fiercely upon the left wing of the other, (consisting mostly of horse) and prevailed altogether, for the Parliament troops ran almost all away in that wing, and many of their foot companies dismayed with their flight, fled all away before they had stood one charge; Colonel Essex being utterly forsaken by that whole brigade which he commanded, went himself into the van, where he performed excellent service both by direction and execution, till, at the last, he was shot in the thigh, of which he shortly after died. Some part of their disheartening was caused by the revolt of their own side, for Sir Faithful Fortescue, at the beginning of the fight, instead of charging the enemy discharged his pistol on the ground, and with his troop wheeling about ran to the King's army, to whom he had formerly given notice thereof by his Cornet. The Parliament army had undoubtedly been ruined that day, and an absolute victory gained on the King's side, if Prince Rupert and his pursuing troops had been more temperate in plundering so untimely as they did, and had wheeled about to assist their distressed friends in other parts of the army; for Prince Rupert followed the chase to Keynton town, where the carriages of the army were, which they presently pillaged, using great cruelty, as was afterwards related, to the unarmed waggoners and labouring men; a great number of the flying Parliament soldiers were slain in that chase, which lasted two miles beyond Keynton, and so far till the pursuers were forced to retire, having met with Colonel Hampden, who marched with the other brigade of the army that brought on the artillery.' As to the King's standard it was given by the General to his Secretary Mr Chambers, from whom it was taken by one Captain Smith and carried back to the King, to whom the General intended to have restored it in case it had not been thus recovered (29). The Parliament claimed the victory on account of their keeping the field of battle, for they stood all night upon the same ground where the King's army was drawn up; and as to the King's title to the victory, it consisted in taking of Banbury the next day, from whence it appears that great faults were committed on both sides. If the Earl of Essex had marched to Banbury, the reputation of his arms had been much raised, which at that time was a thing of great consequence, and if after the taking of Banbury the King had marched to London, he would have reaped all the fruits of a victory whether he had it or not (30).

irregular built place, would not admit of proper fortifications; and besides, the garrison wanted powder to such a degree, that, in ten days time, it was surrendered; and for this Colonel Richard Fielding, who made the capitulation, the Governor being wounded, was sentenced at Oxford to lose his head; but, however, he did not suffer (a). The articles granted by the Earl of Essex were but ill observed by his soldiers, of which he shewed his resentment in a very high degree (b). After this success great things were expected from him by the Parliament; but a sickness which prevailed in his army, and it's not being supplied so well as hitherto it had been, weakened him very much, and put it out of his power to do any thing of importance; which so much irritated some of the leading men in Parliament, that they talked of removing him, and of giving the command to Sir William Waller; but he being presently after defeated at Rowndway-Down, put an end to that scheme (c). The Lord-General Essex was not at all a stranger to what was said and thought of him at London; and, as he was a man of great plainness and sincerity, he was resolved to leave them in no doubt as to what were his real intentions; and, therefore, wrote the Parliament a letter of so extraordinary a nature (d), that we have judged it necessary to insert it in the notes. [I]. While the Earl, with his army, quartered about Thame in Oxfordshire, they suffered not a little by the continual enterprizes of Prince Rupert, who had a numerous body of horse in their neighbourhood; and his endeavours would, probably, have been more successful against any other General than the Earl of Essex, who was not only extremely vigilant, but also very ready to repair in person to any posts that were attacked, by which he prevented the ill consequences that would otherways have attended sudden impressions (e). All his care, and all his courage, expressed in their service, did not, however, entirely satisfy the House of Commons; as, on the other hand, his Lordship was very far from being well pleased with that temper which prevailed amongst them; and most of the Nobility who had hitherto concurred with them, inclined now to the Earl's opinion (f). At this juncture it appears, from the best authority, that the King and the Earl of Essex were equally desirous of putting an end to this unhappy war, and that each had it in his power, as well as will, to have accomplished this good design, if both had not suffered themselves to be fatally diverted from their intentions, and thereby lost an opportunity, the like of which never offered itself to either of them any more (g) [K]. The King, over-perswaded by those who had the

[I] To insert it in the notes.] We have in another place mentioned the disposition of the Parliament at this juncture, when two parties, that agreed in nothing else, joined in pressing the Earl to advance towards Oxford, one desiring nothing so much as to make an end of the war, and the other, with equal passion, thirsting for the destruction of the King; the Lord-General Essex knew, that the former was as much out of his power as the latter was distant from his will. It was very much against his judgment that he advanced to Thame, where the heat of the weather, and the marshiness of the soil, increased the distemper in his army, so that hundreds were disabled in a day; yet he still received the same pressing messages from London, in answer to which he wrote the following letter (31).

(31) Rushworth's Collections, Vol. II. P. iii. p. 290, 291.

Mr Speaker,

I Would have given you the true relation of the skirmish on Sunday last, between some of the horse and the enemy near Buckingham, but Sir Philip Stapleton and Colonel Goodwin being then upon the spot, I refer the relation thereof unto them. Since when, being informed that the King had sent more forces to Buckingham to maintain that place, and bring these parts into contribution, where the enemy stayed until the army came within two miles of them, and then made haste away towards Banbury, notwithstanding they had persuaded the people that they would not quit the place till they had beaten me out of the country: I then understanding that they were fled, held it not fit to go to the town with my army, but sent Colonel Middleton with some horse to clear that town and coast, which they did, and then advised where to quarter with most conveniency for our army, and most ready for the enemy, the Queen's forces being like to join with them very suddenly; and that our army may the better serve the Parliament and city, and counties adjacent, and be more safely supplied with money from London, and lie most conveniently to join the forces with the Lord Gray in Northamptonshire, I was advised to march to Great Brickhill, as the most fit place for all purposes, the enemies chief strength being in horse, and this army neither recruited with horse, arms, nor saddles, it is impossible to keep the counties from being plundered, nor to fight with them but when and where they list, we being forced when we move to march with the whole army, which can be but slowly, so that the counties must suffer much wrong, and the cries of poor people are infinite. If it were thought fit to send to his Majesty, to have peace, with the settling of religion, the laws and liberties of the subject, and to bring unto just trial those chief delinquents that have brought all this mischief to both kingdoms; and as my Lord of Bristol spake once in Parliament, how we may be secured to have those things performed hereafter. Or else, if his Majesty shall please to absent himself, there may be a day set down to put a period to all these unhappy distractions by a battle, which when and where they shall choose, that may be thought any way indifferent, I shall be ready to perform that duty I owe you; and the propositions to be agreed upon between his Majesty and the Parliament, may be sent to such an indifferent place, that both armies may be drawn near the one to the other, that if peace be not concluded, it may be ended by the sword: no officers of the army to be of the committee, nor no intercourse to be between them.

S I R,

Great Brickhill,
July 9, 1643.

I am your assured friend,

[K] To either of them any more.] In order to explain this matter thoroughly, which is in itself equally curious and important, we must observe that factions ran very high both at Oxford and at Westminster, yet those who wished well to the King and kingdom had the same views in both places, that is, were very desirous of seeing peace restored, and the constitution preserved, by an agreement upon moderate terms. In order to this, the King was advised to publish the utmost concessions he was inclined to make, and to give the strongest assurances in his power with respect to their being constantly adhered to, and then to have marched with his army, which was in a very good condition, directly up to London, which if he had done, says Whitlocke

the least knowledge even, and perhaps the least affection for, his cause, having a better army than he had yet brought into the field, marched towards Gloucester, which, on the 10th of August, he invested (b). It had a numerous garrison, commanded by Colonel Malley, who made a vigorous and obstinate resistance, and this weakened the King's army exceedingly, which, without doubt, was least fit for that service. The city of London was greatly alarmed at the news of this siege, which affected them in their trade for the present, and gave them a bad prospect of their security for the future; the Parliament made an advantage of this disposition in their own people, and, on the twenty-first of the same month, published an order, forbidding any shops to be opened till Gloucester was relieved (i). In order to effect this, all ways and means were practised to settle the mind of the General, and next, part of the London trained bands and auxiliaries were ordered to recruit his army, so that, on the 29th of the same month, the Earl of Essex marched from Aylesbury with an army very little short of twenty thousand men (k). He proceeded with much caution, and though his motions were observed by General Wilmot, with a great body of horse, yet he carried his point, obliged the King to raise the siege, entered Gloucester in triumph September 15th, and, soon after, surprized Cirencester, where the King had two regiments of horse, and very considerable magazines (l). His Lordship continuing his march into Berkshire, Prince Rupert, with his horse, incommoded his rear very much; and the King, with his foot, being arrived near Newberry, the Earl found himself obliged to fight, which accordingly he did, on the 20th of September, with very great reputation to himself, in respect both to courage and conduct; though, after all, it was but a drawn battle, or if any, the King had the title to the victory, for by it he opened a passage to London, if he had lost no time in the prosecution of that design, for which, it is supposed, he fought (m). But as he let slip this opportunity, so Essex improved that negligence, and, with great diligence and dexterity, marched to Reading, and from thence nearer London. His army being quartered at Windsor, and in the neighbourhood, the Earl, with some of the great officers, went to London, where the Speaker came to compliment him at Essex-House, as did the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, in their scarlet gowns; and his behaviour at Newberry fight was magnified to as high a degree, as their eloquence could reach (n). The Earl afterwards returned to the army; but, upon receiving orders to join Sir William Waller, he sent for answer, That he held it not for their service; after which jealousies daily increased, and, at last, a committee was appointed for recruiting and reforming the army, which gave him a great deal of distaste (o) and uneasiness, yet his opinion, That he was bound in honour to do nothing to the prejudice of those who intrusted him, hindered him from giving any countenance to the applications he received from the Lords and Commons assembled at Oxford, while those in Parliament, who disliked his conduct, took the necessary measures for curtailing his army, and making the forces he commanded inferior to those at the head of which they had placed their own creatures (p). In the spring of the year 1644 the Earl of Essex, in obedience to the pressing solicitations of his masters, marched into Oxfordshire, and, advancing to Abingdon, General Wilmot quitted the town upon his approach, and retired towards Oxford, which gave him an opportunity of advancing within a mile of that place on one side, at the same time that Sir William Waller, with his forces, came almost as near it on the other (q). The King was thought to be effectually blocked up in that city, and this situation of his equally alarmed his own friends and the enemies of the Earl of Essex. One of the King's Privy-Council apprehended his situation to be so desperate, that he advised him to render himself into the hands of Essex; to which the King answered, It was possible he might fall into Essex's hands, but it should be when he was dead (r). On the other hand, the inveterate party in the Parliament apprehended nothing so much as that this might really happen; and therefore they wrote a short and peremptory letter, directing him, in case of any application of that kind, to do nothing without their orders (s). The King, on the 29th of May, quitted Oxford in the dusk of the evening, marched all night between the two armies, and got safe

Whitlocke (32), it is believed he might have done his business; but the King was prevailed upon by the Lord Culpepper to undertake the siege of Gloucester, which, by an obstinate resistance, ruined his army to such a degree as he could never retrieve. Sir Edward Walker, who had the best opportunity of knowing the King's real intentions (33) in such points, affirms, that he was afraid ever to comply with that advice, from an apprehension that there would be no restraining the licence of the soldiers, and that by concluding the war in this manner, he should totally destroy his capital. But without determining any thing as to the King's motive, certain it is that he lost his opportunity. As to the Earl of Essex, the zeal he shewed for the good of the nation, and the authority he had by being at the head of the army, gave many of the Lords courage to speak their minds freely, and to shew their distaste to violent measures; but finding they lost ground in Parliament by the exorbitant stretches of power which the House of Commons assumed to themselves, and which the Republicans had with great address transferred to a Committee, where they had a constant majority, the Lords proposed to the Earl of Essex their retiring, with their friends in the House of Commons, to him and the army for protection, which they judged must soon have brought those who remained at Westminster to a compliance (34). The Earl thought this might prove a blemish to his honour, upon which the Lords, not thinking themselves safe any longer where they were, withdrew into the King's quarters. Thus this opportunity was lost of doing all that the Earl took up arms to do, while his and the King's antagonists, by considering nothing as just or unjust, but as it contributed to or clashed with their views, brought their projects to bear, and the kingdom into confusion.

safe out of their reach (t). Upon this the Earl of Essex sent Waller orders to follow him, as having a lighter body of troops; about this he made some scruples, but the Earl insisting upon his orders, Waller, at length, obeyed, but complained to the Parliament, who wrote in very quick terms to the Lord-General, who subscribed his answer, Your innocent, though suspected, servant (u).

He then marched into Dorsetshire, where he took Weymouth, and relieved Lyme, while the King, in the mean time, with great address, gave Waller the slip, and returned to Oxford on the twenty-first of June, where, in a short time, he assembled an army of ten thousand men, and, gaining some advantage over Waller, followed the Earl of Essex into the West, where all the forces he then had were

(w). By the persuasion of Lord Roberts, who believed he had a great interest in Cornwall, Essex was engaged to march thither, where, by degrees, the King drove him to the sea, and shut him up in such a manner, that he could neither tell how to fight, or find any thing for his soldiers to eat. In this situation the King wrote him a very kind letter, with proposals for a treaty, which he rejected, as he had done a proposal of the same sort from the King's officers, assigning, as his reason, that he had no authority (x).

In these desperate circumstances his horse, under the command of Sir William Balfour, broke through, or rather slipped by, the King's army, and, on the first of September, the Earl of Essex, with a few of the officers he most esteemed, embarked at Foy, and escaped to Plymouth, leaving his foot under Major-General Skippon, who submitted to be disarmed, gave up their artillery and ammunition, and were conducted through the King's quarters into those of the Parliament (y).

The Earl himself quickly embarked on board a man of war, and returned to London, where he was received with all outward marks of respect and esteem (z); which gave him, however, but very little satisfaction [L]. In the month of October, the armies under the Earl of Manchester and Sir William Waller having joined, the Earl of Essex went down again, to put himself at the head of that army which was intended to attack the King in his return from the West to Oxford (a):

Rebellion, p. 409.

Great preparations were made for that purpose, and great expectations there was at London of the event; but, before this could be accomplished, the Earl of Essex fell sick; upon which a committee of Lords and Commons were appointed to visit him, and to express the affection of both Houses to him; but, if we may judge from what Whitlocke

[L] But very little satisfaction. We have very full accounts of the state and ceremony with which the Lord General was received by the Parliament, who were extremely well pleased with his sending them the letters written him by the King's officers, and by his Majesty himself, on the subject of peace. Perhaps some amongst them were the more ceremonious, as thinking they had him now in their power, and that, understanding as they did the art of raising money, and obliging the people to pay for a rod to scourge themselves, he might at length be laid aside like an old staff now they found their strength increase, though at their first setting out they were not able to move without leaning upon him. As for the Earl, he was very sensible of their former treatment, concerning which a Noble writer gives us a free and full detail, which cannot but prove satisfactory to the reader. Having mentioned the Earl's detaching Sir William Waller after the King, while he marched westward himself, contrary to the route that had been laid down for him, he proceeds thus (35): 'Accordingly he gave that account to the Parliament and Committee of the two kingdoms, with his desire of their directions. They were so mad to see themselves defeated of their plot, that they would not, for many days, return him any answer at all; his disobedience was blown up and trumpeted about by them and their agents: some of whom did not stick to say, It were better my Lord of Essex and his whole army were lost and ruined, than the Parliament not obeyed, and that by their consents, he nor his army should be looked after or cared for more: a maxim they have forgotten now, in the case of Sir Thomas Fairfax and his army's not disobedience, but open rebellion, but they were as good as their words then, and did most maliciously, wilfully, and treacherously, (as to the Parliament's cause, which they seemed to be zealous in) suffer General and army to be lost, and the whole west left farther out of the Parliament's reach, than at any time before. Sir Arthur Haslerigg posted up to London, breathing out nothing but ruin and destruction to the Earl of Essex, spoke it out in the hearing of several persons, that he would ruin him or be ruined himself. His malice and violence was so great at the Committee of the two kingdoms, where he and his party were prevalent, that a report was thence brought down to the House of Commons, by which

' Sir William Waller was taken off from following the King, and by that means the King was left at liberty to bend his whole force for the West, after my Lord of Essex, which he presently did. At last they left my Lord of Essex at liberty to proceed in that western expedition, but with a resolution to let him perish. He takes in Weymouth, and some other towns, goes on as far as Cornwall, whither the King's forces follow him at the heels, cut off all provision from him, press upon him exceedingly, and put him to very great streights. He engaged in a country enclosed with deep ditches and strong fences, that he could neither break through nor march away, but sends letter upon letter, messenger upon messenger, to the Parliament, representing his condition, and how easy it was, with a small force sent upon the back of the King's army, if but only a good party of horse, to stop their provisions and turn the tables, streighten them, and free him, than which certainly nothing had been more easy, and would have saved the kingdom a mass of treasure, and thousands of good mens lives, which the continuance of the war, after that time, did cost. But our masters did not desire then to see the war at an end, they had not the sword in those hands they would have it, for to break the King's forces, well knowing they must then have had a peace, and such a peace as had carried with it an establishment of the King's government, a keeping up the Nobility and Gentry; all things must have returned into their proper channel, and the security of the Parliament and kingdom being provided for, the law of the land must have taken place, their arbitrary empire been at an end, and their design wholly defeated. Therefore my Lord of Essex must not be relieved, but sacrificed to their ambition; the King's army must be yet preserved, to give them a colour to new model theirs, and put the power into the base hands of their creatures, which should keep the kingdom in a perpetual bondage; and though they ended the war with the King, yet never made peace, but continued to grind the faces, and break the backs of the people, with taxes and free quarter, to maintain an army when no enemy was left; in a word, they govern by the sword, the height of all misery and slavery any land can undergo.'

has written upon this subject, there was something more in the matter, and they were instructed to make him a compliment of another kind (b) [M]. However that might be, certain it is, that, when the Parliament army surrounded the King's, who was much inferior in strength, in the town of Newberry, and attacked him on the 27th of the month last mentioned, the Earl of Essex was not in that action, which the Parliament called a victory, but the King made a good retreat, put his artillery into Dunnington-Castle, and, about a week after, having recruited his forces, marched thither, and brought off his train. After this engagement the Earl of Essex gave orders for slighting Newberry, with which the Parliament was much offended (c). On his return to London he found things in great confusion, and, which was not a little extraordinary, his two rivals, the Earl of Manchester and Sir William Waller, as much dissatisfied as himself, and, in point of trust and confidence, exactly in the same situation that he was (d). The Earl, however, was very sensible of the hand that principally hurt him, and had formed a resolution of being too quick for him; in order to this he held a Council at Essex-House, at which were present the Chancellor of Scotland, and the rest of the Scots Commissioners, Mr Denzil Holles, Sir Philip Stapleton, and other friends of the Earl, and to which Serjeant Maynard and Mr Whitlocke were invited (e). The point there debated was, the attacking Lieutenant-General Cromwell in Parliament, as an incendiary; which was very fully and clearly opened by the Lord Chancellor Loudon, and the Members of the House of Commons, who were present, were very hearty in the design, and thought it might be executed with all the success that could be desired (f). But the two Lawyers, though they pretended to be no friends to Cromwell, threw cold water upon the project, and represented it in such a light, as intimidated the Scots Commissioners, and so the matter ended at least there; but Whitlocke owns, that the consultation came to the knowledge of Cromwell, who treated Maynard and himself the better for it, and, no doubt, hated the Earl of Essex for it so much the more (g). The Self-denying Ordinance, by which all the Members in both Houses were to be deprived of their commands, was, by this time, brought into Parliament; and though it made a slow passage through the House of Lords, yet it was at last carried, Sir Thomas Fairfax fixed upon to be the new General, and the clause for the security of the King's person left out of his commission; which was a plain indication of what was to follow, and of the true design of new modelling the army (h). On the 2d of April 1645, the Earl of Essex surrendered his commission, but not without some visible marks of discontent (i). It was then thought proper to reduce a part of the troops that had served under him, and that too without paying them; to which some of the horse quartered in Hertfordshire were not willing to submit, and the friends of the new model proposed, as the shortest method, to cut them to pieces. Mr St John also wrote a letter to the Committee of Hertfordshire, to excite the people to fall upon them; but these extremities were prevented by the Earl of Essex interposing, and prevailing upon them to acquiesce (k). In the beginning of December, the same year, the Parliament voted, that the Earl of Essex should be made a Duke (l), as they had formerly voted him ten thousand pounds a year; but he had no benefit by these votes, nor was there any great care taken for the payment of his arrears. It is generally allowed, that, after he laid down his command, he began to have different apprehensions of things, and to have been very desirous of preventing those miseries that he plainly saw were coming upon these nations; his interest and credit were to the last very great, and some have thought, if he had lived longer, he would have endeavoured to have exerted them for the publick service (m). But, being seized with a sudden and violent illness, not without suspicion of poison, he died greatly lamented, at Essex-House in the Strand, September 14th, 1646 (n). The Parliament directed a publick funeral for him, which was performed, with great solemnity, on the 22d of October following, in the Abbey-Church of St Peter, Westminster (o), when Mr Richard Vines preached his funeral sermon to a very great audience, composed of persons of very great distinction; and the number would certainly have been much larger, if the Parliament had not made an order, that neither his brother the Marquis of Hertford, nor any who had borne arms for the King, should be present at that ceremony (p). Such was the end of this Great Man, in whom the title of Essex became extinct, and whose virtues deserved, that his memory

[M] A complement of another kind ] Whoever considers the passage cited in the former note, will very easily discern what temper the dominant party were in with respect to the Earl of Essex. He had still indeed the title of General, and they were not desirous he should have any more, this was the return they made him whose reputation had first raised them an army; that was a work which he only could do, but they were now entering upon works which they very well knew he neither could nor would do. This message to him therefore had an outward form of civility (36), but withal an inward mixture of reproach, the former served to amuse the people who had a high reverence for the General, the latter was to prevent his obstructing their designs. Whitlocke gives this cautious, and yet very intelligible account, of that Janus-faced complement, for it is observable that these three Earls of Essex were made unhappy by their virtues, flattered out of their reason, and exalted to the highest honours by those who meant to make their fall the greater. But let us hear Whitlocke (37): 'The Houses being informed that the Lord General was not well, and stayed behind the army, they sent a Committee of the Lords and Commons to visit him, and to express the affections of both Houses to him. This was not, as was given out, a piece of courtship, but I think real, and there was cause enough that it should be so, the General having so highly deserved from them. Yet there were some had designs against him, and were desirous to remove him from his command, because memory should be transmitted to posterity with greater care and attention than had been hitherto paid to it, and which we have endeavoured to accomplish.

' because they were jealous that he was too much inclined to peace, and favouring of the King and his party. I think I knew as much of his mind as others did, and always observed him to wish for peace, yet not upon any dishonourable or unjust terms; he was a lover of Monarchy and Nobility, which he suspected some designed to destroy, together with Gentry, Ministry, and Magistracy, which humour began then to boil up; but he resolved to support them, and wanted not advice to that end. But the jealousies upon him who was a most faithful and gallant man, and servant to the publick, gave him great trouble in his thoughts, and they did work so high with his enemies, that some gave out he was by private intimation to forbear engaging in this service, and for certain he was not in it.' D' E W E S (Sir SYMONDS), Knight and Baronet, an accurate Historian, a judicious Critick, an eminent Antiquary, an inquisitive searcher into many different branches of Science, and a communicative friend, as well as generous Patron of learned men (a). He was descended from a very antient family in the Low-Countries, his ancestors retiring hither very early (b), and acquiring a very considerable settlement in the county of Suffolk; by which he was born to a large paternal estate, and was well allied in that county, as may be proved from indubitable authorities [A]. He was the son of Paul D'Ewes, Esq; by his wife Cecily, daughter and sole heiress of Richard Symonds, of Coxden in the county of Dorset (c). He drew his earliest breath, as himself informs us, at the seat of his grandfather before-mentioned, December 18th, 1602 (d); and, having acquired the first tincture of letters in his father's house, the pregnancy of his parts became so apparent, that, in the sixteenth year of his age, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and entered a Fellow-Commoner there, of St John's College, under the tuition of the famous Dr Richard Holdsworth, July the 9th, 1618 (e). It does not appear either how long he remained there, or whether he took any degree; but this is very certain, that, in return for the great acquisitions he made in that celebrated seat of the Muses, he preserved a filial reverence for the place, and expressed so warm a concern for it's reputation, as seems to have exposed him to the resentment of some peevish writers, who cannot bear that any notions should be questioned, and much less contradicted, which they have once embraced, or in favour of which they have thought fit to declare (f). His inclinations to collect the best materials, for the forming a correct and compleat History of Great Britain, shewed themselves very early, since he assures us himself, that he began to put this design in execution when he was not above eighteen years of age (g). He was no less studious in preserving the history of his own times, setting down carefully the best accounts that he was able to obtain of every memorable transaction at the time it happened (h); an instance or two of which, and those very curious in their kind, the reader will find in the notes [B]. This laudable disposition, in so young a man, recommended him to the

(h) But he seems to have corrected and enlarged those accounts afterwards.

[A] As may be proved from indubitable authorities.] In the parish church of St Michael Bassishaw, there was, in one of the windows, a beautiful representation of a man in compleat armour, and his wife's pourtraiture on the other side, which, by the inscription, appeared to have been in memory of Adrian D'Ewes, a lineal descendant from the very antient and noble family of Des Ewes, Lords of the district of Kessell in the duchy of Gueldres, who retired hither upon the breaking out of wars in that country (1). He died of the sweating sickness in the month of July 1551, having lived under the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI. He married Alice Ravenscroft, by whom he left issue, as appears from his will (2), four sons, Gerard, James, Peter, and Andrew. His eldest son, Gerard D'Ewes, lies buried in the isle of Upminster church in Essex, having been Lord of the manour of Gains, alias Upminster; he died April 12, 1591, leaving by his wife, Grace Hinde, a son, Paul Dewes, Esq; and a daughter Alice, who married William Lathom, Esq; who repurchased this manor of Gains, alias Upminster, which he had sold to his father-in-law (3).

[B] The reader will find in the notes.] In order to justify what has been asserted in the text, it will be sufficient to produce two passages from our author's work, one of which shall be his description of the great favourite Buckingham, when he was rising in his fortunes; and the other, his succinct detail of Prince Charles's voyage to Spain. As to the first, having described the tilting in the presence of the French Ambassador, brother to the great favourite of Lewis XIII, the Constable Luynes, on Monday January 8, 1620-21, in the Tilt-Yard over-against Whitehall, he proceeds thus (4): ' After this most of the tilters, except the Prince, went up to the French Lords in a large upper room of the house, standing at the lower end of the Tilt-Yard, and I crowding in after them,

' and seeing the Marquis of Buckingham discoursing with two or three French Monseurs, I joined to them, and most earnestly viewed him for about half an hour's space at the least, which I had opportunity the more easily to accomplish, because he stood all that time he talked bareheaded. I saw every thing in him full of delicacy and handsome features, yea his hand and face seemed the more accomplished, because the French Monseurs that had invested him were very swarthy hard favoured men. That he was afterwards an instrument of much mischief both at home and abroad, is so evident upon record as no man can deny, yet this I do suppose proceeded rather from some jesuited incendiaries about him, than from his own nature, which his very countenance promised to be affable and gentle.' The second passage is this (5):

' February 1622-23, there happened on Monday the 17th day of this month, so strange an accident as future ages will scarce believe it, for Charles Prince of Wales began his journey from London into Spain on Monday the 17th day of February, with the beloved Marquis of Buckingham, Sir Francis Cottington, and Mr Endymion Porter, only in his company, who, besides the King himself, were the only men acquainted with the Prince's resolution. Their going was so secretly carried, as none I believe knew of it in England till they were landed in France. Through which kingdom they passed by post-horse into Spain. The journey was thought so dangerous, being above eleven hundred English miles by land, besides the crossing the seas between Dover and Calais, as all men were generally ensaddled at the adventure, often wishing it had been better advised upon, although all knew the Spaniards durst do the Prince no harm, so long as his royal sister and her illustrious offspring survived. Soon after followed the esteem and acquaintance of persons of the first rank in the Republick of Letters, and amongst these to the celebrated Sir Robert Cotton, who introduced him likewise to the famous Mr Selden (i); which circumstances we learn from himself, together with the opinion he entertained of these great men, which the reader will not probably think unworthy of his notice [C]. In the year 1626 he married Anne, daughter to Sir William Clopton, of Essex, who, though very young, was an exquisite beauty, and, though his passion seems to have increased for her, after she became his wife, to a degree of extravagance (k), yet it did not hinder him from prosecuting his studies with equal vigour and diligence; insonmuch that, when he was little more than thirty years of age, he had, with infinite care and labour, finished that large and accurate work (l); which contributes not a little to explain the most important transactions of one of the most glorious reigns in our History, but will likewise serve to transmit his own name and memory with lustre to posterity [D]. In 1639 we find him High-Sheriff of the county of Suffolk (m), having ' followed the Lord Hayes, Earl of Carlisle, and passed into France, to excuse to that King the Prince's sudden and secret passing through his kingdom without giving him a visit. All men now took it for granted, that the Prince's marriage with the Infanta Maria, the King of Spain's sister, was concluded on, and that he went over only to consummate it, no man imagining that he would take up such a resolution upon uncertainties, especially occasioning so vast an unnecessary expence, at a time when the King's wants pressed him much. But God, whose decree binds Princes as well as peasants, had otherwise disposed, so as our royal suitor arriving at Madrid in Spain on Friday the 2<sup>d</sup> of March, about three weeks after his departure from London, and taking ship for his return into England on the 1st of September then next ensuing, stayed in Spain about seven months, in all which time he seldom saw or spake with the Spanish Princess, nor could ever receive a fair and sincere denial from her brother, although her marriage had been absolutely disposed of by her father's last Will and Testament, he bequeathing her to Ferdinand, son and heir of Ferdinand II, the Emperor of Germany, who afterwards did accordingly espouse her.'

[C] Unworthy of his notice.] Before we give the reader this passage, it may not be amiss to observe, that our author's journal was entirely made for his own private use and advantage, and seems to have been written purely for the securing such of his own thoughts as he was desirous to review, and for preserving such informations as he received upon his enquiries (6); and as he had not any intention, or perhaps the least foresight, that these notices of his might be made publick, so nothing contained in them ought to be considered as any way derogatory from the reputation of those of whom he speaks. We will now proceed to the remarks made by our author. 'On Tuesday September 28, 1624, going, as I frequently used, to visit Sir Robert Cotton, England's prime Antiquary, I there met Mr John Selden of the Inner Temple, a man of deep knowledge, and almost incomparable learning, as his many published works do sufficiently witness, with whom Sir Robert, our joint-friend, brought me acquainted, and we held ever after a good outward correspondence, but both of them being more learned than pious, I never sought after, or ever attained, unto any great entireness with them, yet I had much more familiarity with Sir Robert Cotton than with Mr Selden, being a man exceedingly puffed up with the apprehension of his own abilities.'

We ought likewise to consider, that in those industrious times, it was the custom, amongst such eminent persons as had an opportunity of attaining extensive intelligence, to commit almost every thing to writing; thus the learned and judicious Earl of Clarendon wrote his own life (7) at large, out of which he drew a great part of his materials for his excellent History. Mr Whitlocke, in like manner, digested what occurred to him most worthy of notice into that large work of his, which has been since published; and as different men have different sentiments, so it may not be amiss to quote here a passage of his relating to Mr Selden (8).

'Divers members of both Houses, whereof I was one, were members of the Assembly of Divines, and had the same liberty with the Divines, to sit and debate, and give their votes in any matter which was in consideration amongst them. In which debates Mr Selden spake admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning. And sometimes when they had cited a text of Scripture to prove their assertion, he would tell them, Perhaps in your little pocket Bibles with gilt leaves (which they would often pull out and read) the translation may be thus, but the Greek, or the Hebrew, signifies thus and thus; and so would totally silence them.'

[D] With lustre to posterity.] The title of this book runs thus: The Journals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, both of the House of Lords and House of Commons, collected by Sir Symonds D'Ewe, of Stow-Hall in the County of Suffolk, Knight and Baronet. Revised and published by Paul Bowes, of the Middle-Temple, London, Esq; Lond. 1682, fol.

It must certainly be allowed, that as this was a very great and useful, so it was also a very painful and laborious undertaking, such a one as few men would have ventured upon, and still fewer would have accomplished, with that skill and accuracy which appears in this performance, the benefits derived from which might well have restrained some splenetick persons from speaking so slightly as they do of the author's abilities (9). That account which he has given us of his motives to this undertaking, and the manner in which it is executed is very large and satisfactory, and a few paragraphs from thence will shew us what sort of a work this is, and what sort of a man he was who compiled it. These are his words,

'Because I know the original Journal Books of either House to be more judiciously observed, and more to be esteemed, than the collections of any private men, therefore I have distinguished, by some annotation or animadversion, what is taken out of them, or what out of any other material whatsoever. Nor are those animadversions of mine own at any time added, without some necessary motive, or upon some good ground. Very copious indeed they are in the two first Journals of the Upper House, and House of Commons, in ann. 1 Regin. Eliz. because all matters of form were to be once for all discussed. In all the other Journals they are more succinct and infrequent.

'I confess it cost me many days, besides other expences, to bring these ensuing volumes to that perfection in which I now enjoy them. In which, besides the abundance of the knowledge in this kind especially gained by it, which Sir Edward Coke, Knt. a learned writer of this age, calls Lex Parliamentaria, I have, as I much desired, done some honour to the memory of that glorious Queen, England's royal Elizabeth, in that I have collected in one body the sum of the agitations of all her Parliaments, or at least so much of them as could possibly be gotten, being a work not only singular, in respect that I am the sole enjoyer of it, but also because I rest confident, that never any other man attempted it, much less brought it to perfection. Which I do rather believe, because, when I was one day discoursing with Sir Robert Cotton, the Prime Antiquary of this our age, not long before his decease, touching the two aforesaid volumes he had of the Journals of this Queen's reign, that I wondered he would treasure up in his library such fragmentary and imperfect stuff, he made me no other answer but that he was compelled to store up them, because he knew not how to come by any better; and certainly, if this work, which I have now by God's providence finished, had been performed by any other, been some time before knighted. The same year, having occasion to write to Archbishop Usher, he mentioned that History of Great Britain, in making collections for which he had already spent upwards of twenty, and, in the writing it, thirteen years; and was so unfortunate as to let fall a hint, that this History might, possibly, furnish emendations in almost every page of Camden's Britannia (n); which letter of his coming to light, among other epistles to that learned Prelate, has drawn upon him the heaviest censures, as if he had been prompted to this expression from a mixture of vanity and envy, without any competent capacity (o); in which, perhaps, there is as much wrong done to him, as he is supposed to have done to Camden [E]. In the Long Parliament, which was summoned to meet November the 3d, 1640, he was elected to serve as a Burgess for the town of Sudbury in Suffolk (p), and, on the 2d of January following, he made occasionally a speech in Parliament, in support of the antiquity of that University in which he was bred (q), which has exposed him to very severe usage from Anthony Wood (r), Thomas Hearne (s), and some other writers (t); but with how much reason or foundation must be left to the judgment of the reader [F]. July 15th, 1641, he was, by the favour

' other, it could not have been hid from him, who was a very sedulous gatherer, as of other rarities, so especially of parliamentary passages, for about the space of forty years before his death.

' Touching the rarities and treasures of knowledge contained in these ensuing volumes, to omit many things, thus much it shall not be amiss to premise, that there may not only hence be gathered whatsoever almost concerns the privileges, customs, and usages of either House, but historical matter also touching the Church and State, and in the whole frame may be frequently seen the admirable wisdom of her Majesty, and this her great Council, in the happy quenching of such emergent differences as arose, and in their timely provision against the ambitious Spaniard, the restless and irreconcilable enemy of her Majesty's religion, person, and realms.

' In all Parliaments, and sessions of Parliaments, the Journals of the House of Commons, do, for the most part, much excel those of the Upper House, in variety and abundance of observable matter, and in their copious and orderly relating each day's passage.

' I shall not need further to enlarge myself, but here to shut up this present discourse, this instant Friday the 3d day of February, Anno Dom. 1631, that though through God's Providence I have finished these volumes, which are intended chiefly for my own private use and my posterity's; yet I have already entered upon other and greater labours, conceiving myself not to be born for myself alone, according to that old saying, Melius mori, quam sibi vivere (10).'

The greatest men may mistake in their conjectures, and this appears to have been the case of our author, in respect to his being the only person that ever thought of a work of this nature, for we find that it was not only thought of by another person, but in part executed, and it was the publication of this that brought the more ample collection of Sir Symonds D'ewes to see the light. A certain Prelate, who, upon other occasions, shews himself no great admirer of our author, has however done him all the justice imaginable with respect to this (11). His words are these:

' Heyward Townshend, an eminent Member of the House of Commons, preserved the debates in Parliament of her last fourteen years, which long after the author's death were published under the title of Historical Collections, &c. But this, as vast an undertaking as it seems to be, is only a part of that more comprehensive one of Sir Symonds D'ewes, whose Journal of both Houses, during her whole reign, was soon after given us in print.' This was a noble specimen of his steadiness and diligence in perfecting what he had once undertaken, and may serve to convince us, that he prosecuted with spirit his resolution of comparing the History of Great Britain with the records, which, as he himself assures us, he formed in the month of April 1620.

[E] As he is supposed to have done to Camden. We find the charge against this Gentleman very mildly and modestly stated by Bishop Gibson in his life of Camden, prefixed to the English translation of his Britannia. These are his words (12): ' In the year 1607 he put the last hand to his Britannia, which gained him the titles of the Varro, Strabo, and Pau-fanias of Britain, in the writings and letters of other learned men. Nor did it ever after meet with any enemies that I know of, only Sir Simon D'Ewes encouraged us to hope for animadversions upon the work, after he had observed to a very great man, that there was not a page in it without a fault. But it was only threatening, and neither the world was the better, nor Mr Camden's reputation e'er the worse for it.' This is a very soft translation of a very harsh paragraph in Dr Smith's Life of the same author, in which he assures us (13), that this work was universally approved by all proper judges, one only, Sir Simon D'Ewes, excepted, who moved, says he, by I know not what spirit of envy, gave out that there was scarce a page, &c. In this track we find Bishop Nicholson in his account of the Britannia, where he says (14), ' Some early attempts were made by an envious person, one Brook or Brookmouth, to blast the deservedly great reputation of this book, but they perished and came to nothing, as did likewise the terrible threats given out by Sir Symonds D'Ewes, that he would discover errors in every page.'

Let us now consider the grounds upon which these great men have gone in prejudice to the memory of a person, who for any thing that appears, had nothing of that bad spirit which is here imputed to him. He was ambitious of holding a correspondence with Archbishop Usher, to whom, in a long Latin letter, he gives an account of himself (15), of the pains he had taken in collecting a great library of the choicest pieces that regarded the English History, and adds farther, that he had spent thirteen years in his labours to compile an accurate English History, to which he says he was principally moved, by observing the many mistakes of the common writers, and indeed, says he, what can be expected from them, considering that even in the so much admired Britannia of Camden himself, there is not a page, at least hardly a page, without errors. The reader will consider that this was a private letter, written to a Prelate, whose station in the learned world was not at all inferior to that which he held in the Church. One would have imagined, from what these writers have said, that this Gentleman had published his sentiments of the Britannia to all the world, with a view to lessen Camden's work, and exalt the merit of his own; whereas the fact, as the reader sees, is quite otherwise. Besides, amongst the letters printed by Dr Smith, there is one from Sir John Savile to Camden (16), in which there is such a number of corrections as may serve to render what our author has advanced not altogether incredible. There is without doubt a great respect due to the memory of learned men, but then this ought to be joined with a just regard for learning and truth, which qualification being admitted, Sir Symonds D'ewes will not appear either so vain or so envious a person as they would make him

It is to be observed, that this speech of Sir Symonds D'ewes was occasional, and involuntary; a bill for four subsidies, towards the relief of the King's army in the northern counties, had been twice read in the House of Commons, and the Committee who drew the bill, having placed Cambridge before Oxford, an occasion was sought to transpose those names, when the bill came to be debated in a grand Committee of the whole of his Sovereign, created a Baronet (u). But, upon the breaking out of the Civil War, he adhered to the Parliament; and we find his name in the list of those Members who took the Solemn League and Covenant, pursuant to an order of the House of Commons February 3d, 1643 (w). This did not hinder his having a sincere veneration for the constitution of his country, and a loyal affection to the person of his Prince; so that when things came to extremities, and it was found necessary to purge the Parliament, by turning out of it all who were of such old-fashioned principles, and, for this purpose, a guard of soldiers was sent thither, December 6th, 1648 (x). Sir Symonds D'Ewes was amongst the number (y). Those that were left in the House indeed, sent to the commanding officer to reclaim him, and the rest of the Members in his condition; but to no purpose, for he was never allowed to enter those doors again so long as he lived. When it was thus put out of his power to render any farther service to the publick, he gave himself up entirely to the prosecution of those studies which had been always the principal delight he enjoyed, in the innocent occupations of a private life. He digested into order the vast collections he had made, in reference to the antiquities of this kingdom in general, and several adjacent counties in particular; some volumes of which are yet preserved, and remain incontestible evidences of his wonderful diligence, and excellent disposition (z). He collated whole House, which was on Saturday January 2, 1640, and then our author stood up to prevent the putting of a question, and spoke as follows (17):

' I stand up to persuade, if it may be, the declining of the present question, and the further dispute of this business. Yesterday we had a long debate about the putting out of a word, and now we are fallen upon the dispute of putting one word before another. I account it no honour to Cambridge that it got the precedence by voices at the former Committee, nor will it be any glory to Oxford to gain it by voices here, where we all know the multitude of borough towns of the western parts of England do send so many worthy members hither, that if we measure things by number and not by weight, Cambridge is sure to lose it. I would therefore propound a more noble way and means for the decision of the present controversy than by question, in which, if the university of Oxford, which for mine own part I do highly respect and honour, shall obtain the prize, it will be far more glory to it than to carry it by multitude of voices, which indeed can be none at all. Let us therefore dispute it by reason, and not make an idol of either place, and if I shall be so convinced, I shall readily change my vote, wishing we may find the same ingenuity in the Oxford men.

' There are two principal respects, besides others, in which these famous universities may claim precedence each of other.

' First, in respect of their being, as they were, places of note in the elder ages.

' Secondly, as they were ancient nurseries and seed plots of learning.

' If I do not therefore prove, that Cambridge was a renowned city at least five hundred years before there was a house of Oxford standing, and whilst brute beasts fed, or corn was sown, on that place where the same city is now seated; and that Cambridge was a nursery of learning before Oxford was known to have a grammar school in it, I will yield up the bucklers. If I should lose time to reckon up the vain allegations produced for the antiquity of Oxford by Twine, and of Cambridge by Caius, I should but repeat Deliria senum, for I account the most of that they have published in print to be no better. But I find my authority without exception that in the ancient catalogue of the cities of Britain, Cambridge is the ninth in number, where London itself is but the eleventh; and who would have thought that ever Oxford should have contended for precedence with Cambridge, which London gave it above twelve hundred years since? This I find in Gildas Albanus his British story, who died about the year 520, being the antientest domestick monument we have, page 60. And in a Saxon anonymous story written in Latin touching the Britons and Saxons, page 39. who saith of himself, that he lived in the days of Penda King of the Mercians, in the tenth year of his reign, and that he knew him well, which falls out to be near upon the year 620. And, lastly, I find the catalogue of the said British cities, with some little variation, to be set down in Nennius his Latin story of Britain, page 38, and he wrote the same, as he saith of himself, in the year 830. They

' all call it Cair grant, the word Cair, in the old Celtique tongue, signifying a city.

' These three stories are exotick and rare monuments remaining, yet only in antient manuscripts amongst us, not known to many, but the authority of them is irrefragable and without exception. The best and most antient copies that I have seen of Gildas Albanus and Nennius, remain in the university library of Cambridge, being those I have vouched, and the Saxon anonymous in a library here near us. This Cair-grant is not only expounded by Alfred of Beverly to signify Cambridge, but also by William de Ramsay Abbot of Croyland, in his manuscript story of the life of Guthlacus, ignorantly in those elder days reputed a faint. The said William goes further, and saith, it was so called à Granta flumine. This place remained still a city of fame and repute a long time under the reign of the English Saxons, and is called in divers of the old manuscript Saxon Annals Грантецагрен. And notwithstanding the great devastations it suffered, with other places, by reason of the Danish incursions, yet in the first tome or volume of the book of Domesdei (for now I come to cite record) it appears to have been a place of considerable moment, having in it decem Custodias, and a castle of great strength and extent, and so I have done with Cambridge as a renowned place.

' And now I come to speak to it as it hath been a nursery of learning, nor will I begin higher with it than the time of the learned Saxon Monarch King Alfred, because I suppose that no man will question or gainsay, but that there are sufficient testimonies of certain persons that did together in Cambridge study the arts and sciences much about the time. And it grew to be a place so famous for learning about the time of William the First, the Norman, that he sent his younger son Henry thither to be there instructed, who himself being afterwards King of England by the name of Henry the First, was also surnamed Beauclerk, in respect of his great and invulgar knowledge. If I should undertake to alledge and vouch the records and other monuments of good authority, which assert and prove the increase and flourishing estate of this university in the succeeding ages, I should spend more time than our great and weighty occasions at this present will permit, it shall therefore suffice to have added, that the most antient and first endowed college of England was Valence college in Cambridge, which, after the foundation thereof, as appears by one of our Parliament Rolls remaining upon record in the Tower of London, received the new name or appellation of Pembroke Hall. It is in Rotu. Parliam. de ann. 38 H. VI. Numb. 31. It appearing therefore so evidently, by all that I have said, that Cambridge is in all respects the elder sister, which I speak not to derogate from Oxford. My humble advice is, that we lay aside the present question, as well to avoid division amongst ourselves, as to entomb all further emulation between the two sisters, and that we suffer the present bill to pass as it is now penned, and the rather because I think Oxford had the precedence in the last bill of this nature that passed this house.'

collated and transcribed several ancient records and monuments of past times, such as the BLACK BOOK of the EXCHEQUER (a), which he had some thoughts of publishing. He made a noble collection of Roman coins, of which, as he was a very good judge himself, in respect to their value, so he spared no expence that appeared necessary for accomplishing the ends (b) he proposed, in making that collection. He was a great patron of learned men, and very free in his communications, as appears from the acknowledgments made by the industrious Mr Weever, who received great helps (c) from him in carrying on his large and useful work. That he was not, as some have represented him, a vain man, may appear from hence, that scarce any thing of his writing appeared in his life-time [G]. He was rather desirous of being useful to the literary world in another way, that is, in the way of a collector of scarce, curious, and valuable pieces, more especially such as regarded the history, antiquities, and records of this nation; to which studies, when he had once addicted himself, he was, in a great measure, weaned from that general and indeterminate pursuit of knowledge, with the desire of which he had been before possessed (d). It was the deep sense he had of the great advantages that might arise to his country, from the application of a man of learning and fortune to things of this nature, his just conception of the deficiencies in most of the histories published in and before his time, and the great examples he had before his eyes of the learned Camden, the beneficent Sir Robert Cotton, and the judicious Mr Selden, that inspired him with a strong inclination of composing, or, at least, amassing the materials for those great works, that, we have his own authority to prove, were the principal objects of his care for many years, and which, it is highly probable, he carried to some degree of perfection (e) [H]. This disposition of his procured him very great respect and esteem from the ablest and wisest persons of his times, such as the learned Spelman, the famous Selden, and many others (f); but later writers, either for want of better knowing this gentleman's real character, or for some other reasons, have not treated his memory with that decency (g) that might have been expected; and, therefore, the reader will not be displeased to find, in the notes, a very short and modest vindication of our author and his writings from their censures [I].

He

[G] Appeared in his life-time.] The only piece of his which is known to deserve that title, is that the reader has seen in the foregoing note, which was printed under the following title:

A Speech delivered in Parliament by Sir Symonds D'Ewes, touching the Antiquity of Cambridge. Lond. 1642, 4to.

In those days, when there were some people living who were thought to know as much of our antient History and records as most folks, and but for whom certainly we had known but little of them, this speech was held so far from being idle or ridiculous, that it gave this gentleman a great reputation. We may be very well satisfied of this, since the following tract, which is commonly ascribed to John Selden, Esq; was suspected, by such as pretended to have great insight into matters of that kind, to have fallen from the pen of our learned author, and the point is left undecided by a great Critick in such learning (18).

A Brief Discourse concerning the Power of Peers and Commons in Parliament, in point of Judicature. Lond. 1640, 4to.

If this was really of his writing, it is a very strong proof that he was not covetous of applause, since he neither owned it publickly, nor gave any private intimation to his friends that might secure his title. On the other hand, if the supposing it to be his arises purely from conjecture, it must give us a very high opinion of his credit in those days, since the very raising a doubt whether this belonged to him or to Selden, does the highest honour to his character as an Antiquary.

[H] To some degree of perfection.] The reader will perceive, by what has been already quoted from his Preface to the Journals of Parliament in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that as he was far from inclining to hide them from the publick, so, on the other hand, he had no intention to acquire fame to himself in his life-time by the publication of them. His disposition was the very same with regard to his other great undertakings; he was conscious to himself of the uncertainty whether he might finish all or any of them, but this did not hinder him from beginning them, as appears from his own words, which will best express his meaning (19).

The chief of the works beforementioned, and by me intended for the publick good, are these ensuing:
A General History of Great Britain, from the first Inhabitants to the present Times, to be drawn especially out of Record, and other abstruse and exotic

Monuments, for the reformation of all the Chronicles or Histories of this kind yet extant, which will require several volumes.

The Survey of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridgehire, out of Records or Original Deeds.

The Antiquity of the Municipal or Common Laws of the Realm before the Norman Conquest, out of Record also for the greatest part, or other invulgar materials. For which I have a desire also, if my time will suffice for collection, to add a second part out of the Itinerant and Plea Books, chiefly remaining in the Treasury at Westminster.

These I have proposed to myself to labour in, besides divers other smaller works, as well Theological as Moral, like him that shoots at the sun, not in hopes to reach it, but to shoot as high as possibly his strength, art, or skill will permit. So though I know it impossible to finish all these during my short and uncertain life, having already entered into the thirtieth year of my age, and having many unavoidable employments and cares of an estate and family, yet if I can but finish a little in each kind, it may hereafter stir up some able judgments to add an end to the whole, in the same way and search I shall have waded in before them. In the mean time I shall always pray, as I do sincerely desire, that by all my endeavours GOD may be glorified, the truth divine or human vindicated, and the publick benefited.

SIMONDS D'EWEES.

[I] And his writings from their censures.] It cannot but be esteemed an action right in itself, grateful with respect to the dead, and useful to the Republick of Letters, when care is taken to revive the memory of worthy men, and to rescue them from misrepresentations, which is worse than oblivion. Sir Simonds D'Ewes, having been bred under Dr Richard Holdsworth of St John's in Cambridge, who was a man of moderate principles, though steadily attached to the Constitution in Church and State; came into the world with sentiments that did not much recommend him to Archbishop Laud, and other warm Divines. But for all this he was sincerely religious, and though his affection to liberty induced him to stay with the Parliament, where we find, by several fine speeches (20), that he was a great master in those parts of learning most useful to a Senator, yet he was far from inclining either to Anarchy or a Commonwealth. He

He deceased April 18th, 1650, in the forty-eighth year of his age (b), and was succeeded in his estate and titles by his son Willoughby D'Ewes, to whom Sir Symonds D'Ewes's Journals of the Parliaments of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when published, were dedicated, by his cousin, and Sir Symonds's nephew, Paul Bowes, Esq; of the Middle-Temple, who was himself a Gentleman of great worth and learning.

very well knew, that the former must make way for tyranny of some sort or other, and the latter altogether incompatible with the laws of England, and with the temper and interests of the nation. It is to be hoped therefore, that the Reverend Mr Fuller was not afraid of giving offence, when he drew up his notes concerning this worthy person, which are not only destitute of any remarkable facts, and without method, but without dates also, one only excepted, and that false (21). He might, without doubt, have been better informed, if he had taken any degree of pains, and therefore his omissions in this respect are the less excusable. Doctor Smith, a very learned and good man, to whose care we owe the best memoirs of some of the greatest men that have flourished in this kingdom, was unluckily prejudiced against the memory of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, on account of his pretending to think Camden not infallible (22), and what he has wrote upon this subject being transcribed by Mr Bayle, foreigners can have no other idea of this Gentleman than as he has painted him, a man envious of the merit of others, and having very little of his own (23). Yet it is very certain D'Ewes had the greatest honour for Camden, whom he mentions very respectfully, though he tells us in his Preface to his Journals of the Parliaments of Queen Elizabeth, that they will enable his reader to correct many things in the Annals written by this great man of that reign, but he gives due praises to his performance, and it was his esteem for his memory, though he did not carry that so far as to be in love with his mistakes, betrayed him into the expression, for which he has been censured. Bishop Nicholson, in his dry way, sneers at Sir Symonds D'Ewes more than once (24), and hints, that though he promised much he had performed little, which is the more extraordinary, when in his Preface he very plainly points out where the vast collections made by this painful Antiquary are to be found (25). We need however wonder the less at this, when at the same time he speaks so harshly of John Leland, the bulkieft promises of such noted writers commonly prove the most abortive, and the reason he gives for it is, despair of answering the world's raised expectations, very much contributing to their miscarriage (26). This remark provoked the laborious Mr Hearne to remark upon him in his turn, yet the most abortive pieces of Leland, says he, are far better, and much more correct, than the most compleat performances of some writers (27). Notwithstanding which observation, the very same Thomas Hearne has dealt most unkindly by our author. After he had undertaken to publish the Black Book of the Exchequer, he was generously supplied by the late Edward Earl of Oxford, with the copy of that valuable piece made by our famous Antiquary, bearing this title, Liber niger parvus MS. Scaccarii ex parte rememoratoris Regis, integre transcriptus & cum Autographo accurate comparatus à meipso Simonds D'Ewes. It was by the help of this communication Mr Hearne was enabled to add a great many curious and instructive notes from the margin of our author's book. Yet in his Preface he has expressed his gratitude in the following character (28): 'The reader will not wonder at his leaving this work unpublished, contrary, as I believe, to his original intention, when he shall understand that D'Ewes, tho' a man diligent and learned, was nevertheless vain and empty towards his sacred Majesty; like Selden, an enemy and adversary, and one, who many things (amongst the rest an English History, for the writing of which, in my judgment, he was very little fit) having promised, compleated only a very few.' This is but one passage out of many in which he depreciates this Gentleman's character, which surely is a little hard, considering he would have had no opportunity of doing so, had he not availed himself of his labours. It has been already shewn, that this reproach, with respect to his political principles, was not very well founded, and perhaps Mr Hearne would have dealt with him more softly, if he had known that in the latter part of his life he was wont to observe, not by way of compliment to the Long Parliament, That they alone had passed more laws than all the Parliaments put together that had sat before them (29). But whatever his principles might be with respect to Church or State, and whether these were allied to, or remote from, those of the industrious Mr Hearne, justice was certainly due to his writings, with which he ought to have been better acquainted before he pronounced so positively, that though he promised much he performed but little. Whoever considers that his promises and performances were equal secrets to the publick, till his private letters were printed, and his vast collections fallen into other hands, will be very probably of another opinion, and think that the character afforded him by a Reverend Historian, who was never suspected of being a friend to the memories of men, who in their life-times shewed themselves enemies to our Constitution in Church or State, is much more agreeable to truth, and to the real merits of the person concerned (30): 'We shall next, says he, mention Sir Symonds D'Ewes, a Gentleman educated at the university of Cambridge, celebrated for a most curious Antiquary, highly esteemed by the great Selden, and particularly remarkable for his Journals of all the Parliaments in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and for his admirable manuscript library, he left behind him, now in the hands of one of the greatest genius's (31) in the age.' DICKINSON or DICKENSON (EDMUND) a celebrated Physician and Chemist in the reigns of Charles and James II. His family were originally of Rington in Lancashire, but his father, the Reverend Mr William Dickinson, settled in Berkshire, where he was Rector of Appleton. He married Mary, the daughter of Edmund Colepeper, Esq; of Halingborne in Kent, by whom he had this son, who was born September the 26th, 1624, at Appleton in the county of Berks (a). He received the first rudiments of learning and languages at the famous College of Eaton, whence, in 1642, he came to Oxford, and was admitted of Merton-College as one of the Eaton Post-masters (b). June the 22d, 1647, he became Bachelor of Arts, and was admitted Probationer-Fellow of his College (c). On November 27th, 1649, he took the degree of Master of Arts, and was entered on the Physick line (d). July 3d, 1656 (e), he was admitted to his Bachelor's degree in that faculty, wherein he quickly distinguished himself as well as in other branches of curious and useful knowledge, and, on July 17th, 1656, took the degree of doctor (f). The first thing which made him known in the learned world, was an oration spoken by him in the Hall of Merton-College, July 10th, 1653, in defence of Freedom in Philosophizing, which was highly and justly admired (g). In 1655 he published, at Oxford, his Delphi Phœnicizantes, i. e. Delphos derived from the Phœnicians; of which most learned piece it is hard to say, whether it gained the author more friends at home, or reputation abroad [A]. Dr Gilbert Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, had so just a sense of the value of that work, and the worth of him who penned it, that he would gladly have persuaded him to have applied himself to Divinity, and to have taken orders; but our author was fixed in his choice (b). The Warden and Fellows of Merton-College, in deference to his extraordinary merit, conferred on him the place of Superior Reader of Linacre's Lectures, which he held for some years (i). He then applied himself to Chemistry with much assiduity; and about this time it was that he received the first visit from an illustrious French adept, who commended our author's skill and diligence, and encouraged him to proceed in his studies (k). At length leaving the College, that he might practise his profession more conveniently, he took a house in the High-street of Oxford, where he dwelt many years (l). In 1669 he married his first wife, Mrs Elizabeth Luddington, of an antient family, seated at Carleton-Scroop in Lincolnshire; by this Lady he had his only daughter (m). The mother dying in child-bed, was interred in St Peter's Church at Oxford, where a monument is erected to her memory (n). He wedded some time after Helena, the daughter of * * * * Mole, Esq; of Aylesbury in the county of Bucks, who dying in a short time, he continued ever after a widower (o). On the death of the famous Dr Thomas Willis, which happened in 1684 (p), our author was prevailed on to remove to London, and there he took Dr Willis's house in St Martin's-Lane, where he practised with great success many years (q). Having been so happy as to restore to health, after all hopes of recovery were lost, Henry [Bennet] Earl of Arlington, Lord Chamberlain to Charles II. that Nobleman, in gratitude, introduced him to the King, who, in 1684, appointed him one of his Physicians in Ordinary, and Physician to his Household (r). As that Prince was a great lover of Chemistry, and a considerable proficient therein (s), Dr Dickenson grew into great favour, and was honoured with much of his Majesty's conversation in the royal laboratory, which was under the King's bed-chamber, and to which he had a private stair-case from thence (t). His favour lasted as long as the life of his Royal Master; and his brother and successor King James the Second continued him in both his places (u). In 1686 our author published in Latin his Epistle to Theodore Mundanus, the illustrious French adept before-mentioned, as also his Answer, translated from the French into Latin. This is one of the most curious, as it is absolutely the most rational, piece that ever appeared on Hermetick Philosophy, and is still highly esteemed [B]. Some small time after the abdication of his unfortunate

Master,

[A] Friends at home, or reputation abroad] The title of this book at large runs thus: Delphi Phœnicizantes, sive Tractatus in quo Græcos, quicquid apud Delphos celebre erat (seu Pythonis aut Apollinis Historiam, seu pœanica certamina & premia, seu præscam templi formam atque inscriptionem, seu Tripodem, Oraculum, spectes) è Josuæ, &c. Historia Scriptisque sacris effinxisse, rationibus haud inconcinnis ostenditur. Et quamplurimæ quæ Philologiæ studiosis apprime jucunda futura sunt, aliter ac vulgo solent, enarrantur. The scope of this tract was to prove, that the Greeks borrowed the story of the Pythian Apollo, and all that rendered the oracle at Delphos famous, from the Holy Scriptures, and the book of Joshua in particular. In treating this very obscure subject, he shews a wonderful skill in the Hebrew, Arabick, and Greek tongues, a perfect knowledge of Antiquity, and a most penetrating judgment. The quickness of his thoughts, the probability of his conjectures, and his profound erudition, deserve the highest applause. The judicious Carpsou mentions him with much respect as a very useful Commentator on Joshua: to say the truth, there are abundance of strokes in this piece which throw light on the darkest passages in Sacred and Prophane History, which is the reason this Dissertation gave such high satisfaction to the learned world (1). To this treatise were added, I. Diatriba de Noæ in Italiam Adventu; ejusque nominibus Ethnicis. i. e. A Dissertation on the coming of Noah into Italy, and of the names under which he was known to the Heathens. In which are also a multitude of curious observations, as well Philological and Mythological, as Historical. Struvius (2), the learned German, who has written so usefully on literary History, takes notice of it, and some modern writers have borrowed from it without naming it at all. II. De Origine Druidum. i. e. Of the Rise of the Druids. This treatise, in relation to the eldest of our British Philosophers, is very concise, but discovers the author's great knowledge in our Antiquities, and is particularly mentioned by Stollus (3), and the author honoured with the title of a most learned Antiquary by Reimannus (4). III. Oratiuncula pro Philosophia liberanda. This is the oration mentioned in the text, as the first of our author's performances. Mr Wood (5) tells us, that this was spoken, when, according to the statutes of his house (Merton-college) he varied from the mind of Aristotle, and so it is marked in the end of the oration. IV. Zach. Bogan, Edmundo Dickenson. This letter does our author as much honour as any of his own works, it is filled with citations from the most antient authors in support of his opinions, and the highest commendations of his learning, industry, and judgment. The Delphi Phœnicizantes came out originally at Oxford in 1655, in 12mo, with a Dedication to Dr John Goddard of the College of Physicians, London, and Warden of Merton-college at Oxford. It was printed at Franckfort in 1669, 8vo (6), of which edition Wood never heard; and at Rotterdam in 1691. By Crenius in the first Tome of his Fasciculus Dissertationum Historico-critico-philologicarum, in 12mo, and not in 8vo, as Wood says, which is an indication he had not seen it. He adds, This book is much valued by foreigners, and they speak very honourably of it and it's author (7). This must be understood of the foreigners Wood had conversed with (which were not a few) at Oxford. We have shewn the same thing from their writings; indeed what wonder, considering our author was scarce thirty when he wrote this most learned tract?

[B] And is still highly esteemed.] In order to give the reader a just idea of this most curious treatise, it will be necessary to observe, that Theodore Mundanus visited our author Dickenson first at Oxford, a little after the Restoration, perhaps in 1662 (8). He found him then a deep admirer of sublime Chemistry, and exhorted him to pursue his studies with such assurances, as had probably great effect upon his mind, because we find by his letter he had read Lully, Ripley, Philalethes, &c. and had actually employed much time in endeavouring to reach their sense. In 1679 (9), Theodore Mundanus paid him a visit at London, and renewed his acquaintance. It may from circumstances in the Doctor's epistle be gathered, that he was by this time not a little cooled in his inclinations towards Chemistry, at least towards Alchemy. And therefore to give him spirits to address himself again to such enquiries, Mundanus made two projections in his presence (10). This is so strange a fact, that to leave the English reader without scruple about it, we shall transcribe the words of Theod. Mundanus, writing to Dr Dickenson (11), who caused

Master, Dr Dickenson retired from practice, being in years, and very much afflicted with the stone; he continued nevertheless to apply himself to his studies, and, as he was a Gentleman of great candour, and very communicative, so, at his house in St Martin's-Lane, there were frequent assemblies of the Learned, who were willing to improve these valuable qualities in Dr Dickenson to their own advantage (w). He had long meditated a system of Philosophy, not founded on his own conjectures, or the experiments of other men, but chiefly from the lights afforded by the Mosaic History, compared with the theories of the Antients. Part of this laborious work, when he had brought it into order, was unfortunately burnt. The Doctor, however, was not discouraged; he set about the same task again, and, at length, finished and committed it to the press. It appeared in 1702, under the title of Physica Vetus & Vera (x). The same genius, the same learning, the same exquisite judgment, and, above all, the same modest zeal for truth, and the same pious concern for Revealed Religion, were visible in this, that had rendered his first treatise so much admired. All who had a taste for Oriental Learning, and the Corpuscularian System, which, in those days, were not a few, highly applauded Dr Dickenson's book, and with such it still is, and ever will be, in great credit [C]. The rest of his days he spent in the improvement of his mind, and in conversing with his friends, who, through the whole course of his life, were the most eminent persons in the kingdom, either for parts or preferment, for their intrinsic merit, or elevation in dignity; such as Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, who loved and understood Chemistry, Dr Seth Ward, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, Archbishop Sheldon, and the worthy Archbishop Tension, &c (y). He yielded to fate, through a severe fit of the stone, on the third of April 1707, being then in the eighty-third year of his age, and was interred in the Church of St Martin's in the Fields (z). He left behind him a character every way worthy of esteem, as well as that (so justly acquired by his labours in his profession, and his curious writings) of being one of the most knowing and successful Physicians of his time; which, if we recollect he was contemporary with Willis, Sydenham, Lower, &c. we shall the better comprehend it's extent (a). Besides the pieces before-mentioned, he is supposed to have been the author of Parabola Philosophica, seu Iter Philareti ad Montem Mercurii (b), i. e. A Philosophical Parable, or a Journey to the Mount of Mercury, by PHILARETES; no way inferior to any thing he owned. If this tract be truly his, as there seems no cause to assign it any other author (c), then it may serve as a full answer to one of Anthony Wood's remarks in his usual petulant stile, and indeed worthy of no other author (d) [D]. caused them to be printed. ' That therefore I might, ' by an irrefragable argument, testify how high and ' how honourable an opinion I had conceived of you, ' as also that I might establish your confidence in the ' principles of our Philosophy, and encourage you in your ' enquiries, I made two projections in your presence. ' Neither know I any thing which ought to induce you ' to scruple the truth of what I affirm to you, that ' though it is now forty years since I was Philosophus Adeptus, i. e. an adept, or one perfect in the Alchemical science, yet, yourself excepted, there are not ' three persons, to whom, in that space, I have made ' known myself or my art.' But to strengthen the thing still farther, hear what Dr Dickenson himself says to Theodore Mundanus (12). I heretofore thought of the transmutation of metals, just as we think of the strange accounts we hear of wonderful facts done, or odd customs which prevail, in regions at a vast distance. So should I have ever thought, as till then indeed I did think, when two years ago you had the goodness, by an illustrious demonstration, to take from me all power of doubting any longer. It is now time to come to the book, which bore this title, Epistola Edmundi Dickinon, M. D. & M. R. ad Theod. Mundanum, Philosophum Adeptum, de Quintessentia Philosophorum & de vera Physiologia. Una cum Questionibus Aliquot de secreta Materia Physica. His Accedunt Mundani Responsa. O X O N I Æ, E Theatro Sheldoni, anno 1686, 8vo. i. e. Ed. Dick. to Theod. Mund. an Adept of the Quintessence of the Philosophers, and the true System of Physicks. As also certain Queries, as to the Materials in Alchemy. To which are annexed the answers of Mundanus. The letter is dated from London, July 31, 1683, and the answer of Mundanus from Paris, September 22, 1684. It was not on this account that we called him a French Philosopher in the text, but because, when Dr Dickenson wrote in Latin, he chose to answer in French. From this language his epistle was translated by H. B (13), whom I suppose to have been their common friend Dr Becket. The book was reprinted at Rotterdam 1699, 8vo (14). And there is a large account of it (as it well deserved) in the Literary Journal mentioned in the margin (15). One thing is very remarkable, that this curious piece escaped Professor Boerhaave, who would otherwise have mentioned it in his so much esteemed Elementa Chemicæ. [C] In great credit ] The title of this book runs thus: D. Edmundi Dickinon, M. D. Physica Vetus & Vera: sive Tractatus de naturali veritate hexæmeri Mosaicæ. Per quem probatur in historia Creationis universæ methodum atque modum, tum veræ Philosophiæ principia, striètim atque breviter a Mose traditur. Lond. 1702, 4to. i. e. The antient and true System of Physicks, or a Treatise concerning the natural truth of the Mosaic Creation, in six Days. In which it is proved, that the Method and Mode of the Creation of the universe, according to the Principles of True Philosophy, are striètim and concisely laid down by Moses. It was printed again at Rotterdam 1703, 4to, and Leoburg. 1705, 12mo (16). This shews the sale it had in those parts of Europe, where such systems are most canvassed, and of consequence their value best understood. As the author was an old-fashion'd writer, and not at all inclined to adopt opinions merely for their being plausible, we need not wonder that some admirers of the moderns were but indifferently pleased with his performance. Amongst these Stollius (17) hath explained himself in the clearest terms, though he confesses him to have been a man of great learning. But this censure of his arises from his dislike of the Atomick system, for there are parties among Philosophers as well as Politicians. Fabricius (18) mentions him and it with respect; and so does the celebrated Buddeus in many places with due commendations (19). But what sufficiently demonstrates the wisdom, judgment, and penetration of Dr Dickenson, is, that the famous Leibnitz, and the most learned Wolfius, have, in many things, followed his track. [D] Worthy of no other author ] That we may not be suspected of slandering the Oxford Antiquary, let his own words be produced. After mentioning our author's being appointed Superior Reader of Linacre's Lecture in his own college, he goes on (20), and about that time spent much labour and money in the art of Chymistry, kept an Operator, and gave out to his acquaintance that he would publish a book thereof, but as yet there is nothing of that sort extant by him. We must understand this of Mr Wood's knowledge, which, in reader is to know, that this splenetick person, having contracted a dislike to our author during his residence in the University, could never mention him, on any occasion, without suffering somewhat of his bitterness to appear, by which, without perceiving it, he destroys what he proposes to effect, inasmuch as shewing his partiality equally abates the credit of his testimony as a witness, and takes away all pretence for passing any censure upon him as a judge. Of this more at large in a note [E]. Our learned Physician left also behind him, in manuscript, a treatise in Latin, on the Grecian Games, which, without question, was extremely worthy of seeing the light, and hath been lately published (e). Before we dismiss this article it will be proper to observe, that, as our author wrote altogether in Latin, so he is among the number of those British writers better known abroad than in his own country (f). To this also the subjects on which he wrote did, without doubt, contribute not a little, being since his death, less the objects of young peoples studies, or of the notice of the learned. But, as there seems to be a spirit of inquiry reviving, and as the Oriental Languages begin to be again considered, the bringing this life (hitherto shamefully neglected) into a work of this sort, will certainly be approved; as also the large accounts given of his writings in the notes. This we the rather hope, because, though no English writer is better known by his performances, through the northern parts of Europe, than Dr Dickenson, yet no foreigner has touched one circumstance of his life, because (his works being all published in his life-time) they had no opportunity of acquainting themselves with his character: a thing carefully provided against on their side, no writer of such eminence dying in any other country of Europe, but immediate care is taken of his memory; of which, were it in this place proper, numerous instances might be produced.

his own opinion, was extensive, though I much doubt it deceived him here. For if the Parabola Philosophica was our author's, as I am thoroughly persuaded it was, for reasons that I shall presently mention, then, without question, it was the very treatise Dr Dickenson mentioned to his friends; but because Anthony à Wood was not of the number, he was peevish enough to advance a false fact of his own shewing (though to be sure he over-looked it) for our author's letter to Mundanus (22) is mentioned in the same place, and therein is a concise system of chemical principles. The arguments which induce me to believe he wrote the Parabola Philosophica are these: 1. The judgment of Mundanus, who tells him he is sure it is his. 2. The conformity of the stile and method. 3. Dr Dickenson publishing Mundanus's letter without disowning the book.

[E] At large in a note. The point discussed in the foregoing note, sufficiently demonstrates what an inclination the Oxford Antiquary had to strike at Dr Dickenson, and, as far as in him lay, to lessen that great reputation which he had raised by his successful labours in his profession, and his learned writings. But the Doctor being living, it might not be expedient to proceed to greater lengths, at least openly. However, he has sufficiently vented his spleen, without naming the person against whom his envious shafts are directed, and yet so plainly pointing him out, as to leave no scruple or doubt upon the peruser's mind who it is he means (22). The story is too long to be inserted here, and will fall in with greater propriety hereafter, in the mean time it may not be amiss to observe, whence the distaste of Wood arose, and indeed it is so strange a one from his own account of the matter, which had he not committed to writing the world could never have known, that it is not easy to conceive any thing more extravagant (23). Dr Dickenson was much Mr Wood's senior in Merton-college, and, as himself says, very kind to him when he first came thither (24). In process of time, however, Dr Dickenson being Fellow of his college, of which what little estate Wood's family had was held, the money taken for fines on renewing of leases, which was paid to Dr Dickenson as Bursar or Treasurer, were, in Mr Wood's opinion, very high, and though he does not ascribe this expressly to the Doctor, yet it seems to be the true ground of all his misconstructions of his conduct. There was a long dispute in the college between the Fellows and their Warden, Sir Thomas Clayton, in which, though Dr Dickenson was of the same side with Mr Wood, yet because they did not succeed in their opposition, and the college was obliged to pay a very large debt contracted by the Warden, Mr Wood will have it, that Dr Dickenson was gained by Sir Thomas Clayton's artifices and flattery, of which, except his own suspicion, he offers no kind of evidence whatever (25). Hence however we may judge of his temper and disposition, which ought to render us very cautious in giving an implicit credit to whatever he is pleased to say of his contemporaries. It must indeed be owned, that what he says of those gentlemen who have distinguished themselves by their writings, in another work of his, is, for the most part, free from any of these objections (26), but then it is very well known that work received many castigations from Bishop Fell, by whose care it was translated into Latin and published, and it is as well known, that Mr Wood complained loudly of this, and was highly displeased that any thing he had written should be omitted or softened on any account whatever (27). These remarks were in justice due to the character of this learned and excellent person, and are by no means intended to lessen that obligation which the publick certainly owes to the indefatigable diligence of the Oxford Antiquary, whose labours, notwithstanding his prejudices and peevishness, are highly useful, and ought therefore to be justly valued.

DIGBY (Sir EVERARD) was descended from a very antient and honourable family, distinguished by the confidence, and honoured with many testimonies, of royal favour, by several of our Monarchs, as well for the eminent abilities of their mind, as for the gallant exploits performed by them in the field (a) [A]. His father Everard Digby, of Drystoke

[A] As for the gallant exploits performed by them in the field. In order to do justice to this family it is requisite to observe, that though the Digbys of Warwickshire were, and are still, noble, yet the Digbys of the county of Rutland were of the elder house, which appears thus: Sir Everard Digby of Tilton in the county of Leicester, to take the family no higher, though that might be done from record, was slain at Towton field, fighting there on the side of Hen-

This Sir Everard, by Jaquetta, daughter of Sir John Ellis, left issue six sons, of whom the eldest, Sir Everard Digby, was the ancestor of this family, as Simon Digby, the second son, was of the Digbys of Colchill in Warwickshire, now represented by the Lord Digby, Baron of Geafhill in the kingdom of Ireland, from whence, as the reader will see in the text, descended the Earls of Bristol (2). This Sir Everard Digby just mentioned, married Mary, the daughter

Drystoke in Rutlandshire, Esq; was a person of great worth and learning, had his education at St John's College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Master of Arts; and, though a man of an independent fortune (b), gave very signal marks of his inclination to, and his great success in, his studies [B]. This Gentleman, of whom we are speaking, was born some time in the year 1581, educated with great care, but under the tuition of some Popish Priests; for, when he was about eleven years of age, he had the misfortune to lose his father, who, as he was a man of sound knowledge, and extensive capacity, would, very probably, have given him better impressions, and have taught him to act rather by the light of his own reason, than merely according to the dictates of those, who, by having the care of him in his infancy, had assumed a despotic empire over his spirit. In respect to his parts, however, he was very far from being at all deficient, abating his blind zeal for Popery, and his servile submission to the Priests (c). In his person he was remarkably handsome, very expert in his exercises, extremely modest and affable in his behaviour, so that he was justly reputed one of the finest Gentlemen in England (d). He was brought very early to the Court of Queen Elizabeth, where he was much taken notice of, and received several marks of her Majesty's favour. On the coming in of King James he went likewise to pay his duty, as others of his religion did, was very graciously received, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, being looked upon as a man of a fair fortune, pregnant abilities, and a court-like behaviour (e). These accomplishments, assisted by the influence of the Priests, who were perfectly satisfied, that, in pursuing his interest, they consulted their own, procured his marriage to Mary, daughter and sole heiress of William Multho, Esq; of Gothurst in Buckinghamshire, with whom he had a great fortune (f); which gave occasion for his settlement of that, and of his own estate, upon the children of that marriage (g). One would have imagined, that, considering his mild temper, and happy situation in the world, he might have passed his days in honour and peace, without running the smallest hazard of meeting that dreadful and disgraceful death, which has introduced his name into all our histories. It happened, however, unfortunately for him, that, having a great acquaintance with Sir Thomas Tresham, a very active and zealous Papist, he possessed his mind with such disaffection to his Prince, such false notions of the ill usage that those who stiled themselves Catholicks had met with, and such apprehensions of still greater mischiefs ready to befall them, that he was ripe to receive any counsels that should be given him, for redressing these pretended grievances, and preventing those threaten'd evils, of how dangerous and desperate a nature soever they might be (b) [C]. His intimate friendship with Robert Catesby, Esq; proved the means of his being drawn in to act against that government, towards which he had so long borne the utmost dislike. This Mr Catesby was a man of determined courage, as well as great parts; he had been, for several years, very deep in all the plots daughter of Sir John Heydon, by whom he had Knelm Digby, Esq; of Dry Stoke, or Stoke Dry, for so it is now commonly called, in the county of Rutland, who, by Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Cope, Knt. had Everard Digby, Esq; who married Mary, daughter and coheiress of Francis Neal and the Widow of Samson Erderstwick, Esq; by whom he had three sons and two daughters, the eldest of which sons was Sir Everard Digby, who is the subject of this article (3).

