ABSTRACT.

Memorandum of Agreement, bearing Mr. George Buchanan having appointed Gilbert Earl of Cassillis assignee to his pension of Crosraguel, now resting-owing to the said Mr. George for all years bypast, and specially for the years 1568 and 1569; therefore the said earl binds himself as principal, and Mr. George Corry of Kelwood, Mr. John Shaw of Grimmet, and Mr. Walter Kennedy of Knockdon, as sureties, to pay the said Mr. George Buchanan the sum of 980 marks Scots at the following terms, viz. 320 marks on the 28th of February next, 320 marks further within two months of that day, and the balance within two months again. At Edinburgh, 28th January 1568 (the deed is registered 3d July 1570).

102. Complante of Allan Abbot of Crosraguel to the Privy Council.—
[Circa December 1570.]¹

Unto your Grace and lordis of Secreit Counsall humblie meanes and shawes your servitour Mr. Allane Stewart, commendatour of Crosraguell, that whair upon the 29 day of August last bypast, I, beand within the wood of Crossraguall, doand my leasome errandis and busines, belevand na harme nor invasione to have been done to me be any persone or persones; Notheles, Gilbert Erle of Cassillis, Thomas Maister of Cassillis,² with their complices, to the number of 16 persones or thereby, came to me and persuadit me be their flatterie and deceatful wordis to pas with thame to his castle and place of Dunure,³ being always mindit, gif I had made refusal to nedies, whose principal dwelling was the castle of Dunure, standing on the seasyde in a rocky shoar; but this being wholly ruined (in 1690) their chief mansion is at Cassillis." The building has been attributed to the Danes, and from its strength always played a considerable part in the feuds of Carrick. It was partially destroyed by fire, but the whole under buildings seem to have been vaulted.

³ Dunure is thus described by Abercrummie: "This countrie is the ancient seat of the Ken-

pass with them, to have taken me perforce. And he, puttand me within the same, that I suld be in sure firmance, commandit sex of his servantis to await upon me, so that I ischewit not: wha tuke fra me my hois, with all my weaponis, and then departed quhile the first day of September thereafter, that he came again, and requyrit me to subscriyve to him ane Few Chartour,¹ brought with him, made in parchement, of the whole landis pertening to the said abbacie, together with a 19 and 5 year tak² of the fruetis, teindis, and dewities thereof, as he alledgit, of the whole kirkis and personages perteaning thereto: wharof I never redd a word of; answeritt it was a thing vnreasonable, and that I could nawayis doe, in respect the same, long of befoir, was alreddie disponit to the kindlie tenantis and possessoris thereof, and to James Stewart of Cardonell:³ and therefore, the samin being furth of my handis I culd nawayis grant his vnreasonable desyr; wha then, after long boasting and minassing of me, caused me to be carriet be Jhone Kennedie his baxter, Jhone M'Ceir his cuike, Alexander Richard his pantryman, Alexander Eccles and Sir William Tode, to ane hous callit the Black Voute of Dunvre; whair the tormenteris denudit me of all my cleathis, perforce, except onlie my sark and doublet: and thair band baith my handis at the shakle bones with ane corde, as he did baith my feet, and band my soiles betuix ane iron chimlay and a fyre,⁴ and beand bound thereto could nawayis steir nor move, but had almost inlaikit through my crewell burning. And seeing nae uther appearance to me, but eather to condescend to his desyre, or else to continew in that torment quhill I died, tuke me to the longest life, and said I wuld obey his desyre, albeit it was sore against my will. And for to be relevit of my said paine, subscriyved the foirnamed Chartour and Tacks, whilk I never yett redd, nor know what therin wes contenit: which beand done the said erle causit the said tormentouris of me sweir upon ane Byble never to revaill any word of this my unmercifull handling, to ony persone or persones. Yit he not beand satisfied with their proceedings, come agane vpon the 7 day of the foirsaid month, bringand with him the samyn Chartour and Tak, which he compellit me to subscriyve, and requyred me to ratify and approve the same, before notar and witnessis, which allutterlie I refused. And therefore he, as of befoir, band me, and pat me to the same manner of tormenting: and I said notwithstanding "He suld first get my lyfe or ever I agreit to his desyre," and beand in so grit payne as I truste never man was in with his lyfe, whair I cryed, "Fye upon you! will ye ding whingaris in me and put me out of this world! or elis put a barrell of powder vnder me, rather nor be demaned in this unmerci-full manner!" The said erle hearing me cry bade his servant Alex^r Richard put ane serviati in my throat, which he obeyed; the same being performed at xi horis in the nyght: wha then seeing that I wes in danger of my lyfe, and my flesh burnt and consumed to the bones, and that I wuld not condescend to their purpose, I wes releivit of that paine, whairthrow I will never be able nor weill in my lyfetime.

Sic ane creweltie never being hard of befoir done to onie frie persone that had not committed offence, and gif your Grace and Lordschips takis not gude order heiranent, for punishment of the same, it will give occasione to vtheris proude persones, contemners of the Kingis gracious autoritie, to brek gude order, and truble the comone weall of the cuntrie. And for declaring of the said erle's wicked mynd towardis me, hes wrangouslie by all ordour of justice, intromettit with and tane up my whole living of Crosraguall, at his awin hand, without ony title or richt, thir thrie zeiris bypast. Lykas he yit continewis thairunto, taking no feare of our soverane lordis lettris or chargis used in his name, ewin as he wes ane exemit persone, not subiect to lawis, but mycht doe all thingis at his pleasour. As it is not vnknawin vnto your Grace and Lordschippis, of my deteaning captive, that I obtaned both lettris of Horning, and lettris chargene him vnder paine of Treassone to put me at libertie,¹ yit he continewallie disobeyed the same, and both past to the Horne, and also incurrit the said paine of treassone, as the saidis lettris of Horning and Treassone, executiones, and indorsationes therof, heir present to schaw, beiris. Heirfor in maist humble manner I beseik your Grace and lordschippis to have consideratione of the premisses; and that it will pleiss your Grace to comand and charge the said erle to bring and present befoir your Grace and Lordschippis, the foirnamed Few Chartour and Tackis, at sic day as your Grace pleasis to assyne, and under sic panes as your Grace thinkis expedient. And they beand productit, to be decernit of none avail, for the causses above written. And als to caus and

And ye suld sie the samyn punist in exemple of vtheris. And your Grace and Lordschippis answer.

ABSTRACT.

Complaint by Allan Abbot of Crosraguel, to the Privy Council, narrating the tortures he had experienced at the hands of the Earl of Cassillis, who had compelled him to sign a charter and lease of the lands of the abbey; and praying their Lordships to annul the same, and to compel the earl to find securities that he would not interfere again with the said benefice. Dated 1570.

102A. "The Earl of Cassillis' Tyranny against a quick man."¹

"Maister Allane Stewart, freind to Captain James Stewart of Cardonell, be meanis of the Quenes corrupted court, obtaned the Abbaey of Crosraguell. The said Erll, thinking himself gretter than ony king in these quarteris, determined to have that whole benefice . . . And becaus he culd not find sic securitie as his insatiable appetite required, this shift was devisit: The said Mr. Allane, beand in company with the Lard of Bergany, was be the said Erll and his freindis entysit to leave the saveguard which he had with the said Lard, and to cum mak gude cheir with the said Erll. The simplicitie of the imprudent man was suddenlie abused, and sua he passed with them certain dayis; which he did in Mayboll with Thomas Kennedie, fader broder to the said Erll. Efter the which, the said Mr. Allane passid with quyet cumpanie to visit the place and boundis of Corsraguall; whair of the said Erll being surelie aduertised, determined to put in practice the tyranny which long befor he had conceaved. And so, as for what it is worth. The Earl had fought for Queen Mary at Langside, and had naturally incurred the enmity of the Reformer's party.

King¹ of the countrie, apprehendit the said Maister Allane, and carried him to the hous of Dunure, where for a season he was honorablie entreatit. But efter that certain dayis were spent, and that the Erll culd not obtene the fewis of Croceraguall according to his awin appetit, he determined to prove gif a collatione could work that which neather dinnor nor supper could doe of a long tyme. And so the said Mr. was caried to a secreat chalmer, and hir passed the honorable Erll, his worschipful brother, and sic as was appointit to be servanttis at that banquet. In the chalmer there was a gritt iron chimlay, under it a fyre, other gritt provisione was not seen. The first cours was 'My Lord Abbot' (said the Erll) 'it will pleis you confess heir, that with your awin consent ye remane in my cumpany, becaus ye daire not comitt you to the handis of utheris.' The Abbote answerit, 'Wald ye, my lord, that I shuld mak a manifest leising for your pleasour? The truth is, my lord, it is against my will that I am heir: neither yit have I ony pleasour in your company.' 'Bot ye sall remane with me at this tyme,' said the Erll. 'I am not able to resist your will and pleasour,' said the Abbote, 'in this place.' 'Ye man then obey me,' said the Erll. And with that were presentit unto him certain letters to subseryve, amonges which ther was a fyve year Tak and a 19 year Tak and a chartour of Few of all the landis of Croceraguall, with all the claussis necessaire for the Erll to hunt him to hell. For gif adulterie, saeriledge, oppresione, barbarous creweltie, and thift heaped upon thift deserve hell, the great King of Carrick can no more eschape hell for ever nor the imprudent Abbote eschaped the fyre for a cession, as follows. Efter that the Erll espyed repugnance, and that he culd not come to his purpose be fair meanis, he commandit his cookis to prepare the banquet. And so, first, they fleeced the scheip, that is, they took off the Abbotis cleathis ewin to his skyn; and nixt they band him to the chimlay, his leggis to the one end and his armis to the uther; and so they began to bait the fyre, sometimes to his buttockis, sometymes to his legis, sometymes to his schulders and armes. And that the rost suld not burne, but that it mycht rost in soppe, they spared not flambing with oyle (Lord luik thou to sic creweltie!) And that the crying of the miserable man suld not be heard, they closed his chest, mentioning that the Earl having been put to great expense as heritable bailie of the Abbacy, therefore Allan Stewart assigns to him 4 chalders of victual from the four merk land of Balchrystie in 1567.

mouth that the voice might be stopped. In that torment they held the puir man, whill that oftymes he cryed, 'for Godis saik to dispatche him : for he had alsmeikle gold in his awin purse as wald bye poulder aneuch to schorten his paine.' The famous King of Carrick and his cookes, perceaving the rost to be aneuch, commandit it to be tane fra the fyre, and the Erll himself began the grace in this maner : 'Benedicite Jesus Maria ! You are the most obstinat man that ever I saw ! Gif I had knowin that ye had been so stubborne, I wold not for a thousand crownes have handled you so ! I never did so to man befor you.' And yit he returned to his former practeis within two dayeis, and ceased not untill he had gotten all his pieces subscrivit alsweill as ane half rosted hand culd do it !"

