantine should omit those of his native country; though Athanasius's Synodicon (wherein all their names were set down) being long since lost, we are forced to make use of probabilities, but such as are very convincing, as managed by the learned Bishop of Worcester (88).

When Constantine went against Maxentius, he took divers of the nobles and others with him, who, planting themselves in the West sea-coast of France, called it Britain. He was victorious over the Franks, as well as over Maxentius, and as he had formerly been over the Sarmatians, against whom he was sent by Galerius with a few men on purpose to be destroyed; but he overcame them, and in person drew a fierce young Sarmate by the hair of the head before Galerius: I have a medal, struck upon this occasion, inscribed SARMATIA DEVICTA, whereupon is represented victory, with a palm, carrying a trophy, and a captive at her feet (89). But as to the affairs of our own country, Octavius, taking advantage of his absence, caused the Britons to revolt, and assumed the kingdom; whereupon, faith Alured of Beverley (90), Constantine sent Trabern against him; but it is evident from Eusebius (91), that himself came again in person to Britain, surrounded by the sea, and became Victor. The joyful memorial of this expedition is registered to posterity upon a medal exhibited by Speed (92). In this Museum is one somewhat different, though coined at the same place in London, trampling an enemy under the horse's feet, CONSTANTINUS. P. F. AUG. reverse, ADVENTUS AUG. Exergue P. LN. (93). In this his head has a laurel; upon another (94) he is represented with a helmet, and a spear in his right hand; whereby it appears there were two different mints at the same city; upon a third, whereon he has a scepter, it is expressly P. LON.

When Constantine new modelled the empire, Britain was governed by a Lord Deputy, whose blazonry was a book shut with a green cover (95): he was honoured with the title of Speſtabilis. The other officers may be seen in Camden's Britannia (96), to which we refer; it may suffice, that these parts, called Maxima Cæsariensis, were under the Dux Britannicus, as the Southern were under the Comes Britanniarum.

Upon the death of this ever famous Emperor, May 22, 337, and division of the empire amongst his three sons, Britain (together with Spain, Gallia, and Germany) fell to the share of his eldest son, Constantinus Junior, who enjoyed it but three years, being slain, anno 340, by his brother Constans; yet are there four distinct medals of his, all minted at London (97). His death was much lamented by his brother (76) Phil. Transf. No. 149.

An. D. 306.
(77) Obit Eboraci atque inter Divos relatus est Eutrop. Lib. X. P. 516.

(78) Burton's Comment on Antonin. Itiner. P. 78.

(79) Idem vide etiam, Camden's Britan. p. 719.

(80) Lib. I. p. 176. inter Savi- lii Scriptores rerum Anglic.

(81) Letter to Sir Christ. Wren, in Leland's Itin. Vol. VIII. p. 147.

(82) Constantinus Flos Britannicæ . . . Britannicus genere et patria. Henry Huntington, p. 176.

(83) Dr Hicke's Moral Shechemah, Vol. I. of his Serm. p. 313.

(84) Usher de primordiis, &c. Cap. VIII.

(85) Victor in Epitome Rom. Imperii, p. 348.

An. D. 314.

(86) Stillingfleet's Origines Brit. p. 75.

(87) Burton's Com. on Antoninus's Itin. p. 85.

An. D. 325.

(88) Orig. Brit. chap. 3.

(89) Mus. Thor. No. 920.

(90) Edit. Hearne, lib. 3. P. 37.

(91) Euseb. Life of Constantine, cap. 19.

(92) Speed's Chron. 157, 159.

(93) Mus. Thor. No. 894.

(94) Idem, 915 and 916.

(95) Selden's Jani Anglorum facies altera, cap. 16.

(96) p. lxxviii.

An. D. 337.

An. D. 340.

(97) Mus. Thor. No. 328.

brother Constantius, to whom Britain submitted itself; and I have of his money also coined at London (98). Julian the Apollate was made his successor, having dissembled his religion, but afterwards publicly restored the Pagan altars and temples: while he resided at Paris (99), he heard of the incursions of the Scots and Picts into the province; but, not daring to come himself, he sent Lupicinus to repress the troubles (100). Jovian, his successor, was an orthodox Christian, and refused to act, except he had liberty of his religion, and, when Emperor, severely punished idolatry; but his short reign affords nothing relating to these parts. Valentinian succeeded, in whose time the Scots, Picts, and Attacosts, destroyed the North, as the Saxons and Franes did the South; but these being subdued by the forces he sent over under Theodosius, learning and arts began a little to revive; and in the Theodosian code there is an edict of Gratian, who succeeded in the empire, anno 376 (101), requiring all the chief cities in these parts of the Roman empire to settle and maintain in them professors of learning, both of the Greek and Roman languages, amongst which cities Bishop Stillingfleet expressly mentions London, York, and Caerleon (102); so that these parts, as long as the Roman power continued, had the same advantages for learning as the other provinces. This brave general Theodosius, having thus happily reduced these Northern parts to their pristine state, obtained leave to have them named another province, and it was thenceforward called Valentia in honour of the Emperor (103).

Maximus, a commander in those parts, having by his affability won the hearts of the Britons, set up himself for Emperor in the year 381, according to Sir Henry Savile (104), whose chronology I entirely follow. Some would make Maximus a Spaniard; but the Saxon annals, published by the learned Bishop of Lincoln (105), say expressly, he was on Bretan londe zeboren. With this agrees Wheloc's edition of the Saxon chronology, save that, being less correct, the Emperor is called Maximianus (106). With this agrees also Fabius Etbelwerdus (107), and Henry of Huntington (108); and all authors acknowledge he was declared Emperor in Britain, and that he was a man just and valiant, and worthy of the honour, if he had not come to it by usurpation. After his victory over the Picts and Scots, he transported the flower of the British troops, and fixed his court at Triers, and, by the meer terror of his name, raised taxes among the barbarous nations. After Gratian was slain, he made his son Victor, Cæsar, and entered Italy with so great terror, that Valentinian fled, and the cities opened their gates: there is yet extant at Bononia an inscription in honour of him (109); but after five years reign he was slain at Aquileia: his coins, and those of his son Victor, are very rare; yet of both are found in these Northern parts, where he performed his most noble acts against the Caledonians. I have of his, coined both at Triers and Aquileia (110); and, since the Catalogue was printed, Edward Thompson, jun. Esq; sent me a most rare one of Victor, whereon he is stiled Augustus, which, with many others of the later Emperors, were found, anno 1720, at Richmond in Yorkshire.

The British historians set this matter in a different light, and say, that, after Constantine the Great, one Oñarius reigned, and that he gave his daughter to Maximus, cum regno Britannico (111). Some historians misapply the peopling of Armorica from this island to him; for Bishop Stillingfleet proves it was called by the old name, and not Britannia, near fourscore years after this time (112).

But what more immediately relates to these times and parts of Britain is, that, by reason of these inroads of the Picts and Scots, who continually infested the Northern parts, Fraomarius, King of the Almains (113), (who at that time were eminent for their strength and number) was sent here to check the Barbarians. And that they not only resided in these parts of Yorkshire, but left their name to a noted camp at Cambodanum, is evident from the name of a place which is called Almanbury to this day, which is far more probably deduced from the Almans than from the pretended St. Alban; and to this opinion I have the sanction of Dr. Gale, the late learned Dean of York. St. Alban reminds me of St. Ursula and the 11000 martyred virgins, whose story is generally placed in the reign of this Maximus, though Ser. Cressy makes it to be anno 453; but the thing is not material; I should not have thought it worth the mentioning at all, but that a worthy gentleman brought me from Coleu one of the antique arrows that are there exposed as the instruments of that barbarous slaughter; the Monk that attends there told him, that, though many are given away, the number is [miraculously] made up again in a small time, which, one word excepted, is, I believe, the truest part of the legend.

The Emperors Gratian and Valentinian, to oblige Maximus to withdraw his forces out of Gaul, are said by the author of the Eulogium, as cited by Bishop Usher (114), to enter into a league with the Gothic Picts, and help them with ships to convey them into the Northern parts of Britain, who coming hither in greater numbers, and finding the country naked and without defence, settled themselves with greater encouragement than ever. The Britons, in this distress, chose Marcus for their Emperor, and after him set up Gratian, a native of Britain, anno 409; but, falling into a dislike of him too, after a reign of four months they dethroned him, and chose Constantine, one of the common soldiers, upon the sole account of his name, which they took for a good omen. He defended Valentia with great bravery; and I have one of his coins minted in Britain (115). But he afterwards fixed the seat of his empire at Arles, and was presented with an imperial robe by Honorius (116); but was slain anno 414 (*). Britain was now again happy for a while under the gallant and wise conduct of Victorinus, who put a stop to the inroads of the Scots and Picts: and perhaps we may add the happiness of these parts in Faslidius, as Archbishop of York, who flourished anno 420, and was not only a man of wit and eloquence, but, which is infinitely preferable, of great piety, and an excellent preacher. He, being stiled Britanniarum Episcopus, is by many concluded Archbishop of London, which they suppose the metropolis of Britain; but the famous Archbishop Usher rather inclines to the opinion of Bertarius, that York was then the metropolis of Britain, not only because it was a Roman colony, but because the Prætorium and Emperor's palace were there. However this shall not be insisted on, because the generality of historians place Faslidius among the Bishops of London. What we are more concerned for is, that Honorius was constrained to recall the brave Victorinus to maintain the heart of the empire, Rome the head of it being taken and sacked by Alaric the Goth (117).

Miserable was the state of the Britons thus forsaken; their earnest supplications to the Romans for assistance, and what supplies were granted, may be read in our general histories. I shall here only add in brief, that under Valentinian III, the last wall for their defence against the Barbarians, was built not of Turf, but solid stone twelve feet high, and eight broad, now known by the name of the Picts wall. Afterwards the Romans intirely abandoned the nation, about 476 years after Cæsar's landing. Thus the natives being forced to it, stood in their own defence, and were awakened to that degree, that they made their enemy quiet for some time.

But as their own Historian, Gildas (118), complains, though their foes left our people, our people left not their iniquities, excessive drinking, treas, oppression, divisions, &c.; so that their old enemies observing their intestine divisions, did again invade the land, and reduced them to that extremity, which was aggravated by a severe famine and plague, that it was finally resolved by Vortigern, to send for the Saxons. These arrived anno Dom. 449, under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa; but having overcome the common enemy, the Saxons turn against the Britons, and make a miserable destruction: all the cities and churches were burnt to the ground from the east to the western ocean, the inhabitants destroyed with horrible devastation (119), some escaped to the mountains, or hid themselves in caves, and others went over into foreign parts, which was the foundation of the Armorican colony in Little Britain. This Hengist descended from their idolized Woden, was the founder of the Kingdom of Kent, the first of the Saxon Heptarchy. There were for many years bloody wars betwixt the Britons and Saxons; but I shall chiefly confine myself to the northern transactions.

Hengist was so successful, that he not only erected for himself a Kingdom in the South, but gave to his brother Otho, and his eldest son Ebusa, all Northumberland, by which is to be understood, not only the county that bears the name, but all the land north of Humber, afterwards divided into two Kingdoms; Deira, from the Humber to Tine; and Bernicia, from thence to the Firth of Edinburgh: all this was conquered under Hengist's Commission, by Otho and his son, and held as feudatory Earldoms, and transmitted to their successors, who, for ninety-nine years, used no other title than Ealderman, Dux, or Comes, which words, in those days, were synonymous (120).

- (98) Mus. Tho- reb. No. 982.
- An. D. 363.
- (99) Dr. Brady's Hist of England, p. 34.
- An. D. 364.
- (100) Animan. Marcell. lib. xx. p. 1.
- An. D. 376.
- (101) Sir Henry Savile's Fasti.
- (102) Stillingfleet, Orig. Brit. p. 215.
- (103) Am. Marcell. lib. 28. c. 7.
- An. D. 381.
- (104) Fasti ad calcem rerum Anglicarum scriptores.
- (105) Gibbon's Chron. Saxon, p. 9.
- (106) Wheloc's Bede, p. 506.
- (107) Ethelwerd, p. 474.
- (108) Henry Huntington, p. 176. Both published by Sir Henry Savile in his rerum Anglicarum scriptores, an. 1596.
- (109) Camd. Brit. p. lxxxiii.
- (110) Mus. Tho- reb. p. 332.
- (111) Alared Beverlac. Annales, lib. 3. p. 41.
- (112) Orig. Brit. p. 181.
- (113) Briton. p. lxxx.

- (114) Usher de Brit. Eccl. Antiq. p. 590. 480.
- An. D. 409.
- An. D. 410.
- (115) Mus. Tho- reb. p. 303.
- An. D. 414.
- (116) Camden's Brit. p. lxxxiv.
- (*) The British historians pretend, that Constantine reigned sixteen years in Britain, and in the seventeenth died at York, contrary to the Greek and Latin historians, both heathen and Christian, as Bishop Stillingfleet observes, p. 294.
- An. D. 420.
- (117) In the last cited treatise, p. 97.
- (118) Gildas, § 18.
- An. D. 435.
- An. D. 449.
- (119) Idem, § 24.
- (120) Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 616.

Among the Britains that first opposed Hengist, the papum, none more stout than Vortimer, who was so successful in four battles, that he expelled the Saxons into the isle of Thanet; but upon his death (by treachery and poison), and the arrival of more forces, they return, and are victorious, till restrained by Aurelius Ambrosius, and his brother Uter Pendragon, who coming from Little Britain, infused new life into the Britons, who at the battle of Maisbelly (121), routed the Saxons, and put them to a disorderly flight; upon which Hengist retired to Connisborow, near Doncaster, to secure himself, and a few days after took the field a second time against the Britons, who pursued him; but it proved fatal to himself and his army, which was intirely defeated, and himself beheaded, if, saith a noted Historian (122), the authority of the British History is to be preferred in this matter before that of the Saxon Annals, which report him to have died a natural death, being worn out with fatigue and business. But to this may be appositely replied, what the learned Editor of the Saxon Annals affirms, that not any of them do say so; but on the contrary, those Historians, who seem best acquainted with such ancient records, assert plainly, that he was slain, (as Matthew of Westminster expresseth it) captus amputato capite ad Tarcara destinabatur: to which may be added that of Polydore Virgil, Hengisto primo impetu occiso (123), and saith the memory of the victory was fresh among the neighbouring inhabitants, even to his time, which was above a thousand years after: and we are further told, that before the gate is an agger that tradition saith is the burying-place of Hengist (124).

After this victory, Aurelius Ambrosius called the Princes and great men together at York, and gave orders for repairing the churches, which the Saxons had destroyed. For though the Historians of those contending nations differ very much as to the battles, it is agreed on all hands, that Ambrosius was very zealous in repairing the British churches, setting up divine worship, and giving great encouragement to the Clergy to perform divine offices. In a solemn Council of the Britons, ann. 490, he appointed two Metropolitans for the two vacant Sees at that time, viz. Sampson, one of eminent piety, for York; and Dubritius for Caerleon. Sampson was afterwards driven over to Armorica, or Little Britain (125).

He was succeeded by his brother, Uter Pendragon, who hearing that Oeta, the son of Hengist, after he had destroyed the North (ab Albania usque Eboracum (126)) had besieged the city of York, hastened thither, gave them battle, discomfited their forces, and took him and his brother Eosa prisoners. Before his death, there was a pitched battle between Cerdic and Natanleod, whom some make Uter's General, others a mighty King; Henry Huntington saith expressly (127), he was Rex Maximus Britannorum; and then it implies, that the Britons, as well as the Saxons, had several Kings at the same time: but of as great fame and pride as he was, Cerdic slew him and 5000 men, at a place which bore his name. Camden says, he had been very curious in search of the place, but could not find the least footsteps of that name (128). If this county was not too much northward for the other circumstances of that engagement, why might not Natanleod put in for it? some indeed call him Naxaleod; but the Saxon Annals say expressly Natanleod (129).

The celebrated King Arthur succeeded Uter, ann. 517, whose mighty feats are most amply related by the British Historians. But in respect of this Prince, I am much of Bishop Stillingfleet's opinion, that both parties are to blame; those who tell such incredible tales of him as are utterly inconsistent with the circumstances of the British affairs at that time; and those, who on the other hand deny there was any such person, or of any considerable power; for doubtless he was a valiant Prince, and victorious in many battles against the Saxons. Of the twelve battles so much celebrated, I shall only mention such as we have most certainty of, and do also relate to these northern parts. As that Arthur having defeated the Saxons in Northumberland, besieged Colgrin in York, which yielded to him ann. 521, this is indisputable; but there are other transactions that are commonly supposed to be more Southward, which yet do more strictly, I presume, appertain to these northern parts, and particularly the seventh battle, wherein he slew 6000 Saxons. This is expressly said to be at Cair Loid Coit, or Cair Luit Coit, which later Writers frequently misapply to Lincoln; but not in my opinion only, but that also of Dr Gale, the late Dean of York, is more applicable to Leedes, that the very name imports as much, appears by the etymology (of which before) and all the circumstances countenance it. The Britons having driven the Saxons out of Lincolnshire northward, we find mention of Cair Loid Coit as a place further north. That Holinshed, and other Writers, should herein be misled by Alured Beverlacensis, is no great wonder in affairs transacted 1200 years ago, when in a matter so late as King Edward the Third's reign, the nativity of a Prince of the Royal Blood, is almost universally placed at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, and even by such, as writing the genealogy of the Kings of England, might have been presumed more knowing in those affairs (130); whereas, undeniable evidence from records, manifest that it was at Hatfield in Yorkshire (131). It is the less wonder that later Authors mistake in an affair of so great intricacy, when the Archdeacon of Huntington, who writ his History 500 years ago, owns fairly, that as to the places of the twelve battles, loci nostræ ætati incognita sunt (132). I am apt to suspect that the express mention of the Sylva Celydonis, with respect of this very transaction, has induced some to place it at Lincoln, least it should be referred to the Scotch Caledonian woods, quo Saxones nunquam penetrarunt; but this very passage of the wood, that hugste Celydon, may be justly improved as an argument, that it was in these parts of Yorkshire; Celidon in British signifying Hassel, and Hassel wood is adjoining to Bede's Sylva Elmetæ: which the very learned Dean Gale, in his Emendations of Nennius, acquaints us is territorium agri Ebor. prope Leedes (133).

This famous King Arthur was slain in the year 542. Persons of greatest repute in his time for learning and sanctity were St David and Kentigern. The memory of the first continues famous to this day in Wales, and of the other in Scotland and these parts, by reason of a noted spring that bears his Noriff name, St Mungo. An eminent Physician, that writ of the four famous medicinal wells near Knareburgh (134), confesses himself at a loss for the meaning of the true name Magnus or Mugnus; but Archbishop Spotswood has since told us, it is Mongab or Mungo, that signifies a dear friend (135). The cures wrought there are justly ascribed to the activity of the coldness, rather than the intercession of the Saint, though by the credulous believed to be the son of a pure virgin. The legend may be seen in the Romish authors (136), formerly belonging to New-Abbey (or St Mary de dulci corde) in Galloway. The learned Bishop Nicolson has observed, from a rare manuscript breviary now in this Museum, that this Saint's day was January 14; but the English martyrology (137) says, that, at Glasgow, the deposition of St Kentigern, son to Eugenius, third King of Scotland, is the 13th. The author of this book (which is a great curiosity) is not commonly known, but a learned Vicar of Leedes acquaints us (138) that it was one Wilson; it is remarkable that, in the annexed catalogue of the late Martyrs in England, Richard Oldcorne, Priest, and Henry Garnet, Superior of the Jesuits, are both recorded as such, though executed for the Gunpowder treason.

What more immediately appertains to this place is, that the northern Britons, after some time, came to an agreement with the Saxons, and by their permission enjoyed the Christian religion; and that Ida and Alla from Aldermen (of which before) became now Kings of Northumberland, in which new erected kingdom there was a succession of twenty-one Kings, of whom four were Pagans, and seventeen Christians, some of whom were chief monarchs of the whole island, and had their royal seat at Leedes when Cambodunum was burnt down by the enemy (139). It continued 245 years, from anno 547 to 792. This, as was intimated before, being divided into the kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia, was sometimes under one monarch, and sometimes had two distinct Kings. Ida reigned over both for twelve years, Adda succeeded him, and reigned five years in Bernicia; but in Deira, Alla, the son of Yffus, ruled thirty years. This Alla was father to the famous Edwin, the first Christian King of Northumberland. In his time was Careticus, the fifth British King from Arthur, who began his unfortunate reign anno 586; he was unyoking to God and to Britons (140), which the Saxons perceiving, began to war upon him, and in fine drove him to the mountains of Wales. Near Aburford, in this neighbourhood, is the foundation of an old castle still visible, supposed to be called from him Castle-Cary; this, with all the territory called Elmet, was conquered and taken from him by the said Edwin. If it be objected, that it is very uncertain whether this was the monarch, or another of the same name, that was only King of Elmet, I must answer with Father Cressy, that the records of those times afford us so small light, that it is extremely difficult to determine whether they were monarchs of the Britons, (130) Sandford's Genealogy, p. 177.

(131) Camden's Brit. No. 2. p. 725.

(132) Henry Hunting. p. 180.

(133) Gale's Script. Britan. Vol. I. p. 132. An. D. 542.

(134) Dr French of the Yorkshire Spaw, p. 119.

(135) Spotswood's History of the church of Scotland, p. 11.

(136) Cressy's church history, lib. xi. c. 5.

(137) Printed permiffu superiorum 1608.

(138) Camden's Brit. p. 711.

An. D. 547.

(139) Gibson's Chron. Saxon, p. 20.

An. D. 559.

An. D. 586.

(140) Ran. Higden's Polychron. p. clxxxix.

London in 1724. 8vo. [I]. He did not long survive this publication. He was always inclined to a thickness of blood (m), which subjected him to a pain and numbness in the back part of his head, accompanied sometimes with faintings to the loss of his senses, and other apoplectic symptoms. These he looked upon as so many prognostics of his death: nor was he mistaken, though he lived long beyond his expected period. In October this year, 1724, he was struck with a violent palsy, from which stroke, however, he so far recovered, as to speak intelligibly, and walk with help: but the following year, he was attacked again by the same distemper, on the 10th of the same month, under which, after languishing six days, he departed this life, October 16, 1725, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. His corpse was interred among his Ancestors, in the chancel of St Peter's [the Parish] Church of Leedes. His character for learning is seen in the books he published, which shew him to have been a great Master of the History and Antiquities of his own Country; to attain which, it became necessary for him to be thoroughly skilled, as he was, in Genealogy and Heraldry. He appears, from these books, to have been also an industrious Biographer. However, that which sets his reputation the highest as a Scholar, was his judicious skill and knowledge in Coins and Medals. But Mr Thoresby may be said justly to have been a great man, because he was truly a good man. How diligent soever he was in cultivating the laudable accomplishments of the Gentleman and the Scholar, yet he never suffered his beloved studies to interfere with his religion (n); but managed all his affairs in subserviency to it. In his principles, after his conversion, he was orthodox; in his affections, catholic, comprehending therein all denominations of Christians [K]. He read the Scriptures many times over, with the best Commentators; nor was he unacquainted with the intricate controversies of Religion; but books of warm practical Divinity were the joy of his heart. He was modest and pure, temperate and abstemious to an uncommon degree: though, being one of the Lords of the Manor, and a governing Member of the Corporation (o), he could not always avoid public meetings and festivities, yet he was a sparing partaker, even of innocent diversions. He was constant and regular at his private devotions, which were invigorated with an unusual degree of fervency. Exemplary in the government of his family, he called them together morning and evening to prayer, and reading the Scripture. Extremely careful of the religious instructions of his children, he was not unmindful of the moral behaviour of his servants. He was a kind relation, compromising the distressed affairs of some that were very near to him, by expensive journeys, irksome applications, and money almost beyond his abilities. He was charitable to the utmost of his power, not seldom solicited others, and was always a faithful dispenser of whatever was entrusted to his care. He was constitutionally slow to resent, and, upon Christian principles, ready to forgive, great injuries; and, being of a pacific temper himself, he often had the satisfaction of composing differences among contending friends. He left behind him a mournful widow, sincerely pious, and remarkably humble. She was an affectionate wife, a tender parent, and discharged the several duties of her station, with unblemished fidelity and prudence. She survived him near fifteen years, and was buried in the same grave with him, having brought him ten children, of whom three survived him, two sons, and a daughter named Grace, who was born in 1694, and was disposed of by her parents in marriage to Mr John Wood of Leedes. His sons were both bred to the Church; the elder, Ralph, was born March 24, 1697-8 (p), bred at Queen's College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of A. M. His father had the satisfaction to see him collated to the Vicarage of Rickmansworth in Hertfordshire, by Dr Gibson, Bishop of London; he is now, by the recommendation of the same Patron, Rector of Stoke-Newington in Middlesex. His Lordship likewise preferred the younger son, Richard, born in 1702, and a graduate of Catharine-Hall in Cambridge, to the Rectory of St Catharine Coleman, in Fenchurch-street, London; which he still enjoys. They are both worthy Clergymen, and well respected in their several parishes.

(m) This was peculiar in his constitution, that he had not the usual quantity of matter; and though he could spit upon some very extraordinary occasion, yet it was a force upon nature, and in his usual course he did neither hawk nor spit in many years: but found no inconvenience from it there being spittle enough to suffice for moistening the larynx, and a soft digestion. Parat. Leod. In the Appendix. p. 616.

(n) Upon his conforming to the Church, he was chosen into the Common-Council. On the occasion, he objected to the oaths always taken against the solemn League and Covenant, as an antiquated affair; and it was laid aside from this time. He paid his fine, and resigned this office some years before he died.

(141) Cressy's church history, b. xii. c. 7.

Britons, or Princes that lived in several Provinces, and reigned at the same time (141). Here ends the manuscript.

[I] Vicaria Leodiensis.] This work was undertaken by him purely out of a hearty love to his native place; but the subject being narrow and confined, he has enriched it with observations on the original of parochial churches, and the ancient manner of building them, as also on the old way of passing estates by delivery of pledges, subscription of golden crosses, and pendant seals, &c. And besides the memoirs of many worthy Divines, successively Vicars of Leedes, he has added the lives of the Doctors Matthew Hutton, Edwin Sandys, Tobie Matthew, John Thoresby, Archbishops of York, and of Henry, Earl of Huntington; to which he has likewise added a list of the Lords Presidents of the King's council at York, from the first erection of that court to its dissolution: with an appendix of original records and manuscripts, concluding with an account of Trinity church, which was then building at Leedes (†).

[K] His benevolence extended to all denominations of Christians.] For instance, when the pious Philip Lord Wharton began his charity of distributing Bibles among the poor, on condition of repeating memoriter a few Psalms, and the assembly's catechism, he desired Mr Thoresby's assistance at Leedes, which he cheerfully embraced, and, for many years, painfully executed. In the same spirit, he was from his youth a promoter of private assemblies for prayer and holy conferences, and some good was done in that method. In the latter part of his life, a number of well-disposed young men applied to him for his advice and countenance, and he attempted, with the approbation of the Vicar, to settle them upon Dr Woodward's plan of a religious society. But this laudable design was defeated by the extravagant enthusiasm of one of them, who was too opinionated to be convinced, and not contented with his own ideal perfection, was continually imposing it upon others, as a necessary article of salvation. In the like spirit, when a Charity-school was first erected at Leedes, Mr Thoresby was a zealous Advocate for it, and was named for Treasurer, which, though he out of modesty declined, yet he voluntarily offered to be one of their Collectors, and performed the office with fidelity and activity. Lastly, the pious Robert Nelson, Esq; recommended him for a corresponding member of the Society in London for promoting Christian Knowledge; and he took a great deal of pains to effectuate their design, by recommending subscribers, and dispersing many pious books among the poor; whereupon, at his death, Mr Newman, their Secretary, wrote a letter to the Reverend Mr Robinson, lamenting the loss of so serviceable a correspondent.

(n) He often lamented the great consumption of time, occasioned by the numerous visitants to see his Museum, but took care they should not hinder his private, or public worship.

(p) He had a son born before Ralph, but he died of the small-pox in Novemb. 1689. Ducat. Leod. p. 612. where is related an instance of an extraordinary memory in a young woman, who repeated her Minister's, Mr Sharp's, Sermons, though composed in long sentences, and a lofty stile, once a fortnight, to a considerable number of her own sex, more perfectly than most could take them in shorthand; which, considering her sex, is more remarkable than that of Dr Fuller (omitted in his article) who was able to make use of any man's Sermon that he had but once read, or heard. Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 523.

(†) This church has been since finished and endowed by the Benefactors mentioned in the conclusion.

TILLOTSON [JOHN], Archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from the Tilsons of Tilson in Cheshire [A]. The name of that branch of the family, to which we owe our Archbishop, being changed by his great grandfather, Thomas Wookliff, in the parish of Carlton, in that part of Yorkshire called Craven, from whom it was derived to his son George, who by his wife Eleanor, daughter of Ellis Natter of Pendleforest, in Lancashire, had Robert, his heir, who became a considerable Clothier at Sowerby, in the parish of Halifax in Yorkshire (a), where John, his eldest son, the subject of this Memoir, was born, at a house called Haugh-end, about Michaelmas-day, 1630, being baptized on the 3d of Octob. following (b). His father being a very rigid Puritan and Calvinist (c), was particularly careful to breed up his son in the same principles, and finding that he made an extraordinary progress at school, he kept him there till he was fit for the University, and then sent him to Cambridge, where he was admitted Pensioner of Clare Hall, under the tuition of Mr David Clarkson [B], an eminent Presbyterian Divine, April 28, 1647, being matriculated in the University on the first of July following. Here (d) he followed his studies with a commendable diligence, but not so as to have the character of a hard or plodding student [C], and declined appearing in public exercises as much as he could, but performed them very well when required (e). Midsummer 1650, he took the degree of A. B. and on the 27th of November the following year, was admitted Fellow of the College (f), having about half a year before (g) begun to take pupils, of whose behaviour and manners he was very careful [D], being himself of a serious and religious turn: he had a very good gift of performing extempore prayers, then much in use, and was a great frequenter of sermons [E]. In 1654, he proceeded A. M. and at the public commencement the following year, being appointed to keep the Philosophy Act, he performed it with great applause, and beyond expectation (b). In the latter end of 1656, he left the College, where he had met with extraordinary respect from his first admission, and after he became Fellow, the Seniors did nothing in public affairs of the Society without consulting him (i). Some time before he quitted Cambridge, having met with Chillingworth's book, intitled The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation, the reasoning of that excellent Author had opened his mind so far, as to release him from the narrow notions of his education: in which he had always found something not agreeable to the natural sweetness of his temper (k) [F]. However, he still

(c) His prejudices were scarce to be moderated by all the reasoning of his son, whom he lived to see Dean of Canterbury. Birch's Life of the Archbishop, p. 2. Dr Hickeys says, he early turned Anabaptist. Some Discourses, &c. p. 62. Edit. 1695. 4to.

(d) Le Neve's Lives of the Protestant Bishops, p. 222, 223. from a MS. of Thomas Baker, S. T. B.

(g) When he was made Probationer Fellow. Beardmore, p. 381, who was his first pupil, was admitted Sizer and Pupil to Dominus Tillotson, April 7, 1651. College-Register.

(b) Beardmore, p. 402.

(i) Whiston's Memoirs of his own Life, Vol. 1. p. 29.

(a) His mother was Mary, daughter of Thomas Dobson of the same place, Gentleman. Life of Archbishop Tillotson, p. 4. Edit. 1717. 8vo. p. 11. She unhappily lost her understanding many years before her death. Archbishop's Prayers before his Consecration, printed in his Works, Vol. III. Edit. 1752. fol.

(b) Calamy's Account, Vol. II. p. 795. Edit. 1713.

(c) Memoirs of the Archbishop by Beardmore, subjoined to his Life by Birch, p. 400.

(f) Le Neve, as before, from Baker's MS.

(k) His Funeral Sermon, by Burnet, p. 10, 11. Edit. 1694. 4to.

[A] Descended from the Tilsons in Cheshire.] The first known ancestor of this family was Nicholas de Tilston, Lord of the manor of Tillton, from whom descended Nicholas de Tilston in the 9th year of Edward III, whose grandson and heir, Roger Tilston, Esq; in the reign of Henry V, married Catharine, second daughter of Sir John Leigh of Baguley in Cheshire, Kent. His son and heir, Thomas Tilston, married the daughter and heiress of Hugh Heath of Huxley in the same county, whose second son, Richard, marrying Maud, daughter of Richard Bostock, had several sons, of whom the third, Ralph of Newport in Shropshire, had by his wife (daughter of William, second son of Sir Thomas Leighton, Kent. of Wattleborough in the same county) Thomas of Wookliff, his third son, in the parish of Carlton in Craven in Yorkshire, who changed the name from Tilston to Tillotson, and was great grandfather to our Archbishop (1).

[B] Mr David Clarkson.] The Oxford Antiquary files him a learned Nonconformist, says he was one of those who, with Dr John Owen and several others in 1682, undertook the continuation of Poole's English annotations on the Bible; but that he disowned the piece against Dr Stillingfleet, ascribed to him, entituled, No evidence of Diocesan Episcopacy, or any Bishops, without the choice and consent of the people, in the Primitive times, published in 1681, 4to; though he was the author of another, entituled, Primitive Episcopacy (2). According to Mr Baxter, he was a man of moderate healing principles (3). Upon resigning his fellowship, he put his pupils under the care of Mr Tillotson.

[C] He was no plodding student.] His method of study was not to note, or pick out by way of common place, or otherwise, passages out of the books he read; but only marked those that he meant to familiarize with a black lead pencil (4). He read Tully well, and not improbably Twisse's Vindiciæ Gratiæ, an author in great vogue at that time (5); yet it was not his principles which pleased our student, but his acuteness in disputation. This we have from Mr Beardmore, who observes, that he was a person of a very good wit, sharp and acute, pleasant in conversation, but with much decorum and gravity for his years (6).

[D] He was very careful of his pupils.] He was at these years a very good scholar, an acute logician and philosopher, a quick disputant, of a solid judgment, and no way unqualified, though so young, for the trust and charge of a tutor. He spoke Latin exceeding well, read lectures in Burgerdicius's (7) logic with great smartness and judgment, and, continues Mr Beardmore, when we went to take a new lecture, he examined us about the former, according to the author's and his own explanations: When he went to prayers in his chamber at night, he put us for some time at first upon construing or reading into Latin a chapter in the Greek testament, in which he was a very great critic, and afterwards he used to put some one or other promiscuously upon giving an account of the day's reading, and then required him to defend his author, which was always done in Latin. He sometimes had them to dispute or declaim before him in his chamber in the afternoons. We also, continues Mr Beardmore, went to him to prayers for the most part duly on Sunday nights, when he examined some or other of us about the sermons heard that day; this was done in English; for that was the only day when he spoke to us, and we gave him our account, in English. His prayers were, according to the use of those times, of that sort which are called conceived prayers, in which he had a very great facility; but always performed them with gravity and fervour, as he did also when it was his course to perform prayer in the chapel. In the week days, when he had done his prayer, as we were going out of his chamber, he usually recalled some one of us, and then would use those he called with a fair freedom, discourse them kindly, encourage them to studiousness, seriousness, and diligence; or tell them of any fault he either observed or heard of in them, and those that deserved it, he would reprove very sharply. The same Writer proceeds to observe as follows; he prayed much in secret in his bed-chamber, using his voice, but so as none could hear him, as I think, except myself, who kept just over him. He seemed to be much contrite in his devotions (8).

[E] A great frequenter of sermons.] He generally heard four sermons every Sunday, besides the weekly lecture at Trinity church on Wednesdays, which was preached by a combination of the worthiest and best preachers in the University, all of them fellows of colleges. At that time the prevailing men, being generally Contraremonstrants [Calvinists] used to preach much upon those subjects, especially Dr Hill (9). Him Mr Tillotson heard constantly on Sunday mornings at St Michael's church, and in the afternoons often at Trinity (10).

[F] The natural sweetness of his temper.] We should not have inserted this in the text upon the authority of Bishop Burnet's panegyric, had not we found it confirmed by Mr Beardmore. This more impartial and no less friendly writer to Tillotson's memory, having informed

(8) Beardmore, p. 382, 383.

(9) He was bred at Emanuel college, but then was Master of Trinity, in the room of Dr Comber, ejected by the parliament, before whom Hill was a frequent preacher. He died in 1653. Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 224.

(10) Beardmore, &c. p. 383, 384.

(1) Birch's Life of the Archbishop, p. 1. 2d Edit. 1753, from a manuscript, communicated by Mr John Tillotson, furmaster of St Paul's school, and great nephew of the Archbishop, being grandson of his brother Israel.

(2) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 747 and 873.

(3) Reliq. Baxteriana, Part 3. p. 97.

(4) Sir Isaac Newton used the same method.

(5) See an account of this Author in Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 80, 81, 82.

(6) Appendix to Tillotson's Life by Birch, p. 384.

(7) An author still read by tutors in that University.

still persevered in asserting the Presbyterian form of Church Government, as well as the Protector's Supremacy, continued steady in his allegiance to the covenant and the engagement, according to the oaths he had taken [G]; and being in great favour with that party, he was now called from the University to be Tutor to the son of Edmund Prideaux, Esq; of Ford-Abbey in Devonshire, Oliver's Attorney General, in whose family he likewise officiated as Chaplain, but without any ordination (l), agreeable to the principles of those times. As this employment brought him to London, he was there at the death of his Patron's Master, the Protector, in 1658; and about a week after, was present at a scene in Whitehall, which gave him a disgust to some leading Divines of his own persuasion (m). At the same time, he likewise fell into the acquaintance of some worthy Clergymen of another character, by which he was much improved (n). And soon after the Restoration, in 1669, he took the opportunity that offered of being episcopally ordained, without any oaths or subscriptions, by Dr Thomas Sidserf, Bishop of Galloway in Scotland [H], who was then in London, and where, by this practice, he gave great offence to the English Bishops. Notwithstanding this ordination, Mr Tillotson still adhered to the Presbyterians, and the same year was removed from his Fellowship [I] at Clare-Hall, by the Fellows of the College, at the instance of Dr Peter Gunning, who had been ejected by the Parliament, in 1643, to make way for Mr David Clarkson, Tutor and immediate Predecessor in that Fellowship to Mr Tillotson, who had given the profits to the College during all the time he was possessed of it. About this time, he made a visit to his friends in Yorkshire, and there preached his first sermon in the Church of Oswaldkirk, near Helmsley, which living was then held by his fellow pupil in the College, Mr John Denton [K]. In July 1661, he attended the Presbyterian

(l) This is plainly intimated by Dr Hicke's in Some Discourses, &c. p. 52, and not controverted by Burnet.

(n) Particularly Bishop Browning, who was then Preacher of the Temple; Dr Flacket, afterwards Bishop of Litchfield, of the Church of England; and of the other persuasion, Dr Bates, for whom he professed a great esteem, both on account of his learning and good temper. Beardmore, p. 493.

(m) See Dr. John Owen's Article in remark [D].

(11) Then fellow of Queen's college, afterwards minister of St Mary Woolnoth in Lombard-street, where he died June 12, 1650. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 802.

(12) Afterwards Rector of Loughborough in Leicestershire, and then Chaplain to the Princess of Orange before the Revolution, and after it Dean of St Asaph. He published Vol. I. of Dr Lightfoot's works, 1684, fo.

(13) Life of Tillotson, p. 6.

(14) afterwards Bishop of Dro-more in Ireland.

(15) Author of The Select Discourses.

(16) Memoirs, before, p. 385.

(17) Ibid. p. 387.

formed us how fond his tutor was of Dr Hill's [the Presbyterian's] preaching, intimates that he did not imitate those principles. Diverse young preachers, says he, came up in those times, who were of a freer temper and genius; such were Mr Samuel Jacomb (t. 1), Mr Bright of Emanuel-college (12), Mr Patrick, now Bishop of Ely, and others who went not that way. Mr Tillotson seemed to be an eclectic man, and not to bind himself by opinions. The same writer observes also, that his tutor did not appear to be hotly biased to the presbyterian government after he came under him. Dr Birch observes (13), that there was then a set of as extraordinary persons in the University as perhaps any age has produced; Dr Ralph Cudworth, Master of Christ's college; Dr Benjamin Wicbeck, Provost of King's; Dr Henry More, and Dr George Rust [14], Fellows of Christ's; Dr J. Worthington, Master of Jesus's; and Mr John Smith, Fellow of Queen's (15).

[G] The oaths which he had taken. This is collected from the following observation of Mr Beardmore: 'There was a kind of feud, says he, in the college betwixt the old and the new fellows; for it is well known what differences in opinion and affection the civil wars created in the nation; which extended to the Universities, and the particular colleges and societies therein, as well as to other places. The old fellows that then remained in the college had indeed so far dispensed with their judgments, as to have either taken the covenant, and after that the engagement as it was called, or otherwise to have complied so far with the prevalent powers of those times, as to have kept their fellowships; but yet still very likely in their inward thoughts and inclinations to lean to the ancient government both in church and state. I believe Mr Tillotson then, according to the prejudices of his education, might be something biased the other way, (though not very hotly after I came under him) and so was one of those who lay rather under the disgust of the senior fellows (16).'

[H] He was ordained by the Bishop of Galloway. This remarkable fact we owe to the ingenuity of Mr Beardmore, who assures us, that he had it from the Archbishop's own mouth (17); I mean that he was ordained by this Bishop in 1660, and the ordination passed without any oaths or subscriptions, as appears from the following remarks made by Dr Burnet upon the conduct of this Prelate at that time. 'Dr Thomas Sidserf, says he, the only Scots Bishop who was living at the Restoration, came up then to London, not doubting but that he should be advanced to the primacy of Scotland; though he failed of his expectations, having given offence to the English Bishops by his promiscuous ordinations when he first came to England. For, when the act of Uniformity required all men, who held any benefices there, to be episcopally ordained, he who, by observing the ill effects of the former violence of the Scots Bishops, was become very moderate with others of the Scots clergy, who gathered about him, ordained all those of the English clergy who came to him, without demanding either oaths or subscriptions of them (18).'

[I] He was ejected from his fellowship. This whole affair, so much bandied on both sides, seems to be cleared up by Mr Beardmore in the following account. He, Tillotson, was a probationer to a fellowship in 1651, which I think was by mandamus from the higher powers; yet he was not actually admitted into a fellowship of some considerable time, but lived at his own charge. At length, two fellowships being declared void, he was received into one of them; and one Mr Newce, who had also lived as probationer, was taken into the other. I have heard him say, continues Mr Beardmore, the society dealt not fairly with him about that matter. For when, after the Restoration in the year 1660, those fellows, who had been turned out upon account of their not taking the Covenant, came to be admitted into their fellowships, and, among the rest, the famous Dr Peter Gunning, he being then a man of interest and power, would needs have it, that the fellowship, into which Mr Tillotson had been admitted, was formerly his, though the latter told me he was sure it was not, but one that was fairly and legally void upon a fellow's leaving it by cession. But the aforesaid Dr Gunning, having some personal pique against Mr Tillotson (though at the same time he said he could scarcely tell wherein he had disobliged him); yet, I say, Dr Gunning so wrought with the society, as that they complied with his pretences, and so put Mr Tillotson out of his fellowship. This, I have heard him say, he had reason to take amiss from the society, as not having done him right, but dealing unkindly with him, who, if there had been nothing else in it, deserved to be esteemed a benefactor to the College. For instance, while he was Tutor to Prideaux's sons, he obtained, by the Attorney's means, 1000l. to be paid out of the Exchequer to the College for wood and stone prepared for carrying on its building (19). Moreover, while he resided at London, he fell into the acquaintance of an old gentleman, one Mr Diggons, who had formerly been fellow commoner of Clare-hall, and, being a very humourous person, had taken disgust against some of his own relations. In this temper he was prevailed upon to leave 300l. per annum to the College by Mr Tillotson, who also let the profits of his fellowship go to the College. As for Dr Gunning, he was very hot and earnest to put this disrespect upon him; for though he knew that he was to be chosen Master of Bennet college the very next day (20), and though Mr Tillotson's merits to the College were insisted on and pleaded by some at least of the society, yet he was so vehement in the business as to say, Let Justice be done first; and then, if they were minded to do Mr Tillotson a favour, they might do that afterwards (21).

[K] Mr Denton. This gentleman contracted a most intimate friendship at the College with Mr Tillotson, to whom he was then particularly serviceable during a dangerous sickness, attended for some time after with a very uncommon kind of intermittent delirium, and a constant

(18) Burnet's hist. of his own time, Vol. II. p. 132, 133, who says, he was supposed to do this merely for the fees for the Instrument of orders, for he was poor. Burnet elsewhere stiles him a very learned and good man, p. 26.

(19) This however was seized by the parliament party towards fortifying the castle at Cambridge.

(20) Upon the vacancy, by the death of Dr Love, of whom see some account in Archbishop Tenison's article.

(21) Beardmore's memorials, p. 386, 387.

(o) Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, Part I. p. 337. It was at this time that he advised Mr Beardmore, in his preaching, not to cry up the Liturgy and Ceremonies of the Church. Beardmore's memoirs, p. 399.

(q) His Sermon of the Advantages of an early piety on Ecclef. xii. 1. was preached at St Laurence Jewry 1662, as appears by the title-page.

(t) Le Neve, p. 223.

(u) From the books of that Society.

(w) In the first edition, of 1664, it makes sixty-four pages in 4to. and he afterwards enlarged it to the size we now see it in the front of his Works, in 1752. fol.

(22) Tillotson's life, by Anon. and Dr Birch.

(23) The inscription upon his tomb-stone in the church of Stonegrave.

(24) The preachers names were omitted in the first edition, but were inserted in the subsequent ones.

(25) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 966-968. This sermon is reprinted in the edition of Tillotson's works, Lond. 1752, in 3 vols folio.

(26) Beardmore's memoirs, p. 388. See what is said of this matter in Mr Calamy's article, rem. [L].

terian Commissioners as an Auditor, in the conference at the Savoy for the review of the Liturgy (o); and in September following, he supplied the turn of Dr Bates in preaching at the morning exercise at Cripplegate Church, London, undertaken by several eminent Presbyterian Divines in the city [L]. The same year he complied with the Act of Uniformity, and was appointed Curate to Dr Thomas Hacket, Vicar of Chessunt in Hertfordshire, where he distinguished himself by his persuasive eloquence (p), and as the short distance of that place from London allowed him opportunities of visiting his friends in the city, he was frequently invited into the pulpits there (q); and being presently taken notice of for his excellent talent at preaching, he was elected Minister of St Mary Aldermanbury by the Parishioners on the 10th of December, 1662; but declined it, because the vacancy had been made by the refusal of Mr Edmund Calamy [M] to comply with the Act (r). However, being presented in June the following year to the Rectory of Ketton, or Kedington in Suffolk, worth 200 l. per ann.; he accepted it, though vacated by the ejection of another nonconforming Minister (s), in pursuance of the same Act of Uniformity. He had been possessed of this living but a short time, when happening to be in London, he performed the duty of the stated Tuesday's Lecture at St Laurence Jewry (t). That Sermon procured him the place of Preacher to the Society of Lincoln's-Inn [N], into which he was elected on the 20th of November, 1663; having the appointment of a chamber, and a salary of 100 l. per ann. payable by equal portions at the end of every term, with commons for himself and a servant in term-time, besides 24 l. allowed him for vacation commons (u). This remove bringing him back among his friends, he made no hesitation in preferring it to his Living in Suffolk, where he was not at all liked [O]. He therefore now willingly resigned it, having engaged himself to reside constantly at Lincoln's-Inn. Soon after his settlement in this conspicuous station, he was desired to appear in the pulpit before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, at St Paul's, where, in March 1663-4, he preached his famous Sermon against atheism and infidelity, which at their request was afterwards published with great additions (w), under the title of The Wisdom of being religious [P]. A little before this, viz. on the 23d of February preceding, he had married Mrs Elizabeth French, Oliver Cromwell's niece, and now daughter-in-law to Dr John Wilkins, Rector of St Laurence Jewry (x), where Mr Tillotson was elected Tuesday-Lecturer the following year. About this time, the constant correspondence was kept up between them (22). Mr Denton was ejected from this living in 1662; but he afterwards conformed, and, being reordained, was collated to Stonegrave, within two miles of Oswaldkirk, and also to a Prebend in the church of York, which he held till his death (23).

[L] The exercise at Cripplegate by several presbyterian Divines. The chief promoter of this exercise was Samuel Aneley or Aneley, then Pastor of that church, and LL. D. which degree he took on account of his then holding the rich living of Cliffe in Kent (a peculiar, with a jurisdiction belonging to the Incumbent). His contemporaries looked upon the conferring of this degree upon him as a scandalous thing. Nay, says Mr Wood, some of the grave fellows there, particularly Dr Barlow, have said it diverse times in my hearing, that, if the said Samuel Aneley could have told the meaning or definition of the word Pandectæ, he should have freely had their votes for that degree. On the 26th of July the same year, 1648, he preached before the House of Commons, persuading them to do justice upon the King, and not to treat with him any more, yet highly extolled and affirmed the obligation of the Covenant. He afterwards took the Engagement, and was appointed one of the commissioners for the approbation and admission of ministers by the act of March 14, 1659: and after the Restoration he refused to conform. Among other things he published, The Morning Exercise at Cripplegate, or several Cases of Conscience practically resolved by sundry Ministers, Lond. 1661, 4to. The first sermon is his; and the tenth, entitled, Wherein lies that exact righteousness that is required between man and man, was preached by Mr Tillotson (24), then a Nonconformist (25).

[M] On the refusal of Mr Edmund Calamy to comply with the act. Mr Beardmore gives us the following curious anecdote relating to Mr Calamy's refusal. Mr Tillotson, says he, in the year 1661, told me, that the good old man [Mr Calamy] deliberated about it some considerable time, professing to see the great inconvenience of the presbyterian parity of ministers. And said, if Mr Calamy had accepted of the Bishoprick of Litchfield, which was offered him, Dr Bates had been Dean, and Mr Miles and himself were designed for two of the Canons. But, as he added also, though Mr Calamy was in a manner induced to a willingness to have embraced the King's offer, yet Mrs Calamy, being against it, over-ruled her husband, and so the matter went off (26).

[N] This sermon procured him the preacher's place at Lincoln's-Inn. Mr Atkyns, afterwards Lord chief Baron of the Exchequer, then Bencher of that Inn, being present at this sermon, was so pleased with it, that, going to him in the vestry, he offered him his interest for the place at Lincoln's-Inn, which would be soon vacant. The offer being accepted by the preacher, he was accordingly elected upon the salary above mentioned, which had been allowed to his predecessor (27). Five Masters of the Bench were appointed to acquaint him with his election, and to inform him of the duty expected from him, that he should preach twice every Lord's day in term-time, and next before and after term, and in reading time, and in every Lord's day in the vacation, and as other occasions should require, and administer the sacrament of the Lord's supper together with the Chaplain of the house every term and vacation, and reside constantly in the Society, not absenting himself thence without the leave of the Masters of the Bench in Council (28).

[O] Where he was not at all liked. It seems the people there, being generally infected with the Solifidian and Antinomian doctrines, prevalent in that age, had been deliciously fed by their former Pastor with those favours expressions of reclimbing and resting and rolling upon Christ. Thus pampered, they took great offence at his successor's more rational discourses from the pulpit. This being soon discovered by the preacher, he communicated to his patron his design of quitting them upon that account. Sir Thomas, with great civility, endeavoured to persuade him that he was mistaken in his suspicion: but his lady, more open, being desired to speak her mind, acknowledged ingenuously, that neither herself nor even Sir Thomas, however he might affect to disguise his sentiments, were at all of a different opinion from the rest of the parish, who universally complained, that Jesus Christ had not been preached amongst them (29) since Mr Tillotson had been settled there (30).

[P] The wisdom of being religious. Upon this occasion he incurred the just reproach of having more zeal than knowledge. In the dedication he calls Mr Hobbes a dabbler in mathematics, a censure which was neither just in itself, nor at all becoming the character of the censurer, who was no competent judge of what he here asserted, and it was very imprudent in him as a Divine, since it might be easily foreseen, that this single slip might be sufficient to defeat, if any thing could defeat, all the good intentions of this discourse, excellent as it is, in the front of which it appeared. Mr Hobbes, as was well known, had been the King's Preceptor in Mathematics, and was confessedly an able Mathematician, as well as Dr Wilkins: though both fell into notorious paralogisms in some parts of that science.

(p) He prevailed with an old Oliverian soldier, who preached among the Anabaptists in that town in a red coat, and was much followed, to desist from that, and betake himself to some other employment. His Life by Anon. p. 7, 9. (r) Kennet's Register and Chronicle, p. 343. (s) Mr Samuel Fairclough, of whom there is some account in Clarke's Lives of eminent men, p. 153.

(x) They were married by Dr Wilkins. See Regist. of that Church.

(27) Mr Thomas Greenfield, a remarkable Loyalist. See his sermon on Wednesday, June 12, 1661; before the House of Commons.

(28) Birch, p. 26 from the book of that society.

(29) He seems to allude to this in his sermon against Evil-speaking. I fore see, says he, what will be, because I have heard it often said in the like case, that there is not a word of Jesus Christ in all this.

(30) Bateley's edition of Sorner's antiquities of Canterbury, Part III. p. 12.

sincerity of his affection for the legal establishment of the Church began to be suspected by some of his old friends and admirers [2]. However, this Lecture suited so particularly with his talents, and was so agreeable to his humour, that he presently became the most popular Preacher of that time, and his manner was observed to be so uncommonly prevalent and persuasive, that we are told his Lectures were attended by a great concourse of persons of quality and distinction, and likewise of the Clergy, who came thither to form their minds (1). But Mr Tillotson's labours were not confined to the pulpit alone; his early zeal against Popery engaged him in a controversy with the Author of Sure Footing, &c. against which he wrote his Rule of Faith, and published it in 1668, 8vo. [R]. At the same time, he was one of the first encouragers of that laborious Work, the Synopsis Criticorum, &c. (2), undertaken this year by Mr Matthew Pool, an ejected nonconformist Minister, who joined in the controversy against the Papists (aa). This year, 1666, likewise Mr Tillotson proceeded D. D. (bb): and in January the next year, entered into the design of forming a comprehension with the Dissenters, then proposed by Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and countenanced by Judge Hales (cc), Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and though the scheme then plainly appeared to be against the general bent of the nation [S], yet our Doctor kept it still upon his mind, and even continued to push it till his death, whenever he thought the times were favourable (dd). On the 15th of November, 1668, he preached the Sermon at the Consecration of his father-in-law, Dr Wilkins, to the Bishopric of Chester (ee). This discourse gave general satisfaction, and the Preacher's merit began now to be taken notice of at Court. So that in the following year, the King made him one of his Chaplains, and gave him a Prebend in the Cathedral of Canterbury, into which he was admitted March 14, 1669 (ff); but quitted it in Octob. 1672, when he was advanced to the Deanery of that Church by his Majesty (gg), notwithstanding he had a little before this intimated his apprehensions of the King's tendency to the Romish Religion [T], and preached that noted Sermon at Whitehall in the beginning of the year, upon the hazard of being saved in that Church [U]. In 1674, he joined in a second attempt to bring about his much desired accommodation with the Nonconformists; but having yielded to many articles that were disapproved by the Bishops, he was again disappointed therein [W]: However, this year, by the interest of Dr John Sharp, with Lord Chancellor Finch, (y) Le Neve, p. 224. and Funerall Sermon by Burnet, p. 20.

(z) His name is subscribed to the Proposals for that Work. See also the Prefatio, p. vi, vii.

(cc) See his article.

(dd) This will appear in the course of the present Memoir.

(gg) In the room of Dr Turner, deceased. His friends on this occasion were Archbishop Sheldon, the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Berkeley. Beardmore, p. 393. In the interim, he was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society, Jan. 25, 1671, having been by his own request proposed as a candidate by Dr Ward, Bishop of Salisbury, whose successor at St Laurence Jewry was Dr Wilkins, one of the chief ornaments of the R. S.

[2] He began to be suspected by some of his old friends.] Mr Beardmore, having given Dr Wilkins his just character, proceeds thus (31); 'I remember that, about May, 1655, being at Coventry, I went to wait upon Bishop Hacket, as he was returning from London to Litchfield, who spoke much to the commendation of Mr Tillotson as to his learning and preaching, and particularly praised his sermon, then newly printed, called, The wisdom of being religious, as the best thing that ever he saw against Atheism in the compass of a sermon. But, says he, he is now fallen in with Dr Wilkins, and is become a presbyterian, and an enemy of the church of England. or to that purpose; and, says he, he never came to see me all this time I have been at London; whereas formerly I have conversed with him with great familiarity. I did, continues Mr Beardmore, by letter acquaint him of the importance of the Bishop's complaint of him, who returned to me, that the opinion which I myself had expressed of Dr Wilkins's worth was true and just; that the Bishop's fears of himself being become a presbyterian were causeless and groundless; for that he had long before fixed his principles about church-government, and was in no likelihood of altering them; and that it was by reason of his much business that he had not waited on his Lordship when in town.'

[R] His rule of faith.] In return to this, Mr Serjeant (whose true name was Smith) published A letter of thanks from the author of sure footing to his answerer, Mr J. T. (32), and this was seconded the following year by Faith vindicated from the possibility of falsehood; or The immovable certainty and firmness of the motives to the Christian religion asserted against that tenet, which, denying infallibility of authority, subverts its foundation, and renders it uncertain (33). In this piece he attacked a passage in p. 31 of Dr Tillotson's sermon on the wisdom of being religious. The Doctor replied to his exceptions to that, and to his Rule of Faith, in the preface to the first volume of his sermons, printed in 167, 8vo. To this there came out a Rejoinder the following year, entitled Reason against Raillery, or a full answer to Dr Tillotson's preface against J. Serjeant.

[S] Plainly appeared to be against the general bent of the nation.] Dr Stillingfleet and Mr Hezekiah Burton also joined in this project, which was to bring in as many as they could to the communion of the church, and procure a toleration for the rest; Dr Bates, Dr Manton, and Mr Baxter, being called on the side of the presbyterians. The scheme consisted chiefly of those things which the King had promised in his declaration from Breda in 1660. But the great point of reordination being given up, it was proposed, that those who had presbyterian ordination should be received to serve in the church by an imposition of hands, accompanied with words importing, that the person so ordained should be received to serve as a minister in the church of England (34). When this treaty came to be publicly known, it was universally condemned, inasmuch that when a bill, drawn up by Lord chief Baron Hale, was to be presented to the parliament, a resolution passed against admitting any bill of that nature (35). This is the plain fact, stripped of the colouring given to it by Bishop Burnet from his zealous attachment to this scheme, and under that caution the following remark of his upon it in another place is to be read. "But this treaty, says he, becoming the subject of common discourse, a clamour was raised, especially by the friends of the Earl of Clarendon, disgraced in August, 1667, and now in banishment, that the church was undermined and betrayed (36)."

[T] His apprehensions of the King's inclination to popery.] Upon his Majesty's proclamation for liberty of conscience, March 15, 1671, the Bishops in general, and my Lord of London in particular, charged the clergy to preach against popery. The King complaining to Archbishop Sheldon of this, as done on purpose to inflame the people, and alienate them from himself and his government, that prelate called together some of the clergy to consider what he should say to his Majesty, if he pressed him any further on that head; when Dr Tillotson, who was one of these, suggested this answer, that, since his Majesty professed the protestant religion, it would be a thing without precedent that he should forbid his clergy to preach in defence of a religion which they believed, while he declared himself of it. But there was no occasion for this or any other answer, his Majesty never renewing the motion (37).

[U] A sermon on the hazard of salvation in the church of Rome.] This, they say, says Mr Beardmore, so nettled the duke of York, who was present, having to this time concealed himself, and, being a Papist in masquerade, frequented the King's chapel, that he forsook it afterwards, and never more appeared there (38).

[W] He was again disappointed.] This attempt was in conjunction with the same persons as the former, Tillotson and Stillingfleet declaring they had encouragement of several Lords both spiritual and temporal. They were at first met by Mr Baxter alone, with whom having considered and canvassed various draughts, one was at length fixed on in which they agreed, and, being communicated to the other Nonconformists, was satisfactory

(aa) See his article.
(bb) Le Neve, as before.

(cc) See his article.

(ff) In the room of Dr Gubning. Le Neve's Fasti, p. 10, 14.

(31) In his memoirs, p. 391.

(32) According to the title printed at Paris, but really at London.

(33) This too was printed at London, though said, in the title-page, at Louvain.

(34) Calamy's abridgment of Mr Baxter's list of his life and times, p. 317-322, 2d edition.

(35) Burnet's life of Sir Matthew Hale, p. 42, 43.

(36) Burnet's history of his own time, Vol. I. p. 259.

(37) Id. p. 269. N. B. The King, on the address of the House of Commons, recalled that declaration.

(38) Beardmore's memoirs, p. 392.

(bb) Newcourt, Vol. I. p. 147, 192.

(kk) Le Neve, p. 224. He succeeded Dr Sancroft, then advanced to the See of Canterbury.

(mm) See Lord Chancellor Talbot's article.

Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, the Dean was presented, December 18, 1675, to the Prebend of Ealdland, in the Church of St Paul's (bb); and the same year, he published Dr Wilkins's Principles of Natural Religion (ii), with a recommendatory Preface. The year 1617 was lucky to him, in presenting the opportunity he had of shewing a particular regard for the Prince and Princess of Orange at Canterbury, in their way to Holland, after their marriage [X]. On the 14th of February the same year, 1667-8, resigning his Prebend of Ealdland, aforementioned, he obtained that of Oxgate, together with a Residentiaryship of the same Church (kk). In 1678, the Dean published Dr Barrow's Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy, in pursuance of the Author's dying request to him (ll). The same year he lost his brother, Joshua Tillotson, who died on the 16th of September, of a vomiting of blood [Y]. But this month was more remarkably distinguished by the discovery of the problematical Popish Plot, and the Parliament meeting on the 21st of October, a few days after the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, the Dean was appointed to preach before the Commons on the 5th of November following. As from the whole tenor of his Sermons and other writings, his thoughts appear to be continually agitated with the apprehensions of Popery, so this appointment furnished him with the fittest occasion that could be of opening all his mind upon that subject, and he even excelled himself therein [Z]. Yet this excellence was presently tarnished, by his Sermon preached on the 3d of December following, at the Yorkshire feast, when the high tide of his zeal for a comprehension, drove him foul against that rock upon which he had so often run before, to the no small damage of his reputation [AA]. This damage seems however to be sufficiently repaired, by the great share he had in bringing the Earl of Shrewsbury to the Church of England (mm), in 1679 (n). But the heat of his zeal against Popery, betrayed him into such an excess, as laid him open to the censures of all parties [BB]; and upon the death of Wilmot,

(ii) See Dr Wilkins's article.

(ll) To this he annexed the Doctor's treatise concerning the unity of the Church.

(nn) This year Dr Burnet submitted the MS. of his History of the Reformation to the Dean's perusal and correction, whose reputation was judged by the Author would be of great service in recommending his Work to the public. Preface to that History.

satisfactory to them; but, the Bishops refusing their consent to many particulars in it, the treaty was soon at an end. Mr Baxter sent to Dr Tillotson to know whether he might have leave to speak of it, in order to the promoting concord, and to signify how far they were agreed, that their names might be some advantage to the work. Upon which the Doctor returned him an answer, April 11, 1675, informing him, that he had taken the first opportunity to speak to the Bishop of Sarum [Dr Seth Ward] who promised to keep the matter private, and only to acquaint the Bishop of Chester [Dr Pearson] with it, in order to a meeting. But, upon some general discourse, he plainly perceived several things could not be obtained. That however the Bishop of Sarum had promised to appoint a time of meeting; and that he had not heard from his Lordship since. For his own part he was unwilling that his name should be used in this matter; not but that he did most heartily desire an accommodation, and should always endeavour it; but that he was sure it would be a prejudice to him, and signify nothing to the effecting of the thing, which, as circumstances were, could not pass in either house without the concurrence of a considerable part of the Bishops, and the countenance of his Majesty, which, for the present, he saw little reason to expect (39).

(39) Calamy's abridgment, &c. p. 343.

(40) In the Appendix, p. 11, of his History of England.

[X] He made his court to the Prince and Princess of Orange. Notwithstanding Mr Eachard's account (40) of this incident has been shewn, by Dr Birch, liable, in some circumstances, to exception; yet that writer does not controvert the fact of their Highnesses calling at Canterbury, where the Dean supplied them with some necessaries, and invited them to lodge at the Deanery; which is sufficient to support our assertion.

(41) Life of Tillotson, p. 51, 52.

[Y] He lost his brother Joshua. This brother was an oilman in London [41], and, being frequently visited by the Dean, happened to be there, when Mr Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York, coming in upon business with the brother, that incident gave rise to the acquaintance and friendship that ever after subsisted between the two Archbishops (42). Mr Joshua Tillotson (43) left a small provision for his son, who was taken care of by the Archbishop during his life, and afterwards Mrs Tillotson sent him to Clare-hall, where she supported him till he became Fellow; and, during the course of his education, was honoured with the favour of Lord Somers, out of regard to his uncle's memory, which was acknowledged by him in a Latin letter still extant. Upon entering into orders he was presented to the Sinicure of Elme, of considerable value, in the isle of Ely, by the Executors of the Archbishop, to whose disposal that option was left (44). Upon this preferment he resigned his Fellowship; but, continuing unmarried, lived in lodgings at Cambridge, where I knew him sometime between the years 1722 and 1728.

(42) See Archbishop Sharp's article.

(43) The Dean was much affected with his death, and wrote, on the occasion, a consolatory letter to his Father, who was still living at Sowerby in Yorkshire.

(44) Archbishop Sharp's article, p. 343.

[Z] He excelled himself therein. The following passage is so extremely beautiful, and besides so perfectly characteristic of him, that I cannot forbear laying it before the Reader. 'I can truly say, as the Roman Orator did of himself upon another occasion, me natura misericordem, patria tenerum, crudelium nec patria nec natura esse voluit; my nature inclines me to be tender and compassionate: a hearty zeal for our religion, and concernment for the public welfare of my country, may perhaps have made me a little severe; but neither my natural disposition, nor the genius of the protestant, that is, the true Christian, religion, will allow me to be cruel.'

[AA] His sermon at the Yorkshire feast hurt his reputation. The obnoxious passage is as follows: 'It is not for private persons to undertake in matters of public concernment: but I think we have no cause to doubt but the governors of our church, notwithstanding all the advantages of authority, and we think of reason too, on our side, are persons of that piety and prudence, that, for peace sake, and in order to a firm union among Protestants, they would be content, if that would do the business, not to insist upon little things, but to yield them up, whether to the infirmity or importunity, or perhaps, in some things, to the plausible exceptions of those who differ from us.' Mr Beardmore, having cited this passage, tells us, a Doctor that he was in company with expressed himself very much dissatisfied with it, saying, what had he to do, being but a private Doctor, to undertake this without the consent of his superiors; a censure which is left without any particular answer by this friend (45).

(45) In his memoirs, p. 402, 403.

[BB] A sermon which laid him open to the censures of all parties. It was intitled, The Protestant religion vindicated from the charge of singularity and novelty; where he has these words: 'I cannot think, till I be better informed, which I am always ready to be, that any pretence of conscience warrants any man, that is not extraordinarily commissioned, as the Apostles and first Publishers of the Gospel were, and cannot justify that commission by miracles as they did, to affront the established religion of a nation, though it be false, and openly to draw men off from the profession of it, in contempt of the magistrate and the law. All that persons of a different religion can in such a case reasonably pretend to, is to enjoy the private liberty and exercise of their own conscience and religion, for which they ought to be very thankful, and to forbear the open making of profelytes to their own religion (though they be never so sure that they are in the right) till they have either an extraordinary commission from God to that purpose, or the providence of God make way for it by the permission of the magistrate.' Dr Hickes observes (46), that a witty Lord, standing at the King's elbow when this was delivered, said, Sir, Sir, do you hear Mr Hobbes in the pulpit? which is confirmed by Dr Calamy, who tells a long story of the Dean's being catechized by Mr Howe so severely as to draw tears from him, and a confession of his mistake (47). Dr Hickes further says, that not only Dr Gunning, then Bishop of Ely, complained of this sermon in the House of Lords, as containing a doctrine that would serve the cause of Popery, but

(46) In some discourses, &c. p. 48. and Mr Leslie tells us this witty Lord was the Earl of D— Charge of Socinianism against Tillotson considered, p. 13.

(47) Memoirs of the Life of John Howe, p. 75 who had been Chaplain to Cromwell, when Protector.

Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, attended with a signal repentance the following year, the Dean made a remark in favour of the opinion, espoused afterwards by Mr Bayle, that idolatry is worse than atheism [CC]. In the mean time, he appeared warmly this year on the side of the Bill of Exclusion against the Duke of York, and employed his interest with Lord Halifax to divert him from opposing it (mm). He likewise refused to sign the address of the Clergy of London to his Majesty, upon his declaration that he could not consent to such a bill (*); before the end of the year, he censured the Bishops for opposing the two bills, then in agitation, for an indulgence and union with the Dissenters [DD]. In the summer of 1681, he lost the younger of his two daughters (nn); and in 1682, he wrote an admirable letter to the Lady Henrietta, daughter to the Lord Berkeley, on her yielding to a criminal conversation with Ford Lord Grey of Werke, who had married her sister (oo). This year he also published Dr Wilkins's Sermons, with a Preface, which shews how capable he was of being carried to excesses upon some occasions [EE]. In 1683, he published Dr Barrow's Sermons, in three volumes folio, with a criticism upon them, under the title of an Advertisement (pp) [FF]; and the same year he preached the Funeral Sermon of Dr Benjamin Whicohocot, successor to Dr Wilkins in the Vicarage of St Laurence Jewry, in which church the Dean still held the Tuesday's Lecture. This proved a melancholy year for the Dean, by the discovery of the Rye-house and Fanatic Plot, wherein some of his intimate friends were engaged, especially the Lord John Russell, for whom he appeared as a witness at his trial, and attended him after his condemnation. During this attendance, he was greatly abused by a misrepresentation of that Lord, given to him by Dr Burnet, which occasioned the writing of his much canvassed letter in vindication of the principle of non-

(mm) Burnet's Hist. of his own time, Vol. I. p. 199.

(nn) Her name was Elizabeth; she had not been married. Birch's Life of the Archbishop, p. 88. Edit. 1752.

(oo) See the trial of Lord Grey in State Trials. This incident gave birth to a spurious Collection of Letters pretended to have passed between her and her gallant.

(*) The declaration was made Jan. 4. 1680-1, in answer to the address of the House of Commons. Life of the Archbishop by Anan. p. 17. Edit. 1717. fol.

(pp) This task had employed the Dean for several years, and cost him as much pains as would have produced many more of his own. The Sermons chiefly commended by him, are those upon the vices of the tongue, and the two against pragmatism.

(48) There was also this passage in the sermon: Religion is the band of human society, and God so necessary to the welfare and happiness of mankind, as he could not have been more, &c. which he altered thus: Religion is the band &c. and so necessary &c. that it could not have been more, &c.

(49) It is in the 9th Sermon, and in that Volume.

(50) Tillotson's Eccl. p. 71.

(51) The same remark, in almost the same words, is inserted into the account of Lord Rochester's death by Burnet, p. 117. edit. 1724.

but cites an extract of a letter from Dr Patrick to Dr Samuel Parker, then Archdeacon of Canterbury, full of the sharpest animadversions upon it. But Dr Calamy's story does not agree with what the Dean wrote to Mr Nelson on this occasion on the 27th of July the same year, that these animadversions did not seem to him very considerable: 'However, I am sorry, continues 'he, that any thing of mine should occasion so much 'talk and noise.' Accordingly he republished the sermon the same year, without taking notice of a new edition in the title-page, in which, after the word permission, he added, or connivance of the Magistrate (48). All the subsequent separate editions passed without any more alterations: but in the third volume of his sermons (49), in 1686, 8vo, he added a paragraph of near a page, after the words permission or connivance of the magistrate, beginning thus; not but that every man hath a right, &c. and ending with the word sufferings.

[CC] Idolatry is worse than Atheism. Among some other reflections entered into his common-place book on this occasion, Dr Birch has given (50) us the following: 'Atheism and Infidelity do not bind up the senses 'of men strongly enough, but they may be awakened 'by the apprehensions of death, or some great calamity 'coming upon them. A false religion, if a man be 'sincere in it, will bear up a man's spirits against torments and death, because every man's conscience is a 'kind of God to him. And the strongest opiates in 'this world are Enthusiasm and Popery. These may 'lock up men's senses against the power of truth to 'awaken them, as we see in the murderers of our late 'Sovereign, and in our present Romish conspirators.' These remarks are dated October 1: and in a letter to Mr Nelson, wrote August 1st preceding, the Dean expresses himself on the same occasion thus: 'I am sorry 'that an example, which might have been of so much 'use and advantage to the world, is soon taken from us. 'But God had pity on him, and would not venture him 'again in such circumstances of temptation as were 'perhaps too hard for human frailty (51). This diving into the secrets of God's moral government (so far as is signified in these last words) above what he has given us to know, is not peculiar to Dr Tillotson. It is a faculty which we see too frequently assumed by God's spiritual ministers. Though it would be hard to prove any except a prescriptive right, obtained by immemorial custom, that they have to it.

[DD] He censures the Bishops. It is in a letter to Mr Nelson, then at Paris, dated March 7, 1680-1, where he acquaints that friend, that 'there was little 'progress made the last parliament towards a reconciliation of Dissenters. Two bills were brought into the 'House of Commons for that purpose: the one called 'a bill of Indulgence, to mitigate the severity of the 'laws towards those who would not come into the 'national constitution; the other of Union, by which 'the new subscriptions were to be taken away, and the 'ceremonies left indifferent. I never saw the bills, 'but this was the substance of them, which, so far as 'I can learn, pleased neither side. The Bishops thought 'this too much, and the Dissenters too little. I have 'no great hopes of any good issue of this matter, till 'the minds of men become more calm (52).'

[EE] A preface which shews him capable of being carried to excesses. In defending the Bishop against a character given of him in the Historia & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. he avoids mentioning any author. 'This, he says, he was 'not curious to know.' And indeed Mr Wood was as obnoxious to him as Bishop Fell, or any others concerned in that book, being hearty against his comprehension project, and besides under the displeasure of Dr Burnet, who had dignified him with the title of a Scribbler, and one that had no reputation to lose (53). However, Dr Birch has ventured to fix the drawing of this character of Dr Wilkins upon Bishop Fell (54), proper notice of which has been already taken in the course of this work (55). But we have an undeniable authority, that this was not any of the insertions complained of by Mr Wood, from his remark under Dr Wilkins's article in the Athen. Oxon. where, having given that Bishop a very high character, he concludes thus: 'To pass by 'the character given of him in discourse by the great 'men of the church, Archbishop Sheldon, Bishop Fell, 'and Archbishop Dolben, who did malign him for his 'wavering and unconstant mind in religion, which I 'know will be displeasing to many (56), &c.' This being wrote after Dean Tillotson's censure, now in question, it is much more than probable, that the Historian would in this place have taken notice of any alteration in the article mentioned in his former book, had he entertained the least suspicion of it. On the contrary, we find he was not without some suspicion of Tillotson's having altered the Athen. Oxon. and expressly charges him with revising his manuscript without his privity or consent (57). After all, great allowances ought to be made for an Author's life, written to be prefixed to his works, which is therefore very excusable in this now before us, and the more so on account of the relation between them. But this made it more necessary, upon the plan of our work, impartially to set the fact as far as might be in its true light. Neither does Archbishop Tillotson's character stand in need of being set off by a foil made at the expence of Bishop Fell, which will unluckily prompt a remark in his favour, that, not long before the publication of this preface, he had preached his celebrated sermon before the House of Commons (58), wherein he warmly and smartly exposes Tillotson's comprehension scheme, and where, at the same time, he shewed himself such a perfect master in the gift of rebuking with authority, as naturally leads to a reflection upon Tillotson's remarkable defect in that most useful talent of a Preacher.

[FF] He published Dr Barrow's sermons. It was suggested, that great part of the Dean's excellence as a preacher was owing to his use of the works of this friend. But this reflection is inconsistent with the chronology of their lives. Dr Tillotson was eminent in his profession in the year 1663, and had given the public the first volume of his sermons in 1671. In which year appeared the first and only sermon published by Dr Barrow.

(52) Birch, p. 81, 82. See Bishop Burnet's Hist. of his own time, Vol. I.

(53) Burnet's letter to the Lord Bishop of Coventry, &c. p. 9.

(54) His life of Tillotson, p. 95.

(55) In Mr Locke's article.

(56) Athen Oxon. Vol. II. col. 516.

(57) See his plea, put into the Chancellor's court at Oxford, in 1695.

(58) On the Fast, Dec. 22, 1680, and printed immediately by order of that house.

(99) See the article of Lord Russell, and the General Hist. of England, and Samuel Johnson's article.

(ss) He published also a Discourse upon the same subject, written by Mr Henry Pendlebury. The Dean had published in 1666, The Nullity of the Romish Faith, in 8vo. and A Dialogue between a Popish Priest and an English Protestant, in 1667. 8vo.

(xv) His Life, in 1717, p. 9.

(xx) The Letter is too long to be inserted, but is well worth reading in Birch, p. 126. — 129.

(yy) In this Sermon he applied to that crisis of the public affairs this line of Virgil, Nunc animis opus, Æneæ, nunc pectore firmo.

(zz) Particularly the Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards Duke of Bucks, and Dr Crew, Bishop of Durham, who had both incurred the law by acting in the Ecclesiastical Commission of King James II. Burnet's Hist. of his own time, p. 138. Vol. I. fol. Edit.

(ddd) On the 24th of May. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year.

(eee) It was rejected in the House of Lords, where the votes were equal. Burnet's Hist. of his own time, Vol. II. p. 10, 11.

(ggg) Nichols's Apparatus ad Defensionem Ecclesie Anglic. p. 93.

(bbb) Burnet's Preface to his Essay toward a new book of homilies printed with his sermons on several occasions, in 1713. 8vo.

resistance and passive obedience (99). All successful plots are observed to strengthen the hands of the Crown, and invigorate those measures in the Administration, which it is their aim to overset; so after the defeat of this plot, that was conducted by the protestant party, the Papists, as was natural, triumphed more boldly, and grew more daring than before. By this means our Dean being ill at ease in town, purchased a house at Edmonton (rr), whither he retired about this time; and as the Papists became the prevailing power in the succeeding reign, he kept his residence still in this country-house till the Revolution. However, all the time he continued his preaching, both at Lincoln's-Inn, and St Laurence, with his usual freedom, or rather with more zeal and fervency against Popery. His Discourse on Transubstantiation (ss), printed towards the end of King Charles the Second's Life, begun the debate with that doctrine, and led the way into the controversy with the Papists, which was kept up as long as King James II. kept his seat on the Throne; and in 1685, the Dean shewed himself warmly in the cause of the French Refugees [GG], who had fled into England on the repeal of the Edict of Nantes. In the latter end of this year, he gave great offence to the famous William Penn, the Quaker, by confirming the reflection that was then thrown upon him, of being a Jesuit; but being afterwards convinced that his suspicions were groundless, he asked that Gentleman's pardon, and at his request gave him all the satisfaction that he required, in justice to his character (tt). In 1687, the Dean lost his eldest daughter, and last surviving of his children (uu), and not long after, was himself seized with an apoplectic fit, which, however, went off at this time without any fatal consequences (vv). Under these impressions, he wrote a consolatory letter to a friend, then ill of an incurable cancer (x). In the season next year, 1688, he went to Tunbridge wells for the re-establishment of his health, where he had the honour of conversing frequently with the Princess Ann of Denmark, and having preached before her against Popery (y), on the 2d of September, he went immediately to Canterbury, whence he wrote two letters to Lady Russell, declaring his opinion, that the nation was more inclined to his darling scheme of a comprehension, than it had been. Upon the Revolution, his share was one of the most distinguished in the national good fortune. As soon as the Prince of Orange had settled himself at St James's, the Dean was desired to preach before him, on Sunday January the 6th, being Twelfth Day, and upon the thanksgiving day on the 31st of that month, in a Sermon at Lincoln's-Inn, he laboured to prove that deliverance to be wrought by an immediate divine agency. His situation, with respect to the Court, was so much improved, that he became a successful Intercessor on this change for others (zz), who had occasion for his kindness, and he was so zealous a friend to King William, that he prevailed with the Princess Ann, much against her inclination, to resign her eventual claim to the Crown upon her sister's death (aaa); though he must needs be sensible, that it was likely in the issue to prove, as it actually did, more than a single injury to that Princess. On the 27th of March, 1689, he was appointed Clerk of the Closet to his Majesty (bbb), and easily obtained the Deanery of St Paul's from the King; who then communicated to him his intention to promote him to the See of Canterbury, if Dr Sancroft, as he seemed determined, should incur a sentence of deprivation (ccc). This the Dean took pains to avoid, as being very disagreeable to his temper. Notwithstanding the Act of Toleration passed this year (ddd), yet that not satisfying the Dissenters, their friends made another attempt for a comprehension, which was laid before the Parliament, under the title of A bill for uniting all Protestant Dissenters. But the Dean observing the unlikelihood of succeeding in the design that way (eee), persuaded the King to take another method, which was to lay it before the Convocation, to be passed there (fff). In pursuance of this advice, a Commission was issued out by the King, on the 13th of September, to ten Bishops, and twenty Divines, among whom was our Dean. They opened their Commission at the Jerusalem-chamber, on the 10th of October following; but so greatly was this affair disliked, that some of these Commissioners declined to assist at their meetings, and upon the assembling of the Convocation on the 21st of the next month, when those members of the lower house who were friends to the Dean's design, put him up for the place of Prolocutor, he was rejected by a majority of two to one in favour of Dr Jane, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, who, upon his presentation to the upper house, in order to shew their fixt resolution to oppose it, concluded his speech by way of triumph with those famous words, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari; and to make this scheme for carrying that design the more odious, it was branded with the title of a new Ecclesiastical Commission (ggg). Notwithstanding this spirit against any alteration at all, yet on the miscarriage of his new design, the Dean formed another, of a new book of homilies, to be added to that already established. About the same time their Majesties having published proclamations against profane swearing, sabbath-breaking, lewdness and drunkenness; the Dean desired Bishop Burnet to draw, for an essay, homilies on those subjects, promising to take a large share of the rest of the work on himself (bbb). On the 7th of March this year, he preached before the Queen at Whitehall his remarkable Sermon against the absolute eternity of hell torments, which being published soon after, helped to render him more unpopular to the Clergy than before (iii). In 1690, being appointed to preach on several public oc-

(rr) Beardmore's Memoirs, p. 412. In this retirement he published the Sermons of Dr Hezekiah Burton, in 1684.

(tt) See Penn's article, remark [T].

(uu) She was wife to James Chadwick, Esq, a Nottinghamshire gentleman, in which county he had an estate of about 300 l. per ann. She left him two sons and a daughter. Birch, p. 125.

(aaa) Dutches of Marlborough's Conduct, p. 22, 23, 24.

(bbb) Birch, p. 139.

(ccc) In August this year, the Dean had been appointed by the Chapter of his Cathedral to exercise the archiepiscopal jurisdiction of that province, upon the suspension of Dr Sancroft. Id. p. 143.

(fff) The thought of laying it first before the convocation was probably taken from Archbishop Sancroft, who in his scheme for a comprehension, had proposed that method. Wake's Speech at Dr Sacheverel's trial, March 17, 1709-10.

(iii) He espoused the opinion of Episcopius, in his Institutiones Theolog. p. 67. Edit. Amsterd. 1650. folio. The point is thoroughly discussed by Dr Edmund Law, in the notes upon his translation of Archbishop King's Latin Discourse concerning the origin of evil.

[GG] He promoted the charity to the French refugees.] King James having granted briefs for collecting this charity, Dr Beveridge, then a Prebendary of Canterbury, objected to the reading of one of them, as contrary to the Rubric. For which he was rebuked by the Dean in this short reprimand; Doctor, Doctor, Charity is above Rubrics (59).

(59) Birch, p. 121, 122.

casions before the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor, and the Queen, he performed each in a strain intirely devoted to the Court, and the See of Canterbury becoming vacant, by the deprivation of Archbishop Sancroft on the first of February (kkk) the last year, though he still endeavoured to avoid that dignity, notwithstanding the King's repeated importunities for his acceptance of it then, and for several months after (lll); yet he yielded at length, about the month of October, having obtained a promise from his Majesty to provide for his wife if she should happen to survive him, which promise in a few days was likewise confirmed to him by the Queen (mmm): who having received a MS. tract from Dr Frederic Spanbeim, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, tending to promote the comprehension, put it into the Dean's hands, to whom the Professor had likewise sent a Latin letter on the same subject; in his answer to which, the Dean dissuades this foreigner from intermeddling with the disputes in England, and charges the Dissenters, as well as the Churchmen, with too much stiffness upon that point. This letter is dated February 6, 1690-1 (nnn); and upon the King's return from Flanders in April following, the Dean was nominated to the Archbishopric on the 23d of that month. The Conge d'elire was made out on the 1st of May, and he was elected on the 10th, confirmed on the 28th, and consecrated at Bow-Church on the 31st. He was sworn of the Privy-Council on the 4th of June, and on the 11th of July had a restitution of the temporalities belonging to his See. The Queen likewise granted him all the profits of it from the Michaelmas preceding, amounting to upwards of 2500l. (ooo). However, he continued at the Deanery-house of St Paul's, till he had built a large apartment for his wife at Lambeth; he also repaired the whole palace, altered the windows and lights of the Archbishop's lodgings, wainscotted several rooms, and made other improvements, which being finished, he removed thither on the 26th of November, 1691 (ppp). Upon this promotion, he experienced the truth of what he constantly apprehended, and indeed might easily be foreseen in the then present temper of the nation, some very severe censures that were thrown out against him (qqq) in print. But, when the King, who was much interested in his reputation, ordered some of the publishers and dispersers of the papers to be apprehended, he used all his power to stop the prosecution (rrr) [HH]: and the year was not expired, when he began to write down for his own use, such reflections as the several occurrences of his new station suggested to him. In the beginning of the next year, 1692, the Archbishop having drawn up a circular letter for his Province, in the prosecution of his project for a comprehension, communicated it on the 11th of April to eight Bishops, who unanimously approved the design (sss). The same month, he was found to be excluded the offer of pardon in King James the Second's declaration (ttt), sent over to England previously to his successful attempt to recover the throne. The same year he had the satisfaction of seeing how highly pleasing his favourite scheme of an union with the Dissenters at home was to the Protestants abroad (uuu). October 27 this year, he preached a thanksgiving Sermon before their Majesties, in which the ardor of his devotion for the King, laid the Preacher open to the severe lashes of his enemies [II]; whose heat, on the other hand, betrayed them into some unwarranted aspersions upon his conduct, with regard to the Episcopal Church of Scotland [KK]. In 1693, he revised and published four Sermons

[HH] He endeavoured to stop the prosecution; viz. on his own account: but this having given some uneasiness to the Lady Russel, at whose instance this prosecution was begun in defence of her Lord's memory, his Grace wrote to her Ladyship as follows: 'I intreat you to give my very humble service to my Lord of Bedford, and to let his Lordship know how far I have been concerned in this affair. I had notice first from Mr Attorney-Generall and Mr Solicitor, and then from my Lord —, that several persons, upon the account of publishing and dispersing several libels against me, were secured in order for prosecution: upon which I went to wait upon them severally, and earnestly desired of them that no body might be punished on my account; that this was not the first time I had experience of this kind of malice, which, how unpleasant soever to me, I thought it the wisest way to neglect, and the best to forgive it. None of them said any thing to me of my Lord Russel, nor did it ever enter into my thoughts to hinder any prosecution on his account, &c. (60).' One of these pamphlets was a letter, first sent to the Archbishop's Lady for him, and also a copy to the Countess of Derby for the Queen, and then published in print. In this his Grace's letter to Lord John Russel was reprinted, with several animadversions, suggesting his insincerity, or his apostacy, as it is there called, from what he had formerly preached and written (61); and to the same purpose, soon after his promotion, while a gentleman was with him who came to pay his compliments upon it, a packet was brought in, sealed, and directed to his Grace, upon opening of which there appeared a mask inclosed, but nothing written. The Archbishop, without any signs of emotion, threw it carelessly among his papers on the table; and, on the gentleman's expressing great surprize and indignation at the affront, his Grace only smiled, and said, that this was a gentle rebuke, if compared with some others that lay there in black and white, pointing to the papers on the table (62). We have another story to the same effect, told by Dr Sherlock, that, after the Archbishop's death, there was found in his study a bundle of papers, on which was written by his Grace; These are libels; pray God forgive them; I do (63). We must not however from hence infer, that he sat so tamely under these abuses as to make no kind of reprisals. On the contrary we are assured, that, in a sermon which is lost, he took occasion to complain of the usage he had received from the Nonjuring party, and to expose in return the inconsistency of their own conduct, remarking particularly, that, upon a just comparison of their principle of non-resistance with their actual non-assistance to King James II, they had little reason to boast of their loyalty to him (64).

[II] A sermon which laid him open to the lash of his enemies. In this sermon, taking notice of Lewis XIV's unprincipally manner of insulting over King William, when he believed him to have been slain at the Boyne, he adds, that no mortal man ever had his shoulder so kindly kissed by a cannon bullet. A piece of false eloquence, which, though not usual in his Grace's writing, was severely handled by Dr Hickee (65), and rallied by Dr South as a peculiar strain of rhetoric (66).

[KK] His conduct with regard to the episcopal church of Scotland. In a letter from Mr Robert Pearse, Vice-principal of Edmund-hall in Oxford, dated January 11, 1715, and printed in the life of our Archbishop in 1717 (67). We are told, that there was found in the study of Mr Creech of All-Souls College, when his books were sold by auction at Oxford, the following memorandum: That whatever steps were taken, and all that was done for the abolishing of Episcopacy and subversion of the Church of Scotland, was done by the contrivance, advice, and approbation of Dr Tillotson.

This

(kkk) Le Neve, Vol. 1. p. 212.

(lll) Several Letters of his to Lady Russel, with her answers, printed in Birch's account of his life, from p. 205 to p. 211. and from p. 222 to p. 229; and a remarkable one of this Lady to the Dean is inserted in Lord Russel's article, in this work.

(nnn) First printed in Birch's account, &c. p. 234 to 236.

(ooo) Beardmore says, he discharged a considerable debt of his predecessor's. Memoirs, p. 396.

(ppp) Birch, p. 240, 241, 242.

(qqq) Mr Beardmore observes, that he heard some say, upon the first talk of the Dean's advancement to Canterbury, Actum est de Ecclesia Anglicana. Mem. p. 403.

(sss) His Letter to Bishop Burnet printed by Birch, p. 266, 267.

(ttt) This declaration is said to be drawn up by Sir James Montgomery, Author of a very severe pamphlet against the Government, intitled, Great Britain's just Complaint, printed in 1692.

(62) Communicated by the late Dr Johnson, Chancellor of Ely.

(63) Sherlock's sermon at the Temple, Dec. 30, 1694.

(64) Birch, p. 350, 351.

(65) Some discourses, p. 58.
(66) South's sermons, Vol. III. p. 570, edit. 1698.

(67) in p. 52, 53.

(mmn) His Letter to Lady Russel, dated Octob. 25, 1690, in Birch's account, p. 225 & seq. The widow of an Archbishop of Canterbury would now, as the Dean observes, be an odd figure in England, there being only two instances of it, and those so long ago as the time of his predecessors, Cranmer and Parker.

(rrr) Before the expiration of the year, he joined with the Queen in engaging Bishop Burnet to write his pastoral care, and at the same time concurred with that Prelate in a design of bringing a bill into Parliament for restraining pluralities. See Humphrey Prideaux's article.

(uuu) Limborch's Dedication to his Grace of his History of the Inquisition, published in the latter end of this year, 1692.

(60) See the whole letter in Birch, p. 242, 250.

(61) It was reprinted in Kettlewell's life, p. 233, et seqq. the Editor of which adjudges it to one of his friends; and the Editor of Lord Somers's pamphlets has prefixed to it the name of Charles Wood Lawton, Esq;

mons preached many years before, on the Divinity and Incarnation of Christ [LL], with a view of clearing himself from the charge of Socinianism, which he managed so impolitically, as served to aggravate the charge [MM]. This undeserved malice of his opposers, joined to the defection of his friends, who now began to look more coolly upon him than before, made so deep an impression upon the sensibility of his temper, as sunk him into a degree of melancholy [NN]. In 1694, he published six Sermons upon the advantage of an early piety; and towards the end of June this year, he drew up a prayer of intercession for Lady Ruffel, then afflicted with the loss of her eye-sight, wherein the execution of Lord Ruffel is signified to be unjust (www). After this, he assembled another meeting of several of the Bishops at Lambeth, who concurred with him in many regulations concerning the Church. These he at first designed to enforce by his own authority in conjunction with those Bishops; but upon more mature consideration, he thought it better, upon the suggestion of Dr Burnet, they should appear under that of their Majesties in the form of royal injunctions, to which purpose he made a draught then in a letter intended to be signed by their Majesties, and communicated them to the Bishops Stillingfleet and Burnet for their correction and approbation (xxx). This being done in the King's absence, he laid them before the Queen, by whom the execution was deferred to the King's return from Flanders (yyy). In the interim, he revised and altered in several places, Bishop Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, which had been undertaken by that Prelate, at the request of the Queen, with the concurrence of the Archbishop (zzz), who in a letter, dated October 23, to the Author on this occasion, declared himself unsatisfied with the account given therein of Athanasius's Creed, and wished it might be expunged out of the Liturgy (aaaa). He did not long survive the writing of this letter, for on Sunday the 18th of November following, he was seized the second time with an apoplectic disorder, in the Chapel at Whitehall. The fit coming on slowly, he bore it so well as not to interrupt the service; but it seemed to be fatal, and soon turned to a dead palsy, which deprived him, in a great measure, of the use of his speech; but his understanding was still clear (bbbb): he continued serene and calm, and in broken words said to this effect, that he thanked God he was quiet within, and had nothing then to do but to wait the will of Heaven (ccc). The two last nights of his illness, he was attended by his friend, Mr Robert Nelson, in whose arms he

(www) The words are, whom thy holy and righteous Providence permitted under a colour of law and justice, to be unjustly cut off the land of the living. Birch found a copy in short-hand in the Archbishop's common-place book.

(zzz) See the Preface to that book.

(bbbb) Burnet in his Funeral Sermon, p. 331.

(ccc) Idem, in Hist. of his own time, Vol. II. p. 134. folio Edition.

(xxx) Gen. Hist. of England.

(yyy) Which not being till the 9th of Novemb. a total stop was put to them by the death of the Archbishop not many days after. (aaaa) His words are, The account given of Athanasius's Creed seems to me in no wise satisfactory; I wish we were well rid of it. Birch, p. 325.

This I had from Johnson, who was certain of it, and knew the whole matter when I was in the North. In answer to this Dr Birch observes, that, as the Episcopal party, after the Revolution, still continued to adhere to King James, it was not possible for King William to preserve Episcopacy, which was abolished by an act of the Scots parliament on July 22, 1689 (68), but so as that the Episcopalians should submit to the Presbyterian form of church-government then [in 1693] established, viz. by Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and a General Assembly: and after this, though it appears that his Grace was sometimes consulted with regard to the terms of a comprehension between the Episcopal and Presbyterian ministers, yet he endeavoured to moderate the terms insisted on by the latter (69). In reality there seems to be no more in this charge, but that he used no means either to preserve or restore Episcopacy, to which the King in this affair shewed no inclination. And this is all that ought to be understood by the memorandum here cited. For it has been already observed (70), that the Author of this censure, Mr Johnson, was a most inveterate enemy to the Archbishop, whose friendship to him was at the same time equally inextinguishable.

[LL] His sermons on the Incarnation and Divinity of Christ. He sent a copy (one of the first) from the press to Mr Firmin (71), who published an answer to them, and gave it himself to his Grace (72), who, having read it over, said to him, My Lord of Sarum shall humble you. Mr John Williams wrote a rejoinder (73) to Mr Firmin's piece, and to it is subjoined a letter to the Author from Dr Burnet, Bishop of Sarum, in which he speaks with great contempt and severity of the late pieces published in England in defence of the Unitarian principles.

[MM] He increased the load of that charge. This may be seen in a piece already cited (74), entitled, The charge of Socinianism against Dr Tillotson considered, &c. Edinburgh, 1695, 4to, which the Author declares to be written before the Archbishop's death. But it is worth while to see what Mr Fortin says of this and other aspersions of the Archbishop on this account. 'Tillotson, says that smart Writer, published these sermons on the Divinity of Christ, to vindicate himself from the charge of Socinianism, that is, from an accusation entirely groundless. I have been told that Crellius, a Socinian, (and a descendant from the more celebrated Crellius) who used, when he came over hither, to visit the Archbishop and converse with him, justified him on this head, and declared, that Tillotson had often disputed with him in a friendly way upon the subject of the Trinity, and that he was the best reasoner, and had the most to say for himself, of any adversary he had ever encountered.

But then Tillotson had made some concessions concerning the Socinians, which never were nor ever will be forgiven him (75), and hath broken an ancient and fundamental rule of theological controversy, allow not an adversary to have either common sense or common honesty (76).

[NN] He grew melancholy. In a letter to Lady Ruffel, dated October 19, 1693, he writes thus: 'The King's return is now only hindered by contrary winds; pray God to send him safe to us, and to direct him what to do when he is come. I was never so much at my wit's end concerning the public. God only can bring us out of the labyrinth we are in, and I trust he will. Never, since I knew the world, had I so much reason to value my friends. In the condition I now am, I can have no new ones; or, if I could, I can have no assurance that they are so. I could not at a distance believe the upper end of the world was so hollow as I find it. I except a very few, of whom I can believe no ill, till I plainly see it (77).' Agreeably to this Bishop Burnet tells us, that, as his Grace did not enter into any close correspondence, or the concerting measures with the ministry, but lived much abstracted from them, they likewise (as well as the clergy) endeavoured to depress him all they could. This made a considerable impression upon him, and he grew very uneasy in his great post (78). We find this dejection still increased; for, in the preface to his sermons upon the advantage of an early piety, published the next year, 1694, he expresses his hope that he should be released for the remainder of his life from the irksome and unpleasant task of controversy and wrangling about religion, and his resolution of turning his thoughts to something more agreeable to his temper, being sensible how fast the infirmities of age were coming upon him. I knew very well, continues he, before I entered upon this great and weighty charge, my own manifold defects, and how unequal my best abilities were to the due discharge of it. But I did not feel this so sensibly as I now do every day more and more.

(75) viz. in this passage, beginning, And yet to do right to the writers on that side—and ending, they want a good cause, which if they had, they have reason, and wit, and temper enough to defend it.

(76) Birch, in Appendix, No. 111. p. 426, 427.

(77) Id. p. 289.

(78) Burnet's hist. of his own time, Vol. II. p. 118.

(68) Kennet's hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 555, 572, 575; and Burnet's history of his own time, Vol. II. p. 23.

(69) Birch, p. 280 to 286, from an original letter and other papers of his Grace in short-hand.

(70) In Samuel Johnson's article

(71) A noted Socinian. But Bishop Burnet tells us, that his principles were really those of Arius. Hist. of his own time, Vol. II. p. 211.

(72) It is entitled, Considerations on the explications of the doctrine of the Trinity, 1694.

(73) Entitled, A Vindication of Archbishop Tillotson's four sermons, and the Bishop of Worcester's sermon on the mysteries of the Christian Faith, 4to, 1695, according to the Printer's era. (74) in note (33).

expired on the fifth day of it, Thursday November 22, 1694 (dddd), in the sixty-fifth year of his age (eeee). His death was universally lamented, and his funeral was attended by a numerous train of coaches, filled with persons of rank and condition, who assisted at that solemnity from Lambeth to the Church of St Laurence Jewry, where his corpse was interred on the 30th of that month, and a neat monument, with his bust, afterwards erected to his memory by his widow [OO]. His Funeral Sermon was preached by Bishop Burnet, in the course whereof he was interrupted by a short flow of sighs and tears, which, we are told, forced their way, as was visible to the audience, who accompanied it with a general groan. The Sermon, however, being published soon after, was animadverted on by Dr Hicke, which being answered by the Bishop, a rejoinder was soon after wrote by the Doctor, but never printed. In reality, Archbishop Tillotson's character may be trusted to posterity upon the facts related of him, and the testimony of his own writings, both private and public. His charity and generosity, with the expence of coming into the See, and the repairs and improvements of his palace, had so exhausted his fortune, that if his first fruits had not been forgiven, his debts could not have been paid. He left nothing to his family but the copy of his Posthumous Sermons, which was afterwards sold for twenty-five hundred guineas. The King therefore, according to his promise, granted to his widow on the 2d of May, 1695, an annuity of 400 l. for her life, which, upon some unforeseen losses suffered by her afterwards, he augmented with another annuity on the 8th of August, 1698, of 200 l. more (†). They were both continued till her death, on the 20th of January, 1701-2; and his Majesty was so solicitous for the regular payment of her pension, without any deduction, that he always called for the money quarterly, and sent it to her himself (ffff). Such are the testimonies given of his respect to the memory of our Archbishop by that Prince, who attributed his safety on the throne, in a great measure, to this most loyal subject; and he has been thought of such importance to the nation, and so great an honour to it, that his character is become deservedly the subject of General History, to which, added to the display of it in his Funeral Sermon by Bishop Burnet, we refer the reader. But we must not conclude without giving him a sketch of the Archbishop's person, as follows: His countenance was fair and very amiable, his face round, his eyes vivid, and his air and aspect quick and ingenuous, his hair brown and bushy: he was moderately tall; very slender and thin in his youth; his constitution tender and frail to outward appearance. He became corpulent, when grown in age, which encreased more and more as long as he lived, but yet was neither a burden to himself, nor in the least unseemly to others. This is the picture of his person, as drawn by his Pupil Mr Beardmore (gggg), who very appositely to that connexion, has set his Tutor's character in the most affecting light, by proposing the pattern of his temper and life to his own imitation, as that which, next to that of his Saviour and his blessed Apostles, he hoped would most sensibly affect him. 'Let me, says he, imitate his great wisdom, his blameless and unspotted life; his humility, his meekness, his sweetness of temper, his obligingness, and readiness to do good, his excellent preaching so far as I am able; his constancy to good principles, his moderation and candour; his looseness from the love of the world and earthly riches; his unwearied diligence in preaching, and that from such principles, by such rules, and to such ends, as he did (hhhh).' At the same time, this most affectionately grateful Pupil did not believe his Tutor to be absolutely perfect; on the contrary, he expressly intimates, that he had his faults and blemishes. The Readers therefore may justly expect our mentioning some, at least, of these. The blemish which stands foremost in the Archbishop's frame, was his obstinate attachment to the comprehension. In labouring which, though others were equally, and perhaps Bishop Burnet more concerned, yet the odium of that exploded project, is generally thrown upon him. Indeed the excess of his complaisance for the Presbyterians (iiii), apparently had its root in his education among them, whence his natural tenderness sucked in an inbred fellow-feeling of all their complaints. Add to this what has been before observed, that he had a very extraordinary talent at conceived, or extempore prayers, which must needs strengthen his inclination to their way of worship; however it had this good effect, that after his own conversion, he converted more Dissenters, whether Presbyterians, Independents, or Anabaptists, to the established Church, than any other Divine of his time, besides his preserving others, especially non-conforming Ministers, from being troublesome to the Church, bringing them to some temper and moderation: for the rest, he was sensible of their perverseness, and has frequently rebuked their hypocrisy, and confuted their peculiar tenets. The same prejudice of education gave him an antipathy to Popery, which coming upon the tenderness of his nature, rendered him too apt to be affrighted with any shadow of that Doctrine; whence he was sometimes betrayed even into ridiculous censures that way [PP]. This seems to be the greatest blemish in his Sermons (kkkk); the stile of which has (eeee) He was born in the latter end of Sept. or beginning of Octob. 1630, and consequently was near two months above sixty-four at his death. This must be observed in reading the words Ætatis sue LXIIII. upon his monument, which are not to be understood in the sixty-fourth year of his age, but aged sixty-four, a sense that we see frequently (tho' certainly very inaccurately) used, in monumental inscriptions.

(ffff) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 345, 346. Edit. 1753.

(gggg) Memoirs, as before, p. 412.

(hhhh) Ibid. 414.

(iiii) Mr Beardmore suggests it as his opinion, that the Archbishop had strained a little with the farthest toward gaining them into the Church. Mem. p. 408.

[OO] A monument in the church of St Laurence, Jewry.]

The town of Halifax likewise, out of regard to a man, who did so much honour to their parish, put up this inscription in letters of gold in the church there: JOHANNES TILLOTSON, Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis, natus Sowerbiæ, renatus Hallifaxiæ tertio Octobris, 1630, denatus Lambethiæ 22 Novembris A. D. 1694, ætatis 65 (79).

VOL. VI. No. 330.

[PP] Betrayed into ridiculous censures that way.] One of these is mentioned by Mr Jortin. It is a passage in the 140th sermon, Vol. III. of his works, where he has these words: 'I know not what some men may find in themselves; but I must freely acknowledge, that I could never yet attain to that bold and hardy degree of faith, as to believe any thing for this reason, because it was impossible.—So that I am very far from being (ddd) A: Ave in the afternoon. Birch, p. 345. from Wharton's MS. Collections.

(†) See Mr Nelson's Article, Rem. [H], and Dr Will. Sherlock's Article, Rem. [P].

(hhhh) It is far from our intention to dispute the reasonableness in those times of preaching against Popery, or to detract from the real merit of the many excellently useful Animadversions upon it in these Sermons. One of which deserves particular notice; it is in that discourse on the 5th of Nov. 1678, where he observes, that those remarkable letters of Sir Everard Digby (mentioned in Remark [E] of that Conspirator's Article) were then in his hands. And they were subjoined to a new edition of the history of that Plot, published by Bishop Barlow in 1697, 8vo. with a Preface to them, ascribed to his Grace in his Life by Dr Birch, p. 379.

(79) We see here this word ætatis taken in the true grammatical sense, viz. the 65th year of his age.

(mmmm) It was this meekness of his temper that threw him into the hands of Bishop Burnet, a connexion which served to encrease the number and animosity of his enemies.

(nnnn) Dr Tenison.

(80) Sir Thomas's words are, Methinks there be not impossibilities enough in religion for an active faith. I can answer, all the objections of Satan and my rebellious reason with that odd resolution of Tertullian, Certum est quia impossibile est.

(81) Birch, in Appendix, No. III. p. 432.

(a) J. Foxe's Acts and Monuments, Edit. 1610, Vol. II. p. 981. and Edward Halle, in Henry VIII. fol. 227.

(c) J. Foxe, as above, and Edw. Halle.

(e) Canonicus Secundæ Classis. Vide Wood. Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. II. p. 249. & Ath. Vol. I. col. 42. where he questions this fact.

(b) Enechiridion Militis Christiani.

(1) Ibid. of the English Translations of the Bible, 8vo, p. 73.

been selected as a pattern to our politest Writers (llll.) And as a Preacher, he is universally allowed to carry the first prize. In which character it has been well observed, that his most distinguishing excellence lay in teaching so, as at once both to enable and incline men to teach themselves. And in this he followed the natural complexion of his temper, which was sweetly gentle and tender; but on that very account, not so well adapted for public business (mmmm), as the more hardy constitution, the Socratism [22] and Stoicism, of his Successors (nnnn), who for this reason, is said to have been more agreeable to King William (oooo).

' being of his mind, that wanted not only difficulties, but even impossibilities, in the Christian religion, to exercise his faith upon.' The person, says Mr Jortin, whom Tillotson had in view, was the Author of Religio Medici. But by impossibilities Sir Thomas Brown, as well as Tertullian, meant seeming not real impossibilities (80), and what he says should be looked on as a verbum ardens, a rhetorical flourish, and a trial of skill with Tertullian. Our Critic proceeds to cite Sir Thomas Brown's words, and then makes this candid and just remark: 'Tillotson, judging that the Papists would make an ill use of this, and such passages as this in Protestant writers, was willing to pass a gentle animadversion upon it.' Afterwards, to evince the propriety of that animadversion, it is observed, that Sir Kenelm Digby, a Roman catholic, who criticises several things in the Religio Medici, yet gives his loud approbation to these pious fallies: I am extremely pleased with him when he saith, there are not impossibilities enough in religion for an active faith, &c. Extremely pleased, continues our Critic, without question, and full of hopes, that this young Author might at last unreason himself into implicit belief, and go over to a church which would feed his hungry faith with a sufficient quantity of impossibilities.

Tendimus in Latium.

Among many things which may be mentioned in favour of Tillotson this should not be forgotten, that, of those who have passed their judgments upon him, there never was a son of absurdity that did not dislike, or a sensible Reader who did not approve, his writings (81).

[22] Socratism he wanted.] If a person, says the last mentioned writer, were to offer himself a candidate for honest reputation, what could he wish and hope more than to share Tillotson's fate, and to find the same Censurers and the same Defenders? Yet it has been said of this great and good man, that his spirits were in some degree broken, and his health impaired, by the insolence and calumnies of petulant adversaries. If it be true, it is a melancholy instance of human infirmity; and a proof that a little Stoicism and Socratism is a desirable possession. To forgive enemies, though difficult to many, was easy to him, assisted as he was by good-nature and by religion; but to despise their attacks, was a task rather too hard for his gentle temper and sensibility; so that in this respect, and under these disadvantages, he was not a match for men who could neither blush nor feel. 'A man's good name, says he (82), is a tender thing, and a wound there sinks deep into the spirit even of a wife and good man; and the more innocent any one is in this kind, the more sensible he is of this hard usage; because he never treats others so, nor is he conscious to himself that he hath deserved it.' Every thing, continues this ingenious author, they say, hath two handles. When Socrates was under sentence of death, Xantippe took on bitterly, and, refusing comfort, cried, 'O my husband, what grieves me most is, that these wicked Judges should treat an Innocent man thus, and condemn thee unjustly and for nothing at all.' 'Wife, said he, why should that grieve thee? Hadst thou rather then that they had condemned me justly (83)?' P (lll) A Critic upon them is collected from several Authors by Dr Birch, p. 335 to p. 343. (oooo) Gen. Hist. of England compared with Tillotson's Life by Birch, p. 345.

(82) In Vol. II. Sermon XLII.

(83) Birch, p. 432.

TINDALE, or TYNDALE [WILLIAM], otherwise surnamed Hitchins, the first Publisher of the Holy Scriptures in English, was born about the borders of Wales (a); in what county is not mentioned; but the family seems to have sprung from Robert Tindall, of Tanfover in the county of Northampton, who was living the 16th of Edward I. and descended from Adam de Tindale, Baron of Langley in South-Tindale in Northumberland (b). He was brought up from a child in grammar, logic, and philosophy in Oxford, particularly for the most part in St Mary Magdalen's-Hall [A]; where having imbibed the doctrine of Luther, he privately instructed in it some of the junior Fellows of Magdalen-College, and other Scholars. His behaviour, at the same time, was such, as made him be looked upon as a man of a most virtuous disposition, and unspotted life (c). So that, on account of his merit (d), he was admitted a Canon of the College newly founded by Cardinal Wolfey (e), now better known by the name of Christ's-Church. But, for espousing too openly Luther's opinions, being obliged to quit it [B], he retired to Cambridge, where he diligently applied himself to the study of the Holy Scriptures, and Divinity, and took a degree (f): having taken his degrees before at Oxford [C]. After a convenient stay at Cambridge, he went and lived, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire, with Sir John Welch, Knt. who had a good respect and esteem for him; and was Tutor to Sir John's children (g). Moreover, to be as useful as possible, and to plant true Christianity in that neighbourhood, he frequently preached in and about Bristol. And, in order to give the Knight and his Lady good impressions of Religion, and to confirm them in the truth, he put into their hands Erasmus's Manual of a Christian Soldier (h), translated by him into English. The resort of many Abbots, and dignified Clergymen, at Sir John's plentiful table, gave our Author an opportunity to

(b) Mr Jekyll's Genealogies MS.

(d) Ob egregias ingenii dotes. Cl. Tanneri Bibliotheca, sub voce Hitchins.

(f) Tanner, ubi supra.

(g) Ibid. and Foxe, as above.

[A] For the most part in St Mary Magdalen's-Hall.] His picture is preserved in the Library of this Hall, with the following inscription, ————— 'Resert hæc Tabella (quod solum potuit ars) Gulielmi Tindal effigiem, hujus olim Aulæ alumni simul & ornamenti, qui post felices purioris Theologiæ primitias hic depositas, Antwerpiz in Novo Testamento, nec non Pentateucho in vernaculam transferendo operam navavit, Anglis suis eo usque salutiferam, ut inde non immerito Angliæ Apostolus audierat. Wilfordiæ prope Bruxellas martyrio coronatus an. 1536. Vir, si vel adversario (Procuratori nempe Imperatoris generali) credamus, perdoctus, pius, & bonus.' Mr Lewis tells us, that the picture is but ill done (1).

[B] But for espousing too openly Luther's opinions, being obliged to quit it.] So Bishop Tanner informs us, in these words: 'Postquam autem compertum fuisset Gu-lielimum Lutherani dogmatis fautorem esse strenuum, collegio ejectus est.' i. e. But when it came to be known that he was a strenuous favorer and encourager of Luther's doctrine, he was expelled the college.— And to the same purpose says A. Wood:—'Verum Lutheri dogmata sequutus, inde amotus est (2).'

[C] Having taken his degrees before at Oxford.] So I infer from these words of J. Foxe (3). 'Thus he in the University of Oxford increasing more and more in learning, and proceeding in Degrees of the Schooles— But A. Wood says, 'Whether he took a Degree, either by the name of Tyndale or Hitchins, it doth not appear in the Registers' (4) of the University. . . . However this is no evidence to the contrary: For his name might have been omitted through negligence, or design.

(2) Tanner, ubi supra. A. Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Lib. II. p. 249.

(3) p. 981.

(4) Ath. as above.

converse,

converse, and often to dispute, with them upon the most important points of Religion; and he appealed to the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and establish his opinions [D]; a method not much then practised among the rigid Catholics. His frequent victories over them [E], caused them to look upon him with an evil eye, revile him, count him no better than a heretic [F], and endeavour to have him punished as such. Accordingly, they preferred articles against him to the Chancellor of the Diocese, before whom he appeared, and was severely reprimanded and threatened, but no further proceeded against, at present. However, observing that he could no longer stay in the country with any quiet and comfort, and that his Patron, Sir John Welch, could not protect him without bringing himself into great dangers and difficulties, they mutually parted by common consent (i). Mr Tindale thereupon came to London, and preached for some time in the Church of St Dunstan's in the West. At length, having conceived a great opinion of Dr Cuthbert Tonstall, promoted to the Bishopric of London in 1522; on account of the great commendations given him by the much admired Erasmus, he imagined that he would be a happy man, if he could but be admitted into his service, as one of his Chaplains. For that purpose, he applied to Sir Henry Guildesford [G], Master of the Horse, and Controller, to King Henry VIII. who was a great Patron of learned men, a particular friend to Erasmus, and an acquaintance of Sir John Welch's: And he presented to him an Oration of Isocrates, which he had translated from the Greek; an undoubted proof of our Author's being uncommonly learned, since Greek at that time was a language understood by very few here in England. Sir Henry readily complying with Mr Tindale's request, not only recommended him to the Bishop of London, but advised him to write an Epistle to his Lordship, and carry it himself. This he did, and delivered the Epistle to an old acquaintance of his, a servant of the Bishop. But the Bishop's answer was, 'That his house was full; he had more than he could well provide for; and therefore advised our Author to seek out in London, where, he said, he could not well miss of employment (k).' Not being able to obtain any, he was supported by Mr Humfrey Monmouth, Alderman of London [H], a favourer of Luther's opinions; who took him into his house for half a year, where he behaved in the most sober and temperate manner (l), studying night and day. His thoughts were then bent upon translating the New Testament into English, as the only means to root out Popery, and establish the true Doctrine of Jesus Christ [I]. But being

(i) J. Foxe, as above, p. 981, 982.

(k) Foxe, p. 982.

(l) Eating only boiled meat, drinking small-beer, and wearing no linnen. J. Foxe, p. 909.

[D] And he appealed to the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and establish his opinions. As he was learned, and well acquainted with the Old and New Testament, he scrupled not to shew unto them simply and plainly his judgment in most points, as he thought: and when they at any time varied from him in opinion and judgment, he would lay plainly before them the open and manifest places of the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and confirm his sayings. And thus they continued for a while, reasoning and contending together, till at length his opponents grew weary, and not being able to answer or convince him, bore a secret grudge in their hearts against him (5). He complains, in his Prologue to the first book of Moses, of their ill usage towards him; testifying that he suffered much in that country by a sort of unlearned Priests: being full rude and ignorant (sayth he) God knoweth; which have seen no more Latin than that only which they read in their Portesses and Missals, which yet many of them can scarcely read.

[E] His frequent victories over them. In one of his Disputes, he pressed his antagonist so hard, that the latter burst out in these words: 'We were better to be without God's Laws than the Pope's.' But Tindale zealously and warmly replied, 'I defy the Pope and all his Laws: adding, that if God spared him life, e'er many years, he would cause a boy that driveth the plough to know more of the Scripture, than he [his antagonist] did (6).'

[F] Count him no better than a heretic. He was so much superior, and too strong for them in all Disputes, that they called him a heretic in Sophistry, a heretic in Logic, a heretic in Divinity. And told him, that he mightily depended upon the Gentlemen in that country; but, notwithstanding, he should shortly be otherwise dealt withal. He replied, that he was contented they should bring him to any country in all England, giving him Ten pounds a year to live with, and binding him to no more than to teach children and preach (7).

[G] Sir Henry Guildesford. This noble person was an acquaintance of the celebrated Erasmus, and his great favourite, as appears from several letters of Erasmus to him. He was descended from a very ancient family, famous for considerable services to the public. In his younger years he went into Spain, and engaged himself in the service of Ferdinand and Isabella in their wars against the Moors, where he behaved with that exemplary resolution, that upon the reduction of Granada, the abovementioned Prince added to his paternal coat, an augmentation of a pomegranate slipped upon a canton, which were the arms of that regained Province, and likewise dignified him with the order of Knighthood. Upon the reputation of his martial abilities, he was sent with the fleet against the French, under the command of Sir Charles Brandon. He carried the royal standard at the siege of Terouenne; and at Tournay was created a Banneret. In the 7th of Henry VIII. he was constituted Master of the Horse for life, and had an annuity of 50l. during the like term for executing the office of Esquire of the King's body. In the 14th he was appointed to attend on the Emperor at his coming hither. He was one of the Knights who in parliament subscribed the letter to the Pope. The 24th of April, 1526, he was elected a Knight of the Garter, and installed on St George's feast following. He died in June 1531, being about forty years old: Though he was twice married, he left no issue (8).

[H] Mr Humfrey Monmouth, Alderman of London. He was a Draper; a man of good wealth, and great charity. In 1535, he was knighted, being one of the Sheriffs of London: and dying about the year 1537 was buried in the church-yard of All-hallows, Barking (9).

[I] And establish the true Doctrine of Jesus Christ. He thought no way more conducive thereto, than if the Scriptures were translated into the Vulgar Tongue, that the poor people might also read and see the pure and plain word of God. For, first, reflecting with himself, he perceived by experience, that it was not possible to establish the laity in any truth, except the Scripture were so plainly laid before their eyes in their mother tongue, that they might see the process, order, and meaning of the text. For else whatsoever truth should be taught them, these enemies of the Truth would quench it again; either with apparent reasons of sophistry, and Traditions of their own making, no way founded in Scripture; or else, juggling with the text, expound it in such a sense, that it would be impossible to perceive the right process, order, and meaning of any particular passage. Again, he well perceived and considered, that the only or chief cause of all Mischief in the Church, was, 'That the Scriptures of God were hidden from the people's eyes. For, so long the abominable doings and idolatries maintained by the Pharisaical [Popish] clergy, could not be espied; and therefore all their labour was, with might and main to keep it down: so that either it should not be read at all, or if it were, they would darken the right sense with the mist of their sophistry, and

(8) Register of the Garter, published by John Anstis, Esq;

(9) Stow's Survey, with Strype's Additions, book II. p. 33. and book V. p. 131.

(5) See J. Foxe, p. 981.

(6) J. Foxe, p. 982.

(7) lb. 4.

fenfible he could not fafely do it in England, he refolved to go abroad into Germany, as a place of greater fecurity, and more liberty. This he was enabled to do by the affiftance of Mr Monmouth, and other well-difpofed perfons; who gave him an annuity of ten pounds a year (m), then a fufficient maintenance for a fingle man, and which would go as far as a hundred pounds a year now. At his firft leaving England, he went as far as Saxony, where he conferred with Luther, and other learned men in thofe parts. Then he came back into the Netherlands, and fettled at Antwerp, where was then a very confiderable Factory of Englifh Merchants, many of which were zealous profefors of Luther's doctrine. Here he immediately fet himfelf about his favorite work, the Englifh Translation of the New Testament, in which he had the affiftance of the learned John Fry, and a Frier named William Roye (n), who wrote for him, and helped him to compare the texts together (o). It was printed in 1526, in octavo, without a name [K]: and Mr Tindale added at the

(o) Preface to the Parable of the wicked Mammon.

(m) J. Foxe, p. 909, 982, 983. J. Lewis.

(n) This poor man was afterwards burned in Portugal. Sir Thomas More's Englifh Works, p. 451.

(10) J. Foxe, a little altered in the ftyle, p. 982.

(11) Edward Halle's Chronicle, under King Henry VIII. fol. 227.

(12) Fuller's Abel redivivus, p. 128. A. Wood fays, it was finished in 1527. Ath. Vol. I. col. 42.

(13) See Catalogue of his Books, No. 1252. and his History of Printing, p. 490.

• and fo entangle thofe who rebuked or defpifed their abominations, with arguments of Philofophy, and with worldly fimilitudes, and apparent reafons of natural wifdom: Alfo, by wrefling the Scripture to their own purpofe, contrarie to the procefs, order, and meaning of the text, would fo delude them in defcending upon it with allegories, and amaze them, expounding it in many fenfes laid before the unlearned laie people, that though thou felt in thy heart, and wert fure that all were falfe that they faid, yet couldft not thou folve their fubtile riddles (10).—Ed. Halle, our Author's contemporary, gives much the fame account of his defign—Luther, fays he, fettyng fourth certaine workes againft the Byfhop of Rome, Tyndale occafioned by them to fearche the Scriptures whether Luther fayd the trueth or no, did therby not onely himfelfe attaine the knowlege of the ufurped authoritie of the Byfhop of Rome, and his fuperftitious and damnable doctrynes that he had taught and published through all Chriftendome, but alfo lamentyng the ignoraunt ftate that his native country of England was in, who altogether were wrapped in errors, thought it his dutie, for that God had reveled the light of his Gofpell to him, to beftowe his talent to the honour of God and proffite of his cuntry, and thought no waye fo good to reduce the people from their error as fyrft to make them acquainted with Goddes woorde, that they might know what Goddes will was that we should do, and what the Byfhop of Rome faid that we muft do: and therefore fyrft, as is aforefayd, he tranflated into Englifhe the Newe Testament, a woorke no doubt very notable, and to him verye paynefull, for that he was forced to flye his owne native cuntry, and to lyve in a ftraunge lande among people that as well varied from his manners as the perfones to him were unknown (11).—So that it was pure Love for Truth, and an earneft defire of Benefiting his Country, that fet Mr Tindale upon this arduous undertaking, amidft a thoufand difficulties and dangers, and for which he was at laft crowned with Martyrdom.

[K] It was printed in 1526, in octavo.] Some have placed the firft publication of it under the year 1527 (12), and fome later. But, that it was publifhed as early as the year 1526, is demonftrable from Bifhop Tonftal's Commiffion in the next note, which was dated Oct. 23, 1526. As there were only 1500 printed, and that all the Copies which could poffibly be got in England, were committed to the flames, this firft edition is therefore very difficult to be met with. The late induftrious Mr Wanley hath fet down the following memorandum, in the margin of his Wood's Athenæ, now in our poffeffion: 'I never yet, notwithstanding all my fearches, faw any one copie of this edition, which ought to answer to Sir Thomas More's Remarks.' But there was one in the ingenious Mr Jof. Ames's collection (13). W. Tindale acknowledged, in the Preface to his fubfequent Edition, that there were in this 'many fautes whyche lacke of helpe at the beginnyng and overfyght dyd fow therein.' Therefore he fet himfelf about looking over and correctyng it again, though his own fecond Edition did not come out till 1534.—But the Dutch Printers, finding it was a book in great request, publifhed a new edition of it in 1527, 12mo, and, about a year after, another, in a larger letter and volume, with figures in the apocalypfe; in all about 5000 copies: fo that thefe Testaments became plentier and cheaper than ever they were, or than they could be afforded by W. Tindale. The price of thefe was feven or eight groats a-piece; but the Dutchmen fold them at the rate of thirteen pence each, or three hundred for 16l. 5s. But the Printers not underftanding Englifh, committed a great many faults. However they printed a third edition in 1529, which went off fo well, that this, as well as the two former, were all fold before 1530. In which year, they proceeded to a fourth edition, of about 2000, in a fmall volume and letter; more incorrect than even the former: which however were foon all difpofed of. And in 1534, the Dutch printed a fifth edition, which they got George Joye to correct. [He was a Bedfordshire man, educated at Peterhoufe in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts 1512-13, that of Mafter 1517, and April 27, the fame year, was admitted Fellow. But being accused of herefy, he was forced to fly beyond fea, and retire to Strafburg in Germany.] Not contented with correctyng the typographical errors, he ventured to alter, and amend as he thought, the former tranflation of W. Tindale. But Tindale refented that Joye should take that liberty, and likewife foreftall his Second Edition of the New Testament which was juft ready to come out; therefore, at the end of his Epiftle to the Chriftian reader, he added another Epiftle, which begins thus: 'W. Tindale yet once more to the Chriftian reader.' wherein he has thefe words: 'Wherefore if he [Joye] wold have altered the Text, he should have put it forth for his own tranflation and not for myne.' And exprefles otherwife a great deal too much paffion and refentment. This occafioned Joye to publifh 'An Apology . . . to fatisfy, if it may be, W. Tyndale, to pourge and defende himfelf agaynft fo manye flanderouse Lies fained upon him in Tyndale's uncharitable and unfober Piftle, fo well worthy to be præfixed for the Reader to induce him into the underftanding of his New Testament, diligently correctyng and printed in the yeare of oure Lorde MCCCC and XXXIII, in November.'

W. Tindale's own Second Edition of his New Testament was 'Imprinted at Antwerp by Martin Emperour, Anno M. D. XXXIV.' 8vo.—In 1536, there came out another edition, with this title, 'The Newe Testament yet once agayne correctyng by William Tyndale. Printed in the yere of oure Lorde God, M. D. and XXXVI. in a broad 4to.'—And, the fame year, another edition, printed very probably in Scotland, in a large 4to. Likewife one in a leffer 4to, and a fmall 8vo, and fome others in 8vo, 12mo, and 16mo (14).

For a fpecimen of this tranflation, we fhall give here a few paffages in it, out of the Epiftle to the Romans.—Ch. i. ver. 16, 17. 'For I am not afhamed of the gospel of Chrift, becaufe it is the power of God unto Salvacion to all that beleve, namely to the Jewe and alfo to the gentyle. For by it the ryghtewefnes which cometh of God is opened from fayth to fayth.'—Upon which he hath this marginal note . . . 'from fayth to fayth, that is, from a weke fayth to a ftronger, or from one bataile of fayth to another; for as we have efcaped one jeopardy thorowe fayth, another invadeth us, through whiche we muft wade by the helpe of fayth alfo.'

Ch. v. ver. 15, 16. 'But the gyfte is not lyke as the fynne. For yf thorow fynne of one many be deed: moche more plenteous upon many was the grace of God and gyfte by grace: Whiche grace was geven by one man Jefus Chrift. And the gyfte is not over one fynne, as deeth cam thorow one fynne of one that fynned. For damnacion came of one fynne unto condemnacion: but the gyft came to juftifye from many fynnes.'

Ch. viii. ver. 28, 29. 'For we knowe that all thynges worke for the beft unto them that love God, which alfo are called * of purpofe. For thofe which he knew before, he alfo ordeyned before, that they fhulde be lyke fashyoned unto the fhape of his

* The marginal note here, is, 'God teacheth of his own godnes and mercy thorough the Gofpell: juftifyeth thorough fayth, and glorifieth thorough good workes.'

• Sonne,

(14) Lewis's History of the Tranflations of the Bible, 8vo, p. 75—91.

end an Epistle, wherein he desired them that were learned to amende, if ought were founde amyse. There were but fifteen hundred copies printed of this first impression (p), and most of them being imported into England, were very industriously dispersed, and as greedily bought up and read. At this, the great supporters of Popery were extremely disturbed and alarmed. Conscious that Ignorance was the mother of their spurious Devotion; they well saw, that a fair translation of the Scripture would make men wiser than they wished them to be, and enable them to discern the groundlessness and absurdity of their most gainful and favourite Tenets. They cried out therefore, that there were a thousand heresies in this translation; that it was not to be corrected, but utterly to be suppressed. Some said, it was not possible to translate the Scripture into English; some, that it was not lawful for the laity to have it in their mother tongue; some, that it would make them all Heretics. And, in order to draw the temporal rulers into the quarrel, they furnished and affirmed, that it would make the people rebel and rise against the King (q). William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of London, both great and learned men, except where superstition had distorted their minds, issued out immediately their several orders and monitions, to bring in all the New Testaments translated into the vulgar tongue, that they might be burnt, and to prohibit the reading of them (r). Bishop Tunstall's Commission was dated October 23, 1526 [L]. Not satisfied with that, he preached publicly against these books at St Paul's, and told the people, there were no fewer than 2000 texts in the translation wrong translated. To destroy the books more effectually, the Bishop being at Antwerp in 1526 or 1527, procured Augustin Packington, an English Merchant (s), to buy up all the copies of the English Testament which remained unsold, and they being brought to England, were publicly burnt at Paul's cross. But this ill-judged policy only took off many copies which lay dead upon Tindale's hands, and put a good sum of money into his pocket. So that he was enabled to prepare another Edition, more correct than the former; which however was not printed till 1534. But of the first Edition, about 5000 copies were reprinted in 1527, and 1528: This made the books plentier and cheaper than ever they were. At which Bishop Tunstall being amazed, he sent for Packington, and asked him, how there came to be so many Testaments about, when he had promised him he would buy them all? Packington answered, surely he had bought all that were to be had, but he perceived they had printed more since: and he could not see how they could be kept from doing that, unless his Lordship would likewise buy the types and presses. About the same time, George Constantine, who was suspected of heresy, being examined by Sir Thomas More, and asked, by whom Tindale, Joye, and others beyond sea, were furnished with money from hence; he said, it was the Bishop of London who had helped them, for he had bestowed among them a great deal of money upon New Testaments to burn them; and that had been, and yet was, their only succour and comfort (t). The above order for bringing the Testaments in, being but imperfectly and slowly complied with, strict search was made among those who were suspected of importing and concealing them; of whom John Tindale, our Author's brother, was prosecuted, and condemned to do penance (u). Humfrey Monmouth, his great Patron and Be-

(p) J. Foxe.

(q) Our Author's Prologue to Genesis.

(r) Concilia, &c. Edit. Dr Wilkins, Vol. III. p. 706. and J. Foxe, p. 928.

(s) He was a secret friend to W. Tindale. J. Foxe, p. 929.

(t) J. Foxe, p. 929. and Sir Thomas More's article in remark [RR].

‘ Sonne, that he myght be the first begotten Sonne amonge many brethren. Moreover which he appointed before, them also he called. And which he called, them also he justified; which he justified, them he also glorified *.’

And the controverted passage in 1 Ep. of St John, ch. v. ver. 7, 8, is thus: ‘ And it is the Spete that beares witness, because the Spete is truth. (For there are three which beare recorde in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Wholy Goost. And these three are one) For there are three which beare recorde in earth, the Spete, and water, and blood, and these three are one.’ The Epistle to the Hebrews is placed after the Three of St John, and before that of St James, which immediately precedes the Revelation.—Besides marginal notes, and texts of reference, there are Prologues to most of the books; some of a considerable length; and abounding with excellent observations.—His Prologue to the Epistle of St Paul to the Romans concludes thus—‘ Now go to reader, and according to the order of Paul's writing, even so do thou. First beholde thyselfe diligently in the lawe of God, and se there the iuste damnacion. Secundarely turne thyne eyes to Christ, and se there the exceeding mercy of thy moost kynd and lovinge father. Thyrdly remember, that Christ made not this attonement that thou shuldest anger God agayne: nether dyed he for thy synnes, that thou shuldest lyve styll in them: nether clenseth he the, that thou shuldest retourne (as a swyne) unto thyne olde podel agayne: but that thou shuldest be a rewe creature, and lyve a new lyfe after the wyll of God, and not of the fleshe. And be diligent lest thoro ve thyne own negligence and unthankfulnes thou lose this favour and mercye agayne.’

[L.] Bishop Tunstall's Commission was dated October 23, 1526.] The main of it was in these words . . . ‘ Wee

* The marginal note here, is, ‘ God teacheth of his owne goodness and mercy through the Gospell: justifieth thorough fayth, and glorifieth thorough good werkes.’

‘ having understanding . . . that many children of iniquitie, maintainers of Luther's sect, blinded through extreme wickednesse, wandring from the way of truth and the catholicke faith, craftily have translated the New Testament into our English tongue, intermeddling therewith many hereticall articles, and erroneous opinions, pernicious and offensive, seducing the simple people, attempting by their wicked and perverse interpretations, to prophanate the majestic of the Scripture, which hitherto hath remained undefiled, and craftily to abuse the most holy word of God, and the true sense of the same: of the which translation, there are many books imprinted, some with glosses, and some without, containing in the English tongue that pestiferous and most pernicious poison dispersed throughout all our diocesse of London in great number: which truly without it be speedily forescene, without doubt will contaminate and infect the flocke committed unto us, with most deadly poison and heresie, to the grievous perill and danger of the Soules committed to our charge, and the offence of God's divine majestic. Wherefore we . . . grievouslie sorrowing for the premisses, willing to withstand the craft and subtely of the ancient enemy and his ministers, which seeke the destruction of my flocke . . . desiring to provide speedie remedies for the premisses, doe charge you . . . and by vertue of your obedience, straitly injoyne and command you, that by our authoritie you warne or cause to bee warned all and singuler, as well exempt as not exempt, dwelling within your archdeaconries, that within thirty daies space . . . under paine of excommunication, and incurring the suspition of heresie, they do bring in, and really deliver unto our Vicar general, al and singuler such books as containe the translation of the New Testament in the English tongue &c.’ (15).—Archbishop Warham's Commission, much to the same purpose, to the Bishop of Exeter, is dated Nov. 3, 1526 (16).

(15) J. Foxe, p. 428. See Strype's Eccles. Memor. Vol. I. Appendix, p. 44.

(16) Concilia &c. edit. D. Wilkins, V. III. p. 706.

(w) J. Foxe, p. 909. See Strype's Life of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 81. and his Memorials, Vol. 1. p. 316.

(y) Lewis, Hist. of the Translations of the Bible, p. 71.