[B] And his great success in his studies.] This gentleman published several treatises, some of them upon learned, and others on curious subjects, and of these the following titles may possibly gratify the reader's curiosity (4).

- I. Theoria Analytica viam ad Monarchiam scientiarum demonstrans. Lond. 1579. 4to.
- II. De Duplici Methodo libri duo, Rami Methodum refutantes. Lond. 1580. 8vo.

[C] And desperate a nature soever they might be] It is very remarkable, that the far greatest part of the persons embarked in this treason were Gentlemen of family and fortune; Robert Catesby, Esq; was a Gentleman of an antient family, whose ancestor was a Privy-Counsellor and favourite to Richard III. Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham, Esquires, were men of large estates, and the latter undertook to advance two thousand pounds upon this occasion. Mr Thomas Piercy was related to the Earl of Northumberland, and the King's servant: in short, except Robert Keys, who had spent his fortune, and Thomas Bites, who was Mr Catesby's man, they were all persons in such circumstances, as nothing but their furious zeal could have driven into such a conspiracy (6). The means by which Sir Everard Digby was wrought upon, himself affirmed to be these: First, he was told that the King had broke his promises to the Catholicks, for which, however there was no foundation, since Watson the Priest, who was executed in the first year of the King for treason, confessed, that having had access to his Majesty at Edinburgh twice, he told him plainly what those of his religion had to expect, and this put him upon plotting against him. Mr Piercy, a principal instrument in this conspiracy, went likewise into Scotland upon the same errand, and had the like answer. He was next told, that severer laws against Popery would be made in the next Parliament, that husbands would be made liable for their wives offences, and that it would be made a præmunire only to be a Catholick. But the main point was, that the restoring of the Catholick religion was the duty of every member, and that, in consideration of this, he was not to regard any favours received from the Crown, the tranquillity of his country, or the hazards that might be run in respect to his life, his family, or his fortune (7). All this himself and very probably many of his companions believed, or otherwise it is not easy to account for their involving themselves in such a series of dangers, or for their adhering to each other with such fidelity, that, in the course of several years intrigue, there was nothing divulged (8). But what is yet a stronger, and indeed an invincible proof, that it was a mistaken notion of religion which guided them throughout, was the exceeding care they took to the very last, to prevent those Priests from coming into any trouble by their means, who had brought all this destruction upon themselves, for attaining which they scrupled nothing; Sir Everard Digby valuing himself in his private papers, upon affirming falsehoods to the Lords for this purpose; and Francis Tresham taking it upon his death, that he had not for several years seen Father Garnet, upon account of a difference between them, the direct contrary of which was afterwards confessed by Garnet himself (9).

formed by the Jesuits; and, notwithstanding that which had miscarried in the beginning of this reign, he ventured to frame a new one in his own mind, which he communicated only to a few of his intimate friends, in the close of the year 1604 (i); and this was, blowing up the Parliament-House with gunpowder. When they had taken all the methods for putting this abominable scheme in execution, they began to reflect, that they could make no use even of their success, if they did not provide, at the same time, for an insurrection, and the establishment of a new government. It was therefore, upon mature deliberation, agreed by the confederates, at a meeting they held in the city of Bath, that Mr Catesby should take in to their assistance whom he should think fit, provided they were bound by the oath of Secrecy which themselves had taken (k). In pursuance of this resolution, Mr Catesby applied himself to his friend Sir Everard Digby, whom he acquainted with the whole affair, and with their resolution of seizing the Princess Elizabeth, and proclaiming her Queen, upon the execution of the Powder-treason at London; in which his assistance was particularly necessary, as she was then at the Lord Harrington's, at Comb-Abbey in Warwickshire (l). To this Sir Everard willingly assented, and offered fifteen hundred pounds towards defraying the expences of this dark design, entertained Mr Fawkes afterwards at his house (m), and, the weather being rainy, advised him, upon his return to London, to be very careful in observing that the powder was not damp; so industrious and indefatigable he was, that, when the rest of the conspirators, upon the discovery of their design, at the very point of execution, fled down into the country, they found him at Dunchurch, as had been concerted, and, in company with him, they retired towards Staffordshire, where, after a desperate defence, in which some of these unhappy men were slain (n) [D], Sir Everard Digby, and others, were taken (o). Upon the commitment of Sir Everard to the Tower, he persisted steadily to maintain his own innocence as to the Powder-treason, and absolutely denied his having knowledge of any other persons being embarked in this design, than such as were either killed or taken; in which, notwithstanding all the arguments that could be used by those noble persons before whom he was examined, he continued obstinately firm (p). This resolution of his did not proceed from any hopes of escaping, but from an earnest desire of avoiding, if possible, being the instrument of other mens ruin, or disclosing more than was already discovered, being still satisfied, that he was engaged in a good cause, and having much less concern about his life, than about the bad effects to that cause which the detection of this plot might produce (q). This, which is the strongest proof of the infatuation that may be brought upon minds naturally virtuous, appears fully from a paper of his, written under his confinement, and sent privately to his family [E]. When

In this note we will give the reader a succinct account of the proceedings of the conspirators in town and country, which will shew how perfectly they had concerted their measures, and how punctual they were in executing each the part that had been assigned him. The 4th of November fell that year upon a Sunday, and it was past twelve at night when search was made under the Parliament-house, and Mr Guy Fawkes seized there booted and spurred (10). Mr Piercy had early notice of this, and set out of town about four in the morning. Mr Catesby was gone the night before. Mr Winter and the two Wrights soon followed (11). We come now to another part of the conspiracy, still stranger than any of the rest, which is this: there was one John Grant, Esq; a zealous Papist, who lived near Warwick, who having collected several persons of his own principles, and determined courage, went on Monday night, about the very time that Fawkes was seized in London, broke open the stables of one Mr Bennock at Warwick, who made it his business to break horses for the menage, and took those of several gentlemen that were in his hands, and coming well armed, and being now well mounted, made the best of their way to Dunchurch, where they found Sir Everard Digby and his party ready (12), and, on Wednesday the 7th of November, being joined by their accomplices from London, and knowing all their hopes had failed them there, they resolved, as their last resource, openly to take up arms, and Father Tesmond, alias Greenwell, a Jesuit, went into Lancashire to excite those of their religion to join them (13). They had flattered themselves with a great appearance in their favour, but they could never assemble above fourscore, nor could they depend upon many of those, or even upon their own servants (14). Sir Fulk Grevil, Deputy-Lieutenant, though an old and infirm man, seized the horses and arms of several gentlemen in his neighbourhood in Warwickshire, and made about sixteen of their followers prisoners (15). Sir Richard Verney, High-Sheriff of the county, likewise took some of them (16).

On Thursday they were at Robert Winter's house, where they had absolution given them by Father Hammond, though in open rebellion (17). They were pursued through Worcestershire by Sir Richard Walsli, which forced them to take shelter at Holbitch, the seat of Stephen Lyttleton, in Staffordshire, where Sir Richard, who was Sheriff of Worcestershire, with the people who came in to his assistance, surrounded them (18). He sent a trumpet to summon them to surrender, promising to intercede with the King to spare their lives, for as yet they had no notice of the Powder Treason; but the conspirators rejected this offer with contempt, and prepared to defend themselves as well as they could. This was on the Friday, and finding their powder damp, they placed a small parcel in a pan before the fire, upon a bag which held seventeen or eighteen pounds; a servant, who knew nothing of this, throwing some wood upon the fire, a spark flew out into the pan, which blew up all the powder, together with the roof of the house, and at the same time wounded Catesby, Rookwood, and Grant (19). About eleven o'clock the Sheriff, and those with him, attacked the house, when Thomas Winter was shot in the shoulder, both the Wrights were killed, Ambrose Rookwood fell soon after; then as Winter, Catesby, and Piercy, were standing together, the two last were shot through by the same ball, Winter, being hurt in the belly by a pike, was taken (20), and upon this the rest submitted and were sent up to London, excepting Robert Winter and Stephen Lyttleton, who for some weeks hid themselves (21). Francis Tresham stayed in town, and for some time preserved his liberty, but was at length seized, made an ample confession, but finding himself in a dying condition with the strangury, denied again what he had said that it might be of no use (22).

[E] And sent privately to his family. While Sir Everard Digby was prisoner in the Tower, he wrote in juice of lemon or otherwise, upon slips of paper, as opportunity offered, and got these conveyed to his Lady, by such as had permission to see him.

he was brought to his trial at Westminster, January 27th, 1605-6; he was indicted for being acquainted with and concealing the Powder-treason, taking the double oath of Secrecy and Constancy, and acting openly, with other traytors, in rebellion; to which indictment he pleaded guilty (r). After this he endeavoured to extenuate his offence, by shewing the motives to it, which have been before explained; then requested, that, as he had been alone in the crime, he might alone bear the punishment, without extending it to his family, that his debts might be paid, and that he might be beheaded; to which he received no favourable answer (s). Yet the Earls of Northampton and Salisbury, of whom the latter owned him for his relation, spoke mildly to him, and shewed him how very little service his behaviour had done him, since Fawkes confessed, that he was acquainted with the Powder-treason; and many other things, which he had laboured to conceal, were, by other means, found out (t). But, whatever he might say in his examinations, certain it is, that, upon his having some notice of it's being thought, by his own party, a very wild and ill-concerted enterprize, in which he engaged, he could write a very clear defence against this imputation, though he refused to make any when his life was at stake; so much more did he fear reproach amongst those of his own communion, than a violent and ignominious death [F]. Yet, after sentence of death was passed,

These notes, or advertisements, were preserved by the family as precious relicks, till, in the month of September 1675, they were found at the house of Charles Cornwallis, Esq; executor to Sir Kenelm the son of Sir Everard Digby, by Sir Rice Rudd, Baronet, and William Wogan, of Gray's-Inn, Esq; (23). The first of these papers runs thus:

I have not named any, either living or dead, that should have hurt my Lord Salisbury, and only intended these general informations, to procure me access of some friend, that I might inform my knowledge, for I never intended to hurt any creature, though it would have gained me all the world. As yet they have not got of me the affirming that I know any Priest particularly, nor shall ever do to the hurt of any but myself. At my first examination the Earl of Salisbury told me, that some things should be affirmed against me by Gerrat the Priest, who, saith he, I am sure you know well. My answer was, if I might see him I would tell him whether I knew him or no, but by that name I did not know him; nor at Mrs Vauxe's, as he said I did, for I never saw a Priest there. Yesterday I was before Mr Attorney and my Lord Chief-Justice, who asked me if I had taken the sacrament to keep secret the plot as others did? I said that I had not, because I would avoid the question of at whose hands it were. They told me that five had taken it of Gerard, and that he knew of the plot, which I said was more than I knew.

Now for my intention, let me tell you, that if I had thought there had been the least sin in the plot, I would not have been of it for all the world, and no other cause drew me to hazard my fortune and life, but zeal to God's religion. For my keeping it secret it was caused by certain belief, that those which were best able to judge of the lawfulness of it, had been acquainted with it, and given way unto it. More reasons I had to persuade me to this belief than I dare utter, which I will never to the suspicion of any, though I should to the rack for it, and as I did not know it directly that it was approved by such, so did I hold it in my conscience the best not to know any more if I might.

I have, before all the Lords, cleared all the Priests in it for any thing that I know, but now let me tell you what a grief it hath been to me, to hear that so much condemned, which I did believe would have been otherwise thought on by Catholicks; there is no other cause but this which hath made me desire life, for when I came into prison death would have been a welcome friend unto me, and was most desired, but when I heard how Catholicks and Priests thought of the matter, and that it should be a great sin that should be the cause of my end, it called my conscience in doubt of my very best actions and intentions in question, for I knew that myself might easily be deceived in such a business, therefore I protest unto you, that the doubts I had of my own good state, which only proceeded from the censure of others, caused more bitterness of grief in me, than all the miseries that ever I suffered, and only this caused me to wish life, till I might meet with a ghostly friend. For some good space I could do nothing, but with tears ask pardon at God's hands for all my errors, both in actions and intentions, in this business, and in my whole life, which the censure of this, contrary to my expectation, caused me to doubt. I did humbly beseech that my death might satisfy for my offence, which I should and shall offer most gladly to the giver of my life. I assure you, as I hope in God, that the love of all my estate and worldly happiness did never trouble me, nor the love of it since my imprisonment did ever move me to wish life. But if that I may live to make satisfaction to God and the world, where I have given any scandal, I shall not grieve if I should never look living creature in the face again. And besides that deprivations endure all worldly misery, I shall not need to clear any living body either private or publick, for I never named any body, but reported that those that are dead did promise that all forces in those parts about Mr Talbot would assist us, but this can hurt nothing, for they openly spoke it. You must be careful how you send, for Mr Lieutenant hath stayed the * * * * book, but take no notice of it. Let my brother see this, or know the contents; tell him I love his sweet comforts as my greatest jewel in this place. If I can I will convey in the tables a copy of a letter which I sent yesterday, it is, as near as I can understand, the meaning of the instruction; I perceive it works with the Lords, for I shall be sent to them. Oh how full of joy should I die, if I could do any thing for the cause which I love more than my life. Farewell my _____.

[F] Than a violent and ignominious death.] This, which is the last of Sir Everard's papers, is also the most material, and must appear, to every impartial reader, an incontestible proof of what the Attorney-General Coke affirmed at the trial of these conspirators, That their scheme was no more than an appendix to the plots framed by their party in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and, in a great measure, an improvement upon the scheme of Watson and Clarke on King James's coming to the throne: it runs thus (24).

My dearest, the * * * * I take at the uncharitable taking of these matters, will make me say more than ever I thought to have done. For, if this design had taken place, there could have been no doubt of other success: for that night, before any other could have brought the news, we should have known it by Mr Catesby, who should have proclaimed the heir-apparent at Charing-Cross, as he came out of town; to which purpose there was a proclamation drawn, if the Duke had not been in the House, then was there a certain way laid for the possessing him; but, in regard of the assurance they should have been there, therefore the greatest of our business stood in the possessing the Lady Elizabeth, who, lying within eight miles of Dunchurch, we would have easily surprized before the knowledge of any doubt: this was the cause of my being there. If she had been in Rutland, then Stoaks was near, and, in either place, we had taken sufficient order to have been possessed of her; there was also courses taken for the satisfying the people if the first had taken effect, as the speedy notice of liberty and freedom passed, he seemed to be very much affected; for, making a low bow to those upon the bench, he said, If I could bear any of your Lordships say you forgave me, I should go the more cheerfully to the gallows. To this all the Lords answered, God forgive you, and we do (u). On Thursday the 30th of January Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, were executed, pursuant to their sentence, at the west-end of St Paul's church, when Sir Everard is said to have expressed a very different sense of his crime from that which he had written concerning it after his confinement (w). But of this, and of a much more extraordinary circumstance attending his tragical departure out of this life, some notice will be taken in the notes [G]. He left at his death two young sons, who were afterwards Sir Kenelm Digby and Sir John Digby, and expressed his affection towards them by a well written and paterick paper, which he desired might be communicated to them at a fit time, as the last advice of their father. We shall take occasion, in another place, to shew how the Powder-treason was really discovered, and by whom (x); at present it may not be amiss to observe, that even this second part of the design, in which Sir Everard Digby was to have acted, was likewise timely discovered, and, as the plot proved the ruin of Sir Everard, so that discovery was the rise of his relation. For the Lord Harrington, who had the care of the Princess Elizabeth, having received some intimation of an intention to seize her, immediately sent up John Digby, a younger son of the Lord Digby's, to Court, with an account of all he knew; where the young Gentleman told his tale so well, as to acquire thereby the King's good graces, who, not long after, knighted him (y), employed him in a long negotiation in Spain, and, September 15th, 1622, created him Earl of Bristol. His son was the famous George Lord Digby, who, while he bore that title, made so great a figure in the House of Commons, was Secretary of State afterwards to King Charles I, and, succeeding to his father's title, attended King Charles the Second in his exile, was installed Knight of the Garter in the month of April 1661, and made a great figure throughout that reign. He was succeeded

' from all manner of slavery, as the ceasing of wardships and all monopolies, which, with change, would have been more plausible to the people if the first had been, than it is now. There was also a course taken to have given present notice to all Princes, and to associate them with an oath answerable to the League in France. I have not uttered any of these things, nor ever thought to do. For my going from Dunchurch I had this reason; first, I knew that Fawkes could reveal me, for I must make choice of two besides Mr Catesby, which I did of him and Mr Winter; I knew he had been employed in great matters, and, till torture, sure he carried it very well: secondly, we all thought, if we could procure Mr Talbot to rise that ***** party, at least, to a composition ***** that was not little, because we had in our company his son-in-law, who gave us some hope of, and did not much doubt of it. I do answer your speech with Mr Brown thus: Before that I knew any thing of the plot, I did ask Mr Farmer what the meaning of the Pope's brief was; he told me, that they were not (meaning Priests) to undertake or procure flirts, but yet they would not hinder any, neither was it the Pope's mind they should, that should be undertaken for Catholick good. I did never utter thus much, nor would not but to you; and this answer, with Mr Catesby's proceedings with him and me, gave me absolute belief, that the matter in general was approved, though every particular was not known. I dare not take that course that I could, to make it appear less odious, for divers were to have been brought out of the danger, which now would rather hurt them than otherwise. I do not think there would have been three worth saving that should have been lost; you may guess that I had some friends that were in danger, which I had prevented; but they shall never know it. I will do as much as my partner wisheth; and it will then appear, that I have not hurt or accused one man; and howsoever I might, in general, possess them with fear, in hope to do the cause good, yet my care was ever to lose my own life rather than hurt the unworthiest member of the Catholick Church. Tell her, I have ever loved her and her house, and, though I could never shew it, I will not live to manifest the contrary. Her Go: I hope will remember me, who I am, temporal respects, indebted to: your sister salute from me, whose noble mind to me, in this misery, I will never ***** my Lord of Arundel may do much with the Lord and the Queen. One that you write of, which dearly loveth him, and is dearly loved of him again, can tell him that I love him, and did

' manifest it in his fight, and he might have found it; last time as I saw him was in his company as I think. I am sure when this was, he was there. If your mother were in town, you should do it, to ***** her. Farewell, and where you cannot understand, send to me by your next, and I will explain.'

[G] Some notice will be taken in the notes ] We have a pretty full account of the manner in which Sir Everard and his accomplices finished their days; and that too penned within a very short time after it happened: it runs thus (25). ' Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Grant, and Bates, according to their judgment, were drawn, hanged, and quartered, at the west-end of St Paul's Church, in London, where all but Grant died very penitent; Sir Everard Digby protested, from the bottom of his heart, he asked forgiveness of God, the King, the Queen, the Prince, and all the Parliament; and, if that he had known it at first to have been so foul a treason, he would not have concealed it to have gained a world, requiring the people to witness he died penitent and sorrowful for this vile treason, and confident to be saved in the merits of his sweet Saviour Jesus, &c. He prayed kneeling about half a quarter of an hour, often bowing his head to the ground; in the same manner they all prayed, but no voice heard saving now and then, O Jesu, Jesu, save me, and keep me, &c. Which words they repeated many times upon the ladder. Friday, the last of January, in the Parliament-Yard at Westminster, were executed, as the former, Thomas Winter, Rookwood, Keyes, and Fawkes; which Fawkes, at his death, was more penitent than any of the rest, and besought all Catholics never to attempt any such bloody act, being a course which God did never favour nor prosper. Keyes, in obstinacy, cohered much with Grant; they all craved testimony that they died Roman Catholics; their quarters were placed over London gates, and their heads upon the Bridge.' It is very strange, that no notice at all should be taken, in this account, of that extraordinary circumstance which Mr Wood mentions as a thing generally known (26), That, when the executioner plucked out his heart, and, according to the manner, held it up, saying, Here is the heart of a traitor, Sir Everard made answer, Thou liest. This, continues Mr Wood, a most famous author mentions, but tells us not his name. This famous author is the Lord Bacon (27), and the passage referred to is this. ' We ourselves indeed remember to have seen the heart of a man who was embowelled, according to the custom amongst us in the execution of traitors, which, being thrown into the fire, as is usual, sprung up at first six foot high, and continued leaping leaping gradually lower and lower between seven and eight minutes, as far as our memory reaches. There is also an old and credible tradition, of an ox that lowed after it was embowelled. But it is more certain that a man, who suffered in the manner we have before-mentioned, his entrails being taken out, and his heart almost torn away, and in the hands of the hangman, was heard to utter three or four words of a prayer, which, we say, is more credible than what is reported of the sacrifice, because the friends of such criminals are wont to give money to the executioner, that he may be the quicker in performing his work, and the sooner put them out of their pain; whereas, in sacrifices, we see no cause why the Priests should use such extraordinary diligence. This proves no more than the possibility of such a thing in Lord Bacon's opinion, but cannot be properly applied as a proof to this particular fact, from which, in all its circumstances, it manifestly differs. E

D I G B Y (Sir KENELME) the son of the former, and a very famous Philosopher in the XVIIth century. It is extremely difficult to fix the time of his birth, there being authorities for three different days, but the 11th of June 1603 seems to have been generally received (a). It is said, that King James restored his estate to him in his infancy (b); which, however, is a mistake, since it was decided at law, that the King had no title to it. Both these points shall be cleared up in the notes [A]. At the time of his father's unfortunate death he was with his mother at Gothurst, being then but in the third year of his age. He seems to have been taken early out of her hands, since it is certain that he renounced the errors of Popery very young, and was carefully bred in the Protestant religion chiefly, as there is good reason to believe, under the direction of Archbishop Laud (c), then Dean of Gloucester, who had a very great affection for him, and who had reclaimed a near relation of his from Popery (d). In 1618 Mr Kenelme Digby was sent to the University, and entered of Gloucester-Hall (e), where the direction of his studies was committed to Mr Thomas Allen, one of the most learned and able men of those times (f); though he had another member of that society for his Tutor. His being recommended to Mr Allen was a great advantage to our young student, for he quickly discerned the natural strength of his faculties, and that spirit of penetration which is so seldom met with in persons of his age. He took pains, therefore, to shew him the right method of applying

[A] Shall be cleared up in the notes.] The famous Antiquary of Oxford is clear and positive, that the birth of this gentleman ought to be fixed to the 11th of July 1603 (1), in support of which he quotes two authorities that have very great weight with him, but not altogether so great with me (2). As to Dr Napier of Buckinghamshire, his work is written in a very bad hand, and I could give more instances than one, of nativities in his book, that disagree with the parish registers of persons to whom they belong, and therefore an entry therein ought not to be looked upon as decisive. Again, as to Mr Gadbury, there is great probability that his date was borrowed from Dr Napier's book, and if it was not, the same exceptions lie against it as have been urged against that. In the life-time of Sir Kenelme there is no doubt that the 11th of June was taken to be his birth-day. The famous Ben. Johnson, in a copy of verses to his honour; speaking of a feat in which he commanded, and of his undaunted courage, says (3),

Upon thy birth-day the eleventh of June.*

These two verses indeed do more honour to the hero than the Poet, but a man must have a strange opinion of Johnson's judgment, to believe he would falsify a date for the sake of such poetry. Mr Wood indeed says, and very truly, that this action was not upon the 11th but upon the 16th of June (4), which is indeed a proof that the Poet mistook the date of the battle, but not at all that he missed that of the birth-day, for sixteenth would have run as well, at least no worse, than eleventh. After Sir Kenelme's death, we find the very same day, I mean the eleventh of June, fixed upon in his epitaph (5), and therefore it seems to have been the true date. In the fourth edition of Bayle's Dictionary (6), and in all the late editions of Moreri (7), there is an article of our author, in which the day of his birth and of his death is said to be the eleventh of March, but whence this date was borrowed it is impossible to conceive, because I know not of any writer that has fixed either his death or his birth upon that day. But enough of this; let us now speak of the estate of the family. The dispute about it was determined in the Court of Wards, in Michaelmas term the eighth of King James, that is, in 1610, and in what manner, the reader shall learn from the best authority (8). 'Sir Everard Digby, seized in fee of the manor of Stoke in the county of Rutland, and of the manor of Tilton in the county of Leicester, held (by way of admittance) of the King, by Knights service in capite, by act executed in his life-time, and before any treason by him committed, conveyed the said manors to the use of himself for life, and afterwards to the use of his eldest son and heir apparent in tail, with divers remainders over to his other issues. And afterwards the said Sir Everard Digby was attainted and executed, for the heinous and horrible powder treason, committed after the said conveyance, his eldest son being then within age. The question was, Whether the wardship of the body, or of the third part of the said manors, should be to the King by force of the statutes of 32 and 34 H. VIII? And it was resolved by the two Chief-Justices, the Chief Baron, and the whole Court of Wards, that the King shall never have wardship or primer-feisin, but where there is an heir general or special. For the said statutes of 32 and 34 H. VIII. give wardship or primer-feisin to the King, in divers cases where there is no descent, as if the King's tenant conveys his land for the advancement of his wife, preferment of his children, or payment of his debts, but doth not give wardship or primer-feisin in any case, where there is not any heir general or special, because wardship or primer-feisin ought to be of the land of some ancestor who has an heir.' Thus it appears a certain writer was mistaken in affirming, that, at the request of his Queen, King Charles I. restored Sir Kenelme Digby to the large estate of his ancestors (9). His father had taken due care in this respect, and it seems was very well advised (10), yet he died under great concern even as to that point, for discovering, when it was too late, the universal odium attending the Popish-powder-plot, and fearing this might prejudice even Courts of justice, or excite the Parliament in so very extraordinary a case, to make some law ex post facto, for increasing the punishment of such as were concerned in it, he not only doubted, but seems to have died under a persuasion, that his estate would be confiscated (11).

applying his wonderful capacity, which he frequently compared to that of the so much celebrated wit of Italy Picus de Mirandula (g), to the sublimer parts of Philosophy; so that notwithstanding his stay at Oxford was but between two and three years, yet, upon his leaving that University in 1621, in order to travel, he was considered as a very extraordinary person, and such high expectations of him raised, as he lived afterwards to fulfil (b). Having made the tour of France, Spain, and Italy, and having been in all places remarkably well received, he returned to England in 1623; and being presented to the King, at the Lord Mountague's house at Hinchinbroke, on the 23d of October the same year, with high commendations of his learning, he there received the honour of knighthood in the presence of Charles Prince of Wales and the famous Duke of Buckingham, then just returned out of Spain, where Mr Digby had attended on his Royal Highness, as himself informs us (i). In a very short time after Sir K. Digby rendered himself very remarkable, by the happy application of a secret which he met with in his travels, as to which we will, from his own authority, inform the reader fully in the notes [B]. After the demise of King James,

[B] In the notes.] This secret of his was that which has since made so much noise in the world, under the title of the sympathetick powder, the virtues of which were, as he assures us, thoroughly enquired into by King James, his son the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Buckingham, with other persons of the highest distinction, and all was registered among the observations of the great Chancellor Bacon, to add, by way of appendix, to his Natural History (12). The matter of fact on which this was grounded, take in his own words: 'Mr James Howell, well known for his publick works, and particularly his Dendrologies, endeavouring to part two of his friends engaged in a duel, seized, with his left hand, the hilt of the sword of one of the combatants, and with his right hand laid hold of the blade of the other. They, being transported with fury one against the other, struggled to rid themselves of the hindrance their friend made, that they should not kill one another, and one of them roughly drawing the blade of his sword, cut to the very bone, the nerves, and muscles of Mr Howell's hand, and then the other, disengaging his hilt, gave a cross-blow on his adversary's head, which glanced towards his friend, who, heaving up his fore hand to save the blow, he was wounded on the back of his hand, as he had been before within. The two combatants, seeing Mr Howell's face besmeared with blood by heaving up his wounded hand, left fighting at once, and ran to embrace him, and having searched his hurts, they bound up his hand with one of his garters to close the veins, which were cut and bled abundantly. They brought him home, and sent for a surgeon, but this being heard at Court, the King sent one of his own surgeons, for his Majesty much affected the said Mr Howell.

'It was my chance to be lodged hard by him, and four or five days after, as I was making myself ready, he came to my house, and prayed me to view his wounds, for I understand, said he, that you have extraordinary remedies upon such occasions, and my surgeons are apprehensive that it might grow to a gangrene, and so the hand must be cut off. In effect, his countenance discovered that he was in much pain, which he said was insupportable, in regard of the extreme inflammation. I told him I would willingly serve him, but if haply he knew the manner how I would cure him, without touching or seeing him, it may be he would not expose himself to my manner of curing, because he would think it, perhaps, either ineffectual or superstitious. He replied, that the wonderful things which many have related unto me of your way of curing, make me nothing at all doubt of it's efficacy. I asked him then for any thing that had the blood upon it, so he presently sent for his garter wherewith his hand was first bound, and having called for a basin of water, as if I would wash my hands, I took a handful of powder of vitriol which I had in my study, and presently dissolved it. As soon as the bloody garter was brought me, I put it within the basin, observing in the mean while what Mr Howell did, who stood talking with a gentleman in a corner of my chamber, not regarding at all what I was doing, but he started suddenly, as if he had found some strange alteration in himself. I asked him What he ailed? I know not what ails me, replied he, but I find that I feel no more pain; methinks that a pleasing kind of freshness, as if a wet cold napkin did spread over my hand, has taken away the inflammation that tormented me before. I answered, since you feel already so good an effect of my medicament, I advise you to cast away all your plaisters, only keep the wound clean, and in a moderate temper betwixt heat and cold. This was presently reported to the Duke of Buckingham, and a little after to the King, who were both very curious to know the circumstance of the business, which was, that after dinner I took the garter out of the water, and put it to dry before a great fire. It was scarce dry but Mr Howell's servant came running, that his master felt as much burning as ever he had done, if not more, for the heat was such, as if his hand were betwixt coals of fire; I answered that though that had happened at present, yet he should find ease in a short time, for I knew the reason of this accident, and I would provide accordingly, for his master should be free from that inflammation, it may be before he could possibly return unto him, but in case he found no ease, I wished him to come presently back again; if not he might forbear coming. Thereupon he went, and at the instant I did put again the garter into the water, he found his master without any pain at all.

'King James, who had received a punctual information of what had happened, would fain know how it was done. I readily told him what the author, of whom I had the secret, said to the Great Duke of Tuscany on the like occasion: it was a religious Carmelite, who came from the Indies and Persia to Florence, he had also been in China, and having done many strange cures with his powder, after his arrival in Tuscany, the Duke said he would be very glad to learn it of him. The Carmelite answered, that it was a secret he had learnt in the Oriental parts, and he thought there was not any person in Europe who knew it but himself, and that it deserved not to be divulged, which could not be done if his Highness meddled with the practice of it, because he was not likely to do it with his own hand, but must trust a surgeon, or some other servant, so that in a short time divers others would come to know it as well as himself. But a few months after, I had an opportunity to do an important courtesy to the said Fryar, which induced him to discover unto me his secret, and the same year he returned to Persia, so that now there is no other knows this secret in Europe but myself. The King replied, that I need not be apprehensive that he would discover any thing, for he would not trust any body in the world to make experience of his secret, but that he would do it with his own hands, and therefore desired some of the powder, which I delivered, instructing him in all the circumstances, whereupon his Majesty made fundry proofs, whence he received singular satisfaction.'

If any inquisitive reader should demand, whether the Lord Bacon ever published this account or not, the answer must certainly be in the negative, and yet no inference can be fairly drawn from thence to the prejudice of Sir Kenelme Digby's relation, first, because that noble Philosopher never published his Appendix to his Natural History, and next, because in that very work, he has given us of his own knowledge, and indeed as to his own person, a relation to the full as strong as this, though of another kind (13). He tells us he had a wart from his childhood upon one of his fingers, and that being at Paris when he was about sixteen years

James, he made as great a figure in the new Court, though he was not remarkable for paying his homage to the great favourite. He became, notwithstanding, a Gentleman of the Bedchamber, a Commissioner of the Navy, and a Governor of Trinity-House (k); which employments, if they added but little to the weight of his purse, served however to heighten his reputation. Some disputes having happened with the Venetians in the Mediterranean, by which the English trade suffered, as well as by the depredations committed by the Algerines, Sir Kenelme Digby sailed with a small Squadron thither in the summer of 1628, took several armed vessels belonging to the Infidels, setting the English slaves that were on board at liberty; and, on the 16th of June, having gained a considerable victory with a very inferior force, he likewise brought the Venetians to reason; so that as he left England with a very high character as a Scholar, he returned to it with no less credit as a gallant Soldier, and a wise Commander (l). After his coming back to England, his antient friend, and director of his studies, Mr Thomas Allen, of Gloucester-Hall, died there, full of years and reputation, having collected an excellent library of manuscripts as well as printed books, many of which last he rendered as valuable as the first, by inserting his learned notes in their margins; all which, as a testimony of his affection and esteem for his eminent abilities, he bestowed, by his will, upon Sir Kenelme Digby (m). This was in the year 1632, and Sir Kenelme, considering the great value of the manuscripts, how much they were esteemed in the University, and how serviceable they might prove to such as consecrated the greatest part of their time to their studies, most generously bestowed them, the very next year, upon the Bodleian Library (n). Sir Kenelme continued, to this time, a Member of the Church of England, but going some time afterwards into France, he began to have some religious scruples, occasioned, as it is supposed, by the vigorous sollicitations of several zealous Ecclesiasticks of the first rank; and having applied himself, for about two years, to the perusal of books of controversy, though, as he himself confessed, all of the same side, he, at length, changed his sentiments, and, in 1636, reconciled himself to the Church of Rome (o); which, as it gave very great uneasiness to his friends in England, so to none more than to Archbishop Laud, who had borne him for many years a very particular affection (p). This occasioned his writing to that Prelate a very large apology for his conduct, who returned him a very ample answer, full of tenderness and good advice, which is still extant, and does great honour to the Archbishop's memory (q) [C]. His Grace had very little hopes that these admonitions would operate on the mind of Sir Kenelme Digby, which was certainly carried old, he had a great number of warts that broke out on both hands in a month's time, upon which the English Ambassador's Lady caused them to be rubbed with a piece of bacon with the rine on, which she nailed upon the post of her window, which looked to the south, and the consequence of that was, that in the space of five weeks all the warts died away, and amongst them that which he had for several years. His Lordship likewise gives the receipt for making the weapon salve in the same place, upon which he makes several very judicious remarks.

The celebrated Mr Bayle, in a letter of his dated March 27, 1697, has the following passage, which may prove acceptable to the curious reader (14). 'It is some time ago that I mentioned to you a Physician in Friezeland, who has performed several cures without giving any thing to his patients. He contents himself with mingling with their urine somewhat, which, as the malady requires, either sweats, vomits, or purges. He continues this practice, and I am told he was domestick to a certain great Lord of Italy, who was sent for to the Court of Vienna to cure the Emperor, which he actually did. This man discovered his master's secret and has set up for himself. Yet he is not the only one who possesses it, for there are three others who pursue this practice as well as he; one is at Leyden, another at Antwerp, and another has been here in this city of Rotterdam for two or three months. He has been but lately in any degree of credit. His house is at present like the pool of Bethesda, all who are diseased run thither. It is certain that he has cured some, and that he has sweated a great many. The Physicians cry out against him with the utmost fury, and, as there are more in this country than in any other, who are apt to deny as impossible whatever they do not comprehend, so there are numbers who join in the same outcry with the Physicians. But not being able to deny the fact that many have been sweated, they attribute this to a prepossessed imagination. For my own part I cannot think it impossible, physically speaking, that a man should be made to sweat by having something put into his urine.' There was a German Physician, who, in the year 1700, undertook to cure diseases in the same manner here in England (15).

[C] And does great honour to the Archbishop's memory.] This letter is dated from Lambeth, March 27, 1636. It is very large and full, written, not in decent terms only, but with great delicacy; some part of it the reader will expect to see, and we will give him what most concerns the personal history of this gentleman (16). 'Whereas you say that you have returned into that communion, who, from your birth, had right of possession in you, and therefore ought to continue it, unless clear and evident proof (which you say surely cannot be found) should have evicted you from it. Truly, Sir, I think this had been spoken with more advantage to you and your cause before your adhering to the Church of England than now; for then right of possession could not have been thought little. But now, since you deserted that communion, either you did it upon clear and evident proof, or upon apparent only. If you did it then upon clear and evident proof, Why say you now no such can be found? If you did it but upon apparent and seeming proof, a semblance of very good reason (as yourself calls it) why did you then come off from that communion till your proof were clear and evident? And why may not that which now seems clear and evident be but apparent, as well as that which then seemed clear unto you, be but semblance now? Nor would I have you say, that clear and evident proof cannot be found; for a man in this case of religion, to forego the communion which had right of possession in him from his birth: for the proposition is an universal negative, and of hard proof. And therefore, though I think I know you and your judgment so well, that I may not, without manifest wrong, charge you that you did in this great action, and so nearly concerning you, ad pauca respicere, which our great master tells us breeds facile and easy, rather than safe and warrantable, determinations; yet it will lie upon you not only in honour without, but also in conscience within, to be able to assure yourself, that you did ad plurima, if not ad omnia respicere. The thing being so weighty in itself, and the miserable division of Christendom (never sufficiently ried away with that veneration which he thought due to the faith of his ancestors, and for which his father was understood to have died a martyr; and, perhaps, he was also influenced by that praise which he received from all sides, upon the subject of his conversion (r). At least this is certain, that, to shew at once his parts and his sincerity, he wrote very eagerly in defence of his new, or rather old religion, that the world might take notice he was a thorough convert, and that it might seem he had done nothing precipitately, or without due consideration (s). These works of his were several times printed [D], After a long stay in France, where he was highly careffed, he came over ciently to be lamented) making the doubt so great, that you who have been on both sides, must needs lie under the dispute of both sides, whether this last act of your's be not in you rather a relapse into a former sickness, than a recovery from a former fall.

But against this, the temper of your mind (you say) arms you against all censures, no slight air of reputation being able to move you. In this I must needs say you are happy: for he that can be moved from himself by the changeable breath of mens lives, more out of than in himself, and which is a misery beyond all expression, must in doubts go to other men for resolution, not to himself; as if he had no soul within him. But yet post conscientiam fama, and though I would not desire to live by reputation, yet I would leave no good means untried, rather than live without it. And how far you have brought yourself in question, which of these two, conscience or reputation, you have shaken by this double change, I leave yourself to judge, because you say your first was with a semblance of very good reason. And though you say again that it now appears you were then misled, yet you will have much ado to make the world think so.

The way you took in concealing this your resolution, of returning into that communion, and the reasons which you give, why you so privately carried it here, I cannot but approve. They are full of all ingenuity, tender and civil respects, fitted to avoid discontent in your friends, and scandal that might be taken by others, or contumely that might be returned upon yourself. And as are these reasons, so is the whole frame of your letter (setting aside that I cannot concur in judgment) full of discretion and temper, and so like yourself, that I cannot but love even that which I dislike in it. And though I shall never be other than that I have been to the worth of Sir Kenelme Digby, yet most heartily sorry I am, that a man, whose discourse did so much content me, should thus slide away from me before I had so much as suspicion to awaken me, and suggest that he was going. Had you put me into a dispensation, and communicated your thoughts to me before they had grown up into resolutions, I am a Priest, and would have put on what secrecy you should have commanded. A little knowledge I have, (God knows a little) I would have ventured it with you in that serious debate you have had with yourself. I have ever honoured you since I knew your worth, and I would have done all offices of a friend to keep you nearer than now you are. But, since you are gone, and settled another way, before you would let me know it, I know not now what to say to a man of judgment, and so resolved. For to what end should I treat, when a resolution is set already? so set, as that you say no clear and evident proof can be found against it: nor can I tell how to press such a man as you to ring the changes in Religion. In your power it was not to change; in mine it is not to make you change again. Therefore, to the moderation of your own heart, under the grace of God, I must and do now leave you for matter of Religion, but retaining still with me, and entirely, all the love and friendliness which your worth won from me, well knowing that all differences in opinion shake not the foundations of Religion.

Now to your postscript, and then I have done. That I am the first, and the only person, to whom you have written thus freely: I thank you heartily for it. For I cannot conceive any thing thereby, but your great respect to me, which hath abundantly spread itself all over your letter. And had you written this to me with a restraint of making it further known, I should have performed that trust: but since you have submitted to me, what further knowledge of it I shall think fit to give to any other person, I have, as I took myself bound, acquainted his Majesty with it, who gave a great deal of very good expression concerning you, and is not a little sorry to lose the service of so able a subject. I have likewise made it known in private to Mr Secretary Cooke, who was as confident of you as myself. I could hardly believe your own letters, and he as hardly my relation. To my Secretary I must needs trust it, having not time to write it again out of my scribbled copy; but I dare trust the secrecy in which I have bound him. To others I am silent, and shall so continue, till the thing open itself; and I shall do it out of reasons very like to those which you give, why yourself would not divulge it here. In the last place, you promise yourself that the condition you are in will not hinder me from continuing to be the best friend you have. To this I can say no more, than that I could never arrogate to myself to be your best friend, but a poor, yet respectful, friend of your's I have been ever since I knew you: and it is not your change that can change me, who never yet left but where I was first forsaken, and not always there.

There is nothing more common, than for persons, who have thought fit to alter their choice as to a religious system, to vindicate this conduct of theirs by writing, and the higher their station, the greater their character, the more extensive their reputation, so much the more necessary works of this kind are thought; and, without question, so much the more difficult they are found. Our author had exhibited the best excuses in his power to make, and, very probably, in the best dress, to his Grace of Canterbury; and how these were received, as well as what the nature of them might be, we may easily conjecture from the preceding note. As to those pieces which are to be the subject of this, their titles are these:

I. A Conference with a Lady about Choice of Religion. Paris 1638. Lond. 1654. 8vo. This was a piece written in an easy, polite, and concise stile, in which it's author was peculiarly happy; his principal aim was to secure a general approbation of his conduct, by keeping to such arguments as suited best with common understandings; and, at the same time, insinuated, that, in the choice of a religion, an uninterrupted authority of the safety of salvation, in any communion, was of high importance, and that, with regard to speculative points, liberty of opinion was not precluded. Dr Twisse, one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, wrote an answer to this treatise, which was never published.

II. Letters between the Lord George Digby and Sir Kenelme Digby, Knight, concerning Religion. Lond. 1651. 8vo. These letters, though printed thirteen years after, were written at the time which we have assigned them. The first, from Lord Digby to Sir Kenelme Digby, is dated November 2d, 1638, from Sherborne; and therein his Lordship attacks the authority of the Fathers with respect to Articles of Faith, in which he shews, that though Protestants, as well as Papists, frequently appeal to them in points where they think their judgments agreeable to their own doctrines, yet in others, where they differ from them, they are rejected by both; whence he infers, their authority can be decisive to neither. Sir Kenelme Digby, in his answer, dated at London, December 6th, 1638, takes a great deal of pains to apologize for the Fathers, and distinguishes between their sentiments as to Articles of Faith, and such points of doctrine in which, without prejudice to the Church, freedom of opinion may be allowed. As to the first he will have their authority decisive, to England, and was very well received by the Queen, who, in the year 1638, employed him, and Mr Walter Mountague, in the management of an affair, that afterwards made a very great noise (t). The King was, at that time, preparing for a war with the Scots, of which we have elsewhere given the reader some account (u); and his situation, at that time, was such, as induced him to ask, as well as to accept, the assistance of such of his subjects as were able and willing to supply him with money. The Nobility led the way, and the Clergy of the Church of England contributed, in a manner, proportionable rather to their zeal than to their interest (x). The Queen taking notice of this, and being very desirous that those of her religion should not appear deficient in loyalty at such a juncture, prevailed upon the two Gentlemen before-mentioned to write a kind of circular letter to those of the Romish persuasion throughout the kingdom, in support of one of her own, to excite their liberality at this season (y). These endeavours were attended with very considerable effects, which, however, ought undoubtedly to be attributed to principles of honour rather than any thing else; for we have very good authority to prove, that this proceeding was ill relished at Rome, from whence instructions were speedily sent, to cast a damp upon the loyalty of the English Papists (y) [E]. In the month of January 1640, the House of Commons sent for Sir Kenelme Digby, in order to know how far, and upon what grounds, he had acted in this matter, which he opened to them very clearly (z); and the Queen herself also sent a message to the House, in which she stated her own concern in the matter, and the motives for her conduct; with which the House was, or at least seemed to be, satisfied (a). Yet upon an address, that his Majesty would remove such as were of the Popish Religion from Court, and more especially from his royal presence, Sir Kenelme Digby and Mr Walter Mountague were particularly named, and felt the effects of it (b). Upon the breaking out of the Civil War, Sir Kenelme Digby remaining at London, was, by the Parliament, committed prisoner to Winchester-House (c), where, however, he was treated with great respect, was visited by men of all parties, and some amongst them of the first distinction (d). At length, in the year 1643, her decisive, though not as to the second Lord Digby, in his answer, dated at Sherborne March 29th, 1639, returns to the charge with great strength of reasoning. He shews, that rejecting such a decisive authority in the Fathers, does by no means infer a disrespect of them; and professes, that though he cannot ground his faith precisely upon what they deliver, he nevertheless believes them to have been sincerely pious and excellent persons. He observes, that, if such an authority was due to them, as is contended for, it must be chiefly attributed to those of the earliest ages; and that, with respect to the Fathers of the first three centuries, there are great disputes about the genuineness of the writings ascribed to them, and a doubtful rule can be no rule at all. He insists farther, that their authority cannot be decisive, because sometimes they contradict each other, sometimes they are inconsistent with themselves, sometimes they teach what is not either received by Protestants or Papists, and sometimes they shew a manifest want of ability in handling those subjects of which they treat. In these letters there is great civility expressed on both sides, insomuch, that few controversies have been managed with so little acrimony; which, after all, is the highest commendation that can be bestowed upon them, since the matters to which they relate had been as justly and as conclusively debated, by other as able writers, long before.

[E] Upon the loyalty of the English Papists ] We have, in as concise terms as possible, represented the matter of fact clearly in the text; from whence it appears, that the Queen was the first mover in this affair. She says in her letter, that she had ventured to answer for the zeal of the Catholics, and that, after soliciting so often in their favour, she was desirous of presenting his Majesty with some marks of their gratitude (17). For the management of this affair, an assembly was called at London, of the principal persons of that persuasion, in which Signior Con, the Pope's Nuncio to the Queen, presided, by which assembly the Queen's proposal was embraced and recommended, and, upon the letters of Digby and Mountague, treasurers were appointed in the several counties to collect his contribution, which amounted to upward of twenty thousand pounds (18). As this money was intended for the support of an army raised against the Scots, who, under pretence of religious disputes, but in reality excited by emissaries from France, were in arms against the King, it is a point of some importance to know what the sentiments were of the Court of Rome in a case of this nature; and these are preserved to us in the following paper (19).

A Letter from the Pope to his Nuncio in England at the beginning of the War with Scotland, but badly translated.

' You are to command the Catholics of England in general, that they suddenly desist from making such offers of men, towards this northern expedition, as we hear they have done, little to the advantage of their discretion. And likewise it is requisite, considering the penalty already imposed, that they be not too forward with money, more than what law and duty enjoins them to pay, without any innovation at all, or view of making themselves rather weaker pillars of the kingdom than they were before.

' Inform the Provincials of every order, that it is expressly prohibited no more assemblies (of what nature soever) shall admit of the Laity to have either voice or session in it, being what will be urged for a precedent, tho' it is but only an usurpation.

' Declare unto the best of the Peers and Gentlemen, by word of mouth or letter, that they ought not to express any averseness, in case the High Court of Parliament be called, nor shew any discontent at the acts which do not point-blank aim at religion, being, in general, the most fundamental law of that kingdom.

' Advise the Clergy to desist from that foolish, nay, rather, illiterate and childish custom of distinction in the Protestant and Puritan Doctrine. And, especially, this error is so much the greater, when they undertake to prove, that Protestantism is a degree nearer the Catholic Faith than the other: for, since both of them be without the verge of the Church, it's needless hypocrisy to speak of it, yea, it begets more malice than 'tis worth.

' That the Provincials are herein required to give a general warning, throughout all orders, that no religious person ought to be seduced (by any Noblemen, either Officers of the Crown, or the like, who pretend to be ecismatick) into a premunire. For he that dares not follow the truth as his conscience directs him, is not worthy to be sought or followed by any of our faith. But, on the other side, we give the like command, that whosoever is thought inclining to God in his heart, let no man be so rash to boast and speak it abroad.

' All busy enquiries are forbidden, but especially into arcana's of State.

' That none of the Church, whether Lay-Brother or Ecclesiastick, contribute so largely as they have done her Majesty the Queen-Dowager of France having vouchsafed to write a letter, with her own hand, in favour of Sir Kenelme, and to procure his liberty, it was granted upon certain terms (e), and a very respectful letter written in answer to that of the Queen upon this subject (f) [F]. Before he quitted the kingdom, however, he was summoned before a Committee of the House of Commons, in order to give an account of any knowledge he might have of transactions between Archbishop Laud and the Court of Rome, and particularly as to an offer supposed to be made to that Prelate from thence of a Cardinal's Hat; Sir Kenelme Digby assured the Committee, that he knew nothing of any such transactions, and that, in his judgment, the Archbishop was what he seemed to be, a very sincere and learned Protestant (g); of all which he took care that his Grace should be informed, as well as that his enemies were very solicitous to discover any thing that might fix an imputation of that sort upon his conduct (h). We may easily conceive, that a person of Sir Kenelme Digby's studious and philosophick genius, could not be altogether idle even while under confinement, but that his thoughts would be sometimes employed upon those sublime and important topics which had formerly furnished matter for his meditations; and accordingly we find, that, during his residence in Winchester-House, he composed two pieces at least, that soon after stole abroad into the world, and kept alive that fame which their author had acquired in better times. These two pieces regard the works of others, and may be justly esteemed judicious criticisms, as well as very learned philosophical dissertations [G]. His appearance at the Court of France, to return thanks to the Queen-Mother, for her gracious interposition in his favour, was highly acceptable to many of the learned in that kingdom, who had a very high opinion of his abilities, and were charmed with the life and freedom of his conversation, which is, on all hands, allowed to have been very agreeable, notwithstanding that spirit of envy which pursued him living, and which has not ceased to persecute his memory since his death (i). It is highly probable, that, about this time, having heard so much of the fame of Des Cartes, he resolved to go and pay him a visit at Egmond, the place he had chosen for his retreat, where he accordingly found him, and had a conversation with him upon a very remarkable subject (k); and though he did not declare to that Philosopher who he was, yet Des Cartes

[F] Upon this subject.] Mr Wood tells us, that Sir Kenelme Digby was very active for the King in the beginning of the Civil Wars (20); but it is most probable, that he was prevented from being active, since it is very evident that he was committed to Winchester-House about the time it broke out, and continued in that confinement till he was discharged in the manner mentioned in the text.  ‘ The two Houses of Parliament having been informed, by the Sieur de Gressy, of the desire your Majesty has, that we should set at liberty Sir Kenelme Digby; we are commanded to make known to your Majesty, that although the religion, the past behaviour, and the abilities of this Gentleman, might give just umbrage of his practising to the prejudice of the constitutions of this realm; nevertheless, having so great regard to the recommendation of your Majesty, they have ordered him to be discharged, and have authorized us farther to assure your Majesty, and their being always ready to testify to you their respects upon every occasion, as well as to advance whatever may regard the good correspondence between the two States. Most humble servants, &c.

By whom this letter was to be sent does not appear, but, most probably, by the Committee to whom this matter was referred. In regard to the terms upon which this Gentleman was set at liberty, they will sufficiently appear from the following paper, entirely written with, as well as subscribed by, his own hand.

‘ Whereas upon the mediation of her Majesty the Queen of France, it hath pleased both Houses of Parliament to permit me to go into that kingdom; in humble acknowledgment of their favour therein, and to preserve and confirm a good opinion of my zeal and honest intentions to the honour and service of my country, I do here, upon the faith of a Christian, and the word of a Gentleman, protest and promise, that I will, neither directly nor indirectly, negotiate, promote, consent unto, or conceal, any practice or design, prejudicial to the honour or the safety of the Parliament. And, in witness of my reality herein, I have hereunto subscribed my name, this 3d day of August, 1643.

‘ KENELME DIGBY.’

[G] As well as very learned philosophical dissertations.] Both were written in so short a space of time, and are so full of deep learning, that the reader cannot help allowing there must have been prodigious store in that magazine, which could furnish such variety and choice upon such sudden occasions.

III. Observations upon Religio Medici, occasionally written by Sir Kenelme Digby, Knt. Lond. 1643, 8vo. These observations, digested into the form of a letter, were written in the night between the 22d and 23d of December, 1642, and addressed to Edward Earl of Dorset, Sir Kenelme's great friend and patron, and who was a very great admirer of that famous piece written by the ingenious Dr Brown. Whoever peruses these observations carefully, will discern that Sir Kenelme Digby was not either so credulous, or so superstitious a man as some have represented him, and that there are many crude and hasty censures in that letter, yet there are also some very strong and sensible meditations upon very uncommon subjects.

IV. Observations on the 22d stanza, in the ninth canto of the 2d book of Spenser's Fairy Queen. Lond. 1644, 8vo. This likewise was a letter to Sir Edward Stradling, written hastily, and containing a very deep philosophical commentary upon the most mysterious verses that ever fell from the pen of their learned author, and which are thought to have been admirably explained in this discourse. Beyond all doubt, if Sir Kenelme Digby has reached the sense of his author, it does very high honour to Mr Spenser, and might kindle a spirit of emulation in such as read his excellent writings with delight, to attempt something of the same kind with respect to other obscure passages, which, cleared up in the same manner, would not fail of being very acceptable to the literary world.

[G] Which

Cartes presently discovered him by his discourse, which is a circumstance worthy of notice [H] Our author is also reported to have had many conferences with him after at Paris (l), where he spent the best part of the ensuing year in a close application to his studies, and in frequenting the assemblies of the learned in that city, where he was generally well received, and, for the reasons before assigned, greatly admired (m). He had now leisure to digest that Philosophy which he had been so long meditating, and of which he framed a system, in two parts, which, in his own language, but with a licence or privilege from the French King, he published in the following year, and which is regarded by the learned as his principal performance (n). Some have insinuated, that, in this work of his, he has taken to himself the honour of many weighty and curious observations which he met with in the writings of his learned and judicious friend Thomas Allen, of Gloucester-Hall (o); but as never any proof of this was attempted, and as Sir Kenelme Digby, in every thing he penned, had the air of an original writer, this ought, in justice, to be considered as a very groundless suggestion. We shall give the reader a more full account of these two parts of his Philosophy in the notes [I]. After the King's affairs

[H] Which is a circumstance worthy of notice ] The late very ingenious and knowing M. des Maizeaux, in the life of M. St Evremond, tells us, this gentleman was informed by Sir Kenelme Digby, that, having read the writings of that great Philosopher Des Cartes, he resolved to go in person to Holland on purpose to see him (22) He did so, and found him in his retirement at Egmond. There that studious and intelligent person received and conversed with him as a stranger, but after a considerable time spent in a free and learned discourse upon a great variety of subjects, M. Des Cartes, who had seen some of his works, told him, that he did not doubt but he was the famous Sir Kenelme Digby. And if you Sir, replied the Knight, were not the illustrious M. Des Cartes, I should not have come on purpose to see you. Then Sir Kenelme Digby remarked to the Philosopher, that our speculative discoveries were indeed pretty and agreeable, but that after all they were too uncertain and unprofitable to take up a man's whole thoughts; that life was almost too short to attain to the right knowledge of necessary things; that it would be much more worthy of him, who so well understood the frame of the human body, to study ways and means to prolong it, than to apply himself to the barren speculations of Philosophy. Des Cartes assured him that he had already considered that matter, and that to render a man immortal was what he would not venture to promise, but that he was very sure it was possible to lengthen out his life to the period of the Patriarchs. When Monf. de St Evremond told M. des Maizeaux this particular, he added, that they were not ignorant in Holland that Des Cartes flattered himself he had made this discovery, and that he had heard several persons talk of it who had known that Philosopher, that Des Cartes's friends also in France knew it, and that Abbot Picot, his disciple and martyr, being persuaded that he had found out this great secret, would not believe the news of his death, and that when he was ashamed to doubt of it any longer, he cried, 'tis done and over, the world will soon be at an end!

[I] Of these two parts of his Philosophy in the notes.] In order to treat the subject of this note as clearly and as concisely as possible, we will first give the titles of our author's works, then some observations upon them, next shew how they were received, and lastly, speak of the answers that were written to them.

V. A Treatise of the Nature of Bodies. Paris 1644, fol. printed again at London in 1658, 1665, and 1669, all which editions are in 4to, and to the last some other pieces of his are added.

VI. A Treatise declaring the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul, out of which the Immortality of Reasonable Souls is evinced. Paris 1644, fol. printed again at London 1645, 1657, 1669, all in 4to, and together with the former treatise.

VII. Institutionum Peripateticarum libri quinque, cum Appendice Theologica de Origine Mundi, that is, five books of Peripatetick Institutions, together with a Theological Appendix concerning the Origin of the World. Paris 1651, fol. This piece is added to the two former, translated into Latin by J. L. together with a preface prefixed in the same language, by Thomas Anglus, that is, Thomas White, who also translated these Peripatetick Institutions into English.

The author addresses the two treatises first mentioned, which are indeed but the first and second parts of the same work, to his son Kenelme Digby, and his epistle to him is dated at Paris, August 31, 1644, and the French King's privilege at Fontainebleau, the 26th of September in the same year. It will appear clearly to such as peruse these pieces, that our author was a man of very deep thought, extensive learning, and very happy in supporting his philosophick arguments by a very dextrous application of facts. He was entirely addicted to the Corpuscularian Philosophy, which for those times he very well understood, but his notions being for the most part very new, and the relations advanced by him very extraordinary, those who envied him took occasion from thence to treat him not only with severity but indecency, and better writers having succeeded him, have not taken the pains to expose this ill usage, perhaps to prevent the world's taking notice how much they were obliged themselves to our learned Knight. An instance will make all this plain. Our author having explained the sense of smelling, and shewn why brutes have it in so much greater perfection than human creatures, he proceeds thus (23):

Without doubt the like use men would make of this sense, had they not on the one side better means than it to know the qualities of meats: and therefore this is not much reflected upon. And on the other side, were they not continually stuffed and clogged with gross vapours of steamy meat, which are daily reeking from the table and their stomachs, and permit not purer atoms of bodies to be discerned, which require clear and uninfected organs to take notice of them. As we see it fare with dogs, who have not so true and sensible noses when they are high fed, and lie in the kitchen amidst the steams of meat, as when they are kept in their kennel with a more spare diet fit for henting.

One full example this age affordeth us in this kind, of a man whose extremity of fear wrought upon him to give us this experiment. He was born in some village of the country of Liege, and therefore among strangers he is known by the name of John of Liege. I have been informed of this story by several (whom I dare confidently believe) that have had it from his own mouth, and have questioned him with great curiosity particularly about it.

When he was a little boy there being wars in the country, as that state is seldom without molestations from abroad, when they have no distempers at home, which is an unseparable effect of a country's situation upon the frontiers of powerful neighbouring Princes that are at variance, the village of which he was, had notice of some unruly scattered troops that were coming to pillage them, which made all the people of the village flee hastily, with what they could carry with them, to hide themselves in the woods, which were spacious enough to afford them shelter, for they joined upon the forest of Ardenne. There they lay till some of their scouts brought them word that the soldiers, of whom they were in such apprehension, had fired their town and quitted it. Then all of them returned home excepting this boy, who it seemeth being of a very timorous nature, had images of fear so strong in his fancy, that first he ran farther into the wood than any of the rest, and afterwards apprehended affairs were totally ruined, this Gentleman found himself under a necessity of returning into England (p), in order to compound for his estate, as is generally said, tho' another account is given of this journey (q); but at what time he came, how long he remained here, or where he resided, is very uncertain. He met however, during his stay, with several misfortunes, still more sensible than that which brought him over. Amongst these we ought to reckon the loss of his eldest son Kenelme Digby, Esq; a young Gentleman of great hopes, with respect both to his abilities and his virtues (r). He engaged himself with the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Peterborough, the Lord Petre, and many other Noblemen and Gentlemen, who, on July 7th, 1648, appeared for the King, under the Earl of Holland, near Kingston in Surry, but, being attacked before they could well form, were obliged to retire into Huntingdonshire, where, at St Neot's, they were surprized by Colonel Adrian Scroop's regiment of horse, and, though they made a gallant defence, were totally routed; Colonel Dalbier, who till then had served the Parliament, and is said to have taught Cromwell the art of war, with Mr Digby, being slain upon the spot (s). The Parliament, notwithstanding Sir Kenelme's composition, did not, for reasons which will be hereafter mentioned, judge it proper that he should remain in England, and therefore not only ordered him to withdraw, but voted if he should afterwards, at any time, return without leave of the House first obtained, he should lose both life and estate (t). Upon this he went again into France, where he was very kindly received by Queen Henrietta-Maria, Dowager of England, to whom he had been, for some time, Chancellor, and was, not long after, sent into Italy, where he was, at first, well received by Pope Innocent X (u); but Mr Wood says he behaved to him so haughtily, that he very quickly apprehended that every body he saw through the thickets, and every voice he heard, was the soldiers, and so hid himself from his parents that were in much distress, seeking him all about, and calling his name as loud as they could. When they had spent a day or two in vain they returned home without him, and he lived many years in the woods, feeding upon fruits, and wild roots, and mast.

He said that after he had been some time in this wild habitation, he could by the smell judge of the taste of any thing that was to be eaten, and that he could at a great distance wind by his nose where wholesome fruits or roots did grow. In this state he continued (still shunning men with as great fear as when he first ran away; so strong the impression was, and so little could his little reason master it) until, in a very sharp winter, that many beasts of the forest perished for want of food, necessity brought him to so much confidence, that, leaving the wild places of the forest, remote from all people's dwellings, he would, in the evenings, steal among cattle that were fothered, especially the swine, and among them glean that which served to sustain wretchedly his miserable life. He could not do this so cunningly, but that often returning to it, he was upon a time espied, and they who saw a beast of so strange a shape, for such they took him to be, he being naked and all overgrown with hair, believing him to be a satyr, or some such prodigious creature as the counters of rare accidents tell us of, laid wait to apprehend him. But he that winded them as far off as any beast could do, still avoided them, till at length they laid snares for him, and took the wind so advantageously of him, that they caught him, and then soon perceived he was a man, though he had quite forgotten the use of all language, but by his gestures and cries he expressed the greatest affright that might be, which afterwards he said (when he learnt to speak anew) was because he thought those were the soldiers he had hidden himself to avoid, when he first betook himself to the wood, and were always living in his fancy, through his fears continually reducing them thither.

This man, within a little while after he came to good keeping and full feeding, quite lost that acuteness of smelling which formerly governed him in his taste, and grew to be in that particular as other ordinary men were. But at his first living with other people, a woman that had compassion of him, to see a man so near like a beast, and that had no language to call for what he wished or needed to have, took particular care of him, and was always very solicitous to see him furnished with what he wanted; which made him so apply himself unto her in all his occurrences, that whensoever he stood in need of ought, if she were out of the way and were gone abroad into the fields, or to any other village near by, he would hunt her out presently by his scent, in such sort as with us those dogs use to do which are taught to draw dry foot. I imagine he is yet alive, to tell a better story of himself than I have done, and to confirm what I have here said of him; for I have it from them who saw him but a few years ago, that he was an able strong man, and likely to last yet a good while longer.

And of another man I can speak assuredly myself, who being of a very temperate or rather spare diet, could likewise perfectly discern by his smell the qualities of whatsoever was afterwards to pass the examination of his taste, even to his bread and beer. Wherefore to conclude, it is evident both by reason and by experience, that the objects of our touch, our taste, and our smell, are material and corporeal things, derived from the division of quantity into more rare and more dense parts, and may with ease be resolved into their heads and springs, sufficiently to content any judicious and rational man.

The reception given to this work when it first appeared, may be collected from this character given of the author by one who wrote in his own time (24), Sir Kenelme Digby is an ingenious learned gentleman, and an ornament of this nation, as his book of Bodies shews. We might cite many writers of our own, and of the French nation, of the same standing, to vouch with equal strength in favour of his reputation; but perhaps it will be sufficient to take notice of the learned Morhoff, who had consulted most of his writings, cites them often, and speaks of their author with great applause (25). The Abbe Vallemont is a great admirer of Sir Kenelme Digby's writing (26), and applauds the sagacity with which he handles the most difficult subjects, his penetration in discovering the true causes why they were difficult, and his perspicuity in delivering his own notions.

We must not however imagine, that Sir Kenelme could make himself so famous by his writings without meeting some degree of censure, and in an age so full of cavils as that was, of opposition; accordingly, we find that he was attacked at home by Alexander Ross, a voluminous writer, who likewise undertook to disparage the abilities of Dr Hervey and Sir Thomas Brown. The title of his work was,

The Philosophical Touchstone, or Observations upon Sir Kenelme Digby's Discourses of the Nature of Bodies, and of the Reasonable Soul, &c. in which his erroneous Paradoxes are refuted. Lond. 1645, 4to.

He was also attacked abroad in a small treatise, intituled,

Triumphans Anima, sive Philosophica Demonstratio immortalitatis Animæ. Frank. 1661, 12mo. This was published under the fictitious name of Amandus Verus, which concealed John Christom Enggenfield, a very learned Bavarian, J. U. D. concerning whose history the curious reader may meet with some circumstances in the author cited in the margin (27).

quickly lost his good opinion; and adds farther, that there was suspicion of his being no faithful Steward of the contributions raised in that part of the world, for the assistance of the distressed Catholics in England (w). However that matter might be, it is very certain, that he visited several other Courts in Italy, where he was treated with great respect, as well on account of his personal qualifications, as from the esteem those Princes had of the Queen his mistress (x). But, whether his conduct deserved those imputations mentioned by Mr Wood, or whether his figure and address were capable of making such impressions as another writer mentions, we have not lights sufficient to determine (y) [K]. After Cromwell had assumed the supreme power in this kingdom, Sir Kenelme Digby, who had now nothing to fear from the Long Parliament, ventured to return home (z), and continued here a great part of the year 1655, when it is very certain that he was embarked in some very great design, and, as some writers have suggested, this was, reconciling the Papists to the Protector (a). This created great jealousies against him on all sides, and the countenance he received from Cromwell, who is said to have been very much taken with him, produced no small clamour against his government (b). Whether either of them were sincere, or whether, like thorough Politicians, each acted a part which suited with their interests at that juncture, remains doubtful; but that the facts already mentioned are certainly true, and that Mr Wood has not injured Sir Kenelme in his censure (c), may be proved to the reader's satisfaction [L]. Besides all this, after

It appears from the original picture of Sir Kenelme Digby still remaining, that though he was a person of the largest size, as indeed his family generally were, yet he was a very well made graceful man; his gallant action at sea, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, affords us a pregnant proof of his courage, which shewed itself also upon other occasions; and his writings, which are peculiarly calculated to enliven the driest, as well as to enlighten the darkest subjects, cannot leave us in any doubt as to the faculties of his mind. But that with all these high qualities he had his imperfections, who can doubt? Of what nature these failings were the reader must collect, as well as he can, from Mr Wood's account, which is this (28): 'He was not only master of a good graceful and judicious stile, but also wrote an admirable hand both fast and Roman. His person was handsome and gigantick, and nothing was wanting to make him a compleat Cavalier. He had so graceful elocution and noble address, that had he been dropped out of the clouds into any part of the world, he would have made himself respected; but the Jesuits who cared not for him, spoke spitefully, and said it was true, but then he must not stay there above six weeks. He had a great faculty, which proceeded from abundance of wit and invention, of proposing and reporting matters to the Virtuosi, especially to the Philosophical Assembly at Montpellier, and Royal Society at home. Which is the reason why many say, that as he was most exactly accomplished with all sorts of learning, so he was guilty withal of extravagant vanities.'

Mr Lloyd (29), who likewise wrote when things were fresh in memory, bestows a better character on our illustrious Knight, who he reports of a fluent invention and discourse, as appears from his long discourse at Montpellier in France, and his entertainments of the Ladies of the several nations he travelled in; of a great faculty in negotiations both at France, Rome, and Florence, and most of the states of Italy, of one of the Princes whereof it is reported, that, having no children, he was very willing his wife should bring him a Prince by Sir Kenelme, whom he imagined the just measure of perfection.

[L] May be proved to the reader's satisfaction]

In the articles relating to our author inserted in foreign collections, his loyalty to King Charles I, his steady attachment to King Charles II, and his averring himself to be of the Romish religion at the peril of his life, are extolled as so many acts of heroism (30). As it is our business to discover truth, we are under a necessity of observing, that this gentleman has no title to these praises, and that whatever tincture of envy there might be in the censures passed upon his Philosophical character, what is said to the prejudice of his political behaviour will admit of no such extenuation. His practices in favour of the Catholics, with those who murdered King Charles I. began early, as appears from the following passages in a letter from the Lord Byron to the Marquis of Ormond (31), dated from Caen in Normandy, March 1, 1649, N. S. 'In

' some letters from good hands I meet with a particular of great concernment, which I thought fit to advertise your Excellency of by this bearer, Major Jamot, who, though a Roman Catholic, yet herein so much detests their ways, that truly I believe it will alter his opinion. The business is briefly this: Sir Kenelme Digby, with some other Romanists, accompanied with one Watson an Independent, who hath brought them passes from Fairfax, is gone for England to join the interests of all the English Papists with that bloody party that murdered the King, in the opposition and extirpation of monarchical government, or if that government be thought fit, yet that it shall be by election, and not by succession as formerly provided; that a free exercise of the Romish religion be granted, and of all other religions whatsoever, excepting that which was established by law in the Church of England. This devilish design, which most certainly is now setting on foot, I doubt may have an ill influence upon Ireland, especially upon O-Neil's party, if not prevented by your vigilance and prudence. Poyntz (my Lord of Worcester's devil) I hear is a prime actor in it, and it is much suspected that Walsingham, whom your Excellency knows for a pragmatistical knave, and I believe comes over in Darcy's frigate, is employed by Sir K. Digby, though pretending some other business. Sir Edward Nicholas either hath, or will write to your Excellency, concerning this particular, and Major Jamot is able to say something in it. I am the apter to believe it, because, when I was in England, something to this purpose was propounded by the Independent party to the Recusants.' This was followed by a letter from Secretary Nicholas, inclosing a letter from Dr Winstad, a Physician of the Romish religion at Rouen, dated February 7, 1649, in which he gives the following account of the same journey, from his own knowledge (32): 'Tuesday last arrived here Sir Kenelme Digby from Paris, with divers young gentlemen in his company, only there was a wry-necked fellow amongst them, which Sir Kenelme commended to my acquaintance and care, as being he said in a consumption, and for that cure had changed the air and came into France, but was now going into England, with an intention to return within sixteen or twenty days, and then would stay here, or go into Lauguedoc for his health. Feeling his hand and pulse, I assured him that he was in no consumption nor never had been. Afterwards I perceived that this was but a pretence, and that he was an agent for that accursed crew, his name Watson, Scoutmaster to the rebels. I spake freely my mind of the murder, and the judgment that was made here by the French; his answer was, that the French abhorred the fact in general. I spared no curses, for I assure myself it is no sin to curse the enemies of God and my King. I asked Sir Kenelme Digby why he would go now into England, considering the abomination of that country; his answer was, that he had not any means to subsist longer; and if he went not now he must starve. I answered

Sir Kenelme had left England, and was again in France, we find him not only applying to the government of England, and particularly to Secretary Thurloe, for private favours, but in respect to matters of publick concern (d), and on the behalf of the English Merchants at Calais, who, without doubt, would not have applied to him, if they had not believed his credit with the Protector better than their own. But what serves to put this matter entirely out of doubt, is a letter of his, which contains such extraordinary acknowledgments and assurances, as renders it every way worthy of the reader's notice (e) [M]. After

' it was the better choice to die, if he remembered the obligations he had to the Queen-Regent of France, who took him from those that would have destroyed him. He answered, that the Queen-Regent knew of his going, and that he had the King of France's pass, and would return again suddenly. I next press him to stay two or three months; he replied, that by that time all his business would be settled. I desired him not to think to have from those at London any toleration, for that for my part I had rather live in exile all the days of my life, and suffer at Tyburn when I came home, than that my publick liberty to serve God should spring from the bloody murderers of my Sovereign.' What his thoughts were of the design appears likewise from his own words: 'The plot as I am told about, which Sir Kenelme Digby (who came a few days since to this town) is employed as agent to treat with those horrid rebels, the Independents of England, is for the subversion of successive hereditary monarchy there, and to make it elective, and to establish Popery there, and to give toleration to all manner of religions, except that of the Church of England according to the practice thereof.' The reader will observe that this treaty was with the Independents, and that as soon as the Presbyterian faction recovered power, Sir Kenelme Digby was banished by the Parliament, as an artful, busy, and dangerous person. When Oliver came into power, the same design of the Papists was revived again, for the prosecution of which Sir Kenelme Digby came over in 1655, when he lived here in all the ease, freedom, and credit imaginable (33), conversing entirely with those who were favourers of that government, which induced Mr Holles, afterwards Lord Holles, to publish a pamphlet, in which he addresses himself to Cromwell in the following terms (34): 'What liberty the Priests and Jesuits take, how far they prevail on the people, what countenance they receive from this government, is apparent enough by not proceeding against them in justice, as if no laws were in force for their punishment. Your private negotiations with the Pope, and your promises, that, as soon as you can establish your own greatness, you will protect the Catholics, and the insinuations that you will countenance them much farther, are sufficiently known and understood, and of their dependance upon, and devotion to, you, there needs no evidence beyond the book lately written by Mr White, a Romish Priest, and dedicated to your favourite Sir Kenelme Digby, entitled, The Grounds of Obedience and Government, in which he justifies all the grounds and maxims in your declaration, and determines positively, that you ought to be so far from performing any promise, or observing any oath that you have taken, if you know that it is for the good of the people, that you break it. Albeit they foreseeing all that you now see, did therefore bind you by oath not to do it, and that you offend both against your oath and fidelity to the people, if you maintain those limitations you are sworn to, and sure what you do must be supported by such Casuists.' This point is still more explicitly handled by Mr Prynne, who tells us of Cromwell (35) 'that Sir Kenelme Digby was his particular favourite, and lodged by him at Whitehall; that Maurice Conry, Provincial of the Franciscans in England, and other Priests, had his protections under hand and seal, and that he suspended laws and executions against Popish Priests and Jesuits, though sometimes taken in their pontificalibus at mass, and were soon after released; and that he endeavoured to stop the bill against Papists the very morning he was to pass it, by his Whitehall instruments, who moved it's suspension for a time, as not suiting with the then present foreign correspondencies, against whom it was carried by eighty-eight votes, that it should be sent up with the rest then

' passed, and that he writ to Mazarine to excuse his passing that bill, as being carried on by a violent Presbyterian party, much against his will, and that yet it should not hurt them though passed, &c.' All these testimonies taken conjunctly with the letter produced in the next note, are certainly very decisive, and prove plainly, that Sir Kenelme had precisely his father's principles, and pursued nothing with so much vehemence as the establishment of Popery in England, under any government, and upon any terms. It is very strange that this did not ruin him with the Queen-Dowager, but that it did not is very certain, as it likewise is, that these intrigues were continued to the very last hour of our disturbances, Lambert, who made the final struggle, being a concealed Papist, and King Charles II, or at least his Ministers, so thoroughly apprized of these points, as to send instructions to those who managed his affairs in England, to concert nothing with the Papists (36), though, as we have seen, there might be honest men amongst them, who detested those treacherous arts, by which, after the miscarriage of the powder-treason, disaffection was cunningly spread all over England, commotions excited in Scotland, and, by degrees, the body of the Papists in Ireland precipitated into a bloody massacre, and a most unnatural rebellion. As this detail has a near relation to Sir Kenelme Digby's personal history, so it opens to our view one of the darkest parts of that disagreeable period of our History, in which many people are apt to think that the Papists are accused rather from prejudice than proof; whereas, in reality, though they must be allowed an admirable faculty in mining, yet it would not be at all impossible to prove, that, during this space, the Popes and their agents were as active abroad, as Cromwell and his party were indefatigable at home, and both with the like views, though not from the same principles; and hence we may easily account for Sir Kenelme Digby's great favour and credit with the Protector.