102B. The Imprisonment and Rescue of Abbot Allan from Dunure.—[1570-1.]¹

The Erle, thinking himself sure aneugh so long as he had the half rosted Abbote in his own keping, and yit being ashamed of his presence be reasone of his former creweltie, left the place of Dunure in the handis of certain of his servantis, and the half rosted Abbote to be kept there as presoner. The Laird of Barganie, out of whose cumpanie the said Abbote wes entyceed, understanding (not the extremitie) but the reteaning of the man, sand to the Court and reased letters of delyverance of the persone of the man, according to the ordour ; which being disobeyed, the said Erle for his contempt was denounced rebell and putt to the horne. But yit hope was thair none, neather to the afflicted to be delyvered, neather yit to the purchaser of the letters to obtain ony comfort therbye : for in that tyme God was despysed, and the lauchfull authoritie was contemned in Scotland in hope of the suddan returne and regiment of that crewel murtherer of hir awin husband, of whose lordis the said Erle was called one ; and yit offer than once he was solemmedlie sworn to the King and to his Regent. The true report is sene in this act delyvered by the Privie Counsall on the Abbote's complante :—

"And anent the warning to the said Gilbert Erle of Cassillis to compeir before my Lord Regentis Grace and Lordis of Secreit Counsall at ane certane day to answer to this Complante, the said Erle compearand personallie alledged the pointis of the said Complante to be eather Civile or Criminall; and that he aught not to answer thairto but befor the Judges competent. My Lord Regent with the advyze of the said Counsall, nawayes willing to preiudge the ordinar iurisdiction and Judgment, or hinder ony parties rychtis or defens, but onlie to provyde for the quyetnes of the realme, and to forbid violent forse, therefore ordanes and comandis the said Gilbert Erle Cassillis being personallie present to find cautione and sovertie actit in the bukes of Secreit Counsall, that he or none that he may lett, sall invaid, molest, nor persew the said Mr. Allane Stewart in his bodie; nor yit meddle or intromett with his place and leving of Crosraguell, or uptak the fructes rentis proffettis or dewiteis therof otherwayis nor be ordour of law and iustice under the paine of two thowsand pundis. And als ordanis the said Erle to find the lyk cautione and sovertie, and under the same paine, to Mr. George Buchwhannan pensioner of Crosragwall, being personallie present, and cravit the same alsweile for his awin persone as his pensione. And incais the said soverteis be not found befor the said Erle depart furth of Stirveling, that alwayes the same be found befor he be releavit of his warde¹ whair he is appointed to remane; although the other ocasionis that he is wardit for were accomplished and fulfilled be him.

“Extractum de libro Actorum Secreti Consilii Supremi Domini nostri Regis per me Alex^{rum} Hay deputatum.

(Subscrivit) “ALEXANDER HAY.”

And the said Larde of Barganie, perceaving the ordinar justice could neather help him nor yit the afflicted, applyed his mind to the nixt remedie, and in the end be his servandis tuke the house of Dunure, whair the poore Abbote was keptit presoner. The brute flew fra Carrik to Galloway; and so suddanlie assemblit hyrd and hyreman that perteaned to the band of the Kennedies, and so within a few houris was the house of Dunure invironed again. The Maister of Cassillis was the frackast² and wald not stay, but in his heat wald lay fyre to the dungeon, with no small boasting that all enemies within the hous suld die. He was requyred and admonished be those that were within to be more moderat, and not to hazard himself so foolislie. But no admonition wuld help, till that the wind of ane hacquebute blasted his schulder, and then ceased he fra further persute in furie.

¹ See note on No. 104. The Earl was still under waird for his “treason” at Langside. He was not reinstated until August 1571, and did not “come out of waird” until 22d February 1574.—(Pollock MSS, Bannatyne Club.)

² The University MSS. read ‘frankest’ (note by Pitcairn).

The Lard of Barganie had befor purchest of the authoritie Lettres chargene all faithfull subiectis to the kingis majestie to assist him against that crewell tyrant and mensworne trayter the Erle of Cassillis. Which lettres (with his privie wryttingis) he publissit and schortlie fand sic concurrence of Kyle and Cunynghame with his vthir freindis that the Carrick company drew back fra the Hous: and so the vthir approched, furnist the Hous with meamen, delyvered the said Mr. Allane, and caried him to Ayre, whair publictlye at the mercat croce of the said towne he declared how crewellie he was entreated, and how the murdered King¹ sufferit not sic torment as he did: that onlie exceptit he escaped the death. And thereftir publictlye did revoike all thingis that wer done in that extremitie, and speciallie he revoiked the subscriptione of the thrie wryttingis, to wit of a fyve yeir Tak and 19 yeir Tak and of a chartour of Few.

And so the Hous remaned and till this day the 7 day of Februar 1571 remains in the custodie of the said Lard of Barganie and of his servandis.

103. Instrument of Contract between Allan Abbot of Crosraguel and the Earl of Cassillis.—[9th September 1570.]²

ABSTRACT.

Notarial instrument, dated 9th September 1570, bearing that the Earl of Cassillis gave possession to Allan, Commendator of Crosraguel, personally present, of the place,³ orchard, wood, and four merkland of Crosraguel, to be enjoyed and possessed by him during the earl's pleasure, and in token thereof the earl presented to the said commendator John Davidson and Patrick M'Cawell, occupiers of the said four merkland, together with the key of the principal tower of the place of Crosraguel; and the abbot received the said John Davidson and Patrick M'Cawell as his tenants, and that conform to an agreement formerly entered into between the earl and him. Moreover, the earl⁴ obliges himself to pay yearly to the abbot the sum of

³ These had been assigned to the Earl by George Buchanan, who had a grant of them to satisfy his pension (v. No. 101 supra).

⁴ This Gilbert Earl of Cassillis had a chequered career. He was forfeited in Parliament on August 19, 1568, for his "treason" at the battle of Langside; and on November 17, 1569, "My Lorde Regent declarit that my Lord Cassillis . . . hes maid dew obedience to the Kingis grace, and hes therefor ordanit him to be deletit furth of the summons." The Earl appears again in Parliament on 5th September 1571, and on the 7th of the same month he is chosen one of the Privy Council. (V. Notes on Nos. 102B and 104.)

£100—money in Scotland; and for the more sure payment of the said sum, the earl is to find two landed gentlemen as cautioners therefor at the abbot's pleasure, he being obliged always to give counsel and service to the earl. The deed is dated at the Abbey of Crossraguell before four witnesses, including Hector Fergusson in Crossraguell.

ABSTRACT.

Act of Privy Council anent the petition presented by Thomas Kennedy of Bargany, narrating that complaint having been made by Allan Stewart, Commendator of Crosraguel, that the Earl of Cassillis and his accomplices had laid violent hands upon him and imprisoned him in the Castle of Dunure, royal letters were directed to the said earl, charging him to set the said Mr. Allan at liberty within certain days, and that for their disobedience they were put to the horn. And as they still detained him, fresh letters were directed to the Sheriff of Ayr, the Laird of Blairquhan, and other loyal gentlemen in the shire of Ayr, bidding them set the Abbot free by force. Accordingly, Thomas Kennedy set him free and recovered the Castle of Dunure, which the then Lord Regent intended to have kept for the king's use: therefore he gave the said Thomas Kennedy power to keep the castle for his Highness' use and behoof, upon the readiest of the fruits of the aforesaid earl's lands, and to use all manner of warlike engines in its defence. Therefore the said Thomas held the castle till April 1571, when the earl returned to his obedience, and had retained none of his servants therein since the previous August. And regarding the charge to the earl to appear before the Council at a certain date, the Lords of Council find that, in the whole matter, Thomas Kennedy has performed the part of a true and dutiful subject, and discern that the keys of the castle shall be taken out of his hands, and an inventory made of the goods within the same (5th March 1571-2).

² The Earl was evidently now a warm adherent to the Regent's party, who were at this time rather depressed. The castle of Edinburgh, together with most of the fortresses in the north and west, were in the hands of the Queen's forces, and the truce of the 30th July had not yet been signed.

³ It is pretty clear from this deed that Bargany had been trying his best to fleece the Abbot himself, when "he held him in captivity in 1569, and would in no wise liberate him" (v. No. 94 supra). Otherwise, how had he received these tacks?

ABSTRACT.

Precept of Clare Constat by Allan, Perpetual Commendator of the Monastery of Crosraguel to John Kennedy, son natural of David Kennedy of Pennyglen, and heir by reason of the infeftment previously made to him by the abbot in the forty shilling land of old extent of Easter Auchinblane in the parish of Kirkoswald, the twenty shilling land of old extent of Deneyne in the lordship of Crosraguel, earldom of Carrick and shire of Ayr, the three merk land of Baltersan of old extent, with mansion and orchards, with a piece of meadow lying behind the said mansion on the one side, the lands of Dalehomie on the other side, and the meadow formerly called the Lady of Row's meadow, extending to three acres of meadow-land more or less, one merk land of Knokronalde, lying near the lands of Tornbrek on the south, the lands of Mochrumhill and Enoch on the north, the Mains of Crosraguel and meadow thereof on the west, and the lands of Drummorrane and Cultone on the east; the ten shilling land of Chalmerstoune, the ten shilling land of Lokstone, the eight shilling and four penny land of the same occupied by the persons in the old infeftment of the same, lying in the parish of Kirkoswald, earldom of Carrick, shire of Ayr, and lordship of Crosraguel, which were held of the abbot in chief; reserving to Katharine Kennedy, relict of the deceased David Kennedy, her conjoint fee at least and in frank tenement, of the forty shilling lands of Easter Auchinblane, and twenty shilling lands of Deneyne. Subscribed by the Commendator and sealed with the common seal of the chapter at Edinburgh, 28th March 1574, before Thomas Kennedy of Bargany and others.

² The charter is in the Culzean charter chest. The woodhag, or yearly wood-cutting, was an important part of the Abbey property; and from the constant references to the wood we cannot doubt that there was much of it round the Abbey: even 110 years ago there was more than now (v. Clerk of Eldin's etching ante).

³ Possibly the old servants or retainers of the monastery, who would be pensioned off. They seem to have stayed longer at Crosraguel than at any other monastery, owing to the sympathy of the people. In the Grammar School charter at Lindores (Lindores Abbey, p. 31) the rights of the occupiers of the altars are reserved; and at Paisley many of the brotherhood were allowed to remain so long as they refrained from performing the offices of religion, and received pittances for their support (Buchanan's Hist., p. 266; Lees' Paisley, p. 230).

ABSTRACT.

Letter from John Shearer, messenger, to the Laird of Barnbarroch, assuring the Laird that he had received all the feu mails of Crosraguel, except the Earl of Casillis' feu mails, and the tutor's lands of Craigoth; advising him further that he had ridden through the earl's feu lands and charged them with payment, but that they were ignorant what they should pay according to the feu-charter; praying the Laird to seek out the confirmation of the feu-charter of the lands of Drumgarloch, etc., that he (Mr. Shearer) might charge them with payment. And regarding the Place of Crosraguel, that the Laird of Knockdolian had not been in the country since before Martinmas, but that on his return the poor men in possession of the yards would give over their yards and take a fresh lease from the Laird. Dated at Ayr 2d March 1589.

³ From this we would think that Sir John

Vaus continued to be Commendator till his death in 1642; but we see that in 1617 the Abbacy was annexed to the Bishopric of Dumblane, and that Mr. Peter Hewatt was Commendator. Sir John must, I think, have surrendered his title to the Abbacy before then.

ABSTRACT.

Act of Parliament bearing that the parish church of Invertig having been ever since the Reformation ruinous and decayed, and the Laird of Bargany having at his own expense erected a new church within the town of Ballantrae, close to the parish of Kirkcudbright Invertig, where the inhabitants have for several years assembled for divine worship, and the manse and glebe being designed out of the Laird's own lands; therefore the present Act ratifies the erection of the said church, and ordains it to be the only parish church of the said parish of Kirkcudbright Invertig. ABSTRACT.

