[X] We shall give an account of what he published.] The several pieces published by him, were these. I. A Sermon on Psalm 116. at the funeral of King Henry VII (32). II. A funeral Sermon at the moneth minde of Margaret Countess of Richmond. Printed by Wynkyn de Worde: republished in 1708. by Thomas Baker B. D. with a learned preface. III. His opinion of King Henry the VIIIth's marriage, in a letter to T. Wolfey. Printed in the collection of records, at the end of Jeremy Collier's Ecclesiastical History (33). IV. Commentary on the seven penitencyal Psalmes. Written at the desire of the Countess of Richmond. London 1509. 4to. & 1555. 8vo. V. Sermon on the Passion of our Saviour. VI. Sermon concerning the Righteousness of the Pharisees and Christians. VII. The method of arriving to the highest perfection in religion. These four last were translated into Latin by John Fenne (34). VIII. Sermon preached at London, on that day when the writings of M. Luther were publickly burnt; on John xv. 26. Cambridge 1521. translated into Latin by R. Paice (35). IX. Affertionum Martini Lutheri confutatio. i. e. A confutation of Luther's Assertion; in 41 articles. X. Defensio Affertionis Henr. VIII. de 7 Sacramentis contra Lutheri Captivitatem Babylonicam. i. e. A Defence of King Henry the 8th's book against Luther's intituled, The Captivity of Babylon. XI. Epistola responsoria, Epistolæ Lutheri. i. e. A letter in answer to Luther's. XII. Sacerdotii Defensio contra Lusberum. A Defence of Priesthood against Luther. XIII. Pro damnatione Lu-

Of the reality of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist, against Oecolampadius. In this book he answers Oecolampadius, paragraph by paragraph, and gives him many hard names. It is but a very indifferent performance. XV. De uinca Magdalena contra Clichtoveum & Jac. Fabrum Stapuleusem i. e. That there was only one Magdalen, against Clichtoveus, &c. Lov. XVI. S. Petrum Romæ fuisse. i. e. That St Peter was at Rome, against Ulric Velenus. XVII. Several other small Tracts, viz. on the Benefit of Prayer. The necessity of Prayer. Exposition of the Lord's Prayer. Psalmes, and Prayers. A letter on Christian Charity, to Herman Leclatius, Dean of Utrecht. A Treatise on Purgatory, &c. Most of the foregoing pieces were printed together in one volume folio at Wurtzburg, in 1595. Herbipoli. It is also justly supposed, that he had a considerable hand in King Henry the 8th's book against Luther, intituled, Affertio septem sacramentorum, &c. tho' Bishop Burnet is very angry with Sanders for saying so (36). For it is hardly credible, that a Prince of King Henry's disposition should have allowed himself time and leisure enough for such a work. Finally, there is in the Norfolk Library of MSS belonging to the Royal Society, an answer of Bishop Fisher's to a book printed at London in 1530. concerning King Henry's Marriage with Queen Catharine. FITZHERBERT (Sir ANTHONY) a very learned Lawyer, as his most excellent writings testify, and one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas in the reign of King Henry VIII. He was descended from the most ancient and noble family of Herbert, honoured with the titles of Huntingdon and Pembroke, notwithstanding what is said to the contrary by the judicious and learned Mr Camden (a), whose authority, however, in this, as well as in some other points of a like nature, has borne down that of all others (b), and, which is still worse, even truth itself, as will manifestly appear in that examination, which, for this reason (and sure a better could not be assigned) will be afforded to this point in the notes [A]. He was the younger son of Ralph Fitzherbert, [A] To this point in the notes ] The matter of this note will give the reader full satisfaction, as to the means by which so many errors creep into all kinds of history, and more especially into that of eminent personages, and their descents. It must be allowed, that, in things of this nature, the greatest men may mistake, and that such mistakes might be, and indeed ought to be excused; but for this very reason persisting in such mistakes is altogether inexcusable; and for a man to presume his own authority and credit to be of more consequence than truth, is offering a great indignity to the publick; and yet it has sometimes happened, that this indignity has been not only borne with, but such as have endeavoured to set right mistakes of this nature, have drawn upon themselves only scorn and reproach. In the present case we will first state the account given us by Camden, in all the editions of his book, except the last; then, the remark of Rafe Brooke upon that account; next Mr Camden's reply; after that, the substance of Brooke's rejoinder; and last of all, the paragraph as it stands in Camden's best and most correct edition; with a few observations as to the necessity and use of such discussions.

CAMDEN (1).

Herbert married the sister of William Earl of Hereford, and in her right, was Lord of Deane, from whom is descended the noble family of the Herberts: from hence also, if we shall credit the Heralds and Escutcheons of arms, Anthony Fitz Herbert, that great Lawyer, and Lord Chief Justice of England, took his original. But I think he rather descended from the worshipful family of the Fitz Herberts in Derbyshire.

BROOKE, or as he styles himself YORK, i. e. York Herald (2).

' Your often and suspicious objections, calling in question the credit of her Majesty's Heralds, as tho' you judged them scarce worthy to be believed, doth proceed, as I suppose, from a malignant humour in you, rather then of any good ground, or sufficient reason, that might move you therunto. But I trust that those of discretion will sooner give credit unto them, in matter they shall aver by good warrantife and authority, than to you, who ground your contradicting arguments upon hearsays and opinative imaginations. And where you charge the Heralds to have made Anthony Fitz Herbert, that was Lord Chief Justice of England, to be descended from that family of Herberts, which married the sister of William Earl of Hereford: I say, that therein they have done like honest and learned officers of arms; and those that have, or shall, derive the said Anthony, or any of that family of Fitz Herberts, from any other original than that aforesaid, they have and shall err from the truth.'

CAMDEN's Reply (3).

That I did but so much as believe, that Anthony Fitz Herbert, Lord Chief Justice, did descend of the Lineage of the Fitz Herberts in the County of Derby. He revileth me as tho' he were Lord of my belief.

of Norbury in the county of Derby, Esq; and on this account in all probability it was, that,

He denieth it, and that with many words. He deriveth him from Peter, son of Herbert of Deane, of his own bare words, ipse dixit, he said it, but proof he bringeth none. Let him look upon the visitation, and he shall see that he was of the Lynage of the Fitzherberts of Norbury in the County of Derby. Let him also give ear to one, that having diligently searched all the deeds with their seals fixed of that family, because he would find out the truth, affirmeth, that they never, in former ages, did bare the arms of that Fitzherbert of Deane, but others, which they took from the Earls Ferrar's, of whom in the time of King Henry the Second, they held their lands, and that before and after they flourished under the surname of Fitzherbert. Neither let this fellow, which hath so plodded in the pedigree of the Herberts, which descended from Peter son of Herbert, forget, how that they never took Fitzherbert for their surname, but, after the old and Welch fashion, did alter always their surname by the christian name of their father; for the son of Reginald, Peter Fitz Reginald, and until it came to William ap Thomas, whose son, the Earl of Pembroke, did assume the christian name of Herbert for his surname, and left it to his posterity. And so likewise did others out of that family, whom it shall be needless particularly to reckon up. But wherefore do I stay upon these points? I will in one word end all this matter. He derives this family from Peter Fitzherbert of Deane, but that Peter lived under King John and was of his Council, as witnesseth Roger of Wyndouer, 1211. But William Fitzherbert had Norbury in the year 1125, fourscore years before, as appeareth by the book of Tuttesbury-Abby, where these words are to be read. In the year of the Incarnation 1125, William Prior and the Convent of the Church of St Maries of Tuttesbury, did give to William Fitzherbert, Norbury, to him and his heirs, &c. and for this did William give one measure of wheat.

BROOKS Rejoinder (4).

‘ Gentle reader, in my discovery I reproved this learned man for discrediting of her Majesty’s officers of arms in these words; if we shall credit the Heralds, Anthony Fitzherbert, the great Lawyer, and Lord Chief Justice of England, did descend from Herbert Lord of Deane, &c. as tho’ their labours and travels were not to be believed or regarded so soon as his own thoughts, and thus most subtly he goeth about to impeach their credits, whose books he was not then worthy to carry, in regard of their knowledge and profession. I think this man was much dis tempered in minde, when he suffered these obstinate and unadvised speeches to pass from him, or else was misinformed by his negligent tutors, otherwise to seek revenge upon his adversary. He would not have play’d Sampson’s part rashly, to have crushed the pillars whereby he leaned, and have shaken the whole house upon himself. I appeal to the judgment of the indifferent reader, and his own writings, what this man will not say and write, when as in this place most untruly he dareth to charge me to derive Sir Anthony Fitzherbert to descend from one Peter Fitzherbert of Deane, when as I neither writ, or ever thought, of any such matter, my words being only as before, that who so ever did derive the said Sir Anthony to descend from any other family then of that which married with the sister of William Earl of Hereford, should err. And where he voucheth the visitation of Derbyshire to prove this Sir Anthony Fitzherbert to descend of Fitzherberts of Norbury, I marvel greatly at his weakness therein, considering that the same proveth no further then to Nicholas Fitzherbert in King Henry the Sixth’s time, who was grandfather to the said Sir Anthony beforementioned; but it sheweth his ignorance, and that he dareth to alledge any thing to serve his turn, rather then he will be unfurnished of matter, altho’ very impertinent to that in question.

‘ What will not this man say or put in print upon his own imagination or report of others, there being not any that will or can averr and prove, that they have searched and seen all the Fitzherberts deeds

‘ and charters, therefore have I no cause or reason to lend my ear, and much less to believe one which hath no name, neither that hath reported a truth. And for proof thereof I have at this instant in my custody, divers original deeds and charters of the said Fitzherberts being of the younger house, sealed with the foresay’d coat of the three Lyons, about King Edward the First’s time, which will prove that the Fitzherberts of Norbury did use and bare the said arms, as did they of Deane, which is also acknowledged to be true even by the said Sir Anthony’s own tombe at Norbury, where he lieth buried with the very same arms as Fitzherbert of Deane did use in King Henry the Third’s time (which he that searched all their deeds missed to see) and if this good man, and his diligent searcher, be desirous of further proof hereof, let them go and view the church and cross in Castleton in Derbyshire, but with better eyes than this man did the Castle of Norwich, for the Earl Bygots arms, and they shall find there very antient, both wrought in glass, and carved in stone, the said arms of three Lyons rampant, and the other coat he saith was taken from the Earls Ferrars arms quartered with the same.

‘ This learned man’s fellow hath indeed diligently, and with his best endeavours, collected and set forth (with good authorities) for the late Right Honourable Henry Earl of Pembroke, the honourable and antient descent of Fitzherbert Lord of Deane, &c. which he is and will be ever ready to averr and prove true, therefore let us see how cunningly this learned man will carry himself, which saith he will end all this matter in one word, when I doubt he will not be able to make good his promise in a thousand. First he affirmeth, that the family of Fitzherbert of Deane, did never assume Herbert for their surname before William ap Thomas his son, in King Edward the Fourth’s time, did assume the same, which I hold to be as untrue as his denial of Brute, our antient and great Monarch of Britain, which for the truth sake, and his own credit, I wish he had omitted in his four former editions, as he hath now done in his fifth and last edition; as also his untrue interpreting of surnames, upon his own bare imagination, wherein he hath done great wrong, and misled divers antient families from their right surnames and parents. Because he findeth one Peter, to be the son of Herbert in King John’s time, and that he was called Peter Fitzherbert, therefore, upon his bare word, ipse dixit, he hath spoken it, we must believe it, and that the name of Fitzherbert was but a christen name, and not a surname, before King Edward the Fourth’s time, altho’ he hath produced no proof at all for the same; which to disprove, and make plain that it was a surname long before, as also to warn him hereafter of the like vain imaginations conceived and bred in his own brain, I will endeavour to prove unto you, that this name of Herbert was a surname, and a noble family, above five hundred years past; all surnames being at the first taken either of their parents christian names, their dwelling places, occupations, nicknames, or such like; and that both Fitzherbert of Deane, and Fitzherbert of Norbury, were lineally descended of one paternal ancestor, altho’ here very cunningly he would carry away and abuse the reader, with saying, that I derive the family of Fitzherbert from one Peter, son of Herbert in King John’s time, when as I did never so much as once dream or think of any such matter. For I do, and ever did, derive them to descend and come of Henry Fitzherbert, Chamberlain that, from a child, he was destined to a learned profession (c). After he had received the first tincture of letters in the country, he was sent to the university of Oxford, but in what college he studied there does not appear (d). He went from thence to one of the Inns of Court, but to which of these is also a point, that, at this distance of time, cannot be determined (e). His great parts, penetrating judgment, and incomparable diligence, soon distinguished him in his profession, and, in process of time, he became so eminent, that November 18, 1511, being the third year of the reign of King Henry VIII, he was called to the state and degree of a Serjeant at Law (f); and, in 1516, he received the honour of knighthood (g). As he rose more into publick view, his prudence and probity became more and more conspicuous, so that November 24, 1517, and in the ninth year of the same King's reign, he was appointed one of his Majesty's Serjeants at Law (h). It was two years after this, and not before it as many of our writers say, that he published his great work in relation to the Law, which was then so well received, and has been ever since both revered and admired, as well for the utility of the matter, as the elegance of it's form (i) [B]. It was not long after this that he published several other learned pieces, lain to King Henry the First, son of William the Conqueror; and to prove the same I will first use the testimony of that worthy Herald, which our Pedant himself so much commendeth, Robert Glover, Somersset-Herald, who, in his Collectanea, hath this: Henry Fitzherbert, Chamberlaine to King Henry the First, married the daughter of Robert Corbet of Alenester, and had issue Herbert Fitzherbert, the King's Chamberlain, father of Herbert Lord of Deane, in right of his wife Luce, sister of William Earl of Hereford.

This might persuade this learned man to know and confess, that the first Herbert assumed not his surname of Henry his father, after the Welsh fashion in King Edward the Fourth's time, for then should he have been called Herbert Fitz-Henry. But this I doubt will not yet satisfy this learned man, unless I prove it by some other authentical record, wherefore I wish him to read this in the red book in the Exchequer, which he will not deny but to be very antient and authentical. "Tempore Henrici Secundi, Herbertus filius Herberti Camerarii senioris, tenuit feoda duorum militum in Comit' South' de Epo' Winton, & modo tenet Herbertus filius ejus." This doth prove directly, that the first Herbert, son of Henry, had his surname of Herbert, and not of Henry his father, which may give this man cause to be sorry and repent him of his folly, and wrong he would and hath done unto this noble family of Fitzherbert, had he not been encountered in the same, yet will he object against me, and say, that altho' I have proved the family of Fitzherbert to have a surname in King Henry the First's time, yet have I not proved Fitzherbert of Deane, and Fitzherbert of Norbury to be one family, and therein he thinketh surely to give me the jerk, if I fail to perform the same. Wherefore, to make good what before I have promised, and to stop his mouth, as also his diligent searchers and famous antiquaries whom he so much boasteth of, who have very much wronged me, let both he and them satisfy themselves with this, which Roger Hovedon, his own author, hath set down, who affirmeth that the first Herbert, father to the second Herbert, Lord of Deane, and William Fitzherbert, which had Norbury given him in King Henry the First's time, were both brothers, and that Reginald Earl of Cornwall, natural son of King Henry the First, was begotten of their mother. The words are these. Anno 1177. King Henry the Second gave to Herbert Fitzherbert and William, the brethren of Reginald Earl of Cornwall, and Jossilane de la Pomeray, their Nephew, the kingdom of Limerick, for the service of sixty Knights fees, to hold of him and John his son, &c.

Thus hath Roger Hovedon, his own author, proved for me, that Reginald Earl of Cornwall, Herbert Fitzherbert, and William Fitzherbert of Norbury, were three brothers. And yet for a further proof, I will use here one more of this man's own testimonies, avouched in his Apologie ad Lectorem, which is, as he saith, an antient deed of the aforesaid Reginald Earl of Cornwall, wherein he calleth the second Herbert Lord of Deane his Nephew, and William Fitzherbert of Norbury his brother, and this I hope he will allow of, because he hath avouched it himself. But to a worse purpose than I have here applied it unto. Reginaldus Henrici Regis filius omnibus &c. sciatis me dedisse Gulielmo de Boterell filio Alice Corbet materteræ meæ, totam terram quam dederam Gulielmo de Boterell in Comitatu Cornubiæ, patri scz. prædicti Willielmi vz. Penill Widune, &c. Testibus B. Exon. Episcopo & Nicholao filio meo, Herberto filio Herberti, Radulpho, & Richardo nepotibus meis, Willielmo fratre meo, Hugone de Dunstwill &c.

Now that you have had manifested unto you, gentle reader, by good proofs and records, that these two great and honourable families of Fitzherbert of Deane and Norbury, had a surname in King Henry the First's time, as also that they were descended of one original ancestor, and did use all one coat of arms, which this Pedant, and his unnamed friend, hath laboured to obscure. Give me leave here, I pray you, with your patience, to demand of him, by what commission or authority he hath made this Anthony Fitzherbert to be Lord Chief Justice of England, which if he refuse or fail to satisfy me of, let him not blame me if I tell him that he hath forged that title and office out of his own brain, as he hath done many others of the same kind. The said Anthony himself never assuming any other title or office, than only Knight, and one of the King's Justices of his Common Bench.

C A M D E N's Paragraph in his last Edition (5).

(5) Britannia, 1626, fol. p. 313.

Whence, as some will have it, descended Anthony Fitzherbert, a most excellent Lawyer, as appeared both in that Court in which he sat, and from his most elaborate writings which he published; but that he was of the Knightly family of the Fitzherberts in Derbyshire has been the belief of others.

It appears plainly from hence, that Mr Camden was himself convinced that he could not support his charge against the Heralds and Herald Painters, and therefore he withdrew it, but, that he might confess as little as possible, he still inserts both the opinions, as if they were opposite and inconsistent; whereas Brooke has manifestly proved, that they were very reconcilable, perfectly corresponding one with the other, and both of them true; our Judge being descended from the Fitzherberts of Norbury, and the Fitzherberts of Norbury from the same stock with the noble family of Herbert.

[B] As the elegance of its form.] We have assigned the time when our author's grand Abridgement was published, from unquestionable authority. That original edition, magnificently printed upon royal paper, which is very fine, and in a character resembling antient writing, is become very scarce and very dear. There have been several editions of it since, particularly one in 1665, in large folio, and another in 1577, in a short folio, but upon a fine paper, and with a broad margin. I shall give the title from thence at large:

I. La Grande Abridgement, Collecte par le Juge tres reverend Monsieur Anthony Fitzherbert, dernièrement conserre ouesque la copie escripte & per ceo correcte, ouesque le nombre del feuil, per quel facilement poies trouver les cases cy abrydges. en les liuers duns, nouvellement annote iammais devaunt imprimes. which gained him such reputation, that, in Easter term 1523, and the fifteenth year of the reign of Henry VIII, he was made one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas (k), in which honourable station he spent the remaining part of his life, discharging the duties of his office with such sufficiency, that he was held the oracle of the Law in his time, and with such integrity as gained him universal respect (l). Two things are mentioned in reference to his conduct; one, that (without fear of his power) he openly opposed Cardinal Wolfey in the height of his favour (m); the other, that, when he came to lie upon his death-bed, foreseeing the changes that were like to happen in the Church as well as State, he pressed his children in very strong terms to promise him solemnly, neither to accept grants, nor to make purchases of abbey-lands (n), which it is said they did, and adhered constantly to that promise though much to their own loss. We may add to this a third point, viz. that he continued his labours in the closet for the benefit of succeeding times, as well as upon the Bench for the advantage of his contemporaries, and provided thereby that posterity should be the better for his valuable writings (o) [C]. At length, liuer en le fyne de lour apte titles. That is, The Grand Abridgement collected by that most reverend Judge, Mr Anthony Fitzherbert, lately conferred with his own manuscript corrected by himself, together with the folio's referring the cases to the books, by which they may be easily found; an improvement never before made. Also in this edition, the additions or supplements are placed at the end of their respective titles. The Colophon runs thus: Imprinted at London, in Fleet-Street, within Temple-Bar, at the sign of the hand and star, by Richard Tottel, the 20th day of August, Anno 1577, Cum privilegio. To this edition there is added a most useful and accurate table, by the care of William Rastall, Serjeant at Law, and also one of the Justices of the Common Pleas in the reign of Queen Mary; which table is very highly commended by the Lord Chief Justice Coke.

As to the original of these abridgements of cases, we are told that the first was published in the reign of King Henry the Sixth by Stathom (6), a learned Lawyer of that time and Baron of the Exchequer, concerning whom there is a very singular paragraph to be met with, in the works of the facetious Doctor Fuller (7), which will give some light into the reason of our author's composing his abridgement. 'Much esteemed, says he, at this day, (speaking of Stathom) for the antiquity thereof. For otherwise Lawyers behold him, as soldiers do bows and arrows since the invention of guns, rather for sight than service. Yea a grandee in that profession hath informed me, that a little of Stathom, if any at all, is Law at this day; so much is the practice thereof altered, whereof the learned in that faculty will give a satisfactory account, tho' otherwise it may seem strange, that reason continuing always the same, Law grounded thereon should be capable of so great alteration.'

Sir Edward Coke mentions our author, and this work of his, in many places, and always with much respect; tho' at the bottom he is far enough from being fond of Abridgements, yet he has left us a passage, in which he shews us not only his approbation of this, but even of that which Fuller would have us believe was worn altogether out of date, and is exceedingly puzzled to know, why the reason of things should not outlast the things themselves, and why the Law should not remain always the same, tho' made to regulate the most changeable of all subjects, the manners, opinions, and circumstances of men. But to the passage in Lord Coke (8), 'Perkins, Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, and Stamford, of which the Register, Littleton, Fitzherbert, and Stamford, are most necessary, and of greatest authority and excellency, and yet the other also are not without their fruit. In reading of the cases in the books at large, which sometimes are obscure and misprinted, if the reader, after the diligent reading of the case, shall observe how the case is abridged in those two great Abridgements of Justice, Fitzherbert and Sir Robert Brooke, it will both illustrate the case and delight the reader, and yet neither that of Stathom, nor that of the book of assizes, is to be rejected: and for pleading, the great book of entries is of singular use and utility.' These reasons are certainly clear and convincing, to which we may add, that there is something singularly accurate in our author's method, arising probably from his writing this book with a design to publish it, whereas Sir Robert Brooke's Abridgement, like Sir James Dyer's

Reports, was composed for his own use, and therefore in reading them this circumstance should be always remembered.

Magna Charta cum diversis aliis statutis. Lond. 1519, in 12mo. i. e. Magna Charta, and several other statutes.

[C] For his valuable writings.] In this note we will endeavour to give a distinct account of the rest of our author's writings, and of such as have been attributed to him, and of which it is doubtful whether they are his or not.

II. L'Office & auctorite des justices de peas, compyle & extrayte hors des anciens livres, si bien del commentey, come des statutes. That is, The office and authority of Justices of Peace, compiled and extracted out of the old books, as well of the Common Law, as of the Statutes. Lond. 1538, 12mo. part in French, part in English, without the author's name, and several times afterwards.

It was held a very useful book for that time, being the first upon the subject that was ever published; it was afterwards augmented by Richard Crompton, Esq; and printed in Quarto at least seven times during his life, and before Serjeant Crompton published it with additions, it had been translated and printed several times in English.

III. L'Office de Viconts, Bailiffes, Escheators, Constables, Coroners, &c. That is, The Office of Sheriffs, Bailiffs of Libertys, Escheators, Constables, Coroners, &c. Lond. 1538. 4to.

This has been also annexed by Serjeant Crompton, to his Office and Authority of Justices of the Peace, and has been frequently printed with it.

IV. Of the Diversity of Courts.

This was written by him, as the reader will see hereafter, in the twenty first of Henry the Eighth, but without the author's name; it was originally written in French, but was translated into English by W. H. of Grey's-Inn, and added by him to Andrew Horne's Mirror of Justices.

V. Natura Brevium novel, that is, The new Natura Brevium. Lond. 1534. afterwards translated into English, and often published with very accurate tables, having been always in very high esteem; the nature and design of this work, as also the reason of its being styled the new Natura Brevium, will fully appear from our author's short and excellent proem.

'In every art and science there are certain rules and foundations, to which a man ought to give credit, and which he cannot deny. In like manner, there are divers maxims and fundamentals in the knowledge of the Common Laws of the land, which a man ought to believe very necessary for those who will understand the same, especially at the beginning of their studies: for, upon those fundamentals, the whole Law doth depend. For which purpose, in time past, there was composed a very profitable book, called The Register, which doth contain fundry principles, by which he must be well instructed who would study the Law. And also for that purpose was there composed by a learned man, a book called Natura Brevium, which book doth declare and set forth the diversities and natures of many original writs, with their process, which book helped much to the understanding not only of The Register, but also of the Law of the land; but because of late time that book hath been translated into the English tongue, and length, full of years, in high esteem with his Sovereign, and universally revered by his fellow-subjects, he yielded his last debt to nature the 27th of May, 1538, deservedly lamented and admired (p). His body was interred in his own parish-church of Norbury (q), upon which there was some time afterwards laid a blue marble stone, with a very plain and modest inscription, which, because it is not easily to be met with, the reader will find inserted in the notes [D]. This venerable Sage in the Law, Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, left behind him a very numerous posterity; and as he became, by the death of his elder brother, John Fitzherbert of Norbury, Esq; possessor of the land estate of his family, he was in a condition to provide, in a very plentiful manner, for his younger children (r); so that long after his decease we find several very considerable families, not only in the county of Derby, but also in some other adjacent counties, that very justly valued themselves upon having this learned and upright Judge for their common ancestor (s) [E]. We shall, in a subsequent article, see, that some of his descendants (who understood his last words in so rigorous a sense, as to believe they prohibited them from leaving the Church of Rome (t), as well as from acquiring church lands) suffered very severely for their obstinacy in that particular, but were notwithstanding so far happy, as that while they remained exiles in foreign parts, by the modesty of their behaviour, quickness of their parts, and great probity of their lives, they maintained the reputation of their family, and were not in the slightest degree a discredit to their country, abating their adherence to Popish tenets.

‘ and many things are therein, which are not according to the Law of the land, and many other things are omitted which are very profitable and necessary for the understanding of the Law, for that cause is this work composed and published. Wherein, if there be any thing against the opinion of the sages who have the administration of the Laws, the request of him who hath taken the pains to make this treatise, is, that they would correct and amend the same, as they shall see good according to the Law.’

These observations of our venerable author are highly commended, and strongly supported, by that judicious writer, and exquisite Lawyer, Sir Edward Coke (g). For an example of an original writ, says he, among many others, I refer the studious reader especially to Caly's case, in Easter term in the twenty sixth of the reign of the late Queen Elizabeth, of ever blessed memory, now published, whereby it more clearly appeareth how judicious the opinion of Justice Fitzherbert is, in his preface to his Natura Brevium, where he saith, that original writs are the foundations whereupon the Law dependeth, and how truly he calleth them the principles of the Law, and fortifieth also the opinion of Bracton, where he saith, that Breve, formatum est, ad similitudinem regulæ juris, which case I have reported in that form, to this end, that students, seeing the singular use of original writs, will, in the beginning of their study, learn them, or at least the principallest of them, without book, whereby they shall attain unto three things of no small moment. 1. To the right understanding of their books. 2. To the true sense and judgment of Law: and lastly, 3. To the exquisite form and manner of pleading.’

The same intelligent person has, in another place, given us a short account of most of our author's Law treatises, in these words (10): ‘ Fitzherbert's Abridgement was painfully and elaborately collected, and published in the eleventh year of King Henry the Eighth, by Fitzherbert, then Serjeant at Law: and he wrote also another book, called his Natura Brevium, an exact work, exquisitively penned, and published in the six and twentieth year of Henry the Eighth, when he was Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Knight, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas: about the same time he wrote his treatise of Justices of the Peace, wherewith the Judges, as I have seen it reported, found fault, for that he therein affirmed, that Justices of Peace, having, by their commission, authority to hear and determine felonies, &c. could not hear and determine murders, &c. which, amongst others, they clearly over-ruled, that Justices of Peace lawfully might do.’

VI. Of the surveying of Lands, 1539. 8vo. Lond. 1567.

VII. The Book of Husbandry, very profitable and necessary for all persons.—Printed by Tho. Berthlet 1534, 8vo and several times after in the reign of Queen Mary, and in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth. It is said, in an advertisement to the reader, that this book was written by one Anthony Fitzherbert, who had been forty years a husbandman, from whence many have concluded, that this could not be our Judge, but have rather inclined to think it written by his brother John Fitzherbert. Upon examination, however, it will be found, that this latter opinion is less sustainable than the former; for so it is, that, in the author's preface to his book of measuring of lands, he mentions his book of Agriculture, and in the advertisement prefixed to the same book it is expressly said, that the author of that treatise of measuring, was the author likewise of the book concerning the office of a Justice of Peace, whence it should seem, that both those books were written by our author, who perhaps in those seasons when he had leisure to go down into the country, might apply himself as vigorously to husbandry, as to the study of the Laws when in town; and as his genius naturally led him to method and order, so he might be inclined to commit his thoughts upon that useful subject to writing, tho', it may be very well doubted, whether he ever intended they should be published.

[D] Inserted in the notes. We owe the preservation of this inscription to Mr Brooke, York-Herald, who published it in his dispute with Mr Camden, as a point decisive in his favour; for therein he observes, that, as to his bearing the antient arms of the family, and his being one of the Judges, not Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, appears from his epitaph, taken from his tomb at Norbury, whereon his arms are engraven, viz. Gules, three Lyons rampant, or, with this inscription:

Of your Charitie, praye for the Soules of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Knyght, one of the King's Justices of his Comon Bench, and some tyme Lo. and Patrons of this towne; and Dorathy his wife, daughter of Sir Henry Willoughby, Knyght, &c. Which Sir Anthony deceased 27 May 1538.

[E] For their common ancestor. We are informed by Mr Phillips, that, in the year 1684, there were the following families subsisting, of the descendants of our Judge, viz. Basil Fitzherbert, descended of William Fitzherbert, Esq; a younger son of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert's, who marrying Elizabeth, daughter and coheirefs of Humphry Swinnerton, of Swinnerton in Staffordshire, brought that estate likewise into the family, which, together with the old paternal seat of Norbury, was then enjoyed by Basil Fitzherbert (11). William Fitzherbert, of Tiffington in the county of Derby, was likewise descended, in a direct line, from Sir Anthony (12). As also Francis Fitzherbert, of Somersall-Herbert in the county of Derby (13). Likewise John Fitzherbert, of Luckington in the county of Wilts, Esquire (14). The reader may learn something more, upon the same subject in the succeeding article (15).

FITZHERBERT (THOMAS) a deep sufferer for, and a learned defender of the Popish cause, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the son of William Fitzherbert by Isabel his wife, daughter and one of the heirs of Humphrey Swinnerton of Swinnerton in Staffordshire, fourth son of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Knt (a), of whom in the former article, and born in the said county of Stafford in 1552, in which county being initiated in grammar learning, he was sent either to Exeter or Lincoln-college in 1568 (b). But having been mostly before bred up in the Catholick religion, the college grew uneasy to him, for though he would sometimes hear a sermon, which he was permitted to do by an old Roman Priest that then privately lived in Oxon. yet he would seldom go to prayers, for which he was often admonished by the Sub-Rector of his House (c). At length, seeming to be wearied with Heresy, he receded without a degree to his patrimony, where also refusing to go to his parish-church, he was imprisoned about 1572 (d). But being soon after set at liberty he became still more zealous in his religion, and not only confirmed many wavering Catholicks, but wrote also Several Reasons for the Catholicks not going to Protestant churches, for which being like to suffer, he withdrew and lived concealed (e). In 1580, when Campian and Persons the Jesuit came into England, he retired to London, found them out, shewed himself exceedingly attached to, and supplied them liberally. Whereupon bringing himself into a Præmunire, and foreseeing great dangers, he went a voluntary exile into France, anno 1582, where he continued a zealous sollicitor in the cause of Mary Queen of Scots, with the King of France and Duke of Guise, though in vain (f). After the deplorable death of that Princess, and the loss of his own wife, Mr Fitzherbert resolved to leave France and to repair to Madrid, in order to implore the protection of Philip II, to whom indeed most of the English exiles resorted sooner or later; he continued there till about the year 1589, and then, being either tired out with vain expectations, or finding that he was not a man of fit principles to thrive in that Court, he resolved to accompany the Duke of Feria, who had been formerly in England with King Philip, married an English Lady, and was justly esteemed a great patron of the nation in Spain, to the city of Milan in Italy, where he remained for some time, and from thence repaired to Rome (g). It is reported that during his residence there he fell into great necessities, notwithstanding he had left behind him a competent fortune in England, which distress is supposed to have driven him to think of entering into Orders (h). However that matter may be, it is certain, that he took a lodging very near the English college, and observed the same hours of prayers they did who were resident in the place. He spent the rest of his time in composing several books, and, amongst the rest, one which he addressed to his son Edward Fitzherbert, Esq; against the maxims of the famous Italian Politician, Nicholas Machiavel, which has been of some use to modern writers, and was in those times esteemed a most sound and excellent treatise (i) [A]. He entered into the Society of Jesus in the spring of the year 1614, and received Priests Orders much about the same time; after which he speedily removed into Flanders, in order to preside over the Mission, and continued at Brussels about two years, during which space he wrote several books in defence of his opinions. In these, though he falls much short of the rest of his persuasion, yet he

[A] Esteemed a most sound and excellent treatise. The first writings published by our author, and which gave those of his party a true opinion of his worth, that was not certainly inferior to any of their zealous champions at that time, were the following pieces:

I. A Defence of the Catholick Cause, containing a treatise in confutation of sundry untruths and slanders published by the Heretics, &c. To which is added, an apology, or defence, of his innocency, in a feigned Conspiracy against her Majesty's person, for which one Edward Squire was wrongfully condemned, and executed, in November 1598. St Omer's 1602. This is the book which the learned Camden (1) tells us was written by Walpole a Jesuit, or one under his name.

II. TREATISE concerning Polity and Religion, Doway 1606, 4to. wherein are confuted several principles of Machiavel. The second part of the said treatise was printed also at Doway 1610; and both together in 1615, 4to. A third part was printed at London 1652, 4to. being then, says Mr Wood, cried up for a good book, as the other parts had been.

III. An sit utilitas in scelere, vel de infelicitate Principis Machiavellani? Rome 1610. 8vo. that is, whether there be any utility in wickedness? or, Of the infelicity of Machiavel's Prince.

These last treatises met universally with a favourable reception, amongst Protestants as well as Papists, and did the author great honour as they shewed him to be a man of deep sense, strong parts, and of a generous disposition, as well as of much reading and singular experience. The truth is, these treatises give Mr Fitzherbert a right to be remembered among the learned men of our nation, since they were extremely well calculated to expel the poison infused by Machiavel's books, which have done incredible mischief ever since they were published. Our author goes the right way to work, he shews that cunning, subtilty, and artifice, are but the mimicks of wisdom and civil prudence, and therefore naturally beneath great minds, and altogether inconsistent either with a good heart or a good understanding. He shews next, that address, intrigue, and contrivance, are so far from being proofs of genius, that they are convincing testimonies of the want of it, for that men of true genius move always in a direct path, with their eyes fixed on the object they would obtain, and overcome all obstacles, not by dirty plots, but by noble perseverance. He demonstrates, that the Machiavelian principles lead to infelicity, and that as it is impossible a wicked man should be happy, so it is as impossible that a wicked Prince should be prosperous, or great; it is true that his language is not a little perplexed and obscure, that his method, according to the custom of those times, is somewhat embarrassed and pedantick; and that he has intermixed many things in his discourse, which might have been much better omitted; but tho' these circumstances abate, yet they are far from destroying the merit of his work, in which the materials are to be found of a better refutation of Machiavel's writings than is to be met with in our own or perhaps in any other language.

he expresses himself with a bitterness, which would be altogether inexcusable, but from the nature of his circumstances, which, on the one hand, might sharpen his temper; and, on the other, oblige him to write in such a style as might be most agreeable to his benefactors (k). These books of his, at the time they were published, were highly commended and much esteemed, though now they are little read, and hardly remembered [B]. His great parts, his extensive and polite learning, together with the high esteem that he had procured by his prudent behaviour at Brussels, procured him what any other in his situation would have esteemed a very high preferment, but which he with much reluctance accepted. This was the Government, with the title of Rector, of the Roman College at Rome, which office he exercised with unblemished credit for twenty-two years, and was often named within that space of time for a Cardinal's hat, in the room of Cardinal Alan, which it is thought he might easily have obtained, if it had been in reality the object of his ambition (l). But he was a man of a mild and moderate disposition, more especially in the latter part of his life, and for that reason was more willing to decline, than to aspire to, that envied dignity. He died there August 27, 1640, in the eighty-eighth year of his age (m). His body was interred in the chapel belonging to the English college at Rome (n). As he remained so great a part of his life an exile, and under the imputation of being an enemy to his country, he may be justly reputed unhappy, but yet less so than a near relation of his who was contemporary with him, and resided for some years in the same college (o) [C], since our author lived the far greater part of his days decently, if not splendidly, and died at last peaceably in his bed, exceedingly admired by those of his own faction, and as much esteemed as he could expect by the rest of his countrymen, who disliked nothing in him but his persuasion, and were sorry that a man of his parts, learning, and politeness, should, by his obstinacy, make himself so unhappy.

[B] And indeed hardly remembred] The remaining works of Mr Thomas Fitzherbert are entirely controversial, and by no means equal to those before-mentioned, for the reasons that have been briefly assigned in the text. The titles of them are as follow:

IV. A large Preface, in which are laid open some few examples of the singular ignorance, lying, and other bad dealings, of Mr William Barlow, in his answer to the censure of the apology set before Robert Person's book, entitled, A discussion of the answer of Mr William Barlow, to a book entitled, The Judgment, &c. printed 1612. 4to (2).

V. Supplement to the Discussion of Dr Barlow's answer to The Judgment of a Catholick Englishman, &c. interrupted by the death of the author F. Rob. Persons, Jesuit. St Omer's 1613. 4to. Published under the two letters of F. T.

VI. Censure of Dr John Donne's book entitled, Pseudo-Martyr (3).

VII. Additions to the Supplement.—These two last are printed at the end of the Supplement to The Discussion, &c. against Dr William Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, beforementioned.

VIII. Confutation of certain absurdities in Lancelot Andrews's answer to Bellarmine. 1603. 4to and published under the two letters of F. T. instead of T. F. This was written in vindication of Cardinal Bellarmine's Apology, for his answer made to King James's book, De jure fidel. Whereupon came out a book, entitled, Epphata to T. F. or a Defence of the Bishop of Ely (Lancelot Andrews) concerning his answer to Cardinal Bellarmine's Apology, against the calumnies of a scandalous Pamphlet. Camb. 1617. 4to. written by Sam. Collins, D. D.

IX. Of the Oath of Fidelity, or Allegiance, against the Theological Disputations of Rog. Widdrington. St Omer's 1614. 4to.

X. The Obmutescence of F. T. to the Epphata of Dr Collins, &c. Printed 1621. 8vo.

[C] And resided for some years in the same college] We were unwilling to multiply, beyond what necessity required, the number of articles in this book, and therefore chose to speak of the cousin of this gentleman, who, in his time, made a great figure in the English College at Rome, in a note. This Nicholas

Fitzherbert was the second son of John Fitzherbert, second son of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert of Norbury in Derbyshire, Knight. In his youth he was a student in Exeter College, and exhibited to it by Sir William Petre, about 1568, for his name stands in the register under the title of Coll. Exon in 1571 and 1572, being then the Senior Under-Graduate of that College. About that time he left his native country, parents, and patrimony, for religion, and went beyond the seas as a voluntary exile (4). At first he settled at Bononia in Italy, to obtain the knowledge of the Civil Law, and continued there in 1580. Not long after he went to Rome, and, in the year 1587, began to live in the family of William Alan, the Cardinal of England, and continued with him till the time of his death, being then accounted eminent for his knowledge in the Laws and polite literature. He distinguished himself in the learned world by the following pieces:

I. Johannis Casæ Galatæi de bonis moribus. i. e. John Galatæus, of good manners. Rome 1595. This is no more than a translation of a celebrated Italian treatise into Latin, intended for the special use of young scholars.

II. Oxonienfis in Anglia Academia descriptio, i. e. A description of the University of Oxford in England. Rome 1602, in three sheets and a half. 8vo.

III. De Antiquitate & Continuatione Catholicæ Religionis in Anglia. Of the Antiquity and Continuance of the Catholick Religion in England. Rome 1608. 8vo.

IV. Vitæ Cardinalis Alani Epitome. An Epitome of the Life of Cardinal Alan. Rome 1608. He also wrote the Life of that Cardinal, who was his patron, more at large, which, for certain reasons, was never made publick (5).

This Nicholas Fitzherbert, in a journey that he made from Rome, was unfortunately drowned, some time in the year 1612 (6), being, in the opinion of his acquaintance, about sixty three years of age. We have a very high character given of him by Pitts (7), as might well be expected, his religion considered, and his living, on account of it, an exile from his native country for so many years.

FITZ-WILLIAM (WILLIAM) an eminent Commander at sea in the XVIth century, and created Earl of Southampton by King Henry VIII, was the second son of Sir Thomas Fitz-William of Aldwarke in the county of York, Knt. by Lucia his wife, daughter and coheir to John Neville, Marquis Montacute (a). In the year 1510, he was made one of the Esquires for the Body to King Henry VIII (b), and, in 1512, had that grant renewed for life (c). The year following, he was one of the Chief Commanders in the fleet sent out against France [A]; and had the misfortune to be sorely hurt with an arrow in attempting to destroy the French fleet at Brest (*). Shortly after, he attended King Henry at the siege of Tournay; and, for his bravery there, received the honour of Knighthood (d). In 1520, he was Vice-Admiral of England, and employed in guarding the Channel, at the time the Emperor Charles V. came to England (e). He so ingratiated himself with the King his master, that he obtained from him, in 1521, a grant of the manor of Navesby in Northamptonshire, part of the possessions of Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, then lately attainted (f). At that time he was Embassador in France; but, upon a rupture between that kingdom and England, he was recalled, in January 1521-2, and ordered to sea with a strong fleet of twenty-eight sail, to secure our Merchants, and take what French ships he could (g). Shortly after, he assisted at the taking of Morlaix in Bretagne (h) [B]: and, with Sir William Sandes, and Sir Morice Barkeley, went and burnt Marguison, which was newly built and fortified; and many villages (i). In 1523, the King of France preparing to send John Duke of Albany Regent of Scotland into that kingdom, in order to invade England from that quarter; Sir William Fitz-William was made Admiral, and dispatched, with a strong fleet, to try to intercept him. Having missed of him, he determined to land on the French coast, which he accordingly did, at Treport in Normandy, and burnt the suburbs of that town, and several ships in the harbour; tho' there were but seven hundred English, opposed by six thousand French (k). The year following, being Captain of Guisnes in Picardy, he mightily annoyed Boulogne, and other places adjacent (l). Before the end of that year, he was made Treasurer of the King's Household; and, in October, sent to France, with John Taylor Doctor of Law, to see the Lady Regent (whose son King Francis I, was then prisoner in Spain) swear to observe the articles of a treaty newly concluded between the two Crowns (m). In 1529, he was one of those who subscribed the articles exhibited in Parliament against Cardinal Wolsey (n). At the grand interview between the Kings of England and France in 1532, he attended his Master King Henry VIII to Boulogne, the place of interview, amongst many other persons of the highest quality (o). In May 1535, he was sent, with the Duke of Norfolk, the Bishop of Ely, and Dr Fox, to treat with the French King's Commissioners, about a league between the Crowns of England and France: one of the articles whereof were, That the Duke of Angoulesme, third son to the King of France, should marry Elizabeth second daughter of King Henry (p). Shortly after, he was made Knight of the Garter, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and in 1536, constituted Admiral of England, Wales, Ireland, Normandy, Gasconne, and Aquitaine (q). On the 18th of October 1537, he was advanced to the title of Earl of Southampton (r): and made Lord Privy-Seal the 27th of October 1539 (s). The April following, some disputes having arisen between England and France, he, and John Lord Ruffel lately made High-Admiral, were sent over to Calais with a few troops of horse; and having set all things in good order, they quickly returned (t). He was also employed as Captain of the Foreward, in the expedition to Scotland, in October 1542; but, in the way thither, he died at Newcastle. However, so much esteemed was he, that for the honour of his memory, his standard was borne in the vanguard in all that expedition (u). By his Will, bearing date the 10th of September the same year, he ordered his body to be buried in the church of Midherst in Suffex (w). He left no issue by Mabel his wife, daughter to Henry Lord Clifford, and sister to Henry the first Earl of Cumberland (x). Of this great man it is recorded, whilst he was Admiral, that there was not a serviceable man under him whose name he knew not; not a week passed but he paid his ships; not a prize but his seamen shared in as well

[A] The year following, he was one of the chief commanders in the fleet sent out against France ] The design of this expedition, was, to clear the sea of French ships, before King Henry and his confederates attacked France by land. The most considerable persons employed in this service, besides Sir William Fitz-William, were, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, Sir Walter Devereux Lord Ferrers, Sir Wolstan Browne, Sir Edward Ichyngham, Sir Antony Poyntz, Sir John Wallop, Sir Thomas Wyndham, Sir Stephen Bull, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney, Esquires, &c. (1). They failed to Brest, and resolved to attack the French fleet in that harbour, where it lay under the covert of many platforms raised on the land; besides, which they had joined twenty four hulks together, with intention to set them on fire, and let them go adrift with the tide, to keep the English ships from theirs. Notwithstanding that, Sir Edward Howard sent out his boats, to make a shew of landing; whereupon the French flocking to the shore, to the number of above ten thousand (the English in all the boats being not above fifteen hundred) he thought fit to land over against Brest, where he burnt the country in fight of the castle, under which the French ships lay, defended by their hulks. He could do no more at that time, for want of provisions. But some galleys of the enemy having anchored, a few days after, at Conquet below Brest; the Admiral, attended by Sir Thomas Cheney, Sir John Wallop, Sir Henry Sherborne, and Sir William Sidney, fell upon those galleys, tho' they lay betwixt two rocks, that had bulwarks on them full of ordnance: and the Admiral boarded one galley, in which the commander of them, — Pregent, was; but he had the misfortune to be thrust overboard by the enemy's pikes, and drowned. By which means this expedition became unsuccessful (2). — An attempt of the like nature under the Marquis of Caermarthen, in 1694, did also miscarry. Which shews the great difficulty of such undertakings.

[B] Shortly after, he assisted at the taking of Morlaix, &c. ] There were seven thousand men employed in that enterprise; and amongst them the following nobility and gentry; the Lords Fitzwalter, and Curson, Sir Richard Wyngfield, Sir Richard Jernyngham, Sir William Barantine, Sir Adrian Foskew, or Fortescu, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlayne, Francis Bryan, Richard Cornewall, Sir Antony Poyntes, Sir Henry Sherborne, Sir Edmond Bray, Sir Giles Capel, Sir William Pyrton, Sir John Cornewall, Sir John Wallop, Sir Edward Ichyngham, Sir William Sidney,

FLAMSTEED (JOHN) one of the most eminent English Astronomers in the XVIIIth century, was born at Denby in Derbyshire, August 19, 1646. His father, whose name was Stephen, was third son of Mr William Flamsteed of Little Hallam in that county. His mother was Mary, daughter of Mr John Spateman of Derby, Ironmonger, who died when he was a little above three years old. Our author had, from his infancy, a natural tenderness of constitution which he could never surmount (a). He was educated at the free-school of Derby where his father lived, and at fourteen years of age, when he was but just become head of that school, he was visited with a severe fit of sickness, followed by a consumption and other distempers, which however did not so much obstruct his progress in learning but that he kept his station till the form broke up, and some of his school-fellows went to the university, to which, though designed for it, his father thought it not advisable to send him on account of his infirmity. Being thus taken from school in 1662, within a month or two after he had John de Sacrobosco's book de Sphæra put into his hands; this accident, and the leisure which accompanied it, induced him to make Astronomy the principal object of his studies [A]. He had already perused

[A] Induced him to make Astronomy the principal objects of his studies ] In the text of this article, we have given an account of his progress in that science in his junior years, as it is represented in a manuscript of his, written in 1707, and intitled (1), Historica narratio vitæ meæ ab anno 1646. ad 1675. But we shall give a more particular account of his several steps in that study, from another manuscript of his, dated May the 8th 1667, and intitled The self inspections of J. F. being an account of himself in the actions and studies of his twenty one first years, written at several times, by his own hand. It is there he tells us, that, in 1662, he had Sacrobosco's book de Sphæra lent him, which he set himself to read without any director, but not unsuccessfully, for here he laid the ground of his mathematical knowledge. In that winter, some time before Christmas, his father taught him arithmetic, and the doctrine of fractions, and the golden rule of three direct and converse. At Christmas, or a little after, he went to Uttoxeter for his health, and took with him Mr Thomas Fale's Art of Dialling (2); and having seen a quadrant formerly, the construction of which he was informed was laid down in that book, he set himself immediately to calculate a table of the sun's altitudes at all hours in the Equator, Tropics, and some intermediate parallel in the latitude of fifty three degree, by Mr Fale's tables of natural sines, which our author performed in Lent of that year without any help, and before he had heard of any artificial tables, and accordingly made himself a quadrant. The rest of the winter he was greatly indisposed, and his distemper continued violent upon him the summer of the year 1663, when it abated a little, and suffered him to prosecute his studies. For upon his return home he was introduced to Mr Elias Grice, who told him of artificial tables, and shewed him Wingate's Canon. He procured likewise Mr Stirrup's Art of Dialling, which he read this summer with some other authors on mathematical subjects, as Mr Gunter's Sector and Canon, and soon after he obtained Mr William Oughtred's Canon, in all which, says he, I read some parts cursorily, not abiding a tedious profection of any throughout, without the help or directions of any one, not being permitted (because they were scarce to be met with) the help of any one so much as to expound a term unto me. His studies were discountenanced by his father, but his natural inclination led him to prosecute them thro' all impeding occurrences. Having got the Artificial Canon, he calculated several both general and particular tables, fitting the particular ones to the latitude of Derby, viz. fifty three degrees. He collected also a calculative method of dialling from Mr Gunter's Sector, and transcribed it, with a method for the construction of the quadrant and tables fitted thereto, calculated with his own hand in a small paper book. In this task, and in perusing some other authors on various subjects, he spent his studious hours this year and the beginning of 1664, when he became acquainted with Mr George Linacre and Mr William Litchford, desiring the friendship of the former on account of his knowledge of the fixed stars, and of the latter on account of his knowledge of the planets. Mr Flamsteed being desirous to essay all sorts of mathematical science, and unwilling to be seen with Mr Gadbury's book which contained Horrox's tables, lest he should be suspected to study Astrology, bought Mr Street's Caroline tables, intending, when he had an opportunity, not only to learn to calculate the places of the planets, but also to study their motions and understand their theory, but was prevented from executing this design for that year. January 1st, 1665, he applied himself to calculate the true places of the planets to a given time by his tables abovementioned, and accordingly effected it, tho' not so exactly as by his following calculations, yet so auspiciously, as gave him a further encouragement to prosecute these endeavours, in which, says he, I observe it was my fault to err more thro' want of care than knowledge, which since I animadverted, I have striven with double care to prevent. He employed himself afterwards in writing an Almanack for the year 1666, but never offered it to the press. He had in the summer of the preceding year, calculated several new tables, and digested some of them into a convenient book, and this year he added some more. He likewise calculated the nativities of several of his friends and acquaintance. He wrote also a piece upon the construction and uses of a quadrant, with necessary tables for the framing of the same, and of a rule which he had drawn, fitting both to the latitude of fifty three degrees. He began this piece August the eighth, and finished it on the twenty fourth of the same month, intitling it his Mathematical Essays, which was the first piece he wrote, August the 26th he set out for Ireland, in order to be touched by Mr Valentine Greatraks, (3), but receiving no benefit returned to Derby, September the 23d following. Soon after he added an Appendix to his Mathematical Essays, and the projection of an universal dial, and a catalogue of seventy of the fixed stars, with their right ascensions, declinations, longitudes, and latitudes, to the year 1701, which he had composed by the Lychonic places, and allowing the annual procession of the fixed stars 50". He also proceeded to perfect the calculation of the solar eclipse which was to happen June 22, 1666, in the morning, according to the Caroline tables. In the Lent assize in 1666, he became acquainted with Mr Emanuel Halton of Wingsfield manor, who lent him the Richleian tables composed by Natalis Durret, a Frenchman, the introduction to which Mr Flam-

a great deal of History both Ecclesiastical and Civil, but this was a new subject to him, and he found in it a mighty pleasure; and having translated so much as he thought necessary for his use into English, he proceeded to make dials by the directions of some ordinary books, and having changed a treatise of Astrology found amongst his father's books for Mr Street's Caroline Tables, he set himself to calculate the places of the planets by them, and to enquire into the reasons of them, in which he found little satisfaction, that author being very concise and short, and leaving the reasons of his processes to be learned from others. Having calculated, by these tables, an eclipse of the sun which was to happen June 22, 1666, he imparted it to a relation of his, who shewed it to Mr Emanuel Halton of Wingfield manor (b), who coming soon after to see him, and finding that our author was not acquainted with the Astronomical performances of others, sent him Ricciolus's Almagest, and Kepler's Rudolphine Tables, with some other mathematical books to which he was before a stranger. Mr Halton, who was a good Algebraist, endeavoured to draw him in to the study of Algebra, by proposing little problems to him, which, having not long before made himself acquainted with Euclid, he gave geometrical solutions to, and never applied himself unto Algebra till after he removed to London. He prosecuted his Astronomical studies from this time with all imaginable vigour, and with all the success that he could wish [B]. In 1669, he collected some remarkable eclipses of the fixed stars by the moon, which would happen in 1670, and calculated them from the Caroline Tables, and directed them to the Lord Viscount Brouncker, President of the Royal Society (c), which produced very good effects [C]; for, this piece being read before that Society, was highly approved, and procured him letters of thanks from Mr Oldenburgh their Secretary, and Mr John Collins one of their members, with the latter of whom our author held a correspondence for several years, and wrote a great many letters to him, most of which were in the hands of the late William Jones, Esq; F. R. S. and of which we shall give the reader some extracts, since they will shew the progress of our author's studies till his settlement at Greenwich in 1675, when that correspondence ended [D].

stead translated into English, and corrected the errors of it. Mr Halton soon after communicated to him Ricciolus's new Almagest in Latin, which our author was extremely glad to receive, because it shewed a method of finding the Sun's true parallax by observations of the Moon's Dichotomy, which he was very desirous of investigating at that time. He spent likewise some part of his time in Astrological Studies, 'but so, says he, as my labours were rather astronomical. Amongst others, I spent some time on Mr Linacre's, and another great person's schemes, yet could I not any ways satisfy myself in the arcs of directions for the measuring of time, nor am I yet perfectly satisfied: yet I think Kepler's measures most rational and best grounded, tho', in the great person's nativity which I directed, I used Naboyd's measure, which is most in use amongst Astrologers. In fine, I found Astrology to give general strong conjectural hints, not perfect declarations.' After Mr Flamsteed had received Ricciolus's Almagest, he read it over with great attention. In 1667, some considerations of the different equations of time, used by several Astronomers, tho' well demonstrated by none, induced him to endeavour the discovery of a demonstrable equation. He was at first of opinion, that the natural days were always equal, and that there needed no equation of time; but whilst he was endeavouring to demonstrate this, he proved the contrary, first, that the excentricity of the Earth's Orbit from the Sun's Center caused an inequality; and afterwards, that the Ecliptic's Obliquity caused another inequality of the apparent day, which two causes applied together, would make the absolute equation of time. After a long meditation having removed most of the difficulty, he wrote a letter of three sheets to Mr Halton upon this subject. He likewise endeavoured something with regard to the Obliquity of the Ecliptic, the Sun's true distance from the Earth, and the mean length of the tropical year, in April 1667.

[B] And with all the success that he could wish. He employed himself in calculating the places of the Planets observed by Hevelius, and related in his Mercurius sub sole visus, from the Caroline tables, whereby Mr Flamsteed found that they agreed not so well with the Heavens as he presumed they had, and that further observations were requisite to correct them. An Eclipse of the Sun happening October 25, 1668, he had calculated the times of the appearance from the Caroline tables, and afterwards observed it, but not being yet furnished with convenient instruments for measuring and correcting the times, he could not believe it accurate enough to be published, tho' he found by this that the tables differed very much from the Heavens.

[C] Which produced very good effects. He speaks of this in the Appendix to his Self Inspections, in these words: 'At the latter end of the year 1669, I wrote an Almanack for the following year, not after the usual method, but much more accurately, inserting an Eclipse of the Sun that might have been observable but was omitted in the Ephemerides, and five Appulses of the Moon to fixed Stars. But this being rejected, as being beyond the capacity of the vulgar, and returned me. I excerpted the Eclipse and Appulses, and addressed them with some astronomical speculations to the Royal Society, suppressing my name under my anagram. My little labour was better accepted than I expected. I received a letter of thanks from Mr Oldenburgh, the Secretary of the Society. My papers I sent to Mr Stansby, he delivered them to Mr Ashmole, that great lover of curiosity, and he presented them to the Royal Society.' The original manuscript of this piece was in the hands of the late learned and ingenious William Jones, Esq; F. R. S. and is inscribed thus: 'To the Right Honourable William Lord Viscount Brouncker, President of the illustrious Royal Society, as also the Right Worshipfull worthy and truly ingenious Henry Oldenburgh, Esq; Christopher Wren, M. D. and all other the Astronomical Fellows of the said Society. I. F. humbly presents this epistle.' At the close of it he writes thus: 'Excuse, I pray you, this juvenile heat for the concerns of science, and want of better language from one, who, from the sixteenth year of his age to this instant, hath only served one bare apprenticeship in these arts, under the discouragement of friends, the want of health, and all other instructors, except his better genius. I crave the liberty to conceal my name, not to suppress it. I have composed the letters of it written in Latin in this sentence, In Mathesi à sole fundes. I had many materials to add, but they would have swelled my letter beyond its prescribed limits. If I may understand that you accept of these, or think them worth your notice you shall e'er long hear more from yours, &c. J. F.

[D] When that correspondence ended. In his letter dated at Derby, January the twenty fourth, 1669-70, he writes thus: 'Your's of the fifteenth I received, by which I understand that my papers, however unworthy, were read in the Royal Society, an honour which I could as little either expect or deserve, as it merited

From the time that the abovementioned piece was read to the Royal Society, he began to have

‘ merited their applause, or I their thanks. My intent in addressing those Calculi to his Lordship (4) was only to give notice, what Phenomena the Heavens were about to afford us, which since I was not accommodated with instruments sufficient to observe them with the requisite accuracy myself, I made bold to present to his Honour, whom I supposed to be amply accommodated for such observations. But prescribing the use of a Telescope before other instruments, and taking occasion thereon to urge something too boldly on Mr Hook, and in another on Mr Street, concerning the Ephemerides, being likewise conscious of my rude addresses to those worthy persons with my papers, and fearing that my heat for the promotion of science might be worse taken by them than I intended, knowing also the smallness of my merits, I resolved to suppress my name till I understood how it was like to speed with my papers. I fear I addressed myself too rudely to his Lordship, but since he is pleased to take notice of those unpublished papers and enquire after their author, you may please, if you have not already, to tender my humble and sincerest services with my name to his Lordship, and desire his excuse for me that I have not explained my method of calculation; I suppose it cannot be hid to those who are versed in Trigonometry. It is the accuratest I could choose, and the numbers were twice, some thrice, repeated, for more certainty. If any desire to be more fully satisfied, I hope I shall answer their expectations in an epistle to the excellent Hevelius, containing a commentary on, and a correction of, several particulars, in his Mercurius sub sole visus, and commentary on Mr Horrox’s Venus sub sole visa, which I have lying by me written in Latin about half a year since. But my style not pleasing some of my more judicious friends, I have since then given myself to the perusal of the Classic, old Roman, and some modern authors, that so I may bestow a better language on it before I expose it to the view of such severities as I shall be sure to meet with. I intend to present it, with an epistle de æquatione temporis, to the view of the Royal Society, before I commit it to the public; but by reason of my frequent distempers, my parents affairs, and the coldness of the season, I shall be forced to protract the time I have set myself for the perusal of my papers, which yet I hope to present you with compleated, within these six months. I have solar tables by me composed above two years since, to wit, before I was twenty one years of age, which I intend to expose with my epistle de Æquatione Temporis, directed to Mr Street, whom, on occasion, you may let know I shall write to him before the term be over, by my kinsman an Attorney. But I shall be forced to trouble you with the letter, because I know not the place of his habitation. I desire to transact things fairly with him as I have done with his deceased antagonist Mr Wing, with whom I had a fair correspondence, and tho’ we differed de Parallaxi & Æquatimibus Systematis Solaris, and several other things, yet our dissent made us not the less friends, and tho’ I may not subscribe to Mr Street’s opinions, de fixatione apheliorum & nodorum in superioribus, & de Æquatimibus Lunæ oscillatoriis, yet I hope that he will not refuse that we may friendly communicate by letters, of such things as concern the Heavens and our studies. As to the severity of calculations, I suppose that if the artist be but careful and curious enough, we have canons sufficiently large. In the study of my especial friend Mr Halton, I once saw one of Vlaccus to every ten sexagenary seconds: and if our supputations be exact to seconds, I think it is enough, and more than ever we may hope by instruments to obtain from the Heavens; I mean in defining the places of the Luminaries fixed, and the Planets. As for their Diameters, I dare not deny but that, by the help of glasses, we may be enabled to define them to seconds, or smaller parts; especially if a short telescope may be made to perform as much as a long one, which you say that Mr Newton hath not only proved by demonstration, but fact. Sir, if it be no concealed secret, if you have the liberty, and may do it, I desire that you would

‘ please to inform me of what glasses his small Telescope is composed, how, or in what figures ground, and how disposed in the tube. I intend to work some for my own use, and am framing such an engine as Mr Hook describes for the grinding and polishing of them. I intend to grind with ordinary fine sand, dressed, and polish first with chalk, and after with putty. I know no better powders, but would be much obliged to any one that would inform me that, or any thing else, either concerning the usual method or necessaries for grinding and polishing them; if you know any thing which you may freely impart, I should be much obliged by a communication.’

In his letter dated at Derby July the sixteenth, 1670, he writes thus. ‘ I have received another letter from you since, with an account of Gassendus’s observations, and an information of Mengolus’s book, for which I am obliged to you. Pray, when it is known, let me understand his opinion of the quantity of the Sun’s horizontal parallaxes, and the refractions, and what refraction he allows the Sun in the altitude of twenty degrees. I suspect, and have good reason for it, that in inland places it is nothing or not sensible in that altitude, for by some of Mr Wright’s observations, the Sun at noon had no refraction the fifteenth of December in altitude fifteen degrees. . . I thank you for the advice of writing to Mr Townley.—I am at present calculating the Moon’s Appulses for the next year, which, when I have finished, I will send him a specimen of, to make way for our future correspondence. . . As for what I have noted in Ricciolus, besides the frequent errors of his schemes, you may note these P. 161. he applies the horizontal parallax of the Sun in all altitudes, as if it was the same both in the zenith and the horizon, and so gathers the Ecliptic’s obliquity 20’ more than his own observations permit. P. 435; he, in his second example, is guilty of the highest dishonesty, for he first lays down a vicious observation, by which he thrusts the Sun’s place above ten minutes further than either Street’s or my tables afford, and then derives a right ascension almost two minutes larger than his observation will allow, as I can easily prove, but that I have neither time nor room at present. If you desire it, I shall make it good hereafter. P. 477, in his catalogue of the fixed stars; he protrudes the right shoulder of Auriga 1 deg. 20’ forwarder than his own observed distances from Capella the brightest of the Pleiades and Procyon will permit, that he may make his catalogue agree with the Tycho’s, from which, he was so conscious of his own defects, he scarce has dared any where to recede; so that he seems to me rather to affect the name of having corrected our tables, than really to have amended what was faulty in any one. I had first notice of this star’s varying from the Tycho’s Canon in Hevelius’s Mercurius sub sole, but found it absolutely confirmed by the Ricciolan observations. In his Appendix, p. 733, Prob. 3. he teaches how to correct the apparent time of the quadrature, as if the parallax caused the Moon to be really cove, when she was apparently semi-illuminated. But this correction is needless, and all that is said in that column and the two next, absolutely to be rejected, since the parallax cannot vary the phasis at all, as I can easily prove, and will appear to any one that duly considers what he there lays down. Lastly, he is wholly inclined to the Peripatetics, against all other Philosophy, and on this account favours Claramontius against Tycho, Kepler, and reason itself. And tho’ he protests against it, yet I fear he was partial to Tycho, because a Calvinist, and propense to Claramontius, as one that was a Priest of his own order, and in his principles a rigid Peripatetic, and one that had left some persons his relations of, and well deserving from their society.’

In a letter dated at Derby, September the nineteenth, 1670, he writes as follows. ‘ I sat up this last night, waiting to observe the Eclipse of the Moon. The Heavens were clear till midnight, after which they were by little and little covered over with thick whitish clouds, thro’ which, when our clocks struck have accounts sent him of all the mathematical books which were published either at home

one, I saw the Moon eclipsed almost a digit, but I could not find a convenient star to take its altitude, being on one side prohibited by the buildings, and the Heavens all covered with the white clouds, that none of the bigger stars, or any almost removed from the meridian, appeared, and the Moon was scarce an hour removed from the noonstead, so that it was in vain to think to take her's amongst the clouds. The Heavens continued covered with these till morning, and the Moon appeared very rarely through the clouds, so that despairing of any good observation, and seeing the Heavens thicken, I left off and went to my rest, when I had seen the cusps parallel to the horizon, and the finitèr end had covered the occidental spot, or Palus Mareotidis, of Hevelius, but could not note the time. I wrote to Mr Hook about the observing this Eclipse. Pray if you chance to meet him, enquire whether he observed it or not: if he did, and the Heavens smiled on his endeavours, desire him to be pleased to communicate his observations to me: for I think the Heavens antevèrted our calculations some minutes, which, if so, favours an equation I have long since conceived ought to be induced into the Lunar System. . . . I hope speedily to present you with the Phænomena of the next year, for I have as good as finished my calculations.'

In his letter dated at Derby, October the first the same year he writes thus. 'If the Lunar Eclipse last hath been observed by any in London, if you can procure the observation without trouble, please, by your next, to communicate it to me. I have now finished my calculations, and am writing them out, but cannot tell what tongue to expose them in, English or Latin. Let me have your opinion, that shall rule me. The appearances are treble, the number I calculated last year, and most of them some way truly notable. I have read a part of Fabri's Optics. I was much pleased with his acuteness and acurateness at first, but coming to his forty third proposition. I find it lost, for in his sixth, seventh, and eighth sections, he demonstrates not what he intends, but by drawing his ninety and ninety one schemes too close, deceives and mocks his reader.'

In his letter dated at Derby, December the first following, he writes thus: 'I hope you have received my last, with my calculations of the last year's appearances, in my introduction to which, if I seem to have asserted too boldly against our Astronomical tables, I have now received an observation of my Cousin Wilson that will fully confirm my affirmations, which I send you inclosed. I cannot but congratulate you for your happy correspondence with P. Berrètet, and I am much pleased to hear of De Mouton's book de mensurâ Diam. Solis & Lunæ, one of which, when they come to your hands, I desire you to send me, and pay yourself out of what you have in your hands. If the piece be well done it will conduce no little to the correction of Astronomical Lunar tables. When I have received and perused it, I shall, according to your directions, write to De Mouton, till then, not having any occasion offered, I suppose you will neither hold it convenient nor necessary. Sir, you once, I remember, proffered to lend me Mr Horrox's papers which are now in your hands. If, Sir, you have not procured them yet to be printed, nor any Bookseller offers to undertake them, I would accept of the offer gladly, for I have leisure now to peruse any author, and I would gladly try if that deviation which is now very perceptible in the motion of Saturn, was not, in his time, sensible: for, if I remember aright, one of his books contains the observed distances of the Planets from the fixed stars, with other his observations, from which, nothing as yet, hath been deduced.'

In his letter dated at Derby, January the thirtieth, 1670-1, he writes as follows: 'I have lately written to Mr Moore, from whom I have received an answer full of his natural civility and generosity. By his advice I have likewise wrote to Mr Townley, from whom I cannot yet expect an answer, by reason my letter went but on Tuesday last, and can scarce yet reach his hands. . . . I have the Transaction in which Mr Oldenburgh hath printed the short abstract of my calculations, which give the observers notice of such appearances, but the other requisites of the supputations being wanting, they will be put to a second trouble of calculating to gain the anomalies, and other parts of the calculation, before they can be able to guess how, or where, any thing in our numbers are to be corrected. I am framing tables of oblique ascensions for the latitudes of London, Dantzick, and Derby, supposing the declination 23 gr. 30'. 00'' to second minutes, the old ones falsely supposing it 23 gr. 31'  $\frac{1}{2}$ , to which I intend to add the angle orient, which will not a little assist calculations, and such as are minding to make Astronomical predictions, or compare cælestial observations, with our numbers.'

In his letter dated at Derby, March the 20th 1670-1, he writes thus: 'I have both your letters. . . . I am exceedingly pleased to hear that Mr Horrox's papers will be printed, and I suppose the Venus sub sole with them, to which, having well perused it, I know not what can be added. The notes of Hevelius I find generally needless, and those on the sixth chapter, page 124, absolutely false, conceding his own parallax, because he hath taken the angle of the position of Venus, which is made by a line drawn through her's and the Sun's center, instead of the angle of the vertical circle, per centrum Veneris, with the Ecliptic or the parallactical angle, whence he not only vitiates the truly computed parallaxes of Mr Horrox, but also supposing the parallax of Venus from the Sun in altitude 1. 57, he falsely calculates these parallaxes.

h.	of Long.	of Lat.	Par Long.	Par Lat.

So that what he hath deduced, from these his vitious parallaxes, ought, if his comment be printed with the original, to be corrected. Of this you may please to inform the Doctor. You wrote that Dr Wallis desired my comment on the Mercurius of Hevelius might be printed with Horrox's papers. When I received your letter, I looked up my papers, but find that I shall scarcely have time to transcribe and fit them for the press, partly because my occasions, but more frequently my distempers, withdraw and detain me from my pen endeavours. For the spring coming on my blood increases, which if I should not exercise strongly, I should spit up or receive into my stomach with great detriment to my health. When I return from exercise, other occasions are ready to detain me. Farther, I have received a letter from Mr Oldenburgh, who is not willing that I should advert too plainly on Hevelius, lest he should recede from his correspondency, and detain his observations from us, if he be disgusted. However, if I might but know by what time Mr Horrox's papers would be ready for the Printer, I would endeavour to get my notes ready to succeed them, for I am resolved not to desist if my distemper will be forced to intermit by my usual remedies, which I much question not, God permitting. In the meantime I am preparing cases for my glasses, for which I hope to raise a pole to elevate them on this evening, and then I shall endeavour, when I have leisure, to observe the Heavens, that I may some ways benefit the science, I am enamoured of, Astronomy. . . . I have received and returned letters to Mr Townley, from whom I have an account of the Solar Eclipse of 1668, October the 25th, and the occultation of Antares on May the 23d, 1670, of which I desire you to procure me Mr Hook's observation, if he made any, for I fear Mr Street's is wrested a little.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the third, 1671, he writes as follows: 'I have your's of the twenty seventh last past, for the communications in which I heartily thank you. I am glad to hear that Mr Horrox's papers are gone to the press. I shall against that time they may be almost finished, have retranscribed my notes on Hevelius's Mercurius sub sole, which, lest I may offend, I shall willingly submit to the castigations and corrections of Dr Wallis, or any other ingenious person. My distempers and affairs of late have been so intermutually urgent, that I have performed little. I have by me a sheet or two which I wrote some five years ago, de æquatione temporis astronomica, which I have last summer made Latin, and would gladly it might see the light. It being readiest, I intend first to absolve and send it to you, to be disposed of as you shall think most meet. What you write of Mr Horrox's papers being in Mr Townley's hands, I am well pleased to hear of, and I hope I may do you some service in that business, for Mr Townley corresponds with me very familiarly, and promises me all the services he can do me in my studies. But before this comes to your hands, I suppose you may hear of him in London, for he wrote to me some ten days ago, that he would set forward on Monday last for the city, which I suppose he will reach by this week's end. I am to go into Lancashire, and near his house the latter end of this month, where I intend to call if he be returned into the country. In the mean time, if you or Mr Jonas Moore can meet with him, you may do well to urge him in this business, and if I can do any thing when I go into Lancashire, let me have your directions and you shall not want my endeavours, either for collecting or methodizing any papers, that may fall or be intrusted into my hands. I desire you, Sir, to let me hear from you concerning these things within this fortnight, for I cannot know precisely what time this month I shall take my journey. I must before I end acknowledge myself much obliged to you and Mr Hook, for procuring me my glasses. They serve well in a tube of  $13\frac{1}{2}$  feet but cause some colours which will not be easily removed, tho' I put on a narrow aperture to the object glass. Pray present my service to Mr Moore. I am reading his Algebra and find it not very difficult unto me, and intend when I shall have spare time to make some progress in Geometrical studies.

In his letter dated at Derby May the 13th, 1671, he writes thus: 'Having written to Mr Oldenburgh, I thought convenient to inclose this—— I have sent Mr Oldenburgh my observation of the moon's appulse to the star in virgo  $9^{\circ} 53'$ . whose latitude  $1^{\circ} 20'$ . north of the fourth light, which I saw covered by the dark side of the moon, in something less latitude than the lowest part of the Propontis, when Jupiter was elevated  $32^{\circ} 52'$  whence I deduced the hour  $9. 16'. 30''$ . The precise emersion I saw not, for I was elsewhere then engaged, but coming to the tube, I found that the star was the breadth of the Caspian Spot, or Palus Mæotis, distant from the moon's limb, and higher than the supreme part of the said spot it's whole length; whence turning to my quadrant I took the height of the moon's supreme limb,  $31^{\circ} 54'$ . therefore the star's height was  $71^{\circ} 45'$ . and the hour  $10. 24'. 36''$ . I noted the height of Jupiter to be  $22^{\circ} 36'$ . and find the hour thence  $10. 25'. 00''$ . I am persuaded that the times are pretty exactly taken, for they shew partly the same duration, and, all things considered, as the tables, but at least 10 if not 15 minutes later. I desire to hear from you, whether any of your acquaintance have observed this appearance, of which the Calculus is with the rest in the Transactions. If you have any observations, pray favour me so far as to impart them to me. I have given Mr Oldenburgh a calculation of the moon's transit by Jupiter on the twentieth of September next at sun rise, which I suppose he will if you desire impart to you, for I have not time to transcribe it at present, but you shall command it when you please.'

In his letter dated at Derby July the 10th, 1671, he writes thus: 'I have finished my transcript of my Solar Tables, which I wait but for an opportunity to transmit safely unto you. Last week here I saw a boy, one Smedley, about fourteen years old, who has two perfect rows of teeth on the upper side of his mouth, round, save that the third tooth on each side from the fore-teeth are lately come forth, and has a third half cut and coming forth, more inwards towards the roof of his mouth. Of these two inwards extraordinary rows, the two foremost teeth of the second row came first, not a year ago, the rest all within this half year or less. — The boy is of a good complexion and healthful, only in his childhood he was lamed in his knee.'

In his letter dated at Derby August the first 1671, he writes as follows: 'With these I send my promised Solar Tables, by my school-fellow Mr Sergeant, though I have not added the sun's diameters, yet I intend, before these may be printed, to send them to you to be annexed to them, or included with the rest. — My occasions are so frequent, and I am so much forced from my studies, that I fear I can scarce get any time to transcribe what I have written on Monsieur Hevelius, it being so prolix, that it will cost me more time than I can possibly spare to abbreviate it. I esteem myself obliged to continue my annual præadmonitions of the lunar appearances, which is a work not only necessary, but, if I flatter not myself too much, something honourable for our countrymen, and therefore not to be discontinued. Sir, my spare hours betwixt my indispositions and affairs being now but few, and likely to be much less, I cannot possibly perform both these tasks, therefore desire you to excuse me my papers upon Hevelius, by which perhaps I might disoblige him to the English Society which he honours, and permit me only to make my new calculations, towards which I have not as yet wrote one figure. If you think them not so necessary I shall forbear thinking of them, and perform my notes on Hevelius with all speed and sweetness possible. I shall have, e'er long, an opportunity of sending to Dantzick, when perhaps I shall write to him, and inform him civilly of his errors myself. In the mean time I submit my intentions to your discretion, and resolve in this to be ruled by your advice. — I cannot but joy with you in the knowledge of your French correspondence, but I fear you have given them an account of my abilities beyond what they will prove. I desire to know if you ever communicated any of my calculations, or my few observations, unto any of them, and what you have in return. As for the correspondence of the French Astronomers, I shall gladly undertake it with the first convenient opportunity, but not over hastily. I have several observations of the moon's transits by the fixed stars, and her diameters made by Mr Gascoigne, and related in his letters, which yet the like for accuracy not being to be had amongst the French, I think not fit to communicate, nor buy their acquaintance with them. As for my exercise de Æquatione Temporis, I have no perfect copy of it, so I cannot send one, but shall, if you have not already, inform them of my observations of the last visible solar eclipse, and the lunar transit, and some admonitions of future appearances.'

In his letter dated at Derby November the eighth, 1671, he writes thus: 'I have now somewhat extraordinary to furnish your correspondencies, and shall have every day more and more. Last October I observed with my fourteen foot tube, and the Townleian micrometer, the underwritten distances of the Pleiades, which I have compared with those I find in Mr Gascoigne's papers, and those of Mutus in Ricciolus.' Here Mr Flamsteed incloses a scheme of the Pleiades.

In his letter dated at Derby January the thirty-first, 1671-2, he writes thus: 'I have seen the December Transaction, in which Mr Oldenburgh has transcribed some lines from my letters concerning the appearance of Saturn, which I am glad to find agree so well with the like of the French Astronomers. You may farther intimate, that I viewed the same planet on New-year's day at night, with my long tube and more convex eye-glass. But neither myself, nor a young man with me, could discern any anses, altho' the appearance was sufficiently clear. I have several times measured the sun's semidiameter, which none of my observations allow less in Perigæo than  $16'. 24''$  or  $25''$ . I think I communicated to you some measures of his diameters when he appeared elliptical, ingenious Gentlemen, whom our author at that time had never seen, advised him to take tical, if I have not I shall when you please to command them, for I owe and esteem a good part of my endeavours a debt to you. I am now excerpting some observations from Mr Gascoigne's and Crabtree's reciprocal letters, in which I find exact observations of the moon's eclipse, December the tenth, 1638, and the sun's May the twenty-second 1639, this by Mr Gascoigne, that by Crabtree; which if they were not in Mr Horrox's papers, and Mr Townley would permit, might do well if they were added to them, of which I desire to hear how many are printed by the next. — If Mr Jonas Moore gives any attendance on the Heavens, I shall early enough let him know of some observable appearances, not published nor certified in the Transactions, with some observations made by the micrometer he gave me, and therefore a due debt to him. I have read De Mouton de Aequatione Temporis, &c. whose notes upon the equations of others might easily be redargued, but that I would spare your correspondents, of whom if any now will agree to observe the diameters of the planets, the sun and moon especially, with the satellite appearances of Jupiter, I shall not fail as the weather and my distempers permit to do my endeavour to make respondent observations. All the times I have viewed the sun I could never see any macula upon him, but his whole disk perfectly clear. — I had sent you a draught of my new micrometer, but that I lately sent one to Mr Townley, whose sentiments I expect concerning it, before I mind it should travel further.

In his letter dated at Derby February the tenth, 1671-2, he writes thus: 'I have wrote to you lately, so have not much to write at this time. — The Heavens of late have not favoured me with any serenity, more than served one night, viz. February the first, to observe the immersion of the first satellite into the shade of Jupiter, and the application of the third to his limb, of which I gave Mr Oldenburgh an account in a late letter. I am now excerpting some things from Mr Gascoigne's letters to Mr Crabtree, and his answers, but find some schemes and papers wanting, of which Mr Crabtree could not be careless, but they are supposed to be fallen into Mr Jonas Moore's hands. Pray let him know what I am doing when you see him, they can be of no concern by themselves, wherefore he may do well to put them into Mr Townley's hands, who owns the letters referring to them.' In this letter he likewise sends the sun's diameters on January the 5th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 15th, and 1st of February 1671-2.

In his letter dated at Derby February the twentieth, 1671-2, he writes as follows: 'Mr Halton is translating Kinkhuysen's Moone-wijzer into English that I may have a view of it, and at Mr Townley's request I have lately wrote and sent him the History of Malting. I have begun that tract concerning the distances and diameters of all the planets, which I promised in my letter to Mr Oldenburgh, but shall go but very slowly forward, by reason that sometimes my infirmities, oftener affairs, interrupt me. But this I have certainly learned from my observations, that the sun's parallax is not above  $10''$ , yea probably but  $7''$ , and his distance, à terrâ, 26,000 semidiameters, which is a distance to which none ever durst remove him yet, and thrice as far as I supposed him formerly in my Solar Tables.'

In his letter dated at Derby, April the first, 1672, he writes thus: 'The included paper contains the last observation of Jupiter's transit by a fixed star, and another since made with my deductions therefrom. These (being busy at this time of the year) to save a labour of transcription I send through the hands of Mr Oldenburgh, that so you may have the perusal of them. I hope you had my last, informing you that I have received Mr Horrox's papers, and satisfying you concerning the contents of my last letter. I have perused Horrox's Venus sub sole, and find he needs no comment save, in this he has taken the Sun's semidiameter less by  $20''$  or more than really it was, so that this calculation will need some little correction, which if you think fit, I shall give them by way of comment. He has assumed the diameters of the fixed stars too large, which Hevelius has only well corrected, and his diameters of the Planets are much amiss. But not having observed them all myself as I intend, if God afford me opportunity, I shall not meddle with them, yet only to you I may say, that those settled in Hevelius, except in Venus and Mercury, are as erroneous as those of Mr Horrox. Hevelius is much mistaken in the parallactical angle in his Venus sub sole, but it is so easily proved that I cannot think, but if ever he again reads over that piece and his notes, he could not but see his mistake. I find by my frequent observations, that the remotest satellite of Jupiter goes not twenty three semidiameters only from him, as Cassini has it, but rather  $24\frac{1}{2}$  or  $\frac{3}{4}$  as Mr Townley gave it me in a loose note, and this you may prove by an observation, March the 19th, amongst the rest if you have it, I think those observations the exactest that ever were had of this Planet, and if we had but a few more such in several places of his orbit, I should not doubt but to restore his motions more accurately than we have yet done, or perhaps can expect. I cannot think the satellites of Jove subject to any great inequalities in their motions, since I find their distances from Jupiter on each side him, equal in their greatest elongations. If I had but the opportunity of observing one transit of Mars in his achronical appearance from a fixed star, I should not doubt but to derive the Sun's parallax and distance, à terrâ as well if not better therefrom, than from any observations as yet we possess. This I expect and have forecasted for, but by an accident the course of my observations are, and will be, a little interrupted; for being last Thursday night preparing to observe the diameter of Jupiter, I took my object glass of my long tube to smear it, as I had often done before at my candle. As I was holding it over the light it gave a crack, and a little piece splintered from it in the middle, and the glass cleft clear through. I durst not remove it out of the box, because I was afraid I could not so well make it close again. I keep it by me, but dare not adventure to make any observations by it, tho' I have viewed the Moon with it, and find it does not perform much worse if any than it did.'

In his letter dated at Derby, April the 17th 1672, he writes as follows. 'I have your's of the twelfth instant, whereby you intimate your desire to have me say something farther concerning the Lunar Theory of Mr Horrox, for the satisfaction of Dr Wallis. I am content, and therefore shall e'er long send you the whole calculation of the Moon's place at her last transit over the Pleiades, after his method, with my further thoughts upon it. I am very desirous to be framing Lunar numbers but want observations of her apogæon diameters, which the inconveniency of my dwelling permits me not to make, because the apogæon Moon in Sagittarius goes so very low this year; and further the refractions in her low meridional heights, would greatly diminish her vertical diameters, which upon continual experience I find can only be taken to the requisite exactness, so that I fear I must wait till the year 1674, or 1675, e'er I can well observe them. I cannot but much approve of the form of Mr Horrox's Theory, and having considered it several times, I find that we might almost as easily compute her place in her orb as the elliptical place of any other Planet, if tables were fixed to his method, which therefore for facility of calculation, I intend to propose to myself to correct when I shall gain so much leisure, and I hope this summer may afford it me. . . . The Heavens never since I broke my glass afforded me any opportunity for observation till yesterday, when at noon having covered the broken part of my glass with the bigger piece, I took the Sun's diameter  $5325 = 31 - 58$  which still conspires for the exactly bisected excentricity, and the perigæon  $\frac{1}{2}$  diameter  $16' 25''$ . In this letter there are some remarks upon Mr Newton's letter concerning colours.'

In his letter dated May 6th, 1672, he writes thus: 'I have received two letters from you conveying the most current news for which I am bound to give you take a journey to London, that he might be personally acquainted with them. He gladly

' you hearty thanks. . . . I hope you have by this time received a letter from me by Mr Sargeant. . . . I intimated by that, I would send you the Lunar tables by Monday next.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the thirteenth following, he writes thus: ' With this you will receive the promised Lunar tables, to which I have added an Epilogus directed to yourself. But my desire of brevity, and not to meddle where Mr Horrox had done any thing himself, restrained my thoughts in that place. Here with your leave I shall enlarge. How the Apogee of the Moon is librated, Mr Horrox has shewn us very well, but why it should be so librated, methinks, he shews no good reason. What he says of the Sun's attracting that end of the axis of the system next him, is framed from Kepler's groundless notions.' Mr Flamsteed then proposes his own solution, and afterwards proceeds thus. ' You have sometimes desired to know what I found amiss in the Hevelian edition of Horrox's Venus sub sole, I am not willing to let all be known I have against that great man, but in his comments on that treatise the main cause of his error there is, that he hath mistaken the parallactical angles calculated by Mr Horrox at

3—15	supputat	$\overset{\circ}{70}-\overset{1}{56}$	} and used } instead of } them,
3—35		$\overset{\circ}{68}-\overset{1}{53}$
3—45		$\overset{\circ}{67}-\overset{1}{55}$
			$\overset{\circ}{46}-\overset{1}{34}$ $\overset{\circ}{48}-\overset{1}{37}$ $\overset{\circ}{49}-\overset{1}{35}$

' Which were the Angles made by a line passing thro' the centers of the Sun and Venus with the Ecliptic, or that he hath used the  $\angle \angle ECV$  instead of  $\angle \angle NCL$ , whence having proceeded all those faults and faulty corrections of Mr Horrox's works, which are found every where in the succeeding comments. He finds fault with Mr Horrox for having framed the Diameter of the Planets amiss, whilst his own, if well considered, tho' something alike in proportion to each other, are not less erroneous in quantity. His greatest Diameter of Jupiter is but  $24'' \frac{1}{2}$  yet I find that Mr Gascoigne once observed it  $51''$  he says accurately. I have seen it above  $46''$  and Mr Townley no less, and that it is wholly so much the observed elongations of the satellites from Jupiter's center, taken in minutes and seconds, compared with the estimated diameters do plainly evince. But Mr Horrox hath erred himself in the Sun's diameter which he states only  $31'-30''$  which my observations warrant  $32'-42''$  Hevelius has stated it  $32'-30''$ . He has likewise in his comment on the sixth chapter, p. 124. delivered the parallaxes of Longitude and Latitude in his own hypothesis, which supposed the Sun's distance from the Earth,  $5064$  semidiameters of the Earth, and its horizontal parallax  $41''$ . I know not what warrant he may have for this, since he says nothing of it in his works that I have seen, but I hope at this next achronical apparition of Mars, or at the latter end of September next, to make those observations of him which may shew his parallax, and by consequence the Sun's, I hoped to have observed him this morning, but the skies are clouded, yet if they clear before Tuesday, I doubt not to gain another accurate observation of him, and to measure his diameter, which yet I could never do conveniently. I have observed the return of Jupiter to the star in Virgo,  $9^{\circ} 58''$ . If you desire it I shall send you both it, and what I observe of Mars when I have heard from you. . . . Since I wrote this, I have received your's of the 13th instant. I have therefore pasted new radices to the meridian of Derby, that so they may comply the better with the solar numbers. I have so pasted them, that if you turn them up you may find those for London under: but if you approve the radices to Derby, that so they may comply the better with my solar numbers, the title may be written thus: Lunares numeri, ad novum Lunæ systema excogitatum ab astronomo peritissimo Jeremia Horroxio; ad meridianum Derbiæ, notissimi coritanorum oppidi in ipso ferè totius Angliæ umbilico siti, accommodati ab J. F.

In his letter dated at Derby, May 20th, 1672, he writes thus: ' I have lately observed the distance of Mars from a fixed star very accurately. Last week I made equations for Mr Horrox's greatest eccentricity of the moon: for the least, I have them made ready to my hands. This week I will more accurately calculate the equations of the apogee and eccentricities, and reduce the mean motions to current time. So that you may within a fortnight or three weeks at farthest, expect the Lunar tables from me, if God spare me health. I shall now have more time than formerly. I intend likewise to note the erroneous places in Hevelius's notes on the Venus sub sole, and send them as soon as I have finished the new Lunar tables. My observation of Mars, I intend not to send you till I have made some more, which I expect about the middle of next month.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May 30th, 1672, he writes thus. ' I have this morning completed my numbers for Horrox's theory, which I shall transcribe and send you, with some little account of the method of calculation as my leisure and occasions will permit. These I hope to send you on Monday come sevensnight. I have late observed the return of Jupiter to the star in Virgo  $9^{\circ} 58''$  but have not yet had time to commit it to my book, and calculate the times from the observed altitudes, but with the Lunar tables you may expect them.'

In his letter dated at Derby, June the 12th, 1672, he writes as follows. ' I had delivered my Lunar tables after Mr Horrox's system to our carrier last Monday, but that some employments cast upon me since the death of my uncle put me so behind hand, that I have finished but this morning. However, I hope, they will be no whit the later in your hands, for I shall procure one of our Attorneys to deliver them to you, either the end of this week, or the beginning of the next. I have wrote in Latin an epistle to you containing what I have altered in their form, and what I think concerning the equation of time and alteration, of the eccentricity and the variation. I suppose you print Mr Crabtree's letter which contains this theory with Mr Horrox's works, for the theory contained in the letter of December the tenth 1638, as I find in some loose papers, and the exercises is not that which Horrox resolved upon, and further in it the optical part of the equation varies, not but only the focus of the mean motion and the physical equation; so that the distance of the moon à terrâ, varies not above five semidiameters of the earth, which in his later papers he says all eclipses, require to alter above seven. You have done well therefore to omit that letter, but in the room of it, I suppose you will give Mr Crabtree's which will lead to mine.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the tenth, 1672, he writes thus. ' Included I send you the catalogue I promised. I have chosen those towns where celestial observations have been made, and where I have found none, I have ordered them by comparing their positions to one another in our maps, which yet I dare not trust, for by celestial observations of the pole's height, and eclipses made in several places at once compared together, I find they place Italy too near, and all the towns of Poland, Germany, and France over remote. The maps I used were Speed's where I wanted, but I find them not good. I would gladly make some further enquiry into the nature of light and colours, but want a prism for experiments, which may have two faces of an equal breadth, the third not half so broad as either of them, that so the angle included by the broader faces may be less than  $30$  gr. It needs not be large so it be but clear glass and well wrought. If you can procure me such an one, provide it me against the latter end of the next week.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the 23d, 1672; he writes thus. ' I have received Dr Wallis's letter to you of the 18th of this month, which finding me at an unusual leisure, I thought fit not to delay an answer that might give you satisfaction, tho' I hope you are satisfied already. The difference of the least and greatest extrencities in my tables, is as the Doctor makes it,  $2323 \sqrt{}$  qualium Radius  $100000 \sqrt{}$ . That I wrote  $22235$  was a mistake in the gladly embraced this offer, and visited Mr Oldenburgh and Mr Collins, who introduced him

' first transcript of my number, and ought to be made
' every where  $2323\sqrt{}$  for that I have used in all
' my calculations, and the table of equations is framed
' upon that difference else the greatest distance could ' not be  $7^{\circ}-40'$  as I have calculated it. The other ' faults of my copy pray correct after the Doctor's in' timations. You need alter nothing in the example ' of the calculation, for the fault exceeds not one se' cond, which since we cannot observe with such ex' actness, I willingly yield in any calculation, and few ' expect that severity. I mention in my Epilogus the ' letter in which you have an account of Mr Horrox's
' theory, I mean that you sent me the copy of, the ' theory from which, if I remember, you wrote me
' word, that Dr Wallis had long since translated.
' This I suppose you intend to print, and it is neces' sary to be placed before my tables, and supposing
' that you intend it, I have said nothing of any thing
' contained in that letter, but only of such things as
' Horrox has said nothing of.—I have lately pro' cured some lough water (so the miners call it) for
' one Webster the author of the Metallographia. It ' is found in the midst of a firm stone in the lead
' mine. This I have is very transparent, but looks a ' little whitish and smells of sulphur. I am promised
' some stones which being made of water, that con-
' geals as it drops, are yet all of them hollow in the ' middle. These are rarities seldom met with or ' heard of.'

In his letter dated at Derby, August the fifth, 1672, he writes thus. ' Your last I received on Wednesday,
' and having then a letter new written to Mr Town-
' ley, I sent the included papers of your's to him ac' cording to your desire. When he returns them, I ' shall impart them to Mr Halton, to whom I be' lieve they will be as welcome as to myself.—
' But the business of this letter is to let you know,
' that you mistook my meaning concerning the letter
' I mentioned in my Epilogus, which was not that of ' December the twentieth, 1638, but one of Crab-
' tree's to Mr Gascoigne, dated Junii 21 1642, in ' which he describes Mr Horrox's system upon the ' author's second thoughts, which he might find in his
' exercises, and his calculations on some loose papers.
' This differs much from that in the December Epi' stle, for, 1. In that he makes the greatest equation
' of the apogæon less than in his later papers. 2. The ' greatest physical equation  $5^{\circ} 10'$ , the greatest optical
'  $2^{\circ} 30'$ , whereas afterwards he made either of them
'  $3^{\circ} 50'$  equal to each other. 3. In that epistle he ' directs to take  $\frac{2}{5}$  of the Tyconic variation, but on
' after-thoughts he assumes  $\frac{2}{10}$ . Lastly, that calcula' tion is compiled by aid of Lansberg's and Kepler's
' tables, which in this epistle is done more artificially
' by Trigonometry. Add, that he directs no correc' tion of the mean motions, which yet I find in his
' Exercises and in Crabtree's letter. These considered,
' the difference betwixt this first system of Mr Horrox
' in the letter of December the 20th 1638, and that
' collected from his later papers by Mr Crabtree is so ' wide, that I believe you would not think fit to be ' placed before tables from which they differ so much.
' I have therefore translated so much from that epistle
' of Crabtree, as contains the system and trigonome-
' trical method of calculation, which you may cause
' to be printed before the tables, which are framed
' from them and agree punctually with them.'

In his letter dated at Derby, August the thirteenth, 1672, he writes thus. ' I have your's of the tenth in' stant.—I am glad you are satisfied of Horrox's ' system by the letter I sent you. The precepts I ' found translated by the ingenious Mr Shakerley,
' which I transcribed from him, because I thought
' them clearer expressed than the English ones in ' Crabtree's letter, tho' they are in substance the very ' same. I remember not that he bids any where dou' ble the co-sine of an arch, or that he uses natural ' numbers at all. I doubt you mistake, and that the ' third precept may have caused the error. It is
' Duplicetur argumentum annuum & duplicati co-sinui;
' and the last two words I fear you read to the dou-
' bled co-sine, by which nothing can be understood,
' but to the co-sine of that argument doubled, which

' is clear another sense and sound enough. For his ' method of calculating the Prosthaphereis of the orb,
' it is so framed as that it may include that little arch
' which Street applies at the focus of mean motion
' and calls the variation; otherwise, the difference be' twixt Anomalia media, and Anomalia excentri dou' bled, as Crabtree finds it, will give Bishop Ward's
' elliptic equation or Street's without that variation. As ' for that inequality in the moon's motion which Hor-
' rox calls the variation, and in his letter of Decem' ber the 20th, confesses he knew not how to apply,
' and Crabtree alike in that of June the 21st, 1642.
' I esteem it purely physical, and have not forgotten
' to say something of it in the Epilogus to the tables,
' as you will find if you peruse it again. Nor can
' Horrox be thought to have judged it otherwise on ' his after-thoughts, since he makes no use of it in ' computing the moon's distance from the earth, which
' if it were not only physical it must necessarily vary.
' I thought Crabtree's precepts sufficiently clear for ' calculation. If they shall not be so to some, our ta' bular method and direction will explain them and ' render them easy, though we need not fear that any ' will give themselves the trouble to calculate by them
' trigonometrically, when the tabular calculation is so ' easy, accurate, and expeditious. I think it is not any
' ways evident from Crabtree's letter, that his friend
' Mr Horrox died not the third of January 1640, ex' cept I have amiss translated something. Pray peruse
' it again and let me know, for besides the note on ' the back of the letters, I find that in a letter of ' Crabtree's to Gascoigne, dated March the 18th
' 1640-1, he much laments the death of Horrox. Mr
' Gascoigne was slain in our wars, I believe in the ' year 1642, for I find no letters either of his or Crab-' tree's to him, after that of Junii 21, 1642, if I ' have not miswritten. Crabtree lived much longer,
' I believe till 1652, if his neighbour Mr Wroe in' formed me truly. I shall write to morrow to Mr
' Townley, and will make one part of my desires to ' be ascertained of the time of his death.' In the postscript he writes thus, ' when I came to compare Horrox's own system in the letter of December the 20th,
' 1638, with his in Crabtree's letter, June the 21st,
' 1642, I found that Crabtree had demonstrated it in
' Horrox's own words, from that letter in December
' 1638, I mean the libration of the apogæon, concern' ing which what I have written to you formerly, I ' intended once to have composed into the Epilogus,
' but upon second thoughts, judged it better to take ' your opinion of it. I consent that you should in-
' fert it, since I perceive you esteem of it not amiss,
' and I doubt not but hereafter to have something
' that may further illustrate and confirm it, if occasion
' be given.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the 5th, 1673, he writes as follows. ' I received the sheet omitted in
' Mr Horrox's book, without which I think it may
' do as well as with it; for the corrections in Crab-
' tree's letter I find by Mr Horrox's exercises are the ' very same, he intended, only by this addition we ' shall see the progress of Horrox's endeavours, and ' how he framed that in the rough which he after ' mended, but left to his successors to polish and per' fect. I have spent my spare hours of late in cor' recting Kepler's numbers in the planet Mars, so as ' they may represent my observations which I think
' they will do very accurately, I mean those of Sep' tember last, which I made for finding his parallax
' and the sun's. To make them fit all others is im' possible, by reason that the places of the fixed stars
' are erroneously sometimes stated by Tycho. But if ' we should once be so happy as to have them restored
' by telescope observations on large instruments as
' Tycho's, I should not doubt in a short time to frame
' numbers that should represent all the celestial ap' pearances at least of one age, and perhaps, the next
' very exactly. What I have done, I think will fit all ' observations as well as any, but my great desire is ' to have them represent my own well, which being ' made with larger and more accurate instruments than ' were ever used before Mr Townley's time, must ' needs be more exact than any before his. I hoped
' to him to Mr Jonas Moore, who presented him with Mr Townley's micrometer, and undertook to procure him glasses for a telescope at a moderate rate. At Cambridge he visited Dr Isaac Barrow, and Mr Isaac Newton, and Dr Wroe, then Fellow of Jesus-college there, with whom he corresponded frequently for the four following years. He also entered himself a Student of Jesus-college. In the Spring of the year 1672 he excerpted several observations from Mr Gascoigne's and Mr Crabtree's letters, which had not been made publick, and which he translated into Latin. He finished the transcript of Mr Gascoigne's papers May 12, 1672. Amongst that Gentleman's letters he found some, in which Mr Gascoigne shewed how the images of remote objects were formed in the distinct base of a convex object glass. From these our author got his Dioptrics in a few hours, having read Des Cartes's Dioptrics before, but learned little from them, because Des Cartes discourses not of this subject, his main business being to shew, how, by elliptical or hyperbolar glasses, all the rays of light which fall on the object parallel to the axis, may be collected into one point of the image in the distinct base, supposing all the rays of light of the same species, and liable to the same law of refraction, which yet Mr Isaac Newton has demonstrated they were not, by many experiments published in this year's Philosophical Transactions. 'And this, says our author, is the only thing that I can perceive, for which Des Cartes's Dioptrics have been so celebrated.' The spare hours of the remaining part of the year 1672, were employed in his observations as the weather

'to have had many accurate observations this spring of all the planets, but the clouded Heavens have almost constantly deprived me of my foreseen opportunities in all but Jupiter, of whom what I have observed Mr Oldenburgh can now inform you.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the 7th, 1673, he writes thus. 'I wrote to you about a week agoe. — I might have informed you in my last, that after I had discovered the sun's distance in September last, to be near 21000 semidiameters, I place it just so much in perigeo, then will his parallax be just  $9'' 82$ , which is precise the hundredth part of the sun's semidiameter there i. e.  $16' 22''$ ; so that I find the earth is but the millioneth part of the sun. This caused me to think of putting it in a problem, which I did to puzzle some boasting pretenders to skill. Thus the sun's distance from the earth is 21000 of the earth's semidiameters, whose body is but the  $\frac{1}{1000000}$  part of the sun. Quere, What is the sun's diameter.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the twenty sixth, 1673, he writes thus. 'Thursday last I received a letter from Mr Gregory about the Scotch observatory and instruments. I had written a good way of an answer, but when I came to describe my new micrometer, I find my papers in which I had described it removed. I have not time to search for it at present, and am on Monday next to go some thirty miles from home, but shall return within three days, God willing. After, I shall search for my papers, and return him an answer in the mean time. Yesterday I wrote to Mr Townley to send you his advice, and think it convenient you would visit Sir Jonas Moore, who has one of Mr Townley's micrometers, which Mr Gregory may there see fitted to the tube better, if I mistake not, than by Mr Hook's.'

In his letter dated at Derby, August the twentieth, 1673, he writes thus. 'If Vlac's canon would be had for a crown or a noble, I should be glad of it, but I cannot go beyond that rate, for my father takes notice of my expences, and I am at the outside of my allowance. I have more than half finished my Hecker, for so I call my Ephemeris, and after the next week hope to get time to conclude him, so that you may have him before Michaelmas. My service to Mr Gregory, if he be still in the city. I shall be glad to know what instruments and books he takes into Scotland with him.'

In his letter dated at Derby September the twentieth, 1673, he writes thus: 'This day I have received one from you, by which I understand you have found those tables of Vlac's I desired. — I am very well pleased with the news of Hugenius's treatise being come over, but more to hear of Cassini's book of refractions being expected. I am of his opinion that they ought to be continued to the zenith, because the refractive air reaches some height above our heads. But from Tycho's observations, such as I find in Ricciolus's Aimageß, and some late

'experiments of mine own, which I intend to repeat as soon as I can borrow a convenient room, I have good reason to think that he makes them too large a little in the horizon, and their decrease over flow, or themselves much too big in altitudes above thirty degrees. I shall shortly write to Mr Townley to engage him to make some such experiments as I have thought of, and perhaps if mine own succeed I shall in the mean time let you know the event of them. — I wish I could have any ways assisted Mr Sherburne's Catalogue (5) with particulars of Mr Gascoigne's Life, who I believe was the first that applied screws to telescopes. He made with them several curious observations ab anno 1638 to 1642. Such as could be found in his letters I have digested into a small book, with notes of my own to them where they were needful for my own use. But I fear we have lost many more, and that past hopes of recovery.'

In his letter dated at Derby December the 27th, 1673, he writes thus: 'Your's informs me of the reasons why my Ephemeris is not printed, with which I am very well satisfied. But if you have not already done it, I would not have you propose the printing it at the charges of the Royal Society, lest they lose by it, to whom I am so much already obliged for their respects, that I desire not to be made their further debtor. As for Mr Gregory, after I wrote the letter to him with the description of the micrometer in it, I never heard any thing from him, and therefore forbore to write, supposing he would, if desirous to have any correspondence with me, have given me an occasion to continue it by some answer to mine. I desire to know from you what instruments he took into Scotland. If he desire any intercourse of letters, if he please to give me a good occasion, he shall ever find me ready to satisfy and comply with his desires.'

There is another letter of his from Derby, but without any date, in which he writes thus: 'I intend to send you my Hecker, which I hope to finish either this day or to morrow. If that my father's affairs had not pressed me extraordinarily, I had long since finished it, but hope now will be soon enough. I find a table of the equation of natural days in Hugenius's piece seemingly much different from mine, from which it keeps a constant distance of about fourteen minutes of time, which that ingenious person has so contrived, that the equation may always be of the same species. I doubt not but that though it be seemingly different, I shall find it, on further examination, to agree exactly with ours, but not fit to be applied to astronomical calculations, or any experiments but those about his watches; but of these more hereafter. In the mean time, when you find an opportunity to write to me again, I shall be glad to know what Mr Gregory has done in reference to the instruments he was about procuring, and what is the opinion about my alteration of Mr Townley's micrometer.'

weather permitted, and in preparing advertisements of the appulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars, for the following year, which were printed by Mr Oldenburgh in the Philosophical Transactions, and some observations of the planets which Mr Flamsteed imparted to him (d). In 1673 he wrote a small tract in English, concerning the true diameters of all the planets, and their visible diameters when at their nearest distances from the earth, or their greatest removes from it, which I lent, says he, to Mr Newton in 1685, who has made use of it in the fourth book of his Principia. By Mr Oldenburgh's means he exchanged some letters with Monsieur Cassini. In 1673-4, besides his usual task, he wrote an Ephemeris, in which he shewed the falsity of Astrology, and the ignorance of those who pretended to it, and gave a table of the moon's rising and setting carefully calculated, together with the eclipses and appulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars. This fell into the hands of Sir Jonas Moore, for whom, at his request, Mr Flamsteed made a table of the moon's true southings for that year, from which, and Mr Philips's Theory of the Tides, the high-waters being made, he found that they shewed the times of the turn of the tides very near, whereas the ordinary seamens coarse rules would err sometimes two or three hours (e). In the summer of the year 1674, our author passing through London in the way to Cambridge, Sir Jonas Moore informed him that a true account of the tides would be highly acceptable to his Majesty, and offered the help of his servant to make the table, or any other work of the like nature. Upon this they resolved to compose a small Ephemeris for the King's use, which was in good part finished before Midsummer, but not compleated till near Christmas after, by reason of Mr Flamsteed's return to Derby about Michaelmas. Sir Jonas had heard him often discourse of the weather-glass or Barometer, and the certainty of judging of the weather by it. Mr Townley having communicated to our author his observations and the rules deduced from them, Mr Flamsteed set up a barometer at Derby, where, for three years together before this, he had noted, thrice a day commonly, the height of the mercury in the barometer, and of a tinged spirit in the thermometer, and found, considering the different situation, that Mr Townley's remarks agreed very well with his, which were, That upon every sinking of the mercury the air was more moved, and that either wind or rain followed, not the same day always, but one, two, three, or four days after, according to the time and height it had been stationary at. Something of this had been noted by Mr Boyle but not prosecuted, by reason that the daily watching it's motions and noting them, was thought perhaps a trouble which such a trifling subject as the weather did not deserve. But now, at Sir Jonas Moore's request, Mr Flamsteed set up for him a pair of these glasses, and left him materials for making more. It had been long settled fair weather when Mr Flamsteed left London, soon after which the mercury in the glasses began to sink, but no rain followed till the fourth or fifth day after. This made Sir Jonas esteem the glasses and rules very much, of which informing the King and Duke of York, he was ordered to prepare them the next day, which he did, together with Mr Flamsteed's directions for judging of the weather from their rising or falling. Sir Jonas had shewed the King and Duke our author's telescopes and micrometer before, and whenever he acquainted them with any thing which he had gathered from Mr Flamsteed's discourse, he told them frankly from whom he had it, and recommended him to the Nobility and Gentlemen about the Court (f). Mr Flamsteed having taken his degree of Master of Arts at Cambridge, designed to enter into Orders, and to settle in a small living near Derby, which was in the gift of a friend of his father's, and therefore went to Okeham in order to proceed to Peterborough at Christmas, but it happened that there was no ordination there. In the mean time Sir Jonas Moore having been informed of his design, wrote to him to come to London, upon which he returned thither in the beginning of February 1674-5, and was entertained in the house of that Gentleman, who designed an employment for him, wherein Mr Flamsteed might have been assistant to his son, for whom Sir Jonas had procured the reversion of his place, which, though in nothing like his father, he enjoyed for the few years he lived. But Sir Jonas finding Mr Flamsteed persist in his resolution to take Orders, and that his son's temper was such as would make him as uneasy as himself, he did not continue to dissuade him from his intent. March the fourth following he brought Mr Flamsteed a warrant to be the King's Astronomer, with the salary of an hundred pounds per annum, payable out of the Office of Ordnance, to commence from the Michaelmas preceding (g). The Easter following our author was ordained at Ely house by Bishop Gunning, who ever after conversed freely with him, and particularly upon the new Philosophy and opinions, though that Prelate had always maintained the old. August the 10th, 1675, the foundation was laid of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich [E].

While

[E] Of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich Between the time of Mr Flamsteed's coming up to London in February, and the Easter following, an accident happened which hastened, if not occasioned, the building of the Observatory. The Sieur de St Pierre, a Frenchman who had some small skill in Astronomy, and made an interest with the Duchefs of Portsmouth, proposed no less than the discovery of the longitude, and procured a kind of commission from King Charles the Second to the Lord Brouncker, Dr Seth Ward Bishop of Sarum, Dr Christopher Wren, Sir Charles Scarborough, Sir Jonas Moore, Col. Titus, Dr Pell, Sir Robert Murray, Mr Hook, and some other ingenious persons about the town and Court, to receive his proposals, with power to elect and receive into their numbers any other skilful persons, and to give the King

While it was building Mr Flamsteed resided at the place last mentioned, his quadrant and telescopes being kept in the Queen's house; there he observed with them the appulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars. In 1681 his DOCTRINE OF THE SPHERE [F] was

was

King an account of them, with their opinion. Sir Jonas Moore carried Mr Flamsteed to one of their meetings, where he was chosen into their number. The Frenchman's proposals were then read, which were, I. To have the year and day of the observations. II. The height of two stars, and on which side of the meridian they appeared. III. The height of the moon's two limbs. IV. The height of the pole. All of them to degrees and minutes. It was easy to perceive from these demands, that the Sieur de St Pierre knew not that the best Lunar Tables differed from the heavens, and that therefore his demands were not sufficient for determining the longitude of the place where such observations were or should be made, from that to which the Lunar Tables were fitted. This Mr Flamsteed immediately represented to the company. But they, considering the interest of his patroness at Court, desired to have the Sieur de St Pierre furnished according to his demands. Mr Flamsteed undertook it, and having gained the moon's true place by observations made at Derby, Feb. 23, 1672, and November 12, 1673, gave him observations such as he demanded. The Sieur de St Pierre did not think that they could have been given him, but answered that they were feigned. Mr Flamsteed delivered them to Dr Pell Feb. 19, 1674-5, who returning him his answer some time after, Mr Flamsteed wrote a letter in English to the Commissioners, and another in Latin to the Sieur de St Pierre, to assure him that they were not feigned, and to shew that if they had been so, yet if we had Astronomical Tables which would give us the true places of the fixed stars, and moon's true places, both in longitude and latitude nearer than to half a minute, we might hope to find the longitude of places by lunar observations, but not by such as he demanded; but that we were so far from having the places of the fixed stars true, that the Tychoic Catalogues often erred ten minutes or more; that they were uncertain to three or four minutes, by reason that Tycho affirmed a faulty obliquity of the ecliptic, and had employed only plain sights in his observations; that the best Lunar Tables differed  $\frac{1}{4}$  if not  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a degree from the Heavens; and, lastly, that he might have learned better methods than he proposed from his countryman Morinus, whom it was proper to consult before he made any more demands of this nature. Mr Flamsteed heard no more of the Sieur de St Pierre after this, but was informed that his letters being shewn King Charles the Second, he was startled at the assertion of the places of the fixed stars being false in the Catalogues, and said with some vehemence, That he must have them anew observed, examined, and corrected, for the use of his seamen. And further, when it was urged to him how necessary it was to have a good stock of observations taken for correcting the motions of the moon and planets, with the same earnestness he declared, That he must have it done; and being asked, Who could or should do it? replied, The person that informs you of them. Upon this Mr Flamsteed was appointed, with the allowance abovementioned, and assurances, at the same time, of such further additions as should be found requisite for carrying on the work. The next point to be thought of, was a place to fix in. Several were proposed, as Hyde Park and Chelsea College. Mr Flamsteed went to view the ruins of the latter, and judged it might serve the purpose, and the better because it was near the Court. Sir Jonas Moore enclined to Hyde Park; but Dr Christopher Wren mentioning Greenwich, it was resolved on. The King allowed five hundred pounds in money, with bricks from Tilbury Fort, where there was a spare stock, and some wood, iron, and lead, from a gatehouse demolished in the Tower, and promised to grant what more should be necessary.

[F] His Doctrine of the Sphere.] In the preface he observes, that, in this treatise, he has shewn how all the diurnal appearances of the sun and stars are naturally made, and how, laying aside all those old projections of the sphere which falsely suppose the earth's stability, they may be represented, and the problems concerning them answered, by new ones grounded on that true system of the world, which supposes the annual and diurnal motions of the earth, proposed at first by Pythagoras, asserted by Copernicus, demonstrated by Kepler, and, as most agreeable to reason and experience, approved and entertained by the ablest Astronomers of our times. He tells us, that, in the second part, he has taught how to find within what space of the earth the solar eclipse is visible, and where the principal phases appear by calculation, as also how all the requisites of the same eclipse may be found for any given place, without the calculation of parallaxes; which useful invention, says he, having never appeared in publick before, I find myself obliged to give the following account of it's original, that I may not hereafter be accused of injustice to two of my singular good friends, the admirably ingenious Sir Christopher Wren, Master Surveyor of his Majesty's buildings, and our southern Tycho, Mr Edmund Halley. It was in the winter of the year 1676, that Mr Flamsteed lighted upon this method. The autumn before some spots had appeared in the sun, and then he was observing a compact one that made more than two entire revolutions before it was wholly extinct. Examining his observations to find the reason of their different appearances, he collected from them that the spots adhered to the superficies, and that they were carried round his centre once in twenty-five days and a quarter, the northern half of that axis on which this revolution was performed being inclined about eight degrees to the plane of the ecliptic, between the twelfth and eighteenth degrees of Virgo, which being concluded, he found that allowing what alterations must necessarily happen in their appearances by reason of the earth's diurnal progress in her orbit, all his observations would be represented as nearly as he could expect. And now having seen how the poles, axis, equator, and parallels in the sun, altered their appearances to the eye placed on the earth, according as she changed her place in her orbit, and 'being ill of the stone, that he might have some thing to think of besides his pains,' he set himself to consider how the axis of the earth, and the several paths and parallels imagined on it, would appear from the sun, and how the diurnal phenomena would be represented by an orthographical projection of our globe on a plane, standing at right angles to the ecliptic, and the line connecting the centers of the sun and earth. Here he found what he has delivered in the first section of his treatise of the Doctrine of the Sphere, viz. how the parallaxes of altitude, longitude, and latitude, were made and given by construction; and upon a little farther consideration, how the times of any appearance of a solar eclipse, the part then darkened, with the inclination of the cusps, might be determined without any calculation of them, by the help of projection. Much pleased with this discovery, he immediately constructed an eclipse which he had observed at Derby, October 25, 1668, and, with a brief description of the method, transmitted it to his kind friend and patron Sir Jonas Moore, by whom it was communicated to the Royal Society at one of their meetings. It happened that Sir Christopher Wren was there present, who having viewed the figure only, told Sir Jonas, that himself had known the same method sixteen years before, and, to assure him of it, sent him soon after a like projection neatly drawn on pastboard, and fitted with several ingenious contrivances of numbers and scales, for the construction of solar eclipses in our latitude. This Sir Jonas brought to Mr Flamsteed, then labouring under some distempers, to Greenwich, whereby the latter was satisfied, that the honour of the first discovery of this useful invention was absolutely due to Sir Christopher Wren, whom, of all mortals, he believed to have been the first who knew how to find the times of the beginning, middle, digits then darkened, inclination of the cusps at any phasis, and end of a solar eclipse, without the calculation of parallaxes. In some discourse which our author had with Mr Halley, before he went to observe the southern constellations at St Helena, the latter mentioned the construction of eclipses (6) as possible, but, out of a tender affection, says Mr Flamsteed, to his own in-

was published in a posthumous work of Sir Jonas Moore (b). We may expect a new and accurate edition of this treatise of Mr Flamsteed, with a great many alterations and additions by him, from the very ingenious Mr James Hodgson, F. R. S. About the year 1684 he was presented to the living of Burfrow near Blechingley in Surry (i), which he enjoyed during his life. It appears from hence that he was but very moderately provided for, and yet it seems to have contented him, for notwithstanding he had a warm and aspiring mind, yet this discovered itself only in the pursuit of knowledge, which, like all other violent passions, occupied him in a manner entirely, and, by withdrawing his thoughts from ordinary considerations, enabled him to give the publick so many, and those such incontestible, marks of true genius. As these raised him to the notice of the world, and recommended him to the royal favour and protection; so they likewise procured him the friendship and confidence of some of the greatest persons in point of science this nation could boast, such as the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton, who corresponded with him from 1680 to 1699; Dr Edmund Halley, William Molyneux of Dublin, Esq; (k), Dr John Wallis, and several others; and of the celebrated M. Cassini, for which indeed he was fitted by nature, as being himself very communicative, and blessed with so much candour and justice, that none of his correspondents ran the least hazard from their making him acquainted with their discoveries. He was also exceedingly ready to give any assistance in his power for facilitating the studies of his friends, and took as much pleasure in contributing to the reputation of others, as some do in lessening the fame of their rivals that they may exalt their own. He shewed the same indefatigable assiduity in the prosecution of his labours for the improvement of Astronomy after this moderate provision was made for him—that he did before, the Philosophical Transactions affording such clear evidences of his activity and diligence, as well as of his penetration and exactness, as must fully satisfy any candid enquirer of the truth of this assertion [G]. He spent the latter, as he had

ventions, or for what other reason I know not, he was pleased to conceal his method both from me, who then thought it scarce possible, and for ought I can understand from all others. Nor is it to be wondered at, that three of us should make this discovery severally, and without any intimation of the method from each other. For to me it seems very unlikely, that any one who admits the motion of the earth, and apprehends how the moon passing between the sun and it, eclipses some part of him to all those people who lie under its passage should ever miss of it. But we might rather admire, had I not intimated the reason of it in the fifth section of the second part, that the acute wit of the sagacious Kepler should overlook it, when he had discovered the method of finding by calculation, within what spaces on our globe the solar eclipse is bounded, and where the principal phases of it would appear. Mr Flamsteed then tells us, that he had almost finished what he had here delivered concerning the construction of eclipses, when it was intimated to him by his ingenious friend Mr Perkins, that there was little extant in the English tongue concerning the general method of calculation above mentioned, and that therefore he might do well to explain it. He considered then, that this might be performed more easily than is taught by the first famous inventor, and without his nonagesimary table. Waving therefore his first intent, which was not to engage himself in any thing which had been expressly handled by others before him, he thought it necessary to undertake this further task, and accordingly wrote the precepts relating to that subject after, tho' for method's sake they are inserted before the construction of the solar eclipse. He observes likewise that in 1670, he first published predictions of the moon's appulses to fixed stars, which he continued eight years after successively, first in the Philosophical Transactions, after in the royal Almanack, proposing them as an useful and the most practicable expedient for finding the longitude or difference of meridians betwixt any two places, by reason both of their frequency, and that a single person might obtain whatever is required in observations of them, with a small apparatus of instruments. But the calculation of parallaxes required in their application caused them to be less regarded than he hoped they would have been. He has therefore shewn how this tedious labour may be avoided, and the occultation or emersion of a star from the moon, or time of its visible conjunction with the center and distance, then from her next limb, may be found by construction as the phases of a solar eclipse, and the difference of meridians betwixt two distant places by observations of the same appulse made at each. And now, says he, the main difficulty being removed, I would again recommend this method to the study and practice of the ingenious Astronomer and Navigator.

[G] Of the truth of this assertion. We find before the close of the year 1675, a large and accurate account of a lunar eclipse, December the twenty first, observed by our author, and communicated by him to Sir Jonas Moore in a letter from Greenwich, December the 24th (7). This paper, written in Latin, being communicated to the famous Signior Cassini, he sent over also his observations, with some remarks upon those of Mr Flamsteed; in which he pays very high complements to that gentleman, in respect as well to his diligence and accuracy, as to his great skill and learning (8). Upon this Mr Flamsteed wrote him a short letter, in which are contained some very curious celestial observations. Our author published likewise a very copious and clear account of the eclipse of the sun, June the twenty third, 1676, to which he added also the account sent him by Mr Townley and Mr Halton, in the succeeding months of July and August. Himself at Greenwich, and Dr Edmund Halley at Oxford, observed some spots in the sun very carefully, and published both their observations (9). On the twenty first of August the same year he observed, and published, an occultation of the planet Mars by the Moon, for the benefit of such as were desirous of settling thereby the difference of meridians (10). May the 18th, 1677, he observed a comet very carefully, of which he gave an account by a letter to Mr Oldenburgh. Upon the interruption of the Philosophical Transactions, he sent a most accurate account of his observation of an eclipse of the moon, August the eighteenth, 1681, at Greenwich to Dr Hook (11), to whom he likewise communicated some observations upon tides, the practical knowledge of which with any tolerable degree of accuracy we owe entirely to his labours, as appears from the following account annexed to his tide table for the year 1683 (12). 'Sir, considering how much the river of Thames is frequented by shipping, and how long it has been the chief place of commerce in these parts of the world, one would think our seamens accounts of its tides should be very exact, and their opinions concerning them rational; whereas if they be enquired into, nothing will be found more erroneous and idle.

'For they taking notice that the high waters at, and near, the new and full moons, run an hour and a half or two points of the compass longer than at the quarters, conclude generally that 'tis the inconstancy of the winds that causes it, never considering how improbable it is that so inconstant and changeable a cause, should effect so constant an inequality.

had done the former, part of his life, in promoting true and useful knowledge, by the constant exercise of his own great abilities, and by taking all possible methods to obtain whatever lights the endeavours of others might afford him. In the latter end of the month of December, 1719, he was seized with a strangury, which brought him to his end on the last day of the same month and year (1). He left a widow behind him by whom he had no children. His Historia Cælestis Britannica was published at London in 1725, in three volumes folio, and dedicated to the King, by his widow Mrs Margaret Flamsteed and Mr James Hodgson; great part of this work was printed off before his death, and the rest compleated, except the Prolegomena prefixed to the third volume. In the Preface we are informed, that, in 1704, he having communicated by a friend an account of his collection of observations to the Royal Society, they were so highly pleased with it, that

(1) Historical Register, Vol. V. in the Diary,

‘ In which opinion the tide tables of our Almanacks have contributed much to confirm them, for therein the moon’s age is got by the epacts, thence the time of her southing by the allowance of forty eight minutes of time for every day’s age, as if her diurnal motions and returns to the meridian were altogether equable, than which nothing is more false; and then the time of the high water at London Bridge is made by adding three hours to the time of her southing so got, as if there were the same constant space of time betwixt the moon’s southing and the high waters, which by this means are often made two hours different from truth and experience.

‘ To amend this fault, some of the more skilful have calculated the times of the moon’s southings exactly, and then made their tide tables by adding three hours constantly to them, by which means they agreed nearer with experience at the spring tides, or near the new and full moon, yet they erred not much less than by the old way of account they would have done at the quarters or in the neap tides, the inequality of the tides being above double to the error committed in finding the moon’s southings by her age.

‘ Mr Booker was the first that gave any directions for the amendment of this reckoning, and that was only to subtract an hour from the times in his tide table about the first and last quarters of the moon, because the neap tides did not flow so long as the springs by one point of the compass. But Mr Henry Phillips, a person well known by his works of navigation, was certainly the first that brought the inequality to a rule, whose theory of the tides, and a table grounded on it for the year 1668, was printed in Mr Oldenburgh’s Philosophical Transactions for the month of April that year, numb. 34. which was found much more conformable to experience than was expected.

‘ Having frequent occasion to pass betwixt London and Greenwich by water some two years ago, I took notice that the tides seldom held out so long as Mr Phillips’s calculation gave them; and therefore in the months of October and November, I began to observe them more diligently, and procured them to be carefully noted by an ingenious friend at Tower wharf. From these observations I raised a correction of Mr Phillips’s numbers, and caused a tide table to be made agreeable to it, which was printed by Mr Hook in his Philosophical Collections numb. 4.

‘ But the weather then proving stormy and unseasonable, I durst not rely on those observations nor that correction, and therefore in the spring and summer months following of the year 1682, I set to observe them again; and with the help of my friends and servants, I noted the times of above eighty high waters at Tower-wharf and Greenwich, whereby I found that the greatest and least differences betwixt the moon’s true southing and the high waters, were not as Mr Phillips had placed them at the full or new and quarter moons, but the greatest nearer to the neaps, the least to the highest spring tides. I found also that the inequality was not the same that he had made of it, and after a trial or two, that I could represent and answer above six hundred of these observations, with less than one quarter of an hour’s difference, which, considering how difficult it is to determine the time of an high water exactly, I cannot but esteem a very good agreement.

‘ time of that one high water which next follows the moon’s southing, but in this new table I have given the times of both; concerning which I desire it may be noted, that when by reason of great droughts in summer, or extreme frosts in winter, the springs are low, and the fresh waters less than usual, the tides may hold up longer than the times noted in the table; as also when strong north-westerly or northerly winds blow, which bring in an extraordinary flood from the northern seas and keep it up longer than other times.

‘ So, on the contrary, when the winds blow hard on the opposite points of the compass, or when we have much rain and great freshes, the tides hold out not so long as the times shewed in the table, the freshes over-powering and checking them sooner. Yet have I never found that the differences betwixt the calculated and observed high waters have much exceeded half an hour; most commonly they are scarce half so much.

‘ This table may be reduced, and made to serve for any other port of his Majesty’s dominions or neighbouring countries, by only subtracting or adding so much time to the high water noted in it, as the high water observed in the said place, shall be found to precede or follow the time of the high water the same day herein noted. For by such accounts as I have met with and received of the tides in remote places, I find there is every where about England the same difference betwixt the spring and neap tides, that is here observed in the river of Thames.

‘ I could easily have made and given you a table for this reduction, if I durst have relied on the account our mariners give of the tides in other ports; but I find their opinions different, except where they have copied from one another in their Kalendars, by reason of the aforementioned difference betwixt the times of the moon’s southings and the true high waters, for which reason I forbear it till further experience shall have informed us better.

He continued to publish tables of the like nature, with continual improvements for many years together. We have chosen this familiar instance, that every reader might have it in his power to judge of the nature of Mr Flamsteed’s enquiries, and of the value of his improvements. He took the same method in respect to things of a superior nature, his discoveries end always at something useful; and when he had once found errors in the common schemes of computation, he never left examining, searching, and comparing, till he found the source of the error, and was able to point out the surest and speediest way of investigating the truth.

It would be tedious and trifling to give the heads of almost numberless papers, addressed by our author himself to the Secretaries of the Royal Society, or communicated to them by him from others. Let it suffice that through a long course of years Mr Flamsteed was never deficient in sending his excellent remarks, which were of greater use in promoting the progress of that science to which he applied, than the compass of a note will afford us by any means the power of describing; so that the goodness of his royal master in erecting that post he so worthily filled, and his choice of so able, so indefatigable, and so communicative, a man to discharge it, were equally conspicuous. How far he pushed his enquiries, and to what a bulk his learned labours swelled by degrees, the reader will learn in the next note.

[H] And

that they recommended the work to his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, who ordered Francis Roberts, Esq; Sir Christopher Wren, Sir Isaac Newton, Dr David Gregory, and Dr John Arbuthnot, to inspect Mr Flamsteed's papers, and accordingly a report was made in their favour. Upon this, ninety-seven sheets were printed at the Prince's expence before his death, after which the remainder was published at the charge of our author and his executors, and will prove a noble and lasting monument to his memory <sup>(m)</sup> [H]. How great his reputation was, even in his life-time, appears from what has been already said, and may be rendered still more so, from the testimony of many eminent persons, of which some notice will be taken at the bottom of the page <sup>(n)</sup> [I].

<sup>(m)</sup> It is apparent from hence, that this excellent Mathematician never remitted of his industry so long as he had strength.

[H] And will prove a noble and lasting monument to his memory.] The first volume contains the observations of Mr William Gascoigne, the first inventor of the way of measuring angles in a telescope by the help of screws, and the first who applied telescopic sights to astronomical instruments taken at Middleton near Leeds in Yorkshire, betwixt the years 1638, and 1643, collected from his letters to Mr Crabtree, with some of Mr Crabtree's observations of the same year; as also observations of the sun's and moon's diameters, configurations, and elongations of Jupiter's satellites from him, small distances of fixed stars, with appulses of the moon and planets to them, observed with a telescope and micrometer at Derby by Mr Flamsteed, betwixt the years 1670, and 1675, with the larger intermutual distances of fixed stars, and of the planets from them; eclipses of the sun, moon, and Jupiter's satellites, spots on the sun, comets, and refractions, taken with a sextant of near seven foot Radius, a voluble quadrant, and the abovementioned instruments, betwixt the years 1675 and 1689, at the Royal Observatory; ranked under proper heads; with the places of the Moon, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, deduced from the observations; and also necessary tables to be used with them. The second volume contains his observations made with a mural arch of near seven foot Radius, and 140 degrees, on the limb of the meridional zenith, distances of the fixed stars, sun, moon, and other planets, with the time of their transits over the meridian; together with observations of the sun's and moon's diameters, eclipses of the sun, moon, and Jupiter's satellites, variations of the compass, from 1689, to the end of the year 1719, &c. tables shewing how to render the calculation of the stars and planets places, from the observations, easy and expeditious; to which are added the places of the moon (at the oppositions, quadratures, and on her limits, &c.) and the places of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, derived from the abovementioned observations. The third volume contains a catalogue of the right ascensions, distances from the pole, longitudes and magnitudes, of near three thousand fixed stars, with variations of their right ascensions and distances from the pole, whilst they change their longitudes one degree, whereby the right ascensions and distances from the pole of the stars and planets being given, their longitudes and latitudes may be found by inspection. To this volume is prefixed a very large preface, containing an account of all the astronomical observations made before his own time, with a description of the instruments made use of, as also an account of his own observations and instruments, together with a new Latin version of Ptolomy's catalogue of 1026 fixed stars, from the Greek and Uleg-beigs places annexed on the Latin page, with the corrections, small catalogues of the Arabs, Tycho Brahe's of about 780 fixed stars in a proper order, the Landgrave of Hesse's of 386, Hevelius's of 1534, in a proper order; a catalogue of some of the southern fixed stars not visible in our hemisphere, reduced to right ascension, distance from the pole, longitude and latitude, with variations of right ascensions and distances from the pole, calculated from observations made by Dr Halley at St Helena, and Mr Flamsteed's stars places, and fitted to the year 1726.

[I] At the bottom of the page.] The merit of Mr Flamsteed, as an Astronomer, would be but very indifferently supported by producing general characters of him from historical or biographical writers, little known or distinguished in the world for their skill in that science: we will therefore present the reader with testimonies of another kind, that is, from such as were themselves eminent for their knowledge in Astronomy, who could not therefore be deceived, and who out of regard to their own reputation would never attempt to deceive others. Mr Stephen Gray in a letter of his dated from Canterbury, May the fifth 1701, describing a very ingenious instrument invented by him for drawing a true meridian line by the pole star (13), and also for finding the hour of the day or night by the same, has the following passage. 'That most learned, accurate, and judicious Astronomer, Mr John Flamsteed, Mat. Reg. and F. R. S. has lately discovered that there is a parallax of the earth's annual orbit at the pole star, of about forty or forty five seconds, whereby the diameter of the star's parallel is greater in June than in December, by about 1 minute 2 seconds, which he has evinced from seven years successive observations, whereby the earth's motion is indubitably demonstrated, as appears from his learned letter to Dr Wallis on that subject. Now if on the edge of this index there be drawn a scale of degrees, minutes, and seconds, to the Radius of the glass, we shall not only have a very accurate instrument for the hour, but be furnished with one whereby we shall see the truth of the earth's motion confirmed by the access and recess of our star, towards and from the pole, according to the earth's place in the ecliptick, as that learned person abovementioned has discovered, and that not only when the star transits the meridian, but in clear air at any time of the day, one shall likewise observe that annual increase of the pole star's declination caused by the procession of the equinox. My own observations assure me, that the pole star may be seen in the day time with a telescope of sixteen foot, for with one of this length I saw that star on the 26th of April, this present year 1701, from four o' clock in the morning till seven, and could have seen it longer had not clouds interposed; and again the first of May, I did not look for the star till the sun had been up more than half an hour, viz. at five in the morning, yet I soon found it and saw it afterwards as oft as I pleased, till half an hour after nine the same morning; so that I doubt not this star may be seen in a clear day throughout the whole year.' The very learned Dr William Wotton (14), who was a person of universal knowledge, produces the labours and discoveries of Mr Flamsteed to prove, that the antient Astronomy was not at all comparable to the modern; or, which is the same thing, that modern Astronomers have far surpassed the antients in point of accuracy, as well as extensiveness in their observations. 'Galileo Galilei, says he, was the first who discovered four planets moving constantly round Jupiter, from thence usually called his satellites, which afterwards were observed to have a constant, regular, and periodical motion. This motion is now so exactly known, that Mr Flamsteed, who is one of the most accurate observers that ever was, has been able to calculate tables of the eclipses of the several satellites, according to which, Astronomers in different quarters of the world, having notice of the precise time when to look for them, have found them to answer to his predictions, and published their observations accordingly. This is an effectual answer to all that rhapsody which Stubbe has collected in his brutal answer to Mr Glanville's Plus ultra, about the uncertainty of all observations made by telescopes; since it is impossible to calculate the duration of any motion justly, by fallacious and uncertain methods. By the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, longitudes would soon be exactly determined, if tubes of any length could be managed at sea.' That ingenious and intelligent Mathematician, William Molyneux, Esq; of Dublin, gives our author a very high character and mentions several testimonies of his friendship. Dr Edmund Halley, in a parallel drawn by him, (14) Reflexions upon Ancient and Modern Learning, p. 175.

He was succeeded in his post of Astronomer Royal by the late learned and ingenious Dr Edmund Halley, though the Reverend Mr William Whiston, as he has informed us, made some application during the vacancy, in which, though not successful, he was not much disappointed (o). There has been, while this article was in the press, a short pamphlet of our author's published (p), being indeed no more than the copy of a letter to a gentleman at Turin in Piedmont, dated April 10, 1693, in relation to the dreadful earthquakes that had done so much mischief the year before in Jamaica and Sicily, and had been, though but slightly, felt here. Our author does not seem to have employed much time in the consideration of this difficult subject; he collects from these circumstances, viz. That earthquakes always happen in calm seasons; that a small hollow noise in the air precedes them; that they are felt at sea as well as on shore; that sometimes they shake a whole country at once, sometimes only a very small part, and that gradually; that they are frequently attended with eruptions; that the upper stories of houses are more affected than the lower; and that some people are made sick by the shock: that most of them are really occasioned by some tremor or explosion in our atmosphere, and he endeavours to shew how this will answer all the phenomena beforementioned. But in the end he admits, that some earthquakes may, indeed must, happen, from nitro-sulphureous vapours taking fire in the earth, being induced thereto from the consideration of what happened in Jamaica, Sicily, and other places. He expresses a very strong reluctance to the seeing this little work of his in print, for fear of cavils and disputes, which he seems to have abhorred as much as any man could, and which, in the present case, he took all imaginable pains to prevent. It had in all probability been buried in obscurity, but for the late melancholy accidents, which brought it first to the Bookseller's knowledge, and made it not improbable that it might be also acceptable to the publick. There are certainly in it some very just hints and useful observations, but it is too short, and too hastily written, considering the weight of the argument, to give that full satisfaction to an inquisitive and judicious reader, which the name of so great a man might lead him to expect. It may be very serviceable however to such as turn their thoughts this way, as it gives a fair and full instance of the true method of collecting the capital heads of an enquiry, that may conduct us in discovering, him, and who could draw it better? between the ancient Astronomers and the moderns discourses thus. ' Now in this science to compare the antients with the moderns, and so make a parallel as just as may be, I oppose the noble Tycho Brahe, or Hevelius, to Hipparchus, and John Kepler to Claudius Ptolemy, and I suppose no one acquainted with the stars will doubt, that the catalogue of the fixed stars made by Tycho Brahe above C years since, does beyond competition far excel that of Hipparchus, being commonly true to a minute or two, when the other many times fails half a degree both in longitude and latitude; and this is the fairlier carried, for that it was as easy for Hipparchus to observe the fixed stars, as for Tycho or Hevelius, had he made use of the same industry and instruments, the telescope, wherewith we now observe to the utmost possible nicety, being equally unknown to Tycho, as to Hipparchus, and not used by Hevelius. But what may justly be expected from Monsieur Cassini, and Mr Flamsteed in this matter, does yet further advance in preciseness as not capable to err half a minute, though made with instruments of the production of Gresham.' We are likewise told by that judicious Astronomer, Dr John Keil (15), ' That Mr Flamsteed, with indefatigable pains for more than forty years, watched the motions of the stars, and has given us innumerable observations of the sun, moon, and planets, which he made with very large instruments exactly divided by most exquisite art, and fitted with telescopical sights. Whence we are to rely more on the observations he hath made, than on those that went before him, who made their observations with the naked eye without the assistance of telescopes. The said Mr Flamsteed has likewise composed the British catalogue of the fixed stars, containing about three thousand stars, which is twice the number that are in the catalogue of Hevelius, to each of which he has annexed its longitude, latitude, right ascension, and distance from the pole, together with the variation of right ascension and declination, while the longitude increases a degree. This catalogue, together with most of his observations, is printed on a fine paper and character, at the expences (16), of the late Prince George of Denmark.' To all these authorities we will presume to add, that of a foreign writer of great eminence, M. Sigorne, Member of the Sorbonne, and Professor of Philosophy in the University of Paris, who mentions the approbation of Mr Flamsteed (17), as the very seal of the Newtonian Philosophy, by which with respect to the system of the heavens, or rather of the heavenly bodies, it came to be esteemed certain and beyond all dispute. Quant aux planettes principales, dit il, l'attraction seule du soleil doit les assujettir à decrire des ellipses, &c. that is, ' With respect to the primary planets, the attraction of the sun only is sufficient to oblige them to describe ellipses, but as they ought also to attract each other, there was some room to apprehend that the regularity of their motion might be thereby somewhat disturbed. We ought, however, to take Sir Isaac Newton's word upon this head, since we shall presently see from what he has done, that there is no reason to be in pain upon this account; according to his observation, bodies attract each other in a direct proportion of the quantities of matter they contain, and the converse proportion of the squares of their distances, and in this proportion it is, that the planets affect each other. Now if the Newtonian Philosophy be true, there is a certain method of knowing the quantity of matter in the planets, and consequently of calculating the force of their impressions; such a calculation being made, it appears that Mars, our Earth, Venus, and Mercury, attract each other so little, in proportion to the force with which they are attracted by the sun, that the disorder arising from thence must be altogether imperceptible in many revolutions; and hence there appears a wonderful agreement between the principles of this philosophy and the phenomena. But this agreement appears still more clearly in what happens, with respect to Jupiter and to Saturn, the quantity of matter in Jupiter is so great, that the calculation demonstrates the effects of its attraction upon Saturn, ought to be very sensible in the time of their conjunction. Sir Isaac Newton predicted this to the Astronomers, Flamsteed and Halley, but the former of these great men gave no credit at all to that prediction. However, the conjunction of those two planets approaching, this singular observation was made for the first time, and the consequence was, that the calculation was exactly verified. This procured the Newtonian Philosophy the approbation of so great an Astronomer as Flamsteed, indeed it would have been very difficult for him to have denied it.' We might add much more of the same kind, kind, but the design of this note being fully answered, by our having shewn how high the fame of Mr Fleetwood has risen, amongst the best judges both at home and abroad, we shall conclude.

FLEETWOOD (WILLIAM) a very eminent Lawyer, and Recorder of the city of London in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the son of Robert Fleetwood, who was the third son of William Fleetwood of Hesketh in the county palatine of Lancaster, Esq; and consequently descended of a very antient and worthy family (a). He had a liberal education, and was for some time a member of the university of Oxford, but whether of Brazen-Nose-college or of Broadgate-hall, is a point not now to be certainly determined; but of one of those two learned bodies he was (b). There being no intention of breeding him to Divinity, Civil Law, or Physick, he left the university without a degree, and went to London, where he was entered of the Middle-Temple (c), and having very quick natural parts, and, which rarely happens in the same person, wonderful diligence and application, he became in a short time a very distinguished man in his profession (d). In 1562 he was elected Summer-Reader of that house, and the very next year chose again; but however did not read (e), which it may be presumed was the reason, that, in 1568, he was elected Double Reader in Lent (f). His reputation was far from being confined to the Inns of Court, for it having been thought necessary to appoint Commissioners in the nature of a Royal Visitation in the dioceses of Oxford, Lincoln, Peterborough, Coventry and Lichfield, Mr Fleetwood was of that number (g). In 1569 he became Recorder of London, which was then held an employment of great credit and importance. It does not appear whether his interest with the Earl of Leicester procured him that place or not, but it is very certain that he was considered as a person entirely addicted to that Nobleman's service, and consequently one, who, in any case of necessity, could never want protection at Court (h). It was a very wise maxim in those times, That every great transaction should have a colour of law, and whenever any extraordinary measure was taken, the motives to it were so far from being kept secret, that the Queen took care that the whole world should be made acquainted with it, to prevent false rumours from gaining ground. Thus, in 1571, upon the commitment of the Duke of Norfolk for treasonable practices, the Recorder, Fleetwood, was directed to repair to the Guild-Hall (i), and there to declare in a proper manner to the Lord Mayor, his brethren the Aldermen, and the Commons, the nature of this conspiracy, and the danger to which the Queen and her government had been exposed, which he accordingly did, and acquitted himself with great reputation [A]. As in this, so in every thing else, he was extremely

We have more than once, had occasion to speak of the heavy misfortunes and untimely death, of this Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, whose great-grandfather was slain in Bosworth field, whose grandfather was condemned for high-treason, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and remained a prisoner under that sentence, during the whole reign of Edward the Sixth, and whose father, the learned and witty Earl of Surry ended his days, as himself did, upon a scaffold (1). This noble person, by a contrivance of the Earl of Leicester's, was, in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, drawn into a design of marrying the Queen of Scots, to which Leicester pretended, that he would obtain Queen Elizabeth's consent; instead of which he revealed to her all he knew, which brought disgrace, suspicion, and imprisonment upon the Duke of Norfolk. He was released out of the Tower in 1570, chiefly by the interest of Sir William Cecil, who appears to have been his true friend, by the advice he gave him to marry as soon as possible, if he would avoid taking up his lodgings there again (2). The Duke neglected this caution, was the very next year drawn into new intrigues, in the management of which, he received several letters and papers from Mary Queen of Scots, which, when he had perused, he delivered to Mr Higford with orders to burn them, but instead of doing that, he hid them under a mat in the Duke's bed-chamber; when something of these matters was disclosed, the Duke again put under an arrest, and Higford cast into prison, he confessed all he knew, and amongst the rest where the papers were to be found, amongst which was a draught of the whole design, transcribed from one in the Queen of Scots's own handwriting; and also informed them that Barker, one of the Duke's servants, was privy to the delivery of the money to Brown, who was to have carried it into Scotland, and from whom it was pretended this dis-

very originally came. When the council had received this draught, the letters abovementioned, and others sent by the Pope, and when Barker being apprehended had confessed every particular, Sir Ralph Sadler was ordered to keep a strong guard upon the Duke's house at London, formerly belonging to the Carthusian Friars (3). The third day after the Duke himself was examined, and not knowing what his servants had confessed, but supposing the draught with the letters were burnt, he stiffly denied all which they had confessed. Hereupon within a day or two, namely the seventh of September, he was, to the great grief of the people, carried back to the Tower of London, from whence the year before he was released, by Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Henry Nevill, and Doctor Wilson. Afterwards Banister, the Duke's Counsellor at Law, the Earl's of Arundel and Southampton, the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, and Thomas his brother, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powel, Goodier, and others, were clapt in prison, who every one of them in hopes of pardon, confessed what they knew. 'As soon, says Camden, as the Council produced these mens confessions, the Queen of Scots and Rofs's letters, with the draught, to the Duke's face, he was strangely confounded. But upon sight of the draught, and the letters, which he supposed to have been burnt, he was amazed, and at last brake forth into these words; I am betrayed and undone by my confidents, not knowing how to distrust them, tho' diffidence is the very essence of wisdom (4). However, he humbly prayed the Council to intercede for him to the Queen, promising to conceal nothing he knew, and solemnly protesting, that he had never consented to any thing, which might prejudice the Queen, or injure the realm, but had declared heartily against the plots they laid for surprising the Queen, for seizing upon the Tower of London, and setting the Queen of Scots at liberty, and that he never thought of calling extreamly vigilant and active, looking upon himself as obliged in his office of a Minister of Justice, not only to do what he was commanded, or what appeared requisite for the service of the State, but to do it with alacrity and spirit, which without all doubt recommended him highly to the Statesmen of those times, but at the same time did not prevent his meeting some very untoward rewards for such seasonable and important services (k). As for instance; in the year 1576, being informed that there was a great resort of some of the Queen's subjects to a certain Popish chapel, kept in the house of one who was reputed to be a foreign Minister, he resolved, in conjunction with the two Sheriffs and proper assistance, to go thither, thinking it a reproach to the city of London that the laws for preventing such assemblies should be therein openly broken, and this with the utmost impunity. He accordingly executed his purpose, not without communicating it, as has been thought, to some of the great Ministers of State, without whose approbation he seldom did any thing. But however that might be, the person who kept this house, and who stiled himself an Ambassador from Portugal, complained to the Queen of this act of violence, in direct breach, as he affirmed, of the law of nations; and it so falling out, that a most advantageous treaty of commerce being just concluded with the Court of Portugal, the negotiation of which had been entrusted with this Minister, it was by the Queen therefore held necessary that he should have satisfaction given him, and that in such a manner as might be acceptable to his Court. Upon this motive both the Sheriffs and Recorder were arrested, brought before the Privy-Council, remanded, and a Committee appointed to examine into the whole affair; by this Committee, or rather by Postscript to the Committee's Order written by the Lord Treasurer, the Recorder was directed to draw up a state of his own case, his adversary having represented to the Lords, that his house was first invested, and then entered by force of arms, several persons coming in with their swords drawn, and not only himself insulted and his servants maltreated, but his Lady and her women frightened almost out of their wits (l). Mr Fleetwood, upon the signification of their Lordships pleasure, speedily returned them such a paper, which, for it's singularity, the reader will find at the bottom of the page [B]. But notwithstanding this

' the Queen of Scots rebellious subjects. The same ' day he was examined upon fifty articles, or there' abouts, and concealed nothing. Afterwards, the ' whole proceeding was reported in the Star-Chamber,
' in a full assembly of the nobility, the Lord Mayor
' and Aldermen of the City of London being present,
' and after that to all the citizens at the Guildhall,
' by William Fleetwood their Recorder.' This speech, as we shall see hereafter (s), was, for the further satisfaction of the publick, printed by the direction of those for whose service it was delivered.

[B] At the bottom of the page.] This narrative of Mr Fleetwood's, bears date November the 9th 1576
(6), and is delivered in the following words. ' Upon
' Sunday last, at eleven a clock in the forenoon, Mr
' Sheriff Kimpton, and Mr Sheriff Barnes, and I the ' Recorder, did repair unto the Charter-house, and ' knocking at the gates no man answered. Mr Sheriff
' B. by agreement, went upon the back stairs to see ' that no Maf-hearers should escape. And after di' vers knockings at the gate, the porter came, being ' a Portugal, who did speak English, and say'd, my ' Lord, was not at home. Then, quoth we, let us
' speak with you Mr Porter, for we have brought let' ters. And the porter answered us very stubbornly.
' And at length he opened the gate, and I the Recor' der put in my left leg, meaning to enter in at the ' gate. And being half in, and half out, the porter
' knowing me very well, said, Back, villain, and thrust
' the gate so sore upon my leg, that I shall carry the ' grief thereof to my grave. Sithence that time my ' pain hath been so great that I can take no rest.
' And if Mr Sheriff Kimpton had not thrust the gate
' from me, my leg had been utterly bruised into
' shivers. And besides, the porter began to buffet
' himself to his dagger, and took me by the throat.
' And then I thrust him from me. For indeed, he ' was but a testy little wretch. And so I willed Mr
' Sheriff and the officers to stay the fellow from do' ing any hurt to any other in his fury. After this,
' we pass quietly all doors being open out of the hall
' up the stairs. And at the stair head there was a ' great long gallery, that in length stood east and ' west. In the same gallery all the Maf-hearers, both ' men and women were standing. For the Priest was ' at the gospel, and the altar candles were lighted as ' the old manner was. After this, we knocked at the ' outer door of the gallery, and all they looked back.

' And then Mr Sheriff K. and I, charged all such ' as were Englishmen born, and the Queen's subjects
' to come forth of that place. And then came all the ' strangers running towards us, some of them begin' ning to draw first their daggers, and then after they ' buckled themselves to draw their rapiers. And by ' that time, two Bailiffs-errants of Middlesex, whose ' names, I remember not, being at the door, did draw
' their swords, and immediately Mr Kimpton caused
' the strangers to be quiet, and I caused the Bailiffs to ' be quiet, and then Mr Kimpton with all the Maf-
' hearers, with Signor Giraldie's wife, and her maids,
' were all in a heap, forty persons at once speaking in ' several languages. And then I said to Mr Sheriff,
' I pray you let me and you make a way for my ' lady; and so he making way before, I kissed my ' hand, and took my Lady Giraldie by the hand, and ' led her out of the press to her chamber door, and
' there made a most humble cursey unto her, and af' ter I put my hand out to the rest of her gentlewo-
' men, and first kiss it, and delivered them into their ' chamber also. And Mr Sheriff Barnes came into the ' gallery, and so we three examined every man what ' he was. And first, such as were Signor Giraldie's ' men we required them to depart. And after many ' lewd and contumelious words used by them against ' us, we, by fair means, got them out of the gallery
' into their lady's lodging. And then proceeded we
' to the examination of the strangers, that were not of ' Signor Giraldie's house, nor of his retinue. And ' they most despightfully, against all civility, used such ' like words in their language against us, that if our ' company had understood them there, might have ' chanced great harm. But in plain terms I said unto ' them, Sirs, I see no remedy but ye must go to pri' son. For most of you be free denizens. And then
' I willed the officers to lay hands on them, and im' mediately every man suddenly, most humbly put ' off his cap, and began to be suitors and sought
' favour. And so upon their submission we suffered ' them to depart all, saving Anthony Guarra, who ' was not willing to depart from us, but kept us
' company. And all this done, we examined the Eng' lish subjects and sent them to prison, who, to say
' the truth, provoked the strangers into fury and ' disorder against us. For if the English then had ac' cording to our direction departed from the strangers,
' and come forth unto us, the strangers had been quiet,
' and we without trouble. But truly the greatest fault
' was,

this representation, and his being heard in person before the Council, where he made a long and good defence, he was, for this breach of the Ambassador's privilege, committed again close prisoner to the Fleet, where he continued for some time, and at length, upon the Ambassador's departing the kingdom, was released. One may collect from his behaviour and submission, as well as from a variety of circumstances attending this affair, that the Privy-Council and the Recorder (not to carry the matter any higher) understood each other very well, and that the whole transaction was with a view to two different points; first, to deter the Papists from resorting to these chapels; and next, to give the Merchants and traders in the city of London, a high opinion of her Majesty's concern for whatever regarded commerce (m). This is certain, that whatever happened upon this occasion did not in the least injure either the credit of the Recorder in the city, or his interest at Court, as appears from his name being the first in the writ for calling Serjeants in Michaelmas term 1580, when, with Edward Flowerdue, Thomas Snagge, William Periam, and Robert Halton, he was advanced to that degree (n). It also appears that it did not in the least abate his zeal against the Papists, on the contrary, he was as active in disturbing their mass-houses, committing Popish Priests, and giving informations of their intrigues, as ever. Some instances of which are remarkable enough to deserve the reader's notice [C]. In 1582, when he presented Mr Thomas Blank to her Majesty,

' was, that as well the English Massmongers, as also
' the free Denizons, for the covering of their own
' offences, practised rather to have murder committed
' than to be taken as they were. All this while the ' Mass-fayer stood at the north end of the altar, and
' no man living said a word to him, nor touched him,
' saying that he did give to divers of our servants
' sining cakes, wherewith I was offended with them,
' for receiving that idolatrous bread. And all being ' done, and we ready to depart, it was said by a
' standerby, if ye look in at that door near the altar
' said he, you shall find a number of Massmongers.
' And then did the Priest take a key out of his pocket,
' and smiling opened the door, and Mr Sheriff Kimpton
' with the Priest looked in, and there was no body.
' And then Anthony Guarras took me by the hand to ' see the altar how trim it was. For Mr Barnes and ' I stood afar off in the gallery. And I said to Guar-
' ras, Sir, if I had done my duty to God and to the ' Queen, I had taken two hundred here upon All-hol' low day last, and as many upon All-souls day also.
' Ho, Sir, said Guarras unto me, become of this re' ligious, and surely you will like it well, and it will ' be a ready means to make you a good Christian. And ' so we went near the altar, where neither he nor I
' touched any manner of thing. And so we bade
' the Priest farewell, who gently saluted us. And I
' suddenly looking back, saw the Priest shake his head
' at us, and mumbled out words, which sounded dia-
' ble and male croix, or to that effect. And then I ' said to Mr Sheriff, Sirs, let us depart for the Priest
' doth curse. And so we departed. Anthony Guar-
' ras brought us to the utmost gate, where Mr Sheriff
' and I invited him to dinner with us, but he departed
' back to hear out the aforesaid Mass. The foresaid
' Guarras at this business said, that he himself was an ' Ambassador to a greater person than the ———
' and so did shake his head. What, quoth I, do you ' mean a greater personage than the Queen our Mis' tress? Na, na, said he, I meant not so. No, quoth
' I, it were not best for you to make comparison with
' the Queen our Mistress. Whose Ambassador are you
' then, quoth I? The Pope's? And then he departed
' further off in an anger. This Guarras was a very ' busy fellow in this action. Among all these strangers,
' I marked one Swygo, who is a free Denizon, mar' ried to an English woman. He is a broker, and ' hath his chief living by our merchants. This fellow
' made himself more busy than it became him. There ' was a tall young fellow an Italian, that was very ' wanton with us. And it hath been told me, sith-
' ence, that he and others are kept here for two causes,
' the one for uttering the Pope's allom, and the other
' to serve for intelligencer. Which I think are very
' spies. This youth was very busy, and bestirred him
' as tho' he had been treading of a galliard. There ' was one John Chivers, an Irishman, a Student of the ' Inns of Chancery, who, as it appeared unto me, I
' having a vigilant eye of all sides, was a great stirrer
' of the strangers against us. This young man when ' he could not prevail, then he got up to the south
' end of the altar, and there he confronted the Mass-

' fayer with his cap on his head, who was on the other ' end, and stood there as tho' he had been an Italian.
' His garments were a cloak and a rapier after the ' Italian fashion. And when I demanded what he was,
' he bowed on the one side and the other, as tho' he ' had not understood me, much like the fashion of ' Signor Giraldie. By which I did not note that he ' had been often there. This is all that I do remem' ber, and in my conscience, and as I shall answer be' fore God at the latter day, we used ourselves with ' such humble reverence unto his lady and her family,
' as more we could not do to the Queen our Mistress,
' save kneeling. I sent Signor Giraldie word as I re' member at Easter last, by Mr Benedict Spinello, that ' he should not suffer the Queen's subjects to repair to ' his Mass: yea, and that other things also should be ' amended, wherewith the people did wonderfully
' grudge at him: and I am sure, Mr Spinello did my ' message to him in a decent order. This is not ' the first time, that his house hath been dealt withal
' by the Sheriffs. Strumpets have been gotten with ' child in his house: and we of the hospital driven to ' take order for their keeping. The masters shall jus' tify this. I never saw any Ambassador sent out of ' England, but that he was both wise and vertuous,
' and was not indebted to any. And whether Signor
' Giraldie was an Ambassador or not, surely my Lord,
' I knew not, until my Lords of the Council had told
' me thereof upon Monday last at the Council Board.'