[M] Every way worthy of the reader's notice.] This letter stands in need of no introduction, since it comes directly up to the point mentioned in the text, and is an excellent instance of the advantages that may be drawn from such kind of collections, in works of this nature (37).

Sir Kenelme Digby to Secretary Thurloe.

Right Honourable, Paris, Mar. 18, 1656.

THE French Ambassador taking leave of me yesterday, told me, that his Secretary at London had, among other things, written to him, that Sir Robert Welsh had spoken something to your Honour much to my prejudice, and that since some letter of a Lady to me had been intercepted, the contents whereof did in some sort make good what he had spoken. I believe your Honour hath so good information what this woful Knight is, that if there were nothing but the venom that his malicious tongue can spit, I should not think it needful to trouble myself, much less your Honour's more serious occasions, with taking any notice of it. But since he hath contrived as I verily believe, some better name than his own, to seem to justify what would have no credence from him, I may not fit down without beseeching your Honour, to search the matter to the bottom, and to drive it to the utmost. I look upon this as a contriving of his, because forging of letters, and doing treacheries of this kind, hath been his ordinary course, and because I am confident that nobody in the world, who hath so much familiarity with me as to write to me, but knoweth me so well, as to be sure that whatsoever may be disliked by my Lord Protector and the Council of State, must be detested by me. My obligations to his Highness are

After some stay at Paris, he went to spend the summer of the year 1656 at Toulouse; and, as he had there the pleasure of conversing with a great many learned and ingenious men, so he frequently entertained them, in his turn, not only with his Mathematical, Physical, and Philosophical Discoveries, but with such communications also received from his friends in the different parts of Europe, as he thought most capable either of extending knowledge, or of creating pleasure or delight (f). Amongst these was a relation he obtained concerning a petrified city in Africa, which he likewise transmitted to a friend in England in the month of September, the same year, and which very undeservedly drew upon him a very heavy load of calumny and reproach (g) [N]. We find him the next year at Montpellier, in the south of France, whither he went, partly for the sake of his health, which began to be impaired by severe fits of the stone, and partly for the sake of enjoying the learned society of several worthy and ingenious persons, who had formed themselves into a kind of academy (b) there, and to whom he read his large discourse of the sympathetick powder, afterwards printed and published in several languages, and, at that time, generally well received (i) [O]. ' so great, that it would be a crime in me to behave myself so negligently as to give cause for any shadow of the least suspicion, or to do any thing that might require an excuse or apology. I make it my business every where, to have all the world take notice how highly I esteem myself obliged to his Highness, and how passionate I am for his service, and for his honour and interests, even to the exposing of my life for them. If your Honour cannot readily find out the bottom of this villainy plotted against me upon notice of so much, I will take post the next day to return into England (though it may be much to the prejudice of my domestick affairs, in my broken estate, because my debts are not yet quieted) and I doubt not but I shall soon make discovery of some wicked treachery intended against me; for this wretched creature hath as much malice to me as he is capable of, first, as being an Irish Papist (whose whole tribe have an implacable animosity against me), and next, because I have heretofore shamed him, and have broken some cheating designs of his, by making publick some of his infamous villainies, for which he never durst make any expostulation with me. I humbly crave pardon of your Honour, for suffering myself to be thus far transported. My excuse is, that I should think my heart were not an honest one, if the blood about it were not warmed with any the least imputation upon my respects and my duty to his Highness, to whom I owe so much. I humbly crave a line or two from your Honour, that I may either resolve to return presently home, or remain satisfied by your having discovered the villainy attempted against me, which, with all humility, expecting, I rest,

[N] A very heavy load of calumny and reproach. The matter of fact hinted at in the text was plainly this: Mr Fitton, an English Gentleman, who was at that time Library-Keeper to the Great Duke of Tuscany, wrote a letter, dated July 2, 1656, to Sir Kenelm Digby, at Toulouse, with an Account of a city within the territories of Tripoli in Africa, supposed to be entirely petrified by the rising of a vapour out of the earth; which piece of intelligence Sir Kenelm having written to a friend in England, he was so free in communicating it, that it was at length printed in the Mercurius Politicus (38). The famous Dr Stubbes took occasion from this to shew at once his dislike to Sir Kenelm Digby, and to gratify his professed aversion for the Royal Society, by treating the thing as an absurd and ridiculous falsehood, and by saying of Sir Kenelm; whom he would have represented as the author of it, That he was the Pliny of our age for lying (39). To shew that such a city as this there is from the accounts given by modern writers, would indeed vindicate the sagacity of our author, and shew that he made a better judgment of things than his antagonist Stubbes; but we can do more than this, for we can shew that Sir Kenelm did not either credit a hasty, or an idle report, but that it had been current some time, and the truth of it believed upon good authority; which is sufficient to justify Sir Kenelm in his Philosophick charafter, and to demonstrate that though he was extremely curious, he was not at all credulous (40).

The following paper was delivered to Richard Waller, Esq; Fellow of the Royal Society, by Mr Baker, who was the English Consul at Tripoli, Nov. 12, 1713.

' ABOUT forty days journey S. E. from Tripoli, and about seven days from the nearest sea-coast, there is a place called Ougila, in which there are found the bodies of men, women, and children, beasts and plants, all petrified of a hard stone like marble. That about 1654 or 5, the Corsairs having taken several of the English ships, Admiral Blake was sent with a Squadron of men of war to Tripoli, from which place and Tunis he had all the captives delivered without ransom, at which time the report of this discovery of the abovementioned city was new, so that he obliged the Alkade to procure a whole figure for him, which he promised. But Blake not staying long enough there, but sailing to Leghorn, he sent a small frigate to Tripoli to fetch it aboard, in which frigate one Mr Hebden (then a young gentleman) went, who told Mr Baker that he himself saw a figure of a man petrified, which was conveyed to Leghorn, and thence to England, and that it was carried to Secretary Thurloe. The same Mr Baker told me, that, when he was at Tripoli, he spoke with several Turks, who affirmed themselves to have been eye-witnesses of the said petrifications. That particularly an officer that commanded a garrison of two hundred men, on a frontier place called Derney, not many days journey from the place, had promised him to procure a figure thence; the same affirmed the relation, that accordingly he sent some spies to find the place, which at that time they could not, as he sent him word, it being wholly buried in the sands, which in that country are carried in great clouds; that a strong north wind blows the sand off, and by that means discovers the place, which, at other times, is covered by these sands.

' He farther told me, that this Mr Hebden died about two years since a prisoner in the Fleet, though he had been formerly sent to Moscow by King Charles II. He said he had procured the arm of a fig tree, as big as his arm, petrified, whereon the bark and wood were plainly visible, the bark grey, the wood yellowish, of the true colour of the plant; that in the bark was a groove, in which were several small insects, like the lady cow, petrified; that he had presented this piece of petrified wood to my Lord Torrington, in whose possession he believes it now is.'

published of the famous Mr Algernoon Sydney (k), for the knowledge of this Gentleman's passing the year 1658, and part of the year 1659, in the Lower Germany, and more especially in the Palatinate; but, as to what he says of his going there by the name of Earl or Count Digby, and other circumstances of a very disparaging nature, they seem to flow from a mixture of inconnected reports, joined to a very high dislike of the person to whom they related. It is probable, that he returned from thence towards the close of the last mentioned year to Paris, where we find him in 1660, and employed there, after his accustomed manner, in conversing with the learned, moderating in their assemblies, and giving them occasional lights from his own observations and informations. This circumstance we derive from the pen of a very ingenious and knowing person, who wrote it as acceptable news to his great patron in England (l) [P]. He returned the following year to England, and was very well received at Court, notwithstanding the Ministers were far from being ignorant of the irregularity in his conduct, and the court that he had paid to Oliver while the King was in exile (m). It does not, however, appear, that any other favour was shewn him, than seemed to be due to a man of letters (n). In the first settlement of the Royal Society, we find him appointed one of the Council, by the title of Sir Kenelme Digby, Knight, Chancellor to our dear mother Queen Mary (o). He was not likely to be considered or trusted in the beginning of King Charles's administration, because he not only shewed himself an open but a busy Papist, interfered in their quarrels, and declared himself, upon all occasions, an eager enemy to the Jesuits (p), who were not at all behind with him in resentment, but took all the care they could to lessen his character, and to defame him. As long as his health would permit, he attended the meetings of the Royal Society, and gave his assistance towards the improvements that were then made in useful knowledge; one of his discourses (q) was printed and published by itself, of which we shall take notice [2]. He spent the remainder of his days at his house in Covent-Garden, where he enjoyed the company of his friends, and was much visited by the lovers of Mathematical and Philosophical Learning; so that, according to a custom which then prevailed much in France, he had a kind of Academy, or Literary 1669, and translated into Latin by Laur. Stranfius of Darmsted in Hesse. It is also printed in the book intitled Theatrum Sympatheticum, published by John Andreas Endter at Norimberg, 1662, in 4to, of which there is an account in our Philosophical Transactions: As to the philosophical arguments in this treatise, and the manner in which the author accounts for the strange operations of this remedy, they were highly admired in those days, have been often copied since, and even in this inquisitive and judicious age, are allowed to be very ingenious, though not very convincing.

[P] Who wrote it as acceptable news to his great patron in England. The person mentioned in the text is Mr Oldenburgh, afterwards Secretary to the Royal Society, who, in his letter to Mr Boyle, dated Paris Mar. 20, 1660, writes thus (41): 'Sir Kenelme Digby will himself assure you, by the annexed, of his respects to you. We met lately at the house of a Chemist, where the question was agitated about the dissolvent of gold, Whether the universal spirit of the world, in it's undetermined nature, or, as it is specified and contracted to a mineral, be the menstruum of that noble metal? The discussion hereof being rather made by authority than reason, gave small satisfaction to the auditors, whereof the learned Knight himself being the chief, did moderate the action, but not determine the question, interlacing the discourses of others with several considerable relations, whereof two did ravish the hearers to admiration. The one was of a King's house in England, which having stood covered with lead for five or six ages, and being sold after that, was found to contain three fourths of silver in the lead thereof. The other was of a fixed salt, drawn out of a certain potters earth here in France, at a place called Arcueil, which salt being for some time exposed to the sun-beams, became salt-petre, then vitriol, then lead, tin, copper, silver, and, at the end of fourteen months, gold; which he assured to have experienced himself, and another able Naturalist besides him. I must confess I would rather see this than believe it, though the author be a very authentick gentleman.' These facts, as they are very closely set down, and without any illustration of circumstances, have an air of incredibility: but without doubt if we knew exactly how they were related by Sir Kenelme, they would not appear either so strange or so improbable. As to the alterations of lead indeed, and it's growing heavier in time, so as to endanger the buildings covered with it, we meet with some very extraordinary instances in

Mr Boyle's own writings (42); and as to the other matter, strange as it is, it appears not to have rested entirely upon Sir Kenelme Digby's authority, and seems besides to have some concurrence with the accurate experiments long afterwards made in France by that ingenious and candid Chemist Mr Homberg. It may not however be amiss to remark, by the way, that Sir Kenelme Digby had a true philosophick spirit, and was much more covetous of knowledge than of wealth, and as desirous of communicating science as of obtaining it; which sometimes exposed him, as it hath done other great men, to the supercilious contempt of persons far inferior both in learning and in understanding.

This work is highly applauded by the learned Morhoff, whose judicious character of it will give the reader a true idea of the worth of our author (43). (43) Polyhist. II. 2. 40. 2

The reader may find in Wood, and in some other authors, several pieces attributed to Sir Kenelme Digby (44), but as these were published after his decease by one Hartman, who was his Operator, and who put Sir Kenelme Digby's name in the title-page, with a view to recommend compositions very unworthy of him to the publick; they seem by no means to deserve a place here, which, with our desire to bring this article within bounds as much as possible, are our reasons for rejecting them.

rary Assembly, in his own dwelling (r). Some years before his death, he caused a vault to be built under the east end of the south aisle of Christ-Church within Newgate, in which was deposited the body of his wife, and over it was erected a very stately altar monument of black marble, whereon her bust, made of copper gilt, was placed, with four inscriptions in honour of her memory (s). This lady's name was Venetia, daughter to Sir Edward Stanley, of Tongue-Castle in Shropshire, Knight of the Bath, by his wife the Lady Lucy, daughter and coheirs of Thomas Piercy, Earl of Northumberland (t), which Sir Edward Stanley was the son of Sir Thomas Stanley, Knight, and grandson of Edward Earl of Derby (u), by the Lady Dorothy Howard, daughter of Thomas Duke of Norfolk. We should have been able to have rendered this article much more perfect, if we could have had the assistance of that noble manuscript which Sir Kenelme caused to be collected at the expence of a thousand pounds, as well out of private memorials, as from publick histories and records in the Tower, and elsewhere, relating to the Digby family in all its branches (w): but not knowing where this was to be found, we have drawn together, with no small pains, what lay scattered about him in a variety of authors, and have digested the several facts they mentioned in the best order we could. In the summer of the year 1665, his old distemper the stone increased upon him very much, and brought him very low, which rendered him desirous, as it is said, of going to France (x); which, however, he lived not to accomplish, but deceasing on his birth-day, June 11th, 1665 (y), when he was sixty-two years of age, his corps was interred near that of his lady in the Church before-mentioned (z). Sir Kenelme's valuable library, which was justly esteemed a most excellent collection, had been transported into France at the first breaking out of the troubles, and improved there at a very considerable expence; but, as he was no subject of his Most Christian Majesty's, it became, according to that branch of the prerogative which the French stile Droit d'Aubain, the property of the Crown upon Sir Kenelme's decease. This was a very great injury to his family, as may appear from hence, that, being afterwards begged from that King, the new possessor, for I think one can hardly call him proprietor, sold it (and, it is very probable, below it's real value) for ten thousand crowns. Sir Kenelme left an only son, John Digby, Esq; who succeeded to the family estate (a), and, therefore, there is plainly some mistake in the account given us by a certain great Historian (b), who says, that the death of this son of Sir Kenelme produced the ruin of his family, as that did the finding his grandfather's papers; of which, in the former article, we gave some account, and of which it will be necessary to say somewhat farther here [R]. This John Digby, Esq; of Gothurst in Buckinghamshire, dying many years after his father, left behind him, by his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir Edward Longueville, of Wolverton, in the same county, Baronet, by the Lady Margaret his wife, daughter of Sir Thomas Temple, of Stow, two daughters and coheirs, Margareta-Maria, married to Sir John Conway, of Bodey in Flintshire, Baronet, to whom she was first wife, and by whom she had Margareta, married to Sir Thomas Longueville, of Estclusham in Denbighshire, Baronet, and Henry Conway, Esq; who died before his father married to Honora, daughter and heir of ——— Ravenscroft, of Bretton in Flintshire, Esq; and left only one daughter Honora, married to Sir John Glynn, of Hawarden-Castle in Flintshire, Baronet; and Charlotta-Theophila, married to Richard Mostyn, of Penbeddw in Flintshire, Esq; by whom she had two daughters, Bridget, married to Lytton Lytton, of Knebworth in Hertfordshire, Esq; and Charlotta, married to Richard Williams, Esq; third son of Sir William Williams, of Llanvorda in Shropshire, Esq; and brother to Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, Baronet, and one son Richard, and Penelope, who died a Nun abroad (c). [R] To say somewhat farther here] The great Historian mentioned in the text is the Bishop of Salisbury, who seems to have had some particular concern in this extraordinary transaction, or at least to have been for some time possessed of Sir Everard Digby's original papers, his own words are these (45): 'I will mention what I myself saw, and had for some time in my possession; Sir Everard Digby died for being of the conspiracy. He was the father of the famous Sir Kenelme Digby. The family being ruined upon the death of Sir Kenelme's son, when the executors were looking out for writings to make out the titles of the estates they were to sell, they were directed by an old servant to a cupboard that was very artificially hid, in which some papers lay that she had observed Sir Kenelme was oft reading. They looking into it found a velvet bag, within which there were two other silk bags (so carefully were those relics kept) and there was within these a collection of all the letters that Sir Everard writ during his imprisonment. In these he expresses great trouble, because he heard some of their friends blamed their undertaking: he highly magnifies it, and says, if he had many lives he would willingly have sacrificed them all in carrying it on. In one paper he says, they had taken

' that care that there was not above two or three worth ' saving, to whom they had not given notice to keep ' out of the way: and in none of those papers does he ' express any sort of remorse for that which he had ' been engaged in, and for which he suffered.' We will now compare this with the attestation prefixed to the papers (46): 'The several papers and letters of Sir Everard Digby, which are, as we have been credibly informed, the original papers and letters written by him concerning the gunpowder treason, were found by us Sir Rice Rudd, Bart. and William Wogan of Gray's-Inn, Esq; in the presence of Mrs Ursula Giles, and Mr Thomas Hughes, about the month of September 1675, at the house of Charles Cornwallis, Esq; who was Executor of Sir Kenelme Digby (son and heir to the said Sir Everard) tied up in two silk bags, amongst the deeds, evidences, and writings of the said Sir Kenelme Digby.

(46) At the close of the preface to Sir Everard Digby's private papers, published in 1675. 8vo.

' RICE RUDD.

(47) John Digby, Esq; son to Sir Kenelme, appears from Wright's Hist. of Rutlandshire, to have been living in 1684.

It is not clear from the Prelate's account whose executors he means, but it looks as if it were the executors of Sir Kenelme's son (47), whereas the certificate

this article better than by the following verses, composed by way of epitaph on Sir Kenelme Digby.

*Under this tomb the matchless DIGBY lies,
DIGBY the great, the valiant, and the wise;
This age's wonder, for his noble parts,
Skilled in six tongues, and learn'd in all the arts:
Born on the day he died, the eleventh of June,
And that day bravely fought at Scanderoon;
It's rare that one and the same day should be
His day of birth, of death, of victory!*

shews, that the papers were not found by any executors at all, but by two gentlemen of credit, in the house of the executor of Sir Kenelme Digby. In the certificate two silk bags are mentioned, though not the velvet bag; and, which is very singular, there is no notice at all taken of their being led to this discovery by hearing of the cupboard, or of the old servant, but there are the names of two persons in whose presence they were found, and it is not impossible they might take to themselves some merit in the discovery. But from the certificate, one can see no reason to judge they were hidden at all, but rather that they were accidentally found, searching among Sir Kenelme's papers, who might die in circumstances indifferent as to himself, but whose estate, as we have seen, was too well secured to prejudice his son or his family. DIGGES (LEONARD) Esq; a considerable Mathematician in the XVIth century, was the second son of James Digges, of Digges-Court in the parish of Berham in Kent, Esq; [A] by Philippa his second wife, daughter of John Engham, of Chartham in the same county. He was born at Digges-Court, and educated for some time in University-College in Oxford, where he laid a very good foundation of learning. Retiring from thence without a degree, he prosecuted his studies, and became an excellent Mathematician, a skilful Architect (a), and a most expert Surveyor of land. He composed several books [B], and died about the year 1574 (b). By his wife Bridget, daughter of Thomas Wilford, Esq; (c) and sister to James and Thomas Wilford, two brave Knights, of Hartridge, in the parish of Cranbrook in Kent, he had a son, of whom we shall give some account in the next article.

[A] Was the second son of James Digges of Digges-Court in the parish of Berham in Kent, Esq;] That family was antient and considerable, in the county of Kent. One of them in the reign of King Richard I. had the aldermanry of Newingate in Canterbury, which was then a hereditary office. John Digges, Alderman of the same city, in 1258, was a great benefactor to the Franciscans, then newly settled at Canterbury; and bought for them an island in that city called Binnewight. Adomarus Digges, of Digges-Court, was a Judge in King Edward II's reign, and had much land about Rainham and Newington, where a marsh still bears his name, being called Digges's Marsh. Roger Digges was one of the Representatives in Parliament for the city of Canterbury, in the 29th, 31st, and 34th years of the reign of King Edward III. John Digges, of Digges-Court, was Sheriff of Kent in the 2d year of King Henry IV; and his grandson John, in the 4th year of King Edward IV; and his son of the same name in the 11th year of King Henry VII; and his son James bore the same office in the 2d year of King Henry VIII. His eldest son, Thomas, sold Digges-Court to Capt. Thomas Halsey of DIGGES (THOMAS) after a liberal education even from his tenderest years, went and studied for some time at Oxford; and by the improvements he made there, and the subsequent instructions of his learned father (a), became one of the most excellent Mathematicians of his time; upon which account he was greatly esteemed by Dr John Dee, and other his learned contemporaries. When Queen Elizabeth sent some of her forces to the assistance of the oppressed inhabitants of the Netherlands, Mr Digges was appointed Muster-Master-General of them (b); whereby he had an opportunity of becoming perfectly skilled in military affairs. He writ and published several books [A]. But

DIGGES (DUDLEY) eldest son of Thomas mentioned in the last article, was born in the year 1583 (a), and entered a Gentleman-Commoner of University-College, Oxon. in 1598; where he very much improved himself in learning, under the tuition of Dr George Abbot, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (b). Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, on the first of July 1601 (c), he went and studied for some time at the Inns of Court; and then travelled beyond sea, having before received the honour of knighthood. After much experience, and proper remarks on the laws, customs, and manners, of foreign nations, he returned home, excellently well qualified to serve his King and Country (d). But observing too many to jostle for place, and cross the publick interest, if not joined with their own private gain; he was satisfied with the consciousness of his own merit, knowing good men only can deserve honours, though the worse might attain them. His moderate desires, therefore, confined a long while his thoughts to the innocence of a retired life (e), till the year 1618, when he was sent by King James I. Ambassador to the Czar, or Emperor of Russia. In 1620. he was commissioned with Sir Maurice Abbot, to go to Holland, in order to obtain the restitution of goods taken by the Dutch, from some Englishmen in the East-Indies [A]. He departed in November (f), but how long he stayed there, doth not appear. He was a Member of the third Parliament of King James I. which met at Westminster January 30, 1620-1; and was so little compliant with the Court measures, as to be among those whom the King called Ill-tempered Spirits. And, therefore, soon after the dissolution of that Parliament, he was, for a punishment, sent into Ireland, upon a forced commission with others under the Great Seal, for the enquiry of sundry matters concerning his Majesty's pretended service (g). He was likewise a Member of the first Parliament of King Charles I. in 1626; and joined those eminent patriots, who were for bringing George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, the King's great favourite and Prime Minister, to an account: and so earnest did he prove in that affair, that he was one of the eight chief managers, who carried up, on the 8th

But so highly offended were the Commons at his imprisonment, that they resolved to proceed to no other business till they were righted in their liberties (k). Whereupon one of the Courtiers, to excuse that irregular step, said, That his Majesty conceived, Sir Dudley went too far beyond his commission, in that, speaking of King James the First's death, and the plaister applied to him by the Duke of Buckingham, he had said, That he did forbear to speak further in regard of the King's honour, or words to that effect; which his Majesty conceived to be to his dishonour, as if there had been any underhand dealing by Him in applying of the plaister; and that might make his subjects jealous of him. These words, laid to Sir Dudley's charge, occasioned an uncommon protestation from the Commons [C], which was also taken by thirty-six of the Lords. And Sir Dudley being released soon after, protested, That the matter charged upon him was far from his words, and never came into his thoughts (l). He was again Member of the third Parliament of King Charles I. which met at Westminster the 17th of March 1627-8, being one of the Knights of the Shire for Kent (m), but seemed to be more moderate than he had been in the two last. For, when Secretary Coke moved for the dispatch of the subsidies (n), he was seconded by Sir Dudley [D]. However, his spirits were roused, when any attempts were made upon the liberties of his country, or the Constitution of Parliament [E]. For, on the 14th of April, he opened the grand conference between the Lords and Commons 'concerning the liberty of the person of every Freeman,' with a speech, wherein he made many excellent observations [F], tending

[B] Who carried up a charge against him] It was opened by Sir Dudley himself, who in his Prologue used these words (1): — 'The House of Commons, by a fatal and universal concurrence of complaints from all the sea-bordering parts of this kingdom, did find a great and grievous interruption and stop of trade and traffick: The base pirates of Salle ignominiously infesting our coasts, taking our ships and goods, and leading away the subjects of this kingdom into barbarous captivity; while, to our shame and hindrance of commerce, our enemies did (as it were) besiege our ports, and block up our best rivers, mouths. Our friends, on slight pretences, made imbargoes of our Merchants goods, and every nation, upon the least occasion, was ready to contemn and slight us: so great was the apparent diminution of the antient honour of this crown, and once strong reputation of our nation. Wherewith the Commons were more troubled, calling to remembrance, how formerly in France, in Spain, in Holland, and every where, by sea and land, the valors of this kingdom had been better valued. — The Commons therefore wondering at the evils which they suffered, and debating of the causes of them, found they were many, drawn, like one line, to one circumference, of decay of trade, and strength of honour, and reputation in this kingdom; which, as in one center, met in one great man, the cause of all who I am here to name, the Duke of Buckingham.' — Then, after having read the preamble to the charge, he continued his speech, in which he hath this passage. — 'The last of the charges which are prepared, will be an injury offered to the person of the late King of blessed memory, who is with God; of which, as your Lordships may have heard heretofore, you shall anon have further information. Now upon this occasion, I am commanded by the Commons to take care of the honour of the King our Sovereign that lives, — and also his blessed father, who is dead; on whom, to the grief of the Commons, and their great distaste, the Lord Duke did (they conceive) unworthily cast some ill odor of his own foul wayes; whereas servants were antiently wont to bear, as in truth they ought, their Masters faults, and not cast their own on them undeservedly.' — These words I have taken notice of, because they were misunderstood and misapplied, as will be seen under note [C] and above in the text of this article.

[C] Occasioned an uncommon Protestation from the Commons.] Being as follows: 'I protest before Almighty God, and this House of Parliament, That I never gave consent that Sir Dudley Digges should speak these words that he is now charged withal, or any words to that effect; and I have not affirmed to any, that he did speak such words, or any to that effect.' This was taken by every member in particular for himself; and it was ordered, That they that were sick in town, should have three of the House sent to them, to take the same protestation. The King, to pacify the Commons, signified to them by the Vice-Chamberlain, That he understood, out of some notes taken at the Conference (2), that Sir Dudley Digges had spoken the words wherewith he was charged; but, now, was satisfied that he did not speak them, nor any words to such effect. Nevertheless, the Duke of Buckingham affirmed to the House of Peers, that some words were spoken at the late Conference by Sir Dudley Digges, which so far did trench upon the King's honour, that they were interpreted treasonable: he therefore earnestly desired, since divers constructions had been made of those words, that every one of those who had reported them, would be pleased to produce their notes taken at the Conference. But after a long debate upon that matter in the House of Peers, thirty-six of them made this voluntary protestation, That the said Sir Dudley Digges did not speak any thing at the said Conference, which did or might trench on the King's honour (3). It followed therefore, as Mr Rapin observes (4), from the testimony of the Lords, and the protestation of the Commons, either, That the King was wrong and maliciously informed; or, that he wanted and sought an opportunity of punishing Sir Dudley Digges, for having spoken so irreverently of the Duke as he did. For which purpose the words abovementioned were invented.

[D] He was seconded by Sir Dudley.] Who said, among other things — 'We have freely concluded our liberties, we have offered five subsidies: his Majesty hath given us gracious answers: we have had good by our beginnings: what have we done for the King? nothing is done that the King can take notice of. — He will settle our properties and goods; have we not had a gracious answer? — I dare say confidently we shall have as much as any subjects had from their King (5).'

[E] However his spirits were roused, when any attempts were made upon the liberties of his country, &c.] For when Sir John Finch, Speaker of the House of Commons, interrupted Sir John Elliot in the House, telling him, 'There is a command laid upon me, that I must command you not to proceed;' Sir Dudley Digges vented his great uneasiness in these words: 'I am as much grieved as ever. Must we not proceed? let us sit in silence, we are miserable, we know not what to do (6).' This was on the 5th of June 1628.

[F] With a speech wherein he made many excellent observations.] Among other things, he says — 'I am first commanded to shew unto your Lordships in general, that the laws of England are grounded on reason, ancients than books, consisting much in unwritten customs: yet so full of justice and true equity, that your most honourable predecessors and ancestors, many times propugned them with a Nolimus mutare (i. e. we will not change them;) and so ancient, that from the Saxons days, notwithstanding the injuries tending to establish the liberties of the subject (o). In all these affairs, he so distinguished himself by his parts and abilities, that he was much taken notice of by the Court; being, in consequence of that, one of those eminent Patriots whom they thought worth while to gain to their side (p). Accordingly they tempted him with the honourable and advantageous office of Master of the Rolls, of which he had a reversionary grant the 29th of November 1630 (q), and became possessed of it the 20th of April, 1636 [G], upon the death of Sir Julius Caesar (*). But he did not enjoy it quite three years; for he died the 18th of March 1638-9, which the wisest men reckoned among the publick calamities of those times (r). After having lain some time in state, he was buried in Chilham Church in Kent; in which parish he had a good estate (s), and built a noble seat (t). A monument was afterwards erected in that Church, in memory of him, and his lady, and others of that eminent family; with an inscription, of which the substance is included in this article (u). His Lady was Mary, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir Thomas Kemp, of Chilham aforesaid; with whom he had part of the estate there, and purchased the rest, of the three other daughters and coheirs (v). As to his character; his actions, related above, show, that he was, (as one (x) expresses it,) 'a great assertor of his country's liberty in the worst of times, when the sluices of prerogative were opened, and the banks of the law were almost overwhelmed with the inundations of it.' Besides which, we are informed, that, his understanding few could equal, and his virtues fewer would. He was a pious Man, a careful Father, a loving Husband, a fatherly Brother, a courteous Neighbour, a merciful Landlord, a liberal Master, and a noble Friend (y). He was author of a few things [H]. As hereditary learning seemed to run in the veins of that family (z); Sir Dudley had a brother, Thomas, and a son named Dudley [I], who were both learned men, and writers.

ries and ruins of time, they have continued in most parts the same; as may appear in old remaining monuments of the laws of Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, Ina King of the West-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, &c. whose laws are yet to be seen, published (as some think) by Parliament. — And though, during the troublesome times of the Danes, the laws in a manner were laid asleep in the kingdom; yet, by the blessing of God, good King Edward, commonly called St Edward, did awaken these laws, — and confirmed them (7), confirmavit: which confirmavit sheweth, that good King Edward did not give those laws, which William the Conqueror, and all his successors since that, have sworn unto — And, as we have now, even in those Saxon times they had their Courts Barons, and Courts Leets, and Sheriffs Courts, by which (as Tacitus saith of the Germans) their ancestors Jura reddabant per pagos & vicos: i. e. administered justice in the borghs and villages. And, I believe, as we have now, they had their Parliaments, where new laws were made, cum consensu Prælatorum, Magnatum, & totius communitatis; i. e. with the consent of the Prelates, great men, and the whole community; or, as another writes, cum consilio Prælatorum, Nobilium, & sapientium Laicorum, with the advice of the Prelates, Nobility, and wise men of the laity. — Be pleased then to know, that it is an undoubted and fundamental point of this so ancient Common-Law of England, that the subject hath a true property in his goods and possessions; which doth preserve as sacred that Mens and Tuum, the nurse of industry, the mother of courage, and without which there can be no justice, of which Mens and Tuum is the proper object. But this undoubted birthright of free subjects hath lately not a little been invaded and prejudiced, &c (8).

[G] And became possessed of it the 20th of April, 1636.] The author of his epitaph observes upon that occasion, that 'This did crown his former actions, and though it would not increase his integrity, yet it made him more conspicuous; and whom his acquaintance before, now the kingdom, honoured. If the example of his justice had powerful influence on all Magistrates, the people who are governed would be happy on earth, and the rulers in Heaven, with him, who counted it an unworthy thing to be tempted to vice by the reward of virtue.' What is said in the same place is not literally true; namely, that he was 'unbiaised by popular applause, or Court-hopes.' For, if he was unbiaised by Court-hopes, why did he accept of the place of Master of the Rolls?

[H] He was author of a few things.] The only thing he published was this; I. 'A Defence of Trade: in a Letter to Sir Tho Smith, Knight, Governor of the East India Company.' London, 1615, 4to.

After his death there was printed under his name; II. 'A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject, in a conference desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses, 3 Apr. 1628.' Lond. 1642, 4to. At this Conference it was, that Sir Dudley made the Speech mentioned above, note [F]. And, very likely, this Discourse is the same with that speech. III. He made several Speeches upon other occasions; inserted in Rushworth's Collections (9), and Ephemeris Parliamentaria (10). IV. He collected the Letters that passed between the Lord Burleigh, Sir Fr. Walsingham, and others, about the intended marriages of Queen Elizabeth, with the Duke of Anjou, in 1570, &c. and with the Duke of Alençon in 1581. They were published in 1655, under this title; 'The complaint Ambassador: or two Treaties of the intended marriage of Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory; comprized in Letters of Negotiation of Sir Francis Walsingham, her Resident in France. Together with the answers of the Lord Burleigh, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Tho. Smith, and others. Wherein, as in a clear mirror, may be seen the Faces of the two Courts of England and France, as they then stood; with many remarkable passages of State, not at all mentioned in any History. Faithfully collected by the truly Honourable Sir Dudley Digges, Knight, late Master of the Rolls.' Lond. 1655, fol. The publisher, who signs himself A. H. says in the Preface, that this 'piece was never intended for the press, but had slept long amongst the papers of Sir Dudley Digges, a personage of known wisdom and integrity, and who understood well the value of this manuscript, which had nothing forged or superstitious in it.'

[I] Sir Dudley had a brother Thomas, and a son named Dudley] His brother Thomas was educated in University-college, Oxon (11), took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, Octob. 31, 1606 (12), retired to London; and then travelling beyond sea, studied in foreign universities; from whence returning a good scholar, and an accomplished person, he was created Master of Arts, Nov. 20, 1626 (13). He translated from Spanish into English, 'Gerardo the unfortunate Spaniard.' Lond. 1622, 4to, written by Gonçalo de Cespedes. And from Latin into English verse, 'The Rape of Proserpine.' Lond. 1617, &c. 4to, written by Claudian. He died April 7, 1635, being accounted a good Poet, and Orator; and a great master of the English, French, and Spanish languages (14). — As for Dudley, the third son of Sir Dudley Digges, he was admitted into University-college, Oxon. in 1629, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, Jan. 17, 1631-2. Being the next year elected Fellow of All-souls-college, he took the degree of Master Octob. 15, 1635 (15), and having a great memory, and excellent natural

DODWELL (HENRY) a very learned writer, in part of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was born in the parish of St Warburgh in Dublin [A], towards the latter end of October, 1641 (a); and baptized November 4th (b). His father had an estate in Conaught, but it being seized by the Irish rebels, he came, with his wife and child, to England in 1648, to obtain some assistance among their relations. After some stay in London, they went to York, and placed their son in the free-school of that city (c), where he continued five years, and laid the foundation of his future great accomplishments. His father, after having settled him with his mother at York, went to Ireland, to look after his estate, but died of the plague at Waterford: and his mother going thither for the same purpose, fell into a consumption, of which she died, in her brother Sir Henry Slingsby's house (d). Being thus deprived of his parents, Mr Dodwell was reduced to such straits that he had not money enough to buy pen, ink, and paper [B]; and suffered very much for want of his board being regularly paid (e). Thus he continued till 1654, when his uncle, Mr Henry Dodwell, Rector of Newbourn and Hemley in Suffolk, sent for him, discharged his debts [C], and not only assisted, but also perfected him, in his studies (f). With him he remained about a year, and then went to Dublin, where he was at school for a year longer (g). In 1656 he was admitted into Trinity-College in that city, of which he was successively chosen Scholar and Fellow (h). But in 1666 he quitted his Fellowship, in order to avoid going into holy orders (i), as the statutes of the College require [D]. He came the same year to England, and resided at Oxford (k) for the sake of the publick library. Thence he returned to his native country for a time (l), and in 1672 published, at Dublin, in 8vo. a posthumous treatise of his late learned Tutor John Stearn, M. D. to which he put a preface of his own [E].

[A] Was born in the parish of St Warburgh in Dublin.] Though Ireland was the place of his birth, yet by both parents he was of English extraction. His father, William Dodwell, was in a military office, being Corporal of the Field, a post now difused, but equal to a Captain of horse (1). His grandfather (who first of that family settled in Ireland) was Henry Dodwell, a Clergyman (2); a native of Oxford, and son of William, supposed to be brother of Alderman Henry Dodwell, Mayor of that city in the year 1592 (3). — As for Mr Dodwell's mother; she was daughter of Sir Francis Slingsby, uncle to that Sir Henry Slingsby, who was beheaded in 1658, for being concerned in a plot against Oliver Cromwell then Protector. Sir Francis Slingsby was a very brave officer under Sir George Carew Lord President of Munster (4).

[B] That he had not money to buy pen, ink, and paper.] So that he was forced to use such paper as young gentlemen had covered their work with, and thrown away as no longer fit for their use, he having no other to write his exercises on; and to make use of charcoal, instead of pen and ink, which he had not money to purchase; and then, when he came to school, to borrow pen and ink of his school-fellows to fit his exercises for his master's sight (5).

(5) Brokesby, ubi supra, p. 15.

[C] Discharged his debts.] The non-payment of which, and especially of his board, had procured him a great deal of neglect and ill treatment; which was to him frequently matter of melancholy reflexions, and had made a very great impression upon his tender mind, as appears from the following instance. One night, when at his uncle's, he was heard to cry out bitterly, and make a sad noise, in his sleep. Upon which, his uncle going to him, and awaking him, the young man told him, that he dreamed his landlord Hind was come to fetch him back to York: the thoughts of which gave him inexpressible uneasiness (6).

(6) Ibid. p. 17.

[D] As the statutes of the college require.] By the statutes of that college, the Fellows are obliged to take Orders when they are Masters of Arts of three years standing. The learned Bishop Jer. Taylor, offered to use his interest for procuring a dispensation of the statute. But Mr Dodwell refused to accept of that kind offer; lest it should be an ill precedent, and of bad consequence afterwards to the college. The reasons given for his declining the ministerial function, were, 1. The great weight of that office, and the severe account which the Ministers of Christ have to give to their Lord and Master. 2. His natural bashfulness, and humble opinion, and diffidence of himself; tho' he was, unquestionably, very well qualified in point of learning, of every kind. 3. That he thought he could do more service to religion, and the Church, by his writings, whilst he continued a layman, than if he took Orders: for then, the usual objections made against clergymen's writings on those subjects, viz. 'That they plead their own cause, and are biassed by self-interest,' would be entirely taken off (7).

(7) Ibid. p. 24, &c.

[E] A posthumous treatise of his late learned tutor John Stearne, M. D. to which he put a preface of his own.] He entituled that book, De Obsinatione: Opus posthumum Pietatem Christiano-Stoicam Scholastico more Suadens: and his own preface, Prolegomena Apologetica, de usu Dogmatum Philosophicorum, &c. Wherein he apologizes for his tutor; who, by quoting so often in that book, and setting a high value upon the writings and maxims of the Heathen Philosophers, particularly of the Stoicks, might seem to depreciate the Holy Scriptures. Mr Dodwell therefore premises first, that the author's design in that work, is only to recommend Moral Duties, and enforce the practice of them by the authority of the antient Philosophers; and that he doth not meddle with the great mysteries of Christianity, which are discoverable only by divine revelation. After that, he shews, that in things which concern our practice, reason is to be regarded, and even in things wherein God hath superadded a farther revelation of his will in the Holy Scriptures: That in the examination of natural reasoning, the authority of the great assertors and vindicators of Reason challenges our regard; and consequently the Philosophers. — Moreover, he argues, that the great end of Revelation, was to instruct us in things, which we could not by our reason attain to the knowledge of; but that in ordinary cases our reason is given us by God to be our guide and director, it being the candle of the Lord. That Revelation was superadded by God to make a farther discovery of his will, and to assist our natural reason, and hence not to be expected in cases where reason is sufficient to attain the end. That faith, or belief of divine revelation, is founded on reason, and that some acts of reason precede faith, and are supposed in our belief of divine revelation, &c. Lastly, he shows, that by Obsinatio, Dr Stearn meant what the Greeks call ἀπάθεια, εὐσάθεια, ἀναμαρτυρία, i. e. Firmness,

His second work was, 'Two Letters of Advice. I. For the Susception of Holy Orders. II. For Studies Theological, especially such as are Rational.' To the second edition of which, in 1681, was added, 'A Discourse concerning the Phœnician History of Sanchoniathon [F].' In 1673, he wrote a Preface, without his name, to 'An Introduction to a devout Life,' by Francis de Sales, the last Bishop and Prince of Geneva; which was published at Dublin, in English, this same year, in 12mo (m). He came over again to England in 1674, and settled in London; where he became acquainted with several learned men; particularly in 1675, with Dr William Lloyd, afterwards successively Bishop of St Asaph, Litchfield and Coventry, and Worcester. With that eminent Divine he contracted so great a friendship and intimacy, that he attended him to Holland, when he was appointed Chaplain to the Princess of Orange: He was also with him at Salisbury, when he kept his residence there as Canon of that Church; and spent afterwards a good deal of time with him at St Asaph (n). In 1675 he published 'Some Considerations of present Concernment; How far the Romanists may be trusted by Princes of another persuasion,' in 8vo [G]. The year following he put out 'Two short Discourses against the Romanists. 1. An Account of the fundamental Principle of Popery, and of the Insufficiency of the Proofs which they have for it. 2. An Answer to six Queries proposed to a Gentlewoman of the Church of England, by an Emissary of the Church of Rome [H].'

In the year 1679, he published, in 4to, 'Separation of Churches from Episcopal Government, as practised by the present Nonconformists, proved Schismatical, from such Principles as are least controverted, and do withal most popularly explain the Sinfulness and Mischief of Schism [I]. This being animadverted upon by R. Baxter (o), was vindicated, in 1681, by Mr Dodwell, in 'A Reply to Mr Baxter's pretended Confutation of a Book, intituled, Separation of Churches, &c.' To which were added, 'Three Letters to Mr Baxter, written in the year 1673, concerning the Possibility of Discipline under a Diocesan Government, &c.' 8vo. In 1682 came out his 'Dissertations on St Cyprian [K].'

Firmness, the not sinking under adversities and misfortunes (8).

[F] Two letters of advice — and — concerning the Phœnician History of Sanchoniathon. One of the two letters was written for the use of a son of Bishop Lesley, a brother to Mr Charles Lesley, well known for his useful writings against the Quakers, Deists, Papists, and Socinians; one for whom Mr Dodwell had a great esteem (9). — As for his Discourse on Sanchoniathon; it was occasioned by some letters that passed between him and the learned Dr Tho. Smith. This learned person having desired Mr Dodwell's thoughts concerning that author; Mr Dodwell wrote this discourse, wherein he delivers it as his opinion, that Philo-Byblius was the forger, or contriver, of that History under the name of Sanchoniathon.

[G] Some Considerations of present Concernment, &c.] This book was chiefly levelled against Father P. Walsh, and others concerned in the Irish Remonstrance, and the Controversial Letters; which occasioned a kind of schism amongst the Irish Papists (10). See the Irish Remonstrance from London Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. edit. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 515, 516, 620, &c.

[H] An account of the fundamental principle of Popery, — and An Answer to Six Queries, &c.] That fundamental principle, is, the pretended Infallible Authority of that Church. He begins this treatise, by showing, that the Romanists are guilty of formal schism with respect to us in England; since they separated from us upon the prohibition of Pius V, by his Bull dated Febr. 25, 1569. There is a very long preface to this short tract, 'concerning the usefulness of the following hypothesis.' — His Answer to the Six Queries, was occasioned, by their being presented to a gentlewoman of the Church of England, by a Romanist, in order to seduce her. Whereupon Mr Dodwell was desired, to give a short and distinct answer to them: which he accordingly did. The queries were, 1. 'Whether any one going from the Church of England, and dying a Roman Catholick can be saved? 2. Whether they be idolaters, or no? 3. Where was the Church of England before Luther's time? 4. Why all the Churches are not united in one? 5. Why the Church of England doth not hold up to confession, fasting-days, holy oil, which we ourselves commend? 6. Why was Reformation done by Act of Parliament?' These two Discourses make but a very small volume in 12mo. They were reprinted in 1688, 4to, with 'A new Preface relating to the Bishop of Meaux, and other modern Complainers of Misrepresentation.'

[I] Separation of churches, &c.] This book was occasioned by an Answer to a Sermon of the learned John Sharp, (afterwards Archbishop of York) on Romans xiv. 19, by a Nonconformist. Mr Dodwell undertook to vindicate the doctrine contained in this sermon: and that produced the book now before us. In which Mr Dodwell shews, that separation from episcopal communion renders persons unsecure of their eternal salvation: that salvation is ordinarily to be expected from the participation of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which God has appointed as the ordinary means of obtaining the Gospel-benefits, not to be obtained merely by hearing the word, and prayer: that the validity of the Sacraments depends on the authority of the persons administering them, there being such whom God has commissioned to act as his Ministers, whose acts he will ratify in heaven: that God is not obliged to bestow spiritual benefits on any, who receive the Sacraments from persons not thus authorized, besides their administering them being an usurpation on God's authority, &c. In this book, he hath learned discourses, on the Sin unto Death; and the Sin against the Holy Ghost. He intended to write, moreover, 'A History of the first Schisms in the Christian Church,' as a second part of this work; which he stiled the Historical part, as the former the Rational. Accordingly he began it, and in Latin, that it might be beneficial to foreigners, as well as our nation; but he never finished it (11).

[K] Dissertations on St Cyprian.] They were composed at the request of the excellent Dr J. Fell, Bishop of Oxford, who desired our author to write Observations on St Cyprian, when he was about publishing his beautiful edition of that Father. This produced these Dissertations; which were dedicated by the author to that Prelate, on the 7th of April 1682, and printed, that year, in the same size as Bishop Fell's St Cyprian, and designed to be bound with it. A second edition of them, under the title of Dissertaciones Cyprianicæ, &c. was reprinted at Oxford in 1684, 8vo. They are chiefly explanations of some passages in St Cyprian. In the XIth Dissertation he shews, 'How small the number of martyrs was in the first persecutions; and how later Martyrologies, especially of the Romanists, have multiplied them without the authority of ancient monuments.' This subject he handled, particularly at the request of Dr W. Lloyd Bishop of St Asaph (12); with a prospect of the succession of King James II (13). And he [Mr Dodwell] thought, that the lessening the number of martyrs, lessened not the glory of Christianity, when the heroic constancy he published 'A Discourse concerning the One Altar, and the One Priesthood, insisted on by the Ancients (p) in their Disputes against Schism.' Lond. 8vo. In 1684, a dissertation of his on a passage of Lactantius [L], was inserted in the new edition of that author at Oxford, by Thomas Spark, in 8vo. His treatise 'Of the Priesthood of Laicks [M],' appeared in 1686, in 8vo. About the same time (q) he was preparing for the press the Posthumous Works of the learned Dr John Pearson, Bishop of Chester [N]. He publish'd also, 'Dissertations on Irenæus [O].' On the 2d of April 1688, he was elected by the University of Oxford, Camden's Professor of History, without any application of his own, and when he was at a great distance from Oxford (r): And the 21st of May was incorporated Master of Arts in that University (s). But this beneficial and creditable employment of Professor he did not enjoy long; being deprived of it in November 1691, for refusing to take the Oaths of Allegiance to King William and Queen Mary (t). When their Majesties had suspended those Bishops, who would not acknowledge their authority; Mr Dodwell published 'A cautionary Discourse of Schism, with a particular Regard to the Case of the Bishops, who are suspended for refusing to take the new Oath.' London, 8vo (u). And when those Bishops were actually deprived, and others put in their Sees [P], he joined the former, looking upon the new Bishops, and their adherents, as Schismatics. He wrote likewise 'A Vindication of the deprived Bishops:' and 'A Defence of the same [Q].'

constancy and patience of them that suffered, which tended so much to its honour, was the great reason the persecutors put a stop to these slaughters. However, Mr Dodwell was severely, nay rudely, reflected upon for this Dissertation, by Bishop Burnet; who thus speaks to him: 'In one of these [Dissertations] you laboured to lessen one of the glorious characters of the Christian religion from the number of the martyrs; and in the next, (concerning the signal courage and fortitude of the martyrs) you began the account of the patience and fortitude of the martyrs with the wilfulness of the first Christians, and their desire of fame and vain-glory. It is true, you after that gave better reasons for it: but would a Vaninus, a Hobbes, and a Spinoza, say any thing more derogatory to that glory of our most holy faith, than you wrote in those two Dissertations?' In answer to that, Mr Dodwell replies, That he wrote those Discourses 'with a design of advancing, not of undervaluing martyrdom.'—And that he could have easily confuted his adversaries, had it not been for the great veneration he had for the goodness and piety of several of the Fathers, who were of too easy belief of matter of fact not sufficiently attested (14). This Dissertation was professedly attacked by Father Thierry Ruinart, a Benedictin; in the General Preface to his Acta Primorum Martyrum sincera & selecta, ex Libris cum editis tum manuscriptis collecta, &c. Notisq; & observationibus illustrata. His præmittitur Præfatio generalis, in qua refellitur Dissertatio 11<sup>ma</sup>. Cypriana de Paucitate Martyrum. Paris 1689, 4to, and Amstel. 1712, fol. Mr Dodwell never answered this Preface; not that it was unanswerable, but really out of tenderness for religion: because he must have been forced to expose the weakness or credulity of ancient writers, which some irreligious wretches would lay hold on to vile purposes (15). At the end of these Dissertations are some chronological tables, chiefly the Canons of Ptolemy collated with manuscripts; some Fasts out of manuscripts; a fragment of Theon; and another of the Emperor Heraclius, both founded on Ptolemy's Canons.

of answer to H. Grotius's Dissertation De Coenæ Administratione ubi pastores non sunt, &c. which was translated about this time into English by Mr William Baxter, the Antiquarian, and published under this title, 'Anti-Dodwellism (16): being two curious tracts formerly written by Hugo Grotius, concerning a solution of these two curious questions: 1. Whether the Eucharist may be administered in the absence of, or want of Pastors, &c.'

[N] The Posthumous Works of the learned Dr John Pearson. They were printed at London in 1688, 4to, under this title, V. Cl. Johannis Pearsonii, S. T. P. Cestriensis nuper Episcopi, Opera Posthuma Chronologica, &c. viz. De Serie & Successione primorum Romæ Episcoporum Dissertationes duæ: quibus præfigurantur Annales Paulini, & Lectiones in Acta Apostolorum. Singula prælo tradidit, edenda curavit, & Dissertationis novis additionibus auxit H. Dodwellus, &c. Cujus etiam accessit de eadem Successione usque ad Annales Cl. Cestriensis Cyprianicos, Dissertatio Singularis. The additions made by Mr Dodwell, are, a Discourse to shew that Theophilus Antiochenus, the author of the Discourse ad Autolyicum, was not Theophilus Bishop of Antioch: another, to shew, what St Jerom meant by this passage, 'That the Churches were governed by a Council of Presbyters at first, till divisions arose, &c.' Another, to prove, how little Eusebius was acquainted with Latin authors, or affairs in the West; and how long after his Chronicon he wrote his History. A Dissertation concerning the younger Agrippa's death. A Discourse, shewing, that Celibacy and Virginity were not so much esteemed in the first ages of the Church, as in the following times. A Discourse about Tertullian's Epocha, in his first book against Marcion, c. 19. A Dissertation concerning the succession of the first Bishops of Rome, brought down to the time where the Bishop begins his Cyprianic Annals: which Annals are inserted in Bishop Fell's edition of St Cyprian (17).

[O] Dissertations on Irenæus. They were printed at Oxford in 1689, in 8vo, under the title of Dissertations in Irenæum. Though they are six in number, they are only prolegomena to what the author further designed. He hath joined to this work, Philippus Sides de Catechistarum Alexandrinorum Successione, i. e. Of the Readers in the School of Alexandria; with notes. At the end there is, A Chronological Table.

[P] When those Bishops were actually deprived, and others put in their Sees. The deprived Bishops were, Dr Will. Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr Will. Lloyd, Bishop of Norwich; Dr Fr. Turner, of Ely; Dr Tho. Kenn, of Bath and Wells; Dr Rob. Frampton, of Gloucester; and Dr Tho. White, of Peterborough. And those put in their Sees were, Dr John Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr John Moore, at Norwich; Dr Sim. Patrick, at Ely; Dr Rich Kidder, at Bath and Wells; Dr Edw. Fowler, at Gloucester; and Dr Rich. Cumberland, at Peterborough.

[Q] A Vindication of the deprived Bishops. This was printed at London in 1692, 4to, being an answer to [L] A Dissertation on a passage of Lactantius. In his treatise de Mortibus Persecutorum, sect. 17. The words are — per circuitum ripæ Strigæ Nicomediam venit. In explaining which, Mr Dodwell observes, That Striga is first used for the limit of a Roman camp, and thence for the borders of fields, and limits of countries: that rivers were convenient for all these ends: that as Euphrates was the boundary of the Roman empire towards the Parthians, and the Rhine towards the Germans, so was the Danube of the Illyrian Province. And, because passage by water was the easiest for infirm persons, Dioclesian made choice of it in his chironical weakness to go to Nicomedia, partly by the Danube, and partly by the Euxine sea, though it was per circuitum, by taking a compass about.

[M] Of the Priesthood of Laicks. De Jure Laicorum Sacerdotali, ex Sententia Tertulliani aliorumque Veterum; as the title of it is. 'Twas written by way

continued for some time in Oxford, and then retired to Cookham a village near Maidenhead, about an equal distance between Oxford and London; and therefore convenient to maintain a correspondence in each place, and to consult friends and books, as he should have occasion (w). While he liv'd there, he became acquainted with Mr Francis Cherry of Shottesbrooke, a person of great learning and virtue, for the sake of whose Conversation he remov'd to Shottesbrooke, where he chiefly spent the remainder of his days (x). In 1692, he published his Camdenian Lectures read at Oxford [R]: And in 1694, 'An Invitation to Gentlemen to acquaint themselves with ancient History;' being a preface to Degory Wbear's 'Method of reading History,' translated into English by Mr Bohun. About this time having lost one or more of the Dodwells, his kinsmen, whom he designed for his heirs; he married on the 24th of June 1694, in the 52d year of his age, a person, in whose father's house at Cookham he had boarded several times: and by her had ten children (y). In 1696 he drew up the Annals of Thucydides, and Xenophon, to accompany the editions of those two authors by Dr John Hudson, and Mr Edward Wells. Having likewise compiled the Annals of Velleius Paterculus, and of Quintilian, and Statius, he published them all together in 1698, in one volume, 8vo [S]. About the same time he wrote an account of the lesser Geographers, published by Dr Hudson [T]: And, 'A Treatise concerning the Lawfulness of instrumental Musick in Holy Offices (z):' Occasioned by an organ being set up at Tiverton in 1696. With some other things [U]. In 1701, he published his account of the Greek and Roman Cycles [W], which was the most elaborate of all his pieces, and seems to have been the work of the greatest part of his life (a). The same year was published a letter of his [X], concerning Mr Toland's disingenuous treatment of him (b). The year following appeared 'A Discourse [of his] concerning the Obligation to marry within the true Communion, following from their style of being called a Holy Seed' (c). And 'An Apology for the Philosophical Writings of Cicero,' against the objections of Mr Petit: prefixed to Tully's five books De Finibus, or, Of Moral Ends, translated into English by Samuel Parker, Gent. As also the Annals of Thucydides and Xenophon [Y]. In 1703 he published 'A Letter concerning the Immortality of the Soul, against Mr Henry Layton's Hypothesis, 4to.' And, 'A Letter to Dr Tillotson about Schism,' 8vo. written to a book published by Humphrey Hody, B. D. London 1691, 4to, entitled, 'The Unreasonableness of a Separation from the New Bishops: or a treatise out of Ecclesiastical History, shewing, that although a Bishop was unjustly deprived, neither he nor the Church ever made a Separation, if the Successor was not a Heretick. Translated out of an ancient Greek Manuscript in the Publick Library at Oxford,' viz. among the Barocian MSS. Mr Hody writing an answer to The Vindication, &c. Mr Dodwell published 'A Defence of the Vindication of the Depriv'd Bishops.' Lond. 1695, 4to. To which he put a preface that was then suppressed, but printed afterwards, with this title, 'The Doctrine of the Church of England, concerning the Independency of the Clergy on the Lay-Power, as to those Rights of theirs which are purely Spiritual, reconciled with our Oath of Supremacy, and the Lay-Deprivations of the Popish Bishops in the beginning of the Reformation (18).'

[R] His Camdenian Lectures read at Oxford. The first was read May 25, 1688, and the sixteenth, or last, Nov. 6, 1691. Besides which, there are three more, that were prepared, but not read. These Lectures are upon Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, i. e. those authors, who wrote the History of the Roman Emperors, from the time of Trajan to that of Dioclesian. They were printed at Oxford 1692, 8vo, under this title, Prælectiones Academicæ in Scholâ Rhetoricæ Camdenianâ: cum Fragmentis e Libris Linteis. These Libri Linteis, were the Annals, or Commentaries of the ancient Romans, which used to be written on linnen.

[S] Having likewise compiled the Annals of Velleius, &c. The title of them was, Annales Velleiani, Quintilianei, Statiani; seu Vita P. Velleii, M. Fabii Quintilianii, Papinii Statii (obiterque Juvenalis) pro temporum ordine dispositæ. Those of Velleius Paterculus, were written at the request of Dr Charlett, late Master of University-college, Oxon. when he procured an edition of that author in 1692. At the end of these Annals is an Appendix, concerning Julius Cæsar, who digested Cæsar's Commentaries; and concerning Commodianus; in two Dissertations addressed to the most learned Grævius.

[T] He wrote an account of the Lesser Geographers The first volume of these Geographers was published in 1698, 8vo. The second in 1703. The third and fourth in 1712, &c. Mr Dodwell's account of the several authors, is printed in those volumes.

[U] With some other things Particularly De Tabulis Coelorum Dissert. Et Tabulæ Chronolog. promente xii Patriarch. These are printed in Dr Grabe's Spicilegium, Vol. I, among the notes. The first is a Dissertation on these words, ταῖς πλαξί των γενεων. Tabulis Coelorum, used in the Testament of the xii Patriarchs. Whereby Mr Dodwell understands the archetypal and original Law, as it is in the supreme lawgiver, in heaven; in opposition to the written Law of Moses: and supposes it to be also part of Enoch's prophecy. The other piece is, Chronological Tables, according to the author of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, inserted in that collection of Dr Grabe.

[W] His account of the Greek and Roman Cycles. It was printed at Oxford in 1701, 4to, under this title, De Veteribus Græcorum Romanorumque Cyclis, obiterque de Cyclo Judæorum ætate Christi, Dissertationes Decem, cum Tabulis necessariis. Inferuntur Tabulis Fragmenta Veterum incædita, ad rem spectantia Chronologicam. Opus Historiæ veteri, tam Græcæ quam Romanæ, quam & Sacræ quoque necessarium. At the end, are, Tabulæ Chronologicæ ad hoc opus illustrandum necessariæ. The contents of these Dissertations are, 1. Of Meton's Cycle. 2. Of that of Calippus. 3. Of the Athenian Cycles before Meton. 4. The Cycles of the Olympiads. 5. The Delphic and Boeotian Cycles. 6. Of the Isthmian Games, and Corinthian and Sicilian Cycles. 7. Of the Nemean Games, and Argolic Cycles. 8. Of the Laconic Cycles. 9. Of the Macedonian and Jewish Cycles. 10. Of the ancient Roman Cycles.

[X] A Letter of his It was inserted in the second edition of 'The Canon of the New Testament vindicated, by J. Richardson, B. D.' in answer to J. Toland's Amyntor: who had (19) quoted a long passage out of Mr Dodwell's Dissertations on Irenæus (20), tending (as that impious author imagined) to invalidate the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to represent the Canon of the New Testament as precarious and ill-grounded (21).

[Y] As also the Annals of Thucydides and Xenophon They were printed at Oxford in 4to, under this title; Annales Thucydidei et Xenophontei. Præmittitur Apparatus, cum vitæ Thucydidis Synopsi Chronologicâ.

in the year 1691, The year following came out, his 'Chronology of Dionysius Halicarnassus,' in the Oxford edition of that Historian by Dr Hudson, folio; his 'Two Dissertations on the age of Phalaris and Pythagoras [Z];' and his 'Admonition to Foreigners, concerning the late Schism in England [AA].' When the bill for preventing Occasional Conformity was depending in Parliament, he writ a treatise, intituled, 'Occasional Communion fundamentally destructive of the Discipline of the Primitive Catholick Church, and contrary to the Doctrine of the latest Scriptures concerning Church Communion;' which was published in 1705, at London, 8vo. About the same time, observing that the deprived Bishops were reduced to a small number (d), he wrote, 'A Case in View considered: in a Discourse, proving that [in Case our present invalidly deprived Fathers shall leave all their Sees vacant, either by Death or Resignation] we shall not then be obliged to keep up our Separation from those Bishops, who are as yet involved in the Guilt of the present unhappy Schism.' Lond. 1705. 8vo. Some time after, he published 'A farther Prospect of the Case in View, in answer to some new Objections not then considered.' Lond. 1707. 8vo. Hitherto Mr Dodwell had acted in such a manner, as had procured him the applause of all, except such as hated or despised the Nonjurors; but, about this time, he published some opinions that drew upon him almost universal censure. For, in order to exalt the powers and dignity of the Priesthood, in that One Communion, which he imagined to be the Peculium of God, and to which he had joined himself, he endeavoured to prove, with his usual perplexity of learning, That the doctrine of the Soul's Natural Mortality was the true and original Doctrine; and that Immortality was only at Baptism conferred upon the Soul, by the Gift of God, through the Hands of One Sett of regularly-ordained Clergy (e). In support of this opinion, he writ, 'An Epistolary Discourse, proving, from the Scriptures and the first Fathers, that the Soul is a Principle naturally mortal; but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to Punishment, or to Reward, by its Union with the Divine Baptismal Spirit. Wherein is proved, That none have the Power of giving this Divine Immortalizing Spirit, since the Apostles, but only the Bishops.' Lond. 1706. 8vo. At the end of the Preface to the Reader, is a Dissertation to prove, 'That Sacramental Absolution is necessary for the Remission of Sins, even of those who are truly penitent.' This Discourse being attacked by several persons [BB], our author endeavoured to vindicate himself in the three following pieces: namely, 1. 'A Preliminary Defence of the Epistolary Discourse, concerning the Distinction between Soul and Spirit: in two Parts. I. Against the Charge of favouring Impiety. II. Against the Charge of favouring Herefy. In the former is inserted a Digression, proving, that the Collection of the Code of the Four Gospels in Trajan's Time, is no way derogatory to the sufficient Attestation of them.' Lond. 1707. 8vo. 2. 'The Scripture Account of the Eternal Rewards or Punishments of all that hear of the Gospel, without an Immortality necessarily resulting from the Nature of the Souls themselves that are concerned in those Rewards or Punishments. Shewing particularly, I. How much of this Account was discovered by the best Philosophers. II. How far the Accounts of those Philosophers [Z] Two Dissertations on the age of Phalaris and Pythagoras.] They were occasioned by the dispute between Dr Bentley and the Honourable Mr Boyle, concerning the Epistles of Phalaris. In the preface, Mr Dodwell shews, That Atossa the daughter of Cyrus was not the first inventor of Epistles, as the Doctor had asserted: But the thing she invented, was, the manner of joining the tables on which they were written, with such exactness, that they might be more conveniently carried. These two Dissertations were printed at Oxford in 8vo under this title: Exercitationes duae: prima de aetate Phalaridis: secunda de aetate Pythagorae Philosophi.

[AA] His Admonition to Foreigners, concerning the late Schism in England.] The title of it was, De nupero Schismate Anglicano Parænesis ad Exteros, tam Reformatos quam etiam Pontificios, qua Jura Episcoporum vetera, eorundemque à Magistratu Seculari Independentia, omnibus asserenda commendantur. Lond. 8vo. i. e. 'An Admonition to Foreigners, as well of the Reformed Religion as Papists; wherein the ancient Right of Bishops, and their Independency on the Secular Magistrate, are asserted and recommended.' The schism here mentioned, is that which was occasioned by the deprivation of some of the Bishops, and the putting others into their Sees. See above note [P].

[BB] This Discourse being attacked by several persons.] The chief books written against it were these: I. 'A Charge of Herefy maintained against Mr Dodwell's late Epistolary Discourse, concerning the Mortality of the Soul: by way of address to the Clergy of the Church of England. Laying open his opposition to the received Creeds, and his falsification of all sacred and profane Antiquity.' By Edmund Chishull late Chaplain at Smyrna, and Fellow of C.C.C. Oxon. Lond. 1706, 8vo. In this book the author gives the following character of Mr Dodwell. —

'His modesty will, I hope, excuse me, if I have expressed myself somewhat freely concerning the size of his judgment and understanding, and if I rank him only in that lower class of learned men, who are indeed fitted for the collecting of materials, but are unqualified to judge rightly of, and to reason upon what they shall collect.' The other pieces published against the Epistolary Discourse were, II. 'A Letter to Mr Dodwell; wherein all the Arguments in his Epistolary Discourse against the Immortality of the Soul are particularly answered, and the Judgment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly represented.' By Samuel Clarke, M. A. Lond. 1706, 8vo. III. 'A Philosophical Discourse concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul; wherein the great question of the Soul's Immortality is endeavoured to be rightly stated and fully cleared. Occasioned by Mr Dodwell's late Epistolary Discourse. In two parts.' By John Norris, M. A. Rector of Bemerton. Lond. 1708, 8vo. IV. Thomas Milles, M. A. afterwards Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, published also an Answer to Mr Dodwell, Oxford 1707, 8vo, intituled, 'The Natural Immortality of the Soul asserted and proved from the Scriptures and First Fathers: in answer to Mr Dodwell's Epistolary Discourse, in which he endeavours to prove the Soul to be a Principle naturally mortal.'

phers were corrected, and improved, by the Hellenistical Jews, assisted by the Revelations of the Old Testament. III. How far the Discoveries fore-mentioned were improved by the Revelations of the Gospel. Wherein the Testimonies also of S. Irenæus and Tertullian are occasionally considered.'  Lond. 1708. 8vo. And, 3. ' An Explication of a famous Passage in the Dialogue of S. Justin Martyr with Tryphon, concerning the Immortality of Human Souls. Being a Letter to the learned Author of a Book, intituled, 'H Νέπης δεδωρα, &c. With an Appendix, consisting of a Letter to the Rev. Mr John Norris, of Bemerton; and an Expollulation relating to the late Insults of Mr Clarke and Mr Chishull.' Lond. 1708. 8vo. Upon the death of Dr William Lloyd, the deprived Bishop of Norwich, on the first of January 1710-11; Mr Dodwell, with some other friends, wrote to Dr Thomas Kenn, of Bath and Wells, the only surviving deprived Bishop, to know, Whether he challenged their subjection? He returned for answer, That he did not: and signified his desire that the breach might be closed by their joining with the Bishops possessed of their sees; giving his reasons for it. Accordingly Mr Dodwell, and several of his friends, joined in communion with them (f). But others refusing so to do, Mr Dodwell was exceedingly concerned at it, and wrote, ' The Case in View now in Fact. Proving, That the Continuance of a separate Communion, without Substitutes in any of the late Invalidly-deprived Sees, since the death of William late Lord Bishop of Norwich, is schismatical. With an Appendix, proving, That our late Invalidly-deprived Fathers had no Right to substitute Successors, who might legitimate the Separation, after that the Schism had been concluded by the Decease of the last Survivor of those same Fathers.' Lond. 1711. 8vo. Our author wrote some few other things [CC], besides all that has been already mentioned. At length, after a very studious, and ascetick course of life, he died at Shottesbrooke the 7th of June 1711, in the seventieth year of his age; and was buried in the chancel of the Church there (g), where a monument is erected to him [DD]. Mr Dodwell, as to his person, was of a small, but well-proportioned stature, of a sanguine and fair complexion, of a

[CC] Our author wrote some few other things.] Namely, I. Dissertatio ad Fragmentum quoddam T Livii, i. e. ' A Dissertation on a fragment supposed to be Livy's,' extant among Archbishop Laud's MSS. in the Bodleian Library. This Dissertation is mentioned by Mr Hearne, in his notes on Book vi. of Livy, of his edition. Mr Dodwell likewise settled the times of the actions related by that author, by the years ab Urbe Cond. according to the Varronian account, set at the top of each page (22). II. At the request of a Gentleman in the Isle of Man, who had desired his thoughts on this point, ' Whether the Church of England had just reasons, when she reformed, to lay aside the use of Incense, which was practised in all Churches before our quarrel with the Church of Rome?' he wrote, in 1709, ' A Discourse concerning the Use of Incense in Divine Offices. Wherein it is proved, that that practice, taken up in the Middle Ages, both by the Eastern and Western Churches, is, notwithstanding, an Innovation from the doctrine of the first and purest Churches, and the Traditions derived from the Apostles. Serving also to evince, That even the Consent of those Churches of the Middle Ages, is no certain Argument, that the particulars wherein they are supposed to consent, were faithfully derived from the Apostles, against the modern Asserters of the Infallibility of Oral Tradition.' Printed at London in 1711, 8vo. III. Julii Vitalis Epitaphium, cum Notis Henrici Dodwelli, & Commentario G. Mulgrave. Accedit Dodwelli Epistola ad Cl. Goezium de Puteslanâ & Bajanâ Inscriptionibus. Ipscæ Dunmoniorum & Londini, 1711, 8vo. This epitaph of Julius Vitalis, on which Mr Dodwell wrote notes, was found at Bath, and published by Mr Hearne at the end of his edition of King Alfred's Life by Sir John Spelman, 8vo. The Letter to Mr Goetz Professor at Leipfick, was written by Mr Dodwell in 1700, being an explanation of an inscription on Memnius Calistus, found at Puteoli; and on another found at Baiæ. IV. De ætate & patriâ Dionysii Periegetæ. On the age and country of Dionysius the Geographer. Printed in the Oxford edition of that author in 1710, 8vo. V. De Æarmâ Equestri Woodwardianâ Dissertatio, &c. On the ancient Roman shield, formerly in Dr Woodward's possession, whereon was represented the sacking of Rome by the Gauls. This Dissertation Mr Dodwell was prevented by death from finishing: it was published by Mr Hearne in 8vo. Oxon. 1713. The learned author supposes, this shield to have been made about the time of Nero. VI. Four Letters, which passed between the Right Reverend the Lord

Bishop of Sarum, and Mr Henry Dodwell, were printed from the originals. Lond. 1713, 12mo.

Mr Dodwell wrote likewise, VII. A Treat concerning the Death of Judas. Wherein he showed, that ἀπὸ γυζατο does not signify his being strangled with grief, as Grotius and Dr Hammond understood it, but that he hanged himself. It was never printed: nor the following, being VIII. A Dissertation concerning the Time of the Greek Translation of the Old Testament by the LXX. In which he proved, from the testimony of Eupolemus in Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, that it was not in the time of Demetrius Phaleræus a Prince, and of Ptolemy Phyladelphus the son of Ptolemy Lagida; but of Demetrius Phaler, a Grammarian, and of Ptolemy Philopator, who might be surnamed Phyladelphus as well as the former; as there were several Phyfeones, Soteres, Philometores, and Euergetæ. This Dissertation was left unfinished: as also IX. A Dissertation concerning the Laws of Nature and Nations; in which the author proposed to shew, that these laws were not (as is generally supposed) the result of reason, though highly congruous thereto; but laws delivered by Almighty God, to Adam, or Noah, the first common parents of all mankind, or at least to some in those first ages, wherein God most frequently revealed his Will: that these were transmitted by tradition: that they must proceed from the arbitrary pleasure of the great Governor of the universe, &c. X. He designed to publish The Epistle of St Barnabas, with a literal translation, and notes; having, ever since the year 1691, wrote prolegomena to it. But though he resumed this design not long before his decease, yet it was left imperfect. XI. Lastly, He began to settle the Time and Order in which Tertullian wrote each of his Books. But on this subject he made but a very little progress (23).

grave, and serious, but a comely, pleasant countenance; of a piercing eye, of a solid judgment, and ready apprehension (b). He naturally enjoyed so strong and vigorous a constitution of body, that he knew not, by his own experience, what the head-ach was (i). His industry was prodigious, as appears by the many books he published. Extremely frugal he was of his time [EE], and indefatigable in his studies, by which means he became acquainted with almost all authors, both sacred and profane, ancient and modern (k). He studied, not for his own benefit only, but also for that of others: for he was generously communicative, and always ready to assist others in worthy undertakings; very zealous to promote learning, and though learned almost beyond any one of his age, yet (what is very uncommon) of singular humility and modesty. Accordingly he was courted and admired by the most eminent men abroad (l), who bestow the highest encomiums upon him, on all occasions (m). It must however be owned, that as he conversed more with books than men, his Style is, for that reason, obscure and intricate, and full of digressions: for he often complained to his friends, that he was not able to comprize his thoughts in few words (n). With regard to his moral character; He was a person of great Sobriety and Temperance; of exemplary Charity, notwithstanding the narrowness of his fortune; of strict Piety; a great lover of the Clergy, and a zealous Member of the Church of England (o). As for his being a Nonjuror, That indeed gives no very advantageous idea of his discretion or judgment: but it must be considered, on the other hand, that Conscience is a stubborn thing, that will not always stoop to Interest or Ambition.

[EE] Extremely frugal he was of his time.] How desirous he was to save and improve it, is evident from the care he took not to lose that part of it wherein he travelled, which was chiefly on foot, through his own choice, rather than by stage coaches, that he might thereby be master of his own hours, often reading as he walked. For this end, he carried with him in his journies, books fitted for his pockets, the Hebrew Bible in four small volumes, the Greek New Testament, and the Common Prayer, accordingly. For the same purpose he had Thomas à Kempis, S. Augustine's Meditations, and other books of the like nature and size (25). After he was settled in Berkshire, he generally walked from Shottesbrooke to London, in a day, which is six and twenty miles (26). C

DONNE (JOHN) an eminent Poet and Divine of the last century, was born in London [A], in the year 1573, and educated in his father's house, under a private Tutor, till the eleventh year of age, when he was sent to the University of Oxford: at which time it was observed of him, as formerly of the famous Picus Mirandula, that he was rather born than made wise by study (a). He was admitted a Commoner of Hart-Hall, together with his younger brother, in Michaelmas Term 1584 (b). He declined taking his first degree at Oxford, by advice of his relations, who, being of the Romish religion, disliked the oath tendered upon that occasion. After he had studied three years in that University, University, he removed to Cambridge *, and from thence, about three years after, to Lincoln's-Inn in London [B], where he distinguished himself by his great improvement in the study of the Law (c). He was now in his eighteenth year, and as yet had professed himself of no particular denomination of Christians: but, about his nineteenth year, he laid aside the study of the Law, and of all other sciences, and set himself wholly to consider the points of religion controverted between the Romish and Reformed Churches [C]; which ended in a sincere attachment to the Protestant Religion (d). In the years 1596 and 1597, Mr Donne accompanied the Earl of Essex in his expeditions against Cadiz and the Azores Islands, and staid some years in Italy and Spain [D], where he made many useful observations, and perfected himself in the languages of those countries. Soon after his return to England, he was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor Egerton [E], and continued in that employment five years; during which time, he married privately, and without her father's consent, the daughter of Sir George More, Chancellor of the Garter and Lieutenant of the Tower; who was so incensed at the match, that he procured our author to be dismissed from the Lord Chancellor's service, and committed to prison (e) [F]. He soon obtained his liberty, but was put to the trouble of a long and expensive law-suit, to recover possession of his wife, who was forcibly detained from him. At length, time, together with our author's extraordinary merit, and winning behaviour, so far wrought upon Sir George, that he was prevailed on to use his interest with the Lord Chancellor, that his son-in-law might be restored to his post: but this request was refused [G]. As for Sir George, he was so far reconciled to Mr Donne and his wife, as not to deny them his paternal blessing; but would contribute nothing towards their support, though they stood in great need of it, our author's fortune being much diminished by the expence of his travels, books, law-suit, and the generosity of his temper. However, his wants were, in a great measure, prevented by the seasonable bounty of their kinsman Sir Francis Wooley, who entertained them several years at his house at Pirford in Surrey, where our author had several children born to him (f). During his residence at Pirford, he applied himself, with great diligence and success, to the study of the Civil and Canon Laws; and, about this time, was solicited by Dr Morton (afterwards Bishop

[B] He removed—to Lincoln's-Inn in London.] His mother and his guardians, who were of the Romish persuasion, made choice of Tutors (who were secretly of the same persuasion) to instruct young Mr Donne in the Mathematicks and other liberal sciences; with orders, at the same time, to instil into him the principles of the Romish Church. And he himself confesses (2), they had almost perverted him to their faith.