Act of Parliament whereby the King, considering that the emoluments of the Bishopric of Dumblane are so small that they cannot furnish a Bishop with the necessaries of life, much less pay his expenses in Parliament, etc., with the advice and consent of John Archbishop of St. Andrews, Adam Bishop of Dumblane and Prior of Monymusk, and Mr. Peter Hewat, Commendator of Crosraguel, has annexed to the said Bishopric of Dumblane the whole benefice of the Abbacy of Crosraguel and the Priory of Monymusk both temporality and spirituality, with all lands, kirks, teinds, teind sheaves, and other emoluments; further he dissolves from the Crown the said benefices, to which they were annexed by the Act of Annexation, and by the tenor of the present Act suppresses all their dignity and title for ever. Reserving, however, the liferents to the present titulars of the benefices, and reserving to the Earl of Cassillis and others all their lawful rights by tack or otherwise, and to the ministers at the kirks of the said benefices their rights and stipends; and lastly, reserving to Mr. Peter Hewat, present Abbot of Crosraguel, his own liferent, with all the rents and other privileges belonging to the Abbacy, to be enjoyed by him during his life. REMARKS ON THE EXISTING BUILDINGS

REMARKS ON THE EXISTING BUILDINGS AT CROSRAGUEL ABBEY.

LIKE only too many of our old Scottish Religious Houses, the glory of Crosraguel Abbey is of the past. The roofless walls and grass-grown fragments alone remain, to tell of what it has been; and those who might have told us all, sleep in silence beneath its shade. Fortunately, however, from the ruins still remaining, one may hope to recover an almost complete plan of a mediæval monastic building; small and unpretentious it may be, but as perfect and entire as that of any other now existing in Scotland.

Previous to the "Writ of Crosragmol" delivered by William, Bishop of Glasgow, in July 1244,¹ there existed near to the present building "a certain oratory"² built by the Abbot of Paisley, and which had been served by the monks of that Abbey "for many years" prior to 1244. Of this oratory no trace now remains. Most probably it was destroyed or allowed to fall into decay after the completion of the new building.

The Religious House thus founded at Crosraguel, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was of the order of Paisley—Cluniac—a branch of the great Benedictine order,³ which "never ceased to give employment to those members of its body who could add the charms of art, luxury, or magnificence to their structures." These were adorned in the most profuse and elaborate manner, and are richer in this respect than those of any other order. Its centre was the famous Abbey of Cluny, in Burgundy; and being subject to the rule of a French Monastery, it is only to be expected that much of its architecture would be largely imbued with French feeling and spirit. This influence is apparent at Crosraguel, noticeably in the apsidal termination of the choir,¹ a distinctly Continental feature and one rare in Scotland, as distinguished from the square end more peculiar to this country.

In describing the existing remains, a few seeming inconsistencies may occur, arising in most part from the indefinite character of the architecture, and the absence of any certain record of the various periods, at which it may have been built, added to, or restored. Taken as a whole, the architecture is unique and curious; while the mouldings and workmanship with few exceptions are comparatively rude. The Abbey has, however, sturdily withstood the natural ravages of time; and if it lacks great architectural beauty or elegance, it shows a sensibly and carefully studied arrangement of plan, well suited to the simple requirements of a small monastic establishment.

A reference to Plates I. II. and III. will show the position and plan of the Abbey; and before entering into a detailed description of the various drawings, a glance at these plates, together with a brief outline of the general appearance and surroundings of the building, may enable us better to understand the history of its ruin.

The Abbey is situated in a quiet hollow, about two miles south of Maybole, on the present Girvan road. It lies about forty yards from the wayside, divided from it only by the old and now disused graveyard. Seen from the road, few or no trees break the monotony of the scene, and the near view of the cold sunless north front presents an appearance at once misleading and disappointing, and the wonder seems to be that any building, more especially an abbey, should ever have been placed in such a situation. This first impression, however, is unfair to the Abbey; for the old highway formerly skirted the rising ground to the north; and seen from this road, as one breasted the crest of the hill above, from a point of view much more advantageous than the present, the prospect must have been charming. Let any one, desirous to realise what the old place was in a bygone day, rise to this point, and imagine for himself the Abbey, with its many roofs and gables, nestling peacefully in the hollow at the bottom of the hill, surrounded by its strong boundary walls, its wood and sparkling streamlet, its mill, its orchards and gardens, its grain lands and pasture lands, and beyond, the vast stretches of moor and forest joining hands with the purple hills, far away past the end of the broad valley and the dark rugged hill of Killdoon.

“Anon from the belfry
Softly the Angelus sounded, and over the roofs
Columns of pale blue smoke, like clouds of incense ascending.”

Crosraguel has had its scenes of storm as well as sunshine; for although all positive written record of destruction has perished, excepting that beginning of the end in the days of John Knox,¹ we have the negative statement, from the original documents now published, that at sundry times it has been “repaired” and restored after having suffered from the “savage fury of its enemies.”² These experiences, and the troublous times in which it lived, doubtless in part account for its strong towers of defence; for Crosraguel takes rank with St. Andrews, Aberbrothie, and many others, as one of the fortified abbeys of Scotland. Here the sword and Bible seem strangely familiar, and church and tower go hand in hand.

Probably the only portion of the original Abbey now remaining above ground is part of the ruined west gable of the nave, more immediately round its rude and now built-up door, the two fragments of buttresses at its north-west corner, and a small corresponding portion of the south wall. It is just possible that this entire wall, as far as the belfry gable,¹ may belong to this early period; but of this one cannot be certain, and the balance of facts strongly inclines towards a later date—the period of the rebuilding of the present north wall of the nave.²

Underground, where this north wall of the nave is built, are the foundations of the original nave wall, showing returns for buttresses, with a continuous double-splayed base, and boldly moulded roll above.³ This base course is carried round the north transept, the foundations of which are almost entire, and of which the west wall, at least, has been apparently without buttresses. Deep down on the south side of the nave are the foundations of the east wall of another transept, corresponding in length and position with that on the north.

Thus we have for the original Abbey an aisleless nave over 120 feet long, by 24 feet 6 inches wide; transepts of the same width, and about 30 feet long; and a choir, the length and eastern termination of which we can now only guess.

It is at first somewhat difficult, from the uncertain character of the architecture and building, to say when the north and south walls of the present nave were rebuilt. It is very probable, as in the case of other Scotch Abbeys, that Crosraguel suffered during the Wars of Independence; one Henry de Percy having commanded a portion of the English army at Crosraguel and Turnberry in 1306 and 1307.¹ It is during this period that the north and south walls of the original nave may have been destroyed, and serious damage done to the Abbey generally. In 1324 and twice in 1328 King Robert the First gifted certain lands to the Abbot and monks of Crosraguel;² and in 1329, a year after the independence of Scotland had been acknowledged by the English parliament, the Abbot received the King's penny for the repair of his Monastery.³ The architecture of the present north wall⁴ is of about this date. It is also more than likely that the south wall, being the inner one, may have been rebuilt at this time with the material of the earlier building—hence its more irregular masonry. The long chamber forming the west side of the cloister court is built against this wall,—not bonded into it—but the walling is very similar in character, and may be of the same or a slightly later date. About this time may also have been erected part of the present Abbot's tower; probably too, the range of vaulted cellars on the south side of the infirmary court, and above which would be the Abbot's hall, connected with the tower, and raised a few steps above the level of its first floor.

Wallcot,⁵ writing of Crosraguel, says, "In the beginning of the fifteenth century the choir was rebuilt and the north wing of the transept wholly removed, whilst the south arm was converted into a square chapter-house with a central pillar and a library over it." This conjecture is for the most part probably correct. The excavations prove the existence of the earlier north and south transepts, while the position of the three fragmentary shafts and bases, in what is now the wall of the present sacristy⁶ and little stair lobby adjoining,⁷ confirm the statement as to the chapter-house. The only difference being, that the entire thickness of this wall carrying these shafts and bases is of earlier date than the rest of the choir; and that, although the latter agrees in architecture with this wall, it has been modelled from it, and not built with it. This theory, then, would make the chapter-house¹ mentioned by Wallcot earlier than the choir, which may have been, and probably was, built very early in the fifteenth century; but, judging from the architecture alone, it has all the appearance of being late fourteenth century work, and goes far, I think, to prove that this portion, at least of the choir wall,² which also formed the north wall of the old chapter-house, is of earlier date than the rest of the choir, and that the latter was modelled from its lines. The architecture of this wall is undoubtedly late fourteenth century, even allowing for the fact that architectural features took some time to reach, and to be incorporated in the work of, outlying districts such as Crosraguel.

In 1404 a special altar was built by King Robert the Third,³ where one mass was to be said daily for the soul of the King and certain others, and in return for which he granted and confirmed lands to the Abbey. From this gift the cost of the new choir may have been in part defrayed. The platform of this altar was found during the excavations, and I have no hesitation in saying it was built with, or immediately after, the completion of the new choir.

Whatever earlier buildings may have previously existed round the east and south sides of the cloister court, have been entirely destroyed; and their site is now occupied by the present sacristy and chapter-house⁴ of Abbot Colin in 1487.⁵ At this time the Abbey appears to have been in difficulties; and Abbot Colin while rebuilding the cloister portion, and probably repairing the church, seems to have been compelled to reduce its dimensions. That this was the case, is apparent from the fact, that the belfry gable,⁶ which is a distinct insertion, entirely divides the nave from the choir, so far at least as the purposes of ritual or religious ceremony are concerned. Until this time the church had been most likely open from end to end; but proving too large for the revenue or service of the Abbey, it was reduced to the limits of the choir only: the nave being still, however, roofed over, and forming possibly a large outer vestibule to the choir. It was also used as a place of burial, and was called Saint Mary's, or the "Virgin's Aisle."⁷

In 1505 a somewhat curious state of things must have existed. At this time the Abbey precincts seem to have been in part occupied by others than the monks belonging to the Abbey, and an action was brought against them by Abbot David and decided in his favour, because the dwellings complained of “the said hous, smedy, orchard, and yarde ar within the yettis and umgang and wallis of the said Abbay.”¹

1789 by Jasper

The next mention of the Abbey buildings is in the will of Egidia Blair, dated 1530, in which she bequeathed her “soul to God Almighty and the blessed Virgin Mary,” and her “body to be buried in the monastery of Crosraguel, in the blessed Virgin’s Aisle.”² The slab-stone of this tomb was found during the excavations, in a very perfect condition.