[C] The reader's notice.] The laborious Mr Strype, who has preserved from destruction and oblivion a multitude of passages, serving to illustrate the personal history of most of the eminent men for two centuries past, will furnish us with sufficient materials to make good all that is asserted in the text; what follows will shew, how close a correspondence there was between the great Ministers and Mr Fleetwood, the former having an eye even to the smallest matters, and the latter striving to make his court to them by his punctual administration of justice (7).

' A French merchant, in a bag sealed, delivered
' forty pounds to a carrier's wife of Norwich, to be ' carried thither to some certain correspondent of his.
' But she secretly conveyed the money to an house a ' good way off the inn, and within a quarter of an ' hour the French merchant came again to see his mo' ney packed up. But the woman denied that she ever ' received one penny, with most horrible protestations.
' Upon this Secretary Walsingham, who was made ac' quainted with it, wrote to Fleetwood Recorder of ' London, from whose letter I have this relation, and ' the Frenchman. And after great search made, the ' money was found and restored, she not knowing ' of the same. The Recorder examined her in his ' study privately. But by no means would she confess
' the same: but did bequeath herself to the devil, both
' body and soul, if she had the money or ever saw it.
' And this was her craft that she then [when she said
' so] had not the money, for it was either at her ' friend's, where she left it, or else delivered. Then
' he asked her, whether the French merchant did not ' bring her a bag sealed, full of the metal that was ' weighty,

upon his being chosen Lord Mayor of London, he made a florid and copious speech of the felicity of the nation in general, and of the advantages derived to the city of London in particular, by her Majesty's religious, wise, and fortunate administration (o). The Queen, upon that occasion, gave a gracious reception to the Mayor, and ordered the Lord-Chamberlain to confer upon him the honour of knighthood, but reprimanded several of her servants for suffering some of the young citizens to crowd so near her person as to trample upon the cloth of state, and signified to the Recorder, that she had been better pleased if he had been more sparing of his praises. Mr Serjeant Fleetwood, who understood the language of a Court perfectly well, states this matter at large in a letter to the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, but instead of expressing any great mortification from the Queen's reprimand, he insists that he was in the right. My good Lord, says he, I said nothing but truly and justly, as it was indeed (p). It seems he was one of those bold men that thought Princes may reprove without dislike, and that however unpleasant the answer, his discourse did not give her Majesty any real uneasiness. One thing was very remarkable in Mr Recorder's conduct, and deserves to be remembered as an extraordinary feature of those times. He kept a very exact Diary of all his proceedings, from which, from time to time, he made extracts, and transmitted them to the Lord-Treasurer, who from thence perfectly understood whatever passed in the city of London, and indeed every where else if it fell within the compass of Mr Serjeant Fleetwood's notice, who in this respect seems to have been incredibly diligent, and to let nothing escape him that was either worth his patron's attention or his own (q). We may discern from some fragments of his Diary that are yet remaining, that we have no great reason to look upon the present as an age of more wickedness and debauchery than any that have preceded it, or that ought not to be compared with the times of that glorious Queen, the Recorder's secret history plainly shewing, that though justice was never more strictly administered, yet the idle, the extravagant, and the vicious, were even then a very numerous party, and capable of committing as great outrages on the laws, sacred and civil, as perhaps were ever committed at any time (r) [D]. This course of life, for the space of many years, wore out at length the patience

' weighty, were it either plate, coin, counters, or such like. Then said she, I will answer no further. And then the Recorder using the Lord Mayor's advice, bestowed her in Bridewell: where she was punished being well whipt. It was observable what she said then, that the devil stood at her elbow in the Recorder's study, and willed her to deny it. But so soon as she was upon the cross to be punished, he gave her over.

' The same Recorder Fleetwood about this time, acquainted Secretary Walsingham in a letter to him of another strange accident, of a woman named Mrs Norton that had drowned herself. She was mother-in-law to one Thomas Norton, a person of some reputation in London, whose father was then aged and sick in bed, in her youth, she was bred up in Sir Thomas More's family. In which place she learned idolatrous toys (I transcribe from the Recorder's letter) and usages in the night, so as thereby she was led by evil spirits, sometimes to hang herself, and sometimes to drown herself, as she did at last. Some part of her lewd demeanour, was in the exercise of necromancy: that is to say, in conferences and speeches had (as she thought) with dead bodies being of her old acquaintance. The Recorder writ this accident, the rather to the said Secretary, because she had left behind her divers children, brothers to the said Thomas Norton which were shrewdly given. And that if the old man should then die, it was to be feared all his goods would come to spoil. And therefore he proposed, that if Mr Peter Osborn, who was a worthy Citizen and Remembrancer of the Exchequer, had a commandment, he could devise some good order, as he the Recorder thought, for the saving of things that might be lost. And he prayed his honour to make the Lord Treasurer, who was Master of the Wards, acquainted with the unfortunate case. Such was the care of this good Recorder of the children of the city.' This last story plainly proves how little he liked the Papists, and if it was not for tiring the reader's patience, we could afford him large accounts of his hunting out Jesuits, Massmongers, and Recusants, without distinction of rank, age, or sex. In short, he was the greatest plague these people had, and therefore in all the numerous libels against Queen Elizabeth's government, the Recorder of London is painted in the blackest colours, as a man without either moderation or pity, restless and officious, and willing to make his court to the Administration, in the way that was most in fashion.

[D] As perhaps were ever committed at any time. When we read in some of our old plays of so much quarrelling, fighting, and duelling, we are apt to fancy that things are magnified, whereas the naked truth is, that there were more disturbances then in a week, than we now hear of in a year; in order to be satisfied of this, we need but cast our eyes upon one of our old Chronicles, where the author speaking of the pains taken to pave Smithfield, gives us the following short history of the company that frequented it, during the whole period of Mr Fleetwood's Recordership (8).

' This field commonly called West Smithfield, was for many years called Ruffians-hall, by reason it was the usual place of affrays and common fighting, during the time that sword and bucklers were in use. When every serving-man from the base to the best, carried a buckler at his back, which hung by the hilt or pomel of his sword, which hung before him. This manner of fight was frequent with all men, until the fight of rapier and dagger took place, and then suddenly the general quarrel of fighting abated, which began about the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth, for until then, it was usual to have affrays, fights, and quarrels upon the Sundays and Holidays, sometimes twenty, thirty, and forty swords and bucklers, half against half, as well by quarrels of appointment as by chance. Especially from the midst of April, until the end of October, by reason Smithfield was then free from dirt and plashes. And in the winter season, all the high streets were much annoyed, and troubled with hourly frays of sword and bucklenners, who took pleasure in that bragging fight, and altho' they made great shew of much fury, and fought often, yet seldom any man hurt, for thrusting was not then in use, neither would one of twenty strike beneath the waste, by reason they held it cowardly and beastly. But the ensuing deadly fight of rapier and dagger, suddenly suppressed the fighting with swords and buckler.' This may serve as an introduction to the following extract from our Recorder's Diary, transmitted to the Lord Treasurer Burleigh about Michaelmas 1554 (9).

' At Bridewell, on Saturday we had a minister's wife of Cardiganshire, who confessed, that she was greatly sought unto by young women, when they were gotten with child. She confessed that she gave them laven, &c.

' One Higham an old fellow, that is both an excommunicate for putting away his wife, and his for such other like part: he hath this year gotten three patience and the constitution of Serjeant Fleetwood, notwithstanding his high spirit, and the pleasure which he apparently took in discharging his duty as a Magistrate with the utmost ardour and application. He thought, it seems, that some regard ought to be had to his past services, and that he deserved to be removed to some post of greater honour and less fatigue, to obtain which, upon a vacancy of one of the Queen's Serjeants, he solicited the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh in a very warm and moving manner, in 1582, which solicitations however were without effect (s) [E]. It seems the Ministers were so well pleased with his behaviour where he was, and found so much advantage from his dexterity in managing affairs in the city, that they were not willing to part with him; and therefore Serjeant Rhodes was preferred at that time to the post of which he was so desirous, and Mr Fleetwood continued in his Recordership ten years longer; but at length, when he was in a manner quite wore out, viz. Jan. 27, 1592, in the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth (t), when he had served the Crown upwards of thirty years, he was made one of the Queen's Serjeants at Law, in which post however he did not continue long, dying, about that time twelvemonth, at his house in Noble-street in Aldersgate ward, which he had built but a little before (u), from whence his corps was carried to great Missenden in Buckinghamshire, where he had purchased a good estate, and buried in the parish-church there. As for the private character of this our Magistrate, he was certainly of a very lively and facetious disposition, which made him very acceptable in the city, and enabled him to do his patrons great service there, which perhaps may account for his being stiled, in one of the bitterest libels of those times, Leicester's mad Recorder (w), with an insinuation that he was placed in his office to encourage those of this Lord's faction in the city; but it is very certain, that, whatever respect he had for, or obligations he might lie under to; that powerful Nobleman, he applied himself very assiduously to the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, and from him received both countenance and promotion. Amongst the Latin poems of Thomas Newton of Cheshire, who celebrated many of the great men in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (x), there is one addressed to our Recorder Fleetwood; and other instances might be brought to prove how much he was esteemed, as well for his wit as his learning, in those days [F]. He was perfectly well versed in the History of England, of the laundry maids with child in the Fleet, being there a prisoner. He stoweth out the matter with us, and will not find the children but writeth lewd letters unto us.

Sessions of Goal Delivery were the Monday after. Mr Dockwray's son of Chamberhouse in Berkshire, was arraigned for stealing of a portmanteau, with eighty four pounds in the same: taken out of an inn in London. But he was acquitted.

There was one Heton a Preacher, who contended to be Parson of St Andrew's Holborn, being maintained by some of the Parish, did confront Mr Vice-Chamberlain (Sir Christopher Hatton) therein, was brought to us for * * * a lewd vice which he hath been often accused of before this time. We bailed him. For my part, I was loth to have that vice openly spoken of, until further consideration were had thereof. This Heton's father was at Newgate arraigned, and convicted for incest with his own daughter: and stood upon the pillory for the same.

Another extract of his Diary (10), there remains written in the year 1586, which runs thus. 'Whit-funday May 23. upon Friday at afternoon, I sat in the Commission Ecclesiastical at Lambeth, with my Lord's Grace: where three Oxford Preachers were charged, for that they would have all temporal causes to be decided by the seniors of the church. And that her Majesty had not to deal in causes ecclesiastical, with such like matters. My Lord Almoner did bear much with them.

Saturday was by me employed, to abbreviate and explain a new commission, granted for the relief of the Fleet and King's Bench. And that I did by the command of my Lord of Canterbury his Grace.

Wednesday was spent at the Goal of Newgate, where we had little or nothing to do. The matters there were slender, and of no great importance. There were none executed.

Your good Lordship peradventure may marvel, why we have had so few dealings in criminal causes at this our late sessions. The reason is this. We have in prison, here in Newgate, the most principal thieves of this realm. We lack none but Mannings, who doth daily gather into his society lewd persons, who commit in all parts of the realm most dangerous robberies. I hear that the Genn or Ingen (Engine) is in your Lordship's custody. The want whereof is a great stay of many burglaries.'

September the 6th (11) he wrote and intended to have sent another Diary, which after he had closed, he broke open again to tell the Lord Treasurer, what mighty joy there was all over the city the next morning, and of his being invited out to six or seven places to supper, on the score of its being the Queen's birthday, at first sight this will appear a very insignificant thing, but when it is considered that just at that juncture, Babington's plot was either discovered or divulged, it becomes a thing of consequence; for very probably the Lord Treasurer made his court, by being the first to inform the Queen, what a tender regard her subjects in the City of London, at so critical a season, expressed for her health and safety.

[E] Were without effect.] The foregoing note is a very proper introduction to what we shall say here, because it shews in what manner, Mr Recorder Fleetwood spent his time, and how strict an account he thought it necessary for him to give of it; industrious Strype, to whom we have been before obliged, has preserved this passage, and a very singular one it is, the letter to the Lord Treasurer, was dated Easter Eve 1582, from Bacon-house, which, if I mistake not, was in Chancery-Lane, and is sometimes stiled Bacon's-Inn, or Curstors-Inn, from the Curstors keeping their office there, and this appears to have been the residence of Serjeant Fleetwood, till he removed to Noble Street.

The letter runs thus (12). 'My singular Lord, &c. I never rest, and when I serve her Majesty the best, then I am for the most part the worst spoken of, and that many times in the court. I have no man to defend me, and as for my Lord Mayor, my chief head, I am driven every day to back him and his doings. My good Lord, for Christ's sake be such a mean for me, as that with credit I may be removed by her Majesty from this intolerable toil. Certainly, I serve in a thankless soil. There is, as I learn, like to fall a room of the Queen's Serjeants. If your Lordship please to help me to one of those rooms, assure your Honour, that I will do her Majesty as painful service as six of them shall do: help me, my good Lord, in my humble suit, and I will, God willing, set down for your Lordship such a book of the Law, as your Lordship will like of.'

[F] As well for his wit as his learning in those days.] In reference to this Thomas Newton mentioned in the text, he appears to have been not only a good Latin Poet, but the professed Panegyrist of the whole

as also in it's Antiquities, with respect to which he was at great expence in procuring, and spent much time in the perusal of, manuscripts relating to these subjects, and for this reason was often consulted by the learned persons of those times, who made such things their chief study, and with whom also, when he had any leisure, he was glad to confer. He was farther esteemed a shrewd Politician, and indeed that character was most likely to recommend him to his patron Leicest. He was a good popular speaker, and, when occasion required, wrote very well upon subjects of government (y). These matters however, drew him not at all from his profession, in which he made a very great figure, being equally celebrated for his eloquence as an Advocate, and for the solidity of his judgment as a Lawyer. His employments hindered him from writing much, yet some pieces of his there are extant, and a great many more are lost; those however which remain are sufficient to justify the character that has been given him [G]. Serjeant Fleetwood married Mariana, daughter to John Barley of Kingsley in the county of Bucks, Gent. by whom he had two sons and two daughters. The sons were both Knights; Sir William Fleetwood, the eldest, had his father's estate in Buckinghamshire; and the younger, Sir Thomas Fleetwood, was of his father's profession, became very eminent therein, and was made Attorney-General to Henry Prince of Wales. The daughters were both married to Knights; Cordelia, the eldest, to Sir David Foulis, of Ingleby in the county of York, Baronet; and Elizabeth to Sir Thomas Chaloner, Tutor to Prince Henry before-mentioned (z). These memoirs, however short and imperfect, may serve in some measure to acquaint posterity with the merit of this ingenious and accomplished Lawyer; and it is certainly to be regretted, that more care has not been taken to preserve the personal histories whole Leicestrian party. The reader will judge of his abilities, by his Epigram in praise of our Recorder Fleetwood, which I the rather insert, because his Poems are extremely scarce (13).

What the worst men, for their worst crimes deserve,
Were the rewards to my demerit due;
If while my muse can other names preserve
She should forget how much she owes to you.

Needless her Song since FLEETWOOD knows to sing,
A POET, he his graver cares laid by;
On PINDUS top if he but touch the string,
The MUSES to their Bard, in raptures fly.

His graver cares resumed and legal power,
All LONDON'S many ears our FLEETWOOD draws;
And like the ATHENIAN chief in days of yore,
His thundering eloquence supports the LAWS.

[G] That has been given him.] We have hitherto had but very indifferent accounts of our author's performances; Mr Wood assures us, that tho' he wrote many things, yet none of them, except one, appeared in his life-time, in which however he was certainly mistaken, as will appear from the following catalogue, tho' we are far from asserting that this is perfect, but the reader may be assured, that it is as perfect as we could make it.

I. An Oration made in Guildhall, before the Mayor, &c. concerning the late attempts of the Queen's Majesties evil seditious subjects, October 15th 1571. London by John Day 12mo.

II. Annalium tam Regum Edwardi quinti, Richardi tertij, & Henrico septimi, quam Henrici octavi, titulorum ordine alphabetico multo jam melius quam ante digressorum Elenchus. Studio & labore Gulielmi Fleetwoodi, Recordatoris Londinensis, in adibus Janæ Vetswert 1579, 1597. that is 'an index of the Year Books as well during the Reigns of Edward the Fifth, Richard the Third, and Henry the Seventh, as under that of Henry the Eighth, digested under titles in an alphabetical order, in a much better method than before.'

The bare transcribing this title at length, will perhaps be sufficient to convince the reader, that a certain great critick might have spared his censure of our author's work, which he has delivered in the following words (14). 'The short Epitome of this (Edward the Fifth) and the three following reigns, that was written and published by William Fleetwood Serjeant at Law, is so thin a piece, and refers so particularly to the transactions in the Courts at Westminster, that it has been rather looked on as a table or index to the Year Books of those times, than any historical treatise.' It is very difficult to understand, what he means by saying, it ought rather to be looked on as an index, than an historical treatise, when there is not so much as a syllable of history in it, and the running title throughout is, Index temporum E. 5. R. 3. & H. 7. and through the second part, Index temporis Henrici octavi; so that in plain English, our critick mistook an index of the Year Books, for Annals of the Reigns of these Princes. There is however a very remarkable dedication, prefixed to the Lord Chancellor Brumley, dated from Bacon-house, August 23d 1579. in which there are contained abundance of curious things. He observes, that the Year Books of the three first reigns, are infinitely better written, than those of Henry the Eighth, which was the reason that he divided his work into two parts; the reason he gives for composing it is worthy of notice, he mentions the great Abridgment by Sir Robert Brooke, as a very ingenious performance in its kind, and, properly managed, very useful; but intimates, that he thought the chief cause why it was so much preferred to that of Fitzherbert, was on account of its being divided into a greater number of titles, there being only two hundred sixty two in the former, and no fewer than six hundred thirty three in the latter. This, as he intimates, recommended it strongly to young Students, who were but too apt to spend their whole time therein, without recurring to the books from whence it was taken, against which he remonstrates to the Lord Chancellor as a very lazy and ineffectual method of study, by which men might come to persuade themselves they were Lawyers, when in truth they were nothing less. He observes, and observes very justly, that abridgments are of admirable use to those who make them, and of very little use to any body else, with many other things to the same purpose. The design therefore of his labour, was to render the Year Books familiar to young students, by putting into their hands a copious and methodical index, which would enable them to make abridgments for themselves, not by seeing in a narrow compass what

FLEETWOOD (JAMES) a pious and loyal Divine, and Bishop of Worcester in the reign of Charles II. He was descended from the same ancient family of Fleetwood of Hesketh in the county of Lancaster, being the grandson of Thomas Fleetwood, Esq; Master of the Mint, by his fifth son Sir George Fleetwood, of the Vache in Chalfunt St Giles, in the county of Bucks, Knt. by Catherine, daughter of Henry Denny, of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire, Esq; and Honora his wife, daughter of William Lord Grey of Wilton, and sister to Edward Denny Earl of Norwich (a). As he was his father's seventh son he was intended for the Church, and as soon as he arrived at a proper age was sent to Eaton school (b), through which having passed, with great reputation to himself and satisfaction to his family, he was from thence removed to King's college in Cambridge, of which he was admitted a Scholar in 1622 (c). He continued there near ten years, till he was removed by his kind patron Dr Robert Wright, Bishop of Lichfield, who presented him to the vicarage of Prees in the county of Salop (d), and, in September 1636, bestowed on him the prebend of Eccleshal in his cathedral, void by the resignation of the Reverend Mr Higgons (e). He was hardly settled there before the Civil War broke out, which obliged him to leave his preferments in order to provide for his safety (f). He was a man of a very mild and gentle disposition, but extremely fixed in his purposes, which he assumed with much deliberation, and from which he could not be removed. A great many of his family stuck to the Parliament, and amongst them some of his nearest relations. Mr Fleetwood's subsistence was gone, but he stuck to his old principles, and became Chaplain to that noble Peer John Earl Rivers, in his capacity of Colonel of a regiment of foot, which he raised for the King's service (g). In this situation he acquired fame though he could hardly get bread. For, in 1642, he was, by the university of Oxford, created Doctor of Divinity by the King's special command (h), for the service he rendered him in Edge-hill fight [A]. Soon after he was made

[A] He rendered him in Edgehill fight. It might be reckoned none of the smallest of the calamities which attended this deplorable war, that as it dissolved the relation between the King and his subjects, so it disturbed likewise the peace of private families, and divided, in point of sentiments, interests, and behaviour, those who by the strongest ties of blood and nature were united. Our Divine's eldest brother George Fleetwood, Esq; went into the Parliament's service, where he had the rank of a Colonel, and was one of those that were not only named, but sat and acted as one of the King's Judges, for which he lost his estate (1), and a grant being made of it to his Royal Highness the Duke of York, he sold it to Sir Thomas Clayton (2). Another relation of our Divine, tho' I think in no nearer degree than that of a cousin, was Charles Fleetwood, Esq; who married Mrs Ireton, Oliver Cromwell's daughter, and had for a time the title of Lord Fleetwood, was General of the Parliament forces, but by degrees lost his credit and power, and returned again to the state of a private gentleman (3). Our worthy Divine was in the battle of Keynton, or Edgehill, the first that was fought between the King and the Parliament, on Sunday October the 23d, 1643 (4), and which had been certainly decisive, if Prince Rupert's conduct had in any degree been allied to his courage, but having routed the enemy's left wing, and pursuing them beyond their camp, he left the King with his infantry uncovered, which advantage was taken by some of the best officers in the Parliament's army, who immediately charged the King's own regiment which they put into great disorder, killed his General, the loyal Earl of Lindsey, his Standard-bearer Sir Edmund Verney, and put the persons of the King and his two sons in very great danger. Some who were near his Majesty advised him to withdraw with the two Princes, which counsel he approved in respect to his children, but not for himself. He would have recommended them to the care of the Duke of Richmond, but his Grace said it was his duty to follow his Majesty, and not to think of safety when he was in danger (5); the King then spoke to the Earl of Dorset, who replied smiling, that all the Kings in the world should not command him out of the field, when so good a cause required his sword (6). At last the Princes were committed to the care of the gentleman pensioner who attended them, Sir Henry Blount (7), who with Mr James Fleetwood conveyed them from the field, for which service the former was afterwards questioned by the Parliament, but justified himself from the duty of his office, and probably the latter would not have escaped so well, if he had not taken care to keep constantly out of their reach (8). It was his clear and singular fidelity upon this and every other occasion, that kept him in constant favour with both his royal masters, to whom through all their misfortunes he steadily adhered, tho' there is very little doubt to be made, that if he would have sacrificed his principles, he might have made his peace from the interest of his powerful relations, but he never had a thought of that nature, and therefore chose to remain in exile till he returned in triumph, and received the reward made Chaplain to Charles Prince of Wales, and had also the rectory of Sutton Colefield in Warwickshire (i) bestowed upon him, for which preferment however he was little the better; for the King's affairs falling into confusion, Dr Fleetwood travelled with the Earls of Kildare and Sterling, as he also did with that hopeful young Peer Esme Duke of Richmond, who, dying at Paris in 1660, his title devolved upon Charles Stuart Earl of Lichfield (k), who was likewise a pupil of Dr Fleetwood's. After the Restoration of the King he returned to England, and was most graciously received by his Royal Master, being the first Divine that was sworn one of his Chaplains in Ordinary. In June 1660 he was made Provost of King's college in Cambridge (l), and had also the rectories of Anstey in Hertfordshire, and of Denham in Bucks, being Proctor likewise in the Convocation for the clergy of the diocese of Lichfield (m). On the 29th of August 1675 he was consecrated Bishop of Worcester, in the room of Dr Walter Blandford, in the church of St Peter le Poor in Broad-street, London (n). He discharged his episcopal function with great punctuality, and was exceedingly beloved both by the clergy and laity in his diocese, where he spent the remainder of his days in doing himself, and exhorting others to do good. He deceased July 17, 1683 (o), when he was somewhat above fourscore, and lies interred under a monument, behind the high-altar, erected in his life-time, with an inscription thereon by his own command, and of his own composition, of which the reader will find a very exact copy in the notes [B]. He was succeeded in the government of King's-college Cambridge by Sir Thomas Page (p), Knight, a person of incomparable abilities and of an unblemished character; and in the See of Worcester by Dr William Thomas, who was suspended for not taking the oaths at the Revolution, but died before deprivation which was intended (q). To him succeeded the worthy and learned Dr Edward Stillingfleet, who, at his decease, directed his body to be buried behind the high-altar, near the tomb of this pious and venerable Bishop Fleetwood, which was accordingly performed.

This Epitaph

Living, and having the use of my faculties, I have written,
Let it be inscribed by those into whose hands it comes.
I James Fleetwood Dr of Divinity of the Cathedral Church of Worcester the (*) ninetieth Bishop, of sinners the most miserable lie here. Most worthy to lie here for ever: but by the merciful love of the LORD

(*) According to Bishop Godwin's Catalogue he was the ninety-first.

I attained his Grace.

What to me imports varnished Nobility.

This is my only boast,

That CURIST took on him my Flesh.

Therefore,

Let none with tears deplore me, CURIST shall assert,
His right and from the yawning Tomb redeem me,
Soon shall I climb the heavenly way and view, Recloth'd with Flesh, my LORD in Flesh too cloth'd.

I have lived; I have spoken.

Son of the abovementioned Prelate, by birth the youngest.

took care that this inscription should be here placed,
In memory of that right reverend Father, who changed this life for another,

July xviith.

In the eighty first of his age,
The eighth year after his consecration,
and from the coming of our Saviour,

[B] A very exact copy in the notes.] This monumental inscription which affords the highest testimony of the sincere piety, and incomparable humility of this good prelate, who passed through all the vicissitudes of this troublesome life without the smallest reproach, has been frequently but faultily printed, so that the sense of it was scarce to be collected, which is the reason of our giving it a place together with a translation here. As for his youngest son Mr Archdeacon Fleetwood, by whose care it was in pursuance of his father's will engraved upon his tomb, he was also Rector of Ripple in his own Archdeaconry, to which he was collated by his father in 1676, upon the demise of Dr Hodges. He died in 1705, and lies buried in the Church of Ripple (10).

FLEETWOOD (WILLIAM) a learned Divine, an excellent Preacher, and successively Bishop of St Asaph and Ely in the XVIIIth century. He was descended from the Fleetwoods of Lancashire beforementioned, and inherited an estate in that county (a). His father was Jeffery Fleetwood, Esq; and his mother Anne, daughter to Mr Richard Smith, Prothonotary of the Poultry Compter (b). He was born January 21, 1656, and, as we are told, in the Tower of London (c); but perhaps there may be some mistake as to that circumstance, since his father died in the Tower April 18, 1665, leaving his widow with six small children (d); so that it is possible this circumstance of his father's death, by transposing the two last figures of the year, might be confounded with his son's birth (e). He received the first tincture of letters at Eton school, and was from thence elected to King's-college in the university of Cambridge (f). About the time of the Revolution he entered into Holy Orders, and was considered as a celebrated Preacher almost at his first setting out. Having preached the anniversary sermon on the founder's day before the university in his own college, March 25, 1689, it fell to his turn to preach before them on the Sunday following at St Mary's, when the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of colleges desired him to print both sermons, but he declining one part of the honour, printed only the first [A]. He was soon after made Chaplain to King William and Queen

[A] Printed only the first.] The true character of a genius is this, that it not only penetrates but irradiates every subject, and how common or beaten soever gives it fresh life, sets it in a new light and compels us to acknowledge that we are pleased both beside and beyond our expectation. This observation could never be more properly made than at our entrance on the notes to this article, since our whole business in them will be to exhibit instances of the truth and justice of this remark.

I. A Sermon preached before the University of Cambridge in King's College Chapel on the 25th of March, 1689, being the Anniversary for Commemoration of King Henry VI. the Founder, London 1689. 4to.

Our author made a very judicious choice of a text (1) 2 Cor. ix. 12. (1), upon this occasion, viz. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the Saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God. Which, having first handled with great perspicuity and prudence as a Divine, he proceeds next to the application, and therein gives us not only a fine picture of Henry the Sixth, but intersperses also a variety of historical passages, which the learned reader will allow me to say are hardly to be met with any where else. First, says he, if St Paul so earnestly exhorts to and commends a piece of private, casual, temporary, transient charity, how much is due, what might be said of such a publick, so deliberately designed, such a lasting one (an everlasting one I hope) as I stand here the grateful subject of? A private man may cast his bread upon the waters in hopes to find it after many days; and give a portion to seven, and also to eight, because he knoweth not what evil shall be upon the earth. And if notwithstanding this design, and these self-interested principles, the work is excellent and acceptable both to God and Man, it must needs be infinitely more, so when a Prince becomes the donor, under whose consideration none of those hopes or fears can reasonably be thought to fall. And if the relieving private and some few persons, wants not its praise and glory, they must both of them rise as the merit does, where the publick is obliged, and all may put in equal claim and title to the benefaction, that will be content with his way of education. The story is well known to us be sure, but he that would record the virtuous qualities and fair endowments of our glorious founder, to those that are without or to posterity, could not by any means forget that most remarkable and noble instance of his large and comprehensive soul, in generously rejecting one of our first governors for his too partial fondness to his native county, and endeavouring to appropriate all the royal bounty to it only, considering with himself that tho' a private man might do the same with reason enough and justice too, yet that a Prince should both in this and every thing besides approve himself a father of the publick. Secondly, a formed premeditated and deliberate work of charity, has certainly the advantage of a casual accidental one, this may be wrested only by the importunity of some that want, compliance with the custom of the place, forced by the example of the company and shame of being singular, or express from men by the lamentable moans and presence of some piteous object, and men are often seen upon removal of those objects, and the going down of those mechanick springs of tenderness, to harden and return again to their ill-natured tempers, and frequently repent them of the good they did, wishing themselves again possessors of their riches. But he that acts deliberately, that forms his designs beforehand, without any present artificial motives, and certainly intends them for a lasting benefit to all posterity, must be presumed, in reason and in justice, to build upon the best and surest grounds, to proceed upon the noblest and most perfect principles. It cannot indeed be said, that this foundation was the design of many years before, for the King himself was then but twenty three at the most, an age most commonly of little thinking with great men, or at best of little else, than how to pass away that spring of life in gaiety and pleasure. But yet it was his earliest undertaking and design, and had for some considerable time been the whole employment of his thoughts, and his heart was so intent upon the matter, that he had little rest till he had brought it to a hopeful prospect, and to some degree of its perfection. It was no sudden accidental thing that moved him, it was not the effect of his relenting thoughts after the shedding some innocent blood by the rage of his own hand, or by the hasty execution of some furious order, for he was meek and merciful, sparing of blood, and tender to his ruin; of such a gentle and forgiving disposition, that when a rude and impious soldier struck him knowingly in prison, he afterwards upon the throne rebuked him only with a piece of Scripture, told him he should not strike the Lord's anointed; nor was it an effect of his repentance upon the cooling of his youthful blood, nor of the injunction of his confessor for some extravagancies common to that age. For what was said of virtuous Gratian may be said of him with equal truth, not Vesta's altar, Pontifex his bed, nor Flamen's pillow, was more pure and holy than his chamber. No honourable wife, no noble virgin, private maid, or consecrated spouse of Christ, called at his hands for satisfaction to their injured honour. He was of such white innocence, and such unfulfilled sanctity in that behalf, that he could not bear those liberties and freedoms, that since make up the very innocence and modesty of Courts. This virtue was in truth so much his own, and so peculiarly engrossed up by him, that he seems to have carried her to heaven along with him, and not to have left succeeding Kings the very virtue of hypocrisy, no, not so much as the grace to dissemble any kind of liking to that purity. Nor was it an atonement for some loud oppression, violence, injustice, or some sacrilege. It is, said one of old, the last defence of wicked Kings to take away from some to give to others, and deprecate the envy and the odium of their present rapines by some large works of bounty to posterity; but it was not so with him, for tho' his reign were long and troublesome, and its years might have been named and numbred from some remarkable calamity befalling his person or his government,

Queen Mary, and by the interest of Dr Godolphin, at that time Vice-Provost of Eton and Residentiary of St Paul's, he was made Fellow of that college, and Rector of St Austin's, London, which is in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's (g). His own great merit brought him soon after into the lecture of St Dunstan's in Fleetstreet, where his sermons were generally admired. He maintained that high reputation which he acquired at the university, by publishing a most admirable Introduction to the Knowledge of Antiquities, which has been very highly and very justly admired [B]. His love for that study, which he preserved as long as he lived, did not hinder him from applying to the modern languages, and to every branch of polite learning. He was as candid a Critick as he was an indefatigable Scholar, and could readily admire and recommend the performances of others, and, where it was necessary, yield them any other assistance, of which he gave a pregnant instance in translating a celebrated book of devotion, which was rendered his affairs perpetually embroiled by the prevailing faction of his powerful rival and competitor for sovereignty, and by the passions of his own imperious and intriguing Queen, by the rude works of war abroad, and by the miseries of a worse at home, and consequently a great deal of injustice must be done, yet no man ever had the hardiness to charge the King with any evil, and that not for good manners or respect, but for the truth and justice sake. And it is so little likely he would cement our buildings with the blood or tears of the oppressed, that when he was in want of money to expedite his intentions, and was shown the way by seizing to that use the estates of some that had forfeited them by treason, he generously rejected their advice, and could not bear the thoughts, that any one in after-times should curse our walls, and call with bitterness and anguish of their souls for their forefathers patrimony. — In compliance therefore with the text, I thank the immortal God for that munificence, by which two royal great societies were founded and endowed, which notwithstanding all the depredations they have undergone, do yet subsist in fair and honourable manner, and are if not the envy yet at least part of the praise and glory of their neighbours, for making a King, a young and mighty King, the instrument of so much good, for inspiring into his soul such christian and such generous purposes, instead of all those vain, ambitious, towering imaginations, those wicked, wanton, and luxurious thoughts, that fill the heads and hearts of common Princes; for giving us a founder, whose bounty makes us not more happy men than his example would, if followed, happy Christians: for the advantage of all those excellent graces and illustrious virtues that adorned his life, and shone so eminently in him: for his early zeal and piety, his ardent and unparallel'd devotion towards God, for his innocent and uncorrupted youth, for his sanctity, sobriety, and temperance, in every kind, for his great love to learning, and greater yet to good morality and true religion, for the firm and steady virtues of his manhood, for his care of all his life, and that incredible watchfulness over all his thoughts, and words, and works, in so much, that in twelve years time, his confessor found no occasion to enjoin him any sort of penance, for his ready resignation to the will of God in all conditions, for his admirable patience under all the sorrows and distresses, the dangers and the difficulties, the exiles and imprisonments, with which his life was exercised for one and fifty years, and lastly, for his holy end and sufferings, being found at his devotions, by that inhuman Prince Richard the Third, that stabbed him to the heart, and left expiring out his soul amidst his prayers. These are the virtues, I can thank God for without a blush or secret check for flattering or enlarging, rare and unseen in Kings, and read by private men with wonder and confusion; so that I doubt, if most of us were left to judge of them, by the faint pursuits and feeble imitations we have made, there would be great temptations to conclude against their truth and possibility. These are the virtues better far best the same and memory of christian Kings, than those of glorious heroes and triumphant Conquerors, enlargers of their Empires, and terrors of their Generations. For the true English of those pompous titles is, that they have been the plagues of the earth, and mighty murderers of mankind, that they have made millions of wretched widows, orphans, and relations, have turned fair kingdoms into fields of blood and horror, and overrun the world with barbarous waste and desolation. And tho' these bears and tygers, wolves and foxes, are in some manner necessary and useful in the world, and make a glorious bustle whilst they live, and we are pleased with the relations of their acts when dead (better when dead); yet no man in his wits that can consider and might chuse his state himself, but would prefer the palms of innocent and suffering Kings to all the laurels, and ensanguined wreaths of those renowned Nimrods. These are the virtues we can thank God for, because they are so useful and so edifying to the world, so safe to recommend to all mankind, but especially so proper for our private imitation, so suited to our way of living, that one would think the godly King had lived on purpose for our use and service, and that our statutes had been copied from his practice, with some design to shame us into duty, or make us inexcusable if we could otherwise abuse such bounty, neglect such virtue, and refuse to write after so fair and goodly an original.

[B] And very justly admired.] There is nothing more natural than for a man of letters, to exert his utmost as well as his earliest endeavours, to recommend and promote his favourite branch of science, which as it was our author's intention in the following work, so he made no difficulty of owning it in his two dedications, one to the Students in the University of Cambridge, and more especially in King's College, and the other to Dr Henry Godolphin, Fellow of Eton, and Residentiary of St Paul's. The title of this work at large runs thus.

Regal. apud Cantab. Socio. Londini Impensis Guil. Graves, Bibliopolæ Cantabrigiænsis 1691. 8vo. It consists of two parts. The first contains remarkable Pagan inscriptions, collected from Gruter, Reinesius, Spon, and other writers, which is digested into five classes, the first, of Gods; the second, of Publick Works; the third, of Emperors; the fourth, of Priests, Magistrates, Soldiers, &c. and the last, of various persons, as parents, children, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, &c. The second part contains the antient christian monuments. The notes are very concise, and partly formed from the observations of others, and partly our author's own. If there should ever be published another edition of this book, it would be of great advantage to the reader to give accurate indexes, especially of the proper names, for there is at present only one which may be stiled a Glossary of the Antiquities, that occur in the monuments (2). It would likewise be very proper to add to the titles of the inscriptions, the letter G. or R. or S. A. B. P. F. or W. in order to shew whether they were taken from Gruter, or Reinesius, or Spon, Auringhus, Baronius, Papebroch, Ferretius, Wheeler, &c. For by this means we might have recourse to the sources themselves, if there should be any suspicion of a typographical mistake, or we should be desirous of a more particular account of them.*

rendered thereby as successful here as it had been abroad (b) [C]. But after all he was chiefly distinguished by his great talents for the pulpit, which rendered him so much and so generally admired, that he was frequently called upon to preach in the most publick places, and upon the most solemn occasions; such as, before the King, the Queen, the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, and elsewhere, as the reader will see at the bottom of the page [D]. He was desired to undertake the defence of the Christian religion according to the pious and noble design of the Honourable Mr Boyle, but it pleased God, that, at this time, he found himself not in a condition to discharge that duty in a manner satisfactory to himself, but to shew that he meant not to spare his pains, or to decline hazarding that credit which he had already attained, he digested and published his thoughts upon miracles, which was the subject he intended to have handled in case his health had permitted him to have preached those Lectures; which work of his might have drawn him into a controversy, if that had not been a thing which he studiously declined [E]. Such were the labours of this great man during that reign, in which many were surprized that he did not obtain higher preferment; for, notwithstanding

[C] As if it had been abroad. This note relates to one of the best known and most admired pieces that fell from our author's pen, tho' it is not inserted in the folio collection of his works, or so much as mentioned in the discourse that is prefixed to them, tho' for what reason it is not easy to imagine; the title is this:

III. A plain Method of Christian Devotion, laid down in Discourses, Meditations, and Prayers, fitted to the various occasions of a religious life, in three parts, translated and revised from the French of Monsieur Jurieu, by William Fleetwood, D. D. Lond. 1692. 8vo.

The licence for printing it is dated April the 22d 1692, the author of the book was a Minister much admired in Holland, tho' his reputation sunk afterwards, partly from his entertaining enthusiastick opinions, and partly through the arts and credit of some whom he had provoked to be his enemies. This book however kept up its credit, as the translation has likewise done, there having been a large impression printed this very year (1750) and in the title of the book, this is said to be the twenty seventh edition. It is impossible to read it with any degree of care without being affected by it. The design is perfectly good, the language plain and precise, there is not an expression in it, that is not worthy of the pure light of the Gospel; and upon the whole, there is nothing in it that hinders us from exercising our reason to heighten our devotion; and very probably it was the consideration of these intrinsic excellencies in the book, rather than the great run which it had abroad, that induced our author to give it an English dress, and withal to prefix a most admirable preface, in which he shews the true use, and cautions the pious reader against the too frequent abuses to which works of this kind are liable. Amongst these, with great judgment and integrity, he shews the sincere Christian how to distinguish between the effects of a true christian faith, and the accidental elevation or depression of the natural spirits, which he has so skilfully described, and touched the general sources of enthusiasm with so delicate a hand, that it is impossible for any candid writer to peruse what he says, without owning him to have an equal discernment in Divinity and Philosophy.

[D] At the bottom of the page ] The pieces of which we are to speak in this note, are those Sermons preached by Mr Fleetwood within the compass of the period assigned in the text, upon particular or solemn occasions, which he afterwards thought fit to publish, and which might in a great measure contribute to procure him the reputation of being one of the completest orators in the pulpit in his time, when able and eloquent preachers were very far from being scarce.

[E] Which he studiously declined. ] The title of this famous work of our author is very short and plain, viz.

XIV. An Essay upon Miracles in two Discourses. Lond. 1701. 8vo.

In the first discourse he shews what a miracle is, viz. an extraordinary operation of God against the known course of the laws of nature appealing to the sense; then he proceeds to prove, that the power of working miracles is in God alone, and delegated by him to whom he pleases, the character of Moses in this respect is afterwards examined, as also the case of the Egyptian Diviners who opposed him before Pharaoh; lastly, the Law in Deutronomy against false Prophets, for pretending to work miracles, is very fully sifted; so that in the close this position is laid down as fully proved, that the doctrine in general which is to be established, must be fully and fairly stated before the miracles are wrought in support of it. The second discourse relates to the miracles of Jesus Christ; he shews therein, that it was foretold that Christ should work miracles, and that it was expected, that Jesus answered this expectation and fulfilled those predictions; he examines some of the miracles at large, explains the end for which those miracles were wrought, he discusses the great question, whether we must judge of miracles by doctrine, or of doctrine by miracles, proves that signs and wonders are not true miracles, that strange events are no miracles, answers all the objections that are usually made, and sets the evidence drawn from miracles in favour of the Christian religion in a proper point of light.

The then reverend Mr Benjamin Hoadly now Lord Bishop of Winchester, soon after published a letter to Mr Fleetwood occasioned by a late Essay on Miracles. This letter is reprinted in Mr Hoadley's Tracts. The author of the account of the life and writings of Bishop Fleetwood observes, that it has been often affirmed, and passes with some for a certain truth, that the Bishop in a letter to the Reverend Mr Hoadley had given up his scheme. But this the reader may be assured is a report altogether false. Nor is the Bishop's not replying any just ground for such a surmise, for it was almost a principle with him never to enter into controversy, to which he had an extream aversion, the acrimony with which disputes were too often carried on, being not at all agreeable to the calmness and meekness of his temper, for which reason he would not be drawn to defend what he had written. I write my withstanding his being so early made a Chaplain to his Majesty, and his constant attendance in that capacity, yet he never received any thing in the way of favour from the Crown, till, just before King William's death, he bestowed upon him a canonry of Windsor at the request of the Lord Godolphin (i). But it so fell out, that the grant for this canonry did not pass the Seals before the King's demise, upon which the House of Commons addressed Queen Anne to bestow it upon their Chaplain. Her Majesty however being acquainted by the Lord Godolphin with the true state of the case, immediately assured him, that if the King intended to have given Mr Fleetwood this preferment he should certainly have it, and she was as good as her word (k). He continued Chaplain to the Queen as he had been to her predecessor, was much esteemed at Court, greatly beloved in the city, and universally esteemed one of the best preachers in the kingdom. In this situation it is not easy to conceive what the motives were which induced him to take a resolution of resigning his rectory and lectureship, and retiring into the country; but, whatever his motives were, he adhered steadily to that resolution, and this, notwithstanding his parishioners offered to keep a curate at their own expence, and to do whatever else he should desire to make him easy. He executed therefore what he had resolved, and retired to the small rectory of Wexham, which was of no greater value than sixty pounds a year, where he enjoyed a neat house and pleasant gardens, within a small distance of his beloved college of Eton, living there in that privacy and retirement which he so strongly affected. He withdrew himself from the world, but he could not withdraw that esteem which all good men had conceived for his person, or extinguish that high reputation which resulted from his writings. Indeed he sometimes used his endeavours with respect to the latter, and being contented with the pleasure of doing good, took pains to avoid being commended for the good he had done [F]. But other cases there were which would not admit of this kind of management, what he publicly preached he could not avoid owning in print, and if never any thing of his had appeared but his sermons on relative duties, those alone had given sufficient cause to look upon the retreat of such a man as a loss to the publick; and it was impossible that this should slip out of the minds of serious and attentive people, while his duty, as the Queen's Chaplain, obliged him to attend upon particular occasions, and to give, though less frequently, as strong marks as ever of his singular abilities [G]. As for himself, he fully enjoyed the

In 1706, there was printed at London in 8vo. Reflections upon Mr Fleetwood's Essay on Miracles, showing the absurdity, falshood, and danger of his notions, with a supplement where in is represented the extent and strength of the evidence which Miracles give to Revealed Religion. By John Gilbert, a Presbyter of the Church of England.

Mr Jenkins likewise, in his observations on the life of Apollonius Tyanæus, makes some animadversions upon the principles which Mr Fleetwood's Essay proceeds upon, but without naming the author or the book.

[F] For the good he hath done. The title at large of this work, than which some very good judges have thought, there is not a better among the many that have been written upon this subject, runs at length in the following words.

XV. The Reasonable Communicant or an Explanation of the Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in all its parts, from the Communion Service. In a discourse between a Minister and one of his Parishioners. Lond. 1704. 8vo.

There have been several editions of it. It was ascribed to another hand, and is expressly given to Mr Theophilus Dorrington, Rector of Wittresham in Kent, in the Catalogue of the Tracts distributed by the Society for propagating Christian Knowledge. But notwithstanding this there is not the least doubt of its being our author's, who in his preface assigns this cause for his writing it, viz. 'that he might not be obliged to repeat continually the contents of it to such of his Parishioners, as from time to time came to be instructed how to become worthy partakers of the Sacrament.'

[G] Of his singular abilities ] In this note we are to take notice of those sermons that were published by this great Divine before he became a Bishop, and the first of these was,

XVI. A Sermon preached on September the 7th 1704, being the day for the Thanksgiving. Lond. 1704. 4to.

As this sermon was preached on a solemn occasion, so the author's publishing it arose from a very particular circumstance, which as it was a strong tho' disagreeable proof to him of the great respect paid to his performance, it is necessary the reader should have an account of it, which cannot be better given than in his own preface, more especially as it is very short.

'It is somewhat strange, that I who have been forward enough to submit to the orders of my superiors, and comply with the requests of my friends, in publishing many sermons, should now be constrained to publish one against my will, without command, and without request. But so it is, that a certain person unknown to me, who took this sermon from my mouth in characters, must needs think himself obliged to print it without my consent, and was resolved it seems to do so, if I would not take care of it myself. He had indeed honestly enough to give me notice by another hand of his intentions, but not enough to keep him from invading his neighbour's right, which I must needs blame in him, tho' I have reason to think his purpose proceeded from no ill principle or disrespect to me. It is to this secret violence I give this sermon up, and rather chuse to publish it from the original, than let it come from a copy which cannot possibly be perfect, thinking it much better to prevent mistakes, than to be at the pains to correct them afterwards, tho' I very much dislike the being under a necessity of doing either.'

XVII. The Relative Duties of Parents and Children, Husbands and Wives, Masters and Servants, considered in sixteen practical Discourses; with three Sermons upon the case of self-murder. Lond. 1705. in 2 vol. 8vo.

This was certainly in its kind one of the most satisfactory and practical systems of Christian morals, that was ever published by any Divine, in our own or in any other language. It was dedicated to the inhabitants of the united Parishes of St Austin and St Faith, to whom, as the author observed, these sermons did in some measure peculiarly belong, as having been composed for their service, preached in their hearing, and sent abroad at their request. All these circumstances are highly honourable for this great man, inasmuch as they plainly shew, that while he had the care of a parish, he applied all his time to the just discharge of his duty, made choice of subjects proper for their knowledge and practice, and treated those subjects in benefits he proposed to himself in his retirement, and indulged, in those vacancies which that kind of life procured him, his natural inclination to the study of British History and Antiquities, which as no man understood better, so none knew how to apply that kind of knowledge to useful and beneficial purposes in a clearer or more satisfactory method than he did, as appeared from a work of his, which, though published without his name, was immediately known to be his from its excellence (l) [H]. We need not wonder, when all these particulars are considered, that this great man was not suffered to remain long in that privacy, which, though it was his own choice and very agreeable to his inclinations, was by no means so either to the welfare of the Church or the inclination of his friends, amongst the most sincere of which we may say, without flattering her memory, was the Princess then upon the throne. On the death of Dr William Beveridge Bishop of St Asaph, March 5, 1707 (m), her Majesty of her own motive determined that Dr Fleetwood should be his successor, and this not only without the least application on his behalf, but absolutely without his knowledge, so that it was no secret to the publick when the first news of it was brought to him. The manner in which this preferment came appeared to him a sufficient reason not to decline it, since it seemed to be the appointment of Providence, and as such he embraced it, and was consecrated June 6, 1708 (n). He soon found that Ecclesiastical as well as Civil government is a very difficult task. There was a spirit then abroad which he utterly disapproved, and this spirit appeared more in that part of the kingdom where his diocese lay than in most others; yet his great and clear reputation, his uncommon abilities, and unblemished life, which set off the episcopal character with much lustre; his obliging and easy deportment, free from the least tincture of pride or shew of superiority, did not only place him above all indecent treatment, which was a great point gained in those unequal times, but procured much reverence and affection to his person, from a clergy, that, almost to a man, differed from him in principle. He preached often before the Queen, and several of those sermons were printed [I]. He attended the House of Lords constantly, and acted there with such a manner as suited best with their occasions. Another excellence in this work is, that it is a most clear and convincing demonstration of the truth of the Christian religion, since it exhibits so full, so rational, and so inviting a plan of moral duties, as must persuade whoever considers them attentively, that the principles from whence they are deduced are incontestably the true principles of social happiness.

[H] From its excellence.] In order to make the design of this curious work clearly understood, we will insert the title at large as it stands in the later editions.

XX. Chronicon Preciosum; or, An account of English Gold and Silver Money, the price of Corn and other Commodities, and of Stipends, Salaries, Wages, Jointures, Portions, Day-labours, &c. in England for six hundred years last past; shewing from the decrease of the value of money, and from the increase of the value of Corn and other Commodities, &c. that a Fellow who has an Estate in Land of inheritance or a perpetual pension of five pounds per annum, may conscientiously keep his Fellowship, and ought not to be compelled to leave the same, tho' the Statutes of his College (founded between the years 1440, and 1460) did then vacate his Fellowship on such condition. Lond. 1707. 8vo.

The reader sees from this large title the nature of this treatise; but it may not be amiss to observe, that the great learning and labour necessary for composing it, does not so readily appear, and therefore our dwelling upon it a little, cannot be disagreeable to those who are desirous of knowing on what foundation the high and universal character of this Prelate stands. The great point to be determined was, what annual income in the reign of Queen Anne was equivalent to five pounds a year in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and this with a view to a case of conscience of very considerable extent, for the old statutes remaining in force, there was nothing plainer than that the Fellows of Colleges to whom they related, and their superiors, were equally concerned to know what five pounds in an equitable sense might be extended to, on account of the changes that had happened to money, and to every thing purchased with money, the rather, because if this could be done, it would afford an easy and invariable rule for determining the like cases for the future, a thing that might also be highly serviceable another way, or rather many other ways. Now the method he took in resolving this question, was, without dispute, the fairest and the most satisfactory that could be devised. First, he undertook to settle the value of money in the two different periods, and then by enquiring into the price of necessary commodities, and into the corresponding alterations of salaries and wages, he gave a clear account of all the variations incident to that sum, which through this series of time the statute supposed sufficient to purchase a single man in a collegiate state the necessaries of life; in consequence of which deduction it appears, that the true equivalent of five pounds in King Henry the Sixth's reign, was thirty pounds in the reign of Queen Anne; that is to say, a man in the latter reign might live just as well, and no better, upon a clear annuity or rent charge of thirty pounds per annum, than he could have done, if he had been to live in the reign of Henry the Sixth upon five pounds.

It was thought very extraordinary in this learned Prelate, that in a Sermon preached upon a State Fast, which called for universal observation, he should equally defeat the expectation of all parties; for the whole tenor of it was directly opposite to the sentiments of those who were stiled high churchmen, and the following picture at the close was as little calculated to please some other people; nay, there are a few strokes in it which he knew could not be pleasing even to the royal ear; but in all his conversation with Courts, Bishop Fleetwood had never picked up so much knowledge of this world, as to conceive his interest in it, comparable to the obligation he was under of speaking in that place only what was just and right; and perhaps, it was this noble zeal for truth, which gave that spirit that glows in the following periods.

As for the praises that are bestowed upon King Charles the First, I know not who should envy them, nor how a Church of England Minister can honestly decline them: he must know nothing of that Prince's history; he must have little sense of justice, gratitude, or honour, by whom his memory is not held most precious. It were a small thing to say, no Prince (altho'

with that dignity and spirit which might have been expected from his private character, and which was perfectly agreeable to his function. He visited his diocese, and his charge upon that occasion shews, that he was a zealous, though not a furious, churchman (o). It has been thought one of the most perfect things in it's kind, and contains with much plainness and perspicuity various instances of his great learning, not introduced with any view of shewing it, but perfectly adapted and absolutely necessary to the subject [K]. The dislike he had to the prevailing spirit in those days, of magnifying the regal power in such an indiscreet manner as to represent tyranny in the light of the ordinance of God, and the most abject slavery as founded in the principles of religion, induced him to write upon that subject in such a manner, as he thought most suitable to the temper of the times, and to which therefore he did not think proper to fix his name, but chose rather that it should go abroad into the world under an assumed character. On other occasions he preached and published his sermons as usual, and their peculiar merit always procured them that reception they deserved [L]. His Lordship, who was a man of much wisdom and penetration, had not only an earnest concern for the peace and prosperity of his own country, but a tender and Christian-like sense of the miseries that might be felt in other nations, from that arbitrary scheme of extending her dominions through a great part, and her influence to the very extremities of Europe, which had been the characteristick of the policy of France, during the space of a century at least (p). It was this that made him dissatisfied with the measures taken at the latter end of the Queen's reign, which dissatisfaction, as it proceeded entirely from principle, so he never studied to conceal it on one side, or ever shewed the least inclination to vary from it on the other. A friend of his has set his conduct in this respect in a very true light [M]. He maintained his credit, notwithstanding

(o) (altho' his father was a learned one) but I will say no private gentleman, did ever understand the constitution of our Church better, defend it with stronger arguments, adhere to it with more judgment, adorn it with better manners, live up to its good principles with more virtue, nor in performance of its offices shew more devout and exemplary good behaviour. I will not in these things, except the Queen upon the throne, nor that blessed Saint in heaven her sister, than did King Charles the First. No Prince did ever shew more personal favour to its ministers, nor give more countenance and credit to its discipline and orders. And must I say, no Prince but he did ever die in its defence to justify the high esteem we have him in? I may; because it is so true, that they who envy him the glory of that title upon all accounts besides, will yet allow he fell a Martyr for the Church of England. Would not that Church be most deservedly the hatred and reproach of all the world, that should be sparing of her praises and best incense, but let it ever be unhallowed incense to his memory? Let them to make an end take heed, lest some degree of guilt be thought to make those people over tender, who are soon offended with the praises of King Charles the First. And let even us ourselves take heed, that such our praises may appear so well designed, and be managed with that good temper, sobriety, and modest truth, that they provoke those men to nothing but compunction, and relentings, and repentance, where these things are wanting, and both ourselves and them to the imitation of all those excellent good qualities, those civil virtues, and those religious Christian graces that made him appear so highly exemplary both in life and death.

[K] And absolutely necessary to the subject.] The title of this celebrated charge runs thus.

XXIV. The Bishop of St Asaph's charge to the Clergy of that Diocese in 1710, and now made publick by his Lordship's permission. Lond. 1710. 4to.

A Bishop's charge at his visitation seems to be, and indeed is, a thing so much of course, that the bare mention of it amongst our Prelate's works might appear sufficient upon the subject, but the case is far otherwise. Our Bishop considered every thing not in the way of its being easiest or soonest, but of its being best done. Certain it is, that as he carried many things in the opinions of the best judges as high as they could go, so he aimed at perfection in all. He had observed that a Bishop's charge was often so much a piece of oratory, that there was little in it of reason or conviction; that for the sake of brevity, even the most important points were seldom dwelt upon, and yet that the shortest charge seemed tedious, by being repeated over and over again, at different places during the same visitation. Against these inconveniencies our Prelate resolved to guard; therefore his charge is as serious a thing as the subject, to which it chiefly relates, the care of men's souls. It is very methodical, and every point of it is illustrated at large, in which there is much learning, more good sense, but above all a true spirit of sincere piety. It was, contrary to the usual method, printed before the visitations, and sent to the Clergy of his Diocese a considerable time before the Bishop made his visitation, that they might have leisure not only to read, but to weigh, to consider, and to comply with it. It has been said, that his discourses on relative duties formed an excellent system of the doctrines; it may with equal truth be affirmed, that this charge is an admirable epitome of the discipline of the Church of England. In short, like the rest of Bishop Fleetwood's writings, it is a true model of what such a thing should be, it is full of those sentiments, it is delivered in that language, it breaths the spirit, and carries in it the authority of a Christian Bishop. This I am sensible is saying a great deal, but I am at the same time as sensible, that it is saying no more than it deserves, or than must be said by any man who peruses it with tolerable attention.

[L] That reception they deserved.] The title of the first of these pieces, which is indeed written in a very peculiar stile taken at large runs thus.

XXV. The thirteenth chapter to the Romans vindicated from the abusive senses put upon it, written by a Curate of Salop, and directed to the Clergy of that County, and the neighbouring ones of North-Wales; to whom the author wisheth patience, moderation, and a good understanding for half an hour. Lond. 1710. 8vo.

XXVI. A Sermon preached before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, February the 16th, 1710-11. Lond. 1710-11. 4to.

[M] In a very true light.] Our Bishop says he, 'Who was a steady friend to the old Ministry, because he saw they had served their country well and faithfully, could not be drawn to give any countenance to the measures of the new one, though endeavours had been used, and intimations given by the Queen herself who had a great value for him, how pleasing his frequent coming to Court would be to her. But his sentiments will best appear from his own words, in a letter to a friend to whom he used to speak and write his mind freely: "When my duty to the Queen, and the good of my country, will permit it, my gratitude will never let me vote against my friends. When I have saved my conscience, I give myself up to what I call my honour, and therefore under all the discouragements I can be, I shall always be on the side of the late Ministry, because I know they served the Queen and nation so well, that I am withstanding his difference with the Ministry, so entire, that when a fast was appointed while the peace was in agitation, he was made choice of by the House of Lords to preach before them upon that occasion (q); but, by some means or other, the contents of his sermon were either guessed at or known, and such as thought they should hear nothing from him that would please them, contrived to get the House of Peers adjourned beyond the day, which indeed put it out of our Prelate's power to deliver what he had collected before the House of Peers in a body, but notwithstanding this he printed and put his sentiments into the hands of the people [N]. This gave much offence to some great Ministers of State, who very easily knew, from the spirit and language of the sermon, from whom it came, and resolved not to let slip any future opportunity of shewing their resentment, for, how much soever it provoked, this, could give them none. It was not long, however, before the warmth of our Prelate's temper furnished them with the occasion they wished for, nor did they neglect it. Before this, however, the Bishop of St Asaph sent abroad another tract of his without his name, in reference to Lay Baptism, about which a controversy had been raised that made a great deal of noise. Our Prelate very well knew on how sandy a foundation

“morally assured they never will be served better, and “whenever they are I shall certainly be on their side “who do that service; I think I may be allowed to “act as clear and disinterested a part as any man of “our order, for sure, if I could shift my side I might “be well accepted, considering what relation I have “had to one (the Earl of Rochester) who governs all,
“and who is very civil to me upon all occasions; but “the measures we are in are by no means pleasing to “me, as what will never do the nation's business; and “I foresee that all our millions and our blood spent “for these twenty years past, will end in a despicable
“peace, which yet we must pitifully sue for too.”

When he was asked about two years after this, his opinion of the situation of our publick affairs, his answer was. ‘I have been, and am still in so ill humour ‘with relation to them, that I hardly can endure to ‘think of them. We were in the greatest honour ‘abroad of any nation in the earth; we are now the ‘scorn of all people: our friends hate us, and our ‘enemies laugh at us. We shall neither have a good ‘peace nor a good war, France will not give us the ‘first, and we ourselves have cut off the means of the ‘last. The disgrace of the Duke of Malborough was ‘worth a million at least, and yet I do not hear we ‘got a farthing by it, which I impute not to our honesty
‘and virtue, but to our folly, malice, infatuation,
‘and the great haste we are in to be undone.
‘The Parliament has passed such a censure upon the ‘Duke, that I dare aver no equal number of men in ‘all the world, of what nation or religion soever,
‘would have done. But the laying him aside is so ‘strange a thing, that people are put to all their shifts
‘to account for it, and to make it go down with the ‘world, must invent, exaggerate, and say, and do ‘any thing to make him appear worthy of such usage;
‘but I expect it will turn to his enemies mischief, as ‘it certainly does to his honour, that after so keen ‘and malicious an inquisition into his conduct, their ‘great master should be able to accuse him of nothing,
‘but of doing what all Generals have done before ‘him, and what King William always did.’

[N] Into the hands of the people.] The title of this extraordinary discourse, which, as we have observed in the text, was printed, tho' never preached, ran in the following words.

XXVII. A Sermon on the Fast-day, January the sixteenth, 1711-12. against such as delight in war. By a Divine of the Church of England. Lond. 1712, 8vo. The text is, Psalm lxxviii. 30. Towards the end he has the following passage. ‘The war we are ‘engaged in is acknowledged to be just, and the successes
‘God has crowned it with have been astonishingly ‘great. And therefore they who now tell us ‘that we entered wrong into it, are those I doubt ‘who would have us go wrong out of it; or if they ‘mean that we have been at too great charge, it is ‘manifest they know not how to value those successes.
‘But I would speak to Englishmen. These great ‘successes it is plain have not been overbought, because ‘we are told it is by them that the enemies have been ‘so far reduced, as to make proposals for treating of ‘a general peace. Would they have done it then ‘without these great successes? Or could we have ‘obtained these great successes at a less expence? I ‘am as glad to confront so senseless a slander with so ‘great an authority, as I am to say, that our enemies ‘have been at as great expence at least to lose their ‘country, cities, and their armies, as we have been ‘to win them, take them, and overcome them; and ‘that their children, and their childrens children, ‘will be paying debts (if arbitrary governments pay ‘debts) contracted by disgraces, losses, and defeats,

‘which left them fighting still in chains and slavery;
‘while our posterity shall be discharging debts, contracted
‘by their fathers to leave them the Protestant ‘Religion, a Protestant Succession, and which must ‘keep them both their liberties. Our enemies themselves
‘will hardly have the malice or the confidence ‘to say this nation is an enemy to peace, or that ‘whatever could be done has not been done, in order
‘to the obtaining it. But we shall also give them ‘cause I hope to say, that all that can be done, in ‘order to the carrying on the war, is also done. The ‘first without the last would only give them a pleasure ‘that we owe them not, and make us their scorn
‘who have been hitherto their terror. But let us not ‘so much as presage the least evil. I know very ‘well in whose hands, under God, we are. This is a ‘peace or war, that is not like any other peace or ‘war, that we or our fathers have seen. It is one of ‘the greatest misfortunes that could befall a nation at ‘this time, if peoples consideration can be so short ‘and slight as to think this treaty will determine ‘only, whether they shall save a little money by ‘peace, or spend a little more by carrying on the ‘war. Whereas, it will determine, in all likelihood,
‘whether they shall ever have abilities and power ‘again of giving or refusing. I do not mean, that ‘we shall article for or against a new Religion, a ‘new Government, and a new King; but I mean, ‘that unless the peace be good, those things will certainly ‘follow in their time, without and against all ‘articles. And therefore no man can be too solicitous ‘about this great event, that will determine the ‘fortune of Europe for many years, and it may be ‘for many ages, and, for our own particular, determine ‘in its consequence of all we have. And therefore ‘they who are in earnest, zealous for the glory
‘and the safety of the Queen, the preservation of ‘the Protestant Religion, and the Protestant Succession, ‘and for the English laws and liberties, will certainly ‘beg of God so to direct, guide, and assist ‘those whom the Queen employs in this most nice
‘and perilous affair of treating, that such a peace
‘may be obtained as will secure them all to us and ‘our posterity, or should the war be still found necessary, ‘that he would go forth with our armies in the ‘most glorious and surprising manner he hath hitherto ‘done, and raised us up (he only can) a General ‘wise, and brave, and fortunate, as was our ‘last.’ This was indeed exceeding strong, but it appears ‘to have flowed from a true spirit of patriotism, and not ‘from any private prejudice or personal dislike to those ‘who were intrusted with power, tho' it is so far from being ‘impossible, that, to speak the truth, it is not at all ‘improbable, they took it in quite another light, and ‘believed that they were by this very sermon denounced ‘to the British nation, as the betrayers and enemies of ‘their country.

foundation that superstructure stood which he judged it expedient to demolish, and he did his business very effectually, but in so masterly a manner that his hand was known, and many people concluded from the method and manner of the piece that it could be none but his, which perhaps added somewhat to the reputation it obtained [O]. In the month of May 1712, his Lordship sent abroad four sermons that he had preached upon particular occasions, the latest of them in the year 1710, and the earliest above twenty years before; to which he prefixed a preface, shewing the occasion of their being committed to the press at this time, in which there was nothing very extraordinary, at least in comparison of what befel it, and the noise it made (r). There was no taking advantage of the sermons, for they were received with applause when they were preached, and therefore there could be nothing criminal in printing them either at this or any other time; but for the preface it was a new thing, it had the Bishop of St Asaph's name, and in that was distinguished from the sermons which had excited their dislike. Of this preface therefore they took hold, and, upon a motion made for that purpose in the House of Commons, an order was made to burn it. What end this answered is not easily understood, for it made both preface (s) and sermons more generally read, and consequently more generally admired [P]. It

[O] To the reputation it obtained.] This dispute took rise from a person's publishing a book against Lay-Baptism, who had been himself baptized by a person not episcopally ordained, and who therefore judged it expedient to be rebaptized; so that his book was calculated to defend his own practice which was likewise justified and recommended, by the Reverend Dr Hicke a very learned man, but very rigid in his principles, and a very warm writer. The title of our author's book, was as follows.

XXVIII. The Judgment of the Church of England in the case of Lay-Baptism, and of Dissenters Baptism. By which it appears, that she hath not by any public Act of her's, made or declared Lay-Baptism to be invalid. The second edition. With an additional letter from Dr John Cofin, afterwards Bishop of Durham, to Mr Cordel, who scrupled to communicate with the French Protestants upon some of the modern pretences. Lond. 1712. 8vo. The second part of the Judgment of the Church of England in the case of Lay-Baptism, and Dissenters Baptism. Lond. 1712. 8vo.

To what has been said of this treatise in the text we shall add very little here, and that from the writings of another Prelate, in order to shew the consequences of this extraordinary controversy. 'A conceit was taken up, says Bishop Burnet (3), of the invalidity of Lay-Baptism, on which several books have been writ; nor was the dispute a trifling one, since by this notion the teachers among the Dissenters passing for Laymen, this went to the rebaptizing them and their congregations. Dodwell gave the rise to this conceit, he was a very learned man, and led a strict life, he seemed to hunt after paradoxes in all his writings, and broached not a few; he thought none could be saved but those who by the sacraments had a federal right to it, and that these were the seals of the covenant: so that he left all who died without the sacraments, to the uncovenanted mercies of God; and to this he added, that none had a right to give the sacraments, but those who were commissioned to it, and these were the Apostles, and after them Bishops and Priests ordained by them: it followed upon this, that sacraments administered by others were of no value. He pursued these notions so far, that he asserted that the souls of men were naturally mortal, but that the immortalizing virtue was conveyed by Baptism given by persons episcopally ordained.———This strange and precarious system was in great credit amongst us, and the necessity of the sacrament, and the invalidity of ecclesiastical functions, when performed by persons who were not episcopally ordained, were entertained by many with great applause: this made the Dissenters pass for no Christians, and put all thoughts of reconciling them to us far out of view: and several little books were spread about the nation to prove the necessity of rebaptizing them, and that they were in a state of damnation till that was done, but few were by these arguments prevailed upon to be baptized: this struck even at the Baptism by midwives in the Church of Rome, which was practised and connived at here in England, till it was objected in the conference held at Hampton-Court, soon after King James the First's accession to the Crown, and Baptism was not till then limited

' to persons in Orders. Nothing of this kind was so much as mentioned in the year 1660, when a great part of the nation had been baptized by Dissenters, but it was now promoted with much heat. The Bishops thought it necessary to put a stop to this new and extravagant doctrine; so a declaration was agreed to, first against the irregularity of all Baptism by persons who were not in Holy Orders, but that yet according to the practice of the Primitive Church, and the constant usage of the Church of England, no Baptism in or with water, (In the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) ought to be reiterated. The Archbishop of York at first agreed to this, so it was resolved to publish it in the name of all the Bishops of England; but he was prevailed on to change his mind and refused to sign it, pretending that this would encourage irregular Baptism: so the Archbishop of Canterbury with most of the Bishops of his Province resolved to offer it to the Convocation. It was agreed to in the Upper-House, the Bishop of Rochester only dissenting: but when it was sent to the Lower-House, they would not so much as take it into consideration but laid it aside, thinking that it would encourage those who struck at the dignity of the Priesthood. This was all that passed in Convocation.'

XXIX. Four Sermons. I. On the Death of Queen Mary, 1694. II. On the Death of the Duke of Gloucester, 1700. III. On the Death of King William, 1701. IV. On the Queen's Accession to the Throne in 1702. With a Preface. Lond. 1712. 8vo.

It must be allowed, that the whole of his Lordship's Preface bore very hard upon those that were then intrusted with the conduct of publick affairs. It is by much too long for us to transcribe, but the paragraph that was thought to have drawn the censure of the House of Commons, concludes that piece and runs thus. 'Never did seven such years together pass over the head of any English Monarch, nor cover it with so much honour: the Crown and Sceptre seemed to be the Queen's least ornaments. Those other Princes were in common with her, and her great personal virtues were the same before and since. But such was the fame of her administration of affairs at home, such was the reputation of her wisdom and felicity in choosing Ministers, and such was then esteemed their faithfulness and zeal, their diligence and great abilities in executing her commands: to such a height of military glory, did her great General and her Armies carry the British name abroad: such was the harmony and concord betwixt her and her allies: and such was the blessing of God upon all her counsels and undertakings, that I am as sure, as history can make me, no Prince of ours, was ever yet so prosperous and successful, so loved, esteemed, and honoured by their subjects and their friends, nor near so formidable to their enemies. We were, as all the world imagined then, just entering on the ways that promised to lead to such a peace, as would have answered all the prayers of our religious Queen, the care and vigilance of a most able ministry, the payments of a willing and obedient people, as well as all the glorious toils and hazards of the soldiery.

It was far from affecting the Bishop, who knew very well that this was the pure effects of party rage, and that it would be disapproved even by the wiser and better part of those who differed from him in sentiments. He could not therefore be at all troubled about a thing that discredited his adversaries as much as they meant to discredit him. On the contrary, he looked upon it as a complement made him by mistake, for whatever faction has power may burn what they please, or rather what displeases them, and those writings will ever displease a faction most, that they are least able to disprove. The fire is a conclusive but not a convincing argument, it will certainly destroy any book but it refutes none. How far these were his Lordship's sentiments, and how little he felt from the usage which his preface had met with, the reader will learn from a letter of his to the Bishop of Salisbury (t), which is inserted in the notes [Q]. As times of publick disturbance, or those of animosity and confusion which generally precede them, afford the emissaries of the Church of Rome the fairest opportunity of practising upon weak and unwary minds, our Prelate could not help seeing, with much regret, that these practices were carried on very openly and successfully in his diocese, where the pious gratitude due to Almighty God for the cures wrought by a mineral water, was diverted, by the boldness with which a certain Legend (u) was propagated; he thought it highly worthy of his notice, and for that reason composed and published a treatise, in which he examined this matter to the bottom, demonstrating fully how very useful the knowledge of History and Antiquities may be to a Protestant Divine; and in doing this he acted with so much candour, as left even those whom he opposed no room to object [R]. He gave, not long

It will become me better to pray to God to restore us to the power of obtaining such a peace, as will be to his glory, the safety, honour, and the welfare of the Queen and her dominions, and the general satisfaction of all her high and mighty allies.'

[Q] Which is inserted in the notes.] This letter was communicated to the author of the account of Bishop Fleetwood's life and writings prefixed to his works by Sir Thomas Burnet, Knight, one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas.

My LORD,

I Received the favour of your Lordship's letter, and I took it, as I know it was intended, very kindly. The manner of my receiving the indignity put upon my Preface, was neither like a Christian nor Philosopher, but like a very worldly man. I knew the whole process, and knew it to be a piece of revenge taken by a wicked party, that found themselves sorely stung, and it affected me accordingly, i. e. very little. I am not one that love to be the talk of the town, and in this part I confess I was uneasy, although I think the talk was very much in my favour. The complaint was made by Hungerford, and seconded by Manley, people that should indeed have been ordered to have burnt it, and thirdered by what we call the Court, and carried by numbers without a wise word said against it; Sir Peter King, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr Lechmere, and others of the Robe, were very strenuous advocates in its behalf; and so were other gentlemen, but to no purpose, for the Court divided one hundred and nineteen, and my friends but fifty four. If their design was to intimidate me, they have lost it utterly; or if to suppress the book, it happens much otherwise; for every body's curiosity is awakened by this usage, and the Bookseller finds his account in it above any one else. The Spectator has conveyed above fourteen thousand of them into other people's hands, that would otherwise have never seen or heard of it. In a word, my Lord, when I consider that these gentlemen have used me no worse, than I think they have used their own country, the Emperor, the States, the House of Hanover, and all our allies abroad, as well as all the bravest, wisest, and honestest men we have at home, I am more inclined to become vain, than any ways depressed at what has befallen me; and intend to set up for a man of merit upon this very stock. But pleasantry apart my heart is wounded within me, when I consider seriously whereabouts we are, and whither we are tending. The Court party do now own publickly, that except the allies accept of the conditions that are offered them, King Philip is not to make any renunciation, and certainly the allies cannot accept of those conditions, unless they are distressed to the last degree; we must and shall have a separate peace in spite of all that can be said, and that must be without a renunciation on the part of France, and without a guaranty from the allies, and what a peace is that like to be? It is now said, that England is to constrain the King of France, to content the States with a Barrier to their liking, and that the rest will come in or stand out without any danger; but I am afraid England has lost all her constraining power, and that France thinks she has us in her hands, and may use us as she pleases, which I dare say will be as scurvily as we deserve. What a change has two years made? Your Lordship may now imagine you are growing young again, for we are fallen methinks into the very dregs of Charles the Second's politicks, saving that then they were more reasonable, because our enemy was then in so full power and lustre, as might both terrify and dazzle a poor luxurious Prince that would not be disturbed, nor seem to care much what became of England after he was gone. The present times may put you in mind of those with this bad difference still, that now the ruinous effects of those advices seem to be taking place, after an interval of five or six and twenty years, and after such an interruption as one would have thought, should have quite baffled and destroyed them. I find, my Lord, upon reading my letter, that I have entered upon deep matters, which, considering the times and the Spaw waters I have taken, I ought not to have done. You will I hope excuse me, for methought I was talking with you who I believe favour me. I have, I thank God, an entire trust in his goodness, and know he has hitherto preserved us beyond all reasonable hopes, without and against all our deservings; but will he still go on to save us against our will, and in the midst of our endeavours to destroy ourselves? I hope he will, for else I think we are a lost people. I pray God to preserve your Lordship and all your family.'

June the 17th, 1712.

Your LORDSHIP'S most humble servant,

W. ASAPH.

[R] No room to object.] The title of this work of our author's runs thus.

long after, a very singular specimen of pious benevolence in a new and very extraordinary way, which was by sending abroad, though without his name, a sermon on the execution of a Gentleman for the murder of another Gentleman, with whose wife he had lived in a criminal conversation; which affair, though it made then a great noise, our Prelate apprehended might not make that impression which the laws of God and man required, and for which publick executions are chiefly calculated. This sermon had a very great sale, and it may be presumed from thence had a very good effect [S]. Upon the demise of the Queen, and the Hanover succession taking place, our Prelate had as much reason to expect that his zeal and services should be considered as any of his rank or function; but he was very far from making any display of his merit, or using even the lawful means of making it known to the King or his Ministers. But as his services were not of a nature to be concealed, so it was not long before they were rewarded. Upon the death of Dr John Moore Bishop of Ely, July 31, 1714 (w), Dr Tension, then Archbishop of Canterbury, strenuously recommended the choice of Bishop Fleetwood for the vacant See, and he was accordingly, without the least application directly or indirectly, nominated thereto, and actually translated December the 18th in the same year (x). His new preferment had no other effect, than to quicken his diligence in the discharge of his duty in all its branches, and in this way he continued to distinguish himself as far, and as long, as his strength would permit, with indefatigable industry (y), of which the publick is in possession of incontestible evidence, arising from a variety of excellent writings upon different subjects, of which some notice will be taken at the bottom of the page [T].

XXX. The Life and Miracles of St Wenefrede together with her Litanies, with some historical observations made thereon. London printed for Sam. Buckley, at the Dolphin in Little Britain, 1713. 8vo.

Our Prelate shews us in his Preface what the motives were, which induced him to bestow so much pains upon the life of St Wenefrede, that the concourse of people to the well which carries her name was very great; that the Papists made use of this to influence weak minds, that they had lately reprinted a large life of this Saint in English; that these considerations might justly affect any Protestant Divine; and that for certain reasons, which he did not think fit to explain, they affected him in particular. He farther observes, that Bollandus the Jesuit, and other Popish writers, had taken the freedom of observing, that the inhabitants of England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Bretagne in France, were remarkable for swallowing any kind of legend, and that such as were laught at and despised elsewhere, met with very ready credit in any of these countries, which he thought a little provoking. In reference to the story of St Wenefrede, he compares it with the rules laid down by the great critics of that communion, for determining the credit and authenticity of all such relations, and he shews that if those laws have any foundation it deserves no credit at all. He farther maintains, that concerning this St Wenefrede there was nothing at all written within upwards of five hundred years, after the time in which she is said to have flourished, that within this period there flourished many celebrated writers, who composed works upon such subjects, as must have induced them to have taken notice of Wenefrede, if her story had been at all known; and that it is impossible the legend now insisted upon should contain facts worthy of belief, since if those facts had ever happened they could never be liable to these objections.

But let us hear what he himself says to the Popish votaries. 'In the case of pilgrimage, the business is to thank God for his gifts and graces bestowed upon the Saint, or to pray to that Saint for something that we want, or to pray to God to hear us for that Saint's sake, or to that Saint to intercede with God for us. In all which cases a Pilgrim ought to have the fullest assurance, and the greatest certainty that is possible to be had. First, That Wenefrede did once live as surely as he himself now lives. Secondly, That she was a Saint upon earth as surely as he is a sinner. Thirdly, That she had her head struck off at Holy-well, and miraculously set on again, as surely as he is now at Holy-well himself, and has his head upon his shoulders. Fourthly, That she is now glorified in Heaven, as surely as he is now praying on Earth. I would desire the Pilgrims to this Holy Spring to consider with themselves, whether they can or ought to want any of these points of certainty, of the life and death, and sanctity, and glorification of St Wenefrede, in case they are required to ' thank God for her, or to pray to her, and then to give me the patience of reading the following observations, in which I have endeavoured to shew that they neither have, nor can have, that certainty and assurance of her life, and death, and sanctity, which ought to be the bottom of praise to God for her.' The text of this life is the English Popish life of St Wenefrede, published by I. F. for we know nothing of him more than those initials of his name, or of the name which he assumed; upon which, and upon the Preface, our Bishop wrote his observations; he likewise added the Litanies, Prayers, and some other Legends relative to the same story, which hitherto had lain hid in Libraries, and which might probably have perished there if they had not been sought for upon this occasion.

[S] Had a very good effect.] This Sermon of our excellent Bishop was published, under the following title

XXXI. A Funeral Sermon on the Death of Mr Noble; who was executed at Kingston, for the Murder of a Gentleman, with whose wife he had criminal conversation.

The name of the gentleman who was murdered was Mr Sayer, whose wife, after running him in debt, had separated from him, and lived in a dissolute manner. He had obtained a search-warrant, and upon information given him, that Mrs Sayer, her mother, and Mr Noble, who was an Attorney, were at an house in Lambeth, Mr Sayer went thither with a peace officer in order to apprehend them, and in a fray which ensued, Mr Sayer was killed by Mr Noble, who was tried for this fact together with the two women, when they were acquitted and he was found guilty. He was a young man of good parts and had much business, there was, as is usual in such cases, a prodigious outcry against him till he was found guilty, and then he was in a manner universally pitied. Great applications were made to the crown for mercy, but without the least success, it was a case of so singular, as well as so foul, a nature, that for a long time it was the common topic of discourse; and our charitable Prelate endeavoured to turn this kind of useless attention to better purpose, by representing, in the strongest and most pathetic terms, the danger of entering into those courses which lead to such unhappy acts; the wisdom of embracing such warnings, by recurring to an immediate and sincere repentance; and finally, the usefulness of such dreadful examples, in order to give a check to the lawless vices of men, to protect the innocent from the rage of the guilty, and to execute by the sword of civil justice the sentence pronounced by the Law of God.

[T] At the bottom of the page] We are in this note to render the reader a short account of such other treatises upon different subjects as fell from this learned Prelate's pen, and they were these.

In this course of life he persisted with unwearied spirit, notwithstanding the great infirmities

XXXII. The Counsellor's Plea for the Divorce of Sir G. D. and Mrs F.

The case upon which this plea was formed was as follows. 'I. G. D. without the knowledge and consent of his father, then alive, but accounted not of sound judgment, was, at the age of fifteen, by the procurement and persuasion of those in whose keeping he was, married according to the Church form to M. F. of the age of fifteen. II. This young couple was put to bed in the day time, according to custom, and continued there a little while, but in the presence of the company, who all testify they touched not one the other, and after that they came together no more, the young gentleman going immediately abroad, the young woman continuing with her parents. III. G. D. after three or four years travel returned home to England, and being solicited to live with his lawful wife, refused it, and frequently and publickly declared he never would compleat the marriage. IV. Fourteen years have passed since this marriage ceremony was performed, and each party having, as is natural to think, contracted an incurable aversion to each the other, is very desirous to be set at liberty; and accordingly application is made to the legislative power to dissolve this marriage, and to give each party leave, if they think fit, to marry elsewhere.' The reasons urged against such dissolution were first, that each party was consenting to the marriage, and was old enough to give such consent, according to the known laws of the kingdom; the male being fifteen years old, the female thirteen; whereas the years of consent are by law fourteen and twelve. Secondly, they were actually married according to the form prescribed by the Church of England, the Minister pronouncing those solemn words used by our Saviour. Those whom God has joined, let no man put asunder. They are therefore man and wife, both by the laws of God, and of the land; and since nothing but adultery can dissolve a marriage, and no adultery is here pretended, the marriage continues indissoluble. Our author proposes a variety of arguments in favour of the divorce, and observes, that what makes the marriage contract valid and obliging, is, that a male and female should be at age to consent, and at liberty to consent, and should actually consent to give to each other the use and dominion of each other's body, exclusively to all the world besides, as long as they both shall live. This is properly the marriage contract, and common to all nations and religions, and all beyond this is matter of ceremony, decency, and prudence, and ordered by the legislative powers of different countries as they see convenient. He afterwards shews that this was not a compleat marriage, because it never was consummated. But notwithstanding all the learned arguments contained in this plea, which were offered at the bar or insisted upon in the debate of the House of Lords, the bill was lost, which was an irreparable misfortune to the parties.

XXXIII. A Thanksgiving Sermon preached at Ely-house Chapel, June the 7th, 1716.

XXXIV. A Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Ely at Cambridge, August the 7th, 1716. Lond. 1716. 4to.

In this charge our learned Bishop takes notice of the Dignity of the Priesthood, and the envy which has ever attended it, which having traced to its source, and proved to be altogether incapable of prejudicing religion, or the ministers of religion, unless they concur with their own acls to depreciate themselves. His Lordship then proceeds to the talents and abilities which are requisite to qualify a man for the due execution of the holy function. 'In order to this, says he, if we consult the writings of some very famous Christian Bishops and others of old, and be obliged to believe them without departing from them in the least, we should find them so great, so many, and so hard to be obtained, that as I am sure for my own part, so I may reasonably fear that many of this assembly, despairing of such attainments, must have betaken ourselves to other callings, who, yet I hope shall give a good account to God each of our Stewardship. . . . . According to the flights and ex-aggerations of those devout and overfervid spirits, a very few people were they serious would ever go in to holy Orders, which should it ever happen would be very prejudicial to religion, tho' overstocking the Church is also not without its mischief. There was something like this happened in the matter of the blessed Sacrament, which may partly account for it. For the two or three first Centuries the generality of Christians did frequently, even every Lord's Day, partake of the Lord's Supper; but this their frequency did naturally abate much of their devotion in the performance of that holy service, which godly zealous men perceiving, set themselves to write and preach upon that subject, and to raise the people's devout affections, and revive their antient fervours, said so many fine exalted things, used so many strong and bold allusions, and lively figurative representations, both of the Priest and Sacrifice, and Presence, that they quickly made the duty of preparation so difficult, and the danger of coming to that table so great and dreadful, that even good people were afraid to venture, and rather chose to stay away, altho' invited to that supper, than come without what was then made to be the wedding-garment. Thus good well meaning men do often cure one mischief by another, and till they have tried they know not which is greater. The Bishop remarks, that it is very well for us, that these great men's examples relieve us against the rigour of their rules and instructions; for after all they have said, they were themselves Bishops and Presbyters, and tho' very learned, and very good, yet not so superlatively so, but that others might and did equal them.—In the Postscript to this charge dated at Ely, August the 30th, 1716. he observes, that before these sheets were quite finished at the press, he received a letter from the Deputies of the Episcopal Reformed Churches in Great Poland, and Polish Prussia, and of the Episcopal Betlenian College in Transylvania, wherein they earnestly entreated him, after the example of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, to recommend the most deplorable estate those Churches and that College were then in, to the charitable consideration of the Clergy of his Diocese. The request says he was so reasonable, and the examples so good, that I complied with it and followed it immediately. . . . . The Brief will come amongst you about a month hence, but I hope and desire you will in some of the interim, use your endeavours to dispose your people to a more than ordinary liberality, in contributing to the necessities of these our Christian Brethren of the same household of faith with us.' This charge of the Bishop's was attacked in a bold assuming and insolent Pamphlet, entitled, A letter to the Bishop of Ely, upon the occasion of his supposed late Charge said to be delivered at Cambridge, August the 7th, 1716. as far as relates to what is therein urged against frequent Communion, and for the pretended Episcopal Reformed Churches of Transylvania, Great Poland and Prussia. By Philalethes. mities brought upon him by his indefatigable labours (z), till at length he found his strength so much declined, that he had reason to expect a speedy remove from this life to a better, which happened at Tottenham in Middlesex, whither he had retired for the benefit of the air, August 4, 1723, in the sixty-seventh year of his age (a), and was interred in the cathedral church of Ely, where a monument is erected to his memory by his Lady, who did not long survive him, with an inscription, which, having often been published, it is not necessary that we should insert (b). As to his character, it has been drawn by a very able pen, and one who had the honour and happiness of being intimately acquainted with him (c), to the following effect: ‘ He lived an useful, studious, and exemplary life; so constantly employed in the good way of his profession, that no man had fewer idle hours to answer for. He had a just sense of the duty of his office, and lived up to the dignity of it. He was constant in preaching, which duty he discharged for many years three times a week: it may be truly said, he was the most celebrated preacher of his time: I need not say how usefully he employed his talent, or with how much eloquence; his sermons fully speak it, which he set off with such a sweetness of voice, and such a graceful delivery, that he charmed his hearers into the warmest attention, and left a lasting impression on their minds; and that which made his sermons more useful, was the fine vein of casuistry that ran through most of them, wherein he displayed a peculiar talent, in making things plain and easy which seemed to many difficult, and gave disturbance to weak and honest minds: he informed the judgment, and then set the mind at rest. To which may be added, what many of his auditors have often said, that they seldom heard him preach but they learnt something from him, that they had never observed or heard before. He was a diligent visiter of the sick, and a skillful healer of the wounds of conscience, for the cure of which sad malady he was often applied to by many who were not properly under his care, to whom he was a willing and a wise instructor. And these good offices he discharged in so affectionate and tender a manner, that besides the inward satisfaction he had of doing much good, many of those who had applied to him expressed the grateful sense they had of this his labour of love, which he bestowed upon them, by kind legacies bequeathed to him, some of which came to his hands after he was a Bishop. In this station he did not cease to be a preacher; he was a constant one at St Asaph, where the choir was well suited to his voice; not so at Ely, where the church was much too large for it; but in his own chapel at Ely-house, so frequent in the discharge of that good part of his office, though in the cold season of the year, that he has sometimes preached four and twenty sermons in the space of six months. He was a great lover of Antiquities, especially of those of his own country; but that did not cast a rust upon his parts, or spoil his stile, an effect it often has upon those whose genius leads them early into that kind of study. He was a useful Antiquarian, and at the same time a fine Preacher. The filling of the churches in the diocese of St Asaph, where he was almost the general patron, with virtuous and worthy men, was what lay near his heart: he often expressed the great satisfaction he had in bestowing preferments on worthy Clergymen, and was extremely pleased when, upon experience and observation, he found that the care of their people was matter of conscience to them. So may it always be, he used to say, and with increase, for without that there was no living, but he was sure no dying, with comfort. He paid little or no regard to the importunate solicitations of the great men of that diocese, if the person recommended was not found, upon due enquiry, to be of an unblemished life; and though he could not have the satisfaction he wished, of filling his churches with men he thoroughly approved in other respects, yet he took much pains to fill them with men of virtue; and if ever he was moved beyond his usual temper, it was when he found he had been deceived by testimonials that had little or no truth in them. He had a generous heart; his hands were always open to those in want, especially to the poorer clergy, to whom he often gave money or books, besides the remission of their fees. He was a liberal encourager of every charitable design that came in his way, never shewing any desire to be rich, except in good works; and he was much pleased when he heard that any rich man had left something to good uses, saying sometimes upon that occasion, It were almost reasonable there should be a moderate Purgatory, for such as live and die so wealthy without doing any good to any body but their children, when there was so much want and misery in the world. He was much concerned to see so much passion and uncharitableness raised by difference in opinion in matters of religion, and thought that mere mistakes, and such differences as did not influence practice, were to be borne with. He was modest and humble almost to a fault, qualities rarely to be found in a breast so replete with knowledge as his was; and as he fled from his just praises, and was always uneasy under them, so he was backward to censure others. His temper was sweet and even calm and meek, so that hardly any thing could discompose him, no passion, no resentment, no partial mixtures, could find a place in his breast. To this happy temper of mind was joined a good degree of cool and sedate courage, which he did not fail to shew whenever a proper occasion called for it. And, to crown all his other good qualities, so much innocence of life, integrity of heart, and sanctity of manners, hardly ever met in any one man in a fuller measure than they did in him. In a word, this good ‘ Bishop excelled in every virtue that constitutes a wise man, and in every grace that distinguishes a Christian.’ To so ample, as well as so eloquent a character as this, it would be altogether improper for us to add any thing; but inasmuch as in a work of this nature it may be justly expected, that the testimonies to so eminent a Prelate’s merits should be collected, the reader will find at the bottom of the page some instances of this kind, from a variety of writers of very different tempers and sentiments, which may be regarded as an incontestible proof of his virtues and abilities; since, though it does not always happen, that great and good men are universally esteemed, yet, when the praises of different parties are bestowed upon an eminent person, it cannot but be presumed that his worth must be very conspicuous, to attract the suffrages of men of all opinions, in spite of those little prejudices and prepossessions which are so apt to warp even the best minds, and to hinder them from publickly testifying their respect for those, whom, in their hearts perhaps, they may secretly admire [U]. He left behind him an only son, Dr Charles Fleetwood, who inherited his paternal estate in Lancashire, and had been presented a few years before by his father, as Bishop of Ely, to the rectory of Cottenham in Cambridge, which he did not enjoy long.

Of this family and name there have been several other remarkable persons, not in this only, but in other nations also, particularly in Sweden, where, as we have before observed, there is a Baron of that name, descended in a direct line from the Fleetwoods of Lancashire; and the person who now enjoys that honour, is highly esteemed for his abilities, both civil and military, which have lately procured him considerable preferments. It may not be amiss to observe here, that the Swedes look upon the title of Baron as that alone which confers true Nobility, as having annexed to it all the ranks and privileges derived to Nobility by their constitution. The crown does indeed bestow other titles of honour, such as Counts, but they are not much regarded; and the case is the same in Poland, where titles are assumed rather to procure respect when travelling through foreign countries, than to draw regard in their own.

[U] They may secretly admire.] We find this short character given of our author and his writings, as well as of another English Prelate, by one whose reputation as a critick, will not fail to justify what he has advanced in the opinion of all good judges (4). Bishop Fleetwood’s softness, and Bishop Blackhall’s plainness, are their characters; excellent writers both! The Reverend Dr Hickes (5) acknowledges him for an encourager of his great work, and indeed no wonder it was, that he should lend his assistance for promoting endeavours so advantageous to that sort of literature, which as it was his earliest, so it continued to be his latest study. The indefatigable Mr Hearne (6) confesses himself much obliged to Bishop Fleetwood, for many singular instances of his friendship, and particularly mentions the present he received from him of an antient almanack, which he esteemed to be, as indeed it was, a very great curiosity; and this shews how ready our Prelate was to entertain a free correspondence with men of real merit, how different soever their political principles might be from his own, as in both these cases it is well enough known they were. That candid writer, and eminent Antiquary, Brown Willis, Esq; speaks according to his manner briefly of our Bishop (7), of whom he says, that he was a general scholar, well skilled in Antiquities, and very communicative in imparting to him several collections. It has created some wonder, that Bishop Burnet is silent as to our author, in his History; but whatever his motives might be, other writers within that period of time have pursued a different conduct; one of these, after transcribing those paragraphs that gave offence to the House of Commons, when his Lordship published his four Sermons, proceeds thus (8). ‘ These words of eternal truth, pronounced in so awful and moving a manner, did the majority of this House of Commons vote to be malicious and factious, and condemned his Lordship’s Preface to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. The good Bishop, imitating the apostolical resignation, as his persecutors imitated the Pagan barbarism and insolence, said only when he was told of it, I esteem myself happy to suffer with the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Godolphin, and so many other illustrious Patriots, whose reputation their enemies endeavour to blast; on the other hand, says our historian, this treatment of a Prelate of such signal merit, so unblameable a life, and so universally esteemed, particularly by the Queen herself, who before was used to call him her Bishop, was highly repented by many true sons of the Church.’ The Reverend Mr William Whiston, a man of great probity and a free speaker, admired our Prelate as a preacher when he was a young man at the University, and admired him too as a Bishop, which appears from the following story that he tells us (9); after having mentioned several instances of the danger that the best men run of being corrupted in courts, he proceeds thus. It puts me in mind of what that excellent preacher and liver Bishop Fleetwood, as I have been informed, said upon the like occasion. ‘ This good Bishop once came to the House of Lords a little too early, and overheard certain persons debating this question, Whether a Courtier could be a Christian or not? And when at length the company perceived he was there, they would needs have his opinion. He replied he was no Courtier, nor would determine that question: but he acknowledged that he had learned so much by their discourse, that it was not very fit for a good Christian to go to Court.’ In the additions that have been made to an eminent Prelate’s history of English Bishops, we are told with regard to this worthy person, that his works being in all hands and his character universally esteemed made it unnecessary to be insisted upon there. E

FLEMMING or FLEMMYNGE (RICHARD) Bishop of Lincoln in the XVth century, and founder of Lincoln-college in Oxford, was descended from a good and ancient family (a), and born at Croston in the county of York (b). After having been educated in grammar learning in his native county, he was sent to University-college in Oxford; where he so improved himself in Logic and Philosophy, that he met with no difficulty in obtaining his degrees; an honour which was then conferred only upon a few (c) [A]. On the 22d of August 1406, he was presented, or collated, to the prebend bend of South-Newbald in the church of York, vacant by the resignation of Tho. Langley Bishop of Durham (d); and, the next year had the honour of being one of the Proctors of the university of Oxford (e) [B]: but never was Chancellor of the same, as the famous Mr Leland hath asserted (f). Soon after taking his Master of Arts degree, he warmly espoused J. Wiclef's cause; and so strenuously asserted his opinions, that great numbers (and of those some of the first quality) drawn in by his example, or convinced by his arguments, loudly declaimed against the corruptions of the Church of Rome. But, persons whose interest it was to maintain those corruptions, found means either to awe, or to bribe, him into silence. And, which is not much to his credit, he became as violent an opposer of Wiclef's doctrines, as he had heretofore been a patron of them [C]. So that the college he founded at Oxford (of which we shall presently give an account) was designed as a seminary for writers and disputers against that learned man's opinions (g). In the year 1415, he exchanged his prebend of South Newbald for that of Langford, in the cathedral church of York (h): and, some time before, was also made Rector of Boston in Lincolnshire (i). His learning, and perhaps withal his zeal against Wiclef, having recommended him to the esteem of King Henry V, he was promoted by him to the bishopric of Lincoln (k), having been first appointed by the Pope (l). He was then Professor, or Doctor, in Divinity (m). The temporalities of his See were restored to him May 23, 1420 (n). In the year 1424, he was sent to the Council of Constance, or Sienna; where, in the presence of Pope Martin V, he made a very elegant speech in vindication of his country against the calumnies and aspersions of the Spanish, French, and Scottish Deputies [D]; which procured him great applause (o). And then, I suppose it was, he was made Chamberlain to Pope Martin aforesaid (p). Upon his return from the Council, he caused Wiclef's bones to be taken up and burnt, as had been decreed in that assembly (q). The See of York being then vacant by the death of Dr Henry Bowett, the Pope by his own absolute authority translated Dr Flemming to that Archbishoprick; and he had restitution of the temporalities Decemb. 1, 1424 (r) [E]. But King Henry V, who by his late conquest of France was grown so powerful as to have no cause to dread the Pope's indignation or censures, so vehemently opposed this translation, jointly with the Chapter [F], that the Bishop was content to go back to Lincoln again (s). But though he met with this great disappointment, he pursued his design, of founding a college in Oxford, to be a seminary for Divines, to write, preach, and dispute against Wiclef's opinions. For that purpose, he obtained a licence from King Henry VI, dated Octob. 12, 1427, wherein he was impowered to found a college [G], which of the sixteenth century. For Thomas Arundell, who was Archbishop of Canterbury from the year 1396 to the year 1413, had no other degree but that of Bachelor of Arts (2); tho' he was a very considerable and eminent person in his time. It is well known, how universal and extreme was the ignorance that reign'd in the sixteenth century!

[B] And the next year, had the honour of being one of the Proctors of the University of Oxford] Whilst he was in that office, he caused the ancient book of statutes, belonging to the junior or northern Proctor, to be transcribed for the use of his successors. And that copy is now preserved among the University Archives, being mark'd on the back with the letter C (3).

[C] He became as violent an opposer of Wiclef's doctrines, as he had heretofore been a patron of them.] As an instance of which, he suffered himself to be nominated one of the committee, that was chosen by the University of Oxford, for examining heretical books, and particularly Wiclef's, in the year 1411 (4). Mr Wood questions, whether our R. Flemmyng was one of that committee. His reasons are, that, after the nomination of it, he finds, our author had maintained opinions in the schools, which in those times were accounted downright heresy: That they were condemned by those commissioners, and opposed with so much sharpness by Nicolas Ponce of Merton-college, that Flemmyng appealed to a general congregation. But the Archbishop of Canterbury ordered, his appeal not to be admitted; and enjoined, that Flemmyng, and his adherents, whom he called hard-lets boys, and not fit to appear in the schools, should be punished according to their deserts. Mr Flemmyng thinking himself ill used, carried his complaints to the King, who having examined the whole affair, writ to the University in his favour. But the University making unnecessary delays in raking off the censures they had passed on him, the King sent other pressing letters: which, it is probable, were duly obeyed. — On these accounts, A. Wood is inclined to believe, either that there were two Richard Flemmyngs then in the University; or that this our Richard was not one of those commissioners; unless perhaps some time after (5). But, since he was one of the Proctors of the University in the year 1407; into which office he would undoubtedly never have been chosen, if he had continued publicly to maintain Wiclef's opinions: And, since J. Bale assures us (6), that his disputes with Ponce were before he was chosen one of the committee; we may therefore conclude, that he had renounced those opinions before the year 1411, or even perhaps before the year 1407.

[D] Against the calumnies and aspersions of the Spanish, French, and Scottish Deputies.] For there arose a great dispute between the Deputies of those nations, about precedence, and the right of voting first (7).

[E] Had the temporalities restored to him Decemb. 1. 1424.] Mr Willis says, by mistake, that he was translated to York, Anno 1429 (8).

[F] So vehemently opposed this translation, jointly with the Chapter.] Bishop Godwin gives us this account of it. 'The Pope of his own absolute authority, placed then in Yorke Richard Fleming Bishop of Lincoln. Many statutes and laws had been made to repress this tyrannicall dealing of the Pope. But his excommunications were such terrible bug, as men durst rather offend the laws of their country, than come within the compass of his censure. Yet the Deane and Chapter of Yorke taking stomacke unto them, used such advantage as the Law would afford them, and by force kept out the new Archbishop from entering his Church. Much ado there was between them. The event was, that the Pope unable to make good his gift, was faine to returne Fleming to Lincoln again. — (*)

[G] Wherein he was impowered to found a college] He was impowered to found this college in the Church of All-Saints in Oxford, of which he was patron; and to unite and annex it to the same, together with the Churches of St Mildred and St Michael near Northgate, which were also in the patronage of his See. And the said Churches so united, annexed, and incorporated, to name the Church of All-Saints; and to erect erect

which should consist of one Warden, or Rector, and seven Scholars; and bear the name of The College of St Mary and All-Saints of Lincoln in the University of Oxford. Having thus obtained the royal licence, he set about his foundation; but before he had made any considerable progress in it, death snatched him away. However, he left money and effects in the hands of some persons, which he appointed Overseers of his new foundation; and they carried it on, and settled it, with all imaginable care and expedition (t). He died at his palace at Sleaford, January 25, 1430-31; and was buried in Lincoln cathedral, under a raised tomb, with a long rhyming Epitaph [H], fashionable in the times of ignorance he lived in (u). Bale, and Pits, mention two pieces written by him; and the latter says, his Works were long preserved in the library of Lincoln-college: but they seem to have been no more than the speeches he made at the Council of Sienna (w). After his decease, his college met with several benefactors, but none so considerable as Thomas Rotherham, alias Scot, then Bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbishop of York [I], who deserves the name of a second founder. Its revenues have been also considerably augmented, by the munificence of several other generous and charitable persons [K].

erect and convert it into a collegiate church, or a college; and to annex to the same a chantry in the Church aforesaid, of which the Mayor of Oxford for the time being was patron. Ordaining, that there should be in this new foundation two Chaplains, to be placed or removed at the Rector's pleasure: that the Rector and Scholars should be perpetual patrons of this Church; and capable of purchasing lands, rents, and tenements, not exceeding the yearly value of ten pounds.— This point obtained, the Founder employed some persons to buy tenements, on the site whereof he intended to erect his new college. Accordingly they bought Deep-hall, belonging to St John Baptist's Hospital without East-gate, and a few other buildings. The Bishop's death stop'd their further proceedings, when the first stone was hardly laid. However, certain trustees appointed by him on his death-bed, placed a Rector, seven Scholars, and two Chaplains in his new foundation; which were to be maintained out of the revenues of the Churches abovementioned. And in the room of Deep-hall; and of two others, call'd Brend-hall, and Wynchester-hall, purchased about the year 1438; and of St Mildred's Church, taken down in the year 1436, was the college built, partly in the manner in which it now stands.

There is nothing remarkable in this long Epitaph; except, that Pope Martin consecrated him Bishop of Lincoln with his own hands. The rest is a doleful descant upon the frailty of human nature; which might have been comprised in much fewer words. — His arms on his tomb are, barry of six argent and azure; in chief three fustils; in base a mullet, gules.

[I] After his decease, his college met with several benefactors, but none so considerable as Thomas Rotherham, alias Scot, then Bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbishop of York] This great man was born at Rotherham in Yorkshire, and successively became Fellow of King's College Cambridge, Master of Pembroke-Hall, Chancellor of that University, Prebendary of Sarum, Chaplain to King Edward IV. Provost of Beverley, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Secretary to four Kings, Bishop of Rochester, then of Lincoln, and at length Archbishop of York, and Lord Chancellor from the year 1475, to 1483, tho' with some interruption (10). What induced him to this munificent benefaction, is thus related. In the year 1474, coming to Oxford, on his episcopal visitation, John Trilroppe Rector of this college preached before him, out of Psalm lxxx. 14, and 15. ver; and from thence took occasion, so pathetically to invite him to commiserate their tender vine, their poor half-built college, that the Bishop immediately promised he would do what the Rector had so earnestly pleaded for. Accordingly, the year following, he completed the edifice; increased the number of Fellows from seven to twelve, appropriating for their maintenance the Churches of Twyford in Buckinghamshire, and Combe longa in Oxfordshire; and gave the Society a Body of Statutes (they having none before) subscribed with his own hand, Feb. 11, 1479. wherein he ordained, among other things, that the Fellows should be chosen out of the Dioceses of Lincoln, York, particularly Rotherham if any fit, and Bath and Wells (11).

[K] Its revenues have been also considerably augmented, by the munificence of several other generous and charitable persons] The chief benefactors have been, John Forest, Dean of Wells; John Southam, Archdeacon of Oxford; William Finderne, Esq; Cardinal Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester; John Buke-tot, and Walter Bate, Priests; John Crosby, Treasurer of Lincoln; William Dagvyle, Gent. Edmund Audley, Bishop of Salisbury; William Smyth, Bishop of Lincoln; Sir William Findern, Knt. Our author's nephew, or kinsman, ROBERT FLEMMING, deserves also to be mentioned here, on account of his learning, and particularly of his skill in poetry and polite literature. He was educated at Oxford (x), and probably in Lincoln-college, then newly founded by his uncle, or kinsman. On the 21st of January 1451, he was admitted Dean of Lincoln (y), being famous for his knowledge and ingenuity. But, for his further improvement, he went to Italy, and visited the Learned, and the universities; particularly, he attended the lectures of the celebrated Orator and Poet Baptista Guarini, who was Professor of the Greek and Latin languages at Ferrara: And who had the honour of having for his hearers, several English gentlemen [L], eminent for their birth, and other distinguishing qualifications (z). From Ferrara our author went to Rome, where he stayed a year or two (a); and contracted an acquaintance with several learned men, especially with Bartholomew [M] Platina, Librarian of the Vatican (b). He became also known to Pope Sixtus IV, in whose praise, during a summer's recess at Tibur or Tivoli, he composed a poem in two books [N], inscribed to his Holiness: who was so pleased with it, that he made the author his Protonotary (c). At his return from Italy, he brought over with him several books curiously illuminated, and some of them of his own composition [O], which he bequeathed to Lincoln-college-library (d). On the 27th of September 1467, he was installed into the prebend of Leighton-Manor, in the cathedral church of Lincoln (e); which he exchanged, December 3, 1478, for that of Leighton-Bosard (f). He founded in the cathedral abovementioned, namely in Trinity-chapel, a chantry for two Chaplains, which was valued at 14*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* (g). And dying August 12, 1483 (h), was buried near Bishop Fleming his relation (i). His name is mentioned with honour by some of his contemporaries [P].

FLETCHER (RICHARD) Bishop of Bristol, and afterwards translated to Worcester, and London, in the XVIth century, was born in Kent (a). He received his university-education in Bennet, or Corpus-Christi, college, in Cambridge, of which he was Fellow (b). It doth not appear from the Register-books of that university, when he took his degrees: but, in 1572, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, being four years standing in that degree at Cambridge (c); and if so, must have been admitted about the year 1561. On the 30th of September 1572, he was instituted to the prebend of Illington in St Paul's cathedral, London, which he resigned in October 1589 (d). The 15th of November 1583 he was made Dean of Peterborough (e), but never Bishop of that See, as Dr Fuller hath asserted (f). He was installed into the prebend of Sutton longa in the church of Lincoln, January 23, 1585, and resigned it in 1592 (g). He was also Rector of Alderkirke in Lincolnshire (h). On the 8th of February 1586, he attended Mary Queen of Scots at Fotheringhay, at the time of her execution; and exhorted her, among other things, 'to apply Christ's meritorious obedience to her soul ' with the hand of true Faith, ——— and to make Christ her only sacrifice for her sins, ' and a ransom for her redemption.' But she desired him, three or four times, not to trouble himself, nor her. For she was settled in the ancient Catholick Romish Religion; and in defence thereof resolved to spend her blood (i) [A]. In the year 1589 he was promoted moted to the bishopric of Bristol; being elected November 13, confirmed Decemb. 12, consecrated Decemb. 14, and enthronized January the 3d following (k). We are told, that he took this See on condition to lease out the revenues to Courtiers [B], which he did in so extravagant a manner, that he left little to his successors; insomuch, that after his removal from thence, it lay vacant ten years (l). He was about the end of the year 1592 translated to Worcester; elected January 24, 1592-3, and confirmed February 10, following (m): having, some years before, been made Bishop Almoner (n). Upon the death of Dr Aylmer Bishop of London, in the beginning of June 1594, he made interest with the Lord Treasurer Burghley to be translated to that See: alledging, that he liked London better than any other town in the realm, as being the place of his education, and of his most common residence; where he had many agreeable friends, and a considerable share in the love and esteem of the citizens, who desired that he might be their Bishop; and amongst whom his influence might be of great service to the Court. But his request seems not to have met with immediate success. For, not till above six months after, namely December 30, 1594, was he elected Bishop of London: he was confirmed the 10th of January following (o). A few days after, he being a widower, took to his second wife a very handsome woman, the Lady Baker of Kent (p), sister to Sir George Gifford, one of the Gentlemen Pensioners (q). And, perhaps, one of the secret reasons of the Bishop's earnest endeavours for being translated to London, was to gratify that Lady's desire to live near the Court. Queen Elizabeth, who had an extreme aversion and antipathy to the Clergy's marrying, was highly offended at the Bishop. She thought this marriage so very undecent in an elderly Clergyman, and a Bishop, who also had been married before; that she either reprimanded him with her own mouth, or sent him a message, not to appear in her presence any more, nor to come to Court. The Bishop finding himself in this bad condition, applied by letter to the Lord Treasurer, to represent his case to the Queen, and to do him good offices. Upon the receipt of his letter, the Lord Treasurer used some kind and honourable words concerning him. But,

' in this Religion; I have lived in this Religion; and
' I am resolved to die in this Religion.' Then said the Earls [of Kent, and Shrewsbury,] who were commissioned to attend at her execution, when they saw how she disliked the Dean's exhortation, ' Madam, we will pray for your Grace with Master Dean, if it stands with God's good will, you may have your heart lightened with the true knowledge of God's good will, and his word; and so die therein.' Then answered the Queen, ' If you will pray for me, I will even from my heart thank you, and think myself greatly favoured by you. But to join in prayer with you, my Lords, after your manner, who are not of one and the self same religion with me, it were a sin: I will not. (1)' It seems to have been a very odd undertaking, (and to all appearance unsuccessful,) to endeavour to persuade one so bigotted to Popery as Mary Queen of Scots was, to renounce, in her last moments, that religion whence she expected salvation. However, so the Queen understood it, and such was the drift of the Dean's long and intricate speech, as far as can be collected from the passage cited from it above in the text, and also from these other words out of the same. . . . ' Repent you truly of your former sins and wickedness. Justify the justice now to be executed, and justify her Majesty's faithfulness towards you at all times. Have a lively Faith in Christ our Saviour and Lord: and so shall you be rightly prepared unto death. . . . The special means to attain to forgiveness of sin, is neither in man, nor by man, but by Faith only in Jesus Christ crucified. . . . O, Madam, trust not the devices which God's word doth not warrant, which is the true touchstone, and the clear lanthorn to guide our feet into the way of peace, Jesus Christ yesterday, and to day, and the same for ever. ——— On him all the Saints call in the day of trouble; and have been heard and delivered, in him have they all trusted, and were never confounded. All other cisterns are broken; and cannot hold the water of everlasting life. ——— Therefore, Madam, that you may so glorify the Lord in your last passage, that you may be glorified of him for ever, I most humbly beseech your Grace in the tender mercy of God, to join with us present, in prayer to the throne of Grace; that we may rejoice, and you be converted; and God may turn his loving countenance toward you, and grant you his peace.' ——— This speech, which is preserved by the industrious Mr Strype (2), doth not give a high idea of the author's capacity. And he hath been fe-

verely censured for it by the admirers of the Queen of Scots; particularly by A. Wood, who observes, that he ' being the person appointed to pray with, and for, her, did persuade her to renounce her religion, contrary to all Christianity and Humanity (as it was by many then present so taken) to her great disturbance (3).' Mr Camden calls it, Verbosam orationem (4), a long-winded speech.

[B] We are told, that he took this See on condition to lease out the revenues to Courtiers.] This we learn from Sir John Harrington, whose account be pleased to take in his own words (5). ' I fortun'd to be one day at the Savoy with Mr Secretary Walsingham, where Mr Fletcher was then upon his dispatch for Bristol. A familiar friend of his meeting him there, bad God give him joy, my Lord elect of Bristol: which he taking kindly and courtly upon him, answered, " that it had pleased indeed the higher powers so to dispose of him. But, said his friend " in his eare, do you not lease out tot & tot (6) to such and such." He, clapping his hand on his heart, in a good gracefull fashion, replied with the words of Naman the Syrian, Herein the Lord be merciful to me; but there was not an Elizeus to bid him go in peace.' What shall I say for him? Non erat hoc hominis vitium sed temporis. [This was not the fault of the man, but of the time.] I cannot say so, for I have written otherwise in a book of mine, Libro 3. no. 80.

' Alas a fault confest were half amended,
' But sin is doubled, that is thus defended,
' I know a right wife man faves and believes
' Where no receivers are, would be no theeves.

' Wherefore at the most I can but say, Dividatur, [let it be divided] He was a well spoken man, and one that the Queen gave good countenance to, and discovered her favour to him even in her reprehensions, as Horace saith of Mecænas.

—————Rerum tutela mearum

Cum sis, & prave sectum stomacheris ob unguem;

' for the found fault with him once for cutting his beard too short; whereas good lady (if she had known that) she would have found fault with him for cutting his Bishoprick so short.'

But, notwithstanding, the Queen soon dispatched an order to Archbishop Whitgift, to suspend the Bishop from the exercise of his episcopal function: which was accordingly executed, on the 23d of February, by the Archbishop himself in person. The severity of this sentence filled Bishop Fletcher with the utmost grief and uneasiness, as appears by the copy of a letter of his inserted in the note [C]. He lay some months under the weight of this ignominious censure, before he was restored. For it was not till July 1595 that the Lord Treasurer signified to him, the Queen was in a good measure reconciled to him, and would give instructions and order to the Archbishop, to take off his suspension: for which he was extremely thankful [D]. But tho' he was restored to the discharge of his function, yet, notwithstanding all the entreaties of his friends, and those some of the highest quality, the Queen would not permit him to come into her presence for a twelve-month; tho' for twenty years before he had waited in his place upon her person. This long absence from Court the Bishop laid much to heart; which induced him, in January following, to solicit the Lord Treasurer, his former friend and mediator, to prevail upon the Queen that he might be admitted into her presence. Whether the Bishop ever recovered the place he once had in her Majesty's favour, we cannot certainly learn (r); tho' we are told, that she promised and gave him a visit at Chelsea (s) [E]. However, his disgrace sat so heavy upon his mind, that it is thought to have hastened his end. He died suddenly in his chair, at his house in London; being to all appearance well, sick, and dead, in one quarter of an hour, June 15, 1596 (t). Mr Camden says, that he died by immoderate taking of tobacco (u) [F]. And others, that he died of discontent, thro' the Queen's displeasure at him for his marriage; having had little enjoyment since he was made Bishop of London (w). It is certain that he died suddenly, whilst taking tobacco, which was not usually taken in those days, unless physically, or as a melancholy companion (x). He was buried in St Paul's cathedral, without any monument (y) [G]. As to his person, and character: He was courtly, and well spoken (z); of a comely person, and goodly presence (a) [H]. He loved to ride the great horse, and had much skill in managing thereof: he was condemned for very proud (such his natural stately garb) by such as knew him not, and commended for humility by those that were acquainted with him (b). We do not find that he ever published any thing. One of his sons, John Fletcher, of whom you have an account above, was a very ingenious Poet.

[C] As appears by the copy of a letter of his.] Wherein, among other things, he said—— ' He confessed it was the more grievous and bitter unto him, by the remembrance both of her Highness former favour towards him; as also, for that he was now become unprofitable for the Church, and her Highness service; to both which he had so wholly vowed himself, and all his possibility. Professing [to the Lord Treasurer, to whom his letter was written] that he could have wished, when he heard it, he had also heard (if justice would so have permitted) to have been sequestered from his life itself. He added, that he knew how much his Lordship's approbation and grave mediation might in such cases avail with her Majesty. Which if it might please him to vouchsafe him, he should, he was persuaded, with the whole Ecclesiastical State, be honoured for it; and give to himself matter of bond to his Lordship in all christian devotion and dutifull observance.'

(7) Strype, Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 429.

This letter was dated from Chelsea, Feb. 24 (7). [D] For which he was extremely thankful.] He expressed his great acknowledgment for it in this other letter to the Lord Treasurer Burghley,—— ' That to hear of the least her Highness gracious inclination towards him, in her princely clemency, he could not sufficiently express to his good Lordship, how greatly it had recomforted him, having these six months thought himself (as the Prophet spake) free among the dead, and like unto him that is in the grave; made unprofitable unto God's and her Majesty's service. That to hear of it also, as drawn on and wrought by his Lordship's honourable interest, and so kind mediation, it had greatly added to his joy and alacrity. I do therefore, (as he proceeded) give your Lordship my intirest thanks, beseeching your Lordship to be persuaded, that among so many to whom your Lordship hath been Magnus Benefactor [a great benefactor] there shall be none sound, whose duty and devotion shall henceforth exceed his, who with his hand and heart giveth your Lordship this testimony of love and observance (8).'

(8) Ibid. p. 430.

[E] She promised and gave him a visit at Chelsea.] ' There was, as Sir John Harrington informs us (9), a stayre, and a dore, made of purpose for her, in a bay-window: of which pleasant wits descanted diversly; some said, that was for joy, to shew he would (as the Proverb is) cast the house out at window for her welcome: some, more bitingly, called it the impresse or emblem of his entry into his first Bishoprick, viz. not at the doore, but at the window.'

[F] Mr Camden says, that he died by immoderate taking of Tobacco.] His words are—— qui, dum curas è nuptiis insaufis & Reginae improbatas (quae Praefules conjugatos minus probavit) Nicotia immodice hausta obruit, vitam efflavit.—— Fuller says (10), that he ' died more of grief than any other disease.'——Tobacco (like all other fashions) when it first came into use, was much decried; it being looked upon not only as nauseous, but even poisonous. So that many writers, and, amongst the rest, that Royal Pedant King James I (11), drew their pens against it. However, tho' some are confident that it is of the poisonous sort (12), common experience now shows, that it may be constantly used without danger, or even any visible inconvenience. Peruse, if you please, Dr Raphael Thory's excellent poem in its praise: intituled, Hymnus Tabaci, Autore Raphaelis Thorio (13).

[G] He was buried in St Paul's cathedral, without any monument.] But the following verses were, in Sir John Harrington's time (14), handed about as his most vulgar Epitaph; being some of the many sarcasms passed upon him on account of his second marriage.

Here lies the first Prelate made Christendom See,
 A Bishop, a husband unto a Ladec.
 The cause of his death was secret and hid,
 He cry'd out, I die; and ev'n so he did.

[H] Of a comely person, and goodly presence.] ' Qualities, as Dr Fuller observes (15), not to be cast away in a Bishop, though a Bishop not to be chosen for them.' Handsom and comely persons were in general most acceptable to Queen Elizabeth: which made her always, on an equality of desert, to reflect favourably on such who were of graceful countenance and stature (16). Our Bishop could preach well, and would speak boldly, and yet keep decorum. He knew what would please the Queen, and would adventure on that, though it offended others (17).

FLETCHER (GILES) author of the Russe Common Wealth, and brother to Richard Fletcher Bishop of London, of whom you have an account in the last article, was also born in Kent. He received his education in Eaton school (a); and, in the year 1565, was elected Scholar of King's-college in Cambridge (b), where he took the degrees, of Bachelor of Arts in 1569; of Master of Arts in 1573; and of Doctor of Laws in 1581 (c): and became an excellent Poet (d). His abilities recommending him to that great judge of merit, Queen Elizabeth, he was employed by her as Commissioner into Scotland, Germany, and the Low-Countries (e). In the year 1588, he was sent Embassador to Muscovy; not only to conclude a league with Theodore Juanowich Emperor of that country, but also to re-establish and put into good order the decayed trade of our Russia Company. He met at first with a cold reception, and even with rough usage. For the Dutch, it seems, envying the exclusive privilege which the Company just now mentioned enjoyed of trading thither, had done them ill offices at that barbarous and arbitrary Court. And a false rumour then spread, of our fleet's being totally destroyed by the Spanish Armada, had created in the Czar a contempt and dislike for the English nation, thinking he might safely injure those who were not in a capacity of being revenged. But the Embassador soon effaced those ill impressions, and having obtained good and advantagious conditions [A], returned to England with safety and honour (f) [B]. Shortly after his return, he was made Secretary to the city of London, and one of the Masters of the Court of Requests (g). Also, on the 20th of June 1597, he was constituted Treasurer of St Paul's London (h). From the observations he had made during his embassy he drew up a curious account 'of the Russe Commonwealth: or Manner of Government by the Russe Emperor (commonly called the Emperor of Moskovia) with the Manners and Fashions of the People of that Countrey [C].' Printed at London in 1591, 8vo. But it was quickly suppressed,

[A] And having obtained good and advantagious conditions.] They were to this effect. 1. A continuation of league and amity between the Queen and the Emperor Theodore Juanowich, in like manner as was with his father Juan Basilowich. 2. A confirmation and re-establishment of the former privileges of the company of our English merchants, which were infringed and annulled in the principal points, with divers necessary additions, for the better ordering of their trade in those countreys hereafter; viz. that the state of the privilege granted before in the names of some private and particular men, be altered in that point, and the same granted by the name and stile of their incorporation, viz. to the fellowship of English merchants for the discovery of new trades. 3. That upon every surmise and light quarrel, the said privilege be not revoked and annulled, as before time it hath been. 4. That justice shall be administered to the said company and their agent without delay, upon such as shall offer them any despite or injury, or shall exact or impose upon them any payment, taxation, or imposition whatsoever, contrary to the freedom of the said grant. 5. That the goods and commodities of the said company be not forcibly taken as before time they have been by the Emperor's officers or people of authority, either for the use of the said Emperor or of his officers. But in case they have need of the said commodities, the same to be taken at reasonable prices, and for ready money. 6. That the said company be not charged hereafter with the answering of such debts as are made by any Englishman not being of the society. 7. That the Emperor's authorized people shall not hereafter repute any Englishman resident in that countrey, to be factor, servant, or dealer in the said company's affairs, but such as the agent shall register by name, within the offices where custom is entered in all such places of the land where the said company have residencies to traffick. 8. That the names of such as shall be so registered be no longer continued in record, nor themselves reputed as factors or dealers for the said company, than the agent shall think good. But in case the said agent shall think meet to strike out of the register any name of such as have been employed in the company's service, the said person to be held as private, and whose act in bargaining or otherwise, shall not charge the said company. 9. That if any Englishman within the countrey of Russia be suspected for any notorious crime, as felony, treason, &c. the same be not straightways set upon the Pudkey (*), nor otherwise tormented, till such time as he shall be convicted by plain and evident proofs: which being done, the whole proceeding to be sent over to the Queen of England. 10. That the said privilege with the additions, shall be published in all towns and parts of the Emperor's dominions, where the said company have traffick. 11. That the said company shall be permitted to use a sole trade through the Emperor's countries, by the river Wolga into Media, Persia, Bulgaria, and the other east countries. 12. Whereas there was claimed of the said company the sum of 23,553 marks of debt, made by certain of the factors of the said company, for payment whereof their whole stock was in danger of arrest by publick authority; and also 2140 rubles for customs and house-rent, he obtained an abatement of eighteen thousand one hundred and fifty three marks of the said debt (1). —The Russia company to which these privileges were granted, was first incorporated by Charter, in the 1st and 2d of Philip and Mary; afterwards confirmed by Act of Parliament in the 8th of Queen Elizabeth (2).

[B] Returned to England with safety.] We are told, 'that after his safe return to London, he sent for an intimate friend, with whom he heartily expressed his thankfulness to God for his safe return from so great a danger. For the Poets cannot fancy Ulysses more glad to be come out of the den of Polyphemus, than he was to be rid of the power of such a barbarous Prince; who counting himself, by a proud and voluntary mistake, Emperor of all Nations, cared not for the Law of all Nations; and who was so habited in blood, that had he cut off this Embassador's head, he and his friends might have fought their own amends, but the question is, where he would have found it?' (3) Dr Fuller is mistaken, when he affirms (4), that our author was agent in Muscovy in 1583. For the words of Mr Camden, which he refers to, imply no such thing (5).

[C] Of the Russe Commonwealth.] This curious and scarce little book, is divided into these three general parts. I. Cosmography of the Country. II. Policy. III. Oeconomy or private behaviour. And the second part is subdivided into these four. The ordering of their State. Their judicial proceeding. Their warlike provisions. Their Ecclesiastical State. The whole is comprised into 28 chapters, of which the titles follow. 1. The breadth and length of the country, with the names of the Shires. 2. The soil and climate. 3. The native commodities of the country. 4. The chief cities of Russia. 5. The house or stocke of the Russe Emperor. 6. The manner of inauguration of the Russe Emperors. 7. The form or manner of their publick government. 8. Their Parliaments and manner of holding them. 9. The Russe Nobility, and means whereby it is kept in an under proportion agreeable to that State. 10. The manner of governing their Provinces or Shires. 11. The Emperor's Privy-Council. 12. The Emperor's customs and other revenues, and what they amount unto, with the Sophismes practised for the encrease of them. 13. The Russe communalty, and their condition. 14. Their public suppressed lest it might give offence to a Prince in amity with England (i). Dr Fletcher died in the parish of St Catherine Coleman (k) in London, in the month of February 1610, and was probably buried in that church (l). He left two sons, both learned men. The eldest, Giles, Bachelor of Divinity of Trinity-college in Cambridge, was equally beloved of the Muses and Graces; and died at Alderton in Suffolk in 1623. Phineas, the younger, of King's-college in the same university, was accounted an excellent Poet; and became afterwards Rector of Hilgay in Norfolk. He wrote several books (m); particularly, De literatis antiquæ Britannię, præsertim qui doctrina claruerunt, quique Collegia Cantabrigiæ fundarunt. Cantabr. 1633, 12mo. i. e. public justice and manner of proceeding therein. 15. The Emperor's forces for his wars, with the officers and their salaries. 16. Their manner of mustering, armour, provision for victual, encamping, &c. 17. Their order in marching, charging, and their martial discipline. 18. Their colonies and policy in maintaining their purchases by conquest. 19, 20. Their borderers, with whom they have most to do in war and peace. 21. Their Church offices, and degrees. 22. Their Leiturgy or form of Church service, with their manner of administering the Sacraments. 23. The doctrine of the Russe Church. 24. Their manner of solemnizing marriages. 25. The other ceremonies of the Russe Church. 26. The Emperor's domestic or private behaviour. 27. The Emperor's household, and officers of his house. 28. The private behaviour, and manners of the Russe people. — There are several particulars in this book, no less wonderful than true. As, for instance, what he says of the intense cold of that climate (6). — 'The rivers and other waters are all frozen up a yard or more thick, how swift or broad soever they be. And this continueth commonly five months, viz. from the beginning of November till towards the end of March, what time the snow beginneth to melt. So that it would breed a frost in a man to look abroad at that time, and see the winter face of that country. The sharpness of the air you may judge of by this: for that water dropped down or cast up into the air, congealeth into ice before it come to the ground. In the extremity of winter, if you hold a pewter-dish or pot in your hand, or any other metal, (except in some chamber where their warm stoves be) your fingers will freeze fast unto it, and draw off the skins at the parting. When you pass out of a warm room into a cold, you shall sensibly feel your breath to wax stark, and even stifling with the cold, as you draw it in and out. Divers not only that travel abroad, but in the very markets and streets of their towns, are mortally pinched, and killed withall: so that you shall see many drop down dead in the streets, many travellers brought into the towns fitting dead and stiff in their sleds. Divers lose their noses, the tips of their ears, and the balls of their cheeks, their toes, feet, &c. — And yet in the summer time you shall see such a new hue and face of a country; the woods (for the most part which are all of fir and birch) so fresh and so sweet, the pastures and meadows so green and well-grown (and that upon the sudden) such variety of flowers, such noise of birds (specially of Nightingales, that seem to be more loud and of a more variable note than in other countries) that a man shall not lightly travel in a more pleasant country. — As the winter exceedeth in cold, so the summer inclineth to over-much heat; specially in the months of June, July, and August, being much warmer than the summer air in England. (7). In winter-time, when all is covered with snow, and the ground so hard frozen, as that no spade, nor pickax can enter, their manner is not to bury their dead, but to keep the bodies (so many as die all the winter-time) in an house, in the suburbs, or out parts of the town, which they call Bohsedom, that is God's house: where the dead bodies are piled up together, like billets on a wood-stack, as hard with the frost as a very stone, till the spring tide come, and resolvethe the frost: what time every man taketh his dead friend, and committeth him to the ground. — The account he gives of the arbitrariness of the government there, is surprizing, but well known (8). To shew his sovereignty over the lives of his subjects, the late Emperor Juan Valowich in his walks or progresses, if he had disliked the face or person of any man whom he met by the way, or that looked upon him, would command his head to be struck off. Which was presently done, and the head cast before him. — He enlarges more fully upon that point, in the dedication of his book to Queen Elizabeth. — 'My meaning, says he, was to note things for mine own experience, of more importaunce than delight, and rather true than strange. In their manner of government, your Highness may see both: a true and strange face of a tyrannical State, (most unlike to your own) without true knowledge of God, without written law, without common justice: save that which proceedeth from their speaking law, to wit, the Magistrate who hath most need of a law, to restrain his own injustice (*). The practise hercof as it is heavy, and grievous to the poor oppressed people that live within those countries: so it may give just cause to myself, and other your Majesty's faithful subjects, to acknowledge our happiness on this behalf, and to give God thanks for your Majesty's most Prince-like, and gracious Government: as also to your Highness more joy and contentment in your Royal Estate, in that you are a Prince of subjects, not of slaves, that are kept within duty by love, not by fear.' — It was, undoubtedly, for these passages that the book was suppressed, as is said above: but it was reprinted at London in 1643. 12mo. and is inserted in R. Hakluyt's Navigations, Voyages, &c. Vol. 1. p. 474, &c. only a little contracted. Mr Camden, speaking of this book, styles it libellum, in quo plurima observanda (9), i. e. a book wherein are many things worthy of observation.

FORTESCUE, FORTESKEWE, or FOSKEWE (Sir JOHN), an able Statesman, an excellent Lawyer, a general Scholar, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, and, as is commonly admitted, Lord High Chancellor of England, in the reign of King Henry the Sixth (a). A person so remarkable every way for abilities, dignities, and misfortunes, that it is, in reality, not a little strange we should not hitherto have had a better account of him; more especially since several attempts have been already made to this purpose, and that too by persons equally capable, and one would have thought willing, to have given the world all the light possible into the personal history of so worthy, so learned, and so great a man [A]. He was indisputably descended from the ancient family of Fortescue,

[A] So worthy, so learned, and so great a man ] It seems a little strange, that Leland, in his history of English authors, has not so much as mentioned Sir John Fortescue, and tho' this defect might seem to be in some measure supplied by the accounts given of him, by Bale and Pits, yet what they say of him is rather by way of character, and even in that they are not much to be depended upon, since Bale tells us, that, step by step, he rose to the office of High Chancellor of England, which great office in the state he executed rescue, in the county of Devon; but some diversity there is as to his immediate parentage. The Reverend Mr Prince, who had the inspection, as he informs us, of pedigrees extracted from the Herald's-Office by Sir William Pole, is very positive that he was the second son of Sir John Fortescue of Norreis (b) [B]. But notwithstanding this, the late Lord Fortescue, one executed long with much authority and dignity, and more to the same purpose (1), tho' it is very certain, that he never executed that office in this kingdom at all. He farther informs us, that he was a long time in exile, but upon what account he confesses himself ignorant, which is a pretty clear proof, that he was very far from being well acquainted with his personal history. As for Pits, in this, as in most other-articles, he copies Bale, and whenever he ventures to depart from him is very seldom in the right. He is so cautious as to say, that it was reported Sir John Fortescue passed part of his life in banishment, which, considering the confusion of the times in which he lived, he thinks might probably be true enough; and then he proceeds to give us a catalogue of his works, of which, according to his manner, he gives us the title of four pieces, and adds, that he wrote several more, but, without doubt, he was a very indifferent judge of them, since the first and the last that he mentions, is the very same book (2) under different titles, an error which he very faithfully copied from Bale, except that in his performance the titles follow each other. They both profess to transcribe Robert Record, an author who deserved a better fate than he met with, for he died a prisoner in the King's Bench in the last year of Queen Mary's reign (3), but they neither of them mention from what work of his they copied what they wrote, and perhaps, without breach of charity, we may suspect that Pits never saw any of our author's books, or perhaps Record's account of him. We cannot doubt that the famous Mr Selden was much better acquainted with the history of Sir John Fortescue, than can be collected either from his preface, or the notes he has written upon his book; and it was certainly a little unkind, not to give the world some farther lights as to so eminent a person, when they lay so much within his power. Doctor Fuller mentions him in several of his works (4), and that I think is the most that can be said, for he has preserved nothing worth reading about him in any of them. We might naturally have expected in the very copious preface, addressed to Sir John Holland, by the late Lord Fortescue (5), a larger or at least a more exact account of this reverend Judge; but it falls out quite otherwise, for he is very short, tells us nothing which we did not know before, except, that he was possessed of a manuscript which he believes Mr Selden never saw, and which, sometime or other, perhaps, might see the light, tho' it never did, nor is he so kind as to tell us so much as its title. One thing he asserts which might have been as well omitted, that the remains of this great man are interred in Campden Church, in which there is a handsome monument to his memory, which induced Bishop Tanner (6) to doubt whether it might not be so, whereas the fact is certain, that he was buried at Ebrington (7) Ebburton, or Ebberton.

[B]. That he was the second son of Sir John Fortescue of Norreis.] The Reverend Mr Prince begins his account of the learned person, who is the subject of this article in these words (8). 'Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Lord Chief Justice, and Lord High Chancellor of England, was born most likely at Norreis, in the Parish of North Huish, near South Brent in this county, he was second son of Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Captain of Meaux in France, by his wife . . . daughter and heir of Norreis, of Norreis, who was second son of William Fortescue of Wimston, antiently Wimondeston, in the Parish of Modbiry, the most antient seat of this honourable name and family in this county or the kingdom, in whose possession it remained from the days of John King of England, to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, about four hundred years, so runs the antient deed, Rex Johannes, per Literas suas Patentes, Datas anno 10. Regni sui, concessit Johanni Fortescue, Wymondeston in Com. Devon.' Yet in the space of a few lines, he gives us such an account of this matter as is not very consistent herewith, his words are these. 'Here, ere I proceed farther in regard of the great variety of the families of this name which flourish in this county, and several other parts of England in high degree, it may not prove unacceptable to the curious herein, to lay down a brief account of the pedigree thereof as an industrious Antiquary of our own hath collected it from the Heralds Office. William Fortescue of Wimpston, seventh in descent from the first possessor, by Elizabeth, sister and coheir of Thomas Beauchamp of Ryme, had issue, William, and Sir John Fortescue, Captain of Meaux, William by Mabilia, daughter and heir of John Falwel, had issue, John, who by Joan, daughter and heir of John Pruteston de Pruteston, in the parish of Newton Ferrers, had three sons, John of Wimpston, William of Pruteston, now Preston, and John of Spridleston, commonly Spurleston. Sir John Fortescue, second son of William, Captain of Meaux, by the daughter and heir of Norreis as aforesaid, had issue three sons; Henry, who by his first wife had issue, Fortescue of Wood, whose issue male failing, his daughter and heir was married unto Fortescue of Preston, by his second wife, only daughter and heir of Fallapit, of Fallapit, in East Allington had issue, Richard Fortescue of Fallapit, whose heir male failing in the third descent, his daughter Elizabeth was married unto Lewis, third son of Fortescue of Spridleston, who hath continued the name there unto this day. The second son of Sir John Fortescue of Norreis, was Sir John Fortescue our present subject, his third son was Richard, from whom issued the several families of this name in the east parts of England, as at Polesborn in Hartfordshire, Fulborn in Essex, Souldon in Bucks, &c. all which sprang originally from Wimpston aforesaid.' It is needless to trouble the reader here with the corrections of this genealogy, since it will be set in a proper light in the next note; it is sufficient to observe that it cannot be right, because that in more instances than one it is inconsistent with itself, which in all probability arose from want of duly considering the collections made by Sir William Pole, which are on all hands allowed to have been very authentick. We have a very different account of this matter from Mr Waterhouse (9), who assures us, that he had it from Sir John Fortescue of Salden in Buckinghamshire, which is conceived in these words. 'He was, says he, third son to Henry Fortescue, son of Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Captain of Meaux, and Governor of Bry in France under Henry the Fifth, which Sir John was second son of William Fortescue of Wimpston, in the county of Devon, Esq; so that our Chancellor being immediate heir in the eighth descent of Sir Richard Fortescue, Knight, who came out of Normandy in the Conqueror's time, was generously descended by his father, and no less by his mother, who was a daughter and heir of Beauchamp, his eldest brother was Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, and died issueless.' The last part of this paragraph is directly contradicted by Prince, and indeed by all the accounts of the family of Fortescue that can be relied upon. It is very true, that the male line in the eldest branch failed, but not as is here represented. There is yet another account which occurs in the labours of so careful and so judicious a writer, that it deserves to be particularly examined, it runs thus (10). 'A gentleman of good sense, who is very conversant in the affairs of the family, informs me, that Sir John Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice, and afterwards Lord Chancellor of England, was the third son of John Fortescue, Knight, Captain of Meaux, &c. and not of Henry Fortescue, Chief Justice of Ireland, who, according to a pedigree of the family in his custody, was the Chancellor's eldest brother. He thinks it pretty plain, for that, the fourteenth of Henry the Sixth, Henry Fortescue, by deed indented, did grant and confirm unto John Fortescue his brother, and Isabella, who was wife of the said John, all the messuages, lands, and tenements, of John Fortescue, father of the said Henry, in one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of King's-Bench, and afterwards of the Common-Pleas, is very clear that he was the third son of Sir Henry Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland (c); and when the matter comes to be fairly examined, it will be found that he is certainly in the right [C]. We have no account where this learned person was born (tho' it is very highly probable it was in the West of England), or in what year; we are likewise in the dark as to the University (d) in which he studied, or indeed whether he studied in either; but most probable it is that he did, and that he applied himself particularly to the Civil Law, in which, we have not only testimony to prove, but his writings likewise shew, that he was very learned (e). It is true that the Reverend Mr Prince (f) thought it probable that he studied at Oxford; and a very learned Prelate (g) says, that he was educated in Exeter College, in that University; but as he cites no authority for this, in respect to which no man was more accurate, it is reasonable to believe that he speaks from conjecture also, though certainly, in a point of this nature, any conjecture of his ought to have great weight. When he turned his thoughts to the municipal laws of England, and resolved, according to the example of his father, to betake himself to that profession, he settled in Lincoln's-Inn, where he quickly distinguished himself in a very extraordinary manner (h), and where it is asserted that his lectures were crowded, on account of the high reputation he had acquired in the Civil as well as the Common Law; which is so much the more probable, as we have his own authority to prove that the Inns of Court were never in a more flourishing condition, or the profession of the Law in greater reverence and esteem, than at this time (i) [D]. The first date that occurs with respect to his preferments, in Overcomb, Efford, and Alton, in the parish of Holboughton, Devon.' Against this account there seem to lie two objections, the first is, that there was a long descent of Fortescues, the male line of which ended in Sir Francis Fortescue, who died at the Bath, November the eleventh, 1729. all claiming a descent from Sir Henry Fortescue, Chief Justice of Ireland, which does not at all agree with this account, the other objection is, that this Henry Fortescue mentioned in the deed, might possibly be Henry Fortescue of Wood, eldest son to Sir Henry Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice, which will agree very well with the descent mentioned in the next note.

[C] That he is certainly in the right. There is no doubt, that the house of Fortescue was settled in the county of Devon in the reign of King John, if not before, and that their antient mansion was Winston in Armington hundred, long since passed into other hands. It appears from Sir William Pole's manuscript of Charters, the great Antiquary of that county, that in the thirtieth year of the reign of King Edward the First, Adam Fortescue, eldest son and heir of Adam Fortescue, granted to Henry Lopperigges (11), an annual rent of seven shillings, which Richard the son of Philip used to pay him for his tenement in Wimonston, to which his seal is affixed, being an oval shield charged with a star, circumscribed Ade Fortescue. After him was William Fortescue of the same place, a witness to the charter of John and William Ferrers, in the thirty fifth of Edward the Third, as the aforesaid manuscript shews. And in the second of Richard the Second, being wrote William Fortescue, Senior, he had a grant with Sir Philip and Sir Peter Courtney, Knights, from Richard Mauldif, called Somaister, of lands in Smytheston, Crencomb, Wypnell, and Thurverton. This William married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of John Beauchamp of Kyme, in the county of Lincoln, and had issue two sons, William Fortescue of Winston, which branch ended in an only daughter and heir of Thomas Fortescue, named Jane, married to Edmund Babington of Wyke, in the county of Worcester, Esquire. John, the second son of the first William Fortescue, was one of those brave Englishmen, who signalized themselves under the standard of that victorious Monarch, Henry the Fifth. Which John Fortescue had the honour of Knighthood conferred on him for his valour in those French wars, and was made Governor of Meaux in Berry. He took to wife . . . . . daughter and heir of William Norris, by whom he had issue, Sir Henry Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland (12), who had three sons, first Henry Fortescue of Wood, in the county of Devon, Sir Richard Fortescue, from whom descended the Fortescues of Painsborn, and the third son, was Sir John Fortescue, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and by his appointment Chancellor. This account is clear, consistent, and well supported, so that there seems to be no reason why it should not be willingly received, instead of those vague, contradictory, unattested stories, that are to be met with in some books.

[D] Than at this time. The most learned Antiquaries in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, whose sentiments we have upon the subject of the Inns of Court and Chancery, agree fully in this, that they never were in so flourishing condition, as in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and that this is a point wholly known from the account given of them by our author, who describes those establishments as they stood about three hundred years ago, or more, referring that description, not to the time when he wrote his book, but when he studied in them. That very curious relation which cannot but be very acceptable to the intelligent reader, runs thus (13). 'To the intent, most excellent Prince, you may conceive the form and image of this study, as I am able I will describe it unto you. For there are for these studies ten lesser houses or Inns, and sometimes more, which are called Inns of Chancery, and to every one of them belongeth an hundred students at least, and to some of them a much greater number, tho' at one time they be not ever all together in the same. Those students for the most part are young men, studying the originals and the elements of the Law, who profiting therein as they grow to ripeness, so are they admitted into the greater Inns, called the Inns of Court, of which greater Inns there are four in number. And to the least of them belongeth in form abovementioned, two hundred students or thereabouts, for in these greater Inns, no student can be maintained for less expences by the year, than twenty marks. And if he have a servant to wait upon him, as most of them have, then so much the greater will his charges be. Now by reason of this, the children only of Noblemen study the Laws in those Inns, for the poorer and common sort of people, are not able to bear so great charges for the exhibition of their children. And Merchants can seldom find in their hearts, to burthen their trade with so great yearly expences. And thus it falleth out, that there is hardly any man found within the realm skilful in the Laws, except he be a gentleman born, and one descended of a noble stock. Wherefore, they more than any other kind of men have a special regard to their nobility, and to the preservation of their honour and fame; and to speak with the strict regard to truth, there is in these greater Inns, and even in the lesser too, beside the study of the Laws, as it were an university or school for the acquisition of all commendable qualities requisite for Noblemen. There they learn to sing, and to exercise themselves in all kind of harmony. There also they practise dancing and other genteel accomplishments, as they are accustomed to do, which are brought up in the King's house. On working days most of them apply themselves to the study of the Law, and on holy days

(13) De laudibus legum, cap. 49.

preferments, is the fourth year of the reign of Henry the Sixth, when, as Sir William Dugdale informs us, he was made one of the Governors of Lincoln's-Inn; and was honoured again with the same employment three years after (k). In Michaelmas term 1430, he was promoted to the degree of a Serjeant at Law, and kept his feast upon that occasion, as he himself informs us, with very great splendour (l) [E]. In 1441, he was in Easter term made one of the King's Serjeants at Law (m); and on the twenty-fifth of January 1442, he was constituted Chief Justice of the King's-Bench at Westminster (n). He is highly commended, by some of our most eminent writers, for that wisdom, gravity, and uprightnes, with which he presided in that Court for so many years (o); but certainly they are somewhat mistaken, or have not considered the history of the times in which he lived, who suggest that he was one of the King's principal Counsellors, and that the Court was in a great measure governed by his advice, the direct contrary of which is most likely to be true. For we cannot conceive, that so mild and good a man, as Sir John Fortescue was, could act otherwise than ministerially in the trial of many of the friends and servants of Humphry Duke of Gloucester, called by the people the good Duke of Gloucester, for high-treason, who were convicted upon slender evidence, and afterwards treated in a manner of which we find no other instance in our own, or in foreign records [F]. It is thought that he opposed the days to study Holy Scripture, and out of the time of divine service to the reading of Chronicles. For there indeed are virtues studied, and from them are vices exiled. So that for the acquisition of virtue, and eradicating of vice, Knights and Barons, with other States, and Noblemen of the realm, place their children in those Inns, even, tho' they desire not to have them learned in the Laws, nor to live by the practice thereof, but only upon their fathers allowance. Seldom, if at any time, is there heard amongst them any sedition or grudging; and yet the offenders are no otherwise punished, than only by being removed from the company of their fellowship, which punishment they more fear than other offenders, imprisonment and irons: for he that is once expelled is never received to be a fellow in any of the other fellowships, and by this means there is continual peace, and their demeanour is like the behaviour of such as dwell together in perfect amity. — But there is one thing more which I would have you know, that neither at Orleans, where both the Canon and the Civil Laws are taught, and to which, for that reason, scholars resort from all the adjacent countries; nor at Anjou, nor at Caen, or any University in France, Paris only excepted, are there so many youths grown up, employed in study, as in these Inns of Court and Chancery, tho' there are none that study there but what are English born. This reflects great honour on that age, tho' possibly somewhat at the expence of this.

[E] With very great splendour.] It is in the same book, and in prosecution of the same discourse, that our very learned author gives Prince Edward an account of the state and degree of a Serjeant at Law (14), wherein, perhaps, the reader may at first imagine there was somewhat of vanity, or at least, of an inclination natural enough to old men, that of speaking of himself. But whoever considers attentively the scheme of that book, will see quite the contrary. The design of its wise and worthy author, was to convince the young Prince, his pupil, that England was the country in the world, in which Laws were in the highest estimation, where they were equally the rule of the King's government, and the measure of the subjects obedience, and where consequently neither could despise them without becoming a tyrant or a rebel. It was natural from hence for him to observe, that a Serjeant is a rank or dignity in the Law, unknown in any nation but this, and consequently the strongest mark of the high and universal respect paid to the profession; to prove this the more fully, he mentions the expence with which the taking this state or dignity was attended, and in doing this he is very brief, he observes, that according to the custom then in use, they gave a great dinner like the feast at a King's Coronation, and continued their entertainments for seven days, which when there were eight Serjeants made at a time, amounted to three thousand two hundred marks, or four hundred marks a piece; he is very particular in marking the number and price of the gold rings, of which, he says, not so much as a clerk in the Common Pleas, but received one, and that when himself was called, those rings cost him fifty pounds. He takes notice likewise, that none could be raised to the office of a Judge, either in the King's-Bench, or Common Pleas, but must be of the degree of a Serjeant, to which degree men could not be then raised till they had been at least sixteen years at the bar, which I the rather mention, because it will enable us to form some notion of his own age, since, if we consider, that he was called to the degree of Serjeant in 1430 (15), we may very well conclude, that he was born in or about the year 1395, which remark, tho' in itself a matter of no great consequence, will have its use hereafter, when we come to mention his transactions in the last part of his life, where we have great need of conjecture and reflection to conduct us.

[F] In our own or in foreign records.] If this was a convenient place, and the nature of the work would allow us room, what is advanced in the text might be proved beyond all contradiction; that is to say, it might be shewn that such things were done by the Court, or, to speak strictly, by the Queen and her favourites, as no good man could behold but with great concern. The single instance hinted at in the text will be more than sufficient, considering the narrow bounds within which we are circumscribed, to justify what has been said. We take this instance however a little higher, for the sake of connection and perspicuity, than the fact pointed at in the text absolutely required (16). Humphry, the renowned Duke of Gloucester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the evil angel, which was sent to punish England and to root out her nobles. This Duke was much hated by the Queen, and her faction, as the only man who by his prudence, as also by the honour and authority of his birth and place, seemed to impeach that sovereign command, which they pretended to settle in the King's own person, but meant indeed, as the manner is under soft Princes, to reign themselves in another's name. Many great Lords were drawn on at the time of a Parliament then in February 1477, holden at Saint Edmund's Bury, to concur for his ruin, not perceiving that thereby they plucked up the floodgate at which the Duke of York entered, overwhelming all of them in a deluge of blood. Whether they had any true or just fear of Gloucester himself, least, perhaps, he should take revenge upon some particular persons among them, is doubtful, tho' it be probable enough that they had. Here are some things that forewent this Parliament. About five or six years before the Duchess of Gloucester, Eleanor, was convented for witchcraft and forcery, and afterward indicted of treason in the Guild-hall, in London, before the Earls of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolk, and Northumberland, and certain Lords, as Stanhope and Hungerford, with others, and Judges of both Benches, of which crimes she was appealed by one Bolingbrook an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Canon, which Southwell was charged to have said Masses over certain instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancy against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as accessory, she having desired the help of their art to know what would befall her. Some part hereof she confessed, for which the Duke of Suffolk (p), who, tho' a man of singular abilities, but very ambitious, became at last sole Minister, and directed all things at his pleasure. Yet, notwithstanding the credit that nobleman had with the Queen, Sir John Fortescue remained in great favour with the King, of which, in the twentieth year of his reign, he received a signal proof, by an unusual augmentation of his salary (*), concerning which there seems to be something obscure, or mistaken, in the writings of a celebrated author [G]. He held his high office throughout the whole reign of his gracious master King Henry the Sixth, to whom he steadily adhered, and served him faithfully in all his troubles; and for this, in the first Parliament under King Edward the Fourth, which began at Westminster on the fourth of November 1461, he was attainted of high treason (q), by the same Act of Parliament in which King Henry the Sixth, Queen Margaret, Edward their son, Henry Duke of Exeter, Henry Duke of Somerset, Thomas Earl of Devonshire, Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and, in the whole, one hundred and fifty-three persons of distinction were likewise attainted (r). On the thirteenth of May following, Sir John Markham was made Chief Justice of the King's-Bench (s). After this misfortune, King Henry the Sixth flying into Scotland, it is generally believed that he constituted Sir John Fortescue Chancellor of England (t), George Nevile then Bishop of Exeter, to whom the Great-Seal had been delivered July the twenty-sixth 1460, remaining in the Service of King Edward the Fourth; and this is the reason that the name of our great Lawyer does not occur in the records as Chancellor of Eng-

which she was put to publick and solemn penance in London, upon three several days with wonderful shame to her person; and after she was committed to perpetual prison under the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the castle of Chester, but from thence removed to Kenelworth. Her pride, avarice, and lechery, were causes of her confusion, faith Stowe, who hath set forth that business very diligently, tho' not seeming to attribute much credit to that accusation of treason. The Duke of Gloucester, her unhappy Lord and Husband, whom she by love cups and enchantments, was said to have inveigled, using therein one Margaret Gurdmain, a witch of Eye in Suffolk, who was burnt in Smithfield, stung with this reproach, might reasonably be thought not unwilling to do somewhat. Howsoever that was, his destruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Bury, was arrested of High-Treason, by John Lord Beaumont, High-Constable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerset, with others. Certain of the King's Household were appointed to guard him. Not long after he was found dead. His body was shewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palsy, or an apoplexy. Of thirty and two of his servants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlain, Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Tursey, Esquires, and Richard Needham, Gentleman, were condemned of High-Treason, and had this unexampled punishment: they were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, hanged, let down quick, stript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a charter of pardon shewed for their lives, by the Marquess of Suffolk. But the Yeoman of the Crown had their livelihood, the Executioner their cloaths. Their pardons were thus obtained, by the earnest diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous preacher, Parson of St Andrew's in Holborn. Thomas Wilde, Esq; the Duke's servant, also being condemned, and pardoned among others, had for a preamble in his letters patents words importing, that he had been one among many other traitors against the King, with Humphry, Duke of Gloucester; who went about and practised to deliver Eleanor, late wife to the Duke, from out of prison; for which purpose he had gathered a great power and number of men to come to the Parliament at Bury, there to have contrived the King's destruction. This which is drawn wholly from Speed, who had the best helps, and wrote under the wisest directions of any of our old Historians, must be distinguished and explained to prevent mistakes. Eleanor Cobham was proceeded against in 1440, but her enemies being able to make nothing of the charge of treason, brought her before Ecclesiastical Judges, who put her to that severe and extraordinary penance (17). But upon mature deliberation, this was considered as so dangerous a precedent, that it produced an Act of Parliament, for allowing women of quality, a trial by their Peers (18). As for her confederates, they were tried before Commissioners in the Guild-hall, London, and convicted of High-Treason, tho' none but Bolingbrook suffered; and there was in this, so much of hardship, and the publick clamour pursued the Lord Chief Justice Hody, who condemned them, so strongly, that he broke his heart (19). It was in his room, that Sir John Fortescue succeeded. In 1444, King Henry married Margaret, the Daughter of the titular King of Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem, at the monastery of Tichfield in Hampshire (20); and on May the thirtieth, 1445, she was crowned at Westminster (21); within two years after which, followed the Tragedy of Humphry, Duke of Gloucester and his followers, whose sentences were afterwards reversed by that Duke's being declared to die the King's good subject, by Act of Parliament (22). When the reader duly considers these facts, he will certainly esteem it no compliment to be represented, as having a large share in such an administration.