[C] He set himself to consider the points controverted between the Romish and Reformed Churches.] Let us hear our author himself upon this head. 'I had a longer work, says he (3), to do than many other men: for I was first to blot out certaine impressions of the Romane Religion, and to wrestle both against the examples and against the reasons, by which some hold was taken, and some anticipations early layde upon my conscience, both by persons, who by nature had a power and superiority over my will, and others, who by their learning and good life seemed to me justly to claime an interest for the guiding and rectifying of mine understanding in these matters.' Afterwards he says: 'Although I apprehended well enough, that this irresolution not only retarded my fortune, but also bred some scandal, and endangered my spirital reputation, by laying me open to misinterpretations; yet all these respects did not transport me to any violent and sudden determination, till I had, to the measure of my poore wit and judgment, surveyed and digested the whole body of Divinity controverted between ours and the Romane Church. In which search and disquisition, that God, which awakened me then, and hath never forsaken me in that industry, as he is the author of that purpose, so he is a witness of this protestation, that I behaved my selfe, and proceeded therein with humility and confidence in my selfe, and by that, which, by his grace, I tooke to be the ordinary meanes, which is frequent praier and equall and indifferent actions.' When he set about this enquiry, as he believed Cardinal Bellarmine to be the best defender of the Popish cause, he applied himself to the examination of that writer's works; and, about the twentieth year of his age, had marked all the Cardinal's works with observations under his own hand; which he shewed to the then Dean of Gloucester, and, at his death, bequeathed as a legacy to one of his friends (4).

[D] He staid some years in Italy and Spain.] The time he spent in Spain was, at his first going into Italy, designed for travelling to the Holy Land, and viewing Jerusalem and our Saviour's sepulchre. But the disappointment of company, or a safe convoy, or the uncertainty of returns of money into those remote parts, prevented his design (5).

[E] He was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor Egerton] This, probably, was intended by that Lord only as an introduction of our author to some more considerable employment in the State. For his Lordship often expressed his high opinion of his Secretary's abilities; whom he treated rather as a friend than a servant, constantly admitting him to a place at his own table (6).

[F] He married—the daughter of Sir George More—who was so incensed at the match, that he procured our author to be dismissed from the Chancellor's service, and committed to prison] Sir George's daughter lived in the Lord Chancellor's family, and was niece to his Lady. Sir George, having some intiraations of the intended marriage, removed his daughter, in all haste, from the Chancellor's to his own house at Lothesley in Surrey; and the friends on both sides endeavoured to draw them from their mutual affection to each other: but to no purpose; for, having exchanged the most faithful promises, they found means to have their marriage privately consummated. The affair was broke in the softest manner to Sir George by his friend and neighbour the Earl of Northumberland. But Sir George was so transported with anger, that he presently engaged his sister, the Lord Chancellor's Lady, to joia with him in requiring Mr Donne's dismissal, and would not be satisfied till his suit was granted. The Chancellor, at dismissing our author, declared, He parted with a friend, and such a Secretary as was fitter to serve a King than a subject. But Sir George's anger was not satisfied, till our author, together with Mr Samuel Eerook (*), who married him, and his brother Mr Christopher Brook (†), who gave the Lady in marriage, were all committed to three several prisons. Mr Donne, who was the first enlarged, never rested, till, by his solicitation and interest, he procured the liberty of his two imprisoned friends (7).

[G] This request was refused.] The Lord Chancellor returned for answer, that, 'though he was unfeignedly sorry for what he had done, yet it was inconsistent with his place and credit, to discharge and re-admit servants, at the request of passionate petitioners (8)' of Durham) to go into Holy Orders, and accept of a benefice, which the Doctor would have resigned to him: but Mr Donne thought fit to decline this obliging offer [H]. He lived with Sir Francis till that Gentleman's death; a little before which, by the mediation of Sir Francis, a perfect reconciliation was effected between our author and his father-in-law; Sir George obliging himself to pay Mr Donne 800*l.* at a certain day, as a portion with his wife, or 20*l.* quarterly for their maintenance, till the said portion was paid. After the death of Sir Francis Wooley, Mr Donne took a house for his wife and children at Mitcham in Surrey [I], and lodgings for himself near Whitehall in London; where he was much visited and careffed by the Nobility, foreign Ministers, and other persons of distinction (g). Some time after, at the earnest entreaty of his friends, he removed his family to London, where Sir Robert Drury, a Gentleman of a considerable estate, gave him a commodious apartment in his own large house in Drury-Lane (b). He was incorporated Master of Arts in the University of Oxford (having before taken the same degree at Cambridge) the 18th of April 1610 (i). About two years after, he was prevailed on, not without some difficulty, to accompany Sir Robert Drury to Paris (k) [K]. Before

[H] He thought fit to decline Dr Morton's obliging offer. Dr Morton, having desired a conference with our author, told him, 'he had a matter to propose to him; which nevertheless he would not declare to him; but upon condition, that he should not return a present answer, but pass three days in fasting and prayer, and, after a serious consideration of the proposal, then return with his answer.' Mr Donne promising to observe this condition, Dr Morton told him, 'he was no stranger to his necessities, and would now renew the attempt he had formerly made, to persuade him to wave his expectations of Court-preference, and enter into Holy Orders, with this additional reason, that, the King having just made him (Dr Morton) Dean of Gloucester, he was ready to resign to him (Mr Donne) a very good benefice he was possessed of, if God should incline his heart to embrace this motion;' adding, that 'no man's parts or education set him above that employment, which is to be an Ambassador for the God of glory, that God who by a vile death opened the gates of life to mankind.' Mr Donne performed his promise, and the third day after returned with his answer, which was to this effect: 'That he acknowledged his (Dr Morton's) great kindness, with an heart full of humility and thanks, but could not accept his offer; not that he thought himself too good for that calling, or that his education and learning, though not eminent, might not, by the assistance of God's grace, render him in some measure fit for it; but because some former irregularities of his life had been too notorious, not to expose him to the censure of the world, and perhaps bring dishonour to the sacred function: besides, being determined by the best Casuists, that God's glory should be the first end, and a maintenance the second motive, to embrace that calling, his present condition was such, he feared he could not reconcile his conscience to that rule (9).' This was our author's present resolution.

(9) Ib. p. 21—24.

[I] He settled his wife and children at Mitcham in Surrey. His fortune, at this time, was very narrow, as appears from several of his letters. Writing to the Honourable Sir R. D. he says: 'There is not one person, besides myself, in my house, well. I have already lost half a child, and with that mischance of her's my wife fallen into an indisposition, which would afflict her much, but that the sickness of her children stupifies her; of one of which, in good faith, I have not much hope. This meets a fortune so ill provided for physique and such relief, that if God should ease us with burials, I know not how to perform even that. I flatter myself in this, that I am dying too; nor can I truly die faster by any waste, than by loss of children. From my hospital at Mitcham (10).' In another letter, addressed to Sir Henry Goodere, having expressed his wishes for death, he adds—which though I know it is not merely out of a weariness of this (life), because I had the same desires, when I went with the tide, and enjoyed fairer hopes than now; yet I doubt worldly encumbrances have increased it (11). We shall add but one passage more from another of our author's letters: 'I write from the fire-side in my parlour, and in the noise of three gamefome children, and by the side of her, whom because I have transplanted into a wretched fortune, I must labour to disguise that from her by all such honest devices, as giving her my company and discourse (12).' Here you have part of the picture of his narrow fortune, and the perplexities of his generous mind: and thus it continued with him for about two years; all which time his family remained constantly at Mitcham; to which place he often retired himself, and destined some days to a constant study of some points of controversy betwixt the English and Romish Church, and especially those of Supremacy and Allegiance (13).

(12) Ib. p. 137.

[K] He was prevailed on, not without some difficulty, to accompany Sir Robert Drury to Paris. Mrs Donne, who was with child, and in an ill state of health, expressed some reluctance at her husband's intended journey, saying, her divining soul boded her some ill in his absence, and therefore desired him not to leave her. This made Mr Donne lay aside all thoughts of the journey, and really resolve against it. But Sir Robert becoming very importunate in his request, Mrs Donne, at last, gave a faint consent to the journey, which was proposed to be but for two months (14). Mr Walton is mistaken in telling us, Sir Robert Drury accompanied the Lord Hay in his embassy from King James to the French King: for that Lord was not sent Ambassador to France till July 1616 (15), whereas it is evident from the dates of some of our author's letters (16), that he was at Paris with Sir Robert Drury in 1612. Mr Donne, before his departure, presented his wife with a copy of verses (17), in which we may particularly admire the following beautiful similitudes.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, indure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twinn compasses are two;
Thy soul, the fixt foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if t'other do:

And though it in the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth come,
It leans and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
Like t'other foot, obliquely run:
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
And makes me end where I begun.

We shall here give the reader Isaac Walton's account of Mr Donne's vision, soon after his arrival at Paris. It was not indeed told him by our author himself, but by a person of honour, who had a great intimacy with Mr Donne (18). However take it in Walton's own words (19): 'Two days after their arrival there, Mr Donne was left alone, in that room in which Sir Robert, and he, and some other friends had dined together. To this place Sir Robert returned within half an hour; and, as he left, so he found Mr Donne alone; but in such an extasy, and so altered fore this journey, and after our author's return from France, many of the Nobility and others pressed the King to confer some secular employment on him (l) [L]: but his Majesty, considering him as better qualified for the service of the Church, rejected their application (m). About this time, the disputes concerning the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy being on foot, our author, by King James's especial command, wrote a treatise on that subject, intituled, Pseudo-Martyr [M], printed at London in 1610, in 4to; with which his Majesty was so highly pleased, that, resolving to prefer him in the Church, he was now very pressing with him to enter into Holy Orders: but Mr Donne, being desirous to qualify himself for the sacred function by a closer application to the studies of Divinity and the learned languages, deferred his compliance with the King's instances, till about three years after, when he was ordained both Deacon and Priest by his good friend Dr John King (*), then Bishop of London (n). Presently after, he was appointed one of the Chaplains in ordinary to his Majesty; and about the same time, attending King James in a progress, he was created Doctor in Divinity, at the recommendation of that Prince, by the University of Cambridge (o). His abilities, and industry in his profession, were so eminent, and himself so well beloved and esteemed by persons of quality, that, within the first year of his entering into sacred Orders, he had the offer of fourteen several benefices: but, as they lay in the country, his natural inclination to living in London, the place of his birth, and of his friends and acquaintance, made him refuse them all. Immediately after his return from Cambridge, his wife died [N]; and his grief for her loss was so great, that, for some time, he betook himself to a retired and solitary life (p). Soon after, he was chosen Preacher of Lincoln's-Inn, and was in high esteem with the Members of that Honourable Society. In 1619, he was appointed, by King James, to attend the Lord Hay Earl of Doncaster, in his embassy to the Princes of Germany; and, about fourteen months after his return to England, he was advanced to the Deanry of St Paul's [O], vacant by the removal of Dr Cary to the Bishoprick of Exeter (q). tered as to his looks, as amazed Sir Robert to behold him: infomuch that he earnestly desired Mr Donne to declare what had befallen him in the short time of his absence. To which Mr Donne was not able to make a present answer; but, after a long and perplexed pause, did at last say, I have seen a dreadful vision since I saw you: I have seen my dear wife pass twice by me thorough this room, with her hair banging about her shoulders, and a dead child in her arms: this I have seen since I saw you. To which Sir Robert replied, Sure, Sir, you have slept since I saw you, and this is the result of some melancholy dream, which I desire you to forget, for you are now awake. To which Mr Donne's reply was, I cannot be surer that I now live, than that I have not slept since I saw you; and am as sure, that, at her second appearing, she stopt, and lookt me in the face, and vanished. Rest and sleep had not altered Mr Donne's opinion the next day: for he then affirmed this vision with a more deliberate, and so confirmed a confidence, that he enclined Sir Robert to a faint belief, that the vision was true. It is truly said, that desire and doubt have no rest: and it proved so with Sir Robert; for he immediately sent a servant to Drury-house, with a charge to hasten back and bring him word, whether Mrs Donne were alive, and, if alive, in what condition she was as to her health. The twelfth day, the messenger returned with this account; that he found and left Mrs Donne very sad, and sick in her bed; and that, after a long and dangerous labour, she had been delivered of a dead child. And, upon examination, the abortion proved to be the same day, and about the very hour that Mr Donne affirmed he saw her pass by him in his chamber.

[L] Many of the Nobility, and others, pressed the King to confer some secular employment on him: but his Majesty—rejected their application. King James, it seems, had given our author some hopes of a State-employment, being always much pleased with his company and conversation, especially at his meals, where there were usually discourses and debates, concerning religion or literature, between his Majesty, and those Divines, whose places required their attendance on him at those times; particularly Dr Montague, Dean of the Chapel (*), and Dr Andrews (†), his Majesty's Almoner (20). Among others, who solicited our author's advancement in the State, was the Earl of Somerset, when in the greatest height of favour: who being at Theobalds with the King, and one of the Clerks of the Council dying there, dispatched a messenger for Mr Donne to come thither immediately, and, at our author's coming, said to him; To testify the reality of my affection, and my purpose to prefer you, stay in this garden till I go up to the King, and bring you word that you are Clerk of the Council: doubt not my doing this; for I know the King loves you, and know the King will not deny me. But it happened otherwise; for the King denied the Earl's request, and replied; I know Mr Donne is a learned man, has the abilities of a learned Divine, and will prove a powerful preacher; and my desire is, to prefer him that way, and in that way I will deny you nothing for him (21). It appears from one of our author's letters (22), that he solicited in vain for the place of one of his Majesty's Secretaries in Ireland, upon the death of Sir Geoffrey Fenton.

[M] His Pseudo-Martyr. King James himself had engaged in the controversy concerning the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, as appears by his Works still extant. As he had some discourses with Mr Donne upon that subject, he was so pleased with his clearness in stating the objections made to the taking those oaths, and his answers to them, that he commanded our author to draw up the objections and answers in form, and bring them to him: which our author performed within six weeks, and brought them to the King in his own hand-writing, as they now stand in the book above-mentioned (22). The title, at length, is: Pseudo-Martyr: Wherein out of certaine Propositions and Gradations this Conclusion is evicted; that those, which are of the Romane Religion in this Kingdome, may and ought to take the Oath of Allegiance. It is dedicated to King James I, with a Preface addressed to the Priests and Jesuites, and to their disciples in this kingdome. This book was animadverted upon by one Thomas Fitzherbert, in a Censure of it, subjoined to his Supplement to the Discussion of Dr Harlow's Answer to the Judgment of a Catholick Englishman, &c. printed at St Omers in 1613, in 4to.

[N] His wife's death. Mrs Donne died the 11th of August 1617, on the seventh day after the birth of her twelfth child, and was buried in the parish-church of St Clement's near Temple-Bar, in London (23). She left our author in a narrow unsettled estate, with seven children then living, to whom he gave a voluntary assurance, that he would never bring them under the subjection of a step-mother; which promise he faithfully kept (24). The first sermon he preached after the death of his wife, was in the church where she lay buried, on this text out of Jeremiah's Lamentation: Lo, I am the man that have seen affliction (25).

after, the vicarage of St Dunstan in the West, and another benefice, fell to Dr Donne; the advowson of the former having been given him by the Earl of Dorset, and that of the latter by the Earl of Kent. In 1623-4, he was chosen Prolocutor of the Convocation (r); on which occasion he spoke a Latin oration, as his inauguration speech (s). About the same time, he was appointed by the King to preach several occasional sermons, at Paul's Cross, and other places: these discourses were misrepresented to his Majesty, who gave the Doctor an opportunity of justifying himself in his royal presence (t) [P]. The year following, he was seized with a dangerous fit of sickness [Q]; of which, however, he recovered, and published, on that occasion, his most excellent book of Devotions, which he had written on his sick bed (u). He continued in perfect health till the fifty-ninth year of his age, when, being with his eldest daughter Mrs Harvey, at Abery-hatch in Essex, in August 1630, he was taken with a fever, which brought on a consumption (w): notwithstanding which, he returned to London, and preached in his turn, at Court, as usual, on the first Friday in Lent (x) [R]. He died [S] the thirty-first of March 1631 (y), and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St Paul's, where a monument was erected over him [T]. His character is excellently drawn by the writer of his life [U]; and order to Dr Donne to attend him the next day at dinner. When his Majesty was sat down, he said: 'Dr Donne, I have invited you to dinner; and, though you sit not down with me, yet I will carve to you of a dish that I know you love well; for knowing you love London, I do therefore make you Dean of Paul's; and when I have dined, then do you take your beloved dish home to your study; say grace there to yourself, and much good may it do you (26).'

[P] His Sermons were misrepresented to the King, who gave the Doctor an opportunity of justifying himself, in his royal presence ] His Majesty was told, that Dr Donne had fallen in with the general humour of the pulpits, and was busy in insinuating a fear of the King's inclination to Popery, and a dislike of his government. Whereupon his Majesty sent for our author, and required his answer to the accusation; which was so clear and satisfactory, that the King said, he was right glad he rested no longer under the suspicion. When the King had said this, Dr Donne kneeled down, and thanked his Majesty, and protested, his answer was faithful and free from all collusion; and therefore desired that he might not rise, till, as in like cases he always had from God, so he might have from his Majesty some assurance that he stood clear and fair in his opinion. At which the King raised him from his knees, and protested he believed him, and that he knew he was an honest man, and doubted not, but that he loved him truly. And having thus dismissed him, he called some Lords of his Council into his chamber, and said with much earnestness, My Doctor is an honest man, and, my Lords, I was never better satisfied with an answer than with that he hath now made me: and I always rejoice, when I think, that by my means he became a Divine (27).

(27) Ib. p. 48, 49.

[Q] He was seized with a dangerous fit of sickness.] In this distemper, he was visited daily by his good friend Dr Henry King, one of the Residentiaries of St Paul's, and afterwards Bishop of Chichester: who, observing that our author's sickness rendered his recovery doubtful, took a proper opportunity to acquaint him, that, 'as there had been an offer lately made to the chapter, for renewing the lease of the best prebendal corps belonging to that church, which had been refused, because the tenant had offered too low a fine; his intention was, if he could not raise him to an higher sum, to prevail with the other Residentiaries to join in accepting what was offered; desiring the Dean would agree to this proposal, 'as it would be a considerable addition to his present estate, which (he knew) stood in need of it.' The Dean thanked the Doctor for his kind offer, but declared he could not accept it, saying, 'he dared not, upon his sick bed, when God had made him useless to the service of the Church, make any advantage from it; but that, if he should restore him to such a degree of health, as again to serve at his altar, he should then gladly take the reward, which the bountiful benefactors of that church had designed him; protesting, 'he would not augment, on his sick bed, that little worldly estate he should leave behind him (28).'

(28) Ib. p. 49, 50.

[R] He preached, in his turn, at Court, as usual, on the first Friday in Lent ] His text, upon this occasion, was: To God the Lord belong the issues from death, Psal. lxxviii. 20. It was printed at London in 1633, in 4to, under the title of Death's Duel, or a Consolation to the Soule against the Dying Life and Living Death of the Body, &c. Being his last Sermon, and called by his Majesty's Household, THE DOCTOR'S OWNE FUNERAL SERMON.

[S] His death.] Finding himself hastening to his end, he sent for many of his intimate friends, and took his last leave of them. Having done this, and settled his private affairs, he waited his dissolution with much cheerfulness and resignation, and closed his last breath with these words, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done (29). It must not be omitted, that, among other preparations for death, he made use of this very remarkable one. He ordered an urn to be cut in wood, on which was to be placed a board of the exact height of his body. This being done, he caused himself to be tied up in a winding-sheet, in the same manner as dead bodies are. Being thus shrouded, and standing with his eyes shut, and with just so much of the sheet put aside, as might discover his thin, pale, and death-like face, he caused a skilful painter to take his picture. This piece, being finished, was placed near his bedside, and there remained as his constant remembrancer to the hour of his death (30).

[T] A Monument was erected over him.] It was composed of white marble, and carv'd from the picture mentioned in the last remark, by order of his executor Dr King Bishop of Chichester, who wrote the inscription, as follows:

[U] His character — drawn by the Writer of his life.] 'He was of stature moderately tall, of a stait and equally proportion'd body, to which all his words and actions gave unexpressible addition of comeliness. The melancholy and pleasant humour were in him so tempered, that each gave advantage to the other, and made his company one of the delights of mankind. His fancy was unimitably high, equalled only by his great wit, both being made useful by a commanding judgment. His aspect was cheerful, and such as gave a silent testimony of a clear knowing soul, and of a conscience at peace with itself. His melting eye shew'd that he had a soft heart, full of noble compassion; of too brave a soul to offer injuries, and too much a Christian not to pardon them in others. He did much contemplate (especially after he enter'd into his sacred calling) the Mercies of Almighty God, the immortality of the Soul, and the Joys of Heaven, and wou'd often say, in a kind of sacred extasy, Blessed and his abilities, both as a Preacher [W], and a Poet [X], are sufficiently seen in his incomparable writings [Z]. He left behind him a son of both his names [Z].

'sed be God, that be is God, only, and divinely like himself! He was by nature highly passionate, but more apt to reluct at the excesses of it. A great lover of the offices of Humanity, and of so merciful a spirit, that he never beheld the miseries of mankind without pity and relief. He was earnest and unwearied in the search of knowledge; with which his vigorous soul is now satisfied, and employ'd in a continual praise of that God that first breathed it into his active body; that body which once was a Temple of the Holy Ghost, and is now become a small quantity of Christian Dust. But I shall see it reanimated. Feb. 1639. I. W. (31).'

[W] His abilities as a preacher.] Mr Walton tells (32) us, that, upon his first entering into Holy Orders, his Modesty was such, he could not be persuaded to preach to any eminent auditory, but went usually, accompanied by some one friend, to preach privately in some village near London; his first sermon being preached at Paddington. This he did till the King sent and appointed him a day to preach before him at Whitehall; and, though much was expected from him, both by his Majesty and others, yet he was so happy as to exceed their expectations; 'Preaching the word so, as shewed his own heart was possessed with those very thoughts and joys he laboured to instil into others: A preacher in earnest, weeping sometimes for his auditory, sometimes with them; always preaching to himself, like an Angel from a cloud, but in none; carrying some, as St Paul was, to heaven in holy raptures, and enticing others by a sacred art and courtship to amend their lives; here picturing a vice so as to make it ugly to those that practised it, and a virtue so as to make it be beloved even by those that loved it not; and all this with a most particular grace and an unexpressible addition of comeliness.'

[X] ——— a poet.] Our author's poems consist of I. Songs and Sonnets. II. Epigrams. III. Elegies. IV. Epitaphs or Marriage Songs. V. Satyres. VI. Letters to several Personages. VII. Funeral Elegies. VIII. Holy Sonnets. They are printed together in one Volume, 12mo. London 1719; with the addition of Elegies upon the author by several persons. Mr Dryden has very justly given Dr Donne the character of the greatest wit, tho' not the greatest Poet of our nation (33); and in his Dedication of Juvenal to the Earl of Dorset, he says (34): 'Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification. And were he translated into numbers and English, he wou'd yet be wanting in the dignity of expression. — You equal Donne in the variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; you excel him in the manner and the words. I read you both with the same admiration, but not with the same delight. He affects the metaphysics, not only in his satyrs, but in his amorous verses, where nature only shou'd reign; and perplexes the minds of the fair-sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he shou'd engage their hearts, and entertain them with the softness of love.' A little farther (35), Mr Dryden asks: 'Wou'd not Donne's Satyrs, which abound with so much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words and of his numbers?' Whether our late excellent poet (*) took the hint from this question, or not, is uncertain; but he has shew'd the world, that Dr Donne's Satyres, when translated into numbers and english (as Mr Dryden above expresses it) are not inferior to any thing in that kind of poetry, even his own admirable writings.

[Y] His writings.] Besides the Pseudo Martyr, and volume of poems already mention'd, there are extant the following Works of Dr Donne, viz. I. Devotions upon emergent Occasions, and several steps in his Sickness. 12mo. Lond. 2d edit. (36). II. Paradoxes, Problems, Essays, Characters, &c. To which is added a Book of Epigrams, written in Latin by the same author; translated into English by J. Maine, D. D. As also

Ignatius his Conclave, a Satyr translated out of the original copy written in Latin by the same author; found lately amongst his own papers, Lond. 1653, 12mo. These pieces are dedicated, by the author's son Dr John Donne (37), to Francis Lord Newport. Part of this collection was publish'd, in 1633, under the title of Juvenilia, or Certain Paradoxes and Problems, 4to. The Epigrams were first printed in 1632, under the title of Fasciculus Poematum et Epigrammatum miscellaneorum, &c. 8vo. The Satire, intitled Ignatius his Conclave, was first printed in 1626, in 8vo. under the title of Ignatius his Conclave, viz. of establishing a Church in the Moon; and again in 1635, under the title of Ignatius his Conclave, or his Inthronization in a late Election in Hell, 12mo. With this piece was printed another intitled An Apology for the Jesuits. III. Three volumes of Sermons, in folio; the first printed in 1640; the second in 1649; and the third in 1660. IV. Essays in Divinity, &c. Being several Disquisitions interwoven with Meditations and Prayers, before he went into Holy Orders, Lond. 1651, 12mo. They were published after the author's death, by his son. V. Letters to several Persons of Honour; published by the author's son, in 4to. Lond. 1654. There are several of Dr Donne's Letters, and others to him from the Queen of Bohemia, the Earl of Carlisle, Archbishop Abbot, and Ben Johnson, printed in a book intitled A Collection of Letters made by Sir Tobie Matthew, Knt. Lond. 1660, 8vo. VI. The ancient History of the Septuagint; translated from the Greek of Aristeas, Lond. 1633, 12mo. This translation was revised and corrected by another hand, and printed in 1685, in 8vo. VII. BIAΘANATΩΣ: or a Declaration of That Paradox or Thesis, that Self-Homicide is not so naturally a Sin, that it may not be otherwise, London, 1644, 1648, &c. 4to. The original, under the author's own hand, is preserved in the Bodleian Library. Mr Walton gives this piece the character of 'An exact and laborious treatise, wherein all the laws violated by that Act (Self murder) are diligently survey'd, and judiciously censured: a treatise written in his younger years, which alone might declare him then not only perfect in the Civil and Canon Law, but in many other such studies and arguments, as enter not into the consideration of many, that labour to be thought great clerks, and pretend to know all things (38).' In one of our author's Letters, address'd to Sir Robert Carre, and sent with this book in manuscript, he speaks of it himself in the following terms: 'Because it is upon a misinterpretable subject, I have always gone so near suppressing it, that it is only not burnt. No hand hath passed upon it to copy it, nor many eyes to read it; only to some particular friends in both Universities, then when I writ it, I did communicate it; and I remember I had this answer, that certainly there was a false thread in it, though not easily found. Keep it, I pray, with the same jealousy: let any, that your discretion admits to the sight of it, know the date of it, and that it is a book written by Jack Donne, and not by Dr Donne. Reserve it for me if I live (*), and if I die, I only forbid it the presse and the fire. Publish it not, but yet burn it not, and between those do what you will with it (39).'

[Z] He left behind him a son of both his names.] He was educated at Westminster School, and elected from thence a Student of Christ Church in Oxford, in 1622. Afterwards he travell'd abroad, and took the degree of Doctor of Laws at Padua in Italy. The 30th of June, 1638, he was incorporated in the same degree in the University of Oxford. He died in 1662, and was interr'd in the Church-yard of St Paul's Covent-Garden. Mr Wood gives him the character of an Atheistical Buffoon, and tells us, he was much valued by King Charles II (40): no great compliment to that monarch's judgment. This Dr Donne, besides several pieces of his father, publish'd (as Wood expresses it) several frivolous trifles, under his own name; among which is, The Humble Petition of Covent-Garden against Dr John Baber a Physician, Lond. 1661 (41).

D R A K E (Sir FRANCIS) one of the most distinguished of the naval heroes in the glorious reign of Elizabeth. A man, of whom it may be truly said, That he had a head to contrive, a heart to undertake, and a hand ready to execute, whatever promised glory to himself, and good to his country. As he was, properly speaking, the son of merit, we have but a very indifferent account of his family, or even of his father: that which Camden (a) gives us, and which he says he had from Drake's own mouth, is so embarrassed with inconsistent circumstances, that there is no relying upon it, and trusting to our reason at the same time, as will be shewn in the notes [A]. We will, therefore, give the reader, in this place, a plainer account, as early in it's rise, supported by good authority, and, in all it's circumstances, very agreeable to the sequel of his story, leaving it to his judgment to piece therewith the chief points in Camden's relation (b); which may be also reputed truths, if we knew with certainty how to reconcile, and bring them in (c). According then to this other account, I find he was the son of one Edmund Drake, an honest Sailor, and born near Tavistock in the year 1545, being the eldest of twelve brethren, and brought up at the expence, and under the care, of his kinsman Sir John Hawkins. It is likewise said, that, at the age of eighteen, he was Purser of a ship trading to Biscay, at twenty he made a voyage to Guinea, and, at the age of twenty-two, had the honour to be appointed Captain of the Judith, and, in that capacity, was in the harbour of St John de Ulloa, in the gulph of Mexico, where he behaved most gallantly in the glorious actions, under Sir John Hawkins, and returned with him into England with a very great reputation, but not worth a groat (d). Upon this he conceived a design of making reprisals on the King of Spain, which, some say, was put into his head by the Minister of his ship; and, to be sure in Sea-divinity, the case was clear the King of Spain's subjects had undone Mr Drake, and therefore Mr Drake was at liberty to take the best satisfaction he could on the subjects of the King of Spain (e). This doctrine, how rudely soever preached, was very taking in England, and therefore he no sooner published his design, than he had numbers of volunteers ready to accompany him, though they had no such pretence to colour their proceedings as he had (f). In 1570 he made his first expedition with two ships, the Dragon and the Swan, and the next year in the Swan alone, wherein he returned safe, if not rich [B]. And, having now means sufficient to perform

[A] As will be seen in the notes.] As in venturing to depart from what Camden has said, we, at the same time, leave the great road in which all other writers have travelled, it is but just that we should give the world a full account of the motives which induced us to take this step, that it may clearly appear, it did not proceed from singularity, but necessity. Our learned Historian, speaking of the events (1) which happened in the year 1580, has these words: 'About this time returned into England Francis Drake, having acquired great wealth and greater reputation, by prosperously sailing round about the world, being, if not the first of all which could challenge this glory, yet, unquestionably, the first but Magellan whom death cut off in the midst of his voyage. This Drake, to relate no more than what I have heard from himself, was born of mean parentage in Devonshire, and had Francis Russel, afterwards Earl of Bedford, for his godfather, who, according to the custom, gave him his Christian name. Whilst he was yet a child, his father embracing the Protestant doctrine, was called in question by the Law of the Six Articles made by Henry VIII against the Protestants, fled his country, and withdrew himself into Kent. After the death of King Henry, he got a place among the seamen in the King's navy to read prayers to them, and, soon after, he was ordained Deacon, and made Vicar of the church of Upnore upon the river Medway, where the Royal fleet usually rides. But, by reason of his poverty, he put his son apprentice to the master of a bark, his neighbour, who held him closely to his business, by which he made him an able seaman; his bark being employed in coasting along the shore, and sometimes in carrying merchandize into Zealand and France. The youth being painful and diligent, so pleased the old man by his industry, that, being a bachelor, at his death he bequeathed his bark unto him by his last will.' It falls out unhappily for this story, that the parts of it are not consistent. If Drake was in his tender years or childhood, when his father was persecuted on the score of the Six Articles, he must have been born a good while before the year 1539 (2), and if so, how could Sir Francis Russel be his godfather, who was himself born in 1527 (3)? so that without much straining this account, they might be both of an age. It is very certain, that Mr Drake was but a young man when Sir John Hawkins made himself Captain of the Judith, but according to this computation he was thirty-five or thirty-six at least. It is allowed by all the writers of his time, that he died in the flower of his age, which could not well be said, if he had been between sixty and seventy. As to the account that I have followed, we have it from John Stowe, who was a very industrious careful man, and particularly inquisitive into things of this nature (4). Besides, as the reader sees in the text, he settles every step of his advancement, and affirming that he was in the twenty-second year of his age when he became Captain of the Judith, this fixes his birth to 1545, since he was vested with that command in October 1566; by fixing this date, the facts mentioned by Camden from the mouth of Sir Francis Drake become very probable; for Sir Francis Russel might well be his godfather, and all the events follow that he sets down, only the persecution his father suffered must have been in the reign of Queen Mary, which is the more probable, if we consider that Camden himself assures us, Queen Elizabeth, in the beginning of her reign, made that establishment of the fleet in the river Medway, where Drake's father read prayers to the seamen (5). Neither is this the only mistake in Sir Francis Drake's story by that author.

[B] Wherein he returned safe if not rich.] We have no particular account of these two voyages, or what he performed in them. They were made in the years 1570 and 1571, and there is nothing clearer than that Captain Drake had two great points in view, the one was, to inform himself perfectly of the situation and strength of certain places in the Spanish West-Indies, the other to convince his countrymen, that notwithstanding what had happened to Captain-Hawkins in his last voyage, it was a thing very practicable to fail into these parts and return in safety; for it is to be observed, that Hawkins and Drake separated in the West-Indies, and that the former, finding it impossible to bring all his crew home to England, had set a part of them, but with their own consents, ashore in the bay of Mexico, and these being looked upon as so many men lost, and indeed very few of them found their way home, the terror of such a captivity as these poor men were known to endure, had a great effect (6). But Captain Drake in these two voyages, having very wisely avoided coming to blows with the Spaniards, and bringing home sufficient returns to satisfy his perform greater matters, as well as skill to conduct them, he laid the plan of a more important design with respect to himself, and to his enemies (g). This he put in execution on the twenty-fourth of March 1572, on which day he sailed from Plymouth, himself in a ship called the Pascha, of the burthen of seventy tons, and his brother John Drake in the Swan, of twenty-five tons burthen, their whole strength consisting of no more than seventy-three, men and boys; and, with this inconsiderable force, on the twenty-second of July he attacked the town of Nombre de Dios, which then served the Spaniards for the same purposes (though not so conveniently) as those for which they now use Porto Bello. He took it in a few hours by storm, notwithstanding a very dangerous wound he received in the action; yet after all they were no great gainers, but, after a very brisk action, were obliged to betake themselves to their ships with very little booty. His next attempt was to plunder the mules laden with silver, which passed from Venta Cruz to Nombre de Dios; but in this scheme too he was disappointed. However, he attacked the town of Venta Cruz, carried it, and got some little plunder. In their return they unexpectedly met with a string of fifty mules laden with plate, of which they carried off as much as they could, and buried the rest. In these expeditions he was very much assisted by a nation of Indians, who then were, and yet are, engaged in a perpetual war with the Spaniards. The Prince, or Captain of these people at this time, was named Pedro, to whom Captain Drake presented a fine cutlafs which he wore, and to which he saw the Indian had a mind. Pedro, in return, gave him four large wedges of gold, all these Captain Drake threw into the common stock, with this remarkable expression, 'That he thought it but just, that such as bore the charge of so uncertain a voyage, on his credit, should share the utmost advantages that voyage produced.' Then embarking his men with all the wealth he had obtained, which was very considerable, he bore away for England, and was so fortunate as to sail in twenty-three days from Florida to the Isles of Scilly, and thence, without any accident, to Plymouth, where he arrived the ninth of August 1573

(b). His success in this expedition, joined to his honourable behaviour towards his owners, gained him a high reputation, and the use he made of his riches still a greater; for, fitting out three stout frigates, at his own expence, he sailed with them to Ireland, where, under Walter Earl of Essex (the unfortunate father of that still more unfortunate Earl, who was beheaded) he served as a volunteer, and did many glorious actions (i). After the death of his noble patron he returned into England, where Sir Christopher Hatton, who was then Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth, Privy-Counsellor, and a great favourite, took him under his protection, introduced him to her Majesty, and procured him her countenance (k). By this means he acquired a capacity of undertaking that grand expedition, which will render his name immortal. The thing he first proposed was, a voyage into the South-Seas through the Straights of Magellan, which was what hitherto no Englishman ever attempted. This project was well received at Court, and, in a short time, Captain Drake saw himself at the height of his wishes; for, in his former voyage, having had a distant prospect of the South-Seas, he framed an ardent prayer to God, that he might sail an English ship in them, which he now found an opportunity of attempting, the Queen's permission furnishing him with the means, and his own fame quickly drawing to him a force sufficient (l) [C]. The fleet with which he sailed on this extraordinary undertaking, owners, dissipated these apprehensions, as well as raised his own character; so that at his return from his second voyage, he found it no difficult matter to raise such a strength, as might enable him to perform what he had long meditated in his own mind, but which he never would have been able to effect, but by pursuing this cautious method.

[C] Quickly drawing to him a force sufficient.] We have observed in the text, that Captain Drake was the first Englishman at least, so far as we know, that had so much as a sight of the South-Seas; and, as Mr Camden remarks, he was so inflamed with that sight, as to have no rest in his own mind till he had accomplished his purpose of sailing an English ship in those seas (7). He was not, however, so forward as to tell this to all the world, because he foresaw that such an undertaking would be attended with many difficulties; that the navigation was new, and required much consideration before it was attempted; that the Spaniards were sufficiently alarmed by his last attempt, and that it would be highly rash for him to adventure upon such an enterprise, without having the sanction of publick authority. While he meditated this great design in his own mind, without communicating it to any, he took care to procure the best lights he could to engage several bold and active men to serve under him wherever he went, and by a well timed display of publick spirit, made himself known to, and gained some powerful friends at, Court (8). But while he was thus wisely and warily contriving what he afterwards so happily executed, one John Oxenham, who had served as a soldier, a seaman, and a cook, and had gained great reputation by his gallant behaviour in the last voyage under him, believed he had penetrated Captain Drake's scheme, and thought to be beforehand with him in the execution of it; accordingly, in 1575, this man sailed in a bark of one hundred and forty tons burthen, with seventy brave fellows to Nombre de Dios, where laying his bark up in a creek, he marched cross the Isthmus, with his companions, got into the South-Seas with some canoes, and took two Spanish ships with an immense treasure in gold and silver; but wanting Drake's abilities and generosity, though he was little, if at all, inferior to him in courage, fell out with his men, which occasioned such a delay in his return, that the Spaniards found and recovered the treasure, afterwards destroyed many, and at length took him and some of his companions, whom for want of a commission to justify their proceedings, they hanged as pyrates (9). Captain Drake, before he had any knowledge of the issue of this business, and being acquainted with no more than was publick throughout all the West of England, that Oxenham was sailed upon some such design, brought his own project to bear by the means mentioned in the text (10), and easily obtained a force sufficient to accomplish it, which, all things considered, must at this day appear a very extraordinary event, more especially if we consider that he never disclosed his real intention after he had his commission, nor indeed could disclose it with safety, and yet made all his preparations so judiciously, that it does not appear any other circumnavigator met with fewer discouragements than he, who performed all by the undertaking, consisted of the following ships; the Pelican, commanded by himself, of the burthen of one hundred tons; the Elizabeth, Vice-Admiral, eighty tons, under Captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by Captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of fifty tons, under Captain John Chester; and the Christopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under Captain Thomas Moon (m). In this fleet were embarked no more than one hundred sixty-four able men, and all the necessary provisions for so long and dangerous a voyage; the intent of which, however, was not openly declared, but given out to be for Alexandria, though all men suspected, and many knew, he intended for America. Thus equipped, on the fifteenth of November 1577, about three in the afternoon, he sailed from Plymouth, but a heavy storm taking him as soon as he was out of port, forced him, in a very bad condition, into Falmouth, to refit; which having expeditiously performed, he again put to sea the thirteenth of December following (n). On the twenty-fifth of the same month he fell in with the coast of Barbary, and, on the twenty-ninth, with Cape Verd; the thirteenth of March he passed the equinoctial, the fifth of April he made the coast of Brazil in 30° N. L. and entered the river De la Plata, where he lost the company of two of his ships; but meeting them again, and having taken out of them all the provisions they had on board, he turned them adrift. On the twenty-ninth of May he entered the port of St Julian's, where he did the least commendable action of his life, in executing Mr John Doughty, a man next in authority to himself; in which, however, he preserved a great appearance of justice (o) [D]. On the twentieth of August he entered the Streights of Magellan, on the twenty-fifth

[D] A great appearance of justice.] This is by much the most remarkable passage in the life of our hero in reference to his moral character, and for which, as we shall see, he has been very severely censured. We will first state the matter of fact briefly and plainly, then mention the surmises which have been raised thereupon; and lastly, shew the reader what has been, or may be, alledged in his justification, which we take to be the true course of rendering works of this kind useful; since in other books, the actions of great men are seen only in particular lights, according as the author's subject, or sometimes his humour, inclines him to place them; but the business of a Biographer, is from the relation of facts, to shew what the man of whom he is speaking really was. Let us proceed then in the present case to the business.

On the 18th of June, Captain Drake arrived with his small fleet at Port St Julian, which lies within one degree of the Streights of Magellan, where he continued about two months, during which time he made the necessary provision for passing the Streights with safety (11). Here it was, that, on a sudden, having carried the principal persons engaged in the service to a desert island lying in the bay, he called a kind of Council of War, or rather Court Martial, where he exposed his commission, by which the Queen granted him the power of life and death, which was delivered him with this remarkable expression from her own mouth: We do account that he, Drake, who strikes at thee, does strike at us. He then laid open with great eloquence, for tho' his education was but indifferent he had a wonderful power of speech, the cause of this assembly, he proceeded next to charge Mr John Doughty, who had been second in command during the whole voyage, when Drake was present, and first in his absence, with plotting the destruction of the undertaking, and the murder of his person. He said, he had the first notice of this gentleman's bad intentions before he left England, but that he was in hopes his behaviour towards him would have extinguished such dispositions, if there had been any truth in the information: he then appealed for his behaviour to the whole assembly, and to the gentleman accused; he next exposed his practices from the time they left England, while he lived towards him with all the kindness and cordiality of a brother, which charge he supported by producing papers under his own hand, to which Mr Doughty added a full and free confession; after this the captain, or as in the language of those times, he is called, the General, quitted the place, telling the assembly he expected that they should pass a verdict upon him, for he would be no judge in his own cause. Camden, as the reader will see, says, that he tried him by a jury, but other accounts affirm, that the whole forty persons of which the court was composed, adjudged him to death, and gave this in writing under their hands and seals, leaving the time and manner of it to the General. Mr Doughty himself said, that he desired rather to die by the hands of justice than to be his own executioner. Upon this, Captain Drake having maturely weighed the whole matter, presented three points to Mr Doughty's choice. First, to be executed upon the island where they were, next to be set a shore on the main land, or, lastly, to be sent home to abide the justice of his country. He desired he might have till the next day to consider of these, which was allowed him, and then giving his reasons for rejecting the two last, he declared that he made the first his choice, and having received the sacrament with the General, from the hands of Mr Francis Fletcher, Chaplain to the Fleet, and made a full confession; his head was cut off with an ax, by the Provost Marshal, July 2d 1578. It is very remarkable, that this island had been the scene of another affair precisely of the same nature, fifty-eight years before, when Magellan caused John de Carthagena, who was joined in commission with him by the King of Spain, to be hanged for the like offence, and from hence it was called the Island of true Justice (12).

As to the imputations which this matter brought upon Drake, we will first cite what Camden says of this transaction (13). 'On the 26th of April entering into the mouth of the River of Plate, he saw an infinite number of sea calves. From thence sailing into the haven of St Julian, he found a gibbet set up as is thought by Magellan for the punishment of certain mutineers. In this very place, John Doughty, an industrious and stout man, and the next unto Drake, was called to his trial for raising a mutiny in the fleet, found guilty by twelve men after the English manner, and condemned to death, which he suffered undauntedly, being beheaded, having first received the Holy Communion with Drake. And indeed, the most impartial persons in the fleet were of opinion that he had acted seditiously, and that Drake cut him off as an emulator of his glory, and one that regarded not so much, who he himself excelled in commendations for sea matters, as who he thought might equal him. Yet wanted there not some who pretending to understand things better than others, gave out that Drake had, in charge from Leicester to take off Doughty upon any pretence whatever, because he had reported that the Earl of Essex was made away by the cunning practices of that Earl.' We find this matter touched in several other books, and particularly in two, which were written on purpose to expose the Earl of Leicester, and perhaps deserving the less credit for that reason (14).

It may be offered in defence of Sir Francis Drake, that this man was openly put to death, after as fair a trial as the circumstances of time and place would permit; that he submitted patiently to his sentence, and received the sacrament with Drake, whom he embraced immediately before his execution. Besides these, there are two points which deserve particular consideration.

fifth of September he passed them, having then only his own ship, which, in the South-Seas, he new named the Hind; on the twenty-fifth of November he came to Machao, in the latitude of thirty degrees, where he had appointed a rendezvous in case his ships separated: but Captain Winter having repassed the Streights, was returned to England. Thence he continued his voyage along the coasts of Chili and Peru, taking all opportunities of seizing Spanish ships, or of landing, and attacking them on shore, till his crew were sated with plunder, and then coasting North America, to the height of forty-eight degrees, he endeavoured to find a passage back into our seas on that side, which is the strongest proof of his consummate skill, and invincible courage; for, if ever such a passage be found to the northward, this, in all probability, will be the method; and we can scarce conceive a clearer testimony of an undaunted spirit, than attempting discoveries after so long, so hazardous, and so fatiguing a voyage (p). Here, being disappointed of what he sought, he landed, and called the country New Albion, taking possession of it in the name, and for the use, of Queen Elizabeth; and, having careened his ship, set sail from thence on the twenty-ninth of September 1579, for the Moluccas. The reason of Captain Drake's chusing this passage round, rather than returning by, the Streights of Magellan, was, partly, the danger of being attacked at a great disadvantage by the Spaniards, partly the lateness of the season, whence dangerous storms and hurricanes were to be apprehended (q). Perhaps too he gave out amongst his seamen, that he was deterred by the confident, though false, report of the Spaniards, that the Streights could not be repassed [E]. On the thirteenth of October he fell in with certain islands, inhabited by the most barbarous people he had met with in all his voyage. On the fourth of November he had sight of the Moluccas, and coming to Ternate, was extremely well received by the King thereof, who appears, from the most authentick relations of this voyage, to have been a wise and polite Prince. On the tenth of December he made Celebes, where his ship unfortunately ran on a rock the ninth of January following, whence beyond all expectation, and in a manner miraculously, they got off, and continued their course.

First, that in such expeditions, strict discipline and legal severity are often absolutely necessary. Secondly, that as to the Earl of Essex, for whose death Doughty had expressed concern, he was Drake's first patron, and it is therefore very improbable he should destroy a man for endeavouring to detect his murder. We may add to all this, if liberty may be indulged to conjectures, that this man presuming upon the Earl of Leicester's favour, (who very probably imposed him upon Drake to be rid of him) was from thence encouraged to form designs against Drake, and this might also be the reason which hindered him from inclining to an absolute pardon, as doubting whether it was possible to trust one who had so far abused his confidence already, and whose known interest with so great a man, might always enable him to find instruments, in case he was wicked enough to enter upon fresh intrigues. All this however, is submitted entirely to the reader's judgment; since it is our design only to furnish proper lights from the intelligence which has come to our hands, but by no means to aim at imposing our sense of things upon the publick.

[E] That the Streights could not be repassed] In spreading this report, the Spaniards certainly acted very wisely, for it intimidated even the boldest navigators of other nations from attempting this passage, from an apprehension, that when they were once in those seas, they should never get out again, but either fall into the hands of the Spaniards from whom they could hope no mercy, or perish by famine before they could possibly reach the East-Indies (15). It is very evident from Captain Drake's conduct, for we have no other way left of coming at his sentiments, that he had maturely weighed all these things before he left England. He carried five ships with him to Port St Julian, that the people might be more at their ease, and have greater plenty of provisions; but when he came thither he broke up two of them, that there might be less danger of separating in strange seas, which though it failed him, was nevertheless a just precaution. In the next place it appears, that he had formed a design of returning by a new passage, which tho' often attempted on the other side, no Englishman could ever have thought to have tried in this manner, because till he opened the way, none had the least notion of entering these seas. Lastly, he had taken great care to visitual himself properly, that if this design failed, as it did, he might be in a condition to follow the example of Magellan. In order to encourage his people to this, he seemed to give credit to the opinion propagated by the Spaniards, of the great danger in repassing the Streights of Magellan, which however, were actually repassed by Captain John Winter, though Drake and his company could know nothing of this at that time. But that Captain Drake could not apprehend any impossibility in the thing itself, we may be assured from hence, that in this very voyage he had not only passed the streights, but had also been driven back again, not through the streights indeed, but in the open sea, of which we have a very distinct account given us from his own mouth, by his relation Sir Richard Hawkins, which is very curious, and well deserves the reader's notice (16): 'In all the Streights it ebbeth and floweth more or less, and in many places it riseth very little, but in some Bays where are great in-draughts, it rises eight or ten feet, and doubtless farther in more. If a man be furnished with wood and water and the wind good, he may keep the main sea, and go round about the Streights to the southwards, and it is the shorter way; for besides the experience which we made, that all the south part of the Streights is but islands, many times having the sea open. I remember that Sir Francis Drake told me, that having shot the Streights, a storm took him first at North-West, and afterwards vered about to the South-West, which continued with him many days with that extremity, that he could not open any sail, and that at the end of the storm he found himself in fifty degrees, which was sufficient testimony and proof that he was beaten round about the Streights, for the least height of the Streights is in fifty two degrees and fifty minutes, in which stand the two entrances or mouths. And moreover, he said, that standing about when the wind changed, he was not wellable to double the southermost island, and so anchored under the lee of it; and going ashore, carried a compass with him, and seeking out the southermost part of the island, cast himself down upon the uttermost point groveling, and so reached out his body over it. Soon after he embarked, where he acquainted his people that he had been upon the southermost known land in the world, and further to the southward upon it than any of them, or any man as yet known. These testimonies may suffice for this truth unto all, but such as are incredulous, and will believe nothing but what they see; for my part, I am of opinion, that the Streight is navigable all the year long, although the best time be in November, December, and January, and then the winds are more favourable, which at other times are variable as in all narrow seas.'

course. On the sixteenth of March he arrived at Java Major, thence he intended to have proceeded for Malacca, but found himself obliged to alter his purpose, and think of returning directly home (r). On the twenty-fifth of March 1580, he put this design in execution; and, on the fifteenth of June, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope, having then on board his ship fifty-seven men, and but three casks of water. On the twelfth of July he passed the Line, reached the coast of Guinea on the sixteenth, and there watered. On the 11th of September he made the island of Tercera, and, on the 3d day of November, the same year, entered the harbour of Plymouth. In this voyage he completely sur- rounded the globe, which no Commander in Chief had done before (s) [F]. His success in the voyage, and the immense mass of wealth he brought home, raised much discourse throughout the kingdom, some highly commending, and some as loudly decrying him. The former alledged, that his exploit was not only honourable to himself, but to his country; that it would establish our reputation for maritime skill in foreign nations, and raise a useful spirit of emulation at home; and that as to the money, our Merchants having suffered deeply from the faithless practices of the Spaniards, there was nothing more just than that the nation should receive the benefit of Drake's reprisals. The other party alledged, that, in fact, he was no better than a pyrate; that, of all others, it least became a trading nation to encourage such practices; that it was not only a direct breach of all our late treaties with Spain, but likewise of our old leagues with the house of Burgundy; and that the consequences would be much more fatal than the benefits reaped from it could be advantageous. Things continued in this uncertainty during the remainder of the year 1580, and the spring of the succeeding year. At length they took a better turn; for, on the fourth of April 1581, her Majesty going to Deptford in Kent, went on board Capt. Drake's ship, where after dinner she conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and declared her absolute approbation of all that he had done, to the confusion of his enemies, and to the great joy of his friends (t). She likewise gave directions for the preservation of his ship, that it might remain a monument of his own and his country's glory. In process of time the vessel decaying, it was broken up, but a chair, made of the planks, was presented to the University of Oxford, and is still preserved (u) [G]. In 1585 he failed

The first into whose thoughts the possibility of this entered, was the celebrated Christopher Columbus, whose knowledge in the art of navigation, when one considers the defects in Philosophy and Astronomy in his time, appears perfectly amazing (17). Sir John Cabot, father to Sebastian Cabot, who was contemporary with Columbus, comprehended his principles perfectly, which induced him to propose to our King Henry the Seventh, the finding a North-West Passage. Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese by birth, offered his service to the Crown of Spain, and proposed searching for a passage to the South, which was accepted. He sailed from St Lucar, September the twentieth, 1519, he found and passed the Streights, which bear his name the next year, but in his return was killed in the East-Indies. His ship came back safe to Spain, and as this was the first, so it was the only example that Captain Drake had to encourage him in his design; and to balance this, there were a multitude of unfortunate attempts afterwards. In 1527, the Spaniards sent Garcia de Loaisa, a Knight of Malta, with a squadron of seven ships to follow the route of Magellan. He passed the Streights indeed, lost some of his ships in the South-Seas, others put into the Ports of New Spain, and only his vessel and another reached the East-Indies, where himself and all his people perished. Another squadron of seven ships fitted out by the Bishop of Placentia, had no better fortune; for having reached the South-Seas, they were so discouraged, that they proceeded no further. In 1526, the Genoese sent two ships to pass these Streights, of which, one was cast away, and the other returned home without effecting any thing. Sebastian Cabot, in the service of the crown of Portugal, made the like trial, but not being able to find the Streights, returned into the River of Plate. Americus Vesputius, from whom the new world received its name, undertook to perform in the service of the Crown of Portugal, what Cabot had promised, but this vain man was still more unlucky, for he could not find either the Streights, or the River of Plate. Some years after, the Spaniards equipped a stout squadron under the command of Simon de Alcafara, but before they reached the height of the Streights, the sailors mutinied, and obliged their commander to return (18). Such repeated misfortunes discouraged even the ablest and boldest seaman, so that from this time, both Spaniards and strangers dropped all thoughts of emulating Magellan, and highly probable it is, that if Captain Drake had fully disclosed his design, he had not been more fortunate than the rest. His courage therefore may well be admired, who durst endeavour an enterprize, the declaring of which had infallibly destroyed it; his sagacity in navigating seas, wholly unknown, as well in his return, as in his going out, for not a man on board his ship had ever seen the Cape of Good Hope, can hardly be enough admired. His intrepidity in sailing so far to the North, in hopes of coming that way home was very surprizing, and the methods he took through all the voyage, to keep his people steady, in full spirits, and for the most part in good health, must give us a very high idea of his capacity; and therefore, we need not at all wonder that upon his coming to England, his fame rose to such a height, as to provoke envy as well as praise.

[G] And is still preserved. It is observed by Mr Camden, that when the Queen went to dine on board the Golden Hind, there was such a concourse of people, that the wooden bridge over which they passed broke, and upwards of an hundred persons fell into the river, by which accident, however, there was nobody hurt, as if, says he, that ship had been built under some lucky constellation. Upon this occasion, the following verses made by the scholars of Winchester College, were nailed to the mainmast (19).

failed again to the West-Indies, having under his command Captain Christopher Carlisle, Captain Martin Frobisher, Captain Francis Knollys, and many other Officers of great reputation. In that expedition he took the cities of St Jago, St Domingo, Carthagena, and St Augustin, exceeding even the expectation of his friends, and the hopes of the common people, though both were sanguine to the last degree (w). Yet the profits of this expedition were but moderate, the design of Sir Francis being rather to weaken the enemy than to enrich himself (x). In 1587 he proceeded to Lisbon with a fleet of thirty sail, and having intelligence of a great fleet assembled in the Bay of Cadiz, which was to have made part of the Armada, he, with great courage, entered that port, and burnt there upwards of ten thousand ton of shipping; and, after having performed all the service that the State could expect, he resolved to do his utmost to content the Merchants of London, who had contributed, by a voluntary subscription, to the fitting out of his fleet. With this view, having intelligence of a large carrack expected at Tercera from the East-Indies, thither he sailed; and though his men were severely pinched for want of victuals, yet, by fair words, and large promises, he prevailed upon them to endure these hardships for a few days; within this space the East-India ship arrived, which he took, and carried home in triumph; so that throughout the whole war there was no expedition so happily conducted as this, with respect to reputation or profit (y); and therefore we need not wonder, that, upon his return, the mighty applause he received might render him somewhat elate, as his enemies report it did; but certain it is, that no man's pride had ever a happier turn, since it always vented itself in service to the publick [H]. Thus, at this time, he undertook to bring water into the town of Plymouth, through the want of which, till then, it had been grievously distressed; and he performed it by conducting thither a stream from springs at eight miles distance, that is to say, in a strait line; for in the manner by which he brought it, the course it runs is upwards of twenty miles (z). In 1588 Sir Francis Drake was appointed Vice-Admiral under Charles Lord Howard of Effingham, High Admiral of England: here his fortune favoured him as remarkably as ever, for he made prize of a very large galleon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, who yielded on the bare mention of his name. In this vessel fifty thousand ducats were distributed among the seamen and soldiers, which preserved that love they had always borne to their valiant Commander. It must not, however, be dissembled, that,

[H] Since it always vented itself in service to the publick.] It must be observed, that though in his voyage round the world, our gallant seaman had the Queen's commission, yet he had not the honour to command any of the Queen's ships. But in the expedition of 1585, Sir Francis Drake went on board one Man of War, and his Vice-Admiral, Frobisher, was in another (21). In this last enterprize, in 1587, he had four of the Queen's ships, and twenty six sail of several sizes fitted out by the Merchants of London; so that if we consider the expectations which his former successes had raised, his having now several interests to serve, and those in a manner opposite to each other, one cannot but admit, that this fortune was very singular, as well as his conduct great, that could give full satisfaction to all. Yet this he did in so high a degree, that Sir William Monson confesses in his naval tracts, envy herself knew not what to object, either to the management, or the issue of this voyage (22). If therefore Sir Francis Drake bore his head a little higher upon his return, it was highly pardonable, and all that we find objected to him, is no more than this, that in the soldier like language of that time, he very merrily called this, burning the King of Spain's beard (23). This expression was indeed blunt and coarse enough, and yet there is something in it expressive; it is on all hands allowed that he did infinite mischief, and retarded thereby the coming of the Armada for a whole year.

The same learned author in another famous work of his (*), takes notice of a circumstance very extraordinary in relation to this celebrated ship, which is so strange in itself, that we should have passed it by in a writer of less credit; but what Camden thought fit to record of things happening in his own time, it might be justly thought a fault in us to omit. Speaking of the Shire of Buchan in Scotland, he says: 'It is hardly worth while to mention the Clayks, a sort of Geefe, which are believed by some with great admiration, to grow upon trees on this coast, and in other places, and when they are ripe to fall down into the sea, because neither their nests nor eggs can any where be found. But they who saw the ship in which Sir Francis Drake sailed round the world, when it was laid up in the river Thames, could testify that little birds bred in the old rotten keels of ships, since a great number of such, without life and feathers, stuck close to the out-side of the keel of that ship. Yet I should think that the generation of these birds, was not from the logs of wood, but from the sea, termed by the poets, the Parent of all things.' But to proceed in our narration. Time that destroys all things, having made great breaches in this ship, which for many years had been contemplated with just admiration at Deptford, it was at length broke up, and a chair made out of the planks was, by John Davies, Esq; presented to the University of Oxford, upon which the famous Abraham Cowley made the following epigram, that neither the hero nor his vessel might want the assistance of the Muses to render them immortal (20):

through an oversight of his, the Admiral ran the utmost hazard of being taken by the enemy; for Drake being appointed, the first night of the engagement, to carry lights for the direction of the English fleet, he, being in full pursuit of some hulks belonging to the Hanse towns, neglected it, which occasioned the Admiral's following the Spanish lights, and remaining almost in the centre of their fleet till morning. However, his succeeding services sufficiently effaced the memory of this mistake, the greatest execution done on the flying Spaniards being performed by the squadron under his command (a) [I]. The next year he commanded as Admiral at sea the fleet sent to restore Don Antonio King of Portugal, the command of the land-forces being given to Sir John Norris. They were hardly got out to sea before the Commanders differed, though it is on all hands agreed, that there never was an Admiral better disposed with respect to soldiers, than Sir Francis Drake.

[I] Being performed by the squadron under his command. We will begin this note with observing, that a little before this formidable Spanish armament put to sea, the Ambassador of his Catholick Majesty had the confidence to propound to Queen Elizabeth, in Latin verse, the terms upon which she might hope for peace; which, with an English translation by the facetious Dr Fuller (24), we will present to the view of the reader, the rather, because it appears that Drake's expeditions to the West-Indies makes a part of this message. The verses are these:

Te veto ne pergas bello defendere Belgas :
Quæ Dracus eripuit nunc restituentur oportet :
Quas pater evertit jubeo te condere cellas :
Religio Papæ fac restituetur ad unguem.

In English.

*These to you are our commands,
Send no help to the Netherlands ;
Of the treasure took by Drake, Restitution you must make ;
And those abbies build anew
Which your father overthrew.
If for any peace you hope,
In all points restore the Pope.*

Ad Græcas, bone Rex, sient mandata calendas.
Worthy King, know this your will,
At Latter Lammas we'll fulfil.

There is a letter still preserved by Strype, written by Sir Francis Drake to the Lord High-Treasurer Burleigh, dated June 6, 1588, wherein he acquaints him, that the Spaniards were approaching, and that though their strength outwent report, yet the cheerfulness and courage which the Lord Admiral expressed, gave all who had the honour to serve under him assurance of victory. This compliment, which sure was very well turned, proved also a prophecy, which Sir Francis had his share in fulfilling (25). On the twenty-second of July, Sir Francis observing a great Spanish ship, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, who was reputed the projector of this invasion, floating at a distance from both fleets, sent his pinnace to summon those who were on board to yield; Valdez, to maintain his credit and pretence to valour, returned, that they were four hundred and fifty strong, that he himself was Don Pedro, and stood much upon his honour, and thereupon propounded several conditions upon which he was willing to yield: but the Vice-Admiral replied that he had no leisure to parley, but if he thought fit instantly to yield he might, if not he should soon find that Drake was no coward. Pedro hearing it was Drake, whose name was so terrible to the Spaniards, presently yielded, and, with forty-six of his attendants, came aboard Sir Francis's ship, where, giving him the solemn Spanish congee, he protested, 'that they were all resolved to have died fighting, had they not fallen into his hands, whose felicity and valour was so great, that Mars the god of war, and Neptune the god of the sea, seemed to wait upon all his attempts, and whose noble and generous carriage toward the vanquished, had been oft experienced by his foes.' Sir Francis, to requite these Spanish complements with real English kindness, set him at his own table, and lodged him in his own cabbin, sending the rest of his company to Plymouth. Drake's soldiers were well recompensed with the plunder of this ship, wherein they found fifty-five thousand ducats of gold, which they joyfully shared amongst them (26). This Don Pedro Valdez remained above two years Sir Francis Drake's prisoner in England, and, when he was released, paid him for his own and his two Captains liberties, a ransom of three thousand five hundred pounds (27). The Spaniards, notwithstanding their loss was so great, and their defeat so notorious, took great pains to propagate false stories, which in some places gained so much credit as to hide their shame. This provoked all good Englishmen, and, amongst them, none more than Sir Francis Drake, who, to shew that he could upon occasion draw his pen as well as his sword, vouchsafed this refutation of their romances (28): 'They were not ashamed to publish in sundry languages in print, great victories in words: which they pretended to have obtained against this realm, and spread the same in a most false sort over all parts of France, Italy, and elsewhere; when, shortly after, it was happily manifested in very deed to all nations, how their navy, which they termed invincible, consisting of one hundred and forty sail of ships, not only of their own kingdom, but strengthened with the greatest argosies, Portugal carracks, florentines, and large hulks of other countries, were by thirty of her Majesty's own ships of war, and a few of our own merchants, by the wise, valiant, and advantageous conduct of the Lord Charles Howard, High-Admiral of England, beaten and shuffled together even from the Lizard in Cornwall, first to Portland, where they shamefully left Don Pedro de Valdes with his mighty ship; from Portland to Calais, where they lost Hugh de Moncado, with the gallies of which he was Captain; and from Calais driven with squibs from their anchors, were chased out of the sight of England, round about Scotland and Ireland. Where, for the sympathy of their religion, hoping to find succour and assistance, a great part of them were crushed against the rocks, and those other that landed, being very many in number, were, notwithstanding, broken, slain, and taken. And so sent from village to village, coupled in halsters, to be shipped into England, where her Majesty, of her princely and invincible disposition, disdaining to put them to death, and scorning either to retain or entertain them, they were all sent back again to their countries, to witness and recount the worthy achievement of their invincible and dreadful navy. Of which the number of soldiers, the fearful burthen of their ships, the commanders names of every squadron, with all other their magazines of provisions, were put in print, as an army and navy irresistible and disdaining prevention; with all which their great terrible ostentation, they did not in all their sailing round about England so much as sink or take one ship, bark, pinnace, or cock boat, of ours, or ever burnt so much as one sheepcote on this land.' If the knowledge of a writer, with respect to the subject which employs his pen, ought to render his relation more credible; or if the quality of an author can add any weight to his productions, this will not fail of being esteemed as well as believed. To speak the truth plainly, there is not perhaps in our own or in any other language, within so narrow a compass, so full, so perspicuous, and so spirited a relation of a transaction, glorious as this was, extant in any History. Indeed, what wonder, if the defeat of the Spaniards be as finely painted by the pen, as it was gallantly achieved by the sword, of Sir Francis Drake!

Drake. The ground of their difference was this; the General was bent on landing at the Groyne, whereas Sir Francis, and the sea-officers, were for sailing to Lisbon directly, in which, if their advice had been taken, without question, their enterprize had succeeded, and Don Antonio been restored. For it afterwards appeared, on their invading Portugal, that the enemy had made use of the time they gave them to so good purpose, that it was not possible to make any impression. Sir John Norris, indeed, marched by land to Lisbon, and Sir Francis Drake very imprudently promised to sail up the river with his whole fleet; but when he saw the consequences which would have attended the keeping his word, he chose rather to break his promise, than to hazard the Queen's navy; for which he was grievously reproached by Norris, and the miscarriage of the whole affair was imputed to his failure in performing what he had undertaken; yet Sir Francis fully justified himself on his return, for he made it manifest to the Queen and Council, that all the service that was done was performed by him, and his sailing up the river of Lisbon would have signified nothing to the taking the castle, which was two miles off, and that without reducing it there was no taking the town (b) [K]. The war with Spain still continuing, and it being evident that nothing galled the enemy so much as the losses they met with in the Indies, a proposition was made to the Queen by Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake, the most experienced seamen in her kingdom, for undertaking a more effectual expedition into those parts, than had hitherto been made through the whole course of that war; and, at the same time, they offered to be at a great part of the expence themselves, and to engage their friends to bear a considerable proportion of the rest (c). The Queen readily gave ear to this motion, and furnished, on her part, a stout squadron of men of war, on board one of which, the Garland, Sir John Hawkins embarked. Their whole force consisted of twenty-seven ships and barks, and on board them were about two thousand five hundred men. Of all the enterprizes throughout the war, there was none of which so great hope was conceived as of this, and yet none succeeded worse. The fleet was detained, for some time after it was ready, on the English coast, by the arts of the Spaniards, who, having intelligence of its strength, and of the ends for which it was intended, they conceived, that the only means whereby it might be disappointed was by procuring some delay; in order to which they gave out, that they were ready themselves to invade England; and, to render this the more probable, they actually sent four galleys to make a descent on Cornwall (d). By these steps they carried their point; for the Queen and the nation being alarmed, it was by no means held proper to send so great a number of stout ships on so long a voyage, at so critical a juncture. At last this storm blowing over, the fleet sailed from Plymouth on the twenty-eighth of August, in order to execute their grand design of burning Nombre de Dios, marching thence by land to Panama, and there seizing the treasure which they knew was arrived from Peru. A few days before their departure, the Queen sent them advice, that the plate fleet was safely arrived in Spain, excepting only one galleon, which, having lost a mast, had been obliged to return to Porto Rico. The taking of this vessel she recommended to them as a thing very practicable, and which could prove no great hindrance to their other affair. When they were at sea the Generals differed, as is usual in conjunct expeditions. Sir John Hawkins was for executing immediately what the Queen had commanded, whereas Sir Francis Drake inclined to go first to the Canaries, being pressed thereto by Sir Thomas Baskerville, in which he prevailed; but the attempt they made was unsuccessful, and then they sailed for Dominica, where they spent too much time in refreshing themselves, and setting up their pinnaces. In the mean time the Spaniards had sent five stout frigates to bring away the galleon from Porto Rico, having exact intelligence of the intention of the English Admirals to attempt that place. On the thirtieth of October Sir John Hawkins weighed

[K] There was no taking the town.] Before this expedition, all difficulties, however great, were seen to bend before the fortune of Sir Francis Drake; but whether it was the strange division of command, for there were two Generals in Chief declared, and a third who expected to command them, though without a commission. Whether they were deceived in the furnishing the fleet, which would not have been the case if the sole management had been committed to Sir Francis Drake, or whether their hopes failed them in Portugal, so it was, that, with respect to the great end of their expedition, they miscarried; and as they carried Don Antonio out with strong hopes of leaving him a King, so, when they brought him home, he left all his hopes behind (29). In most of our Histories many aspersions are thrown upon Sir Francis Drake, and Sir William Monson very impartially professes, that he cannot excuse his breaking his promise to Sir John Norris, though he allows the thing was impracticable. Now, though the breaking a promise be a bad thing, one might be tempted to think, that not being able to keep it is a pretty tolerable excuse; the Queen and her Council understood it so, for Sir

Francis alledged, and it could not be denied, that the very time they spent at the Groyne, the Spaniards employed in fortifying Lisbon, which was the reason he opposed that measure (30). He shewed, that whatever was done there or elsewhere for the credit of the nation, was performed solely by the fleet and by his orders, in consequence of which a large fleet, laden with naval stores from the Hanse Towns, was taken, and a great quantity of ammunition and artillery. He farther shewed, that, had it not been for the fleet, the army must have been starved; and that, if they had stayed any longer, neither fleet nor army could have returned home; all which distresses arose from their not going about their principal business at first, which was what he advised; but when he found he could not prevail upon some men to manage their own affairs right, he contented himself with managing, as well as he could, those that were immediately within his own province, and with respect to these, even the censurers of this expedition admit, that nobody could have managed them better. Happy for Sir Francis Drake, if, upon his receiving this first check at play, he had withdrawn his stake.

weighed from Dominica, and, in the evening of the same day, the Francis, a bark of about thirty-five tons, and the sternmost of Sir John's ships, fell in with the five sail of Spanish frigates before-mentioned, and was taken; the consequences of which being foreseen by Sir John, it threw him into a fit of sickness, of which, or rather of a broken heart, he died on the twelfth of November 1595 (e). At this time they were before Porto Rico, and the very same evening Sir John Hawkins died, while the great officers were at supper together, a cannon shot from the fort pierced the cabin, killed Sir Nicholas Clifford, wounded Captain Stratford, and mortally wounded Mr Brute Browne, striking the stool from under Sir Francis Drake, who was drinking, without doing him any hurt at all. The next day, November 13th, 1595, the General, pursuant to the resolution of a Council of War, made a desperate attack on the shipping in the harbour of Porto Rico, which was attended with great loss to the Spaniards, yet with very little advantage to the English, who meeting with a more resolute resistance, and much better fortifications, than they expected, were obliged to sheer off. The Admiral then steered for the main, where he took the town of Rio de la Hacha, which he burnt to the ground, a church, and a single house belonging to a Lady, only excepted. After this he destroyed some other villages, and then proceeded to Santa Martha, which he likewise burned. The like fate had the famous town of Nombre de Dios, the Spaniards refusing to ransom any of these places, and the booty taken in them being very inconsiderable. On the twenty-ninth of December Sir Thomas Baskerville marched, with seven hundred and fifty men, towards Panama, but returned on the second of January, finding the design of reducing that place to be wholly impracticable. This disappointment made such an impression on the Admiral's mind, that it threw him into a lingering fever, attended with a flux, of which he died on the twenty-eighth of the same month, about four in the morning; though Sir William Monson hints, that there were great doubts whether it was barely his sickness killed him [L]. Such was the end of this great man, when he had lived

[L] Whether it was barely his sickness that killed him. In the text we have stated the facts according to the lights given us, and, from the authorities of the best writers in those times, we will in this note endeavour to clear up some passages that might otherwise seem obscure, and by doing this we shall, in some measure, enable the reader to form a just notion as to his death. Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins were, without doubt, two of the most experienced officers, that those stirring times, and that glorious reign, had bred. Each of them had his reasons for undertaking that expedition, and both of them acted from motives of honour; they knew well the situation of the countries which were to be the scene of their actions, and the plan they laid was equally worthy of the great experience they had, and the high reputation raised thereby. In few words, their aim was to plunder and destroy Nombre de Dios, to force a passage through the Isthmus, and then to make themselves masters of Panama, which done, they were to act as circumstances should direct (31). The preparations made for their voyage, chiefly at the expense of the Generals, were such as could not be concealed: the Spaniards, being apprized of these, alarmed England, and thereby gained time to send advice into America. When, after many months delay, the Queen allowed them to proceed, she charged him with another project, which was attacking Porto Rico, where, according to her information (and it was true) the whole cargo of a rich galleon was deposited (32). When they were at sea, Sir Thomas Baskerville started a third project, which was reducing one of the Canary Islands, to which Sir Francis Drake assented, as believing, that, whatever became of their expedition, the conquest of that island would be of very great importance to the nation (33). Their miscarriage in that was many ways detrimental, but chiefly through this which they did not foresee, that it gave time for the Court of Spain to send five frigates, with nine hundred regular troops on board, to St John de Porto Rico. Of this they had no suspicion, and therefore they spent more time than they needed to have done before they went thither, and the bark Francis being taken in their passage, Sir John Hawkins truly foresaw what afterwards happened, that the Spaniards, by the help of the reinforcement that squadron carried, would be too strong for them. The sad accident of his death, and of two principal Commanders desperately wounded the same evening, damped the spirits of the soldiers and seamen exceedingly. General Drake himself, when he took his leave of Mr Brown in order to go to the attack, could not help saying, Brute, Brute, (that was his Christian name) how heartily could I lament thy fate, but that I dare not let my spirits sink now (34). The several enterprises that followed, were to gratify other mens projects, but at last Sir Francis Drake returned to his first design, and made an attempt upon the Isthmus, but the Spaniards were too well provided, so that he plainly saw things went not with him as in former days. The whole of this expedition was a series of misfortunes, in which Providence made use of their own counsels to destroy them. If they had gone at first to Porto Rico, they had done the Queen's business and their own. If, when they had intelligence of the Spanish succours being landed there, they had proceeded directly to the Isthmus, in order to have executed their designs against Panama, before their forces had been weakened by that desperate attack, they might possibly have accomplished their first intention, but grasping too many things spoiled all. A very strong sense of this threw Sir Francis Drake into a melancholy, which occasioned a bloody-flux, the natural disease of the country that brought him to his end (35). His body, according to the custom of the sea, was sunk very near the place where he first laid the foundation of his fame and fortune. This appears to be a plain and probable relation of the end of this great man; if the reader has a mind to see it set in a stronger light, Mr Fuller shall afford him that satisfaction, which will be heightened by knowing that he wrote from the mouth of Henry Drake, Esq; who accompanied his cousin in that unfortunate expedition (36). 'Now began the discontent of Sir Francis to feed upon him. He conceived that expectation, a mercilefs usurer, computing each day since his departure, exacted an interest and return of honour and profit proportionable to his great preparations, and transcending his former achievements. He saw that all the good which he had done in this voyage, consisted in the evil he had done to the Spaniards afar off, whereof he could present but small visible fruits in England. These apprehensions accompanying, if not causing, the disease of the flux, wrought his sudden death; and sickness did not so much untie his clothes, as sorrow did rend at once the robe of his mortality asunder. He lived by the sea, died on it, and was buried in it. Thus, an extempore performance, scarce heard to be begun before we hear it is ended, comes off with better applause, or miscarries with less disgrace, than a long studied and openly premeditated action. Besides, we see how great spirits having mounted up to the highest pitch of performance, afterwards strain and break their credits in striving to go beyond it. Lastly, God oftentimes leaves lived fifty-five years (f), according to some, but according to our computation fifty-one (g), but his memory will survive as long as that world lasts which he first surrounded. His death was generally lamented by the whole nation, but more especially by his countrymen, who had great reasons to love him from the circumstances of his private life, as well as to esteem him in his publick character. He was elected Burgess for the town of Bossiney, alias Tintagal, in the county of Cornwall, in the Parliament held the twenty-seventh of Queen Elizabeth, and for the town of Plymouth in Devonshire, in the thirty-fifth of the same reign (b). It is indeed true, that he died without issue, but not that he lived and died a Bachelor, as several authors have written (i); for he left behind him a widow, Elizabeth (k), daughter and sole heiress of Sir George Sydenham, of Combe-Sydenham in the county of Devon, Knight, who afterwards married William Courteney, Esq; of Powderham-Castle in the same county. It was not the custom of those times to set up cenotaphs, at least for private persons, otherwise one might have expected some monument should have been erected to the memory of Sir Francis Drake. Indeed it was needless; for his picture was common not only here, but in all parts of Europe, insomuch, that a disturbance was occasioned at Rome by the imprudence of a famous Painter, who caused the head (l) of Sir Francis Drake to be hung up in a publick place, next to that of his Catholick Majesty. Hitherto we have spoken of his publick actions, let us now, as we have ample and excellent materials, discourse somewhat of his person and character. He was low of stature but well set, had a broad open chest, a very round head, his hair of a fine brown, his beard full and comely, his eyes large and clear, of a fair complexion, with a fresh, chearful, and very engaging countenance (m). As Navigation had been his whole study, so he understood it thoroughly, and was a perfect master in every branch, especially in Astronomy, and in the application thereof to the Nautick Art. As all men have enemies, and all eminent men abundance of them, we need not wonder that Sir Francis Drake, who performed so many great things, should have as much ill spoken of him as of any man of the age in which he lived. Those who disliked him alledged, that he was a man of low birth, haughty in his temper, ostentatious, self-sufficient, an immoderate speaker, and, though indisputably a good Seaman, no great General; in proof of which they took notice of his neglecting to furnish his fleet thoroughly in 1585, his not keeping either St Domingo or Carthagenia, after he had taken them, the slender provision he made in his expedition to Portugal, his breaking his word to Sir John Norris, and the errors he committed in his last undertaking (n). In excuse of these it is said, that the glory of what he did might very well remove the imputation of his mean descent; what was thought haughtiness in him, might be no more than a just concern for the support of his authority, his display of his great services, a thing incident to his profession, and his love of speaking qualified by his wisdom and eloquence, which hindered him from ever dropping a weak or an ungraceful expression. In equipping his fleet, he was not so much in fault as those whom he trusted; sickness hindered his keeping the places he took in the West-Indies; his counsels were continually crossed by the land-officers in his voyage to Portugal; and, as to his last attempt, the Spaniards were certainly well acquainted with his design, at least as soon as he left England, if not before. His voyage round the world, however, remains an incontestible proof of his courage, capacity, patience, quick-sightedness, and publick spirit, since therein he did every thing that could be expected from a man, who preferred the honour and profit of his country to his own reputation, or private gain (o) [M]. It was the felicity of our Admiral to live under the reign of a

(g) In the margin of Stowe's Annals he is said to have died at fifty five; but, from all the passages in that account of him, he appears to have been no older than we have reported him.