Father Hay³ quotes Dempster’s notice of one Gilbert Macbrayar, who brought many materials “together for the adornment of his monastery, and died in 1547, and was buried in Crosraguel, which he had decorated with most splendid buildings.” The “splendid buildings” referred to are most probably the refectory and other buildings on the south side of the cloister

THIS drawing is enlarged from the Ordnance Survey of 1859, and is intended to show the immediate surroundings of the Abbey. It indicates the relative positions of the former and present highway roads, the general line of the boundary wall (so far, at least, as these are shown in old prints and drawings), the Abbey mill, stream, and fish ponds. The old road has been out of use for over eighty years, and is now overgrown with grass, and in parts under cultivation. In Slezer's view, in 1693, the boundary walls are shown enclosing a considerable extent of ground, and, with the entrance gateway, were then strong and in good preservation. They continued to be so till at least 1762, when Clerk made his picturesque little etching, in which, however, the walls are shown as being much higher, and even strongly fortified, the gateway itself being protected by two strong towers. That the boundary walls were strong and high is confirmed by two pencil sketches, shown to me only a few weeks ago, by the late Mr. James Fergusson, and made by him in 1814 or 1816, in one of which part of the east boundary wall is shown to have been over 10 feet high. The Abbey mill appears to have been situated without the boundary walls, and its wheel gable was standing in the beginning of the present century. Grose shows it in his view from the north, lying to the west of the Abbey, and its site was pointed out to me by the old tenant of the Abbey mills, who remembered it well when a boy; also at its side a large circular fish pond, bordered by a fringe of willow bushes. Another fish pond lay to the east of the Abbey, near the present broken ground, and was filled with clear water; it had an island or mound in the centre.¹ The positions of these two ponds are shown in this Plate. The stream, now very small, and, since the opening of another channel to the Abbey mills, of little importance, formerly flowed past the Abbey, somewhat to the south of its present course. Clerk shows it passing clear of the Abbey walls; while in Slezer's view it is not shown at all, and is presumably hidden by the rising ground in his foreground. The present bank of earth, reaching to the south wall of the Abbot's tower, covers part of the old channel of the stream, as well as the only existing portion of the boundary wall, which here springs from the south of the tower.

GENERAL PLAN OF ABBAY AND SURROUNDINGS

PLATES II. AND III.

PLATES II. AND III.

THE Cluniac arrangement of monastic buildings, while following generally that of the Benedictine model, differed from it in its greater irregularity of plan. At Crosraguel, however, the grouping is simple and convenient; and, although built at various periods and with frequent alteration, it still retains to a very great extent most of the usual features of an ordinary monastic establishment. There are the three typical divisions: the church, the cloister, and the domestic buildings. Lying almost due east and west is the first group, comprising the nave and choir. On its south side is the cloister garth, round which are the usual claustral buildings. To the east of this court is that of the infirmary, near at hand is the Abbot's tower, and probably beyond to the east the cemetery. The domestic buildings were in their usual position to the west, and occupied two sides of the outer or base court. The court or close of the church, which was open to the public, lay to the north, within the boundary walls. At some distance to the west was the Abbey mill; and, usually to the extreme south, the orchards and gardens.

Taking, then, the first group, and entering by the north door (Plate VII.), a roofless nave is found, about 78 feet 9 inches long by 24 feet 8 inches wide. Its north wall is pierced by five pointed windows of unusual form (Plates IV. VII. and VIII.), that above Lady Row's tomb being an insertion of the sixteenth century. In this wall, close by the entrance door, is a small circular hollow, indicating the position of the holy water basin. In the south wall, and nearly opposite to the entrance, is a door leading to the cloister. It has a semicircular head with a small chamfer on its outer edge and step. It may be here noted that the moulding of the doorstep is a feature of frequent occurrence throughout the Abbey. High up in this wall, above the line of the cloister roof, and overlooking the cloister garth, are portions of two small attic windows, one being now completely built up. The remains of the west gable show a confused intermingling of old and modern work. Blocks of the original ashlar wall are here and there visible; while low down, and almost covered with rubbish, is a fragment of the early west door of the church. A few stones only of one jamb are left, and a detail of this is given in Plate XXV., No. 1A. At the east end, and entirely shutting out the view of the choir, is the late fifteenth century gable. Passing through the small door in this gable the choir is entered. It is a long, apsidal, and somewhat ornate building, of early fifteenth century workmanship; roofless, like the nave, and within a few feet of the same size. Three broad platforms, each having a single moulded step, lead up to the high altar, which has been detached from the wall; and at its side is the moulded jamb (Plate XXVI., No. 8) of a narrow door leading to the space behind. The head of this door has been square. In the north wall, about nine feet above the floor level, are five pointed windows of varying size, and wider than those in the nave. The apsidal windows, now completely ruined, have been filled with rich tracery; and under the window in the south angle is the piscina (Plate XIII.), while immediately adjoining, but in the south wall, and under one of its two windows, is the elaborately carved sedilia. Towards the nave, in this wall, is the quaint little door (Plate XIV.) leading to the sacristy lobby and staircase; while just beyond are portions of the chamfered altar platform, built in honour of King Robert the Third in 1404. Near the belfry gable is the processional door (Plate XIX.) leading to the cloister, and close beside it the niche of another holy water basin (Plate XII.), more ornamental than that in the nave.

This choir, as already stated, was probably built very early in the fifteenth century, and the foundations of the former transepts, said to have been then destroyed, are indicated on the drawings by hatched lines. That portion of the choir wall, however, which now forms the north wall of the present sacristy, and is continued to its junction with the nave wall near the belfry gable, is part of the earlier chapter-house and choir; and from it the present choir has been designed. This wall is shown on Plates III. XV. and XVI. Its architectural detail will be found to be almost identical with that of the choir, while the stonework of the two portions is distinctly different. The masons' marks can also be divided into two distinct groups. On the choir side of this wall the three original arches of the blind arcade are slightly stilted at the top, and are flatter than those copied from them, and continued round the choir. The six triplet wall shafts round the sanctuary are carried down to the floor, where they are finished with very beautiful bases; while the other shafts are stopped against a horizontal string course returned round them at the level of the window sills, and under each of these shafts is a large flat stone, now hewn even with the wall. The processional door, although of the same date as the choir, is an insertion in the older wall. The choir floor, like that of the nave, has been paved with stone, the remaining blocks of which are shown on Plate III. The choir roof was considerably higher than that of the nave, and both have been of wood covered with slates; the corbel stones for the support of the roof beams, and the stone weathering above, being still discernible on the belfry gable. The very curious position of this gable, blocking up the entire half of one of the nave windows, may be accounted for by the theory that the previous gable was left in situ till the present gable was built. The overlapping of the nave wall on the north side by that of the choir, and the rough walling there remaining, indicate the position of the earlier gable; and the theory that the one gable was built previous to the removal of the other, thus necessitating its unfortunate position, is reasonable, if one considers that, had the earlier gable first been removed, the inner ends of both choir and nave, during the building of the present gable, would have been left quite open, and exposed to the risk of serious damage from wind and rain. In the centre of the belfry gable is a small door of good form, and on the nave side is a plain flat arched recess. Across the end of the nave there appears to have been a narrow gallery or rood loft, entered by a small moulded door opening from the spiral stair from the choir; and this stair is continued a few steps higher, till it again opens into the choir. Although only a few indications of this gallery are left on the walls, its existence cannot be doubted; and, among other purposes, it may have been used for reading the Gospels, letters of communion to the laity, preaching, and in later times for the service of music. On the top of this gable is the belfry (Plate X.), with openings for two bells, surmounted by a very beautiful cross (Plate XI.), with a group of hearts round a centre at the intersection of the arms. The sacristy is a large apartment, with a good light, and a vaulted ceiling of great elegance and beauty, the moulded ribs of which are carried by very quaint and curious corbels; and near the floor level a stone bench or seat occupies three of its sides. This chamber is usually found near the choir or transept, and was used by the clergy for the purpose of robing, and for the safe keeping of the sacred vessels and altar furniture. At Crosraguel it is now called the "singing room" or "sang school," a name yet lingering perhaps from former uses, and a possible reason for the unusual feature of its stone benches.

Entering the cloister, its four walks or alleys can still be traced. These alleys were probably enclosed on their inner sides by a wooden screen, glazed or open, and stiffened at intervals by strong upright posts, supporting a shed or lean-to roof, covering in the alleys. At each of the four inner angles there appears to have been a clustered pillar of stone; and in the two corners of the west alley are single corbels, one of which still carries a few stones of a broad chamfered rib, which has reached diagonally to these angle piers. The corbels (Plate XXVII., No. 14), carrying the horizontal wall beam of the lean-to roof, yet remain in considerable numbers; those on the east wall being the most numerous, and the four next the choir have carved faces. In the church wall of the north alley are the two processional doors, used in the daily processional service, symbolising the pilgrimage of man from the cradle to the grave, and following round the cloister towards the west the daily course of the sun. Immediately in front of the door from the choir a slab tomb was found, measuring 6 feet 4 inches long by 2 feet 6 inches broad. It has a raised surface, but is without any carving or lettering, and a chamfer of $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches runs round the stone. In the centre of the garth is a large well, with ten stone steps leading down to the paved floor, and on one of the lower steps is the quaint inscription, "Dñs Johanes Boyd me fierit" (Plate XXVIII.) The chapter-house occupies its usual position near the centre of the east alley. It has the characteristic central pier, from which springs a rich cluster of vaulting ribs, carrying the ceiling. In its east wall are two pointed windows, formerly filled, like that of the sacristy, with tracery of good design; between and under the level of these two windows is the Abbot's seat, and round the four walls are the ordinary stone benches. This chamber is second in importance only to the church itself. Here all the business of the Abbey was transacted, rules were read, public confession of faults made, judgment given, and penance ordained. Adjoining the chapter-house is the parlour, where a monk could hold private intercourse with a friend, or trade with a merchant. Its roof has been semicircular in form, and one stone of the moulded door jamb, its splayed step, and the sill of the narrow chamfered window, are yet in position. Beyond this parlour is the vaulted slype, one of the most distinctive features of the east alley. It formed the passage to the monks' cemetery, and through it the funeral passed after dirge or devotion had been said or sung in the chapter-house. At Crosraguel it was also the passage to the infirmary garth, and its stone benches formed a quiet and shaded seat from the heat of the summer sun. The last chamber on the east side of the garth was probably used as a dungeon or penitential cell for the confinement of minor offenders. It is usually situated near the chapter-house, sometimes directly adjoining. This cell is, however, quite distinct from the prison for the incarceration of grave offenders. It was under the charge of the infirmary, and is here entered from a cross passage between the infirmary garth and the cellarer's passage. The refectory was invariably placed on the south side of the cloister, and in Benedictine and Cluniac monasteries was built east and west, or parallel with the axis of the church. At Crosraguel the buttery is at its west end, communicating across a passage with the kitchen and scullery. These buildings on the south walk of the cloister are among the latest additions to the Abbey. The refectory had the usual barrel-vaulted roof, and light was admitted by four low windows on its south side. The entrance door was square headed, and chamfered on its outer edge. On its right was a large arched fireplace, with corbelled jambs and a raised stone fender, and at its side a large aumbry. At the west end, under the day stair to the dormitory, is a large square opening, too low seemingly for a pulpit, but possibly a deeply recessed seat, from which the ordinary portion of Holy Writ or other sacred book would be read during meals. Close by this recess is a service hatch or door, leading to the buttery. Of this buttery, with the passage adjoining, and the kitchen and scullery beyond, only the foundations remain; and while digging in this neighbourhood fragments of earthenware and broken pottery were found.