(z) Regist. Warham, fol. 188. a. printed from thence in Spelman's Councils, Vol. 11. p. 732, &c. and in Dr Wilkins's Edit. Vol. III. p. 728, &c.

(bb) J. Foxe, p. 983.

hefactor, was imprisoned in the Tower, and almost ruined (w). But all these rigorous measures not having the intended effect, and burning the Word of God being looked upon among the people as a shocking profanation; the great Patrons of Popery endeavoured to ridicule what they could not suppress. They employed for that purpose the noted Sir Thomas More (x), who, like all other witty men, suffered his wit to out-run his judgment, and had so devoted himself to the blindest corruptions of the Church of Rome, that he was then ready to swallow and defend them without examination, and was as severe a persecutor as any ignorant Monk. He published in 1529, a Dyaloge, wherein he treated of the pestilent sect of Luther and Tyndale, &c. [M], and in which, among other things, he says, 'That whoso called these books which were burnt, New Testaments, gave them a wrong name, since they were rather Tyndal's or Luther's Testament, it being so corrupted and changed from the good and wholesome doctrine of Christ to their own devilish heresies, as to be quite another thing.' Mr Tindale, in 1530, published An Answer to this Dialogue of Sir Thomas More (y). But all the methods used for destroying William Tindale's Translation having continued hitherto ineffectual and unsuccessful, the secular arm was called in. For at the instance of some zealots, on the 24th of May, 1531, King Henry VIII. came into the Star-Chamber, and there, by one whole advice and assent of the Prelates and Clerks, as well of the Universities as all other there assembled together, ordered all the books containing several great errors and pestilent heresies, contagious and damnable, then set down; and all the books containing the same, with the Translation also of Scripture corrupted, by William Tyndall, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, and all other books in English containing such errors; to be utterly expelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to be suffered to go abroad among his subjects (z). And a Proclamation was issued out to the same purpose (aa) [N]. The Old Testament here mentioned to have been translated by William Tindale, was the Five Books of Moses, which he translated from the Hebrew into English, as soon as he had finished his New Testament. But going by sea to Hamburgh, to have it printed there, the vessel in which he went was wrecked on the coast of Holland, so that he lost all his money, books, writings, and copies; and was forced to begin anew. However, he came in another ship to Hamburgh, where, by his appointment, Miles Coverdale waited for him, and assisted him in translating the Pentateuch, from Easter to December, 1529, in the house of Mrs Margaret Van Emmerson, widow: It was printed in 1530 [O]. And he afterwards made an English version of the Prophecy of Jonas, with a large Prologue, which was published in 1531 (bb); but he translated no more books of the Scripture, as some have asserted [P].

From

[M] A Dyaloge, &c. We shall give the whole title, which may perhaps divert the reader with the manner of Spelling in those days. 'A Dyaloge of Syr Thomas More knyghte: one of the counsayll of oure Soverayne lorde the Kyng and Chauncellour of hys duchy of Lancafter: wherin be treatyd dyvers matters, as of the veneration and worthyp of ymagys and relyques, prayng to Sayntys and going on Pylgrymage, with many othere thyngys touchyng the Pestylent Sect of Luther and Tyndale, by the tone bygone in Saxony, and by the tother laboryd to be brought into England. Emprynted at London at the Sygne of the Meremayd at Powlys gate next to Chepe-syde in the moneth of June the yere of our Lord 1529.'—W. Tindale, in 1530, published, An Aunfwere unto Syr Thomas More's dyaloge.—And Sir Thomas replied, in his 'Confutation of Tyndale's Aunfwere to his Dyaloge, in nine books.' 1532.

[N] And a Proclamation was issued out to the same purpose. In that proclamation, are these very weak reasons given why the Scriptures should not be in English. . . . 'Forasmuch as it is come to the hering of our said Soveraigne lord the king, that report is made by divers and many of his Subjects, that it were to all men not only expedient, but also necessary, to have in the English tonge both the New Testament and the Old, and that his highness, his noblemen, and prelates were bounden to suffer them so to have it; his highness hath therefore semblably thereupon consulted with the said primates, and vertuous, discrete, and well learned personages in divinity forsaide; and by them all it is thought, that it is not necessary the said Scripture to be in the English tonge, and in the hands of the common people; but that the distribution of the said Scripture, and the permitting or denieing thereof, dependeth only upon the discretion of the Superiours, as they shall think it convenient. And that having respect to the malignity of this present tyme, with the inclination of people to erroneous opinions; the translation of the New Testament and the Old into the vulgar tonge of English should rather be the occasion of continuance or increase of errors amonge the said people, than any benefyce or commodity towards the weale of their soules. And that it shall now be more convenient, that the same people have the holy Scripture expounded to them by preachers in their sermons, according as it hath ben of old time accustomed before this time. Albeit yf it shall hereafter appeare to the king's highness, that his said people do utterly abandon and forsake all perverse, erroneous, and seditious opinions, with the New Testament and the Old corruptly translated into the English tonge nowe being in printe; and that the same bokes and all other bokes of heresie, as well in the French tonge, as in the Dutch tonge, be clearly exterminate, and exiled out of this realme of England for ever; his highness intendeth to provide, that the holy Scripture shall be by great, learned, and catholique persons translated into the English tonge, yf it shall then seeme to his grace convenient to be.' . . . (17).—The whole tenor of this proclamation does but too well justify the Character given by W. Tindale of his opposers and persecutors; whom he calls 'fleshy minded Hypocrites, as making the Scripture their own possession and merchandise, and so shutting up the Kingdom of heaven, which is God's word, neither entering themselves, nor suffering them that would (18).'

[O] It was printed in 1530. And in a small octavo volume, which seems to have been printed at several presses, as we may suppose the times would permit. Genesis and Numbers are in the Dutch letter, and contain the one 76 leaves, and the other 67. Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, are printed in the Roman letter, with now and then a capital of the black letter intermixed, as was done in books printed about this time at Zurich. Exodus contains 76 leaves, Leviticus 52, and Deuteronomy 63. To every one of these five books is prefixed a Prologue; and at the end of Genesis, Exodus, and Deuteronomy, and at the beginning of Numbers, are Tables expounding certain words. In the margin are some notes: and it is adorned with ten wooden cuts (19).

[P] But he translated no more Books of the Scripture, as some have asserted. Edward Halle, who was his contemporary, says, that, 'besides the New Testament, he translated the Five Bookes of Moses, Josua, Judicum, Ruth, the bookes of the Kynges, and the bookes of Paralipomenon, Nehemias, or the fyrst of Esdras, the Prophet Jonas, and no more of the holy Scripture (20).'—And Bishop Bale (21), and Bishop Tanner speak to the same purpose (22).

We

(x) Vide Wilkins's Concil. Vol. II. p. 711.

(aa) Cott. Cleop. E. V. fol. 321 and Wilkins's Concil. Vol. II. p. 740.

(17) Cott. Lit. Cleop. E. V. f. 321. and Wilkins's Concil. Vol. III. p. 74.

(18) Prologue Jonas.

(19) Lewis, above, p. 70.

(20) In Henry the VIIIth, fol. 227.

(21) Bale, cent. VIII. p. 658.

(22) Bibliotheca sub voce Hittins.

From Hamburg he returned to Antwerp, and lodged, in 1534, in the house of Mr Thomas Pointz, an English Merchant. We might think in our days, that the life of so innocent a man as Mr Tindale, could be in no danger. But in the hight of Popery, that envenomed set of people, one of whose properties is never to forgive, could not rest as long as so dangerous a Heretic, as they counted him, was suffered to live. To take him off therefore, King Henry VIII. and his Counsel suborned and employed one Henry Philips (cc), who insinuating himself both into Tindale's and Pointz's acquaintance, was treated by both as a friend. At length, when Philips found his opportunity, he got the Procurator General of the Emperor's Court at Brussels, and other Officers, to come and seize poor unhappy Tindale, though they could not but pity and admire at the time his plain honest simplicity; and to convey him prisoner to the Castle of Vilvorden, eighteen English miles from Antwerp, where he remained a prisoner about a year and a half. His friend Pointz, and the body of the English Merchants, procured Letters from Secretary Cromwell to the Court at Brussels, for the release of Tindale. But treacherous Philips invented a false accusation against Pointz, in order to render all his applications ineffectual; so that he was prosecuted and imprisoned, but escaped in the night (dd). Tindale's destruction being now resolved, he was brought to his trial, and offered an Advocate and a Proctor: but he refused to have any, saying, he would answer for himself; and so he did. But none of his reasons being admitted, he was condemned by virtue of the Emperor's Decree made in the assembly at Augsburg. And being brought to execution, in 1536, he was by the hangman first strangled, calling out in his last moments, 'Lord, open the King of England's eyes:' after which, his body was reduced to ashes (ee). Such was the tragical end of one of the learnedst men in his time: a man of the most unblemished character; whose only crime was, Translating into English, for the Benefit of his Countrymen, the Holy Scriptures [Q], which all Christians do and ought to look upon, as the only Rule of their Faith and Practice; and which consequently they cannot be too well acquainted with. Time it was therefore, that such a Tyranny as he fell a sacrifice to, should be abolished; as it was very soon: The measure of their Iniquities was then fulfilled. Besides his Translations of part of the Bible, and other pieces already mentioned, William Tindale was Author of other things [R], of which some account is given below.

(cc) Whose father was a Custom-house Officer at Prul. J. Foxe. See A. Wood, Vol. 1. col. 43. This Philips was then a Scholar at Lovain. Edw. Halle, as above, fol. 227. b.

(dd) J. Foxe, p. 923, 984, 985.

(ee) Idem, p. 984, 985, invictus Christi martyr, as J. Bate styles him, Cent. p. 659.

We have seen, that he published no more than the Pentateuch, or Five Books of Moses; the prophecy of Jonas; and the New Testament. He might possibly have translated afterwards the other Books above mentioned. But as, upon his apprehension, his lodgings were searched by the officers that had apprehended him (23); if any of his manuscript translations of Scripture were there, and fell into such hands, we may be sure they would not be permitted to see any other light than that of the flames. The translation of the Old Testament, from Joshua to Nehemiah, in the first Edition of the English Bible printed in 1535, was done by Myles Coverdale.

[Q] Translating into English, for the benefit of his countrymen, the Holy Scriptures. How honestly he had acted in that work, he solemnly declares in a letter to John Fryth, part of which is as follows. . . 'I call God to record, against the day wee shall appeare before our Lord Jesus to give a reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one Syllable of God's word against my conscience, nor would doe this daie if all that is in earth, whether it be honour, pleasure, or riches, might be given me. Moreover I take God to witness to my conscience, that I desire of God to myselfe in this world, no more than that, without which I cannot keepe his laws.'—

[R] Besides his Translations of part of the Bible . . . he was Author of other things. These several pieces of his were collected together, and printed by John Day in one volume folio, 1572, together with John Fryth's, and Barnes's works. 1. 'A protestation touchyng the resurrection of the bodyes, and the state of the soules after this life. 2. Preface to the Pentateuch, dated Jan. 17, 1530. 3. Prologue shewing the use of the Scripture. 4. Prologues to the five Books of Moses. 5. Certaine hard words expounded in the first, second, and fourth book of Moses. 6. Prologue upon the Prophet Jonas; 7. and upon the four Evangelists, the Epistles of St Paul, the Epistles of St Peter, and St John. 8. The parable of the wycked Mammon, dated May 2, 1527. 9. Of the obedience of a Christen man, and how Christen rulers ought to governe, dated Oct. 2, 1523. Printed at Malborow in Hesse 1535, and at London 12mo, and again in 1561. In the preface we find the name of William Tyndall, al. Hitchins. 10. An exposition on the Vth, VIth, and VIIth chapters of St Matthew. Printed first about 1531, and again in 1548, 12mo. 11. Answer unto Syr Thomas More's Dyaloge, as above. 12. The practise of the Praelates, whether the kinges grace maye be separated from hys quene, because she was hys brother's wife: written in 1530. Printed at Marpurg in 1530, and Lond. 1548, 8vo. [This was enough to procure his violent death from King Henry VIII.] 13. A Pathway into the holy Scripture. 14. Exposition of the first Epistle of St John. Printed in September, 1531, and in Southwark, 1538, 12mo. In this edition are included his Commentaries upon the three Epistles of St John. 15. The testament of M. William Tracie expounded, 1535, 12mo, and at Norimberg 1546. 16. A treatise upon signes and sacramentes. Lond. 12mo. 17. Three Letters to John Fryth, prisoner in the Tower. The last of which contains an Exposition of the 6th chapter of St. John, and 1 Cor. xi. against Sir Thomas More.'

He also translated some of Luther's works into English. . . And put a Preface to, The prayer and complaint of a Plowman:—And to the Examinations of William Thorpe, and Sir John Oldcastle, which he published.

There are likewise ascribed to him—An Exposition on 1 Corinth. vii. with a Prologue, wherein all Christians are exhorted to read the Scriptures. Printed at Malborow in Hesse 1529, 12mo.—A booke concerning the church.—A Godly disputation between a Christian shomaker and a popish persone.—The disclosyng of the man of sin.—The matrimonye of Tindall, 1529 (24).

Some of our Author's positions about Oaths, are reflected upon by Dr Richard Cosin, in his Apologie of certaine proceedings in Courts Ecclesiasticall (25). . . . And some of his notions are also censured by J. Collier (26), as he takes them from Sir Thomas More's works. But, upon the whole, he well deserved the Character given of him by the Emperor's procurator, employed in his condemnation; That he was Homo doctus, pius, & bonus, a learned, pious, and good man (27).

(24) J. Bale, Cent. p. 659. A. Wood, col. 42. and Tanner Biblioth.

(25) Part III. p. 174—176. edit. 1595. 4to.

(26) Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 72.

(27) Ed. Halle, as above, fol. 227. b.

TINDAL [MATTHEW], was born about the year 1657, at Beer-Ferres in Devonshire; where his father, Mr John Tindal, was Minister (a). His son was first put to school in the Country (b), and after he had made a sufficient progress in grammar learning, was sent to Oxford, where he was first admitted of Lincoln-College, under the tuition of Dr Hickes, in 1672; but removed thence to that of Exeter (c). Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, October 17, 1676 (d), he was from thence chosen into a Law Fellowship at All-Souls College (e). In 1679, he proceeded Bachelor of Laws (f), and was created Doctor in the same faculty in 1685 (gg). Not long afterwards, our Author became a Profelyte to the Popish Emiffaries employed in the University by King James II, publicly declared himself a Roman Catholic, and openly frequented the Maſs-houſes during the greateſt part of that King's reign. In this interval he went to London (h), and was admitted an advocate in Doctors Commons (i). While he was in town, he fell into the acquaintance of ſome perſons, whoſe converſation led him into a diſlike of Popery. He therefore renounced that Religion in the latter end of the year 1687, and returned to Oxford; he received the Sacrament publicly in his College Chapel from the hands of the Warden on Eaſter-day, April 15, 1688 (k) [A]. From this time, he grew a warm oppoſer of ſome of the powers and authority claimed by the Church of England, and falling in with the Revolution, it was not long before he became a zealous Writer in defence of it. In November, 1693, he published An Eſſay concerning Obedience to the Supreme Powers, and the Duty of Subjects in all Revolutions, with ſome Considerations concerning the preſent Juncture of Affairs. The ſame year Count Paleoti, an Italian, having killed one of his own domeſticks, who was a native likewiſe of Italy, proteſted againſt the power of any Engliſh Court of Law to bring him to trial for that fact (l). The caſe was referred by his Maſteſty to the conſideration of proper Delegates, conſiſting of ſome of the moſt eminent perſons both in Church and State, as well as Common Lawyers as Civilians. Dr Tindal was put into this Commiſſion, where he gave ſome diſtinguiſhing proofs of his abilities in his profeſſion. After this, he ſat frequently as Judge in the Court of Delegates (though he rarely, if ever, practiſed as an Advocate in the Courts of Civil or Eccleſiaſtical Law) and had a penſion of 200 l. per annum granted to him by the Crown (m). In the beginning of March, 1693, he published an Eſſay concerning the Law of Nations, and the Rights of Sovereigns [B]. As there had been a deſign on foot from the time of Dr

(a) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1011. 2d Edit. He was preferred to that living (worth 300 l. per ann.) by the university of Cambridge, in the Civil Wars. Mr Small's account, in Memoirs of the Life, &c. of Matt. Tindal, p. 9. Edit. 1733. 8vo.

(f) Ibid. Faſti, col. 211.

(g) Ibid. col. 227.

(h) Second Defence of the Rights, ubi ſupra.

(i) Communicated by the late Sir Nathaniel Lloyd, who was Fellow of the ſame College, and an Advocate in the Commons.

(k) See his Defence, &c. ubi ſupra. Mr Wood tells us, he returned to the Proteſtant religion after King James left the nation. Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(l) History of King William III, p. 171.

(m) Communicated by the abovementioned Gentleman.

(b) The Second Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church, by our Author; p. 79. Lond. 1708. 8vo.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) Ibid. Faſti, Vol. II. col. 207.

(e) Ibid. Athen. Vol. II. ubi ſupra.

(f) He was qualified for this preferment according to the Founder's deſign of admitting only ſons of Gentlemen, by both his parents. His mother, Ann Hulſe, being daughter of Matthew Hulſe of Efford in Devonſhire, poſſeſſed of an eſtate of 1000 l. per ann. Small, as before.

(g) History of King William III, p. 171.

(h) Communicated by the abovementioned Gentleman.

[A] Eaſter-day, April 15, 1688. Our Author alledges this renunciation of Popery at this juncture as a certain proof of his ſincerity upon the point of religion. He could not, he ſays, but apprehend it would be his certain ruin, ſince the Papiſts had not only an army here, which the King was modelling for their purpoſe, but they were ſure of the aſſiſtance of the great Champion of Popery, who, the Empire being engaged in a war with the Turks, might aſſiſt his dear ally with as many troops as he pleaſed for the extirpation of the Northern Hereſy; and all things were like to go here according to their wiſhes; the Queen, as might be foreſeen without the gift of Prophecy, was to be brought to-bed of a ſon; ſo that there was nothing to ſcreen a Relapſed Heretic from their utmoſt fury. Yet this did not ſo much trouble him, as he was pleaſed with the opportunity of ſatiſfying the world that he acted out of principles, and that, as he would not ſcruple to ſacrifice his reputation in joining with the Papiſts when he thought they were in the right, ſo he was willing to run any hazard in quitting them as ſoon as he was made ſenſible of his error (1). This account of our Author's lapſe and recovery from the Popiſh religion by himſelf, is infered here in juſtice to his memory; nor indeed can the truth of it be candidly or fairly controverted. However, the ſame regard to truth obliges us not to ſuppreſs ſome inſtances relating to the moral part of his conduct, which ſhew him to have been no credit to any religion. We are aſſured, that his debaucheries with women became ſo notorious, that he was publicly reprimanded by his College as an Egregious Fornicator. To this purpoſe, the following fact is related upon the credit of a Canon Reſidentiary, who was one of the ejeſted Demys of Magdalen-College in King James the Second's time. The Doctor, it is ſaid, got a wench to ſwear one of his children to a Gentleman of that College, altogether as infamous at that time as himſelf. The Gentleman was obliged to ſubmit, and maintain the child: nevertheless, after ſome time, he got into the company of the mother, and aſked her how ſhe came to uſe him ſo, ſince ſhe could not be ignorant, that he was never concerned with her in the manner that ſhe had ſworn. Her answer was, that Dr Tindal had got her with child, and prevailed on her to ſwear as ſhe had done: Well then, my dear, replies the pious Reprover, I deſire you to be ſo juſt to me, as to let me get another, and that you would ſwear it to him, which was immediately a bargain, and ſtrictly executed in all its branches (2).

[B] An Eſſay concerning the Law of Nations, and the Rights of Sovereigns, &c. A Second Edition of this Treatiſe was published in the ſame year, to which he added, An Account of what was ſaid at the Council-board by the Civilians, upon the Queſtion, whether their Ma- jeſties ſubjects taken at ſea acting by the late King's Commiſſion, might not be looked upon as Pirates? With Reflections on the Arguments of Sir T. P. [Thomas Pinfold], and Dr Ol. [Oldys]. Theſe Civilians were both of opinion they could not, and Dr Oldys, in ſupport of his opinion, cited the caſe of Antonio, King of Portugal, who after he had loſt his Kingdom, commiſſioned privateers to ſeize upon all Spaniſh veſſels, whom, as the Spaniards met with, they hanged indeed like Pirates. But his Author gave it as an acknowledged opinion, that if Antonio had ever been a rightful King (as King James had been) then the Spaniards ought not to have treated thoſe acting under his Commiſſion, as they might ſuch as acted by none (3). On the other hand, Dr Littleton ſaid, that King James now was a private perſon; we had no war with him, nor he with us; or if he deſigned to have any, Avarium non habet, he is not in a capacity of making war; he can neither ſend nor receive Ambaſſadors, and thoſe who adhere to him are not enemies, but rogues, and conſequently theſe perſons are not Privateers, but Pirates. Dr Tindal was of the ſame opinion with Dr Littleton, and among other arguments to confirm it, obſerves, that this was a foreign Kingdom in reſpect to King James, now depoſed and deprived of it, and was properly indeed of no nation. 'Why may he not (aſks our Civilian) be puniſhed without violation of the laws of nations, or injury to any nation whatever, ſince no nation owns him ſo much as to be of their body? Therefore the King, in whoſe dominions he is, may, if his crimes deſerve it, puniſh him with loſs of life, as Queen Elizabeth, of bleſſed memory, did Mary Queen of Scotland.' It is true, the juſtice of this laſt caſe has been ſo much controverted, as may be thought to exclude it from the place, either of a governing, or even a perſuaſive precedent. But our Author will be ſtrongly defended in making uſe of it as a juſt precedent, by ſome new light which is thrown upon the conduct of Mary Queen of Scots, in a Collection of Papers containing the Examinations and Confeſſions of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, John Leſlie Biſhop of Roſs, and their dependants; as alſo by the correſpondencies between her and Thomas Morgan, her Agent in France, laying open, from a ſeries of intercepted letters, the various ſchemes and deſigns which were carried on, both at home and abroad, in her favour, and for the deſtruction of the government, and even the perſon of Queen Elizabeth (4).

(1) Hereupon Dr Oldys was removed from his poſt of King's Advocate, and Dr Littleton ſucceeded him, who tried the perſons impriſoned as Pirates, and condemned them; and ſome, if not all, were executed. Hiſt. of Trials for Capital Crimes, Vol. II. p. 513, & ſeq. Eſſay concerning the Laws of Nations, and Rights of Sovereigns, p. 170, 18.

(2) A Collection of State Papers relating to affairs in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, from 1571 to 1596, published from MSS. in the library at Hatfield houſe, by William Murden, B. D. 1759. fol.

(3) A Collection of State Papers relating to affairs in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, from 1571 to 1596, published from MSS. in the library at Hatfield houſe, by William Murden, B. D. 1759. fol.

(4) A Collection of State Papers relating to affairs in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, from 1571 to 1596, published from MSS. in the library at Hatfield houſe, by William Murden, B. D. 1759. fol.

(5) A Collection of State Papers relating to affairs in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, from 1571 to 1596, published from MSS. in the library at Hatfield houſe, by William Murden, B. D. 1759. fol.

Tillotson's promotion to the See of Canterbury, to make some alterations in the Liturgy, particularly with regard to the Trinity and Athanasian Creed (n), our Author, following the humour of the times, addressed A Letter to the Clergy of both Universities concerning these two Articles, which was published in the year 1694, and the following year he printed a Defence of it under this title: The Reflections on the Twenty-eight Propositions, &c. in the Letter maintained against the Third Defence of the said Propositions. In 1706, he made himself remarkable, by publishing a treatise in 8vo, intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish, and all other Priests who claim an independent power over it: With a Preface concerning the Government of the Church of England, as by law established. The Clergy in general being alarmed at this book, several Answers appeared to it, the foremost of which were written by Mr Wotton, Chaplain to the Earl of Nottingham, and by the celebrated Dr Hickes [C]. A Bookseller and his servant were likewise both indicted for selling it. These proceedings engaged our Author to enter into the defence of his Doctrine [D], and the dispute was kept up with great warmth on each side, till the year 1709, when Mr Oldifworth published, in three volumes 8vo, his ingenious Piece, intitled, Timothy and Philatheus, in which the Principles and Projects of a late whimsical Book, intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church, are fairly stated and answered in their kinds. Written by a Layman. From this time, the noise about the Rights was intirely drowned in the much greater cry of High-Church, occasioned by Dr Sacheverel's Sermons. Accordingly our Author at that time published a pamphlet under the title of New High-Church turned old Presbyterian. But having likewise published the same year, a second edition of his Defence, both this and the Rights &c. were ordered by a vote of the House of Commons to be burnt in the same flames with that famous Doctor's Sermons, upon March 25, 1710 (o). This occasioned our Author to put out a pamphlet that year, intitled, A High-Church Catechism; as also another called, The Jacobitism, Perjury, and Popery of the High-Church Priests, and a third, which he named, The Merciful Judgments of High-Church Triumphant on offending Clergymen and Others in the Reign of King Charles I. The next year, the Lower House of Convocation (where Dr Atterbury was chosen Prolocutor) having, in pursuance to a letter to that assembly from the Queen, drawn up a Representation of the present State of Religion, with regard to the late excessive growth of Infidelity, Herefy, and Profaneness, wherein it was observed, that the asserting the necessity of human actions, overturns the foundation of all Religion, both Natural and Revealed, and renders all notions of good or evil, of rewards and punishments, vain and groundless; Dr Tindal, in answer to this, published a Pamphlet [E], wherein he

(n) See Journal of TILLOTSON [JOHN].

(o) See Journal of the House of Commons for that year. The vote for burning the Doctor's Sermons passed the day before.

[C] Mr William Wotton and Dr Hickes.] The first of these wrote the following pieces: I. The Rights of the Clergy in the Christian Church asserted, in a Sermon preached at Newport Pagnel in Buckinghamshire, September 2, 1706, at the Primary Visitation of William Lord Bishop of Lincoln. II. The Second Part of the Wolf stripped of his Shepherd's Cloathing, in answer to a late Book intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church asserted, published at Lond. in March, 1707. By the latter Gentleman, there appeared two treatises, 'one of the Christian Priesthood; the other of the Dignity of the Episcopal Order, formerly written, and now published, to obviate the erroneous Opinions, fallacious Reasonings, and bold and false Assertions, in a late Book, intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church, with a large Prefatory Discourse, wherein is contained an Answer to the said Book. All written by George Hickes, D. D. Lond. May, 1707.' There came out likewise by the same hand, in 1709, in 8vo. 'Three short Treatises: viz. 1. A Modest Plea for the Clergy, &c. 2. A Sermon of the Sacerdotal Benediction. 3. A Discourse published to undeceive the People in point of Tythes, formerly printed, and now again published by Dr George Hickes, in Defence of the Priesthood, and true Rights of the Church, against the slanderous and reproachful Treatment of the Rights of the Christian Church.' Besides these was published, '1. A Thorough Examination of the false Principles and fallacious Arguments advanced against the Christian Church, Priesthood, and Religion, in a late pernicious Book, ironically intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church asserted, &c. In a Dialogue between Demas and Hierarcha. Humbly offered to the Consideration of the Nobility and Gentry of England; by Samuel Hill, Rector of Kilmington, and Archdeacon of Wells, in 8vo. in November, 1707.' 2. Adversaria, or Truths opposed to some of the Falshoods contained in a Book called, The Rights of the Christian Church asserted, &c.; by Conyers Place, M. A. London, 1709. 8vo.

[D] Our Author to enter into the defence of his doctrine.] He wrote, first, A Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church, against a late Visitation Sermon, intitled, The Rights of the Clergy in the Christian Church asserted, preached at Newport Pagnel in the County of Bucks; by William Wotton, B. D. and made public at the command and desire of the Bishop of Lincoln, and the Clergy of the Deaneries of Buckingham, and Newport: London, 1707, VOL. VI. No. CCCXXXI.

in 8vo. 2. A Second Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church, occasioned by two late Indictments against a Bookseller and his servant for selling one of the said Books; in a letter from a Gentleman in London to a Clergyman in the Country. To which are added, two Tracts of Hugo Grotius on these Questions; 1. Whether the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper may be administered where there are no Pastors? II. Whether it be necessary at all times to communicate with the symbols? As also some Tracts of Mr John Hales of Eton; viz. Of the Lord's Supper; The Power of the Keys; Of Schism, &c. Lond. 1707, in 8vo. In 1709, our Author likewise wrote, A Discourse for the Liberty of the Press, and an Essay concerning the Rights of Mankind in Matters of Religion, which, together with his two Essays concerning Obedience, and the Laws of Nations, were printed that year in 8vo. He also the same year printed a Second Edition of his Defence, in which he put both Parts into one Volume, with this title, A Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church, in two Parts: Part the first against Mr Wotton's Visitation Sermon, preached at Newport Pagnel: Part the second, occasioned by two late Indictments against a Bookseller and his servant, for selling one of the said Books; with some Tracts of Hugo Grotius and Mr John Hales of Eton. The Second Edition, corrected. To which is added, A Letter from a Country Attorney to a Country Parson, concerning the Rights of the Church, never published before: And likewise Monf. Le Clerc's Extract and Judgment of the said Book; translated from his Bibliotheque Choisie: London, printed in the year MDCCIX. It was this Edition that was burnt, as is mentioned in the text (5).

[E] He published a pamphlet.] The title runs thus: The Nation vindicated from the Aspersions cast on it in a late Pamphlet, intitled, A Representation of the present State of Religion, with regard to the late excessive growth of Infidelity, Herefy, and Profaneness, as it passed the Lower House of Convocation; in two Parts. In the Second Part of this Treatise, our Author lays it down for an undoubted maxim, that men are necessarily determined to love themselves: 'Whence, says he, the desire of getting pleasure and avoiding pain must as necessarily govern their actions; that the difference between men and angels is not that both alike do not necessarily love their own good; but that the latter, by having their judgments so much

(5) Boyer's Hist. of the Reign of Queen Ann, fol. 1735. P. 446.

he maintained, on the contrary, the necessity of human actions to be the true foundation of all Religion, without which, rewards and punishments would be vain and groundless. — In 1713, our Author turned his thoughts from Religious to Civil Concerns, and begun to try the force of his pen upon the subjects of State Politicks: He observed many people possessed with Jealousies about the Pretender; his first essay therefore of this kind, was intitled, A Dissuasive from Jacobitism; shewing, in general, what the Nation is to expect from a Popish King, and in particular from the Pretender. This was presently followed by a Second Dissuasive from Jacobitism, wherein the Interest of the Clergy and the Universities is considered (p); and the next year he wrote an answer to Mr Bedford's Hereditary Right of the Crown of England (q) asserted. In the same spirit, after the death of Queen Ann; when her Ministry came under examination, in 1715; the Doctor published a pamphlet, intitled, Justice done to the late Ministry, or the Charge of their designing to make the Pretender King of Great Britain proved from their Conduct to be groundless, and the Reasons for a Parliamentary Enquiry considered. In 1716, he wrote a vindication of the Septennial Act, in defence of the Ministry then in being. We must not omit to observe, that our Author, as well as Mr Toland, had, from the time of King George the First's accession to the throne, occasionally entertained his thoughts with the view of getting the Universities reformed by a Royal Visitation. In the prosecution of this scheme, at the request of Mr Walpole, who was now in the Administration, he drew up an account in writing, which he gave to that Gentleman, of the methods that were taken in the several Visitations of the Universities in the Reign of King James II: and the Ministry happening to run into divisions at the same time, our Author being desired by the same Patron, gave him a rough draught of the Characters of the leading men in it (r). However, affairs took such a turn, that presently after he published a pamphlet in 1717, with this title: Defection considered [F], and the designs of those who divided the friends of the Government set in a true light, wherein, among others, the Character of Mr Walpole (who, contrary to our Author's expectation, had resigned all his posts) was most rudely handled. To this, an answer, in 1718, was returned, in which that Gentleman declared it was plain by a manuscript in his custody, that the last mentioned pamphlet was written against another person; but that upon the change of the Ministry, that name was struck out, and his put in, and that through a detestation of the calumny, he gave the Author a sum of money not to publish it. This provoked Dr Tindal to publish in 8vo, the same year, an account of a manuscript [G], intitled, Destruction the certain consequence of Division; or the Necessity of a strict

(p) Mr Toland also published his famous pamphlet, intitled, The Art of Restoring, at the same time. See his article.

(r) An account of a manuscript, p. 4. See Remark [G].

(q) The Hereditary Right was published in October, 1715, in the Gazette: One Harbin was the real Author; but Mr Hilkiah Bedford took it upon himself, and was sentenced May the 4th, following, to suffer a severe punishment. See the article SMITH [GEORGE], Remark [B].

the better informed, cannot commit such mistakes as men do. Nay, God himself, by the excellency of his nature, is necessarily determined to will the best; and that does not hinder, but that he is absolutely free; because nothing can prevent his acting as he pleases. And man is a free agent, when he is not hindered from putting his will in execution, though his will is the necessary result of his judgment (6). It may not be amiss to take notice here, that Anthony Collins; Esq; in the year 1717, published A Philosophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty, where he had reasoned in much the same manner as our Author does in this above mentioned passage; that Mr Collins's book was answered by Dr Samuel Clarke, in some Remarks subjoined to a Collection of Papers, which passed between the late learned Mr Leibnitz and Dr Clarke, relating to the Principles of Natural Philosophy and Religion, 1717, in 8vo. to which the former found it not proper to make any reply (7).

[F] Defection considered. It was answered in two pamphlets: 1. The Resigners vindicated, or the Defection reconsidered; in which the designs of all Parties are set in a true light: by a Gentleman. London, 1718, in 8vo. 2. The Resigners vindicated: Part II, and last: Containing, 1. An Account of the Authors of the Defection; 2. Their falsification of Facts; 3. Reasons against abolishing the 30th of January, and the 29th of May; 4. Characters of the Resigners. The Author, in the entrance of this last piece, observes, that 'it is now no secret from what hands the Defection considered, &c. came, though it was of the first consequence to those, for whose interest those papers were published, to have let the Authors continue in darkness. Infamy ought to be surrounded with a thick cloud, when it attacks reputations of a standing, and experienced merit. The arrow should fly by night, when the discovery of the archer will blunt the edge of the weapon; or at least bring a cure after the wounds it makes. Desperate indeed must be the cause that employs such foul hands for a halter. The taste must be vitiated to the last degree, that weeds a wilderness of poisons for a nosegay, and sends to the Fens of Ireland for perfumers. When a man has made it the employment of his life, and all the study that a mean capacity, ill furnished with the helps of languages, can attain to, to pick up all the little objections against Christianity itself, to strike boldly at the Religion of his Country, despise its Worship, and ridicule its Worshippers; what a grimace is it to see such a one turn Champion for the Rights and Privileges of a Christian Community, and pretend to defend that, in which he never believed? Serpens nisi serpentem comederit non erit Draco. How many venomous Writers has this wretch swallowed; to qualify him to become the formidable Enemy of Religion, and the Protector of a set of men, whose cause he now so strongly supports? Is it not enough to prejudice truth itself, when it comes from such a quarter? Or, what is worse, does it not give strong suspicions, that no truth can be there? since this Author has been so often proved guilty of falsifying matters of fact, quotations indutiously misrepresented; or for want of knowledge, vilely translated? He concludes as follows: 'Thus have I run through the Defection considered, without offending, I hope, against truth; and if I have taken some pains to vindicate merit from reproaches, I have performed a more laudable part, than the man who drugged in the poor work of calumny and detraction. If there appears any where something warm and passionate, I own it the effect of contempt and indignation; when I see a wretch, who neither can write English, nor construe Latin, make an attempt upon the good names of his fellow subjects, under the false colour of a love for his country, at the same time dictating schemes of politicks to his superiors; and under the disguise of a zealot, imposing scandalous notions of Religion on the world: All this I could not bear. And I profess, that neither a view of interest, nor any hopes of pleasing or displeasing the great, made me expose, in this manner, the numerous falsities and aburdities in his book (8).'

[G] An Account of a Manuscript. In this Account, page 2, our Author informs us, that he wrote a paper in the form of a Dialogue between two Scholars; whereof one was to personate a Whig, and the other a Tory. The Whig being supposed to know what reasons would most affect the Tory, endeavours to prove it his interest to change sides; the other, by arguments drawn from the wretched management, and weak conduct of some then in power, shewing they took no step but what was to the prejudice of their own side, pretends to prove, that the Government, if other measures were not taken, could not long subsist; or, what was next to it, must throw itself into Tory hands for protection.

(6) P. 6, 7. of the Nation vindicated &c.

(7) See Mr Des Maizeaux, Preface to Recueil de diverses pieces sur la philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Histoire, les Mathematiques, &c. par Messieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres auteurs celebres. Amsterdam, 1722, two Vols. in 12mo.

(8) At the end of this piece is the following advertisement: Speedily will be published, An Account of the Learned and Political Qualifications of Dr M—w T—nd—l, from Memoirs of his Club, with a faithful Catalogue of the Pamphlets he has written, and those he intends to write; dedicated to A. C. Esq; strict Union between all who love the Protestant Government and Protestant Religion: written at the desire of R—— W——, Esq; and left with him, at his request; but since exposed, contrary to his promise, with Aspersions on the Author of the Defection. In this pamphlet the Doctor denies the fact of having changed the person characterized, and charges this antagonist with the basest treachery in betraying a secret, which, from the narrative he here gives of that transaction, was the effect of former mutual confidence and friendship (s). Notwithstanding this, in 1721, and the two following years, he entered the lists in defence of Mr Walpole's measures (who was then at the head of the Ministry) against the attacks of the Author of Cato's Letters in the London Journal [H]; and 1727 he published a pamphlet, with this title, Corah and Moses: being the substance of a Discourse on those words, I have not taken one ass from them, neither have I hurt one of them; where he gives the highest encomiums to the same Gentleman, under the character of Moses, 'whose personal accomplishments, he observes, were so great, that the Rabbies say, even the Egyptian faction, who hated the Minister, yet loved the Man; and it is plain from Scripture, his post did not elevate him, but he preserved his humility, being easy of access to all, and treating the meanest with the greatest affability; and therefore he is called meek above all men which are upon the face of the earth.' Mr Anthony Collins, Esq; having published, the year following, his scheme of Literal Prophecy considered, the Bishop of London, Dr Gibbon, wrote his first Pastoral Letter to the people of his Diocese, occasioned (as the Author expressly declares) by some late writings in favour of Infidelity. In return to this, Dr Tindal published, in 1728, An Address to the Inhabitants of the two great Cities of London and Westminster, in relation to a Pastoral Letter, said to be written by the Bishop of London to the people of his Diocese, &c.; and upon the Bishop's writing a second Pastoral Letter, our Author published a Second Address (t) —. In 1730 came out his grand Work, intitled, Christianity as old as the Creation: or the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature; which being immediately attacked by Dr Waterland, our Author the same year published a Second Edition of his Second Address to the Inhabitants &c. with Remarks on [Dr Waterland's book, intitled] Scripture Vindicated [I], and some other late writings. Not long

(s) An account of a manuscript, &c. p. 1, 2, & seq.

(t) It was reprinted with alterations and additions the same year, in 8vo.

'The Dialogue (which at first had not near so many things in it, and yet had been seen by some great men) when it was enlarged, I sent, says he, to Mr W—— with this compliment, that he might see what his enemies said of him, and what his friends expected from him.' After this, at Mr W——'s invitation; he waited upon him, when that Gentleman, he says, having expressed himself upon the subject of occasional conformity, and the reformation of the Universities, much to our Author's mind, told him, that if he was at leisure, he would have him put his thoughts, with relation to the deficiencies among the great men, in writing, and shew it him; saying, it would be for his private satisfaction; or to that purpose. 'Upon which, continues he, I drew up an incorrect, unfinished piece, intitled, Defection &c. and the first opportunity I had, put it into Mr W——'s hands, who neither read it before me, nor ever returned it. What shews, that he thought when he had got this manuscript he had wherewith to hinder me from printing the Dialogue, is, that as soon as it was in his possession, though a considerable while before he quitted his posts, all the correspondence I had with him, was wholly lost; he dropped me with this cold compliment: that I need not give myself the trouble to come to him till he sent for me.' Thus, says our Author, have I given the secret history of a correspondence which did not last long, it not beginning till some months after the King went abroad, and ending as before mentioned.'

[H] He defended Sir Robert Walpole's measures against Cato's letters in the London Journal.] The titles of the pamphlets he wrote on this occasion are: 1. The Judgment of Dr Prideaux in condemning the murder of Julius Cæsar, by the conspirators, as a most villainous act, maintained, and the sophistry of the London Journal of December the 2d and 9th exposed, with some political remarks on the Roman government. Lond. 1721, in 8vo. 2. A defence of our present Happy Establishment, and the Administration, vindicated from the falsehood and malice of several late treasonable Libels, viz. Cato's letters in the London Journal, and the Historical Account of the advantages of the Hanover Succession, &c. Lond. 1722, in 8vo. 3. An Enquiry into the Causes of the present disaffection; as also into the necessity of some standing forces; the power of Judges and Juries in relation to Libels; and the Justice of the Additional tax on the Papists and Popish Recusants; with Remarks on the Dissolution of standing armies, and other Papers of Cato the Journalist. London, 1723, in 8vo.

[I] Remarks on Dr Waterland's book, intitled, Scripture Vindicated] That Christianity as old as the Creation was at least artfully wrote, is incontestibly evident from the foils which many of its Oppugners suffered in attacking it. For instance, Dr Waterland sets out thus, in his Introduction: 'His [Dr Tindal's] attacks are feeble, his artillery contemptible; he has no genius or taste for literature, no acquaintance with the original languages, nor so much as with common criticks or commentators; several of his objections are pure English objections, such as affect only our translation: the rest are of the lowest and most trifling sort.' And in the body of the book he calls him fool and idiot, who had neither wit, judgment, learning, or any thing else but dull malice, p. 31, 95. 'If this be really the case, says another Assailant (9), what is all this bustle about, why all this Apparatus to foil so feeble, so contemptible an Adversary. Why must two Eminent Scholars be picked out from (10) Oxford and Cambridge to divide the task between them, and repel, with united force, the despicable attacks of a poor English blunderer. All this Apparatus must needs persuade us, that you have a different notion of his ability from what you think proper to declare: and, in fact, as all who talk extravagantly or insincerely are apt to betray themselves, so you in many places confute yourself, and shew, that these pure English objections, which owe their rise, as you would insinuate, to the blunders of our translation, deserve to be considered in another light; since at some times you exclaim against them as being stale, or borrowed from antiquity, from the ancient enemies of religion, Celsus and Julian; at other times from our learned moderns, Marsham and Burnet, &c. and do not so much as in one single instance prove them to be grounded on the mistaken sense of the original. For my own part, continues he, to observe our English proverb, and give the Devil his due, I cannot for my life discover any such want of literature as you object to him; but, on the contrary, see plainly, that his work has been the effect of much study and reading; his materials collected from a great variety of the best writers; his pages decently crowded with citations; and his index of authors as numerous as that of most books which have lately appeared: and, to tell you the truth, were it my task to answer him in the method you have chosen, by undertaking to vindicate every single text of Scripture from all the exceptions that may be made to it, I should be tempted to wish that he had less learning rather than more; since, with the small share he has, one may easily foresee, by the specimen you give us, that he will in many cases be at least a full match for you.' This he proceeds to confirm in several instances, as in the history of the fall of man, of circumcision, and the confusion of tongues at Babel. But here he suffered a like foil to that of his immediate Antagonist,

(9) Dr Conyer's, Middleton, in a letter wrote this year to Dr Waterland, containing some remarks on his vindication &c.

(10) Middleton's works, Vol. II. Edit. 1752, 4to. Besides this by Dr Waterland, another answer was published to Dr Tindal's book by Dr John Conybear, Dean of Christ-church in Oxford, intitled, A Defence of Revealed Religion against the Exceptions of a late Writer, in his book, intitled, Christianity as old as the Creation. To whom may be added Mr James Foster, in his Usefulness, Truth, and Excellency of the Christian revelation defended; and Mr John Lealand, in his Answer to Christianity as old as the Creation, Dublin, in 2 Vols, 8vo.

after this, the Doctor began to sink under the infirmities of old age, and a few days before his death, being prevailed upon to remove from his chambers in Gray's-Inn to lodgings in Cold-Bath Fields (u), he expired there on the 16th of August, 1733, being then Senior Fellow of All-Soul's College; which was the only preferment he ever had. He had been long afflicted with the stone, and his body being opened (w), according to his own request, there was found in the gall-bladder, a stone of the size of a chefnut, and in the ductus choliodocus another stone, which, though of a smaller size, was big enough to prevent the passage of any gall, and thereby became the immediate cause of his dissolution. After the opening, his body was wrapt in a sheet of fine lead, and preserved for a week, during which, two molds were taken from his face by Mr Riefbrach, the Statuary, to make a bust of him. On Thursday, August 23, his remains were conveyed from Cold-Bath Fields in a hearse, attended by three mourning coaches, to Clerkenwell Church, and interred, according to his desire, near those of Dr Burnet, late Bishop of Salisbury. The corpse was followed only by Eustace Budgell, Esq; (x), who, by the tenor of the Doctor's last will [K], was appointed (u) By the persuasions of Mr Budgell, who hired the lodgings near his own house. A copy of the will of Dr Tindal, &c. 1733. 8vo. p. 22.

(w) By Mr Small, a Surgeon, who with Dr Dodd, a Physician, and formerly Fellow of All-Soul's College, attended the Doctor in his last illness. Id. p. 20.

(x) Id. p. 22.

(†) See Dr Middleton's article.

* Uniform darkness.

(11) Pope's Essay on man, Ep. 3. in the note to line 111. For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight.

(12) This servant, in excuse for not sending to Mr Tindal during his Uncle's illness, said, that Mrs Price assured her, that his Uncle had left him all, except a small legacy to Mr Budgell; which story she believed, and therefore thought there was no occasion to send for him. She also told him, that, in his illness, his Uncle wrote a letter to him, which was never carried to the post. A copy of the will of Dr Matthew Tindal, 1733.

(13) The word [thing] is omitted in the original.

(14) Mr Budgell's servant.

(15) Judge Price's Relist, who, in a letter to Mr Tindal, dated the day of his Uncle's death, first informed him thereof, as also that his Uncle's will was in her hands. A copy of the will of Dr M. Tindal, &c. printed for T. Cooper in 1733, 8vo.

and run into some unwarranted interpretations of Scripture, which drew him into further disputes, that ended not to his reputation (+). It is pleasant enough to hear Mr Warburton, the present Bishop of Gloucester, upon this subject. Having mentioned the controversy between Dr Waterland and Mr Jackson upon the Trinity, he proceeds thus: 'The worst is, that such kind of Writers seldom know when to have done. For, writing themselves up into the same delusion with their Readers, they are apt to venture out into the more open paths of literature, where their reputation, made out of that stuff which Lucan calls *Σκότος ἰλόχρους, presently falls from them; and their nakedness appears; and thus it fared with our two worthies. The world, which must have always something to amuse it, was now in good time grown weary of its play-thing, and caught at a new object that promised them more agreeable entertainment. Tindal, a kind of bastard Socrates, had brought our speculations from heaven to earth, and, under pretence of advancing the antiquity of Christianity, laboured to undermine its original. This was a controversy that required another management. Clear sense, severe reasoning, a thorough knowledge of profane and sacred antiquity, and an intimate acquaintance with human nature, were the qualities proper for such as engaged on this subject: a very unpromising adventure for these metaphysical nurslings, bred up under the shade of chimæras. Yet they would needs venture out. What they got by it was only to be once laughed at, and then forgotten. But one odd circumstance deserves to be remembered, that though they wrote not, we may be sure, in concert, yet each attacked his adversary at the same time, fastened upon him in the same place, and mumbled him with just the same toothless rage (11).'

[K] His will.] It was drawn up in these terms: I Matthew Tindal do make this my last will and testament in manner following: I give and bequeath unto my servant Hannah Anthony (12), if she live with me at the time of my decease, the sum of fifty pounds ten shillings; and also I give and bequeath unto Eustace Budgell, Esq; the sum of two thousand one hundred pounds, that his great talents may serve his country. I give and bequeath unto the widow Lucy Price the translation of Rapin's history of England, in fifteen volumes, by my nephew Tindal. I give and bequeath unto Eustace Budgell, Esq; my strong box, my diamond ring, and all my manuscript books, papers, and writings; and I do hereby desire the said Eustace Budgell to print the second part of Christianity as old as the creation, and also my other works collected in a volume, of which I will give him a list, if I should not live to print them myself. And I do hereby make the said Eustace Budgell my executor, to the end that no other person whatsoever may have any power over, or have any (†) to do with my said books, papers, and writings. And I do make my nephew, Nicholas Tindal, my residuary Legatee and my Executor; and I do hereby revoke all former wills by me made. In witness whereof I do hereunto put my hand and seal this seventh day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-three. Mat. Tindal.

Signed, sealed, and published in the presence of Margaret Leigh (13).
Samuel Tuckey (14).
Mr Tindal, upon reading this paper, which was delivered to him by Mrs Lucy Price (15) in the presence of

Mr Budgell, suspected it on many accounts; namely, for the stile, so different from his Uncle's; for the strange expression concerning Mr Budgell; for the omission of a word; for being all writ with Mrs Price's own hand, and witnessed by Mr Budgell's footman and the woman of the house, whose lodgings were recommended and hired for the Doctor by Mr Budgell; but more particularly for the extravagant legacy, so contrary to what his Uncle had lately told him, to his frequent and express declarations to him and his friends, and to his real will, witnessed by Gentlemen who were ready to attest it, and perused by a friend of the Doctor's about six weeks before. As Mr Tindal was expressing his surprize at this legacy, Mr Budgell steps up and tells him, he must not think he had all this money to pay; for the Doctor had lent him 1000l. upon bond and judgment. Accordingly, upon opening his Uncle's strong box, (which was also delivered to him by Mrs Price) he found Mr Budgell's single bond of 1000l. but all the other things in it amounted to no more than about the value of 60l. (16). This put him upon further search after the Doctor's effects; to which purpose going to Mess. Snow and Pultocks, the Doctor's bankers, he was told, that the Doctor had not been possessed, at least for many years, of more than 100l. Bank stock, and 1800l. South-sea stock. That on June 2, 1732, Mr Snow sold for him 1000l. South-sea stock, and paid him in Bank notes; and on June 20, 1733, he sold for him the remaining 800l. South-sea stock, and heard him say afterwards, he had lent his money upon bond. These circumstances increased Mr Tindal's suspicions of foul play. He could not believe that his Uncle would in his senses give more than he was worth in one legacy, and then formally appoint him a residuary Legatee, as well as Executor. Wherefore he resolved to contest the will; but however would first see what was become of the 1000l. received by the Doctor of Mr Snow the 2d of June, 1732; for as to the other 800l. stock, sold June 20, 1733, Mr Budgell's bond being of the same date, it was plain he had received it, as indeed he confessed. In this further search at the Bank he found there the aforesaid notes, all endorsed with these words, Budgell, June 3, BB; which BB appeared to be the mark of a servant of Sir Francis Child and Company, to whom the Bank notes were paid by Mr Budgell the 3d of June, 1732, and for which he took promissory notes of Sir Francis Child and Company, payable to Eustace Budgell, Esq; or order. When Mr Tindal acquainted Mr Budgell, at Mrs Price's, that the Doctor was never possessed of more than 1900l. stock, they both shewed some concern, but said they knew nothing of the 1000l. stock, sold by the Doctor, June 2, 1732, nor had ever seen, or heard the Doctor speak of, any Bank notes relating to the same, nor knew any thing of his lending such a sum, upon bond or other security. However, upon Mr Tindal's proposing to renounce the will, if Budgell would agree to give him the Doctor's goods (17) and the 100l. Bank stock, it was agreed, upon articles, that he should have immediate possession of the goods, and also 145l. on condition he could trace the lost 1000l. Mr Tindal, having secured the goods, told Mr Budgell he had traced the 1000l. in the manner above mentioned into his pocket, and therefore demanded performance of the articles. And, upon telling him the particulars, Budgell, after many other baffled subterfuges, owned that he had borrowed the money of the Doctor upon bond, but had repaid it, and torn the bond (18). And at last, at the instance of Mrs Price (19), he transferred the stock to Mr Tindal, as soon as the will was proved. Budgell, at the proving of it, took the usual

(16) As Mr Tindal knew the Doctor's true will was kept in the strong box, he asked them if they had seen it, or knew what was become of it; Mrs Price answered, she knew nothing of it.

(17) They were appraised at 51l. besides the remainder of a bond from Mr Tindal's father to the Doctor, amounting to 26l. which Mr Budgell gave up, p. 16.

(18) Mr Tindal intimated that this was not probable, and insisted, since Budgell had owned the receipt of the money, upon his proving how he was discharged of it.

(19) She insisted upon it with an oath. For, says she, who brought you first acquainted with the Doctor, was it not I? Is not all this my doing? I fay you shall comply. Id. p. 20.

appointed his testamentary heir, having before got possession of his fortune (y), in prejudice of his nephew, and heir at law, the Reverend Mr Nicholas Tindal, the Translator and Continuator of Rapin's History of England.

(y) Thus our Deist's vanity, and conceit of his own parts, delivered him up a prey to the greater vanity and villany of Mr Budgell.

(21) Peerage of England, Vol. V. p. 292, 293. Edit. 1756.

usual oath; but Mr Tindal, in renouncing it, refused to swear he believed it to be the Doctor's will; and afterwards contending it at Law, the will was set aside. But he never recovered the 1000l. or any part of it, notwithstanding Mr Curl assured him (20), that Lord Orrery was an Obligee in the bond with Mr Budgell. But this information, which was not made till 1734, happened, if true, to come a little too late, his Lordship having expired on the 28th of August the preceding year (21).

TOLAND [JANUS JUNIUS]. This was his true name, though he lost it at school, where his Master (a) first ordered him to be called John, which he himself retained ever after, the other being only used by him as a disguise (b). He was born November the 30th, 1678 (c), upon a peninsula, vulgarly called Enisowen (d), in the province of Ulster in Ireland, and descended of an ancient family in that Kingdom (e). He was put to school at Redcastle near Londonderry (f), and bred in the Roman Catholic Faith (g), all his relations being in that Communion; but as he was a boy of forward parts, he early shook off the superstition of his ancestors, and even before he was sixteen years of age, had grown into a warm zeal against Popery. Wherefore, having acquired a competent stock of grammar learning at school, he went from thence, in 1681, to Glasgow in Scotland, where he continued three years (h), after which he made a visit to the University of Edinburgh; and having gone through the statutable examinations with great applause there, on the 30th of June, 1690, he was created Master of Arts. Upon the 22d of July following he received the usual diploma (i), with which he returned to Glasgow, where he staid only a few days, till he could procure a proper testimonial of his Religion and Loyalty (j) from the Magistrates of that town, as he had before done of his learning and morals from the Professors of Edinburgh [A]. Thus furnished, after some small deliberation (k), he determined to go to England. Here joining with the Dissenters, he recommended himself to some good families of that persuasion, in which he lived about two years. During his residence amongst them, a remarkable book, intitled, Gospel Truth stated and vindicated, was published in 1692, by Mr Daniel Williams, a celebrated Dissenting Minister. This piece being greatly liked by our young Student in Divinity, he sent it to the Author of the Bibliothèque Universelle (l), whom he desired to give an abstract of it, acquainting him with the history of the dispute which had occasioned it to be wrote [B].

(a) His school-fellows made a jest of it, as he was called in the school-roll every morning. Life of John Toland by Des Maizeux, prefixed to the first volume of his Posthumous Works, in two volumes, 8vo. 1747.

(c) See note [EE].

(f) This city stands upon the isthmus of the forementioned peninsula. Hist. of the Druids, ibid. ubi supra.

(i) See note [A].

(k) It appears by his diploma, in note [A], that he told the Edinburgh Professor, his intentions were to return to Ireland.

About

[A] A certificate of his learning from the Professors at Edinburgh. As the form of such a diploma is rarely to be met with, we shall give a copy of it. Universis et singulis ad quos presentes Literæ pervenient, Nos Universitatis Jacobi Regis Edinburgensæ Professores, salutem in Domino sempiternam precamur: Unaque testamur, ingenium hunc bonæ spei juvenem magistrum Johannem Toland Hibernum, moribus, diligentia, et laudabili successu, se nobis ita approbasse, ut post editum Philosophici profectus Examen, solenni more Magister in Artibus Liberalibus renunciaretur in Comitibus nostris laureatis anno salutis millesimo sexcentesimo & nonagesimo, trigesimo die Junii. Quapropter non dubitamus eum nunc a Nobis in patriam redeuntem, ut egregium adolescentem, omnibus quos adire vel quibuscum versari contigerit de meliori nota commendare, sperantes illum (optulante divina gratia) literis bisce testimonialibus fore abunde responsurum. In quorum fidem inclita civitas Edinburgum, Academia hujus Parens & Altrix, sigillo suo publico literas singraphis nostris porro confirmari jussit. Alexander Monro, S. S. T. D. Professor Primarius. Ja. Strahan, S. S. T. D. ejusdemque Professor. D. Gregorie Math. P. J. Herbertus Kennedy, P. P. J. Drummond, H. L. P. Tho. Burnet, Ph. P. Robertus Henderfon, B. & Academia ah Archivis &c.

That from Glasgow is as follows:

We the Magistrates of Glasgow undersubscribing, do hereby testify and declare to all whom these presents may concern, that the bearer, John Toland, Master of Arts, did reside here for some years as a Student at the University in this citie, during which tyne, he behaved himself as one true Protestant, and loyal subject; as witnesses our hands, at Glasgow, the penult day of July, one thousand six hundred and ninetie yeares. And the common seale of office of the said citie is hereunto affixt.

L. S. John Leeck, George Nisbit (1).

[B] Acquainting him with the history of the dispute which occasioned it. The whole title of Mr Williams's (2) book runs thus: Gospel Truth stated and vindicated; wherein some of Dr Crisp's notions are considered, and the opposite truths plainly stated and confirmed. It was occasioned by the republication of Dr Crisp's Works, about two years before, which had revived a controversy that Mr Williams had made himself famous for managing against the Antinomian Principles, which then were breaking in, with great impetuosity, among the Presbyterians. This new impression of sermons appearing (at a time when the Socinian Controversy was very hotly agitated) with additions, and twelve names of the Presbyterian and Independent Ministers prefixt to honour it, spread the Antinomian Principles to such a degree, that the more sober of the Presbyterian Ministers were not able to preach a sermon, wherein either hope was asserted by conditional promises, or the fear of sin pressed by the divine threatenings, but they were immediately censured and condemned as enemies of Christ, and of free grace; and especially were cried out upon violently by many of the Anabaptists and Independents: nay, one of them preaching at Pinners-Hall that repentance was necessary to the remission of sins, that pulpit was soon filled with the hardest censures against the Presbyterians. These proceedings incited some of the most zealous among them, called the United Brethren, to consider of some proper expedient to obviate the growth of those errors, the revival whereof, they concluded, would make their Ministry useles, and unity impossible. And Dr Crisp's book being found to be the chief source of this evil, at their request Mr Williams undertook therefore to confute it. This he did, first, in a sermon at Pinners-Hall, and afterwards in the treatise above mentioned, which was published in May, 1692, with the approbation of Dr Bates, Mr Horve, Mr Alsop, Mr Shower (3), and a dozen more of the Dissenting Ministers, wherein they did not only attest the right stating of truth and errors therein, but recommended it as a considerable service to the Church of Christ, and as a means for the reclaiming of those who have been misled into such dangerous opinions, and for the establishing any that waver in any of those truths. But upon the coming forth of this treatise, it was observed, that such a furious zeal against the Author and his book broke out, as had almost overfet the United Brethren, with their union: for in October following, a paper was delivered unto the said Brethren, subscribed by six Dissenting Ministers, importing a high and heavy charge against the Author and his work. However, the objections being looked upon, either as frivolous, or groundless, and some of the citations to be quite contrary to the letter of his expressions pretended to be cited, were thought

(3) This Gentleman was a particular friend of Mr Toland, both now, and long after he left the Dissenters. He sent the Memorial of the State of England, in 1705, to him for his approbation, which Mr Toland set a great value upon. See Miscellaneous Works, ubi supra, Vol. II. p. 356.

(o) In the Declaration to him his Uncle's Law concerning the laws of Nations and the rights of Sovereigns, dated Oct. 18, 1734.

(p) To the Preface of his Pantheisticon, mentioned in the sequel, he subscribes this name for that purpose.

(q) See note [P].

(r) Its ancient name is Inis Eoin. See Toland's specimen of the History of the Druids, in a note, p. 8. in the first volume of his Posthumous Works.

(s) Christianity of mysterious, viii, ix.

(t) Apology for Mr Toland, 46.

(u) It is inserted in Tomes XXIII. p. 505. where he is called Student in Divinity.

Dabamus in supradicto Atheneo Regio 22do die Julii, anno 1690. Christianæ. [L. S.]

(1) Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Mr John Toland: by Mr Des Maizeux, prefixed to Toland's Miscellaneous Works, Vol. I. p. vii, viii, ix.

(2) This Mr Daniel Williams may be said to have succeeded Mr Baxter in the management of this dispute.

About this time, several of the most eminent of these Protestants conceiving great hopes from his uncommon parts, he went, by their encouragement, to perfect his studies at Leyden, where he was supported by them near two years (m). After his return to England, he presently went to Oxford (n), having procured letters of recommendation [C] to Mr Creech of All-Souls College, Dr Mill, Principal of Edmund-Hall, Mr White Kennet, then a Member of that Hall, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, and several other learned Members of that University. Upon the credit of these Gentlemen, he got sworn and admitted in the regular form into the Bodleian Library, in January 1693-4 (o). Having procured this favour, he did not neglect to make his own use of it, and prosecuted his intended studies very industriously [D]. But he had not been here long before some religious notions, openly advanced, and warmly maintained by him in the coffee-houses, were taken notice [E] of; whereupon he drew up a formal Confession of his Faith [F], which giving some satisfaction, he

(m) See his Life, ubi supra, p. ix.

(o) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 292, 293.

(n) He was there in December 1691. See his Posthumous Miscellanies, ubi supra, Vol. I. p. 205.

thought not deserving to be taken notice of. Notwithstanding, Dr Chauncey, one of the Subscribers, in a meeting of the United Ministers, declared, that he would break off from their Union, because they had taken no cognizance of this Paper of Objections; and the opposition was carried on so far by that party, particularly by Mather and Lob, two Independents, that when other ways, as that of writing against Williams, were found unsuccessful, a person was appointed more narrowly to examine his books, and to collect out of them what errors he could discover; and accordingly another Paper of Objections was drawn up against him: and whereas, in the former paper there was not one word tending to the charge of Socinianism; upon this fresh examination, that was now thought proper to be added to the weight of other exceptions against him. After some time, the matter was referred, by both sides, to Dr Stillingfleet, Bishop of Worcester, who gave the world a true state of both these controversies; wherein he cleared Mr Williams (as well as Mr Baxter) from the charge of Socinianism. After this Mr Lob and his brethren being better reconciled to Mr Williams, he, at their request, printed a small pamphlet, representing the true state of the Principles of the more sober Independents, intitled, An End of Discord. And thus ended this controversy among the Dissenters (4), of which we thought it not amiss to give this account, as it serves to let us see by what means Mr Toland procured those recommendations, mentioned in the text, which he at this time carried to Oxford.

(4) See Nelson's Life of Bishop Bull, p. 259, & seq. Lond. 1713. in 8vo.

(5) Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 292.

[C] He carried letters of recommendation. In a letter (5) which he wrote soon after his arrival to a Gentleman who was concerned in procuring these recommendations, he writes thus: 'I lie under great obligations to the Gentlemen who recommended me, both for the advantageous character they were pleased to bestow upon me, and the suitable reception I met with. Mr Creech, in particular, has been extraordinary civil to me, and did me the honour to recommend three or four of the most ingenious men in the University to my acquaintance, who accordingly visited me. The like did Dr Mill and Mr Kennet—I beg you to acquaint Mr Freke with the contents, whose care and favour I shall always endeavour to deserve, looking upon him as the primum mobile of my happiness. I forget to tell you Mr Creech is publishing Lucretius in Latin, with a paraphrase (6) and commentary, and Manilius in English verse, which will be nothing inferior to Lucretius. Dr Mill has already communicated his Testament to me, and others have already sent me several books I only enquired after, without any design of making bold so soon to borrow; all which I attribute to the respect they owe their friends. I am conveniently and pretty reasonably lodged at Mr Bodington's, over-against All-Souls College.'

(6) It was not published till 1695, and the Manilius came out some time after.

[D] He followed his studies industriously. He collected materials upon various subjects, and composed some small pieces. To the end of his Specimen of a History of the Druids is subjoined a catalogue of some old Armoican British words, which he supposes to be Irish, chiefly from their affinity in pronunciation, at the head of which he has these words: 'Catalogus vocum quarundam Armoricarum quas Hibernicas esse deprehendi, quasque ex libello, quem mihi mutuo dedit Cl. & Rev. Dominus Dominus Jo. Millius, S. S. T. in Academia Oxoniensi P. ibidemque Aula Sanctæ Edmundanæ Principalis, collegi & desumpsi.' This is followed with a short introduction, which is dated thus: 'Oxonix 19 Decembris anno a Christo nato 1693 (7).' In this Specimen, p. 4, he says he formed the design of writing that history at Oxford, and he mentions Mr Aubrey (afterwards Author of the Natural History and Antiquities of Surrey) as one of his acquaintance there, who was of great assistance to him, p. 112.

(7) See Specimen of the History of the Druids, in the first volume of his Miscellaneous Works, p. 204, 205.

In his Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 28, et seq. there is a piece intitled, The Fabulous Death of Attilius Regulus: or a Dissertation proving the received History of the Tragical Death of Marcus Attilius Regulus, the Roman Consul, to be a Fable (8). This is dated Oxon. Aug. 6, 1694; and Mr Toland owns, that the hint for enquiring into this subject was, though undesignedly, given him by an acquaintance there. He was led to the discovery by a note in Palmerius upon the same subject in a note upon Appion (9).

(8) The Abbé Vertot has related this as a fact in his Revolutions of the Roman Republic.

(9) A piece intitled, Observationes in optimos fere Authores Græcos.

[E] Some religious notions were taken notice of. He received a letter, dated May 4, 1694 (10), from an unknown hand, which begins thus: 'Mr Toland, The character you bear in Oxford is this; that you are a man of fine parts, great learning, and little Religion. Whether or no this be your just character, I cannot say; but this I can say, and am assured of, that if it be, it is your highest interest to reflect seriously upon the matter, and to endeavour betimes to deserve a better. This is the whole occasion of my writing to you, and I intreat you to receive it as it is meant—Popular esteem, the applauses of a coffee-house, or a club of prophane wits, are mean unworthy ends—Believe me, I am concerned for your sake: methinks it is ten thousand pities, that any one should freely choose to be eternally wretched, or but moderately happy, into whose hands God hath put the means of purchasing an exceeding weight of glory; and whom he seems to have designed to be a vessel of honour.'—The same person, in another (11) letter, dated May 30, has these words: 'It is said, that you are now publishing a piece with an intent to shew, that there is no such thing as a mystery in our Religion.'

(10) Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 295, & seq.

(11) Ibid. p. 312

[F] He drew up a system of his Faith. After having declared his belief of the immortality of the soul, and a future retribution, he goes on, 'I must therefore be necessarily of some Religion, and I presume you will readily acknowledge it to be the Christian, when I assure you, that, I. I firmly believe the existence of an infinitely good, wise, and powerful Being, which in our language we call God, substantially different from the universe he created, and continues to govern by his Providence, of whom, through whom, and to whom are all things. II. Concerning Christ in particular, that he is God manifest in the Flesh, or True God and Man, perfectly united, without contrariety of will, or confusion of essence. As to his human nature, that according to the Prophets, he was born of a pure virgin, conceived by virtue of the Divine Spirit, and therefore ever free from all the sinful disorders of fallen man. That he rose from the dead the third day after he was crucified by the Jews, and forty days after ascended into heaven, from whence I expect his coming at the last day to judge me and all the world: and that when he was on earth, he not only by his life gave us a perfect example, and by his doctrine an infallible rule of all that we are to do, suffer, and hope; but also by the sacrifice of his death, reconciled to Mercy, all such as do the will of his Father, particularly those that believe his word, imitate his works, and accept his intercession. That as well the holy adult, deceased before his passion, as children dying before the use of reason, are delivered from death by his merits; so that none can be saved without a Mediator. And lastly, that he is the only Ruler and Legislator of the Church. III. I believe we are sanctified by the Divine Spirit, who worketh in us and with us, who directs and perfects us. I acknowledge the purity, excellence, and obligation of all the evangelical precepts, as they are comprehended under these three heads, to live temperately, justly, and piously; to love God above all things, and my neighbour as myself. This is the he proceeded in composing his grand Work against 'the Christian Mysteries.' However, he did not stay at the University till he had compleated his design, but going to London the following year, he finished and published it there in 1696, under the title of Christianity not Myste- rious: or a Treatise shewing that there is nothing in the Gospel contrary to reason, nor above it, and that no Christian Doctrine can be properly called a Mystery. Every body was alarmed at the boldness of this attempt: our Author thereby raised himself a crowd of adversaries among Christians of all denominations [G], and his book was even presented by the Grand Jury of Middlesex (p). In the midst of this clamour against him in England, our Author took a trip into his native country, where he arrived in the beginning of April the ensuing year (q). But here he met with much worse fare; for his book being got to Dublin before him, he had scarcely set his foot there, when he heard himself warmly attacked from the pulpit, and in a little time it became so popular a subject, that it was even expected of course, as much as if it had been prescribed by the Rubric (r). In the mean time, his own indiscreet behaviour did not a little contribute to exasperate the people [H]. Soon after his arrival, he made a visit to Mr William Molyneux, who received him with great politeness, and was much pleased with his conversation (s). But the general cry ran so strong against his book [I], that

(p) See his Life, p. 47.

(q) A Letter by Mr Molyneux to Mr Locke, dated April 6, 1697.

(r) Toland's A- pology, p. 4.

(s) Mr Moly- neux's Letter, ubi supra.

' sum of my assurance of Eternal Life; in hopes where- of, I am now writing this unfeigned confession of my Faith.' This letter is dated May the 7th, and in an- swer to it, his correspondent writes, May 30 follow- ing, that he acquiesces in these tokens of his sincerity (12).

[G] Raised himself antagonists among Christians of all denominations.] For instance, Mr Beverly, a Presbyte- rian Minister, put out a pamphlet, intitled, Christianity the great mystery, in answer to a late treatise, intitled, Christianity not mysterious, that is, not above nor con- trary to reason. In opposition to which it is asserted, Christianity is above created reason in its pure estate, and contrary to human reason as fallen and corrupted, and therefore, in a proper sense, mystery. Another came out, intitled The Christian belief, &c. in answer to a book, intitled, Christianity not mysterious. Mr Norris like- wise, in his Account of Reason and Faith in relation to the mysteries of Christianity, and Mr Elys, in a letter to Sir Robert Howard; Dr Payne, in some sermons preached at Cambridge; Dr Stillingfleet, Bishop of Wor- cester, in his Vindication of the Doctrines of the Trinity, &c. the Author of the Occasional Paper, No. III. Mr Miller, in his discourse of conscience; Mr Gailhard, in his book against the Socinians; Mr Synge, in his Appendix to The Gentleman's Religion; all animadverted upon it. We have the remarks also of the celebrated Mr Leibnitz, intitled, Annotatiunculae Substantiae ad librum de Christianismo mysteriis carente conscriptae, 8 Augusti, 1701 (13). On the other side Mr Des Maizeaux appears in our Author's defence. 'To affirm indeed, says he, that the Christian religion has no mysteries, or nothing above reason, must needs appear a strange paradox; but, as we ought not to be prejudiced, or frightened with words, let us examine our Author's intent and meaning. The word mystery is always used in the New Testament for a thing intelligible in itself, but which could not be known without special revelation. And, to prove this assertion, he examines all the passages of the New Testament where the word mystery occurs, and shews, first, that mystery is read for the Gospel, or Christian religion in general, as it was a dispensation totally hid from the Gentiles, and but very imperfectly known to the Jews: secondly, that some peculiar doctrines, occasionally revealed by the Apostles, are said to be manifested mysteries, that is, unfolded secrets: and thirdly, that mystery is put for any thing under parables or enigmatical forms of speech. And, to set this matter in a clearer light, he observes, that, as in the phenomena of nature we neither call mysteries those things which are perfectly unknown to us, nor those whereof we can have no adequate idea, the same way of speaking ought to be used in religious matters; since all the revealed truths of the Christian religion, which it is necessary and beneficial for us to know, can be made as clear and intelligible as natural things which come within our knowledge and comprehension; and that the case is parallel, he [Mr Toland] promised to shew in another work, and to give a particular and rational explication of the reputed mysteries of the Gospel. But he declares at the same time, that, if his Adversaries think fit to call a mystery whatever is either absolutely un- intelligible to us, or whereof we have but inadequate ideas, he is ready to admit as many mysteries in reli- gion as they please. So far you will say there is no great harm done: it is only a dispute about words. Indeed he pretends that he can give as clear an explanation of the mysteries of the Gospel as it is possible to give of the phenomena of nature; but do not our Divines do the same thing, in attempting to give a rational explanation of the Trinity, the greatest mys- tery of the Christian religion? Such explanations are the test of the soundness of their doctrine; and who knows but Mr Toland's explanation, had he given one, might have been orthodox? To all this it may be easily answered in a few words, that our Orthodox Divines (to use his own term) never pretend to give such a rational explanation of the Trinity as does not imply in it something above human reason: what then could hinder Mr Des Maizeaux from knowing, that Mr Toland's explanation, had he given one, could not have been orthodox? One would be apt to think, from this remark of Mr Des Maizeaux, that he had some reasons to know Mr Toland either was not thoroughly convinced himself, or else was capable, upon a proper occasion (14), of explaining away his own words, and construing above reason in a different sense to what he knew the Orthodox Divines understood by them. In this light indeed the dispute would be merely Verbal. But any such supposition sinks Mr Toland from a for- midable Opponent into an idle insignificant Trifler; which is not what he deserves. In this treatise, chapter the third, he expressly asserts, that many miracles were wrought by Christ; therefore there could be nothing above reason in his sense of the words, that is, above what reason teaches us concerning the force of the Divine power to controul the ordinary laws of nature by an extraordinary agency. In any explanation then that we can suppose him to have given of the reputed mysteries of Christianity, as in the instance now before us of the Trinity, so as not to be above reason, he must have represented it in such a manner, as to imply no- thing which reason does not teach us concerning the nature and attributes of the Divine Being: whereas, if I am not much mistaken, the Orthodox Divines (to keep to the same expression) maintain, that we are not able to conclude, from any thing which reason teaches, whether, what is revealed in the Gospel concerning this mystery, be compatible to the nature of the Deity or no.

[H] His indiscreet behaviour did not a little contribute to exasperate the people.] In a letter (15) writ to Mr Locke from Dublin by Mr Molyneux, that Gentleman, speaking of Mr Toland, expresses himself thus: 'To be free and without reserve to you, I do not think his management, since he came into this city, has been so prudent. He has raised against him the clamours of all parties, and this not so much by his difference in opinion, as by his unseasonable way of discoursing, propagating, and maintaining it. Coffee-houses and public tables are not proper places for serious discourses relating to the most important truths. But when also a tincture of vanity appears in the whole course of a man's conversation, it disgusts many that may other- wise have a due value for his parts and learning.'

[I] But the general cry ran so strong against him.] He was attacked by Mr Peter Brown (16), senior fellow of Trinity-College near Dublin, in a letter, in answer to a book, intitled, Christianity not mysterious, as also to all those who set up for reason and evidence in opposition to revelation and mystery. This letter, we are told, contributed very much to inflame all sorts of people against Mr Toland, who was represented by this Author as a most inveterate enemy to all religion, a Knight errant,

(14) In a letter, wherein Mr Toland is making his court to Mr Harley and Lord Godolphin, he has these words, You will wonder all this time that I have not men- tioned the Church, which is so much ex- asperated against me; but as that is the heaviest article, yet it is undoubtedly the easiest conquered, and I know the infallible method of doing it.

And, in a letter to Dr Tenison, Archbishop of Canterbury, he expressly pro- mises to reform his religion to that Prelate's liking. Ibid.

P. 357, 371. By a letter of Toland's to a Clergyman, ibid. P. 373, probably written near the same time (viz. 1706) with that to the Arch- bishop, it appears that he had re- ceived the Sacra- ment.

(15) It is datrd May 27, 1697, in Locke's Works, Vol. III.

(16) This Gen- tleman being af- terwards made Bishop of Cork, Mr Toland used to say, He had made him a Bishop. See his life, ubi supra, p. xx. The same Au- thor wrote a book against drinking of healths, which was pleasantly ridiculed by Dean Swift at a Mayor's feast in Dublin. That Magistrate drinking a health to him, he re- plied very loud, I drink no healths. See more of this Bishop in the Dean's article, Rem. [NN].

(12) Miscella- neous Works, Vol. II. p. 301, et seq.

(13) See the Ap- pendix to To- land's Miscella- neous works, p. 60. Vol. II.

the Grand Jury was solicited to present him for it, and to gain the readier compliance, the presentment of that of Middlesex was printed at Dublin, with an emphatical title, and cried about the streets. Accordingly, the last day of the term he was presented there in the Court of King's-Bench. The Jurors, however, did not ground their proceedings upon any particular passage in this book, most of them having never read it, and those that did, confessed they did not understand it (t). But the matter did not rest here, for in a few days after, the Lords Justices of that Kingdom landing from England, the Recorder of Dublin [Mr Hancock] in his congratulatory speech, begged their Lordships would protect the Church from all its enemies, particularly from the Tolandists (u). Agreeably thereto, the Parliament fell upon his book [K], voted it to be burnt by the common Hangman, and ordered the Author to be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and to be prosecuted by the Attorney-General at Law. Hereupon Mr Toland found it necessary, in the beginning of September, to withdraw himself out of Ireland [L], and to avoid the storm, he came into England just before the passing of that vote (w). It must be observed, that the Dissenters in Ireland were the chief promoters of all this prosecution [M], and as our Author had, by writing this book, lost the greatest part of his friends of that persuasion, so as soon as he got safe to London, he published an Apologetical Account (x) of the treatment he had met with in Ireland, wherein he spares neither the discipline nor worship of that sect, which he there renounces, and declares himself a Latitudinarian [N]. Our Author's fortune had been reduced to the lowest ebb before he es-

(x) It is intitled, An Apology for Mr Toland, in a Letter from himself to a Member of the House of Commons in Ireland; written the day before his book was resolved to be burnt by the Committee of Religion. To which is prefixed, a narrative, containing the occasion of the said Letter.

(t) Mr Molyneux's letter, dated July 20, this year.

(u) Apology, p. 7.

(w) A Letter of Mr Molyneux, ubi supra, dated September 11.

(17) In justice to our Author we must not omit to mention his translation into English, from the Italian, a discourse upon coins, by Signor Bernardo Davanzati, a gentleman of Florence, published by him this year, in the view of remedying the mischiefs arising from the wicked practice of clipping our coins.

one who openly affected to be the head of a sect, and designed to be as famous an impostor as Mahomet. He likewise calls in the aid of the Civil Magistrate, and delivers Mr Toland up to secular punishment (17).

[K] The parliament fell upon his book. On Saturday the 4th of August it was moved in the Committee of Religion, that the book, intitled, Christianity not mysterious, should be brought before them, and it was ordered accordingly to be done on the Saturday following. The Committee not sitting that day, the next Saturday, August 28th, there met a very full Committee, wherein this business was a great while debated: several persons, eminent for their birth, good qualities, or fortune, opposed the whole proceeding, being of opinion it was neither proper nor convenient for them to meddle with a thing of that nature. This being without much argument carried against them, they insisted, that the passages in the book which gave offence should be read, and then the Committee was adjourned to the 4th of September. That day several Gentlemen spoke to the objections made to some passages in the book, after which they urged, at Mr Toland's request, that he should be called to answer in person, to declare the sense of his book, and his design in writing it. Which being denied, a letter containing these declarations, received that morning from Mr Toland, was offered to be read by an honourable member, who went to the bar of the House for that purpose. But this was rejected, and the Committee came immediately to these resolutions; to which the House agreed, after some debate, on Thursday following, being the 9th of September, "That the book, intitled, Christianity not mysterious, containing several heretical doctrines, contrary to the Christian religion and the established church of Ireland, be publicly burnt by the hands of the common Hangman. Likewise that the Author thereof, John Toland, be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and be prosecuted by Mr Attorney-General for writing and publishing the said book. They ordered too, that an address should be made to the Lords Justices, to give directions, that no more copies of that book be brought into the kingdom, and to prevent the selling of those already imported." The sentence was executed on the book the Saturday following, viz. the 11th of September, before the Parliament-house gate, and also in the open street before the Town-house, the Sheriffs and all the Constables attending (18).

[L] He found it necessary to withdraw himself out of Ireland. The day that his book was burnt, Mr Molyneux wrote to Mr Locke (19) to acquaint him, that Mr Toland was driven out of the kingdom. 'The poor Gentleman, says he, by his imprudent management, had raised such an universal outcry, that it was even dangerous for a man to have been known once to converse with him. This made all men, wary of reputation, decline seeing him, insomuch that at last he wanted a meal's meat, (as I am told) and none would admit him to their tables. The little stock of money which he brought into this country being exhausted, he fell to borrowing from any one that would lend him half a crown, and run in debt for his wigs, cloaths, and lodging.'

[M] The Dissenters were the chief promoters of all this prosecution. In a letter, dated July 20, the same Gentleman informs Mr Locke of this, and says, when he asked one of that persuasion, What if a violent Church of England jury should present Mr Baxter's books as pernicious, and condemn them to the flames by the common Executioner? That Dissenter was sensible of the error, and said, He wished it had never been. Mr Molyneux, as appears from these letters, was very warm against these proceedings in the Irish parliament, where he himself sat (20). Nor does Mr Locke spare the Dissenters upon this occasion. In his answer to the aforesaid letter he writes, 'I think with you the Dissenters were best consider, that which is sauce for a goose is sauce for a gander; but they are a set of men that will always be the same.' Mr Toland, upon another occasion, gives us a character of some of his countrymen at this time, which he says discovers the original root of all this violent heat and fury against his book. 'When I was in Dublin, says he, in the year 1697, I walked out one day to the village of Finglafs, and overtook upon the way two gentlemen of the old Irish stock, with whom I had contracted some acquaintance at the coffee-house. They told me they were going a good way further, about a business of some importance; and not many minutes after one of them cried out with joy to the other, See Cousin! by heaven, matters will go well; pointing at the same instant to a Raven feeding and hopping hard by, which had a white feather or two in the wing that was towards us. The other appeared no less transported, nor would they stir, till they saw what way the Raven flew, which being to the South of them, and with a great noise, they were fully confirmed about the success of their business (21).'

[N] And declares himself a Latitudinarian. In answer to the imputation of being a rigid Nonconformist, Mr Toland says, "he will never deny but the real simplicity of the Dissenters worship, and the seeming equity of their discipline (into which, being so young, he could not distinctly penetrate) did gain extraordinarily upon his affections, just as he was newly delivered from the insupportable yoke of the most pompous and tyrannical policy that ever enslaved mankind, under the name or shew of religion. But, when greater experience and more years had a little ripened his judgment, he easily perceived that the differences were not so wide as to appear irreconcilable; or at least that men, who were found Protestants on both sides, should barbarously cut one another's throats, or indeed give any disturbance to the society about them: and as soon as he understood the late heats and animosities did not totally (if at all) proceed from a concern for meer religion, he allowed himself a latitude in several things that would have been matter of scruple to him before. That his travels (22) increased, and the study of ecclesiastical history perfected, this disposition, wherein he continues to this hour; for whatever his own opinion of those differences be, yet he finds so essential an agreement between the French, Dutch, English, Scotch, and other Protestants, that he is resolved never to lose the benefit of an instructive discourse in any of their churches upon that score; and

(20) He was chofe, with Cyril Wych, for Dublin, in 1692.

(21) Specimen of the history of the Druids, in the 1st Vol. of his Miscellanies, p. 141.

(22) After he left Leyden, he had travelled no where yet but to Oxford and Ireland.

(18) See Toland's Apology, p. 22, et seq.

(19) In a letter, dated Sept. 11, 1697.

caped from Ireland, so that he gladly embraced the opportunity which was thrown into his hands by the conjuncture in 1690 (y), of proposing a method to reform the militia, in a pamphlet in 8vo, intituled, Militia Reformed: or an easy scheme of furnishing England with a constant land-force, capable to prevent or subdue any foreign power; and to maintain perpetual quiet at home, without endangering the Public Liberty (z). There being a collection of Milton's Prose-works on foot about this time, Mr Toland was pitched upon to write the life of that celebrated Author. It was both prefixed to that collection published this year in folio, and likewise printed separately in 8vo, with this title, The Life of John Milton, containing, besides the History of his Works, several extraordinary characters of Men, of Books, of Sects, Parties, and Opinions. In this performance, he took occasion to enter into the controversy concerning the Author of Icon Basilike, and opposed the then generally received opinion, which had ascribed that Work to King Charles I; he does not scruple to stile the whole of that report, a notorious imposture, and from thence steps forward to declare his doubt, that the spuriousness of several books generally ascribed, either to Christ or his Apostles, or to some other great persons, was yet undiscovered through the remoteness of those ages, the death of the persons concerned, and the decay of their monuments, which might give us true informations (aa). As these assertions drew several adversaries (bb) upon him [O], he defended himself in a treatise, which for that reason he intituled, Amyntor, in which he gave a catalogue of such primitive books as he concluded to be spurious, and likewise a complete history of the Icon Basilike, in proof of his first assertion. The same year, 1699, in the spring, he made a trip to Holland (cc); soon after his return, the Duke of Newcastle, one of his Patrons and Benefactors (dd), having put into his hands a manuscript containing some Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, Baron of Ifield in Suffex (*), from the year 1641 to 1648; he published them by his Lordship's direction: and the following year, upon the encouragement of Mr Rober Harley, he reprinted Harrington's Oceana (ee) [P]. About the same time there appeared an anonymous satyrical pamphlet upon the Clergy, of which Mr Toland tacitly acknowledged himself the Author. It was intituled, Clito, a Poem [Q] on the Force of Eloquence. In the beginning of the year 1701, he published another pamphlet

(y) See the article MOYLE [WALTER]. After the peace of Ryfwic great disputes arose about the number of forces to be kept up. Life of King William III, p. 310, & seq.

(bb) For the last assertion, see the article BLACK-ALL [OFFSPRING] in note [B].

(dd) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 348.
(ee) There was a new edition printed in 1737, with an Appendix, containing also the polemical tracts omitted by Mr Toland.

it must be a civil not a religious interest that can engage him against any of these parties; not thinking all their private notions, wherein they disagree, worth disturbing, much less endangering, the public peace of a nation. If this, pursues he, makes a man a Nonconformist, then Mr Toland is one unquestionably (23).'

hath since furnished the substance of all the materials now extant of Milton's life, was literally taken from this manuscript. But Wood (says Mr Warton) has omitted some circumstances; one of which is, that Milton was actually whipped by Dr Thomas Bainbrige, Master of Christ's college, while he was at Cambridge. This explains more fully the following passage in one of Milton's elegies:

*Nec duri libet usque minas perferre magistri,
Ceteraque ingenio non fubeunda meo* (30).

(30) Eleg. lib. i. Eleg. 15.

[P] Upon the encouragement of Mr Robert Harley, he reprinted Harrington's Oceana.] In a memorial (31), addressed to that gentleman after he was Earl of Oxford, our Author gives us an account of the state of his own political principles, in which he assures his Lordship, that he means no more by liberty than a government of laws, and not of will, particularly our own excellent constitution of King, Lords, and Commons; yet without the Jure-divino-ship of the Prince, or the Passive Obedience of the Subject; the laws being to both an equal rule. As the Whigs mean no other Commonwealth, contrary to the furious and ill-affected part of the Tories; so I am persuaded, says he, many of the Tories are far from aiming at setting up irresistible power or indefeasible succession; contrary to the suggestions of some weak but well-meaning Whigs. The Papists and Jacobites are common enemies to both, and against these they must both join at last, or be ruined. Such a Commonwealth's-man I only approve, as your Lordship formerly was, when you encouraged me to reprint Harrington's Oceana, though neither of us imagined the model itself to be practicable. The whole title of this edition runs thus: The Oceana of James Harrington, and his other works, some whereof are now first published from his own manuscripts. The whole collected, methodized, and reviewed, with an exact account of his life prefixed by John Toland, in folio. In the preface to this, which is dated Nov. 30, 1699, he says, I am this present day beginning the 30th year of my age.

(31) It is dated Dec. 17, 1711, and printed in his Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 220, et seq.

[Q] Clito, a poem.] The Editor expressly ascribed it to Mr Toland, and moreover declares, that he is understood in the poem by Adeisidæmon, unsuperstitious. Mr Toland never openly denied either of these facts. Adeisidæmon undertakes to undeceive mankind in respect to some religious truths, and, having mentioned the great and surprizing things he can perform in these matters, proceeds thus:

Nor will I here desist; all holy cheats,
Of all religions, shall partake my threats;

Whether

(1) Toland, in his treatise, argues against a standing army.

(aa) The Life of John Milton, p. 92.

(cc) Here he visited Van Dale and Gravius. See Miscellanies, ubi supra, Vol. II. p. 333, 335.

(*) See his article, in remark [E].

(23) Apology, p. 18, 19.

(24) In the second edition of his Dictionary, published in 1702, article of Milton, note [N].

(25) The first edition was in 1693, and the second in 1697.

(26) P. 347.
(27) Biblioth. Græca, lib. 4. c. 5. § 15.

(28) In Dissertatione Critica de librorum. N. T. lectione rite investiganda, c. 1. § 2.

(†) Viz. this present year 1761.

(29) In Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 282.

pamphlet without his name, which he called, The Art of Governing by Parties [R]: he dedicated this book to the King, with this inscription; To William, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland: Stadtholder of Guelderland, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, and Over-Yssel: Supreme Magistrate of the two most potent and flourishing Commonwealths in the Universe. And soon after he put out Propositions for uniting the two East-India Companies [Dutch and English]: in a Letter to a Man of Quality, who desired the opinion of a Gentleman not concerned in either Company. In March following, he wrote two letters to Dr Hooper, Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, where his book, Christianity not Mysterious, and his Amyntor, were then under the consideration of a Committee. But this did not stop the proceedings of that house. They extracted five propositions out of the first, and in substance resolved, that in their judgment the said book contains pernicious principles, of dangerous consequence to the Christian Religion, written on a design (as they conceive) and tending to subvert the fundamental articles of the Christian Faith; that the positions extracted out of it, together with divers others of the same nature, are pernicious, dangerous, scandalous, and destructive of Christianity. This representation was sent up to the Upper House, who agreed with the other in their opinion of the book: however, after the most mature deliberations [S], it was there declared, that without a licence from the King, (which they had not yet received) they did not find how they could have sufficient authority to censure any such books. Several pamphlets came out on occasion of this difference between the two houses upon the extent of that Assembly's jurisdiction. In some of those that were written in favour of the Lower House, Mr Toland found such an account of Christianity not Mysterious, as he thought injurious to his character: for which reason he published Vindicius Liberius: or Mr Toland's defence of himself against the Lower House of Convocation; wherein, besides his Letters to the Prolocutor, certain passages of the book, intitled, Christianity not Mysterious, are explained, and others corrected, with a full and clear account of the Author's principles relating to Church and State, and a justification of the Whigs and Commonwealth's Men against all their opponents (ff). Upon the passing of the new Act of Succession, in June this year, 1701, occasioned by the death of the Duke of Gloucester, our Author published his Anglia Libera, wherein he asserts and explains the natural advantages of that act, and being resolved to push his fortune qua data via, he took the opportunity of attending the Earl of Macclesfield, who carried the act to Hanover. Here he presented his book to the Princess Sophia, and was the first who had the honour of kissing her Electoral Highness's hand on occasion of the said act [T]. Not long after his return to England, upon the calling the new Parliament, our Author published the following advertisement in the Postman: 'There having been a public report as if Mr Toland stood for Blechingley in Surrey, it is thought fit to advertise, that Sir Robert Clayton (gg) has given his interest in that bo-

(ff) It was published in 1702, in 8vo.
(gg) This Gentleman was a great Patron of our Author, who had a particular value for him, as appears by two letters in the Miscellanies, Vol. II. p. 318, & seq.

Whether with fable gowns they shew their pride,
Or under cloaks their knavery they hide;
Or whatso'er disguise they chuse to wear
To gull the people, while their spoils they share.

This piece was animadverted on in a pamphlet, intitled, Mr Toland's Clito dissected, and Fuller's plain proof of the true mother of the Prince of Wales made out to be no proof: In two letters from a Gentleman in the Country to his Friend in London. This Author remarks, that Mr Toland rightly assumes the title of Adeisidemon, which, in downright English, is one that fears neither God nor Devil.

[R] The art of governing by parties.] The whole title is, The Art of governing by Parties; particularly in religion, in politics, in parliament, on the bench, and in the ministry; with the ill effects of parties on the People in general, the King in particular, and all our foreign affairs, as well as on our credit and trade in peace or war, &c. In the first chapter he observes, that, till the accession of the Stuarts to the imperial throne of this realm, we never knew the art of governing by parties. It was set on foot, says he, among us by the first of that race, and was daily improving under his successor, till at last it fatally turned on himself, and deprived him both of his crown and life. But because this execrable policy was brought to perfection under Charles II, I shall display some of its worst effects in his reign, and the dismal influence it has on all our affairs even at this time. In the ensuing books he characterises several great ones of his own time, as the Lords Somers, Halifax, Nottingham, Rochester, Marlborough, and others, who happened not to be his Patrons at that time.

[S] After mature deliberation.] They consulted with Council, who advised them, that by any such judicial censure both Houses might incur a Præmunire by 25 Hen. 8. The questions they put to the Lawyers were; 1. Whether the Convocation's giving an opinion concerning a book that is heretical, impious, and immoral, is contrary to any law? to which they received an answer in the affirmative: secondly, whether the positions they had extracted out of Christianity not mysterious were such an opinion as is contrary to any law? to which it was answered in the negative. Besides this advice, they inquired what had been formerly done in such cases, and found, that, on a complaint being exhibited against some books by the Lower to the Upper House in the year 1689, the learned in both the laws were of opinion they could not proceed judicially in such matters (32).

[T] On occasion of the said act.] The Earl of Macclesfield was pleased to recommend him particularly to her Highness. Mr Toland staid there five or six weeks, and, upon his departure, the Electress dowager and the Elector were pleased to present him with several Gold medals as an acknowledgment for his book. Her Highness gave him likewise the pictures of herself, the Elector, the young Prince, and of her Majesty the Queen of Prussia, done in oil-colours. The Earl of Macclesfield, in his return, waited upon the King at Loos. 'There, says Mr Toland, he presented me to kiss his Majesty's hand, and took off those impressions which might have been made upon him by some of them who endeavoured to prepossess him against those that were the most zealous for his service, and the most faithful in his interests. My Lord himself went with a prejudice against me to Hanover, where he was thoroughly undeceived, and became my hearty Patron, till, just on his going home, he was removed by death from the service of his country and his friends.' It must be observed, that from the time of his writing his pamphlet upon the militia, which was levelled against any standing army, our Author had sided with the Tories against the ministry of Lord Somers and Halifax, with whom, he says, he never entered into any manner of transactions either at home or abroad (33). Before Mr Toland's return to England, he made a visit to the court of Berlin, where he talked openly against the authority of the Scripture, and had a dispute before the Queen of Prussia at Charlottenburgh with Mr Beaufobre upon that point. This latter gave afterwards an account of the dispute very much in his own favour. He says it happened in the beginning of October, 1701 (34).

(32) See Toland's Vindicius Liberius, p. 51.

(33) See a letter of his, dated London, June 24 1705, in his Miscellaneous Works, Vol. I. p. 337, et seq.
(34) Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. V. p. 39, et seq.

rough

‘rough to an eminent Citizen, and that Mr Toland has no thoughts of standing there, or any where else.’ This advertisement furnished a subject for the pleasant humour of an anonymous Writer, who published a little pamphlet, intitled, Modesty mistaken [U]. The King’s speech, at the opening of the Parliament, gave our Author occasion to publish, in 1702, in 8vo, Paradoxes of State relating to the present Juncture of Affairs in England, and the rest of Europe, chiefly grounded on his Majesty’s Princely, Pious, and most Gracious Speech. Soon after which, King William being now known to be in an irrecoverable state of ill health (bb), he put out another pamphlet, containing, I. Reasons for addressing his Majesty to invite into England their Highnesses the Electress Dowager, and the Electoral Prince of Hanover, and likewise, II. Reasons for attainting and abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and all others pretending any claim, right, or title from the late King James and Queen Mary: with arguments for making a vigorous war against France (ii). Upon the accession of Queen Ann, Mr Toland thought proper to go to the Courts of Hanover and Berlin, where he was received very graciously [W] by the Princess Sophia, and the Queen of Prussia, and had the honour to be often admitted into their conversation; and as he made a longer stay at Berlin than at Hanover, so he had frequent opportunities of waiting upon the Queen, who took a pleasure in asking him questions, and hearing his singular opinions. This gave him occasion to write some philosophical pieces, which he then presented to her Majesty. Three of these, after his return to England, in 1704, he printed (with some others) in the form of letters, inscribed to Serena, i. e. the Queen of Prussia, who, he assures us, was pleased to ask his opinion concerning the subjects of them [X]. In one of these letters (kk), he maintains that the best, if not the only demonstration of the soul’s immortality, is from Divine Authority. At the same time he published an English Translation of the Life of Æsop from the French of Mr de Meziriac (ll), and dedicated to Anthony Collins, Esq; [Y]. In 1705, before the election of the new Parliament, he found means to introduce himself into the Patronage of Mr Harley, then Secretary of

(bb) See the article RAD-CLIFFE [JOHN].

(ii) The acts for attainting the Pretender, and for taking the Abjuration Oath, had the Royal Assent by Commission, on the 2d and 7th of March, and the King died on the 8th.

(kk) The second letter, containing the History of the Soul’s Immortality among the Heathens.

(ll) It was prefixed to the fables of Æsop, with the moral reflections of Mr Baudouin: translated from the French.

[U] Modesty mistaken.] The whole title runs thus: Modesty mistaken; or a Letter to Mr Toland upon his declining to appear in the ensuing parliament. He begins his Letter thus: ‘Among all the news of this busy season, no report has affected me so peculiarly, as that of your inclination to fill a seat in the grand approaching Council; for I am persuaded, that not only our Civil Interest, but our Religion, has some dependance on the issue of the next debates; and I have long known your talents, whether in Politicks or Theology, to be so weighty, as to qualify you at once for a good old Committee-man, and for a member of that healing synod, the Assembly of Divines: it was with this double justice to your merit that I lately confounded an Academical Fop, who, speaking of your book-learned Antagonist, the late Bishop of Worcester, and gravely stiling him a body of Divinity, was by me given to understand, that what the Bishop had in profundity, Mr Toland made out in latitude; and that if the one was Corpus Theologiæ, the other was Traçtatus Theologicæ-politicus.’ See what has been said in Remark [G] note (14).

[W] He thought proper to go to the courts of Hanover and Berlin, where he was received very graciously.] We have an account from himself what it was that called him to these courts at this juncture, which was to inform them of (what he then thought convenient to call) the true state of the English court upon that change, which created at Hanover some uneasy speculations. It is in a letter quoted in remark [T]. After having related the series of his political conduct, from his first coming into the world till that time, he proceeds thus: ‘Those who pass for Tories, without being Jacobites, are perfectly misinformed about me, and if they knew how I represented them at Hanover and in Holland, as being really for the succession, and in what matters I was of opinion they deserved to be obliged, they would undoubtedly believe me no enemy of theirs, how little I might thereby befriend myself.’ This was our Politician’s employment there. Next he lets us know what it was that sent him upon this errand. ‘From these several considerations, continues he, you may easily infer, that in the first year of her Majesty’s reign, being a stranger abroad and friendless at home, I must needs have been in a very uncertain condition, were not the high-born persons, under whose protection I then lived, proof against all misrepresentations, and that they judged of things from their own knowledge, and not by the passions of others, to which they are not so great strangers as they are thought, or would seem. It was happy for me they had this generous disposition: for, at one and the same time, I had a Tory Secretary of State [Lord Nottingham] writing letters against me to foreign courts, as Agent to the Whigs, if not obnoxious to the law; and certain leading Whigs were persuading the same Princes that I was Mr Harley’s creature, which was a higher crime by far than being a Tory. With relation to the Duke of Marlborough, I own, that, having known nothing of him but by the report of others, and being misled by appearances of a conjunction between him and the most violent Tories, from whence I reasonably apprehended danger to the succession in the beginning of this reign, I gave myself, in Holland and Berlin, and elsewhere, some liberties in speech—’

[X] Who, he assures us, was pleased to ask his opinion concerning the subjects of them.] The Title of these letters runs thus: Letters to Serena, containing, first, the origin and force of prejudices. II. The history of the soul’s immortality among the heathens. III. The origin of idolatry, and reasons of heathenism. IV. A letter to a gentleman in Holland, shewing Spinoza’s system of philosophy to be without any principle or foundation. V. Motion essential to matter, in answer to some remarks by a noble friend on the confutation of Spinoza. To all which is prefixed a preface, being a letter to a gentleman in London, sent together with the foregoing dissertations, and declaring the several occasions of writing them. These letters were animadverted on by Mr Wotton in a pamphlet, intitled, A Letter to Eusebia, occasioned by Mr Toland’s Letter to Serena; and the Author of the Divine legation of Moses, B. 3. § 6. gives the third letter several hard names. Mr Toland’s veracity, in asserting that the three first letters were written and presented to the Queen of Prussia, has been called in question; but, since the same Author (35) assures us, that Mr P’Enfant heard Mr Toland read A discourse concerning prejudices to that Princess, the bare disappointment of not meeting with any body in that court twenty years after, that could give any further account of the matter, will hardly be deemed sufficient to justify so severe a censure as is passed upon it.

[Y] And dedicated it to Anthony Collins, Esq;] This piece seems to have recommended itself to our Author’s taste, particularly by the paradoxical opinion maintained in it, That Æsop was an ingenious, eloquent, and comely person, a Courtier, and a Philosopher; contrary to the fabulous relation of the Monk Planudes, who makes him a stupid flammering buffoon, and monstrously deformed. Besides, the original was then a scarce book. In 1697, Dr Bentley (36), though he had heard of it, had not been able to meet with it. And Mr Bayle says the same of himself, in the first edition of his Dictionary, published the same year. But he had found it afterwards, and quotes it in the second edition (37) of the Dictionary, which was published at the time when Mr Toland went to Holland. As to Mr Collins, our Author much courted his friendship, which might have been useful to him; but, it is well known, that Gentleman had never any opinion of the uprightness of his principles.

(35) Mosheimius de Vita fati & scriptis J. Tolandi commentatio, printed at Hamburg, 1722, in 8vo.

(36) In his Dissertation, &c. at the end of Mr Wotton’s Reflections on ancient and modern learning, 2d edition, p. 135.

(37) See the article Æsop, notes [B] and [O]. In the latter he tells us, that Meziriac’s book was printed at Bourg-en-bresis, 1632, in 40 pages in 16mo.

State, by whose direction, he published, without any name, the Memorial of the State of England [Z], in vindication of the Queen, the Church, and the Administration. This being animadverted on by Thomas Rawlins, Esq; an intimate friend of our Author (mm), in a letter which contained several reflections upon the Duke of Marlborough's conduct the preceding campaign, as well as against Mr Harley. They were greatly incensed at it, and Mr Toland was directed to answer it [AA]. This he performed, and the defence was immediately put to press, but suppressed after six or seven sheets were printed (nn). In 1707, he published an ancient Latin Oration, exciting the Britons to a vigorous war with France, and about the middle of the spring, our Author made a tour into Germany, where he went first to the Court of Berlin, and thence to that of Hanover; but a ridiculous incident drove him from the former, and finding, from a manuscript communicated by Mr Harley [BB], his account of the court of Hanover, had given a disgust there, by some observations he had made in it on the territories of a neighbouring Prince, he proceeded to Dusseldorp, where he was very graciously received by his Electoral Highness, who, in consideration of the English pamphlet he had published [CC], presented him with a golden chain and medal, and a purse of a hundred ducats. From Dusseldorp he went to Vienna, in hopes of engaging the Imperial Ministers to procure the title of Count of the Empire for an eminent French Banker, then in Holland; but notwithstanding our Agent was commissioned to offer good round sums of money for this protection, which was greatly wanted by his Principal, yet all his attempts therein (oo) proved fruitless [DD]. Whereupon, leaving Vienna, he made a visit to Prague in Bohemia, where he succeeded much better in procuring a testimonial [EE] of his birth and family, which was given him by some (nn) Life of Toland, ubi supra, p. 40.

(oo) Ibid. p. 42.

[Z] The memorial of the state of England.] The title informs us, that this was designed to rectify the mutual mistakes of Protestants, and to unite their affections in defence of our religion and liberty. It was written against the Memorial of the Church of England, by Counsellor Pooley and Dr Drake, which had been published with a view of influencing the people in the election of the ensuing parliament; to which end they had represented the Church to be in danger under the then Whig administration: In a letter to Mr Harley, dated December 14, 1705; upon the subject of this book, Mr Toland expresses himself thus: 'It is no small satisfaction to me, that the judgment of the Queen, the Parliament, and the Ministry, do so unanimously concur with the book which (under your protection) I have published for their service. As for any thing in it not just according to your sentiments, which perhaps may happen in a point or two, you will have the goodness to consider that I wanted opportunity to consult you personally; I having finished it in a very few days, without any to advise me but Mr P—, being in the country, and not master of time enough to polish the very language (38).'

(38) Toland's Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 354, 355.

[AA] They were greatly incensed at it, and Mr Toland was directed to answer it, which he did.] Mr William Stephens, Rector of Sutton, who was found to be the Publisher, refusing to be an evidence against Mr Rawlins, was sentenced to stand in the pillory. That sentence however was afterwards remitted. Mr Toland's answer was composed under the title of A Defence of her Majesty's administration, particularly against the notorious forgeries and calumnies with which his Grace the Duke of Marlborough and the Right Honourable Mr Secretary Harley are scandalously defamed and aspersed in a late scurrilous Inveective, intitled, A letter to the Author of the Memorial of the state of England. Our Author likewise published this year the following pieces: 1. Socinianism truly stated, being an example of fair dealing in Theological controversies. To which is prefixed, 2. Indifference in disputes recommended by a Pantheist to an Orthodox Friend, 1705, in 4to. 3. An Account of the courts of Prussia and Hanover, sent to a Minister of State in Holland, 1705, in 8vo. dedicated to the Duke of Somerset. It was translated into French, Dutch, and High Dutch. Two letters were published against it in Dutch. Our Author had some intentions to have published a more correct edition of it. In Vol. II. of his Posthumous works, there is a tract, intitled, The primitive constitution of the Christian church, which appears to be wrote about this time from these words: 'This, says he (p. 124.) is self-evident in the disputes about Occasional Conformity, which divides our nation at present.'

[BB] An ancient Latin oration, exciting the Britons to a vigorous war with France, communicated by Mr Harley.] The title is, Oratio Philippica ad excitandos contra Galliam Britannos, maxime vero ne de pace cum vicis præmature agatur, sanctiori Anglorum concilio exhibita anno a Christo nato 1514. Authore Matthæo Cardinale Sedunensi; qui Gallorum unguis non refecandos, sed penitus evellendos esse voluit: publica luce, Diatriba præliminari & Annotationibus donavit Johannes Tolandus. He published it at the same time in English. The manuscript was found by Mr Harley accidentally amongst some others.

[CC] In consideration of the English pamphlet he had published.] It was intitled; The Elector Palatine's declaration lately published in favour of his Protestant subjects, and notified to her Majesty. To which is prefixed an impartial account of the causes of those innovations and grievances about religion, which are now so happily redressed by his Electoral Highness. He published it at the request of the Elector Palatine's Minister, who at that time had some particular reasons to make himself acceptable to his master, as he wanted to be raised from the character of Resident to that of Envoy. And being informed by Mr Toland, with whom he was intimately acquainted, of his design to go into Germany, he encouraged our Author to wait upon the Elector, and gave him instructions concerning the management of this affair (39).

(39) Life of Toland, p. 61, 62.

[DD] Yet all his attempts therein proved fruitless.] However, while he was here, he negotiated another affair, which turned to better account. In a memorial to the Earl of Oxford, dated December 17, 1711, he endeavours to recommend himself to his Lordship for the employ of a private Agent abroad. He has these words: 'They who confided to my management affairs of a higher nature, have found me exact as well as secret. My impenetrable negotiation at Vienna (hid under the pretence of curiosity) was not only applauded by the Prince that employed me, but also proportionably rewarded (40).'

(40) Toland's Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 225.

[EE] Procuring a Testimonial.] Mr Toland seems to have met with some injurious reproaches upon his birth, which put him upon this errand to Prague. The Testimonial runs thus: 'Intra scripti testamur Dom. Johannem Toland ortum esse honesta nobili et antiquissima familia quæ per plures centenos annos, ut regni historia & continua monstrant memoria, in peninsula Hiberniæ Emis Oen dicta, prope urbem Londino-Deriemsem in Ultonia perduravit. In cujus rei firmiore fidem nos ex eadem patria oriundi propriis manibus subscripsimus. Præge in Bohemia hac die 2 Januarii, 1708.

' Johannes o Neill, Superior Collegii Hibernorum.
' Franciscus o Deulin, S. Theologiæ Professor.
' Radolphus o Neill, S. Theol. Lector (41).'

(41) See Toland's life, p. v.

In a letter (42), dated January, 1708, and sent to Vienna, Mr Toland makes a handsome mention of this favour as follows:

(42) Miscellaneous, ubi supra, p. 381.

' Sir,

' I have nothing to add to what I did myself the honour to write to your Excellency per post, but that the Countess of Starenburg is not the only person at Prague to whom I am particularly obliged: For the very Reverend Father Guardian, and the rest of the worthy members of the Irish convent, were not more disposed to do me all the good offices of humanity, than they were forward to shew me the most zealous affection of countrymen.' Mr Francis o Deulin was the bearer of this letter, whom our Author, in return, recommends of his Countrymen, Irish Franciscans, in that city, where we see the honest Friars did then certify, under their hands and seal, that Mr Toland was descended from an honourable, noble, and most ancient family recorded in the History of Ireland for several hundred years. By this time, his purse being emptied, it was not without some hardship that he got back to Holland, in the latter end of the year 1708. Here he presently set his pen to work, and published the year following, at the Hague, a volume containing two Latin Dissertations, viz. Adeisdæmon sive Titus Livius a superstitione vindicatus, and Origines Judaicae sive Strabonis de Moyse et Religione Judaica historia breviter illustrata. In the first of these dissertations, he declares Superstition to be no less destructive of any government, than downright Atheism: and in the latter, he prefers Strabo's account of Moses, and the Jewish Religion, before the testimony of the Jews [FF]. This year he likewise published, at Amsterdam, a second edition of Oratio Philippica, &c. to which he annexed an invective against the Authors of a Rhapsody, published monthly at Paris, under the title of Mercur Galant (pp). In 1710, he published an anonymous pamphlet in French, relating to the affair of Dr Sacheverel [GG]. During this abode in Holland, he had the good fortune to get himself introduced to Prince Eugene of Savoy, who gave him several marks of his generosity (qq). In the latter end of 1710 (rr), he returned to England, where he found Mr Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and Lord Treasurer, still his friend (ss). It was owing to the liberality of that Patron, that at this time he maintained a handsome post, and took a country house at Epsom in Surrey; he was greatly delighted with his situation at this place (tt), and published a very entertaining historico-poetical description of it, in 1711 [HH]. However, he did not continue long in the favour of Lord Oxford [II], and the next year we find him writing several pamphlets on the side of the opposition to that Minister [KK]. At the same time he

(pp) He calls that Author, Gallus Arctologus, odium orbis & ludibrium, sive Gallantis Mercurii Gallantissimus Scriptor Vapulans.

(ss) See Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 40, et seq.

(tt) His house stood upon Woodcote-Green. Ibid. p. 95.

recommends to his Excellency's protection during his stay at Vienna.

[FF] A volume containing two dissertations, &c.] To the first of these he prefixed, Epistola quæ præfationis vices supplere possit ad D. Antonium Collinium Arnigerum, non magis integritate morum quam ingenii dotibus conspicuum virum. He sent a copy to Mr Leibnitz at Hanover, who returned an answer, April 30, 1709, containing several remarks upon it. He agrees with our Author in asserting Livy's freedom from superstition (43). As to the first of these positions, that Superstition is worse than Atheism, it is manifestly retailed from Mr Bayle, who has scattered it up and down in his Dictionary and other writings. Neither was Mr Bayle the Inventor of this Hypothesis, though he adorned and improved it; Lucretius and other esprits bons had maintained it. Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona. Lucretius l. 81.

*Illud in his rebus vereor, ne forte rearis
Impia te inire rationis elementa viamque
Endegredi sceleris: quod contra sepius olim
Religio peperit scelerosa atque impia facta.* l. 81.

This subject is agreeably enough handled by a late writer (44).

In the latter Dissertation our Author ridicules Huetius, who, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, affirms, that some eminent persons recorded in the Old Testament are allegorized in the heathenish Mythology. Moses is understood by the name of Bacchus, Typho; Silonus, Priapus, and Adonis. Huetius was greatly provoked at this attack, and expressed his resentment in a French letter, first published in the Journal of Trevoux, and afterwards printed with some dissertations of Huetius, collected by the Abbot Tilladet (45); but these descended to personal abuses on account of his illegitimacy. However, Mr Leibnitz agrees with our Author in this last assertion against Huetius, who, he says, in applying the Pagan fables to Moses, hath shewn more learning than exactness: and Mr Des Maizeaux thinks he is not much in the wrong. On the other hand, in the Remarks on Ecclesiastical history (46), already cited, the Author observes, that a person can be produced, who was very like to Moses, namely Bacchus, who was an Egyptian God. Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, has with much accuracy and learning, says he, drawn up the comparison, and the resemblance is so great in so many particulars, that it cannot be supposed accidental: but then, continues he, Bacchus is a poetical Deity, and the accounts of him are taken from fabulous history. Bacchus is Moses in disguise. The same Author, from a passage in Herodotus, lib. ii. 42. concerning the Egyptian Hercules, compared with Exodus xxiii. is inclined to believe this Hercules to have been Moses.

[GG] Relating to Dr Sacheverel.] It is intitled, Lettre d'un Anglois a un Hollandois au sujet du Docteur Sacheverel, presentement en arret par ordre des communes de la grand Bretagne, & accusé des hauts crimes & malversations a la barre des Seigneurs, in 4to. Mr Toland sent this letter the very day it was published to Mr Leibnitz, which, in a subsequent one, dated Feb. 14, 1710, N. S. to that Gentleman, he says, was wrote as an antidote against Dr Sacheverel's seditious sermon. 'And the articles since exhibited against that Incendiary by the Commons shew, that I did not only rightly apprehend the scope of his writings, but that I nowhere stretched his meaning; and that his principal view has been the defeating the succession in the house of Hanover. I should have sent you freely the articles at large, whereof I have an authentic copy; but that I suppose your Envoy at our court would not leave the Elector to the blundering abstracts of Gazettes in a matter that so nearly and essentially concerns himself and his posterity (47).'

[HH] A poetical description of Epsom in 1711.] The title is, The Description of Epsom, with the Humours and Politicks of that Place, in a Letter to Eudoxa. There is added a translation of four letters out of Pliny, as a specimen of a translation he was about of Pliny's Epistles. All the letters he translated are in the collection of his Posthumous Works, Vol. II. p. 48, et seqq; where his Description of Epsom is likewise inserted, p. 91, but so much corrected, enlarged, and explained, that it is, as it were, a new work, and Mr Toland for that reason called it, A New Description of Epsom.

[II] He did not continue long in the favour of Lord Oxford.] Lord Oxford had been a very useful Friend to him, and he was very unwillingly torn from it. He wrote a memorial to that Minister, wherein he lays forth all his former services (*), claims his promise, and offers to serve him in any capacity that should not be destructive of the necessary supplies he received from Hanover (48). When he found nothing would do, he wrote his Lordship a letter, wherein, upon certain (as his Lordship thought) ambiguous words he let drop about the house of Hanover, I utterly, says he, renounced his friendship, and consequently all the advantages one in my circumstances might hope from his protection. This he relates two years after, as an argument to induce a person, in the opposition to Lord Oxford's ministry, to take him into the like useful friendship, as one that neither was nor could be any thing but a Whig; 'that so by your generous care, says he, I might be put in a condition of writing as freely as I think (49).'

In the mean time he did not fail to keep up his correspondence with the Princess Sophia. Presently after his return from Holland, when he applied to the Earl of Oxford to serve him with his head, his pen, and his heart, he takes notice to his Lordship, that the October club, if rightly managed, would be rare stuff to work the ends of any party. 'I sent, says he, such an account of those wights to an old gentlewoman [Princess Sophia] of my acquaintance, as, in the midst of fears (upon the change of the ministry and talk of a peace) to make her laugh (50).'

[KK] Several pamphlets against the politicks of that Minister.] I. A Letter against Popery, particularly against admitting the Authority of Fathers or Councils in Controversies

(47) Miscellaneous Works, Ibid. p. 388, 389.

(*) Particularly in having possessed the court of Hanover with an opinion of Mr Harley's abilities, and attachment to that succession.

(48) Ibid. p. 220, et seq. The Memorial is dated Dec. 11, 1711.

(49) Ibid. 489, 430.

(50) Ibid. 411.

(p) See his Life, p. 65.
(r) He dates a letter from York-Buildings, b. 9. 1710-11. Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. 403.

(3) Tite Live etoit-rien joins que superstitieux. Ibid. 383.

(4) Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, p. 127, et seq. Lond. 1751, 8vo.

(4) Preface des dissertations de Mr Hoet sur diverses matieres de Religion & de Philologie, p. v.

(46) p. 223, 224.

he undertook a new edition of Cicero's Works by subscription, the plan of which he drew up, in a dissertation intitled, Cicero Illustratus, Dissertatio Philologico-Critica: sive Concilium de toto edendo Cicerone, alia plane methodo quam hactenus unquam factum; but this he never published, and only printed a few copies at his own charge to distribute among his friends and subscribers (uu). He continued writing pamphlets against the Ministry in the two following years [LL]; in the beginning of the latter of which, among others, he published The Art of Restoring: or the Piety and Probity of General Monk, in bringing about the last Restoration, evidenced from his own authentic letters; with a just account of Sir Roger [Earl of Oxford], who runs the parallel as far as he can. In a Letter to a Minister of State at the Court of Vienna. There were ten editions of this pamphlet in a quarter of a year, and he was not without great apprehensions of a prosecution [MM] for it. He was encouraged to take the greater liberty, as the Queen's Death was daily expected at this juncture, which would have placed the Crown upon the head of the Princess Sophia, then alive, of whose favour he judged himself well assured [NN]; but that Princess happening to die before the Queen, who likewise deceased shortly after, our Author, upon the accession of King George I, published The Funeral Elegy and Character of her Royal Highness the late Princess Sophia, with the Explication of her Consecration Medal: written originally in Latin, translated into English, and farther illustrated by Mr Toland (wvw), who has added the Character of the King, the Prince and the Princess. Our Author being now more at his ease [OO], turned his thoughts more particularly verses of Religion, by Sophia Charlotte, the late Queen of Prussia; being an answer to a Letter written to her Majesty by Father Vota, an Italian Jesuit Confessor to King Augustus. There is prefixed by the Publisher, a Letter, containing the occasion of the Queen's writing, and an Apology for the Church of England. II. Her Majesty's reasons for creating the Electoral Prince of Hanover a Peer of this realm, or the preamble to his Patent as Duke of Cambridge, in Latin and English, with Remarks upon the same, in 4to. III. The Grand Mystery laid open; namely, by dividing of the Protestants to weaken the Hanover Succession; and by defeating the Succession, to extirpate the Protestant Religion. To which is added, the Sacredness of Parliamentary Securities, against those who would indirectly this year, or more indirectly the next, if they live so long, attack the public funds.

(uu) It is printed in the first volume of his Miscellaneous Works, p. 231, et seq.

(wvw) The Latin Speech was written by M. Cræmer.

[LL] He continued writing pamphlets the two following years.] In 1713, he put out An Appeal to Honest People against wicked Priests, or the very Heathen Laity's Declarations for Civil Obedience and Liberty of Conscience, contrary to the Rebellious and Persecuting Principles of the old Christian Clergy, with an Application to the corrupt part of the Priests at this present time, published on occasion of Dr Sacheverel's last Sermon. II. Dunkirk, or Dover: or the Queen's Honour, the Nation's Safety, the Liberties of Europe, and the Peace of the World, all at Stake, till that Fort and Port be totally demolished by the French. In 1714, besides those mentioned in the text, he published, 1. Reasons for naturalizing the Jews in Great Britain and Ireland on the same foot with all other nations: containing also a Defence of the Jews against all vulgar prejudices in all Countries. He dedicates it ironically to the Archbishop and Bishops of both Provinces. 2. A Collection of Letters, written by his Excellency, General George Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, relating to the Restoration of the Royal Family, with an introduction, proving by incontestible evidence, that Monk had projected that Restoration in Scotland, against the cavils of those that would rob him of the merit of this action.

[MM] He was not without apprehensions of a prosecution.] He wrote this piece at Epsom, and coming to town to get it printed as soon as it was finished, he sent a copy to a friend of the party he had now chosen, before it was published, to whom he writes thus: 'I flatter myself in this book you'll meet with more novelties, than in the ordinary course of Postage I could have sent in that time. Discouraging of Liberty, nay asserting and maintaining it, I could not but act with the greatest freedom; and indeed it is impossible for a soul that is really fired with the love of his country, not to express in the most pathetic terms a detestation for tyranny, a contempt for slaves, an aversion to traitors, and resentment of injured trust. But all this while I have not acted without caution likewise, expecting little assistance from many of those that will be the lowdest to applaud me: and therefore the coming out of the book being fixed to next Tuesday, I have provided myself with a privacy, where I fancy I may be safe enough, till the first fury be overpast, if they think it advisable to make any prosecution. Clippstone is too far off, or it were the securest place in the world (51).'

(51) Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 431, 432.

[NN] Of whose favour he judged himself secure.] Speaking of his prosecution, he goes on thus: 'But leaving the event to time, you are to understand, that without any regard to these things, I am in about three weeks time bound for Germany, though first for Flanders, and next for Holland. I believe I shall be pretty well accommodated for this voyage, which, upon many accounts, I expect will be very short. Lord! how near was my old woman being a Queen, and your humble servant being at his ease! All is not over yet, and some symptoms are promising enough. I have been the bolder upon this presumption; nor am I alone, since all the Princes in Europe take their measures upon the same foot. You'll receive Mr Steel's Crisis by the same Carrier that delivers you my Art of Restoring. I think it a very good book; but it does not answer the expectation of many others, who are good friends to him and the cause (52).'

[OO] He turned his thoughts upon his History of the Druids.] In the specimen of this history, p. 8, Mr Toland assures his Lordship, from all Authors, that no Heathen Priesthood ever came up to the perfection of the Druidical, which was far more exquisite than any other system: as having been much better calculated to beget ignorance, and an implicit disposition in the people, no less than to procure power and profit to the Priests, which is one grand difference between the true worship and the false. Afterwards he professes to keep strictly to truth, being the fundamental law of an Historian: but, says he, if in clearing up ancient rites and customs long since extinct, any communities or orders of men should think themselves touched, they ought not to impute it to design in the Author, but to the conformity of things. 'I remember, continues he, when complaints were made against Sir Robert Howard, that in treating of the Heathen Priests, he had whipt some Christian Priests on their back; all the answer he made was only, what made them get up there? which answer I claim before hand.' Notwithstanding this, he goes on, and says he leaves the Reader to make such applications himself, seldom making any for him, since he that is neither clear-sighted, nor quick enough of conception to do so, may to as good purpose read the Fairy-Tales as this history. Soon after King George the First's accession to the throne, our Author drew up a memorial to a Minister of State, containing several hints for mending the state, the substance of which, new modelled and enlarged, with some additions, he published in 1717, under the following title, State Anatomy of Great Britain, containing a particular account of its several Interests and Parties, their Bent and Genius; and what each of them, with all the rest of Europe, may hope or fear from the Reign and Family of King George. Being a memorial sent by an intimate friend to a foreign Minister, lately nominated to come from the Court of England. This tract was answered by Dr Fiddes, Chaplain to the Earl of Oxford, and by Daniel De Foe; whereupon Mr Toland published, The Second Part of the State of Anatomy, &c. containing a short Vindication of the former Part, against the misrepresentations of the ignorant, or the malicious, especially relating to our Ministers of State, and to Foreigners, with some Reflections on the designed Clamour against the Army, and on the Swedish Conspiracy. Also Letters to his Grace the late Archbishop of Canterbury, and

(52) Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 443.

cularly upon his History of the Druids, of which he drew up a large specimen, and sent it in three letters to Lord Moleſworth, in the year 1718 (xx). About this time, Mr Toland finding himſelf aſthmatical, and beginning to loſe his ſtomach, took a lodging at Putney for the ſake of the country air (yy). However, he uſually ſpent the greateſt part of the winter in town, where this year he publiſhed his Nazarenus [PP]. In this treatiſe our Author gives what he took to be the Original Plan of Chriſtianity, which was this: That the Jewiſh Converts were ſtill to obſerve their own Law throughout all generations, which was not however to be obſerved by the converted Gentiles; but that both were to be united into one Body or Fellowſhip, in that part of Chriſtianity particularly, which, better than all the preparative purgations of the Philoſophers, requires the ſanctification of the Spirit, and the renovation of the inward man. The ſame year he put out a pamphlet, intitled, The Deſtiny of Rome (zz) [22]. He was very much reduced in his fortunes at this time, being entirely ſupported by the bounty of his friends, the narrowneſs of which he complains of (aaa). Towards the latter end of the year following, Dr Hare, late Biſhop of Chicheſter, then Dean of Worceſter, having given an injurious representation of our Author's conduct in penning ſome parts of Chriſtianity not Myſterious, Mr Toland publiſhed an advertiſement in the Poſtman, where vindicating himſelf from the Dean's aſperſion, he makes the charge fall heavy upon the Aſperſor. The Dean attempted to clear himſelf in an advertiſement printed in the Daily Courant; but did it in ſuch a manner [RR], as occaſioned the publiſhing of a pamphlet with this title, A Short Eſſay upon Lying: or a Defence of a Reverend Dignitary, who ſuffers under the perſecution of Mr Toland for a Lapsus Calami. About this time our Author, at the requeſt of Lord Southwell (bbb), undertook to defend the Independent Jurisdiction of the Iriſh Houſe of Peers, againſt a bill then brought into the Britiſh Parliament, wherein it was declared, that there lies an appeal from any decree of the Houſe of Lords in Ireland to that of Great Britain, as the Supreme Court of Judicature, and laſt Refort. Mr Toland, in this affair, had likewiſe the direction and aſſiſtance of Lord Moleſworth (ccc), and this being the fatal South-Sea year, our Author met with a friend among the Directors, who, even without conſulting either of them (which the ſhortneſs of the time would not admit) was ſo kind as to do him the favour of making uſe of this Lord's name in his behalf for a thouſand pound ſubſcription in that fund. Our Author informs his Lordſhip, that he was offered a thouſand pounds advantage three hours after the thing was done, and thirteen hundred the 25th following; but my benefactor aſſures me, ſays he, that at the opening of the books it will be worth a great deal more. You may eaſily gueſs I will be governed by him in this point. Another ſuch job (continues he) will make me as eaſy and independent, as I deſire, without ever ſtock-jobbing more (ddd): ſince I may buy an annuity of two or three hundred pounds; though the purchaſe of land is got up to thirty years, and if things go on at this rate, will mount much higher. Elated with this project, it was about this time that he printed his Pantheiſticon (eee) ſive Formula celebrandæ ſodalitatis Socraticæ [SS]. It is written by way of Dialogue

(xx) It is printed in Vol. 1. of his Poſthumous Works, p. 1, et ſeqq.

(zz) An Hiſtorical Account of the Life and Writings of the late eminently famous Mr John Toland, by one of his moſt intimate friends. Lond. 1722. 8vo. p. 90.

(bbb) Ibid. p. 458.

(ccc) Ibid. p. 462.

(ddd) His friend Sir T—— had promiſed him the like favour in the next ſubſcription, which he ſaid was to be about three months afterwards. Miſcellaneous Works, Vol. II. 464, et ſeq.

(yy) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 275.

(aaa) In a letter, dated June 26, 1718-19, in his Miſcellanies, Vol. II. p. 445, et ſeqq.

(eee) This piece is founded upon the Principles of Jordano Bruno.

(53) Mr Des Maizeaux obſerves here, that our Author uſed to prefix long titles to his books, the better, as he ſuppoſes, to recommend them to the Bookſellers. Life, p. 70.

(54) The Goſpel of Barnabus is interpolated by the Mahometans. There is but one copy of it in Chriſtendom, accidentally diſcovered by me at Amſterdam, in 1709, in the library of Prince Eugene of Savoy. Miſcellanies, Vol. II. p. 381.

(55) This prophecy has been ſhewn to be a forgery by Father Menestric, a Jeſuit.

(56) In his Life, p. 72.

and to the Diſſenting Miniſters of all denominations, in the year 1705-6, about a general toleration, with ſome of their answers to the Author, who now offers to public conſideration what was then tranſacted for private ſatisfaction; together with a Letter from their High Mightineſſes the States General of the United Provinces on the ſame ſubject (53).

[PP] His Nazarenus: Or the Jewiſh, Gentile, and Mahometan Chriſtianity; containing the Hiſtory of the ancient Goſpel of Barnabus, and the modern Goſpel of the Mahometans, attributed to the ſame Apoſtle: this laſt Goſpel being now firſt made known among Chriſtians (54). Alſo the Original Plan of Chriſtianity occaſionally explained in the Hiſtory of the Nazarenus, whereby divers controverſies about this Divine (but highly perverted) Inſtitution may be happily terminated; with the Relation of an Iriſh Manuſcript of the four Goſpels, as likewiſe a ſummary of the ancient Iriſh Chriſtianity, and the reality of the Keldes (an order of lay Religious) againſt the two laſt Biſhops of Worceſter. This book was answered by Mr (afterwards Dr) Mangey in his Remarks upon Nazarenus: by Mr Paterson, in his Anti-Nazarenus: by the Author [Dr Hare] of the Difficulties and Diſcouragements, which attend the Study of the Scriptures; and by Dr Brett, in the Preface of his Tradition neceſſary to explain and interpret the Holy Scriptures.

[22] The Deſtiny of Rome: Or the probability of the ſpeedy and final Deſtruction of the Pope; concluded partly from natural reaſons and political obſervations, and partly on occaſion of the famous Prophecy of Father Malachy (55), Archbiſhop of Armagh, in the XIIIth Century, which curious piece containing emblematical characters of all the Popes, from his own time to the utter extirpation of them, is not only here intirely publiſhed, but likewiſe ſet in a much clearer light than has ever hitherto been done.—In a Letter to a Divine of the Church of the Firſt-born. What made him triſle away his time upon this ſubject, ſays Mr Des Maizeaux (56), I will not pretend to account for: but we have ſhewn the true reaſon in the text, which was no other but the miſfortunes that attended the want of a ſplendid ſwilling.

[RR] He did it in ſuch a manner.] In a Poſtſcript to a

Viſitation Sermon, intitled, Church Authority, ſays Biſhop Hoadly, had juſt ſuch a reſemblance to Chillingworth, as Mr Toland has to Mr Locke, who, in Chriſtianity not Myſterious, is often quoted to ſupport notions he never dreamt of. Mr Toland, in the News-paper mentioned above, having deſied him to ſhew any ſuch quotation [of which there is none] in that book, the Dean in answer to this, publiſhed in the Daily Courant of Feb. 3, 1720, as follows: Juſt publiſhed, the fourth edition of the Dean of Worceſter's Sermon, &c. [In the poſtſcript, l. 9, from the end, inſtead of iſt often quoted, read makes great uſe of Mr Locke's principles] which occaſioned the abovementioned pamphlet. Our Author, in his Tetradymus (57) (of which preſently) relates the whole tranſaction, wherein having produced Mr Locke's own words to falſify the Dean's charge of Mr Toland's making uſe of Mr Locke's principles, he obſerves, that it appears by the whole connexion, that this emendation was not in the Doctor's thoughts at the beginning; or, ſuppoſing it were, that it ſerves his cauſe as little as the other way of ſpeaking, ſince I proceed, ſays he, upon different principles from Mr Locke, and principles that are better, if you believe the then Biſhop of Worceſter (58). In fine, no ſlip of the pen, nor any of the methods laid down by an ingenious writer [A ſhort eſſay upon lying] can poſſibly ſalve the Doctor from oblique dealing, as the drawing me by the head and ſhoulders into his pamphlet was unneceſſary, if not ſpightful, with regard to me or ſome other. I ſay it again, that it would have been no condeſcenſion below his dignity, ſince he vouchſafed to take notice of me at all, if he had accuſed his memory, or in any other manner owned his miſtake; inſtead of having recourſe to ſhifts that deſerve a courſer name than I am willing to give them, out of the reſpect I pay him on other accounts.

[SS] His Pantheiſticon, ſive Formula celebrandæ ſodalitatis Socraticæ. Our Author, while he was in Holland in 1709, wrote a Diſſertation de genere loco et tempore mortis Jordani Bruni, Nolani, which was inſcribed to Baron Hebenſdorf, to whom he ſent it at Vienna. He likewiſe ſent another copy afterwards to Mr Leibnitz the ſame year.

(57) page 190, et ſeq.

(58) In his third answer to Mr Locke.

Dialogue between the President and Members of a Philosophical Society, who are Pantbeists, that is, such as acknowledge no God but the Universe. The piece is made up in the form of Responses, Lessons, a Philosophical Canon, and a sort of Litany; the whole being printed both in red and black, one cannot forbear thinking it was drawn up by way of mockery to some Christian Liturgies. It has been observed by one of his friends, that the Author himself seemed to have been sensible, that he had too much indulged his loose imagination; since he got it printed secretly, under a disguised name, at his own charge, and took off a few copies, which he distributed with a view of receiving presents for them (fff). Some time after, he published a book, intitled, Tetradymus, as containing four tracts; in the last of these, addressed to the Bishop of London, having inserted his advertisement against Dr Hare, with the Doctor's answer, he here makes a reply to that answer, and concludes with an account of his own conduct and sentiments [TT]. The following year, 1721, in May, Dr Hare published a book, intitled, Scripture vindicated from the misrepresentations of the Lord Bishop of Bangor, &c. In the Preface of which, he charged our Author with having, in some copies of his Panttheisticon, inserted a blasphemous prayer to Bacchus [UU]; but he was defended from this heavy charge by Mr Des Maizeaux, who, upon enquiry, assures us, Mr Toland never dreamt of writing any such thing (ggg). Some letters of the Earl of Shaftsbury to Lord Moleworth having been communicated by the latter to our Author the year before, were published by him, with that Lord's consent, this year [WW]. To these letters, he prefixed a large Introduction, wherein he gives a particular (fff) See his Life, p. 78.