'leaves the brightest men in an eclipse, to shew, that they do but borrow their lustre from his reflection. We will not justify all the actions of any man, tho' of a tamer profession than a sea Captain, in whom civility is often counted preciseness. For the main, we say, that this our Captain was a religious man towards God, and his houses, generally speaking, churches, where he came chaff in his life, just in his dealings, true of his word, and merciful to those that were under him, hating nothing so much as idleness.'

[M] To his own reputation or private gain] The materials that I have collected from several writers in that age, and which are to be digested into this note, will, I hope, sufficiently justify what is advanced in the text, and shew, that if Sir Francis Drake amassed a large fortune to himself, by continually exposing himself to labours and perils which hardly any other man would have undergone, for the sake even of the greatest expectations, he was far from being governed by a narrow and private spirit; on the contrary, his notions were free and noble, and the nation stands indebted to his memory, for advantages, infinitely greater than are commonly imagined.

I. He was the great author of our navigation to the West-Indies; for though he was not the first that went thither, yet, after the severe check that Sir John Hawkins met with when Drake commanded the Judith, our seamen were much discouraged, and in all probability, would scarce have adventured upon any expeditions of that sort in haste, if he had not encouraged them by his two prosperous voyages. In these he acted with extraordinary caution, and was remarkably careful of the health and safety of his seamen, that he might beget in them not only a confidence in himself, but a thorough contempt of those vulgar fears, which represented voyages into that part of the world as so difficult and dangerous in many respects, besides that of falling into the hands of the Spaniards (37). In this he succeeded so well, that, in the space of a very few years, many small vessels, most of them commanded by persons bred under him, followed that course, and partly by trading, partly by privateering, brought great wealth into the nation, and accustomed the English mariners to traverse seas, and visit ports, to which, but for his vigilance and good fortune, they had remained much longer strangers (38). On this account, therefore, he may be considered, very justly, as the author of all our success in those parts; for tho' several famous seamen engaged afterwards in expeditions of the like nature, and began to think of making settlements also in those remote parts, yet it was but in consequence of the lights he gave them, and from that spirit of emulation which was raised by the extensive reputation he had acquired.

Princess, who never failed to distinguish merit, or to bestow her favours where she saw desert. Sir Francis Drake was always her favourite, and she gave a very lucky proof of it in respect to a quarrel he had with his countryman Sir Bernard Drake; whose arms Sir Francis had assumed, which so provoked the other, who was a seaman likewise; that he gave him a box on the ear. The Queen took up the quarrel, and gave Sir Francis a new coat, which is thus blazoned: Sable a fess wavy between two pale stars argent, and for his crest, a ship on a globe under ruff, held by a cable, with a hand out of the clouds, over it this motto, Auxilio divino, underneath, Sic parvis magna, in the rigging whereof is hung up by the heels a wivern, gules, which was the arms of Sir Bernard Drake (p). Her Majesty's kindness, however, did not extend beyond the grave; for she suffered his brother Thomas Drake, whom he made his heir, to be prosecuted for a pretended debt to the Crown, which much diminished the advantages he would otherwise have reaped from his brother's succession (q). This brother of his accompanied him in his last expedition, as his brother John, and his brother Joseph, had done in his first voyages to the West-Indies, where they both died; and both Thomas and John left children behind them, whereas Sir Francis, and nine of his other brethren, died without (r). As for the land estate which he had purchased, and which was very considerable, (for though, on proper occasions, he was extremely generous, yet he was also a great economist,) it came to his nephew and godson Francis Drake, son to his brother Thomas (s), who, by letters patents, dated August 2d, 1622, in the twentieth year of the reign of King James the First, was created a Baronet (t), and, in the beginning of the next reign, was returned one of the Knights of the Shire for the county of Devon (u). He was twice married; first to Jane, daughter of Sir Amias Bampfylde, of Poltimore in the same county, Knight, by whom he had a daughter that died an infant; and, secondly, to Joan, daughter of Sir William Strode, of Newman, Knight, by whom he had four sons (w). The eldest, Sir Francis Drake, Baronet, married Dorothy, the daughter of Mr Pyn, but dying without issue, the title devolved upon his nephew by his second brother Thomas, who became thereby Sir Francis Drake, Baronet, who frequently represented the town of Tavistock in Parliament (x). He was thrice married, but had no issue; but by his last wife, who was the daughter of Sir Henry Pollexfen, Knight, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, his son and successor by her was Sir Francis-Henry Drake, Baronet, who died January 26th, 1740, leaving issue by his wife, the sister of Sir William Heathcote, Baronet, three sons and two daughters (y). The eldest of these, Sir Francis-Henry Drake, Baronet, is the present representative of this family, and member in the present Parliament for Beerlston, in the county of Devon, who has still, in his possession, a Bible, with an inscription indented on the edges, signifying, that it made the tour of the world with Sir Francis Drake (z). There are many other relics preserved in the cabinets of the curious, in memory of this famous person; such as the staff made out of his ship before it was broke up, in that of Mr Thoresby at Leeds (a); and there is hardly any collection of English money, in which there are not pieces of Queen's Elizabeth's coin, supposed to be marked with a Drake, in honour of Sir Francis's voyage round the world, in the twenty-second year of her reign. I say, supposed, because some curious persons suggest, that this bird upon her coin is not a Drake but a Dove, and consider this tradition as a vulgar error (b). It may be so indeed, for any thing we know with certainty; as, on the other hand, it may not be so, for any thing that has been said to the contrary. Two things, however, are certain; one, that there are a variety of marks upon the

II. He was also the first that shewed his own nation, what, till then, no other nation had ever attempted, that it was practicable with a very small force to act against the Spaniards, both by sea and land, as this nation have acknowledged, and attribute to him all the troubles they afterwards met with from the French and Dutch, as well as from the English (39). In his expedition of 1572, he had but two ships, if they might be so called, one of seventy tons, commanded by himself, the other of twenty five tons, commanded by his brother John, and his whole force consisted but of seventy three men and boys. Yet after he was discovered, and known to be upon the coast, and to have committed hostilities, he had the courage to resolve upon remaining there, and to do his business with pinnaces, finding his ships too large, and therefore intending to destroy one, and convert the other into a store-ship; but knowing that his seamen would never consent to this, tho' the ships were his own, and the best part of his estate; he prevailed upon the carpenter of the lesser, to bore holes in the bottom of her in the night, without so much as communicating the design to his own brother who commanded her. This happy temerity was followed by as much success as he could wish, since he kept the Bay of Mexico for many months in a manner blocked up, and his fertility in inventing expedients to answer all purposes, and to provide against all dangers, excited that amazing spirit amongst the seamen of his time, that is scarce credible in ours (40). A spirit that rendered them so famous, as to occasion their being sought after, and employed by all nations, but more especially the French and Dutch, as might be shewn from numerous instances.

III. His genius was far from being confined to small undertakings, though necessity compelled it's first appearance in such; for when he undertook his voyage round the world, he not only framed the scheme in his own head, but kept it entirely within his own breast, bringing it out only by parts, as the execution required, and proposing nothing to be effected till he had made the necessary provisions for effecting it, tho' without any communication, by which he drew his people first into the South-Seas, thence to the East-Indies, and home by a route new to him and them, which he had never accomplished, if his intentions had been foreseen from the beginning (41). In 1585, he executed a great undertaking with a considerable force, having under him, Captain Frobisher, and other able seamen, with like conduct and courage, and with dreadful destruction to the enemy; so that there is very little reason to regret Sir Philip Sydney's not going that voyage with him, nor will any wise man believe implicitly on the credit of Sir Fulk Grevil, that Sir Francis Drake was less capable of performing any service in the coin of that Queen, and the other, that they were sometimes placed in commemoration of remarkable events; as for instance, the Belgick Lion very fairly impressed upon the Queen's breast, at the time when she took the United Provinces under her royal protection (c). It is, therefore, far from being impossible, and perhaps it is not carrying the thing too far, to say, that it is not altogether improbable, there may be some truth in this vulgar notion; for, that nothing of this is recorded in the histories of this reign, is no considerable objection, since we are satisfied, that many things of a like nature, the truth of which cannot be disputed, were nevertheless omitted, partly from the abundance of more weighty materials, and partly from the want of attention in our Historians to things of this nature, which would have left us in the dark as to many curious particulars, if their negligence had not excited a strong spirit of enquiry in the learned lovers of English History, who have lived in succeeding times, and whose industry has been repaid by a variety of useful, as well as entertaining discoveries.

America, than that excellent person (42), or that he left him behind, from a jealousy of his superior abilities.

IV. We are assured by Camden (43) and other writers, that Sir Francis Drake first brought tobacco into England, from whence a certain writer most unaccountably took it in his head, to conclude his life of Sir Francis Drake, with a violent invective against that plant, and an outrageous abuse upon all who take it (44). But men of milder tempers and clearer judgments will acknowledge, that Sir Francis was in this a very great benefactor to his country, since it will not be easy to name any one commodity, through which such vast advantages have accrued to this nation. It is true, that Sir Walter Raleigh is commonly entitled to this honour, but then it is grounded upon his bringing it into use, by his own practice and example. Yet in both of these truly great men, the good done to their country, was but accidental; for we cannot suppose that either of them could foresee what prodigious wealth the cultivation of tobacco would bring into Great-Britain, and yet this ought not to lessen, in the least, our gratitude or veneration towards their memories.

V. The last thing I have to say, and I say it upon the credit of Mr Camden, is, that he was the author of our trade to the East-Indies; for as that learned writer informs us, the books, papers, and charts, that were found in the East India ship, which he took in his return from his expedition to the coasts of Spain in 1587, gave those lights which encouraged the undertaking a trade to those parts, and produced an application to the Queen, for establishing our first East-India Company (45). These are facts that are certainly worth the knowing, remembering, and considering, that we may do proper justice to the character of this illustrious person, who, as from low and mean beginnings, he raised himself to move in a superior orb; so by his example, he encouraged and raised those English fleets that have since given law in the seas, which he visited with barks so small, that they would now be scarce thought capable of such a voyage. Let us conclude with a circumstance, which though not of so publick, is yet, not altogether of a private nature, and deserves to be remembered to the honour of this worthy person, and of Sir John Hawkins, who, in 1588, advised the establishment of the chest at Chatham, for the relief of seamen wounded in their country's service (46). They were indeed, both remarkable for bearing in mind that they had been (47) once seamen themselves, as long as they lived; and though they were very strict in maintaining discipline, yet they were so well obeyed from a principle of affection, that instances of severity were things to which they were very seldom constrained.

D R A K E (JAMES), a noted political writer and Physician in the end of the XVIIth and beginning of the XVIIIth, century, was born at Cambridge in the year 1667, and, by the care of an indulgent father, had a very liberal education. In 1684, he was admitted into the university wherein he was born; and soon distinguished himself not only in his college, but also in publick, by his quickness and ingenuity. Some time before the Revolution, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, after having performed his exercises with very great applause; and in process of time he commenced Master, with unusual honours paid him by men of the brightest parts in the university. He took a turn to London in the year 1693, where being soon made known, he was very much admired at all places frequented by ingenious men: and having a particular genius to the study of Physick, was encouraged in the pursuit of it by Sir Thomas Millington, and the most eminent members of the College of Physicians. In 1696 he took the degree of Doctor in that Faculty (a), and was soon after Fellow of the Royal Society, as likewise of the College of Physicians. But, whether through his own inclination, or that the narrowness of his fortune streightened him so as not to let him appear in a proper equipage; (without which a Physician is not duly regarded) he had been in London but a short time, before the Bookfellers laid hold of him: in whose service being listed as an author, he had the satisfaction to see whatever he did pass off very currently, and to meet with a favourable acceptance from the publick. In 1697, he contributed very much to the publication of a pamphlet, entituled, 'Commendatory Verses upon the Author of Prince Arthur, and King Arthur:' which was very well received. But the next book he published did not meet with the same favourable reception: I mean, 'The History of the last Parliament begun at Westminster the 10th day of February, in the 12th year of King William, A. D. 1700.' Lond. 1702, 8vo. For the House of Lords thinking, it reflected too severely on the memory of the late King William, they convened the author before them in May 1702 [A], and ordered him to be prosecuted by the Attorney-General; who brought

[A] They convened the author before them in May 1702. The passage that gave offence, was in the preface, and ran thus.—'And, perhaps, there was a third thing in prospect, of deeper reach than all these, which was, That should it have pleased God, for our sins, to have snatch'd from us the king on the brought him to a trial, in which he was acquitted the year following (b). In 1704, being disgusted at his disappointment of being made one of the Commissioners of the sick and wounded, as was promised him; and dissatisfied, at the rejecting of the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity, and the disgrace of some of his friends who were sticklers for it, he writ, in concert with Mr Poley Member of Parliament for Ipswich, 'The Memorial of the Church of England: Humbly offered to the Consideration of all true Lovers of our Church and Constitution.' Lond. 1704, 8vo. The Lord-Treasurer Godolphin, and other great officers of the Crown in the Whig interest, therein severely reflected upon, were so highly offended at the publication of it, that they represented it to Queen Anne, as an insult upon her Majesty's honour, and an intimation that the Church was in danger under her administration [B]. Accordingly, her Majesty took notice of it in her speech to the ensuing

'from the advantage of being at the helm, and the assistance of their rabble, to have put in practice their own schemes, and, To have given us a new model of government of their own projection; and so to have procured to themselves a lasting impunity, and to have mounted their own beast, the rabble, and driven the sober part of the nation, like cattle, before them. That this is no conjecture, will readily appear to any considering persons. from the Treatment her Royal Highness the Princess of Denmark, the Heiress Apparent to the Crown, met with all along from them, and all their party. They were not contented to shew her a constant neglect and slight themselves, but their whole party were instructed not only to treat her with disrespect, but spight: They were busy to traduce her with false and scandalous aspersions; and so far they carried the affront, as to make her at one time almost The common subject of the tittle-tattle of almost every coffee-house and drawing-room, which they promoted with as much zeal, application, and venom, as if a bill of exclusion had then been on the anvil, and these were the introductory ceremonies'

This passage being complain'd of, and read, in the Upper House, the Lords ordered the booksellers, for whom that book was printed, to attend their house on the Saturday following. But before that day came, Dr Drake having owned himself to be the author of the book in question, he was on the 9th of May examined by the Lord-Keeper; who asked him, 'What he had to say concerning the said book?' And the book and the paragraph being shewed him, 'He owned he writ the book, and that paragraph in particular; and thought he had just reason to write it, he having heard her Highness talked of disrespectfully in almost every coffee-house.' Then he withdrew, and, after some debate, was called in again; and the Lord-Keeper told him, 'The house was not satisfied with what he had said, but thought he trifled; and required him to acquaint the House with the grounds of his writing that paragraph.' He answered, 'He found it mentioned in divers anonymous pamphlets published at that time, and hoped, it was no hurt to answer those pamphlets, and desired time to recollect what those pamphlets were;' and then withdrew. After some time he was called in again, and asked, 'If he could charge any person or persons in the kingdom, with the matters asserted by him in that paragraph? and, Whether he had heard any other person say, that they could charge any person whatsoever with the matters contained in that paragraph?' To these questions he answered, 'That he did not know of any such person' Being further asked, 'If he had any other grounds besides the pamphlets? And what these pamphlets were?' He said, he had no other grounds besides these several pamphlets following, the two Legion Letters; the Black List; the Jura Populi Anglicani; and, Toland's Reasons for inviting over the Princess of Hanover. Lastly, being asked, 'If in any of these pamphlets there was any thing said about Setting aside the present Queen?' he answered, 'He did not remember there was.' Then he being withdrawn, the Lords took the aforesaid paragraph into consideration, and resolved and declared, 'That in the preface of a book intituled, The History of the last Parliament, &c. written by Dr Drake, as he owned at the bar, there were several groundless, false, and scandalous expressions, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her people, and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes amongst

'the Queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom (1).'

[B] And an intimation that the Church was in danger under her administration.] The design of that book, was not so much to shew the danger of the Church under The government of the Queen, as under the then administration; namely, that of the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin, the Duke of Marlborough, and all those who countenanced the whig, or dissenting interest, and had been the occasion of the miscarrying of the bill against Occasional Conformity. And the publication of it at that time, was, with a view of influencing the election of the new parliament. Such was the real intention of that book. But, as most Ministers of State are apt to represent affronts against themselves, as insults upon their Masters, or even as down-right treason; it was so in the present case. That the reader may best judge of the drift of that book, we shall give here the beginning of it; with a few extracts from the same. It begins in these words. 'Those that look no deeper than the surface of things, are apt to conclude without hesitation, that the Church of England is in a very flourishing condition: Its dignities and preferments make a very goodly shew, and the patronage of the Queen seems to promise a continuance of prosperity: But, for all this fine complexion and fair weather, there is a Heelick Fever lurking in the very bowels of it; which, if not timely cured, will infect all the humours, and at length destroy the very being of it. The nation has a long time abounded with Sectaries, who, in the preceding Century, violently overturned both Church and State.——The sons of those men yet remain, and inherit many of them the principles of their fathers; it would therefore be no very charitable supposition, without any other argument, to imagine them heirs of their designs likewise.——If, since the Church recovered its ancient lustre and authority, they have been more silent, and, in appearance, more moderate, it is not that they are better tempered or affected, but that, submitting to the necessity of the times, they have dissembled their intentions better: Yet some overt-attempts here, and the whole course of their proceedings in Scotland during the two last reigns, sufficiently shew us what treatment we might expect, if they had the power.——The history of their carriage towards the Church is publick and recent, as likewise are the advances that have been made in their favour, and the repulses which the Church has met with. Every thing has pass'd in Scotland to the desire of the Presbytery, even to the endangering of the Church and Monarchy of England, and the disherison of its Constitution, and the immediate prejudice of its Sovereignty; but, on the contrary, nothing for the security of the Church here.——All attempts to settle it on a perpetual foundation have been opposed, and rendered ineffectual.'——Then he shows, what danger the Church hath been brought into, by putting its best friends out of their places, viz. the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Rochester, Nottingham, Jersey, and Winchelsea; Sir Edward Seymour; the Lords Granville, Guilford, Gower; Earl of Dorset, Sir George Rook, and other great patrons and asserters of the interest of the Church at Court; who were turned out, without the least pretence or colour of offence (2).——Next he proves, what want of moderation there is in all Sects whatsoever, though they reproach the Church of England for having none; and, consequently, how little favour she must expect from them, if they should be uppermost. 'The In-ensuing Parliament, October 27, 1705 (c) [C], and was addressed by both Houses [D] upon that occasion (d). Moreover, the 6th of December was appointed by the House of Lords, to enquire into the danger of the Church: when, after a long debate, it was voted, That the Church was not in danger (e). The 14th of that month, the Commons concurred in the same resolution: in consequence of which, they besought her Majesty to punish the authors and spreaders of the 'seditious and scandalous report' abovementioned. Soon after, the Queen put out a Proclamation for discovering the author of the Memorial (f). Whereupon, the Printer being taken into custody, and examined before one of the Secretaries of State, pretended to make a discovery; but could do nothing more than fix it upon three of the members of the House of Commons, namely, Mr Peley, Mr Ward, and Sir Humphrey Macworth; and related, that a woman in a mask, with another barefaced, brought him the manuscript, and made a bargain with him to have two hundred and fifty printed copies; which he delivered to four porters, sent to him by the persons concerned. But though the woman that came to the Printer without a mask, and some of the porters, were found out, yet it was impossible to fix it with certainty upon any of the three Gentlemen abovementioned, or upon any other person (g); so that Dr Drake, the true author of the Memorial remained undiscovered. It was not the Parliament only that shewed their resentment against that book; for, on the 31st of August, the Grand Jury of the city of London having presented it, at the sessions, as a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel, it was forthwith burnt in the sight of the Court then sitting: and the Tuesday following before the Royal Exchange; by the hands of the common hangman (h). But though Dr Drake then escaped, yet as he was very much suspected of being the author of that book, and had rendered himself obnoxious upon other accounts, to some persons then in power, occasions were sought for endeavouring to ruin him if possible. A news-paper he was publishing at that time, under the title of Mercurius Politicus, afforded his enemies the pretence they wanted. For, they taking exception at some passages therein, prosecuted him in the Queen's-Bench, in the beginning of the year 1706. His case was argued at the bar of that Court on the 30th of April; when, upon a flaw in the information [E], the trial was adjourned: and the sixth of November following, the Doctor was acquitted (i). However, the government brought a writ of error (k). The severity of this prosecution, joined to repeated disappointments, and ill usage from some of his party, flung the Doctor into a fever; of which he died at Westminster, on the 2d of March 1706-7, after a short confinement to his bed; not without violent exclamations against the rigor of his prosecutors (l). Besides those books of his that are mentioned above; he made a new English translation of Herodotus, which was never published (m): And finished, not long before his decease, 'A New System of Anatomy,' which was first printed in 1707 [F]. He likewise published,

'dependents and Presbyterians formerly in England and Ireland; the Kirk of Scotland, heretofore and at present; the Anabaptists at Munster; the Lutherans in divers parts of Germany, Sweden, Denmark, &c. the Calvinists in Holland, and at Geneva; and the Roman Catholics, at several times, almost all the world over, have in their respective turns experimentally demonstrated by their practice, that they will not endure a rival Church in their dominions; and some of them—not even tolerate it (3).' In another place, he gives this excellent character of the Church of England. 'Our Church is not so rigid, or so capricious, as to require an absolute uniformity of sentiments among her sons in matters of doubt or speculation, which are not essential to the true faith, nor necessary to the maintenance of order and good discipline: She does not require implicite Faith, nor command her sons to believe as the Church believes, whether they comprehend her meaning or not, or can be convinced in their understandings that those things are true, which she delivers as such. She could wish, indeed, that all her sons had as sound and clear understandings to embrace all useful truths, as strong constitutions to digest all wholesome food: But, like a tender indulgent mother, she does not reject those weak ones, who, through infirmity, cannot receive all that is good and conducive, if they admit All that is essential to the Christian Faith, and necessary to Christian Communion (4).'

[C] Her Majesty took notice of it in her speech In these words. — 'I cannot but with grief observe, there are some amongst us, who endeavour to foment animosities. — I mention this with a little more warmth, because there have not been wanting some so very malicious, as, even in print, to suggest The Church of England, as by law established, to be in danger at this time (5).'

[D] And was addressed by both Houses.] The Lords in their address, promised, 'Ever to shew the utmost

detestation of those ungrateful and wicked men, who laboured to dishonour her Majesty's reign, and distracted her subjects with unreasonable and groundless jealousies of dangers to the Church of England: And to concur in all measures requisite to put a stop to the malice of those incendiaries, &c. (6)'

[E] Upon a flaw in the Information.] In the libel set forth in the information, the word not was inserted; and in the libel given in evidence, the word not. Upon arguing of that error, the court inclined for the party accused; whereupon the trial was adjourned (7).

Illustrated with above fourscore figures, drawn after the life. With a preface by W. Wagstaffe, M. D. and reader of Anatomy at Surgeons-hall.*' In this preface, Dr Wagstaffe makes the following observations: 'How much and how eminently Dr Drake excelled in all the qualifications I have mentioned,' [viz In giving the rationale of things, and enquiring into the nature and causes of phænomena] 'the learned world already have been judges, and posterity, I am persuaded, will reap the benefit of his labours (8).' — 'The sentiments of others are candidly and ingeniously delivered by him, and like one who thoroughly understood them; and whenever he disagrees with, or assents to their conjectures, or proposes any thing of his own, he gives his reasons with the utmost impartiality, without the triumph and ostentation of a conqueror, or an fond opinion of his own merit (9). — He does not behave himself like a describer of the parts, but like an unprejudiced enquirer into nature, and an absolute master of his profession.'

DRAYTON (MICHAEL) a renowned Poet in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles I; was of an antient and worthy family, originally defcended from the town of Drayton in Leicefterfhire; which gave name to his progenitors, as a learned Antiquary of his acquaintance has recorded (a). But his parents removing into the bordering county of Warwickfhire, he was born there, as we receive it from his own information (b); and, as it is remembered by his countryman Sir William Dugdale, as well as others, who have followed him, at Atherfton (c); but more particularly it appears, that the little village of Harfull, or Hartfhill, in that parifh, will claim the honour of his birth; whereof it were the greater pity to deprive it, as it is represented to have been obfcure till rendered conspicuous for his nativity, by the author of thofe Latin verfes at the bottom of his picture; which being publifhed in the life-time, and under the infpection of our Poet himfelf, before his own edition of his works, could not have efcaped his correction had it been erroneou [A]. It may alfo be computed from the circumfcription upon the faid picture, which with all other circumftances very agreeably corresponds, containing the year of our Lord, and that of his own age, when it was engraved, that he was born in the year 1563. In his tender age he was bleffed with fuch a forwardnefs of genius, fuch a fweetnefs of afpect, temper, and deportment, as rendered him not only the delight of his inftstructors, but preferred him to the favour of fome perfons of diftinction. In the year 1573, being then but ten years of age, he appears to have been page to fome perfon of honour, as we collect from his own words: and, as for his propenfity to learning, it no lefs evidently appears in the fame place (d), that he could then conftrue his Cato, and fome other little collections of fentences; which made him very anxious to know, What kind of ftrange Creatures thefe Poets were? and very follicitous with his Tutor, that, if he could, he would make him, of all things, a Poet. So he was put to the reading of Mantuan, and Virgil’s Eclogues, with others of the infpired tribe; till, even then, he fcorned any thing that looked like a ballad, though written by William Elderton [B]. If after this, he finifhed not his education at the University

[A] Could not have efcaped his correction.] Thefe verfes, in the vein of Ariofto, have not been cited by any author who has written of our Poet that we have met with, and are as follow:

LUX HARESHULLA tibi (Warwici villa, tenebris Ante tuas cunas, obfita) prima fuit.
Arma, Viros, Veneres, Patriam modulamine dixti; Te Patriæ refonant Arma, Viri, Veneres,

[B] Though written by Will. Elderton.] This Elderton was a famous Comedian of thofe days; a facetious fuddling companion, who having a great readinefs at rhiming, compofed abundance of fonnets and catches upon love and wine, which were then in great vogue among the light and merry part of the town; but he was not more notable for his drollery and his doggerel, than he was for his drinking, infomuch that he was feldom remembered for his fingular faculty in either of the former, but his thorough praftice in the latter was joined to it; wherefore we find him called the Bachanalian Buffoon, the Red-nos’d ballad-maker, and fuch like. It feems by this exceffive habit he indulged himfelf in, over his ftrong drink, that he fell a martyr to Sir John Barlycorn, as fome of his contemporary writers have hinted (†). We find he was dead before the year 1592, and Mr Camden has preferved this epitaph on him:

Hic fitus eft fitiens, atque ebrus Eldertonus;
Quid dico, hic fitus eft? hic potius fitis eft (1).

University of Cambridge, it is apparent, from the credible testimony of one of his own friends, that he was some time a Student in that at Oxford [C]; and by the support, it seems, of Sir Henry Goodere; however, he might not be so formally entered, as to be remembered by Anthony Wood, though he has made greater digressions in the commemoration of several others, who were more distantly related to that University. In 1588, he seems, from his own description of the Spanish Invasion, which the Spaniards themselves, with no less presumption, than arrogance, or vain-glory, had stiled Invincible, to have been a spectator, at Dover, of it's defeat (e); and might, possibly, be engaged in some military post or employment there; as we find some mention made of his being well spoken of by the Gentlemen of the Army. He took delight very early, as we have seen, in the study of Poetry; but how soon he delighted the publick with any of his own, all those who have written of him have been very incurious to learn, or inform us. He was certainly eminent for some of his poetical publications, nine or ten years before the death of Queen Elizabeth, and how much sooner, we have not yet discovered. At least, so early as the year 1593, when he was but thirty years of age, he set forth in print, a Collection of his Pastorals; likewise some of the most grave and weighty poems, which have rendered him most memorable, and best supported his fame to posterity, were, not longer after, published. His Barons Wars, and England's Heroical Epistles: His Downfalls of Robert of Normandy; Matilda; and Gaveston; for which last he is called, by one of his contemporaries, Tragediographus, and part of his Polyolbion, were all written before the year 1598: For all which, and his other deserts, he was highly celebrated at that time, and distinguished not only as a great genius, but a good man; not only for the sweetness and elegance of his words, but of his actions and manners; for his humane and honourable principles, as well as his refined and polite parts: And thus was he characterized, not only by Poets, or the more florid and panegyric writers of those days, but also by Divines, Historians, and other Scholars of the most serious and solid learning. Of which Works and Characters, from such contemporary writers, in hopes of reviving his memory somewhat more proportionable to his merits, than those who, through their ungrateful negligence, conceited sufficiency, or blind pursuit of ignorant guides (f), have very superficially attempted the same, we shall here below be more particular: But, as what we find sufficient for one note, first of his Works aforesaid, with some others of his early compositions [D]: And as to those Characters of him, such as

Dead as he is, he still is drie:
So of him, it may well be said,
Here he, but not his thirst, is laid.*

[C] Some time a student in that at Oxford.] Tho' he appears not in Wood's Fasti, to have taken any degree there, yet as he was some time a student in this university, it is conceived that he ought to have been ranked by that author, among the Oxford writers, from the authority of our Poet's intimate acquaintance Sir Aston Cokain, in these lines;

OXFORD, our other academy, you
Full worthy must acknowledge of your view:
Here smooth-tongu'd DRAYTON was inspir'd by Mnemosyne's manifold progeny (2).

[D] First of his said Works, and other early compositions.] First, of those poems abovementioned. What is there called a Collection of his PASTORALS, was first published under, at least the oldest edition we have seen thereof, was distinguished with, the title of, IDEA: The Shepberd's Garland, fashioned in nine Eglogs; with ROWLAND'S Sacrifice to the Nine Muses. Dedicated to Mr Robert Dudley: By M. DRAYTON, and printed in 4to 1593. This Shepherds Garland, &c. is the same that was reprinted afterwards with emendations by our author, in the first folio edition of his works, under the title of PASTORALS: containing Eglogues: With the Man in the Moon. They are nine in number, written in stanzas of various measures, adorned with tales, sonnets, &c. and in this folio edition they are dated 1619. There are many of the true rural images, and much of the beautiful simplicity in these pastorals, for which this species of poetry is so much admired. Our author has been therefore justly applauded for these eclogues, by some able judges of our time, and classed among the best pastoral writers in his own, for the many new and beautiful varieties, embellishments, and improvements, that he has introduced therein: yet such has been the justice as well as judgment of others in our time, that though they have, in the very title-page of a late edition, professed to give us his Works complete in one volume (3), neither these, nor many others of his most considerable compositions, are therein reprinted, or so much as spoken of: But perhaps a second volume is intended to supply the deficiencies of the first. As to his other poems abovementioned, they are historical. In an old edition of them in 8vo without date, but printed near about the middle of King James's reign, our author's Dedication before the BARONS WARS to Sir W. Aston, is in verse; and in the Preface he seems to hint as if his travels had not afforded the leisure and study he desired. In his folio edition of these poems with others, the Dedication before those Wars to his said patron, is in prose. In this latter edition, these Barons Wars in the reign of Edward II, are illustrated with marginal notes by the author, which have been all since omitted (4) by his late editor, though the author of the Preliminary Discourse, was desirous of a more ample commentary (5). There are commendatory verses before both editions, by Mr Thomas Green, E. Heywood, John Beaumont, and the learned Mr Selden. His ENGLAND'S HEROICAL EPISTLES were newly enlarged, and republished in 8vo, 1598; which is the most ancient edition we have seen, or read of. These Epistles are written in our heroick measure of ten syllables, and are very judiciously explained in the necessary places, by short notes drawn out of good authentick Histories, and printed at the end of each epistle. There are twenty-four of them, with a short summary in fourteen lines of their titles, at the end. They are professedly written in the vein of Ovid's Epistles; but of a much more substantial and affecting nature, as they concern so many real persons of the highest rank in our Chronicles, and illustrate so much real matter of fact in their most unfortunate, perplexing, and often criminal loves, by the strongest sentiments, and most moving numbers. Besides the author's Preface, there are three panegyric poems prefixed, which were addressed to him by William Alexander, afterwards Earl of Stirling, a famous Poet of Scotland before spoken of in this work (6), Sir Edmond Scory, and Mr Thomas Hassel. In the undated 8vo edition abovementioned, there are near a dozen Dedications, before as many of the Epistles, to so many of the author's friends and patrons of both sexes. The first Epistle of Fair Rosamond, to King Henry

Henry II (7), is dedicated to Lucy Countess of Bedford; to whom he says, 'I strive not to affect singularity; yet would faine flye imitation, &c. Much would she say to a King, much would I say to a Countess; but that, the method of my epistle must conclude the modesty of her's; which I wish may recommend my ever vowed service to your Honour.' In his Dedication of another Epistle to Lady Anne Harrington, the wife of Sir John Harrington, he forbears to enlarge upon her excellencies, because 'dejected minds want that pure fire which would give vigour to virtue.' The next Dedication is to Sir Walter Aston, Knight of the Bath (8). The next to Edward Earl of Bedford, contains the most personal particulars of our author (†). The next is to Sir John Swinerton, Alderman of London (9). The next is to his worthy and esteemed friend Mr James Huisb, upon the subject of Dedications. The next is to Mrs Elizabeth Tanfield, sole daughter and heir of Laurence Tanfield, Esq; a famous Lawyer. The next is to Sir Thomas Monson: before the Epistle of King Edward IV to Jane Shore, and her Answer. Our Poet, in his notes of the Chronicle History, upon the second of these two letters, after having given Sir Thomas More's description of Jane Shore, mentions a curious portrait of her in these words: 'That picture which I have seen of her was such, as she rose out of her bed in the morning, having nothing on but a rich mantle, cast under one arm over her shoulder, and sitting in a chair, on which her arm did lie.' We remember a late published print of her, in mezzotinto, in a light or loose covering, very open at her bosom; whether copied from that, or one at Eaton-College, we cannot at present determine (†). The dedication to the next pair of these Epistles, is to Sir Henry Goodere of Poleworth (in Warwickshire) Knight, the nephew of that worthy old Sir Henry Goodere, who was our Poet's most early patron (10). In respect to whom, he says in this Dedication, 'Till such time as I may in some more large measure make known my love to the happy and generous family of the Gooderes, to which I confess myself beholding for the most part of my education, I with you all happiness.' The next, is to Henry, the Son of Edward Lucas, Esq; of whose parents he acknowledges himself to have received great favours, though there were many in England of whom he might justly challenge greater; 'had I not been born in so evil an hour, says he, as to be poisoned with that gall of ingratitude.' The last, which is the eleventh of these Dedications; the second brace of epistles having none before them, but seem to be joyned under the patronage of the first, is addressed to the Lady Frances Goodere (†). It were easy for those who have been conversant in these Poems of our Author, to observe how the moderns, even the late Mr Pope himself, have imitated Drayton, and refined upon his pattern, in those distinctions which are esteemed the most delicate improvements of our English versification at this day; such as the turns, the pauses, the contrasts, and elegant tautologies, &c. It is also easy for such readers to point out several thefts, and petty larcenies which have been committed upon our Poet, however obsolete and unfashionable he may have been accounted, by some writers of eminent character; and shew, where verses have been appropriated to some famous wits, which were composed by him, even as many years before they were born, as they attained to when they died. We shall here for brevity sake mention but one instance, and that is in these lines,

Th' Arabian bird which never is but one,
Is only chaste, because she is alone:
But had our mother nature made them two,
They would have done as Doves and Sparrows do (11).

These are ascribed to a famous nobleman, who was one of the brightest Wits in the reign of King Charles II, and have been admired, as worthy of him: In his works they are not otherwise materially alter'd, than by the transposition of the rhymes in the first couplet, and the retrenchment of the measure in both (12). His other more early and famous Historical Poems, before mentioned to have been written in Queen Elizabeth's time, are intitled, His LEGENDS; first, of Robert, Duke of Normandy; in which is seen a picture of distressed integrity; secondly, Matilda, a Pattern of Chastity; and thirdly, Pierce Gaveston, a Warning Picce to Court Minions and Prime Ministers, against the abuse of their Princes favour. He afterwards added to them the Legend of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, printed 4to, 1609, an example of speedy advancement to grandeur, by politick advantages taken of his Prince's violent appetites and the troubled times (13). Our author had good encouragement for illustrating their histories in this poetical manner; the like having been so well received before from other eminent hands (14). They are dedicated in his folio edition to Sir Walter Aston; and therein are embellished with short and useful explanatory notes in the margin; which are left out in the late new folio edition. When his SONNETS were first published, we cannot say, but it should seem that he set them forth, or wrote some of them before the death of Queen Elizabeth, because among those five additional sonnets which he directed to some great and worthy personages, but never revived them himself in his folio edition, one is to James King of Scots, before he came into England; another, which might be writ afterwards, is inscribed to Lucy, Countess of Bedford, in which he says, she rain'd upon him her sweet showers of gold; and the last to Sir Anthony Cook, to whom he says of these rhymes, that but for him, they had slept in fable night; and that he had borrowed no man's conceits. The whole number should be sixty eight or sixty nine. There was an edition of all, or most of those poems above mentioned, published in 8vo, 1605, and another, as we have heard, in 1610, besides the undated one of the same size before spoken of. His ODES (*) were written after Queen Elizabeth's death, as appears in one of them, and dedicated to Sir Henry Goodere, Gent. of the King's Privy-Chamber, in verse. They are seventeen in number and not one reprinted in the late new edition: nor is his Fable of the OWL a pretty allegorical poem, therein preserved. It was first printed soon after King James came to the Crown (15), and reprinted in the authors last edition in small folio. In which there are title-pages to every Poem we have mentioned but the first, which are all dated 1619, wherefore we think this volume of them was all printed that year. The title of it is, POEMS by Michael Drayton, Esq; THE BARONS WARS, ENGLAND'S HEROICAL EPISTLES, IDEA, ODES, THE LEGENDS OF ROBERT DUKE OF NORMANDY, MATILDA, PIERCE GAVESTON, and the GREAT CROMWELL: THE OWL. ELOGUES, with the MAN in the MOON. The rest of his compositions we shall mention under the years they were published.

[E] Such characters we hope may here be acceptably assembled, or referred to.] And first, Mr Charles Fitz-Geoffry, the learned Divine and Poet of Broadgate's Hall, in an Historical Poem he published at the time that some of Drayton's earliest pieces appeared, gives him the appellation of the Golden Mouth'd Poet, for the purity and preciousness of his phrase (16). And Mr Francis Meres, also a Divine of no small repute at that time for his moral and poetical writings, having mentioned all Drayton's historical poems, recited as part of the title above, that is, all therein but the three last, in a work he published before the death of Queen Elizabeth, gives him this character: 'Michael Drayton, among Scholars, Soldiers, Poets, and all sorts of people, is helde for a man of virtuous disposition, honest conversation, and well-governed carriage, which is almost miraculous among good wits in these declining and corrupt times (17).' Two years after Mr Robert Allot, in his Common-Place Book, of the Select Thoughts, of our most eminent English Poets in that century, has many extracts from Michael Drayton's earlier pieces before mentioned, whereby he makes a figure as considerable as most of them (*). Another Poet of that time refers to an Elegiac Poem upon the death of Sir Philip Sidney, that was composed by Drayton; which was never reprinted in his works; and if it was written soon after Sir Philip's death (18), it is likely his latter years, much beloved and befriended by Sir Walter Aston, of Tixhall in Staffordshire, to whom, for his kind patronage, he gratefully dedicates many of his Poems, whereof his Barons Wars was the first, in the spring of his acquaintance, as our Poet expresses it himself to him (g). Nevertheless, we have since gathered, from those Epistles before mentioned (b), and, till then, unobserved by all who have written of him, that his most early dependance was upon another noble patron, named Sir Henry Goodere, of Poleworth, in his own county; to whom he has liberally acknowledged himself obliged for the greatest part of his education, and by whom, some time before his death, our Poet was recommended to the patronage of the Countess of Bedford; as may evidently appear, in his Epistle, to her Lord here-under recited [L]. However, it is no less visible, from his many dedications, and acknowledgments also, to Sir Walter Aston, that he was, for many years, patronized by him, and accommodated with such supplies, as afforded him leisure to finish some of his most elaborate compositions. Nay, it is intimated, we know not from what authority, that he was, by the interest of the said Sir Walter, with Sir Roger Aston, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to King James in his minority, made, in some measure, ministerial to an intercourse of correspondence between the said young King of Scots and Queen Elizabeth. The words of my author are these; speaking of the said Sir Roger Aston, and of his being of the Bed-chamber to that King when a child; that 'He was the person principally entrusted with the messages and letters that passed between his Master and Queen Elizabeth; and, by the interposition of Sir Walter Aston, Mr Drayton was, in this respect, very useful, in faithfully performing the various services which he was commanded (i).'

But if these services were performed by Mr Drayton so early as in the childhood of that King, we fear it will be found too soon for him to have had the interest or recommendation of Sir Walter Aston thereto, because, at the publication of some, which were not his earliest poems, they were but in the spring of their acquaintance, as he has said himself: so that, if he was in any such sort trusted, it must be much later than that King's childhood, and nearer the close of the Queen's reign. He certainly had fair prospects from his services, labours, or other testimonies of early attachment to the King's interest, of some favour or preferment, besides from what he had written among his Sonnets in his praise, as a Poet, while King of Scots. He was also one of the foremost of Apollo's train in England, who welcomed his Majesty to his British dominions with A Congratulatory Poem to King James, &c. 4to, 1603: and how, through interest or ingratitude, it might have proved his ruin, but for his own patient and prudent conduct under the indignity, he has, with as much freedom as was then convenient, himself informed us both in prose and verse (k). The same year he was chosen, by Sir Walter Aston, one of the Esquires who attended him when he was, with others, created Knight of the Bath at the coronation of the said King (l). We find not that our author ever reprinted those poems in praise of his Majesty; and the ungrateful reception they met likely to have been the earliest of his performances. That Poet calls him Noble DRAYTON! and observes, how well he bewailed our said loss in dreary verse (19). A Divine of Cambridge at the same time published a dramatick performance, wherein a character being given of the Wits of that age, one of the interlocutors, in a dialogue between Ingenioso and Judicio, says,

DRAYTON's sweet Muse is like a sanguine die,
Able to ravish the rash gazer's eye.

And the other answers — 'However, he wants one true note of a Poet of our times, and that is this; he cannot swagger it well in a tavern, or domineer in a hot-house (20).' There is a description of Drayton's, quoted by two or three authors of those times with applause; and one of them, who was the learned translator of Ariosto's Satires, in his version of another Italian Wit, where he is describing, in a note, how the Muses were despised in that age by the stupid Midas's, and slavish jaylors of their own pelf, has said, 'He will set down the worth of a Poet, as that sweet Muse of his, who not unworthily beareth the name of the Chief Archangel, singeth, after his soul-ravishing manner;' part of which verses as quoted from the earlier editions, are as follow:

The diff'rence only 'twixt the Gods and Us,
Allow'd by them, is but distinguish'd thus;
They gave them breath, men by their pow'rs are born;
That life THEY give, the POET doth adorn:
And from the world, when they dissolve mens breath,
He in the world doth give men life in death (21).

Mr W. Burton, the learned Antiquary of Lindley in Leicestershire, speaking of Mr Drayton as his near countryman and old acquaintance, adds further of him, these words, 'Who, though those Transalpines account us, Tramontani, rude and barbarous; holding our brains so frozen, dull, and barren, that they can afford no invention or conceits; yet may he compare, either with their old Dante, Petrarch, or Boccace; or their Neoteric Marinella, Pignatello, or tigliano; but why should I go about to commend him, whose own works and worthiness have sufficiently extolled to the world (22).'

Other testimonies of our author's merit might be added were they necessary, and not liable to be thought tedious or superfluous.

[F] As may evidently appear in his Epistle to her Lord here recited ] It is in these words:

To the Right Honourable and my very good Lord,
EDWARD EARL OF BEDFORD.

Thrice noble and my most gracious Lord,
THE love I have ever borne to the illustrious house of BEDFORD, and to the honourable family of the HARRINGTONS; to the which by marriage your Lordship is happily united, hath long since devoted my true and zealous affection to your honourable service, and my Poems to the protection of my noble Ladie, your Countesse; to whose service I was first bequeathed by that learned and accomplished Gentleman, Sir HENRY GOODERE, not long since deceased; whose I was, whilst he was; whose patience pleased to beare with the imperfections of my heedless and unstayed youth. That excellent and matchless Gentleman, was the first cherisher of my Muse, which had been by his death left a poor orphan to the world, had he not before bequeathed it to that Ladie, whom he so dearly loved. Wouldst thou then my dear Lord to accept this Epistle, which I dedicate as zealously, as I hope you will patronize willingly, until some more acceptable service may be witness of my love to your Honour.

Your Lordship's ever,

with, as well as the disagreeable scenes he might behold of such wicked vices, and effeminate vanities, as afterwards prevailed at Court, so degenerating from that in the Muse-nursing Maiden Reign (m), might damp all desire of raising himself there. We have not time to examine how far, in his Fable of the OWL, published in 1604, he may have made any thing applicable to his present case (n). In 1613, he published the first part of his POLY-OLBION [G]. In 1619, came out his first folio volume of poems, before described. In 1622, the foregoing part of the Polyolbion was reprinted, together with the second part, making in all thirty books or songs. In 1626, we find him, before a copy of his own verses, stiled POET-LAUREAT [H]. In 1627 was published the second part or volume of his poems; containing his Battle of AGINCOURT, in stanzas of eight lines: The Miseries of Queen MARGARET, in the like stanza: NYMPHIDIA, or the Court of FAIRIES; a master-piece in the grotesque kind (o): The Quest of CYNTHIA, another beautiful piece; both reprinted in Dryden's Miscellanies. The SHEPHERD'S SIRENA; also, The MOON CALF, a strong satire upon the masculine affectations of Women, and the effeminate disguises of the Men, in those times; as they were by others also then exposed in prose (p): Lastly, there are his ELEGIES upon sundry occasions. These are introduced by The Vision of BEN JONSON on the Muses of his friend Michael Drayton; wherein he is very particular in the enumeration and praise of his several compositions: Also by another poem upon the battle of Agincourt, by J. Vaughan; and another by his friend Henry Reynolds, Esq; Those Elegies are twelve in number, though there are but eight reprinted in the late new edition. In 1630 he published another volume of poems, in 4to, intitled, The MUSES ELIZIUM, in ten sundry NYMPHALLS; with three divine poems, on NOAH'S Flood; MOSES his Birth and Miracles (†); and DAVID and GOLIAH. The Pastoral Poems are dedicated to Edward Sackville, Earl of Dorset, and Lord Chamberlain; whose durable Favours had now made him one of his Family; and these are written in verse of various measure. His Divine Poems are in English Heroic Measures: and are dedicated to the Countess of Dorset; and there

(†) Towards the end of the second Canto of this Poem he describes the Plagues of Egypt, from the Plague which then raged in London, at his writing thereof; which was so long before this publication, at the year 1603.

[G] The First Part of his POLY-OLBION, &c. By this Greek title, signifying very happy, he denotes England; and the antient name of Albion, is by some derived from ΟΛΕΙΟΝ, happy (24). It is a chorographical description of the rivers, mountains, forests, castles, &c. in this island, intermixed with the remarkable antiquities, rarities, commodities, &c. thereof. This first part is dedicated to Prince Henry, by whose encouragement it was written; and there is a picture at full length of that hopeful Prince, in a military posture, exercising his pike. He had shewed Drayton some singular marks of his favour, and seems to have admitted him as one of his poetical pensioners, but dying before the book was published, our Poet lost the benefit of his patronage. The reason why the publick was so long debarred of it, he has intimated in his Preface, where he acknowledges that the means to finish it, were owing to the bounty of Sir Walter Aston. There are eighteen songs in this volume, illustrated with the learned notes of Mr Selden; and there are maps before every song, wherein the cities, mountains, forests, rivers, &c. are represented by the figures of men and women. His metre of twelve syllables being now antiquated, it is quoted more for the History than the Poetry in it; however, it contains many excellent lines, and is so exact, that, as Bishop Nicholson observes, 'Drayton's Poly-Olbion affords a much truer account of this kingdom, and the dominion of Wales, than could well be expected from the pen of a Poet (25)'. 'Tis interwoven with many fine episodes; of the conquest of this island by the Romans (26); of the coming of the Saxons (27), the Danes (28), and the Normans (29), with an account of their Kings; of the noble English Warriours in the conquest of France, &c. (30). our brave navigators (31); the Saints (32); and of the Civil Wars in England (33), &c. This volume was reprinted in 1622, with the Second Part, or Continuation of Twelve Songs more, making thirty in the whole, and dedicated to Prince Charles; to whom he gives hopes of bestowing the like pains upon Scotland. There are verses before this Second Part by William Brown, Geo. Wither, and John Reynolds. 'Tis as accurately written as the First Part; but Mr Selden being otherwise engaged, had not time to adorn this Second with notes, and perhaps the want of a friend to help out the expence, may be the reason it was not adorned with maps. From the encomiums of those Poets we shall not make any extract; but add this short one, wherewith we have been favoured by the learned and ingenious translator into Latin, of some of the finest essays written by Mr Pope, out of a Poem that is now in the press, wherein there are these lines:

DRAYTON, sweet ancient Bard, his ALBION sung,
With their own praise her echoing Vallies rung;
His bounding Muse o'er ev'ry Mountain rode,
And ev'ry River warbled where he flow'd (34).

[H] Before a copy of his own verses stiled POET LAUREAT. Before the posthumous Poems of Abraham, the son of Dr Philemon Holland, among the commendatory verses, the first copy of ten lines, bears this title; Michael Drayton, Esq; and Poet Laureat, in commendation of the author, &c. which ends with this distich:

Proceed, let not Apollo's stock decay,
POETS and KINGS, are not born ev'ry day (35).

It is likely this stile or appellation of Poet Laureat was not formerly confined so strictly as it is now, to his Majesty's servant, known by that title, who is presumed to have been at that time Ben Jonson (†); because we find it given to others only as a distinction of their excellency in the art of Poetry. So it was bestowed also upon our author's friend Mr George Sandys, and we could produce an author who has called Francis Quarles by the same title. As for the pictures of our Poet appearing so constantly laureated, it may be a complement also of the Painters and Gravers. The print of Mr Drayton before the first volume of his Poems in folio, graved by W. Hole in 1613, has a wreath of bays above his head, and so has his bust in Westminster-abbey: the like had the painting of him, as we have heard, which was in the collections of the late Thomas Sclater Bacon, Esq; at his seat in Cambridgehire; and so likewise another delicate pourtrait in miniature, said to be painted of him by Peter Oliver, which was in the possession of the late Lord Lansdown, and highly esteemed by him. as we have lately been satisfied, not only from an ample description (36), but also by the sight of it. And yet when we find, that the pourtraits of Joshua Sylvester, John Owen, and others, who never had any grant of the Poet Laureat's place, are as formally crowned with laurel as those who had the utmost right to it; there is reason to believe, it was only an honour conferred by the artists who drew or engraved those pictures, here mentioned of Master Drayton.

there are some images truly sublime in them. But there is not one of these Poems revived, or so much as mentioned, in the late edition, pretending to have comprehended all the works of this celebrated Poet. At the end of the first Divine Poem, there are three copies of verses in praise of the author; by Beal Sapperton, in Latin; Mr John Fletcher and Thomas Andrews in English; which last has very expressly displayed the great extent of our Poet's renown. In 1631, he exchanged his laurel for a crown of glory, as it is expressed in his monumental inscription. He was buried in Westminster-Abbey among the Poets; and the handsome table monument of blue marble, which was raised over his grave the same year (q), is adorned with his effigies in busto, laureated. On one side is a crest of Minerva's cap, and Pegasus in a scutcheon on the other (r). Among those poetical friends who have lamented his death, was Sir Aston Cokain, who, in gratitude for his having brought him acquainted with Sir Thomas Burdet, Bart. by our Poet, composed an elegy upon him [I]; and Ben Jonson is said to have been the author of his epitaph, which was written in letters of gold upon his monument.

[I] Composed an elegy upon him.] The first lines of the said elegy are these:

PHOEBUS, art thou a God, and canst not give
A privilege unto thy own to live?
Thou canst: but if that Poets ne'er should die,
In Heaven, who should praise thy deity?
Else still, my DRAYTON, thou hadst liv'd and writ;
Thy life had been immortal as thy wit.

And it ends with these:

But I molest thy quiet; sleep, while we,
That live, cou'd leave our lives to die like Thee (37).

The epitaph on his monument, ascribed to Ben Jonson, is in these words:

Doc, pious marble, let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe,
To Drayton's name; whose sacred dust
We recommend unto thy trust:
Protect his memory, and preserve his story,
Remain a lasting monument of his glory:
And when thy ruins shall disclaim
To be the treasurer of his name;
His name, that cannot fade, shall be An everlasting monument to thee.

G

DRYDEN (JOHN), the most eminent Poet of the last century, was son of Erasmus Dryden, of Tichmarsh in Northamptonshire, third son of Erasmus Dryden, of Cannons-Ashby, in the same county, Baronet; and was born at Aldwincle near Oundle in that county, the ninth of August 1631 (a). He was educated in grammar learning at Westminster-school, being King's Scholar there, under the famous Dr Busby; and was from thence elected, in 1650, a Scholar of Trinity-College in Cambridge (b). During his stay at school, he translated the Third Satire of Persius [A], for a Thursday-night's exercise (c); and, the year before he left it, wrote a poem On the Death of the Lord Hastings; a performance very unworthy of the great Poet he afterwards proved. In 1658, he published Heroick Stanzas on the late Lord Protector, written after his Funeral (d). In 1660, came out his Astræa Redux [B], a Poem on the happy Restoration and Return of his sacred Majesty King Charles II (e); and, the same year, his Panegyrick to the King on his Coronation (f). In 1662, he addressed a poem To the Lord Chancellor Hyde, presented on New-Year's Day (g); and the same year published A Satire on the Dutch (h). His next piece was his Annus Mirabilis: The Year of Wonders 1666: An Historical Poem (i). In 1668, Mr Dryden, upon the death of Sir William Davenant, was made Poet-Laureat and Historiographer to King Charles II (k); and, the same year, published his Essay on Dramatick Poesy [C]. Our author's first Play, intitled The Wild Gallant, appeared in [A] During his stay at school, he translated the Third Satire of Persius.] We learn this from the following advertisement at the head of that Satire. I remember I translated this Satire, when I was a King's Scholar at Westminster-school, for a Thursday-night's exercise; and I believe that it, and many other of my exercises of this nature, in English Verse, are still in the hands of my learned master, the Reverend Dr Busby (1).

[B] His Astræa Redux.] A remarkable distich in this piece exposed our poet to the ridicule of the wits. It was this:

An horrid stillness first invades the ear,
And in that silence we the tempest fear (2).

Among others, Captain Alexander Radcliff has a fling at it in the following lines of his News from Hell (3):

Laureat, who was both learn'd and florid,
Was damn'd long since for silence horrid:

VOL. III. N<sup>o</sup>. 147.

Nor had there been such clutter made,
But that his silence did invade:
Invade! and so't might well, that's clear;
But what did it invade? An Ear.

[C] His Essay on Dramatick Poesy.] It is dedicated to Charles Earl of Dorset and Middlesex. Mr Dryden tells his patron, that the writing this essay had served as an amusement to him in the country, when the violence of the plague (in 1665) had driven him from the town; but that he finds many things in it, which he does not now approve, his judgment being not a little altered since the writing it. Presently after he says: 'For the way of writing plays in verse, which I have seem'd to favour, I have, since that time, laid the practice of it aside, till I have more leisure, because I find it troublesome and slow. But I am no way altered from my opinion of it, at least with any reasons which have oppos'd it. For your lordship may easily observe, that none are very violent against it, but those who either have not attempted it, or

' who have ill succeeded in their attempt.' In the preface to the reader, we are told, that the drift of this discourse was to vindicate the honour of our English writers from the censure of those who unjustly prefer the French before them. ' This (says Mr Dryden) I intimate, lest any should think me so exceeding vain, as to teach others an art, which they understand much better than myself. But if this incorrect Essay, written in the country, without the help of books, or advice of friends, shall find an acceptance in the world, I promise to myself a better success of the second part, wherein I shall more fully treat of the virtues and faults of the English poets, who have written either in this, the epick, or the lyrick way.' The Essay is drawn up in the form of a dialogue between Eugenius, Crites, Lisideius, and Neander. It was animadverted upon by Sir Robert Howard, in the Preface to his Great Favourite or Duke of Lerma; to which Mr Dryden replied in a defence of it, prefix'd to the second edition of his Indian Emperor.

[D] A list, and some account, of Mr Dryden's plays.]

I. The Wild Gallant: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre Royal, and printed in 4to: London, 1699. This was Mr Dryden's first attempt in dramatick poetry, and met with but very indifferent success in the action. Mr Langbaine tells us (4), Mr Dryden confessed, the plot was not originally his own: ' but however (he adds, with a sneer) having so much altered and beautified it, we will do him the honour to call him the author of the Wild Gallant; as he has done Sir Robert Howard, the author of the Duke of Lerma * : and by way of excuse I shall transcribe his own lines (||) in behalf of a new brother of Parnassus :

' 'Tis miracle to see a first good play ;
' All hawthorns do not bloom on Christmas-day :
' A slender poet must have time to grow,
' And spread and burnish as his brothers do :
' Who still looks lean, sure with some pox is curst ;
' But no man can be Falstaff fat at first.'

To say the truth, this play is so indifferent a performance in itself, and was so ill received, that, if the author had not had a peculiar force of inclination to writing, he would have been sufficiently discouraged from any farther progress. II. The Indian Emperor, or, the Conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards: being the Sequel of the Indian Queen: A Tragi-Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal in 1670, and printed in 4to. It is dedicated to the Dukes of Monmouth and Buccleugh. It is written in heroic verse, or rhyme, and appeared on the stage with great approbation. The story may be found in Mariana's History of Spain, B. 26. ch. 3. and Sir Paul Ricaut's History of Peru. III. An Evening's Love, or, The Mock Astrologer: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1671. It is dedicated to the Duke of Newcastle. The principal plot of this play is built on Calderon's El Astrologo fingido; and the play is, for the most part; taken from Corneille's Feint Astrologue, Moliere's Depit Amoureux and Precieuses Ridicules, and Quinault's Amant Indiscret. IV. Marriage a la mode: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1673. It is dedicated to the Earl of Rochester. This play, though stiled a Comedy, is rather a Tragi-Comedy, and consists of two actions, the one serious, and the other comic; both borrowed from two stories, which the author has tacked together. The serious part is founded on the story of Sesostris and Timareta in the Grand Cyrus, Pt. 9. B. 3. and the characters of Palamede and Rodophil on the story of Timantes and Parthenia in the same romance, Pt. 6. B. 1. The character of Doralice seems borrowed from the story of Nogaret, in a piece called The Annals of Love; and Melantha's making court to herself, in Rodophil's name, from Les Contes d'Ourville, part 1. p. 13. V. Amboyna: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1673. It is dedicated to the Lord Clifford of Chudleigh. The plot of this play is chiefly founded on history, being an account of the cruelty of the Dutch to our countrymen in

Amboyna, A. D. 1618; for which see Stubbs's Relation of the Dutch Cruelties, &c. Wanley's History of Man, B. 4. ch. 10. The Rape of Isabinda by Harman is built on a novel in Cynthio Gyraldi, Dec. 5. Novv. 10. VI. Mistaken Husband: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1675. Mr Langbaine tells us (5), Mr Dryden was not the author of this play, ' tho' it was adopted by him, ' as an orphan, which might well deserve the charity ' of a scene, which he bestow'd on it.' It is in the nature of Low Comedy, or Farce, and written on the model of Plautus's Menechmi. VII. Aurenge-Zebe, or, The Great Mogul: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1676. It is dedicated to the Earl of Mulgrave. The story is related at large in Tavernier's Voyages in the Indies, Vol. I. Pt. 2. ch. 2. Mr Langbaine (6) determines, that the characters of Aurenge-Zebe and Nourmabal are borrowed from Seneca's Phædra and Hippolytus. But whoever considers them, will see, that there is nothing alike through their whole story, excepting only the love of a mother-in-law towards her son-in-law, and the son-in-law's aversion; and as to the characters (a thing Mr Langbaine seems never to understand) Hippolytus has an aversion to love; Aurenge-Zebe is in love: Hippolytus is a hunter; Aurenge-Zebe is a warrior: as for Nourmabal, she is a degree beyond the lewdness even of Seneca's Phædra, who degenerates extremely from her original in Euripides, and indeed has none of her qualities, but only revenge for disappointed love. Mr Langbaine accuses our poet likewise of theft, in borrowing, or rather imitating, several passages of Seneca, in this play. But, with his leave, a poet deserves praise, rather than censure, who transplants the beauties of antient authors into his own works. This play is written in heroic verse, or rhyme. VIII. The Tempest, or, The Inhabited Island: A Comedy: acted at the Duke of York's Theatre, and printed in 4to, 1676. This is only an alteration of Shakespear's Tempest by Sir William Davenant and Mr Dryden. The characters of the sailors were chiefly the invention and writing of Sir William, as is acknowledged by Mr Dryden in the preface. IX. Feign'd Innocence, or, Sir Martin Mar-all: A Comedy: acted at the Duke of York's Theatre, and printed in 4to, 1678. The foundation of this play is originally French, the greatest part of the plot, and some of the language of Sir Martin, being taken from Quinault's Amant Indiscret, and Moliere's Etourdi. Warner's playing on the lute, instead of his master, is copied from Du Pare's Francion, B. 7; and the hint of Old Moody and Sir John seems borrowed from Shakerly Marmion's (*) Fine Companion. X. The Affignation, or, Love in a Nunnery: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1678. It is dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley. This play, Mr Langbaine tells us (7), was damn'd on the stage, or, as the author expresses it in the epistle dedicatory, succeeded ill in the representation: but ' whether the fault was in the play itself, or in the lameness of the action, or in the number of it's enemies, ' who came resolved to damn it for the title,' he will not pretend, any more than the author, to determine. Mr Ravenscroft, in the prologue to his Careless Lovers, acted the year following, reflects on this and the preceding play, in these lines:

An author did, to please you, let his wit run,
Of late, much on a serv'ing-man and cittern (†);
And yet you wou'd not like the serenade;
Nay, and you damn'd his Nuns in masquerade:
You did his Spanish sing-song too abhor;
Ab! que locura con tanto rigor!
In fine, the whole by you so much was blam'd,
To act their parts the players were asham'd.

Several of the incidents and characters of this play are borrowed: those of the Duke of Mantua, Frederick, and Lucretia, from the story of Constance the Fair Nun, in the Annals of Love, p. 81. those of Aurelian, Camillo, Laura, and Violetta, from the story of Destiny and

XI. The State of Innocence, or, the Fall of Man: An Opera, written in heroick verse, and printed in 4to, in 1678. It is dedicated to her Royal Highness the Duchess of York, on whom the author paises the following extravagant compliment: 'Your person is so admirable, that it can scarce receive addition, when it shall be glorified; and your soul, which shines through it, finds it of a substance so near her own, that she will be pleased to pass an age within it, and to be confined to such a palace.' To this piece is prefixed An Apology for Heroick Poetry and poetick Licence. The subject is taken from Milton's Paradise Lost, and many of that excellent poet's thoughts and expressions are copied in this play; but with what success, the judicious reader will easily determine. Mr Nat. Lee wrote commendatory verses on this play, and speaks of it in these terms:

To the dead bard your fame a little owes:
 For Milton did the wealthy mine disclose,
 And rudely cast what you cou'd well dispose.
 He roughly drew, on an old-fashion'd ground,
 A chaos; for no perfect world was found;
 Till thro' the heap your mighty genius shin'd:
 His was the golden Ore, which you refin'd.
 He first beheld the beauteous rustick maid,
 And to a place of strength the prize convey'd:
 You took her thence, to Court the virgin brought, Drest'd her with gems, new-weav'd her hard-spun thought,
 And softest language, sweetest manners taught:
 Till from a comet she a star did rise,
 Not to affright, but please our wond'ring eyes.
 Betwixt ye both is fram'd a nobler piece,
 'Than e're was drawn in Italy or Greece.

But these lines, as Mr Dryden himself justly observes in the Apology, &c. 'ought to be esteem'd the effect of Mr Lee's love to him, rather than his deliberate and sober judgment.' XII. The Conquest of Granada by the Spaniards, in two parts: Two Tragi-Comedies: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, in 1678. These two plays are dedicated to his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and were received on the stage with great applause. The story is to be found in Mariana's History of Spain, B. 25. ch. 18. Thuanus's History, B. 48. Guicciardine, l. 12. &c. Mr Langbaine tells us (8), the characters in these plays are all borrowed from French and Spanish Romances, particularly Almahide, Grand Cyrus, Ibrahim, and Gusman: but, in truth, that of Almanzor seems rather a copy of Homer's Achilles, ill understood. These plays are written in heroick verse, or rhyme. To the first is prefixed An Essay on Heroick Plays; and to the second, A Defence of the Epilogue, or An Essay on the Dramatic Poetry of the last Age. Mr Richard Leigh, a player belonging to the Duke of York's Theatre, attack'd Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada, in a Pamphlet, intitled; A Censure of the Rota: On Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada: Oxford, 1673, in 4to. This occasioned several other Pamphlets, particularly; The Friendly Vindication of Mr Dryden from the Censure of the Rota; Cambridge, 1673, in 4to: Mr Dryden vindicated in a Reply to the Friendly Vindication of Mr Dryden; with Reflexions on the Rota; London, 1673, in 4to: and A Description of the Academy of the Athenian Virtuosi, with a Discourse held there in Vindication of Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada, against the author of the Censure of the Rota; London, 1673, in 4to. Mr Elkanah Settle likewise criticised on these Plays of our author's, in a Pamphlet, intitled, Reflexions on several of Mr Dryden's Plays; particularly The First and Second Part of the Conquest of Granada; By E. Settle, Gent. London, 1687, in 4to. XIII. All for Love, or The World well lost: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1678. It is dedicated to the Earl of Danby. This Play is written in imitation of Shakespear's Style, and is chiefly taken from that author's Anthony and Cleopatra. Mr Dryden tells us (9), he prefers the Scene betwixt Anthony and Ventidius, in the first Act, to any thing he had written in this kind. At the same time he acknowledges the introducing of Octavia to be an error in the contrivance of the drama. 'For, though, says he, I might use the privilege of a Poet to introduce her into Alexandria, yet I had not enough considered, that the compassion she moved to herself and children was destructive to that which I reserved for Anthony and Cleopatra; whose mutual love being founded upon vice, must lessen the favour of the audience to them, when virtue and innocence were oppressed by it. And though I justified Anthony in some measure, by making Octavia's departure to proceed wholly from herself, yet the force of the first machine still remained, and the dividing of pity, like the cutting of a river into many channels, abated the strength of the natural stream.' XIV. Tyrannick Love, or, The Royal Martyr: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre Royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. This play is written in heroick verse, or rhyme, and dedicated to the Duke of Monmouth. The Plot founded on History. See Zosim. l. 4. Socrat. l. 5. c. 14. Herodian. l. 7, 8. *Jul. Capit. in vit. Max. It is dedicated to the Earl of Sunderland, and has a Preface prefixed concerning the grounds of Criticism in Tragedy. This play is originally Shakespear's, and revised and altered by Mr Dryden, who added several new scenes; among which the last in the third act is allowed, even by Langbaine (10), to be a master-piece. The plot was taken by Shakespear from Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, which that poet (according to Mr Dryden) translated from the original story, written in Latin verse by one Lollius a Lombard. Mr R. Duke addressed a copy of verses to our author on occasion of this play; in which he thus compliments him at the expence of Shakespear:

Shakespear, 'tis true, this tale of Troy first told;
 But, as with Ennius Virgil did of old,
 You found it dirt, but you have made it gold.
 A dark and undigested heap it lay,
 Like Chaos e're the dawn of infant day;
 But you did first the chearful light display.
 Confus'd it was as Epicurus' world
 Of atoms by blind chance together hurl'd;
 But you have made such order thro' it shine,
 As loudly speaks the workmanship divine.

XVI. OEdipus, King of Thebes: A Tragedy: acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed in 4to, 1679. It was written jointly by Mr Dryden and Mr Lee, and is justly esteemed an excellent Play. The subject has been treated by the best dramattick writers in all languages, particularly by Sophocles, Seneca, and M. Corneille. Mr Dryden, in the Preface, taxes Seneca with 'running after Philosophical Notions, more proper for the study than the stage;' and accuses Corneille of failing in the character of his Hero, which he calls an error in the first concoction. XVII. Secret Love, or the Maiden Queen: A Tragi-Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. The serious part of the plot is founded on the History of Cleobuline Queens of Corinth; and the characters of Celadon, Florimel, Olinda, and Sabina, are borrowed from the story of Pisisrates and Cerintha in the Grand Cyrus, P. 9. B. 3. XVIII. The Rival Ladies: A Tragi-Comedy: acted at the Theatre Royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. It is dedicated to the Earl of Orrery. The Dedication is in the nature of a Preface, in defence of English verse, or rhyme. Mr Langbaine (11) accuses Mr Dryden of a gross mistake in the Preface, where he says, 'that the Tragedy of Queen Gorbudac was written in English verse, and consequently that verse was not so much a new way among us, as an old way revived; and that this Play was written by the late Lord Burgh,

'hurft, afterwards Earl of Dorset.' Mr Langbaine observes, that Gorbuduc was not a Queen, but a King of the race of Brute; and that the three first acts were written by Mr Thomas Norton; and that the play itself is not in rhyme, but blank verse. Sir Robert Howard, in the Preface to his Plays, answered this Preface of Mr Dryden's. In this Play, the dispute between Amideo and Hippolyto, and Gonsalvo's fighting with the Pyrates, in the last act, are borrowed from the story of Encolpius, Giton, &c. in Petronius Arbitrator; and the catastrophe bears a near resemblance to Scarron's Rival Brothers. XIX. The Kind Keeper, or, Mr Limberham: A Comedy: acted at the Duke's Theatre, printed in 4to, 1680. It is dedicated to John Lord Vaughan. Some of the incidents are borrowed from Cynthio Gyraldi's Novels, Pte. 1ere. Dec. 3. Nouv. 3. and from the Zelotide of M. de Pais. Mr Langbaine, who takes this to be the best of Mr Dryden's Comedies, tells us (12), that it so much exposed the keeping part of the town, that it was stopt after the third night; but that the author took care to omit in the publication what had given offence on the stage. A writer of those times concludes a short Satire against Keeping with these lines (13):

(12) Ib. p. 164.

(13) Cleve's Poems, p. 94.

Dryden, good man, thought Keepers to reclaim,
Writ a kind Satire, call'd it Limberham.
This all the herd of Letchers straight alarms;
From Charing-Cross to Bow was up in arms.
They damn'd the Play all at one fatal blow,
And broke the glafs that did their picture show.

XX. The Spanish Fryar, or, The Double Discovery: A Tragi-Comedy: acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed in 4to, 1681. It is dedicated to John Lord Haughton. Mr Langbaine is very angry with Mr Dryden for the character of the Fryar. 'Whether,' says he (14), Mr Dryden intended his character of Dominick as a satire on the Romish Priests only, or on the Clergy of all opinions in general, I know not; but sure I am, that he might have spared his reflecting quotation in the front of his Play;

(14) Ib. p. 171.

Ut melius possis fallere, fume togam.

'But the truth is, ever since a certain worthy bishop refused orders to a certain poet, Mr Dryden has declared open defiance to the whole clergy; and since the church began the war, he has thought it but justice to make reprisals on the church — But, whatever success this way of writing may find from the sparks, it can never be approved of by sober men, &c.' The comick parts of Elvira, Lorenzo, &c. are founded on a Novel called The Pilgrim, written by M. S. Bremond. XXI. The Duke of Guise: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1683. It was written by Mr Dryden and Mr Lee, and dedicated to the Earl of Rochester. The plot is taken from Davila, Mezerai, and other writers of the French affairs. See also Thuanus, l. 93. For the story of Malicorn the conjurer, read Rosset's Histoires Tragiques, &c. p. 449. This play gave great offence to the Whigs, and was immediately attacked in a pamphlet, intitled; A Defence of the Charter and Municipal Rights of the City of London, and the Right of other municipal Cities and Towns of England. Directed to the Citizens of London. By Thomas Hunt. In this piece, Mr Dryden is charged with condemning the Charter of the City of London, and executing it's magistrates in effigy, in his Duke of Guise; a Play, 'most certainly intended to provoke the rabble into tumults and disorders.' About the same time were printed Some reflexions upon the pretended Parallel in the Play called The Duke of Guise. The author of this pamphlet tells us, 'he was wearied with the dullness of this play, and extremely incensed at the wicked and barbarous design it was intended for; that the fiercest Tories were ashamed of this piece; in short, that he never saw any thing, that cou'd be called a Play, more deficient in wit, good character, or entertainment, than this.' In answer to this, and Mr Hunt's Pamphlet, Mr Dryden published The Vindication: or, The Parallel of the French Holy League, and the English League and Covenant, turn'd into a Seditious Libel against the King and his Royal Highness, by Thomas Hunt, and the author of Reflexions, &c.