The range of buildings forming the west side of the cloister is most probably the remains of a former dormitory, that apartment being always found either on the west or east side of the cloister court. Mr. Fergusson wrote about this building as follows: "It appears to me that what you have found on the west side of the cloister at Crosraguel is the foundation of the original dormitory. It seems that at some period of the Abbey's history it was found expedient to contract the building, and all the accommodation for the monks was concentrated at the east and south sides of the cloister. Under these circumstances the old dormitory was abandoned, if not pulled down." This chamber, as it now stands, measures 56 feet 2 inches by 18 feet 3 inches. A round-headed door or window opens to the cloister near its north end; and in its west wall, now ruinous, Grose says there were "three narrow slips," probably windows. The foundations exist underground of a small chamber at its south end. The new dormitory lay above the buildings south of the chapter-house, and probably also over the refectory, but scarcely a fragment of these upper walls now remains. The dormitory day stair from the cloister was at the side of the refectory door, and this stair must have had one or more of its lower steps projecting into the cloister alley; the door jamb was moulded (Plate XXVII., No. 17), and its head circular. Besides this day stair, the dormitory had always direct communication with the church; at Crosraguel, through a door into the library, and thence through the scriptorium to the night stair, leading down to the sacristy and choir. The library and scriptorium (Plate III.) are respectively above the chapter-house and sacristy, and were built some time after the completion of the lower rooms. In the library there is a large fireplace with moulded jambs, a stone hearth, and fender fillet; also three windows, that overlooking the cloister garth having a mullion and transom. The scriptorium is raised a few steps above the library floor; it has no fireplace, and but one small window, similar to those in the east wall of the library. A separate passage, entered from the south-east angle of the cloister by an arched door (Plate XIX.), led to the outer court and cellarer's rooms. These rooms are now dark and almost filled with grass-grown débris; above the innermost chamber is a curious stone hatch or trapdoor, opening from the floor of the dormitory above. The infirmary buildings, the home of sick and infirm monks, are now completely ruined; even the foundations are hardly traceable, and one can be certain of little more than the carved club skew and the few remaining corner stones of the low wall near the choir. At Crosraguel these buildings cannot have been large, a hall and chapel probably meeting all requirements. A range of vaulted cellars forms the south side of this infirmary garth; above these cellars, and communicating with the Abbot's tower, would be the Abbot's hall, and the fragment of a chamfered door jamb can still be seen at its west end. Slezer shows an outside stair in the south wall of these buildings, but no trace of it remains.

The Abbot's tower is, unfortunately, much destroyed, one angle and a large portion of the corresponding side walls having been undermined and cast down by the stream. The entrance door must have been near this angle, and there is yet left part of the passage from it to the circular stair leading to the principal floor above; one side of which is shown on Plate XXI. The ground floor has a barrel-vaulted roof, while the two upper floors have been of wood; and the stair to these floors must have been in the angle of the wall now destroyed. The wall passage and porch leading to the Abbot's hall and the Abbey buildings are yet, however, fairly entire. The masons' marks on this tower correspond with those of various portions throughout the church and cloister. The broken foundations shown in the neighbourhood of the stream on Plate II. are most likely those of the buildings which always found a place near the Abbey stream. At Crosraguel the gate tower (Plates XXII. XXIII. XXIV.), almonry, and guesthouse, are all concentrated in one building, now called the Abbot's new tower; and this grouping together of these buildings is of frequent occurrence in small abbeys. To the south of this tower, and on the west and south sides of the base court, are fragmentary traces of the foundations of a portion of the domestic offices; these would comprise the stables, barns, brewhouse, bakehouse, and other similar buildings. At the south-west angle of this court the solitary dovecot (Plate XXIV.) yet stands almost entire; and, at its foot, part of the bakehouse floor, with the stones all carefully cut and set on edge, and the traces of fire yet remaining on its upper surface.

Throughout these two Plates all walls at present existing above ground are shown in solid black, while those also existing, but buried underground, are simply hatched. No restoration has been attempted at any part of the building, and only what actually remains is shown.

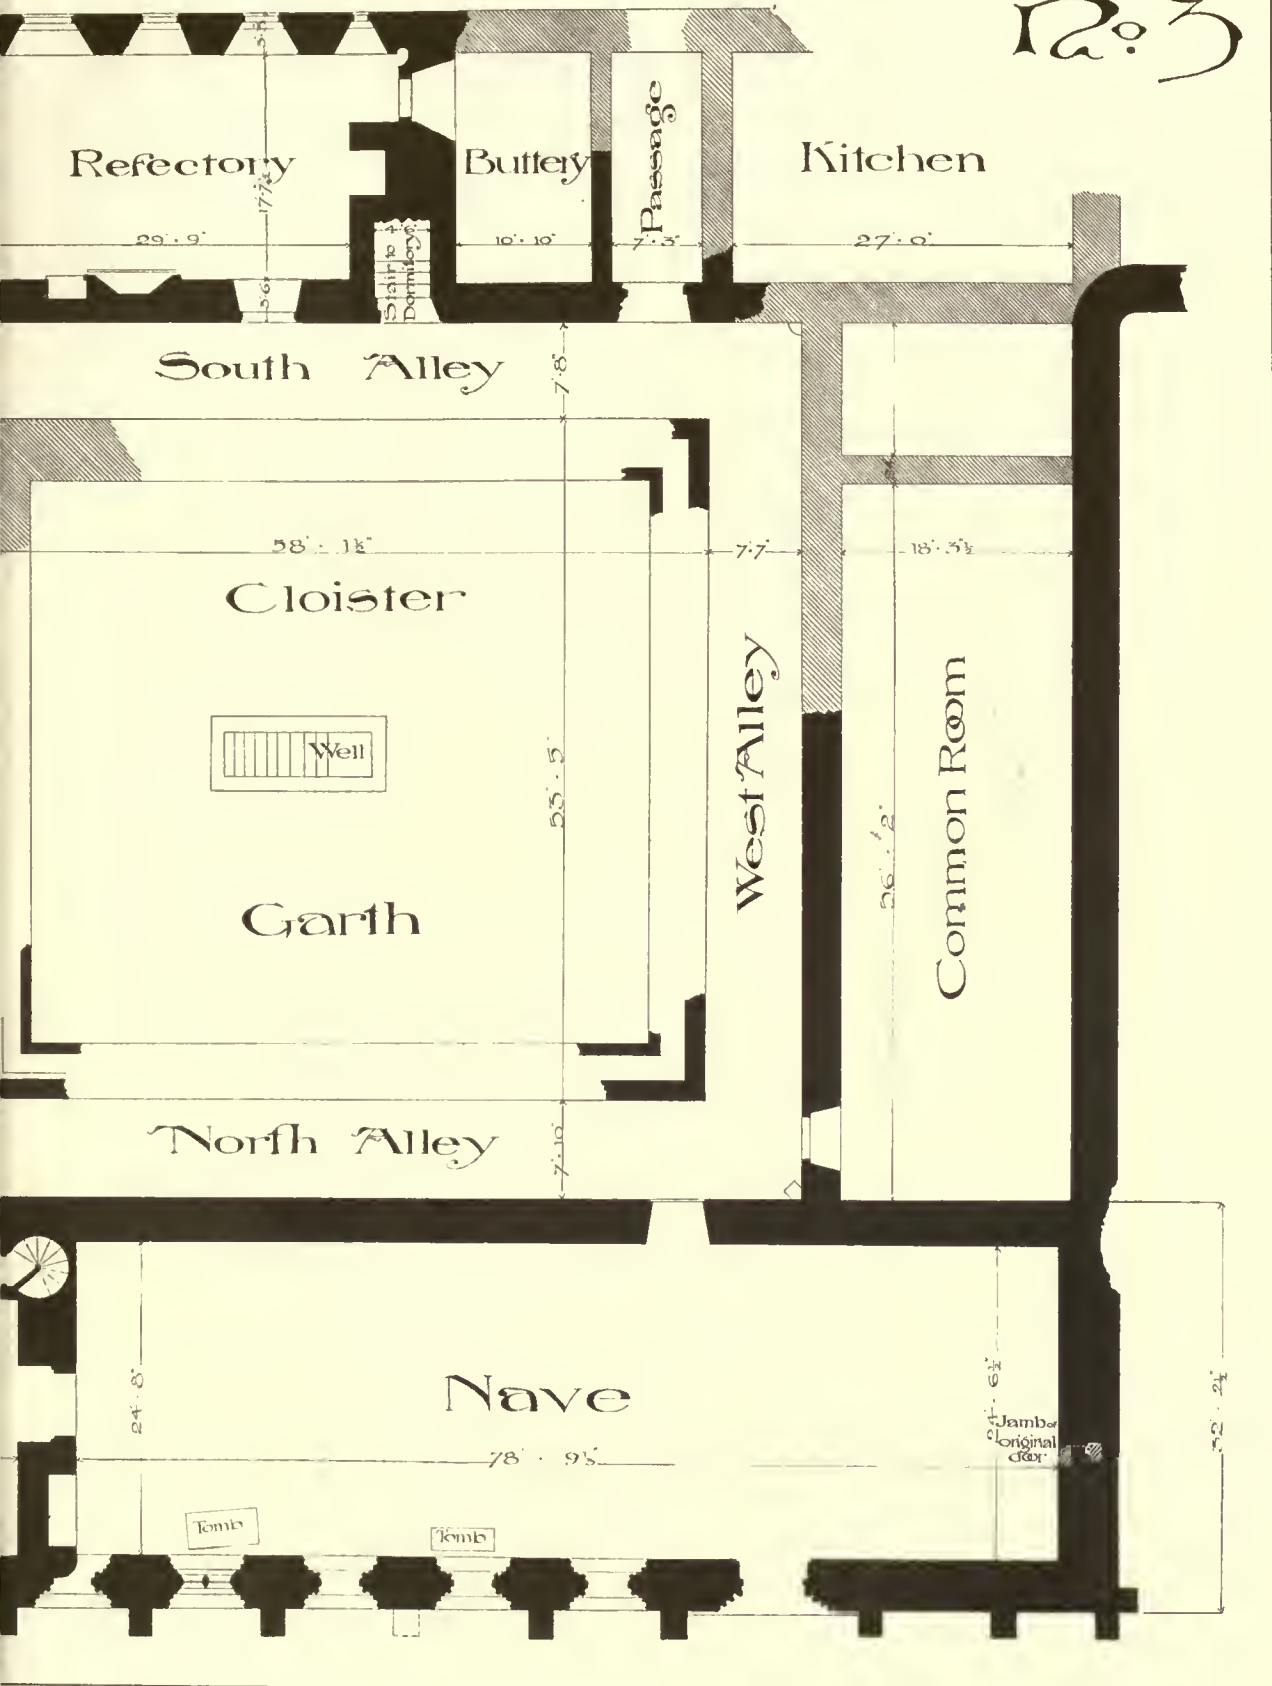

PLATE IV.

PLATE IV.

THE north wall of the church is shown on this Plate as it at present exists, and it may be divided into three portions, corresponding with the three periods at which it was built, viz., 1244, 1329, and very early in the fifteenth century. The foundations of the nave and north transept, the two angle buttresses at the west end of the former, and the plinth or wall head above, belong to the first period ; the nave wall eastward to the second ; and the entire north wall of the choir to the third. In the splayed base near the west end of the nave there have been two breaks or steps, one of which is still remaining underground, and is shown between the second and third buttresses. The original plinth has been continued to, and stopped against, the third buttress, which has been carried higher than the others, and has been built, together with that on its right, upon the foundations of two of the original buttresses, while the remaining nave buttresses eastward have been spaced afresh, and built independently of the former foundations. The nave plinth of the second period (it is almost a cornice) was carried to, and is in position above, the eastmost buttress of the nave, and its overlapping by the choir plinth and wall under is interesting, as affording proof of the position of the previous belfry gable ; showing that when the choir was built it was joined to the nave at the east side of this buttress, behind which was the gable ; and that when the present gable was built on its west side, the portion of the choir wall above or overlapping the nave was carried westward with it, while the nave plinth and buttress were left in position.