[G] In the writings of a celebrated author.] We are told by the late Judge Fortescue, in reference to this venerable person, that he had extraordinary favours shewn him from his Prince; for besides the usual salary of a Chief Justice, he had granted him an augmentation of it two several times, by two several annuities (23). The last of which, was an annuity of one hundred eighty marks out of the Hanaper, a great sum in those days, that he might Statum suum decentius manutenere, as the record says; and with that, was granted the sum of one hundred sixteen shillings, eleven pence half penny, percipiendum singulis annis, ad festum natalis Domini, pro una Roba & Furrara pro eadem, erga idem Festum, and sixty six shillings and six pence, singulis annis, ad Festum Pentecostes, pro una Roba, & Linura pro eadem erga idem Festum; the like favour, as Mr Selden observes, 'having never been granted to any Judge before.' We are not told by this learned person, where Mr Selden says, that this was a favour, the like of which was never granted to any Judge before; but certain it is, that where he mentions this Grant from the King, and gives us the date of it, there is no such thing said. Sir John Hody, his predecessor, had a grant of the very same nature, of a hundred and forty marks (24) &c. and whereas it is asserted, that Sir John Fortescue had his salary twice augmented, and that this large augmentation, was the last; there is great reason to believe otherwise, and that it was in reality the first; after which, he had a grant for a hoghead of wine annually during his life, to be received from the head Butler in the Port of Bristol; and after that, another grant of the like kind, which last vessel of wine was to be received from the same Port on the feast of St Michael the Archangel (25); the second augmentation of his salary, was by Letters Patents, dated May the twenty eighth, 1447. by which forty pounds per annum were granted to him over and above what had been given him before, and this was in the twenty fifth year of that reign (26); neither were favours of this kind at all uncommon, tho' not altogether in such high proportions to other Judges, which, however, land [H]. In the month of April 1463, he embarked with Queen Margaret, Prince Edward, the Duke of Exeter, Dr John Morton, Dr Robert Mackerell, and other persons of distinction, who followed the fortunes of the House of Lancaster, to the number in the whole of two hundred, at Bamburg, and landed safely at Sluys in Flanders, from whence they were conducted to Bruges, and thence to Lisle, where the Queen had an audience of the Duke of Burgundy, to whom, with tears, she related the long series of her misfortunes, and the extreme misery to which she was reduced; with which the Duke being exceedingly moved, comforted her in the best manner that he could, made her a present of a considerable sum of money, and sent her, with most of the English attending her Majesty, into Lorraine, where her father then was, who gave them a castle to reside in, till he should be able to make further provision for them (u). In this exile he remained for many years, retiring from place to place as the necessities of the Royal Family required; for though, during that space, the Queen and Prince were often in motion, and great efforts were made to restore King Henry, yet, considering the age of the Chancellor Sir John Fortescue, it is by no means probable that he was suffered to expose himself to such hazards, more especially as he might be capable of rendering great services, by soliciting their interest at different Courts; and could not at that time of life, being near fourscore, be in any condition to sustain the fatigues of war (w). It does not indeed appear, from any of the histories that are extant, that our Chancellor had any hand in that negotiation, by which Queen Margaret, and the potent Earl of Warwick, were reconciled; but it is, notwithstanding, extremely probable that he had. We know very well, that the Queen was a high spirited woman, and that she was not, without reason, highly provoked against that ambitious nobleman; and therefore we may well presume, that it must have been some person of distinguished character, and who stood very high in her favour, who could so far pacify her resentment, as to engage her in a treaty first, and prevail upon her afterwards, to think of marrying the Prince of Wales, her only child, to the Lady Anne Nevile, younger daughter to the Earl of Warwick; the elder, Isabel, being before married to George Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the Fourth, whom the Queen considered as the usurper of her husband's throne (x). We may the more easily yield credit to this, when we are told that our Chancellor, in a certain book of his, still preserved though not published, represents himself as a Chief Counsellor of State at that time (y); which, if he was, he must undoubtedly have had a large share in a transaction which was by far the most important of any that happened after the Queen and Prince retired out of England, which gave so great a turn to their affairs, and which was very near retrieving their desperate game, and restoring the Line of Lancaster, at that time, to the possession of the imperial diadem of England. But whatever weight there may be in these conjectures, most certain it is, that the Chancellor observing the quick parts, and excellent understanding of his young master, who applied himself wholly to military exercises, and seemed to think of nothing beside qualifying does not at all lessen the argument which is drawn from thence of Sir John Fortescue's standing highly in the King's favour, but on the contrary, strengthens and confirms it.

[H] In the records as Chancellor of England.] We have in an old Chronicle, the following account of some transactions at this time, which may possibly shew the reason, why Sir John Fortescue was attainted by King Edward, and also point out with more certainty than has been hitherto done, the time after which he must have been made Lord Chancellor (27): 'Edwarde Erle of March, by cause King Henry had broken covenantes, was made King at Westminster, Anno Domini, 1459. and straye King Edward rode northward, and at Towton not far from York on Palmes Sunday, advengid his fathers death and wan the field, where were slain XXM people on both parties. The Erle of Northumberland, the Lord Clifford, Sir John Nevil, the Erle of Westmordes brother, and Andrew Trollop, were killed at this time, King Henry, the Prince, the Queen, the Duke of Somerfet, Henry Duke of Excestre, the Lord Roos, Syr John Fortescue, Chief Juge of England, and Tailboys Erle of Kyme, beyng at York, and hering of this fled first to Newcastle, and then to Berwick, delivering it to the Scots.' This plainly shews, that he was only Chief Justice when he attended his master, King Henry, into Scotland; and as from the time he left him there he never saw him any more, there seems to be no room to doubt, that he received the Great-Seal from that King there, as soon as it was known that George Bishop of Excter, afterwards Archbishop of York, continued to bear the title, and execute the Office of Lord Chancellor, by the authority of King Edward. It is true, that some have doubted whether he was ever Chancellor at all; as for instance, Mr Thynne, a very learned Antiquary in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who expresses himself thus (28). 'Sir John Fortescue was only Chief Justice of the Bench, and not Chancellor of England, as he is untruly called by Molcafter, in translating his book of the Laws of England, since he was only Chancellor to the youngest Prince Edward, and his mother, after he fled with them into France.' This, however is false, for Sir John Fortescue, in the preface to his own book, does positively stile himself the King of England's Chancellor. So, as Mr Selden proves, he did in another work of his (29). Mr Whitlocke, who was perfectly well read in the Laws and History of this nation, made no scruple of differing in this respect from Mr Thynne, his words are these (30): 'Fortescue, that lived in Henry Sixth, and Edward the Fourth's time, and was Chancellor of England; and being of the faction of Lancaster, lived an exile in France, when that family was depressed writ a small pamphlet of the Law of England, in that his banishment, wherein he reporteth, &c.' It was probably upon these motives, that Sir Henry Spelman, who was so perfectly versed in every thing relating to our History and Antiquities, has added the name of Sir John Fortescue to the Chancellors in the reign of King Henry the Sixth (31), upon a supposition that he must have been so appointed by that Monarch while in Scotland, which, as he truly says, is a sufficient reason why nothing of this kind appears in our records at all; indeed it is impossible it should, since from the time he was Chancellor, King Henry was never acknowledged, or at least, not for above six months, during which space those who set him at liberty, and restored him to the title of King, obliged him to acknowledge the Archbishop of York for his Chancellor, that prelate being brother to the potent Earl of Warwick, who valued himself on making and unmaking Monarchs at his pleasure.

qualifying himself for an expert commander (z); he thought it high time to give him some other impressions, and to infuse into his mind just notions of the constitution of his country, as well as due respect to it's laws, that, if Providence should favour his designs, he might govern as a king, and not as a tyrant or a conqueror (a). That these impressions might not easily wear out of his mind, but that by frequently reviewing what had passed in these conversations, he might the better fix them in his memory, and strengthen them by his own meditations, the Chancellor digested them into a little treatise, written in the Latin tongue (b); which, how short soever it fell of it's primary intention, that hopeful Prince being not long after cruelly murdered, yet will remain an everlasting monument of this great and good man's respect for his country, and affection to his countrymen, which could not be better testified than it was by this short treatise [I]. There may possibly some doubts arise about the precise time in which this valuable work was composed, and indeed something of this kind has been already intimated, by writers of great authority (c). However, such as will look carefully into the work itself, and compare it with the history of these times, will very plainly see that it was written within a year or two of Prince Edward's death; for the establishing of which opinion, the proofs requisite will be found at the bottom of the page [K]. This very curious and concise vindication, as well as elogium,

[I] Than it was by this short treatise.] This discourse of Sir John Fortescue's, has, in the most eminent degree, those two great properties, from which works of learning are justly stiled excellent, solidity in point of matter, and elegance in reference to its form. It is written in the way of dialogue, in which the characters are sustained with great dignity and spirit; he shews the Prince, that it is absolutely necessary for one of his condition to have a good understanding in the Laws, and a just regard for them too, in order to make himself easy, and to keep up the reverence due to them amongst the people; he demonstrates the advantage of a constitution governed by stated Laws, in making of which the subject has an interest; beyond that of a government, depending on the absolute pleasure of a Prince. He puts proper objections into the mouth of his pupil, and proposes them with a great air of freedom, and then he resolves them briefly, decently, and with much perspicuity; he observes, that what was requisite for a Prince to know in these matters lay within a narrow compass, and that there is no reason he should apprehend any thing, either tedious or difficult in acquiring such knowledge. Our author then proceeds to prove, that the Common Law is the most rational, as well as the most antient, in Europe. That the conviction of criminals by juries, and without racking, is more just and humane than the methods of neighbouring nations, our challenging of panels, writs of attain upon corrupt verdicts, and the usual wealth of our juries, such securities to the lives and property of the subject, as other countries are incapable of affording; that our Kings are greater and more potent in the liberties and properties of their people, than arbitrary tyrants in the vassalage of their slaves; that the Civil Law is more unreasonable than ours in the legitimation of children born before marriage, as also in its axiom partus sequitur ventrem, tuition of orphans, &c. that our Inns of Court are more convenient for the study of the English Law than their Universities, and that the degree of Serjeant at Law is as honourable, as that of Doctor in the Universities; and, in the last place, that the proceedings in our Courts of Justice are less dilatory than in those of other nations. These important and some of them too perplexed points, are handled with such clearness and strength of reason as may be truly said to carry with them conviction; with great reason therefore, did a wise and worthy author, upon nearly the same subject, deliver his opinion of this work in these terms (32). 'If the Noblemen of this realm would see their children brought up in such manner, that they should have learning and knowledge more than they commonly have, especially of the grounds and principles of the Law of the Realm, tho' they had not the cunning of the whole body of the Law, but after such manner as Mr Fortescue, in his book De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, advertiseth the Prince to have, I suppose it would be a great help hereafter to the ministration of justice, and a right great gladness to all people.' Sir Edward Coke, who often mentions our author, and this work of his, mentions him always with applause; in one place he tells us, that besides his profound knowledge in the Law, he was also an excellent Antiquary (33); and in another, he points out some particular chapters in this work, which he assures us are so excellent (34), that they deserve to be written in letters of gold.

[K] At the bottom of the page.] In the course of the conversation the Prince proposes it as an objection, that notwithstanding the excellency of the English Laws, yet some of the Kings, his predecessors, had been desirous of introducing the Civil Laws, of which therefore he desires to know the reason. The Chancellor tells his Highness that he need not be at a loss, for that since Princes might be easily conceived willing enough to change the Laws of England, because of their binding alike upon them and their subjects, for the Civil Law built upon a principle directly opposite, quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem, that the will of the Prince shall have the force of a Law. Upon this it has been demanded, what authority the Prince had to affirm, that any Monarch of England should form a design of changing the Common for the Civil Laws? The very learned Mr Selden discourses thereupon thus (35). 'I confess, I here understand him not. What Kings of England ever desired the Civil Laws of Rome? I have read of a protestation against them in Parliament, by the King and Lords, which you may see in Rot. process. & jud. of the appeal of Thomas Duke of Gloucester, and others, against Alexander Archbishop of York, Robert de Veer Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, and Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, in Rich. 2. Parlamento Westm. 3 Febr. Anno 11. where upon default of the appellees, the appellants desire that the Court would proceed to judgment. I remember also King Stephen, his publick edict against the Laws of Italy, but remember not any story or authority teaching that any of our Kings would have had them here used. That of Stephen is related by that noble and most learned Friar, Roger Bacon, in his Compendium Theologiæ, or his Opus minus (both those names are of one Ms book) where he is speaking of the Civil Laws of Italy, and that they are abused and too much affected by Clergymen, leaving their profession to study those Laws.' What he quotes from Bacon is to this effect, he says, that the several countries of Europe, such as England, France, Spain, Germany, were governed by Laws and constitutions of their own respectively, and so were the people of Italy, therefore no reason that the English Clergy should endeavour to bring in the Italian Laws, but rather that they should live as their ancestors had done under the Laws of their own country. King Stephen, says he, by a publick edict prohibited so much as the keeping the Italian Laws in a man's custody, and if a Lay King took such a method to prevent Laymen from being subjected to them, much more ought the Clergy to disdain these Laws that were made by and belonged to Laymen. Mr Selden afterwards observes, that tho' Bacon is so clear about the Civil Law, yet another author, of full as great authority in things of this nature, suggests, that it was a book of the Canon Law, which Archbishop Theobald brought with him from Rome. All this, however, is very little to the purpose, and if it proves any thing, proves directly the contrary of what our author has put into the mouth of Prince Edward. Let us hear now, what another great of our laws, was received with that esteem and credit which it deserved, immediately after great oracle of the Law takes to be the meaning of this passage (36). 'H. 6. had William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, &c. who endeavoured to have brought in the Civil Laws, which was the occasion that the Chief Justice Fortescue wrote in the commendation of the Laws of England, preferring them for the government of this Land before the Civil Laws. This Duke, with others, plotted the death and destruction of Humfry the good Duke of Gloucester who ever stood in his way.' It is highly probable, that Sir John Fortescue might differ with the Duke of Suffolk, and it is not at all impossible, that the Duke of Suffolk might have a high opinion of the Civil Law, tho' it would be no easy matter to produce any proof of either. But what then? The Duke of Suffolk had been dead many years, and the whole scope of this treatise plainly proves, that it was writ upon a sudden occasion, and all at a time. The last commentator, whose name I am sorry it is not in my power to mention, gives quite another and a better turn to this (37). 'King Henry the Sixth's Queen was niece to the Queen of France, and came out of a country where an arbitrary Government prevails: in order to raise her own power, she insisted and infused into her favourites, that the Duke of Gloucester's administration according to the strictness of the national Laws was mean, and below the dignity of that sovereign power and dominion which the Civil Law conferr'd on the King's person, and therefore she countenanced such proceedings as looked imperious and absolved from all restriction. Why may not our author have respect to this particular character and case?' This is very sensible and very clear, and, to say the truth, the Chancellor's whole book is very plainly built upon his apprehensions, that a foreign education, and living so long in the earlier part of his life in a foreign country, might have had effects upon the young Prince's mind, and bring him to have a dislike, or at least an indifference for the Laws and constitution of his native country. Sir John Fortescue was a man of probity, a man of loyalty, and a man of letters, which his whole book and his whole conduct shows, for they are indeed reciprocal comments upon each other. His probity appears in his making the constitution of England his first and greatest temporal concern; his loyalty was without reproach, he adhered to King Henry and Prince Edward so long as they lived; if he afterwards embraced the part of King Edward, it was when Providence and the Laws of the land had declared in his favour; his knowledge and learning are placed beyond dispute, by this and by his other treatise, both which are short, plain, and convincing. It remains, that in this note, according to the promise made in the text, we establish the juncture at which his treatise De Laudibus Legum Angliæ was written, and if this cannot be done in few words yet no more shall be used than are necessary. The passage that I rely upon to fix within a year or so at the farthest, is that which follows, and I insist upon it the rather, because there is not a word said of it by any of the learned commentators, upon this excellent work; it is in these words (38). 'Now what man is there so stout or resolute, who has once gone through this horrid trial by torture, be he never so innocent, who will not rather confess himself guilty of all kinds of wickedness, than undergo the like tortures a second time, who would not rather die once, since death would put an end to all his fears, than to be killed so many times, and suffer so many hellish tortures, more terrible than death itself? Don't you remember, my Prince, a criminal, who when upon the rack impeached of treason a certain noble Knight, a man of worth and loyalty, and declared that they were both concerned together in the same conspiracy: and being taken down from the rack he still persisted in the accusation, lest he should again be put to the question. Nevertheless, being so much hurt and reduced by the severity of the punishment, that he was brought almost to the point of death, after he had the Viaticum and Sacraments administered to him, he then confessed and took a very solemn oath upon it, by the Body of Christ, and as he was now as he imagined just going to expire; he affirmed that the said worthy Knight was innocent, and clear of every thing he had laid to his charge; he added, that the tortures he was put to were so intolerable, that rather than suffer over again, he would accuse the same person of the same crimes, nay, his own father, tho' when he said this, he was in the bitterness of death, when all hopes of recovery were over. Neither did he at last escape that ignominious death, for he was hanged, and at the time and place of his execution, he acquitted the said Knight of the crimes wherewith he had not long before charged him. Such confessions as these, alas! a great many others of those poor wretches make, not led by a regard to truth, but compelled to it by the exquisiteness of their torments.' It is very evident, that this story was at that time of so great notoriety, as not to lay the Chancellor under any necessity of mentioning the person's name; in the next place, it is very apparent, that it was a very recent thing with which the Prince was well acquainted, and therefore likely to move him the more. Lastly, the circumstances mentioned in the story are such as distinguished it sufficiently. The informer was a mean man, the person accused a Knight, and otherways of distinguished reputation; this accusation brought him into great trouble and danger, out of which, however, he was at length extricated, and as for the informer, his infidelity turned upon himself, and he was executed upon his own evidence. Let us hear then what a certain Historian says, who lived in these times, and was himself Sheriff of London, consequently well acquainted with what he relates, and whose authority therefore ought not to be doubted. The story he tells us, is in the year 1468, and, in his own words, runs thus (39). 'Sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, was by one, named Hawkins, appeached of treason, for the which he was sent to the Tower, and his place within London seized by the Lord Rivers, and his wife and servants clearly put out thereof. The cause was this. The forenamed Hawkins came upon a treason unto the said Sir Thomas, requesting him to lend a thousand marks upon good surety, whereunto he answered, that first he would know for whom it should be, and for what intent. At length understanding it should be for the use of Queen Margaret, he answered he had no current wares, whereof any shifts might be made without too much loss, and therefore required Hawkins to move him no further in that matter, for he intended not to deal withal, yet the said Hawkins exhorted him to remember what benefits he had received by her, when she was in prosperity, as by making him her wardrober and customer of Hampton, &c. But by no means the said Cooke would grant goods nor money, altho' at last the said Hawkins required but an hundred pounds, he was fain to depart without the value of a penny, and never came again to move him, which so rested two or three years after, till the said Hawkins was cast into the Tower, and at length brought to the brake called the Duke of Excester's daughter, by means of which pain he shewed many things, amongst the which, the motion was one that he had made to Sir Thomas Cooke, and accused himself so far that he was put to death. By means of which confession, the said Sir Thomas was troubled, as before is shewed, when the said Sir Thomas had lain in the Tower from Whitsuntide till about Michaelmas, in the which season many enquiries were made to find him guilty, and ever quit, till one jury, by means of Sir John Fog, indicted him of treason, after which an Oyer and Terminer was kept at the Guild-hall, in which sat with the Mayor the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Rivers, Sir John Fog, with other of the King's Council. To the which place the said Thomas was brought, and there arraigned upon life and death, where he was acquitted of the said indictment, and had to the Counter in Bread-Street, and from thence to the King's Bench. After a certain time that he was thus acquitted, his wife got again the possession of her house, the which she found in an evil plight, for such servants of the Lord Rivers, and Sir John Fog, as were assigned to keep it, made havock of what they listed.

it's being communicated to the learned men of the profession (d), then flourishing in this kingdom; and yet, notwithstanding the reputation both of the piece and it's author, it continued long as a kind of jewel in private libraries; and, when it was at last published, came abroad in a manner little suitable either to the value of the performance, or the respect due to the memory of this reverend Sage in the law (e); but, by degrees, all these inconveniencies have been removed, and, in consequence of several new editions, we have it now in that state in which so useful a book, and so honourable for our constitution, deserved justly to appear [L]. But to return to our famous Chancellor. He had, without doubt, a very good opinion of the state of King Henry's affairs, when he had intelligence that the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, had released him out of the Tower, placed him again upon the throne, and forced his competitor King Edward to leave England. These successes determined him not only to consent to the proposition made for Queen Margaret's going over with her only son Prince Edward, but made him also resolve to accompany her himself (f). Great preparations were made for this expedition, in which they were favoured by the French King (g); but before they were in a condition to put to sea, there happened a new change of affairs in England. For King Edward landing in the North, advanced with a very small body of forces to York, where, upon his solemn declaration that he did not aim at the crown, but sought only restitution to his duchy of York, and the estates belonging to his family (h), he quickly gained a superior force, with which, passing by Marquis Montacute, he entered London, and made King Henry the Sixth once more a prisoner (i). Then marching to Barnet, with his brother the Duke of Clarence, now reconciled to him, he fought the Earl of Warwick, who stiled himself King Henry's Lieutenant, upon Gladmore-Heath, on Easter-Sunday, April the fourteenth 1471, and there gained a compleat victory (k). This, without doubt, was very unwelcome news to Queen Margaret, listed. Also at his place in Essex, named Giddihall, were set another fort to keep that place, the which destroyed his deer in his park, his conies, and his fish, without reason; and spared not brass, pewter, bedding, and all that they might carry, for the which might never one penny be gotten in recompence; yet could not Sir Thomas Cooke be delivered till he had paid eight thousand pounds to the King, and eight hundred pounds to the Queen. We are farther told by Stowe, that Sir John Markham, Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, having directed the Jury that Sir Thomas Cooke's offence was but misprision of treason, the Lord Rivers, and the Duchesse of Bedford, his wife, informed the King thereof, and prevailed upon him afterwards to dismiss him from his office (40). If therefore this be the story to which our learned author alludes, as methinks there is no great reason to doubt that it must be; then, it follows plainly the discourse could not be written before the year 1469, and indeed there are some other circumstances in that treatise, which might be urged to the same purpose, but this being remarkably clear, and so well attested by our antient Historians, there does not seem to be any necessity of alledging farther evidence, when nothing can possibly be opposed to it, but bare conjectures without proof, or even probability to support them.

[L] Deserved justly to appear ] The history of the several editions of this celebrated work, is not a bare matter of curiosity, but also of use, because (except very briefly, by Bishop Tanner) (41) we have not hitherto had so distinct a catalogue of them, as might be wished. It first appeared in Latin only, under the following title, which seems to have been that of the manuscript from whence it was printed.

Prænobilis militis cognomento Fortescue, De politica administratione & legibus civilibus Florentissimi regni Angliæ Commentarius. Lond. per Ed. Whitchurch, temp. Henr. VIII. 12mo.

It was again printed in Latin and English, by the care of Robert Mulcaster, Lond. 1567, 12mo. it was also published in English alone, under the following title,

A learned Commentary of the Politic Laws of England: Wherein, by most pithy reasons and demonstrations, they are plainly proved to excel, as well the Civil Laws of the Empire, as also all other Laws of the World; with a large discourse of the difference between the two Governments of Kingdoms, whereof the one is only regal; and the other consisteth of regal and politic administration conjoined. Lond. 1599. 8vo.

It was again published both in Latin and English, with the following title.

De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, written by Sir John Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice, and after Lord Chancellor. VOL. III. No. 167.

cellor to King Henry the Sixth. Hereto are added the two sums of Sir Ralph de Hengham, Lord Chief Justice to King Edward the First, commonly called Hengham Magna, & Hengham Parva, with notes, both on Fortescue and Hengham. By that famous and learned Antiquary, John Selden, Esq; Lond. 1616, 1640. 8vo. 1672. 12mo.

Some of these, and more especially the last edition, were very faulty; the Stationers, as a certain author justly observes, regarding no body's profit but their own. In the mean time it came out again, soon after the Restoration, in a very flourishing dress; and tho' I cannot say with, yet involved in the following pompous title.

FORTESCUTUS ILLUSTRATUS; or a Commentary on that nervous treatise, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ; written by Sir John Fortescue, Knight, first Lord Chief Justice, after Lord Chancellor to King Henry the Sixth, which treatise dedicated to Prince Edward, that King's son and heir whom he attended in his retirement into France, and to whom he loyally and affectionately imparted himself in the virtue and variety of his excellent discourse, he purposely wrote to consolidate his princely mind in the love and approbation of the good Laws of England, and of the laudable customs of this his native country. The heroick design of whose excellent judgment and loyal addition to his Prince, is humbly endeavoured to be revived, admired, and advanced by Edward Waterhouse, Esquire. Lond. 1663. folio.

The very language of this title is a sufficient sample of the book, where the reader will find a profusion of learning, and yet meet with very little satisfaction. A short chapter, a line, nay, a word, furnishes occasion, I cannot prevail upon myself to say, matter, for a folio page, diversified with variety of languages, and embroidered with numerous quotations from Schoolmen and Divines, as well as Lawyers. This Commentary however was licensed by the Judges, and dedicated to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, and perhaps with a view to this dedication, the book was in some measure written, as the reader may perceive, from the following parallel, which our commentator has drawn between his author and his patron (42).

'My noble text, Master, and your noble self, says he, to the Earl of Clarendon were—Both Gentlemen by birth, both Lawyers by breeding, both Knights by degree, both wise men by experience, both loyal attendants on your Sovereigns recesses abroad, and both honoured by your Sovereigns with the trust and state of Chancellors.' The last edition we shall mention, is that printed at London in folio, in 1732, again in 1741, with a copious preface, and with large, learned, and useful annotations, an accurate index, and whatever else is necessary to satisfy a curious and inquisitive reader.

Margaret, who, with Prince Edward, Sir John Fortescue, styled Lord Chancellor of England, the Prior of St John's, who had the title of Lord High-Treasurer, Lord Wenlock, and several others, landed the very same day at Weymouth, in Dorsetshire (l). However, being joined by the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Devonshire, she resolved to prosecute her design, and to make head against the conqueror, relying upon a great reinforcement which was expected from Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who was raising men in Wales for the service of King Henry (m). But this was prevented by the vigilance of King Edward, who, having recruited his army as soon as possible, marched Westward, and reduced his enemies to the necessity of fighting near Tewksbury, in Gloucestershire. This battle was fought on Saturday the fourth of May 1471, and was very bloody; but at length ended in the total defeat of the Queen's army, the Queen herself, the Prince, and most of the great persons in her army, being either killed or taken prisoners (n). There is said to be a tradition, that, after this decisive stroke, Sir John Fortescue retired to his seat at Ebberton or Ebbrighton, three miles from Camden in Gloucestershire, where he passed the remainder of his days in privacy (o). But History speaks another language; for by that we are informed, that Prince Edward, being delivered by the gentleman who took him, upon promise of preserving his life, was, for a haughty answer given to King Edward, basely murdered by the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Lord Hastings, and others (p). The Duke of Somerset, the Lord St John, Sir Humphry Audley, and Sir Gervase Clifton, having retired into a church in Tewksbury, continued there upon the King's promise of pardon, though they might have escaped from Saturday to Monday, when they were taken out and beheaded (q); at the same time Queen Margaret, the Lady Anne, Widow to Prince Edward, the Countess of Devonshire, the Lady Catherine Vaus, Sir John Fortescue, Sir John Saintlowe, Sir Henry Rous, Thomas Ormond, Dr Mackerell, and five others, were spared (r). It is very certain, that in a short time King Edward was prevailed upon to pardon and release Sir John Fortescue (s); nor is it at all impossible that he likewise restored him to this estate, which was of the value of four hundred pounds a year. This, I say, is not at all improbable, since Sir John Burg, to whom the manor of Ebbrighton had been given, died the very same year (t). There is no manner of doubt that our Chancellor, seeing the affairs of the House of Lancaster entirely overturned, endeavoured to reconcile himself to the victorious Edward the Fourth, and that in this he succeeded; and it was in order to facilitate this reconciliation, that he wrote a kind of apology for his own conduct, which treatise the learned Selden had seen (u), and of which some manuscript copies are still preserved, tho' it has never yet been published [M]. After all these extraordinary changes, as well of his masters as of his fortunes, Sir John Fortescue preserved his old principles, in regard to the constitution, as appears from another learned and valuable work of his, written in the English

[M] Tho' it has never yet been published.] The title of the piece hinted at in the text at large, runs thus.

Sir John Fortescue's Declaracioun upon certayn writings sent out of Scotteland, agens the Kyngis title of his Roialme of Englonde (43). By way of Dialogue.

There is no doubt at all with me, that if we had this treatise published, we should see that he made a very grateful return to the King for his mercy, which, more than one writer intimates, he freely obtained; but having formerly written in direct terms against the title of the House of York, as well as in defence of that of Lancaster, he judged it highly expedient for him now to give a fair account of his changing his sentiments, for this may be well deduced from what Selden says in his preface, where speaking of our author's taking the title of Chancellor, he delivers himself thus. 'In his Declaration, or rather Retraction, of that he had written against the title of the House of York, himself, puts in the mouth of a friend of his expostulating with him these words, considering that ye were the chief Chancellor to the said late King.' But tho' we mention this, to shew the sense he had of the royal mercy extended to him, yet we have in the text refuted from authority, the groundless insinuation of a certain writer a little too apt to advance things at random, contained in these words (44). 'I suppose he grew weary of banishment, and the interrests of the House of Lancaster, some time before the unhappy return of the Queen and her son, upon the Earl of Warwick's revolt, since we do not hear of him in their retinue.' It is shewn in the text, that he was in their retinue, if that expression must be used towards a man of his rank, and that he shared in the dismal consequences of the decisive defeat at Tewksbury; so that to say, as the same writer does, that he changed his side and his principles is extremely harsh, and was certainly the effects of that writer's not knowing the true state of his case. But a captious reader may possibly have it at his tongue's end to say; since you acknowledge that you have not seen this treatise, how, with any certainty, can you know it? To this it is very fit that an answer should be given; for to be angry with a man's conjecture, without offering any thing towards the disproof of it, is not only acting rudely, but ridiculously. But mark what is the true state of the question. I very readily acknowledge that he changed his political opinions, but I deny that he either changed his side or his principles. Not his side, for he adhered to King Henry and Prince Edward as long as they lived, so that he did not pass from side to side, but very wisely submitted when he saw that resistance was both vain and unjust. Not his principles either, for we shall see that he steadily maintained them after he acknowledged the right as well as the power to be in the House of York. Now to prove all this, notwithstanding that remarkable dialogue of his still shut up in a library, let us hear what Sir Edward Coke says (45), who had perused this treatise, and who will not only give us a general view of its contents, but his opinion likewise of his predecessor's practice, and a better opinion than his in a point of this nature, all things considered, cannot be easily had; take it then in his own words. 'Fortescue De Laudibus Legum Angliæ: this book was written in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, in commendation of the Laws of England, containing withal much excellent matter worthy the reading: he wrote also a book in defence of the title of King Henry the Sixth, his Sovereign Lord and Master, to the Crown of England, but after, out of truth and conscience, retracted the same, both which I have: where in he deserved singular commendation, in that he was not amongst the number of those, qui suos amasent errores, but yielded to truth when he found it. This Sir John Fortescue was Lord Chief Justice of England, and his posterity remain in great and good account to this day.' This certainly is decisive, and comes up fully to all that I have said.

[N] Which will appear in the notes.] The title of this work, as it stood in it's original edition, runs thus:

The Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy, as it more particularly regards the English Constitution; being a Treatise, written by Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Lord Chief Justice, and Lord High-Chancellor of England, under King Henry VI. Faithfully transcribed from the Manuscript Copy in the Bodleian Library, and collated with three other Manuscripts. Published with some Remarks, by John Fortescue Aland, of the Inner-Temple, Esq; F. R. S. Lond. 1714, 8vo.

In reference to the genuineness of the peice, and to the certainty of it's being our author's, hear what the right honourable editor thereof, John, Baron Fortescue of Credans, in the County of Waterford, (for so Mr Fortescue Aland was afterwards created) says in his Preface. 'The first copy of this piece, I saw at Oxford some years ago, in the Bodleian Library, among the manuscripts of Mr Selden, and being taken with the excellency of the subject, I procured a transcript of it, which I carefully examined myself in Oxford, and collated the same with three other manuscript copies, two of which I found in the same library, among the manuscripts of Archbishop Laud, and Sir Kenelm Digby; and the third, I found in the Cotton Library. But this copy is the fairest, most perfect, and compleat of them all, and was transcribed by Sir Adrian Fortescue's own hand, who was a descendant from our author, and lived in the reign of King Henry VIII; for I find written upon this copy, these words: Isse Liber pertinet Adriano Fortescue, Militi, manu propria scriptus, Anno Domini 1532, & Anno Regis H. VIII. 24 (46). But Archbishop Laud's copy seems to be the most ancient, for therein are to be found several Saxon characters in several places, and some very old words different from those in this copy; but all the various readings which are material, for the curious Antiquary, I have noted in the margin of this book. As to the language, it is the English of those times, participating very much of the nature of the Saxon tongue; for it has in it many words, and terminations of words, as also many phrases, purely Saxon: And I chose to publish it in it's own native dress, not only as it is a curious piece of antiquity, but that every man may be judge for himself of the true sense and meaning of our author; and lay no imputation on the publisher of altering the sense, in attempting to give it a more modern dress.'

It is not easy to apprehend what the cause might be, which hindered the noble editor from speaking clearly of the occasion and design for, or time in, which it was written; but certain it is, that none of these are particularly marked, neither is the least word said, that this treatise was penned in favour of King Edward the Fourth, which, notwithstanding, may be proved from several passages in the book itself, though it cannot be denied, that in the title of the manuscript in the Cotton Library, it is said to be addressed to King Henry the Sixth (47); this treatise is divided into twenty chapters, we will briefly run over the contents of them all. In the first, he shews the difference between an absolute and a limited monarchy, which he very plainly and sensibly places in a King's ruling by laws of his own making, which he calls Dominium Regale; and in a Prince's governing by laws made with the consent of his subjects, which he calls Dominium Politicum & Regale. In the second chapter, he points out the means by which these differences in government grew, and that with equal perspicuity and sagacity. He supposes, that in rougher and more barbarous times, such as had followers, and power, made use of them to settle principalities, and so ruled their people when settled, as they did before, that is, by their mere will and pleasure. But when men were become milder and more civilized, he thinks they chose their own governors, and prescribed the terms upon which they would be governed; hence he takes occasion to observe, that when Brute first settled this island, he brought with him a colony, and consequently must have previously agreed with them how public affairs should be administered. Let no hasty critic, or forward politician, blame our reverend author for giving credit to what others stile a fable; but let them observe the good use he has made of this piece of vulgar history, whether true or false, viz. to shew that there never was such a thing as absolute government established in this island, and before they reject his reasons for it, let them be sure they can assign better. The business of his third chapter, is to shew the fruits of an absolute and of a limited government; he instances, as to the former in France; and shews that the government there became absolute by our invasions, when their Kings, pleading necessity for raising supplies, and the impossibility of calling their Estates, took thence occasion to tax the common people at their pleasure, whence had arisen their poverty and distressed condition, which he largely and pathetically describes; and he deduces the power and strength of the English nation, from their living under the other form of rule, which enabled them not only to defend themselves, but to conquer their neighbours; and thus, says he, we may judge of the nature of governments by our Saviour's rule, by their fruits shall ye know them. These three chapters fall in so exactly with the beginning of his book, de Laudibus Legum Angliæ; that, as the last and best commentator upon that piece observes, it is impossible he should not have referred to it, as he does to another treatise, if that work had not been composed before this. In his fourth chapter, he shews how the French King's revenues come to be double to that of the King of England; because, says he, the French King takes what he pleases, and the King of England what his people will please to give him. In the fifth chapter, he shews the mischiefs that arise from a King's being poor, and more especially from his being in debt; and this he does very fully, though very concisely, arguing, that as he must always pay more in such circumstances, than he would need to pay if in better; so what he pays, coming in the end out of his peoples pockets, the nation must be impoverished that suffers their King to be distressed. In the sixth chapter, he shews the ordinary charges of the realm, in which he observes, that tonnage and poundage ought not to be considered as a part of the King's general revenue, since it is given for a particular use, and should only be applied to the maintaining his dominion of the seas. His seventh chapter, treats of the extraordinary expence of the crown. In the eighth, he shews, that if the King's settled revenue be not sufficient, it is the duty of his subjects to supply him, and in this kingdom more especially, where both the King's ordinary and extraordinary expences, are employ'd for the benefit of his people. He insists in his ninth chapter, on the danger of subjects becoming too potent; and he observes, that in France, the government was never subverted but by such potent subjects; here I must crave the liberty of citing his own words. 'In our days, says he, we have seen a subgett of the Frenche Kyng gyvyn battel to the same Kyng, and put him to flight, and afterward begid him in Parise, his grettest Cyte, and so kepte hym ther, unto the time his said Kyng had made such end with him, his adherents, and fautours, as he desired. We have also seen in our Realme, sum of the Kyng's subgetts gevyn hym batell, by occasion that their lyvelood and offices were the grettest of the lond, and els they would nor could have done so. The Erllys of Lyncestre, and of Gloucestre, which then war the grettest Lords of England, rose ageyn theyr Kyng, Herry the thirde, and toke hym and his son prisoners in the feld. Whiche maner of demeanyng the Kyng of Scotts, that last dydd, dredyng to be practysyd in his lond, put out of the same lond, the Erls Dowglas, whose lyvelood and myght was nere hand equivalent to his owne, movyd therto by non other cause, save only drede of his rebellion.' The reason of citing this passage, is, on account of it's helping us to several dates. The French subject, who defeated

defeated his Sovereign, and shut him up in the city of Paris, till he made a treaty to his satisfaction, was Charles Count de Charolois, eldest son to the Duke of Burgundy, who formed a league of the great French Lords, against Lewis XI, which produced the civil war, covered with the specious title of the Publick Good; he gained the battle of Montlehery, on Tuesday, July 16, 1465, and forced the King to grant him and his associates what they pleased (48). The King of Scots spoken of, as long before deceased, was James the Second, who died in 1460 (49). In the tenth chapter, he enquires how the Crown may be best endowed; and therein he determines, that, all things considered, the best method for increasing the King's Revenue, was to augment his Crown Lands. In the eleventh chapter, he shews how this may be done by a resumption, but with due care, and under proper restrictions; and therein he seems to exempt the King's brethren, to whom, for their services, as well as their being nigh in blood to his Highness, he says, the King had given lands, and that it did not become his magnificence to act otherwise. This plainly shews, that the King he means, was Edward the Fourth; for considering the dates formerly fixed, he could mean no other; at the close of the chapter, he proposes that a large subsidy should be given the King by his people, that he may be able to give ample rewards to those from whom the lands which he had inconsiderately bestowed upon them, should be taken, and this to prevent the King's falling into poverty again. The dismal consequences that must necessarily follow the bringing the Commons of this Realm into poverty, is the subject of the twelfth chapter, which, though at first sight it may seem, in a great measure, antiquated; yet, if strictly and soberly considered, the grounds of his observations will yet be found true; for he says, that on one hand, these needy Commons will be most ready to rise up against the government; and, on the other, such as are not inclined to rise, will not have wherewithal to help the government; whence he infers, that if a people be rich, the King ought to be rich; but, if the people be not rich, the King must be poor: It appears from the particular mention of taxes in this chapter, that this treatise must have been written after the year 1474. In the thirteenth chapter, he labours to prove, that the only reason why the French do not rebel, is their want of courage; and upon this, he advances a very odd fact, that there were more men hanged in a year in England, for robbery and manslaughter, than in seven years in France for the same crimes; he says, that in Scotland, there was hardly a man hanged for robbery once in seven years; but, in England, says he, if a man be very poor, and see another very rich, whom he may despoil by force, he will not fail to do so. In France, therefore, says he, it is not their poverty, but their want of heart, that keeps men from rising. In the fourteenth chapter, he proposes an act of Resumption, and a large subsidy, as the only means by which the grandeur of the Crown could be restored; and the Commons freed from the necessity of giving continual supplies. The title of his fifteenth chapter is, how the King's Council may be best chosen and established; this seems to have been a favourite design of his, and to have cost him much more pains than any in his book; and therefore, as well as because it is short, we will give it the reader precisely in his own words. 'The Kings Councile was wont to be chosyn of grete Princis, and of the grettest Lords, both Spirituallis and Temporallis, of the Realm; and also of other men that wer in grete auctorite and offices. Which Lords and Officers, had nerehand as many matters of their own to be treatid in the Councile, as had the Kyng. Wher thorow whan they came togeders, thay was so occupyd with their own maters, and with the maters of their kynne, servants, and tenants, that they intendyd but lityll, and other while, nothyng to the Kyng's maters: and also, ther war but fewe maters of the Kyng's, but if the same maters, towchid also the said Counceylors, their cofyns, their servaunts, tenants, or such other as thay owy'd favor unto. And what lowar man was than sytting in that Councile, that durst, say, ageyn the opynyoun of any of the grete Lords? And might not than men make, by meyns of corrupcion, sum of the servaunts and Counceillours, of some of the Lords, to move the Lords to parcyalite, and to make them favourable and parcyal, as wer the same servaunts, or the parties that so movyd them. Than could no mater treatid in the Councile, be kepte privy and secrete. For the Lords of tyn tymes tould to their Counceylours and servaunts, that had sewyd to them for the maters, hou thay had sped in them, and who was ageyn them. Hou may the Kyng be counselid to restrayne gevyng away of his loud; of gevyng of offices corodyes, or pencions of abbeyes, by such gret Lords, to other menys servants, sythen they most desyer such gyfts for themselves and their servants. Which thyngs confydery'd, and also many other, which schal be schewy'd hereafter, hyt is thought good, that the Kyng had a Councile chosyn and establischid, in the fourme that followith, or in some other fourme like thereunto. First, that ther were chosyn xii temporal men, and xii spirituall men, of the wisest and best disposyd men that can be found in al the parties of the lande; and that they be sworne to councile the Kyng, after a fourme to be devysyd for their othe. And in especially, that thay schal take no fee, nor clothyng, nor reward, of any man, excepte only of the Kyng, like as the Justices of the Kyng's Benche, and of the Common Place, be sworne, whan thay take their offices. And that thees xxiv be always Councelors; but, if ther be any defawte fownd in them, or that yt lyst the Kyng, by the advyse of the more partie of them, to chaunge any of them. And that every year, be chosyn by the Kyng, iv<sup>er</sup> Lords Spiritual, and iv<sup>er</sup> Lords Temporal, to be for that yere of the same Councile, in like fourme as the said xxiv schal be. And that they al have an heede, or a cheffe ruler, one of the said xxiv, and chosyn and appointyd by the Kyng, havynge his office at the Kyng's pleasure, which may then be callid Capitalis Conciliarius. Hyt schal not be necessarye, that the xij spirituall men of this Councile, have so grete wages as the xij temporal, because they schal not nede to kepe an household in their countrey, while thay be absent, as the temporal men must needs do, for their wives and children. By which confyderation, the Spiritual Judges, in the Court of Parlement of Paris, takyn but CC franks by the yere; whereas, the Temporal Judges thereof, takyn by the year CCC frankes. The said vij Lords also, which, by reason of their Baronies and astats, ben to the Kyng always, Consiliarii nati, and therfor oughtyn to councile him at al tymys, whan he woll nedyn not to have grete wags for their attendaunce to this Councile, which shall last but for a yere. For temporal men, which, by reason of their enheritance and lyvelood, been made Scheriffs for a yere, takyn of the Kyng lityl and almost no thyng, for their service of that yere. And though that wages of the said xxiv Councelors, seme a new and a grete charge to the Kyng, yet, whan it is considered hou grete wages the grete Lords, and other men, which wer of the Kyng's Councile, in tymes passed, toke for their attendaunce therunto, which maner of Councile was nothyng so behovefull to the Kyng, and to his Realme, as this wol be, which wags schal than forwith cease; the wages of the xxiv Counceillors schal appere no grete charge to the Kyng. And I can suppose, that summe Kyngs before this tyme, have gevyn to sum one man that hath servyd him, as mych lyvelood yerely, as the said wages woll come unto. And if the same wages be thought so grete charge unto the Kyng, the foresaid Counceillours may be in less nombre, as to be xv<sup>en</sup> Counceillours of private personys, with ij Lords Spiritual, and ij Lords Temporal, so as than they be in all xx<sup>ii</sup> Persons. Thees Counceillours may continually, at such houres as schal be assigned to them, comeune and deliber upon the maters of difficultie, that fallen to the Kyng; and than upon the maters of the polycie of the Realme: as how the going out of the money may be restraynyd; how bullion may be brought into this land; how also plate, jewels, excepted, to which he refers in a treatise already mentioned; but, however, we have taken all the care possible to represent those titles distinctly, and to give the reader the best lights we can, where they may yet be found and consulted by such as have the curiosity to enquire after the labours of this excellent person, which, from what we have seen of his compositions, cannot but be esteemed every way worthy of perusal [O]. ‘ jewels, and money, late borne oute, may be getyn yn ageyn, of which, right wise men may soon find the meyns. And also, hou the pryces of merchaundises, growyn in this lond, may be holden up and encrealyd, and the pryces of merchaundise, brought into this lond, abatyd. How our Navey may be maynteny'd and augmentyd; and upon such other pointz of polycie, to the grettest profit and encreate that ever came to this lond. Hou also the Lawy's may be amendyd in such thyngs as thay nede reformation in, w'her thorough the Parlements schall or may do more good in a moneth, to the amendment of the Lawe, than thay may do in a yere, if the amendment thereof be not debatid, and by such counceile rypynd to their hands. Ther may be of this Counceile, when they like to come thereunto, or that they be desyryd by the said Counceilors, the grettest officers of the land, as Chauncelor, Tresorar, and Pryvye Seale, of which the Chancelor, whan he is present, may be Hye President, and have the supreme rule of al the Counceile. Also, the Juges and Barons of th' Eschequer, and the Clerk of the Rollis, and such Lords as the said forsaide Counceilors woll desyer to be with them, for matters of grete diffyculty may be of this Counceile, whan they be desyryd, and els not. All other maters which schal conserne this Counceile, as whan a Counceilordyyth, hou a new Counceylor schal be chosyn, how many howrs of the day this Counceil schal syt, whan they schal have any vacation, how long any of them may be absent, hou he schal have his leve and lycense, with al other articles necessary for the demeanyng and rule of this counceile may be conceyvd by leyfure and put in a boke, and that boke kept in this counceile as a registre, or an ordynal hou thay schal do and be orderyd in every thyng.' The sixteenth chapter shews how the Romans prospered while their senate was maintained in its full authority, and how it declined when the credit and freedom of that venerable assembly decay'd. In the seventeenth chapter, instructions are given as to the manner in which places ought to be bestowed, and it is therein observed, that the King had above a thousand offices in his gift. In the eighteenth are advertisements concerning the bestowing of pensions. In the nineteenth, the advantages which might arise from these regulations are fully stated, and in Archbishop Laud's manuscript this chapter ends abruptly, part of it being lost, but in Sjr Adrian Fortescue's manuscript this is supplied, and therein is a prayer in direct terms for King Edward the Fourth, for whose use, as from many other circumstances, we have proved this treatise was undoubtedly written. The twentieth, that is the last chapter, demonstrates the expediency of the King's bestowing no gifts but by letters patent under his great seal, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, which, as this able statesman very judiciously observes, would not only prevent improper and excessive gifts, but also save the King the trouble of denying, or, at least, his being exposed to unseemly and importunate solicitations. Take it altogether, and it will appear to be a work which affords as full evidence of the learning, wisdom, uprightness, publick spirit, and loyal gratitude of its author, as any that is extant, either in ours or in any modern language; and which as it is illustrated with the learned Judge Fortescue's notes, may certainly be of very great use to all who are inclined to study the original and true foundation of our laws and civil constitutions.

[O] Every way worthy of perusal.] The care with which this great man's works have been so long preserved, the variety of copies, in different libraries, as well as numerous editions of his little treatise, in praise of the Laws of England, are more than sufficient to refute that ill grounded, as well as ill bred, censure, of one, whose rank and function, should have restrained from such indecent language, more especially of to great a man, and one so long since in his grave (50; VOL. III. No. CLXVIII.

‘ he wrote, says he, other two books of the distinction, betwixt Dominium Regale & Politicum, and a retraction of his errors, about the title of the House of York, both which are still pretty common in manuscript, but have not yet been thought worthy of the press. A third, he compiled likewise, as himself tells us, for the use of Prince Edward, which treated, de natura legis naturæ; and, in the opinion of its author, was a notably shrewd piece: but whether 'tis now lost, or was destroyed, and recanted upon the forementioned change of his side and principles, I cannot tell.' We may believe him, since we shall shew that his intelligence, at least in this point, was of no greater extent than his good manners. All the pieces that he ever was acquainted with, have been already mentioned, one only excepted, that, and the rest, are as follows.

Opusculum de Natura legis Naturæ, &c. (51). A pretty fair book for the time when it was written. 'A curious MS. on paper, small folio, with large margins, especially at the bottom, writ on both sides, without introduction, dedication, or preface.' Each chapter hath its contents. The whole title is,

Opusculum de Natura legis Naturæ, & de ejus censura in Successione Regnorum Supremorum. i. e. 'A short treatise of the Nature of the Law of Nature, and its influence in the Succession of independent Sovereignties.' It is distinguished as a first part (pars prima). The conclusion of this piece (cap XLV111) seems to intimate, an argument upon the rules of Succession to Kingdoms in general. It is in the following words; Scriptor progreditur, alium superinde, quod de jure succedendi in regnis, supremis intitulabitur, exordians sic libellum. This second part is now lost, or probably destroy'd by its author. Mr Waterhouse, in his commentary on Fortescue, mentions the Opusculum (52), under the character of an excellent treatise; a book of worth and weight, purposely penned to set forth to the Prince the just measure of government, according to the law of nature and nations. Tho' the language be a little incorrect, the sense, considering the time when the author wrote, is very extraordinary; and he must be allowed to have been a person of general and useful learning. This is also in the Worsley Library, under the title of Traëtatus de Naturâ legis Naturæ, per D. Joannem Fortescue (53). The book de Vigore legis Naturalis, mentioned by both Bale and Pits, probably is the Opusculum.

Defensio Juris Domus Lancastriæ (54).
A Defence of the House of Lancaster one leaf (55).
Genealogy of the House of Lancaster (56).
Of the title of the House of York (57).

Genealogia Regum Scotiæ. In the same hand (58).

But it may be doubted, whether this was written by our author or not. Dugdale ascribes to him an abridgement of the book of assizes (64), in which he seems to be mistaken; yet it is very far from being impossible, that there may be other works of our author still preserved in manuscript, with which the learned world is not yet acquainted, and it may be, that some of his thing of the remaining part of his life; which was very probably spent in an honourable retirement in the country, free from the cares, and remote from the dangers, that necessarily attend those who pass their time in Courts. Neither is there any distinct account preserved of his death; we are only told in general, that he was near ninety-years of age (x) when he breathed his last, which the circumstances of his life render very probable. His remains were interred in the Parish-Church of Ebburton, where one of his descendants, in the year 1677, caused a monument to be repaired, upon which was the effigies of this venerable person in his robes, and added an inscription to his memory (y) [P]. It has been very truly reported, that all good men, and lovers of the English constitution, speak of him with honour (z); and that he still lives in the opinion of all true Englishmen, in as high esteem and reputation as any Judge that ever sat in Westminster-Hall. He was a man acquainted with all sorts of learning, besides his knowledge in the Law, in which he was exceeded by none, as will appear by the many learned judgments he gave when on the Bench, in the year-book of Henry the Sixth. His character in History, is that of pious, loyal, and learned; and he had the honour to be called the Chief Councillor of the King. He was a great courtier, and yet a great lover of his country. It would carry this article into too great a length, if we should insert here all that is even necessary to be said of his learning and virtues; and therefore some points relative to these, and serving to set his character in a true light, are placed at the bottom of the page [Q]. His son and heir, Martin Fortescue, Esq; espoused writings are lost. John Speed (65) quotes him in his history, in a place where nothing occurs, at least, in his published works, that has any relation to that passage; and yet Speed was too honest and too correct a writer, either to mislead others, or to be misled himself. It would be certainly a great benefit to the learned world, if all his manuscripts were printed, for he was a man of general knowledge, great observation, and one who has given many useful notices, in relation to the dark parts of our History and Antiquities.

[P] And added an inscription to his memory. He lies buried in the Parish Church belonging to Ebburton, now written more frequently Ebrighton, where, in the chancel, there is a monument erected for him; probably, soon after his interment, by the appearance of its antiquity and workmanship: on this old tomb, lies his effigies at full length, in freestone, in his robes of Lord Chief Justice, which doubtless was done at the time that the said monument was first erected; on the sides and ends, are the Fortescue's arms: over this tomb, a table of marble was fastened, at the charges of the late Colonel Robert Fortescue, of Weare and Filleigh, his direct heir (66), with the following inscription engraven thereon.

ROBERT FORTESCUE, Esq;
The direct heir of this family lately deceased.
Of him, who justice could the best explain,
This little URN doth all that's left contain.
His country's living Law, that Law's great light,
The scourge of wrong, and the defence of right.
His birth distinguished, merit gave him state,
Learning, applause, but virtue made him great.
Through darkness now a carbuncle he shines,
Nor wisdom's rays the gloomy grave confines;
To latest times shall FORTESCUE be known,
And in the LAWS just PRAISE be read his own.*

[Q] Are placed at the bottom of the page ] We are told by Bale (67), upon the credit of Robert Record, a very sensible and learned man, and one well acquainted with the personal History of English Scholars and Statesmen, as well as with the civil History of the English Nation; that this reverend person, through the whole course of his life, was a great lover of polite literature, and that he obtained great reputation for his learned lectures on the Civil-Law (the Common he probably means) while he was yet resident in the Inns of Court. There is something remarkable in the author's Latin Diction, and therefore I beg leave to cite his own words, Excoluit tum juvenis, tum etiam senex, virtutem: literasque politas, ut qui maximè, semper amavit. Inter forenses Londini clarissimus juris civilis interpres admittebatur: ac nobiliores in schola juvenes, peculiare à regibus conditas leges perdocuit. This commendation of him is very just and well founded, since his writings plainly shew that he was a man of general learning, and of great reading for those times; for we find him quoting Aristotle, Tully, Quintilian, Boetius, St Auespoused the daughter of Richard Denfell, of Filleigh; and in her right was seated at Filleigh in Devonshire (a), and had issue two sons, John and William; the first married Jaquet, eldest daughter of Ralph St Leger, and had issue a son Bartholomew, who dying without issue, the estate at Filleigh devolved on William Fortescue, Esq; his uncle, which William was before seated at Buckland Filleigh, and by Maud his wife, daughter and heir of John Atkyns, of Milton, in the county of Devon, had issue three sons, John, Edward, and James; as also a daughter Jaquet, married to William Dennis, of Southcomb in Devonshire, Esq; (b). The eldest son John Fortescue, of Filleigh, Esq; married Christian, daughter of John Arscott, of Hollesworth in the same county, Esq; and had issue two sons, William and John, and a daughter Alice, married to John Farry, Esq; (c). William Fortescue, Esq; the eldest son, took to wife Anne, daughter of Sir Roger Gifford, of Brightley in Devonshire, and had issue five sons and eight daughters (d). Of his sons, two of the youngest of them, Faithful and Nicholas, had the honour of knighthood conferred on them, and were distinguished for their eminent abilities [R]. His eldest son was

St Austin, Aquinas, Ægidius, Romanus, Parisiensis, and many other good authors; but he was far from drawing all his knowledge from books, he gathered much from his own experience, and was very communicative with respect to the fruits of it, of which it may not be amiss to give here an instance or two, as in reality they make a part of his history, and are besides, curious in themselves, and not to be met with any where else. In answering an objection made by the Prince, that causes were often very tedious in England; he observes two things, first, that this was not an inconvenience to which the English laws only were liable; and next, that too much haste, was a greater inconvenience than too little (68). Upon this subject, he adds: 'There are in France, in the Supreme Court of Parliament, some causes which have been depending upwards of thirty years. I myself know a case of appeal prosecuted in the said court, which has been depending now these ten years, and it is likely will be so for ten years more, before it can be decided. While lately at Paris, my host shewed me his process in writing, which had been before the Court of Parliament for eight years, for four French Sols rent, which of our money, makes but eight-pence, and he had no prospect of obtaining judgment in less than eight years more. I have known other cases of the same nature: And for what appears to me, the laws of England do not admit of so great delays, as the laws of France. But it is really necessary there should be delays in legal proceedings, provided they be not too dilatory and tedious. By these means the parties, in particular the party prosecuted, is better provided with his proper defence and advice of counsel, which otherwise neither of them could be either to prosecute or defend, judgment is never so safe when the process is hurried on. I remember once at an Assizes and Goal Delivery at Salisbury, that I saw a woman indicted for the death of her husband within the year: she was found guilty and burnt for the same. In this case the Judge of Assize, after the whole proceedings before him were over, might have respited the execution of the woman even after the expiration of the year. At a subsequent Assizes I saw a servant of the man who was so killed, tried and convicted before the same Judge for the same murder, who made an ample public confession, that he was the only person who was guilty of the said fact, and that his mistress who had been executed was entirely innocent of it: wherefore he was drawn and hanged, and at the time and place of his execution, he lamented the case of his poor mistress upon account of her innocence, and her being in no wise privy to her husband's death. The fact being thus, how may we suppose the Judge to be affected with a sense of conscience and remorse, for being so hasty in awarding judgment of execution, when it was in his power to have stay'd for some time further process against her: he often owned to me with concern, that he should never be able to satisfy it to his conscience, for such his precipitate behaviour. Deliberation often brings judgment to maturity, which seldom or never happens where the proceedings are too much hurried on. Wherefore the Laws of England admit Effoins, a sort of practice not known in the Laws of other countries.' There is a case still more remarkable than this to the same purpose, in the works of Sir Edward Coke (69), whose high opinion of our author we have already mentioned, and with respect to this very chapter, he commends it particularly, and advises that the rule which Sir John Fortescue lays down, should be always kept in mind by such as are desirous of rendering rather true than quick justice. That true Patriot, and most judicious Historian, Sir Walter Raleigh, speaking of our reverend author, styles him, that notable bulwark of our Laws (70). He had reason so to do, for never any author, either antient or modern, took more pains than he did to secure them against the ambition of Princes, as well as the passions and vices of private men. It is a very shrewd insinuation of his, that how absolute soever some constitutions might be upon the Continent, yet it was impossible an island should be planted upon those terms (71). The followers of Brute, says he, before they embarked, resolved to unite themselves into a society, hence sprung their policy, and to facilitate the execution of this design, they consented to be governed by a single person, hence arose our Monarchy. The remark of the late Judge Fortescue upon this, is extremely sensible. 'It may be observed here, that our author does not affirm the story of Brute to be true, but only produces it as an instance, which upon the supposition of its truth is very apposite: tho' whether it be really true or no, is not material in this place, and is left to every man's own opinion.' We may from hence gather the reason why our learned author, and after him Sir Edward Coke, and many others, maintained that the Laws of the Britons were never cancelled, but subsisted always; which, tho' opposed by the ingenious Mr Hakewill, and other learned Antiquaries, is a very good position; because in matters of great obscurity, that supposition ought to be held for truth, whence the best consequences may be drawn, and as there cannot be a better reason for our remaining free than that we were always so, it is right to say, that the Laws of the antient Britons which were certainly favourable to liberty, never were or can be cancelled. Agreeable to this notion it was laid down for Law in the reign of Edward the Fourth, that the Common Law has been from the Creation of the World, for it is common reason (72). To conclude, there is hardly any writer of note, who has mentioned this great and good man, but has at the same time applauded his notions, and afforded a just tribute of praise to his great abilities and inflexible virtue. This character indeed may be well given him, for as adversity could not break, so prosperity could not corrupt him, for when King Henry the Sixth, in the thirty fourth year of his reign, made another Sheriff for the county of Lincoln, than the Statute warranted, the two Chief Justices, Sir John Fortescue, and Sir John Prisot, declared publicly for themselves and their brethren, that the King therein did an error (73), and with this notable and noble instance of his integrity let us conclude this note.

It is indeed so good an account, that the reader ought to see it in his own words, which are these (74). 'As the right wing of John Fortescue, of Filleigh, Esq; who married Anne, daughter of Walter Porter, of Thetford in the county of Norfolk, Esq; his eldest son, I presume, was Robert Fortescue, of Filleigh, Esq; who married Grace, daughter of Sir Bevil Grenville, of Stowe, and sister to John Earl of Bath; by whom having no issue male (e), the estate descended to Hugh Fortescue, of Filleigh, Esq; who married Bridget, sole daughter and heir of Hugh Boscawen, of Tregothnan, in the county of Cornwall, by Margaret his wife, fifth daughter, and at length co-heir, of Theophilus Earl of Lincoln, and Baron Clinton; whose sisters having no surviving issue, the barony of Clinton devolved on Hugh Fortescue, of Filley, Esq; son and heir of the beforementioned Hugh and Bridget; which Hugh having demanded a writ of summons to Parliament, pursuant to his claim, was, on the 16th of March 1721, called up to the House of Peers, and took his seat according to the rank of the antient Barons Clinton, who, by several summons, had enjoyed it from the sixth of February 1298, the twenty-sixth of Edward the First (f). In 1721, his Lordship was constituted Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Devonshire, and, on the twenty-seventh of May 1725, was elected a Knight of the most honourable order of the Bath: On his present Majesty's accession to the throne, he was again constituted Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Devonshire, and one of the Lords of his Majesty's Bed-Chamber; but in 1733 resigned his places (g). On a succeeding alteration of affairs, his Lordship came again into employment; and, as a testimony of respect paid to his services, he was, by letters patents bearing date July the fifth 1746, created Baron Fortescue, of Castle-Hill in the county of Devon, and Earl Clinton (h). Of this family likewise was the late William Fortescue, Esq; first Attorney-General to the Prince, and afterwards Master of the Rolls; and indeed there have been so many eminent persons of this surname, and of these not a few bearing the same christian-name, that it is a thing of very great difficulty to distinguish and state their descents truly, more especially as the heiresses of the elder branches commonly married some gentleman of their own name; so that their descendants seem, from the lands which they inherit in right of their mothers, to be of elder families than they really were, a case not at all common in other numerous families.

the King's horse advanced to charge the left wing, which was the gros of the enemy's horse, Sir Faithful Fortescue, who having his fortune and interest in Ireland, was come out of that Kingdom to hasten supplies thither, and had a troop of horse raised for him for that service; but as many other of those forces were, so his troop was likewise disposed into that army, and he was now Major to Sir William Waller; he with his whole troop advanced from the gros of their horse, and discharging all their pistols on the ground within little more than carbine shot of his own body, presented himself and his troop to Prince Rupert, and immediately with his Highness charged the enemy. Whether this sudden accident as it might very well, and the not knowing how many more were of the same mind, each man looking upon his companion with the same apprehensions as upon the enemy, or whether the terror of Prince Rupert and the King's horse, or altogether with their own evil consciences wrought upon them, I know not, but that whole wing having unskilfully discharged their carbines and pistols into the air, wheel'd about, the King's horse charging in the flank and rear, and having thus absolutely routed them, pursued them flying, and had the execution of them above two miles. We may be satisfied, that this matter is not represented in too strong a light in this relation, since it is placed rather in a stronger by the Historian of the Parliament, who ascribes the great disorder of their cavalry, which might, and indeed must, have been fatal to the Earl of Essex and his army, if Prince Rupert had shewn as much conduct as courage, to the going over of Sir Faithful Fortescue with his troop (75). But how advantageous soever this might be to his Majesty's cause, it was in some measure fatal to that corp, for in the confusion that afterwards happened as they forgot to pull off their orange coloured scarfs, some of the royalists fired upon them, by which seventeen or eighteen were killed (76). It may be easily conceived, that this gentleman's behaviour drew upon him a very heavy load of reproach from those whom he left. His justification however was very short and explicit, his troop was raised for the Irish service, and therefore when the Parliament obliged him to act against the King, it was taking such an advantage of him, as left him no other means of recovering his freedom, and doing what he took to be his duty, than that of quitting their forces the first opportunity that offered. Their own proceeding was a lesson to him, and by whatever arguments they could hope to justify their compelling him to take service under the Earl of Essex, his leaving that service must be likewise justified (77). His Brother, Sir Nicholas Fortescue was a Knight of Malta, and was also Knighted by King James the First at Whitehall (78), on the second of February 1617. He was, as one characterises him, a person of so dexterous an address, that when he came into notice, he came into favour, when he entered the court he had the chamber, yea, the closet of a Prince, open. A gentleman that did much in his person, and, as he would say, let reputation do the rest (79). He and Sir Edmund Fortescue were always observed so wary as to have all their enemies before them. He lost his life in the service of King Charles the First in Lancashire (80). Of Sir Edmond Fortescue of Vallowpit, or Fallowpit, before mention'd, and who also suffered deeply in the same cause, there are likewise some few particulars preserved. After having served Charles the First with great courage and fidelity, as a brave Commander in the wars, and made as honourable articles for the surrender of Charles Fort at Salcombe, Devon, whereof he was Governor, as could be demanded. Upon the fall of the King, and his cause, he fled beyond sea, and died in Holland, he was interred at Delft, where is a monument erected to his memory (81). He was forced to compound for his estate at six hundred and sixty pounds and upwards in the same troubles. There was one John Fortescue of Cookill in Worcestershire, Esq; who paid two hundred thirty four pounds for his loyalty, and John Fortescue of Bridlest, Devon, perhaps, it should be Spridlestow, who paid two hundred and two pounds (82). In the next article some farther account will be given of the eminent persons of this family, and whoever is desirous of being still better informed, may find abundant proofs of our not having exhausted this copious subject (83).

FORTESCUE (Sir JOHN), a very learned gentleman, a true patriot, an able statesman, Privy-Councillor, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James the First. He was descended in a direct Line from the elder brother, or rather one of the elder brothers, of Chancellor Fortescue, before-mentioned, who was his father's great uncle (a), as the reader will see by the account of his family in the notes [A]. He was but very young at the time the first misfortune befel his family, in the person of Sir Adrian Fortescue, Knight of the Bath, his father (b), who having unfortunately entered into a close alliance with a family under the extreme displeasure of King Henry the Eighth, had the ill luck, notwithstanding he had stood for many years very high in that monarch's favour, to be involved in one of those prosecutions which he thought necessary for his safety (c); and being attainted for high-treason, of which we have but a very dark account in our histories, lost his head (d); but died very much pitied, as being esteemed a person of great learning and wisdom, as well as a gallant man and a great officer, and one who fell rather to gratify the royal suspicions, than from his being guilty of any formed design to the prejudice of the crown (e) [B]. To whom the care of his children devolved, we have not, at this

[A] In the notes.] As there are few families in England so numerous, or divided into so many branches, settled in different parts of the kingdom as this of Fortescue (1); so the confusion and mistakes which this has occasioned, has thrown some obscurity on very material passages in our history, which, as far as we are able, we have, in these two articles, endeavoured to rectify and set in a true light. It has been shewn, that Sir Henry Fortescue, Chief Justice of Ireland, had three sons, the second of which was Sir Richard Fortescue (2), who was the father of Sir John Fortescue of Punburn, in the county of Hertford (3), who married Alice youngest daughter of Sir Jeffery Bullen, Lord Mayor of London, by Anne his wife, daughter, and one of the heirs of Thomas Lord Hoo and Hastings, Knight of the Garter, and was grandfather to Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, the father of Queen Anne Bullen, the mother of Queen Elizabeth (4). From which match proceeded Sir John Fortescue of Punburn, porter of the town of Calais (5), who in the third year of King Richard the Third, having set at liberty John Vere Earl of Oxford, imprisoned by that King, went with him into France, and came over with Henry, Earl of Richmond, when he attained the Crown of England by his victory at Bosworth field, that Earl, upon his landing at Milford-Haven, knighted this Sir John Fortescue (6), who in the second of Henry the Seventh, for his valour at the battle of Newark on Trent, when John, Earl of Lincoln, and Lambert Simnel were defeated, was made Knight Banneret (7), and his brother Sir Adrian Fortescue was made one of the Knights, at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, on the eighteenth of February, in the nineteenth year of Henry the Seventh (8), during whose reign both brothers were in high favour. This Sir Adrian Fortescue was a valiant soldier, and served King Henry the Eighth in his wars (9). In the fifth of Henry the Eighth, he and John Fortescue, Esq; had the King's letters of protection (10) going with Sir Charles Herbert, Knight, in that expedition, when Teroven and Tournay were taken, and a memorable battle fought, called, by our Historians, the battle of Spurs (11); we also find this Sir Adrian Fortescue attended on the Queen at that famous interview, Anno 1520, between King Henry the Eighth, and the French King (12). Also in the fifteenth of the same King, he was one of the principal commanders of those forces that took Bray and Montdidier, and ravaged those parts of France (13). But notwithstanding all these services he fell into disgrace, and, as will be shewn in the next note, was executed for high-treason (14). He married first, Anne, daughter of Sir William Stoner, of Stoner in Oxfordshire, by whom he had issue, Margaret, married to Thomas Lord Wentworth, and Frances, to Thomas Lord Fitzgerald, eldest son to the Earl of Kildare (15). But this Sir Adrian by his second wife, Anne, daughter of Sir William Rede of Roekingham Castle in Northamptonshire, had issue three sons, John, the subject of this article, Thomas, and Anthony; as also two daughters, Mary, married to William, son and heir of John Norris of Fyfield in Berkshire, and Elizabeth, married to Thomas Bromley of the county of Salop, Esquire, lineally descended from the famous Sir John Bromley, who in the fourth year of the reign of King Henry the Fifth, recovered the Standard of Guyen, in that memorable battle of Corby (16) then gained by the French, for which eminent service, he had not only the dignity of Knighthood conferred on him, but offices of special power and trust, with lands of great value in the Duchy of Normandy, as also the same Standard of Guyen for his crest. In which reign was also Henry Bromley, and Richard Bromley, who distinguished themselves in those wars, the first being a principal officer in the town of Caen (17), and in the seventh of Henry the Fifth, had in consideration of his services, a grant of all the lands and tenements, rents and services, of Ralph Ruet: and the other being styled of Harfleur, had a grant of all the lands, &c. of Sir Lionel de Recheburgh, Knight, and Jane his wife. From which Sir John Bromley, descended William Bromley, Esq; Principal Secretary of State in the reign of Queen Anne. It appears from hence, our Statesman Fortescue was on all sides honourably descended.

[B] To the prejudice of the Crown.] In order to understand this matter perfectly, we must take things a little higher. In the year 1536, there was a Rebellion against King Henry the Eighth, in Lincolnshire, and in the northern counties; the former gave the King some apprehension, and therefore the Duke of Suffolk, who was sent to suppress it, had instructions and authority to make use of fair means as well as foul, and it was by the former that he chiefly prevailed (18). Against the northern Rebels the Duke of Norfolk was sent, who was assisted by the Marquis of Exeter, and Bishop Burnet says, it was owing to the Duke's great prudence, and by his timely applying for and publishing a general pardon, that all things were pacified and the King kept upon his throne; one Aske, who had been at the head of the northern rebels, was invited to Court, kindly received by the King, who it was thought drew out of him some informations (19). Upon his return into the country it was said that some new meetings were held, upon which the King was released from the promises he had made in his pardon, many of the rebels were executed by martial law, many more tried, convicted, and put to death in different parts of the country, and the Lords Darcy and Hussey being tried by their Peers, the Marquis of Exeter sitting as High-Steward, found guilty, and beheaded, the former on Tower-hill, and the latter at Lincoln (20). The next year Sir Jeffery Pole gave some informations, upon which Henry, Marquis of Exeter, Henry Lord Montacute, elder brother to Cardinal Pole, and Sir Jeffery, and several other persons, were apprehended, tried and executed, in the month of January following at Tower-hill and Tyburn (21). Sir Nicholas Carew, Master of the Horse and Knight of the Garter, having presumed to say that these proceedings were something harsh, considering the Marquis was the King's cousin-german, and the grandson of Edward the Fourth (22), he was tried, convicted, and executed on the third of March following; and now we come to the case of Sir Adrian Fortescue, in which we shall use the best authorities we can find, and particularly that of a learned prelate, than whom there was no body better versed in this period of our history (23). 'After these executions this distance of time, been able to discover; but most certain it is, that due care was taken of them; so that the eldest, Mr John Fortescue, became distinguished for his extensive knowledge, for his singular sagacity, and for his perfect acquaintance with the best Latin and Greek authors (f). These qualifications, joined perhaps to some distant affinity in blood, which there was between him and her Majesty on the mother's side (g), brought him very early to the knowledge and esteem of Queen Elizabeth, who made use of his learning in the direction of her studies; to which she was constant during her whole life, and rewarded the pains he took, in that respect, with the place of Master of the Wardrobe (b). We cannot doubt but the Queen had a great esteem for, and a very high confidence in, him, since the second great misfortune in his family, which was the conviction of his brother Sir Anthony Fortescue, Knt. for high-treason (i), did not in the least affect him; but, on the contrary, it may be presumed his interest had a considerable share in obtaining, from the clemency of the Queen, the pardon of that offence; which, tho' the criminals endeavoured to extenuate, they never attempted to deny, but were convicted upon their own confessions [C]. It does not appear, that, in the course of this reign, our were confirmed, but new ones of a strange and unheard-of nature were enacted. It is a blemish never to be washed off, and which cannot be enough condemned, and was a breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules of justice which is capable of no excuse, it was the attainting of some persons whom they held in custody without bringing them to a trial. Concerning which I shall add, what the great Lord Chief Justice Coke writes (24). 'Altho' I question not the power of the Parliament, for without question the attainder stands of force in Law, yet this I say of the manner of proceeding, Auferat oblivio si potest, si non utrumque silentium tegat. For the more high and absolute the jurisdiction of the Court is, the more just and honourable it ought to be in the proceedings, and to give example of justice to inferior Courts.' 'The chief of these were the Marchioness of Exeter, and the Countess of Sarum, the special matter charged on the former, is her confederating herself to Sir Nicholas Carew in his treasons; to which is added, that she had committed divers other abominable treasons. The latter is said to have confederated herself with her son the Cardinal, with other aggravating words. It does not appear by the journal that any witnesses were examined, only that day that the bills were read the third time in the House of Lords, Cromwell shewed them a coat of white silk, which the Lord Admiral had found among the Countess of Sarum's cloaths, in which the arms of England were wrought on the one side, and the standard that was carried before the rebels was on the other side. This was brought as an evidence, that she approved of the rebellion. Three Irish Priests were also attainted for carrying letters out of Ireland to the Pope and Cardinal Pole, as also Sir Adrian Fortescue for endeavouring to raise Rebellion, Thomas Dingley, a Knight of St John of Jerusalem, and Robert Gran- ceter, Merchant, for going to several foreign Princes and persuading them to make war upon the King, and assist the Lords Darcy and Hussey in the Rebellion they had raised. Two gentlemen, a Dominican Frier and a Yeoman, were by the same Act attainted for saying, that that venomous serpent the Bishop of Rome was supreme Head of the Church of England. Another gentleman, two Priests, and a Yeoman, were attainted for treason in general, no particular crime being specified. Thus sixteen persons were in this manner attainted, and if there was any examination of witnesses for convicting them, it was either in the Star-chamber or before the Privy-Council, for there is no mention of any evidence that was brought in the Journals: there was also much haste made in the passing this bill, it being brought in the tenth of May, was read that day for the first and second time, and the eleventh of May for the third time. The Commons kept it five days before they sent it back, and added some more to those that were in the bill at first, but how many were named in the bill originally, and how many were afterwards added cannot be known. Fortescue and Dingley, suffered the tenth of July. As for the Countess of Sarum, the Lord Herbert saw in a record, that Bulls from the Pope were found in her house; that she kept correspondence with her son; and that she forbade her tenants to have the New Testament in English, or any other of the books that had been published by the King's authority. She was then about seventy years of age, but shewed by the answers she made, that she had a vigorous and masculine mind. She was kept two years prisoner in the Tower after the Act had passed; the King, by that reprieve, designing to oblige her son to a better behaviour; but upon a fresh provocation by a new rebellion in the north, she was beheaded, and in her the name and line of Plantagenet determined. The Marchioness of Exeter died a natural death." Tho' there is a most commendable spirit of justice, and an honest zeal for truth in what Bishop Burnet says, yet having this opportunity it may not be amiss to add some other historical lights in respect to these dark passages, which in the opinion of the best judges is the great use of works of this nature, in which such points are frequently canvassed as are hardly discussed in any other place. Whoever considers the foregoing narration, will perceive, that here was a great number of persons of high rank, or of much experience, or of great influence, taken out of the world, upon strange surmises, and very forced constructions, even upon the face of the proceedings against them, for which no competent reason appears; for if the Marquis of Exeter had been truly guilty of rash expressions, he might have pleaded real services which far outwent them; or if he denied the words, his marching against the northern rebels, and his sitting as Lord High-Steward at the trial of the Lords Darcy and Hussey, were facts very much in his favour. But these could be of little use, if only a colour was sought to sweep off at once the Marquis and the friends of his family. A certain Historian, who, as we have more than once observed, had very extraordinary assistances, has suggested one cause why the King was so desirous of having the Marquis of Exeter out of his way. They were sisters children, and the King in the earlier part of his reign had such an affection for him, as to declare him his successor, but now having a son of his own, he entertained apprehensions that were not to be quieted by any milder methods (25). It might be objected to this, that the extraordinary instances the Marquis had given of his zeal for the King's person and government, might have over balanced these suspicions. To this another Historian supplies us with an answer, which is, that the King took notice with how much ease he raised many thousand men to suppress the rebellion (26), and the thoughts of his having so great an influence, instead of diminishing, augmented his fears, and added weight to his suspicions. The same maxim extended itself to all the rest who were involved partly by their connections with families allied to the Crown, and partly by the knowledge the King had of the courage of some, and the abilities of others. The same spirit is thought to have ruled in subsequent councils, for Edward Courtney, the son of the Marquis of Exeter, remained a prisoner all the reign of Edward the Sixth, tho' but a child, released indeed by Queen Mary when a man, but sent to the Tower again upon Wyatt's insurrection, set at liberty once more and suffered to travel, but at length, as was commonly reported, poisoned at Padua, either on account of his descent from Edward the Fourth, or which, perhaps, was a greater crime, preferring in his affections the Lady Elizabeth to her royal sister (27). [C] But were convicted upon their own confessions.] The death of his father could not divert his youngest son from his attachment to the family of Pole, of which a treaty of equal benefit to the Crown and to the States [D]. In the troubles of the Earl of Essex, he conducted himself with such prudence as to give no offence, either to the Queen or to those who were that unfortunate nobleman's enemies; and was, notwithstanding, understood throughout the whole to be his friend (a). In the proceedings in the Star-Chamber, at the close of Michaelmas-term 1599, when all the great officers of State were called upon in publick, to speak their sentiments on that nice subject, with a view probably of obliging them to take either one part or the other; Sir John Fortescue had the address to speak to the satisfaction of the audience, without falling into any of the heats with which others were transported. He first gave a clear account of the Queen's care and concern for the reduction of Ireland, and the measures pursued for that purpose, so far as they fell within the cognizance of his own office. He observed, that he was not called to Council when these matters were first in debate; he said, that since he came rarely thither, most of his time being taken up in the management of the revenue, that, notwithstanding this, he had a general knowledge of what passed in Council, from which general knowledge, however, he could collect nothing more than that notwithstanding all the Queen's pains and providence, things were then in a worse state in Ireland than when the army first landed. After this, raising his voice, he complained, with tears in his eyes, of libels scattered abroad, to inflame the minds of the people; of the fatal consequences of these factious intrigues amongst great men; and closed his speech with a pathetic recommendation of affection to the Queen's Majesty, and a sincere regard to the peace and welfare of the nation. He was one of the Commissioners, March the fifth 1600, present at the trial of Sir Christopher Blount, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gelly Merrick, and Henry Cuffe, for high-treason; but it does not appear that he took any share therein, except that of being present on the Bench (b). At the time of the death of the Queen his mistress, he was possessed of the offices of Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, and Master of the Great Wardrobe; and was likewise a member of the Privy-Council (c). It is also very remarkable, that one of the last publick acts of her government, was a commission directed to him, and others of the Privy-Council, for dealing with, and seeing banished and transported out of her dominions, all seminary priests and jesuits, as well those then in prison as out of prison, or that at any time after should come into or be found in her dominions; and directing, that a certificate of their proceedings should be transmitted, under the hand of the Principal Secretary of State, to the Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench, in order to their being enrolled in the Crown-Office. Some writers affirm, that he opposed the admission of King James to the vacant throne, but upon certain terms; for which that monarch is said to have borne him ever afterwards a grudge (d). Yet there does not appear to be any evidence of either of these facts; but, on the contrary, many circumstances which seem to be incompatible with either. It is not easy to conceive, by such as are acquainted with our constitution, who could have taken upon them, with any hopes of success or safety, to frame or prescribe such articles. An overture of this sort, looks not very consistent with the cautious and circumspect conduct of Sir John Fortescue, in the preceding part of his life. Besides, upon the demise of the Queen, there appeared to be no doubt at all about the succession, since the Privy-Council directed King James to be proclaimed before noon, at the Cross in Cheapside, the very day that the Queen died (e); and the only struggle seems to have been, who should assume the merit of communicating this acceptable news first to the King of Scots (f) [E]. We may add to these conjectures have cost the actors in it very dear. Sir Anthony Fortescue survived this many years, and by his Lady Catherine Pole, left a son John behind him.

[D] Of equal benefit to the Crown and to the States. In order to this negotiation, the States-General sent over John Duenvoord, Admiral of Holland; John Oldenbarnevelt, Keeper of the Seals; John Verke, John Hooting, and Andrew Hessel, and joined in the same commission, Sir Nowel Carron, their Agent in England, who being mightily for promoting the war did in the month of August hold a conference with Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great-Seal, the Earl of Essex, the Admiral, George Lord Hunfdon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir William Knolles, Sir Robert Cecil, and Sir John Fortescue, commissioners appointed by the Queen (33), and subscribed to the following articles: that the treaty made Anno 1585, should be ratified and confirmed, excepting some articles relating to the civil administration: that the Confederate States should pay to the Queen eight hundred thousand pounds of English money, viz. thirty thousand pounds yearly during the continuance of the war, to be employed against the common enemy, until four hundred thousand pounds were paid: and if a peace were agreed on between the King of Spain and the Queen, there should be paid of the remaining sum twenty thousand pounds yearly, till the eight hundred thousand pounds were fully discharged. That eleven hundred and fifty English soldiers, who were in the garisons of Flushing, Briel, and the adjacent ports, should be paid by the States. That they might have the liberty to levy men in England under English officers, who should serve under their pay: that if the Spaniard should make a descent on the Isles of Wight, Guernsey, Jersey, or Scily, the States should be obliged to assist the Queen with five thousand foot, and five hundred horse: that if it 'twas necessary to equip a fleet in England to serve against Spain, they should provide an equal number of ships: that if any English forces were sent over into Flanders or Brabant, they should provide and furnish out the same number of men: as for the money due to Pallavicini, the Queen should reimburse herself from Brabant and Flanders, and the rest of the Provinces which were not within the union (34). By this treaty all the ends of true policy were answered, a just provision made for the continuance of the war against Spain, and the Queen's expence reduced one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year. In this negotiation, Sir John Fortescue was understood to speak the sense, and to have the secret of the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, who at that time laid dangerously ill and died very soon after.

[E] To the King of Scots. We have this matter very clearly set down in Stowe, where it is asserted, that the Lords caused King James to be proclaimed at the Palace Gate, by eight of the clock in the morning; by conjectures and probabilities, a matter of fact relating to this gentleman, and his sense of the point in question; for within four days after the death of the Queen, he subscribed, with other persons of the first quality, a letter to the Lord Eure, and the rest of the Commissioners then engaged in a negotiation at Bremen (*), signifying that King James was proclaimed with such universal acclamation of all persons, as declared the undoubted assurance, in every man's conscience, of his rightful succession; and betokened, as they hoped, the

by eleven, he was likewise proclaimed in Cheapside (35), Mr Secretary Cecil reading the proclamation in person, with a loud voice, being attended there, by most of the Nobility and the Privy Council. But the most distinct, perfect, and authentic account that can be had of this matter, and which fully proves the truth of what is asserted in the text, is that contained in the relation of Sir Robert Carey, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, who was nearly related to Queen Elizabeth, a great favourite with King James, and who, was the very person that carried him the news of her decease (36). We will give it in his own words. 'I went to my lodging, and left word with one in the Cofferer's Chamber, to call me, if that night (Wednesday, March the twenty-third) it was thought she would die, and gave the Porter an angel, to let me in at any time when I called. Between one and two of the clock on Thursday morning, he that I left in the Cofferer's chamber, brought me word, the Queen was dead. I rose and made all haste to the gate to get in. There I was answered, I could not enter; the Lords of the Council having been with him, and commanded him, that none should go in and out, but by warrant from them. At the very instant, one of the Council, the Comptroller (37), asked whether I was at the gate? I said yes. He said to me; if I pleased, he would let me in; I desired to know how the Queen did? He answered, pretty well. I bade him good night. He replied and said, Sir, if you will come in, I will give you my word and credit you shall go out again at your own pleasure. Upon his word I entered the gate, came up to the Cofferer's chamber, where I found all the ladies weeping bitterly. He led me from thence into the Privy-Chamber, where all the Council was assembled. There I was caught hold of, and assured I should not go for Scotland, till their pleasure was farther known. I told them I came on purpose to that end. From thence they all went to the Secretary's Chamber; and as they went, they gave especial command to the porters, that none should go out of the gate, but such servants as they should send to prepare their coaches and horses for London. There was I left in the midst of the court to think my own thoughts, till they had done Council. I went to my brother's chamber, who was in bed, having been over watched many nights before. I got him up with all speed, and when the Council's men were going out of the gate, my brother thrust to the gate. The porter knowing him to be a great officer, let him out. I pressed after him, and was staid by the porter. My brother angrily said to the porter: Let him out, I will answer for him. Whereupon I was suffered to pass, which I was not a little glad of. I got to horse, and rode to the Knight-Marshal's lodging by Charing-Cross, and there staid till the Lords came to Whitehall Garden (38). I staid there till it was nine o'clock in the morning; and hearing that all the Lords were in the old orchard at Whitehall, I sent the Marshal to tell them, that I had staid all that while to know their pleasures, and that I would attend them, if they would command me any service. They were very glad, when they heard I was not gone, and desired the Marshal to send for me, and I should with all speed be dispatched for Scotland. The Marshal believed them, and sent Sir Arthur Savage for me. I made haste to them, one of the Council, my Lord of Banbury that now is, whispered the Marshal in the ear, and told him, if I came they would stay me, and send some other in my stead. The Marshal got from them, and met me coming to them between the two gates. He bade me be gone, for he had learned for certain, that if I came to them they would betray me. I returned, and took horse between nine and ten a clock, and that night I rode to Doncaster. The Friday night I came to my own house to Wetherington, and presently took order with my deputies to see the borders kept in quiet, which they had much to do, and gave order that the next morning the King of Scotland should be proclaimed King of England, &c. at Morpeth and Alnewick. Very early on Saturday I took horse for Edinburgh, and came to Norham about twelve at noon, so that I might well have been with the King by supper time, but I got a great fall by the way, and my horse with one of his heels gave me a great blow on the head, that made me shed much blood. It made me so weak that I was forced to ride a soft pace after, so that the King was newly gone to bed by that time I knocked at the gate. I was quickly let in and carried up to the King's chamber. I kneeled by him, and saluted him by his title of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. He gave me his hand to kiss, and bade me welcome. After he had long discoursed of the manner of the Queen's sickness, and of her death, he asked what letters I had from the Council, I told him, none, and acquainted him, how narrowly I escaped from them, and yet I had brought him a blue ring from a fair lady (39), that I hoped would give him assurance of the truth that I had reported. He took it and looked upon it, and said it is enough, I know by this you are a true messenger. Then he committed me to the charge of my Lord Hume, gave strict command that I should want nothing. He sent for his Chirurgeons to attend me, and when I kissed his hand at my departure, he said to me these gracious words, I know you have lost a near kinswoman and a loving mistress, but take here my hand I will be as good a master to you, and will requite this service with honour and reward. The first author who suggested any thing in relation to Sir John Fortescue was Francis Osborn, Esq; and the very title of his treatise shews, that it is not to be put into the balance with what we are told, by those who were eye and ear witnesses of what they relate; his account however is worth reading, and runs thus (40). 'The news of the Queen's death was brought him first, as I have heard, by Carey after Lord Lepington, and since Earl of Monmouth, who not able to satisfy such a course of doubts and questions, as far more resolute natures than his do generally muster upon less occasions, the King stood as in a maze, being more affected thro' the fear of opposition, than pleased with the present report, till by a later post he was advertised of his being joyfully proclaimed in London by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and of the unquestioned reception, his title in all places met with, no less than that the hopes of the prudent carriage of the Treasurer, and ranting protestations of the Earl of Northumberland, that in all places vapoured he would bring him in by the sword, had stop'd their mouths that desired, in regard of the known feud between the nations, he might be obliged to articles: and amongst these noble and publick spirits, was Sir John Fortescue, Sir Walter Raleigh, the Lord Cobham, &c. all frowned upon after by the King.' In direct contradiction to this Mr Winwood, after Sir Ralph Winwood and Secretary of State, in a private letter written to his intimate friend the Duke de Tremouille, immediately upon the death of the Queen, has these words (41). The same day the late Queen died, the King of Scots was proclaimed King in the city of London, between the hours of ten and eleven, with inexpressible applause, as he has been since through the whole kingdom, without the least opposition being given by any person of what quality soever either by word or deed. It is not easy to suppose, that Mr Winwood was not as well informed as Mr Osborn, and it cannot be imagined that he would have written a direct falsehood to a person of such quality, when he might have so easily avoided it by saying nothing.

the future happiness of his reign. Now how much sooner of ceremony and compliment there might be in this, one cannot well believe that Sir John Fortescue would have set his name to it, if he had ever raised any objections against King James's coming in except upon terms. On the second of May 1603, when King James came to Brockesborne in the county of Hertford, the Seat of Sir Henry Cock, Comptroller of the Household to Queen Elizabeth, the members of the Privy-Council were presented to his Majesty, and were continued in that high station (g). When his consort Queen Anne came from Scotland, the King went to meet her, and on the twenty-seventh of June dined with her, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth, at the house of Sir George Fermor, in Northamptonshire, from whence he proceeded the same night to Sir John Fortescue's, at Salden in Buckinghamshire, where they lay (h); and certainly this could not pass for any instance of distaste or resentment, but rather the contrary. On the twenty-fourth of July following, Sir Francis Fortescue, son to Sir John, was made a Knight of the Bath, previous to the Coronation, which was another mark of royal favour (i). It is indeed true, that, instead of Chancellor of the Exchequer, the King made Sir John Fortescue Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (k), which is the single matter of fact that has been ever urged to shew the probability of his declining in the King's esteem; and yet it is very possible, that this might be done without the least disrespect to Sir John, and upon terms with which he might be well satisfied. We may the rather esteem this to have been the case from a subsequent fact, one of the most remarkable in our statesman's life, and none of the least memorable in that Monarch's reign (l). The King having summoned the first Parliament in his reign, to meet at Westminster March the nineteenth 1603-4, a writ was issued to the Sheriff of Buckinghamshire, Sir Francis Cheyne, to return two Knights for that county (m). The Sheriff accordingly brought on the election January the twenty-fifth, at Brickhill, and not at Aylesbury, because the plague was there. It was intended, that Sir John Fortescue, and Sir Francis Goodwin, should be elected; but upon the Sheriff's proposing them, the freeholders cried out, a Goodwin, a Goodwin, notwithstanding that the most considerable gentry, and the Justices of Peace, were in the interest of Sir John Fortescue. Upon this, Sir Francis Goodwin himself came, and laboured all that was in his power, to induce the freeholders to consent that Sir John Fortescue's name should stand first in the return; but they adhered to their former opinion, and, upon receiving the poll, Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir William Fleetwood, were returned, by the Sheriff, Knights of the Shire for the county of Bucks (n). This was represented to the King, as a great insult upon Sir John Fortescue, an old Privy-Counsellor, and, as such, worthy of honour and respect. It was discovered, that Sir Francis Goodwin was outlawed, which was supposed to be a sufficient bar to his sitting in Parliament; of which the Sheriff being informed, he made such a return to the writ, viz. that Sir Francis Goodwin was chosen, but disabled by being outlawed; which return was drawn for him by Sir Edward Coke, then the King's Attorney-General (o). The Lord Chancellor Egerton, upon this, issued a second writ, which was delivered to the Sheriff by Sir John Fortescue, and upon this Sir John was returned (p). On Thursday the twenty-second of March, when the House met, Sir William Fleetwood moved, that Sir Francis Goodwin might take his seat as Knight with him for Buckinghamshire; which the House ordered the next day, and Sir Francis did take his seat accordingly (q). This occasioned a long dispute between the House and the King, the true point in debate being this, Whether the House was the proper judge of the return, or the Chancellor? For if the latter was not, then the second writ was void in its own nature; this dispute lasted to the eleventh of April, when the King proposed it to the House as an expedient, that both these gentlemen should be set aside, and a new writ issued for the choice of a member (r). Upon this difference between the King and the House of Commons, so many and such strange reports went abroad, that it was judged expedient, by the Lord Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, who was then at the head of the administration, to give the King's Ministers at foreign Courts an account of it, which he did (s) [F]. Upon mature deliberation

[F] Which he did.] The following passage is extracted from a letter to Mr afterwards Sir Ralph Winwood by the Lord Cecil, dated April the twelfth 1604, the very day that the last writ was issued (42), ' If you have heard any thing of any question between the King and the Lower House of Parliament, you may satisfy yourself whatsoever you may hear, that the cause was only by lack of understanding of what was intended by his Majesty, and not any other point of importance. So as if I did not conceive that idle discoursers are apt to make comments upon all things according to the levity of their own brain, I should not have touched it at all, for to be short, it was no more but this. That Sir Francis Goodwyn having laboured to be Knight of Buckinghamshire, to the exclusion of an antient Counsellor Sir John Fortescue, it was advised by the King's learned Counsel and Judges, whether there were not some means by the Laws to avoid it. Whereupon it being found that he was outlawed, and so certified by the Sheriff, consequently a new writ was sent forth by virtue whereof Sir John Fortescue was chosen. Notwithstanding the Lower House having had notice that he was once chosen, and having found that the outlawry was pardoned, in effect, by his Majesty's general pardon upon his Inauguration, altho' in true construction of Law, he is not Reclus in Curia, until he hath sued out his scire facias, they somewhat suddenly fearing some opposition which was never intended, allowed of him and rejected the other, which form of proceeding appeared harsh to the King, rather in form than matter. And therefore being then desirous that the Higher House might have some conference with the Lower House (which we as of ourselves did intimate unto them) they grew jealous of that proposition as a matter which they misliked to yield to after a judgment, and therefore did rather choose to send to the King, that they would deliberation the House of Commons thought fit to accept the proposition the King had made, provided Sir Francis Goodwin, whom they had admitted to his seat, gave his consent, which he very readily did; upon which a new writ issued, and Christopher Pigott, Esq; was chosen (t). It may be fairly presumed, tho' the King did not carry his point in this matter, that Sir John Fortescue thought himself much obliged; nor is it in any degree credible, that he would himself have meddled in this affair, as indeed he transacted many things in it personally, if he had been but slightly attached to the King, or in his principles an enemy to the Prerogative. We do not meddle with the merits of the case, but with the conduct of Sir John Fortescue, who, being generally reputed a very wise man, as well as a man of honour, would have been ashamed to have changed sides in a few months, in so glaring a manner as to claim the assistance of that Prince's power which he had publicly advised should be curtailed. Some authors have represented this as an act of great violence and injustice in King James, and that, as such, it gave very high distaste to his first Parliament (u). In order to countenance these notions, a very imperfect case upon this subject has been printed (w); but forty years after it happened, the House of Commons ordered all that was entered upon that head in their journals to be printed (x), and from thence it appears in the light in which it is here placed; and to leave the reader without any doubt of this, Sir Francis Goodwin's letter, the Speaker's report of the thanks of the House given to the King, together with his answer, and the warrant for the new writ, are inserted in the notes (y) [G]. A little attention will shew, that this indisputable matter of fact, is very hardly, if at all, reconcilable to what is suggested of Sir John Fortescue's opposing

' would be glad to shew himself the reasons, to whom they owed all duty as their Sovereign, rather than to any other, taking it somewhat derogative from their House, to attribute any superiority to the Higher House, seeing both Houses make but one body, whereof the King is the Head. This being done, after two conferences, in the presence of the King, the Council, and Judges, the matter was compounded to all men's likings, wherein that which is due is only due to Cæsar, for, but for his wisdom and dexterity, it could not have had any conclusion with so general an applause. This being found by debate to be most certain, namely, that neither of them both were duly returned, and therefore resolved of all parties, that a new writ should go forth by warrant from the Speaker, wherein none of them should stand to be elected, and so much for the truth of that cause.' This and the following papers might have been consulted by an author who states this matter thus (43). 'He (i. e. the King) let them know in the case of the contested election, between Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir John Fortescue to be Knight of the Shire, for the county of Bucks, that he would have differences determined by his absolute power; and tho' the Commons voted Sir Francis duly elected, yet the King commanded them to let the matter be heard before the House of Lords, and the Judges: but Sir Francis Goodwyn fearing it might cause a rupture between the King and the House of Commons, petitioned that a new writ might be issued to elect a Knight for that county in his stead.' It appears from the proceedings, that the King desired the House to confer with the Judges, not as Umpires, but as his Counsellors, that he might receive satisfaction

(44). It also appears from the paper which the House sent the King, that this was no new dispute, since they alledged that in the twenty third year of the preceding reign a Burgess was returned dead, and another chosen, and returned by a new writ, but the party returned dead appearing, the House of Commons admitted him to his seat, and notwithstanding the Sheriff's return rejected the other. The very same year a Burgess for Hull was returned a lunatick, and a new one chosen upon a second writ. The person first returned, appeared and claimed his place, the House examined the matter, and found the first return to be true, and therefore they refused him, which they would not have done if the return had been false. In the twenty ninth year of the same reign, a writ was awarded into Norfolk for the choice of Knights, and election made and returned, but before the Parliament met, the Chancellor awarded a second writ, and upon that also return was made, the Commons being attended with both writs and returns by the clerk of the Crown, examined the cause, allowed the first, and rejected the second (45). The fault therefore in this case, lay in those who advised the King to insist so much upon this matter. But after all, the final resolution was not taken upon Sir Francis Goodwin's petition, but upon the King's proposal and Sir Francis Goodwin acquiesced under that resolution of the House, as the reader will see in the next note.

[G] Are inserted in the notes.] The reader will doubtless observe, that the Lord Chancellor Egerton, and Sir Edward Coke then Attorney-General, had at this time a good understanding, and through them it is plain this advice with respect to the second writ was both given and executed (46). The King therefore had reason to tell the House of Commons as he did, that both the gentlemen were his good subjects, and that in one sense it was indifferent to him, whether Sir John or Sir Francis was chosen; but in another, he was unwilling that any disgrace should be thrown upon an old Privy-Counsellor, since it was a thing himself had carefully avoided, and indeed it appears to have been from the accident of the plague's being at Aylesbury, which frightened many of the better sort from attending the county Court that Sir John Fortescue lost his election. But it is time to come to the papers, as we find them entered in the Journal Book of the House of Commons (47).

SIR FRANCIS GOODWYN'S Letter.

S I R,

I AM heartily sorry to have been the least occasion, either of question between his Majesty and that honourable House, or of interruption to those worthy and weighty causes, which by this time in all likelihood had been in very good furtherance; wherefore understanding very credibly, that it pleased his Majesty when the committees last attended him, to take course with them for a third writ and election for the Knightship of the county of Buckingham, I am so far from giving any impediment thereunto, that, contrarywise, I humbly desire his Majesty's direction in that behalf to be accomplished and performed. So praying you, according to such opportunity as will be ministred, to give furtherance thereunto, I take my leave, and rest opposing King James, and of the King's resentment ever after (z). For if this had been a thing generally known, the affront put upon him by his county, would have been a compliment to the King; as, on the other hand, one cannot easily conceive how the King could have been prevailed upon to interfere so far as he did, if he had not had a very high personal esteem for Sir John Fortescue. We may add, to shew that even this disappointment did not lessen this accomplished courtier's credit with his master, that there was a current report, the very next year, that he would have been created a Baron; the like honour being intended for the Chief Justice Sir John Popham, Sir Edward Coke, who was to succeed Sir Francis Gawdy as Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and Sir Thomas Knivet, who was very active in detecting of the powder-treason (a). But the last only had that honour, which it is not at all improbable Sir John Fortescue, who was a very modest and disinterested person, might decline. He was also, which ought to be considered as a very remarkable act of confidence, one of those Privy-Counsellors to whom the King, in 1606, executed an indenture (*), signifying what lands should be for ever annexed, and what jewels should be held and reputed jewels belonging to the Crown; which, tho' one part of the indenture was under the Great-Seal, was in reality a family transaction, till confirmed (as the King intended it should) by Act of Parliament. After this, we are able to meet with no farther particulars worthy of the reader's notice, which will not seem strange if we remember that he must have been now above fourscore, since he was a man, tho' a very young man, at the time of his father's death; he had, however, the satisfaction of seeing his son, Sir Francis Fortescue, Sheriff of the county (b), which he had also represented in the last Parliament of Queen Elizabeth (c). He died, as Mr Camden tells us, December the twenty-third 1607 (d), at which time he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Master of the Great Wardrobe (e) and a Privy-Counsellor. His parts and learning first introduced him at Court, where, from the beginning to the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was in constant favour, and, in the latter part of it, employed in matters of the highest importance; so that if we had set down every commission in which he is named, and dwelt minutely upon all his services, it would have swelled this life to a much larger extent (f), tho' there is not twenty lines to be met with about him in all our Biographers. His lasting love to literature, was rendered evident by his contributions to the library, which, through the care and diligence of Sir Thomas Bodley, was erected at Oxford; and the nature of his studies, agreeable to what Camden reports, is no less evident from the titles of some of the books bestowed by him upon that library, amongst others, by a Sophocles, with manuscript Scholia in Greek; for which Sir Thomas held himself so much obliged, that he gave particular directions for Sir John's being received with all imaginable respect, when, going occasionally to Oxford, he went to visit the library (g). He was a particular friend and patron to the learned Camden, and, as he acknowledges, gave him great assistance in compiling his Annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth (h); which passage indeed is not in the English translation, or in most of the Latin editions, but occurs in that of Mr Hearne's, printed from the author's own copy, which was in the possession of Dr Smith. It might be probably for this reason, as well as in virtue of his office as Clarenceux King at Arms, that he assisted at his funeral, which, if the memorandum he left be right, was solemnized on the fourth of July ensuing his death, that learned person being disabled, by a fall from his horse, from making such a journey sooner (i). His posterity for several generations remained possessed of his estate and fine seat at Salden, and became extinct in Sir Francis Fortescue, who died at Bath November the eleventh 1729, without issue.

‘ That he related to this House, the humble and dutiful acceptance of what his Majesty had done, together with the humble thanks of the House, for his zealous and paternal delivery of his grace unto us by his own mouth, what wonder they conceived in his judgment, what joy in his grace, what comfort they had in his justice, what approbation they made of his prudence, and what obedience they yielded to his power and pleasure. That his direction gave all men satisfaction, that they were determined to pursue the course he had prescribed. That now they were become suitors, he would be pleased to receive a representation of the humble thanks and service of the House.

‘ His Majesty answered that upon this second access, he was forced to reiterate what he said before. ‘ That this question was unhappily cast upon him, for he carried as great a respect to our privileges as ever any Prince did, he was no ground searcher, he was of the mind that our privileges were his strength, that he thought the ground of our proceeding, was our not understanding that he had intermeddled before we had decided, that he thought also we had no wilful purpose to derogate any thing from him, for our answer was a grave, dutiful, and obedient answer.

The Warrant for a new Election of a Knight for Bucks, read and allowed in this form.

‘ Whereas the Right Honourable Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Chancellor of his Majesty's Duchy of Lancaster, and Sir Francis Goodwyn, Knight, have been severally elected and returned Knights of the Shire for the county of Bucks, to serve in this present Parliament; upon deliberate consultation, and for some special causes moving the Commons House of Parliament. It is this day ordered and required by the said House, that a writ be forthwith awarded for a new Election of another Knight for the said Shire. And this shall be your Warrant.

Directed to my very loving friend Sir George Coppin, Knight, Clerk of the Crown in his Majesty's High-Court of Chancery.

FOSTER (SAMUEL), an eminent English Mathematician in the XVIIth century, and Astronomy Professor in Gresham College. As to this gentleman's family we are able to say nothing; all that is preserved of him, in that respect, being no more than this, that he was a native of Northamptonshire (a), and, in all probability, his parents were in competent, tho' not in affluent, circumstances; since himself, and his elder brother Walter, were both sent to Emanuel College in Cambridge (b). Samuel was admitted a Sizer there April the twenty-third 1616, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1619, and that of Master in 1623 (c); he applied himself early to the study of the Mathematicks, and attained to a great proficiency in that kind of knowledge, of which he gave the first specimen in the year 1624, as the reader will see at the bottom of the page [A]. He never had a Fellowship, and is therefore placed, by Mr Fuller (d), among the learned writers of Emanuel College, who were not Fellows. Upon the death of Mr Henry Gellibrand, Astronomy Professor in Gresham College, February the ninth 1636 (e), our author, Mr Foster, made interest to succeed him, and was accordingly chosen (f) on the second of March following, but for what reason does not appear; he quitted it again on the twenty-fifth of November in the same year, and was succeeded therein by Mr Mungo Murray (g), a Scots gentleman. He continued, however, to pursue his mathematical studies with great diligence; and, in 1638, he gave another proof of this, in a work of his (h) that was then extremely well received, and is to this day very much esteemed [B]. In the mean time Mr Murray having been presented to the rectory of Welles in Norfolk, by the Right Honourable Thomas Earl of Arundel, and marrying in 1641, his Professorship was thereby vacated (i); and, as Mr Foster had formerly made way for him, so, by this alteration in his condition, he made way for Mr Foster, who was accordingly chosen May the twenty-sixth the same year (k); the civil war breaking out very soon after his becoming a second time Astronomy Professor at Gresham College, he became one of that worthy and learned society of gentlemen who had stated meetings for cultivating the new Philosophy, to whose parts and industry this nation, and indeed the whole republick of letters, stand so much indebted (l). In 1646, Dr Wallis, another Member of that Society, received from Mr Foster a Mathematical Theorem, which he afterwards published (m). Neither was it only in this branch of science that he excelled, but he was likewise well versed in the ancient languages, as appears from his revising and correcting the LEMMA TA of Archimedes, which had been translated from an Arabick manuscript into Latin, but not published by the learned Mr John Greaves (n). Our author made also several curious observations of Eclipses, both of the sun and moon, as well at Gresham College as in his native county of Northamptonshire, at Coventry, and in other places (o); and was particularly famous for inventing, as well as improving, of Astronomical and other Mathematical instruments. We have mentioned all the treatises of his published in his life-time; but, besides these, he wrote many more, which his long and great infirmities, hindered him from fitting for the press in the manner he intended (p). These, however, have not been lost to the world, since the greatest part of them at least, have been printed by the care of several of his learned friends, particularly Dr John Twysden, and Edmund Wingate, Esq; as the reader will be informed at the bottom of the page [C]. [A] At the bottom of the page.] It is necessary to inform the reader, that this treatise, divided into two parts, was originally published at the end of the ingenious Mr Edmund Gunter's description of the Cross Staffe in three books. The titles ran thus.

I. The description and use of a small portable QUADRANT for the more easy finding of the hour of Azimuth. 4to.

The Description and uses of another Quadrant fitted for daily practice for finding the hour and Azimuth, and other things of the sun's course in reference to the Horizon, with new lines serving to the forementioned and other purpose more accurately. Invented by Mr Samuel Foster sometime Professor of Astronomy in Gresham-College. Lond. 1624. 4to. 1662. 4to. 1673. 4to. 1652. 8vo.

The last mentioned edition of this book was published within a small time after the author's decease, by one Anthony Thomson mathematical instrument maker (1), who in his preface tells us, they were intended as appendices to Mr Gunter's treatises, and the reader is farther to know, that the quarto editions were actually printed as such, only some few copies that were printed separately of the first edition for the use of the author's friends. In this as in all our author's other works, there is a preciseness and a perspicuity which could not fail of recommending them extremely, more especially in those days when these sciences were not so well or so generally understood as at present. But how much soever the modern mathematicians may surpass those of the last age, yet there is certainly great respect due to the memories of those worthy men, by whose diligence and industrious application the first steps were made towards those improvements, which have since followed, and which like scaffolds in building were absolutely necessary to the raising those stately piles that now attract every eye.

[B] And is to this day very much esteemed.] There might possibly be some particular reason for our author's resigning his Professorship, tho' we have no account of it; to which conjecture, I am led by the observation of the most judicious and accurate Historian of Gresham-College, that upon the resignation of our author, Mr Mungo Murray, was recommended by King Charles the First. The title of the latter work of our author, published after he resigned his employment, and before he was rechose is,

II. The Art of Dialling. Lond. 1638, 1675. 4to.

The edition in 1675, has several additions and variations taken from the author's own manuscript, as also a supplement by the editor William Leybourne, who was first a Printer, then an editor, and lastly an author of books, and who, as we shall hereafter have occasion more than once to remark, was particularly instrumental in the preserving and publishing several of Mr Foster's writings.

[C] At the bottom of the page.] We are now come to speak of such of this gentleman's treatises as were published after his decease, and which indeed make far the greater part of his works, the titles of them follow.

III. Posthuma Fosteri: containing the description of a ruler, upon which are inscribed divers scales, &c. Lond. 1652. 4to.

(1) As appears by the Preface to Foster's Miscellanies.

This was published soon after the author's death by Mr Wingate.

IV. Four Treatises of Dialling. Elliptical or azimuthal horologigraphy. Circular horologigraphy. Rectilineal or diametrical horologigraphy. Elliptical horologigraphy by spherical and not projective work. Lond. 1654. 4to.

V. MISCELLANIES or MATHEMATICAL LUCUBRATIONS of Mr Samuel Foster, sometime publick Professor of Astronomy in Gresham-College in London, published, and many of them translated into English, by the care and industry of John Twysden. C. L. M. D. whereunto he hath annexed some things of his own.

As the greatest part of this book is printed both in Latin and English, so there are prefixed to it two dedications, the first in Latin addressed to Sir Henry Yelverton, Baronet, who was nephew to the editor Dr Twysden by his mother, in which he tells him that he had collected these pieces of Mr Samuel Foster out of his loose papers, and had added to them some few pieces of his own, that Sir Henry might have ever at his hand what might put him in mind of the most learned author, and prevent himself also from slipping out of his memory when removed from this world. The other dedication is in English. To the Right Honourable Lady Susanna Longueville, Baroness Grey, Ruthin, Hastings, Washford and Valence. The epistle to the reader is also both in English and in Latin, beginning thus. 'Courteous reader, we have at last made publick these posthumous works of that learned, industrious, and most skilful Mathematician, Mr Samuel Foster. They would have come out more polished and with greater lustre, had himself lived to have added his last hand unto them. But since it hath pleased God to deny this unto us, we have rather made choice to bring them to their birth with our hands, such as they are, than suffer those things to perish which we judged worthy of the press, or that the learned world should be longer deprived of the genuine offspring of so worthy a person. The treatises themselves are of different kinds, some of them written by the author in Latin, some in English, others promiscuously in both languages. The Astroscope, Planetary instruments, and some others we have translated into Latin, and caused them to be printed in a double column, to the end that those of our own nation who are not much skilled in the Latin tongue, may read them in their mother language. But strangers not remain deprived of the knowledge of new and profitable inventions. Some others of them are put out without any version, because in truth being employed in other things, I could not get leisure enough to do them; peradventure, if they shall bear a second impression, and no body else prevent me, I may labour in that also.' In this volume there are no less than twelve small treatises of Mr Samuel Foster's, the titles of which are very exactly set down, as indeed every thing is, by the judicious and industrious Mr Ward, in that lasting monument which he has raised to the honour of the Professors of Gresham-College. We shall however set down these titles somewhat more at large, and with a short account of each.

1. Stellæ fixæ, quas Tycho ad mille, in catalogum congescit, & Keplerus tabb. Rudolphinarum operi adnexuit ad annum incarnationis 1671. adservatis eisdem Latitudinibus, quoad Longitudines, ex additione nimirum gradus unius integri correctæ; & à polo Eclipticæ ad polum mundi, quorum distantia est 23 grad. 31 min. reducæ: hoc est in ascensiones rectas & declinationes, eidem anno debitas correctæ. A Samuele Fostero, olim Astronomiæ Professore in Collegio Greshami, Londini. That is, A catalogue of the fixed stars which may serve for the year 1671. In Latin, but with a table of the sun's right ascension for every degree of the ecliptic, at the end in English; being a necessary introduction to the next treatise.

2. ASTROSCOPIUM, pro facillimâ stellarum dignotione, that is, Astroscopium, an instrument for the ready finding of the stars in the Heavens. Written by Mr Foster in English, with the Latin prefixed by Dr Twysden. At the time the author invented this instrument it was equally curious and useful, being calculated for the service of young Astronomers, with a view to encourage their progress in the science.

3. De instrumentis Planetariis. Cui usui inserviunt, & quomodo sunt tractanda. That is, Of the Planetary instruments; to what end they serve, and how they are to be used. In two columns, the Latin by Dr Twysden, and the English by Mr Foster.

4. Eclipsium tam Solarium quam Lunarium observationes. That is, Some observations of Eclipses of the Sun and Moon. In several of these observations our author was assisted by Dr Twysden, who has also added to them his own observations, as to the motion of a comet at Easton in Northamptonshire from December the 14th, 1652. to the 24th of the same month, as also an account of a spot seen in the sun at the same place, July the 2d, 1651.

5. Ratio facillima computandi altitudinem Solis horarium ad quamlibet latitudinem, struendis Tabulis altitudinem commodissima: quam à D. Fostero olim acceptam, communicavit mihi D. Palmerus, Ectonenfis. That is, An easy way to calculate tables of the sun's horarie altitude for any latitude, which being communicated to Dr Twysden, by Mr John Palmer of Ecton, who received it long since from Mr Foster, I thought worthy to be here inserted. In two columns Latin and English.

6. Problemata Geometrica varia. That is, Geometrical Propositions of divers kinds. In Latin and English.

7. De Constructione Canonis Sin. Tang. & Secantium. That is, Of the Construction of the Canon of Sines, Tangents, and Secants. In Latin only.

8. Quadrantis Horometrici olim editi demonstratio. That is, A demonstration of an horometrical Quadrant formerly published, in Latin only.

9. Epitome Aristarchi Samii de magnitudine Solis & Lunæ. That is, An Epitome of Aristarchus Samius, concerning the magnitude of the Sun and Moon, in Latin only. This great Philosopher Aristarchus Samius flourished long after Pythagoras, and a little before Archimedes; our author supposes, that he flourished two hundred and eighty years before Christ. He held that which is now stiled the new system, that the earth moved and the sun remained at rest; there is nothing extant of his, except his treatise of the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon, which, together with the learned commentary of Pappus of Alexandria, was published in Latin by the famous Ferdinand Commandine at Pisa in 1572.

10. Lemmata Archimedis, apud Græcos & Latinos jam pridem desiderata, e vetusto codice M.S. Arabico; à Johanne Gravio traducta; et nunc primum cum Arabum scholiis publicata. Revisa & pluribus mendis repurgata a Samuele Fostero. That is, The Lemma's of Archimedes not extant either in Greek or Latin, translated from an old Arabick manuscript by John Greaves, and now first published with the Scholia of a learned Arabian. Revised, and in many places corrected, by Samuel Foster. In Latin only.

11. The Geometrical Square with the use thereof in plain and spherical Trigonometrie, chiefly intended for the more easy finding of the hour and Azimuth. In English only.

12. The construction and use of the horizontal planisphere in projective Dialling refractive Dials. In English only.

To these are added two pieces of Dr Twysden's, one of dialling, and the other of fortification, to which is annexed, an Appendix published by Mr William Leybourne consisting of three pieces, two written by Mr Halton, and the third entituled, Equations arising from a quantity divided into two unequal parts: and the second book of Euclid's elements demonstrated by species by John Leeke.

VI. The Sector altered, and other scales added, with the description and use thereof, invented and written by Mr Samuel Foster, sometime publick Professor of Astronomy in Gresham-College in London, and now published by W. L. London 1661, 1673. 4to.

This

clining state of health, departed this life in the month of July 1652, in his own apartment at Gresham College, and was buried in the church of St Peter le Poor in Broadstreet (q). There have been two other persons of his name, who have published some mathematical pieces, and therefore it may not be amiss to give some little account of them; indeed all the account we are able to give, is very far from being considerable, but it may nevertheless be of use to prevent mistakes, and to avoid confusion. The first of these was William Foster, who, in his youth, was a disciple of the famous Mr Oughtred's, and afterwards a teacher of the Mathematicks in London (r). He distinguished himself by a book he published; and dedicated to the celebrated Sir Kenelm Digby, of which the reader may find somewhat more in the notes [D]. The other was one Mark Foster,

(q) Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham College, p. 85.

(r) See the note [D].

This was an improvement of Mr Gunter's Sector, and therefore publish'd amongst his works, the fourth edition of which was printed in the former of these two years, and the fifth in the latter. In this last edition, Mr Leybourne corrected some oversights and mistakes which were in the fourth edition from Mr Foster's own manuscript. Besides these printed pieces, there was in the hands of the late William Jones, Esq; a manuscript treatise in folio, composed by Mr Foster with this title,

VII. The uses of a general Quadrant invented by Mr Samuel Foster, late Professor of Astronomy in Gresham-College.

We have before mentioned our author's plain and perspicuous manner of treating abstruse subjects, a short instance will best support what we have advanced, and this shall be taken from his description of those planetary instruments he called Theoricks (2). His words are these.

'The finding out of the places of the five planets, in respect of Longitude and Latitude, is the thing principally intended in these Theoricks. Now this having been already declared, it shall not be amiss to add somewhat of the principal passions belonging unto them, of which there are these three chief heads.

'First, at sometimes these five planets, in respect of that motion which they make according to the Longitude of the Ecliptic, do appear to go forward, agreeably to the order and succession of the signs, that is, they appear to be direct in motion. Sometimes again they seem to go backward in motion, or to be retrograde, and in their changes from the one of these motions to the other, they must necessarily appear to be standing still or to be stationary.

'Secondly, their places being compared in respect of distance from the sun, or one from the other, the planets may have several aspects; as conjunction, when they are (any two of them) in one place of Longitude; opposition, when they are in opposite Longitude; Trine, when they are  $\frac{1}{3}$  part of a circle, or four signs, distant from each other; Quartile, when they are three signs or a Quadrant of a circle distant; Sextile, when they are  $\frac{1}{6}$  part of a circle or two signs distant. Venus and Mercury cannot make any of these aspects with the Sun. And one of them with the other can make none, but the sextile which often they do.

'Thirdly, their places being compared with the sun's place, they are either under the sun's beames, and are then said to be combustile, or else they rise after the sun rising when the sun is up, and are called oriental; or they set after the sun while the sun is down, and are called occidental; or are opposite to the sun, and are called acronychal. Venus and Mercury can never be acronychal, because they never go far enough from the sun: Venus only forty eight degrees, Mercurius only twenty nine degrees.

'These things will not be well discovered by these Theoricks, it being a difficult business to set the just times of these changes in their courses. If you desire to know in which of these motions any planet is, the best way will be, when you have found their places for any one day, to enquire their Longitudes about five or ten days after in Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars, or about two or four days after, for Venus and Mercurius, because the motions of these are much swifter than of the other. And so having found their places of longitude at two several times, you shall perceive what course they hold in respect of progress, regress, or standing still. For it must

'always be noted, that if a planet pass from direct motion to station, then that standing is the first station. But if it pass from retrograde motion, then is the station following to be taken for the second station.'—How modest he was in his opinion of his own abilities, and how sensible that, what he published in this treatise was valuable only to the younger students in Astronomy, we may gather from hence. —The poetical kinds of rising and setting, are called cosmical, acronychal, and heliachal. These and some other passions of the planets, such as are the emersions and occultations are not to be expected from these Theoricks. They are difficult to be found, especially for the planets which are always in motion, not residing any long time in one Longitude and Latitude. Besides the same things have relation to the elevations of the pole above several horizons, which kind of conclusions are not proper for Theoricks, but must be referred to Astrolabes and other Spherical Instruments. The most exact practice this way is to be had in the astronomical tables, and trigonometrical spheric works to be conjoined therewith for such purposes. They therefore that would have more; must there seek help and ways to satisfy themselves. This that is here done may serve for an introduction to more exact workings: at least it may supply the wants of such whose skill and desires reach not so far for whose sakes it was principally intended—and that he was apprised of the superior merit of other Astronomers is plain from hence.—The way that I go is (in general) agreeable to Copernicus his frame of the world, and in particular to that which Kepler useth in his Rudolphin Tables. Only this difference there is: Kepler makes the orbits of the planets to be ellipses, which is the better way; and I here do make them perfect circles, which is the easier way. And tho' it be defective, yet it makes no great difference in these small instruments.

[D] In the notes.] The title of the book which he translated and published, runs at large thus.

The Circles of Proportion and the Horizontal Instrument. The former shewing the manner how to work Proportions both simple and compound, and the ready and easy resolving of Questions, both in Arithmetic, Geometry, and Astronomy, and is newly increased with an additament for navigation. All which rules may also be wrought with the pen by Arithmetic, and the Canon of Triangles. The latter teaching how to work most Questions, which may be performed by the Globe, and to delineate Dials upon any kind of Plain. Hereunto is annexed the excellent use of two Rulers for calculation, invented and written in Latin, by W. C. translated into English, and set out for the publick benefit, by William Foster. Lond. 1633. 4to. The dedication to Sir Kenelm Digby, is dated May 1. 1632. and in it, he writes thus.

'Being in the time of the long vacation, 1630, in the country of the Reverend, and my most worthy friend and teacher, Mr William Oughtred, to whose instruction I owe, both my initiation and whole progress in these sciences. I, upon occasion of speech, told him of a ruler of Numbers, Sines, and Tangents, which one had bespoken to be made, such as is usually called Mr Gunter's rule, six feet long, to be used with a pair of beam compasses. He answered, that was a poor invention, and the performance very troublesome. But, said he, seeing you are taken with such mechanical ways of instruments, I will shew you what devices I have had by me these many years. And first he brought to me two rulers of that sort to be used, by applying one to the other with

Foster, who published a treatise of Trigonometry (s), but lived later in point of time than either of the other two. As for our author's eldest brother, Mr Walter Foster (t), who was himself likewise no mean proficient in the Mathematicks, he became Fellow of his College, and Rector of Allerton in Somersetsshire, as the reader will see, with some other circumstances relating to him, at the bottom of the page [E]. Dr John Twysden, above-mentioned, was a Physician, brother to Sir Roger Twysden, Baronet, a very learned man (u), a lover of the Mathematicks, and one who had been an intimate friend, and the companion of his studies, to our author (w), Mr Samuel Foster; and, in the careful publication of his posthumous works, may justly be stiled the executor of his fame.

'out any compasses. And after that, he shewed me those lines cast into a circle or ring, with another moveable circle upon it. I seeing the great expedite of both these ways, but especially of the latter, wherein it far excelleth any other instrument which hath been known, told him I wondered he could so many years conceal such useful inventions, not only from the world, but from myself, to whom in other parts and mysteries of art he had been so liberal. He answered, that the true way of art is not by instruments, but by demonstrations, and that it is a preposterous course of vulgar teachers to begin with instruments, and not with the sciences, and so instead of artists to make their scholars only doers of tricks, and as it were jugglers, to the despite of art, loss of precious time, and betraying of willing and industrious wits upon ignorance and idleness. That the use of instruments is indeed excellent, if a man be an artist, but contemptible being set and opposed to art. And lastly, that he meant to commend to me the skill of instruments, but first he would have me well instructed in the sciences. He also shewed me many notes and rules for the use of those circles, and of his Horizontal instrument which he had projected about thirty years before, the most part written in Latin. All which I obtained of him leave to translate into English, and make publick for the use and benefit of such as were studious and lovers of those excellent sciences. Which thing, while I with mature and diligent care, as my occasions would give me leave, went about to do, another, to whom the author in a long conference discovered his intent, using more haste than good speed, went about to pre-occupate, of which untimely birth and preventing, if not circumventing, forwardness, I say no more, but advise the studious reader only so far to trust as he shall be sure doth agree to truth and art.'

[E] At the bottom of the page.] All the proof we have, that the Reverend Mr Walter Foster, was elder brother to our author Samuel, is, that he took his degrees somewhat earlier, for he was admitted Bachelor of Arts, in 1617, Master in 1621, and Bachelor of Divinity, in 1628, at which time he was Fellow of his College, had an exceeding fair character there, and was well beloved, as fully appears from the following passage in a letter written by Dr Samuel Ward to the Lord Primate Usher (3).

'As for Dr Walsfall's manuscript of Rathrammus, I know where it is. I think it were not amiss to print both those treatises of Rathram's, with that De Corpore & Sanguine Domini, which is already extant. If I do not print them, your Lordship shall have a copy. As for the Latin copy of Ignatius's Epistles in Caius College Library, I was in good hope it had been the same with an old printed translation which I have, but comparing them together, I find them differ much. I acquainted Mr Thomas Whalley, now Dr Whalley, with that you wrote in your letter. He seemed to me not unwilling to undertake, but now in this contagious time he is gone into the country. I spoke also with Mr Foster of Emanuel College, who it seemeth hath taken some pains already in it, but then he was to go into the country. I am informed by some Fellows in that College, that being shortly to depart from the College by his time there allotted, finding in himself some impediment in his utterance, he could wish to be employed by your Lordship in such like business. He is a good scholar, and an honest man. The worst is, the book cannot be lent out of the College. I will see (by God's grace) at the return of our students what can be done, if God send life.' But notwithstanding what is said of the impediment in his speech, he continued his studies in Divinity, entered into Holy Orders, and possessed the living in Somersetsshire, which is mentioned in the text. Dr Twysden in his epistle to the reader, prefixed to Mr Foster's Mathematical Lucubrations, speaks of Mr Walter Foster in the following terms. 'In the last place, says he, let me admonish thee (courteous reader) that I have here obtruded nothing upon thee, which was not first taken out of the author's adversaries written with his own hand, which were communicated to me by that learned Divine Mr Walter Foster, Bachelor in Divinity, skilful also in these studies, to whom of right it belonged, to have raised up this seed to his deceased brother, had not his infirm health and domestick affairs held him in the country a great many miles distant from this place.' FOWLER (EDWARD) Bishop of Gloucester in part of this and the last century, and a most rational and moderate Divine, was born, in the year 1632 (a), at Westerleigh in Gloucestershire, of which place his father William Fowler, was minister. His education in Grammar-learning was at the College-school in Gloucester, under William Russell who had married his sister. In the beginning of the year 1650. he became Clerk of Corpus-Christi-College in Oxford, and on the 14th of December 1653. one of the Chaplains thereof (b). The 23d of the same month, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). Afterwards retiring to Cambridge for a time, he took his Master of Arts degree, as a member of Trinity-college in that University; and soon after returning to Oxford, was incorporated in the same degree July 5. 1656 (d). About that time he became Chaplain to Amabella Countess-dowager of Kent [A], who presented him to the Rectory of North-hill in Bedfordshire (*). Having been educated in the Presbyterian way [B] he scrupled embracing for a while the terms of Conformity, at the Restoration (e); but he conform'd afterwards, and became a great ornament to the Church. His excellent moral

moral Writings rendered him so considerable, that Archbishop Sheldon, in order to introduce him into the metropolis of the kingdom, the city of London, collated him, August 25. 1673, to the Rectory of Allhallows-Breadstreet (f). The 29th of February 1675 6, he was install'd into the fourth Prebend in Gloucester-Cathedral (g): And the 31st of March 1681, had institution to the Vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate, vacant by the death of Dr John Prichett Bishop of Gloucester, who had held it in commendam (h). The 10th of June following he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity (i). During the struggle between the Protestant Religion and Popery in this Kingdom, our Author appear'd to great advantage in defence of the former (*); being one of those illustrious Champions of the Reformation, which were an honour both to the Church and to the Age in which they lived (k). But this rendered him obnoxious, among the rest, to the Court, and its adherents: and, in all probability, caused an ill-natur'd prosecution against him, in 1685, by some of his parishioners; who alledged, That he was guilty of Whiggism; That he admitted to the Communion excommunicated persons before they were absolv'd &c. We are told, this matter was carried so far, that Decemb. 9. after a tryal at Doctors-Commons, our author was suspended, under pretence of his having acted several things contrary to the Canons of the Church, &c. (l). However, this affront did not intimidate or discourage him from performing what he thought his duty. For he was the Second who, in 1688, signed a Resolution, entered into by the principal of the London clergy, Not to read King James the Second's new Declaration for liberty of conscience (m). A person of so much learning and merit as Dr Fowler, was not left neglected or unrewarded at the Revolution. For April 23. 1691, he was nominated Bishop of Gloucester, (upon the deprivation of Dr Robert Frampton for refusing to take the oaths,) confirmed July 2. and consecrated the 5th of the same month (n). In this See he continued, without any translation, till his decease; which happened at Chelsea August 26. 1714. He lies buried in a vault on the north side of Hendon Church-yard in Middlesex; within the Chancel of which Church there is set up a handsome monument for him, with an inscription [C] containing his Character (o). This learned Author hath published, I. 'The Principles and Practices of certain Moderate Divines of the Church of England, abusively called Latitudinarians (greatly misunderstood) truly represented and defended; Wherein (by the way) some Controversies of no mean importance, are succinctly discussed: In a free Discourse between two intimate Friends [D]. [C] With an inscription.] Being as follows. 'To the pious memory of the Right Reverend Edward Fowler, late Lord Bishop of Gloucester; to which station he was advanced by King William, in the year 1691. for his known steadiness to the true interest of the Church of England, and of his country in times of danger. He approved himself worthy of that dignity, by a faithful and diligent discharge of his pastoral office; till disabled by age and bodily infirmities, he rested from his labours in the 82d year of his age, admitted to partake of his reward. He departed this life, Aug. 26. 1714. and was interred in the grave of his first wife, in this Church; leaving behind him, in the excellent treatises published by himself, lasting monuments of learning, judgment, piety, and christian temper of mind. He was twice married, first to Ann, daughter of Arthur Bernardston, of the Inner Temple, Esq; one of the Masters of Chancery; she departed this life, Dec. 19. 1696. He had by her three sons, Nathaniel, Edward, and Richard; and five daughters, Anne, Anne, Susannah, Elizabeth, and Mary; of whom Edward and Richard, Susannah, Elizabeth and Mary, survived him. His second wife, Elizabeth, who likewise survived him, was Elizabeth, widow of the Reverend Dr Ezekiah Burton, and daughter of Ralph Trevor of London, Merchant.'

At the bottom of this Epitaph, it is observed, that Richard, the younger son, 'did by his last will direct his executor, to cause a vault to be made, which for want of room in the Church, was made in the Church-yard, at the west corner of that wall; wherein were removed the Bishop's body, that of his first wife, and those of the said Richard, and his wife and daughter, in 1717 (3).

[D] The principles and practices of certain moderate Divines, &c.] The first edition of this book was printed at London, 1670. 8vo. and a second edition came out in 1671.—Some of the rational principles of those moderate Divines, were as follow. They admitted the use of reason in matters of religion, and preached the reasonableness of the christian precepts; for which they were, in contempt, called the rational preachers (4). They maintained, that moral good and evil are so essentially in their own nature; and not because God commands the one, and forbids the other (5). They so handled the doctrine of imputative righteousness, as to shew the necessity of inherent righteousness, and did not build it upon a strong faith only (6). They asserted, that faith justifieth only as it implyeth obedience (7). And they condemned the barbarous doctrine of unconditional and absolute Predestination (8).

[E] The design of Christianity, &c.] This was first printed in 1671. and there was a second edition in 1676. 8vo. The substance of it is summed up in these two propositions, in the contents. 1. That true holiness is the design of Christianity. 2. Upon what accounts the business of making men holy, came to be preferred by our Saviour before any other thing, and to be principally designed by him.—John Bunyan, the Antinomian, having writ against this excellent book, the author vindicated it, in Dirt wiped off: or, a manifest discovery of the gross ignorance, error, and most unchristian and wicked spirit of one John Bunyan, Lay-preacher in Bedford, which he hath shewed in a vile pamphlet published by him against the design of Christianity, &c. Lond. 1672. 4to.

[F] Libertas Evangelica, &c.] Published at London, 1680. 8vo. The substance of this also, is summed up in these two propositions. 1. 'That the most excellent and most highly to be valued liberty doth consist in an entire compliance with the laws of righteousness and goodness: or in freedom from the dominion of corrupt and sinful affections. 2. That the freedom to holy obedience and true goodness, or

The Resolution of this case of conscience, whether the Church of England’s symbolizing so far as it doth with the Church of Rome, makes it lawful to hold Communion with the Church of England? Lond. 1683. 4to. 2. A defence of the Resolution, &c. in answer to a book intituled, A modest Examination of the Resolution, &c. Lond. 1684. 4to. 3. Examination of Cardinal Bellarmine’s 4th note of the Church, viz. Amplitude, or Multitude and Variety of Believers. 4. The Texts which Papists cite out of the Bible, for the proof of their Doctrine concerning the obscurity of the Holy Scriptures examined. Lond. 1687. 4to (9). Antony Wood ascribes also to him another tract in this controversy: viz. ‘ The Texts ‘ examined which Papists cite out of the Bible, for ‘ the proof of their Doctrine concerning the insufficiency of the Scriptures, and necessity of Tradition.’ But it was written by J. Williams, afterwards Bishop of Chichester (10).

[H] And on the Doctrine of the Trinity.] viz. 1. Certain propositions, by which the Doctrine of the H. Trinity is so explain’d, according to the ancient Fathers, as to speak it not contradictory to natural reason. Together with a defence of them, in answer to the objections of a Socinian writer, in his newly-printed Considerations on the Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, occasioned by these propositions, among other discourses. In a letter to that author. Lond. 1694. 4to. 2. A second defence of the propositions, by which the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity is so explained, according to the ancient Fathers, as to speak it not contradictory to natural reason. In answer to a Socinian manuscript, in a letter to a friend. Together with a third defence of those propositions, in answer to the newly-published reflexions, contained in a pamphlet, intituled, A Letter to the Reverend Clergy of both Universities. Lond. 1695. 4to.

[I] Likewise several Sermons.] 1. A Sermon preached before the Judges, in the time of the Assizes, in the Cathedral Church at Gloucester, Aug. 7. 1681. on 1 Tim. i. 19. Lond. 1681. 4to. published to put a stop to false and injurious representations. 2. A Discourse of Offences in two Sermons, Aug. 19. and Sept. 2d 1683. in the Cathedral Church of Gloucester, both on Matth. xviii. 7. Lond. 1683. 4to. published by reason of the heinous offence that was taken at the former, by some of that city; particularly the Common-Council, who made a wonderful wise order thereupon; which is printed at the end. 3. A Sermon preached at the general meeting of Gloucestershire-men; for the most part inhabitants of the city of London: in the Church of St Mary le Bow, December the 9th 1684. on 1 Pet. ii. 17. Lond. 1685. 4to. 4. The great wickedness and mischievous effects of flandering, preached in the Parish Church of St Giles’s, Nov 15. 1685. on Psalm ci. 5. Lond. 1685. 4to. with a large preface of the author, and conclusion in his own vindication. 5. [K] And other Tracts.] viz. 1. An answer to the paper delivered by Mr Ashton at his execution. Lond. 1690. 4to. 2. A discourse of the great disingenuity and unreasonableness of repining at afflicting Providences; and of the influence which they ought to have upon us, on Job ii. 10. published upon occasion of the death of Queen Mary; with a preface containing some observations touching her excellent endowments and exemplary life. Lond. 1695. 8vo (11). — The first of these he begins, with observing, that ‘ the paper which passed under the name of Mr Ashton’s speech, seemed to him to be composed with ‘ too much art and care, to be the work of one who ‘ professed, he thought it better to employ his last minutes in devotion — And, as the whole nation was ‘ therein charged with the guilt of Perjury and Rebellion, therefore, he rather believed it to be drawn ‘ up by some persons of more art and leisure; who ‘ thought it best to convey their own sentiments (as ‘ they called them) under the more popular name of ‘ one who suffered for their cause.’ C

FOX (EDWARD) an eminent Statesman in the XVIth Century, Almoner to Henry VIII. and bishop of Hereford, was born at Dursley in Gloucestershire, and educated at Eton School (a). Thence he was admitted Scholar of King’s College in Cambridge, March 27, 1512, and elected Provost of the same Decemb. 27, 1528 (b), which place he kept to the time of his death (c). He was in his youth a person of great vivacity, but having withal prudence to govern that spirit, it only served to raise him, and render him eminent. His relation to Richard Fox bishop of Winchester made him a Scholar, and his own inclination a politician (d). Being recommended as such to Cardinal Wolfey, he took him into his service; and, if our author is entirely to be credited (e), it was he that put the Cardinal upon aspiring to the Papacy. However, being noted for a man of great sense and address, he was, in the beginning of the year 1528 (f), sent ambassador to Rome, jointly with Stephen Gardiner afterwards bishop of Winchester, in order to obtain new Bulls from Pope Clement VII, for King Henry the Eighth’s divorce from his queen Catharine of Arragon (g). He was then Almoner to that King, and reputed one of the best Divines in England (h). Having soon obtained the desired Commission or Bull from the Pope to the Cardinals Wolfey and Campegio, to try the affair in England; ’tis probable that they return’d from their Embassy, along with Campegio, who came over the October following (i). After that, Mr Fox whose abilities were sufficiently known, had the honour of being employed in Embassies both in France and Germany (k). [A] It

[A] Had the honour of being employed in embassies both in France and Germany.] During which, as he was discoursing one day of terms of peace, he said,

‘ Honourable ones last long, but the dishonourable no longer than till kings have power to break them: ‘ the surest way therefore, said he, to Peace, is a ‘ constant was in conversation with him, in 1529, that Thomas Cranmer afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury discover'd a plainer and shorter way for the King's divorce, than a tedious application to Rome; namely, by taking the Opinions of the most learned persons and Universities of Christendom: and it was He that made it known to the King as Cranmer's advice, when Stephen Gardiner, who was present at that conversation, would have put it off as his own. To him therefore Cranmer owed his introduction to Court, and by natural consequence his advancement to the See of Canterbury (l). In 1530, he was employed with Stephen Gardiner at Cambridge, to obtain that University's determination about the King's marriage and divorce above mention'd (m) [B]. On the 27th of September 1531, he was install'd Archdeacon of Leicester, upon the resignation of Dr Stephen Gardiner (n); and in November 1533, was made Archdeacon of Dorset (o). It was he that appriz'd the Clergy of their being fallen into a Præmunire, and advis'd them to make their Submission to the King (p); which they did, by acknowledging him Supreme Head of the Church of England, and making him a present of a hundred thousand pounds (q). In the year 1535, he was promoted to the Bishopric of Hereford, having obtain'd the Royal assent to his election, September 2. and receiving consecration Septemb. 25, and the Temporalities Octob. 4 following (r). He was the principal pillar of the Reformation, as to the management of the politick and prudential part of it; being of more activity, and no less ability than Cranmer himself (s). But he took care not to bring himself in danger of suffering persecution on that account (t) [C]. A few months after his consecration, namely on the 6th of December 1535, he was sent Embassador to the Protestant Princes in Germany, then assembled at Smalcald; whom he exhorted to unite, in point of Doctrine, with the Church of England (u) [D]. He spent the winter at Wirtemberg, and held several Conferences with some of the German Divines, endeavouring to conclude a Treaty with them upon many articles of Religion, but nothing was effected (w) [E]. He return'd to England in the year 1536; and, after having enjoy'd his Episcopal dignity but two years and seven months, dy'd at London May 8. 1538 (x). According to his desire,

' constant preparedness for war. Two things he would say, must support a Government; Gold and Iron: Gold, to reward its friends; and Iron, to keep under its enemies.' The Emperor offering him once a sum of money, he did not accept of it: And, as his attendants scrupled to take what he had refused, ' Take it, says he to them, for you are not all the King of England's ambassadors.' This saying was frequently in his mouth, ' Time and I will challenge any two in the world (1).'

[B] In 1530 he was employed with Stephen Gardiner at Cambridge, to obtain that University's determination about the King's marriage and divorce.] When they came to Cambridge, they spake to Dr William Buckmaster the Vice-chancellor, whom they found very ready to serve the King; as was also Bonner, and several others, but there was a contrary party that met together and resolv'd to oppose them. So that, at length, it was (not without a considerable opposition,) determined, ' That the King's Marriage was against the Law of God.' And ' it is thought strange, as Bishop Burnet observes, that the King who was otherwise so absolute in England, should meet with more difficulty in this matter at home, than he did abroad.' This the Bishop resolves, into the University's aversion in general to Luther's Doctrine, which was professed by the chief promoters of the Divorce (2).

[C] But he took care not to bring himself in danger of suffering persecution on that account.] This Bishop Godwin hints at, when he says, that he was Reformationis Ecclesiasticæ illius tempore coeptæ, clandestinæ fautor: a secret Favourer of the Reformation. That is, to the length of the establishment, in the reign of King Henry VIII, as Mr Collier expresses it (3).

[D] Whom he exhorted to unite, in point of Doctrine, with the Church of England.] After having observed, how nearly related the Kings of England and the Electors of Saxony were; he assures them of the King's great favour and affection to them, on account of their endeavours to propagate the true knowledge of God. And though they had been much reviled for casting off the Pope, yet King Henry retain'd a very good opinion of them, and look'd upon them as honest persons, who would not do any thing unseemly, nor without sufficient reason, and whose only aim was to promote the glory of God by the true preaching of the Gospel. That the King his master's design was the same, as was manifest by the alterations he had made in England, having abolished many errors, and renounced, with his Parliament's consent, the Pope and all his impostures. And since they concurred in the same laudable work, the King had conceived a singular regard for them, and desired them to go on so, that they might all profess the same doctrine, this being the most solid ground for a perpetual and lasting peace. That the King knew by experience, what confusions arose from diversity of opinions; and instanced in the Anabaptists amongst them. That the Pope pretended now to call a Council; but unless there was a perfect agreement between the King his master and them, they would find themselves under a great inconvenience, when they should repair to that Council. They ought therefore to think of such a peace, as should be grounded on the sure foundation of Scripture. The Pope would endeavour to the utmost to obstruct such an union, and therefore it could not be accomplished so long as his tyranny lasted. That the casting off his usurped authority in England, and restoring that kingdom to its original liberty, had put that idol and antichrist in such a rage; that what he could not do by force, (i. e. to reduce it again to slavery) he endeavoured to do, by stirring up underhand all the Princes in Europe against the King. But he was so well prepared, that he despised all his attempts: and he had informed them of it, not that he was afraid of the Pope, but that they might see, notwithstanding his pretended peaceable disposition in calling a Council, that he was far from thinking of peace. That a fair debate of the controverted points of religion, the King was sensible, would be very serviceable to the Church. But no Council ought to be suffered, which would only tend to establish the papal tyranny. Therefore he exhorted them not to approve of such a Council, till peace was restored to the Christian World. In conclusion, he desired a private conference upon those points with some persons appointed by them (4).

[E] Endeavouring to conclude a Treaty with them, &c.] The reader may see a particular account of this negotiation, in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation (5); by which it appears, that the Elector of Saxony thought King Henry had only a political design in all this negotiation; intending to bring the German Protestant Princes into a dependance on himself, without any sincere intentions with regard to religion. Bishop Fox pressed them also to approve of all that the King had done in the matter of his divorce, and of his second marriage; but they could never be prevailed upon (6).

When 'he was called to the pulpit or chair, he came off 'not ill, so prudential were his parts in Divinity; 'when advanced to any office of trust in the Univer- 'sity, he came off very well, so incomparable were 'his parts for government (9).'

FOX E, or FOX, (RICHARD) a famous statesman and bishop in part of the XVth and XVIth centuries, and Founder of Corpus-Christi-College in Oxford, was born at Ropesley near Grantham in Lincolnshire [A] about the latter end of the reign of King Henry VI; being the Son of Thomas Fox and Helene his wife, persons in mean circumstances (a). His education in Grammar-learning was at Boston, or according to some at Winchester. When fit for the University, he was sent to Magdalen-college in Oxford, where he soon surpassed all his equals in knowledge and reputation. But the plague obliged him to retire from thence, and to go and finish his studies at Penbroke-hall in Cambridge (b). He is said to have taken the Degree of Doctor in law at Oxford (c); but it could not be till some years after. When he had stayed a competent time at Cambridge, he went, for his farther improvement, to Paris, where he studied Divinity and the Canon-law. In this place, he became acquainted with Dr John Morton Bishop of Ely, whom the cruelty of that wicked usurper Richard III. had forced to quit his native country, and to fly thither (d). By him probably, who knew his great learning and abilities, he was introduced to Henry Earl of Richmond; that was then meditating a descent upon England, in order to dethrone the usurper: and, with the rest of the Englishmen residing at Paris, He vowed and sware to take his part (e). The Earl immediately received Dr Fox into secret familiarity (f): And having applied to Charles VIII king of France for assistance in his designed expedition, but being called away by multiplicity of business before he could obtain his desire, he left the further prosecution of this matter to the Doctor, whom he thought the fittest man to manage so important an affair. Nor was he deceived in him; for he acted with that industry and prudence, that he soon procured men and money from the Court of France (g). Henry having gained the Crown of England, by his glorious victory at Bosworth on the 22d of August 1485, took care to reward those who had faithfully serv'd him. Among the rest, he made his trusty friend Dr Fox one of his Privy-counsellors, that he might continue to have the benefit of his good counsel and advice [B]. About the same time, the Doctor was collated to the Prebend of Bishopston in the Church of Sarum; and, in February 1485-6, to the Prebend of South-Grantham in the same Church (b). The February following he was nominated Bishop of Exeter (i), and had restitution of the Temporalities April 2. 1487 (k). On the 24th of February 1486-7, he was appointed Keeper of the Privy-seal; for the better discharge of which office his Majesty granted him, the 5th of July following, a pension of twenty shillings a day (l). He was also made Principal Secretary of State, and Master of St Crosse near Winchester (m). And the King employed him continually either in matters of counsel at home, or in Embassies of great importance abroad (n). In September 1487, he was sent Ambassador, with Sir Richard Edgecombe Comptroller of the Household, to James III. king of Scotland [C], and concluded

[B] Among the rest, he made his trusty friend Dr Fox one of his Privy-Counsellors, &c. He was the person in whom his Majesty placed the most confidence, next to Dr John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury. They were both vigilant and secret, and such as kept watch with the King almost upon all men else. They had been both versed in his affairs before he came to the Crown, and partakers of his adverse fortune; therefore he was resolved to promote them in the Church as much as he could (3).

[C] In September 1487, he was sent Ambassador, with Sir Richard Edgecombe, to James III. King of Scotland, &c. Bishop Godwin (4), and after him Antony Wood (5), are mistaken, when they affirm, that it was after his return from this embassy that Dr Fox was made Bishop of Exeter: for he was so before.—And Edward Hall (6), as well as most of our Historians, are not accurate in saying, that in this embassy a seven years truce was concluded between England and Scotland; for, it was only a prolongation of the concluded a Treaty with him, on the 28th of November; wherein the Truce between England and Scotland was prolonged to the 1st of September 1489 (o). He also was employed in an embassy to the King of France, about the beginning of the year 1491, with Thomas Earl of Ormond, and the Prior of Christ's-Church in Canterbury; and returned to England in November following (p). February 8. 1491-2, he was translated from Exeter to the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, vacant by the death of Robert Stillington, and had restitution of the Temporalities May 4. 1492 (q). From this See he was removed to that of Durham, of which the Temporalities were restored to him Dec. 8. 1494 (r). He made great improvements at his palace in this city; walled round his park near the same; and repaired Hertlepole-castle (s). In the year 1494, he was at the head of an embassy to James IV. King of Scotland; but could not, with all his address, end some differences subsisting between the two nations about the fishery of the river Esk (t). In 1497, the castle of Norham belonging to his See, being besieged by the king of Scotland [D], was relieved by the English under the command of Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey (u). And the Bishop being shortly after sent Ambassador to Scotland, signed a seven years truce between that kingdom and England on the 30th of Sept. 1497 (w): About which time, overtures were made for a marriage between James IV. king of Scotland, and Margaret King Henry's eldest daughter; which the latter had designed ever since the year 1495 (x). The proposal being well received, Bishop Fox was sent into Scotland to negotiate that affair, but it was not fully concluded till January 24. 1501-2 (y). In the mean time, the University of Cambridge, out of a due sense of the Bishop's great authority and interest, chose him their Chancellor in 1500, which honourable office he bore till 1502 (z). Upon the death of Dr Thomas Langton Bishop of Winchester, he was removed to that See, whereof the Temporalities were restored to him October 17. 1500 (a). Here he spent the rest of his life in great affluence and prosperity. For such was his favour with the King, that no one could ever do so much with him; and no man there was upon whose counsel he so much relied (b) [E]. Being not only a grave counsellor for war and peace, but also a good surveyor of works, and a good master of ceremonies, and any thing that was fit for the active part belonging to the service of the Court or State of a great King; he had, upon that account, the ordering of the nuptial-ceremony of Prince Arthur with the Lady Catherine, which was performed on the 14th of November 1501, with great and true magnificence (c). One of our Bishop's Chaplains, was the famous Thomas Wolfey, whom he afterwards introduced to Court; that he might be a check to the overgrown interest of the Earl of Surrey (d). About the beginning of August 1507, the Bishop was chosen Master of Penbroke-hall in Cambridge, which place he kept till May 1519 (e). In 1507, and part of 1508, he was employed at Calais, with other Commissioners, to negotiate a treaty of marriage between Mary the King's third daughter and Charles Archduke of Austria, afterwards the most renowned Emperor Charles V (f). Thus was Bishop Fox generally employed in matters of the greatest importance; and thus did he continue to the last in the highest degree of favour with King Henry VII, who appointed him in his Will one of his Executors, and particularly recommended him to his Son and successor King Henry VIII (g). But the Bishop's Credit greatly declined at Court, and his excellent abilities and talent for business were slighted by the young luxurious Prince, (who minded nothing but pleasures and diversions,) chiefly through the artifices of Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey and Lord Treasurer. This nobleman having been the Bishop's rival in the late King's favour, continued to be so still in his son's, endeavouring to win the affection of his new master by a blind compliance to his will. In order therefore to undermine and supplant so dangerous an adversary, the Bishop introduced Thomas Wolfey to Court, as hath been already observed, who soon engrossed the King's favour (h). When the affair of King Henry's marriage with the Princess Katherine, widow of his brother Prince Arthur, was debated in council, Bishop Fox advised the consummation of that marriage, contrary to the opinion of Archbishop Warham (i).

Being

the truce, which was to expire July 3. 1488, till Sept. 1. 1489, as appears from Rymer's Fœdera.— Mr Rapin observes (7), after my Lord Verulam (8), that 'Henry loved to employ Ecclesiastics, because he had always Church-preferments ready for their reward. But he took care to promote them by degrees from smaller to more considerable Sees. Therein he found his own profit; for by translating Bishops from one See to another, he made the more vacancies, and consequently the first-fruits which accrued to the King, were greatly multiplied.' [D] In 1497, the castle of Norham belonging to his See, being besieged by the King of Scotland.] The Bishop, aware of this Scottish invasion, had caused that castle to be strongly fortified, and furnished with all kind of munition: and had mann'd it, likewise, with a very great number of tall soldiers, more than for the proportion of the castle; reckoning rather upon a sharp assault, than a long siege. And for the country likewise, he had caused the people to withdraw their cattle and goods into fast places, that were not of easy approach; and sent post to the Earl of Surrey (who was not far off in Yorkshire) to come in diligence to his succour. Whereupon King James retired into Scotland; and the Earl pursuing him, took the castle of Aton, then reckoned one of the strongest places between Berwick and Edinburgh (9).

[E] And no man there was upon whose counsel he so much relied.] But, what Bishop Godwin adds in the same place, seems to be a mistake. His words are these. 'Amongst other honors done unto him, it was not the least, that he [King Henry VII.] made him Godfather unto his second sonne, that was afterward King Henry the VIII (10).' For Fr. Sandford, Esq; (whose authority is the best upon this point, seeing he had his information from the College of Herald,.) relates (11), that the Prince's two godfathers, were John de Vere, Earl of Oxford, and Peter Courtney, Bishop of Winchester: but indeed he was baptized by Dr Richard Fox, then Bishop of Exeter, which might occasion the mistake.

Being appointed by Margaret Countess of Richmond one of the Executors of her Will, and also one of the Supervisors of the same [F], he fully perform'd his part, in founding and compleating the settlement of St John's-college in Cambridge (k). In March 1509-10, he was sent embassador to France, jointly with the Earl of Surrey, and the Bishop of Durham, and on the 23d of the same month concluded a new Treaty of alliance with King Lewis XII (l). About the same time, a sharp dispute arose between him and William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, concerning the extent of the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court, and its claiming the probate of Wills when the Testators had bona notabilia in divers Dioces. The dispute at length grew so high, that an Appeal was made to the Pope. But it being referred back to the King, he determined it amicably in 1513 (m) [G]. This summer, he attended the King in his Expedition into France, with a large retinue, and was at the taking of Terouenne (n). Also the 15th of October following, jointly with Thomas Grey Marquis of Dorset, he concluded a new Treaty with the Emperor Maximilian against France (o). In 1515, being no longer able to bear the repeated mortifications he received from Cardinal Wolfey, a creature of his own making, he withdrew in discontent to his own Diocese (p) [H]: But it is not known when he resigned the Privy-seal. The rest of his days he spent wholly in works of Charity and Munificence. Particularly, about this time, he was employed in the noble and generous Foundation of Corpus-Christi-College in Oxford [I]. which hath produced several learned and eminent men in every profession. In 1522 he founded a free school at Taunton in Somersetshire, where he had a fine manor as Bishop of Winchester, and built a convenient house for the master. The like he also did at Grantham near his native place [K]. At Winchester, he covered the Choir of the Cathedral, the presbytery and isles adjoining, with a good vault; and new glazed all the windows of that part of the Church. He likewise built a handsome wall round the presbytery, on the top of which he placed, in leaden coffins, the bones of such Princes and Prelates, as had been buried in divers parts of the Church (q): but they were mostly destroyed during our unhappy civil wars. He had the misfortune of being blind for about ten years before his decease: However he attended the Parliament in 1523 (r). Cardinal Wolfey meanly taking advantage of his infirmities, would fain have persuaded him to resign his Bishoprick to him, and to be content with a pension; but the [F] Being appointed by Margaret Countess of Richmond one of the executors of her will, and also one of the supervisors of the same.] This lady made her will June 6. 1508 (12), and died June 29. 1509. The executors of her will, were, Richard [Fox] Bishop of Winchester, John [Fisher] Bishop of Rochester, Charles Somerset Lord Herbert, Thomas Lovel, Henry Marney, John St John, Knights; and Henry Hornby, and Hugh Ashton, clerks. And Bishop Fox, and Dr Hornby, were also supervisors of the same, with liberty to alter, add, and diminish such articles, 'as in their 'sadness and good discretions they thought most convenient and according to her will.' The Charter of this noble foundation was given April 9. 1511 (13).