London, 1683, 4to. In this Vindication, he tells us, that, in the Year of the Restoration, the first Play he undertook was the Duke of Guise, as the fairest way, which the Act of Indemnity had then left, of setting forth the rise of the late Rebellion; that at first it was thrown aside, by the advice of some friends, to whom he shew'd it; but that, at the earnest request of Mr Lee, (with whom he had promised to join in another play, after the writing of Oedipus, and who now claim'd his promise) it was afterwards produced between them; and that only the first scene, the whole fourth act, and somewhat more than half the fifth, belonged to him (Mr Dryden) all the rest being Mr Lee's. XXII. Albion and Albanus: An Opera: performed at the Queen's Theatre in Dorset Garden, and printed in folio, 1685. The subject of it is wholly allegorical, and intended to expose the Lord Shaftesbury and his party, who are represented by the man on the pedestal, with a long pale face, &c. encompassed by several heads, which suck poison from his side. The musick for this Opera was made by one Grabut; and Mr Langbaine tells us (15), the following satirical lines were made upon this occasion:

(15) Ib. p. 152.

Grabut his yoke-mate n'ere shall be forgot,
Whom th' God of tunes upon a Muse begot.
Bays on a double score to him belongs,
As well for writing as for setting songs:
For some have sworn (th' intrigue so odd is laid)
That Bays and he mistook each other's trade,
Grabut the lines, and he the musick made.

XXIII. Don Sebastian, King of Portugal: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1690. It is dedicated to the Earl of Leicester. This play is generally esteemed one of the best of Mr Dryden's and was received with great applause; though the actors were forced to curtail it after the first night, it being, as the author himself tells us in the Preface, insupportably too long. As for the story, or plot, it is chiefly founded on a French novel of the same name. XXIV. King Arthur: or, The British Worthy: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre in Dorset Garden, and printed in 4to, 1691. It is dedicated to the Marquis of Halifax. This play is more remarkable for singing and fine scenery, than for any excellency of the drama. The story in general is founded upon Geoffrey of Monmouth's History: the Inchanted Grove, and the character of Osmond, are taken from Tasso. XXV. Amphytrion, or, The Two Socias: A Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1691. It is dedicated to Sir Levison Gower. This play is taken from Plautus and Moliere. XXVI. Cleomenes: The Spartan Heroe: A Tragedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1692. It is dedicated to the Earl of Rochester. There is prefixed to it The Life of Cleomenes, translated from Plutarch by Mr Creech. This play was at first prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain; but, upon examination, being found innocent of any design (as had been suggested) to satirize the government, it was suffered to be represented, and had great success. In the Preface, the author tells us, a foolish objection had been raised against him by the Sparks, for Cleomenes not accepting the favours of Casandra. 'They, says he, would not have refused a fair Lady: I grant, they would not; but let them grant me, that they are not heroes.' He adds: 'Some have told me, that many of the fair sex complain for want of tender scenes, and soft expressions of love. I will endeavour to make them some amendments, if I write again; and my next hero shall be no Spartan.' XXVII. Love Triumphant, or, Nature will prevail: A Tragi-Comedy: acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1694. It is dedicated to the Earl of Shaftesbury, and is the last Mr Dryden wrote or intended for the Theatre. It met with but indifferent success; though in many parts the genius of that great man breaks out, especially in the discovery of Alphonso's successful love, and in the catastrophe, which is extremely affecting. — Thus, in the space of twenty-five years, Mr Dryden produced (besides his other numerous poetical writings) twenty-seven plays. As to the character of Mr Dryden's dramatick performances, we find, that the Criticks, his contemporaries, made very free with them; particularly, Mr Gerard Langbaine (16): and it must be confessed, they are

(16) See the next remark.

dramatick performances [E]. In 1671, Mr Dryden was publickly ridiculed on the Stage, under are not the least exceptionable of his compositions. As to Tragedy, the Criticks have observed, that Mr Dryden seldom touches the passions, but deals rather in pompous language, poetical flights, and descriptions. That this was his real taste, appears, not only from his Tragedies themselves, but from two instances mentioned by Mr Gildon (17). The first is, that, it being recommended to him to turn his thoughts to a translation of Euripides, rather than of Homer, he replied, that he confessed he had no relish of that Poet, who was a great master of Tragick simplicity. The other is, that he constantly expressed a very mean, if not contemptible, opinion of Mr Otway, who is universally allowed to have succeeded very happily in affecting the passions: though, in the preface to his translation of M. Frenoy, he speaks more favourably of that Poet. The author, who mentions these instances, ascribes this gusto in Mr Dryden to his great conversation with French Romances. As to Comedy, our Poet himself acknowledges his want of genius for that species of the drama. 'I know, says he (18), I am not fitted by nature to write Comedy: I want that gaiety of humour, which is required in it. My conversation is slow and dull, my humour saturnine and reserved. In short, I am none of those, who endeavour to break jests in company, or make repartees. So that those, who decry my Comedies, do me no injury, except it be in point of profit: reputation in them is the last thing to which I shall pretend.' But, perhaps, Mr Dryden would have wrote better in both kinds of the drama, had not the necessity of his circumstances obliged him to conform himself to the popular taste. Hence my Lord Lansdowne (19):

Dryden himself, to please a frantick age,
Was forc'd to let his judgment stoop to rage:
To a wild audience he conform'd his voice,
Comply'd to custom, but not err'd thro' choice.
Deem then the people's, not the writer's sin,
Almanzor's rage, and rants of Maximin:
That fury spent, in each elaborate piece,
He vies for fame with antient Rome and Greece.

And Mr Dryden himself insinuates as much in the following passage (20): 'I remember some verses of my own Maximin and Almanzor, which cry vengeance upon me for their extravagance. — All I can say for those passages, which are, I hope, not many, is, that I knew they were bad enough to please, even when I writ them. But I repent of them among my sins; and if any of their fellows intrude by chance into my present writings, I draw a stroke over all those Dalilabs of the Theatre, and am resolv'd I will settle myself no reputation by the applause of fools. 'Tis not that I am mortified to all ambition; but I scorn as much to take it from half-witted judges, as I should to raise an estate by cheating of bubbles; neither do I discommend the lofty stile in Tragedy, which is naturally pompous and magnificent. But nothing is truly sublime, that is not just and proper.' He tells us elsewhere (21), that his Spanish Fryar was given to the people, and that he never wrote any thing (in the dramatick way) to please himself, but his Anthony and Cleopatra, i. e. his All for Love, or, The World well lost.

[E] Mr Langbaine has treated Mr Dryden with more severity, than justice, on account of his dramatick performances.] He begins his account of our Poet with treating him as an errant plagiarist. 'Mr Dryden, says he (22), is the most voluminous writer of our age, he having already extant above twenty plays of his own writing, as the title-page of each would persuade the world; though some people have been so bold as to call the truth of this in question, and to propagate in the world another opinion.' Speaking of Mr Dryden's Comedies, he tells us (23), 'he is for the most part beholden to French Romances and Plays, not only for his plots, but even a great part of his language.' Having observed, that Mr Dryden, in the preface to his Conquest of Granada, magisterially buffs at, and domineers over, the French writers, he desires the reader to take notice, that all the characters of that play are stolen from the French: so that, says he (24), Mr Dryden took a secure way (24) 1b. p. 132. to conquest; for having robbed them of their weapons, he might safely challenge them, and beat them too; especially having gotten Pence de Lion (*) on his side, in disguise, and under the title of Almanzor: and should Mont. Vulture presume to lay claim to his own song, l'Amour sous sa loy, &c. which Mr Dryden has robbed him of, and placed in the play of Sir Martin Marr-all (being that song, which begins Blind Love to this hour &c.) our Poet would go nigh to beat him with a staff of his own rhimes, with as much ease, as Sir Martin defeated the Bailiffs in the rescue of his rival.' Mr Langbaine, next, undertakes the defence of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Johnson, against the attacks of Mr Dryden, whom he represents as treating the memory of those great Poets with the utmost disrespect. 'Had he, says he (25), only extended his conquests over the French Poets, I had not meddled in this affair; and he might have taken part with Achilles and Rinaldo, against Cyrus and Oroondates, without my engaging in this foreign war: but when I found him flushed with his victory over the great Scudery, and with Almanzor's assistance triumphing over the noble kingdom of Granada; and not content with conquests abroad, like another Julius Caesar, turning his arms upon his own country; and, as if the proscription of his contemporaries reputation was not sufficient to satiate his implacable thirst after fame, endeavouring to demolish the statues and monuments of his ancestors, the works of those his illustrious predecessors, Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Johnson; I was resolv'd to endeavour the rescue and preservation of those excellent trophies of wit, by raising the Posse Comitatus upon this Poetick Almanzor, to put a stop to his spoils upon his countrymen.' The foundation of this heavy charge, is, some passages in the Postscript to Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada; in which he speaks of Shakespeare, as writing, in many places, below the dullest writers of any age; of Fletcher, as a person, that neither understood correct plotting, nor what is called The Decorum of the Stage; of Johnson, as a writer, whose chief excellency lay in the low characters of vice and folly; and of all three together, as guilty, in every page of their works, of some solecism in speech, or some notorious flaw in sense. And here Mr Langbaine applies to Mr Dryden the character, which an ingenious writer (†) draws of a malignant wit; 'who, conscious of his own vices, and studious to conceal them, endeavours by detraction to make it appear, that others also, of greater estimation in the world, are tainted with the same, or greater: as infamous women generally excuse their personal debaucheries, by incriminating upon their whole sex, calumniating the most chaste and virtuous, to palliate their own dishonour.' This is the ill-natured turn Mr Langbaine gives to our author's Apology, in the same Postscript, where he begs the reader's pardon for accusing those authors, desiring him to consider, that 'he lives in an age wherein his least faults are severely censured, and that he has no way left to extenuate his failings, but by shewing as great in those whom he admires.' Mr Langbaine proceeds to censure Mr Dryden for assaulting with all the bitterness imaginable, not only the Church of England, but also the several professions of the Lutherans, Calvinists, Presbyterians, &c. though I must observe, says he (26), by the way, that some people among the persuasions here mentioned might justly have expected better usage from him on account of old acquaintance in the year 1659. We shall not enter upon Mr Langbaine's defence of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Johnson; which he concludes with these words: 'As to his (Mr Dryden's) reflexions on this triumvirate (Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Johnson) in general; I might easily prove, that his improprieties in grammar are equal to theirs, and that he himself has been guilty of solecisms in speech, and flaws in sense: but this would be to waste paper and time; and besides, I consider, that Apollo's laws, like those of our own nation, allow no man to be tried twice for the same crime: and Mr Dryden having already been arraigned

[F] Mr Dryden was ridiculed on the stage—in the Rehearsal.] The character of Bays, in that excellent satirical Comedy, we are told (28), was originally intended for Sir Robert Howard, under the name of Bilboa. But the representation being put a stop to by the breaking out of the plague in 1665, it was laid by for several years, and not exhibited on the stage till 1671: in which interval Mr Dryden being advanced to the Laurel, the noble author changed the name of his Poet from Bilboa to Bays, and made great alterations in his play, in order to ridicule several dramatick performances, which had appeared since the first writing of it. Those of Mr Dryden, which fell under his Grace's lash, are The Wild Gallant, Tyrannick Love, The Conquest of Granada, Marriage a la Mode, and Love in a Nunnery; and how justly, may be seen in the following extracts.

So two kind turtles, when a storm is nigh,
Look up, and see it gathering in the sky;
Each calls his mate to shelter in the groves,
Leaving, in murmurs, their unfinish'd loves:
Perch'd on some dropping branch, they sit alone,
And coo, and hearken to each other's moan.

Rehearsal, p. 18.

So boar and sow, when any storm is nigh,
Snuff up, and smell it gathering in the sky;
Boar beckons sow to trot in chestnut groves,
And there consummate their unfinish'd loves:
Pensive in mud, they wallow all alone,
And snore and gruntle to each other's moan.

Conquest of Granada. Part i. p. 55.

As some fair tulip, by a storm oppress'd,
Shrinks up, and folds it's silken arms to rest;
And bending to the blast, all pale and dead,
Hears from within the wind sing round it's head:
So shrouded up your beauty disappears;
Unveil, my love, and lay aside your fears:
The storm that caus'd your fright is past and gone.

Rehearsal. p. 28.

As some tall pine, which we on Ætna find
T' have stood the rage of many a boist'rous wind, Feeling without that flames within do play,
Which wou'd consume his root and sap away;
He spreads his worsted arms unto the skies,
Silently grieves, all pale, repines, and dies:
So shrouded up your bright eye disappears;
Break forth, bright scorching sun, and dry my tears.

Tyrannick Love. p. 25.

————— My earthly part,
Which is my tyrant's right, death will remove:
I'll come all foul and spirit to your love.

With silent steps I'll follow you all day;
Or else before you in the sun-beams play.
I'll lead you hence to melancholy groves,
And there repeat the scenes of our past loves.
At night I will within your curtains peep;
With empty arms embrace you, while you sleep.
In gentle dreams I often will be by,
And sweep along before your closing eye.
All dangers from your bed I will remove;
But guard it most from any future love.
And when at last in pity you will die,
I'll watch your birth of immortality:
Then, turtle-like, I'll to my mate repair,
And teach you your first flight in open air.

Rehearsal. p. 55.

Since death my earthly part will thus remove,
I'll come a humble bee to your chaste love:
With silent wings I'll follow you, dear coz,
Or else before you in the sun-beams buz:
And when to melancholy groves you come,
An airy ghost, you'll know me by my hum;
For sound being air, a ghost does well become.
At night into your bosom I will creep,
And buz, but softly, if you chauce to sleep;
Yet in your dreams I will pass sweeping by,
And then both hum and buz before your eye.

Mr Dryden affected to despise the satire levelled at him in the Rehearsal, as appears from his Dedication of the translation of Juvenal and Perfius (29), where, speaking of the many lampoons and libels, that had been written against him, he says: 'I answered not the Rehearsal, because I knew the author fat to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bays of his own farce: because also I knew, that my betters were more concerned than I was in that satire; and, lastly, because Mr Smith and Mr Johnson, the main pillars of it, were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, those noble characters of men of wit and pleasure about town.' But it is impossible our Poet could be insensible of the force of that admirable satire; and we shall be convinced that he felt it's edge, if we reflect on the character of Zimri, in his Absalom and Achitophel (30), in which he took a full revenge on the author of the Rehearsal.

[G] The Essay on Satire.] This piece, which was handed about in manuscript, containing reflexions on the Dukes of Portsmouth and the Earl of Rochester; they, suspecting Mr Dryden to be the author of it, hired three men, who took their opportunity to cudgel our Poet, in Will's coffee-house in Covent-Garden, the 16th of December, at eight of the clock at night. We give you this story on the authority of Anthony Wood (31).

[H] His Absalom and Achitophel.] This poem, which was at first printed without the author's name, is a severe satire on the contrivers and abettors of the rebellion, against King Charles II, under the Duke of Monmouth; and may serve to convince us of what Mr Dryden says in the preface, that he could write severely with more ease than he could gently. 'The violent, says he, on both sides, will condemn the character of Absalom (*), as either too favourably, or too hardly drawn: but they are not the violent whom I desire to please. The fault, on the right-hand, is to extenuate, palliate, and indulge; and to confess freely, I have endeavoured to commit it.

(†) King Charles. Besides the respect, which I owe his birth, I have a greater for his heroick virtues; and David himself (†) could not be more tender of the young man's life, than I would be of his reputation. But, since the most excellent natures are always the most easy; and, as being such, are the soonest perverted by ill counsels, especially when baited with fame and glory; 'tis no more a wonder that he withstood not the temptations of Achitophel (‡), than it was for Adam to have resisted the temptation of the two devils, the serpent and the woman (32). Mr Dryden goes on to assign the reason why he left the subject unfinished. The conclusion of the story, says he, I purposely forbore to prosecute, because I could not obtain from myself to shew Abfalom unfortunate. The frame of it was cut out but for a picture to the wait; and if the draught be so far true, 'tis as much as I designed. Were I the inventor, who am only the Historian, I should certainly conclude the piece with the reconciliation of Abfalom to David. And who knows but this may come to pass? things were not brought to extremity where I left the story: there seems, yet, to be room left for a composition; hereafter, there may be only for pity. I have not so much as an uncharitable wish against Achitophel; but am content to be accused of a good-natured error, and to hope with Origer, that the devil himself may, at last, be saved. For which reason, in this poem, he is neither brought to set his house in order, nor to dispose of his person afterwards, as he in wisdom shall think fit (33).

This poem is celebrated in some commendatory verses, addressed to the then unknown and concealed author, by Mr Nat. Lee, Mr Richard Duke, and Mr N. Tate. The first of these gentlemen affirms,

There are two translations, in Latin verse, of Mr Dryden's Abfalom and Achitophel: one by Dr William Coward, a Physician, of Merton-college in Oxford; published in 4to at Oxford 1682 (37): the other by Dr Francis Atterbury, afterwards bishop of Rochester; published the same year in 4to (38). That the reader may judge a little of the comparative merit of these two translations, we shall transcribe a few lines from the beginning of the original, and subjoin the different versions.

An Answer was published to Mr Dryden's Abfalom and Achitophel, intitled, Azariah and Hushai, a Poem, Lond. 1682, in 4to, said to be written by Mr Elkanah Settle. A Second Part of Abfalom and Achitophel was undertaken, and written, by Mr Tate, at the request, and under the direction, of Mr Dryden, who wrote near two hundred lines of it himself, beginning with

[I] His Medal, a Satire against Sedition.] This poem was occasioned by the striking of a medal, on account of the indictment against the Earl of Shaftesbury, for high-treason, being found ignorant by the Grand-Jury at the Old Bailey, in November 1681; for which the Whig party made great rejoicings, by ringing of bells, bonfires, &c. in all parts of London (41). The poem is introduced with a very satirical Epistle to the Whigs; in which the author says: 'I have one favour to desire of you at parting, that when you think of answering this poem, you would employ the same pens against it, who have combated with so much success against Abfalom and Achitophel; for then you may assure yourselves of a clear victory without the least reply. Rail at me abundantly; and, not to break a custom, do it without wit. By this method you will gain a considerable point, which is wholly to wave the answer of my arguments. — If God has not blessed you with the talent of rhiming, make use of my poor stock and welcome: let your verses run upon my sect; and for the utmost refuge of notorious blockheads, reduced to the last extremity of sense, turn my own lines upon me, and, in utter despair of your own satire, make me satirize myself (42). The whole poem is a severe invective against the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the Whig party. Mr Elkanah Settle wrote an answer to this poem, intitled, The Medal Revers'd, Lond. 1681, 4to.

[K] His Religio Laici.] The whole title is: Religio Laici, or, A Lay-man's Faith. This piece is intended as a defence of Reveald Religion, and the excellency and authority of the Scriptures, as the only Rule of Faith and Manners, against Deists, Papists, and Presbyterians. The author acquaints us, in the preface, that it was written for an ingenious young Gentleman, his friend, upon his translation of Father Simon's Critical History of the Old Testament; and that the style of it is Epistolary. Whereupon he adds: 'If any one be so lamentable a critick, as to require the smoothness, the numbers, and the turn of herodick poetry in published a Translation of M. Maimbourg's History of the League; in which he was employed by the command of King Charles II, on account of the plain parallel between the troubles of France and those of Great Britain (s). Upon the death of King Charles II, he wrote his Threnodia Augustalis; A Poem sacred to the happy Memory of that Prince (t). Soon after the accession of King James II, our author turned Roman Catholick [L]; and, in 1686, he wrote A Defence of the Papers written by the late King of blessed Memory, and found in his strong box [M]. In 1687, he published his Hind and Panther [N], A Poem (u); and, in 1688, his Britannia Rediviva, a Poem on the Birth of the Prince (w). (w) Ib. p. 123.

' in this Poem, I must tell him, that if he has not
' read Horace, I have studied him, and hope the style
' of his Epistles is not ill imitated here. The expres' sions of a poem, designed purely for instruction,
' ought to be plain and natural, and yet majestick;
' for here the Poet is presumed to be a kind of Law-
' giver, and those three qualities, which I have named,
' are proper to the legislative style (43).'

(43) Ib. p. 225.

[L] He turned Roman Catholick.] Upon this occasion, Mr T. Brown wrote The Reasons of Mr Bays's changing his Religion considered, in a Dialogue between Crites, Eugenius, and Mr Bays. London, 1688, in 4to. Also, The late Converts exposed: Or, The Reasons of Mr Bays's changing his Religion considered, in a Dialogue; Part the Second. London, 1690, in 4to. There likewise appeared another piece against Mr Dryden, intituled, The Revolter; A Tragi-Comedy, acted between the Hind and Panther and Religio Laici. London, 1687, in 4to.

[M] His Defence of the Papers written by the late King of blessed Memory, and found in his strong box.] This piece was written in opposition to Dr Stillingfleet's Answer to some Papers lately printed, concerning the Authority of the Catholick Church, in Matters of Faith, and the Reformation of the Church of England. London, 1686, in 4to. Mr Dryden, in the above-mentioned piece, takes occasion, from the two Papers, published by King James II. and by him affirmed to have been found in the Strong Box of the deceased King Charles II (44), to vindicate the authority of the Catholick Church, in decreeing Matters of Faith, upon this principle, that, The Church is more visible than the Scripture, because the Scripture is seen by the Church (45); and to abuse the Reformation in England, which, he affirms (46), Was erected on the Foundation of Lust, Sacrilege, and Usurpation. Dr Stillingfleet, hereupon, published A Vindication of the Answer to some late Papers, London, 1687, in 4to; in which he treats Mr Dryden with some severity: And another author (47) observed, that this Tract of Mr Dryden ' Is very light, and in some places even ' ridiculous; and shews that the author's talent lay to' wards controversy no more in prose, than it appears
' by the Hind and Panther it did in verse.'

[N] His Hind and Panther.] It is divided into three parts, and is a direct defence of the Romish Church, chiefly by way of dialogue between a Hind, who represents the Church of Rome, and a Panther, who sustains the character of the Church of England. These two beasts very learnedly discuss the several points controverted between the two Churches, as, Transubstantiation, Church-Authority, Infallibility, &c. In the preface, the author tells us, this Poem ' Was ' neither imposed on him, nor so much as the subject
' given him by any man. It was written, says he,
' during the last winter, and the beginning of this
' spring, though with long interruptions of ill health, ' and other hindrances. About a fortnight before I ' had finished it, his Majesty's *Declaration for Liberty
' of Conscience* came abroad; which, if I had so soon ' expected, I might have spared myself the labour of ' writing many things which are contained in the third ' Part of it. But I was always in some hope, the ' Church of England might have been persuaded to ' have taken off the Penal Laws, and the Test, which ' was one design of the Poem, when I proposed to ' myself the writing of it. 'Tis evident that some ' part of it was only occasional, and not first intend' ed: I mean that defence of myself, to which every ' honest man is bound, when he is injuriously attacked ' in print (48).' Mr Dryden then lets us into the subject matter of the Poem, and the style in which it is written. ' The First Part, says he, consisting most
' in general characters and narration, I have endea' voured to raise, and give it the majestick turn of ' heroick Poesy. The Second, being matter of dis' pute, and chiefly concerning Church-Authority, I ' was obliged to make as plain and perspicuous as pos' sibly I could; yet not wholly neglecting the numbers,

' though I had not frequent occasions for the magni' ficence of verse. The Third, which has more of the ' nature of domestick conversation, is, or ought to be,
' more free and familiar than the two former. There ' are in it two Episodes or Fables, which are inter' woven with the main design; so that they are pro' perly parts of it, though they are also distinct stories ' of themselves. In both of these I have made use ' of the common-places of satire, whether true or ' false, which are urged by the members of the one
' Church against the other (49).' In the First Part, (49) Ib. p. 249, Mr Dryden speaks of his own conversion in the following terms: 250.

But, gracious God, how well do'st thou provide For erring judgments an unerring guide!
Thy throne is darkness in th' abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the fight.
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And search no farther than thyself reveal'd;
But her alone for my director take,
Whom thou hast promis'd never to forsake!
My thoughtless youth was wing'd with vain desires;
My manhood, long misled by wandring fires, Follow'd false lights; and when their glimpse was gone,
My pride struck out new sparkles of her own.
Such was I, such by nature still I am;
Be thine the glory, and be mine the shame.
Good life be now my task; my doubts are done—(50).

(50) Ib. p. 253.

The Third Part begins with an Apology for the Fable or Contrivance of this Poem; as if Mr Dryden foresaw the ridicule, to which it would expose him.

Much malice, mingled with a little wit,
Perhaps, may censure this mysterious writ;
Because the Muse has peopled Caledon
With Panthers, Bears, and Wolves, and Beasts unknown,
As if we were not stock'd with monsters of our own.
Let Æsop answer, who has fet to view
Such kinds as Greece and Phrygia never knew;
And mother Hubbard, in her homely drefs,
Has sharply blam'd a British Lioness—
Led by these great examples, may not I
The wanted organs of their words supply (51)?

(51) Ib. p. 290

This Poem was immediately attacked by the wits, particularly by Mr Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, and Mr Matthew Prior, who joined in writing The Hind and Panther transferr'd to the Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse. London, 1687, 4to. In the preface to which, the authors observe, That Mr Dryden's Poem ' Naturally falls into ' ridicule,' and that, in this burlesque, ' Nothing is ' represented as monstrous, and unnatural, which is ' not equally so in the original.' They afterwards remark, that ' We have this comfort under the severity ' of Mr Dryden's Satire, to see his abilities equally ' lessened with his opinion of us; and that he could ' not be a fit champion against the Panther, 'till he ' had

He was supposed to have been engaged in translating M. Varillas's History of Heresies, but to have dropped that design [O]. At the Revolution, having disqualified himself for Court favours, by turning Papist, he was dismissed from the office of Poet-Laureat [P], in which he was succeeded by Mr Thomas Shadwell; against whom he wrote his Mac Flecknoe [Q]. The same year he published The Life of St Francis Xavier; translated from the French of Father Dominic Bouhours. In 1693, came out a Translation of Juvenal and Perfius [R]; in which, the first, third, sixth, tenth, and sixteenth Satires of Juvenal, and Perfius entire, were done by Mr Dryden, who prefixed a long and beautiful Discourse, by way of Dedication to the Earl of Dorset (x). He contributed likewise to the Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published, several years after his death, by Dr Garth; in which, the first Book; the Story of Meleagar and Atalanta in the eighth; that of Baucis and Philemon in the same; the Fable of Iphis and Iantbe in the ninth; that of Pygmalion and the Statue in the tenth; the Story of Cinyras and Myrrha, in the same; that of Ceyx and Aleyone in the eleventh; the twelfth Book; the Speeches of Ajax and Ulysses, and the Death of Ajax, in the thirteenth; the Story of Acis and Galatea, in the same; and the Pythagorean Philosophy in the fifteenth; are Mr Dryden's (y). In 1695, he published a Translation, in prose, of M. Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting [S]; and, in 1697, a Translation

'had laid aside all his judgment.' Dr Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, speaks with great severity of this Poem, as well as of its author (52).

[O] He was supposed to have been engaged in translating M. Varillas's History of Heresies, but to have dropped that design.] This we learn from a passage in Dr G. Burnet's Defence of the Reflexions on the Ninth Book of the first Volume of M. Varillas's History of Heresies. Being a Reply to his Answer (53). The Doctor says: 'I have been informed from England, that a Gentleman, who is famous both for poetry, and several other things, has spent three months in translating M. Varillas's History; but that, as soon as my Reflexions appeared, he discontinued his labour, finding the credit of his author was gone. Now, if he thinks it is recovered by his Answer, he will perhaps go on with his translation; and this may be, for ought I know, as good an entertainment for him, as the conversation he has set on foot between the Hinds and Panthers, and all the rest of the animals; for whom M. Varillas may serve well enough as an author; and this History and that Poem are such extraordinary things of their kind, that it will be but suitable to see the author of the worst Poem become likewise the translator of the worst History, that the age has produced. If his grace and his wit improve both proportionably, we shall hardly find, that he has gained much by the change he has made, from having no religion to choose one of the worst. It is true, he had somewhat to sink from in matter of wit; but as for his morals, it is scarce possible for him to grow a worse man than he was. He has lately wreaked his malice on me for spoiling his three months labour; but in it he has done me all the honour that a man can receive from him; which is to be railed at by him. If I had ill-nature enough to prompt me to wish a very bad wish for him, it should be, that he would go on and finish his translation. By that it will appear, whether the English nation, which is the most competent judge in this matter, has, upon the seeing our debate, pronounced in M. Varillas's favour or me. It is true, Mr D. will suffer a little by it; but at least it will serve to keep him in from other extravagancies; and if he gains little honour by this work, yet he cannot lose so much by it as he has done by his last employment.' This passage, besides the fact it lets us into, shews how ill an opinion Dr Burnet had entertained of Mr Dryden (54).

[P] He was dismissed from the office of Poet-Laureat.] Mr Mat. Prior, in the Dedication of his Poems to the Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, having said of the great Earl of Dorset, that 'he was so inviolable in his friendship, and so kind to the character of those whom he had once honoured with a more intimate acquaintance, that nothing less than a demonstration of some essential fault could make him break with them; and then too his good nature did not consent to it without the greatest reluctance and difficulty:' adds; 'Let me give one instance of this among many. When, as Lord Chamberlain, he was obliged to take the King's pension from Mr Dryden, who had long before put himself out of a possibility of receiving any favour from the Court; my Lord allowed him an equivalent out of his own estate. However displeas'd with the conduct of his old acquaintance, he relieved his necessities; and while he gave him his assistance in private, in public lick he extenuated and pitied his error.'

[Q] His Mac Flecknoe.] This is one of the best, and severest, satires in the English language. Mr Richard Flecknoe, with whose name it is inscribed, was a very indifferent Poet of those times (55), or rather, as Mr Dryden expresses it (56),

In prose and verse, was own'd, without dispute,
Thro' all the realms of nonsense, absolute.

[R] The Translation of Juvenal and Perfius.] In the Dedication to the Earl of Dorset, Mr Dryden gives us the following account of this translation: 'I would excuse, says he (57), the performance of this translation, if it were all my own; but the better, tho' not the greater, part being the work of some gentlemen, who have succeeded very happily in their undertaking; let their excellencies atone for my imperfections, and those of my son's. I have perused some of the Satires, which are done by other hands; and they seem to me as perfect in their kind, as any thing I have seen in English verse. The common way, which we have taken, is not a literal translation, but a kind of paraphrase; or somewhat which is yet more loose, betwixt a paraphrase and imitation. It was not possible for us, or any men, to have made it pleasant any other way. If rendering the exact sense of these authors, almost line for line, had been our business, Barten Holiday had done it already to our hands.——But he wrote for fame, and wrote to scholars. We write only for the pleasure and entertainment of those Gentlemen and Ladies, who, though they are not scholars, are not ignorant: persons of understanding and good sense; who, not having been conversant in the original, or at least not having made Latin verse so much their business, as to be Criticks in it, would be glad to find, if the wit of our two great authors be answerable to their fame and reputation in the world.——This must be said for our translation, that if we give not the whole sense of Juvenal, yet we give the most considerable part of it: we give it, in general, so clearly, that few notes are sufficient to make us intelligible.——If sometimes any of us (and 'tis but seldom) make him express the customs and manners of our native country, rather than of Rome; 'tis either when there was some kind of analogy betwixt their customs and ours, or when, to make him more easy to vulgar understandings, we give him those manners, which are familiar to us.'

[S] His Translation of M. Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.] The Second Edition, corrected and enlarged, was published at London, in 1716. The Title is: The Art of Painting: By C. A. Du Fresnoy: With Remarks: Translated into English; with an Original Preface, containing a Parallel between Painting and Poetry: By Mr Dryden. As also a short account of the most eminent Painters, both ancient and modern: By R. G. Esq; It is dedicated to the Earl of Burlington. The editor acquaints us (58), that some liberties have been taken with this excellent translation; of which tion of all Virgil's Works [T]. Besides the Original Pieces and Translations hitherto mentioned, Mr Dryden wrote many others, published in the Six Volumes of Miscellanies (2), and which he gives the following account. 'The misfortune that attended him (Mr Dryden) in that undertaking, was, that, for want of a competent knowledge in Painting, he suffered himself to be misled by an unskillful guide. Monf de Piles told him, that his French Version was made at the request of the author himself, and alter'd by him till it was wholly to his mind. This Mr Dryden taking upon content, thought there was nothing more incumbent on him, than to put it into the best English he cou'd, and accordingly perform'd his part here (as in every thing else) with accuracy. But, it being manifest that the French translator has frequently mistaken the sense of his author, and very often also not set it in the most advantageous light; to do justice to Monf. du Fresnoy, Mr Jervas (a very good Critick in the language, as well as in the subject of the Poem) has been prevailed upon to correct what was found amiss: and his amendments are every where distinguished with proper marks.' Mr Dryden, in his Preface (59), tells us, it was not of his own choice that he undertook this work. 'Many, says he, of our most skillful Painters, and other Artists, were pleased to recommend this author to me, as one who perfectly understood the rules of painting, who gave the best and most concise instructions for performance, and the surest to form the judgment of all who loved this noble art.' He freely owns, he thought himself incapable of performing this translation, either to the satisfaction of others, or his own credit. 'Not, says he (60), but that I understood the original Latin, and the French author, perhaps as well as most Englishmen: but I was not sufficiently versed in the Terms of Art.' However, having obtained the assistance of others in this particular, he tells the reader, he may assure himself of a tolerable translation. 'In this one particular only, says he, I must beg the reader's pardon: the prose translation of the poem is not free from poetical expressions, and I dare not promise, that some of them are not rustian, or at least highly metaphorical; but this being a fault in the first digestion (that is, the original Latin) was not to be remedied in the second, viz. the translation.' When Mr Dryden undertook this work, he was already engag'd, he tells us (61), in the Translation of Virgil, from whom he borrowed only two months; and he acquaints us (62), that his preface was begun and ended in twelve mornings: 'and perhaps, says he, the judges of Painting and Poetry, when I tell them how short a time it cost me, may make me the same answer, which my Lord Rochester made to one, who, to commend a bad Tragedy, said it was written in three weeks; How the Devil could he be so long about it?' Mr Pope has address'd a copy of verses To Mr Jervas, with Fresnoy's Art of Painting, translated by Mr Dryden; in which are these lines:

Read these instructive leaves, in which conspire
Fresnoy's close art, and Dryden's native fire:
And reading wish, like theirs, our fate and fame,
So mix'd our studies, and so join'd our name;
Like them to shine thro' long succeeding age,
So just thy skill, so regular my rage (63).

[T] His Translation of Virgil.] It has passed thro' several editions, and appeared in various forms. The Pastorals (or Eclogues) are dedicated to Hugh Lord Clifford, Baron of Chudleigh. Mr Dryden tells his patron, 'What he now offers his Lordship, is the wretched remainder of a sickly age (*), worn out with study, and oppress'd by fortune; without other support than the constancy and patience of a Christian (64);' and he adds (65), that he began this work in his great climax. The Life of Virgil, which follows this Dedication, the two Prefaces to the Pastorals and Georgicks, and all the Arguments in prose to the whole Translation, were given him, he tells us (66) by two worthy friends of his (||), who, seeing him straitened in his time, took pity on him, and lent him their assistance. Besides which, Mr Dryden had the advantage of perusing the Earl of Lauderdale's translation of the Aeneis; of which he gives us the following account: 'The late Earl of Lauderdale sent me over his new translation of the Aeneis; which he had ended before I engaged in the same design. Neither did I then intend it: but some proposals being afterwards made me by my Bookseller, I desired his Lordship's leave that I might accept them; which he freely granted, and I have his letter yet to shew for that permission. He resolv'd to have printed his work; which he might have done two years before I could publish mine; and had performed it, if death had not prevented him (†). But having his manuscript in my hands, I consulted it as often as I doubted of my author's sense. For no man understood Virgil better than that learned nobleman (67). Mr Congreve, likewise, he tells us (68), did him the favour to revise the Aeneis, and compare his version with the original. And, I shall never be ashamed to own, adds Mr Dryden, that this excellent young man has shew'd me many faults, which I have endeavour'd to correct.' The translation of the Georgicks is dedicated to the Earl of Chesterfield; and that of the Aeneis to the Earl of Mulgrave. This latter dedication contains the author's thoughts on Epic Poetry, particularly that of Virgil. At the end of the Aeneis, is a postscript to the reader; in which Mr Dryden acquaints him (69), that the First Georgick, and the greatest part of the last Aeneid, were translated at Denham-Court, the house of Sir William Bowyer; and the Seventh Aeneid, at Burleigh, the seat of the Earl of Exeter. And speaking of some particular parts of Virgil, translated by other hands, he says: 'Whoever has given the world the translation of part of the Third Georgic, which he calls The Power of Love, has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his: As my Lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr Addison of Oxford has also been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account: After his Bees, my little swarm is scarcely worth the hiving. Mr Cowley's Praise of a Country Life, is rather an imitation of Virgil, than a version (70). Mr Dryden likewise informs us (71), that, when he began this work, Gilbert Dolben, Esq; son of Dr Dolben, Archbishop of York, made him a present of all the several Editions of Virgil, and all the Commentaries of those Editions in Latin: 'Amongst which, says he, I could not but prefer the Dauphin's, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrini I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.' The Postscript is followed by some Notes and Observations on Virgil's Works in English, which, the author tells us (72), he wrote par maniere d'acquit, because he had oblig'd himself by articles to do somewhat of that kind.

It is generally allowed, that Mr Dryden's translation of Virgil is, upon the whole, extremely well performed; at least, better than by any other Poet in any other language. Dr Felton says in it's commendation, that 'Those who excel him, where they observe he hath failed, will fall below him in a thousand instances where he hath excelled (73):' And Mr Pope, the best Poet of his times, speaking of Mr Dryden's translation of some parts of Homer, says, 'Had he translated the whole work, I would no more have attempted Homer after him, than Virgil; his version of whom (notwithstanding some human errors) is the most noble and spirited translation I know in any language (74).' Dr Trapp (75) charges Mr Dryden with grossly mistaking his author's sense in many places; with adding or retrenching, as his turn is best served by either; and with being least a translator, where he shines most as a Poet: and whereas it is a just rule laid down by my Lord Roscommon, that a translator, in regard to his author, should

Fall as he falls, and as he rises rise;

Mr Dryden, he tells us, frequently acts the very reverse of this precept; of which he produces some instances, and remarks in general, that the first six Books of

They consist of Translations from the Greek and Latin Poets; Epistles to several persons; Prologues and Epilogues to various Plays, and on various occasions; Elegies; Epitaphs; and Songs (a). His last work was his Fables [U], Ancient and Modern; translated into Verse from Homer, Ovid, Boccace, and Chaucer. A new Collection of our author's Poetical Works has been lately published (b), under the title of Original Poems and Translations, by John Dryden, Esq; now first collected and published together [IV]. As to his performances in prose, besides those already mentioned, he wrote the Lives of Plutarch and Lucian, prefixed to the translations of those authors by several hands; the Life of Polybius, before the translation of that Historian by Sir Henry Sheer; and the Preface to the Dialogue concerning Women, by Wm. Walsh, Esq; This great Poet died the first of May 1701 (c), and was interred in Westminster-Abbey [X], where a monument has been since erected over him, by John late Duke of Bucks [Y]. We shall set down his character, of the Aeneis, which are the best and most perfect in the Original, are the least so in the Translation, and the six last Books vice versa.

[U] His Fables.] To this work is prefixed, by way of Preface, a critical Account of the authors, from whom the Fables are translated. Among the original pieces, the Ode on St Cecilia's Day is justly esteemed one of the most perfect in any language, and has been set to music more than once; particularly, in the winter of the Year 1735, by that great master Mr Handel; and publickly performed, with the utmost applause, on the Theatre in Covent-Garden. Mr Pope has celebrated this Ode in the following lines:

And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love:
Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow;
Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow:
Persians and Greeks like turns of nature found,
And the world's victor stood subdu'd by sound:
The Power of Music all our hearts allow;
And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now (76).

All the other parts of this Miscellany are so excellent, that the reader must think Mr Dryden (as, he tells us (77), he thought himself) as vigorous as ever in the faculties of his soul, though he was sixty-eight years of age at the publication of this his last Work.

[W] Original Poems and Translations, by John Dryden, Esq; now first collected and published together.] The editor acquaints us in the preface with the motives to the publication of this collection. 'It was thought, he tells us, but justice to the productions of so excellent a poet, to set them free, at last, from so disadvantageous, if not unnatural, an union (viz. of being blended with the Compositions of inferior Writers); an union, which, like the cruelty of Mezentius in Virgil, was no less than a junction of living and dead bodies together.' And a little farther: 'It is now high time the Partnership should be dissolved, and Mr Dryden left to stand upon his own bottom. His Credit, as a Poet, is out of all danger, though the withdrawing his Stock may, probably, expose many of his Co-Partners to the hazard of a Poetical Bankruptcy.' There is a collection of Original Poems and Translations by Mr Dryden, published by J. Tonson, in 1701, in a thin folio: But, as it contains not much above half the pieces, so it does not at all answer the design of this collection, which, with the author's Plays, Fables, and Translations of Virgil, Juvenal, and Persius, is intended to complete Mr Dryden's Works in twelve Vols. The First volume of this collection consists of our author's Larger Poems; and the Second, of his Translations, Epistles, Prologues, Epilogues, Elegies, Epitaphs, and Songs. Particular care, we are told, has been taken to render this edition as correct as possible, by reforming numberless errors of the press, which have been continued down through all editions hitherto published; but especially by observing the strictest accuracy in the pointing: 'An article of correctness (says the editor very justly) too generally neglected, though so much of the beauty, as well as the perspicuity, of language depends upon it.'

[X] He was interred in Westminster-Abbey.] There are some circumstances, relating to the funeral of Mr

Dryden, recorded in the Memoirs of the Life of Mr Congreve (78); with which we shall entertain the reader. The day after Mr Dryden's death, the Dean of Westminster (79) sent word to the Lady Elizabeth Howard, Mr Dryden's widow, that he would make a present of the ground, and all the other Abbey Fees. The Lord Halifax likewise sent to the Lady Elizabeth, and Mr Charles Dryden her son, offering to defray the expences of our Poet's funeral, and afterwards to bestow 500 pounds on a monument in the Abbey; which generous offer was accepted. Accordingly, on the Sunday following, the company being assembled, the corps was put into a velvet hearse, attended by eighteen mourning coaches. When they were just ready to move, the Lord Jefferies, Son of the Lord Chancellor Jefferies, with some of his rakish companions, coming by, asked whose funeral it was; and being told, it was Mr Dryden's, he protested, he should not be buried in that private manner; that he would himself, with the Lady Elizabeth's leave, have the honour of his interment, and would bestow a thousand pounds on a monument in the Abbey for him. This put a stop to the procession, and Lord Jefferies, with several of the Gentlemen, who had alighted from the coaches, went up stairs to the Lady Elizabeth, who was sick in bed. His Lordship repeated the purport of what he had said below; but the Lady Elizabeth absolutely refusing her consent, he fell on his knees, vowing never to rise till his request was granted. The Lady, under a sudden surprize, fainted away; and Lord Jefferies, pretending to have obtained her consent, ordered the body to be carried to Mr Ruffel's an undertaker in Cheap-side, and leave it there till farther Orders. In the mean time, the Abbey was lighted up, the ground opened, the Choir attending, and the Bishop waiting some hours to no purpose for the corps. The next day, Mr Charles Dryden waited upon the Lord Halifax, and the Bishop, and endeavoured in vain to excuse his mother, by relating the truth. Three days after, the Undertaker, having received no orders, waited on the Lord Jefferies, who pretended, it was a drunken frolick, that he remembered nothing of the matter, and he might do what he pleased with the body. Upon this, the Undertaker waited on the Lady Elizabeth, who desired a day's respite, which was granted. Mr Charles Dryden immediately wrote to the Lord Jefferies, who returned for answer, 'That he knew nothing of the matter, and would be troubled no more about it. Mr Dryden applied again to the Lord Halifax, and the Bishop of Rochester, who absolutely refused to do any thing in the affair. In this distress, Dr Garth sent for the corps to the College of Physicians, and proposed a funeral by subscription: which succeeding, about three weeks after Mr Dryden's decease, Dr Garth pronounced a fine Latin Oration over the body; which was conveyed from the College, attended by a numerous train of coaches, to Westminster-Abbey. After the funeral, Mr Charles Dryden sent a challenge to the Lord Jefferies, which the latter refused; and Mr Dryden publickly declaring, he would watch every opportunity to meet and fight him, his Lordship thought fit to leave the town upon it.

[Y] A Monument has been since erected over him by John late Duke of Buckinghamshire.] Mr Dryden had no monument erected to him for several years; to which Mr Pope alludes in his Epitaph intended for Mr Rowe (80), in which is this line, speaking of Dryden:

It is insinuated, that he had offered himself for Holy Orders, but was refused; and had failed likewise in his application for the Provostship of Eaton-College (d). [Z] Mr Dryden's Character, as represented by different writers.] To shew our impartiality, we shall begin with Bishop Burnet, who, speaking of the corruption of the times, says: 'The Stage was defiled beyond all example, Dryden, the great master of Dramatic Poesy, being a monster of immodesty and impurities of all Sorts (81).' The late Lord Lansdown took upon himself to vindicate Mr Dryden's Character from this severe imputation. He observes (82), that, 'He was so much a stranger to Immodesty, that Modesty in too great a degree was his failing. A monster of impurities of all sorts! Adds his Lordship: Good God! What an idea must That give! Is there any wickedness under the Sun, but what is comprized in those few words? But, as it happens, he was the reverse of all this, a man of regular life and conversation, as all his acquaintance can vouch. And, I cannot but grieve, that such rash expressions should escape from a Bishop's pen. If bearing false witness against one's neighbour is a breach of the Commandment, Can there be a more flagrant one than this?' His Lordship concludes with observing, that Mr Dryden's writings 'Will do honour to his name and country, and his Poems last as long as the Bishop's Sermons.' Mr Burnet the Bishop's son, in reply to this passage of my Lord Lansdown's, observes (83), that Immodesty, in the Bishop's words, is not opposed to Modesty, but Chastness, and that this expression, as well as that of Impurities of all Sorts, can only be meant of Dramatick Poesy, of which only the Bishop was speaking; and have nothing to do with Mr Dryden's life and conversation. Indeed, he acknowledges, a writer more accurate in his stile, would rather have used the terms obscenities. Whereupon he asks: 'Are not Dryden's Comedies then full of obscenities, of immodesty, and impurities?' He instances in his Limberham, or The Kind Keeper; and then says: 'Where is the Clergyman, who would not merit his Lordship's esteem instead of censure, for calling this play a monster of immodesty and impurities of all sorts? And this, this only is Dr Burnet's crime, for which he is to be unbishop'd, unchristian'd, and stigmatiz'd as a flagrant false witness against his neighbour.' Mr Congreve, in the Dedication of our Poet's Dramatick Works to the Duke of Newcastle, has drawn his character to very great advantage. 'Mr Dryden, he tells us, had personal qualities to challenge both love and esteem from all who were truly acquainted with him. He was of a nature exceedingly humane and compassionate; easily forgiving injuries, and capable of a prompt and sincere reconciliation with them who had offended him. — His friendship, where he professed it, went much beyond his professions. — As his reading had been very extensive, so was he very happy in a memory tenacious of every thing that he had read. He was not more possessed of knowledge, than he was communicative of it. But then his communication of it was by no means pedantick, or imposed upon the conversation; but just such, and went so far, as by the natural turns of the discourse, in which he was engaged, it was necessarily promoted or required. He was extreme ready and gentle in his correction of the errors of any writer who thought fit to consult him; and full as ready and patient to admit of the Reprehension of others in respect of his own oversights or mistakes. He was of very easy, I may say, of very pleasing, access; but something slow, and as it were diffident in his advances to others. He had something in his nature that abhorred intrusion in any society whatsoever. Indeed it is to be regretted, that he was rather blameable in the other extremity: for by that means he was personally less known, and consequently his character might become liable both to misapprehensions and misrepresentations. — He was, of all the men that ever I knew, one of the most modest, and the most easily to be discountenanced, in his approaches, either to his superiors, or his equals. — As to his Writings — I may venture to say in general terms, that no man hath written in our language so much, and so various matter, and in so various manners, so well. Another thing I may say very peculiar to him; which is, that his parts did not decline with his years; but that he was an improving writer to the last, even to near seventy years of age; improving even in fire and imagination; as well as in judgment: witness his Ode on St Cecilia's Day, and his Fables, his latest performances. He was equally excellent in verse and in prose. His prose had all the clearness imaginable, together with all the nobleness of expression; all the graces and ornaments proper and peculiar to it, without deviating into the language or diction of poetry. — I have heard him frequently own with pleasure, that if he had any talent for English prose, it was owing to his having often read the writings of the great Archbishop Tillotson. His versification and his numbers he could learn of nobody: for he first possessed those talents in perfection in our tongue: and they who have best succeeded in them since his time have been indebted to his example; and the more they have been able to imitate him, the better have they succeeded. — In his Poems, his Diction is, wherever his subject requires it, so sublimely and so truly poetical, that it's essence, like that of pure gold, cannot be destroyed. Take his verses, and divest them of their rhimes, disjoint them in their numbers, transpose their expressions, make what arrangement and disposition you please of his words, yet shall there eternally be poetry, and something which will be found incapable of being reduced into absolute prose. — What he has done in any one species, or distinct kind (of writing), would have been sufficient to have acquired him a great name. If he had written nothing but his Prefaces, or nothing but his Songs, or his Prologues, each of them would have entitled him to the preference and distinction of excelling in his kind.' It should be remembered, that Mr Congreve, in drawing this character of Mr Dryden, discharged an obligation laid upon him by our Poet in these lines (84):

Be kind to my remains; and O defend,
Against your judgment, your departed friend!
Let not th'insulting foe my fame pursue,
But shade those laurels which descend to you.

Dr Garth, in his Preface to the translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, in which Mr Dryden's share is considerable, speaks of him as follows: 'I cannot pass by that admirable English Poet, without endeavouring to make his country sensible of the obligations they have to his Muse. Whether they consider the flowing grace of his versification; the vigorous fallies of his fancy; or the peculiar delicacy of his periods; they'll discover excellencies never to be enough admired. If they trace him from the first productions of his youth, to the last performances of his age, they'll find, that, as the tyranny of rhyme never imposed on the perspicuity of the sense, so a languid

‘ sense never wanted to be set off by the harmony of ‘ rhyme. And as his earlier works wanted no matura‘ rity, so his latter wanted no force or spirit. ———
‘ As a translator, he was just; as an inventor, he was ‘ rich. ——— With all these wond’rous talents, he was ‘ libelled in his life-time by the very men, who had no ‘ other excellencies, but as they were his imitators.
‘ Where he was allow’d to have sentiments superior to all ‘ others, they charged him with theft: But how did ‘ he steal? no otherwise than like those, that steal
‘ beggars children, only to cloath them the better.’
The testimony of so great a Poet, and so good a judge, as Mr Pope, must not be omitted, when we are setting down the praises of Mr Dryden. In a letter to Mr Wycherley, dated December the 26th, 1704 (85), he says: ‘ It was certainly a great satisfaction to me,
‘ to see and converse with a man, whom in his writ‘ ings I had so long known with pleasure. But it was ‘ a high addition to it, to hear you at our very first ‘ meeting doing justice to your dead friend Mr Dryden.
‘ I was not so happy as to know him; Virgilium tan-‘ tam vidi. Had I been born early enough, I must ‘ have known and loved him. For I have been af‘ fured, not only by yourself, but by Mr Congreve
‘ and Sir William Trumbul, that his personal qualities ‘ were as amiable as his poetical, notwithstanding the ‘ many libellous misrepresentations of them; against ‘ which the former of these Gentlemen has told me
‘ he will one day vindicate him (*). I suppose those ‘ injuries were begun by the violence of party; but ‘ it is no doubt they were continued by envy at his ‘ success and fame. And these scribblers, who attack-

‘ ed him in his latter times, were only like gnats in a ‘ summer’s evening, which are never troublesome, but ‘ in the finest and most glorious season; for his Fire,
‘ like the Sun’s, shone clearest towards it’s setting.’
The Editor of Original Poems and Translations by John Dryden, Esq; &c. (86), speaking, in the Preface, of his Character, says: ‘ Posterity has been just to his ‘ Fame, and he stands now in full possession of that ‘ established Reputation, so justly due to the spright-‘ liness of his wit, the liveliness of his imagination, ‘ the beauty of his sentiments and expression, but ‘ especially that improved harmony of his Numbers, ‘ so happily begun by his predecessor Mr Waller; and ‘ if since brought to a greater perfection by a P O E T ‘ of our own times (+), it is what he himself always ‘ owned to be owing to the foundation laid by Mr ‘ Dryden. To this honour may be added another, ‘ that he improved our Prose as much as our Verse,
‘ and is, in that way too, one of the most correct
‘ writers in the English Language.’

Charles became Usher of the Palace to Pope Clement XI.
to officiate in his room, and was drowned in swimming cross the Thames near Windsor, in 1704. He wrote several pieces, and translated the Sixth Satire of Juvenal. Mr John Dryden translated the Fourteenth Satire of Juvenal, and was author of a Comedy intitled, The Husband his own Cuckold (87). He died at Rome not many months after his father. Mr Henry

DUDLEY, the surname of a noble family in England, formerly Viscounts L’Isle, Earls of Warwick and Leicester, and Dukes of Northumberland (a). In order to give the reader a clear and distinct account of this great House, concerning which many of our best writers have fallen into palpable errors, it is requisite to observe, that this surname was taken from the castle of Dudley, and assumed as the antient custom of England was, by the younger children of the Barons of that place (b). This castle stands upon the very edge of Staffordshire, on the summit of a lofty rock, affording a free and pleasant prospect over a vast extent of country (c). So much as remains of it, (for, in spite of the injuries of time, and of men far less merciful, there are still some remains,) may claim the honour of being part of one of the oldest fortresses in this island (d). Dudo, an English Saxon, bestowed his name upon it about the year 700 (e). At the time of the Norman Conquest it was granted to a Norman Baron, whose name was Fitz-Ausculph (f), but did not remain long in his family; for the daughter of William Fitz-Ausculph being married to Fulk Paganel, brought with her the inheritance of Dudley-Castle, which descended to her son Ralph Paganel, who took up arms for the Empress Maud against King Stephen (g). His son Gervase Paganel married Isabel, daughter to Robert Earl of Leicester, by whom he had a daughter Hawise, who was first married to John de Somery, and afterwards to Roger de Berkeley, of Berkeley-Castle (h). Her son by the first marriage, Ralph de Somery, was Baron of Dudley in right of his mother, and flourished in the reign of Richard I. The male heirs of this family ended in John de Somery, who died in the fiftenth of Edward II. leaving his sisters, Margaretta and Joan, coheiresses. The eldest of these sisters, Margaret, married Sir John Sutton, of the an-tient Saxon family of Sutton in Nottinghamshire, who became, in her right, Baron of Dudley (i). This noble person, taking part with Thomas Earl of Lancaster against the evil Ministers of Edward II. was compelled, in order to save his life, to convey all his right and title in the castle and manor of Dudley, and many other large estates, to Hugh le Despencer, son to Hugh Earl of Winchester; but, in the first of Edward III. he obtained restitution of them all (k). His son John married Isabel, daughter to John de Charlton, Lord of Powis, by whom he had a son named John, concerning whom there occurs little either in Records or History, except that he inherited a great estate from his grandmother (l). He died in the eighth of Henry IV. leaving a son of the same name, who was then five years of age, and who carried the standard at the solemn funeral of Henry V (m). He was in great favour with King Henry VI. or rather with his uncle the good Duke of Gloucester, by whom he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and sworn into that high office in the month of January 1428 (n). According to Sir William Dugdale’s account, this noble person was honoured with many other high employments in that reign, and lived much beyond it; of which there is some reason to doubt, since we have the positive authority of Sir Philip Sydney to the contrary (o), who seems to have been well acquainted with, and to have taken great pains about, the genealogy of his family. It is therefore highly probable, that his son John Sutton, Baron of Dudley (p), succeeded him in that title pretty early in that reign, and was employed in many great affairs during the continuance of it, and particularly in an embassy to France, where he was attended by Leon d'Or, a Pursuivant of his own (q). After his return he obtained several large grants from the Crown, was advanced to be Treasurer of the King's Household, and, in the 39th year of his reign, was elected one of the Knights Companions of the most noble Order of the Garter (r). After the accession of King Edward IV. he grew likewise into great favour with that Prince, and, in the very first year of his reign, obtained a special discharge, under the Broad Seal, for all such sums of money as might be due and owing from him on account of the post he held in the former reign (s); in the fourth year of the same King he obtained a grant of one hundred marks per annum, out of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, for his great integrity, and in consideration of his large expences in the King's service; and the year following had another grant of one hundred pounds a year for life, out of the customs of the port of Southampton (t). He was also employed, together with the Earl of Arundel, and other noble persons, to treat with the French King for a continuance of peace, and intrusted in many other affairs of great consequence by his royal master (u). Sir William Dugdale was of opinion, that he died towards the close of that reign, and mentions his being succeeded in his barony by his grandson John, who, he assures us, was summoned to Parliament the first of Richard III (w). It is however evident, from the Register of the Order of the Garter, that the old Lord lived not only through that reign, but even so low as that of Henry VII (x), and that there never was any such grandson as Sir William Dugdale, misled by more antient writers, supposes [A]. On the contrary, this John Sutton, Lord Dudley, was appointed [A] As Sir William Dugdale, misled by more antient writers, supposes.] It is a point that enters strictly within the plan of this work, and must at the same time be of much publick utility, to correct, where it can be done, the genealogies of great families, more especially when the mistakes about them receive countenance from authors of great character. This happens to be the case of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, whose succession the learned Sir William Dugdale found recorded in the Heralds books, particularly in the collections of Glover, who was a man of great reputation; and to these he laboured, as well as he could, to reconcile the circumstances he met with in the patent rolls, and those of Parliament. Now there being great mistakes in those collections, it was impossible that Sir William Dugdale, reducing the facts he met with to these erroneous pedigrees, should fail of adding to the mistakes, as we shall plainly prove he did: but first let us see what that great man has said.

After observing that John Sutton Baron of Dudley, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Sir John Berkeley, and widow of the Lord Powis, had issue three sons, Edmund, John, and William, and a daughter Margaret (1), in which he is certainly right, he proceeds thus: 'Which Edmund, in 7 Edward IV, being then a Knight, accompanied (2) John Earl of Worcester, Deputy to George Duke of Clarence, Lieutenant of Ireland, into that realm, for the safeguard thereof: and in the thirteenth of the same reign, in consideration of his expences (3) in the King's service, as well in this realm as in Ireland, obtained the stewardship of the manor of Aberbury in the county of Salop, then in the King's disposal, by reason of the minority of George, son and heir to John Earl of Shrewsbury, but died in his father's life-time, leaving issue by Joyce, his first wife, sister and co-heir to John Tiptoft Earl of Worcester, John his son and heir, as also four other sons, viz. Arthur, Geoffry, Thomas, and George, and a daughter called Alianore, married to Charles Somerset Earl of Worcester: and by Maud his second wife, daughter of Thomas Lord Clifford, two sons, Thomas, who married _____, daughter and coheir to Lancelot Threlkeld of Gerworth, and Richard a Clerk: as also four daughters, viz. Joyce, married to William Middleton, of Stokkelde in the county of York, Esq; Margaret to Edward Lord Powis; Alice to Sir John Ratcliffe, of Ordsale in the county of Lancaster, Knight; and Dorothy, to Sir John Musgrave, Knight (4). Which John, in the first of Richard III, obtained a grant to himself, and the heirs male of his body, of the manors of Derlaston, Bentley, Tittesovre, Hertwel, Pakynton, and Newton in the Moors, in com. Stafford, Bruggenorth in the county of Salop, and Rokeby in the county of Warwick. And by his testament, bearing date the 17th of August anno 1487 (2 Hen. VII. (5)) he bequeathed his body to be buried (6) within the priory of St James at Dudley, appointing that a tomb should be set over his grave. Also that twenty four new torches should be lighted during the performance of divine service at his funeral; likewise that every Priest or religious person coming thereto should have four pence, and every Clerk singing three pence. Moreover, that twenty marks in money should be disposed in alms the same day, and on the morrow, to poor people to pray for his soul, and for the soul of his wife and all their friends. Furthermore, that a thousand masses should be said for him so soon as possible after his burial, which masses to cost sixteen pounds thirteen shillings, and fourpence. And having been summoned to Parliament (7) from the first of Richard III till the third of Henry VII, died soon after, leaving issue by (8) Cecily his wife, daughter of Sir William Willughby, Knt. Edward his son and heir, Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter (9), elected shortly after the beginning of King Henry VIIIth's reign: and summoned to Parliament from the seventh of Henry VII, to the twenty-first of Henry VIII, inclusive.'

The first error that occurs in this account, is, that Edmund did not die in the life-time of his father John, Baron of Dudley, but succeeded him in that honour. The next, that by his wife Joyce he was not father of any of the children mentioned by Dugdale, but had by her an only son whom he does not mention, viz. Edward, who succeeded him in the barony, and was Knight of the Garter, whom Dugdale makes his grandson. As to the children by the second marriage they are right, except the first, whose name was Jane and not Joyce. With respect to the grants made to, and the will made by, John Lord Sutton, son to Edmund, they really relate to his father; and whereas he says, that this John married Cecily, daughter to Sir William Willughby, the truth is, that Edward Sutton, Lord Dudley, son of Edmund Lord Dudley, married that Lady, and had by her John Sutton Lord Dudley, and also a daughter Eleanor, who married Charles Somerset Earl of Worcester, which Lady, Dugdale makes to have been the daughter of Edmund Sutton Lord Dudley, by his first wife. These facts are set right from a manuscript Peerage of England written in the year 1596 (11), and that they are really set right will appear from hence, that whereas Dugdale makes John, Baron of Dudley, son to Edmund, decease in the beginning of the reign of Henry VII, it is evident beyond all contradiction from the register of that most noble Order, this was John Sutton Lord Dudley (12), Knight of the Garter, not the son, but the father of Edmund. The reason of these mistakes was this, Sir William Dugdale was persuaded, that John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, who was born in the third year of Henry appointed, by King Edward V. which is very remarkable, to hold the feast of St George at Windsor; which he accordingly did on the 24th of May 1483 (y). He was also present in a Chapter of the Order held in King Richard the Third's palace in Westminster, in the first year of his reign. In the third year of King Henry VII. the feast of St George being held with extraordinary solemnity, and offerings then made for the Knight's Companions deceased, according to the custom of the Order, we find the sword of John Lord Dudley, or, as they spelt it in those days, Dudely, offered by the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Lord Denham (z). This noble person espoused Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Berkeley, of Beverston in the county of Gloucester, Knight, by whom he had issue three sons and one daughter; his eldest son Edmund Sutton (a), from whom the Barons Dudley descended; which title remains to our times, as will be shewn in the notes [B]; William, who became, in process of time, Bishop of Durham, and died in 1483 (b), was the youngest son; Margaret his daughter married Sir George Longueville, of Little Billing in the county of Northampton, Knight. The second son of this noble Peer was Sir John Dudley, Knight, who married Elizabeth, one of the two daughters of Sir John Bramshot, of Bramshot in the county of Suffex, Knight (c), and by her he had only one son Edmund, of whom in the next article.

Henry IV, was Knight of the Garter in the reign of Henry VI, and father to Edmund Sutton; whereas, in truth, he was his grandfather by another John whom he does not mention at all: farther still, whereas Dugdale says that John Sutton married Cecily, daughter of Sir William Willughby, Knt. and had by her Edward his son and heir; whereas the manuscript before cited says, that Edward Lord Dudley married that Lady, and had by her a son John and a daughter Alianore. We can prove from Sir William Dugdale himself, that the account in the manuscript is right, and his own is wrong; for, speaking of Charles Somersset Earl of Worcester, he tells us, that his third wife was Eleanor, daughter of Edward Lord Dudley (13), and not John Lord Dudley, as set forth in the article of that noble family. But notwithstanding these mistakes, and those that have been discovered by others, his work is truly valuable, since, before it appeared, we had nothing upon the subject in any degree worthy of it, and we should have had, in all probability, nothing worthy of it yet, if Sir William Dugdale's labours had never appeared; but the most diligent and careful man living may be misled if he trusts to bad guides, or if he travels at a time when none but bad guides are to be had.

[B] As will be shewn in the notes In the former note we have shewn that Edward Lord Dudley, by Cecily his wife, had issue John, his son and heir, who married Cecily daughter of Thomas Gray, Marquis of Dorset, by whom he had his son and successor, Edward Lord Dudley (14), who was in great favour with Queen Mary (15), and who deceased July 4, 1586: He married, first, Catherine, daughter to the Lord Chandos, by whom he had an only daughter (16); secondly, Jane, daughter to the Earl of Derby, by whom he had two sons, Edward and John; and thirdly, he married Mary, daughter to William Lord Howard of Effingham (17). His son Edward, Lord Dudley, espoused Theodosia, daughter of Sir James Harrington, Knight, by whom he had a son, Ferdinando, and three daughters; Mary married to James Earl of Hume, in Scotland; Anne, who was the wife of Baron Schomberg, and the mother of the great Marshal Schomberg; and Margaret, who married Sir Miles Hobart, Knight of the Bath (18): As for his son Ferdinando, he was made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, and espousing Honora daughter to the Lord Beauchamp, and grand-daughter to the Earl of Hertford, had issue by her an only daughter, Frances (19). He died November 22, 1621, in his father's life-time. The old Baron of Dudley being a man of very dissolute life, ruined the large estate which descended to him from his ancestors, and to repair it married his grand-daughter Frances to Humble Ward, Esq; (20), the son of a rich Goldsmith of London, descended from the ancient family of the Wards, in Norfolk. This Gentleman adhering steadily to his Sovereign, King Charles the First, in all his troubles, was by him knighted at Oxford, June 24, 1643, and on the 23d of March, the same year, was created Baron Ward of Birmingham, in the County of Warwick, and in that year, likewise, deceased the old Lord Dudley, by which the honour descended to Lady Ward (21). Humble, Lord Ward, died October 4, 1670, having had issue three sons and four daughters; Edward, the eldest son, succeeded in the honour and estate, John died an infant, and William, the third son, settled at Willingworth in the County of Stafford (22). Edward, Lord Ward, became, a very little before his death, Lord Dudley, by the decease of his mother in 1701; by his Lady Frances, daughter of Sir William Brereton of Cheshire, Baronet, and sole heiress to her brother, he had three sons, John, William, and Ferdinand, and three daughters; the eldest and youngest of his sons died unmarried, William, the second son, married Frances, daughter of Thomas Dilkes, Esq; by whom he had three sons and a daughter, Frances, who married William Lea, Esq; of Hale-Owen, in the County of Salop, and died in the life-time of his father; upon the demise therefore of Edward, Lord Dudley and Ward, the titles descended to the eldest son of William, beforementioned: Which Edward Lord Dudley and Ward, married Diana, daughter of Thomas Howard of Ashled, in the County of Surrey, Esq; and dying March 28, 1704, under-age, left his Lady big with child of a son, who was Edward Lord Dudley and Ward. He dying September 6, 1731, unmarried, his honours and estate devolved upon his uncle William, son to William Ward, Esq; second son to Edward, first Lord Dudley and Ward, and he dying unmarried, the title of Dudley descended to Ferdinando Dudley Lea, son of Frances, daughter of William Ward, Esq; beforementioned (23). As for the barony of Ward, it descended to John Ward of Sedgley Park in the county of Stafford, Esq; grandson of William Ward of Willingworth, third son of Humble, first Lord Ward of Birmingham, and this Nobleman is now in possession of Dudley castle (24).

DUDLEY (EDMUND), a celebrated Lawyer, and able Statesman, in the reign of Henry VII. He was, as we have before informed the reader, the grandson of John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, and Knight of the Garter, by his second son Sir John Dudley (a); and, therefore, the malicious reports of his being the son of a Mechanick, and that the whole story of his descent was a fable, framed by his son's flatterers in the time of his greatness, though adopted by some authors of reputation, is equally groundless and ridiculous (b) [A]. He was born some time in the year 1462, in the second year of the reign

[A] Is equally groundless and ridiculous. We cannot set this matter in a clearer light, than by giving the reader what the famous Dr Fuller has said upon this subject (1). 'Edmund Dudley, Esq; says he, 'was son to John Dudley, Esq; second son to John Sutton first Baron of Dudley, as a learned Antiquary reign of Edward IV. and his father having, in his own, and in his wife's right, a very plentiful fortune, he received a suitable education (c); and, discovering very early the great pregnancy of his parts, he was sent, in the year 1478 (d), to the University of Oxford, being then about the age of sixteen. When he had spent there some time in the study of ancient learning, he was removed to London, and, being intended for the profession of the Law, he was placed in Gray's-Inn (e), where, when he afterwards became so eminent, his arms, finely depicted, amongst those of many other noble and illustrious persons, were placed in one of the windows of the Hall (f). It is very certain, that he studied the Law with great diligence, and came to be very soon considered as one of the most considerable ‘ hath beheld his pedigree derived. But his descent is controverted by many, condemned by some, who have raised a report that John, father to this Edmund, was but a Carpenter, born in Dudley town, (and therefore called John Dudley) who travelling southward to find work for his trade, lived at Lewes in Suffex, where they will have this Edmund born, and for the pregnancy of his parts, brought up by the Abbot of Lewes in learning. But probably some who afterwards were pinched in their purses by this Edmund, did in revenge give him this bite in his reputation, inventing this tale to his disparagement. I must believe him of noble extraction, because qualified to marry the daughter and heir of the Viscount L'Isle, and that before this Edmund grew so great with King Henry VII, as by the age of John his son, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, may probably be collected.’ This writer is frequently unhappy in his accounts, in which he is too often followed by such as have written since his time. He says that Edmund Dudley was the grandson of John Sutton, first Baron of Dudley; in the very page before this he informs us, that William Dudley Bishop of Durham, who died in 1483, was the son of John Dudley, the eighth Baron of Dudley, of Dudley castle in the county of Stafford (2). Now there is nothing more certain, than that this William Dudley was the uncle of our Edmund Dudley, and that his father John Dudley, the eighth Baron of Dudley, was the very same person with John Sutton the first Baron of Dudley, which Dr Fuller might easily have discerned, if he had considered the time when these Dudleys lived. The story of the Carpenter he had out of a manuscript intitled A View of Staffordshire, by Samson Erderfwick, Esq; which he highly commends (3). This tale, which Fuller treats as it deserves, passed for true History with all the enemies of the Leicester family. In a famous Popish libel in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, I find it observed of Robert Earl of Leicester (4). ‘ That he was the son of a Duke, the brother of a King, grandson of an Esquire, and great grandchild of a Carpenter. The Carpenter, says my author, was in all likelihood the happiest of his race, for he perhaps was an honest man and died in his bed.’ But though Dr Fuller is right in his criticism, yet he is right upon wrong grounds, for he did not marry the daughter and heir of the Viscount L'Isle before he was high in King Henry's favour, since that match was the pure effects of it, the Lady being the King's ward (5). His other argument is still worse, for John, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, was not born till eight years after the marriage, and not quite six years before the King's death (6); so that if it proves any thing, it must prove directly the reverse of what he cites it to prove. In our subsequent articles the reader will see the true reason, why the foolish story of the Carpenter came to gain any credit, and that was the endeavours of this Gentleman's son to deprive the chief of his family of his honour and dignity, and to attribute to himself, in a direct descent from his ancestors, the barony of Dudley, to which indeed they never had any title at all; and thus from a malignant ambition in him to be descended wholly from Lords, his enemies took the advantage of suggesting, that his grandfather was not so much as a gentleman, and so turned his own art upon himself, or rather upon his descendants.

But we cannot part with this matter thus. There was another writer of much greater figure than Dr Fuller, whom the story of the Carpenter alarmed, and who, though he professes that he was satisfied this was false, yet he saw no reason to believe that our Edmund Dudley was descended from the Barons of Dudley, though he knew that with his own hand that Gentleman, in a pedigree of his family, asserted himself to be (7). But notwithstanding this, Sir William Dugdale thinks he might be the son of some Gentleman of the name of Dudley, but not of the Baron's family, of which he says there are many in several parts of England. Upon the whole he suggests, that though the father of Edmund Dudley was without doubt a Gentleman, since he married a woman of considerable family and fortune, yet it was not impossible that his grandfather might be a Carpenter, or if not his grandfather, his great-grandfather. In answer to this we shall observe, first, that it is a very strange thing Sir William Dugdale should doubt, that so wise and learned a man as Mr Dudley is on all hands confessed to be, should not know who his grandfather was as well as Mr Erderfwick, the father of this tale of the Carpenter. In the next place, Why, since this tale is absolutely false as to his father, which is the matter of fact affirmed, must it be supposed true of his grandfather, or his great-grandfather, of which there is not a word said any where? But, thirdly, though Sir William Dugdale asserted this in his History of Warwickshire, yet afterwards, when he came to examine things better, in order to compose a History of our Nobility in general, he thought fit to abandon this notion, and though his account of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, is not very exact, yet he is very clear that Edmund Dudley was really the son of John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, and consequently allows that neither his grandfather, nor his great-grandfather, could be a Carpenter.