THIS plate shows the Abbey buildings in their present condition, as seen from the east. The former richness of the choir apse is now represented by a single window arch, the tracery of which is entirely destroyed, but some idea of its former character may be gathered from the remaining rybats, and a fragment of tracery, now placed for greater security in the sacristy. The buttressed wall to the south of the choir is fairly entire, and the tracery of the windows in the chapter-house and sacristy could easily be restored from the existing fragments. Above the two windows of the chapter-house are those of the library, and in the angle next the choir the remains of the ruined night stair may still be seen. To the left of this group is the barrel vault of the parlour roof, and immediately adjoining is the flat pointed arch of the slype, the stone seats on either side of which are also shown. Close by is the dungeon window; and in the left angle of the court, is, in a single stone, one half of the door arch of the cross passage. A section is given of the vaulted cellars forming the south side of the infirmary court, and these cellars seem to have been at a lower level than the other buildings. Behind, and above all, is the lofty outline of the gate tower.

PLATE VI.

ON this plate is shown a longitudinal section of the church, taken through the nave and choir. To avoid repetition, the remarks accompanying Plates II. and III. may be taken as also applying in part to this Plate; which again, in its turn, may help to further assist and illustrate those descriptions. It may be here noted that the nave floor slopes somewhat downward towards the choir. To the right of the entrance door is shown the hollow of the holy water basin. The wall directly under the little window above Lady Row's tomb was repaired some years ago, and any indication of the original work at the back of the tomb is now lost. On either side, however, of the window, there are parts of two attached wall shafts, and between their bases is a fragment of a narrow band or frieze, of a distinctly classic character, and a sketch of this fragment is given on Plate XVII. Inside the choir, and immediately within the line of the present belfry gable, may be seen the ragged wall indicating the position of the previous gable; and against the rough remains of which, the moulded corbel string carried along the entire choir, and returned round its window arches, is stopped. At the sanctuary the triplet wall shafts are carried down to the floor level, where they are finished with bases. The three platforms are also shown, together with, on the upper platform, the position of the high altar, detached from the wall.

PLATES VII. AND VIII.

PLATES VII. AND VIII.

THESE two plates should be examined together, as both show similar portions of the nave to a larger scale. The detail is very curious, and the general design full of interest. The work of the original Abbey is represented by portions of the splayed base, the plinth, and the south club skew of the west gable. On Plate VII. parts of the splayed base are shown, stopped against the later buttresses on either side of the entrance door. The detail of these two portions of the base is different (Plate XXV., Nos. 9 and 10); and another similar base from the south wall of the nave is shown on Plate VIII., and is detailed on Plate XXV., No. 11. The wall plinth is also detailed as No. 5 on the same plate, while the general form of the club skew on the west gable is shown on Plate VIII. It will be noted that the buttress on the right of the entrance door is built upon the foundations of an earlier buttress, the lower splay of which yet remains; and that the wall plinth has been stopped against the top stone of this high buttress, but this top stone has now disappeared. The entrance door is a remarkable piece of design. The moulded jambs (Plate XXV., No. 1) are without either caps or bases, and a moulded string (Plate XXV., No. 3) forms a general abacus, against the under side of which the projecting members of these jambs are finished; the upper portions, or heads, being, however, first cut inwards to suit the curvature of the abacus. The detail of the arch mould and the upper line of the abacus are shown on Plate XXV., No. 1; while the detail of the inner arris of the door is figured No. 2 on the same Plate. The only hood mould found in this portion of the nave is that of the little niche in the wall above this door, and it is detailed on Plate XXV., No. 4. The door platform follows the general slope of the nave floor, thus making the door jambs of unequal height, as figured. A stone step seems to have been fitted in across the door, and the ends of this step have been returned to suit the moulded jambs. In the interior this door appears to have undergone considerable repair, and very little of the original masonry remains, the eight moulded stones representing the only existing portions. On its right is the shallow hollow, indicating the position of the holy water basin.

The nave windows are also very curious, their moulded rybats (Plate XXV., No. 6) converging inward towards the top, somewhat after the manner of a Greek doorway; and the transom at the springing of the window arch continues across itself, but with a slightly flatter detail, the corresponding members of the rybats. A section taken through this window is shown on Plate VIII., and it also gives a side view of one of the ordinary buttresses of the nave, with the wall plinth (Plate XXV., No. 8) of the same period above. Lady Row died in 1530, and the little window above her tomb is of about this date; and, although thirteenth century in feeling, there is no doubt whatever as to its late insertion, the outer order of one of the nave windows being still in position round it, while the space below the sill has been built up and formed the back of the tomb. It is probably a copy or rendering of an earlier window, and its curved transom is certainly unique in the history of architecture. A detail of the rybat and mullion of this window is given on Plate XXV., No. 7.

PLATE IX.

THIS plate gives the plan and two elevations of the small door in the centre of the belfry gable. The form of the arch is very pleasing, and on the nave side the step and rybats are moulded (Plate XXV., Nos. 13 and 12). The hood mould of this door, like that of the chapter-house, is finished square at its lower ends, and the masons' marks on the two doors are alike. Above the apex of the hood mould there are three courses of ashlar, bringing the wall up to the level of the door opening into the nave from the rood stair from the choir; and above this line the entire wall is built of rubble. This line I take to be the floor line of the narrow rood loft, projecting above the door into the nave. On the ingoing of the door opening on the choir side, the marks of the iron hinges and the hole for the wooden bar may still be seen.

THE belfry or bell turret is of simple design, and is pierced with openings for two bells; above these openings is a moulded string (Plate XXV., No. 14), which also divides them from the gable above; and crowning all is the very quaint and beautiful cross, the ingathering to which is most satisfactorily arranged. The bells, which used "to summon the clergy and faithful to the service of God," are lost, and not even a tradition of their fate remains. All one can gather is that, during drainage operation some years ago, one of the workmen found near the dovecot what he thought was a piece of gold, "as big as his hand," but which, on the authority of an Ayr jeweller, turned out to be a piece of bell-metal; possibly a fragment of one of the Abbey bells.

The drawings on Plate XI. give a fair idea of the cross, and the division of the ten hearts on the two sides into two groups of four and six, facing respectively the east and west, is worthy of consideration. When Sir James Fergusson had this gable pointed a few years ago, the stonework under the cross was found to be almost entirely worn away, while the cross itself oscillated at the gentle touch of a finger; and there is little doubt that, but for the care it then received, it would now have been among the things of the past, for the next severe gale would assuredly have thrown it down.

A PLAN and two elevations are here given of one of the choir buttresses, also a drawing of the little ogee-headed niche of the holy water basin in the choir. The splayed base (Plate XXVI., No. 3) and the moulded string (Plate XXVI., No. 4) are carried round the entire choir. The jointing round the buttresses of the upper bed of this moulded string, as well as that of the buttress string above, is very peculiar, the slope on the face of these strings being carried through the mortar joint and curved into the line of the buttress above. The little splay along the top of the two side faces of the buttress, under the upper weathering, may be noticed, also the plain butt finish under the same of the chamfered edges of the upper stage. The splayed plinth and water spouts round the choir are detailed on Plate XXVI., No. 7.

The little niche, as already stated, is in the south wall of the choir, near the processional door.

PLATE XIII.

POSSIBLY the most elaborately carved stonework in the Abbey buildings has been that of the piscina and sedilia, drawings of which are given on this Plate. Unfortunately much of the delicate carving has been wantonly destroyed, and what is yet left has suffered much from the hand of time. The piscina shows the remains of a flat arched niche, enclosing two shallow basins, the outlet channels from which are at the back. The jamb mouldings are finished against bases (Plate XXVI., No. 14) resting upon a boldly moulded sole (Plate XXVI., No. 13). On each of the outer sides of these moulded jambs there have been small buttresses, finished at the top with a long pinnacle. The gablet is ogee in shape, enclosing a circle with quatrefoil and carved spandrils, and the hood mould has been ornamented with crockets and a carved finial, now destroyed. The sedilia shows an arcade of four compartments, with small moulded ribs on the under side of its coved canopy, and this portion of the work shows traces of dull red colouring. The outer face is represented by four elaborately carved gablets, with groups of carved pinnacles between. Each gablet has enclosed a quatrefoil in a circle, and surmounts a cusped arch, the cusping, however, being now entirely destroyed. The carved bosses at the lower extremities of the gablets and pinnacles are now merely rough masses of stone. The gablets have each had four carved crockets on either side, and on top a carved finial, the general form of which is best shown on the right hand gablet. These finials, and those of the pinnacles, have been carried above the moulded string of the choir. Details of the side jambs with their bases, and the necking at the back of the sedilia, are shown on Plate XXVI., Nos. 9, 11, and 10. The face of the stone seat is quite broken away, but sufficient remains to show fragments of a carved head at either end. For convenience of representation the piscina and sedilia are on this drawing shown on the same wall plane; the correct angle is, however, shown on Plate III., at the choir apse. The broken and crumbling stonework of the two drawings is shown as it actually exists.

The moulded steps of the sanctuary platform are here shown, also the triplet shafts of the choir with their bases, and the moulded string round the choir at the level of the window soles; details of which are given on Plate XXVI., Nos. 18, 15, 16, and 17, respectively.

PLATE XIV.

PLATE XIV.

THIS quaint little door is illustrated by a plan and elevation, and, to a larger scale, the detail of a jamb and base. The jamb mould (also shown on Plate XXVI., No. 20) is bold and good, and the base (Plate XXVI., No. 21), while peculiar, is of a very pleasing form. The little quirk on its lower swelling is repeated on every base throughout the choir, and its general detail is taken from that of the wall base in the earlier chapter-house (Plate XXVI., No. 22). In the base of this door the roll fillet of the jamb reappears under the octagonal necking, and the base itself assumes on plan this octagonal form, and its lower members are stopped against the fillet, which grows gradually heavier, and is continued down to the floor level, projecting at the same time beyond the face of the step. To the right of this door one of the lower wall stones is checked out to form also part of the stone paving of the floor, and this line gives the correct floor level. On the left is the step of the lower platform, with its moulded nosing. Just inside this door the lower of the two steps in the sacristy passage is sufficiently hollowed on its outer face to allow the door to swing open past it, and the left wall is checked out about two inches, the thickness of the door itself, so that when open it might be flush with the line of the passage wall, and thus not in any way further reduce the already contracted space. The curious jointing of the stonework in the wall round the door should be noted.

PLATES XV. AND XVI.