(ggg) Ibid. p. 86.

(59) Miscellaneous Works, Vol. I. p. 304, et seq. et Vol. II p. 395.

* This book was so scarce, that it was seldom sold for less than 50 l. This we are told by Nicereh, Hom. Illust. tome 17. p. 211. However, hence it appears, that Mr Toland's copy was not the only one extant, as he imagined.

(60) Tetradymus, p. 223.

year (59). In this tract there is an account of all the works of Jordano, the founder of Pantheism. However, Mr Toland observes to Mr Leibnitz, that this Author's works, particularly his Spaccio della Bestia trionfante, sive Bestie triumphantis expulsio (i. e. the expulsion of superstition) is not a secret to be communicated to every body*. In the first volume of Mr Toland's miscellaneous pieces, p. 316, et seq. is inserted an account of Jordano Bruno's book of the Infinite Universe and Innumerable Worlds, translated from the original Latin, printed in the year 1514.

[TT] An account of his own conduct and sentiments.] Here he solemnly professes, that the religion taught by Jesus Christ and his Apostles, but not as since corrupted by the subtractions, additions, or other alterations, of any particular man or company of men, is that which he infinitely preferred before all others. 'I do, continues he, over and over again repeat it, Christ and his Apostles, exclusive of either oral tradition or the determination of synods, adding, what I declared before to the world, that religion, as it came out of their hands, was no less plain and pure, than useful and instructive (60).' The title of this book is Tetradymus: containing, I. Hodegus; or the pillar of cloud and fire, that guided the Israelites in the wilderness, not miraculous; but, as faithfully related in Exodus, a thing equally practised by other nations, and in those places not only useful but necessary. II. Clidophorus; or, Of the Exoteric and Esoteric Philosophy, that is, of the external and internal doctrine of the Antients: the one open and public, accommodated to popular prejudices and the established religion; the other private and secret, wherein to the few capable and discreet was taught the real truth, stript of all disguises. III. Hypatia; or, The history of a most beautiful, most virtuous, most learned, and every way accomplished Lady; who was torn to pieces by the Clergy of Alexandria, to gratify the pride, emulation, and cruelty of their Archbishop Cyril, commonly but undeservedly stiled St Cyril. IV. Mangonentes; being a defence of Nazarenus, addressed to the right reverend John Lord Bishop of London, against his Lordship's Chaplain, Dr Mangey, his Dedicator, Mr Pater-son, and, who ought to have been named first, the reverend Dr Brett, once belonging to his Lordship's church. The first dissertation was answered in a pamphlet, called Hodegus confuted; or a plain demonstration that the pillar of cloud and fire, that guided the Israelites in the wilderness, was not a fire of human preparation, but the most miraculous presence of God. 1721, 8vo. And in A discourse upon the pillar of cloud and fire which guided the Israelites through the wilderness, proving it to have been miraculous: occasioned by a dissertation of Mr Toland's, called Hodegus. Inserted in the Bibliotheca literaria, &c. 1723, Numb. V. p. 1, et seq.

[UU] A blasphemous prayer to Bacchus.] The Doctor introduces it thus: speaking of the constitutions of Carolina, he observes, that by one of the articles none are excluded from settling in that country on account of their opinions, but downright Atheists, such as the impious Author of the Panttheisticon. To this passage, at the bottom of the page [xxi], he inserts the following note: 'This Atheistical writer, not content with what he has dared to print in this profane piece, has, I am told, in some copies inserted a prayer in manuscript in these or the like words, Omnipotens & sempiterna Bacche, qui hominum corda donis tuis recreas, concede, propitius, ut qui hesternis poculis ægroti facti sunt, hodiernis curentur, & per pocula poculorum. How to fill up the blank I have left I do not remember. Thus prays this impudent Pantheist, whose impudent blasphemies loudly call for the animadversions of the civil power.' And, upon further intelligence, he inserted this advertisement in the Errata: 'The prayer to Bacchus, p. xxi, being, to the best of my remembrance, in the very words in which I have heard it repeated more than once by the same person; and yet differing much in expression from two written copies I have lately seen (which also differ from each other) I thought it would not be unacceptable to the reader to give him the following copy, which, whatever the other be, I can assure him is from an original: Omnipotens & sempiterna Bacche, qui humanam Societatem maxime in bibendo constituisti, concede, propitius, ut istorum capita, qui hesternæ comotatione graventur, hodierna leventur; idque fiat per pocula poculorum. Amen.' [WW] Were published with that Lord's consent this year.]

This is collected from a letter (61) of Lord Moleworth to our Author, the first paragraph of which runs thus:

'To Mr Toland.

'Brechenston, near Dublin, June 25, 1720.

'Sir,

'I should be glad that any thing my Lord Castleton met with in my Lord Shaftsbury's letters to me would encourage him to try for heirs to his honours and estate: I think he owes so much to his family and country. I was always of your opinion, that those letters were very valuable for the reasons you give, and had it in my thoughts that it would be a good thing to publish them. But, upon farther consideration, that my Lord Shaftsbury's relations might take it amiss that I divulge family secrets, and that it would be construed a piece of vanity (now much in use) for me to print my own commendations (as you know there are such in several of those letters), I concluded it better to have such publication deferred till after my death. If you have any good reasons to think otherwise, let me know them. You may, if you think fitting, communicate them to Mr Collins, and take his opinion of them. I own I am proud enough of having been not only so intimate with that great man, but to have had a hand in the first forming of his mind to virtue. There are other great ministers now living, for whom I endeavoured as much; but, as they have forgot it, so will I. The Lord Shaftsbury was of a different temper, and carried on his friendship to my sons, the eldest of whom did him signal service in Italy, where at Naples he died.'

To this if we add Lord Moleworth's extraordinary kindness afterwards to Mr Toland in his sickness, there is no room to suppose the publication was made without that Lord's privity and consent. This Lord sent frequent messages and billets to Mr Toland, while he lay ill at Putney. In one of the latter (63) he writes thus:

(61) In the second volume of his Posthumous works, ubi supra, p. 461.

(62) These letters turn chiefly upon two points, the love of one's country, and the choice of a wife.

(63) In his Miscellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 484.

To

cular account of Lord Shaftsbury's principles and conduct (bbb), with respect to public affairs. It was now four years that Mr Toland had been in a declining state of health, and this year, about December, he grew much worse, and finding little or no relief from the assistance of his Apothecary, he took the advice of a friend (iii), and sent for Mr Woodward, who, not judging rightly of the true state of his case, brought a continual vomiting and looseness upon him, by which he grew a great deal worse (kkk), and not without difficulty got to his lodgings at Putney on the Saturday before Christmas-day. Here he continued so ill, as to be wholly confined to his chamber till the end of January, when he began to grow perceptibly better (lll), and in a few weeks got so well, as to entertain hopes of a recovery. In this interval, he wrote his dissertation, intitled, Physic without Physicians, to shew the danger of trusting Physicians, while every man may easily be his own Physician. He likewise prepared a Preface to be prefixed before a pamphlet, called The Danger of Mercenary Parliaments, which was to be reprinted against the approaching Election of a new Parliament; but in the latter end of February (mmm), he relapsed into all his former symptoms, being seized with his old pains in his thighs, reins, and stomach, with a total loss of appetite, and hourly reachings, attended with a very high-coloured water, which he took to be occasioned by the gravel (nnn); but we are told by one of his friends, who attended him in his last moments, that a severe rheumatism had hung long upon him, which turning to the black jaundice, attended with a fever, proved mortal to him, about three o'clock on Sunday morning, the 11th of March, in the fifty-third year of his age. The same Author assures us, that ' he behaved, throughout the whole course of ' his sickness, with a philosophical patience, an intire resignation to the Divine Will, ' and was thoroughly sensible of his approaching dissolution; for upon his appearing some- ' thing more than ordinary chearful the day before he died, and my telling him I hoped ' he was better, he replied quick upon me, Sir, I have no hopes but in God. A few minutes ' before he died, looking earnestly at some friends that were in the room, and being asked ' if he wanted any thing, he answered with the firmest resolution, I want nothing but ' death (ooo).' And Mr Des Maizeaux tells us, that ' he looked upon death without ' the least perturbation of mind, bidding farewell to those that were about him, and tell- ' ing them he was going to sleep (ppp).' His body was decently interred, on the 13th fol- ' lowing, in Putney Church-yard. He wrote an epitaph for himself some few days before ' his death, which we shall insert in the note [XX]. As to his character, Mr Molyneux ' declares (qqq), that he was a candid Free-thinker, and a good Scholar; but at the same ' time vain, and addicted to religious disputes in Coffee-houses and other public places. We ' learn from Mr Des Maizeaux (rrr), that he was fond of paradoxes, and affected singularity ' in his opinions; that he might have employed his talents much better; but he had the ' misfortune to fall into an idle indiscreet way, which he indulged to his death, notwith- ' standing the repeated advices and remonstrances of his best friends. And it was observed ' by the Author of the Freeholder's Journal (sss), that his being known to the world is ' owing chiefly to the animadversions of learned men upon his writings, among whom it is ' a common trick in their disputes, to charge their adversary with an agreement to, or re- ' semblance of Mr Toland's notions, as the greatest infamy, and the surest criterion of ' error.

(bbb) There are several mistakes in it.
(iii) Lord Moleworth. See his Letter to Mr Toland, in p. 484, of the Miscellaneous Works. But our Author had some obligations to the Doctor. See his Specimen of the History of the Druids, in Vol. I. ibid. p. 105.

(nnn) See a Letter to Lord Moleworth in Miscellaneous Works, ubi supra, p. 492.

(ooo) Historical Account of the Life of John Toland, p. 90, et seq.

(rrr) In his Life, p. 92.

(sss) This Journal is dated March 21, 1722.

' To Mr Toland.

' Albemarle-street, Jan. 5, 1721-2.

' Sir,

' Saturday night, about nine, I received yours of that day, which gives me such a dismal account, of your ill state of health, that I was extremely concerned at the condition I found you were in, I doubt, for want of necessaries. I cannot forbear wishing you were in Town; for I doubt you cannot easily get such broths and bits of easy digestion as I should take care to procure for you. Your landlady may be a very good woman, and have a great respect for you; but her poverty (64) may prevent her from providing such sort of victuals and drinks as are proper for a sick man, reduced to so weak a condition as I find you are. Indeed I expected you in Town after the letter I wrote to you last week; not imagining you had been so much out of order; though I saw by your looks that a fit of sickness was growing upon you, which I hoped your vomits and purges had prevented in a great measure. I intend to solicit the Peer, your old stinging acquaintance, and my neighbour, and see whether a letter which I shall send him will move him once in his life to be generous and charitable. Your reflections upon the Physicians and the Injustice of the world are very right; but you must not indulge melancholy thoughts at such a time. Let it suffice you to know, that, although my circumstances are narrow enough, you shall never want necessaries whilst I live. I am sensible that bare necessaries are but cold comfort to a ' man of your spirit and desert; but it is all I dare ' promise you. It is an ungrateful age, and we must ' bear with it the best we may, till we can mend it. ' Adieu, be chearful, and think of going with me for ' Ireland.

' Yours sincerely,

' Moleworth.'

[XX] An epitaph in the note.]

H. S. E.

Johannes Tolandus,
Qui in Hibernia prope Deriam natus,
In Scotia & Hibernia studuit,
Quod Oxonii quoque fecit adolefcens;
Atque Germania plus semel petita
Virilem circa Londinum transegit ætatem.
Omnium literarum Excultor.
Ac linguarum plus decem sciens.
Veritatis Propugnator.
Libertatis Assertor.
Nullius autem sectator aut Cliens.
Nec minis nec malis est inflexus
Quin, quam elegit viam, perageret.
Utili honestum antefereus.
Spiritus cum æthereo patre,
A quo prodiit olim, conjungitur,
Corpus item naturæ cedens
In materno gremio reponitur.
Ipse vero æternum est resurrecturus,
At idem futurus Tolandus nunquam.
Natus Nov. 30.
Cætera ex scriptis pete.

P

(64) See Physic without Physicians, Vol. II. p. 276.

(mmm) See his Life, p. 87.

(ppp) In his Life, p. 88.

(qqq) In his Letters to Mr Locke, of April, and May 26, 1697.

(64) Mr Toland lodged at a Carpenter's house. See above, in the text.

TONSTALL, or TUNSTALL [CUTHBERT], successively Bishop of London and Durham in the sixteenth century, a man of great learning, integrity, and politeness, was a natural son of one Mr Tunstall, a Gentleman of good rank (a) [A], by a daughter of the Conyers family (b). He was born at Hatchford in Richmondshire, about the year 1474 [B]: and became a Student in the University of Oxford about 1491, particularly, as some will have it, in Balliol-College. Being forced to leave it by reason of the plague, he went to Cambridge, where he became Fellow of King's Hall (c) [C]. After some stay there, he travelled beyond sea, and studied in the University of Padua, then in the highest repute; and took the Degree of Doctor of Laws, not having, that we can find, taken any Degree in either of our Universities (d). He so well improved himself in every place, that 'there was scarce any kind of good learning in which he was not excellent; being a very good Grecian, well acquainted with the Hebrew, a very eloquent Rhetorician, a skilful Mathematician, famous especially for Arithmetick, a great Lawyer, and a profound Divine (e).' And all these accomplishments were crowned with eminent piety, virtue, and regularity (f). They soon recommended him to the esteem of all good men, particularly of William Warham, then Archbishop of Canterbury, a most generous Patron of Learning; who constituted him his Vicar-General, or Chancellor [D], Aug. 25, 1511; introduced him to the King: and also collated him, on the 16th of December 1511, to the Rectory of Harrow on the Hill in Middlesex (g). On the 15th of April 1514, he was installed in the Prebend of Stow-longa in the Church of Lincoln: and, November 17, 1515, admitted Archdeacon of Chester (h). May the 12th, 1516, he was made Master of the Rolls (i), for which he was extremely well qualified on account of his knowledge in the Laws. The same year, he and Sir Thomas More were sent Embassadors to the Emperor Charles V, then at Brussels; and had the pleasure and happiness of living there in the same house with the most excellent Erasmus (k) [E], which created a lasting and indelible friendship between them (l). During this employment, our Minister was very sedulous in his charge, as well as very capable of executing it; and nothing wherein his Majesty was concerned escaped him. He perfectly understood the state of the Imperial Court, penetrated into all the designs of it, and failed not, as occasion offered, to impart his advice accordingly, either to the King, or his Officers (m). He returned to England in 1517, but had not been at home above ten days, before he was sent upon a second Embassy to the Emperor (n). In 1519, he was collated to the Prebend of Botevant in the Church of York (o). The 26th of May, 1521, he was also made Prebendary of Combe and Hornham in the Church of Sarum;

(b) J. Leland, Itiner. Vol. IV. p. 17. and Collect.

(c) Wood, Athenzæ, Edit. 1721. Vol. I. col. 127. Godwin, Edit. Clar. Richardsoni, Dr Knight's Life of Erasmus, Cambr. 1726. 8vo. p. 191.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Bishop Godwin's Catalogue &c. as above, Edit. 1615. 4to. p. 669.

(g) Newcourt Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 25, 637. Tanner, Bibliotheca, p. 724.

(h) Survey of the Cathedrals &c. by Dr Browne Willis, Vol. II. p. 244. and Vol. I. p. 414.

(i) Vide ibid. col. 27. 400, &c. Mihi jam non videor vivere, adempto Tunstallo, Erasmi. ibid. viz. col. 400.

(m) Dr Fiddes's Life of Card. Wolsey, fol. p. 130. and Dr Knight's Life of Erasmus, p. 190.

(a) Splendid loco natus, juxta J. Bæz, Scriptorum Britannicæ Cent. IX. p. 713. See W. Harrison's Hist. Descript. of Britain, l. 1. c. 24. in the first volume of Holinshed's Chron.—and Bishop Godwin's Catalogue of the Bishops, under Durham. He says, the father was of a very ancient house.

(f) Maximæ ingenii & doctrinæ dotes insigni pietate, virtute, morum severitate cumulavit. H. Wharton de Episcopis Londi. p. 185.

(j) Pat. 8. Hen. VIII. p. 1.

(k) Erasmi Epistolæ, Edit. Lond. fol. 1642. col. 27, 120, 783, 1509.

(n) Erasmi Epist. ut supra, col. 119.

(o) Dr Browne Willis, as above, Vol. I. p. 123.

[A] Was a natural son of one Mr Tunstall, a gentleman of good rank.] Bishop Godwin says, that he 'was the base son of one Tunstall, a Gentleman of a very ancient house. It is reported, (adds he) that their first ancestor attended William Conqueror as his Barbor, and being raised by him unto some better fortune, in memory of his former estate, took for his armes Sable three combes Argent. But I take this for a fable. The special use of armes is to expresse unto posterity the vertues of such as are raised unto Gentry, and not to remember any thing that may be to the disgrace of the bearer, and make him lesse honourable. Were the first of his race, as he is supposed, because he was not advanced for being a Barbor but for his faithfull and loyall service, such armes should rather have bene given him, as might have registered that virtue, then twighted him with the baseness of his first trade and manner of life. Rather therefore should I gesse some other occasions of these armes, which as they were born by him, may have many very honourable significations.'—It hath been the simple vanity of many considerable Families in this kingdom, to deduce their pedigree from those plundering Invaders, who attended William the Bastard in his conquest of England. And, possibly, that might be the vanity of the Tunstall-family, who derived their name from the Latin word Tonsor, a Barber; and told the story set down above in Bishop Godwin's words. But it is much more likely, that the name of that family was taken from a place in England called Tunstal; there being no less than eight parishes, or places, of that name in this Kingdom (1). Dr Fuller says, that their chief seat was at Tunstall-Thurland in Yorkshire, from whence unquestionably they took their surname (2). . . . In the pedigree of the Holland-family, it is asserted (3), that Cuthbert Tunstall, in his youth, near two years, was brought up in Sir Thomas Holland's kitchen unknown, till being known, he was sent home to Sir Richard Tunstall, his father.

[B] About the year 1474.] A. Wood says, that it was 'in the year 1476, or thereabouts (4).' But, by a memorandum of our learned Author's at the end of his book, De veritate Corporis & Sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi in Eucharistia, it appears that he was in the seventy-seventh year of his age in 1551, when he finished that book; and consequently must have been born about the year 1474. His words are, Hoc opus ab authore absolutum est, Anno ætatis suæ septuagesimo-septimo, qui fuit annus Domini 1551.

[C] Where he became Fellow of King's Hall.] This Hall is now incorporated with, and made part of, Trinity-College (5). And as to Mr Tunstall's having been Fellow of that Hall; it appears from an account, given in by the several Colleges to Queen Elizabeth, when at Cambridge, anno 1564, of men of note in their respective societies. The account given in by Trinity-College styles him, Cuthbertus Tunstall Aulæ Regiæ quondam Socius, postea regnante Henrico VIII. Episc. Lond. tandem Dunelmensis (6).

[D] Or Chancellor.] So Erasmus styles him. Cuthbertus Tunstallus, Cantuariensis Archiepiscopi Cancellarius (7). But he was more properly the Archbishop's Vicar-General in Spirituals, as Archbishop Parker calls him; who adds, that Archbishop Warham introduced and recommended him to King Henry VIII. and that was the occasion of his rise and successive greatness. . . . Ejusque Vicarius in spiritualibus generalis fuerat, ab eoque Henrico Regi Octavo quasi manu deductus, atque traditus (8).—He was ordained Sub-deacon, March 24, 1508, by Richard Fitz-James, bishop of London; and Priest April 19, 1511, by John Thornton, Suffragan to Archbishop Warham (9).

[E] And had the pleasure and happiness of living there in the same house with the most excellent Erasmus.] So Erasmus relates, in the following words: 'Adest hic [viz. Bruxellæ] Cuthbertus Tunstallus apud Anglos scriniis præfectus, sui Regis nomine apud Carolum Principem nostrum orator, vir præter utramque literaturam, quæ neminem suorum non superat, judicio excusso, ac naris emunctissimæ, tum modestiâ quâdam inauditâ, postremo moribus festivis, ac citra gravitatis detrimentum, amoenis. Huic (quo me beatum duco) ἡμολογῶμενος εἶμι (10).' i. e. 'We have here Cuthbert Tunstall, Master of the Rolls in England, Embassador from his Prince to our Emperor Charles V. A man, who not only outdoes all his contemporaries in the knowledge of the learned languages, but is also of an exquisite judgment, and clear understanding, and likewise of an unheard of modesty; and moreover is a chearful and pleasant companion, without losing his proper gravity. I board with him, which is a great happiness to me.'

(5) See T. Fuller's History of the university of Cambridge, p. 39, 40.

(6) Life of Erasmus by Dr Knight, p. 191.

(7) Erasmi Epistolæ, edit. Lond. 1642, fol. col. 582.

(8) Matthæus, in the Appendix to Mr Strype's life of Archbishop Parker, No. XC. p. 16 and in Dr Drake edit. of Antiqui Britann.

(9) Tanner, Bibliotheca, sub Tunstallo p. 72.

(10) Erasmi Epist. edit. u supra, col. 27.

(1) See Villare Anglicum.

(2) Worthies in Yorkshire, p. 197.

(3) Blomfield's Hist. of Norfolk, Vol. I. p. 232.

(4) Athenæ Oxon. Vol. I. ed. 1721, col. 127.

(r) Newcourt, p. 25, and J. Le Neve, p. 179. He was then in great reputation for his learning and piety. See M. Parker, Antiquitates Brit. Edit. Hanov. 1605, p. 312.
(t) Erasmus Epist. Edit. ut supra, col. 1138, &c.

and in the said month and year, elected Dean of the same Church (p) [F]. He behaved so worthily in every station, that in 1522 he was promoted to the Bishopric of London, of which the temporalities were delivered to him, July the 5th; and again, October 7 (q), he was consecrated October 9, and inthronized the 22d following (r). In 1523, May 25, he was made Keeper of the Privy-Seal (s). Though he was undeniably a person of good sense and learning, yet upon the first appearance of Luther's Writings against Popery, so far was he from being convinced by them, that he very earnestly solicited Erasmus to write against Luther, upon whom he bestows very hard names: But Erasmus handsomely excused himself (t) [G]. In March, 1525, our Bishop, and Sir Richard Wingfield, Chancellor of the Duchy, went Embassadors into Spain, to confer with the Emperor, after the

(p) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 25. and J. Le Neve's Fasti, p. 264.
(q) Rymer, Acta Pub. Tom. XIII. p. 771, 774.
(r) Newcourt, ibid. and Rymer, Tom. XIV, p. 1.

[F] And in the said month and year elected Dean of the same church. About the same time, he attended Cardinal Wolsey in his splendid Embassy to the Emperor Charles V. (11).

[G] He very earnestly solicited Erasmus to write against Luther, upon whom he bestows very hard names: but Erasmus handsomely excused himself. He begins his letter by informing Erasmus, that he was suspected of having assisted Luther in his answer to King Henry VIII. His own words are; 'Dici non potest, quantopere sum gavissus, lectis tuis literis, præsertim his quibus tum ad Regem tum ad Legatum scriptis, his te suspicionibus liberas, quas de libello a Lutero in Regem edito, tanquam aliquid inesset tuum, hic subortas esse nonnulli tibi retulerunt: non quod animis hominum tam alte intederat hæc suspitio, ut tuis literis fuerit revelanda: quandoquidem sic totus liber contumeliis scatur, sic singulis pagellis Lutherianum virus spirat, ut ex qua officina proderit, ille ipse lectus prodatur; verum ea te sum latatus vehementer, quod ex his intellexi tibi cum Lutherianis male convenire, teque a Pontifice Maximo rogatum, ut congregandi cum Lutero provinciam susciperes, jam exoratum prope in procinctu esse. Id quod omnes amici tui magnopere & expectant & cupiunt, ut cum illo Proteo, imo verius Atheo, tandem congregiare. Cæterum ex Lutero, inquis, & Lutherianis male audiam. At non pejus, quam Deus ipse, quem ille maliciæ omnis autorem facit, dum liberum tollit ab hominibus arbitrium, atque omnia statim necessitatis legibus fieri prorsus contendit, ut liberum cuiquam non sit, si velit bene facere,' &c. i. e. 'I cannot express, how great a joy your letters have given me, especially those you have written to his Majesty and the Legate (12), by which you free yourself from the suspicions entertained here against you, as if you had had a hand in Luther's book against the King; not that those suspicions were so fixed in people's minds, that there was any need of letters from you to remove them; for the whole book is so full of railing, and breathes so in every page the Lutheran poison, that the reading of it shews out of what shop it comes. But I am extremely glad to find by your letters, that you are upon ill terms with the Lutherans, and have been requested by the Pope to engage with Luther; which you are preparing to do. That you would at length attack that Proteus, or rather that Atheist, is the earnest expectation and desire of all your friends. But you say, that it will give you a bad character with Luther, and the Lutherans. Not worse surely than Luther doth to God himself, whom he makes the author of all evil, when he takes Free-will from mankind, and maintains that all things are done by the laws of Necessity, so that every one is not at liberty to do good if he would.' &c.—This letter breathes the true spirit of Popery, and not that spirit of Meekness for which some have celebrated our Author. But it is to be remembered, that it was written whilst Popery was triumphant; and in our Prelate's younger years: Afterwards, age, and the revolutions in the state of religion in this kingdom, cooled his zeal, and taught him more prudence and moderation. Let it be further observed, That he was not then a Predestinarian, as he became afterwards, witness his book Against the impious blasphemers of God's Predestination. And as to Luther, he at first professed that cruel doctrine, but softened some of the rigor of it before his death; and his Followers condemn it absolutely.

Erasmus, in his Answer, commends our Bishop's zeal, but insinuates that it ought to be according to knowledge. And has these excellent passages: 'Istud tam pium studium, tam flagrantem erga Ecclesiam Dei zelum non possum equidem non vehementer probare, præful cum primis observande: nec dubito quin istum mentis impetum judicio susceperis: at mihi meique similibus circumspiciendum est, ne, quod scribit Apostolus, zelum habeamus, sed non secundum scientiam; ac, juxta Parmenonis comici dictum, metuendum ne nimium calidum hoc sit modo. Siquidem video quibusdam usu venire, ut dum majore studio quam judicio rem gerunt, non solum una cum zizaniis evellant triticum, quod Christus in Evangelio fieri vetuit, verum etiam pro zizaniis evellant triticum; dum vel prius damnant quam intelligunt, vel quod pie dictum est interpretatione depravant: idque videri volunt zelum religionis, & hæreses odium, quum hæc præcipua sit pestis & pietatis & concordia. Sic qui vehementer amant quempiam, nihil in eo non laudant: qui vehementer oderunt, nihil non damnant. In Lutheri scriptis quedam audio reprobari, quæ, si sobria collatione inter eruditos & integros disputarentur, nonnihil conferrent ad spiritualem & Evangelicam vigorem, a quo mundus nimium profecto degeneravit' Then he bewails the disturbances occasioned by the Anabaptists, and other Sectaries, in Germany, who were running from one extreme into another. . . . 'Utinam de exitu rei tua te fallat divinatio, mihi non admodum sagaci jamdudum idem subolet: quod si eveniat, vereor ne pro excusis Pontificibus, Episcopis, & Principibus, sordidos quosdam dominos recipiamus multo illis inclementiores. Nam ἀναρχίας jam pridem mussant ii quos Anabaptistas vocant: aluntur & alia dogmatum monstra, quæ, si proruperint, efficiunt ut Lutherus propemodum orthodoxus videri possit. . . . Extitit aliud insanix genus, Prophetæ volunt videri, sed ridentur ab omnibus. Nulla quidem adhuc exorta secta, quæ de Christo prædicet impie: multis tamen hic opinionum tumultus addidit animos, ut ausint non solum de Christi Divina natura blasphema loqui, verum etiam de Scripturæ totius auctoritate dubitare. Ita sit, quoties semel effractis repagulis sese in licentiæ campum effudit hominum temeritas, nullam facit insanix finem, donec omnia secum involvat exitio.' . . . The substance of which is, 'That he could not but greatly commend his pious affection and flagrant zeal for the church of God, and did not doubt but it was taken up with due judgment; but as for Himself and others, they were to beware not to have a zeal without knowledge, as the Apostle writes, and according to Parmeno's saying, that it should not be too hot. For he saw it usually happen, that when men act with more eagerness than judgment, they not only do what Christ hath forbidden in the Gospel, that is, pluck up the wheat with the tares, but instead of the tares pull up the wheat; whilst they condemn before they understand, or misinterpret what hath been piously said: and that they would have it pass for a zeal for religion, and an aversion to heresies, when it is the chief bane of piety and concord. So they who vehemently admire any one, find nothing but good in him; and they who hate violently, dislike all. In Luther's writings, says he, I hear that some things are condemned, which, if they were coolly examined by learned and unprejudiced persons, would contribute to that spiritual and Evangelic Heartiness and Zeal, which is too much lost in the world. . . . The Bishop had hinted at the Confusions like to ensue from some blind Zealots, upon the alteration of Religion. . . Erasmus says, he apprehended the same; and was afraid that, in the room of Popes, Bishops, and Princes, the Scum should become uppermost, and prove more severe and unmerciful masters than the others. The Anabaptists were already aiming at Anarchy; and other monstrous opinions were hatching, in comparison of which Luther appeared almost orthodox. . . . Another kind of madness, saith he, is that they would pass for Prophets; but they only expose themselves to ridicule. Some begin already to talk blasphemously about the Divine nature of Christ, and to bring the authority of the Scriptures into question. So it comes to pass, that when Mankind have once broken the bounds, they never stop in their madness, till they have involved every thing into utter destruction.'

(11) Erasmus Epist. col. 759.

(12) i. e. King Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey, who was the Pope's Legate.

(u) Hall's Chronicle, in Henry VIII. fol. 137. a. Stow's Annals, Edit. 1631. p. 523. and Lord Herbert's Reign of Henry VIII. under the year 1525.

(y) Hall, fol. 186. See also Lord Herbert, under the year 1529.

(z) Bishop Godwin's Catal. as above. Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Part I. p. 783.

(bb) J. Pits, de illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus, &c. Edit. Paris, 1619. 4to. p. 760.

(13) Erasmi Epistolæ, ut supra, Ep. 3. lib. 16. p. 725.

(14) Hist. of the Reformat. Pt. i. p. 159.

(15) Under the 21st year of King Henry VIII. fol. 186. See the article TINDALE [WILLIAM].

(16) Sir Thomas More.

(17) Matthæus, ut supra.

King of France's being taken at the battle of Pavia (u). We find him employed, in March 1527, in prosecuting several persons in his Diocese, particularly about Colchester, that entertained heretical opinions, as they were called, that is, differing from the then established Popery (w). The July following, he attended Cardinal Wolsey in his pompous Embassy into France (x); being one of his Eminency's most able and faithful Counsellors [H]. In 1529, he was one of the English Ambassadors at the famous Treaty of Cambray; and, at his return from that place through Antwerp, bought up all the copies of William Tindale's Translation of the New Testament that remained unfold, in order to burn them at Paul's Cross (y) [I]: So firmly attached was he to Popery! However, he had behaved with so much faithfulness and prudence in his Embassies [K], and all other public employments, that, in 1530, he was translated to the rich Bishopric of Durham (z) [L]. Before his removal from the See of London, he had bestowed much money in furnishing a Library in Cambridge, with good books, both printed and manuscript, which he had collected abroad. And, after his translation to Durham, he laid out great sums, in adorning that city with public buildings, and in repairing, improving, and beautifying his episcopal houses (aa) [M]. He declared, and wrote, for King Henry the Eighth's divorce from Queen Catharine of Arragon, when that affair came to be debated: though it seems he afterwards altered his mind (bb) [N]. And when that King took the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, he recommended it, both in his injunctions, and in a sermon preached at Durham; as he testifies in a letter, set down in the note below (cc) [O]: though he had before, in 1531, solemnly protested against that [H] Being one of his Eminency's most able and faithful Counsellors.] Erasmus, after mentioning him in that capacity, among many of our most eminent men, breaks out into this exclamation: Quid Cuthbertum Tunstallum, cum quovis prætorum conferendum, quorum non ita multa paria celebravit antiquitas? O domum illam augustam ac felicem! O vere splendidum Cardinalem, qui tales viros habet in consiliis, cujus mensa talibus hominibus cingitur! (13).

[I] Bought up all the copies of William Tindale's translation &c.] This fact is thus related by Bishop Burnet (14), from the original author Edward Hall (15). 'Tunstall, then Bishop of London, being a man of invincible moderation, would do no body hurt, yet endeavoured as he could, to get their [the Reformers] books into his hands: So being at Antwerp, in the year 1529, as he returned from his Embassy at the Treaty at Cambray, he sent for one Packington, an English merchant there, and desired him to see how many New Testaments of Tindal's translation he might have for money. Packington, who was a secret favourer of Tindal, told him what the Bishop proposed. Tindal was very glad of it; for being convinced of some faults in his work, he was designing a new and more correct edition; but he was poor, and the former Impression not being sold off, he could not go about it: so he gave Packington all the copies that lay in his hands, for which the Bishop payed the price, and brought them over, and burnt them publicly in Cheapside. This had such an hateful appearance in it, being generally called a burning of the Word of God, that people from thence concluded, there must be a visible contrariety between that Book and the Doctrines of those who so handled it; by which both their prejudice against the Clergy, and their desire of reading the New Testament, was increased. So that next year, when the Second Edition was finished, many more were brought over, and Constantine being taken in England, the Lord Chancellor (16) in a private examination, promised him that no hurt should be done him, if he would reveal who encouraged and supported them at Antwerp; which he accepted of, and told that the greatest Encouragement they had, was from the Bishop of London, who had bought up half the impression. This made all that heard of it laugh heartily, though more judicious persons discerned the great temper of that learned Bishop in it.'

[K] He had behaved with so much faithfulness and prudence in his Embassies.] This is acknowledged by Archbishop Parker in the following words . . . Cujus [Henry VIII.] crebras legationes summa fide & prudentia ad plerosque Christiani orbis Principes, tanta laude & celebritate obiit, ut fama ubique notus & per vulgatus fuerit (17). i. e. Whose [viz. Henry VIII's] frequent Embassies to most Christian Princes, he performed with the utmost faithfulness and prudence, so much to his own reputation and honour, that he was known and esteemed every where.

[L] In 1530, he was translated to the rich bishopric of Durham.] He was translated by a bull, dated Feb. 21, 1529-30. And the Temporalities, which had been committed to his custody the 4th of the same month, were restored to him the 25th of March following (18).

[M] And, after his translation to Durham, he laid out great sums in adorning that city, &c.] This is the account given of it by Bishop Godwin (19): 'Hee built from the ground a most beautiful Porch or Gate-house (with a Chappel annexed thereunto) of faire stone, in the castle of Durham, and added to the said castle certaine gates with iron bars and portcullies, supported with strong wals on each side. He brought water thither with a conduit, whereas before time it was ferved with well-water. He made the gate-house at Alnewike, [a chamber at Aukland] and built the Tolebooth in the market of Durham, all of stone, with divers edifices neare the hinder part of the said Tolbooth, which he gave also to the city of Durham. Lastly, he repaired with great charge [Norham-castle] and the third part of Tine-bridge.'

[N] He declared, and wrote, for King Henry VIIIth's divorce from Queen Catharine, &c.] Bishop Burnet says, that 'the King having commanded the Archbishop of Canterbury to require the opinions of the Bishops of England, they all, in a writing under their hands and seals, declared they judged it an unlawful Marriage. Only the Bishop of Rochester refused to set his hand to it (20).' J. Pits's account is more explicit; being in these words (21): Unicam in tota vita sibi inussit maculam, quod videlicet ab Henrico rege seductus & inductus fuerit, ut matrimonium Regis cum Catharina Hispana dissolvi posse & debere offeruerit, idque libro scripto probare conatus fuerit. Cujus facti ita eum postea pœnituit, ut in contrariam plane sententiam descenderit, & damnato, quem prius scripserat, libro, Reginae partes constanter tenuerit, fueritque in illa causa unus ex Reginae advocatis, i. e. There was only one blot in his life, namely, his being seduced and drawn in by King Henry, to assert, that the King's marriage with Catharine of Spain might and ought to be dissolved, and to write a book wherein he endeavours to prove it. Of which he so much repented afterwards, that he went into the quite contrary opinion; and condemning the book he had written, constantly took the Queen's part, and was one of the advocates in her cause.' This latter part is explained by the following paragraph in Bishop Fisher's life (22): 'Cardinal Campeius called for Doctour Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of London, and desired to heare him speak, for he was a man of profound judgement and learning, and one in whose wisdom and honesty the Cardinal reposed great confidence. This Tunstall had written a very learned Treatise in defence of the Queene's marriage, which indeed should have been read in the Court, but the King fearing his abilities, purposely sent him upon an Embassie into Scotland (at the very time he should have appeared) about a triviall businesse, so that he appeared not in Court this second time.'

[O] As he testifies in a Letter &c.] That Letter, written to Mr Crumwel, is in these words: 'And where now of late I have also received the King's most honorable Letters sent unto me by Sir Francis Bygot, Knight, containing the King's Highnes commandment for setting forth of his title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the abolishment of the authority of the Bishop of Rome; I not only myself, before the receipt of the same

(w) See Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials, Vol. I. p. 74, 78, &c.

(x) Hall's Chronicle, as above, fol. 160. b.

(aa) Ibid. and Dr Richardson's Edit. of Bishop Godwin. See also Dr Knight's Life of Erasmus, p. 191. and M. Parker, Hist. Academiæ Cantabrig. p. v.

(cc) Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials, Vol. II. p. 191. See also Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part I. Collect. of Records, p. 177.

(18) Rymer, Acta Publ. Tom. XIV. p. 364, 384, 387.

(19) Catalogue of Bishops, as above, p. 670. and edit. Cl. W. Richardson, Leland's Itiner. Vol. I. p. 75.

(20) Hist. of the Reformation, Pt. i. p. 38.

(21) De illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus &c. p. 760.

(22) By Thomas Baily, alias Ric. Hall, D. D. Lond. 1655. 8vo. p. 83.

that title [P]. The same point, of the King's Supremacy, he earnestly vindicated also in 1538, in a sermon preached before his Majesty, upon Palm-Sunday [Q], wherein he zealously condemned the usurpations of the Bishop of Rome (dd). In 1535, he was one of the Commissioners for taking the valuation of Ecclesiastical Benefices, in order to settle the First-fruits and Tenths (ee). And in 1537, the King commanded him, on account of his learning and judgment, to peruse Reginald Pole's book of Ecclesiastical Union (ff); which occasioned some letters between the Cardinal and our Bishop; particularly a severe joint one from him, and John Stokesley, Bishop of London, against the Pope's Supremacy (gg) [R]. The year following, he was appointed to confer about the Reformation of Religion, with some Embassadors from the Protestant German Princes; but things were not yet ripe for a proper alteration in this Kingdom (hh). In 1541, came out a new edition of the Bible in English, revised by him and Nicolas Heath, Bishop of Rochester [S]. He did not approve of every part of Popery; but was of opinion, that old Usages and Traditions were not to be broken without a great cause, and that some of them were in no wise to be broken (ii). In the reign of King Edward the Sixth, he went along with the Reformation [T] for some years; and was one of the Privy-Council, and of the King's Council in the North (kk). At length, some of the Courtiers covetsame Letters, had don my duty in setting forth his title of Supreme Head, but also caused others to do the same. And so his Grace was prayed for ever since the Proclamation of the Act thereupon made. And as soon as upon the receipt of the King's said letter, I repaired to Duresm, and there preached myself again in great presence, as wel in setting forth the King's Title, as in declaring the usurped authority of the Bishop of Rome, heretofore used in this realin. And so have done, and shall, from time to time accomplish the King's commandment in my diocess, God willing. There were words in the said Letter that sore grieved me; that the King's Highness should repute, that I should look for a new world, or mutation. If the King's Highness knew my mind, as God doth, sure I am, those words had not been put in. For I have been as sore against such Usurpations of the Bishop of Rome, as dayly did grow, as any man of my degree in this realme. And that I should now look for the renewing of that thing, which I withstood heretofore, as far as I might, when he flourished most, it is not likely. Surely I look for no mutation, nor new world, but one; which is the changing of this life transitory to the life eternal in the world to come. Which mutation, whensoever it shall happen, I beseech Almighty Jesus of his infinite mercy, that I may leave the King's Highness in his most prosperous reign many years after my decease, to myche increase of his Honour, the wealth of his Subjects, and the propagation of his most royal posterity. And thus Almighty Jesus preserve your good Mothership to his pleasure and yours. From Aukland the 10 day of July.

Your Majesty's humble Bedeman,

Cuthbert Duresm (23).'

[P] Though he had before solemnly protested against that title.] It was upon occasion of the following words, in the preamble to the grant of a subsidy to King Henry VIII, in a Convocation for the province of York . . . ' Quamplurimos hostes, et maxime Lutheranos, in perniciem ecclesie et cleri Anglicani (cujus singularem protectorem unicum et Supremum Dominum, et quantum per Christi legem licet, etiam Supremum Caput ipsius majestatem recognoscimus) conspirantes, . . . from which, as he observes, some, lately suspected and accused of heresy, had taken occasion to decline and deny the jurisdiction of their own Bishops; therefore he thought the following distinctions necessary . . . ' viz. ' ut, si per ea intelligatur, quod Rex sit post Christum ' Supremum Regni sui, et Cleri Anglicani in terrenis ' et temporalibus caput, sicut revera est, et omnes recognoscimus, sic ad vitandum malignorum interpretationem exprimenda sunt verba, ne in alium sensum ab hæreticis trahantur. Si vero per ea intelligatur ' indistincte, prout verba sonant, quod Rex tam in spiritualibus, quam in terrenis et temporalibus sit Supremum ecclesie caput, et quod ita licere per Christi legem affirmetur, sicut malignantes quidam illa verba ' [scilicet, quantum per Christi legem licet] tanquam ' assertive posita capere videntur, quia hic sensus cum ' sententia catholice ecclesie videtur non convenire; ' idcirco ab hujusmodi sententia, verbis sic intellectis ' & positis, ne ab ecclesia catholica, extra quam nemi Christiano est salus, dissentire videar, expresse ' dissentio—(24). ' The substance of which is, he was willing to allow, that the King, after Christ, was the Supreme Head of his Kingdom, and of the Clergy of England, in earthly and temporal matters; but would not acknowledge him to be such, both in spirituals and temporals, and that it was lawful according to the Law of Christ; lest he should seem to dissent from the Catholic Church, without which there is no salvation for any Christian.

[Q] In a sermon preached before his Majesty, upon Palm-Sunday.] That sermon is what Archbishop Parker refers to (25); when, after saying that Bishop Tonstall disowned the Pope's Supremacy in his last days, he goes on thus: Id quod ante, Henrico Rege regnante, qui primus eandem potentiam labi-factavit, regnoque eiecit, vehementissimè, doctissimeque pro concione suavit. . . The text was Philipp. ii. from ver. 5 to 12. And the sermon was printed by Thomas Berthelet, at London, 1539. 4to. reprinted in 1633. See below, note [FF]. It is upon account of this sermon, and our Author's subsequent relapse, that Michael Wood thus abuses him (26). ' I have heretofore (says he) with no small admiration, ' readde a certain sermon made in Englishe, before our ' late Sovereigne Lorde Kinge Henry the Eight, about ' xiiii years past, by Doctour Tonstall, then Bishop ' of Duresme, and set furthe in printe, bylike for ' his owne glorie, or rather purgacion, being suspected (and not without cause) to be a favourer of the ' pretended autoritie, and antichristian power of the ' Bishop of Rome (whereof he is bent at this daye with ' other his complices to shew himself, that sermon notwithstanding, not only to be a friendly favourer, but ' with an open diligent proctour) . . .

[R] Which occasioned some letters between the Cardinal and our Bishop.] Reginald Pole was created Cardinal, December 22, 1538 (27). One of the letters that passed between them, is printed in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation (28). Another in Mr Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials (29). And another, in J. Foxe's Acts and Monuments (30), Bacon's Reports (31), and the Appendix to Dr Knight's Life of Erasmus (32).

[S] In 1541, came out a new Edition of the Bible in English, &c.] There is, in the beginning, the picture of King Henry VIII, with Crumwel and Cranmer; and the title is, ' The Bible in English, of the largest and greatest Volume: auctorysed and appointed, by the Commaundement of our most redoubted Prince and Sovereign Lord, King Henry VIII, Supreme Head of this his Church and Realm of England: To be frequented and used in every Church within this his said Realm; according to the tenour of his former injurections given in the behalf. Overseen and perused at the Commaundement of the King's Highness, by the Right Reverend Fathers in God, Cuthbert Bishop of Durham; and Nicolas Bishop of Rochester. Printed by Edward Whitchurch, Cum Privilegio, ad imprimendum solum. 1541.' . . . The New Testament in English, of William Tindale's translation, was first printed in 1526, and the whole Bible by Myles Coverdale, in 1535. fol. (33).

[T] He went along with the Reformation.] In all points he gave obedience to every Law, and to all the injunctions that were made: but always in Parliament protested against the changes in Religion; which he thought he might with a good conscience submit to and obey; though he could not consent to them. Only in the matter of the corporal presence, he was still of the old persuasion, and writ about it (34).

(dd) See an abstract of that sermon in Strype's Memorials, Vol. I. p. 336, &c.
(ff) De Unione Ecclesiastica.

(hh) Idem, p. 329, 330. and Appendix. p. 260.

(kk) Strype's Mem. Vol. II. p. 457, 458. 462. J. Collier says, he was dismissed the Council-board in 1547. Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 233.

(25) Mattheus, ut supra.

(26) Preface to the English Translation of Stephen Gardiner's book, De vera Obedientia, &c. 1553. 8vo. See Wood, Ath. Vol. I. Edit. 1721. col. 128.

(27) Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. I. p. 299.

(28) Part III. Collect. No. 52.

(29) Vol. I. p. 296. and Appendix, No. 83. p. 206.

(30) Vol. II.

(31) Fol. 272.

(32) P. 66, &c.

(33) See J. Lewis's Hist. of the English Translations of the Bible. 8vo.

(34) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part II. p. 194.

(ee) Ibid. Vol. I. p. 211. and Appendix, p. 147.

(gg) Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. I. p. 296—299.

(ii) Idem, Appendix, p. 257.

(23) Cott. Libr. Cicop. L. 6. p. 248 b. See Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. I. p. 191. and Appendix, p. 153.

(24) Wilkins, Concil. Vol. III. p. 745. See Collier's Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 63.

ing the revenues of his rich Bishopric, took the advantage of an accusation of misprision of treason brought against him; for which he was committed to the Tower, on the 20th of December 1551 (ll) [V]. The Parliament sitting, on the 28th of March, a Bill was brought into the House of Lords, to attain him for misprision of treason. Archbishop Cranmer spoke warmly and freely against it [W], not satisfied, it seems, with the charge that was laid: However, the Bill pass, and the Archbishop protested. But when it came down to the Commons, they were not satisfied with the evidence, which consisted of bare depositions of witnesses; but required, that the accusers might be brought face to face: And so it went no farther (mm). When he could not be ruined in a Parliamentary way, means were contrived to do it in a more private and effectual manner. For that purpose, a Commission was granted, September 21, 1552, to seven persons [X]; empowering them to call before them Cuthbert, Bishop of Durham, and examine him of all manner of conspiracies &c. And if he were found guilty, to deprive him of his Bishopric (nn). Accordingly he was deprived, either the 11th or 14th of October (oo), and remained a prisoner in the Tower all the rest of King Edward's reign. Upon his deprivation, the Bishopric was offered to Dr Robert Horne, Dean of the same Church, who refused to accept of it: Next, to Nicolas Ridley, Bishop of London. Then a project was formed of dividing the Bishopric into two, by founding a new one at Newcastle: but that design did not take effect; nor, very probably, was it ever intended it should. For, though that is mentioned in a private Act of Parliament, in March 1552-3, whereby it was actually dissolved; yet, in April 1553, being converted into a County Palatine, it was given to the ambitious John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland (pp) [Y]. Upon Queen Mary's accession to the Throne, in 1553, Bishop Tonsall was not only delivered from his imprisonment, on the 5th of August (qq), but also reinstated in his Bishopric [Z]. March 13, 1554, he was put in Commission with Gardiner, Bonner, and others, to deprive Robert Holgate, Archbishop of York, and John Bird, Robert Ferrar, and Paul Bush, Bishops of St David's, Chester, and Bristol, on account of their being married (rr). Otherwise he behaved, during this whole cruel reign, with great lenity, moderation, and good nature; no ways embruing his hands in the blood of the faithful and unfortunate Protestants [AA], who were brought to the stake: so that his Diocese escaped the persecutions, which were too frequent in others at that time (ss). When Queen Elizabeth (ll) King Edward's Journal, in Bishop Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation. Collect. of Records, p. 42. and Part II. of that History, p. 194, 195.

(nn) Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. II. p. 367, 489.

(pp) Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. II. p. 367, 395. and Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 283. and Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part II. p. 215, 216. and Collier's Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 326.

(qq) Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Part I. p. 783. note.

(mm) Burnet, ibid. p. 194, 195. and Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, by J. Strype, fol. 1694. p. 288, 289.

(oo) Ibid. p. 367. and King Edward's Journal, ubi supra, p. 64.

(rr) Rymer, Act. Publ. Tom. XV. p. 370. Collect. of Records in Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part II. p. 256, 257.

(ss) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part I. p. 33, 159. and Part II. p. 195, 387. Knight's Life of Erasmus, p. 190.

[V] Took the advantage of an accusation of misprision of treason brought against him, for which he was committed to the Tower, &c.] The best account of that affair is in the following Minutes in the Council-books. ' May 20, 1551. The Bishop of Durham is commanded to keep his house. August 2, He had licence to walk in the fields. December 20. Whereas the Bishop of Durham, about July 1550, was charged by Vivian Menville, to have consented to a conspiracy in the North, for the making a rebellion; and whereas, for want of a Letter written by the said Bishop to the said Menville (whereupon great trial of this matter depended) the final Determination of the matter could not be proceeded unto, and the Bishop only commanded to keep his house; the same letter hath of late been found in a casket of the Duke of Somerset's, after his last apprehension. The said Bishop was sent for, and this day appeared before the Council, and was charged with the Letter, which he could not deny but to be his own hand-writing: and having little to say for himself, he was then sent to the Tower, there to abide till he should be delivered by process of law (35).'

[W] Archbishop Cranmer spoke freely against it.] There was a constant good correspondence between Cranmer and him: Though in many things they differed in opinion; yet Tonsall was both a man of candour, and of great moderation, which agreed so well with Cranmer's temper, that no wonder they lived always in good terms (36). The Bill was greatly hurried through the House of Lords; for it was read three times, on March 28, 29, and 31 (37).

[X] A Commission was granted . . . to seven persons.] Namely to Sir Roger Cholmely, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Sir Richard Rede, John Gofnold, Richard Goodrick, Robert Chidley, . . . Stamford, Esquires, and Richard Liel, Doctor of Law; or to seven, six, or five of them (38).

[Y] Was given to the ambitious John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland.] Sir John Harrington's account of this affair may be deemed full severe, but it is in these words . . . ' Concerning this Bishoprick it is formerly noted by mine Author, that it was once dissolved by Act of Parliament in the Minority of King Edward VI, what time the two new Dukes of Sommerset and Northumberland, like the Souldiers that cast lots for Christ's garment, divided between them Patrimonium Crucifixi, namely the two good Bishopricks of Bath and Durham, one being designed as a Seat for the Western Duke, the other for the Northern; and whereas by an old metamorphosis the Bishop of Durham had been Earle of Northumberland (39), now by a new Apotheosis the Duke of Northumberland would have bene Bishop of Durham: But qui despectit de caelo deridebat eos. That visible hand that wrote in the wall while Balthasar was quaffing in the holy vessels, that hand though invisible weighed these petty Monarchs in the ballance of God's judgements, found them too light; and because they should not grow too long, they were both cut shorter by the head: the Bishopricks restored to what they now are by Queene Mary, one being in substance, the other by accident of leaden mines, two of the best Bishopricks in England (40).'

[Z] But also reinstated in his Bishoprick.] ' As it was dissolved by Act of Parliament, and the Regalities of it, which had been given to the Duke of Northumberland, were now by his attainder fallen into the Queen's hands, she granted Dr Tonsall letters patent, whereby she erected that Bishopric anew; mentioning, that some wicked men, to enrich themselves by it, had procured it to be dissolved (41).—Upon his Appeal, a Commission had been granted to some persons to examine it: And in that Commission it is alleged, That the Sentence of Deprivation was given only by laymen; that Tonsall being kept prisoner long in the Tower, was brought to his trial, without either having counsel assigned him, or convenient time given him for clearing himself; and that, after divers protestations, notwithstanding his appeal, he had been deprived of his Bishoprick (42).'

[AA] No ways embruing his hands in the blood of the Protestants.] David Lloyd, in his uncouth way, speaks thus of him (43): ' In the reign of Queen Mary, he spake more harshly against the Protestants (calling Bishop Hooper Beast for being married) than he acted: being politickly presumed to bark the more, that he might bite the less; and observed to threaten much in London, and do little in his own Diocess. For I meet with a marginal note in Mr Foxe, which indeed justly deserved even in the fairest letters to be inserted in the body of his book: ' Note, that Bishop Tonsall in Queen Mary's days was no great bloody Persecutor: for Mr Ruffel a preacher was before him, and Dr Hinmer, his Chancellour, would have had him examined more particularly; the Bishop staid him, saying, Hitherto we have had a good report among our neighbours, I pray you bring not this man's blood upon my head.'

came

(35) Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, by J. Strype, p. 283. and see his Eccl. Memor. Vol. II. p. 366.

(36) Burnet's History of the Reformation, Pt. II. p. 195.

(37) Lords Journals.

(38) Strype's Eccl. Memor. Vol. II. p. 489.

(39) Hugh Pudsey.

(40) A briefe View of the State of the Church of England, &c. Lond. 1653. 8vo. p. 204.

(41) Burnet's History of the Reformation, Pt. II. p. 247.

(42) Burnet, ibid. p. 216. and Rymer, Act. Publ. Tom. XV. p. 334.

(43) State-Worthies, ed. 1679. p. 531.

came to the Crown, there were great hopes that a man of his great meekness and knowledge (ii) would have readily come into the Reformation; but being attached to some of the errors of Popery, and being indeed so far advanced in years, that he had in all probability but a very little time to live, he conscientiously chose rather to lose his rich Bishopric, than act against his own judgement (iii). Being therefore deprived in July 1559, for refusing the oath of Supremacy, he was committed to Matthew Parker, Archbishop elect of Canterbury [BB], in free custody, where he was entertained in a most kind, friendly, and brother-like manner (xx) [CC]. The Archbishop, in his frequent conversations with him, brought him off from many of the errors of Popery [DD]. He did not continue long in that retired and private condition: for he died November the 18th, 1559, at the age of eighty-five (yy); and was very handsomely buried in the chancel of Lambeth-Church, at the charge of Archbishop Parker (zz). Over his grave a black marble stone was soon after laid, with an epitaph composed by the learned Dr Haddon (aaa) [EE]. The several pieces he composed, and which were published either by himself or others, are set down below [FF]. His character hath been represented in the most advantageous light, by the immortal Erasmus, and other his contemporaries. They commend his charity, his hospitality, and generosity [GG]; his meekness, chastity, temperance,

(ii) Ingenio mihi vixque pontificio. Tabula Chronice sub Episcop. Dunelm. ad calcem Parkeri de Antiq. Brit. Eccl. Edit. Drake. Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. Part II. p. 387, 396.
(xx) Godwin's Catalogue, 25 above. Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 47.
(zz) Matthæi sumptibus honorifice humatus. Matthæus, ubi supra, p. 161.

[BB] He was committed to Matthew Parker, Archbishop elect of Canterbury.] Had Antony Wood considered every circumstance, he need not have asked, 'how that could be, seeing the said Matthew was not consecrated Archbishop till December 17, 1559 (44)?' But Bishop Tonstall was 'put in prison for a little while,' after his refusing the oath (45). And the Compte d'héri for Archbishop Parker being dated July 18, and he being actually elected August 1st (46), he might, at least from this last period, very properly bear the title of Archbishop, even before his consecration. However, to avoid all ambiguity, we have added above, in the text, the title of Archbishop elect.

[CC] Where he was entertained in a most kind, friendly, and brother-like manner. Non tam custodia observandus, quam summa excipiendus humanitate, alendusque; as Dr Drake's words are (47). 'He lived there, faith Lloyd (48), in sweet chambers, warm beds, by warm fires, with plentiful and wholesome diet at the Archbishop's own table: differing nothing from his former grandeur, save that that was at his own charges, and this at another's; and that he had not his former suit of superfluous servants, that long train that doth not swarn but weary the wearer thereof.'

[DD] The Archbishop . . . brought him off from many of the errors of Popery.] So the Archbishop himself testifies. Hic, opera Matthæi, a multis Popisticis nugis, quas Maria regnante sequutus est, prorsus abducens fuit, Popalemque tam ambituose dilatatam, potentiam, plane a Christianorum cervicibus depellendam, & suæ, nempe Romanæ urbis atque diocesis finibus concludendam, affirmavit. . . . In articulis tamen quibusdam ecclesiasticis adhuc firmiter hæsit, uti Clericorum conjugia lege divina licita ac permissa statuerit (49). i. e. 'By Matthew [Parker's] means he was entirely brought off from many Popish trifles, which he had adhered to under Queen Mary, and was of opinion, that the Pope's ambitious Power, which was stretched so far, ought to be shaken off from the necks of Christians, and confined within its proper bounds, namely the city and diocese of Rome.—However, he stuck firmly still to some articles of Popery, though he judged that the marriage of Priests was allowed by the law of God.' . . . And, in the point of justification, he was of the same opinion as the Reformed (50)—He told Bernard Gilpin, that in the matter of Transubstantiation, Pope Innocent III. had done unadvisedly, in making it an article of faith. And further confessed, that the Pope committed a great fault in the business touching indulgencies; and other thing (*).

[EE] With an Epitaph composed by the learned Dr Haddon.] It is in the old black English letter, and in these words:

Anglia Cuthbertum Tunstallum mesta requirit,
Cujus summa domi laus erat atque foris.
Rhetor, Arithmeticus, Juris consultus et equi,
Legatusque fuit; denique Presul erat.
Annorum Sater, & magnorum plenus honorum,
Vertitur in cinere aurei iste senex.
Vixit annos LXXXV. obiit
18 Novemb. MCCCCCLIX.

[FF] The several pieces he composed, and which were published by himself, &c.] Those published by himself were, 1. In laudem Matrimonii. Oratio habita in Sponsalibus Mariæ filæ Hen. VIII. et Francisci Francorum Regis primogeniti. Lond. 1518. 4to. i. e. 'In praise of Matrimony. An Oration pronounced at the Espousals of Mary daughter of King Henry VIII, and Francis eldest son of Lewis XII. King of France. 2. De Arte Suptandi libri quatuor, Cuthberti Tonstalli. i. e. A Treatise of Arithmetic. London, 1522. 4to. Printed by R. Pinson; reprinted several times in divers parts. A very beautiful edition was printed at Paris in 1538, 4to, by the excellent Robert Stephens. 3. Sermon on Palm-Sunday before King Henry VIII, on Philippians ii. from ver. 5. to the 12th. London, 1539. 4to. Printed by Thomas Berthelet; reprinted in 1633. 4to. See above, note [2]. 4. De veritate Corporis et Sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi in Eucharistia, Authore Cuthberto Tonstallo Dunelmensi Episcopo. i. e. Of the Truth of Transubstantiation. Paris, 1554. 4to. apud Vascosan. The preface is dated at the end, Anno Domini 1551. Bishop Burnet rightly observes, that 'the Latin stile of this book is much better than the Divinity and Reasonings in it (51).' 5. Compendium & Synopsis in decem libros Ethicorum Aristotelis. i. e. an Abridgment of Aristotle's Ethics. Paris, 1554. 8vo. apud Vascosan. 6. Contra impios Blasphematores Dei Prædestinationis Opus Cuthberti Tonstalli Dunelmensis Episcopi. i. e. Against the impious Blasphemers of God's Predestination. Antwerp, 1555. 4to. 7. Godly and devout Prayers, in English and Latin. 1558. 8vo.

His pieces published by others after his decease, were, I. A Letter written by him and John Stokesley, sometime Bishop of London; and confessed to Archbishop Parker, and others, to be his, about fourteen days before his death. Imprinted at London by Reginald Wolfe, Anno 1560. Inserted in Foxe's Vol. II (52); and also in the Appendix to Dr Knight's Life of Erasmus (53). See above, note [R]. II. Licence to Sir Thomas More for reading heretical Books (54). III. His Opinion and Resolutions concerning the Sacraments (55). IV. Arguments for the Divine Institution of Auricular Confession, with some Notes written on the margin by King Henry's own hand (56). V. Letter of his to the Lord Cromwel, concerning a book taken at Newcastle, called the Souls Garden (57). VI. Letter proving the subjection of the Realm of Scotland to the King of England. 1547 (58). VII. Answers to some Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass, &c. (59). VIII. Letter to Cardinal Pole concerning his book De Unione Ecclesiasticâ (60). An abstract of it is in Jer. Collier's Ecclesiastical History (61); and the original is in the Cottonian Library (62). IX. Answer to the Embassadors of the Protestant German Princes (63). X. A Protest in the Convocation at York, against King Henry's title of Supreme Head of the Church of England (64). XI. His Oration to the Parliament, declaring to the people the office of a King; and his Answer to the Embassadors from James V, King of Scotland; are in Hall's Chronicle (65). XII. One of his Letters to Budæus, and two to Erasmus, are inserted amongst Erasmus's Letters (66); and there are, in the same Collection, one of Budæus, and five of Erasmus to him (67). XIII. Two Letters of his are also in the Collection of Records, at the end of Part III. of Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation; namely, one upon the King's ordering the Bishops to send up their Bulls (68): And a Consolatory Letter to Henry VIII. after the death of Queen Jane (69).—Besides which, we are informed, that he had made a great many Remarks upon the Jus Cæsareum (70).

[GG] They commend his charity, his hospitality, &c.] William

(51) Hist. of the Reformation, Part II. p. 195.
(52) 972.
(53) P. 66—96.
(54) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part I. Collect. of Records, p. 8.
(55) Id. p. 214, &c.
(56) Id. p. 363.
(57) Strype's Ecclesiast. Mem. Vol. I. Append. p. 185.
(58) Burnet's Hist. of the Reform. Collect. of Records, Part II. p. 106.
(59) Id. p. 133.
(60) Id. Part III. Collect. p. 464.
(61) Vol. II. p. 136.
(62) Cleopatra, E. 6. p. 385. Burnet's Hist. of the Reform. Part I. p. 367. and Addenda, No. 8.
(63) J. Collier's Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 143, &c.
(64) See above, note [P].
(65) Under the 14th and 16th of Henry VIII. fol. 106. 133.
(66) Lib. 2. Ep. 29. Lib. 3. Ep. 2. Lib. 22. Ep. 22.
(67) Lib. 2. Ep. 30. Lib. 3. Ep. 3. Lib. 13. Ep. 24. Lib. 18. Ep. 48. Lib. 22. Ep. 23. Lib. 26. Ep. 59.
(68) P. 437.
(69) P. 476.
(70) Erasmi Epist. col. 583.

(44) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 127, 128. Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. Part II. p. 396. and Knight, 25 above. In Strype's Aon. Vol. I. p. 142. it is said, that he was deprived Sept. 29.

(45) Cum annos 85 transfegisset. Antiq. Britann. ut supra.

(46) Godwin de Præfulibus, sub Tonstallo.

(47) Ath. Vol. I. col. 128.

(48) Burnet's History of the Reformation. Pt. II. p. 336.

(49) Strype's Life of Parker, p. 52.

(50) Tabula Chronice, ut supra.

(51) Ubi supra.

(52) Matthæus, ut supra, p. 161.

(53) See his book Contra impios Blasphematores Dei Prædestinationis.

(*) Life of Bernard Gilpin by Bishop Carleton, p. 114, 164. 4th ed. 1674.

perance, prudence, and industry [HH]. They describe him as a man of incomparable learning, sagacity, and judgment [II], of great probity, good-natured, modest, and endowed with rare virtues; of a most unblameable life: in a word, as the learnedest, best, humanest, kindest, and wisest man in his time. And withal very chearful and lively in conversation [KK]. We shall conclude this article with Bishop Tonstall's character of Yorkshire [LL].

William De Chambre, in particular, speaks thus of him (71). Familiam honorificam semper secum tenuit, honorificeque attendebatur a generosis & hominibus plebeis; quocumque enim loco residebat, honorificam mensam valdeque largam semper secum habuit. In elemosynis erat abundans, in omni vitæ genere Præsul præclarus. i. e. 'He always had a creditable family, and was honourably attended by people of all conditions; for wherever he resided he kept a magnificent table. He was very charitable, and an illustrious Prelate in every respect.'

(71) Anglia Sacra, Part I. p. 783.

(72) J. Pits, ubi supra, p. 760.

(73) Erasmi Epist. col. 27. Ed. 1642.

(74) Erasmi Epist. col. 783.

(75) T. Mori Epistola, inter Erasmanas, col. 120.

(76) Erasmi Epist. col. 400.

(77) Tabula affixa ad sepulcrum T. Mori, inter Epist. Erasmi, col. 1509.

[HH] His meekness, chastity, temperance, prudence and industry.] Erat vir mitis & mansuetus, castus, & temperans, prudens, & industrius (72).

[II] They describe him as a man of incomparable learning.] So he is stiled by Erasmus. . . vir, præter utramque literaturam, quâ neminem suorum non superat, judicio excusso, ac naris, emundissimæ, &c. (73). See the next note; and above, note [FF].

[KK] Of a most unblameable life: in a word, as the learnedest, best, &c. in his time, &c.] Such is the character given him by Sir Thomas More, and Erasmus, two excellent judges. Is Homo est vitæ inculpatisimæ, utriusque Literaturæ ad unguem doctus, nec ullius honestæ disciplinæ rudis (74).—Quo ut nemo est omnibus bonis literis instructior, nemo vita moribusque severior, ita nemo est usquam in convivio jucundior (75).—Quo viro nihil habet hæc Ætas nec eruditius, nec melius, nec humanius (76).

—Quo viro vix habet orbis hodie quicquam eruditius, prudentius, melius (77). See also Dr Burnet's History of the Reformation, Part I. Appendix, p. 301. and Part II. p. 396.

[LL] We shall conclude this article with Bishop Tonstall's character of Yorkshire.] As this Prelate was attending upon King Henry VIII, in his progress towards the city of York, upon the hill beyond Barnesley, some four miles on this side Doncaster, he took an occasion to shew unto his Majesty, and speak of the pleasures of Yorkshire: requiring his Grace to behold and look upon the country before him there, affirming, that he should see the greatest and fairest valley there, that was in all Europe, from end to end, and he never saw the like as that was for all pleasures and commodities, which he could well testify and witness. And therefore desired his Highness to behold upon his right hand the great hills, the Yorkeswoldes, and Blakemore hills; and likewise to behold those great mountains and fells which were upon the left hand; the breadth of which valley is some thirty or sixty miles wide in the most places, and in length some eighty and one hundred miles: wherein for cities and towns, castles and manor-houses, famous rivers and brooks, parks and woods, corn, grafs, and cattle, fairs and markets, fish and fowl, mines and quarries of coal and stone, and likewise mines of lead, iron, and other metals, he never saw the like in all his travels. And for the truth and verity thereof, as it may and doth plainly appear, some miles west of Tadcaster there is within some seven or eight miles circuit seventy-seven manor-houses, whereof the worst of them were Esquires of an antient continuance. There be also within the same circuit twenty-five woods, thirty-two parks, sixteen rivers, eight market towns, and in them and other villages there, there be as many fairs in the year as in any other place in England. There be also twenty-four coal-mines, and divers furnaces both for melting and drawing forth iron into bars: There be also much other metals, if they were sought for; and for corn, grafs, and cattle, fish, and fowl, not inferior to the best place in all England. And there is one thing here more worthy to be spoken of than all the rest; which is of the great abundance of free-stone and lime, that is there to be found within that circuit; as much lime and free-stone as would build as many churches, cities, castles, towns, and houses, as are in all England, if need were. And for the pleasures of hunting and hawking, fishing and fowling, it is as delicate a place as any there is in all England (78).

(78) Dodsworth's MSS. in the Bodleian Library, vid. Catalog. MSS. Angliæ. Vol. I. p. 222. col. 2, No. 14.

TYRRELL [JAMES], Author of a history of England, and descended from an ancient and considerable family [A]; was the eldest son of Sir Timothy Tyrrell of Shotover, near Oxford, Knight, by Elizabeth his wife, sole daughter and heir of the most learned Dr James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh. He was born in Great Queen-Street, in the parish of St Giles's in the Fields, Middlesex, in the month of May, 1642, and educated chiefly in the Free-school at Camberwell in Surrey. In the year 1657, he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner of Queen's-College in Oxford, where he continued three years under the tuition of Mr Thomas Tully and Mr Timothy Halton. Thence he went to the Inner-Temple, to study the laws of the land (a). On the 28th of September, 1663, he was created Master of Arts at Oxford (b). And, about two years after, was called to the Barr. However, he did not practise in that profession; but employed himself very diligently in studying the History and Constitution of this country, as his learned works afterwards sufficiently evinced. He resided chiefly upon his estate at Oakeley near Brill in (a) A. Wood, Athenæ, Edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 972.

(b) Idem, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 155.

[A] Descended from an ancient and considerable family.] The Tirel, or Tyrrel, family is of great antiquity in England; . . . Tirel being one of those eminent men who came over with William the Conqueror in 1066 (1). And Walter Tirell was the person said to have shot William Rufus in the year 1100 (2). One of them was the common ancestor of the numerous family of the Tyrrels, seated both in Ireland and England.—Hugh Tirell was one of those brave English Noblemen, who, in the year 1172, made a conquest of Ireland (3). Some of them were Barons of Castle-Knoc in the county of Dublin, whose estate by females was transferred to other families about 1370 (4). And a branch of them is seated at Fertulogh, in the county of West-Meath (5)——In England; the manor of Thornton in Buckinghamshire, after having passed through the families of Barton and Ingleton, became the possession of the Tyrrels, descended from Jane heir-general of Robert Ingleton (6), the last of that name in the beginning of King Henry VIII. From whom are also descended both the other families of the Tyrrels in this county, of Castlethorp and Oakeley: and they all descended from one common ancestor, Humphrey Tyrrel, Esq; nephew of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, one of the coheirs of Sir Humphrey le Bruin, as well as the said Humphrey Tyrrel. That family hath also a seat at Leckhamstead, in the same county (7). And a branch of the same family is seated at Heron-gate in Essex; Sir Edward Tyrrel, Knt. being created a Baronet, October 31, 1627.—To return to Humphrey Tyrrel: George his eldest son dyed in 1571, and He, by his second wife, Margaret, daughter of Thomas Aston of Aston in Cheshire, Esq; had an elder son, Sir Timothy, Knt. Master of the Buckhounds to Prince Henry and King Charles I, who dyed in 1633, leaving issue by Eleanor his wife, daughter of Sir William Kingsmill, his eldest son, Sir Timothy, Knt. of Oakeley and Shotover, one of the privy Chamber to King Charles I, a Colonel, Governor of Caerdiff, and General of the Ordinance under the Lord Gerard, who paid 750l. composition for his estate. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Archbishop Usher, he had James, who is the subject of this article, and three other sons: besides several daughters (8).

(7) Camden, Vol. I. col. 333.

(8) English Baronetage, as above.

(1) Historiæ Normannorum Scriptores antiqui, editi ab And. Duchesne. Paris. 1619. fol. Appendix, p. 1125. Stow's Annales, p. 106, 108. Hollinshed's Chronicle, Vol. III. p. 5. Histoire du Roy Willaume par Fr. d'Eudemare. Rouen, 1629. 2mo. p. 673.

(2) Florentius Wigorn. ad ann. 1100. But Ordericus Vitalis says, he was a brave French knight, an inhabitant of Pontoise, and a renowned warrior, p. 782, 783.

(3) Camden's Britannia, edit. 1722. Vol. II. col. 1322.

(4) Idem, col. 1365.

(5) Idem, col. 1373.

(6) She is said to have brought thirty Manors to that family. The English Baronetage, edit. 1741. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 76, &c.

Buckinghamshire, and was made one of the Deputy-Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace for that county: in which offices he continued till King James the Second turned him and the rest out of Commission, for not assisting in taking away the Penal Laws and Test (c). Upon the Revolution, he zealously espoused King William's interest, and writ with great strength in vindication of his Expedition into England, and his title to the Crown; as will be shewn presently. When he began compiling his History of England, he came and lived chiefly at Shotover, near Oxford, for the benefit of the Bodleian, and other Libraries in that University (d). The first thing he published, was a book written by his grandfather, Archbishop Usher [B]; and he wrote also a Vindication of that learned Primate [C]. He did not run into those extravagant notions about the Prerogative, and Passive-obedience and Non-resistance, which were so much espoused and recommended in his time; but was for a limited Monarchy; as appears by his answer to Sir Robert Filmer [D], and especially by his fourteen Political Dialogues [E], of which an account is given

(c) Wood, Ath. ut supra.

(d) From the information of a person who knew him.

[B] The first thing he published, was a book written by his grandfather, Archbishop Usher. A. Wood says, it was Mr Tyrrell who published it (9). But, upon inspection, it appears that it was published by Dr Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, and dedicated by our Author to King Charles II. The title of it is, 'The Power communicated by God to the Prince, and the Obedience required of the Subject. Briefly laid down and confirmed out of the Holy Scriptures, Testimony of the primitive Church, Dictates of right Reason, and Opinion of the Wisest among the heathen Writers. By the most reverend Father in God, James late Lord Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland. Published out of the original Copy written with his own hand by the reverend Father in God, Robert Lord Bishop of Lincoln, with his Lordship's Preface thereunto, dated London, Dec. 31, 1660. With an Epistle Dedicatory to the King by James Tyrrell.' Lond. 1661. 4to. Bishop Sanderson, in the Preface, acquaints us, That this Treatise was written by the reverend and learned Author, at the special command of King Charles I. about the time when those unhappy Distempers did first begin to appear openly in our land. As soon as the Treatise was finished, the Author caused a Copy thereof to be fairly transcribed, and, with a Dedicatory Epistle prefixed thereunto, to be presented to his Majesty; who having read the Book, signified his Will and Pleasure that it should be Printed. Which notwithstanding, whether by the Negligence or Unfaithfulness of the Party to whose Care and Trust it was committed, was not done, &c.

Mr Tyrrell concludes his Dedication in these words. . . 'I shall now make this my most humble Suit to your Majesty, that as the reverend Author in his life-time publicly professed his Loyalty to his Sovereign, and constantly prayed for your Majesty's happy and glorious Return to these your Kingdoms, and in all things shewed himself your loyal Subject, so you would be pleased to own him as such, by affording your gracious Countenance to this his posthumous Work, which will eternize the Memory of the deceased Author, and thereby confer the greatest temporal Blessing on,

' Your Majesty's most loyal

' And obedient Subject,

' James Tyrrell.'

[C] And he wrote also a Vindication of that learned Primate. It contains three and thirty pages in folio, and is printed at the end of The Life of Dr James Usher, Lord Primate of Armagh, published by Richard Parr, D. D. Lond. 1686. with this title, 'An Appendix to the Life of the Lord Primate Usher, containing a Vindication of his Opinions and Actions in reference to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, and his conformity thereunto, from the aspersions of Peter Heylin, D. D. in his Pamphlet called Respondet Petrus.' This Respondet Petrus, was the Answer of Peter Heylin, D. D. to so much of Dr Bernard's book, entitled The Judgment of the late Primate of Ireland, &c. as he is made a party by the said Lord Primate in the point of the Sabbath. Lond. 1658. 4to.

[D] As appears by his answer to Sir Robert Filmer. This answer is entitled, 'Patriarcha non Monarcha: or the Patriarch unmonarched; being Observations on a late Treatise and divers other Miscellanies, published under the name of Sir Robert Filmer, Baronet, in which the Falseness of those Opinions that would make Monarchy jure divino are laid open, and the true Principles of Government and Property (especially in our Kingdom) asserted.' Lond. 1681. 8vo.

This book was reprinted upon by Mr Edmund

Bohun, in the Preface to the Second Edition of Sir Robert's Patriarcha; 1685. 'In which (as it is said) Sir Robert Filmer's Patriarcha is vindicated from the cavils and misconstructions of the Author of a piece stiled Patriarcha non Monarcha, &c.'

[E] And especially by his fourteen Political Dialogues. The nine first of these Dialogues were published in 1692; the tenth in 1693; the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, in 1694; and the fourteenth in 1695. quarto. Afterwards they were collected into one volume folio, with this general title, 'Bibliotheca Politica: or an Enquiry into the antient Constitution of the English Government, with respect to the just Extent of the Regal Power, and the Rights and Liberties of the Subject. Wherein all the chief Arguments, both for and against the Late Revolution, are impartially represented and considered. In fourteen Dialogues. Collected out of the best Authors, antient and modern.' Lond. 1718. 1727. That the Reader may judge of the nature of this work, we shall give him this short summary of it. He enquires, therefore, in Dialogue the first, whether Monarchy be Jure Divino? In the second, whether there can be made out from the Natural, or Revealed Law of God, any Succession to Crowns by Divine Right? In the third, whether Resistance of the Supreme Power, by a whole Nation, or People, in cases of the last extremity, can be justified by the Law of Nature, or Rules of the Gospel? In the fourth, whether absolute Non-resistance of the Supreme Powers be enjoined by the Doctrine of the Gospel, and was the antient practice of the Primitive Church, and the constant Doctrine of our Reformed Church of England? In the fifth, whether the King be the sole Supreme Legislative Power of the Kingdom: And whether our Great Councils, or Parliaments, be a fundamental part of the Government, or else proceeded from the Favour and Concessions of former Kings? In the sixth, and seventh, whether the Commons of England, represented by Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament, were one of the Three Estates in Parliament, before the forty-ninth of Henry III, or eighteenth of Edward I? The eighth, is a Continuation of the same Discourse, concerning the Antiquity of the Commons in Parliament; wherein the best Authorities for it are proposed and examined: with an entrance upon the question of Non-resistance. In Dialogue the ninth, he enquires, whether by the antient Laws and Constitutions of this Kingdom, as well as by the Statutes of the thirteenth and fourteenth of King Charles II, all Resistance of the King, or of those commissioned by him, are expressly forbid upon any pretence whatsoever: And also, whether all those who assisted his Majesty, King William, either before, or after his coming over, are guilty of the breach of this Law? In the tenth, 1. whether a King of England can ever fall from, or forfeit his Royal Dignity for any breach of an original contract, or wilful violation of the fundamental laws of the Kingdom? 2. Whether King William, the Norman, did by his Conquest acquire such an absolute unconditional Right to the Crown of this Realm for himself and his heirs, as could never be lawfully resisted or forfeited for any male-administration or tyranny whatever? In the eleventh, 1. In what sense all Civil Power is derived from God, and in what sense it may be also from the people. 2. Whether his Majesty King William, when Prince of Orange, had a just cause of war against King James II? 3. Whether the proceedings of his Majesty, before he was King, as also of the late Convention, in respect of the said King James, is justifiable by the Law of Nations, and the constitution of our Government? In the twelfth, 1. Whether the vote of the late Convention, wherein they declared the Throne to be vacant, can be justified from

(9) Athen. col. 973.

given below. Subjects of a religious nature did likewise sometimes employ his thoughts; for he drew up a clear and elegant Abridgment, in English, of Bishop Cumberland's Philosophical Disquisition, or Enquiry, into the Laws of Nature [F], which was published in 1692. But his capital work was, 'The General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil; from the earliest Accounts of Time;' which he intended to bring down to the reign of King William III [G]; but which was compleated, and published, only as far as the end of King Richard the Second [H]. In that work, he makes it his business to oppose and confute Dr Brady's History of England (e); especially these two favourite notions of the Doctor's, 'that all the Liberties and Privileges the People can pretend to, were the Grants and Concessions of the Kings of this Nation, and were derived from the Crown (f) [I]. And, that the Commons of England represented by the antient constitution and customs of this Kingdom? 2. Whether the said Convention, declaring King William and Queen Mary to be lawful and rightful King and Queen of England, may be justified by the said Constitution? 3. Whether the act passed in the said Convention, after it became a Parliament, whereby Roman-Catholick Princes are debarred from succeeding to the Crown, was according to Law? In the thirteenth, 1. Whether an oath of Allegiance may be taken to a King or Queen de facto, or for the time being? 2. What is the obligation of such an oath; whether to an actual defence of their Title against all persons whatsoever, or else to a bare submission to their power? 3. Whether the Bishops, who refused to take the oath of Allegiance to their Majesties, could be lawfully deprived of their Bishopricks? In the fourteenth Dialogue he shews, that the Arraigning and Murther of King Charles I, can by no means be justified by the proceedings of the Convention-Parliament against King James II, upon his Abdication; the grounds and manner thereof being wholly different. Proved by an exact relation of the beginning, progress, and issue of the late Civil War.——The chief books our Author cites, and animadvert upon; are, Dr Brady's, and Sir Robert Filmer's several pieces, Dr Hickeys's Jovian, P. Heylin's Stumbling-block of Rebellion, Dr Johnston's Excellency of Monarchical Government, L'Estrange's Observators, Bishop Sanderson's Preface to Archbishop Usher's Power of the Prince, Digges's Unlawfulness of Subjects taking up arms, &c. To which he opposes the Authorities of Grotius, Puffendorf, William Petyt, Esq; . . . Cooke's Argumentum Anti-Normannicum, Rushworth, &c. And in this work he shews a very extensive reading, and thorough knowledge of our Constitution.

(e) See above, the article BRADY [ROBERT].

(f) See preface to Vol. I. of Dr Brady's Complete History of England, p. 1.

[F] For he drew up a clear and elegant Abridgment, in English, of Bishop Cumberland's Philosophical Disquisition, or Enquiry, into the Laws of Nature. The Bishop's book was written in Latin, with this title, De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica: in qua earum Forma, Summa Capita, Ordo, Promulgatio, & Obligatio à rerum natura investigantur; quin etiam Elementa Philosophiæ Hobbeianæ, tum moralis, tum civilis, considerantur & refutantur. Lond. 1672. 4to (10). Our Author's Abridgment of it was intitled, 'A brief Disquisition of the Law of Nature, according to the Principles and Method laid down in the reverend Dr Cumberland's (now Lord Bishop of Peterborough's) Latin Treatise on that Subject. As also his Confutations of Mr Hobbs's Principles, put into another method. With the right reverend Author's approbation.' Lond. 1692. 8vo. A Second edition corrected, and somewhat enlarged, came out in 1701. The right reverend Author's approbation was contained in a Letter to the Bookfeller, wherein he thus speaks of Mr Tyrrell's performance . . . 'I found that he had not only well translated and epitomized in some places what I had written in Latin, but had fully digested the chief things of my Design in a well-chosen Method of his own, with great perspicuity, and had added some Illustrations of his own, or from other learned Authors, with a Philosophical Liberty, which I must needs allow. For this reason I judged that the then unknown Author had given too low a title to his Book, and that I was to esteem him a good Hyperaspistes, or able Second, in this combat for Truth and Justice, rather than a Translator or Epitomizer of what I had written. . . . And I hope that since this Learned Gentleman hath conquered the Difficulties of the Search into the Rise of the Laws of Nature, now many of our younger Gentry will be encouraged to follow him in the way which this his Treatise makes plain before them (11). For from thence they may receive assistance, not only to discern the Reasonableness of all Vertue and Morality, which is their duty and ornament as they are Men, but also they may

(10) See above, the article CUMBERLAND [RICHARD].

(11) The Bishop's Book had been complained of for Obscurity; though it was more in the subject itself, than in the manner of treating it. See the above said Article.

here see the true foundations of civil Government and Property, which they are most obliged to understand, because, as Gentlemen, they are born to the greatest interest in them both.'——

[G] The General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, &c. The rest of the title will inform us with what it further contains: . . . being as follows . . . 'Taken from the most Ancient Records, Manuscripts, and Printed Historians. With Memorials of the most eminent Persons in Church and State. As also the Foundations of the most noted Monasteries, and both Universities.' What he published of it, is comprised in Five Volumes folio: sometimes bound in Three. And printed at London 1700. 1704.

[H] But which was compleated, and published, only as far as the end of King Richard II. It is said that Mr Tyrrell had brought that History down lower; but was prevented by death, or otherwise, from making it public (12).

(12) Vide T. Hearne's Pref. ad Tho. de Elmham, p. 17.

[I] That all the Liberties and Privileges the People can pretend to, were the Grants and Concessions of the Kings of this Nation. The patrons of that Opinion grounded it upon the Conquest of William I, or the Bastard; alledging, that by his subduing of Harold and the whole English Nation at the battel of Hastings, he thereby put an end to the old Saxon Government and Laws; so that no man at this day can claim any right to their Liberties, or any kind of property, but what must be owned as wholly derived from the Laws, Concessions, and Charters that have been from time to time granted by Him and the Succeeding Kings of this realm (13). What the Liberties and Privileges of this Nation were under the Saxons, our Author had shewn, in the Introduction to the first Volume of his History (14); wherein he observes, among other things, That their Government was rather Aristocratical, than Monarchical; and that their Kings were at first no better than Generals in war, and in time of peace had little or no power: Moreover, that their succession to the Crown was not lineal, or hereditary, but mostly elective, &c. (15).——As to the supposition, of all the Liberties and Privileges of the people being annihilated by the Conquest; he cannot rest satisfied with it. For they who make it, 'being greater friends to the arbitrary Power of Kings, than to the Laws and Liberties of their country, lay down this hypothesis, thereby to confer on the Prince an absolute power to break all our Laws, and seize upon our Liberties and Properties at his pleasure, and thereby reduce this kingdom to the same miserable state of Slavery with some of our neighbouring Nations; upon the aforesaid pretence, That all the Liberties and Privileges we now enjoy, being at first derived from the Concessions of former Kings (and those in great part wrested from them by force) their Successors may, whenever they shall think it conducing to the greater safety of the kingdom, (of which they are to be the sole judges) reassume them, and thereby make themselves absolute masters of the Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes of their Subjects, as they suppose their Conqueror and his son William Rufus to have been during their times. Nor may any body question or resist such Princes if they shall think fit so to do, since they have by this supposed Conquest of their predecessors, an absolute and indefeasible right to the Crown of England, paramount to all Laws, Compacts, and Coronation-oaths, the interpretation of which must lie wholly in their breasts, as being responsible to none but God, if they either wrest, or wilfully break and transgress them (16). These arbitrary Maxims our Author opposes all along; shewing by many instances, that King William I. did not claim and exercise an absolute Dominion over the Lives and Liberties of all his Subjects.——The same point is also professedly handled by Mr Cooke, in his Argumentum Anti Normannicum: or an Argument proving,

(13) Filmer, Brady, &c.

(14) P. 34, 39, &c.

(15) P. 41, &c.

(16) Introduced to Vol. II. of History. See Bibliotheca Ficticia, Dialog. and 10th.

Knights, Citizens, and Burgesſes of Parliament, were not introduced, nor were one of the three Eſtates in Parliament, before the forty-ninth of Henry III [K]. Before which time, proving, from ancient Histories and Records, that William, Duke of Normandy, made no absolute Conquest of England by the Sword; in the Sense of our modern Writers (17).

[K] That the Commons of England, represented by Knights, Citizens and Burgesſes of Parliament, were not introduced, nor were one of the Three Eſtates of Parliament, before the 49th of Henry III.] There being, in none of our Offices, any precepts to the Sheriffs, to cause Two Knights out of each Shire, and Citizens and Burgesſes out of the respective Cities and Burghs, to be chosen and returned for Parliament, before the 49th of Henry III. A. D. 1265. Dr Brady (18), and others, inferred from thence, That before that time, the body of the Commons of England, or Freemen collectively taken, had not any share or votes in making of Laws for the Government of the kingdom, nor had any communication in Affairs of State, unless they were represented by the Tenants in capite.—Now the said year 1265 happening during the Barons wars, and while the King was their prisoner; it was intended thereby to insinuate, That the House of Commons was the Offspring of Rebellion.—Before that period, according to the opinion of the best Antiquaries (19), the Parliaments consisted of the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and Barons. Of these Barons there were two sorts, the greater Barons, or the King's chief tenants, who held of him in capite by Barony: And the lesser Barons, who held of the King by military service, in capite. The former had summons to parliament by several writs: and the latter (that is, all those who were possessed of thirteen Knights-fees and a quarter) had a general summons from the Sheriff in each county. This is quite plain from the following clauses in King John's Magna Charta . . . ' Et ad habendum Commune Consilium regni de Auxilio assidendo, aliter quam in tribus casibus predictis, vel de Scutagio assidendo, summoneri faciemus Archiepiscopos, Episcopos, Abbates, Comites, & majores Barones sigillatim per literas nostras: & preterea faciemus summoneri in generali, per vicecomites & ballivos nostros, omnes illos qui de nobis tenent in capite, ad certum diem, scilicet ad terminum quadraginta dierum ad minus, & ad certum locum; et, in omnibus literis illius summonitionis, causam summonitionis exprimemus.' i. e. ' And in order to have [or hold] a Common Council of the kingdom for assessing an Aid, (otherwise than in the three cases aforesaid) (20) or for assessing a Scutage, we shall cause to be summoned the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and greater Barons severally by our letters; and, moreover, we shall cause to be summoned in general, by our Sheriffs and Bailiffs, all those who hold of us in capite, to a certain day, namely at the end, or expiration, of forty days at the least (21), and to a certain place; and, in all the letters of such summons, we shall express the cause of the summons.'—Here being no mention of Knights of Shires, or other Representatives of the Commons, for so important an affair as the granting of Money, we may very justly conclude, that there were then none.—In this state things continued till the 49th of Henry III; when, instead of keeping the old form, Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, and his party, thought fit to summon, not all, but those of the greater Barons who sided with them. And, instead of the lesser Barons, who came with large retinues, they sent their writs to the Sheriff in each county, to cause two Knights in every Shire to be chosen, and one, two, or four Burgesſes for each Burgh, to represent the body of the people, residing in those Counties and Burghs: lest they should be in no small danger from such unlimited and tumultuous assemblies. If that form had been observed before, it is amazing there should not be the least remains of it in our Records or public Offices. Unless we suppose, with the learned Bishop Squire (22), that there were not any formal Summons even to the Lords before the 49th of Henry III; because they were to come to the Parliament suo jure, in their own right, by prescription, and consequently there was no occasion for any Summons.

But to trace this matter higher up, even to its origin: It is universally allowed, that our Constitution is founded upon the Saxon Government once established in this island. And it is certain, that Power and Authority naturally follow Property. Government and Legislation therefore must be vested of course in the richest persons in the state, and those that are put in places of trust and dignity. Among the ancient Germans indeed, of whom the Saxons were a branch, all had a right to be present at the public Assemblies (23); that is, all the Land-holders, but not those whose chief business it was to cultivate the land, and to be employed in mechanic arts; for these were supposed to be present, and to give their consent to the Laws, by their Lords, or those whose lands they occupied (24). And, after the Saxons were settled here, every Land-holder of the Kingdom, whether of the Clergy or Laity, who was of an approved age, and had not forfeited this privilege by some previous misdemeanor, had originally a right to be present there in person, whenever he pleased to make use of that right (25). But, in process of time, the lesser Freeholders finding it an intolerable burthen to attend the Witena-gemot twice a year, even from the remotest parts of the Kingdom; they left the burthen of that attendance to the Richer, who had better means, and more leisure: or they sent Deputies out of the several Tithings to represent them; as trading Communities afterwards did (26). And there is all the reason to believe, that this method continued with very little alteration, after the Conquest, and even in King John's time. For, the confirmation of Magna Charta, in a great Council, or Parliament, holden in Runnemede, A. D. 1215, is not only a good evidence of what was usually done (27); but is also an emblem of the Champs de Mars, or May, among the old Franks, which were in effect the same Assemblies as were afterwards called Parliaments; they being held in a large open field, capacious of the greatest company, and most commonly by the side of a river, for the conveniency of water (28).

Now if we examine further, wherein the difference between Mr Tyrrell and Dr Brady consists, it will appear from the following particulars. Upon examining the Saxon Laws (29), and the ancient Gemots, Councils, and Synods (30); it is manifest, that the Legislative Power was lodged in the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots; and in other persons that are denoted by the following names: Witum, Witan, Witena, or Witenan, Sapientes, Wisemen, Ealdormen, Aldoras, Seniores, Seniores, Aldermen, Elders, or Senators; Eadigan, Optimates, Magnates, Primates, Proceres, Principes, the great or chief men; Aethelun, the Nobles; Thegen, or Thains; Consiliarii, Counsellors; Satrapæ Praefecti, Governors; Duces, Commanders; Comites, Governors of Counties; Tam Clerus quam Populus, Clergy and People; Lege eruditi, learned in the Law.—Who are meant by all these names? is the question. Dr Brady contends (31), that Witen, or Sapientes, mostly signifies Noblemen, or great Lawyers: That Optimates, Magnates, &c. denote only Chief, Great, or Noble Men (32): That Clerus and Populus signify only Clergy and Laity (33): That the Saxon Witena-gemotes consisted only of Archbishops, Bishops, Masse-Thegnes, or dignified and great Clergymen, Aldermen, or Comites, King's Gervases, or Præpositi, King's Thegns, Ministers, or Officers, his Counsellors, Judges, or Magistrates (34).—In opposition to this, Mr Tyrrell affirms, that the general or great Council of Estates, consisted of the Clergy, Nobility, and Deputies of Cities and great Towns (35): That Dr Brady brings no good authority for the word Sapientes signifying only Noblemen, or great Lawyers (36): That the word Nobilis includes not only Noblemen of title, such as Dukes, Marquises, &c. but also all Gentlemen of families, who are well born, and do not exercise mechanic trades (37): [But it is to be remembered, that there was no Duke in England till King John's reign, and no Marquis till Richard the Second's. And that it was not the title as now, but the estates, or high posts and offices, that were qualifications for sitting in Parliament.] To proceed; Mr Tyrrell goes on with observing, that Proceres does not signify only men noble by birth, but the chiefest of subjects or citizens: And Primates, no more than principal or chief men, however born: That Optimates signifies no more than the better sort of men and great Lords, and is not confined to the King's Thanes, or Tenants in capite only: And Principes doth not always signify Princes, or men noble by birth, but any chief or principal man, remarkable by place, office, or dignity (38).

(23) De minoribus rebus principes consultant, de majoribus omnes; ita tamen ut ea quoque, quorum penes plebem arbitrium est, apud principes tractentur. Taciti Germania, c. 11.

(24) Bishop Squire, as above, p. 174, 177.

(25) Idem, p. 167.

(26) Idem, p. 240, 244, 245.

(27) Vide Matt. Westmonast. ad ann. 1215.

(28) Bishop Squire, as above, p. 170—173. note.

(29) As published by W. Lambard, Abraham Wheloc, and Dr Wilkins.

(30) Published by Sir Henry Spelman, and Dr Wilkins. See also our ancient English Historians.

(31) Glossary at the end of his Introduction to the old English History, p. 66.

(32) Ibid. p. 57.

(33) Introduction to Eng. Hist. p. 26.

(34) Ibid. p. 10.

(35) Tyrrell's General Introduction to his Hist. of England, Vol. I. p. 87.

(36) Ibid. p. 88.

(37) Ibid. p. 91.

(38) Ibid. p. 92. See Right of the Commoners asserted &c. by William Petyt, Esq; Lond. 1680. 8vo.

(17) Lond. 1682. 8vo.

(18) Introduction to the old English History, p. 130, &c.

(19) Sir W. Dugdale's Origines Juridic. p. 17, 18.

(20) Viz. for redeeming the King, if taken prisoner; making his eldest Son a Knight; and marrying his eldest Daughter once.

(21) From the date of the Summons.

(22) Enquiry into the foundation of the English Constitution; or an Historical Essay upon the Anglo-Saxon Government. Lond. 1745. 8vo. p. 253. note.

(g) See his Introduction to the Old English History, in the beginning.

(b) From an account sent to us.

time, the body of the Commons of England, or Freemen collectively taken, had not any share or votes in making Laws for the Government of the Kingdom, nor had any communication in affairs of State, unless they were represented by the Tenants in capite (g). Our Author, Mr Tyrrell, is chiefly valuable for his copious translation of all our old English Historians, and his methodical arrangement of them under the respective years: By which means, the Reader sees their different accounts at one view. But, as it is not so agreeably digested, nor so well interwoven, as some more modern, though less faithful, Histories; therefore it is not so much sought after by the indolent and thoughtless, that is, the generality of Readers: who look into books more for amusement than real improvement. However, it hath an intrinsic value, and deserves a place in the Libraries of all lovers of the History and Antiquities of Great Britain. Though it must be owned, that it is not free from faults and mistakes [L]. This learned and industrious Author died in 1718, aged seventy-five, and upwards, and was buried in Oakley church (b). He married Mary, daughter and heir of Sir Michael Hutchinson of Fladbury in Worcestershire, Knight; by whom he had the late Lieutenant-General James Tyrrell, of Shotover, Esq; (i) [M].

(i) English Baronetage, Vol. II. Edit. 1741. p. 79.

One common Mistake there is running among all those who have writ upon this subject; which is, That they judge of the ancient times by the present, and think that the Number of Freeholders then, bore any proportion to what they do now. Whereas it appears from Domesday-book, that the Holders of all the Lands, in 1087, were under 1200. So that the majority of them might, without any great inconvenience, be summoned to, and appear at, the great Councils of the Nation; supposing that they were all qualified by having Thirteen Knights-fees and a quarter, which there is great reason to question: Or rather they may reasonably be supposed not to have been above five, or six hundred.

A pretty exact account of the several Times, and Places, wherein our Kings, after the Conquest, used to keep their Courts, either de more, according to custom, or otherwise, may be seen in the Folio Edition of Rapin's History, at the end of each King's reign. At those times, the great Councils of the Nation were commonly holden, as hath been shewn by the learned Mr T. Madox (39). — It is to be observed, That the first time the word Parliamentum occurs in our ancient Historians, Bromton, and the rest (40), is under the year 1164. And according to W. Prynne, in his Animadversions, the first Record wherein Parliamentum is used for Parliament, is clause 28 Hen. III. memb. 12. dorso. See Spelman's Glossary, under Parliamentum.

[L] Though it must be owned, that it is not free from faults and mistakes.] He hath committed several Mistakes in his Translations from the ancient Historians, as I have observed in many instances; and he hath also suffered himself to be overbypassed by the notion, That the Norman Conquest had brought little or no Alteration in the English Constitution: which it certainly did in many instances; especially in that very material point of Tenures, as hath been shewn by the best judge in those affairs, the very learned Sir Henry Spelman, in his treatise of the Origin of Feuds and Tenure by Knights Service.

[M] By whom he had the late Lieutenant-General James Tyrrell, of Shotover, Esq;] That gentleman was Colonel of a regiment of foot; and his Commission, as Colonel, bore date April 21, 1709, as Major-general, December 18, 1735; and as Lieutenant-general, July, 1739. He was one of the Grooms of the bed-chamber to his late Majesty, when Prince of Wales, and represented the Corporation of Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire, in the third parliament of King George I, and the first and second of King George II. He was also Governor of Gravesend and Tilbury-fort; appointed, in May 1742, Governor of Berwick and Holy-island; and dyed the 30th of August following, aged sixty-eight (41). His body was buried in Oakley church; where is a monument, erected to his memory, by his kinsman Augustus Schutz, to whom he left his estate from the Tyrrell-family.

(41) English Baronetage, &c. above, p. 79. and London Magazine, in May and September, 1742.

(39) History of the Exchequer, p. 2—6. See also Spelman's Conc. Tom. I. p. 347. ed. 1639.

(40) Bromton apud Sciptores. fol. 1058.

V.

VANE [SIR HENRY], the Younger, a man of a very ambiguous character in the last century; eldest son of Sir Henry Vane of Hadlow in Kent, Knight [A], was born about the year 1612. His education was at Westminster-School, with Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Thomas Scot, and others of that stamp (a); at which time, the liveliness of his temper rendered him acceptable company to those called good fellows; and yet he abstained from that lewdness, which intemperance sometimes leads into. At the age of fourteen, or fifteen, he became altered in his disposition (b); though he is not pleased to tell us by what means. About the sixteenth year of his age, he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner of Magdalen-hall in Oxford; but when he should have been matriculated as a Member of the University, and taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, he quitted his gown, put on a cloak, and studied notwithstanding for some time in that Hall (c); where, we are told, that though he was under the care of a very worthy Tutor, he lived not with great exactness. After that, he spent some little time in France, and more in Geneva; from whence he imported a full prejudice and bitterness, both against the Government, and the Liturgy, of the Church of England. His father, then Controller of the House-

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. Edit. 1721. col. 291.

(b) The Life and death of Sir Henry Vane, Edit. Lond. 1662. 4to. p. 3. and his last speech.

(c) Wood, as above.

[d] Son of Sir Henry Vane of Hadlow in Kent.] The family is said to have been originally of the diocese of Durham (1). They derive themselves from Howel ap Vane of Monmouthshire; whose son, Griffith ap Howel Vane, had to wife Lettice, daughter of Bledwin ap Kenwyn, Lord of Powis.—The 6th in descent from him, was Henry Vane, knighted for his valiant behaviour at the battle of Poitiers, in 30 Edw. III, whose descendant, in the fifth generation, named—John, altered his name from Vane to Fane; and by his wife Isabel, daughter of John Darell, of the county of Kent, Esq; had four sons, and three daughters: Henry—Richard, ancestor to the present Earl of Westmorland; Thomas; and—John, ancestor to the Lords Bernard, and the now Earl of Darlington (2). This John had the manor of Hadlowe, and other estates in Kent, and elsewhere, of the gift of his elder brother Henry, who dyed without issue. By Joan his wife, daughter and co-heir of Edward Hault, Esq; he had—Henry; and Richard; and Thomas. Henry was unwarily drawn into Sir Thomas Wyatt's insurrection, but pardoned by Queen Mary, on account of his youth. He was twice representative in parliament, in 1559, and 1563, in the time of Queen Elizabeth. He dyed in 1582, leaving, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Godsalve, Esq; his only son and heir—Henry, who was twice married: first, to Mary, daughter and heirs of Thomas, Fane of Buxton, who brought him no child; secondly, in 1587, to Margaret, daughter of Roger Twisden, of East Peckham in Kent, Esq; He dyed at Roan, October 14, 1596, leaving issue by his second wife—HENRY, born February 18, 1589, and Ralph. Henry was father of Sir Henry, who is the subject of this article. He resumed the ancient name of his ancestors, writing himself Henry Vane, and his posterity have continued to do so ever since. In the 22d year of his age, March 28, 1611, he received the honor of knighthood from King James I; after which he improved himself by travel, and in learning foreign languages. He was elected one of the burgesses for the city of Carlisle, in the parliaments which began in 1614, in 1620, in 1625; and served in every parliament after, to the time of his decease, being elected for Thetford in Norfolk, Wilton in Wiltshire, and for the county of Kent (3). In the first parliaments, his abilities, and his affection to the royal family, were so conspicuous, that King James I. made him Cofferer to his son Prince Charles; who continued him in the same office after his accession to the throne, and made him one of his Privy-Council. In Sept. 1631, he was appointed Ambassador extraordinary, to renew the treaty of friendship and confederacy with Christian IV. king of Denmark; and also to treat and conclude on a firm peace and confederacy with Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden. He came back to England in Nov. 1632 (4). In May 1633, he nobly entertained King Charles I. at Raby-castle, on his way to Scotland to be crowned: as he did again, April 30, 1639, in his Majesty's expedition to Scotland, when Sir Henry commanded a regiment of 1099 men (5). He was made Treasurer of the Household, in September 1639, upon the death of Sir Thomas Edmondes; and, on the 5th of February following, constituted Principal Secretary of State for life, in the room of Sir John Coke: And was generally in the most important commissions. But on his appearing in the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford, the King was so offended with him, that he removed him from his place of Treasurer of the Household, and also from being Secretary of State. It does not appear that he was concerned in any measures against the King, but continued in London without acting in the rebellion. And, on the 1st of December, 1645, the Parliament debating on propositions of peace with the King, voted, that it be recommended to his Majesty, to create Sir Henry Vane, senior, a Baron of this kingdom. He was not in any commission or employment under the Parliament, or Commonwealth; but lived retired till the latter end of the year 1654, when he departed this life, at his Seat at Raby-castle, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. By his wife, Frances, daughter of Thomas Darcy, of Tollestunt in the county of Essex, Esq; he had four sons, and five daughters. Thomas, and John, who dyed infants; Sir Henry; Sir George, knighted November 22, 1640, and seated at Long Melton in the county palatine of Durham. The five daughters were, 1. Margaret, married to Sir Thomas Pelham, Bart. ancestor to the present Duke of Newcastle; 2. Frances, wedded to Sir Robert Honeywood, of Pet in Kent, Knt. 3. Anne, wife of Sir Thomas Liddal, of Ravensworth in the bishoprick of Durham, Bart. 4. Elizabeth, wife of Sir Francis Vincent, of Stoke-Daberon in Surrey, Bart. and 5. Catharine (6).

(4) See Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 107, 129, &c. 166—171, &c.

(5) Ibid. p. 173. and Vol. III. p. 921, 926.

(6) This account is chiefly extracted from Arthur Collins's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 20, &c.

(1) Ludlow's Mem. Vol. III. 8vo. p. 110. But the author of Regicides no Saints, says, The family had nothing to do in the North, till old Sir Henry got Raby under a grant of King Charles I. p. 99.

(2) Ar. Collins's Peerage of England, ed. 1736. Vol. II. p. 256, &c.

(3) See Dr. Br. Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(d) Lord Clarendon's Hist. Edit. 1732. 8vo. Vol. I. p. 187.

(e) Life, &c. as above.

(f) Lord Clarendon, ibid. and Life.

(g) D. Neal's Hist. of New England, Edit. 1720. Vol. I. p. 144.

(h) Douglass's Summary, &c. Vol. I. p. 428.

(m) D. Neal, as above, p. 144, 145. and Ludlow's Memoirs, 8vo. Edit. Vol. III. p. 110.

(o) It was reckoned worth at least 6000 l. a year in time of war. Mystery of the good old Cause.

(r) Dr Willis's Notitia Parliam. Vol. III. Part II. p. 238, 252. and Wood, Ath. as above, col. 292.

(t) Lord Clarendon, p. 150, 183.

hold, and a Privy-Counsellor, was extremely angry at this (d): And, it being suggested to King Charles I, that the heir of a considerable family about his Majesty, was grown into dislike of the discipline and ceremonies of the Church, and that his Majesty might do well to take some course about him; upon that, Bishop Laud took him to task, and seemed to handle him gently in the conference, but concluded harshly enough against him in the close (e), though we are not told in what manner. Thus made uneasy at home, his giddiness led him, in 1634, with some Non-conformists, to the infant colony of New England, then a receptacle of all ill humours, and a medley of every thing called Religion (f). His father was against his taking that voyage, but the King being informed of the son's inclination, obliged him to consent to it for three years; his design, as he pretended, was, to begin a settlement upon the banks of the river Connecticut (g). No sooner was he landed, but his parts made him quickly taken notice of, and very probably his quality, being the eldest son of a Privy-Counsellor; insomuch, that when the next election of Magistrates for the colony of Massachusetts came, he was chosen their Governor (h). But being a warm, hot-headed, unexperienced young man (i), and an enthusiastic rigid Puritan (k), his working and unquiet fancy raised and infused amongst them a thousand scruples of conscience, which they had not brought over with them, nor heard of before (l). He openly espoused the Antinomian Doctrines [B], and gave such encouragement to the Preachers and Spreaders of them, that it raised their vanity, and gave them such an interest among the people, as the very next year had like to have proved fatal both to the Church and Commonwealth. But the sober part observing his conduct, concerted such measures among themselves, as put an end to his Government the next election. Some time after, about 1639, he returned privately to England (m). He seemed then to be much reformed from his extravagancies, and, with his father's approbation and direction, married a Lady of a good family (n). Also through his father's credit with Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, then High-Admiral of England, he was joined with Sir William Russell in the office of Treasurer of the Navy, a place of great trust and profit (o), which he equally shared with the other, and seemed a man well satisfied and composed to the Government (p). Being a person of great natural parts, of a quick conception, and very ready, sharp, and weighty expression [C]; and withal of very profound dissimulation (q), which gave him a great advantage over the rest of mankind; he came to be much considered. So that the town of Kingston upon Hull chose him one of their Representatives, in the Parliament which met at Westminster April 13, 1640, and again in the Long Parliament which began the 3d of November in the same year (r). In June 1640, he received the honour of Knighthood from King Charles I. But thinking both his father, and himself, ill used by the Court; his father, in that Sir Thomas Wentworth had with great earnestness opposed his being made Secretary of State, and prevailed for above a month's delay; and himself, for that the said Sir Thomas would needs be created (s) Baron of Raby, in the Diocese of Durham, a house and estate belonging to the Vane family, and an honour Sir Henry made account should belong to himself [D]; from thenceforth he opposed, with great bitterness, and the utmost virulence, King Charles, and all his measures (t) [E]. During the Earl

(b) Lord Clarendon, p. 187.
(i) Neal, as above.

(l) Lord Clarendon, p. 187.

(n) Frances, daughter of Sir Christopher Wray, of Ashby in Lincolnshire, Bart. Ar. Collins, Vol. IV. p. 304.

(p) Lord Clarendon, as above, p. 188.

(q) Idem, p. 137. and Vol. III. p. 379. See Ludlow's Mem. Vol. III. p. 111.

(s) The Earl of Strafford's Patent bore date Jan. 12, 1639-40.

(10) Abridgement of R. Baxter's life, p. 98.

(11) Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 117.

(12) History, Vol. III. p. 379.

(13) Vol. I. p. 188.

(14) p. 153.

(15) Vol. II. col. 292.

(7) p. 3.

(8) Lond. 1758. 8vo. Vol. II. p. 148.

(9) Mather, Book III. p. 77. See Neale, as above, p. 144.

[B] He openly espoused the Antinomian doctrines, &c. The author of his Life relates (7), that 'his honourable Birth, long hair, and other circumstances of his person, rendered his fellow-travellers jealous of him, as a spye to betray their liberty, rather than any way like to advantage their design. But He, that they thought at first sight to have too little of Christ for their company, did soon after appear to have too much for them. For he had not been long in New England, but he ripened into more knowledge and experience of Christ, than the Churches there could bear the testimony of. Even New England could not bear all his words, though there were no King's court or King's chapel.'—The late Author of the 'Account of the European settlements in America (8)', gives this character of him, and of his behaviour there: 'The famous Sir Henry Vane the younger, an enthusiastic, giddy, turbulent man, of no very good disposition, came hither [to New England] with some of the Adventurers; and rather than remain idle, plaid at small games in New England, where the people had chosen him governor. It is not hard to conceive, how such a man, at the head of such a people, and engaged in such controversy [about Grace and Works] could throw every thing into confusion.'—Mr Vane's election, says another author (9), will remain a blemish to their judgment who did elect him, while New England remains a nation; for coming from England a young unexperienced gentleman, by the industry of some who thought to make a tool of him, he was elected Governor, and before he was scarce warm in his seat fell in with the Sectaries, and sacrificed the peace of the State to them, leaving as a caveat, that all good men are not fit for Government.' R. Baxter says, he was fain to steal away by night, and take shipping for England, before his year of Government was at an end (10).

[C] Being a person of great natural parts, &c. Mr Ludlow gives much the same character of him, in these words: 'In the beginning of the great Parliament, he was elected to serve his country among them, without the least application made on his part to that end: And in this station he soon made appear how capable he was of managing great affairs, possessing, in the highest perfection, a quick and ready apprehension, a strong and tenacious memory, a profound and penetrating judgment, a just and noble eloquence, with an easy and graceful manner of speaking. To these were added a singular zeal and affection for the good of the commonwealth, and a resolution and courage, not to be shaken or diverted from the public service (11).' . . . The Lord Clarendon says, 'He was of a temper not to be moved, and of rare dissimulation, and could comply when it was not seasonable to contradict, without losing ground by the condescension; and if he was not superior to Mr Hambden, he was inferior to no other man, in all mysterious artifices (12).'

[D] An honor Sir Henry made account should belong to himself. The Lord Clarendon observes (13), that 'it was unluckily cast upon the Earl [of Strafford] purely out of contempt of Vane.'—And he says elsewhere (14), it 'was an act of the most unnecessary provocation (though he [the Earl of Strafford] condemned the Man with marvellous Scorn) that I have known, and I believe was the chief occasion of the loss of his head.'

[E] He opposed, with great bitterness, and the utmost virulence, King Charles, and all his measures. A. Wood says (15), that, 'in the beginning of the Long Parlia-of Strafford's tryal, he communicated a very material paper, privately taken by him out of his father's study, of which an account is given in the note [F]. The 26th of February, 1640-1, he carried up to the House of Lords the articles of impeachment against Archbishop Laud (u). In June, 1643, he was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines (w). The following month he was appointed one of the Parliament's Commissioners, sent into Scotland, to negotiate a treaty with that nation; and engage them in the Parliament's service and assistance. These Commissioners embarked on their voyage July the 20th, and arrived at Leith the 7th of August (x). Sir Henry, on his return to London, made a report of all their proceedings to the House of Commons (y). He took the Covenant, among the rest, on the 22d of September [G], and subscribed it next to Oliver Cromwell (z): indeed it was in the main his own contrivance. About that time, he found means to supplant Sir William Ruffel, and to be appointed sole Treasurer of the Navy (aa); which place he held till the first wars between the English and Dutch. In that office, we are told, he shewed a rare example of honour and integrity: For the fees were, at that time, four-pence in the pound, which, by reason of the war, honestly amounted to little less than 30,000 l. a year (bb). Sir Henry looking on it as too much for a private subject, very generously gave up his Patent (cc), which he had for life from King Charles I, to the then Parliament, desiring but 2000 l. a year, for an Agent he had bred up to the business, and the remainder to go to the public. This was done, and the method of a fixed salary has continued ever since in that office (dd). About the beginning of the year 1645, he was one of the Parliament's Commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge (ee). As he was again at the Treaty in the Isle of Wight, in 1648 (ff) [H]: but he was always an enemy to Peace. Having always appeared unsettled in matters of Religion, when the Independents sprung up, he declared himself one of their Leaders (gg): and veered afterwards with every wind of new Doctrine, being successively Presbyterian, Independent, Anabaptist, Fifth-Monarchy-man, &c. [I]. In June, 1647, he was one of the Commissioners sent to the (u) The Archbishop's Diary in his Troubles and Tryal, by H. Wharton, and in Kithw. Vol. III. p. 1087.

(y) Whitelock, p. 76.

(aa) Wood, as above, col. 292. Mystery of the good old Cause.

(bb) This is hardly credible.

(dd) A. Collins's Passage, Vol. V. p. 303. See Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 111.

(ee) Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 846. &c. Whitelock, p. 125.

(ff) Whitelock, p. 334.

(w) Scobell's Collection of Acts, June 1643, p. 43.

(x) Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 466, &c.

(z) Rushworth, p. 480. See Richard's Hist. Edit. 1720. p. 585.

(cc) Decemb. 23, 1646, an Ordinance passed, at his request, to enable him to make a surrender of his place of Treasurer of the Navy. Whitelock, p. 232.

(gg) Rapin's Hist. Edit. 1733. Vol. II. fol. p. 514. and Richard's, p. 606, 607.

ment, he was a promoter of the Rebellion, a frequent committee man, a speech-maker, a preacher, an undertaker, a juggling fellow, and a plotter to gain the estates of other persons that adhered to his Majesty in the worst of times.' And another writer tells us, that 'he was born to disquiet the world, and to be a firebrand of communities; yet still carrying his designs of confusion under a feigned meekness and simplicity of the Gospel (16).'

[F] During the Earl of Strafford's tryal, he communicated a very material paper, &c.] That paper contained notes, taken by his father, Secretary Vane, of some opinions delivered at the Council-table, May 5, 1640. And Mr Whitelock gives us the following account, how they came to be discovered. . . Secretary Vane being out of town, sent a letter to his son, Sir Henry Vane the younger, then in London, with the key of his study, for his son to look in his cabinet, for some papers there to send to his father. The son looking over many papers, among them lighted upon these notes, which being of so great concernment to the publick, and declaring so much against the Earl of Strafford, he held himself bound in duty and conscience to discover them. He shewed them to Mr Pym, who urged him, and prevailed with him, that they might be made use of in the evidence against the Earl of Strafford, as being most material, and of great consequence, in relation to that business. Accordingly they were produced, April 12, 1641, to the House of Commons, and in the afternoon at a conference with the Lords; and the next day the Earl being brought to Westminster, and both houses being met, the notes were openly read. The title of them was,—No danger of a war with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive.—Then followed the opinions interlocutory. [King Charles] 'How can we undertake offensive war, if we have no more money?' [Sir Thomas Wentworth, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.] 'Borrow of the city 100000 l. go on vigorously to levy ship money; your Majesty having tried the affection of your people, you are absolved and loose from all rule of Government, and to do what power will admit. Your Majesty having tried all ways, and being refused, shall be acquitted before God and man. And you have an Army in Ireland, that you may employ to reduce this Kingdom to obedience: for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months.' [Archbishop Laud] 'You have tried all ways, and have always been denied, it is now lawful to take it by force.' [Lord Cottington] 'Leagues abroad there may be made for the defence of the kingdom; the lower house are weary of the King and Church: all ways shall be just to raise money by, in this inevitable necessity, and are to be used, being lawful.' [Archbishop Laud] 'For an offensive, not any defensive war.' [Lord Lieutenant of Ireland] 'The town is full of Lords, put the commission of Array on foot, and if any of them stir, we will make them smart.'—What was accounted the most criminal, and no less than treason, in these words, was the proposal, of bringing an Army out of Ireland, to reduce this Kingdom to obedience; by which the Earl's enemies understood England. But if he spoke any such words, he plainly meant Scotland, which was in rebellion. For, as he said in his own defence, the word this cannot rationally imply England; because England was not out of the way of obedience, and because there never was any the least intention of landing the Irish Army in England, as the Lords of the Council were able to attest (17).

[G] He took the Covenant, among the rest, &c.] Whilst he, and his fellow-commissioners, were settling it with the Scottish parliament; the last finding fault with these two clauses, concerning—'the preservation of the King's person'—and, 'reducing the Doctrine and Discipline of both Churches to the pattern of the best Reformed.'—Sir Henry found out a softening expedient, by adding to the first clause these or the like words. . . 'in preservation of the Laws of the Land, and Liberty of the Subject—and to the second—according to the Word of God (18).'

[H] As he was again at the Treaty in the Isle of Wight.] We are told, that he acted perfidiously upon that occasion; in that he persuaded his Majesty, not to be prodigal in his concessions; alledging, that He had already yielded more than was fit for them to ask, or Him to grant: yet afterwards did most fiercely inveigh against the concessions, as designed by his Majesty, under the appearance of peace, to ruin the Parliament and Commonwealth (19).—The reason of this odd conduct is explained by Bishop Burnet (20), who tells us, that 'Sir Henry Vane, and others who were for a change in the government, had no mind to treat any more. —They went to the Treaty on purpose to delay matters; and therefore studied to draw out the treaty to a great length, till Cromwell had settled Scotland and the North, and could bring up the Army to London.' . . . In the mean time, Sir Henry flattered the Episcopal party to the King's ruin, as well as their own.'

[I] And veered afterwards with every wind of new Doctrine, &c.] The Lord Clarendon says of him, in this respect, that 'Vane was a man not to be described by any Character of Religion; in which he had swallowed some of the fancies, and extravagancies of every Sect, or Faction; and was become (which cannot be expressed by any other language than was peculiar to that time) a Man above Ordinances, unlimited or unrestrained by any rules, or bounds prescribed to other men, by reason of his perfection. He was a perfect Enthusiast; and, without doubt, did believe himself inspired; which so far corrupted his reason and understanding, (which in all matters without

(16) Perinchief's Life of King Charles I. Lond. 1676. 8vo. p. 174.

(17) Whitelock's Memorials, ed. 1732. p. 43.

(18) Ludlow's Memoirs, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 79.

(19) Wood's Ath. as above, col. 292.

(20) History, as above, Vol. I. p. 60, 61.

the Army, to acquaint them what the Parliament had done in satisfaction of their desires, and to persuade them to a compliance with the Parliament (bb). He doth not appear to have had any share in the King's Tryal or Death (ii); but was after that one of the most zealous Commonwealth's-men. In 1649, 1650, 1651, and 1652, he was appointed one of the Council of State (kk) [K]: and, in 1652, was for a time President of the same Council, being then also one of the Commissioners of the Navy (ll). The 9th of January 1649-50, he made the report to the House of Commons, from the Committee appointed to consider of the manner of electing future Parliaments (mm). Towards the end of the year 1651, he was nominated one of the Commissioners, that were to be sent into Scotland; in order to introduce the English Government there, and effect an union between the two Kingdoms (nn): but Sir Henry, for his own part, only sowed dissention between the opposite parties in the Kirk [L]. To embroil affairs, and have every thing unsettled; except perhaps a Commonwealth, with great latitude and libertinism; seems indeed to have been his natural disposition, and earnest endeavour. Therefore, when Oliver Cromwell went about to usurp and ingross the Supreme Authority, he became one of his most violent opposers; and left no stone unturned to supplant, and even to ruin him (oo). He was one of the great opposers of the dissolution of the Long Parliament [M]. And continuing his practices against Cromwell [N], the latter summoned him, in 1656, to appear before him in Council. After some delays, he appeared, when he was charged by the Protector with disaffection to the Government; which he had demonstrated in a late book, published by him with a seditious intention, called, A Healing Question proposed and resolved [O]. Sir Henry did not disown his dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs; and owned the (ll) Wood, Ath. col. 293.

(mm) Parl. Hist. p. 244.

(nn) Whitelock, p. 512, 517, 527. Parl. Hist. Vol. 20. p. 82, 85, 101.

(oo) Siding with, and preaching among Anabaptists and Fifth-Monarchy-men. Wood, Ath. col. 293.

(21) Lord Clarendon's History, Vol. VI. p. 695, 696.

(22) Athen. as above, col. 293.

(23) R. Baxter's Life, fol. 74. and Abridgment of it, p. 100, 101.

(24) Whitelock, p. 381.

(25) Bishop Burnet's History of his own Time, ed. 1753. 8vo. Vol. I. p. 85.

(26) Vol. III.

‘ without the verge of religion was superior to that of most men) that he did at some time believe, he was the person deputed to reign over the Saints upon earth for a thousand years (31).’—A. Wood says of him (22), as follows, in yet harsher terms; ‘ In sum, he was the Proteus of the times, a meer hotch-potch of religion, chief ring-leader of all the frantick Sectarians, of a turbulent spirit and working brain, of a strong composition of choler and melancholy, an inventor not only of whimsies in Religion, but also of crotchets of the State, (as his several Models testify) and composed only of treason, ingratitude, and baseness.’—It seems, there was a sect, from him called Vanists (23).

[K] He was appointed one of the Council of State.] The powers of this Council were, To command and fettle the Militia of England and Ireland: To set forth such a Navy as they should think fit: To appoint magazines and stores, and to dispose them &c. To sit and execute the powers given them, for a year (24).

[L] Only sowed dissention between the opposite parties in the Kirk.] The Kirk was then divided into two parties, denominated the Protestors, and the Resolutioners, which, like all other religious factions, acted with great fierceness against one another. To calm them, these Commissioners were sent: Some of them ‘ moved, that pains should be taken to unite these two parties. But Vane (says Bishop Burnet) opposed this with much zeal: He said, would they heal the wound that they had given themselves, which weakened them so much? The setting them at quiet could have no other effect, but to heal and unite them in their opposition to their authority: He therefore moved, that they might be left at liberty to fight out their own quarrels, and be kept in a greater dependence on the temporal authority, when both sides were forced to make their appeal to it: So it was resolved to suffer them to meet still in their Presbyteries and Synods, but not in general Assemblies, which had a greater face of union and authority. This advice was followed: so the division went on (25).’—It may not be amiss to hear what the Lord Clarendon says of Sir Henry Vane upon this occasion (26). ‘ There hath been scarce any thing more wonderful throughout the progress of these distractions, than that the Covenant did with such extraordinary expedition pass the two Houses, when all the leading persons in those Councils were at the same time known to be as great enemies to Presbytery (the establishment whereof was the main end of this Covenant) as they were to the King or the Church. And he who contributed most to it, and in truth was the principal contriver of it, and the man by whom the Committee of Scotland was entirely and stupidly governed, Sir Harry Vane the younger, was not afterwards more known to abhor the Covenant, and the Presbyterians, than he was at that very time known to do, and laughed at them then, as much as ever he did afterwards. . . . There need no more be said of his ability, than that he was chosen to couzen and deceive a whole nation which was thought to excel in craft and cunning: which he did with notable pregnancy and dexterity, and prevailed with a people,

‘ that could not otherwise be prevailed upon, than by advancing that idol Presbytery, to sacrifice their peace, their interest and their faith, to the erecting a power and authority, that resolved to persecute Presbytery to an extirpation; and, in process of time, very near brought their purpose to pass.’

[M] He was one of the great opposers of the dissolution of the Long Parliament.] By this Dissolution, we mean Oliver Cromwell's forcibly and irregularly turning them out of the House. For by Statute XVI. Caroli I. c. 7. the Parliament then assembled could not be dissolved, prorogued, or adjourned, unless by Act of Parliament; nor could they be adjourned, unless it was by themselves, or by their own order.—When therefore Lieutenant-Colonel Worley entered the House of Commons with two files of musqueteers, to drive out the members, on April 20, 1653, Sir Henry Vane said aloud, ‘ This is not honest, yea it is against morality and common honesty.’ Upon which Cromwell fell a railing at him, crying out with a loud voice, ‘ O Sir Henry Vane, Sir Henry Vane, the Lord deliver me from Sir Henry Vane (27).’

[N] And continuing his practices against Cromwell.] Henry Cromwell, in a letter to Secretary Thurloe (28), gives this account of him, in 1655: ‘ Sir Henry Vane, and such like, who are rotten in their principles, can make good use of such delusions as these [Fifth-Monarchy] and the like, to carry on their designs. . . . Sir Henry goes up and downe amongst these people and others, endeavouring to withdraw them from their submission to the present Government. . . . If he be not prevented, he will be a sad scourge to England.’—We find him again, in 1656, caballing against the Protector; and, when writs came out for a new parliament, ‘ was one of those who said, they would have no swordmen, no decimator, or any that received salary from the State to serve in parliament; and were resolved to give a list to the Government, and doubted not of carrying all before them.’ He then endeavoured to be elected for Boston in Lincolnshire, and afterwards for that County; but was disappointed. He polled in three places, and mist it in all (29).

[O] A Healing Question proposed and resolved.] The further title of it was, ‘ A healing Question propounded and resolved, upon occasion of the late public and seasonable call to Humiliation, in order to Love and Union amongst the honest Party &c.’ Lond. 1656. four sheets, quarto. It was written upon an invitation given, in a declaration published by Cromwell, for a general Fast, that the people would apply themselves to the Lord, to discover the Achan which had so long obstructed the settlement of these distracted nations: And contained, says Ludlow (30), the state of the Republicans controversy with the King, the present deviation from that cause for which they engaged, and the means to unite all parties in the accomplishment of it. When it was finished, Sir Henry shewed it to Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, who seeming to approve it, desired to take it with him, and promised to communicate it to Cromwell upon the first opportunity.

writing

(27) Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 457.

(28) Thurloe's State-Papers, Vol. IV. p. 509.

(29) Idem, Vol. V. p. 295, 299, 349.

(30) Vol. II, p. 576.

writing of the book, and also the publishing, though in terms dark and mysterious enough, as his manner was. Whereupon Cromwell ordered him to give security, by a day limited, not to disturb the peace of the nation, or else to stand committed. The time being expired, he appeared again before the Council, and delivered into Cromwell's own hand another Paper, containing the Reasons of his disapproving the present usurpation, and a friendly advice to him to return to his duty, with some justification of his own conduct with regard to the publick. But notwithstanding all this, and divers reasons alledged by him to excuse himself from giving the demanded security; one of which was, the summons sent him to appear in Parliament; he was sent prisoner to Carisbrook-Castle, in the Isle of Wight (pp). From whence being released, December 31, 1656 (qq), he came to London, where he met with another kind of persecution: For Cromwell perceiving that the imprisoning of him had proved unsuccessful, he privately encouraged some of the Army to take possession of certain forest-walks belonging to him, near Raby-Castle, and also gave orders to the Attorney-General, on pretence of a flaw in his title to a great part of his estate, to file a bill against him in the Exchequer. This was designed to oblige him to produce his title, which if he had done, they doubted not, by the craft of the Lawyers, to find some defect in it, whereby it was hoped he would be forced into a compliance: Yet, at the same time, he was privately informed that he should be freed from this, or any other inquisition, and have whatever else he could desire, in case he would comply with the present authority (rr). But he remained inflexible all Oliver's time: And so he did under his successor, Protector Richard; against whom there were many meetings of the chief sticklers for a Commonwealth, at Sir Henry's house near Charing-crofs (ss). Great endeavours were used to keep him out of Richard's Parliament in 1659 (tt); and by direction, the returning officers at Hull and Bristol would not return him, though he is said to have had the majority; yet at last he was chosen for Whitchurch in Hampshire, through the interest of Robert Wallop, Esq; (uu). In that Assembly, he and other Republicans laboured to overturn the settlement of a Protector and two houses of Parliament, and to introduce a Commonwealth: By their abilities, they soon lessened Richard's power, and gained an ascendent over his party, to which a warm speech of Sir Henry's [P] is said to have not a little contributed (www). After Richard's abdication, the Long Parliament that had been restored by a general council of the officers of the army, constituted Sir Henry one of the Committee of Safety the 9th of May; and the 13th of the same month, one of the Council of State (xx). The 26th of the said month, he was appointed the first of the seven Commissioners for managing the affairs of the Admiralty; and in September, President of the Council: About which time he proposed a new model of Government [Q]. Upon the Council of the Army's exclusion of the Parliament, which was on the 13th of October, he was nominated, four days after, one of the Committee of Ten from the Council of State, to consider of fit ways to carry on the affairs of the Government; and also one of the Committee to nominate officers of the army. The 26th, when the Committee of Safety was framed [R], he was one of them; and their design

(pp) Wood, Ath. col. 293.

(rr) Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 594.

(ss) Oldmixon. Vol. I. p. 428.

(uu) Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 618. Sir Edw. Moun- tague affirms, he, and other Commonwealth's- men were let in, upon their fair promises not to overturn the Government. See Kennett's Register, p. 5.

[P] A warm speech of Sir Henry's. It was in these words: 'Mr Speaker, Among all the people of the universe, I know none who have shewn so much zeal for the liberty of their country, as the English at this time have done: They have, by the help of Divine Providence, overcome all obstacles, and have made themselves Free. We have driven away the Hereditary Tyranny of the house of Stuart, at the expence of much blood and treasure, in hopes of enjoying Hereditary Liberty, after having shaken off the yoke of Kingship; and there is not a man amongst us, who could have imagined that any person would be so bold as to dare to attempt the ravishing from us Freedom, which costs us so much blood and so much labour. But so it happens, I know not by what misfortune, we are fallen into the error of those who poisoned the Emperor Titus to make room for Domitian, who made away Augustus that they might have Tiberius, and changed Claudius for Nero. I am sensible these examples are foreign from my subject, since the Romans in those days were buried in Lewdness and Luxury; whereas the People of England are now renowned, all over the world, for their great vertue and discipline; and yet suffer an Idiot, without courage, without sense, nay without ambition, to have dominion in a country of Liberty. One could bear a little with Oliver Cromwell, though, contrary to his oath of fidelity to the Parliament, contrary to his duty to the Publick, contrary to the respect he owed to that venerable body from whom he received his Authority, he usurped the government. His merit was so extraordinary, that our judgments, our passions might be blinded by it. He made his way to Empire by the most illustrious actions; he had under his command an Army that had made him a Conqueror, and a People that had made him their General. But as for Richard Cromwell his son, who is he? what are his titles? We have seen that he had a sword by his side, but did he ever draw it? And, what is of more importance in this case, Is he fit to get obedience from a mighty Nation, who could never make a footman obey him? Yet we must recognise this Man as our King, under the stile of Protector! a man without birth, without courage, without conduct. For my part, I declare, Sir, it shall never be said that I made such a Man my Master (31).'

(31) Oldmixon's History of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 430, 431.

[Q] He proposed a new model of Government. The substance of it was, That the supreme Power, delegated by the People to their Trustees, ought to be in some fundamentals not dispensed with: That it is destructive to the People's Liberties (to which by God's blessing they are fully restored) to admit any earthly King or single Person to the legislative or executive Power over this Nation: That the supreme Power, delegated, is not entrusted to the People's Trustees, to erect matters of Faith and Worship, so as to exercise compulsion therein (32). — Mr Baxter informs us (33), that Vane was for a Fanatick Democracy. . . . When Cromwell was dead, he got Sir Arthur Haslerigge to be his close adherent on civil accounts, and got the Rump set up again, and a Council of State, and got the power much into his own hands. When in the height of his power, he set upon the forming a New Commonwealth, and with some of his adherents drew up the model, which was for Popular Government; but so that men of his confidence must be the people.'

(32) See Trial, p. 30.

(33) Abridgement of his Life, p. 99.

[R] When the Committee of Safety was framed] This Committee was authorized to seize and secure such as might justly be suspected of any design to disturb the publick Peace, and also to remove such Officers of the Army as they should think fit, and to fill their places with others, till the Parliament should take farther order therein. The time appointed for the duration of their power was Eight Days, by which time it was supposed the House of Commons would be able to constitute a Council of State, to take care of affairs of that nature (34).

(34) Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 652, 653.

(qq) In Sept. 1656. Ludlow's Mem. Vol. II. p. 568, 576, 577. and Thurloc's State-Papers, Vol. V. p. 328, 349, 407. He remained prisoner four months. Trial, p. 47.

(tt) See Thurloc's State-Papers, Vol. VII. p. 588, 704.

(www) White-lock, 677. and Oldmixon, p. 430.

(xx) Whitelock, p. 677, 678. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 656.