But since we have said so much upon this head, we will go a little farther, and put it entirely out of doubt, both by reason and authority. In the first place let it be observed, that Edmund Dudley, Esq; was admitted into the service and Council of King Henry VII. in the first year of his reign, when that gentleman was in the twenty-third or fourth year of his age, and in the life time of his grandfather, John, Lord Dudley, Knight of the Garter. Now, though it is said that he owed this preferment to his prudence and reputation, yet is it not reasonable to suppose, that these might have been overlooked, if he had not been also a man of quality? In the next place, when Perkin Warbeck published a proclamation, in which he reproached King Henry VII. with admitting many mean and low men into his Councils, of whom he gives a long catalogue (8). Can one imagine, that if Edmund Dudley's birth had not been truly noble, he would not have stood there, as well as Sir Richard Empson, Bishop Fox, and Sir Reginald Bray? Thirdly, How came Bale, Pitts, and all the old writers in general, to insist so expressly on the nobility of his birth, without the least note of doubt, or suspicion of the matter? Fourthly, when so much weight is every where laid upon the mean birth of Sir Richard Empson, who was the son of a sieve-maker at Towcester; how can it be conceived that Edmund Dudley, in the same condemnation, should be mentioned by the same writers with so much respect for his birth, if it had not been in those times, as clear as any thing could be? or, what but respect to his family could move King Henry VIII. to restore his son, a child of eight years old, in blood, and give him his estate. Lastly, in point of authority, I shall mention but one writer, because his name is sufficient to silence all disputes, it is the famous John Leland, who, in his Itinerary, has these words (9). ‘ The Viscount (9) Vol. VIII. p. 29. ‘ Duddleley now being, is of the Suttons, that married the heirs general of the Duddelys. He cometh by his mother side, of the Talbot, Lord or Viscount Lisle.’ This is spoken of Sir John Dudley, Viscount Lisle, and being set down in a note book merely for his proper use, cannot be suspected, since no Antiquary desires to deceive himself.

considerable persons of the profession; which induced Henry VII. a Prince who was an excellent judge of the talents of men, to take him very early into his service (g); it is also said, that, for his singular prudence and fidelity, he was sworn of the King's Privy-Council, in the 23d year of his age (h); and, as Polydore Virgil affirms this, who was then here, there can be no cause to doubt. In 1492 we find he was one of those great men in the King's army near Bologne, who offered propositions to the King for the conclusion of a treaty with France, and advised him to comply with them (i); which he at their intercession did, and a peace was accordingly signed November 6th, 1492. This was the finest stroke in politicks of that reign; and though the peace was very far from being well received in England, yet it answered the King's purposes compleatly, and was highly honourable for this nation, since an annual tribute was, in plain terms, stipulated, and actually paid during the remainder of this reign and part of the next (k) [B]. It is highly probable, that Mr Dudley was one of the King's principal instruments in this intrigue, since, two years afterwards, we find he obtained the wardship and marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Grey, Viscount L'Isle, sister and coheirefs of John Viscount L'Isle, her brother (l). In 1499 he was one of those who signed the ratification of the peace before-mentioned, by authority of Parliament (m). This plainly shews, that he was a person in great credit with his country, as well as in high favour with his Prince, whom he served in promoting the filling of his coffers, under colour of the Law, though with very little respect to the principles of equity and justice, as an able and excellent author informs us (n) [C]. But, in what capacity he did this, is not at all in our power to assert. We

It was a maxim with Henry VII. to have as little to do with the Continent as possible, but when he was obliged to have to do with it, he carried things as high as he could. In the beginning of his reign, he had temporized with the French King, to prevent having a foreign war and domestick broils to deal with at the same time. But finding the French grew upon him, he resolved to make war in such a manner, as should procure him peace for the future (10). He laid before the Parliament, therefore, the ground of his quarrel, in which he was certainly right. For this induced them to espouse the proposal of a war very warmly; but to avoid oppressing the meaner sort of people in raising money for the support of it, they granted the King a benevolence by law, which was collected by way of request, but of the better sort only, and brought in a vast sum of money (11). The King on his part, raised an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and one thousand six hundred horse, and attended by the flower of his Nobility, passed the seas after Michaelmas 1492. And as if he intended no time should be lost, he afterwards actually opened the siege of Bologne, though propositions had been made for amicably composing all disputes; upon which a negotiation was begun, and while the siege went on, a peace was concluded by the commissioners, to continue for both Kings lives; 'in which, says Lord Bacon (12), there was no article of importance, being in effect, rather a bargain than a treaty. For all things remained as they were, save, that there should be paid to the King, seven hundred and forty five thousand ducats, in present, for his charges in that journey, and five and twenty thousand crowns yearly, for his charges sustained in the aids of the Britains. For which annual sum, though he had Maximilian bound before for those charges, yet he counted the alteration of the hand, as much as the principal debt. And besides, it was left somewhat indefinitely, when it should determine or expire, which made the English esteem it as a tribute carried under fair terms. And the truth is, it was paid both to the King, and to his son King Henry VIII. longer than it could continue upon any computation of charges. There was also assigned by the French King, unto all the King's principal Counsellors, great pensions, besides rich gifts for the present. Which, whether the King did permit to save his own purse from rewards, or to communicate the envy of a business that was displeasing to his people, was diversly interpreted. For certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this peace. And therefore, a little before it was concluded, he had, underhand, procured some of his best captains and men of war, to advise him to a peace under their hands in an earnest manner, in the nature of a supplication. But the truth is, this peace was welcome to both Kings. To Charles, for, that it assured unto him the possession of Britain, and freed the enterprize of Naples. To Henry; for, that it filled his coffers; and, that he foresaw at that time, a storm of inward troubles coming upon him, which presently after brake forth. But it gave no less discontent to the nobility and principal persons of the army, who had many of them sold, or engaged their estates upon the hopes of the war. They stuck not to say, that the King cared not to plume his nobility and people to feather himself. And some made themselves merry with, that the King had said in Parliament, that after the war was once begun, he doubted not but to make it pay itself; saying, he had kept promise.' The curious reader may find a very fair and full account of this matter in the French Historians, which will convince him, that they differed very little in their judgment of the matter from us, that is, they thought the honour of the nation highly concerned, and blamed Lewis XII. who succeeded in 1498, for renewing this treaty, and undertaking to continue the payment of those sums annually, which had been stipulated by his father (13). This they say he might very well do for the sake of peace, but then he should have done it as an act of his own, and not as heir and successor to his father, and so bound to comply with, and discharge his engagements (14).

[C] As an able and excellent author informs us.] In all our general histories, this matter is handled in the gross, so that it is very difficult to conceive wherein the crimes of Empson and Dudley consisted; but Lord Bacon, who understood the matter well, relates every circumstance freely and fully, in the following manner (15). 'As Kings do more easily find instruments for their will and humour, than for their service and honour; he had gotten for his purpose, or beyond his purpose, two instruments, Empson and Dudley, bold men and careless of fame, and that took toll of their master's grist. Dudley was of a good family, eloquent, and one that could put hateful business into good language. But Empson, that was the son of a Sieve maker, triumphed always upon the deed done, putting off all other respects whatsoever. These two persons being Lawyers in science, and Privy-Counsellors in authority, turned law and justice into worm-wood and rapine. For first, their manner was to cause divers subjects to be indicted of sundry crimes, and so far forth to proceed in form of law; but when the bills were found, then presently to commit them: and nevertheless, not to produce them in any reasonable time to their answer, but to suffer them to languish long in prison, and by sundry artificial devices and terrors, to extort from them great fines and ransoms, which they termed compositions and mitigations. Neither did they toward the end, observe so much as the half face of justice in proceeding by indictment, but sent forth their precepts to attach men, and convent them before themselves and some others, at their private houses in a Court of Commis-are assured by Stowe, that, in 1497, he was Under-Sheriff of London, and continued so for six years (o); which might, indeed, put it in his power to pack Juries, and to have a hand in other enormities with which he was charged; but, that the same person should, at the same time, be Under-Sheriff of London, one of the most distinguished Lawyers at the Bar, and a Privy-Counsellor, is not to be conceived (p). The ingenious Dr Fuller gives us a more plausible account, for he makes him a puisne Judge (q); but it happens unluckily, that, had he been so, it must have appeared, which it does not. Besides, as a Judge, he could not have meddled with the King's revenue; as a Baron of the Exchequer he might, but neither was he that. Polydore Virgil, who was well acquainted with those times, tells us, what both he and Sir Richard Empson were, but he tells it us in Latin; they were, says he, Fiscales Judices (r); the misfortune is, that we do not know how to put this into English. It might, perhaps, be no improbable guess, that they were Attorney and Solicitor General; for which, however, no direct authority can be alledged. In the Parliament held in 1504, Edmund Dudley, Esq; was Speaker of the House of Commons (s), and, about the same time, was, by the King's writ, discharged from the state and degree of a Serjeant at Law (t), as Sir William Dugdale tells us; another writer calls it degraded, which, however it may sound, was, in reality, an act of favour (u) [D]. In the Parliament in which this Gentleman was Speaker, there were several acts passed, much for the publick benefit; but which, at the same time, very plainly discovered, that they were framed and digested by Lawyers; and this, perhaps, was one reason why they were found very practicable in the execution, and, like many other laws made in this reign, have been since admired for going clearly and directly to the ends that they were meant to accomplish (w) [E]. In consideration, as it may be presumed, ing by examination, without trial of jury, assuming to themselves there, to deal both in pleas of the Crown, and controversies civil. Then did they also use to enthrall and charge the subjects lands with tenures in capite, by finding false offices, and thereby to work upon them for wardships, liveries, premier seifins, and alienations, being the fruits of those tenures, refusing, upon divers pretexts and delays, to admit men to traverse those false offices according to the law. Nay, the King's wards, after they had accomplished their full age, could not be suffered to have livery of their lands, without paying excessive fines, far exceeding all reasonable rates. They did also vex men with informations of intrusion, upon scarce colourable titles. When men were outlaw'd in personal actions, they would not permit them to purchase their charters of pardon, except they paid great and intolerable sums, standing upon the strict point of law; which, upon outlawries, giveth forfeiture of goods: Nay, contrary to all law and custom, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of mens lands and rents, during the space of full two years, for a pain, in case of outlawry. They would also ruffle with jurors, and enforce them to find as they would direct; and if they did not, convent them, imprison them, and fine them.' It appears from Polydore Virgil, that at first, these proceedings were carried on with much temper and address; that is to say, the penalties levied, were not very severe, and those who paid them, were commonly persons in pretty good circumstances, which prevented any great clamour: but by degrees, when the legality of these proceedings seemed to be thoroughly established, they were extended farther, and then it was, that they created such a general dissatisfaction, as induced the King to promise restitution, and to part with his Ministers, Sir Richard Empson, and Edmund Dudley.

[D] Which however it may sound, was in reality an act of favour.] That learned Herald and Antiquary mentioned in the text, gives us a large account of this matter (16). 'In the nineteenth of Henry VII, says he, he was Speaker of the Parliament, and should the same year have been made a Serjeant at Law, but, for what reason I will not take upon me to assign, he desired that he might be discharged from assuming that degree, whereupon the King directed his precept to William, Bishop of London, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, commanding his forbearance of making out any writ to him for that purpose.' This sufficiently shews Dr Fuller's mistake in affirming our Dudley to have been a Puisne Judge, for if so he must have been a Serjeant. We have a large account of the antient manner of making Serjeants at Law, from an author of great dignity (17), who informs us, that the Chief Justices of the Common-Pleas, with the advice of the other Judges of that Court, were went to set down the names of a certain number of the discreetest persons who had most profited in the Laws; and were thought to be of best disposition, which being presented to the Lord Chancellor of England in writing, he, by the King's writ, charged every of the persons elect, to be before the King at a day by him assigned, to take upon him the state and degree of a Serjeant at Law, under a great penalty which in those writs was specified. But there were many reasons why persons thus named chose to avoid taking upon them that dignity, though it may be doubted whether this was not the first instance of a person's being discharged by the interposition of the royal authority, but it was soon followed, for we find in the second year of Henry VIII, that the King granted to Richard Brooke (18) an exemption from being called to the degree of a Serjeant against his good will, or if he was called, to refuse it. Sometimes also they were discharged from that degree in order to their enjoying some office that was inconsistent therewith, which was the case of Thomas Fleming, Serjeant at Law, who was discharged by writ directed to himself from Queen Elizabeth, November 5, in the thirty-seventh year of her reign, in order to his being made Solicitor-General (19). Now, from what Sir William Dugdale says, it looks as if there was some particular reason for Mr Dudley's desiring his discharge, and it is not impossible that it might be for obtaining the office of Solicitor-General. It is very true that Sir William Dugdale mentions but two Solicitors in the whole reign of Henry VII, viz. Andrew Dimmock, who obtained that office in the first of Henry VII, and John Ernley, who came into it in the twenty-second of the same reign (20). But that there were other persons in that office within that space of time, may be concluded from hence, that Andrew Dimmock was raised to the degree of a Baron of the Exchequer in the eleventh year of that King, and one cannot suppose, that in so busy a reign there should be no Solicitor for eleven years together. Something of the same kind might be said as to the post of Attorney-General, in which we find Sir James Hobart during that whole reign.

[E] That they were meant to accomplish.] We have this matter admirably set forth by the wise and judicious Historian of this reign (21). 'In this Parliament, says he, there were not made any statutes memorable touching publick government. But those that were, had still the stamp of the King's wisdom and policy. There was a statute made for the annulling of all patents of lease or grant, to such as came not upon lawful summons to serve the King in his wars against the enemies or rebels, or that should depart without the King's licence, with an exception of several persons of the long robe. Providing nevertheless, that they should have the King's wages from their house till their return home again. There hath sumed, of the great services rendered by him in this high station, we find, that, two years afterwards, he obtained a grant of the Stewardship of the rape of Hastings, in the county of Suffex (x). This was one of the last favours that he received from his Master, who, at the close of his life, is said to have been very much troubled at the oppressions and extortions of which his Ministers, particularly Empson and Dudley, had been guilty, infomuch that he expressed a willingness to make restitution to such as had been injured, and directed the same by his will (y). Polydore Virgil (z), and some other courtly writers, take occasion from hence to free that Monarch, in a great measure, from blame, discharging, as is commonly done, all the errors and evil practices in his government upon the shoulders of Empson and Dudley (a), who, it is very certain, lost their heads for them. But, that they did not drive the King, or even deceive him, into such measures, the judicious Lord Bacon (b) has very plainly proved, from instances that are worth the reader's notice [F]. The King died at Richmond on the 21st of April 1509 (c); and he was scarce laid in his grave before Mr Dudley was sent to the Tower, the clamour hath been the like made before for offices, and by this statute it was extended to lands. But a man may easily see, by many statutes made in the King's time, that the King thought it safest to assist martial law by law of Parliament. Another statute was made, prohibiting the bringing in of manufactures of silk wrought by itself, or mixed with any other thread. But it was not of stuffs of whole piece (for that the realm had of them no manufacture in use at that time) but of knit silk, or texture of silk; as ribbons, laces, cauls, points, and girdles, which the people of England could then well skill to make. This law pointed at a true principle, that where foreign materials are but superfluities, foreign manufactures should be prohibited. For that will either banish the superfluity, or gain the manufacture. There was a law also of resumption of patents of gaols, and the reannexing of them to the sheriffwicks, privileged officers being no less an interruption of justice than privileged places. There was a law likewise to restrain the bye-laws, or ordinances, of corporations, which many times were against the prerogative of the King, the common law of the realm, and the liberty of the subject, being fraternities in evil. It was therefore provided, that they should not be put in execution without the allowance of the Chancellor, Treasurer, and the two Chief-Justices, or three of them, or of the two Justices of Circuit where the corporation was. Another law was in effect to bring in the silver of the realm to the mint, in making all clipped, minished, or impaired coins of silver, not to be current in payments, without giving any remedy of weight, but with an exception only of reasonable wearing, which was as nothing in respect of the uncertainty; and so upon the matter to set the mint on work, and to give way to new coins of silver which should be then minted. There likewise was a strong statute against vagabonds, wherein two things may be noted, the one, the dislike the Parliament had of gaoling them, as that which was chargeable, pestiferous, and of no open example. The other, that in the statutes of this King's time (for this of the nineteenth year is not the only statute of that kind) there are ever coupled the punishment of vagabonds and the forbidding of dice and cards, and unlawful games unto servants and mean people, and the putting down and suppressing of ale-houses, as strings of one root together, and as if the one were unprofitable without the other. As for riot and retainers, there scarce passed any Parliament in this time without a law against them, the King ever having an eye to might and multitude. There was granted also that Parliament a subsidy, both from the temporality and the clergy. And yet nevertheless, e'er the year expired, there went out commissions for a general benevolence, though there were no wars, no fears. The same year the city gave five thousand marks for confirmation of their liberties; a thing fitter for the beginnings of Kings reigns than the latter ends. Neither was it a small matter that the mint gained upon the late statute, by the recoinage of groats and half groats.

[F] That are worth the reader's notice. The turn given by some writers to these oppressions and exactions, is this, that the King intended one thing, and his Ministers did another. He found many of his subjects either too rich, or too proud, to stoop to the laws, which conceiving to be the effects of those domestick commotions with which the realm had been often troubled, he judged that the best physick for this state malady, was the calling great and opulent offenders to justice; but Sir Richard Empson, and Mr Dudley, extended this plan, so as to take in all ranks of people, and at the same time stretched the laws, and heightened the severities of them beyond the intention of the legislators; with all which, when the King was thoroughly informed, he was highly offended (22). But that there was little or no truth in this; that the King was himself as severe, and as rapacious as his Ministers could be; and that there is very small reason to suppose he was at all ignorant of any of their proceedings, will appear from the following instances; one of which, the noble author had from good authority, and the other he relates from his own knowledge: so that if we aim at discovering truth in this business, we may easily discern it (23).

‘ There remaineth to this day, says Lord Bacon, a report, that the King was on a time, entertained by the Earl of Oxford, his principal servant, both for war and peace, nobly and sumptuously, at his castle at Hemingham; and at the King's going away, the Earl's servants stood in their livery-coats, with cognizances ranged on both sides, and made the King a lane. The King called the Earl to him, and said to him, my Lord, I have heard much of your hospitality, but I see it is greater than the speech: these handsome gentlemen and yemen which I see on both sides of me, are sure your menial servants. The Earl smiled, and said, it may please your Grace, that were not for mine ease, they are most of them my retainers that are come to do me service at such a time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. The King started a little, and said, by my faith, my Lord, I thank you for my good cheer, but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my sight, my Attorney must speak with you. And, it is part of the report, that the Earl compounded for no less than fifteen-thousand marks. And to shew farther the King's extreme diligence, I do remember to have seen a book of accompt of Empson's, that had the King's hand almost to every leaf, by way of signing, and was in some places postilled in the margin with the King's hand; likewise, where was this remembrance.

‘ Item, Receiv'd of such a one, five marks for a pardon to be procured, and if the pardon do not pass, the money to be repaid, except the party be some other-ways satisfied.

It was by such small sums as these, as our excellent Historian well observes, that King Henry collected that immense mass of treasure of which he died possessed, and how immense that wealth was, in comparison of those, or indeed of these times, that learned and painful Antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton, has told us, from a book of receipts and payments kept between the King, and Mr Edmund Dudley, viz. four millions and a half in coin and bullion, exclusive of rich furniture, wrought plate, and jewels. It appears likewise from the same book, that the extraordinary, or casual reveof the people being so great, that this step was thought absolutely necessary to quiet them (d); tho' Stowe seems to think, that both he and Sir Richard Empson were decoyed into the Tower, or they had not been so easily taken (e). At the same time numbers of their subordinate instruments were seized, imprisoned, tried, and punished (f). On the 16th of July, the same year, Edmund Dudley, Esq; was arraigned, and found guilty of High-Treason, before Commissioners assembled in Guild-Hall (g) [G]. The King taking a progress afterwards into the country, found himself so much incommoded by the general outcry of his people, that he caused Sir Richard Empson to be carried down into Northamptonshire; where, in the month of October following, he was also tried and convicted, and then remanded back to the Tower (h). In the Parliament which began January 21st, 1510, of which Sir Thomas Ingleby was Speaker, Sir Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, Esq; were attainted of High-Treason (i). The King, however, was unwilling to execute them; and Stowe (k) informs us, that a rumour prevailed, as if Queen Katherine had interposed, and procured Mr Dudley's pardon. To give some employment to his thoughts during his tedious imprisonment, and, perhaps, with a view of extricating himself happily out of all his misfortunes, he composed a very extraordinary piece (l), which he addressed to King Henry VIII; but, as it never came to his hand, so it could not contribute to save the head from which it sprung [H]. The clamours of the people continually increasing;

venue arising from the sale of offices, composition of penalties, and dispensing with the laws, was advanced to one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year (24).

[G] Before Commissioners assembled in Guild-Hall.] It appears from the account given by Stowe, that Sir Richard Empson, and Mr Dudley, were sent for to attend the King in the Tower of London at such a time, very probably, as his Privy-Counsellors were sworn; and having thus put themselves in the power of those who had no good will to them, they were committed to prison, contrary, as he insinuates, to their expectations (25). Grafton tells us, that in the last year of King Henry VIIth's reign, they were by special Commission, appointed to enquire of the offenders against penal laws, which they diligently prosecuted; but, says he, the malice of the people was so increased against them, for their endeavours and service in the said Commission, the new King, to pacify the populace, was obliged to proceed against them (26). Accordingly, Edmund Dudley, Esq; was brought, on the day mentioned in the text, before Edward, Duke of Buckingham; Henry, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas, Earl of Surrey; George, Earl of Shrewsbury; Thomas, Earl of Derby; Thomas, Prior of St John's of Hierusalem, in England; Charles Somerset, of Herbert, Knight; Stephen Jennings, Mayor of the City of London; John Fineux, Knight; Robert Rede, Knight; William Hodie, Knight; Robert Brudnele, Humphry Coningsby, John Fisher, Knight; John Boteler, William Grevill, Thomas Lovell, Knight; Edward Poynings, Knight; Henry Marney, Knight; Thomas Englefield, Knight; and Robert Drury, Knight; Justices to enquire, &c (27). He was then indicted, together, as it seems, with Sir Richard Empson, for high-treason; in proof of which, it was alleged, that during the sickness of the late King, in the month of March preceding, they summoned certain of their friends to be in arms at an hour's warning, and upon the death of the said King, to hasten to London. Out of which, and other circumstances, it was collected by the jury, that their intention was to seize on the person of the new King, and so to assume the sole government, or, if they could not attain this, to destroy him. It was a very strange inference, that because a man who had the misfortune to labour under the publick hatred, desired the assistance of his friends, in order to come safe to London, therefore this implied a design to imprison and destroy the King; but as strange as it was, the jury it seems thought it credible. However, Sir Richard Empson was sent down into the country, and there tried for as strange a felony as this was a treason (28). To ratify all this, they were attainted in Parliament, notwithstanding an excellent speech made by Sir Richard Empson, which was not, as is generally supposed, written for him by the Lord Herbert (29); for the substance of it was long before printed in one of our chronicles (30). The whole of these proceedings, which were in the first and second years of the reigns of Henry VIII. were recited at large in the petition exhibited in the name of John Dudley, the son of Edmund, by his guardian Edward Guildford, Esq; in the third year of the same reign, upon which he obtained a special Act of Parliament, for the repeal of this attainder; which sufficiently shews, that it was founded rather in clamour, than in justice, and that the Parliament were as willing to remove that precedent as to make it.

[H] To save the head from which it sprung.] It is somewhat strange, that this book, though seen and perused by many, and thence made often the theme of publick discourse, should never yet see the light; as from the title and contents it seems well to deserve. We will first give the reader these, next speak of the fate of the author's original book, and lastly, say somewhat of its consequences. It was entitled (31),

The Tree of the Commonwealth, by Edmund Dudley, Esq; late Counsellor to King Henry VII, the same Edmund, being at the compiling thereof, prisoner in the Tower, in 1 Hen. VIII.

'The effect of this treatise, consisteth in three especial points.

'First, Remembrance of God, and the faithful of his holy Church, in the which, every Christian prince had need to begin.

'Second, Of some conditions and demeanors necessary in every prince, both for his honour and assuredty of his continuance.

'Thirdly, Of the Tree of Commonwealth, which toucheth people of every degree, of the conditions and demeanors they should be of.'

As to the original book, as it missed the King's hands, so it seems the family were also deprived of it; but many years afterwards, it was met with by that faithful historian and curious collector, of whatever regarded our antiquities, honest John Stowe; who believing the sight of it would be welcome to the grandson of this great man, then Earl of Warwick, he set himself to make a very fair transcript of it; which, when he had performed, he carried to that noble person, by whom it was very graciously accepted, John Stowe receiving in return, as much thanks, and as many good words as he could wish (32). The original, that industrious man kept to his death; long after which, with the greatest part of his historical collection, it came into the possession of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who purchased them at a considerable price, about the time that he began to collect his noble library of manuscripts, afterwards purchased by the late worthy Earl of Oxford, in which it is highly probable, this original work is to be found, though several copies of it have been, and are still to be met with in other Libraries, besides that before specified in the margin, which probably was transcribed from the Earl of Warwick's.

It may be conjectured, that if this piece had been presented, as it's author intended, to King Henry VIII. it might have delivered him from his misfortunes; but as Camden says on another occasion, some ill star seems to have waited upon all such undertakings. King Henry VIII. being very desirous of having such a book as our author Dudley had composed for his use, assigned this employment to another of his father's Counsellors, Dr Thomas Ruthall, Bishop of Durham (33), a man famous for his abilities, and who executed it with all the increasing, and being rather exaggerated than softened by seeing numbers of mean fellows, whom these great men had employed as informers and witnesses, convicted and punished, while they were spared, the King was, at last, obliged to issue his writ for their execution, in obedience to which the Sheriffs of London, August 18th, 1510 (m), brought Sir Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, Esq; out of the Tower to a scaffold upon the Hill, where they both lost their heads. The same night their bodies were interred; that of Empson in White-Friers, and that of Dudley in the Black-Friers Church (n). Such was the end of our great Lawyer and Statesman, in the forty-eighth year of his age. We are assured, that he inherited some estate from his father, and a better from his mother, to whom he was found heir at her death, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. He was a gainer by both his marriages, and a great gainer by the last; to which if we add the profits of his profession, what he received from his Master's bounty, and what might be diverted into his own coffers, in it's passage to the royal treasury, we have no great reason to scruple what Stowe relates as a fact, that, at the time of his fall, he had an estate of eight hundred pounds a year, and above twenty thousand pounds in money, exclusive of plate, jewels, and rich furniture (o). As to his character, it sufficiently appears from what has been said, as well of his abilities as actions; and, in reference to his family, because there are many disputes about it, and we go somewhat a different road from that in which those travelled who went before us, we shall speak of it at large in the notes [I]. The reader may observe, in this and the subsequent articles, that we are careful in giving him matters of fact, without adopting the sentiments of any of our Historians, farther than we find them supported by evidence. Several of them ascribe all the exactions and prosecutions under colour of penal laws, which began in this reign, almost as soon as the Civil Wars ceased, to Sir Richard Empson and Mr Dudley; but there is no proof at all to support this, more especially with respect to the latter, who seems to have entered into the management of such affairs but a very few years before the King's death. The Noble Historian, who has so impartially written the history of Henry VII, speaks clearly to this point; of which, if we consider his profession, he must be allowed a much better judge than any who have taken upon them to treat of the same subject. The King's close and griping disposition, he plainly admits, was the cause of all these rigorous proceedings; but he observes, that Cardinal Morton, Sir Reginald Bray, and some other Ministers in the beginning of his reign, took much pains to bridle his avaricious disposition; which, however, was not so understood by the people, who, measuring the merits of Ministers by those events which fell out under their administration, attributed to them those mischiefs which, but for their interposition, had been far greater than they were. The wise Lord Bacon tells us, that, upon their demise, and the coming of Sir Richard Empson, and Edmund Dudley, Esq; into the direction of these matters, the King made no account of them at all, farther than as they obeyed his orders, and carried all things as far as they would go, which Polydore Virgil, and other writers, say they did; and Lord Bacon also says much the same: and, if this be the truth, then they were strictly and properly the King's instruments; but it may be with some distinction in their practices: for, if Dudley had been as guilty as Empson, he might have been convicted for such offences as he was, whereas the matter objected to him was treason: as to the other great men of this line, they are treated much in the same way, and writers give what colour they think fit to their actions; which makes their characters uniform indeed, but in a way that will not satisfy impartial readers, who know that all actions may be set in different lights, and will therefore expect to be told, why they are set in one light rather than another. This, whenever it is in our power, we shew; and when not, we content ourselves with the bare matters of fact, knowing that even the greatest men are inconsistent, and that there is no such thing as guessing, with any degree of certainty, at their secret intentions. Lastly, it is to be observed, that, when we speak of rewards, honours, or offices, conferred for the wisdom, fidelity, and great services of those who receive them, we speak commonly in skill and accuracy imaginable. It happened however a little unluckily for him, that, prompted by the same desire which warmed the breast of his master, he had drawn up a book of the same kind, with respect to his Bishoprick of Durham, and caused both, according to the custom of those times, to be very neatly bound in parchment, precisely in the same manner. When therefore, Cardinal Wolsey came from the King, to enquire for this system of government for his use, the Bishop directed his Secretary to reach the new parchment book, who by mistake, reached him that of the Bishoprick of Durham. The Cardinal taking the liberty to read the book first, then carried it to his master with this complement; I bring your Grace a mine, out of which, when your occasions require it, you may take a large mass of treasure: it was not long before this mistake reached the Bishop's ears, which affected him so strongly, that, falling into a fever, he died, and Wolsey succeeded him. Another treatise of the like nature, was penned for the special use of King Edward

VI. by William Thomas, Esq; Clerk of the Council in his reign (34), who afterwards had the misfortune to be hanged, drawn, and quartered for high-treason, in that of Queen Mary.

[I] We shall speak of it at large in the notes.] Sir William Dugdale takes no notice at all of this gentleman's having two wives, and indeed, I do not find any writer that mentions his having had issue by the first, except the manuscript Baronage, which has been so often cited; from thence, we learn that he married, first, Anne, Daughter of Sir Andrews Windsor, afterwards Lord Windsor, then the widow of Sir Roger Corbet, of Morton, in the County of Salop, by whom he had a daughter Elizabeth, who married William, Lord Stourton (35). His second wife, was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, Lord Lisle, and sister and coheirrefs to John, Viscount L'Isle, by whom he had three sons, John Dudley, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, of whom in the next article, Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight of the Garter, and Jerom Dudley, Esq; concerning cerning whom we know very little, except that he lived long in the family of his brother the Duke of Northumberland, and that he was provided for by the will of the Dukes. As to the Lady Elizabeth Grey, about five years after the decease of her husband Edmund Dudley, she married Arthur Plantagenet, son to Edward IV. by Lady Elizabeth Lucy, who in her right upon the resignation of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who had married that lady's niece, was created Viscount L'Isle. By this noble person she had three daughters; Bridget, married to Sir William Carden, Knight; Frances, who espoused John Basset, Esq; first, and afterwards, Thomas Monk of Potheridge, in the County of Devon, Esq; from whom descended, George, created by King Charles II. Duke of Albe-marle; and lastly, Elizabeth, the wife of Sir Francis Jobson, Knight (36).

DUDLEY (JOHN), son of the former, Baron of Malpas, Viscount L'Isle, Earl of Warwick, and Duke of Northumberland; reputed, by many of our Historians, the most powerful subject ever flourished in this kingdom. He was born some time in the year 1502, when his father was in the very zenith of his power, and stood in equal credit with the King and his subjects, as appears by his being chosen, the year after, Speaker of the House of Commons (a). At the time his father was put to death, this John, his eldest son, was about eight years old; and it being well enough known, that the severity exercised in that act was rather to satisfy the people than justice, John Dudley, by Edmund Guilford, Esquire of the body to the King his Guardian, petitioned the Parliament that the attainder might be reversed of Edmund Dudley, his late father, and himself restored in blood; which was accordingly obtained, and a special act passed for that purpose in 1511 (b). There is no reason to doubt, that all due care was taken of his education, by a mother equally distinguished by her virtues and her quality, and by a Guardian, who is celebrated for being one of the finest Gentlemen in a Court then esteemed the politest in Europe (c). But, as to any particulars, Historians are silent. When his mother, with the King's consent, married Arthur Plantagenet, who, in her right, was created Viscount L'Isle (d), which was about the year 1523, we find that he was brought to Court, and, being a young Gentleman of a fine person, and highly accomplished, he attended the King's favourite Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, in his expedition into France (e); where his gallant behaviour not only entitled him to the special notice of his noble General, but procured him also the honour of knighthood (f). It may be reasonably presumed, that, upon his return, he met with a kind reception at Court, having many relations in great favour; but it seems he trusted chiefly to his own abilities, and very wisely attached himself to the King's First Minister Cardinal Wolfey (g), whom he accompanied in his embassy to France, in the nineteenth year of that reign (b); and, making a proper use of the advantage which this afforded, entered, not long after, into the King's service, as appears from a patent (i) granted him for the office of Master of the Armory in the Tower, with the allowance of a groom. His hopes at Court did not hinder him from attending to his concerns in the country, where he was very careful to improve his interest amongst the Gentry; and, in 1536, was Sheriff of Staffordshire, where he lived hospitably, and had the good-will of his neighbours in a much greater degree, than when he was exalted to a far superior station (k). About two years after this he entered himself of the society of Gray's-Inn (l); but that he ever studied the Laws there, as his father did, seems to be very doubtful; though some authority might be brought to prove it (m). The Court was still his home, and Wolfey his patron so long as he had power. He was also in great confidence with the next Prime Minister Thomas, Lord Cromwell; so that upon the coming over of Lady Anne of Cleves, whom that Statesman had engaged the King to marry, when that Lord was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Essex, and Great Chamberlain of England, he was made Master of the Horse to the intended Queen (n). On the first of May 1539, he was the first of the challengers in the triumphant tournament held at Westminster, in which he appeared with great magnificence (o) [A]. The fall of the Earl of [A] In which he appeared with great magnificence. We are told that this great man, who did not rise over hastily at the beginning, took a great deal of pains to qualify himself for the King's service; in order to which he made a tour to Italy, and remained some time at Rome: as with the like design he visited France, by which means he became a very compleat Courtier, and capable of employments of very different kinds (1). In this, which was to make way for his future honours, he, to please the King, accepted an office in the household of a Queen who was not like to enjoy that honour long, it being well enough known in the Court, that the King had not married her from affection but from policy (2). This tournament, in which he made the principal figure, had been proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spain, for all comers to try their prowess against the English challengers, who were Sir John Dudley, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Thomas Poynings, Sir George Carew,

Knights, Anthony Kingston, and Richard Cromwell, Esquires. They came into the lists upon May-day, preceded by a band of Knights and Gentlemen, all dressed in white velvet, the furniture of their horses was of the same, but the challengers themselves were very richly dressed. The first day there were forty-six defendants, amongst whom were the Earl of Surrey, Lord William Howard, Lord Clinton, and Lord Cromwell, son to the Prime-Minister who was a little before created Earl of Essex. Sir John Dudley, by some mischance of his horse, had the misfortune to be overthrown by one Mr Breme, but however he mounted again and performed very gallantly. After this was over, the challengers rode in state to Durham House, where they entertained the King, Queen, and Court. On the second of May, Anthony Kingston and Richard Cromwell were made Knights; on the third, the challengers fought on horseback with swords against twenty-nine defendants. of Essex, which happened soon after, did not in the least affect the favour or the fortune of Sir John Dudley, who had a very great dexterity in maintaining himself in the good graces of powerful Ministers, without embarking too far in their designs (p), preserving always a proper regard for the sentiments of his sovereign, which kept him in full credit at Court in the midst of many changes, as well of men as of measures. It was owing to this wise conduct of his, as well as to his splendid manner of living, and great liberality, not only to the extent but beyond the limits of his estate, that he never wanted friends to solicit in his behalf, and to excite, in his Royal Master, a just attention to his services (q). This very clearly appeared soon after the death of his father-in-law, when the King, by letters patents, bearing date the twelfth of March 1542, raised him to the dignity of Viscount L'Isle (r), with very singular marks of his esteem and consideration [B]. At the next festival of St George he was also elected Knight of the Garter (s). This was soon after followed by a much higher instance, both of kindness and trust; indeed, such an instance, as had scarce any example in former times, and has not been considered as a precedent fit to follow in those that have succeeded since; for the King, considering his prudence, his courage, and his activity, as well as the occasion he had, and was like to have, for a man of such talents in that office, constituted him Lord High-Admiral of England for life (t). The next year he commanded a fleet of two hundred sail, with which he proceeded to the Scotch coasts, where he performed all the service that was expected from him, and, having landed his forces, marched through the southern provinces of Scotland by land, and most effectually restored the tranquillity of the marches (u) [C]. He next embarked for France, and, on the twenty-eighth of July 1543, appeared before Bologne, then besieged by King Henry VIII. in person, and, by his great diligence and courage, facilitated very much the taking of the place, of which the King left him the charge, with the title of his Lieutenant (w). In this important employment he did more than his master had reason to expect, and as much as the nation or himself could desire [D]. On the twenty-seventh of March 1646, the King declared him, by patent, Lieutenant-General, and Commander of all his forces at sea (x), for the more effectual carrying on of Surrey running first with equal advantage. On the fifth of May they fought on foot at the barriers against thirty defendants. In the course of these military diversions, the challengers, at a vast expence, entertained both Houses of Parliament, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and their wives, and all the persons of distinction then in town, as a reward for which, the King gave to each of them a house and a hundred marks a year for ever, out of the revenues of the Knights of Rhodes, which had been given to his Majesty by the Parliament then sitting (3).

[B] Of his esteem and consideration. We have before observed, that, upon the marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Viscount L'Isle, and widow of Edmund Dudley, Esq; to Sir Arthur Plantagenet, he was raised to that dignity, which was limited to his heirs male by that Lady, in prejudice of her children by the first marriage, but he dying in the Tower on the third of March 1542 (4), it was represented to the King that this honour naturally descended to Sir John Dudley, to which therefore he was advanced by patent (5), in consideration (as the preamble sets forth) not only of the acceptable and laudable services of his beloved and faithful subject Sir John Dudley, Knt. variously done, but also his vigilance, foresight, faithfulness, valour, and illustrious descent. To hold the said title to him, and the heirs male of his body, and to enjoy seat and place in Parliament among the Viscounts of this realm of England, and in all other the King's dominions, with a grant of an annuity of twenty marks, payable half yearly out of the revenues of the counties of Warwick and Leicester, by the Sheriffs of the said counties.

[C] The tranquillity of the marches. We find the Lord Viscount L'Isle, from the time of his being promoted to the great office of Lord High-Admiral, commonly mentioned, by that title, in all our histories. It is plain enough, that he had served with reputation at sea, before he obtained that honour, since we are told, by a person who attended him in all his expeditions, that he boarded and took the Admiral of Sluys, fighting her ship to ship (6). In this expedition to Scotland, he had a fleet of two hundred sail, on board of which, at Newcastle, he embarked an army of ten thousand men; on the 4th of May, 1544, he landed the troops about four miles from Leith, from whence, they marched to Edinburgh, the Lord Admiral commanding the van-guard, and the Earl of Hertford the main battle (7); the former, had the credit of routing the Scots, and of forcing the principal gate of Edinburgh, into which, he was the first man that entered (8); the fleet also, did infinite mischief, ruining the sea-coasts, and taking all the ships which the Scots had in those parts, particularly, the Salamander, a very fine ship of war, presented by the French King, to his son-in-law King James, at the time of his marriage; and the Unicorn, built by order of the King of Scots. The fleet quitted Leith on the 15th of May, after spoiling the port, destroying the pier, burning the town, ruining the towns and villages on each side the river, as high as Stirling, and sinking every vessel, great and small, that they did not carry away. The land army, in its return, proceeded with the same rigour, and, in our histories, there is a long list of places, by the ruin of which, their rout was distinguished (9). This was, in execution of the King's orders: afterwards, it seems, his Historian thought of it in another light, when he said, we did on that occasion too much for lovers, and for conquerors, too little (10).

[D] As the nation, or himself could desire. The siege of Bologne, was formed on the 19th of July, by the Duke of Suffolk; the King came to the camp in person on the 26th, the Lord Admiral arrived there on the 28th of the same month, where he encamped the nearest the town of any of the King's forces. In this siege, he was present in most of the attacks, and had there, the misfortune to lose his eldest son. The place was surrendered on the 14th of September, and on the 18th, the King made his public entry into it, and soon after, delivered the keys of the place to the Lord Admiral, with the title of Governor; and upon his embarking for England, on the 30th of the same month, declared him his Lieutenant-General (11). The Dauphin being not far off, with an army of upwards of fifty thousand men, he first formed a design of retaking the place by siege; and afterwards, on the 9th of October, attempted it by surprize, in which, through the vigilance, care, and courage of the Lord Admiral, and his garrison, the French were repulsed, with the loss of eight hundred men of their best troops; and this, all our writers allow (12), to have been one of the gallantest actions performed in that war, none of the breaches being repaired, and the place in a manner open. On the 1st of February following, the Lord Admiral sallying out of Bologne, with a small body of horse and foot, attacked a much superior corps of French forces, under the command of Mons. de Beiz, forced them to retire precipitately, and made themselves masters of twelve pieces of canon (13).

the war against France; and this at a time when the French, by the help of money, and alliances with the maritime powers of Europe, had drawn together a very great naval force, and threatened to make the English feel the weight of it, not only at sea, but by covering an invasion, which they had long meditated; all which vast designs were frustrated by the courage and conduct of the Lord Viscount L'Isle, with a force much inferior to theirs (y). After this the Lord High-Admiral returned their visit, landed five thousand men upon their coasts, burnt the town of Treport, and some other villages; and the French army advancing offered them battle, which they declined; and he thereupon re embarked his troops, having, in this expedition, lost only a single man, and done infinite mischief to the enemy (z) [E]. The same year he was, together with Dr Cuthbert Tonstall, Bishop of Durham, and Dr Nicholas Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York, appointed a Commissioner to take the oath of Francis the French King, for observing the treaty of peace signed June 7th, 1546 (a); which he performed with great solemnity. On the sixteenth of October following he was, together with many other persons of rank, named in a commission for settling the accompts of the army. This was one of the last services he performed in the reign of that great Prince, to whom he owed all his honours and fortune, receiving from him, towards the close of his reign, very large grants of Church-lands, which delivered him from the inconveniences that must otherwise have ensued from his unbounded generosity; which grants, however, created him many enemies (b) [F]. The King's health daily declining, his Majesty made the best provision he could for the safety and quiet of his son's reign; in order to which he caused his last will and testament to be framed, with much deliberation, by the ablest and wisest of his Counsellors, which he sealed and subscribed December 30th, 1546 (c); and therein, as the last mark of his affection and trust, he named Sir John Dudley, Lord Viscount L'Isle, one of his sixteen executors, and gave him also a legacy of five hundred pounds, which was the highest that he bestowed upon any of them (d). By this will they were constituted Privy-Counsellors, and had the government put into their hands, which gave them a legal authority, since this will was founded upon an act of Parliament (e). On the last day of the month of January succeeding, King Henry VIII died, and his son Edward VI succeeded him, to the general joy and satisfaction of the nation (f). It was not long before great alterations were made in the dispositions by the late King's will; which alterations were, in truth, the source of all the mischiefs that followed. The Earl of Hertford, who was the King's uncle, and, by that near relation, in very great credit about his person, thought that sufficient regard had not been shewn to him, by the bare nomination to a seat in the Council, among so many where, at first, he did not perceive that he was like to have any precedency. He therefore pressed to be declared Protector, that the State might have some visible head; to which, very probably, from their own views, the major part of the Council yielded, much against the will of the Lord Chancellor Wriothesly, who shewed, that this was departing entirely from the will of Henry VIII, which was the only legal rule they had (g). The Protector soon after took from him the Seals, and thought of nothing so much as how to establish his own power. It is indeed reported, by many writers, that he was excited to these steps by a wiser man than himself, by whom they mean the Lord Viscount L'Isle (h); but of this, as there is no evidence, so in truth there is not much probability. Amongst the first of the Protector's projects one was, to get his brother, Sir Thomas Seymour, made High-Admiral, in whose favour the Lord Viscount L'Isle resigned, not willingly (i) to be sure, but upon the [E] And done infinite mischief to the enemy.] The French King at an immense expence, hired from several of the Italian powers, what in those days was accounted a very large fleet; it consisted of upwards of two hundred sail of all sorts, besides galleys; which, however, met with an accident when it first put to sea, one of their best ships, of the burthen of eight hundred ton taking fire (14). Between Alderney and Guernsey, their galleys attacked the Lord Admiral, who, had but a small squadron with him, bending all their endeavours to take his own ship; which, however, he defended so well against eighteen of those vessels at once, that they were at length glad to retire (15). The whole French fleet appearing before St Helens, and making a shew of attempting something upon the coast, the Admiral advanced, with his small fleet of sixty sail, but after exchanging some shot, the French retired. The English fleet being then reinforced, and taking some troops on board, offered them battle again, forced them to retire to their own coasts, where they were spectators of those mischiefs done by the English (16), which are briefly mentioned in the text. All these transactions happened between the beginning of June, and the end of August, 1545.

[F] Which grants, however, created him many enemies.] The Abbey of Hales-Owen, in Shropshire, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and St John the Evangelist; which, at the dissolution, had lands of the annual value of three hundred thirty-seven pounds, fifteen-shillings and six-pence, according to Speed, was granted to Sir John Dudley, by King Henry VIII, in the thirtieth year of his reign (17); the hospital of Burton Lazars, in Leicestershire, which, was the largest foundation of that kind in England, being valued, both according to Dugdale and Speed, at the annual rent of two-hundred sixty-five pounds, ten shillings, was granted to the Lord L'Isle, by the same monarch, in the thirty-sixth year of his reign (18); the Manor of Chosel, near Ringstead, in the County of Norfolk, was about the same time granted to him, as being annexed to the hospital beforementioned; by the same grant, he acquired the Hospital of St Giles's (19), without the Bar of the Old Temple, London. The same King, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, granted to John Dudley, Lord Viscount L'Isle, and Lord High-Admiral of England, as well in consideration of his service, as for the sum of one thousand pounds sterling, the site, circuit, and precinct of the Hospital, or Priory of St John of Jerusalem (20), only the lead, bells, timber, stone, glass, and iron, and other things of the church, were specially reserved to the King's Majesty. I have likewise seen accounts of some other small grants, with which I will not trouble the reader.

the best terms he could make. Accordingly, February 17th, 1547, the very same day that the new Lord Admiral's patent passed, he was created Earl of Warwick, and made Great Chamberlain of England; neither was it long before he had great grants from the Crown, particularly Warwick Castle and Manor (k). This has occasioned several writers to represent the promotions made, and titles conferred about this time, as proceeding from his intrigues; whereas, in truth, he had a title by descent to the Earldom of Warwick; King Henry VIII intended to have created him Earl of Coventry (l); and the new King's coronation made it natural to do something extraordinary to grace it. The Duke of Somerset, Lord Protector, finding himself under a necessity of marching an army into Scotland, resolved to command it in person, and took the Earl of Warwick with him, in quality of his Lieutenant-General (m); in this expedition he added to that great reputation which he had already acquired, as even his enemies themselves confess, being the chief author of that victory which was then obtained, and would also have pushed the war to a glorious conclusion, if he had been intrusted with the sole command; as it was, his conduct was universally commended, and all the blame fell elsewhere (n) [G]. He was next employed by the Duke of Somerset, Lord Protector, in conjunction with many other honourable persons, to compromise matters with the French, who, after the death of King Henry, were very desirous of getting Bologne again into their hands (o), which it was of great consequence to the Protector to prevent, and yet to avoid, if possible, engaging in a war; both which ends were effected for the present; to which the industry and authority of the Earl of Warwick did not a little contribute (p). It was this activity of his in business, which was generally attended with success, that chiefly recommended him to the Protector Somerset, who certainly had much slowness and timidity in his nature, which made him admire men of quick parts and solid abilities, whose advice he used from time to time, but more especially listened to the counsels of Warwick, Sir William Paget, who was Secretary, and Sir William Cecil, who afterwards enjoyed the [G] And all the blame fell elsewhere. Sir John Hayward, who took upon him to write the History of this reign, was no friend at all to the noble person who is the subject of this article, and yet he allows him all the honour of this expedition. We will first give the reader a short character of the Earl of Warwick as he has drawn it, and afterwards some other passages, which will fully justify what we have advanced in the text (21). 'The Earl of Warwick, says he, was a man of antient Nobility, comely in stature and countenance, but of little gravity or abstinence in pleasures, yea sometimes almost dissolute, which was not much regarded, if, in a time when vices began to grow into fashion, a great man was not over severe. He was of a great spirit and highly aspiring, not forbearing to make any mischief the means of attaining his ambitious ends. Hereto his good wit and pleasant speeches were altogether serviceable, having the art also by empty promises and threats to draw others to his purpose. In matters of arms he was both skilful and industrious, and as well in foresight as resolution present and great. To say truth, for enterprises by arms he was the minion of that time, so as few things he attempted but he achieved with honour, which made him more proud and ambitious when he had done. He generally increased both in estimation with the King, and authority among the Nobility, doubtful, whether by fatal destiny to the State, or whether by his virtues, or at least by his appearances of virtues.' After this character, the same author proceeds to give us the following relation (22): 'As the English directed their way towards the place where they understood the Scots assembled, they came to a river called Lynne, crossed with a bridge of stone. The horsemen and carriages passed through the water, the footmen over the bridge, which, because it was narrow, the army was long in setting over. The avant guard marched forth, and the battail followed; but as the rear was passing over a thick mist did arise. The Earl of Warwick having before espied certain plumps of Scottish horsemen in ranging the field, returned towards the rear, to prevent such danger as the thickness of the mist, the nearness of the enemy, and the disarray occasioned by the narrowness of the bridge, might cast upon them. The Scots conjecturing, as it was, that some personage of honour stayed to have a view of the rear, called to the English to know if any Nobleman were near, for that one whom they named, well known to be of honourable condition, would present himself to the General, in case he might safely be conducted. Certain young soldiers, not used to such trains, made rash and sudden answer, That the Earl of Warwick was near, under whose protection he might be assured. Hereupon they passed the water, placed two hundred of their prickers behind a hillock, and, with forty more, cast about to find the Earl. Now the Earl espying six or seven of them scattered near the army, and taking them to be of the English, sent one to command them to their array, and to that end himself rode an easy pace towards them, followed only with ten or twelve on horseback: he that had been sent before, was so heedless either to observe or advertise what they were, that the Earl did not discover them to be enemies until he was in the midst among them. Certainly a Commander should not carelessly cast himself into danger, but when either upon necessity or misadventure he falleth into it, it much advanceth both his reputation and enterprize, if bravely he behave himself. Now, the Earl espying where he was, gave so rude a charge upon a Captain of the Scots, named Dandy Care, that he forced him to turn, and chased him above twelve score at the lance's point. Herewith the residue retired deceitfully towards the place of their ambush, from whence issued about sixty more. Then the Earl gathered his small company about him, and, with good countenance, maintained the fight. But the enemy in the end, whether perceiving some succours advancing from the army where the alarm was then taken, or whether intending to draw the English further into their ambush, turned away an easy pace. The Earl forbade his men from following, fearing a greater ambush behind the hill, as in truth there was. At his return he was received with great applause by the English soldiers, for that he did so well acquit himself in the danger, whereunto, by error, and not by rashness, he had been carried. One of his men was slain; another hurt in the buttock; a third, named Vane, so grievously hewn, that many thousands have died of less than half his hurts, whereof, notwithstanding he was cured afterwards. Of the Scots three were taken prisoners, and presented to the General by the Earl. When a challenge was brought in the name of the Earl of Huntley, to the Lord Protector, the Earl of Warwick told the trumpeter, that he would undertake that Lord, and give him at housand crowns reward upon his bringing news that his offer was accepted (23). In the battle of Musleborough, fought Sept. 10, which was one of the greatest defeats the Scots ever received, the victory was the pure effects of the courage and

(g) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 424. the same place (g). Happy had it been for him, if he had constantly followed their opinions. But it so fell out, that, without regarding the feebleness of the government, he persisted in a war with Scotland, which was very indifferently managed, assumed the direction of affairs at home entirely to himself, undertook too many great enterprizes at once, which unluckily crossed one another, and, by degrees, brought all into confusion (r). His own brother, the Lord Admiral, entered into strange practices against him, which occasioned much disturbance in the Court; but there is no sign that the Earl of Warwick had any correspondence with him, but, on the contrary, discountenanced his proceedings, and, in appearance at least, supported the cause of the Duke of Somerset, who, after temporizing a long time, caused the Lord Admiral, in the end, to be attainted by Parliament, and executed (s). In the midst of these troubles the common people in most parts of the kingdom, as is usual when any State is distracted by factions, began to grow mutinous and disobedient, and, at last, broke out into insurrections (t). The Protector Somerset permitted these to grow to a great head, either from an unwillingness to shed the blood of his countrymen, for he was certainly a man of a mild and merciful disposition, or that he might gain time to bring in foreign troops, which he might have afterwards at his own disposal. In Devonshire they grew so strong, that they besieged the city of Exeter, and, before they could be reduced by the Lord Russell, a new rebellion broke out in Norfolk, under the command of one Robert Ket, a Tanner, who was very soon at the head of ten thousand men (u). The swiftness of their progress excited a commotion in Yorkshire, and, in both places, the rebels went upon levelling principles, thought of nothing but pulling down the Nobility, and changing the Constitution at their fancy: this was an evil not to be trifled with, and therefore an army of six thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, which was to have been employed against the Scots, received orders to march towards the rebels, under the command of John Earl of Warwick, whose known military abilities rendered him fittest for this service. He preserved Norwich with some difficulty, and afterwards fought with the rebels, who both, in drawing up their men, and, in the course of the action, behaved much better than could have been expected from such raw soldiers (w). The Earl, however, defeated them, and killed about a thousand men, other writers say many more. This greatly discouraged, but did not dissipate them; on the contrary, they collected all their scattered parties, and offered him battle a second time. The Earl marched directly towards them, but, when he was on the very point of engaging, he sent them a message, That he was sorry to see so much courage expressed in so bad a cause; but that, notwithstanding what was passed, they might depend upon the King's pardon on delivering up of their leaders; to which they answered, That he was a Nobleman of so much worth and generosity, that, if they might have this assurance from his own mouth, they were willing to submit (x). The Earl accordingly went amongst them, upon which they threw down their arms, delivered up Robert Ket and his brother William, with the rest of their chiefs, who were hanged; upon hearing which the Yorkshire rebels dispersed, and so all was quiet again (y). This rebellion being suppressed in the summer, the Lords of the King's Council, amongst whom was the Earl of Warwick, began in the autumn to confer amongst themselves, as to the causes of that distressed and discontented state into which the nation was reduced. The Protector upon this sent Secretary Petre to know the meaning of their meetings, whom they kept with them; and, October 8th, 1549, they went into the city, where, having acquainted the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, that they had no other views than for the safety of the King's person, the redress of grievances, and the restoring the peace of the kingdom, the city thankfully concurred with them; upon which the Protector, who had removed the King from Hampton-Court to Windsor, submitted himself, and was sent prisoner to the Tower on the 28th of the same month (z). The Earl of Warwick was again made Lord High-Admiral, by the King's letters patents, with very extensive powers (a). At this time, it is said, the Papists had some hopes that he would favour their religion; but, whether as a Politician he gave them any grounds for these hopes, whether they took them up without grounds, or whether, as others had done, he altered his system when he came into power, certain it is that he adhered steadily to the Reformation, and, shortly after and conduct of the Earl of Warwick. The Lord Grey began the battle, contrary to his orders, and being soundly beaten, had like to have thrown all into confusion, but the Earl of Warwick stood firm, though very much exposed, and, giving his orders with great presence of mind, recovered all, and drove the Scots out of the field. What little was done afterwards was by his command, and the execution of it trusted to his brother, Sir Andrews Dudley (24). But the Protector had his reasons for returning as soon as possible to London; and Bishop Burnet says, that the Earl of Warwick was not displeas'd with that, because he saw it would lessen the Duke's reputation; which is a conjecture only, and ought to be considered as such, and not at all esteemed a fact, since there is no evidence to support it (25). At that time the Protector had so good an opinion of the Earl of Warwick, that he left him behind in the North to treat with the Scots, which proved indeed a thing of no consequence, as the Scots never intended to treat, but made that proposal to the Duke of Somerset, only to gain time, as the Duke accepted it, because it afforded him a fair pretence for returning into England (26). It has little or no relation to the Earl of Warwick's character, whether this war was wisely or imprudently entered into; since it is universally acknowledged, that he discharged the trust reposed in him with great capacity, hazarded his person freely, and, by a right application of his military skill, gained a glorious victory, which procured him, at that time, what he certainly deserved, a very high and general reputation.

after, procured the removal of some who differed in opinion from him in that and many other respects (b) [H]. He stood, at this time, so high in the King's favour, and had settled so firm a friendship with the rest of the Lords of the Council, that nothing was done but by his advice or consent; to which, therefore, we must attribute the release of the Duke of Somerset out of the Tower, and restoring him to some share of power and favour at Court. The King was much pleased with this, and, being desirous that the friendship of these two great men should not be barely in appearance, a marriage was proposed between the eldest son of the Earl of Warwick and the Lady Anne Seymour, daughter to the Duke of Somerset; which, at length, was brought to bear, and, on the third of June, 1550, was solemnized in the King's presence, who expressed great satisfaction thereat (c). The King's favour to him still continued, or rather increased, so that upon his surrendering the office of Lord High-Chamberlain of England, which was bestowed upon the Marquis of Northampton, the King was pleased to make him Lord Steward of his Household, by Letters Patents (d), not only expressive of his Majesty's affection and esteem, but containing also some other matters that deserve the reader's notice [I]. In the month of April, 1551, he was constituted Earl Marshal of England (e); but whereas a certain Historian says, that he was joined in an embassy with William, Marquis of Northampton, to the French King, about the same time (f), it is clearly a mistake; since it appears, from unexceptionable authority, that it was his son the Lord Viscount L'Isle. On the 15th of August the same year, Sir Robert Dudley, one of the Earl's younger sons, was sworn one of the six ordinary Gentlemen of the Chamber (g); a short time afterwards the Earl of Warwick was made Lord Warden of the Northern Marches (b); and, on the 11th of October the same year, he was advanced to the dig-

[H] In that and many other respects. If we consider the removal of the Lord Protector Somerset from the government, as it is stated by Stowe and other plain writers, it will appear that the far greatest part of the King's Council concurred in that measure, and offered very plausible reasons for their so doing (27). Sir John Hayward is very clear, that the whole was a contrivance of the Earl of Warwick's, that the rest were but his tools, and that the articles objected against the Protector were invented to make him odious (28). It is very true, that when the Council met to take this bold step of pulling down the King's uncle, it was at Ely house, where the Earl of Warwick then resided; yet it no where appears that he was at the head of this business, nor indeed could he be, when the Lord Chancellor Rich, and the Lord St John, who was President of the Council, were at all the consultations. The articles against the Protector are extant in our Histories, there is nothing in them of black and heinous crimes, but of presumption, overbearing, and high indifferences, many of the facts in them were notoriously known, and the Duke of Somerset confessed them in his submission (29). When the Lords went to the King to justify their complaints, the Earl of Warwick went not with them, which Sir John Hayward says was a piece of craft, it might be so, and it might also be the effects of tenderness and modesty. He was appointed by the Council one of the Lords to attend upon the King's person, which was a great honour, but then he shared it with five others (30). Sir John Hayward speaks much of his secret conferences with the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, and affirms, that not being able to work these great Peers to serve his purposes, he got them both excluded from the Council. Bishop Burnet is of quite another opinion, he suggests, that the Papists were in hopes of making some great advantage by this notable change in the government, because they were sure of the other two Earls, and had a favourable opinion of Warwick (31). But it seems he was a very great politician, he saw that the King was a firm Protestant, and perhaps he made it a rule with him to be of the religion of the Crown; so that it is very likely his conferences with Arundel and Southampton might be upon this subject, Whether it was best to stop the reformation of religion or to promote it? and there is nothing more certain, than that in this they differed, that the two Earls were for the old Popish road, but the Earl of Warwick was for marching in the King's high-way; and therefore it is no wonder that he procured their exclusion from Councils, in which he was determined to lead, and knew very well they were not inclined to follow (32). In all this he acted like a great Statesman, though perhaps not upon virtuous or religious principles; whatever censures he may deserve for this, must light upon him in common with many others, for few Statesmen are very remarkable for a steady adherence to any thing but their own interest, and if his happened at this time to concur with the true interest of his country, he was so much the less to blame.

[I] That deserve the reader's notice These letters patents bear date, February 20th, 1550, in the fourth of Edward VI (33), wherein the King recites, 'That whereas Henry VIII, late King of England, granted to his most beloved Cousin and Counsellor, Charles, late Duke of Suffolk, deceased; the office of Lord Steward of the Household, by the name of Great Master of the Household, or the Great Master of the King's Household: and, whereas, by Act of Parliament, in May 22 Hen. VIII, it was enacted, that during the time the late Duke of Suffolk, and his successors in the said office, should enjoy the said post of Lord Steward; they should be called Lord Steward of the King's Household, as by the said Act appears. That, attributing much to the loyalty, wisdom, and virtue of his beloved Cousin and Counsellor, John, Earl of Warwick, &c. and having always experienced his constancy in the Christian Religion, his valour in war, sedition, and riots; his friendly and faithful inclination towards him, and desiring his abode and residence in his Palace, and attendance on his Royal Person. By advice of his Privy-Council, he grants to the said Earl of Warwick the office of Lord, or Great Master of his Household for life, with all fees, wages, &c. as the said Duke of Suffolk, Earl of Wiltshire, or any Steward of the King's Household, held, or enjoyed. And commands, that the said Earl of Warwick, have his Letters Patent, without fine or fee, great or small, to his use to be paid.' At this time he was looked upon as so warm a Protestant, that the most zealous Divines had recourse to his favour and protection; amongst the rest, Dr Hooper, appointed about that time, Bishop of Gloucester, who scrupled much the wearing the episcopal habit, and for whom, the Earl, out of respect to the tenderness of his conscience, actually interposed; but afterwards, when the Earl became better acquainted with the state of the question, and was made sensible of the consequences that might follow from indulging such a singularity in sentiments, he withdrew his protection, and Dr Hooper was forced to submit (34). On the other hand, tho' it is certain, that Dr Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, wrote him a letter of complement after the fall of the Protector, yet he never shewed him any countenance, nor did he give the least opposition to his being deprived of the rich Bishoprick of Winchester, when he knew that Archbishop Cranmer, considered it as a thing necessary to the peace of the Church (35). The reader is left to judge from these facts, whether he was a man wholly indifferent about religion, or a deep dissembler, willing to do any thing that might either gain, or preserve power.

nity of Duke of Northumberland (i), at the same time that the Marquis of Dorset was created Duke of Suffolk. In a few days after these promotions, the conspiracy of the Duke of Somerset, as it was called, broke out, being betrayed by Sir Thomas Palmer; the Duke, his Duchefs, and several other persons, were sent prisoners to the Tower; and the King, being persuaded that he had really formed a design to murder the Duke of Northumberland; resolved to leave him to the law (k). Accordingly, on the 1st of December, he was brought to his trial in Westminster-Hall, where the Duke of Northumberland, which was very indecent, sat as one of his Judges (l). He was acquitted of the treason, but found guilty of the felony, upon a statute made in the third year of that reign, received sentence of death, and on the 22d of January following, was executed upon Tower-hill; which many considered as an effect of the potent Duke of Northumberland's resentment (m) [K]. About this time, or rather a little before, he was elected Chancellor of Cambridge

[K] Of the potent Duke of Northumberland's resentment ] This business of the Duke of Somerset's death, is very warily related in our old chronicles, more especially those written nearest the time, yet in one of these (36), we have the following account. ' Sir Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, was again apprehended and cast into the Tower of London, by means of Sir John Dudley, lately made Duke of Northumberland, at this time, of great authority in the realm. It was laid to the Duke of Somerset's charge, that he proposed, and went about, the death of the Duke of Northumberland, being one of the Privy-Council, and therefore, by statute, was guilty both of treason and felony. Of this he was after arraigned at Westminster, and by his peers acquitted of treason, but condemned of felony. At this time many of the people rejoiced, being persuaded, that the King's uncle should never be put to death for felony, and thereby, thought he should have escaped: but he was had again to the Tower, and there kept, until he was brought out to his death.' Sir John Hayward, according to his usual custom, charges it roundly upon the Duke of Northumberland, as if he conspired against the Duke of Somerset, and not that Duke against him, he relates the matter thus (37). ' The Duke of Northumberland, being now inferior unto none of the nobility in title of honour, and superior to all in authority and power, could not restrain his haughty hopes from aspiring to an absolute command. But, before he would directly level at his mark, the Duke of Somerset was thought fit to be taken away, whose credit was so great with the common people, that although it sufficed not to bear out any bad attempt of his own, yet, was it of force, to cross the evil purposes of others. And now to begin the third act of this tragedy, speeches were cast, that he caused himself to be proclaimed King in divers countries; which albeit, they were known to be false, inasmuch, as the Miller's servant at Battle-Bridge, in Southwark, lost both his ears upon a pillory for so reporting; yet, the very naming of him to be King, either as desired by himself, or by others esteemed worthy, brought with it a distasteful relish, apt to apprehend suspicion to be true. After this, he was charged to have persuaded divers of the nobility to chuse him Protector at the next Parliament. The Duke being questioned, neither held silence as he might, nor constantly denied it, but entangled himself in his doubtful tale. One Whaley, a busy-headed man, and desirous to be set on work, gave first light to this appeachment, but the Earl of Rutland did stoutly avouch it. Herewith, Sir Thomas Palmer, a man neither loving the Duke of Somerset, nor beloved of him, was brought by the Duke of Northumberland to the King, being in his garden. Here he declared, that upon St George's day last, before the Duke of Somerset, being upon a journey towards the North, in case Sir William Herbert, Master of the Horse, had not assured him, that he should receive no harm, would have raised the people; and that he had sent the Lord Grey before, to know, who would be his friends: also, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, and other Lords, should be invited to a banquet, and if they came with a bare company, to be set upon by the way; if strongly, their heads should have been cut off at the place of their feasting. He declared further, that Sir Ralph Vane, had two thousand men in readiness; that Sir Thomas Arundel, had assured the Tower; that Seymour and Hammond would wait upon him, and that all the horse of the Gendarmorie, should be slain. To this, Mr Secretary Cecil added, that the Duke had sent for him, and said, that he suspected some ill meaning against him, whereto Mr Secretary answered, that if he were not in fault, he might trust to his innocency, if he were, he had nothing to say, but to lament him. The Duke being advertised of these informations against him, by some, who had some regard to honesty, did forthwith defy the Secretary by his letters. Then he sent for Sir Thomas Palmer, to understand what he had reported of him, who denied all that he had said; but by this hot and humourous striving, he did but draw the knots more fast. We have this account afterwards repeated, and a little diversified, in speaking of the Duke's trial, sentence, and execution. Bishop Burnet speaks with much more tenderness of this unfortunate nobleman; and though he bears pretty hard every where upon the Duke of Northumberland, yet he does not venture to charge that Duke of with forging any of the circumstances of this conspiracy (38); to say the truth, the friends of Somerset, in the very same breath that they charge Northumberland with bringing him by art to the block, let fall things that seemed to speak quite the contrary; for instance, a certain author (39), delivers himself thus. ' The Duke of Somerset is trained by his enemies to such fears and jealousies, as transport him beyond his own good nature, to an attempt one morning upon the Earl of Warwick, now Duke of Northumberland, a bed, where being received with much kindness, his heart relented, and he came off re infecta. At his coming out, one of his company asked him if he had done the deed? he answered, no; then, said he, you are, yourself undone. And indeed, it so fell out, for when all other accusations failed, this only stuck by him, and could not be denied, and so he was found guilty by a statute of his own procurement, viz. That if any should attempt to kill a Privy-Counsellor, although the fact were not done, yet it should be felony, and to be punished with death.' This fact of Somerset's going with an intention to murder Northumberland in his chamber, is related more at large by a foreign author of the highest credit, who is known to have had his materials from the most knowing persons in this kingdom, who might perhaps be more free in their communications, than they would have been in penning a history, for which they must have been accountable themselves, if it had been published; the reader will be probably pleased to see what he says (40). ' Northumberland having drawn the chief power into his own hands, he had nothing else to do, but to remove Somerset himself out of the way, towards whom he shewed such a contempt, as drove the other upon the thoughts of killing Dudley, for the vindication of his own authority. Somerset therefore went to his house, under pretence of a visit, covered with a coat of mail under his cloaths, and carrying with him, a party of men, whom he left in the next chamber; but, when he was introduced in the civilest manner to Dudley, who was naked, and lying upon his bed, the good natured man repenting, he would not execute his design, and departed without striking a stroke.' It is the observation of the very learned and judicious Mr Camden (41), that the Duke of Somerset lost his life for a very small crime, and that upon a nice point, subtilly devised and managed by his enemies. Now if Doctor Fuller may be admitted to explain this short text, he will bring it home

Cambridge (n), in the room of that unfortunate Peer of whom we have been speaking; but at what time he became High-Steward, which Dr Heylyn assures us he was (o), and that these two offices have never been in one person before or since, is very uncertain. This great Politician had now raised himself as high as it was possible, in point of dignity and of power; the ascendancy he had gained over the young King was so great, that he directed him entirely at his pleasure; and he had, with such dexterity, wrought most of the great Nobility into his interests, and had so humbled and depressed all who shewed any dislike to him, that he seemed to have all things to hope, and little to fear (p). We ought, therefore, to attribute to this situation, and that vain pride which naturally triumphs in the breasts of ambitious men, his mean and barbarous usage of the head of his family, and his near relation, John, Baron of Dudley, whose estate being entangled by usurers, he, by purchasing assignments of mortgages, drew by degrees entirely into his own hands, so as at last to compass what he for many years desired, the possession of the antient castle of Dudley; which he not only thoroughly repaired, but added also a most noble structure, worthy of his wealth and greatness, which was called the new building, adorning all parts of the castle, with the arms of the noble families from which, by his mother's side, he was descended, that, in succeeding times, it might not be taken for an acquisition, but the patrimony of his family (q). This was certainly going far enough, or rather much too far; yet he ventured still farther, and, having despoiled his poor cousin of his castle and estates, thrust the titles of Dudley and Somerie amongst his other baronies, leaving his unhappy kinsman a new and strange title in their stead; for living, as well as he could, amongst the great families in Staffordshire and Warwickshire, who pitied his misfortunes, he went there currently by the name of Lord Quondam, till, by a sudden revolution, he became master of Dudley castle again, and his son obtained, out of the forfeiture of this potent Duke, an ample fortune, free from all incumbrances, with a clear title. But to return to our History. Many writers there are who insinuate, that, from the time the Duke of Northumberland and his family came to have the person of the King, as well as the direction of the Government, in their hands, the health of that young Prince began to decline; but these, perhaps, are no other than calumnies, since the decay of the King's health may, with great probability, be attributed to his having the measles and small-pox in a short time, one after the other, which could not but harrass extremely a constitution naturally tender; and these were diseases which artifice or intrigue could never procure, though they might have afforded a better colour to bad designs, if such had been really entertained, than a lingering consumption which followed them (s). It does not indeed appear, that the Duke of Northumberland had any cause to suspect the loss of his power while that King lived, nor did he seem to fear it; but, when he discerned his Majesty's health to decline apace, it was very natural for him to consider how he might render himself and his family safe. This appears plainly, from the hurry with which the marriage was concluded between the Lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, and his fourth son Lord Guildford Dudley, which was celebrated in the month of May, 1553, that is, not above two months before the King died (t). We may however suppose that he had, for some time, been contriving in his mind that plan, for the disposal of the Kingdom, which he carried afterwards into execution [L]. In the Parliament held a little before the King's death, the Duke of Northumberland procured a considerable supply to be granted, and, in home to the noble person whose article we are writing, speaking of Somerset's accusation (42); he says, 'Here I must set John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, as a transcendent, in a form by himself, being a competent lawyer, son to a Judge, known soldier, and able statesman, and acting against the Protector, in all these his capacities. Indeed, he was the very soul of the accusation, being all in all, and all in every part thereof.' It may be presumed, that the King was as well informed in these points, as any writer whatever; and it appears as well from his Journal, which he kept very exactly, and very secretly (43), as from a private letter of his to Mr Barnaby Fitzpatrick (44), that he did not judge his uncle altogether so innocent, or, that he was convicted without evidence. But after all can be said, the resentment of the Duke of Northumberland, was certainly seen in his execution, if not in his condemnation; since the King might have been easily prevailed on to spare his uncle, if he had been applied to; or rather must have been drawn with difficulty to consent to the death of him, he had so long considered as a parent. Here then lay the cruelty of Northumberland, which was generally remembered when his fall came, and loudly charged upon him by the people (45); and yet it may be urged, if not in justification, yet in excuse, that he was not bound to regard his own life less than Somerset did his, who, for his security, procured that act of Parliament on which he died, nor could it be well expected, that he should have more pity or commiseration for his rival in those unhappy circumstances, than Somerset, when Protector, had for his own brother. [L] Which he carried afterwards into execution.] We are told by Sir John Hayward, that after the creation of the Marquis of Dorset, and the Earl of Warwick, Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, and other promotions and alterations made at court (46), there followed somewhat of still greater consequence, which he introduces thus: 'And which was the accomplishment of mischief, Sir Robert Dudley, one of the Duke of Northumberland's sons, a true heir, both of his hate against persons of the Nobility, and of his cunning to dissemble the same, was sworn one of the six ordinary gentlemen. He was afterwards, for lust and cruelty, a monster of the Court, as apt to hate, so a most sure executioner of his hate; yet, rather by practice, than open dealing, as wanting rather courage than wit. After his entertainment into a place of so near service, the King enjoyed his health not long.' After laying this foundation, he takes it for granted in several passages in the subsequent part of his work, that the King was poisoned by the procurement of the Duke of Northumberland; yet the reverend Mr Strype censures him for writing so positively without authorities, and not without reason. His very introduction is ill grounded; for, as the King tells us himself, Sir Robert Dudley was sworn one of his gentlemen in ordinary, August 15th, 1551 (47), and the promotions of which, Sir John Hayward makes this a consequence, were in the October following. It was in the preamble of that act, a direct censure of the Duke of Somerset's administration; and, having wisely answered his purposes by this single measure, dissolved that Parliament immediately (u). He then applied himself to the King, and shewed him the necessity of setting her aside, from the danger the Protestant religion would be in, if the Lady Mary, should succeed him; in which, from the piety of that young Prince, he met with no great difficulty. Bishop Burnet says, he did not well understand how the King was prevailed upon to pass by his sister Elizabeth, who had been always much in his favour (w); perhaps he might be told, that it was impossible to assign any reasons for disinheriting one sister, that might not also be applied for the other; so that there was a necessity of depriving both, or neither. Yet, when this was done, there was another difficulty in the way. The Duchess of Suffolk was the next heir, and she might have sons, and, therefore, to bar these in favour of Lady Jane Dudley seemed to be unnatural, as well as illegal; the Duchess herself contributed, as far as in her lay, to remove this obstacle, by devolving her right upon her daughter, even if she had male issue; which satisfied the King, who was but in the sixteenth year of his age, and might not therefore perceive the fallacy of resigning not only her own claim, but that of those who might descend from her, which she could not possibly have power to do (x). The King's consent being obtained, the next point was to procure a proper instrument to be drawn by the Judges; in doing which the Duke of Northumberland made use of threats as well as promises, and when done at last, it was in such a manner, as plainly shewed it to be illegal in their own opinions (y) [M]. At this was in the month of April 1552, that the King had the measles and the small-pox, and his health did not begin to decline till some time afterwards, so that there is great impropriety in saying, that after his coming into a place so near him, the King enjoyed his health not long. All the rest of our historians speak very doubtfully of the King's death, chiefly from a great indiscretion, which was the putting him into the hands of a woman, after the Physicians began to doubt whether he could be saved by their skill; from which time it is certain, that he did grow worse, and so the Physicians were called in again (48); yet there are many who will hardly take this for a testimony of his being poisoned, though Sir John Hayward, says, she was a schoolmistress well instructed for the purpose (49), but will rather conceive, that the Duke of Northumberland consented to this, in hopes of saving the King's life; which, if he was a sound politician, he must have considered, as of greater consequence to him, than to any other man in the kingdom. But be this as it will, there is no sort of proof, that the Duke took such early care as he might have done for his family, if he had any foresight of the King's death; but his doing things as he did in a hurry, seems to shew quite the contrary, and indeed, there is a letter of his to Sir William Cecil, which looks as if he had deceived himself much in this particular, and entertained hopes of the King's recovery, after they were lost by others. Yet it cannot be conceived, that while the whole nation was alarmed by the King's sickness, the Duke should be wholly unconcerned as to the event, which is the reason of it's being said in the text, that he might have digested in his mind that scheme of the succession, some time before he mentioned it to the King; and that looking upon it as a dangerous undertaking, and his last shift, he delayed it till the necessity became pressing.