THE sacristy and chapter-house, being the most beautiful as well as the most perfect portions of the Abbey ruins, are in these Plates shown more in detail, and to a larger scale; and the remarks made regarding them in the descriptions accompanying Plates II. and III. are more fully illustrated by these drawings. The plan indicates more clearly the positions of the bases and shafts of the earlier chapter-house, while the section shows from the interior the entire east walls of the two chambers, also the levels of the scriptorium and library floors above, occasioned by the different heights of the vaulted ceilings. While in the sacristy, the positions of the three fragmentary original wall shafts are shown, that in the angle of what is now the stair lobby may be specially interesting, from the fact that it carries with it the moulding of the former chapter-house door (Plate XXVII., No. 11). The round-headed door from the present sacristy into this little vaulted lobby has had its left jamb stones built into the old wall, the mortar joints of which can still be traced on these stones, which now form the ingoing of the rough modern door, here cut through the wall from the choir. The lofty groined ceiling is of very elegant and graceful proportion, and the curiously carved stone corbels carrying the ribs are shown on the following Plate.

In the chapter-house the stone bench is still entire round two of its sides, and the ogee arch of the Abbot's seat is yet perfect in form although defaced in detail. The bosses of the four compartments of the groined ceiling appear each to have carried a carved shield, and any of the carving remaining on these shields has been shown as carefully as possible in dotted lines on the plan. The shield on the south-west compartment shows what is apparently intended to be the apsidal end of a building, closely resembling the present choir apse when entire, and of which it may possibly be a rude representation. For details of the sacristy and chapter-house see Plate XXVII., Nos. 3 to 12 inclusive.

PLATE XVII.

AMONG the quaintest features of Crosraguel Abbey are the curiously carved corbels in the sacristy. Unfortunately much of this interesting work is now indistinct and very indefinite, partly owing to the boarding up of the sacristy window, and partly on account of the dampness of the chamber and the consequent decay of the stone. As correct a rendering of it as possible has, however, been here given, and a few explanatory notes may also be of interest. Nos. 1 to 4 are the angle corbels, and Nos. 5 and 6 those on the side walls. No. 1, in the north-east angle, is a rude representation of a bearded head with three faces. No. 2 is in the south-east angle, and, being next the window, is in a better light, and can be more easily seen. No. 3, in the north-west angle, appears to have been floral in character, two circular flowers being most prominent, but the general design is almost altogether obliterated. No. 4, in the south-west angle, is a gagged head, with staring eyeballs and a very flat face. No. 5 is on the north wall, and is the largest mass of carving in the chamber, and seems to be two roughly-cut monsters, with heads of men, and lions' bodies partly covered with scales. No. 6, on the south wall, forms the capital of the only wall shaft in the sacristy, and carries two sitting squirrels, evidently enjoying a quiet meal. All these corbels carry the ribs of the vaulted ceiling, and No. 7 is the boss at the intersection of these ribs. No. 8 is one of the hood mould terminals of the sacristy window, and is graced with the form of a mermaid, for whose reception a special little niche has been cut out of the side buttress. No. 9 is from the nave, and shows the base of one of the two wall shafts, with the fragment of the classic band between, already mentioned as being the only existing portions of Lady Row's tomb.

PLATE XVIII.

PLATE XVIII.

ON this drawing is shown, to a large scale, the south bay of the chapter-house and library. The window rybat, arch, and hood mould, with its carved end and apex, are fairly entire, and sufficient of the tracery remains to indicate its general design; and it is worth noting that its largest stone, with a considerable leverage of dead weight, is held in position by a single joint, and that apparently of little strength. The carving on the hood mould is very original, the two lower terminals being grotesque representations of the human figure, while the carving at the apex is so indefinite that its form only can be outlined. The hood moulds of the other two similar windows have been ornamented with like carving, rude and quaint; the terminal at the north side of the sacristy window, and shown on the preceding Plate, being peculiarly characteristic. Above the chapter-house window one of the small east windows of the library is shown, and it is moulded in the same manner as that overlooking the cloister garth (Plate XX.) The section shows the side view of one of the buttresses, the ingoing of the chapter-house and library windows, the line of the library floor, and the top of the stone seat round the chapter-house. The plan gives the figured sizes of the chapter-house window and adjoining buttress, and a detail of the rybat and hood mould of the former is shown on Plate XXVII., No. 1.

PLATE XIX.

PLATE XIX.

THREE of the four remaining doors in the cloister are shown on this Plate, and of these that of the chapter-house is the most important. The moulded jambs (Plate XXVII., No. 2) of this door have been finished at their lower ends with bases, the detail of which is now very uncertain. The unequal mitering at the apex of the arch is the result of careless workmanship, and the finish of the arch mould on either side is, in consequence, of slightly different size and contour; the lower ends of the hood mould are cut square, like those of the processional door from the choir, shown on this Plate, and a similar finish is found on the door in the belfry gable. The processional door has been moulded on its outer jamb (Plate XXVI., No. 19) and inner arris, the former moulding terminating upon a moulded base, now almost entirely worn away. This is the door already spoken of as an insertion in the existing wall of the former choir, and the mason's mark found on three of the stones of this door, is the same as the one mark peculiar to the early fifteenth century portion of the choir as it now exists. The little round-headed door, the last shown on this sheet, leads to the cellarer's passage, and is probably of a slightly later date than either of the two doors described above.

ON this Plate is shown part of the east wall of the cloister, with the little library window overlooking the garth. The window itself is very simple and effective, and contrasts pleasantly with the plain mass of masonry around. Immediately under it are two of the corbels for the support of the former wall beam of the east alley roof, and the water table above is quite fresh, and almost wholly entire. The plan shows the usual stone window seats, and the corbels in the wall above indicate the line of the ceiling beam. The curious stone fillet on the inside of the mullion and transom is peculiar, and on the exterior the deep hollow moulding is very satisfactory. These moulded stones are detailed on Plate XXVII., Nos. 13, 14, and 15. The library, and the sacristy adjoining, are later in date than the chapter-house and sacristy above which they are built, and the junction line of the two portions can be easily followed on the east and west walls. On the latter wall the four corbels next the choir are much weatherworn, and bear traces of carving similar in style to that found in the sacristy, and these corbels are earlier than those remaining to the westward, which are quite plain, and of the same date as the upper rooms.

THIS is the only measured drawing illustrative of the Abbot's tower, and on it is shown a plan and elevation of one side of its principal apartment. The flat jointing of the round corner stones of the fireplace opening is very bad, and the lintel, which the left hand stone shows to have been keyed in, is now lost. The raised stone fender is, however, a good feature, and one to be commended in those early days when floor draughts were common and carpets a somewhat rare luxury. At the side of the fireplace is a small aumbry, of a curious and rather awkward shape; it shows a gibbet check, and the hinge and fastening marks of a small door. Along the top of the wall above is a continuous corbel string, for the support of the ceiling beams. A section and half plan of the window in the west wall is shown, and in the opposite wall a large moulded aumbry. The detail of this aumbry jamb and those of the entrance door and fireplace are shown on Plate XXVII., Nos. 21, 19, and 20.

PLATES XXII. XXIII. AND XXIV.

PLATES XXII. XXIII. AND XXIV.

THESE three Plates are principally drawings of the gate tower, which was probably the last inhabited portion of the Abbey, and even now it only requires a roof and two floors to render it again perfectly habitable. These drawings are perhaps also interesting as showing in detail a small semi-baronial building of the sixteenth century, which is, so far at least as the walls are concerned, in almost perfect preservation. The entrance archway is vaulted, and in the thickness of the wall on one side is a long narrow chamber, with one small wall slit for light. The stair to the upper rooms opens from the courtyard; and near the level of the first floor is a now built-up door, leading to the walk on the top of the battlemented screen wall, which connects this tower with the claustral buildings. In one of Mr. Fergusson's sketches he shows the corbelling of a small circular stair in the angle where this wall joins that of these buildings, but unfortunately this portion of the wall is now a wreck of fallen masonry; still it is more than probable that the battlemented walk terminated at the stair, which would communicate with the courtyard or one of the cloister buildings. Slezer, however, in his drawing shows this same battlemented wall returned along the entire west wall of the common room, but one cannot be at all certain that the wall head walk was carried along with it, for the wall is now very ruinous, and there is no trace visible of any stair or other opening from this wall to the ground or nave. Returning to the tower, its upper floors have been of wood, and a large fireplace, and two small windows with stone seats are in each of the two rooms. The stair is continued up to the level of the roof, round which has been a paved walk with battlements, the merlons of which are now destroyed; and from the stair side of this walk ten little stone steps, five on either side, lead up to the small square chamber above the circular stair, called the watch-tower.

On Plate XXIV. two plans, an elevation and a section, are given of the dovecot, the door to which appears to have opened from the wall head of the domestic buildings, and this wall is shown by Clerk to have been corbelled on its outer face, and it may possibly have had, like the wall from the gate tower, a passage along the top. In the dovecot the nests are about 8 inches square, arranged in fourteen rows, with 4-inch stone divisions between, and the entrance for the pigeons is at the top. In the centre of the floor is a trapdoor or hatch opening to a small circular chamber below, about 6 feet 7 inches in diameter, with three narrow wall slits for light. Grose says, "this room or 'circular shaft' surrounded a well of excellent water;" the only entrance to which must have been from the floor of the dovecot above. The two rugged openings at present existing in its walls were made some years ago for the passage of a drain, at which time the workmen were down to a depth of several feet, but no trace of any well was then found.

THE detail mouldings shown on this and the two following Plates have all been very carefully taken from the Abbey buildings; first by exact measurement, where the forms were square or rectangular, and the curved lines afterwards filled in from impressions taken by lead wire. They were all drawn out full size on the spot, and afterwards reduced by photo-lithography to the present size, so that the forms now given are absolutely correct reproductions to a smaller scale of the various mouldings. Many of the curved lines do not follow true circles, and seem to have been either drawn by the hand or to be the result of imperfect workmanship.