(yy) Whitelock, p. 678, 685.

was apprehended to be the overthrowing of Magistracy, Ministry, and the Law (yy). We find him also, November 1, one of the Committee to consider of a Form of Government for the three Nations as a Commonwealth. In that case, ' he was hard to be satisfied, ' but did much stick to his own apprehensions, or notions (zz).' The proceedings of General Monk were very displeasing and alarming to him, with the rest of the Republicans; and new Commissions being ordered for raising of fresh forces, he was nominated Commander of a Regiment of Horse, which was the only military employment he ever had (aaa). November 16, he was appointed one of the Committee of Nineteen, to determine the qualifications of Members of Parliament. Upon the re-assembling of the Long Parliament, being sent for, he came and took his place in the House, January 9, 1659-60. Then he was questioned for his compliance with the Army during the late interruption; and, though he answered ingenuously, it was voted, that he should forthwith repair to his house at Raby, and remain there during the pleasure of the Parliament: At the same time, he was discharged from being a Member of the Parliament (bbb). Delaying to remove from London, on account of illness, real, or pretended, and endeavouring to stir up the enemies of the then Government to rise and take up arms; an order was made, February 1, for his being taken into custody, and sent to Raby; and another order, on the 13th, for the Serjeant at Arms to carry him to his house at Bellew in Lincolnshire (ccc); in the way to his house at Raby (ddd). The month following, the Jesuit provincial Bradshaw, who came over from Spain with above a hundred thousand pounds sterling, was treating with him, and General Lambert (eee). After the King's Restoration, being, as he thought, conscious to himself of having done nothing in relation to public affairs, for which he could not willingly and cheerfully suffer, he came up, and continued at his house in Hamstead near London (fff). But, June 11, 1660, the House of Commons resolved [S], that he should be one of the Twenty Persons to be excepted out of the act of General Pardon and Oblivion, for and in respect only of such pains, penalties, and forfeitures, not extending to life, as should be thought fit to be inflicted on him. And he never applying to the King, but lurking up and down, without giving any account of himself, and being looked on as a person of a mischievous activity (ggg); engaged, with some of the Army, to drive the King out of England again (hhh); he was therefore committed to the Tower in July (iii). Upon the insurrection of the Fifth-monarchy-men, in January 1660-1, Sir Henry, the only person of parts and figure who had formerly countenanced them, and writ in favour of their principles [T]; being now looked upon by the Court with a jealous eye, (zz) Whitelock, p. 686, 689.

(aaa) Whitelock, p. 686. His regiment was ordered to be disbanded Jan. 14, 1659-60. Idem, p. 693. It is there called a regiment of foot. See his Tryal, p. 33, 49. and Life, p. 9.

(bbb) Whitelock, p. 693. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 805. and Tryal, p. 48.

(ddd) Mercurius Politicus, No. 605.

(ccc) Whitelock, p. 694, 696. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 823, 826, 827, 828. Wood, Ath. col. 294.

(eee) Woodrow's Introduction, to his Hist. of Scotland, fol. p. 13.

(fff) Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 111.

(ggg) Printed Journals of the House of Commons, in 1660, p. 61, 126.

(iii) Wood, as above, col. 294.

(hhh) Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 47, 112.

[S] But, June 11, 1660, the House of Commons resolved. The several Resolutions and Proceedings of the House of Commons, with relation to Sir Henry, will appear by the following extracts from their Journals.

" June 11, 1660. Resolved, that Sir Henry Vane, Knight, be one of the Twenty Persons to be excepted out of the act of General Pardon and Oblivion, for and in respect only of such pains, penalties, and forfeitures (not extending to life) as shall be thought fit to be inflicted on him by another act, intended to be hereafter passed for that purpose (35)."—The clause of the act of Indemnity, in pursuance of that resolution, was in these words. ' Provided always, that this act, or any thing therein contained, shall not extend to the pardoning, or to give any other benefit whatsoever, to Sir Henry Vane, John Lambert, or either of them, but that they, and either of them, are and shall be out of this present act wholly excepted and foreprised.'—August 17, 1660, Sir Heneage Finch reports, . . . That ' to the exception of the Four Persons that follow in the clause concerning Vane, Lambert, &c. they also adhere, that they should stand excepted for life: The Lord Finch (who managed the conference for the house of Lords) said, indeed they were not excepted as Murderers; but he took notice, that the King, of whose Wisdom none will or can doubt, . . . thought fit, sitting the Parliament, to commit these persons to the Tower of London. . . . But he said withal, if they were capable of mercy, no question but the King, the Fountain of Mercy, he would extend it to them. In the mean time, their Lordships thought it fit to leave them to the Mercy of the King; and so he hoped this House will too (36)."

(35) Journals of the House of Commons, p. 61.

(36) Ibid. p. 126.

August 23. At a conference between the two Houses, the Lord Chancellor Clarendon observed, that Hesilrigg and Vane were persons, whom the secluded Members, after their restitution, and when they were preparing the way for the Restoration, looked upon as fit to be secured and confined: That, after the King was come in, those Gentlemen, notwithstanding the censure on them by the secluded Members, and the blessed end of the Long Parliament, returned to town; never applying themselves to the King, but lurked up and down, without giving any account of themselves: and his Lordship added, that they look on them as persons of a mischievous activity: And therefore their Lordships desire to leave them to the Mercy of the King; with this further intimation, that they would be ready to join with the House of Commons in a Petition to the King, that Mercy might be shewed them; and that his severity might not extend to their Lives: And he did not doubt, but the intercession of the House would be effectual for that (37).—August 24, 1660. Resolved, that this House doth agree with the Lords, as to Sir Henry Vane's standing excepted in the act of General Pardon and Oblivion; in the same sort, as is offered in the amendments from the Lords.—Resolved, That this house doth agree with the Lords, in the expedient offered by them, at the last conference, as to Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert, for petitioning his Majesty for their Pardon, as to their Lives (38).—August 28. Ordered, that it be referred to the Committee, who managed the last conference with the Lords, to draw a petition to his Majesty, in the name of both Houses, for his Majesty's pardoning of Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert, as to Life; according to what was offered by the Lords in that behalf, at the late conference (39).

(37) Ibid. p. 133.

(38) Ibid. p. 135.

(39) Ibid. p. 140.

[T] And writ in favour of their principles.] Their principles are well known to have been, that our Saviour was coming down to erect a Fifth-Monarchy upon earth, which would last a thousand years. Sir Henry's enthusiastick Treatise on that subject, was intituled, ' The retired man's Meditations: or the Mystery and Power of Godliness shining forth in the living world, to the unmasking the Mystery of Iniquity in the most refined and purest Forms. And withal presenting to view, 1. The Riches and Fullness of Christ's Person as Mediator. 2. The Natural and Spiritual Man in their proper distinctions. 3. The Reign and Kingdom of Christ in the nature, limits and extent thereof, as well in his Saints as over his Enemies. In which old Light is restored, and new Light justified, being the Witness which is given to this Age by Henry Vane, Knight.' Lond. 1655. 4to. In the Preface, he begins with some Prophecy of himself and of his party. ' There is not any thing which lies more cross to the busy and boundless Spirit of man, than that which takes him off the wing of his natural desire, and is a bar unto that activity in him, which, if permitted to run its course, makes his feet swift to his eye, was removed from one prison to another, and at last to the Isle of Scilly (kkk) [V]. The Lords and Commons had, in August, 1660, joined in a petition to the King, that if he were attainted, yet execution as to his life might be remitted [W]: to which his Majesty gave a favourable answer, though in general words; so that he reckoned he was safe (lll). But in July 1661, the Commons had so far altered their sentiments, as to order, that he should be proceeded against according to Law [X]. And, for that purpose, he sent for back to the Tower of London (mmm). In Easter term, 1662, he was indicted of High-Treason; and the Grand-Jury having found the bill, he was arraigned the 2d of June following, at the King's-Bench Bar. The substance of the charge against him, was, that he did compass and imagine the death of the King; contrived totally to subvert the ancient Frame of Government; and to keep out the said Sovereign Lord from the exercise of his Regal Government: To effect which, he had traiterously and maliciously assembled, and consulted, with other false Traitors; had appointed Officers; and arrayed a multitude, to the number of a thousand persons, with guns, &c. June the 6th, the day of his tryal, he pleaded strongly, that no Treason could be committed against a King de jure, and not de facto, such as King Charles II. was, from 1648 to 1659, when the crimes against him were laid: And that he acting then by authority of Parliament, the supreme Court of the Nation, could not be questioned by any inferior Court (nnn) [Z]. His enemies affirm, his whole behaviour was so assuming and insolent, that the Court and King's Council told him, that his own defence was a fresh charge against him, and the highest evidence of his inward guilt, had there not been such a cloud of witnesses to prove the particulars (ooo). His friends maintain, on the contrary, that he behaved with great eloquence, soundness of judgment, and presence of mind (ppp) [Z]. On the 11th of June, (kkk) Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 112.

(lll) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. I. p. 228.

(nnn) See his Trial.

(ppp) Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 108.

(mmm) Journals, as above, p. 287.

(ooo) Echard, as above, p. 802.

‘ his own destruction.’ In Chap. I. is shewed, ‘ that the foundation and first rule of all true and right knowledge of God is seated in Christ the living Word, as the blessed Trinity by their own immediate operations do make themselves personally visible therein.’—The 26th and last Chapter treats of ‘ the time of the Manifestation of the Sons of God, their sitting with Christ on his Throne, ruling and influencing all things on earth, during the space of a thousand years.’

[V] And at last to the Isle of Scilly.] The Letter he wrote from thence to his Lady, and which is printed at the end of his Face of the Times, is dated March 7, 1661-2.

[W] The Lords and Commons . . . joined in a petition, &c.] That petition was in these words.

“ To the King's most Excellent Majesty: The humble Petition of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled.

Sheweth, that your Majesty having declared your gracious pleasure to proceed only against the immediate Murderers of your Royal Father: We your Majesty's most humble subjects, the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, not finding Sir Henry Vane, or Colonel Lambert, to be of that number, are humble suitors to your Majesty, if they shall be attainted, yet execution, as to their Lives, may be remitted: and, as in duty bound, we shall ever pray for your Majesty's long and happy reign over us.” This petition was presented by the Lord Chancellor, who reported, that he had presented the petition of both Houses to the King concerning Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert, and his Majesty grants the desires in the said petition (40).

[X] As to order, that he should be proceeded against according to law.] Their orders upon that occasion were as follow—July 1, 1661. Ordered, That Sir Henry Vane and John Lambert, that are wholly excepted and foreprised out of the Act of Indemnity, be left to be proceeded against according to law: And it is recommended to Mr Attorney-general, to take care of the proceeding against them.—July 23. Upon information that the Fanaticks make mention of Lambert and Sir Henry Vane in their Meetings; and have great hopes to disturb the publick peace, if they could procure their escape; Ordered, that Mr Attorney-general have notice to speed the prosecution against Vane and Lambert, and prepare the evidence against them.—Nov. 22. Ordered, That the King's Majesty be desired to send for John Lambert and Sir Henry Vane back again to the Tower of London, in order to their Tryal. . . Upon which application, his Majesty returned this answer, That he would take care, that Vane, and Lambert, and Waller, should be brought in safe custody (41).—It is said, that this Address of the House of Commons against Sir Henry, was ‘ either upon the account of his own behaviour, or that of his party, or some private resentment (42).’

[F] Could not be questioned by any inferior Court.] He laid it down as a maxim, That none are judges of the Power and Privileges of Parliament, but themselves.

For, admit once, that their judgment may be called in question, and disputed by private persons, or by inferior Courts (whose Votes are included in theirs) the Fundamentals of Government are plucked up by the roots. Par in pares non habet imperium, multo minus in eos qui majus imperium habent; An equal has no command over his equal, much less over those that have a greater command or authority (43). He also offered these points to the consideration of the Court, and prayed earnestly to have counsel assigned him to speak to them: 1. Whether the collective body of the Parliament can be impeached of high-treason? 2. Whether any person acting by authority of Parliament, can (so long as he acteth by that authority) commit Treason? 3. Whether matters acted by that Authority, can be called in question in an inferior Court? 4. Whether a King de jure, and out of possession, can have Treason committed against him, he not being King de facto, and in actual possession (44)? No council was assigned him.—And as to the pretence of the Power, or Authority, of Parliament; Sir Heneage Finch, the Sollicitor-general, said, ‘ It is to be known, that it was not the eighth part of the House of Commons, such as were let in, to do all that hath been complained of; and the acting under Authority of such an End of a Parliament, under such a violation, was no excuse, but an aggravation; but that the Parliament was in law ended by the death of the late King, notwithstanding that act of 17 Caroli I.—As to the question, Whether an House of Parliament can commit treason? If they depart from that allegiance which they have sworn, at their first meeting, they are impeachable for it.—And as to the question, Whether the King, being out of actual possession, can have treason committed against him? He affirmed it (45).’—Justice Windham also held, ‘ That if the House be under a force, and some kept out, some let in, to serve a turn, whatever they act is a nullity in law.’—Justice Twisden held the same opinion, That it is not the fitting of a few members within those walls that will continue it a Parliament. And said, Whether a Parliament may commit treason, is not the question: but, Whether a few of the House, shutting out their fellows, and usurping the government, were not Traitors (46)?—In a word, the Resolutions of the Court were: 1. That by the death of King Charles I. that Long Parliament was actually determined, notwithstanding the Act, that it should not be dissolved but by the consent of both Houses. 2. That though King Charles II. was de facto kept out of the exercise of the Kingly office by Traytors and Rebels, yet he was King both de facto and de jure, and all the acts which were done to the keeping him out were high-treason. 3. That the very consultation and advising together of the means to destroy the King and his Government, was an overt-act to prove the compassing of the King's death (47).

[Z] His friends . . . maintain, that he behaved with great eloquence, &c.] Ludlow says (48), ‘ That he behaved himself on all those occasions [his Trial, Sentence,

(43) Trial, p. 38.

(44) Ibid. p. 32.

(45) Ibid. p. 34.

(46) Ibid. p. 35.

(47) Kelyng's Reports, Folio, p. 14.

(48) Vol. III. p. 103.

(40) Journals, p. 152. Sir Henry Vane's Trial, p. 74. and Thurloe's State-Papers, Vol. 7. p. 914.

(41) Journals of the House of Commons, p. 287, 303, 317, 318. (42) Echard's History, p. 802.

(999) Whose sufferings for his Majesty and his Father had been eminent. Wood, Vol. II. col. 294.

(rrr) Tryal, p. 51, 52, 81.

(sss) Echard's Hist. p. 802.

(ttt) Tryal, &c. p. 84, 86, 87. and Burnet, Vol. I. p. 229.

he received sentence to be hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn: which, at the request of his friends (999), was changed to beheading on Tower-hill. Some persuaded him to make his submission to the King, and to endeavour by that means to save his life; but he said, 'If the King did not think himself more concerned for his Honour and Word, than he did for his life, he was very willing they should take it. Nay, he declared, that he valued his life less in a good cause, than the King could do his promise (rrr) [AA].' The warrant therefore for his execution being signed, he was drawn on a sledge to Tower-hill, on the 14th of June, and beheaded in the very same place where the Earl of Strafford, whose victim he was, had been sacrificed before to popular fury (sss). The Sheriff had beforehand signified to him, that he must not speak any thing against his Majesty, or the Government: and he beginning to reflect upon them, in his last speech upon the scaffold, as the Lieutenant of the Tower apprehended [BB], he was interrupted by drums and trumpets placed about the scaffold on purpose to drown his voice (ttt). He was naturally a very fearful man; but he composed himself so, that he died with a resolution that surpris'd all who knew how little of that was natural to him. We are told, that he had a head as darkened in his notions of Religion, as his mind was

'tence, and Death] in such a manner, that he left it doubtful, whether his Eloquence, soundness of Judgment, and presence of Mind, his gravity and magnanimity, his constant adherence to the cause of his country, and heroick carriage during the time of his confinement and at the hour of death; or the malice of his enemies and their frivolous suggestions at his trial, the breach of the publick Faith in the usage he found, the incivility of the bench, and the savage rudeness of the Sheriff, who commanded the trumpets several times to sound, that he might not be heard by the people; were more remarkable.'—He adds a little lower, from a letter he had received . . . 'Sir Henry Vane was long in his defence, but not tedious: He much perplexed both Court and Council, and has acquired eternal reputation by nobly pleading for the dying liberties of his country; it being clear, that all the party which seemed to be indemnified by the act of Amnesty, shall be punished in his person; and that for this cause only, That in his pleading he undertook by the Authority of the said Parliament to justify what he had done.'

[AA] Than the King could do his promise.] Bishop Kennett observes, 'Though the King gave a favourable Answer to the Address of the two Houses, yet it was in general words only, and could not be called a promise of sparing his life (49).'—The substance of the Address of the two Houses was, That if Sir Henry should be attainted, yet Execution as to his Life might be remitted: And his Majesty granted the desires in the said petition. See note [W]. But, in less than a year, the Parliament ordered, that He should be proceeded against according to Law So that his Majesty complied both ways with the Desires of the great Council, or Wisdom, of the Nation. . . . Bishop Burnet insinuates, that the putting him to death was contrary to the Declaration from Breda. For, says he, that declaration 'being full for an Indemnity to all, except the Regicides, he was comprehended in that; since, though he was for changing the government, and deposing the King, yet he did not approve of the putting him to death, nor of the force put on the parliament, but did for some time, while these things were acted, withdraw from the scene (50).'—In opposition to which, the Reader will be pleased duly to consider this passage in that declaration . . . 'We do by these presents declare, that we do grant a free and general Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under the great Seal of England, to all our Subjects, of what degree or quality soever, who, within forty days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall by any publick act declare their doing so; and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good subjects; excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament.' . . . It is also to be remembered, as hath been observed above, that Sir Henry never applied to the King, but lurked up and down, without giving any account of himself.

[BB] And he beginning to reflect upon them in his last Speech, &c.] The words were these: 'I suppose you may wonder when I shall tell you that I am not brought hither according to any known Law of the land. It is true, I have been before a Court of Justice (and am now going to appear before a greater Tribunal, where I am going to give an account of all my actions)

'under their sentence I stand here at this time. When I was before them, I could not have the liberty and privilege of an Englishman, the grounds, reasons, and causes of the actings I was charged with, duly considered; I therefore desired the Judges, that they would set their Seals to my bill of Exceptions; I pressed hard for it again and again, as the right of myself, and every free-born Englishman, by the law of the land, but was finally denied it.'—Here Sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of the Tower, interrupted him, saying, Sir, you must not go on thus, and in a furious manner said, that he railed against the Judges, and that it was a lye, and I am here, says he, to testify that it is false. . . . Sir Henry replied, 'God will judge between me and you in this matter. I speak but matter of fact, and cannot you bear that? It is evident, the Judges have refused to sign my Bill of Exceptions.'—Then the trumpets were ordered to sound in his face, to hinder his being heard. At which Sir Henry (lifting up his hand, and then laying it on his breast) said, 'What mean you, Gentlemen? is this your usage of me? did you use all the rest so? I had even done (as to that) could you have been patient; but, seeing you cannot bear it, I shall only say this, That whereas the Judges have refused to seal that with their hands, that they have done; I am come to seal that with my blood, that I have done.'—He then proceeded to give some account of his life; and mentioning the Solemn League and Covenant, the trumpets sounded again, and the Sheriff caught at the Paper in his hand. Upon which, Sir Henry only said, 'It was hard he might not be suffered to speak; but, says he, my usage from man is no harder than was my Lord and Master's: And all that will live his life this day, must expect hard dealing from the worldly Spirit.'—The trumpets sounded again, to hinder his being heard. Then, a second time, Sir John Robinson, and two or three others, endeavoured to snatch the paper out of Sir Henry's hand, but he kept it for a while, now and then reading part of it; afterwards, tearing it in pieces, he delivered it to a friend behind him, who was presently forced to deliver it to the Sheriff. They also searched his pocket for papers (51).—Bishop Burnet accounts for this (52) Tryal, p. 86—89. 'new and very indecent practice,' as he calls it, in the following manner: 'It was observed, that the dying Speeches of the Regicides had left impressions on the hearers, that were not at all to the advantage of the government. So strains of a peculiar nature being expected from him, to prevent that, drummers were placed under the Scaffold, who, as soon as he began to speak of the publick, upon a sign given, struck up with their drums. This put him in no disorder. He desired they might be stopped, for he understood what was meant by it. Then he went through his devotions. And, as he was taking leave of those about him, he happening to say somewhat with relation to the times, the drums struck up a second time: So he gave over, and died with so much composedness, that it was generally thought, the government had lost more than it had gained by his death (52).' (52) Burnet, Vol. I. p. 229. R. Baxter also observes, that 'no man could die with greater appearance of a gallant resolution and fearlessness than he did, though before supposed a timorous man. Inasmuch, that the Manner of his death procured him more applause than all the Actions of his life (53).'

(49) Register and Chronicle, p. 711. marg. See also Burnet, Vol. I. p. 228.

(50) Vol. I. p. 228.

(51) Tryal, p. 86—89.

(52) Burnet, Vol. I. p. 229.

(53) Abridgement of Mr Baxter's Life, p. 102.

clouded with fear (uuu) [CC]. Besides the several pieces already mentioned, what was published as his, is set down below [DD]. There appear not in his compositions that wisdom, that judgment, extraordinary parts, and great understanding, for which he is extolled by some (vvvv); for they are an unaccountable medley of enthusiasm, and incomprehensible nonsense. So that, as one observes (xxx), so much dissimulation and enthusiasm, such vast parts and such strong delusions, so much good sense and so much madness, can hardly be believed to meet in any one man in the world. What hath been said further of him by way of character, is set down below [EE]. As to his person; he had an unusual aspect, which, though it might naturally proceed both from his father and mother, neither of which were beautiful persons, yet made men think there was something in him extraordinary; and his whole life made good that imagination (yyy). It is suggested, that the cause of his destruction was, because his adversaries knew his (uuu) Burnet, p. 228.

(vvvv) Lord Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 187. Vol. III. p. 179. Vol. VI. p. 695. and Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 110.

(yyy) Lord Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 187.

(xxx) Echard, p. 802.

[CC] He had a head as darkened in his notions of Religion, &c. These are Bishop Burnet's own words, who adds, 'For though he set up a form of religion in a way of his own, yet it consisted rather in a withdrawing from all other forms, than in any new or particular opinions or forms; from which he and his party were called Seekers, and seemed to wait for some new and clearer manifestations. In these meetings he preached and prayed often himself, but with so peculiar a darkness, that though I have sometimes taken pains to see if I could find out his meaning in his works, yet I could never reach it. And since many others have said the same, it may be reasonable to believe he hid somewhat that was a necessary key to the rest. His friends told me, he leaned to Origen's notion of an universal salvation of all, both of devils and the damned, and to the doctrine of pre-existence.'—The Lord Clarendon's judgment of our Author's book Of the Love of God, and the Union with God, is much to the same purpose. . . . Which, says he, when I had read, and found nothing of his usual clearness and ratiocination in his discourse, in which he used much to excel the best of the company he kept, and that the style thereof was very much like that of Santa Sophia (55); and that in a crowd of very easy words, the sense was too hard to find out: I was of opinion that the subject-matter of it was of so delicate a nature, that it required another kind of preparation of mind, and it may be another kind of diet, than men are ordinarily supplied with (56).

[DD] Besides the several pieces already mentioned, what was published as his, &c. The Retired Man's Meditations; and The Healing Question, &c. are all the publications of his we have mentioned. The rest were, 'The Proceedings of the Protector (so called) and his Council against Sir Henry Vane, Knt. as touching his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight, &c.' Lond. 1656, four sheets in 4to. 'A Letter from a true and lawful Member of Parliament &c. to one of the Lords of his Highness's Council, upon occasion of the last Declaration, shewing the Reasons of their proceedings for securing the Peace of the Commonwealth, October 31, 1655.' Printed in 1656, 4to. 'Of the Love of God, and Union with God.' Lond. 1657. 'A needful Corrective or Balance in popular Government.' In a Letter to James Harrington, Esq; Lond. one sheet and a half, 4to. 'The People's Cause stated. The Valley of Jehosaphat, considered and opened, by comparing 2 Chron. xx. with Joel iii. Meditations concerning Man's Life. Concerning Government. Concerning Friendship. Concerning Enemies. Meditations on Death.' Penned during his imprisonment, and printed at the end of his Tryal. Lond. 1662, 4to.—'An Epistle general to the Mystical Body of Christ on earth, the Church universal in Babylon, who are Pilgrims and Strangers on the earth, desiring and seeking after the Heavenly Country.' It is addressed, To the scattered Seed and Sheep of Christ in all Nations, the true Israel by Faith, unknown for the most part to themselves, but more to the world and worldly Christian: Yet, in this their unknown or dispersed Estate, owned of the Lord, as the Church that are in God the Father, truly pure, Catholick, and Christian, of which Christ Jesus is the alone and immediate Head.—'The Face of the Times: Wherein is briefly discovered by several Prophetical Scriptures, from the beginning of Genesis to the end of the Revelation, the Rise, Progress, and Issue of the Enmity and Contest, between the Seed of the Woman and Seed of the Serpent, to the final breaking of the Serpent's head, in the total and irrecoverable ruin of the Monarchies of this World, which have been spirited, influenced, and headed all along by him, for the bruising of the Saints heel (or killing of their Bodies) for the Testimony of Jesus, which by them hath been given forth in the true Spirit of Prophecy. The design of this writing is to alarm the world, and awaken up the present Generation of God's people in it, to a more diligent and curious observation of the present signs of the near approaching day of the Lord, that they may be more carefully minding and doing what most concerns them, by way of preparation thereunto.'—'A Letter to his Lady from the Isle of Scylly.' These three last were written during his imprisonment, and printed together in 1662, 4to.—'Paper towards the defence of his cause and life, preparatory to his Tryal (57).—Memorandums for, and towards his defence (58). Memorandums as to his main defence, in relation to matter of fact, and as a narrative thereof (59). Reasons for an arrest of Judgment (60). His Bill of Exceptions (61). Occasional Speeches before his Tryal, and Execution (62). His Prayer in his Chamber; and his Speech and Prayer on the Scaffold (63).—The following Speeches of his are also in print: Speech in the House of Commons, at a Committee for the Bill against Episcopal Government, June 11, 1641.—In the Guildhall, London, November 8, 1642, concerning his Majesty's refusal of a Treaty of Peace.—At a Common Hall, October 27, 1643, wherein is shewed the readiness of the Scots to assist the Kingdom and Parliament of England.—Several Speeches in a Common Hall at London, in January, 1643, in examination of the Plot to divide and destroy the Parliament and the City of London.—In the Guildhall, London, concerning the Treaty at Uxbridge, 1644.—Speech to the citizens at Guildhall, April 9, 1644, to advance men and money (64).

[EE] What hath been said further of him by way of character. It may be summed up in these observations of well-meaning R. Baxter: At his return from New England, Sir Henry proved an instrument of greater calamity to a sinful people. Being chosen a Parliament-man, he was very active at first for bringing delinquents to punishment. He was the principal man that drove on the Parliament with that vehemence against the King. Being of ready parts, great subtilty, and unweari'd industry, he laboured, and not without success, to win others in parliament, city, and country, to his way. . . . To most of the Changes that followed, he was that within the House, that Cromwell was without. His great zeal to inflame the war, and to cherish the Sectaries, and especially in the army, made him above all men to be valued by that party. His unhappiness lay in this, That his doctrines were so cloudily formed and expressed, that few could understand them; and therefore he had but few true disciples. . . His obscurity was by some imputed to his not understanding himself; but by others to design, because he was able to speak plain, when he pleased. The two things in which he had most success, and spake most plainly, were his Earnest Plea for Liberty of Conscience, and against the Magistrates intermeddling with Religion, and his teaching his followers to revile the Ministry, calling them ordinarily Black Coats, Priests, and other names which favoured of reproach. . . . When King Charles came in, he was questioned with others by the Parliament, but seemed to have his life secured. But, being brought to the Bar, he spake so boldly in justifying the Parliament's Cause, and what he had done, that it exasperated the King, and made him resolve upon his death (65). The great share Sir Henry had in the Troubles of the Nation, exposed him to the Satires and Lampoons of the Royalists, as may be seen in the Rump, or Collection of Poems (66).

(57) See his Tryal, p. 11.

(58) p. 21.

(59) p. 36.

(60) p. 55.

(61) p. 64.

(62) p. 77.

(63) p. 82, &c.

(64) Printed in Rushworth, Part III. Vol. I. or Vol. IV. p. 658.

(65) Abridgment of Baxter's Life, p. 98, 99, 100.

(66) Edit. 1662. 8vo. Part I. p. 347. and Part II. p. 64, 83, 100, 133.

(zzz) Ludlow,
Vol. III. p. 112.

Integrity, and feared his Abilities (zzz). But we are persuaded, that he rather fell a sacrifice to the Earl of Strafford; and was taken out of the way, for being one of the most able and active Members of the Republican Party [FF], which the Court, and the Generality of the Nation, were then resolved to crush. Sir Henry Vane left only one son, named Christopher, who was knighted by King Charles II, and advanced by King William, July 8, 1699, to the title of Lord Bernard of Bernard-castle. By his wife Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Gilbert Holles, Earl of Clare, he left two sons, Gilbert, and William. Gilbert succeeded him in honour and estate, and dying April 27, 1753, left, among many other children, Henry, his eldest son, who was created, April 3, 1754, Viscount Barnard and Earl of Darlington. William was advanced, June 1720, to the titles of Viscount Vane and Baron of Duncannon in the county of Tirone in Ireland (*).

(*) See Ar. Collins's Peerage,
Vol. IV. p. 305,
&c.

[FF] He fell a sacrifice to the Earl of Strafford, &c.] Bishop Burnet concurs in the same opinion, as appears from this passage. . . 'The great share he had in the attainder of the Earl of Strafford, and in the whole turn of affairs to the total change of government,

'but above all, the great opinion that was had of his parts and capacity to embroil matters again, made the Court think it necessary to put him out of the way (67).' He was often nick-named Sir Humorous Vanity.

(66) History of his own Time,
Vol. I. p. 228.

VERE [Sir FRANCIS], or DE VERE, second son of Geoffrey de Vere [A], a branch of the noble and most ancient family of the De Veres, Earls of Oxford [B], was born in the year 1554 (a). Applying himself early to the art of war, he became one of the most famous Generals in his time. His first entrance on a martial life, was when he went to the assistance of the States of Holland; among the forces sent by Queen Elizabeth, under the command of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. They arrived at Flushing the 10th of December (b), 1585; and continuing in those parts, he gave early proofs of a warlike genius, and undaunted courage. In 1587, the town of Sluys being besieged by the Prince of Parma, the Earl of Leicester was sent for out of England to its relief: and our young Officer, Mr Vere, with Sir Roger Williams, and a garrison of English and Walloons, bravely defended it; though, the place being furiously battered with 17000 great shot, and a large breach made, they were obliged to surrender it to a superior force (c). In 1588, he was part of the English garrison, which gallantly defended Berghen-op-Zoom against the Prince of Parma, who had laid siege thereto. They gave him such warm entertainment, by several brave repulses, frequent sallies, and other-well applied arts of war, that he quitted all hopes of blocking up the harbour, or gaining the town; and, winter approaching, he broke up the siege, after it had been carried on for two months. And 'that true cou-

(a) He was aged fifty-four, at the time of his death, in 1608, from whence it is plain, that he was born in 1554. See his epitaph.

(c) Camden's Annals, under the year 1587.

(b) Stow's Ann.
p. 711, 712.

[A] Second son of Geoffrey de Vere.] This Geoffrey was the third son of John de Vere, the fifteenth Earl of Oxford, of this noble family: which Geoffrey de Vere, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Sir Richard Hardekyn of Colchester, he had four sons, and a daughter; viz. 1. John Vere of Kirkby-hall in Castle-Hedingham, Essex, Esq; who by Thomafine his wife, daughter of William Carew, of Stone-castle in the county of Kent, Esq; had two sons, John and Robert, who both dyed without issue. 2. Sir Francis Vere, the subject of this article. 3. Robert, who dyed young. 4. Horace, created Baron Vere of Tilbury, July 25, 1625. — Elizabeth, the daughter, was married to Sir Robert Harcourt of Stanton-Harcourt, ancestor of the present Lord Harcourt (1).

(1) Vincent's Baronage MS. B. 20. in Offic. Arm. and Epitaphs in Castle-Hedingham church.

[B] A branch of the noble and most ancient family of the De Veres, Earls of Oxford.] The De Vere family may justly be styled one of the most ancient, noble, and illustrious in the world. Alberic de Vere, the first of the family who settled in England, came over with William the Conqueror; and was enriched by him with several fine Lordships; particularly with that of Castle-Hedingham in Essex, where he fixed his residence, and that became the head of his Successors Barony. From him proceeded a numerous race of noble persons, which obtained the highest Honors, and became eminent in the arts of peace and war. His son Alberic was, by King Henry I, made Lord great Chamberlain of England: his grandson, Alberic de Vere, was created, in 1137, by the Empress Maud, Earl of Oxford; a title confirmed unto him by her son, King Henry II. And a dignity enjoyed by his descendants and successors, of the same surname, for Twenty Generations, from the year 1137 to 1703, a circumstance attending, as far as we can remember, no other British noble family whatsoever. Besides the great office of Lord High Chamberlain, and the Earldom of Oxford, hereditary dignities in this family; some of them discharged the offices of Port-reve of London, of Lord Chief Justice, Chancellor, High-Admiral, Lord High-Steward, and Constable of England. William de Vere, son of the first Earl, was Bishop of Hereford in 1186. And this family hath produced several renowned Warriors and Generals, and four Knights of the order of the Garter. Robert, the ninth Earl, was by King Richard II. created Marquis of Dublin, (being the first who was honoured with the title of Marquis in this kingdom) and Duke of Ireland.

Immense, for a long time, have their Riches and Possessions been. John, the seventh Earl, who dyed 34 Edw. III. A. D. 1360, had, in Essex, forty-nine Knights-fees; in Suffolk, seventeen; in Cambridgehire, eighteen; in Huntingdonshire, seven; each of which Knights-fees may justly be computed to be equal to two hundred pounds a year of our present money (2): Besides the large personal estate. And, first and last, they had about Seventy Knight-fees in the county of Essex alone. John, the fourteenth Earl, when he came to the Earldom, in 1512, was offered Twelve thousand pounds a year for his Estates: leaving in his occupation all manors, houses, castles, parks, woods, forests, and all the demesne lands thereto belonging; the yearly value of which last might be worth more than many present Earldoms. . . . Some of them suffered for their adherence to the House of Lancaster. And Edward Seymour, Duke of Somersfet, unjustly deprived John, the sixteenth Earl, of his Estates, which were however restored. But the greatest waster of them was Edward, the seventeenth Earl. Having a very intimate acquaintance and friendship with Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, condemned for his indiscreet adherence to the Queen of Scots; He most earnestly interceded with his father-in-law, William Lord Burghley, to save that Duke's life. Which not being gratified in, he declared he would do all he could to ruin his own wife, a daughter of Lord Burghley; accordingly, he not only forsook her bed, but sold and consumed very nearly all his noble inheritance. But it was finely repaired by the great fortune which Aubrey, the twentieth Earl, had with his wife Anne, eldest daughter and one of the co-heiresses of Paul Viscount Bayning. For this Lord Bayning appears, by the authentic account of one of his stewards, now before us, to have been possessed of One hundred and seven thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven pounds, clear; without reckoning the jewels, plate, and household stuff. And this was in 1637, the year before that Lord's decease (3).

(2) According to Sir Edward Coke, a Knight's fee contained 480 acres.— 2. Inst. 596.

(3) This account we have extracted from the History of Essex and from other MSS. and from Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 188, &c. and other authorities.

‘rage might not want its due reward or distinction, the Lord Willoughby, who was General of the English after Leicester’s departure, conferred the honour of Knight-hood on Sir Francis Vere, whose great fame commenced from this siege (d).’ In 1589, Count Mansfeldt having passed with part of his army into the Isle of Bommel, was endeavouring to make himself master of that place. Count Maurice, General for the States, had not above eight hundred men to oppose the Spaniards, and the whole force he could draw together did not exceed 1500: whereas, the enemies troops were then reckoned about twelve thousand men (e). In those circumstances, Count Maurice thought it best to abandon the place. But Sir Francis Vere, who commanded six hundred English, part of the abovesaid corps of eight hundred, represented, that considering the importance of the island, and the reputation of Count Maurice, whose first command in chief this was, the place could not be abandoned, with honour, without the knowledge and order of the States General. Whilst a message was sent to them; Sir Francis undertook the defence of the place, and used such industry in entrenching it, and planting artillery, that the enemy desisted from the enterprize.

(d) Camden’s Annals of Queen Elizabeth, under the year 1588. Tho. Churchyard ranks him among those English warriors, ‘who deserved ‘most worthy ‘and memorable ‘commendations.’ The Civil Warres in the Netherlands. Lond. 1602. 4to. p. 98.

The same year, the town of Bergh, upon the Rhine, being besieged by the Marquis of Warrenbon, and distressed for want of provision, he was sent by the States General to Count Meurs, Governor of Gelderland, with nine companies of English; to concert with him measures for the relief of that town. At his coming to Arnheim, the Governor being greatly hurt by the blowing up of gunpowder, and the States of the Province representing to Sir Francis the importance of the place, and the great extremity it was reduced to; at their earnest desire, he hastened to its relief, with seven companies of foot of their own nation, and twelve troops of horse. With these, and the carriages laden with provisions, he marched towards Bergh, through a heathy and open country, with such diligence, that having surprized the enemy, who lay dispersed in their forts about the town, in full view of them, he put provisions therein, and returned without loss (f). After some days refreshment, the States, who had received advice how matters passed at Bergh, ordered a fresh supply of provisions to be put therein under the command of Sir Francis. When he came within two English miles of the town, the way they were to take being very narrow, and leading by the castle of Loo, the enemy from the castle galled his men and horses in their passage with such resolution, that Sir Francis perceived they were not the ordinary garrison. Yet, by his military skill and valour, he beat them back to their castle, and was no further interrupted by them in his passage through the narrow way: But, before he could well form his men on a plain adjoining, he was again attacked by a fresh body of the enemy. At the first encounter, his horse was killed under him by a pike, and falling upon him, he could not rise presently, but lay between the two armies, receiving a hurt in his leg, and several thrusts with pikes through his clothes, till the enemy was forced to give way. Though his forces consisted only of the two English troops under his command, and did not exceed 400 men, yet by his valour and conduct, the enemy was discomfited, and lost about 800 men. And he threw in provisions into Bergh, and exchanged the garrison, notwithstanding Count Mansfeldt was near with thirteen or fourteen thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse (g). In 1590, he bravely relieved the castle of Litkenhooven in the fort of Recklinchusen, with the diocese of Cologne, in which the States had a garrison that was besieged by some of the neighbouring inhabitants; and recovered the town of Burick in Cleves, and a little fort on that side of the Rhine, which had been surprized by the enemy. He took by stratagem, in 1591, a fort near Zutphen [C], in order to facilitate the siege of that town. And assisted Count Maurice at the siege of Deventer, being the chief instrument in the taking of the place (h). Through his conduct and management also, chiefly, it was, that the Duke of Parma received a signal defeat before Knodsenburgh-fort, near Nimmeghen; which obliged him to retire from thence, with more dishonour than in any action that he had undertaken in those wars (i). In 1592 we find, that he was elected one of the Representatives in Parliament for the burgh of Leominster in Herefordshire (k). How he employed himself the three following years, doth not appear; though he was undoubtedly all that time in the service of the States. When the expedition against Cadiz was resolved, he was sent for into England; and returned speedily into the Low-Countries, with letters from Queen Elizabeth to the States, to acquaint them with her design, and hasten the preparation of the ships they had promised to attend her fleet: And withal, to desire to have two thousand of her own forces, as well of those in their pay, as her own, to be employed in that service. This being obtained, he sailed to the appointed rendezvous before Boulogne on the coast of France; but finding no English ships there, he crossed to Dover, where he found the whole fleet, and the Generals, the Earl of Essex, and Earl of Nottingham High-Admiral, who received him

(f) Commentaries, p. 3, 4.

(g) Commentaries, p. 6, 7, &c.

(h) Commentaries, p. 10—19.

(i) Commentaries, p. 20, &c.

(k) Br. Willis’s Notitia Parliam. p. 127, 130.

[C] He took by stratagem, in 1591, a fort near Zutphen. Because he wanted strength to work by open means, he put the following sleight in practice; which he pleased to take in his own words . . . ‘I chose a good number of lusty and hardy young Soldiers, the most of which I apparelled like the countrey-women of those parts, the rest like the men; gave to some baskets, to others packs, and such burthens as the people usually carry to the market, with pistols, and short swords, and daggers, under their garments, willing by two or three in a company, by break of day to be at the ferry of Zutphen, which is just against the fort, as if they stayed for the passage-boat of the town; and bad them to sit and rest themselves in the mean time as near the gate of the fort as they could for avoiding suspicion, and to seize upon the same as soon as it was opened. Which took so good effect, that they possessed the entry of the fort, and held the same till an officer with two hundred souldiers (who was laid in a covert not farre off) came to their seconds, and so became fully Master of the place. By which means the siege of the town afterwards proved the shorter (4).’

(4) Commentaries, p. 17, 18.

with

(e) The Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere. Cambr. 1657. fol. p. 1.

with much joy and favour, being then chosen to supply the place of Lieutenant-General of the army by the title of Lord-Marshal. The fleet failed shortly after, and the Earl of Essex leaving his own ship, embarked in that which Sir Francis was in, on purpose to confer with him, fully and at ease, about the voyage. After two days failing, they landed near Rye, and the Earl taking Sir Francis along with him to Court, dispatched him thence to Plymouth, where most of the land-forces were to march, to see them lodged, provided with necessaries, and exercised, which he accordingly did, to the great satisfaction of the Generals. During their stay at Plymouth, the Earl of Essex gave Sir Francis much countenance, and had him always near him; which drew upon him the envy of Sir Walter Raleigh, the Rear-Admiral, and Sir Coniers Clifford, the Sergeant-major General. But to allay it, the Earl ordered, that, in all meetings at land, Sir Francis should have the precedence of Sir Walter; and Sir Walter of him at sea. And, by Sir Francis's advice, what belonged properly to every office in the field was set down in writing, and delivered severally to the officers, which prevented all subsequent disputes. About the 10th of June, the fleet set sail, and arrived before Cadiz July 1; Sir Francis acting as Vice-Admiral of the Earl of Essex's squadron (l). We shall not enter here into a detail of this expedition, of which a particular account may be seen in Hakluyt (m), in Camden's Annals (n), and our other Historians. We shall only observe, that he was one of the foremost, and the readiest, to approach the enemy's ships (o)]D]. And equally active, industrious, and successful was he, in getting possession of the town of Cadiz [E]. He returned to England about the middle of August; and, after dismissing the land-forces and shipping, and sending back into the Low-Countries the troops he had brought from thence, he came to Court, where he remained the most part of that winter (p). However, he was again in Holland in January 1596-7, and the 24th of that month had a very great share in the action near Turnhout, of which he hath given a fine and particular relation (q) [F]. This same year, he was engaged in a second expedition with the Earl of Essex. The design of this expedition was, to destroy the fleet that lay in Ferrol, and other places on the coast of Spain, threatening to invade England; and, for that purpose, if occasion was, to land troops: as also to intercept the Spanish fleet in their return from the Indies. Our armament consisted of the Royal Navy; some merchant-ships; several

(l) Commentaries, p. 24.

(n) Under the year 1596.

(o) Commentaries, p. 28, 29.

(q) Commentaries, p. 72, &c.

(m) Navigation Voyages, &c. Vol. I. p. 60 &c.

(p) Commentaries, p. 44, 45.

[D] He was one of the foremost, and the readiest, to approach the enemy's ships.] This is easily gathered from his own account. 'My ship (says he) was floaty, and stored with good ordnance, and proper for that service, which made me hasten towards them, without staying for any company. And indeed my readinesse was such, by reason of my riding with my anchor a pike, that no other ship could come near me by a great distance, so as I entered fight with them alone, making still toward them upon one board, and so galled them with my ordnance, which was cannon and demi-cannon, that they gave back, keeping still in order, and in fight with me, drawing as near the town as they could, and with purpose (as I thought) as our ships thrust further into the bay, to have fallen upon our smaller ships in the tayl of the whole fleet, and having made a hand with them, so to have put to the sea-ward of us, the better to annoy us, and save themselves from being blocked up. Wherein to prevent them, I made toward the shore, still sounding with our leads, till the ordnance of the town might reach me, and I the shore with mine; infomuch as I put them from under the town, and took certain ships, which rode there at anchor forsaken of their men, and followed them, continuing fight till they came under the fort of the Puntal. . . I was nearer Puntal and the shore of Calis [Cales, or Cadiz] by much than any ship of the fleet, and further advanced into the Bay, so that now growing within shot of the fort, which lay on my right hand, and in like distance to the gallions on the left hand; and having the gallies a-head me, betwixt them both was plied with shot on all sides very roundly, yet I resolved to go on, knowing I had good seconds, and that many hands would make light work, &c. (5).'

(5) Commentaries, p. 30, 31.

[E] And equally active, industrious, and successful was he, in getting possession of the town of Cadiz.] The means he used for that purpose, be pleased to take in his own words. . . 'As we approached affar off, saith he, we might perceive the enemy standing in battle under the favour of the town, with cornets and ensigns displayed, thrusting out some loose horse and foot toward us, as it were to procure a skirmish. I, marking their fashion, conceived hope of a speedier gaining the town than we intended, and were then about; and said to his Lordship, at whose elbow I attended, that those men he saw standing in battel before the town, would shew, and make the way for us into the town that night, if they were well handled, and at the instant I propounded the means, which was to 'carry our troops as near and covertly as might be, towards the town, and to see by some attempt if we could draw them to fight further from the town, that we might fend them back with confusion and disorder, and so have the cutting them in pieces in the town-ditch, or enter it by the same way they did. His Lordship liked the project, and left the handling thereof to me.' . . . And he executed it with great success, as he proceeds particularly to relate. . . . 'The ditch, says he, was very hollow, but dry, out of which was raised a massy rampier, with two round half bulwarks; the one towards the one sea, the other towards the other, for height and thickness in their perfection, but not steeped and scarped; so as it was very mountable. . . . To the top of this rampier our men climbed, who, being for the most part old and experienced soldiers, of the bands I brought out of the Low-Countries, boldly attempted to climbe the wall, from which they beat with their shot the defendants, wanting no encouragements that good example of the chiefs could give them, the General himself being as forward as any. Whilest it was hard stroven and fought on that side, I sent a Captain and countreyman of mine, called Upsher, with some few men alongst the ditch, to see what guard was held along the wall towards the bay-ward, and whether any easier entrance might be made that way, or no, willing him to bring, or fend me word, which he did accordingly, though the messenger came not to me. He found so slender a guard, that he entered the town with those few men he had, which the enemy perceiving, fled from the walls, and our men entred as fast on the other side (6).'

(6) Commentaries, p. 36, 38.

[F] Of which he hath given a fine and particular relation.] See his Commentaries, p. 72, &c. The Lord Burghley calls it, 'an overthrow given by Count Morrice and our English forces commanded by Sir Robert Sidney and Sir Francis Vere, of a number of the King of Spaynes aunient soldiars, as the like hath not happened with such successe to the States synce the beginning of their warrs (7).'

Grotius says, this was so easy a victory, that the Conquerors lost hardly ten men; but there were above 2000 of the enemies buried, and near 500 taken (8). Sir Francis himself informs us, that 'there were taken between forty and fifty ensignes, and slain and taken of the enemy near three thousand, and their Generall, Signieur de Ballancy, and Count de Warras, died on the place (9).'

(7) Letter of his to Archbishop Hutton. MS. dated Jan. 30, 1596. See also Camden's Ann. at the beginning of the year 1597.

(8) Hist. de rebus Belgicis, lib. 6.

(9) Commentaries, p. 30.

furnished

furnished by the States of Holland, in all about 140; with an army of seven or eight thousand land-men, as well pressed as volunteers; and a thousand of the English that were in the service of the Dutch. Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, was appointed Lieutenant-General, which highly offended Sir Francis Vere [G], who had borne that office in the Cadiz voyage; however, he retained the title of Lord-Marshal (r). They sailed from Plymouth, July 9, but were driven back by a storm, and detained about a month (s). Their provisions failing, they discharged all the land-forces, except the thousand men brought from Holland; and some proposed a voyage to the West-Indies, which Sir Francis opposed [H]. The Earl of Essex in the mean time went to Court; and, at his return, the design was pursued, of attempting to fire the Spanish fleet at Ferrol, and along the rest of their coast; and to intercept their Indian plate-fleet. But a Council of war being called near the Groyne, it was resolved to give over the enterprize of Ferrol, as not only difficult, but impossible; and to go directly to the Azores Islands, in quest of the Spanish Indian fleet: from whence this came to be called the Island Voyage. They landed at Fayal, St Michael, Flores, and Gratiofa; losing at the same time, by wilful mistake, a large ship, which was a rich booty: and not being strong enough to attempt the Spanish Indian fleet, that consisted of twenty sail, and saved itself in the Port of Tercera (t). Sir William Monson, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Francis Vere, who were nearest, gave them chace: and the two latter attempted to crowd into the haven with great boats at midnight, and to cut the cables of the nearest ships, that they might be forced to sea by the gusts which blew from the shore. But the Spaniards keeping a very strict watch, that project miscarried. So having taken only three Spanish ships, they returned from this unsuccessful expedition to England [I], about the end of October (u). In the same year, he was appointed Governor of the Briel, one of the cautionary towns in the Low-Countries, through the interest of Secretary Cecil, and Sir Fulk Greville, and also of the Earl of Essex [K]. He

(r) Commentaries, p. 45.

(t) Commentaries, p. 48, &c.

(u) Camden's Annals, as above; and Commentaries, p. 56.

(s) They sailed again, Aug. 17. Camden's Ann. under the year 1587.

[G] Which highly offended Sir Francis Vere.] His own account will be the best, and most authentic. When the Earl of Essex acquainted him with it, though 'with much demonstration of favour, and with many circumstances of words;' . . . 'I answered, says Sir Francis, that I had partly understood before my coming out of the Low-Countries, my Lord Mountjoy's going Lieutenant-Generall, so that I had forethought and resolved what to do. For though I was sensible, as became me, who saw no cause in myself, of this disgrace, yet my affections having been always subject to the rules of obedience, since it was my Prince's action, and that it could not be but that my Lord Mountjoy was placed with her Majesty's consent, my sincerity would not give me leave to absent myself, and colour my stay from this action with any feigned excuse; but counselled me to come over, both to obey my Lord Mountjoy, and respect him as his place required, much more his Lordship, which was Generall to us both; though I was not so ignorant of his Lordship's power, as to doubt that my Lord Mountjoy, or any subject of England, could be thrust upon him without his desire and procurement. That therefore, as I had good cause to judge that his Lordship had withdrawn much of his favour from me, so I humbly desired his Lordship, that as by a retrenchment of the condition I was to hold in this journey, I held it rather a resignation to his Lordship again of the honour he had given me the last yeare, so farre as concerned my particular respect to his Lordship sought for of me, then a service to him; so hereafter he would be pleased not to use me at all in any action, wherein he was to go chief (10).'

[H] Which Sir Francis opposed.] And for these very material reasons: . . . Our fleet's being so slenderly provided with forces and provisions, that nothing could be exploited there, answerable to the expectation would be generally conceived. And that in the mean time, through the want of her Majesty's Royal Navy, and other principall shipping of the realm, with the choice Commanders both for sea and land, the State might be endangered by an attempt made by the Spaniards upon our own coast; whom they certainly knew to have then in a readinesse a great power of sea and land-forces in the north parts of Spain.—This last reason was very material. For, on their return from the Azores, they met, toward the coast of Ireland, with two or three Spanish ships, full of soldiers, which they took: by which (adds he) we not only understood at our coming to Plymouth their purpose to have landed at Falmouth with ten thousand men, but saw the instructions and orders of the sea-fights, if they had met with us, which was so full of perfection, that I have ever since redoubted their sufficiency in sea cases (11).'

[I] They returned from this unsuccessful expedition to England.] Though there was no good understanding between him and the Earl of Essex, yet, at his first appearance to Court, he did not suffer his passions to get above Truth and Justice; of which take the account in his own words. . . . 'So soon as I was able to go abroad (12), I went to the Court, which was then at Whitehall; and because I would use no bodies help to give me access to her Majesty, as also that I desired to be heard more publickly, I resolved to shew myself to her Majesty, when she came into the garden; where, so soon as she set her gracious eyes upon me, she called me to her, and questioned with me concerning the journey, seeming greatly incensed against my Lord of Essex, laying the whole blame of the evil successe of the journey on his Lordship, both for the not burning and spoiling of the fleet at Faroll, and missing the Indian fleet. Wherein with the truth I boldly justified his Lordship with such earnestnesse, that my voice growing shrill, the standers by, which were many, might hear, (for her Majesty then walked) laying the blame freely upon them that deserved it. And some there present being called to confront me, were forced to confesse the contrary of that they had delivered to her Majesty, insomuch that I answered all objections against the Earl, wherewith her Majesty well quieted and satisfied, fate her down in the end of the walk, and calling me to her, fell into more particular discourse of his Lordship's humours and ambition; all which she pleased then to construe so graciously, that before she left me, she fell into much commendation of him, who very shortly after came to the Court. This office I performed to his Lordship to the grieving and bitter incensing of the contrary party against me; notwithstanding I had discovered his Lordship's coldnesse of affection to me. . . . fearing more to incur the opinion of ingratitude than the malice of any enemies, how great soever, which the delivery of truth could procure me (13).'

There appears also to have been a great enmity between Sir Francis, and Sir Walter Raleigh (14).

(12) For, in his coming home, he got a cold so violent, that for three weeks after he could not stir out of his lodging. Commentaries, p. 65.

(13) Commentaries, p. 66, 67.

(14) See there, p. 26, 47, 48, 52, 53.

[K] And also of the Earl of Essex.] Sir Francis was ignorant of it. For he says upon this occasion . . . 'As I had good cause to doubt my Lord of Essex would not further me in that suit, so I was as loth to have any thing by his means in the terms I then stood in with his Lordship; much less by any other persons that were known his opposers.—He rather discouraged me than otherwise in the pursuit (15).'

—But in a letter of Rowland Whyte to Sir Robert Sidney, of November 5, 1597, we find this passage . . . 'For the annexing of Brill to your government [of Flushing] upon the conditions you offer, of 500l. a yeare less, hath been already propounded to 1000

(15) Commentaries, p. 68, 69.

(10) Commentaries, p. 46, 47.

(11) Commentaries, p. 49, 64.

He was permitted, at the same time, to keep the command of the English troops in the service of the States. In September, 1597, he went over, and took possession of his Government (w) [L]. The December after, he was again in England, and resorted frequently to Court, where he and Sir Edward Norris were gallantly followed, by the military Gentlemen (x). In February, 1597-8, a warrant was drawn, to take away from him the allowance of ten pounds a day as Serjeant-major of the field: He, and the Earl of Essex, used all their interest to have it still continued, but the Lord Burghley was therein his assured enemy (y). The Queen sent him, in 1598, to the States, upon the conclusion of a peace between France and Spain, to know whether they would come into that peace, or continue the war: they chusing the latter, a new treaty was signed between England and Holland (z). And, the year following, when danger of an invasion was apprehended from Spain, the Queen constituted him Lord-Marshal: Being sent for over in all possible haste, he embarked, August the 22d, at the Briel, and came to London the next day, where he staid till all apprehensions of an invasion were over. During his stay, he was proposed, or mentioned, for Lord Deputy of Ireland. But the strong factions between the two parties of Essex and Cecil, seem to have rendered his interest very fluctuating at Court (aa) [M]. The 21st of October he came back to the Hague; and had an audience of the States. In the beginning of the year 1600, there happened great uneasinesses and disputes between him and the States, about matters of account [N]; and for their having lessened, in his absence, the companies he commanded for them, from a hundred and fifty to a hundred and thirteen men (bb). Happy was it for them, that they came not to an open rupture, nor did deprive him of the supreme command of their forces! For, to his undaunted valour and wise conduct was owing the signal victory, gained by their own and the English troops, on the 5th of July, 1600, near Newport. It was he that rallied and inspirited those troops, when they were giving way; and crowned them with certain victory [O]. The last and most signal military exploit performed by him, was his gallant defence

(w) Commentaries, 68—71.

(x) Letters and Memorials of the Sydney-family, Edit. 1746. Vol. II. p. 78.

(z) Camden's Annals, under the year 1598.

(aa) See Letters of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 112, 113, 115, 116, 118, 119, 120, 121, 128—133, 142.

(y) Ibid. p. 93.

(bb) Ibid. p. 126, 136, 189, 191, 196.

(16) Letters and Memorials of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 75.

(17) Commentaries, p. 71.
(18) Annals, under the year 1597.

(19) Letters of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 128.

(20) p. 130.

(21) p. 133.

(22) Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham.

(23) Robert Ratchiff.

(24) Sir Robert Sydney, Governor of Flushing.

[Earl of Essex] but he smiled at it, and wished it were foe. He delt very earnestly for Sir Francis Vere, but the Queen will not yield unto it. My Lord Sheffield still hopes to have it (16).—

[L] In September, 1597, he went over, and took possession of his government. So he says in express words (17). And yet Mr Camden affirms (18), that he and the fleet did not return till October: which we cannot tell how to reconcile.

[M] Seem to have rendered his interest very fluctuating at Court. So we gather from the extracts of the following Letters of Rowland Whyte, agent at Court for Sir Robert Sydney, to the said Sir Robert. In one dated from the Court, Nonfuch, Michaelmas-day, 1599, he writes thus: 'The States, if yt [the peace] goe forward, must have warning of yt, and I believe Sir Francis Vere will be sent unto them about yt. He lives very darckly, for he comes very seldome here, and little Speech of him. The Miseries that his poore Regiments are in, both in Camp and in Zealand, is spoken of here; but the States is blamed for want of pay (19). . . . In another letter, dated October 2, he has these words . . . 'This peace with Spaine, is a thing very much desired here; I beleve when her Majesty is disposed to harken unto yt thoroughly, she will give some notice of yt to the States, and that by Sir Francis Vere, who is here, but comes not much to Court (20). . . .

And in another letter of the sixteenth of the same month, he writes in a different strain . . . 'Sir Francis Vere is much graced at Court, and happy if this peace goe forward; that by the Warres he hath extremely enriched himself to be able to live without yt (21).—But what interest he had in particular with Secretary Cecil, and what his own disposition was, will further appear from this part of another Letter to Sir Robert Sydney . . . 'You are desirous to be advertised of Sir Francis Vere's welcom here. Many kind Lettres past between Mr Secretary and him, while he was in the Low-Countries; and, at his arrival, he came to Mr. Secretaries, who brought him to the Queen, with whom he was long, and very graciously used; and true it is, that Mr. Secretary gives him all grace. My Lord Admirall (22) also brought him to the presence, where all these saluted him, only my Lord Montjoy refraines speaking to him; and my Lord of Suffex (23) being in a corner of the presence, my Lord Admirall shewed him to Sir Francis, but he never sturd foote to goe towards him, but over his shoulder looked upon him, which the Earle tooke very ill, and began to chaffe at it. Yt was indeed here marvelled at, that the twenty companies came not to Flushing to be imbarqued; but I heare Sir Francis answered, that he wold not send any troopes of his, where their was so little love born him. He complaines, that your Lordship (24) went about to have his Comand from him; and when you could not compas that, you wold have a regiment in the field, not to be comanded by him, which likewise the States wold not grant. And now when he was sent for, it was writ unto him that you shuld say, that his coming over here was not to be employed, but to answer such contempts as were by him comitted towards my Lord of Essex; and that now againe you wold have his place from him (25). Lastly, he belevies that you were some cause of my Lord of Essex's unkindness towards him, by your aggravating of matters; and saies, that the States had not so great an opinion of you, as you seme to assure to yourself (26).'

[N] In the beginning of the year 1600, there happened great uneasinesses and disputes between him and the States about matters of account, &c.] For these matters of fact, we are indebted to the Letters just now mentioned. In one of September 22, 1599, we read as follows . . . 'Sir Francis Vere hath written to the States, that he will be here shortly, but how he will lyke of the reduction of his companies from 150 to 113, that is doubtfull (27). In another of Aprill 3, 1600— 'I demanded of Monsieur Charon, why Sir Francis Vere was not in the field with his Excellency; he answered, that he grew too stately and ambitious, and, but for the respect was carried to some of his Friends here, he shuld find that he had offended the States by some late courtes (28). . . . 'He tells me, that the States will trust no more 29 [Sir Francis Vere] (29). . . . 'It is reported here still, that Sir Francis Vere is in disgrace with the States, about matters of Accounts (30). . . . 'Yesterday being Sondag, the Court was full that Sir Francis Vere will serve the States no longer; that he will come over to justify his actions (30).'

[O] And crowned them with certain victory.] The enemies forces were then weak and in mutinies, and their affairs in disorder; which induced the States to carry the war into Flanders. The army of the latter consisted of about twelve thousand foot, and three thousand horse; and was divided into three parts, commanded by Count Ernest of Nassau, Count Solmes, and Sir Francis Vere; his troop consisting of one thousand six hundred English, two thousand five hundred Frisons, and ten cornets of horse: with which troop he took his turn of vanguard, battle, and reeward, as it fell out. The siege of Newport was the first action they resolved on: which the Spaniards advanced to hinder. And, partly the little canals which that country abounds with, and the many sandy hillocks near the sea-shore, rendered the situation of both armies very uneasy and disadvantageous. What share he bore in the action, let us learn from himself—'To give our men the more courage, I went into the bottom amongst them, where riding up and down, I was in their eyes both doing the office of a Captain and Soldier.—At my

(25) i. e. Government of the Briel.

(26) p. 121.

(27) p. 126.

(28) p. 186.

(29) p. 183. Dated April 19.

(30) Letter, dated April 30. p. 191.

(31) Letter of May 26, p. 196.

defence of Ostend; which was besieged by the Archduke Albert, and a very numerous army, in 1601. To qualify him for that great employment, the States conferred on him the important office of General of all their army in and about Ostend, with very ample power. Whereupon, he came to England, to obtain Queen Elizabeth's approbation; and leave, to raise 3000 of her subjects, at the States charge; and transport them into the Low-Countries in ten days warning, that is, by the 10th of May. He entered Ostend, July 11, with eight companies of English, sent him by Count Maurice, being part of the twenty English companies in his army; and found in the place thirty companies of Netherlanders, making about sixteen or seventeen hundred men (cc). With this handful, (for no less than four thousand were necessary for proper defence) (dd) he resolutely defended the place against the Spanish army, which was computed at twelve thousand men, until March 1601-2. During the course of this Siege [P], he received a reinforcement of twelve companies of English from Count Maurice: and cut out a new harbour [Q] at Ostend, which proved of great service to him (ee). The 14th of August, he was wounded in the head by the blowing up of a cannon; and that obliged him to remove into Zealand till September 19, when he returned to Ostend, and found two thousand English, and twenty ensigns of French, Walloons, Scots, and Frisons, that had arrived there in his absence (ff). On the 4th of December, in the night, the Spaniards fiercely assaulted the English trenches, so that Sir Francis was called up without having time to put his clothes on: but by his conduct, the enemy were repulsed, with a loss of about 500 men on their side (gg). In the mean time, the place began to be much distressed; for a hard frost having set in about the 12th of November, with a strong north-west wind, no ships, nor any succours out of Holland or Zealand, could come to Ostend. Sir Francis having advice, that the besiegers intended a general assault; in order to put them off, and gain time, he artfully contrived to enter into treaty with them, for the surrender of the place (hh) [R]. But receiving

(cc) Commentaries, p. 118, 119, 120.

(ee) Ibid. p. 124, 139.

(ff) Ibid. p. 132, 136.

(gg) Ibid. p. 140, 141.

(hh) Ibid. p. 147-161.

‘ my first coming I got one shot through my leg, and a quarter of an hour after another through the same thigh, which I then neither complained nor bragged of, nor so much as thought of any chirurgeon; for I knew if I left the place, my men would instantly quit. I therefore chose (not having been used to have my troops foiled) to try the uttermost, rather then to shew them the way to flee, hoping still for the coming of the Frisons and the horse I sent for. But their haste was so small, that my men, overlaid with number, forsook the place, notwithstanding my best endeavour to stay them, hastening along the sands towards our cannon, the enemy following them hard. I was forced, seeing them all going, to go for company, with the last, uneasily and unwillingly (God knows) and in the way my horse fell dead under me, and upon me that I could not stirre: I had neither officer, gentleman, nor servant about me to give me help. Sir Robert Drury by chance came, and a gentleman, being a servant of his called Higham, drew me from under the horse, and set me up behind his master; which help came very seasonably, for the enemy being near at hand when I fell, by this means I was saved out of their clutches. Thus I rode to the ordnance, where I found my brother Horace and the most of the officers that were living, with some three hundred foot. I made them stand from before the ordnance, and willed the Cannoniers to discharge upon the enemy that now swarmed upon the sands, and at the same instant my own companie of horse and Captain Balls coming thither, I willed them to go to the charge, and my brother with the foot to advance and second them home. This small number of horse and foot made an exceeding great change on a sudden, for the enemy in hope of victory followed hard, and being upon the sands, where horse might serve upon them, were soon routed, most cut in pieces, the rest saving themselves by flight, as they could, in the downs, our men both horse and foot followed them (32). The fortune of the day being thus decided, Sir Francis began to take care of himself, who all this while having been undressed, the blood leaking from him at four holes, together with a dangerous disease that had long held him, had made him extremely weak and faint. The enemy lost above 120 ensignes, most of his foot slain, not many of his horse lost. On the States side in a manner the whole loss fell upon the English, of which near 800 were hurt and slain, eight captains slain, the rest all but two hurt, and most of his inferior officers hurt and slain (33).—The accounts we have of this Victory in the Letters of the Sydney-family, are as follow (34): . . . ‘ The ennemy was overthrowen by the valor of the English, and the good direction of Sir Francis Vere, to whom his Excellency committed the whole charge and command of horse and foote; and that the vanguard of the army kyled

‘ 5000 Spaniards, took 200 captains, and 110 coullers. ‘ Sir Francis Vere hath gained a great deale of honor, ‘ and Prince Mores, in his lettre to the Queen, hath ‘ donne him right, attributing the victory to his good ‘ order and direction.’—‘ Sir Francis Vere's friends ‘ in Court doe highly comend the great service he did ‘ the last battell, and have possessed her Majestie with ‘ it, who very often is hard to say, That she holds him ‘ the worthies Capten of her time.’—‘ Yt is wondered ‘ here, by Sir Francis Veres friends, that the States have ‘ not presented hym with some giste of worth, either in ‘ plate or jewels, for the Victory he gott them that day, ‘ which preserved their cuntry from ensuing dangers.’

[P] During the course of this siege, &c.] These remarkable occurrences are recorded to have happened . . . During the first month of the siege, the Spaniards discharged little less than thirty-five thousand cannon-shot against the town (35). A bulwark, called the Sandhill, was so thick stuck with bullets, that the ordnance could hardly shoot without hitting its former bullets, which like an iron wall made the latter fly in pieces up into the air: Yea, the bullets in it were so many, that they left no room to drive in palisadoes, though pointed with iron; and some there were that would have undertaken to make the bulwark new, if they might have had the bullets for their pains (36). A gunner, more than once, shot a bullet into the mouth of a charged cannon; which, taking fire with the blow, returned the bullet instantly back again, attended with another of its own. As good a marksman was he (if he did it designedly) who, when a soldier of the town, having bought a loaf of bread was holding it up in a boasting way, took away with a shot the uppermost half, leaving the other in the soldier's hand, who finding that he had received no hurt, said ‘ it was a fair-conditioned bullet, for it had left him the better half behinde (37).’—John Carew, of Antony in Cornwall, a young English gentleman about twenty-three years of age, having in a fally had one of his Arms shot off, he went and took it up, and brought back with him into the town unto the chirurgeon: and coming back to his lodging, shewed it, saying, ‘ Behold ‘ the Arm which but at dinner did help its fellow.’ This he did and endured without the least fainting, or so much as resting upon his bed (38).

[Q] Cut out a new harbour.] It was of so great service, that sixty ships came into it in a few days: the Gueule, or old haven, became useles (39).

[R] He artfully contrived to enter into Treaty with them, for the surrender of the place.] He was then reduced to the greatest distress; knowing, that the enemy were preparing for a general Assault, which he was not able either to stand, or beat off. And therefore he expressed his uneasiness to Sir John Ogile, who hath given an account of this transaction (40), in the following manner . . . ‘ What think you? are we not in a fine taking ‘ here? ha! I will tell you, captain Ogile, there was ‘ never

(35) See Commentaries, p. 132, 133. Continuation of the siege of Ostend.

(36) Ibid. p. 136.

(37) Ibid. p. 136.

(38) Ibid. p. 141.

(39) Letters of the Sydneys, Vol. II. p. 250, 280.

(40) Continuation of the siege of Ostend, at the end of Sir Francis's Commentaries, p. 139, 160. and the end of the book.

(dd) See p. 148.

(32) Commentaries, p. 102, 103, 104.

(33) Ibid. p. 104.

(34) Vol. II. p. 204, 205, 208.

(ii) Commentaries, p. 161, 210.

(kk) Continuation of the siege of Ostend, p. 163, 164, 165.

(ll) Ibid. p. 177, 178.

receiving part of the supplies he had long expected from the States, with an assurance of more at hand, he broke off the Treaty (ii) [S]. Thunderstruck, and infinitely enraged at this disappointment, the Archduke took a resolution to revenge himself of those within the town; saying, he would put them all to the sword: His commanders and soldiers taking likewise an oath, that if they entered, they would spare neither man, woman, nor child. Accordingly, they made a general assault, on the 7th of January, 1601-2. But Sir Francis, with only about twelve hundred able fighting men, kept off the enemy's army of ten thousand men; which threw that day above two and twenty hundred shot on the town: And had, before, thrown upon it no less than one hundred and sixty-three thousand two hundred cannon-shot, leaving scarce a whole house standing (kk). Thus our brave hero having acquired immortal honour in the defence of Ostend, for about eight months together, resigned his Government, March 7, 1601-2, to Frederick Dorp, that had been appointed by the States to succeed him: And he, and his brother, Sir Horatio Vere, returned into Holland (ll). We shall only add, that this memorable siege lasted in all three years, and about a hundred days. Happy had it been for the soldiers, if the sea had broke in and swallowed it up; for this place proved the common grave, though indeed a most glorious monument at the same time, to the best soldiers in the Low-Countries, Spain, France, England, Scotland, and Italy; whilst they fought all the while for a mere barren never man of my fortunes and reputation (both which have been cleared hitherto) plunged in greater extremity than I am now.—Adding, 'that he was like a man that had both courage and judgment to defend himself, and yet must sit with his hands bound, whilst boys and devils come and box him about the ears. Yet this I will tell you too, (said he) rather than you shall ever see the name of Francis Vere subscribed in the delivery of a town committed to his custody, or his hand to the least article of treaty (though with the Archduke's own person) had I a thousand lives, I would first burie them all in the rampier, yet in the mean while judge you of the quality of this our being.'—However, to ward off so dangerous a blow as a general assault; to gain time for the succours he impatiently expected, and that might possibly come every hour; as also to have an opportunity of repairing and strengthening the works; he proposed a treaty for surrendering the place. Commissioners were appointed on both sides, one of whom was Sir John Ogle.—But to protract yet the time, Sir Francis used this stratagem: Causing a Gentleman that waited on him in his chamber to make an alarm at the entry of the Spanish commissioners, He pretended thereupon treachery on their part (41); and made it the cause why he would neither let them stay in the town, nor return the way they came. This bred disputes, and messengers passed to and fro betwixt them and the General. In the mean time the flood came in, and the water waxed so high, that there was no passage that way without a boat; whereof there was none on that side of the town, nor any brought, for that had been to cross his own purpose. The Commissioners desired earnestly to be suffered to stay, though it were upon the worst guard of the town; but it was denied: for he must rid himself of them; he could not do his business so well, if their eyes and ears were so near him; he sent them therefore to their friends on the East side, forecasting wisely, that e'er they could come there, and thence by the South to the West side again, there to have admittance to his Highness, and there to have the matter debated in council, he should not only gain the whole winter-night, but most part of the next day for his advantage, which fell out according to that calculation; and beyond his expectation that it continued longer.—The reason of the General's proceeding in that unaccountable manner, was, 'To gain so much more time; for that was precious to him for the advancement of his works in the old town; to which, through the benefit of this cessation of hostility, he had now drawn most of the hands that could labour, giving them spades to work, and order to have their weapons by them ready upon occasion to fight; and he handled the matter so, that, e'er the Commissioners returned again, the old town and works were stronger by a thousand men. He could not have done this (at least so conveniently) had he begun conference with them at their first entry, nor avoided that first conference, had he let them stay in the town, at least he understood it so.'—This unaccountable Behaviour, one might naturally think, would have quite put an end to the Treaty. But Sir John Ogle, one of the English commissioners, who had not been let into the secret, managed it so with the Archduke, that the Commissioners were sent again: And, this second time, their reception 'was better than the first. For the General feasted with them, and drank and discoursed with them; but came to no direct overture of article, though they much pressed him. That part of the day, and the whole night, was so spent, and in sleep. In the morning were discovered five ships out of Zealand, riding in the road, that brought four hundred men, and some materials for the sea-works. The men were landed, not without opposition, but without any hurt. And this pretext, of succour from the States, the General took to break off the Treaty, which he had not yet really entered into: Whereupon the Commissioners were discharged on both sides (42).—The States, unacquainted with the General's design, were highly discontented at his Treating; imagining, that he was about making a separate Peace between England and Spain; and even without the Queen's consent (43).

[S] He broke off the Treaty.] And wrote this paper to the Archduke . . . 'We have heretofore held it necessary, for certain reasons, to treat with the Deputies which had authority from your Highness; but whilst we were about to conclude upon the Conditions and Articles, there are arrived certain of our ships of warre, by whom we have received part of that which we had need of; so that we cannot with our Honour and Oath continue the Treaty, nor proceed in it; which we hope that your Highness will not take in ill part; and that nevertheless, when your power shall reduce us to the like estate, you will not refuse, as a most generous Prince, to vouchsafe us again a gentle audience. From our town of Ostend, the 25th of December, 1601.

'Signed, Francis Vere.'

Now, (as our Author goes on) whosoever shall but consider how many and how great difficulties the Archduke had struggled with to maintain the siege; how highly concerned he was in point of honour, and how eagerly engaged in his affections; and what assured hopes he had of taking the town; will easily conceive that he must needs finde himself much discomposed at so unexpected a disappointment. He had already taken it with his eyes; and, as if he had bound the Leviathan for his maidens to sport withall, under the assurance of the truce he walked the Infanta before the town, with twenty Ladyes and Gentlewomen in her train; as it were valiantly to stroke this wild beast, which he had now laid fast in the toiles; and to look upon the outside of the town before they entered into it (44).—Grotius adds, that all Flanders had flocked to see the surrender of the place as a certain spectacle. And represents the treaty as an unnecessary, dangerous, and not very handsome piece of craft (45). Every step of it might not indeed be consonant to the Rules laid down by that excellent Civilian, in his book De Jure Belli & Pacis. But it was certainly an act of consummate Generalship. And Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirit? Grotius's words are, 'Commovit Archiducem ea contumelia, quippe Flandria omnis velut ad certum speculaculum potiundæ urbis concurrerat, & jam didita fama propinquis regnis vagabatur. Nec ordinibus fati excusata fraus per se indecora, ad hoc periculosa magis quam necessaria.'

and

(41) They came attended with sixty horse, which Sir Francis called coming in a hostile manner. See Letters of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 240.

(42) See Letters of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 239, &c.

(43) Ibid. p. 239, 242, 243.

(44) Continuation of the siege of Ostend, p. 163.

(45) Grotii Analecta, edit. fol. L. X. p. 414.

and fruitless spot of ground (mm). Soon after his discharge from the Government of Ostend, Sir Francis, at the request of the States, came to England to desire fresh succours; which went over in May, and were to be under his command (mm). He was a great favourite of Olden Barnevelt (oo). Upon receiving the news of Queen Elizabeth's death, he proclaimed King James I. at the Briel, in April 1603, and in June following came to England (pp). His Government of the said town expiring, or being superseded at his good Mistress's decease [T], it was renewed to him by King James I. [V]. But, under that peaceable Monarch, Gentlemen of the sword came to be less considered than under his martial predecessor. And they became almost useless to him, upon his making peace with Spain, in 1604. However, Sir Francis Vere could not live inglorious. But, after an honourable repose of about four years, he died quietly at home, August the 28th, 1608, in the fifty-fourth year of his age; and was buried in St John the Evangelist's Chapel in Westminster-Abbey: where an uncommon monument was erected to his memory by his Lady [W]. Besides his other preferments, he was Governor of Portsmouth (qq). His own glorious exploits, recorded by himself in his Commentaries [X], are the greatest character and encomium of him that can be. However, the good account given of him by Sir Robert Naunton, we shall add in the note [Y]. He married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of - - - Dent, Citizen of London, who survived him, and by whom he had three sons and two daughters, John, Edward, Henry, Dorothy, and Elizabeth; all which died before him (rr).

(mm) Grotii Annales; and Camden, under the year 1601.

(oo) Ibid. p. 255.

(pp) Ibid. p. 270, 275.

(qq) Epitaph.

(rr) Visitation of Essex, in the Heralds Office, No. 124.

[T] His government of the Briel expiring, or being superseded &c.] We do not know which it was. But Sir William Broune, in a Letter to Robert Lord Sydney, tells him, 'that Sir Francis Vere, hearing that he should loose his place, came himself to the Kinge, desyringe to be lycensed from the charge of the Brill (46).'

[V] It was renewed again to him by King James I.] That it was at an end, in the beginning of that King's reign, is most evident from the patent then granted to him; which begins thus: 'Whereas the Toune of Brill in the Lowe Countries is nowe without a Governor, forasmuche as we thinke meet and necessary, for the advancement of our service in those parts, to have the same place supplied by some personage of quality and gifts fitt for a Charge of that importance, Know ye &c. (47).' — Sir Francis enjoyed this Government in November, 1605 (48).

[W] Where an uncommon monument was erected to his memory by his Lady.] A print of it may be seen in Dart's and other Histories of Westminster-abbey. On a marble table, raised somewhat above the floor, rests Sir Francis's statue, as big as the life, on a quilt, all of figured alabastr: Above which is a canopy of Lydian, or touch stone, supported at the four corners on the shoulders of four knights in armour, kneeling on one knee upon the ground. And, on the canopy, are his helmet, vambrace, gauntlets, spurs and shield, of white marble exquisitely wrought. Round the verge, is this epitaph, in gilt letters: 'Francisco Vero, Equiti Aurato, Galfredi F, Joannis Comitiss Oxoniæ Nepoti, Brieliæ et Portsmouthæ Præfecto, Anglicarum Copiarum in Belgio Ductori summo; Elizabetha uxor viro charissimo, quocum conjunctissime vixit, hoc supremum amoris et fidei conjugalis monumentum mœstissima et cum Lacrymis gemens posuit. Obiit XXVIII Die Augusti, Anno Salutis MDCVIII, et Anno Ætatis sue LIII.'

But we find this other ingenious Epitaph made upon him:

'When Vere fought Death, arm'd with his sword and shield,

Death was afraid to meet him in the Feild:

But when his weapons he had laid aside,

Death like a coward strooke him, and he dy'd (49).'

[X] Recorded by himself in his Commentaries.] The title of them is, 'The Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, being diverse pieces of service, wherein he had command, written by himself in way of Commentary.' They were published from the Author's original, compared with a copy in the possession of the Earl of Westmorland, and another copy communicated by the Lord Fairfax, in the year 1657, by William Dillingham, D. D. finely printed by J. Field, Cambridge, fol. and adorned with very beautiful pictures of Sir Francis, and Sir Horace, Vere; Sir John Ogle; with maps, plans of battles, &c. At the end is subjoined, Sir John Ogle's account of the last charge at Newport battle; and his account of the parly at the siege of Ostend; with a short relation of some circumstances during that treaty, by Henry Hexham. The Editor hath also continued the story of that siege, from the time Sir Francis put up his pen, to the time that he put up his sword there. — At the end, is a relation of Newport battle, in elegant Latin, by Isaac Dorislaus; the same who was one of the Judges of the Court of Admiralty, and an assistant in drawing up and managing the charge against King Charles I. at his tryal (50). — In the beginning, the Editor gives the following just encomium of this work.

Brave Vere! who hast by deeds of arms made good
What thou hadst promised by birth and blood;
Whose courage ne're turn'd edge, being back'd with wife
And sober reason, sharpened with advise.
Look (Reader) how from Newport hills he throws
Himself a thunder-bolt amongst his foes;
And what his Sword indicted, that his Pen
With like success doth here fight o're agen:
What Mars performed, Mercury doth tell;
None e're but Cesar fought and wrote so well.
Why may not then his Book this title carry,
The Second Part of Cesar's Commentary?

[Y] The good account given of him by Sir Robert Naunton, &c.] It is in these words. 'Sir Francis Vere was of the ancient and most noble extract of the Earles of Oxford: And it may be a question, whether the Nobility of his House, or the Honour of his Achievements, might most commend him; but that we have an authentique Rule to decide the doubt:

Nam genus & proavos, & quæ non fecimus ipsi,
Vix ea nostra voco

'For though he were an Honourable Slip of that ancient Tree of Nobility, (which was no disadvantage to his vertue) yet he brought more glory to the name of Vere, than he took of blood from the Family. He was amongst the Queen's swordmen inferior to none; but superior to many: Of whom it may be said, "To speak much of him, were the way to leave out something that might adde to his praise, and to forget more that could adde to his Honour." I find not that he came much to the Court, for he lived almost perpetually in the Camp: but when he did, no man had more of the Queen's favour, and none less envied: for he seldom troubled it with the jealousy and allarum of supplantations; his way was another sort of undermining. They report, that the Queen (as she loved martiall men) would court this Gentleman as soon as he appeared in her presence. And surely he was a Souldier of great worth, and commanded thirty yeares in the service of the States, and twenty yeares over the English in chief, as the Queen's Generall: and he that had seen the Battail of Newport, might there best have taken him, and his Noble Brother, my Lord of Tilbury, to the life (51).'

(50) See Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 339. Edit. 1721.

(51) Naunton's Fragmenta regalia, &c. Edit. 1653. 12mo. p. 84.

(a) There were four brothers and a sister who are mentioned in the preceding article, remark [A] to which account we shall add of Robert, the third brother, that he died beyond the seas unmarried. Visitation of Essex, 1634, 82. A. 7. in Bibl. Harl. in the British Museum.

(f) Sir Francis Vere's Commentaries, p. 103.

(b) Ibid. p. 170.

(i) Ibid. p. 178.

(1) Dillingham, in the Preface to Sir Francis Vere's Commentaries.

(2) Sidney's Letters, and Memorials, p. 208.

(3) Commentaries, p. 108 to 111.

VERE [HORACE], Baron of Tilbury, youngest brother of the preceding (a), was born at Kirby-Hall in Essex, in the year 1565 (b). He took to a military life from his youth (c), and accompanied his brother, Sir Francis, in his most signal exploits, being in courage equal, and in hazards undivided [A]. In the 20th year of his age, he with his brother, Sir Francis, then aged 31, went over with those forces sent the latter end of the year 1583, to the assistance of the States of Holland, and served there in several actions with his brother, till he had the command of a regiment of foot; yet we don't find any particular mention made of him till the expedition to Cadiz, in 1596, wherein he embarked, and was knighted for his valour in taking of that sea-port town (d). In 1597, he was in the Low-Countries in the service of the States, and after the end of the campaign, lay sick at the Hague (e). He continued there the following year, 1598, without any considerable action; but the enemy making strong efforts in 1599, he greatly signalized himself in the campaign that year [B]. In 1600, he had a great share in obtaining the victory at the famous battle of Newport (f); where, after Sir Francis, his brother, was wounded, he pursued the enemy, making great slaughter among them [C]. In 1601, he was with Prince Maurice at the siege of Rhineberg; and his brother, Sir Francis, being appointed General of the army employed in and about Ostend, having orders for all the English to be sent to him, Prince Maurice, not willing to part them from the siege, detached only eight companies under Sir Horace Vere, with which entering Ostend, he had his share in that memorable siege, and behaved with great conduct and intrepidity. After the parley on December 28, 1601, the Archduke made a general assault on the town (g), when Sir Horace Vere's station was to maintain the Sand-bill, and defend the breach; Sir Charles Fairfax [D] being under him, with only twelve weak companies, whereof some had not above ten or twelve men; but had double arms, as pike and musket, with store of ammunition; all which was judged necessary for defending so dangerous a post. Yet it was performed with the loss of a few men (h) in repulsing the enemy by a stratagem [E]. In this general assault, the Archduke lost above two thousand men, and among them many noblemen, &c.; but of the English were slain only forty, and about a hundred wounded, among which was Sir Horace Vere himself, in the leg. After this bloody shower was over, the fortifications were repaired; and on the 7th of March, 1602, Sir Horace, with his brother, embarked themselves, their horses and baggage being sent before, having valiantly defended the town for above eight months against all the Archduke's power, and leaving it much better able to defend itself, than at their first coming thither; and both leaving behind them the marks of true honour and renown (i). The next news we hear of Sir Horace is, that he arrived at Flushing from England before the 20th of June,

[A] In courage equal, in hazards undivided.] As he must be allowed a great share in the actions recorded by his brother, so were his own services afterwards as eminent and considerable, that they might have furnished another Commentary; but his exceeding modesty would not permit of relating his own actions (1).

[B] He signalized himself in the campaign 1599.] Sir William Brown, from Flushing, July 2, 1599, gives the following information to Sir Robert Sidney: 'Letters from Sir Francis Vere, and others, say, that June 24, by break of day, there was a half-moon made in the upper part of Bommel's-Waert, right against the island Voorn, not a league from a fort the enemy was building, who, about seven of the clock in the evening, gave a very hot assault upon it for near an hour. In the half-moon was Sir Horace Vere, and four companies of his regiment, with some French soldiers, who defended it with great valour, repulsing the enemy, who left behind them on the place eighty men; and, as reported by their own men, they lost at least 500 men in the assault. Our nation, continues Sir William, gained reputation, though they escaped not spot-free; Captain Upchar being slain, and several officers wounded (2).'

[C] He pursued the enemy, making great slaughter among them.] Sir John Ogle, in his account of the engagement, says, 'that he being advanced near the enemy, and their men ready to fall on them, Sir Horace Vere came on horseback from pursuit of the enemy, whom the horse had scattered (mentioned by his brother, Sir Francis,) and with 200 men, marched along the Downs towards him, having with him his own Lieutenant-Colonel, Lowel, that commanded Sir Francis Vere's foot company, with other officers. And that Sir Horace willed him to join his forces, and give one good charge on that great troop of the enemy he saw stood firm before them, which they did accordingly, falling in pell-mell among them. And some troops of horse rushing also in, they were presently broken, and the slaughter was great on their side, as the execution easy to them (3).' Camden, on this victory, says, that among those who deserved the first commendations, were Sir Francis Vere, and Sir Horace Vere (4).

[D] Colonel Charles Fairfax.] This Gentleman was the third son of Thomas Lord Fairfax, the first Baron of Cameron, and consequently uncle to Fairfax, General of the Parliament Army in the Civil Wars of England, who married Ann, fourth daughter of Sir Horace Vere. Sir Charles, besides his military abilities, was also a noted Antiquary, and particularly drew up a piece, intitled, Analeta Fairfaxiana, containing a very accurate account of the Fairfax family, which MS. was of great service in reducing the pedigree of that family by the learned Antiquary, Mr Ralph Thoresby, who congratulates his native town of Leeds in Yorkshire, on the happiness of having then resident among them the Colonel's son, the learned and pious Thomas Fairfax, Esq; 'who, says he, many years ago laid down his Commission of Justice of Peace for the West-Riding, and retired hither for devotion sake; whose example, continues Mr Thoresby, is at once both a happiness and reproach to the neighbourhood, who cannot but observe him and his family, twice every day, going to attend the worship of God in his holy Temple there, in the most solemn manner, to offer up their prayers and thanksgiving to that God whose service is perfect freedom (5).'

[E] The enemy was repulsed by a stratagem.] The soldiers by order falling flat on the ground, the enemies shot flew like hail over their heads, which saved the lives of many men. And when the Spaniards were climbing up the breach, they tumbled down among them much combustibles that were provided to impede them; the fight continued there hotter and hotter for the space of above an hour, and they were so bravely repulsed, that they could not enter a man. On perceiving their retreat, the west sluice was opened, out of which ran such a torrent through the channel of the west haven, as carried many of their sound, as well as wounded men into the sea. Under Sand-bill, which Sir Horace defended, lay heaps of dead men, and scaling ladders, store of spades, hatchets, and axes, with other materials (6).

(b) MS. I. 3. page 45, in Office Armor.

(c) He was probably initiated therein by Sir Will. Brown, as will be seen presently.

(d) Camden's Life of Q. Eliz. in the compleat Hist. of Eng. Vol. II. p. 593.

(e) Letter of George Gilpin, Esq; the Queen's Resident, dated November 22, 1597, to Sir Robert Sidney, Governor of Flushing, in Sidney's Letters and Memorials, p. 77.

(g) Hexham's continuation of the siege of Ostend. Ibid. p. 167.

(4) Life of Queen Elizabeth, ubi supra, p. 624.

(5) Ducat Leodiensis, &c. Edit. 1715. fol. p. 65 66.

(6) Hexham's continuation of the siege of Ostend, in Commentaries, as above, p. 172 to 176.

1603 (k), whence he set out the same night for the Hague to relieve his brother, Sir Francis, who was to embark for England. On his arrival there, Sir Horace joined the army under Prince Maurice, who being afterwards before Gertruydenburg, letters from the camp there of the 6th of August, N. S. brought advice of a quarrel between the English and French [F], wherein were slain of the English fifteen or sixteen, and at least thirty-six wounded; also as many of the French; and Colonel Bethune so hurt, that he died the next day (l): and that the fray continuing, the French would have been all slain, had not Sir Horace Vere come timely in to save them; and so great was the rage of the English, that his presence could hardly prevail to stay their fury and revenge on the French; for neither the presence of his Excellency Prince Maurice, or any other Commander, could quiet them, so greatly did they honour and love him. It does not appear, that any action happened during that campaign. But in 1604, Sir Horace again joined the army under Prince Maurice before Sluys, and from the camp, May 2, that year, wrote the letter, inserted below, to Sir William Brown [G], with whom he had an intimacy, having, as it should seem, been initiated by him in military discipline; for he subscribed himself his loving son, yet was not allied to him. Sir William, by a letter to Robert Lord Sidney, dated at Flushing, July 12, acquaints him, 'that he had received a letter from Sir Horace Vere, on the 9th, from the Leaguers before Sluys, that a soldier, come out of the town, reported they were in great scarcity of provisions, and were weak in their bodies for want of competent food to eat: also that the Governor would have made a sally with 1500 men, which they refused, alledging their disabilities in weakness of their bodies (m).' Afterwards, by Sir Horace's good conduct, the town of Sluys was taken, overcoming difficulties, which, in the opinion of his friends, were impossible to surmount (n). In the campaign of 1605, he greatly signalized himself by his gallant retreat with 4000 men from Spinola, the Spanish General, when with three times that number he had grasped up Prince Maurice and his men against the sea-shore (o) [H].

(k) Sidney's Memorials, Vol. II. p. 274. Letter of Sir William Brown to Robert Lord Sidney.

(l) The English were killed with musket-shot, but those they killed were with pike and sword, for shot they used none, having spent their powder the night before in honour of King James's Coronation. Ibid. p. 277.

(m) Ibid. p. 299.

(o) Ibid.

On

[F] A quarrel between the English and French. The ground of discontent between them grew first at Dort, where three of the English being slain, and two French, and no justice done, the heart-burning continued, and broke out afresh at Gertruydenburg by accident. 'The Englishman, says Sir William Brown, who brought me the letter from the camp, tells me it began by an Englishwoman that had sticks to sell, which a Frenchman cheapened, and because she would not let him have them for the money he proffered, he snatched the wood from her; which provoking an Englishman, that was standing by, to pull them again from him; the Frenchman thereupon drew his sword, and run him through the body (7).' Fœmina causa mali.

[G] A letter to Sir William Brown. This is the tenour of it:

'I thank you very much for the letters you sent me. If it falls within the compass of my power to do you any acceptable service, you shall find me ready: you have the main of your honest friends of Flushing amongst us, that I do forbear to acquaint you with our occurrences. In the last business we had to do with the enemy, Captain Williams behaved himself very worthily with the troops he commanded. We mist a fair occasion to have a good day's work, which I doubt not but you have heard it at large. So with my kindest salutations, and my prayers for your health, I recommend you to the Almighty's protection, and rest

'Your Loving Son,

'And most assured Friend to be commanded,

'H. Vere.'

Sir William Brown, May 23, inclosed this letter to Robert Lord Sidney, observing, 'that therein due praise was given his Lordship's garrison from Sir Horace Vere, who, says he, honourably gives witness of our men's behaviour.' And Captain Williams, in a letter to Sir William Brown, informs him; 'that on Saturday evening the enemy marched out of Sluys about 800 in two troops, and with them most of their slaves: when they came, continues he, within cannon-shot of our shipping, that lay in the drowned land, they made a stand; and after some stay, returned (without doing any thing) the same way they came, which was over the drowned land into the town. They came for two ends, first, to receive provision brought them out of Damm; the second, to deliver their slaves to be led to Bruges; but their convoy did not come that night according to their expectation. The next day, at six in the morning, 3000 foot and 1500 horse came with twenty-four waggons laden with meal to be delivered them, and to receive the slaves. His Excellency having intelligence thereof, drew out his horse, and the better 'part of his foot, with three field-pieces; the French, and the old Scotch regiment had the van-guard led by Count William; other Nations made the battle, and the English had the rear, for so it fell to be their turn, &c. After two hours stay, word being brought to his Excellency, that the grofs of the convoy were near passing over a morass towards Damm, he commanded Sir Horace Vere to draw off half the English, and march to find the enemy: he thereupon drew off his own regiment and my troops, and when we came within sight of the enemy, he bad me send my musketeers, with a Lieutenant and a Sergeant. Our musketeers, after two volleys, had no powder, and were on a retreat till I came in with the pikes, and then we went on again, and pressed so hard the enemy, that they gave way; they had a river between them and us, which we passed, and I was in the way to follow the enemy, but Sir Horace Vere ordered me back. At my return I met his Excellency, who told me, if we had been an hour sooner, we should have had a good day: I said, if we followed them, we should have a good execution; but for that they made haste, and their retreat near, he judged it not convenient. Our men come to be in good order, and are glad of this small business; I think we shall have more. We are all exceedingly bound to Sir Horace Vere; who doth me all the honour he can, and hath given strict commandment, that none of his troops shall quarrel. I have lost two men, and seven shot, and Lieutenant Zouch had his arm broken with a bullet on our first going on. As soon as we came to our quarter, Sir Horace sent James to dress Lieutenant Zouch, and our soldiers: his care is much of us, and our loves must be as great to him. This siege will prove tedious, and produce many dangerous attempts by the difficult passage over (8).'

[H] He made a gallant retreat, &c. Sir John Throgmorton, Lieutenant Governor of Flushing, in a letter from thence, dated October 5, 1605, to Robert Sidney, Lord Viscount Lisle, has given the particulars thereof greatly to the honour of Sir Horace Vere, saying of him, 'that seeing their own horse had abandoned their foot, and the enemy falling desperately on their rear, he desired Prince Maurice to let him, with those of his nation, attack them. On which his Excellency giving him charge of the rear, and leaving him to make the retreat, he had no sooner passed a river (where his soldiers waded up to their middle) to come to the rear of the Dutch, and landed, but the enemy, with five or six troops of horse, charged his three troops he had with him to favour his retreat, who thereupon ran all away, leaving Sir Horace to receive them with only his foot; wherein he very bravely repulsed the enemy, and retired in good order to repass the aforesaid river, in the rear

(8) Sidney's Memorials, p. 289.

of

(6) Epistle to the Reader before Sir Francis Vere's Commentaries.

(7) Sidney's Memorials, p. 277.

On the death of his brother, Sir Francis Vere, in 1608, he succeeded him as Lord General of the English forces in the Netherlands (p). And on the 18th of October, in the 7th year of King James, he was, by Letters patent under the great Seal of England, made special choice of (as therein expressed) to supply the place of Governor and Captain of the Town of Briel in the Low-Countries, and of all other forts thereunto belonging, and of all the garrison and soldiers therein, or thereafter to be placed; with power to appoint a sufficient Deputy or Deputies (q): which government his brother also had till the time of his decease (r). A truce about that time had been made for twelve years between Spain and the States General, whereby they were in perfect tranquillity: but Sir Horace Vere being General of the English forces in the Netherlands, and Governor of the Briel, he was for the most part out of England till the latter end of King James's reign (s). In 1616 he was commissioned, May 22 (t), to render and yield up, into the hands of the States of the United Provinces, the town of Briel, and all the forts and sconces thereunto belonging, whereof he had then the charge, by virtue of the King's letters patent, together with all the Artillery and Ammunition remaining there, observing and performing, in all points, such instructions as he should receive under the hands of the Lords of the Privy-Council, concerning the rendering up the said town, &c. However, the King, in consideration of his services, and the loss of that Government, allowed him a pension (u), as he did to Robert, Earl of Leicester, who had been Governor of Flushing [I]. In 1618, 16 Jac. I, on the commotions which the Arminians had raised to oppose the Prince of Orange, Sir Horace Vere marched with him to Utrecht, whereof they were possessed, and seizing the Ringleaders of the faction, some of them were executed (w), and the Prince left Sir Horace Governor of the city (x), whose conduct was necessary to keep them in order [K]. In 1620, forces being raised for

of the Dutch whom he had saved, and by this time had got over; and the enemy, perceiving that the whole forces of Prince Maurice depended on their Rear, came very desperately on to charge them a second time. Whereupon Sir Horace caused his Vanguard to begin to pass the water, and chusing out about sixty of his best men, with them received this second charge, wherein his own horse was shot under him, but lived to carry him on the other side of the river. In that charge he lost most of the men with him; but by it he saved the army. Had our horse, says Sir John Throgmorton, done their duty, his Excellency had wholly defeated the enemy. Count Henry charged on another quarter of the enemy, and meeting with some resistance from their foot and their horse coming up, all Count Henry's horse shamefully ran away, that he was very greatly endangered, and Sir Henry Carey, of the Court, slain. That Sir Horace Vere saved the army, was confessed by Spinola, the enemy's General (g). [I] He allowed him a pension, as he did Sir R. Sidney. They both enjoyed it in the year 1626, when Robert, Earl of Leicester, by a letter, dated June 12, to James Ley, Earl of Marlborough, Lord High Treasurer, complains of want of payment of it, alledging that Lord Vere had his money; and that the reason for their pensions was all one (10).

[K] He attended prince Maurice to Utrecht against the Arminians, &c.] This expedition, with its consequences, is one of the most memorable events in the history of the United Provinces. The famous synod of Dort, The utter extirpation of Arminianism, The establishment of Calvinism, The execution of that eminent Patriot Barneveldt, Grand Pensioner of Holland, And the imprisonment of the celebrated Hugo Grotius for life, all followed as the natural fruits of it. And as the state of religion in England was likewise nearly connected with it, and the importance of Sir Horace's service at Utrecht cannot otherwise be perfectly understood, we shall give a concise account of it as follows.

In 1608, while the Truce between the Spaniards and the United Provinces was negotiating, Arminius, an eminent Professor at Leyden, began to broach his doctrine, which was warmly opposed by Gomar, another Professor in the same university. The doctrine of Arminius being directly opposite to that of Calvin, he was accused before the synod of Rotterdam, in which Gomar's party prevailed. Hereupon Arminius applying to the States of Holland and West Friesland to take cognizance of the dispute, Gomar was summoned, together with him, before these Magistrates, who promised to have the affair discussed in a synod; but the Grand Council reporting to the State, that the whole dispute was about some obscure questions concerning Grace and Predestination, Barneveldt happened to say, he thanked God that the fundamental points of religion were not in question, which was warmly resented by Gomar (11). Arminius died October 10, 1609 (12); but his Partizans drew up a Remonstrance, dated January 14, 1610, containing a Confession of their faith, comprehended in five articles (13). On the other hand, the Gomarists opposed to it a Contra-remonstrance. Hence arose the names of Remonstrants, and Contra-Remonstrants. And the dispute still continuing with much bitterness, the States of Holland, who were made uneasy thereby, convened, in 1611, six of the principal Divines of each party to dispute before them on the points in question; which being done, the States, without determining any thing, recommended to them to live in peace; but enjoining them to deliver their thoughts of the most proper means thereto. The Remonstrants proposed a Toleration, the Contra-Remonstrants a National Synod. Both which opinions being laid before the States, they declared for a Toleration: thus the cause was gained to the Arminians; but the Gomarists were favoured by the people, and grew very factious. Hereupon the Grand Pensionary Barneveldt, imagining that, if they made themselves masters of the election of ministers, the States would insensibly appease these troubles, proposed the revival of an obsolete regulation made in 1591, by which the Magistrates and Consistory were each to nominate four persons, who should chuse a minister to be afterwards presented to the Body of the Magistrates, who might receive or reject him. This motion was agreed to by the States, to the great mortification of the Contra-Remonstrants, who complained that the States had exceeded their power. Hence arose a grand contest, who ought to be Judge in ecclesiastical matters. The Arminians attributed this power to the Civil Magistrate: The Gomarists to the Clergy alone. Hence arose a separation between them (14); each party seizing the churches of their adherents, stirring up sedition, writing libels, &c. These violences gave birth to a schism; some joining the old ministers, and others the new. In this time of confusion Grotius was nominated Pensionary of Rotterdam, and sent into England. It is imagined (15) he had secret instructions to get the King and the principal Divines to favour the Arminians, and approve the conduct of the States. He had several conferences with his Majesty on that subject (16). But at his return to Holland he found the divisions increased. Barneveldt and he having the direction of the proceedings of the states in this matter, he was appointed to draw up an Edict which might restore tranquillity. It was approved by the States, and contained in substance, 'That, whereas several Divines had taught, that God has created some men to damn them; that he has laid certain men under a necessity of sinning; that he invites some men to salvation to whom he is resolved to deny it: That other Divines were charged with teaching, that men's natural strength or works may operate their salvation. It is hereby ordained, that these doctrines be condemned by the Pastors, both from the pulpits and on all other seasonable occasions. But as to those who only believe and teach, that God hath from all eternity chosen to salvation, from the mere motion of his will through Jesus Christ, those who by Grace, which they have

(r) See his article.

(t) Patent 14 Jac. I. p. 1. in dorf.

(x) Camden's Annals of King James, in the said Hist. of England, p. 649.

(13) It was drawn up by Utengobard, minister at the Hague, and signed by forty-six ministers, being probably made in concert with Grotius, the intimate friend of Utengobard, at that time wholly employed on these subjects. From the five points this was called the Quinquarticular Controversy, well known and much bandied in England.

(14) Grotius's Apology, cap. 9.

(15) Le Vassor's Hist. de Louis XIII. lib. 4. p. 477.

(16) While he was in England, he wrote, in 1613, his Reconciliation of the different opinions on predestination and grace, which is printed in his Theological works. It contains a display of Arminianism in its favour.

(p) MS. I. 8. p. 45, in Offic. di. nor.

(q) Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. XVI. p. 786.

(s) His two eldest daughters, Elizabeth and Mary, were born abroad, during this absence from home. Rushworth's Collections, Vol. I. p. 153.

(u) Sidney's Letters, Vol. II. p. 368, 369.

(w) Wilson's Life of King James I, in the Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 718.

(g) Sidney's Memorials, p. 314, 315.

(10) Ibid. p. 369.

(11) He said he would be very sorry to appear before God with Arminius's sentiments. Burigny's Life of Grotius, p. 40. Lond. 1754.

(12) Grotius made his Elogium in versu.

(17) This Edict being warmly attacked by the Contra-Remonstrants, Grotius reprinted it, with a collection of passages, justifying it against their censures. He afterwards wrote a defence of that decree, which he did not finish; but, on occasion of the dispute concerning the power of Sovereigns, he composed a considerable treatise, and had before handled that subject in a tract on the rights of the States of Holland.

(18) Casaubon's Epistles, No. 933. (19) lb. Ep. 863. It is probable, that the Letter sent by the States of Holland and West Friesland, in 1618, to King James, was written by Grotius: it is his style and sentiments.

(20) Grotius was sent to this town to reconcile them to these proceedings: he laboured with all his might; but in vain; the grief for which threw him into a fever, which had well nigh carried him off. His speech on this occasion was translated into Latin by Schrivelius, and is in the third tome of his Theological works.

(21) Grotius's History of the Netherlands, lib. 17. (22) The substance of which was, that the five Articles should be examined in a Synod of Holland, and the decision carried to a Synod of all the Provinces; that, previous thereto, the sovereignty of all the provinces should be settled: that nothing should be fixed without an unanimous consent: that, if they could not agree, a general council of all the reformed churches should be convened: and that, in the mean time, a severe edict should be published against rioters and the authors of defamatory libels.

(23) The Provinces of Holland, Utrecht, and Overysel, protested against this resolution; and Barnevelt was so thunder-struck by it, that he would have resigned the assistance of the King of Bohemia, he had the command of them conferred on him by King James, laying aside Edward Cecil, who was first designed. In consequence of this command, not merited, and by the operation of the Holy Spirit, believe in Christ, and, by free grace given, persevere in the Faith to the end, We will (says the Edict) that they be not molested on that account, nor pressed to embrace other sentiments, or teach other doctrine. For we judge these truths sufficient for salvation, and proper for the instruction of Christians (17). The States were very desirous that the King of Great Britain and the English Bishops should be satisfied with the manner in which they had explained themselves in this Edict; they were the more anxious, as they had reason to believe James unfavourable to the Arminians (18). However, the King, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops, allowed the doctrine of the Edict to be orthodox, and equally distant from Manicheism and Pelagianism: the only thing which gave the King some pain, was to see the Civil magistrate assume a right of making decrees in matters of religion (19). But this Edict served only to increase the troubles, by driving the Gomarists, against whom it was manifestly levelled, into despair. The riots which had already happened, and which they hourly apprehended, made the Grand Pensionary Barnevelt propose to the States of Holland, that the Magistrates of the cities of the province should be empowered to raise troops for the suppression of the Rioters, and the security of their towns. Dort, Amsterdam (20), and three others of the most favourable to the Gomarists, protested against this step, which they regarded as a kind of declaration of war against the Contra-Remonstrants. Barnevelt's motion was nevertheless agreed to; and on the 4th of August, 1617, the States issued a placard accordingly. This fatal decree occasioned the death of the Grand Pensionary, and the ruin of Grotius, by incensing Prince Maurice of Nassau against them, who looked upon the resolution of the States, taken without his consent, as derogatory to his dignity of Governor and Captain-General. He had entertained a mortal enmity for several years against the Grand Pensionary (21), who concluded the truce in 1609 without his concurrence. Hitherto he had stifled his revenge for want of a proper opportunity to execute it; but it blazed openly on occasion of this decree of the States, which he considered as Barnevelt's act. He accused him of labouring to diminish his authority, found fault with the Edict drawn up by Grotius (22), declared publicly for the Gomarists, assisted at Divine service only in their Churches, and forbade the Soldiers to obey the States, when they would employ them to appease the riots. Some towns however, whether they suspected their garrisons, or found there was no other way to suppress the rioters, levied men in consequence of the States decree. The Contra-Remonstrants, seeing themselves powerfully protected by Prince Maurice, separated from the communion of the Arminians in 1617.

The States of Holland, wholly employed in seeking ways to compound matters, had come to a resolution, February 21, this year, to have a proper Formula drawn up, to which the Ministers of the two parties should be obliged to conform; that it should be sent first to Prince Maurice, and then presented to the States for their examination; and such a Formula was accordingly prepared by Grotius. But this project did not please the Prince; he wanted a National Synod; and the States General, entirely devoted to him, determined, in spite of the States of Holland, to convoke a National Assembly in Holland itself, at Dort (23). In the mean time Prince Maurice, who saw, with the utmost displeasure, several cities, agreeable to the permission granted them by the particular States, levy a new Militia without his consent, engaged the States General to enjoin the disbanding of those levies, which were stiled the Attendant Soldiers. And when these orders were not obeyed by the particular States (24), the Prince, considering this conduct as a rebellion, concerted with the States General, that he should march in person, with the troops under his command, to get these soldiers disbanded; that he should depose the Arminian Magistrates, and turn out the Ministers of their party. He accordingly set out, accompanied by the Deputies of the States General, in 1618, and, beginning with the province of Guedres, he removed from the senate of Nimeguen all who were known or suspected to favour Arminian-his place of Grand Pensionary; but was prevailed upon to continue in it by the earnest desire of the province. Grotii manes, p. 78. (24) The particular States looked upon themselves as Sovereigns. See Neuvill's Hist. of Holland, B. III. c. 5.

ism, and turned out the Ministers, obliging them instantly to leave the Town. At Overyssel he met with no opposition. In Arnhem there was a numerous garrison of Attendant Soldiers; but the Prince, having intelligence from within the place, got into it by night; and the soldiers, seeing themselves betrayed, laid down their arms. Some Senators were deposed, and the Secretary of the Council banished the city. The States of Holland, knowing that the Prince was to treat Utrecht in the same manner, sent thither Grotius, and Hoogerbetz, Pensionary of Leyden, with instructions to consider and resolve on some method of opposing the commission given by the States General to the Prince, and to consult in what manner the Union between the particular State of the Provinces might be strengthened for their mutual aid and assistance (25). In consequence of these advices, the Magistrates doubled the guards at the gates, and armed all the militia they could assemble. Every thing seemed ready for enabling the city to make a vigorous resistance. The Burghers had taken up arms, and the Attendant Soldiers were posted in the principal quarters of the town. These dispositions did not divert the Prince from his design of seizing it. The old garrison, from a jealousy of the new, declared for him; this occasioned a mutiny: some of the Burghers left the interest of the city, which being unprovided of good officers, the Prince and the Deputies of the States found means to enter and reduce it. Being then Master of the town, he disbanded the Attendant Soldiers, made Leydenberg Secretary of the States (26), and some Senators prisoners, and turned out of their places those who had distinguished themselves by their resistance, putting in their room such as he could depend on. Nor was the Prince of Orange's (27) revenge so satisfied. The destruction of the Grand Pensionary he had resolved on; and, in that spirit, having procured an ordonnance of the States General, Barnevelt was seized on the 29th of August this year, 1618, and thrown into the castle of the Hague, as were Grotius and Hoogerbetz about the same time (28). Some days after these imprisonments, the Prince of Orange and the Deputies of the States General made a tour through the towns of Holland, where the Prince deposed such Magistrates as were relations or friends of the three illustrious prisoners, putting in their places others that were wholly devoted to him, and obliged some towns to receive a garrison, particularly Rotterdam. The Arminians had hitherto been the most powerful party (29) there, and had excluded the Contra-Remonstrants from preaching in the great church. But the Prince took that church from them, and gave it, with all the rest, to the Gomarists, except two only which were left to the Arminians. He placed a garrison of a hundred men in the town, and turned out and banished the Ministers who had appeared most zealous for Arminianism, such as Vorsius, Utengobard, and Episcopius. The warmest opposers of a National Synod being thus disabled from giving any further obstruction, the States General proceeded to the holding of it, and it was opened on the 15th of November, 1618, at Dort (30), wherein Episcopius and the other Arminian ministers were deposed, and Calvinism established.

The three prisoners were not brought to their trial till after the rising of this synod. But twenty-six Commissioners were appointed to be the Judges on the 19th of November. They began with Barnevelt, who was sentenced on the 12th of May, 1619, to lose his head. And this sentence was executed upon him the next day. The scaffold for his execution was erected in the court of the castle at the Hague, facing the Prince of Orange's apartments. After a short speech (31) to the people, the executioner struck off his head at one blow. It is affirmed, that the Prince of Orange, to feast himself with the cruel pleasure of seeing his enemy perish, beheld the execution with a glass. The people looked on it with other eyes. Many came to gather the sand, wet with his blood, to keep it carefully in phials; and the crowd of those who had the same curiosity continued the next day, notwithstanding all possible means were used to hinder them.

Five days after came on the trial of Grotius (32), which concluded in a sentence, pronounced May 18, 1619, condemning him to perpetual imprisonment, and the confiscation of his estate (33). In consequence of this sentence, he was carried from the Hague to the own liberty, was owing to his opposition against making Prince Maurice Dictator. See Du Maurier, Le Vassor, La Neuville, and Le Clerc.

(25) Grotius and Hoogerbetz promised they should not be abandoned by the States of Holland, from whom they brought letters, persuading them, that it was their duty to obey the States of Utrecht who paid them, and to resist the Stadtholder.

(26) Upon hearing of the imprisonment of Barnevelt, Grotius, and Hoogerbetz, and the banishment of Vorsius, Utengobard, and Episcopius, he was so terrified, that he made away with himself in prison.

(27) Maurice had this title after the death of his brother Philip-William, which happened at Brussels, Feb. 21, 1618.

(28) Upon this arrest, Carleton, our Ambassador then at the Hague, was prevailed on by Grotius's enemies to complain against his Mare liberum, and to maintain, that the States ought to make an example of him. Selden's Mare clausum, lib. 1. p. 198.

(29) Mercure Francois, an. 1617.

(30) The States of Holland, who, in May 1618, had renewed their protest against it, frightened by the violences exercised against the three illustrious prisoners, at last gave their consent.

(31) 'Burghers, says he, I have been always your faithful countryman: believe not that I die for treason; but for maintaining the rights and liberties of my countrymen.' Mercure Francois.

(32) His accusation consisted of twenty-nine articles, confessed by himself. The chief of which was his opposing the Synod of Dort, being active in raising the Attendant Soldiers, and particularly in the resistance against the Prince of Orange at Utrecht.

(33) The same punishment had been moved for in the case of Barnevelt, but in vain; and it is not improbable, that the death of a person, to whom the Dutch were partly indebted for their command, he took leave of the King at Theobalds, July the 9th, and set sail from Gravesend on the 22d, with the Earls of Oxford (y), Essex, Dorset, and others. Wilson, who wrote fortress of Louvestein near Gorcum in South Holland, at the point of the island formed by the Vabal and the Meuse, on the 6th of June following. He had been above eighteen months shut up in this fortress, when, on January 11, 1621, Muys-Van-Holi, his declared enemy, who had been one of his Judges, informed the States General, that he had advice from good hands, that their prisoner was seeking to make his escape. Some persons were sent to Louvestein to examine into this matter: but, notwithstanding all the enquiry that could be made, they found no reason to believe that Grotius had laid any plot to get out.

(y) Camden, ubi supra, p. 654.

(34) She had been suffered to accompany him in the castle from his first imprisonment.

His wife however was wholly employed in contriving how to set him at liberty (34). He had passed his time in the prosecution of his studies, and for that purpose had been permitted to borrow books of his friends, which, when he had done with them, were carried back in a chest with his foul linnen that was sent to Gorcum to be washed. The first year his guards were very exact in examining the chest, when it went from Louvestein; but, being used to find in it only books and linnen, they grew tired of searching, and did not take the trouble to open it. Grotius's wife, observing their negligence, purposed to take advantage of it. She represented to her husband, that it was in his power to get out of prison when he pleased, if he would put himself in the chest that carried his books. However, not to endanger his health, she caused holes to be bored opposite to the part where his face was to lie, to breath at; and make him try if he could continue shut up in that confined posture as long as it would require to go from Louvestein to Gorcum. Finding it might be done, she resolved to seize the first favourable opportunity. It soon offered. The Commandant of Louvestein going to Heusden to raise recruits, Grotius's wife made a visit to his Lady, and told her in conversation, that she was desirous of sending away a chest full of books; for her husband was so weak, it gave her great uneasiness to see him study with such application. Having thus prepared the Commandant's wife, she returned to her husband's apartment, and, in concert with a valet and a maid, who were in the secret, shut him up in the chest. At the same time, to prevent any surprize in the people's not seeing him, she spread a report that he was ill. Two soldiers carried the chest: one of them, finding it heavier than usual, said, There must be an Arminian in it (35). Grotius's wife, who was present, answered with great coldness, There are indeed Arminian books in it. The chest was brought down on a ladder with great difficulty. The soldier insisted on its being opened to see what was in it; he even went and informed the Commandant's wife, that the weight of the chest gave him reason to think there was something suspicious contained in it, and that it would be proper to have it opened. Whether it was that she was willing to wink at the thing, or through negligence, she would not consent: she told him, that Grotius's wife had assured her, there was nothing but books in it. It is affirmed, that a soldier's wife who was present said, there was more than one example of prisoners making their escape in boxes. The chest however was put into the boat, and Grotius's maid, who was in the secret, had orders to go with it to Gorcum, and put it into a house there. When it came to Gorcum, they wanted to put it on a sledge; but the maid telling the boatman there were some brittle things in it, and begging of him to take care how it was carried, it was put on a carriage called a horse, and brought by two chairmen to David Daxelaer's, a friend of Grotius, and brother-in-law to Erpenius, having married his sister. When every body was gone, the maid opened the chest. Grotius had felt no inconvenience in it, though it was not above three feet and a half long. He got out, dressed himself like a mason, with a rule and a trowel, and went by Daxelaer's back-door, through the market-place, to the gate that leads to Valvic in Brabant (36). At this place he made himself known to some Arminians, and hired a carriage to Antwerp, taking the necessary precautions not to be known by the way. He alighted at Antwerp, at the house of Nicholas Grevincovius, who had been formerly a minister at Amsterdam, and discovered himself to no body else. It was on the 22d of March, 1621, that Grotius thus recovered his liberty; and on the 30th of that month he wrote to the States General, that, in procuring it, he had employed neither violence nor corruption with his keepers; that he had nothing to reproach himself with in what he had done (37); that he gave those counsels which he thought best, for appeasing the troubles that had arisen before he was concerned in public business; that he only obeyed the Magistrates at Rotterdam, his masters; and the States of Holland, his sovereigns; and that the persecution he had suffered would never diminish his love to his country, for whose prosperity he heartily prayed. After a few weeks stay at Antwerp, he went by invitation to Paris, where he arrived in safety on the 13th of April, 1631. Grotius's escape exercised the pens of the most famous poets of that time (38); and he himself wrote some verses on his happy deliverance (39); and others also on the chest to which he owed his liberty; and in the latter part of his life he was at great pains to recover it (40). It was believed at Louvestein, for some time after his escape, that he was ill; and, to give him time to get clear off, his wife gave out that his illness was dangerous; but as soon as she learnt, by the maid's return, that he was in Brabant, and consequently in safety, she told the guards the bird was flown. They informed the Commandant by this time returned from Heusden, who hastened to Grotius's wife, and asked her where she had hid her husband? She answered, he might search for him: but, being much pressed, and even threatened, she confessed that she had caused him to be carried to Gorcum in a book-chest: and that she had done no more than kept her word to him, to take the first opportunity of setting her husband at liberty. The Commandant, in a rage, went immediately to Gorcum, and, acquainting the Magistrate with his prisoner's escape, both came to Daxelaer's house, where they found the empty chest. On his return to Louvestein, the Commandant confined Grotius's wife more closely; but she presenting a petition, April 5, 1621, praying her discharge, and Prince Maurice, to whom it was communicated, making no opposition, the majority were for setting her at liberty (41). Accordingly she was discharged two days after, and suffered to carry away every thing that belonged to her at Louvestein. This done, she followed her husband, and arrived at Paris in October, 1621 (42). We have been more particular in setting forth the violent steps taken in bringing about this revolution in Holland by Prince Maurice, since they furnish so many glaring proofs of his temper and principles in respect to religion: and therein are also seen the religious principles of Sir Horace Vere. He was entirely devoted to the Prince, who on his side was equally fond of him. We have seen him heartily concur in suppressing the Arminians and establishing Calvinism at Utrecht; and I believe it will not be doubted that he had imbibed the principles, though without the persecuting revengeful spirit, of his Commander. But it is well known, that the doctrine of the Remonstrants, upon the points of Grace and Predestination, was embraced at this very time by some of the most eminent Divines in England, particularly Dr Overal, the learned Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, whose example must have had great weight with many of the clergy: and though it is true, Calvinism was in general the doctrine of the church, as expressed in the articles of Faith, as long as King James, who had been bred in Scotland, held the crown, yet, in his Successor's reign, this doctrine began early to be disapproved, and in some years that of Arminius so generally prevailed, by the influence especially of Dr Laud, afterwards Archbishop, that the Church of England might truly be said to be Arminian, notwithstanding several eminent persons still retained the Dutch principles. Among these must be reckoned Sir Horace Vere, who (by long residing among those people, and through his devotion to the Prince of Orange) being a Calvinist, would certainly breed up his children there in the same belief in particular, together with some antiepisopal principles in general, who would thereby unavoidably contract a dislike to the Church of England. And the same is confirmed by Lord Clarendon (43), particularly in the case of Sir Horace's daughter Anne, who was married to Fairfax, General of the Parliament's army, and who, as that noble historian observes, having been bred in Holland, had not that reverence for the church of England as she ought to have had, and so had unhappily concurred in her husband's entering into rebellion. However, his Lordship makes this apology for her, that she never imagined what misery it would bring upon

(36) It was not the Spaniards he feared, for there was then a truce between them and the United Provinces.

(37) He was always persuaded, that, if he would own his transgression, and ask pardon, they would set him at liberty; but he never would take any step that might infer consciousness of guilt.

(38) Barlaeus wrote some very good verses upon it, printed in Præstantium Virorum, Epist. p. 655. He also celebrated his wife's magnanimity. Grotii manes, p. 230. Another Poem was also composed upon it by Rutgerius, who compared Grotius to Moses. Ibid. p. 204. and Observat. Hallenf. 15. lib. 7. p. 336.

(39) They were translated into Flemish by the famous Poet John Van Vondel.

(40) Grotius's Hist. No. 720. p. 670.

(41) Some indeed voted for detaining her a prisoner; but they were looked on as very barbarous, to want to punish a woman for an heroic action.

(42) Grotius, Ep. 156.

(43) History of the Rebellion, Vol. V. p. 255. 8vo edition.

wrote the Life of King James the First, and was in the Expedition, has given an account of it, which the Reader will find below [L]; and there see the reason of the ill success of it. After which, during the army's being in winter-quarters, the Imperial forces, under Bavaria and Buquoy, advanced towards Prague, and the Bohemians quitted their garrisons to make their army more compleat. On the 8th of November, both armies met for the decision of King Frederick's fate. The Bohemians stood on the advantage-ground between the Imperialists and Prague, but the enemy breaking through, ruined their whole army, and pursued the victory. The King and Queen, surpris'd with the discomfiture among a wavering people, in a city not defensible, were constrained to fly the next morning. The English were too far distant to be in the battle, and before they heard of it, the Earl of Essex pass'd through Lorraine, and through France posted into England, to solicit the King to send those regiments promised, and other supplies. The Princes of the Union, when they heard of the defeat, had not so much faith as to depend on King James for assistance; but before the spring, submitted themselves to the Emperor, leaving the almost ruined Palatinate as a prey to an insulting enemy. Sir Horace Vere, with the English, only gave spirits to the vital parts of it (x). The Earls of Oxford and Essex left Sir Horace in his winter-quarters, and upon their narration of the state of affairs in those parts to the King, he called a full Council together to consider thereof, who met at Whitehall, Jaupon the kingdom; and that she utterly abhorred the proceedings of the pretended High Court of Justice against his Majesty as much as any body could do. Of which his Lordship gives a most remarkable instance, well worth perusing, as inserted in this work (44), where it well deserved a place.

(x) Rushworth, Vol. I. p. 17. and Hist. of Eng. as before, p. 725.

[L] He went to the assistance of the King of Bohemia.] The account is in these terms: 'While they were grappling in Bohemia, says he, the marquis Spinola was forming an army in Flanders, and the Protestant Princes of Germany, calling themselves Princes of the Union, raised forces for defence of the Palatinate, and their own interest, under the command of the Marquis of Anspach. But so odious was the name of war to King James, that it was with difficulty he consented to the raising one regiment of foot; but consented that two more should follow. Which regiment was the gallantest for their persons that in many ages had appeared, either at home or abroad. It consisted of 2200 men compleat, under the command of Sir Horace Vere (after Baron of Tilbury) bred up in the school of war, and a known master in the art of victory. The English followed Spinola, but at a distance; for he, being nearer the Palatinate, got much the start of them. On the last of August, by the assistance of Maurice Prince of Orange, and a bridge of boats a little below Wesel, they pass'd the Rhine with Prince Henry of Nassau, who, with 2000 horse and 400 musqueteers, cleared the country before them. When they came to Coblentz, standing on the center of the two rivers, the Rhine and Moselle, giving out, on their march, as if the army intended to pass the Moselle, they (to divert the enemy's intelligence) drew two miles back from Coblentz, and pass'd the Rhine; and this sudden change of resolution amus'd the enemy. In the halt before Coblentz, one bullet (among others from the town) pass'd General Vere and the Earl of Essex, standing together, and hit Flood, a gentleman, on the elbow. Before the army pass'd the Rhine, General Vere sent Captain Rouv and Captain Dexter, with 94 sick men, tents, trunks, &c. that were cumbersome, by water, to Bacrach, which town, within few days, was yielded to Spinola, after the example of Openbeim, and other towns in the Palatinate: so spiritless were the people, that he met no resistance. The English taken in Bacrach were us'd with civility, and, with payment of small ransoms, had liberty to return home. After the army, both horse and foot, had pass'd the Rhine, they had hard marches through the pleasant country of Nassau, shaping their course towards Frankfort. Spinola, finding himself deluded on one side of the Rhine, pass'd the river Maine with all his horse and 4000 foot, intending to snap them on the other side; but, the stream being too high, his waggons and ammunition took wet, and some field pieces were lost, which admonish'd him to retreat; otherwise he had probably cut off our forces, before they could have join'd the Princes of the Union. The 24th of September, Prince Henry with the horse, and General Vere with the foot, pass'd the river Maine near Frankfort, the foot marching up to the middle through the stream, and that night flood in arms, on alarms from Spinola's approach, not yet hearing he was retired. The next day they had a long march to recover Darmsted, one half of which town belonged to the King of Bohemia, the other to the Landgrave of Hesse. There Prince Henry and the Dutch left the English, returning into the Netherlands again. The 27th of September, being joined by 1500 German horse, sent by the Princes of the Union, they came to Brinsheim, the first town in the Palatinate, and, October 1, pass'd over the Rhine by Worms; and that day were met by the Marquis of Anspach, and others of the Princes of the Union, who staid to see them march by, wondering at their gallantry.

After two days rest, the Princes, with part of their army, being 2000 horse and 6000 foot, join'd with the English, and together march'd towards Alzsi, (a town in the Palatinate taken in by the enemy) which they intended to surprize. But hearing, by their scouts, of the town being quitted by the enemy, and that Spinola, with his whole army, was marching towards them, they faced about to make his way the shorter; and within three hours their scouts and the enemy's were in skirmish. The German Princes were not forward to engage, having not their whole army with them; but, finding how the enemy strove to secure themselves, they judg'd their strength not to be great, and resolv'd to attack them. The Dutch, in courtesy, yielded the vanguard to the English, which before they stood on as a punctilio of honour. General Vere drew out of every division 80 musqueteers to begin the onset, standing ready, expecting the command of the Marquis of Anspach to begin the charge; and the evening halting, General Vere, tired with his delays, rode up the hill, accompanied with the Earls of Oxford and Essex, and there saw the enemy begin to march away without drum or trumpet, till the last division moved, and then made the air shake with the noise of their shouts of joy, as was apprehended for their escape. Wilson blames the Princes in not attacking them, being not above 6000 foot and 2000 horse, and might have come up with Spinola before he reach'd Openbeim, whither he was marching. The Earl of Essex press'd the Marquis of Anspach to it, desiring him not to let slip an opportunity so happily put into his hand. He, not pleas'd to be urg'd to that, contrary to his humour, replied angrily, There is a fort betwixt us and the town, and we must pass thither under the mercy of their cannon. Sir Horace Vere, being by, said, When shall we then fight, if we shun the cannon? But no persuasion can be prevalent, where power and disaffection join, says Wilson. The Dutch horse skirmish'd with the rear of the Spanish; and some few of their straggling foot, and about five or six horse, were taken, which was all the hurt done them. The next day the English, with the other forces, march'd into quarters again, where the soldiers found the fruits and wine in the must, no good preservatives. But, after a stay of seven or eight days, Spinola led them a dance for digestion, pretending for Keyfars Luther, a town in the Palatinate, which made the Princes advance their whole body to attend him; but, as they drew near, he retreated: so they sported with one another; though neither of the armies could be pleas'd with the sharp frosty nights, so violent, that the soldiers lay in heaps on the ground, close together, like sheep, till they were fummon'd to warmer lodgings. The English were dispos'd in three principal garrisons. General Vere command'd in Manheim, Sir Gerard Herbert in Heidelberg, and Burrows in Frankendale, imprisoning themselves in walls, while the enemy roam'd round about them, having only power to preserve themselves, the forces of the Princes of the Union being garrison'd in their several countries (45).

(45) History of England, Vol. II. p. 722, 723.

bruary 16, 1620; when, in consideration thereof, the Earls of Oxford, Essex, and Leicester, the Lord Viscount Wilmot, the Lords Danvers, and Alfield, Sir Edward Cecil, and Sir Richard Harrison, Knights, were called to the Council-table, and acquainted with his Majesty's pleasure, that they, or any five or more of them, together with Sir Horace Vere, and Sir Edward Conway, Knights, (if they return to England whilst this Committee doth continue) shall undertake preparations for the recovery and protection of the Palatinate, and have their meetings and assemblies at the Council-chamber at Whitehall (aa). But no assistance was sent, pursuant to this order, farther than that 30000*l.* was given to the Princes of the Union to encourage them to keep in arms. Sir Horace Vere remained in Germany the year after, and kept the Palatinate from being quite over-run by the Imperial forces. On the re-assembling the Parliament, November 20, 1621, the King being absent by indisposition in health, commanded a message to be delivered to both Houses (bb) by the Lord Keeper, and the Lord Digby. After the Lord Keeper had acquainted the Houses with his Majesty's pleasure, the Lord Digby having also the like command, gave a brief account of his negotiation with the Archduke, &c. Then he proceeded to give also an account how bravely Sir HORACE VERE had behaved himself in the Palatinate, and that by his wisdom and valour, there were kept from the enemy, Heidelberg, Mannheim, and Frankendale, the last of which places had then endured a month's siege. And concluded, that the fittest redress was to furnish and keep up the army already there, which must be done by supplies of men and money, and more forces prepared against the next spring (cc). Thereupon, whilst Sir Horace Vere continued in Germany, he was by Letters Patent, bearing date the 16th of February, 1621, 19 Jac. I, in consideration of his fidelity, services, valour, and experience in military affairs, constituted Captain General of the forces in aid of Frederick, Elector Palatine, with full power and authority to raise and transport beyond the seas, with all expedition, 8000 foot and 1600 horse of the King's subjects, or of other nations, that will take on under his banner (dd). Whether after this any forces were sent abroad, or raised, history is silent: but towards the latter end of the year 1622, Heidelberg was taken, and soon after followed the loss of Frankendale, and Mannheim, the chief fortresses in the Palatinate (ee). Sir Horace Vere commanded in Mannheim (ff), and having neither strength of men or means to resist an enemy, after he had defended it as long as man was capable of doing, he surrendered up the town to Count Tilly on honourable conditions to march out with bag and baggage, &c. [M]. On his return, in January, 1622-3, the King received him so graciously and thankfully (as Camden observes) that, forgetting himself, he stood bare to him (gg). On July 20, 1624, 22 Jac. I, he was constituted one of the Council of War, in consideration of the knowledge the King had of his wisdom, integrity, and experience, to assemble and meet together to take such ways and means as shall be most requisite for securing the Realm of Ireland, with the rest of the King's dominions, and putting the Navy Royal in readiness: also to advise of such ways and means as may give advancement by the aforesaid means of assisting the King's allies, especially in the Low-Countries: and upon mature deliberation to set down in writing their opinions, and to offer to the King, and his Council, such propositions, as may be meet for their consideration, or to be by them put in execution (hh). At length, for his great merit and services, on the accession of King Charles to the throne, he was the first Peer of his Majesty's creation, by the stile and title of Lord Vere Baron of Tilbury, in the County of Essex, by Letters Patent, bearing date, July 25, in the first year of his reign (ii) [N]. Not long after, in the same year, the Council of War (whereof the Lord Vere was one) appointed to manage the business of the Palatinate, were called into the House of Commons, and this question propounded to them, Whether the advice was followed in the four ends in the Act of Parliament of 21 Jacob. I, by which the monies given by that Act were to issue? Carey Earl of Totness, and Lord Brook, desired to be excused from answering; the Lord Vere said, he had been much absent in the Low-Countries, and could say little; Lord Grandison said, that since July last, they had seldom met; Sir Robert Mansel and Sir John Ogle desired a copy of the question, and that they might all confer together to give an answer. The Lord Vere's answer was satisfactory, he was excused from any further attendance; but all the rest were called before them again, and giving unsatisfactory answers, were pressed to deal clearly and fully in the business: on which they desired they might have the King's consent before they answered, as a special order of the House required an answer (kk). As his Lordship still held his Post of General

(a.) Rushworth, as before, p. 18.

(bb) Idem, ibid.

(cc) Rushworth, Prædict. p. 39, 40.

(dd) Rymer, Tom. XVII. p. 352, 353.

(ee) Rushworth, Vol. I. p. 69.

(ff) Hist. of Eng. Vol. II. p. 775.

(gg) Camden's Annalium Apparatus, &c. inserted in Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 619.

(h) Pat. I. Car. I.

(hh) Rymer, Vol. XVII, p. 615.

(kk) Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 217.

[M] He surrendered Mannheim to count Tilly, &c.] In short, the fault chiefly lay in the King of Bohemia himself, as appears from hence, that the Earl of Bristol, in the articles of impeachment exhibited against him in parliament, Charles I, being charged with the loss of the Palatinate; in answer thereunto alleged his solicitations for supplying the forces there, by presently sending 30000*l.* borrowed of Sir Baptist Hicks, &c. besides 10000*l.* which he lent, &c. and that if, by accidents of war, the Marquis of Baden, Count Mansfield, and the Duke of Brunswick, received each of them an overthrow, he hopes he shall not be liable to the blame, his Majesty having so far complained to his son-in-law, of the ordering affairs, as to give orders for withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his Majesty's letters to him, and to Sir Horace Vere, of the 3d of June, 1622 (46).

(46) Rushworth's Collection, Vol. I. p. 282.