[G] But it being referred back to the King, he determined it amicably in 1513.] Bishop Fox was seconded in this dispute by the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Exeter. And what they insisted upon, was, that no sum under ten pounds should be accounted bona notabilia: that desperate debts should not be taken in, to make up that sum: and, that the oaths of executors and administrators should be sufficient, without the Archbishop's appointing other persons to value the goods of the deceased. All which the King determined against the Archbishop, in favour of the appellant Bishops: tho' Warham pretended, that bona notabilia to the amount of forty shillings were sufficient to found his prerogative. The King also decreed against him, that none but chattels or moveables were within his jurisdiction; and that he had no authority to intermeddle with real estates (14).

[H] He withdrew in discontent to his own Diocese.] As did also Archbishop Warham to his, about the same time. Before their departure, they besought the King, that he would not suffer any servant to be greater than his master; alluding to John xiii. 16. Henry knowing that they meant this of the Cardinal, made answer, that he would diligently see, that every servant should obey, and not command (15).

[I] Particularly about this time, he was employed in the noble and generous Foundation of Corpus Christi-College in Oxford.] His design at first, was, to erect in Oxford a College or Seminary for eight Monks, members of St Swithin's Priory in Winchester, and professed of the same, with a few secular scholars: for which he obtained a licence in Mortmain, dated March 12. 1512-13. But he altered his design, chiefly, as 'tis said, through the persuasions of Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter; who thus represented to him, 'What, my Lord, shall we build houses, and provide 'livelihoods for a company of bustling Monks, whose 'end and fall we ourselves may live to see? No, no, 'it is more meet a great deal, that we should have 'care to provide for the increase of learning, and for 'such as by their learning shall do good in the Church 'and Commonwealth.' To this Bishop Fox readily yielded, accepting of Bishop Oldham's kind assistance, who contributed no less than 6000 marks towards the building of this college (16). Having therefore purchased three tenements, called Corner-hall, Nevills-inne, and Nunhall, with some parcels of land adjoining; and having obtained a new licence in Mortmain, dated November 26. 1516; he went on with his new foundation, the charter of which bore date the first of March following. He dedicated it to the honour of God Almighty, of the most sacred Body of Christ, [Corporis Christi] of the blessed Virgin Mary, of St Peter, and St Paul; and of St Andrew, St Birinus, St Cuthbert, and St Swithin, the tutelar patrons of the Cathedral Churches of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester: directing, that it should be named Corpus-Christi-College. In the Statutes, dated 1517, he ordained, that it should consist of a President, twenty Fellows, twenty Scholars, two Chaplains, two Clerks, and two Choristers. And he endowed it with possessions, lands, &c. to the yearly value of 401 l. 8 s. 11 d. Bishop Hugh Oldham above-mentioned enlarged its revenues, besides what he contributed towards the building. And its most considerable benefactors since have been, William Fross of Yavington in Hampshire, who gave the manor of Maplederwell; John Claymond, and Robert Morwent, the two first Presidents; Richard Pate, Esq; Sir George, St Paul, Bart. Dr Reynolds, Dr Thomas Turner, &c (17).

[K] The like he also did at Grantham near his native place.] He designed at first to have built this in a little grove, at Ropefley, near the house wherein he was born: but considering, that it would be much more useful in a town than in so obscure a village, he built it for that reason at Grantham (18).

the good old Bishop stoutly rejected his insinuations (s) [L]. He died Septemb. 14. 1528 (t), in a very advanced age; and was buried on the South side of the high Altar in Winchester-cathedral, in a Chapel of his own building (u). In his will he left several legacies to the Church and See of Winchester, and many others; which Wolsey, who seized upon his effects by his Legatine authority, refused to pay (w). Bishop Fox appears by his picture [M] to have been a man of a strong and robust constitution. His great wisdom and abilities were approved and esteemed by one of the wisest Princes of his age. And of his Charity he hath left lasting monuments. Besides which, he maintained several poor scholars at the University, before he founded his College; and is said to have been a generous Patron of learned men (x). FOX (JOHN), the famous Martyrologist, was born at Boston in the county of Lincoln, in the year 1517 (a). His father dying when he was very young, and his mother marrying again, he came under the tutelage of a father-in-law, with whom he dwelt till the age of sixteen, when he went to the University of Oxford, where he was entered of Brasen-Nose College, under the care of Mr John Hawarden, Fellow of that College, and was Chamber-fellow with the famous Dr Nowell, afterwards Dean of St Paul's. May the seventeenth 1538, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). His great parts and learning soon distinguished him, insomuch that he was chosen Fellow of Magdalen College, and proceeded Master of Arts in 1543, which was the highest degree he attained in the University (d). He discovered, in his younger years, a genius for poetry, and wrote several Latin comedies [A], but the subjects were chosen from the Scriptures; and in these, his first essays, he gave an earnest of his strong and natural bent to the study of Divinity, to which he soon betook himself with rather more fervency than circumspection, discovering himself in favour of the Reformation then in hand, before he was known to those who maintained and supported the cause, or had power to protect the maintainers of it; and hence began his troubles. In order to make himself a sufficient judge of the controversies which then divided the Church, his first care was to search diligently into the antient and modern history of the Church; to learn it's beginning, by what arts it flourished, and by what errors it began to decline; to consider the causes of those controversies and dissensions which had arisen in the Church, and to weigh attentively of what moment and consequence they were to Religion. To this end he applied himself with such zeal and industry, that before he attained to thirty years of age, he had read over all that either the Greek or Latin Fathers had left in their writings, the Schoolmen in their disputations, the Councils in their acts, or the Consistories in their decrees; and also acquir'd a competent skill in the Hebrew language (e). But from this strict and severe application, by night as well as by day, from

We have a comedy of his, intitled, de Christo Triumpante, printed at London 1551; and at Basil in 1556, in 8vo. Mr Wood asserts (1), that it was written at Basil in the house of Operinus the Printer, but this must be a mistake, because Mr Fox did not go to Basil till the reign of Queen Mary, who did not come to the Crown till 1553. This play was translated into English by Richard

Day, son of John Day the famous Printer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and published with this title, Christi Jesus triumphans, ubi describitur gloriose triumphus et conquestus Christi over sin, death, and the law, &c. London. 1579; and in 1607, in 8vo. It was again published in 1672, at London in 8vo. and dedicated to all schoolmasters, in order that it might be admitted into their respective schools, for the peculiar elegance of its style, by T. his forsaking his friends, for the most solitary retirement; the great and visible distractions of his mind; and, above all, his absenting himself from the public worship of the Church, of which before he had been a most constant frequenter, arose the first suspicions of his alienated affections from the Church, and in which his enemies were soon confirmed, upon a more narrow inspection into his conduct, which was too open not to expose him to the snares which were laid for his ruin; and having been accused of heresy, he was, by the judgment of the College, condemned as an heretick, and expelled the House; and was thought to have been favourably dealt with, that he escaped with his life [B]. This misfortune, however, was the heavier upon Mr Fox, as it lost him the favour and good offices of his friends, who were afraid to countenance or protect one condemned for a capital offence; and his father-in-law took a handle from hence, to withhold Mr Fox's own father's estate from him, thinking that he who stood in danger of the Law himself, would with difficulty find relief from it. Being thus forsaken by his friends, he was reduced to great distress, when he was taken into the house of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire, to be tutor to his children. Here he married a citizen's daughter of Coventry, and continued in Sir Thomas's family till his pupils were grown up, after which, with some difficulty, he procured entertainment from his father-in-law, and his wife's father at Coventry; from whence he removed to London a few years before King Henry's death, where, having no employment nor preferment, he was again driven to great necessities and distress, from which he was seasonably relieved, in a remarkable manner, as we shall relate in the note [C], and was soon after taken into the Duchefs of Richmond's family, to be tutor to her nephew the Earl of Surrey's children, who, upon the commitment of the Earl and his father the Duke of Norfolk to the Tower, were committed to the care of the Duchefs of Richmond to be educated. In this family Mr Fox lived, at Ryegate in Surrey, during the latter part of King Henry's reign, the five years reign of King Edward the Sixth, and part of Queen Mary's reign, being at this time protected by one of his pupils then Duke of Norfolk, and is said to have been the first person who preached the Gospel at Ryegate (f). Anthony Wood also says, he was restored to his fellowship in Magdalen College, under Edward the Sixth (g). But Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, who hated him, and fearing least the heir of one of the noblest families in the kingdom, should, as might naturally be expected, tread in the steps of his tutor, by him greatly respected and honoured, sought by many snares and stratagems to work his ruin; infomuch, that Mr Fox, very much against the Duke's inclination (b), was obliged to quit his native country, and seek shelter abroad. Accordingly, the Duke having caused every thing necessary to be prepared for his tutor's voyage, he set sail from Ipswich-haven, taking his wife along with him, who was then big with child, and some other persons who went abroad on the same account. But a storm arising, they were obliged the next day to put back to port, where, having with much difficulty arrived, Mr Fox found that Bishop Gardiner had issued out a warrant for apprehending him, and caused the most diligent search to be made after him; upon which, having prevailed upon the Master of the ship to put to sea again, to the great peril of their lives, they arrived safe in two days at Newport-haven, from whence Mr Fox and his company travelled to Antwerp and Franckfort, and thence to Basil in Germany, where great numbers of English subjects resorted in those times of persecution [D]. This city was

[B] Condemned as an Heretick, and expelled the House.] Anthony Wood says (2), he resigned his fellowship in 1545, merely, as it was thought, to prevent expulsion; and the same writer in his History and Antiquities of Oxford (3), says that he was in a manner obliged to resign his fellowship. But Mr Fox's own son informs us (4), that our author being suspected of heresy, and upon examination, not concealing his sentiments, was condemned as an heretick, and actually expelled the College; and his enemies affirmed that he was favourably dealt with by that sentence, and that he might have been questioned for his life, if they had not designed to have used clemency towards him.

[C] Was relieved in a remarkable manner.] As he was sitting one day in St Paul's Church, almost spent with long fasting, his countenance wan and pale, and his eyes hollow, there came to him one whom he never remembered to have seen before, who sitting down by him, accosted him very familiarly, and put into his hands an untold sum of money, bidding him be of good cheer, and to be careful of himself, and use all means to prolong his life; and that within a few days, new hopes were at hand, and more certain means of subsistence. Mr Fox used all his endeavours to find out the person, by whose bounty he was so seasonably relieved from extreme necessity, but in vain; however the prediction was fulfilled, for within three days afterwards Mr Fox was taken into the service of the Duchefs of Richmond (5).

[D] He travelled to Basil in Germany, &c.] We have followed his son, the Historian of his life, in this account, who must certainly be supposed to have been best informed in all particulars of his father's life. Anthony Wood however differs in his account of Mr Fox's travels; he says, that he went over to Basil in King Henry the Eighth's time, when he was about thirty years old, and became a laborious writer, at the house of one Operinus a Printer there. After King Henry's death, he returned to Magdalen-College, and after a short stay there went again to his charge at Rygate, and remained there till after Queen Mary came to the Crown, when he again left England, and as Dr Heylyn says, was at Franckfort, and appeared in the schism among the English there; for we find his name among those of the English Protestants who took refuge in that city, in the tract entitled, The troubles of Franckfort, printed in 1575; was against the Church of England as settled in the reign of Edward the Sixth, and took part with Knox and Whittingham (6). Afterwards he retired to his old landlord at Basil, where he continued a severe drudge at writing, till Queen Elizabeth was settled in the throne, when he again returned to England. The former part of this account however contradicts itself, for if Mr Fox was born in 1517, and first went abroad at thirty years of age, that must have been in 1547, which was in King Edward's reign; whereas Mr Wood says, he went abroad in King Henry's time. It seems much more probable, as we have before shewn, that he did not leave England till Queen Mary's reign, according to his son's account.

[E] Tho'

was at that time one of the most famous in Europe for Printing, and most of those who retired thither got their subsistence by revising and correcting the press; and to this employment Mr Fox betook himself, and it was here he laid the first plan of his Acts and Monuments of the Church. Upon the death of Queen Mary, which (according to the testimony of Dr Elmare, afterwards Bishop of London) Mr Fox in a sermon foretold the day before it happened; and, as soon as he found the Protestant religion likely to be established, he ventured to return to his native country, where he still found a faithful and serviceable friend in his quondam pupil, the Duke of Norfolk, and was entertained by him at his Manor-place called Cbrist-Church, in London, as long as his Grace lived, and at his death he settled a pension upon him, which his son the Earl of Suffolk confirmed to him (i). Mr Secretary Cecil also obtained for him of the Queen, the rectory or prebendship of Shipton, in the church of Salisbury, tho' Mr Fox himself would have declined accepting it; and tho' he had many great and powerful friends, as Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Thomas Gresham, Sir Drue Drury, the Bishops Grindal, Pilkington, Elmare, &c. who would have raised him to very considerable preferments; yet he declined them, being, as Anthony Wood says, always averse to subscribe to the Canons, tho' tendered to him by Archbishop Parker, and to some part of the ceremonies of the Church [E]. But tho' he was a Nonconformist, he was a moderate one, and disapproved of the heats of the rigid Puritans [F]. In 1564, he sent a Latin panegyric to the Queen, upon her indulgence to some noncomplying Divines, and suffering them to hold dignities in the Church [G]. In July 1575, he wrote a Latin Letter to the Queen, to dissuade her Majesty from putting to death two Anabaptists who had been condemned to be burnt [H].

(i) Vita Foxii.

[E] Tho' tender'd to him by Archbishop Parker. Dr Fuller tells us (7), that the Archbishop summoned him to subscribe, 'that the general reputation of his piety might give the greater countenance to Conformity.' That the old man produced the New Testament in Greek, to this, says he, will I subscribe. And when a subscription to the Canons was required of him, he refused it, saying, I have nothing in the Church save a Prebend at Salisbury, and much good may it do you, if you will take it away from me. However he continued in his place till his death, such respect, as Dr Fuller observes, did the Bishops, most of them formerly his fellow-exiles, bear to his age, parts, and labours.

[F] And disapproved of the heats of the rigid Puritans. Dr Fuller observes (8), that tho' Mr Fox came not up in all particulars to cleave the pin of Conformity (as refusing to subscribe) yet he utterly distasted the factious people of that age. The Historian then gives us a Latin letter written by our author to a Bishop, upon occasion of his son Samuel's being expelled by the Puritan party from his fellowship of Magdalen-College in Oxford, after his return from his travels abroad, upon the groundless imputation of his having turned Papist. In this letter he says, 'I confess it has always been my great care, if I could not be serviceable to many persons, yet not knowingly to injure any one, at least of all those of Magdalen-College. I cannot therefore but the more wonder at the turbulent genius which inspires those factious Puritans, so that violating the laws of gratitude, despising my letters and prayers, disregarding the intercession of the President himself, without any previous admonition, or assigning any cause, they have exercised so great tyranny against me and my son; were I one, who, like them, would be violently outrageous against Bishops and Archbishops, or join myself with them, that is, would become mad, as they are, I had not met with this severe treatment; now because, quite different from them, I have chosen the side of modesty and publick tranquillity, hence the hatred they have a long time conceived against me, is at last grown to this degree of bitterness. As this is the case, I do not so much ask you what you will do on my account, as what is to be thought of for your sakes; you who are Prelates of the Church, again and again consider. As to myself, tho' the taking away the fellowship from my son, is a great affliction to me; yet because this is only a private concern, I bear it with more moderation; I am much more concerned upon the account of the Church, which is publick. I perceive a certain race of men rising up, who if they should increase and gather strength in this kingdom, I am sorry to say what disturbance I foresee must follow from it. Your prudence is not ignorant how much

' the Christian Religion suffered formerly by the dissimulation and hypocrisy of the Monks. At present in these men I know not what new sort of Monks seems to revive; so much more pernicious than the former, as with more subtle artifices of deceiving, under pretence of perfection, like Stage-players who only act a part, they conceal a more dangerous poison: who while they require every thing to be formed according to their own strict discipline, and conscience, will not desist till they have brought all things into Jewish bondage.' Upon this letter, Dr Fuller (9) bids us remark the violence of rigid Nonconformists. 'We may perceive, says he, by this letter how powerful the party of Nonconformists was grown at that time, and to what violences and extravagancies, some went in their practices, infomuch that Dr Humphreys, then President of Magdalen, and Mr Fox himself (both which scrupled subscription in some particulars) were deserted by them as lukewarm, and remiss in the cause.' Mr Fox's son however was at last restored to his fellowship by the Queen's mandate.

[G] In 1564, he sent a Latin panegyric to the Queen, upon her indulgence of some Divines, &c. In the beginning of this address, he mentions her Majesty's retrieving the kingdom from the last degree of misery and declension; that she had reformed religion and the statute book, corrected idleness, suppressed robberies, and made the country orthodox and quiet. That she had recovered the mint to its old standard; and that the manners of her subjects were no less refined and brightned than the coin. That these state regulations, tho' very valuable in their kind, came short of the blessings in religion. That now truth was no longer persecuted, conscience had its just liberty, and superstition gave way to the gospel. 'And of this, says he, we have a remarkable instance in your Majesty's answer to the petition of some divines concerning the ecclesiastical habit. What satisfaction this gracious indulgence gave the universal Church, what an advantage after-ages would receive by it; and what an immortal honour would descend upon her memory, is scarcely to be imagined.' From hence he proceeds to commend her for her encouragement of learning, and the expectations of favour which she had given to the University of Cambridge. In the close he acquaints her Majesty that he designed to write her history, and had prepared some materials for that purpose; but that these would be imperfect without further information from her Majesty; and after all, he thought her own genius nobly furnished to describe her reign, and that no body could do her justice better than herself (10).

[H] He wrote a Latin letter to the Queen to dissuade her Majesty from putting to death two Anabaptists, who had been condemned to be burnt. Fuller,

He was remarkable for his piety and great zeal for Religion, his charity, humility, and intense application to the duties of his function. He died on the eighteenth of April 1587; in the seventieth year of his age, greatly lamented, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St Giles's Cripplegate, where a monument was erected to his memory on the fourth wall, and an inscription on it. It is said Mr Fox had the vicarage of St Giles's; but, as Mr Wood says (if he had it at all), he kept it but a little while in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign. who transcribed this letter from the original, has published it in his Church History (11); Mr Collier observes (12), that it is written in a very handsome Christian strain. In this letter, Mr Fox declares, that with regard to those fanatical sects, he does not think they ought to be countenanced in a state, but chastised in a proper manner. But that to punish with the flames, the bodies of those who err rather from blindness than obstinacy of will, is cruel, and more suitable to the example of the Romish Church; than the mildness of the gospel. He declares he does not write thus out of an indulgence to error, but as he is a man, out of regard to the lives of men, that they may have an opportunity of repenting of their errors; and entreats her Majesty therefore to spare the lives of these wretches, or at least to change the shocking manner of their punishment; to banish them, or commit them to perpetual imprisonment; or stigmatize, or even hang them; at least not to revive the Smithfield fires, which thro' her Majesty's care had been so long extinguished. If this could not be granted, at least to allow them a month or two, in order that endeavours might be used to reclaim them from their errors, and thereby to prevent the destruction of their souls as well as bodies. But Fuller tells us, that tho' the Queen constantly called Mr Fox her father, yet she gave him a flat denial as to the saving of their lives, if after a month's reprieve, and conference with Divines, they would not recant their errors; and they continuing still inflexible, were accordingly burnt in Smithfield.

[I] In the note is an account of our author's writings.] Besides those already mentioned, he wrote, Syllogisticon admonitio ad Parliamentum. De lapsis per errorem in Ecclesiam restituendis. A Latin translation of the controversy between Archbishop Crammer, and Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, about the Eucharist. This our author did at Basil, and there was only a part of it printed. De censura, seu excommunicatione Ecclesiastica, interpellatio ad Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem. London 1551. in 8vo. A Sermon preached at St Paul's Cross, on Good-Friday, upon the subject of Christ's Crucifixion, printed by John Day, at London, 1570, in 4to. It was dedicated, 'to all such as labour and be heavy laden in conscience, to be read for their spiritual comfort.' The text is, 2 Cor. v. 20, 21. and the Sermon is divided into two parts, to which are subjoined, a prayer made for the Church, and all the States there; and a postscript to the Papiſts. Mr Wood mentions (13) an edition of this Sermon at London, 1609. in 8vo. and a Latin translation of it intitled, De Christo crucifixo: concio in Die Parasceve. in 2 Cor. cap. v. vers. 20, 21. London 1571, in 4to. Mr Strype, who does not appear to have ever seen the edition of this Sermon in 1570, is mistaken in saying (14) that it was preached in 1578, and printed in 1585, unless reprinted in that year. His argument that it was preached about 1578, is drawn from a passage in the prayer, wherein Mr Fox says, that the Queen had doubled the years of her sister and brother; but these very words are also to be found in the prayer published in the edition of the Sermon in 1570. Tables of Grammar; London

Or otherwise thus; necessary instructions of faith and hope for Christians to hold fast, and not to doubt, &c. London 1579, second edition in 8vo. written by Urbanus Regius. He also finished An answer apologetical to Hierome Oforius his slanderous invective; which had been begun in Latin by Walter Haddon, LL D. London 1577, and 1581, in 4to. and he published the four Evangelists in the old Saxon Tongue, with the English thereunto adjoined. London 1571, in 4to. Bale mentions several other writings of his, but Mr Wood says some of them were never printed; we shall therefore proceed to give some account of the principal and greatest of our author's works, his Acts and Monuments of the Church, commonly called, Fox's Book of Martyrs. We have before observed that the author first applied himself to write this History of the Church, whilst he was at Basil, but he reserved the greatest part of it against his return into his own country, that he might have the authority and testimony of more witnesses. It appears by the author's own notes, that this most laborious work was eleven years in hand; and in this, as well as in some others of his labours, Mr Fox was greatly assisted by that pious prelate Dr Grindal, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, who besides his constant counsel and advice in the course of the work, supplied him with materials, which he digested and methodized himself; for whilst Dr Grindal was abroad, he had established a correspondence in England for this purpose, by which means accounts of most of the acts and sufferings of the persecuted in Queen Mary's reign, came to his hands (16); and it was owing to Dr Grindal's strict and tender regard to truth, that the Martyrology was so long in hand, for he rejected all common reports and relations that were brought over, till more satisfactory evidence could be procured; and hence he advised Mr Fox at first only to print separately the acts of some particular men, of whom any sure and authentic memoirs came to hand, till materials for a more compleat history of the Martyrs and their persecutions and sufferings could be procured. In pursuance of this advice Mr Fox published at Basil, diverse histories of the English Bishops and Divines, in single pieces, soon after their respective sufferings and martyrdoms. He had also published at Strasburgh, in 1554, in octavo, Commentarii rerum in Ecclesia gestarum,

It was also by the advice of Dr Grindal, that the Martyrology was printed both in Latin and English, for the more general use, the author having began it in Latin. It was published at London 1563, in one thick volume in folio, with this title, Actes and Monuments of these latter perillous days touching matters of the Church, wherein are comprehended and described the great persecutions and horrible troubles that have been wrought and practised by the Romish Prelates, specially in this Realme of England and Scotland, from the yeare of our Lorde a thousand unto the time now present, &c. gathered and collected accord-dyng to the true copies and vertynges certifiatorie, as well of the parties themselves that suffered, as also out of the Bishops registers, which were the doers thereof. By John Fox. Imprinted at London by John Day, dwelling over Aldersgate beneath St Martin's, Anno 1563, the 20th of March. Cum gratia & privilegia regie Majestatis. Mr Fox presented a copy of this edition to Magdalen-College, Oxford, and at the same time wrote a Latin letter to Dr Lawrence Humphreys, printed by Mr Thomas Hearne in his appendix, No. 5. to his Preface to Adami de Domersham Hist. de Rebus Gestis Glastonensibus, Oxon. 1727, in 8vo. 2 Vols. There was a fourth edition at London 1583, in two volumes in folio, and it was reprinted in 1632, in three volumes folio. The ninth edition was printed at London in three volumes in folio, with copper cuts, the former Editions having only wooden ones. Mr Wood observes (17), that the undertakers of this edition had in a manner obtained a promise from King Charles II to revive the order made in Queen Elizabeth's time, of placing it in the common halls of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, Heads of Colleges, &c. according to the Canons of Dr Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1571. Mr Strype tells us (18), that when this book was first published, our author was thought, 'to have done very ' exquisite service to the Protestant cause, in shewing,
' from abundance of antient books, registers, records,
' and choice manuscripts, the encroachments of Popes,
' Papalins, and the stout oppositions that were made
' by learned and good men, in all ages and countries
' against them; and especially under King Henry the
' VIIIth, and Queen Mary here in England; preserv' ing to us the memories of those holy men and wo' men, those Bishops and Divines, together with their ' histories, acts, sufferings, and their constant deaths,
' willingly undergone for the sake of Christ and his ' gospel, and for refusing to comply with Popish doc' trines and superstitions.' Archbishop Whiggist (19) styles Mr Fox that worthy man, and tells Mr Cartwright the Puritan, that he had read over his Acts and Monuments from the one end to the other; and declares that Mr Fox hath very diligently and faithfully laboured in this matter, (of Archbishops and Me-tropolitans) and searched out the truth of it as learnedly as I knowe any man to have done. Camden likewise gives him and his work this character (20); Ex eruditiorum numero obiit Johannes Foxus Oxoniensis, qui Ecclesiasticam Angliæ Historiam sive Martyrologiam indefesso veritatis studio, primum latine, postea anglice auctius, magna cum laude contexit. The Papists were very angry at the publication of this history; in which their lyes and cruelty were so fully exposed; and accordingly did all they could to blast the credit both of that and its author. They called it Fox's golden Legend, and represented it an huge sardel of notorious lyes and falsehoods (21). In 1673, above forty years after the publication of Mr Fox's book, father Robert Parsons published, under the name of N. D. that is, of Nicholas Doleman, A Treatise of the three conversions from Paganism to the Christian Religion, in three volumes in 8vo. the principal design of which is to expose Mr Fox's Church History. In this performance he charges Mr Fox with falsities and impostures, marifest foolery and lying, with having a wicked spirit, being guilty of tergiversation, using impertinent arguments, shewing a contempt of antiquity, &c. of wilful corruptions and falsifications of authors, particularly of Venerable Bede. He tells us Mr Fox endeavoured to corrupt the acts of old Martyrs, nay, that he discredited his own Martyrs, and pretends to have found no less than 120 lyes in less than three leaves of his book (*). Mr Collier, who takes all opportunities of depreting Mr Fox's character, and undervaluing his work, accuses him of disingenuity and ill nature, and says he ought to be read with caution.

'That a vein of satire and coarse language runs thro'
his Martyrology (22), and instances in his calling (23) the Bishop of Winchester an insensible ass, and saying he had no feeling of God's Spirit, in the matter of Justification. Mr Fox does certainly sometimes fail in decency and temper; but this was no more than was common to the zealous promoters of the Reformation, who it must be confessed were sometimes hurried on by their zeal to lengths by no means defensible. Mr Wood says Mr Fox was a severe Calvin-ist, and shewed himself a very bitter enemy in his writings, against the Roman Catholicks, exceeding as some conceive the rules of charity. He observes (24), that as our author ' hath taken a great deal of pains
' in his work, and shewed sometimes much judgment
' in it; so hath he committed many errors therein, by ' trusting to the relations of poor simple people, and ' in making such Martyrs as were living after the first ' edition of his book came forth, tho' afterwards by ' him excused and omitted.' He charges Mr Fox likewise (25) with committing a most egregious falsity in reporting, that one Grimwood of Higham in Suffolk, died in a miserable manner for swearing and bearing false witness against one John Cooper a Carpenter of Watfam in the same county, for which he lost his life. The account which Fox gives of his death, is this. 'When he was in labour stacking up
' a gosse of corn, having his health, and fearing no
' peril, suddenly his bowels fell out of his body, and ' immediately most miserably he died.' Now Wood relates, that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth one Prit became Parson of the parish where the said Grim-wood dwelt, and preaching against perjury, not being acquainted with his Parishioners, cited the said story of Fox; and it happening that Grimwood being then alive and in the church, he brought an action upon the case against the Parson. But Judge Anderson, who sat at the Assizes in the county of Suffolk, adjudged it not maintainable, because it was not spoken maliciously. Mr Wood refers to the abridgement of many cases and resolutions of the Common Law, written by Judge Henry Rolles, p. 87. Sect. 7. tit. action for case. But Mr Strype has shewn (26), that Mr Fox has not had justice done him in this passage, since there was one Grimwood who died in the manner above mentioned, though Mr Fox was misled in inserting this story in his Martyrology, because the said John Cooper was not tried for his religion, but for speaking rebellious words against the Queen. But there are many other facts, in the relation of which, Mr Fox is not to be depended upon; particularly in his account of the death of the persecuting Bishop Gardiner. He tells us (27), as he says from credible intelligence, that the Bishop refused to go to dinner on the day Ridley and Latimer were burnt, till his servants who were posted on the road for that purpose had brought him word that the faggots were kindled about them;
that this barbarous resolution occasioned the dinner to be kept back till four o' clock, and that the old Duke of Norfolk, who that day dined with the Bishop, was uneasy at staying so long. That when Gardiner heard the two Bishops were burning, he was transported with the news, and went immediately to dinner, but was seized at table, carried to his bed where he lay a fortnight, and died. To disprove this tragical story, it may be sufficient to observe that Gardiner appeared twice in the House of Lords, after he is reported to have been seized with this mortal distemper; and the old Duke of Norfolk had been dead above a year, when Fox makes him at dinner at the Bishop of Winchester's

afterwards Fellow, and Master of Arts. In 1586 he had a lease of the manor annexed to the prebend of Shipton, settled on him by his father [K]. He was steward to Sir Thomas Heneage, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen; and in 1589 married Mrs Anne Leveson, in the house of Sir Moyle Finch, of Eastwell in Kent (l). In 1610, he wrote the Life of his father, prefix'd to the Acts and Monuments of the Church (m). Thomas Fox, the younger son of our author, was educated at King's College Cambridge, and became afterwards an eminent Physician at London, and Fellow of the College of Physicians (n). chester's, for he died at Framingham castle, September 1554, and was succeeded by his grandson, who could not then be an old Duke, as the story says. As to Gardiner he died of the gout, as Godwin relates, and not of a suppression of urine as Fox would have it (28). Mr Fox, as Mr Collier also observes, is particularly severe upon the memory of the famous Cardinal Wolsey, and in many places of his Martyrology lashes him and loads him with censure, sometimes wrongfully, and disingenuously. He gives a remarkable instance (29) of an exaggeration of Mr Fox, in the account he gives of the charge exhibited against the Cardinal by the Privy-Council, in the fourth article of which, Wolsey is accused of presumption in speaking and writing in this manner, The King and I would you should do thus; and, the King and I do give you our thanks, &c (30). This to be sure was an high presumption in the Cardinal, but Mr Fox has swelled it much higher, by making him set himself before the King, and speak in the language of Ego & rex meus, as Fox reports he did (31). The same author (32) also gives us, among others, a very remarkable instance of Mr Fox's intemperate zeal, which hurried him almost to a degree of prophaneness. When it was thought that Queen Mary was with child, there were prayers printed and dispersed about the kingdom, for her Majesty's happy delivery, &c. which Fox has taken the freedom to ridicule (33), and to rally the people's devotion upon this occasion, with this extraordinary and odd sentence in his margin; cry up louder you Priests, peradventure your God is asleep; as if (as Mr Collier justly observes,) their devotions had been directed to Baal or Ashteroth; as if the Papists had worshipped one God, and the Protestants another. I can't perceive (says Mr Collier) that the Martyrologist had any right to Elijah's sarcasm; his zeal was without doubt too much embittered; he was plainly ridden by his passion, and pushed, by disaffection, to-

Mr Strype (34) remarks that the esteem of our author grew low among some even of the Clergy; and it is intimated by Dr Walker (35), that 'the Dissenters pay a known and particular regard to Mr Fox's Acts and Monuments;' which passage is animadverted upon by the Reverend Mr John Lewis (36), who observes, that 'as to private stories, Mr Fox and his friends used the utmost diligence and care, that no falsehood might be obtruded on the reader, and were very ready to correct any mistakes that might happen.'

[K] In 1586, he had a lease of the manor annexed to the Prebend of Shipton settled on him by his father.] Mr Strype tells us (37), that this was done upon Mr Samuel Fox's return home from his travels, which was about the end of June, as appears from a journal of his; but Dr Piers, Bishop of Sarum, a Court Prelate, had begg'd it of the Queen to collate it, and accordingly had the grant of it. Upon this, Mr Fox applied himself in his father's name to Archbishop Whitgift, declaring his case, who immediately gave him a letter dated July the 14th, to the Bishop of Sarum, and the Bishop readily granted his request, 'out of a due sense, (says Mr Strype) of a man that had so well deserved of the Church for his vast written labours of the History of the Church, and the persecutions of the true professors of it. Nay, more than his request, for he promised to settle an exhibition upon father Fox's second son, whose name was Thomas, bred up in King's-College, Cambridge; and when he was capable of it, of a Prebend in his Church of Sarum. For to this tenour did the Bishop's answer to the Archbishop run, dated the same day with the Archbishop's to him. This was the judgment and venerable esteem the Archbishop and Churchmen in those days, had of that reverend and learned confessor and his labours.'

FREIND (JOHN), a learned Philosopher, an excellent Physician, and a most elegant Writer in the XVIIIth Century. His father was Rector of Croton, in Northamptonshire, a man of great learning, piety, and integrity; and extremely careful in the education of his sons (a). Of these, John was born in 1675, and, together with his brother Robert, put under the care of the celebrated Dr Richard Busby, then Master of Westminster-School; under whom both brothers distinguished themselves, as well by the quickness of their parts, as the steadiness of their application. From thence, John was elected into Christ's-Church College in Oxford, in 1690, where he had again the signal advantage of being under the eye of the famous Dr Aldrich, who, for his exemplary vigilance, true zeal for learning, and well conducted generosity, was universally admired and applauded while living, whose memory will be ever revered in that seat of the Muses, where he made it the business of his life to promote useful and polite literature (b), and whose praises ought always to accompany those of the great men formed under his care. In consequence of that warm spirit of emulation which then prevailed in Christ-Church, as well as the natural inclination of our young scholar, he applied himself with the greatest vigour to study the writings of the most celebrated Poets, Orators, and Historians, among the Antients; by which he acquired an early facility in writing elegant Latin, in Verse as well as Prose, and a perfect knowledge of the Greek language, of which he gave some publick specimens, which were generally and justly admired (c) [A]. He was not however diverted, either by the pleasure

[A] Which were generally and justly admired.] It may be affirmed without the least flattery, or even complaisance towards the memory of this learned person, that even in the earliest part of his life he gave unquestionable testimonies of those two admirable qualities, which when conjoined never fail of producing great men in every profession, genius, and application. We have observed in the text, that it was impossible for one endowed with such signal advantages, not to receive all imaginable encouragement in that seminary of pleasure that accompanies this kind of reading, or the reputation he had acquired by his proficiency therein, from the design which he had formed of pursuing severer studies; and accordingly began with great diligence to cultivate those sciences, without the knowledge of which it is impossible to become absolutely master of Physick (d). His first care was to digest thoroughly the true and rational principles of Natural Philosophy, Chymistry, and Anatomy; and to these he added a sufficient acquaintance with the Mathematicks, reading afterwards the best physical authors ancient and modern, examining, weighing, and comparing what they said, and labouring to gain a true judgment of their excellencies and defects, from the dictates of sound reason and the unbiassed light of experiments. How well this method succeeded, and how soon he became a great master in this truly noble and useful science, appeared from a letter of his, dated from Oxford July the twenty-sixth 1699, to Sir Hans, then Dr Sloane, which was very soon after published in the Philosophical Transactions (e) [B]. In this first exercise of his pen, on the proper business of

of learning, where Dr Aldrich presided. Under his auspice, Mr Freind undertook, together with another young gentleman of great parts and rising reputation, to publish a Latin translation, with several necessary helps, of two Greek orations (1), one of Æschines and the other of Demosthenes, which were at that time generally well received, and have been since reprinted. The title of this book runs thus.

About the same time, being then in the twenty first year of his age, he was prevailed upon to revise that edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, which had been prepared in France for the use of the Dauphin, which was then re-printed at Oxford (2) with the following title.

Ovidii Metamorphoseon libri xv. cum interpretatione Danielis Crispini in usum Delphini, à Joan. Freind recensiti. Oxoniæ 1696. in 8vo.

To these proofs of his diligence and learning, let us also add one of his genius excited by a very melancholy occasion, that of the death of his Royal Highness, William Duke of Gloucester, which happened July the thirtieth 1700, at Windsor, in the eleventh year of his age. It was upon this subject, that Mr Freind addressed a Latin Ode to Dr Edward Hannes (3) an excellent Physician, and one who was also distinguished by his poetic writings in the same language. The conclusion of this Ode, which has been always regarded as an admirable performance, as well in point of sentiment as elegance, cannot but be acceptable to the reader at the same time, that it justifies what is asserted in the text. After expatiating on the high hopes that were entertained of this promising young Prince, he returns to the sad subject of his loss in these stanzas.

[B] Which was very soon after published in the Philosophical Transactions.] This letter contains the history of a very remarkable Hydrocephalus, or watry head, and is more precise, and at the same time more perspicuous, than almost any thing of the same kind extant in other authors (4). The external dimensions of this head before it was opened, were from the eye brows over the crown to the nape twenty three inches, the circumference from the nape round the Offa Bregmaticis twenty six, but round the Os Frontis twenty four; from ear to ear over the crown nineteen, from the eye brows to the chin four, from one extremity of the eye brows to the other, four and a half from the chin to the coronal future, seven and a half, the circumference from the chin round the crown thirty, from one extremity of the ear backwards to the other; round the nose twelve, and round the nape six and a half, from temple to temple over the forehead eleven; the circumference of the head round the Os Frontis and Occipitis twenty nine; the circumference of the neck nine and two thirds, the length of the neck two, the length of the body thirty three, the circumference of the Thorax eighteen, the length of the foot four and a half, from the end of the middle finger to the acromion twelve and a half, the circumference of the arm five, of the calf five and a half, and of the thigh eight inches. After the integuments were removed, the top of the Cranium appeared soft and membranous, the extent of the membrane from one temple to the other was eight inches, between the parietal bones three and a half, from the Os Frontis to the Os Occipitis twelve; in the middle, just upon the crown, lay a bone in some places a little cartilaginous five inches long and one broad, joined to the membranes on every side of the same thickness, with the rest of the upper part of the Cranium that was bony, which was extremely thin every where, and the Lamina lay so close, that in many places no Diploe could be discerned, the membrane was as thin as the Pericranium, which yet was easily divided from it, none of the sutures were entirely closed, those of the upper jaw were very loose in the temporal and lambdoidal futures, there was a vast number of the Triquetra wormiana, all which had so many distinct sutures: upon piercing the Dura Mater, a great quantity of water gushed out which lay in the ventricles of the brain, as well as between the Dura Mater, and the Pia; the liquor was thin, pale, and inspid, of which there was taken out five quarts; the Dura Mater was firm and entire, of its usual thickness, and it stuck very close to the bony as well as membranous parts of the Cranium; all its processes and sinus's were singular, the fourth sinus somewhat larger than ordinary, a very large vein of the Dura Mater entered the longitudinal sinus directly forwards towards the Criſta Galli, contrary to the course of the blood.

The Pia Mater was very much distended, and seemed to be stretched as much as it could bear, it lay smooth and equal upon the surface of the brain, there being neither any circumvolutions in the brain for it to go between, nor any partition to the Corpus callosum, tho' there was a large Falx in the Dura Mater ; the lateral ventricles were very thin, their upper part tohis profession, he shewed the same exactness, regard to method, and modesty in expressing his own sentiments, which were so conspicuous in his succeeding Treatises. He was very careful in restraining that eagerness which is naturally incident to young men, and without suffering himself to be led away by the commendations of his friends, continued his assiduity in his study and practice, from whence he would rarely suffer himself to be drawn aside by the desire of adding to that fame which constantly attended his writings. However, in the spring of 1701, he wrote to the same worthy person a Latin letter, concerning some extraordinary cases of persons afflicted with convulsions in Oxfordshire (f), which, at that time, made a very great noise, and might very probably have been magnified into something supernatural, if our author had not taken great pains to set them in a true light [C]. He was already known and considered in the Faculty, when he began to meditate wards the Cerebellum was quite wasted, so that nothing was left to cover the cavity in that place but the Pia Mater, this was so thin that in bending down the head to empty the water it broke, and hindered the knowing exactly how much water the lateral ventricles contained, but by their cavity which was very large, one might guess they held at least a pint each. The third and fourth ventricles had a little water in them, but were scarcely larger than usual, as Steno observed in his Hydrocephalus calf; the brain had all its parts plain and entire, tho' its substance in most places was but very thin and loose about the Corpora striata, thalami nervorum optico- rum, it was tolerably thick and firm enough, tho' nothing to what it is in a natural state; the Cerebrum and Cerebellum, when laid out in their proper position, were eleven inches long; the Cerebrum cross the lateral ventricles was nine inches broad; after all the water was taken out, both of them weighed one pound and a half.

The Corpora striata, and thalami nervorum optico- rum, were very small in all their dimensions, on the inside towards the ventricles they were wrinkled, and lay in folds like those in the inner coat of the stomach; in the Corpora striata, there were no Striæ discernible, the Plexus Choroides was very small, the Glandula Pinealis was somewhat larger, but less compact than ordinary; the Nates were very red and large two inches long, one broad, and one thick, the Testes were not distinguished from them by any protuberance, they seemed rather to be a production, into which the Nates lessened by degrees like a fugar loaf. The Cerebellum was very firm every where, and did not much exceed its natural bulk, the medullary trunk, which sends out those little branches like trees, was thicker and harder than usual, the branches were not so much disposed like those of a tree, but went rather in single oblique lines, like so many rays from a point; the nerves were all regular and plain, only the olfactory were very small, the optic nerves did not join before they entered the orbits; the Rete mirabile was very large, and so was Dr Ridley's circular sinus, on the right side were two carotidarteries, the intercostal nerve lying between them, and they entered the scull at the same hole; the trunk of the vertebral where those arteries unite was extremely large and full of blood, the veins were neither larger nor more in number than usual; Mr Freind could easily discern three or four lymphatics upon the brain over the lateral ventricles, but they were too small to be traced: whether this great effusion of water was caused by an obstruction in the capillary arteries, which might make the finer part of the Serum ouze thro' their coats, or by a rupture in the lymphatics Mr Freind could not determine. The mother of the child brought it to Oxford for a shew, the account she gave of it was, that she had been three weeks in travail, and that at last she was obliged to have the vagina ript for its passage, the child was two years and six weeks old, it could speak a little, it could neither walk nor hold up its head, it was always merry, never subject to drowsiness, pain in the head, want of appetite or indigestion; its sight was somewhat dim, and its smelling but indifferent; it never had any illness only two or three days before it died, it was very much troubled with the gripes, and upon opening the Abdomen, the guts were found extremely swelled with wind, every thing else in both the lower cavities was in its natural state. By comparing those two Hydrocephali which Tulpus gives an account of, with this, we may see how different each of them is from it; his first was a boy five years old, the scull no larger than a man's, and contained only five pints of water, the brain had lost all its shape and most of its substance, the reliicks of which stuck to the scull; and all he says of the second is, that it had a quart of water in one of the lateral ventricles.

[C] To set them in a true light.] We shall give the reader the substance of this (5), as of the former paper, the rather, because we do not meet with either of them in the collection of our author's physical works. At Blackthorn in Oxfordshire, five little girls were seized with frequent fits of barking like dogs, together with violent motions of the head, no convulsions were observed in their faces, only frequent distortions and oscillations of the mouth, their pulse was like that of persons in health, but that towards the end of the fit it was somewhat weaker, the noise as it seemed to the Doctor did not resemble the barking of dogs so much as their howling, only that the returns were more frequent with alternate sobbings. The youngest of the girls was but six, and the eldest fifteen years of age. At intervals they had their reason and senses entire, but it was not long ere one of them renewing her yelling would affect the rest. At length their spirits being exhausted, they would fall down like epileptics upon a couch, laid in the middle of the room to receive them, for some time they would lie quietly and decently, but upon a new irritation, or orgasm of the spirits, they would beat their breasts and other parts and discommode each other. July the twelfth 1700, Dr Freind visited another family at Blackthorn, where a boy and three girls had been seized with convulsions ten weeks before without any apparent preceding cause, at first one of the girls was affected, and the first fit lasted for two hours, and the rest, as the mother informed him, were so struck with their sister's disorder, that in a few days they were also seized therewith. At his arrival they were all before the doors upwards of half an hour at play very brisk and unconcerned, and their complexion laudable from this disorder, was produced no other bad effect than a little weakness and languor, their pulse was in every respect regular. At length the eldest girl about fourteen years of age was seized as usual, the only symptoms of its approach was a swelling of the stomach, which rising gradually like a ball up the throat, set the muscles of the larynx and head upon their wonted convulsions, this rising was a certain and constant forerunner of the paroxysm, and if they endeavoured to stop it, it broke out with the greater violence and continued the longer: the noise they made, which was incessant and disagreeable, did not so much resemble the barking or howling of dogs as had been given out as an uncouth kind of singing, consisting of three notes or tones repeated twice over, and succeeded by deep sighs, which ended in a plain note that was much stronger and sharper than any of the rest. No words can describe this song. At intervals she varied her note, but when her spirits began to fail her motions and bawling increased, till being at length almost choaked, she would express a note or two and repress a little the shaking of her head, by this means recovering strength she would renew the same ditty, which was always accompanied with an alternate nodding of the head backwards and forwards, the muscles of the neck were very tense and inflated, all the other parts of the body were free of convulsions. All the time of the paroxysm she had her senses entire, and would sit or walk as she pleased, but could not utter one word, her complexion did not change, her eyes were immovable as if dead, she had no distortion but tate a work truly worthy of his own genius and learning; and of those free, rational, and incontestible principles on which it was founded. He observed, that Sanctorius, Borelli, and Baglivi in Italy; and Pitcairne and Keil, here at home, had introduced a new and more certain method of enquiring after physical truths, than had been known to most of the writers in the preceding age (g). He therefore resolved to apply this way of reasoning, in order to set a certain subject of great importance, of daily use, and general concern about which the learned had been always divided, in such a light as might put an end to disputes, and open the eyes of mankind to a natural unperplexed theory, from whence, of consequence, an effectual and satisfactory practice might be deduced. This he accomplished in his EMMENOLOGIA (h), which he gave to the publick when he was about twenty-eight years old; and tho' at first it met with some very considerable opposition, through the reverence that many entertained for old tho' unintelligible systems, and the prejudices with which others beheld the discoveries made by their contemporaries, as if their sagacity and industry rather outraged than obliged such as were of the same profession; yet all candid and competent judges acknowledged it to be an excellent performance; in respect to which, it was hard to affirm whether the beauty of the stile, the elegant disposition of the parts, or that wonderful succinctness which detracted nothing from it's perspicuity, ought to be more admired than the happy concurrence of learning and penetration, which enabled him so effectually to reconcile the judicious observations of the Antients, with those discoveries in Anatomy which are indisputably due to the Moderns. In short, his plainness in stating the principal points in question, his easy and satisfactory solutions, his wonderful application of all previous, concomitant, and succeeding circumstances, to that simple principle, which, he suggests, quickly gained that acquiescence in his doctrine (i) which it deserved. Some years after a second edition of this treatise appeared, which is likewise to be found in the general collection of his medical works [D]. In the succeeding year 1704, he was appointed in her mouth, which by reason of the contraction of the muscles, was quite a Spasmus cynicus; during the paroxysm you could scarce feel a pulse, and thus she continued upwards of half an hour, tho' the brother and sisters stood by, yet they were not seized with the Spasmus as usual: they slept pretty well in the night, provided they were inclined to it when they lay down, but if not, they were seized with the paroxysm till morning, at the same intervals, as in the day time; the girls of the other family were troubled with this disorder about the beginning of the year, at which time their mouth was distorted and swelled, and a little after that these just mentioned had convulsions, the others were seized with epileptic fits, and a total deprivation of sense; they would sometimes, as if they were possessed beat upon their breasts, and at other times run about, &c. but there was nothing of this the first three months, only the symptoms the Doctor has already described. The uncommon appearance, or long continuance of these symptoms, does not hinder concluding that this is a natural disorder, for this Spasmus agrees with all other convulsions, as arising from the irregular motions of the animal spirits within the nerves, variously contracting the muscles according to the disposition of the organs; so that in this case nature does nothing but what is usual in other kinds of convulsions, using the same organical motions here, as in the Chorea S. Viti, or in hysterical disorders, where the patient is at one time seized with laughing, at another with howling, and at another time beats upon the breast, all which is occasioned by the various and involuntary motions of the muscles; seeing therefore the muscles of the larynx, head, hands, and feet, are equally disposed to convulsions, whatever seems to be strange and uncommon in these girls, is owing not so much to the nature of the symptoms as to the part affected.

[D] Of his medical works] We will first give the title of this valuable performance at large, then a short view of its contents; and lastly some historical remarks of the fate with which it has been attended. The title in the original runs thus.

EMMENOLOGIA, in qua Fluxus muliebris menstrui Phenomena, periodi, vitia, cum medendi methodo, ad rationes mechanicas exiguntur. Auctore Johanne Friend, M. B. Aed. Christi Alumno. Lond. 1703. 8vo.

This treatise was translated into English by Dr Thomas Dale, who dedicated it to the late Dr James Douglas.

Our author takes notice in his preface, that there are very few subjects on which Physicians had written more, or with less satisfaction to their readers than this, which he had undertaken to explain; the cause which he assigns for this, is their having recourse to dark, abstruse, and unintelligible principles, neglecting those that were plain and easy, as if their being more obvious made them less valuable. He acknowledges, that in his performance he has followed the principles and the example of the learned Bellini; and that one of the principal points he had in view, in composing this work, was the opening a clear road to the relief of one half of the human species, since almost all the diseases incident to the sex, either arise from, or are connected with, the subject of his book. As to the final cause of the catamenia, he agrees with Galen, and that it is to provide for the health of the mother and to provide nutriment for the embryo; with the same learned person he agrees with respect to the efficient cause and rejecting the influence of the moon, the operation of the Archeus, and the doctrine of ferments, as equally repugnant to truth and reason, he adheres to that of a Plethora. He proceeds next to explain this, to shew how and whence it arises, and why it is peculiar to the sex. He demonstrates the truth of this opinion from the structure of the parts, and then goes on to shew, from mechanical principles, how this is effected; he then answers the objections that have been made to this doctrine; after this he proceeds to the periods, and gives a plain solution of those difficulties that from other methods are inexplicable. The way being thus cleared, he enters on an explanation of the phenomena, then considers whatever is known to promote or to retard the menses. He next points out the symptoms which arise from a suppression, and establishes the proper method of cure. In like manner he describes the symptoms attending an immoderate flux, and the most effectual means of removing them, illustrating all that he delivers with the most exact and instructive histories or cases. He concludes with a discourse on the virtue and operation of the usual remedies, and from a retrospective view of the whole makes it evident, that his theory is founded in truth and the operations of nature, and is not the fruit of a happy invention, and the power of explaining in a plausible manner principles that have no foundation but in the mind of the contriver. Such is the design and distribution of this excellent work.

Soon after the publication of this treatise, our author's opinion that the Menses are occasioned by a Plethora, was attacked by Dr Thomas Snuellen, or Snelenus a Dutch Chymist (6), who ascribes that purgation to a ferment. He wrote with much warmth, or rather rudeness, and, as the ingenious author of the historical preface to Dr Friend's Medical Works, observes, used rather the language of Billingsgate, than the Schools, in his performance. In 1712, Peter Frepointed to read chymical lectures in the University, which he performed with great applause, the novelty and perspicuity of his lectures, attracting and giving the highest satisfaction to a numerous audience (k). In 1705, he attended the famous Earl of Peterborough in his Spanish expedition, and was the companion of his fatigues, in which, as Physician to the army, he had no small share for very near two years together; and, in his return home through Italy, he made a tour to Rome, as well for the sake of seeing the celebrated antiquities of that famous city, as for the pleasure of visiting and conversing with Baglivi and Lancisi, men whom their skill in physick, and their excellent writings, had justly merited respect and renown (l). On his coming back to England, he found the character of his illustrious patron very rudely treated; and, out of a spirit of justice and gratitude, fart, a Physician of Liege, published an Emmenologia, in which he rejects our author's notion, as well as that of a ferment, and asserts the cause of the Menses to be Sal exustum purgaminis uterini in vasis collecti, which, as the author before mentioned rightly remarks, is in reality saying nothing, and therefore it is impossible that there should be any thing said in answer to it. Since Dr Friend's death, Dr Thomas Simson, Chandos Professor of Physick and Anatomy in the University of St Andrew's, in his System of the womb: with a particular account of the Menses independent of a Plethora; to which are subjoined a few observations relating to cold and its effects upon the body, printed at London 1730. in 8vo. has declared against the doctrine of a Plethora, and assigns another cause of it. Monsieur Tellier the younger, Physician at Peronne, in his Reflexions Critiques sur l'Emmenologia de Mr Freind, printed at Paris 1730, recommends our author's treatise on account of its perspicuity, strength of argument, and the useful observations contained in it, and owns that the Plethora contributes not a little to this purgation; but differs with Dr Friend among other points, in this, that the latter supposes the flux to be occasioned by the rupture of the capillary vessels, whereas Monsieur Tellier affirms it to be performed by the influx of the blood into the lymphatic vessels, or as Helvetius calls them the lymphatic arteries. But Dr Wigan observes, that tho' Dr Friend often speaks of the rupture of the vessels, yet we are not to imagine that he meant a preternatural or violent breaking of them, since he expressly says, 'that the orifices of the vessels open upon the impulse of the blood.' Per impulsum sanguinis, eorum officia dissilere; considered in this light, Dr Wigan does not perceive any great difference between the theories of our author and Monsieur Tellier. He acknowledges that Frefart, Simson, and Tellier, have raised some difficulties against Dr Freind's doctrine, which deserve to be solved, and that the Doctor might be mistaken in some points of less importance, and advanced some things in this treatise not altogether consistent with what he wrote afterwards in his riper years; and he assures us, that the Doctor designed in the second edition published at London, to have corrected some things, added others, and answered some objections, but was prevented by business from executing that design. But Dr Wigan thinks that none of the objections are of such weight, but that the substance of his doctrine of a Plethora still stands firm.

In 1735, there was published an academical exercitation upon Dr Friend's Emmenologia, under the following title, Exercitatio Academica ad Emmenologiam Freindianam: quâ fundamenti loco suppositæ quædam Doctrinæ modeste examinantur. Præsidi Jo. Friderico Herelio, Medicinæ Doctore & Physico Reipublicæ Norinbergensis, designato placidæ Eruditorum discussioni A. D. Martii 1735. 1000 xxxv. subjicienda, respondente Jo. Philippo Zellmano Hertzbergæ Hannoverano: Halæ Magdeburgicæ in 4to. p. 26. Dr Herelius in his preface observes, that tho' a great many foreigners as well as English extol Dr Freind's book, as a compleat work, and adhere to his doctrine, yet that when he studied physic under Dr John Henry Schulze, he perceived many reasons which weakened the authority of that book, and shewed its insufficiency both in theory and practice. These reflections were confirmed by Monsieur Tellier's treatise abovementioned, upon which Dr Herelius translated it into Latin, and wrote notes upon it, and designed to publish his translation with an appendix, containing further animadversions upon Dr Freind's Emmenologia, but was prevented for the present from executing this design by his travels. However he committed the Exercitation abovementioned to Dr Schulze in order to be published, which was accordingly done.

It contains five Theses which the author amply explains and illustrates, and which are as follow. I. Freindi Systema non suppeditat ullam rationem, cur fluxus menstruus sit periodicus, & non perpetuus. II. Freindius nihil agit, quando solis humanis fœminis purgationes uterinas vindicatum it, ideoque uteri situm perpendiculararem in mulieribus, in quadrupedibus horizontalem urget. III. Freindius Plethorâ suâ quam a Galeno adoptat, remminimè expedit, nec alii expedient, quam diu nihil aliud nisi Plethoræ imminuendæ viam interpretantur menstruæ evacuationis negotium. IV. Freindius nullam rationem indicavit, cur suppositâ Plethorâ vim potius in vasa capillaria, usque ad disruptionem eorum, edat, quam majores truncos, quos tamen prius debet ingredi, antequam ad capillares perveniat. V. Freindius contendit, quod in gravidis menstrua cessent, quia sanguis alendo fœtusi insumitur. Id si verum est, concipi non potest, cur fœmina paupercula, laboriosa, & non plethorica, non diutius uterum gerat, aut minores fœtus excludat, quam fœmina sanguine ad modulum Freindianæ Hypotheseos abundans, tantamque abundantiam suo fœtui impendens.

It is visible enough from the heads of these discourses, that Dr Herelius had either read our author's discourse with little attention, or had the misfortune not to comprehend his meaning. For with respect to the first, the account which Dr Freind has given of a Plethora, the consequences of it in a human body, and the different structure of the parts in women, very clearly explains, not only why they are subject to this flux, but also why they are not always subject to it. The second assertion is a bare begging of the question, and if he had been well acquainted with Natural History, he would have known that there are some exceptions to that general rule, which very plainly prove the reason assigned by Dr Freind to have very great weight. What he affirms in the third place, will not affect the candid reader's judgment in any degree, when he is informed that the best Physicians and Anatomists are now of a contrary opinion. His fourth objection proceeds from a mistake of Dr Freind's meaning, who plainly enough declares that he did not intend a preternatural breaking or separation of the vessels, but their yielding to an impinging force, in consequence of their natural structure, which is the plain solution of his doubt. The last is the least founded objection of them all, since there is no thing more commonly known, than that the nutriment depends as much on the quality as the quantity of the aliment; and therefore there is no reason in the world, why strong women should go longer with their children, much less that their offspring should be weaker than the children of those who have a more delicate constitution. But after all these objections, all this opposition, and not a little ill usage, if the reader will consult the learned Boerhaave (7), he will find the truth of Cicero's maxim, that the credit of opinion lasts but for a day, whereas truth rightly stated makes its passage in time, and remains established for ever. This has been the case of our author's doctrine which is now generally received, and received upon the arguments which he advanced, tho' we often find them mentioned without the least notice taken of him; so certain it is, that both envy and gratitude are short lived, in comparison of truth and experience.

gratitude, he drew his pen in the defence of that brave man, whose actions he is truly said to have vindicated, with the same spirit and fire with which they were performed (m). It is no wonder therefore, that the Doctor's book met with the same fate that the Earl's conduct had done; and, that as the surprizing successes of the latter were attributed to a happy temerity, so the detail given by the former, was, in spite of all the evidence he produced, considered as absolutely incredible, even by those who confessed that nothing could be written with more sprightly eloquence, or a more plausible appearance of truth (n). As time has now worn out all prejudices and prepossessions, so we may have leave to say, without giving much offence to any party, that the Doctor's history, however short, may be esteemed as correct and as perfect a piece, as any thing that ever appeared of the kind; and no doubt, had it been written in favour of any of their Generals, and published in a neighbouring country, it would have been extolled to the skies, compared to the most finished writings of the Antients, and treated as a work that deserved to be universally read, and as universally admired (o). But with us, things of this kind are run down by a party-spirit when they are new, and buried in oblivion when they are old; while, at the same time, we do all the justice imaginable to the writings of foreigners, whether new or old; which is indeed as reasonable as the other practice is absurd. What truth there is in these reflections, and what merit in that work of our author which occasioned them, we shall take occasion to explain in the notes [E]. It is now time to return to the historical thread of our article.

[E] To explain in the notes.] The title of our author's work at large, runs in the following words.

An Account of the Earl of PETERBOROUGH'S Conduct in SPAIN, chiefly since the raising the Siege of Barcelona, 1706; to which is added, The Campaign of Valencia. With original Papers. Lond. 1707, 8vo.

He dedicated this book to his patron Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough and Monmouth; and it is generally reported, that he gave the strongest testimony a man could do, of his being fully informed, and thoroughly persuaded, of the facts that are contained in the whole series of his relation (8). The character we have given it in the text, requires that something farther should be said of it here. There are some places that seem fated to be always famous, and one would think that Saguntum was of the number; the siege of that place, in early times, has been described by masterly pens; we will leave to the reader's own judgment this account of the surprisal of it by the Earl of Peterborough, which fell from the pen of Dr Freind (9).

The Duke of Arcos, who commanded for the Duke of Anjou (as Philip the Fifth was then stiled by the Allies), kept the main of his army to the right of Valencia, towards a place called Torrente; but sent Brigadier Mahoni, with a detachment of horse, to secure the strongest pass in the country, over a river which was just under the walls of Molviedro, the antient Saguntum so famous in the Roman History. This place, which is about four leagues distant from Valencia, my Lord must pass, for no other way was practicable. All the officers were of opinion, that his Lordship must come to a full stop here, having no artillery, no miners, no preparations to take a walled town; where, besides numerous inhabitants, all armed and zealous for the Duke of Anjou, there was a very good General officer, and near eight hundred men, near half of them being Mahoni's regiment of Irish dragoons. What made our circumstances the more desperate in appearance, this place was for us most unfortunately situated, because, after passing the river, there was a plain of two leagues to a Carthusian convent, where the enemy, to all advantage, might make use of their horse, which were excellent, and double in number to ours. The Earl of Peterborough gave the officers hopes, that what he could not do by force, he did not fear but to compass by art; and told them, that if he could but prevail to get Mahoni to come out to speak with him, he was almost confident of getting immediate possession of the town, and the opportunity of passing the plains without opposition.

Molviedro lies about a league from the sea, the greatest part of the town upon a flat, except the side rising towards the castle, which stands on a high hill. On the right runs a long ridge of mountains; but, a little above cannon-shot from the place, there is, towards the country, a little round hill distinct by itself: our troops came towards the town by a great descent, and the way towards the pass was behind the round rising ground, turning short on the left to the river.

V O L. III. No. 170.

The place of the interview intended by his Lordship, was on the side of this little rising ground next Molviedro, behind which my Lord had stolen some of his troops towards the pass, and brought them within view of the town; the rest were at the same time marching on purpose to make a shew, and, coming down the hills, the soldiers edging, as it were, the country people on that side where they could be seen. The few field-pieces we had were disposed to the like advantage, and every thing was set in a sort of perspective to the place of the interview.

The scene being thus prepared, the Earl of Peterborough sent an officer and trumpet into the town to Mahoni, to let him know that it should not be his fault if the country was exposed to unnecessary hardships and ruin, it being the interest of both sides to prevent it, since each had a chance to be master of it: that besides, he should be glad to have an interview with a countryman of so good a reputation; that such a conference could have no ill consequence, and might perhaps have some good effects; and that he was ready to meet him, with ten or twelve horse, in any convenient place betwixt his troops and the town. My Lord had the more hopes of succeeding in this project, since, that besides in these conferences, every body presumes to make his own advantage; he thought it might be reasonable enough, that Mahoni should be glad of a capitulation, and an opportunity to join his horse with those of the Duke of Arcos, in order to prevent our passing the plains towards the Carthusian convent.

The Condé de las Torres, the best officer in Spain, but by many thought no enemy to the House of Austria, was luckily recalled, upon pretended faults found in his conduct, in relation to the siege of St Mattheo; so that the Earl of Peterborough met an advantage he well improved, a General just come to an army, a man of great quality, but no soldier of service. Mahoni returned an officer with this compliment, that he would immediately wait upon the Earl of Peterborough, upon his Lordship's parole for his security, being desirous to shew him any proper respect, and to concert measures with him, that might prevent any disorders but those which were inevitable in war. This gentleman being related to the late Countess of Peterborough, of the Thomond family, was the more inclined to pay any civility to his Lordship. He came, with some of the principal officers of the Spanish forces, to the place where his Lordship received him, as the most proper to make an advantageous shew of his strength; and, after he was entertained upon a subject which had no effect, my Lord's second design was more successful.

It was not improper for my Lord to offer the most pressing motives, to incline him to take part with King Charles the Third, and to support them with the greatest offers; which were refused upon the principles of honour, and the impossibility of leaving a service to which he was engaged, for any advantages. But, as all pass with great compliments, the

He was created Doctor of Physick by diploma, July the twelfth 1707 (p); his reputation every day increasing, in proportion as the true sense and real merit of his writings became better known. In 1709, he published his Chemical Lectures, read at Oxford five years before; in which he rendered the same service to that science, that he had before done to Physick,

‘ Earl of Peterborough, to shew how sensible he was
‘ of his confidence in coming to him, told him, that ‘ he was willing to return his marks of esteem, with ‘ what he conceived he would be well pleased with,
‘ and which might prevent likewise some unavoidable ‘ cruelties very much against his inclination. The ‘ Spaniards, said he, have used such severities and ‘ cruelties at Villa Real, as will oblige me to retaliate.
‘ I am willing to spare a town that is under your pro‘ tection: I know you cannot pretend to defend it ‘ with the horse you have, which will be so much more ‘ useful in another place, if joined with the Duke of ‘ Arcos, to obstruct my passing the plains of Valencia.
‘ I am confident you will soon quit Molviedro, which ‘ I can as little prevent as you can hinder me from tak‘ ing the town. The inhabitants then must be exposed ‘ to the utmost miseries; and I can no otherwise pre‘ vent it, but by being tied by a capitulation, which ‘ I am willing to give you, if I had the pretence of the ‘ immediate surrender of the place this very night.
‘ Some cases are so apparent, that I need not dissemble:
‘ I know you will immediately send to the Duke of ‘ Arcos, to march to the Carthusian convent, and meet ‘ him there with the body of horse under your com‘ mand. My Lord, with a pretended frankness, of‘ fered him, if he pleased, to let him see his troops,
‘ and the artillery which he had; and, besides, told ‘ him, what he could bring from the sea.

‘ Mahoni seemed almost to confess, that his part
‘ was to strengthen the Duke of Arcos with his horse;
‘ and laughing, said to my Lord, I may say so to your ‘ Lordship, who is sensible of it, but cannot prevent it.
‘ The Brigadier, however, seemed to be very well ‘ pleased with my Lord’s openness, and told his Lord‘ ship, that he would go back into the town, and send ‘ an answer in half an hour. The capitulation was a‘ greed upon, and the answer came by the chief of the ‘ Spanish officers, with whom my Lord had occasion
‘ to talk, and to feel his pulse; but finding no proba‘ bility of prevailing on him to change sides, he con‘ trived all he could, and not without success, to give ‘ him jealousies of Mahoni.

‘ Mahoni, who of his side managed this matter with ‘ a great deal of dexterity, and very much like an of‘ ficer (had his advices been followed) in his capitula‘ tion, had agreed not to quit the place till about one ‘ at night; neither was the Earl of Peterborough to ‘ pass the river till that hour. This was to get time ‘ for the Duke of Arcos, to have made the march to ‘ the plains; and the Brigadier allowed himself the ‘ time before day-break, to have gained the same post.
‘ But the Earl of Peterborough so increased the jealousy ‘ betwixt the Spanish officers and Mahoni, that the ‘ latter was forced to send to my Lord, to let him ‘ know that his Lordship was obliged, in honour to ‘ the most sincere and punctual compliance with his ‘ capitulation; and confessed to him, that he was in ‘ danger from the Spanish troops, even for his person,
‘ if there were not the greatest assurances and evidences ‘ given of the performance of his word.

‘ I am satisfied nothing would have engaged the ‘ Earl of Peterborough to the least breach of faith, nor ‘ could any consideration have justified his Lordship in ‘ going over the pass of the river till the appointed ‘ time, the enemy upon agreement having withdrawn ‘ their dragoons which defended the intrenchments on ‘ the other side. But my Lord having over-heard the ‘ neighing of horses in the night, took it for granted ‘ that some part of the troops had evacuated the town;
‘ and that if the noise of firing was heard, it might ‘ cause a jealousy that they were attacked, and so pro‘ duce the desired effects of his plot upon the Duke of ‘ Arcos, if any of the Spanish officers should arrive in ‘ the enemy’s camp persuaded of an ill design in Ma-‘ honi.

‘ Upon this, my Lord ordered a party of men a ‘ little up the river, with directions to make discharges ‘ that might resemble an engagement of small parties.
‘ Mahoni sent immediately to my Lord, to let him

‘ know that whatever umbrage was given, he depended ‘ upon his word, and would never believe there could ‘ be of his side any foul play. Mahoni was so pressed, ‘ that many of his officers solicited his immediate ‘ march; but his aim was not to move till one o’clock,
‘ to give time to the Duke of Arcos; and the point
‘ my Lord was labouring, was to improve the suspi‘ cions and jealousies of the Spaniards. He thought ‘ the message from Mahoni gave him a good occasion,
‘ and therefore sent back an officer with this seeming ‘ compliment, which succeeded to his wish, and entire‘ ly accomplished what he aimed at. My Lord begged ‘ of Mahoni to consent, that, for his security from any ‘ accident, he might order a regiment of dragoons to ‘ pass the river, and wait the hour appointed under the ‘ walls of the town; that his own officers might ac‘ company them, and send them to the proper place,
‘ his Lordship having ordered two thirds of the officers ‘ to come into the town, and put themselves into his ‘ hands as hostages, for the exact and honourable per‘ formance of all articles.

‘ Upon the march of these troops towards the town,
‘ most of the Spanish officers, with the detachments ‘ they commanded, marched separately towards the ‘ Duke of Arcos; and some left their men, to give ‘ their General an account of what had passed. My Lord,
‘ as his officers conceived, had two insuperable difficul‘ ties; the one, to get possession of Molviedro, and se‘ cure the pass on the river; the other, to pass the two ‘ leagues of the plains, which were betwixt Molviedro
‘ and Valencia, before so good and so strong a body of ‘ horse. My Lord was in hopes, if he succeeded in ‘ one, to compass the other; and to that end, as soon ‘ as he found the treaty in a fair way, he chose two ‘ Irish dragoons out of Zinzendorf’s regiment, which ‘ he well instructed, and well paid, and sent imme‘ diately as deserters to the Duke of Arcos. He pro‘ mised to make them officers if they succeeded, which ‘ was punctually made good to one, who had well de‘ served it, the other dying soon after his return. They ‘ were to discover to the Duke of Arcos, that, being ‘ hid under the rocks of the hill where they were drink‘ ing a glass of wine, they had heard all the discourse
‘ betwixt the Earl and Mahoni; that they saw five thou‘ sand pikoles delivered; and that Mahoni was to be a ‘ Major-General upon the English and Spanish establish‘ ment, and to command a body of ten thousand Irish ‘ Catholics, which were raising for the service of King ‘ Charles. They agreed with the Duke of Arcos, to ‘ have no reward, if he were not soon made sensible of ‘ the truth of what they said by Mahoni himself, since ‘ they were persuaded that he would quickly send, to ‘ engage the Duke of Arcos to march immediately, with ‘ the whole army, towards the Carthusian convent, ‘ under pretence of joining with his horse, in order to ‘ prevent the Earl of Peterborough from passing the ‘ plains of Molviedro; but that whereas this march ‘ must be made in the night, all matters were so agreed ‘ and contrived betwixt the Earl and Mahoni, and the ‘ troops so placed, that he must fall into the ambushes ‘ designed, and run great hazards of an entire de‘ feat.

‘ It fell out, that soon after these spies had given ‘ this account to the Duke of Arcos, Mahoni’s Aid de ‘ Camp arrived, with proposals exactly to the same ‘ purpose; the Spanish General, whose suspicions were ‘ confirmed, by the jealousies the Earl of Peterborough ‘ had raised in several of the Spanish officers that were ‘ come from Molviedro to him, instead of complying ‘ with the immediate march proposed by Mahoni, re‘ moved his camp quite the contrary way. Mahoni,
‘ with his horse, expected the whole army at the Car‘ thusian convent, till the approach of the Earl of Pe‘ terborough made him retire to the Duke of Arcos’s ‘ camp; as soon as he arrived, he was secured by that ‘ General, and sent to Madrid. I must add here, that ‘ when Mahoni came to tell his story at Court, he was ‘ made a Major-General, and the Duke of Arcos was ‘ recalled.

Physick, by reducing it from fictitious and fabulous, to rational and real principles (q). This small work of his, for small it is in bulk, however weighty in it's contents, gave as much satisfaction to all judicious readers, as the same lectures, when read, did to the learned audience which attended them. They were so much the more agreeable, to the lovers of undisguised truth, and of knowledge capable of being reduced to practice, as hardly any thing of the same nature had appeared; so that this science was left in the worst hands, and, from their ill management, had contracted stains that could be no other way wiped out, but by shewing that they were not in the art, but in the abuse of it (r). In fine, his lectures were clear, and yet very concise, plain, and perspicuous, tho' deduced from mathematical principles, and in which many curious and instructive disquisitions were made, of a philosophical nature, without the least perplexity or confusion. It was no wonder, therefore, that a performance so much wanted, and of such general use, should meet with general esteem [F]. But as these chymical lectures were written, read; and published in Latin; so when they came to the view of the learned Philosophers in Germany, the novelty of the doctrine they contained alarmed such as were zealous for the old principles, and of that learning which was built upon them, and of which they looked upon themselves as in full possession. The authors therefore of a celebrated Literary Journal, prefixed, to their account of this treatise, a censure of it (s), in which they were pleased to treat the principles of the Newtonian Philosophy as figments, and the method of arguing made use of in the lectures as absurd; because, in their opinion, it had a tendency to introduce again occult qualities in Philosophy. To this unfair and unfounded charge, an answer was given by Dr Freind, which was published in Latin in the Philosophical Transactions (t), and afterwards translated into English [G]. In 1712, he attended his Grace the Duke of Ormond

[F] Should meet with general esteem.] We will first give the title of this book at large.

Prælectiones Chymicæ: in quibus omnes fere operationes chymicæ ad vera principia & ipsius naturæ leges rediguntur; Anno 1704, Oxoniæ in Museo Ashmoleano habitæ. A Johanne Freind, M. D. Aed. Christi. Alumn. Lond. 1709. 8vo. That is, Chymical Lectures, in which almost all the operations of Chymistry are reduced to their true principles, and the laws of nature. Read in the Museum at Oxford, 1704.

These lectures are dedicated to Sir Isaac Newton, and are nine in number, besides three tables. In the first lecture, after having observed the great defect of all chymical writers, in the theory of Chymistry, he proceeds to take notice, that no person had contributed more to the improvement of this art, than Mr Boyle, who did not so much lay new foundations of it, as destroy the old ones; and tho' he left sufficient materials from whence to deduce a true explication of things, yet his explications themselves are very defective. As to the way of deducing the operations in Chymistry, from the true mechanical principles, this he ascribes to Dr John Keil, as its first discoverer. Our author's design is, from these principles, to discourse somewhat largely upon such things, as tend most to the illustration of the nature of Chymistry, and to explain, as clearly as he can, its principal operations. This method he thought by far the most proper to be used, because it is the most natural and simple; and also, because he found by experience, that the common confused courses were of such little advantage, as not to leave the least tolerable idea of Chymistry, upon the minds of those who hear them. Upon this account, he proceeds in the following method. First, to explain all the operations in their natural order, and to shew by what law of mechanism they are produced, and to what uses and purposes they are principally subservient. Secondly, to shew all the ways in which they either are, or may be performed. Thirdly, to record all the experiments relating to this subject, under their proper heads, and to reduce them to the general theory. It is impossible to enter into a closer analysis of this work, our author having written so concisely, that it is simply impossible to give his meaning, or any thing like it, in fewer words. We may be well assured, that to write perspicuously, and to bring all he was to deliver on such a variety of subjects, in which almost every thing he had to say was entirely new, must have cost him a great deal of pains, which, however, he willingly underwent for the information of mankind, by the subversion of the ancient errors, and opening a new road to truth.

[G] Translated into English.] We find it added by way of appendix, to the second edition of our author's book, in Latin, and to the English translation of it. A short extract will be acceptable to the reader, as it will be sufficient to give him a just notion, both of the censure and the reply.

The publishers of the Leipsick Transactions, says the Doctor, without making any objection to the experiments themselves, or shewing any false reasonings in the manner of explaining them, attack some of the principles, upon which the explication is founded, and this they do before they give any account of the treatise itself, with a design to raise a prejudice against it: a method surely very new, and very unfair, in these retailers of learning, who pretend only to give a naked and impartial relation of what is contained in books, and to leave the readers at liberty to judge for themselves. The grounds upon which I proceeded, in my Theory of Chymistry, were the principles and method of reasoning introduced by the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton, whose conclusions in Philosophy are as demonstrative, as his discoveries are surprising. And since the editors seem to have no true notion of his method, which is the only one by which natural knowledge can be advanced, I will here endeavour to explain it to them; I shall shew that it is to this we owe the late great improvements in Philosophy; that the objections they produce against it, arise from their wrong apprehensions of it, that the same objections are of much more force, against their own principles, than those of Sir Isaac Newton; and if, from what I have to offer upon these points, the reader be convinced, that the principles upon which my lectures are founded, are sufficiently justified and confirmed, I hope he will the easier be inclined to believe that they are rightly applied, which the editors, by their silence in this point, seem to confess.

It has been the constant method of the Cartesians, and of those too, for the most part, who call themselves mechanical Philosophers, to assume an hypothesis, or figment, which has no foundation any where, but in the imagination only; and then, in general terms, to tell us how every thing in nature may be produced, according to that hypothesis, without being able to give a clear and satisfactory account of one single appearance. Nothing of this kind can be charged upon Sir Isaac Newton, he assumes nothing but observations and experiments, which are evident to the sense of all mankind; and from thence he deduces demonstrative conclusions, and then again, by the assistance of these conclusions, he explains the causes of many phenomena in nature. Thus it is evident, by undoubted observations, that the planets move in ellipses round the sun, and describe areas always proportional to the times; and that the satellites do the same, in respect of their primary planets: from this he clearly demonstrates, that all the planets have into Flanders as his Physician (u), and remained abroad the best part of a year. He had been a little before his departure admitted a Member of the Royal Society (w), which afforded him the honour and the happiness of conversing with Sir Isaac Newton, Dr Halley, Dr Keil, and several other eminent persons, whose great knowledge, and wonderful discoveries, reflected glory on their country. To them also Dr Freind was so much the more agreeable, as the learning he drew from books, had been cultivated and improved, after have a tendency towards the sun, and the satellites towards the planets, which they attend, that this tendency decreases in a duplicate proportion of their distance; that moreover, there is an universal tendency of matter to matter, and that the tendency of the moon towards the earth, is the very same with the force of gravity, and is the cause of the flux and reflux of the sea. This tendency, or attraction, some indeed may, if they please, term an occult quality, and I believe it will always remain so, for I cannot find that the greatest Philosopher among the editors will undertake to shew how it may be produced mechanically.

But then, however occult it be, as to its cause, it cannot be called what their principles are own'd to be, an hypothesis or figment; since the existence of it is as undeniably proved, as that of the sun, or the planets. If then there be such a principle, which demonstrably belongs to matter, what reason can there be why we may not make use of it in Philosophy? and shew how it is the real and adequate cause of a great many effects which we daily observe. So likewise, by the most evident experiments and observations, Sir Isaac Newton has found the different refrangibility of the rays of light, and by that means has discovered such wonderful properties of light and colours, that all the attempts which have been made, in this part of Optics before, are trifling, in comparison of his performance.

The true way certainly of proceeding in these philosophical enquiries, is, first to find out, by many and undoubted experiments, the properties of bodies, and then, without any farther search into the cause of such properties, which perhaps are insearchable, to explain the particular phenomena which depend upon them. By this method Archimedes discovered the principles of Mechanics, and the laws of Hydrostatics, without determining the cause of gravity and fluidity. He assumes such facts as are evident to observation and sense, and from thence he demonstrates the principles of those sciences. So likewise, Galileo, tho' he knew no hypothesis which explained the cause of gravity, did, notwithstanding, find out the laws of acceleration in heavy bodies, the motion of projectiles, and the doctrine of pendulums: and, in a word, laid a foundation for all the discoveries which have been made in natural knowledge since his time. Have not the Mathematicians made great advancements in the science of Optics, by assuming two principles of reflection and refraction, which are evident to experience, tho' the real cause of these two principles, is still unknown to most of them? According to the principles of our philosophical editors, all these great and noble discoveries must be rejected, because they are founded upon such properties of bodies as have unknown causes, and cannot be explained without admitting occult qualities, which confound the principles of true Philosophy, and reduce it to its antient chaos.

Wolfius, in his Aerometria, has assumed for a principle, the gravity of the air; and from thence has deduced the reason of many phenomena in nature, but he has no where given us a mechanical account of the cause of this gravity; and, I believe, never any hypothesis has been yet produced to explain it, but what Wolfius himself could easily demonstrate to be false. Will the editors object to him, that he has introduced an occult quality into Natural Philosophy? Indeed, Sir Isaac Newton has gone farther towards explaining the cause of gravity, which we feel and observe, than any one besides, for he has shewn that it arises from the principle of attraction, which all matter has to matter. Such a principle of attraction they are pleas'd to call a figment, but how any thing should be a figment which really exists, is past comprehension. Sir Isaac Newton has undeniably proved one species of attraction to be diffused through the whole planetary systems, and I have not heard that any objections of the least weight have been raised against his demonstrations.

I have more experiments to prove the existence of this other kind of attraction, which decreases in a greater proportion than the squares of the distance, and that it exerts itself vigorously in the minute particles of matter, than Wolfius has to prove the gravity of the air. Why then must we reckon the principles upon which the reasoning is founded, more a figment in one case than in the other? We find by observation that the particles of light which flow from the sun, the fixed stars, or even our terrestrial fires, are all equally attracted towards the edges of solid bodies, and wherever there is action, there must be re-action, and therefore it may be concluded that this principle is really existent, and equally diffused through all the matter of the universe. And tho' it may be inherent equally in all matter, yet Mr Keil has demonstrated, that it must of necessity produce the most sensible effects in the smallest bodies.

But they say, if we once allow such a liberty of feigning, others will invent other occult qualities, and so, by degrees, we shall return to the old refuge for ignorance: as if there be an attractive force or sympathy, why not likewise an antipathy, or an antipathistasis, and qualities emitted by way of species: we may likewise allow of the attractive funicles of Linus, and the variation of extension in the same manner. If there be an attractive force? 'Tis clear and demonstrable that there is such a force. This is not an hypothesis invented to solve other phenomena, but is itself a phenomenon in nature, and therefore tho' these editors may think they have urged the defenders of it to an absurdity, yet the foregoing argument, in which they seem to place so much confidence, has really no more in it than this: If we allow of one principle, which by undoubted experience we are sure exists in nature, therefore we ought upon the same account, to admit of others which do not exist: for instance, if we allow of gravity, which by experience we find to be in all bodies, tho' we know not the reason of it, therefore we must acquiesce in all the fictions and fancies of Philosophers, of which we have no experience, and for which no reason can be assigned. If this be a mathematical way of reasoning, I must confess we had better return to any old refuge of ignorance, than allow of such a liberty of arguing.

But the great objection against the principle of attraction is, that there can be no mechanical reason given for it. Must we then allow of nothing, but what we can give a reason for? have ever any of them yet given a true and mechanical account of the elasticity of the air? which however, is acknowledged by all Philosophers, and several phenomena are owned to be rationally solved by it. We don't deny but a clock maker may understand the mechanism of a clock or watch, tho' he knows nothing of the nature of gravity, or elasticity, which are the principles that set all the wheels in motion: and for the same reason, why may not he be allowed to know the mechanical operations of nature, who has discovered the spring which actuates all the bodies in the universe, and preserves them in their orders and motions, and can give an account how it mechanically produces each particular phenomenon, tho' at the same time he is intirely ignorant as to the cause of that first spring, upon which they all depend? however, if the editors have a mind to attempt explaining this principle of attraction mechanically; they have their full liberty: Sir Isaac Newton, I dare say, will willingly resign to them the glory of the discovery, and be satisfied if he escapes their censure for not undertaking the solution of such an intricate problem.

the manner of the Antients, by travelling through various countries, and conversing with the learned of different nations. He had now visited Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Flanders, and heightened the lights which his great genius and extensive learning enabled him to receive from experience, by a strict attention to the havoc made by wounds and diseases in fleets and camps (x). He resided mostly after his return at London, and gave himself up wholly to the cares of his profession. In this if he succeeded, it was wholly owing to his merit, for he was incapable of using any of the little arts that passed for wisdom with men of meaner minds; he had neither an obsequious complaisance for patients of high quality, nor could he readily dispense with all the received opinions amongst those of the same Faculty (y). But these, and some other wants, were supplied by true knowledge, great integrity, and happy success, which triumphed over all obstacles, and carried him to the very summit of medical practice. He passed through his first examination July the third 1713, was admitted a candidate on the thirtieth of September following, and April the ninth 1716, was elected a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians (z). He published the same year the first and third books of HIPPOCRATES de morbis popularibus, to which he added a commentary upon fevers, divided into nine short dissertations (a), which he dedicated to Dr Richard Frewen, of Oxford, a person of excellent character, with whom he had lived long in the most entire friendship. This was still a more important work than any which had fallen from his pen, and as he was desirous of establishing, for the true principles of Physick, those that having been discovered by the sagacity of the Antients, were confirmed by the experiments of the Moderns, he thought a more proper method could not be taken than this, of prefixing the most valuable parts of the Epidemics of Hippocrates before his own discourses, that it might incontestibly appear that he had not only sound sense and right reason, but also the highest authority on his side (b). Few books have met with better reception than this did, from all who were competent judges of the subject; and indeed it had all the merit of his former pieces, with this additional advantage, that it contained a greater variety of matter [H]. It is no improbable conjecture, that the loud and general applause

[H] A greater variety of matter.] The title of this learned and curious book, in which our author shewed an equal reverence for the Antients, and just respect for the discoverers of the Moderns, runs thus.

HIPPOCRATIS de morbis popularibus liber primus & tertius Græco Latinus. His accommodavit novem de Febris Commentarios, Johannes Freind, M. Doctor, Coll. Med. Londinensis. Londini 1717. 4to. That is, The first and third books of Hippocrates of Epidemick Diseases in Greek and Latin. To which are added nine Commentaries upon Fevers accommodated to his Doctrine, by Dr John Freind. These Commentaries were translated by Dr Thomas Dale into English, after the death of their author.

We find a copious and curious dedication prefixed to this work, as has been observed in the text, addressed to the author's old and intimate friend, Dr Frewen, dated December the first, 1716. In this our author observes, that the ancient Physicians were not only skilled in their profession, but likewise in all other parts of learning, and distinguished for the elegance of their stile. They applied themselves to give an exact account of diseases, and their different symptoms, and explained them with the utmost perspicuity and accuracy. Among the Latin Physicians, he particularly extols Celsus as an admirable writer, as well as an excellent Physician, and observes that Cælius Aurelianus would deserve a place amongst the principal physical writers, if his style had been less barbarous. Amongst the Greek writers he commends Alexander Trallianus, who expresses himself politely enough, except with regard to some few words. We find some things in him which favour of the Empiric, and of one full of superstition, he is also too diffuse upon the remedies, but he gives a very clear and exact account of diseases. Dr Freind seems to doubt, whether Galen is to be ranked among the Physicians, who have explained the nature of diseases, since this does not appear to be his design in any one of his books, tho' he was himself an excellent Physician, and delivers the notions of his predecessors, and especially of Hippocrates, with great subtilty and elegance. Our author recommends Aretæus, and then proceeds to the character of Hippocrates, whom he stiles the most compleat Physician of all Antiquity, and is surprized that several Moderns neglect the study of him, as if he was of little consequence, and prefer several writers to him. He remarks, that those who abandon the Antients, do not understand the subjects of which they treat, or express themselves in a very bad manner, and that the reason why we have so few good writers among the vast number who have written of diseases in the two last centuries, is, that they never read the Antients, but formed their style merely upon the Moderns; and not content with writing ill, have added to the explication of distempers, so many vain chimeras of Philosophy, that they seem rather to have composed fables than histories of diseases; for being infatuated with their own hypotheses, they lay down not only useless, but even false and pernicious rules for the cure of them. Dr Freind does not pretend to deprive the Moderns of the honour due to them, he owns that they have cultivated anatomy, and enriched it with a great many new discoveries, and explained the virtues of medicines with great diligence and accuracy. But perhaps, says he, the use which anatomy may be of in physic, has not yet been sufficiently shewn. And with regard to medicines it may be affirmed, that they frequently perplex the Physician, and that the needless multitude of them is a great obstacle to the cure of diseases.

In the preface our author informs us, that all the editions of Hippocrates's works are full of errors. That of Aldus Manucius is very defective, but Frobenius's is more correct. Jerom Mercurialis has followed the latter so implicitly, that he has sometimes copied even the faults. Though Foësius's edition is not exempt from mistakes, it is more correct. Charterius's is the most erroneous. There is but one manuscript in England of Hippocrates de morbis popularibus, which was of great advantage to Dr Freind, who, in order to publish the text as correct as possible, consulted all the editions, without adhering to any one in particular. After the preface, follows Hippocrates's treatise in Greek, with Foësius's Latin version at the bottom of the page.

In the first of his commentaries, our author discourses of the manner of writing which Hippocrates pursued in his books of epidemick diseases. He gives us two reasons for the pains he took in publishing these pieces; the first is, that only these two books are held to be genuine, and that in them we find all that this great man delivered concerning fevers. For the better understanding of which, our author enters very learnedly and closely into his method of writing and recording, that the reader may the more easily apprehend the meaning of his observations, and have the clearer idea of the matters of fact which he sets down. In his second discourse, he considers the use of bleeding, and more especially the safety, expedience, and even necessity, of opening the jugulars, where the brain is affected; at the close, he mentions the opening the temporal artery, which applause with which this learned treatise was received, had an unhappy effect; either on the head or heart of another Physician, who set himself immediately an unpleasing, or at least an unsuccessful task (c), that of destroying with the publick the credit which some new points in practice, recommended by our ingenious author, had gained, purely from that force of reasoning with which they were supported. To this extraordinary piece, in which great bitterness of heart appeared, with no small acrimony of stile, it is said our author opposed a very ludicrous answer (d), in which the vivacity of his wit, was shewn to be not at all inferior to the extent of his learning, and the solidity of his understanding. His rival shewed some inclination to fight him with the same weapons, but his vinegar was not near so strong as his gall; so that it was quickly discerned that all the lovers of raillery were on the side of Dr Freind, and were extremely diverted with the controversy, of which, had it been managed in a serious light, they would not have ventured to assume the character of judges [I]. Upon this the scene changed, the Doctor's adversaries cried out, that they had been laughed at, but not refuted; that the subject was very serious and important, and therefore called for a sober and judicious, not a humourous or whimsical reply. Upon this Dr Quincy took them at their words (e), and very learnedly and modestly, as well as plainly and judiciously, answered all the little cavils that had been raised against Dr Freind's Commentaries. Yet even this did not do; those who called so loudly for argument, found it not at all grateful to their palates, and therefore chose to put an end to the controversy, by a flat piece of irony, which could be only scorned and despised [K]. Our author supported that sentiment of his, which had occasioned so warm an altercation, in which he commends; but at the same time adds, that he is unwilling to dwell upon it, since it is very unlikely that our countrymen will ever be reconciled to this kind of practice. The utility of sweating is the subject of the third commentary, which is very short. In the fourth, he treats of vomiting, which he advises at the beginning, and the use of which he dissuades at the approach of the crisis in fevers, and more especially in the small-pox when at the height, unless where there is evident danger of suffocation. In the fifth, he treats of a purulent spitting, of a pleurisy likewise and peripneumony. What he says concerning an abscess, an ulcer of the colon, and the bladder, composes the sixth commentary, in which there is a very singular and accurate history, of a curious case that fell under our author's inspection. The seventh commentary, which is larger than all the other six taken together, relates to purging, what effect it may have in the putrid fever which attends upon the confluent small pox, and in an erysipelas of the head; in this there are inserted, with the consent of the persons who wrote them, a letter from Dr Richard Frewen, dated Christ-Church Oxon, July the twentieth 1710; another from Dr H. Levett, dated June the tenth 1710; another from Dr Salusbury Cade, dated September the eighth 1716; another curious, critical, and circumstantial letter from Dr Richard Mead, dated September the first 1716; as also a letter from Dr Freind, to the same gentleman, dated November the twenty-sixth 1716, and in this there is a very exact history of a case in which they were consulted together. At the close of this commentary, there is added a very clear and learned account of the intestinal discharge. What he says concerning a profluvium of urine takes up the eighth discourse; and the ninth relates to those vesicatories into which cantharides enter, and concludes with the author's assuring the candid reader, he will find by experience, that tho' many kinds of fevers generally yield to evacuations, without making use of any other remedy; yet there are scarce any, which, if they are become any thing vehement, can be extinguished by any medicine whatever, if this method of evacuating be set aside.

[I] The character of judges ] The history of this dispute, which was carried very high, would take up much more room, than, in a work of this nature, can be allowed; we must therefore be content to report the titles of the principal pieces published during this controversy, with a few remarks. It was begun by a book written by Dr John Woodward, Professor of Physick in Gresham College, and eminent in his profession. The title of which ran thus:

The State of Physick and of Diseases: With an Enquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of them, but more particularly of the Small-Pox: With some Considerations upon the new Practice of purging in that Disease: To the whole is premised, An Idea of the Nature and Mechanism of Man, of the Disorders to which it is obnoxious, and of the method of relieving them. Lond. 1718, 8vo.

Dr Woodward tells us in his preface, that this book, together with remarks upon some of the other heads treated of by Dr Freind in his Commentaries, were drawn up in the winter of the year 1716, soon after these Commentaries came out; and in the second section he writes thus (10). 'In every thing that Dr Freind hath hitherto published, and particularly the present Commentaries, he hath advanced several hypotheses, some of which are rightly supported, and the rest all so ingenious, that I cannot but be pleased with them. But then I can see no reason to debar myself of the same pleasure, from those of Dr Willis, Dr Sydenham, Dr Morton, and other Physicians, to whose hypotheses Dr Freind is so very adverse, he having not, exclusive of others, the sole privilege of entertaining the world in this way.'

To this, Dr Freind opposed a ludicrous answer; under the title of A Letter to the learned Dr Woodward, by Dr Byfield. Lond. 1719, 8vo. It was purely calculated to expose Dr Woodward, and his manner of writing. About the same time, there was likewise published another pamphlet against Dr Woodward, intitled, A Letter from the facetious Dr ANDREW TRIPE, at Bath, to his loving Brother the profound GRESHAMITE, shewing that the SCRIBENDI CACOETHES is a Distemper arising from the redundancy of BILIOSE SALTS, and not to be eradicated but by a diurnal Course of Oils and Vomits. With an Appendix concerning the Application of SOCRATES his Clyster, and the use of clean Linnen, in Controversy. Lond. 1719, in 8vo. pages 48. In answer to this, and the Letter by Dr Byfield, there was published, The two Sofia's: Or, the true Dr BYFIELDE at the Rainbow Coffee-House, to the Pretender in JERMYN STREET; in answer to a LETTER wrote by him, assisted by his two Associates. With a Preface relating to the late famous exploits of the facetious Dr ANDREW TRIPE. As also an Account of the new Creed of these Physicians, designed as an Appendix to the RELIGIO MEDICI. Lond. 1719, in 8vo. pages 58. In this Pamphlet, Dr Freind is every where represented as the author of the Letter from Dr BYFIELDE, and severely reflected upon; and his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conquest in Spain, is particularly censured. Another bitter invective, which appeared on the same side, bore the following title:

A Letter to the fatal Triumvirate, in Answer to that pretended to be written by Dr BYFIELDE; in which, sufficient Reasons are assigned, why Dr WOODWARD should take no Notice of it. Lond. 1719, 8vo. There were also several smaller pieces inserted in the publick papers, and periodical productions of those times, of which it is not requisite that we should take any further notice.

in a letter addressed to the learned Dr Richard Mead, and dated September the twentieth 1719 (f); in the beginning and at the close of which, if we discover something of heat, or cannot avoid perceiving an unusual quickness and acidity in the stile, we ought, not only to excuse it, on the score of the many admirable things which that most learned epistle contains; but we must likewise acknowledge, that some amends is made us by that honest zeal which our author expresses for the dignity of his profession, the sincerity and tenderness of his friendship for that worthy person to whom his letter is addressed, and, if one may be allowed to avow it, that elegant spirit of invective by which his resentment is conveyed in all the energy and force of the Roman language. This letter had it's effect, and every body that took any share in matters of this kind, could not avoid being pleased to find the history of so capital a disease as the small-pox, deduced, with so much accuracy and succinctness, from the very earliest accounts that authors give of it; so many slips of the learned; as well as vulgar mistakes, convincingly rectified; and the subject, with all it's circumstances;

this debate in so fantastick a way, there came out a short treatise which had a graver aspect; it was intitled,

An Appeal to common Sense, or a sober Vindication of Dr Woodward's State of Physick, by a Divine of the Church of England. Lond. 1719, 8vo.

The apparent design of this short discourse, was to shew how very inconsistent the language hitherto used in this dispute was, not only with regard to the persons concerned therein, but also to the importance of the subject, as a thing in which mankind was deeply interested, and had a just right to expect it should be no longer considered as a jest. Upon this, the very learned and ingenious Dr Quincy immediately took up the challenge, and very soon after published

An Examination of Dr Woodward's State of Physick. Lond. 1720.

In that treatise, Dr Woodward had advanced the following hypothesis. 'That the beginnings of all things, good or bad to the body (bating exterior accidents) are in the stomach, in which more or less of a bilious juice is ordinarily resident, containing salts of a very different nature. These salts are the instruments of digestion, and, while they retain their natural state, are in a proper quantity, and regular motion, the body is in health; but when they become too redundant or vitiated, they are the causes of all distempers. Therefore the speediest, as well as the most effectual, method of removing all bodily disorders, is to cleanse the stomach by emetic medicines. And as this generally holds good in other cases, so particularly in the second fever of the confluent small-pox, in which purging is very dangerous.' In answer to this, Dr Quincy asserts, 'That several diseases have not their origin in the stomach; that the natural residence of the bile is not there, but, being separated by the liver, is emptied out into the bowels, a considerable distance below the further orifice of the stomach, and never ascends thither but by convulsive and preternatural means; that consequently the disorders attributed to the bilious matter in the stomach, and the method of removing them by vomits, must be groundless (*). And then he proceeds to vindicate the practice of purging in the second fever of the confluent small-pox, in the following manner; he insinuates, that Dr Woodward disguises, under the name of purging in the small-pox, the practice recommended, and adds, 'Those Physicians have advised that evacuation only in some particular circumstances of this distemper; that is, chiefly in such cases of the confluent kind, where the whole load of humours cannot be thrown off by the surface and glands about the mouth, but stopping, when the pustules grow hard, returns back into the blood, and raises a secondary fever, which proves often fatal; and their reasons for thus doing, they have communicated to one another in the Latin language, as a point in practice of great importance. But Dr Woodward, in English, has harangued the populace, and endeavoured to frighten people with a belief that their general practice, in this distemper, is by purging; and, from instances of it's impropriety in some cases, takes occasion to be very compassionate for his country, to weep over the Weekly Bills, and inveigh as bitterly against purges, as a crafty Penthustia would against the Scarlet Whore, by this means prostituting the honour of the profession, and marking out those of greatest eminence therein to publick resentment. He traduces these gentlemen also by a delusory name, for purging, in the common acceptation in English, has a very different idea from those terms of the learned, whence it is translated. Solliciting the discharge of an overload of bad humours by stool, which the constitution is not of itself able to struggle with, is amongst them expressed in terms which may bear the English word purging in a restrained sense, but in the most enlarged acceptation of it, and as Dr Woodward uses it, it is not true of their writing or practice. After all, so far as these Physicians advise purging in the small-pox, it is also practised, by common consent, in many other cases of fevers; that is, wherever nature makes an imperfect crisis, and the efforts of the constitution are not able to bring the peccant matter to a head, or throw it off the principal parts, and wherever such matter threatens mischief to some noble part. These happen frequently in inflammatory fevers; and evacuation often by stool is promoted both to ease the constitution of the over-load, and draw off the humours that would be otherwise troublesome; and this assistance, in some particular cases of the small-pox, seems so consonant to nature and reason, that an omission of it can arise only from an unacquaintance with the true procedure of the distemper.' Dr Quincy also gives the following answer, to the passage cited from Dr Woodward in the foregoing note (11). 'Every one who has read Dr Freind, will find it very difficult to understand what is meant by hypotheses. That gentleman has advanced many propositions, which he has fully proved; but for hypotheses, in the common acceptation, he disclaims them, and is an utter enemy to them. But yet, in this sense, Dr Woodward must use the word; because he says, just after, But then I can see no reason to debar myself of the same pleasure from those of Dr Willis, &c. Yet, here again, we are in a contradiction, for Willis's works are professedly an hypothesis, being founded upon suppositious principles, such as sulphur, salt, &c. And Dr Morton accounted for diseases, and their cures, from a supposition of their seat being in the animal spirits. But then Dr Sydenham went upon no hypothesis, but utterly declaimed all such delusory conceits, and drew no conclusions except from facts and experience.' The whole of this work was conducted in such a manner as to convince by reasoning, and to give no other offence than what must necessarily attend every endeavour to refute opinions, warmly, and even angrily, espoused. At the same time, it gave a fair occasion to wipe out the remembrance of those mistakes, by a conduct of another nature, and by a defence worthy the importance of the subject, and of the characters of those who were embarked in this affair. But instead of a serious answer to this book, there was published soon after, An Account of Dr Quincy's Examination of Dr Woodward's State of Physick and Diseases, in a Letter to the Free-thinker; which consisted, in a great measure, of invectives against the author and his performance, without entering into the subject. This occasioned Dr Quincy to print a second edition of his examination; to which was subjoined, A Letter to Dr Woodward, wherein he complains of the ill treatment he received in that pamphlet, for having complied with the invitation of bringing the matters in dispute to the test of truth and argument. And thus at length ended this controversy.

stances, set in so very clear a light [L]. The connecting several points relating to the same subject, has carried us a little out of the direct path of Chronology, into which it is but reasonable we should return. March the seventh 1717, he read the Gullstonian lecture in the [L] In so very clear a light. This was written in the heat of that dispute, and before several treatises mentioned in the former note, but it seemed to be the clearest, as well as the most natural, method to carry on the history of the paper war in that quarter without interruption, and this finished, to give an account of his epistle, the title of which runs thus.

Johannis Freind, M. D. De Purgantibus, in secunda Variolarum confluentium febre, adhibendis Epistola. Lond. 1719. 4to. That is, Concerning purging in the second fever of the confluent small pox, in an Epistle to Dr Richard Mead.

This letter is dated, London, September the twentieth 1719, our author begins with lamenting the hard state of those Physicians, who have no other way of enlarging their practice, or raising their reputation, but by a diligent application to the study of the profession. He speaks of the little arts, the low complacencies, the mean cunning of some men, who by constantly pursuing the beaten road, falling in with popular prejudices, and vainly pretending to follow nature, tho' they are not able to penetrate much less to explain her operations, endeavour to support themselves, and to decry others who labour with unwearied pains to tread in the footsteps of their judicious predecessors, and, if possible, add a farther degree of perfection to the healing art themselves. He then enters into the reason of that practice, in which he had concurred with the worthy and learned person to whom he wrote, which from his experience he had recommended, and which he was desirous of seeing farther explained, and supported by a work which this gentleman had then in hand, and which having lately appeared fully justifies the character given it so long ago, by so good a judge. He afterwards delivers ten cases, which, in point of accuracy, perspicuity, and coming clearly up to the point they were brought to prove, are in every respect satisfactory. He enters afterwards into a very curious, but concise history of the disease, and of the method in which it had been treated in all its stages, by the ablest of the Faculty in different countries and ages, to shew how little foundation there was for styling this a new practice, he comes then to the apprehensions which some had endeavoured to raise upon this manner of treating the disease, as if a temporary relief ought not to be sought by running the hazard of future evils, which he fully shews to be without either meaning or foundation. His words are very worthy the reader's observation (12). 'For to say something, continues he, of that danger which some dread, as being the certain consequence of this method of cure, they seem to me not to understand, either what that distemper can bear, or in what manner this medicine ought to be applied. But do they know any one to have been killed or carried off by purging? Perhaps they may: for my part I do not: nay, not one whom it did not recover, unless in a case which in the judgment of every one was plainly desperate. Farther I can affirm, which may perhaps seem strange, that not one of those who could not be saved by this kind of remedy, ever died of a looseness, and that no one ever sunk under the operation of the purge: but that those very persons; who tho' catharticks were given them, however died, almost always found some relief from them for a time. And this, indeed, is agreeable to reason; for nature at this time labours under the too great weight of the distemper, and has no occasion for an additional load from the intestines: by what medicine then can she be more expeditiously relieved, than that whereby this load of faeces is discharged? But neither yet, because a spontaneous flux of the belly has proved destructive, which does not however very often happen, is the opening of the body to be scrupled at this time of the distemper, for whatever agreement there may seem to be betwixt them they differ very widely, for one of these cases shews plainly, that the strength is dissolved; in the other case, what hinders, if the other inclinations agree, our trying those purges which are suited to the strength, upon this account likewise, is there the less danger from this evacuation, in that we can moderate it at our pleasure, either by giving the most gentle remedies, or in a moderate quantity, or at the longer intervals. Besides, at this time of the small pox the belly having been so long shut up, and immoderately charged with faeces, is not so readily loosened, as to occasion any fear of too great a flux. Therefore it is in our own power, either to hold in or let go the reins, we may try this experiment of purging without any danger in the most gentle manner, we may, if it avails any thing, repeat it at times, so that we may proceed gradually as far as we desire. Wherefore, since this kind of remedy is not only free from hurt, but greatly advantageous to the patient, I admire at the dulness of some men who, being prejudiced, are entirely averse to it, or at least they administer it so timorously and coolly, that they are not willing to try it till the health is even irrecoverable. As if it were better to wait for the danger than prevent it: as if he would not more easily surmount the danger of this distemper, who is thus relieved on the ninth or tenth day, than by deferring this medicine till the thirteenth or fifteenth, when the distemper is become already inveterate.' He goes on to enquire to what causes these people themselves attribute these jealousies and terrors, and demonstrates them to be vain from those causes, having no foundation, but in their imagination. They dread that nature should be disturbed in her course, or defeated in her endeavour, to throw out the morbid matter; he shews that in this case nature makes ineffectual efforts, and without the assistance of art can only struggle against death, till the strength of the patient is exhausted. They are afraid of sinking the spirits by purging; he affirms, that this does not happen, but that the body being relieved by the removing an oppressive load, is quickly freed from many alarming symptoms. They take it for granted, that the tumefaction in the hands must be abated by the purging, he gives many instances of the direct contrary. In reference to the abuse of a true principle, that Physicians ought to study nature, and the occasion taken from them, to reflect upon learning, as if a Physician deserted nature by applying himself to books, he says with much warmth, but at the same time with much good sense (13). 'I must confess the constant cant of those trifling, and as they imagine themselves philosophising, fellows, has often times raised my indignation, and often times also my laughter, when they tell us we must always attend nature, and proceed in that path which nature's self points out to us: as if no body knew this, but persons entirely unskilled in all the arts and sciences: as if they were less capable of this, who are assisted by the writings of the Antients, and have made some progress in learning. What else have those ingenious and learned men done, those great restorers of physick among the Greeks and Arabians, what end did they propose to themselves in their studies, than to understand only how to follow nature; to follow her however in such a manner, as that they might guide and direct her by art, whenever there was occasion? Can we receive therefore no advantage from their lucubrations? Can we find no assistance in our endeavours towards relieving the afflicted from their experience, histories, and institutions? Because, forsooth, it is the part of an honest Physician to observe only what is indicated by nature. In truth, those very persons who entertain these sentiments, trusting too much to their own natural sagacity, will not easily understand what is meant by the word Nature, neither will they understand what she indicates, nor what of help she stands in need, or lastly by what means she may be assisted.' To this epistle are added two letters, the first from Dr Sedgewick Harrison, dated All Soul's College Oxon, September the tenth, 1719, containing five cases; the other from Dr Bate, dated Ashford, September the nineteenth, 1719, containing six cases.

the College of Physicians; he was chosen one of the Censors September the thirtieth 1718, in which honourable post he continued two years. On the twenty-fifth of March following, he gave the sum of fifty pounds towards repairing the College. October the eighteenth 1720, he pronounced the anniversary oration before that learned body, which was published, and, as might be well expected, highly applauded (g). He takes occasion therein, to bestow just praises on the great men who had adorned the Faculty, by their learning and labours, in this kingdom; and as there was no subject more agreeable to his temper and inclination, as he had a great facility of composing, and withal a very strong judgment, so we need not wonder that this oration is a peculiar proof of the felicity of his genius, and of his excelling in those qualities for which he has so justly, and so highly, commended the famous Linacre (h). In 1722, he was elected a Burgess to Parliament for Launceston, in the county of Cornwall; and acting in his station as a Senator, with that warmth and freedom which was natural to him, he distinguished himself by some quick speeches against such measures as he disapproved (i). As those were very critical times, and a matter of great importance was upon the carpet, in which Dr Freind thought himself obliged to take some share; it drew upon him so much suspicion, or so much resentment, that, the Habeas Corpus Act being at that time suspended, a warrant was issued against him for high-treason, and, after the House of Commons had been made acquainted therewith, he was on the fifteenth of March 1722-3 committed to the Tower (k), where he continued prisoner till the twenty-first of June following, when he was first admitted to bail, and afterwards discharged from his recognizance (l). This affair made a great deal of noise at the time it happened, and was then very little understood; which is the reason that what some publick writers have delivered concerning it, is at once obscure, and not much to the purpose [M]. The leisure afforded him by this confinement, being not at all

Immediately after the publication of this Latin epistle, came abroad a burlesque piece under the following title.

Dr Freind's Epistle to Dr Mead, rendered faithfully into English, divided into proper chapters, with notes learned and unlearned. Lond. 1719. 8vo.

The design of this ingenious piece was by a ridiculous translation of a few of the first paragraphs in Dr Freind's letter, and the heightening this coarse humour with some notes of the same kind, to raise a laugh amongst those who were incompetent judges of the point in dispute, of which it is requisite to give the reader an instance, that it may appear we have no intention to deceive him. At the beginning of his epistle, Dr Freind writes thus, as we have literally translated his expressions (14).

'In this therefore, as well as in the business of Painting or Sculpture, if any has a desire to excel, it is necessary that he should have an understanding framed as it were and accommodated to the art he would pursue, for no man by mere dint of study can ever become a Physician, unless he is in some sort born thereto. For in this art there are many things obscure and hidden, many complicated and subtle, which cannot by any precepts be taught or fully delivered by any explanation; so that, tho' much may be learned from the writings of Physicians, from whence that he may the better draw them, it is requisite that they should be thoroughly known to a Physician, yet much more must after all be left to his judgment and penetration. Neither is this in any thing more evident, than in the being able to distinguish amidst the variety of pulses, for those who are well acquainted with this happy effect of the touch, are very sensible that it is not to be acquired by the lessons of masters, but from daily practice and their own proper sagacity; insomuch, that in the affair of physic, more especially, the benefit is found of a natural quickness of apprehension, and the felicity of forming readily a true and sound judgment of things.' The remarks upon these observations of Dr Freind, in the piece before mentioned, are in the following words (15).

'This is the most extraordinary discovery the Doctor ever made, that no man can be a Physician, unless he be born one, or as he more elegantly phrases it, as it were, and in some manner, born one. This softening quodammodo instead of mitigating the nonsense in it, and turns his poor attempt at a meaning into ridicule. Pray, after what manner, which way, or how, must he be born a Physician, or as it were one? Must he come into the world with receipts in his hand, or must the name like the Beasts in the Revelations be written on his forehead? But 'I know what deceived the Doctor, having heard of Poeta nascitur non fit, and knowing himself to have as indisputable a right as Sancta Panca to the misapplication of all Proverbs and quaint Sayings, he changes the word Poeta for Medicus, and makes the proverb his own. There may be something in the assertion, when it refers to works of fancy and imagination, as Poetry and Painting, but I hope Physic is not in that number, nor any Physician proud of the title, but as it stands in opposition to the unborn Doctor, unless the great F—— who is the most fanciful of his brethren, writes treatises of Poetry instead of Physic, and paints when he should prescribe. The secret is now out, a Physician must be born a Pulse-feeler, having a nicer sensibility in extremis partibus, than a Tanner or a Tinker. After the same reason, long and small fingers denote a man born a Musician, or a Man Midwife, an erect countenance makes an Astronomer, and a down-cast look a Botanist. Te, vir clarissime, hinc oculis sepius vidi, & dum lineamenta tua, cum figuris Baptistæ Portæ contuli, nunquam Te alium, quam Saltatorem natum judicavi, adeoque Te tuis verbis, proprio Magisterio relicto, in Medicæ Artis Munera insuluisse credo.' Such were the arguments made use of to refute the learning, reasoning, and facts, advanced by Dr Freind.

[M] And not much to the purpose ] In the close of the year 1722, a discovery was made of that design, which has been since stiled the Bishop of Rochester's plot, upon this there was a bill brought into the House of Lords, 'to impower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect, are conspiring against his person and government;' by which the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act was taken away for a whole year, which before had never been suspended, for above six months; after it had passed the Lords, it was brought down to the Commons, on the fifteenth of October read the first time, the same day a second, a third time the next, and soon after received the Royal Assent. In regard to what happened to Dr Freind, we find the following account given which we transcribe without altering a letter (16).

'March the eleventh, 1722-3. Mr Yonge stood up and took notice how deeply Dr Francis Atterbury Bishop of Rochester had been concerned in this detestable conspiracy, aggravating his crime from his holy function and high station in the Church of Eng'and, a Church ever conspicuous for its loyalty, from the solemn oaths he had on so many occasions taken to the government, and by which he had abjured the Pretender, when at the same time he was traitorously conspiring to bring him in, upon the ruin disturbed by any uneasy thoughts or apprehensions, was, in some measure, employed in writing a second epistle to Dr Mead, on the subject of the small-pox, in which the strength of thought, the freedom of stile, and the accuracy of the several cases set down, most evidently demonstrates, that he never had a greater command of his parts, or exercised his judgment in his profession more happily, than at this time (m); so that however his health and his affairs might suffer by his confinement, his reputation increased, and the Republick of Letters was the better for it [N]. Here also he laid the plan of his last and most elaborate of his country, and of all that was dear and valuable to us as free men and christians: concluding, that as he was a disgrace to his order, and dishonour to the Church, so he might apply to him on this occasion these words, of the first of Acts verse the twentieth, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein: and his Bishoprick let another take. And therefore he moved that it appears to this house, that Francis Lord Bishop of Rochester was principally concerned, in forming, directing, and carrying on the said wicked and detestable conspiracy for invading these kingdoms with a superior foreign force, and for raising insurrections, and a rebellion at home, in order to subvert our present happy establishment in Church and State, by placing a Popish Pretender upon the throne. Mr Yonge was seconded by Sir John Cope, but they were answered by Sir William Wyndham, who said, 'He saw no cause to proceed against the Bishop in so severe a manner, there being little, or indeed no evidence, besides conjectures and hearsays.' He was back'd by Mr Bromley, Mr Shippen, Mr Hutcheson, Mr Hungerford, Colonel Strangeways, Mr Lutwyche, and Dr Freind. They were replied to by Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr R. Walpole, Mr Pelham, Mr Talbot, Mr John Smith, and Mr William Pulteney; and a motion being made, and the question being put, that the House do now adjourn, it passed in the negative by two hundred eighty five voices, against one hundred and fifty two; after which the question being put upon Mr Yonge's motion, the same was carried without dividing. Then a motion was made, and the question put, that a bill be brought in To inflict certain pains and penalties on Francis Lord Bishop of Rochester, which after some debate was also carried without any division. March thirteenth, Mr Robert Walpole acquainted the House, that he had received his Majesty's commands to acquaint the House, that his Majesty having had just reason to apprehend Dr John Freind, a Member of this House, for High-Treason, had caused him to be apprehended, and desired the consent of the House to his being committed and detained for High-Treason, according to an Act of this present Session, intitled An Act for empowering his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government. Upon which he moved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to give order for committing and detaining Dr John Freind, pursuant to the Act of this Session of Parliament for that purpose. This motion was seconded and backed by several members: but Mr Shippen, and Mr Bromley opposed it, saying, 'they could not see any reason for that House giving leave for detaining any Member, unless the species of Treason was declared, and that the information was upon oath.' Sir Joseph Jekyll, and Mr Robert Walpole replied, that by the late Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, the King was empowered to take up any person he had reason to suspect, that therefore the Government was not obliged to say, whether the information was upon oath or not. But Mr Walpole added, 'He did not doubt, but Dr Freind was charged upon oath, and privately declared to several Members, that they had positive proof of his being guilty of the blackest and basest Treason.' Mr Shippen then suggesting, 'That Dr Freind's having spoke so warmly two days before in Mr Kelly's, and the Bishop of Rochester's behalf was, in his opinion, the reason of his being taken up the next day himself, and that at that rate there was an end of the liberty of speech, which every Member of that House had a right to.' Mr R. Walpole with a great deal of warmth replied, 'He wondered any gentleman could think any Ministry capable of so base a thing, as to take up any gentleman for what he said in that House without any other cause, when they knew themselves to be accountable as well as others for their actions,' adding, 'That they who made such insinuations, might more easily be proved to be Jacobites, than they could make out such an allegation against the Ministry;' Mr Pulteney spoke on the same side, and in relation to Dr Freind's speaking in Kelly's behalf, 'observed, that it was usual in all conspiracies, for one traitor to endeavour to excuse another.' Mr Shippen animadverted severely upon this reflection, saying, 'It was not to be endured to have a Member of that House called a traitor, before he was convicted as such.' But Mr Pulteney having explained himself, that matter ended, and then the motion for an address was carried without dividing.

We have observed in the text, that on the twenty-first of June following he was admitted to bail, his sureties being Dr Mead, Dr Hulse, Dr Levett, and Dr Hale. On the first day of Michaelmas term following he appeared at the King's-Bench Bar, and November 28, 1723, being the last day of Michaelmas term, Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk; Charles Boyle, Earl of Orrery; William North, Lord North and Grey; Dennis Kelly, Esq; John Freind, Esq; M. D. and Thomas Cockran, Esq; who had been prisoners in the Tower, and were admitted to bail, appeared on their recognizances, and were discharged (17).

[N] Was the better for it. The title of this short work at large, runs thus.

Joannis Freind ad Ricardum Mead, M. D. de quibusdam Variolarum generibus Epistola. That is, An Epistle to Dr Richard Mead, concerning some particular kind of the small pox. This letter is dated March the thirtieth, 1723, and begins thus (18). 'Enjoying, Sir, unexpectedly, abundance of leisure, and my mind being even in this confinement not over solicitous, I thought I could not better employ my vacant hours, than in cultivating my former studies, and adding a few observations to what I have already writ, concerning acute diseases. And indeed, I the more willingly undertake it, since I learn from that elegant book concerning the small pox, which Helvetius has lately presented us with, that that learned author has either trod in our steps in his method of cure, or at least set out in the same road with us. I read that work over, I cannot say whether with greater eagerness or pleasure. So diligently has this learned and experienced practitioner traced out the various and greatly dissimilar kinds of the small pox, so wisely delivered the whole method of cure, that he alone has happily supplied many things, which have hitherto been wanting in the generality of authors. But neither has this gentleman explained every thing so fully, but that this Province seems by a certain fatality to be reserved for you, Sir, namely that you should one day give us a full and complete account of the nature and difference of the several kinds of the small pox, a work which I know you have long since undertaken.' There are two things remarkable in this paragraph, the first is, that in so short a time, so judicious, and so eminent a Physician as Helvetius, should embrace the practice recommended by Dr Freind, or should think proper to declare publickly on its behalf, if he had embraced it before, for in either case his book is decisive against the calumnies of those who had attacked our author and his friends. If concurrence in opinion amongst the most distinguished in any profession of different nations, is not sufficient to establish the reasonableness of any point in which they concur, there is no such thing as authority, neither can there be any criterion whatever of notions agreeing with, or being contrary to, good sense. It is true, indeed, that a wise man may be elaborate work, his celebrated HISTORY of PHYSICK, from the time of Galen to the close of the XVth century; the first part of which was published in 1725, and the second in the year following (n). In respect both to use and elegance, it may be justly stiled a great and masterly performance, worthy of the reputation of it's author, and capable of rendering singular service to young Physicians, nothing comparable to it, either in point of judgment or accuracy, having been before published in any language. These were the sentiments of some of the ablest men in the Faculty, at the time it came abroad; and the work having always kept up it's credit, and being still in as much esteem as ever, shews that their opinion was not ill founded [O]. There were, however, certain circumstances that be in the wrong; but that a false or absurd position should, by a dint of argument, be imposed upon men of the greatest credit for wisdom, capacity, and learning, where there is no connection of interest, and not the least visible motive to warp them from the love of fame and truth, is not to be comprehended. The second remarkable particular, is the zeal with which he recommends that learned person's treatise to whom he writes, which has since appeared, tho' at a great distance of time, and does the same credit to our author's judgment, as his language here and elsewhere, to the sincerity of his friendship. He hated flattery as much as he despised calumny, but he had a peculiar pleasure in praising merit, and never missed any occasion of paying a just tribute of applause where it was due. The last paragraph of his epistle is as remarkable as the first, the whole of it demonstrates the soundness of his head, and these passages are peculiar proofs of the uprightness of his heart (19). 'Dear Sir, says he in the conclusion, farewell, and of this be assured that where ever I am, fortune will never have it in her power to efface that remembrance of your friendship which gratitude will ever oblige me to preserve.'

[O] Was not ill founded.] The title of this very learned and useful treatise at large, runs thus.

The History of Physic from the time of Galen to the beginning of the sixteenth Century, chiefly with regard to Practice: in a discourse written to Dr Mead by J. Freind, M. D. London 1725. 8vo. The second vol. 1726. 8vo.

Our author divides his History of Physic into three parts, of which the first contains the Greek Physicians after Galen, the second relates to the Arabian Physicians, and the third takes in the Moderns. To give a long account of a book at once remarkable and valuable for its brevity would be absurd, and yet it is absolutely necessary that we should give the reader some notion of the contents of its three parts, and of the advantage arising to the study of medicine, from the indefatigable pains he has taken in this respect. In the first part then, he settles very exactly the time in which Oribasius, Aëtius, Alexander, and Paulus, flourished, which was a point so much the more necessary, as great mistakes have been made about them, so that in reality nothing had been written, even with respect to their history, that could be depended upon, 'till it became the subject of our author's pen. It is acknowledged, that the chief merit of these authors lay in their compiling, what had been written before their time by others, and more especially by Galen; yet there are some things in them new as well as some ancient fragments preserved in their collections, which are not to be met with any where else. He insists particularly upon what they have preserved relating to Surgery. He shews that some things which are commonly regarded as modern discoveries or inventions, were actually known to them; as for instance, the salivary glands, the use of issues, setons, cauteries, and of acupuncture in case of dropsies. He then proceeds, to such of the Greek Physicians as lived after these. He insists upon the description of the plague, by Procopius and Evagrius; and concludes from the accuracy of the former, that he must have been a Physician. He maintains, that the art of distilling liquors was actually known to the Greeks. He describes from these writers two very strange distempers that were not very rare in those days, and which in ours however are never mentioned; the first a kind of worms, and the other a sort of melancholy madness, when men wandered in desolate places, and howled like wolves. He commends some remedies that were then in use, and which are since in a great measure fallen into oblition, such as scarification, and on some occasions opening an artery, with a multitude of other useful observations and remarks, so much the more valuable as they are delivered with great simplicity and succinctness; so that at the very same time they do justice to the learning and abilities of the Antients, they are the most pregnant proofs of his own industry in collecting, and that happy facility with which he has disposed them in proper order.

In the second part he renders the same justice to the Arabians, he mentions such diseases as are nowhere to be found but in their writings, and likewise such as were by them first described. He enters largely into the history of chirurgical operations. He shews that some useful instruments were invented, described, and even depicted by Albucasis, concerning whose writings he had made very particular enquiries. As the small pox first appeared amongst the Arabians, so the very best description of the different sorts of that distemper, and of the methods of cure before the time of our Sydenham was written by Rhazes. Of the truth of this, even the English reader may now be a judge, since a translation of that curious piece has been published in our own language (*). By these writers there are not only many things preserved, that were contained in the books of the Greek Physicians now lost, but they have added also of their own invention, many gentle and moderate purges, taught the advantages of moderate Phlebotomy, made us acquainted with Chymistry, and with several useful compositions that have long had a place, and are not like to be very soon discarded from our best Dispensatories.

In the third part we have the History of Physic, as practised and improved by the Moderns; he not only mentions, but describes the schools of Salerno, Naples, Montpellier, and Bononia. The History of Chymistry more especially in this kingdom, from the time of the celebrated Roger Bacon, who was perfectly skilled in this, and all other parts of useful learning, is clearly and concisely laid down. He gives us a view of that dreadful plague, which raged about the middle of the fourteenth Century, which is succeeded by the description of the sweating sickness, which was peculiar to the English nation, and of which there were five returns. He enters into a short, but satisfactory, history of the venereal disease, which is thought to have taken its rise from our first correspondence with the West Indies, about the end of the fifteenth Century, as the scurvy is believed to be produced about the same time, or a little earlier, from the inconveniences attending the long voyages by the Cape of Good Hope to the East. Neither is our author at all forgetful of his own country, but furnishes us with excellent memoirs of such physical writers as flourished here, more especially of the famous Linacre who lived under Henry the Seventh, and Henry the Eighth, who founded two Lectures of Physic at Oxford, and one at Cambridge, and who procured the original charter for incorporating the Royal College of Physicians, with the history of which foundation, and a very just encomium thereon he finishes his work. We may even from this short and imperfect sketch of the out lines of his performance, discern the great utility and real value of such a history, which, tho' very succinct, must have cost him incredible labour, and could never have been drawn up in so easy, so elegant, and so natural a manner, but by a person of his great sagacity and extensive learning. We need not wonder therefore, that it was quickly translated into French, and received in that language with as great, if not greater, applause than it met with here at home. The Latin translation published with the rest of his medical that attended the publication of this judicious and learned treatise, which raised the prejudices of some against it, more especially in a neighbouring country, where it was thought that our author had dealt a little too severely with Mr Daniel le Clerc (o), and that this usage might justify reprisals, in which there was a pretty strong mixture of invective, as the reader will be informed, more at large, at the bottom of the page [P]. This attack from abroad, works, has contributed to make it still more generally known, and is so much the more valuable as it contains some additional corrections and explanations taken from his own notes upon the English original. We may the more boldly advance this, since within two years after the publication of our author's medical works at London, there came out a new edition at Paris (20), that in the title page was affirmed to be more accurate than correct; which could not have happened, if the demand for his writings had not been very great in consequence of his credit as a Physician, being thoroughly established in all parts of Europe, and of this some farther instances will necessarily occur in the succeeding note.

[P] At the bottom of the page.] We have observed in the foregoing note, that our author's History of Physic had not been long published in English, before it was translated into French, and this translation had no sooner seen the light, than the book was attacked in Holland by a famous journalist, who gave his censure the following title (21).

Réponse à ce qu'a écrit Mr Freind concernant diverses fautes, qu'il prétend avoir trouvées dans un petit ouvrage de Mr le Clerc, intitulé Essai d'un Plan, &c. That is, 'An answer to what Mr Freind has written concerning several faults that he pretends to have found in a little work of Mr le Clerc's, &c.'

These animadversions were written in defence of Dr Daniel le Clerc, the three former parts of whose History of Physic Dr Freind had highly extolled, but had spoken somewhat slightly of the supplement to that work published in the new edition of 1723, and represented it as not only a very imperfect and superficial performance, but in many particulars inaccurate and erroneous. The author of the Memoir in the Bibliothèque observes, that it will be no difficult matter to shew that Dr Freind had not a just idea of the piece which he so rashly condemns, but that he is mistaken in several points. For first he did not understand what Dr le Clerc's meaning was by these words, Essai d'un Plan pour servir à la Continuation de l'Histoire de la Médecine, which Dr Freind thought to be the same, as if Dr le Clerc had said, that that Plan was a Continuation or a Sequel of the History of Physic, whereas the author only meant it as a plan or rough draught, which might be of use to such as would undertake to bring that history down to the time which he has mentioned. The author of the Memoir proceeds then to vindicate Dr le Clerc from the particular exceptions of Dr Freind, and concludes with observing, that as the plan of the former contains but six or seven sheets, if it were true, that there are as many errors in it as the latter pretends, one might justly conclude, as Dr Freind has done, that it is a very imperfect, superficial, inaccurate, and erroneous performance. 'But I think, says the writer, that I have sufficiently demonstrated that nothing could be charged on Dr le Clerc with less reason, not to say more lightly, since, if there are faults they are few and inconsiderable. However, such as they are, if Dr Freind had contented himself with setting him right, he was at liberty to do it, but to endeavour, as he has done, to find errors where there are none, it is what one should not have expected, and what has occasioned this answer.'

It is a point of justice certainly due to the memory of Dr Freind, to examine what is here charged impartially, as in justice to the publick we could not omit the charge. Dr Daniel le Clerc, brother to the celebrated Mr John le Clerc, wrote, as has been said, a History of Physic, which was justly admired and applauded. This History reached no lower than the time of Galen, but upon publishing a new edition in 1723, there was a little piece added to it, which in the title page of that new edition is styled, un Plan pour servir à la Continuation de cette Histoire depuis la fin du Siècle II. jusques au milieu du XVII. That is, a Plan which may serve as a Continuation of that History, from the end of the second age to the middle of the seventeenth. It was after the perusal of this, that Dr Freind finding himself much disappointed, and having a strong idea in his mind of the usefulness of a proper continuation of so good a book, determined to employ the leisure he had in the Tower, for there it appears that he conceived the whole, and executed a part of his design in writing such a history in composing such a work. When he had taken this resolution, it was necessary for him to express it, more especially as he wrote to a particular friend, the present Dr Mead (22), and this he does in the following manner.

'Sir, you will forgive me, that I was a little impatient to see a new edition of Mr le Clerc's History of Physic, for you know very well what a great opinion I have always had of the learning and judgment which he has shewn in the three parts already published. In them he brought down the History to the end of Galen's time, and having searched into his works, and into those of all the writers, who preceded him for above six hundred years, he put together his memoirs, not only with indefatigable industry, but with exquisite skill. We find there very amply and clearly represented all the philosophy, the theory, and practice of the antient Physicians; so that there is scarce a notion, a distemper, a medicine, or even the name of an author to be met with among them, of which he has not given a full and exact account.'

'In this edition we have a plan containing fifty six pages, which he designs should serve for a continuation of the History down to the middle of the sixteenth, the title by mistake says the seventeenth Century, a space of twelve hundred years, and too large to be well explained, in so short a sketch, tho' he had not filled half of it, with relating all the obscure jargon and nonsense of that illiterate Enthusiast Paracelsus.'

'You desire that I would send you my thoughts of this piece, I must own I wish I could give it the same character which the former very justly deserved. But it seems to me not only a very imperfect and superficial performance, but in many particulars inaccurate and erroneous. I shall, in compliance with your commands, make a few cursory remarks touching the History of Physic within this period, but as I have not the opportunity of having much recourse to books, tho' indeed at present I have leisure enough, you must not expect any thing which is either correct or perfect, and must be satisfied only with some loose observations, such as my memory chiefly can at present furnish me with, and which a short review of some of these authors can suggest.'

The reader sees clearly that our author could not write without mentioning Dr le Clerc, and he sees also how he has treated him. What is said in the French Memoir of not understanding the title of Le Clerc's supplemental piece is weak enough; for if our author did not understand it, it must have been because it is not to be understood, for, an Essay, of a Plan, of a Supplement; cannot be made sense in any language. That Dr Freind did not consider it as a Supplement is plain, for if he had he would not have wrote another, neither did he conceive it a Plan, for then he would have followed it, but he tells us plainly what he took it for, and which is not a little strange, Mr John le Clerc confesses in his Memoir, that it was precisely what he calls it, an imperfect and superficial performance. Imperfect, as it does not come up to what it promises; and superficial, as it is not collected from original authors. We shall in the next note mention Dr Buillie's defence of our author, and therefore here we will confine ourselves to matters which he has not mentioned; in the first place it is observable, that the Memoir writer confesses that he never saw our abroad, on the character of Dr Freind, met with some countenance here from those who were piqued against him before, and who were in hopes, that, with the assistance of these auxiliaries from the Continent, they might be able to run him down; but, as in former combats, so in this, they were soon made sensible of their want of strength (p). It was defended in a pamphlet by Dr John Baillie (q), against the united forces both of the English and French critics; and the publick seemed to be perfectly satisfied with what was therein advanced, and with the contents of the author's book, which, with it's title, very plainly proved that some who censured it misapprehended his design, or at least wrote in such a manner as that he might be sensible they had other causes of resentment, than those that were avowed in the present quarrel [Q]. That severity which Dr Freind had met with, from those who differed, our author's original work, but took the matter of his charge from the Translation, which is the less excusable, since he well understood English, and it might be shewn that our author made use of milder terms than his translator. In the next place he states the matter a little unfairly, in not taking notice that Dr Freind justifies and commends le Clerc's observations in many places, tho' he differs from him in others, which plainly shews he had an esteem for that gentleman, tho' in respect to the study of Physic, he could not commend an imperfect and superficial work. Besides, there are various objections made by our author to Dr le Clerc's History, which are passed by in the Memoir without any notice at all; we may add to this, that sometimes disingenuity, and even falsehood, are called in to support one Doctor and to refute the other. This fact requires an instance; that instance shall be given; Dr Freind says, that the celebrated Fallopius lived later than le Clerc has placed him, because he published his Lectures in 1555 (23). The Memoir writer complains he does not understand this, for that Gabriel Fallopius died in 1562 (24). It is very true he did so, but the point is where Dr le Clerc placed him? He says positively that he was born in 1490, and the common complaint of all writers that mention him is, that he was cut off in the flower of his age, that is, when he wanted a year of forty. How then does his reading Lectures in 1555 agree with this date, or how was it possible that he should read those Lectures, if he died so young? The truth is, he was born in 1523 (25), that is, thirty three years after the time assigned by Dr le Clerc. What pretence therefore for calling either the meaning or the truth of Dr Freind's assertion in question? The proper business of a Journalist, is to acquaint the world with the contents and characters of new works, but the author of this Journal, instead of inserting an extract of a new and valuable book, inserts a Memoir against it, which was treating his readers very indifferently, as well as the English Physician very unfairly (26). Father Niceron (27) who was a very impartial judge, decides this matter very clearly. 'John le Clerc, says he, complained of the dissembling manner in which he has spoken of the Plan, which his brother Daniel le Clerc had given for the Continuation of his History of Physic. Freind proposed himself to give such a Continuation which he has very learnedly executed' No exceptions can be taken to this judgment, Father Niceron had seen the books, and heard the parties, with neither of whom he had any connection.

(f) The pamphlet was not rise near so high as before.

[Q] In the present quarrel] The title of the piece which we have mentioned in the text, and which is indeed a full answer to all that is said in the French Memoir, in the first edition runs at full length thus.

A Letter to Dr ——— in answer to a tract in the Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne, relating to some passages in Dr Freind's History of Physic. Lond. 1728. 8vo

Mr Baillie observes, that one would imagine upon viewing the number of pages in the piece abovementioned, Dr Freind had certainly been guilty of a great many mistakes, and that Mr le Clerc had been very grossly misrepresented. Yet upon looking into this critic, says he, we find nothing like this, and that, however vigorous in general he appears in Mr le Clerc's defence, he nevertheless acknowledges most of the errors alleged against him, and this not faintly, but in full as strong expressions as the Doctor himself uses. To give one instance of his manner of treating his antagonist, 'The Memoir writer, says he, goes on with his usual evasions in the dispute concerning the person who first introduced Chymistry into Physic. Mr le Clerc had affirmed in his Plan, that Avicenna was the person. The Doctor is of opinion if this practice be, as perhaps it may be derived, from the Arabians, the honour of the invention ought rather to be restored to Rhafes, because he wrote first, and first mentioned medicines made by a chymical process. This the answerer cannot avoid owning, and acknowledges that the oil of Bricks in Rhafes is a chymical medicine, and proposed by him as a cure in many distempers. This he confesses Mr le Clerc overlooked, when he said there was no mention of any chymical remedy in the writers of Physic, who lived before Avicenna. One would think that after saying so much, there was no way left of evading the force of Dr Freind's arguments. For the Doctor says nothing more upon this head against the plan, than this defender of it: but observe his usual way of chicanery; he goes on and says, that altho' Mr le Clerc be mistaken in this article, it does not from thence follow that the honour of the invention of chymical medicines belongs to Rhafes. I fancy you could not have guessed at his reason, had you not seen the piece itself, what tho' this Arabian writer does not pretend he invented or first discovered the manner of preparing the medicines he treats of? Is that any thing to the purpose? The dispute was not, who invented or who did not. The single question is, who is the first Arabick author who mentions a chymical medicine? Is there any one before Rhafes? If not, who knows but he did introduce it first, and perhaps invent it, at least it is a sufficient proof that Avicenna did neither. This instance amongst others may give you the reason, why I called this critic's piece the pretended defence of Mr le Clerc's Plan. For almost in every place he gives up Mr le Clerc, and seems fully satisfied if he can only cavil at the Doctor.' At the close of his pamphlet he tells us, that the defender of Dr le Clerc set out with the mighty appearance of running down every thing which was objected against the Plan, and yet in the issue yields up every thing. This certainly must appear a very burlesque defence to the greatest favourers of the Supplement. For what can be more ridiculous than to pretend he would defend an author, and yet in almost every instance to own he is in the wrong? To be convinced that he does this, you need do no more than call your eye back on the three principal points in dispute. Does he not acknowledge Mr le Clerc's error in the ages of Orbasias, Aetius, Alexander, and Paulus? And notwithstanding his sophistical subtleties, doth he deny that some of the Greeks mention Rhubarb contrary to Mr le Clerc's assertion? Nay, doth he not in express terms own it? After the same manner, doth he not confess that Rhafes first introduced Chymistry into Physic? And as to the age of Fallopius, he says Mr le Clerc is deceived in it. This gentleman however, acknowledges a mistake in Dr Freind in the spelling of Aetius with Æ instead of an a and an e separate, every one knows it is Aetius in the Greek, and yet very commonly it is writ with an Æ in Latin, as you may see in several books. So the island Aeria is very often writ Æria, though no doubt it is the Aeria of Stephanus. He believes the Doctor likewise to be mistaken, when he says that Dr le Clerc supposes the Pena Medarshi, the same as another distemper described by the Arabians, and called the Pena Bovina; and I dare say, continues he, the Doctor, upon considering the passage in the Supplement again, will own that these two distemdiffered, or supposed they differed, with him in political principles, was amply recompensed, soon after he obtained his liberty, by the favour he met with at the Court of the King now on the throne, then Prince of Wales, who entrusted him with the care of some of his Royal Family when indisposed, and who under it happily recovered (r). Upon his Majesty's accession, he became Physician to the late Queen, who honoured him with her confidence and esteem (s), which naturally increased the circle of his practice, that was of large extent before. How equal soever his talents might be to that prodigious weight of business which was thrown upon his shoulders, it quickly appeared that his constitution could by no means bear so great a fatigue; he struggled against it as much as he was able, he concealed his weakness, he was silent as to the decay of his strength; in short, he preferred his duty to his safety, and to the preservation of the health of others sacrificed his

' are there plainly distinguished. So far is true, and the Doctor's expressions are no doubt too general in this case, and, what I believe he is not very often guilty of, a little unguarded. But what he intended, I suppose, was chiefly this, to shew that even the Affectio Bovina, described at large by the Arabians, and in a separate article, was not a distemper unknown, as Mr le Clerc asserts, to the Greeks. For Aetius, as the Doctor remarks, mentions the little Dracunculi as well as the great, which latter the Arabians call the Vena Medinensis. And what Avenzoar, Alfaharavius, and Albucasis, say of the former, amounts to nothing more than what Aetius had in general and in short said before, that the worms in this case were little.' These concessions shew the candour and ingenuity of Dr Baillie, and they shew at the same time how little foundation there was for the clamour raised against our author, as if he had endeavoured to raise his own reputation by depressing that of Dr Daniel le Clerc; whereas he commends him highly and frequently, and corrects him only where it was requisite, and that too in a manner which ought not to have given any offence, more especially when it is considered, that the far greater part of his corrections are in the justification of writers long since deceased, and for whose memories Dr Freind thought himself obliged to shew a due concern.

We have now done with this little treatise, considered in the light of a defence, at least in regard to the French memoir; but there is a passage at the beginning of this performance, which, for the reader's satisfaction, it is necessary should be explained. That passage runs thus.

' Tho' the justness and truth of all Dr Freind's writings are sufficient to bear them out, yet there are many who have an appetite for nothing but answers and replies, and who entirely form their judgment of the author from his antagonist. These men very often read the answer, without ever having looked into the original, and as confidently determine, as if they had, with the utmost care and exactness, read it over and over. Were it not for this unaccountable and disingenuous turn in some readers, and a strange negligence and inadvertency in others, who, out of indolence or incapacity, seldom use their own judgment, but must have every thing minutely pointed out to them. I say, were it not for these two things, I must confess the following remarks would be entirely useless. For a careful reader, with but an ordinary understanding, by perusing the history, and annotator's criticisms, would quickly see the justness of the former's observations, and the fallacy of those in the latter. Yet I make no doubt, as inconsiderable a writer as this annotator is, his having attacked an author of reputation, will be reason sufficient to translate him into English, with a prolix preface, containing probably a tedious repetition of the critic's errors; for none but an author of a very low size would undertake such a work. And if such a notable performance should come out, we shall find it, I dare say, writ with so much wit, learning, and in so good language; with so much perspicuity, modesty, and manners, that it will not be at all difficult to guess at it's author, however his name should happen to be inverted.'

The first part of this paragraph explains very properly the causes which render these literary éclaircissements so necessary, or at least so acceptable. Let us proceed then to shew what is the true sense, and genuine meaning, of these obscure insinuations. Immediately after our author's book appeared, it was attacked with the utmost indignation, unallay'd with the smallest regard to temper or decency, in a piece which bore the following title.

Observations on Dr Freind's History of Physick, shewing some false Representations of antient and modern Physicians; by C. W. M. D. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh. London 1726, 8vo.

The very first paragraph will sufficiently support what has been before hinted, as to the heat of this author's resentment, abundantly discovered in the acrimony of his stile. ' Dr Freind's principal scheme in writing his History of Physick, says he, was to represent himself first, and after him Dr Mead, as the only Physicians at this time, in London especially. As for History, that is made subservient to the mentioned design; and indeed that part of the performance is very imperfect and superficial, he seeming now to corrupt the history of physick, and to abuse men by a corrupted history. Did I propose to examine the book, it might be made very manifest, that he was little acquainted with his authors, and less in what they excelled. His great unhappiness is most commonly to propose their errors, or their weakest performances, to our imitation; so that the mistake should not be great, if I affirmed that his end seems to be a banter on the antient as well as our own Physicians. All these his talents, will sufficiently appear in the following examination of that part of the book which at present falls under our consideration.' He proceeds afterwards to refute what Dr Freind had advanced, that the antient Physicians never had a nosstrum, or a secret medicine, and that a nosstrum is the peculiar and distinguished mark of a Quack; and affirms, that Physicians of every sect, both rational and empirics, had their nosstrums, and that from antient times down to this day; and, among the moderns, he particularly instances in Dr Cockburn, a most rational Physician, says he, who has always vindicated this antient practice, and has an Arcanum. The author defends likewise, Dr Cockburn's book concerning the gonorrhœa, and his tables of doses, in opposition to what Dr Freind had urged from Avenzoar, that it is vain and useless (28), ' to pretend to find out the proportionable quantity and quality of any purge, so as to square it exactly to the constitution of the patient, and the nature of the humours to be discharged; and calculate it so as not to be even a hair under or over, since such speculations contribute very little to form a judgment about any right method of cure.' Within a very short time after the publication of Dr Baillie's pamphlet, there came abroad another shrewd piece, under the following title.

An Answer to what Dr Freind has written in his History of Physick, concerning several mistakes which he pretends to have found in a short work of Dr le Clerc, intitled, An Essay of a Plan, &c. translated from the Eighth Article of the Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne. Vol. XXVII. Part ii. By Mr le Clerc. To which is added, a Preface by W. Cockburn, M. D.

Upon the whole it is manifest, that what Dr Baillie had in view, was to intimate to the publick, that the sending this translation into the world, was the mere effects of personal resentment; and that W. C. M. D. was the same person with C. W. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh; which is likewise agreeable to what we have hinted in the text of this article.

own (s). His health having been for some time on the decline, a fever at length ensued, which presently affected his head; and tho' in this, as well as in former illnesses, he had all the assistance that the Faculty could give, yet even that assistance proved vain; and the power of medicine being far inferior to the violence of the disease, he expired July the sixth 1728, in the fifty-second year of his age (u). Their Majesties expressed the greatest concern on the news of his illness, and appeared very much affected with that of his death. The pension settled upon his widow, sufficiently declared how large a share this worthy person had in the Royal esteem (w). He was buried in the church of Hitcham in Buckinghamshire, near which he had a seat; but there is a cenotaph erected, with a suitable inscription to his memory, in Westminster-Abbey (x) [R], a mark of filial piety in his only son, but of little consequence to his fame, which his writings have rendered extensive and immortal. Dr Wigan published his Latin works, and added to them his History of Physick, translated into the same language, with an excellent historical preface, and a grateful commemoration of his obligations to the deceased (y). To these, his medical works, a most elegant dedication is prefixed, to his Royal Patroness the late Queen, by his brother Dr Robert Freind (z); and if, after all these glorious monuments, this article should be esteemed

[R] To his memory in Westminster-Abbey. How little necessary soever a cenotaph, with an inscription, might be for preserving the memory of an author whose reputation extended so far, and was established so well; yet it must be allowed, that this was no improper, or unseasonable, testimony of respect to this excellent person. He had himself rendered the like kind office to more than one of his friends. The inscription on the monument erected to the memory of the famous Mr John Phillips, by the Lord Chancellor Harcourt, was penned by our author. That copious and elegant character of the Right Reverend Dr Thomas Sprat, Lord Bishop of Rochester, and his son the Archdeacon, appear, from what is said at the foot of the tomb-stone, to have fallen from the pen of Dr Freind, who was peculiarly happy in this kind of compositions. It may however be with truth affirmed, that the following lines are not at all inferior to his own, and consequently deserve to be remembered. They are conceived in the following terms, Johannes Freind, M. D.

Into ENGLISH it has been thus translated.

*John Freind, Doctor of Physic.
 First Physician
 To the most serene Queen Caroline.
 Whom when once her penetrating judgment had approved,
 His universal reputation in Physic,
 Was but equal to the favour expressed to him by the Royal Family.
 His disposition was benevolent and highly liberal,
 Towards his acquaintance affectionate,
 Of his Friendships
 (Even when attended with danger to himself)
 Most tenacious.
 None in respect to obligations
 Was on others more ready to confer,
 Or if received with a willing gratitude to remember.
 While a very youth distinguished by his writings.
 And from his assiduous diligence as well in Latin as in his mother tongue,
 His stile was perfectly polite.
 That eloquence which he cultivated in retirement,
 He had the courage as a Senator to display.
 The Belles Lettres at home and abroad claimed his attention,
 But, as was fit, his whole abilities were bent,
 To render him most expert in his profession.
 With how great success the whole English world
 Of every rank,
 With what various knowledge the learned in every nation,
 With what indefatigable study and industry
 His friends not without tears shall declare.
 Some wonder it may create,
 That continually occupied,
 And having so many avocations
 He should yet find time to write;
 That to sustain such burthen he should at length be unequal
 Is not to be wondered at all.
 He died therefore, in the flower of his age,
 When only in his fifty second year,
 July 26. A. D. 1728.*

But we must not imagine, that the praises of this great Physician were barely confined to his tombstone; on the contrary, the celebrated Dr Keil acknowledging, that, at his persuasion, the piece he published was sent to the press, makes him a compliment that can scarce be exceeded, and might possibly be regarded as a mere compliment, if the character of that worthy man did not set his sincerity above suspicion; his words are these, 'En editionem suadente, quem omnes & scribendi & docendi, Magistrum nostræ Gentis si non aliarum omnium, maximum libenter agnoscunt (29).' high praises were bestowed upon him in his life-time, from whence perhaps some objection might be made; but the force of that will be wholly taken away, when it is considered that the very ingenious and learned Dr Edward Wilmot, some years after his decease, spoke of him in the highest terms of commendation and respect, representing him as a deep Philosopher, a learned Physician, an elegant Writer, and an ornament to Society; as being very honest and very humane, ever desirous of doing good, and communicating knowledge to the utmost extent of his power; and a zealous defender of the rights of that learned Body before whom he spoke. The reader shall have his own words, as well as the sense of them, because a translation could not be made, without manifest injury to the beauty of the expression

We have already, moved by his merit, and conducted by his reputation, carried this article to an extraordinary length, which is sufficient to excuse our not adding the testimonies of foreign writers; but, that we may not be entirely defective in this point, let us observe, that his writings were admired, and the notions he advanced applauded, by the greatest men in the Profession throughout Europe; such as Hoffman, in Germany; Helvetius, and Hecquet, in France; and Boerhaave, in Holland (31); which abundantly demonstrates his abilities in his profession, and frees us from any apprehension that the praises given him by his countrymen and contemporaries, were tinged with the zeal of their personal friendships. This indeed, might be in them excusable, but not in us; for we do not cite authors as elegant panegyrists, but for their exquisite judgments, which, in this case, being corroborated by such disinterested, as well as such capable witnesses, we may be satisfied, that, in these endeavours to do justice to his memory, whose writings have been so useful to his profession, so honourable to his country, and so beneficial to mankind, we have done our duty as well as gratified our inclinations. FROBISER, FROBISHER, FROBUSHER, or FORBISHER (Sir MARTIN) [A], a most excellent navigator, and sea-officer in the XVIth century, was born near Doncaster in Yorkshire (a). Who were his parents, or in what year he was born, is not mentioned any where. But being brought up in his youth to Navigation, either through his own or his friends choice, he became one of the most eminent Sailors in his time: and was the first Englishman that attempted to find out a North-West passage to China. For, having a thorough knowledge of the sphere, and being extremely well skilled in his profession, he judged, from his own experience, and many years observations both by sea and land, that a Voyage that way was not only possible, but also most easily practicable. Having therefore well laid his design, he resolved to go and put it himself in execution; But wanting ships and other necessaries for that purpose, which he could not procure at his sole charge, he consulted a long time with his private friends how to have his wants supplied. He made also many offers to several English merchants, even for a course of Fifteen years; but meeting at last with no sufficient encouragement from them [B], he applied to Queen Elizabeth's Court, which, under her royal influence, promoted to the utmost the Trade and Navigation of England. And so, through the favour and countenance of her wise Ministers, particularly of Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, he engaged a sufficient number of Adventurers in the affair; and, by degrees, with no small expence and pains, collected such sums of money as enabled him to fit himself out for his voyage. The ships he provided, were only three; namely, two small Barks of about twenty-five tuns a-piece; named the Gabriel, and the Michael: the one commanded by himself, the other by Capt. Matthew Kinerley; and a pinnace of ten tuns burthen (b). June 8, 1576, they sailed from Deptford [C], and, bending their course Northward, came, came, the 24th of the same month, within sight of Fara, or Faire-isle, one of the islands of Shetland. Thence they cast about to the Westward, in 59 degrees of latitude; and the 11th of July, being in 61 degrees, discovered Freeisland bearing West-North-West, which stood high, and was all covered with snow [D]. Making towards it, they could not land, by reason of the ice, and depth of water, which, near the shore, was above 150 fathoms: The east point of this island the Captain named Queen Elizabeth's Foreland. On the 28th of the said month, in 62 degrees of latitude, they had sight of Meta Incognita (c), being part of New Groenland; towards which advancing, they endeavoured to find out a harbour, and to land, but could not for the reasons just now mentioned (d). August the 10th he went on a desert island, three miles from the continent; but stay'd there only a few hours. The next day, in latitude 63 degrees 8 minutes, he entered into a Streight, which he called, and that hath ever since borne the name of, Forbisher's Streight; and went as far as 60 leagues in it. On the 12th, sailing to Gabriel's-island, they came to a Sound, which they named Prior's-Sound, and anchored in a sandy bay there. The 15th they sailed to Prior's-bay: the 17th to Thomas Williams's island: and the 18th came to an anchor under Burber's island; where they went on shore, and had some communication with the natives [E]: but he was so unfortunate as to have five of his men, and a boat, taken by those barbarians. Having endeavoured in vain to recover them, he set again sail for England on the 26th of August; came within sight of Freeisland the 1st of September; and, notwithstanding a terrible storm on the 7th of the same month, he arrived safe at Harwich October the 2d (e). He took possession of the country in the Queen of England's name; and, in token of such possession, ordered his men to bring him whatever they could first find. One, among the rest, brought a piece of black stone, much like a sea-coal, but very weighty. Having, at his return, distributed fragments of it among his friends, one of the adventurer's wives threw a fragment into the fire; which being taken out again, and quenched in vinegar, glistered like gold; and being tried by some refiners in London, was found to contain a rich quantity of that metal (f). From this Essay, the Nation dreaming of nothing but mountains of gold, great numbers earnestly pressed, and soon fitted out, Capt. Frobisher to undertake a Second Voyage the very next Spring. The Queen lent him a ship of the royal navy, named the Aid, of 200 tun; and he had besides two small barks, of about 30 tuns a-piece: one named The Gabriel, and the other The Michael. His whole complement, of gentlemen, soldiers, and sailors, was about 140 [F], furnished with victuals, and all other necessaries for half a year (g). May 26, 1577, they fell down to Gravesend [G], and two days after came to Harwich, where Capt. Frobisher went on board; having been to take his leave of the Queen, who was then at the Earl of Warwick's seat in Essex. The Privy-Council having sent him orders, not to take in more men than the number appointed him, he discharged several to their great grief: And setting sail May 31, arrived in St Magnus Sound at the Orkney-islands June 7. After having taken there a few necessaries, they proceeded, June 8, on their voyage; and kept their course by their good mistress Queen Elizabeth, appears by this passage, out of the account of their voyage. 'We bare down by the Court [then at Greenwich] where we shotte off our ordinance, and made the best shew we coulde. Her Majestie beholding the same, commended it, and bade us farewell, with shaking her hand at us out of the window. Afterward shee sent a gentleman aboard of us, who declared that her Majestie had good liking of our doings, and thanked us for it, and also willed our Captaine to come the next day to the Court to take his leave of her. The same day towards night, Mr Secretarie Woolly came aboarde of us, and declared to the company, that her Majestie had appointed him to give them charge to be obedient, and diligent to their Captaine, and governours in all things, and wished us happie successe (2).'

[D] And was all covered with snow.] George Best, who writ an account of this voyage, affirms, that Captain Frobisher, 'not far from hence, lost company of his small pinnace; which he supposed, in a great storm, to be swallowed up by the sea, but lost in it only four men. Also that the other burk, named the Michael, conveyed themselves away privately from him, and returned home, with a strong report that he was cast away.' Notwithstanding these discouragements, and tho' his mast was sprung, and his top-mast blown over board with extreme foul weather, he continued his course (3).— But the other relation of the same voyage, written by Christopher Hall, Master of the Gabriel, mentions no such thing (4).