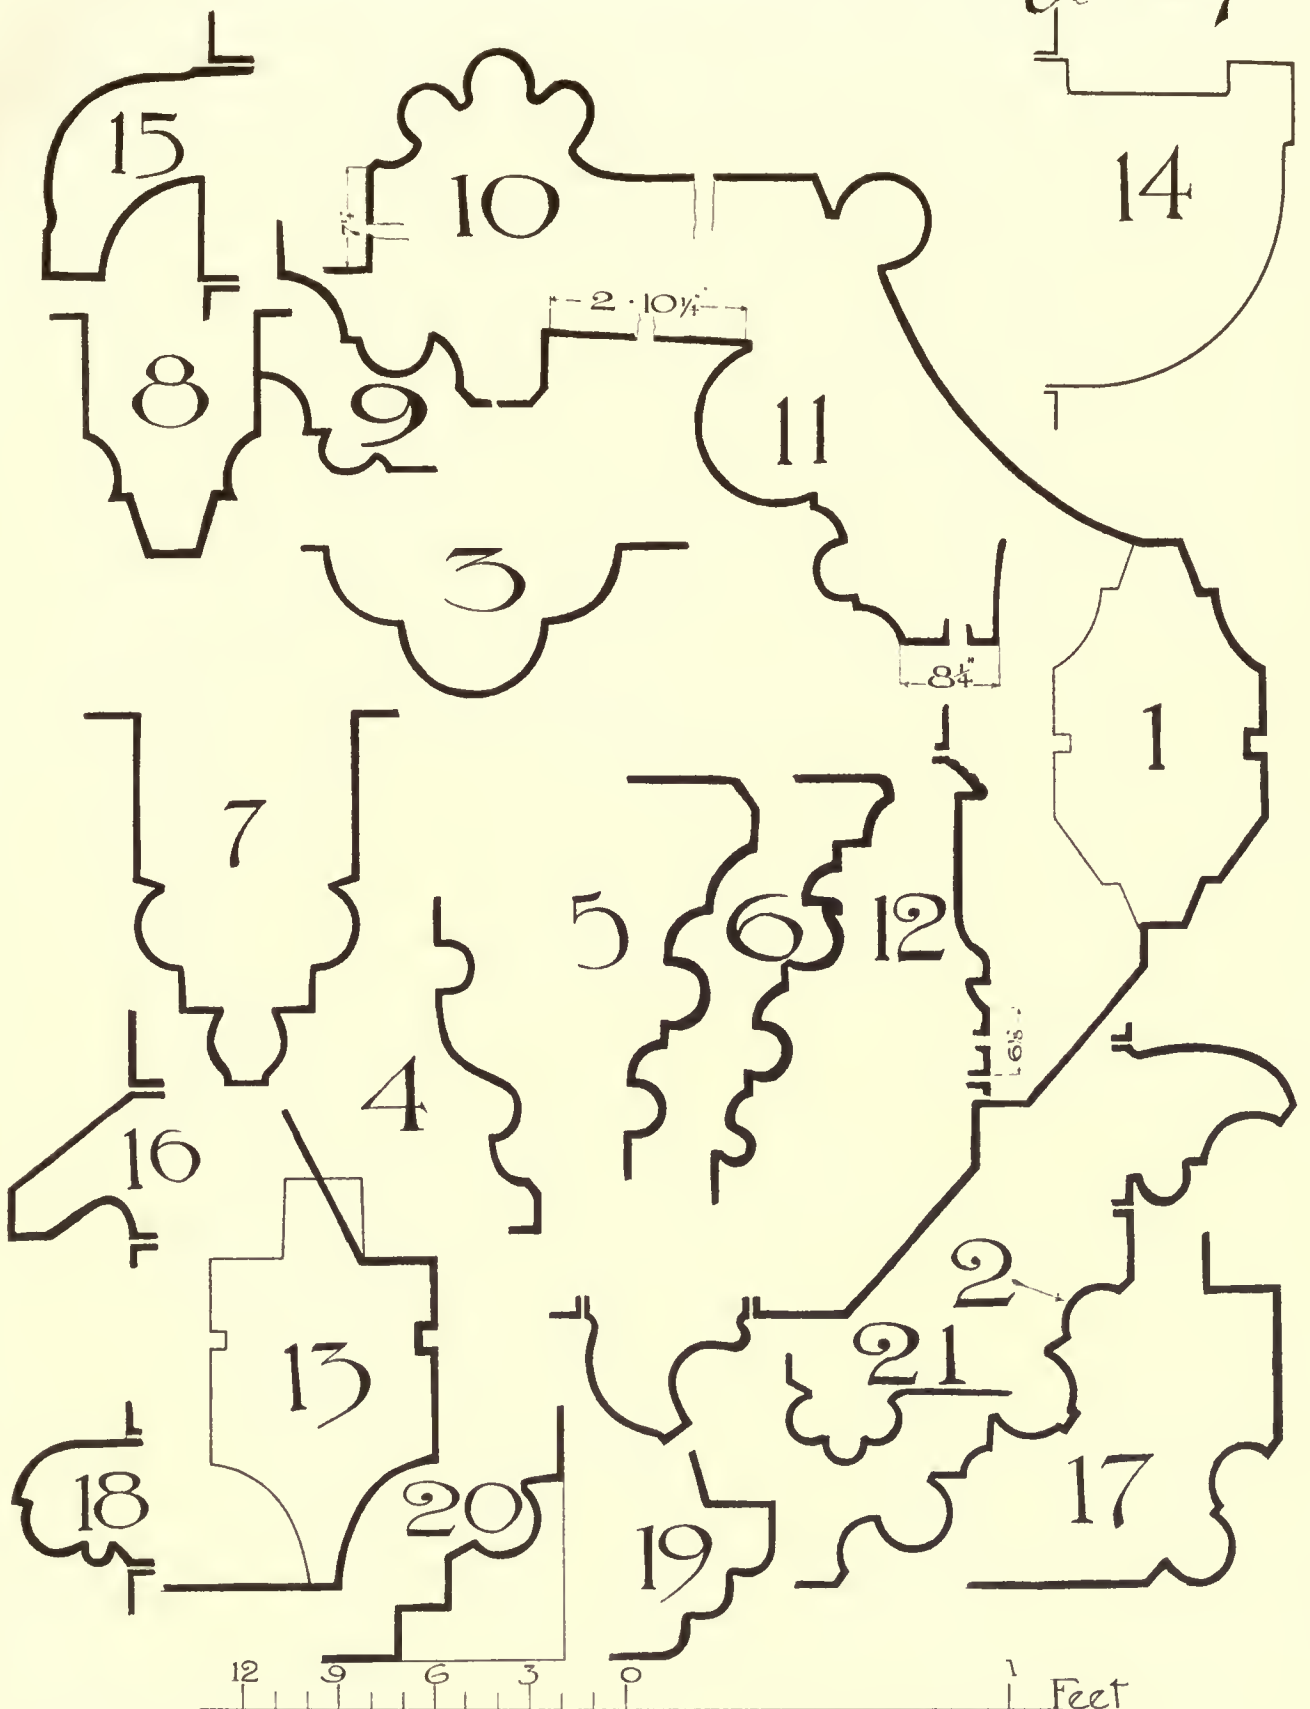

PLATE XXVIII.

THIS drawing shows four tomb slabs and an inscription, of which A and C were found in the nave, and D and E in the choir. All the graves appear at some time to have been opened, for the slabs now lie irregularly, and the ground below is soft. Unfortunately a fragment of A (which otherwise is in perfect condition) is lost, and no trace of it can be found. Of the others, C is the most entire, and the quaint inscription is complete. B is a curious inscription, found on one of the steps of the well in the cloister garth. These drawings have been reduced by photo-lithography from full size rubbings taken from the stones.

PLATE XXIX.

PLATE XXIX.

THE masons' marks at Crosraguel are very numerous, and full of interest. A careful rubbing has been taken from each of the different marks it was possible to distinguish; these rubbings have been arranged into groups, lettered and tabulated, and reduced to their present size by photo-lithography. On the work of the original Abbey no masons' marks could be found, but it is only right to say that these early portions are either so ruinous and decayed, or so thickly covered with lichen, that the search for masons' marks was from the beginning almost hopeless. On the library, scriptorium, gate tower, and dovecot, they do not appear to have ever existed; while, on the remaining stones of the door from the cloister to the dormitory day stair, one indistinct mark is found several times repeated.

The masons' marks shown on the accompanying Plate may be divided into the following five groups:—

1. The present nave.
2. The remaining portion of the early choir and chapter-house wall.
3. The later portions of the present choir.
4. The sacristy and chapter-house.
5. The Abbot's tower.

No. 1. The present nave.

- A. Eight of this mark on the window next the north door, and many of the same on the nave walls.
- B. Many of this mark on the walls.
- C. Only one of this.
- D. About six of this.
- E. This man appears to have cut most of the north door, also the hewn work of the door to the cloister.
- F. This mark is near the north door, and is much worn.
- G. Only one of this, and it is indistinct.
- H. This mark is from Lady Row's tomb.
- I. This mark was found on a fragment of the original base, dug up near the sacristy.

No. 2. Early choir and chapter-house wall.

- A. This mark is found on both sides of this wall.
- B. Only two of this mark.
- C. Found on this wall.
- D. Eight or ten of this mark.
- E. Found on the lintel of the outer door from sacristy to night stair.

No. 3. Later portions of present choir.

- A. This is apparently the only mason's mark on the new choir, and is found three times on the processional door, five times on that leading to the night stair, and twice on the second window from the east end, in the north wall.

No. 4. Sacristy and chapter-house.

- A. Fifteen times on the east wall of the cloister.
- B. Twelve times on the same wall.
- C. This man appears to have cut the whole of the chapter-house door, and nearly every stone in the passage between the sacristy and the night stair bears his mark. It is also found seventeen times in the east wall of the cloister, and on most of its more ornamental stones; while on the corbel of the diagonal rib, in its south-west angle, it is found cut in relief. The door in the belfry gable carries the same mark, and it is found again on the base of one of the shafts of Lady Row's tomb, and in the Abbot's tower.
- D. Nine times on the east wall of the cloister.
- E. Only one of this mark.
- F. Only one of this mark.
- G. Only one of this mark.
- H. Ten of this mark.
- I. Three times on the east wall of the cloister.
- J. Three or four of this mark.

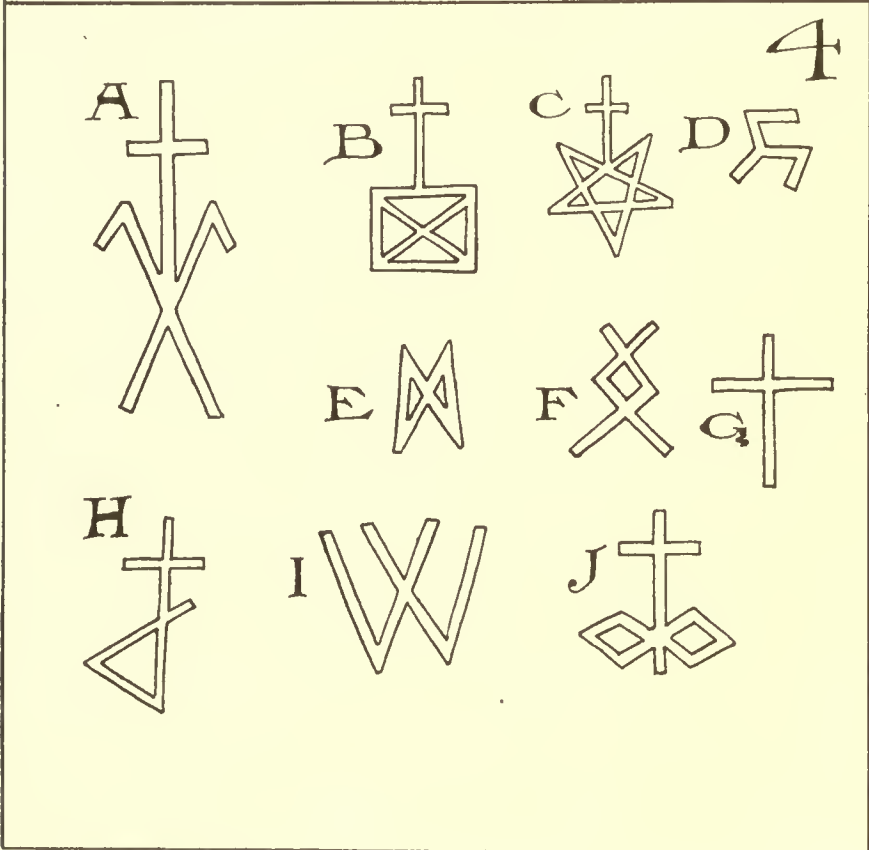

No. 5. Abbot's tower.

The following were all found on the principal floor :—

- A. Three or four times on the door ingoing.
- B. Found on the fireplace jamb.
- C. Three times on the door ingoing.
- D. Found on the door jamb, partly cut away by the bed joint.

The fragment of a tomb, also shown on this Plate, was found in the choir, about the centre of the floor; and the other rubbing is from the club skew of the remaining portion of the infirmary gable.