[N] He was created Baron Vere of Tilbury.] The preamble to the patent, setting forth his merit, as usual upon these occasions, presents us with his just Elogium in the following terms: ' Qui ad arma & munera militaria ab ineunte ætate accinctus, tam per serenissimam Principem Dominam Elizabetham nuper Regiam Anglie, quam per precharissimum Patrem nostrum nuper Regem Jacobum beate memorie, in gravioribus & magis arduis negociis & expeditionibus transmarinis in Hispania & Germania, Francia & Provinciis Belgicis ad primarios semper fidelitatis, & honoris locos merito evocatus, tanta cum fide, zelo, fortitudine & alacritate indefessa in maximum hujus Gentis honorem inservivit, ut ejus acta vere honorifica & laudabilia se Regibus & Reipublice suis acceptabilem, ipsumque per totum Christianum orbem gloriosum reddiderunt, &c.'

of the Forces in the service of the States-General, he frequently went over to them, in the year 1627 [O]. And he continued in the Low-Countries the following year, 1628, when King Charles, by the Ambassadors of Denmark, and the States-General, being solicited to send forces and shipping to secure the Elbe, and for the defence of Luckstadt, his Majesty borrowed six or eight men out of every company serving in the States pay, under the conduct of the Lord Vere, to fill up Sir Charles Morgan's regiments that were to be employed therein, engaging his royal word, that for every man then lent to him, he would fend them two, as soon as his forces returned from Rochel (ll). On the decease of George Carew Earl of Totness, Master of the Ordnance, who died March 27, 1629, his Majesty conferred that Place on the Lord Vere of Tilbury for life, as the said Earl of Totness held it (mm). In 1633, he made the campaign in the Netherlands, and by his Majesty's Letters Patent constituting him General of his Forces, being empowered to confer the honour of Knight-hood, his Lordship, in the camp of Bockstal near Balduck in Brabant, knighted, July 25, 1633, William Boswel, at that time the King's Resident with the States-General (nn). His Lordship afterwards resided for the most part in England, and growing near seventy years of age, made his last Will and Testament the 10th of November, 1634, 10 Car. I. And not long before his death, which happened the following year, taking a resolution to retire from the world, he disposed of all his employments. Being suffered to make the best advantage he could of his thirty-three companies in Holland, and troops of horse, Mr Goring had the one, and Mr Wilmot the other, and his office of the Ordnance he made over to the Lord Newport, to whom the reversion had been granted some time before (oo). Thus having bid farewell to the business of the world, he did not continue in it long after. On the 2d of May, 1635, dining with Sir Henry Vane at Whitehall, he was seized with an apoplexy as he sat at table. Calling for fresh salmon, and reaching out his plate to take it from one that carved, he was not able to draw his hand back again, but sunk down. They instantly carried him to a bed, where he expired within two hours. He was buried on the 8th of that month, in the same vault with his brother, Sir Francis Vere, in Westminster Abbey, with much military pomp, the train-bands attending the corpse in great numbers, besides most of the Nobility in town; and the ordnance of the Tower all going off at the time of his interment (pp). All which honours were judged to be due to a person, who had been Governor of the Briel, General of the English Forces in the Netherlands, Master of the Ordnance in England, and had reflected an honour to each Post by his distinguished fidelity, and superior abilities. He lies without any monumental inscription, or elogium over him. But this has been, in some measure, supplied by the general display of his worth in several writings. Among these, we shall take notice of the two following. First, Dr Thomas Fuller, who was acquainted with his Lordship, has given this short character of him: 'Horace Lord Vere had more meekness, and as much valour, as his brother; so pious, that he first made his peace with God, before he went out to war with man. Of an excellent temper, it being true of him what is said of the Caspian Sea, that it doth never ebb nor flow, observing a constant tenour, neither elated with good success, nor depressed with the reverse of fortune. Had one seen him returning from a victory, he would, by his silence, have suspected that he had lost the day; and had he beheld him in a retreat, he would have collected him a Conqueror by the cheerfulness of his spirit. No doubt but he was well prepared for death, seeing such was his vigilancy, that never any enemy surprized him in his quarters. Sir Francis, the elder brother, was more feared, Sir Horace more loved by the soldiers. Both lived in war, much honoured, and died in peace, much lamented (qq).' Dr William Dillingham also, who published the Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, has given the following account of the Lord Vere: 'He was in courage equal to his brother, and in hazards undivided: for as he must be allowed a great share in the actions recorded by his brother, so were his own services afterwards, when General of the English, so eminent and considerable, that they might have furnished another Commentary, had not his own exceeding modesty proved a step-mother to his deserved praises. He was a religious, wise, and valiant Commander, and (which quartered him in the bosom of the Prince of Orange) he was successful in his enterprizes; sometimes to the admiration both of friends and enemies. When he took Shays, there was one strong-hold first to be taken, which he found some difficulty to overcome; and that was in the opinion of his friends an impossible enterprize. And for his enemies, Spinola himself did him, in his life-time, the right to bear witness of his gallant retreat with four thousand men from between his very fingers, when with three times that number he had grasped up the Prince [Maurice] against the sea-shore. And as the proficiency of the scholars was ever accounted a good argument of their Master's ability, I shall (with their leaves) give you a list of some of his: Henry Earl of Oxford, Thomas Lord Fairfax, Sir Edward Vere Lieutenant Colonel, Sir Simon Harcourt Serjeant Major, Sir Thomas Dutton, Sir Henry Peyton, Sir John Burroughs, Sir Thomas Gates, Sir John Conyers, Sir Thomas Gale, Sir William Lovelace, Sir Robert Carey, Sir Jacob Ashley, Sir Thomas Conway, Sir John Burlacy, Sir Thomas Winne, Sir Gerard Herbert, Sir Edward Harwood, and Sir Mi- (ll) Rushworth, ubi supra, p. 649.

(mm) Funeral Certificates MS. I. 8. fol. 20 and 45. Offic. Armor.

(nn) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. 1. p. 805.

(oo) Letter of James Howel, dated Westminster, May 14, 1635, to the Lord Deputy Wentworth, in the Earl of Strafford's Letters, Vol. 1. p. 423.

(pp) Mr Garrard's Letter to the same, dated May 19, 1635. Ibid. p. 417. where there is also another letter in p. 426, 427, to him from the Earl of Arundel, Earl Marshal, dated from Arundel-house, May 3, 1635, referring the Deputy to Sir Thomas Wharton for an account of Lord Vere's sudden death of an apoplexy the day before.

(qq) Fuller's Worthies of Eng. p. 331.

[O] He frequently went over to the Netherlands.] John Lord Haughton, (afterwards the second Earl of Clare) who had married his eldest daughter, in a letter, dated May 19, 1627, to his brother-in-law, Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, writes thus: 'Lord Vere's occasions will call him into the Low-Countries before he should go over, his wife desiring to lie in here, and that her mother, Lady Vere, would be with her (47).' His Lordship also, in another letter from the Hague, December 7, O. S. that year, informs Sir Thomas Wentworth, 'that he, with his Lady, were then there with the Lord Vere, Lady Vere going over with them (48).'

(47) Strafford's letters, Vol. 1. p. 37.

(48) Id. p. 45.

(rr) Preface to the Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, published in 1657. 4to.

(ss) Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. p. 141. and Vol. VI. p. 699. 8vo.

(tt) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. V. p. 37. 8vo.

chael Everard. Besides divers others, whose effigies do at once, both guard, and adorn Kirby-ball in Essex, where the truly religious and honourable the Lady Vere doth still survive, kept alive thus long by special Providence, that the present age might more than read and remember what was true godliness in eighty-eight (rr). The Earl of Clarendon also recites, that Edward Lord Conway was bred up a soldier in several commands, under the particular care of the Lord Vere, whose nephew he was. And that Monk Duke of Albemarle had the reputation of a good field-officer, when he was in the Lord Vere's regiment in Holland (ss). In his last Will having appointed his body to be buried where it shall please God, he ratifies and confirms several conveyances by deeds of trust of the Monastery of Hailes in the County of Gloucester, and several Manors, Lordships, Farms, &c. lying in the said County [P], and then proceeds in these terms: 'For it is my will and meaning, that the said Monastery of Hailes, with the premises, &c. shall be in the power of my said most loving wife, for her freely to dispose of as she shall think fit, either by sale or otherwise, for her own use and benefit, at her pleasure.' He also bequeaths to the said Dame Mary, his wife, all his goods, chattels, &c. and all monies, debts, &c. owing to him by any person or persons in England or elsewhere, and appoints her full and sole Executrix. Accordingly Administration was granted, May 6, 1635, to the Right Honourable Mary Lady Vere, his Relict and Executrix; who lived to be very aged. After the death of the Countess of Dorset, who had the tuition of the three youngest children of King Charles I; viz. the Duke of York, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Princess Elizabeth, and died in May, 1645, the Parliament, that they might be sure to keep them in their power, put them into the Custody of the Lady Vere, an old Lady much in their favour, but not at all ambitious of that charge, though there was a competent allowance assigned for their support (tt). His Lordship makes no mention in his will of any of his children; but though he left no heir male to bear his name, yet his blood is distributed in the veins of many noble families, leaving issue by his said Lady, third daughter of Sir John Tracey of Toddington, in the County of Gloucester, Knight [Q], five daughters his coheirs (uu).

[P] Deeds in trust relating to the monastery of Hailes, &c.] For the satisfaction of such as are curious in these matters, we shall here insert the very words of the will relating to these deeds, as follows: 'First, whereas all that the house, site, &c. of the monastery of Hailes in the county of Gloucester, and several manors, lordships, farms, &c. lying in the said county, are by one pair of indentures tripartite, dated the 17th of May, in 8 Car. I. between myself and dame Mary, my loving wife, on the first part; and Laurence Wright, Esq; Doctor of physick, on the second part; and my kind loving friends, Richard Winwood, of Dutton Park in the county of Buckingham, Esq; John Packer, of the city of Westminster, Esq; Walter James, of the said city, Esq; and William Perkins, of the city of London, merchant, on the third part; have conveyed unto the said Richard Winwood, Walter James, John Packer, and William Perkins, for a term of years not yet expired, to the uses, trust, &c. declared in one pair of indentures, dated October 20, now last past, before the date of these presents, made between myself and dame Mary, my wife, on the one part; and the said Richard Winwood, Walter James, John Packer, and William Perkin, on the other part; the said monastery of Hailes, and other the premises, &c. Also by one other pair of indentures, dated December 25. 8 Car. I. made between William Williams, Robert Michel, Walter Markes, and Robert March, citizens of London, on the one part; and my much respected friends, Sir Robert Harley of Brampton-castle, alias Brampton-Brian, in the county of Hereford, Knight of the honourable order of the Bath, Sir Robert Tracey, of Fairford in the county of Gloucester, Knt. and Richard Moor, of Okingham in the county of Berks, Gent. on the other part; have conveyed the premises aforesaid unto the said Sir Robert Harley, Sir Robert Tracey, and Richard Moor, for another term of years, not yet expired, to the uses, &c. of one pair of indentures, dated October 20, now last past, made between the said Sir Robert Harley, Sir Robert Tracey, and Richard Moor, on the one part; and myself and the said dame Mary, my wife, on the other part, &c. I, the said Horace Lord Vere, do, by this my last Will and Testament, ratify and confirm the said several &c. and every of them; and my desire and request, unto all and every my said Friends, whom I have trusted as aforesaid, is, that they would respectively perform, fulfil, and execute, the Trust by me in them respectively reposed, &c. (49).'

[Q] Daughter of Sir John Tracey of Tedington in com. Glam. Knt.] This family, which is very ancient and honourable, took the surname of Tracey from a maternal Ancestor, descended from the Traceys, Barons of Barn- staple in Devonshire, who, ann. 1066, accompanied the Conqueror in his expedition to England, and were denominated from the town of Traci in Normandy. The honour and barony of Barnstaple (50) was the gift of King Stephen to Henry de Traci. By paternal descent, the family derives from the royal blood of the Saxon kings, namely from Goda, youngest daughter to King Ethelred (son of King Edgar) sister to Edward the Confessor, and Walter de Maunt, or de Maige, a noble Norman, whose son Ralph was Earl of Hereford in the reign of his uncle the Confessor, but was deprived of it by the Conqueror; and his son Harold, at the time of the general survey, possessing several Lordships, and fixing his chief residence at Sudeley, was Lord thereof, and of Todington in the county of Gloucester, and by his wife Maud, daughter to Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, left two sons; Ralph, Baron of Sudeley, progenitor of the Sudeleys, Barons of Sudeley, whose heirs male failed in John Lord Sudely, temp. Edw. III. (51); William, the younger son, was named Fair, from his mother (an usual thing in that age). This William lived in the reign of Henry V. and held lands of his brother Ralph by the service of one Knight's fee, which probably was the manor of Todington; for it appears, by Domesday-book, that it was held by the Lord Sudeley, of the manor of Sudeley, and temp. Edw. I. the Traceys are expressly said to be possessed of it; and this William (52); in a deed perfected by Otwel, Lord of Sudeley, son and heir of the said Ralph, is called his Uncle (53). This William's great great grandson Henry had a daughter Margery, married to John Archer of Umberstade in Warwickshire, ancestor to the present Lord Archer, Baron of Umberstade. From this Henry descended, in the tenth generation, Sir William Tracey of Todington, Knt. called the Martyr, who was Sheriff of his county in 1513, (5 H. VIII.) and was a person of distinguished parts and sound learning, and is memorable for being one of the first that embraced the reformed religion in England, as appears by his last will, dated in 1530 (22 H. VIII.) The preamble of which runs thus: 'In the name of God, Amen. I William Tracey of Todington, in the county of Gloucester, Esq; make my testament and last will, as hereafter followeth: First, and before other things, I commit myself to God and to his mercy, believing, without any doubt, or mistrust, that, by his Grace, and the merits of Jesus Christ, and by the virtue of his passion and resurrection, I have and shall have remission of all my sins, and resurrection of body and soul, according as it is written, I believe that my Redeemer liveth, and that at the last day I shall rise out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see my Saviour. This my hope is laid up in my bosom; and, touching the wealth of my soul, the faith that I have taken and (uu) MS. I. 8. fol. 45, in Offic. Armor.

I. Eli-

(50) It had formerly belonged to Jahel the son of Alured de Totneis.

(51) The title was conveyed by his eldest sister, Joan, to the family of her husband, Sir William Butler, of the family of Wenme, who were thereupon summoned Peers of England, after whose extinction it hath also given the title of Baron, from a Mary, 1554, to the family of his Grace the duke of Chandos.

(52) He or some of his posterity differed their coat-armour from the elder house, by adding an escallop fable in the chief point between the two Bendlets Ruby, in a field Topaz.

(53) Fuller, in his Worthies, makes him one of the four assassins of Tbo. à Becket, A.B.C. but he hath mistaken him for his contemporary, Sir William Traci, of Wollacomb in Devonshire, who lies buried there. And this mistake was probably occasioned by Sir William Traci of Todington's removal, in his old age, into that country, where he had large possessions, and, dying there about ann. 1180, he is supposed to be buried in the church of Mart.

(49) Ex Regist. Sadler, Qu. 450, in Cur. Prerog. Cant.

1. Elizabeth, born abroad, and naturalized by Act of Parliament in 21 Jac. I, married to the Right Honourable John Holes, second Earl of Clare, an account of whose issue by her, has been already given (xxx).

(xxx) In the article of John Holes, the first Earl of Clare.

2. Mary, second daughter of the said Horace Lord Vere, was also born in the Netherlands, and naturalized with her sister by Act of Parliament, 21 Jac. I. She was first married to Sir Roger Townshend of East-Raynham, in the County of Norfolk, Bart, who departed this life on the 1st of January, 1636, and had issue by her Sir Roger Townshend, Bart, Horace, second son, Mary, Jane, Anne, Elizabeth, and Vere. Sir Roger Townshend dying in his minority, was succeeded in title and estate by Sir Horatio Townshend, who became the first Lord Viscount Townshend, and father of Charles Lord Viscount Townshend, Principal Secretary of State to King George I. and II.; and by his first wife Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of Thomas Lord Pelham (father of his Grace Thomas the present Duke of Newcastle by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter to Sir William Jones) left issue Charles, now [1762] Lord Viscount Townshend. The said Mary Lady Townshend, after the death of Sir Roger Townshend the first of January, 1736, entered into a second marriage with Mildmay Fane Earl of Westmorland, by whom she was mother of Vere Fane Earl of Westmorland, and four daughters, whereof Mary was first married to Francis Palmer, son and heir to Sir Bryan Palmer of Astwell in the County of Rutland, Knight; and secondly, to John Cecil Earl of Exeter. Another daughter, named Catharine, was wedded to Conyers Darcy Earl of Helderness. Vere Earl of Westmorland, was father of Vere Earl of Westmorland, Thomas Earl of Westmorland, and John, now [1762] Earl of Westmorland, and Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

Catharine, third daughter of Lord Vere, was married to Oliver St John, son and heir of Sir John St John of Lidiard Tregose, in the County of Wilts, Knight and Baronet, who had issue by her several sons, whereof Henry, the youngest, left issue a daughter, Anne, married to Anthony Bowyer, of Camberwell in the County of Surrey, Esq; and the rest died without issue, except Sir Walter St John, the sixth son, who died July 3, 1708, and had issue

‘rehears’d is sufficient, as I suppose, without any other man’s works or merits. My ground and belief is, that there is but one God, and one Mediator between God and Man, which is Jesus Christ; so that I accept none in heaven or in earth to be Mediator between me and God, but only Jesus Christ; all others to be but as Petitioners in receiving of Grace, but none able to give influence of Grace; and therefore will I bestow no part of my goods for that intent, that any man shall say or do to help my soul; for therein I trust only to the promises of Christ: He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned. As touching the burying of my body, it availeth me not whatsoever be done thereto; for St Augustine saith, De cura agenda pro mortuis, that the funeral pomps are rather the solace of them that live, than the wealth and comfort of them that are dead; and therefore I remit it wholly to the discretion of my Executors.—And touching the distribution of my temporal goods, my purpose is, by the grace of God, to bestow them to be accepted as the fruits of faith; so that I do not suppose that my merit shall be by the good bestowing of them, but my merit is the faith of Jesus Christ only, by whom such works are good, according to the words of our Lord, I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, &c. and it followeth, That ye have done to the least of my brethren, ye have done it to me. And ever we should consider that true saying, That a good work maketh not a good man, but a good man maketh a good work; for faith maketh a man both good and righteous: for a righteous man liveth by faith; and whatsoever springeth not of faith is sin.’

This will was condemned as heretical in the Bishop of London’s court, and an order on that account issued to Parker, Chancellor of Worcester, to raise his body, according to the law of the church: The Chancellor, too officiously burning the corpse, was, two years afterwards, sued by the heirs of Sir William, fined 400*l.* and turned out of his Chancellorship. The Martyr’s second son, Richard, had, by his father’s gift, the manor of Stanway in the county of Gloucester, and part of the possessions of the Abbey of Tewkesbury, which Abbey was granted to him by the crown upon the dissolution of the monasteries. He was well educated, and wrote several treatises in defence of his father’s faith very learnedly and judiciously; among which was that most memorable one, intitled Preparations to the Cross, written experimentally (say the Decem Scriptorum) having suffered much in his estate for his father’s reputed heretical will. He also wrote prophetically, in 1550, two or three years before Queen Mary’s reign, another treatise to teach one to die, which was annexed to the former, when reprinted, and falsely ascribed by the Editor to John Fitch; being one of the three found in the belly of a cod, brought, in 1626, to be sold in the market of Cambridge, wrapped in canvas (54): on which occasion the wits of that University diverted themselves. This Richard’s eldest son, Paul, was created a Baronet, June 24, 1664, being the thirtieth from the institution of that order; but the title became extinct in 1677, in John, the fifth Baronet, who, dying without issue, left the manor of Stanway, with all his estate, to Ferdinando Tracey, second son of John Viscount Tracey.

The Martyr’s eldest son, William, succeeded at Todington, and was father of John (or Henry) who married Elizabeth, second daughter to John, the first Lord Chandos of Sudeley. John’s grand-daughter, Mary, the subject of this remark, was born May 18, 1581, three days after which died her mother, Anne, daughter to Sir Thomas Throckmorton, of Corsecourt, Knt. which family had enriched themselves by the marriage of Eleanor, sister to the great grandmother of the Martyr. Mary was married first, when nineteen years of age, to Mr William Hoby, by whom she had two sons, who both died unmarried; and secondly to Sir Horatio Vere, Baron of Tilbury, one of the greatest generals of his age, and dying December 25, 1671, was buried, January 10, at Castle-Heveningham in Essex, having lived to see her eldest brother, Sir John Tracey, advanced, January 12, 1642, to the dignity of Viscount Tracey of Rathcoole in Ireland, whose grandson, John, the third Viscount, had, by his second wife, Dorothy, daughter to Thomas Cox, of Castleditch in Hertfordshire, Esq; a son, Robert Tracey, Esq; who, being bred to the law, went out Serjeant in that profession, November 6, 1700, having, October 3, 1699, been, by King William, deservedly made one of the Justices of the King’s-bench, which he surrendered November 13, 1700, and was advanced to the same station in the court of Common-pleas, being also, by Queen Anne, September 25, 1710, appointed, with Sir Thomas Trevor and Baron Serape, Commissioner of the great Seal of England, until it was delivered, October 17, to Sir Simon Harcourt; and again, April 15, 1718, with Sir John Pratt and Sir James Montague, Baron of the Exchequer, upon the resignation of Lord Chancellor Cowper. His ill state of health obliging him to quit his employment, October 26, 1726, his Majesty, King George I. in recompence of his services, settled on him 1000*l.* a year for life. He married Anne, eldest daughter to William Dowdesley, of Pool-court in Worcestershire, Esq; and his grandson, named Dowdeswell, is his heir. The Judge had also two daughters, the younger of which, Dorothy, was married, April 10, 1725, to John Pratt, Esq; eldest son of Sir John Pratt, Chief Justice of the King’s-bench (55), whose younger son, now Sir Charles Pratt, was knighted and raised from the post of Attorney-general to that of Chief Justice of the Court of Common-pleas, December 28, 1761.

(54) Which probably had been devoured by that voracious fish, out of the pocket of some ship-wrecked Seaman. One of the scholars in his verses had this distich: If Fishes thus do bring us books, then we May hope to equal Eodley’s library.

(55) Lodge’s peerage of Ireland, under the article of Viscount Tracey of Rathcoole.

(xx) See Lord Bolingbroke's article.

Sir Henry St John, who was created Lord Viscount St John by King George the First, and had issue John Lord Viscount St John, father of Frederick, now Lord Viscount St John, who, on the decease of his uncle, the famous Henry Viscount Bolingbroke, and Baron of Lidiard Fregose, succeeded to those titles, together with the seat and manor of Baterfea, and a large estate (xx). The said Catharine was, secondly, married to John Lord Paulet, who had issue by her John Lord Paulet, father of John, created Earl Paulet, by the late Queen Anne. He had issue John, now Earl Paulet.

Anne, the fourth daughter of the Lord Vere, was married to Thomas Lord Fairfax of Cameron in Scotland, who was General of the Parliament Army against King Charles I. A remarkable instance of this Lady's spirit and loyalty at his Majesty's trial, has been already mentioned, as related by Lord Clarendon.

Dorothy, the Baron of Tilbury's fifth and youngest daughter, was married to John Wolstenholm, Esq; son and heir of Sir John Wolstenholm of Nostel, in the County of York, and of Fourtree-ball in Enfield, in the County of Middlesex, Bart; but died without issue by him.

The Lord Vere was evidently determined in the choice of Tilbury for his title, from the consideration of that Manor's having been possessed by his Ancestors almost from the first settling of the Vere family in England (yy). And though the patent declares the Barony to be the just reward (as it really was) of his personal merit, yet he was not even then without some view of succeeding to the Earldom of Oxford, and soon after became heir apparent to it [R]. We shall therefore, agreeably to the plan of this work (zz), give a full account of that noble family in a distinct article: and the rather, because the title of the Earl of Oxford having been many years extinct in the name of Vere, and transferred to another (*), the many renowned actions of that most illustrious family, which produced so many heroes to the great honour of our country, may be otherwise in some danger of sinking into oblivion.

(yy) See the ensuing article.

(zz) See the families of Beauchamp, Beaufort, Bertie, Butler, Campbell, Carew, Dudley, Grant, &c.

(*) Viz. that of Harley.

[R] He became heir apparent to it.] Upon the death of Hugh Vere, the eighteenth Earl of Oxford, without male issue, in 1625, there arose a great dispute about the descent of the title, which was claimed by Robert (Bertie) Lord Willoughby of Eresby, in right of his mother, Mary, daughter of John de Vere, sixteenth Earl of Oxford, against Robert Vere, great grandson of John de Vere, the fifth Earl of Oxford. The Cause being brought before the House of Peers in 2 Car. I. each Claimant, as usual, drew up a state of his case for the use of their Lordships: And the case of Robert Vere was as follows.

The Earldom of Oxford was granted by King Henry II. by his letters patent, to Aubrey Vere and his heirs; and the same Earldom descended from heir male to heir male unto Robert Vere, Duke of Ireland and Earl of Oxford, which Robert was attainted of high-treason by act of parliament, ann. 11 Rich. II. And ann. 16 Rich. II. in parliament, it was certified, that, before the said attainer, certain Lands and Tenements, which were belonging to the said Robert Vere, were intailed by fine, and by force of the said intail ought to descend to Sir Aubrey Vere, uncle and heir to the said Robert. Now the King, by the assent of the Parliament, granted to the said Sir Aubrey Vere livery of all the lands and tenements to him soe intailed by fine as aforesaid. And further, whereas the said Aubrey had yet shewed nothing in special that the name and estate of the Earle of Oxford are to him intailed; notwithstanding the King, having consideration to the good service which the said Aubrey had done to him and his noble father, and howe the ancestors of the said Aubrey had bine Earles of Oxford a long time, and being willing that the estate and name of the Earle of Oxford, although they were forfeited, should not cease, but should be continued in time to come to the honour of the King and his realm, hath now of his special Grace restored, given, and granted, by assent of Parliament, to the said Sir Aubrey, the Name, Title, and Honour of Earle of Oxford, to have the same Title, Estate, and Honour to the said Aubrey, and his heirs male for ever; and him made Earle of Oxford in full parliament; and presently the said Earle did his homage to the King, and after was put and set in his place with the Peeres of Parliament.

After which, ann. 21 R. II. the said Act of Parliament, ann. 11 R. II. and all the dependancies thereupon, was repealed and made voyde.

After which, ann. 1. H. IV. the said Act of Parliament, ann. 21 R. II. was repealed and made voyde.

And after the Act of Parliament, ann. 1. H. IV. was repealed and made voyde by Parliament, ann. 3 and 4 Edw. IV.

And in ann. 14 Edw. IV. the Earle of Oxford and twoe of his sonnes were attainted of treason by Parliament.

And in ann. 1 H. VII. that Act was repealed and made voyde.

Aubrey Vere, Earle of Oxford, ann. 16 R. II. had issue Richard Vere, his son and heir, and died; Richard Vere, Earle of Oxford, had issue John, his eldest sonne, and Robert his youngest sonne; the grandchild and heire male of the bodie of John, his eldest sonne, died ann. 18 H. VIII. without heire male of his bodie, or any heire male of the body of John, the eldest sonne of Richard, having three sisters att his death, which were his heirs and heirs general to John, Earle of Oxford, eldest sonne of Richard.

John Vere, grandchild of Robert Vere, second sonne of Richard, was next heir male, and had the Earldome by virtue of the Act of Parliament of Richard II. without any new creation; and soe it was found by office, ann. 18 H. VIII. after the death of John Vere, Earle of Oxford, his couzen.

Ann. 23 H. VIII. the three daughters, sisters and heirs of John, Earle of Oxford, deceased, clayme the landes of the Earldome, but not the Honor; and they of the one parte, and John, Earle of Oxford, couzen and heir male to their brother, submitted themselves to the award of King Henry VIII. and an award was made, which was confirmed by Parliament.

The said John, Earle of Oxford, died (*), having issue John his eldest sonne, Aubrey his second sonne, and Jeffery his youngest; John, the eldest son, had issue by his first wife (a Nevile) Catharine, married to the Lord Windsor, who pretends not; and by his second wife had Edward, Earle of Oxford, and Lady Mary his daughter, and died; Edward, Earle of Oxford, had issue Henry, Earle of Oxford, by one Venter; and the Lady Derby, the Lady Montgomery, and the Lady Berkshire, by his first wife, who pretends not, and died; Henry, Earle of Oxford, his sonne, died without issue. The said Aubrey, son of John, had issue Hughe Vere, his only sonne, and died. Hughe Vere had issue Robert Vere, his only sonne, now Earl of Oxford. And Jeffery had issue Horace, now Lord Vere, and next heir male to Robert. The Lady Mary had issue Robert, Lord Willoughby, her sonne and heir, and died.

In this case, Robert Vere, now Earle of Oxford (56), sonne of Hugh Vere, and after him Horace, Lord Vere, clayme the Earldom as next heire male of the bodie of Aubrey Vere, which was Earle of Oxford, ann. 16 R. II. by virtue of the said Act of Parliament of ann. 16 R. II. which is no waye repealed, but is in force.

And thence it follows, that Horace, Lord Vere of Tilbury's male issue, had he left any, would have succeeded to the Earldom of Oxford.

(*) This John, thus coming to the honor, was greatgrandfather to the now Earle of Oxford, and to the Lord Willoughby, who now pretends as heire general, and goeth about to overthrowe the title from which himself claims, wherein is a plain contradiction.

(56) i. e. the right, as he alleges; and the title was adjudged to him by the Peers, though not the title of Lord Bolebeck, Sanford and Badlesmere.

VERE, Earls of Oxford. This noble and ancient family, the first of which, mentioned in our records, came into England with William, stiled the Conqueror (a), derives its descent much earlier. Leland, the famous Antiquary, carried it up as high as to the Patriarch NOAH [A], from whom he deduces the pedigree down to Alberic de Vere, the noble Earl, who, having married Beatrix, sister to the Conqueror, and attending him into England, was greatly favoured by that Monarch. In whose reign we find him possessed of Chenefiton (now wrote Kensington) in com. Middlesex, Geling and Emingford in com. Huntingdon. As also of nine Lordships in the county of Suffolk, and fourteen in the county of Essex (b), whereof Colne, Heningham, and Benetly, were part; which continued in his posterity till the last century. The Conqueror gave him likewise the whole inheritance of a great man in the Saxons days, called Walsine: in consequence whereof he took from the Monks of Ramsay what Walsine had before the Norman conquest, and left it to his own posterity (c). However he bore a great respect to the Monks of Abingdon in Berkshire, to whom he gave the church of St Andrew, at Colne in Essex, with the land of Randulph the Priest, the tythes of the whole Lordship, Town, and Park, and of all that was tytheable there, and 120 acres of the demesnes, the Spinney beyond the Park, as also the Park itself, Coleford mill, Mees pasture beyond Coleford bridge, one acre and a rood in Brademede, together with their meadow-land in Kinbrane and Linland, the woods of Dodespellesho and Littlebar, with twenty acres of land; the lands of Goda, Edwin the Brewer, and of Alymeri the Long; also the land called Waluricmucche, the church of Beauchamp, together with three acres of meadow, and the whole tythes of the said town. The church of Duurecourt, and the tythes there; also of the fishery, with pasture for 100 sheep in the marsh. The churches of Campis and Benetlei; the tythes of the demesnes of Rodings-Grimbald, together with that church, and also Colne-Miblanc church, with every thing thereunto belonging, in the manors of Haingham, Laoreham, Aldeham, and Roinges, with two parts of all the tythes, and the moiety of the tythes of the demesnes in Walde and Wadobo; the third part of the tythes of Haingham, together with that mill, 10d. land at Burgate, 3s. at Cripping, and 2s. 8d. which Hargar pays for his land in Roinges, together with a messuage in Colchester. Whereupon Colne afore said was made a cell to that great Abbey of Abingdon; and in the latter part of his life he took a religious habit, and was shorn a Monk in the said Abbey, to which he had been so large a benefactor (d); and there lies buried, together with William, one of his younger sons [B]. This Alberic the first had issue by Beatrice, his wife, four sons, Geffery, Alberic, Roger, Robert, whereof Geffery dying before his father, he was succeeded by

(a) Stowe's Annals, p. 106, from the Roll of Battle-abbey, where Alberic's name appears.

(b) Domesday-book penes Thef. & Camer. Scacc.

(c) Regist. de Ramsay, penes H. Spelman, Equ. aur.

(d) Monast. Anglic. Vol. I. p. 436, 437, 438.

(e) Id. Vol. I. p. 436. n. 60.

Alberic de Vere, the second of that name, who confirmed all the grants made by his father to the Monks of Abingdon (e), and was in such high esteem with Henry I., that in the beginning of his reign he made him Lord Great Chamberlain of England, to hold the said office in fee to him and his heirs, with dignities and liberties thereto belonging, as honourably as Robert Malet (f),

[A] Leland carries the family up to Noah.] The pedigree is in this form.

Ex libello Genealogix comitum Oxoniensium.

Repetit genus a Noe. Deinde a Tideo Græco. Insuper a Vero (1) nobili Romano. Postremo à Milone comite de Genney alias Gifney. Milo, Duke of Aungiers, and Duke and Leader of great Charles's hoste and army, married Beribelle, sister of great Charles. Hic sinit superstes, A. D. 800.

1. Milo had to his first sunne Rothuland or Rouland, Erle Palatine, Erle of Maunce and Bleuys, that was slaine of the Paganes at Rumidevale. 2. He had also Baldewine de Ver, afterwards Duke of Maunce. 3. He had also Milo de Ver, to whom, as to the youngest brother and his nephew, King Charles gave the Erldom of Genney or Gifney, Avelina, daughter of the Erle of Nautes, wif to Milo de Ver the sun. Nicasius de Ver, Erle of Genney, sunne to yonge Milo, Erle of Genney. This Nicasius had to wife Agathe, the daughter of the Erle of Champain. Of Nicasius cam Otho de Vere, Erle of Genney, married to Constance, daughter to the Lord of Charters. Of Otho cam Amelius de Ver, Erle of Genney: Helena, daughter to the Erle of Bloys, tooke to husband Amelius. Gallus de Ver, Erle of Genney; Gerthrudis, daughter of the Erle of Cleremont, wif to Gallus. Manasse de Ver, Erle of Genney; Petronilla, daughter of the Erle of Boleine, wif to Manasse de Ver. Alphonsus de Ver, Erle of Genney; Katarine, his wife, daughter to Arnalde, Erle of Flaundes. Albery de Ver, Erle of Genney; Beatrice, his wife, siter to King William, Conqueror.

The said Alberic is the noble Erle who came over with the Conqueror, and was rewarded by him with the Lordships mentioned above. Yet of the name of Alberic there was an Earl in Edward the Confessor's time, possessed of six Lordships in com. Warwick, fourteen in Leicester, six in Northampton, two in Oxford, and ten in Wiltshire (2). But this Alberic is stiled Albericus Comes in Domesday-book, has not there the name of de Vere, and may be of another family (3). Waleber, Bishop of Durham, purchased the Earldom of Northumberland of King William the Conqueror, in the eleventh year of his reign, anno 1076, and was slain in 1079 (4); upon which the King gave the Earldom of Northumberland to Alberic, who probably was the same Alberic Comes; who, going with the King into Normandy, married there a widow, named Græcia, which gave an accomplishment to a prophecy, That he should possess Græcia; whereupon he foolishly went thither, to make himself King of that country, but was expelled by the Grecians. And going on that expedition, King William the Conqueror gave the Earldom of Northumberland to Robert de Mowbray (5).

[B] He lies buried there, with William, a younger son.] It is said that a monument was erected for him, with the effigies of him and his wife, and the following epitaph:

Cedunt e vita votis animisque cupita,
Barbarus et scita, gentilis & Israelita.
Has pariter metas habet omnis sexus et ætas:
En puer, en senior, pater alter, filius alter
Legem, fortunam, terram, venire, sub unam:
Non Juveni tote quas epotavit Athene
Non vetulo tote vires vel opes valuere.
Sed valere fides, et prælia quæ memoramus
Ut valeant valeant per sæcula cuncta, precamur.

We are indebted for this to Mr Weever, who likewise says he had another epitaph for the said Aubrey and Beatrice, mentioned in the book of Colne Priory, to be engraven on their monuments in these English words:

Here lyeth Aubrey de Veer, the first Earl of Guines, the sonne of Alphonsus de Veer: The which Aubrey was the Founder of this place, and Beatrix, his wife, siter of King William the Conqueror (6).

The said Alberic and his wife Beatrix did, for the health of the soul of Geffery, their first born son, give to the Monks of Abingdon the church of Kensington, in com. Middlesex, with two hides, 240 acres, and a curcate of land there, which Henry I. afterwards confirmed. He also gave, to the same Monks, his house in Westminster-street, London (7).

(4) Simeon Duneim, inter decem Script. p. 205.

(5) Knighton, p. 2409.

(6) Weever's Fun. mon. p. 613, 614.

(7) Monast. Anglic. Vol. I. p. 106 and 437, where it is said they had also a daughter, Rose or Rohesia, wife of Geoffrey de Mandevill, Earl of Essex; but this is probably a mistake. See rem. []

f) Malet was disinherited and banished in H. I. for deserting the King, and adhering to Robert Curthoise. Alberic Vitalis, 104. c. and 805. c.

1) Some of our Antiquaries derive the name from Vere, a town in Zealand. Vincent on Brook, p. 396. Weever's Funeral monuments, p. 613.

2) As he possessed some of these Lordships in the Confessor's time, he was probably then in England. Domesday-book. 3) Alberic II, son of Alberic senior, is not stiled Earl, though Henry I. made him Lord Great Chamberlain and Chief Justice of England; therefore it is not to be supposed there could be any deprivation or loss of honour.

(Lord of the honour of Eye in Suffolk) or any other before or after him, held the same, with such liveries and lodgings of his Court as belonged to that office (g). This Alberic was also Justice of all England in that King's reign (h). In the fourth of King Stephen he suppressed an insurrection of some Bishops at Winchester [C]. And in the fifth of Stephen (with Richard Basset, then Justice of England) he executed the office of Sheriff for the counties of Surrey, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Essex, Hartford, Northampton, Leicester, Norfolk, Suffolk, Buckingham, and Bedford (i); which office was then of great power and trust. But before the end of that year, in the contests between the King and Maud the Empress, he was killed at London (k). He gave to the Monks of Thorney, in com. Cantab. certain rents in Islep, amounting to 6l. 10s. per annum (l). By his wife Adeliza, daughter to Gilbert, Earl of Clare (m), he had issue three daughters and five sons: 1. Alberic, his heir; 2. — a Canon of St Ositb's, at Chick in Essex; 3. Robert; 4. Geffery [D]; 5. William. The three daughters were, Robesia, wife of Pagan de Beauchamp, and secondly of Geffery Mandevil [E]; 2. Adeliza, wife of Henry de Essex, Lord of Ralegh (n); 5. Juliana, wife of Hugh Bigot, first Earl of Norfolk (o). Their mother Adeliza gave to the Monks of St Ositb or Chick in Essex, lands of 7l. per annum value, lying in Dalbam, Tunstal, and Denbam, being part of her frank marriage, which was confirmed by her son,

Alberic the Third (p), who in his father's life-time was at the conquest of the cities of Nique [Nice], Antioch, and Jerusalem, in the company of Sir Robert Curtoise (q), Duke of Normandy [F]; and in a siege of Antioch, in a battle against Solyman, commander of the Turkish

[C] He suppressed an insurrection &c. King Stephen having surprized divers great persons, and forced them to deliver up those castles they then held, and amongst them Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, being compelled to deliver up Shireburn, Devises, and Malsbury, thereupon the other Bishops called a council at Winchester, 4 Kal. Sept. to which they summoned the King, who thereupon, say some, sent this Alberic to seize upon that assembly (8); but others, with greater probability, tell us, he was only sent to them with the King's answer, being learned in the laws; and by his speeches and arguments he put a stop to the proceedings of the Council, and caused them to break up without any conclusion, telling them, among other particulars, that the King had been informed they were sending some persons to Rome against him; but he charged them to forbear that presumption, lest the King should prevent their return (9).

[D] His sons, Robert and Geffery. Of these, Robert, in 12 H. II, on levying the aid for marrying the King's daughter, certified, that he then held half a Knight's fee in com. Northampton (10). And he also held the Lordship of Turwell, in the same county, of the Monks of Thorney, in fee-farm, as his father did (11). Geffery and William were his other sons, who are mentioned in the grant of Maud, the Empress, to their brother Alberic. Geffery was Sheriff of Shropshire from 11 H. II. to the end of the 16th of that reign (12). Also in 12 H. II, upon levying the aid for marrying the King's daughter, he then resided in com. Salop, and certified his Knights fees to be nine de veteri feoffamento, and three de novo (13). What posterity he had, if any, is not known; but, in 6 Rich. I, William de Boterel paid 9l. for the scutage of his Barony (14).

[E] A daughter, Robesia, &c. Our Antiquaries differ in their judgments whose daughter she was, whether of Alberic the first or second. Sir W. Dugdale, who mentions her (as aforesaid) to be the daughter of the said Alberic, yet, in his account of Pagan de Beauchamp, he recites her marriage with him, and of her being the widow of Geoffry Mandevil, Earl of Essex, and that she was daughter of the second Alberic (15). Sir William Seagar, Garter, in his collection of the Baronage in manuscript, makes her to be the daughter of Alberic first mentioned, and to be first married to Pagan de Beauchamp, and secondly to Geoffry Mandevil, Earl of Essex. Vincent asserts (16), that she was daughter of Alberic 2d; also that she was married to Pagan de Beauchamp: And with him Weever (17) and others concur. Nicholas Jekyl Esq; a laborious Antiquary, contemporary with Selden and Camden, and of their society, has left in manuscript the pedigrees of the Barons; and in both families, of Beauchamp and Mandevil, mentions the said Robesia to be daughter of Alberic 2d, and that she died 1 Kal. Oct. 1160; yet there is no account when Pagan de Beauchamp died; but her son, by him, Simon de Beauchamp, was Steward to King Stephen (18), and died before 9 John, when William, his son and heir, was of full age, and had livery of his lands (19): whereby it may be concluded, that she had, for her first husband, Pagan de Beauchamp, son of Hugh de Beauchamp, who came in with the Conqueror; which agrees in time: and it is certain he, with his wife Robesia, confirmed to the Monks of Thorney, in Cambridgeshire, the grants of lands that four of her tenants had made to them within her Lordship of Colworth; and, with her said husband, was founder of Chicksand in Bedfordshire; and she was buried at Chicksand (20). All which, except her burial, was before 1 King Stephen, when she was present with her husband, Geoffry de Mandevil, at the consecration of the church-yard of the Abbey of Walden in Essex, founded by the said Geoffry (21). The said Robesia was a Lady of singular piety, and, on the northern edge of the county of Hertford, erected a cross by the road side, which was thought, says Weever, in that age a pious work, to put passengers in mind of Christ's passion, whereupon it was called CRUX ROBESIA before there was either church or town (22). And under it she caused to be made a kind of subterraneous chapel or oratory, whither she used to retire for her private devotions. This chapel, not long since, hath been discovered, and largely described by Dr Stewkley (23). And, near the said cross, Eustachius de Mare, in the reign of Henry II, founded a Priory of black Canons, stiled de cruce Robesia; and soon after, says Weever, Inns were built there for the use of Travellers, and, in process of time, it grew to be a town, which, instead of Robesia's cross, was called Robesia town, and thence contracted into Royston.

[F] He was at the conquest of Antioch. Leland relates (24) that, in 1098, Corborant, Admiral to the Soudan of Persia, was fought with at Antioche, and discomfited by the Christians. The night coming on, in the chace of this bataille, and waxing dark, the Christians being four miles from Antioche, God willing, the fauste of the Christians shewed a white star, or molette of fyve pointes, which, to every manne's sighte, did lighte and arrest upon the standard of Albrei, there shining excessively. Thus we see that Light and Ornament of Great Britain promptly recording an ordinary natural meteor for a miracle, declarative of an extraordinary Divine interposition in favour of a set of superstitious Christians. However, such a scrap of credulity is pardonable enough in that distinguished Scholar's circumstances. In reality it was vitium temporis magis quam hominis. When Leland wrote his Itinerary (25), where this superstitious brat is found, notwithstanding he had followed his Royal Master and munificent Patron Henry VIII, in throwing off the Pope's supremacy, and all such tenets as were appendant thereto, yet he certainly still retained, together with the same master, most of the old leaven of the Popish faith, which, among other errors, inculcated the firm belief of an un-failing course of miracles throughout the whole Christian period. In justice to Leland it ought likewise to be further observed, That these meteoric stars had been uncontestedly held for miraculous from the earliest ages of Christianity, a superstition that not improbably had its first rooting in, and was originally grafted upon, that truly miraculous star which conducted the three Eastern Sages to Christ. The star upon the Earl of Oxford's standard had, it seems, the figure of a mullet, or star with fyve points or rays: when the same kind of meteor has happened to be thrown into four rays,

(g) Pat. 1 H. 1. p. 2. m. 26.
(h) Dugdale's Chron. Series, p. 2.

(i) Rot. Pip. 5 Stephen.

(k) Matth. Westm. p. 476.

(l) Monast. Anglic. Vol. I. p. 248.

(m) Leland's Collect. by R. Glover, Somerset Herald.

(8) M. Westm. an. 1139, p. 476.

(9) Daniel's life of King Stephen, in Compl. hist. of England, Vol. I. p. 127.

(10) Lib. Rubr. in Scacc. sub tit. Northamp.

(11) Mon. Angl. Vol. I. p. 248.

(12) Rot. Pip. de iisd. Ann. Salop.

(13) Lib. Rubr. in Scacc. sub tit. Salop. The vetus feoffamentum was 5l. the novum 15l. Spelman's Glossary sub tit. feodum and miles.

(14) Rot. Pip. 6 R. I.

(15) Baronage of England, Vol. I. p. 223, which is a flat contradiction to what he asserts in his account of the Vere family, p. 88.

(16) Discovery of Brook's errors, p. 400.

(17) Funeral Mon. p. 547.

(18) Richard Hagustald, p. 315. l. 2.

(19) Rot. Pip. 9 John, Bedford, and Buck.

(n) Rot. de Domin. &c. sub titulo Northampton, Rot. 3 in dorso.

(o) Ibid. sub titulo Essex, Rot. 32.

(p) Monast. Angl. Vol. II. p. 183.

(q) Leland's Itinerary, Vol. VI. p. 38.

(20) Mon. Angl. Vol. I. p. 245.

(21) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 793. p. 238 and Vol. I.

p. 447, 459, who says it was consecrated by Robert de Sigillo (Keeper of the Signet) Bishop of London, Nigel of Ely, and William of Norwich, and that it was placed at the West end of the town, upon the meeting of four road-ways, and in an angle of two waters, one returning from Newport, and the other descending from the side of his castle, that was his chief feat.

(22) Fun. Mon. in Royston, p. 51.

(23) In Palæog. Brit. Numb. 1. edit. 1743, 4to.

(24) In his Itinerary, as cited in the text.

(25) He began his travels thro' England, upon this design, in 1536, and spent six years upon them. See his article.

Turkish army, ann. 1097, he retook a banner of St George, taken from the Christians; whereupon he afterwards gave the arms of St George in his shield. After the death of his father, returning to England, he was made an Earl in King Stephen's time by Maud the Empress: for by that title she rendered and granted to him all the lands which his father Alberic de Vere held at the time of his death, and particularly the office of great Chamberlain of England. Also the land of William de Albrinces, with the inheritance which he claimed in right of his wife; and the castle of Colchester, as soon as she could deliver it to him. The Earldom of Cambridgehire, with the third penny thereof, as an Earl ought to have, if the King of the Scots had not that Earldom; or she could procure him to exchange it: But if not, he was to be Earl either of Oxford, Berkshire, Wiltshire, or Dorsetshire, at the discretion of her brother, the Earl of Gloucester, Earl Geoffry, and Earl Gislebert [Clare]. Also the inheritance, to him and his heirs, of William de Helion, namely ten Knights fees; likewise Dibam, which belonged to Roger de Rannis, and was the right of the nephews of this Earl Alberic, viz. the sons of Roger de Rannis. And Turroc, which belonged to William Peverell, Earl of Nottingham, and the land of Salamon, the Priest of Tillebery. And to him and his dependants freedom to profit by these gifts, without being called to answer for any thing which they had done, before they joined Maud the Empress and the Earl of Anjou her husband (r). This deed was given at Oxford, and signed by the Empress Maud's own hand, and several sureties named for the performance thereof; and that the Earl of Anjou her husband, and Henry her son, should confirm it under their hands [G]. Accordingly that son, King Henry II, by a deed, dated at Dover, in his passage, granted to Alberic the Earldom of Oxford, and the third penny of the pleas of the county, to him and his heirs (s). In the twelfth of this King's reign, upon levying the aid for marriage of his daughter, Alberic certified his Knights fees to be 28. a 4th and 8th part (t); for which, in the 14th of that reign, he gave 20 l. towards the aid (u). In the 2d of Rich. I. he gave a fine of 500 marks for the sister of Walter de Bolebec to make a wife for his son (w).

And in the 6th of that reign, on the collection of the aid for the King's redemption, he paid 30 l. 2 s. 6 d. for the Knights fees he then held (x). Before the end of that year he died, and was interred in the Priory at Colne, where a monument was erected to his memory [H]. By his second wife (y), Lucia, daughter and heir to William de Albrinces [I], he had two sons, Alberic and Robert, successively Earls of Oxford [K].

Alberic the eldest, and second Earl of Oxford, was with the King in Normandy in the life-time of his Father (z), and at his death, viz. in 7 Rich. I, gave 100 l. for his relief (aa); as also 500 marks, upon collecting the aid for the King's redemption (bb). Likewise, 8 Rich. I, he paid 30 l. 2 s. 6 d. upon collecting the third scutage of Normandy (cc). In 6 John (dd) he gave 200 marks for the tertium denarium of Oxfordshire, paid to the Earl of that county as customary (ee). In 10 John he was Sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire (ff) for one half of that year, and so continued till the 15th of John (gg). In the 14th of that reign he was a witness, made between the King and the Earl of Bulloign, not to make a separate peace with France (hh); and being firm in the interest of King John, he was one of the thus exhibiting the form (how rudely soever) of a cross, that figure rivetted the belief of a miracle therein. The cross is particularly sacred to Christianity, and the appearance of one has been constantly held for a signum salutis to the Christians. Thus, for instance, when Julian the Apostate, for the particular encouragement of the Jewish religion, set about rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, great numbers of these meteoric crosses or stars happened to light upon the cloaths of the workmen and by-standers: What was the consequence? Did not the Christian writers, even the most famed for learning and sound sense (26), claim them, with the utmost assurance of faith, for so many miracles, denouncing the overthrow of that attempt: A piece of superstition, which has been marked by the present Bishop of Gloucester (27); who indeed may be thought to have lavished more learning and labour upon it than would have been needful, had not the delicacy of his design required such a conduct. The reputation of the Fathers was to be carefully managed, and the weight of their evidence in general was to be signified by the respect shewn in the extraordinary pains taken to set it aside in one particular, which was to be censured so as not to hurt the credit of their testimony with regard to the miracle of the fiery eruption, the truth whereof his Lordship had undertaken to assert.

[G] The deed was to be confirmed by Henry.] In the same deed she grants to Geffery de Vere all the land that was Geoffry Talbot's, or the value of it, at the discretion of Geoffry, Earl of Essex, Earl Gislebert, and Earl Alberic, brother to the said Geffery de Vere. And to Robert de Vere a Barony, of equal worth with his brother Geoffry's (or an equivalent) within a year after she had possession of the realm of England. And to the said Alberic, her office of Chancellor, for the use of his brother, William de Vere, as soon as it could be got from William, brother of John, the son of Gislebert, who then had it.

[H] A monument to his memory at Colne.] The monument, on the suppression of the Priory, was removed into the church of Earls-Colne, having his effigies lying cross-legged, and a Saracen's head thereon, as a memorial of having killed one in the Holy land, and this inscription: Hic jacet Albericus de Vere, filius Alberici de Vere, Comes de Guisney, & primus Comes Oxoniæ, Magnus Camerarius Angliæ, qui, propter summam auidaciam & effrenatam pravitatem, Grymme Aubrey vocabatur. Obiit 26 die Decembris, anno Christi 1194, Ricardi I. sexto (28).

[I] His second wife Lucia was daughter to William de Albrinces.] This first Earl of Oxford is also said to marry a daughter of Henry de Essex, Baron of Ralegh, mentioned above, in the text, to marry Adeliza [Alice] Earl Alberic's sister, who was secondly the wife of Roger Fitz-Richard, Lord of Warkworth in Northumberland (29). But it is also evident, by the aforesaid grant of Maud the Empress, that the wife of the said Alberic was daughter of William de Albrinces; for she grants to him all the lands of the said William, with the whole inheritance, which he claimed in right of his wife. Besides a Priory of Nuns at Ikellington in Cambridgeshire (30), he also founded that of Heningham in Essex, Lucia, his wife, being the first Priores there. He likewise founded the Priory of Hatfield-Broad-Oak in com. Essex, and gave Hexford, with a certain wood called Alcotehegh, to the Nuns of St. Cross (31).

[K] Two sons—Earls of Oxford.] Besides these she also brought him another son, William de Vere, who was a great builder, and consecrated Bishop of Hereford in 1186, 33 Henry II. He died December 24, 1190, and was buried against the South wall, opposite to the presbytery of the Cathedral church of Hereford, where a tomb, erected to his memory, was remaining in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (32). Henry de Vere is said to be another son; and he had also two daughters, Adeliza and Sarab, wife of Richard de Ergoze the elder, of Blakewick in Lincolnshire (33)

(r) Vincent's discovery of Brook's error, p. 400, as before.
(s) He had been a witness to King Stephen's settling the crown of England, anno 1153, in favour of Henry. Rymer's Fœd. Vol. I. p. 13.
(t) Lib. Rub. in Scacc. Essex.
(u) Rot. Pip. 14 Hen. II. Essex.
(w) Ibid. 2 R. I. Essex.
(x) Ibid. 6 R. I. Essex.
(y) His first wife, Euphemia, daughter of Sir William Cantelupe, brought him no issue. Vincent on Brook, p. 396.

(z) Rot. Pip. 9 R. I. Buck. and Bedf.
(aa) Ibid. 7 R. I.
(bb) Ibid.
(cc) Ibid. 3 R. I. Essex.

(28) Weever's Fun. Mon. p. 613, 615, i. e. Here lies Alberic de Vere, son of Alberic de Vere, Earl of Guisnes, and first Earl of Oxford, Great Chamberlain of England, who, for his consummate boldness and unbridled depravity, was called Grimme Aubrey, &c. Leland says he was named Aubrey the Grymme, for his greatness of stature and stern look. Itin. Vol. VI. p. 35.

(29) Dugdale's Mon. Aug. ubi supra, whomakes her the sister of Rohesia before mentioned.

(30) Leland's Itin. as last cited.

(31) Mon. Ang. Vol. I. p. 545, 1020, 1021.

(32) Godwin's Cat. of Bishops of England, p. 374, 375.

(33) Miller, p. 679.

(dd) In the 5th year of K. John, upon his settling his Q. Isabel's dower, the last was one of the witnesses, and affixed his seal to the deed. Rymer's Fœd. Vol. I. p. 134, 135.
(ee) Rot. Pip. 6 John, Essex.
(ff) Ibid. 10 John, Essex and Hertf.
(gg) Ibid. de iisdem annis.
(hh) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 151.

(26) As Gregory Nazianzen, in particular.

(27) In his Julian &c. chap. III. edit. 1752, 3vo.

(ii) Matth. Paris, 131. n. 10.
(kk) Leland's Collect. Vol. II. p. 324.

(ll) Leland's Itinerary, Vol. VI. p. 38.

(mm) Rot. Pip. 16 John, Essex and Hertf. & Clauf. 16 John, m. 19.

(nn) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 198.

(oo) Clauf. 17 Joh. in dorfo, m. 4. and Rymer, Vol. I. p. 201. He was also in the number of those whom Pope Innocent III. excommunicated on that occasion. M. Paris, p. 254. and Rymer, Vol. I. p. 211.

(tt) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 158. N. B. 15 H. III. performing his homage, he had livery of all the lands of his father. Clauf. 15 H. III. m. 1.

(xx) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 387, 388.

(yy) M. Paris, 700. a. n. 60.

(zz) Ibid. 743. n. 50. and 744. n. 30.

(aaa) Rot. Pip. 33 H. 14. Essex and Hertf.

(eee) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 447.

(34) Miller's Cat. of Honour, p. 678.

(35) Fuller's Worthies in Northamptonshire.

(36) Seager's Baronage MS.

(37) Fuller's Worthies, Præd.

(*) Viz. in 1752.

(38) Pat. 34 H. VIII. p. 207.

Nobles then reputed evil Counsellors to that King (ii). In 16 John he died, and was buried at Colne (kk). He married Adeliza [Alice], daughter of Roger Bigot, Earl of Norfolk, and left issue Margaret, his daughter and heir, married to Hugh, Earl of Chester (ll). To this Alberic succeeded

Robert his brother, the third Earl of Oxford, who the same year, 16 John, gave 100 marks to the King for livery of the lands of his inheritance, with the castles of Heningham and Camenent; together with the wardship of the heir of William Fitz-Oats, to marry to his niece (mm). The same year he was also one of the witnesses to that grant, whereby the King, on a vacancy among the Ecclesiastics, gave them licence to make a free choice among themselves (nn). In the 17th of John he was one of the chief of those Barons that took up arms against the King, and was party to the covenants then made between them, whereby they were to have the city and Tower of London delivered up into their hands (oo). But, upon the death of King John, a peaceable accord being made between Henry III. and these Barons, Earl Robert was received into favour. In 4 Henry III. he was one of the Judges in the King's court of justice (pp); as he was also in 5 Henry III (qq). In which year he departed this life, and was buried in the Priory of Hatfield-Broad-Oak in Essex [L]. He married Isabel, daughter of Hugh, and sister and heir of Walter de Bolebec; of Bolebec-castle in Witchurch, in com. Bucks, by whom he left issue a daughter, Isabel, wife of Sir John Courtney; and two sons, Hugh and Sir Henry Vere (rr) [M]. His wife, surviving him, gave a fine to the King, 6 Henry III, of 2228l. 2s. 9d. for the wardship of Hugh, her son and heir (ss), which fine was over and above a debt of Earl Robert, her husband, of 1780l. 11s. [N].

Hugh, fourth Earl of Oxford, in 14 Henry III, was one of the witnesses to that league the King made with Reginald, Earl of Boloigne, to make no peace or truce with the King of France without a mutual consent (tt). In 1233, 17 Henry III, he was solemnly knighted at Gloucester, on the King's solemnizing the feast of Pentecost there (uu). In the 21st of Henry III. the King ordered twenty marks yearly to be paid him for the third penny of the county of Oxford, as Earl of that county (ww). And, 23 Henry III, on a difference between the King and the Monks of Winchester, relating to the election of an Archbishop of that see, he, with other peers, wrote about it to the Pope, who returned them for answer, that his Legate had instructions to provide a person of whom the King could have no suspicion (xx). In the 30th of Henry III. he was one of the Barons who subscribed that letter sent to the Pope, complaining of his exactions upon this realm (yy). In 32 Henry III. he was in that parliament wherein the King was upbraided by the Lords with his licentious expences, and that his Treasurer and Chancellor were not persons of their approbation (zz). In 33 Henry III. he paid 1000 marks to the King for the wardship and marriage of Alice, heir of Gilbert de Saunford (aaa), whom he married to Robert his son soon after (bbb). In 44 Henry III. he went against Lewellin, son of Griffin, his accomplice, and other rebels in Wales (ccc). He married Hawise, daughter of Sayer de Quincey, Earl of Winchester (ddd), and, with his wife, lies buried at Colne [O].

Robert, his son, fifth Earl of Oxford, in his father's life-time, having taken upon him the cross, in order to go to the Holy land, had thereupon the King's protection (eee) for three years, and probably staid there during that term; for nothing further appears of him till after the death of his father, when, in 48 Henry III, he was one of those powerful peers who set their hands and seals to the Ordinances made by Simon de Montfort and his accomplices at London, in the parliament held in June, 1264, till such time as a peace should be [L] He was buried at Hatfield-Broad-Oak.] Where he had the following memorial: Sir Robert de Vere the first, and the third Earl of Oxford, lyeth here: God, if he please, have mercy on his soule. Whofoever shall pray for his soule, shall obtain a forty-days pardon (34).

[M] Sir Henry Vere.] He was of Great Addington in com. Northampton: His son and heir, Sir Robert Vere, was Sheriff of the said county in 33 Edw. I. (35), and had issue Richard Vere, of Great Addington, who had to wife Isabel, daughter of John Green, of Drayton in the county of Northampton, Esq; (36), and sister and heir to Henry her brother; by which match the manor and mansion of Drayton accrued to his posterity, that terminated, in the male line, in Sir Henry Vere, who was possessed of Great Addington, Drayton, and Thrapston, in Northamptonshire, and was Sheriff of the said county 1 Henry II (37). He had to wife Isabel, daughter to Sir Thomas Tresham, of Rushton in com. Northampton. and left issue four daughters, his coheirs; first, Elizabeth, wife of John, Lord Mordant, ancestor to Charles, now * Earl of Peterborough, who had thereby, on partition, the manor of Drayton, now possessed by the Lady Elizabeth Germaine, daughter of Charles, Earl of Berkley. Second, Ann, wife of Sir Humphry Brown, of Abbots Reading in Essex, made Lord Chief Justice of the Common-pleas (38), 4 Henry VIII, and had issue Sir Weston Brown. Third, Constance, wife of John Parr, Esq; who died without issue by her. Fourth, Ethelred, married to John Brown, of Rookwood-Hall in Abbots-Rooding, Essex, Esq;

[N] Isabel his wife survived him, &c.] She was after married to Henry de Novant (39), and died the day after the purification of our Lady, 29 Henry III, having founded the abbey of Woborne (40), and the house of Friar Preachers at Oxford, where she was buried (41).

[O] He lies buried, with his wife, at Colne.] The following epitaph is engraven on their tomb:

Hic jacent Hugo de Vere ejus nominis primus Comes Oxonie Quartus, Magnus Camerarius Anglie, filius & hæres Roberti Comitis et Hawise Uxoris ejus, filia Saeri de Quinci Comitis Wintonie. Qui quidem Hugo obiit MCCLXIII. Quarum animabus propitiatur altissimus (42).

He founded the hospital at Castle Heningham in Essex (43). He also bestowed on the Knights Templars the church of Radenache in Buckinghamshire (44). The inquisition taken after his death, 47 Henry III, sets forth, that he died seized of the manor of Kensington in com. Middlesex, the manors of Castreton and Whitchurch in com. Buck. The manor of Campes in com. Cantabr. (45), which manor appertained to the Barony in right of his office as Chamberlain of England; also the manor of Awiton in that county, appertaining likewise to his Barony: Also of the manors of Cokefeud and Prefton in com. Suffolk; of Hengham castle in com. Essex, and advowson of the Priory there; with the hamlet of Tillebyri, and manors of Hengham, Ravetiles, Bonethy, and Colun, held likewise of the King in capite, by the service of Chamberlain of England, together with the advowson of the Priory of Colun or Colne (46).

(pp) Fin. Levat. T. Pasch. 4 H. III.

(qq) Ibid. Craft. Mart. 5 H. III.

(rr) Rot. Pip. 9 John, Essex and Hertf. Miller's Catal. of Honour, p. 678.

(ss) Rot. Fin. 6 H. III. m. 9.

(uu) MS. in Bibl. Bodl. K. 84. Cant. f. 50.

(ww) Pat. 21 H. III. m. 5.

(bbb) Leland's Collect. Vol. II. p. 375.

(ccc) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 706, 707.

(ddd) Leland, p. 38. and Rot. Pip. 7 Hen. III. sub tit. Honor. Bolon.

(39) Rot. Pip. 20 Henry III. Devon.

(40) Leland's Itin. Vol. VI. p. 38.

(41) Miller, p. 679.

(42) Weever's Fun. Mon. p. 616.

(43) For the health (as expressed in those times) of his wife, children, and ancestors. Mon. Angl. Vol. I. p. 2021.

(44) Ib. Vol. II. p. 545.

(45) Whereof the Park was four miles in compass.

(46) Ffcaet. 48 H. VIII. n. 26. Middlesex.

concluded between the King and his Barons [P]; and, on the 24th of December following, the King, at Woodstock, informed the Earl of Oxford, that whereas, after many distractions in the kingdom, his eldest son, Prince Edward, for the tranquillity and peace of the realm, is become an hostage, and, all matters reconciled, he commands him to be at London on the octave of Hilary next, to give his assent for the more effectual performance thereof (fff). On the 16th of February, 1265, 49 Henry III, the King, at Westminster, signified to Simon de Mountford, Gilbert de Clare, and Robert de Vere, Earls of Leicester, Gloucester, and Oxford, with other great Barons, who had appointed a meeting at Dunstable, to tilt (as given out) to forbear coming there (ggg): And as the day after, viz. Ash-Wednesday, was concluded on to treat finally about setting at liberty Edward, his eldest son, he commands them to attend him on that day. But shortly after, in the same year, being one of the Barons in arms against the King (bbb), and made Knight in the field by Mountfort (iii) (the chief of them) he was, among others, surprized at Kenilworth (kkk), a little before the battle of Evesham, which proved so fatal to Mountfort and those rebels. But afterwards, making his peace according to the tenor of that decree, called Dictum de Kenilworth, he, in 4 Edward I, was one of the council to whom was communicated a letter from Lewellin, Prince of Wales, refusing to do his homage (lll). Whereupon his Highness, by advice of his Council, forbids all correspondence with the said Lewellin; and, in the tenth year of this reign, Earl Robert was employed against the Welch (mmm). He died in 24 Edward I. (nnn), leaving issue by Alice, daughter and heir of Gilbert Lord Samford aforesaid, Chamberlain to the Queen of England in fee, several children [Q], besides his eldest son.

Robert de Vere, who succeeded him, became sixth Earl of Oxford, and was surnamed the good Earl of Oxford, his government, both in peace and war, being so prudent, his hospitality and works of charity so wisely abundant, and his temperance with a reli-

[P] The peace concluded between the King and his Barons.

In this treaty are the following remarkable articles: 1. That three wise and loyal persons shall be elected, with power from the King (who was then in their custody) to nominate nine Counsellors, three of whom always to attend in court. 2. The King, by the advice of the said nine, to order and dispose all matters relating to the kingdom, and to elect a Justice, Chancellor, Treasurer, and other officers, for the government of the kingdom; any of which nine shall, by the advice of the aforesaid three, be removed, and others nominated. 3. That all officers may be removed by the assent of the Nine. 4. That Two of the Three, upon any difference, shall be a majority; and, in case of a difference between the Nine, the aforesaid Three to determine it (47).

[Q] He left several children, besides Robert, by Alice, his wife. These were, 1. Alphonfus de Vere, Knt. who had to wife Jane, daughter of Sir Richard Foliot, Knt. by whom he had a son, John, hereafter mentioned, as succeeding to the title of Earl of Oxford (48). 2. Hugh de Vere, who eminently distinguished himself. In 21 Edward I, being then in the wars of France, he was made Governor of St Cyverine, having 200 horse and many foot in that garrison (49). And the next year he was there also, with Edmund Earl of Leicester (the King's brother) and Blanch his wife, the Queen of Navarre (mother to the Queen of France), and the Duke of Burgundy, at the ratification of the peace made betwixt both realms through the mediation of those Queens (50). In 24 Edward I. he went Ambassador, to conclude a truce with the French King; also to Reginald, Earl of Guelderland, to treat about an alliance with him; likewise to take the oath of Florence, Earl of Flanders and Zealand, relating to the agreement of the said Earl to furnish the King with armed men (51). In 25 Edw. I. he was sent with the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, William de Valence Earl of Pembroke, and others, to treat of peace between the Kings of England and France (52), and continued in Gascoigne, in the King's service, a great part of that year (53); and, for his good service in those parts, had a special livery of the lands of William, the son of Warine de Mountchenst, whose daughter and heir, Dyonisia, he had married, though she was not then of full age (54). In 26 Edward I. the King at Ghent notified to the Pope, that, in order to settle a peace with the King of France, he sends to him Hugh de Vere and Otta de Grandison, Knts, desiring him to counsel and help them (55). And accordingly he went to the Court at Rome (56). 27 Edward I. he obtained a Charter for Free Warren in all his Demesne lands within his Lordships of Hairwode in com. Norfolk, and Hasingbroke and Pbanges in Essex (57): and he was at the Abbey of Holmecham in Scotland, Oct. 7, 1300, 28 Edward I, when Robert, Bishop of Glasgow, swore fealty to King Edward as his lawful Sovereign (58). In 29 Edward I. he was employed, with John Earl Warren, and others, to treat with certain French Ambassadors about the peace with the Scots (50), and, 32 Edward I, being returned to England, did his fealty to the King for the lands of his wife's inheritance (50). He was also the same year in the wars of Scotland (61). In 34 Edw. I. he was employed in the Scottish wars (62). In 1 Edward II. he was summoned to be at the King's coronation, as was also his wife Dyonisia (63), by whom it seems he had no issue: For, upon her death, 7 Edw. II, Ademare de Valence, son of the Lady Joan de Valence, was found to be her next heir, she then dying seized of the manors of East and West Hanyngfeld, Stanford, and Fenge, with the advowsons of those churches; as also of the manors of Rodeswell, Great Fordham, and Thurstone, with the advowson of the church of Thurstone, all in Essex (64).

This Earl Robert had also two daughters; Joan, married to William de Warren, son of John, Earl Warren and Surrey, who had with her, by gift of her father, the manors of Midingham, Tyburne, Priterwell, Wifhamstoue, Nechamsfede, and Gynges, with lands in Cestresham of 10l. a year (65). He had by her a daughter, Alice, married to Edmund, the son of Allan, Earl of Arundel, and died before his father, 18th Kal. January, 1286, in the nineteenth year of his age, leaving the said Joan his wife great with child, who, 2 Kal. July, was delivered of a son, named, after his grandfather, John, and succeeded him in the Earldoms of Arundel and Surrey, and was also Earl of Strathern in Scotland, but deceased, without lawful issue, on the anniversary of his birth-day, anno 1347, in the sixty-first year of his age, leaving Alice, his sister, heir to all his estates, married, as said before, to Edmund Fitz-Allan, Earl of Arundel, and had by him a son, Richard, who succeeded in the Earldoms of Arundel and Surrey, which through the Mowbrays, Dukes of Norfolk, descended to the Howards, Dukes of Norfolk (66).

The other daughter of Earl Robert and Alice, his wife, was Lora, wife of Reginald de Argentein, with whom her brother, Earl Robert, gave the manor of Ketlingham in Norfolk in dower; and from her descended the families of the Lord Fitz-Warin, St George of Hatley, St George in Cambridgeshire, and the Allingtons of Horfeheath in the same county (67).

This Earl Robert, in 18 Edward I, obtained the King's charter for an annual fair at his manor of Lanlan in Suffolk, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, in Easter week (68). And for works of piety it appears, that, for the health of his soul, he gave to the Knights Hospitallers all his royalty, and services of two Knights fees in Ashby and Silverly which Geffry Arfick had wont to perform unto them (69). And, 16 Edward I, 145 acres of land and meadow in Bilchaungre and Takdegh in Essex, to the Canons of Trenkale, for the health of the soul of Gilbert his son (70).

(fff) Rymer, Vol. I. p. 203.

(ggg) Ibid. p. 206.

(bbb) Ffcaet, 49 H. III. n. 5. (iii) MS. in Bibl. Bodl. Mtd. 20. 119. a.

(kkk) Chron. MS. in Bibl. Bodl. K. 8. 4. Cont. 63. a.

(lll) Rymer, Vol. II. p. 68, 69.

(mmm) Rot. de Scutag. Wall. 10 Edw. I. m. 4.

(nnn) Ffc. 24 Edward I. n. 26. Leicester.

(50) Rot. Alem. 29 Edw. I. m. 7.

(60) Rot. Fin. 32 Edw. I. m. 2.

(61) Rot. Scoe. 32 Edw. I. m. 7.

(62) Ibid. 34 Edward I. m. 3.

(63) Rymer, Tom. III. p. 53, 60.

(64) Ffc. 7 Edward II. n. 31. Essex.

(65) Claus. 12 Edw. I. m. 5, and 13.

(66) Miller, p. 629, 630.

(67) Ibid. p. 682.

(68) Cart. 18 Edward I. n. 13.

(69) Mon. Angl. Vol. II. 507. 2.

(70) Ibid. 24. l. p. 10. Ffcaet. 71 Edw. I. n. 75. Essex.

(47) Rymer's Ffcaet. Vol. I. p. 793, et seq.

(48) Miller's Cat. Hon. p. 632.

(49) Knighton, p. 2499. n. 10. and 2500. n. 20.

(50) Tbo. Wal-ling. p. 24. n. 40.

(51) Rymer, Vol. II. p. 703, 704.

(52) Rot. Alem. 25 Edw. I. m. 15.

(53) Rot. Vafcon. 25 Edw. I. m. 14.

(54) Claus. 25 Edw. I. m. 10.

(55) Rymer, Vol. II. p. 803.

(56) Claus. 26 Edw. I. m. 12.

(57) Cart. 27 Edw. I. n. 29.

(58) Rymer, Vol. II. p. 867.

(ooo) Leland,
p. 38. Miller's
Cat. of Honour,
p. 633. Weever's Fun. Mon.
p. 616.

(ppp) Rymer,
Vol. II. p. 688.

(qqq) Id. p. 736.

(rrr) Id. p. 823.
and Rot. Scoc.
26 Edw. I. m. 9.

(uuu) Rymer,
Vol. II. p. 986.

(yyy) Ibid. p. 113.
He had the other summons, 19 Edward III, but was excused afterwards, on the prospect of a peace. Ibid.
p. 217.

(4a) Ibid. p. 217.

(4b) Efc. 5 Edward III. n. 71.
Leicest.

(4c) Ibid.

(4d) Rymer,
Vol. IV. p. 564,
566.

(4e) Rot. Scoc.
8 Edw. III. m. 9.
The truce expiring the next year, the King,
about Midsummer, went to the head of his army
at Newcastle, and was attended by this Earl of Oxford, and the Scots were obliged to submit to King
Edward at St
Johnston, where both were. Ibid.
9 Ed. III. m. 27.
and Barnes's hist.
of Edw. III. p. 94
to 99.

(71) Baronage,
Vol. II. p. 192.
col. 2.

(72) Rot. Scoc.
31 Edw. I. m. 7.

(73) Comp. Joh.
de Drokenesford Custod. mag.
garderobæ penes
Remem. R. in Scacc. and Ashmole's order of the Garter, p. 38.

(74) Rot. Scoc.
34 Edw. I. m. 9.

gious zeal so admirably conjoined, that the common people esteemed him as a Saint (ooo). He inherited from his father the office of Great Chamberlain of England and the title of Lord Bolebec, and in right of his mother was Lord Samford. In 23 Edward I, his father then living, he was commanded by the King to attend his brother Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, with horse and arms to Gascony (ppp). In 25 Edward I. the King required him to be present, with his Countess, at the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the Earl of Holland at Ipswich (qqq). In 26 Edward II. he attended the King on an expedition to Scotland (rrr), and was also in that war the following year (sss), and in 30 Edward I. was Sheriff of Northampton (ttt). In 34 Edward I. he was summoned to assist at settling the aid in the knighting, at Westminster, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, of the King's son, Prince Edward (uuu), afterwards Edward II, upon whose accession to the throne, the Earl and his Countess were summoned, January 10, 1 Edward II, to attend at the King's coronation on the Sunday after Valentine's day at Westminster, on which solemnity, Thomas de Vere, the Earl's eldest son, together with the Earl of Arundel, Hugh de Spencer, and Roger de Mortimer of Wigmore, bore the Royal robes (www). July 30, 1309, 3 Edward II, he received the King's commands to march against the Scots at Michaelmas next ensuing. On which business he was also summoned again, 7 Edward II, and in the tenth of that reign he went by the Royal command against the Welch (xxx). In the 18th of Edward II. he attended the King into Gascony against the French (yyy). In the 1st of Edward III. he was commanded to attend in arms against any hostile attempt that should be made by Robert de Bruce and his adherents, who, in case he could not obtain a peace to his liking in treaty, to be negotiated on the marches of Wales, threatened to invade England (zzz). In the 4th of Edward II. the King, April 2, 1330, notified to his Treasurer and Chamberlains, that Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, had set forth, that by inheritance he claimed to be Chamberlain to the Queen on the day of her coronation, and that he and his ancestors, time immemorial, have enjoyed and exercised the same office. That, for the fee on that day, they received the Queen's bed, her shoes, and sandals, three silver basons in which the Queen is served, viz. one for the washing of her head, and two for her hands; that the King was willing to deliver the same to him on account of the coronation of Queen Philippa his consort, on which day he attended as Chamberlain; and that, as it evidently appeared he and his ancestors had enjoyed the same, he had the shoes and sandals delivered to him; therefore he now orders his said Treasurer and Chamberlains to pay him, in lieu of the said bed, a hundred marks (4a). This Earl died the 19th of April, 5 Edward III, and was solemnly buried at the Priory of Colne (4b). He had issue by Margaret, his wife, daughter of Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, one son, Thomas de Vere [R], who dying in his life-time, the Earldom fell to his nephew,

John, the seventh Earl of Oxford (4c), who, at twenty years of age, subscribed to that agreement the King made with Patrick, Earl of March, and others, for a cessation of arms on Tuesday, the feast of St Margaret the Virgin, 1333, 7 Edward III (4d), and the year after he was in the expedition made into Scotland (4e). His Lordship attended the same King in his wars against the Scots in the ninth and tenth years of his reign (4f), and in the fourteenth went with him to Flanders. In the fifteenth he was at the great feast and justing in London, which the King caused to be made in respect to the Countess of Salisbury (4g), and the same year had an assignation out of the subsidy then levied of 300l. in part of a greater sum due to him for his services in the King's wars beyond-sea (4h). He had also that year a summons, dated November 4, 15 Edward III, to be at Newcastle upon Tyne with forty Gens d'Armes and Archers on the 24th of January, ready to march against the Scots. In 16 Edward III. he was again in the wars of France, in which service he had forty men at arms (himself accounted) one Banneret, nine Knights, twenty-nine Esquires, and thirty Archers on horseback, with an allowance of fifty-six sacks of wool for the wages of himself and his retinue (4i). In 17 Edward III. he accompanied Henry de Lancaster Earl of Derby, and other great Lords, into Scotland, for raising the siege of Laumaban-castle (4k); but before their arrival the Scots had retreated (4l). And soon after the King coming to Berwick, with all his forces, a truce was made for two years. After which, the same year, the Earl embarked with William Montague Earl of Salisbury, and other Lords, to aid the Countess of Montfort in Bretagne; and in their way met with a fleet fitted out by the Lord Charles of Blois, which lay to intercept them before the isle of Guernsey; on which the two fleets engaging, the action was very bloody, being fought with much fury and bravery till night parted them. About midnight arose such a storm as separated the fleets (4m). The Earl of Oxford, with [R] He had issue one son, Thomas de Vere.] Sir William Dugdale (71), in his account of this family, has recited some particulars of Thomas de Vere, whom he makes a younger brother of the said Robert, Earl of Oxford; but it does not appear, by any authority, that he had such a brother; and what Sir William mentions of him is certainly true of Thomas de Vere, son of the said Earl Robert, which is evident in what he says of him. In 32 Edward I. he was in the wars of Scotland (72), and in 34 Edward I. he was knighted with Prince Edward, by Bathing and divers other sacred ceremonies, and is expressly said to be son and heir to the Earl of Oxford (73). The same year he attended the Prince in his expedition into Scotland (74). On the coronation of Edward II. he attended, and is filed Thomas de Vere, son and heir of the Earl of Oxford. In 12 Edward II. he was again in the wars of Scotland (75), and, in 18 Edward II, the King having appointed him guardian of the coasts of Essex, the Bishop of London had the King's orders to administer to him the oaths for that office (76). He married, in 8 Edward II, Agnes, widow of Pain Tiptoft, but had no issue by her (77). His father, Robert Earl of Oxford, in 3 Edward III, obtained the King's charter for a court-leet at his manor of Chebbam in Bucks, with all those profits and advantages that the Sheriff of that county used to enjoy there, paying yearly five marks into the King's Exchequer. As also another charter for his tenants of Lavenham in Suffolk to be Tell free throughout all England (78).

(ss) Ibid. 27 Edward I. m. 16.

(tt) Fuller's Worthies, in
eod. comitat.

(www) Idem,
Vol. III. p. 52,
and 63.

(xxx) Ibid. p. 108, et seq. et p. 463
and Vol. IV.
p. 694.

(zzz) lb. p. 281.

(4f) Rot. Scoc.
10 Edward III.
m. 27. and
Barnes, p. 102.

(4g) Froisart,
Chron. fol. 45.

(4h) Claus. 15
Edw. III. p. 14
m. 31.

(4i) Rymer,
Tom. V. p. 290.

(4k) Tho. Walsingham, in eod.
ann. p. 150.

(4l) Barnes,
p. 269.

(4m) Id. p. 270.

(75) Id. 12 Edward II. m. 13.

(76) Rymer,
Vol. IV. p. 77.

(77) Claus. 8 Edward II. m. 4.

(78) Cart. 3 Edward III. n. 2,
and 30.

the English, when the storm was over, landed in Bretagne, near the city of Vannes, to which they presently laid siege, and took both the town and castle by stratagem, thus; the Earl of Oxford and his forces approaching silently to the walls without any difficulty, mounted up scaling ladders, and entered the town, which so dismayed the French, that every man shifted for himself, and escaped out of a privy postern (4*n*). The siege of Rennes and Nantes followed that of Vannes the same year, in both which our Earl signalized himself: but these, as also the particulars of the campaign the ensuing year, 18 Edward III, together with the famous battles of Cressy and Poitiers, under the Black Prince, are too much known to be retailed here; and the glorious share our Earl had in them is particularly enlarged on by Mr Barnes, in his history of this King, to which therefore we refer the Reader: And only observe, that, notwithstanding the great and exemplary services the Earl of Oxford had performed for his King and country, it does not appear that he had any beneficial grants; and probably his large estate made him less solicitous to obtain any such favour, contenting himself with the glory he had achieved. On the 24th of June, 32 Edward III, the truce between England and France (which from the battle of Poitiers had continued, with expectation of a full peace) being wholly expired, the French refused the conditions agreed on by King Edward and King John of France, then prisoner in England (40). Hereupon Edward raised an army of 100000 fighting men (4*p*), and, having seen them mustered and embarked between Sandwich and Dover, he notified, October 10, 1359, 33 Edward III, from Sandwich to the Earl of Oxford, that, for the dispatch of the war with France, and for the defence of his kingdom, he was going beyond the seas, having constituted Thomas, his son, guardian of the kingdom of England; and the welfare of his kingdom lying much at heart, he had appointed a Council to be at Westminster on Sunday next after St Martin's day (November 11) and commands him to be present there (4*q*). The Earl accordingly staid to attend this Council, not embarking with the King; but he followed him not long after, and died in this expedition in the English army encamped before Rheims, January 24, 34 Edward III, in the forty-seventh year of his age. Before he set out he made his will [S], and thereby bequeathed his body to be buried in the chapel of our Lady, within the Priory of Colne, on the South side of the quire, at the head of John and Robert his sons, there interred before. He married Maud, widow of Robert, son of Robert Fitz-Pain, and eldest daughter of Bartholomew, Lord Badlesmere, and sister and co-heir of Giles, Lord Badlesmere, a great Baron in Kent (4*r*), by whom he had also other issue [T], besides his eldest son,

(4*n*) Barnes, p. 271.

(40) Froisart, c. 201. f. 107.

(4*p*) They were raised by summons (which is still the custom in France) suffering none to stay at home (except some particularly named) between the ages of 20 and 60, so that, after many thousands had been rejected, there remained 100000.

(4*q*) Rymer, Tom. VI. p. 138.

(4*r*) Vincent on Brook, p. 40.

Thomas Vere, who succeeded him, and became the eighth Earl of Oxford, and, in the life-time of his father, attending the King in his expedition to France (29 Edward III.) was knighted on the Downs, by his Highness (4*s*). On the death of his father he was likewise beyond the seas in the King's service (4*t*). On the 15th of March, 1361, 35 Edward III, holding an estate in Ireland, the King signified to him, that, by the incursions other sons to Barons of the realm, in the whole 27, all about the same age. Efc. 34 Edward III. n. 84. and Knighton, p. 2609.

(4*t*) Yet he had livery of the lands descended to him, and his homage was respited till his return. Rot. Fin. 34 Edw. III. m. 4.

(81) Claus. 15 Edw. III. p. 2. m. 111.

(82) Efc. 40 Edward III. n. 38. Essex.

(83) Miller, p. 685.

(84) Chitting's descents of nobility, MS. Lanç. Ferial. penes nup. A. Collins.

(85) Vincent on Brooke, p. 403.

[S] He made his will. It is dated at Bentley in Essex, on Friday the feast of All-saints, 33 Edward III. In it he appointed, that 400 marks sterling, left by his ancestors in aid of the Holy-land, should be paid by his Executors with all convenient speed. And towards the building of the church at Colne he gave 100 marks, and towards re-edifying the chapel, called the Nerv-Abbey in Castle-Heningham, 100 marks, for celebrating masses, as formerly, by one or two priests. He bequeathed to Maud, his wife, all the utensils of his house, as well silver as other; and to Maud, his daughter, for her marriage, 1000 marks. He died seized of the castle at Leonhals in com. Hereford, Langle and Bradele, com. Bedford; of the manors of Wykingston in com. Leicester, Great Bentley, Fratynge, Great Kemfeld and Fingre in Essex; as also of the manors of Colne, the castle and manor of Heningham, the manors of Heningham-Sibill, Gelham-Le-Vaux in Beauchamp Otes, Dodinghurst and Stansted-Mountfitchet in the same, and Whitchurch in Bucks. And of the inheritance of Maud, his wife, he died seized of the manors of Market-Overt in com. Rotel, Welles in com. Hertford, Laughton, with the hundred of Sheplake, in com. Sussex, in the possession of the late Hon. Henry Pelham, Esq; brother to the Duke of Newcastle, Palton and Milton in Northamptonshire; and, for his wife's life, the manors of Wroxhall and Worth in com. Derjet. Also jointly with her, by the endowment of Robert, son of Robert Fitz-Payne, her first husband, of the manors of Storktone, Polc, and Hurdecote, in Wilts; and likewise, jointly with her, of the manors of Abyeton and Campe in com. Cantabr. Flete, Rydingwolde, Bokynfeld, Badlesmere, and Whitstable in com. Kanc, Kensington in com. Middlesex, Great Hormede in com. Hertford; of Lavenham, called Over-Hall and Nether-hall, Aldham and Cokefield in Suffolk, and Bumstede in Essex (79). The said Maud, then surviving, had, for her share, part of the inheritance descended to her by the death of her brother, Giles de Badlesmere, the manors of Badlesmere and Bokynfeld in com. Kanc, with fifty acres of wood belonging thereto (80). Also the manors of Rydingwolde in com.

Kanc, Laughton (except Waldern-wood) and West-Dene in Sussex, Welles in Hertford, and a fourth part of the manor of Thaxted in Essex (81). She died ann. 40, Edward III (82).

[T] He had other sons.] These were, 1. Another John de Vere, Knt. who died without issue by his wife, —widow of—Lutterel. She died on the 7th of August, 9 Richard II. (83). He had also two daughters; Margaret, first married to Henry, Lord Beaumont, who had issue by her, John, Lord Viscount Beaumont, Knight of the Garter, father of Henry, whose grandson, William, Viscount Beaumont, dying without issue, his sister and heir was Joan, wife of John, Lord Lovell of Tichmersb, who by him had issue Francis, Viscount Lovell, who dying without issue, his two sisters were his heirs, viz. Jane, wife of Sir Bryan Stapleton, Knt. ancestor to the Stapletons of Yorkshire; and Fridiside, married to Sir Edward Norris, Knt. ancestor to Francis Norris, Earl of Berkshire, from whom the present Earl of Abingdon, and others are descended (84). The said Margaret had, to her second husband, Sir John Devereux, Knt. Constable of Dover-castle, and Steward of the Household to King Richard II, who left issue by her Joan, his daughter and heir (85), married to Walter, Lord Fitz-Walter, who had by her Walter, Viscount Fitz-Walter, who, by Agnes, his wife, daughter of Sir John Chidioc, left Elizabeth, his sole daughter and heir, married to Sir John Ratcliff, Knt. who had issue by her John Ratcliff, Lord Fitz-Walter, Burnell, and Egremond, father of Robert Ratcliff, Viscount Fitz-Walter, whose son and heir, Henry, Earl of Sussex, had two wives; 1. Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, by whom he had issue Thomas and Henry, successively Earls of Sussex; and by his second wife, Anne, daughter of Sir William Calthorp, Knight, had issue Frances, his daughter and heir, married to Thomas Mildmay, Esq; ancestor to Benjamin, now Earl Fitz-Walter.

Isabel, the second daughter of the said Earl of Oxford, was married to Sir John Courtney, Baron of Oakhamp-ton, ancestor to the Courtneys of Devonshire, and 2dly to Sir Oliver Dinham (86).

(4*s*) He was then only 18 years of age; but there were knighted with him the King's two sons, Lionel of Answerp, and John of Gaunt, besides

(79) Efc. 34 Edward III. n. 84. Leicester.

(80) Rot. Fin. 12 Edw. III. m. 8.

of his enemies in Ireland, and the inability of the inhabitants there, by reason the owners of lands resided in England, and receiving the issues and profits thereof, yet took no care to defend them, the King, willing to prevent the same, has appointed Lionel, Earl of Ulster, his son, forthwith to repair thither with a great army, and requires those who have estates there to go in company with his said son for the defence thereof. And being desirous to consult with those who have estates there before they go, he commands this Earl of Oxford to be at Westminster in the Quindenes of Easter to consult thereon (4u). In 37 and 38 Edw. III. he, by the title of Lord Great Chamberlain, was witness to two deeds executed by the King [U]. And in 43 Edward III. he was in the wars of France, the King then sending an army, about Midsummer, under the command of John of Gaunt (w). He married, in his father's life-time, Maud, daughter of Sir Ralph de Ufford, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, by his wife Maud, widow of William de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, (who by her left Elizabeth, his daughter and heir, wife of Lionel, Duke of Clarence). The Earl of Oxford, by the said Maud, his wife, had issue

(4z) Rymer, Tom. V. p. 318, 319. but the Earl neglecting to go, the King, Feb. 10, 1362, 36 Ed. III, commanded him to embark on the Quindenes of Easter at farthest. But that he be at Westminster on Friday in the second week in Lent, to consult thereon. Ibid. p. 350, 351.

(4v) Rot. Franc. 43 Edw. III. m. 4.

Robert, their only son and heir, who, on the death of his father, September 18, 1371, 45 Edward III, became ninth Earl of Oxford; but being then in his minority, King Edward III, in the 45th year of his reign, granted his marriage to Ingelram de Coucy, then Earl of Bedford, to the intent he might take to wife the Lady Philippa, daughter of that Earl by Isabel, daughter of King Edward III. (4x), which marriage being effected, King Richard II, in the second year of his reign, granted to William, Bishop of London, and Roger de Beauchamp, 100l. per annum, for his better support till he should arrive at full age (4y). Also, in 6 Richard II, wanting lands of sufficient worth to maintain her the said Philippa, he obtained from the King, in consideration of his service done and to be done, that, during her life, they should enjoy all those lands which were bestowed by Edward III, in remainder after Joane, the wife of John de Coupland, upon the said Ingelram, Earl of Bedford, and Isabel, his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies (4z). After which, the same year, making proof that he was of full age, and then doing his homage, he had livery of his whole lands (5a), and the next year he was summoned among the Peers to parliament (5b). In the 9th of Richard II. the King, having retained him in his service, gave him, in consideration thereof, the castle and Lordship of Okeham in Rutland, with all the forest of Rutland, to hold to him and his heirs male. And purposing to confer on him the title of Marquis of Dublin, that he might the better support the said honour, he assigned unto him in reversion, after the death of James de Audcleigh, the castle, manor, and borough of Barnstaple; the manors of Fremington, Ilferecombe, Combe-Martyn, South-Moulton, Holdesworthby, Nemet-Bowe, Uppeye, Bovy-Tracey, Holne, Dertyngton, Kyngeston, Blackdon, and Long-Acre, with all other lands of the same James de Audcleigh, lying in the counties of Devon, Cornwall, and Somerset, which, after the death of him the said James, were to descend to the King (5c). He was accordingly created a Marquis of Dublin the same year (5d), which being consented to in parliament (5e), the King granted him the land and dominion of Ireland, with all profits, revenues, and regalities, as amply as the King himself ought to have the same, reserving to the King the homages, resort, and superiority of that country, which confirmation in parliament was made by the girding of a sword, and putting a circle of gold upon his head (5f). The title of Marquis had never till then been heard of in England, and therefore was much distasteful by others of the nobility (5g). The King also granted him all the benefit which might be had by John, son of Charles de Blois (then prisoner in Gloucester-castle) that he might be able to maintain 500 men at arms, and 1000 archers, at the accustomed wages of war, by the space of two years after his arrival in Ireland (which he intended about Candlemas the same year) in order to the conquest of that realm. And to go thither, warrants were issued out to employ vessels to transport him and his retinue (5b). And the King esteeming that honour, so lately conferred upon his chief favourite, too low for his merits, he was advanced to the title of Duke of Ireland upon the feast-day of Edward the Confessor (5i). He also ordained, that the heir of Charles de Blois, who challenged the Dukedom of Britany, (and whose ransom he had obtained) should sell it to the French for 30000l. to the intent that this Duke, with that money, might by force get the dominion of Ireland before Easter ensuing (5k) [W]. In 11 R. II. the King gave him liberty to reside at Berbemstede-castle in

(4x) Pat. 45 Edward III. p. 2. m. 13.

(4y) Ib. 2 R. II. p. 1. m. 45.

(4z) Ib. 6 R. II. p. . m. 15.

(5a) Claus. 6 R. II. p. 2. m. 17.

(5b) Cotton's Records, p. 290. He was also in parliament next year, where Walter Sibal, being accused of slandering him, was convicted to the damage of 500 marks to the said Earl, for which, and for his fine and ransom, he was committed to prison. Ibid. p. 304.

(5c) They were chagrined at his being set above them, who was not their superior either in wisdom or valour, says Walsingham, p. 348. n. 40. (5k) Walsingham, p. 352, 353, 354. n. 2. who says the Lords and Commons willingly assented, being rather content to want the money than be troubled any longer with his company.

(5c) Pat. 9 R. II. p. 1. m. 6. & Ibid. p. 2. m. 28.

(5d) Rot. Parl. 9 R. II. n. 17. Cart. 10 R. II. m. 1. n. 2.

(5e) Ibid.

(5f) Ibid.

(5b) Pat. 9 R. II. p. 2. m. 17. & Ibid. m. 14. & Rym. Vol. VII. p. 503, & 506. (5i) Cart. 10 R. II. m. 1. n. 2.

[U] Witness to two deeds.] These were, 1st, 37 Edward III, February, 1363, a confirmation of the treaty concluded between Peter, King of Castile and Leon, and Sir William Latimer, Knt. Lord Latimer, and John de Stretely, Dean of Lincoln, his Plenipotentiaries. The second was articles of a contract of marriage, executed at Dover-castle, 38 Edward III, October 19, 1364, between Edmund de Langule, the King's son, and Margaret, Dutcheffs of Burgundy, daughter to the Earl of Flanders (87).

[W] That he might get the dominion of Ireland.] The Irish historian gives this account of him: 'The English parliament, says he, to get rid of him, gave him a debt of 30000 marks, due from the French King, upon condition that after Easter he should pass into Ireland, to recover the lands the King had given him there. He had 500 men at arms, at 12d. per day, and 1000 archers, at 6d. a day, appointed him for two years, for the reduction of that country. He was trusted with the whole dominion of the realm during his life, without paying any thing therefore, or making any account for it. He had power to pass all writs under his own test, and to place and displace all officers, how great soever, even the Chancellor, Treasurer, Admiral, &c. and to name his own Deputy, and all other ministers. Afterwards he had a larger patent, whereby the King granted him the whole territory and government of Ireland, the isles thereto adjacent, with castles, counties, burroughs, towns, seaports, &c. together with homages, obeissances, vassals, servants, and acknowledgments of the Prelates, Earls, and Barons, &c. with the royalties, regalities, liberties, &c. with all other things belonging to the sovereign power, with absolute and joint authority, so fully, perfectly, and truly, as he the King held, or had the same, or any of his progenitors in times past. To hold by homage and allegiance (88).

But that, says another historian, which is most strange is, that those letters patent should be authorized by the assent of the Prelates, Dukes, and other Peers, and

(88) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, p. 135, 136.

(87) Rymer, Tom. V. p. 401, and p. 444 to 449.

in Hertfordshire, one of his own Royal palaces, granting him fire-wood out of his woods and parks there (51). Thus puffed up with wealth and honour, he grew insolent, and thereby raised such powerful enemies, as obliged him to fly for his safety beyond-sea with Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk [X]. Yet it was not long e'er he again landed in England with about four or five thousand men, and, being got into Oxfordshire, came, on the feast-day of St Thomas the Apostle, to Radcote-bridge upon the river Isis; which bridge Henry Earl of Derby, who with his power was not far off, had broken in three places, and placed soldiers there to stop his farther passage. The Duke therefore, seeing himself in this desperate condition, displayed the King's banner, and animated his men to fight, advancing before them to the bridge; and finding it impassable, environed by the Duke of Gloucester on one side, and the Earl of Derby on the other, he threw away his sword, gauntlets, and armour, and, leaping into the river, escaped them. But the Lords, growing powerful, caused the King to summon a parliament, which met at Westminster, 11 R. II, where articles of high-treason were exhibited against him by the Duke of Gloucester, Henry Earl of Derby, Richard Earl of Arundel, and others; and he, not appearing, was forthwith banished, and all his possessions confiscated, excepting his entailed lands, which only were to remain to his right heirs (5m). Being likewise attainted, outlawed, and fled beyond sea (5n), he was, after five years banishment, struck by a wild boar in hunting (5o), and died of his hurts at Lovaine, November 22, 1392, 16 R. II. (5p), in great distress and penury, leaving nothing, says my Author, but his tomb and titles, and the world matter of talk (5q) [Z]. The Duke dying without issue, his heir was his paternal uncle, Alberic de Vere, who, in 16 R. II, was restored to the honour (5r), and thereby became the ninth Earl of Oxford. This Alberic, before he had the title, was employed in several commissions in the service of his country [Z]: But being now grown infirm, the office of Lord High Chamberlain of England was, on 17 R. II, bestowed by the King on John Holland, Earl of Huntington, for life (5s). And the Earl of Oxford continuing still weak, had special licence to be absent from that parliament held at Shrewsbury, 21 R. II, in which the attainder of his nephew Robert, Duke of Ireland, was revoked and annulled (5t). He departed this life on St George's day, 1 Hen. IV (5u), leaving issue by his wife Alice, daughter of John, Lord Fitzwalter,

Richard (5w), his heir, who thereby became the eleventh Earl of Oxford. The Commons the same year in parliament prayed in his behalf, that having married Alice, the daughter of the King's sister, he might be restored to the office of Chamberlain of England, being his due inheritance, and taken away by violence by King Richard II; but the King, Henry IV, did not then assent (5x) [AA]. However, being a minor, his Majesty, in the third year of his reign, Commonalty of the English parliament. Yet nothing violent is permanent: And that new strange shadow of honour soon vanished. He went as far as Wales, and the King with him, in order to go to his government; but they could not be persuaded to part; so he never went over, and deputed Sir John Stanley Lord Deputy (89).

[X] He fled beyond sea, with the Earl of Suffolk.] He grew insolent and blustering, says Walsingham, and put away the fair Lady Philippa, his wife (kinswoman to the King) with purpose to take another who came out of Bohemia with Queen Anne, and was of mean extraction; which gave great distaste to the nobility, especially to the Duke of Gloucester, the King's uncle, who, though he could not at present vindicate his niece, so repudiated, reserved himself for an opportune time to do it. But soon after, Easter being passed, and the expectation of his going to Ireland still continuing, the King, to prevent any tumult by the Nobles, accompanied him part of his way; and continuing retired for a while, they consulted together how to murder the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham. And having staid in those remote parts of the kingdom, till they imagined the people had forgotten the so much talked of voyage into Ireland, he returned with the King to Nottingham castle, there to consider farther how they might best put in execution the designed murders. The Nobles therefore, by way of prevention, raised all the power they could, and met at Haringhay Park, near High-gate in Middlesex, in an hostile manner; which so startled the King, and his party then about him, that all of them began to desire an accommodation, and to that end sent to the Lords at Haringhay to come to Westminster, that, upon a calm debate together, differences might be quietly composed: Who meeting there accordingly, the Lord Chancellor (Bishop of Ely) made a short speech to them, in the close whereof he said the King desired to know the cause of this their insurrection; to which they answered, that it was for the King's advantage to rid him of those Traitors he then had about him; among whom they first named Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland. But the King, giving them fair words, and taking them into his chamber, where he made them drink together, told them they should all meet in parliament, and equal justice should be done to each. Matters being thus qualified, the Duke of Ireland, by the King's connivance, hastes forthwith into Wales, there to raise what power he could (90); but discerning his danger, privily got away, disguised, as was said, in the habit of a servant, with a bow and a quiver of arrows at his back, and so, with five others in his company, alike accoutred, came to Chester, and soon after that fled beyond-sea, with Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk (91).

[Z] Leaving the world matter of talk.] About three years after, viz. in November, 1395, 19 R. II, the King having caused his body to be embalmed, and brought over into England in a Cyprus case, made a solemn funeral for him at Celne in Essex, which he honoured with his presence, and caused the coffin of Cyprus, wherein his body lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, and touch him with his fingers, openly shewing his love to the dead carcass which he bore him when alive (92). And Speed relates (93), that he caused him to be apparelled in princely ornaments and robes, and put about his neck a chain of gold, and rings upon his fingers (94).

[Z] He executed several commissions.] On the 14th of May, 1377, 51 Edw. III, he was joined in commission with the Bishop of St David's, Lord Chancellor, William de Montague, Earl of Salisbury, and others, to treat of a peace and truce with Charles, King of France (95). In 4 Rich. II, as Ambassador, he treated with the Emperor of the Romans, and signed the articles of marriage between Richard and Anne daughter of the said Emperor (96). In 7 Rich. II, Oct. 4, 1383, he was commissioned with John Devereux, Governor of Calais, to treat about a time and place for meeting of Plenipotentiaries of France to conclude a peace and truce at (97). And, in 8 Rich. II, he was retained to serve the King in the wars of Scotland (98).

[AA] The King did not then assent.] However, in 2 Hen. IV, it was enacted by parliament, that, if this Richard Earl of Oxford, when he came of age, should consent that Philippa, Dutchess of Ireland, might enjoy her dower out of the entailed lands, confirmed and assured to her by Earl Aubery, his father, he should have, to him and his heirs, all those lands which were the Duke of Ireland's, in demesne or reversion, and in the King's hands, upon the 1st of March preceding (99).

(51) Par. II. R. II. p. 1. m. 2.

(5n) Ibid. 2727. n. 30 and 40.

(5o) Leland's Collect. Vol. 1. p. 190. Ypod Neustr. p. 152. n. 40.

(5p) Milles, p. 633.

(5q) Borlase's Hist. of Ireland, p. 60.

(5r) Rot. Parl. 16 R. II. n. 15.

(5s) Ibid. 21 R. II. p. 2. m. 14. & 22. R. II. p. 3. m. 1.

(5t) Efc. r. H. IV. & 1b. schedul. p. 4.

(5x) Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. IV. n. 140.

(90) Walsingham, p. 358 to 362 inclusive.

(91) Knighton, p. 2701. n. 60. p. 2702.

(92) Leland's Collect. Vol. I. p. 155. n. 10.

(93) In his Chronicles, p. 618. And Stow's Annals, p. 312.

(94) With the King, at his funeral, were the Countess of Oxford, the Duke's mother, the Abp. Cant. with many of the Bps, but few of the temporal Lords, their old hatred towards him being not then abated, says Walsingham, p. 359.

(95) Rymer Vol. VII. p. 145, 151. In this commission he is wrote Sir Aubrey de Vere, Kat.

(96) Ibid. p. 290. The other Ambassadors were Edmund, Earl of Cambridge, and Hugh de Segrave, Steward of the Household.

(97) Ibid. p. 412.

(98) Ex Autog. penes Cleric. de Pall.

(99) Rot. Parl. 2 Henry IV.

(5m) Knighton, p. 2702, 2703, 2706, 2714, and 2726. in their pursuit of him, it is said his chariot was taken, and in it the King's letters, appointing him to haste to London with what strength he had, expressing, that he was ready to live and die with him. Walsingham, p. 363. n. 10. and Rymer, Vol. VII. p. 567.

(5n) Milles's Cat. of Nob. p. 690. & Par. 17 R. II. p. 1. m. 23.

(5o) Milles, ubi supra, who mentions another son, John, that died unmarried, and a daughter, Alice, married to Sir John Fitz-Lewis, Kat.

(89) Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, p. 60.

(5y) Pat. 3 H. IV.
p. 1. m. 34.

(5z) Rymer,
Vol. VIII. p. 463.
It was settled upon the Prince and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to his other sons, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, and the heirs male of their bodies.

(*) Chichley,
Vol. I. p. 304. a.
(6c) Esc. 4 H. V.
n. 53. Buck.

(6e) Ex Autog.
penes Cler. Pell.
p. 1. m. 3 & 5.

(6b) Pat. 7 H. VI.
p. 1. m. 3 & 5.

(6l) Rot. Franc.
14 H. VI. m. 5.

(6m) Hall's
Chron. p. 133.
In the same year performing his homage, he had livery of all the lands which descended to his wife by the death of her mother,
being sole heir
to her parents.
Rot. Fin. 16 Henry VI. m. 5.
and Descents of Nobility, per
Hen. Chiting.
Lanc. Feclal.

(6s) Ibid. p. 247,
248, 293, & 327.

(6u) Ibid. p. 389,
426, et seq.

(6w) Stowe's
Annals, p. 416.
Holinshead,
p. 665. b. n. 20.
Hall's Chron.
fol. 139.

(6x) Weever's
Fun. Mon. p. 418.

(6y) Esc. 3 Edward IV. n. 23.
Oxon.

(100) Walsingham, p. 411.
n. 20, 30, 40.
(101) Rymer,
Vol. VIII. p. 379.

granted him 100 l. per annum for his maintenance, to be received out of the profits of his own lands (5y) [BB]. In the eighth of Henry V, being then of full age, he was one of the witnesses to the King's altering the succession of the crown, and settling it on his son Henry, Prince of Wales (5z), who succeeding to the throne, under the stile of King Henry V, did, in the third year of his reign, summon this Earl Richard, among other great Lords, to meet him in the Quindenés of Easter, when he thanked them, and declared his intentions of going beyond-sea for the recovery of his rights (6a). Going soon after the same year, he was attended into France by the Earl (6b); but before the end thereof, finding himself infirm, he made his last will on the 6th of August, 1415, therein bequeathing his body to be buried in the conventual church of the Priory of Colne in Essex, where his ancestors lay interred, and gave to Alice, his wife, all his personal estate, to pay his debts, discharge his funeral expences, and dispose of for pious uses (*). He was the second Knight of the Garter elected in the reign of Henry V. (6c); and in the fourth of Henry V. he was retained to serve the King in person in his wars of France (6d), but died the same year on the morrow after St Valentine's day, leaving issue by Alice, his wife, daughter and co-heir of Sir Richard Sergeaux, Knt. two sons (6e) [CC], of which the eldest,

John, became the twelfth Earl of Oxford, being then only nine years of age (6f). On 4 Hen. VI. he was, among others, knighted by the King at Leicester on Whitsunday (6g). In 7 Hen. VI. being then in ward, and having married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Howard the younger, Knt. without licence, he was obliged to purchase his pardon at the expence of 2000 l. paid into the Exchequer. And before the end of that year, making proof of his age, and doing his homage, he had livery of his lands (6h). In 13 Hen. VI. the King granted him his licence, with twelve persons of his retinue, to go in pilgrimage to the Holy land (6i): As also his protection for two years, with allowance of carrying, in specie or bullion, 100 l. and to receive 500 marks more, by way of exchange, to defray his expences (6k). In 14 Hen. VI. he was one of the commanders under the Duke of Gloucester sent to the relief of Calais, then besieged (6l); and the French, on hearing of their arrival, retired before it, July 18, in the night, with such precipitation, that they left behind them their provisions, tents, &c. (6m). In 17 Hen. VI. the Earl was joined in commission with John Duke of Norfolk, and others, to treat in the marches of Calais with Charles de Valois, or his Ambassadors, about a perpetual peace between England and France (6n); and also about setting at liberty the Duke of Orleans, then prisoner in England (6o). In 18 Hen. VI. (Richard, Duke of York, being made Regent of France on the death of the Earl of Warwick) the Earl of Oxford was the principal commander under him; and, with other noblemen, going into Normandy, obliged the French King to raise the siege of Pontboise, leaving behind great riches and much provision (6p). The Earl probably continued in the wars of France till the conclusion of a truce in 23 Hen. VI (6q), in which year (1446) the King, at his instance, as proprietor of the ship called the Jesus of Orwel, granted licence, March 8, to the captain thereof to transport as many persons as he shall think proper, going on a pilgrimage to St James in Galicia (6r). In 28 Hen. VI, a truce being made between England and France, he was appointed a conservator thereof on the part of England; as he was also of another truce, made the year following, for three years, from August, 1451, to August, 1454; and likewise of a third, concluded at Newcastle in 31 Hen. VI, to continue from May, 1453, to May, 1457 (6s). In 32 Hen. VI. he, with the Earls of Salisbury, Shrewsbury, and some other Lords, undertook to keep the seas for three years next following, being allowed the subsidies of tonnage and poundage then granted for that service (6t). In 35 Hen. VI. he was again appointed one of the conservators of the truce made for two years with Scotland; as also of another, concluded for five years, in 38 Hen. VI (6u). But when King Edward IV. attained the crown, he caused this Earl John, far stricken in years, and Aubery, his eldest son (with others) to be attainted in parliament, and afterwards (viz. Feb. 1, 1 Edw. IV.) beheaded them both on Tower-hill (6w), and they were buried in the church of the Augustin friars, London (6x). Besides Aubery, he had, by his wife Elizabeth beforementioned, four sons, of whom

John, the eldest, became the thirteenth Earl of Oxford, who was then twenty-three years of age (6y). The Earl, during the reign of King Edward, went through great hardships for his loyalty to the Lancastrian party; and being in France in the 9th of Edward IV, was at the consultation at Amboya with the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and the French King, Queen Margaret, Henry VI's Queen, and Edward her son, to restore Henry VI; which being effected, the Earl of Oxford bore the sword in the procession from [BB] Out of the profits of his own lands.] About this time, or not long before, Maud, Countess of Oxford, widow of Earl Thomas, and mother to Robert, Duke of Ireland, still surviving, caused it to be divulged, that King Richard II. was alive, and that he would forthwith lay claim to his crown; and procured hearts to be made of silver and gilt, (badges that King Richard gave to his friends, soldiers, and servants) to be in the King's name distributed in the country, whereby the people might be the sooner ready to rise on his behalf: Giving it farther out, that he was privately kept in Scotland till he could have a fit opportunity to come in with an army of French and Scots. Hereupon she was committed to prison, and her goods confiscated (100). But the King, at the request of his Queen, pardoned her, and restored her to all her lands and tenements, fees, advowsons, goods, and chattels (101). This Maud, by her will, dated at Bentley, Jan. 20, 1412, (14 Hen. IV.) bequeathed her body to be buried in the Nuns church-yard at Brusezard, and gave those nuns the manor of Wrabnase in pure alms, and died on the conversion of St Paul the same year (102).

[CC] He had two sons.] Viz. John and Robert. The younger of which took to wife Joan, widow of Nicholas, Lord Carew, daughter to Sir Hugh Courtney of Haccomb, Knt. and heir to her mother Philippa, one of the daughters and heirs to Sir Warine Archdecon, Knt. and had issue John, who married Alice, daughter and heir to Walter Kilrington of Trefithryn in Cornwall, by whom he had issue John Vere (103), who, after the death of that Earl John, commonly called Little John of Campes, became Earl of Oxford, as will be seen presently.

(6a) Ibid.
Tom. IX. p. 222.
(6b) Rot. Franc.
3 Hen. V. m. 14.

(6d) Ashmole's
Order of Garter,
p. 610.

(6f) Esc. 4 H. IV.
ut supra.

(6g) The King himself having received that honour at the hands of the Duke of Bedford. Leland's collections, Vol. I.
p. 705.

(6i) Rot. Franc.
ibid.

(6k) Rymer,
Vol. X. p. 601.

(6n) Rot. Franc.
17 H. VI. m. 10.

(6o) Rymer,
Vol. X. p. 728.
Their instructions bear date
May 21, 1439,
17 Hen. VI.

(6p) Stowe's Annals, p. 378, 379.

(6q) Hall's
Chron. fol. 148. b.

(6r) Rymer,
Vol. XI. p. 79.

(6t) Ex Autog.
penes Cler. Pell.
The following year, 1455, he was one of the Council, who,

with the King,
signed a mandate
for releasing the Duke of Somers-set out of the Tower upon bail,
Feb. 15; and
was with the King in Council
at Greenwich,
when he declared
the Duke his true
and faithful subject, and discharged his bail,
March 4. Ry-
mer, Vol. XI.
p. 361, 362.

(102) Arundel,
Vol. II. f. 161. a.

(103) Vincent's Coin. of Brook,
p. 406.

the Tower (where the King was imprisoned) to St Paul's cathedral (62). Upon the recovery of the Crown, King Henry VI. called a parliament, wherein Edward being declared a Traitor and Usurper, the Earl of Oxford, attainted by him (7a), was restored in blood, dignities, and ancient possessions. On the 23d of December following he was commissioned, with Richard Earl of Warwick, and others, to levy all persons capable of bearing arms, and to muster and review them as often as occasion should require; and to lead and command them in opposing King Henry's enemies, with a mandate to the Sheriffs of Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Hertford, to aid and assist as often as required (7b). And John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, having rendered himself very obnoxious to the Lancastrians, he was seized and brought to London, where the Earl of Oxford sat High Steward on his trial, and, pronouncing the sentence of death upon him, he was beheaded on Tower-hill (7c). On the first news of King Edward's return and landing, the Earl of Oxford repaired immediately to the Earl of Warwick in Warwickshire, and was with him when Clarence's message was delivered, unto which he made this reply: Go, tell your Duke, that I had rather be an Earl, and always like myself, than a false and perjured Duke; and that e'er my oath shall be falsified (as his apparently is) I will lay down my life at my enemy's foot, which I doubt not but shall be bought very dear (7d) [DD]. Soon after followed the memorable battle of Barnet-field, where the Earl of Oxford commanded the right wing of the army against Edward, and led the van-guard; but, by mistake, his own men shooting against each other (7e), he and all his party were routed; whereupon he fled into Wales [EE], and thence to St Michael's mount in Cornwall (7f); but being besieged there, after a stout resistance, was forced to surrender a prisoner to King Edward, who sent him to the castle of Hams in Picardy (7g); and in the parliament begun at Westminster, Oct. 6, 14 Edw. IV. he (together with his brothers, Sir George and Sir Thomas) were attainted, but pardoned for their lives (7b). In 2 Rich. III, being still prisoner in the castle of Hams, and observing what hopes of aid the Earl of Richmond then had from the French and others, he escaped thence, and together with Sir James Blount, Governor of that castle, and Sir John Fortescue, Porter of Calais, went to the Earl of Richmond (at Montargis) to assist him in gaining the crown of England; Richmond received him with much joy, being a person of high nobility, expert in military affairs, and withal of high integrity; as Polydore Virgil relates (7i); and our other historians mention the great joy Richmond had on seeing him, looking on it as a presage of his happy success. When Richard received this news, he appointed part of the garrison at Calais to march out to regain the castle of Hams; but the garrison sending to the Earl of Richmond for more aid, he dispatched the Earl of Oxford with a choice number of expert soldiers, who, by his skilful conduct, drew off those in the castle without any loss. After which he hastened to the Earl of Richmond in Paris, and never left him till he had settled the crown of this realm upon his head, by the name and stile of Henry VII. (7k) [FF]. Upon which event the Earl was immediately restored to all his possessions (7l), and chosen of the Privy Council (7m). Also, at his coronation, was constituted one of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Steward of England (7n), and was the first Knight of the Garter elected in that King's reign (7o) [GG]. And September 22, the said

(62) Hall's Chron. l. 2. c. 10. 210, and again, l. 42. c. 107. See also the Chron. l. 1. c. 107.

(7a) Hall, f. 210. and Speed, p. 693, 364.

(7b) Rymer, Vol. XI. p. 677, 678.

(7c) Speed's Chron. p. 693, who tells us, that Tiptoft was found hidden in the top of a tree in the forest of Weybridge, not far from Huntingdon.

(7e) For an account of this battle, see the Gen. Histories of Eng. The mistake was owing to the Earl's men having stars with streamers for their liveries, which, by reason of a mist, rendered them not distinguishable from those of K. Edward; whereupon the Earl's soldiers crying treason, he fled, with 800 of them. See Hollinshed, Hall, and Speed.

(7m) Pol. Virg. p. 566. n. 30. (7n) Pat. 1 Henry VII. p. 2. m. 17. (7o) Ashmole's Order of Garter, p. 712.

(7d) Ibid. p. 694, 695.

(7f) Polydore Virgil, p. 526, 527, and 532. (7g) Hall, f. 224.

(7i) Cotton's Records, p. 699, 700.

(7j) In his Hist. p. 558. n. 20.

(7k) Ibid. p. 558. (7l) Rot. Parl. 1 H. VII. m. 10. Rec. de Term. Hil. 2 H. VII. Rot. 5.

[DD] It shall be bought dear. King Edward, upon his landing at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, laying aside all claim to the crown, pretended he was come only to enjoy his dutchy of York, whereupon he was admitted into that city, on taking his oath to be true to King Henry (104). But after that growing more potent, and the Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward, falling from the Earls of Warwick and Oxford, to whom, in France, he had taken an oath to continue in firm amity with them, Edward took on himself the title of King at Nottingham (105). The Earl of Oxford was linked in close friendship with the Earl of Warwick, having married Margaret his sister, and had cause of inveteracy against King Edward, who had banished him, and put his father and brother to death, as beforementioned. Therefore it may be presumed he had some influence on the Earl of Warwick, in keeping him steady in the interest of King Henry; when the Duke of Clarence, who had married Warwick's daughter, endeavoured to reconcile him to King Edward, promising him to work his peace, and that with such honour, as Warwick should know himself not only a father to CLARENCE, but likewise to Edward, England's King (106).

[EE] He fled into Wales. Leland says he fled into Scotland (107); but others say more truly that he fled towards Scotland, and finding danger in so long a journey, he altered his purpose, and turned into Wales, and thence, with the Earl of Pembroke, into France, and having gotten much at sea, came into the West country, where by subtlety he entered St Michael's mount in Cornwall with 397 men (108), on the last of September, and divers times coming down there into the adjacent villages, had good cheer of the inhabitants: Whereupon Bodrigan, the King's Lieutenant in that county, being commanded by the King, besieged the Mount, but so favourably, that the Earl revictualled it; so that Richard Fortescue, Esq; of the body to the King, Sheriff of Cornwall, was sent to continue the siege. And King Edward, by sending pardons, so wrought with the soldiers in the Mount, that, had not the Earl submitted, his own men would have made him prisoner, whereby Fortescue entered the Mount on the 15th of February following, wherein he found victuals enough to have served till Midsummer (109).

[FF] He settled the crown upon Richmond's head. Upon Richmond's arrival in England, he marched with him to Bosworth, where King Richard being ready to give him battle, Richmond marshalled his army, and appointed this Earl to command the vanguard, consisting of archers. And he behaved with such great courage in the battle, that when they came to the sword, fearing to be encompassed, he commanded that no soldier should stir above ten feet from his colours: and then most valiantly charging the enemy in form of a wedge, put them to the rout, in which he slew many, and thereby became one of the chiefest instruments in obtaining the happy victory that day, August 22, 1458 (110).

[GG] He was the first Knight of the Garter, &c. He also stood in such high favour with the King, that he obtained a grant to himself, and Margaret his wife, and to the heirs of Margaret, of the lordship of De la Mere, in com. Hertford and Middlesex, late belonging to George Nevil, Archbishop of York; also of the manors of Frankingbam, Kelvall, Harestone, Pesenball, Walton, with Tremley, and the hundred of Loese in Suffolk, and of the manor of Willington in com. Bedford, which were part of the possessions of John, late Duke of Norfolk, attainted: Likewise of the manors of Berham, Walkesfart, and Powers, in Waltham-parva in Essex, late the lands of Francis Viscount Lovell, attainted; and of the manor of Botesworth in com. Northampton, late William Catesby's, Esq; attainted: Also of the house called the Herber, in the parish of S. Mary Botolph in the ward of Dowgate,

(104) Speed, p. 694.

(105) Hall, fol. 215.

(106) Speed, p. 694, 695.

(107) Collect. Vol. 1. p. 728.

(108) Ibid. Stowe, Chron. p. 426. says he had only 77 men.

(109) Stowe, as before.

(110) Pol. Virg. p. 563. n. 18, 20, 30.

first year of his reign, he was made Constable of the Tower of London for life (7p), and likewise Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the Dutchy of Aquitain (7q). In the 3d of Henry VII. he was constituted one of the commissioners to exercise the office of High Steward of England at the coronation of the Queen (7r). And, upon the infurrection made by John Earl of Lincoln on the behalf of Lambert Simnel, this Earl, with Jasper Duke of Bedford, was chief commander of the King's forces against those rebels, and vanquished them, June 16, in a pitched battle at Stoke, near Newark upon Trent (7s). In 4 Hen. VII. he was empowered to examine what number of archers, armed at the King's expence, the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Hertford, could provide for the relief of Britany; and to article with them, and review them, and to certify their names before the Quindenes of Easter (7t). And the same year, with the Duke of Bedford, had the command of those forces sent by King Henry into Flanders, in aid of Maximilian the Emperor against the French (7u). In the 8th of Henry VII. this Earl had the chief command of the army sent against the French, and the King, in October, met him, then come from beating down the town of ARDE, at Mergifon (7w), in his way to Bulloign. Two days after which they came before that town, and besieged it till the 8th of November, when a peace being concluded with the French at Staples upon the sea near that town, the Earl of Oxford assented, and signed the same (7x). In 9 Hen. VII. he was constituted Constable of the castle of Clare in Suffolk (7y), and, in 11 Hen. VII. he was one of the Guarantees on the part of England for keeping the peace then concluded with the Archduke of Austria (7z). In 12 Hen. VII. he was the chief commander against the Lord Audley and the Cornish rebels at the battle of Black-beath, and environing the hill with his archers and horsemen, set on them with great valour, killing 300, and taking 1500 prisoners (8a). In 23 Hen. VII. he, with other great Lords, entered into a recognizance of 50000 crowns each, for performance of the articles of marriage between Charles, Prince of Spain, and Mary, the King's third daughter; and was present at that marriage, solemnized in the palace at Richmond, December 7, 1508, 24 Hen. VII. (8b). On the accession of Hen. VIII. the Earl's patents were renewed for the office of Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the dutchy of Aquitain, and of the constablership of the castle of Clare, and both were made to him for life (8c). He had also, May 16, 1 Hen. VIII, a grant and confirmation, to him and his heirs, of the castle and tower of Colchester (8d); and likewise a confirmation of the office of Lord Great Chamberlain of England (8e). After this there does not appear any mention of him, but that he made his will [HH] near five years before his death, which happened on Thursday, March 10, in 4 Hen. VIII, having been Earl of Oxford full fifty years, and was buried in the priory of Colne, according to his desire (8f). He largely contributed to the finishing St Mary's church in Cambridge (8g), and, in the estimation of all that knew him (8b), was a very wise, learned, religious, and magnificent man [II].

(7s) Pol. Virg. p. 573. n. 10. and Stow, p. 473.

(7t) Rymer, Vol. XII. p. 356.

(7u) Pol. Virg. p. 584. n. 40.

(7x) Rymer, Vol. XII. p. 710.

(7y) Pat. 9 H. VII. p. 1. m. 25.

(7z) Rymer, Vol. XI. p. 588.

(8c) Pat. 3 Hen. VIII. p. 1. m. 26.

(8d) Rymer, Vol. XIII. p. 251.

(8e) Pat. 3 Hen. VIII. p. 1. m. 26.

(8f) MS. I. 7. in Offic. Armor.

(8g) Weever, p. 617.

(8b) Hist. of Eng. Vol. I. p. 560.

(7p) Rymer, Vol. XII. p. 276.

(7q) Pat. 1 Hen. VII. p. 1. m. 13.

(7r) Ibid. 3 Hen. VII. p. 1. m. 17.

(7w) Stow's Annals, p. 477, who says the King landed at Calais on Oct. 15, and departed thence towards Bulloign, lying the first night at Sandingfield, and the next at Mergifon.

(8a) Stow, p. 480, and Hall, f. 42, 43.

(8b) Rymer, Vol. XIII. p. 176, 177, 237, 238, where we find the King and Prince of Wales bound themselves in 25000 crowns; and that John de Berghis, Chamberlain to the Emperor, and Knight of the Golden Fleece, stood as proxy to the Prince of Spain.

(111) Pat. 2 Hen. VII. p. 2.

Dowgate, London, part of the possessions of George, late Duke of Clarence; to hold to him and to the heirs male of his body (111).

[HH] He made his will.] It was dated April 10, 1508, being (as his words are) in good health and perfect mind, not grieved, vexed, troubled, nor diseased with any bodily sickness. He bequeathed to the figure of the blessed Lady at Walsingham, his eagle of gold, displayed and garnished. He also bequeathed, in honour of the holy and blessed King, Maiden, and Martyr, St Edmund, to his monastery at Bury, his best whole suit of vestments of cloth of gold of tissue, viz. for Priest, Deacon, and Subdeacon. And he wills and requires his Executors, as hastily as they can after his departure, to cause 2000 masses of requiem to be said and sung for his soul by every Fryar, being a Priest, in any of the houses of the black Fryars in Cambridge and Oxford, and the white Fryars of Lynn, which houses were of the foundation of his ancestors. And also to the brethren of the Charterhouse, London, Shene and Sion; and every Monk, Chanon, or every other religious person, being a Priest, or abiding within any house of religion of the foundation of any of his ancestors, shall sing and say Placebo and Dirige, and commendations, and have 3 s. 4 d. for their labour. And every other Fryar, Monk, Chanon, or Priest, within any house of religion in the shires of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, shall have, for their labour, 1 s. 6 d. His other bequests to Priests are very numerous. He wills that, if he has issue male of his body, lawfully begotten, they shall have his image of the Trinity, silver and gilt, and his cross of gold, wherein lie two pieces of the holy cross, with the garnishing of the same; his bed of Roote, which he had by reason of his office of Great Chamberlain of England at the King's coronation; also his hangings of Tulins, a Celonanda Tessel of rich Arras, with a Torney thereon, which he had at the coronation of the Queen that is dead, by reason of his said office, with several other particulars recited, which were to go to his heirs male, and in default to his nephew John Veer, son of his brother Sir George Veer, when he comes to the age of twenty-one years; and in default to his cousin John Veer, son and heir to Sir Robert Veer, Knt. his uncle, and in default to his right heirs. To the same heirs he also bequeathed the castle and honour of Hedingham and Gelham, with his manors of Bumsted, Canfield, Praisers, Bowre-hall, Greys in Hedingham-Sibille, Earls-Colne, Bentley, Crepinghall, Downham, Lavenham, Overhall, Nether-hall, Cokefield, Walsham-hall, Campes, Abingdon, Saxton, Swaffham-Bulbeck, Kensyngton, and his place near Bishops-gate in London. All which were of the old inheritance of the Earldom of Oxford, as by old gifts thereof made to his ancestors manifestly did appear. He farther bequeathed to his nieces, Dorothy and Ursula, 600 marks, and constitutes executors, Elizabeth his dear wife, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir James Hobant, Sir Robert Drury, Sir William Waldegrave, Sir Robert Lovel, Knts. Dr William Cook, John Veer the elder, Humphry Wingfield, John Daniel, John Josselyn, Esqs; and William Okeley, Gent. each of which, being of the degree of a Knight, he bequeaths 10 l. and to every other, ten marks (112).

[II] He was a magnificent man.] Of his hospitality, and the great post he lived in, we have the following instance by Lord Bacon: The King, says that learned Author, was on a time entertained by the Earl of Oxford (that was his principal servant both for war and peace) nobly and sumptuously at his castle at Heningham: And, at the King's going away, the Earl's servants stood in a seemly manner in their livery coats, with cognizances, ranged on both sides, and made the King a lane. The King called the Earl unto him, and said, My Lord, I have heard much of your hospitality; but it is greater than the speech: These handsome gentlemen and yeomen, which I see on both sides of me, are sure your menial servants. The Earl smiled, and said, That were not for mine ease: They are most of them my Retainers, that are come to do me service at such a time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. The King startled a little, and said, By my faith, my Lord, I thank you for my good cheer; but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my sight: My Attorney must speak with you. And it is part of the report, that the Earl compounded for no less than 15000 marks (113).

(112) By a codicil, dated Sept. 7. 1512, 4 H. VIII, he confirms this will, of which the probate is dated May 10, 1514, and administration granted to Sir R. Drury, Sir W. Waldegrave, Knts. J. Veer, J. Josselin, and J. Daniel, Esqs; and W. Okeley, Gent. See the probate of his will in cur. prærog. Cant.

(113) Bacon's life of Hen. VII. in Hist. of Eng. Vol. 1. p. 630.

He first married Margaret, daughter to Richard Nevile Earl of Salisbury, and sister to Richard the great Earl of Warwick, surnamed the King-maker (8i), by whom he had issue one son, John [KK], who died young in the Tower of London during his father's exile (8k). Margaret dying, he married Elizabeth Countess, daughter of Sir Richard Scrope, Knt. and widow of William Lord Viscount Beaumont (8l); but, having no issue by her [LL], the earldom devolved on his nephew,

John [MM], the fourteenth Earl of Oxford, who had also the titles of Lord Bolebec, Samford, and Scales. On the death of his uncle he was in his minority, and being small of stature, and residing at Castle-Camps in Cambridgeshire, a seat that had been in his family from the Conquest, he was by the common people called Little John of Campes (8m). In 12 Hen. VIII, being of full age, he had a special livery of his lands (8n); and the same year attended the King at Canterbury, in order to that grand interview appointed by King Henry VIII. and Francis the French King between Guines and Ardres; and had in his retinue three chaplains, six gentlemen, thirty-three servants, and twenty horses (8o) [NN]. This Earl John took to wife Anne, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk (8p), and dying July 14, 1526, 18 Hen. VIII, without issue, was buried with his ancestors at Colne (8q). Whereupon the inheritance, by his will, devolved, together with the Earldom, upon his next heir

Sir John Vere (8r), who was the fifth of that name, and the fifteenth Earl of Oxford; and, on the 15th of October following, he was, with Francis the French King, elected Knight at the battle of the Spurs. Cat. of Knights, MS. col. per Nich. Jekyll, Armiger.

[KK] One son, John, by Margaret his wife.] This Lady, while her husband was prisoner in the castle of Hanis, was not suffered to have access to him, and was forced to live upon the charity of others and by her needle-work, both very short to supply her great wants. This unmerciful and most inhumane usage was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himself, his father, and brother, had ever sided with the Lancastrians. And she, being sister to Richard Earl of Warwick, the capital enemy of King Edward, was held either dangerous, if her wealth balanced her birth and estate, or else unworthy of his favour, whose good fortunes, as was suggested, she ever maligned (114). However King Edward, toward the latter end of his reign, granted her, being in great want, and her husband standing attainted as the patent sets forth, an annuity of 100l. per annum during her life, to be paid out of the imposts upon wines in the port of London (115).

[LL] He had no issue by his second wife Elizabeth, &c.] This Countess, by her last will, dated May 30, 1537, 29 Hen. VIII, ordered her body to be buried in the parish-church of Wywenho (116). And soasmuch as she had found from experience, that the rich, as well as the poor and needy, resort to common doles, she therefore would have no such; but that her executors deliver to the curates, churchwardens, &c. of every parish near adjoining to the place of her burial, such sums of money as shall be thought convenient for the relief of poor and impotent persons of the said parishes; as also to the poor of every parish where she was patroness, and had lands, to pray for her soul, &c. To the same end she likewise bequeaths 12d. a mass for 200 masses, viz. of the Trinity, the Holy Ghost, and requies; and the five wounds 50 each: Also to the picture of the Lady of Walsingham her wedding-ring: Likewise to the parish-church of Wywenho her best vestment, her best cope of crimson velvet, her best chalices, and her two altar-cloths of crimson velvet, and a frunulet of the same suit; being a benefactor besides to many other churches and religious houses. And after bequeathing much rich furniture (117), &c. to John, then Earl of Oxford, and her brothers and sisters, and other near relations, she leaves the overplus among the poorest of her servants, and in other deeds of charity, at the discretion of her executors, who were, her brother Sir William Kingeston, her sister Jane Kingeston, Philip Parrys, Esq; John and Margaret Rider. And she appoints overseer of her will, Thomas Cromwell Lord Cromwell, and Lord Privy Seal, to whom she bequeaths, for a poor remembrance, 10l. The probate bears date November 6, 1537, which shews she died that year.

[MM] The earldom devolved on his nephew John.] This John was son and heir of Sir George Vere, brother to the late Earl of Oxford. Which Sir George Vere was also steady in the Lancastrian interest, and was a commander in those forces his brother John brought against King Edward, which obliged him to leave the kingdom. And when that monarch, in order to regain his crown, attempted to land in Essex, this Sir George, by his power and interest in that country (his brother being with King Henry) appeared so strong, that Edward was obliged to land, fore weather-beaten, at Ravenspur in Holderness (118). Sir George and his brother Thomas were with the Earl in the bloody battle of Barnet, and thence followed him, first into Wales, and after into France, and thence embarked with him, and were with him at the surrender of St Michael's mount in Cornwall: whereupon all three were attainted (119), but pardoned for their lives: and the attainder of Sir Thomas Vere, Knt. was afterwards revoked (120). This Sir Thomas, being one of the commanders under Sir Edward Poynings at the siege of Sluys, 5 Hen. VII, 1489, lost his life in the assault thereof, without leaving issue (121). Sir George Vere made his will August 21, 1500, wherein, bequeathing his body to be buried in the conventual church of the priory of Earls-Colne, he appoints, among other masses, twelve poor men to say to the twelve Apostles, at his funeral, before the high altar, the Lord's prayer; also in English, The Lord have mercy upon the soul of George Vere, and on the souls of all the faithful deceased (*). He bequeaths to the high altar at Heningham-castle, 10s. to the nuns at Heningham, 100 ewes; to the Franciscans at Colchester, to the Carmelites at Malden, to the Friars preachers at Chelmsford, and to the Augustine Friars at Clare, 13s. 4d. each; to his Executors 40l. to be laid out on his funeral; to Margaret his wife 40l. and all the silver plate and utensils of his house; to his three daughters, Elizabeth, Mary, and Dorothy, a gold chain, weight twenty-six ounces; a paper missale and a silver chalice to the high altar before which he was buried, and 3l. for gilding the said chalice; to the Friars preachers at Cambridge, 40s. to St Osieth's convent, 5l. to the high altar of that convent, a covering and case for the same of purple velvet with his arms upon it: That all his tenements in Colchester be sold, and the monies arising by such sale be applied to the use of his will; the remainder to be divided between his wife and his boys at the discretion of John Earl of Oxford, his brother, whom he appoints supervisor of his will (122), which being proved April 3, 1503, shews he lived almost three years after the making of it. Administration was granted to Margaret his widow, who was daughter and heir of William Stafford of Litchfield and Frome in com. Dorset, and had issue by her Sir George Vere, and John, the fourteenth Earl of Oxford (123); George was buried at Hallstead in Essex, where a monument was erected to his memory, much defaced in Weever's time (124): Their daughters were, Elizabeth, wife of Sir Anthony Wingfield, Knight of the Garter; Dorothy, wife of John Nevile, Lord Latimer; and Ursula, first married to George Windsor, Esq; and secondly to Sir Edmund Knightly, of Faverley in Northamptonshire.