[E] And had some communication with the natives.] They were like the Tartars, or Samoeds, with long black hair, broad faces, flat noses, and tawny: the garments both of men and women were made of sealskins, and did not differ in fashion. But the women were marked in the face with blue streaks, down the cheeks, and round the eyes. Their boats were made of seals-skins, with a keel of wood within the skins; flat at bottom, and sharp at both ends (5). They appeared, by several circumstances, to be a dispersed and wandring nation, living in hords and troops, without any certain place of abode (6).

[F] His whole complement of gentlemen, soldiers, and sailors was about 140] Those on board the Aid, officers and gentlemen were, Martin Frobisher, General of the whole company for her Majesty; George Best, Lieutenant; Richard Philpot, Ensign; Francis Forder, Corporal of the Shot; Christopher Hall, Master; Charles Jackman, Mate; Andrew Dier, Pilot; Richard Cox, Master-gunner. Together with these gentlemen, Henry Carew, Edmund Stafford, John Lee, M. Harvie, Matthew and Robert Kinerley, Abraham Lins, Francis Brakenbury, William Arnshaw.—The chief on board the Gabriel; Captain Edward Fenton, a gentleman of the Earl of Warwick's; William Fansfield, Gent; William Smyth, Master.—On board the Michael; Captain Gilbert Yorke, a gentleman of the Lord Admiral's; Thomas Chamberlaine, Gent; James Beare, Master (7).

[G] May 26, 1577, they fell down to Gravesend.] And there performed an act of religion, not so frequent as it ought to be among men of their profession, exposed to so many perils: of which he pleased to take an account in the words, of their journal. 'On Monday morning the 27th of May, aboard the Ayde we received all the Communion by the Minister of Gravesend, and prepared us as good Christians towards God, and resolute men for all fortunes (8).'

course West-North-West, for the space of 26 days, without sight of any land [H]. At length, on the 4th of July being in the latitude of 60 degrees and a half, they discovered Freeseland; along the coast of which they found islands of ice of incredible bigness [I]. Not having been able safely to land in this place, they proceeded for Forbisher's Streights, and, on the 17th of the said month, made the North-Foreland in them, otherwise named Hall's island (b); as also a smaller isle of the same name, where they had, in their last voyage, found the ore, but could not get now a piece so big as a walnut. However, they met with good quantity of it in other adjacent islands. On the 19th they went upon Hall's greater island, to discover the country, and the nature of the inhabitants; with some of whom they traffick'd [K], and took one of them, neither in a very just nor handsome manner: And upon a Hill here, they erected a Column of Stones, which they called Mount Warwick. The 21st they discovered a Bay into which they anchored, and named it Jackman's Sound, from the Master's mate, who first lik'd the place. Upon a small island within it, called Smith's island (from one of that name who first set up his forge there), they found mines, both of silver and gold; but not sufficient, it seems, to merit their attention [L]. As they went along these streights, they landed on both sides, namely July 23d on the South side [M], and the 26th on the North side, without meeting any thing very remarkable. One of the Bays they anchored in, was named by them Beare's Sound, from James Beare Master of the Michael; and an island in it, Leicester's isle, in honour of Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester. Another bay received the appellation of Yorke's Sound, from Gilbert Yorke Captain of the Michael; under whose conduct, a party landing in an island there, had a bloody conflict with some of the natives, five or six of which they killed, and brought away a woman with her child [N]. Further up, they named

(b) He was master of the Gabriel, in the former voyage. Hakluyt, ubi supra, p. 63.

[H] Without sight of any land.] But they met great drifts of wood, and whole bodies of trees: which were either blown off the cliffs of the nearest lands, by violent storms; or rooted up, and carried by floods into the sea. They imagined, that they were brought from some part of the Newfoundland, with the current that setteth from the West to the East (9).

(9) Hakluyt, ubi supra, p. 33, 61.

[I] Along the coast of which they found islands of ice of incredible bigness.] Some were seventy or eighty fathoms under water, besides the part that stood above water; and more than half a mile in circuit. Upon tasting the ice of which they consisted, it was found quite fresh without brackishness. From whence they concluded, that those islands were bred, in the sounds or bays adjoining, either from melted snow, or fresh rivers, and driven with the wind and tide along the coasts. For, as to their proceeding from the supposed Mare Glaciale, or frozen sea; that they looked upon as absurd (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 62.

[K] With some of whom they trafficked.] Their manner of trafficking was thus: two on each side met, without weapons, at a good distance from the rest of their company. And then laying down upon the ground what they could or chose to part withal, they retired a little. If the savages liked what the others had set down, they took it, leaving their own goods in exchange: but if they did not like what was put down, they took up again their own wares, and marched away (11).

(11) Ibid. p. 63.

[L] But not sufficient, it seems, to merit their attention.] Upon another island near, they found a Sea-Unicorn dead, about twelve foot long, and of a proportionable bigness; having a horn two yards long growing out of its snout, which they brought home, and is still kept at Windfor (12).

And Supplement at the end of Sir John Narborough's, &c. Voyages, p. 190.

[M] Namely, July 23, on the South side.] What they did there, I shall relate in their own words. Our General commanding a trumpet to sound a call for every man to repair to the ensign, he declared to the whole company [being about seventy in number] how much the cause imported for the service of her Majesty, our country, our credits, and the safety of our own lives; and therefore required every man to be conformable to order, and to be directed by those he should assigne. And he appointed for leaders, Captaine Fenton, Captaine Yorke, and his Lieutenant George Beste: which done, we cast ourselves into a ring, and all together upon our knees, gave God humble thanks for that it had pleased him of his great goodness to preserve us from such imminent dangers, beseeching likewise the assistance of his holy spirit, so to deliver us in safety into our country, whereby the light and truth of these secrets being known, it might redound to the more honour of his holy name, and consequently to the advancement of our Commonwealth. And so, in as good sort as the place suffered, we marched towards the tops of the mountains, which were no lesse painfull in climbing then dangerous in descending, by reason of their steepness and yce. And having passed about five miles, by such unwieldy wayes, we returned unto our ships without sight of any people, or likelihood of habitation (13).

(13) Hakluyt, p. 65.

[N] Five of which they killed, and brought away a woman with her child.] It is manifest from our people's own account, that they were the aggressors, and attacked the poor savages in their boats: a strange way of endeavouring to civilize those people! It might be said, by way of excuse, that it was done as a kind of retaliation for their taking the five English, the year before: but this excuse cannot hold good, unless it had been quite certain, that the persons thus attacked were the very same that had taken those five prisoners.—The woman they took, was encumbered with a child, which prevented her escape. And, in shooting at her, they wounded the child in one arm; to cure which the English chirurgeon applied salves. But the mother, not acquainted with such kind of surgery, plucked off the plaister; and by continual licking of the wound with her tongue, healed the child's arm (14).—Having now a woman for the man they had taken before, they brought them together; and extreme was their surprize, and strange their gestures and behaviour, at their first meeting. They stared a while at each other, without speaking a word; tho' great and visible was the change in their colour and countenance all the while. At last, the woman suddenly turned away, and fell a finging as if she had minded something else, seeming to disdain or not regard the man. But being brought together again, the man broke silence first, and with a stern and stayed countenance began a long story, which the woman attentively listened to, without interrupting him. Afterwards being grown better acquainted by conversing together, they seemed not to be easy without each other's company. But tho' she would do all kind and friendly offices for him, as a good housewife yet they never knew one another as man and wife; [having undoubtedly left some behind, in that relation to each other, when they were taken] And so extremely strict and remarkable was their bashfulness and modesty, that they could not bear to appear naked in each other's presence, or any one's else: and their continence very much surpassed that of multitudes of Christians, and others so in name, who pretend to more politeness and knowledge, but really have much less virtue and morality, than those honest heathens (15).

[O] And

named another bay, with an island, Anne Countess of Warwick's Sound, and Island. And this was the furthest place they went, this year, within those Streights [O]; being only about 30 leagues (i). For, the Captain's commission directed him, in this voyage, only to search for ore, and to leave the further discovery of the North-West passage till another time (k). Having therefore, in the island last mentioned, found a good quantity of ore, he took a lading of it; intending, the first opportunity, to return home. But, before that, he would fain have recovered the five men he lost the foregoing year; for which purpose he landed in several adjacent places [P], and used all possible and imaginable means, tho' still in vain (l). So, despairing of ever seeing them again, they set sail on the 23d of August; and, tho' very much tossed and separated by storms, all safely arrived in England, about the end of September, the Aid at Milford-haven, the Gabriel at Bristol, and the Michael at Yarmouth. In this voyage they lost only two men; the Master of the Gabriel, who was washed over-board; and one who died at sea, being ill when he went out (m). Capt. Frobisher was most graciously received by the Queen, whose singular pleasure and glory it was, to extend the English name and trade to the furthest parts of the habitable world. And, as the gold ore he brought had an appearance and shew of great riches and profit; and the hopes of a North-West passage to China were greatly increased by this second voyage, the Queen appointed Commissioners to make trial of the ore, and examine thoroughly into the whole affair. Also the new-discovered country not being known by any particular name, her Majesty named it Meta Incognita (n). The Commissioners, after sufficient proof of the ore, and examination of every circumstance, reported, How great was the value of the undertaking; and the expediency of further carrying on the discovery of the North-West passage. Whereupon suitable preparations were made, with all possible dispatch. And, because the mines newly found out were sufficient to answer all Adventurers charges, it was thought necessary to send a select number of soldiers, and other proper persons, to secure the places already discovered, to make further discoveries in the inland parts, and to search again for the passage to Cathay. As they were to be left behind, a strong Fort of timber was framed to be set up at their landing, in order to protect them from the injuries of the weather, and defend them against all attacks of the natives. The adventurers which willingly offered, and were appointed, to stay in that cold and desert country all the year round, were 100 in number; whereof 40 were mariners for the use of the ships, 30 miners to dig the ore, and 30 soldiers to guard the whole company, in which last number were included the gentlemen, refiners, bakers, carpenters, and other useful persons. Their leaders were Capt. Edward Fenton, Lieutenant-general to Admiral Frobisher, Capt Best, and Capt. Philpot. To each of these Captains was assigned one ship; as well for the better searching of the coast and country; as to bring them back again to England, if they should be driven by necessity, or disappointed of a fleet's coming the next year. Besides these three ships, twelve others were fitted out for this voyage [Q], which were to return in the end of the Summer, with a lading of gold ore (o). They assembled at Harwich the 27th of May, from whence they departed the 31st of the same month, and sailing Westward through the English channel, arrived, June 6, at Cape Clear in Ireland. Then they bent their course Northward [R], and in fourteen days came within sight of West Freeland, where the General went on shore, and taking possession of the country in the Queen of England's name, named it West England; and one high cliff therein, Charing-Cross. June the 23d they made for Frobisher's-streights, and on the [O] And this was the furthest place they went this year, within those streights. They observed, among other things, that in the narrowest parts, they were nine leagues broad at the least (16).

[P] For which purpose he landed in several adjacent places. Upon the main land over against the Countess's island, they observed with astonishment the caves or winter-habitations of the natives. They were two fathoms under ground, round like an oven, and had a communication with each other. That the water falling from the hills above might not annoy them, there were proper trenches made deep under them, to carry off the water. And generally they were seated at the foot of a hill, in order to be secured from the piercing cold winds; for which reason also, the door or entrance into them was always towards the South. From the ground upward they were built with whales bones, for want of timber, which bending one over another, were handsomly compassed together at the top; and covered with seals skins, instead of tiles that are unknown in that country. Each of these houses consisted only of one room, and half of the floor was raised with broad stones a foot higher than the rest; upon which strewing moss, the poor inhabitants laid themselves down to rest (17).

[Q] Besides these three ships, twelve others were fitted out for this voyage The names of all the ships, and of their Captains, were, the Aid, being the Admiral-ship, in which was the General Capt. Frobisher; the Thomas Allen, Vice-Admiral, Capt. Yorke; the Judith, Lieutenant-general, Capt. Fenton; the Anne Francis, Capt. Best; the Hopewell, Capt. Carew; the Beare, Capt. Philpot; the Thomas of Ipswich, Capt. Tanfield; the Emmanuel of Exeter, Capt. Courtney; the Francis of Fowey, Capt. Moyles; the Moone, Capt. Upcot; the Emmanuel of Bridgewater, Capt. Newton; the Solomon [or Salamander] of Weymouth, Capt. Randal; the Bark Dennis, Capt. Kendal; the Gabriel, Capt. Harvey; the Michael, Capt. Kinesley (18).

[R] Then they bent their course northward. As they were sailing towards the Northwest parts from Ireland, they met with a great current from the Southwest, which carried them one point to the Northeastward of their course. And it seemed to continue towards Norway, and other North east parts of the world; which made them believe it to be the same, the Portuguese had observed at the Cape of Good Hope. That, in their opinion, being obstructed in its western course by the narrowness of the streights of Magellan, ran along into the Bay of Mexico, where also meeting another obstruction from the land, it was forced to strike back towards the North-east (19).

the 2d of July came within the mouth of them; but being obstructed by the ice (which sunk the Bark Dennis) [S], and driven out to sea by a violent storm, they were so unfortunate as not to hit the entrance into them again. For, instead thereof, being deceived by a swift current from the North East, which had dragged them many miles more South-Westward than was thought possible, and remaining twenty days in a continual fog, they ran above sixty leagues into Streights hitherto unknown [T], before they were sensible of their mistake. However, coming back again, the Admiral made for the real Streights that bore his name; and, on the 23d of July, at a place within them called Hatton's headland, found seven ships of his fleet, by which he was heartily welcomed. At length, on the 31st of the same month, after many difficulties, he recovered his long desired port, and came to anchor in the Countess of Warwick's sound (p). But the season of the year was so far advanced, that he could not pretend to undertake any new discoveries during this voyage; and part of the wooden Fort being lost, a Council which was called, did not think it adviseable to leave those persons behind, that were carried on purpose to winter in that desolate country [U]. So all that remained to do, was to get as much ore as they possibly could; which they did in great quantities, particularly out of a new place, named by them the Countess of Suffex's mine (q). Whilst the ships were loading, General Forbisher having an extreme desire of making some further Discovery, went higher up the Streights in a pinnace; and found, that by Beare's sound and Hall's island the land was not firm, as he imagined, but all broken islands, in form of an Archipelago. At the same time, the masons were employed in building a house of lime and stone upon the Countess of Warwick's island; by way of trial, to see what effect the frost and snow would have upon it against the next Season, or whether the natives would take it to pieces. And to allure them to civility against other times of their coming, they left in the house, bells, knives, looking-glasses, pictures of men and women in lead, whistles, and such other toys as they knew them to be delighted with. They made also an oven in the house, and left bread baked, for them to see and taste. The timber of their intended fort, they buried; and sowed pease, corn, and other grain, to try what the soil would produce against their coming again. On the last day of August, and the day following, the whole fleet set sail from the Countess of Warwick's Sound; and, after a stormy and very dangerous passage, arrived safely in England, about the beginning of October. The Emmanuel of Bridgewater being left behind the rest, in great danger of never getting out of the ice, was forced to seek a way Northward, beyond Beare's sound, through an unknown channel full of rocks, into the North-Sea, upon the back of Frobisher's Streights [W]. And, in her passage home, to the South-East of Freeseland, discovered a great Island in the latitude of 57 degrees and a half, which was never found before; along the coast of which they sailed for three days, the land seeming to be fruitful, full of woods, and a champain country. In all this voyage, there died not above forty persons in the whole fleet: a small number, considering the extreme hardships and the variety of fortunes they underwent (r)! We can find no account, how Capt. Forbisher employed himself from this time till the year 1585, when he commanded the Aid, in Sir Francis Drake's Expedition to the West-Indies; which was attended with the glorious success of taking and sacking St Domingo in Hispaniola, Carthagena on the continent, and Santa Justina in Florida, three towns of great importance (s) [X]. In 1588, he bravely exerted himself in the defence

[T] They ran above sixty leagues into Streights hitherto unknown. These were the Streights between the Isle Desolation, and another Isle south of the same. Such as sailed furthest into them, met with the outlet or passage leading into Forbisher's Streights. And some had sight of a supposed continent on their left hand, but could make no part of it exactly; except certain islands in the entrance thereof. That whole track of land seemed to be more fruitful, and better stored with deer, foxes, hares, and all kind of fowl, than any part they had yet discovered, and more populous (21).

(21) Ibid. p. 81.

[U] That were carried on purpose to winter in that desolate country. The chief reasons against their staying, were these. Upon perusing the bills of lading, it was found, that only the East and South sides of the Fort were arrived, and those not entire; for many pieces had been used by some of the ships when they were distressed by the ice, and broken or lost. Then, there was not a sufficient quantity of drink and fuel for the number of persons that were to be left. And upon enquiring of the Carpenters and Masons, what time it would take up to erect a house only for sixty men; they replied, eight or nine weeks, if there were timber sufficient. Whereas now there were but six and twenty days in all, they could stay in that miserable cold country. For these reasons, the design was absolutely laid aside, at least for this year (22).

(22) Ibid. p. 86.

[W] Upon the back of Forbisher's Streights. The General himself had gone into this passage with his pinnace; and some of his company discovered therein (as they affirmed) a large foreland; from whence they imagined here was a great probability of the widest passage towards the South-Sea (23). But time has shewn that they were mistaken.—For a further account of the attempts made since to discover the North-west passage, see what was published upon that subject by Arthur Dobbs, Esq; Capt. C. Middleton, in 1743. and 1744. and Capt. Ellis, in 1746, and 1747.

[X] Three towns of great importance. This fleet, (as Sir William Monson observes,) was the greatest of any nation but the Spaniards, that had been ever seen in those seas from the first discovery of them (24); and if it had been as well considered of before their going from home, as it was happily performed by the valour of the undertakers, it had more annoyed the King of Spain than all other actions that ensued during the time of the war.—For had we kept and defended those places, when in our possession, and provided to have been relieved and succoured out of England, we had diverted the war from this part of Europe; and with more ease inroaded upon the rest of the Indies, than the King of Spain could have aided or succoured them (25).

fence of his country against the Spanish Armada; commanding then the Triumph, one of the three largest ships in that service, and which had on board the greatest number of men of any in the whole English fleet (r). On the 26th of July, he received the honour of Knighthood, from the hand of the Lord High-Admiral, at sea, on board his own ship the Ark, amongst four others of the gallantest officers (u); for a reward, and encouragement, of their most distinguished and unparallel'd valour (w). And when, after this signal victory, Queen Elizabeth thought it necessary to keep a fleet on the Spanish coast, as well to hinder the fresh preparations King Philip might make against her, as to intercept his flota's from America, Sir Martin was employed in that service; particularly in 1590, when he commanded a squadron, as Sir John Hawkins did another: But tho' they alarmed the coasts of Spain, and ranged as far as Tercera (x), they had not so good success in making of prizes; as in 1592, when two ships of good value were taken by Sir Martin, and a rich carack by another part of his squadron (y). In 1594, he was sent with four men of war (z) to the assistance of Henry IV, King of France, against a body of the Leaguers and Spaniards then in possession of part of Bretagne, which had fortified themselves very strongly at Croyzon near Brest. But in an assault upon that fort, on the 7th of November, Sir Martin unfortunately was wounded with a ball in the hip, or side, of which he died [Y] soon after he had safely brought back the fleet to Plymouth (a); and was buried in that town (b). Some accuse him, of having been harsh and violent (c); but he is universally allowed, to have been a man of great and undaunted courage, and inferior to none of his age in Experience and Conduct, or the reputation of a brave Commander (d).

FULLER (THOMAS), an eminent Divine and Historian in the reigns of King Charles the First and Second; was the son of the Rev. Mr Thomas Fuller, Minister of St Peter's, in the town of Alwinckle, or Oldwinckle (a), near Oundel in Northamptonshire; who being presented to that benefice by William Cecil, Earl of Exeter, as may be gathered from our author's account in the same place, did, by the painful discharge of his pastoral office, and peaceful evasion of those disputes and controversies, so frequent in his time between the Puritans and Papists, acquit himself there with general satisfaction; and was in good esteem among the most eminent Literati in those parts, particularly Sir Robert Cotton; who once told him, he had met with a true Plantagenet at plough (*). In that town (which is some five miles distant from) and not in Oundel, as David Lloyd mistakes (b), his said son, Thomas, was born in the year 1608 (c). His mother was sister to Dr John Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury; as from his own, and other writings, may be gathered [A]: and that town was many years reckoned most notable for being the birth-place of this Historian; as it was afterwards, for giving his first breath also to Mr Dryden, the famous Poet. His pregnant parts were so ripened, under his father's tuition, for the University, when he was not above twelve years of age, that he was then sent, in 1620, to Queen's College in Cambridge (d), where his father had been, it seems, himself educated; and here, under the care and government of his uncle Dr Davenant, then Master of that College, and soon after Bishop, as aforesaid, he made such extraordinary progress in his learning, that he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1624, and that of Master in 1628 (e), with general approbation, and at such an unusual age, that it is observed the like early commencement had not been within memory. About the end of those first eight years education, which he received in this University, at that College (f) there became a Fellowship vacant, for which he stood candidate; and he had a double prospect of succeeding, by merit as well as interest, besides the inclinations of the whole House; but grants that, 'corruption was too common in this kind; yet were there, besides them, many worthy Bishops raised by their deserts, without any simoniacal compliances (2).' Now, to that notice which our author here takes of his said uncles, if we join what Anthony Wood says of them, 'that the former, Dr Robert Townson, dying 15 May 1621, left fifteen children by his wife Margaret; and that the latter, Dr John Davenant, who died 20 of April 1641, was enjoined by King James not to take a wife (3). we may conclude that, the said Margaret, whom the former married, was sister to Mrs Fuller our author's mother; and that the latter, who probably never was married, was Mrs Fuller's own brother, and consequently that the maiden name of both the sisters was Davenant. Of his said uncle Davenant, he has more than once spoken elsewhere (4).

[A] As from his own writings and others may be gathered ] Sir Anthony Welden informs us, that, among the Ecclesiastics in King James his reign, 'some worthy men were preferred gratis, to blow up the fame of Backingham, and his party; as Dr Townson, who paid nothing in fine or pension; and after him, Davenant in the same Bishoprick; yet, that these were but as music before every hound (1). Whereupon our author Dr Fuller makes this reflexion: 'Tho' both these persons here praised, were my god-fathers, and uncles; the one marrying the sister of, the other being brother to, my mother: yet it does not tempt me to accept his praises, upon such invidious terms; knowing, those Bishops, if alive, would condemn such uncharitable commendations, which are, if not founded on, accompanied with, the disgrace of others of their order: and tho' he

all their hopes were frustrated by the College statutes, which, prohibiting the admittance of two Fellows from the said county of Northampton, he relinquished his pretensions there- to, tho' he knew that a dispensation could have been procured for him; so unwilling to obtain that preferment was he, by setting others such a precedent of irregularity (g). Thereupon, thro' the invitation of some learned friends, he transplanted himself in, or a little later than, the year last mentioned, to Sidney College in the same University (*). Here he was pupil under Dr Samuel Ward, Master thereof, and Margaret Professor for above twenty-years (h). His private studies, at this time, were chiefly Divine Poetry; and the first specimen of it, that we find in print, was about three years after published [B]. In that College he had not been long settled, before he was chosen Minister of St Bennet's parish, in the town of Cambridge; in which church he offered the first fruits of his pastoral office; and here, by the most sublime Divinity, in the most ravishing elegancies, says my author, he attracted the audience of the University (i), and became a very popular preacher, at those years when others are scarce publickly known. Being now arrived to the age of twenty-three (k), his extraordinary qualifications tendered him the Prebendship, in Salisbury Cathedral, of Netherbury in Ecclesia, to which he was collated upon the decease of Dr John Rawlinson, on the 18th of June 1631 (l), and at the same time a Fellowship in Sidney College; whereupon he retired from the University, and betook himself to his priestly function, being thereunto ordained by Bishop Davenant. And that Prebend was a commodious step to another preferment more profitable, in the same diocese; being soon after inducted to the Rectory of Broad-Winsor, in Dorsetshire; of which he mentions himself to have been once Minister (m), and, upon his advancement to this Benefice, he seems to date, in one place, the discontinuance of his living at Cambridge, about 1634 (n). After he had here exercised for some time his ministerial charge, he was persuaded by some friends to dignify his desert, with the degrees which his time and standing in the University allowed him. Accordingly, he returned to Cambridge, was gladly received, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1635 (o); and this commencement, thro' the extension

[B] The first specimen of his DIVINE POETRY in print, was about three years after published. The first performance of our author that has appeared to us in print, being a Divine Poem, very rare to be met with, and having had no description given of it, the following account may not be unacceptable to the curious. It is entitled, DAVID's Hainous Sin, Heartie Repentance, and Heavie Punishment. By THOMAS FULLER, Master of Arts, of Sidney College in Cambridge. London, printed by T. Coates, &c. in a thin 8vo. 1631. 'Tis dedicated in verse, To the Honourable Mr William and Mr Christopher Montagu, sons of the Right Honourable Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton. The whole three parts, consist of 144 stanzas, of seven lines each; four alternate, and a triple in base. A critical reader of poetry might find matters of remark in it; either to commend in some agreeable descriptions, natural similies, and instructive reflections; or to censure in some few parts of the style, which were fashionable elegancies in those times: but in the whole, promising that, had he persevered in the study and culture of poetry, his genius might have advanced him to some considerable rank among those contemporaries, who were then favourites of the Muses. His good sense and ingenuity at that age, is distinguishable enough; his versification is more compact or limited, and usually flows with smoother cadence, than that of some riper wits of great name in those days. Among other observable parts, the very proposition and invocation are very comprehensive, solemn, and regular: the persuasions of David by the Spirit, and the Flesh; with the description of Uriah's drunkenness are very natural: the obsequious offer of the Elements to destroy David upon his transgression, and after his restitution, to relieve and cherish him, are somewhat Picturesque, and touching upon Spenser's imagery in miniature: his comparison of those variable Elements upon this occasion, to temporising Courtiers, who will fawn upon a Minister, when he is restored to favour, as fast as they flouted him in disgrace, looks to have something in it perfectly alive; and so does that figure, wherein we may imagine that we see Abolom cringing, with supple neck and knees about the Court, to gather up what alms and fragments he could of popular favour and interest, by seizing upon one man's hand, to steal away his heart; and sucking out the soul of another with deceitful kisses; enquiring the name of this, the business of that, and the country of t'other, to serve them all! prostituting his promises, and enslaving himself, to errant slaves: in whom also we have a further glimpse of pride itself, groveling to be exalted to grandure, and exercising all the abject spirit of the most beggarly poor, to worm itself into riches: Or as our author words it,

Proud men are base, to compass their desire;
They lowest crouch, that highest do aspire.

But this is a picture not near so agreeable as that of plain-dealing Nathan, in his state of moderation; the knowing and communicative, the kind and compassionate Nathan; who being skilled in lancing a fester'd soul, in searching and tenting the sore, and stanching a bleeding-hearted finner; would heal his wounds with the sovereign balsam of counsel, or bind up the disjointed members of his troubled mind. He was neither oppressed with that plenty which made him envied; nor distressed with that penury which made him despised: his pursuits were circumscribed to his possessions; and as he was in no needful want, he thought wanton need most despicable; or that want in sufficiency was the true mother of contempt: so, as his desires were planted within the most temperate situation of command, they produced the sweetest fruits of content: for, as our Poet says,

High hills are parch'd with heat, or hid with snow,
And humble dales, soon drown'd, that lie too low;
Whilst happy grain, on hanging hills doth grow.

Descriptions more flowery might be hither transplanted; such as are so gently strewed over David's child in death, and others; but as his gravity in this poem prevails above the natural gaiety of his genius, we have chosen in this historical work, to instance those few particulars, which are rather in the edifying and profitable, than to hunt after such as may run into a more pleasing and poetical vein. At the close of this performance, our author having subsided into the characters of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles I. and lamented the loss of the Duke of Brunswick, with the discords then in Europe, thro' the wars in the Netherlands, Denmark, &c. he very properly and piously concludes, that those grievances may be bewailed by mankind, but till they are redressed by Providence, they are more besitting his prayers than his pen.

[C] His

of a liberal disposition, agreeable to that of his literary affluence, cost him seven score pounds (p). It seems, according to his own reckoning, that he did not account himself totally removed, or departed from Sidney College, before 1636; because he also gratefully acknowledges this to have been his mother, for his eight last years in this university (q). After his return into Dorsetshire, and during his recess in that Rectory, he applied himself to compleat some other of the books he had begun at Cambridge: And there, about the year 1638, or not long before, he was married to a virtuous young gentlewoman; it being when the nation was alarmed with the news of the tumults then begun in Scotland (r). By her he had one son, named John, who was brought up a Student at the same University and College in which his father had been: And she was delivered of him, much about the time that her husband brought forth his History of the Holy War, which is dated in the latter end of 1639, tho' not published, it seems, till the next year [C]; soon after which, and but a short time before the eruption of the civil wars, she died (s). Then, for the greater convenience of enjoying more readily, and in larger choice or variety, the works and conversation of the learned, he removed to London, where his conspicuous talents in the pulpit were soon admired by the distinguishing part of his auditory; being cry'd up for one of the most excellent preachers of his age (t), but more especially in the Inns of Court. However, he was soon after drawn to settle a little nearer the Royal Court, and chosen Lecturer of the Savoy in the Strand, by the Master and Brotherhood thereof, at the intreaty of some principal parishioners. Here he gave such general satisfaction, became so famous, and was thronged with such distant congregations, that those of his own cure were in a manner excommunicated from their own church, if they came not early enough to fill it, which, without conforming to his own habitual temperance, they could seldom do: tho' he had an audience without, and another within the pale, the windows and sextonry were so crowded, as if bees had swarmed to his mellifluous discourse (u). On the thirteenth of April 1640, a Parliament was called, and then also a Convocation began at Westminster, in King Henry the Seventh's chapel, having licence granted to make new Canons for the better government of the Church. Of this Convocation our author was a Member;

[C] His History of the HOLY WAR, dated in 1639, &c. It is dated at the end of his epistle dedicatory, from his Rectory at Broad Winfor on the sixth of March that year: and as no other date appears in the graved frontispiece, it is mentioned as printed that year in some catalogues; but was not, it seems, before the next. It was well received by the publick, and has passed at least three editions; the last is entitled as the former likely are—The History of the Holy War: by Thomas Fuller, B. D. Prebendary of Sarum late of Sidney College, Cambridge, printed there by Roger Daniel, &c. the third edition, fol. 1647: to which is also prefixed the said graved frontispiece, containing the portraits of Godfrey of Bulloign, and of Saladin, in small ovals at top; and underneath a view of all ages, sexes, and degrees of people, flocking to the said wars, &c. with an explanation in the page before the same, in verse by J. C. The History is divided into five books, has a map before it of Palestine, and three tables at the end; the one chronological, another of authors cited, and the third of contents. The beginning of this war is reckoned to have been about the year 1096, and the end about 1291 (5). The author's ingenious dedication of this history is, To Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton, and John Lord Powlet of Hinton St George: to whom he recommends, 'If they fear to hurt their hands with thorny school-questions, the turning over of History, as a velvet study and recreation work. What a pity is it, says he, to see a proper gentleman have such a crick in his neck, that he cannot look backward! yet no better is he, who cannot see behind him, the actions which long since were performed. History maketh the young man old, without either wrinkles or gray hairs; privileging him with the experience of age, without either the infirmities or inconveniences thereof: yea, it not only makes things pass, present; but enables one to make a rational conjecture of things to come. For the world affordeth no new accidents, but in the same sense, wherein we call it a new moon; which is the old one in another shape; and yet no other than what hath been formerly, &c.' Then, lest some critick should condemn him for an ill husband, in lavishing two noble patrons upon one book; whereas one of them might have served to patronize many volumes, he says, 'He did it in the weak expression of his thankfulness to them; being deeply indebted to them both; and thought it dishonestly to pay all to one creditor, and none to another; therefore conceived it better to share his estate jointly between them, as far as it would extend: and secondly, considering the weakness of his work, now being to walk abroad in the world, I thought it must be led by both arms, and needed a double supporter, &c. In his short preface to the reader, he challenges nothing to himself but the composition; and as for his vouchers, 'If every where, says he, I have not charged the margin with the authors names, it is either because the story is author for itself, I mean generally received; or to avoid the often citing of the same place. Where I could not go abroad myself, there I have taken air at the window, and have cited authors on others citations; yet so, that the stream may direct to the fountain.' There are many encomiums bestowed upon our Historian, his wit, and his style, in the ten poems prefixed to this work; written by Robert Gomerfall, Vicar of Thorncombe, in Devon. Robert Tyrling, James Dupont, B. D. of Trinity College; J. Booth, B. D. of Christ-College, Cambridge; H. Atkins, H. Hutton, M. A. of Jesus College; H. Vintener, Thomas Jackson, William Johnson, of Queen's College; and Clement Bretton, of Sidney College. Out of these, a short sketch of some sentiments may shew the character for which he was chiefly distinguishable to them. One says his vein is so rich, that Tasso could not invent so well as Fuller could relate (6). A second, that barbarism is more vanquished by his wit, than ever it was by Godfrey's sword (7). A third, that Jerusalem need not envy Troy, since she has found one to write her battles in prose, as elegantly as Homer did those of the other in verse (8). A fourth, that as a viper was once enshrined in the amber tears of Phaeton; so here, Mahomet shall find a tomb in his language, so rare and transparent, as will endure, when the faint loadstone lets his own of iron fall (9). And a fifth compares the weaving of his stories to figures wrought in tapestry, and so enriched with embroidery, that flames, wounds, and bloodshed, objects in their nature most irksom and dreadful, are rendered agreeable by his art: the most horrid slaughters wrapped in his art's language, give more delight than distaste, and that which was most painful in the rencounter, is quite qualified by what we meet with so pleasing in the relation (10): besides many other high commendations, which to be more particular in, by citing the verses themselves, might here take up too much room.

Member; and, when the Parliament was dissolved, on the fifth of May following, the Convocation was commissioned to continue still, by the title of a Synod, to complete the said new Canons, which, on the last of June following, were printed, with the royal assent; tho' our author says, he was one, who, in the select committee, privately dissented in passing many particulars therein; and has publickly preserved the several exceptions which were, and probably some of them by himself, then made to them. But those Canons being insufficiently confirmed, only by royal authority, enough notice was taken thereof in the Long Parliament, which in November following ensued; all which he has himself amply recorded (w). But now the divisions between the King and Parliament being grown so great, that he had left his Court at London, on the tenth of January 1641 (x), to gather such strength in the countries as might oblige their Representatives to obedience, rather than comply with what he and his advisers thought unprincipally concessions, our author, in other pulpits as well as his own, very loyally enforced the doctrine of allegiance; and so particularly in the Inauguration Sermon, he preached at Westminster-Abbey, on the twenty-seventh of March 1642, upon that text, so directly persuading the duties of submission, Yea, let him take all, so my Lord the King return in peace, his Majesty then being at York, that it gave great disgust to those who were in the opposition against him, and brought the preacher himself into great danger. He soon found that he was to expect nothing less than to be silenced and ejected, as others had been; yet desisted not from proceeding in the same course, till he either was, or thought himself unsettled, by what he says in the preface to his Holy State, which was that year printed [D]. And it appears more plainly the next year; when an oath, but not the Covenant, as some authors have mistaken (y), was obtruded upon him; which he took not without such exceptions in regard to himself, that the Parliament, unsatisfied therewith, and requiring him to take it in a more absolute manner, he retired to the Court at Oxford some months before the Covenant was urged. Yet were there various reports relating to his steadiness in refusing even this oath. The writer of his life says he conveyed himself to the King at Oxford in April 1643, to avoid the imposition, and preserve his conscience clear of it (z); and another, with the confidence that is usually hardened by malice or error, says that he saw him take the Covenant before he went thither, more than once; but as our author has both cleared himself, and rectified our understanding in this matter, it is but justice on all sides to give each of them a hearing [E]. When he arrived at Oxford, he was both joyfully received and honourably

[D] Or thought himself unsettled, by what he says in the preface to his Holy State, &c.] That is pretty visible, from more than one part of this preface; wherein it appears, that this book was composed before he left Broad Winton in Dorsetshire, or at least before the eruption of the wars; it having been committed a twelve month before to the press: and his characters therein are, as he says, conformed to the then standing laws of the realm; which, as the King and State had now thought fit to alter, he expects his reader would make his alterations accordingly. And after having prayed that God would discloud these gloomy days, he says, 'Which if I may be so happy as to see, it will encourage me to count it a freedom to serve two apprenticeships, God spinning out the thick thread of my life so long, in writing the Ecclesiastical History from Christ's time to our days; if I shall, from remoter parts be so planted, as to enjoy the benefit of walking and standing libraries; without which advantages, the best vigilancy doth but vainly dream to undertake such a task. Mean time, I will stop the leakage of my soul; and what heretofore hath run out in writing, shall hereafter, God willing, be employed in constant preaching; in what place soever God's providence and friends good will shall fix me (11).' And it elsewhere appears, that he was now or very soon after debarred of the profits of his Prebendship of Salisbury, by the time he is mentioned to have continued so at the Restoration (12). However in the title page of this Holy State, it is said to be written by Thomas Fuller, B. D. and Prebendary of Salisbury. It was printed at Cambridge, fol. 1642. and the second edition, by R. D. for J. Williams, &c. fol. 1648. The whole contained in five books; whereof the Profane State, printed also by Roger Daniel, is the last. This work is a collection of Characters, moral Essays, and Lives; antient, foreign and domestic; so interspersed, as often to hold some analogy with the characters or essays which precede them. They are much enamelled with the figures or flowers of wit, and have much engaged the regard of rhetorical readers (13). But the lives are not in number equal to the essays; there being between seventy and eighty of the characters and essays, and not above thirty lives; among which those of our own country, are, Edward the Black Prince, Sir John Markham, Lord Chief Justice; Cardinal Wolsey; Bishop Ridley, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; Lady Jane Gray; Dr Nicholas Metcalf; Sir Francis Drake; Lord Burghley; Mr William Perkins, and Dr William Whitaker; Queen Elizabeth, and Mr William Camden. The antients and foreigners are, Abraham, Eleazar, Haman, St Augustine, Monica, Lady Paula, Hildigardis, Paracelsus, Scaliger, and Gustavus King of Sweden; and in the profane state there are, Jehu, the Witch of Endor, Andronicus, Joan Queen of Naples, Joan of Arc, Caesar Borgia, and the Duke of Alva: with copper prints, engraved by W. Marshall, &c before most of them. Between the publication of these two editions of the Holy and Profane State, came out our author's Andronicus: or the Unfortunate Politician by itself, in 12mo. 1646. reprinted 1649, &c. And 'tis the same we presume above mentioned, which appears in the last edition of the Profane State, cap. 18, from fol. 448, to 502.

[E] But justice on all sides, to give them each a hearing.] We do not find that our author ever looked with a malignant aspect on any of the planetary schemes of Will. Lilly the famous Astrologer, Almanac maker, Prophet, Fortune-teller, and Conjuror; or that ever he charged any of his unaccomplished predictions with being retrograde, or in opposition to truth: we hear not that he any ways concerned himself with setting Aries and Taurus together by the ears (14); that he ever denied him to be even Lord of the Ascendant in his own Horoscopes, or any how promoted the least ejection of him from the twelve houses (15): Yet has this Mr Lilly, in a certain libel, endeavoured to stigmatise him, in these words— 'I would be very sorry to belie the dead, as Mr Fuller hath Paracelsus; who delivers him unto posterity for a drunkard (16), though those who lived with him, the Bishop of Saltzburg, knew no such thing of him, but report him virtuous. But that Mr Fuller may know, he hath wantonly abused his oratory, I let the ages to come know thus much of himself, viz. That he took the Covenant twice for the Parliament, before my face in the Savoy Church; invited others to it; yet, honourably distinguished there. The King having heard of his extraordinary abilities in the pulpit, was desirous of hearing them from it. But, as the original cause of his leaving London,

' yet, apostate-like, ran within few days to Oxford, and there whined to his companions, and protested the Countess of R—— made him take it'— Here he turns one of our author's cudgels against himself, in behalf of Paracelsus; and quotes this precept of Fuller's, as if it were against his own practice; Let not thy jests, like mummy, be made of dead men's flesh; abuse not any that are departed; for to wrong their memories, is to rob their ghosts of their winding sheets (17): ' And yet, says he, this man must call Paracelsus a Quackfalver, and gave him, besides, other Billinggate language (18).'<sup>(17)</sup> As for Paracelsus, since our author has said nothing of him, for which he does not fairly produce his vouchers and compurgators, such as Thomas Erastus, Beroaldus, and those who had the best opportunities of knowing his character; Paracelsus seems not so much defamed or belied, if we may retort such an expression above, by Fuller, as Fuller is by Lilly; and that he made no mummy of Paracelsus when he was dead, whatever the wits of those times might make of Lilly while alive: but if, on the credit of others, he had, it little became such a scribbler to charge him with having belied one man, who, thro' the impossures of his pretended arts, made it his constant practice to belie and deceive the whole nation. Then as for Fuller's taking the Covenant, the author who best knew his story, and seems less biased by his affection, than Lilly by his acrimony, therefore most worthy of credit, has represented his conduct with relation thereto as follows. ' Several false rumours and cavils there are about his carriage and opinion touching that sacrilegious thing, by persons who were distanced as far from the knowledge of those passages, as fortunately from being concerned and engaged within the reach of that snare. 'Twas not only easy, but prudential, for other ecclesiastical persons to quit their livings, who were out of the gripe and elutches of those ravenous reformists, in order to keep their consciences inviolable; but it was difficulty enough of itself for the Doctor to escape, and get out of that place, where the next preferment would have been a dungeon. Some ventilations, and transient discourses, he made about that frequent and thumb'd subject of the reformation, the rather to suspend the busy censures of the Parliament and their party; wherein, though he seemed to comply, but as far as the rule and example would allow, and indulge the misapprehension of those men; yet these his charitable disguises could not obscure him from the severe animadversions of several ministers eminent in those reforming times; particularly Mr Saltmarsh. The contest between them is so known in print, that it will be needless to trouble the reader with it here: only thus much by digression, in honour of this venerable Doctor; Mr Saltmarsh being long since dead; he hath, in his book of the Worthies of England, given him a most honourable mention, and assigned him the place of his birth, education, and burial; registering him for an ornament of them all; so resplendent and durable was the Doctor's charity, &c. But to return to our subject; in the beginning of the year 1643, the said covenant was generally pressed; and a very great persecution soon after followed it. The Doctor was settled in the love and affection of his own parish, besides other obligations to his numerous followers; so that the covenant then tendered, might seem like the bright side of that cloud, promising serenity and prosperity to him, as was insinuated to the Doctor by many great Parliamentarians, which showed down, after a little remoteness such a black horrible tempest upon the Clergy; nay, the Church, and three kingdoms. But the good Doctor, could not bow down his knee to that Baal-Berith; nor, for any worldly considerations (enough whereof invited him to fall down and worship; men of his great parts being infinitely acceptable to them) lend so much as an ear to their serpentine charms of religion and reformation. Since therefore, he could not continue with his Cure without his Conscience, and every day threatned the imposition of that illegal oath, he resolved to betake himself to God's providence, and to put himself directly under it; waving all indirect means and advantages whatsoever towards his security. In order thereunto, in April 1643, he deserted the city of London, and privately conveyed himself to Oxford, to the no less sudden amazement of the faction here, who yet upon recollection quickly found their mistake, than to the unexpected content and joy of the loyal party there; who had every day, Job's messengers of the plundering, ruin, and imprisonments of orthodox Divines (19).<sup>(19)</sup> Thus distinctly is his evasion of, or escape from, this oath asserted by that author. But Fuller himself has best discovered the ground of Lilly's misreport, and even more clearly than his Biographer, distinguished how the said covenant could not be taken by him, as well as what other oath he did take, and in what manner. For having mentioned that Scottish Covenant, as he calls it, being born beyond the Tweed, and projected, as a band for the streighter union of the English and Scotch among themselves, and of both, to the Parliament (20); having there also shewn very expressly, that it was first taken by the House of Commons and the Assembly of Divines, on Sept. 25, 1643; and first ordered to be printed two days after: that divers Lords, Knights, Gentlemen, Officers, &c. met also at St Margaret's Westminster, and took it; and that it was commanded to be taken the Sunday following, October the first, in all Churches and Chapels of London, within the lines of communication, and throughout the kingdom, in a convenient time appointed, according to the tenor thereof; he then recites at large the said covenant (21); not heeding whether there be exactly 666 words in the body of it (22): so proceeds to deliver many solid exceptions to the preface; the six articles, whereof it is constituted, and the conclusion. Then he goes on thus— ' So much concerning the Covenant; which some three months after began to be rigorously and generally urged. Nor have I ought else to observe thereof, save to add in my own defence, that I never saw the same, except at distance, as hung up in Churches; nor ever had any occasion to read, or hear it read, till this day (23),<sup>(23)</sup> in writing my history; whatever hath been reported, and printed to the contrary, of my taking thereof in London; who went away from the Savoy to the King's quarters, long before any mention thereof in England. True it is, there was an oath, which never exceeded the line of communication; meeting with so much opposition, that it expired in the infancy thereof, about the time when the plot was discovered; for which Mr Tomkins and Mr Chaloner suffered (24). This was tendered to me and taken by me, in the vestry of the Savoy Church; but first protesting some limitations thereof, as to myself. This not satisfying, was complained of by some persons present, to the Parliament; where it was ordained, that the next Lord's Day I should take the same oath in terminis terminantibus, in the face of the Church; which not agreeing with my conscience, I withdrew myself into the King's parts, which I hope, I may no less safely, than I do freely confess; because punished for the same with the loss of my livelihood, and since, I suppose, pardoned in the Act of Oblivion (25).'<sup>(25)</sup>

As for the controversy between our author and Mr John Saltmarsh, it was occasioned by the Sermon of Reformation, which Fuller had preached at the Savoy (26); against which, Mr Saltmarsh published some animadversions, wherein he charged him with several points of Popery (27); and Fuller defended the arguments he had delivered upon that occasion, in the tract he thereupon set forth, under the title of truth maintained, wherein he challenged Saltmarsh to a reply, but he appeared in the lists no more; giving his reason afterwards for it, that he would not shoot his arrows against a dead mark; being informed that Fuller was dead at Exeter (28). Upon which our author observes, that he himself has no cause to be angry with same, for such a favourable fallhood; May

London, after the sermon he preached upon the new-moulding Church-Reformation, appears to have been, for the censure it gained him of being too hot a Royalist; it is now no less apparent, that, for preaching before the King and Court, at St Mary's in Oxford, he was censured for being one too lukewarm (a); which being the reverse of flattery on both sides, can only be accounted for, from that inflexible principle of moderation in himself, which he would have sincerely inculcated in either party, as the only means of reconciling both; that each, abating their high expectations of condescension in the other, both might be brought to a happy accommodation; in which, if he could have prevailed, the beneficial effects must have exceeded all estimate; and it had been difficult to determine, what reward could have been made him equivalent to such a national remedy, in that violent calenture under which the nation now laboured. But his reflection on his own narrative of the Convocation aforesaid, may be applicable here; that, He is generally accounted an impartial arbitrator, who displeases both sides (b). It seems to have been at this time that he was, as he mentions himself, tho' no member yet an inhabitant of Lincoln college in this University; that he was also then deprived of all his subsistence, or means of livelihood, and now, or not long after, rifled and plundered of his books, manuscripts, &c. But, tho' he expressly denies that his losses were owing to his expences, or the dearth of the place or provisions; yet there is a noted opposer of him, as of many others, who has, by the grossest distortion of his sense, and most uncharitable insult under his sufferings, endeavoured to make an affirmation of his denial [F]; and tho' he could plainly understand,

‘ May I make this true use, says he, of that false report, to die daily: see how Providence has crossed it; the dead reported man is still living; the then living man, dead; and seeing I survive to go over his grave, I will tread the more gently on the mold thereof; using that civility on him, which I received from him.’ Indeed he has further spoken, with that superior candor and generosity of him, which he was wont to do of the few antagonists he had, in the same place, where he has preserved him among his learned and eminent men; and where, after informing us, that he was born in Yorkshire, bred at Magdalen College in Cambridge, and much befriended by Sir John Hotham the elder, he gives him the character of having had a fine and active fancy, of being no contemptible Poet, and a good Preacher; but that of a zealous observer, he became a violent opposer of Bishops and ceremonies; which our author very charitably wishes, imputed to the information of his judgment and conscience (29). It may be taken also as a beauty in his own character, that he was not too strict or over curious in remembering the place and time of this adversary's death, tho' the cause and manner of it were too publicly known to be omitted; for Mr Saltmarsh being at times intellectually disordered (30), it took him in the head latterly, after a fever, that he had commissions from the Lord, to deliver to the Parliament Army then at Windfor, whereof he was one of the Chaplains; and after that fit of sickness, telling his wife he had been in a trance, seen a vision, and received messages to the said army, he strode thither in a very erratic, if not distracted, manner; and did so much further inflame his brains, by riding to and fro among them in his shirt, pronouncing the menaces of the Lord, with his revelations, counsels, and rebukes, to the General Sir Thomas Fairfax, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, and other officers, in many extatic speeches, and prophetic raptures, that, when he returned home, five days afterwards, to his house near Ilford in Essex, his spirits seem to have been quite exhausted. He told his wife, that he had then done his work, finished his errand, and must go to his father; so, in two days more, being taken speechless, he quietly breathed his last, on the eleventh of December 1647, and not three years after, as our author has misconjunctured (31). The short abstract we have here given of his latter end, is from the account which the officers of the army aforesaid suffered to be published of it (32); but those who will not think it an infirmity bordering too near upon his own, either in others to be more particular, or in themselves to be further acquainted with his insignificant and brain-sick extravagancies, or crazy conduct in this melancholy condition, may repair to that account itself, or a more copious extract of it, than we have here from that pamphlet given, less difficult to be consulted (33). Among the books and tracts he had published, tho' they are now little read or known, the titles of about twenty are remembered in the author last quoted, and some of them elsewhere (34): in several parts whereof, he appears to have been of the Antinomian persuasion; also that, besides Dr Fuller and Mr Gataker, he had made himself an adversary to Dr John Bastwick, Thomas Edwards, the author of Gangræna; and John Ley, one of the Assembly of Divines, &c. The very titles of some of those pieces seem to have some tincture, or glimpses of enthusiasm, if not frenzy in them.

[F] A noted opposer, &c. who has endeavoured to make an affirmation of his denial.] This noted opposer was Dr Heylin, in his Animadversions upon our author's Church History; both which books we shall hereafter more particularly speak of. Our author being willing to intimate how he was totally ruined in the beginning of the civil wars, while he fled for protection to the royal party at Oxford, has gently dropt a reflection upon that melancholy event, where speaking of the foundation of Lincoln College in Oxford, he informs us, he was in those troublesome times, tho' no member of, a dweller in it; and adds, ‘ I will not complain of the dearth of this University, where seventeen weeks cost me more than seventeen years in Cambridge, even all that I had; but I shall pray that the Students therein, be never after disturbed upon the like occasion (35).’ Now tho' Heylin suffered then himself, and there, attending also the royal party in the like manner, we shall see how he could magnify that expression, without the use of glasses, which then indeed could do his eyes no service; or if they could, none are so blind, as those who will not see: for tho' Fuller has expressly distinguished that he had no objection to make against any extravagant exactions for his diet, or other accommodations, therefore would not complain of any dearth there, yet, says Heylin, ‘ The ordinary and unwary reader might collect from hence, that Oxford was a chargeable place, and that all commodities there are exceeding dear, but that our author lets him know, it was upon some occasion of disturbance: by which it seems, our author doth relate to the time of the war, when men from all parts did repair to Oxford, not as a University, but a place of safety, and the seat Royal of the King; at which time notwithstanding, all provisions were so plentiful, and at such cheap rates, as no man had reason to complain of the dearth of them. No better argument of the fertility of the soil, and the richness of the country in which Oxford standeth, than that the markets were not raised on the accession of such infinite multitudes as resorted to it at that time, and on that occasion.’ Here conscious that he had wilfully perverted our author's sense long enough into a wrong meaning, and considering that Fuller would be thought sensible of the cheapness of the place then, as well as himself, he goes on to let us understand, how unnecessary his own misconstruction was, by shewing again how readily stand, from our author's expression, that he was sequestered by the parliamentary power; yet, as we see he has most preposterously upbraided him with being a Royalist, tho' he was an exceeding one himself, and most ambitious, in his writings, of being so accounted. Thus, deprived of all, and having no church to preach in, our author turned his thoughts towards the camp; for, at this tumultuous juncture, having no conveniency to explain, or vindicate, those tenets or schemes of compofure and reconciliation, by the press or pulpit (c), against which some ecclesiastical and invidious competitors for court-favour had diligently insinuated their misconstructions; he resolved to recover the opinion of his stedfast adherence to the Royal cause, by openly trying his fortune, more distantly, under the Royal army. Therefore, being well recommended to Sir Ralph Hopton, now, after his late victory obtained at Stratton in Cornwall, May the sixteenth 1643 (d), created Lord Hopton of Stratton, at Oxford, he was admitted by him, in the quality of his Chaplain; and he has gratefully exemplified the patent of his patron's creation, which is dated the fourth of September following (e). This attendance must have been most agreeable, being most fortunate to him; as that Lord's steady attachment to the King's interest was so well known, that it reinstated the credit of Fuller's loyalty; and yet his Lordship's inclinations to an amicable and honourable closure of the war, were so correspondent with those of his Chaplain, that they no less confirmed his judgment; which justly reflecting a double honour upon both, gained him also a victory (f) over that attempt aforesaid, by his circumventing enemies. And now attending his Lord, wherever the soldiers under him lay in camp, his Chaplain constantly exercised his duty, in exhorting them to theirs; and where, in their progress, they lay quartered in towns and cities, he always found some intervals for his beloved studies, in gathering materials, especially for his WORTHIES OF ENGLAND.

How

dily he could take his right meaning. 'Our author therefore, says he, must be thought to relate to somewhat else than is here expressed; and possibly may be, that his being at Oxford at that time, brought him within the compass of delinquency, and consequently of sequestration.' But mind with what politeness and humanity he concludes upon this misfortune of a fellow-sufferer in those calamitous times. 'And were it so, says he, (that he was sequestered) he hath no reason to complain of the University, or the deariness of it; but rather of himself, for coming to a place so ehargeable, and destructive to him. He might have tarried where he was, for I never heard that he was sent for, and then this great complaint against the deariness of that University would have found no place (36).' Many such bitter draughts of his gall should we swallow, if we were to run thro' this, and many others of his controversial writings; in which, he surely did not always sufficiently reflect, that if the Clergy were to make a practice of thus treating their own cloth, it would soon be no wonder that the laity, of whom they are the instructors, should, in their treatment of them, follow their own example. That our author was of a contrary spirit, might appear in many instances of his answer to the Doctor; but in this place, let us rather observe, with what temper he could express that most severe loss, and more valuable to him than all his other possessions, in these unhappy times of anarchy and lawless spoil, his library of books and manuscripts. In one place, for that loss invaded his memory more than once, having ingeniously introduced it with a story out of Plutarch's morals, of one Nicias an antient Philosopher, who being robbed of his shoes, wished, they might fit his feet who took them away: which may seem a charitable wish, but was a revengeful one; for being himself club-footed, he thereby wished the thief a cripple, rather than that they might prevent his being made one, by going barefoot. This story he no less ingeniously applies thus, 'Whosoever hath plundered me of my books and papers, I freely forgive him, and desire that he may fully understand, and make good use thereof; wishing him more joy of them, than he hath right to them. Nor is there any snake under my berbs; nor have I, as Nicias, any reservation, or latent sense to myself; but from my heart do desire, that to all purposes and intents, my books may be beneficial unto him. Only requesting him, that one passage in his, lately my, bible, namely Exo. iv. 28. 'may be taken into his serious consideration (37).' But it seems he did not lose all his books, as he also elsewhere informs us in these words, to one of his patrons: 'Besides desire, to shelter myself under your patronage, gratitude obligeth me to tender my service to your Honour. For all my books, being my netber and upper millstone, and such by the Levitical

Law, might not be taken to pledge, because a man's life (38), without which, I had been rendered unable to grind any grist, for the good of myself or others, had been taken from me in these civil wars, had not a letter from your Lady mother preserved the greatest part thereof. Good reason therefore, that the first handful of my finest meal should be presented in thankfulness to your family (39).' And elsewhere we learn, that he had afterwards a considerable reparation made of this loss; for which, to another of his patrons, he makes this grateful acknowledgment. 'I am sadly sensible, what the loss of a library, especially of manuscripts, is to a minister, whose books have passed such hands, which made riddance of many, but havock of more. Was it not cruelty to torture a library, by maiming and mangling the authors therein, neither leaving nor taking them intire? Would they had took less, that so what they left, might have been useful to me; or left less, that so what they took, might have been useful to others. Whereas now, mischievous ignorance did a prejudice to me, without a profit to myself, or any body else. But would to God all my fellow brethren, who, with me, bemoan the loss of their books, with me, might also rejoice for the recovery thereof, though not the same numerical volumes. Thanks be to your Honour, who have bestowed upon me, the Treasure of a Lord Treasurer; what remained of your father's library. Your father, who was the greatest honourer and disgracer of students bred in learning; honourer, giving due respect to all men of merit; disgracer, who by his meer natural parts and experience, acquired that perfection of invention, expression, and judgment, to which, those who make learning their sole study do never arrive. It was a gift I confess, better proportioned to your dignity than my deserts; too great, not for your Honour to bestow, but for me to receive. And thus hath God by your bounty equivalently restored unto me, what the locusts and the palmer worm, &c. have devoured; so that now, I envy not the Pope's Vatican, for the numerousness of books, and variety of editions therein; enough for use, being as good, as store for state, or superfluity for magnificence. However, hereafter, I shall behold myself under no other notion, than as your Lordship's Library-keeper: and conceive it my duty, not only to see your books dry'd and rubbed, to rout those moths which would quarter therein, but also to peruse, study, and digest them; so that I may present your Honour with some choice collections out of the same, as this ensuing history is for the main extracted thence; on which account, I humbly crave your acceptance thereof; whereby, you shall engage my daily prayers for your happiness, and the happiness of your most noble consort, &c. How assiduous he was in his researches, and how extensive in his correspondence for that purpose, may appear in his Memorialist [G]. After the battle of Cheriton Down, on March the twenty-ninth 1644, the Lord Hopton drew on his army to Basing-House, the Marquis of Worcester's in Hampshire, and left his Chaplain in that strong garrison, intending to consult the King, at Oxford, before he took up his quarters; when Sir William Waller, having taken in Winchester, besieged the Doctor's sanctuary; but so little terrified was he with the cannon from the assailants leaguer, that it made him so vigilantly animate the defendants to such continual and effectual sallies, as constrained Sir William to raise the siege on the (g) seventeenth of November following, with the loss of more than a thousand men (b): However, this most noble feat in that county, some months after Fuller had left it, was taken by storm, with the Marquis in it, and razed to the ground. After the war, which had made a lamentable ravage through the three kingdoms, was drawing to a conclusion, and part of the loyal army driven into Cornwall, under the Lord Hopton; his Chaplain, having received a dismissal of his beloved patron, took timely refuge at Exeter, where he resumed his studies, and constantly preached with great satisfaction to those loyal citizens. Here, the Queen having been delivered at Bedford House, of her last issue the Princess, called after her own name Henrietta Maria, in June the year last mentioned, who was soon after her brother's restoration married to Philip of France Duke of Orleans, our author was made Chaplain to the Infant Lady (i), and, as the writer of his life also observes, the King soon after gave him a patent for his presentation to the living of Dorchester in Dorsetshire, valued at four hundred pounds per annum. But, as this would obstruct his design of settling in London, for the more convenient attainment of historical intelligence, he modestly declined that gracious offer, and continued waiting on the young Princess during the siege of that city, in the latter end of 1645; when, as he tells us, it was for a while so wonderfully relieved with such prodigious flocks of larks [H]. His conversation was here, no less than wherever else he was, much sought and admired by the most noble and ingenious persons of all ranks [I], several of whom made him advanta-

[G] How assiduous he was in his researches, and extensive in his correspondence for that purpose, may appear in his Memorialist.] This author informs us, that, 'While he was in progress with the King's army, his business and study then was a kind of errantry; having proposed to himself a more exact collection of the Worthies General of England; in which others had waded before, but he resolved to go through. In what place soever therefore he came, of remark especially, he spent most of his time in views and researches of their antiquities, and Church Monuments; insinuating himself into the acquaintance, which frequently ended in a lasting friendship, of the learnedst and gravest persons residing within the place, thereby to inform himself fully of those things he thought worthy the commendation of his labours. It is an incredible thing to think what a numerous correspondence the Doctor maintained, and enjoyed by this means. Nor did the good Doctor ever refuse to light his candle, in investigating truth, from the meanest persons discovery. He would endure contentedly, an hour, or more impertinence, from any aged Church-officer, or other superannuated people, for the gleanings of two lines to his purpose. And tho' his spirit was quick and nimble, and all the faculties of his mind, ready and answerable to that activity of dispatch, yet in these inquests, he would stay and attend those circular rambles, till they came to a point; so resolute was he bent to the sifting out of abstruse antiquity. Nor did he ever dismiss such adjutators or helpers, as he pleased to stile them, without giving them money and cheerful thanks besides (41).'

(41) Life of Dr Fuller, p. 27.

[H] Wonderfully relieved with such prodigious flocks of larks.] This memorable relief by the vast numbers of those birds, being himself a witness of, he has recorded in these words.— 'When the city of Exeter was besieged by the Parliament forces, so that only the south side thereof towards the sea was open to it, incredible numbers of larks were found in that open quarter, for multitude, like quails in the wilderness; tho', blessed be God, unlike them, in the cause and effect; as not desired with man's destruction, nor sent with God's anger; as appeared by their safe digestion into wholesome nourishment. Hereof, I was an eye, and mouth-witness. I will save my credit in not conjecturing any number; knowing that herein, though I should stoop beneath the truth, I should mount above belief. They were as fat as plentiful; so that being sold for two pence

' a dozen, and under, the poor, who could have no cheaper, and the rich, no better meat, used to make pottage of them, boyling them down therein. Several natural causes were assigned hereof: 1. That these fowl frightened with much shooting on the land, retreated to the sea side for their refuge. 2. That it is familiar with them in cold winters as that was, to shelter themselves in the most southern parts. 3. That some sorts of seed were sown in those parts, which invited them thither for their own repast: however, the cause of causes was the Divine Providence; thereby providing a feast for many poor people, who otherwise had been pinched for provision (42).'

[I] His conversation was much sought and admired by the most noble persons, and ingenious of all ranks.] While he resided here, as well as in other places, his temper and humour, his learning and wit, were so conspicuous and captivating to the wise and grave, the learned and judicious, as well as those who were more jocose and mercurial themselves, that old Doctor Villain of that city, was pleasantly rallied by the Governor of Exeter, for inviting him so often, or detaining him so long, from the society of others; as a cornholder that hoardeth up the grain to enhance the market, and make a dearth in the neighbourhood (43). But it seems, that Doctor had some uncommon manuscripts in his library, with a Museum of natural curiosities besides; and being of a generous disposition, as his benefactions in that town may testify, notwithstanding his sufferings in those destructive times; as also of courteous comportment and communicative conversation, they were mutually agreeable to each other. It was in that Museum belike, that our author saw such a rarity, as served him to illustrate a reflection, he afterwards made, upon the assertion in one of the Oxford Antiquaries (44), that there were, or had been above two hundred halls in that University: for thereupon he observes, that, 'such halls, like flowers, which grow double, must either one crowd into another, or else be inconsiderably small; like those three hundred sixty five children which Margaret Countess of Henneberg brought forth at a birth in Holland; one skull whereof, says he, I have seen, no bigger than a bead, or a bean;' so, in the margin adds, 'It was derived for some hundred of years by succession, through authentic Physicians, to Dr Villain of Exeter, the present owner thereof; and avouched, by the skilful in anatomy, the true head of an infant once born into the world (45):' As it might geous overtures to engross him to themselves, which he refused. Here he composed a little book, of pious applications and reflections upon familiar objects, examples, and events; so ingeniously, as made devotion delightful to the Princess, when she was old enough to read and understand it. He dedicated it to the Lady who preferred him into the service of her Highness, and calls it the first fruits of Exeter press, presented to her [K]. At last the garrison might more probably be, than together with so many brothers and sisters. However the Doctor himself has in his book of Epigrams, one upon this incredible swarm of children, which that Belgic Countess is said to have brought forth at one birth, upon the imprecation of a beggar woman (46) who was reviled by her, as a common prostitute for having many herself. But our author was tempted with greater prospects of advantage by persons of higher rank, to engage him more constantly to themselves. For while he lay here, the Bishop of Bristol, Dr Thomas Westfield, it seems, made him fair invitations to live with him; but he declined them, being cautious of such a family favour: and John Digby, Earl of Bristol, was so charmed with his company, while he was here Chaplain to the Princess, that he also tendered him a noble competency, both now, and after the siege of Exeter, if he would go over and reside with him in France; protesting that, while he was master of a loaf, our author should have half of it (47): but he valued his liberty above the whole loaf. He seems to have considered the close attachment to dignity in a domestic Retainer, but as a crippling kindness; and however it might for a while promise an air of equality, or permit the appearance of a companion, that it was a situation which would prove improsperous by its contiguity, and insensibly breed a subordination, that would grow contemptible by its constancy; more especially, as the greatest services therein, soonest beget the most envious circumventions; or so dwindle and degenerate into unthankful duty, that the Dependent will find it thought a reward too great, to have been the witness only of little foibles; that he must live by no direction of his own, and have no dispositions that are unguided by his principal; till he who at first was a freeman himself, gradually becomes a slave, to the passions or humours, the vices or vanities, the profits or pleasures, the avarice or ambition, of another; and often in the end, a victim to the treachery of undermining competitors. But tho' he accepted not such courtesy, he has spoken much to the honour of those who offered it (48). In short, he was so engaging, and had such a fruitful faculty of begetting wit in others, when he exerted it himself, that he made his associates pleased with their own conversation as well as his: his blaze kindled sparks in them, till they admired at their own brightness; and when any melancholy hours were to be filled up with merriment, it was said, in the vein he could sometimes descend to, that the Doctor made every one Fuller. An author before quoted informs us, 'He was so good company, that happy the person who could enjoy him, either Citizen, Gentleman, or Nobleman; the Earl of Carlisle, and George Lord Berkeley especially; he removing up and down, out of an equanimous civility to his many worthy friends; so to dispense his much desired company among them, that no one might monopolize him to the envy of others (49).' For that Lord Berkeley's noble friendship to him, he has sundry times repeated his gratitude with great zeal and affection: where he calls him, the Paramount Mæcenat of his studies (*): and in another place, 'one, who hath been so signally bountiful in promoting these, and all other my weak endeavours, that I deserve to be dumb, if ever I forget to return him publick thanks for them (50).' But to enumerate all the patrons or promoters of his works, and recite his shining characters of, and liberal acknowledgments to them, might make an article longer than this of his life.

[K] The first fruits of Exeter press presented to her Several little books of this kind were published by our author; some whereof have past divers editions. They are partly composed upon the plan of a learned and ingenious prelate's most celebrated writings (51): but several others have been since written, more directly upon our author's plan. As that, by Theophilus Wodenote, a sequester'd divine, sometime of King's-

College in Cambridge (52). Another was published by Dr William Spurthow Minister of Hackney (53), and afterwards there was another volume set forth, by an author more famous for his many publications in natural and experimental Philosophy (54). Whatever there might be in this last author's performance, that could tempt a late ludicrous wit to give his serious manner of writing another air (55), we forbear now to enquire; but have been so far from meeting with any reflection upon our author, for the pieces in this kind which he set forth, that we find they rather gained him the character of a most penetrating and flexible genius; which testified a comprehensive memory to recollect, and judgment to prefer, the most proper and agreeable incidents in poetry, history, or any other science, as well as divinity; and then a most surprising faculty of allusion, to apply them so pertinently and so eloquently, by inference or deduction to any present purpose or occasion: whereby he has drawn the most delightful and salutary precepts out of the most ordinary and disregarded, as well as the most extraordinary and observable examples; insomuch that no books of those times, in this manner of writing were more read than his, or more often reprinted. The first tract which he brought to light of this nature, if we are not misled by some catalogues in its title and date, was called, Good Thoughts, 12mo. 1637. The next he published was this above referred to, while at Exeter, as is there said, and entituled, Good Thoughts in bad times, &c. printed there, it seems in 12mo 1645, for we have not seen that edition; but the next we have, which was the fruit of a London press, printed for Andrew Crook, &c. in 12mo. 1646. And he published Good Thoughts in worse times, that year or the next in 12mo. 1647 (+). They were reprinted in 1649, and 1650. At least these two parts were again printed together, under the title of, Good Thoughts in bad times: together with, Good Thoughts in worse times; consisting of Personal Meditations, Scripture Observations, Historical Applications, Mixt Contemplations: Meditations on the Times, Meditations on all kind of Prayers, and Occasional Meditations. By Thomas Fuller, B. D. both parts printed for J. Williams, &c 12mo. 1652. He afterwards published a different work entituled, Mixt Contemplations in these times, as one author says in folio (56); who mentions no date to this, or any other of his works; and this if not printed in octavo, we never saw; but his Mixt Contemplations in better times, printed in 8vo. 1660. and dedicated from Syon College, to the Lady Monck we have seen. As for his Good Thoughts in bad times; which contain the first four heads of those specified in the two parts before mentioned to have been printed together; this first part containing an hundred meditations, is addressed by him in a polite dedication, to his patroness, the Lady Dalkieth, Governess to the Princess, as also her godmother, who was the planter of him in her service. We have seen an account or description of a collection of moral and divine contemplations, written seemingly in a woman's hand, by either the said Princess Henrietta Maria, as it was said, or for her use (57), having on its blue Turkey leather cover, the two first letters of her name in a cypher, surrounded with palm branches, and crowned with a coronet, in which there are several of the curious thoughts in this book; among others transcribed. As that pleasant story of the simple American, who hid or buried under a stone the letter his Spanish master had sent by him, to a friend with a basket of figs, while he eat some of them, because a former letter had revealed his former thievery; thinking, while he was out of its sight, he should now be free from its detection; which is ingeniously applied by our author, to the conscience in man, which however stifled and suppressed, while we are committing transgressions, will at last both upbraid us with, and punish us for them (58). Another is, that application he makes of the Shepherds on those Welsh moun-garrison there, for want of succours, was forced to surrender, but upon such favourable conditions, to the Parliament army, under Sir Thomas Fairfax, on the thirteenth of April 1646 (k), that Fuller was permitted by him to depart without any loss or interruption to London. Here he met but cold reception among his former parishioners; Mr Bond, heretofore a preacher at Exeter, was Master of the Savoy; and so many other changes he saw, that the parish was scarcely to be found in itself. However, it was not long before he was chosen Lecturer at St Clements-Lane, near Lombard-street; and shortly after removed to St Bride's church in Fleet-street. In the title-page of a sermon which he published in 1647, he styles himself late Lecturer in Lombard-street; and in his dedication thereof to Sir John Danvers, it appears he was now silenced [L]. He published several other pieces in these two last years, as we shall see hereafter. But it seems to have been before the latter end of the next year, when King Charles was put to death, that he was received as Chaplain to James Hay Earl of Carlisle (*), and presented by his Lordship, soon after, to the Rectory of Waltham-Abbey in Essex; because in that year 1648, and in 1649, he was, not only at London, but at Waltham, employing some engravers, to adorn, with sculptures, his copious Prospect or View of the Holy Land, as from Mount Pisgab, therefore called and known by the name of his PISGAH-SIGHT of Palestine (l), which he published in 1650 [M]. But as for his WORTHIES OF ENGLAND, the death of the tains, so high and such little ways asunder, that the men can talk together, but must walk some miles before they can meet together, to the divisions between the King and Parliament (59). Another is, his meditations on the risings and fallings in Salisbury plain (60); and besides two or three more, there is one we shall here recite, as a specimen of our author's talent in this kind of writing, as follows: 'I have sometimes considered, in what a troublesome case is that Chamberlaine in an Inn, who being but one, is to give attendance to many guests. For, suppose them all in one chamber; yet, if one shall command him to come to the window, and the other to the table, another to the bed, another to the chimney, another to go up stairs, and another to go down; and all in the same instant; how would he be distracted to please them all? And yet, such is the sad condition of my soul by nature, not only a servant but a slave to sin! Pride calls me to the window; gluttony to the table; wantonness to the bed; laziness to the chimney; ambition commands me to go up stairs, and covetousness to come down. Vices I see are as well contrary to themselves as to virtue. Free me, Lord, from this distracted case; fetch me from being sin's servant to be thine, whose service is perfect freedom; for thou art one and ever the same, and always enjoins commands agreeable to themselves, thy glory, and my good (61).'

[L] In his dedication to Sir John Danvers, it appears that he was now silenced.] This is entitled, A Sermon of assurance, fourteen years ago preached in Cambridge, since in other places: now, by the importunity of his friends, exposed to publick view. 4to. 1647. In his dedication to Sir John Danvers, he says that, 'It had been the pleasure of the present authority to make me mute; forbidding me till further order, the exercise of my publick preaching.' And in the Preface he tells his readers that, 'if he was finally interdicted his calling, he might bespeak their pity to bemoan his state; but lying as yet, in the marshes between hope and fear, I am, says he, no fit subject to be condoled for, or congratulated with: yet it is, I trust, no piece of Popery to maintain, that the prayers of others may be beneficial and available for a person in my purgatory condition.' And a little further, 'However matters shall succeed, it is no small comfort to my conscience, that in respect to my ministerial function, I do not die, felo de se; not stabbing my profession by mine own laziness, who hitherto have, and hereafter shall improve my utmost endeavours, by any lawful means to procure my restitution.' And tho' some might persuade him to hold a private congregation, and carry the pulpit to his lodgings; yet he refrains from giving any offence, in hopes of being brought back to his pulpit. Of that Sir John Danvers, to whom he dedicates this sermon, who was of a noble family, and had been a Royalist, tho' now an Oliverian, and next year one of the King's Judges, but died before the Restoration, we have met with the following passage, relating both to him and our author, in a little book that gives us some account of Sir John's life; the writer whereof, says that, tho' he lived some years in his disloyalty without repentance, 'Yet drawing near the time of his death, I have, says the said writer, cause to believe that he repented of the wickedness of his life; for that, then, Mr Thomas, now Dr Fuller, was conversant in his family, and preached several times at Sir John Danvers his desire, in Chelsea Church; where, I am sure, all that frequented that congregation, will say, he was instructed to repent of his misguided and wicked consultations, in having to do with the murder of that just man, the King (62).'

[M] His Pisgab Sight of Palestine, he published in 1650.] The title is, A Pisgab Sight of Palestine. and the confines thereof; with the History of the Old and New Testament acted thereon. By T. Fuller, B. D. 'Tis an handsome folio, embellished with a frontispiece designed by Francis Cleyn, with many other copper plates, and divided into five books. The dedication, to Esme Stuart Earl of March and Darneley, &c. is dated from Waltham-Abbey, 7th July 1650, and after the preface, in which he excuses his delay of the Church History, and renews our hopes of receiving it, follow some verses in Greek, by John Ridley. Then we have a table of the arms in sculpture of several encouragers of this work, graved by J. Goddard; and after that, a map of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, dedicated to John Lord Cranfield, Sir William Paston, and Robert Condel, Esq; 'The first book contains the general description of Judea in fifteen chapters; with a map of old Canaan, inscribed to Edward Bendloes, Esq; The second book, is dedicated to Henry Lord Beauchamp, as we before mentioned. Then follow the histories of the Twelve Tribes, &c. in as many chapters, with a map before each, containing also, in a little compartment, a short Latin inscription, in prose or verse, to some patron, with his arms over it: the first, which is the map of Reuben, is inscribed to Sir Paul Pindar; the next of Gad, to Sir Hugh Windham, Bart. and so on: that of Benjamin to James Earl of Carlisle; and that of Judah, to another special patron, William Lord Maynard, &c. of whom, he elsewhere gratefully speaks (63). The third book, dedicated to John Lord Rofs, Son of John Earl of Rutland, gives us a description of the city of Jerusalem in thirteen chapters, with a plan of it in sculpture, inscribed to the Honourable Edward Montagu, Esq; also an account of Solomon's Temple in seven chapters, and his Courts, with the utensils of the Temple in twelve chapters; and prints of them inscribed to other promoters of the work. We have next a description and history of Zerobabel's Temple in twelve chapters, and a plate inscribed also of that, like the rest. The fourth book is dedicated to Francis Lord Russel, son of William Earl of Bedford, and dated from Waltham-Abbey, July 16, 1650. Here we have a map and description of Mount Libanus, with the adjacent country, inscribed to Simeon Bonnel, Merchant of London, a great encourager of his works. Also of Median, and other eastern confines of Palestine, with the like prospect and account of the wilderness

King, did now, for a while, quite stagnate and dishearten his continuance of that Work, as if the proceedings of the Parliament had proved a contradiction to the title of it: For what shall I write, said he, of the Worthies of England, when this horrid act will bring such an infamy upon the whole nation, as will ever cloud and darken all its former, and suppress its future, rising glories (m). Therefore he was busy till the year last mentioned, in getting out that book and others; and the next year, he rather employed himself in publishing some particular lives, in a volume, of religious Reformers, Martyrs, Confessors, Bishops, Doctors, and other learned Divines, foreign and domestick, than in augmenting his said book of English Worthies in general; and to this collection he gave the title of ABEL REDEVIVUS, which he published at London, in quarto, 1651 [N]. In the two or three following years, he printed also several sermons and tracts upon ecclesiastical subjects. And now having lived above twelve years a widower, and being recommended to an advantageous match by his noble friends, he married one of the sisters of the Lord Viscount Balsinglass (n), in or not long before the year 1654. The next year she brought him forth a son, who, with the other before mentioned, survived their father. In 1655, notwithstanding Cromwell's prohibition of all persons from performing any ministerial service, or teaching any school, who had been adherents to the late King, he continued preaching, and exerting his charitable disposition towards those Ministers who were ejected; whom he not only relieved with what he could spare out of his own slender estate, but procured many contributions for them of his auditories. Nor was his charity confined to the Clergy, but, among the Laity whom he likewise befriended, one Captain of the royal army, who was of Paran, through which the children of Israel travelled forty years: likewise a draught of the tabernacle, inscribed to James Bovey, Merchant of London, and a map of Egypt, with historical observations, founded upon the authorities of the holy writings, and those of travellers, topographers, &c. as the other parts are.

We have next a description of the Jewish habits in eight chapters, with a table of them engraved (*), and inscribed to his friend Mat. Gilly, Esq; also a print of the Jewish Pantheon, or Idols, with an inscription to Dr Hamey as we mentioned before, and philological observations upon them, partly, as he acknowledges, from the labours of Mr Selden (64). The fifth book is dedicated to John Lord Burgheley, son of John Earl of Exeter; and contains his answers to objections, concerning this treatise, and the representation of the Tribes, &c. in the maps aforesaid, in twenty two chapters. In one of them, to an objection, that the faces of the men who bear the great bunch of grapes (65), are set the wrong way: for being to go south-east, to Kadesh-barnea, they look full west, to the Mediterranean sea, he answers: 'You put me in mind of a man, who being sent for, to pass his verdict on a picture, how like it was, to the person whom it was to resemble, fell a finding fault with the frame thereof, not the Limner's, but the Joyner's work; that the fame was not handsomely fashioned. Instead of giving your judgment on the map, how truly it is drawn to represent the Tribe, you eavil at the history-properties therein; the art of the Graver, not the Geographer. Yet know, Sir, when I cheekt the Graver, Robert Vaughan, for the same, he answered me, that it was proper for the Spies, like Watermen, and Rope-makers, to look one way, and row another (66).' After these answers, there are six chapters more. 1. Of Ezekiel's visionary land of Canaan. 2. An account of the Ten Tribes since their Captivity, &c. 3. Of the Jews repossessing their native country. 4. Of the general calling of the Jews. 5. The present obstructions of their calling. 6. How Christians should behave in order to the Jews conversion.—Then follows a sculpture of sacred fragments, dedicated to John and Edward Russel, youngest sons of Francis late Earl of Bedford: and the whole closes with an elaborate table or index, of all the places; as cities, towns, mountains, vallies, rivers, &c. mentioned in this history of Palestine out of the Scriptures, in their proper Hebrew names, also their significations in English, parallel'd with many English towns, &c. as synonymas, and the texts referred to, in which those places are mentioned; as also their longitudes and latitudes: lastly, the book, page, and paragraph, in this history, where such places are treated of, or mentioned; and all in distinct columns. If we may depend upon the judgment of some writers who have given our author's character, this Pisgab Sight is the most exact of all his writings (67).

[N] His Abel Redevivus be published at London in Quarto 1651.] The title of it is, Abel Redevivus: Or the Dead yet speaking. The lives and deaths of the modern Divines; written by several able and learned men, whose names ye shall find in the epistle to the reader; and now digested into one volume, for the benefit and satisfaction of all those that desire to be acquainted with the paths of piety and virtue. Printed by Thomas Brudnell, &c. Lond Quarto 1651. The epistle written by our author, is subscribed from Waltham-Abbey. There are about one hundred and twelve lives, foreign and domestie in this volume, whereof thirty eight are English, except two or three Scots; beginning with Berengarius and Wicliffe, and ending with Robert Bolton and W. Wheatley. About forty three of the lives are embellished with little copper prints of their heads before them, and in the preface upon the honours, uses, and benefits of BIOGRAPHY, proceeds to distinguish the compilers of this collection, in these words— 'As for the makers thereof, they are many. Some done by Doctor Featly, now at rest with God: viz. the lives of Jewel, Reynolds, Abbot, and divers others: some by that reverend and learned Divine, Mr Gutaker: viz. the lives of Peter Martyr, Bale, Whitgift, Ridley, Whincker, Parker, and others: Doctor Willer's life, by Doctor Smith, his son in law. Erasmus his life, by the Reverend Bishop of Kilmore (68): the life of Bishop Andrews, by the judicious and industrious, my worthy friend, Master Isaackson: and my meanness wrote all the lives of Berengarius, Hus, Hierom of Prague, Archbishop Cranner, Maller Fox, Perkins, Junius, &c. save, the most part of the poetry at the end of every life was done by Master Quarles, father and son, sufficiently known for their abilities therein. The rest, the Stationer got transcribed out of Mr Holland, and other authors (69).' Before a little book of the Daily Devotions of Dr John Colet, Dean of St Paul's, and Founder of the Grammar School there, we see, a short account of that Dean's life written by our author, T. Fuller; but it is a different work from that in this collection, and not near so long (70). It may be observed in this collection of lives, that the plan our author followed in composing his share of it, is that which was then, among the most judicious writers in use; too modest to be justly charged with ostentation: for the other compilers, who were also learned and ingenious men, have as little displayed the directions they had in chronology, or those their readers might covet to their authorities, as himself; except one of them, who has bravely embroidered his margins, with above fourscore references to the old Philosophers, Fathers, Poets, &c. in the life of a modern Divine, within the compass of six leaves, and not five quotations in the whole that are directly personal, or do historically concern his subject (71).

was quite destitute, he wholly maintained, with lodging, diet, and ten pounds a year for other necessaries, till he died (o). In that year, his History of the UNIVERSITY of CAMBRIDGE, and his History of WALTHAM-ABBEY, were printed; and they are usually annexed, as an appendix, to his volume intituled, The Church-History of GREAT BRITAIN, which, after many interruptions, he brought out in a large folio, printed the same year, and then published, some few copies, it seems, with the date thereof in the title page; and the rest with another title, dated the next year 1656, &c. and having then chambers in Sion College, London, for the benefit of the library there, he from thence published the said volume (p). The reader will think it no news to hear that it did not please every body. It was commended by several, and censured by some [O]. About this time he was

[O] It was commended by several, and censured by some. This book, for which our author has been so variously characterized, bears the title of, The Church-History of Great-Britain, from the Birth of Christ, until the year 1648. endeavoured by Thomas Fuller. London, printed for John Williams, &c. fol. 1656. It is divided into eleven books, whereof the sixth is the history of Abbies; also into seventeen centuries, and most of them after the earlier times into several sections; with a dedication before each, to some noble or eminent friend who was an encourager of his works, with their arms often printed from wooden cuts, in the initial letters; which particular publications of, and acknowledgments to his patrons, subscribers, &c. begot him some particular envy, as the history itself did, some censure, for his moderation to all parties therein; without a great regard to which, by the most discreet conduct, he must in the latter part of this history, have brought himself when it was published into inextricable danger. Indeed he brought this history down too far within his own time, contrary to a good rule of his own (*): but he could no longer resist the importunity of his friends, who had so long expected it, at this time, when truth could not be done right with safety, nor wrong with honour, to bring it out, as appears by the first words of his preface; which inform us, that an ingenious gentleman some months before it appeared, in jest earnest, advised him to make haste with his History of the Church of England, for fear, said he, lest the Church of England be ended before the History of it. It must be provoking enough in envious minds, to see the noble Duke of Richmond in the very first dedication of this book (72), had such a singular regard to our author's judgment in the exposition of the Scriptures, that his Grace would give him some favourite text to compose a sermon upon; and the zealots of a party could deduce enough matter of reproach from his saying that, 'The three first books were chiefly written in the reign of the late King, as appears by the passages then proper for the government; and the other nine, since Monarchy was turned into a State (73).' As for the gentleman aforesaid, who hastened the publication, we have learnt it was Edward Waterhouse, Esq; the author of some learned books, which were well received; in one whereof, speaking of our Church-Historian he calls him, 'ingenious Dr Fuller; who will be more valued in after ages as most are, than in their own (74).' Another contemporary writer, in a tract published before the last quoted, having occasion to consult that part of this Church History, treating of the foundation which was first begun at Chelsea, for a College of Controversial Divinity against the Papists, but is now an Hospital for disabled and superannuated soldiers, has these words— 'But yet further, for the establishing your judgments, and the attracting of your affections, let us produce the venerable relation and judgment of one, who may be well called a Chrysostom; that is, Doctor Fuller, &c (75):' and further again, in another part of the same treatise; 'Let us hercupon still hear, and heed what Doctor Fuller says; and he is ever most worthy to be heard, &c (76).' But somewhat earlier still, there was another author of those times, Mr Thomas Forde; a man of good genius, who was esteemed no inconsiderable Poet and Orator; a volume of whose writings in prose and verse, has been elsewhere spoken of among our dramatic writers (77); in one part of which book, there is a very respectful letter, in commendation of this history, addressed, tho' by the initial letters of his name only, yet evidently, as may appear by the substance thereof, as follows,

' To Mr THOMAS FULLER.

' SIR,

' HAVING lately, not without pleasure and profit read your Church-History; by which you have not only indebted our Church in particular, but the whole commonwealth of learning in general; my memory continually upbraided me with ingratitude, till I found out this way to convey my resentments. For though our returns of thanks ought to be large and universal as your merit, yet your goodness, I hope, will not refuse the single gratitude of private persons. In that number, though the last, and the least, I am bold to tender my mite. A task indeed better befitting a more equal pen, since none is able to do it but your own. But I know your modesty is as great as your merit, the highest worths being always accompanied with the lowest humility. May your name ever live, who have raised so many to life, and rescued their memories from the tyranny of oblivion. Among many others, I am particularly obliged to your courtesy, in the remembrance of that good man Mr Udal, to whom, by kindred, I am something related. One, of whom we have this tradition, that he was the first man King James asked for when he came into England, and being answered, that he was dead, the King, whose judgment was an exact standard of learning and learned men, replied, By my sal, then the greatest scholar in Europe's dead. And certainly, by his own party, if they may be admitted for competent judges, it is not yet resolved, whether his learning or his zeal were greatest; and they think, they justly boast him a Confessor, if not a Martyr, for that cause which since hath paid those scores with interest. Now, though I am not heir to his opinions, yet a small affinity to his person, makes me embrace the opportunity of proffering you that intelligence you complain to want, the rather, because perhaps, no man can now do it but myself; and I have a relation of all his trials, censures, and sentence, written by himself, which I doubt not may give you a satisfactory account in what you desire. If you please to command it, I shall be ambitious to serve you and the truth therewith. But I could wish you would review that passage in the 31 Sect. after the execution of Udal, &c (78), for he died at the White Lyon, just as his pardon was procured, and was buried at St George's Southwark. And so I leave him to his rest, wishing his good name and doctrines may survive his discipline. Sir, you have not only engaged learning, but religion, to perpetuate your labours. Fame is much in arrears to your desert, and therefore cannot in justice, but continue that veneration in length to your memory, which it yet wants in breadth. Those religious houses, erected by a better devotion than that which destroyed them, are more beholding to your pen, than to their founders, or materials; you having made them a task for the remembrance and admiration of future ages, so long as time shall hold a scythe, or fame a trumpet. I would say more, if the universal applause of all knowing men had not saved me a labour; and to pay you in some of your own coin, it is no flattery to affirm, what envy cannot deny. Did I not foresee that the relation would swell my discourse beyond the limits of a letter, or the length of your patience, was invited to another living in Essex, which, for some respects to the patron, he undertook, and piously continued his labours there till his settlement at London (q). He seems to have had two great deliverances from death while he was in this county; for where he is speaking of the saffron in it, which grows so plentifully about the town of Walden, he calls it an admirable cordial; adding, that, ‘under God, I owe my life, when sick of the small-pox, to the efficacy thereof;’ and Dr Baldwin Hamey, afterwards knighted, seems to have been his Physician in this illness (r). The other deliverance we have also in his own words, where he says, ‘It is questionable, whether the making of gunpowder be more profitable or more dangerous, the mills in my parish having been five times blown up within seven years; but blessed be God without the loss of any one man’s life (s).’ Before he left Essex he made, as we are told, his last Will; which, after his death, was repositied in the Prerogative-office of Canterbury, at Doctor’s-Commons in London; where, with others made by some of the same name, it is to be seen (t). But now another noble patron, George Lord Berkeley, having made him his Chaplain, he took his leave of that county, to the great reluctance of his parishioners, and was presented by his Lordship to the living of Cranford in Middlesex, where he was no less generally beloved and respected, than at his other livings he had been (u). Ever since the Church History aforesaid was published, Dr Heylin had been hatching his Animadversions upon it and some others, which he printed in 1659. This invidious task, as he owns it himself to have been (w), diverted our author from his other studies to return an answer to it, which he published with no less speed than success within the same year; of both which we shall say something more in a note apart [P]: And when Dr Heylin’s own Ecclesiastical History, only of the Reformation, ‘patience, I should assume the liberty to inform you, that my neighbourhood to the place, acquaints me with some reliques of religious houses, at and near Malden, bearing still the name of an Abbey, a Friery, and a Nunnery. And if we may judge of Hercules by his foot, of the whole piece by the remnant, and of them by their remains, I should suppose them not behind many in England. As yet, I know little of them, but their ruins; but if you vote it convenient, I shall endeavour to improve my present ignorance into a discovery of them. I suppose it will be no hard task; I am sure it shall not, when in relation to your command. I must now take pity of your patience, which had not run this hazard of abuse, did I not know I have to do with so great a candour, from which I can expect no less than pardon. And in that presumption, I crave your leave to be, as I subscribe myself,

‘S I R,

‘Your most assured Servant,

‘THOMAS FORDE (79).’

These, and other commendations of our author, that might be assembled, were paid him for this elaborate and ingenious performance, some after, as well as others before, the more severe examinations and censures of it were made, which will appear in the next note. Annexed to this Church History, is his History of Cambridge, from the Conquest to 1643, in 172 pages, with a dedication to Banister, son of William Lord Maynard, and a map inscribed to Baptist Camden, Lord Noel: also the History of Waltham-Abbey in Essex, founded by King Harold, in 22 pages, dedicated to his patron James Earl of Carlisle; with a plate at the end, before the index, of the Seals of Arms, of all the Mitred Abbays in England. Both which histories were printed, as we above observed in 1655, and the latter of them has lately been recompiled by another pen (80).

[P] Of both which we shall say something more in a note apart. We have seen in the letter, recited in the last note, a little mistake of our author’s, in a generous and genteel manner rectified by Mr Forde. We have also met with some agreeable conversation, which is said to have passed between our author and his ever-cheerful and friendly acquaintance, Mr Isaac Walton, upon the general character of this Church-History, when it first came abroad. For Walton, taking occasion, upon reading something in it, relating to one of the lives, he was collecting materials for writing, I think, that of Mr Richard Hooker, to visit him with other company; and our author knowing how intimate he was with several of the Bishops and antient Clergy, first asked him what he thought of the History himself, and was then curious to know, what reception it had met with among them: Walton answered, that he thought it should be acceptable to all tempers, because there were shades in it for the warm, and sunshine for those of a cold constitution; that with youthful readers, the facetious parts would be profitable, to make the serious more palatable; while some reverend old readers might fancy themselves, in his History of the Church, as in a flower-garden, or one full of ever-greens: and why not, said Fuller, the Church History so decked, as well as the Church itself, at a most Holy Season; or the Tabernacle of old, at the Feast of Boughs? That was, but for a season, said Walton; in your Feast of Boughs, they may conceive, we are so overshadowed throughout, that the parson is more seen than his congregation, and this, sometimes invisible to its own acquaintance; who may wander in the search, till they are lost in the labyrinth: oh, said Fuller, the very Children of our Israel may find their way out of this wilderness: true, returned Walton; as indeed they have here such a Moses to conduct them (81). These were Laymen; how some of the Clergy have treated this history, we are now to relate; and particularly the author of animadversions on it. This was Dr Peter Heylin, a man whose learning had been well employed, if it could have reduced his unhappy temper; which obstructing his own preferment, moved his discontented spirit to oppose that of others; and lifting his hand against every body, raised theirs against him. This Doctor having written the History of our Champion of England (82), took a pique, it seems, partly from the slight grounds of our author’s making a little parallel of Perseus and Andromeda, with St George and the King of Lybia’s daughter (83); and taking some further distaste, that himself was less mentioned, or with less homage than he expected, in some other parts of his writings, especially for his reflection on the Doctor’s reflecting story on the antiquity of the University of Cambridge (84), kept feeding his rancour upon this Church History till it broke out, however he would have us believe it a task imposed upon him, in these Animadversions (85), before which he has written an Introduction, and given therein, the anatomy of the said History; dissecting it into many parts, and then reading lectures upon the unsoundness of all: beginning, I. At the title: of the Church History from Christ; by which, expecting an allowance of a Christian Church in Britain, in the time of Christ; he betrays his disappointment, in our author’s refuting the popish pretensions of St Peter’s planting the gospel here, or any other of the Apostles, &c. so early from Rome; and so, Mother-Church in that age, is defeated of the duty of a daughter! II. Church-History of Britain, is mighty exceptionable with him; because there is little said of the Churches mation, appeared, it gave less satisfaction, and was by others no less animadverted on. They had no further controversy after the said answer, but were both thereupon, as we have of Scotland and Ireland. III. 'Tis not properly called a Church-History, because 'tis an aggregation of heterogeneous bodies. There is too much variety; and, a Church Rhapsody, or Fuller's Miscellanies, had been a fitter title: so picks us out these impertinent parts; IV. Such as, Title pages a dozen; Dedications as many; and about three-score more, to other patrons, before the subdivided sections. This number of Patrons was an intolerable felicity, especially as our author has, more than once, let us into his good husbandry, of raising a Nursery of them (*). V. His Heraldry, Blazon of Arms, Descents of Noble Families, Rolls of Battle-Abbey, Arms and Names of the Conqueror's Knights billeted with the Monks of Ely: catalogue of Adventurers with Richard I. to Palestine; which he thinks might have better served his History of the Holy Wars; but being also what would engage the young Nobility and Gentry, for whom he so much designed this book, is very displeasing. VI. Then also, his Epitaphs, and Translations of other pieces of Poetry, sprinkled up and down, as another attraction of his younger readers to the graver parts, and for the enlivening or illustration of his characters, are wholly disallowed; because, among the other ancient Historians, he says, Plutarch and Suetonius yield him no example; and therefore it looks rather like a Church Romance. VII. His raking into Papish Legends was unnecessary; that is, he should not have exposed so much, and armed his readers so well against the ecclesiastical impostures and miracles therein, devised to promote the admiration and bigotry of the people, and augment the profits of the Monks and Priests. VIII. Above all, says the Doctor, recommend me to his merry tales, and scraps of trencher jests, frequently interlaced in all parts of the History; which, extracted into a book by themselves (*), might be served up, he thinks, for a second course to the banquet of jests; or wits, fits, and fancies; or the old hundred merry tales. But would one think his own severity could fall into the same levities he censures, in these animadversions? Yes, when they will gratify his spleen; tho' it be with a trencher-jest, out of any common jest-book in Grub-Street; as where, being inflamed at a story our author recites of a Lady, who told Archbishop Laud of her going over betimes to Rome, because, she perceived his Lordship and many others hastning thither, and she did not love to go in a crowd (†); he thereupon returns a story of another Lady; at whose table one Mr Fuller was a welcome, tho' frequent guest; and being offered by her the wing of a Woodcock, he was so very importunate to know, how she could tell a woodcock from a woodhen, that the Lady at last answered, a Woodcock was fuller headed, fuller breasted, fuller thigh'd; and, in a word, every way, Fuller (86); so hard it is to halt before a cripple! But this is not the only time the Doctor went astray, in the path he had given such expectations he could direct others. For our author might have retorted this jest, in a story of one Dr Heylin, who travelling not far from home to Oxford, was earnestly intreated by the man who was with him, to lead the way thro' the forest of Whichwood; but the Doctor lost his way, and wanted a leader himself. Strange! said the fellow, that you, who made a book of the whole world (†), can't find your way out of this wood (87). But he has not done with our author yet; for the next objection is, IX. His manifold excursions about the Antiquity of Cambridge; in which tho' this animadverter pretends to forbear awakening a useless controversy, that had so long lain asleep, yet he refers his reader to his animadversions, for what he could oppose our author therein; but might possibly have testified more discretion, in recommending to both Universities, such a friendly and laudable emulation in their studies, as should make it more difficult to determine, which of them were of greater service and honour to their country, by their instructions of mankind, than which of them is of greater antiquity. X. That there is too little of the Church and too much of the State History in his book; which, tho' sufficiently implied in other articles before, yet must more distinctly appear, to increase the reckoning. For our author has not, it seems, frequently enough to please this candid and humane critic, displayed the calling of national and provincial Synods, and made their influence, or authority, sufficiently glaring and ascendant over the civil power; he wanted more such notable Convocations, as threw about their firebrands of Sequestration, Deprivation, Suspension, Excommunication, and other Ecclesiastical Censures, without any confirmation of Acts of Parliament. More of the Heterodoxies and Superstitions of the Church of Rome; and the whole Reformation settled upon the Doctrine of the Apostles: More of the Affaults and Batteries of the Puritan faction; and justification of Rites and Ceremonies. X. He discerns a continual vein of Puritanism running thro' the book; which thro' the facetiousness of his style, may work upon unwary readers. As if he allowed the sword to be put into the common peoples hands, when the reforming humour shall grow strong enough: that the opinions of Wicliffe and Calvin are too much favoured; the Hierarchy of Bishops too coldly pleaded for; Non-conformists followed with Plaudites; Fathers of the Church often sent off in silence. But makes a heavy clutter about the Ceremonies, and that dispute of the Communion-Table standing Altar-wise; also of a chapel built north and south; tho' King James could say, it was no matter how the chapel stood, so the heart was right; and another unconsecrated; with more, about hoods, gowns, cassocks, surplices, and such like. And last of all, our critic chews over what we mentioned before, from the preface of this Church History; in which our author distinguishes what part was written in the reign of the King, and what since Monarchy was turned to a State; by which, as 'tis construed, he only meant to temper it to the palate of the present Government, whatever it was, &c. These are the general heads of objection in the Doctor's Introduction. Then he attempts to make them good by above three hundred particulars, in the Animadversions themselves. To these is annexed An Appendix, containing the Apology of Dr John Cofin's, Dean of Peterborough: in answer to some passages in the Church History of Britain, in which he finds himself concerned. This letter, in answer to our author's charge (88), in relation to Dr Cofin's imprisonment of Mr Smart a Prebendary of Durham, for his sermon against certain superstitious innovations, imputed to the Doctor; for which suffering the Parliament had voted Mr Smart damages, is dated from Paris, April 6th 1658; and therein, the Doctor thinks, that he inserted that passage upon the false reports and informations of others, who were loth to let an old malicious accusation die, as it might have done, if he had not kept it still alive, and recorded it to posterity. But it appears also therein, that our author wrote him a letter of apology for publishing the said misinformation, which the Dean should have had printed here with his own letter; especially since our author therein offered to make him amends, in the next book he published; which he has very ingenuously done (89). As for Heylin's Animadversions, tho' 'tis allowed they contain many useful remarks, and corrections of several involuntary mistakes in this Church History, as to some circumstances of time, distinction of families, forms and ceremonies, &c. and might have been proper, in some reasonable degree, to amend the errors therein; yet they appear nothing so enormous as in his representations; being thereby so much aggravated and magnified. For if the Doctor does not frequently explain a truth into what is erroneous, he often will, an insignificant error into one that is material, where an unprejudiced reader would conceive none at all; or discern no fault in the history, till it is made one in the animadversion. Even the reflexions of others upon the Hierarchy, he turns upon the Historian, tho' he mentions, but to refute them, only that this eternal caveller may add some further superfluous refutation of his own; and many times willfully misconstrues his apparent meaning. But the great burden of his cavils, is the allowance of any mismanagements in the Monarchical Government, and speaking with any candour or lenity of some who were afterwards fa-

(89) Worthies of Eng. in Durham, p. 295. And yet it seems Dr Cofin was then spirited up, to some more severe opposition of our author; by those words in Chancellor Hyde's Letter to Dr Barwick, from Brussels, June 27, 1659. 'Pray tell me, whether my Lord of Ely doth not think that my very good friend Dr Cofin, hath proceeded further than he needed to have done, upon any Provocation Mr Fuller could have given him.' have observed, well reconciled, especially when the Doctor's turbulent and acrimonious spirit was calmed and moderated by some of the many antagonists he had raised against himself;

voured under the administration of the commonwealth; which could not be avoided at the unlucky juncture when his history was published, without his inevitable ruin, as was before observed. If that incessant wrangler may not be flatly accused with Popish tenets, in the discipline he bellows on this history; yet what our author has related on another occasion, may be here applied; that, as that Driver at the Olympic games of old was held the conqueror, who could run his chariot wheels most near the mark, and yet not touch the mark, to hamper himself or impede his career: So that Divine was reckoned the hero of Laud's party, who could border, or drive up nearest the Papists, and not intangle himself in the charge of Popery; which yet Dr Heylin had not the dexterity to keep himself clear of, as may be read, when his own History of the Reformation appeared (90), in the Animadversions that were made upon that; the author, or authors whereof, having informed him therein, from many instances, that, 'we should rather judge you to be the pupil of Dr Harding, whom you would be thought to oppose; than of Bishop Jewel, whom you seem to reverence, &c. (91).' But others since, have treated it no better than as a libel upon the Princes, Prelates, and all, who, so much at their own peril, purged our Church of its corruptions, and established the said Reformation. It may be seen in Bishop Burnet, how he seems to have been set on by the Church of Rome, in those violent prejudices he has exerted against this of England, without the support of any authorities for the same (92). And also in Bishop Barlow, besides others of great knowledge and credit, who might be named, how justly, for representing our said Reformers as a pack of Fanatics, he is reproached with being guilty of scandalous injuries, both to Truth and the Church (93). The same year that Heylin published those animadversions upon our author's history, Fuller set forth his reply to them, intituled, The Appeal of injured Innocence to the learned and impartial Reader, in answer to some Animadversions of Dr Heylin's on his Church History. Printed in a thin folio 1659, being, as one author terms it, 'a very modest, but 'most rational and polite defence, to the aforesaid 'exceptions against that elaborate piece (94).' Some have spoken of it, as if, he was not only to be pardoned but praised, for tripping in his steps, who could make such graceful recovery of them. And others have observed, that the errors in his history are so ingeniously excused or confessed in his appeal, that he is even pleasing to his readers in those faults for which he has so wittily apologized (95). But his unquiet antagonist, to a book of his disputations with several other persons, published the same year (96), has added in the Appendix, An Exchange of Letters between Mr Thomas Fuller of Waltham, and Dr Peter Heylin of Abington, with an examination also of some passages in the said appeal. In this appendix, Dr Heylin allows that Mr Fuller's appeal is a well-studied answer, composed with ingenuity and judgment (97). And that he does not find wilfully in any error whereof he finds conviction, however traversing some points; which the Doctor thinks might have been with more honour to truth, declined. It appears here also, that our author, when his appeal was published, sent it to the Doctor; likewise such a letter with it, as very much mollified his censor's harsh opinions, and promoted their succeeding reconciliation. It also probably conduced to the abridgement of his reply to so long an answer; tho' the motives which the Doctor here publishes thereto, are, that three parts in five of the appeal are the words of the animadversions; that, in the two other parts, our author confesses mistakes, and promises corrections in the next edition of his history; and that other traverses or evasions in the appellant, are tantamount to acknowledgments, not to be qualified with the name of satisfactory answers; and therefore, he thinks no special replication necessary to them (98). But it is manifest, that letter before mentioned, and perhaps others which our author sent him, did allay his indignation; where-in he assures the Doctor, that, 'he was cordial to the 'cause of the English Church, and that his hoary hairs 'would go down with sorrow for her sufferings;' because the Doctor says thereof, that, 'It tended especially to the begetting such a friendly correspondence 'betwixt us, as might conduce to the establishment of 'a future peace.' And so it did, after our author had been more explicit in some serious conferences with him at Abington. For the writer, who well knew the conclusion of these altercation between them, asserts that the dispute in relation to this Church History was soon ended; 'for the oil our author had bestowed upon 'that labour, being poured into the fresh wound of 'this quarrel, did so assuage the heat of their contest, 'that it was soon healed into a perfect amicable clo- 'sure, and mutual endearment (99).' And what expectations the Papists had from this controversy, if they had no hand in it, for that more hands than Dr Heylin's contributed to those animadversions is evident enough (100), may also appear in another part of his Biographer aforesaid, where he informs us, that, 'It 'much rejoiced the Roman party, when this misunder- 'standing happened between Dr Heylin and himself, 'about his Ecclesiastical History, tho' they caught no 'fish in those troubled waters; while they tossed their 'proud billows forward and backward, the Prote- 'stant cause was safely anchored and moored between 'them (101).' And thus his orthodox principles, as a true son of the Church of England, were no more called in question.

As to those more obvious qualities in our author, which inclined him so much to illuminate the obscure, and enliven the languid parts of this History, as might render them more engaging to the generality of his readers; it has been objected, that he was too witty, too lepid, and indulgent therein of his own fancy and conceits; which, tho' often very ingeniously applied, it is thought he would have much refrained, if he had submitted to the advice of his good and worthy friend, as he styles him (102), Mr William Somner, the Antiquary of Canterbury (103), and not lightened some weighty matters so frequently with jests and tales; however, he might design only to enlighten them, or think them dispersed in his materials, like some alloy in metals, which may temper and dispose even gold itself, to be more binding and work the better. But that objection also, it seems, has since been accumulated upon him, with too much violence and excess. For some late Examiners of his works, in a few remarks left upon them, as well as other writers on serious subjects, would be for reducing this censure to its just bounds or degrees; and therefore observe, that much of his manner was the mode of the reign wherein he laid the foundation of his studies, and not to be particularly charged upon any new obtrusion of his; further observing, that much of what has been disparaged with the slighting title of jests and tales, are indeed apophthegms, and parallel events; so intended by the author, and so received and revived by unprejudiced readers, as instructive and corroborating ornaments; like what may be seen in many solemn discourses of great antiquity, being an imitation of the Philology therein. They have thought also, that an author may make even Church history in some parts diverting, without making a diversion of the Church; and therefore, that he may ridicule some monstrous and mischievous impositions on it, without making it ridiculous; as we daily behold in Civil, and even Ecclesiastical life, the most serious and sober negociations carried on by men of volatile and humorous dispositions, who may surely sometimes smile, or even laugh over their business, and not laugh at it; there being great difference between a man's shewing a little jocularly now and then, in the faithful discharge of a trust he has taken upon him, and betraying it into contempt, by making jokes of the trust itself. Therefore it has been questioned, when an author, who has the uncommon talents to render himself most pleasing and agreeable, shall, by an uncommon industry to exert them, render himself least so, whether there is not a sinister and ungrateful reception made of his labours? And whether any faults or failings, in the government either of Church or State, may not be sometimes corrected, with as much success, and more humanity, in a good humour, than a sour and morose himself; when he found his own History more censurable for giving countenance to the Popish cause, than he could censure Fuller's for it's candour to the Presbyterians, and he saw one? But if, in a copious work, wherein there must be a great diversity or disparity of actors, their actions and arguments, which must sometimes appear ridiculous even to one another, all confirmation of the good, or chastisement of the bad, by the illustration of any similar story, or witty saying, must be rejected, as altogether unseasonable, in respect to the grave title of it, what will become of the gravest Historians, Philosophers, and Fathers of old; who in the same manner derided the impostures in the Pagan, as our modern Divines have done in the Popish, and other Christian systems of worship; or the Prophets and Apostles themselves, who have so agreeably embellished and enforced their doctrines, with fables and parables? And if these illustrations are established by such unerring authorities, in the most inspired and divine, the most sublime and spiritual writings, sure they may be safely practised in those that are of temporal, or human concern and institution. If then, say they, notwithstanding such great examples, some men can still be so saturnine, as to relish nothing mercurial; no facetious or other delectable representation, naturally arising, in the miscellaneous occurrence of historical matter; if wit and humour are such disasters, blessed are the dolts and dizzards! Or, as Falstaff phrases it; If sack and sugar be a sin, the Lord help the wicked! But if our Historian has treated us too plentifully therewith, and, like a prodigal son, been so lavish of his treasure, as to be ungenerously reduced to husks, with those who prefer them to pearls, his motives for such liberty are yet thought to be misinterpreted; and this argument is not relinquished without some indications, as we shall see, at the grounds and sources of those rigorous and aggravated constructions, which have been made of the use of wit and humour, in such parts of a grave and serious work, which give birth to them; or any such history, as contains matters no less prophane than sacred in it; especially in respect to our author, and what has been written on him, by a late historical critic; who may yet have wronged more characters without wit, than Fuller did with it; or traduced them undeservedly in earnest, more than ever he did by a deserved jest; and with that gravity he required in our Historian, may have done him, and many others, more injustice than if he had reprehended them with levity; as where he charges him with not having taken care enough of his style; when, as it is observed, there is no writing in his style, without being more careful and delicate than we generally think it needful now to be: He adds, that if a pretty story comes in our author's way, affording scope of clinch and droll, off it goes, with all the gaiety of the stage; and that the most serious parts of his history, are so interlaced with pun and quibble, as if he designed to ridicule the annals of our Church into a fable or romance; of which, if proper distinction has not been made above, it may, by reading the history itself. As for puns, quibbles, and clinches, which are but the shadows of Wit, 'tis no wonder they are at present so much out of request, as to be almost out of sight, since the substance itself is so little seen, in the many volumes that are daily published; but they were not always in such low ebb of esteem as they are now; for some of the gravest Antients so loved the goddesses, that they would embrace the very clouds which appeared in her shape; and they were favourably enough thought of even in Fuller's time, or else such as may occur in him, would not have escaped the censure, much less engaged the imitation, even of his captious opponents. Indeed that critick also adds, that if this Church History could be refined, it would be of good use; since there are in it some things of moment, hardly to be had elsewhere, which may often illustrate dark passages in more serious writers, &c. (104). These things of moment, are several letters, records, instruments of Church and State, and other authentic evidences unprinted in other histories, thro' the friendly communications of Sir Thomas Cotton, Sir Simonds d'Ewes, Sir Simon Archer, and other treasurers of antiquities. He has also crected, as so many beautiful statues, abundance of characters of eminent men throughout this history; many of them latterly, drawn from the life, and also scarcely elsewhere to be seen; out of such circumstances therein, which occurred from his own observations, or the intelligence of friends, as would yield the most remarkable connections or contrasts, &c. and he could best animate or adorn, with allusions or reflections, political, moral, and divine. Which embellishment is always desirable, unless where the clippings are more valuable than the little jewels that are reduced and shaped out of them, or many substantial matters of fact have been dropt, or excluded, for some more capable of such decorations; which indeed, in some histories, may be a little like filling of houses with so much carving and painting, as to leave them unfurnished with necessary utensils for every ordinary occasion. If his gay sparkling tales are such eye-fores, they may be overlooked by his gloomy or tender-sighted readers; and as for the arrows of his jests, they are usually so fledged with the feathers of his ingenuity, that, by a well-tempered and counter-vailing moderation, they break the force of their own flight, and defeat the danger of the points they are tipp'd with: so that we may smile more at the innocent effects of his wit, than frown at any rankling wounds that are made by it. But such is the hard fate of an author, especially if he happen to be a man of uncommon abilities, and so prone are his readers to calumny, thro' the conceit, or pretence of a superior taste or distinction, that if there be but one exceptionable quality in him, it shall be ever uppermost, and six such a disrelish as many excellencies cannot qualify. Had he violated the decorum required by good manners and morals; had he profaned, or defiled his pen, with the impiety, or ribaldry of low, licentious, and abandoned writers, he might not have been treated with greater severity, tho' he had then deserved it. However, since some varieties he designed in the entertainment of his readers, agreed not with the weak or dainty appetites of all, some reasons for it have been assigned, as the grounds and sources of that distaste, in the remarks here extracted; from whence we further collect, that this mixture of wit in history, was thought to treat irreverently that of the Church, however decently, concisely, and pertinently, interwoven or adapted; because it might be apt to make it too familiarly read, so be hurtful to that awe and veneration which must be kept up therein; as nothing but sincerity and sanctity should be thought to have any footing there: But his frequent application of the divine texts of scripture, so wittily, how adaptly or respectfully soever also, in it, to human or secular affairs, might be as reproveable, for the same reason as his pleasant stories or sayings; since the very translation of those scriptures into our own tongue, was once even sentenced to the flames, as what might also bring the religion itself into a familiarity too great with the vulgar. Then his rhetorical style, his quaint conformities, contradistinctions, and other elaborate niceties of an elegant and sententious diction; those who have the capacity, either want the forms and rules, or will not spare the time and pains to imitate; therefore such precedents must be rejected, as may tend to exact or revive an obsolete and troublesome compliance. Besides, bright and witty authors on any subject, must be discountenanced by dull and heavy ones, as riches and honours are by those in a poor and abject condition; who, to suggest in themselves more excellent properties, will rail at what they cannot reach: For if such inconvenient examples were to predominate; if florid and pithy writings were to prevail, or wit and eloquence become in vogue, it would make a dearth at the press; the majority of voices would be silenced by a few, and the generality of authors, being out of the fashion, might as well be out of the world. But, after all, it is not expected to establish a common practice of writing books, by any recommendation of such patterns, in these apologetical remarks, as our Historian has left us. For the author of them pronounces him more liable to robbery than rivalry; and, which is worse, many who have made him first stand and deliver, have afterwards abused him and defaced his credit, to prevent their own detection: so that there is no great danger of his corrupting those readily to an ill taste of imitation, who are humbly restrained from ascending higher than repetition, saw his efforts so ineffectual to weaken our author's interest after the Restoration, that Fuller then grew in greater favour at Court, than ever he had been before. It was his noble patron aforesaid it seems (x), the Lord Berkeley, who, at that grand revolution, took Fuller over with him to the Hague (y), that King Charles the Second might also hear his singular excellencies in the pulpit, and his grateful salutations, upon the prevailing resolution of his subjects to receive and obey him in his own kingdoms; but the croud and hurry being too great there, he had soon after better opportunities of expressing his cordial and dutiful satisfaction upon that topic at Whitehall (z); and, among the many loyal congratulations which were made to his Majesty upon his joyful and magnificent entry, our author revived his acquaintance with the Muses, to address him poetically also upon that occasion (a). He was, a short while before, re-admitted to his Lecture in the Savoy, and now restored to his Prebend of Salisbury, after being twenty-years, as the writer of his life says, deprived of it's profits. He was chosen Chaplain in Extraordinary to his Majesty, created Doctor of Divinity by the King's letters of recommendation to the University of Cambridge, dated August the Second 1660 (b); and so well grounded was his expectation of higher advancement, that, had he lived about a twelvemonth longer, 'twas thought he would have been made, upon the translation of Dr Gauden from Exeter to Worcester, or his death soon after, Bishop of one of those Sees (c), thro' the Berkeleys interest with the Queen-Mother, and Princess Henrietta, soon after Duchesse of Orleans, at their late being in England. Now being commodiously enabled to prosecute his studies, he closely applied himself to set a finishing hand to his WORTHIES of ENGLAND [2]. This work was the petition, unless the art was as perfectly attained of making, by bidding writers go and be witty, as the Alchemist implied his was, who bid his believer go forth and be rich.

Thus we have given the sense and substance of some Reasons which were drawn up for the toleration of wit in due proportion, and in the proper parts of serious subjects, with respect to our author; and found, among some critical papers, of a late gentleman who had a hand in the original Spectator (105), with others he also wrote of a political nature, in opposition to the late Earl of Orford. And tho' we have likewise seen some notes which a late Prelate (106) left, in the margins of Bishop Nicholson's Historical Library, correcting some errors therein; yet they distinguish his to be a different hand from that which wrote these Remarks on our Historian; and we have been informed (107), they were most probably written by the author of a treatise published entirely in favour of this subject (108), as an addition he might design to incorporate in the next impression of it; in which treatise, the said author has quoted a Divine, named Mr Gilbert Rule, who says, he knows of none that blame the excellent writings of Mr Fuller, for the pleasantries in them; and has given us, throughout the said tract, abundance of authorities and examples, of writing in the same manner; especially out of Ecclesiastical authors, in all ages, and of all ranks and persuasions.

[2] To set a finishing hand to his Worthies of England.] This work, which was part of it printed before the author died, seems not, in the lives or characters in some of the counties, especially of Wales, so finished as it would probably have been, if he had lived to see it completely published. It is intitled, The HISTORY of the WORTHIES of ENGLAND: Endeavour'd by THOMAS FULLER, D. D. folio. 1662. With a sculpture of his effigies prefixed, engraved by David Loggan, having this inscription round it, Thomas Fuller, S. T. D. Aet. 53. 1661; this motto at top, Metodus Mater Memoriae; and these verses at bottom,

The Graver here, hath well thy face design'd,
But no hand, FULLER, can express thy mind;
For that, a resurrection gives to those,
Whom silent monuments did long enclose.

Being a posthumous publication, it is dedicated to King Charles the Second, by the author's son, Mr John Fuller, a young Divine of Cambridge. In the said editor's preface, we are assured that the unprinted counties were faithfully set forth from the author's copy, without any additions; and that the volume was printed for expedition at several presses, which may account for the several errors in the numbers of the pages, and thereby, the want of an index or two to the whole, which might have directed to the local commodities and personal characters therein: However, there has lately been published an index of the personal part, sometimes to be met with at the end of such copies as have been new bound to receive it. This book, tho' never wholly reprinted, has been partly revived in epitomies of the whole (109), or dividedly, in a work, geographical, historical, and political, whereof the second part is abstracted from these lives (110). The subject matter of the book, is distributed under the several counties of England and Wales; each division beginning first, with the commodities, products, and other particulars most eminent and remarkable in each county; whether waters, minerals, plants, animals, manufactures, buildings, battles, proverbs, &c. then the worthies born or residing therein, marshalled under their respective ranks or professions; the whole contents of each county, ending with tables of the gentry that were therein in the reign of King Henry the Sixth; and a list of the Sheriffs, for several Kings reigns, down to King James or King Charles the First, with their arms described, and places of abode. Prefixed to the whole, is a copious introduction, in near twenty sheets, divided into many chapters; distinctly treating of this grand and comprehensive plan, the matter, order, and stile, &c. shewing how methodical and uniform he has been throughout; also apologizing for any defects that may have escaped his pen, and answering many objections which might be made to any part thereof: But as the heads of those preliminary discourses will best explain the contents of the book, and display as well the variety, as the grandeur of the undertaking; and as a recital of them will give the most ready command of the whole scheme, to those who would only be informed, or reminded thereof; or such as may be inclined to revive the author in a more correct edition; give us a continuation, or any other improvement of his model; the said heads are therefore here offered to their consideration, as follow.

Chapter the Ist, contains the general design; wherein, as learned Camden, and painful Speed, with others, have described the rooms in that convenient structure, to which he compares this nation: So he intends to describe the furniture of them, in the most signal products and persons of distinction, adorning the same: to these five ends, 1. To gain some glory to God. 2. To preserve the memory of the dead. 3. To present examples to the living. 4. To entertain the reader with delight. And lastly, To procure some honest profit to himself. II. Of the national commodities; as the manufactures, wonders, buildings, local proverbs, medicinal herbs, waters, &c. III. The first quaternion of persons; Princes, Saints, Martyrs, and Confessors. IV. Of Popes, Cardinals, and Prelates, before the Reformation. V. Since the Reformation. VI. Of our statesmen; as Chancellors, Treasurers, Secretaries of State, Admirals, and Deputies of Ireland. VII. Capital Judges, and

Of benefactors to the publick, with a recommendation of choice charities; under the heads of churches, free-schools, colleges, and almshouses; with a distinction of benefactors since, from those before the Reformation. XII. Of memorable persons, or such as were extraordinary for stature, strength, age, fertility, &c. XIII. Lord-Mayors of London. XIV. Catalogues of the gentry under Henry the Sixth; why inserted. XV. Other general rules and distinctions, for the author and reader's ease: As, his use of the word amplendum, expressing a want of fuller intelligence: And his use of S. N. signifying second nativity; that is, when a Worthy whose native country is not known, he is historized under that which was his place of residence: And by the abbreviation R. E. M. which implies removeable, upon better information: Also his rule for ranking under some one head, persons who have a claim to several. XXII. The precedency of several professions adjusted. XXIII. Of the authorities from whence the work is derived. XXIV. Concerning his double division of the English, according to their nation and profession. XXV. General exceptions against the stile and matter of the author prevented; by his propositions of, and answers to them, being twenty-four in number. XXVI. An apology for the involuntary omissions in this book.—The whole volume wants but few of a thousand pages, and seems to have been not quite finished at the end.

Tho' our author was very diligent, as hath been attested in a note before (111), in collecting his materials for this work; yet when several parts of it were written, he had the disadvantage of being unsettled, remote from proper libraries, and intelligent conversation, being as it were a travelling writer, and forced to leave blank spaces, especially for Dates; wherein he has sometimes modestly left his reader rather uninformed than misinformed; and sometimes again filled them up conjecturally, and without any supposed need of nice recollection, as he designed to be more exact upon better opportunities of examination; in several whereof he was prevented by death. But tho' he looked upon dates as so many little sparkling gems in history, that would reflect the clearest and most sudden light, a great way's off, he still found or thought them very slippery ware, liable, by the smallest and most imperceptible variations, to lead us greatly astray from truth; and speaks of Chronology in one of his books, as of a little furlly animal, that was apt to bite the fingers of those who handled it with greater familiarity than was absolutely necessary; yet he knew, there was no giving any satisfactory intelligence without it, especially in the writing of lives. But indeed, an accurate regard to the directions thereof, was little in use with any writers in this particular branch of history at those times; as, among many others, may be observed, to go no further, in the author of his own life, whose deficiencies we have here been at much trouble to supply; one instance only whereof we shall now repeat, having touched upon it before, in that author, which is, that tho' he gives us the titles of almost all Fuller's books, and their sizes, he has not given us the date of one. But it was a general or fashionable neglect, especially in the more polite and ornate writers, as if they thought that arithmetical figures would look like so many scars in the sleek face of their rhetorical phrase. But what our author, in apology for himself, has ingeniously observed further on this topic, we refer to his own words, in one or two of the chapters, whereof we have before given the heads (112). As to the historical particulars of these lives, no man could pretend to be very circumstantial, in a work that proposed to revive the famous men in a whole nation; such an undertaking can, or should give but a general and compendious view of them. Suppose here are eighteen or twenty hundred eminent persons characterized, much after the manner of those in his Church History; to have given a general satisfaction in all parts of the lives, actions, and works, of one or two only in every hundred, might have required more eyes, hands, and years, than nature allowed this author, and perhaps more abilities, knowledge, or information, than could be justly pretended to, by any of his ungrateful cavaliers. Then for the errors that must unavoidably occur, in the revival of such multitudes in all ages, our author's own apology, as it will be equally needful to any other compiler of a numerous collection of lives, is here produced from his own words, upon some objections made to Mr Fox the Martyrologist, as follow.

'It is impossible for an author of a voluminous book, consisting of several persons and circumstances, reader, in pleading for Master Fox, I plead for myself, to have such ubiquitary intelligence, as to apply the same infallibly to every particular (113).' But there is no winning the favour of those who think they have a licence for detraction, and may spoil an author with impunity, when he is incapable of self-defence, both of his reputation and his labours. Thus we may see some very rash censurers, superficially read, who have often pronounced their anathemas upon many other Historians, from the titles only of their writings, and sometimes without having ever seen so much as them, treating him also, like those who cannot be content with sheering the inoffensive prey that is free-yielding of his wool, but they must butcher him too: for surely, few have been so much pillaged, who have been so much disparag'd; he has been reproached for his ingenuity, by those who have no wit; and robb'd of his knowledge, by those who have no gratitude. Bishop Nicholson, who was too censorious, as we have seen, upon his last history, will also run the hazard of recrimination upon this. Our author begun his Worthies of England when he was Chaplain to the Lord Hopton, and it was his chief study, or mostly under his consideration by intervals, for near seventeen years, as it may be from this account computed; but the Bishop says it was buddled up in haste. Our author mentions, as we have quoted in this note, five reasons for publishing this book; but as if he had nothing more than a mercenary motive therein, the Bishop has sunk four of them, and quoting but the last induced you to believe, it was only for the procurement of some moderate profit to the author: and yet not quoted this honestly. The Bishop says, it corrects many mistakes in his Church History; but our author was acquainted with few mistakes, till a little time before he died, and then had little leisure or room to correct many, when the greatest part of his Worthies was printed off. The Bishop says, that Fuller's chief author is Bale, for the lives of his eminent writers; and he must have been his also, if he had wrote in Fuller's time, of the writers Bale has given account of, when Leland was not published; unless he would rather have followed Bale's Popish Plagiary; but a great part of the writers in Fuller, lived and wrote since Bale; therefore he had many other authorities for his writers, as may be sufficiently seen in his work. And whether our author has given more misshapen scraps, or lies, as they are called (114), of his Heroes, than the Bishop of his Historians, those may best judge who have read the one and the other; but if the Bishop would have undertaken to reform or rectify both, it might have been more acceptable, as well as more discreet, than to revile an author so extravagantly, as to vilify himself. In short, notwithstanding these hasty and immoderate aspersions, the characters or memorials here assembled, of so many great men, will always make the book necessary to be consulted; especially, as there are preserved therein, abundance of

ly occasional, or offered from time to time, as so many little whets, or stays, to the keen appetites of his curious readers; while his larger, and more splendid entertainments for them, were getting ready. lives, then first or newly written, and no where else to be had; which have been of good service to many grave writers of substantial credit, even in History, Antiquities, and Heraldry; who, wanting neither the judgment nor justice in themselves, which they might covet in their own readers, knew how to make proper uses of his work, and acknowledgments for what they drew from it, without turning executioners upon every trivial oversight, or expressing any grievance at his humour, or his wit. But since his character has been so much degraded by some, it will be but equitable, to shew that it has been no less exalted by others; and as he has bestowed a grateful remembrance upon many Poets, we have met with a retribution that has been attempted by one; in a Panegyric upon Biography in general, and this Biographer in particular. It was freely communicated from the author's original, in the possession of a late Nobleman, who was a signal Patron to some of the greatest Poets, and other ingenious men in his time: and since it has never been published; since it is entirely suitable in this, as it may be partly serviceable in any other Collection of illustrious men; or may in some part be no less applicable to any other Compiler, than to every Peruser of such collections, we shall here present it as follows, faithfully in its own language, without any apology for its length.

and WRITER
of

Written in FULLER'S WORTHIES.

HERE, from FAME'S Wardrobe, you may dress to please,
In Suits adorn'd, and shap'd to all degrees:
Each genius hence, may graceful Habits take;
No mind so warp'd, some mould won't straighter make.
Patterns that best become you, still prefer,
Without some wearing, they to ruin wear;
Some patterns yet, like tarnish'd lace, are worn,
And now disguise, what once they did adorn:
Then be not, servilely a slave to those;
Reform their Fashions, but refrain their Cloaths.

By the best chemic skill, their gifts combin'd,
May so concocted be, and so refin'd;
May, through your works, so undistinguish'd wreath,
As Incense rich, from Holy Altars breathe;
'Till, so the blended Aromatics rise,
In grateful gales, to greet the deities,
That we perceive no Franckincense exhale,
No Cassia here, or Storax there prevail;
Nor this, can Myrrh, that, Ambergriſe can call;
But one strong, curling odour, spires from all:
So when, such Sweets, you from these Flours have hiv'd,

From each they differ, as from all deriv'd.

CHUSE then with prudence, in your choice proceed,
Till those you follow, you're improv'd to lead.
The object equal to the human mind,
And most instructive, must be human-kind.
Read manly books then, books of men, and so,
That you proceed to do the best you know.
Peruse such lives, or parts, as you can live;
It is the practice must perfection give.
Souls, in which samples great, no semblance breed,
Like cold and hungry Soils, but rot the seed:
Or like weak stomachs, with strong food oppress'd,
By that ne'er nourish'd, which they ne'er digest.

For, as your meals should suit, to thrive aright,
Your constitution, and your appetite;
So your examples shou'd proportion'd be,
Both to your power, and your capacity.

SOME seek their minds with marvels to repleat,
And taste no objects they shou'd emulate:
Of things incredible, experience faith,
The feeblest judgments have the firmest faith:
Such, in admiring, still those hours destroy,
They in excelling, only should employ.

SOME think, distemper'd times less heal'd may be,
By wise mens woes, than fools felicity:
Think not, that fortitude grows more unsound,
By vice's balsam, than by virtue's wound:
'That without deeds, words hold no lasting height,
Unbodied feathers wanting nerves for flight:
While airy sounds soon lose their empty name,
Surviving record is substantial fame.
To boundless forms, some, crude collections breed,
And write a life, wou'd waste a life to read!
With griping hands, some shrink up life's short span,
And to a mite, epitomize a man!

Others add streams, to rivers swoln too high,
While drowned pastures unrecover'd lie;
Prop those, who boast superfluous aids to stand,
While crowds deserted, most their aid demand!
The aim's more lofty, th' art, in more esteem,
To save the sinking, than sink those who swim.
Thus, upon others lives, their own are lost,
Or least devoted, where deserved most.
But worse, desert in others, there is known,
Where none from others, or themselves, is shown;
Whose mem'ry of the GOOD, the LEARN'D, the BRAVE, Shou'd be their monument, and is their grave.

BUT victories o'er Death, must be renown'd;
Triumphs like those, must thro' fame's clarion sound:
His victors shou'd her richest trophies wear,
To fame who rescue, what the fates won't spare.
Garlands shall crown their works, that cannot fade;
The lights they lend, with lustre be repaid.
Who noblest do, most nobly must deserve;
Great, who perform, but greater who preserve:
If virtue most directs, which most dilates,
The draught excels, that most communicates;
Such copy spread, thus durably to all,
Begets more virtue, than th' original:
'Tis an original; its own outvy'd;
Where life less copied is, than multiply'd;
And they are deathless made, who long since dy'd. }
Thus, when a Heroe is compar'd to you,
Th' Historian is the Heroe of the two;
The BRAVE, LEARN'D, GOOD, more efficacious grown,
In your immortal lives, than in their own.

YOUR merit is, who labour'd hath so much,
Such to revive, to be reviv'd as such:
Our shame is, in your WORTHIES to be read,
Till one at least, each to their number add:
Till we, your Worthies reading, such shall turn,
As sacred Reliques sanctify the Urn:
'Till they, thro' you, dart influential worth,
As Stars, tho' fixt in Heav'n, shine down on Earth.

PHOEBUS, the fire of your resplendent wit,
Who blinds all brightness, must to your's submit:
HE, only in th' Horizon, gilds our day,
You here, tho' set, your glory still display.

siderable feast. Of these lesser tracts, now difficult to recover, we shall here only preserve the titles [R]; and proceed to observe, that, having been at Salisbury to settle his revenue, as Prebend of that Deanery, in his return about the tenth of August 1661, he brought home an aguish disorder, which turned to a malignant fever, whereof Dr Matthew Nicholas, Dean of St Paul's, after his return about the same time from the same place, died but two days before him (d). On Sunday the twelfth of that month he was taken with a dizziness in his head; upon which his eldest son, John, advised him to lie down, urging how dangerous such symptoms were; but he would go to Church, because he had promised a relation to preach his wedding sermon, declaring that he had often gone up into the pulpit sick, but always came down well (e); and said to his audience, I will preach this sermon, though it be my last. In the middle of it he faltered, and after it, was so weak that he was led down the pulpit-stairs, carried in a sedan to his lodgings in Covent-Garden, and put to bed. When Dr Walter Charlton, the Physician, came, he soon found him in a raging fever; which distemper he long before considered, and often discribed in his writings; but always suspiciously, if not prophetically, as what might be most fatal to, or was most feared by, him (f), and which was then so rife, and unufually violent, that it was called the new disease. Though he lost twenty ounces of blood, the paroxysms continued, and set the Physician's skill at defiance. It seized upon his intellects; but, in all his words, he would most frequently call out for, the pen and ink, ——— and, he would write it out. ——— On Wednesday the disease, like a flame which has nearly burnt up the spirits that fed it, abated, as his strength decayed. At last, his enfeebled senses were a while restored, but wholly alienated from all worldly thoughts; and the next morning, being the sixteenth of that month, the light of his life went gently out, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. A while after his death, an effusion of blood burst forth at his temples, which was thought to have been settled there by his sedate and intense application to his studies. The solemnity of his funeral was performed by the direction, and at the expence, of his noble friend the Lord Berkeley; and he was most reverently attended, by at least two hundred of the Clergy, to his grave; where his corps was deposited, in the chancel of Cranford church (g). Dr Thomas Hardy, the Dean of Rochester, preached his funeral sermon, in which he pathetically deplored so great a loss; to which learned discourse, we are further referred for his just commendation, when it had passed the press, as was then soon expected and desired; but we cannot find that it was ever printed. His Biographer, whom we have here been so much obliged to follow, has also given a copious character of him (*), an extract from which, of the most observable particulars, is hereunder added [S], as in this work it

[R] We shall here only preserve the titles.] These detached pieces, hitherto in this article unspoken of, are so many, that he might pass for a very industrious author, if he had never published the much larger quantity of his works which we have before mentioned; as may be seen by the following titles of them.

I. Joseph's party-coloured coat, and Sermons on the Corinthians; which we take to be the same with A Comment on part of the eleventh chapter of the first Epistle of the Corinthians; with other Tracts, by T. Fuller, B. D. and Prebendary of Sarum, 4to. 1640. The second edition enlarged, Cambridge 1648. II. Sermon on the Revelations, ii. 5. 4to. 1646. III. The Times anatomized, by T. F. 12mo. 1647. From those initial letters, we conceive; it has been ranged, with other books that were written by our author, under his name, in some catalogues: but as the writer of his life has left it out of his list, and A. Wood says, there was a little thing printed in 12mo. under the name of Thomas Forde, perhaps the same with him of that name beforementioned, entitled, The Anatomy of the Times, tho' Wood had never seen it (+), we think it most likely that the said Forde was the author. IV. Sermon on the 2d of Peter, i. 10. 4to. 1647. V. The Cause and Cure of a wounded Conscience. 8vo. 1647, 1649. VI. Sermons on Matthew, upon Temptations (or his Comment on the 11 first verses of the 4th chapter of St Matthew) 8vo. 1652. VII. The Infants Advocate; of Circumcision and Baptism, on Jewish Christian Children. 8vo. 1653. VIII. The Tripple Reconciler: flating the controversies, whether, 1. Ministers have a power of excluding Communicants. 2. Whether unordained persons may preach. 3. Whether the Lord's Prayer ought not to be used by Christians. 8vo. 1654. IX. A Fast Sermon preached on Innocents Day, 4to. X. Sermon of Life and Death, 8vo. XI. A Comment on Ruth, with two Sermons, 8vo. 1654. XII. Three Sermons, London, 8vo. 1655. XIII. Four Sermons, and notes upon Jonab. 8vo. 1656. XIV. The left name on earth, with other Sermons; and a copper print, in a 4to size, doubled in before it, of Thomas Fuller, B. D. and Historian; having paper, pen and ink beside him, 8vo. 1657. XV. The speech of birds, also of flowers, partly moral, partly mystical. 8vo. 1660. XVI. A Latin Tract on the Church in a MS. left imperfect; mentioned in the catalogue at the end of his life. XVII. The Library of British Historians MS— This is referred to by our author himself, in the beginning of his Church History (115): But as it was never printed, we take it to be a work only then intended separate, and that he afterwards incorporated those Historians among his Worthies. XVIII. T. Fuller's Triana: or Threefold Romanza, of Mariana, Paduana, and Sabina: 12mo. 1662. This, if written by our author, is a posthumous publication, which we have several times met with ascribed to him in some catalogues, but never saw the book (||). XIX. Several Letters to his Friends at Cambridge, and other places; which, as he had so many patrons, and so many occasions of intelligence, from his correspondents in relation to their own knowledge, or the particulars in many books concerning the eminent and learned persons, he so much enquired after, must have been so numerous, that a good volume might doubtless have been collected out of them, especially if the answers he received, had been added thereunto.

[S] An extract from his character is hereunto added.] This we must chiefly gather from the author of his life; who beginning with his person, informs us what a convenient habitation, learning and virtue had chosen (116); in which nothing could be complained of but that they were tenants for so short a term. He was of a stature rather tall, or exceeding the middle size, and of a becoming bigness, not inclined to corpulency; exactly strait, and proportionable, of a florid or sanguine complexion; his hair short, light coloured, and naturally curling; in his gait somewhat stately or majestic; in his garb the less careful externally, as he was so curious in that of his mind. As he had such an honourable and numerous acquaintance, he was no ways undisciplined in the arts and forms of courtly it may be expected. Mr James Heath, who wrote a Chronicle of the Civil Wars, also published an Elegy upon Dr Thomas Fuller, that most incomparable Writer, &c. and it was printed on a sheet, in broad-side, the same year he died (b). But here to conclude; as our author bestowed so much time and pains in illustrating so many lives and characters of others; thus much, at least, we hope cannot be here thought redundant, by candid and grateful readers, in commemoration of himself.

courtly civility, but they were circumscribed by his sincerity, to an easy and succinct compass. He was a walking library, but sometimes required turning over to attain the contents; and when he was unbent from his studies, no man could better promote civilized and well tempered mirth. In diet, he was very temperate, especially as to liquor, which greatly contributed to his little need of sleep, and his great share of health, till his first sickness, and his last. All his recreation was intellectual; even riding he little indulged, but on his necessary occasions. He was a kind husband to both his wives, a tender parent to both his children, sparing no cost in the education of them, and serviceable to his neighbours; who found it the greatest prudence to rely on his advice. He never indulged his correction or severity so much, as on the offspring of his brain; and tho' he might not entirely clear all the cockle from his corn, any more than his adversaries from theirs, yet they have plough'd with his heifers, and been beholden to the direction of his authorities for many exceptions they made against him. He had a memory so vastly comprehensive (117), that he is deservedly known for the first inventor of that noble art (*), whereof he left no rules behind him, but many extraordinary proofs; as, after a walk from Temple-Bar to the furthest conduit in Cheapside, his repeating all the signs on both sides of the way, orderly without missing or misplacing one; and so he would do by the words of different languages to any number; to the great astonishment of his hearers. Yet he would say, as we are told by David Lloyd, that the art of memory was apt to corrupt the nature of it. Which may be, as others have explained, that some men, thro' an insatiable monopoly of knowledge, so much trust to the numerous notifications of what they would not forget, till they lose all recollection of what they preserved, and cannot remember what is become of their memorandums. But what was most strange and rare, was his way of writing; somewhat like that of the Chinese, from the top to the bottom of the page. He would write next the margin, the first words that should make every line, down to the foot of the paper; then beginning at the head again, would so perfectly fill up every one of the lines, as, without spaces, interlineations or contractions, would so connect the ends and beginnings, that the sense would appear as complete, and as much to his mind, he would say, as if he had writ it after the ordinary manner, in a continued series (118); which seems to denote a great command of the language, and is somewhat like the practice that has been among some Poets, especially in France, who would set one another tasks of difficult rhymes, as incoherent as they could in sense, to be filled up with words, that would make them complete verses. Our author, speaking of a ledger-book collected by Robert Fuller, the last Abbot of Waltham, gives a character of him as a happy penman, for his fair and fast writing therein; and adds, that others of his surname were no less defective in those qualities (119). The treasury of this happy memory, with his great reading, ready faculties of invention, distinction, application, and graceful elocution, completed him for the pulpit: and even upon very obscure texts of Scripture, of which some noble friends would desire his explanation, he would, only upon two hours warning, acquit himself with great applause. 'Twas sufficiently known how well grounded he was in the Protestant Religion, against the innovations of the Presbytery, and the schism of Independency; but his zeal against these, was allay'd with greater compassion, than towards the Papists; distinguishing between the seducers and the seduced. He avoided polemical controversies with one and the other, as endless or needless; and looked upon the new invented arguments against Episcopacy, but as insects of a day. While the Clergy were widening the divisions by their warm debates, he both preached and practised moderation; growing, in the promotion thereof, more diligent, as the dawning Restoration grew more visible; when he most plainly saw, how necessary the condescension of all parties would be, to remove all cause or remembrance of their former contentions, and combine in the establishment of a general concord (†). As he chose not to struggle thro' or make his way foremost in the crowd at Court; had he lived till the tide of solicitations was abated, 'tis not doubted but his advancement in the Church would have been no less eminent than his merits; especially since he had so many noble and honourable friends; who, thro' their affection to his virtuous and agreeable qualities, would have been as liberal of their interest in the preferment of his person, as they had been of their contributions, in the publication of his works.

G.

GALE (THEOPHILUS), a very pious Divine, as well as a very learned and elegant writer, among the Nonconformists, in the XVIIth century (a). He was descended from a very good family in the West of England; and his father was Dr Theophilus Gale, Prebendary of Exeter, and Vicar of King's-Teignton in Devonshire (b), where this son of his was born some time in 1628 (c). He received the rudiments of polite learning in his father's vicaridge-house, which having cultivated in a neighbouring grammar-school, he was, when about nineteen, sent to the University of Oxford, where he became a Commoner of Magdalen college some time in 1647, that is, after the surrender of that place, as one of the King's garrisons, to the forces of the Parliament (d). He was much distinguished, soon after his coming thither, by Dr John Wilkinson, who was then President. In 1648, he was appointed a Demy of that college, by the Parliament Visitors (e). In 1649, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, December the seventeenth, and had this character from the Commissioners (f) before mentioned, that he was Vir provectioris ætatis, & uberioris Spei Juvenis, somewhat advanced in age (as to the usual time of taking that degree), and a youth of pregnant hopes. In 1650, he was chosen Fellow of his College, when many of his seniors were set by (g). He was no less countenanced by Dr Goodwin, than by the former President (h); and having, June the eighteenth 1652, completed his degree of Master of Arts, he became an eminent Tutor, and a distinguished Preacher (i). Among other pupils under his care at that time, was Mr Ezechieh Hopkins, afterwards Lord Bishop of Rhaphoe in the kingdom of Ireland, and one of the most pathetick preachers of that age; who was but five years younger than Mr Gale his tutor (k). In 1657, he went to Winchester, and became there a stated preacher, where, as well for his exemplary life and conversation, as for his excellent sermons, he was generally esteemed and admired (l). Upon the Restoration of King Charles the Second, not being able to conform to the terms prescribed by-law, he was excluded from the publick exercise of his function, and lost likewise his Fellowship (m). In this situation of his affairs, he was taken into the family of Philip Lord Wharton, who put his two sons, Thomas, afterwards the famous Marquis of Wharton, father of the late Duke, and Godwin, under his care; with whom he travelled in the month of September 1662, and resided with them for some time at Caen in Normandy, then a celebrated seminary for learning, under the direction of some of the most distinguished Professors of the Reformed Religion in France (n). This excursion into foreign parts was of very great service to Mr Gale, as well in the enlarging his mind and affording him an opportunity of acquiring the French language, as in procuring him the acquaintance of the famous Mr Bochart, and other great men who then resided there; and, by a communication of studies, improving those extraordinary talents nature had bestowed (o). In 1665, he returned with his pupils into England; and being now released from that employment, he became an assistant to Mr John Rowe, his countryman (p), who had then a private congregation in Holborn. Some time after this, his papers, which were his greatest treasure, and which, at his going over to France, he confided to the care of a friend in London, narrowly, but luckily, escaped (q) that dreadful fire which will be ever remembered, for the devastation it made in this metropolis [A]. As Mr Gale had now some leisure, he resolved to prosecute a great

[A] For the devastation it made in this metropolis. It is to be regretted, that we have not a more distinct account of this accident. Upon Mr Gale's coming from France, he carried his pupils to the Seat of the Lord Wharton their father, and in his return from thence to London in the beginning of September 1666, he was struck with the dreadful sight of the city in flames (1). His concern for his friend, as well as the effects which he had deposited with him, naturally prompted him to enquire of almost all he met, whether such a street, naming the place where his friend lived, was in danger; to which they very uniformly answered, that great work, which he had for many years in his mind; for compleating of which he had made vast collections, and on the principal points of which he had consulted the most learned amongst his friends. The care he had of his reputation, as well as the vast extent of his plan, and the great pains it required to digest his large stock of materials into a clear and concise method, took up a great deal of time, and obliged him to add several things to his original draught (r), that it might the more effectually answer the important ends himself proposed, and the high expectations of those he had occasionally consulted about it [B]. At length, when it was entirely finished, he grew apprehensive that the bulk of it that it was wholly burnt to the ground. This was very bitter news at the first hearing, and he could not help regretting the loss of so many years reading, and the large collections which had cost him so much time and pains, and which he had little spirit left to think of going through a second time. By degrees, however, he quieted his thoughts, and as his learning, his passions, and his desires, were always subservient to his religion, he did not disquiet himself in vain, but submitted patiently to an evil, which he thought past remedy. It was not long before he met with his friend, and having received from him a detail of this dreadful calamity, with this alleviating circumstance, however, that by timely and vigorous precautions he had happily saved a good part of his effects, Mr Gale could not help interjecting this short question, and what is become of my desk? 'Why truly, replied his friend, that is saved too, and by a very singular accident. It stood in my counting house, the contents of which being thrown into a cart, I thought there was still something wanting to make up a load, and in that instant calling my eyes upon your desk, in it went among the rest, and you may have it returned when you please.' This, as it may be imagined, filled the mind of Mr Gale with joy, and as it was a very acceptable thing to him, so it was no inconsiderable benefit to the learned world, for if that desk had perished, the Court of the Gentiles had never appeared.

[B] He had occasionally consulted about it.] It was about the time he began his studies at Oxford, that our author observing what Grotius had remarked in his excellent book of the truth of the Christian Religion, began to be persuaded that it might be made appear, 'the wisest and most esteemed of the Pagan Philosophers, borrowed the most rational of their sentiments, and were indebted for their most sublime contemplations, as well natural and moral, as divine, from the Scriptures; so that how different soever they might be in their appearance, not only their Theology, but their Philosophy, and Philology were derived from the sacred oracles.' The more he considered and reflected upon this proposition, it seemed to him of so much the more importance, and his conviction was the stronger when he manifestly perceived that the most able and judicious critics in all ages had expressed their approbation of this opinion. As for instance, Josephus in his book against Appion; Origen in his defence of Christianity against Celsus; that learned Christian Father, Clement of Alexandria, in the first book of his Miscellanies; Eusebius, in his Evangelical Preparation; Tertullian, in many of his writings; Augustin, in his book of the city of God; John the Grammarian, in his treatise of the creation of the world. Steuchus Eugubinus, Ludovicus Vives, with other learned Papists of the former age; as also Julius and Joseph Scaliger, Serranus, Vossius, Sandford, Heinsius, Eochart, Selden, Jackson, Hammond, Usher, Preston, Owen, Stillingfleet, with others among the Protestants. He thought that so many great men could not be deceived, and he was fully satisfied, that if, upon a close and strict examination, this proposition could be made out to the satisfaction of reasonable and learned men, it would be attended with many very high advantages to the Christian Religion. Upon this principle he undertook so arduous and so painful a work, which however he went through cheerfully for the course of twelve or fourteen years, being continually stimulated from the hopes he entertained of its good effects, which were chiefly these. First, he thought that this would greatly confirm the authority and demonstrate the perfection of the sacred Scriptures, in which he was not led by his own sentiment only, but by the example of several modern Divines, and particularly of the most learned Stillingfleet. His second motive must be expressed in his own words (2), because they shew the reason upon which the title of his book is founded. 'Another great end I have in this discourse, is to demonstrate what great marks of divine favour and rich tokens of his Grace, Christ the Mediator has been pleased to vouchsafe to his poor afflicted Church. And indeed is it not a great mark of honour that his poor infant Church, so much despised and persecuted by the Gentile world, should be not only the seat of his own presence and worship, but also as the moon to reflect some broken rays, or imperfect traditions of that glorious light she received from the sun of righteousness to the Pagan world, which lay wrapt up in midnight darkness? What, that the proud Sophists of Greece, esteemed the eye of the world for human wisdom, should be fain to come and light their candles at this sacred fire, which was lodged in the Jewish Church! That the poor Temple of Jerusalem should have a COURT for the GENTILES, to which they must be all beholding for their choicest wisdom, how great an honour is this for Mount Zion the Church of God!' His third motive was to exterminate a false notion, that the rational divinity, and sound morality scattered through the writings of Pagan Philosophers, were deductions made by the pure light of nature; whereas in truth, they are at best but broken traditions derived from the sacred Scriptures, and the Doctrines of the Jewish Church. The fourth great view that he had, was to disabuse the minds of many young students prepossessed with gross, yea in some degree blasphemous, ideas and notions touching God, his names, attributes, nature, operations, &c. sucked in together with those poisonous insusions they derived from ethnic Poets and Mythologists. The sad experience hereof made many of the primitive Christians, as well learned as others, greatly decry and declaim against the reading of Pagan books, specially Poets (3). 'Yea, Plato himself, says he, in his discourse of Mimetic Poetrie, is very invective against it, demonstrating how the minds of young students, by reading such romantic or fabulous stories of the gods, and things divine, are first abused with false images, and then adulterated and corrupted with false principles which draw on corrupt practices. Wherefore, in the idea of his commonwealth, he gives order that such mimetic or fable-coining Poets be banished, tho' with respect, from his commonwealth. For the preventing or removing of such corruptions, I have endeavoured to decipher or unriddle the whole Pagan Ægyptioria, or the genealogie of the Pagan Gods; as also other parts of history, Mythology touching the first chaos, the golden age, the several floods under Deucalion, &c. the Giants war, with other pieces of Mythology, and Pagan Theology, so common among the ancient Poets and Historiographers. Hereby we shall come to understand the original ideas of those monstrous fables, as also disabuse our minds from those false images of things divine and human, which are so pleasing to corrupt nature, and too often prove a foundation of atheism. If thou shalt, reader, continues our author, farther inquire into the motives and reasons which have induced me to suffer this discourse to come under public view, then be pleased to take notice, that I am not so much mine own flatterer, as not to be sensible of many imperfections, both as to matter and form, which may render it unfit for any curious eye or palate. Indeed, I have neither time nor capacity, no, nor yet a will, to polish and flourish it, so as to render it acceptable to every curious critic. I have always affected, with that great master of wisdom, Padre Paulo, the Venetian, it might prejudice it with some; that many might esteem some portions, tho' they might disapprove others; and that it would be prudent to see how it might be relished, before the whole was committed to the press; which determined him to publish it in parts. After this wise resolution, the press being then subject to restraint, he applied himself, as a member of the University, to Dr John Fell, then Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, for his licence, who, as he was a zealous friend to the Church of England, was also a true patron and encourager of learning, and therefore granted, with much readiness, that mark of his approbation of the work (s). Thus all obstacles being now removed, the first part of THE COURT OF THE GENTILES appeared, and was received with great applause (t). In process of time, encouraged by this candour and kind treatment, the author ventured to publish likewise the three following parts, of that truly learned work [C]. The love of privacy, the desire he had to pursue his studies, and the convenience of instructing a few young persons under his own roof, of which none was more capable, induced him to make choice of Newington for his retreat (u), where he was often visited by persons of distinction, and some not of his own communion, who were desirous, by their respect for him, to testify their esteem for unaffected piety and extensive learning. Upon the demise of Mr Thomas Tregosse, a zealous Nonconformist minister, but a very loyal, peaceable, and worthy person, it was resolved to put some little remains of his to the

' tian, to suit my form to my matter, as nature does, and not my matter to my form, as the schools are wont to do. This with other moving considerations, detained me some while from publishing this discourse, which was, in the first draught thereof, intended for the private instruction of some persons of noble condition committed to my tuition: But that which prevailed upon me to let it pass a more common view and censure, besides my general ends above specified, is the persuasion of several judicious, learned, and pious friends, who conceive it may be some way useful at least, for the instructing of young students, which is a main consideration I had in mine eye, when I first undertook the composition thereof.'

[C] Of that truly learned work.] In this note we shall give the reader an account of the different times in which the several parts of this very learned performance came abroad. The Title of which was,

The COURT OF THE GENTILES; or, a Discourse touching the Original of human Literature, both PHILOLOGIE and PHILOSOPHY, from the SCRIPTURES and JEWISH Church, in order to a Demonstration of,

I. The Perfection of GOD's Word and Church Light.

II. The Imperfection of Nature's Light, and mischief of Vain Philosophy.

III. The right use of human Learning, and especially found Philosophy.

Part the first, Of Philology, was printed Oxon. 1669, and there again, 1672, in 4to. The second part, which is of Philosophy, was printed Oxon. 1671, and at London, 1676, in 4to. Of these two parts, there is a laudable account in the Philosophical Transactions

(4) Vol. VI. No. lxxiv. p. 2231.

(4). The third part, of the vanity of Pagan Philosophy, was printed Lond. 1677; and the fourth part, of Reformed Philosophy, was printed there the same year, both in 4to. These four parts, says Wood, shew the author to have been well read in, and conversant with, the writings of the Fathers, the old Philosophers, and those that have given any account of them or their works. As also to have been a good Metaphysician and School Divine. But to give the reader a clearer idea of this large and learned work, it may not be amiss to speak particularly of the aim and intention of each of these parts.

In the first he endeavours to prove, that all languages have their origin and rise from the Hebrew, intancing particularly in the Oriental tongues, as the Phœnician, Coptic, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Samaritan, and Ethiopic; and then in the European, especially the Greek, Latin, the old Gallic, and Britannic. To which he adds a deduction, importing, that the Pagan Theology, Physic, Politics, Poësie, History, Rhetoric, are traduced from sacred names, persons, rites, and records, and shewing withal, how the Jewish traditions came to be corrupted and mistaken by Pagans.

In the second part, he maketh it his business to evince, that Philosophy also hath it's original from the Jewish Church; beginning to shew this of the Barbaric Philosophy, under which he comprehends the Egyptian, Phœnician, Chaldean, Persian, Indian, Ethiopic, Scythian, and Britannic; and thence, proceeding to the Grecian, and chiefly to the Ionic and Italic, or Pythagorean, where he shews great reading and learning, whilst he deduceth this doctrine of Judaic origin, from the testimonies of Heathen, Jewish, and Christian, both ancient and modern, authors, passing through all the particular sects of Philosophers, with great sollicitation and industry; and promising at the end of this work, that he is willing to undertake another treatise, to shew both the mischief of vain, and the usefulness of found, Philosophy, to Christian religion.