[NN] He attended the King at Canterbury, &c.] Whilst they were at Canterbury, Charles the Emperor landed at Dover, where the King met him, and from thence they rode to Canterbury, where the Emperor was magnificently entertained for three days, and took leave of the King on the last of May. The same day the King, Queen, and his train, sailed from Dover, and landed at Calais, and in the Queen's train were the Countess of Oxford, consort to this Earl, as also the Countess dowager of Oxford (125).

(8i) Pat. 21 Edward IV. p. 1. m. 10.

(8j) Miller's Cat. of Nob. p. 695.

(8m) Pat. 12 H. VIII. p. 2.

(8o) MS. penes John Austis, Armiger. nuper Cart. Reg. Arm.

(8r) He was knighted, 5 Henry VIII. for his valiant behaviour

(114) Speed's Chron. p. 698.

(115) Pat. 21 Edward IV. p. 1. m. 10.

(116) By that of her former husband, Lord Beaumont.

(117) Consisting of Arras hangings, several diamond rings, a little cross of gold, with a piece of the holy cross inclosed, which she daily wore about her neck, a great silver shaving basin, weight 24 oz. a basin and ewer of silver, chased and gilt, &c.

(8k) Vincent's Discourse of Brooke's Barons, p. 403.

(8m) lb. p. 696. and Vincent's Baronetage MS. in Offic. Armor.

(8p) Miller's Cat. of Hon. p. 636.

(8q) Weever, p. 617.

(118) Stowe's Annals, p. 423.

(119) And he restored to the manor of Dillingham in com. Cantabr. and all other his hereditaments. Cotton's Records, p. 699, 700.

(120) Ann. 13 Ed. IV. Tit. 35, Ibid. p. 700.

(121) Hall's Chron. fol. 23. a. b.

(*) Also that a poor man say every day, for one year, the mass of the Virgin Mary, and that a poor woman, every Saturday, in honour of the Virgin Mary, do the office of the Priest.

(122) With a codicil, dated Dec. 2, 1502, wherein he bequeaths to John Vere, his son and heir, his gold seal, called Le Signet, and a gold ring with a ruby in it, besides his black velvet gown, with faines, to Ric. Fitz-Lewis, Kt. his kinsman, and a gown to each of his six servants.

(123) Vincent's Baronetage in Offic. Armor.

(124) Fun. Mon. p. 619. there was only remaining Georgio Vere filio Georgii Vere - - Miles - - 1498.

(125) Rymer. Vol. XIII. p. 721.

(8s) Ashmole, p. 322, 323. On their installation, 19 H. VIII, he was placed in the 11th stall on the Sovereign's side; but on the election of the King of Scots, in 27 Hen VIII, he was honoured with a higher stall. Ibid. p. 324.

(8z) Herbert, p. 207, 208.

(9b) Fun. Certif. i. 11. in Offic. Armor. 686.

(9c) Vincent's Baron. MS. in Offic. Armor.

(9d) Pat. 32 Hen. VIII. p. 1.

(9e) Herbert, as before, p. 244, et seq.

(9f) Rymer, Vol. XV. p. 71, 72.

(9i) Ex Regist. Chayre, qu. 22, in cur. Prærog. Cant.

(9k) This appears from the administration, which was granted May 29, 1563.

(126) Descent of Nob. by Henry Chiting, MS. Lanc. Feical.

(127) Pat. 19 Jac. p. 2.

(128) Pat. 2 C. I. p. 5.

of the Garter (8s). In 21 Hen. VIII. he received his writ to take his place in parliament (8t), and, October 1st following, sat among other nobles in the Star-chamber on the accusation of Cardinal Wolsey, and subscribed the articles against him, which were preferred to parliament (8u). July 13, 22 Hen. VIII, he subscribed that memorable letter, sent by the nobility of England, &c. to Pope Clement VII, intimating to his Holiness, that, unless he complied with King Henry in his divorce from Queen Catharine, his supremacy in this realm was not like to be long acknowledged (8w). In 24 Hen. VIII. the clergy, and other of the religious, to ingratiate themselves with the King, presented him with new-year's gifts very liberally, considering those of the nobility, of which notice was taken that the rich Earl of Oxford presented but nine sovereigns, valued at 10l. 2s. 6d. (8x); the Earl of Rutland 6l. 13s. 4d. &c. In 25 Hen. VIII. he was commissioned, with the Duke of Norfolk, to settle the household of the Lady (afterwards Queen) Mary (8y). In 28 Hen. VIII, on the rebellion of Aske and the northern rebels, the King, in justification of himself against their complaint of grievances, sets forth, that he had chosen of his Council Nobles of birth and condition, wherewith his subjects seemed to be content, and among them he mentions the Earl of Oxford (8z). In 29 Hen. VIII. he attended at the Christening of Prince Edward at Hampton-court, October 12 (9a.) And departed this life at his seat at Colne in Essex on Saturday, March 21, 31 Hen. VIII, and was buried at Castle-Henningham on Monday, April 12, following (9b). He married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Edward Truffel, Knight Banneret (son and heir of Sir William Truffel, Knt.) (9c), by whom he had issue three sons [OO], of whom

John de Veer, the sixth of that name, became the sixteenth Earl of Oxford, and, in 32 Hen. VIII, had livery of all the lands which descended to him by Elizabeth his mother, sister and heir to John Truffel, Esq; (9d). In 36 Hen. VIII. he was at the siege and taking of Bulloigne, having command in the rear of the King's army, under the conduct of John Lord Ruffel, Lord Privy Seal (9e). In 37 Hen. VIII. he received a commission of array to raise as well archers as horse and foot, to be in readiness to suppress the enemy as occasion required (9f). At the funeral of Henry VIII. at Windsor, Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, attending as chief mourner, the Earls of Oxford and Arundel were the two next (9g). At the coronation of Edward VI. he was made Knight of the Bath, and, being created with great royalty, was commanded to pay to the Heralds double fees (9h). July 28, 1562, 4 Eliz. he made his will, ordering his body to be buried in the body of the church of Earl's Colne (9i). He died in less than a year after this (9k). He married first Dorothy, daughter to Ralph Nevile, Esq; of Westmorland, who died, leaving him only a daughter Catharine [PP], whereupon he married secondly Margaret, daughter of John Golding, and sister of Sir Thomas Golding, Knt. by whom he had issue [OO] He had issue three sons.] His second son, Aubrey de Vere, married Margaret, daughter of John Spring, of Lanham in Suffolk, and had issue Hugh de Vere, who, by Eleanor his wife, daughter of --- Walsh, Esq; was father of Robert Earl of Oxford, as will be shewn hereafter. The third son, Geffery Vere, was father of Sir Francis and Sir Horace Vere Lord Vere of Tilbury, of both whom we have before treated. The said John Earl of Oxford had also three daughters; Elizabeth, married to Thomas Lord Darcy of Chich in Essex, who had issue by her John Lord Darcy, father of Thomas Lord Darcy of Chich; and Elizabeth, the second wife of John Lord Lumley (126). The said Thomas Lord Darcy married Mary, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Kitson of Hengrave in Suffolk, and, July 5, 1621, (19 Jac.) was created Viscount Colchester for life, with remainder to Sir Thomas Savage, Knt. and Bart. (who had married Elizabeth his eldest daughter) and to their heirs male (127). Also, Nov. 4, 2 Car. was created Earl Rivers, with like remainder to Sir Thomas Savage (128), from whom the Earls of Rivers descended. He had also three other daughters, who were, with the said Elizabeth, coheirs to the said Earl Rivers, who died Feb. 21, 1639, 15 Car. and was buried in the church of St Osth at Chich, whereby the Earldom devolved as beforementioned. His three daughters were, Mary, wedded to Roger Manwood, Esq; Penelope, to Sir G. Trenchard, of Wolveton in Dorsetshire, Knt. who died in a week after her marriage, and she was secondly the wife of Sir John Gage, of Firle in com. Suffex, Bart. ancestor by her to the present Viscount Gage; Susan, the youngest daughter, died unmarried; so that, by the family of Savage, Earls of Rivers, being extinct, the barony of Darcy is in abeyance, having its rise in the said Thomas Lord Darcy, who married the Earl of Oxford's daughter as abovementioned, and had summons to parliament 5 Edward VI.

Anne, the second daughter of the Earl of Oxford, was married to Edmund Lord Sheffield, from whom proceeded the Earl of Mulgrave, and John Sheffield, and his son Edmund, the last Duke of Buckinghamshire.

Frances, third daughter, was espoused to Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (grandson and heir to Thomas Duke of Norfolk); Jane, married to Charles Earl of Westmoreland; Margaret, to Henry Lord Scrope of Boston; and Catharine, to Henry Lord Berkley; and Descendants are remaining from all of them (129).

[PP] He left only a daughter Catharine.] A marriage was agreed on, and indentures signed between her and Henry, son to the Duke of Somerset; but after the Duke's attainder and execution, a bill was brought into parliament, and enacted, 6 Edw. VI, 1551, that the indentures should be void and of none effect (130); and the Lady Catharine was afterwards married to Edward Lord Windsor, who died at Venice, Jan. 24, 17 Eliz. and had issue by her four sons and four daughters; Frederic Lord Windsor (from whom the present Lord Windsor is descended); Edward and Andrew, that were married; Mary and Elizabeth, who died in their infancies; Margaret, wife of John Talbot, of Grafton in com. Wigorn, Esq; (ancestor to the present Earl of Sbrevsbury); and Catharine, wife of Robert Audley, of Berechurch in Essex (131), Esq; who are all recited in an inscription on a noble monument erected to her memory in the chancel of Tarbick in Warwickshire, wherein is this further mention of her Ladyship and her Lord:

‘ D. O. M.

‘ Katharinæ Oxoniæ filix, Westmerlandiæ neptis, Staffordiæ, Buckinghamiensis abneptis, Windsorix conjugis, hic jacent cineres. Quæ ortu Vero, partu clara, clarior virtute, Edwardo chariff. marito Venetiis defuncto, ætate, forma florens 33 vitæ anno, viduam castitatem more prisco inceptit, usque ad sexagesimum vitæ ultimum sancte tenuit; novo tunc flagrans amore, novum quæsit et sponsum in cælis Christum: Terrestrem hæc terra tenet partem; ætheriam æther. Obiit 17 Jan. 1599.

‘ Sed ne exemplar castitatis & pudicitix, honore merito, posteri exemplo, hic careret, aviæ suæ digniss. Thomas, et Henrico filio nepos, hoc monumentum poni curavit.’

(8t) Rymer, Vol. XIV. p. 302, 303.

(8u) Herbert's Life of H. VIII. in Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 125, 129.

(8w) Rymer, Vol. XIV. p. 405, 406.

(8x) Strype's Memoirs, Vol. I. p. 137.

(8y) Ibid. p. 153.

(9a) Strype, Vol. II. p. 4, who tells us, p. 7, that his Countess attended at the funeral of Queen Jane at Windsor, November 12 following.

(9b) Appendix in Strype's Mem. p. 15, who observes, that they, receiving from Garter the King's embroidered coat of arms, were conducted by him to the Offering, which being delivered again to Garter, he laid it reverently upon the altar.

(9c) As were also the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Hertford, and other nobles, who were created at the same time. Strype's Mem. Vol. II. p. 23.

(129) Descent of Nobility.

(130) Strype's Mem. Vol. II. p. 309.

(131) Chitting's Descents of the Nobility, MS. p. 63.

Edward, his son and successor, the seventeenth Earl of Oxford [22]. This Earl travelled in his youth to Italy, and, on his return, was the first that brought embroidered gloves and perfumes into England; and presenting the Queen [Eliz.] with a pair of perfumed gloves, she was pictured with them on her hands (91). He distinguished himself in two juits and tournaments before the Queen; the first in 1571, and the second in 1580 [RR]: And he was the chief of those nobles that embarked with Robert Earl of Leicester for the relief of Holland and Zealand in 1585, 28 Eliz. (9m). The next year he was one of the commissioners on the trial of Mary Queen of Scots (9n). In the memorable year 1588, 31 Eliz. the Earl, at his own charge, hired ships, and joined the grand fleet employed against the Spanish Armada (9o). In 32 Eliz. he sat on the trial of Philip Howard, Earl of Arunel, who was unanimously found guilty of high-treason (9p): Yet he was such an intire friend to Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, that, when he discerned the Duke's life in danger by the charge against him touching the Queen of Scots, he earnestly interceded with Burleigh (his wife's father) for saving him, which being declined by the Treasurer, the Earl, in great indignation, said he would do all he could to ruin his daughter (9q) [SS]. The Earl died June 24, 1604 (9r), and was succeeded in honour and estate by his only son and heir,

Henry Vere, the eighteenth Earl of Oxford. In 1605, the King being at Oxford, he was created A. M. with other nobles then attending (9s). In 1610 he was the first chosen to be of the order of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales (9t) [TT]. He afterwards travelled into Italy (9u), and returned home in 1618 (9w) [UU]. His exploits in 1620, [22] He had issue Edward his son.] He had also a daughter Mary, married to Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, who in right of his mother, in 2 Car. I, had the office of Lord Great Chamberlain adjudged to him by the House of Peers, which office is still in his descendants (132).

The said John Earl of Oxford, in his will, bequeaths to his loving son-in-law the Lord Windsor, and to his daughter the Lady Catharine his wife, 300 marks; to the Lady Mary his daughter, 200 marks at the day of her marriage; to Hugh and John, sons of his brother Aubrey de Vere, 20l. each, to be paid when they come to the age of twenty-one; to Ann Vere, eldest daughter of his said brother Aubrey, 100 marks; and to his other daughters, Bridget and Jane, 40l. each on the day of their marriage; to his brother Robert Vere's daughter, 40l. and 20l. to each of the two sons of his brother Jeffery at their age of twenty-one; to his three loving sisters, the Ladies Darey, Surrey, and Sheffield, each of them one of his cups of silver and gilt; to the Lord Keeper, 10l. and one of his great horses; to Sir William Cecil, 10l. and another of his great horses. He makes his Executors, his well-beloved wife Margery Countess of Oxford, his son Edward Lord Bulbeck, his loving friend Sir John Wentworth, Knt. his trusty servants, Henry Golding, Robert Christmas, and John Turner; and supervisors of his will, his singular good Lord the Duke's Grace of Norfolk and the Lord Robert Dudley, and bequeaths to each of them 20l. and one of his best horses or geldings. In a schedule annexed he gives legacies to his servants, Henry Golding, Esq; 20l. to Robert Christmas, 20l. and to twenty other gentlemen, who were his servants, the most of them 20l. He also bequeaths legacies to forty-four yeomen his servants, and to twenty-two grooms that were his servants (133): Whence he appears to have lived in great grandeur.

[RR] He distinguished himself in two tournaments.] In the first, this Earl of Oxford, Charles Lord Howard, Sir Henry Lea, and Sir Christopher Hatton, afterwards Knights of the Garter, were challengers; and the Lord Stafford, Lord Henry Seymour, Thomas Cecil, and others, were defendants; and on each of the challengers her Majesty bestowed a prize, for the receiving whereof they were led armed by two ladies into her presence-chamber. This triumph continued three days; the first at Tilt, the second at Tourney, and the third at Barrier. In the second, in 1580, the Earl of Arunel, and his assistant Sir William Drury, challenged all comers: The Defendants were the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Windsor, the famous Sir Philip Sidney, and others; and the prize was given by her Majesty to the Earl of Oxford (134).

[SS] He would do his best to ruin his daughter.] Sir William Dugdale, who relates this, says further, that, in the same resolution, the Earl not only forsook his wife's bed, but sold and consumed that great inheritance descended to him from his ancestors. But for that part relating to his inheritance, Sir William cites Camden, who only says he was in a fair way to find his estate (135): and it is certain the greatest part descended to his son and heir, and, on his decease without issue, devolved on his kinsman Robert Earl of Oxford, who died seized thereof, as will appear presently. By this wife Anne the Earl had three daughters: Elizabeth, born July 2, 1575, married at Greenwich, Jan. 26, 1594, to William Stanley, Earl of Derby (136); 2. Bridget, born April 6, 1584, married to Francis Lord Norris of Ricot, after created Earl of Beckshire; and 3. Susan, born May 26, 1587, married to Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery, and, on the decease of his elder brother William, was also Earl of Pembroke (137). Their mother Anne died at Queen Elizabeth's court at Greenwich, June 6, 1588 (138), and was interred in Westminster-abbey on the 25th, attended by many persons of great quality and honour: The chief mourner was the Countess of Lincoln, supported by the Lords Windsor and Darey, and her train borne by the Lady Stafford; and among other mourners at her funeral were the Ladies Ruffel, Elizabeth Vere, Willoughby sister to the Earl of Oxford, Cobham, Lumley, Hunsdon, Cecil wife to Sir Thomas Cecil. Six bannerets were borne by Michael Stanhope, Edward Wotton, Anthony Cook, William Cecil, John Vere, and Richard Cecil (139). We have an account of this Earl from the Oxford Antiquarian, who, having acquainted us, that in his younger days the Earl was a pensioner of St John's college in Cambridge, proceeds in the following terms: 'This most noble Earl of Oxford, Sept. 6, 1566, waiting on Queen Elizabeth at Oxford, had the degree of A. M. conferred upon him by the University. He was in his younger days an excellent poet and comedian, as several of his compositions that were made public shewed, which I presume are now lost and worn out. All that I have yet seen are certain poems on several subjects thus: 1st, His good name being blenished, he bewaileth. 2d, The complaint of a Lover wearing black and tarvie. 3d, Being in love he complaineth. 4th, A Lover rejected complaineth. 5th, Not attaining his desire, he complaineth. 6th, His mind not quietly settled, he complaineth. With many such like things that were highly valued in their times (140).'

[TT] He was the first chosen of the order of the Bath.] The bill was signed by the King June 2, and he repaired to Durham house in the afternoon. The next day the Knights rode to the court, their pages riding before them, carrying a sword in a white scabbard with a belt, with gilt hilts, and a pair of gilt spurs hanging thereon. Being alighted at the court-gate, the Earl of Oxford proceeded with his page before him, between his two governors; and the others followed according to their priority into the hall, where the King came, accompanied with the nobility. The Earl of Oxford was first presented by the Governors to him sitting under his State, the Page delivering the sword to the Lord Chamberlain, and he to the King, who girt it about the Earl's neck, and the Earl of Northampton put on his spurs; the rest were received accordingly (141).

[UU] He travelled into Italy.] Sir Henry Wotton, in a letter from Venice, Feb. 3, 1617, to Mr Secretary Lake, acquaints him, That my Lord of Oxford, having at Florence heard of the imprisonment of Mr Henry Bertie, his near kinsman, by the inquisition at Ancona, went the next day post to Rome, after he had first procured the Great Duke's palace there for his own security, and letters of favour, which were to follow him. Since which time Mr Bertie was removed, perchance upon his intercession, as safe for himself as it is nobly done. Now having never yet, by any intelligence, (94) Camden's Eliz. ubi supra, p. 519.

(95) Ibid. p. 547.

(97) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 199.

(98) Vincent on Brooke, p. 410. and Milles, p. 701.

(99) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. p. 172.

(99) Anstis's Observations on the Knighthood of the Bath, p. 61, & seq.

(132) See rem. [P] in the article of HOLLIES [JOHN], first Earl of Clare. Vol. IV. p. 264a.

(133) Ex Regist. Chayre, qu. 22 in Cur. Præteg. Cant.

(134) Seager's Hon. Milit. and Civil, p. 194, 195.

(135) Camden's Life of Q. Elizabeth in Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 391.

(91) Stowe's Annals, p. 686.

(9m) Ibid. p. 711.

(9p) Ibid. p. 552, who informs us also that he sat on the trials of Essex and Southampton, in 44 Eliz. Ibid. p. 563.

(9u) Sir Henry Wotton's letters MS. in the paper office.

(9w) Camden's Annals under that year.

(136) Milles's Cat. of Hon. p. 701.

(137) MS. de Fam. de Nobil. collected by T. Miller.

(138) Milles, p. 701.

(139) MS. by Sir W. Delbick, Garter. Not. A. 31. in Bibl. Joh. Anstis, Arm.

(140) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 99.

(141) Anstis's Observat. on the Knighthood of the Bath, p. 61, et seq.

1620, for the recovery of the Palatinate, have been already recited (9x); to which we must not omit to add, that, in 1622, being one of those Peers that aimed at public liberty more than their own interest, and speaking freely, he was taken into custody, being accused by one White, a Papist, (called after in derision Oxford White) of speaking some words to the disparagement of the King and dishonour of his government; whereupon he was committed to the Tower. The Earl continued in the Tower a great while; and being an active man, the King sent him at last to sea, to be one of Buckingham's Vice-Admirals for the English coast (9y). He was so desirous of a martial employ, that he proposed to purchase of Robert Lord Vicount Lisle his regiment encamped in Cleveland in 1624 (9z). However, that not taking effect, he went into the sea-service as beforementioned. But, in the spring of that year, 1624, four regiments being raised to assist Prince Maurice against Spinola the Spanish general, after the defeat at Breda, the Earl went to the Hague, and staid there the whole winter. But Henry Prince of Orange succeeding his brother (who died at the Hague, April 23, 1625.) and attempting one of the enemy's strong works at Terbeiden, either to relieve the town or drive the enemy from their trenches, failed in both, and lost many gallant men, especially English, in the enterprize. The Earl of Oxford led the van, and being a man corpulent and heavy, got such a heat in the service, that though he came off without hurt from the enemy, yet he brought death along with him; for falling sick presently after, he went to the Hague, and there died in the middle of summer, 1625 (10a). His body was brought to England, and interred in St John Baptist's chapel in Westminster-abbey. On the 15th of July that year he had married Lady Diana, second daughter to William Cecil, Earl of Exeter, one of the most eminent beauties and fortunes of the times (10b); but by her leaving no issue (10c), the honour devolved upon his kinsman, (9y) Camden's Annals, p. 657. and Wilson's Life of K. James, p. 736, 748.

(10c) Seagar's Baronage MS.

(10d) He was only son and heir of Hugh Vere, only son of Aubrey Vere (by his wife Margaret) second son of John, 5th Earl of Oxford, whereupon he was restored to the title in the parliament held at Westminster, 2 Car. I, after a contest with Rob. Bertie, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, who obtained the office

Robert Vere, who was the nineteenth Earl of Oxford (10d). The Earl of Clarendon hath given some account of his Lordship's temper, which will be hereafter mentioned (10e). This Earl took to a military life [WW], had the command of a regiment in the service of the States, and was slain at the siege of Maestricht, August 7, 1632. He died rich, having married Beatrice, daughter of Van Hemima of Friezland, by whom he had issue three sons (10f), of whom

Aubrey, the eldest, succeeding to the honour and estate, became the twentieth Earl of Oxford. Being not five years and a half old at his father's decease, he was in ward to King Charles I; but the civil wars breaking out, being then with his mother and her friends in Zealand, he entered early on a military life in the service of the States, in which he had the command of a regiment of English foot about the year 1648 [XX]. June 20, 1654, he, with of Great Chamberlain. Journal of Parl, 2 Car. I. See the article of Holles, first Earl of Clare.

gence, understood the particular cause of his restraint, I will set down what I conjecture upon certain circumstances. Mr Porie, Secretary to the Ambassador at Constantinople, took pains to translate the King's book against Cardinal Perron out of French into Italian, upon request of the Venetian ambassador; whereupon I am fallen into a conceit, that Mr Porie did send the said book by an Italian, and that Mr Bertie's man, who was a Papist, did bewray it in Ancona. To this conjecture I am led by finding, in all Mr Porie's letters, a very eager desire to know whether Mr Bertie were safely arrived at Venice. If my fancy should be true, his case is the very same as Mr Mole's (*), and then I fear it will go hard with him.

In another letter from Sir Henry Wotton from Venice to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, dated June, 1617, is this account: 'Now because it is likely that his Majesty will be pressed to the assistance of this Republic, my Lord of Oxford intendeth to employ the intercession of his friends at home, that he may have leave to contract with them here, and to transport unto them some volunteer troops; wherein, as I conceive it, the King shall but leave his subjects in their natural liberty, and yet much oblige this state unto him, without any charge of his own, or so much as any direct engagement of himself in the cause. My Lord himself is grown a goodly gentleman, of great ability, for his years, both of body and judgment, and has already taken a way to make both his affection and resolution well known to them here, by going in a very noble manner, both himself and his followers, to the siege of Gradisca, as the public voice leadeth him. And of this I shall need say no more, because he proposeth to write himself to you, upon whose friendship he maketh much foundation, as he telleth me, &c. (142).'

[WW] He died rich.] The inquisition taken after his death at Stratford in Essex, Jan. 30, 8 Car. I, sets forth, that he died seized of a Knight's fee in Heningham-Sible, a Knight's fee in Willingale, a Knight's fee in Bumsted, a Knight's fee in Ramsay, two Knights fees and a half in Finchingfield, one Knight's fee in Aldham and Feering, one Knight's fee in Zerdale, half a Knight's fee in Gosfield, and twelve Knights fees in Yardley, Little Canfield, Willingale-Spaine, Wendon, Weddington, Salcot, Verley, Margaret-Rothing, Wytham, Wormensford, Asben, Toleshunt magna, Little Bentley, Burch, Ravenhall, and Maplested magna, late appertaining to the honour of Stansted-Montfichet, with divers lands, woods, &c. all in the county of Essex. And in Hertfordshire, of the scite of the manor and park of Northwood, and all messuages, lands, and tenements, &c. there and in Thornbury, with the advowson of the church of Thornbury.

And by another inquisition, taken at the castle of Oxford, May 30, 10 Car. I, it was found that he was seized, at the time of his death, of the Earldom of Oxford, and honour of Earl of Oxford, &c. held of the King in capite by the service of two Knights fees and a half. And in Oxfordshire of two Knights fees in Lachbroke, one Knight's fee in Little Rycote, one Knight's fee and a half in Ewelme, one Knight's fee and a half in Stoke-Lisle, and one Knight's fee in Bodicote. And in Cambridgeshire, of one Knight's fee in Balsam, half a Knight's fee in Missenden parva, half a Knight's fee in Wayyndon, half a Knight's fee in Burton, half in Leckhamsted, and half in Welton. In Hertfordshire, one Knight's fee in Bayninge, one in Damflete, one in Alfodwyke, one in Meesden, one in Beugh, half a Knight's fee in Thele, and half a Knight's fee in Cokenhacht. In Essex, of a Knight's fee in Hengham and the castle. A third of two Knights fees in Tilberry near Gelham, one Knight's fee in Stemington and Ashden, one in Bertilsdon, one in Bromley parva, one in Tollehunt-Boyes, two in Beaumont, two in Davercourt and Colne, and divers other parcels of fees in Hengham, Gellam-magna, Langdon, Donton, Leyndon, Finchingfield, Raye, Ashe; with divers woods, &c. (143).

[XX] He had a regiment of foot in 1648.] The famous Algernoon Sidney, in a letter to Robert Earl of Leicester, dated January 10, 1648, informs him, that, old Berington being dead, his brother Robert Sidney was made Lieutenant colonel to the Earl of Oxford, then abroad (144). This regiment, on the breaking out of the war with the Dutch, was sent for to England, and the said Robert Sidney was made colonel thereof by King Charles II, May 31, 1665 (145); and it is yet subsisting by the name of the Holland regiment. The Earl had afterwards a quarrel with his Lieutenant-colonel

(9x) In the preceding article of Horace Lord Vere of Tilbury.

(9z) Sidney's State-Papers, Vol. I. p. 351.

(10a) Wilson's Life of K. James, p. 793.

(10b) Ibid. p. 736

(10e) In the article of the first Duke of Buckingham.

(10f) The two younger sons, Horace and Francis, died young, as did also his three daughters, Mary, Magdalen, and Susan.

(*) See an account of Mr Mole's case in remark [B] of Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham.

(142) Sir H. Wotton's letters, MS. in the Paper-office, as in the text.

(143) Cole's Esc. Lib. 3. p. 147, note 61. A. 14 in bibl. Harl. now in the Brit. Museum.

(144) Vide his letter in the memoirs of the Sidneys, before the letters and memoirs of State, p. 131.

(145) Sidney's letters, p. 161.

with Wentworth, of the Bed-chamber to the King, was committed to the Tower for high-treason, with others, as conspirators against the Lord Protector (10g) [YY]. But the Earl was never brought to a trial, and obtained his liberty soon after; though he was ever constant to the Royal cause [ZZ]. And upon Sir George Booth's rising in 1659, he, with others, was apprehended, August 13, on suspicion of being in the present plot [AAA]; but was discharged, on the 2d of November following, by the Committee of Safety (10b), on security to live peaceably. As he had been a great sufferer in the Royal cause, he was the first of the six Lords deputed by the House of Peers, with twelve of the Commons, to present to the King, at the Hague, the Parliament's supplication for the King's return (10i). His Lordship returned to England with the King, who, on the day of his arrival at Whitehall, designing to confer the Garter upon him, signed the letter for that purpose the last of May; and the next day, Friday, June 1, 1660, the Earl received the order in the Council-chamber (10k). His Lordship, August 20 this year, was Lord Lieutenant of the county of Essex (10l); and was also the same year appointed Lord Chief Justice in Eyre of all the King's forests, parks, and chases, on this side the river Trent. At the King's coronation, which was performed with great splendor on the 23d of April, 1661, the Earl of Oxford bore the sword called the Curtana (10m). In 1665, on the war with the Dutch, a regiment of horse being raised, the command of it was conferred on this Earl, and retained the name of Oxford's horse to his death, and is now the royal regiment of horse-guards blue. On Jan. 5, 1669, his Lordship was sworn of the Privy Council (10n). In 1679, on the establishment of a new Privy-Council, which met at Whitehall, April 21, his Lordship was left out of it; though he had ever behaved with great moderation, not being violent in any measures (10o); and on Jan. 6, 1680, he was again sworn into it (10p). On King James's accession to the throne, the Earl carried the sword of state at his coronation, April 23, 1685 (10q), but was left out of the commission of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Essex, the Lord Petre having that trust till Oct. 25, 1688, when his Majesty conferred it again upon the Earl as a person more acceptable to the people (10r). On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he joined the Protestant Lords in the petition to King James for a free parliament (10s), which being delivered Nov. 17, and rejected, his (10g) Diurnal Occurrences, p. 58. and Whitlock's Memoirs, p. 574.

(10b) Ibid. p. 683, 691, who says it was done to ingratiate with the Cavaliers.

(10f) Bill signat. 12 Car. II.

(10m) Cook's Life of King Charles II, p. 247.

(10n) Pointer's Chron. Hist. p. 230.

(10o) Comp. H. B. of England, Vol. III. p. 362.

(10p) Ibid. p. 381. and Gazette, No. 1585.

(10q) Ibid. p. 424.

(10r) Ibid. p. 523.

(151) Whitlock, p. 674.

(152) Thurloe, Vol. 1. p. 713.

(153) Whitlock, p. 683, who says the D. of Buckingham was also taken up and discharged. Vide also his article.

(154) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Vol. VI. p. 670, 671, 2vo edition.

(155) Ibid. p. 601. and Whitlock, p. 683, 684.

(10i) Clarendon, Vol. VI. p. 763, 769.

(10k) Sir Edw. Walker's Hist. Account of Elections, Installations, &c. of the Garter, MS. p. 32, et seq.

(10l) The Earl, among others, desired a clause to be inserted, that the Peers who had joined the Prince should sit in that free parliament; but the rest thought it needless. Ibid. p. 529.

(146) P. 749. This was a weekly paper published in these times.

(147) lb. p. 793. and Whitlock, p. 467.

(148) Whitlock, p. 575.

(149) Thurloe, Vol. II. p. 253, 395, 481, 482.

(150) Idem. Vol. VII. p. 83, 84, and 247.

Sidney, as appears from the following account in the Mercurius Politicus (146) from the Hague, April 19, 1651: 'On Saturday last the Lord of Oxford, and Lieutenant-colonel Sidney, Lord Leicester's son, fell out at play here, and are gone into Flanders to fight, with their seconds, Colonel Gerard and Captain Clerk.' After which is this relation from the Hague, of the 13th of May: 'The two duellists, Oxford and Sidney, have had their quarrel taken up by some friends, who prevented them in the way to Flanders (147).'

[YY] A conspiracy against the Protector. Colonel John Gerard, brother to Sir Gilbert Gerard, with others, were tried by the High Court of Justice, and charged with a conspiracy to murder the Protector as he should go to Hampton-court, to seize the guards, and make themselves masters of the Tower, &c. and proclaim the King, for which he was sentenced to be hanged; but, upon petitioning the Protector, was beheaded on Tower-hill. Sir Gilbert Gerard, with another of his brothers, Colonel Alburnham, Mr Joseph Alburnham, and several others, were under custody for it (148). How long the Earl of Oxford continued in confinement does not appear. In Thurloe's State-papers he is mentioned as follows, in a letter from Paris, May 8, 1654, N. S. to Mr Thomas Scot, at his house at Lambeth, London, intercepted: There is gone from hence lately, Colonel John Gerard, and with him Major Hallsley, who killed Mr Ascham, with intent to kill the Protector. They have another design in the city; the Earl of Oxford is to be the Chief. Beverning, Newport, and Jongestall, the Dutch Ambassadors in England, in their letter, dated from Westminster, July 3, 1654, to the States-General, write thus, 'Since our last, some more prisoners are sent to the Tower, who are said to have a hand in the conspiracy; and, among the rest, the Earl of Oxford is said to be in no danger; and though there are still above 300 prisoners, many are of opinion they will put to death no more (149).'

[ZZ] He was ever constant to the Royal cause. Secretary Thurloe, in a Letter to Henry Cromwell, Lord Deputy of Ireland, from Whitehall, April 20, 1658, informs him of the designs of the Royalists (Cavaliers he calls them) and that they were sure of the Earl of Oxford. And, in a letter of intelligence from beyond the seas, July 18, 1658, this further account is given: 'There are none at present going for England, who are suspicious persons; but the Lord Gerard is very busy in engaging for another trouble in England. It is thought, when any thing comes to the birth, the Lord of Oxford and the Lord Camden will be deeply engaged (150).'

that year, and condemned (151). And in letters of information relating thereto is this mention of the Earl: 'I hear they still go on with their preparations in the city, and that many are engaged therein. It is thought they aim at the Earl of Oxford for their General (152).'

However, his Lordship was not then taken into custody. [AAA] He was taken up on Sir George Booth's rising.

The Earl was apprehended with the Lord de la Ware and Lord Falkland, on the 13th of August, and they were all sent to prison (153). The Earl of Clarendon gives the following account of this attempt of the Royalists: 'There was, says he, to be a general rising of all who would declare for the King, on a day named about the middle of July, there being commissions in every county, directed to six or seven known men, with authority to chuse one to command in chief in that county, till they made a conjunction with other forces under the command of one who had a superior commission from the King, who was to be on the day appointed at Calais. But, by the treachery of Sir Richard Willis, who continually gave Thurloe intelligence of all that he knew, the design had no prosperous effect, and every post brought news to the King of persons of honour and quality committed to several prisons throughout the kingdom (154). And of all the enterprizes for seizing on strong places, only that succeeded which was undertaken by Sir George Booth, who, having seized Chester, was joined by the principal gentlemen in the parts adjacent, and the Earl of Derby appeared in Lancashire. Lambert marched immediately against them, and, August 19, defeated Sir George Booth, who, escaping from the battle, was taken in disguise at Newport Pagnel in Bucks, and the Earl of Derby was also taken prisoner; whereby all the hopes of the Royalists were at that time totally destroyed, and the Rump parliament thought of transporting the loyal families into Barbadoes, and other plantations, lest they might hereafter produce in England children of their fathers affections. This spirit had not however any long continuance; for the army assuming supreme power, there were again several sudden changes in England. The Committee of Safety, appointed by the army on the 2d of November, 1659, discharged from imprisonment the Earls of Oxford and Northampton, the Lord Falkland, and other Lords, on security to live peaceably; and this, says Whitlock, was to ingratiate with the Cavaliers. Also Sir George Booth was released soon after upon security (155); and, on the arrival of Ment with his army, the face of affairs soon changed, and a new parliament being summoned to meet, April 25, 1660, restored the ancient constitution of monarchy and episcopacy.

Majesty the same day began his journey towards Salisbury, and the Earl of Oxford immediately after went over to the Prince; and on King James's return from Salisbury, and appointing the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin, to treat with his Highness, who were to meet the Prince of Orange at Amesbury, December 6, they were informed by the Earls of Oxford and Clarendon from his Highness, to make their proposals in writing, which message induced the King to send away his Queen, with her son, into France; and on the 10th of December he himself privately withdrew (107). The Earl marched with the Prince into London, heartily concurred in the Revolution, and was among those Peers who voted for the vacancy of the Throne (108). Upon their Majesties accession, he was sworn of the Privy Council, and made a Lord of the Bedchamber to the King (109). He likewise continued in the command of his regiment, and was constituted Lieutenant-general of horse and foot, Feb. 13, 1688-9, having precedency of the Earl of Marlborough, whose commission for that post was dated the next day. His Lordship carried the sword of state at the coronation, April 11, 1689 (10x), and, on the 14th of June following, his patent was renewed for Lord Lieutenant of the county of Essex, and for Custos Rotulorum, August 29 (10y). In 1690 his Lordship embarked with the King for Ireland, and was present at the battle of the Boyne, and the reduction of that kingdom; but, on his return to England, being in an advanced age, he never after engaged in the military service abroad; though he kept the command of his regiment (10z). On the accession of Queen Anne, his patent was renewed for Lord Lieutenant of the county of Essex, July 25, 1701 (11a). And he departed this life at his house in Downing-street, Westminster, in the 78th year of his age, on March 12, 1702-3; at which time he was Colonel of her Majesty's royal regiment of horse-guards, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Essex, one of the Lords of the Privy Council, senior Knight of the most noble order of the Garter; and the twentieth Earl of this noble and ancient family, by whose death, without issue male, the Earldom became extinct therein (11b). His Lordship was buried, March 22, 1702-3, in St John Baptist's chapel, Westminster-abbey, by the remains of Henry Vere, Earl of Oxford, buried 1625 (11c). He was of a humane and generous disposition, steady in asserting the liberty of the subject, and the prerogative of the crown, and so tender of scrupulous consciences, that he was the first of the Lords who entered their dissents, 1 Will. and Mary, on rejecting the clause, allowing every one to be sufficiently qualified for any employment or trust, who, within a year before or after his admission, did receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, either according to the usage of the church of England, or in any other protestant congregation (11d). To his first wife he had Anne, daughter and coheir of Paul, Lord Viscount Banning, by whom he had no issue (11e). He married secondly Diana, daughter of G. Kirk, Esq; Groom of the Bedchamber to King Charles II, by whom he had issue one son and three daughters (11f), besides Diana, who, Tuesday April 13, 1694, was married to Charles Beauclerk, Duke of St Albans (11g).

(107) Ibid.
P. 537.

(10x) Gazette,
No. 2444.

(10y) Bill signat.
1 W. and M.

(10z) Hist. Eng.
Vol. III. p. 598.

(11c) Ex Regist.
Eccles. istius.

(11d) Hist. Eng.
Vol. III. p. 554.

(11f) The son,
Charles, died in his infancy, as did Charlotte;
but Mary and Henrietta lived to be aged, and died unmarried.

(107) Compleat
Hist. of England,
Vol. III. p. 532.

(108) Ibid.
P. 550.

(11a) Bill signat.
1 An. Reg.

(11b) Contin.
Heylin, p. 441.
Pointer's Chron.
Hist. p. 484. and
Le Neve's Mon.
Anglic. Vol. I.
p. 50.

(11e) She died soon after her marriage, and was buried in St
John Baptist's
chapel, Sept. 27,
1659.

(11g) Peerage
of Engl. Vol. I.
edit. 1756.

VERSTEGAN [RICHARD] well deserves a place in these memoirs as a great reviver of the English antiquities, and an admirable critic in the Saxon and Gothic languages. He was descended from an ancient and worthy family in the Dutchy of Guelderland in the Low-countries, where his grandfather, Theodore Rowland Verstegan, was born (a); but, being deprived of his friends by the intestine wars which depopulated and ruined that dutchy [A], he looked out for some other and better residence, and casting eyes upon the then flourishing state of England, he resolved to cross the sea, and accordingly arrived here about the latter end of King Henry VIIIth's reign. He was a young man, in the prime vigour of his age, and, falling into acquaintance with the female sex, he entered into matrimony, and probably would in some measure have repaired his broken fortune, had not he

(a) Verstegan's Epistle, prefixed to his book, intitled, A Restitution of decayed intelligence, &c.

[A] The civil wars had depopulated that dutchy. This dutchy, which is one of the seventeen United Provinces, is bounded to the North by Overysstel and the gulf of the German ocean called Zuiderzee; to the South, the Meuse, the dutchy of Cleves, the country of Liege, and the dutchy of Juliers; to the East, by the bishoprick of Munster, the dutchy of Cleves, and the territory of Cologne; and to the West, the Zuiderzee, the province of Utrecht, Holland, Dutch Brabant, and the country of Liege. It lies in a plain, containing twenty-two towns, the chief of which are Nimeguen, Ruremonde, Arnheim, and Zutphen. The province is divided into four quarters, all very fertile, abounding with wood and pasture. Formerly it had its proper Lords, who made themselves masters of it under the Kings of France of the second race. The first of these Lords flourished ann. 878, from whom, after six generations, descended Wichard III, who succeeded to it ann. 1061; but having issue only a daughter, named Alix or Adelaide, she by marriage brought Guelderland into the possession of Otho of Nassau, whom the Emperor Henry IV. created a count; and to him, after eight descents, succeeded Renaud II, ann. 1326, who was created a Duke by the Emperor Lewis IV, ann. 1339, with the privilege of investing and crowning the Emperor, and of coining money. This Duke Renaud, after five generations, was succeeded by Arnoul Count of Egmont, whose son Adolus, turning rebel, rose up in arms against him, and taking him prisoner, kept him confined a long time; whereupon Arnoul sold the dutchy to Charles, surnamed the Rash, Duke of Burgundy; but upon his death, in 1372, his daughter, Mary of Burgundy, surrendered it to Adolus, who married, in 1463, Catharine of Bourbon, daughter of Charles I, and was killed in 1477, leaving his son and successor Charles, who was disturbed in his possession by the Emperor Charles V, grandson of the forementioned Mary of Burgundy. This war ended in a peace, whereby Duke Charles, in case of his leaving no issue, yielded up the Dutchy to the Emperor. And it was in the times of the Emperor Charles V, and his son Philip II, that the States General got possession of almost all the Dutchy of Guelderland, the upper quarter of which was granted to Spain by the treaty of Munster; whence it has the name of the Spanish Guelderland, comprehending the towns of Venloo, Ruremonde, and Gueldres. By the peace of Utrecht in 1713, and the barrier treaty in 1715, the dutchy was divided into three parts, of which Ruremonde and its dependencies were assigned to the Emperor; Gueldres, or Gelre (1) as it is called by the people of the country, was ceded to the King of Prussia; and the Dutch had, for their share; Venloo and Stevensweert (2).

(1) The allies had taken it in 1703. The town is but small, though it gives name to the province. It lies upon the river Niers, which serves it for a fosse. The castle is very strong, and passed
for impregnable.
It is distant
four good leagues
from the Wezer,
west-south-west.
Cluver, Ortelius
Guicciard.

(2) *Strada de bello Belgico, &
Grotius Belgico
Hist.*

been

been cut short by death soon after his marriage, leaving behind him a son not more than nine months old. The mother however took care of the child, and, having brought him up to the age of sixteen years, put him apprentice to a cooper [B], which trade he afterwards followed, and, settling in the parish of St Katharine near the Tower of London, he had by his wife this Richard Verstegan our Author, who was born in that parish. The boy soon discovered a pregnant genius, and an inclination to letters, and his father, by diligence and frugality improving his circumstances, resolved, though a mechanic, to be at the expence of a liberal education for him; in which spirit, having given him a proper foundation of classical learning at school, he sent him to Oxford (b). The Student happily answered his father's hopes, and applying himself particularly to some branches of literature not much known then in the University, he made a distinguished figure therein, and became much esteemed. But, not being satisfied with the oaths required on taking a degree, he left this nursery of learning without receiving that test of his literary merit; and, being by this time confirmed a zealous Roman catholic, he quitted his native country, went into the Spanish Netherlands (c), and fixing himself at Antwerp, he wrote and published a piece there against Queen Elizabeth [C], upon whom, according to the virulent spirit of that religion, he scattered the usual flowers of heresy and cruelty with an unsparing hand. Upon the breaking out of the rebellious league in the Netherlands [D], he removed with his

(b) Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 3ca.

(c) Idem. Ibid.

[B] Put him apprentice to a cooper.] This having been thrown out in disparagement of our Author by some of his adversaries, on an occasion which will be mentioned presently; by way of answer thereto the Oxford antiquary very justly observes, that there is not any discredit in it; to confirm which he takes notice, that the father of Wolfgangus Musculus was of that trade; and it may be added in our Author's behalf, that Cooper Musculus was not so well to pass in the world as Cooper Verstegan: And therefore, though the former saw his son's inclination to letters, and designed him for a scholar, yet he left him to his own shifts for a subsistence, which he procured by begging and singing from door to door till he came to a town called Rapsonswil, where he was taken into the house of a poor widow who gave him lodging; and being assisted by the Lord of the manor, he went to school: And afterwards proceeding to Seblestadt, he sung there so happily one day, at the vespers of a convent of Benedictines, that the society presented him with the habit of their order gratis. He was then fifteen years of age (3), and applying closely to his studies, he became at length a distinguished preacher, and was chosen Prior of the house. But soon after, being observed to speak in favour of Lutheranism, he was obliged to fly to Straßburg, where, throwing off his frock, he publicly married one Margaret Barth, to whom he had been betrothed before he left the monastery. As he had now no subsistence, he put his wife to service with a clergyman, and bound himself apprentice to a weaver, an Anabaptist; but entering warmly into disputes against the doctrines of that sect with their Minister, who lodged in the house, the Weaver dismissed him. Thus again reduced, he resolved to earn his bread by working as a common labourer in the fortifications of the town. But the famous Martin Bucer, having been informed of his merit, procured him the evening before to be appointed Catechist in the village of Derlisheim near Straßburg. Here he preached every Sunday, and lodging the rest of the week with Bucer, supplied the place of his Ammanensis. Bucer, it seems, wrote so ill a hand, that the Printers could not read it (4). Musculus therefore, being a great master of his pen, was very serviceable to his Patron in transcribing the work he was then busied upon for the press. But this employ was put an end to in some months. Our Catechist was called by his parishioners to reside among them; so that, receiving no part of his stipend (5), he set up a petty school for a support. Thus he passed a year in very hard circumstances (6), till the Magistrates of Straßburg, who had assisted him before with a purse out of the public Treasury, made him Minister-Deacon of their principal church. About two years after he went, on an invitation, to Augsburg, where he began to preach in January, 1631. He continued eighteen years at Augsburg, and procured the abolition of Popery there; but, upon the Magistrates receiving the Interim in 1548, he left that city, and, passing into Switzerland, was made next year Professor of Divinity at Bern. This office he discharged with great reputation till his death, which happened there August 29, 1563, aged 66 years. He published several works, an account of which may be seen under his article in Moreri and Bayle; from the latter of whom we learn, that he left a son, Abraham Musculus, who wrote his father's life, which was prefixed to the Synopsis concionum festalium, Wolfgangi Musculi, printed at Basil in 1595, 8vo.

[C] He published a piece against Queen Elizabeth.] It bears this title: Theatrum credulitatum Hereticorum nostri temporis. The book is full of cuts, which represent the hanging, quartering, and beheading, or butchering of Popish Martyrs, engraven from the drawings of Verstegan, who was observed, while in England, to be much delighted in drawing and painting (7). There are verses put under each cut, to explain the meaning of it, which were made by John Boeb, or Bochius, or Boqui, a famous Latin poet, who was born at Brussels in 1555, and having travelled for his improvement into Italy, Germany, Poland, and Muscovy, was made, at his return, Secretary to the Maison de Ville, or Register, of Antwerp, by the Duke of Parma, which place he was possessed of at the time of reprinting Verstegan's book in 1602. He died there January 13, 1609. His poesies are much cried up by the critics of the Netherlands, who even give him the title of the Belgick Virgil (8).

(7) Ath. Oxoni ubi supra.

(8) Dictionaire Portatif, under his article, Tome I. Paris, 1755, in two Tomes, 8vo.

[D] Upon the breaking out of the rebellious league, &c.] The Oxford Antiquary, though in general a careful Timist, has suffered himself, in our Author's memoir, to wander in great confusion for want of his usual and commendable accuracy in dates. In order therefore to fix the time of Verstegan's journey to Paris, it will be necessary to give some account of this rebellious league, as follows. The project was first designed by the Cardinal of Lorraine, who observed at the Council of Trent, that the surest method of maintaining their religion against the Heretics [viz. the Protestants] was to form a league, to which proper means should be used to bring in all Catholic sovereign Princes and great Lords, especially the King of Spain, to be under the direction of a Leader or Chief, appointed by the Pope, who was to be declared Protector of the League. The motion was approved, and the Cardinal's brother, the Duke of Guise, was about to be elected Chief, when the news arrived of his death. The Cardinal however did not drop his enterprize; but waiting ten or eleven years, till the young Duke of Guise, Henry of Lorraine, his nephew, came of age to execute it, he then proposed the same thing to the Pope and the King of Spain, who came into his sentiments, though upon different motives; the Pope in the desire of seeing heresy extirpated; the Spaniard in the view of making advantage of the disturbances which the League would evidently occasion in France. After the Cardinal's death in 1574 (9), the Duke of Guise, pursuing the same design, caused a form to be drawn up in 1576 consisting of twelve articles, in the view of getting it privately signed by such Catholics as were most attached to his family; but, communicating it in confidence to the Governor of Peronne in Picardy, was betrayed by that Lord (10), who drew up another form in eighteen articles, in favour of the King. This act was signed at Peronne, Feb. 12, 1577, by near two hundred gentlemen and officers of the province, whose example was soon followed by all the provinces of the kingdom; and in November following all exercise of the reformed religion was prohibited by the estates of Blois. The King also, seeing the Leaguers aim more to lessen his authority than to crush the Huguenots, put himself at the head of the League, in the design of making himself master of it; but not caring to enter into a war, he granted the Huguenots a toleration by the Edict of Poitiers in 1578. The Leaguers did not stir for some years after the King had declared himself their Chief; but in 1581 they

(9) He died Dec. 12 that year. Bayle, under his article.

(10) He was Count of Humieres.

(3) This must be therefore in 1572. Musculus being born September 8, 1497, at Dreuzé in Lorraine. Moreri's Dictionary, under his article, Vol. VI. Edit. 1740, in 8 Vols. folio.

(4) Mr Jortin, in the life of Erasmus, Vol. I. Edit. 1758, has given a specimen of Bucer's handwriting, with that of several other eminent scholars, which confirms Mr Bayle's remark, that there were very few men of learning who possessed at that time the contrary accomplishment, as Musculus did. Bayle's Critical Dictionary, under the article of Musculus.

(5) The Abbe of the convent of Hohenfort, who gathered the tithes and revenues of the church, refused to pay him. Bayle.

(6) He lay on the ground, covered with a little straw, quitting the bed which he had brought from the Convent to his wife, who was ready to lye on. Baillet, cited by Bayle.

(d) This must be the first impression of it, as appears from remarks [D] and [E] below.

(b) His antagonists spared not to return him filth for filth, as may in part be seen in his character drawn by Will. Watfon in his Quodlibets, And Mr Wood observes, in his course language, that the Author of the pamphlet against the Jesuits, intituled, Another letter, &c. has thrown out stuff enough, against the rules of charity, to run down a dog. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 504.

(11) This particular league was begun by a citizen of Paris, by name La Roche Blond. They had forty Chiefs, among whom the government was distributed according to the sixteen wards or quarters of Paris, whence they were called the Seize or Sixteen.

(12) His Holiness fulminated a bull against the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, depriving them of their estates, and declaring them incapable of succeeding to any principality whatsoever; and the King of Navarre caused a protest against it to be fixed up at Rome.

(13) Barclay, de regno et regali potestate, adversus Buchananum, Brutum, Bourchierum, et reliquos monarchomacos, &c. Parag. 1600. lib. 6. c. 7. p. 438, 439.

(14) So his name is written by his own countrymen; though Mr Wood writes it Bouchier, and William Barclay, Bourchier.

(15) Wood from Boucher's book De Justa Henrici III. abdicatione, &c. Lugd. 1591, 8vo. lib. 2. cap. 16. p. 123.

his books (d) to Paris. Here the English Ambassador complaining of him to Henry III, then King of France, and urging, that, as he was born a subject to Queen Elizabeth, and a fugitive, who, in despite of his natural allegiance, had abused his Sovereign by a malicious representation of cruelties, he might be delivered into his hands to be sent to England, there to receive the proper reward of his demerits (e). The French monarch, though far from being displeased with the book, thought proper so far to yield to the Ambassador's suit, as to order Veritegan into confinement [E]. How long he lay in prison does not appear: But upon his release he quitted France, apparently to escape a further prosecution, and, returning to Antwerp, republished his book (f), and taking up the business and trade of a Printer, he acquired thereby a handsome subsistence, maintaining the port and figure of a gentleman [F]. It was during this interval that he was drawn into the quarrel which had been carried on several years with great animosity between the regular and secular Priests of the Romish Church in England (g); and we are told, that on this occasion, he mingled as much gall with his ink as the bitterest of the Jesuits, though he was no member of that fiery spirited society, being rather a secular Clerk. Whether he ever published any of these railings separately, or whether they were only inserted as fit supports and decorations in other pieces, is no easy matter to find out at this distance of time: In whose iron arms, under this inscription, that the best tempers have been unbinged by the heat of controversy (b), let the filth lie fast buried in oblivion, while the more worthy productions of his genius still survive to embalm his memory. It is certain, that, about the time of Queen Elizabeth's death, he turned his studies on a more noble subject, which, being finished, he published under the title of A Restitution of decayed intelligence in Antiquities con- they put themselves openly in defiance, under the conduct of the Duke of Guise, upon his Majesty's entering into an alliance with the King of Navarre, a heretic. The Duke of Guise drew the Cardinal of Bourbon into his party, which was further strengthened by the junction of the particular league of the Parisians under the name of the Seize [sixteen] (11). And, in 1584, the Duke withdrew from Court, and going to his government of Champagne, went thence to meet the agents of the Cardinal of Bourbon and the King of Spain at Joinville, where a compact was made, that the Cardinal of Bourbon should succeed to the crown, exclusive of all heretical Princes, in case the King died without issue; that the King of Spain should furnish fifty thousand pistoles a month for the support of the League; and that, reciprocally, the Princes of the League should assist his Catholic Majesty in reducing to obedience his rebellious subjects of the Netherlands. This war commenced in 1585; but, some months after, the French monarch granting the League an edict, by which he revoked all those that had been made in favour of the Huguenots, and took away the toleration, the war was thereupon rekindled through all the provinces of France, by the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde on the side of the Huguenots, and by the Duke of Guise and the Leaguers on the other side, assisted by the Pope [Sixtus V.] (12). The French King, siding with the League, published an edict in their favour, called the Edict of Reunion, in 1588, declaring his resolution to exterminate heresy, and exclude every heretical Prince from the succession to his crown, if he should himself die without male issue. But soon after, suspecting the Duke of Guise to harbour some ill designs against him, he caused him to be put to death, together with the Cardinal his brother. The King himself, Henry III, was assassinated the next year, 1589, and was succeeded by the King of Navarre, Henry IV, who, after several struggles with the League, at length professed himself a Roman Catholic in 1593, upon which the Leaguers laid down their arms. From this narrative it appears to our present purpose, what breaking out of the rebellious League it was that drove Verstegan out of the Netherlands, mentioned above, viz. undoubtedly that which commenced in 1585, a point which is left unsettled by the Oxford Antiquary. And a further use of this narrative will be seen in the next remark.

[E] Verstegan was imprisoned by Henry III.] We are told, that Henry III. was so much pleased with the pictures, and gave so much credit to them, that he did not spare to accuse Queen Elizabeth of great cruelty, calling her a wicked and cruel woman (13). But her Majesty was revenged, though undesignedly, by John Boucher (14), who presently kindled into a flame on Verstegan's imprisonment, charging it on Henry as an heretical fault (15). This Boucher, who was a native of Paris, is called by Mr Wood an active firebrand of the League, and the character is confirmed by their own writers, who give the following account of him: That he was Rector of the University of Paris, and Prior of the Sorbonne in 1580, and afterwards became a Doctor of Divinity and Curate or Parson of St Bennet's parish in Paris: that he was not wanting for parts; but that a false zeal rendered him one of the most seditious preachers of the League: That it was in a chamber, which he had in the college of Fortet, that the Leaguers held their first assembly in 1585. He declaimed publicly in the pulpit against Henry III, and also his successor Henry IV; but, upon the conversion (16) of this last monarch, Boucher retired into Flanders in 1594, being then Canon and Dean of Tournay, where he died in 1644, having changed his sentiments (17). Besides the piece cited by Mr Wood, there are several sermons of his in print (18). And the Apology, or defence of John Chatel, who was executed for rebellion, is also attributed to him, though published under the feigned name of Francis of Verona Constantin. To which must be added, that he published some things against Richer, as we are told by Mr Bayle, who observes, that he was not only the most seditious, but the most stubborn and unruly person among the rebels; that it was he who, giving order to sound the alarm bell in his church, contributed more than all the rest to the insurrection; that on that success he became more insolent, and preached insolently next day against the person of the King and his Counsellors; that his piece of the just deposition of Henry III. was the most infamous satire that could be written; that it is very probable he was an accomplice with James Clement, who assassinated that King; that he was still bolder against Henry IV. as an heretic; that after Henry professing himself a Roman Catholic, Boucher still retained his former sentiments; and that he went into the Netherlands with the Spanish garrison, which was at Paris during the league: That he died well changed in temper, and as zealous a Frenchman against strangers, as he had been a furious Spaniard in France. To conclude with a remark on our present subject: These transactions, passing between Henry III. and Verstegan, shew, that his book against Queen Elizabeth was printed before the death of the French monarch, which happening in 1589, is an undeniable proof that the book had been printed before the edition of 1592, as Mr Wood was informed. The narrative in the preceding remark makes it more than probable, that the first edition went through the press at Antwerp not later than 1585, which year our Author went to Paris.

[F] He maintained the port and figure of a gentleman.] Prosperity is the genuine prey of Envy. No wonder then that Verstegan's good fortune and success fell under the ridicule of his adversaries. The Author of a pamphlet against the Jesuits, intituled, Another letter of Mr A. C. to his disjuncted kinsman, concerning the Appeal, State, Jesuits, &c. thus gibes upon him: 'By his rising up only by Brocade, says he, and Spierie for the Hispanified Jesuits, he lived then and there [at Antwerp] as if he were an HIDALGO; as who may not be a gentleman, who lives so far from home, where he is not known (19).'

(e) Gul. Barclay de regno & regali potestate, &c. Parag. 1600. lib. 6. cap. 7. p. 438, 439.

(f) Viz. in 1592, which was the Edition cited by Mr Wood, who never saw the first.

(g) See Carte's History of England, under the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

(16) It is a Papist that writes this.

(17) Dictionnaire Portatif, and Moreri under his article.

(18) Particularly nine, wherein he maintained, that the conversion of Henry IV. was a piece of dissimulation, and his absolution null. Printed in 1594, but they were burnt at the cross next day after the reduction of Paris.

(19) Another letter of Mr A. C. &c. p. 24, edit. 1602. 4to. p. 24.

cerning the most noble and renowned English nation [G]. He prosecuted the same subject many years, and continued to employ the press by printing some other works, which shew him to be skilled both in painting and poetry [H]. Several years before his death he had the good fortune to marry a thrifty and prudent woman, who was a great help in supporting his credit; so that he lived, under the notion of a Spanish stipendiary, in good condition at Antwerp, among the English who had fled thither for the sake of religion. It appears, by some letters written by him to the great Antiquary Sir Robert Cotton (b), that he was living in the end of King James, and the beginning of King Charles I's reign; but, dying abroad, the exact date of his death has not been preserved amongst us.

(b) Mr Wood says he saw two of these letters in the Cotton library; but I do not find them in Dr Smith's catalogue, and no other has been yet made of that library for the use of the British Museum.

[G] He published A Restitution of decayed Intelligence, &c. This curious piece was first published at Antwerp in 1605, 4to. The subject is well handled, contains many things which were little known before his time, and was well received by the public, especially on account of several prints engraven from his own drawings, among which are figures of those Saxon and Danish deities from whom our days of the week take their names; yet Mr Wood observes, that the fame and sale of it was hurt by the first edition of Camden's Remains, which unluckily came out the preceding year, 1604. However the book kept up a good share of esteem among the curious and learned in antiquities, as is evident from the several editions it has gone through, being reprinted in 4to at London, 1634, after which a second impression was made there in 1653, in a large 8vo, and a third in 1674, 8vo (20). The Restitution, &c. being our Author's master-piece, and that by which he is especially known, and his memory and reputation still preserved in England, it will be proper to take notice of the two copies of recommendatory verses prefixed to his book, chiefly because we thereby come to know two of his friends and patrons, which is a part of his history: These are Richard Whyte (21) of Basingstoke, and Richard Stanyhurst; both men of distinction in the literary republic. The latter will fall under our notice hereafter (22). We shall therefore give here the following account of Dr Whyte from the Oxford Antiquary, who informs us (23), that the Doctor was the son of Henry Whyte of Basingstoke in Hampshire, Gent. in which town his mother, the daughter of Richard Caplin of Hampshire, brought him into the world in 1536. After going through Winchester-school he was sent to Gloucester-hall (now Worcester-college) in Oxford, whence he removed to New-college, being chosen a fellow there, and admitted perpetual in 1557. He proceeded A. B. May 30, 1559 (24); but before commencing Master, he withdrew from the college, and, continuing absent till the time limited for absence by the statutes was spent, his fellowship was declared void in 1564. He had, it seems, crossed the sea to Louvain; whence going to Padua, he applied himself to the study of Civil and Canon Law, and was created Doctor in that faculty. At length, removing to Dorway, he was there made Regius Professor of Law; in which place he continued about twenty years, married two rich wives (one being an heiress), grew wealthy, was made, by order of the Pope, Magnificus Rector, though out of his ordinary turn; and about the same time was created Comes Palatinus (25). At length, having buried two wives, he was, by the dispensation of Pope Clement VIII, ordained Priest, and about the same time obtained a canonry at St Peter's church at Dorway. The first thing that made him known to the curious in literature was his exposition of that ancient enigmatical epitaph, which in his time was remaining near Bononia, the title of which is, *Ælia Lelia Crispis—Epitaphium antiquum in agro Bononiensi adhuc videtur: novissime autem a Ric. Villo (26) Basingstoclio amicorum precibus explicatum. Patav. 1568, in 4to, with a dedication to Christopher Johnson, head-master of Winchester-school. Afterwards he wrote and published, 1st, Orationes quinque de circulo artium & philosophiæ—Pro divitiis Regum—Pro doctoratu—De studiorum finibus cum notis. Atrebat. 1596, 8vo. The two first, which were spoken at Louvain, were published by Christopher Johnson beforementioned, about 1564, and ordered by him to be read publicly by the scholars in Winchester-school. 2d, Notæ ad leges Decemvirorum in XII tabulis. Atreb. 1597, 8vo. 3d, Historiarum Britannicæ Insulæ ab origine mundi ad annum Domini octingentesimum, libri novem. Duaci 1602, in a thick 8vo (27), with a preface, to which is prefixed a print of the Author, with his arms, viz. Parted per Chevron, embattled Argent and Gules, three roses leaved vert, countercharged of the field, on a chief of the second a Lyon passant, Or; all within a bordure Ermine. Crest a Stork or Crane standing, resting its right foot on the top of an hour-glass, with this Motto under all, Plus vigila. Allowed to our Author, Count Richard Whyte, with two Dragons for the supporters, by Sir William Dethicke, Garter Principal King of arms, in allusion to the arms of his kinsman Dr John Whyte, Bishop of Winton (28). Dr Whyte also published, 4th, Explicatio brevis privilegiorum juris et consuetudinis circa ven. Sacramentum Eucharistiæ. Duaci. 1609, 8vo. 5th, De reliquiis et veneratione sanctorum. Ibid. 1602. And some other things, which may be seen in John Pius (29). At length this learned person, dying at Dorway about the year 1612, was buried in the parish-church of St James there.*

(26) So our Author usually wrote his name.

(27) The first, second, third, fourth, and fifth, were printed in 1597, the sixth in 1598, the seventh and eighth in 1600, and the ninth in 1602, separately.

(28) Whose arms are quite different from those of his brother, Sir John Whyte, who was Lord-Mayor of London, ann. 1563.

(29) De Illustrib. Antiq. Script. æt. 17. an. 1-57.

[H] He published some other pieces, &c. The titles of some of these are, 1st, Odes in imitation of the seven penitential psalms, with sundry other poems and ditties, tending to devotion and piety, printed abroad in 1601, with the Jesuits mark in the title. In these poems many matters of antiquity and ancient Saints of England are touched upon by the Author, who, subscribing himself R. V. is claimed by Mr Wood for Richard Verstegan, who, as he had been informed, had some skill in poetry as well as in painting. 2d, The sundry successive regal governments of the realm of England. Antwerp, 1620, printed in one large sheet, wherein are copper-plate prints of a Briton, Roman, Saxon, Dane, and Norman. Mr Wood also ascribes the following English translation, which is subscribed R. V. to our Author, intitled, A Dialogue of dying well. Antwerp, 1603, 8vo. written in Italian by Don Peter of Luca, a Canon regular and D. D. and by the Translator dedicated to the Lady Joan Berkley, Abbess of the English Benedictine Nuns at Brussels. Moreover Verstegan, says Mr Wood, hath written and translated other things; but, few of them coming into England, we seldom or never see them.

VILLIERS [GEORGE], the first Duke of Buckingham of this family, and the greatest favourite of two succeeding Monarchs, that was ever known in this, or any other Kingdom. He was the third son of Sir George Villiers, Knight, by Mary, daughter of Anthony Beaumont of Cole-Orton, Esq; names on each side of ancient extraction (a). He was born August 28, 1592, at Brooksby in Leicestershire, where his Ancestors had chiefly continued about four hundred years [A], though rather without obscurity, than with any great lustre.

(a) They had been seated long before at Kinalton in Nottinghamshire. Life and Death of the Duke of Buckingham, by Sir Henry Watson. Edit. 1642. 4to.

[A] Of ancient extraction.] The family of Villiers was descended from the ancient and noble house of Villiers, Seigneurs of Lisle Adam in Normandy (1), and came into England at the time of the conquest. But the first that was written of Brooksby was Alexander de

Vylers (2), who flourished in the reign of Edward I, and was father to Sir Nicolas de Villiers, who, following that King into the holy Land, took on him the Cross, chusing that of St George, the Patron of his country, and five escallop shells on it to shew the cause of his expedition,

(2) The name is variously written, as Villiers, Villiers, Vylers, &c. Peerage of England, Vol. III. edition 1766, Earl of Jersey,

(20) Since which time, being garbled by other writers, and the subject much improved by later inquiries, it has suffered the fate of many other valuable pieces, by having served the turn, to be neglected as useless.

(21) His father, Thomas Whyte, was the son of Jenkyn Whyte, who was possessed of almost half the town of Basingstoke, being son of Thomas Whyte of Purville in Hampshire, grandfather to John Whyte, some time Bishop of Winchester.

(22) In the article of Archbishop Usher.

(23) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 381, 382.

(24) Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 83.

(25) This title is commonly conferred by the Imperialists on their Professors. Vide Shadwell's article, rem. [A].

(1) Philippe Villiers Lisle Adam was the last great master of Rhodes, and defended it six months against the Turkish Emperor Solyman. Memoirs of the Life of G. Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, &c. p. 24. by Bryan Fairfax, Esq; Edit. 1753, 4to.

where the pedigree is drawn at length under the article of the a descendant of this family.

lustre. Being carefully bred under his mother till ten years of age, he was then sent to school at Billifden in the same County, where he was taught music, and other slight literature, till thirteen, when his father dying, he was taken home to her house at Godby by his mother, to whom both the elegant beauty of his person, and the gay sprightliness of his temper rendered him a particular favourite. Under her tuition little regard, it seems, was had to grammar, or classical learning. He was instructed in dancing, fencing, and other ornamental accomplishments, in which lessons he had such a natural and prompt dexterity, as obliged his masters to restrain his forwardness for the sake of his brothers, who being under the same training, might otherwise have been too much discouraged by his prodigious outstripping them. At the age of eighteen, he travelled into France for a further improvement in the exercises of that nobility, and having spent three years in those academies, he came home perfectly possessed of every qualification they could give him, without affecting any of the airs peculiar to that people. Upon his return, he passed a whole year, as before, under the wing and counsels of his mother. At the end of which, being now arrived to the age of manhood, he began to think of marriage, and in that view, fixed his eye upon a daughter of Sir Roger Ashton, Gentleman of the Bedchamber to King James I, and Master of the Robes. But he was diverted from all pursuits of that kind by Sir John Graham, into whose acquaintance he fell about this time, who being one of the Gentlemen of his Majesty's Privy-Chamber, encouraged him greatly to push his fortune at Court (b). This advice exactly concurring with his own taste and humour, made a deep impression upon his mind: he pursued it with ardour and address, and the result answered the most sanguine of his wishes. For not long afterward, the King (as his manner was) from some accidental glances (the first of which was at Abthorp, in a progress) took such a liking to his person, that he resolved to make him his mignon (c): and not content with barely being the architect of his fortune, he put his hand also to some part of the work; giving Sir John Graham secret directions how, and by what degrees, he should bring him into favour. To this purpose, first an intimation of the King's pleasure was conveyed to him to wait in order to be sworn his Majesty's servant, and shortly after his Cup-Bearer at large, ann. 1613, to which he was admitted in ordinary the summer following. An entrance being thus opened, favours came thick upon him, liker main-showers, than sprinkling drops, or dews. For the next St George's Day, 1615, he was knighted, and made Gentleman of the King's Bed-Chamber, and the same day had an annual pension settled upon him of a thousand pounds out of the Court of Wards. At New-Year's-Tide following, the King appointed him Master of the Horse, and in July, 1616, he was installed Knight of the Garter. On the 22d of August, he was created Baron of Whaddon, in the County of Bucks, and Viscount Villiers; and January the 5th, the same year, was advanced to be Earl of Buckingham, and sworn of the Privy-Council. In March, 1617, he attended the King into Scotland, where he was likewise sworn a Privy-Counsellor of that Kingdom; and on the succeeding New Year's-Day, he was created Marquis of Buckingham, and made Lord High-Admiral of England, Chief Justice in Eyre of the Parks and Forests on the south side of Trent, Master of the King's-Bench Office, Steward of Westminster, and Constable of Windsor-Castle (d). With these great honours, and as great employments, he was likewise the sole dispenser of the King's favours, so that he exalted all his own numerous family, and dependents. In February, 1623, he embarked for Spain [B], with Prince

(b) Life and death of the Duke of Buckingham, page 1. to page 4.

(c) The merit of recommending him first of any one to the Queen, was claimed afterwards by Archbishop Abbot, who tells us also, that he was knighted with the Prince's sword, and that Somerfet, the preceding mignon, opposed his being sworn of the bed-chamber, and importuned his Majesty, that he might be only sworn a Groom. See Archbishop Abbot's article, remark [M].

(d) Gen. Hist. of England.

being ancient badges of those Croisades. From this Sir Nicholas descended, after eleven generations, Sir George Villiers, who became Father to the subject of the present article by his second wife, daughter to Anthony Beaumont, of Glenfield in com. Leicester, Esq; which Lady, surviving him, became secondly wife to Sir William Rayner, and lastly to Sir Thomas Compton, Knight of the Bath (3), brother to William Lord Compton, Earl of Northampton, who, it is said, had a great hand in the rise of the Duke of Buckingham at Court. Weldon, in his Court and Character of King James I, having thrown some indecent reflections upon the Duke (4), there was published, in 1650, An Answer thereto, wrote by a person of figure in the same court, in which the Author relates, that the Duke's 'mother, a widow, being lately married to Sir Thomas Compton, brother to the Lord Compton, who by chance falling on a wonderful match for matchless wealth with Alderman Sir John Spencer's daughter (5) and heir, and his father then lately dead, this Lord was master of all, which was of more than credible; and so might be enabled bountifully to set up a kinsman without help or alms of the parish; and that, on Villiers's succeeding the old Earl of Nottingham in the Admiralty, who requested of the King that he might have his place, he went in person to acknowledge the kindness, and presented his young Lady with a very noble and valuable reward, which my Lord Compton paid for (6).' It is somewhat remarkable, that this noble friend and promoter of the Duke's rise was taken out of the world by a sudden act. 'Yesterday sevensnight, says my Author, the Earl of Northampton, Lord President of Wales, after he had waited on the King at supper (and had also supped himself) went in a boat, with others, to wash himself in the Thames, and so soon as his legs were in the water but to the knees, he was seized with the colic, and cried out, Have me into the boat again, for I am a dead man. Accordingly he died a few hours after at his lodgings in the Savoy, June 24, 1630 (7). His son and successor, Spencer Compton, married Mary, daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, brother to the Countess of Buckingham, by whom he had six sons, the youngest of which, Henry, became Bishop of London (*), and his eldest son James was father to the right honourable Sir Spencer Compton, being his third son, who was Speaker of the House of Commons in that parliament, which passed an act to continue themselves for seven years, tempore Georg. I, and was afterwards created Earl of Wilmington. The eldest brother George succeeded to the earldom of Northampton, as did also his eldest son James, and after his death the second son George; but this last dying without issue in 1758 (8), the title became extinct in this family.

[B] He embarked for Spain.] Some time before this extraordinary frolic, the Duke's high favour with the King had transported him into a forgetfulness of his duty to the Prince, whom he was very near striking. For that affront his Highness having conceived very great indignation against him, to remove it he projected this frolic, which succeeded to his wish, and fixed him in the Prince's favour (9). They set out on Tuesday, February 18, from a house lately purchased by the Marquis at Newhall in Essex (10), with disguised beards, and the feigned names of Thomas and John Smith, attended only by Sir Richard Graham, Master of horse to the Marquis. On passing the Thames against Gravesend,

(7) Peck's Defiderata Curiosæ, Vol. 11. l. 2. p. 36.

(*) See his article.

(8) There being no male issue left. Peerage of Engl. Vol. 11f.

(9) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. Fol. Edit.

(10) Now in the possession of Mr Olmus, member of the present parliament, 1762, for Weymouth.

(3) She brought him two daughters; Anne, married to Sir Hugh Cholmley, of Whitby in com. Ebor. Bart. and Penelope to Sir John Nicholas, Knight of the Bath, one of the principal Secretaries of State to K. Ch. I. and II. Ibid. Vol. 11. p. 218.

(4) P. 89, et seq.

(5) He was usually called the rich Spencer: He was Lord-Mayor of London in 36 Queen Elizabeth.

(6) Aulicus Coquinariæ, p. 165, and 168.

(2) Sir Simonds d'Ewes calls this journey, an accident, though at the same time he observes, that the King was privy to it. See his article, in remark [B].

Prince Charles (e), (afterwards King Charles I.) to make up the long agitated match with the Infanta of that Kingdom; and, in his absence, he was created Earl of Coventry, and Duke of Buckingham, the 18th of May following. After his return from Spain, in September, he was made Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Steward of the Manor of Hampton-Court. The death of King James, which happened March 27, 1625, brought no diminution to the power of the Duke; he continued in the same degree of favour with the son, which he enjoyed so many years under the father. The new King sent him to conduct into England, his lately espoused consort (f), the Princess Henrietta Maria of France [C]. On which Embassy, he arrived at Paris, May the 24th, 1625 (g); and

(f) By his proxy, the Duke of Chevreux, Salmon's Chron. Historian, who says the marriage was solemnized at Paris on the 11th of May, 1625.

(g) Petition of England, Vol. III. p. 207. Edit. 1750.

end, having no silver, they gave the Ferryman a gold piece of twenty-eight Shillings, which struck the poor fellow into such a melting tenderness, that such good gentlemen should be going, as he suspected, upon some quarrel beyond sea, that he could not forbear to acquaint the officers of the town with what had befallen him. The officers thereupon sent presently post to stop them at Rochester, but they were passed through it before. On the brow of Chatham-hill they were somewhat perplexed by spying the French Ambassador, with the King's coach and others attending him, which made them baulk the road, and teach Post-hacknies to leap hedges. At Canterbury, whither some bruit was run before, the Mayor of the town came himself to seize on them, as they were taking fresh horses, alledging, in his blunt manner, a warrant to stop them, first from the Council, next from Sir Lewis Lewkner, Master of the ceremonies, and lastly from Sir Henry Mainwaring, then Lieutenant of Dover-castle; at all which confused fiction the Marquis had no leisure to laugh, but thought it best to dismask his beard, and so told the Mayor that he was going covertly with such a slender attendance to take a secret view (being Admiral) of the forwardness of his Majesty's fleet, which was then in preparation on the narrow seas. On the way afterwards a Post-boy, who had been at Court, got somehow a glimmering who they were, but his mouth was easily shut. To Dover, by reason of bad horses and these petty impediments, they came not before six at night; where they found Sir Francis Cottington, then Secretary to the Prince, and Mr Endynion Porter (t t), who had been sent before to provide a vessel for their transportation. The next morning (for the night was tempestuous) taking ship at Dover about six, they landed the same day at Boulogne in France, near two hours after noon, reaching Montreuil that night, and Paris the next day (t 2), viz. Friday the 21st. Here the Prince spent one whole day to view the city and the court; and, for a better disguise, his Highness and the Marquis bought each a periwig, somewhat to overshadow their foreheads. They got sight of the King and Queen, without being discovered, no not by Monsieur Cadinet, who had been lately Ambassador to England, and saw them both. Towards evening, by meer chance, they had a sight of the Infanta and of the Princess Henrietta Maria, with other great Ladies, at the practice of a masking dance which was then in preparation; having overheard two gentlemen who were going to that sight, they pressed after them, and were let in by the Duke de Mont-Bajon, the Queen's Lord Chamberlain, out of civility to strangers, when diverse of the French were put by. Leaving Paris next day at three in the morning, they spent six days at Bayonne, the last town of France, having before at Bordeaux bought them five riding-coats, all of one colour and fashion; and Sir Francis Cottington was employed to prevent their being entertained by the Duke of Espernon, telling him they were gentlemen of mean degree, and formed yet to little courtship or politeness (t 3). It being now Lent season, they could get no flesh in their inns, which occasioned the following incident. Near Bayonne was a herd of goats with their young ones, upon which sight Sir Richard Graham tells the Marquis he would snap a kid, and make some shift to convey it unseen to their lodgings; the Prince overhearing it, Why Richard, says he pleasantly, do you think you may practise here again your old tricks upon the borders? In this humour having satisfied the goat-herd, while the Marquis and his servant on foot chafed the kid about the stack, the Prince killed him by a shot in the head with a Scotch pistol (t 4). At Bayonne both their persons and behaviour were eyed narrowly by the Count de Grammont, Governor of that jealous frontier, who told some of his train, that he thought them to be gentlemen of much more worth than their habits bespoke them; yet he let them courtously pass (t 5); and four days after they arrived at Madrid (16), where alighting at the Earl of Bristol's house, the Marquis [Mr Thomas Smith] came in first, with a portmanteau under his arm; then [Mr John Smith] the Prince was sent for, who staid a while on the other side of the street in the dark. They were received with all possible politeness at this court. But the Duke soon began to be displeas'd for his behaviour to the Prince, which, together with his personal animosity against the Duke of Olivarez, the sole favourite at that court, was one reason that this journey intirely dissolved the Spanish match, so many years in agitation (t 7).

[C] To conduct Henrietta from France.] Sir Henry Wotton takes notice (18), that in this embassy, which consisted all of meer shew, there wanted no ornaments or bravery to set it off; and he thinks it worthy some little remembrance, that the Duke on a solemn day gorgeously clad in a suit all overspread with diamonds, and having lost one of good value, perchance he might be dancing, after his manner, with lofty mien, it was strangely recovered next morning in a court full of pages; such a diligent attendant, says he, was fortune upon him every where, both at home and abroad. However, it seems, he experienced at this time one of her cross purposes, if we may believe the Lord Clarendon, who, having observed, that in this embassy his person and prudence was wonderfully admired and esteemed, and that he appeared in it with all the lustre the wealth of England could adorn him, and outshined all the bravery that court could dress itself in, and over-acted the whole nation in their own most peculiar vanities, proceeds thus: 'He had the ambition to fix his eyes upon, and to dedicate his most violent affections to, a Lady of a very sublime quality, and to pursue it with most importunate addresses, infomuch as when the King had brought the Queen his sister as far as she meant to do, and delivered her into the hands of the Duke, to be by him conducted into England, the Duke, in his journey, after the departure of that court, took a resolution once more to make a visit to that great Lady, which he believed he might do with much privacy: But it was so easily discovered, that provision was made for his reception; and if he had pursued his attempt, he had been without doubt assassinated; of which he had only so much notice, as served him to decline the danger: But he swore in the instant, that he would see and speak with that Lady in spite of the strength and power of France. And from the time that the Queen arrived in England, he took all the ways he could to undervalue and exasperate that court and nation, by causing all those that fled into England, from the justice and displeasure of that King, to be received and entertained here, not only with ceremony and security, but, with bounty and magnificence; and the more extraordinary the persons were, and the more notorious their King's displeasure was towards them (as in that time there were many Lords and Ladies in those circumstances) the more respectfully they were received and esteemed. He omitted no opportunity to incense the King against France, and to dispose him to assist the Huguenots, whom he likewise encouraged to give their King some trouble. He also took great pains to lessen the King's affection towards his Queen, being exceeding jealous lest her interest might be of force enough to cross his other designs, and had even brought himself (against his nature) to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the Queen. One day, when he unjustly apprehended, that she had shewed some disrespect to his mother, in not going to her lodging at an hour she intended to go, and was hindered by meer accident, he came into her chamber in much passion, and after some expostulations, rude enough, he told her she should repent it. Her Majesty answering with some quickness; he thereupon replied insolently to her, that there had been Queens in England who had lost their heads. And it was universally known, that, during his life, the Queen never had any credit with the King, in reference to any public affair (t 7).'

(17) Howel's Letters, as before, No. XV.

(18) In his life of the Duke, p. 15.—Cardinal Barberini, it is said, came with great pomp from Italy to hinder this match. Vide Letter LXXXIX in Parr's Collection of Letters, annexed to Archbishop Usher's Life.

(11) He was taken in, not only as a bed-chamber servant of confidence, but, as useful for his skill in the Spanish tongue, and his singular credit in Spain, which we are told by Sir Henry Wotton; and these two qualities are intimated in several addresses to him by Mr Howel, in Epistol. Howellianæ &c.

(12) About two posts before, they had met with two German gentlemen, come newly from England, where they had seen the Prince and the Marquis taking coach together with the King, and retained such a strong impression of them, that they now bewrayed some knowledge of their persons, but were outwitted by Sir Richard Graham.

(13) The Earl of Carlisle was sent into France soon after, to excuse the Prince's sudden and secret passing through his kingdom, without giving him a visit. Sir Simonds d'Ewes, as above in note (e).

(14) It is part of K. Charles's character, that he was a good marksman. Gen. Hist. of England. Particularly by Mr Hume.

(15) In this, says Mr Howel, they had very good luck; for the Count was informed who they were the next day, and would certainly have stop't them. Howel's Letters, Vol. I. Sect. 3. No. XVI. Edit. 1650.

(16) Sir Henry Wotton, as before,

when

(14) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. fol. 102.

(i) Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot, two of the Members of the Commons, who carried up the impeachment, were committed to the Tower for some obnoxious expressions on that occasion, though upon explaining themselves, released soon after.

(20) History of the Rebellion, as before.

(21) Strafford's Letters and State Papers, &c. Vol. I. p. 27, Edit. 1737, in 2 Vols. Folio.

(*) From Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. XVIII. p. 236, et seqq.

when he was arraigned in the Parliament, which met at Oxford in August, the King dissolved that Parliament, At his Majesty's Coronation, February the 2d, the same year, the Duke was Lord High-Constable for that day; and in the new Parliament, which met four days after, being impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours by the Commons (b), the Duke put in his answer, which not giving content, the King, impatient of all proceedings (i) against him, chose to dissolve this Parliament also, rather than part with the Duke, and that too at a time when he was actually engaged in a war with Spain [D]. In the prosecution whereof, the Duke went not long after with the Earl of Holland to the Hague, in order to negotiate a treaty with the States about a common diversion for the recovery of the Palatinate [E]. Within a month after the dissolution of the parliament,

[D] Notwithstanding he was then engaged in a war with Spain. Lord Clarendon (20) having observed, that the Duke's answer to the impeachment was civilly couched; and, though his heart was big favoured of an humble servant, proceeds to inform us, 'that they who flattered him most before, mentioned him now with the greatest bitterness and acrimony; and the same men who had called him Our Saviour, for bringing the Prince safe out of Spain, called him now the corrupter of the King, and betrayer of the liberties of the people, without the least crime imputed to him, to have been committed since the time of that exalted adulation; or that was not then as much known to them as it could be now: so fluctuating and unsteady a testimony is the applause of popular councils. This transported him with indignation, and created in him a greater contempt of parliaments than he had before shewn, and which he did not forbear to publish in the most open manner. Such as had given any offence were imprisoned and disgraced, and new projects were set on foot for money, which served only to offend and incense the people, and brought little supplies; yet raised a great stock for expostulation, murmur, and complaint; many persons of the best quality (excepting Peers) being committed to several prisons with unheard of circumstances, only for refusing to pay money required of them by those extraordinary ways. And the Duke himself would passionately say, and frequently do, many things, which only grieved his friends, and incensed his enemies, and gave them ability to do him harm.'

[E] He went to the Hague. He set out in the beginning of November, as appears from a letter, dated November 7, from Sir Arthur Ingram to Sir Thomas Wentworth, Bart. in which is the following passage: 'The Duke [of Buckingham] is now gone over to the Hague, and from thence cometh to France, and, it is thought, will be here again before Christmas. He hath carried all the great jewels of any value, of the King's, and all the gilt plate, it is said, to borrow money upon them, to supply the King of Denmark withal (21).' These jewels being crown jewels, and of very great value, it was necessary to have a warrant from the King himself, both for the delivering them to and receiving of them by the Embassadors, with a particular description and weight of each jewel, which being very curious both in the form and richness of them, we shall lay before our readers (*). The warrant is directed to the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Holland, Lord Conway, Lord Compton, Sir Henry Mildmay, Master of the Jewel-Office, and Endymion Porter, one of the Grooms of the Bed-chamber, in these terms: 'Whereas we have lately employed the said Duke and Earl as Embassadors to the States of the United Provinces, and for our especial service have commanded the said Lord Compton to deliver into the hands of the said Lord Conway the several jewels hereafter particularly mentioned, being at that time in his custody, that is to say, Imprimis, A great rich jewel of gold, called the Mirror of Great Britain, having two fair table diamonds, and two other large diamonds cut lozenge-wise, garnished with small diamonds, and a pendant of a fair diamond cut in fancetts without foyle.

Item, A fair jewel, in fashion like a feather of gold, having in the midst one great diamond, and thirty other diamonds of different bigness, and five small diamonds in form of a cross.

Item, A flower of gold, with three great ballaces, in the midst a great pointed diamond, and three great pearls fixt, with a fair pearl pendant, called the Bretbren.

Item, A great pointed diamond, with a collet taken from a collar of gold, wherein yet remains eight great rock rubies, and twenty great pearls, set in twoes, and a long pearl pendant.

Item, A broken collar of gold of thirty pieces, whereof fifteen are roses, and fifteen crowned cyphers of the King and Queen's names, wherein are eleven pointed diamonds, and eight table diamonds.

Item, A jewel of gold of the letter I, having one long fair table diamond, and two lesser square table triangled diamonds, and a rose-diamond, and a great oval pearl pendant.

Item, The great collar (*) of ballast rubies, containing twenty pieces of gold, whereof ten are set with great ballast rubies, and ten with sixteen great round pearls in each piece.

Item, One great sapphire cut in fossets, one pendant sapphire cut in fossets, one ballast ruby with a long pearl pendant, one ballast ruby without foyle in a collet of gold enamelled.

Item, A great amethyst in a collet of gold.

All which jewels the said Lord Compton, according to our command, did deliver to the said Lord Conway, and the said Lord Conway, by our command, did deliver them upon or near the 8th of November last past, to the said Endymion Porter, to be carried beyond the seas into Holland, and there to be delivered to the said Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Holland, by them two to be disposed of as we have especially directed them for our service.

And whereas the said Sir Henry Mildmay, Master of our Jewel-office, by our special commandment, upon or about the 26th of October last past, did deliver out of his custody and charge, unto the said Duke and Earl, or their servants for them, these several parcels of rich plate and jewels hereafter particularly mentioned in these presents, that is to say, Imprimis, One bason of gold, in the bottom whereof are set two fair diamonds, two fair rubies, and two emeralds, and seventeen fair pearls, and the brim of the same garnished with four fair diamonds, four fair rubies, four fair emeralds, and forty-eight clusters of pearls, there being four fair pearls in every cluster. Of the weight of 113 ounces.

Item, One very fair layer of mother of pearl, being a shell crazed in sundry places, and limited again, garnished with gold, the foot thereof cut eight square, in the lower part whereof is one diamond without a foyle, four rock rubies, two fair emeralds, and one sapphire, and upon the upper part of the same square is one very great diamond without foyle, one fair rock ruby, two fair emeralds, the shank thereof garnished with two very fair rubies, two very fair emeralds, and three very fair pearls pendant, the body thereof garnished with five fair rubies, two fair diamonds, and six pearls, the handle being an antique man of gold, garnished with six rubies, one emerald, one sapphire, and one pearl, and laying his one hand upon a goodly ballace, and his other hand upon a goodly ruby, and, from the body to the same shell, garnished with two diamonds, four rubies, and two very fair rubies, with two pearls in two womens hands, holding between the other two hands a goodly ballace like a heart, the garniture of the same shell above the brim, and spout downward, the body with five diamonds, two of them being great, seven rubies, four emeralds, one emerald pendant, one blue sapphire, and three pearls pendant, with two several pearls set, and a long pearl set in the top, over the said heart of ballace. Weighing 160 ounces.

Item, One bason and layer of gold, the bason enamelled about the bushel and brim, and the layer suitable, having forty-eight small diamonds in the bason, and thirty-five small diamonds, thirty rubies, and twelve great sapphires in the layer. Weighing 202 ounces.

Item, A bason and ewer of gold, set with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, and one great ballast ruby in the midst of the ewer, the arms of Denmark in the bason, with Anna Regina. Weighing 165½ ounces.

Item, A fair boll of gold, and a cover garnished with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, on the top a wild man, with a ruby pendent in his hand, and Anna Regina on the cover. Weight 51¼ ounces.

Item,

(b) In this Parliament the Earl of Bristol having exhibited articles against the Duke, May 1, 1626, charging him with endeavouring to pervert the Prince (now King) to the Romish Religion in Spain, the King sent a message to the Lords, asserting the Duke's innocence of his own certain knowledge.

(*) This was called the inestimable collar of rubies: it was made by the order of Hen. VIII. and is introduced in the portraits of that King.

the kingdom found itself engaged in another war with France, at the instance of this imignion, who thereupon, in 1627, went in person Admiral and General in an expedition
to

Item, A standing cup of gold, with a cover, garnished with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, perfect, having the arms of Denmark graven within the cover. Weight fifty ounces scant.

Item, One cup of gold, with the cover, graven on the body with an altar, and an inscription over it, nil nisi vota; and the similitude of a temple graven, with a pyramid on the top of the cover; and a harnessed man in the top thereof, holding an antique shield in his left hand. Weight 200½ ounces.

Item, One basin and layer of gold, plain. Weight 196 ounces.

Item, A pair of fair bolls, and covers of gold, raised with talbots on the sides. Weight 120 ounces.

Item, A fair standing cup, garnished about the cover with eleven diamonds, and two pointed diamonds about the cup, seventeen table diamonds, and one pearl pendant upon the cup, with these words, bound to obey and serve, and H and I knit together. In the top of the cover the King's arms, and Queen Jane's arms, holden by two boys under a crown imperial. Weight 65½ ounces.

Item, A cup of gold, with a cover, garnished with red roses, and full set and garnished with coarse ballaces of rubies and sapphires, and one and twenty troches of pearls, three pearls in every troche. Weight 56 ounces scant.

Item, A high salt of gold in the form of a ship, with a striking clock in the cover, garnished with diamonds, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, jacinths, amethysts, ballaces, and pearls. Weight 162½ ounces.

Item, One salt of gold, called the Morris dance, having the foot garnished with six great sapphires and sixteen coarse diamonds, thirty seven coarse rubies, forty two small garnishing pearls, having upon the shank three great coarse sapphires and three great coarse pearls, and upon the border about the shank twelve coarse diamonds, eighteen coarse rubies, and fifty-two garnishing pearls, and standing about that five morris-dancers and tabourer, having among the morris-dancers and tabourer thirteen small garnishing pearls and one ruby; the lady holding the salt having upon her garment, from her foot to her face, fifty garnishing pearls and eighteen coarse rubies; the foot of the same having four coarse rubies and four coarse diamonds. The border about the middle of the same salt having four coarse diamonds, seven rubies, and eight pearls; and upon the top of the said salt four diamonds, four rubies, and three great pearls. The lady having upon the tyre of her head ten small rubies, twelve coarse diamonds, and twenty-nine coarse garnishing pearls. Weight 151½ ounces.

Item, One cup of gold, called the dream of Paris, having upon the cover thereof the images of Paris, Jupiter, Venus, Pallas, and Juno. Paris's horse upon the cover, garnished with eighteen diamonds, great and small, and in the five borders of the same cover thirty-two great rubies. Jupiter garnished with ten small rubies; and Paris's helmet with two small rubies, Venus and Pallas having each one small ruby upon their breast, Juno wanting her chaplet. The horse of Paris having eight small rubies, also upon the five borders of the same forty-one great pearls; Jupiter having his garment garnished with thirty-two small pearls; Paris having one small pearl upon the top of his cap; Venus having two small pearls hanging down from her chaplet; Juno having upon her chaplet two small pearls hanging down, and upon her buttocks two small pearls. The horse garnished with twenty-seven pearls, great and small. The cup having, upon the foot and shank, twenty-five rubies, great and small, ten diamonds of diverse sorts, four sapphires, and thirty-eight pearls, great and small. Weight 121 ounces.

Item, A trencher-salt of gold, in form of a castle, garnished with diamonds, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, and pearls. Weight 21½ ounces.

Item, A cup and cover of gold, weighing 30 ounces.

Item, One cup of gold, the cover enamelled with eight coarse diamonds, four on the cover, and four lesser on the foot, and on the top of the cover a fair pointed emerald, and another knob of gold, enamelled like the emerald. Weight 28½ ounces.

Item, One high salt of gold, with a cover of gold, in the cover twelve ballace rubies, nine sapphires, and three diamonds; and on the top a woman, having a rose-diamond in one hand, and in the other an arrow, with a diamond at the end, garnished with pearls, fixt and pendant, wanting five pearls. Nineteen small diamonds in the coronet of the cover: weight 60 ounces. The salt set with forty-five ballast rubies, thirty-five sapphires, seven small diamonds, and garnished with pearls, fixt and pendant; weighing 234 ounces. Weight, in toto, 286½ ounces.

Item, One cup of gold, the cover and foot enamelled, with eight coarse diamonds, four on the cover, and four lesser on the foot, and on the top of the cover a fair pointed emerald, and another knob of gold, enamelled like an emerald. Weight 28½ ounces.

Item, One cup, the boll thereof agate, oval fashion, called the constable's cup, with an agate in the foot, all garnished with gold, enamelled, set with rubies and diamonds, with a cover likewise of gold, and garnished with rubies and diamonds, set about with four antique heads of agates; in the inside one agate, cut with two faces. Weight 57½ ounces.

Item, One cup, and cover of gold, with dops, and a branch of flowers, the top enamelled like daisies. Weight 36 ounces.

Item, One layer of gold, chased in the top with long dops, the spout being a serpent, garnished with rubies, pearls, and flowers, enamelled with white and red, wanting a ruby in the top of the cover. Weight 40 ounces scant.

Item, Eight great dishes of gold. Weight 184½ ounces.

Item, Six trencher-plates. Weight 74½ ounces.

Item, Seven fruit dishes of gold, with the arms of Denmark. Weight 185½ ounces.

Item, A posnet of gold, and cover. Weight 20½ ounces scant.

Item, A boll, and cover of gold, with roses and crowns, and a crown with a cross on the top of the cover. Weight 69½ ounces.

Item, One pair of gold cups, with covers, having blue snake-rings on the top of the covers. Weight 30½ ounces.

Item, Two trencher-plates of gold, standing upon pillars. Weight 110½ ounces.

Item, One porringer of gold. Weight 27¾ ounces.

Item, One cup and cover of gold. Weight 31½ ounces.

Item, A cup and cover of gold. Weight 25½ ounces.

Item, A cup and cover of gold. Weight 23½ ounces.

Item, A collar of gold, with seventeen roses and seventeen knots. Weight 29¾ ounces.

Item, A basin and ewer of gold. Weight 71½ ounces.

Item, A cup of agate, with a cover, garnished with gold, and full of emeralds, turquoises, diamonds, roses of diamonds, rubies, and pearls, with a sapphire on the top, with a boy holding a spear. Weight 53½ ounces.

Item, A looking-glass set in gold, garnished on the one side with two sapphires, four rubies, and one emerald; and on the other side with four sapphires and four rubies. The stale of agate, two little boys, one of them holding a pearl, and five pearls hanging. On the other part of the body is a man on horseback; the body being a clock within a chrystal, garnished with four diamonds and fifty-five rubies, with four antique boys, enamelled with white, two of them bearing in each hand a pearl; and the other two, the one having two pearls and the other one pearl in their hands, wanting four pearls in the said antique boys. The base or foot standing upon four round chrystals, garnished with ten rubies, and four naked women of gold, standing at every corner one, and a man on the top being naked. Weight 97¾ ounces.

Item, One plate of gold, graven on one side with astronomy, and on the other with a ship called the Triumphe, with a case of murrey velvet. Weight 73 ounces.

Item, One layer, the foot, body, and handle, of agate; the body crafed, garnished with gold, and set with diamonds, rubies, and amethysts, one emerald, and one sapphire. The foot having a border of small rubies round about it. Weight 28½ ounces.

Item, A cup of agate, with a cover of gold, like a tent, having a morris dance in the cover, set with twenty sapphires, nine small diamonds, and seventeen ballace rubies, garnished with pearls fixed, and pearls and beads of gold pendant. Weight 68 ounces.

(k) The mariners to Rochelle [F], which proving unsuccessfull, the cry of the people was so great (k), and the King's came in flocks to Whitehall, in great disorder and confusion, crying out for pay, and hardly to be appeas'd. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. Fol. Edit.

' All which jewels and plate have been received by the said Duke and Earl, to be disposed of by them for our especial service, according as we have given unto them private directions.

' Now forasmuch as the said jewels and plate are of great value, and have long continued, as it were by dissent for many years together, with the crown of England, and therefore it may not be safe for the said Lord Compton, Lord Conway, Sir Henry Mildmay, Endymion Porter, or any of them, to deliver them out of their several charges, nor for the said Duke and Earl to receive the same, and transport them beyond the seas, and there to dispose of them, without especial warrant from us for the doing thereof, which in time to come might be perilous unto them, unless we did declare by some public instrument, that all this was done by our especial warrant; and for our especial service, we have &c. (22).

' Witness ourself at Hampton-court, the 7th day of December.

' Per Ipsum Regem.'

While he was in the Netherlands, some curious Arab MSS. collected by Erpenius, and by him left to his widow, were upon sale to the Jesuits at Antwerp. But the Duke, being informed of it by his Secretary Dr Mason, stept between and purchased them for 500l. more than their weight in silver; 'a mixed act,' says Sir Henry Wotton, 'both of bounty and charity, and the more laudable, being much out of his natural element.' After the Duke's death they were presented to the University of Cambridge by the Dutchess Dowager, as soon as she knew from Dr Mason that this was the intention of her husband, who had a purpose likewise, as I am well informed, continues Sir Henry Wotton, to raise, in that University where he was Chancellor, a fair case for them, and to furnish it with other choice collections from all parts at his own charge (23). It is well known that he spared no cost in procuring scarce and curious coins (24), as well as pictures, of which last his collection at York-house was the admiration of the age (25). Here, to use Sir H. Wotton's phrase, he was in his natural element; and the same is elegantly expressed in a picture, hanging in the Queen's stair-case at Hampton-court, where he appears in the figure of Mercury, presenting the Arts and Sciences to their Majesties sitting in a cloud, while some boys are driving away Envy and Malice. The piece was drawn by Huntorst, who, among several others, tasted largely of the Duke's liberality; particularly, it is said that his Grace once gave Nicholas Lanier 500l. in gold, and at another time 300l. because he could not get of King James what that painter deserved (26).

[F] His expedition to Rochelle.] The Duke's conduct in this expedition was generally much censured, and no where more severely than in a letter of Denzil (afterwards Lord) Holles to his brother-in-law Sir Thomas Wentworth (afterwards Earl of Strafford) which, containing some particulars about it not taken notice of by any of our historians, we shall lay before the Reader: 'God, says his Lordship, hath blessed us better than we deserve, or by our preparations than we could expect, or else we had been in a far worse condition than now we are, though we be sufficiently bad: for it was a thousand to one we had lost all our ships to close up this unfortunate action, if a fair wind had not so opportunely come to have brought them off; for they had but ten days victuals left, which failing, they must have submitted themselves to the enemy's mercy; who besides were preparing with long boats to have come and fired them, which was marvellous feasible, if they had staid never so little longer. For the particulars of their most shameful deroute upon their retreat, which is or will be in every body's mouth, I doubt not but you know as well or better than myself. For the action in general, one of themselves, who, for his sincerity and understanding I may term also a prophet of their own, has given me this censure of it, That it was ill begun, worse ordered in every particular, and the success accordingly most lamentable: Nothing but discontents betwixt the General and the most understanding of his soldiers, as Burroughs, Courtney, Spy; every thing done against the hair, and attempted without probability of success, and there was no hopes of mastering the place from the very beginning, especially since Michaelmas; that a very great supply came at one time into the fort, and that since they relieved it at their pleasure. Yet for all this the Duke would stay, and would not stay, doing things by halves: For had he done either, and gone through with it, possibly it could not have been so ill as it is; for he removed his ordinance, and shipped it a month almost, before he raised the siege, yet still kept his army there, fit neither for offence nor defence; and at the last, the Saturday before the unfortunate Monday he came away, would needs give a general assault, where many good men were lost, when there was no ordinance to protect them going on or coming off. Et qualis vita, finis ita, as they behaved themselves while they were there, so did they at their coming away: for though they knew two thousand French landed that morning in the island, and there was at least three thousand in the two forts, the great one and the little one (of which by the way we never heard; but they thought it not fit we should know all perhaps, because they knew secrecy an essential part of war policy) so as they could not but expect to be a little troubled with them in their marching, yet made they no provision to secure themselves: For being to pass by a narrow causey (where more than six or eight could not go in front, and which a very small number might have made good against a million) and so by a bridge over a little passage into an island as it were, where once being they would be safe, there was no order taken for viewing and preparing the way, that when they came to it there was no passage over; so that their stay gave a great deal of time and opportunity to the enemy, who all the while followed them at the heels so close, that my Lord Duke himself, who, I know not by what misfortune, was in the rear, had like to have been snapped, if he had not presently made way through the troops upon the narrow causey: and had he, the General, miscarried, what might have become, think you, of the whole army, like a body without a head, or a flock without a shepherd? But he carefully got himself on ship-board that night, to prevent the worst, and to order boats for the shipping of the army; but the French, falling upon the rear, killed and took prisoners as they would themselves, helped by our own horse, who, to save themselves (which yet they could not do) broke in, rode over our men, and put all into disorder, which made way for the slaughter; but it seems no resistance at all was made, but they even disbanded, and shifted every one for himself, there being no word of command given for the making them face about for repulsing of the enemy; for then it must needs have gone from hand to hand through the whole troops; and a serjeant major that was in the rear has protested to me, They did not so much as know, that any thing had been done till after-ward a pretty while; and it had been the easiest thing in the world, in that narrow place, to have beaten back the enemy, had they been never so many, or at least to have defended themselves. But the disorder and confusion was so great, the truth is, no man can tell what was done, nor no account can be given how any man was lost, not the Lieutenant-Colonel how his Colonel, or Lieutenant how his Captain, or any one knows how another was lost; which is a sign that things were ill carried. This only every man knows, that since England was England it received not so dishonourable a blow: Four Colonels lost; thirty-two colours in the enemy's possession. (but more lost); God knows how many men slain; they say not above two thousand of our side, and I think not one of the enemies.

' But I little thought to have said so much when I began, l'appetit m'est venu en mangeant, one thing having drawn in another. I will here end with a prayer, that God, who only can draw light out of darkness, will be pleased to give us a better issue out of our present miserable condition than any of us can expect, though we may hope and pray for it. To his holy protection I commend you and yours, and so I rest

' Your most affectionate

Dorchester,
Nov. 19,
1627.

' Brother and Servant,

' D. Holles (27).'

(27) Strafford's Letters, &c.
Vol. I. p. 47.

Sir

(22) These Jewels, with some of the Duke's, were pawned for 53400l. Vide The book of his Grace's accounts from 1622 to 1628 inclusive, by Sir Sackville Crow, a MS. in Museo Thoresbeiano, communicated by the present worthy Possessor thereof. N. B. As these Crown Jewels are not now in the possession of the Crown, and were apparently never redeemed, this account therefore is all that remains authentic of them.

(23) Life &c. of the Duke, p. 18.

(24) See a letter of Dr Laud to Archbp Usher, in Parr's collection, No. CLXVI.

(25) A particular account of it is inserted in the next article.

(26) R. Simonds, as quoted in the anecdotes of painting, Vol. II. p. 125, Edit. 1762, by Mr Horace Walpole, who observes, that Lanier was an excellent musician; and in that character was retained by his Majesty, with a salary of 100l. per annum.

(1) The act for granting the famous petition of right was signed by his Majesty the same day. The King having sent the grant, font fait comme il est désiré, in answer to the Commons address on the 7th of June preceding. Upon which, says Mr Howell, the Duke made a notable speech at the Council-table in joy thereof. Among other passages one was, That hereafter his Majesty would please to make the parliament his favourite, and he to have the honour to remain still his servant. Epist. Ho-Eliazar, Vol. I. § 5. No. VI. to the Lord Scroop, &c. dated London, Sept. 25, 1621. Salmon's Chron. Hill. under this year.

(28) In his Grace's life, p. 20.

Sir Henry Wotton, on the other hand, having assured us (28), 'that the Duke undertook this service to recover the public good-will; which he saw by his own example might quickly be won and lost, observes as to the action, that it had been much less censured by some of the French writers than generally among ourselves at home. That the Duke's carriage was noble throughout; respectful to the gentlemen, bountiful to the soldiers, as he found any distinguished worth in them; tender and careful of the wounded; his personal courage unquestionable, and rather fearful of fame than danger. That he shewed no visible alteration in his countenance after the succours, which he expected, failed him, though it lay heavy at his heart; which to Dr Mason, his Secretary, whom he laid on a pallet near him, broke out into bitter and passionate expressions, protesting, that neither his dispatches to diverse princes, nor the great business of a fleet, of an army, of a siege, of a treaty of war and peace, both of them on foot together, and all of them in his head at a time, did not so much break his repose, as a conceit, that some at home, under his Majesty, of whom he had well deserved, were now content to forget him (29). But whom he meant, says Sir Henry, I know not, and am loath to roam at conjecture. Of the two forts, proceeds this Author, he could not take the one, and he would not take the other: But in the general town, he maintained a seizure and possession of the whole three full months and eighteen days, and that, at his first descent on shore, he was not immured within a wooden vessel, but countenanced the landing in his long boat, where succeeded such a defeat of 200 horse, (and these not, by his guests, mounted in haste, but, for the most part, gentlemen of family and great relations) seconded with 2000 foot, as, all circumstances well ballanced on either side, may surely endure a comparison with any of the bravest impressions in ancient time. In the issue of the whole business he seems charged in opinion with a kind of improvident confidence, having brought of that with him to the camp perhaps too much of a court, where fortune had never deceived him. Besides, we must consider him but rude in the profession of arms, though greedy of honour, and zealous in the cause.' Some part of these remarks, by the Duke's friend, with regard to his courage, and conduct to the soldiers, is confirmed by a passage in a letter to one of his foes, to whom it was proposed as an example for him to copy. The passage is as follows: 'Upon this occasion I will relate to your Lordship what happened lately in the isle of Rhee, when the Duke of Buckingham was the King's general there: I heard one relate it who was present upon the place. It was told the Duke by a colonel there, that two other colonels said these words to him, which he would maintain with his life: That they observed the Duke often to go in his barge to the fleet, and that one time or other he would steal away into England, which if he did, they would hang out the white flag, and deliver up the town and island to Toras, Governor of the castle. The Duke called next day a council of war, the accuser absent, and charged these two gentlemen with the words, who flatly denied them upon their honours, offering to make it good with their swords. This the Duke took for satisfaction; and, giving a general admonition, he dismissed the court. Nay he [the Relater of this story] said further, that, during the Duke's abode in that island, there were soldiers and captains who would say ill things; and that they spoke as boldly of the Duke their General, as the Commons house of parliament did in the session before he went thither; and that the Duke was told of these speeches every day, but passed them over without so much as questioning any one (30). After reading this, no doubt can be made how he treated the letter which was wrote by James Howell before this session of parliament. That forward penman, it seems, had been, in some shape or other, a Retainer (31) to the Duke, and, upon the confidence of that connexion, and the Duke's well known affability, presumed to advise him to part with some of his places, to take away the mutterings that run of the multiplicity of offices; and continues he, (according to his wonted strain of affected witticisms) 'in my shallow apprehension your Grace might stand more firm without an anchor.' In proceeding, he ventures upon some further advice in regard to the better regulation of his Grace's private family, and then concludes with gilding such unpalatable pills in the following courtly address: 'I know your Grace does not nor needs not affect popularity. It is true, that the people's love is the strongest citadel of a sovereign Prince; but to a great subject it hath often proved fatal; for he who pulleth off his hat to the people, giveth his head to the Prince; and it is remarkable what was said of a late unfortunate Earl, who, a little before Queen Elizabeth's death, had drawn the axe upon his own neck, That he was grown so popular, that he was grown too dangerous for the times, and the times for him [32].' These last words evidently point at the Earl of Essex: And it is not improbable, that the story of this illustrious statesman was often mentioned by way of contrast to that of the Duke, especially after his unfortunate end. Among others, Mr Hyde (afterwards Lord Chancellor Clarendon) employed some thoughts and time upon the subject, in a piece, entitled, The difference and disparity between the estates and conditions of George Duke of Buckingham and Robert Earl of Essex; which appears to be written presently after the Duke's assassination.

[G] He received a mortal stab.] The very surprizing manner in which the Duke's assassination was perpetrated, furnished the dealers in omens and prodigies with choice matter to feed their fancies. Every tale that brought any tidings of the least circumstance relating to it was sure to be eagerly listened to, and religiously preserved as a sacred treasure. Hence we find the famous story of the apparition or ghost of Sir George Villiers, the Duke's father, predicting his son's untimely end, if he did not change some part of his ministerial conduct, equally related by the loyal and serious Earl of Clarendon (33), and William Lilly, juggler and mountebank to the rebels (34), whose misrepresentations were also thought worth while to be corrected in a more authentic account by that curious natural historian Dr Robert Plot (35), who ushers in his narrative with the following introduction: 'Since William Lilly, the rebels juggler and mountebank, bath, in his malicious and blasphemous discourse concerning our late martyred Sovereigne, of blessed memory, imprinted (among other his lies and falsehoods) a relation concerning an apparition, which foretold several events which should happen to the late Duke of Buckingham, wherein he falsifies both the person to whom it appeared, and the circumstances; I thought it not amiss to enter here (that it may be preserved) the true account of the apparition, as I received it from and under the hand of Mr Edmund Windham of Kottisford in the county of Somerset. I shall set it downe (ipsisimis verbis), as he delivered it to me at my request, written with his owne hand.'

(30) Mr Garrard's letter of Jan. 25, 1635, to the Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, in Strafford's letters and State-papers, Vol. I. p. 510.

(31) See his article. To which we shall take this opportunity of adding, that he probably got into the Duke's retinue by the interest of Lady Scrope, who was sister to the Earl of Rutland, and aunt to the Dukes of Buckingham. Howell's Letters, Vol. I. § 5. Edit. 1650, where he gives an account of the Duke's murder from a letter to the Earl of Rutland, whom he met on the road, posting up to London on that sad occasion.

(32) Idem, § 4. No. XVIII.

(33) In his Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. I. Fol. Edit.

(34) In his Observations on the Life and Death of K. Charles.

(35) See Historia et vita & regni Rich. II. p. 405. Edit. Oxford. 1729, by T. Hearne, a genius particularly turned for picking up and hoarding such trash.

• Sir,

universally detested. His bowels were interred at Portsmouth, and a handsome memorial of

‘ Sir,
 ‘ According to your desire, and my promise, I have written downe what I remember (divers things being slipt out of my memory) of the relation made me by Mr Nicholas Towse concerning the apparition which visited him about 1627.
 ‘ I and my wife, upon occasion being in London, lay at my brother Pyne’s house without Bishopsgate, which was next house unto Mr Nicholas Towse’s, who was his kinsman and familiar acquaintance, in consideration of whose society and friendship he took a house in that place; the said Towse being a very fine musician, and very good company, for ought I ever saw or heard, a virtuous, religious, and well disposed gentleman. About that time the said Mr Towse told me, that, one night being in bed, and perfectly waking, and a candle burning by him (as he usually had), there came into his chamber, and stood by his bed-side, an old gentleman, in such a habit as was in use in Queen Elizabeth’s time; at whose first appearance Mr Towse was very much troubled; but after a little while, recollecting himself, he demanded of him in the name of God, what he was? whether he were a man? And the Apparition replied noe: Then he asked him if he were a devil? And the Apparition answered noe. Then said Mr Towse, In the name of God what art thou then? And as I remember Mr Towse told me, that the Apparition answered him that he was the ghost of Sir George Villiers, father to the then Duke of Buckingham, whom he might very well remember, since he went to schole at such a place in Leicestershire, naming the place, which I have forgotten. And Mr Towse told me, that the Apparition had perfectly the resemblance of the said Sir George Villiers in all respects, and in the same habit that he had often seen him wear in his life-time. The said Apparition also told him, that he could not but remember the much kindness, that he the said Sir George Villiers had expressed to him, whilst he was a scholar in Leicestershire, as aforesaid; and that, out of that consideration, he believed that he loved him, and that therefore he made choice of him the said Mr Towse to deliver a message to his son the Duke of Buckingham, thereby to prevent such mischief as would otherwise befall the said Duke, whereby he would be inevitably ruined. And then, as I remember, Mr Towse told me, that the Apparition instructed him what message he should deliver to the Duke; unto which Mr Towse replied, that he should be very unwilling to go to the Duke of Bucks upon such an errand, whereby he should gaine nothing but reproach and contempt, and be esteemed a madman, and therefore desired to be excused from the employment. But the Apparition prest him with much earnestness to undertake it, telling him, that the circumstances and secret discoveries (which he should be able to make to the Duke of such passages in the course of his life which were known to none but himselfe) would make it appeare, that his message was not the fancy of a distempered braine, but a reality. And so the Apparition tooke his leave of him for that night, telling him, that he would give him leave to consider until the next night, and then he would come to receive his answer, whether he would undertake to deliver his message to the Duke of Buckingham or noe. Mr Towse passed the next day with much trouble and perplexity, debateing and reasoning with himselfe whether he should deliver this message to the Duke of Buckingham or not; but in the conclusion he resolved to doe it. And the next night, when the Apparition came, he gave his answer accordingly, and then received full instructions. After which Mr Towse went and found out Sir Thomas Bludder and Sir Ralph Freeman, by whom he was brought to the Duke of Buckingham, and had several private and long audiences of him. I myselfe, by the favour of a friend, was once admitted to see him in private conference with the Duke, where (although I heard not their discourse) I observed much earnestness in their actions and gestures. After which conference Mr Towse told me, that the Duke would not follow the advice that was given him, which was (as I remember) that he intimated the casting off and rejecting of some men, who had great interest in him, and, as I take it, he named Bishop Laud; and that he the Duke was to do some popular acts in the ensuing parliament, of which the Duke would have had Mr Towse to have been a Burgess; but he refused it, alleging, that, unless the Duke had followed his directions, he must doe him hurt if he were of the parliament. Mr Towse also then told me, that the Duke confessed, that he had told him those things that no creature knew but himselfe, and that none but God or the Divell could reveale to him. The Duke offered Mr Towse to have the King knight him, and to have given him preferment (as he told me) but that he refused it, saying, that, unless he would follow his advice, he would receive nothing from him. Mr Towse, when he made me this relation, told me the Duke would inevitably be destroyed before such a time (which he then named) and accordingly the Duke’s death happened before that time. He likewise told me, that he had written downe all the discourses that he had had with the Apparition; and that at last his coming to him was so familiar, that he was as little troubled with it as if it had been a friend or acquaintance that had come to visit him. Mr Towse told me further, that the Archbishop (then Bishop of London) Dr Laud, should by his counsels be the Author of very great trouble to the kingdome, by which it should be reduced to that extremity of disorder and confusion, that it should seem to be past all hope of recovery without a miracle; but yet, when all people were in despaire of happy days againe, the kingdome should suddenly be reduced and resettled againe in a most happy condition. At this time my father Pyne was in trouble, and committed to the Gatehouse by the Lords of the Council, about a quarrel between him and the Lord Parwlett; upon which, one night, I sayd unto my cousin Towse by way of jest, I pray you ask your Apparition what shall become of my father Pyne’s business? which he promised to doe, and the next day told me, that my father Pyne’s enemies were ashamed of their malicious prosecution, and that he would be at liberty within a weeke, or some few days, which happened accordingly. Mr Towse’s wife (since his death) told me, that her husband and she living in Windfor-castle, where he had an office, that summer the Duke of Buckingham was killed, told her the very day that the Duke was sett upon by the mutinous mariners at Portsmouth, saying, that the would be his death, which accordingly fell out, and that at the very instant the Duke was killed (as upon strict enquiry they found afterwards) Mr Towse, sitting amongst some company, suddenly started up, and said, The Duke of Buckingham is slain. Mr Towse lived not long after; but told his wife the time of his own death beforehand: which is as much as I can remember of this Apparition, which, according to your desire, is written by,

‘ Sir,

Boulogne,
 Aug. 5,
 1652.

‘ Your &c.

‘ Edmund Windham.’

The incident of the Duke’s death is perhaps not more astonishing than it is, that this idle tale (for so I do not scruple to call it) should be credited by the forementioned writers, notwithstanding the evident marks which it bears of being nothing more than a mere phantom of Mr Towse the relator’s enthusiastic brain, to which, it seems, at last the coming of the Apparition was so familiar, that he was as little troubled with it as if it had been a friend or acquaintance that had come to visit him (36). However, that the Enthusiast believed it, got himself introduced to the Duke, and told him the whole story, is probable enough (37): one circumstance especially will never be questioned, that after the conference he told Mr Wyndham, that his Grace shewed no manner of regard to the advice of his Father’s Ghost. Such a treatment of it was perfectly agreeable to the Duke’s manner in general. And to the same purpose Sir Henry Wotton (who, by the bye, if he had heard of the Apparition, thought proper to say nothing of it) relates the following passage, which happened on the Duke’s return to Plymouth, after the expedition to the isle of Rhee: When Lord Goring dispatched an expresse messenger in all haste, with advice to him to assure his person by declining the ordinary road, for that he had credible intelligence of a plot against his life, to be put in execution upon him in his said journey towards the Court. The Duke, continues Sir Henry, meeting the messenger on the way, read the letter, and smothered it in

(36) A circumstance which, added to the extravagance of the rest, is sufficient to blast the credit of the whole.

(37) Sir Simons d’Ewes, who has related the account of his assassination at full length, concludes thus: It was reported the Duke had some prediction or forewarning given him to beware of this month of August as fatal to him. D’Ewes’s Life of himself, MS. in the British Museum, of him erected there by his sister, the Countess of Denbigh [H]. His body was brought to York-house, whence, after lying some time in an illustrious manner on a hearse, it was conveyed to Westminster-abbey (m), and sumptuously entombed on the North side of Henry VIII's chapel, where a most noble monument is erected to his memory. The Earl of Clarendon, who had considered him thoroughly, having mentioned his faults with a candid impartiality, observes, that ' he was of a noble nature and generous disposition, and of such other endowments as made him very capable of being a great favourite to a great King, and understood the arts of a court, and all the learning that is professed there, exactly well. That he was of a most flowing courtesy and affability to all men who made any address to him; and so desirous to oblige them, that he did not enough consider the value of the obligation, or the merit of the person he chose to oblige, from which much of his misfortune resulted. He was of a courage not to be daunted, both in civil and military life, which was manifested in all his actions, and in his contests with particular persons of the greatest reputation [I], especially his pocket without the least imaginable apprehension, rides forward, having not above seven or eight persons in his retinue, and those with no other weapons than ordinary swords. After this he had not advanced three miles before he met with an old woman, near a town in the road, who demanded whether the Duke was in the company; and signifying some special occasion to be brought to him, she was led to his horse's side, where she told him, that, in the very next town through which he was to pass, she had heard some desperate men vow his death, and so offered to direct him about by a safer way. This old woman's casual access, joined to that deliberate advertisement which he had from his noble friend, moved him to participate both the tenour of the said letter, and all the circumstances, with his company, who all agreed, that the woman had advised him well: notwithstanding all which importunity he resolved not to wave his road, upon this reason, perhaps more generous than provident, that, as he said, if he should but once by such a diversion make his enemies believe he was afraid of danger, he should never live without it. Hereupon his nephew, Lord Viscount Fielding, being then in his company, out of a noble spirit besought him, that he might wear his coat and blue ribbon through the town, pleading that his uncle's life, whereon lay the property of his whole family, was of all things under heaven the most precious unto him, and undertaking so to gesture and muffle up himself in his hood, as the Duke's manner was to ride in cold weather, that none should discern the difference, and so the Duke should be the more at liberty for his own defence; at which sweet proposition the Duke caught him in his arms and kissed him, yet would not, as he said, in that case, accept of such an offer from a nephew, whose life he tendered as much as himself; and so, liberally rewarding the poor old creature for her good-will, after some short directions to his company how they should carry themselves, he rode on without perturbation of mind. He was no sooner entered into the town, but a scrambling soldier clapt hold of his bridle, which he thought was in a begging or a drunken fashion; but a gentleman of his train, that rode a pretty distance behind him, conceiving by the premises, that it might be a beginning of some mischievous intent, spurred up his horse, and with a violent rush severed him from the Duke, who with the rest went on quietly through the town; nor was there any further enquiry into this conspiracy, the Duke peradventure thinking it wisdom not to reserve discontentments too deep (38). This writer, Sir Henry Wotton, relates also another passage concerning the Duke, which happened just before his departure on this expedition to Rochelle, when it seems he took an opportunity, in a parting visit to Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, to tell him, that he well knew his Majesty's unalterable affection for his Lordship, and therefore desired him to recommend his poor wife and children to his favour. The Bishop, prompted either by the words or the manner of his delivery, or both, asked him if he had never any forebodings; to which the Duke replied, No; but I think I may chance to be killed as well as another man. We have chosen to mention this passage, because it sets before us a lively picture of this great Duke's courage. We see him here perfectly sensible, and considerate of the danger he was running into, yet far from being touched with any unmanly or unsoldierly fears or apprehensions about it.

(m) Sir Henry Wotton, ubi supra.

[H] His sister, the Countess of Denbigh. Sir Henry Wotton informs us, that she received a letter from the Duke on the day of his death, whereunto all the while she was writing her answer, she bedewed the paper with her tears, and after a most bitter passion, (whereof she could yield no reason but that her dearest brother was to be gone) she fell down in a swoon. Her letter ended thus: I will pray for your happy return, which I look to with a great cloud over my head, too heavy for my poor heart to bear without torment. But I hope the great God of heaven will bless you. The next day the Bishop of Ely, her devoted friend, who was thought the fittest preparer of her mind to receive such a doleful accident, came to visit her: But hearing she was at rest, he attended till she should wake of herself, which she did with the affrightment of a dream, her brother seeming to pass through a field with her in his company, where hearing a sudden shout of the people, and asking the reason, it was answered to be for joy that the Duke of Buckingham was sick, which she had scarce related to her gentlewoman before the Bishop was entered into her bed-chamber for a chosen messenger of the Duke's death. The dreaming of his sickness was the natural consequence of that indisposition of body that he felt the day before, as is related by the same writer, who further informs us, that the King, hearing it, was pleased to give him the honour of a visit (39), and found him in his bed, where, after much serious and private discourse, the Duke, at his Majesty's departure, embraced him in a very unusual and passionate manner, and did in like sort to his friend the Earl of Holland, as if his soul had divined he should see them no more. Such was the comment made upon it by the generality of people (40), always fond nurses of omens and presages; though it was evidently nothing more than the natural effect of the sense he had of the danger he was about to run, as well from his enemies at home, who might more easily compass his ruin while absent, as also from that of losing his life in the expedition abroad: Nor was it difficult to foresee the no less danger if he should happen to escape at Rochelle with his life, but return home a second time unsuccessful, which was most likely to be the event, as had been not only the fate of a fleet commanded by the Earl of Denbigh (41), his brother-in-law, which set sail from Plymouth to relieve the same city on the 17th of April preceding, but also of this very fleet intended for the Duke, which set sail afterwards on the same design, under the command of the Earl of Lindsey, on the 18th of September following. In short, the game was become desperate: He knew it, and expressed his full sensibility of it in the abovementioned apartment with the King, who, when the messenger arrived at Tichfield with the news of his murder, was in his closet at prayers, in which the Duke no doubt had a share, as is intimated in those excellent lines of Mr Waller on the occasion, which begin, So earnest with thy God &c. (42).

[I] His civil courage was manifest in his contests with persons of the greatest reputation. To confirm this, the noble historian produces the following remarkable instance: Having observed, that the Duke never endeavoured to do any man an ill office before he first told him what he was to expect from him, and reproached him with the injuries he had done, he goes on thus: ' In this manner he proceeded with the Earl of Oxford, a man of great name in that time, and whom he had endeavoured by many civil offices to make his friend, and who seemed equally to incline to the friendship. But when he discovered (or, as many thought, only suspected) that the Earl was entered into some cabal in parliament against him, he could not be dissuaded by any of his friends, to whom he imparted his resolution, but meeting the Earl the next day, he took him aside, and told him, he would rely no longer on his friendship, nor should he [the Earl] expect any further friendship from him; but, on the contrary, he would be for ever his enemy, and do him all the mischief he could. The Earl, who, as many thought, had not been faulty

(39) His Majesty was then at Tichfield, the seat of six miles from Portsmouth.

(40) Life of the Duke, as before.

(41) William Viscount Fielding, Lord St. Lis, and Baron of Newnham Padox, was created Earl of Denbigh, Jan. 20, 1622-3, by the interest of the Duke of Buckingham. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

(42) Waller's Poems.

(38) Life and Death of the Duke, p. 19, 20, 21.

cially in his whole demeanor in the isle of Rhee, both at the landing and on the retreat; in both which no man was more fearless, or more ready to expose himself to the highest dangers.' The Duke's memory has been severely handled by many writers. Among others, Sir Simonds d'Ewes (n) represents him as a man of extreme lust with regard to women. But this is unsupported by any facts, and rests solely upon the authority of that writer, whose general character, both for mistake and malice, are too well known to gain much credit (o). However we are far from thinking him obstinate against all the temptations this way, to which his high station and personal accomplishments laid him open. No doubt he had his juvenilities with the sex, though they were managed with decorum: In which respect he was a proper confidant of those of his master when Prince of Wales [K]. Whatever his amours were, it is evident he preserved his heart entire to his Lady, whom, Sir Henry Wotton assures us, he loved dearly, and expressed his love in an act and time of no dissimulation, towards his end bequeathing her all his mansion-houses during her natural life, and a power to dispose of his whole personal estate, together with a fourth part of his lands, in jointure. The regard he shewed to his relations was such, that it was charged, though surely without reason, among his crimes. The last mentioned writer has indeed observed, that he left his elder brother John, of the same womb, a Viscount (p), and Christopher, his younger, an Earl (q): Sir Edward Villiers, his half brother (r) on the father's side, he either preferred, or removed, call it how you will, from his step-mother's eye to the presidentship of Munster in Ireland, where he lived in singular estimation for his justice and hospitality, and died, with as much grief of the whole province as ever any Governor did [L], before his religious Lady, of sweet and noble discretion, adding much to his honour. The eldest of the brethren, William, and heir of the name, was made a Baronet, but abstained from Court, enjoying perhaps the greater greatness of self-fruition (s). He left his mother a Countess by patent (t) in her own person, which was a new leading example, grown before somewhat rare since the days of Queen Mary. His sister of Denbigh, that right character of a good Lady, he most recommended to the Queen, who, after a discharge of some French in her court, that were to return home, took her into three several places of honour and trust. In short, he left all his female kindred, of the entire or half blood, descending of the name of Villiers or Beaumont, within any near degree, either matched with Peers of the realm actually, or hopefully with Earls sons and heirs, or at least with Knights, or Doctors of Divinity, of plentiful condition. He did not much strengthen his own substance in Court, but stood there on his own feet. For the truth is, the most of his allies rather leaned upon to him, was as great-hearted as he (and thought the very suspecting him to be an injury unpardonable) without any reply to the particulars, declared, that he neither cared for his friendship, nor feared his hatred; and from thence avowedly entered into the conversation and confidence of those who were solicitous to pursue any thing that might prove to his disadvantage, which was of evil consequence to the Duke; the Earl being of the most ancient of the nobility, and a man of great courage, and of a family which had in no time swerved from its fidelity to the crown (43).

[K] He was a confidant in the intrigues of his master. We have a letter of this Prince, afterwards King Charles I, to the Duke, by which it appears he was privy to an amour of his Highness. It runs thus:

Steanie,
I have nothing now to wryte to you, but to give you thanks bothe for the good counsell ye gave me, and for the event of it. The King gave mee a good sharp potion, but you took away the working of it by the well relished comfites ye sent after it. I have met with the partie that must not be named, once alreddie, and the cullor of wryting this letter shall make me meete with her on Saturday, although it is written the day being Thursday. So assuring you, that the busines goes safelie onn, I rest

Your constant loving friend,

I hope ye will not shew the King this letter, but put it in the safe custody of Mister Vulcan.

[L] His death was much lamented by the province. In the Earl of Cork's chapel at Youghall, where he was buried, there still remains the following hexastic to his memory:

Munster may curse the time that Villiers came
To make us worse, by leaving such a name
Of noble parts as none can imitate,
But those whose hearts are married to the state:
But if they press to imitate his fame,
Munster may bless the time that Villiers came.

His Lady abovementioned was Barbara, eldest daughter of Sir John St. John of Lidiard Tregose in Wiltshire, and niece to Sir Oliver St John, created Viscount Grandison in Ireland, Jan. 3, 1620, with limitation of that honour to her posterity. She brought Sir Edward, besides three daughters, four sons; 1st, William, who succeeded his father in estate, and his uncle in the title of Viscount Grandison in 1630. On the breaking out of the rebellion he adhered to King Charles I, and signalized himself on several occasions; but being wounded at the siege of Bristol, July 26, 1643, he was carried to Oxford, where he died in August following in the thirtieth year of his age, and has a noble monument erected to his memory in the cathedral of Christ-church (where he was buried) by Barbara Dutchess of Cleveland, his only daughter and heir. His character is drawn by Lord Clarendon (45) so very amiable, that the reader cannot but be pleased with it. 'He was a young man, says the noble historian, of so virtuous a habit of mind, that no temptation or provocation could corrupt him; so great a lover of justice and integrity, that no example, necessity, or even the barbarity of this war, could make him swerve from the most precise rules of it; and of that rare piety and devotion, that the court or camp could not shew a more faultless person, or to whose example young men might more reasonably conform themselves. His personal valour and courage of all kinds (for he had sometimes indulged so much to the corrupt opinion of honour as to venture himself in duels) was very eminent, insomuch as he was accused of being too prodigal of his person; his affection, zeal, and obedience to the King was such as became a branch of that family. And he was wont to say, that if he had not understanding enough to know the uprightnes of the cause, nor loyalty enough to inform him of the duty of a subject, yet the very obligations of gratitude to the King on behalf of his house were such as his life was but a due sacrifice for; and therefore he no sooner saw the war unavoidable, than he engaged all his brethren as well as himself in the service, and there were then three more of them in command in the army where he was so unfortunately cut off. These brothers were Sir John, who succeeded his brother William as Viscount Grandison, but dying without issue male, the title came to George, whose grandson and heir was created Earl Grandison, of Limerick in Ireland, Sept. 11, 1721. Edward, the third brother, and fourth son of the President of Munster, was ancestor to the present Earl of Jersey (46), him

(n) In the account of himself, MS. in the British Museum.

(q) Created Earl of Anglesey, Sept. 24, 1623. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year. His son Charles, Earl of Anglesey, died without issue in 1654, leaving Susan his sister and heir, who was married to Thomas Savile, Earl of Suffolk. Peerage, as before.

(t) She was created Countess of Buckingham, 16 Jac. I. Peerage, p. 203.

(43) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, &c. 8vo. Vol. I. p. 32.

(44) Historia et vita & regni Ricardi II. p. 404, by Mr T. Hearne, who tells us the letter is said to have once belonged to Archbishop Sancroft, and observes it is the only intrigue he had ever heard this Prince was concerned in.

(o) Sir Simonds is also very justly taxed with vanity; the same foible which too evidently prompted his Vindicator to shew his talents in defending a bad cause. See d'Ewes's article.

(p) Created Baron Villiers of Stoke, and Viscount Perbeck. Peerage, Vol. III. p. 203. Edit. 1756.

(r) He was knighted at Windsor on the 7th of September, 1616, and in 1620 was sent Ambassador into Bohemia, both by the Duke's interest. Idem, p. 216.

(s) He was created a Baronet on the 19th of July, 1619; but the title became extinct in his grandson and heir, Sir William Villiers, Bart. who dying Feb. 27, 1711, aged 67 years, no issue male is now remaining of that line. Peerage, as before, p. 203, and Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1619.

(45) In his Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. Fol. Edit.

(46) Peerage, Vol. III. p. 216, 217. Edit. 1756.

him than shored him up. His familiar servants, either about his person in ordinary attendance, or about his affairs of state as his Secretaries, of office and his Steward, or of law, as that worthy Knight whom he long used to solicit his causes, he left all both in good fortune, and, which is more, in good fame; things very seldom consociated in the instruments of great personages. This great Duke took to wife, eight years and two months before his death, the Lady Catbarine Mannors, daughter and sole heir of Francis Earl of Rutland (u) [M], by whom he had issue three sons and a daughter. Mary, his first-born child, who, by patent, bearing date Aug. 31, 3 Car. I, had the title of Dutchess of Buckingham limited to her in default of issue male of her Father. She was first married to Charles Lord Herbert, son and heir to Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery [N]; secondly to James Duke of Richmond and Lenox; and thirdly to Thomas Howard, brother to Charles Earl of Carlisle; but left no issue by any of them (w). Of the sons, Charles the eldest died an infant, and was buried in Westminster-abbey, March 17, 1626. The second son George is the subject of the ensuing article; wherein will be given an account also of his third son Francis. After the Duke's death, the Dutchess entered into a second marriage with Randulph Macdonald, first Earl and then Marquis of Antrim in Ireland (x). The King was much displeas'd with this match, and for some time refused to see her; yet afterwards, in 1635, he became so far reconciled as to treat her with the same respect he had ever done: but her children were taken from her [O]; the sons to be brought up with the

(a) The match was probably much to the satisfaction of the King, who, when Prince, in 1623, was brought safely out of Spain by the Earl, having the command of his Majesty's great ships and pinnaces given him for that purpose. Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 468. Edit. 1756.

(w) Ibid.

(x) She had no issue by him, Collins's Peerage, Vol. I. p. 69. Edit. 1756, though she had a miscarriage at Newhall in 1635. Garrard's letter to Deputy Wentworth, dated Oct. 3, 1635, in Strafford's letters, &c. Vol. I. p. 467, et seqq.

(47) Collins's Peerage, Vol. I. p. 469. Edit. 1756.

(48) Letter of Mr Garrard, dated June 3, 1634, to Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, in Strafford's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 261.

(49) He was the second son, and succeeded his father in the estate and titles, his elder brother Charles dying in his father's lifetime at Florence, ann. 1635, before cohabitation. Peerage of England by Collins, Vol. II. p. 122. Edit. 1756.

(50) Letter of Mr Garrard, dated Jan. 15, 1634, to the Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, in Strafford's Letters and State Papers, &c. Vol. II.

(51) Strafford's Letters, &c. Vol. I. p. 524.

(52) Viz. April 5, 1636. Ibid. Vol. II. p. 2.

(53) Ibid. p. 125, and 128.

[M] Francis Earl of Rutland.] This Earl Francis by a second match had two sons, Henry and Francis, who both dying in their infancy, the title came to Sir George Mannors, Knt. his brother and heir male (47), with whom, as to the estate, the Dutchess of Buckingham, after some disputes, made the following agreement: That he was to have for his life 7000l. per annum; that legacies and annuities should be parted betwixt them; that Belvoir and 2000l. a year should go to his heir; and all the rest to be settled on her and her children after her (48).

[N] She was married to Charles Lord Herbert, &c.] They were married about Christmas, in the year 1634, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the closet at Whitehall. It was done privately, and a few only invited, and sooner than was intended, by reason the young Lady began to affect the younger brother, Philip Herbert (49), and of herself had moved the Lord Chamberlain his father that she might marry him, saying he did apply himself to her more than Lord Herbert did; but the Dutchess chid her out of that humour; and now she is married, the affection, says my Author (50), will vanish.

[O] Her children were taken from her.] In a letter, dated March 15, 1635, to Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, a very sensible correspondent of his Lordship's, Mr Garrard, sends him the following piece of news: 'The Dutchess [of Buckingham] hath been to see her daughter at Ramsbury, where she yet is, and would fain have her home to her at Newhall; but the King will not suffer her to be bred a Papist. It is said she will come to my Lady Roxborough, and be bred up with the Princess until his Majesty shall dispose of her in marriage (51).' Accordingly the next year the same correspondent writes as follows: 'Lady Mary Herbert is brought and placed with the Lady Roxborough in the Prince's court. It is said the Duke of Lenox shall marry her (52)' The Dutchess, it seems, upon her marriage with the Marquis of Antrim, had not only changed her religion, but, in the usual forward zeal of a new proselyte, was busy in proselyting others. Among the collection of letters, &c. last quoted, there is one to the Deputy from Lord Conway, wherein, speaking of the Countess of Newburgh's then late conversion to Popery, which had been imputed to Walter Montague, Esq; and Sir Toby Matberus, Knt. his Lordship makes this remark: 'The King did use such words to Wat Montague and Sir Toby Matberus, that the fright made Wat keep his chamber much longer than his sickness would have detained him; and Don Tobias was in such a panick, as shews he would make a very ill martyr. But now the Dog dare again wag his tail.—They were, it seems, unjustly accused in this business, the conversion had been made by the Dutchess of Buckingham and Signor Con the Spanish Ambassador (53).' As Mr Montague made a remarkable figure in his time, and was the subject of much talk in the court of King Charles I, it will not be amiss to take this occasion of giving some account of him, as follows: He was a younger son to Henry Montague, first Earl of Manchester of this name, and was born in London, bred at Sidney college in Cambridge, and afterwards travelled beyond-sea. Thus educated in a proper manner for a Cadet, whose fortune was to be made by the court, he became, like Jaine Hovel, an occasional agent of the ministry, and was sent several times upon public business into France (54). But in 1635, renouncing the Protestant religion in which he had been bred, he turned Papist, quitted the court and his relations in England, and, crossing the sea, went to Paris, and put on the appearance of one of the warmest zealots of the Romish church. Soon after this change he wrote in vindication of it a letter, upon which the aforementioned Mr Garrard makes the following remarks: 'Wat Montague, says he, wrote and sent over to his father a letter (55), where he gave his Lordship the reasons why, at his last being in England, he was reconciled to the church of Rome. He sent another to father Philips, one of the Queen's Priests, to publish, in case his father should have concealed that sent to him. They have passed up and down. There is nothing of value in his reasons. If it had been but a good letter, I would have sent it to your Lordship (56).' Mr Garrard's letter bears date Jan. 8, 1635. He had, on the 7th of December preceding, descanted upon our profelyte's zeal in the following spirit: 'Wat Montague, says he to his noble friend, triumphs in his new religion at Paris, and is such a zealot there, that he wears a chain of beads, with a cross hung to them, about his neck, waits upon that King whenever he goes to mass, writes over to his friends here, that he is not only reconciled to the church of Rome, but is ready to die a martyr for his religion. That King gave him a present of a ring worth 1400l. which he sent over by Sir Henry Hungate to shew the Queen. He is going to Rome, being, they say, the only favourite of Cardinal Barberino the Pope's nephew, whose letter he shewed here to his friends, so full of affection and many expressions of love to him, that he is convinced he shall make himself a better fortune there than he could have done here; which I believe is the true cause why he has changed his religion (57)'. However that be, the Oxford antiquary speaks more favourably of him, and tells us, that his first settlement abroad, upon his change, was in the college of St Omer. And that afterwards he was received with great affection into the favour of the Queen-mother of France, who made him Abbot of Nantueil of the Benedictin order in the diocese of Metz, and thence promoted him, upon the death of John Francis de Gondy (58), to be Abbot of the same order in St Marzyn's abbey near Pentboise, in the diocese of Reau; that he was also one of her Majesty's cabinet council, and was instrumental in bringing into her favour the famous Cardinal Mazarine, who, when fixed, proved ungrateful to Montague and his friends. That the Abbot was also in great favour with the Queen-mother of England, whom he did not long survive (*); but that a little before his death there was a report that he was elected Archbishop of — in Guienne. He was buried in the church of the hospital of Incurables at Paris. That he was of a most generous and noble spirit, and of great piety, spending all he could get in publick and pious uses (59). Before he left the church of England, he wrote the Shepherd's Paradise, printed at London in 1629, 8vo. And after he had left it, Miscellanea Spiritualia; or Devout Essays, in two parts. The first of which was printed in 1648, the other in 1654, both at London in 4to. But the small tract, intitled Miscellanea al mondo; Contemplations on death and immortality, (54) Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 162.

(55) It was dated from Paris, Novemb. 21, 1635, and was presently answered by Lucius Lord Falkland. See his article, Vol. II. remark [O].

(56) Strafford's Letters, &c. Vol. I. p. 505.

(57) Ibid. p. 492.

(58) Uncle to Cardinal de Retz, author of the celebrated Memoirs under his name. Moreri's Dictionary, under the family of Gondy, in Tome IV. Edit. 1740.

(*) She died Aug. 10, 1669. Salmon, under that year.

(59) Fasti Oxon. as before.

(y) Idem, eidem, ibid. p. 427, in a letter, dated
May 19, 1635.

Prince, afterwards King Charles II, and the Lord Chamberlain took home his daughter-in-law (y). The mother crossed the sea into Ireland with her Lord, who, by his conduct in sometimes ascribed to our Abbot, was probably written by his father.

Sir Toby Matthews was a character equally if not of a more abnormous cast than his equally suspected coadjutor. He was the eldest son (60) of Dr Toby Matthews, Archbishop of York, and was born at Salisbury (61) Oct. 3, 1577, was matriculated as a member of Christ-church college in Oxford in the beginning of March, 1589, at eleven years of age, and had a student's place there conferred on him the following year. By the advantage of a good Tutor and pregnant parts he became a noted Orator and Disputant, and taking the degrees in arts, he afterwards travelled into various countries beyond-sea. At his return, being esteemed a good accomplished gentleman, and well versed in the affairs of other nations, he was taken into the acquaintance of that profound scholar Sir Francis Bacon (afterwards Lord Verulam) then of Gray's Inn, who honoured him with a frequent literary correspondence (62). At length, leaving the church of England, by the persuasions of Parsons the Jesuit, to the great grief of his father, he entered himself into the society of Jesus. Afterwards, growing famous for his eminent skill in politicks, he came into England, upon invitation, in January, 1621, it was said, to give his assistance to King James I. in certain matters of state. On the 10th of October, 1623, he received the honour of Knighthood from his Majesty at Roylton, for his great zeal in carrying on the proposed Spanish match with Prince Charles, at which time not only the King, but the chief of the nobility, particularly the Duke of Buckingham (63), and others at court, had a high value for him, and so continued for several years after. Among the rest, the Earl of Strafford had so great an opinion of his abilities, that he was taken by his Lordship into Ireland, as a friend whose advice and counsel might be of use to him. But from the above-cited letter of Lord Conway to the Deputy, his residence in Ireland seems not to have been very long; and his connection with that statesman, and also with Dr Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, unavoidably brought him into the odium of the puritanical party; which was greatly inflamed by the character which one Andrew ab Habernfeld gave of him in a pretended discovery of a treasonable plot against the King, sent in a letter to Sir William Boswell, his Majesty's agent at the Hague, to Dr Laud, in October, 1640, which runs thus: 'Sir Tob. Matthews, a Jesuited Priest (64) of the order of politicians, a most vigilant man of the chief heads, to whom a bed was never so dear, that he would rest his head thereon, refreshing his body with sleep in a chair for an hour or two: neither day nor night spared he his machinations, a man principally noxious, and himself the plague of the King and kingdom of England; a most impudent man, who flies to all banquets and feasts, called or not called, never quiet, always in action and perpetual motion, thrusting himself into all conversations of superiors, he urgeth conferences familiarly, that he may fish out the minds of men. Whatever he observeth thence, which may bring any commodity or discommodity to the part of the conspirators, he communicates to the Pope's Legate, and the more secret things he himself writes to the Pope, or to Cardinal Barberino. In sum, he adjoins himself to any man's company, no word can be spoken that he will not lay hold on, and communicate to his party. In the mean time whatever he hath fished out he reduceth into a catalogue, and every summer carries it to the general consistory of the politician Jesuits, which secretly meet together in Wales, where he is an acceptable guest, &c. (65).' This was published in 1643 by the famous William Prynne (66), who spared not to say that Sir Toby was sent into England by the Pope (Urban VIII. with whom he was in great esteem) to reconcile England to the church of Rome, to which end he received a pension also from Cardinal Barberino, protector of the English nation. Mr Wood however gives little credit to these (which he calls) bare reports, and says, that 'he had all his father's name, and many of his natural parts; was also one of considerable learning, good memory, and sharp wit, mixed with a pleasant affability in behaviour, and a seeming sweetness of mind, though sometimes, according to the company he was in, pragmatical, and a little too forward (67). This character is a remarkable instance of the truth of that observation, that the Antiquary has been favourable in general (68) to the memory 'of the Papists.' The present character is notoriously copied in that disposition from the sketch given of Sir Toby by Dr Fuller (69), That having all his father's name, and many of his natural parts, he had few of his moral virtues, and fewer of his spiritual graces. His father was in reality a Divine of such eminent worth, as ought not to be passed over in silence. He was descended from an ancient family of the Williams, of Flint, in the principality of North Wales, of which family John Williams, Esq; Receiver of Flintshire, 10 Edw. IV. marrying the daughter and heir of Edmund Matthews, Esq; his son, Sir George, assumed the name of Matthews, and had issue Richard Matthews of Flint, the father of John Matthews of Bristol, merchant, where this his son Toby was born in 1546 (70). From the school at Wells he was sent to Oxford at thirteen years of age, and soon after became a Student of Christ-church there. Having taken his degrees in arts, he received holy orders from the famous Dr Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, being then much respected for his great learning, eloquence, sweet conversation, friendly disposition, and sharpness of his wit. In 1569 he was unanimously elected public Orator of the University, which office, though but twenty-three years of age, he executed with great applause to himself and honour to the public (71). At the same time he was a most celebrated preacher, when Oxford seems to have been but indifferently stocked with such. Afterwards preferments came thick upon him. In 1570 he was made Canon of Christ-church and Archdeacon of Bath, in 1572 Prebendary of Sarum and President of St John's college in Oxford, when, being famous for his preaching, he was made Queen's Chaplain, and soon after proceeding in divinity (72), he was made Dean of Christ-church in 1576. In 1579 he bore the office of Vicechancellor of that University, and in 1583 he was made Præcentor of the church of Salisbury in June, but being infatigable Dean of Durham in August following, he resigned the Præcentorship in February the same year; as he also did the Deanery of Christ-church in the beginning of the next year, 1584. It is not certain what was his motive for leaving the University, where he had so many ingenious friends and admirers, quit preferments of more profit than this deanery, and go further from the Court, the fountain of preferment; but there seems to be something in it of the spirit which prevailed at that time and before among many Divines (73), and which was called an apostolical preaching of the gospel, by travelling from town to town about the country for that purpose, in places where instruction was most wanted, as was particularly the case of those northern parts. The Dean's uncommon diligence in that practice strongly favours this opinion, there being scarce any town in the county but had him in their pulpit, and some places very often, while he held the deanery; nor did his assiduity in this course at all remit upon his promotion to the bishoprick of that diocese in 1595, nor even after his advancement to the archiepiscopal see of York (74) in 1606 (75), in which he sat with great honour and reputation to the time of his death, which happened May 29, 1628, at Cawood castle, whence his remains were carried, and interred in our Lady's chapel, at the East end of York Minster (76), where stands a sumptuous monument of black and white marble, adorned with gold, representing his effigies incumbent in full proportion, in his archiepiscopal robes, and an inscription in Latin, celebrating his hospitality, and particularly his powerful preaching (77), a talent which he never suffered to lie idle, but put out to use with indefatigable diligence to the last. Whence that challenge of Alexander Cook, Vicar of Leedes in Yorkshire, against the Papists, 'That Toby Matthews, the most reverend Archbishop of York, though almost eighty years of age, preacheth more sermons in a year, than you can prove has been preached by all your Popes from Gregory the Great his days (78).' Even Edmund Campian, the Jesuit, mentioning his name on another occasion, has these words: 'He that now rules in your pulpits, Qui nunc dominatur in concionibus;' adding, 'whom for his good learning and seeds of virtue we loved, Quem propter bonas artes & virtutis semina dileximus (79).' He preached with

(69) In his Church History, ann. 1628.

(70) Pedigree of the family, an abstract of which is in Duc. Leod. p. 253, 254.

(71) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 730.

(72) He supplicated for the degree of B. D. in 1571, but did not take it till Decemb. 10, 1573, and he proceeded to that of D. D. May 27, 1574. Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 105, 109, 110.

(73) See in Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 428, the article of Edmund Bunny, who was called the Divinity Squirt, by some who did not approve this method.

(74) In his Diary, a transcript of which is in Musæo Thoresb. he accounts for 721 sermons while he was Dean, for 550 while Bishop of Durham, and for 722 in the 16 following years.

(75) For the dates of these promotions, consult Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 730, 731.

(76) Vicaria Leodiensis, p. 169, 170.

(77) In these words: Cum omni politior doctrina Theologiam conjunxerat statim in concionibus dominari cepit. In Aula Academia Urbe Rure juxta celebris. Neque Chrysofomum Græcia, quam Tobiam suum Anglia jactantius olim profitebitur. Neminem illa [Reg. Eliz.] libentius audivit aut prædicantem suum prædicavit — Vix ad extremam senectutem exaruit dives illa concionandi Vena; cum erat Septuagenario major, nemo in concionibus frequentior, nemo felicius, nemo quem in æternum magis audire velis.

(78) Cook's Popish Brags abated.

(79) Campian's Ten Reasons, Rationes Decem, &c. printed first in 1581, and five times in 1583, and translated into English in 1687. In which labouring to prove that the Fathers were all Papists, to give a sanction thereto he says, that Toby Matthews once confessed so much to him; and the same opinion has been lately maintained by Dr Conyers Middleton.

(60) The Archbishop had two sons; John, born in Christ-church, Oxford, 1580; and Samuel, born at Oxford in 1583; besides a daughter, Mary, who died an infant in 1587. Vicaria Leodiens. p. 174, from a MS. of his mother, in an account of the births of all her children.

(61) Mr Wood therefore was mistaken in supposing him born at Oxford. Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 194.

(62) Enough, says Wood, to make a pretty volume. Sir Toby translated Bacon's Essays into Italian, printed at London in 1618, 8vo.

(63) Whom he accompanied into Spain, as will be seen presently.

(64) Mr Wood doubts his ever taking holy orders.

(65) Probably he had several relations there, being of Welch extraction, both by his father, and also by his mother, Frances, daughter of Will. Barlow, some time Bishop of Chichester, descended from the Barlows in Wales. Pedigree in Duc. Leod.

(66) In a piece, intitled Rome's Master-piece, p. 19, 20.

(67) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 194, 195.

(68) See his Vindication, &c. prefixed to the 1st Vol. of Athen. Oxon.

(*) Antrim promised to raise 3000 men at his own expence, to go against the Scots, then in rebellion, and afterwards disappointed the Deputy therein. See his article.

in the year 1639, highly provoked the Lord Deputy Wentworth (2): Whereupon, to avert the danger that was apprehended from his resentment, the Dutchess addressed to him the letter, a copy of which is inserted below [P], where it well deserves a place, both because it the most ardent fervour, and his sermons, especially those on extraordinary occasions, made such impressions upon himself, that he gave thanks for the divine assistance in them. At the same time all his pains in preaching did not make him neglect the proper episcopal duties of visitation, confirmation, ordination, &c. confirming sometimes 500, sometimes 1000, at a time, yea so many, that he has been forced to betake himself to his bed for refreshment (80). He may justly be ranked among the eminent Divines of this nation, considered either in the schools or the episcopal chair. Camden styles him, Theologus præstantissimus, in quo doctrina cum pietate, ars cum natura, certant (81); and his great reading and tenacious memory are taken notice of by the Oxford historian, as follows: Infruitæ propemodum lectionis vir librum penè nullum, quem vel scriptoris fama vel ipsum operis argumentum commendaret, intactum prætermisit, memoriam quoque tam tenacem habuit ut legenti sese paucissima obtulerint, quæ non, si quando usus flagitaret, confestim profert (82). It is a little surprizing, that we find none of the Archbishop's sermons in print except his Concis Apologetica contra Campianum in Deuteron. XXXII. v. 7. first printed in 1581, and again in 1638, at Oxford, in 8vo. After his death a large letter, penned by him in the name of the Convocation about Archbishop Grindal's suspension, was published by Dr Fuller (83). Our Archbishop Matthews had a very great opinion of Grindal, and was a zealous promoter of the exercises, since called lectures, which were countenanced and encouraged by him (84). Another letter of his Grace to Archbishop Usher is exhibited by Dr Parr (85); and a third has been printed by Dr Smith (86). These are all that are genuine (87), save that remarkable letter of his concerning the Hampton-court conference in 1603, published by Mr Strype in Archbishop Whitgift's life (88), from the original in Mus. Tboresbeian. His Grace's manuscript notes upon all the ancient Fathers are mentioned by Dr Favour, who had read them, and says they are very judicious (89). These are probably lodged in the archives of York minster, to which church his whole library was bequeathed by his relict, a lady of distinguished beauty, and of exemplary wisdom, gravity, piety, and indeed all other virtues, not only above her sex, but the times. One thing is very singular in her story, that, as she was daughter of Bishop Barlow, so, her first husband was Matthew Parker, son to Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury. She had four sisters, married to four Bishops, one to William Wickham, Bishop of Winchester; another to Overton, Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield; a third to Westphaling, Bishop of Hereford; and a fourth to Day, that succeeded Wickham in Winchester (90): so that a Bishop was her father, an Archbishop her father-in-law; she had four Bishops her brethren, and an Archbishop her husband. She died at the age of seventy-eight, on the 10th of May, 1629, and was interred near her last husband, under a monument, with an inscription to her memory. By her last will she gave to Peter-house in Cambridge, where her beloved son Samuel was a scholar and died, 200l. for two scholarships; and to her son, Sir Toby Matthews, a gold ring, set with eleven diamonds, which King Charles I. gave her: the Archbishop had bequeathed him a piece of plate, with a note that he had in his life-time given him above 14000l. Sir Toby, after acting a most heteroclitic part upon the stage of life, was taken off it Oct. 13, 1655, in the house of the third probation of the English college of Jesuits at Gaunt in Flanders, and was buried in a vault under the church belonging to them, without any kind of funeral pomp or splendor, according to his will. So much fluency of wit as his genius was impregnated with, could not be restrained from shewing some specimens in print. Besides some translations, we have several original pieces of his writing: Among which are, 1st, A rich cabinet of precious jewels, printed about 1623, 2d, A Collection of Letters, with his picture prefixed; to which is added, Letters to several persons, and the character of the most excellent Lady Lucy, Countess of Carlisle. She was the Goddess of his heart, and he expressed his adorations to her in such peculiar strains (*), as procured him a place in Sir John Suckling's Session of Poets: Thus:

Toby Matthews (poë on him (||) ' what made him there) (||) This was a common by-word with him.
Was whispering nothings in somebody's ear,
When he had the honour to be named in court,
But Sir you may thank my Lady Carlisle for't.

This Lady was daughter of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland; she died without issue in November, 1660, and was buried by her ancestors in the church at Petworth in Suffex. 3d, Some letters printed in the Cabala, or mysteries of state, in 1654, and in the Cabala, or Scrinia Sacra, printed at London in 1663, both which are perhaps inserted in the last mentioned collection of letters. 4th, Sir Toby also wrote a book to show the benefit that proceeds from washing the head every morning in cold water; and he had likewise made a large progress in the history of the late times, but, being left imperfect, it never saw the light. As to his translations, besides that of Bacon's Essays already mentioned, Sir Toby published an English version of St Austin's confessions (91), printed in 1624, 8vo; as also the List of St Teresa, printed about 1623, 8vo; and The Penitent Bandito; or The history of the conversion and death of the most illustrious Lord Signor Troilo Savelli, a Baron of Rome, printed about the same time; and a second edition came out in 1663, 8vo.—To conclude, Mr Walpole, who having well observed that Sir Toby had some wit, and pretended to be a politician, has given him a place among the English painters, as being intitled thereto upon the authority of Mr Vertue the engraver, who says Sir Toby had some skill in limning; and that he sometimes diverted himself in handling the pencil, appears from a letter of the Dutchess of Buckingham to the Duke in Spain, wherein she tells him, that she had not yet seen the picture of the Infanta drawn by Toby Matthews (92). [P] A letter, which is inserted below. The letter runs thus:

' My Lord,
 ' I was in hope, till very lately, that all your displeasure taken against my Lord had been past; but, in letters sent me out of England, I was assuredly informed your Lordship was much disgusted still with him; which news hath very much troubled me. I cannot be satisfied without sending these expressly to you: And I beseech you that, whatever you do conceive, you will deal clearly with me, and let me know it, and withal direct me how I may remove it. I must necessarily be included in your Lordship's anger to him, for any misfortune to my Lord must be mine, and it will prove a great misfortune to me to live under your frowns. Out of your goodness you will not, I hope, make me a sufferer, who have never deserved from you but as

' Your Lordship's
 ' Most faithful Servant,

Dunlure,
 this 2d of Sept. ' KATHARINE BUCKINGHAM (93).' 1639.

The noble spirit which prompted and dictated this address shews, that her Grace knew exactly how to hit that nice and delicate point of condescending with a dignity suitable to her birth and quality: And the Lord Deputy's answer is animated with a no less nobly spirited politeness, in these terms:

' Madam,
 ' What relations your Ladyship hath had forth of England concerning me, I know not; but if I understood the parties that writ them, I should be better able to judge of them: For a sort of persons there are in that kingdom, who as they are of all others least privy with my inclinations, so are they most apt to form and publish every untruth that may be fashioned or enforced to my prejudice.
 ' Your Ladyship desires me to deal clearly with you, and otherwise I never practised with any. And as for my Lord of Antrim, your Ladyship might do well to advise him to the like manner of proceeding: For I must needs confess myself not satisfied, finding, in the (80) Vicaria Leod. p. 165, and 167.

(81) Britannia in Brigant.

(82) Wood's Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. as amended by Bp Fell.

(83) In his Church Hist. anno 1580.

(84) Vicaria Leod. p. 161.

(85) Letters annexed to Usher's life, Number XXXVI.

(86) Camden. & illustr. viror. epist. p. 53.

(87) That in the Cabala, ascribed to him by Mr Wood, is of Abbot, Abp Cant. Ruthworth's Hist. Collect. Vol. 1. p. 85.

(88) Viz. in p. 236, 237, 238. Dr Matthews, then Bp of Durham, assisted at this conference, and at the end of it preached before the King at Hampton-court, by his Majesty's special appointment. Vic. Leod. p. 160. from his Diary.

(89) Favour's Anuq. Triumph. over Novelty, in the Epist. Dedic.

(90) Pedigree of the Barlows of Barlow, in Duc. Leod. p. 253, and 627.

(*) Mr Walpole has given us some pleasant strictures upon this character in his Anecdotes of painting, Vol. II. under Sir Toby's article.

(91) This sold for 16s. a copy. See a catalogue of Popish books, subjoined to a piece, called The foot cut out of the snare, by John Gee, who says Sir Toby's translation might have been afforded for half a crown.

(92) Walpole's Anecdotes of painting, 23 before.

(93) Strafford's letters, &c. Vol. II. p. 386.

it is the chief production we have of her Grace's pen [2], and (which is directly to the purpose of these memoirs) it opens a view into a very engaging part of her character, by exhibiting a specimen of her admirable talent in that most useful species of writing.

' late proceedings here with this state, his Lordship returned me artificial for my simple and ingenuous dealing; and that himself and his man Stewart endeavoured to turn the improbability, indeed impossibility, of that design upon me as a fault whereon to excuse himself, which methought was not so fair, to make me accountable for that in the conclusion, wherein I had no hand or privity at all originally.

' But let these things be as they may, your Ladyship, I know, is so just as to allow me to preserve myself, which I shall do without hurt, I trust, to any other: and then I shall be very ready, without reflecting upon any matter which concerns myself, as formerly, to do your Ladyship's person and affairs all the service I shall be able, and persuade myself you will not find any, which may succeed me in this place, more careful and glad to express himself

' Your Ladyship's

Dublin,
this 9th of Sept.
1639.

' Most humble Servant,

' WENTWORTH (94).'

(94) Idem,
p. 387, 388.

[2] The chief production of her Grace's pen. There are some other letters of hers, written to the Duke, preserved among the Harleian manuscripts, one of which has been already mentioned. In another, written also to her Lord while he was in Spain, she desires him to get his picture drawn. I pray you, says she, if you have any idle time, sit to Gerbier for your picture, that I may have it well done in little. This painter, who became afterwards Sir Balthazar Gerbier d'Orville, was born at Antwerp in 1592 (95), but came young into England, and was in the Duke's retinue so early as the year 1613. He was in high favour with his Grace, and, attending him into Spain, was employed in the treaty of the Prince's [Charles] marriage, though ostensibly acting only in the character of a painter (96). Bishop Tanner has a manuscript catalogue of the Duke's collection of pictures, statues, &c. drawn up by Gerbier, who was employed by his Grace in several of his purchases, by whose interest he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him in 1628, at Hampton-court, by the King [Charles I.] (97) who, it is said, employed him, upon his Grace's recommendation, as a man of a good understanding in the character of his agent at Brussels, where he resided several years (98). These anecdotes are furnished by Mr Walpole, who has given another, which confirms and elucidates a characteristic mark of the Duke's temper and singular turn of mind before noted. It is taken from a manuscript of the late Mr Vertue, which though a little imperfect, and thereby somewhat obscure, is yet sufficiently clear for our purpose, as follows: ' King James I. ill and dying, the Duke of Buckingham was desired to apply a plaister to his stomach, which he did with proper advice of Doctors, Physicians to the King: but the King dying, the Duke was blamed. One Eglebam printed a scurrilous libel, and flew away into Flanders. I was told by Gerbier, (though his testimony be odious to any man) that Eglebam dealt with him in Flanders for a peece of money (not more than 400 guilders to defray the charges) to print his recantation. Of which the Duke bid Gerbier join knavery together, and spit their venom till they split, and he would pay for printing that also (99).'

(95) De Pile's Art of Painting, &c. p. 277. English Edition the Third.

(96) He drew the Infant's there, which was sent over to King James.

(97) In a letter, dated 1628, it is said the King and Queen were treated by him at supper, which could not cost him less than 1000 l.

(98) De Pile, as before.

(99) Walpole, ubi supra, under Gerbier's article.

VILLIERS [GEORGE], eldest surviving son of the preceding, was born Jan. 30, 1627, at Wallingford-house, in the parish of St Martin in the fields, within the liberty of Westminster (a). His father's cruel fate leaving him an infant-orphan, the King [Charles I.] in his first visit after it to the Dutchess his mother, promised to be a husband to her, and a father to her children, and he performed his promise. The Dutchess was then great with child, and the King said he would be Godfather, in which relation he stood, together with Francis Earl of Rutland, the child's grandfather. After some compliments who should give the name, the King named him Francis, and the grandfather gave him his benediction, 7000 l. a year (b). The Duke and his brother were bred up by the King with his own children, under the same Tutors and Governors: Both the brothers were sent young to Trinity-college in Cambridge, and their names entered in the College book the same year with Prince Charles (c). Here the Duke became acquainted with the celebrated Mr Abraham Cowley and Mr Martin Clifford, whom he loved ever after, and they as faithfully and effectually served him. From the University both the brothers went to travel abroad, under the care of William Aylesbury, Esq; son of Sir William Aylesbury, Bart. appointed to that office by the King (d). They continued abroad till after the breaking out of the civil wars, and upon their return were conducted by their Governor to his Majesty, then at Oxford (e), where they laid their lives and fortunes at the King's feet, as a testimony of their loyalty and gratitude, worthy to be imprinted in the memory of the royal family. Young as they were, they immediately engaged in that cause, and chusing Prince Rupert and the Lord Gerard for Tutors to enter them in the war, they went with those noblemen into very sharp service, viz. the storming of the close at Litchfield (f) in Staffordshire [A]. For this the parliament seized on their estates; but, by a rare example of their compassion, restored them again in consideration of their nonage. However, these loyal youths kept those no longer than till they came of age to forfeit them again. It was about this time that their mother married the Marquis of Antrim, and thereby ruining herself and offending the King, they were now committed to the care of the Earl of Northumberland, and sent to travel in France and Italy, where they lived in as great state [B] as some of those sovereign Princes. Their return to England was in so critical a time, as if, it should seem, they had

(a) He was baptized there the 14th of February following by Dr [afterwards Abp] Laud; then Bp of Bath and Wells. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 803.

(b) Idem, ibid. See also Hill's life of Dr Barrow, who was recommended to the mastership of that college by his Grace.

(c) See his article in Vol. I. of this work.

(d) Mr Wood says they were entered of Christchurch, and that Mr Geo. Eglington by was their Tutor, the Duke being then 15 years of age. Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.

(b) Memoirs of the life of G. Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, by Mr Brian Fairfax, printed from a MS. in the possession of the late Bp Atterbury, with a piece, entitled, A catalogue of the curious collection of pictures of G. Villiers, D. of B., &c. 1758, 4to, p. 24, 25.

(f) Lord Clarendon, who gives a particular account of this action, observes, that it was one of the sharpest engagements that happened during the civil wars.

(1) Fairfax's Memoirs, as above, p. 25, 26.

[A] Storming the close at Litchfield. At their return to Oxford, the Dutchess their mother was very angry with Lord Gerard for tempting her sons into such danger; but he told her it was their own inclination, and the more danger the more honour (1).

[B] They lived in great state. Florence and Rome were the places of their residence, and they brought, says my Author, their religion home again. The Duke did not as his predecessor in the title of Lord Rofs had done before him, who changed his religion at Rome, and left his Tutor Mr Mole in the Inquisition, for having translated King James's book, entitled, An Admonition to Princes, into Latin; and Du Plessis Mornay's book of the Mass into English (2). The Duke was instructed in mathematics at Rome by Mr Abraham Woodbead, who was there at this time on his travels as Tutor to some young gentlemen of University-college in Oxford, of which he was then a fellow; and upon his return, being deprived of his fellowship by the parliament visitors in 1641, he was entertained at York house by his Grace's appointment (3).

(2) Ibid. p. 26. See some account of Mr Mole's case under Henry [Vere] the 18th Earl of Oxford.

(3) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 613.

now chosen the last opportunity, as they had done the first, of venturing all in the King's service. It was in the year 1648, when the King was a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, and his friends in several parts of England designing to renew the war: Duke Hamilton in Scotland, the Earl of Holland and others in Surrey, Goring in Kent, and many in London and Essex, appeared in arms. These were the last efforts of the dying cause, and the Duke and his brother, in the heat of their courage, engaged with the Earl of Holland, and were the first that took the field about Ryegate in Surrey. The parliament, with their old army, knew all these designs, and despised them, till they grew so numerous in Kent, that the General [Fairfax] himself was sent to suppress them, who found sharp service in storming of Maidstone and taking of Colchester (g). Some troops of horse were sent, under the command of Colonel Gibbons, to suppress them in Surrey, and they drove my Lord of Holland before them to Kingston, but engaged his party before he got thither near Nonfuch, and defeated them. My Lord Francis at the head of his troop, having his horse slain under him, got to an oak-tree in the high-way, about two miles from Kingston, where he stood with his back against it, defending himself, scorning to ask quarter, and they barbarously refusing to give it, till with nine wounds in his face and body he was slain [C]. The Duke, after the loss of his brother, hardly escaped with his life to St Neots in Huntingdonshire, whither also came the Earl of Holland, who was there taken, and soon after beheaded. The Duke next morning finding the house where he lay surrounded, and a troop of horse drawn up before the gate, had time with his servants to get to horse, and then, causing the gate to be opened, he charged the enemy, and killed the officer at the head of them, and made his escape to the sea-side, and thence to Prince Charles, who was in the Downs with those ships that had deserted the Earl of Warwick. And now again the parliament gave him forty days to return to England; but he refused, and chose rather to stay with the Prince: So, at the expiration of the time, his estate was seized, being then the greatest of any subject in England, having now his brother's estate fallen to him (b). All that he had to support him beyond-sea was the money he got at Antwerp for his pictures, which were part of that costly and curious collection of his father, procured from Italy by the help of Sir Henry Wotton (i) and others, which adorned York house to the admiration of all men of judgment in pictures [D]. These were secured, and sent to him by his old trusty servant

(g) See Fairfax's article.

(b) The yearly value was above 20000l. Memoirs, &c. by Mr Fairfax, p. 28. It was assigned for the payment of the forces under General Lambert.

(i) See Reliquiæ Wottonianæ passim.

Mr

[C] Lord Francis was slain. The oak-tree is his monument, and had the two first letters of his name, F. V. cut in it, which remain to this day, says Mr Fairfax (4), who proceeds with his Lordship's elogium in these terms: 'Thus died this noble, valiant, and beautiful youth, in the twentieth year of his age. A few days before his death, when he left London, he ordered his Steward Mr John May to bring him in a list of his debts, and he so charged his estate with them, that the parliament, who seized on his estate, paid them. His body was brought from Kingston by water to York-house in the Strand, and, being there embalmed, was afterwards deposited in his father's vault in Henry VIIIth's chapel, Westminster-abbey, with this inscription, which it is pity should be buried with him:

Depositu[m] Illu[st]rissimi Domini Francisci Villiers,
Ingentis speciei Juvenis,
Filii posthumi Georgii ducis Buckinghamii.
Qui vicefimo ætatis anno pro Rege Carolo
Et patria
fortiter pugnando,
Novem honestis vulneribus acceptis,
Obiit vii^o die Julii
Anno Domini 1648.

The body of the Lord Francis Villiers, a most beautiful youth, the posthumous son of George Duke of Buckingham, who in the twentieth year of his age, fighting valiantly for King Charles and his country, having received nine honourable wounds, died July 7, 1648.

[D] Part of his father's collection of pictures. This collection had been purchased at great prices by his father. He gave 10000l. for what had been collected by Sir Peter Paul Rubens; and Sir Henry Wotton, when Ambassador at Venice, purchased many other capital pieces for his Grace. After his assassination some had been purchased by the King, the Earl of Northumberland, and Abbot Montague. One may however form a judgment in some measure how valuable the intire collection must have been, by the list of what remained; where we find no less than nineteen by Titian, seventeen by Tintoret, twenty-one by Bassan, two by Julio Romano, two by Georgioni, thirteen by Paul Veronese, eight by Palma, three by Guido, thirteen by Rubens, three by Leonardo da Vinci, two by Correggio, and three by Raphael d'Urbino, besides several by other esteemed masters, whose pieces are scarce (5). Mr Duart of Antwerp bought some of them; but the greatest part were purchased by the Archduke Leopold, and added to his noble collection in the castle of Prague. He bought the chief picture, the Ecce homo by Titian, in which are introduced the portraits of the Pope, the Emperor Charles V. and Solyman the magnificent: It is eight feet in length, and twelve feet in breadth. Mr Fairfax says it was valued at 5000l. but from a note of the late Mr George Vertue, the Engraver, on that place in the manuscript, it appears, that Thomas Earl of Arundel offered the Duke's father the value of 7000l. in land or money, for this single piece (*).

The Duke was also possessed of another great curiosity in painting, which, being likewise sold by his son, has lately been the subject of much discourse, and not only given birth to various pamphlets, &c. but has likewise by the use that has been made of it, occasioned a contest at law. The Reader is doubtless beforehand with me in pointing out the stained window now standing at the East end of St Margaret's church, Westminster, of which is given the following account: The magistrates of Dort in Holland, being desirous of presenting Henry VII. with something worthy to adorn his magnificent chapel, then building at Westminster, directed this window to be made, which was five years in finishing; King Henry and his Queen sending their pictures to Dort, from whence their portraits in the window are delineated.

King Henry dying before the window was compleated, it fell into the hands of an Abbot of Waltham, who placed it in his abbey church, where it remained till the dissolution of that abbey by Henry VIII, A. D. 1540. To preserve it from being destroyed, it was removed by Robert Fuller, the last abbot of Waltham, to a private chapel at New-hall, an ancient seat belonging to the Butlers Earls of Ormond in Wiltshire; which afterwards came into the hands of Thomas Bollein, father of Ann Bollein, Henry VIIIth's Queen.

In Queen Elizabeth's reign New-hall is found to have been the seat of Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Suffex; from his family George Villiers Duke of Buckingham bought it; his son sold it to General Monk, who to preserve it, or to guard it against imputations from his party, caused it to be buried under ground during the civil wars and usurpations; in which times many beautiful glass windows, to the amount of above 800, were destroyed by the rage of puritanical zealots. After the Restoration, General Monk caused this window to be replaced in his chapel of New-hall. In 1688 died his son and heir

(5) This was printed in the catalogue of the curious collection, &c. ubi supra, from p. 1 to p. 22; containing 230 pictures, besides 24 models in metal, marble, joory, or alabaster. After which are mentioned 12 boxes of agates, and other precious stones, chased in gold, and all antiques, as expressed in the English inventory of the Duke of Buckingham's collection in 1635.

(*) There is a curious copy of it in Northumberland house.

Christopher

Mr John Trayman, who lived in York house. The King resolving to go into Scotland,

(6) An account of this painter may be seen in Anecdotes of painting in England, &c. in 2 Vols 4to, Vol II. 1762, by Mr Horace Walpole, who has also shewn, by an uninterrupted series of masters in this kind of painting, that it was never lost, as has been commonly supposed.

(7) This church being used by the House of Commons to assemble in, they seem to have taken upon themselves to repair and beautify it. In 1735 the tower was rebuilt, and the church finely cycled, by the sum of 5500l. granted by parliament in the 8th and 12th years of Geo. II. And by a grant of 4000l. in 1757, the church had a thorough repair, the whole pavement was taken up, and new vaulted, the East end rebuilt, and the pews all made new: All being finished before the end of the year 1758.

(8) Viz. the Dean of Westminster-abbey.

(9) Near the place where it stood in Palestine a chapel was erected afterwards by way of memorial of it. Sandy's travels.

(10) This representation of him is not unlike that by Eusebius in his life of Constantine the Great, which Emperor erected his statue, and over his head was displayed a banner with the cross, and underneath his feet a dragon.

Christopher Duke of Albemarle, by whose death this noble seat devolved to his Dutchess; but she not residing there, it became ruinous and decayed. The present possessor of New-hall is John Olmius, Esq; who it is presumed purchased it of the heirs of the Monk's family. Within these few years he hath demolished great part of the ancient structure, and the fine chapel; but the window he preserved, hoping that it might at length be purchased for some church. It lay some time cased up in boxes, till Mr Conyers, coming to the knowledge of it, purchased it for his chapel at Coptball near Epping, and paid Mr Price, a great artist in that way (6), a large sum of money for repairing it. There it remained till his son John, building a new house at some distance from the old seat, had no further use for the window, and sold it to the Committee appointed for the repairing and beautifying St Margaret's, A. D. 1758, for the sum of 400 guineas; part of the 4000l. granted by Parliament for repairing and beautifying that church (7).

The progressive changes this window hath undergone are somewhat remarkable, and particularly in its being now fixed near the abbey-church of Westminster, in the chapel belonging to which it was originally designed to be placed.

The antiquity of it, by the foregoing account, I presume cannot be less than 250 years, being probably begun soon after the founding of Henry VIII's chapel, and before the death of that King, which is evident by several figures introduced into it.

However, soon after it was set up in St Margaret's church, several articles were exhibited in the Commissary's court against the Churchwardens, William Ruffed and Samuel Pierston, for setting up a piece of painting there, wherein was delineated several superstitious pictures or images, and that without a licence or faculty from the Ordinary of the place (8). Hereupon there came out, in vindication of the Churchwardens, in 1761, a piece in 4to, entitled, Ornaments of Churches considered, &c. to which is added in the appendix, a description of the window, as follows:

' This Eastern window, says the anonymous writer of the defence, consists of one entire history of the crucifixion of our blessed Saviour between two thieves, the portraiture of whose persons is so extremely well done, that there may be seen the muscles of each limb, occasioned by the different ways they are expanded on the crosses. Round the cross where our Saviour is crucified are the Roman officers and soldiers attending the execution, with some of the chief rulers of the Jews. At the foot of the cross are Mary Magdalen, and Mary the wife of Cleophas, and sister to the blessed Virgin Mary, who stands in the front (9), representing as fainting away, so drawn in most pictures. On the right hand of the cross is the Roman Centurion on horseback, who with a lance pierces our Saviour's side, from which are represented issuing blood and water. The horse whereon the Centurion sits is finely executed, with full spirit and vigour. Behind the cross, a little to the left, is a small perspective view of the city of Jerusalem. On the right is the Penitent, and on the left the Thief which reviled our Saviour.

' The first capital figure on the right hand, standing in a niche, curiously delineated, is that of St George of Cappadocia, the reputed Patriot Saint of England, standing completely armed at all points, holding in his hand a banner partly unfurled, charged with a red cross, and behind him lies at his feet a red dragon (10). He was a Tribune under the Emperor Dioclesian, and beheaded by him for embracing the Christian religion A. D. 290. The banner he holds is a symbol of his dying in defence of the cross, and the red dragon under his feet alludes to his conquest over that red dragon the Devil, who burneth with fury, and is red with the blood of the faithful. Rev. ch. xii. v. 3.

' Opposite to St George, on the left hand, standing also in a niche, is the figure of St Catharine, the virgin and martyr of Alexandria, holding in her right hand a book, and resting her left on a sword, her head encircled with a crown of glory. At the bottom, towards the right, is a Hermit, drawn about breast-high, holding something that resembles a root, and looking up towards her; towards the bottom, on the left hand, is part of a wheel, the emblematical device of the manner of her martyrdom. She was beheaded under Maximus I. Emperor of the Western monarchy, A. D. 455.

' The third figure on the right hand, under St George, is Henry VII. at his devotion in his royal robes, crowned with a diadem, and kneeling under a canopy of state in a small oratory, with a book before him.

' Opposite to the King, on the left hand, under St Catharine, is the fourth figure, representing Elizabeth his royal consort at her devotions, and kneeling also under a canopy of state, with a book before her, and in her countenance is lively expressed the devotion of her heart.

' Above all is a row of six small panes, in which are the representations of angels attendant on the crucifixion. On the left hand, in a small pane, is the moon, and on the opposite side the sun, alluding to the preternatural manner of the darkness (the sun not being eclipsed, as the moon was at full) at our Saviour's crucifixion.

' On the left of these figures, and over the moon, is placed a white rose within a red one, to signify the uniting of the houses of York and Lancaster in the persons of Henry and Elizabeth. On the opposite side, and over the sun, is placed a Pomegranate, to signify the descent of the two mentioned houses from the royal house of Spain, as John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, married Constance, the eldest daughter and coheir of Peter King of Castile and Leon; and his brother Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, (great great grandfather of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.) married Isabel, the youngest daughter of the aforesaid King. The pomegranate Vert in a field Or are the arms of the kingdom of Granada in Spain, which kingdom was added to that of Castile by Ferdinand V. A. D. 1478, who united Spain into one monarchy, having married Isabel, Queen of Castile and Leon.

' On each side of the altar-piece, within stocco panes, are copper-plates, finely enamelled with the texts of Scripture explaining the crucifixion as painted in the glass, and the supper at Emaus in bas relief, carved by Alkin of St Anne's, Westminster, from a painting of Titian.

Upon the whole it is observable, that this writer has passed over in silence the figures of four angels, each with a cup or chalice in his hands, catching the blood which issues in unbroken streams from our Saviour's side and the wounds in his hands and feet (*). As also the figures of other angels conducting the soul of the penitent thief on one side to heaven; and the Devil on the other side transporting that of the reviling thief to hell; the souls of each thief being represented in a small bodily shape, fixed to suitable crosses.

The prosecution against the Churchwardens was begun in the Commissary's court, from whence an appeal being made to the court of Delegates, the cause is still depending there.

This cause naturally brings to mind another, as being an exact contrast to it, I mean the case of Mr Sherfield, Recorder of Salisbury, who was prosecuted in the Star-chamber, and fined 500l. for contemptuously breaking some panes of painted glass, representing the creation of the world by God the Father, in a window of St Edmond's church in that city (†). The fine it is allowed was very severe, according to the temper of that too arbitrary court (‡); but it may perhaps be esteemed an instance of the Divine Nemesis upon the man; of whom we have the following account, in a letter from Mr Garrard to the Lord Wentworth, Lord Deputy of Ireland. ' About this time [viz. in March, 1633 (§)] died Sherfield the glass-window breaker, some thousands in debt, and most wickedly cheated those that dealt with him for that little land he had in a manor near Marlborough. When, as your Lordship knows, he was fined 500l. in the Star-chamber, he then mortgaged his manor to one Ayres, a Bencher in Lincoln's Inn (||), who lent him upon it 2500l. Upon his death, Ayres challenging it, Audley, of the court of Wards, shews a former mortgage to him; Sir Thomas Jarvis one more ancient than that; his wife, before him, challengeth it as her jointure: His eldest brother shews a conveyance before all these. In conclusion, on his death-bed he commands a servant of his to carry a letter, with a key sealed up in it, to Mr Noy [the famous Attorney-general] where was assigned in what box in his study at Lincoln's Inn lay the conveyance of his estate; there it was found, and by a deed, bearing date before all these formerly mentioned, he had given all his estate to pious uses. Sic finita est fabula of Mr Sherfield (11).'

(*) The author of this piece assures me, that this part of the picture was omitted, as not being relative to the law-suit between the Ordinary and Churchwardens.

(†) Rushworth, Vol. I. second part, p. 152 to 156 inclusive, Edit. 1680, Fol.

(‡) He was also removed from the Recorder's place, and sentenced to make an acknowledgment of his fault before such persons as should be appointed by his Diocesan; notwithstanding his plea, that the church was an exempt jurisdiction, and what he had done was in pursuance of an act of vestry. He also pleaded the acts of Elizabeth, and her royal injunctions, as well as the book of Homilies. All which have been since considered by the Author of The ornaments of churches, &c. Sect. VI.

(§) The prosecution was in February the preceding year, but the fact was committed in 1629.

(||) He was a Bencher of that Inn.

(11) Strafford's letters, &c. Vol. I. p. 206.

the Duke attended him (k); and now again the parliament offered to compound for his estate at 20000l. which was less than a year's value; but he chusing to run the King's fortune in Scotland, worse than exile, came with him out of Scotland into England, and at Worcester his escape was almost as miraculous as the King's in the royal oak [L]. He escaped again into France, and went a volunteer into the French army, where he was much regarded by all the French officers, signalizing his courage at the siege of Arras and Valenciennes (l). When he came to the English court, which was but seldom, the King was always glad to see him: He loved his person and his company; though his court was not well disposed to him (m). There now happened a great turn in the course of his life. My Lord Fairfax, not approving the war with Scotland, had laid down his commission of General of the parliament's forces in 1650, but had part of the Duke's estate, about 5000l. a year, allotted him by the parliament toward the payment of his arrears, and he remitted more than would have purchased a greater estate. They gave him the manor of Helmesley, the seat of the Rutland family in Yorkshire, as a salve for the wound he received there, being shot through the body. They gave him also York house in London. The Duke heard how kind and generous Lord Fairfax was to the Countess of Derby, in paying all the rents of the Isle of Man, which the parliament had also assigned to him for his arrears, into her own hands, and which she confessed was more than all her servants before had done. The Duke had reason to hope my Lord had the same inclinations as to this estate of his, which his Lordship never accounted his own, and the Duke wanted it as much as the Countess. He was not deceived in his hopes; for my Lord Fairfax wished only for an opportunity of doing it. He lived in York house, where every chamber was adorned with the arms of Villiers and Mauvros, Lions and Peacocks. He was descended from the same ancestors, Earls of Rutland [F], Sir Guy Fairfax's two sons having married two of the daughters of the Earl of Rutland, which he took frequent occasion to remember. The Duke resolved to try his fortune, which had hitherto been adverse enough (n). Over he came into England, to make love to my Lord's only daughter, a most virtuous and amiable Lady. He found a friend to propose the match (o); the parents consented, and the young Lady could not resist his charms, being the most graceful and beautiful person that any court in Europe ever saw. All his trouble in wooing was, He came, saw, and conquered. When he came into England he was not sure either of life or liberty. He was an outlaw, and had

[E] His escape after the battle of Worcester.] When the King was preparing to march into England, he granted a commission to the Duke to raise a regiment of horse, and one of foot, out of the English that should repair to him. And after their march to Worcester, perceiving that very few of quality or distinction repaired to his Majesty, he remonstrated to the King, that it would be more for his interest to remove the Scottish General; alledging it would not consist with the honour of any peer of England to receive his orders; and thereupon asked his Majesty to confer that honour on himself; which the King refusing, the Duke was so discontented, that he came no more to the Council, scarce spoke to the King, neglected every body else, and himself, in so much as for many days he scarce put on clean linnen, nor conversed with any body, nor did he recover this ill humour while the army staid at Worcester. Nevertheless, in the engagement there, he was at the King's right hand, and behaved with exemplary valour. On the loss of the day he retired northward with his Majesty, who had then an intent of going into Scotland; but, on consultation with the Duke, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Wilmot, &c. it was thought more convenient to conceal himself in Boscobel-house. Whereupon the Duke, the Earl of Derby, and others, in all about sixty horse, marched thither with the King, and having left his Majesty there, as they hoped, in security, the Duke, with the Earl of Derby, &c. went northward, to overtake General Lesly with the main body of Scotch horse. But being met by the rebels, the Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Lauderdale, with most of them, were taken prisoners. While the rebels were plundering those noble persons, the Duke, with the Lord Leviston, Colonel Blague, Mr Marmaduke Darcy, and Mr Hugh May, forsook the road first, and soon after their horses, and betook themselves to a by-way, and got into Blowre-Parke, near Cheswardine, about five miles from Newport, where they received some refreshment at a little obscure house of Mr George Barlow: and afterwards met with two honest labourers in an adjoining wood, to whom they communicated the distress to which the fortune of war had reduced them; and finding them like to prove faithful, the Duke thought fit to imitate his royal master, delivered his George, which was given him by the Queen of England, to Mr May (12), (who preserved it through all difficulties, and after restored it to his Grace in Holland) and changed habit with one of the workmen. In this disguise, by the assistance of Mr Barlow and his wife, he was after some days conveyed by one Nicholas Mattherus, a carpenter, to the house of Mr Hawley, a hearty cavalier at Billstrop in Nottinghamshire, from thence to the Lady Villiers's house at Brookesby in Leicestershire, and, after many hardships and encounters, his Grace got secure to London, and thence had the good fortune to escape a second time into Holland; where, on his arrival, he was taken for the King; and it was thought good policy to publish that his Majesty was arrived. However, the King soon after escaping into France, the Duke went to him there (13).

[F] He was descended from the house of Rutland.] This appears from a pedigree of this ancient family, curiously drawn by Mr R. Thoresby, the famous Antiquary of Leeds in Yorkshire (14), who having observed that the name Fairfax is Saxon, and presumed to be in England about the time that they expelled the Romans, and confined the Britons before the coming of the Danes, and so, long before the Norman conquest, proceeds to inform us, that the records of this family before King John's time are not so well preserved: but since that there are very good evidences in the hands of the then Lord Viscount Fairfax, that they have succeeded lineally Lords of the manor of Walton for nineteen or twenty generations, near five hundred years, anno 1660. Accordingly the pedigree begins with Richard Fairfax, from whom descended William Fairfax, who lived in the time of King John and Henry III, whose descendant, after nine generations, was another Richard Fairfax, father to Sir Guy Fairfax, his third son, Knt. Judge of the King's bench, who died anno 1497, leaving a son, William Fairfax, a Judge, who died 6 Henry VIII. having married Elizabeth, sister to the first Earl of Rutland (15). Besides William the eldest, Sir Guy had other sons, viz. Thomas, a Serjeant at Law, as also Guy and Nicholas; but no mention is made of any of their marriages in this pedigree, a defect which must be supplied from Mr Brian Fairfax in the text above. This William's grandson, Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, was father to the Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron, whose son Ferdinand, Lord Fairfax, was father to the General (16), who leaving no male issue, the title came to his paternal uncle Henry, whose grandson Thomas, Lord Fairfax, was living and unmarried in 1712; in which year also was living and unmarried, Brian Fairfax, Esq; son to Brian Fairfax, Esq; the writer of the Memoirs of the Duke of Buckingham, who was second son to the General's paternal uncle Henry, Lord Fairfax. He died in 1711.

(k) On their arrival there, when all the rest of his Majesty's English servants were removed from his person, the Duke only was excepted. Peerage of England, Vol. III. p. 213.
(m) Fairfax, p. 29. Among these courtiers Mr Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon, was the chief. See his article in remark [O]. And the Duke had his full revenge upon him afterwards. Ibid. in remark [P].

(o) Mr Fairfax thought it was Mr Robert Harlow.

(l) He was made Knight of the Garter soon after. Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

(n) Mr Fairfax observes, that he had some revenge upon her by translating into English verse Horace's ode, Fortuna semel laeta negatio &c. it was printed afterwards in his works, Vol. I. Edit. 1715.

(13) Peerage, Vol. III p. 213, 214.

(14) In Doct. Leod. p. 66, 67, 69, 572, 575.

(15) Her mother was Dutches of Exeter, sister to Edward IV.

(16) The General was sprung from a younger branch of his family, the descendant of the elder branch being Thomas Lord Viscount Fairfax of Embsay, whose great grandson dying an infant, the title came to Thomas's second son, and upon his death, without male issue, the title came to the grandson of Thomas's third son, Charles Viscount Fairfax, who died in 1719.

(12) This servant of the Duke had also his share in procuring the disgrace of the Earl of Clarendon. See that Earl's article in remark [P].

not made his peace with Cromwell, who would have forbid the banns if he had known of his coming over. Cromwell had a greater share of his estate (||), had daughters to marry, and would not have liked such a conjunction of Mars and Mercury as was in this alliance. They were married Sept. 7, 1657 (p), at Nun-Appleton, six miles from York, a new and noble house built by Lord Fairfax, and where he kept as noble hospitality (q). When Cromwell heard of it, he rested not till he had him in the Tower, and would have brought him to Tower-hill had he lived a fortnight longer. The Duke had liberty given him to be at York house with his Lady; but going to Cobham to see his sister (r), he was taken and sent to the Tower on the 24th of August, 1658. This so angered Lord Fairfax, that he went to Whitehall to the Protector, and expostulated the case so as it put him into a great passion, turning abruptly from him in the gallery at Whitehall, cocking his hat and throwing his cloak under his arm, as he used to do when he was angry [G]. After the death of Oliver, the Duke had leave to be a prisoner in Windsor-castle, where his friend Mr Abraham Cowley was his constant companion. He continued till the 29th of July, 1659, when Richard Cromwell having abdicated, the Duke's liberty came of course, on his giving security to be faithful to the government. This was the happiest time of all his Grace's life, when he went to his father-in-law's house at Appleton, and there lived orderly and decently with his own wife, where he neither wanted, nor so abounded as to be tempted to any sort of extravagance (s), as he was after, when he came into the possession of his whole estate. Lord Fairfax was much pleased with his company, and especially to see him so conformable to the order and good government of the family. If they had any plots together, they were to the best purposes, the restoration of the royal family [H]. The Duke had given sufficient proofs of his loyalty, and Lord Fairfax of his affection, and desire to see that happy event, and now was the time of compassing it. General Monk in Scotland declared against Lambert, who marched against him with a strong body of horse. Lord Fairfax, and the Duke with him, declared for Monk in Yorkshire; but the Duke was obliged to withdraw, because his presence gave a jealousy of the design to bring in the King (t), which it was too soon yet to avow [I]. His Majesty's restoration restored the Duke to his estate (u), but to such a train of expence with it, as brought him acquainted with bankers and scribes, that infested it with the gangrene of usury, from which it never recovered. At the King's restoration no subject appeared in greater splendor. None kept greater hospitality than he did at Wallingford house [K], especially for the French nobility that came over, that engaged him in play, which had he continued, his estate had not lasted so long as it did; but he resolved to give it over, and kept his resolution ever afterwards. He was moderate in all his expences, his stable, table, laboratory: but all the King's favours to him were occasions of great expence (w). He was made one of the Lords of the Bedchamber, and sworn of the Privy Council presently after the Restoration (x). These were followed

(p) Mr Wood by mistake says November 19. Athen. Oxon. ubi supra, and therein is followed by the General Dictionary.

(s) Not so much as to his after beloved and costly mistress, the philosopher's stone. Idem, p. 32.

(x) During his abode in Holland he had been elected Knight of the Garter, and he was now installed at Windsor, April 15, 1661. Peerage, Vol. III. p. 214.

(17) Memoirs, p. 30.

(18) This was confirmed by the insurrection of Sir George Booth, which Lambert, with a brigade of this old army, did so easily suppress, the success whereof inspired him with the ambition of imitating Cromwell in dissolving the parliament, and making himself Protector. Gen. History of England.

[G] Cromwell was angry. Thus, says this writer (17), I saw him, Lord Fairfax, take his last leave of his old acquaintance Cromwell, whose servants expected he would be sent to bear the Duke company in the Tower. But the Protector was wiser in his passion.

[H] The restoration of the royal family. It was a maxim of my Lord Fairfax in politics, that the old veteran army, which he had commanded, was not to be beaten by any new raised force in England, and that the King's friends shewed more affection than discretion in their plots to restore him, while they were united (18); and that this old army would never be beaten but by itself, as the event shewed, when Lambert and Monk divided them. But the most fatal influence of this opinion in my Lord Fairfax was the night before the 30th of January, when some of his friends proposed to him to attempt the next day to rescue the King, telling him, that twenty thousand men were ready to join him: he said he was ready to venture his own life, but not the lives of others, against the army now united against them.

[I] It was too soon to own the design. The matter was concerted between Fairfax and Monk before the latter marched out of Scotland, whither Dr Brian Fairfax (afterwards Secretary to the Archbishop of Canterbury) was dispatched to him from Lord Fairfax the General, and there concluded that great transaction about the restoration of our liberties, with such privacy, that Mr Fairfax never saw Scotland, though the matter was transacted there. This curious anecdote is preserved in the Diary of Mr Ralph Thoresby, the eminent Antiquary of Leeds, whose father, upon Fairfax's declaration for a free parliament, joined him, among others, with a large body of men at Marston Moor, for which, as he had been in the parliament service under the General before, he was censured by some persons as acting now inconsistently. Whereupon, by way of defence, he made the following Dodecastick:

*If to be modest in all revolutions,
And to refuse to act in our confusions;
If to condole the sad fate of the nation,
And help towards the King's restoration;*

*If swearing the allegiance cheerfully,
And daily appearing for his Majesty;
If wishing all the forces good success
Against all sorts of foes: And to express
Much joy for victory all appointed times:
If these, I say, shall be accounted crimes,
Then let me bear the blame; if otherwise,
Let hanging be the false informer's prize (19).*

— Nec lex est justior ulla
Quam necis artifices arte perire sua.

Upon this appearance of Fairfax at Marston Moor, he was joined by Lambert's forces at Newcastle, who deserted him. Whereupon Fairfax took possession of York, and kept a correspondence with Monk. What was the issue is well known (20), and was remembered by our Duke, who, in an expostulatory letter to King Charles some years after, has these words: 'As to your Majesty's return to England, I may justly pretend to some share, since, without my Lord Fairfax's engaging in Yorkshire, Lambert's army had never quitted him, nor the Duke of Albemarle marched out of Scotland (21).'

[K] He lived at Wallingford house. When he first began to settle his family, he desired his old friends, Cowley and Clifford, to recommend to him a domestic Chaplain. They knew how hard it was to please him; he must be a man of learning, wit, good nature, good manners, a graceful person, and decent behaviour. They found one to their own mind and to his (22), whom he valued as a friend and loved as a companion, who lived to be an ornament to the age among those of the highest order. He brought the Duke acquainted with another excellent person, whose friendship and conversation he much coveted if he could have more of it, who afterwards attained to the highest dignity in the church; and likewise with a Lawyer, as eminent in his profession. So that his father was not more happy in the choice of a few friends, than he was if he had followed their advice. He saw and approved the best; but too often did deteriora sequi, follow the worst (23).

first

(||) He had particularly the estate and house of Newhall in Essex, mentioned in the preceding article.

(q) His friend Mr Cowley made an Epithalamium on the occasion.

(r) Mary. She was Dutches of Richmond and Lenox. Memoirs, p. 24.

(t) On Sir Geo. Booth's rising this year, 1659, the Duke was taken up, and sent to the Tower, August 13, with the Earls of Oxford, De la Ware, and Falkland, who were all, except his Grace, sent to the Tower. Whitlock's memorials, p. 683.

(u) On the 4th of May, 1660, the Commons agreed to an order of the Lords to restore him to his estate; and on the 29th the Duke and Monk rode together bareheaded before his Majesty on his triumphant entry into London.

(w) Fairfax, as before, p. 37.

(19) Diary of Mr R. Thoresby, communicated by his son and heir, the reverend Mr R. Thoresby, Rector of Stoke-Newington in Middlesex.

(20) The General presented a fine horse of his own breeding to the King, on which his Majesty rode at his coronation. He also made some verses upon the occasion, which will be inserted under the additions to his article in the Appendix.

(21) Memoirs of Fairfax, p. 33.

(22) Dr Thomas Sprat. See his article.

(23) Memoirs, p. 34. This well known passage in Ovid is, Video meliora, proboque, deteriora sequor.

first by the Lord-Lieutenancy of Yorkshire, and then by the place of Master of Horse to his Majesty (y); the first of which cost him more than it did all that succeeded him, and the last cost him 20000l. to the Duke of Albemarle (z). This is not mentioned as any excuse for his ingratitude to his Royal Master, which indeed will admit of none. Who would have then thought that his Grace was secretly engaged in rebellious designs against the King [L] so early as the year 1662? Yet it is notorious, that he suffered himself to be led away by the same spirit of faction so far, that in 1666 he found it necessary to abscond, in order to avoid a most just prosecution. He was removed from all his places on the 25th of February that year, and a Serjeant at Arms was sent, by express order from his Majesty, to take him up; but this proving ineffectual (aa), a proclamation was issued out on the 8th of March, requiring his appearance, and surrender of himself by a certain day. In compliance to this proclamation he surrendered himself, made his submission, and, through an almost unparalleled instance of kindness, he was received into favour by the good-natured Charles, who restored him also to his place in the Bed-chamber, and even to his seat at the Council-board, Sept. 23 the following year, 1667; and the same year he found himself sufficiently able to overset and ruin his great rival in the Monarch's affections, the Earl of Clarendon (bb). After this, no wonder that we find him at the head of the Cabinet Council, constituted in 1670, which was generally nicknamed the Cabal (cc), and invested with all the power of a prime minister. In August this year he went Ambassador to France, in order to break the famous triple alliance [M], which had been the boast

(y) Gen. Hist. of England, and Athen Oxon. as before.

(z) Fairfax, p. 33, 34.

(aa) He defended his house for some time by force against the Serj. at Arms, and at last made his escape. Carte's life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. book 6. p. 347.

(cc) From the first letters of their names, viz. Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale, where we see his Grace is the center or key-stone.

(bb) See that Earl's article.

[L] He absconded on account of some seditious practices.] The King's happy restoration may justly be stiled the æra of the Duke's unhappiness, since from that period commenced the ruin both of his fame and fortune. It appears that he had joined with Peter Talbot, Confessor to her Majesty, in inflaming the minds of the Dissenters as early as the year 1662, and had some time before engaged in an acquaintance with one Dr Heydon, a noted impostor, and reputed Conjuror among the people. This man, just before the recess of the parliament in 1665, being taken up for treasonable practices, for sowing sedition in the navy, and engaging persons in a conspiracy to seize the Tower, an information was made against the Duke by some persons to whom the conjurer unboasted himself, and who had been employed by him to carry letters to the Duke. Heydon pretended to have been in all the Duke's secrets for near four years past, and said that he had been all that time designing against the King and his government. That his Grace thought the present season favourable for the execution of his design, and had his agents at work in the navy and in the kingdom, to ripen the general discontents of the people, and dispose them to action; that, since the Duke came out of the Tower (24), he had been importuned by him to head the first party he could get together, and engage in an insurrection, the Duke declaring his readiness to appear, and join in the undertaking as soon as the affair was begun. This Doctor pretended to great skill in Astrology; but had lost much of his fame by a prediction of the hanging of Oliver, made to his son Richard and Thurloe, who came to him for the calculation of nativities, disguised in the garb of distressed cavaliers. He was for that imprisoned and confined sixteen months, whilst Cromwell outlived the prediction near four years. However, the Duke, who had imbibed an opinion of the art (25), as well to gratify his own humour as to flatter the Astrologer, put him upon casting the King's nativity, which was condemned by a statute. The Duke had employed this fellow, among others, to incite the seamen to mutiny; and had given money to other rogues to go about the country in sailors jackets begging, and exclaiming for want of pay, whilst the people, oppressed with taxes, were cheated of their money by the great officers of the Crown. The King was highly incensed at him for his conduct in the late sessions, and infusing the spirit into the Commons which had been so much to the detriment of the public service: He could not forbear expressing himself with more bitterness against the Duke than ever dropped from him upon scarcely any other occasion. When he was solicited in his behalf, he frankly said, that the Duke had been the cause of the continuance of the war; for the Dutch would have made an early and very low submission, had the parliament pursued their first vigorous vote of supplying him; but the Duke's cabals had lessened his interest both abroad and at home with regard to the support of the war (26). What it was that provoked the Duke to carry his resentment to such a pitch as is utterly inexorable is not certainly known. Mr Carte thinks it probable the ill humour might be first engendered by his being denied the post of President of the North; which, if true, is certainly an aggravation of his fault, since that post and court

(24) He pretended to have been put there for speaking in parliament for the pay of the fleet, and for easing the people in their taxes.

(25) This art, as vain as it is, was in great vogue in France, when the Duke passed some years of his life there before the Restoration. See the History of that kingdom.

(26) Carte's life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. B. 6.

had been very justly abolished in the time of King Charles I. so that the revival of it would undoubtedly have created a general uneasiness, and must have been particularly opposed by the Earl of Clarendon, who had so great a hand in procuring the abolition (27). Let me therefore add further, that as the disappointment must more than probably have been imputed to the Earl by his Grace, so it was a further incentive to revenge it upon that minister. Accordingly, presently after his Grace was taken into his Majesty's favour, we find him engaged in persecuting the Earl with such inveterate malice, as drove him to seek his refuge in banishment.

(27) See his article.

[M] He went Ambassador to France.] Mr Wood tells us (28) that the French monarch liked his person and errand so well, that he entertained him very nobly for several days together, and in conclusion gave a sword and belt set with diamonds to the value of forty thousand pistoles; and Monf. de Verville assures us, 'the Most Christian King shewed him a greater respect than ever any foreign Ambassador was known to receive. As he knew him, continues the Frenchman, to be un homme de plaisir, he entertained him accordingly. Nothing could be so welcome to the court of Versailles as the message he came about; for which reason a regale was prepared for him, that might have befitted the magnificence of the Roman Emperors, when Rome flourished in its utmost grandeur (29).' This account is likewise confirmed by the Duke himself in the following letter to the Lord Arlington, then principal Secretary of State, dated St Germain, August 15, 1670.

(28) In Athenæ Oxon. Vol. II. col. 803. from a manuscript which he had seen.

(29) Mémoires de la Cour de l'Angleterre, by Mr de Verville.

' My Lord,

' If I had had the good fortune to bring my Lord Falconbridge's Secretary with me, he would have entertained your Lordship with a whole sheet of paper, full of the particulars of my reception here. For I have had more honours done me than ever were given to any subject.' He then proceeds to give an account of his success in the business of his embassy, as follows: 'You will receive, in two or three days, a proposition from this Court concerning the making war upon Holland only, which you may enlarge as you please. Monf. de Lionne shewed me the model of it last night, and I shall see the particulars before they are sent. In the mean time, having not your cypher, I shall only tell you in general, that nothing but our being mealy-mouthed can hinder us from finding our accounts in this matter. For you may almost ask what you please. I have written more at large in cypher to my Lord Ashley; and when you have discoursed together, if you think my stay here will be of use to his Majesty, let me know it. If not, I will come away. I am,

' My Lord,

' Your Lordship's most humble

' And most faithful Servant,

' Buckingham.'

Whatever expence the Grand Monarque might be at in presents and entertainments to our Ambassador, his friend Mr Fairfax intimates, that these were turned

(dd) See his article.

of Sir William Temple (dd), and was thought to have been the principal author of an attempt made upon the life of Clarendon's first friend the Duke of Ormond in December the same year [N]. In 1671 he was installed, on the 7th of June, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and he entertained that learned body nobly at York-house, where his father had done it on the same occasion forty years before (ee). His celebrated comedy, called the Rehearsal, was first brought upon the stage the same year, 1671 [O], and before the expiration of it he advised the Declaration of Indulgence, published March 15, for suspending

(ee) Fairfax, p. 34. who observes, that he now seemed to be setting up for a Favourite; but he wanted his father's diligence, which fitted him to stand before Princes.

(30) Mr Fairfax's words are: His [the Duke's] embassies into France and Holland cost him more than a diamond ring could recompense. Memoirs, p. 34.

into so many occasions of an almost equal expence to the Duke (30), who was now in the highest spirits, as appears from the next letter to Lord Arlington, which furnishes a glaring instance of that foible of vanity, which has been deservedly laid to his charge. It is dated August 17, from the same place as the preceding, and runs in these terms:

‘ My Lord,

‘ I have nothing to add to what I wrote last, but that ‘ I am every day convinced of the happy conjuncture
‘ we have at present in our hands of any conditions
‘ from this court that we can in reason demand (31).
‘ The King of France is so mightily taken with the ‘ discourses I make to him of his greatness by land,
‘ that he talks to me twenty times a day; all the Courtiers here wonder at it, and I am very glad of it, and ‘ am very much,

‘ My Lord,

‘ Your Lordship's most humble

‘ And most faithful Servant,

‘ Buckingham (32).’

(31) The presence of this embassy was to condole the death of the Dutchess of Orleans, King Charles's sister, who died at St Clou, June 30th preceding. See the Duke's speech in the House of Commons, June 14, 1673.

(32) These letters are in the Duke's Works, Vol. I. Edit. 1704.

(33) He was not only pardoned, but had an estate of 500l. per annum given him in Ireland.

(34) The excuse was a revenge for the Duke's prosecution of him in 1663 for a conspiring to seize Dublin castle, and the Duke then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Blood's article, Vol. II. p. 817.

(35) Here Mr Carte seems not sufficiently to advert to Blood's character, which makes him an exception to this rule, as will hardly be denied after perusing his article in the second volume of this work.

(36) Bp Burnet says, that, in the Dutch wars, the King having discovered to Buckingham the Earl of Ossory's design on Helvoetsluys, he employed all his wit to make it appear ridiculous, as hating both the Duke of Ormond and Lord Ossory, and would have seen the King and all his affairs perish, rather than the person he hated should have the honour of such merit; and thereupon the King ordered the design to be laid aside, so easy was he to the man of wit and humour. Burnet's History of his own time, Vol. I. Folio Edition.

But notwithstanding these vaunting letters, that he could obtain any thing from the French King, it is certain the Grand Monarque, by tickling his vanity, obtained every thing that he proposed, and the Ambassador consented to the French fleets coming into our seas and harbours, which afterwards improved their mariners, and learnt them the way of fighting at sea.

[N] The principal author of the assault upon the Duke of Ormond.] Mr Carte, having taken notice of the general opinion, that Blood was put upon this attempt by the Duke, to which he joins the Dutchess of Cleveland. They both, continues he, hated the Duke of Ormond mortally, and were powerful advocates to solicit Blood's pardon (33). The reason assigned by the criminal for his attempt was considered as a meer excuse (34); for his Grace had done nothing particularly against him more than against others concerned with him in the same conspiracy, and put into the same proclamation. If Blood's estate at Sarney was forfeited for his treason, and, upon his attainer, granted by his Majesty to Captain Toby Barnes; or if his accomplices were executed after a full conviction; all this was done in the course of government, and must have been done by any other Lord Lieutenant as well as the Duke of Ormond. Blood knew very well his own guilt, and had no reason to resent any thing in this proceeding of his Grace; nor do acts, merely ministerial, use to produce, in any, such resentments as cannot be satisfied without the assassination of a minister, who, in the discharge of his duty, and the trust reposed in him by his Prince, could not have spared his own father in the like case (35). Mr Carte then proceeds to give the direct reasons for laying the design upon the Duke, which are, first, that it suited him better than any other person, as being the most profligate man of the age, and capable of any iniquity, however mean or enormous. That all the arts or suggestions, which he or his instruments could use, had not worked his Grace so much out of the King's good opinion and favour, but that his Majesty still gave him, upon occasion, marks of his esteem and confidence. The Duke had not, by the resentment which disgraced ministers are apt to shew in their conduct, given the finishing stroke to his credit with the King, which they had begun by removing him from the government of Ireland. He might be again employed to defeat the measures of Buckingham and his cabal, to which he was in the mean time a considerable restraint. It was undoubtedly Buckingham's interest to have Ormond dispatched out of the way. That it was not long before this attempt of Blood, that Buckingham and some of his friends had given out, that the Earls of Clarendon and Ossory had set on two persons to murder him (36); that these two persons were poisoned, and before their death owned the subornation. It would be impertinent to offer to vindicate those two honourable noblemen from a charge which no man on earth could possibly believe: but to what purpose could such a calumny be invented and spread, unless to prepare the world to receive an apology for another assassination (in case the true author should be discovered) as if it were perpetrated purely in revenge for the like intended against himself, or made necessary for his own defence. No body does odious things but for some end or other of a piece with the means which they make use of to bring it about. The Duke of Buckingham was not so senseless a mortal, or knew men so little, as to believe this story, which he took care to have published; or if he did, as mankind judge of others by themselves, he could not suspect these men of virtue and honour of such a design, without being capable of it himself (37). Here we see this writer has accumulated no less than nine reasons to induce a belief of the Duke's guilt; yet they are all of them manifestly too general to fix the charge absolutely upon him; which indeed is suggested by the accuser himself, where he says, it is not easy to find any other person to whose character the design so well suited, or who could be under a temptation to it; not denying, that such a person might be found, though not without some difficulty. But whatever defects may appear in the preceding reasons, when considered separately, they will unquestionably be allowed to be sufficiently made up by the sanction given to them in the tenth and last, where he tells us from good authority, that the Earl of Ossory, not long after the affair, boldly charged it upon the Duke to his face, and that too before the King himself, with whom his Grace was then in high favour (38). At the same time this noble spirited son vowed, that if his father should come to a violent end, he would pistol his Grace as the author of it. All which, for any thing that appears, was quietly pocketed by the Duke, who had several other transactions with Blood afterwards, an account of which may be seen under Blood's article.

[O] The Rehearsal was first brought upon the stage in 1671.] It was first acted on the 7th of December this year, and several times printed in quarto; but the plays exposed in it shew, that it was begun before the end of the year 1663, and finished before the end of 1664; since it had been several times rehearsed, the players were perfect in their parts, and all things in readiness for its acting, before the plague in 1665; which then prevented it, and so proved an occasion of new modelling it. In the first form he called his Poet Bilboa, meaning Sir Robert Howard. But many plays coming out in heroic rhyme, which grew still into greater vogue after Mr Dryden became Laureat in 1669, this put the Duke upon changing Bilboa for Bays. Mr Dryden, in revenge for the ridicule thrown upon him in this piece, exposed the Duke under the name of Zimri, in his Abalom and Achitophel. The lines are too well known to be transcribed here, though well worth the reader's perusal: They are very severe; yet the Duke is thought to have exposed Dryden ten times more severely. Dryden, says Mr Walpole (39), is an admirable portrait, but Bays an original creation. Dryden satirized Buckingham, Villiers in the Rehearsal made Dryden satirize himself. The same author observes it as an instance of astonishing quickness, that the Duke being present at one of these plays by Dryden, where a Lover says,

My wound is great, because it is so small:

His Grace cried out,

Then 'twould be greater, were it none at all.

And it may be further remarked, that had the Duke lived long enough, he would have had a like occasion for displaying his wit in behalf of his friend Mr Cowley, in celebrating whose praises Mr Addison has this astonishing line:

He more had pleased us, had he pleased us less (40).

The Duke also wrote a poem of some considerable length, called Reflections upon Abalom and Achitophel; all in verse: And a Key to the Rehearsal.

(37) Carte's History of the Life of the Duke of Ormond, p. 424.

(38) The Earl's words are related under his article in remark [D] Vol. II. p. 1073.

(39) In his catalogue of royal and noble authors under the Duke's article.

(40) Vid. Cowley's article in remark [LII].

the penal laws against Dissenters (ff). In 1672 he was sent a second time, together with the Earls of Arlington and Lord Halifax, to the French King, then at Utrecht, to concert measures secretly for carrying on the second Dutch war [P]; and it was about this time that he bought Colonel Scot's regiment. Yet, upon the meeting of the parliament the ensuing year, a complaint being made of him in the House of Commons for revealing the King's counsels and corresponding with his enemies, in his defence of himself before that house, he confessed some part of his own bad administration, and betrayed more of his associate Arlington [Q]. In 1674, having made himself very unpopular at Cambridge (gg), he resigned the chancellorship of that University, and the Duke of Monmouth was chosen in his room, July 15 that year (bb). About this time he began to side with the Nonconformists; and, in opposition to the Court, he joined with the Earl of Shaftsbury and others against the famous bill, To prevent the danger that may arise from persons disaffected to the government, which was brought into the House of Lords in April, 1675 [R]. In October

(ff) See remains [R].

(gg) Carte's Hist. of England, Vol. II. under the year 1669. See also the Lantry in remark [U].

(bb) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 803. and Gen. Hist. of England.

(*) Turenne.

(41) Memoirs, &c. p. 34.

[P] He was sent to the French King at Utrecht. Mr Bryan Fairfax attended him in this embassy, and gives us the following account of the rout taken in it: 'We took barge, says he, at Whitehall, June 1673, and lay that night on board the English Admiral at the buoy of the Nore, the King and Duke being there. Next night we came to anchor in our yacht in the Dutch fleet on the coast of Holland. The next night we were entertained by the States at the Hague. Next night we supped with the Prince of Orange, at his camp at Bodegrave. Next night with the King of France at Utrecht, where we staid two or three days, and then marched back with him at the head of his army to Arnheim, where we visited the Prince of Conde, who lay ill there of a wound in his arm, which he got in passing the Rhine at Tolhua, and Marthal Turin (*). Thence we went with the King to Nimeguen, Grave, Boxtell, and there we parted. The King went to Paris, and we into the Spanish dominions, to Antwerp, Brussels, Bruges, Ghent, Dunkirk, and Calais; where our yachts staid for us, and we came to Dover, Canterbury, London, where we arrived the day month that we left it (41).'

[Q] He defended himself before the House of Commons. He spoke twice before the House on this occasion. On the first day, in answer to the charge of entering into the French measures, he avowed, that, if the triple league had any advantage in it, he had as great a hand therein as any man. This he repeated the next day, and then proceeds thus: That when, upon the instance of the French Ambassador, he was sent into France afterwards to condole the death of the Dutchess of Orleans, he urged for the service of the King, that the French ought not to endeavour to make themselves considerable at sea, of whom we had reason to be more jealous than of the Dutch, because, says he, the French then would have power to conquer us. When I returned, I found all demonstrations that the French had no such thoughts, but that the King of England should be master at sea. At this time, continues he, Lord Shaftsbury and myself advised not to begin a war without the advice of the parliament. But this was not Lord Arlington's opinion. My next advice was, not to make use of French ships; half their value in money would have been more serviceable. I alledged they would be of no use to us, by reason of their want of experience in our seas, and there would be great danger in their learning the use of them; which advice my Lord Arlington opposed, notwithstanding the King was so desirous of avoiding a breach with France, that he sent me to Dunkirk, and my Lord Arlington to Utrecht, where I still endeavoured to get money instead of ships. At my first audience the King of France was willing to comply; but after some returns and letters from hence he was altered: but I make no reflections upon persons, but barely state matters of fact. He afterwards declares it was the advice of my Lord Shaftsbury, as well as his own, so to order the war, that the French should deliver us some towns of their conquests into our hands, a useful precaution in former times; Lord Arlington would have no towns at all for one year. And here is the cause of the condition of our affairs. We set out a fleet, with intention to land men, in order to the taking of towns. The French army go on conquering and get all, and we get nothing, nor agree for any. Pray consider who it was that was so often locked up with the French Ambassador. My spirit moves me to tell you, that, when we were to consider what to do, we were to advise with the French Ambassador. I will not trouble you with reports; but pray look not upon me as a peer, but an honest English gentleman, who has suffered much for my love to my country. I had a regiment given me, which was Sir

Edward Scot's; I gave him 1600l. for it. There is no Papist officer in it, nor Irishman. I shall say nothing of my extraordinary gains; I am sure I have lost as much estate as some men have gotten (and that is a big word;) I am honest; and when I appear otherwise, I desire to die. I am not the man that has gotten by all this; yet after all this, if I am a grievance, I am the cheapest grievance this house ever had; and so I humbly ask the pardon of this House for the trouble I have given. The Speaker then proceeded to ask him several questions, in his answer to which he suggests, that Lord Arlington had declared to him some advices against the liberties and privileges of the House of Commons, and to alter the government. That if the Duke of Ormond had got, as appeared upon record, about 500000l. though Lord Arlington had not got so much, yet he had got a great deal. That the army was raised and Scornberg made General by Lord Arlington, and that the army was brought up to awe the debates and resolutions of the House of Commons by the same Lord's advice. He acknowledged that he joined with that Lord in making the French league, and that he himself made the first treaty with France, by which the triple alliance was broken. He also confessed, that he advised the declaration for indulging the Dissenters, and that he joined Lord Arlington in making the second treaty of Utrecht: But that he was utterly against attacking the Dutch Smyrna fleet before the war was proclaimed, that step being taken purely by Lord Arlington's advice. And lastly, that both himself and Lord Shaftsbury were for advising with the Parliament before the [Dutch] war begun, and averse to the prorogation which followed it (42).

[R] He opposed the bill to prevent the danger that may arise from persons disaffected to the government. In this bill was inserted the Test, by which, besides the oaths required of Magistrates in corporations, viz. I A. B. do declare, that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the King, there was added the following, I A. B. do swear, that I will not endeavour an alteration of the Protestant religion established by law in the church of England, nor will I endeavour any alteration in the government of the kingdom in church or state as it is by law established. This was proposed to be taken by all who enjoyed any beneficial offices, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, and by all Privy Counsellors, Justices of the peace, and both houses of parliament. The Court party espoused the bill very vehemently, and it was opposed as vehemently by the Country party, who looked upon it as a project to divide the Protestants, and to strengthen the Popish party. It was debated in paragraphs for seventeen days successively, the Lords that opposed it alledging, that it was inconsistent with itself and hurtful to the constitution of the kingdom. The chief speakers for it were the Lord Treasurer Danby and the Lord Keeper Finch, with the Bishops Morley and Ward. Those on the other side were the Lords Halifax and Holles, the Earls of Salisbury and Shaftsbury, and the Duke of Buckingham; these with the Marquis of Winchester, nine Earls and seven Barons, entered their protest against it, 'conceiving, that any bill which imposeth an oath upon the peers, with a penalty, as this doth, that upon refusal of that oath they shall be made incapable of sitting and voting in their house, as it is a thing unprecedented in former times, so it is, in their opinion, the highest invasion of the liberties and privileges of the peerage that possibly may be, and most destructive of the freedom which they ought to enjoy as members of parliament: because the privileges of sitting and voting in parliament is an honour they have by birth, and a right so inherent in them, as that nothing can take away but what

(42) By this defence the Duke escaped any further prosecution. The Earl of Arlington, who was examined by the House on the same occasion, was impeached by them. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year 1673. The speech is printed in his Grace's works, Vol. I. Edit. 1704.

(kk) He opened the conference. His speech on this occasion is likewise inserted in his works.

(ll) He was accompanied by Shaftsbury, Salisbury, and Wharton, who were all sent thither on the same occasion. General Hist. of England.

following he brought a bill into the House of Lords for tolerating the Dissenters (ii), and was appointed one of the managers in a conference between the two Houses of Parliament upon the point of the jurisdiction of the upper house (kk). In order to check the heat and animosities occasioned by this dispute, his Majesty, in November this year, prorogued the parliament till Feb. 15, 1676-7, which being upwards of a year, the Duke made a speech on that day, to shew, that, in this prorogation, his Majesty had exceeded the bounds of the prerogative [S]; and persisting in defence of this assertion, the next day he was committed to the Tower by the House of Lords (ll): but, upon a petition to the King, he was discharged thence in May following. After this he joined in opposition to the court upon the breaking out of the Popish plot, and was warm in prosecuting all those who were concerned therein. In 1680, having sold Wallingford house, he purchased a house at Dowgate, and resided there, joining with the Earl of Shaftsbury in raising tumults and disturbances in the city against the administration (mm). In 1685 he published, in 4to, A short discourse upon the reasonableness of men's having a religion, or worship of God (nn) [T].

(mm) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 804.

(nn) Three editions of it were published that year.

To

(43) The bill miscarried by the King's proroguing the parliament on the 9th of June.

(44) See his article.

(45) The General died in 1671. The Ode is inserted at the head of the Duke's works, Edit. 1704.

(46) Having called them the ancient statutes of the realm, he observes by the way, that statutes are not like women, for they are not one jot the worse for being old.

‘ what by the law of the land must withal take away their lives, and corrupt their blood.’ And when the bill was committed, they got in this proviso, That it should be no hindrance to their free speaking and voting in parliament (43). Whatever patriotism there might be in opposing this bill by others, it is too notorious that Villiers had no title to any share of that merit. He seems indeed in this, as in other parts of his political conduct at this time, to have acted the mean part of a second to Shaftsbury (44). Yet so much may be alledged in his behalf, that this opposition was of a piece, and consistent with his avowed espousal of the Dissenters, and indeed a consequence of it; a part of his conduct surely somewhat more than excusable, on account of the respect and gratitude which he owed to the memory of his father-in-law Fairfax, and which he always preserved, and had given a noble testimony of it in a Pindaric ode on his death a few years before (45).

[S] His speech to prove the parliament dissolved.] As this is an essential point in the constitution, it will be worth while to see the Duke's way of arguing thereupon. His proofs are drawn from two statutes of Edward III. (46): The words of the first being, Item, It is accorded, that a parliament shall be holden every year once, and more often, if need be, which is explained and confirmed in the other. Item, For maintenance of these articles and statutes, and the redress of divers mischiefs and grievances which daily happen, a parliament shall be holden every year, as at other time was ordained by another statute. He then proceeds to observe, that these statutes were not repealed by either of the bills for a triennial parliament, which passed in this and the preceding reign; ‘ Whence, continues he, the whole matter is reduced to this short dilemma; either the Kings of England are bound by the acts abovementioned of Edward III. or else the whole government of England by parliaments and by the law above is absolutely at an end. For a power to invalidate, by an order of the King, an act made for the maintenance of Magna Charta, implies a power, by a like order, to invalidate Magna Charta itself; and then the King is absolute, and may do what he pleases with our estates, lives, and liberties. And yet this power must be allowed him, or else we that sit here this day cannot act as a parliament. For as to the proclamation, pray, my Lords, is that of more force than a prorogation; or if a thing that hath been ordered the first time be not valid, doth the ordering it a second time make it good in law; I have heard indeed that two negatives make an affirmative, but I never heard before that two nothings ever made any thing.—The laws have reposed so great a trust and so great a power in the hands of a parliament, that every circumstance relating to the manner of their electing, meeting, and proceeding, is looked after with the nicest circumspection imaginable. For this reason the King's writs about the summons of parliament are to be issued out verbatim according to the form prescribed by the law, or else that parliament is void and null: For the same reason, if a parliament, summoned by the King's writ, do not meet the very same day that it is summoned to meet upon, that parliament is void and null: And, by the same reason, if parliaments be not legally adjourned de die in diem, those parliaments must be also void and null. He then proceeds to answer the objections, wherein he observes, that though the King's power of prorogation is not taken away by the statute of Edward III. yet it is certainly limited to be within a year.’ In answer to the argument, that if that prorogation be null and void, then things are just as they were before, and therefore the parliament is still in being. ‘ My Lords, says he, I confess there would be some weight in this but for one thing, which is, that not one word of it is true. For if, when the King had prorogued us, we had taken no notice of the prorogation, but had gone on like a parliament, and had adjourned ourselves de die in diem, then I confess things had been just as they were before; but since upon the prorogation we went away, and took no care of ourselves for our meeting again, if we cannot meet and act by virtue of that prorogation, there is an impossibility of our meeting and acting any other way. One may as properly say, that a man who is killed by assault is still alive, because he is killed unlawfully, as that the parliament is still alive, because the prorogation is unlawful. The next argument that those are reduced to, who would maintain this to be yet a parliament, is, that the parliament is prorogued sine die, and therefore the King may call them again by proclamation. In the first part of this proposition I shall not only agree with them, but also do them the favour to prove that it is so in the eye of the law, which I never heard they have yet done. For the statutes say, that a parliament shall be holden once within a year, and the prorogation having put them off till a day without the year, and consequently excepted against by the law, that day in the eye of the law is no day at all, that is, sine die: And the prorogation might as well have put them off till so many months after Doom's day; and then I think no body would have doubted but that would have been a very sufficient dissolution. In confirmation of this he observes, that the usual way of dissolving parliaments formerly was, the King desired them to go home till he sent for them again, which is a dismissal sine die. Lastly, in answer to the Precedent in Queen Elizabeth's time, when the parliament was once prorogued three days beyond a year, he observes it was done in a hurry, in the time of a very great plague; the mistake was not attended to then, nor taken notice of afterwards, otherwise than that Queen Elizabeth would have given a lawful remedy. But this supposition of the Duke's is a little too hard to be digested. It is certainly much more probable, that, in this prorogation, the necessity of the occasion [the plague] was considered, which put the case properly within the prerogative. And it is well known, that Queen Elizabeth exerted the prerogative oftener than any of her successors, but without giving any offence or raising any jealousies, for this reason, because in every instance the equity and justice of the proceeding was notoriously evident. Whence our Duke's conclusion seems to be too hasty, in saying, that we must either allow the statutes made in that particular session in Queen Elizabeth's time to be void, or lay it down for a maxim, that the Kings of England, by a particular order of theirs, have power to break all the laws of England when they please. He concludes with observing, that it is no disrespect to his Majesty to say he is bound up by the laws; that, if nothing of all he had urged were true, they should not find any honourable excuse for acting again with the House of Commons; and that nothing could be more dangerous than the making laws by an assembly whose power is doubtful, and therefore, says he, it would be in us inexcusable if we should overlook this danger, since there is for it so easy a remedy, which the law requires, and which all the nation longs for, that is, The calling of a new parliament (47).

[T] A discourse concerning the reasonableness of men's having some religion.] In this piece the Duke having made use of the common argument, though in an un-

(47) This speech is also printed in his works, as before.

common

To this there coming out presently, in 4to, A short answer to the Duke of Buckingham his Grace's paper concerning religion, toleration, and liberty of conscience, the Duke wrote a reply in 4to, entitled, The Duke of Buckingham his Grace's letter to the unknown author of the paper, entitled, A short answer. Immediately after which there was published, A reply to his Grace the Duke of Buckingham's letter to the Author of a paper, entitled, A short answer to his Grace's discourse concerning religion, in folio. At the death of King Charles, falling into an ill state of health (99), he went into the country to his own manor of Helmesley in Yorkshire. King Charles was his best friend; he loved him, and excused his faults; he was not so sure of his successor, whose emissary father Fitzgerald, sent to convert him in his sickness, he had so shamefully foiled by an inimitable turn of wit (pp). During this retirement he wrote a piece, which was published in 1687, entitled, A Demonstration of the Deity. In the country he generally passed his time in hunting and entertaining his friends, which he did a fortnight before his death as pleasantly and hospitably as ever he did in his life. But one day, after fox-hunting, he took cold by sitting on the cold ground, which threw him into an ague and fever that carried him off, after three days sickness, at a tenant's house, Kirkby-moor-side, a lordship of his own near Helmesley, April 16, 1688, ætat. 60 (qq). The day before his death he sent to his old servant Mr Brian Fairfax, to desire him to provide him a bed at his house at Bishop-hill in York; but the next morning the same man returned with the news that his life was despaired of. Mr Fairfax went post, but before he got to him he was speechless. The Earl of Arran, son to Duke Hamilton, was with him; who, hearing he was sick, visited him in his way to Scotland. When Mr Fairfax came, the Duke knew him, looked earnestly at him, but could not speak. Mr Fairfax asked a gentleman there present, a Justice of peace, and a worthy discreet man in the neighbourhood, what he had said or done before he became speechless; who told him that some questions had been asked him about his estate; to which he gave no answer. Then he was admonished of the danger he was in, which he seemed not to apprehend: he was asked if he would have the minister of the parish sent for to pray with him; to which he gave no answer; which made another question be asked, if he would have a Popish Priest; to which he answered with great vehemence, no, no! repeating the words he would have nothing to do with them. Then the aforesaid gentleman, Mr Gibson, asked him again if he would have the minister sent for; and he calmly answered, yes, pray send for him. This was in common way, against the eternity of the world from its mutability, the author of the short answer observes, that, had he been to treat with Atheists, he would have urged to them, that it is impossible this world should be eternal, because then it must also be invisible. To which the Duke replies thus (48): 'My nameless, anonymous, harmless humble Servant, I have twice read over, with a great deal of patience, a paper of yours, which you call An Answer to A Discourse of mine: And to my confusion must own, that I am not able to comprehend what part of my discourse it is you do answer, nor in all yours what it is you mean. Having this confession, you ought not to be offended at me if I cannot remember it neither. And yet there is one passage in it which I shall never forget, because it does in a most extraordinary manner delight me: It is this shrewd convincing argument of yours, which you say, had you been to treat with Atheists, &c. It is, I swear, a refined quaint kind of notion, which, to do you justice, I do verily believe is intirely your own. Yet, for all this, I cannot be absolutely convinced, that I am now the same George Duke of Buckingham that I was forty years ago: And, to shew you I am in earnest, I do here promise you, that if you do for me a favour less difficult, which is to make me the same George Duke of Buckingham I was but twenty years ago, I will (as poor a man as I am) give you a thousand guineas for your pains, and that is somewhat more, I am afraid, than you will ever get by your writings.' Which the aforesaid anonymous replier returns in these terms: 'But, not to be wholly contradictory to his Grace's opinion, as his Grace is pleased to express his great difficulty of believing himself the same George Duke of B—— which he was twenty years ago, there indeed I must join with him, it being too apparently true, that his Grace has not been the same five years ago that he was twenty-five, which all men that have had the honour of knowing his Grace at Whitehall in 60, and at Dowgate, will justify for me.' In 1686 there came out A defence of the Duke, intitled A letter from Nevill Payne to a domestick of the Duke of Buckingham, upon occasion of his Grace's discourse concerning Toleration, which is exactly in the Duke's vein. He begins with declaring himself enraged to see so great a peer treated with so little respect, especially in a public good, that may compose animosities and prevent distractions. Entering then into the merits of the argument, he shews the answerer's false conceit, that Toleration is admitted no where but in commonwealths; and having observed that Calvinists, Lutherans, &c. subsist in Poland and Germany together with Catholics, he enquires why the church of England will not admit competitors. The cause, says he, is visible, The church of England is only a Court Invention, and their Ministers are a sort of ecclesiastical guard to the Prince. When Henry VIII. was first possessed by his scruples, like Numa consulting with his goddess, he asked advice of their oracle, which he knew would suit with his own opinion; and this made them acceptable, especially when sacrilege, that was no little game with our courtiers and gentry, countenanced the innovation. He then observes, that this turn produced a deluge of wild conceits in religion. While the Dissenter contemns all forms of prayer as insipid, and without edification; the Churchman, in answer, produceth authority and antiquity from Catholic authors. But when the Papist returns his own arguments against his novelty, then he turns fanatic, and believes no more than reason and sense; which in different terms is the Quaker's light within, or the Presbyterian's divine impulse or illumination. Considering then that she [the church of England] cannot subsist but by a regal power and assistance, she cannot admit a Toleration, whereby her specious pretences would be discovered. On the other hand he further observes, that a Prince, who will be engaged for her cause, must disoblige the greatest part of the nation. And therefore it cannot be for the security of the King to uphold a Court religion, because his subjects will be always jealous of them both, since these are ready for their own interest and lucre to preach the Prince's will for Gospel; as in my hearing, before Charles I. Dr Sheldon, the late Archbishop, upon the text of Samuel, Hoc est Domini regis—proved that Kings might take away any man's possessions. Besides, it is impossible that any security can be to a Protestant King, because the Dissenters, being more numerous, will be always plotting his destruction, as they did to Charles I. and were near accomplishing that of Charles II. How much better is it that things purely so be committed to them that are truly Ecclesiastical; wherein the Prince is freed from the vain scruples and pretensions of his subjects in religion. This was perfectly a-la-mode de Cour, when an universal Toleration as is here recommended was then actually granted, and the King [James] had delivered himself up absolutely to these true Ecclesiasticals. Mr Nevill Payne therefore concludes with the following Eloge upon that Monarch: When the King gives the best example of piety, and the greatest devotion, he shews us how much need we have of God's grace and mercy (49)

(99) Memoirs, p. 38.

(49) The Duke, it seems, was out of health at the time. For Mr Payne concludes with wishing him a good recovery.

the

(99) Nevill Payne's letter to him, mentioned in remark [T]

(pp) Every body knows his Grace's excellent banter of Transubstantiation, by proving a cork which he held in his hand to be a horse, according to that doctrine. He published the dispute, with the title of An Account of a Conference, &c. printed in his works, Vol. II.

(48) Mr Walpole justly gives this the character of a ludicrous and very good answer. Catalogue of royal and noble authors, ubi supra.

the morning, and he died that night. The minister came and did the office enjoined by the church; the Duke devoutly attending it, and receiving the sacrament, an hour after which he became speechless; but appearing sensible, the prayers of the church were repeated by his bed-side, recommending him to the mercy of God through the merits of Jesus Christ. Thus he died quietly in his bed, the fate of few of his predecessors in the title of Buckingham. His body was embalmed, and brought to Westminster-abbey, and there laid in the vault, with his father and brothers, in Henry VIIIth's chapel (rr). The world has been severe in censuring his faults and foibles [U], but not so just in noting his good qualities. This is well remarked by Mr Fairfax (ss), who has therefore thought proper to do him that justice. For his person, says this faithful friend, he was the glory of the age and of any court wherever he came; of a most graceful and charming mien and behaviour, a strong, tall, and active body, all which gave a lustre to the ornaments of his mind; of an admirable wit and excellent judgment; and had all other qualities of a gentleman. He was courteous and affable to all; of a compassionate nature, ready to forgive and forget injuries. What was said of a great man in the court of Queen Elizabeth, that he used to vent his discontents at court by retiring from company and writing sonnets, may be said of him; but when he was provoked

(rr) Memoirs,
p. 38.

(ss) Ibid.

[U] The world has been severe in censuring his faults and foibles. In 1679 there came out a piece, intitled, The Litany of the Duke of B———, exposing the most flagrant faults and follies in the course of his life. This most virulent foul-mouthed satire, containing several facts in the Duke's life, being very scarce, we shall present the Reader with it, relying upon his candor for the same apology as is constantly made for the Roman satirist Juvenal in the like case. It runs thus:

*From a sensual, proud, atheistical life,
From arming our lacquies with pistol and knife,
From murthering the husband, and whoring the wife,
Libera nos Domine.*

*From going Ambassador only as Panders,
From rekillng dead Kings with monstrous slanders,
From betraying the living in Scotland and Flanders,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From a wild rambling no-where abode,
Without day or night, nor at home nor abroad,
From a Prince to unborse us in Dover road,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From crowning the herse of our babe of adultery,
By an infamous servant to a Lord of the prelacy,
Whom we got cashiered for carnal arsery,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From selling land of twice ten thousand a year,
All spent no mortal can tell how or where,
And then reform kingdoms as a sanctified Peer,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From monstrous sucking till both tongues have blisters,
From making our boasts of giving three glisters,
By giving of claps to three cheated sisters,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From transposing of nature upon the Bum Gers,
On Kenison acting both Venus and Mars,
From owning twenty other men's farce,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From wretched pasquils on Shadwell and Dryden,
From casting natiwities with learned Heydon,
And casting of dollars at Antwerp and Leyden,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From trembling at sea when not a gun roar'd,
And then steal ashore by breaking our word,
With damm me if ever you catch me aboard,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From being still cheated by the same Undertakers,
By Levellers, Barwds, Saints, Chymists, and Quakers,
Who make us gold-finders, and themselves gold-makers,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From damning whatever we don't understand,
From purchasing at Dowgate, and selling in the Strand, Calling streets by our name, when we have sold the land (50),
Libera nos Sc.*

*From barring our own house to treat Scholars ill,
And then be unchancellor'd against our will,
Nought left of a College but our own College-hill,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From judging of Judges in a senseless speech,
From following S—, that regaling leech,
Because, being twins, both suck'd the same bitch,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From mortally hating all those that love us,
From mimical acting all those above us,
Till the master at last is forc'd to remove us,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From cringing to those we scorn to condemn,
In hopes to be made the Citizens gem,
Who now scorn us more than e'er we did them,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From sneaking 'twixt Castle-yard and Vandeput,
From telling of tales when we have been at Rut,
And ramming three candles into one Lady's scut,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From beginning an execrable traitterous health,
To destroy the parliament, King, and himself,
To be made Ducal Peer of a new Commonwealth,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From changing old Friends for rascally new ones,
From taking Wildman and Marvel for true ones,
From wearing green Ribbons 'gainst him that gave blue ones,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From lodging at Court before we are sent for,
For selling six palaces for less than they rent for,
And buying three hillocks (51) for three Kings of Brent-ford,
Libera nos Sc.*

*From learning new morals from Bedlam Sir Peyton,
Or truth and modesty from Elwys Leyton,
From making our heirs to be Morris and Clayton,
Libera nos Sc.*

A late elegant writer observes, that the Duke's portrait has been drawn by four masterly hands. Burnet has hewn it out with his rough chissel, Count Hamilton touched it with a slight delicacy, that finishes while it seems but to sketch. Dryden caught the living likeness. Pope completed the historical resemblance (52). But, however unsparingly cruel these may be in the design, they are all exceeded by this writer himself in the cruelty of the execution. 'When this extraordinary man,' says he, with the figure and genius of Alcibiades, 'could equally charm the Presbyterian Fairfax and dis-solute Charles, when he alike ridiculed that witty King and his solemn Chancellor; when he plotted the ruin of his country with a Cabal of bad ministers, and, equally unprincipled, supported its cause with bad patriots, one laments that such parts should have been devoid of every virtue. But, when Alcibiades turns chymist, when he is a real bubble and a visionary miser, when ambition is but a frolic, when the worst designs are for the vilest ends, contempt extinguishes all reflection on his character (53).' This last thrust is aimed to give his memory such a mortal stab, as had been given to his father's life by Felton, upon whom we have a commendatory epitaph, ascribed to the son, which though the Editor thinks (54), in favour of the Duke, could not be written by him, yet Mr Walpole declares he knows no principle the Duke had to prevent his being the author. Indeed, says he, it is more bombast than offensive.

(51) Viz. Sion-hill, College-hill, and Cliefden-hill.

(52) Burnet, in Hist. of his own times. Hamilton's sketch is, that, full of wit and spirit, he lavished away, without noise, the vast riches he was entered upon. Memoirs of Count de Gramont, p. 94. Edit. 1714. Dryden's satire has been already mentioned, and Pope's will be seen in the next remark.

(53) Catalogue of royal and noble authors, ubi supra.

(54) Thomas Brown, who says he had seen it ascribed to the Duke in several MS. collections of state poems, then in the custody of some curious gentlemen, and printed as the Duke's, in a Miscellany, published in 1692, by Peter Buck. Memoirs of the Duke of Buckingham, prefixed to his works.

by

(50) York-house, now York-buildings, consists of George-street, Villiers-street, Duke-street, of Alley, and Buckingham-street.

by the malice of some, and ingratitude of others, he might shew, that a good-natured man might have an ill-natured muse. His charitable disposition he seemed to inherit from his grandfather, Francis Earl of Rutland, who used every quarter-day at London to send his Steward with bags of money to several prisons, to relieve prisoners and pay their debts, bidding them thank God, and pray for their benefactor, but not telling them who he was. The Duke, continues this writer, was a man of great courage. One instance of which was, that when a melancholy mad servant assaulted him with a drawn sword in his hand, while he was at supper, he with a knife disarmed him. The character which Sir Henry Wotton gives of his father might be said of him: 'Among all the favourites which mine eyes have seen in diverse courts and times, I never saw before a strong heart and eminent condition, so clearly void of all pride and shocking arrogance, either in his face or in his fashion.' It is to be wished the rest of his father's character had been as true of him; his diligence and application to business, and that he had left his few honest servants in as good fortune as reputation, who never wronged him in his estate, nor flattered him in his faults, and thought they escaped well in not being oppressed under the ruins of his fortune. His father had two crimes objected against him, which he was not guilty of; plurality of offices, and preferring his relations. The faults objected to him were, that he loved women and spent his estate. His estate was his own: He had often lost it for the King, and might now be allowed to enjoy it himself. If he was sui profusus, he never was alieni appetens. If he was extravagant in spending, he was just in paying his debts, and at his death charged them on his estate, leaving much more than enough to pay them [W]. 'If he was a grievance, as he told the House of Commons (11), he was the cheapest to the public that ever was complained of.' He had no children by his Dutchess, nor heirs capable of inheriting his estate or title. His amours were too notorious to be concealed, and too scandalous to be justified by saying he was bred in the latitude of foreign climates, and now lived in a vicious age and court, where his accusers of this crime were as guilty as himself. He lay under so ill a name for this, that whenever he was shut up in his chamber, as he loved to be nescio quid meditans nugarum, or in his laboratory over the fumes of charcoal, it was said to be with women; when a dirty chymist (*), a fox-hunter, a pretender to poetry or politicks, a rehearsal, should entertain him, while a messenger to summon him to Council could not be admitted. This is true of him, that, of all the noise made of his loving women, he never had so much as a bastard laid to his charge that he or any body else believed to be his own. Some pretended to love his person, but it was his estate which smarted for it. It is hard to tell by his expence (111) which was his favourite pleasure: I think his chymistry at home, and fox-hunting abroad. I will conclude his character with saying, that if human frailty will not excuse these faults, let Christian charity oblige us to hope, that as God gave him time, he gave him also the grace of true repentance. His wife Mary, Dutchess of Buckingham, was a most virtuous and pious Lady in a vicious age and court: If she had any of the vanities, she had certainly none of the vices of it. The Duke and she lived lovingly and decently together; she patiently bearing with those faults in him which she could not remedy. She survived him many years, and died near St James's at Westminster, and was buried in the vault of the family of the Villiers in Henry VIIIth's chapel, anno 1705, ætat. 66 (1111). Most of the productions of the Duke's pen were collected and published, not many years after his decease, in two volumes 8vo; the second edition of which came out in 1704; and the third in 1715 [X]: And there is another edition now [1762] in the press.

[W] Leaving much more than enough to pay his debts.] The above authentic account of the circumstances of his Grace's exit furnishes a very necessary key to the description given of it by Mr Pope in the following lines:

In the worst Inn's worst room, with mat half hung,
The floors of plaster, and the walls of dung;
On once a flock-bed, but repaired with straw,
With tape-tied curtains never meant to draw;
The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
Where tawdry yellow strowe with dirty red,
Great VILLIERS lies—alas, how chang'd from him,
That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim!
Gallant and gay in Cliveden's proud alcove,
The burver of wanton Shrewsbury, and love;
Or just as gay at Council, in a ring
Of mimick'd statesmen and their merry King.
No wit to flatter left of all his store!
No soul to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this Lord of useless thousands ends.
His Grace's fate sage Cutler could foresee,
And well (he thought) advis'd him, Live like me.
As well his Grace replied, Like you Sir John!
That I can do when all I have is gone.
Resolve me, Reason, which of these is worse,
Want with a full or with an empty purse (55).

We have already observed, that this excellent Poet frequently over-seasoned his satires with gall (56). Whether in this instance it does not sink into a libel waits the decision of Bishop Warburton, the undertaker of this Poet's honest fame.

[X] His works.] These volumes are a Bookseller's Miscellany, containing various speeches, poems, &c. The chief of those which belong to his Grace have been mentioned in the course of this memoir, except An essay on human reason, addressed to Martin Clifford, Esq; Five letters on election affairs, Ten little burlesque and satirical palms: In the second volume. And in the first, Four poems by the Duke and Lord Rochester; upon nothing, a Session of the Poets, a Satire on the follies of the men of the age, Timon, a satire on some new plays, and a poem, entitled, The lost mistress, a complaint against the Countess of —, 1675. This was probably the Countess of Shrewsbury, whose Lord he killed in a duel on her account, and who is said to have held the Duke's horse, disguised like a page, during the combat: to reward his prowess in which, she went to bed to him in the skirt stained with her husband's blood. We have also, of the Duke's writing, A demonstration of the Deity: As also Verses on two lines of Mr Edward Howard, printed in the third part of Miscellanies in 1693: And a Letter to Sir Thomas Osborn. All mentioned by the Catalogue of royal and noble Authors. In the Gazetteer for Feb. 24, 1750, was inserted the following challenge, said to be sent by his Grace sometimes (57) to a young Lady on Valentine's day:

Brimfull of anger, not of love,
The Champion sends his Fee One glove:

45 D

(11) See remark [2].

(*) In 1673 his chymist was one Robert Bathurst, an Irishman, a kinsman of Dr Ralph Bathurst, some time President of Trinity-college in Oxford. See the Doctor's article in the Appendix.

(111) Among other unaccountable extravagancies, he fell into a new way of expence, in building in that sort of architecture which Cicero calls rejana substructiones; and himself, when his friends dissuaded him from it, called it his Folly. Fairfax, p. 35.

(1111) Id. p. 39.

(56) Pope's article, &c. item. [Ad].

(57) In the London Magazine for that month the verses are ascribed to the late Dr B—y.

(55) Epist. 3. to Allen Lord Bathurst, ver. 299, et seqq.

But I, that have a double share
Of softer passion, send a pair.
Nor think it, dearest Delia, cruel,
That I invite you to a duel;
Ready to meet you, face to face,
At any time, in any place;

Nor shall I leave you in the lurch,
Though you should dare to fix the Church:
There come equipt with all your charms,
A ring and licence are my arms;
I will th' unequal contest try,
Resolv'd to fight, though sure to die.

P

USHER [JAMES], the pious and learned Archbishop of Armagh in Ireland, was born on the 4th of January, 1580, in the parish of St Nicholas in the city of Dublin, where his father, Mr Arnold Usher, was one of the six Clerks in Chancery, a gentleman of a good estate and reputation, and descended of a very ancient family, which in England bore the name of Nevil, till the reign of Henry II, when it was changed by one of his ancestors, who about the year 1185, passing with Prince [afterwards King] John in quality of Usher into Ireland, settled there by the name of his office (a), and his descendents spreading into several branches, filled the most considerable posts in and about Dublin for many ages (b), to the time of our Author, whose personal merit will appear in the sequel to have reflected an honour upon his descent. He had excellent natural endowments, with a most tractable temper. The first steps of his education were distinguished by some remarkable incidents. Having learned to read from two of his maternal aunts (c), who were both blind from their cradle. He had the good fortune to be prepared at the age of eight years, to be taken into a very good school, opened at that time by two eminent scholars [A], sent by James I, then King of Scotland, to keep up a correspondence with the nobility and gentry about Dublin, in order to secure his interest in that country, in the view of his eventual succession to the Crown of England. Under these masters our young genius advanced so quick in the rudiments of classical learning, that the College of Dublin being compleated in 1593, he was found qualified to be then admitted, at the age of thirteen, the first scholar upon that foundation (d); the charter of which had been obtained from Queen Elizabeth by an uncle of his own name, and his predecessor in the see of Armagh [B]; and Mr James Hamilton,

(b) Parr's Life of our Archbishop, p. 1, Edit. 1686. fol.

(c) That is, sisters to his mother, Margaret, daughter of James Stanyhurst, Esq, Recorder of Dublin, Speaker of the House of Commons in three Parliaments, and a Master in Chancery. Vita Usherii a T. Smith, p. 5, 6, Edit. 1707.

one

[A] Two eminent scholars.] Their names were James Fullerton and James Hamilton, both young Scotch gentlemen. This employment was made use of for a colour; good schoolmasters being then much wanted in Ireland. They were afterwards both knighted by King James; and the first being appointed of the bedchamber to his Majesty, the other was at length created, by that King, Viscount Chandebois. The Archbishop always recounted this as a remarkable instance of God's providence towards him (1).

[B] An uncle of his name, and his predecessor in the see of Armagh.] His name was Henry Usher, he had been bred at Cambridge, from whence he went to Paris to compleat his education. And was at that time Archdeacon of Dublin, having been deputed before to Queen Elizabeth, upon an affair relating to St Patrick's church (2), which he managed with the same success as he afterwards met with in this of the college. Henry Fitz-Simons (of whom hereafter) tells a story, which must rest upon his authority (3), that, when the Archbishop had spent a considerable time in writing a work against Cardinal Bellarmine, all his papers were forced away by his wife, who threw them into the fire, alledging, that the match was unequal between a man who, having a great family of children, was continually interrupted by his domestic affairs, and one who was entirely free from all earthly cares. Mr Bayle (4) has spent a long note to shew, that this Lady's argument, though plausible in the theory, was not well grounded in fact and experience. This, I believe, would be thought meer trifling at this time of day, at least in England, since it is nothing else than giving a list of all the best Protestant writers of our church, some of whom (as Hooker) have been as much exercised by their wives as Socrates. But Bayle (as is well known) frequently launches out into such reasonings chiefly for the sake of some piece of wit, as here he concludes with observing, that Bellarmine had not so much leisure as the Archbishop's lady imagined. 'Here follows, continues he, a passage I met with in a piece, published in 1625 (5). Cardinal Bellarmine, of pious memory, said often to the most illustrious Cardinal Rochefoucault, 'I assure you, my Lord, that I am oppressed with people and visits, and must needs confess there are too many Christians in the world.' Monsignore veramente ci sono troppo Christiani al mondo. But to return to the proper business of this remark, the foundation of Dublin-college; to solicit which our Archdeacon went to England in 1590, and returned to Dublin with the charter, dated March 30, 1592. He was promoted immediately from the archdeaconry, by a rare example, to the primacy in August, 1595, and died April 2, 1613, leaving a son, Robert Usher, who being bred at Dublin-college, was first chosen Fellow, and afterwards, by the interest of his cousin James, unanimously elected Provost of the society in 1629, whence he was advanced to the bishopric of Derry in 1634. But in the Irish rebellion, in 1641, retiring to England, he died there towards the latter end of the next year, at Bridgenorth in Shropshire (6). This is related by Dr Thomas Smith, who likewise observes, that the Dublin-college was first founded by Alexander Bicknor, Archbishop of Dublin, in 1320, and that this foundation being intirely demolished, the first motion in parliament for restoring it was made in 1569, by Dr James Usher's father-in-law, James Stanyhurst, Esq; (7), who died at Dublin, Dec. 27, 1575, aged fifty-one years (8). So that our Archbishop had a double title to the favour mentioned in the text. His father-in-law had a son, named Richard, who, being a man of distinguished learning, and much respected on that account by his nephew, our Archbishop, who held a correspondence with him, deserves some notice to be taken of him here. He was born in Dublin in 1547; and having been bred at school under the famous Peter White (9), became a Commoner of University-college, Oxon. in 1563, where he wrote Commentaries on Porphyry at two years standing. After taking the degree of A. B. he left the college, retired to London, became first a Student in Furnival's Inn, and afterwards in that of Lincoln, where spending some time in the study of the common law, he then returned to Ireland. But resolving to change his religion, he went into the Low-countries, France, and elsewhere, being then a married man. Upon the death of his wife, he was made Chaplain to the Archduke of Austria, who gave him a handsome salary. He died at Brussels in 1618, with the character of an excellent Theologian, Grecian, Philosopher, Historian, and Orator (10). He is the Author of the following pieces: 1st, Harmonia, sive catena Dialectica in Porphyrianas constitutiones (11), Lond. 1570, fol. 2d, De rebus in Hibernia gestis (12), lib. 4. Antw. 1584. 4to. To which is annexed, Rerum Hibernicarum Appendix ex Silvestro Giraldo Cambrensi collecta cum annotationibus adjectis. 3d, Descriptio Hiberniae, of which an English translation was inserted in Holingshead's Chronicle, Vol. I. Lond. 1586, fol. 4th, De vita S. Patricii Hiberniae Apostoli, lib. 2. Antw. 1587. 5th, Hebdomada Mariana, ex orthodoxii catholicae Rom. ecclesiae patribus collecta &c. Antw. 1609, 8vo. 6th, Hebdomada Eucharistica, Duac. 1614, 8vo. 7th, Brevis praemunitio pro futura concertatione cum Jacobo Usserio (13), Duaci. 1615, in about three sheets 8vo. 8th, The principles of the Catholic religion. 9th, He also translated into English heroical blank verse, the first four books of Virgil's Aeneis, Lond.

(6) Jacobi Usherii vita, a T. Smith, p. 11.

(7) Id. p. 7.

(8) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 443.

(9) He was born in Ireland, became Fellow of Oriel college in Oxford in 1551, and A. M. in 1556, and Dean of Waterford, from both which being ejected for Popery by Queen Elizabeth, he afterwards taught school at Munster, and was much encouraged by the Popish gentry and nobility. Id. col. 249.

(10) Camden files him Eruditissimus ille nobilissimus Ricb. Staniburghus. In Hibernia, in com. West-Meath.

(11) This being communicated to Edm. Campian before it went to the press, he gave a great character of the Author. In Epist. suis editis. Ingolst. 1602, p. 50.

(12) Dedicated to his brother, Baron of Dunfany.

(13) This piece accordingly was to have been followed by another, which was expected by our Author in vain. See remark [O].

1583,

(a) This was a practice much used in those early ages, to which no doubt the ambition of founding a family was the great motive.

(d) There were three admitted; but Usher's name is still standing at the head of all in the College-Register. Letter 240 in Parr's Collection. Sir James Ware says, they were admitted in this order, Walsh, Usher, Lec.

(1) Parr's life of Usher, as above, p. 2.

(2) The affair of St Patrick's church related to its revenues, which he saved out of the hands of Sir John Perrot, then Deputy, who had resolved to seize them for the public service. Usherii vita, a T. Smith, p. 10.

(3) In Britonoma-ch. Ministrom, lib. 3. cap. 6. p. 348.

(4) Note [B] in the article of Henry Usher.

(5) Intituled Responseaux demandes d'un grand prelat touchant la hierarchie de l'eglise, & la juste defense des privilegies & des religieux, p. 204, 205.

one of his schoolmasters, being at the same time made Senior Fellow of the Society, and a Professor of Philosophy, was appointed his tutor (e). In the beginning of his studies he was particularly fond of poetry, and lost too much time in diversions (f); but was reclaimed by a passage he luckily met with in Cicero (g), which putting him upon the perusal of Sleidan de quatuor Monarchiis: this gave him a strong inclination to the study of history, which he prosecuted with an almost unexampled vigour. In this pursuit, beginning at fourteen years of age to make extracts from all the historical books he could meet with, he placed the facts in a chronological order for the assistance of his memory [C]. In the mean time, he did not neglect the necessary academical sciences, and having made a suitable progress in logick and the Aristotelian philosophy, he took the degree of A. B. in 1586 (b), and immediately applied himself to the study of divinity, chiefly upon the controverted points between the Roman Catholic and Reformed Churches, his country being then mostly inclined to Popery. However, in 1598, he held the part of Respondent with great applause in the philosophy act, that was performed in compliment to the Earl of Essex, upon his first coming over Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (i), and Chancellor of the University of Dublin. Our student the same year, upon the death of his father, who had designed him for his own profession, the Common Law (k), discovered an uncommon degree of resolution and firmness of mind. The paternal estate, which descended to him as eldest son and heir, he resigned, though of considerable value, to his younger brother [D]: and reserving only so much of it as was necessary to support him in a studious life at the college, he followed his own inclination in devoting himself to the profession of divinity, and being thereby qualified by the statutes (E), he was admitted Fellow of the Society. The proficiency he made in this study, was answerable to his resolution. At the age of eighteen, our stripling entered the lists with Henry Fitz-Simons, a learned Jesuit, then prisoner in the castle of Dublin, who had given a general challenge to defend Bellarmin's principles against any opposer [F]. The next 1583, 8vo. To which he subjoined an English translation of certain psalms of David [the four first] according to the observation of the Latin verses, that is without rhyme. 10th, Poetical conceits, Lond. 1583, in Latin and English. 11th, Certain epitaphs, framed as well in Latin as English, one of which is upon his Father. Mr Wood tells us, that he and Gab. Hervey were esteemed by some to be the best Poets for Iambics in their age (14).

[C] For the assistance of his memory. Dr Parr informs us (15), that, between the age of fifteen and sixteen, he had drawn up, in Latin, an exact chronicle of the Bible as far as to the book of Kings, not much different from the method of his annals, only in the enlargement by some more accurate observations and synchronisms of heathen annals.

[D] He resigned the paternal estate to his younger brother. Dr Parr is still our informer, who intimates, that this step was not taken out of an inconsiderate juvenile rashness, but was the effect of a mature deliberation, upon viewing the condition of the estate, which he found greatly incumbered with law-suits, besides being loaded with sisters portions. That he wrote out a complete terrier of all the estate and leases, and, to obviate the censure of doing any thing rashly and with precipitation, he drew up an exact state of all the law-suits and incumbrances that lay upon it, with directions what to do in them, transmitting it to his uncle as guardian for his brother and sisters, to be managed for their advantage, which was performed so well, that most of his sisters (of whom he had no less than seven) were afterwards very well married, and some of them to persons that proved eminently considerable in church and state (16). Add to this, that our Author, besides something for his support at the college, reserved a sum to purchase books sufficient to carry on his studies. His younger brother, named Ambrose, was also a very deserving youth, and, being bred at Cambridge, early attained a great skill and perfection in the oriental tongues, and rendered a great part of the Old Testament from the original Hebrew into English before King James's translation was made (17), the manuscript of which Dr Parr had seen, being then lodged in the hands of his nephew, Sir Theophilus Yong, Knt. one of his Majesty's privy council in Ireland. Mr Usher also translated, out of Latin into English, his brother's treatise De Christiana in ecclesiam successione et statu, the manuscript of which was then extant. We have a Latin letter to the Archbishop, written April 9, 1607, by one William Eyre, Fellow of Emanuel college in Cambridge, a good judge of oriental learning, wherein Ambrose's skill in the Arabic tongue is strongly intimated, as follows: Interea vero hec, agnosco me valde obaratum esse et tibi, et dulcissimo fratri tuo Ambrosio, qui peritissima manu sua quaedam in usum meum ex Alcorano Arabice exscripsit (18). These early productions gave room to expect many others, had not he been prevented by his death, which cut him off in his youth (19).

[E] Qualified by the statutes. By the first draught of the statutes all the fellowships were appropriated to Divinity, which was afterwards altered by the directions of Dr Bedel, the second Provost (after Mr Temple (20)). I suppose, says that Provost in a letter to our Archbishop, it hath been an error all this while to neglect the faculties of law and physic, and attend only to the ordering of one poor college of Divines. I did communicate the plan of the four faculties (21) to my Lord of Canterbury—who seemed not to dislike it, but required it should be maturely thought of by your Grace and the University, in which case he promised his assistance, if it was judged fit. At that time I left with him the statutes of our College, which I had this winter written out with mine own hand, and caused to be fair bound (22).

[F] He held a dispute with Henry Fitz-Symonds &c. This challenge by Fitz-Symonds is in the dedication of a piece already quoted (23), where he declares he offered to maintain such particulars as were thought by the Protestants to be the weakest in the Romish doctrine, and to attack all those points which they thought to be the strongest in their doctrine. ‘Douce ego (says he) causæ bonitate suffultus defendere quicquid inter nos infirmissimum, vel impugnare quicquid inter ipsos tutissimum reputant, in me recipere. The Jesuit then proceeds to give an account of his dispute in these terms: Sed neque in specula eminentem videre, neque in castris, clausisque Stentoria ut agnoscent voce provocantem, exaudire voluerunt. Prodit quidem semel in summa vocis vultusque trepidatione ostendarius præceci sapientiae (non tamen male ut videlatur indolis) juvenis, nescio an auræ populavis cupidior, saltem de abstrusissimis rebus Theologicis, cum adhuc philosophica studia non esset emensus, nec Ephæbis egressus, disputandi avidus &c. Hunc autem Jussi suorum calculos adferre, quibus pugil seu agonista idoneus renunciaretur, et vel cum ipso disputationem me intarum. Sed sicut hsi cum minime tanto honore dignati sunt, ita me vicissim sua concepi præsentia dignatus ipse non fuit (24). But no body would hear me, though I called with a voice as loud as Stentor to the contest. Only there once came to me a youth of about eighteen, very forward in his understanding, who shewed a very strong desire of disputing upon the most abstruse points of Divinity, though he had not yet completed his course of philosophy, nor arrived to manhood. But when I asked him if he had leave from his Superiors, promising in that case to enter the lists with him, the young man, not being honoured with any such commission, had nothing to shew, and returned no more. Thus the Jesuit; but the matter is related by another author, as follows: Henry Fitz-Simon, the Jesuit, challenging his adversaries to meet him in the castle of Dublin, this beardless youth combated so bravely and frequently that veteran in the main article of his cause, viz. Antichrist, that he repented his having challenged him, and met with opponents sufficient in this one youth, who was but eighteen years old. Cum Henrico Simonide

(e) Letter 14c, p. 412, of his Life by Dr Parr.

(g) The passage was this, Nescire quid ante quam natus sit, accidit id est semper esse puerum. Id. ibid.

(i) Parr, p. 5.

(k) Smith, p. 18.

(f) Smith tells us, he was much addicted to card-playing. Vite Illustrum Viror. 1700, 4to, in Vita Usserii, l. 15.

(b) Vite, anno ætatis decimo septimo. Vita a F. Smith, 16.

(14) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 442.

(15) In the Abp's life, p. 3.

(16) Ibid. p. 6.

(17) Dr Smith mentions a Latin translation of Surata Carverna from the Alcoran, some Hebrew and Arabic collections, and an Arabic lexicon, besides some tracts upon various points of Theology of his writing, which are extant in the archives of Dublin-college library. Vita Usserii, p. 9.

(18) Collection of letters by Dr Parr, No. III.

(19) Smith, as before.

(20) Grandfather to Sir W. Temple. See his article.

(21) That is apparently, Philosophy or Arts, Law, Physic, and Divinity.

(22) This letter is dated in 1628, and is the 126th in Dr Parr's collection.

(23) In note (3).

(24) Prefatio Britten-moch. p. 14.

(1) He was much pleased with this office, and spoke of it with pleasure after he became Archbishop. Epist. to Archbishop Laud techumens in the next year, 1600, he proceeded A. M. was appointed Proctor (1), and chosen Catechetical Lecturer of the University (m). — About the same time having met with Stapleton's Fortress of Faith, he tasked himself to read the Fathers [G] thoroughly, being resolved to examine the in Parr's Collection, p. 459.

(m) It is observable, that the famous Origen was appointed to the like office of instructing the school of Alexandria at the same age. Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. 6. c. 3.

Jesuita poscente sibi dari adversarios in castro Dubliniensi de arce causæ suæ, scil. Antichristo sapius quidem conflixit — This Author then proceeds thus: Ipsum audite Jesuitam in præfatione libri sui quem de Britannomachia ministrorum placuit inscribere. Prodiit quidem semel inquit octodenarius, and so on as before to the words disputandi avidus, at which he stops with an &c. (25). Whereupon Mr Bayle remarks pertinently enough, 'The Reader, says he, will please to take notice of the &c. where he must not suppose the rest to be omitted as being of no use to the subject; for the only reason why they were suppressed is, because they are inconsistent with what was said before (26).' However, Dr Thomas Smith has made it sufficiently evident, that there was a dispute between them (27): And Dr Parr informs us (28), that the subject was Bellarmin's controversies; and because the several matters in debate could not be disputed in one or two meetings, they appointed to meet once a week; and besides gives us the following letter of Mr Usher to Fitz-Simonds, which shews that, after a few meetings, the Jesuit declined the combat.

'I was not purposed, Mr Fitz-Simonds, to write unto you, before you had first written unto me, concerning some chief points of your religion, as at our last meeting you promised. But, seeing you have deferred the same (for reasons best known to yourself) I thought it not amiss to enquire further of your mind concerning the continuation of the conference begun betwixt us. And to this I am the rather moved, because I am credibly informed of certain reports, which I could hardly be persuaded should proceed from him, who in my presence pretended so great love and affection to me. If I am a boy (as it hath pleased you very contemptuously to name me) I give thanks to the Lord, that my carriage towards you hath been such as could minister no just occasion to despise my youth. Your spear belike is, in your own conceit, a weaver's beam, and your abilities such, that you desire to encounter with the stoutest champion in the host of Israel; and therefore, like the Philistine, you contemn me as being a boy. Yet this I would fain have you know, that I neither came then, nor do come now unto you, in any confidence of any learning that is in me (in which respect notwithstanding, I thank God, I am what I am) but I come in the name of the Lord of hosts, whose companies you have reproached, being certainly persuaded, that even out of the mouths of babes and sucklings he was able to shew forth his own praises; for the further manifestation whereof, I do again earnestly request you, that, setting aside all vain comparison of persons, we may go plainly forward in examining the matters that rest in controversy between us. Otherwise I hope you will not be displeased if, as for your part you have begun, so, I also, for my own part, may be bold, for the clearing of myself, and the truth which I profess, freely to make known what hath already passed concerning this matter. Thus intreating you in a few lines to make known unto me your purpose in this behalf, I end; praying the Lord that both this and all other enterprizes that we take in hand may be so ordered, as may most make for the advancement of his own glory and the kingdom of his son Jesus Christ.

'Tuas ad aras usquæ,

'James Usher.'