In the third, the vanity of Pagan Philosophy is demonstrated from it's causes, parts, proprieties, and effects; namely, Pagan idolatry, Judaic apostacy, Gnostic infusions, errors among the Greek Fathers, specially Origen, Arianisme, Pelagianisme, and the whole system of Papisme, or Antichristianisme, distributed into three parts, Mystic, Scholastic, and Canonic Theology.

In the fourth part he treats of Reformed Philosophy, wherein Plato's moral and metaphysic, or prime Philosophy, is reduced to an useful form and method. He divides this, which is larger than any of the former parts, into three books, discoursing in the first, of Moral Philosophy, in the second, of Metaphysics, and in the third, of Divine Predetermination. This last seems to have been a distinct piece, and to have been published after the fourth part of the Court of the Gentiles, to which it serves as an appendix, having a distinct preface and table of contents, which is not the method pursued through the rest of the work. The judicious Morhoff (5) gives a very advantageous character of our author and his work, and acknowledges, that, with much patience and application, as well as with great parts and learning, he had run through the whole circle of Jewish, Christian, and Hebrew learning; and with great diligence, and no less candour, had digested whatever was worth reading and consideration, in an accurate and perspicuous manner. We may plainly perceive in those parts of Bishop Huet's famous work, which relate to the same subject, that he was not unacquainted with Mr Gale's performance, or with another piece of his, of which we shall speak hereafter. Indeed, the author beforementioned assures us, that there was a Latin translation of the Court of the Gentiles, before the second edition of the original appeared in England, by which the reputation of the author was spread into all parts of Europe, but more especially in Germany, where his labours met with great applause. Here at home the learned ushered in both the editions of the first parts, according to the mode of that time, with Latin and English poems, of these the English pindaric before the first part, contains some fine strophes. Before the second part, there is a long Latin poem, subscribed Thomas Gilbert, and a shorter by Owen Price, M. A. a long Pindaric poem, probably by the same person, who wrote that prefixed to the first part, and a shorter complement in heroics, both without any name subscribed.

the press; and the better to preserve his memory, it was wished that some particulars of his life should be prefixed (w). Our author undertook and performed it with spirit and eloquence, for it was a subject very well suited to his temper, and he was perfectly satisfied as to the veracity of the facts which he reported, and which were very much enlivened by the manner in which he set them forth; and yet he so carefully concealed his being the author, that we do not find it mentioned in any catalogue of his writings (x) [D]. In the discharge of his ministry, and the improvement of his faculties, he spent his years in solitude and quiet; and yet in a way highly useful to his contemporaries, and to posterity (y). He composed, amongst other useful and learned treatises, a compendious view of the ancient Philosophy in general (z), with an immediate regard to the service of his pupils, but in such a manner as that it might be very advantageous to the publick; and therefore, at the request of several eminent and worthy persons, he printed it in Latin, which is one reason perhaps why it is less known than so judicious a treatise deserves [E]. We mention these

This Mr Thomas Tregosse was of an ancient and worthy family, seated at St Ives in Cornwall, and educated in Exeter college at Oxford; he was a zealous nonconformist minister, and fessed for preaching privately very much. Amongst his other misfortunes he was once sent to the Marshal of Bodmyn, to be kept in custody as a dangerous and seditious person, of which King Charles II, being informed, and being also acquainted, that notwithstanding what was set forth in his commitment, he was so far from meddling with state affairs, that he did not so much as touch the controversies between the Church and the Dissenters, in any of his sermons; but, on the contrary, exhorted his hearers to live peaceably, and to manifest their faith by their works; his Majesty directed a special order to the Marshal to set him at liberty. Yet this did not hinder his being seized and imprisoned afterwards; and much notice was taken of misfortunes that befel those who were instrumental in his troubles; and it was currently reported, that he had prophesied the death of one of his great persecutors. Mr Gale mentions this matter, but not in such terms as will justify that report; for he tells us (6), 'that after Mr Tregosse had been committed by Mr Robinson, to Lancaster Jail for three Months, and had been four days returned home, Mr Robinson, who was indeed fatigable, gave out, that he would speedily send him back again to the place from whence he came. In order where-to, providing to ride to market, to procure another justice to join with him in a warrant, for a second conviction of Mr Tregosse, for a conventicler, and to prosecute some other; whilst he was at a tenement of his, his own bull, which was never known to hurt any before, followed him in a field with much fury, and gave him deadly wounds, whereof he shortly died.' This shews that Mr Gale was very cautious in his expressions; and tho' he might be of opinion himself, as indeed it is clear enough he was, that there was somewhat providential in this case, yet he would not take upon him to declare it a judgment, as many had before, and some very deliberately, have since done.

[E] Than so judicious a treatise deserves.] The title of this book runs thus:

Philosophia Generalis in duas partes determinata, una de Ortu & Progressu Philosophiæ, &c. Altera, 1. De Minorum Gentium Philosophiâ 2. De 9 Habitibus intellectualibus. 3. De Philosophiæ Objecto. London 1676, 8vo. That is, A General View of the Rise and Progress of Philosophy; to which are added, some particular Treatises.

In this book, which is very learned, and where, in a very narrow compass, the sentiments of the Ancients may be found, upon almost every subject of importance, the chief design of the author is the very same with that, in his Court of the Gentiles, only here he writes more concisely, and fitter for the perusal of such, as were engaged in a regular course of study, to whose use it was especially designed. What is said in the text, of it's being less known from it's being written in Latin, relates to our own island only, where this piece of Mr Gale's is in a great measure neglected, while a great many books, that might be named, that have been picked out of it, are in great esteem. It is quite otherwise abroad, where it is the best known of any of his works, much read, and highly commended. Morhoff particularly gives it a very good character, and represents it as highly useful in affording a considerate person the sense of antiquity at a single view, upon any point whatever. It must not however be disssembled, that in one thing he passes a censure upon our author, but with great decency and moderation (7). He says, that when learned men have addicted themselves to any particular hypothesis, they bend every subject that way, from which failing he thinks our author not entirely free, in his endeavouring to deduce all the arts of Philosophy and fabulous Divinity of the ancient Pagans, from the law and doctrine of the Jews. His position, generally speaking, is, without doubt, true enough; for we may very easily perceive, that the friends of an hypothesis, and much more the author of one, will bend things any way, rather than suffer the repugnancy of them to their own sentiments from becoming apparent. In this case, however, it is to be considered, that some very learned men have been in a direct opposite way of thinking, and have laboured to prove, that the Pagan notions were so far from being borrowed from the Jewish Church, that there was a visible conformity between the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic Institution, and the religious customs of certain idolatrous nations, and more especially the Egyptians. Now we can hardly believe, that persons so opposite in their judgments, should agree in a falsehood; and if this be right reasoning, then there must be certainly a strong likeness between the facts in the Jewish History, and the fables in the Heathen Mythology; and granting this, we cannot certainly be at a loss to distinguish the original from the copy. There is in the Sacred Writings, a majestic simplicity that has been admired, even by the Heathens themselves; there was a certain childishness in the Ethnick Theology, which the wiser Pagans despised. We have no reason then to doubt of the foundation, or to suspect that our learned author, and all who went before him in his opinion, were mistaken, or that the French Prelate Huet, or our most learned Bishop Cumberland, were misled by their authorities; notwithstanding which, we are at liberty to doubt, and we may presume, that this is all that the judicious Morhoff means, whether in every particular these authors have been right in their conjectures; for it is one thing to lay down, and prove the truth of a general proposition, and quite another, to make a long train of deductions with equal truth and certainty. The greatest master in figures may mistake in a particular calculation, but it would be very unfair to infer from thence, the falsity of the rule by which he wrought. These reflections relate equally to this treatise of Philosophy, and to the Court of the Gentiles, and are intended purely for the reader's satisfaction, and to do justice to the skill and diligence of our learned and worthy author; not to represent him as infallible, or incapable of making mistakes, upon subjects so perplexed and embarrassed as those were, and ever will be, which he undertook to handle. His design in both books was good, and he pursued it with indefatigable labour, which is more than sufficient to justify the little pains we have taken works of his particularly, because in those days they gained him universal esteem; but his other performances deserve also to be remembered, as breathing the same spirit of kindness and charity, tho' some of them written on less striking subjects; and therefore the reader will find an exact catalogue of them in the notes (a), with some necessary remarks [F]. Upon the death of Mr John Rowe, to whom, as we have said, he was for many years assistant, October the twelfth 1677, he, together with Mr Samuel Lee, was chosen Pastor of his congregation (b). He continued, as long as his strength would permit, to labour for the service of the Church of CHRIST, and in promoting, as it's support, sound literature. A very short space before his death, he published proposals for printing by subscription a very large and useful work, which he had long under his hands, and which was very far advanced (c). This, with some pieces he left behind him, served to prove how well he had spent his time, and how great a loss the world had, in so learned, so ingenious, so communicative, so indefatigable; and, in all respects, so pious and worthy a person [G]. He breathed his last, either at the close of the month of February, or in the beginning of the month of March 1678, when he was in his fiftieth year (d). He was decently interred in the burying-ground near Bunhill-Fields, and his death universally regretted (e). He was a man whose learning made him admired and esteemed, by all who were judges of it; his piety was so evident and unaffected, his course of life so innocent and uniform, that his example went as far as his sermons; he was stedfast in his opinions, and warm in the defence of them; but had charity for those who differed from him, whom he would labour to convince, but not to compel; he was as much an enemy to sedition as to persecution; and the known aversion he had to the former, defended him from the latter, when many of his brethren were exposed. In a word, he maintained to the last the character which he had early acquired, of having, in a very high degree, those qualities that most adorn a Minister of CHRIST, which secured him the love and veneration of men sincere and devout of all parties (f). His concern for learning and piety, reached beyond the times in which he lived; not in his writings only, but in the manner in which he disposed of the temporal goods, which either came to him by descent, or were the product of his œconomy in managing his small income. He bestowed all his estate, real and personal, on young students of his own principles, and appointed trustees to manage it for their support (g). All his well chosen library he gave towards promoting useful learning in New England, where, at that time, such a numerous collection was a publick benefit. Out of this, he excepted only such books of Philosophy as might be judged more proper for young students here; and thus having spent his whole life in doing good, he provided at his death that there might be a continuance of persons of the same frame of mind, and of like qualifications with himself, or at least he did towards such a provision all that was in his power.

to set his character, and that of his writings, in their true light; and so far as in our power lies, to revive the credit of both, as is certainly our duty.

[F] With some necessary remarks. In this note, we are to give the reader an account of such other pieces, as fell from the pen of Mr Theophilus Gale, which we shall do as exactly as we can; tho' it is not impossible, that some may have escaped us, but if there be any, such it is most likely, that they are prefaces to other mens works; or, it may be, that some of the treatises he left behind him, have been published without any mention of the author. The treatises known to be his are these:

The true Idea of Janfenism, both Historick and Dogmatick, Lond. 1669, 8vo. The large Preface to it was written by Dr John Owen.

Theophily; or, A Discourse of the Saint's Amity with GOD in CHRIST, &c. Lond. 1671, 8vo.

The Anatomy of Infidelity; or, an Explication of the Nature, Causes, Aggravations, and Punishment of Unbelief. Lond. 1672, 8vo.

A Discourse of CHRIST's coming, and the Influence which the Expectation thereof, &c. Lond. 1673, 8vo.

Idea Theologiæ tam contemplatiuæ quam activæ, ad formam S. Scripturæ delineata. Lond. 1673, 12mo. That is, An Idea of Theology, contemplative as well as active, according to the Holy Scriptures.

Wherein the Love of the World is inconsistent with the Love of God. A Sermon on the 1 Epist. of John, chap. ii. ver. 15. Lond. 1674. And in the Supplement to the Morning Exercise at Cripplegate:

A Summary of the two Covenants. This is set before a book by him published, intituled, A Discourse of the Two Covenants, &c. Lond. 1678. fol. Written by William Strong, some time Preacher in the Abbey Church at Westminster.

There is another book usually put into the catalogues of his works, which bears this title.

Ars Sciendi; sive Logica novo Methodo disposita, & novis præceptis aucta, Lond. 1682, 8vo. This is John Clauberg's Logic, and Ars Cogitandi, called the Jansenits Logic, digested into one volume, with some alterations and enlargements; but we are assured by Dr Calamy (8), that this was unjustly ascribed to Mr Theophilus Gale.

[G] So pious and worthy a person ] The title of this work, of which he gave a large account in his printed proposals for publishing it, ran thus:

Lexicon Græci Testamenti Etymologicum Synonymum sive Glossarium & Homonymum.

This Lexicon of the Greek Testament was finished as far as the letter Iota; and the most considerable words were also placed under the other letters. It would have made when printed, a large folio volume, and have been much more compleat in every respect, than any thing of the kind yet extant, the author intending that it should serve for a Concordance as well as a Lexicon, and with that view, had taken great pains in settling the different senses of the same word, shewing whence they arose, and how they might be with certainty distinguished. It was a great loss to the world, that he did not live to compleat it; and still a greater, that we have not so much as the titles of the other manuscripts which he left behind him. It is very remarkable, that in Anthony Wood's account of Mr Gale, there is not the least abatement or restriction in his commendations; and it is no less remarkable, that the Reverend Mr Echard (9), joining his accounts of Dr Thomas Manton, and Mr Theophilus Gale, says, the latter seemed to have more learning and less fashion than the former; he adds, that he shewed himself to be a man of vast reading and industry, an exact Philologist and Philosopher, as his Court of the Gentiles, and other learned works, sufficiently testify; and that in the midst of his great designs, he was snatched away in the prime of his years. These testimonies do as much honour to those who gave, as to the memory of him to whom they are given.

G A L E (THOMAS), a most excellent scholar in the last century, was born at Scruton in Yorkshire, in the year 1635, or 1636 [A], and educated in Westminster-school. Thence he was elected a scholar of Trinity-college Cambridge, of which he became Fellow (a). He took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1658, that of Master in 1662, and accumulated the Degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity in 1675 (b). At the opening of the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, July 12, 1669, he was incorporated Master of Arts in that University (c). Among other branches of learning, he distinguished himself most particularly by his curious, critical, and exact knowledge of the Greek tongue; of which he was Regius Professor at Cambridge: And he published new and accurate editions of several ancient writers in that language; whereof an account is given below. In 1672, he was chosen Head-master of St Paul's-School in London, in the room of Mr Samuel Cromleholme; and had the Honour of being employed by that city, to write the elegant inscriptions on the Monument, erected in memory of the dreadful conflagration in 1666; for which he was presented with a piece of plate (d). June 7, 1676, he was collated to a Prebend in the Cathedral church of St Paul's (e). He was also a Fellow of the Royal Society, to which he gave a Roman urn with its ashes. About the year 1697, he presented the new Library at Trinity-college in Cambridge, with a great number of curious Arabic manuscripts (f). This most learned and industrious person, tho' encumbered with the care of so large a school, found means to publish new Editions of several ancient valuable Greek authors: Namely, A collection of the Mythologists, and other writers of moral and natural Philosophy [B]: A collection of authors on the Poetical History [C]: The select Rhetors, or Orators [D]: Jamblichus of Mysteries [E]: An Edition of the Greek Psalter, from the Alexandrine MS. [F]: and Herodotus [G]. He also revised Cicero's Works, printed in 1684 [H]; and published two volumes in folio of our ancient English Historians [I]. After having continued about twenty-five years Head-Master of St Paul's-school,

[A] Was born at Scruton in Yorkshire, in the year 1635, or 1636.] We learn from his Epitaph, that he died April 8. 1702. in the 68th year of his age. And as it doth not appear how far he was then advanced into his 68th year, he might therefore be born either in the year 1635, or in the beginning of 1636.

[B] A collection of the Mythologists, &c.] The title of which volume is, Opuscula Mythologica, Ethica, & Physica, Græcæ & Latine. Containing. 1. *Pa-lecti: viz. 1. Demetrius Phalereus de Elucutione.

Editio emendatio.* 2. Tiberius Rhetor de Schematibus apud Demosthenem. 3. Anonymus Sophista de Rhetorica. These two, first published by our learned author, with a Latin version. 4. Severi Sophiste Alex-andriini Ethopoeiæ. Published before by Fred. Morel and Leo Allatius, but more correctly by Dr Gale, with a new translation. Oxon. 1676. 8vo.

[E] Jamblichus of Mysteries.] Under this title, Jamblichus Chalcidensis de Mysteriis. Epistola Porphyrii de eodem argumento. Græcæ & Latine ex versione Thomæ Gale. Oxon. 1678. fol.

[F] An edition of the Greek Psalter, &c.] The title of this edition, was, *Psalterium juxta exemplar Alexandrinum, Editio nova Græcæ & Latine. Oxon.
1678. 8vo.*

[G] Herodotus.] This neat and accurate edition of that most valuable ancient Historian was published at London, in 1679. fol. And, considering how severely Gronovius's edition hath been animadverted upon, and very gross errors discovered in it by the best of critics (1), Dr Gale's edition of Herodotus must, upon many accounts, still pass for the best.

[I] And published two volumes in folio of our ancient English Historians.] These two volumes are a continuation of another collection of the like kind, published by, or under the direction of, the most learned and worthy John Fell, Bishop of Oxford; with the title of, *Rerum Anglicarum Scriptorum veterum Tom I. Quorum Ingulfus nunc primum integer, &c.
terti nunc primum prodeunt. Oxon. 1684. fol.* Of the two volumes published by Dr Gale, the first was, at Oxon 1687. fol and intituled, Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores Quinque, ex vetustis Codicibus nunc primum in lucem editi. Which volume contains. I. Annales de Margan; The Annals of Margan-Abbey in Glamorganshire; that is, once belonging to that Monastery, and written there: Reaching from the year 1066, to 1232. II. Chronicon Thomæ Wikes, aliter Chronicon Salisburienfis Monasterii. i. e. The Chronicle of Thomas Wikes, a famous Monk of Osney-Abbey in the 13th century. It begins at the year 1066, and extends to the year 1304. But from the year 1289, it was continued by another hand. III. Annales Waverleienfis; i. e. The Annals of Waverley-Abbey in Surrey, from 1066. to the year 1291. [N. B. Every considerable Abbey in this kingdom, used to keep a Chronicle of what happened most memorable every year.] IV. Itinerarium Regis Anglorum Richardi, & aliorum in terram Hierosolymorum. Auctore Gaufrido Vinisaufo. i. e. The expedition of King Richard I. and others into the Holy Land: by Geoffrey Vinisaufo. To which is subjoined an account of the taking of Damietta. school, he was, as a just reward for his merit and pains, promoted to the Deanery of York, into which he was admitted Sept. 16, 1697 (g). Here he kept an hospitable table, and was particularly remarkable for his care and good government, and the repairing and beautifying the fabric of the Cathedral (b); besides an especial service he did to his Deanery [K]. But, after having enjoyed that Dignity little more than four years and a half, this worthy person, to the universal loss of learning, died at York April 8, 1702, in the 68th year of his age (i). He was buried in the Cathedral there, with an Inscription on his Grave-stone, as below [L]. As to his Character; he was a learned Divine, a great Historian and Antiquary, and one of the best Grecians of his age. He was not only known and esteemed at home, but also by the most learned of his contemporaries abroad; and kept a particular correspondence with Father Mabillon, Monsieur Baluze, Peter Allix, James Cappel, Sebastianian glia. Ab anno Domini. 1066. ad annum 1300. i. e. The Chronicle of Walter Hemingford, Canon of Gifeseburne [in Yorkshire] from the year 1066, to 1300. But the learned editor hath published it here only as far as the year 1273, reserving the rest for another volume of our English Historians, beginning at King Edward I. which he intended to oblige the world with, but never did. It was published entire by T. Hearne in 1731, in 2 vols. 8vo.

The second volume of our English Historians published by Dr Gale, was intituled, Historia Britannica, Saxonica, Anglo-Danica, Scriptores XV. Ex vetustis Cod. MSS. editi opera Thomae Gale Th. Pr. Oxon. 1691. fol. This volume comprehends. I. Gildæ sapientis de Excidio Britannia liber querulus. Ex antiquissimo MS. Cod. Cantabrigiensis i. e. An History, and a Letter, concerning the destruction of Britain by the Saxons; written by Gildas, a Monk of Banchor in the 6th century. II. Vita S. Wilfridi Episcopi Eboracensis. Auctore Eddio Stephano. i. e. The life of St Wilfrid the third Archbishop of York, [who died in 711.] written by Eddius, or Heddius, surnamed Stephen, that flourished about the year 720. III. Historia Britonum, auctore Nennio. i. e. The History of the Britons, by Nennius; a Monk of Banchor, who flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. With notes at the end. IV. Annales Joani. Afferii. i. e. The Annals of J. Affer, Bishop of Sherborn, who died anno 909. These Annals begin at Julius Cæsar, and end at the year 904. V. Polychronicon Ranulphi Higdeni Monachi Chestrensis. i. e. The Polychronicon of Ralph Higden Monk of Chester: divided into six books. It begins at the earliest times, and was brought down by the author to the year 1343: but Dr Gale has published it here only as far as the year 1066, and hath retrenched from it every thing that did not relate to the English History. VI. Willelmus Malmesburienfis de Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesie. i. e. William [Somerset, Monk] of Malmesbury, of the Antiquity of Glastonbury-church. VII. Wil. Malmesburienfis Liber V. de Pontificibus. i. e. The same William's fifth book of the English Bishops: being the life of Aldelm, first Bishop of Sherborn (3); and a supplement to his IV. books De Pontificibus, published by Sir Henry Savile, with the rest of that author's historical works. He had promised this life, at the beginning of his account of the Bishops of Sherborn. VIII. Historia Ramesiensis, sive Liber de Fundatione & Benefactoribus Coenobii Ramesiensis. i. e. The History of the foundation of Ramesey-monastery, in Huntingdonshire; and of the benefactors to the same. IX. and X. Historia Ecclesie Eliensis. Lib. 11. i. e. The History of the Church, or Monastery of Ely, in two books. XI. Chronica Joannis Wallingford. i. e. The Chronicle of John Wallingford, twenty first Abbot of St Albans. It begins at the year of Christ 449, and ends at 1035. XII. Historia Compendiosa de Regibus Britonum, auctore Radulpho de Diceto. i. e. A compendious [and indeed an imperfect] History of the British Kings, from [the pretended] Brutus to Cadwalader, anno Ch. 689. By Ralph de Diceto, Dean of St Paul's in the 13th century. XIII. De Partitione Provinciae in Schiras, & Episcopatus, & Regna. i. e. Of the Division of England into Shires, Bishopricks, and Kingdoms. By an author unknown. He reckons 32 counties in England; exclusive of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Cumberland, Cornwall, and Wales; and two Archbishopricks, and twenty Bishopricks. XIV. Joannis Fordun Scoti-Chronicon, sive Scotorum Historia. i. e. The History of the Scots, by John Fordun, Chaplain of the Church of Aberdeen. [Published in a more compleat manner by Thomas Hearne Oxon. 1722. 5 vols. 8vo] XV. De Pontificibus & Sanctis Ecclesie Eboracensis Poema, auctore Flacco Alcuino. i. e. A poetical account of the Archbishops and Saints of the Church of York, by Flaccus Alcuinus, or Albinus (4). To this collection the learned editor hath added an Appendix, of what several ancient authors have written concerning Britain: namely, 1. The 2d and 3d chapters of the viiith book of Ptolemy's Geography, in Greek and Latin. 2. Extracts, from Antoninus's Itinerary; the Notitia Dignitatum Imperii Romani; & Geograph. Anonymus Ravennas. 3. The number of hides in several counties south of the Humber. 4. An abstract of Doomesday-book, which he intitules, Consuetudines & Jura Anglicana, ex libro censuali, dicto Doomesday. 5. The ancient names of the people, places, &c. in Britain; from Camden, in alphabetical order. 6. Chap. 16. of book iv. of Pliny's Natural History, relating to Britain. 7. Genealogies of the several Saxon Kings in this island; from the Textus Rossensis, and Alured of Beverley. Interspersed with learned notes, and emendations. This very particular account of the contents of these two volumes I thought necessary to give, for the sake of all lovers of English History, to whom such notices are very useful, and save them a great deal of time.

Our learned author left also several pieces in manuscript, namely, 1. Jamblicus de vita Pythagoræ. 2. Origenis Philocalia, variis MSS. collecta, emendata, & nova versione donata. 3. Antonini Itinerarium. This last was published by his learned son Roger Gale, Esq; under this title, Antonini Iter Britannicum, commentariis illustratum Thomæ Gale S. T. P. nuper Decani Eboracensis. Opus posthumum revisit, auxit, edidit R. G. Accessit Anonymi Ravennatis Britannia Chorographia cum Autographo Regis Gallia MS. & Codice Vaticano collata. Adjiciuntur conjecturæ plurimæ, cum nominibus locorum Anglicis, quotquot iis assignari potuerint. Lond. 1709. 4to. But this is the most exceptionable of Dr Gale's works: for, out of an affectation of saying something new, he hath displaced most of the ancient stations, without sufficient authority; and hath indulged himself a great deal too much in fancy and conjectures.—There were likewise published in 1704, 'Sermons preached upon several holy days observed in the Church of England, by Thomas Gale Dean of York.' Lond. 8vo.

G A L E (Dr JOHN), a learned Divine, an eminent Preacher, and the most applauded Champion of the English Anabaptists (as they are called) in the XVIIIth century. He was born May the twenty-sixth 1680, at London, his father being a worthy and well esteemed citizen, one who had great natural abilities, and a very high reputation for integrity (a). The natural gravity, and unusual composure, of his son's temper thro' the course of his childhood, induced him to spare no pains or expence in his education, as having an early view to those labours for the instruction of mankind, which were to be the principal business of his riper years (b). He corresponded precisely with his father's intentions thro' his primary studies, which were his sole occupation, as well at those hours when his school-fellows were employed in amusements suitable to their age, as when, according to the ordinary course of education, a strict attention was expected from him (c). By this indefatigable pursuit of learning, he soon outstripp'd those of his standing, and qualified himself for more important inquiries than those which relate to grammar and languages. The good old man, desirous of giving all imaginable advantages to so great a genius, and so uncommon an application to literature, sent him over to Leyden, in order to finish perfectly what he had so happily begun (d). He was there engaged in the most serious enquiries; when at the age of seventeen, he received the unexpected, as well as unwelcome, news of his mother's death, whom he had many other reasons to regret besides those of tenderness and affection springing from so near a relation (e). He well expressed the motives to his own constancy, in a letter of consolation he wrote his afflicted father on that melancholy occasion. Yet he was well apprized, that this breach in the family would make his return to England necessary, earlier than otherwise it would have been, which made him very industrious in improving all the time which he still had to stay; and in this he was not only so diligent, but so successful, that, in the space of two years, a short time indeed for so great a work! he conquered all the difficulties of his favourite study, and, with universal applause, received, when little more than nineteen years old, the academical degrees of Master of Arts, and Doctor in Philosophy (f) [A]. In attaining these honours, at a time of life when most others begin only to aspire to them, he not only raised his own reputation very high, but reflected glory on his country; the rather because at his coming to that seat of the Muses, he was completely master of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, which, besides being unusual in a youth of sixteen, must have greatly facilitated his other studies (g), and contributed thereby to so surprizing a progress as that before mentioned.

Surprizing

[A] Of Master of Arts and Doctor in Philosophy ] To be satisfied that there is no exaggeration in what we have advanced in the text, the reader need only cast an eye on what his Professor testified to his father upon this subject, and which is much stronger than any thing in our account, and yet considering the reputation of the person subscribing it, no doubt need be conceived of its veracity. ' It has happened to no body says he, that I know of, to gain such a knowledge of things, which are to be traced out by natural reason within the space of fifteen months and no more, which is all the time your son has applied himself wholly to the study of Philosophy, and that before the expiration of the nineteenth year of his age, as to be judged worthy to be adorned with the ' highest honours in a solemn ceremony. God grant he may go on in the same pace he has begun, and continue the same assiduity and diligence to the end, that so he may become a most fit instrument to advance the glory of the name of the Lord, the furthering his own salvation, and the publick good of his neighbours.'

Upon this occasion when he published his Thesis, De ente ejusque conceptu, dedicated to his father and his two uncles, Sir John and Sir Joseph Wolf, the famous

Surprizing, one has a right to call it, since it appeared such even in the eyes of the best judges, as is manifested not only from the pieces preserved in the former note, but from the most eloquent oration pronounced by the learned Volder, expressly upon this occasion, July the third 1699, and published after his death by the celebrated Professor Boerhaave (b), of which a few periods will be found at the bottom of the page [B]. After he left the University of Leyden, he made a tour to Amsterdam, which afforded him several opportunities of visiting the famous Mr John le Clerc, with whom he then fix'd a correspondence, and of whose character we find him, in his writings, a very zealous as well as very able defender (i). Upon his return to his native country, he pursued, with the same vivacity and diligence as at School or the University, the acquisition of all useful knowledge in regard to the concerns of this life, and with still more attention and vigilance that sacred science which affords the means of obtaining a sure title to a better. With a view to this, he perfected his skill in the oriental languages; and, having carefully sought all the previous helps necessary to the thorough understanding of them, began, with most serious application, to study assiduously the sacred Scriptures in their originals, and to consider what lights might be obtained towards reaching their true sense, not only from commentaries, but antient versions (k). When he had been in England, or at least from that feat mous Adrian Reland (1) subjoined a noble testimony of his worth, in a Latin panegyric which ends thus, alluding to the Cartesians whom he had always opposed.

[B] At the bottom of the page.] It will certainly be some entertainment to the reader, and can scarce be considered as a digression from our subject, if in this note we give some account of Mr de Volder, whose harangue does our author so much honour; he was Professor of Philosophy and Mathematics in the University of Leyden, and had therefore the fairest opportunity of knowing Mr Gale thoroughly, which adds not a little credit to what he says. This learned man was brought up, and in his youth embraced the sect of the Menonites, or Minnists, or as they are with greater propriety called Baptists, but before he entred upon the functions of his Professorship, he became a member of the reformed Church in Holland. He was a zealous Cartesian, and had high notions as a Republican, which being maliciously represented to King William then Prince of Orange, he superseded his own nomination of this gentleman to be Rector of the University, the very night before it was to have taken place. But in 1697, which was eleven years afterwards, his Majesty of his own accord conferred upon him that honour (2). In 1699, he presided in that publick Act, in which our young Student had his degrees conferred upon him, and in his oration he shews how unreasonable it is to oppose notions, merely upon account of their novelty, and from thence he takes occasion to make it appear, that it is highly imprudent for Princes or States to interfere at all about speculative opinions, by encouraging one side or depressing the other; he remarks, that truth and falsehood are not at all subject to authority, and that where a Government leaves an entire freedom to Theologians and Philosophers in their debates, it is impossible it should be hurt by them; whereas by a contrary conduct, factions are excited that frequently become dangerous, whereas when there is no such interposition, how loud or how warm soever those disputes may be for a time, truth is sure to prevail at last. This is the general scope of his discourse, and from the facts before related, the reader will see the true motive to it. The whole oration in Latin is very judiciously prefixed to the posthumous works of our author, and very well deserves reading, but for what more particularly concerns him, who is the subject of our discourse, it follows translated with the form of creation, (which is curious) as spoken in Latin (3). 'If that be new, said he, which has not been done for many years, which no one of the Professors in this University hath seen in his time, then 'tis new to declare a Doctor of Philosophy from this place, tho' if you consider the ceremonies with which this solemnity is performed it appears antient. But I wish the noble and very laudable design of this candidate in prosecuting his studies was a thing customary, who after he had applied his mind to them, thought it his business, not according to the new, but very bad, method to rest satisfied with a slight and superficial knowledge of the liberal arts, but to look into their inmost recesses, and to acquaint himself with what lay most concealed in those of them which he conversed with. Wherefore in the first place, with great labour he gained the knowledge of the tongues, that he might afterward with more ease and advantage apply himself to the sciences themselves. For this purpose he not only carefully studied the Latin Tongue, but what in this age is very rare and unusual the Greek and Hebrew. I say nothing of the Latin in which he has often spoke publicly at London, that famous city, for you have heard with what elegance, propriety, and force of persuasion, he commended the study of wisdom. But I can by no means omit to observe, that he so applied himself to the Greek Language, as not only to understand it, but be able to declaim in it publicly. To these he added likewise the Hebrew, thinking the knowledge of the Greek insufficient without this, and that he must depend upon the credit of others for the interpretation of the sacred writings. Furnished with these helps he entered upon the study of Philosophy being induced to it partly by the pleasure which arises from enquiries into things obscure, and partly by the advantage which those studies afford both in life and other sciences, and partly likewise as thinking it the best method to cultivate his mind, and dispose it more readily and clearly to distinguish truth from falsehood in every subject. And before he had pursued these studies full two years, see, I beseech you, what penetration of mind, joined with incredible diligence, is capable of performing, he was willing to give some publick proof of his proficiency in them. Nor has he failed in the attempt, for both in his private and publick examinations he discovered so acute a genius, and such knowledge of things natural, divine, and moral, that, agreeable to his great merit, the highest honours in Philosophy have been decreed to be conferred on him in a solemn manner, and according to antient custom. Having said this he added. 'Quare quod felix faustumque sit tibi, tuisque honorificum, ex auctoritate amplissimi Senatus Academici ego te Johannem Gale, Londinensem Anglum L. A. M. & Philosophiæ Doctorem creo, dico, renuncio: do tibi facultatem Cathedram hanc Doctoralem conscendendi, & ex ea Philosophiam docendi: confero denique in te omnia privilegia, immunitates, quæ L. A. M. & Philosophiæ Doctoribus vel legibus vel moribus debentur.' It was rude therefore in his antagonist to use so coarse a phrase as being dubb'd a Doctor (4).

(4) Wall's Defence of the Hist. of Infant Baptism.

[C] Than

of learning, about four years, he was offered by the University of Leyden (willing to preserve an interest in him) the degree of Doctor in Divinity (l), provided he would give his assent to the articles established by the Synod of Dort. But this, tho' highly sensible of the honour, he very prudently refusing, preserved the freedom of his judgment, tho' at the expence of a title (m). It is certain, that, in conferring this degree, the Dutch University would have lost no credit, since of his age there were few in Europe deserved it better. For, by this time, he had not only gone through, in the laborious way of a critical examination, both the Old Testament and the New, with the most celebrated commentaries on both, as well antient as modern; but the most eminent amongst the Fathers; with equal diligence and impartiality, by which he acquired (as his learned writings shewed) a thorough acquaintance with, and due regard for, without imbibing an implicit faith in, or a dangerous reliance on, the authority of antiquity (n). All this time, his worth was in a great measure hid; and there were but a very few, and those of his most intimate acquaintance, that knew the real merit of this excellent young man. It was not, however, many years before an occasion offered which called his very high qualifications into a much more conspicuous point of view. The Reverend Mr Wall, Vicar of Shoreham in Kent, wrote a celebrated treatise, which he intituled, The History of Infant Baptism; and for this he not only received, long after, the honour of a Doctor's degree from the University of Oxford, but also the thanks of the Convocation then assembled (o). A friend of Dr Gale's, a member of the Church of England, and very zealous for the doctrines of the Church, considering the reputation of this book, wrote the Doctor a warm letter thereupon, as if it had been absolutely impossible to read the arguments contained therein, without being convinced (p). It fell out, however, otherwise with Dr Gale; he was not only proof against both book and letter, but resolved to answer them, purely to satisfy his correspondent, that reason and learning might appear in defence of that cause which he thought so utterly overthrown by this performance (q). These letters, though written in 1705 and 1706, were not published till 1711, and then at the very earnest desire of some persons of distinguished abilities, who thought it an injury to the publick that they should remain longer in obscurity (r). Thus, by their own merit, they came abroad into the world, and made their author generally known and respected in a very short space (s), even by those who did not embrace his sentiments. Indeed there was so much good sense, learning, and moderation, in his discourses, that it was impossible they could meet with any other than a favourable reception [C]. But, amongst the best judges of those who were

[C] Than a favourable reception.] The best way of making the value of this work known within the narrow compass of a note, will be by entering into a succinct analysis of his learned performance, in which he has shewn himself equally conversant with books and men, and with polite literature as well as ecclesiastical writers. In the first letter, he observes that Mr Wall's history is not so formidable as is pretended, tho' the best defence of Infant Baptism which he had seen, and that for those reasons on which Mr Wall himself recommends it in his preface. He then tells us, that Mr Wall is not much to be depended on, and that his real aim and design, was only to establish the Baptism of Infants, and that he takes all occasions to blacken the Anti-Pædobaptists, disguising his designs with pretences to moderation. That Mr Wall endeavours to possess his readers with an opinion of his penetration, by several needless digressions, and to gain reputation by quarrelling with several of the greatest men for learning, &c. as particularly Archbishop Tillotson, Bishop Burnet, Rigaltius, Gregory Nazianzen, both father and son; St Chrysostom, Monsieur le Clerc, and Grotius. That he has not acted the part of a faithful Historian towards the Anti-Pædobaptists, but several times, on no ground at all, takes for granted some things, merely because they favour his design, and charges the Anti-Pædobaptists with whatever he had heard any one among them to have believed or said. In the second Letter, Dr Gale endeavours to justify his brethren from the charge of schism; and observes, that in order to an union it would be requisite (5), and 'I think, says he, none can except against it, ' that some fit persons were chose on both sides, to ' examine the Scriptures impartially; and the Fathers ' of the three first centuries, who followed their great ' master through sufferings, and whose writings are ' undoubtedly by far the best commentary on the sacred books; and, with these helps, to collect from ' the Word of God, the true doctrine and discipline ' of the primitive Catholic Church. And to what ' should be thus sincerely deduced, every one should ' resolve to conform, without reserve. And, I doubt

' not, if an union were endeavoured on this expedient, it would be accomplished much more easily ' than is imagined.' In the third letter our author remarks, that the dispute between the English Pædobaptists, and Anti-Pædobaptists, may be cast under two heads, one relating to the mode of baptism, whether it is to be administered only by dipping, and the other, who are the true subjects of it, whether adult persons alone, or infants also. He tells us, that so far as the scriptures are clear, the practice of the Anti-Pædobaptists is allowed to be agreeable therewith; and that therefore if they err, they are, however, on the safer side. He observes, that the Greek word for baptize, always signifies to dip only into any manner of a thing, but is more commonly used for dipping into liquids, which observation he confirms from several passages of ancient writers. In the fourth letter he remarks, that the critics constantly affirm the proper and genuine sense of βαπτίζω, to be immergo; that Mr Wall is conscious, notwithstanding his pretence that the opinions of learned men are against him; and that whereas that writer appeals to the scriptures for the sense of the word, it is evidently never used there in his sense, but the contrary. In the fifth letter he observes, that though it is very unreasonable to appeal to the Scriptures only, for the sense of a word; yet it is clear from them the Greek word must always signify to dip; that if the word were otherwise ever so ambiguous, yet, as it relates to baptism, it is sufficiently determined, only and necessarily to mean to dip, by the doctrine and practice of St John, amongst the apostles, and of the succeeding Church for many centuries, which urged a trine immersion. He affirms likewise, that the ancient Church of the three first centuries did not practice affusion; that all who baptized in the times of the apostles, were baptized by immersion; that clinical affusions do not appear to have been introduced, till about two hundred and fifty years after Christ, at which time their validity was much doubted; and that all allow immersion to have been insisted on anciently, as the only regular way in all common cases. In the sixth letter, he proceeds to the other chief in the same opinion with the Divine who wrote the book he answered, some thought themselves obliged to testify their esteem for his candour and abilities, while others went a little further, chief article in dispute, between the Anti-Pædobaptists and their antagonists, relating to the persons who are the true subjects of baptism, whether adult persons alone, or infants also. He observes, that Mr Wall's attempt, though the best in it's kind, falls very short of answering the design of it; and that this writer allows it cannot be made appear from Scripture that infants are to be baptized, and therefore recurs to these as the only expedients. 1. To the practice of the Jewish Church. 2. To the practice of the antient Christians. Dr Gale remarks upon this, that from Mr Wall's concession, that it cannot be proved from Scripture, it unavoidably follows, that it is no institution of Christ, and that to suppose it may be included in some of the more general expressions, is only to beg the point in dispute; and that unless Mr Wall can shew that Infant-Baptism is so much as mentioned in Scripture, the Anti-Pædobaptists will not believe it instituted there. He observes likewise, that the Baptism of Infants is unlawful, if Christ has not instituted it, that true Protestants should adhere to the Scripture as the only infallible guide in all religious controversies, and that the silence of the Scripture is a good argument against Infant-Baptism. In the seventh letter, he shews from Matt. xxviii. 19. that the Scripture does not leave Infant-Baptism so undetermined as some would pretend, and that the commission necessarily obliges to teach all whom it intends should be baptized, and that therefore infants cannot be included in that commission, and he asserts that the verb μαθητεύειν is constantly used to signify nothing less than to teach. In the eighth letter, he remarks that the substantive μαθητής is only said of such as are at least capable of being taught, and that the most judicious have always agreed, that the word in the commission particularly signifies to teach and instruct; and that this appears evidently to be the true sense of the place from the authority of the Scriptures themselves, from the practice of the Apostles, and from parallel places. The sum of the Doctor's reasoning on this head is this, that the commission obliges to teach all that are to be baptized, and therefore that the Scriptures are not so silent concerning the baptizing of Infants as the Pædobaptists would persuade us, so that if Mr Wall should prove the Jews and Christians did baptize their children, the Anti-Pædobaptists have still reason enough not to admit the practice. In the ninth letter, he observes that Mr Wall's assertions, that the Jews did initiate their Proselytes, and their infants by Baptism, and that the Apostles and Primitive Church baptized the Infants of believing parents, are mistakes, and that the arguments brought to prove these two points are no better. Dr Gale examines first Mr Wall's pretences from the Jews in this and the following letter, in which he endeavours to shew, from many considerations, that the arguments of the Pædobaptists do not make it appear to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to baptize Proselytes and their children, and urges several arguments to evince the contrary. He remarks likewise, that even supposing the fact could be demonstrated, it is no rule in the administration of a Christian Sacrament, as being only the tradition of their elders, and not grounded on Scripture or derived from Moses. In the eleventh letter, Dr Gale proceeds to the other kind of evidence produced by Mr Wall, viz. the authority of the Primitive Fathers, which the Doctor observes ought to be valued more than Monsieur Daille and some others suppose (6). 'It is an ill return, says he, for the great lessons and examples of piety they have given us, and for their having been so instrumental in transmitting to us the knowledge of our most holy religion. And there is yet a greater evil attends this method, for all the abuses and affronts put upon the Fathers of the first centuries, do in the end reflect on Christianity itself which those great men have handed down, and which therefore must needs be in some degree of but doubtful authority, if it depends upon sufficient testimony. It would not be difficult to defend the writings of the Fathers from the reproaches cast on them by these men, and by

(5) Reflections on Wall's Hist. of Infant Baptism, p. 86, 87.

Daille, their oracle, notwithstanding he has taken such pains in the matter, and pushed it with all the vigour he could. But it is a nice subject, and much too copious to be treated here at large. I shall therefore only say, that in many cases the rejecting the authority of the Fathers is a very wild extreme, which men are driven to, only because they have nothing better to say for themselves, and cannot brook to see their opinions contradicted in their writings. That the Fathers of the first Churches were honest faithful men, and every way capable to acquaint us with the true posture of affairs in their own Churches and times, and therefore are to be depended on, as far as they relate facts within their proper cognisance, must be allowed on all hands, and I don't see how their greatest enemies can have the face to deny this.' The Doctor then observes, that Mr Wall's argument from the Fathers turns upon a supposition which cannot easily be granted him, viz. That the Primitive Church believed and practised nothing but what they had received from the Apostles themselves. But Dr Gale tells us, that without any reflection on the honour and fidelity of the Fathers, their testimonies cannot support Infant Baptism, tho' they should afford Mr Wall ever so many and full citations, 'for if the Fathers only prove Fact in the Church and not Right, and the Church was not wholly pure from innovations, how does this prove the Baptism of Infants was no innovation, but an institution of Christ? And yet this is the thing our author should have done, tho' he takes no notice of it. It is irksome to remember the instances of human frailty which even the most antient Church was liable to. They were men subject to like passions with us, and therefore no wonder they were sometimes in the wrong, and their zeal for God's honour was not always according to knowledge, which, tho' it might keep them from losing the chief thing our Lord had commanded, might however expose them to the inconveniency of superadding several things he never authorized. The Apostles undoubtedly kept close to his directions in all things without deviation, either in defect or excess, for they had the immediate assistance in a most extraordinary manner of the Spirit of God (7).' But that the Christians of the very next age made several additions, Tertullian confesses in his book de Corona. And Eusebius from Hegeippus (8) notes, 'that the Church continued all the Apostles times a pure virgin and undefiled.——But when those holy men were dead——then errors began to arise thro' the mistakes of other teachers.' Dr Gale then proceeds to discuss the grand question, whether it can be proved from any of the authentic pieces of the Primitive Fathers, that the Church used Infant-Baptism in those early times? He considers in this and the twelfth and thirteenth letters, such passages as are produced by Mr Wall. He remarks in the thirteenth, that in St Cyprian's time, Infant-Baptism was practised in Africa; and infers from thence, it probably took its rise there, together with Infant-Communion; that the Africans were generally men of weak understandings, that the Greek Church probably had not yet admitted the error, that the practice of Infant-Baptism began, as all innovations do, with only some little variations in opinion, and then passed to as little deviations in practice, and so by very short steps at length attained, unobserved, the great reputation it has now indeed for a long time enjoyed; that this was occasioned in some measure by a zeal which was not always according to knowledge, and that the earliest Pædobaptists admitted children to the Lord's Supper on the same principles as to Baptism. His own words upon this subject highly deserve the reader's notice (9), 'for thus, says he, in a case most exactly parallel, the same persons who introduced the baptizing of infants, were equally for admitting them, immediately after that, to the other Sacrament likewise, and that upon just such another mistake of our Saviour's words too, for as they inferred the necessity of Baptism from John iii. 5. so they did also that of the Eucharist from John vi. 53. Thus further, and confessed they were moved by his arguments, and that they had never received so much satisfaction before as to this point, tho' they had been long conversant even in the most arduous disputes in Divinity, and the writings of the very ablest masters in controversy (t). Such, again, as did not esteem it necessary to make any declaration as to the point in question, shewed equal regard for his learning and modesty (u), for that strength and dignity which appeared in his manner of reasoning, and that spirit of candour and decency, which so happily distinguished his writings (w). Above all, they set an high value upon his charity, and that inclination he discovered that things should be calmly examined by the infallible standard of the Holy Scriptures, taking their true sense from the commentaries of genuine antiquity, in order to a thorough reconciliation of all sincere Christians upon a stable basis (x) [D]. In the management of this dispute, he took a proper opportunity to vindicate his friend Mr John le Clerc, from some imputations thrown on him by Mr Wall, or rather which he had taken upon trust from others. One sees in this, how much our author adhered to his own rule, that sincerity was a thing never to be dispensed with. He had conversed with Mr le Clerc, but could have hardly studied under him as his pupil; for after he quitted Leyden, he applied himself to the celebrated Limborch, one of the most learned and moderate of their Divines, and the scholar then in greatest esteem amongst the Dutch (y). Yet, for the sake of this acquaintance, and a persuasion that the attack on le Clerc was ill founded, and calculated to do him hurt here, he very generously engaged in his behalf, and very fully refuted whatever in his heat his opponent had charged upon him as impious, as well as heretical. This was certainly due to truth and friendship, but, without all question, many would not have been so ready to discharge the debt. The point too as to which this defence is made, was not a little difficult; and, in speaking to it, the Doctor's own notions would necessarily appear: He was no way moved by this consideration, but has very fairly and justly stated the imputation, or rather insinuation, which he overturns from that learned man's writings [E]; and then speaks as frankly

‘ Thus St Austin from these very texts at the same time argues for baptizing and communicating infants. And this custom of communicating infants accompanied the baptizing them, even from the first rise of Pædobaptism for several hundred years together, as in the Greek Church it does to this day, all which is so true and manifest as to be pretty generally acknowledged. Dr Taylor (10) somewhat largely proves it, and frequently says, the one is altogether as well grounded as the other, and indeed earnestly pleads for the continuance of both.’

[D] Of all sincere Christians upon a stable basis. There is something so attractive in a modest and learned search after truth, through the obscurest paths of antiquity, that such as take different roads in that search, naturally wish each other well, and speak kindly of their common labours. Thus the learned Dr Wotton, though he writes expressly against our author, in relation to the Jewish Talmud (11), says thus much of him. ‘ He seems to be well acquainted with those books, and is a writer so well versed in the arts of persuasion; and his way of writing is generally so very winning, that when I had undertaken to treat of the true authority of this most ancient text of Jewish traditions to us Christians, I should have been wanting to my subject, if I had not taken notice of what he had said upon these matters.’

The famous Dr Whitby (12), who made no scruple of thinking freely, and of speaking as freely what he thought, says, that Dr Gale's very learned letters prove it to be doubtful and uncertain, whether that practice did constantly obtain. Mr Whiston (13), in a little treatise of his, very fairly acknowledges that the first light he received in reference to the primitive mode of baptizing, was from Dr Gale's observations upon the passage of Irenæus, which laid the foundation of what he wrote upon that subject. This account he has very much enlarged in a late work of his, in which he says (14), ‘ this most important discovery I soon communicated to the world in this paper, which both Bishop Hoadley and Dr Clarke greatly approved, but still went on in the ordinary practice notwithstanding. I sent this paper also by an intimate friend, Mr Haines, to Sir Isaac Newton, and desired to know his opinion: The answer returned was this, that they both had discovered the same before: Nay, I afterward found, that Sir Isaac Newton was so hearty for the Baptists, as well as for the Eusebians, or Arians, that he some times suspected these two were the two witnesses in the Revelations.’ In several other places of that work, where Mr Whiston takes occasion to mention our author, he never fails to do it with the highest marks of esteem and respect, and makes no scruple of pronouncing him the most learned amongst the Baptists, though it will fully appear from the succeeding note, that Dr Gale was not at all of the same sentiments with him, in respect to some very material points; and therefore, this character of his, is the more to be admired, as it is the less to be suspected. Sir Peter King, successively Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, High Chancellor of Great Britain, and Lord King of Ockham, had a very high opinion of Dr Gale, who was also honoured with the friendship of Dr Hoadley, in his time Bishop of Salisbury, and now of Winchester, and of Dr Samuel Bradford, late Bishop of Rochester, who declared in writing his esteem of our author, on account of his good understanding, great learning, candour, and largeness of mind (15). These were truly such qualities as merited general esteem, and ought to preserve universal respect to his memory, as in his life-time they attracted from wise and good men of all denominations, a sincere regard and veneration for his abilities, and the use he made of them, in labouring to promote the fundamental principles of the Gospel, and that spirit of extensive charity, which is the peculiar ornament of the Christian religion.

[E] From that learned man's writings. It is in his first letter upon Dr Wall's History of Infant-Baptism, that he inserts this vindication of Mr le Clerc, which he thought the more necessary, because his opponent was not the only learned man who had attacked, and as, the Doctor conceived, misrepresented this gentleman's opinions, which therefore he thought requisite to set in a true light. ‘ You may observe (16), says he to his correspondent, he, that is Dr Wall, is very angry with Mr Le Clerc, chiefly on these two accounts: Because he endeavours, with so foul a mouth, to vilify the Fathers and their writings; and the other is, his suspected Heterodoxy concerning the Blessed Trinity, and particularly the Deity of Christ. This is the common objection of all Mr Le Clerc's enemies, for which they most bitterly exclaim against him, though very unjustly, and oftentimes, in very bad language too. But it ought to be considered, whether a different sentiment, or suspending the judgment in so arbitrary a point, is a sufficient warrant to dispense with the rules of charity and forbearance, which the great incarnate God so repeatedly enjoins, and has made the discriminating badge of his disciples. 'Tis dreadfully severe to damn men, because they can't find out the Almighty to per-frankly his own sense of things, the very mention of which, by a very little address, might have been wholly left out of this dispute (z). He was little more than twenty-seven years of age when he finished this work, which shewed not only strong parts and great judgment, but also most extensive reading. Yet the reputation acquired thereby, did not hasten him in his design of publick and stated preaching, which he would not undertake till himself judged every obstacle removed, and that he was in all respects qualified to discharge his trust duly, and with success (a). Upwards of seven years elapsed before this happened, and he who had merited and received a Doctor's degree at nineteen, declined a like degree in Divinity at twenty-three; and, before he attained the age of thirty, acquired the most established character for learning and a sound understanding, would not adventure on the great charge of constantly exhorting and instructing from the pulpit, till he was in the thirty-fifth year of his age (b). He was then chosen one of the ministers of the Baptist's congregation, in Paul's-alley near Barbican (c); and his sermons being chiefly calculated to promote the amendment of his hearers lives, and to press on Christians the great duty of living up to their profession, he was deservedly attended to and admired by persons of all persuasions, which occasioned a prodigious resort to hear him as often as he entered the pulpit (d) [F]. He was Chairman of a society for promoting primitive Christianity,

' perfection; for who then can be saved? But thanks be to God, the scriptures give us better hopes, and at the same time assure us, their condition is much the more dangerous, who so freely presume to judge their brethren: For thou art inexcusable, O man, says St Paul, Rom. xi. 1. whosoever thou art that judgest. Besides such men, in effect, do nothing less than oppose themselves to the merciful designs of our great Redeemer, and strive to frustrate his kind endeavour, to make us like himself, while he would teach us those admirable virtues of meekness, love, and good will, &c. And though he has been pleased to take so much more care to fix us right in the practice of these things, than in the speculations which disturb us; yet, an exact conformity in these weighty matters, which our Lord himself lays so much stress on, as spotless conversation, a pious life in all godliness and honesty, are not protection powerful enough to secure men from the insults of these furious's, as if they thought all moral virtues were nothing, without being right in the notion of the Trinity; and that this one speculation might compensate for the want of all other good qualities; and I believe, Sir, you may have observed with me, that many of these fiery zealots are none of the exactest men in their lives. But God grant, they may, in time, consider that most charitable warning, our gracious Lord has given them, of their danger beforehand, assuring them, Not every one that says unto him Lord! Lord! and in words only acknowledges his mighty power and attributes, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; but he only that does the will of his Father which is in Heaven. But what considerably aggravates the crime in the present case is, that the charge is utterly false; and 'tis strange, persons that pretend to justice and honour, should exclaim against Mr Le Clerc, on such slender grounds, who must be acknowledged a man of great piety and learning. For the substance of all they urge, with any manner of probability, is, that his interpretations of several portions of scripture, destroy the fine glosses others have built upon them; and that he has gone about to shew, that the Fathers did not altogether understand this mystery in the present orthodox sense. Hence some angry men proceed to accuse him of Socinianism; some, for they are not agreed of Arianism, and others again of Photinianism; but they all join to reproach him, though for no reason, as I can discover, but his refusing to strain any text, which he believes in his conscience is not to the purpose, as men of no mean figure have done. A method which he rightly thinks only serves to expose the cause they pretend to vindicate. By the way, Sir, I would not be thought to justify all his expositions, some of them I receive, and thank him for, but not all; and I know Mr Le Clerc will not be offended at my dissenting. The question is not whether his interpretations are just or not, he thinks they are, and has a right therefore to propose them, without being stunned with such hideous outcries of Socinianism, &c. especially, since in several parts of his works he has cleared himself to the satisfaction of

' any impartial readers.' He then proceeds to cite such passages, as render it very evident that Mr Le Clerc acknowledged the Divinity of Christ, as plainly and expressly taught in the Holy Scriptures, but was unwilling to make an article of faith, of any human explanation of that mystery, which our Lord had left to exercise our faith, and not our reason.

[F] As often as he entered the pulpit. The great figure this learned person made in his life-time, in quality of a teacher of divine truths, and the general esteem the discourses he left behind him, and which have been since published, are in, at this day, render it absolutely necessary, that we should set his character in this respect, in a clear and full light. One who had an intimate acquaintance with him for fourteen years, treats this subject of his preaching in the following terms (17). ' Thus mature in knowledge, and prepared for his Master's service, he began stately to preach about the thirty-fifth year of his age, possessed of a heart glowing with humanity, and disposed to sacrifice every private view to that most glorious one, of promoting the eternal interest of mankind. This pleasing work he pursued with unwearied diligence and integrity, preaching the word, as the Apostle directs, in season and out of season, reproving, rebuking, and exhorting, with all long suffering and doctrine, resolving firmly to regard no man in the discharge of his duty. He stood too much in awe of his great Master, to fear or know any man, or to be swayed by any worldly considerations. He believed firmly that he must render an account of his conduct at the day of Judgment, and wisely resolved to act as that he might do it with rejoicing. He was equally qualified, both to teach and persuade. His style was easy and natural, his expressions strong and lively, his reasonings clear and convincing. He had almost an irresistible power over the passions which he used, agreeably to reason, and to the nature and importance of the subject. Who would not love God, when what may be known of the Supreme Being was described by him? When he maintained and vindicated human freedom, fate and necessity seemed to vanish before him. How gloomy does he make the vale of death appear, and how glorious the resurrection from that state of darkness, and the re-uniting for ever the immortal spirit, to the unchangeable body! how awful does he draw the last tribunal, when the Son of God, arrayed with the glory of his Father, shall come to render to every man, according to his works.' Dr John Kinch, who was also well acquainted with him, gives us the following pathetic account of his labours (18). ' But what rendered him most valuable was, that his mind was well stored with heavenly gifts and graces, so that as a scribe, well instructed in the law, he brought forth of his treasures, things new and old. Furnished to every good work, he was prevailed on to engage in the Ministry, in the discharge of which office, he studied to shew himself approved to God, a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, and giving to all a portion in due season. In his preaching, though he highly deserved stianity, from July the third 1715, to the tenth of February following. This society met weekly at Mr Whiston's house in Cross-street Hatton-Garden, in order seriously and amicably to consider and examine the most antient writers of the Christian Church, to determine which of the pieces attributed to them were, and which were not genuine, that from thence the doctrines and discipline of the Church, in the ages next to the Apostles, might be clearly and certainly understood and embraced (e). This, as we have already seen, was entirely, was exactly, conformable to the Doctor's views, who was not passionate against any Church, or obstinate in any opinions; but sincerely desirous of being, in faith and practice, a true Christian, without regard to any other distinction. It is also acknowledged by Mr Whiston, that none of that assembly shewed a more steady, warm, and conscientious disposition, in this respect, than he did; or discovered more willingness to contribute to the utmost of his power, to extinguish all disputes amongst Christians (f) [G]. He remained however, at all times, firm to his first principles of religious liberty, which he conceived essentially necessary to the peace of the Church; and therefore, in the year 1719; when a great Synod was held amongst the dissenting Divines, in order to pacify the disputes raised amongst the people in their sentiments at Exeter, he was one of the seventy-three who subscribed an advice not to impose unscriptural subscriptions, whereas sixty-nine subscribed a contrary letter on that subject. This shews he was uniform in his judgment, and of the same opinion in an assembly of his friends, as in a controversy against one who opposed that Christian system which he had embraced. At the persuasion also of Mr Whiston; he had, in that gentleman's house, a conference with his former antagonist Dr Wall, which ended as such conferences generally do, without any signal or decisive success (g). Indeed Mr Whiston is very clear; that the advantage was altogether on the side of Dr Gale; but having deserved the praise and commendation of his hearers, yet what he sought, was their profit and advantage. It was pleasing and agreeable to a polite and ingenious audience, which usually attended him, and at the same time plain and easy to persons of a meaner capacity; so that in his discourses, there was instruction for the ignorant, and entertainment for the most learned and judicious. His deportment in the pulpit was easy, yet attended with a seriousness and gravity, becoming the solemnity of the work in which he was engaged. His method was exact, his stile elegant, but unaffected, his reasoning clear and strong, and his arguments just and nervous, which, by his happy managing them, constantly discovered fresh beauties to his hearers. His voice was clear and melodious, which at once charmed the ear, raised and fired the imagination, and could not easily fail to gain the affections, and engage a reasonable mind, not wholly sunk in sin, and bound down with vicious habits, to receive the truth in love. He did not shun to declare, as far as he could, the whole counsel of God; nor was he afraid to oppose those sentiments he apprehended to be erroneous: though the zeal he sometimes used upon those occasions, might perhaps induce some, unreasonably fond of their own opinions, to treat his labours with disrespect. However, it is apparent from the whole of his conduct, that the earnestness he has at any time shown, in contending for what he esteemed the truth, did not arise from the disaffection of his mind to the person of any man, but from the love he bore to souls, from his great desire to reclaim those whom he thought mistaken, and prevent, to the utmost of his power, others from running into the like sentiments. He strictly adhered to the Scriptures, as the perfect and only rule of his faith and practice, and was a zealous asserter and patron of universal liberty, where it tended not to licentiousness; a warm opposer of all human impositions, in matters of religion, and used earnestly to press all Christians to stand fast in that liberty, wherewith Christ had made them free. He entertained a sincere and hearty respect for all good men, and paid a great regard to his Master's new commandment to his disciples, to love one another. The different apprehensions between him and other Christians, did not in the least alienate his affections from them. He truly loved all who bore the image of the blessed Jesus. He valued all his fellow-travellers, though they did not walk just in his path. To these testimonies, it may not be improper to join that of Mr Joseph Burroughs (19), speaking to the congregation of Dr Gale, to whom he appealed for the truth of all he said. Of his happy talent in the Ministry, when once he was brought statedly to it, you all are witnesses.

(19) Funeral Sermon, p. 27.

Concerning which, I shall have occasion to speak more particularly by and by. In the mean time, the consideration that a person so well furnished; was content to struggle with so many difficulties as he did, when he might have enjoyed ease and plenty; that for the sake of what he believed to be the truth, and commands of Christ, he chose to minister in an unfashionable and despised way, when he might have had both applause and riches; in turning his thoughts to some other courses; and that he persisted in this choice to the last, obliges me to observe, that herein he did, like the Apostle, fight the good fight, and finish his course, and keep his fidelity. He imitated him likewise, in his zeal, as well as in his integrity and constancy. But though he would be very earnest in defending his own opinion, yet he was far from bearing ill-will to any; for the sake of their differing from him; and of very large and generous principles, as to the extent of Christian Communion, with regard to any matters merely speculative; and in his conversation in general, he shewed a good and agreeable temper.

[G] To extinguish all disputes amongst Christians.] We have before shewn, that our author declared himself a lover of peace, and one that was by no means inclined to increase those heats, or widen those divisions, which had been already so fatal to Christianity. It was with this view, and in hopes of finding a rule for interpreting Scripture, of greater authority, and more consistent, than private opinion, that induced him to become a member of the society at Mr Whiston's, which consisted of men of very different persuasions; united by no other ties, than those of being serious and sincere in their enquiries after truth, as will fully appear, from the first and third articles of the rules (20) laid down for the conduct of that society, conceived in the following words. I. That the main, proper, and direct design of these societies, and their meetings, be the calm, serious, and impartial discovery of true religion, and genuine Christianity, both as to faith, practice, government, worship, and discipline, as they were at first settled by the Apostles from Christ himself; and the consequent recommendation of it to, and the re-establishment of it in, the several Churches in Christendom, with the propagation of the same throughout the world, and in proper and direct opposition to all party notions, human determinations, and modern controversies, among the several contending bodies.——III To admit and invite good Christians of all persuasions and denominations to these societies, to avoid all unhandsome reflections upon any of their persons and opinions, and to treat them all with that respect, tenderness, love, and affection, that are due to fellow-members, however different in their sentiments about lesser matters.

having himself embraced his opinion, perhaps his judgment in this case may admit of some exception. It is out of all doubt that reverend person was far enough from thinking so, since some years afterwards he wrote a reply to Dr Gale's answer, which, as we have already hinted, procured him a Doctor's degree from Oxford, which shews they considered his undertaking as no easy task (b). Notwithstanding this, Dr Gale was not either silenced or discouraged, but resolved to write a rejoinder; yet this, as well as many other important designs, were defeated by his death. All that we know concerning it, is from a passage in a letter to his father upon the subject, in which he does not seem to have much doubt of making his party as good against the defence, as he had done against the history (i) [H].

[H] As he had done against the History.] The design of Dr Wall's defence of his History of Infant-Baptism, was, in general, to refute whatever had been said against it by Dr Gale and others. His motives to it himself informs us were these (21). 'The book, says he, that is, the History of Infant-Baptism having had more said and published by some for, and by some against it, than I could have expected, these latter who have wrote against it, and especially Mr Gale's large book of Reflections, so he calls them, he might have entitled them reproaches, have made it needful, in the opinion of some worthy men to whom I owe a deference, for me, even in this my weak and superannuated state, to write something in vindication, partly of the cause, and partly of myself, some people having it seems raised a report or suspicion, as if I myself had altered my opinion about the duty or the antient practice of baptizing infants.' After dispatching what he has to say against the rest of his antagonists, in about the ninth part of his book, he enters upon what he has to say of our author, in the following manner (22). 'Those that I have hitherto been speaking to have concerned themselves with my book but briefly and occasionally. But Mr Gale in 1711, wrote professedly against it. And tho' the greatest part of his book be either of personal matters, some about my life, temper, actions, &c. not relating to the cause; and some about my way of writing, when it is too long or too short, or too censorious, or catching at here and there a passage of my book, which he thought might be represented so as to put me out of favour with the Anti-Pædobaptists, as are his two first chapters which he calls my character, or else on another subject, viz. not the age or time of receiving Baptism, but the way of administering it, with which I had meddled very little, as are his three next, yet he gave to the whole the title of Reflections on my book. And tho' he goes no farther in any methodical way of answering than to the introduction, and five first chapters of my book, not nigh one tenth part of it, which answer begins at his ninth chapter, and he has but thirteen in all, yet it has gone among the men of his party as an answer to it. He deals not much with argument which the others have chiefly aimed at, but writes in a way of declaiming and flourish, and much addicted to reproaching, taking a pride in shewing how easily, and how naturally he can express a contempt of his adversary, or of any reason or argument. He writes in a stile indeed sufficiently fluent, and with a good stock of philological learning, but does not keep very close to the rules of candour, modesty, or truth; but delights in vaunting, insulting, slighting, and laying odious and false imputations, not on me only, but on the Clergy of England in general, and indeed our whole Church, as that was a time in which some people found their advantage by raising such slanders. His talent in Rhetoric, which is not inconsiderable, he uses to false colouring, and gaining his point, as he calls it, by wrested representations of things and passages. Of his impertinencies, to name but one sort of them, an unparallel'd instance is his picking up stories of things said or done by me before he was born, and naming the people, whose names one would never have thought to have seen in print, nothing, thanks be to God, of which one need be ashamed. But it is a great shame to see such impertinent stuff brought into a controversy of religion. Of his untruths, I would before-hand instance in one flagrant and manifest one, which, as I shall shew, he has affirmed above twenty times over; his saying that I have in my books yielded, and owned that there is no Scripture proof for Infant-Baptism, tho' near half his book be spent in refuting, as well as he can, those proofs which I brought from Scripture. The province which I had undertaken, was the history of the times near following, but I did not altogether omit those of Scripture. If I had followed my own inclinations, or the advice of some of my friends in drawing up an answer to him, I should have made it shorter by half than it is, and taken notice only of those few reflections of his, that seemed to be of moment to the main point. The tyranny of custom obliges me not only to take more pains than I needed, but the dry work of following him κατὰ ὁδόν, and answering to many things that are impertinent to the cause, or of small weight in it: but also when I have done it to make an excuse to any judicious reader why I did it. Such an one will pardon me, if he consider, that some captious and litigious men would otherwise have been apt to say, that I had passed over the material objection: To spare the time of those who are choice of it, tho' I had not liberty to spare my own, I must advertise them, that there is hardly any thing in Mr Gale's first six chapters, or in my answer to them that is very material to the point of Infant-Baptism. And it will be no great loss to step over them. A vein of boasting and magnifying his own performance runs through all his book. With that he continues his work, and with that he ends, and contrary to Horace's rule, who says of a vaunting prefacer, Quid dignum tanto foret hic promissor hiatus? With that he begins. For in an advertisement prefixed to his book, having taken notice that several great and worthy men whom he names too, had given a favourable character of my book, he says, that he published these his Reflections, to inform the publick, &c.—and to let those learned gentlemen know, that they had been too hasty in their judgments, and that this history is not by far what they take it to be. Is not this youth a likely man, think you, to be able to inform their judgment of any considerable thing? I set down this as a specimen of the arrogance you are to expect all through the book. In the same advertisement, he says, that these Reflections, tho' published in 1711, were written in 1705, and 1706. Suppose that. But when he saw in 1707, my second edition with some alterations, should he not have left out his needless remarks on those places of my first edition, which I myself had altered in the second? He there adds, that he had hoped that a more learned advocate would have been engaged. If Mr Stennet were once desired or pitched on to answer my book, and it was devolved upon this man, it was an unhappy change both for the Anti-Pædobaptists and for me. For if he had answered at all, he would have said more to the purpose, would have used a more rational, modest, and candid way of seeking the truth, and I should have had far more Christian treatment.' In another place, he acquaints us with particularity relating to the Doctor's book, which at once contains both compliment and satire (23). 'I will make one observation, a better natured one tending to the commendation of him, and of the Anti-Pædobaptists of them for their generosity and being pleased, and of him for his abundant justice. It is to be noted, that this chapter was published a good while before the rest, as a specimen of what the book should be. They seemed very well pleased, and much taken with it, and encouraged him to go forward. Which was an instance of very good nature, since it is so little to the purpose, that if one were to expose him among

This, as we just now hinted, was not the only great design of which he had formed the plan before he quitted this life, and of which the publick was deprived by the loss of so valuable and so industrious a person. He had thoughts of contributing to the study of the oriental languages, by offering some means for facilitating the speedy acquisition of them; which he knew would have a very great effect in rendering the Scriptures, as well of the New as of the Old Testament, thoroughly understood, which, without this help, is impossible, and is one great source of those mistakes which do so much discredit to Revealed Religion. Another great and useful labour he had proposed to himself, if Providence had lengthened his days, was a translation into English of the Septuagint, according to the accurate edition published by Dr Grabe, at Oxford. But what seems most to have occupied his thoughts, to have been in the fairest train of execution, and for the loss of which, in all appearance, the Christian world has most cause to be concerned, was the scheme he had framed of a compleat Exposition of the whole New Testament from the pulpit, which, whoever impartially reflects on his critical knowledge of the Greek tongue, his soundness in the fundamental articles of religion, his great sagacity in judging, his known candour in speaking, and his moderation towards such as differed from him in opinion, must allow it to have been a loss indeed! It is hard to say, whether this loss is softened or irritated, by the plan he left behind him of this important work; but this, as is highly fit, shall be left entirely to the reader's judgment, by inserting that very curious and accurate, though plain and concise, piece, in the notes [I]. We must add to these another treatise of great expectation;

' among judicious men, one would desire them to read this chapter. But he is to be commended for doing them more than justice, and making the goods to be delivered better than the sample. For the following chapters are really something more to the purpose, and of a better strain.' Yet many disinterested persons who have read our author's book, think there is not a stronger chapter in it, and that the first part of it particularly contains as much as can possibly be said in favour of his opinion. As Dr Wall is very angry with him for being rude in many places in his book, yet in the following passage he censures him for being civil (24). 'He labours, says he, to defend

' the late Bishop of Salisbury's notion, that by the Kingdom of God in that text, is meant not Heaven, but the Church on Earth, and by some flattering elogiums of his Lordship's, unanswerable arguings, &c. seems to have aimed at currying favour. And whereas, I had said that all the Antients understand it in this place of the Kingdom of Glory; he says, yet it may not be the true sense if they do. For the Antients were fallible, &c. It seems he could find no unanswerable arguments among them, for they were all dead and had no places to give.' It does not appear that this insinuation had the least foundation, from the conduct of the person to whom it is applied; and the truth of the matter is, that Dr Gale's civility in one place (25), was intended to atone for his censure in another; for tho' he does acknowledge that the Bishop had very well proved, that this expression, generally speaking, refers to the Kingdom of Christ, and not to the Kingdom of Glory; yet he denies his Lordship's conclusion, from the passage which he had cited, and maintains, that tho' it does rarely signify the Kingdom of Glory, yet there it must be so understood. If this be currying of favour, it is a strange way of doing it. We come now to the passage of our author's letter mentioned in the text, which was conceived in these words. 'Dr Wall has written a defence of his History of Infant-Baptism, in which he has treated me very roughly, and has endeavoured to enrage the Clergy, as well as our own people, against me, besides which there appears not to be much in his book, however I am preparing an answer, which, &c.' After all, as they were men, we do no injustice to these learned persons in saying they had both their failings, or to speak with greater propriety, both had the same failing, that of warmth, and suffering themselves to be too much heated in the course of the dispute. But when a proper allowance is made for this, it may be truly said, and indeed tho' in their heat they sometimes unsay it, yet in several places they say it of each other, that Dr Wall's History of Infant-Baptism is by much the best vindication of the doctrine and discipline of the Church that ever appeared; as, on the other hand, Dr Gale's reflections upon that work is the best defence of the Baptists that was ever published, and this, tho' it be no more than the truth, is saying a great deal for both,

since the subject had been handled by very great men before.

[I] Tho' plain and concise piece in the notes.] Amongst Dr Gale's papers after his decease, there was found his introduction to this practical exposition, and therein we have the plan of it so clearly, and so circumstantially laid down, that we may from thence form a just notion of the nature and importance of his design, and of how great value the work itself would have been had he lived to finish it. This short preface runs thus (26).

' I am now about to begin an Exposition of the New Testament, and design, if God in his boundless goodness shall give me life and ability, to go thro' the whole, with as much brevity as the nature of the thing will conveniently admit. To engage your most diligent attention, and to help your memory, and thereby render these lectures the more useful, I think it may be very proper at present to give you a short model of my design, and the method I intend to take in the prosecution of it. Now my chief view is not to engage you in any particular set of opinions, or to enslave your minds to any man's private interpretation of the Scripture, by dressing them to advantage, and concealing or misrepresenting what is said by others; this indeed is commonly thought warrantable enough, but truth needs no such artifices, but disdains to trick men unwarily into the belief or knowledge of it. Besides, since we are too sensibly convinced, how liable we are all to error and mistake, we by this artificial way deprive ourselves of the assistance of other men for the discovery of the truth, and when we are in an error ourselves, do all we can to cover others with the same darkness, and if our endeavours were successful, we should effectually deprive them of any possibility of being better informed. I am very sensible what poor short-sighted creatures we are, and therefore will endeavour not to espouse any particular opinion or interpretation, or urge any with that warmth, which may any way contribute to blind or obscure my own mind, or deceive you. But my whole aim shall be to lay before you the most sacred and awful rule of our faith and practice, without any partial disguises; and to the utmost of my power assist you in opening your minds to receive and own those great truths, which are able to make you wise unto salvation; that you may, upon a mature and due consideration of things, judge for yourselves with all that just liberty and true freedom of thought which so well becomes all men, and is the indispensable duty of every Christian, and upon which, 'tis the peculiar glory of the Christian religion to have spread itself thro' the whole world. To build your faith on the sense and authority of great men, is giving up your souls intirely to them, and to believe in them and not in Christ, as peevishly and hastily to pass judgment or take up an opinion without hearing, and diligently weighing pectation, which was an History of the Notion of Original Sin, in which he hoped to have explained many deep truths, and to have driven out of the bosoms of reasonable men, several rooted and yet dangerous errors (k). About the beginning of December 1721, he was attacked by a slow languid fever (l), of which he died, after an illness of about three weeks, on the of the same month. He bore his last sickness with great constancy and patience, expressed the utmost resignation to the Divine Will, and, in his last moments, testified an entire confidence in that almighty and all-wise Being in whose hands are the issues of life and death, and whose mercy is over all his works (m). He may be said to have died in the flower of his age, being in his forty-second year; and in some measure unexpectedly, as being of a strong and healthy constitution. In his person he was rather taller than the common size, of an open pleasant countenance, and of easy and affable behaviour. Serious, without any tincture of moroseness; cheerful without levity, having a most perfect command over his passions, insomuch that one who knew him intimately for many years, assures us he never once saw him discomposed (n); extremely humble, tho' in such high reputation for learning; and particularly careful of giving offence to such as were in low circumstances, as being sensible that nothing makes the mind of man so tender as poverty, and that nothing wounds so deep as the very suspicion of contempt. As to his character in other respects, it may, in a great measure, be collected from what has been already said; and, if this shall appear deficient, the reader may receive ample satisfaction from those pieces that shall be presently mentioned, and in some measure from the extracts at the bottom of the page [K]. He was, as is apparent from a variety of evidence, as uni-what others say, is setting up a very dangerous ignorant idol in your own minds, and paying divine honour and worship to the vain delusion. Besides, 'tis the highest affront and indignity that can be put upon God and Christ, to deal so carelessly and disrespectfully with those holy books, as if we would boldly despise and trample upon all the sacred doctrines which the Son of God himself came down from heaven to teach us, and that purely for our good. Since then the extremes on both sides are so very dangerous, it highly concerns every private Christian to proceed in affairs of such great moment with the utmost caution and calmness of mind, with great sincerity and impartiality, for the Scripture contains such things as are undoubtedly to every one of you matters of the last concern. On your conscientious obedience to this rule your eternal welfare depends, and by this you shall be judged. To give you what help I can in this very important business, I intend to take this as the most proper method for your assistance and instruction. I will take in order entire portions of Scripture, which comprehend a full and compleat sense. This I would, if it were proper, read to you in the original language, but that not being convenient, I shall read the common version and consider it carefully, comparing it with the parallel places where the same thing is handled; the same words or phrases used, or any thing which may give light, and shall consult also the several opinions of learned men, with the reasons on which they build and compare the antient versions in the learned languages, together with the interpretations of the first Christians, and such remarks from the antient Historians, and such accounts of the Jewish and Greek Antiquities, as may give us any light at this distance from the time and place wherein the Scriptures were at first written. After having thus examined every thing which may seem to need examination, from the whole I will endeavour to give a very impartial and unbiassed translation and paraphrase, and herein draw out and make some rules and maxims for the conduct of life, in order to fasten all upon your minds, and leave it to your serious and diligent consideration. Before I do this, I shall in general prove the truth of the Christian rule. This comprehends, first that the books were written by those whose names they bear, and such as could not but know, whether what they writ was true or not; secondly, they could not design to impose upon us. And I will settle the authority of each book just before I enter upon the exposition of it. It may perhaps be objected by some, that in the course of these lectures there must be several things said not fit for common auditories; but since it is necessary to render the Scriptures intelligible to all, whatever is necessary to this end must not be omitted upon this pretence, that these things are unfit for common auditories, i. e. not to be easily understood by common auditories, because people do so rarely, if at all, hear them talked of. By treating these difficult matters frequently, they will become familiar to all, all things even the most necessary are strange and distasteful, and hard to understand at first. In the schools men are made acquainted with the most difficult matters, by being frequently entertained with them, and having them repeated over and over again. And this is destroying and cutting up by the very roots, heresy and schism, atheism, irreligion and profaneness, and all error and mistake, as far as it can be hoped for in this imperfect state of men; for 'tis reserved for the life to come to be perfect, when all error and mistake shall be done away for ever.

[K] At the bottom of the page.] The author of that short account of his life prefixed to the Sermons published after his decease, among other remarkable passages has these. (27). 'The grand principle which he endeavoured to root the deepest, and cultivate with the greatest care, in his own mind, as well as in the minds of his hearers, was that of sincerity; upon which he thought our happiness or misery in a future state will depend. He therefore considered that this would be of the highest importance, when many of the acquirements we here gain one above another will fade and wither away, which made him very humble, notwithstanding his great abilities. This also disposed him to judge charitably of those who differed from his sentiments, and to be very diligent in his enquiries after truth. His embracing the doctrine of the Trinity was one effect of this, for he did not run into this belief from any prejudices of education or bias put upon his mind, in his youth having been early introduced into the conversation of those who examined the several doctrines of the Christian Revelation with the utmost freedom, amongst whom were some foreigners as well as others of the first rank for learning and abilities.' Dr Kinch, in his discourse (28), sets some other parts of his character in a very graceful light. 'He was blessed, says he, with extraordinary natural abilities, a hail strong constitution, a smooth ready wit, a bright and lively fancy, a piercing thought, a quick invention, a strong memory, and a good and solid judgment. These excellent qualifications were very much heightened and improved by the advantages he received from an ingenious and liberal education, in which he made so great a progress, as rendered him truly valuable to all persons of real worth and learning, who were so happy as to have any knowledge of or acquaintance with him.—He had an even and composed temper, which discovered itself in the constant serenity of his countenance. The different turns of his affairs seemed to make little or no impression upon his mind, for he, with the great

verfally regretted as any man of his character and abilities ever was, or could be, notwithstanding the heats and party prejudices which prevailed in those days (o). His funeral sermon was preached at Barbican, to his own congregation, by Mr Joseph Burroughs, December the fourteenth (p); and on the Sunday following, December the thirty-first, by John Kinch, Doctor of Laws (q); elegant and pathetick discourses both. But his praises were not only in the mouths of his brethren, I mean those of his own communion; but others also who were acquainted with his merit, his learning, and his zeal for the fundamental truths of the Christian religion, took also a share in the sorrow for his death, and willingly contributed their part in confessing and applauding his virtues (r). It is very certain that those who have said such high things of his attention to the great duties of his calling, his contempt of the vanities of this life, and his exalted confidence in the supreme Being, have not gone to any excess, or expressed his diligence, humility, or patience, with any excusable degree of latitude, but have strictly adhered to truth. Those were his sentiments in the vigour of his health, nor did they cease to be his sentiments on his bed of sickness. While he was able, he preached to his congregation from the pulpit; when he was no longer able, he preached to them from his death-bed. He taught them in words how to live with hope, he taught them by his example to die in comfort. These things, which might otherwise, in an age so censorious and incredulous, meet with doubts and suspicions, are put beyond all question by his sermons printed since his decease, and which fully shew what he was. As these posthumous works make the greater part of what he has left behind him to posterity, we reserved the mention of his writings till we could speak of them at once, and present their titles all together to the reader's view [L]. In them the justification of all that has been said of his parts, or his piety, will be found; and there

' Apostle St Paul, had learned in whatever state he was therewith to be content. He knew both how to be abased, and how to abound every where, and in all things was he instructed, both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound, and to suffer need. He was truly pious, but without any thing of ostentation, exercising himself herein to have a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward man. He adorned the profession he made of the Christian Doctrine by a holy and exemplary life, which was a convincing proof that he firmly believed religion to be of the greatest importance, and that he was in earnest when he endeavoured to persuade others to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. He was a person of great integrity, and preferred the peace of his own mind in the answer of a good conscience to all other considerations. His thoughts were so fully employed about affairs of the highest consequence, that he neglected several opportunities of advancing his temporal interests. He was so intent upon his great Master's business, and was so warmly engaged in the pursuit of the durable riches of the eternal world, that these fading treasures passed his notice. He was a kind friend, and made it his business to instruct and inform, to advise, and, on proper occasions, to reprove those with whom he converted; which most difficult office of friendship he so well managed, that none could be offended with him. And being always delighted in doing good, he was ever as ready to perform any friendly office even for the meanest disciple of Christ Jesus, as for those whose circumstances being more exalted, are from thence generally deemed to have a more commanding influence. He abounded greatly in those fruits of the Spirit mentioned by the Apostle, Gal v. 22, 23. love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance. But that virtue wherein he peculiarly excelled, was his great humility. Notwithstanding his valuable and uncommon abilities, both natural and acquired; he always appeared humble and modest, mild and courteous; and was so far from having a vain and proud conceit of his own endowments, that he knew how, without the affected vanity of lessening his own qualifications, to esteem others better than himself. He bore his last sickness with great patience and resignation to the will of God. When a little before his dissolution, his mournful consort, with weeping eyes and wringing hands, expected the dreadful separation, Trust in the all-sufficient one, says the good man, who can if he thinks fit raise me up. He seemed to depart with the greatest composure and serenity of mind, making good that observation of the Psalmist, that the end of the perfect and upright man is peace, and indeed what should discompose him? For he well knew in whom he had believed.' Mr Burroughs observes also of his departed friend (29), 'That his extensive knowledge, and the sweetness of his address, gave him an easy access to men of the greatest figure and worth, by conversing with whom, his own abilities were very much improved, and this advantage he constantly pursued. The large acquaintance he had with the Classic authors in both languages, and the progress he made in mathematical studies, and in the most valuable parts of Philosophy, were accompanied with a good degree of skill in the oriental tongues. But tho' he took a large compass, 'tis evident that he turned the whole course of his studies to the work of the Ministry, to prepare for which, he spent a very considerable part of his time in the study of the Scriptures themselves in their originals, and in comparing them with the versions of various languages, particularly the more antient, whereby he became a great master in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and capable of discoursing to advantage upon any point which immediately related to them. Besides this, he employed himself with much diligence in consulting the antient commentators upon the Bible, and in reading and digesting the primitive writers of the Christian Church, for whose interpretations of Scripture he shewed a more than ordinary value. And here I think it deserves to be mentioned, to his special honour, that he entered into a voluntary society erected on purpose to enquire into the primitive doctrines and practices of the Christian Church, and compare them with the books of the Old and New Testament, at a time when such a thing could not be done without suffering much reproach for it; and that he continued diligently several years to search into the antient books for this purpose, and by discourse with others to make them familiar to him, the effect whereof might have been very beneficial to the publick, if it had pleased God to prolong his life.'

[L] All together to the reader's view.] We have already spoken largely of our author's principal work, published in his life-time; we have likewise spoken of those that he intended to have composed, if Providence had bestowed upon him a longer stay in this life; all therefore that is intended in this note, is, for the sake of perspicuity, to set down the titles of such of his works as are extant, and to give from the last, a short specimen of those excellencies that we have applauded in the text.

III. Sermons preached upon several Subjects, by the late Reverend and Learned Dr John Gale; to which is prefixed, an Account of his Life, in four Vols. Lond. 1726, 8vo. the second edit.

The first edition, was published very soon after the death of the author, and met with such a reception as might be expected, from the reputation he had acquired while living. In these four volumes, there are seventy-eight discourses, exclusive of that preached on the fifth of November, which is reprinted (30). It may be very truly said, that though the eloquence of the pulpit be in itself a very distinct thing, from the various kinds of eloquence, by arriving at perfection, in which some men make themselves the guides and leaders of others; yet even this eloquence of the pulpit, is capable of many subdivisions; and we shall find, upon a strict enquiry, that few have been distinguished preachers, without having something very peculiar in their manner. We cannot either illustrate this observation, or bring this article better to a close, than by giving an instance from Dr Gale's Discourses (31).

In discoursing upon these words, Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the LORD. Having first stated the nature of this command, and described that habit of mind which Christians are directed to acquire, he proceeds to shew the advantageous consequences, that must be the natural, and therefore necessary, result of such an acquisition. 'This noble, generous, peaceable, and holy disposition of mind, says he, as it is every man's duty, and highly acceptable in the sight of the great God, and supreme Governor of the world; so is it likewise of unspeakable advantage to mankind, and absolutely necessary to their well being, in every state and condition, whether here or hereafter. To confine ourselves at present, to a prospect of this life only, we know men can't subsist without society, there is such a mutual dependance upon one another, so strongly planted and rooted in our very natures, that no art or violence can pluck it up; besides, our internal dispositions, and strong inclinations to converse, and which shine out so clearly, that some of the ancient Philosophers have thought fit to define man, by calling him a sociable creature, believing nothing in man to be so essential and distinguishing as this: we are likewise, as to our external condition, visibly placed, by the wise Author of all things, very much in one another's power; and though men were to condemn themselves to the most unnatural and uncomfortable state, and betake them to desarts, and solitary mountains and forests, there to lead a savage life, in the most obscure retirement, they could not remove themselves out of one another's reach; for even these places would be open to their rude incursions, and inevitably haunted by wilder and more savage monsters, than they are at present. The only remedy for all the numberless evils, and inconceivable miseries, into which an independent state, in every particular man, would certainly plunge us, is this of society, which nature itself, that is, the finger of God, has pointed out to us; and yet, without these virtues of peace and holiness, society, instead of a good, will be the worst condition rational creatures can be in; families, cities, and commonwealths, will be only so many swarms of scorpions, tygers, and all manner of venomous and rapacious creatures, pent up together in a narrow compass, and incessantly spending their utmost rage and fury upon one another; for no creature is more fierce and unruly than man, or exposed to more failings, which disturb and overturn society, when he throws off all restraint. Our own experience, as well as the history of all past-times, shews us, that most savage man exercises all his cruelties, not like the gentler beasts of the forest, upon those chiefly of a different kind, but even more especially upon mankind itself; and besides the stings of hunger, and other natural appetites, which it seems are not enough abused to the worst purposes, they have created to themselves other more powerful, at least more frequent and mischievous, incentives to violence and oppression, and the vilest acts of injustice and impiety. Thus they have raised in themselves, an endless burning thirst after things superfluous, which must be continually gratified, no matter how; they have planted in their very hearts, the most pernicious of all evils, the cursed sins of ambition, pride, and avarice, which lead captive virtue in adamantine chains of slavery, while they ravage the world. Outrageous malice, fierce resentment of petty injuries, and implacable revenge, do almost seem the natural product of a human mind; these are some of the inexhaustible springs, whence pour forth those deep foul rivers of sin and wickedness, which spread themselves over the whole earth, and pollute all the several degrees and stations of life. Hence arise quarrels, envy, hatred, rancour, enmities, discord, confusion, and endless disorders. Hence spring all kinds of violence, injustice, oppression, and fraud; hence come robberies, horrid murders, and cruel devastations, by fire and sword, together with all manner of direful calamities; and, in fine, hence proceed the mighty armies of impiety, vice, and profaneness, which make a constant and too successful war upon religion and virtue, establishing infidelity and impurity, irreligion and debauchery, atheism and immorality, and all manner of licentiousness, and numberless abominations, which utterly subvert and destroy all society from amongst men, and bury the distinctions of good and bad, right and wrong, in one common dreadful ruin: for by these, private persons break to pieces all the bonds and ties of duty, friendship, and relation; and by these, supreme governors, and men of great influence, whose sphere of action is large, and widely extended over the commoner sort, when they throw off the restraints of reason and law, spread ruin and desolation throughout the world. Thus then you see, as it were in miniature, a representation of man's uncultivated nature, which may well be likened to a deep wide sea, which these unnatural passions soon blow up into a dreadful storm, and render very turbulent and boisterous, and hardly to be confined within any bounds; but of what amazing force and efficacy then, must those divine virtues be, which can remedy all these mighty evils; which can subdue, manage, and tame the wild savage nature, and make it mild and calm; which can curb and restrain all the unruly passions, and confine them within the bounds of right and good, just and honourable? Nothing can be more amiable or beneficial to mankind; and here, no doubt, you'll fix your thoughts upon that peace and holiness, which the great Lover and Benefactor of mankind so earnestly recommends to us, not for his own advantage, but for our good; for these most powerfully expel all noxious humours, and naturally tend to settle an everlasting serenity, quiet, and uninterrupted happiness among men: And notwithstanding the corruptions of our natural appetites, or any unnatural propensions and dispositions, we may have contracted these great virtues, having once gained admission into our hearts, and a full power there, will render us pure and holy, as that bright flame which warms the breasts of saints, gentle as innocence, and kind and peaceable as love. For a truly peaceable disposition of mind, will constantly exert itself in all manner of generous and wonderful acts of goodness to all mankind; 'twill teach us to put on a calm, modest, and friendly behaviour towards every one, and is always bent upon that beneficial work, of promoting the growth of publick and private peace and concord; and accordingly, is in all cases forward, and strongly inclined, to put the most candid and favourable interpretations upon mens words and actions, and not quick-sighted to see their failings, and forward to blow them through the world, or lightly to play with another's reputation and good name; for a generous and good man, would sooner cease to breathe, than one contagious pestilential breath should escape him, to blast his neighbour's fame. The true disciples of the Lord Jesus, whose distinguishing character

GARDINER (STEPHEN), an able Lawyer, a learned Divine, and shrewd Statesman; Bishop of Winchester, and Chancellor of England, in the XVIth Century (a). Few have risen higher by mere dint of abilities, few suffered greater changes of fortune, few have been more magnified or commended, few more invidiously and outrageously treated, than this famous Prelate, in his life-time and since his decease; yet, for any tolerable account of him there is none. We find no article of him in any collection of this kind, very little amongst the compilers of historical memoirs, and, tho’ there is more in our literary and other biographical Historians, it is so intermixed with other matter, or so visibly tinged with party resentment, that it is almost impossible to know what to think, or whom to trust. In this case, the collecting his memoirs with caution, care, and candour, and reporting them fairly to posterity, is a work of equal labour and difficulty; but what then? It is necessary, useful, conducive to the bringing much truth to light, and exposing many errors which have been so often, and elegantly, repeated by those who took them to be truths, that we may reasonably hope a kind and favourable reading of what particulars are here digested concerning this great man’s life, which are as copious, as exact, and as free from bias of any kind as we were able to make them. It is also to be hoped, that they will be perused with the same equal spirit, and that the reader will bring an inclination to be informed how things really happened, what were, and what were not, the actions of this famous man, who had many failings, and some vices; but, withal, had fine parts, general knowledge, and abilities every way equal to the posts he gradually filled, and even to those high employments to which he at length attained [A]. At the very entrance

[A] To which he at length attained.] Such as have not had experience of the incertainties, inconsistencies, and contradictions, that perpetually occur in most of the books relating to English History, will very probably wonder at these complaints, and look upon it as a thing strange, that the personal history of one who rose to such high dignities, both in Church and State, should be a thing so very obscure and perplexed, as we have represented it. The only method of making this plain, would be producing to the reader’s view, the genuine causes of this darkness and embarrassment; but, as that would require a volume instead of a note, it shall, in this place, suffice to set down briefly, only a few of these causes, and such as have a direct relation to the article before us. The authors of our Chronicles and Annals, very frequently, either in the course of their histories, when they speak of remarkable persons, or at the close, perhaps, of a Prince’s reign, when they come to speak of the scholars, statesmen, and soldiers, that flourished in his time, give short characters of such great men, from what occurs to their memory; but these concise representations, rather heighten than satisfy our curiosity, and excite in us a desire, to know where we may meet with more, instead of giving us content in the particulars we would be glad to learn. Some again, from an inclination to render their narratives more pleasing, draw their pictures a little fuller, and give not barely the out lines, but add also something of strength and colour to the piece, which is attended with various inconveniencies, not foreseen by the author. For the same period of time falling under the consideration of some other writer of a different genius and sentiments, he gives the picture of the same person opposite, it may be, in several, if not in all respects; and then we want new lights, to inform us which, or whether either, of these pictures were taken from the life. Those who have attempted to exhibit the lives and characters of such as have filled certain high offices, either through the want of proper materials, or negligence in collecting them, have rather given us catalogues, and those too very imperfect. Bishop Godwin, for instance, in this very article, has hardly two right dates in the whole. Such as out of a love to learning, have undertaken the history of our eminent writers, content themselves, commonly, with a few general strokes in relation to their characters, and these rather taken from common fame, than from a close examination of their works. Besides, partiality and prejudice have had so great a dominion over the two principal authors in this way, with respect to our nation, that we learn from them, rather their own opinions, than the histories of those of whom they write. According to Bale (1), this Bishop of Winchester was a devil incarnate; but then, according to Pits (2), he was a very angel of light. It is the same thing with respect to Ecclesiastical Historians, or such as have written tracts relative to ecclesiastical history. John Fox (3) asserts, that this prelate was of a most fierce and sanguinary disposition; and the principal author of all the cruelties, in the reign of Queen Mary. Father Persons (4), on the other hand, assures us, that such as will speak truth, must acknowledge Bishop Gardiner to have been not only of a mild, but of a most compassionate nature; and that it was chiefly owing to him, the principal Protestants in that reign escaped. The remedies that are to be applied in this case, in order to free ourselves from mistakes, and to make the way open for truth, is to proceed methodically, and to shew his progress in preferment, the several employments through which he went, and the manner in which he discharged them. It is from facts, that we must collect his real character, and not from the panegyrics written by his creatures, or the invectives penned by his enemies. We must consider the temper of the times in which he lived, the nature of the affairs which went through his hands, the circumstances attending his actions, the means by which he rose, the causes of his fall, the manner of his recovery, and the measures he afterwards pursued. We must be content to compare what is advanced by differ-trance of our labours, we meet with nothing but doubts and incertainties. Most authors of his age tell us he was born of obscure parents at Bury St Edmund, in the county of Suffolk (b). As to the place, indeed, there is no dispute at all; but for the obscurity of his parentage, if we may trust to some very good authorities, it arose from hence, that he was the illegitimate son of a prelate nobly descended and royally allied, who took pains to conceal that so much discrediting circumstance to himself, by bestowing his concubine on one of his meaner servants, whose name, being born in wedlock, this infant bore (c). Fuller, who is not always an enemy to secret history, rejects this story, as invidious and ill contrived (d); but many, as like to be well informed, and not at all more credulous, admit the truth of it; and Sir William Dugdale (e), whose knowledge in such points can hardly be disputed, sets it down as a fact. We cannot, indeed, go quite so far; but laying all circumstances together, there appears to be the greatest probability that this was really the case, as the reader will see in the notes [B]. As to the year of his birth, that has been hitherto as great a secret as his descent; and very likely the design of concealing the one, might occasion so profound a silence in respect to the other; however, from an original picture of his still preserved, we have good grounds to conclude that it ought to be fixed to 1483 (f). We know nothing of his education, or the manner in which he passed his youth, till he was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he studied in Trinity-Hall with great diligence and success. He was distinguished there by his quick parts, his correct pen, his elegance in writing and speaking Latin, and for his extraordinary skill in Greek, which procured him very high compliments, as to his acquisitions in literature, when he was in no condition to reward flatterers (g). In process of time he applied himself entirely to the Civil and Canon Law, for which that learned foundation was very famous [C]. The reputation he attained rent authors, in order to discover not only the truth of some things, and the falshood of others, but the probability or improbability of such transactions, as at this distance of time cannot be reduced to any absolute certainty. It is not of much importance to us, whether our discoveries heighten or depress the characters of several writers; but it is of very great importance to know the truth, and to have a just notion how the great businesses he managed were brought about, and whether he was at the bottom, a weak and wicked man, or a politician of great art and address; and who, like other politicians, sometimes pursued the interests of his country, for which, upon what motives soever he did it, it is fit he should be commended, and sometimes crossed them to pursue his own, when he ought to be censured, how plausible soever his excuses might be. These are the true principles upon which this kind of writing ought to rest, that those who move in the superior spheres of life, may be always sensible, that whatever their present fate may be, they will have justice done them by posterity; and that their memories will not be either tarnished by the groundless calumnies which envy excited, or preserve any of that false lustre, their mercenary flatterers, while living, were encouraged to bestow

[B] As the reader will see in the notes. The plain fact, in respect to his birth, was this. He is said to have been the son of Dr Lionel Woodvill, Widvill, or as he wrote his own name, Wydvisle, Dean of Exeter, and Bishop of Salisbury, brother to Elizabeth, Queen Consort to Edward the Fourth, who died in 1484 (5). Dr Fuller (6) objects to this, that Salisbury is at a great distance from Bury, where Gardiner was born, which is, in reality, no objection at all, for, since that prelate was so cautious as to oblige his mistress to marry an inferior servant of his, whose name was Gardiner, the better to conceal this shameful transaction, he might therefore be well supposed to have been as careful in sending her far enough off to lie in. Another objection he makes, has somewhat more weight, he thinks Bishop Woodvill must have had this son in his youth; and if so, the age of Gardiner, at his death, would not agree with the story. But those who relate it, say that he was born while his father was Bishop of Salisbury; and he did not hold that dignity above two years, which takes away the force of this objection. In the satirical writings against him and Bonner (7), it was objected to them, that it was not strange they were against the marriage of priests, since they were both born in adultery. Now Bonner was the bastard of one Savage, a clergyman, who was himself the bastard of Sir John Savage, Knight of the Garter. Bonner's was precisely the same case with Gardiner's, for his mother was married before he was born, to the person whose name he bore; and it is very remarkable, that both of them, till they were Bishops, declined using their surnames, the one being called Dr Stephens, and the other Dr Edmonds. But Gardiner seems to have been better reconciled to his name afterwards, since he assumed the arms of the Gardiners of Glemsford in Suffolk (8), with a distinction of a border; and afterwards, either through the mistake of the painter, or by his own direction, they were impaled with the arms of the See of Winchester, without any such distinction. Bishop Burnet plainly proves, that this story was believed in our Prelate's life-time, for he tells us, that he had seen a letter written by Sir Edward Hobby, to one of the exiles abroad, for religion, immediately upon Gardiner's death, in which it was said, that he was a man of higher descent, than he was commonly reputed; and in the margin of the letter it was noted, that he was Nephew to a Queen of England (9); but though this might be true, and though he was, by this means, second cousin by the King's mother to Henry the Eighth, Bishop Burnet's conjecture is not at all probable, that this might be the cause he was so suddenly advanced to the Bishoprick of Winchester; for as the reader will see, there was another cause, which is assigned by Gardiner himself; neither is it at all likely, that the King knew this piece of secret history, or would take any notice of it if he did. Had it been otherwise, amongst the many private papers relating to that reign (for whence it's publick history is best collected) which, in process of time, have come to light, something of that kind would have appeared.

[C] For which that learned foundation was very famous. Amongst other poems of the famous Antiquary, John Leland, there is one addressed to Stephen Gardiner, when he wore no higher title; and in the close of which, he foretels him, that his brow would be honoured with a mitre. In this poem he compliments him on his great progress in polite literature, on his fine taste, and just respect for the Ancients; and the desire he had shewn of promoting the study of their valuable writings in the university (10). His own writings shew how much he had studied Cicero; and the critics of those times reproached him with affectation in that respect. As to severer studies, he is allowed to have excelled in the Civil and Canon Law; and in respect to the latter, he was so able, that Bishop Burnet tells us, King Henry, as eager as he was for promoting his divorce, would not suffer the proceedings to be begun before the two Cardinals, till the return of Dr Gardiner from Rome, so much he relied upon his judgment and abilities. Both that Bishop, and the Reverend Mr Jeremy Collier, who seldom thought the same way of men or things, agree that he was but moderately skilled in Divinity; and therefore, it is reasonable to acquiesce in their decision. But then it is at Cambridge, soon opened him a passage into the favour and confidence of several of the greatest men of that age. First, as some report he was taken under the protection of that generous and potent Peer Thomas Duke of Norfolk (b), and afterwards received into the family of the still more potent Cardinal Wolfey, in quality of his Secretary (i). But whatever hopes he might entertain of rising at Court, he had still academical honours in view, and in 1520 received the degree of Doctor of Civil Law (k), and was the year following made Doctor of Canon Law also; but whereas the learned Bishop Tanner, not without authority, makes him Master or Guardian of Trinity-Hall the same year (l), there seems to be good reason to suppose he did not attain that preferment till some years after. There is no question, that, as the Cardinal of York's Secretary, he had a good provision made for him; but this must have been by way of pension or salary, for preferment, so far as we find as yet, he had none. In 1525, he was, by an accident, admitted at once into the King's presence and favour (m) [D], to the great satisfaction of the powerful Cardinal, his Master to be considered, that they ground their sentiments upon his book of true Obedience, which they confess he wrote to please his Sovereign, and against his own sentiments. It is no great wonder, therefore, that his arguments are not very strong, and that he does not reason so closely and convincingly as he might have done; but notwithstanding this, whoever reads that book with attention and impartiality, will not be able to deny, that he has overturned the Pope's Supremacy effectually; and though it is not penned, at least the greater part of it, with that heat and vehemence, visible in the writings of Protestant Divines, yet there is enough in it to shew learned men, that he had thoroughly considered the point, and was able to have said much more if he had been so inclined. All this learning he must have brought with him from the university, for from the time that he first came into business, to his being committed to the Tower, he was continually employed in matters of such high importance, that it was impossible he should have much leisure for study. That his parts and learning indeed were very extraordinary, must be confessed; but if what one of his greatest enemies said of him was true, we must have still an higher idea of them, since there is nothing harder, than for a man of a disagreeable, and even forbidding aspect, to make his way in a Court, and insinuate himself into the good graces of all sorts of people, which it is confessed he did. But we will transcribe the passage, which is very curious, and the book from which it is taken very scarce, for the reader's satisfaction (11). 'Albeit, this Doctor be now but too late thoroughly known, yet it shall be requisite, that our posterity know what he was; and, by his description, see how nature hath shaped the outward parts, to declare what was within. This Doctor hath a swart colour, hanging look, frowning brows, eyes an inch within his head, a nose hooked like a buzzard, nostrils like a horse, ever snuffing into the wind, a sparrow mouth, great paws, like the devil's talons, on his feet, like a gripe, two inches longer than the natural toes, and so tied to with sinews, that he cannot abide to be touched, nor scarce suffer them to touch the stones. And nature having thus shaped the form of an old monster, it gave him a vengeable wit, which at Cambridge, by labour and diligence, he had made a great deal worse, and brought up many in that faculty.' The author who wrote this, and whom we shall be obliged to quote hereafter, was Dr Ponet, advanced to the Bishoprick of Winchester, upon the deprivation of Gardiner, in the reign of King Edward the Sixth; and at the time he wrote this book, an exile in Germany, where he died. In his treatise, he gives Gardiner, who was then Chancellor of England, the title of Doctor of Practices, and bestows the name of Master of Practices upon the Lord Paget, whom he makes to have been Gardiner's pupil; he was indeed bred up in his house, and owed his first rise to Bishop Gardiner's favour; and to shew how great wits will differ in opinion, John Leland complimented Paget upon this very circumstance, calling Gardiner's family the school of the Muses. At the time he directed these verses to him, he was Sir William Paget, and Secretary of State to Henry VIII; and their author thought it would not create either discredit or displeasure to him, to shew how much he, and Wriothesley, then his Fellow-Secretary, and afterwards Chancellor, were obliged to that Prelate for his countenance, and for their own preferment. The lines are very remarkable, and worth reading (12).

[D] Into the King's presence and favour.] There is nothing more entertaining, as well as more useful and satisfactory, than to be thoroughly and certainly informed, of the first steps by which those who have made a figure in the world, have risen to greatness. That of Gardiner, as of many others, was owing purely to accident, to speak according to the common sense of mankind. In the year 1525, his master Wolfey thought fit to change sides; and from being most violently attached to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, became as warm a friend to the French King, Francis the First, then a prisoner in Spain. Humanity and compassion, one would think, must have been the motives to this change; and they might be so, but a very grave Italian Historian, has suggested causes of another kind (13). He says, that before the battle of Pavia, in which the French King was made prisoner, the Emperor used to write to Wolfey, with his own hand, and subscribe your son and cousin CHARLES; but after that victory, the letters to Wolfey, like those to other persons, were written by his secretary, till the Cardinal taught him to resume his old manner of writing. It was the penning this lesson for his Imperial Majesty, that brought Gardiner to the knowledge, or at least introduced him to the favour of Henry the Eighth; the Cardinal had projected a treaty, which was to change the face of affairs in Europe, as indeed it did; and the King coming to his house at More-Park, in Hertfordshire, found Gardiner, then the Cardinal's Secretary, busy in framing that alliance. Few Princes understood business, or could transact it better, than Henry; and therefore, it is no wonder that from such a specimen, he should make a true judgment of Dr Gardiner's abilities. He liked his performance extremely, his conversation better, and that fertility he had in the invention of expedients, best of all (14). He did not disguise his sentiments from Wolfey, there was no need of it, the Cardinal was truly great in this particular, that he feared no man's parts,

Master at this season; whatever it might be in process of time, when, as the Politicians remarked, the Cardinal sunk in the same proportion as this servant of his rose. At this juncture, the King's affairs at Rome were but in an untoward situation, the Roman Pontiff, Clement VII, having address enough to feed the King's Agents with fair promises, according to the standing maxim of that Court; but, in effect, making no progress at all towards the King's point, which was the obtaining a divorce from his Queen Katherine of Arragon. His Majesty therefore resolved to send some person thither, in whom he could entirely confide, and of whose abilities and attachment he had a like opinion (n). After much consideration, he fixed upon our Doctor, now become Master of Trinity-Hall, and, as Bishop Burnet remarks, esteemed at that time the best Civil Lawyer in England (o); to whom he joined Edward Fox, Provost of King's College in Cambridge. At the time of his departure, in February 1528, there is nothing clearer, or more certain, than that he had the most entire confidence reposed in him; both by the King and his Minister, who hoped all things from his diligence and dexterity [E]; and who, if there be any credit due either to their verbal or written declarations, were equally sincere and in earnest in this matter. In their journey towards Italy they executed a commission at the Court of Paris, where, by warm and vigorous representations of what their Master had done, and might do, for King Francis, they obtained that Monarch's letter to the Pope, in as strong terms as could be desired, in support of King Henry's demands. When they came to Orvieto, where the Pope then was, Dr Gardiner used very free language with his Holiness, shewed him the danger he was in of losing the King by playing a double game, and how much injury he would do the Cardinal if he failed his expectations. By these measures all was obtained which his instructions required, and a new commission directed to the Cardinals Wolfey and Compegius was issued (p). In the course of this long embassy, the Pope, whose mind was continually perplexed, and to whom the Imperial, French, and English Ministers allowed no quiet, fell dangerously ill, the disorders of his affections operating upon the humours of his body; and this, as might be expected, gave a new turn to the intrigues of Rome. Dr Gardiner had as large a share in these as any Minister, for he laboured the cause of the Cardinal of York, in case the Pope's death made way for a new election (q). He had the French King's letters also to support this design; for by soliciting the Popedom, he thought to make Wolfey more than amends for the Archbishoprick of Toledo, which was once tendered him by the Emperor; it may be with the same sincerity, or, in other words, with none at all. Yet so much was Wolfey set upon having, at least for a time, the title of Pope, that, having intelligence the King's agents, and his own, parts, but was proud of bringing to the royal notice, able and active men; and even under his misfortunes, as will be hereafter shewn, he had no reason to repent that the new ministers, Cromwell and Gardiner, were taken out of his house, because, in their highest prosperity, they did not forget that they had been once his domesticks. This treaty, (which was the foundation of Gardiner's fortunes) or at least the substance of it, may be found in that great work of the noble Historian (15), who has done so much honour to the reign of Henry the Eighth, and placed that important period of time, in a much better point of light, than almost any other, relating to the affairs of this kingdom. It was from this time, that Dr Gardiner was admitted into the secret of affairs, and equally employed and trusted by the King and his Minister, tho' we have no particular account of the matters, which exercised his care, till he came to be employed in the troublesome business of the King's divorce, which was about three years afterwards. All we know is, that he and his friend Dr Fox, were the persons upon whom the Cardinal chiefly relied, for directing his fine buildings, and for laying the plan of those magnificent foundations, which, however they might excite the envy of the times in which he lived, have very justly recommended his memory to posterity.

[E] From his diligence and dexterity ] Our Historians, are most of them dark, and divided in their sentiments, as to the sincerity of Cardinal Wolfey, in the business of the divorce. Yet this may be observed, that those who were best informed, and took most pains to look into original papers, are very clear, with respect to the Cardinal's real intention, to carry that point for the King, as the only one that could preserve his power, and secure him against all his enemies. Dr Ponet however, who made no scruple of laying every thing to Gardiner's charge, that might render him odious, tells us plainly, that, in order to his own advancement, he betrayed the Cardinal in this embassy, and pushed, with the greatest vigour, what his master wished might be spun out, in order to gain time. But let us hear what the industrious and impartial Mr John Strype says upon this subject, from better authorities than any of our Historians, except Fox, had ever seen, which will effectually clear up this affair (16). 'Gardiner, says he, the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox, the King's servant, Provost of King's College Cambridge, were dispatched to the Pope to effect this, in February 1527, according to the computation of the Church of England. Of whom, Gardiner was the chief, having been admitted into the King's and Cardinal's Cabinet Council for this affair, and stiled in the Cardinal's credential letters to the Pope, Primary Secretary of the most secret Counsels. He was grown into extraordinary request with the Cardinal, in so much, that in his said letters, he called Gardiner the half of himself, than whom none was dearer to him. He writ, that he should unlock his breast to the Pope; and that in hearing him speak, he might think he heard the Cardinal himself. The particulars of this embassy, of which I have the very minutes, in divers letters sent to the King and Cardinal, I will give some account of, especially of such things, as the Lord Herbert, or the Right Reverend Author of the History of the Reformation, have made no mention of, or but briefly and imperfectly.' He proceeds then to shew from these papers, that when the Pope intimated to Dr Gardiner, that he understood this proceeding was not managed with Cardinal Wolfey's consent; and that he had likewise heard some strange things of the Lady intended for the King's bed; the Doctor thereupon, in the name, and by the authority of the Cardinal, who had been acquainted with this before he left England, demonstrated to him the falsity of those suggestions, and what the Cardinal's real sentiments were in both points (17); and that the reader may have no doubts, as to the relator's capacity in stating these matters, he has printed several letters from the originals, which very fully justify all that is said of them; and shew the Cardinal was, hitherto at least, disposed to serve his master as far as he could.

own, had procured for him the suffrages of one third part of the Cardinals, orders were sent them immediately, to cause those Cardinals to withdraw to a place of safety, in case the Conclave appeared more inclined to any other, and there to declare him Pope, assuring them they should be most vigorously sustained by King Henry and his allies. No doubt the pains taken in this business must have been highly pleasing to the Cardinal, though, after all, the design came to nothing; for when Wolsey had shewn his utmost strength, and procured from the King very liberal marks of esteem for the Cardinals of his faction, Clement VII. recovered, and things once more returned to their old state (r). All imaginable care was taken to have the new commission penned to the King's mind, which, not without much difficulty, was obtained; and then it was to be carried from Orvieto to Rome, to pass through the necessary forms requisite to render it authentick. This being also an affair of nicety, and the disposing Cardinal Campegio to make a tour to England with a good will, requiring some extraordinary management, Dr Gardiner took it upon himself, after having procured whatever was requisite for his negotiation, and put every thing necessary to set this in a proper light at home into the hands of his colleague (s). Upon this, Provost Fox was sent home with a full account of their negotiation, with which the King, the Cardinal, and Mrs Anne Bullen, were equally pleased, and unanimously joined in applauding the industry, intrepidity, and ingenuity, of this new Minister, as is incontestably proved from the authentick minutes of this negotiation, which are, or at least very lately were, still preserved and in being [F]. The King, indeed, had the best reason to be satisfied, since Dr Gardiner dealt clearly with him, and shewed him plainly there was nothing to be obtained by soliciting at Rome; that the Pope might probably be induced to approve any thing the King could persuade the Legates to do, but, without question, would never be prevailed on, by hopes or fears, to do any thing himself, which, in his judgment, was the final issue of all this trouble and solicitation (t). Bishop Burnet is offended with Gardiner for desiring the King not to shew this epistle to the Cardinal (u), which, however, might be very consistent with his attachment and regard for his old master, since, from this caution, it appears he had no settled private correspondence with the King; for then it would have been needless, and some of the contents, as he was to sit in judgment in the cause, were exceedingly improper for him to have seen. The reader will find at the bottom of the page the greatest part of this letter, which shews not barely a strong capacity and a true political genius, but also how politely and how correctly he wrote, and that too in language very little antiquated even at this day [G]. When the King

[F] Were lately preserved, and in being] We learn from the same author, and from the same authorities, that Fox was most joyfully received upon his return, which was in the beginning of the month of May 1529; it was evening when he came to Court, when he was directed to go to Mrs Anne's, that is, Anne Boleyn's chamber, where he first made a recital to her, of such points as were fittest for that Lady's ear; soon after the King came thither, and the Lady being withdrawn, he delivered his Majesty the letters he had brought, and run into a large and particular detail of the several steps they had taken; all of which he entirely approved and highly admired. After some time, he sent for Mrs Anne back again, and directed some passages to be repeated in her presence; then Fox went to the Cardinal, who was no less pleased with every thing he heard, and particularly with the accounts given him, of Dr Gardiner's justifying his colleges to the Pope's satisfaction, and making his Holiness sensible, that the revenues of the monasteries granted for their endowment, were fairly applied. Altogether, made such an impression on the Cardinal's mind, that speaking of Gardiner, he cried out, O inestimable treasure, and jewel of this realm! which exclamation, he desired Fox to remark, and to insert in his letter (18). As for Mrs Anne Boleyn, she thought herself under such obligations to this able negotiator, that even before Fox's coming, she wrote him the following letter (19), which is not amongst the papers collected by Strype.

' Mr STEPHEN, I thank you for my letter, wherein I perceive the willing and faithful mind that you have to do me pleasure, not doubting, but as much as is possible for man's wit to imagine, you will do; I pray God to send you well to speed in all your matters, so that you would put me to the study how to reward your high service. I do trust in God, you shall not repent it; and that the end of this journey shall be more pleasant to me, than your first, for that was but a rejoicing hope, which ceasing, the lack of it does put me to the more pain, and they that are partakers with me, as you do know; and

' therefore I do trust, that this hard beginning shall have the better ending.

' Mr STEPHEN, I send you here cramp rings, for you and Mr Gregory, and Mr Peter, praying you to distribute them as you think best. And have me recommended heartily to them both, as she that you may assure them, will be glad to do them any pleasure which shall lie in my power. And thus I make an end, praying God send you good health. Written at Greenwich, the 4th day of April.'

The first part of this letter seems to refer to the journey made by Dr Gardiner, from the Pope's court at Orvieto to Rome, in order to quicken the departure of Cardinal Campegio. It is indeed very difficult to settle the dates of many letters, written about that time, because sometimes they have only the month, without either day or year; but more frequently the day and month without the year, which can only be recovered from circumstances.

[G] Even at this day.] It has been very justly observed, that the surest method of making a right judgment, as to the capacity of public ministers, is to consider their dispatches; and it is for this reason chiefly, that the collections of letters, written by famous men, are so highly and so deservedly valued. It is impossible for a man with a confused head, or of superficial parts, to write clearly and closely; these are qualities not to be acquired even by a long habit of business, but are the pure effects of superior talents. There is another remark, that may and ought to be made, upon this curious and important letter of Dr Gardiner's, which is, that solid learning enables a man to form a style, very different from that of the age in which he lives; and if the ingenious reader will be pleased to compare the following epistle, not only with those written about the same time, of which numbers are preserved, by Fox, Hollinshed, Stow, Fuller, Burnet, Collier, and Strype, but with such as are in the Cabala, and even in later collections, he will find it is written with peculiar elegance and ease, and has nothing of that stiffness or pedantry, which is visible in many of those compositions. It is no exception to this, that Gardiner

King had considered this advice sufficiently, and saw how well it corresponded with events, he recalled Dr Gardiner from Rome, in order to make use of him in the management of his

Gardiner makes use therein of several Latin expressions, because of their apparent propriety; and that he was writing to a Prince, not only well versed in that language, but who valued himself upon his learning. It may be also observed, that he shews a hearty and generous concern for Mr Gregory, in which there could be nothing of artifice or collusion, since it is very evident, from the contents of this letter, that he could not have communicated it; as it is likewise plain, that, by recommending this gentleman's affairs, when he is absolutely silent as to his own, he meant to render him the greatest, and most effectual service, in his power, which is a strain of friendship rare amongst Politicians (20).

‘Pleaseth it your Majesty to understand, that besides all other means used to the Pope's Holiness, for attaining and atchieving your Highness's purpose and intent, such as in our common letters to my Lord Legate's Grace, and my several letters to the same, be contained at length. I have also a-part shewed unto the Pope's Holiness, that which your Highness shewed me in your gallery at Hampton-Court, concerning the sollicitation of the Princes of Almayn, and such other matter, as should and ought to fear the Pope's said Holiness, adding also, those reasons which might induce the same to adhere expressly to your Highness, and the French King; and so to take the more courage, to accomplish your Highness desires, using all ways possible; to enforce him to do somewhat, being a man of such nature, as he never resolveth any thing, but by some violent affection compelled thereunto. And considering we can speed no better at his hands, it agreeth with that, your Majesty, of your high wisdom before perpended, that his Holiness would do nothing which might offend the Emperor, unless he first determined himself to adhere to your Highness, and the French King, and so to declare himself, containing himself no longer in neutrality, which he will not do: nor, the state of the affairs here considered, it were for his weal so to do, unless the Leagues otherwise proceeded, than they yet do; or that his Holiness would determine himself to leave these parts, and establish his See in some other place, for as much as here being, he is daily in danger of the Imperial's, like as we have signified by our other letters.

‘His Holiness is in great perplexity, and agony of mind, nor can tell what to do; he seemeth in words, fashion, and manner of speaking, as though he would do somewhat for your Highness, and yet, when it cometh to the point, nothing he doth: I dare not say certainly, whether it be for fear, or want of good-will, for I were loth to make a lie of him, or to your Highness, my Prince, Sovereign, Lord, and Master. Finally, I perceive this by the Pope, and all other here, that so your Highness cause were determined there by my Lords Legates, they would be glad thereof; and as I think, if the Emperor would make any suit against that which shall be done there, they would serve him as they now do your Highness, and so drive off the time; for they seem to be so minded, as in this cause they would suffer much, but do very little.

‘Wherefore, if my Lord Campegius will set a-part all other respects, and frankly promise your Highness to give sentence for you, then must be your Highness remedy short and expedite; nor shall there want wit by another means, to meet with such delays, as this false counterfeit breve hath caused. For with these men here, your Highness shall, by no suit profit, which thing I write unto your Highness, as of my most bounden duty I ought to do, there shall every day rise new devices, and none take effect, but long delays and wasted time; wherefore, doing what I can yet to get the best, although we be fully answered therein, I shall do what I can to get the commission amplified as much as may be, and at the least, to extend to the reprobation of the brief if I can, for I dare promise nothing to your Majesty at this man's hands; and that which shall be obtained, if any be obtained, shall be, according to your Highness pleasure, sent by Mr Bryan.

‘And whereas your Highness, in your gracious letters directed to me, and my colleagues, marvelleth that I have not, ere this, advertised the same, of such Bulls as your Majesty willed me to impetrate here; I thought verily, that for as much as the same be, to be impetrate at the Pope's hand; and that we signified unto your Majesty, by our letters of the Pope's great sickness; and how we could not have access unto the same, that it had been superfluous for me in my letters, to make any mention of the said Bulls, signifying unto your Highness now, that having those matters, as it becometh me to have in good remembrance, I have not yet broken with the Pope's Holiness in them, nor thought good to interrupt the prosecution of your Highness matter, with the pursuit of those, saving that I spake a word to the Pope's Holiness, de Ecclesiis Cathedralibus; and his Holiness said, nothing could be done, till the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor be recovered.

‘In other things I speak not, for our audience with the Pope's Holiness hath been so scarce, that we thought it little enough to spend the same in your Highness principal matter. And to advertise your Highness what Counsel is here conducted, for the defence of your Majesty's cause, the same shall understand, that this court, as it hath suffered in all other things, so it is also much appeyed in learned men; and of them that be, we dare not trust every one, ne Causa Majestatis vestrae illis denudata, they should, prodere illam Adversariis, wherefore, counselling as yet only with two, the one called Dominus Michael, the other Dominus Sigismundus; we perceived nothing to be solicited openly on the other side; and that there, as yet, hath been no need to dispute openly, have communicated your Highness matter to no more. And as for that article, Quod Papa non possit dispensare, the Pope himself will hear no disputations in it; and so he might retain your Highness good mind, he seemeth not to care for himself, whether your Highness cause be decided by that article or no, so he did it not; but surely it appeareth, as a man may gather, by his fashion and manner, that he hath made his account no further to meddle in your Highness matter, neither with your Majesty, nor against the same, but follow, that shall be done by his Legates there.

‘Wherefore, if my Lord Campegius would promise your Majesty to give sentence frankly and apertly, having propitium Judice, I would trust, being there, with such consultations, as I should bring from hence, to say somewhat to this breve there, Apud illos Et ista est sacra anchora Majestatis vestrae; for from hence shall come nothing but delays, desiring your Highness not to shew this to my Lord Campegius, nor my Lord's Grace.

‘Mr Gregory sendeth presently unto your Highness, the promise made by the Pope's Holiness, concerning your Highness cause, at such time as I went to Venice, for his cause, which promise in the first three words, viz Cum nos justitiam ejus causæ perpendentes, &c. doth make as much, and more, for the maintenance of that, shall be done in your Highness cause; then if the commission decretal, being in Cardinal Campegius's hands, should be shewed, and this your Highness, at your liberty, to shew to whom of your Council, it shall please your Grace, thinking, in my poor opinion, that it were not the best, therefore, to move the Pope in that matter again, in this adverse time. I most humbly desire your Majesty, that I may be a suitor to the same, for the said Mr Gregory, so as by your gracious commandment, payment may be made there, to his factors, of such diets as your Highness alloweth him; for omitting to speak of his true, faithful, and diligent service, which I have heretofore, and do now perceive in him here, I assure your Highness, he liveth here sumptuously and chargeably to your Highness honour; and in this great scarcity, must needs

his cause before the Legantine Court. Upon his return he had the Archdeaconry of Norfolk bestowed on him by Bishop Nyx, of Norwich, for whom he had obtained some favours from the Pope. He was installed March the first 1529 (w), and this, so far as appears, was his first preferment in the Church; but in the State his growth was quicker, for the King having constant need of his service, and not esteeming it proper to use it while he belonged to another, took him from his old Master Cardinal Wolfey, and declared him Secretary of State (x). In this situation he was considered as having a large share in the management of all affairs, and was particularly advised with by the King, when Cardinal Campegio declared that the cause was avoked to Rome, and that himself and his colleague could proceed no further (y). An accident furnished the King with the means of extricating himself out of the many difficulties into which this behaviour of the Pope's had thrown him, for which he was indebted to the shrewd advice given by Dr (afterwards Archbishop) Cranmer (z), as he was indebted for that to Dr Gardiner, who introduced him [H]; and by this, and this only, contributed to his old patron's ruin. As soon as the King saw a way open for the conclusion of his business, without the assistance of the Cardinal, he delayed no longer making himself sensible of his displeasure. Whence it arose, is variously and inconsistently related by our Historians; but, without recurring to deep and uncertain motives, we may be satisfied with this, that when Henry saw his Minister had either concurred with the Court of Rome in duping him, or was in reality duped most ungratefully and egregiously by that Court himself, he determined to trust him no longer, but to make him

' be driven to extremity, unless your Highness be a gracious Lord unto him in that behalf.'

This letter is dated the twenty-first of April, which must have been in the year 1529; but before it came to the King's hands, he had written a long dispatch to Gardiner, which is still preserved. The orders for his return to England, were communicated to him, and to Sir Francis Bryan, in a long dispatch by Cardinal Wolfey, who tells the former, what has been hinted in the text, that his presence was absolutely necessary at home, the King being unwilling to commence his suit before the two Cardinal Legates, without having his advice; and therefore, there is reason to believe, that he left Italy some time in the month of May, or it may be in the latter end of April (21). He was succeeded by Dr Bennet, who was also a creature of the Cardinal's, and who was particularly charged to spare no pains, in moving the compassion of the Pope, by shewing him plainly, that the welfare or ruin of the Cardinal of York, depended upon the success, or want of success, in the King's suit for a divorce (22).

[H] Who introduced him. There are some writers, who ascribe the introduction of Cranmer to the King's knowledge, to Fox entirely; and whoever was inclined to flatter Gardiner's memory, would suffer this to pass; for certainly, the manner in which he introduced him, was very unworthy; Bishop Burnet, after John Fox and others, relates it thus (23). 'Dr Cranmer, being forced to fly out of Cambridge, from a plague that was there, and having the sons of one Mr Cressly, of Waltham Crof, committed to his charge, he went, with his pupils, to their father's house at Waltham. There he was, when the King returned from his progress, who took Waltham in his way, and lay a night there. The harbingers having appointed Gardiner and Fox, the King's Secretary and Almoner, to lie at Mr Cressly's house, it so happened, that Cranmer was with them at supper. The whole discourse of England being then about the divorce, these two courtiers, knowing Cranmer's learning and solid judgment, entertained him with it, and desired to hear his opinion concerning it. He modestly declined it, but told them, that he judged it would be a shorter and safer way, once to clear it well, if the marriage was unlawful in itself, by virtue of any divine precept: for if that were proved, then it was certain that the Pope's dispensation could be of no force, to make that lawful, which God had declared to be unlawful. Therefore, he thought that, instead of a long fruitless negotiation at Rome, it were better to consult all the learned men, and the universities of Christendom; for if they once declared it in the King's favour, then the Pope must needs give judgment, or otherwise, the Bull, being of itself null and void, the marriage would be found sinful, notwithstanding the Pope's dispensation. This seemed a very good motion, which they resolved to offer to the King; so next night, when he came to Greenwich, they proposed it to him, but with this ' difference, that Gardiner had a mind to make it pass for their own contrivance, but Fox, who was of a more ingenuous nature, told the King from whom they had it. He was much affected with it, so soon as he heard it, and said, had he known it sooner, it would have saved him a vast expence, and much trouble, and would needs have Cranmer sent for to Court, saying, in his coarse way of speaking, That he had the saw by the right ear. So he was sent for to Court, and being brought before the King, he carried himself so, that the King conceived an high opinion of his judgment and candour, which he preserved to his death, and still payed a respect to him, beyond all the other churchmen that were about him; and though he made more use of Gardiner in his business, whom he found a man of great dexterity and cunning, yet he never had any respect for him. But for Cranmer, though the King knew that in many things he differed from him, yet for all his being so impatient of contradiction, he always revered him.'

This last observation of the Bishop's, is, perhaps, a little too refined, since it was impossible to know what were the real sentiments of King Henry, farther than they are discovered to us by facts; and these speak pretty equally in favour of Cranmer and Gardiner. They were both countenanced, employed, and preferred, and both were sometimes checked and frowned upon by their master; he had this in his temper, which no body better understood than Gardiner, as we shall see hereafter. They were both guilty of inexcusable compliances, to preserve their credit with that haughty and hally Prince, which Cranmer did to the last; and how Gardiner came to lose it we shall enquire. At present, it may be convenient to give some account of what is asserted in the text, that the bringing Cranmer to the King, proved Wolfey's ruin, as to which, it must be confessed, that our histories are silent, but it appears thus. All the world expected his disgrace, upon the avocation of the King's suit to Rome, which, however, did not happen; and Bishop Burnet very well observes, that the Cardinal himself began to be cured of his apprehensions, when he saw that the King's countenance was not altered towards him; and that those who were most familiar with that Monarch, preserved their respect to him. But when, to use the King's coarse expression, he had once got the saw by the right ear, he no longer temporized with the Cardinal, but ordered his Attorney-General, Christopher Hales, to file an information against him in Michaelmas-term; sent for the Great Seal, and ordered him to retire to his house at Ather, which belonged to his Bishoprick of Winchester. It is therefore plain, from a comparison of dates, and of facts, that the King's receiving and embracing Cranmer's counsels, was the true source of the Cardinal's disgrace, the King being then persuaded, that he had no farther need of him.

him in some measure the victim that might satiate popular resentment, and stifle those clamours raised amongst his subjects in different parts of the kingdom (a). This tempest broke with such fury on the head of this devoted Minister, that his misery became as much the subject of amazement, as his prosperity had ever been. In this distress he had recourse to his old servant the Secretary, and, though some have insinuated the contrary, he met with as sincere returns of gratitude and friendship, as he could desire or expect [1]. The year

[1] As he could desire or expect. There is a great deal to be met with in secret history, in relation to the fall of Cardinal Wolsey, as well as of the strange calamities into which he fell; and his misfortunes are, by many, attributed to the resentment of Mrs Anne Boleyn, which, however, there is some cause to doubt. Great Ministers have always bitter enemies, who earnestly wish, and would willingly work, their destruction; but it does not follow from thence, that they accomplish what they have wished and worked for, even when it falls out; for it may and often does happen, from other secret causes, in respect to which, they have no power, and of which, sometimes, they have not the least knowledge. It has been shewn, in the former note, that the King thought he had no farther need of this Minister; and whoever looks closely into the history of Henry the Eighth, will perceive that it was his ruling maxim, to promote men whom he might use, to protect them while he could use, and to give them up when they were of no further use. He was not entirely satisfied, that the destruction of Wolsey's person could promote his designs, and therefore he spared him; and as he saw further, that the fall of his Minister, would be considered as a point of importance in other kingdoms, as well as his own; he was willing to see how far the Cardinal's interest reached, and whether the Court of Rome, for which he had done so much, might not be inclined to do something for him; and this induced the King to take so much care of his life, when, through the agitation of his spirits, he fell into a dangerous illness at Asher (24).

(24) He sent his own Physician, Dr Putts, to attend him, and by him sent kind messages and presents.

It is very rare in such cases, for Ministers to find friends, more especially amongst those, who, in point of fortune, depend upon the master with whom they are in disgrace. Thomas Cromwell, then Secretary to the Cardinal, distinguished himself by adhering steadily to his master, and soliciting stoutly for him at Court; in respect to this, all our histories agree, and commend him for it, as he deserved. But they do not tell us, to whom he applied himself at Court, though at that time, he was not of a rank to have any admittance to the King, though his conduct, in this respect, recommended him afterwards to his favour, as a man of abilities, spirit, and fidelity. Dr Gardiner was then Secretary of State, in the King's Council, and one of his most active Ministers. To say nothing of his having been bred and raised by Cardinal Wolsey, the then state of affairs, and the situation of that once great man, were points that must have fallen under his notice; and whoever had an inclination to look into his history, must necessarily be curious to know how he acted in so delicate a conjuncture; and whether ambition, and self-interest, so much took up his heart, as to leave no room for gratitude or pity. It might have been surmised, that considering his former condition, and his station at this time, that he was the person to whom Cromwell had recourse, in favour of his unfortunate master, that he solicited his suits, and procured him those gleams of royal clemency and compassion, that broke through all the obscurity of his misfortunes, to a degree, that revived the envy and the malice of his enemies. But the silence of our greatest Historians, and the character commonly given to Stephen Gardiner, would have prevented any conjecture of this kind, from gaining the least degree of belief. However, the indefatigable Strype (25), who had no talent for inventing or interpolating history, and who very honestly communicated to the public all he knew, has effectually settled this matter; and the reader will be pleased to see a part of his evidence in his own words, founded not upon obscure hints, or upon memoirs of uncertain authority; but upon Cardinal Wolsey's own letters; and facts, that will admit no dispute.

(25) Memorials,
Vol. I. p. 114.

In the mean time, he employed those few friends he had, to intercede with the King, and to make as good a conclusion of his troubles as they could. He had two that stuck close to him, viz. the aforesaid Thomas Cromwell, and Dr Stephen Gardiner, Secretary of State. This latter he plied with his letters, the bearer whereof was Cromwell, whom he called his trusty friend. After he had got free of the articles drawn up against him in Parliament, by the means of Cromwell, the King appointed, to come to some conclusion of the Cardinal's business, and to determine what was to be done concerning him. This Secretary Gardiner signified to him in writing, and likewise the time when he supposed it might be, namely, within a week, or thereabouts: and likewise told him, that he would not fail to write to him the particulars. The Cardinal impatient to know the issue, and not thinking the Secretary swift enough in his information, above a week being now past, could take no rest till he heard from him the sum of what had past concerning him. And therefore in a letter sent by Cromwell, most earnestly begs the Secretary in much meanness of spirit, As he tendered his poor life, and at the reverence of God, and that holy time, he would send him his letter, appealing also to his pity, knowing in what an agony he was, and that he would not only deserve towards God, but bind him thereby to be his continual headsmen. And so ended from Asher. Written, those are his words, with his rude hand and sorrowful heart. Subscribing himself T. Carli's Ebor. miserrimus, The most miserable Thomas, Cardinal of York. This was written in Christmas holidays.

Soon after Cromwell returned from the Secretary with this message to the Cardinal. That the King moved with pity of the Cardinal, and commiserating his lamentable condition, prest with extreme poverty as well as sickness of body and mind, had committed the ending of his troubles to the Secretary, and some others of the Privy Council, and that to be done with all the haste that might be. And that he should have a pardon drawn up in the most full and ample form, that his own Counsel could devise. Upon this message he soon dispatched a letter to the Secretary, importing, that this favourable order of the King, he was more sensible of and thankful for, because it proceeded from himself, out of a gracious remembrance of him: for which he accounted himself most bounden, to serve and pray for the preservation of his most royal Majesty: thanking God, that he, the Secretary, had occasion given him to be a solicitor and setter forth of such things, as should conserve his end. That in the making and compounding whereof, his assured trust was, that he would shew the love and affection which he bore towards him. He earnestly intreated him, to whom he, the Cardinal, had been an old lover and friend, that he would so declare himself in the managing of his business, that the world might perceive that by his good means, the King was the better good Lord unto him; and that now coming newly in a manner into the world, there might such respect be had unto his degree, old age, and long service, as might be to the King's honour, and the Secretary's praise; which would, as he said, undoubtedly follow, if he obtained his benevolence towards him. And men would perceive, that it was by his wisdom and dexterity, that he was relieved and holpen in his calamity. At the reverence therefore of God, he prayed him that was his refuge, to set to his hand, that he might come to a laudable end and repose. And that he would see that he might be furnished after such a sort, that he might end his short time and life to the honour of Christ's Church and his Prince. Promising withal to requite his kindness in such a manner, as he should have cause to think his pains to be well employed. And so referring him to his trusty friend Cromwell, to whom he desired him to give firm credence, he concluded, at Asher with the trembling hand and heavy heart, of his assured lover year ensuing opened with the most important service, at least as his Master conceived it, that had been as yet rendered him by Dr Gardiner, and which nevertheless does more honour to his abilities than his virtue; and this was to manage the University of Cambridge, so as to procure their declaration in the King's cause, after Dr Cranmer's book should appear in support of it (b). This, in conjunction with Dr Fox, he accomplished, tho' not without much artifice and address, as his own letter shews [K], which sufficiently demonstrates that men, and even great bodies of men, have been much the same in all ages.

(b) Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 5, 6.

After

and breadstman — Soon after, viz. February the twelfth, the King sealed his pardon, and three days after restored him the Archbishoprick of York, and sent him money, upwards of six thousands pounds, besides plate, and furniture for his house and chapel. Which favours pretty well recovered the Cardinal, while he remained still at Ather, and by the King's leave removed thence to Richmond.

But his enemies now thought him too near the Court: so they prevailed to get him removed to his Diocefe of York. In the month of September Anno 1530, he came to Cawood-castle near York, so the Lord Herbert (26); but before he came hither, I find him in the months of July and August at Southwell (27), a manor of the Archbishop's, where he made some stay. Here the Cardinal recommended unto the Secretary, one who had the title of Provost of Beverley, the Governor of a religious house, situated in his Diocefe. His state, it seems, was in some hazard. Whereupon the Cardinal espousing his cause, and probably to make himself popular upon his first coming into his Diocefe, desired the Secretary that he would use his interest for him to the King, and bring him into his presence. This the Secretary did accordingly, receiving the Provost as coming from the Cardinal, humanely and lovingly, and introducing him into the King's Highness presence. Whom the King received, and shewed him, that he was his good and gracious Lord, and admitted and accepted him as his Orator and Scholar. For this the Cardinal from Southwell thanks him much, intreating him to continue his good favour towards the said Provost, and to take him into his patronage and protection. The Cardinal now found a great change in his revenues and incomes, which were sinking very low, in comparison of what they had been. So that he laboured under want. This made him write in the month of July to his friend the Secretary, to take the opportunity to excite the King to some liberality towards him That he would remember the poor state and condition he stood in, and to be a means to the King's Highness for his relief; whereby he would not only as he said, deserve thanks of God, but also declare to his perpetual laud and praise, that he being in authority, had not forgotten his old master and friend. This is all the language of those times and of those letters, much more to the same purpose the reader may find in the same place; but this being enough to our point, we shall not detain him any longer.

[K] As his own letter shews. We are told by the Lord Herbert of Cherbury (28), who had read this letter, and had a very just notion of the business, and of the means by which it was carried, what the reasons were, that occasioned the King more trouble in obtaining the declarations of his own Universities in his favour, than of many others in foreign parts, and more especially of the difficulties that were met with at Cambridge. He says, that there were two parties in the University, that united together in opposing the King's desire; that is, those who were really against the divorce, as a thing they apprehended to be unjust; and those, who, independent of that motive, were zealous for the Popish religion, and disliked whatever had a tendency to promote the Reformation, or, as it was styled in those times, the new opinions. The reason that the latter party were so much alarmed, was, because they saw those they opposed, with Cranmer at their head, eager for this declaration; and the strength these united parties had in the University, being well known to Cranmer, we need not at all wonder, that the King was so uneasy about it; or that he considered the service in procuring it, even in the manner it was procured, as a thing of the greatest consequence. Let us now come to the letter (29), which will shew, that the King had intrusted his concerns in the hands of very capable agents.

February 1530,

from Cambridge.

To the King's Highness.

PLEASETH it your Highness to be advertised, that arriving here at Cambridge upon Saturday last past at noon, that same night and Sunday in the morning, we devised with the Vice-Chancellor, and such other as favoureth your Grace's cause, how, and in what sort to compass and obtain your Grace's purpose and intent, wherein we assure your Grace, we found much towardness, good-will, and diligence in the Vice-Chancellor, and Dr Edmunds; being as studious to serve your Grace as we could wish or desire: nevertheless, there was not so much care, labour, study, and diligence employed on our party by them, ourself, and other, for attaining your Grace's purpose, but there was as much done by others, for the let and impeachment of the same; and as we assembled, they assembled; as we made friends, they made friends, to let that nothing should pass as in the University's name, wherein the first day they were superiors; for they had put in the ears of them, by whose voices such things do pass multas fabulas, too tedious to write unto your Grace.

Upon Sunday at afternoon were assembled, after the manner of the University, all the Doctors, Bachelors of Divinity, and Masters of Art, being in number almost two hundred: in that congregation we delivered your Grace's letters, which were read openly by the Vice-Chancellor. And for answer to be made unto them first, the Vice-Chancellor calling apart the Doctors, asked their advice and opinion; whereunto they answered severally as their affections led them, & res erat in multa confusione.

Tandem they were content. Answer should be made to the questions by indifferent men: but then they came to exceptions against the Abbot of St Benet's, who seemed to come for that purpose; and likewise against Dr Reppes and Dr Crome, and also generally against all such as had allowed Dr Cranmer's book; inasmuch as they had already declared their opinion; we said thereunto, that by that reason they might except against all; for it was lightly, that in a question so notable as this is, every man learned hath said to his friend, as he thinketh in it for the time, but we ought not to judge of any man, that lieth more to defend that which he hath once said, than truth afterward known. Finally; The Vice-Chancellor, because the day was much spent in those altercations, commanding every man to resort to his seat apart, as the manner is in those assemblies, willed every man's mind to be known secretly, whether they would be content with such an order, as he had conceived for answer, to be made by the University to your Grace's letters, wherunto that night they would in no wise agree. And forasmuch as it was then dark night, the Vice-Chancellor continued the congregation till the next day at one of the clock; at which time the Vice-Chancellor proponed a grace, after the form herein inclosed, and it was first denied: when it was asked again, it was even on both parties, to be denied or granted; and at the last, by labour of friends, to cause some to depart the house, which were against it, it was obtained in such form, as the schedule herein inclosed purporteth, wherein be two points which we would have left out; but considering, by putting in of them, we allured many, and that indeed they shall not hurt the determination for your Grace's part, we were finally content therewith.

The one point is that where it was first, that quicquid major pars, of them that be named, decreverit, should be taken for the determination of the University. Now it referred, ad duas partes, wherein we suppose shall be no difficulty. The other point is, that your Grace's question shall be openly disputed, which

After this great exploit, as it was then thought, his ascent in the Church was marvellously quickened. In the spring of the year 1531, he was installed Archdeacon of Leicester (c), resigning that of Norfolk, which he held before; and, towards the close of the month of September ensuing, he also resigned that in favour of his coadjutor Dr Edward Fox, who became afterwards Bishop of Hereford (d). In the month of October he was incorporated at the University of Oxford (e), and November the twenty-seventh 1531, he was consecrated Bishop of Winchester (f), contrary to what many writers assert, that he was not promoted to this See till about three years after (g). On the fifth of December following, the temporalities were restored (h), which is a sufficient proof that the former is the right date. Dr Gardiner, it seems, was not apprised of the King's intentions, who would sometimes rate him soundly, and at the instant he bestowed it put him in mind of it. I have, said he, often squar'd with you, Gardiner (a word he used for those kind of rebukes), but I love you never the worse, as the Bishoprick I give will convince you (i). He sat with Dr Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, when that prelate pronounced the sentence of divorce against Queen Katherine, or rather declared her marriage with the King null and void, May the twenty-third 1533 (k). The same year he was sent over to Marseilles, that he might have an eye to the interview between the French King and the Pope, from whence his master suspected some detriment might spring; and there he intimated the appeal of Henry VIII. to a General Council, in case the Pope should pretend to proceed in his cause (l); and he did the like on the behalf of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who made a particular application to him for that purpose [L]. Upon his return to England, he

' which we think to be very honourable; and it is agreed amongst us, that in that disputation, shall answer the Abbot of St Benet's, Dr Reppes, and I, Mr Fox, to all such as will object any thing, or reason against the conclusion to be sustained for your Grace's part. And because Mr Doctor Clys hath said, that he hath somewhat to say concerning the Canon Law, I, your Secretary, shall be adjoined unto them for answer to be made therein.

' In the schedule, which we send unto your Grace herewith, containing the names of those who shall determine your Grace's question, all marked with the letter (A), be already of your Grace's opinion, by which we trust, and with other good means, to induce and obtain a great part of the rest. Thus we beseech Almighty God to preserve your most noble and royal estate.

Your Highness may perceive, by the notes, that we be already sure of as many as be requisite, wanting only three; and we have good hope of four, of which four if we get two, and obtain of another to be absent, it is sufficient for our purpose.

[L] To him for that purpose. We have this passage, together with the Archbishop's letter, from an unexceptionable author, who, having mentioned this interview, proceeds thus (30), 'Gardiner, Bishop of Winton, about this time, and upon this occasion, was sent Ambassador to the French King, and Bonner soon after followed him to Marseilles, where Gardiner, at the interview between the French King and the Pope, now was. For the King, and the Council, apprehended some mischief to be hatching against the kingdom by the Pope, who was now inciting the Emperor, and other Princes, to make war upon us. And indeed he had vaunted, as the Lord Herbert declares, that he would set all Christendom against the King. And the Emperor, in discourse, had averred, that, by the means of Scotland, he would avenge his aunt's quarrel. The Archbishop, in this juncture, had secret intimation of a desire to excommunicate him, and interdict his Church. Whereupon, as the King, by Bonner, November the seventh, had made his appeal from the Pope to the next General Council, lawfully called, so by the King and Council's advice the Archbishop soon after did the same: sending his appeal with his proxy, under his seal, to Bonner, desiring him, together with Gardiner, to consult together, and to intimate his appeal in the best manner they could think expedient for him. And this letter he wrote by the King's own commandment. It was not the hand of the Archbishop, nor of his Secretary. So I suppose it was drawn up by some of his own lawyers, and is as followeth.

In my right hearty manner I commend me to you. So it is, as you know right well, I stand in dread, least our Holy Father, the Pope, do intend to make some manner of prejudicial process against me and my Church. And therefore, having probable conjectures thereof, I have appealed from his Holiness to the General Council, accordingly as his Highness, and his Council, have advised me was called upon, as other Bishops were, not only to acknowledge and yield obedience to the King as Supreme Head of the Church, but to defend it; which he did, and this defence, or court sermon, he published; and this is that celebrated piece of his, intituled, Of true Obedience. His pen was made use of upon other occasions, and never declined vindicating the King's proceedings in the business of the divorce, the subsequent marriage, or throwing off the dominion of the See of Rome, which writings of his then acquired him the highest reputation (m). In the next year 1535, he had some dispute with Archbishop Cranmer, on account of his visiting his diocese; upon which occasion there appeared a good deal of heat on both sides (n). When he went over again to France, to resume his embassy, he had the ill luck to differ with another Archbishop of Canterbury, as he afterwards became, Dr Reginald Pole, then Dean of Exeter, whom, as King Henry's bitterest enemy, he prevailed on the French King to remove out of his dominions, whence those distastes grew which afterwards became publick (o). While he was thus employed, Cromwell demanded his opinion about a religious league with the Princes of Germany; which, on that bottom, he dissuaded, and advised making an alliance grounded on political motives, and strengthened by subsidies, which he thought would last longer, and answer the King's ends better (p). In 1538, he was sent Ambassador, with Sir Henry Knevit, to the German Diet, where he is allowed to have acquitted himself well in regard to his commission; but either fell into some suspicion, or was in danger of having something fastened on him, in respect to his secret correspondence with the Pope, which at that juncture might have been his ruin (q) [M]. His being so often, and so much, absent from the Court, as it gave him a great knowledge of foreign affairs, so it kept him from having any hand in several transactions which did no great honour to that reign, such as the divorce and death of Queen Anne Bolleyn, the prosecution of Sir Thomas More, and bringing Bishop Fisher to the block: It is however asserted, that tho' he was clear of these, yet he instigated other severities, and was the principal author of all the cruelties committed upon Hereticks, as they were then called; which, being a matter of great consequence, the reader may expect should be more clearly discussed. The only way of doing this, will be to consider a few of those sanguinary proceedings, in which he is said to have had the chief hand; for this will shew us what credit is due to the general suggestion, that persecution was the great object of his counsels. Amongst these, the first that occurs is the case of Lambert (r), who was burnt for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament, and which is commonly attributed to the virulent spirit of the Bishop of Winchester, and with what reason the reader will discover in the notes [N]. The statute, commonly called the Six Articles, and which it must

Which my appeal, and procuracie, under my seal, I do send unto you, herewith desiring you right-heartily to have me commended to my Lord of Winchester, and, with his advice and counsel, to intimate the said provocation, after the best manner that his Lordship and you shall think most expedient for me. I am the bolder thus to write unto you, because the King's Highness commandeth me thus to do, as you shall, I trust further, perceive by his Grace's letter: nothing doubting in your goodness, but, at this mine own desire, you will be contented to take this pains, though his Highness shall perchance forget to write unto you therein. Which your pains and kindness, if it shall lie in me in time to come to recompence, I wol not forget it with God's grace. Who preserve you, as well as myself. From Lambeth the twenty-seventh day of November.*

THOMAS Cantuar.

[M] Might have been his ruin.] We have this story thus told by Mr Strype (31). 'About the year 1538, a Diet was held at Ratibone, whither King Henry sent Bishop Gardiner and Sir Henry Knevit, his joint Ambassadors: where also was Contarini, a Legate from the Pope. This Legate brought letters from the Pope to Winchester, and, going away suddenly, desired an Italian Merchant, named Lodovico, to go to Winchester, and to hasten his answer to the Pope's packet, for that the carrier was ready to depart in a day or two. This Lodovico soon after meeting one Wolf, Steward to Sir Henry Knevit, prayed him that he would tell the English Ambassador what the Legate desired. Wolf told him there were two Ambassadors, and asked him which. He said he knew not that: but he said it was a Bishop, whom he stiled Reverendissimo. This, Wolf discovered to Mr Chaloner, Sir Henry Knevit's Secretary. And him Wolf carried to Lodovico, that there might be another witness besides himself; and then pumped him so in Chaloner's company, that he again spake of it. This whole matter was fully related by these two persons to Knevit. And he sent secret notice of it to the King. The King thought fit, at that time, to put it up; and sent word to Knevit and the Bishop, who had words together about this, that they should both unite and mind his business.'

This was Sir Henry Knevit's explanation of the matter; but the Bishop of Winchester gave it quite another turn, he said that there was poison in his dish, which he explained by suggesting that Lodovico was suborned to set this story on foot, of which he complained to the Emperor, and the man was imprisoned. All our Histories of Henry VIII, forbid us to believe that he would wink at a minister's betraying him; it is much more probable, that he understood the thing thoroughly, and advised his ministers wisely to make use of the keennes of their wits in the discharge of their duty, and not to the prejudice of each other. But tho' this tale was harmless in one reign, it proved hurtful in another; one who owed his bread and being to the Bishop, and who came to the knowledge of it by being his Secretary, gave it in evidence when the Protector first picked, and those who came after maintained, a quarrel with the Bishop of Winchester, in the time of Edward VI (32); and this has very unaccountably helped it to credit ever since, tho' surely suspicions slighted by King Henry deserve none; had there been any thing in it, he would not have been afterwards employed in affairs of the greatest importance, both foreign and domestick.

[N] In the notes.] It is allowed on all hands, that the case of this unfortunate person, was, in all respects, the most extraordinary that happened throughout this reign, in which there were so many, and such strange, prosecutions. Let us hear the account that Bishop Burnet gives of it (33). 'One John Nicholson, alias Lambert, was then questioned by the Archbishop of Canterbury. He had been Minister of the English company at Antwerp, where, being acquainted with Tindal and Frith, he improved that knowledge of Religion which was first infused in him by Bilney: but Chancellor More ordered the Merchants to dis-must be owned was the law on which many were put to death, is attributed to his contrivance, and said to have been passed by his influence, having been warmly opposed, both by the Archbishop, and the Vicegerent Cromwell (s); but those who alledge he had no credit with the King, and was little beloved by the people, cannot expect an implicate faith to attend such an assertion. That he was principally concerned in drawing it, and that he was very earnest in promoting it in the House of Lords, in conjunction with the Duke of Norfolk, and other Lords Spiritual and Temporal, those must have but little knowledge in English History who will attempt to deny. It was not long after this, that Robert Barnes (t) fell under persecution, and, in the issue, was condemned to be burnt; who, because ‘ mis him; so he came over to England, and was ‘ taken by some of Archbishop Warham’s officers, and ‘ many articles were objected to him. But Warham ‘ died soon after, and the change of Councils that fol‘ lowed, occasioned his liberty. So he kept a school

‘ at London, and hearing Dr Taylor afterwards preach
‘ of the presence of Christ in the Sacrament, he came ‘ to him upon it, and offered his reasons why he could ‘ not believe the doctrine he had preached: which he ‘ put in writing, digesting them into ten arguments.
‘ Taylor shewed this to Dr Barnes, who, as he was ‘ bred among the Lutherans, so had not only brought ‘ over their opinions, but their temper with him: he ‘ thought that nothing would more obstruct the pro‘ gress of the Reformation, than the venting that doc‘ trine in England. Therefore Taylor and he carried ‘ the paper to Cranmer, who was at that time also of ‘ Luther’s opinion, which he had drunk in from his ‘ friend Osiander. Latimer was of the same belief.
‘ So Lambert was brought before them, and they stu‘ died to make him retract his paper: but all was in ‘ vain, for Lambert, by a fatal resolution, appealed to ‘ the King. This Gardiner laid hold on, and persuaded
‘ the King to proceed solemnly and severely in it.
‘ The King was soon prevailed with, and both interest
‘ and vanity concurred to make him improve this op‘ portunity for shewing his zeal and learning. So let‘ ters were written to many of the Nobility and Bishops ‘ to come and see this trial, in which the King intend‘ ed to sit in person, and to manage some part of the ‘ argument. In November, on the day that was pre‘ fixed, there was a great appearance in Westminster-‘ Hall, of the Bishops and Clergy, the Nobility, Judges, ‘ and the King’s Council, with an incredible number of ‘ spectators. The King’s guards were all in white, and ‘ so was the cloth of state.’

All this is taken upon the credit of Fox, who likewise informs us, that, as Lambert had advanced ten (34) arguments in defence of his opinion, the King resolved that these should be answered by ten Bishops, appointing Cranmer to solve the first of Lambert’s objections, which was, The impossibility of Christ’s body being in two places; and Fox makes it a great crime in the Bishop of Winchester, that he interposed to assist Cranmer in the debate; however, the King himself had the greatest share in the triumph, for he so affrighted the poor man with the sternness of his looks, and the roughness of his language, that, at length, wearied out with the debate, he said, he would submit himself to the King’s clemency; upon which Henry ordered the Lord Cromwell, as his Vicegerent, to read the sentence by which this tragedy was ended, Lambert being appointed to die on the ninth of October 1538. Fox says, that, in the morning before he suffered, he was carried to the Lord Cromwell’s house, who most humbly asked him forgiveness.