Dr Parr observes, with the Author of Collectio Batefiana, that the same Jesuit, living to understand our Author better, styles him A catholicorum Doctissimus (29). And to form a judgment of the value of this testimony of our Author's literary merit, it will be necessary to enquire into the worth and credit of the witness. Henry Fitz-Simon was the most noted Jesuit in his time, if we may believe the Oxford Antiquary, who informs us, that he was an Irishman born, and the son of a merchant in Dublin, that he was matriculated at Oxford as a member of Hart-hall [now Hertford-college] April 26, 1583, and in that of his age, fourteen. That in December following it seems probable that he was elected Student of Christ-church (30): But that he did not stay long at the University, which he left without taking any degree, being come to a resolution to change the church of England for that of Rome. In which disposition he crossed the sea, and entered himself in the Society of Jesus at Louvain, where putting himself under the instructions of the famous Leonard Lessius (31), he made such a quick proficiency, that he became eminent enough, in a short time, to be himself a Teacher, especially in Philosophy, which he taught publicly for several years. At length, returning to his native country of Ireland, he made it his business, as a missionary, to gain profelytes to his religion. To which end he had both private conferences and public disputes with Protestant ministers. In this work he persisted for two years without disturbance, being esteemed the chief disputant among those of his party, and so ready and quick, that few or none would undertake to deal with him. In fine, being apprehended for a dangerous person, he was committed to safe custody in Dublin-castle in 1599, where he continued about five years. Though confinement hindered him from proceeding to spread his principles, yet did it not break his resolution, or damp his courage and good-will for the cause. On the contrary, he was no sooner fixed in a prison, than he said, that, being a prisoner, he was like a bear tied to a stake, and wanted some to bait him; which expression being looked on as a challenge, was taken up by our Author, then Mr James Usher. Afterwards, at the end of the five years, being set at liberty, on his promise to behave quietly, and give no disturbance to the King and kingdom, he went forthwith into voluntary exile into the Low-countries, where he spent his time in performing offices requisite to his function, and in writing books, particularly, A catholic confutation of Mr John Rider's claim of antiquities, and a calming comfort against his carceat, with a reply to Mr Rider's postscripts, and a discovery of Puritan partiality in his behalf. To which is annexed, An answer to certain complaintive letters of afflicted Catholics for religion. All printed together in quarto, at Roan, in 1608, in which year he went, according to summons, to Rome, where being appointed for the mission of Ireland, he published his profession of the four vows; and then, being sent back to the Low-countries, he went again into Ireland, where he spent many years, in confirming the Roman catholics in their religion, and in making new profelytes. At length, having been a great encourager and abettor of the rebellion which broke out there in 1641, he was, after the rebels began to be subdued, forced to fly for shelter into woods and on mountains, and to creep and skulk into every place, for fear of being taken and hanged by the English soldiers. In the beginning of the year 1643 he was forced to change his place, and retire for safety into a moorish and boggy ground, where sheltering himself under a shepherd's cot, no better than a hovel, which did not keep out the wind and rain, he lived there in a very sorry condition, and had for his bedding a pad of straw, which would be often wet by the rising and coming in of the water. Notwithstanding all this misery he seemed to be very cheerful, and was ready to instruct the young ones about him, and comfort others. But being in a manner spent, and his age not able to bear such misery long, he was with great difficulty taken away, and being conveyed by some of the brethren into a better place, he expired among them on the calends of February the same year 1643-4. By his death, concludes this writer, the Roman catholics lost a pillar of their church, being esteemed, in the better part of his life, a great ornament among them, and the greatest defender of their religion in his time (32). Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote A justification and Exposition of the Sacrifice of the Mass, in two books, or more, printed in 1611, 4to. And Britannomachia ministrorum in plerisque & fidei fundamentis & fidei articulis dissidentium. Duac. 1614, 4to. As also a third piece, which was A Catalogue of the Irish Saints.

[G] He was put upon reading the Fathers by Stapleton's Fortress. That the Archbishop should be particularly moved to enter into so long and laborious a study by Stapleton's book, is easily accounted for from the great reputation

(30) One of both his names was then elected a Student there.

(31) This famous Jesuit was born in the parish of Brechtan, near Antwerp, in 1554, taught Philosophy and Theology at Louvain with reputation, and died in 1623. We have a treatise De Justitia & Jure, by him, and other works, which make two volumes folio in Latin. Ladvoocat's Diction. Portatif, 2d edit. Paris, 1755, in 2 Vols. 8vo.

(25) Vita Jacobi Ufferii in collectione Batefiana, p. 737. Lond. 1681, 4to.

(26) Bayle, in our Author's article, rem. [A].

(27) In vita Ufferii, p. 19, 20, 21.

(28) In our Author's life, p. 6.

(29) His life, p. 7, 8. And Collect. Batefiana, page 737.

(32) Ath. Oxon: Vol. II, col. 457 46.

the truth of that learned Author's quotations from them. He spent eighteen years in this study [H] without interruption, only by way of refreshment, spending some hours occasionally reputation of the Author, who was esteemed the most learned Roman catholic of all his time. He was son of William Stapleton, and born in 1535, of a genteel family at Hensfield in Suffex. He received the first part of his education under one John Twine, a noted schoolmaster at Canterbury, and being removed thence to Wykeham's school at Winchester, he went in the ordinary course to New-college in Oxford, of which he was admitted perpetual Fellow in 1591, and made Prebendary or Canon of Chichester a little before the death of Queen Mary, being then only Bachelor of Arts. But, upon the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the crown, religion beginning to put on another face, the Canon, as well as his father and family, left the kingdom, and went to Louvain, where being settled, he applied himself with great zeal to the study of Theology, and in a short time making great proficiency therein, he went to Paris to compleat his knowledge in the sacred tongues. Afterwards he took a journey to Rome, from a motive of devotion, says my Author; however, he made no long stay there, but returning to Louvain, he set about writing an answer to Bishop Jewel, and translating Bede's church history into English, to the end that Queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated it, might see and understand the ancient faith and religion of our ancestors, &c. This service to his church being finished, he left Louvain, and removed to Doway, which University had been erected a little before. Thither he hastened at the request of Dr William Allen, President of the English college there, and for a time performed the office of Catechist Reader at Ancbine, near that place. Afterwards he took the degrees of Bachelor, Licentiate, and Doctor of Divinity, under Matthew Galien, Provost of the church of St Amoure, and Chancellor of the University of Dorway, who collated him to a canonry in that church; and he was also made Regius Professor of Divinity in the University. However, he resigned both these preferments some time after, and entered into the Society of Jesus at Doway: but, upon a long and diligent probation, finding that order not to agree with his temper and course of life, he quitted it, and returned to his former way of teaching, (to the great joy of many) and became a Canon once more of the church of St Amoure. At length, being called to Louvain, he was made King's Professor of Divinity, and Canon of the church of St Peter there, and writing several things, particularly against Mr Whitaker of Cambridge, his fame spread over all those parts, and he grew into great esteem with the King of Spain, so that he had the deanery of Hilverbeck in Kampenland in Brabant conferred upon him: [Little enough, God wot, for such a rare and most learned clerk as he was] says Mr Wood, who repeats it again, that in all kind of literature he obtained such perfection, that he was numbered among the most learned men of that age. And it was generally thought, continues our Antiquary, that he deserved a Cardinal's cap before Allen; but so it was, that his ability being eclipsed by the activity of the other, he did not rise higher than a Dean. In the possession of this dignity, and his professorship and canonry at Louvain, having lived to the age of sixty-three years, he expired there, greatly lamented by all learned Roman catholics, on the 12th of October, 1598, and was interred in the church of St Peter in the same city, where soon after a monument was erected to his memory, with a large inscription thereon, containing the succession of his employments in the universities and church, as well in England as beyond sea. He wrote and translated many things, most of which were printed in four large volumes in folio, at Paris, in 1620. The titles of them are in the first volume. 1. De principiis fidei doctrinalibus, lib. 12. Paris, 1579 and 1582, &c. 2. Defensio successionis ecclesiasticæ, lib. 1. 3. Reflexio principiorum fidei doctrinalium, Antw. 1592. 4. Defensio autoritatis ecclesiasticæ, contra Gul. Whitakerum, Anglo-Calvinistam. 5. Triplicatio pro ecclesiæ autoritate, adversus eundem Whitakerum. The second volume contains, 1. De universæ justificationis doctrina hodie controversæ, lib. 12. 2. Speculum pravitatis hereticæ per orationes quasi ad oculos demonstratæ, Duac. 1580. 3. Orationes Fanebræ, Antw. 1577. 4. Orationes academicæ miscellanæ; some of which were published in 1602. 5. Orationes Catecheticæ, sive manuale peccatorum de septem peccatis capitalibus, Antw. 1598. 6. De magnitudine Romanæ ecclesiæ, lib. 2. Antw. 1599, in 4to. 7. A Fortress of Faith, first planted among us Englishmen, and continued hitherto in the universal church of Christ, the faith of which times the Protestants call Papistry, Antw. 1565, 4to. This learned treatise the Author, as before intimated, wrote upon occasion of his translating Bede's church history into English, wherein he endeavours to shew, that the same faith was professed in the primitive times as in his. This being read over several times by Archbishop Usher, then Bachelor of Arts, some mistrust of the quotations of ancient authors therein put him upon reading the Fathers. 8. The Horn-blast: or A Reply to the answer of Robert Horne, the false Bishop of Winchester, in four books, Lovain, 1567. 9. A discourse of Protestancy and the mit Authors of it. In volume the third are, 1. Antidota Evangelica in Matthæum, Marcum, Lucam, Johannem, Antw. 1595. 2. Antidota Apostolica in Acta Apostolorum, Tom. I. Antw. 1595. 3. In Epist. Pauli ad Romanos, Tom. II. Ibid. 1595. 4. In duas Epist. ad Corinthios, Tom. III. Ibid. 1598 and 1600. The fourth volume is filled with, 1. Promptuarium in Evangelia Dominicalia; pars hyemalis, Antw. 1591, pars æstivalis, Venet. 1594. 2. Promptuarium Catholicum in Evangelia Dominicalia totius anni, Col. 1592 et 1602. 3. Promptuarium Catholicum supra Evangelia Ferialia totius quadrages. 4. Promptuarium Catholicum super Evangelia in festis S. S. totius anni. 5. Tres Thomæ, seu res gestæ S. Thomæ Apost. S. Tho. [a Becket] Archiepiscop. Cantuariensis, et Thomæ Mori Angliæ Cancellarii, Duac. 1588.

Besides the pieces contained in these four volumes, our Author wrote A Treatise de Justificatione, printed at Paris in 1582. As also A Return of untruths, against Mr Jewel, Antw. 1566. His translation from the Latin into English of Venerable Bede's history of the church of England beforementioned was printed at Antwerp in 1565. This translation, to which he added some marginal notes, was censured by the learned Selden (33) as not altogether true. Stapleton also translated Frederic Staphyle's large volume De diffidiis Hæreticorum, printed at Antwerp in 1565. It is remarked, to the honour of his works, that Pope Clement VIII. was so much delighted with them, that he commanded them to be read daily at times of his recreation, or meal-times, and invited him to Rome, with a design to confer upon him the place of Apostolical Prothonotary, or, as some said, to make him a Cardinal. Among which high order the famous Cardinal Perron, who was well read in the controversies of his time, was wont to postpone all controversial writers in comparison with Stapleton, whom he esteemed to be the best of his time and before. To conclude, passing by all the commendations given him by those of his own faith and persuasion, it is sufficient for his fame to mention those of his antagonist Whitaker, who says in Latin, Stapletonus hanc causam (de traditionibus) omnium acutissime ac accuratissime tractavit, &c. (34). And elsewhere, speaking of the opinion, as well of Papists as Protestants, in divers matters, he saith modestly of himself, that he differed as much from Stapleton as Troilus from Achilles.

[H] He spent eighteen years in reading the Fathers.] In prosecuting this study, his method was to make notes and observations upon their writings, taking them in order, and marking the passages, which were genuine, and which spurious and forged. In this compass of time he not only read the Greek and Latin Fathers, but most of the considerable Schoolmen and Divines from the first to the thirteenth century. He intended to have published these collections under the title of Bibliotheca Theologica, after a book of that title published by one Johannes Melanus, Professor of Divinity at Louvain (35). This appears from his Epistle to the Reader, prefixed to his answer to the challenge of Malone the Jesuit (36), where, having given an account of the chronological catalogue annexed to the end of that treatise, apparently drawn from this store, he proceeds thus: 'The exact discussion, as well of the Author's times as of the censure of their works, I refer to my Theological Bibliothecque, if God hereafter shall lend me life and leisure to make up that work for the use of those that mean to give themselves to that noble study of the doctrines and rites of the ancient church.' And how much he desired it might be done appears from hence, that, being asked upon his death-bed what his will was

(33) Selden's Preface to the Decem Scriptorem, p. 9, 10. Edit. 1632.

(34) In contr. 1. q. 3. cap. 3. In epist. dedicat. lib. de Scriptura.

(35) See his letter to his uncle, Mr Richard Stanyhurst, at the English college there, desiring him to procure this book for him. Letter 1 in Parr's collection.

(36) This answer was printed at London in 1625, in 4to, and again in 1631. Malone published a reply about 1625, which was sufficed with many false citations from the Fathers, or collections of supposititious authors, and also forged records and lying legends, that the Archbishop intended to make any more of; but an answer was wrote by Dr Thomas Dr Smith, and Mr Turck, Parr, p. 25.

(n) He was ordained Deacon and Priest the same day (Sunday before Christmas-day) by his uncle, Henry Usher, Archbishop of Armagh, who had dispensed with his want of age, which was allowed by the Canons in case of extraordinary merit. Smith, p. 23, who tells us he had preached before the State for some time without orders.

(37) The transcript of Dr Langbaine is in the Bodleian library; and the original, in our Author's handwriting, was once in the possession of Dr Edward Stillington, Dean of St Paul's in 1636. Parr, p. 12, 13.

(38) In vita Usherii, p. 25, 26. See more of this in remark [SS].

sionally in searching into, and collecting the antiquities of his country [I]. - In 1601, he entered into holy orders (n), and was in a little time appointed Afternoon Preacher on Sundays before the State at Christ-Church in Dublin. In the course of this duty, he preached a remarkable Sermon against granting a toleration to the Papists [K]. In 1603, a collection of eighteen hundred pounds being made to buy books for his college-library, he was pitched upon, with Dr Chaloner, to execute that trust [L]. This brought him into England, where he became acquainted with Sir Thomas Bodley, who being then upon the like employ for his new erected library at Oxford, they mutually assisted each other (o). In 1606, the like business of purchasing books and manuscripts relating to the English history (in which study our Author was then engaged) brought him again into England [M]. And the following year, he proceeded Bachelor of Divinity, and was chosen Professor of that faculty in his college (p). He was also promoted to the Chancellorship of the cathedral of St Patrick the same year [N]. In 1609, he wrote his treatise about Hermage and Corban lands [O], not only in Ireland, but in England, whither he came a third time this year to buy books, and consult MSS. upon the subject of history and antiquities. In which search, he visited, among others, the libraries in both the Universities, and contracted an acquaintance with most of the Literati in that way [P] here. In the same manner he con-

(o) Dr Smith observes, that Sir Thomas must have been very serviceable on this occasion to our Author, who was then only twenty-three years of age. Vita Usherii, p. 28.

(p) He held this place thirteen years, and read lectures weekly, but they are all lost. They were written chiefly upon the points in dispute with the Papists. Parr, p. 10, 11.

concerning those collections, he answered to this effect, 'That he desired they might be committed to his dear friend Dr Langbaine; Provost of Queen's college, Oxford, the only man on whose learning as well as friendship he could rely, to cast them into such a form as might render them fit for the press. They were accordingly put into the hands of that learned Doctor, who in order thereto had them transcribed (37), and then set himself to fill up the breaches in the original, the quotations in the margin being much defaced with rats. But the Doctor, studying in severe cold weather in the public library, contracted a cold, which put an end to his life in 1657, while he was upon this task; and Dean Fell afterwards endeavoured to get it finished, but in vain.

[I] He spent some time in collecting the antiquities of his country.] In his letter to his uncle Stanyhurst afore-cited he writes thus: 'Besides my main studies, I have ' destined, as a kind of recreation, to spend some time ' in gathering together the scattered antiquities of our ' nation, whereof I doubt not but many relicks are ' come into your hands, which I would very willingly ' hear of.' And then, running over several, he particularly insists upon a copy of the life of St Patrick (which he observes is in manuscript in the Jesuit's college at Louvain) not only because the Author seemed to be of some antiquity, but as he alledged several sentences out of St Patrick's own writings. ' If any of our countrymen, ' continues he, studious of such matters, will be pleased ' to communicate either that or any other antiquities ' of like nature, I do promise that I will take as much ' pains for him, and make full recompense of courtesie ' in the same kind.'

[K] Sermon against granting a toleration to the Papists.] The text was from Ezechiel, c. iv. v. 6. And thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year, which he applied to Ireland. From this year, says he, I reckon forty years, and then these whom you now embrace shall be your ruin, and you shall bear their iniquity. This conjecture at that time seemed to be the present thoughts of a young man who was no friend to Popery; but when the Irish rebellion broke out in 1641, and so many thousand Protestants were killed, and the whole nation harassed by a bloody war, some persons then alive, who heard this sermon, began to think the preacher a young prophet. Our Author was particularly lucky in some other such predictions, insomuch that there is a treatise extant de prædictionibus Usherii. Dr Smith (38) has thought proper (how judiciously I refer to others) to censure these fumes of our Author as proceeding from a vain humour to dive into the mystical sense of Scripture, and an idle pretence of being endued with a prophetic spirit. But such kind of predictions being only a judicious conjecture and foresight, it seems more to the purpose of his character, that, in this passage of his sermon, he put the non-toleration of Popery upon the intolerant persecuting spirit of that religion, dissuading a toleration thereof upon reasons of danger to the state, and not solely upon its idolatry. The use of this will appear presently.

[L] He was appointed with Dr Chaloner to that trust.] The money was raised by the English army, after having defeated the Spaniards that had come to the assistance of the Irish at Kingsale: And it was resolved by the benefactors that these two should be employed to buy the books. They discharged the trust to the satisfaction of the donors and the whole college (39). Our Author always testified the greatest regard for the benefit of the college in every point, as is evident from many of his letters. He was Vice-chancellor several years, and frequently corresponded with Abbot and Laud, the two succeeding Chancellors. But it seems to have been during his absence upon this occasion that his mother was reconciled to the Romish religion, a misfortune which gave him the most afflicting concern, and the more as she continued obstinate therein to the last, dying at Drogheda in the communion of that church (40). The same writer observes (41), that her father, the Recorder, though outwardly a conformist to the new religion, after its establishment by Queen Elizabeth, yet still retained his old affection for Popery, as appears from his supporting first in his own house Edmund Campian, afterwards the famous Jesuit, then a refugee from England, and in the next place recommending him to a friend in the country, where he might be secure from the danger of being seized (42) and brought to justice for treasonable practices, in drawing her Majesty's subjects from their allegiance. The Recorder took care however to manage so prudently, as to give no umbrage to the government, and by that means continued unmolested in his post.

[M] The same business brought him again to England.] He now contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendship with several learned men, and among others, Sir Robert Cotton, Thomas Allen of Oxford, and Mr Camden (43), which last designing a new edition of his Britannia, consulted with him about publishing Nimias, St Patrick, and Congal, and other things relating to the ancient state of Ireland and the city of Dublin (44), a great part of the answers to which were inserted in the edition of our Author: For many of these things concerning Dublin I acknowledge myself indebted to the diligence and labour of James Usher, Chancellor of the church of St Patrick, who in various learning and judgment far exceeds his years (45).

[N] Chancellor of St Patrick's.] This place was conferred upon him by Dr Adam Loftus, then Archbishop of Dublin. It was his first ecclesiastical preferment; he had no other till his promotion to the bishoprick of Meath. Dr Parr observes, that though he had no particular obligation by this post to preach, yet he would not omit it in the place whence he received the profits, viz. Finlasi, not far from Dublin, which he endowed with a vicarage, and preached there every Sunday, unless hindered by very extraordinary occasions.

[O] His treatise about Hermage and Corban lands.] These were lands anciently received by the Chorepiscopi (46). Archbishop Bancroft, to whom this treatise was addressed, presented it to King James. The manuscript is still extant in the library at Lambeth, but the substance of it was translated into Latin, and published at the end of his dissertation de Corbis, &c. in the first part of his glossary, by Sir Henry Spelman, who gives our Author the character of Literarum insignis Pharus.

[P] He became acquainted with most of the Literati here.] Among these were Henry Bourchier, afterwards Earl of Bath, Sir Henry Saville, Henry Briggs, John Selden, John Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, Samuel Ward, afterwards Master of Sidney-college in Cambridge, and lastly Thomas Lydiat, famous for his chronological writings against Joseph Scaliger, and being now much reduced in his fortune, the Archbishop carried him to

(39) Parr, p. 11.

(40) Idem, p. 8, 9, who says her change happened during our Author's absence in England, but without specifying the particular time.

(41) P. 6.
(42) Epist. III. in the select pieces of Edmund Campian, edit. Antwerp, 1631. See also Campian's preface to his Hist. of Ireland, published from a MS. in our Archbishop's library, by Sir James Ware, at Dublin, 1633.

(43) Smith, p. 29. See an account of Thomas Allen in Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 574, et seq.
(44) Usher's letter to Camden, No. 61. p. 76. in the Collection of Camden's letters, Edit. Lond. 1691.

(45) Camden's Britannia, Lond. 1607, Folio, p. 752.

(46) These lands were free from all taxes and secular jurisdiction, but liable to services and pensions to the Bishops, which not being performed, they ceded from their right. Dr Smith says they were first called Termon-lands, either as belonging to the monks, or as being separated from lay lands by boundaries, called Termini. Vita Usherii, p. 31.

tinued ever after to make once in three or four years a visit to London, passing one month of his stay in the summer at Oxford, and another at Cambridge. Thus eager in the

(47) The Primate, in some of his letters to Lydiat, subscribes your loving brother-in-law, particularly letter XXI, and others in Parr's collections, viz. on the 26th and 27th of March.

(48) Our Author, in a letter to Usher, calls it Alkerton. Letter XX. in Parr's collection.

(49) He took that of A. B. May 5, 1595, and A. M. February 5, 1593. Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 150 and 154.

(50) Dedication to his Lordship of a Sermon preached at a Visitation while he was rural Dean.

(51) There was a design of presenting him to the free-school at Armagh, the salary of which was raised for that purpose to 50l. per annum at least. Lydiat's letter to Usher, dated from the Inner Temple, Aug. 22, 1611, and Usher's answer, Oct. 4 the same year. Letters V. and VII. in Parr's Collection &c.

Ireland, where he afterwards married his Grace's sister (47). He was the son of Christian Lydiat, Lord of the manor of Aulkrynton (48), commonly called Okerton, near Banbury in Oxfordshire, and citizen of London. Thomas was born at Okerton, in the beginning of the year 1572, and discovering pregnant parts from his infancy, was, by the application of his father, elected at about thirteen years of age one of the children of Wykeham's college near Winchester, whence, according to the statutes of the two foundations, he was removed to New college in Oxford, and chosen Probationer-fellow in 1591: At which time being under the tuition of Dr (afterwards Sir) Henry Marten, he made great proficiency in Logick, and two years afterwards was admitted Veni. Suius. After he had taken the degrees in arts (49), he applied himself to Astronomy, Mathematics, the learned languages, and Divinity; the last of which he was very desirous to have made his principal study, and took holy orders, as the statutes of the college require; but, finding a great defect in his memory and utterance, of which he often complained, particularly to Dr Bancroft, Bishop of Oxford, his Diocesan (50), he resolved to resign his fellowship, as he did in 1603, and retiring to his patrimony at Okerton, and contenting himself with the revenues thereof, though but small, he prosecuted his studies with indefatigable diligence, and spent seven years in finishing and publishing such books as he had begun in the college. He was thus employed, when his merit coming to the knowledge of Prince Henry, his royal highness appointed him his Chronographer and Cosmographer. He was possessed of these honours in 1609, when publishing his capital book De emendatione temporum, he dedicated it to that Prince, who, agreeably to his excellent good-nature, accepted it very graciously, and, had he lived, would have proved a truly royal patron to him; but all our Author's towering hopes from this quarter were buried in the grave of that most amiable Prince, who died in the flower of his youth a year after. In the interim, his Grace the Primate of Ireland being in London this year, 1604, found out our Chronologer, and, taking him into Ireland, provided him a chamber in the college of Dublin, where he continued two years; at the end of which, purposing to return home, he obtained a promise from the Lord Deputy and Chancellor of Ireland of a competent maintenance (51) whenever he should come back to that kingdom. But, on his arrival in England, the rectory of Okerton, his native place, becoming vacant, though when he was Fellow of New-college he had refused the offer of it by his Father, who was Patron, yet he did now, after several demurs, and not without much reluctancy of mind, accept of it in the year 1612. Thus settled, he entered into a marriage with his friend our Primate's sister, and sat down to his studies more closely than ever. Besides going over the harmony of the Gospels, and making six hundred sermons thereon, he wrote and intirely finished several books, and laid the foundation of others in the twelve ensuing years. All these pieces he designed to publish, but was prevented by having unadvisedly engaged for the debts of a near relation, upon which bond he was arrested, and not being able to pay for the present (having spent his small patrimony in printing his books) he was thrown into a prison called Butards, in Oxford, where he remained, and in the King's bench and elsewhere, till Sir William Besswell, a great encourager of deserving men, Dr Robert Pink, Warden of New-college, and Primate Usher, laid down the money, and released him. As soon as he had obtained his liberty (in procuring which Archbishop Laud, at the request of Sir Henry Marten, gave his assistance) he presented a petition to King Charles I. for leave to travel into foreign parts, viz. Turkey, Ethiopia, or the Abassinian empire, in the search after manuscripts, especially relating to civil and ecclesiastical history, in order to publish them in print, or whatsoever copies might tend to the propagation or increase of good learning. And further also, as his Majesty had Leiger Ambassadors and Agents, with his confederates, Emperors, King, and Princes, of other countries, they might in his Majesty's name, in behalf of Mr Lydiat and his assigns, move their Highnesses to grant the like privileges to him and his assigns &c. What effect this petition had does not appear, probably not such a one as was agreeable to the ardor of his wishes. However that he, it is an incontellible evidence of his noble intentions and public spirit for the advancement of letters. Neither did his disappointment in it lessen his respect for the King, in whose cause he shewed himself a firm and zealous loyalist on the breaking out of the civil wars, in which he was a great sufferer at his rectory of Okerton by the Parliament party. In a letter written by him to Sir William Compton, Kut. Governor of Banbury-castle, dated Dec. 7, 1644, he complains of having been four times pillaged by the Parliament's forces of Compton-house (commonly called Compton in the hole) in Warwickshire, to the value of at least 70 l. and was forced, for a quarter of a year together, to borrow a shirt to change his linnen; that he had also been twice forced from his house, and carried once to Warwick, and another time to Banbury. To the first of which places he was hurried away on a rascally jade of a horse, and was infamously abused by the soldiers there, and so sorely hurt, that at the writing of the said letter he was not perfectly restored, and doubted he scarce ever should be. The cause of all which ill usage was for that he had denied them money, and had defended his books and papers, and afterwards, while a Prisoner in Warwick-castle, he had spoken boldly in behalf of the King and Bishops. At length, after he had lived at Okerton several years in great poverty and obscurity, he was taken out of this world on the third of April, 1646, and was buried the day following in the chancel of the church at Okerton, which he had rebuilt some time before. In 1669 a stone, with an inscription, was laid over his grave, at the expence of the Warden and Fellows of New-college in Oxford, and an honorary monument, with an inscription, was erected by the same society in the cloyster of their college. Mr Wood observes, that though he was a person of small stature, yet was he of great parts, and of a public soul, and though a poor and contemptible priest to look upon (for so he was held by the vulgar) yet he not only puzzled Christopher Clavius, and the whole college of Mathematicians, but also that Goliath of literature, Joseph Scaliger, who, when he was worsted by our Author's writings (as was maintained by great men, and particularly Archbishop Usher) instead of acknowledging the superiority of his antagonist, meanly betook himself to abusive language, calling Lydiat, in the most scornful manner, a beggarly, beardless, and gelt priest. That as he was much esteemed by learned men at home, among whom, besides our Primate, were Sir Adam Newton, Secretary, and Sir Thomas Chaloner, Chamberlain to Prince Henry, Dr John Bainbridge, Mr Henry Briggs, Dr Peter Turner, &c. who were his great acquaintance, so was he by the Virtuosi beyond-sea, who even did not scruple to rank him with the Lord Bacon of Verulam and Mr Joseph Mede. And when they heard that Lydiat and Mede were very poorly preferred, they declared that the English were unworthy of such brave scholars, since they shewed no more regard for them. This character of Mr Lydiat was apparently drawn from a perusal of his works, of which therefore we shall give a list, as follows: 1. Traclatus de variis annorum formis, Lond. 1605, 8vo. 2. Prælectio Astronomica de natura caeli et conditionibus elementorum. 3. Disquisitio Philologica de origine fontium. These two were printed with the first, and are always bound up with it. 4. Examen canonum chronologicæ Isagogicorum, annexed to. 5. Defensio Traclatus de variis annorum formis contra Josephi Scaligeri obtredationem, Lond. 1607, 8vo. 6. Emendatio temporum ab initio mundi huc usque compendio facta contra Scaligerum & alios, Lond. 1609, 8vo. (*). 7. Explicatio et additamentum argumentorum in libello emendationis temporum compendio factæ, de nativitate Christi & ministerio in terris, printed in 1613, 8vo. 8. Solis et Lunæ periodus, seu annus magnus, Lond. 1620, 8vo. 9. De anni solaris mensura epistola Astronomica ad Heu. Sarichum, Lond. 1620-1, 8vo. 10. Numerus annorum melioribus lapidibus insignitus, factusque gemmeus, et ab anno ann. magni, sive Solis et Lunæ periodus octid sexcentenniæ &c. Lond. 1621, in one large sheet on one side. 11. Canones chronologici, nec non series summorum magistratuum et triumphorum Romanorum, Oxon. 1675, 8vo, printed from a manuscript in the library of Dr J. L. Lambire, Principal of Hart-hall, now Herford-college, Oxford. 12. Letters to Dr James Usher, afterwards Primate of Ireland, annexed to that Primate's life, published by Dr Parr, 1686. 13. Marmorium chronon Arundelianum cum annotationibus, printed in Marmora Oxonijsis, published the pursuit of knowledge he declined the provostship of his college to which he was elected in 1610 (q). Two years afterwards he commenced D. D. (r); and the next year, 1613, being at London, he published his first treatise [2.] De Ecclesiarum Christianarum Successione et Statu; it was presented by Archbishop Abbot to King James, as the eminent first-fruits of Dublin University (s). Returning home a little before Midsummer, he married Phæbe, the only daughter of Dr Luke Chaloner [R] abovementioned. In 1615, he drew up articles of religion for the Church of Ireland; which being intirely Calvinistical in respect to the doctrine of absolute predestination and reprobation, a handle was made of this step to endeavour the ruin of his interest in King James, by representing him as inclined to Puritanism: but the impotent malice turned (as is not unusual in such cases) greatly to his advantage [S]. For coming, explaining both against the Millenaries of the elder and latter times. Parr.

Both Inscriptions may be seen in Hist. et Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 11. p. 149 & 155.

(*). Another edition was printed at the Hague, in 1654, 12mo.

(r) He was admitted by Dr Hampton, Abp. of Armagh, then Chancellor. Having performed the usual exercises, part of which being to read two lectures on some part of Scripture, he chose Dan. ix. 24, and Rev. xx. 4.

lished by Humphrey Prideaux. In this piece Mr Lydiat had animadverted upon the edition of the Marmora Arundeliana by Mr Selden, whom, instead of a most judicious, he has stiled only an industrious Author; which coming to the ears of that learned gentleman, was so much resented by him, that, though otherwise in general a friend and supporter of learned men under difficulties, yet, when desired and importuned to contribute towards Lydiat's release from prison, he absolutely refused. These are all the pieces of our Author's extant in print. He also left behind him a great number of manuscripts, most of which are: 1. Annotations upon that part of Mr Edward Breweood's treatise of the Sabbath, wherein he denies the Christian sabbath on the Lord's day, or the first day of the week, to be established jure divino, by God's commandment. The beginning of this manuscript there was brought to me, being prisoner in the King's bench, on Friday evening, Dec. 3, 1630 &c. which is mentioned, as it shews the time of his confinement in that prison. 2. Annotations upon some controverted points of the Chronical Canons. 3. A few annotations upon some places or passages of the second and third chapters of the book, intitled Altare Christianum. 4. A treatise touching the setting up of altars in Christian churches, and bowing in reverence to them or common tables, and bowing the knee or uncovering the head at the name or naming of Jesus, occasionally made in 1633, written upon the request of some London ministers, to declare his judgment therein, and dedicated to Archbishop Laud in gratitude for his releasing him out of prison, [which shews that he was not a prisoner in 1633, though probably discharged not long before]. In a postscript to this discourse about bowing at the name of Jesus, he endeavours to answer the four arguments of Bishop Andrews in his sermon on Philip. ii. 10, 11. 5. An answer to Mr Joseph Mede's treatise of the name of altar, or ἁγίασηγιον, anciently given to the holy table; written in February, 1637. 6. An answer to the defence of the coal from the altar. 7. Evangelium contractum ex quatuor Evangelis &c. written in Hebrew. 8. Annales Ecclesiæ Christi inchoati secundum methodum Baronii: This is written in Latin, but is imperfect. 9. Chronicon Regum Judæorum methodo magis perspicua, written in Hebrew. 10. Mesolabium geometricum. 11. Chronicon mundi emendatum. 12. Divina sphaera humanorum eventuum, dedicated to the King in 1632. 13. Problema Astronomicum de Solis eccentricitate. 14. Diatribæ, et Animadversiones astronomicae ternæ. 15. Circuli dimensio Lydiatæa, Archimæda. All which manuscripts, with others, treating of Divinity, Mathematics, and Astronomy, amounting to the number of thirty-eight at least, were bound up in twenty-two volumes, and reserved as rarities in the hands of the forementioned Dr John Lamphire, Principal of Hart-hall, now Hertford-college.

[2.] His treatise De Ecclesiarum Christianarum Successione et Statu.] This piece is a continuation of Bishop Jewel's Apology, written in answer to that captious question of the Papists, where was your [Protestant] religion before Luther? The design therefore is to prove that the protestant tenets are the same with those of the primitive church, in executing which Jewel shews, that there also were some visible members of this church down to the 6th century, which is here extended to the 13th by our Author, who further proves that there were some persons in the Western churches, during the darkest times of ignorance, not tainted with the errors of the Romish faith. It is divided into three parts. The first reaches to the tenth century, when Gregory VII. was raised to the popedom. The second was to have reached from that period to the year 1370. And the third was planned to bring it to the Reformation. How far he had brought it in this edition is seen in the following extract of a letter written to his brother-in-law, Thomas Lydiat, dated at Dublin, August 16, 1619. 'You have rightly observed,

' says he, that in my discourse, De Christianarum Ecclesiarum Successione et Statu, there is wanting, for the accomplishment of the second part, an hundred years [from 1240 to 1370, viz. the last chapter of this part] which default in the continuation of the work is by me supplied. I purpose to publish the whole work together, much augmented, but do first expect the publication of my uncle Stanyhurst's answer to the former, which, I hear, since his death (52), is sent to Paris to be there printed. I am advertised also, that even now there is one at Antwerp who hath printed a treatise of my countryman De sacro Bosco, De vera Ecclesiæ investigatione, wherein he hath some dealing with me: Both these I would willingly see, before I set about reprinting my book, meaning, that if they have justly found fault with any thing, I may amend it; if unjustly, I may defend it (53). We have already shewn what reason he had to expect the answer here mentioned from his uncle; but that was never published, nor did our Author publish any other edition of his work, as he here purposed. Probably prevented by the distraction of the times (54). It was reprinted at Hanover in 1658, 8vo, without any amendments. In the last edition of 1687, containing likewise his Antiquity of the British churches, are these words in the title-page: Opus integrum ab Auctore auctum et recognitum, which Dr Smith observes was a meer puff of the Bookseller.

[R] He married Dr Chaloner's daughter.] This gentleman was descended from the ancient family of the Chaloners in Yorkshire. He was one of the four first Fellows of the college of Dublin (55), and had been a great assiter and benefactor to it, having been appointed Overseer of the building, and Treasurer for the money raised for that purpose, and was both a learned and pious man. In all these respects Dr Usher must needs be very agreeable to him, and we are assured that he courted this alliance, intending, had he lived, to have given this friend his only daughter, with a considerable estate in land and money (56). But dying before it was concluded (57), he charged her upon his death-bed, that, if Dr Usher would marry her, she should think of no other person for a husband; which command of her dying father she punctually obeyed, and continued his wife forty years, and was always treated by him with great tenderness to her death, which preceded his about a year and a half.

[S] Turned in the end to his advantage.] Among those articles, which amount to the number of 104, besides asserting the doctrine of predestination and reprobation in the strongest terms (58), one of them professes that there is but one catholic church, out of which there is no salvation; and another maintains that the sabbath-day ought to be kept holy (59). Upon these accounts, Dr Heylin called the passing of these articles an absolute plot of the Sabbatarians and Calvinists in England, to make themselves so strong a party in Ireland as to obtain what they pleased in this convocation (60). Our Author was well known to be a strong asserter of the predestinarian principles, and being besides of opinion, that episcopacy was not a distinct order, but only a different degree from that of Presbyters, he lay obnoxious enough to the charge of Puritanism. However, as he always warmly asserted the King's supremacy, and the episcopal form of church government established, and all the discipline of it, it is evident all the objections to him, as inclined to Puritanism, were the effect of party, the church beginning about this time to be divided between the Calvinistic and Arminian principles upon the quintarticular controversy. Dr Parr tells us his enemies were of no great repute for learning and worth, and that our Author, hearing of their attempts to rivet him out of his Majesty's favour, procured the following letter from the Lord Deputy and Council of Ireland to the Privy-Council in England.

(q) He recommended Sir William Temple's Grandfather to it. Smith, p. 34.
(r) Parr, p. 13.
(s) They were framed with very little alteration from the nine Lambeth articles, so called, because confirmed there by Archbishop Whitgift, in 1595.

(52) He died at Brussels the year before. Athen. Oxon. Vol. i. col. 250.

(53) Letter 38 in Parr's collection.

(54) It is certain that, in his journey to St Donat, mentioned hereafter, he lost two MSS. concerning the Waldenses, which he had obtained toward the writing of this work. Parr, p. 60.

(55) There was only four appointed at first, viz. Luke Chaloner, William Daniel, James Fullerton, and James Hamilton.

(56) Parr.

(57) He died at Dublin on the 27th of April, 1612.

(58) From the 1Xth to the XVIIth inclusive.

(59) They were signed by Archbishop Jones, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Speaker of the House of Bishops in convocation, and Prolocutor of the clergy, and likewise by the Lord Deputy Chichester in King James's name, and by his Majesty's order.

(60) Heylin's Petrus respondet, p. 47.

(x) It was printed in 1621, in 4to. This and another printed in 1625, which was preached before the King at Wanstead, Jan. 10, 1624, on Esther iv. 14. are all the Sermons published by himself.

(y) Subjoined to Christ. Sibthorp's book upon the same subject, and reprinted at London in 1631, 4to. In it he endeavours to prove the religion of those ancient Christians to be the same with that of the Protestants, in the most material points of difference from the Church of Rome.

as his custom was, to England in the latter end of the year 1619, he brought a letter to the Privy-Council to clear him of that charge, and he afterwards gave the King in discourse such intire satisfaction in the point, that the Bishopric of Meath (u) being then vacant, his Majesty of his own accord nominated him thereto in 1620 [T]; soon after which, he preached before the House of Commons [U], on February 20 (w) that year, and printed his Sermon at their request (x). He was consecrated to his see on his return home the following year. In 1622, he published, at Dublin, his treatise concerning The Religion of the ancient Irish and Britons (y). And in October the same year, upon Lord Falkland's receiving the sword as Lord Deputy of Ireland, our Prelate preached a Sermon before him which gave great offence [W]: but at the censuring some officers on the 22d of November for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, he made a speech in the castle of Dublin in defence of that supremacy, for which he received a letter of thanks from his Majesty (z) [X]. In June,

(u) His conduct in the Government of this see, shews him to be far enough from being disaffected to the discipline of the established Church. See Parr, p. 27, 28.
(w) By mistake it is Feb. 19 in Parr, and so copied in the General Dictionary.

1623,

(z) Dr Parr has preserved an extract of this letter, p. 24, and 25.

‘ May it please your Lordships,
‘ The extraordinary merit of this bearer, Mr Doctor ‘ Uther, prevailed with us to offer that favour (which ‘ we deny to many that move us) to be recommended ‘ to your Lordships; and we do it the rather, because ‘ we are desirous to set him right in his Majesty's opi‘ nion, who it seemeth hath been informed, that he is ‘ somewhat transported with singularities, and unapt‘ nesses to be conformable to the rules and orders of ‘ the church. We are so far from suspecting him in ‘ that kind, that we may be bold to recommend him
‘ to your Lordships as a man orthodox, and wor‘ thy to govern in the church, when occasion shall be ‘ presented, and his Majesty may be pleased to advance ‘ him. He being one that hath preached before the ‘ state here for eighteen years, and hath been his ‘ Majesty's Professor of Divinity in the University thir‘ teen years, and a man who has given himself over to ‘ his profession. An excellent and painful preacher,
‘ a modest man, abounding in goodness, and his life
‘ and doctrine so agreeable, as those who agree not with ‘ him are yet constrained to love and admire him. And ‘ for such a one we beseech your Lordships to under‘ stand him, and accordingly to speak to his Majesty.
‘ And thus, with remembrance of our humble duties,
‘ we take leave of your Lordships, most humbly at ‘ command. From Dublin the last of September, 1619.
‘ Adam Loftus, Chancellor; Henry Docwra; William ‘ Metberould; John King; Dudley Norton; Oliver St
‘ John; William Tuamensis; Francis Axingiers.’

Upon this letter the King sent for him, and, after much conversation upon the subject, declared his satisfaction in the Doctor, by saying, that the Knave Puritan was a bad man, but the Knave's Puritan was an honest man (61).

[T] The King nominated him Bishop of Meath.] Upon this occasion he received the following letter from the Lord Deputy of Ireland:

‘ My Lord,
‘ I thank God for your preferment to the bishopric
‘ of Meath. His Majesty thereto hath done egregious ‘ favour to his poor church here. There is none here
‘ but are exceeding glad that you are called thereunto:
‘ Even some Popish gentlemen themselves have largely ‘ testified their gladness of it. Your grant is, and other ‘ necessary things shall be, sealed this day or tomorrow.
‘ I pray God bless you and whatever you undertake.
‘ So I rest,

‘ Your Lordship's most affectionate Friend,

Dublin, Feb. 3, 1620. ‘ Oliver Grandison (62).’

[U] He preached before the House of Commons.] Upon his appointment to preach on the 7th of February, the Prebendaries of Westminster-abbey claimed the privilege of their church, and their exemption from episcopal jurisdiction for many years, and offered their service (63); whereupon the House being displeas'd, appointed the place to be at the Temple, and he was ordered a second time to preach before them. And Secretary Calvert, by the appointment of the House, spoke to the King that the choice of their Preacher might stand. The King said it was well done. Feb. 13 the Bishop was at court, kissed the King's hand, and had a conference with him upon his sermon: when his Majesty told him he had an unruly flock to look after next Sunday, observed that the House were in no proper temper for receiving the Sacrament, that after the late contentions many might eat their own condemnation. He bid the Bishop tell them he hoped they were prepared, but wished they might be better: to exhort them to unity and concord; to love God first, and then their Prince and Country; to look to the urgent necessity of the times, and the miserable state of Christendom; concluding with his dat qui cito dat. Feb. 27 the House sent Sir James Perrot and Mr Drake to give him thanks, and desire him to publish his sermon, which was done accordingly (64).

[W] A sermon which gave great offence.] We have an account of this by himself in a letter to Lord Grandison from Dublin, Oct. 16, 1622, wherein he acquaints that nobleman (late Lord Deputy) that, taking his text in Rom. xiii. He beareth not the sword in vain, he expressed his wishes, that if his Majesty were pleased to extend his clemency towards his subjects, that were Recufants, some order notwithstanding might be taken with them, that they should not give us public affronts, and take possession of our churches before our faces. ‘ I also intreated, continues he, that, whatever con‘ nivance were used to others, the laws might be strictly ‘ executed against such as had revolted from us (65).’ Upon this a report was raised that he had said, the sword had rested too long in the sheath. But the reason of this address to Lord Grandison was what some gave out, that he had taxed his Lordship with being too remiss in prosecuting the Papiists during his government, which he here expressly denies. However that be, it is certain he fell under the displeasure of his Metropolitan, Dr Hampton, Archbishop of Armagh, who wrote him the following letter.

‘ My Lord,

‘ In the exceptions taken by the Recufants against ‘ your sermon, I cannot be affected as Gallo was at the ‘ beating of Sophenes, to take nothing for them. I am ‘ sensible of that which my brethren suffer: and, if my ‘ advice had been required, I should have counselled
‘ your Lordship to give lenitives of your own accord
‘ for all which was conceived over-harsh or sharp. The ‘ Inquisition, whether an offence were given or taken,
‘ may add to the flame already kindled, and provoke
‘ further displeasure; it is not like to pacify anger.
‘ But let your case be as good as Peter's was, when
‘ the brethren charged him injuriously with preaching
‘ to the uncircumcised, the great Apostle was content
‘ to give them a public satisfaction, Act. ii. and it ‘ wrought good effects; for the text, says his auditors, ‘ quieverunt & glorificaverunt Deum, it brought peace
‘ to the congregation and glory to God.

‘ My noble Lord Deputy hath propounded a way of ‘ pacification, that your Lordship should satisfy such of
‘ the Lords as could be present, wherein my poor en‘ deavours shall not be wanting. Howbeit (to say in‘ genuously as I think) that is not likely to have success;
‘ for my Lord of Kilkenny and your other friends, try‘ ing their strength in that kind at Trim, prevailed not,
‘ but can tell your Lordship what is expected. And ‘ if my wishes can take place, seeing so many men
‘ having something against you, tarry not till they com‘ plain, but prevent it by a voluntary retraction, and ‘ milder interpretation of the points offensive, especially ‘ of drawing the sword, of which spirit we are not, nor ‘ ought to be; our weapons are not carnal, but spiritual.
‘ Withal it will not be amiss, in mine opinion, for your ‘ Lordship to withdraw yourself from these parts, and
‘ to spend more time in your own diocese, that such as ‘ will not hear your doctrine may be drawn to love and ‘ reverence your Lordship for your hospitality and con‘ versation (66).’

[X] He made a speech &c.] This speech is too long to be inserted here (67), and contains nothing more than the common arguments. However, it had so good

(64) In this sermon he states the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Sacrament against the real presence. In which view he refers to it in his treatise against Malene the Jesuit, ch. iii. in initio, and gives the substance of it.

(65) Letter 53 in Parr's collection.

(66) Letter 54 ibid., dated from Treilagh, October 17, 1622.

(67) It is printed by Dr Parr, p. 19 to 24.

(61) Parr.

(62) Idem.

(63) Dr Laud, afterwards Abp of Canterbury, was installed a Prebendary a few weeks before. See his article.

(aa) Letter 55 in Parr's Collection from Mr Henry Holcroft to our Bishop, dated June 13, 1623.

(dd) Ibid. p. 26, it was held in Nov. 1625. The event was of singular service to Lady Peterborough, and the grateful sense she had of it will be seen in the sequel.

(68) See Wilkin's Concil. Brit. & Hibern. Vol. IV. p. 445.

(*) To the same purpose it is said that Sir John Savile once brought our Archbishop, under the notion of a country parson, to dispute with a learned Jesuit, who, upon trial, said, that country Vicar had more learning than all the Bishops in England. Ducat. Leod. p. 626.

(69) Bates, ubi supra, p. 741.

1623, he was constituted a Privy-Counsellor of Ireland (aa), and went not long after to England, by his Majesty's special command, in order to carry on a work, which he had begun some time before, concerning the antiquity of the British Churches (bb). This business keeping him here till the death of Dr Christopher Hampton, Archbishop of Armagh, in January 1624, made way for his advancement to that see, upon which occasion he prepared to return to Ireland; but being seized with a quartan ague, which held him nine months, it was August 1626, when he arrived there (cc). Before he left England, he had a disputation (dd) with a Popish Priest at Drayton in Northamptonshire, the seat of Lord Mordaunt, afterwards Earl of Peterborough, who thereby became a convert to the Protestant religion [Y]. King James granted him the temporalities of the Archbishopric, notwithstanding his absence, and he was ordered four hundred pounds sterling out of the revenues of Ireland, by King Charles I, not long after his accession to the throne (ee). Being now at the head of the Irish Church, he omitted nothing which might either reform the abuses, or relieve the wants of it, both in regard to doctrine and discipline [Z], keeping a watchful eye to defeat the restless endeavours of its nearest and most dangerous enemies the Papists. In this spirit, he opposed vigorously a design which was set on foot by them in the winter after his arrival for granting a more full toleration to them [AA]. At the same time observing the

(bb) See remark [HH].

(cc) Parr, p. 27.

(ee) Ibid. p. 264.

an effect, that diverse of the offenders being satisfied they might lawfully take the oath of supremacy, did thereby avoid the sentence of Præmunire, then ready to be pronounced against them. It must be observed, that there had been a synodical meeting (as it is called) of the popish clergy, together with some common lawyers, and Monks of the Cistercian, Franciscan, and Jesuits order, wherein a decree was made, declaring the absolute unlawfulness of taking this oath of supremacy (68).

[Y] He disputed with a Jesuit, and converted Lord Mordaunt to the protestant religion. He was scarce recovered from his ague, when Lord Mordaunt, a zealous Roman catholic, being greatly desirous to bring his Lady into the pale of that church, concluded, that there could be no better or more certain way of bringing it about, than to procure a disputation to be held between two learned and principal persons, one of each side, at which his Lady should be present. In that resolution he chose, for the champion of his own cause, the Jesuit Beaumont, whose true name was Rookwood, being brother to that Rookwood who was executed for the gunpowder treason. Against this antagonist Lady Peterborough chose our Primate, who, notwithstanding his health was not sufficiently confirmed to engage in such a task, yet from the ardent zeal for the reformed doctrine, with which he was constantly animated, and to save a soul from falling into the wiles of an artful Jesuit, he did not refuse to comply with her Ladyship's request. The place appointed for holding the disputation was my Lord's seat at Drayton in Northamptonshire, a place very proper for the business, as being furnished with a most copious library of the writings of all the ancient fathers of the church, which were ready at hand, if it should happen (which is ordinarily the case) that any of them should be referred to in the engagement. The heads of the dispute were agreed to be upon Transubstantiation; the Invocation of Saints; of Images; and the Perpetual Visibility of the Church. After it had been held for three days, five hours each day, in which our Primate sustained the part of Respondent, that office for the fourth day lay upon Beaumont, according to the regulation settled by himself. But no Jesuit then appeared. On the contrary, he sent a letter to the Baron, with an excuse for the default, alledging, that all the arguments which he had formed had slipped out of his memory, nor was he able by any effort to recollect them, imputing the cause of the misfortune to a just judgment of God upon him, for undertaking of his own accord, without the licence of his Superiors, to engage in a dispute with a person of so great eminence and learning as the Primate ().* Such a shameful tergiversation sunk deeply into the mind of Lord Mordaunt, so that, after some conferences with the Primate, he renounced popery, and continued in the profession of the protestant faith to the end of his life. This account is given in the life of our Archbishop by Dr Nicholas Bernard, who says he had it from an eye and ear witness. And it is in a great measure confirmed by the reproach thrown upon Beaumont by Chaloner, a secular priest, who in a piece wrote against the Jesuit, admonishes him to beware of Drayton-house, lest he should there chance to light upon another Usher, and be again put to flight, to the great disgrace both of himself and his profession (69). As to the Primate, the eminent service done by this disputation to Lady Peterborough could not but be very sensibly felt by her; and that it was so, she gave his Grace sufficient proofs in that extraordinary kindness and respect which she shewed to him all his life after.

[Z] He reformed the doctrine and discipline of the Irish church. For that purpose he made frequent personal visitations, admonishing those of the clergy whom he found faulty, and giving excellent advice and directions to the rest, charging them to use the liturgy of the church in all public administrations, and to preach and catechise diligently in their respective cures, and to make the Holy Scripture the rule as well as the subject of their doctrine and sermons. He also endeavoured to reform the Proctors, Apparitors, and other officers of the Ecclesiastical courts, where there were many great complaints of abuses and exactions in his Predecessor's time (70).

(70) Parr, p. 27, 28.

[AA] He opposed a full toleration to the Papists. The propositions to which the Papists offered to consent, in case of a more full toleration, were to pay their quota towards maintaining 500 horse and 5000 foot-soldiers: Upon which occasion a general assembly of the nation, both Protestants and Papists, was called by the then Lord Deputy Falkland in the hall of the castle of Dublin. The Bishops, by the Lord Primate's invitation, met first at his house, where a protestation was drawn up in form, importing, that the popish religion being superstitious and idolatrous, a full toleration of it would be sinful, and moreover a matter of most dangerous consequence. This paper was signed by our Archbishop at the head of eleven Prelates, one of whom [the Bishop of Derry] at the next meeting of the assembly, April 23, 1627, published it at Christ-church before the Lord Deputy and Council in the middle of his sermon, wherein he declared warmly against the toleration; in which he was seconded by the Primate in a sermon preached the Sunday following before the same auditory (71). Hereupon other resolutions were taken. Mr Bayle (72) having transcribed Bates's account (73) of this proceeding of the Bishops, makes the following remark: 'I am to observe, that our Archbishop and his Suffragans acted according to the principles of those who are the most rigid enemies to toleration, they not grounding their declaration upon political reasons, like moderate men of that party, but only on the nature of the worship in the popish communion, without once mentioning its persecuting spirit, which is the only reason why even such as favour toleration suppose that it ought not to be tolerated.' To pass by this Critic's rash assertion, that the favourers of toleration ground their opinion of exempting Popery only upon account of its persecuting spirit, the contrary of which is notoriously evident in our famous Poet Milton, who gives the very same reason for denying a Toleration to Popery with our Archbishop, viz. its idolatry (74). It will be sufficient to represent the true state of the case with respect to the Primate's conduct, which probably was unknown to Bayle. The Papists here understood by the Irish Bishops protestation were such as either descended of the race of the ancient English, or such as held their estates from the crown, who being generally loyal subjects to his Majesty, thereupon took this occasion to propose the suspension of the laws against Recusants. This raised a murmur among several of the Protestants, for whose satisfaction it might be very necessary for the Bishops to make the mentioned declaration. But that the Primate had no such spirit of Intolerance as is here intimated by his Accuser, is evident from what followed, which was, That the Protestants, refusing to contribute their quota to the support of a standing army, were assured that the laws against Recusants should remain in full force, and that if the Papists, on the other hand,

(71) Parr, p. 29.

(72) Under our Prelate's article, remark [B] at the end.

(73) In vita Ufferii, p. 741, 742.

(74) Milton's treatise of true religion, heresy, schism, and toleration, in his works, Vol. II. Edit. 1753, 419.

daily growth and increase of Arminianism, which was looked on by him as a very dangerous doctrine, he employed some time in searching into the original of the Predestinarian Controversy, and meeting with a curiosity upon that subject, he published it in 1631, at Dublin (ff) in 4to [BB]; as he did also another in 1632 (gg), Concerning the ancient Irish Church [CC]. This year he was likewise employed in recovering several lands belonging to his own diocese, in which he was assisted by Archbishop Laud (bb). From the time that Lord Wentworth Earl of Stafford held the post of Lord Deputy of Ireland, the Archbishop left no means untried to improve the revenues of that Church in general [DD], hav-

(ff) It was the first book in Latin that was printed in Ireland.

(gg) Which was reprinted in 1665, 4to, at Paris.
(bb) See his letters to that Archbishop, No. 154, and 172, in Parr's Collection.

would give nothing without such a suspension, they might perhaps agree that the condition of the kingdom required some standing forces. It was resolved therefore, by the Lord Deputy and Council, that the Primate should, in regard of his great esteem with all parties, declare, in a speech to the whole assembly, the true state of the kingdom, and the necessity of a standing army for the defence thereof against any foreign invasions or intestine commotions; and consequently, that a competent supply was needful for that purpose, and to be raised, without any condition whatsoever, as well by the Roman catholic as Protestant subjects. The speech is too long to be inserted here, though it is an exquisite proof of his Lordship's abilities in matters of state, and being transmitted by the desire of the Lord Deputy to the King, was well approved by him. The following passage in it is apparently a full vindication of the Archbishop against Bayle's accusation of a persecuting spirit. 'Where the burden is born, says he, in common, and the aid required to be given to the Prince by his subjects of different judgments in religion, it stands not with the ground of common reason, that such a condition should be annexed unto the gift as must of necessity deter the one party from giving at all upon such terms as are repugnant to their consciences: as therefore on the one hand, if we desire that the Recufants should join with us in granting a common aid, we should not put in the condition of executing the statute, which we are sure they would not yield unto; so on the other hand, if they would have us to join with them in the same contribution, they should not require the condition of suspending the statute to be added, which we in conscience cannot yield unto. The way will be then freely to grant unto his Majesty, without all manner of conditions that may seem unequal unto any side, and to refer unto his own sacred breast how far he will be pleased to extend or abridge his favour; of whose lenity, in forbearing to execute the statute, our Recufants have found such experience, that they cannot expect a greater liberty, by giving any thing that is demanded, than now already they do freely enjoy.' The inference from this argument is obvious; That though it could not consist with a conscientious regard for the safety of the true religion, to consent that Popery, as being idolatrous, should have the sanction of a law to warrant the exercise of it, yet he expressly approves his Majesty's lenity in forbearing to restrain that exercise, except where the safety of the public, and thence of the established religion therewith, makes it necessary. In short, he is for keeping the rod in his hand, but to use it sparingly against them. Is not this the principle which is universally maintained at this day by the favourers of Toleration?

[BB] He published a curiosity upon the Predestinarian controversy.] It is entitled, Goteschalti & predestinarianæ Controversiæ ab Eo motæ historia (75). Our Author had begun twelve years before to make collections for a history of Predestinarianism; but, upon the coming out of that history by Vossius (76), he dropt his design of publishing any thing of it except these written by Goteschalt himself, which were not mentioned by Vossius, and had never been printed. He had procured them out of Corbey abbey in France. Thus he writes to Dr Ward (76), who had assisted him about the same time with some observations touching the nickname of the Predestinarians, imposed by the Semipelagians on the followers of St Austin. Hereby it is seen how much reason we have, at this time of day, to lament the great waste of time and labour which was thrown away upon this absurd doctrine by persons whose abilities might have been of so much more service to religion and learning upon better subjects. The only use such productions seem to be capable of being turned to at present is, to look upon them as so many sea-marks, to avoid falling into the like utilities.

[CC] Another concerning the ancient Irish church.] The title of this piece is, Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge, containing a choice collection of letters out of several ancient manuscripts, and other Authors, to and from Irish Bishops and Monks, from anno 592 to 1180, concerning the affairs of the Irish church; which shew the great esteem, as well for learning as piety, in which the Bishops and Clergy of that church were held both at Rome, France, England, and elsewhere: with several matters relating to the great controversies of those times about the keeping of Easter, and also every thing relating to the ecclesiastical discipline and jurisdiction of the church of that kingdom.

[DD] He left no means untried for improving the revenues of the Irish church.] A remarkable instance of this appears in the warmth with which he opposed a patent granted to Sir John Bathe of 300l. per annum, at this time to be paid out of the impropriations. The Primate having given orders to stop his patent, received a letter from the Lords Justices, desiring him to declare his motives for it. In answer to which he expresses himself in these very warm terms: 'I cannot nor need not produce any other reason than that which I have done, and for the maintenance of the sufficiency whereof I will adventure all I am worth, namely, that, for the particular grant now in question, Sir John Bathe's letter hath been gotten from his Majesty by meer surreption, and therefore no patent ought to be passed thereupon. For though I easily grant, that my Lord Treasurer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might certify unto his Majesty, that there was no other thing to be passed here but impropriations, though Sir John Bathe, I think, hath found already somewhat else to be passed in his books, and may do more, if he will not be too hasty, but take time to enquire; yet how does it appear, that either of these two noble gentlemen did as much as know that his Majesty had taken a former order for the settlement of these things upon the church, to which resolution had they been privy, I do so presume of their nobleness, and care of the publick good, that the remittal of a matter of 2000l. would not induce them to divert his Majesty from making good that precious donation, which, by the example of his father of never dying memory, he had solemnly devoted to God and his church; such an eximious act of piety as is not to be countervailed with 2000l. or 20000l. of any earthly treasure. But whatsoever they knew, or knew not, of his Majesty's own pious resolution, and constant purpose never to revoke that which he hath once given unto God, I rest so confident, as I dare pawn my life upon it, that, when he did sign those letters of Sir John Bathe's, he had not the least intimation given unto him, that this did any way cross that former gift, which he made unto the church upon so great and mature deliberation; as being grounded upon the advice first of the Commissioners sent into Ireland, then of the Lords of the Council upon their report in England, thirdly of King James that ever blessed Father of the church, and lastly of the Commissioners for Irish affairs, unto whom, for the last conclusion and debating of this business, I was by his now Majesty referred myself at my being in England (77). But it appears, by Bishop Laud's answer, that the seal was put to Sir John Bathe's grant in April before, of which doctrine, says that Prelate, you may make this use, what close conveyance and carriage there may be when the church is to be spoiled (78). Sir John Bathe, to procure this grant, had represented that the clergy had a third part of Ireland in their hands: To let that matter right, our Author had been at the pains of procuring a rental of all the revenues of the bishoprics and deaneries, which he sent to Bishop Laud. It appears also, by a letter of Usher to Laud (79), that the former was made by his Majesty Guardian of spiritualties for the Irish church; and in the same letter, recommending his nephew Mr Usher to the provostship of Trinity-college, he has this expression, 'I would rather lose my life than not to answer the trust reposed in me by my Sovereign.' Upon the whole it appears, by these letters, that he perfectly concurred with Laud

(75) He dedicates the piece to Vossius, for whom his Grace would willingly have procured the deanery of Armagh. Letter 144 in Parr's Collection, February 3, 1629. (76) Letter 149 ibid. dated December 10, 1630, where he writes that it was then finished.

(77) Letter 156, dated at Drogheda, April 3, 1630.

(78) Letter 166, dated July 5, 1630.

(79) No. 145 in Dr Parr's Collection.

ing for the use of it some years before obtained a grant from his Majesty of such impropriations belonging to the crown as were then leased out, as soon as they should fall (ii). In 1634, a little before the meeting of the Parliament, he preserved the right of his see to the primacy against the attempts of the Archbishop of Dublin, who challenged it (kk), in consequence of which his precedency to the Lord Chancellor was obtained at the same time. The Convocation meeting together with the Parliament, he had the principal hand in composing and establishing the Irish Canons, in which the liberties of that Church were maintained by him against Dr Bramhall, then Bishop of London-Derry [EE]. All this while he kept a correspondence in all countries for the advancement of learning [FF], whereby, (ii) Parr, p. 41.

(kk) He wrote a paper upon this subject, which being sent to England, the right was declared in his favour by his Majesty. The precedency to the Lord Chancellor was given him without his seeking. Id. p. 41, 42.

in promoting the honour, power, wealth, and revenues of the hierarchy; so far was he from giving way to a spirit of Puritanism.

[EE] He drew up and defended the canons of the Irish church.] Bishop Bramhall proposed to have the canons of the church of England established for that of Ireland, without any alteration whatsoever. This was thought something prejudicial to the liberties of the Irish church; whereupon it was concluded that the church of Ireland should not be tied to that book, but that such canons should be selected out of the same, and such others added, as the present convocation should think fit, which was accordingly done, as appears from the view of each. It is more than probable that Bishop Bramhall was influenced by Archbishop Laud, who, upon passing these canons, wrote thus to Usher: 'For your canons, to speak truth, and with liberty and freedom, though I cannot but think the English canons intire (especially with some amendments) would have done better, yet since you and that church have thought otherwise, I do very easily submit to it.' His Grace afterwards writes thus: 'As for the particular about subscription, I think you have couched that very well, since, as it seems, there was some necessity to carry that article closely; and God forbid you should upon any occasion roll back upon your former controversy about the articles (80).' To explain his Lordship's meaning, it must be observed, that in those canons the thirty-nine articles of the church of England were received, and declared to be the confession of the faith of the church of Ireland, to which every clergyman was obliged to subscribe. Upon which Dr Heylin asserted, that the Irish articles of 1615 abovementioned were now repealed (81). But he recalled this error when he found (the truth) that the Irish articles were still retained and confirmed in these very canons. The Doctor indeed observed, that the inconsistency of the several articles proved the virtual repeal of the Irish ones: yet it is plain that this was not so understood at that time, nor for several years after, since both the Primate and all the rest of the Irish Bishops, at all ordinations, took the subscription of the party ordained to both sets of articles, till the Irish rebellion put a stop to all ordinations. However, since the Restoration of King Charles II, a subscription only to the thirty-nine articles of the church of England is required.

[FF] He kept a correspondence in all parts for the advancement of learning.] We have before, in the course of this work (82), mentioned his procuring a Latin translation of the Chronicon Samaritanum by Henry Hottinger, Professor of Hebrew at Zurich in Switzerland; and having also referred hither for an account of another of his correspondents (83), the present remark shall be employed in discharging that promise. The person was the famous Christian Ravius, Rave, or Ravius. He was born in Berlin, the capital city of the marquisate, as it then was, of Brandenburg in Germany, anno 1613, and after he had spent about eight years in some foreign academies, became a sojourner in Oxford in 1638; much about which time he addressed a letter to our Primate, who thereby perceiving his merit, gave him an invitation to come to Dublin, with a proffer of very honourable terms. In the mean time his merit coming to the knowledge of the famous Hugo Grotius, that excellently learned man, unawares to the Primate, commended and afterwards conveyed him with him to Cardinal Richlieu, then Arbiter of France, who, after discoursing him in a proper manner, offered to employ him as his Agent in the Eastern parts of the world; but Ravius modestly declined accepting the proposal, alledging his obligations to the English nation, and especially to our Primate, whereupon the Cardinal dismissed him with an honourable donative, says my Author, in the presence of that renowned Ambassador Grotius, with whose son (when a courtier in the court of the King of Sweden, anno 1636) (84), he had acquaintance at Stockholm. It was therefore by the encouragement and munificence of our Primate that Ravius began his travels into the East. In these travels, being at Constantinople in 1639, our Primate wrote him a Latin letter, containing a promise to allow him 24l. a year towards his support, giving him instructions to procure, if possible, some manuscripts which he mentions to him (85). Here he became acquainted with Dr Pococke, then in that city upon the same design with Ravius, who, bringing with him ample testimonials of his worth, was kindly received by the English Ambassador there, as he was also by the English Consul of Smyrna, Mr Edward Stringer, a worthy and learned gentleman, who, for Dr Usher's sake, was never weary of shewing him all the favour he could. After his return into England, (bringing with him a choice treasure of Oriental manuscripts) the Primate's bounty was dispensed to him with so liberal and large a hand, that he confessed himself to have had all along an exceeding rich supply from that learned and religious person: and therefore, upon the consideration of so much generosity, and especially done to a stranger, only at the motion of the learned Dr Eliehman, he was enjoined by John Gerbard Vossius, and Lud. de Dieu, as an indispensable duty, to make a suitable acknowledgment for the same. Ravius was now settled in England, and in 1642 resided at Gresham-college, and afterwards at London-house, in both which places he taught the Eastern languages, being then subservient to the prevailing party here. Afterwards he took another ramble to Holland, and visited the principal towns of Amsterdam, the Hague, Utrecht, &c. In the beginning of the year 1648 we find him again in England, whither the hopes of being preferred by the Parliament had brought him. Accordingly, having taken the Covenant, he was made, by the parliamentary visitors, Fellow of Magdalen-college in Oxford; but finding few persons, either in that college or any other, inclined to the study of the Eastern tongues, wherein his excellency lay, he continued there not above a year. He had been encouraged a long time by the parliament committee to expect their favour, in succeeding his friend Mr Pococke as Arabic Professor in that University, a promotion which was much against the mind of our Primate, who used all his influence to dissuade him from pursuing his views of it. How far he was wrought upon by this great Patron is not known; but it is certain the design miscarried, and that he afterwards travelled into Sweden, became Professor of the Eastern languages in the University of Upsal there, and that, having married a Swedish woman, by whom he had a family of children, he was in a short time reduced to great poverty, all the revenues of the professorships in that University being applied to defray the expences of the war in which the Swede was engaged against the Dane about 1657. Hereupon he settled at Kiel, in the dutchy of Holsatia in Germany, and lived there in a comfortable condition till his death, which happened in 1677 (86). We have the following pieces of his writing: 1. Panegyricæ orationes duæ de linguis Orientalibus, Ultr. 1643-44, 4to. 2. Dissertatio de scribendo Lexico Arabico, Ibid. 1644, 4to. 3. Obtestatio ad universam Europam pro discendis rebus et linguis Orientalibus ac conjuganda Africa atque Asia eruditione, Ibid. 1644, in eight sheets folio: This was written at Constantinople four years before. 4. Orthographiæ et Analogiæ (vulgo Etymologiæ) Ebraicæ delineatæ juxta vocis partes abstractas; 1. Consonas, 2. Vocales, 3. Accentus, &c. Amstel. 1646, 4to. 5. Prima tredecim partium Alcorani, Arabico-Latini, ubi textus Arabicus, &c. Or thus, Primæ aliquot Alcorani Surata, &c. printed beyond-sea in 1646, 4to. 6. Specimen Alcorani Arab.-Lat. printed with the last-mentioned piece; as also, Catalogus CLXI manusciporum Arabicorum bibliothecæ Laurentinæ in Escuriali Regis Catholici, which catalogue was made by Licent. Castillius, August 16, 1583. 7. A discourse of the Oriental tongues, viz. Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic, Lond.

(85) Letter CCCV in Parr's collection. It is dated Nov. 12, 1639.

(86) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 598; 599.

(80) Letter 184 in Parr. See also several particulars relating to this affair in a letter of Deputy Wentworth to Bishop Laud, dated Dec. 6, 1634, in Straford's Letters, &c. Vol. I. p. 343.

(81) Petrus respondet, Sect. IX. where he gives instances of this inconsistency, some of which are mentioned already.

(82) In Vol. V. p. 3374, remark [S], note (34).

(83) Ibid. p. 3378, remark [DD], note (60).

(84) Hugo Grotius was then Ambassador from Sweden to France, and his eldest son, Cornelius, in 1636, was Latin Secretary to Oxenstiern, then Prime Minister and High Chancellor of Sweden. Life of Hugo Grotius by Burigny, English Edit. 1754, 8vo, Book IV and VI. p. 339.

among other things, he had procured in 1634 a very curious copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch from the East; besides one of the old Testament in [GG] Syriac, and other valuable manuscripts. And notwithstanding the aforementioned necessary avocations in the discharge of his episcopal office, he prosecuted his studies with indefatigable diligence, the fruits of which appeared in 1638, when he published at Dublin, in 4to, his Emanuel, or a Treatise on the Incarnation of the Son of God (ll), which was followed by his Britannicarum Ecclesiarum [III] Antiquitates (mm) in the ensuing year. In the beginning of 1640, he came into England with his family, intending (as before) to return in a year or two at farthest. Soon after his arrival he went to Oxford (nn) for the more convenience of pursuing his studies: but these were unhappily interrupted by the urgent necessity of the times which put him upon writing some pieces that were published at Oxford in 1641, upon the subject of episcopacy [II]: It was about this time also, that he drew up his remarkable treatise concerning the Power of the Prince, and Obedience of the Subject [KK], and the same year being (ll) The second edition came out in 1643 at Oxford, the third at London in 1641, the fourth in 1642, and the fifth was reprinted in 1670 in 16. It is reckoned a matter of our Author.

1640-50. Svo: It treats of the antiquity, virtues, copiousness, use, unity, and canals of the said tongue. To it is annexed a copper-plate print, in form of an almanack, divided into several columns, one of which contains the orthography, another the etymology, of consonants, vowels, and accents, another the syntax of the holy tongue, &c. S. A general grammar of the Hebrew, Samaritan, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, and Ethiopic tongues, Lond. 1147, Svo. There are also other cuts annexed to this for the sake of explanation, and at the end is subjoined, Sequitur Decuria epistolarum ad optatum ex variis orbis partibus commissarum, circa Orientalium studiorum promovendorum curam, Lond. 1648, Svo. These epistles were written to Ravis by several learned men: Among others there is one of Mr (afterwards Dr) Edward Pococke, dated at Oxford, July 16, 1647, which begins thus: 'Clariff. et doctiff. Viri, Binus a Te literas accepi, nraque Libelles genuinum ingenii aritari factum, et affectus singularis indicium.' And a little after are these words: 'Concordantiarum compendium a Te elaboratum avidè expectamus, quod haud dubie usus singularis omnibus Christianis futurum &c.' 9. Epistole varie ad doctissimos Viros; besides other things, as his Catena Magnetica, his Fons Zionis, his Chronologia Biblica, &c.

Our Ravius had a brother, called John Ravius, who was Professor of Eloquence in the University of Reslock, who published an edition of Cornelius Nepes in 1636; as also, Traclatus de profectionibus modalibus contra Scharfium, 1637, and Legica Novissima &c. 1638.

[GG] A very curious copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch, &c. It was one of the first of those Pentateuchs that ever were brought into these Western parts of Europe, as Mr Selden (86) and Dr Walton (87) acknowledge; and the Syriac Testament was much more perfect than had hitherto been seen in these parts. The other manuscripts were procured by the means of one Mr Davies, then a merchant at Aleppo. The Archbishop collated the Samaritan with the Hebrew, and marked the differences, after which he intended it for the library of Sir Robert Cotton (88). But this, as well as the other manuscripts, being borrowed of him by Dr Walton, and made use of by him in the edition of the Polyglot Bible, were not recovered out of the hands of that Bishop's executors till the year 1686, and are now in the Bodleian library at Oxford.

[III] Britan. Eccles. Antiquitates. This history contains a most exact account of the British church, from the first planting of Christianity in twenty years after our Saviour's crucifixion. He brings it down, both in Britain and Ireland, to the end of the VIIIth century. The piece was of great service, particularly to Dr Lloyd (89) and Bishop Stillingfleet (90), his followers upon the same subject. And a good use has been made of it by Mr Thoresby in an imperfect treatise, first printed in this work (91).

[II] Some pieces upon the subject of Episcopacy. These were: 1. The judgment of Dr Reynolds concerning the original of Episcopacy defended. 2. The Original of Bishops, or a chorographical and historical disquisition touching the Indian or Proconsular Asia, and the seven metropolitane churches contained therein. The design of this treatise is to prove, from Acts xix. 17. supported by Rev. ii. 1. and confirmed by Ecclesiastical history, that Bishops and Metropolitans were instituted by the Apostles; meaning only with regard to their superiority in degree; for he did not hold Episcopacy to be a superior order to Presbytery. He also endeavours to prove, that the Bishop of Ephesus was not only the Metropolitan of the Proconsular Asia, but the Primate or Exarch of all the provinces that were comprehended within the compass of the whole Asian diocese; and that he acted suitably to the patriarchal jurisdiction, which was in effect conferred upon him. In the prosecution of the argument he shews: 1. That the Stars described in the Revelations are the Angels of the seven churches. 2. That these Angels were the several Bishops of those churches, and not the whole college of Presbyters. 3. That each of these seven churches was at that time a metropolis. 4. That these Bishops were ordained by the Apostles as constant permanent officers in the church, and so in a sort Jure Divino, not to be dispensed with except in cases of necessity. These tracts were printed with others upon the same subject under the following title: Certain Chief treatises, written by diverse learned men, concerning the ancient and moderne government of the church, wherein both the primitive institution of episcopacy is maintained, and the lawfulness of the ordination of Protestant Ministers beyond the seas likewise defended, Oxford, 1641, 4to. Some of his Grace's arguments in this learned tract have been generally thought too high-strained even by the orthodox part of Divines. No wonder therefore that Milton was raised to the height of exultation upon it. Nor is it more a wonder to find the fiery malevolence of that antiepiscopal spirit falling upon the Archbishop in his strongest fort, and where he is fairly defensible against any attack whatsoever. His Grace observes, that the ground of episcopacy is fetched partly from the pattern prescribed in the Old Testament, and partly by the imitation thereof brought in by the Apostles. The champion for a Presbyterian parity takes this position to task, and having poured forth a redundancy of wit, void of solid reasoning, to prove the divine institution in the Gospel of the Presbyterian form of church government, he concludes in these words, which are produced as an exact sample of all that goes before: 'We may remember then, says he, that Prelaty neither hath nor can have foundation in the law, nor yet in the gospel; which assertion, as being for the plainness thereof a matter of eyesight rather than of disquisition, I voluntarily admit, not forgetting to specify this note again, that the earnest desire which the Prelates have to build their hierarchy upon the sandy bottom of the law, gives us abundantly to see the little assurance which they find to rear up their high roofs by the authority of the gospel; repulsed as it were from the writings of the Apollles, and driven to take sanctuary among the Jews. Hence that open confession of the Primate beforementioned, Episcopacy is fetched partly from the pattern of the Old Testament, and partly from the New as an imitation of the Old; though nothing can be more rotten in divinity than such a position as this, and is all one as to say, Episcopacy is partly of divine institution, and partly of man's own carving. For who gave the authority to fetch more from the pattern of the law than what the Apostles had already fetched, if they fetched any thing at all, as hath been proved they did not. So was Jeroboam's episcopacy, partly from the pattern of the law, and partly from the pattern of his own carnality; a party-coloured and a party-membered Episcopacy; and what can this be less than monstrous (91)?

[KK] His piece upon the power of the Prince, &c. This tract was not printed till after the Restoration, when it came out with a remarkable preface by Bishop Sanderfon. It is too well known to need any comment here. We shall only take notice, that Dr Parr seems to have had this look in his eye (92), where he tells us, that, after the sitting of the long parliament, the Primate made it his business, as well by preaching as writing, to exhort them to loyalty and obedience to

(91) Pattern of church government, page 1 and 2. Prelaty. Book I. Chap. V.

(92) In the same work, p. 44.

(86) The second edition of Autoris Manuscriptum was printed at Lon. in 1687. (87) An apartment was provided for him in the lodgings of Dr Marston, Regius Hebrew Professor. Parr, p. 44.

(86) In Marmore Arund. &c. (87) Præfat. ad Bibl. Polyglott.

(88) Our Author's letter to Mr Selden, No. 125 in Parr, where he gives an account of these MSS.

(89) In his Historical Account of the ancient church government in Great Britain and Ireland.

(90) In his Origines Britannicæ.

(91) See his article, in rem. [G].

ing consulted by the King in the Earl of Strafford's affair, he gave his opinion against his Majesty's signing the bill [LL] for attainting that nobleman. In the rebellion which broke out ' their Prince, endeavouring, to the utmost of his power, to heal up those breaches, and reconcile those differences, that were ready to break out both in church and state. The book was wrote by the King's command, but forborn then to be published because of the ' increasing violence of the times.' And, if we may believe the aforementioned writer of the Archbishop's life, the reason of his not doing it during the time of the Usurper was, an apprehension that either his adherents or others might interpret it to his advantage. It was published by his Grace's grandson, James Tyrrel, Esq; in 1661. Bishop Sanderson observes (93), that in it every thing may be found which can be met with either in the Holy Scriptures, fathers, philosophers, common reason, and the laws and statutes of the realm, to prove it altogether unlawful for a subject to take up arms against his sovereign Prince, and is also there made use of to the greatest advantage. Dr Parr has given his Grace's answers to several queries proposed to him while he was at Oxford concerning this matter, in one of which (94) he gives the following rule for obeying extrajudicial precepts of his Majesty: " If they be such, says he, as command me to be active in doing that which is unjust by the known law of the land, he yields true obedience that denies to fulfil such a command: Only this must not be generally pronounced as a rule in time of war, where necessity will be in many things a stronger law than that which is fixed for a peaceable government. But if they be any of such commands as make me only passive in requiring some of my estate by a loan or tax, I may not hastily square with my Sovereign by denial and standing out: For any man, as he may recede from his right, and that which is his own, so ought he not to contest with his Sovereign upon matters of no very great moment. As for the infringing of the liberties of the Subject, such taxes or loans, or any other extrajudicial commands, must be general, extending to all or most subjects; and customary, being often imposed before they can be judged so immediately to infringe the Subject's liberties, as to make a subject think he is bound to deny." Hence it appears, that the Archbishop knew how to distinguish between unlimited passive obedience and legal resistance. He held every means for defending and maintaining the liberties of the Subject lawful except that of taking up arms against him: But all attempts of that kind, either by open violence or secret machinations, he absolutely condemned, as built apparently upon popish principles, which he took all proper occasions to expose. In that spirit we find him preaching a remarkable sermon in St Mary's church at Oxford, before the University, on the fifth of November this same year 1640 (95). One Ralph Buckland, a popish priest, had published two tracts in 12mo, intitled: 1. Seven Sparks of the enkindled Soul. 2. Four Lamentations, which, composed in the hard times of Queen Elizabeth, may be used at all times when the church happeneth to be extremely persecuted: Drawn out of the Holy Scriptures, after the form of psalms. To these was subjoined a Jesus psalter. Where or when these were printed is not mentioned in the title-page. However, that it was after the accession of King James I. to the crown of England appears in the first psalm, p. 12. thus: By the hand of thy great Servant James shake off our yoke, that we may find him an honorable Comforter— Beautify him with a name more precious than his crown; by the true name of a good King, &c. Our Primate having procured a copy of these pious pieces, took occasion in the sermon just mentioned to observe, that the said tracts having been printed at Rome in 1603, or thereabouts, the Gunpowder-treason, which was not discovered till 1605 in England, was known two years before at Rome, where these two tracts were printed in 1603, or thereabouts; and that prayers were sent up there at the same time for the prosperous success of the said treasonable plot, which was evident from several passages in these tracts, which he read before his audience, as follows: Pf. ii. p. 25. Confirm their hearts in hope; for the redemption is not far off. The year of visitation draweth to an end: and Jubilation is at hand.— Pf. ii. p. 32. But the memory of Novelties shall perish with a crack: as a ruinous house falling to the ground.— Ibid. p. 33. He will come as a flame that burneth out beyond the furnace, &c. His fury shall fly forth as thunder.— Pf. iv. p. 54. The crack was heard into all lands; and made Nations quake for fear.— Ibid. p. 66. In a moment

canst thou crush her bones, &c. But we must not omit the remarks made hereupon by Mr Wood, who, having informed us, that all these passages delivered from the pulpit by our learned and godly Archbishop were then generally believed, proceeds thus: ' I must make bold to tell the Reader, being an eager pursuer of truth, that, by the several copies of the said books which I have seen, it doth not appear at all that they were printed at Rome (96), or where else: and if it may really be guessed by the make or mould of the letter where-with they were printed, I should rather take them (as one or more Doctors of the University do the like) to have been printed either at Rheims or Doway, or not unlikely at Antwerp: For at Rome there were seldom before that time, then or since, such fine or clear letters used, as by multitudes of books which I have seen, that were printed at that place, appears; nor indeed ever were or are any English books printed there (97).' This most diligently inquisitive writer furnishes us, pursuant to the plan of his work, with an account of the author, Ralph Buckland, who, he says, was ' an Esquire's son, born and descended from an ancient genteel family of his name at West Harptree in Somersetshire, became a Commoner of Magdalen-college, Oxford, in Michaelmas term, 1579, aged fifteen, or thereabouts; but, before he took a degree, went to London, and studied the Common law. At length, being inflamed with a love to the Roman catholic religion, he left his parents, country, and the prospect of a fair inheritance (for he was the first heir to his father) and went forthwith (by the instigation, without doubt, of some priest) to the English college at Rheims; in which place and at Rome he spent about seven years, in the eager obtaining of knowledge in philosophy and divinity. Afterwards being made priest, and sent into the mission of England, lived chiefly, I presume, in his own country, and spent above twenty years in doing offices belonging to his profession.' Then follows an account of his writings, beginning with the two tracts abovementioned, which he calls, Two little things that contain ejaculations very full of most fervent devotion for the reconciliation of England and Scotland to the Romish church. The next piece is, An Embassy from Heaven, wherein our Lord Christ giveth to understand his indignation against all such as, being catholically minded, dare yield their presence to the rites and public prayers of the malignant church, in 8vo, without date of time or place. He also translated, from Latin into English, a book, intitled, De persecutione Vandelica, lib. 3. written in Latin by Victor, Bishop of Biserte or Benserte in Africa. Also the six tomes of Laur. Surius, De vitis Sanctorum. After this the conclusion follows in these terms: " What else our zealous Author hath written and translated I find not as yet, nor any thing else of him only that he, dying in 1611, was buried, I presume, in his own country, near to the graves of his ancestors, who were all zealous Roman catholics, but since not. He left behind him, among the Brethren, the character of a most pious and seraphical person, a person who went beyond all of his time for fervent devotion (98)." We have transcribed this article of Buckland, in Mr Wood's own words, because it is a remarkable instance of the truth of Bishop Burnet's charge against the Antiquary for his partiality to the Roman catholics (99).

[LL] He gave his opinion against his Majesty's signing that bill.] His Grace having been misrepresented in this matter, we shall give a just account of it; and first from Dr Nicholas Bernard's funeral sermon, in the preface to which he declares he had the account from the Primate himself in writing, as follows: ' That Sunday morning wherein the King consulted with the four Bishops (of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle) the Archbishop of Armagh was not present, being then preaching (as he then accustomed every Sunday to do) in the church of Covent-garden; where a message coming unto him from his Majesty, he descended from the pulpit, and told him that brought it, he was then, as he saw, employed about God's business; which as soon as he had done, he would attend upon the King to understand his pleasure. But the King spending the whole afternoon in the serious debate of the Lord Strafford's case with the Lords of the Council and the Judges of the land, he could not before evening be admitted into his Majesty's presence. There

(93) In the preface.

(94) Viz. the 7th. There are eight queries in all.

(95) MS. in Biblioth. Tho. Marshall, coll. Lincoln. Oxon.

(96) I believe it will hardly be doubted that the Primate had proper information of the time and place where the books were printed, probably by the same conveyance that procured them for him.

(97) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 375.

(98) Ibid. col. 374, 375.
(99) Vindication &c. and Answer &c. of the Oxford Historiographer, prefixed to the 2d Volume of Athen. Oxon. Second Edition, 1721.

out this year in Ireland, the Popish party made spoil of all the effects of the Primate, except some furniture in his house at Drougheda, and his library there, which were conveyed thence to Chester. Thus deprived and plundered, he never more saw his native country, and had the Bishoprick of Carlisle, lately vacant by the death of Dr Potter, given him by the King to hold in commendam; but the revenues of it were much impaired by the quartering of the Scotch and English armies upon it: neither did he above once or twice receive the annual pension of four hundred pounds voted to be given him by the Parliament, upon their seizing the Bishop's lands [MM]. In 1642, he returned to Oxford, where besides his close

There the question was again agitated, whether the King in justice might pass the bill of attainder against the Earl of Strafford; for that he might shew mercy to him was no question at all, no man doubting but that the King, without any scruple of conscience, might have granted him a pardon, if other reasons of state, in which the Bishops were made neither Judges nor Advisers, did not hinder him. The whole result therefore of the determination of the Bishops was to this effect, that therein the matter of fact and matter of law were to be distinguished. That of matter of fact he himself might make a judgment; having been present at all the proceedings against the Earl, where, if, upon hearing the allegations on either side, he did not conceive him guilty of the crimes where-with he was charged, he could not in justice condemn him. But for matter of law, what was reason, and what was not, he was to rest in the opinion of the Judges, whose office it was to declare the law, and who were sworn therein to carry themselves indifferently between him and his subjects, which gave his Majesty occasion to complain of the dealing of the Judges with him not long before; that, having earnestly pressed them to declare in particular, what point of the Lord Strafford's charge they judged to be treasonable, (forasmuch as, upon hearing of the proofs produced, he might in his conscience perhaps find him guilty of the fact) he could not by any means draw them to nominate any in particular, but that, upon the whole matter, treason might justly be charged upon him. And in this second meeting it was observed, that the Bishop of London spake nothing at all; but the Bishop of Lincoln not only spake, but put a writing also into the King's hand, wherein what was contained the rest of his brethren knew not (100).

(100) Parr, p. 46.

This account is certainly sufficient to any candid Enquirer. But it having been laid to the Primate's charge, that he persuaded the King to sign this bill out of revenge, because the Earl, when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, had outwitted him, and made him the instrument, before he was aware, of abrogating the Irish articles of religion, that pretence has been invalidated, as we have already seen, by Dr Parr, who exposes it smartly enough, observing, that if the Primate had any private grudge against the Earl upon this score, he carried it very slyly, inasmuch that neither the Earl himself nor any of his friends were sensible of it. For, says he, whilst the Earl continued in Ireland, there never was any dispute or unkindness between them, but they parted good friends. The Earl wrote to him after this business, and not long before his going for England, full of kindness and respect. And after the Earl's commitment to the black rod, as also when he was a prisoner in the Tower, the Primate frequently visited him, and the Earl was pleased to consult with him in divers matters relating to his defence at his trial. Now certainly, had the Earl believed that the Primate bore any malice towards him, much more had advised the King to put him to death (which could not have been well concealed from him) though we may suppose the Earl had so much Christian charity as to forgive so great an injury, yet, it is not very likely that he should exercise such a piece of mortification as to chuse him, whom he believed to be the promoter of his death, to prepare him for it, and to be the man to whom he addressed his speech upon the scaffold, and whose assistance he desired in that his last extremity. Dr Parr likewise assures us (101), that, in the Primate's extreme illness at St Donate's castle in Wales, he asked his Grace whether he had advised the King to pass the bill against the Earl of Strafford. To which the Primate answered: I know there is such a thing most wrongfully laid to my charge; for I neither gave nor approved of any such advice, as that the King should assent to the bill against the Earl; but, on the contrary, told his Majesty, that, if he was satisfied, by what he had heard at his trial, that the Earl was not guilty of treason, his Majesty ought not in conscience to consent to his condemnation. And this the King knows well enough; and can clear me, if he please. Nor was the Primate, continues Dr Parr, mistaken in this: For when, not long after, it was told his Majesty at Oxford, that the Archbishop of Armagh was dead, he spoke to Colonel William Legg and Mr Kirk, then of the Bedchamber, to this effect, 'that he was very sorry for his death,' together with high expressions of his piety and merits. And when one there present replied, 'that he believed he might be so, were it not for his persuading your Majesty to consent to the Earl of Strafford's execution.' To which the King in a great passion returned, that it was false; 'for, said he, after the bill was past, the Archbishop came to me, saying, with tears in his eyes, 'Oh Sir! what have you done? I fear that this will prove a great trouble to your conscience, and pray God that your Majesty may never suffer by the signing of this bill;' or words to that effect (102). Moreover it is certain, that his Majesty, the next day after he had signed the bill, and the day before the Earl's execution, pitched upon the Primate as the fittest person to be entrusted with a message of the most interesting nature, to be delivered privately to the Earl. We have a letter, written by Mr Radcliff to William Earl of Strafford (son to the former Earl) the contents of which are as follows:

(101) Page 61.

(102) Of this Dr Parr had an affidavit, signed by the persons here named.

My Lord,

Since I wrote last to your Lordship, my Lord Primate hath shewed me my Lord Primate Usher's Anna-nack. In the beginning whereof I find written what is contained in the note I here send your Lordship, the contents whereof being the only occasion of this letter. I rest,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most humble

Dublin,
Nov. 17,
1666.

And obedient Servant,

Thomas Radcliffe.

P. S. The Lord Primate Usher's note.

May 11, 1641.

The King wisheth me to deliver unto my Lord Strafford tomorrow,

1. That if the King's life only were hazarded thereby, he would never have given passage unto his death.
2. That the execution, without extreme danger, could not be deferred.
3. That he was moved by the Lords for his wife and children, and intended to dispose his entire estate upon them.
4. That if his son be capable, he will take especial notice of him for his employment and preferment (which I must tell none but him).
5. That for Lord Chancellor Lowther and Derry, he stops the proceedings, until they give good reason for their authority.
6. Lord Dillon's ability above all the Natives.
7. Earl of Ormond will be Knight of the Garter in his place.
8. Carpenter to be at liberty to look to his estate, or any one whom he shall appoint to have care of his children (103).

[MM] He was plundered upon seizing of the Bishop's lands.] Dr Bernard, in his funeral sermon, tells us, that about this time Cardinal Richelieu invited him into France, with a promise of a very noble pension, besides freedom of his religion: And Dr Parr observes this is not unlikely (though he never heard his Lordship speak of it) from an instance of the honour that Cardinal shewed him, upon receiving a present of his treatise of the antiquity of the British churches, by a letter full of kindness and respect, accompanied with a gold medal of considerable value, with his own effigies stamp't upon it, which, says Dr Bernard, is still preserved. The

(103) Strafford's Letters, &c. Vol. II. verus finem, where there is also a letter of the Earl to Sir G. Radcliff with this expression: The King saith he will give all my estate to my son, sends me word so by my Lord Primate.

same

(pp) In 1647, he printed at London in 4to, under the title of Appendix Ignatiana, a new edition of the genuine letters of Ignatius, with a new Latin version, and some pieces relating to Ignatius, with remarks, in which he endeavours to prove the genuineness of those letters, and explains several points of close application to study, he preached every Sunday at some of the churches [NN]. The following year he was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, but was so far from complying to it, that he even spoke against their authority in some of his sermons, upon which he was not only voted out again, but his library seized by the Parliament; yet he met with some friends who redeemed it [OO]. In 1644, he published (oo) at Oxford Polycarpi et Ignatii Epistolæ, &c. (pp). Quibus præfixa est non de Ignatii solum et Polycarpi Scriptis sed etiam de Apostolicis Constitutionibus et Canonibus Clementi Romano Attributis Dissertatio: Upon the decline of the King's affairs, Oxford being threatened with a siege, he left that city, and retired to Caerdiff in Wales to the house of Sir Timothy Tyrrel, who had married his only daughter, and was then Governor of that garrison, and General of the Ordnance. Having brought many chests of books with him, he prosecuted his studies here undisturbed for six months, and made a good progress in the first part of his Annals: Till this garrison was antiquity. Vid. Jortin's Remarks upon Ecclesiast. Hist. from p. 54 to p. 68, and from p. 355 to p. 372.

(104) In vita Usserii, p. 84, 85.

(105) See Letter 306 from Usher to Arnold Boot, dated London, Nov. 29, 1651.

(106) This church has been since rebuilt, and situated in the High-street, at some small distance from the college.

same writer also says, that the University of Leyden offered at this time to chuse him their honorary Professor, with an increase of the stipend. It is true, these facts are somewhat questioned by Dr Smith (104), who however does not omit mentioning, that the Primate was invited ten years afterwards by Anne of Austria to that kingdom (105), but upon what terms he could not tell.

[NN] He preached every Sunday at one or other of the churches in Oxford.] He had generally a crowded audience, and, as he preached frequently at the church of All-hallows, joining to Lincoln-college (106), Thomas Marshall, then a young Student of that college, constantly attended his Grace's sermons there, which so exceedingly wrought upon his affections, that he resolved from thenceforth to make him the pattern of all the religious and learned studies and conduct of his life, and therefore could never after endure those that should, in their common discourse and writings, reflect in the least on our sacred Prelate. This Dr Marshall became afterwards an exemplary Divine, and an eminent Critic in the Gothic and Saxon languages, and on that account challenges some further notice to be taken of him in these memoirs. He was the son of a father of both his names, was born at Barkeby in Leicestershire, educated there in grammar-learning under Francis Foe, Vicar of that town, entered a Bachelor in Lincoln-college in Michaelmas term, 1640, aged nineteen years, and on the 21st of July the following year he was elected one of Robert Trapp's scholars in that house, about which time it was that he became a constant auditor of Archbishop Usher at All-hallows church, the advowson whereof is in that college. Soon after Oxford being garrisoned upon the breaking out of the rebellion, he bore arms therein for his Majesty in the regiment of Henry Earl of Dover at his own proper costs and charges, and therefore in 1645, when he stood candidate for the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was admitted thereto without paying fees. But, upon the approach of the parliamentary visitation, he left the University, crossed the seas, and became Preacher to the English merchants at Rotterdam and Dort, in the place of Henry Tozer, deceased (a). In 1661 he was admitted Bachelor of Divinity, and four years after, publishing Observations on the Evangelists, did thereby revive the memory of himself so much in his college, that the Society chose him Fellow thereof without his knowledge or seeking, Dec. 17, 1668. In the year following he proceeded Doctor in his faculty, and upon the promotion of Dr Crew to the see of Oxford (*), he succeeded that munificent benefactor in the rectory of his college, and was afterwards appointed Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty. In the month of May, 1680, he became Rector of Bladon near Woodstock in Oxfordshire; and, upon the promotion of Doctor Frampton to the see of Gloucester, he was nominated Dean of that church in January, 1680; in which deanery being installed on the 30th of April, 1681, he resigned the rectory of Bladon in February, 1682. Neither did he live to enjoy the Deanery many years, his death happening suddenly at his lodgings at

(*) See his article.

(a) There is something singular in the character of this Divine, who was a Devonshire man, born in 1602, elected Fellow of Exeter-college in 1623, and, taking holy orders, became a useful person in the society, by moderating, reading to Novices, and lecturing in the chapel. He afterwards proceeded B. D. and became an able and painful Preacher, had much of the primitive religion in his sermons, and seemed to be a most precise Puritan in his looks and life, on which account his preachings and expoundings in the churches of St Gyles and St Martin in Oxford were much frequented by the puritannical party. But being elected one of the Assembly of Divines in 1643, he refused to sit among them. In 1646, a little before the garrison of Oxford was surrendered to the Parliament, he was one of those Divines who, having either preached at Christ-church before his Majesty, or at St Mary's before the Parliament, were nominated by the Chancellor of the University for the degree of D. D. but this also he, as others,

Lincoln-college, early in the morning of the 19th of April, 1685. He was buried in that chancel commonly called the college-chancel of the church of All-hallows, or All-saints aforementioned. By his last will and testament he gave to the public library of the University of Oxford all such of his books, whether manuscripts or printed, that were not then in the said library, except only such as were in his said will otherwise disposed of: and the remaining part to Lincoln-college library, that is, such as were not already there at that time. Also he gave to the said college the money that should be raised by the sale of his estate: This amounted to the sum of 600l. and upwards, with which was purchased 14l. per annum, a fee-farm-rent issuing out of the manor of little Dean in Gloucestershire, and 12l. per annum, a rent-charge out of some lands in Brill in Bucks: Which benefaction is now enjoyed by three scholars of the society. Upon the whole, the Oxford Antiquary does him no more than strict justice, when he records him as a person very well versed in books, a noted Critic, especially in the Gothic and English Saxon tongues, a painful preacher, a good man, and a good Governor, and one every way worthy of his station in the church. He hath written: 1. Observationes in Evangeliorum versiones perantiquas duas Gothica scilicet et Anglo Saxonica &c. Dordrecht, 1665, in a thick large 4to. 2. The Catechism set forth in the book of Common-prayer, briefly explained by short notes, grounded upon Holy Scripture. Oxford, 1679, 8vo. The short notes were drawn up and composed by our Author at the desire and motion of Dr Fell, Bishop of Oxford, to be used by the ministers of his diocese in catechizing the children of their respective parishes. In other editions, that followed soon after, was added, An Essay of Questions and Answers framed out of the same notes, for the exercise of youth, by the same hand: Which catechism, with the notes and essay, was translated into Welsh by John Williams, a Cambridge scholar, but Tutor to a nobleman of Jesus-college in Oxford, printed at Oxford, 1682, 8vo. 3. An Epistle for the English reader, prefixed to Dr Thomas Hyde's translation, into the Malayan language, Of the four gospels of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Acts of the Apostles, Oxford, 1677, 4to, in a sheet and a half. Dr Marshall did also take a great deal of pains in completing the life of Primate Usher, published by Dr Richard Parr, but died before it saw the light (107).

[OO] He met with friends who redeemed it.] It was seized by the Committee of Delinquents estates, and would have been sold by them, had not Dr Featly, who was then in some favour with them (108), made interest, by the means of Mr Selden, to obtain them for his own use, either as a gift, or by laying down some money for them; and so got them into his hands, and secured them for the Primate. But several were either embezzled or stolen whilst in their custody. Among others, diverse papers and collections of his own writing, with all his letters, either to or from his learned friends, which he had left behind him, were then plundered.

refused. In 1647 and 1648 he behaved himself as a stout champion against the unreasonable proceedings of the parliamentary visitors: For which being posted up by them for an expelled scholar, they revoked the sentence so far, that by an order, dated Nov. 2, 1648, they empowered him to use his chamber in Exeter-college, and also ordered that he should enjoy a traveller's allowance for three years: Upon which he went to Holland, and became Minister to the English merchants at Rotterdam, where he died in 1650, and was buried in the English church there, appointed to the said merchants. He published Directions for a Godly life, especially for communicating at the Lord's table, Oxon. 1628, 8vo, and then again the tenth time in 1680, 8vo. 2. Diæta & fæsa Christi, ex quatuor Evangelistis collecta, et in ordine disposita, Oxford, 8vo. Besides several sermons; as, 1. A Christian amendment. 2. Christian wisdom &c. 3. A sermon on John xviii. 3. printed respectively at Oxford in 1633, 1639, and 1646 (*).

(oo) This library consisted either of such books as the Primate had either brought over with him, or bought there, or left behind in Chelsea College, Parr, p. 50.

(107) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 782, 783.

(108) He sat in the Assembly of Divines, though otherwise orthodox and loyal. He had been Chaplain to Abp. Abbot. Some of his letters to our Author are in Parr's Collection.

(*) Ibid. col. 133, 134, partly from the mouth of Dr Marshall, who, he says, was always taken for an honest and conscientious Puritan;

unfurnished

unfurnished for the King's service, and his son-in-law obliged to give up his post, and quit the place. In this exigence, he very gladly accepted of an invitation from Lady Dowager Stradling to come to the castle at St Donate. But in passing thither, he unluckily fell into the hands of the Mountaineers, who stript him of all his books and papers, which yet were afterwards in a great measure recovered by the kindness of the Clergy, and Gentlemen of that country [PP]; and he met with an excellent library at St Donate, which he did not neglect to make use of while he was able; but within a month after his arrival, he was seized with a fit of sickness, which reduced him to the last extremity (99). After his recovery, he went to London by the invitation of the Countess of Peterborough [QQ], at whose house he arrived in June, 1646 (*); and in the beginning of the next year was chosen Preacher to the Society of Lincoln's-Inn [RR]. This year he published his treatise De Romanæ Ecclesiæ Symbolo (rr), which following by his Dissertatio de Macedonum et Asianorum anno solari in the beginning of 1648, 8vo (ss) [SS]. About this time he was sent for to the Isle of Wight by his Majesty, to assist him in treating with the Parliament upon the point of episcopacy; when he proposed an expedient, which he called Presbyterian and Episcopal Government conjoined (tt) [TT], which the King approved as the likeliest means of reconciling the

(99) It began with the flaggers, and a suppression of urine, and was relieved by bleeding at the nose for 40 hours without any considerable intermission.

(*) In his way to London, passing through Gloucester, he had a conference with John Biddle, the famous Unitarian, about his notions; but without any success, as might be expected. See Biddle's article, Vol. II. p. 737.

(tt) It was printed by Dr Bernard in 1658.

[PP] He was robbed by &c. The Mountaineers, just as he was ready to go, got up, to the number of ten thousand, in arms, in a tumultuous manner, and, chusing officers, formed themselves into a body, as was pretended, for the King: but they would neither be governed by English commanders, nor suffer any English garrisons in the country. To avoid these men, who lay between Caerdiffe and Donate, some persons in Caerdiffe, at the request of the Governor, undertook to convey him through by-ways; but they unluckily fell into the hands of a straggling party that was scouting thereabouts, who, carrying them to the main body, immediately broke open the Primate's chest of books, &c. and ransacking his manuscripts, and papers of his own writing, these were quickly dispersed into a thousand hands; nor so content, they pulled the Primate and his daughter, and other ladies, from their horses; all which he bore with his usual patience and a seeming unconcernedness; when some of their officers (who were gentlemen of the country) coming in, seemed very much ashamed of this barbarous treatment, and caused their horses and other things to be restored: but the books and papers could not then be retrieved. They afterwards conducted him back to Sir John Aubrey's house, not far off, where he was very civilly received, and lodged that night. When he came thither, and had retired himself, 'I must confess, says Dr Parr, that I never saw him so much troubled in my life; and those that were with him before myself said, that he seemed not more sensibly concerned for all his losses in Ireland than for this; saying to his daughter and those that endeavoured to comfort him; I know that it is God's hand, and that I must endeavour to bear it patiently; though I have too much human frailty not to be extremely concerned; for I am touched in a very tender place; and he has thought fit to take from me at once all that I have been gathering together above these twenty years, for the advancement of learning and the good of the church.' Divers of the neighbouring gentry and clergy came to visit him next day, and, condoling his loss, promised to do their utmost to retrieve his books and papers, if not torn and burnt, and civilly attended him to St Donate, and by publishing in the churches every where in those parts, that all who had any such books or papers should bring them to their masters or landlords, there was brought, within two or three months, almost all his books and papers; so that we found not many wanting (110).

[QQ] He went to London &c. Before he left Wales, his finances being much reduced by an expensive sickness, as well as by removals, the year past, several gentlemen of the country sent him, unknown to each other, divers considerable sums; so that in a few weeks he had enough to supply all his present occasions, and also to defray the expences of his journey to England. This was considered by him as a particular Providence, for which he was very thankful. It is certain the supply was very seasonable: For it now began not to be safe for him to stay at St Donate. Wherefore Oxford being like to be taken, and not caring willingly to trust himself at London, he reassumed his former thoughts of passing beyond-sea; and, having provided a vessel, had procured a pass for that purpose from the Earl of Warwick, then Admiral. But, as they were preparing to go, there came into the road before Caerdiffe a squadron of ships under the command of one Moulton, Vice-admiral for the Parliament. Whereupon the Primate sent his Chaplain to him, then on shore at Caerdiffe, to know if he would suffer him to go, shewing the pass; which Moulton not only refused to comply with, but said, if he could get the Primate into his hands, he would carry him to the Parliament, and threatened to send the Chaplain immediately to his ship. So that this invitation from Lady Peterborough was exceedingly welcome to the Primate; and, having procured passes, he left St Donate's, after almost a year's residence there (111).

[RR] He was chosen Preacher at Lincoln's-Inn. The Society ordered him handsome lodgings, ready furnished, and divers rooms for his library, which was about this time brought up from Chester, being almost all the remains of his substance that had escaped the rebels. Mr (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) Hale was then a Bencher of the Society, and probably had the chief hand in procuring him this place; and it happened that the Society was well rewarded for it by that treasure lodged in this library by the Lord Chief Justice in four volumes, which were extracted from the Primate's MSS (112); of which Dr Parr has subjoined to his life of the Primate a Catalogue, consisting of thirty-three very curious books. Here the Primate constantly preached all the Term time for almost eight years, till at last, his eyesight and teeth beginning to fail him, he could not well be heard in so large a congregation, and was forced to quit this place about a year and a half before his death, to the great regret of that Society (113).

[SS] De Asianorum anno solari. In this tract, besides fixing the exact time of St Polycarp's martyrdom, he hath compared the Grecian and Macedonian months with the Julian and other nations, and, having laid down the method and disposition of the Macedonian and Asiatic year, he adds rules for finding out the cycles of the Sun and Moon, and Easter for ever, with several curious accounts of the celestial motions according to the ancient Greek Astronomers, Meloni, Calippus, Eudoxus, and others. To which is annexed an Ephemeris, or intire Greek and Roman Calendar for the whole year, with the rising and setting of the stars in that climate.

[TT] Presbyterian and Episcopal government conjoined. Soon after his arrival, the King having consented, though unwillingly, to the suspension of Episcopacy for three years, would by no means agree to the absolute abolition of it, which was obstinately insisted on by the Presbyterians: wherefore, to put a stop to the present career of the presbyterian discipline, this expedient was devised by the Primate (114), which, not long after his coming thither, he delivered to his Majesty, who had before, in his last message to the Parliament, consented to the reducing of Episcopacy into a much narrower compass, viz. not only to the Apostolical Institution, but to the taking away of Archbishops, Deans, and Chapters, &c. and settling presbyterian government for three years, as has been said. This was more than was proposed by the Primate's plan, which supposes the Archbishops or Primates ought to be continued, appointing them Moderators of the Provincial Synods of Suffragans and Pastors. It is true, he mentions Bishops as to be only Presidents of the Diocesan Synods; yet he no where denies them a negative voice in that Assembly. And though in the beginning he says, that the Bishops in the primitive times were wont to do nothing of moment without the advice of a synod of their clergy, as he proves from divers quotations out of the Fathers and ancient Councils; yet he does not assert this practice as a thing of divine and unalterable right (as the Scotch kirk does) but only as the custom and practice of the church in those times which, being

(111) Parr, p. 63.

(112) In the catalogue of the Chief Justice's MSS. which he left them, they are called, Chronological Remembrances, extracted out of the notes of Ep Usher.

(113) Parr, p. 64, 65.

(114) It had been drawn up long before by him, if we may believe Dr Bernard, who published it in 1658, with this title, The Reduction of Episcopacy to the form of the Synodical government in the ancient church. Written in 1641 by that learned and revered Father of the church, Jamés Usher, Bishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland.

Dr Bernard also, in his Cham Treason, inserted two letters of the Primate's upon church government. See Ep Usher's article in Vol. V. p. 190 Remark [U].

(rr) It is dedicated to Gerard Vossius, and contains the various copies of the creed used in the Roman Church, with other forms of confessions of faith wont to be proposed to the Catechumens in the Eastern and Western Churches, with several other monuments of antiquity relating to the same.

(ss) These were both reprinted, with his Annals, at Geneva, 1722, folio.

(110) Parr, p. 59, 60. The most remarkable were two MSS. mentioned in remark [Q]. As also another MS. catalogue of the Persian Kings, communicated by Elæmannus; and one Vol. of *MS. varia lectio*nes of N. T.: and of printed books, only Tully's works, and some others. The *varia lectio*nes were such as were collected at Oxford: those done out of the Cambridge copies were saved, and several years after consulted by Dr Hammond in preparing his notes upon the N. T.

the then differences. But no propofals, how moderate foever, were able to fatisfy the Prefbyterians, till his Majesty was taken out of their hands by the army, and brought to the fcaffold, the fight of which struck our Primate with the utmoft horror [UU]. In 1650, he published the firft part of his Annals of the Old Testament (uu). In 1652 came out his Epiftola ad Ludovicum Capellum de variantibus Textus Hebraici Lectionibus, at London, 4to. In 1654, Cromwell now raifed to the Supreme Dignity with more than Kingly Power, under the title of Protector, thought it would become that character to put on the air and manner of a gracious Sovereign, equally regarding all his fubjects with a paternal care, without diftinction of parties or profefions. In this difpofition he began to fhew favour to fome of the orthodox Clergy of the Church of England: Among thefe was Dr Nicholas Bernard, who had been the Lord Primate's Chaplain in Ireland, and was afterwards Dean of Kilmore. Cromwell having faved his life at the taking of Drogheda, had now made him his Chaplain, when his Highnefs in the fame humour fending for the Primate, received him with great kindnefs and civility [WW], and the following year gave him a promife to grant liberty of confcience to the epifcopal Clergy [XX], which being evaded by the Ufurper, occafioned the Primate thereupon to predict the King's Reftoration [YY].

(uu) Second part came out 1654. The whole was printed in 1673 at Paris, and again in 1722 at Geneva, to which are added three of Usher's trafts, before printed with his Life by Dr T. Smith. See a character of it in Dean Prideaux's Connexion of the Old and New Testament. In the Preface to Vol. I.

The

only prudential, may be altered according to the exigency or circumftances of affairs. And though, in Sect. II. of this expedient, he propofes the making of as many Suffragans in each diocefe as there are rural deaneries in the fame, and who fhould afsemble a fynod of all the Rectors or Minifters of their precinct; yet their power was only to be according to the ftatute of 26 Henry VIII. whereby they are exprefly forbid to aft in any matters, but by the authority of, and in fubordination to, their diocefan Bifhops. Nor does he extend their power farther than to be Moderators of this leffer fynod, where matters of difcipline and excommunication only were to be determined, ftill referving power of ordination to the Diocefan, which was no where given from him in this expedient. Neither was this power of excommunication left abfolutely to this leffer fynod, without an appeal to the diocefan fynod of the Suffragans and the reft of the Paftors, wherein the Bifhop was to prefide. Thus much I fhall fay, continues Dr Parr, that it was not the Primate's defign or intention to rob the Bifhops of any of thofe juft rights which are essentially neceffary to their order and conftitution, and without debafing Epifcopacy into Prefbytery, or ftripping the church of its lands and revenues, both which he always abhorred. However, as his Majesty's propofal was voted unfatisfactory before this fcheme was delivered to him, there was no room to offer it; the Prefbyterians, as Dr Parr obferves, being bent to abolifh the very order of Bifhops (115), that no propofals of his Majesty, though ever fo moderate, would content them; till at laft, when they had wrangled fo long as to fee the King's perfon feized by the army, and that the power was likely to be taken out of their hands, then they grew wifer, and would have agreed to his propofals when it was too late; and fo, continues the Doctor, the Prefbyterian party faw themfelves within a few days after forcibly excluded, and turned out of doors by that very army which they themfelves had raifed, and hired to fight againft their Prince; which, as it was the caufe of his Majesty's defftruction, fo it proved their own ruin (116).

(115) Thus it happened, as in the famous Interim many years before in Germany, that neither fide were pleafed with this expedient: In which Dr Smith complains, that the Bifhops, being ftript of their peculiar power, both of order and jurisdiction, were left a meer empty name and shadow. Vita Ufferii, p. 77.
(116) Parr's life of the Archbp, p. 66, 67.

[UU] The King's execution struck him with horror. The Countefs of Peterborough's houfe, where the Primate then lived, being exactly oppofite to Charing-Crofs, feveral of the family, at the time of the King's execution, went up to the leads of the houfe, which commanded a full view of Whitehall; and, as foon as his Majesty came upon the fcaffold, fome of them went down and told the Primate, asking him if he would not fee the King once more before he was put to death. Though unwilling at firft, yet he was perfuaded at length to go up, as well out of a defire to fee the King once again as curiofity, fince he could fcarce believe what they told him unlefs he faw it. When he came upon the leads, his Majesty was in his fpeech: The Primate ftood ftill, and faid nothing, but fighed, and lifting his hands and eyes full of tears towards heaven, feemed to pray earneftly. But when the King had done fpeaking, and had taken off his cloaths and doublet, and ftood ftript in his waiftcoat, and the executioners in vizards began to put up his hair, the Primate grew pale, and began to faint; fo that, if he had not been obferved by his own fervant, and fome others who ftood near, and thereupon fupported him, he had fwooned away. Upon this, they prefently carried him down, and laid him on his bed, where he made ufe both of tears and prayers; tears that fo horrid a fin fhould be committed, and prayers that God would give his Prince patience and conftancy to undergo thofe cruel fufferings, and that he would not, for the vindication of his own honour, permit fo great a wickednefs to pafs unpunifhed (117). And he kept the 30th of January a private faft as long as he lived.

[WW] Cromwell received him very kindly. The converfation might not improbably (as Dr Parr was informed) turn chiefly about advancing the Proteftant intereft, as well at home as abroad, to which Cromwell made great pretences. And it was faid that, either now or fome other time, he gave the Primate a penfion for life (118); the truth of which is much queftioned by Dr Parr, who however tells us he remembered the Primate's faying that Oliver had promifed to make him a leafe of the lands belonging to the archbifhopric of Armagh for twenty-one years, which he thought it no harm to accept, confidering it was but his own, and which he had been deprived of above half that time, efpecially in confideration of his daughter, and many grandchildren, for whom he had as yet been able to do nothing. And if the church fhould happen to be reftored before that time, it could lofe nothing by this grant; and if not, he thought his children might as well reap the benefit of it as others. But though Dr Bernard, in his Epiftle to the Reader, prefixed to the life of the Primate, was made (by Cromwell's Secretary who then had the copy in his power) to publifh as if this grant had been really paffed, yet the Ufurper was craftier than fo; and as he delayed paffing it as long as the Primate lived, fo, after his death, he made a pretence (by imputing malignancy to the Primate's fon-in-law and daughter) to free himfelf from that promife (119).

(117) Id. p. 72. who tells us he had this from the Primate's grandfon, who heard it from his fervant, that lived with him till his death.

(118) This is afferted in the Primate's life, prefixed to a then late edition of the Body of Divinity, [XX] A promife of liberty of confcience to the Epifcopal clergy. It was by the particular defire of the Epifcopal clergy in and about London, that the application had been made for this favour to Cromwell, who promifed him they fhould not be molefted, provided they meddled not with any matters relating to his government. But when he went again, to get this promife ratified and put in writing, he found the Protector under the hands of his furgeon, who was dreffing a great boil that he had then upon his breaft. So he begged the Primate to fit down, faying he would fpeak with him when the dreffing was over. Whilst it was doing, he faid to the Primate, if this core (pointing to the boil) were once out, I fhould quickly be well. To which the Primate replied, I doubt the core lies deeper; there is a core at the heart that muft be taken out, or elfe it will not be well. Ah! replied Cromwell (feemingly unconcerned) fo there is indeed, and fighed. But, when the Primate began to fpeak of the bufinefs he came about, he answered to this effect, that he had fince better confidered it, having advifed with his council; who thought it not fafe for him to grant liberty of confcience to thofe fort of men, who are reftlefs, and implacable enemies to him and his government. And fo took his leave with good words and outward civility (120).

(119) Parr, p. 73.

[YY] He predicted the King's Reftoration. We have already obferved (121), that fuch kind of predictions were ufual with the Primate in expreffing his resentments of any great and violent wickednefs. Upon the prefent occafion, when he found it in vain to urge the matter any further, he returned to his lodgings very much troubled and concerned; and, when he was in his chamber, faid to fome of his relations, and Dr Parr that came to vifit him, This false man hath broken his word with me, and refufes to perform what he promifed. Well, he will

(120) Id. p. 75.

(121) In remark [K].

have

The same year, 1655, his Grace published his last piece, De Græca Septuaginta Interpretum verum Septagma, to which was subjoined, De Cainane in vulgata LXX editione superaddita ex ejusdem Chronologia Sacra nondum edita Dissertatio, una cum ejusdem edita ad Lud. Capellum de variantibus Textus Hebraici Lectionibus, anno 1652 & altera, a Gulielmo Byrio, ad eundem have little cause to glory in his wickedness; for he will not continue long. The King will return: Though I shall not live to see it, you may. The government both in church and state is in confusion. The Papists are advancing their projects, and making such advantages as will hardly be prevented (122). Upon the whole it cannot be denied, that the Primate's rebuke of his Highness, mentioned in the preceding remark, was not only very uncourtly, but extremely unseasonable at a time when he was come to petition a favour. With regard to his predicting the Restoration from the wickedness of the times and the prevalence of Popery, we shall present the Reader with the following particular account from a manuscript in the Museum Thoresbianum, intitled, 'The predictions of that learned and holy man Bishop Uther.

(122) Idem. ibid.

That year wherein he died, being asked by a gentleman 'what his present apprehensions were of a very great persecution that would fall upon the church of Christ in these nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, (concerning which he had ever confidently spoken many years past, when we were in the fullest peace and settlement) whether he did not believe these sad times to be passed, or whether yet to come?' He told me they were yet to come, and that he did as confidently expect them as ever he had done. That they would fall upon ourselves the Protestant churches in Europe. I answered, I hoped they might have been past as to this nation, since that I thought, though we in them had been punished less than our sins deserved, and that the wars had left much less devastation than by that means had been brought upon other countries, yet many a house, fair and great, had been left without inhabitants, many a family had been impoverished, and many thousand lives lost in that war; that Ireland and Scotland had drunk deep of the cup of God's anger, to the overthrow of government, and almost utter destruction of a great part of those nations.

He turning to me, and fixing his eyes with that ireful look which he used to have when he spake God's words, and not his own, and the power of God upon him to constrain him so to do, Fool not yourself with such hopes; for I tell you all that you have yet seen have been but the beginning of sorrows to what is yet to come upon the protestant churches of Christ; which shall, e'er long, fall under sharper persecutions than ever yet hath been upon them. And therefore, said he to me, look you be not found in the outer court, but a worshipper in the temple before the altar; for Christ will measure all that profess his name, and call themselves his people, and the outward worshippers he will leave to be trodden down by the Gentiles.

The outward court (said he) is the formal Christians, whose religion stands in performing the outside duties of Christianity, without having an inward life and power of faith and love uniting them to Christ; these God will leave to be trodden down and swept away by the Gentiles. But the worshippers within the temple and before the altar are those who worship God in spirit and truth, whose souls are made his temples, where he is honoured and adored in the most inward thoughts they have, and who sacrifice their lusts and foul affections in their own wills to him. God will hide them in the hollow of his hand and under the shadow of his wings. And that will be one great difference between these last and all other preceding persecutions: In them the most eminent and spiritual ministers were, first or last, violently fallen upon; but, in this last, these will be preserved by God, as a seed of that glory that shall immediately fall to the church as soon as these storms are over; for as they will be the sharpest, so they will be but short, and shall take away but the gross hypocrites and formalists, while the true spiritual believers shall be preserved till the calamity be past.

I then asked him by what instruments this great trial would be brought on. He answered, by the Papists. I replied, that seemed to me very improbable, since they were less countenanced, and less in number in these nations, and the hearts of the people were more set against them, than ever since the Reformation. He answered that it would be by their hands, and in the way of a sudden massacre, and that the now Pope would be the instrument of it. And these things he spoke with the assurance and ireful look that I have observed him to speak with, when I have heard him myself predict things very unlikely, in human appearance, to come, which I myself had then lived to see happen according to his predictions; which made me give the more attention to what he uttered.

And he then added, that the Papists were, in his opinion, the Gentiles spoken of in Rev. ii. to whom the outward court should be left, that they may tread it under foot, they having received the gentile worship in their adoring images and saints departed, and taken to themselves many mediators. And this (said he) is now designing among them, and therefore look you be ready.

This was the substance, and, for the greatest part (I think) the words themselves, which that holy man spake to me at the time beforementioned, which I set down, that so great a prediction may not be lost to myself or others.

The same holy man repeated the same predictions to his only daughter the Lady Tyrrel, and that, with many others, much about the same time he had explained himself to me, as she herself assured me with her own mouth. That, after she had been at the door of his chamber, she found him with his eyes lift up to heaven, and tears running down apace, in a kind of extasy, wherein he continued after she came into the room, without taking any notice of her, for about half an hour. And then he told her his thoughts had been taken up about the miseries and persecutions that were coming upon the church of Christ, that would be so sharp and bitter, that they had forced those tears from his eyes; but he hoped he should not live to see it; but possibly she might, for they were even at the door: Therefore take heed you be not found sleeping.

The same he after repeated to Mrs Bisi, the chief Baron of Ireland's wife that now is, with this difference in circumstances, that if (said he) they bring back the King, they may be a little longer delayed; but they will surely come, and therefore look ye be not unprepared for it.

The Lady Tyrrel's answer to a friend's letter about the truth of these predictions.

' Sir,

' I cannot speak so punctually to the particulars of your paper, but much of it I have heard him speak with great assurance in the beginning of the summer before the rebellion in Ireland. Sir Thomas Barrington's Lady was enquiring his opinion of the Interpreters of the Revelations and of the prophecies of Daniel: She was desirous to know whether the last bitter dregs should be poured out upon the world. I can never forget with what trouble he expressed his answer, viz. That he could not see but that God intended them on the Northern parts. And, said he, I besought God in mercy to divert a share of the time from our dominions, and that they may not begin with poor Ireland: But we must all (said he) taste of them, I am certain. Mrs Barrington, who is yet living, was present at this discourse as well as myself, when my father, among other admonitions, was pleased to give me his commands to be prepared for times of persecution; for he feared wicked people would for a time prevail, and that the persecution would be sharp, but should not last long. The last day that I saw my dear Father he told me, that I should see, in a short time, London burnt; at which when I was troubled; Yes, says he, it will be burnt to a cinder (that was his expression): How can we expect other than judgment upon the feat of rebellion and sin, and miseries that have proceeded from thence. He was also confident of his Majesty's restoration within five years, or less. He said it will be in a short time; You will live to see it, but I shall not: And said my thoughts and dreams are often troubled by being carried by violence into a great church. These were his last discourses to her, who is

' Your faithful Servant,

' E. Tyrrel.

Jacobum,

(xxv) Vid. rem. [D].

(xx) The Lady Peterborough was of this family.

Jacobum, anno 1607 data Epistola (ww). Our Author did not long survive this publication; for going shortly after to the Lady Peterborough's house at Ryegate in Surrey, he was taken [ZZ] on the 20th of March, 1655-6, with an illness which carried him off the next day, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. His friends intended to bury him at Ryegate, in the vault of the Howard family (xx); but they were forbid by Cromwell [AAA], at whose order the corps being first removed to Somerset-house in the Strand, was conveyed thence with great magnificence to Westminster-Abbey, where it was interred in Erasmus's Chapel, the funeral service being performed according to the liturgy of the Church of England, by Dr Nicholas Bernard, who preached a sermon upon the occasion, which was afterwards printed. As to the Archbishop's character: His genius, in every particular, has been sufficiently marked in the course of this memoir; we shall therefore only give some description of his person and temper. He was of the taller sort of middle-sized men, and well-shaped. He walked upright to the last. His hair was naturally brown when young, and his complexion sanguine. His countenance expressed gravity and good-nature. He had a presence that commanded both respect and reverence. The air of his face was so difficult to hit, that though many pictures were drawn of him, yet, says Dr Parr, I never saw any that was like him but one, which was done by Mr (afterwards Sir Peter) Lely. His constitution was strong and healthy, nor was he ever troubled with the head-ache, gout, or stone; but bred blood so fast, that it often burst out of the veins on one side of his tongue; and this was something singular, that he never felt his heart beat in the greatest exercise. He was easy, affable, and cheerful in conversation, and extremely charitable (yy). (yy) Parr, p. 79. He was of so sweet a temper, continues Dr Parr, that I never heard he did an ill office to any one man, or revenged any of those that had been done to him. He envied no man's happiness, or vilified their persons or parts, nor was he apt to censure, or condemn any man upon bare reports. Though he could rebuke sharply in the cause of virtue and religion, yet he was not easily provoked to passion. He left his library, being the chief part of his substance, as a portion to his only daughter, who had been the mother of a numerous offspring. It was first bought by the officers and soldiers of Cromwell's army in Ireland, and lodged in Dublin Castle, where it lay, though not without being much pillaged, till the Restoration, which bringing it into the possession of King Charles II, he gave it, according to the Primate's first intention, to Dublin College, where it now remains [BBB]. From the Primate's manuscripts we have several posthumous pieces in print, some of which have been occasionally mentioned in the course of this memoir. The titles of the rest are, 1. Chronologia Sacra seu Annorum πατριάρχων Patriarcharum πατριάρχων Israelitarum in Ægypto; Annorum etiam Judicum, Regum Judæ Israelis ἀπόδειξις Chronologica. Oxford 1660, in 4to, published by Dr Thomas Barlow, Keeper of the Bodleian Library, and afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, and was reprinted with the Annals of the Old and New Testament, at Geneva, 1722, in fol. But this chronology is imperfect, the Author dying while he was engaged in it (zz). 2. A collection of Pieces, under the title of The Judgment of the late Archbishop, &c. published by

(zz) Dr Smith says, he proposed to have joined to it a tract, De primitivo et veterum Hebræorum Calendario. Smith in Vita Usserii, p. 117.

[ZZ] He was taken ill. He first complained of his hip, thinking it was a touch of the Sciatica, which he had been afflicted with many years before. But next morning he complained of a great pain in his side, which could not be removed by the physician, and he departed about one o'clock in the afternoon. His last words were, O Lord forgive me especially my sins of omission. Upon opening his body, there was observed a thick membrane lined with fat, supposed by the surgeons to be a continuation of the Omentum or caul, which extended itself quite over the stomach, and was fastened above to the Peritonæum, somewhat below the diaphragm. The Primate had been often heard to say, he never felt his heart beat in the most violent exercises. He used frequently to have evacuations of blood from the veins on one side of his tongue, but more usually in some lower parts of his body; which stopping for some time before his death, was thought to be the cause of it, as he had a quick digestion, and bred blood fast (123).

(123) Id. p. 77.

[AAA] They were forbid by Cromwell &c. A more conspicuous instance of the Primate's great reputation among all orders and degrees of men could not be given than in this action of the Protector, who was plainly led thereto from the popularity of it. His relations durst not disobey the command, though it was much against their wills, perceiving well enough, says Dr Parr, the Usurper's design, that (as it was intended so) it would make more for his own honour than that of the deceased, and withal perceiving (what accordingly happened) that he would never defray half the expence of such a solemn funeral, which therefore would bring the greatest part upon them, though they were least able to bear it; and yet he would reap all the glory of it. I should not, proceeds the Doctor, have said so much on this subject, had it not been to shew the world the intriguing subtlety of this Usurper even in this small affair; and that, for the expence of about 200l. out of the Deodands in his Almoner's hands, (which was nothing at all to him) he was able to put those he accounted his enemies to treble that charge (124).

(124) Parr, p. 78.

[BBB] Where it now remains. This was according to the Primate's first intention; but, upon the loss of every thing else except his books, it is no wonder he left these in the manner abovementioned; his daughter having before had nothing from him except some pieces of gold presented to him by Mr Selden's executors and other persons of quality. The library consisted of ten thousand volumes, printed and manuscript, and cost the Primate many thousand pounds. Both the King of Denmark and Cardinal Mazarine offered a good price for it by their agents here; but the executors were forbidden, by an order from Oliver and his council, to sell it to any one without his consent; so it was at last bought by the soldiers and officers of the then army in Ireland, who, out of emulation to the former noble action of Queen Elizabeth's army, were incited by some men of public spirits to the like performance, and they had it for much less than the real worth, or what had been offered for it before by the agents abovementioned. They had also with it all the manuscripts which were not of his own hand-writing: as also a choice though not numerous collection of ancient coins. But, when this library was carried over into Ireland, the Usurper and his son, who then commanded in chief there, would not bestow it upon the college, lest perhaps the gift should not appear so considerable there as it would do by itself; and therefore they gave out that they intended it for a new College or Hall, which they said they intended to build and endow. But it proved that, as these were not times, so, they were not persons capable of any such noble or pious work; so that this library lay in the castle of Dublin, unbestowed and unemployed, till Cromwell's death; and, during that anarchy and confusion that followed, the rooms where this treasure was kept being left open, many of the books, and most of the best manuscripts, were stolen away, or else embezzled by those that were intrusted with them (125).

(125) Parr, p. 102.

Dr

Dr Nicholas Bernard at London, 1658, 8vo; who also published in 1609, 3. The Judgment and sense of the present See of Rome, from Apocal. xviii. 4; by the late Archbishop, &c. together with Ordination a fundamental &c. as also, Of the use of a set Form of Prayer in the Church; The Extent of Christ's Satisfaction &c.; Of the Sabbath and Observation of the Lord's day (uua); his Judgment and Sense of John xxi. 22, 23, &c. 4. A volume of Sermons preached at Oxford before his Majesty and elsewhere. 5. Historia Dogmatica Controversiæ inter Orthodoxos et Pontificios de Scripturis et Sacris Vernaculis. Accessere ejusdem Dissertationes duæ de Pseudo-Dionysii scriptis et de Epistola ad Laodicenos. Descripsit, digestit, et notis atque auctorio locupletavit, Henricus Wharton. Lond. 1690, 4to. 6. A Collection of three hundred letters written to James Usher Lord Archbishop of Armagh, and most of the eminentest persons for piety and learning in his time, both in England, and beyond the seas. Collected and published from the original copies under their own hands by Richard Parr, D. D. his Lordship's Chaplain at the time of his death, with whom the care of all his papers were intrusted by his Lordship. London 1686, folio. This collection is annexed to the Primate's Life, written by the same Gentleman [CCC].

(222) These tracts are in Parr's Collect. No. xxii. and ccv.

[CCC] His Life written by Dr Parr.] This worthy Divine, Dr Parr, who had to great a share in the Primate's friendship, was the younger son of Richard Parr of Devonshire, who, being sent into Ireland by King James I. to be a Minister there after Tyrone's rebellion, fixed himself in the town of Fermoy in the county of Cork, where this son Richard was born in 1617, his mother being then fifty-five years of age. Afterwards the Father, removing to Castle-Lyoni in the same county, put his son to school to an Irish Roman catholic Priest, who, with others of the same church, were the only schoolmasters in Ireland at that time for the Latin tongue. In 1635 our Author was sent to England, and, in Michaelmas term the same year, was entered a poor scholar or fervitor of Exeter-college, at which time being recommended to the care of Dr John Prideaux, the Rector, for his towardliness and great ingenuity, he was, by the Rector's interest, chosen, while Bachelor of Arts (126), Chaplain-Fellow of that college anno 1641. In 1643, Primate Usher being driven, in the civil wars, to take sanctuary at Oxford, became a lodger in the same college, and taking notice of Mr Parr, then a junior Master (127), and a frequent Preacher in Oxford, he made him his Chaplain, and took him in his retinue that year to Cardiff and St Donat in Glamorganshire; at which places continuing in the Primate's service till the said wars were terminated, he attended him then to London, and soon after became Vicar of Ryegate in Surrey by the presentation of one Roger James, Gent. whose sister he married, being a widow of a plentiful fortune. In a pamphlet that came out in 1647, containing the contents of the Covenant, and the names of the Ministers of Surrey that set their hands in testimony of the lawfulness of it, Mr Parr's name appears among the rest: Yet his friends and intimate acquaintance averred that he never took the said Covenant, though much pressed thereto by the Committee of Goldsmith's hall in London. In 1649 he resigned his fellowship of Exeter-college, but continued Chaplain to the Primate till his Grace's death. Afterwards he became Vicar of Camberwell in the said county of Surrey, Rector of St Mary Magdalen in Southwark for a time, and after his Majesty's restoration he was created D. D. (128), and was about the same time offered the Deaury of Armagh, and soon after a Bishoprick in Ireland; but, refusing both, he contented himself with only a canonry of Armagh. He was so constant and ready a Preacher at Camberwell, and so generally liked, that thereby he broke two conventicles in his neighbourhood: For, out-vying both the Presbyterians and Independents in his extemporaneous preaching, their auditors left them, and flocked to Mr Parr. In this course of constant preaching at Camberwell he continued near thirty-eight years; during all which time he was esteemed a person of great piety, and of so regular and unblemished a conversation, that even the Nonconformist party could not pick up any thing to object against him on that account; but generally looked on him as a moderate person, chiefly, perhaps, because he was a Calvinist (129). He died at Camberwell, Nov. 2, 1691, and, according to his desire, was buried together with his wife in that church-yard. Soon after a stone was laid over his grave, with an epitaph inscribed thereon, testifying that he was in preaching constant, in life exemplary, in piety and charity most eminent, a lover of peace and hospitality, and, in fine, a true disciple of Jesus Christ. To which may be added, that he was a person of a generous, genteel temper, exceeding good-natured and charitable to all sorts of people, insomuch that those of his own nation, though of a different profession in religion, were often relieved by him (130) &c.

(128) Oct. 30, 1660. Ibid. col. 137.

(129) As was his Patron the Primate.

(130) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 879, 880, 881.

Besides the Primate's life, he published: 1. Christian Reformation; being an earnest persuasion to the serious practice of it; proposed to all, but especially designed for the serious consideration of his dear kindred and countrymen of the county of Cork in Ireland, and the people of Ryegate and Camberwell in Surrey. Lond. 1666, 8vo. 2. Several sermons; as first, The Judges charge, preached before the Judges of Assize at St Mary Overy's in Southwark. Lond. 1658. 4to: Another, intitled, Christ's gracious intention to sinners &c. Lond. 1661, 8vo: And a third, preached Feb. 20, 1676, at the funeral of Dr Robert Bretton, Minister of Deptford in Kent. Lond. 1672, 4to. P

(126) He took that degree June 13, 1639. Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 279.

(127) He took that degree April 23, 1642. Ibid. Vol. II. col. 5.

The END of the SIXTH VOLUME. PART I.