Another writer, no way inclined to favour Popery or Bishop Gardiner, gives quite another turn to this whole affair, for he represents it thus (35). ‘ John Lambert, ‘ alias Nicholson, bred in Cambridge, had lately been ‘ much persecuted by Archbishop Warham, about some ‘ opinions he held against the corporal presence in the ‘ Sacrament. And now being fallen into fresh troubles ‘ on the same account, to make the quicker work (fol‘ lowing the precedent of St Paul appealing to Cæsar)
‘ he appeals to the King. Who having lately taken ‘ upon him the title of the Supreme Head of the Church ‘ of England, would shew that head had a tongue could ‘ speak in matters of Divinity. In Whitehall the place ‘ and day is appointed where an Act Royal was kept,
‘ the King himself being the Apponent and Lambert the ‘ Answerer; and where his Highness was worsted or

‘ wearied, Archbishop Cranmer supplied his place, ar‘ guing, tho’ civilly, shrewdly against the truth and ‘ his own private judgment. Was not this worse than ‘ keeping the cloaths of those who killed St Stephen, ‘ seeing this Archbishop did actually cast stones at this ‘ Martyr, in the arguments he urged against him? Nor ‘ will it excuse Cranmer’s cowardice and dissimulation,
‘ to accuse Gardiner’s craft and cruelty, who privily
‘ put the Archbishop on this odious act; such Christian ‘ courage being justly expected from a person of his ‘ parts and place, as not to be acted by another con‘ trary to his own conscience. I see not, therefore,
‘ what can be said in Cranmer’s behalf; save only, that ‘ I verily hope, and stedfastly believe, that he craved ‘ God’s pardon for this particular offence, and obtain‘ ed the same on his unfeigned repentance. And be‘ cause that mens faults are commonly seen in the glass
‘ of their punishment, it is observable, that as Lambert
‘ now was burnt for denying the corporal presence, so ‘ Cranmer now, his opponent, was afterwards con‘ demned, and died at Oxford for maintaining the ‘ same opinion; which valour, if sooner shewn, his ‘ conscience had probably been more clear with-
‘ in him, and his credit without him, to all poste‘ rity.’

Here the charge, with respect to Gardiner, is entirely changed; for he is accused not of giving ill counsel to the King, but of making a tool of the Archbishop; quite contrary to the relation of Fox, and very unlikely to be true, since they were not friends. But this imputation is nothing in comparison of the load laid upon the Archbishop, and this too without any cause; for, as Mr Strype has very clearly shewn in the life of that prelate (36), he sincerely believed the real presence at that time, and did not change his opinion till about the close of King Henry’s reign, or a little after.

It would take up too much room to produce Strype’s account of this matter, who has preserved the original argument of the Bishop of Chichester against Lambert; from whence it appears, that Fox is mistaken in many particulars, for instead of ten there were but eight arguments advanced by Lambert, and of these the first was answered by the King, so that there were but seven left to the Bishops. Upon the whole we may see, that Ecclesiastical Historians, of all others, are to be read with great caution, as being too much addicted to suffer their own conjectures to supply the want of materials, and this sometimes at the expence of the highest characters; as of Cranmer’s, by Fuller, for want of considering duly the progress made by that great prelate, in detaching himself by reasoning and reading, from the errors in which he was bred. Yet, in the main, Dr Fuller seems to be in the right as to the true motive of this transaction, which was the King’s vain affectation of displaying his authority as Supreme Head of the Church, to which Cromwell, Cranmer, Gardiner, perhaps all, more or less unwillingly, were obliged to bow.
At least it is apparent, that the Bishop of Winchester had no hand in the seizing, or examining, this man; on the contrary, he was brought before Cranmer, and, by his appeal from him to the King as Supreme Head of the Church, he made that method of proceeding necessary; the advising of which, Bishop Burnet, from Fox, imputes to Gardiner, whose guilt, in this business, seems to have been no greater than that of the rest; and yet leaves it great enough too, since it was extremely hard to proceed in a matter of such exceeding difficulty, with such celerity and severity, in those more especially who contended themselves for the right of a free inquiry, which this method was plainly calculated to destroy.

because he shewed particular spleen against Bishop Gardiner, and was first committed to prison for want of respect to him in a sermon, he is surmised to have been the author of all his sufferings, and the person by whose power that unfortunate Friar was at length brought to the stake, which is mentioned as a second instance of his good will to persecution [O]. There is no doubt, that, in the course of this reign, the Bishop of Winchester must have done many things against his inclination, and several against his conscience. He was obliged to take a share in the divorce of Anne of Cleves, which was none of the most honourable; and he was likewise obliged to bear a part in that of Queen Katherine Howard, which, considering his attachment to that most noble family, could be no very pleasing employment (u). But in these, and other compliances, he had many companions, and the excuses made for them by some great pens, may serve for him; or the reader will pass sentence as he pleases, since we have no intention to disguise faults, but to disclose truths. Upon the death of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, he was elected Chancellor of the University of Cambridge 1540, which preferment was very acceptable to him (w). He still preserved his Mastership of Trinity-Hall; and it was well he did preserve it, since,

[O] Of his good will to persecution.] There was certainly a very strange spirit prevailing at this time among all ranks of people, and this was a bitterness against each other, in respect to religious opinions, which led them to be busy in persecuting others, at the very time that themselves were flying in the face of those doctrines which had the sanction of the law on their side. In this state of things, it was impossible for those who held high stations in the Church, to avoid odium, because the very people who complained of persecution, when they felt it, complained as loudly of indulgence, whenever it was extended to others. These are plain and natural observations founded on facts, and which nothing can more fully prove, than the story now before us. ' This Barnes, says my author, had formerly been in trouble, upon the score of his preaching and opinion. During Wolsey's Ministry, he had reflected in a sermon at Cambridge, upon the Cardinal's port and equipage (37). The Cardinal told him, this state and magnificence could not well be dispensed with by a person in his station; that it was necessary to support his character, and the reputation of the government. Barnes not reaching this reason, was unwilling to retract his invective: but Gardiner, the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, being his friends, prevailed with him to give satisfaction, and abjure some opinions charged upon him. He was afterwards, in 1536, delated upon other articles, and in danger of being burnt; but counterfeiting himself lunatick, got off into Germany. Here he made an acquaintance with Luther, Melancthon, and other Divines. He was likewise known to the Duke of Saxony, and the King of Denmark. Fox, Bishop of Hereford, Ambassador at Smalcald, sent him into England, where he was kindly entertained by Cromwell. By his interest, the correspondence with the Germans was in some measure kept up. He was first employed in the business of the King's marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve. But this Lady's person proving unacceptable, was, it may be, one occasion of Barnes's disgrace. But other accidents concurred to Barnes's misfortune. This year, 1540, in Lent, Bishop Bonner appointed him, Gerrard, and Jerom, to preach at St Paul's Cross; this it seems, was done as a mark of respect, and to oblige Cromwell; but Gardiner sent Bonner word, he intended himself to preach at St Paul's Cross on Sunday. In his Sermon, he spent some strokes of satire against the new teaching: complained that the Devil had taught some people to throw off confession, fasting, and other instances of discipline and penance. About three weeks after, Barnes took the same text, but spent his discourse in maintaining the opposite doctrine. Besides this, he gave himself the liberty of making some bold indiscreet reflections upon Gardiner's person. He played upon his name, and brought a jingling comparison or two, which were short both in sense and breeding. Gerrard and Jerom preached much the same doctrine, but without falling foul upon any person. Jerom had been charged with preaching against the magistracy, but he explained himself to a very defensible and honest meaning. He affirmed, That if the laws of Princes, are consistent with those of God Almighty, we are bound to obey them; but in case the Prince is wicked, and commands a contradiction to Revealed Religion, when this happens, we are to submit and suffer, and not apply to the expedient of resistance. To return to Barnes: though Gardiner seemed to bear the affront with great temper and neglect, his friends thought it necessary to solicit for reparation. To this purpose they complained to the King of Barnes's intemperate language; how ill he had used Gardiner, who was both a great Prelate and a Privy-Counsellor. Fox reports one circumstance otherwise, and faith, Gardiner complained to the King himself. But let this be as it will, Barnes was reprimanded for his misbehaviour, and ordered to ask the Bishop of Winchester's pardon. They were likewise to argue the point of Justification. Upon this article, Barnes had maintained, That though God requires us to forgive our neighbour, as a condition of forgiveness from him, yet God must forgive us first, before we forgive our neighbour; for else, it would be sinful to forgive our neighbour: For St Paul tells us, Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. By this foreign and uncatholic construction of the text, it appears, Dr Barnes was none of the greatest Divines. The next day, Gardiner and Barnes had another conference: at the conclusion, the latter made his submission, asked the Bishop's pardon, and desired to be under his instructions. The Bishop very frankly passed over the former affront, entertained Barnes as his companion, and offered him a pension of forty pounds a year. Barnes accordingly went to the Bishop's house: but hearing the people talk to his disadvantage, and discouraging with some men of learning, he grew weary of this close correspondence, and disengaged with the Bishop. The King was displeased with Barnes's management; and ordered him, Gerrard, and Jerom, to renounce their opinions. They promised satisfaction, and made their recantation. But this, it seems, was but a force upon their judgment; for they retracted their recantation in the pulpit. Upon this, they were sent to the Tower, and attainted of heresy in Parliament. On the thirtieth of July, they were brought to Smithfield, with three others of a different persuasion, Abel, Fetherstone, and Powel. These were attainted for owning the Pope's Supremacy, and denying the King's. One of each was put upon a hurdle; the Papists were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and the other three burnt. This was an odd spectacle, and looked like fanciful severity. Infomuch, that a Frenchman who was there, being surprised at the conduct of the Government, told his friend in Latin, They had a strange way of managing in England; for those who were for the Pope, are hanged, and those against him burnt. At his death, this Barnes behaved with great courage and constancy, forgave the world in general, and the Bishop of Winchester in particular, if he had any hand in his death; which implying a doubt in him at that time, and in those circumstances, it will not be easy to find any evidence to render this matter certain to us; and therefore a famous writer (38), than whom none was more a friend to liberty, or less inclined to palliate persecution, after reading the proceedings against Barnes, which his friends took care to send into Germany, lays no blame upon Bishop Gardiner at all.

(38) Bayne, in his article of BARNES (1622 & 7).

in the next reign, this in most peoples opinion preserved the foundation. As he was elected Chancellor of the University without influence, he was very assiduous in his office, that he might conciliate the affections of it's members, and did all he could to assist them with his interest at Court, which, when he had done any great service, was very good. Certain it is, that whatever power or preferments his compliances obtained under this Monarch were dearly purchased, since they were held in continual hazard, and imbittered with violent storms of royal resentment; which, though, as this Prelate himself says, he knew how to sustain without sinking, must nevertheless be exceedingly distasteful [P]. In some conjunctures too we are satisfied they filled him with many apprehensions, and, tho' he might be dextrous in sometimes shifting off the King's ill humours, yet at others, how great or how alert soever his spirit might be, he was forced to bear slights with patience, and even submit to very

[P] Be exceedingly distasteful. Though Cromwell and Gardiner had been both bred in the same family, and both derived their preferment from the display of their abilities in Cardinal Wolsey's service; yet when Cromwell, though he came later into the King's favour, gained the ascendant, they could never agree together, which will be the less strange, when we consider, that they acted upon very different maxims; Cromwell being desirous to place his safety and prosperity in being always of the same side with the King, in which, perhaps, he followed his old master; but Gardiner, taught by the example of that master, thought it better to lean upon the law than the King; by which, if he did not make his court so well, yet certainly he carried his point better. Amongst other disputes they had, the Bishop has left us one, in a letter of his to the Duke of Somerset, which is worth the knowing, and it cannot be better told than in his own words (39). 'The Lord Cromwell had once put in the King's, our late Sovereign Lord's head, to take upon him to have his will and pleasure regarded for a law; for that he said was to be a very King; and thereupon I was called for at Hampton-Court; and as the Lord Cromwell was very stout, come on my Lord of Winchester (quoth he), for that conceit he had, whatsoever he talked with me, he knew ever as much as I, Greek or Latin, and all. Answer the King here, quoth he, but speak plainly and directly, and shrink not, man: Is not that (quoth he) that pleaseth the King, a law? have ye not the Civil Law therein? (quoth he) Quod principi placuit, and so forth, (quoth he) I have somewhat forgotten it now: I stood still, and wondered in my mind, to what conclusion this should tend; the King saw me musing, and with earnest gentleness, said, Answer him whether it be so or no? I would not answer my Lord Cromwell, but delivered myself to the King, and told him, I had read indeed of Kings that had their will always received for a law; but I told him the form of his reign, to make the laws his will, was more sure and quiet, and by this form of government ye be established, quoth I, and it is agreeable with the nature of your people: if ye begin a new manner of policy, how it will frame no man can tell; and how this frameth ye can tell, and would never advise your Grace to leave a certain, for an uncertain. The King turned his back, and left the matter after, till the Lord Cromwell turned the cat in the pan afore company, when he was angry with me, and charged me, as though I had played his part.' Some other particulars there are in the same reign, curious in themselves, and the more so, as coming from him, a person of great sagacity, and who made no vulgar observations. As they are in reality part of his personal history, and written with his own pen, we will be bold to insert them, speaking to the same great person he says in his letter. 'Whether the King may command against the Common Law, or an Act of Parliament, there is never a Judge, or other man in the realm, ought to know more by experience of that the Lawyers have said, than I. First, my Lord Cardinal had obtained his Legacy, by our late Sovereign Lord's request at Rome; yet being, it was against the laws of the realm, the Judges censured the offence of premunire, which matter I bore away, and take it for a law of the realm, because the Lawyers said so, but my reason digested it not. The Lawyers, for the confirmation of their doings, brought in a case of my Lord Typtoft, an Earl he was, and learned in Civil Laws, who being Chancellor, because in execution of the King's Commission, he offended the laws of the realm, he suffered on Tower-Hill; they brought in the examples of many Judges that had fines set on their heads in like cases, for transgression of the Laws, by the King's commandment, and this I learned in this case. Since that time being of the Council, when many proclamations were devised against the carriers out of corn; when it came to punishing the offenders, the Judges would answer, it might not be by the Laws, because the Act of Parliament gave liberty, wheat being under a price: whereupon at the last, followed the Act of Proclamations, in the passing whereof were many large words. When the Bishop of Exeter and his Chancellor, were by one body brought into a premunire; I reasoned with the Lord Audley, then Chancellor, so far as he bad me hold my peace, for fear of entering a premunire myself: but I concluded, that although I must take it as of their authority that it is Common Law, yet I could not see how a man authorized by the King, as since the King's Majesty hath taken upon him the Supremacy, every Bishop is, that man could fall in a premunire. I reasoned once in the Parliament-House, where was free speech without danger, and there the Lord Audley, Chancellor, then to satisfy me, because I was in some secret estimation as he knew, though art a good fellow, Bishop, quoth he, look the Act of the Supremacy, and there the King's doings be restrained to spiritual jurisdiction; and in another Act, no Spiritual Law shall have place contrary to a Common Law, or an Act of Parliament. And if this were not (quoth he) the Bishops would enter in with the King, and by means of his supremacy, order the Law as you listed; but we will provide (quoth he) that the premunire shall never go off your heads. This I bore away there, and held my peace.' But as there was little fair weather abroad in those days, the courtiers were not always sure of avoiding foul by their keeping at home. The Bishop himself tells us, that the King could be very angry, and would then talk very loud, very probably too his language was but coarse, since many samples there are of that sort in his history; this had a great effect upon those that were about him, and kept them ever in a state of deep humility, in which, without doubt, Gardiner differed but very little from the rest; but the King letting him into the secret, that he could look sour and talk rough without meaning much harm, he ever after bore those fallies with much less anxiety. The thing happened thus, the Earl of Wiltshire and Dr Gardiner had been joined in some affair of consequence, which had not been managed so as to give the King satisfaction, upon which he treated Gardiner, in the presence of the Earl, with such a storm of words as quite confounded him; but before they parted, the King took him into his chamber, and told him, that he was indeed very angry, yet not particularly with him, though he had used him so, because he could not take quite so much liberty with the Earl. Bishop Gardiner thenceforward could stand a royal rattling pretty well, or, to use his own words to the Duke of Somerset, He folded it up in the matter, and bore it patiently. The King had another practice, which he called whetting, and this in effect was scolding with pen and ink; the Bishop says, that when some of the courtiers saw letters to him in this stile, they looked upon him as undone, while himself was under no such apprehensions, knowing the King to be a wise Prince, and who, after thus venting his anger, would remember past services, and be more ready to do an old servant a good than an ill turn, after giving him such correction. very disagreeable supplications and expressions of deep humility, and great sense of his own failings, directly contrary to the conviction of his own conscience and understanding [Q]. In the time of King Henry, these were indispensable conditions of ministerial greatness; nor was there any such thing as enjoying court favours, without being exposed also to threats and frowns. Bishop Gardiner felt these, as Cranmer and others did alternately, living now in the sunshine, and by and by in the shade, or rather under a cloud. But, in the latter end of the King's life, the prospect grew darker than ever. In 1544, if we may rely on the credit of John Fox (x), who assures us he had what he relates from one Morrice, who was Secretary to Archbishop Cranmer, this Prelate had a very narrow escape from the greatest danger to which he was ever exposed in his whole life. He had a Secretary, and a relation, one German Gardiner, who is said to have been much in his favour, and who had distinguished himself by his conferences with John Frith the martyr, an account of which he published. This young Clergyman being suspected in the matter of the King's supremacy, a prosecution was commenced against him, and, his obstinacy being great, he was executed as a traitor March the seventh 1544. The enemies of the Bishop, and, as Fox lays, the Duke of Suffolk particularly, suggested to the King, that it was very likely, notwithstanding all he had written, that he was of his Secretary's opinion, and that, if he was once in the Tower, matter enough might be found against him; on which his Majesty consented to send him thither. But the Bishop, having intelligence of this, went immediately to the King, submitted with the utmost humility, confessed whatever his Majesty charged him with, and, to the no small disappointment of his enemies, by complying with the King's humour, and shewing the deepest concern for his real or pretended failings, obtained his full pardon. Yet, after this, we may [Q] To the conviction of his own conscience and understanding. As long as this article may seem, our great care has been to make it as short as it was possible, consistent with perspicuity, truth, and such authorities as are requisite to support the facts mentioned therein; without which it must be confessed, that there is very little credit due to the histories and memoirs of these times, which bear on all sides such visible marks of partiality and prejudice, that nothing is to be depended upon, where there is not a degree of evidence produced proportionable to the importance of what is asserted.

Mr Strype (40), who has preserved the following letter, thinks it was written about the year 1535, and he gives us this account of the occasion of it. The King, it seems, was desirous that the Clergy of all ranks should acknowledge, that all the powers they had were derived from him, as the supreme head of the Christian Church in his dominions. Against this doctrine somebody had written a book, with which the King was offended; and, as the Bishop of Winchester had both preached and written much to his satisfaction, in the support of his supremacy, he sent him this book, with orders to answer it. But, upon the perusal of it, this Bishop, whom we find often represented as one so complaisant that the King could require nothing from him which he was not ready to perform, not only declined writing such an answer as was expected, but professed himself of the same opinion with the author of that book. It is no wonder at all, that, to a Monarch of Henry's disposition, this disappointment should appear in a very bad light, or that he should testify his dislike in very strong terms. This it seems he did, and sent the Bishop of Winchester word of it by his Almoner Dr Fox, as Strype conceives. The Bishop knowing his Master's temper well, and not caring to meet the tempest of his anger by a personal apology, thought fit to write him the following letter, which is produced to shew the real sentiments of the man, and that he was not always so servile, or so willing, an instrument of the King's will, as we find him sometimes represented. In stating this fact without the letter, we must have left the reader in much uncertainty; but now having that before him, he may judge for himself, and form a true decision of the fitness, or unfitness, of this Prelate's behaviour upon so important an occasion.

Cotton Library, Cleopatra. E. 6.

MY duty remembered to your Majesty, with all lowly humility and reverend honour. For as much as letted by disease of body, I cannot personally repair to your Highness presence, having heard, of your Grace's Almoner, to my great discomfort, what opinion your Highness hath conceived of me. I am compelled, by these letters, to represent me unto the same, lamenting and wailing my chance and fortune, to have lost, beside my deserts, as much reputation in your Grace's heart, as your Highness, without my merit, hath conferred unto me, in estimation of the world. And if I comforted not myself with remembrance of your Grace's goodness, with whom Veritas semper vincit, & fortis taderet & vitæ. I know in myself, and can never forget your Grace's benefits, your Highness notable affection toward me. I know my duty and bond to your Highness. How much I desire to declare, in outward deeds, mine inward knowledge, God knoweth, and I trust your Highness shall know. But, in the mean time, for want thereof, thus I suffer, and know no remedy but your Highness goodness, to expend what I have done, what I should have done, and what I may do; and not to be discontent, though, in correcting the answer made, I believed, so great a number of learned men affirming it so precisely to be true, that was in the answer alledged concerning God's law. Especially, considering your Highness book against Luther, in mine understanding, most plainly approveth it. The book written in your Grace's cause, and translated into English, seemeth to allow it. And the Council of Constance, condemning the articles of Wycklif, manifestly decreeth it. The contrary whereof if your Grace can now prove, yet I, not learned in Divinity, ne knowing any part of your Grace's proves, an, I trust, without cause of blame in that behalf. When I know that I know not, I shall then speak thereafter. It were pity we lived, if so little expressing our love to God in our deeds, we should abuse his name and authority to your Highness displeasure, of whom we have received so many benefits. On the other part, if it be God's authority to us allotted, tho' we cannot use it condignely, yet we cannot give it away. And it is no less danger to receive than to give, as your Highness, of your high wisdom, can consider. I am, for my part, as I am bound, most desirous not only to do what may be done to your Highness contentation, but also applicable to learn the truth what ought to be done. Trusting your Majesty will finally take in good part, that I think that true for which I have so good grounds and authorities, until I hear stronger grounds and reasons to the contrary. I shall most gladly confer with any of your Grace's Council in this matter. And, in the mean time, daily pray to God for knowledge of his truth, and preservation of your Majesty in much felicity; alway most ready and desirous, to do as becometh may suppose, provoked by such usage, for, as Fox states it, one cannot avoid seeing it was a design to destroy him at any rate, he thought of refining upon this invention, and of turning their own artillery upon his adversaries. In short, he is said to have dipped very deep in a plot against Archbishop Cranmer, which was discovered and dissipated by the King, who left all his enemies to his mercy, and, amongst the rest, the Bishop of Winchester; but he forgave them (y). After this, the King opening himself to Bishop Gardiner, upon some suspicions he entertained of his last Queen Katherine Parre, as inclined to Heresy, he so far improved these jealousies as to prepare a paper of articles against her, which the King signed, and it was agreed to send her to the Tower; but Chancellor Wriothisly, who was entrusted with this paper, dropped it out of his bosom, and it was immediately carried to the Princess. She so wrought upon the King's affections, as to dispel his suspicions; and this brought severe reproaches upon the Chancellor, and the King's resentment against the Bishop grew so strong that he would never see his face afterwards (z). One has, however, some reason to wonder, that when John Bale wrote his article of Queen Katherine Parre, in which he celebrates her learning, piety, and zeal for true religion, at the time all parties were living, and when any thing against the Bishop of Winchester would have been well received, he should say nothing of this iniquitous contrivance (a). Nor is it less strange, that, when matter was sought much farther back to charge him with, this should not be remembered in the proceedings at his deprivation under the succeeding reign. We need not wonder, if, standing in this light with the King, when drawing towards his latter end, he left him out of his will, and did not appoint him one of the Counsellors to Prince Edward, as he once intended. Sanders alledges another reason for this, which was, that Gardiner, taking some favourable opportunity, persuaded the King to restore the supremacy to the Pope, either by a solemn declaration in Parliament, if there was time to call one; or by an authentick act of his own, if there was not; which would sufficiently manifest his intention. In this respect, the King, as he tells the story, soon after changed his mind; and thence proceeded his enmity to Gardiner (b). But all is pure fiction, for Bishop Gardiner himself, in a sermon before King Philip and Queen Mary, mentions some such thoughts in the King during the Northern rebellion; and, had there been a grain of truth in it, no doubt would have mentioned his inclination at this time. Besides, there actually was a Parliament then in being, which was dissolved by his death. Some other reasons were assigned for the King's excluding him in his testament, which will be mentioned at the bottom of the page [R]. Whatever usage he might meet with at any time from his master, he shewed, upon all occasions, very high respect for his memory, and ever spoke and wrote of him with much deference; and tho' Fox treats him very coarsely on that head, yet others have thought there was in it as much of prudence as of gratitude. Upon the accession of King Edward VI, Archbishop Cranmer, being earnest in imputation of forgery, grounded upon this circumstance; that though it was prepared by the King's direction, yet he delayed signing it so long, that, at length, he became unable, and then his stamp was put to it by the direction of some about him, when the King was either dying or dead. It is very certain, that, in Queen Elizabeth's time, Mr Maitland, Secretary to Mary Queen of Scots, suggested this on the behalf of his mistress, as a thing positively testified by Lord Paget, and desired that some persons of great quality, who were then living, might be examined to this point (43). This was considered, in those days, as a matter of great consequence; for if it could have been fully proved, the will must have been regarded as invalid; because, upon the testimony of one Clark, that he put the stamp to the instrument which regarded the Duke of Norfolk's attainder, that was in full Parliament declared to be void; and the statute that gave the King power to limit the succession by his will, declared expressly the form in which such a will should be executed. But however these affairs stood, they were kept as impenetrable secrets upon the King's demise, the will being then taken not only for a legal and authentick piece, but as the very foundation of the new government. All these facts came out afterwards by degrees, and in consequence of a great variety of accidents. Paget deserting his old master Winchester, attached himself to the Protector Somerset, and was examined as a witness against the Bishop, afterwards falling under the Duke of Northumberland's displeasure, for having had so large a share in the confidence of the Protector (44); he was very severely treated, and, tho' this seemed to be afterwards passed over, yet when Queen Mary came to the throne, he laid open every thing that had been done during the former reign, and this transaction about the will amongst the rest.

[R] At the bottom of the page. All that is said of the Bishop of Winchester's contriving to thrust Queen Katherine into the Tower, is taken from John Fox; nor are there any distinct marks, by which the time when this happened can be certainly known. At the time when the King went to France, in his last expedition, the Bishop of Winchester was intended to be one of his executors (41); but, after that, when the King's will came to be drawn afresh, he was left out without the privy, as it seems, of any of the Council. Sir Anthony Brown, it is said, twice moved the King to put his name again into his testament, but without effect; and the King said, if he was one, he would trouble them all, and they would never be able to rule him; it is also reported, that, when the King saw him once with some of the Privy-Counsellors, he shewed his dislike, and asked What he did there? He was answered, that the Bishop came to inform him of a benevolence granted by the Clergy; upon which the King called him immediately to deliver his message, and, having received it, went away. Yet, for all this, the Bishop himself, in one of his letters to the Protector, puts him in mind of a commission in which he was named, amongst others, in the very last year of the King's life; so that whatever the King's distaste was, it must have been sudden; and there is nothing so probable, as that his acquaintance with, and attachment to, the Norfolk family, might be the cause. The King knew this very well, and, having determined to reduce the power and authority of that family, as well as to take off the heads of it, it was a very easy and a very natural consequence of that resolution, to remove the Bishop of Winchester from being one of his executors, whom he knew to have great obligations, and a very warm friendship, for the Duke of Norfolk and his son. Bishop Burnet (42), after discussing this point, gives us to understand, that this second will laboured under a strong

in carrying on the great work of Reformation, to which he found the Protector Somerset well inclined, laboured all he could to gain the Bishop of Winchester to a concurrence, or at least to an acquiescence (c). But this wary Prelate thought, or seemed to think, that, by making too much haste, all might be spoiled; and opposed his sentiments at least; to those of the Protector, and all his Council. He suggested, that the ruling maxim in a minority was to keep things quiet, and alledged this could never be done if any signal alterations were attempted in Church or State. On this principle he dissuaded the war with Scotland, as a measure necessarily attended with much hazard and a vast expence (d). The Protector received his advice civilly, and wrote answers to his letters, still remaining, with much decency and moderation. But, notwithstanding this, things went on according to the plan laid down by the Archbishop, who formed a design of having a royal visitation by commissioners, who might see the condition of every diocese, encourage the progress of reformed religion, remove and discredit superstition, and one in each list of these Commissioners, being a Clergyman, was directed to preach sound doctrine (e). The wisdom of the Archbishop, in framing this scheme, was certainly great; and yet Winchester no sooner had intelligence of it, than he set up objections. In the first place, he doubted it's legality, as it was to countenance innovations; in the next, he thought it imprudent, as it would disturb the order of government in Church and State; and lastly, he thought it impolitick, as all things must be done in the King's name, and by his authority as Supreme Head of the Church, at a time when he, being a child, could know nothing of these things; and his uncle the Protector, being at the head of an army and absent, could know very little more of them; so that in the opinion even of the meanest people, this would weaken that great prerogative which King Henry had assumed, and on the due use of which all reformation must depend (f). Sir John Godsalue, one of the Visitors (but not for the diocese of Winchester), having heard of the Bishop's discourses, and, having a very sincere regard for him, wrote to him, desiring him to be more discreet, and not run the manifest hazard of ruining himself and losing his Bishoprick. Bishop Gardiner sent him an answer highly commended by Bishop Burnet, and which is inserted in the notes to shew the temper of the man in these times, and how very able he was in casting the fairest colour imaginable on all his opinions and actions (g) [S]. In all probability, this answer [S] On all his opinions and actions. It is very singular, that this, being a private letter, should remain and be preserved to our times. Bishop Burnet says, that it has the most of a Christian, and a Bishop, in it, of any thing he had seen of Gardiner's; he adds too, very judiciously, that it has no less of a Patriot, and therefore he resolved not to suppress it, tho' it was on the other side. But, from this letter, it cannot be shewn that the Bishop of Winchester was on the other side, for there is nothing of Popery in this letter, or indeed in his whole opposition; what he had in his heart no man can say; but either he was sincere in penning this epistle, or he was the most finished dissembler in the world (45). It is true he changed afterwards, and we shall consider how far he changed when we come to that period of his life, from the testimony of writers who did not at all flatter him. But now to the letter, which runs thus.

MR GODSALVE, after my right hearty commendations, with like thanks for the declaration of your good mind towards me (as you mean it), although it agreeth not with mine accompt, such as I have had leisure to make in this time of liberty, since the death of my late Sovereign Lord, whose soul Jesu pardon. For this have I reckoned that I was called to this Bishoprick, without the offence of God's law or the King's in attaining of it. I have kept my Bishoprick these sixteen years, accomplished this very day that I write these letters unto you, without offending God's law or the King's in the retaining of it, howsoever I have of frailty otherwise sinned. Now if I may play the third part well, to depart from the Bishoprick without the offence of God's law or the King's, I shall think the tragedy of my life well passed over, and, in this part, to be well handled, is all my care and study now how to finish this third act well; for so I offend not God's law nor the King's, I will no more care to see my Bishoprick taken from me, than myself to be taken from the Bishoprick.

I am by nature already condemned to die, which sentence no man can pardon, nor assure me of delay in the execution of it; and so see that of necessity I shall leave my Bishoprick to the disposition of the Crown, from whence I had it, my household alio to break up, and my bringing up youth to cease, the remembrance whereof troubleth me nothing. I made in my house at London a pleasant study that delighted me much, and yet I was glad to come into the country and leave it; and as I have left the use of somewhat, so can I leave the use of all to obtain more quiet; it is not loss to change for the better.

Honesty and truth are more leese to me, than all the possessions of the realm; and in these two, to say and do frankly, as I must, I never forbore; yet, and in these two, honesty and truth, I take such pleasure and comfort, as I will never leave them for no respect, for they will abide by a man, and so will nothing else. No man can take them away from me but myself, and if myself do them away from me, then myself do undo myself, and make myself worthy to lose my Bishoprick, whereat such as gape might take more sport than they are like to have at my hands.

What other men have said or done in the homilies I cannot tell, and what homilies or injunctions shall be brought hither I know not; such as the printers have sold abroad, I have read and considered, and am therefore the better instructed how to use myself to the Visitors at their repair hither, to whom I will use no manner of profection, but a plain allegation, as the matter serveth, and as honesty and truth shall bind me to speak; for I will never yield to do that should not be seem a Christian. Bishops ought never to lose the inheritance of the King's laws, due to every Englishman, for want of petition. I will shew myself a true subject, humble and obedient; which repugneth not with the preservation of my duty to God, and my right in the realm not to be enjoined against an Act of Parliament: which mine intent I have signified to the Council, with request of redress in the matter; and not to compel me to such an allegation, which, without I were a beast, I cannot permit; and I were more than a beast, if, after I had signified to the Council truth and reason in word, I should then seem in my deeds not to care for it.

My Lord Protector, in one of such letters as he wrote to me, willed me not to fear too much; and indeed I know him so well, and divers others of my Lord of the Council, that I cannot fear any hurt at their

of the Bishop's proved the cause of that Prelate's first imprisonment, which was in all respects extraordinary, and out of the common forms of justice (b). He was sent for, when in London, to attend the Council, three weeks before the Visitors came into his diocese; and because he would not promise to receive the homilies, and pay obedience to whatever the King's Visitors might require, the Council, notwithstanding his close reasoning the point as to its consistency with law, and his earnest entreaty to give him a little space to consider, committed him close prisoner to the Fleet (i). He was there, as we see by his letters and petitions, very strictly kept, and very indifferently used; which must have been by order, since John Fox has marked on the margin of one of his applications for redress, that the Warden of the Fleet was his friend (k). It is probable the Archbishop consented to this, but it is impossible he should contrive it; being a very deep, tho' a most unjustifiable, stroke of policy. The Bishop held the visitation, as directed by the instructions, illegal without an Act of Parliament; but, being confined, he could not hinder that visitation going on; and, remaining close in the Fleet during the whole session (tho' a Lord of Parliament), he could give no opposition to those bills, which were calculated to make the things lawful which he had objected to as illegal (l). When all this was done, he was discharged like a common malefactor, under colour of the King's general pardon, tho' never charged judicially with any offence (m). The very dates prove these facts; he was committed September the twenty-fifth, the Parliament assembled November the fourth, was prorogued December the twenty-fourth, and he was set at liberty before the close of that year 1547. Besides this, all that we have advanced is supported by unquestionable authorities (n) [T]. In the course of this imprisonment, it came out, that the famous

' their hands, in the allegation of God's law and the King's; and I will never defame them so much to be seen to fear it. And of what strength an Act of Parliament is, the realm was taught in the case of her that we called Queen Anne; where all such as spake against her in the Parliament-House, altho' they did it by special commandment of the King, and spake that which was truth; yet they were fain to have a pardon, because that speaking was against an Act of Parliament. Did you never know, or hear tell, of any man, that for doing that the King, our late Sovereign Lord, willed, devised, and required, to be done; he that took pains, and was commanded to do it, was fain to sue for his pardon; and such other also as were doers in it; and I could tell who it were; sure there hath been such a case, and I have been present when it hath been reasoned.

' That the doing against an Act of Parliament excuseth not a man even from the case of treason, altho' a man did it by the King's commandment. You can tell this to your remembrance, when you think farther of it; and when it cometh to your remembrance, you will not be best content with yourself, I believe, to have advised me to venture the breach of an Act of Parliament, without surety of pardon, although the King command it; and were such indeed as it were no matter to do it at all. And thus I answer the letters with worldly civil reasons, and take your mind and zeal towards me to be as tender as may be; and yet you see, that the following of your advice might make me lose my Bishoprick by mine own act, which I am sure you would I should keep; and so would I, as might stand with my truth and honesty, and none otherwise, as knoweth God, who send you heartily well to fare.'

[T] Is supported by unquestionable authorities.] There is not, to say the truth, but very few writers amongst our Ecclesiastical Historians that have taken upon them to justify these proceedings; but on the other hand, none of them go to the bottom, except Bishop Burnet (46), who speaks very clearly and candidly of this whole affair. 'On the twenty fifth of September, says he, the Council being informed that Gardiner had written to some of that board, and had spoken to others many things in prejudice and contempt of the King's visitation, and that he intended to refuse to set forth the homilies and injunctions, he was sent for to the Council. Where being examined, he said, he thought they were contrary to the word of God, and that his conscience would not suffer him to observe them. He excepted to one of the Homilies, that it excluded charity from justifying men, as well as faith. This he said was contrary to the book set out in the late King's time, which was afterwards confirmed in Parliament, in the year, 1542; he said further, that he could never see one place of scripture, nor any ancient Doctor that favoured it. He also said, Erasmus's Paraphrase was bad enough in Latin, but much worse in English; for the translator had oft, out of ignorance, and oft out of design, misrendered him palpably, and was one that neither understood Latin nor English well. He offered to go to Oxford to dispute about Justification with any they should send him to, or to enter into conference with any that would undertake his instruction in town. But this did not satisfy the Council. So they pressed him to declare what he intended to do, when the visitors should be with him. He said, he did not know; he should further study these points, for it would be three weeks before they could be with him, and he was sure he would say no worse than that he should obey them, as far as could consist with God's law and the King's. The Council urged him to promise that he would without any limitation, set forth the Homilies and the Injunctions, which he refusing to do, was sent to the Fleet. Some days after that, Cranmer went to see the Dean of St Paul's, having the Bishops of Lincoln and Rochester, with Dr Cox, and some others with him. He sent for Gardiner thither, and entred into discourse with him about that passage in the Homily, excluding charity out of our justification, and urged those places of St Paul, That we are justified by faith, without the works of the Law: He said, his design in that passage, was only to draw men from trusting in any thing they did, and to teach them to trust only to Christ. But Gardiner had a very different notion of Justification. For as he said, infants were justified by Baptism, and penitents, by the Sacrament of Penance; and that the conditions of the justifying of those of age, were charity as well as faith, as the three estates make a law all join together; for by this simile, he set it out in the report he writ of that discourse to the Lord Protector, reckoning the King one of the three estates (a way of speech very strange, especially in a Bishop and a Lawyer). For Erasmus, it was said, that though there were faults in his Paraphrase, as no book besides the Scriptures, is without faults, yet it was best for that use they could find, and they did choose rather to set out what so learned a man had written, than to make a new one, which might give occasion to more objections, and he was the most indifferent writer they knew. Afterwards Cranmer, knowing what was likely to work most on him, let fall some words as Gardiner writ to the Protector (47), of bringing him into the Privy Council, if he would concur in what they were carrying on. But that not having its ordinary effect on him, he was carried back to the Fleet.'

He afterwards gives the remainder of the story thus. But notwithstanding all his letters, yet he continued a prisoner till the Parliament was over, and then by state book of religion, published by authority, under the title of The Erudition of Christian Man, was compiled chiefly by Bishop Gardiner (o). By comparing this with the religious systems in the reign of Edward VI, the difference may be seen between his notions and those of Cranmer; and from hence we may discern the probability of his being in earnest in his declarations, without supposing, as almost all writers do, misled therein by the Papists themselves, that in his heart he was a bigot to Popery. The Archbishop was once as well pleased with the book beforementioned as any body, and had recommended it as strenuously; but now having changed his mind as to the real presence, he was not unwilling the world should know its true author; and Gardiner, being touched with his insinuations, replied very eagerly in defence of his book (p) [U]. Upon his obtaining his liberty, the Bishop went down to his diocese, and there was so far from creating any trouble or disturbance, that he was remarkably active and diligent in giving obedience, and seeing that it was given, to the laws concerning religion (q); but those who had a dislike to him, would not suffer him to be long at quiet. They were no sooner informed of his returning to town, than they procured an order for him to come before the Council, where he was roughly treated, and then directed to keep his house till he gave satisfaction, which was to be done in a sermon preached before the King and his Ministers, in a publick audience; for the matter of which, he was directed as well what he should not as what he should say, by Sir William Cecil (r). On St Peter's day the Bishop did accordingly preach, but was so far from giving satisfaction, that the very next day, June the thirtieth 1548, he was sent to the Tower, and continued there a prisoner during all that reign (s). It was very near a year, notwithstanding repeated applications, that he continued there, without having scarce any notice taken of him, his Chaplain having admittance but once when he was ill, and then restrained because his life was not thought in danger (t). When the Protector was deposed, or some small time before, he had hopes given him of his release, and from those it is likely who could have done it if they had judged it proper (u). But finding himself deceived, he took the freedom of applying himself by letter to the Council, of which we have probably a true, tho' certainly a very unpolished, account from honest John Stowe (w); who likewise tells us very plainly why he published it, which in effect was because he saw that no body else would [W]. When the Duke of Somersset, tho' removed

' the Act of Pardon, he was set at liberty. This was much censured as an invasion of liberty; and it was said, those at court durst not suffer him to come to the house, lest he had confounded them in all they did. And the explaining justification with so much nicety in Homilies that were to be read to the people, was thought a needless subtilty. But the former abuses of trusting to the acts of charity that men did, by which they fancied they bought Heaven, made Cranmer judge it necessary to express the matter so nicely, though the expounding those places of St Paul, was as many thought, rather according to the strain of the Germans, than to the meaning of these epistles. And upon the whole matter, they knew Gardiner's haughty temper, and that it was necessary to mortifie him a little, though the pretence on which they did it, seemed too slight for such severities. But it is ordinary, when a thing is once resolved on, to make use of the first occasion that offers for effecting it.'

[U] In defence of his book. While the Bishop was under this confinement, the Archbishop of Canterbury sometimes wrote to him, and, as Strype tells us, proposed to him, employing a part of his time in writing Homilies, which he declined; but it was in one of these conferences, that the dispute to which we refer, happened, the same author tells it in the following words (48).

' During his being here, which was not long, there past some letters between the Archbishop of Canterbury and him: He had urged to the Archbishop, the state of religion in King Henry's days; from which, he and the Clergy and the Council, did begin so much to vary, Winchester reminded him of the King's book as he called it, established by Parliament. But the Archbishop in his answer, told him, that he indeed called it so, and that the King was seduced; and that he the Archbishop knew by whom he was compassed in that book.

But Winchester sharply replied to him. ' That the book was acknowledged by the Parliament as the King's book, and that the Archbishop himself, commanded it to be published in his diocese as the King's book. And that if he thought it not true, he ought to think his Grace would not, for all the Princes christened in the world, have yielded unto. And he threatened the Archbishop, that if he made this matter more public, and charged the late King with being seduced, he would vindicate his master, as one of his old servants. And whereas the Archbishop had advised him to bethink himself of his present condition, lying now in prison; Winchester replied to this with seemingly much satisfaction: how himself was arrived to that haven of quietness, without the loss of any notable tackle, as the mariners say, which he said, was a great matter as the winds had blown, and with a little flea biting, conveyed to an easy state. He advised, that seeing King Henry died so so honourably and so much lamented, and was concluded to be received to God's mercy; the realm should not be troubled during the King's minority, with matters of novelty, there being so many other things for the King's Counsellors to regard.'

[W] That no body else would. Whoever will take the pains of examining our Ecclesiastical and Civil Histories, will see how little care is taken to fix the dates relative to these transactions, which are only to be recovered from the original papers that are still preserved. By comparing them, the reader will perceive, that the Bishop of Winchester never sat in any one of King Edward's Parliaments; and notwithstanding this flagrant injustice, we do not find so much as a single word said of it in the articles against the Protector Somersset, tho' it was not only of more moment than many things alleged in them, but was also a fact which he could not possibly deny. It is indeed affirmed in the following account, and we have some notices of it elsewhere, that the Earl of Warwick, and some of the rest of the cabal, gave Gardiner assurances of his liberty; but when they found themselves able to act without him, they made no scruple of forgetting or breaking that promise, from a just foresight, that he would give the same opposition to their measures he was inclined to have given to those of the Duke.

But let us hear Stowe (49), who very seldom puts original papers into his Annals, and takes care, when he does, that they shall be equally curious and important, thus then he writes. ' Now when the Duke of Somersset was first apprehended, Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, then being prisoner in the Tower (as before ye have heard) was borne in hand, he should be set at liberty; in hope whereof, he prepared him new apparel for that purpose, thinking removed from his high office, found means to come again into power, and to be called to Council, this affair of Bishop Gardiner was brought once more on the carpet, and the Duke and others, by virtue of an order of that Board, went to confer with him in the Tower June the ninth 1550 (x). It was proposed that he should make a submission for what was passed, should testify his approbation of all that had been done in religion since he had been laid aside, and that he should promise obedience for the future. The two last points Winchester readily consented to, and actually signed all that was expected from him; but refused his assent to the first, insisting upon his innocence. Much sollicitation there was, with what intent one cannot say; at last the Bishop, perceiving they rose in their demands, told them roundly he would do nothing in a prison; and that he did not seek either favour or pity, but justice (y). On the nineteenth of July he was brought to the Council, and being asked whether he would subscribe the last articles or not, he answered in the negative; and it was thereupon declared to him, that his Bishoprick should be sequestred; and, if in three months he did not comply, they would go still farther (z). Fuller confesses, in case he was innocent, he was in the right not to acknowledge himself guilty (a); and Heylin seems to think, those who had now to do with him, would not have been satisfied let him have subscribed what he would (b). Strype, out of respect to Cranmer, approves the whole proceeding, as Fox applauds it; but Bishop Burnet, having undertaken to state the matter impartially, does it accordingly, with that clearness which the evidence of the fact demands [X]. When the three months were fully expired, and the Bishop remained in the same

‘ verily to have come abroad within eight or ten days; but when he was forgotten, and nothing said unto him by the space of one month after, he thought it good to put the Lords in remembrance by his letters; wherein, after commendations had unto them, he wrote as followeth: I have continued here in this miserable prison now, one year, one quarter, and one month, this same day that I write these my letters, with want of air to relieve my body; want of books to relieve my mind; want of good company the only solace of this world; and finally, want of a just cause why I should have come hither at all. More of this letter came not to my hands, but that the Lords took it in good part, and laughed very merrily thereat, saying, he had a pleasant head; for reward whereof, they gave him leave to remain still in prison five or six weeks after, without saying, or sending any word to him; which when he considered, then he wrote to them this letter following. After my due commendations to your good Lordships: Howsoever the time is stolen from you with the multitude of businesses, and variety of matters wherewith ye be travelled; whereby ye rather want time, as I suppose, than be glutted with it; yet with me, being alone comfortlesse in this miserable prison, the time passeth more sensibly; and as the grief groweth in length, so it bringeth more encombrance and travell with it. And being now the time of Parliament, whereof I am a member, in my degree called unto it by writ, and not cut from it by any fault, but only by power kept here; it is a double calamity to be detained in prison by so intolerable wrong, and excluded from this assembly, so much against right. I have suffered the like in the late Lord Protector's time, against all reason, which God hath given you power now to reform; and among many other things, which in his time wrythed amisse, no one thing, as I suppose, was of worse example, ne more prejudicial to the good order of the high Court of Parliament, which is the direction of all mens lives, lands, and goods in this realm, than to allow for a precedent, that any one man being member thereof, might, without cause, be excluded, and so letted to parlee there his mind in publick matters for the wealth of the realm, and such other private causes as do occur. If the strength of the Parliament be not impaired by wrong in one, because right consisteth not in number, it shall be at the pleasure of him that ruleth, to do the same in me, whereby others may take more harm than I, as experience hath shewed in such examples. But I know it becometh me not to reason the strength of that court, ne the order of it; the Lawyers of this realm know that, and to their knowledge I submit my judgment, and take for good that they allow. But this I dare say, when religion is entreated in a general Council of Christendome, if the rulers of the Council let any man's repaire thither, that hath right to

‘ be there; whatsoever is there concluded, is in the laws of the world abroad, taken of no force by excluding of one member wrongfully, that should furnish the body, which I write unto your Lordships for the good opinion I have of you, trusting that ye intend not to uphold or follow the late Lord Protector's doings, by wrong, but so fashion your proceedings, as they may agree with justice at home, and seem agreeable to reason to others abroad, being so assured of mine innocency, that when your Lordships shall hear what can be said against me and mine, answer thereunto, there shall appear cause why I should have had praise, thanks, and commendations of the late Lord Protector (if truth, honesty, and due obedience might look therefore) and no cause of trouble or displeasure at all, so wrongfully have I been tormented in this prison, so boldly dare I speak to you of my cause, with such an opinion and estimation of your wisdoms, which I know and reverence, as I ought not, ne would not vainly hope to abuse you with words, but upon certain confidence of your indifferencies; verily I trust that ye will deem and take things in such sort, as being plainly, and truly opened, shall appear unto you by matter indeed. In consideration whereof, I renew my suit unto your Lordships, instantly requiring you, that I may be heard according to justice, and that, with such speed, as the delay of your audience give not occasion to such as be ignorant abroad of my matter, to think that your Lordships allowed, and approved the detaining of me here. Which without hearing my declaration, I trust ye will not but have such consideration of me, as mine estate in the Common-Wealth; the passing my former life amongst you, and other respects do require; wherein you shall bind me, and do agreeably to your honours and justice: the free course whereof you have honourably taken upon you to make open to the realm without respect, which is the only establishment of all Common-Wealths; and therefore the zeal of him was allowed, that said, Fiat justitia & ruat mundus: signifying, that by it, the world is kept from falling indeed, although it might seem otherwise in some respect, and some trouble to arise in doing it. And this I write, because in the late Lord Protector's time, there was an insinuation made unto me, as though I were kept here by policie; which, with the violation of justice, took never good effect, as I doubt not of your wisdoms ye can and will consider, and do therefore accordingly; for the effectual execution whereof, I shall not fail to pray Almighty God for the preservation and increase of your honours. From the Tower.

‘ Thus much concerning these letters have I thought good to set down, for that I find not the same otherwise extant, in large discourses of the said Bishop's writings.’

same sentiments, a resolution was taken to proceed judicially against him, in order to deprive him of the See of Winchester, and what other preferments he had under the authority of the King's commission, in which the Archbishop presided. These Commissioners began their proceedings December the fifteenth, and ended them February the fourteenth following (c), having had in all two and twenty sessions, when the grand affair was finished, and the Bishop deprived for irreverence to the King's authority; though but a few months before they had condemned the abuse of that authority, by those in whose hands it then was. It was added, that he was disobedient to the King's orders and instructions in ecclesiastical affairs; tho' he twice subscribed his approbation to all that was already done, and promised never to disclose any future scruples he might have but to the Privy-Council. As a further aggravation of his offences, it was suggested that he refused to confess his faults, and this matter given by Bishop Burnet, whose authority in these points must be decisive, as nothing could induce him to treat these subjects as he does, but a due respect for truth, which every historical writer ought to prefer to every other consideration; it is necessary to observe, that he is entirely mistaken as to the time of the King's sending to the Bishop, in which he supposes Fox to have erred, and all this from a notion, that, upon his submission, the Protector might have been prevailed with to set him at liberty; whereas, in truth, the offers that were made him, came from the Protector's enemies, who, it has been suggested, made very great use of the Bishop of Winchester's head and hand, in bringing their design to bear; inasmuch that a certain author says (50), the original of the articles against him which he confessed, and upon which he was deposed, or rather the draught of those articles, was in Winchester's own hand-writing. But be that as it will, the King's own Journal very fully shews (51), that the first message sent from him to Gardiner, was June the ninth, 1550, when the Bishop had been, within a few days, two years in prison. These points being premised, let us hear our right reverend author.

(c) Mr Strype asserts this from his own acquaintance with the hands of these times.

(51) Hist. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 150.

' When the Book of Common-Prayer was set out, the Lord St John, and Secretary Petre, were sent with it to him, to know of him, whether he would conform to it or not; and they gave him great hopes that if he would submit, the Protector would sue to the King for mercy to him. He answered, that he did not know himself guilty of any thing that needed mercy: so he desired to be tried for what had been objected to him, according to law. For the book, he did not think that while he was a prisoner, he was bound to give his opinion about such things; it might be thought he did it against his conscience to obtain his liberty; but if he were out of prison, he should either obey it, or be liable to punishment according to law. Upon the Duke of Somerset's fall, the Lord-Treasurer, the Earl of Warwick, Sir William Herbert, and Secretary Petre, were sent to him: Fox says this was on the ninth of July, but there must be an error in that; for Gardiner in his answer says, that upon the Duke of Somerset's coming to the Tower, he looked to have been let out within two days, and had made his farewell feast; but when these were with him, a month, or thereabout, had passed, so it must have been in November the former year. They brought him a paper, to which they desired he would set his hand. It contained, first a preface, which was an acknowledgement of former faults, for which he had been justly punished: There were also divers articles contained in it, which were touching the King's supremacy, his power of appointing or dispensing with holidays and fasts; that the Book of Common Prayer, set out by the King and Parliament, was a most christian and godly book, to be allowed of by all Bishops and Pastors in England; and that he should, both in sermons and discourses, commend it to be observed; that the King's power was compleat now, when under age, and that all owed obedience to him now, as much as if he were thirty or forty years old; that the six articles were justly abrogated, and that the King had full authority to correct and reform what was amiss in the Church, both in England and Ireland. He only excepted to the preface, and offered to sign all the articles, but would have had the preface left out. They bid him rather write on the margin his exceptions to it, so he writ, that he could not, with a good conscience, agree to the preface, and with that exception, he set his hand to the whole paper. The Lords used him with great kindness, and gave him hope, that his troubles should be quickly ended. Herbert and Petre came to him some time after that, but how soon is not so clear, and pressed him to make the acknowledgement without exception; he refused it, and said he would never defame himself; for when he had done it, he was not sure, but it might be made use of against him as a confession. Two or three days after that, Ridley was sent to him, together with the other two, and they brought him new articles. In this paper, the acknowledgement was more general than in the former: It was said here in the preface, that he had been suspected of not approving the King's proceedings, and being appointed to preach, had not done it as he ought to have done, and so deserved the King's displeasure, for which he was sorry: the articles related to the Pope's Supremacy, the suppression of abbeys and chantries, pilgrimages, masses, images; the adoring the Sacrament; the communion in both kinds; the abolishing the old books, and bringing in the new book of service, and that for ordaining of Priests and Bishops; the compleatness of the scripture, and the use of it in the vulgar tongue; the lawfulness of Clergymens marriage; and to Erasmus's Paraphrase, that it had been on good considerations ordered to be set up in Churches. He read all these, and said, he desired first to be discharged of his imprisonment, and then he would freely answer them all, so as to stand by it, and suffer if he did amiss, but he would trouble himself with no more articles while he remained in prison, since he desired not to be delivered out of his troubles in the way of mercy, but of justice.

' After that he was brought before the Council, and the Lords told him, that they fate by a special commission to judge him, and so required him to subscribe the articles that had been sent him. He prayed them earnestly to put him to a trial for the grounds of his imprisonment, and when that was over, he would clearly answer them in all other things: but he did not think he could subscribe all the articles after one sort, some of them being about laws already made, which he could not qualify; others of them being matters of learning, in which he might use more freedom: in conclusion, he desired leave to take them with him, and he would consider how to answer them. But they required him to subscribe them all, without any qualification; which he refused to do. Upon this, the fruits of his Bishoprick were sequestred, and he was required to conform himself to their orders within three months, upon pain of deprivation; and the liberty he had of walking in some open galleries, when the Duke of Norfolk was not in them, was taken from him, and he was again shut up in his chamber.

' All this was much censured, as being contrary to the liberties of Englishmen, and the forms of all legal proceedings. It was thought very hard to put a man in prison upon a complaint against him, and without any further enquiry into it, after two years durance, to put articles to him. And they which spoke freely said, it favoured too much of the Inquisition. But the Canon Law not being refused, and the King being in the Pope's room, there were some things gathered from the Canon Law, and the way of proceeding ex officio, which rather excused, than justified this hard measure he met with. The sequel of this business shall be related in it's proper place.

and submit himself to the King's mercy; tho' he alledged first his innocence, which entitled him to receive from the King's justice what it was supposed he ought to accept as his mercy; and next, that he was not sure of this mercy if inclined to submit, but had reason to fear this confession might be made a ground for conviction, where he knew there was a defect of evidence. He complained that those who committed him were to be his judges, and consequently their own; that he was charged for disobedience to some of them, who in this case were prosecutors as well as parties and judges; and that the whole was the contrivance of men who had been long his enemies, and who, after failing in many schemes, hoped to prevail in this, to his destruction (d). But as a particular detail of this matter would detain us too long, so some curious points, supported by unquestionable evidence, will be found at the bottom of the page [Y]. It is no wonder that the Romanists dwell so much on these proceedings, or that they are so slightly passed over by some of our own Historians, because they are apparently indefensible upon any constitutional principles, and can only be excused in the lump, by alledging that all was done to gratify a party; lay open the rich Bishoprick of Winchester to be canton'd amongst Clergy and Laity, so that Dr Ponet had only the title and two thousand marks a year, instead of being possessed of the temporalities as his predecessors held them; and to keep an old man fast in prison, whom they knew not how to manage out. For this, if considered in any other light, was by no means reconcilable to law of any kind, much less to any notions of liberty; since in effect it was delivering up both Church and State into the hands of a few ambitious and avaricious men (e), who, when they had trampled on others, fell out amongst themselves about the spoil, and, by the natural consequences of their irregular administration, made way for their own destruction in the issue; as at the very time it revived the cause of Popery, and the hopes of Papists [Z]. Bishop Gardiner himself very prudently laid the [Y] Will be found at the bottom of the page.] It is very probable, that having once determined to deprive him of all his preferments for his contempt, they began to consider what that contempt was, and framed an order about it, expressed in such terms as they judged convenient, which was to pass for the order upon which he was committed, and be made the foundation of all their subsequent proceedings. This is indeed a very strange fact, and to which no credit could be given, if it was not reported by Bishop Burnet, from the Council Book, where he discovered it by the orders being signed Bedford, amongst other Counsellors; but that noble peer recollecting that he had not his title at the time the order was dated, struck it out again, and subscribed J. Russel; we have from the same writer, a short but very satisfactory account of the proceedings in that great cause, upon which though Collier makes some remarks, yet he does not treat the point so fairly or so fully as Bishop Burnet, whose words are these.

There was a commission issued out (52) to the Archbishop, the Bishops of London, Ely, and Lincoln, Secretary Petre, Judge Hales, Griffith and Leyson, two Civilians, and Goodrick and Gofnold, two Masters of Chancery, to proceed against Gardiner, for his contempt in the matters formerly objected to him. He put in a compurgation, by which he endeavoured to shew there was malice borne to him, and conspiracies against him, as appeared by the business of Sir Henry Knevet, mentioned in the former part, and the leaving him out of the late King's will, which he said was procured by his enemies. He complained of his long imprisonment without any trial, and that articles of one sort after another were brought to him, so that it was plain, he was not detained for any crime, but to try if such usage could force him to do any thing that should be imposed on him. He declared, that what order soever were set out by the King's Council, he should never speak against it, but to the Council themselves; and that though he could not give consent to the changes before they were made, he was now well satisfied to obey them, but he would never make any acknowledgement of any fault. The things chiefly laid against him were, that, being required, he refused to preach concerning the King's power when he was under age; and that he had affronted preachers sent by the King into his diocese, and had been negligent in obeying the King's injunctions, and continued after all so obstinate, that he would not confess his fault, nor ask the King mercy. His crimes were aggravated by this, that his timely asserting the King's power under age, might have been a great means for preventing the rebellion and effusion of blood which had afterwards happened chiefly on that pretence, to which his obstinacy had given no small occasion. Upon this, many witnesses were examined, chiefly the Duke of Somerset, the Earls of Wiltshire and Bedford, who deposed against him. But to this he answered, that he was not required to do it by any order of Council, but only in a private discourse, to which he did not think himself bound to give obedience. Other witnesses were also examined on the other particulars. But he appealed from the Delegates to the King in person. Yet his Judges on the (*) eighteenth of April, gave sentence against him; by which, for his disobedience and contempt, they deprived him of his Bishoprick.

(*) It should be the 14th of Feb.

It is to be observed, that Gardiner always insisted, that these proceedings in the King's minority, would produce such disturbances; that the King's supremacy had been sworn to, but that the Council's supremacy was a new point, and this it was which he declined preaching to the people. But it was not deprivation alone that would content Gardiner's enemies, more especially since by his protestation he shewed plainly that he did not despair of having this matter reviewed, and therefore they went farther, as Strype tells us (53), and on the next day the Council made the following order, which he transcribed from the book. 'For as much as it appeared he had at all times before the judges of his cause, used himself unreverently to the King's Majesty, and slanderfully towards his Council, and especially yesterday, being the day of his judgment given against him, he called his Judges hereticks and sacramentaries, they being there the King's Commissioners and of his Highness's Council; it was therefore ordered by the whole board, that he should be removed from the lodging he hath now in the Tower, to a meaner lodging, and none to wait upon him but one by the Lieutenant's appointment, in such sort, as by the resort of any man to him, he have not the liberty to send out to any man, or to hear from any man. And likewise that his books and papers be taken from him and seen; and that from henceforth, he have neither pen, ink, nor paper, to write his delectable purposes, but be sequestered from all conferences, and from all means that may serve him to practise any way.' But in process of time, very probably the rigour of this order might be dispensed with.

[Z] Revived the cause of Popery, and the hopes of Papists.] This, though a matter little regarded by modern writers, is in reality a thing of great consequence, in respect to the history of those times. Contemporary writers on both sides agree, that these proceedings of King Edward's Ministers had this effect, and that those who were bigotted Papists, shewed their joy

the weight of the whole on the Delegates who deprived him, and, by protesting and appealing to the King, shewed plainly that all the hopes of redress he had lay in the Crown, and must spring from the exercise of that supremacy to which they represented him as an enemy. He could not, however, avoid seeing, as he was a consummate statesman, that the Politicians made tools in this transaction of the Prelates, and were making large steps towards such a depression of the Church, as would make it entirely dependant on the Crown and it's Ministers, with such a shew of it's antient privileges as might enable those who commanded it to have an uncontrollable power over the legislature, which, how plausibly soever it may be defended by such as have an interest in it at the time, will be ever esteemed a dangerous thing by intelligent and impartial persons. Our ecclesiastical Historians have been most of them aware of this (f), but unwilling to own it, because they were afraid it might reflect on some of the great men amongst our first Reformers; whereas in truth nothing can do them so much service as setting this fact right, and shewing they were outwitted by persons who pretended zeal for the Reformation, and yet had no religion, or were Papists in their hearts. It is no wonder that they were not politicians, much less is it criminal; on the contrary, their simplicity, in this respect, is their true and best excuse. All the blame that can be justly laid upon them, is, that they ever suffered themselves to be drawn into schemes, the bottom of which they could not understand, or foresee the consequences (g) [AA]. All the remaining part of this reign Bishop Gardiner remained in the joy and satisfaction at these prosecutions. They drove some of the ablest and greatest men out of the Church, as Gardiner, Tonstall, and Day, who had shewn themselves very well affected to some of the principal points of the Reformation; and who, if they had gone on complying as they would have done, would in time have both strengthened themselves and drawn in others (54). Gardiner particularly had declared himself on the point of Supremacy very fully; which they took the most effectual method to make him repent; he had acknowledged, that though men were married, they might continue Priests, though, for prudential reasons, he thought that the marriages of Clergymen should be discouraged, that they might live the better, and exercise greater hospitality out of their revenues. He was a strenuous advocate for the real presence in the sacrament, yet disclaimed Transubstantiation, and was for the communion in both kinds. He wrote against treating images irreverently, but justified the taking them away upon due proof of their being abused. In reference to Justification, he declared himself clearly on his death-bed, but professed it ought to be taught with caution to the people, to prevent their falling into fanaticism and running away with a notion, that if they believed in Christ, they might be saved, though they did not live like Christians. Sir John Harrington (55) therefore had reason to say, that he was a Catholic Protestant, or a protesting Catholic, that is, he had given such proofs of his willingness to adhere unto and proceed in the Reformation; that if he had not been treated as he was, he might have been highly serviceable; whereas by these severe, and in some respects irregular, proceedings, King Edward's Ministers actually provided instruments for Queen Mary, who otherwise might have found none, and furnished a colourable pretence for what was afterwards done against themselves.

Another injury that the Protestant Religion received, was in the spoiling the Bishopricks, which were thus rendered vacant, which was either done under colour of the King's authority, or by the persons who accepted them; and this countenanced the clamours of the Papists, that all was done out of temporal views, and that men pretended a quarrel to the doctrines, that they might get at the lands of the Church. If there had been no cause given for these complaints, if the Bishop of Winchester had been encouraged to proceed as he did immediately after he came out of the Fleet, in officiating as the law directed (56), and preaching the King's authority to remove what was amiss in the ceremonies and discipline of the Church, and the great men had shewn themselves as zealous Protestants in their lives, as they were in their professions, without carving for themselves estates out of what belonged to the Bishops fees, which had not been done in the time of Henry the Eighth, and which it was both unwise and unsafe to do in the time of a minority, all the troubles the nation suffered might have been avoided; the young King's uncles, and perhaps the young King himself, might have lived much longer; the unjust attempt to alter the succession, the consequences of which were so fatal to many noble and not a few innocent persons, would never have been thought necessary (57); and the Reformation would have been so effectually established, that even the ecclesiasticks would have been against alterations.

[AA] Or foresee the consequences.] There is not any period in the English History, where one who searches for truth, finds himself more at a loss which road to take, than in the short reign of Edward the Sixth; and the reason is, because most of our Historians have written systematically, and have laboured to reduce all the characters they met with, into such forms as might make them best suit with their respective plans. In some we find the Protector Somerset represented as one of the wisest, best, and mildest governors this nation ever had (58), and brought to an untimely end by the artifices of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, who is made one of the greatest monsters that ever lived. In others, that Duke is represented as a weak man, whom Dudley governed till he had made him do so many exorbitant and unpopular things, as shewed him unfit to be trusted longer with the administration, and then took the government upon himself (59). The truth of the matter is, they were both ambitious men, and both laboured to support their power by gratifying their dependants.

As for these dependants, whatever there might be of piety and true religion in some few of them, yet the major part were governed only by their interests, and would support any man or any scheme by which these might be promoted. Somerset began to make free with the Church, and by that means raised fortunes for himself and his family, in which he persisted, when he came a second time into favour, and took up the thread of the Bishop of Winchester's prosecution, just where he dropped it when deposed from his Protectorate. In this he was supported by Northumberland and the rest of the Council, who had views of the same kind, and they shewed great respect to Cranmer and the Divines he brought into the Church, because they found them men easily over-reached, and who thought they did no wrong in obeying whatever directions came to them from the Crown. Some likewise were really of opinion, that large revenues and a considerable measure of temporal power, were hindrances to their ministry, and were therefore the less uneasy in making such concessions as they apprehended would best bind the great men to keep out Popery; but it is certain they had no jealousy that many of these potent courtiers, and particularly those of Northumberland's faction, were very far from having any hearty concern for that faith which they professed; and consequently preferred getting estates at the expence of the Church, to the making provisions for the security of the Church, which they pretended to leave to the management of Cranmer and his friends, only that they might serve themselves of him and them at particular conjuncture, without troubling themselves much about futurity.

same state, that is, a close prisoner in the Tower, and yet not so strictly kept, at least all the latter part of the time, as the order of Council seemed to require; for certain it is, that, in this space, he not only wrote many controversial pieces, but also composed variety of Latin poems, and translated into verse several beautiful passages in the books of Ecclesiastes, Wisdom, Job, and other poetical parts of the Old Testament (b). He also kept up his spirits all that time, and was wont to say very confidently, as either believing it or desiring to be thought to believe it, that he should live to see another turn, and another Court in which he should be as great as ever (i). On the death of King Edward no doubt he foresaw that turn was near, notwithstanding the new Court set up in his neighbourhood for that unfortunate Lady, Queen Jane. On the nineteenth of July 1553, Queen Mary was publicly proclaimed by that very Council which the day before owned the right of her competitor, and gave her the coarse and injurious title of Bastard of Henry VIII (k). On the third of August the Queen made her solemn entry into the Tower, when Bishop Gardiner, in the name of himself and his fellow-prisoners, the Duke of Norfolk, the Dukes of Somerset, the Lord Courtney, and others of high rank, made a congratulatory speech to her Majesty, who gave them all their liberties (l). On the eighth of the same month he performed, in the Queen's presence, the obsequies for the late King Edward, whose body was buried at Westminster, with the English service, by Archbishop Cranmer, the funeral sermon being preached by Bishop Day (m). On the ninth, Bishop Gardiner went to Winchester-House, in Southwark, after a confinement of somewhat more than five years (n). On the twenty-third he was declared Chancellor of England, tho' his patent did not pass till the twenty-first of September (o). On the first of October he had the honour of crowning the Queen (p), and on the fifth of the same month he opened the first Parliament in her reign (q). By this time he was in possession again of his academical honours; for as at the beginning of his misfortunes the University of Cambridge elected in his place the Duke of Somerset, and on his fall the Duke of Northumberland; so when he fell they rechose the Bishop of Winchester for their Chancellor, and restored him also to his headship of Trinity-Hall, then possessed by Dr Mowse (r). At this juncture, the Bishop of Winchester, either thro' the Queen's esteem for, and confidence in, him; or, as some suggest, tho' without any great evidence, thro' the recommendation of Charles V, was possessed of a larger compass of Civil and Ecclesiastical power, than any English Minister ever enjoyed, except Cardinal Wolsey; and in his management of this, in all its various branches, tho' taken from so long an imprisonment, and labouring under the weight of so great an age as seventy, his bitterest enemies must allow he gave indubitable marks of superior talents (s). One cannot help looking with some surprize upon the conduct of Archbishop Cranmer in this business. Strype shews, from the Council Book, that he presided, and was very active in the Bishop of Winchester's deprivation, and for the trouble therein, received four hundred marks (60). He was particularly objected to by Winchester as his personal enemy, and both before and after, was engaged in a controversy with him about the sacrament. Bishop Burnet, makes an apology for him, which deserves to be considered. 'He was, says he, naturally a man of bowels and compassion, and did not love to drive things to extremities; he considered that men who had grown old in some errors, could not easily lay them down, and so were by degrees to be worn out of them. Only in the proceedings against Gardiner and Bonner, he was carried beyond his ordinary temper. But Gardiner he knew to be so inveterate a Papist, and so deep a dissembler, that he was for throwing him out, not so much for the particulars objected to him, as upon the ill character he had of him. Bonner had also deceived him so formerly, and had been so cruel a persecutor upon the statute of the six articles, and was become so brutal and luxurious, that he judged it necessary to purge the Church of him. And the Sees of London and Winchester were of such consequence, that he was induced, for having these well supplied, to stretch a little in these proceedings against those dissembling Bishops.'

If these were really the maxims upon which he acted, they were certainly very indifferent ones, whether considered in the light of Christian prudence, or of civil policy. For to assume a power of judging of men's hearts, contrary to their declarations and subscriptions, which were all that the law required; and to think that such a construction could justify a legal deprivation, is not very reconcilable to religious principles, and with respect to maxims of policy, such proceedings were still worse, because they established the most dangerous precedents, and left every thing open to the will and pleasure of such as were invested with power, as those who abetted this prosecution afterwards felt to their cost. But the truth of the matter seems to be, that Archbishop Cranmer was not either a great lawyer, or a profound politician, which induced him to follow the sentiments of others, of whose abilities he had a good opinion, to which perhaps, he might be the more inclined from the rectitude of his own intentions, and from a charitable apprehension, that other men were as upright as himself, in which, not in this instance only, but in many others, he was sadly deceived.

For, in reality, he was the dupe of the Great in this business, and while he flattered himself that they assisted him in his views for the Church, he was in fact doing theirs at the expence of the Church. The Duke of Somerset had besides the Admiral, another brother, Sir Henry Seymour, to whom he was desirous some good estate might come; and therefore Dr Ponet, who was raised to the See of Winchester upon the deprivation of Gardiner, was hardly warm in it, before he conveyed to this Sir Henry Seymour the stately palace of Marwel, with the lordship and park belonging thereto, and also that of Twyford. There was another nobleman too, the Earl of Wiltshire, afterwards Marquis of Winchester, who had a good stroke at the lands of this See, Bishop Ponet conveying to him the palace, park, and manor of Waltham, with some good farms in the neighbourhood (61). But unluckily for these able politicians, Gardiner survived, recovered his dignity, and recovered also to his See, these and other lands granted away during the time it was taken from him. This scheme was carried still farther, upon depriving Dr Cuthbert Tonstall, of the Bishoprick of Durham, the Bishoprick itself being dissolved (62), with intent to raise a vast temporal estate to the great man who then ruled all, but this likewise proved abortive by the death of King Edward.

pass all mens expectations, be, as the world seems agreed they are, sure signs of superior talents [BB]. The Queen is said, by most of our Historians, to have recommended three great points to the Bishop of Winchester's care, with equal concern, all of which were attended with almost equal difficulties; the first was, the clearing the legitimacy of her birth, and annulling the divorce of her mother; tho' this was apparently bastardizing her sister, and presumptive successor. The next was, restoring the old religion, and reconciling the nation to Rome, in the same manner as before her father's desertion. The third was, obtaining the consent of Parliament to her marriage with Prince Philip; which was so unpopular, that the former House of Commons prepared an address to the Queen not to marry a foreigner (t). Amongst all the secret and open obstacles, which were not a few, that our Minister had to overcome in the prosecution of these measures, none probably gave him more trouble than getting over his own dislike to every one of them. The procuring the divorce was the first service he rendered the father; and now reversing this divorce, and branding all who had been concerned in it, was the first service required by the daughter. He [BB] Be sure signs of superior talents ] It may perhaps be truly said, that Gardiner was the wisest and most fortunate, as Cecil was the worthiest and most steady, of English Ministers. The greater part of Queen Mary's reign was full of uneasiness and misfortunes, but neither began till after the death of the Bishop of Winchester, whose administration was a perfect triumph, which must not be understood over his enemies, for that would be false as well as fulsome flattery; but over all the obstacles he met with, and never Minister met with greater. August the third, 1553, he was discharged from his imprisonment, and took his seat in the Queen's Council, where he was Prime-Minister from the time he entered it, though he was not declared Chancellor till about three weeks after, and had not his patent before the time mentioned in the text. He was a man of such comprehensive parts, that every thing was present to him; and, which is still more extraordinary, whatever he did, was so done, that it looked as if he attended to nothing else.

He saw the kingdom in great confusion, and the Queen surrounded by an army, but he loved not standing forces, and besides her coffers would not afford it; he disbanded them therefore, and provided for the Queen's security by paper. He penned first a proclamation for quieting people's minds in respect to the disputes in Church and State, forbidding the abusive words Papist and Heretick, speaking fair to both parties, and prohibiting any rash acts of loyalty, by injuring those who had been concerned in supporting Queen Jane. To prevent despair, and to give a high idea of the Queen's clemency, a pardon was granted to the Duke of Suffolk, who had persuaded his daughter to take the title of Queen, after he had been four days in the Tower. The Bishop of Winchester had a conference also with the Duke of Northumberland, who it is said told him, he was desirous of living, if it were in a mouse-hole; to which the Bishop replied, that instead of a mouse-hole, he would be glad to spare him one of his palaces, but that he would do well to prepare for the worst; it is reported that he interceded for him to the Queen, but she was not inclined to spare him, and indeed it could not be expected (63).

That the people might not be too much alarmed with the execution of that nobleman, and some of his followers, or conceive harsh ideas of the new reign, there issued about that time two proclamations, one for the regulation of the coin as far as it could be regulated, with a promise of what amendment should follow in that respect; the other for remitting a tax granted to King Edward (64), and though in itself this was a very acceptable act of grace, yet it was sensibly lightened and improved by the manner of doing it; the Proclamation setting forth, that she graciously considering the good wills, forwardness, and hearty dispositions of her true loving subjects, always heretofore exhibited to the aid and succour of the commonweal, with their proper substance and goods, when the service, the necessity and honour of the realm had so required, as well in the times of her father and brother, but especially since the time of her vocation to the crown, in the defence of her royal person, against the malicious force of the most arrant traitor Sir John Dudley, late Duke of Northumberland, and his complices: notwithstanding it was well known to the multitude of her said good subjects, how by the evil government of the realm in those late years, especially since the said Duke had borne rule, the treasure of the same was marvellously exhausted; and she now presently charged with payment of notable great sums, being the debts of her said brother the King, partly due to divers of her servants and subjects, and partly to certain merchant strangers and others; which for her own honour, and the honour of the realm, she determined, by the help of God, truly to discharge, content, and pay in times convenient and reasonable. That yet having a special mind to the weal of her subjects, and accounting their loving hearts and prosperity as her own weal, and the chiefest treasure that she desired next the favour and grace of God; and having a full assurance in her said subjects, that if the state, the cause and honour of the realms should so require, they would at all times hereafter, exhibit their semblable service, though in the latter session of the said Parliament, holden in the time of the said King Edward, towards the payment and discharge of the said notable debts were granted, two sixmes and two fiftens, and one subsidy of four shillings in the pound, to be raised and levied of the manors, lands, and tenements; and two shillings eight-pence of the goods and chattles of her subjects, which grants were now due unto her by the same act, and would discharge one great piece of the said debts. Her Majesty of her mere grace and great clemency for the relief and succour of her said good subjects, had freely for her, her heirs and successors, pardoned and remitted to them the said subsidy of four shillings the pound, and two shillings eight pence the pound. Trusting her good subjects would have loving consideration thereof, whom she required heartily to bend themselves wholly to serve God to his glory, with continual prayer for the honour and advancement of her grace and the commonweal. There is no doubt made, that these proclamations were drawn by the pen of Bishop Gardiner, who by this means, in some measure, removed the jealousies that had been conceived of Queen Mary, and established in the minds of the common people at least, a firm hope, that, in matters of property, the Queen would be both punctual and just to her subjects, and gentle and moderate in her demands from them.

The same prudent dexterity was visible in the conduct of the first Session of the first Parliament in that reign, in which there passed but one publick and two private bills, all three acts of grace (65). The first was for abolishing those laws passed in the reign of Henry the Eighth, by which new treasons were enacted, and under colour of which, as this law for repealing them recited, several persons of high rank had been condemned and put to death for words, or for very slight and doubtful offences. Of the two private bills, one was for restoring in blood, Lord Edward Courtney, whom the Queen had created Earl of Devonshire; and the other for restoring in like manner, the Lady Gertrude Courtney, widow of the Marquis of Exeter, executed in the reign of King Henry, and these matters dispatched, both houses were prorogued on the twenty-first of October, for a few days, that it might be said in this first Session of her first Parliament, the Queen had done all for, without demanding any thing from, her people.

He had also assisted, promoted, and defended, the King's supremacy, which made way for all that followed, as much or more than any in the kingdom, and had the reputation also of penning what was published in defence of that Prince's marriage with Anne Bolleyn, and all that happened thereupon, which was now to be condemned as null and illegal. Besides, so far as we are guided by unquestionable authorities, this seems to have been going greater lengths than he intended; for hitherto he had not entered into correspondence with the Pope, or done any thing in ecclesiastical affairs but in virtue of the Queen's supremacy, an authority more agreeable to his system of Divinity than that of the Roman Pontiff; but in that particular the Queen was inflexible; and her passion as strong to relinquish this title to the Pope, as her father's ambition was to take it from him (u). The Spanish match crossed the mind of Winchester, as much as it did that of the nation; he foresaw the many troubles would follow from it, and that the Queen would enjoy none of that felicity with which she flattered herself in the prospect. But he well knew what a temper she inherited from her parents, and that she would find ministers enough to carry into execution all that she proposed; he knew of how great importance this was to the kingdom, and that the manner of doing these things was almost as material as the points themselves, since, if any means could be found to mitigate their malignity, it must be by a proper regulation of the conditions attending them (w). Upon this consideration therefore, joined to a sense of his own danger from what was passed if a new revolution happened, he resolved to remain where he was, and employ his utmost skill to render the measures of Queen Mary's reign as beneficial to herself, and as little burthensome to her people, as in their nature they could be; tho' it is certain he was not able to prevent all the evil, or do all the good, he could wish (x). The Convocation being assembled, he procured such questions to be moved there, as he judged conducive to the change he proposed to make; yet went no farther than declaring the Real Presence in the Sacrament, which made way for reviving the old service on the twenty-first of December (y). In Parliament he went the same pace, repealing, by a single law, nine acts passed in the reign of King Edward, all respecting religion; by which those who were of that religion, countenanced by Henry VIII, became as safe as they could wish, and even the grossest Papists were out of danger, yet not restored to power (z). The Queen's legitimacy was established, the divorce declared null and void, the whole fault being thrown upon Archbishop Cranmer, against all truth and justice, since Gardiner had to the full as great a share therein as he, tho' now Chancellor of England and Prime-Minister, while the other was attainted of high-treason, by a bill passed this session; but to make that venerable Prelate some amends, upon an humble letter acknowledging his fault in the business of Queen Jane, he received a pardon (a). These extraordinary changes were wrought rather by address and fair speeches, than by violence or corruption, though some of our writers say the contrary. As to force, the Queen, a few guards excepted, had none; and her case as to money was the same, tho' the Bishop of Winchester was a frugal Minister (b). But what seems to put corruption out of the question in this Parliament, is, that, after all, the members could not be brought to relish the Queen's marriage to Don Philip, and therefore, the Chancellor advised the dissolving this Assembly before the close of the year. And thus two of the three great points were accomplished [CC]. But much

[CC] And thus two of the three great points were accomplished. According to the character of Queen Mary, as it stands in Bishop Burnet's History, we find zeal for religion was the ruling inclination of her mind; and that the first purpose after her accession, was restoring the old worship, in which she was sure of being supported by many of the nobility, clergy, and gentry; and it is highly probable, that the Bishop of Winchester shewed as much willingness thereto as any of the rest. The question however is, how far he meant to go, and whether his true design was to bring back the whole of Popery, or only to reduce things to the state in which they were at the death of King Henry. If we trust to what most authors have written, we must believe that the former was his great view, as well as that of his mistress; but if we examine his actions, which is the surest way of judging of a wise man's sentiments, we shall see reason to conclude, that he aimed at the latter; it is acknowledged, that he disliked the coming of Pole into England; it is certain that he procured nothing to be done, either in the Convocation or the Parliament, that went farther than his old master's regulations; and it is likewise owned, that when the Queen sent Pole an account of the great things, which as she apprehended had been carried for her, in the second session of her first Parliament, he was far enough from seeing those things in that light that she did (66). He complained, that in the act for repealing her mother's divorce, there was no notice taken of the insult offered to the See of Rome; nor in the other act, repealing the laws of King Edward, any provision made for returning again to the obedience of the See of Rome. May we not then doubt, whether Gardiner ever intended it?

Before this Parliament was called many things had been done, and the Queen had issued various commissions, as supreme head of the Church, and this title was also used in the writ for calling the Parliament, though afterwards laid aside. It is also said, that Bishop Gardiner caused Pole's journey into England to be stopt, that he suggested receiving him with the title of the Pope's Legate, was hurrying on things too fast, and that he procured from the Emperor Charles the Fifth, some intimations of the same kind, which disposed Queen Mary to listen altogether to his advice, instead of receiving Italian Counsels, against which she had been cautioned by his Imperial Majesty. Upon these motives, Pole became, and continued, his enemy, as long as they continued together in the world. It is however very true, that our Bishop altered his conduct afterwards, that he received this Cardinal as the Pope's Legate, with the highest marks of honour, that he preached a famous sermon at Paul's Cross (67), upon the reconciling of the nation to the Pope; and if he was not the author, had at least a great share in that bloody persecution which ensued against the Protestants. Against these accusations there is no defending him, and yet some things may be said in alleviation of his offences.

He made no great haste in restoring Popery, or in calling Cardinal Pole as the Pope's Legate; he did not much greater difficulties were to be surmounted before the third could be brought to bear. The marriage treaty was left entirely in the hands of Bishop Gardiner, and it is allowed he managed it very dextrously. He made use of the great reluctance shewn by the last Parliament, to procure such articles as might secure the nation against the ambition of Philip and his Spaniards; and foreseeing expences might follow upon this match, notwithstanding the hard bargain he had made, he procured, as is said, half a million sterling from the Emperor, to facilitate the approbation of a new Parliament. But while these preparations employed those in the cabinet, such as abhorred this match were contriving very formidable measures for it's disappointment. Sir Thomas Wiat of Kent, and Sir Peter Carew of Cornwall, laid the plan of a deep and dangerous insurrection, in which the unfortunate Duke of Suffolk had just share enough to bring his own head, and, which was much more to be regretted, the heads of Lady Jane and her husband Lord Guilford Dudley, to the block. The whole scheme miscarried by the ill management, and, to say the truth, the want of honesty in the Chiefs (c). Sir Peter Carew declared before the time fixed, and was easily subdued; this forced out Sir Thomas Wiat before he was ready. Yet he was very near carrying his point, and might have carried it if he had used less artifice; but he carried his declarations of duty to the Queen so high, that those who were in the first digestion of his enterprize were afraid to join him; so that at length his forces were broken, and he surrendered. Sir George Harper betrayed the whole conspiracy, and explained all the secret correspondencies on which those who embarked in it had depended (d). Sir Thomas also behaved meanly, and talked of discoveries to save his life. When he found that was impracticable, he recanted, and denied the truth of what he had said: But, notwithstanding this, some persons of the highest rank suffered deeply, either by his perfidy or pusillanimity; and it is one of the heaviest charges against the Bishop of Winchester, that he gave credit, or seemed to give credit, to these informations (e) [DD]. All insurrections, express any great violence in the beginning of his administration, and is said to have testified some indignation against Bonner, for the pleasure he took in pursuing hereticks. We shall have occasion hereafter to discuss the point of his cruelty more at large, yet here it may not be amiss to observe, that in the years 1553, 1554, when he was in the zenith of his power, there was not one burnt, and in the last year of his life, there were fewer burnt than in any year of that reign. That he did return to Popery again is not to be denied, but it seems to have been when he had no other choice to make, so that he took up with this, because he could not get a better religion; for if there be any thing clear or certain with regard to his sentiments in these matters, he thought the ceremonies and discipline of the Church ought to be under the direction of the State, and that Princes might waive their Supremacy if they thought fit, for the sake of what was stiled unity in the Church.

That he had really no way to avoid doing what he did, will appear clearly from hence; that on the one side, he had the furious Papists, not his friends, who insinuated that he was more a Statesman than a Bishop, and to be esteemed rather as a Politician than a Prelate; while the Protestants, and more especially the exiles, took every possible method to expose him, inventing many things to his prejudice, as for instance, at the beginning of the Queen's reign, that she was with child by him (63), which however improbable, as he was above seventy, and she near forty, made much disturbance; and by the translating the piece he had written for the King's supremacy, and other treatises, not at all consistent with the cause of the Church and the Court of Rome. He was therefore, with some of his brethren, obliged to swim with that stream to which they had given strength enough to carry them out of their depth. In this respect therefore he deserved to be stiled a dissembler, and the more so, because upon his death-bed, when he had least reason to dissemble, he shewed his repentance of many things, and declared for Justification by Faith, against works as will be shewn hereafter.

[DD] That he gave credit, or seemed to give credit, to these informations.] There was, as there commonly is against all Prime Ministers, a very high spirit of resentment against the Bishop of Winchester; he was represented as the author of the Spanish match, as the betrayer of his Queen and country, and as one who had sold his country to strangers. Whereas in making the match, he submitted to the Queen's will, who thought she could not be safe, even upon the throne, without the protection of some potent foreign Prince. In settling the terms, there is no doubt at all, that this prelate set them so high as that Philip himself, as great a Politician as he was, found it impossible to pick a hole in them; and in reference to the treasure, the nation was at that time much exhausted; the Spaniards in pursuit of their projects, were scattering their money through all Europe; and as the Chancellor had been obliged to cry Philip up for a great, a rich, and a magnificent Prince, he thought it not amiss that some of the money should be scattered here, and that with his person, the English should see a little of his treasure. Those that rose under Sir Thomas Wiat, when they came into Southwark, rifled the Bishop's study, tore all his books to pieces, so that in Winchester Close, people might walk up to their knees in papers (69). This however was an open testimony of resentment; but William Thomas, Esq; who had been Clerk of the Council to King Edward, and a great favourite of his, is said to have formed a design against this Prelate's life; however that was, he was convicted and executed, as having been one of the principal conspirators (70). A little before Sir Thomas Wiat died, he was examined by Secretary Bourn, before the Earl of Devonshire, in respect to what he had charged him with, in reference to his design; but at his death, he declared him innocent (71). There were some aspersions also very falsely thrown upon the Lady Elizabeth, who came into a great deal of trouble, was sent prisoner to the Tower, and examined by the Bishop of Winchester, who is reported to have been her great enemy, and to have let fall some strange speeches, which were thought to refer to her, such as, We may shake off the leaves, and lop the branches; but if we do not destroy the root, the hope of Hereticks, we do nothing.

However, her innocence and her fortitude preserved her, and after her sister's marriage, King Philip is said to have interposed on her behalf, in hopes, as some say, of marrying her after the decease of her sister; but as others with greater probability affirm, from a motive of policy; foreseeing, that if she was removed, the Crown, as things then stood, would descend to Mary Queen of Scots, who being married to the Dauphin of France, that must have proved a great check to the Spanish designs (72), and to the project of universal Monarchy which Philip had formed very early; yet these are but conjectures, and it is very remarkable, that Mr Camden, who no doubt had the best information, and could have no reason to conceal any thing he knew, refers the expression about the root and branches, to Dr John Story (73), who was afterwards executed for High-Treason in Queen Elizabeth's reign; ascribes her persecution in it's greatest violence, and when to secure her life, she was forced to make profession of the Popish religion, to Cardinal Poic, without so much as once mentioning the Bishop of Winchester's name;

insurrections, when suppressed, are useful to those against whom they are raised, more especially when managed by men of parts and dexterity. None knew better how to procure, or to use, advantages, than the Bishop of Winchester; and he so well managed mens hopes and fears, with every other help he had, that when the Queen's second Parliament met, April the second 1554, it very soon appeared he might prevail on them to give a sanction to his measures, whatever they were. The terms of the Queen's marriage, as he settled them, met with very little opposition; and as for making severe laws against Hereticks, it is allowed the Bishop had no other trouble than to restrain them, which in several instances he did. His own and the wiser Bishops zeal, not flaming near so high as that of this House of Commons (f). In the whole of his conduct thro' this Parliament, over which he had as much influence as Minister ever had, there was nothing done that was either unworthy of his station, or injurious to his country; on the contrary, foreseeing that some who had access to the Queen might make an ill use of her confidence, and engage her, by plausible promises, to countenance things every way beneath her, and dangerous to her subjects, he procured this to be put out of her power, by a short law drawn by his direction, as may be seen more at large in the notes [EE]. But when the great measures name; so that notwithstanding what is said in Holinshed, and other writers; there is good reason to doubt whether this Prelate went any farther in these matters than his duty and the Queen's temper; who, as Camden very truly says, though a mild and benevolent Princess, bore her sister no good will, might require. In this however it is hard to decide, as there might be a great deal, and not without authority, alledged on both sides.

[EE] As may be seen more at large in the notes.] In the former part of his life, this Prelate, upon more occasions than one, had taken upon him to express a great zeal for the Laws, and a very warm concern for the constitution of his country. But it very often happens, that Patriots preferred forget their former professions, endeavour to explain them away, or, it may be, retract them, and act in direct opposition to them: This was not the conduct of Gardiner, the best and most candid of our Historians being his judges. They very fairly admit, that he shewed himself through the whole course of his administration, a good Englishman (74), and one as careful to preserve his country from becoming a province to foreigners, or his countrymen from being enslaved by an undue extension of the prerogative, as any minister we ever had; it would be easy to prove all this by a train of numerous quotations, but as these would necessarily take up a great deal of room, and as this article has already swelled into a great extent, we will content ourselves with producing two passages from a modern author (75), who has abridged within a narrow compass, what Bishop Burnet, and other Ecclesiastical Historians have written at large, from our records and other authentic testimonies.

' In the managing of this treaty Gardiner had a principal share, for he was the oracle of the Council Board, as having thirty years experience in affairs, and a great knowledge of the Courts of Christendom and of the state of England. In drawing the articles of the marriage he had a double design, one was to have them so framed, as they might easily pass in Parliament; and the other was to exclude the Spaniards from having any share in the government of England, which he designed to hold in his own hands. Accordingly it was agreed, that the government and gift of places, should be entirely in Queen Mary; and though Prince Philip was to be called King, named in all writs, and his image put on the coin and seals, yet the Queen's hand alone was to give authority to every thing without his; no Spaniard was to be capable of any office; no change was to be made in the law, nor was the Queen to be required to go out of England against her will, nor might their issue go out of England, but by the consent of the nobility. The Queen was to have a jointure of forty thousand pounds a year out of Spain, and twenty thousand pounds out of the Netherlands. If the Queen had a son, he was to inherit Burgundy and the Netherlands, as well as England; and if Philip's son died, he was to inherit all the Spanish Dominions. If the Queen had only daughters, they were to succeed to her crown, and have such portions from Spain, as were usually given to Kings daughters. Prince Philip was to have no share in the government after her death, and the Queen might still keep up the League with France, notwithstanding this match.

' On the second day of April, a new Parliament met, which was the second in this reign, but the most considerable members were before corrupted by Gardiner (*), who gave them pensions, some two hundred, and others a hundred pounds a year for their voices. The first act that passed was declaratory, that all the prerogatives and limitations which by law belonged to the Kings of England were the same, whether the crown fell into the hands of a male or female. The real meaning of this was little known, some feared there was a pernicious design in it; and, that it being declared that she had all the authority of any of her progenitors, it might be inferred that she, by this, could pretend to a right of conquest, and like William the Conqueror, seize on the estates of the English. But it was so conceived, that the Queen was put under the same limitations, as well as acknowledged to have the same prerogatives with her predecessors.

(*) See note [M22].

' The secret of this Act was afterwards discovered: a projecting man, who had served Cromwell, and had been deeply engaged in the Lady Jane's affair, and the late insurrection, by making a timely application to the Emperor's Ambassador obtained his pardon; and for amends, he offered a project to the Ambassador, that the Queen should declare, that she succeeded to the crown by the Common Law, but was not bound by the Statute Law, which only obliged Kings, and not Queens, by which she might pretend to be a conqueror and rule at pleasure, and by that might restore both religion and the Abbey Lands without any restraint. This was brought to the Queen by the Ambassador, who begged of her to keep it very secret. She disliked the paper, yet she sent for Gardiner, and charged him to give her his opinion of it sincerely, as he would answer to God for it at the great day. He read it carefully, and told her, it was a most pernicious contrivance, and begged of her not to hearken to such platforms, which might be brought her by base sycophants. Upon that she burnt the paper, and ordered the Ambassador to bring her no more of such projects.

' This gave Gardiner sensible apprehensions of the mischiefs that Spanish counsels might bring upon the nation, and therefore he procured the forementioned Act to be made, by which the Queen was as much bound by the Statute Law as her predecessors. He also procured an Act to be passed, ratifying the articles of the marriage of the Queen, with very strong clauses for keeping the government entirely in the Queen's hands, so that Prince Philip might not take it upon him as Henry the Seventh had done, when he married the heirs of the House of York: for as that King set up a title in his own name, and kept the government in his own hands, so the Spaniards began now to derive a descent from John of Gaunt, father to Henry the Fourth, which caused Gardiner to be the more cautious in this matter; and it must be acknowledged, that the preserving the nation out of the hands of the Spaniards, was almost only owing to his care and wisdom (*). In this Parliament several measures aimed at were once adjusted, the Chancellor supposing that what remained for accomplishing the whole of the Queen's plan, might be compassed more effectually after the marriage, the Queen on the fifth of May came to the Parliament, and, having given her consent to fifteen bills, dissolved that Assembly (g). All obstacles to the marriage being now removed, and the circumstances of the House of Austria making it necessary to hasten it, King Philip put to sea, and arrived towards the close of July at Southampton, escorted by a considerable fleet, which however was obliged to pay homage to that of England in the narrow seas; such was the temper of those times, and the vigour of that administration (h). He proceeded with a numerous train of nobility from Southampton to Winchester, where he was received, and splendidly entertained, by the Bishop; on St James's day, the tutelary Saint of Spain, he was by that Prelate solemnly married to the Queen in the cathedral, the Emperor Charles V. resigning to him the kingdom of the two Sicilies, and many nominal sovereignties, upon the marriage (i). In his way to London the King took Windsor, where he was installed Knight of the Garter, and made his entry into this capital on the eleventh of August 1554, with prodigious magnificence, and, like all new Princes, with universal acclamations (k). The Chancellor well knowing this fair weather would not continue long, resolved to avail himself of it while it lasted, and therefore called a new Parliament about the middle of November the same year. A very little after the session begun Cardinal Pole came into England, not much to the real good liking either of the King or Chancellor. But the Queen being set upon it, and the new House of Commons having the same bigotted spirit with the old one, a solemn deputation was sent to fetch him over, Lord Paget and Sir William Cecil being two of the Commissioners. His attainder, in the reign of the late King Henry VIII, was reversed with as much facility as it was made, and with much the same consideration (l). To prevent his falling into the same inconveniency that Wolsey had done, he had a licence, under the Queen's broad seal, to execute his functions as the Pope's Legate. When these advances had been gradually made, a supplication was presented from both Houses to the King and Queen, that the nation might be reconciled to the See of Rome; which being granted November 30, 1554, the request of both Lords and Commons was signified, in the presence of their Majesties, to his Holiness's Legate, by the Lord High-Chancellor the Bishop of Winchester; when the Cardinal, after a long oration, solemnly absolved them, and received the People of England once more into the bosom of the Catholick Church (m). By these gradations all things were brought back to their old situation; and the sanguinary laws, for repressing what they called Heresy, revived and carried into execution. Thus the Bishop of Winchester paid the full price of his exaltation to the Ministry, and obtained, in spite of all difficulties, all that the Queen had desired (n). But the joy ensuing on this was quickly troubled by the bloody persecution set on foot in almost all parts of the kingdom (o), whether by the advice, and with the entire concurrence, of the Bishop of Winchester, as many Historians affirm, it is but just should be more largely discussed [FF] than the bounds of this

* several other bills were prepared against the Lollards, and for the six articles, but none of them passed, nor nothing material was enacted, besides a confirmation of former attainders, and the restoration of the Bishoprick of Durham. So the Parliament was dissolved on the twenty fifth day of May.

[FF] It is but just, should be more largely discussed ] We have more than once touched this matter of the wrong imputations upon this Bishop, for his cruelty to the Protestants, and promised to speak of it more at large. It is fit this promise should be executed, the rather, because in most of our histories, his character is represented as very odious in this respect. In the first place we shall observe, that there is a double charge against him, that he was the author of the Doctrine of Persecution in Queen Mary's reign; and next, that he was active and zealous in carrying this doctrine into execution; with respect to the former it is very positively asserted, that when Pole advised the Queen to rely upon fair means for bringing men back to the Romish Church, to reform the lives of the Clergy, and to take other steps of the same mild nature; Bishop Gardiner opposed this, and prevailed so far, as to bring the Queen to consent, that the weapons of the Law, rather than the arguments of the Gospel, should be employed to reduce Hereticks to the Catholick Church. This, Bishop Burnet having transcribed from others, adds, that this advice proceeded from his own abject and servile spirit (76).

With respect to particulars, he is charged to have condemned Dr Robert Farrar, Bishop of St Davids, who was burnt with great cruelty in Wales; the like accusation we find with respect to Dr John Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, with this aggravating circumstance, that it proceeded from private resentment for what Hooper had done against him in the former reign. To him, is chiefly ascribed the burning Father Latimer, once Bishop of Worcester, and Dr Nicholas Ridley, Bishop of London; and he is farther said to have been a persecutor of Archbishop Cranmer, with a view of getting into his Archbishoprick; and that it was no better motive than this, which afterwards engaged him to protect and prolong that prelate's life, in order to defeat the views and expectations of Cardinal Pole, and thereby gain time for himself to equal him in one, to deprive him of another, and to supplant him in a third dignity, by procuring from Pope Paul the Fourth, a Cardinal's hat with the Legantine Power, and his nomination to the See of Canterbury, which would indeed have rendered him not equal only, but superior to his master Wolsey. Besides these, there are many lighter imputations, such as his driving abroad the Dukes of Suffolk, and other Protestants of distinction, by his menaces, and threats; and his expressing the most violent resentment against the exiles in general, though he well knew that they only fled to be out of the reach of his severity.

After reporting fairly what has been asserted, in order to render the portrait of this great man as hideous and deformed as it is possible, we are obliged in justice to consider what may be said in extenuation, both of the general and particular charges, and in doing this, we shall content ourselves with appealing to the common sense and candour of the intelligent and attentive reader, and the authorities of Protestant writers; for as to the Papists, they exceed as much on the other hand, and bestow upon him praises as little consistent with truth, as the flaming invectives of some of his enemies, so that no man of an impartial disposition, can ever prevail upon himself to give an implicit belief to either. It is this narrative will allow. Certain it is, that, to this time, our Prelate had not discovered any thing of this disposition. He is indeed reputed, by many of our Historians, a great dissembler strange that the Bishop of Winchester should oppose the milder measures of Pole, when he came over veiled with legantine power, considering, that before he had this, that prelate himself was possessed of almost equal authority, which he exercised in quite another manner. We have observed in the text, that the House of Commons in the second Parliament of Queen Mary's reign, expressed a furious zeal for the old religion, and had actually prepared a bill for reviving the old Law of the six Articles, the passing which was prevented by the dissolution of that Parliament when Gardiner was Prime-Minister (77). Of this law the Protestants in general were so much afraid, that John Fox, in the name of the exiles, penned an epistle in Latin to the Parliament, in which he told them they had a Queen, who, as she was most noble, she was ready to listen to sound and wholesome counsel; and that they had a Chancellor too, who, as he was learned, so he was not of a rough nature, if uninfluenced by the counsels of others. His own words are very elegant and pathetick, Porro, habetis ad hoc Reginam, ut Nobilissimam, ita ad sana & salubria quaeque obsequacem Principem. Habetis & Cancellarium, ut doctrina praestabilem, ita natura non improbum, siquorum absint concilia. He goes on to insinuate, that as among animals there are some born to create trouble and mischief to the rest; so there wanted not of mankind, a race by nature turbulent and cruel, and formed to disturb and destroy, by their intrigues, both Church and State. It was from them therefore that Fox and his associates then dreaded those mischiefs that afterwards followed. But it is strange logick to infer, that because Bishop Gardiner, by a hasty dissolution of that Parliament, prevented that bill from passing, therefore he was the author of cruel counsels, and not the person, who by an Act of another Parliament, had the power of persecuting put into his hands.

Before the proceedings of the Protestant Bishops for religion, the Popish Prelates, who were to persecute, went not to Westminster, or Winchester House, but to Lambeth (78), where they received their instructions, and all the bloody things that were afterwards done, were done by commissions from the person, who is said to have given those mild counsels; and it is acknowledged, even by Bishop Burnet, who makes Gardiner the author of these cruelties, that he grew very soon weary of them, and refused to have any farther hand in them, reproaching Bonner for his butcher-like disposition, in pursuing them as he did (79). Would it not have been natural in Bonner and his associates to vindicate the Cardinal and themselves, by recriminating; and if they had done so, is it possible that the world should not have heard of it? besides, in another proceeding, when the prisoner charged the Bishops with misleading the Queen, and drawing her against her will to these severe courses, they very roundly asserted the contrary, and that themselves were rather compelled by her (80).

Indeed whatever is said from John Fox, of Gardiner's giving cruel advice, is in a good measure contradicted by what Strype delivers from the authority of records, and of the directions from Lambeth before-mentioned, which it is necessary we should produce for our own justification (81). 'In these instructions, there are several strictures, that make it appear, Pole was not so gentle towards the Hereticks (as the professors of the Gospel were then stiled) as is reported, but rather the contrary, and that he went hand in hand with the bloody Bishops of these days. For it is plain here, that he put the Bishops upon proceeding with them according to the sanguinary laws lately revived, and put in full force and virtue. What an invention was that of his, a kind of Inquisition, by him set up, whereby, not a man might escape, that stood not well affected to Popery? I mean, his ordering books to be made and kept, wherein the names of all such were to be written, that in every place and parish in England were reconciled; and so, whoe'er were not found in those books, might be known to be no friends to the Pope, and so to be proceeded against. And indeed, after Pole's crafty and zealous management of this reconciliation, all that good opinion that men had before conceived of him vanished, and they found themselves much mistaken in him, especially seeing so many learned and pious Gospel Bishops and Ministers imprisoned, and martyred under him, and by his commission. Info-much, that now people spake of him, as bad as of the Pope himself, or the worst of his Cardinals.'

We will now proceed to the particular charges. As to Dr Robert Farrar, the account given of him by Bishop Godwin, who lived in those times, and knew well what he wrote, is this (82). 'He was a man of a rigid temper and rough behaviour, which drew on him much trouble, even in King Edward's days, and was now perhaps his destruction: for having been preferred to that dignity by the Duke of Somerset, after his death, this good and learned man, by the unhappy moroseness of his manners, which even bordered upon arrogance, raised against himself accusations. Two of these, who were Bishops afterwards under Queen Elizabeth, easily prevailed with the faction against Somerset, to get Farrar imprisoned. Thus being in custody at Queen Mary's accession to the throne, he was brought before the Bishop of Winchester, and 'tis very probable, that by a little temper in his answers, and a discreet regard to the times, he might have saved himself, without wrong to his integrity, from the hands of bloody men, as several had done, who were not engaged in the cause of Lady Jane, nor had any other way affronted the patrons of Popery, whose flight was therefore connived at, or if they were taken, they were soon discharged again, at the intercession of their friends. But Farrar, sway'd by his natural severity, and ungoverned passion, gave such bold and provoking answers to the Bishops, that it is not to be admired it went so hard with him.' It is therefore his commitment only, that is to be attributed to the Bishop of Winchester; for as to his trial, conviction, and the terrible cruelties afterwards exercised on him, they are to be placed to the account of Dr Morgan, Bishop of St Davids; however, from the foregoing account, it appears, that Bishop Godwin, thought with John Fox that Gardiner was not naturally ill tempered, and that a little civility, which certainly is not incompatible with Christianity, might have opened a passage to this Prelate to escape the flames.

In reference to Bishop Hooper, we are told by Strype (83), that he was extremely hated by Gardiner, not only as an earnest reformer of religion, but for having been one of the witnesses against him in the time of King Edward. For this, it is said, that he was exceedingly ill used in prison. Bishop Godwin gives another account of this matter; he says, that he had been very instrumental in procuring Bonner's deprivation (84), and adds, which now probably proved his ruin; it is very likely from hence, that Mr Strype put Gardiner for Bonner, and though he tells us afterwards, that he transcribed the circumstances he mentions from a letter of Bishop Hooper, in which he stiles Gardiner, God's enemy and mine; yet as that letter is not placed in his appendix, we have no opportunity of seeing whether Gardiner is there mentioned by name, or whether the person to whom that character is given, is not left to be discovered from circumstances, which point us not to Gardiner, but to Bonner. It cannot however be denied, that the Bishop of Winchester sat in judgment upon this Prelate, in the church of St Mary Overs, near his own house, but then he sat as a Commissioner, with twelve other Bishops; and though Mr Strype does not insist upon what was said by any of the rest, yet he admits that Winchester both offered a pardon, and laboured all he could to convince Hooper, that nothing dangerous to his conscience, was expected from him; which proposition he rejected with great disdain, and the Bishop of Winchester, as his commission obliged him, pronounced sentence.

In this, without doubt, he acted severely, and against the sentiments of humanity; but as things were circumstanced, it is not easy to see how he could act otherwise, or how the blood of Bishop Hooper, lay more at his door, than that of the other Bishops, or the blood dissembler (p); but in this acted quite another part. In all publick transactions he professed himself always of the same opinion with the Council, and did not aim at screening himself from popular odium, by putting on a cloke of moderation. But, in all the trials, where, by virtue of Cardinal Pole's commission, he was obliged to be, he was exceedingly assiduous to shew the prisoners, that, in the matter of the Real Presence, which was most insisted on, they might easily save their lives, by complying with subscriptions drawn in very general terms; till, by foul language, they convinced him that he had to do with men who were as little to be wheedled as frightened out of their principles (q). This surely proves that he was not desirous of severities, or persecuted for the sake of gratifying a cruel temper, or to revenge past injuries (r). And that such Protestants as were of milder natures, and content to reserve themselves for better times, when driven to distress were well received by him, and not barely screened but encouraged and protected, without offering any violence to their consciences farther than locking them up, and committing the key to the custody of their own discretions, I may very safely affirm is a point out of dispute (s) [GG]. But now, after the coming of Cardinal Pole, it is not impossible that of others put to death under colour of Heresy, in the time of Henry the Eighth; at the doors of such Bishops, as afterwards changed their sentiments, and became Martyrs for the same opinion that those held, whom they formerly condemned. These were dismal and dreadful times, when a zeal, that was certainly not according to knowledge, prevailed strongly in the minds of men, and induced them, under the colour of promoting the Gospel, to act exactly in the same manner as the Jews did against those who first preached it. It may however be inferred from hence, that being a vice of the times, it ought not, with peculiar vehemence, to be ascribed to any particular man. Bishop Gardiner, to be sure, had his share in these barbarous proceedings, yet he had but his share, and ought not therefore to bear all the reproach.

Bishop Burnet says, that by this time he was convinced, severity would not do, and that refusing to meddle any more with condemnations, he left them to Bonner (85). Yet it was some months after this, that Latimer and Ridley were burnt at Oxford; with which, the Bishop of Winchester, is by the same writers, reported to be highly pleased, and to have been so eager to receive the news, that he delayed his dinner till the post came in (86); which how well founded a report it is, we shall hereafter have occasion to enquire. In the mean time let it be observed, how the same writers vary this man's character, he had borne five years imprisonment in the reign of King Edward, besides the loss of his Bishoprick and all his other preferments, rather than stoop to make a submission; and yet his advising these cruelties, is ascribed to his servile and abject temper, apt to be wrought on by the same means. Then he becomes a brutal persecutor, taking pleasure in the miseries and misfortunes, not only of his fellow creatures, but of some who had been his intimate acquaintance; yet the acts, or judicial proceedings, plainly prove, that he took all the pains in his power to persuade those who were tried before him to accept of pardon. At length, it is said, he was thoroughly distasted at persecution, because he saw it did not answer his end; but instead of drawing the people to, drove them from Popery; and yet we find him some months after, having a better stomach to the blood and slaughter of men, with whom he had lived before in intimacy, than to his dinner: this is not only to make him a bad man, but a beast, and those who would be inclined to believe him ever so wicked, will find it hard to reconcile this to his weakness, or that again to the great things which he performed, or the character he had with some of the best and wisest amongst the Protestants.

In respect to Cranmer, all that is said of the Bishop of Winchester's conduct toward him, is upon a supposition of the original author's tergiversity, in judging of that Prelate's thought, and penetrating into the secrets of his heart; for no body has the confidence to say, that he owned he preserved Cranmer's life to spite Pole, or to get possession of his See, to which, by the way, Bishops of Winchester rarely aspire. Let us now hear a few things on the other side. Very soon after King Edward's death, a rumour prevailed, as if the Archbishop had changed his sentiments (87); in answer to which, he drew up a kind of Manifesto, which was published without his consent, by the indiscretion of his friends. Upon this, he was brought before the Council where Gardiner presided, there he boldly owned the paper, said, he meant to have enlarged and strengthened it, and to have posted it upon the gates of St Paul's. He was, notwithstanding this, discharged, contrary to all men's expectations, but by the Bishop of Winchester's advice; and if the Archbishop had followed the counsel of his friends he might then have withdrawn; we are farther assured, that Gardiner proposed removing him from his dignity, and allowing him a pension for his support in a private state of life. When he was attainted of High-Treason by Parliament, for the share he had in Queen Jane's business, he had a pardon granted him. Such was the treatment of this great Prelate, while Gardiner had the sole direction of affairs; and after this, when the supreme power in Ecclesiastical affairs was transferred to Cardinal Pole, he had still authority enough to preserve the Archbishop's life, and it is allowed that he did preserve it, and there let the matter rest.

As to the Duchesse of Suffolk, what is related concerning her, runs thus (88). 'This lady being most zealous for the Reformation in the reign of King Edward the Sixth, Stephen Gardiner, after that he was restored to his Bishoprick of Winchester, by Queen Mary, sent for her husband in the first year of her reign, and amongst some questions touching his religion, asked, Whether the Lady, his wife, was now as ready to set up Mass, as she had been to pull it down, when in her progress, she caused a dog in a rocket, to be carried, and called by his name? whereupon, being advertised by his friends, that the Bishop meant to call the Duchesse, his wife, to an account of her Faith; and foreseeing danger, he procured the Queen's licence to travel beyond sea, under colour of such debts as were due from the Emperor, to the late Duke of Suffolk, his Lady's former husband. And having obtained it, passed the seas at Dover, in June the same year, leaving her behind, who in January following, went disguised from her house in Barbican, and passing to Leigh in Essex, privately took shipping, and after much danger met her husband in the Duchy of Cleves.' If there was any thing harsh in what the Bishop said to Mr Bertie, it must consist in putting him in mind of an action no ways suitable to that great Lady's quality. It is not pretended, that the Bishop of Winchester, either impeded their retreat, or persecuted them after they were abroad; it is true, that some injuries were afterwards offered them, which obliged them to fly, with some hazard to their lives, but this was after the Bishop of Winchester was in his grave.

We are also told, that the Bishop frightened the famous John Fox (89) out of England, at a time, when he was tutor to the Duke of Norfolk's grand-children; but as in this matter, all is ascribed to Fox's own suspicion, though it might be a reason why he did not easily forgive that Prelate, yet it ought not to reflect any stain upon his character. After all, what is here collected remains entirely under the censure of the reader, who in every case, without question, will distinguish which are facts, and which are conjectures.

[GG] Is a point not to be disputed There was, without doubt, very great confusion amongst those that had made a figure in the court of King Edward the the Archbishop of Canterbury being deprived, and he nominated to that See (t), with the legantine authority in his hands, Gardiner might have less weight in ecclesiastical affairs, more especially if, as some say, Queen Mary considered him rather as a Statesman than a Priest, and looked on Pole as a Confessor for religion, and a Saint in morals (u). If this was at all the case, Bishop Gardiner did wisely not to contend with him; for, besides the privilege of his high birth, and his dignity, it was visible enough that he would be supported by a great party amongst the Clergy, and the hot men in the House of Commons, who, by restoring the Pope's supremacy, and reviving the laws against Herefy, had made that cause their own. At least there is something so probable in this, and it accounts so well

Sixth, and who were sincerely Protestants, when they saw Queen Mary fixed upon the throne, and how strong her inclinations were to the Popish Religion. But however, there were some very eminent men, who by behaving with great moderation and decency, preserved themselves from trouble, without making shipwreck of their consciences; and of these, not a few stood indebted for their safety, and something more, to the protection afforded them by the Bishop of Winchester. Amongst these was Sir William Cecil (90), afterwards the great Lord Burleigh, who had been twice Secretary of State, and of whom it was suggested, that he furnished the reasons of policy set forth in his master's will, in favour of Queen Jane. Some troubles he met with, which were not very sharp, but lived afterwards, not only in peace and honour, but might also have been Secretary again if he would have complied; and tho' he declined this, because of the condition, yet it was without incurring the Queen's displeasure, or the loss of Gardiner's friendship, with whom he went over to Calais, in the last year of that Prelate's life, and remained upon perfect good terms with him to the last.

Sir Thomas Smith, who was also Secretary to King Edward, was, by the favour of Gardiner, permitted to live in a state of learned privacy, which he affected, without any enquiry into his religious principles, and with a pension of one hundred pounds a year, which in those times was a considerable sum, for his better support (91), though he had a good estate of his own. Yet both Cecil and Smith had formerly opposed the Bishop one at Court, and the other at the University, but without any thing of rudeness or asperity; which Gardiner was so far from remembering, that he treated them both with the utmost kindness and respect. We may add to these, the celebrated Mr Ascham, another Secretary for the Latin tongue, continued in his office, as indeed he well deserved, and his salary increased by this Prelate's favour, which he fully repaid, by those grateful and elegant epistles to him, that are extant among his works, which do equal honour to both, and which will be read with pleasure, as long as there continues any taste for stile or sentiment. But let us hear how honest Mr Strype represents this matter, with respect both to Smith and Ascham, his words are these (92).

'This must be remembered to this Bishop's commendation, among the many evil things that asperse and blacken his name to this day. Nor must the like favour, or a greater, be forgotten by him, shewn to such another learned and grave Protestant, friend, and contemporary with Smith, I mean Roger Ascham, which I must have leave to mention here. Whom the Bishop of Winchester did not only spare, but called to Court, and preferred to be Secretary of the Latin tongue to Queen Mary. Whom for his learning in the languages, and incomparable faculty of a clean stile and beautiful writing, he greatly loved, and obliged with many benefits. And when Sir Francis Engfield, Master of the Wards and Liveries, a fierce Papist, had often cried out upon Ascham to the Bishop, as an Heretick, and fit to be rejected and punished as such; he never would hearken to him, either to punish him, or remove him from his place. Thus lived two excellent Protestants, under the wings, as it were, of the sworn enemy and destroyer of Protestants, Ascham and Smith, to whom we now return again.'

The same plain spoken writer, in an account he gives us of the adventures of one Underhill, a gentleman of the Band of Pensioners, and a zealous Protestant, has the following passage, which happened when the Queen was going to be married (93). 'Then was there preparing, says he, to go with the Queen to Winchester: and all the books of the ordinaries were perused by the Bishop of Winchester and the Earl of Arundel, two great Papists, to consider of every man, And one would think Underhill should have hardly escaped now. Sir Humphry Radcliff, Lieutenant of the Band, brought unto them the book of the Pensioners. Which when they overlooked, and came unto Underhill's name, what doth he here, said the Earl of Arundel? I know no cause why he should not be here, said Radcliffe, who also was secretly a favourer of the Gospel. He is an honest man, and hath served from the beginning of the Band, and was as forward as any to serve the Queen, in the time of Wyatt's rebellion. Let him pass then, said the Bishop. Well, said the Earl, you may do so, but I assure your Lordship, he is an arch-heretick. Thus he passed the brunt.'

This is a strange proof of our author's position, that Bishop Gardiner was a great, that is, a bigotted Papist; and the ingenious Dr Fuller, has no less strange a proof of his being a most invenomed persecutor; perhaps the reader will not be displeased to see that too, thus then our Ecclesiastical Historian writes (94).

'In the diocese of Winchester, consisting of Hampshire and Surrey, I find no great impression from Stephen Gardiner the Bishop, and much marvel thereat. It may be, this Politician, who managed his malice with cunning, spared his own diocese, fox like, preying farthest from his own den; indeed he would often stay behind the traverse, and send Bonner upon the stage; free enough of himself, without spurring, to do mischief, to act what he had contrived. Yea, I may say of Gardiner, that he had an head, if not an hand, in the death of every eminent Protestant; plotting, though not acting, their destruction. And being Lord Chancellor of England, he counted it his honour to flie at stout game indeed, contriving the death of the Lady Elizabeth, and using to say, that it was vain to strike at the branches, whilst the root of all Hereticks doth remain. And this good Lady was appointed for the slaughter, and brought to the shambles, when the seasonable death of this butcher, saved the sheep alive.

'However, as bloody as he was, for mine own part I have particular gratitude to pay to the memory of this Stephen Gardiner, and here I solemnly tender the same. It is on the account of Mrs Clarke, my great-grand-mother, by my mother's side, whose husband rented Farnham-Castle, a place whither Bishop Gardiner retired, in Surry, as belonging to his See. This Bishop, sensible of the consumptionous state of his body, and finding physick out of the kitchen, more beneficial for him than that out of the Apothecaries shop, and special comfort from the cordials she provided him, did not only himself connive at her herefy, as he termed it, but also protected her, during his life, from the fury of others. Some will say, this his curtesie to her, was founded on kindness to himself. But however, I am so far from detaining thanks, from any deserved on just cause, that I am ready to pay them, where they are but pretended due on any colour.' Our Historian is certainly in the right, a good thing done (upon whatever motive) ought to be remembered; men, can judge of men, only by their actions, as to their intentions, they belong to a higher tribunal, and consequently not to us. If once we desert this rule, the reader is at the mercy of the author, it is but suggesting right motives for wrong deeds, and the malefactor becomes a hero, or giving foul colours to fair facts, and the hero is turned into a malefactor.

well for the subsequent behaviour of the Chancellor, that it certainly deserves to be impartially considered [HH]. Towards the close of the year, it was strongly reported, and indeed generally believed, that the Queen was with child, for which rejoicings were made, and prayers appointed for her safe delivery. The Chancellor made a right use of this wrong notion; he persuaded her Majesty to set several prisoners at liberty, that had been near a year in confinement, and for that purpose went in person to the Tower (w), January the eighteenth 1555, and discharged the Archbishop of York, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Sir Edward Warner, Sir George Harper, Sir William Saintlow, Sir Gawin Carew, Sir Andrews Dudley, William Gibs, Cuthbert Vaughan, John Harrington, Esqrs. Mr Tremain, and others. One of these had a little before taken the liberty of expostulating with him very freely, notwithstanding which he had (beyond his expectations perhaps) his liberty amongst the rest. His son has given us, an account of this adventure, some passages (x) relating to Bishop Gardiner very well worth notice [II].

[HH] Deserves to be impartially considered] There is nothing more manifest in this reign, than the great change of measures which followed, after the coming over of Cardinal Pole, and the nation's submitting again to the Papal authority. It was upon this, that the persecution began, in virtue of a law passed the same session, with that for reversing the Cardinal's attainder, and restoring the Pope's supremacy. Cardinal Pole has the credit of absolving the Parliament, and the nation, as it were freely, and at the first word; but the truth is, that it was against his will. He was desirous, that the kingdom should remain under an interdict, till all who had received holy orders irregularly, or had otherwise offended the Church, should be reconciled, which Gardiner over-ruled; and in consequence of this, such of the Clergy as complied, continued in their functions, without any new ordination; this does not very well agree, either with Pole's proposing moderate measures, or Bishop Gardiner's opposing them (95).

Whoever looks closely into the History of that reign, and depends only upon facts, will find that the Bishop of Winchester's authority, was very far from being uncontroled after the coming of Cardinal Pole, and his having the Queen's ear, and of this he gave himself some intimations, and that too in publick. He observed at one of the trials, that returning to the obedience of the See of Rome, was almost the unanimous act of the House of Commons, one member only opposing it, and that was Sir Ralph Bagnall, who publickly and plainly declared, that it was a thing to which he could never consent (96). Bishop Gardiner, by doing this, gave the Parliament the credit of those proceedings, which were the natural consequences of being reconciled to Rome, and which, in justice, ought to be ascribed to that reconciliation. At Rogers's tryal, when the prisoner imputed his sufferings to the advice the Bishops had given the Queen, Bishop Gardiner said, as has been before observed, that the Queen went before him in those counsels, appealing for the truth of this to all the rest, who affirmed it likewise. Rogers said, they might well vouch one for another (97), which was boldly and sensibly spoken. Yet from hence it appears, that the Chancellor had no inclination to pass for the author of those measures; and it is acknowledged, that he began to grow quickly weary of being the instrument of them, at the time, it is very probable, that the generality of the world ascribed them to him; for we are told, that Philpot conceived some hopes of life, upon the demise of this Prelate (98), which occasioned Bonner's saying, What, now the Chancellor is dead, you think there will be no more burning, but you'll find the contrary, which proved very true. Yet some say, that Bonner himself grew tired; however, the prosecutions went on to the very last week of the Queen and Cardinal's lives. Who then were the instigators?

King Philip took care to purge himself, and a Spanish Friar, who preached publickly before him, told the people, the Bishops did not extract this doctrine of fire and faggot from the Gospel. It is not easy to conceive upon what motive the Bishops should be general in their inclinations to these severities, and in truth, many of them were not; those that were, did it in compliance with the Court and the Queen, certainly shewed what she misunderstood to be zeal for the Catholick Religion, and from which she might have been diverted, as well as she had been in the beginning of her reign, if those who had her ear then, had been of the same sentiments with the Bishop of Winchester, who is allowed to have conducted all things in the first years of her government, when there were none of these severities.

Besides, Bishop Burnet is very express, that the Emperor was averse to the Cardinal's coming, and hindered it as long as he could; he assigns the reason, for that he was afraid of precipitating things, and having recourse to harsh measures, which were entirely against that Monarch's inclinations (99). While these suggestions had weight with the Queen, moderate measures were pursued; after the Cardinal came over, they were laid aside, one would think this should confirm the Emperor's opinion (100). But Pole made a great shew of moderation, affected to speak with much tenderness and compassion, and never took any share himself in this persecution, except issuing the commissions, under which all those severities were acted. Let us then consider what are the maxims of Italy in such cases; let us remember, that after Gardiner's death, at least, none had so much influence with the Queen as he, and let us reflect, that in the Court of Inquisition, that court which is the most dreadful, and therefore the most detested, the language is as merciful and mild, as the practice bloody and cruel. If we look into all these circumstances attentively, and weigh them maturely, we shall find, that they afford a kind of evidence at least as strong as that of one writer's transcribing another, with respect to the Bishop of Winchester's advice, without producing so much as one private paper, or publick record to prove it.

He complied with the Queen in compassing the reconciliation with Rome, that reconciliation produced a perfection; in that light, he was the author of it, but perhaps in no other, and though at first sight this may be considered as very favourably spoken of the Bishop of Winchester's memory, yet it will be found, and so it ought to be understood, a very indifferent excuse at bottom; he knew, from reason and experience, the spirit of that Church, and he ought, in pity to his countrymen, and in justice to his country, to have kept the Queen his mistress from that step, which put her into a road of stumbling, from whence it was impossible for her to recover.

[II] Very well worth notice.] The person hinted at in the text, is Sir John Harrington, of Kelston, who wrote for the use of Henry Prince of Wales, a kind of supplement to Bishop Godwin's Catalogue of English Bishops, and gives us therein an account of Bishop Gardiner's sending his father to the Tower, for carrying a letter to Queen Elizabeth, and obliging that Princess to discharge his mother for being a Heretick; but notwithstanding this, the reader will find he was no bitter enemy to that Prelate, but rather inclined to treat him, as a gentleman should, with impartiality and candour. Thus he writes (*), after transcribing some of the hard things that had been said of Gardiner, by the Martyrologist Fox and others.

The three months next ensuing, Bishop Gardiner was employed in carrying the laws lately revived against Hereticks into execution, and sat often (to his eternal disgrace), by virtue of a commission from Cardinal Pole as the Pope's Legate, at Winchester-House in South-wark, to examine such as were brought before him (y). Yet we are told that he soon grew weary, and would proceed no farther; upon which this cruel and invidious task was put upon Bonner; neither was it long before he grew relax, till quickened by orders from the Council, and other measures (z). The Queen, or it may be the Chancellor, foreseeing that sooner or later the nation might be obliged to take part in the war between the Emperor and the French King if it continued, it was resolved to send over Commissioners, of the highest rank, to a sort of congress that was to be held at Calais, in order to mediate a peace (a). Cardinal Pole went over on behalf of the Pope; the Bishop of Winchester, the Lord Arundel, and Lord Paget, on the Part of the Queen of England (b). They departed May the eighteenth 1555, and while they were employed in this negotiation the Pope died, and the Queen wrote most pressing letters to her Commissioners, to engage the powers with whom they were treating to consent that Cardinal Pole should be raised to the Papal Dignity (c). But neither in this, or any thing else, could her Ministers succeed; and therefore, after a fruitless stay of some weeks, at a great expence, returned upon the twenty-sixth of June (d). During the Chancellor's absence, the great seal was put into the hands of William Marquis of Winchester (e); and from the Council-books it appears, good use was made of it for stirring up the Persecution; for quickening of which, writ after writ was issued, and letters directed to the Nobility and Gentry, as well as Clergy, exciting them to give their attendance, with their servants, at the burning of Hereticks (f); so that we see this cruel flame raged most when the Bishop was abroad, and grew still higher after his death. Upon his coming home he declared plainly he would have no farther hand in severities, and therefore those apprehended in his diocese were removed into that of London, and so put under the jurisdiction of Bonner (g), who in a short time fell off again, and had fresh reprimands from the King and Queen for his relaxation and lenity. We may, from these instances, perceive that some made their court to the Queen by promoting those cruel proceedings, and that they were neither pressed, nor could be impeded, by the Bishop of Winchester (b). In matters of government his influence was still without diminution, and according to his advice a Parliament was summoned to meet in October (i); for it was one of his maxims, to have short sessions and frequent Parliaments. He had projected some additional security for Church and Abbey lands, which, by a well-timed address

' were beholden to him, with the House of Stanhope's, and the Lord Arundel of Warder; and I have heard old Sir Mathew Arundell say, that Bonner was more faulty than he, and that Gardiner would rate at him for it, and call him afs, for using poor men so bloodily; and when I would maintain the contrary, he would say, that my father was worthy to have lain in prison a year longer, for the faucy sonnet he wrote to him from out of the Tower; which sonnet, both because it was written in defence of Queen Elizabeth, and because, if I be not partial, it is no ill verse for those unrefined times, and toucheth the matter I enforce; I will here set down, pre-supposing, that in the eleven months before, he had sent him many letters and petitions full of reason, that could not prevail for his liberty. The distressed prisoner writeth this rime:'

I.

At last withdraw your cruelty,
Or force the times to work your will;
It is too much extremity,
To keep me pent in prison still.
Free from all fault, void of all cause,
Without all right against all laws.
How can you doe more cruel spight,
Than proffer wrong and promise right?
Nor can accuse nor will acquight.

II.

Eleven months past and longer space,
I have abid your divelish drifts;
While you have fought both man and place,
And set your snares with all your shifts;
The faultlesse foot to wrap in wile,
With any guile by any guile:
And now you see that will not be,
How can you thus for shame agree,
To keep him bound you can set free?

III.

Your chance was once as mine is now,
To keep this hold against your will;
And then you sware you know well how,
Though now you sweare, I know how ill.
But thus the world his course doth passe,
The Priest forgets a Clerk he was;
And you that then cry'd justice still,
And now have justice at your will,
Wrest justice wrong against all skill.

IV.

But why doe I thus coldly plaine,
As if it were my cause alone;
When cause doth each man so constraîne,
As England through hath cause to moane?
To see your bloody search of such,
Whom all the earth can no way touch,
And better were that all your kind,
Like hounds in Hell with shame were shrin'd,
Then you had might unto your mind.

V.

But as the stone that strikes the wall,
Sometimes bounds back on th' hurler's head;
So your foul fetch, to your foul fall,
May turn and noy the breast that bred.
And then such measure as you gave,
Of right and justice look to have.
If good or ill, if short or long,
If false or true, if right or wrong,
And thus till then I end my song.

dress from the Convocation to the Cardinal, which he put into his hands himself, he had in some measure preserved to all who possessed them; and this project was afterwards brought to bear by his friend Mr Secretary Petre (k). October the twenty-first 1555, he opened the session with a judicious speech, and was there again on the twenty-third, which was the last time of his appearing in that Assembly (l). Towards the close of this month he fell ill, and continued to grow worse and worse to the thirteenth of November 1555, when he departed this life, about the age of seventy-two (m). As to the time of his decease the dispute is not great about it, but the manner of it is far from being settled [KK].

[KK] But the manner of it is far from being settled. In those times, such was the eagerness and heat of most writers, that scarce any extraordinary person went to his grave without a prodigy. In that great Chronicle which goes under the name of Holinshed (101), tho' in the latter editions there was much added by Abraham Fleming, we have the following passage inserted from John Fox, and the reason that we take it from thence, is because this Chronicle being chiefly consulted by the abridgers of English History, the substance of this passage has been often retailed to the world for an undoubted truth.

During this session of Parliament, Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester and Chancellor of England, died at his house called Winchester-Palace, beside St Mary Overies in Southwark, the ninth day of November, whose corpse was shortly after solemnly thence conveyed to his church of Winchester, and there buried. The manner of whose death why should I blush to blaze as I find it by report. One Mistress Monday, being the wife of one Master Monday, Secretary some time to the old Lord Thomas Duke of Norfolk, a present witness of this that is testified thus, openly reported in the house of a worshipful citizen, bearing office in this city, in words and effect as followeth. The same day when as Bishop Ridley and Master Latimer suffered at Oxford, being about the nineteenth day of October, there came to the house of Stephen Gardiner the old Duke of Norfolk, with the aforesaid Monday, his Secretary above named, reporter hereof. The old aged Duke there waiting and tarrying for his dinner, the Bishop being not yet disposed to dine, deferred the time till three or four of the clock at afternoon. At length, about four of the clock, cometh his servant posting in all possible speed from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the Bishop what he had heard and seen, of whom the said Bishop diligently enquiring the truth of the matter, and hearing by his man that fire most certainly was set unto them, cometh out rejoicing to the Duke. Now, faith he, let us go to dinner; whereupon they being set down, meat immediately was brought, and the Bishop began merrily to eat: but what followed: The bloody tyrant had not eaten a few-bits, but the sudden stroke of God his terrible hand fell upon him, in such sort as immediately he was taken from the table, and so brought to his bed, where he continued the space of fifteen days, in such intolerable anguish and torments, that all that mean while, during those fifteen days, he could not avoid, by ordure, or urine, or otherwise, any thing that he received; whereby his body being miserably inflamed within, who had inflamed so many good martyrs before, was brought to a wretched end. And thereof, no doubt, as most like it is, came the thrusting out of his tongue, so swollen and black with the inflammation of his body. A spectacle worthy to be noted, and beholden, of all such bloody burning persecutors. But whatsoever he was, seeing he is now gone, I refer him to his Judge, to whom he shall stand or fall. As concerning his death, and manner thereof, I would they which were present thereat would testify to us what they saw. This we have all to think, that his death happened so opportunely, that England hath a mighty cause to give thanks to the Lord therefore; not so much for the great hurt he had done in times past, in perverting his Princess, in bringing in the six articles, in murdering God's Saints, in defacing Christ's sincere religion, &c. as also, especially, for that he had thought to have brought to pass in murdering also our noble Queen that now is. For whatsoever danger it was of death that she was in, it did no doubt proceed from that bloody Bishop, who was the cause thereof. And if it be certain, which we have heard, that her Highness being in the Tower, a writ came down from certain of the Council for her execution, it is out of controversy that wilie Winchester was the only Dedalus and framer of that engine. Who no doubt in that one day had brought this whole realm into woful ruin, had not the Lord's most gracious Council, thorough Master Bridges, then the Lieutenant, coming in haste to the Queen, certified her of the matter, and prevented Achitophel's bloody devices. For the which thanks be to the same our Lord and Saviour, in the congregation of all English churches, amen.

There are many exceptions to the truth of this account, which, in common justice to this Prelate's memory, ought to be mentioned. Mr Strype very justly observes, that both the time and place of his death are mistaken; since he did not die on the ninth, but on the thirteenth of November, at two in the morning; neither did he die at Winchester-House, but in Westminster (102). Yet Mr Strype does not observe another mistake, which is that of the day when Latimer and Ridley suffered at Oxford, which was not on the nineteenth of October, but on the sixteenth; so that here is at least a week gained towards making the judgment more probable. Then the suppression of urine is expressly said to have continued fifteen days; whereas, according to his manner of stating it, it must have lasted one and twenty at least; and had the story been true, and the dates rightly placed, it must have lasted twenty-seven.

This, however, is not all; the Bishop of Winchester, as Chancellor, opened the new Parliament on the twenty-first of October, and was there again on the twenty-third, a week after the death of the two martyrs; at whose death it is not likely he should rejoice, if what Heylin says be true, that he studied to prevent it (103). One of the exiles abroad, who laboured to expose Gardiner all in his power, charges him with straining his authority, in offering Latimer a pardon without the knowledge of the Queen or Council (104). But to come closer to the point, the old Duke of Norfolk, who waited so long for his dinner, as his Secretary reported, who waited with him, died in the month of September 1554, that is, thirteen months before this transaction happened (105). His death was a thing of great notoriety, the Queen and Court, out of respect to his memory, going into mourning. One would think that Fox might have known this as well as another, since he lived long in that Duke's family, and went abroad but a very little before his death.

In reference to the latter part of this account, it may not be amiss to observe, that the honest and impartial Historian John Speed, who was furnished with the best materials from some of the most considerable persons in this kingdom, ascribes the ill usage of the Princess Elizabeth, and the advice given to take her off, to the Lord Pagett (106); and asserts, that King Philip was ever after dissident of him, and those of his party. A certain Popish writer does indeed pretend to let us into the secret of the affair; he says, that Sir Thomas Wiat's plan for an insurrection, was sent to the Lady Elizabeth in a bracelet; that this was discovered by the Bishop of Winchester, but that he pushed it no farther than to persuade her to submit herself to the Queen. But the silence of Camden, in the account he gives of her sufferings before her accession to the Crown, as to all these facts, leaves them not a little doubtful.

It must be acknowledged, that Fox is not the only author that has given the manner of his death the air of a judgment, for John Bale (107) goes even farther than he, affirming that he was informed by a letter

He died at the royal palace of Whitehall, about one in the morning; and about three the same morning, his body was carried over to Winchester-House, from whence the funeral was performed (n). His death was a great loss to the Queen his mistress, who found no Minister that could manage her affairs so well, or keep her on so good terms with her Parliaments, from whom, during his administration, she received nothing, but lived upon the settled ordinary revenue of the Crown, with some help it may be from the treasure brought over by King Philip. But this course was speedily altered, and from that hour dissatisfaction and complaints began (o). The Clergy had also a great loss in him; they depended much on his wisdom, and no less on his experience, but most of all on his caution and due regard for the law, by which they might be kept out of the reach of a premonition; nor did he deceive their expectations in this, taking care while he lived that Cardinal Pole should do nothing within this realm, but by authority under the broad seal of England as well as that of St Peter (p). Those who were affectionate to that government had a great loss in him, for he kept things together; and, by steering steadily and keeping a good countenance, preserved a degree of respect which can never be preserved where there is a fluctuation of Councils. His pen also was of no small use, since in polemical writings he was inferior to none of his contemporaries, and with one party (few have it with more) had a high reputation for learning from the many books he had penned, of which something will be said at the bottom of the page [LL]. The freedom taken in displaying this character wrote out of England, 'that his disease was hydrops acidus & prodigiosus scabies, a sharp dropsy and prodigious leprosy, taken, as was commonly reported, by drinking or whoredom. For he had indulged much to both those vices in his life-time. In his sickness he stunk like a jakes, his breath not to be endured, his body distended, his eyes distorted and turned inwards; during his illness he spake little but blasphemy and filthiness, and gave up the ghost with curses in his mouth, in terrible and unexpressible torments, &c.' He likewise adds, that he left thirty thousand pounds in ready money behind him, besides plate and rich furniture.

Dr Thomas Cooper, who was himself Bishop of Winchester in Queen Elizabeth's time, and published his Chronicle within five years after Gardiner's death, sets it down simply, and without any of these strange circumstances (108). He charges the death of Latimer and Ridley expressly upon Cardinal Pole; and tho' he gives a very particular account of the ill usage of the Lady Elizabeth, yet he does not ascribe it in the least to Gardiner. Dr Francis Godwin, Bishop of Hereford (109), assures us that he died of the Gout. Dr Fuller (110), as we have seen, ascribes his end to a consumption. In a book compiled by the direction of Archbishop Parker (111), he is also said to have died of the gout or rheumatism; the lower parts of his body being mortified, smelt very offensively. We are told by Bishop Burnet (112), 'he had great remorse for his former life; and Day, Bishop of Chichester, coming to him, and comforting him with the assurance of justification through the blood of Christ, he answered him he might speak of that to him, or others in his condition, but if he opened that gap again, and preached that to the people, then farewell all together. He often repeated those words, Erravi cum Petro, sed non flevi cum Petro; I have erred with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter.'

[LL] At the bottom of the page] It is, without doubt, a very difficult task to attempt giving the reader an account of the writings of this Prelate; some few of them indeed were published with his name, and concerning them there is no dispute. Others are without any name, and yet there are good reasons to induce us to believe they fell from his pen; and others again have the names of other men set before them, tho' they were in reality penned by this Bishop. We will, however, handle the matter as well as we can, and give the reader as just and as correct a catalogue of his writings, as the best enquiry we could make has put in our power.

The first piece made publick by our author, was his treatise De vera Obedientia, i. e. Of true Obedience, Lond. 1534, 1535, 4to. at Hamburgh in 1536, 8vo. with Bishop Bonner's epistle prefixed, in which several strong things are contained against the Pope's supremacy, and in support of the King's divorce from Queen Katherine. We have before told the reader the nature of this work, which induced the author to speak rather as an Orator than as a Logician; yet some of his arguments are not easily answered, tho' delivered with great plainness and moderation. He suggests, that the policy of the Church, in every kingdom, was partly spiritual and partly temporal; that, with respect to the former powers, they came from God; and for the latter, since they could not be executed without the consent, so it is impossible they should come but from the Civil magistrate. He urges, that Princes lose their sovereign dignity if they are not supreme in all causes over their subjects, and that therefore their supremacy makes a part of their sovereignty; when therefore novelty is objected to this doctrine, he says it goes no farther than this, that a new term is employed in speaking of an old right. He positively asserts, that St Peter's supremacy cannot be proved by Scripture; that the Bishoprick of Jerusalem was yielded by him, and the rest of the Apostles, to St James, the brother of our Lord; and that if, on particular occasions, St Peter acted as chief of the Apostles, it was owing to the deference they had for his extraordinary conduct and courage, which being personal qualities, could not convey any right to his successors. In the close he puts an objection against himself, it might be said there was no agreement between his book and his practice; he had undertaken to press obedience, and failed notoriously in that branch of his duty. He had engaged his subjection to the Court of Rome, sworn submission to the Pope and his successors, and solemnly obliged himself to defend the privileges and jurisdiction of the Apostolick See. He received his episcopal character by the Pope's consent, and was consecrated by his mandate; and yet, after all these ties and assurances, he has ventured to write against his supremacy, and renounce him in the most publick manner. To take off the imputation of falsehood and perjury, he observes, that an engagement against right is by no means binding. For an oath was never intended a bond of iniquity, and a bar against repentance. He illustrates his case by a husband's marrying a second wife, living the former, whom after the best enquiry he concluded dead. Thus he continued undisturbed in his second marriage: and when his first wife returned from a foreign country, and challenged him for her husband, he denied the relation. But after she had made out her claim by legal proof, he lived with her again, and dismissed the second. This instance the Bishop applies to his own case. He thought the Pope's authority unquestionable at first, and submitted accordingly. But when truth appeared he found himself mistaken, and therefore ought not to be charged with breach of faith for altering his measures. There were many other editions of this work, and a translation into English, printed abroad in Queen Mary's time, by one Dr Turner, with a most vindictive preface before it; as also some additions, with intent to expose the Bishop's inconsistency, who had now submitted again to the Pope.

character from the evidence of facts, and supporting what is advanced by the clearest authorities, might in some degree dispense with our offering to sum up at the close what has been

A necessary Doctrine and Eradition for any Christenman, set furthe by the Kynges Majestie of England, &c. Lond by Thomas Birthelet, 1543; this, as we have said before, was published with roval authority; and Mr Strype, in giving us the history of this peece, which was the system of religion in King Henry's time, allows the Bishop of Winchester but a very small share in it; yet, in King Edward's time, Archbishop Cranmer was for yielding him the whole merit of the work; and his report was so much credited, that John Bale put it into the catalogue of our author's writings, in which he has been followed by Bishop Tanner; yet there is a passage in the declaration, concerning the life and actions of the Archbishop, written by his Secretary Mr Morris, still preserved in Bennet College Library at Cambridge (113); which is not very consistent with this account, and which is reported here only to shew how very difficult a thing it is to come at certainty, with respect to matters of fact, even from those who one would think must have been best acquainted with them.

(113) This Declaration is a very curious piece, and deserves to be printed entire.

'At what time, says he, the book of articles of our religion was new penned. For even at that season, the whole rabblement, which he took to be his friends, being Commissioners with him, forsook him, and his opinion and doctrine. And so leaving him post alone, revolted altogether on the part of Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester. As by name, Bishop Hethe, Shaxton, Day, and all other of the meaner sort. By whom these so named were chiefly advanced and preferred unto dignities. And yet this sudden inversion, notwithstanding God gave him such favour with his Princee, that book altogether past by his assertion against all their minds. More to be marvelled at, the time considered, than by any reason to compass how it should come to pass. For then would there have been laid thousands of pounds to hundreds in London, that he should, before that Synod had been ended, have been shut up in the Tower, beside his friend the Lord Cromwell. Howbeit, the King's Majesty having an assured and approved assurance, both of his deep knowledge in religion, and fidelity both to God and him, suspected in that time other men in their judgments, not to walk uprightly nor sincerely. For that some of them swerved from their former opinions in doctrine: and having great experience of the constancy of the Lord Cranmer, it drove him all along to join with the said Lord Cranmer, in the confirmation of his opinion and doctrine against all the rest, to their great admiration.' When the Bishop of Winchester was in Germany, with the title of Ambassador from King Henry VIII, he had several conferences with the learned Bucer, upon different points, which afterwards occasioned warm writings on both sides, some of which were published, and others not.

In the year 1550, Archbishop Cranmer published a book intitled, 'A Defence of the true and Catholick Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ, with a Confutation of sundry Errors concerning the same: grounded and established upon God's holy Word, and approved by the Consent of the most ancient Doctors of the Church.' In this book he mentioned the Bishop of Winchester by name, as one of the greatest writers amongst the Papists; with which this Prelate was so much offended, that he thought himself obliged to write an answer, as he did under this title, An Explication and Assertion of the true Catholick faith, touching the most blessed Sacrament of the altar, with the Confutation of a book written against the same: which was printed abroad in 1551, and the Bishop of Winchester endeavoured to make the world believe, that his writing this book was one great cause, or rather the principal cause, of the severe proceedings against him; which, however, was peremptorily denied by the Archbishop, who not long after published another piece, under the following title, 'An Answer, by the Reverend Father in God Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and Metropolitan, unto a crafty and sophistical Cavillation, devised by Stephen Gardiner, Doctor of

VOL. III. No. 173.

'Law, late Bishop of Winchester, against the true and godly Doctrine of the most holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ. Wherein is also, as Occasion serveth, answered such Places of the Book of Dr Richard Smith, as may seem any thing worthy the answering. Also a true Copy of the Book written, and in open Court delivered, by Dr Stephen Gardiner; not one Word added or diminished, but faithfully in all points agreeing with the Original.' To this, Gardiner replied in Latin, under the feigned name of Marcus Antonius Constantius, a Divine of Lovain, giving his book the following title, Confutatio cavillationum, quibus, sacrosanctum Eucharistiae Sacramentum, ab impiis Capernaitis impeti solet. Printed at Paris 1552. This piece he composed while a prisoner in the Tower, which is the reason of our affirming that the order for debarring him the use of pen, ink, and paper, must have been relaxed; and to this the Archbishop, during his own confinement, wrote a large and copious answer, which he did not live to finish.

Bishop Gardiner managed this controversy also against Peter Martyr, and others who espoused Cranmer; and it was for these writings of his, that he was in those days magnified by the Papists, as a most zealous Catholick; and disliked and dreaded by those of the Church of England, as a warm and irconcilable enemy; whereas, in truth, he admitted the Communion to be given in both kinds, and, being allowed to put his own sense upon the words, would have subscribed to what was established about the Sacrament. After the accession of Queen Mary, finding himself attacked with the utmost violence and virulence by several of the exiles abroad, and particularly by Dr Turner (114), who wrote several treatises on purpose to expose and abuse him; as Dr Poynt likewise did, who succeeded him in the title of Bishop of Winchester, when he was deprived, to which he wrote replies, and is also said to have corrected at least, if he did not compose, Dr Martyn's book against the married Clergy.

He likewise preached two very remarkable sermons in that reign: the first, November the thirtieth 1554, at Paul's Cross, to a very numerous audience, in which he placed the new opinions, as he called them, in a very bad light, attributing to them all the extravagant and unjust things that had been done under the reign of King Edward. In this sermon he took shame to himself, and acknowledged that he had erred too as well as the rest, with a great deal more to the same purpose. In the second part of his sermon he gave a high character of King Philip, whom he represented as a prudent, gentle, and temperate Princee, exhorting the people to behave well towards him, by which they might gain him, and all that he had brought with him; which some say alluded to his money that had been carried publickly to the Tower, in order to ingratiate him with the populace. Thus much is certainly true, that, by the marriage articles which Gardiner framed, that Princee was allowed to bring what riches he pleased into the kingdom, but was restrained from carrying out specie, bullion, or jewels.

The Bishop's second sermon was likewise preached at Paul's Cross, on the second of December following, on account of the nation's returning to communion with the See of Rome. His text was (*), Knowing the time that it is now high time to awake out of sleep, &c. From these words, amongst other things, he observed that when King Henry VIII. was pressed with a rebellion in the North, he resolved to return the Pope his Supremacy. But this resolution came to nothing The hour was not yet come. For had the matter gone forward under such circumstances of difficulty, some would have said the King had been over awed into justice. After this, Gardiner and Knevet were sent Envoys to the Emperor, to request his mediation for bringing the Pope and the King to a good understanding, and to smooth the way for renewing the former correspondence between them: But the time was not yet come: For the juncture might have made the King's return misunderstood, and interpreted his compliance to reasons of State. In the beginning of King Edward's been in a great measure insisted on thro' the whole article. But the length of it (how absurd soever that may seem) will not suffer such an omission, least an unwary reader should take his sense from a part, and not from the whole; which on that account it is necessary, as well as expedient, should be contracted into one point of view, and therefore in the notes, his conduct in different stations is clearly and candidly, tho' not copiously, stated [MM].

reign the business of reconciliation was moved, but neither was that a proper time: For the King being then a child, he could not have had a share in the submission. In short, he told them this was the time which Providence seemed to have reserved for so great a blessing.

There are likewise extant, in the first edition of Fox's Acts and Monuments, several letters of the Bishop of Winchester's to the Duke of Somerset, Lord Protector, with the Duke's answers to some of them; as also other letters of his, to different persons; we might add to these, several other little pieces; but to avoid prolixity, and in order to bring this long article to a speedy close, we will refer the curious reader to Bishop Tanner's accurate catalogue, with this observation only, that whereas he mentions two penitent letters to Archbishop Cranmer, published by Strype, as if they were written by the Bishop; that is plainly a mistake, for they were written by William Gardiner, one of the Prebendaries of Canterbury, who, about the year 1543, was engaged in a base design of aspersing the Archbishop, for which he seems to have been very penitent (115). It is not impossible that this man's name might occasion other mistakes, and prove the handle for objecting to the Bishop of Winchester, his being so deeply concerned in the several plots formed about that time against the Archbishop.

The letters of the Bishop of Winchester, to Sir Thomas Smith and Sir John Cheke, against the new pronunciation of the Greek language, are most of them extant; in which it was Roger Ascham's opinion, that tho' these learned Knights shewed themselves better critics than our Prelate, yet his letters manifested a superior genius, and were chiefly liable to censure, from his affecting to enter farther into a dispute of this kind than was necessary for a person of his dignity. On the whole it may be truly affirmed, that if he had not entered into business so early, or had not been so much employed as he was in political affairs, he might have established a great reputation for his knowledge in polite literature, which was certainly very extensive; and so much a master he was of foreign affairs, that in the latter part of King Henry's reign they were compelled to consult him, tho' unwilling to confide in him.

Under Queen Mary he shewed his great abilities in this science so highly useful to Ministers, by his masterly conduct in the management of the Spanish match, and by his keeping the friends of King Philip, so long as he lived, from involving the English nation in a war with France, against which he had expressly provided in the last article of the marriage treaty. It is also believed, that notwithstanding he could not prevail with Queen Mary to retain the title of Supreme Head of the Church, or prevent her submitting to the See of Rome; yet he gave her such notions of her own rights, and of the necessity of opposing Papal encroachments, as induced her, after his death, to act with so much spirit as she did, when an attempt was made to send over a Legate who was unacceptable to her, merely because her politicks happened not to be very consistent with those of the Court of Rome at that juncture; tho' in all probability, had he survived, that quarrel would have been prevented, since it was owing to the Queen's deserting his maxim, and embracing her husband's foreign interests against her own.

[MM] Clearly and candidly, though not copiously, stated.] The only certain way of collecting men's characters, is from their actions; it is true, these are not always uniform, but neither is the mind of man, we must take them as we find them, and be content to follow the evidence they give, instead of suborning them to testify to the notions we have conceived. If we consider Stephen Gardiner in this light, we must allow him great parts, since he raised himself, and that to the highest stations. We must also own, that he had many good qualities, not only because it is impossible that he should have rose without them, but because the proofs we have seen, are such, as will not suffer it to be disputed. He was learned himself, and a lover of learning and learned men; he was grateful to his master Wolsey in distress; to the memory of his royal master Henry VIII, when he was dead; to the Duke of Norfolk, when himself was exalted to power. He was of a generous and liberal disposition, kept a good house, and brought up several young men, some of which, became afterwards Statesmen, Peers, and Privy-Counsellors, Secretaries of State, and Chancellors. He had courage, which enabled him to stand against all his enemies, in the time of King Henry, and bore him up through a long course of misery and misfortunes in the succeeding reign, neither did it forsake him in the last period of his life, since, in point of vigour, as well as prudence, his administration is as conspicuous as any in our records, and the more so, since from the day of his death his mistress's affairs went wrong, and the publick confusion became so great, as to break that Princess's heart, the force and credit of the nation being long before broken.

He had great address in conciliating the minds of men, which plainly appeared by that attachment which some of the greatest Statesmen in all respects, had to his personal advice for almost forty years together, as well as by his interest with foreign Princes, of which he availed himself upon all occasions. But his greatest virtue was publick spirit, which he shewed in maintaining the rights of his College, preserving the revenues of his See, and, above all, in preventing the projects of Philip from taking place, circumscribing the power of the Queen, when he found it might be dangerous to the constitution, and obliging Cardinal Pole, to accept a commission under the Great Seal, for executing his Legantine Power, by which the Papal authority, when restored, was still in a condition of restraint.

He had his vices, and his bad qualities too, for what man, what Minister, has them not? His envy appeared in his crossing the designs of Cranmer, in the reign of King Henry, and if he really drew the articles against the Protector Somerset, it is a proof that he was vindictive. He had certainly a great measure of pride, and his ambition was boundless, to which, if we add what most writers bestow upon him plentifully, a refined dissimulation, we shall perhaps have a tolerable notion of the dark, as well as the bright side of this character. As to his religion, he seems to have been more a Protestant than a Papist in his principles, but with a great regard to the authority of the Church, from whence arose his unwillingness to reform hastily; he considered the mass of the people as grossly ignorant, and therefore he thought that some allowances were to be made them, from an apprehension, that if they were suddenly taught to contemn what they had long revered, it might render it very difficult to make them revere any thing; Cranmer was honest and open, hated priestcraft and superstition; Gardiner was close and circumspect, afraid of novelties, and suspicious that anarchy would ensue from affording a premature countenance to foreign opinions; this difference in their sentiments, had, as might well be expected, a strong influence on their fortunes, exposed Cranmer to sufferings, and Gardiner to misrepresentations.

To enter more thoroughly into his merit, let us consider him in the University, the Church, and the Court, since in the different scenes of his life, he was in some measure supreme in all. He loved an academical life, had a true notion of it's advantages, and was very desirous of promoting them to the utmost extent of his power. Dr Fuller, speaking of Trinity-Hall (116), ranges the great men produced by that foundation, in four classes, Masters, Benefactors, Writers, Bishops, and we find Gardiner's name in every one of them. The Duke of Somerset, when Protector, would have had him resigned that house into the hands of the crown, giving

The fashion of those times allowed more to exterior expressions of funeral sorrow than ours, and by entertaining the eyes of the vulgar with a lugubrious spectacle (9) of a great man's last journey, impressed on their minds a greater degree of reverence than could be wrought by giving out, that from his affection to the Civil Law, he was inclined to erect a College for promoting that study, and to endow it with the revenues of that foundation, and of Clare-Hall. 'Most politick Gardiner, says my author, not without cause, suspecting some design or casualty might surprize the interval between the dissolution of the old, and the erection of this new foundation, civilly declined the motion, informing his Grace, that the way to advance the study of the Law, was by promoting the present professors of that faculty (now so generally discouraged) and not by founding a new College for the future students thereof, seeing Trinity-Hall alone, could breed more Civilians than all England did prefer according to their deserts.' This, as the same writer observes, cost Gardiner his mastership, but saved the foundation.

He was no less tender of the privileges of the University as Chancellor, than of the welfare of that Hall of which he was Master; this fully appears from Ascham's letters to him, even when the Protector had supplanted him in that office, so much the University depended upon his friendship, when necessity obliged them to deprive him of his power (117). Upon the turn of the times, and his coming again into that office, he purged it thoroughly, turning out all the masters except two, yet some kind things made amends for this, if there was any injustice in it, for Queen Mary made a considerable grant to Trinity College, and the Chancellor, by the help of his Vice-Chancellor, and another famous instrument of his, Dr Andrew Perne, preserved that seat of the Muses from the flames of persecution. Cardinal Pole, who succeeded Gardiner, and was Chancellor at once of both Universities, began his administration at Cambridge, by burning the dead bodies of Martin Bucer, and Paul Fagius, which had remained quiet in their graves during Gardiner's time, though Bucer was his old opponent; yet our Historians say, Gardiner was a furious persecutor, and Pole a very moderate man, to which we should have no exception, if he had burnt only dead bodies.

As Bishop of Winchester, we find him always very considerable; he was able to do much in Convocation, and more in Parliament. Such as are disposed to see with their own eyes, and not trust to the reports of Historians, will find abundant proofs of this, by resorting to the remains of the journals of both assemblies that are still preserved; and the further evidence of this is the extraordinary care that was taken to exclude him from both, during the whole reign of King Edward. In this those who loved the Reformation concurred, as fearing his abilities, and the courtiers assisted therein, as being thoroughly acquainted with his resolution. They knew that no Sec in England afforded richer plunder than Winchester; and they knew in that point, that no Bishop in England was more inflexible than Gardiner, but being once heaved out, they made no doubt of cutting many pretty estates out of the lands of this Bishoprick; and we have elsewhere shewn that in this they were not mistaken; but as this is a point of very great consequence, and as at the beginning of this article, we gave the reader Gardiner's picture drawn by the hands of his successor, Bishop Poynt; so here we will give a detail of Bishop Poynt's administration, as Mr Strype (118) has drawn it from records, which will shew what those apprehensions were, that made Bishop Gardiner so stiff in his opposition, and what concessions the great men in power exacted for the countenance they gave to the Reformation, to which we may in a great measure ascribe the turn that happened upon the accession of Queen Mary.

In the month of May, 1551, when Ponet was made Bishop of Winchester, after the deprivation of Gardiner, a great alienation was made of the lands and revenues anciently belonging to that Bishoprick, according as it was required of the said Ponet, when he first came to the See, or rather conditionally to his preferment thither. Then he passed away to the King, the manors of Marden, Twiford, Marwel, Waltham, &c. in the county of Southampton, and divers other lands, lordships, tenements, rents, &c.

and, in effect, all the temporalities of that rich Bishoprick. And to make all sure, letters were dispatched to the Dean and Chapter, to confirm the grant of the said Bishop, by their full consent and seal of the Chapter, as in that case, by the order of the laws, is required and accustomed. Then did the King give to the Bishop and his successors, in consideration of the said Bishop's surrender, a great many rectories, as that of Bremmer, and of the Chapel of Charford and Hale, and the rectory of Regborn, in the county of Southampton, and divers other lands, to the value of two thousand marks, to be held in liberam elemosynam, and to take the profits from Michaelmas last. He granted him moreover, for some recompence for all this taken away, that his first fruits, which before were charged in the King's books, at three thousand eight hundred eighty-five pounds, three shillings, three pence half-penny farthing, should be now reduced to two thousand marks, and that for his tenths, from henceforth he should be taxed at two hundred marks and no more, to be paid yearly; that he should have ten years space to pay his first fruits in; that bonds should be taken for payment from the Bishop only, without sureties to be bound with him: and that all the bonds and writings for the first fruits of his former Bishoprick, viz. of Rochester, should be delivered him up, which the King forgave him. And for the putting all this into effect, a warrant was issued out to the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Council, and to all others being officers of the court of First Fruits and Tenths. The King also gave him a licence to enter into his Bishoprick, and to take the profits thereof, without paying any thing therefore, notwithstanding a statute made in that behalf, in the twenty-sixth of Henry the Eighth, the import whereof was, that no spiritual person should enter upon his benefice before he had paid the first fruits, or given bond and security to pay them. A pardon also was granted him of all pains, penalties, and sums of money that might be forfeited and due to the King, for entering into the Bishoprick of Rochester, contrary to the said statute. The King soon gratified his servants with the lands and manors of this Bishoprick, viz. To Sir John Gates, the manors of Sutton, Ropley, &c. in Southampton and Surry, of the yearly value of one hundred forty five pounds, nineteen shillings, nine pence half-penny. To Sir Philip Hoby, the manors of Marden, &c. in the county of Southampton, of the yearly value of eighty-seven pounds, eighteen shillings, seven pence. To Sir Andrews Dudley, the manor of Witney, &c. of the yearly value of one hundred eighty pounds, seven pence half-penny farthing. To Sir Henry Seymour, lands to the yearly value of one hundred eighty-six pounds, four pence. To William Fitz-Williams, the manor of High Clere, &c. to the yearly value of eighty-four pounds, seven shillings, three pence. To Henry Nevyle, the manor of Margrave, &c. to the yearly value of one hundred fourteen pounds, eighteen shillings, ten pence. Sir Thomas Wroth, had also an annuity of one hundred pounds. And for the further confirmation of this alienation made by the Bishop of Winchester, it was thought requisite to have it allowed and consented to by the Dean and Chapter under their seal. Whereupon, in August, a letter was sent to Sir John Mason, Knight, that he should repair to Winchester, and to agree with the Bishop to meet them there at a certain day, and to cause all the Canons, Prebendaries, and others whom it concerned, to assemble in the Chapter-House, for confirming the said lands before Michaelmas next, and to advertise the Council the next day, that order might be given to the King's learned Counsel to be there at the same time. And a letter was sent to this Bishop, in behalf of the City of Winchester, namely, to take order, that the city and citizens, and their successors, might be freed from their suits and services heretofore made to that court, called the Palm Court, and all other liberties he had to the same, clearly exonerated and discharged by words. As this is a point not altogether unworthy of observation, and as we rarely find ceremonies of this kind so clearly, so circumstantially, and so methodically set down as these are, we judged it not altogether amiss to give them a place in the notes, as a sort of feature of that age, when there was more attention paid to Sight than to all the rest of the Senses, and more money bestowed, and more diligence used, in setting out such a solemnity, than without such a detail as this could be easily imagined [NN]. Many intrigues were

We see that it was not either doctrine or ceremonies that produced Gardiner's deprivation, he would have consented to the one, and complied with the other, though at the same time he professed, that more alterations were made than he could approve; but spoiling his Bishoprick was a thing to which he would never have yielded. He judged the Christian Church with the supremacy placed in the crown, to be a necessary part of the English constitution, and for that reason was for preserving it; and when he afterwards recovered this See, he made use of the law to recover it's revenues. But how right soever his conduct might be in this respect, his compliances were certainly wrong in the reign of Queen Mary, because he acted contrary to his own knowledge. However he might solve to himself the restoring the Papal power, and reviving the sanguinary laws, without which, it could not be supported; it is impossible to justify him, nor will any honest and ingenuous man attempt it; but that he acted in many things unwillingly, and under that necessity which he had brought upon himself and the nation, by complying with Queen Mary's bigotry, is apparent enough from his actions, which though they excuse him in some instances from cruelty, yet that very excuse demonstrates, that he acted against his principles, in procuring that power for others, which was executed with such unchristian rigour and severity.

Some of our Historians urge in favour of Cardinal Pole, that he was under no necessity of putting Cranmer to death, in order to come at the Archbishoprick, since that was conferred upon him by the Pope (119), before the burning of his predecessor. If this was really so, then the suggestion that Bishop Gardiner preserved Cranmer's life out of spleen to Pole, and from private views, must be also ill-founded, and his preservation of him as long as he lived, may be therefore referred to a better motive. But still, his reconciling the English nation to the obedience of the Sec of Rome, which was plainly his act and deed, is as indefensible as ever. Whatever compassion he might have as a man, he shewed little of the piety or prudence of a Christian Bishop in that action, the worst without all doubt of his whole life, though not the worst spoken of, even by Protestant Historians.

His behaviour as a Minister of State in the reign of Henry, is far from being unexceptionable. His soliciting the divorce from Queen Katherine, at home and abroad; his carrying Cranmer to the King, applauding his advice, and taking upon himself to carry it into execution at Cambridge, if done contrary to his sense of things, as there is great probability it was, cannot be either defended or excused. His reversing all this, by an Act of Parliament, and throwing the whole odium upon Cranmer; Bishop Burnet says (120), shewed he had lost all sense of shame, and a man must want either conscience or understanding, who does not think so. His advising Queen Mary to acts of lenity at her entrance on the government, was certainly very commendable. His soliciting her to restore what the crown had taken from several noble families, such as Norfolk, Arundel, Stanhope, and Hungerford, and the provision for restoring in blood, the Earl of Devonshire, and the son of the Duke of Somerset, highly laudable; his excluding foreign influence from English Councils, and his preventing a Spanish Prince from being placed on the English throne, were essential services to his country; his attention upon all occasions to the spirit of the constitution, in preference to every thing, and particularly, both to royal and ministerial power, is worthy of praise and of imitation.

It might be thought a strange omission, if we should say nothing of the charge that was brought against him of corrupting Parliaments, as it is mentioned by several eminent Historians, but the asserting boldly, or transcribing a fact, often is no kind of evidence. We find nothing of it in the earliest Historians, who wrote in the succeeding reign; and there is nothing brought to justify it, excepting what has been said of King Philip's bringing over a large sum in ready money. As to the Parliament, particularly insisted upon, which is the second of the Queen's reign, and as to which it is surmised; that he gave pensions to several of the members; there is a matter of fact that strongly contradicts it, and it is this, that this Parliament did not continue full two months, meeting on the second of April, and being dissolved on the twenty fifth of May. Now it is natural to believe, that if this Minister's influence, which was indeed very great, had been built upon corruption, he would have continued that Parliament; for it is not the custom of those who give wages, to be content with such short service, more especially when a Parliament was again called the very same year. Besides the Spanish money was not then arrived.

We may add to all this, that our Prelate had less occasion to bribe, because he asked no supplies. It is usual to wet the sucker, before the hand is applied to the pump, but it would be a mere waste of water, if there was no intention of pumping. The Ministers who followed him in that reign, stood in need of that vile expedient, and practised it, but they steered by other maxims than Gardiner had done, and knew not the art of managing Parliaments, by beginning with Constitutional Bills, and thereby putting them in a good humour, or of being contented with a moderate share of success, and not pushing too many government points at once, which were the principal arts he used.

In this respect he was perfectly happy, that he died before he found himself under the necessity of altering his conduct, or of forfeiting the reputation he had acquired by unwarrantable compliances. We are now at such a distance from the time in which he lived, and are possessed of so many publick and private papers, that open to us the whole circle of his conduct, at the same time that all partiality or prejudice is, or ought to be, removed, that we may look on ourselves as free, as well as competent judges of it. To this, if the pains taken in the present article, shall any way contribute, it will fully answer the only end for which they were taken, by recommending a critical examination of our History, with an unbiassed regard to truth and the constitution.

[NN] Could be easily imagined. In all probability, the reason of removing the Bishop's corps so hastily, was to have it in the proper place where these funeral honours might be paid, since at the Court, where he died, it would have been very improper. By five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, his bowels were buried before the high-altar, in the parish church of St Mary Overy's; at six, the knell began, and a Dirge and Mass, all the bells continuing to ring till seven at night. November the fourteenth, began the knell again; there was then a hearse adorned with four branches of gilt candlesticks, two white branches, and three dozen of staff torches. The choir was hung with black, and coats of arms and escutcheons, Dirge sung that evening; the next day, Mass of Requiem was sung by Dr Bonner, Bishop of London, many Prelates, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen being present; after which Dr White, Bishop of Lincoln, ascended the pulpit, and preached the Funeral Sermon, this over, they went to Winchester palace to dinner. The same day in the afternoon, was Dirge sung in every parish in London, with a hearse and ringing of bells, and the next day a Mass of Requiem and prayers, according to the fashion of those times. On the twenty-first of the same month, about noon, began the knell, when the body was brought to the church of St Mary Overy's, attended by all the Bishops who were in town, and by a great number of the Clergy; the Bishop of London performed the funeral Service, and wore his Mitre;

were set on foot at Court, on this great Prelate's death, about filling his places, which occasioned some delay in disposing of them. The great seal was in the mean time put into the hands of Sir Nicholas Hare, Master of the Rolls, and on Newyear's-day following given to Dr Nicholas Heath, Archbishop of York (r). In the Chancellorship of Cambridge he was succeeded by Cardinal Pole (s), who had some inclinations to have held his Bishoprick of Winchester too in commendam; but at length it was given to Dr White, Bishop of Lincoln, the modest Cardinal contenting himself with a pension of one thousand pounds a year out of the revenue, for the support of his dignity (t). As to the Mastership of Trinity-Hall, Dr Mowse, who took it as a good Protestant in King Edward's time, was now become so good a Catholick as to take it again in Queen Mary's time; and in the days of Elizabeth had a Prebend of York bestowed upon him, being once more become a Protestant (u). As to the private estate of Bishop Gardiner, he disposed of it by will, of which his two old friends (w), Sir Anthony Brown, Viscount Montacute, and Dr Thomas Thirlby, Bishop of Ely, were the executors.

Mitre; before the corps, went the King at Arms in his coat, and five banners of his arms, and four images wrought with gold and jewels. On the morrow were said three Masses; one of the Trinity, one of our Lady, and one of Requiem; after which, the company repaired to dinner at Winchester Palace, and the body was deposited in a vault, till it could be carried to Winchester. On the twenty-fourth of February following, were the obsequies of this Prelate celebrated after the following manner. In the afternoon, began the knell at St Mary Overies and ringing. After that began the Dirge. A pall of cloth of gold, and two white branches, and two dozen of staff torches burning, and four great tapers. The Lord Montacute, the chief mourner, and the Lord Bishop of Lincoln, Sir Robert Rochester, Comptroller, and divers other attendants in black, and many black gowns and coats. And the morrow, Mass of Requiem and offering done, began the sermon; and so Mass being done, all repaired to a dinner at Lord Montacute's. At the gate, the corps was put into a chariot with four horses all covered with black. Over the corps, an image resembling the deceased, with his mitre on his head, with five gentlemen, bearing five banners of his arms. Then followed an hundred men in gowns and hoods. Then two Heralds in their coat-armour; Mr Garter and Rouge Croix. Then came men riding, carrying of torches burning, in number sixty, about the corps all the way. Then came the mourners in gowns and coats, to the number of two-hundred, afore and behind; and ceasing, and there they had a great torch given them. And so through every parish till they came to Winchester. And as many as came to meet them, had money given them. And a Dirge and Mass at every lodging (121). All these needless ceremonies being over, the corps was interred according to the Bishop's last will, as Bishop Godwin tells us, on the north side of the high altar in the Cathedral, in a tomb answerable to that of Bishop Fox, on the other side (122). Many poetical compositions, both in Latin and English, were published on the demise of this great Prelate; the most bitter invectives against him, may be found in Bale, who seems to have taken particular pleasure in the abuse of him; on the other hand, Mr John Morwen, who was fellow of Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, wrote an elegant Latin Poem in honour of his memory, in which there are many facts, as well as much panegyric. Sir John Harrington, whom we have before mentioned, deals very fairly by him and the publick, by preserving a poem highly in his commendation; and that piece, according to the custom of those times, reversed into a most outrageous satire. It had been well, if authors on both sides had confined their partiality and their prejudice, to poetical compositions only, and left history untainted with them, we should then have been able to have made this article much shorter, as well as more satisfactory. GARTH (Sir SAMUEL), a genuine son of Apollo, as he was at once an excellent Poet, and a very learned as well as successful Physician. He was descended from a good family in Yorkshire, and after he had passed through his school education, he was removed to Peter-House in Cambridge, where he is said to have continued till he was created Doctor of Physick, July the seventh 1691 (a). His first examination before the Royal College of Physicians, was on the twelfth of March 1691-2, and he was admitted Fellow June the twenty-sixth 1692 (b). In 1696, he zealously encouraged the speedy erecting the Dispensary, being an apartment in the College for the relief of the sick poor, by giving them advice gratis, and dispensing medicines to them at low rates (c). This work of charity having exposed him, and many other of the most eminent Physicians, to the envy and resentment of several persons of the same Faculty, as well as Apothecaries, he ridiculed them with peculiar spirit and vivacity, in his admirable poem called THE DISPENSARY, in six canto's; which, tho' it first stole into the world a little hastily and incorrect, in the year 1699, yet bore in a few months three impressions, and was afterwards printed several times, with a dedication to Anthony Henly, Esq; and commendatory verses by Mr Charles Boyle, afterwards Earl of Orrery, Colonel Christopher Codrington, Thomas Cheek, Esq; and Colonel Henry Blount (d). This poem raised our author a very just, as well as prodigious, reputation (e) [A]. This poetical

[A] As prodigious reputation] There are two things remarkable with respect to this admirable poem of our author's, the first, that it is in itself a most beautiful and elegant composition; the second, that it was written to support a most generous and charitable design. In order to make the reader perfectly master of the reasons upon which that scheme was founded this poem was written to recommend: the judicious author in his preface, advises him to read a little piece, written by the directions, and published by the order, of the College of Physicians, then common, and in every body's hands, though now become very scarce and hard to be met with, which cannot therefore but be very acceptable to the reader, as without it, one of the best poems in our language, can be but very imperfectly understood. The title of this performance was,

Since it hath been the fate of many good undertakings, though in themselves highly beneficial to the publick, to miscarry and come to nothing, not so much by the open opposition of interested and designing persons, as by their private insinuations and mis-representations, whereby they prepossess the people to their own great hurt and damage; that the like misfortune may not befall the charitable design now set on foot by the College of Physicians, LONDON, for the relief of the poor sick in and about this great city and suburbs; we have thought it necessary to give a short historical account of the rise and progress of this matter, whereby we hope it will appear, that this undertaking, as it was several years since begun, before there were any differences or misunderstandings, either amongst ourselves, or with the Apothecaries, upon no other ground but the commiseration of the deplorable condition of the poor sick, especially poor house-keepers, not usually taken care of by the parishes; so also, that the same hath been ever since carried on with the same honest intention: and we doubt not, but a work so advantageous to the sick poor, and so honourable to this city, will in the same manner be shortly finished, and brought to its utmost perfection.

To omit therefore what has in former times been attempted of this nature by our predecessors, of whose early charity we have several instances recorded in our annals; the first step we find tending directly to this purpose, is a vote of the College in their publick meeting, July the twenty-eighth, 1687, to this effect. 'It was this day appointed and ordained, by the unanimous vote of the college, that all the members thereof, whether Fellows, Candidates, or Licentiates of the said college, shall give their advice gratis, to all their sick neighbouring poor, when desired, within the city of London, or seven miles round.'

This order being carried by several of the Members of the College to the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen; they, August the twenty-third, 1687, did by Dr Betts, one of our Elects, return the College thanks, for this their charitable order, with this farther request to the College, that they would explain themselves, as to whom they meant by poor? which they did, by declaring, that all those should be esteemed poor, that brought certificates under the hand of the Rector, Vicar, or Curate of the parish wherein they dwelt, of their being such.

An account of this was by the respective Aldermen sent to each ward. But partly by the industry of some persons, with whose private gain it was not so consistent, and especially by reason of the high prices of medicines, above the purchase of poor house-keepers, it was for that time stilled. Which the College perceiving, and desirous that so good an intention to so many poor people might not be frustrated, several methods for the removing this obstruction, were proposed at their general meetings, as the expending all the fines of the College, in providing physick for the poor, and the like: and at last they came to this resolution, which was past into an order, August the thirteenth, 1688, viz.

'The College having considered, that the charitable vote, which formerly passed for prescribing to the poor gratis, hath not had the effect intended, by reason of the great prices they are obliged to pay for their medicines, have this day unanimously voted, that the laboratory of the College be forthwith fitted up, for preparing medicines for the poor, and also the room adjoining for a repository.' And the College further gave a power to those members who would subscribe to this charitable work, to choose a committee from among themselves, who should order what compositions and simples should be kept at the College for the benefit of the poor, and manage the whole affair as they thought fit.

It was expected, that upon this order, the Apothecaries, (rather than the College, should make medicines themselves) would have so far concurred in this charitable work, as to have borne their part therein: and that as we had freely offered our pains to prescribe for the poor for nothing, so they would have given them their pains also in furnishing them with necessary medicines at the intrinsic value, or at least, for some small profit. But instead of that, several amongst them set themselves, by all the art and industry they were capable of, to frustrate the whole design; and finding no method so promising, as to stir up a party among ourselves to oppose our proceedings, they fell to intriguing with several of our own members, who were too easily lured off to serve the Apothecaries interest, for their own private advantage. And from this cause, as we have too much reason to believe, have chiefly sprung the unhappy differences that are still fomented among us.

But notwithstanding all the discouragements we met with from those of our own members, who contrary to all the obligations of honour and conscience, constantly discovered to our adversaries, whatsoever passed in the College relating to this design, and exposed to them, the names of such as were promoters thereof, that they might be kept out, as far as in them lay, from all patients, where they should be proposed, and themselves brought in; these, and several other difficulties, were, though after a considerable time intervening, at last broke through, and the College proceeded to enforce their former order, by another of the eighteenth of March, 1694, to this effect. 'Whereas in the year 1687, there was an order made, by the unanimous consent of the College, obliging every member thereof to give his advice gratis, in their respective parishes in the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, to all poor sick, as should be recommended to them for such, by the Rector, Vicar, or Curate of the said parishes, by certificate under their hands, which said order was presented to the city: now we judge it necessary, that the said order be again presented to the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, and do hereby again, require strict obedience from all our members, to the aforesaid order.' And a committee was then chosen by the College, to take care of the managing this matter to the best advantage of the designed charity, consisting of the Elects, Censors, and eight Fellows, whereof five to be a committee.

This order was accordingly presented to the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, June the eighteenth, 1695. Upon which, the Common-Council did nominate, appoint, and choose Sir John Moor, Sir William Hedges, and Sir Joseph Smart, Aldermen; Mr Darvile, Mr Ballow, Mr Egglestone, Sir Edmund Wiseman, Mr Rieber, and Mr Palsfreman, Commoners; whereof, any one of the said Aldermen, and two of the said Commoners to be a committee, to return the thanks of that court to the College of Physicians for such their order, and with them, to consult how to improve the advantage proposed by the said college, for the relief of the said poor inhabitants.

July the twenty-fourth. The Committee of the city and College met, where the thanks of the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, were returned to the College of Physicians, for their charitable order.

The Committee of the College, delivered in a list of the names of all their members, with the places where they lived, which was desired by the city to be printed.

Then the committee of the city made several proposals or queries, as first, who should be recommended as fitting objects of this charity? secondly, who should be the persons that should make up the Physicians prescriptions in the several wards and parishes of the city? thirdly, who should prize the medicines prescribed by the Physicians bills?

After which, they, with the College Committee, passing over the first proposal, which was sufficiently answered by the College's order, proceeded to debate the second and third, and came to this resolution, that some Apothecaries should be found out, who should supply the poor with medicines, at such rates as should be adjudged reasonable by the Physicians in or near the several parishes, which the committee of the city earnestly recommended to the Physicians to take care of, and promised that they would do the same on their part.

Upon this, the Committee of the College, applied themselves with great diligence to answer the said desire of the City committee; and after some time, found out several honest and charitable Apothecaries, who very cheerfully and readily embraced the offer, and at the solicitation of the Physicians, entered into this following subscription. We whose names are here under written, are willing to furnish the poor within our respective parishes, with medicines, at such rates as the Committee of Physicians shall judge reasonable, witness our hands. Which subscription we have now by us, but for the subscribers sakes, do not divulge their names.

When the Committee of the College had got a sufficient number of Apothecaries to furnish all the Wards of London, they acquainted the Committee of the City therewith, requesting them at the same time, that they would, for their encouragement, endeavour to have an act passed in the Common-Council, to excuse those charitable Apothecaries from any troublesome office.

Then the Committee of the City, did desire the College Committee to get a farther addition to their former order, whereby the Churchwardens and Overseers of the poor, or any of them, might, as well as the Ministers, recommend, by certificate, fit objects of charity; as also, that all hired servants, and apprentices to handicraftmen, should be reckoned as objects of charity, which the Committee of the College promised to endeavour.

Now the College thought they had surmounted all difficulties, and had attained their end: but the Apothecaries Company having got knowledge of our meeting with a Committee of the City, did not only draw up and present a paper to the Committee of the City, tending wholly to frustrate the charitable ends of our design, which was sufficiently answered article by article, by the Committee of the College, (copies of both which are annexed to this piece) but also hearing that the Committee of Physicians had gotten Apothecaries enough to supply this charity, they were extremely alarmed, and presently called a Hall, wherein, partly by threatening to impose upon them the most troublesome and expensive offices of their company, and partly by charging them upon this compliance with the Physicians, with breach of their oaths to their company, they affrighted most of these Apothecaries from this undertaking, as if their oath obliged them not to do any thing charitably.

September the fourth, 1695. The College made such addition to their order, as the City Committee had desired. At which meeting, the College did likewise approve and confirm all that had been done by their Committee, giving them thanks for the care and trouble they had already taken, and desiring them to proceed and perfect this charitable work, owning and declaring all that the Committee had done, to be the act of the College, and not the act of six or seven men, as some had industriously, though falsely, given out; and that the College would accordingly stand by their Committee in what they had done.

At the next meeting of the Committees, the addition by the College to their former order, desired by the City Committee, was delivered to them, who were much pleased therewith. Then they proceeded to consider who should prize the medicines. And the College Committee was content, because they would avoid every thing that might obstruct this designed charity, that the Master and Wardens of the Apothecaries Company should do it every year, and afterwards bring it to the President and Censors of the College for their approbation, but even this was also opposed by the Apothecaries Company.

Thus it appearing, that the Apothecaries were resolved to obstruct this charity in every particular, the City Committee asked the Physicians then present, whether their College would provide medicines for the poor at reasonable rates, if the Apothecaries should refuse so to do? to which they answered, that they believed, rather than so charitable a design should fail, the College would undertake it, and promised that they would propose it at their next publick College meeting.

Hereupon, the City Committee being fully satisfied with the Physicians answers to their proposals, and with their sincerity in transacting this whole affair with them, as also, that the methods offered by them, were the most proper for obtaining the end proposed, drew up a report accordingly of the whole matter, which the Chairman, Sir William Hedges, offered to read at the next Common-Council; but some affair that required a quicker dispatch intervening, it was put off for that time, and this happening at the latter end of the year, the Common-Council was not long after of course dissolved, and another chosen, in which, several of the then Committee were left out, which probably was the cause that this report was never after called for.

The matter resting thus, and the College being in expectation to hear from the City, they did nothing farther in it till December the twenty-second, 1696, when a proposition was made in the publick College, for a subscription by the Fellows, Candidates, and Licentiates, for carrying on this charity; which being therein approved, about nine or ten only dissenting, a subscription to the effect following, was immediately made.

Whereas the several Orders of the College of Physicians, London, &c.

But this order being annexed to the preface to the Dispensary, it is unnecessary to transcribe it here.

[B] By those who perused it.] There is so great a difference between the harmony of Prose and Verse, and that turn of thought which makes a great Poet or an accomplished Orator, that it rarely happens the same genius inspires both, at least in an equal degree. Cicero, who was not heard by his contemporaries with greater applause than his works are now read with admiration, attempted Poetry without success; and the same thing might be said of others, if it were decent to name them after Tully. Yet it must be confessed, that some of our own Poets have written Prose with equal skill and delicacy; as for instance, Dryden, Pope, and Garth. But it was the peculiar excellence of the latter, that not in his own language only, but in that of ancient Rome, he delivered himself with equal eloquence and spirit. A short instance of this, from the oration of which we are speaking, shall suffice (1).

Dryden, in May 1701, by a very strange accident his burial came to depend on the piety of Dr Garth, who caused the body to be brought to the College of Physicians, proposed and encouraged, by his generous example, a subscription for defraying the expence of the funeral (g); and, after pronouncing over the corps, before it set out from Warwick-Lane, a suitable oration, attended the solemnity to Westminster-Abbey, where at last the remains of that great Man were decently interred. For this most memorable act of tenderness and respect, those who loved the person, or who honoured the parts of that excellent Poet, expressed much gratitude to Dr Garth. He was one of the most eminent members of a famous society called the Kit Kat Club, which consisted of above thirty noblemen and gentlemen, distinguished by their excellent parts, and their very zealous affection to the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover (b). October the third 1702, he was elected one of the Censors of the College of Physicians. In respect to his political principles, he was open and warm; and, which was still more to be valued, he was steady and sincere. In the time of Lord Godolphin's administration, no body was better received of his rank than Dr Garth, and no body seemed to have a higher opinion of the Minister's integrity and abilities, in which he had however the satisfaction of speaking with the publick. But in 1710, when things began to wear another aspect, and that noble person had an opportunity of distinguishing his own friends from those of his power, it could not fail of giving him sensible pleasure to find Dr Garth amongst the first, and to receive the tribute of his MUSE on that situation of his affairs, which would have struck a flatterer dumb (i). But there wanted not some to whom this remarkable testimony of gratitude was by no means pleasing, and therefore the Doctor's lines were severely criticized (k), in a certain paper engaged in the service of the new Ministry; but instead of sinking the credit either of the verses or the Poet, they added to the reputation of both, by exciting the judicious Joseph Addison, Esq; to write in their defence (l) [C]. He was also in particular favour and esteem with the Duke of Marlborough, whose disgrace, and voluntary exile abroad, he lamented in a fine copy of verses (m). In 1711, he wrote a dedication for an intended edition of Lucretius, addressed to his late Majesty, then Elector of Brunswick, which has been justly

Which has been translated thus,

‘ More I might say, as there is no want of materials, in commending Apollo’s art; but I omit them, that I might not seem on this occasion to affect delivering such things as were not sufficiently known before. Of the dignity and titles of Physicians, let those who would know more consult Foefius and others. But at present, let us speak of places and times in which medicine itself is sick. This art, of all others the most useful, knows not how to help itself; while rather from mock Physicians, than diseases, this country suffers. What, and what sort of people they are, the rubrick’d walls at the corner of every street will inform you. Here an Operator, mounted on his pyed horse, draws teeth in the streets; another is fo obliging, as to be at home at certain hours to receive fools; another pores in urinals, and if he finds no disease there, he makes it; another still, draws together a crowd by the help of rope-dancing; he comes, he sees, then rushes forth upon the multitude,

‘ and murders without mercy. Yet not with weapons do these swarms of mountebanks inflict wounds, but with some nostrum more dangerous than any weapon; not with plain gun-powder, but with some strange foreign dust they charge their packets; not with leaden bullets, but with pills as mortal, they do their business. O race of men, of all others the most wicked! thro’ the whole city these homicides spread their terror, whether with more ignorance or impunity it is hard to determine; instead of modesty, impudence; instead of sagacity, stupidity; instead of integrity, wickedness; now, as of old, flourishes. To check this plague, Henry VIII, a most august Prince, and religiously tender of the health of his subjects, established this College, and fortified it with many privileges, that it might regulate and preserve the art of Physick. Moved by the example of Henry, Edward VI, the Queens Mary and Elizabeth, James, and both the Charles’s, omitted nothing that might prove beneficial to the Faculty; much also we owe to Mary and Arabella Stuart, whose veins were enriched with royal blood; much to the Lord Lumley, in his time a person of great authority; nor less to the Marquis of Dorchester, himself a Fellow of this Royal College, and a man still more distinguished by the virtues of his mind than by the splendour of his birth. Neither are we to seek for many other ornaments in this our Society, such as Linacre, Atkins, Read, Meverel, Fox, Gulston, Pagett, Bidgod, Paman; but above all, Harvey and Hames, both of great virtue and learning, but of different dispositions, Harvey distinguished by benignity of mind, Hames by simplicity of manners; the former was endeared to all by his chearful humanity, the latter attracted respect by a becoming gravity; the one justly celebrated for his lenity, as the other for his firmness.’

The whole of the oration is equally beautiful, but more especially the warm, pathetick, and sublime panegyrick on King William, too copious to be transcribed, and too fine to be curtailed in an abstract; in a word, tho’ all the orations spoken before this learned body do honour to the learning of this nation, yet none, in point of sentiment or of eloquence, ever exceeded this of which we are speaking.

[C] To write in their defence.] In order to judge both of the Criticism and of the Defence, it will be requisite first of all to read the Poem to which they refer, justly admired as one of the finest pieces of Latin written in our times. On the accession of that Prince to the throne, he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by his Majesty, with the Duke of Marlborough's sword (11). He was likewise made Physician in Ordinary to the King, and Physician-General to the army. As his known services procured him a great interest with those in power, so his humanity and good nature inclined him to make use of that interest rather for the support and encouragement of men of letters who had merit, than for the advancement of his own fortune, his views in that respect having been always very moderate. He lived with the Great in that degree of esteem and independency, and with all that freedom which became a man possessed of superior genius, and refer, more especially as it is very short, and as it may be very well supposed written suddenly, and at least as much from the author's propensity to Patriotism as Poetry.

To the Earl of Godolphin.

*Whilst weeping Europe bends beneath her Ills,
And where the sword destroys not famine kills.
Our illc enjoys by your successful care,
The pomp of peace amidst the woes of war.
So much the publick to your prudence owes,
You think no labours long for our repose.
Such conduct, such integrity are shown,
There are no coffers empty but your own.
From mean dependance, merit you retrieve;
Unask'd you offer, and unseen you give.
Your favour, like the Nile, increase bestows;
And yet conceals the source from whence it flows.
So seiz'd your passions are, we find no frown
If funds oppress not, and if commerce run, Taxes diminish'd, liberty entire,
These are the grants your services require.
Thus far the state-machine wants no repair,
But moves in matchless order by your care.
Free from confusion, settled and serene;
And, like the universe, by springs unseen.
But now some star, sinister to our prayers;
Contrives new schemes, and calls you from affairs.
No anguish in your looks, nor cares appear,
But bow to teach th' unpraclis'd crew to steer.
Thus like some victim no constraint you need,
To expiate their offence by whom you bleed.
Ingratitude's a weed in ev'ry clime;
It thrives too fast at first, but fades in time.
The God of day, and your own lot's the same;
The vapours you have rais'd, obscure your flame.
But tho' you suffer, and a while retreat;
Your globe of light looks larger as you set.*

The criticism upon these verses was published in a letter to the Examiner, for Thursday September the seventh 1710; and the author of it observes (2), that there does not appear either Poetry, Grammar, or design, in the composition of this poem. 'The whole,' says he, 'seems to be, as the sixth edition of the Dissertary happily expresses it, a strong unlabour'd impotence of thought. If we examine it by the new test of good Poetry, which the Doctor himself has established pleasing at first blush, has this piece the least title even to that? Or if we compare it with the only pattern, as he thinks, of just writing in this kind, Ovid, is there any thing in De Tristibus so wild, so childish, so flat? What can the ingenious Doctor mean? Or at what time could he write these verses? Half of the poem is a panegyric on a Lord Treasurer in being, and the rest a compliment of condolence to an Earl that has lost the staff. In thirty lines his patron is a river, the primum mobile, a pilot, a victim, the sun, any thing, and nothing. He bestows increase, conceals his source, makes the machine move; teaches to steer, expiates our offences, raises vapours, and looks larger as he sets. Nor is the choice of his expressions less exquisite than that of his similes. For commerce to run, passions to be seiz'd, merit to be retrieved from dependance, and a machine to be serene, is perfectly new. The Doctor has a happy talent at invention, and has had the glory of enriching our language by his phrases, as much as he has improved medicine by his bills.

But to be more particular:

famine kills.*

'I could wish the verse would have allowed of the word plague or pestilence, for I suppose that is what the author means. I have heard of the plague at Dantzick, but what part of Europe famine rages in I know not. Why won't physick stand here? It is better sense, runs as well. What the pomp of peace is, I as little comprehend as how it can be enjoyed amidst the woes of war.

*Such conduct, such integrity are shown;
There are no coffers empty but your own.*

'Since there is little poetry in this couplet, I wish there were more truth in it. Some coffers I have heard were empty three weeks ago, and if they are not so still, the nation is more obliged to the Doctor's unpraclis'd crew than to the experienced pilot.

Unask'd you offer.

'A great discovery! I always thought, till now, he that was asked might be said to give, but not properly to offer. The malicious part of the world, will, I doubt, be apt to observe, that this sentence, as it stands here, is as true in fact as it is exact in language.

Your favour, like the Nile, increase bestows.

'If the beauty of the simile is to be judged of by the frequent use which the Poets of all ages have made of it, scarce any can come in competition with the Doctor's river. The Nile on these occasions, is as trite as the stories of Icarus and Pbaeton. I remember I used it when I was about twelve in a new-year's-gift to my uncle, and was heartily ashamed of it a year after. A school-boy can no more miss the Nile, than a French author when he dedicates to the Grand Monarch can live without the sun, that other simile in which the Doctor rejoices.

—— some star, sinister to our prayers,
Contrives new schemes.

'Alii legunt, five stars which makes this passage intelligible. I have often heard Astrologers talk of a sort of influence that stars have upon human affairs, but I know of no stars but those in Mr Bickerstaff's constellation that ever contrived schemes, and those too were erected under no very benign aspect.

'My Lord's care, he tells us, is to teach the unpraclis'd crew to steer. By crew we are to understand the Lords of the Treasury. A very civil expression! But as to the sense of it, what affinity is there between crew and steering. Is steering the business of the whole ship's crew? This is a true image of the whig scheme, where every man is his own pilot.

'If we read the next two lines, we shall find these people have wounded him; and yet, like the best natured victim imaginable, he needs no constraint to the most valuable talents. He was not so haughty as to be above being obliged, and he had a fund of gratitude and good sense, which induced as well as enabled him to oblige them in return.

‘ expiate their offences. All this is what the French call gallimatias, and what the English critics term nonsense. But what follows? For whom you bleed. Bleed? What is the Devil in the Doctor, to mention such a word, and give so unlucky a hint? I hoped that this point had been so well guarded, that here could be no farther need of an act of security.

The God of day, and your own lot's the fame.

‘ A hundred pound for a genitive case, as old Busby used to cry out upon such an occasion.

‘ But to go on from Grammar to decency. Of this happiness of Great Britain, is any part ascribed to the Queen? To this machine, which moves so like the universe, does the royal hand give any turn? Methinks he might at least allow her Majesty as much as his friends did in the coronation medal, Vicem gerit illa. But, as the Poet observes,

Ingratitude's a weed of ev'ry clime.

‘ He will give me leave, in my own turn, to observe, that in Don Sebastian it is

Ingratitude's the growth of ev'ry clime.

‘ What occasion was there of altering a verse he thought fit to steal? This is being a mere Banditti in Poetry, to rob and murder too. But who is to be charged with this ingratitude? The whole body of the nation did indeed wish the Treasurer out, but it was her Majesty only that could displace him. Such are the compliments which the Crown receives from this anti-monarchical academy. Excellent Poets! dutiful Subjects!

‘ I could give you many more observations upon the beauties of this sublime panegyric, if I had my Longinus by me. It has been corrected, I find, twice or thrice already; and if the author corrects it once more, I am so well acquainted with his lucky performances that way, that I do not doubt but I shall be tempted to write to you again upon the same subject. He will not be like himself, if he does not shift his patron as well as his phrases; and it will not surprize me at all, if the next edition the poem should come out inscribed to the late Treasurer of Ireland.’

In the Medley, or Whig Examiner, published September 14, 1710 (3), this criticism was roundly replied to, with all the wit and spirit, and with all the critical skill and judgment, for which it's excellent author was so famous. ‘ The design, says he, of this work, is to censure the writings of others, and to give all persons a re-hearing, who have suffered under any unjust sentence of the Examiner. As that author has hitherto proceeded, his paper would have been more properly intitled the Executioner, at least his examination is like that which is made by the rack and wheel. I have always admired a critic that has discovered the beauties of an author, and never knew one who made it his business to lash the faults of other writers, that was not guilty of greater himself; as the hangman is generally a worse malefactor, than the criminal that suffers by his hand. To prove what I say, there needs no more than to read the annotations which this author has made upon Dr Garth's poem, with the preface in the front, and a riddle at the end of them.’

Mr Addison concludes that paper with these words. ‘ Before I take my farewell of this subject, I shall advise the author for the future to speak his meaning more plainly. I allow he has a happy talent at dog-grel, when he writes upon a known subject; where he tells us in plain intelligible language, how Syrisca's ladle was lost in one hole, and Han's Carvel's finger in another; he is very jocular and diverting; but when he wraps a lampoon in a riddle, he must consider that his jest is lost to every one but the few merry wags that are in the secret. This is making darker satires than ever Persius did. After this cursory view of the Examiner's performance, let us consider his remarks upon the Doctor's. This general piece of raillery, which he passes upon the Doctor's considering the Treasurer in several different views, is, that which might fall upon any poem in Waller, or any other writer who has diversity of thoughts and allusions; and, tho' it may appear a pleasant ridicule to an ignorant reader, is wholly groundless and unjust. I do likewise differ from the Examiner upon the phrases of passions being poised, and of the retrieving merit from dependence, which are beautiful and poetical.

‘ It is the same cavilling spirit that finds fault with that expression of the pomp of peace, among woes of war, as well as of offering unask'd. As for the Nile, how Icarus and Phaeton came to be joined with it, I cannot conceive! I must confess they have been formerly used to represent the fate of rash ambitious men, and I cannot imagine why the author should deprive us of those particular similes for the future. The next criticism upon the stars, seems introduced for no other reason but to mention Mr Bickerstaff, whom the author every where endeavours to imitate and abuse. But I shall refer the Examiner, to the Frog's advice to her little one that was blowing itself up to the size of an ox.

Par eris* ——

‘ The allusion to a victim may be a gallimatia in French politics, but is an apt and noble allusion to a true English spirit. And as for the Examiner's remarks on the word bleed, tho' a man would laugh to see impotent malice so little able to contain itself, one cannot but observe in them the temper of the Banditti whom he mentions in the same paper, who always murder where they rob. The last observation, is upon the line ingratitude's a weed of ev'ry clime. Here he is very much out of humour with the Doctor, for having called that the weed which Dryden only terms the growth of ev'ry clime. But, for God's sake, why so much tenderness for ingratitude? But I shall say no more. We are now in an age wherein impudent assertions must pass for arguments, and I do not question but the same who has endeavoured here to prove that he who wrote the Dispensary was no Poet, will very suddenly undertake to shew that he who gained the battle of Blenheim was no General.’

It is not impossible that our author himself might have in view this criticism, and some other compliments of the like nature, when, at the close of his preface to the translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, he takes occasion to deliver himself in a manner equally suitable to the case of that Roman Poet, and of his own. His words will bear reading, even after those of Mr Addison's.

With all those wond'rous talents, he (Ovid) was libell'd in his life-time, by the very men who had no other excellencies but as they were his imitators. Where he was allowed to have sentiments superior to all others, they charged him with theft; but how did he steal, no otherwise than like those that steal beggars children, only to cloath them the better.

'Tis to be lamented that gentlemen still continue this unfair behaviour, and treat one another every day with most injurious libels. The Muses should be ladies of a chaste and fair behaviour; when they are otherwise they are Furies. 'Tis certain that Parnassus is at best but a barren mountain, and it's inhabitants contrive to make it more so, by their unneighbourly deportment; the authors are the only corporation that endeavour at the ruin of their own society. Every day may convince them, how much a rich fool is respected above a poor wit. The only talents in esteem at present, are those of Exchange-Alley; one tally is worth a grove of Bays; and 'tis of much more consequence to be well read in the tables of interest, and the rise and fall of stocks, than in the revolutions of empires.

return. His poem intituled CLAREMONT (o), addressed to the present Duke of Newcastle, will survive the noble structure it celebrates, and remain a perpetual monument of its author's learning, taste, and great capacity as a Poet, since in that short work there are innumerable beauties, and a vast variety of sentiments easily and happily interwoven, the most lively strokes of satire being intermixed with the most courtly panegyric, at the same time that there appears the true spirit of enthusiasm, which distinguishes the works of one born a Poet, from those of a witty or learned man, that has arrived at no higher art than that of making verses. His knowledge in Philosophy, his correct taste in Criticism, and his thorough acquaintance with Classical Literature, appear with all the advantages that can be derived from an exact but concealed method, an accurate tho' flowing style, and a language pure, natural, and full of vivacity, in the preface that he prefixed to a translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, which would have been sufficient to have raised him an immortal reputation, if it had been the only product of his pen [D]. It has been attributed by some (o) Printed in the fifth Vol. of Dryden's Miscellanies.

[D] The only product of his pen.] It is generally allowed by the critics, that Ovid is the most learned of the Latin Poets, perhaps we might be justified in saying, that he is not exceeded in this by any of the authors in his own language, either in verse or prose; but with all this learning, he has a most lively imagination, and writes with wonderful harmony and perspicuity. These singular and surprising excellencies joined perhaps to his tender inclinations, and that inimitable manner, in which he has described the softest passions, recommended him peculiarly to our author's study and regard. There was a great resemblance in their humours, their manners, and their poetry, and perhaps, it was from a consciousness of this, that Sir Samuel interested himself so much on behalf of this Roman bard. He dedicated to the Lady Louisa Lenos, afterwards Countess of Berkeley, an English translation of his epistles; he addressed likewise, his Art of Love, to the Earl of Burlington; and now, after translating a part, he prefixed a preface to the whole of his Metamorphoses.

A preface, which may be considered as a model in its kind, since it serves not only to give an idea of the work which follows it, and points out its principal beauties; but shews farther, the uses of his poem, and how it may be read to most profit. If we regard it in this light, his preface is in reality, a short but excellent commentary, which enables the reader to enter into the spirit and genius of his author, to understand his meaning, to apprehend the moral of his fables, and to feel the force of those fine reflections which are every where scattered through his writings. In the very opening of that short piece, he vindicates his author and himself, from an imputation that has fallen but too commonly upon Physicians and Poets. He observes, that Ovid had a discerning notion of the gravitation of bodies, and that there can be no arbitrary principle in mere matter; its parts cannot move, unless they be moved, and cannot do otherwise when prest on by other parts in motion; and therefore, says he, it is evident from the following lines, that Ovid strictly adhered to the opinion of the most discerning Philosophers, who taught, that all things were formed by a wise and intelligent mind:

Fronde tegi sylvas,*

It may be, he carries it a little too far, in saying, that the Fiat of the Hebrew law-giver, is not more sublime than the Iussit of the Latin Poet. After explaining his philosophy with much learning and judgment, he comes next to consider him in his poetical capacity; and to shew how far he has been justly censured by the critics, and how much he has been frequently injured for want of being understood. He suggests, and he brings the author's own authority from another of his works to prove it, that this great performer never received his last hand, but went into the world, even in his own opinion, in some measure unfinished; but as he very justly remarks, the variety with which he feasts his reader, ought certainly to compensate for some trivial inaccuracies. 'Here, says he, are the hurries of a lover; a search and penetration into nature, for the Philosopher; fluency of numbers, and most expressive figures for the Poet; morals for the serious, and

'pleasantries for admirers of points of wit.' Where an author labours to please all, all ought in justice, to come with an inclination to be pleased. He compares this writer with Virgil, and though he confesses the comparison very unequal, yet he shews, that tho' Ovid be mostly, he is not always inferior. In reference to many subjects, his education and breeding enabled him to enter deeply into them, and with these advantages, his genius gave him a power of treating them with such strength, and yet with such facility, as perhaps leave him without any rival.

Ovid deserves as much praise for saying a great deal in a little, as censure for saying a little in a great deal. None of the classic Poets had the talent of expressing himself with more force and perspicuity. Sir Samuel gives some instances of this, and goes on. Ovid never excels himself so much, as when he takes occasion to touch upon the passion of love, all hearts are in a manner sensible of the same emotions, and like instruments tuned unisons, if a string of any of them be struck, the rest by consent vibrate. The fable of Byblis, shews how touchingly the Poet argues in love affairs, as well as those of Medea and Scylla.

The two last are left by their heroes, and their reflections are very natural and affecting. Ovid seemed here to have had Virgil's passion of Dido in his eye, but with this difference, the one had conversed much with ladies, and knew they loved to talk a great deal; the other considered no less, what was natural for them to say, than what became them to say. Virgil has through the whole management of this rencounter, discovered a most finished judgment. Æneas, like other men, likes for convenience, and leaves for greater. Dido, like other ladies, resents the neglect, enumerates the obligations the lover is under; upbraids him with ingratitude; threatens him with revenge; then by and by submits, begs for compassion, and has recourse to tears. Nor does the genius of Ovid more exert on the subject of love, than on all others.

In the contention of Ajax, Ulysses's elocution is most nervous and persuading. Where he endeavours to dissuade mankind (Book xv. of his Metamorphoses) from indulging carnivorous appetites in his Pythagorean Philosophy, how emphatical is his reasoning. Through the whole texture of this work, Ovid discovers the highest humanity, and a most exceeding good nature. The virtuous in distress are always his concern, and his wit contrives to give them an immortality with himself. He seems to have taken the most pains in the first and second book of the Metamorphoses, though the thirteenth abounds with sentiments most moving, and with calamitous sentiments introduced with great art. The animated thoughts, and lively images of this poem are numerous. None ever painted more to the life than our author, though several grotesque figures are now and then seen in the same group. The most plentiful season that gives birth to the finest flowers, produces also the rankest weeds. Ovid has shewn in one line the brightest fancy, sometimes in the next, the poorest affectation.

Ovid was much too fond of trivial witticisms, which are more to be wondred at, because they were not the fashion of that age, as puns and quibbles are of this. Virgil, as I remember, is not found trifling in this manner above once or twice. With regard to Ovid's diction, he observes, that a great many of his lines end with monosyllables, and more indeed than seems consistent some to a certain indolence of temper, but with more justice certainly may be referred to his prudent and sound judgment, that he did not write more, but chose rather to rest his reputation upon a small number of fine things, than to risque it by undertaking many. Yet tho' all his works would scarce make a moderate volume, it may be truly affirmed that we find in them a greater variety of sentiments than in almost any writer of his time (p). His epigrams for the glasses of the Kit Kat Club, are bold, lively, and free, abounding with that vivacity which constitutes extempore wit; whereas the DISPENSARY and CLAREMONT, shew the whim to have possessed a cool and regular judgment, which enabled him to make a proper use of his warm imagination. His poems to the Earl of Godolphin, and the Duke of Marlborough, are serious and sententious; and yet his epilogue to Cato, and many other lighter pieces, shew that he was a great master of humour. One circumstance might very probably contribute to the real value of his works, as well as to his universal reputation; and that circumstance was this, that his hand and his heart went always together. He became very early acquainted with some of the wisest and wittiest, as well as some of the ablest and greatest, men in the kingdom, to whom he steadily adhered in all their fortunes; which, as it did him deservedly great honour, so it turned, in the end, as it usually does, not a little to his advantage. But in justice to his memory it must be observed, that tho' he was zealous for and constant to his party, yet he was very far from having that narrow and malignant spirit which induces men to hate those who differ from them in sentiments. He was indeed, and his writings speak it, as free from this pernicious quality as any man that ever lived; and he felt the just consequences of it, since he was beloved, esteemed, and admired, by the best men of all parties [E]. The truth is, that he had as many amiable sistent with the majesty of heroic verse. When lines, (continues he) are designed to be sermoni proprioeres, this liberty may be allowable, but not so, when the subject requires more sonorous numbers. Virgil seems to endeavour to keep up his versification to an harmonious dignity; and therefore, when fit words do not offer, with some ease he'll rather break off in an hemistich, than that the line should be lazy and languid. He well knew how essential it was in poetry to flatter the ear, and at the same time was sensible, that this organ grows tired by a constant attention to the same harmony, and therefore he endeavoured now and then to relieve it by a cadence of pauses, and a variation of measures.

Those that are most conversant in classic poetry, must be sensible that Virgil has been much more solicitous than Ovid, to keep up his lines to an easy and musical flow; but though the critics charge the latter with breaking through prosody and grammar, and allowing himself too often the licence of græcisms. I take this censure to be only an arrogant pedantry in the grammarians, and groundless in itself; but though it were true, I dare be confident, it is full as just upon Virgil. Certainly no-body can imagine, but that these two celebrated authors understood their own tongue better than the scrupulous grammarians of after-ages, who are too dogmatical and self-sufficient, when they presume to censure either of them for not attending strictly enough to Syntax and the measure of verse. The Latin tongue is a dead language, and none can decide with confidence on the harmony or dissonance or the numbers of these lines, unless they were thoroughly acquainted with their pauses and cadence. They may indeed pronounce with much more assurance on their diction, and distinguish where they have been negligent, and where not finished. There are certainly many lines in Ovid, where he has been downright lazy, and where he might have avoided the appearance of being obviously so, by a very little application.

Ovid's allegories are either physical or natural, moral or historical. Of the first kind, is the fable of Apollo and Python: in the explanation of this, all the Mythologists agree, exhalations and mists, being the constant effects of inundations are here dissipated by the rays of the Sun. Of the second kind, are Acteon torn to pieces by his own pack of dogs; and Erichon starved by the disease of hunger. These two allegories seem to signify, that extravagance and luxury end in want. Of the third, is the story of the rape of Europa. History says, she was daughter to Agenor, and carried by the Candians in a gally, bearing a bull in the stern, in order to be married to one of their Kings, named Jupiter. As to Ovid's being censured for being too free with the characters of his Gods, it must be considered, that what appeared an absurdity in our Poet, is not so much his own fault, as that of the times before him.

The character of the Gods in the old heroick age, represented them unjust in their actions, mutable in their designs, partial in their favours, ignorant of events, scurrilous in their language; some of the superior hierarchy, treating one another with injurious brutalities, and are often guilty of such indecencies and misbehaviour, as the lowest of mortals would blush to own. The commentators may endeavour to hide some absurdities in the Iliad, under the veil of allegories; but the reader, that considers the whole texture of that poem, will find that the author's meaning, and their interpretations, are often as unlike, as the imaginary heroes of his time are to the real ones of ours. Ovid was so far from paying a blind difference to the venerable name of his Grecian predecessor, in the character of his Gods; that when Jupiter punishes Andromeda for the crimes of her mother, he calls him injustus Ammon (Metamorph. Book iv.) and takes commonly an honourable care of the decorum of the Godhead, when their actions are consistent with the divinity of their character. His allegories include some religious or instructive moral, wrapt up in a familiar perspicuity, and the reader cannot fail of observing how many lessons of morality Ovid has given us in the course of his fables. To conclude, the poem of the Metamorphoses has been the ample magazine which has furnished the greatest Poets of the following ages with fancy and allusions; and the most celebrated Painters with subjects and designs.

[E] By the best men of all parties.] We find in the Dispensary, and indeed in all the writings of Sir Samuel Garth, a strict regard paid to merit, and due praises given to men of very different parties; the following lines, to avoid numerous quotations, will sufficiently prove the truth of what is here advanced.

*In sense and numbers if you would excel,
Read Wycherley, consider Dryden well:
In one, what vigorous turns of fancy shine!
In th' other, syrens warble in each line.
If Dorset's sprightly muse but touch the lyre,
The Smiles and Graces melt in soft desire,
And little loves confess their amorous fire.
The gentle Isis claims the ivy crown,
To bind th' immortal brows of Addison:
As tuneful Congreve tries his rural strains,
Pan quits the woods, the list'ning fawns the plains,
And Philomel in notes like his complains.
And Britain since (*) Pausanias was writ, amiable qualities to recommend him, as could be well found in one person. He was a general scholar, without the least tincture of affectation or taint of pedantry. Humane in his profession, and not more ready to visit than to relieve the necessitous. His conversation was free and sprightly, his wit flowing and agreeable, and always tempered by affability and good nature. He was censured for his love of pleasure, and under some suspicion in respect to his religious principles (g); with respect to the former, it would be easier to excuse than to defend him; and in regard to the latter, some who knew him intimately have thought that he was injured; and indeed it is not easy to conceive, how a man blessed with so much good sense, and so solid an understanding, should err in matters of such high importance, and which so nearly concerned his own peace. He died after a short illness, which he bore with great patience, January the eighteenth 1718-19, and was buried on the twenty-second of the same month, in the church of Harrow on the Hill, in the county of Middlesex, in a vault which he had caused to be built for him and his family (r), leaving behind him an only daughter, married to the Honourable Colonel William Boyle, a younger son of the Honourable Colonel Henry Boyle, who was brother to the late, and uncle to the present, Earl of Burlington (s).

We have already seen how warmly Mr Addison defended our author's writings, when they were attacked merely upon a principal of party; and it would be no difficult thing to cite, many compliments to him, or on his writings, from some of the greatest men his age produced; but what follows, will abundantly answer our intention.

Lord LANDSDOWNE, on Dr GARTH's illness.

MACHAON sick! in every face we find,
His danger is the danger of mankind;
Whose art protecting, nature could expire,
But by a deluge, or the general fire.
More lives he saves, than perish in our wars,
And faster than a plague destroys repairs;
The bold carower and adventurous dame,
Nor fear the fever, nor refuse the flame,
Safe in his skill from all restraint set free,
But conscious shame, remorse, or piety.

GASCOIGNE (Sir WILLIAM), Knight, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in the reign of King Henry IV. was nobly descended, of a very antient and numerous family, which has been seated some hundred years in Yorkshire; where, and in other parts, it appears to have flourished in very honourable distinction, at least from the Conquest. As the name is derived from Gascony in France; as it appears in the roll of Battle-Abbey (a), among those who entered this Kingdom with William the Norman, and as one of his ancestors, brought hither by King Henry II, was, in right of his wife Eleanor, Duke of Gascon (b), it has been thought that the family was not fixed here, more early than in the former, as it might not be more illustriously so, before the latter of those Kings; yet its first entrance may not have been with the earliest of these, but it might be more antiently settled here, than in either of those reigns; as many, out of families long inhabiting this island, who, wearied with Harold's Usurpation, went over to join the Conqueror, and being entered in that roll, after their return, appear as then first entering the nation with him (c); and as other eminent progenitors have been traced thereof, up to the Saxon times, in some of the elaborate pedigrees, which have been preserved therein; or who, at least, were then, at the Conquest, of Saxon names and lineage; tho' the name of Gascoigne appears not annexed to them, because surnames were not customary, or hereditary among us, till after the entrance of the said William the Norman (d), and then it was common for local names, especially of French derivation, to swallow up those that were personal. The family thus descending through, or engrafted with, different nations, may help us to account for the different ways of spelling its name. For tho' we have here, in the head or title of this article, preferred that orthography, or spelling thereof, which is now, and has long been, most established and received, as we generally find it in our most antient law-books, and as his descendants retain it to this day; yet hath it been written, as some antiquaries of his own county have observed (e), from very authentic precedents, more variously than perhaps any other among us [A]. It has also been observed from his pedigree, that the

[A] His name has been more variously written than perhaps any other among us.] Surnames are subject to mutation, according to the caprice, not only of strangers, but their owners themselves. Tho' many are for retrenching every redundant letter, and making names correspondent, with the language of the times, to the most graceful, or convertible manner of stile or speech, and so as they may be rendered most smooth, easy and familiar, to speaking and writing, reading and remembrance: yet others will pride themselves in retaining every mark of antiquity in their names, as the most concise cognizance, and genuine testimony in them, both

Sire of all arts, defend thy darling son,
Restore the man, whose life's so much our own,
On whom like Adam the whole worlds reclin'd,
And by preserving GARTH, preserve mankind.

The celebrated Mr Pope, in a letter to a friend, gives the following account of our author's death, his sense of it, and his own opinion of the character he deserved. 'The best natured of men, says he, Sir Samuel Garth, has left me in the truest concern for his loss. His death was very heroical, and yet unaffected enough to have made a Saint or a Philosopher famous. But ill tongues, and worse hearts, have branded even his last moments, as wrongfully as they did his life with irreligion. You must have heard many tales on this subject; but if ever there was a good Christian, without knowing himself to be so, it was Dr Garth (4).' This letter is dated Dec 12, 1718; and his free and candid sentiments of this great man, as they are infinitely better, so will they probably last much longer, than any monumental history.

of reverence and authority, how inelegant soever to the eye or ear, in themselves; or upbraiding of poverty in others; and urge, they may be found upon consideration, to be less disguised in their obsolete orthography, than in any modern masquerade. Besides, ignorance as well as willfulness, is so much greater, in spelling the names of particular persons erroneously, than the general words in a language, that it is no wonder the greatest pseudography is most often propagated therein; especially of such families as, having been eminently and fruitfully dispersed through different countries, have had their names subject to the different impressions of their sever-

christian name of William has been preserved from the Conquest so successively in the heir or eldest son of the family, that the like in others is rarely to be met with; there being no fewer than fifteen Williams, of whom six or eight were Knights, in a lineal descent; that is, seven before this Sir William the Judge, who was the eighth lineal heir by whom that christian name was borne; and it was preserved also as regularly in his eldest descendents, for seven generations after him, as may be more particularly seen in the note subjoined [B].
The

ral dialects. From some of these, or such like motives, many instances of such diversity or transposition, in spelling of names may be accounted for. Dr Thomas Tenison, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, has quoted five or six authors, who have differently written the name of Sir Gervas Elwis, tho' neither of them right (1): and Dr Fuller observes, in his Discourse upon the Alteration of Surnames, that the name of Villiers, has been written, in their old evidences, fourteen several ways (2). Yet in a volume of the principal families in Yorkshire, whereof divers transcripts having been made, it is well known among the gentry of that county (3), we have observed this name of Gascoigne is still more variously spelt; and Mr Thoresby has printed no less than nineteen variations thereof, as they have been distinguished out of the old deeds and records, by those who have laboured most extensively in the pedigree of this family: and, as he has transmitted them, they stand thus (4). Gaskin, Gauvain, Gascoigne (5); Gascoigne, Gascoigne (6); Gascoyn (7), Gascun, Gasken; Gaskyn, Gaskun, Gaston (8); Gastone, Gastoyne (9); Gastoyne, Gasquin, Gasquyne; Gawken, Vascon and Guascogn. But there are two or three different spellings more, that have been occasionally used, as the true name, not wantonly studied for the sake of variety, and are not here, in that list mentioned: one whereof, may appear as ancient or authentic as most of them; and that is written, de Gasquone; another is Gaskoigne; as may hereafter more particularly occur. But these various readings are all now, chiefly reduced, either to Gascoigne, after the shorter sound of the French; or Gascoyne, to smoothen the spelling, and keep the sound of the diphthong open, after the broader manner of the English pronunciation; tho' in current speech, it is more briefly sounded Gaskin.

[B] Fifteen Williams successively, in a lineal descent, as may be seen in the note. Certain surnames have been most frequently preserved, and devolved through divers families, as from other occasions, so chiefly in memory of some eminent ancestors who bore them; as that of Frederic, in the Tilneys; Everard, in the Digbys; Marmaduke, in the Constables, Wyvils, &c. or in respect to such Princes or Potentates, who had conferred honours upon some branches thereof: and, as in regard to others, so to the Williams in particular. The name of William is of German original, and was used with us in the Saxon times; though it was not in such vogue or request, till the establishment here of William the Conqueror. It is a compound word; and as Helm signifies Defence, in the German tongue, according to Martin Luther, and Kenhelm, defence of kindred (10), so Willy, Villi or Billi, with the Germans, like Poly, before several names among the Grecians, signifies Many; and consequently Wilhelm, now mollified into William, Much Defence, or Defence of Many: though, as some Etymologists have derived the Willow tree from its Willingness to grow (11), others have turned William into a Willing Defender (12). In several families, which had any dependence upon the Conqueror, and his line, especially those who had received grants of pardons, privileges, offices, lands, or feignories, his name was thus transmitted, and became so predominant, among those of eminent rank, that, as our last cited Antiquary has recorded, upon a certain festival day, in the court of King Henry II, when Sir William Saint John, and Sir William Fitz-Hamon, two special officers, had commanded that none, but of the name of William, should dine in the great chamber with them, they were accompanied with, an hundred and twenty Williams, all Knights (13). And as many of these, in grateful remembrance of those Princes, who had conferred honours, promotions, or estates upon them, or their ancestors, had their royal names engrafted on their own, to spread and survive in themselves and posterity; so it is probable, from what may hereafter appear, that for such like favours, the like commemoration was preserved, with such constant and singular gratitude, in this of the Gascoignes. Among other names derived from, or revived in memory of, our most famous Princes, that of Henry, but more especially of Edward, has also been very numerous; infomuch, that Dr Plot has taken notice of it as very observable (14); that there were nine Sir Edwards successively in the Family of Littleton, of Pillaton Hall, but of this of the Gascoignes, as we said before, there were no fewer than fifteen Williams, of whom six or eight were Knights, in a lineal descent; that is, seven before, and seven after the celebrated Sir William Gascoigne, the Chief Justice; tho' as some of our Antiquaries and Heralds have truly observed, there may be an inconvenience herein; and if a man should be forced to prove his descent, this identity of names, would be apt to perplex or confound it, and make it hard to prove the donor and the donee in formedon, or distinguish the one from the other (15). The most copious pedigree we have in print, of this family, is that extracted by Mr Ralph Thoresby, from a very extensive one, which was lent him in the year 1696, by John Gascoigne, of Parlington, Esq; the father of Sir Edward Gascoigne, Bart. of Nova Scotia. It is drawn out in sixteen large sheets or skins of parchment, curiously illuminated, and attested by Sir Henry St George, Norroy. In this extract, Mr Thoresby traces not the Gascoignes so high as Ailricus, a noble Saxon of this family, who was banished by the Conqueror, and has omitted most of the females and younger branches (16): nevertheless his extract appears considerably copious, and begins, if not so high as the Conquest, but few degrees below it, as it contains a line of seven descents before the Judge; and all of them, as we observed, are named William. Of the four first, the wives are not mentioned. The fifth, was William Gascoigne of Harwood; who married Elizabeth, the heir of W. Bolton. The sixth, is called Sir William Gascoigne, in one account (17), though not mentioned as a Knight in this pedigree; and he, by Mansfield, or Matilda, if it should be translated Maud, daughter of John de Gawketorp, had William Gascoigne of Gawthorp; who by Agnes his wife, had five sons and two daughters; that is to say, 1. This Sir William Gascoigne, the Chief Justice. 2. Nicholas. 3. Richard. 4. Thomas; and 5. John, a Clerk: the daughters were, Anne, married to Sir Robert Constable; and Elizabeth, to John Aske of Oldroppe. The Chief Justice was twice married; first, to Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Alexander Mowbray (18), of Kirdlington, Esq; by whom he had one son, Sir William Gascoigne, as Walsingham calls him, of Gawthorp, a brave commander in the wars of France under King Henry V (19), who, by Jane, daughter and heir of Sir Henry Wyman, had Sir William Gascoigne of Gawthorp, High-Sheriff of Yorkshire, 20 Henry VI; who by Margaret, daughter of Thomas Clarell, Esq; and relict of John Fitz-Williams, had four sons, and five daughters; the first whereof was, Sir William Gascoigne; another was named John, of Thorp on the Hill, who married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir William Swillington of Thorp, and was ancestor to the Gascoignes of Thorp: that Sir William, by Joan, Daughter of John, the son of Sir Ralph Nevil, of Oversley in Warwickshire, had Sir William Gascoigne of Gawthorp; to whom, at the death of the said John, in 1482, when Sir William was aged thirty years, fell Oversley, Merton-Boteler, with other Lordships or Manors, in the said county of Warwick; which were sold by the fourth descendent from this, who was Nevil's heir, to Thomas Lord Cromwell; by whose attainder they escheated to the Crown (20). That Sir William was created Knight of the Bath at the Queen's coronation in the third, not the first, of King Henry VII (21), Anno 1487; and marrying Margaret, Daughter of Henry Piercy, the third Earl of Northumberland, had by her her Sir William Gascoigne, who was twice married; to Alice, daughter of Sir Richard Froynel, and after, to Margaret, daughter of Richard Lord Latimer; by both whom he had issue, and by the first, Sir William Gascoigne of Gawthorp (*), who was High-Sheriff of Yorkshire, the eleventh of Henry VII: he married first, Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Fitz-Williams; and afterwards, Lady Lucy, daughter and heir of John, Marquis of Montacute: by the former Lady, he had William Gascoigne, Esq; besides two sons, who died issueless, and three daughters. The said William, by his wife Beatrice, daughter of Sir Richard Tempelst, had four sons, who died young, and Margaret his sole heir; in whom this line terminated; she married Thomas Wentworth, of Wentworth Woodhouse in Yorkshire, Esq; in 1552 (22), and brought a great estate into that family. The said Thomas, was Sheriff of Yorkshire in the 24th of Eliz and had by this wife, four daughters, and one son, who was Sir William, the father of Thomas, the first Earl of Strafford. Thus we have given the eldest descendents from the Chief Justice, by his first Wife. His second, was Joan, daughter of Sir William Pickering, Knight, and relict of Sir Ralph Graystock, Baron of the Exchequer (23), by whom he had a son, James Gascoigne, of Cardington, in Bedfordshire. Dr Fuller has mentioned and distinguished, from good authority, a younger brother of Gawthorp House, named William Gascoigne, who was, long after that James, settled at Cardington nigh Bedford, by marrying the inheritrix thereof. He was Sheriff of Bedford and Bucks, the 22 Henry VII, and again the 7th and 9th of Henry VIII. He was also knighted by this King, and Comptroller of the Household to Cardinal Wolley (24).

Nicholas Gascoigne of Lasingcroft, next brother to the Chief Justice, was, by his wife Mary, the daughter of Sir Hugh Underhow, father of several children; and ancestor of others, who married into the families of Beckwith, Vavasour, Ardington, Ingleby, &c. From him was descended John Gascoigne of Lasingcroft, who died in 1557; and left, among other children, John, his third son and heir, of whom hereafter; and George Gascoigne, Esq; (25) first of Oldhirst, who by Mary, daughter of John Stokesley, was father of Sir Nicholas Gascoigne of Surry, who was knighted in 1603, and died in 1617; also of Richard Gascoigne, Esq; the celebrated Antiquary, and other children. This Richard was born at Sherfield, near Brentwood in Essex, Anno 1579, as he left it written in a note with his own hand, on the title page of a book which was part of his own library (26). He was educated at Cambridge, whether in St John's College, we are not sure; but in that University he made others eminent for their learning besides himself. He was famous among the Historians and Antiquaries, for his manuscript Collections, before the year 1622; and as Sir Robert Cotton, St Low Kniveton, Mr W. Lisle, the Saxon Antiquary, of Wilbrougham in Cambridgeshire, besides others, imparted of their greatest curiosities to him; so was he no less communicative of his own choice and invaluable collections, to several who were cultivating the like studies with himself (27). Nor spared he to employ his interest, with such of his friends, who could best forward their productions to the publick. Soon after Mr Dugdale was first brought to London by Sir Simon Archer, in 1638, and recommended by Sir Henry Spelman, to Mr Roger Dodsworth, Mr Gascoigne, who had great acquaintance with Sir Christopher, afterwards the Lord Hatton, a noble encourager of these studies, so effectually introduced Mr Dugdale to this worthy patron, that he was not only made welcome, with all expressions of kindness, but actual readiness to promote his labours (28); which turned greatly to the benefit and advancement thereof. Wherefore, Dugdale, afterwards recording some particulars we have before spoken of, relating to the descendents of Nicholas Gascoigne of Lasingcroft, brother, as we observed to the Chief Justice, and their alliance with the Wentworths, has gratefully added these words, 'Nor must I forget that, likewise from the same stock, is also sprung my special friend, Richard Gascoigne, late of Branham Biggen, in the county of York, Esq; a gentleman well worthy of the best respects from all lovers of antiquities; to whose good affections and abilities in those studies, his own family and several others of much eminency, allied thereto, are not a little obliged (29).' He was related, as we have said above, to the Wentworth family, by the marriage into it of a female heir; and as she enriched it with a large estate, so did he, with no small portion of honour; by reviving, from his own extraordinary treasury of antiquities, such a numerous generation of the most eminent ancestors therein. Some copy of this copious; and accurate work, was made by Dr Johnson, as appears among the voluminous collections he gathered for the Antiquities of Yorkshire (30). For these, and other respects, Mr Gascoigne was much esteemed in the Strafford family; as by Thomas, the first Earl, so also by his son William, after his death, Earl of Strafford, at Wentworth Woodhouse. His picture was there preserved, representing him with a fresh healthy complexion, in his very old age, when his head was reverently silver'd over with grey hairs. It is a half length, sitting in a chair; attir'd in a white damask gown, flowered with black; and in his hand, an old parchment deed or charter, folded up, with a broad seal of yellow wax appendant: but if it could cover the posthumous treatment of it's original's memory, as gracefully as it does it's length and breadth of the waincot, it would surely then be a most honourable ornament. Several printed books were also preserved in the Library there, as hath been in some others, relating to the History and Peerage of England, the Antiquities of the Counties, and Monumental Inscriptions in the Churches, wherein any pedigrees or descents of noted families are mentioned; which were many of them laboriously corrected, and enlarged with marginal notes, and additional tables of Genealogy, written in the fine, fair, little hand, of the said Richard Gascoigne. By which we may perceive, he spent much of his long life, especially the latter part, in these Studies. What family he had, is but briefly mentioned. We find in the printed pedigree, that he was, or had been married, to the daughter of Mr Colles, or, as others seem to have corrected it, Collet (31): and there was an old gentleman of this name, in the reign of K. Charles I, who was chief Clerk, or Deputy Keeper of the Records, in the Tower of London, under Sir John Burroughs (32); but we know not that this was the father of his wife, nor what issue Mr Gascoigne had by her. Though he was often at the Universities, at York, and at London, searching the libraries, archives, and offices of record; or at the seats of his learned and honourable friends, augmenting his antique collections from their family records; as Mr Henry Pencers of Baddesley had also gathered part of his many volumes of Antiquities from the living, as well as the dead, yet his own dwelling, or proper abode, was at Bramham Biggin in Yorkshire; where it is thought he died; and, as we compute, about the year 1638; having seen some books, with his writing and illustrations in them, so late, as within one or two years of that time (33); when he must have been aged near fourscore. As for his vast magazine of most valuable and venerable antiquities, which once filled the rooms of a tall stone-tower, their dusty dormitory, or long unmoleted asylum, and what became of them; to many original charters, patents, deeds, and other evidences, some in the Saxon character; so many rolls of pedigree, creations, successions; court-rolls, and others of limned portraits, from old illuminated manuscripts, fenestral paintings, and monumental effigies, with their inscription, arms, &c. besides his infinite extracts, as well from ancient registers, ledgers, couchers, visitations, obitals, wills, elcheats, and all sorts of other records, as from the painful researches of many other antiquaries, which enabled him, so expertly to make, as well all those additions and improvements in the printed books of Heraldry, Genealogy, Topography, &c. aforesaid, as to draw out the many volumes from them, in manuscript, which he did, of our most eminent families, especially in Yorkshire, even throughout the alphabet; each volume being distinguished by a letter thereof: what became of all this inestimable treasure, I say, except those alphabetical volumes, more happily estranged; and by what innovating, intimidating, or other infatuating, and misconceived motives, they met with a most undeserved fate, from whence it was least to be expected, being all, without distinction, wilfully sacrificed to the no less undistinguishing flames, as it is elsewhere observed (34), about seventy years after the death of their learned and worthy collector, it might be more tedious than agreeable, in this place, more amply to relate. However, thus much may be said, of what has been thought thereof, that, whatever similitude may appear in the action, there was a great disparity between the motives to that sacrifice, and those, whereby our famous Whittington (35) is said to have testified his generous loyalty, and gratitude, for the honours he had received; when, in his costly Fire of Spices, far less precious, less profuse, than that of those Antiquities! further to brighten, and enrich the fragrant flame, he made a burnt-offering of those manuscript obligations, whereby his princely benefactor had engaged himself to restore the treasures wherewith he had been intrusted (36). All we have more to observe here, of this learned Antiquary, is that, whether it was a different person, or not, of the same name and family, whose genealogy is preserved in one of our publick libraries (37), we have not been yet certified. The third son and heir of John of Lasingcroft before mentioned, and uncle to this Richard was John Gascoigne of Parlington, Esq; who by Maud, the daughter of William Arthington of Castley, Esq; had besides younger sons John Gascoigne of Lasingcroft, Parlington, and Barnbow, the eldest; who was created Baronet of Nova Scotia, by King Charles I. And this Sir John Gascoigne, dying May 3, 1637, his eldest son, by his lady, Anne, Daughter of John Ingleby, Esq; was Sir Thomas Gascoigne, Baronet, of Elmet in the West-Riding of Yorkshire; who, being above eighty-five years of age, very deaf, and superannuated, in February 1679, was indicted at the King's-Bench-Bar Westminster, for high-treason, upon the evidence of Robert Bolron, and one Mowbray, his servants; the former of whom, had been sued on his bonds for debt to Sir Thomas, and ejected from his farm for default of rent; and the latter also discarded, and disgraced, for defrauding his said master of money: yet one or both pretended to have been, notwithstanding, engaged by him in a conspiracy, to destroy the King, for a large sum of money, and bring in the Popish Religion (38). The Chief Justice Scroggs, left the Court, when he saw the malicious contrivance detecting, and the evidence against Sir Thomas likely to be invalidated: and though the other Judges would have bias'd the Jury, to find him guilty; yet, these, seeing how exceptionable the witnesses against him were, and how improbable, that Sir Thomas should shew so little favour to those, at whose mercy it was pretended, he had trusted his life, now so much endanger'd by the spirit of revenge, and avarice in them, upon such prospects especially as they had of reward, for their accusation, the said Jury brought him in Not Guilty: And 'tis remarked, as an instance in this trial, of the new witnesses of the plot, which were then rising every day, that if a servant had cheated, or robbed his master, he would ward off the prosecution, by swearing him into the conspiracy (39). But History might accommodate us with more agreeable particulars, of some succeeding descendants in this line of the Gascoignes of Lasingcroft, Parlington, and Barnbow, were it to be continued down to Sir Edward Gascoigne, Baronet, beforementioned; whose benefactions to the Cathedral Church of York, are recorded by the historian of that city (40); or those other gentlemen of merit and distinction, who are now living; among whom we shall only mention, John Gascoigne, Esq; Rear-Admiral, the present chief of one branch of the family; to whom, and to another John Gascoigne of London, Esq; who is related to the alderman of this city, of the same name, we here make our grateful acknowledgement, and return of thanks, for the favour of their communications, relating to this article of the Lord Chief Justice. The next line, of the Judge's second brother, Richard Gascoigne of Hunslet, Esq; is but short (41). He is distinguished in the records, to have been Marshal of the Exchequer, by the grant for life, of Thomas, Earl of Kent (42). Some of our old writers pretending to give us the names of his father and mother, have mistaken both (43). He married, according to the pedigree, Anne, daughter and coheir of Henry Ellis, Esq; and dying in 1422, left a son named Thomas, and two daughters, Alice and Elizabeth: the first was married to Sir Thomas Nevil, Knt. and the second to Sir John Everingham. That Thomas was bred at Oriel College in Oxford, and became a learned Doctor of Divinity; famous both abroad and at home. In 1434, he was Vice-Chancellor, and in 1442, Chancellor of that University, which he resign'd about three years after (44). He was the author of many books, all written in Latin it seems; at least, the titles of them are all in that language. Some ancient copies of them are preserved in many Libraries; but we meet with none that have been ever printed. The most considerable of them are, An Epistle of the Proceedings at the Council of Florence, in Trinity College Library at Cambridge; his Narrative of the Decollation of Archbishop Scrope, among the manuscripts in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; his Life of St Jerom, in the Library at Magdalen College, in that University; his Complaint against the Election of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1443, among Bodley's MSS. and besides three or four more, upon scripture arguments (45), his Theological Dictionary, in Lincoln College; the largest, most noted, and most cited of all his works. Among the additions to one of our old Historians, set forth by the late Mr Thomas Hearne, he has given us an extract, or collection in several pages, of such particulars in this Dictionary, as are most enriched with historical intelligence (*). As for the author, there is a letter written to him by Wolfard Kober, in 1456, preserved among the manuscripts in Baliol College, Oxford; and, as appears in the pedigree, he died on the 13th of March 1457, but in other accounts, that he was flourishing three years later (46): And as for the Judge's two youngest brothers, Thomas and John, beforementioned, we have already said as much of them, as we have met with. But, whereas there was one Sir Bernard Gascoigne, who has been looked for in this pedigree, and thought to have been inadvertently omitted, we shall, to prevent any further misapprehension, here briefly shew, how likely it is, that he had no right of admittance therein. This Knight, having the reputation of being well acquainted with the German interest, and policies, was employed by King Charles II, in the quality of his envoy to the Imperial Court at Vienna, in order to negotiate a match, which was then proposed between his Majesty's brother, James, Duke of York, and the Archduchess of Inspruck. While Sir Bernard resided there, in the Emperor's court, he wrote an historical and political discourse upon the German Empire, which he then sent over in a letter to King Charles; and it was, in the beginning of the late Queen Anne's reign, set forth in print (47). There were also published at the same time with it, among other state papers, written by several other persons, the epistolary correspondence which was held by Henry Bennet, Lord Arlington, then Secretary of State, with Sir Bernard Gascoigne, on the occasion of the said match. They consist of about thirty letters in number, and contain some reasons and arguments to be used, or directions to be followed, in that negotiation, by the said Sir Bernard Gascoigne (48). But the ingenious editor of these papers, in his prefatory discourse prefixed to them, gives us to understand, that the said Description of Germany, was writ by no countryman of ours, and consequently, as we presume, unalied to the English family of Gascoignes before spoken of; for where he has given some character of it, in regard to the phrase or diction in which it is written, he confesses that, 'The style thereof is somewhat obscure or harsh; which ought to be pardoned, says he, in a foreigner, as Sir Bernard Gascoigne was, being a Florentine by birth; but, adds he, the importance and faithfulness from which time this place became their chief seat of residence (g). That Sir William's son William, married Alice, the daughter and coheir of Nicholas Frank, Esq; by whom he had this Sir William Gascoigne, the Chief Justice, their eldest born; besides the sons and daughters whom we have mentioned in the preceding note. At Gawthorp, in the said parish of Harwood, between Leeds and Knarsborough, it is credibly attested that this Chief Justice was born (h), and, as it has been computed, in the middle of King Edward III's reign, about 1350, or not much later. He was afterwards a student of the Law in the Inner Temple, as our last quoted author informs us; but Sir William Dugdale has given us a sculpture of his arms, from one of the windows in Grays Inn-Hall, importing him to have been a member of that Society (i). He grew so eminent in his profession towards the latter end of King Richard II, that he was made one of the King's Serjeants in September 1398 (k). And how much esteemed he was by his successor, for his knowledge and fidelity in the transaction of the most intricate and important affairs, as well relating to his own rights as those of the kingdom, may be inferred from several instances. For, on the eighth of October in the same year, he was nominated by King Richard, with others, in a commission of Agency, procured by the said Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford (l), soon after King of England, when he was going into banishment. These letters patent, which were so granted to Duke Henry at his departure, whereby Gascoigne, and the Duke's other General Attorneys, were empowered to prosecute his causes, and sue livery of any Inheritance, which, during his exile, might fall to him, as that of his father John of Ghent did, and whereby his homage was respited for a reasonable fine, were, as one of our Historians has truly observed, revoked by King Richard (m), as it appears from the Parliament rolls on the eighteenth of March following, the said grant being judged unlawful by his Parliament; and when Duke Henry, the next year, ascended the throne, that revocation was judged unlawful by his Parliament, and made one of the articles for deposing King Richard (n); so that the said King's ineffectual endeavours to extinguish the Duke's greatness, did but augment it, to his own destruction; as the general Histories have related. From the first year of this King Henry IV, who began his reign in September 1399, to the latter end of it, we meet with the abstracts of Gascoigne's opinions, arguments, distinctions, and decisions, as well before he was Chief Justice as after, very frequently recited, among those of other sages of the Law, in our old books of Reports (o), many whereof are distinguished, and recommended, by the brief remarks of their learned editor, as very notable, or worthy of observation, and may give good lights into our old law cases; especially the more choice, nice, or intricate causes, then canvassed or agitated in our courts of justice; with the various opinions, abilities, and characters, of those who presided in them; and have been long so well esteemed to yield many precedents of good authority, that some famous Judges, and others learned in the laws, have taken much pains, of summaries as they are, to render them still more succinct (p). And as some remarks, critical or historical, have been made, by one of our most industrious Antiquaries, upon the antient administrators of justice, whose sentiments and judgments are recorded in these books, some character or distinction, according to the title of his performance, may be expected to appear, of Judge Gascoigne therein (q); but whether such distinction or character is there preserved, we have not now the opportunity of information. It appears from very good authority, that he was Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, so early at least as the second year of King Henry IV, or 1401; tho' there has been some little disagreement upon that head [C]. And now, the nation being embroil'd with dangerous commotions, faithfulness of the relation, will, I hope, make sufficient compensation for the deficiency of the language; and certainly cannot be unwelcome at this conjuncture, when England has so visibly an interest 'in the affairs of Germany (49).' When the said Sir Bernard Gascoigne returned from his embassy into England, he took shipping at Dunkirk; and one of the passengers who came over with him, was Mrs Aphra Behn, the ingenious poetess. It is asserted by the writer of her life, that in the course of their voyage, they all saw a surprising Phænomenon, whether formed by any rising exhalations, or descending vapours, shaped by the winds, and irradiated by refracted lights, is not explained; but it appeared, through Sir Bernard's telescopes, in a clear day, at a great distance, to be, or to resemble, a fine, gay, floating fabrick, adorned with figures, festoons, &c. At first they suspected some art in his glasses, till at last, as it approached, they could see it plainly without them; and the relater is so particular in the description, as to assert that it appeared to be, a four-square floor, of various coloured marble; having rows of fluted and twisted pillars ascending, with Cupids on the top, circled with vines and flowers, and streamers waving in the air. 'Tis added, of this strange visionary, if not romantic or poetical pageant; for fancy is an architect, that can build castles in the clouds, as well by sea as land; that it floated almost near enough for them to step out upon it; as if it would invite them to a safer landing, than they sought by sailing; or portended that the one should be as dangerous and deceitful as the other: for soon after the calm which ensued, there arose such a violent storm, that they were all shipwreckt, but happily in sight of the land; to which, by timely assistance, they all got safe (50).

[C] There has been some little disagreement upon that head.] John Stow is manifestly mistaken in suggesting that this Chief Justice, appeared no sooner on the King's Bench than the sixth year of King Henry the Fourth's reign (51). And Dr Fuller, in correction of him, has asserted, as from good authority, that Gascoigne was made Chief Justice of that Bench, on the first of November in the first year of that King (52), wherein he is also mistaken; for it is manifest in the Parliament Rolls, that Sir Walter Clopton, was then Chief Justice of this Bench, from that remarkable incident of his taking the confession of John Hall, who was concerned in that most wicked and formal murder of Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, by smothering him between two feather beds, in the Prince's Inn, or English Prison, as some call it, at Chelms, according to the secret direction of King Richard (53). This confession was taken, and the said malefactor executed, on the commotions, by the friends of the late King Richard, and other enemies of King Henry, we find among the records, that, in July 1403, together with Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmorland, this Judge Gascoigne, and others, are commissioned by the said King, to issue their power and authority, for levying and assembling forces in the counties of York and Northumberland, of what state, degree, or condition soever, against the insurrection of Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland (r). In the fifth year of King Henry, which is one part in 1403 the other in 1404, when an erroneous judgment, which had been given against Roger Deyncourt, touching a manor in Warwickshire, was, upon examining the process and record, reversed by this Chief Justice; and he gave a transcript of it, under his own hand, to the Clerk of the Parliament; as also, a scire facias to the said Roger, returnable in the next Parliament; we observe in the printed abstract of this record, the Chief Justice is distinguished by the title of Sir William Gascoigne (*), expressing him to have been at that time a Knight; tho' from some remarks of other writers, which we have mentioned in the note directed to in the next year of that King's reign, it should seem that he was not knighted till then. On the 25th of April 1405, we find the said Earl of Westmorland, William Gascoigne, and others, also appointed, by letters patent, with full power and authority, from King Henry, to treat with the rebellious abettors of the said Earl of Northumberland; that they, paying their fines, might be received to mercy: and there was a proclamation issued by the King to the same purpose, at Pontefract, the next day (s). Soon after, in the same year, when Archbishop Scrope, with others, was taken in arms against the King, and his Majesty would have had Judge Gascoigne pronounce sentence of death directly upon him, he maintained the law so incorruptibly, with regard to the ecclesiastical privileges, which the Archbishop himself had charged the King with violating, and so inflexibly refused to pass such sentence, in the illegal and irregular manner required, that he incurred the King's high displeasure for that refusal, tho' for his integrity he gained great applause [D]. But when the heads of that insurrection were cut the 28th of November, in the first year of that King, or 1399; and, on the third of October, in 1400, we find the said Sir Walter Clopton, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, called to Parliament (54); but after that, and he had sat about twelve years on this bench, we hear no more of him; for, in one of the volumes of old Reports before referred to, it appears, under the second year of King Henry IV, that Gascoigne was then Chief Justice, as it seems, of the King's Bench; and also that he sat, or had set, sometimes, in the Common Pleas; whether before Sir William Thyrning was advanced thereto, in the foregoing year, or during that Judge's extraordinary engagements in the renunciation and deposition of King Richard, or upon any other special causes, does not appear (55): but in Sir William Dugdale's Tables of Juridical Succession, it is asserted, against, or under, the year 1401, that William Gascoigne was constituted Chief Justice of the King's Bench, on the 15th of November (56); which is near two months in the third year of King Henry: so that Judge Gascoigne is promoted to this seat, above a year too soon, in Doctor Fuller, and at least three years too late, in John Stow.

[D] Though for his integrity he gained great applause] As the Earl of Northumberland at his insurrection, exhibited articles against King Henry, before the battle of Shrewsbury (57): So now after it, Archbishop Scrope also issued his. They contain many heavy charges against him; as, of perjury, falshood, oppression, tyranny, usurpation, so especially, of causing King Richard, after fifteen days and nights perishing with hunger, thirst and cold, in Pomfret Castle, to be murdered; or as the Archbishop says, put at last, to a most vile death; hitherto altogether unknown to our kingdom (58), but, by the Grace of God, no longer to be concealed (59): so that, starving seems to be but one part of his sufferings, and the other, not to have been disclosed in History: for as to the assassination of Sir Pierce Exon, it seems romantic, and but a copy of the motives which Archbishop Becket's assassins received from their Prince. Archbishop Scrope had a stronger power than the King, and might have overcome his army, if his own credulity in the treacherous pretensions of his adversary, had not betrayed him; being ensnared, or deluded by the Earl of Westmorland, to enter into a parley, and disband his forces, from a feigned approbation of his articles (60), and seeming revolt to his party; then was the Archbishop arrested by him, and taken prisoner at Shipton More (61); and the King, knowing that the House of Lords had lately, in taking the Earl of Northumberland's case from the

Judges under their cognizance, cleared his insurrection of treason, on account of his submission (62), and judged it to be only a trespass, punishable by fine and ransom, did not care to bring this case of the Archbishop's before that Judicatory (63); but resolving to have him put to death for high-treason, would, when the Archbishop was brought to his manor house at Bishopthorp, near York, before his Majesty, have obliged Judge Gascoigne to pronounce sentence accordingly upon him as a traitor; but this upright and memorable Judge (64), who was, by no prospect of fear or favour, to be corrupted to any such violation of the subjects rights, or infringement of their laws and liberties, as then established; which suffered no religious person to be brought to a secular or lay-trial, unless he were a heretic, and first degraded by the Church, as the Archbishop had objected against the King, in the case of others (65), absolutely refused to obey the royal command, and said to his Majesty, Neither you, my Lord the King, nor any liege Subject of your's, in your name, can legally, according to the rights of the kingdom, adjudge any Bishop to death (66). Whereupon the King, highly incensed against the Judge, commanded Sir William Fulthorp (or Fulford, as Stow and others call him), who might be learned in the Laws (67), but was no Judge, to pronounce sentence against the Archbishop, which he did, that day, being the 8th of June in the year 1405, as aforesaid, from a high throne, or stage, as some call it, erected in the Archbishop's palace, after the most abrupt and extrajudicial manner, without indictment, trial, defence, or any other ceremony; and the Archbishop's tragedy was compleated the same day, in a corn-field without the city walls; being there, according to the King's mandate, beheaded, with Thomas Mowbray Earl Marshall, and others. As for the miracles which are said to have ensued at the place where the Archbishop suffered, upon certain lays of barley, which sprung up next season so fruitfully, tho' they had been all crushed and trampled down by the spectators of his death; and the judgments which befel the King, in those leprous diseases which soon after broke out upon him, as 'tis said to have been testified to master Thomas Gascoigne, Professor of Divinity (68), who was the Judge's nephew; with other such particulars; we leave them where they are to be found, among some who have asserted (69) and others who discredit them (70); and shall only here observe, that Judge Gascoigne's conscience was highly celebrated, for his having no share in the Archbishop's death; and his courage, for resisting so incorruptibly such a temptation to violate the laws of his country. off, it is evident that he soon recovered the King's favour; if now, the same year in which he lost it, he received, as we see it asserted in the last note, the honour of knighthood from him. In April 1408, the Earl of Westmorland, Judge Gascoigne, and others, were further empowered by the King, who is expressed to be fully satisfied of their fidelity and circumspection, to treat with, compound, and offer clemency or pardon to the adherents of the Earl of Northumberland; likewise to receive their fines, and pay them into the Exchequer: and this power for their said treaty, is also dated from Pountfreyt Castle, on the 25th of April, in the year aforesaid (u). Besides the determination of particular causes in the Court of King's-Bench, which may be consulted in the law books, as we before observed, many other publick affairs of the kingdom, of more general or national concern, we may discern the Chief Justice engaged in, to regulate or reform, according to the resolutions and directions of the Parliament; tho' his name does not frequently occur, in such abstracts of their acts and ordinances as have appeared in print: and this may be observed from the beginning of Judge Gascoigne's administration of Justice in that Court. As where, upon a petition of the Commons, that the fees of all the Marshals in every one of the King's Courts, and of the Warden of the Fleet, might be certainly, or expressly, settled and established by authority; the King is said to have appointed, that the Council, Chancellor, and Justices, should take order therein (w). So also, where a judgment had formerly been given in the King's-Bench, in a cause between the late King Richard demandant, and Edmund Bassett deforciant, for certain lands and tenements withheld from him in Somersetshire; and that judgment given against the said Bassett, was, for certain errors, revoked in the said Court, now, in the reign of King Henry, with restitution granted of the premises; tho' no Judge of this Court is mentioned to have reversed that judgment (x); it was late enough in this King's reign for Gascoigne to have then been the Chief Justice there, and to have granted the said restitution. And, when certain Abbots, Priors, Knights, Esquires, and other persons of distinction, who had been wrongfully impeached, by a common perjured evidence in the King's-Bench, for sundry heinous crimes, and suffered imprisonment; when the villainy was detected, that evidence condemned to death, and the guiltless prisoners discharged, by the King's writ; as 'tis expressed to be sent to the Justices of the King's-Bench, it is here likewise manifest, that Chief Justice Gascoigne did then officiate in that seat (y), and might be principally implied, tho' no one Judge is named in the abstract, or any thing else, whereby we might discover which of them was most instrumental in detecting such extensive injustice in the guilty on one side, and promoting such a general deliverance of the innocent on the other; but the names of those who were such benefactors, in this signal relief, are thus passed over, and that of the malefactor, as may be seen, preserved (z). As other instances might be given, in some succeeding years of that King's reign, how little we are able to distinguish what particular share the Chief Justice had in these parliamentary references to a determination in his Court, from the short and general form or manner of those references; or the little we can find determined by him, in what appears among those abstracts under his own name, we shall give but one example more of a case, in which he is thus conjunctively referred to; and that was of great moment to many, as it concerned such a comprehensive reformation of practice in the Law. For the Attorneys being even then grown, by their multitude and male-practice, a publick grievance; an act was now made, in 1410 (a), not only for the reduction and limitation of them, to a certain number for every county, but also for their amendment and correction; as that they should be sworn every term, to deal faithfully and truly by their clients; and in breach thereof, should be imprisoned for a twelvemonth, and make their ransom according to the King's will: also, that the Prothonotaries and Filacers, upon conviction, should endure double penalties: and it being further enacted, that the Justices of both Benches should make this regulation, the Chief Justice Gascoigne must be again allowed his particular, if not a principal part in this general benefit and redress of the said grievance thro' the whole kingdom. Upon this grant of that power to them, is endorsed, Respectuatur per Dominos Principem, et Consilium (b): by which we may understand, that the King's eldest son, Henry Prince of Wales, was then President of the Council. It seems the Clerks and Attorneys of both Benches, did afterwards pray for a revocation of this statute, but the motion itself proved that the same was an act, notwithstanding the Respectuatur thereon endorsed: however, the Judges of both Benches were appointed further to consult thereupon, as well as more effectually to reform many other mischievous corruptions and irregularities in their Courts (c). But there is another decision committed to our Chief Justice, in this abstract of the Parliament rolls, wherein he is expressly named; and that is, in the case of William Lord Roos of Hamalake, and his complaint against Sir Robert Thirwit, one of the Justices of the King's Bench, in the latter end of November, or beginning of the next month, in 1411 (d), for withholding certain manors files the Judge at this time no more than Esquire; which may agree very well with what another Historian observes of his receiving the honour of knighthood this year, the sixth of King Henry IV (71), if we may allow the King's resentment was but short, or that he

and commons in the county of Lincoln; and for lying in wait, with five hundred men, to apprehend or seize the said Lord. Sir Robert confessed his fault before the King, and offering to abide by the order of two Lords, the complainant's kindred, they made a long award; and further enjoined Sir Robert to make a great feast at Melton le Roos, in the said county; that he should prepare two fat oxen, twelve sheep, two tuns of Gascoigne wine, with other provisions; and then assemble thither, all such Knights, Esquires, and Yeomen, as were his accomplices in this riot; where they should confess their misbehaviour to the Lord Roos, crave his pardon, and make him an offer of five hundred marks in recompence; which the said Lord Roos should refuse, but pardon them, and partake of their dinner, in token of his reconciliation: and it was referred by the arbitrators aforesaid, to Sir William Gascoigne the Chief Justice, to determine the common right between them (e); but to which party he adjudged it, does not appear. It is thought to have been in the latter part of the King's reign, that his son, Prince Henry, indulged himself with some of his corrupt courtiers, in that interval of wild and disorderly frolicks which several authors have taken notice of (f). In the course whereof, as the Chief Justice had before given an extraordinary testimony that no respect of dignity, however supreme, in the King himself, could move him to an undue administration of the Law; so there occurred such a memorable occasion to exert the like resolution against the obstruction of it, in that famous incident of the Prince's being committed to prison by our Chief Justice, now about the latter end of this reign [E], that no act of his, or any other Judge, has been more celebrated by Historians, Poets, and other eminent writers, to succeeding generations. The substance of the story, as here briefly gathered from the most credible accounts, is, that a servant of Prince Henry's being arraigned before Judge Gascoigne, at Westminster, for felony, and the Prince hearing of it, came into Court, commanded him to be unfettered, and offered to rescue him; wherein being opposed, he rushed up to the Bench, with such fury, that,

[E] The Prince's being committed to prison by the Chief Justice, now about the latter end of this reign. Tho' we find not the year in which this extraordinary incident occurred, yet we may gather from several circumstances in our old Historians, that those wild excursions which Prince Henry gave into, with some of his dissolute and flattering attendants, were more especially made in the latter part of his father's life. For he was carefully educated, and governed at the University of Oxford, in his green or younger age; and when he came from thence, he was laudably engaged in spiring up his father's armies with his presence, to appease the commotions in the kingdom, as at Shrewsbury and in Wales, even till the flight of Owen Glendour. We may also frequently see him summoned to the Parliament; and how some propositions were there made, that he should be sent with a commission to abide in Wales in the year 1407 (72), for the more effectual suppression there of the rebellion. We may see him likewise mentioned, in some years, as President of the Council; as where, in May 1410, when two of the Counsellors were changed, the Speaker recommended Prince Henry, and his brothers the Lords Thomas, John, and Humphry, to advancement; for which the King thanked him, and promised satisfaction at opportunity (73); and, as it is recorded elsewhere, under that year, the said Lord Thomas was then created Duke of Clarence; the Lord John, Duke of Bedford; and Humphry, Duke of Gloucester (74). Tho' others, from the records, affirm, that the said Lord Thomas of Lancaster was not created Duke of Clarence till two years after, and about eight months before his royal father's death (75). Again we may also find, that on the last of November 1411, the King is prayed, by the Speaker of the House of Commons, Thomas Chaucer, the son of Geoffrey the Poet, in the name of the Commons, to give thanks to the Prince, and others appointed to be of the King's Council in the last Parliament, for well employing the treasure therein granted (76). And yet there is interval or space enough before the King's death, which was more than fifteen months after that, for such a contempt to have been committed in the Court of King's Bench, as might occasion the imprisonment of the Prince. For this assault of the Chief Justice, is agreed upon to have been done, when the Prince was well grown into the years of manhood, and beyond the contrivance of any tutors (77). And it must have been also after he was President of the Council, because the Historians likewise agree that the King, upon the said insult of his Chief Justice, discarded the Prince of Wales from the Council-board, and took his brother Thomas, whom they call Duke of

Clarence at that time, into his room, to the Prince's great reluctance, remorse, and open reproach. If the Prince had been reformed any considerable time before the King died, there would have been no occasion for him to be seen in that strange kind of emblematical dress or disguise at Court; breaking in, as it were, upon the King's retirement, so weak and crazed, or near his latter end, as he appears to have been; and in a blue silk gown, full of black eyelet-holes, with the needles hanging, like so many trickling drops of penitential tears, from every one, by the silk that wrought them; and offering a dagger for the King to kill him, if he suspected his duty or loyalty (78); in order to dissipate the jealousies which he thought had been infused into him, by those traducers who might take advantage from his misconduct towards others, to suggest that he would grow dangerous and disloyal to his father. Besides, if the Prince had, for a good while before the King's death, renounced his irregular and discreditable frolicks, he would also have discharged his loose accomplices or associates in them; but, it seems, he kept them company till he came to the throne; because, not till then, is he said to have summoned and dismissed them; and if it were not so, the reflection would be very improper in Polidore; and all our other Historians who have followed him in it; where they say, This man was he, speaking of the Prince, after he was King Henry V, who made it manifest how necessary and commendable it was, for honours, according to the proverb, to change mens manners (79). In the same sense Christopher Ocland, one of our Latin Poets; and so Shakespear also understood the Historians, where he says of the Prince,

The breath no sooner left his father's body,
But that his wildness, mortify'd in him,
Seem'd to die too (80).

And tho' he had in a former play made an anachronism in relation of this incident, or antedated the Prince's violent opposition of the Chief Justice on the Bench, where he speaks as if it was before the suppression of Archbishop Scrope's Infurrection (81); yet afterwards, in the same play, more conformable to historical direction, he describes the Prince to have been so much in the height of his irregularities, and so absolutely unreclaimed from them, till after his father's death, that it is most likely, from the Poet's own representation, this misdemeanor of the Prince's was not long before it.

as some say, it was expected he would, or, as others, that he did, strike the Chief Justice; who, nothing disturbed thereat, after some earnest expostulation, upon such interruption of the proceedings, and indignity, in that place, charged the Prince to go directly to the King's-Bench prison, and there, to wait his father's pleasure; but in such venerable, such coercive expressions; wherein the paternal authority of the King, was so enforced by the awful gravity of the Judge, that the Prince's calm submission to that disgraceful punishment, was no less sudden and surprizing, than the outrageous offence had been, which drew it upon him. And when that disturbance, with this commitment, were, by some officious courtiers, so represented to the King, that it might foment his displeasure, he discreetly defeated the ill-will of his informers; and, taking it in the right sense, returned God most joyful thanks, that in this one example, he had given him both a Judge who could minister, and a son who could obey justice (g). 'Tis further affirmed, by many creditable writers of this story, that for this, and other irreputable actions, the Prince was removed from the Council table, as President thereof, and his brother, Thomas of Lancaster, then, or not long after, Duke of Clarence, admitted in his place: tho' he was probably restored before the King's death, as we have seen some dispositions to repentance and amendment in the foregoing note, and might find him giving other instances thereof, as well in the general Chronicles, as the particular Histories, written at large, of his father's reign and his own. But as this was an event too extraordinary to escape the embellishment of our dramatic Poets, some of their audience have rather been inclined to think it a poetical invention, than built upon matter of fact; tho' it may be seen upon comparison, that nothing appears in this story upon the stage, except by the heighthning or colouring of the language, but what is founded upon the authority of our Historians, and other grave writers [F]. However, as both

Poets

[F] It may be seen upon comparison, that nothing appears in this story on the stage, &c. but what is founded upon the authority of our Historians, &c. There were two plays in which Judge Gascoigne was brought upon the stage by the Poets in Queen Elizabeth's reign, upon this occasion of his committing the Prince to prison. The first was the play of King Henry V (82), a different work from what we have now of Shakespear's under that name, and written some years before it; because Richard Tarlton, the famous Comedian, who died in 1592, acted in it, not only his own part of the Clown, but also that of the Chief Justice; the player who was to have performed the same being absent. In this play the Judge on the Bench was to receive a blow of Prince Henry, who was represented by one Knell, another drole Comedian of those times; and when it was to be done, he struck Chief Justice Tarlton such a swinging box on the ear, as almost fell'd him to the ground, and set the whole house † in an uprore of merriment. When Tarlton the Judge went off, presently after entered Tarlton the Clown; and, according to that liberty wherewith the players in those days were indulged, of obtruding interrogatories of their own, in the midst of their acting, he very simply, and unconcernedly, asked the occasion of all that laughter, like one who was an utter stranger to it. O! said another of the actors, had'st thou been here, thou had'st seen Prince Henry hit the Judge a terrible box on the ear. What, strike a Judge! quoth Tarlton. Nothing less, said t'other. Then, reply'd he, 'it must indeed be terrible to the Judge, since the very report so terrifies me, that methinks the blow remains so fresh still on my cheek, that it burns again. This, it seems, raised a greater acclamation in the house than there was before; and this was one example of that extempore wit or humour, for which Tarlton was so much admired and remembered many years after his death (83). The second play in which our Chief Justice is introduced on the stage, was written by Shakespear (84); but he more judiciously therein, has sunk the action of the Prince's striking the Judge, as an indecorum too gross and disagreeable, into a narrative. Their speeches are too long to be here transcribed intirely; therefore we shall only extract so much of them, as may be necessary to shew how nearly the Poet has followed the sense of the Historians in matters of fact, and only rendered them more lively and emphatical, by a greater variety of argument and aggravation, especially on the Judge's part, in justification of himself. For, as it was not consistent with the integrity of his conduct, in the character of a Chief Justice, to betray that of a malefactor, by any abject apology or repentance; so the Poet has very properly made him declare, before he saw his new Sovereign, the late Prince of Wales, whom he had so indiscrimi-nately punished as a common offender, that he would never beg a forestalled remission of him, for the power and priviledge he had exerted in right to the honour and prerogative of his office on that occasion. Accordingly, upon the first interview between them, after the said Prince was King Henry V, and he began to expostulate a little upon that rough treatment, the Judge discoursed him so convincingly into a better understanding of the matter, that he perfectly turned the tide of his wild blood, reasoned him into a self-conviction, and into a full reconciliation both to that treatment, and himself who had inflicted it; where the Poet makes the Judge intimate, that his resentment proceeded not from the offence committed against him, but his royal father in him; with whose authority he was invested, in the administration of the law; and while he was upon his publick duty, in the place of his Sovereign, serving his country; or, as the Poet's words are,

Ch. Just. Whilst I was busy for the commonwealth,
Your Highness pleased to forget my place;
The majesty and power of law and justice;
The image of the King, whom I presented;
And struck me, in my very seat of justice:
Whereon, as an offender to your father,
I gave bold way to my authority,
And did commit you. If the deed were ill,
Be you contented, wearing now the garland,
To have a son set your decrees at nought;
To pluck down justice from your awful bench;
To trip the course of law, and blunt the sword
That guards the peace and safety of your person:
Nay more! to spurn at your most royal image,
And mock your workings in a second body.

Question your royal thoughts, make the case your's,
Be now the father, and propose a son;
Hear your own dignity so much prophan'd;
See your most dreadful laws so loosely slighted;
Behold yourself, so by a son disdain'd;
And then, imagine me taking your part,
And in your power soft silencing your son:
After this cold consideration, sentence me;
And as you are a King, speak in your state,
What I have done that misbecame my place,
My person, or my Liege's sovereignty?

King. You are right, Justice, and you weigh this well
And I do wish your honours may increase,
Till you do live to see a son of mine
Offend you, and obey you, as I did,

Poets and Historians have generally thought it sufficient, in representing the same, to distinguish Judge Gascoigne in it, under his title only of the Chief Justice, without thinking it

So shall I live to speak my father's words;
Happy am I, that have a man so bold,
That dares do justice on my proper son:
And no less happy, having such a son,
That would deliver up his greatness so,
Into the hands of Justice! You committed me;
For which I do commit, into your hand,
Th' unstained sword that you have us'd to bear;
With this remembrance; that you use the same,
With the like bold, just, and impartial spirit,
As you have done 'gainst me. There, is my hand.—
You shall be as a father to my youth;
My voice shall sound as you do prompt mine ear,
And I will stoop, and humble my intents,
To your well-practis'd, wise directions (85).

(85) Shakespear's second Part of
Hen. IV. Act 5.

Those who are curious to know how much, or what parts, of these speeches are founded upon truth, may find, that the most material points or particulars in them, which, among the unread part of their auditories, often passed for poetical licence, were, long before this Poet's time, authorized, by good historical and other grave writers. One of them is Sir Thomas Eliot, a gentleman of good credit and distinction, not only for his services to the government under King Henry VIII, but for the learning and virtuous principles he testified in many books, which he set forth for the benefit of the publick. This author, desirous of presenting the said King with the mirror of such an accomplished Minister, Ruler, or Governor as he wished under him, has accordingly drawn a capital piece of such a character; and in one of the chapters, to shew how requisite the virtue of Placability, or a reconcilable disposition, is in such a person, has illustrated the same by an example of this incident, in it's full circumstances, between the Prince and our Chief Justice; which, because it has been very seldom, if ever, perfectly or exactly recited, without abridgment or alteration; and as his book is now grown, from it's great age, very scarce, we shall here revive it entirely, as follows, in the author's own words. 'We lack not of this virtue, says he, domestic examples, I mean of our own Kings of England; but most specially one, which, in myne opinion, is to be compared with any, that ever was written of, in any region or country. (*) The most renowned Prince, Kyng Henry the fift, late Kyng of Englande, during the lyfe of his father, was noted to be fierse, and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his servautes, whome he favoured well, was for felony by him committed, arreigned at the Kyng's-Benche; whereof the Prynce beyng advertised, and incensed by light persones aboute him, in furyouse rage came hastily to the barre where his servant stode as a prysoner, and commanded hym to be ungyved, and set at lybertee. Wherat al men were abashed, reserved the Chief Justice; who humbly exhorted the Prince to be contented, that his servaunte moughte bee ordered accordyng to the auncient lawes of this realme; or yf he wolde have hym saved from the rigour of the lawes, that he should obtaine, if he mought, of the Kyng his father, his gracious pardon; whereby no lawe, or justice shulde be derogate. With which answer the Prince nothyng appeased, but rather more inflamed, endeavoured hymselfe to take away his servant. The Judge, confydering the perillous example and inconvenience that mought therby insue, with a valiant spirit and courage, commaunded the Prince upon his allegeance, to leave the prysoner and departe his way; with which common commandement the Prince, being set all in a fury, all chafed and in a terrible manner, cam up to the place of judgement, men thinking that he wold have slaine the Judge, or have done to hym some damage; but the Judge sitting still without moving, declared the majestee of the Kingis place of judgment, and, with an assured and bold countenance, had to the Prince these wordes followyng. Syr, Remember your selfe; I kepe here the place of the King your Sovereigne Lorde and Father, to whom ye owe double obedience; wherefore estfoones, in his name, I charge you desyste of your wylfulnesse, and unlaifull enterpryse, and from henceforth be your propre subjects. And now, for your contempte and disobedience, go you to the prison of the Kynges-Bench, wherunto I comytte you, and remayne ye there prysoner, untill the pleasure of the Kyng your father be further knowen. With whyche wordes beyng abashed, and also wondryng at the marvailous gravitee of that worshipfull Justice, the noble Prince, laiyng his weapon apart, doying reverence, departed and went to the Kynges bench, as he was commanded. Wherat, his servantes disdeigning, came and shewed to the Kyng all the holle affayre. Wherat he, a while studienge; after, as a man all ravyshed with gladnes, holding his eyes and handes up towards Heaven, abrayded with a lowde voyce: O mercifull God! Howe much am I bounde to your infynite goodnesse? specially, for that ye have given me a Judge, who feareth not to minister justyce; and also a sonne, who can suffer semblably, and obey justice (86)! Here Sir Thomas remarks, how worthy of being preserved in memory these three persons were. First, the Judge; who, tho' a subject, could so undauntedly execute justice on the heir apparent of the crown: secondly, a Prince; who, in the midst of his passion, could be so suddenly struck, by a grave reproof of his evil example, both with shame thereat, and submission to his reprover: lastly, a King; who could so laudably rejoice, to hear of such disobedience in a son, by such a subject corrected.

In this account it may be observed, that Sir Thomas Eliot does not mention the Chief Justice to have received any blow of the Prince, tho' Shakespear, in the play, does; in which particular he is supported by authors as ancient, tho' in others the Poet seems to have followed him. And notwithstanding that one Historian thinks this account in Eliot rests upon his credit only (87), as to the speeches we suppose, of the Judge, and the King, yet he has not himself over-faithfully quoted the story from him, because he mentions also, as from his authority, the blow given; which as we may see above, is not to be found in this author, tho' that circumstance is asserted by some of our Historians, who wrote as early as himself (88), expressly enough, to justify the recitation; and more particularly afterwards, by an Italian writer of our history (89). And though Judge Gascoigne is not named in the relation of this story, either by these, or several other authors who mention it, (the effect of which silence, or omission, we shall see in the next note) yet no body will doubt the substance of it, and matter of fact, or that he was the Judge by whom the Prince was so committed, who has but read or heard, how early, frequently, and uncontestedly, the Lawyers and Judges themselves, were wont to cite this very case, as a precedent, in other succeeding cases of commitment. We shall here produce but one instance; and that, in the words of Crompton, a grave and learned Counsellor in Queen Elizabeth's reign, which are as follow. WHIDDEN vouche un Case in Temps GASCOIGNE, Cheefe Justice D'Englitierr, que commit le PRINCE (que voile aver pris un Prifoner del Barre in Banco Regis) al prison; que luy obey humblement, et ala auxi a son commandement; in que le ROY grandment rejoice, in ceo quil avoit Justice que oFAST minister justice a son Fils le Prince, et que il avoit Fils que lui obey. Et CATLIN dit in cel case, que il ne usont de monstre in le Bre, pur que ils met pur home, mes ceo nous reservom' in nre Peetus, car poit esir pur treason, ou grand conspiracie (90). That is to say; 'Whidden cites a case, in the time of Gascoigne, Chief Justice of England, who committed the Prince to prison, because he would have taken a prisoner from the bar at the King's-Bench; and he very submissively obeying him, went thither according to order: at which the King was highly rejoiced, in that he had a Judge who dar'd to minister justice upon his son the Prince, and that he had a son who obey'd him. And Catlin says, in this case, that they were not wont to specify the cause of the commitment it needful to make any mention of his name, the consequence of this inaccurate distinction, seems to have been an attempt to supply that omission of his name by an erroneous substitute, which might transfer the shining character of an invincible defender of the laws, from one Chief Justice to another [G], without any ground to support the usurpation. Therefore ment in the Brief, or Habeas Corpus, but reserved that in their own breast; because it might be for treason, or some grand conspiracy.' Here is a summary of the most material points of the story, confirmed by the most credible authorities; those of Sir John Whiddon, and Sir Robert Catlyn, two eminent Lawyers; the former a Judge, the latter Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, near two hundred years ago; and probably they were not the first who made a precedent of it, but if the old law books were to be sufficiently inspected, we might find others who had cited it before them. If after these testimonies there needed any further confirmation of this extraordinary event, we might alledge the solid evidence of that metallic memorial, which, not long after it occur'd, was struck in honour thereof; being a small medal, not so broad as a guinea, representing the Judge himself, sitting by another on the Bench, and, with a writing in his hand, reading or speaking to a person presumed to be the Prince, among others in the Court before him; with this inscription round the edge of it in the old English character; Sir Wylliam de Gasquone (91). An impression, or stamp of this medal, with printing-ink, as it is remembered by those who have seen it, was made and preserved in the margin of a large manuscript volume, containing the pedigree of that noble family, whereunto the Gascoignes were by marriage allied, as is before mentioned, against the Rundle wherein the name of Sir William Gascoigne is written; which pedigree was partly deduced by Robert Glover, Somerset-Herald, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and is also adorned with the arms of the several relative or collateral branches, blazon'd in their proper colours; as is usual in the like accurate tables of consanguinity, which have been drawn out in commemoration of the Gascoignes also, and other eminent families. But as this illustrious example, which has propagated such a variety of encomiums, attracted some of our ancient Poets to flourish upon it, as we have seen towards the beginning of this note, in their theatrical entertainments: so does it continue still to shine with such equal lustre and influence upon some Moderns, as hath induced them also to celebrate, in the Chief Justice, that salutary correction and restraint which was so signally, so happily, conducive to the Prince's glorious conversion, whereby he soon after became such a renowned Conqueror in France, as in other efforts of their genius, so in the following Epigram; wherewith we shall conclude our remarks upon this part of our subject.

While upright Rokeby scorns the shining self,
And pays in gold, but eats in wood himself (+):
While dauntless Gascoigne, from the Judgment Seat,
To Justice dares make princely Pow'r submit;
Dares tame by law, him who all laws cou'd break,
And to a Heroe, raise a royal Rake:
Whilst we such precedents can boast at Rome,
Keep thy Fabricius, and thy Cato, Rome.

[G] Transfer the shining character of an invincible defender of the laws from one Chief Justice to another. It seems that in default of a name to this story in History, Sir John Hody was the Judge first proposed to father the said imprisonment of the Prince upon; but this choice being soon found so ignorantly made, in that the said Chief Justice could not be met with in History, upon the King's-Bench, till many years after that Prince's death (92), his title to the action was relinquished. But how well the change was mended, in fathering it upon another who was Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and how much more properly cognizable the case was in that Court, may be seen in Braceton, Staunford, Crompton, and other writers who distinguish the proper jurisdiction of our Courts. This other was Sir William Hankford, who was Sir John's countryman; for to a native of Devonshire, (some Antiquaries of that county were very fond of intitling the credit of this notable commitment. And one of them says accordingly, that this was the noble and famous Justiciary that dared to do justice upon the King's son (93), who afterwards was the glory of the English nation, by the name of Henry V. And upon this authority, another writer, who undertook to revive the eminent men that were born in the said county, has given us an abstract of this story under the life, and in the name of Sir William Hankford (94), much as it is to be found in John Speed, and other compilers of our general chronicles; tho' neither under the name of Hankford in this author, nor that of any other Chief Justice: And adds this reflection, upon the Prince's immediate obedience to the Judge's sentence, out of Sir Richard Baker: You would wonder to have seen how calm the Prince was in his own cause, who in the cause of his companion had been so violent (95): As if this Historian had, by nominating the Judge, authorized him to attribute the said commitment to his Worthy; whereas Baker, in his recital thereof, like most others, neither names Sir William Hankford, nor any other Chief Justice. But if he had consulted John Stow, he might have perceived that this Historian understood the Judge, who so ordered the Prince to prison, was Sir William Gascoigne; tho' indeed he has not very exactly settled the whole time of his sitting on the Bench (96), as we have before observed: nor would he have found any direction in this Historian, for sending the Prince to the Fleet; but, according to the relation he follows of Sir Thomas Eliot, to the prison of the King's-Bench (97).

Now the liberty that has been taken of transferring the story of this commitment from one Judge to the other, seems to have been hence derived; that a name being so often wanted to an event so remarkable, and it was resolved that one should be supplied; as there was no chronological succession of the Judges then extant, when Rifdon, or some other of his countrymen, first advanced this misnomer, to afford any exact light or distinction therein: And as Hankford was a Judge first of one Bench, during the Prince's minority, and Chief Justice of the other all the time he was King, till after his death: As the time of Gascoigne's death was not then publicly known in History: As Hankford might be thought a Judge of the King's-Bench, while Gascoigne was Chief Justice on it; or Hankford's succession, in his place, might be computed sooner than it was; he was preferred, as the most probable person to fix the story upon.

But as this riot which the Prince made, was never pretended to be in the Court of Common-Pleas; whereof Hankford was one of the Judges indeed, but Sir William Thyrning Chief-Justice, while Gascoigne was so on the King's-Bench; as Hankford was never one of the Judges in the King's-Bench; much less while Gascoigne was Chief Justice there, and till he succeeded him: as Gascoigne did not die soon enough for the case to come before his said successor, in the King's Bench; therefore, if it was Sir William Hankford, who, after he was Chief Justice thereof, did commit the son of King Henry IV. to prison, it must be after he was Henry the Vth, and King of England; which will not be easily allow'd. And as it is agreed on all hands, that the cause was brought before the King's-Bench, while that King Henry was Prince of Wales, it must consequently be allowed to have been under the jurisdiction of Sir William Gascoigne. But there are greater improbabilities told under the name of Sir William Hankford, tho' not so much to his reputation; among which is, the cunning contrivance he is charged with, of bringing himself upon this account, to an untimely end (98). But it is more strange, than in all probability, true, that a grave, learned, and pious Judge, who had built a church upon his own estate at Annery in Devonshire, should, in his old age, use such a criminal, as to conspire a robbery upon himself, even of his own life, and by the innocent hands of one of his own servants! designing it should appear, a murder fore as the glory of that action seems to be sufficiently rescued, and restored, to its right owner, from the misguiding conceptions of ignorance, or the impotent endeavours of circumvention to supplant him therein, by those authorities which have been here assembled, in the foregoing note; and as it might therefore be unnecessary to appear any further solicitous in appropriating the fame, we shall proceed to observe that Judge Gascoigne persevered conspicuously in the discharge of his duty, not only to the last session in the Parliament-House, and the last term in Westminster-Hall, during the reign of Henry IV, but even beyond the demise of this King, to the beginning of his son and successor Prince Henry, in the royal throne, as it is manifestly apparent in the records; notwithstanding the evidence of those Heralds and Antiquaries, who, tho' respectfully to be regarded in many other communications relating to him, and his family, have in the pedigrees thereof been somewhat deficient in fixing the date of his death; and tho' it may, in the latitude of a rhetorical style, be granted, that his sitting on the Bench, ran parallel in a manner to the King's sitting on the throne (b), yet historically, or strictly speaking, the measure of the King's reign is too long for his administration at the beginning, and too short in the end. So that as all authors consent to his departure out of this life on the 17th of December, I think we may safely take the liberty of prolonging it only a single year beyond their computation; and instead of contracting it to the last or fourteenth of Henry IV, extend it to the first year of King Henry V, or 1413, unless we can think it allowable that he was summoned to attend the Parliament out of his grave [H]; as he will appear to have been, if he died the der committed, in such manner by another, as to clear him of the crime, himself of suicide, and save his effects from confiscation. For so, many Historians inform us, that, pretending to be enraged with his park-keeper, for suff'ring his deer to be stoln, he charged him that, the first person he met, at unseasonable hours, who wou'd not stand, and give account of himself, he shou'd shoot him; and that he wou'd indemnify, or discharge him. Accordingly, the keeper did meet with a man in the park, under an oak tree, one dark night, who wou'd not stand and declare what his business was; whereupon he shot him dead, and it proved to be his Master (99). One relator of this tragedy informs us, he has seen the stump of that tree, which is called, says he, Hankford's Oak to this day (100). And one motive to this desperate destruction of himself, is pretended to have been, his having committed the Prince of Wales to prison, and his dreadful apprehensions from thence, that being King, he wou'd be revenged for the disgrace (101); tho' he had preferred him, after Gascoigne's decease, to be his representative on the King's Bench; which fear, throwing him into insuperable melancholy and despair, provoked him to this preferable course, of getting himself murdered, that he might not be put to death; which is so ridiculously incredible, that it needs no other confutation, than to observe that, on the sixth of October 1423, he was confirmed Chief Justice of the King's Bench (102); which proves that he could neither be in any fear of revenge from King Henry V, who had then been above twelve months in his grave, nor so disorder'd, with any such melancholy, despair, or distraction of mind, as is pretended, when he was thought capable, to the very conclusion of his life, which happened in less than three months after, of discharging his office, and deciding causes upon the bench. And that date, by the way, may also serve to rectify another, in the inscription as quoted from his monument (103); by which, thro' some error in the copy, or defect in one figure of the date, we are led to believe, he died a year sooner than he did.

[H] Unless we can think it reasonable, that he was summon'd, to attend the Parliament, out of his grave. Though in the pedigrees we have seen of this family, both in manuscript and print, Sir William Gascoigne is mentioned to have died on the 17th of December, 1412; and though it is believed that Dr Fuller, in his account of this Chief Justice (104), received direction to confine himself to the same date, from Mr Richard Gascoigne the Antiquary, because he acknowledges that he was informed by him of the Judge's birth-place; and says, 'That date is fairly legible on his stately monument in Harwood church (105);' yet we think it will appear that there is a little miscomputation therein, and that occasioned, either through some error in the transcript from the tomb of Sir William Gascoigne, or some such dimness of one, and the same last numerical figure upon it, as might cause the like mistake in space of time, with that which we observed before in the inscription taken from Sir William Hankford's (106). For, it is credibly asserted, that Chief Justice Gascoigne gave his judgment upon a certain brief in Hillary-Term the fourteenth of Henry IV (107), or between the latter end of January, and the middle of February, the said year beforementioned, 1412 (108), which may be near two months after the time of his death above quoted, as from his tomb. And the said King Henry died on the 20th of March following, which is above three months after that date of Gascoigne's death, as it is said to have been inscribed on the tomb: yet we shall find him to have been, after that King's death, alive, and called to Parliament, in the first year of King Henry V. But if in reverence to monumental authority, it must not be granted that Gascoigne was living after the said King Henry's coronation, which was the ninth of April 1413, we must reject that speech as a forgery, which he is affirmed to have made the day after it, to those who had been his dissolute comrades, while he was Prince of Wales; whom he then summon'd before him to renounce and discharge them, after a formal manner. In this speech the Chief Justice is expressly mentioned to be alive, as it is recorded by John Truffell; who, in the preface of his history, having declared against making, or devising fictitious speeches, for any of the eminent personages commemorated therein, we shou'd the more reasonably give credit to it (109); and in the said speech, after this King had told those his companions, It was sufficient, that for many years together, he had fashion'd himself according to their unruly dispositions, not without reluctance; and wandered with them in a wilderness of riot and unthriftiness; whereby he had made himself almost an alien to the hearts of his father and allies, and so disparaged, or depreciated himself, that in the eyes of mankind, his presence was grown vulgar and stale, and like the cuckow in June, heard but not regarded; he proceeds in brief to relate how, when one of them was converted before the Lord Chief Justice, he interposed, and struck him on the face; and that he was by him deservedly committed for the same: for which act of justice, says he, I shall ever hold him worthy of the place, and my favour; and wish all my Judges to have the like undaunted courage, to punish offenders of what rank soever, &c (110). But if through any little disagreements in this speech with the more ancient accounts already related, any readers shall except against it, as doubting the genuineness thereof, there is no need to contend for it; since we have authorities, which they will think unexceptionable, from the Records themselves, to prove that our Chief Justice was living after the said King came to the crown, and was then called, as we before said, to the Parliament. For, in Sir William Dugdale, who has mentioned all the writs of summons directed to him, from the third of Henry IV, we may see the last of them, dated from Westminster, the 22d of March, in the first year of this the year before. There is no doubt but the solemnity of his funeral was magnificently proportionable, as well to his eminent dignity, his honourable family, plentiful fortune, and exalted fame, as to the sepulchral honours wherewith his remains were distinguished in Harwood church, the Place of his interment. Upon his stately monument are to be seen the effigies of himself at length; and, on his right hand, one of his wives by him. He is represented in his Judge's robes, with his hood on; a large purse fastened to his girdle on his left side, and a long dagger on the right (i). But the inscription which was cut on a brass fillet, and inlay'd about the verge of the tomb, having been torn away during the civil wars, we cannot assert what date, or further particulars it contained, otherwise than from a doubtful copy, said to have been taken from the monument before the same was robbed thereof, and those particulars were legible. Of this inscription having formerly received some account, as also of some other antiquities relating to the family, from the late Rev. Mr Knight, Vicar of Harwood, and other correspondents, our reader may not think them unworthy of preservation in this place [I]; the rather because, if the said inscription meets with King Henry V, to meet in the Parliament that was to be there held, in the third week of Easter; and it did assemble accordingly, on the 15th of May in the said year 1413 (111), when, there is no intimation of the least doubt to the contrary, but Sir William Gascoigne was at this time present in it. But, being afterwards incapacitated by age or infirmities, to officiate in court, or attend in the next Sessions of Parliament, summoned from Westminster, on the first of December, to be held at Leicester, on the 29th of January following, in the second year of the King (112), and so on, through his reign, to the third of Henry VI, the like writs are directed to Sir William Hankford, Chief Justice of the King's Bench; and Sir William Gascoigne is no more mentioned. Whence it is evident, that, as he is univocally allowed to have died on the 17th of December, it was in this first year of Henry V, or 1413, and not the last of Henry IV, as the Genealogists and Historians have in a single year misreckon'd. And tho' Sir William Hankford is summoned, by the nominal title of Chief Justice, in the writ directed to him, on the said first of December, yet it is distinguished that he was not so constituted, till the 29th of January following, which is computed to have been in the year of our Lord, 1414 (113). But though many authors in this particular point of Chronology, have thus shorten'd a little the line of this celebrated Chief Justice's life, we have met with one who has made ample amends, and spun it out to a length beyond all authority or belief; as may be seen in the ensuing note.

[I] Our reader may not think them unworthy of preservation in this place.] The account we formerly received from the late Rev. Mr Knight, in a letter containing these antiquities relating to the Gascoigne family, may best appear in the words of the said letter; which is as follows.

Harwood, April 20, 1742.

S I R,

HAVING been acquainted by Mr Green of Wakefield, who was lately at my house, that an account of the Lord Chief Justice Gascoigne's Monument in my church would be acceptable to you, if what I have here drawn up will afford you any satisfaction, it will be highly pleasing to me.

'Tis a misfortune there is no Inscription now remaining on that monument; and the arms relating to the family, once visible on the shields carved thereon, are now no longer so; having been only blazon'd in colours and not cut in Basso-Reliefs. Yet it is observable, that some of the armorial lines, whereby escutcheons are divided, may be still seen upon them, and particularly on one of those at the east end of the said monument, where we can behold the two perpendicular lines drawn through the middle of the escutcheon, in form of a pale; which I am persuaded once bore the arms of the family. Besides the robes of a Judge, in which the effigies is apparell'd, is a very prevailing evidence that it was carved to represent this excellent Lord Chief Justice, as we find no other of his station or dignity here interr'd.

And what may further strengthen our belief therein is, that in the east window of the isle or chapel where the monument stands, are some remains of painting on the glass; among which are three figures kneeling; whereof, two represent women, on each side one, and the third, a man in the middle, and him I take to be the Lord Chief Justice Gascoigne; part of whose scarlet robe still appears, though the greater part thereof is unfortunately defaced; which is confirmed, by an escutcheon of his arms, still to be seen over his head; and I take the other two figures, which are pretty entire, to represent his two wives, as partly appears from the arms of Gascoigne, which are, Argent, on a Pale Sable; a Demi Luce, Or; and are impaled with their own, on each of their mantles; but more clearly from the escutcheons of their own arms, placed over their heads; which arms are, first, those of the illustrious family of Mowbray, viz, Gules; a Lion Rampant Argent, armed and langued Azure; a Bordure gobonated, Or, and Argent; the other, those of the ancient family of Pickering, viz, Ermin; a Lion rampant Azure, crowned, Or; armed and langued Gules. The arms of Mowbray are quarter'd with those of Gascoigne, the latter distinct. Now that those painted figures and arms represent and belong to the said Chief Justice and his wives, is confirmed by the pedigree of the Gascoignes, printed in Mr Thoresby's Antiquities of Leeds, to which I refer you for further satisfaction; and what is more, the original of the said pedigree, which I have seen by the favour of Sir Edward Gascoigne, exhibits the painted figures abovementioned, by a copy thereof when entire; painted in such a lively manner upon the parchment roll, as perfectly corroborates the observations I have drawn from the ruinous remains of the window, which is now in a worse condition than it was when I first made these remarks, and consequently lets in less light to our enquiries. But that I am not mistaken in my account of those figures and arms, the remainder of an inscription at the bottom of the said window, as it stood when I took it, will still more evidently demonstrate; which stands thus; Or te pro Gulielmo Gascoigne, et Elisabetha, et Johanna Arzobis ejusdem. I have supply'd, as you see, the chasms which time had then made, and are now greater; yet I think, without any room to doubt such supplement, as the name of his second wife appears in the pedigree, to be Joan.

But whereas Mr Thoresby dates the Chief Justice's death in 1412, it seems to be a mistake, by what is mentioned in the speech of King Henry V, to his licentiate's associates, while he was Prince, as it is recorded in Trussel's Continuation of Daniel's History; in which speech, this Chief Justice appears to be then living; and the same is confirmed by a copy of the inscription, said to have been preserved, as it originally stood upon the monument; which I designed to have annexed to this account, had not Mr Green, who received it from me, been before hand with me, in transmitting it to you, wherefore it is omitted. And though, as you observe, Dr Fuller affirms, that the date of the Judge's death, which he mentions, is fairly written on his tomb in Harwood church; yet it does not appear from thence that he had seen it; nor is it likely that it was legible when he wrote the latter part of his Worthies; because most of the brass margins which contained the monumental inscripwith nothing to confirm the same, it may here carry with it sufficient caution, or advertisement, that others may not be misguided by it. It is also observed, that the Arms of England are carved or painted at the foot of the Judge's tomb, with those of France, Semé Fleurs de Lis (k); which Henry V. reduced to three of those flowers, not long after he came to the crown, being the same number then worn by Charles VI. of France (l): and thus much is all we have here to observe of the ancient, valiant, and virtuous family, as Camden styles it, of the Gascoignes.

(k) Mr Lethieullier's Letter, as above.

(l) Fr. Sandford, as before, fol. 277.

tions in churches, were torn away, by the sacrilegious plunderers in the grand rebellion; whereof there are visible instances in other parts of my church. But the inscription communicated to you, which I received of a curious gentleman in London, is probably more to be relied on, than that in the printed authority aforesaid, because it seems to have been transcribed from the tomb when it was entire; being preserved in an old volume of monumental draughts, and arms from the Windows of several remarkable churches in Yorkshire, as they might be standing perhaps an hundred and fifty years since; from which volume, among the MSS. in the Herald's Office, it was copied, and sent me by the said gentleman, Mr Smart Lethieullier of Bond-street.

There is a monument under the arch in the south wall of the chapel, where Judge Gascoigne's is, which, as I suppose, is his father, and mother's, from the numerous progeny represented in effigie on one side, and at the end thereof; which progeny agrees pretty well with that in the pedigree; only, in this, a part is probably left out, for want of room. I take the other monument under the opposite arch, on the side of the great chancel, to be that of his grandfather and grand-mother, who was the heiress of Gawthorp.

When I saw the pedigree aforesaid at Sir Edward Gascoigne's, and some other antiquities, I received from him the impression of an original ancient seal, belonging to that family. It exhibits a person setting, who is thought to be William the Conqueror, and delivering a deed, it seems, to a person kneeling before him, who is supposed to be one of the family of Gascoigne, and to receive thereby a grant of lands. Other two persons are also represented kneeling by him, probably for the same purpose; and there seems to be the head of another standing by the Conqueror, as one of his officers or attendants. The legend round the seal is SIR WILLEME GASQVONE. Mr Richard Gascoigne has left some observations on this seal in MS (which are in Sir Edward's hands) who writes his name as here set down, to the best of my remembrance. If these, or any other particulars I can furnish you with, will answer your enquiries, it will be very agreeable to,

S I R,

Your most Obedient

Humble Servant,

R. KNIGHT (114).

(114) He died at his Vicarage in Yorkshire, in July 1747.

Here it may not be improper to remark, that the deed or patent, appearing, in this old family seal, to be given by W. the Conqueror, or one of his successors, to an ancestor of Judge Gascoigne, seems to be the same, which Mr Richard Gascoigne is represented in his picture beforementioned, to be holding in his hand, and doubtless he was possess'd of the old grant or patent so painted therein; which in all probability we should find he has explained, or mentioned the contents of, in his said observations upon that seal, were the curious obliged with an edition thereof from the press. Another account we have also received of this seal

(115), with some further constructions of the images upon it; which, as they may be of use towards attaining the full knowledge or explanation thereof, we shall here also recite: 'There is still preserved in this family, the seal of the first William, the inscription about it, in Gothic characters, and his name spelt in the Gascon manner, SIGILLUM WILLELMI DE GASQVONE. There is represented on it, a King, sitting in a chair of state, with another person by him, who seems to be a coasseffor, and delivering a charter to a knight on his knees before him, agreeable to the custom both of the Conqueror's and Henry II's times: and perhaps the grant referred to by this device, when the eldest son of that King Henry was associated with him in the royalty (116).'

(115) In Memoirs of the Gascoignes MS. as before.

As for the copy, said in the letter above, to have been taken of the Inscription on the Chief Justice's monument, from a MS in the Herald's Office wherein it was preserved, before that brass edging was ript off whereon it was inscribed; and which, as Mr Knight has also above said, was sent by the late Mr William Green, an ingenious carver and statuary some time of Wakefield (117), in a letter to the writer of this article; that letter, containing the said inscription, is also still in being; and the substance in it, of what concerns this matter is, That in, or about the year 1736, Sir John Fortescue Aland (118) being in Yorkshire, took a journey of some miles, to see Judge Gascoigne's monument; but finding no epitaph on it, and Mr Knight the Vicar of Harwood distant from home, he returned unsatisfied of the intelligence he wanted; as it was thought he intended to publish something concerning the said Judge. But afterwards, by letters from London, he sought and obtained of Mr Knight, such an account of the antiquities in Harwood church, &c. relating to this family, as we have printed above: yet Sir John received not the said inscription, because Mr Knight was not then possessed of it. And after Mr Lethieullier had oblig'd him with it, Mr Knight sent him, at his request, or in return of the favour, a cast of Judge Gascoigne's face from the effigies on his monument, taken, or finished off, by Mr Green, in plaister of Paris; and he gave Mr Green a copy of the Inscription; which, as he sent it to us, in a letter (119), dated a fortnight before that above was written by Mr Knight, we shall here exactly transcribe;

after having first observed, that in one part of Mr Lethieullier's letter, above quoted in the text, it is said to be the effigies of his second Lady, Joan, daughter of Sir William Pickering, which lies at the right-hand of the Judge on his Monument, but in this inscription, to be that of his first Lady, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Mowbray: and yet we believe, the great difference in the chronological assertion of the Judge's death, no less than sixteen years later than any other account, will be a greater difficulty to digest. But here it is, just as we received it *Hic Jacet Willielmus Gascoigne, nuper Capitalis Justiciar' de Banco Henrici nuper Regis Angliæ, et Elizabetha uxor ejus: Qui quidem Willielmus obiit Die Dominica, 17<sup>o</sup>. Die Decembris, A. (120) If any Reference to the Volume in the Herald's Office, from whence this Inscription is said to have been transcribed, had been sent with it, we should have here cited it, for the more easy examination thereof.

GASTRELL (FRANCIS), late Bishop of Chester, a man of great learning, and an excellent preacher, was born at Slapton in Northamptonshire, about the year 1662 (a). His education was at Westminster-school, under the famous Busby; from whence he was elected Student of Christ-Church in Oxford. There he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; in 1684; that of Master, April 20, 1687; and that of Bachelor of Divinity, June 23, 1694 (b). About the time he took this last degree, he was Preacher to the Honourable Society of Lincoln's-inn: and was so eminent and admired for his sound, elegant, and useful manner of preaching, that he was appointed to preach in the year 1697, the Lecture founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle, Esq; The eight Sermons he made upon that occasion, were published by him in 1697, in one continued Discourse [A], that the strength of the proofs therein used might appear more plainly from their connexion (c). By way of continuation, or second part, of the same most important subject, he published in 1699, another Discourse, to which he gave the title of, 'The Certainty of the Christian Revelation, and the Necessity of Believing it, established [B].' On the 13th of July 1700, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (d): and, being Chaplain to the House of Commons, was presented by Queen Anne to a Canonry of Christ-Church in Oxford; to which he was instituted January 5, 1702-3, and installed the 16th of the same month (e). He published, in 1702, 'Some Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that Controversy [C].' And afterwards put out another piece against Dr Samuel Clarke, upon that subject [D]. But his most considerable work, next to his Boyle's Lectures, was an excellent book, which he intitled, 'The Christian Institutes, or the sincere Word of God [E].' He also published in 1707, a Sermon preached at the Anniversary meeting

[A] The eight Sermons he made upon that occasion, were published by him in 1697, in one continued Discourse. He intitled it, 'The Certainty and Necessity of Religion in general, or the first Grounds and Principles of Humane Duty establish'd; In eight Sermons, preach'd at St Martin's in the Fields, at the Lecture for the year 1697, founded by the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; 8vo.'

In the Preface he observes, That 'in every age of the world we have any account of left us, the Wickedness of Mankind has much the largest share in their History; and if we believed the Complaints of the several Historians, who acquaint us with what passed in their days, we should be disposed to conclude, that those particular times, we were reading of, were certainly a great deal worse than any that went before, and that consequently Vice having been always growing, and gathering strength, as the world advanced in age, the present Generation of men must far exceed all their predecessors in wickedness: But though (says he) I have a very ill opinion of the age we now live in, I cannot look upon this reflection, as just and well grounded. The true occasion, both of the Observation, and the Complaints grounded upon it, he takes to be that variety of Wickedness, whereby the several Ages and Countries of the world have been distinguished from one another. For there have been as many different methods and fashions of sinning, among men, as forms of government; and as many changes and revolutions in vice as in Empire. Some periods of time have been remarkable for open Cruelty, Rapine, and Oppression; others for Treachery, and private Revenge, and all the secret ways of destruction: Other ages there have been, when Luxury and Riot, and all manner of extravagant Lust and Debauchery, were the publick reigning Vices: Sometimes Profaneness, and a publick Contempt of Religion have prevailed; at other times, Indifference, and a careless Neglect of all that is good; sometimes Hypocrisy, and an open Pretence to piety and virtue, have been used for a cover to a close and secret practice of all manner of vice; and at other times, men have had the Impudence to defend the worst actions, by endeavouring to make them appear consistent with religion. These, and many more such like differences, are observable in the History of former time; but the peculiar distinguishing character of this Age is a publick denial of Religion, and all the obligations of it, with an endeavour to disprove the Evidences brought for it, and to offer a more rational Scheme of Libertinism.'

In the first Lecture, he thus defines Religion. 'By Religion in general, I mean all that Worship, Service, or Obedience, we, that call ourselves Men, are to pay to God; or whatever we are, in any 'respect, obliged to, upon the prospect of his favour, or under the penalty of his displeasure, in this, or a future state.'

And, a few pages lower, he gives the following Description of the Supreme Being. 'I conceive God to be One Unchangeable Being, of an intelligent nature, who always necessarily existed of himself, who knows every thing that can be known, who can do every thing that is possible to be done, who does every thing he wills, and nothing but what he wills himself, who enjoys an unalterable state of the greatest happiness that can be enjoyed, who never wills or does any thing inconsistent with this state, who makes himself the ultimate end of all he does, and next to that the good or happiness of all such beings as are capable of it; which, together with all other beings, and every thing that belongs to them, were from him, and depend upon him for their continuance; and lastly who brings about whatever he wills or designs, by the fittest and most proper means.'

[B] The certainty of the Christian Revelation, and the Necessity of Believing it, established. The rest of the title, is, 'In opposition to all the Cavils and Insinuations of such as pretend to allow Natural Religion, and reject the Gospel.' It is dedicated to the Lord Chief Justice Holt; to whom the ingenious Author pays very handsome compliments, and with a great deal of truth.

[C] Some Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that Controversy. To the third Edition, which came out in 1707, is subjoined, A Vindication of it, in answer to Antony Collins's Essay concerning the use of Reason.

[D] And afterwards put out another piece against Dr Samuel Clarke, upon that subject. This was intitled, 'Remarks upon Dr Clarke's Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, by the Author of Some Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the ways of managing that Controversy.' Lond. 1714, 8vo. Dr Clarke published an Answer to it, at the end of his Reply to Mr Nelson; and observes, That the Objections in those Remarks, were set forth to particular advantage, by the skill of a very able and Learned Writer; and proposed with a reasonable and good spirit.

[E] The Christian Institutes, or the sincere Word of God. The rest of the title is, 'Being a plain and impartial Account of the whole Faith and Duty of a Christian. Collected out of the Writings of the Old and New Testament: Digested under proper heads, and delivered in the words of Scripture.' It is dedicated, 'To the worshipful the Masters of the Bench, and the rest of the Members of the honourable Society of Lincoln's-Inn. And was at first printed in Italic, without any references to the scriptures; which were added in the second edition. In the meeting of the Charity-schools in London [F]. In 1711, he was Proctor in Convocation for the Chapter of Oxford; and made one of the Chaplains in ordinary to Queen Anne. Upon the translation of Sir William Dawes to the Archbishoprick of York, Dr Gastrell being nominated Bishop of Chester in his room, was consecrated in Somerfet-house Chapel April 4, 1714, and allowed to keep his Canonry in commendam with that small Bishoprick (f). But being one of those Prelates that were advanced during the four last years of Queen Anne, the Ministry of King George I. thought fit to frown upon him, without any sufficient reason; which so much disgusted him, that he opposed and protested against most of their measures (g). He shewed his zeal for the University of Oxford, in 1717, when it was attacked in the House of Lords, upon account of the pretended riot on the Prince of Wales's birth-day (b). And when the Bill was depending, for inflicting pains and penalties, on his old friend and fellow-collegian Dr Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, he spoke in his behalf [G]. In the year 1719, &c. he had (out of a tender regard for the Honour and Interest of the Universities) a contest with the Crown, about filling up the Wardenship of Manchester-college. For Samuel Peploe, Master of Arts of the University of Oxford, having obtained a grant of that Wardenship from King George I; and it being a necessary qualification, according to the foundation-charter of the said college, that he should be Bachelor of Divinity; instead of taking this degree regularly at Oxford [H], he procured a faculty for it from the Archbishop of Canterbury. But Dr Gastrell, who, as Bishop of Chester, was to admit him; not thinking a Lambeth-degree to be a good and effectual qualification in law for any ecclesiastical dignity or benefice, refused to give him institution, and published his Case [I]. However, the matter being referred the preface, he observes, that 'several Abstracts, or Summaries of Christian Doctrine, had been drawn up, for the benefit of such as will not be at the pains to search and study the Scriptures; such as, by reason of their age, are not capable of reading them with judgment; and such as, through some prejudice or evil disposition of mind, may be apt to misapply them.—But the great misfortune is, that these very books, which were intended to lead us more easily and certainly into the knowledge of Scripture, are most of them so framed, as to represent the Religion there delivered to us, in a false light.—The chief occasion of which abuse, is, the many Differences and Divisions that have happened among Christians, both with regard to their Faith, and to their Rules and Measures of serving God; which Differences, as they plainly rose at first, from a greater deference that was paid, either to the Traditions, or Writings of Men, than to the Word of God; so have they been kept up ever since, by a greater care that hath been taken by the several sects, to instruct their children in those things which distinguish them from one another, than to teach them the common Doctrines and Duties of their most holy profession: From whence it follows, that the books composed by them for that purpose, must needs give a very different, and the greatest part of them, for that reason, a very false account, of the Christian Religion.—Now, for the better removing any false opinions we may have received from those different accounts which are given us of Scripture by other men, as well as preventing any wrong judgments we might be disposed to make of the Word of God, when we read it ourselves; I have often thought (says he) that it would be a work of great use, to collect out of the writings of the Old and New Testament, all the Doctrines and Precepts therein dispersed; to lay them together in such an order and method, as to give the Christian reader a full and distinct view of his whole Faith and Duty at once; and by keeping all along the Language of Scripture, to leave no room for misrepresentation. This is what I have endeavour'd to do in the following Treatise, as being fully satisfied of the truth of what a great writer observes, (1) That we cannot speak of the things of God better than in the words of God.

[F] A Sermon preached at the Anniversary meeting of the Charity-schools in London. It is intitled, 'The Religious Education of poor Children recommended, in a Sermon preach'd in the parish Church of St Sepulchres, June 5, 1707. Being Thursday in Whitson-week, at the Anniversary meeting of the Gentlemen concerned in promoting the Charity-schools lately erected in the Cities of London and Westminster: And of the poor Children educated in 'the said Schools, in number about three thousand.' On Psalm cxlvii. 12, 13.—In one part of it (2), he has this pretty allusion, or comparison.—'These Schools are not like the Popish Monasteries, and other places of religious retirement; those standing Pools of Charity, which, if they do not stink and grow corrupt, yet, being pent up within narrow bounds, carry no refreshment or fruitfulness to other parts. These are pure and wholesome Streams, which are always running, and dispersing themselves into different channels, and by that means, communicating their virtues to all the dry and barren parts of the land. The children that are here educated, will afterwards be distributed into many families, &c.'

He also published, without his name, A moral Proof of a Future State. And perhaps some other pieces, of that kind.

[G] He spoke in his behalf.] The substance of his speech was. 'That extraordinary proceedings may be recurr'd to, upon extraordinary occasions, and when they are evidently necessary for the preservation of the State; but that this was very far from the present case, since the Conspiracy, in which the Bishop of Rochester was charged to have had a share, had been discover'd and disappointed long before (3).'

[H] Instead of taking this degree regularly at Oxford.] When Bishop Gastrell first scrupled to admit the Archbishop's Degree for a qualification, he said [to use his own words] to Mr Peploe; 'That, being in all respects qualified to take his Degree regularly in the University, he might proceed that way, without any fear of being denied; but, if he desired any Favour, usually indulg'd to other persons, that I would endeavour to obtain it for him; and I did not doubt but the University would readily grant it.' Upon what views and motives [adds the Bishop] Mr Peploe declined taking his Bachelor of Divinity's Degree in Oxford, when he had actually prepared the best part of the Exercise required in order to it, I cannot tell; but sure I am that he might have done it without hurting the Archbishop's pretensions (4).

[I] And published his Case.] Under this title, 'The Bishop of Chester's Case, with relation to the Wardenship of Manchester. In which is shewn, That no other Degrees but such as are taken in the University, can be deemed legal Qualifications for any ecclesiastical preferment in England.' Oxford 1721. fol. As this Book is now grown very scarce, the Reader will not be displeas'd with an extract of it. The learned Author then observes (5), That the Authority of Parliament, upon which the Archbishop grounds his pretended Right, is Statute 25 Hen VIII. c. 21. But there being no mention of Degrees in that Act; nor any thing that, upon a careful perusal of the Act, can lead any one to think of Degrees; the Power referred to the King's Bench, was decided in favour of Mr Peploe. Bishop Gastrell did not long survive this conquest over himself and the Universities; for he died at his Canon's lodgings in Chrst-Church November 14, 1725, in the 62d. or 63d. year of his age: and was buried in the Cathedral there, without any monument (i). But he left a sufficient monument of himself in his excellent writings. And his virtues are far from being yet forgotten. Besides his other honourable employments, he was one of the Commissioners for building the fifty new Churches in London: and a member of the Society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts (k). He was succeeded in the See of Chester, by Mr Peploe abovementioned.

now challenged by the Archbishop, of conferring Degrees, must be couched under the general Powers there conveyed to him, which are ranked under these two heads, viz 1. 'All manner of licences, dispensations, faculties, &c. as heretofore hath been used and accustomed to be had at the See of Rome, — or of any person by authority of the same. — 2. All other licences, dispensations, &c. for all such causes and matters as shall be convenient and necessary to be had, for the honour and surety of the King, and the wealth and profit of the realm.' But Degrees, as he shews (6), were not used and accustomed to be had, for these kingdoms at the See of Rome; because no body ever had a good, just, and reasonable cause to have recourse to Rome for them, there being always a landing Power within this realm, from whence they might be obtained. And it was not likely that any persons would be at an excessive charge to obtain Degrees from Rome, which they might take at a cheaper rate here at home; namely, in our Universities. — Moreover, in the same Statute of 25 Hen VIII, it being enacted, 'That there shall be two books made and drawn of one tenour, in which shall be contained the Taxes of all customable Dispensations, Faculties, and other writings, wont to be sped at Rome:' Therefore, from two entries, made in a Taxation-book, now remaining in the Faculty-office (7), some have inferred the Archbishop's right of conferring Degrees. — But our learned Author shews this Tax-book (now in the Faculty-office) to be of no manner of authority, or validity (8). For it is only a copy of an ancient paper-manuscript, taken about the year 1680; And that ancient paper manuscript, was not one of the original Tax-books directed to be made by the foresaid statute; as appears by this very material reason, among others, Because it is not signed or subscribed by any body; whereas the Act positively orders, that every Leaf of those Books (which were enacted to be made and drawn of one tenour), and both sides of every leaf, should be subscribed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor of England, the Lord Treasurer, and the two Chief Justices of both Benches for the time being. And such subscription was absolutely necessary to render the said books authentick. — Besides, in that ancient MS. paper, the number of heads upon which Faculties were granted, are 225: whereas by an order of Council in 1576, they were restrained to 13. And consequently it cannot be supposed, that a book where 225 several kind of Faculties were taxed, should be looked upon as an authentick standard for granting Faculties, at a time when 13 only were judged grantable, which were no way distinguished from the other in the old book (9). Therefore, our learned Author thinks, that the said ancient paper manuscript was only a loose collection of various matters, taken out of several different books, relating both to the ordinary and extraordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Rome, put together, with a design to compose out of it such a Tax book as the Act of Parliament directed to be made, and which he believes was never made (10). — In considering what the Practice hath been with relation to Degrees conferred by the Archbishop, since Statute 25 Hen VIII; He observes, there are very few instances of such Faculties granted before the Restauration (11) And concludes, that no such Custom of conferring Degrees can be pleaded, as will establish the Right now claimed by the Archbishop; because Custom must be certain, uniform, constant, and uninterrupted; whereas the Practice in this case has been various, both as to Form and Authority, with a long intermission of at least 80 years, after a very considerable change made in the first ground and foundation of the pretence (12). — After having duly examined several Acts of Parliament, Canons of Councils, Records, Articles of Enquiry at Archbishops and Bishops Visitations, &c. he draws what may be called his general conclusion, That Degrees conferred by the Archbishops of Canterbury could never be reputed or taken to be any more than bare Titles of Honour, which were attended with no legal or canonical Effect whatsoever; and as they are conferred without Investiture, so they give no right to any habit at all (13).