[M] As plainly shewed it to be illegal in their own opinions.] The full narrative of this whole important transaction, and of the Duke of Northumberland's behaviour therein, is thus briefly and clearly delivered by Bishop Burnet (50). 'On the 11th of June, says he, Montague, that was chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and Baker and Bromley, two Judges, with the King's Attorney and Solicitor, were commanded to come to Council. There they found the King with some Privy-Counsellors about him. The King told them, he did now apprehend the danger the kingdom might be in, if, upon his death, his sister Mary should succeed, who might marry a stranger, and so change the laws and the religion of the realm; so he ordered some articles to be read to them, of the way in which he would have the crown to descend. They objected, that the Act of Succession, being an act of Parliament, could not be taken away by any such device: yet the King required them to take the articles, and draw a book according to them: they asked a little time to consider of it. So having examined the statute of the first year of this reign, concerning treasons, they found that it was treason, not only after the King's death, but even in his life, to change the succession. Secretary Petre, in the mean while pressed them to make haste: when they came again to the Council, they declared they could not do any thing; for it was treason, and all the Lords should be guilty of treason, if they went on in it. Upon which, the Duke of Northumberland, who was not then in the Council-Chamber; being advertised of this, came in great fury, calling Montague a traitor, and threatened all the Judges, so that they thought he would have beaten them. But the Judges stood to their opinion. They were again sent for, and came with Gosnald added to them, on the 15th of June. The King was present, and he somewhat sharply asked them, why they had not prepared the book as he had ordered them? they answered, That whatever they did, would be of no force without a Parliament. The King said, he intended to have one shortly. Then Montague proposed, that it might be delayed till the Parliament met. But the King said, he would have it first done, and then ratified in Parliament, and therefore, he required them on their allegiance, to go about it, and some Counsellors told them, that if they refused to obey, that they were traitors. This put them in a great consternation; and old Montague thinking it could not be treason whatever they did in this matter while the King lived, and at worst, that a pardon under the Great-Seal would secure him, consented to set about it, if he might have a commission, requiring him to do it, and a pardon under the Great-Seal when it was done. Both these being granted him, he was satisfied. The other Judges being asked, if they would concur, did all agree, being overcome with fear, except Gosnald, who still refused to do it. But he also being forely threatened, both by the Duke of Northumberland, and the Earl of Shrewsbury, consented to it the next day. So they put the entail of the crown, in form of law, and brought it to the Lord Chancellor, to put the seal to it. They were all required to set their hands to it; but, both Gosnald and Hales refused. Yet the former was wrought on to do it, but the latter, though a most steady and zealous man for the Reformation, would upon no consideration yield to it: after, that the Lord Chancellor for his security, desired that all the Counsellors might set their hands to it, which was done on the 21st of June, by thirty-three of them, it is like, including the Judges in the number. But Cranmer, as he came seldom to Council after the Duke of Somerset's fall, so he was that day absent on design. Cecil, in a relation which he made one write of this transaction for clearing himself, afterwards, says, that when he had heard Gosnald and Hales declare how much it was against law, he refused to set his hand to it as a Counsellor, and only signed it as a witness to the King's subscription. But Cranmer still refused to do it, after they had all signed this time indeed the Duke, either from the hurry of his passions, the fear he had of what might happen from delays, or the haughtiness arising from a series of good fortune which had so long continued, began to lose much of his former gentleness and affability, as he shewed himself amazingly rapacious in the grants which he obtained from a King, whose age, exclusive of his sickness, made it indecent at least, if not illegal, to accept such mighty bounties, the worth of which he could never be presumed to know, from his giving them thus lavishly away. The Duke was no less careful in drawing to himself as much power, and diffusing his interest as wide as possible; so that whatever happened he might not want a retreat, or find his schemes in danger of being broken through an opposition by the discontented Nobility, in which schemes, notwithstanding their difficulty, he succeeded to his wish, his estate being enlarged, and his offices multiplied, beyond any thing that had in former times been bestowed upon any subject (z) [N]. The Letters Patents for disposing of the Crown were signed by King Edward on the 21st of June (a), and on the 6th of July that Monarch expired, expressing to the last great satisfaction in the provision he had made for the security of the Protestant Religion, and the happiness of his people (b). It is said, that the Duke of Northumberland was very desirous of concealing the King's death for some time, but this being found impossible, he carried his daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane, from Durham-House to the Tower for the greater security, and on the 10th of July proclaimed her Queen (c); the Council also wrote to Lady Mary requiring her submission, but they were very soon informed that she was retired into Norfolk, where many of the Nobility, and multitudes of people, resorted to her (d). It was then resolved to send forces against her under the command of the Duke of Suffolk, but Queen Jane, as she was then stiled, would by no means part with her father, and the Council earnestly pressed the Duke of Northumberland to go in person, to which he was little inclined, as doubting their fidelity. He signified as much in the speech he made at taking his leave, and was answered with the strongest assurances that men could give; the Earl of Arundel particularly told him, he was sorry it was not his chance to go with him, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his blood even at his feet (e). On the 14th of July the Duke, accompanied by the Marquis of Northampton, the Lord Grey, and others, marched through Bishopsgate with two thousand horse, and six thousand foot; but, as they rode through Shoreditch, he could not forbear saying to the Lord Grey, The people press to see us, but not one says God speed us (f). His activity and courage, for which he had been so famous, seemed, from this time, to have deserted him; for though he advanced to St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, yet finding his troops diminish, the people little affected to him, and no supplies coming from London, though he had wrote to the Lords in the most pressing terms, he retired back again to Cambridge (g). In the mean time the Council thought of nothing but how to get out of the Tower, and at last effected it, under pretence of going to the Earl of Pembroke's house at Baynard's Castle, to give audience to the foreign Ambassadors. This was on the 19th of the same month, and the first thing they did when they came there, was to send for the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, whom they accompanied to Cheapside, and there Garter King at Arms proclaimed Queen Mary; the Earl of Arundel, and Lord Paget, went the same night signed it, and said he would never consent to the inheriting of the daughters of his late master. Many consultations were had to persuade him to it. But he could not be prevailed on, till the King himself set on him, who used many arguments from the danger religion would otherwise be in, together with other persuasions; so that by his reasons, or rather importunities, at last he brought him to it.

[N] Been bestowed upon any subject] If all the instances that might be alledged of this, were carefully collected, they would swell this note very much beyond its proper bounds; and therefore, it shall suffice to alledge here, the testimony of the industrious Strype, who, though in other places he has distinctly considered them, thus sums up the matter at once, speaking of the Duke's state and condition, in the year 1553 (51). Dudley, the great Duke of Northumberland, now bore all the sway at Court, and, in effect, did what he listed. This year, besides the County Palatine of Durham, the honour and power of which was like to fall to him; the King gave him Bernard's Castle there, with very great additions of lands and lordships in that county, and in Northumberland, Westmoreland, and York, or any other where in the Bishoprick of Durham for life. He had also granted to him, the manors of Feckenham, Bromesgrove, King's Norton in Worcestershire, with many other lands. The year before, he was made Chief Steward of the East-riding of York, and of all the King's lordship in Holderness and Cottingham in the said county. The year before that, he was constituted General Warden, or Keeper of the Marches of England, towards Scotland, namely, of the East, West, and middle Marches. Which were scarcely before, put into one man's hand (except the Marquis of Dorset immediately before him) and he to appoint his deputy-wardens. And his patent was ordered to be drawn up in the most large and comprehensive manner, endowing him with as much authority, power, pre-eminence, commodity, and liberty, as any before him had enjoyed, from Richard the second's time, to Henry the eighth, as the warrant ran. Besides these things in the North, he obtained of the King, great and spreading demesns in Somersethire, Warwick, and Worcestershire, and many other counties. So that by this time, the Duke had prodigiously enriched himself, and made himself formidably great, by lands and lordships, honours and offices, castles and places of trust heaped upon him by the King, by whom it was not safe to deny him any thing he asked. He had strengthened his interest also, by raising himself friends upon the King's cost, as more especially the Lord Clinton, and Sir John Gates, and his brother, Sir Andrews Dudley, Master of the Wardrobe, and taken into the order of the Garter; and his own sons, John, raised to the degree of Earl of Warwick, and master of the King's horse (52); Sir Robert Dudley made a Lord (53), and the King's Carver, and Guildford Dudley, whom the Duke was now marrying to one of the royal blood, viz. the Lady Jane, eldest daughter of the Duke of Suffolk.

(52) This was only by his father's being created Duke of Northumberland.

(53) He was a Lord barely by courtesy, as all the rest of the Duke's sons were.

night post to pay their duty to her (b). The Duke of Northumberland had advice of this on the 20th, and about five in the afternoon the same day, caused her to be proclaimed at Cambridge, throwing up his cap and crying, God save Queen Mary! with how much joy and sincerity may be easily imagined (i); about an hour afterwards came letters from the Council to the Duke of Northumberland, by one of the Heralds, requiring him to disband his forces, upon receiving which the Duke gave leave to every man to depart, and soon after he was arrested in King's-college by Slegge, Serjeant at Arms; but other letters coming from the Council, that all men should go each his way, the Duke said to those that kept him, Ye do me wrong to withdraw my liberty, see ye not the Council's letters, without exception, that all men should go whither they would. Whereupon they who guarded him and the other Noblemen, set them at liberty, and so they continued for that night, and the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumberland's son, was ready in the morning to have rode away, at which time the Earl of Arundel came from the Queen to the Duke into his chamber, who, when he saw him, said, For the love of God consider, I have done nothing but by the consent of you, and all the whole Council. My Lord, replied the Earl of Arundel, I am sent hither by the Queen's Majesty, and in her name I arrest you. I obey it, said the Duke, I beseech you, my Lord of Arundel, use mercy towards me, knowing the case as it is. My Lord, answered the Earl, you should have sought for mercy sooner, I must do according to my commandment. And thereupon committed the charge of him, and of others, to the guard, and Gentlemen that stood by (k). The 25th of July, the Duke, with the rest, were brought to the Tower of London, under the conduct of Henry Earl of Arundel, with a body of light horsemen (l). On Friday the 18th of August he was arraigned, a great scaffold being set up in Westminster-Hall, with John, Earl of Warwick, his son and heir, and William Parr, Marquis of Northampton, before Thomas Duke of Norfolk, High-Steward of England on that occasion. As to his behaviour at his trial, which was equally modest and decent, some particulars of it will be mentioned in the notes (m) [O]. After his condemnation he was carried back to the Tower, where he remained a close prisoner. Monday, the twenty-first of August, was the day fixed for his execution, when a vast concourse of people assembled upon Tower-Hill, all the usual preparations being made, and the executioner ready; but, after waiting some hours, the people were ordered to depart. This delay was to afford time for his making an open shew of the change of his religion, since that very day, in the presence of the Mayor and Aldermen, as well as some of the Privy-Council, he heard mass in the Tower (n). The next day he was actually brought out to suffer death, on the same scaffold, on Tower-Hill, where he made a very long speech to the people; of which there remains nothing but what relates to his religion, which he not only professed to be then that of the Church of Rome, but that it had been always so, taking upon himself the odious character of a hypocrite in the sight of God, as well as a dissembler with men (o). John Fox affirms, that he had a promise of pardon even if his head was upon the block, if he would recant and hear mass (p); and some have believed that he entertained such a hope to the last, from a passage in his speech [P]. However that may be, it is allowed that he behaved with becoming

[O] Will be mentioned in the notes.] The indictment having been read, containing a charge against him of high-treason. The Duke of Northumberland, with great reverence towards the Judges, protested his faith and allegiance to the Queen, whom he confessed grievously to have offended, and said he meant not to speak any thing in defence of his acts, but requested to understand the opinion of the court in two points (54):

First, Whether a man doing any act by the authority of the Prince's Council, and by warrant of the Great Seal of England, and doing nothing without the same, might be charged with treason for any thing he might do by warrant thereof.

Secondly, Whether any such persons as were equally culpable in that crime, and those by whose letters and commandments he was directed in all his doings, might be his judges, or pass upon his trial as his Peers?

To which it was answered: 'That the Great-Seal which he had for his warrant, was not the Seal of the lawful Queen of the realm, nor passed by authority, but the Seal of an usurper, and therefore could be no warrant to him. And that if any were as deeply to be touched in the case as himself, yet so long as no attainder was of record against them, they were persons able in law to pass on any trial, and not to be challenged but at the Prince's pleasure.' After which answer the Duke used few words, but confessed the indictment; by whose example the other prisoners arraigned with him did the like, and thereupon had judgment. The Duke, on receiving his sentence, said: 'I beseech you, my Lords, all to be humble suitors to the Queen's Majesty, and to grant me four requests: First, That I may have that death which Noblemen have had in times past, and not the other, Secondly, That her Majesty will be gracious to my children, which may hereafter do good service, considering that they went by my commandment, who am their father, and not of their own free wills. Thirdly, That I may have appointed to me some learned men for the instruction and quiet of my conscience. And fourthly, That she will send two of the Council to commune with me, to whom I will declare such matters as shall be expedient for her and the commonwealth. And thus I beseech you all to pray for me.'

[P] From a passage in his speech.] Several authors agree in affirming that he made a long speech at the time of his death, and we have reason to regret that only a part of it is preserved, which is what follows: (55) 'Good people, all you that be here present to see me die, though my death be odious and horrible to the flesh, yet I pray you judge the best in God's works, for he doth all for the best. And as for me I am a wretched sinner, and have deserved to die, and most justly am condemned to die by Law. And yet this act whereof I die was not altogether of me, but I was procured and induced thereunto by others; I was I say induced thereunto by others. Howbeit, God forbid that I should name any man unto you, I will name no man unto you, and therefore I beseech you look not for it. I, for my part, forgive all men, and pray God also to forgive them, and if I have offended any of you here, I pray you and all the world to forgive me, and most chiefly I desire forgiveness of the Queen's Highness, whom I have most grievously offended. And I pray you all to witness becoming courage and composure, putting off his damask gown when he had done speaking, and then kneeled down, saying, to them that were about him, I beseech you all to bear me witness that I die in the true Catholick faith, and then said the Psalms of Miserere, and De profundis, his Pater noster, and six of the first verses of the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ending with this verse, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit. And when he had thus ended his prayers, the Executioner asked him forgiveness, to whom he said, I forgive thee with all my heart, do thy part without fear. And bowing towards the block, he said, I have deserved a thousand deaths; then laid his head on the block, and was beheaded; whose body, with the head, was buried in the Tower by the body of Edward Duke of Somerset, so that there lie between the high altar in St Peter's church, two Dukes between two Queens, viz. Queen Anne and Queen Catherine, all four beheaded (q). Such was the end of this potent Nobleman, who, with the title of a Duke, exercised, for some time, a power little inferior to that of a King, in the fifty-first, or at most in the fifty-second year of his age, one differently represented by our Historians [2], but witness for me, that I depart in perfect love and charity with all the world, and that you will assist me with your prayers at the hour of death. — And here I do protest unto you, good people, most earnestly, even from the bottom of my heart, that this which I have spoken is of myself, not being required nor moved thereunto by any man, nor by any flattery or hope of life; and I take witness of my Lord of Worcester (*) here, mine old friend and ghostly father, that he found me in this mind and opinion when he came to me, but I have declared this only upon mine own mind and affection, and for the zeal and love that I bear to my natural country. I could, good people, rehearse much more even by experience, that I have of this evil that hath happened to this realm by these occasions, but you know I have another thing to do, whereunto I must prepare me, for the time draweth away. And now I beseech the Queen's Highness to forgive me mine offences against her Majesty, whereof I have a singular hope, forasmuch as she has already extended her goodness and clemency so far upon me, that whereas she might forthwith, without judgment, or any farther trial, have put me to most vile and cruel death, by hanging, drawing, and quartering, forasmuch as I was in the field in arms against her Majesty. Her Highness nevertheless, of her most merciful goodness, suffered me to be brought to my judgment, and to have my trial by law, where I was most justly condemned. And her Highness hath now also extended her mercy and clemency upon me, for the manner and kind of my death. And therefore my hope is, that her Grace, of her goodness, will remit all the rest of her indignation and displeasure towards me, which I beseech you all most heartily to pray for, and that it may please God long to preserve her Majesty, to reign over you in much honour and felicity. I must confess it does not appear to me, that this speech of the Duke implies any persuasion of pardon, but quite the contrary; he recapitulates those instances of justice and kindness, which he would have the people believe, he, in his own opinion, had received from the Queen, and from thence infers, that her Majesty would retain no resentment against him after he was dead, and consequently would not proceed against his family, of which many were obnoxious to her justice, and all of them to her suspicions. If, therefore, any promises were made to him, it is more likely that they should relate to his children, and his brother, in favour of whom he might possibly resolve to die as he lived, like a Courtier, as he evidently did.

We have the following character of this great man, drawn by the hand of a famous Ecclesiastical Historian (56). Such was the end of this great person, the first Earl of Warwick, and the last Duke of Northumberland of this name and family. By birth he was the eldest son of Sir Edmund Sutton, alias Dudley, who, together with Sir Richard Empson, were the chief instruments and promoters under Henry VII for putting the penal laws in execution, to the great grievance and oppression of all sorts of subjects. For which, and other offences of a higher nature, they were both sacrificed to the fury of the common people, by King Henry VIII, which possibly might make him carry a vindictive mind towards that

King's children, and prompt him to the disinheriting of all his progeny. First trained up (as his father had also been before him) in the study of the Common Laws, which made him cunning enough to pick holes in any man's estate, to find ways by which to bring their lives in danger. But finding that the long sword was of more estimation than the long robe in the time of that King, he put himself forward on all actions wherein honour was to be acquired, in which he gave such testimony of his judgment and valour, that he gained much on the affections of his Prince, by whom he was created Viscount L'Isle, on the 15th of March, anno 1541, installed Knight of the Garter in 1543, and made Lord Admiral of England. Employed in many actions against the Scots, he came off always with success and victory, and having said this, we have said all that was accounted either good or commendable in the whole course of his life. Being advanced unto the title of Earl of Warwick by King Edward VI, he thought himself in a capacity of making Queens, as well as Richard Nevil (one of his predecessors in that title) had been for setting up and deposing Kings; and they both perished under the ambition of those proud attempts. Punished as Nevil also was, in having no issue male remaining to preserve his name. For though he had six sons, all of them living to be men, and all of them to be married men, yet they went all childless to the grave, I mean, as to the having of lawful issue, as if the curse of Jeconiah had been laid upon them. With him died also the proud title of Duke of Northumberland, never aspired to by the Piercys, though men of eminent nobility. The reader may compare this with the following sketch of his character by Bishop Burnet, than whom no man could be better acquainted with the History of those times (57). Thus died the ambitious Duke of Northumberland. He had been, in the former parts of his life, a great Captain, and had the reputation of a very wise man: he was generally successful, and they that are so, are always esteemed wise. He was an extraordinary man in a lower size, but had forgot himself much when he was raised higher, in which his mind seemed more exalted than his fortunes. But as he was transported by his rage and revenge out of measure, so he was as servile and mean in his submissions. Fox, it seems, was informed, that he had hopes given him of his life, if he should declare himself of the Popish religion, even though his head were laid on the block; but which way soever he made that declaration, either to get his life by it, or that he had really been always what he now professed, it argues that he regarded religion very little, either in his life, or at his death. But, whether he did any thing to hasten the King's death, I do not find it was at all enquired after. Only those who consider how much guilt disorders all people, and that they have a black cloud over their minds, which appears either in the violence of rage, or the abjectness of fear, did find so great a change in his deportment in these last passages of his life, from what was in the former parts of it, that they could not but think there was some extraordinary thing within him, from whence it flowed. We may well suppose, that some shining qualities were very conspicuous in this unfortunate Duke, since the greatest enemy his family ever had, at the close of his most virulent invective against his son, the Earl of Leicester, has these words, which

but, of whom it may be truly said, that though even his enemies could not deny he had many great, and some good, qualities, yet the best friends to his memory must confess, they were much overballanced by his vices. His relict, Jane, Duchefs of Northumberland, was a Lady of great piety and virtue, of whom therefore we shall give a short account in a note [R]. His brother, Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, fell under the same condemnation with himself, but, through the clemency of Queen Mary, his life was spared; some particulars of which the reader will find at the bottom of the page [S]. This great Duke had also a numerous issue, viz. eight sons and five daughters, of whom some went before him to the grave, others survived, and lived to see a great change in their fortunes; we shall likewise give a succinct account of them, for the reader's satisfaction [T]. It may not be amiss to remember here, that Sir John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, was taken into the new Queen's favour, though he did not live to enjoy it long, dying in less than a month after the great Duke his cousin, and, by the Queen's special command, was, on the 21st of September 1553, buried with great pomp and ceremony at Westminster, the Heralds attending at his funeral, when his stile and titles were publickly proclaimed (r). His son Edward Sutton, Lord Dudley, received still higher marks of her Royal beneficence, since, by her Letters Patents, she restored to him and the heirs of his body all the manors of Horburne and Smethwick, with the advowson of the church of Horburne in the county of Stafford; as also the whole priory of Dudley, and the tithes of Norfield and Sedgeley, with divers messuages and lands, parcel of the possessions belonging to the same priory, then in the possession of the Crown by the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland (s). This Lord taking to wife Catherine, the daughter of Sir John Bridges, Lord Chandos of Sudeley, one of the Ladies in ordinary attending on the Queen, she granted to him, and to the heirs of their two bodies, the lordships of Sedgeley, Himley, and Swinford, with the parks of Etinshall, Sedgeley, and Himley; the hays, forests, and chaces, of Ashwood and Chaspell, with all the land called Willingworth, and divers other lands and tenements which falling from him are very remarkable (58). In his father, no doubt, there were to be seen many excellent good parts, if they had been joined with faith, honesty, moderation, and loyalty. For all the world knows that he was very wise, valiant, magnanimous, liberal, and assured friendly where he once promised, of all which virtues, my Lord his son hath neither shew nor shadow. That he was a good master, and that he had a servant in whom the memory of past favours out-lived the Duke, as well as his fortunes, will appear from the following passage, recorded in an old History of our Peerage (59), and except the last sentence transcribed by Sir William Dugdale (60). John Cock, Lancaster Herald, some time servant to this Duke, begged of Queen Mary to bury the head of his old master in the Tower of London, which was granted him with the whole body, and performed accordingly. In remembrance whereof, the said Lancaster, did ever after bear for his crest, a bear's head, silver; crowned, gold. It may not be amiss to add here, that it was also in gratitude for this good office he was made Lancaster Herald in 1585, when Robert, Earl of Leicester, son to this Duke, went Governor of the Low-Countries, whom he attended (61).

[R] A short account in a note.] The name of this lady, was Jane Guilford, daughter and heir of Sir Edward Guilford, Marshal of Calais, Lord-Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Master of the Ordnance under King Henry VIII, by Eleanor, sister and heiress of Thomas West, Lord la Warre. It seems this was a marriage of affection, their fathers having been intimate friends, and themselves brought up together while children. The Duke married her when he was scarce of age, so that they had lived together thirty years at the time he lost his life, when her estate was truly deplorable, being, in the strict sense of the words, turned out of doors, all her furniture seized, left without fortune, without friends, and without necessities, her husband and her son executed, her other sons living, but by permission; so that considering her age, her quality, and the manner in which she had spent her days, the Duke being as absolute in his own house, by affection, as in the state by power, she could not but be very miserable. By degrees however things grew better, more especially after the marriage of Queen Mary to King Philip, the Spanish lords and ladies of his court, employing all their interest in her favour, as appears from her will, written with her own hand, in which she expresses a very grateful sense of their kindnesses. But no reason has been assigned hitherto for their behaviour towards her, though there was a very good one; for her uncle Henry Guilford had served long in Spain, was knighted by King Ferdinand, and for his gallant behaviour in war, had the arms of the kingdom of Granada granted him, as an augmentation of his paternal coat; she deceased at her house at Chelsea, in the forty-sixth year of her age, on the 22d of January 1554-5, and was buried with great funeral solemnity in the church there, on the 1st of February following, and had a noble monument erected there, with a suitable inscription to perpetuate her memory (62).

[S] At the bottom of the page.] It does not appear, at what time this gentleman received the honour of knighthood, but we find, that by the title of Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight, he had the manor of Whitney granted him by King Edward VI, in the year 1551 (63). A like grant of the manor of Minster Lovel, and the hundred of Chadlington, passed in the month of February, 1552; in the month of October, the same year, upon his being recalled from the castle of Guines, of which he was captain, he was appointed one of the four gentlemen in ordinary of his Majesty's Privy-Chamber (64); he was also keeper of the palace of Westminster, and, as the warrants to him plainly shew, Master of the Wardrobe (65); but the last and greatest favour he received in that reign, was his being elected, April 23d, in the sixth year of Edward VI, one of the Knights Companions of the most Noble Order of the Garter (66). He joined, as it was natural for him to do, with the Duke his brother, and for that offence, on the 19th of August 1553, received judgment to die as a traitor, notwithstanding which, he was reprieved, and afterwards pardoned, and discharged out of the Tower, Octob. 18, 1554, living the remainder of his life privately, at his house in Tothill-street, where he deceased in 1559, but it does not appear that any notice was taken of him by Queen Elizabeth, so that, at the time of his demise, his fortune was but small (67).

[T] For the reader's satisfaction.] We are here to speak of the Duke of Northumberland's posterity, and first of the sons, which were eight.

I. Henry, who was killed at the siege of Bologne, at the age of nineteen, married to Wynefred, daughter to the Lord Rich; upon whose death there is an elegy extant, by Leland (68).

II. Thomas, who died when he was two years old.

III. John, who had the title of Earl of Warwick in his father's life-time; at the coronation of Edward VI, he was made one of the Knights of the Bath; in the fifth year of that monarch's reign, he accompanied the Marquis of Northampton, who carried the Order of the Garter to the French King (69). In the sixth of Edward in the county of Stafford (t): her Majesty also granted him, though the date does not appear, the whole castle of Dudley, the park called the Conigree, the old park of Dudley, with divers other lands lying in Dudley, Rowley, and Sedgley, in the county of Stafford; all which came to the Crown by the forfeiture of the said John, Duke of Northumberland (u). The Queen also made this Lord Governor of the castle of Hampnies in Picardy, for the term of his natural life (v). By his Lady beforementioned, he had only one daughter, Anne, married to Thomas Wylmer, Esq; Counsellor at Law (x). As to his other marriages and issue, the reader has seen them already in another place (y); we shall therefore add nothing farther here, than that this noble Peer dying July 4, 1586, in the twenty-eighth year of Queen Elizabeth (z), his body was interred in the church of St Margaret, Westminster.

Edward VI. he was made Master of the Horse, with a fee of one hundred pounds per annum (70). He had the wardship granted him, of Sir Edward Seymour, Knight, son to the Protector (71). But whereas it is said, by certain writers, that when his father caused the Lord Paget to be deprived of the Garter (72), it was to make room for his son the Earl of Warwick, that is not likely to be true, because this young nobleman never had it at all; he was condemned with his father, but reprieved and released out of the Tower with his uncle, and going to his brother's house at Penhurst in Kent, died there in two days time; so that it is probable, he was dying when he was discharged (73). He was, as a certain writer informs us, a nobleman of great hope, and one of the mirrors of his age for religion, learning, and military affairs (74). He deceased, October the 21st, 1554, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, leaving no issue by his Countess, the daughter of the Duke of Somerset, who after his death, married Sir Edward Umpton, Knight (75).

IV. and V. Ambrose and Robert, of whom hereafter.

VI. Guilford, who, as we have shewn in the text, married Jane, daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, in the month of May, 1553, and on the 12th of February following, lost his life, together with his unfortunate lady, upon the scaffold (76).

VII. Henry, who married Margaret, the sole daughter and heiress of Thomas, Lord Audley, High-Chancellor of England, and was killed at the siege of St Quintins, in 1557. His widow married Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, and from her descended the Howards, Earls of Suffolk (77).

VIII. Charles, who at his death, was but four years old. The daughters were five, viz.

1. Mary, who married Sir Henry Sydney, Knight of the Garter, Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Lord President of Wales, from whom descended the Earls of Leicester of that name (78).

2. Margaret, who died when she was ten years old.

3. Catherine, who became the wife of Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntington, and Lord President of the North, by whom she had no issue, she survived him long, and deceasing in the month of August, 1620, was interred by her mother in Chelsea church (79).

4. Temperance, who died at a year old (80).

5. Another Catherine, who died at seven years of age (81).

DUDLEY (Lady JANE), see GRAY (Lady JANE), or, as Heylyn styles her, QUEEN JANE.

DUDLEY (AMBROSE), son of John, Duke of Northumberland beforementioned, afterwards Baron L'Isle, and Earl of Warwick, through the favour of Queen Elizabeth. He was born, as I conjecture, either in 1530 or 1531, and was carefully educated in his father's family, and shewing an early propensity to arms, he attended his father, then Earl of Warwick, when he went into Norfolk against the rebels in the year 1549 (a), and there it was, in all probability, that he deserved the honour of knighthood, which was conferred upon him November the 17th, with the Duke of Lunenburgh, Sir John Perrot, Sir Nicholas Pelham, and Sir Thomas Russel (b). We find him very high in King Edward's favour in 1552, when he assisted at several tournaments, made, as some writers insinuate, to amuse the young King, while his uncle the Duke of Somerset was under sentence of death (c). He was then stiled Lord Ambrose Dudley, and received by that title some marks of benevolence from the King his master (d). He continued all that reign, as the reader may conceive, in much credit at Court, and being in arms at the same time with the Duke of Northumberland on the behalf of Lady Jane, he was attainted, received sentence of death, and remained a close prisoner till October 18, 1554 (e), when he was discharged out of the Tower, and pardoned for life (f). Upon the demise of his mother, the Duchess of Northumberland, in the succeeding year, he became possessed of the Lordship of Hale Owen, charged with some annuities to his younger brothers by the Will of that Lady (g). In 1557, in company with both his brothers, he attended the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Viscount Montacute, the Lord Wilton, and the Earl of Lincoln, who, in the month of May, with a body of eight thousand men, passed over into the Low-Countries, and joined the Spanish army that lay then before St Quintins (h). He had his share in the famous victory that was gained over the French who came to the relief of the place, and was likewise present during the remaining part of the siege, which after the battle was resumed (i). Having had the misfortune to lose there his youngest brother, who was a person of great hopes, and a singular favourite with King Edward VI (k), this matter was so represented to Queen Mary, that she consented to restore the whole family in blood, and accordingly an act passed this year for that purpose, by which Sir Ambrose Dudley, Knight, was entirely freed from the inconveniencies derived upon him by the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland, his father (l) [A]. [A] By the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland, his father. It is highly probable, that this restitution in blood was obtained by the power of King Philip, on account of the good services that had been performed by all the brothers at St Quintins, where the youngest, Henry, in the last assault given to the place, was killed by a shot, as he was stooping to draw his stocking over his knee, that it might not incommode him in scaling (1). This act of Parliament recites (2), that by reason of the attainders of John, Duke

the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he became immediately one of the most distinguished persons at her Court, and was called, as in the days of her brother, Lord Ambrose Dudley (m). In the first year of her reign, he obtained a grant of the manor of Kibworth Beauchamp in the county of Leicester, to be held by the service of Pantler to the Kings and Queens of this realm at their coronation (n), which seemed to be a happy omen of the restitution of his family, since that office had been, by his father, and other his ancestors Earls of Warwick, enjoyed. In the first promotion however he had no higher preferment given him, and was also passed by in the first creation of Peers (o). In the second year of her reign, the Queen bestowed on him a much stronger mark of her kindness, by advancing him to the great office of Master of the Ordnance (p), and to shew her confidence in him the greater, he was so constituted for life. On Christmas day, in the fourth year of her reign, he had the antient honour of his family, though with some change in the title, conferred upon him, being created by patent Baron of Kingston L'Isle in the county of Berks, in consideration of his illustrious blood, fidelity, valour, prudence, and other great merits, as the preamble of that patent recites (q); and the very next day was advanced to the honour of Earl of Warwick, with very singular circumstances of the Queen's esteem [B]. It was about this time judged necessary to send over a body of English troops to Normandy, upon a promise made by the Protestants to Queen Elizabeth, that they should have a very important port put into their hands, which being considered as a matter of the highest importance, the Council recommended to her the Earl of Warwick, as the properest person to be entrusted with the command. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1562, he was honoured with a commission to be the Queen's Lieutenant in Normandy, where the important town of Havre de Grace, called by our writers New Haven, was delivered to him, and he was with great solemnity sworn into his office (r). He behaved himself, in the course of that expedition, with the greatest courage and conduct, executed the Queen's orders with the utmost punctuality, and when he found himself shut up in the place, defended it with all the firmness and prudence imaginable; neither would he deliver it up, though warmly pressed by a great army, and attacked within by famine and pestilence, till he received the Queen's express commands, and then obtained an honourable capitulation (s) [C]. While he commanded in France, the Queen caused him to be elected Knight

Duke of Northumberland, the said Ambrose Dudley, and Robert Dudley, Knights, now remain out of all name and reputation, to their great discomfort, grief, and daily sorrow. And for as much as the said Ambrose and Robert be, and always, ever since the said attainders have been, and always hereafter intend to be, her Highness's true and faithful subjects: It may therefore please her Highness, &c. at their most humble petitions, for the true and faithful service which they had done, and intend to do during their lives; and having already given good proof and trial of their fidelity, &c. it was therefore enacted, with the assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and of the Commons in Parliament assembled, That the said Ambrose Dudley, and Robert Dudley, Knights, the Lady Mary Sidney, and Lady Catherine Hastings, and every of them, and their heirs, and the heirs of every of them, from henceforth, may, and shall, by authority of this act, be restored and enabled in blood and name, and made heir and heirs, as well to the said Sir John Dudley, Knight, late Duke of Northumberland, their said father, as also to any other their ancestor or ancestors, lineal or collateral, in such manner and form, as if the said late Duke their father, or they, or any of them had never byn attainted, and as yf no such attainder or attainders were, or had byn had: the corruption of blood between the said late Duke their father, and your said subjects, or any of them, or the corruption of blood between your said subjects, and any other their ancestor, or ancestors, or any act of Parliament, or judgment at Common-Law, concerning the attainder of the said late Duke their father, or of the said Sir Ambrose Dudley, or of the said Sir Robert Dudley, or any of them, or any other thing, whereby the blood of the said late Duke their father, or of the said Sir Ambrose Dudley, or of the said Sir Robert Dudley, or any of them, is, should, or might be, corrupted, &c. And it was also enacted, that the said Ambrose Dudley, and Robert Dudley, the Lady Mary Sidney, and the Lady Catherine Hastings, and every of them, and their heirs, &c. shall be enabled to demand, ask, have, hold, and enjoy, all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, &c. which at any time hereafter shall descend, come, remain, or revert from any their ancestor, or ancestors, as if the said Duke their father, or any of them had never byn attainted, and as though no such attainder of their said late father, or of them, or any of them had ever been had or made.

[B] With very singular circumstances of the Queen's esteem ] It is no unreasonable conjecture, that the Queen had the raising of this noble person and his brother much at heart, from the very beginning of her reign; at which, though some historians affect much amazement, and have recourse to the influence of the stars, to account for what they could not comprehend (3), there seems however, to be no great difficulty in the case. In her youth, the princess Elizabeth, had conversed very intimately with Ambrose and Robert Dudley. saw them high in her brother King Edward's favour, and probably had made use of their interest in those times of prosperity. They had been also, abating the great distance in their rank, companions in adversity under Queen Mary; nor is it at all improbable, that they might render the Princess Elizabeth very acceptable service, during the latter part of that reign, when both the brothers had recovered some degree of favour. But notwithstanding all this, the Queen proceeded slowly, and with much deliberation. The preamble to his patent for the Earldom of Warwick sets forth (4), That the Queen considering that the way to increase her royal dignity, is by advancing men to titles of honour, eminent for their abilities and valour, and of such, the more she prefers, the brighter her crown shines. And Sir Ambrose Dudley, Knight, Baron L'Isle, being lawfully descended from the illustrious and ancient race of the Earls of Warwick, as also he is at the present eldest son of John, late Duke of Northumberland, and Earl of Warwick. She therefore being willing to restore the family, has created him Earl of Warwick, by girding him with a sword, and placing a cap of honour and circle on his head; to hold to him, and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, Master of the Horse to her Majesty, otherwise called Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, brother of the said Sir Ambrose Dudley, Knight, Baron L'Isle, and now Earl of Warwick, and to the heirs male of the body of the said Sir Robert, with a grant of twenty pounds annually, out of the fee-farm rent of the city of Coventry, payable by the sheriff and citizens of the said city.

[C] And then obtained an honourable capitulation ] About this time, the first civil wars on the score of religion

Knight of the Garter, and the ensigns of the Order were sent over to him thither (t). Upon his return he was received with great kindness by his Sovereign, who continued to him her accustomed favour, and gave him, upon many occasions, extraordinary marks of her confidence. In 1566 he was created Doctor of Laws by the University of Oxford (u), and, in 1568, he was added, with some other Noblemen, to the Lords of her Majesty's Privy-Council, as a Commissioner in the great cause of the Queen of Scots, upon her retiring into England; and took the oath of secrecy imposed upon that occasion (w). In 1569 he, together with the Lord Clinton, was appointed jointly and severally the Queen's Lieutenants in the North, upon that dangerous rebellion which broke out under the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, which, by his care and vigilance, was happily suppressed. In 1570 the Queen was pleased to grant him the office of Chief-Butler of England (x). In the beginning of the succeeding year, when the unfortunate Thomas Duke of Norfolk was brought to his trial before George Earl of Shrewsbury, as Lord High-Steward of England, he was one of the Peers appointed, by the Queen's Commission, to sit upon the trial (y). In the same year he was sworn one of the Members of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy-Council (z). We find him in all the great and publick services during this active and busy reign, but never in any of the intrigues with which it was blemished; for he was a man of great sweetness of temper, and of unexceptionable character, so that he was beloved by all parties, and hated by none (a). He distinguished himself particularly as the zealous patron of the trade and manufactures of his country, which induced him to promote a design, formed by some Merchants of London, for opening the trade to Barbary; which, however, was not attended with so much good fortune as they expected; upon which that noble Lord, in 1585, procured a licence from the Queen, for the sole transporting of cloths into those parts for two years, that Thomas Starkey, Gerard Gore, and other Merchants of London, who were embarked in the first unfortunate adventure, might repair the losses they had sustained (b). In 1586 he was one of the Peers that assisted at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and to whom, as a person for whom she had a particular regard, that unfortunate Princess addressed herself when the Assembly broke up (c). In the last years of his life he endured great pain and misery, from the wound received in his leg, when he defended Newhaven against the French, and this, at last, brought him so low, that, submitting to the opinion of Physicians and Surgeons, he consented to an amputation, which was accordingly performed, but without success, so that he departed this life soon after at Bedford-House, Bloomsbury, February 20th, 1589, when he was about the age of threescore (d). As the long decline of his health gave him timely notice of the approach of death, he made a long and very remarkable will, some few passages of which the reader will find in the notes [D].

This

ligion broke out in France, King Charles IX, being then in his minority. The Guises, who were at the head of the Papists, had the King, and the Queen his mother, in their hands, which induced the Prince of Condé, and the other Chiefs of the Protestants, to desire the protection of Queen Elizabeth, which she accordingly granted. The Earl of Warwick embarked at Portsmouth, October the 17th, 1562, but was obliged by ill weather to put into Dover, from whence he failed again, and was again forced back, so that he did not arrive at Newhaven till the 29th of the same month; he found the place in the hands of Sir Adrian Poyning, who had taken possession of it on the 2d of September. While the Civil-War continued, the English Lord-Lieutenant, gave all the assistance possible to the Protestants, but they having made up their quarrel with the Court, declared against the English, upon which, the Lord-Lieutenant obliged all the French to quit the town (5). It was not long before the place was invested by a numerous army, under the command of the Constable Montmorency, the Protestants being as active against the English as any, that they might recover the favour of the Court. The place was quickly deprived of fresh water, partly through the dryness of the season, and partly by the pains taken by the French to cut off the aqueducts, which obliged the soldiers to boil their victuals in salt water. This produced an epidemick distemper, by which numbers perished. Notwithstanding all this, the Lord-Lieutenant continued to make an obstinate defence, and frequently repulsed the French in their assaults, as is very largely related by our own Historians, and is also clearly admitted by theirs (6). The Queen having intelligence of the state that things were in, expressed with tears her commiseration for her subjects, and that she might no longer expose so many brave men at once to sickness and the sword; she publickly applauded their noble courage, and at the same time directed the Earl of Warwick to capitulate upon honourable terms. He sent accordingly commissioners to treat, and on this occasion, going himself upon the rampart without armour, to speak to a French officer of distinction, he was basely, and against the rules of war, shot with a poisoned bullet in the leg, which proved not only the cause of his losing that limb, but afterwards his life (7). It was not long before the articles of surrender were adjusted, and were in substance these, viz. That the town, with all the ammunition, shipping, and furniture, which belonged to the French King and his subjects, should be surrendered. That the large tower should forthwith be delivered up to Montmorency. That the prisoners taken on both sides should be exchanged without ransom, and that the English should have free liberty to depart in six days, if the wind served, with all things that belonged to the Queen and them. The hostages delivered were, Sir Oliver Manners, the Earl of Rutland's brother; the captains, Leighton, Pelham, and Horsey. The last that stayed, says Camden, was Colonel Edward Randolph, who out of a piety, never enough to be commended, carried upon his shoulders the sick and deceased soldiers into the ships. Thus was Newhaven, after it had stood the siege of a sickness, more violent than the enemies fire, left at last to the French, after the English had been masters of it eleven months. The soldiers that were brought back to England sick of the infection, scatter'd the bad influence thereof so unhappily, that it seized on the whole kingdom in a miserable manner, and there were carried out of the city of London alone, which then consisted of an hundred and twenty-one parishes, twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty corps (8).

This noble person was thrice married, first to Anne, daughter and heir of William Whorwood, Esq; Attorney-General to King Henry VIII, by his first wife Cassandra; daughter to Sir Edward Grey, Knight, which Lady died on the 26th of May 1552, his and her only son John dying before her (e). He married next Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Gilbert Talboys, Knight, sister and sole heiress to George, Lord Talboys (f); and, after her decease, by whom he had no issue, he married Lady Anne Russell, daughter to Francis, Earl of Bedford, by whom also he had no issue (g). Sir William Dethick had the direction of his funeral, which was performed with great solemnity; Henry, Earl of Huntingdon, who had married his sister, was chief mourner, and his corps was attended to the grave by the Earls of Kent, Bedford, Cumberland, and Pembroke, the Lords Dudley and St John, Sir William Russell, Sir Henry Knevet, Sir John Harrington, Sir Fulk Grevil, Sir Drew Drury, and Sir Henry Lea (h). He was interred April 9th, 1590, in the midst of the chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, at Warwick, where a curious altar-monument is erected to his memory, by the pious care of his relict Anne, Countess of Warwick, with his effigies in armour, and mantle of an Earl lying thereon; his head resting on a mattress cut in marble, with his hands conjoined, as in prayer, and, at his feet, a bear couchant muzzled, all painted to the life (i). On this monument there is a large inscription, which, being already inserted in several books (k), it would be needless to transcribe; and, therefore, let us conclude with observing, that he was called by the people, long before and after his decease, THE GOOD EARL OF WARWICK (l).

D U D L E Y (ROBERT), Baron of Denbigh, and Earl of Leicester, son of John, Duke of Northumberland, and brother to Ambrose, Earl of Warwick, before-mentioned. We have no certainty at all as to the time of his birth, or distinct account of the manner of his education, except that he had a competent knowledge of the Latin tongue, and was thoroughly versed in the Italian (a). He received the honour of knighthood when he was but a youth, and came very early into the service and favour of King Edward (b). It was one of his father's maxims to marry his children while they were young, as the surest means of fixing their fortunes, bringing them into a settled course of life, and giving him an opportunity of procuring for them valuable grants, or places of honour and profit. Accordingly June the 4th, 1550, being the day after the marriage of his brother the Lord L'Isle to the Duke of Somerset's daughter, Sir Robert Dudley espoused Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart (c), at Sheen in Surrey, the King honouring their nuptials with his presence [A]. He was, not long after, made Master of the King's

[A] The King honouring their nuptials with his presence. There is not any article in this collection, encumbered with more difficulties than this of Queen Elizabeth's distinguished favourite, the third in descent of the same family, to the third in descent of the same royal house. Edmund Dudley, Esq; was the chief Minister of Henry VII. John, Viscount L'Isle, honoured, living and dying, with the favour of King Henry VIII; and, by the title of Northumberland, ruling all things under Edward VI; and this Robert, Earl of Leicester, from the very entrance of Queen Elizabeth's reign, taking in the space of near thirty years, in as high credit and power as a subject could be; but notwithstanding all this, and that hardly any nobleman's name occurs more frequently in our Histories, yet there are many particulars relating to his life, which are very obscure, chiefly from the different views which those persons had, by whom they were recorded, and these we shall principally endeavour to clear up, as far as the narrow bounds which the nature of such a collection prescribes will allow.

As to this marriage, King Edward enters it thus in his Journal (1). 'June 4, 1550, Sir Robert Dudley, third son to the Earl of Warwick, married Sir John Robsart's daughter, after which marriage, there were certain gentlemen that did strive who should first take away a goose's head, which was hanged alive on two cross posts.' Authors differ as to the name of this lady. Brooke, in his first edition (2), calls her Amy, in which he agrees with some ancient authorities that I have seen; but in his second edition, following the general course of other authors, he styles her Anne (3), and indeed, in old writings it is very difficult to distinguish between Anie and Anne. She was a very considerable heiress, and descended of a noble family in Norfolk,

(d) Pat. 4 Ed. V. King's Buckhounds for life (d), and, on the 15th of August 1551, he was sworn one of the Six Gentlemen of the King's Chamber in Ordinary, together with Mr Barnaby Fitzpatrick (e). In the month of October he was, amongst many other persons of distinction, appointed to wait upon the Queen-Dowager of Scotland, and appears to have had a share in most of the King's diversions, who gave him, upon all occasions, very pregnant marks of his singular affection (f). In the first year of Queen Mary he fell into the same misfortunes with the rest of his family, was brought prisoner from the Queen's camp to London, sent to the Tower, indicted of high-treason, and, upon his pleading guilty (g), received sentence of death, but was pardoned for life, and set at liberty October 18th, 1554 (h). He was restored in blood at the same time, and by the same act of Parliament with his brother (i), but had the advantage of him in one respect, being raised to the important post of Master of the Ordnance by Queen Mary (k), which has been thought to give some credit to the earliest piece of secret history that is to be met with in respect to this great man, if we except what regards King Edward's death (l); though, perhaps, both are without foundation [B]. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth it very soon appeared, that the change of Sovereigns had created no alteration but in the degree of his favour: he was immediately entertained at Court as one of the new Queen's principal favourites, promoted to the office of Master of the Horse, with the fee of one hundred marks per annum (m), and named first in the commission for compounding with such as might be called to receive the honour of knighthood at the Queen's coronation, by the name of Lord Robert Dudley (n). On the 4th of June 1589, he was installed Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, and sworn of the Council (o). These great preferments excited some degree of envy, the rather, because this noble person, in compliance with his Sovereign's humour, and perhaps with his own, lived at a very high rate, and, in point of magnificence, surpassed most of the Nobility, tho' he had not as yet any other title than he derived from courtesy. In 1562 he obtained from the Queen the Castle and Manor of Kenilworth, together with Astell-Grove in Warwickshire, the Lordships, Manors, and Castles of Denbigh and Chirk, of very large value (p). The same year he became High-Steward of the University of Cambridge, and obtained prodigious grants from the Crown, and from others, in virtue of that influence which he was known to have at Court [C].

Norfolk, one of her ancestors by the father's side, having been a peer of the realm in the reign of Henry V, and two of them Knights of the Garter in the reign of that prince, and of his son (4). So, that as we observed in the text, this match at the time it was made, agreed perfectly with his father's maxim, and afforded Sir Robert Dudley a very good establishment for a younger brother, which he improved, by procuring grants to his father-in-law and himself.

[B] Though perhaps both are without foundation. We are told in that famous book, which is ascribed to Persons the Jesuit, that at the very close of K. Edward's reign, the Duke of Northumberland wrote flattering letters to the Lady Mary, promising to assist in establishing her succession (5), which seems not a little incredible. It is not however at all unlikely, that his younger sons, Ambrose and Robert, might express an affection for her cause, and a great unwillingness to act against her, which turned afterwards highly to their advantage; but in this, as in the succeeding reign, the younger brother shewed himself the more expert courtier of the two, attaching himself wholly to King Philip after his marriage; so that we find him made choice of to carry messages between the King and Queen, riding post (6) upon such occasions, and neglecting nothing that might ingratiate him with either of these princes. This assiduity recommended him to the post he obtained under the Queen, and in all probability he had a great share in King Philip's favour, not only then, but long after, which, at the first-accession of Queen Elizabeth, he employed for her service, and was for some years looked upon as a person well affected to his Catholick Majesty, and rather a friend than an enemy to the Popish interest; yet without running any hazards in their defence, and purely by observing great civility towards them, which he afterwards excused out of gratitude for favours formerly received. But when the Papists felt the severity of the laws, and saw this noble person set himself at the head of the Puritans, they made no scruple of affirming loudly, that he was once theirs; that if Queen Mary had lived, he would have neglected nothing to ingratiate himself with her; and that following his father's example, he was ready to embrace, or at least to profess, any Creed that might promote his own progress at Court, and lessen the greatness of those who refused to depend upon him.

intelligent reader will observe, that notwithstanding the revenues of the Crown were far inferior in those days, to what they are now, yet such as had the favour of the prince, knew how to turn it to greater advantage than can be done at this day; as for instance, the Earl of Leicester having obtained a licence for transporting cloths, sold it immediately to some of the Merchant-Adventurers, for the sum of six-thousand two-hundred sixty-six pounds thirteen shillings and four pence (7). He made such a display of his power over the Queen his mistress's mind, that even her best friends, and oldest servants, were glad to court his favour, as appears by a letter in a very humble stile, from Sir William Cecil, afterwards Lord Burleigh, with a present (8). By the reputation of this high influence, he obtained whatever he sought, almost from all hands. As for example, he had a patent of the stewardship of the Bishoprick of Ely, confirmed by the Dean and Chapter of that place, also the office of Chamberlain of the County Palatine of Chester. And these following were after conferred on him, the stewardship of the forest of Snoden; the stewardship of Reading; the stewardship of Abingdon; the stewardship of Harrow on the Hill, from Roger, Lord North. The stewardship of Tewsbury, Cleve, Swell, and Longney, with the fees of eleven pounds per annum, and the Bailiwick, with the fees, of sixty-six shillings and eight pence. The stewardship of Clun. A patent of master of the game and liberties belonging to the Bishoprick of Coventry and Lichfield, with licence to muster his tenants, &c. with a fee of ten pounds per annum. A patent from the Archbishop of York, of the high-stewardship of his possessions, and master of his game, with a fee of ten pounds. The stewardship of the Church of Norwich, with a fee of ten pounds. A grant of a rent-charge of six pounds per annum, from the Bishop of Winchester, for term of his life, out of the manor of Taunton, and other lands in Somersetshire, confirmed by the Dean and Chapter. The stewardship of the lands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a rent charge of ten pounds per annum, granted by the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Canterbury. And a patent in reversion, of the stewardship of the lands of the Bishop of London, with a fee of ten pounds per annum, granted by Edwin, Bishop of London, and a confirmation of the same from the Dean and Chapter. The stewardship of the honour of Tickhall, with the accustomed fee.

All things gave way, at this time, to his ambition, influence, or policy, so that whatever he desired for himself, or his friends, were obtained as soon as demanded. He had a grant of Windsor-Park, in terms as ample as he could desire, or the Queen could give (q). In his attendance on the Queen, when she visited the University of Cambridge, the highest reverence was paid him; he was lodged in Trinity-College, consulted in all things, requests made to the Queen through him, and, August 10th, 1564, he, on his knees, entreated the Queen to speak to the University in Latin, which she accordingly did (r). At Court, however, Thomas, Earl of Suffex shewed himself averse to his counsels, and strongly promoted the overture of a marriage between the Queen and the Archduke Charles of Austria, as much more worthy of such a Princess than any subject of her own, let his qualities be what they would. This was resented by Lord Robert, who insinuated, that foreign alliances were always fatal, that her sister Mary never knew an easy minute after her marriage with King Philip, and that her Majesty ought to consider, she was herself descended of such a marriage as, by those lofty notions, was decried; so that she could not condemn an alliance with the Nobility of England, but she must, at the same time, reflect on her father's choice, and her mother's family (s). These disputes created a kind of civil war in the very palace, both Lords openly avowing their distaste to each other, and keeping their servants armed about their persons, and, whenever they went abroad, as if things were to be decided by the sword. But the Queen taking up the matter, reconciled them, or rather prevented an open rupture (t). But this without any diminution of Lord Robert Dudley's ascendancy, who continued daily to solicit and obtain new grants and offices for himself, and his dependants, which, by degrees, grew so numerous, and made so great a figure, that he was stiled the Heart of the Court by the common people. It was thought necessary to give some colour to these extraordinary marks of royal indulgence, and therefore the Queen thought proper to propose him as a suitor to the Queen of Scots, promising that Princess all the advantages that she could expect or desire, either for herself or her subjects, in case she consented to the match (u). The sincerity of this was suspected at that time, when the deepest Politicians believed, that, if the Queen of Scotland had complied, it would have served only to countenance the preferring him to his Sovereign's bed. But the French faction at the Court of Queen Mary represented to her, that such a step would be highly dishonourable to a Queen-Dowager of France, and a Queen of Scotland in her own right; which induced her to reject the proposal (w), in a manner that some have thought proved as fatal to her as to another Lady, who was supposed to be sacrificed to his ambition of marrying a Queen (x) [D]. Whatever truth there might be in these suggestions, very certain it is, that, on the

[D] To his ambition of marrying a Queen.] The death of this lady, happened Sept. 8. 1560, at a very unlucky juncture for the Earl's reputation, because the world at that time conceived it might be much for his conveniency to be without a wife, this island then holding two Queens, young and without husbands. The manner too of this poor lady's death, which Mr Camden says, was by a fall from a high place (10), was another untoward circumstance, which added to the number of this favourite's enemies, filled the world with the rumour of a lamentable tragedy. The reader will perhaps expect to be gratified with some account of this, and it so falls out, that the industrious John Aubrey, Esq; speaking of Cumnor in Berkshire where this happened, inserts the following relation, which is very circumstantial, and carries in it strong pretences to absolute certainty. At all events it is very curious, and much clearer than any thing else that is to be met with on this subject (11). Robert Dudley, Earl of

Leicester, a very goodly personage, being a great favourite to Queen Elizabeth, it was thought, and commonly reported, that had he been a bachelor or widower, the Queen would have made him her husband; to this end, to free himself of all obstacles, he with fair flattering intreaties, desires his wife to repose herself here, at his servant Anthony Forster's house, who then lived in the manor-house of this place; and also prescribed to Sir Richard Varney (a promoter to this design) at his coming hither, that he should first attempt to poison her, and if that did not take effect, then by any other way whatsoever to dispatch her. This was proved by the report of

Dr Walter Bayley, some time Fellow of New-College; then living in Oxford, and Professor of Physick in that University; who, because he would not consent to take away her life by poison, the Earl endeavoured to displace him. This man reported for certain, that there was a practice in Cumnor, among the conspirators, to have poisoned this innocent lady a little before she was killed, which was attempted after this manner. They seeing her sad and heavy, as one that well knew by her other handling, that her death was not far off, began to persuade her, that her present disease was melancholy and other humours, and would needs counsel her to take some potion, which she absolutely refusing to do, as suspecting the worst; they sent a messenger for Dr Bayley, and intreated him to persuade her to take some little potion by his direction, and they would fetch the same at Oxford, meaning to have added something of their own for her comfort, as the Doctor upon just cause and consideration did suspect, seeing their great importunity, and the small need the lady had of physick, and therefore he peremptorily denied their request, misdoubting, as he afterwards reported, least if they had poisoned her under the name of his potion, he might after have been hanged for a colour of their sin; and the Doctor remained still well assured, that this way taking no effect, she would not long escape their violence, which afterwards happened thus. Sir Richard Varney, who by the Earl's order, remained that day of her death alone with her, with one man only; and Forster, who had that day forcibly sent away all her servants from her to Abingdon fair, about three miles distant from this place; they first stifling her, or else strangling her, afterwards flung her down a pair of stairs and broke her neck, using much violence upon her; but however, tho' it was reported, that she by chance fell down stairs, but still, without hurting her hood that was upon her head; yet the inhabitants will tell you there, that she was conveyed from her usual chamber where she lay to another, where the beds head of the chamber the 28th of September 1564, the Queen created him Baron of Denbigh (y), and the next day Earl of Leicester, with all the ceremony imaginable, which, in the preamble of the patent, is said to be in consideration of his noble blood, great loyalty, eminent valour, distinguished prudence, and other numerous virtues; as also on account of his being lawfully descended from the illustrious and ancient Earls of Warwick (z). He received, before the close of the year, a very considerable addition to his new honours, by being elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford (a). His great influence in the Court of England was not only known at home but abroad, which induced the French King, Charles IX. to send him, as well as the Duke of Norfolk, the Order of St Michael, then the most honourable in France; and both these great Peers were installed with the greatest solemnity possible January 24th, 1565 (b), and a very particular relation of the whole ceremony has been carefully preserved to posterity (c). If we may trust the reports of Camden, and other Historians, he was the principal mover in the affair of the Duke of Norfolk's suit to the Queen of Scots, which proved so fatal to them both (d). The Duke wanted not friends to dissuade him from that dangerous enterprize, or to shew him how much hazard he might run, by exciting the hate of one Queen, thro' his discovering so much affection for the other; but Leicester infused bolder counsels, and made him believe, that Queen Elizabeth should not have power to hinder or resent his marriage if she would (e). But he was fatally deceived, and, as the Lord Burleigh long before hinted to him, the pursuit of that match cost him his head, the Earl of Leicester being one of those Peers that sat in judgment upon him in 1572, and condemned him to death (f). About this time it is supposed, and some writers pretend that it has been legally proved, that the Earl married Douglas, Baroness-Dowager of Sheffield (g); which, however, was carried with such privacy, that it did not come to the Queen's ears, though a great deal of secret history was published, even in those days, concerning the adventures of this unfortunate Lady [E]. One might be tempted to suppose, notwithstanding the confidence with chamber, stood close to a privy postern door, where they in the night came and stifled her in her bed, bruised her head very much, broke her neck, and at length flung her down stairs, thereby believing the world would have thought it a mischance, and so have blinded their villainy. But behold the mercy and justice of God in discovering this lady's murder; for one of the two persons that was a coadjutor in this murder, was afterwards taken for felony in the Marches of Wales, and offering to publish the manner of the aforesaid murder, was privately made away in the prison, by the Earl's appointment; and Sir Richard Verney, the other, dying about the same time in London, cried miserably, and said to a person of note not long before his death, that all the Devils in Hell did tear him in pieces. Forster, likewise after this fact, being a man formerly addicted to hospitality, company, mirth, and musick, was afterwards observed to forsake all this with much melancholy and pensiveness; some say with madness, pined and drooped away. The wife also of Bald Butler, kinsman to the Earl, gave out the whole fact a little before her death, Neither are the following passages to be forgotten, that as soon as she was murdered, they made great haste to bury her before the Coroner had given in his inquest; which the Earl himself condemned, as not done advisedly, and her father, Sir John Robertsett, hearing, came with all speed hither, caused her corps to be taken up, the Coroner to sit upon her, and further enquiry to be made concerning this business to the full; but it was generally thought, that the Earl stopped his mouth; and to make plain to the world, the great love he bare to her while alive, and what a grief the loss of so virtuous a lady was to his tender heart, caused her body to be re-buried in St Mary's church in Oxford, with great pomp and solemnity. It is also remarkable, that Dr Babington, the Earl's chaplain, preaching the funeral sermon, tript once or twice in his speech, by recommending to their memories, that virtuous lady so pitifully murdered, instead of saying, 'pitifully slain.' There are some things in this account not very consistent, which in so dark an affair, is not at all strange, but with respect to the least intelligible passage of all, which is her father's being so silent about a matter which opened the mouths of all the world besides; a very probable account may be given, which is this, the Inquisition taken after the death of this Lady, was to determine who were her heirs, for her father was long before dead, and this was the reason that inquisition produced no other effect, than preserving the family estate, which was very considerable, to John

Walpole, Esq; ancestor to the present Earl of Orford. It may not be amiss to observe, that the Lord Robert Robfart, came over from the Low Countries with King Edward III, and that he left behind him three sons, John, Lewis, and Theodorick; or, as we wrote it in those days, Tyrrey; Lewis, the second brother became Lord Bouchier by his marriage, and was a Knight of the Order of the Garter, but dying in the life-time of his elder brother, he became his heir (12). This Sir John Robfart, was also a Knight of the Garter, and dying in 1450, left his estate to Sir John Robfart his son, who had issue, Sir Theodorick, or Sir Tyrrey Robfart, who married the daughter and heirs of Sir Thomas Syderston, in the County of Norfolk, by whom he had issue, Sir John Robfart, and a daughter Lucy, who married Edward Walpole, Esq; of Houghton (13). Sir John Robfart left behind him an only daughter, Amy, who was the wife of Lord Robert Dudley, and by the Inquisition before mentioned, John Walpole, Esq; in right of his mother Lucy Robfart, aunt to this unfortunate Lady, was found to be her next heir, and came into possession of her lands (14).

[E] Concerning the adventures of this unfortunate Lady.] It may seem a little strange, to insert in the notes to a Statesman's life, the memoirs of several Ladies, and of many of his intrigues; but the misfortune is, that we have no remedy; the learned Camden, and the judicious Sir William Dugdale, have been forced to take the same method, which, as it is a proof of the necessity, so it amounts to a vindication of the practice. This Lady Douglas Howard, was the grand-daughter of Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, the daughter of William Howard, the first Baron of Effingham, and Knight of the Garter, and the widow of John, Lord Sheffield of Butterwick, who died suddenly of an extream rheum in his head, which the malicious people of those times, called a Leicester cold (15). It is beyond all doubt, that the Earl of Leicester had by her a son, Sir Robert Dudley, of whom we shall speak of hereafter, and to whom, by the name of his base son, he left the bulk of his fortune, as also a daughter. It likewise appeared by depositions taken long after in the Star Chamber, upon the oath of Lady Douglas Sheffield herself, and of several other persons, that she having been first contracted in Cannon Row (16), within the liberties of Westminster, about two years before, was solemnly wedded to him at Asher, in the County of Surry, by a lawful Minister, according to the form of matrimony by Law established in the Church of England, in the presence of Sir Edward Horsey, Knt. who gave her in marriage, as also of Robert Sheffield, Esq; Dr Julio, Henry Frodsham, and five other persons, who with which these stories are told, that they must be exaggerated at least, if not false, since the Earl, at this juncture, obtained an act of Parliament to enable him to erect an Hospital at Warwick; which he afterwards did, and plentifully endowed it, that it might bear his name, and preserve his memory as a most religious person, the character which of all others he most affected, to succeeding times (b) [F]. Yet very great doubts have been moved upon this subject, some affirming, that, in the former part of his life, he inclined to favour the Papists, but, at the persuasion of his friend the Lord North, altered his conduct, and became the patron of the Puritans (i). In the thirteenth of Queen Elizabeth he procured, from the Earl of Arundel, an assignment of the Wardenship of New Forest, which had been granted to his ancestors in the sixth of Edward III (k). He is reported to have had much of his father's temper, which appeared in nothing more than the pains he took to adorn his Castle of Kenilworth, and to render it, as his father had done Dudley-Castle, one of the fairest, as well as one of the strongest, places in England, whose names are there specified, and that the ring wherewith they were so married, was set with five pointed diamonds, and a table diamond, which had been given to him by the then Earl of Pembroke's grandfather, upon condition, that he should not bestow it upon any but whom he did make his wife. Likewise, that the Duke of Norfolk was the principal mover of that marriage; but that this Earl, pretending a fear of the Queen's indignation, in case it should come to her knowledge, made her to vow not to reveal it till he gave leave, whereupon all her servants were commanded secrecy therein. And it was also farther deposed, that within two days after the birth of this Sir Robert Dudley, which happened at Sheen, where he was christened by a minister sent from Sir Henry Lea, having to his godfathers, the Earl of Warwick his uncle, and the same Sir Henry, and to his godmother, the Lady Dacres of the South, by their deputies; the said Lady Douglas, received a letter from this Earl, which one Mrs Erifa (then Lady Parker) read, wherein his Lordship did thank God for the birth of this his son, who might be their comfort and staff of their old age, as are the words of the letter, and subscribed your loving husband, Robert Leicester. Likewise, that the said Lady Douglas, was after this served in her chamber as a Countess, until he commanded the contrary, for fear the marriage should be disclosed. Some of the Wits in the Court of Queen Elizabeth, after the Earl's publick marriage with the Countess Dowager of Essex, filed these two Ladies, Leicester's two Testaments, calling Lady Douglas the old, and Lady Lettice the new (17). In order to stifle this affair, however, as much as possible, the Earl made several propositions to Lady Douglas Sheffield, to desist from her pretensions, particularly, as she herself deposed, in the close arbour in the Queen's gardens at Greenwich, where, in the presence of Sir John Hubbard and George Digby, he offered her seven hundred pounds a year, adding at the same time threats, that if she would not comply, he would never come near her, nor should she receive from him one penny of money. Being able to do nothing, either by fair means or foul, he went somewhat farther, so that the poor Lady, to shelter herself from his resentment, was constrained to marry Sir Edward Stafford, a person of high birth, great honour, and the Queen's Ambassador in France (18), which being, as she herself confessed, an act which did the greatest wrong possible to her own pretensions, and to those of her son; she upon her oath declared, that her motive thereto was this, that having had some ill potions given her, which occasioned the loss of her hair and nails, she knew no other way to preserve her life (19). Such is the history of the Lady Douglas, whom some reckon the second wife of this potent Earl.

[F] Which of all others he most affected, to succeeding times.] The statute mentioned in the text, to have been passed in the 13th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, gave power and authority to him, his heirs, executors, and assigns, to establish an Hospital, either in Warwick, or in Kenilworth, to have continuance for ever, with a perpetual succession, and to be ruled, governed, and directed in all things as they should appoint (20). The Earl long after, by deed-poll under his hand and seal, November 1st, 1585, reciting (21), 'That since the said act, he had appointed a house in the town of Warwick, for the said Hospital, and had placed therein one master, viz. Ralph Griffin, Professor of Divinity, and twelve poor brethren, who ever since the making of the said act, had their abode and relief there, at the Earl's charge. Now the said Earl calling to remembrance, that the good and charitable deeds and works of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and others his ancestors, being provided and intended for the relief of the poor within the said town of Warwick, but instituted and ordained according to the error and superstitious ignorance of those former times, are abrogated and taken away. And withal, being continually mindful of the great mercy and goodness of Almighty God, freely bestowed upon him many ways, and especially by the singular bounty and favour of his most gracious sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth. And in respect thereof, by the authority of the said statute, ordains, establishes, and appoints an Hospital in the said town of Warwick, to have continuance for ever; for the finding, sustentation, and relief of poor needy and impotent men, and especially of such as should be hereafter wounded, maimed, or hurt in the wars, in the service of her Majesty, her heirs and successors; and did found and establish the said Hospital, to consist of one master, and twelve poor brethren, to be called the Hospital of Robert, Earl of Leicester, in Warwick. And the said Ralph Griffin, having lately been preferred by her Majesty, at the earnest suit of the said Earl, to the Deanry of Lincoln, in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, he thereupon ordained, that Thomas Cartwright should be, during his life, master of the said Hospital, unless removed, or resigning, and in that case, such persons as the Earl, or his heirs, should appoint, should be master. And did further ordain, that the twelve persons there named, then dwelling and abiding in the said Hospital, should be the then present twelve brethren of the said Hospital. And that upon the death, resignation, deprivation, or other lawful removing of any of them, such person or persons, as by the said Earl, or his heir or heirs after his death, should be named or appointed a brother, or brethren of the said Hospital, should be the brethren of the said Hospital for ever. And if the said Earl, or his heir or heirs, did not from time to time, within three months next after the said twelve brethren, or any of them should die, resign, be deprived, or otherwise lawfully removed from the said Hospital; then such person and persons, as from time to time, upon the default of the said Earl, and his heirs, in form aforesaid, should be appointed, and preferred to be a brother, or brethren, by the Bishop of Worcester for the time being, and the Recorders of Coventry and Warwick for the time being, or any two of them, under hands and seals, should be a brother, and brethren of the said Hospital for ever. And he appointed the said master and brethren, a Body Corporate and Politick, &c. and the lands, tenements, &c. thereof, should be for ever thereafter, ruled, governed, ordered, and directed, according to such rules, statutes, and ordinances, as were thereto annexed, or at any time thereafter should be set forth, made, devised, and established by the said Earl, by writing, or writings under his hand and seal; which writing, containing a complete body of Statutes, the Earl executed on the 26th of the same month. It may not be amiss to observe here, that Thomas Cartwright beforementioned, was the great chieftain of the Puritans, by which, having obtained this preferment for himself, he condescended for some time to leave the Church undisturbed (22).

land, which, if Sir William Dugdale was well informed, was a project that cost him about sixty thousand pounds (l). There, in the month of July 1575, he entertained the Queen his Mistress for ten days, with the greatest elegance as well as magnificence, at a boundless expence (m). Of this, none of the least remarkable transactions of his life, some farther account is given at the bottom of the page [G]. In 1576 happened the death of Walter, Earl of Essex, which, as we have elsewhere shewn, drew upon this noble Peer many suspicions, more especially after his marriage with the Countess of Essex was declared (n); as to which the reader will not be displeas'd to see, in the notes, some particulars that were reserved for this place [H]. In 1578, the Duke of Anjou pressing the match that had been propos'd between him and Queen Elizabeth, and sending over Monsieur Simier, a very gallant Gentleman, attended by a large train of French Nobility, the Earl of Leicester was doubtful whether the marriage might not take effect. The Earl, as it is said by our Historians, had, some time before, founded the Queen's disposition in choosing him for a husband, and not receiving a favourable answer (o), he abandoned all thoughts thereof, and privately married the Countess of Essex, as before related. This marriage Simier discovered to the Queen, apprehending his Lordship to be the greatest bar to the Duke's pretensions; and Camden relates, that she was so enraged thereat, that she commanded him not to stir from the Castle of Greenwich, designing to have committed him to the Tower, but was dissuaded from it by the Earl of Suffex (p): this he repented so far, as it was thought he had some intention to cause him to be murdered; and one day Simier waiting on her Majesty in her barge, not far from Greenwich, a gun was discharged from a neighbouring boat, and one of the Queen's bargemen wounded through both his arms; this was suggested to be intended to dispatch Simier, but, on enquiry, it appeared to have been wholly accidental, and the man, who had been apprehended, was set at liberty (q) [I]. The Duke of Anjou sending an embassy, compos'd

[G] At the bottom of the page. There was a large relation of the Queen's entertainment at this palace, written by George Gascoign, Esq; out of which, Sir William Dugdale tells us (23), that the Queen was surprized at her entrance, with the sight of a floating island on the large pool there, bright blazing with torches, on which were clad in silks, the Lady of the Lake, and two nymphs waiting on her, who made a speech to the Queen in metre, of the antiquity and owners of that castle, which was clos'd with cornets and other musick. Within the base court, was a noble bridge set up of twenty feet wide, and seventy feet long, over which the Queen pass'd; on each side whereof, on posts erected, were presents on them to her by the Gods, viz. a cage of wild fowl, by Sylvanus; divers sorts of fruits, by Pomona; of corn, by Ceres; of wine, by Bacchus; of sea-fish, by Neptune; of all habiliments of war, by Mars; and of musical instruments, by Phœbus. Also, during the several days of her stay, various rare shews and sports were exercised, viz. In the chace, a Savage man with satyrs, bear-baitings, fire-works, Italian tumblers, a country bride-ale, with running at the Quinting, and morrice dancing; and that nothing might be wanting which those parts could afford, the Coventry men came and acted the ancient Play, long since used in that City, called Hock's Tuesday, setting forth the destruction of the Danes in King Ethelred's time, which pleas'd the Queen so much, that she gave them a brace of bucks, and five marks in money, to bear the charges of a feast. Likewise, on the pool, there was a Triton riding on a Mermaid eighteen foot long, as also Arion on a Dolphin, with rare musick. The costs and expences of these entertainments, may be guess'd at by the quantity of beer then drunk, which amounted to three-hundred and twenty hogsheds of the ordinary sort; and for the greater honour thereof, Sir Thomas Cecil, son and heir to the Lord Burghley, Lord Treasurer; Sir Henry Cobham, brother to the Lord Cobham; Sir Thomas Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Tresham, were then knighted, and the next ensuing year, the Earl obtained a grant of the Queen for a weekly market at Kenelworth, on the wednesday, with a fair yearly on Midsummer-day (24). There is also in Strype (25), a long and very circumstantial narrative of all that pass'd at this royal visit, by one who was present, and is very well worth the reading, as it shews the temper of the Queen, and manners of those times.

[H] Some particulars that were reserved for this place. In that famous book of Persons the Jesuit, or whoever else was the author of this favourite's secret history, besides the account quoted in another place, there is a short detail of this iniquitous transaction, which follows an hint of Lord Sheffield's being taken off in the same manner, and for the same reason, that is, because this great man had a mind to his wife. This relation runs thus (26). 'The like good chance had he in the death of my Lord of Essex, as I have said before, and that at a time most fortunate for his purpose; for when he was coming home from Ireland, with intent to revenge himself upon my Lord of Leicester, for begetting his wife with child in his absence (the child was a daughter, and brought up by the Lady Shandois, W. Knolles's wife) my Lord of Leicester hearing thereof, wanted not a friend or two to accompany the Deputy, as among other, a couple of the Earl's own Servants; Crompton, if I miss not his name, yeoman of his bottles; and Lloyd, his Secretary, entertained afterward by my Lord of Leicester, and so he died in the way of an extreme flux, caus'd by an Italian recipe, as all his friends are well assured; the maker whereof was a Surgeon, as is believed, that then was newly come to my Lord from Italy, a cunning man, and sure in operation.' The judicious Mr Camden, in treating expressly upon this subject, leaves it doubtful and open, but glancing occasionally at it elsewhere, he shews plainly his own belief, that this imputation was not false. Sir Robert Naunton goes farther, and having in all probability the very book, we have first cited, in his eye, proceeds thus (27). 'I am not bound to give credit to all vulgar relations, or to the libels of the times, which are commonly forced and falsified, suitable to the moods and humours of men in passion and discontent; but that which leads me to think him no good man, is, amongst others of known truth, that of my Lord of Essex's death in Ireland, and the marriage of his Lady, yet living, which I forbear to press, in regard, that he is long since dead, and others living, whom it may concern.'

[I] Was set at liberty. It may not be amiss, for a reason which will be hereafter given, to exhibit two accounts that are yet extant of this great peer's malice to this French gentleman, which arose, as the writer of his secret history says, from his having had the boldness to tell the Queen of the Earl's marriage, with the widow of Essex, which though celebrated at Wanstead, in the presence of the Earl of Warwick, the Lord North, Sir Francis Knolles, and others; at Mr Stoner's house, by one Dr Culpeper, a clergyman, yet the Queen heard nothing of it in several days. This it was that provok'd Leicester first to attempt taking him off by poison (28). 'And when that failed (says this author) he appointed, that Robin Tider, his man, as after, upon his ale-bench he confessed, should have slain him at the Black-Friars at Greenwich, as posed of some persons of the first distinction in France, into England in 1581, they were received by the Queen with all possible marks of distinction, and the Earl of Leicester was one of the Noblemen appointed to confer with them, and that engaged for their diversion, in justings, barriers, and turney; but the people in general shewing great discontent at the proposed marriage, it induced the Queen to issue her proclamation, under a severe penalty, that none of her subjects should either strike, or draw weapon, within four miles of London, or the Court (r). And the Duke thinking his presence might contribute to his point more than the oratory of his Embassadors, who signified to him the Queen's declining the marriage, he came in person to prefer his suit; but having remained in England the space of three months, and finding his application to be ineffectual, he set out on the sixth of February for Sandwich (s); the Earl of Leicester, with a train of one hundred Gentlemen, and three hundred others of inferior sort, attending him to Antwerp, as did also the Lord Hunsdon, and the Lord Charles Howard, who had each of them one hundred and fifty followers (t). The Confederates of the Low-Countries, believing it might please the Queen, had sent over their agents to the Duke in England, to desire he would be their protector against the Spaniards, and the Queen promising him aid, he accepted of their offer, and, on his arrival at Antwerp, was, with the Earl of Leicester, who accompanied him, entertained with great state and solemnity; and, having seen him invested in the government of the said Provinces, the Earl, on the 19th of February, together with the English Nobility, and their trains, returned to England (u). In 1584 he prevailed on the chief of the Nobility and Gentry in the kingdom to subscribe an association, by which they bound themselves to pursue unto death, whosoever should attempt any thing against Queen Elizabeth; and this, by some authors, is said to be in hatred to the Queen of Scots, and that a plot being formed to set her at liberty, he was for making her privately away (w). His aversion against that unhappy Princess is supposed to have rose from a private view, of conveying the Crown into the family of the Dudleys, as a certain author informs us (x), by advancing the Earl of Huntington to the Throne, who had a claim to the Crown as being descended, in a direct line, from George, Duke of Clarence (y), who had married the sister of the Earl (z), and was ever after closely attached to his interests [K]. As he was now in the very height of power and influence, he went forth at the garden gate; but missing also that purpose, for that he found the gentleman better provided and guarded than he expected; he dealt with certain Flushiners, and other pirates, to sink him at sea, with the English gentlemen his favourers, that accompanied him at his return into France. And though they missed of this practice also (as not daring to set upon him, for fear of some of her Majesty's ships, who to break of this designment, attended by special commandment, to waft him over in safety) yet the aforesaid English gentlemen, were holden four hours in chace at their coming back, as Master Rowley well knoweth, being then present; and two of the chacers, named Clark and Harris, confessed afterward the whole designment. Mr Camden (29), much to the same purpose, 'That in the mean while, Simier continued amorously to solicit Queen Elizabeth in Anjou's behalf. And altho' she excused herself a long time, yet he brought her to that pass, that Leicester, who from his heart was against the marriage, and others, spread rumours abroad, that by love potions, and unlawful arts, he had insinuated into the Queen's affection, and induced her to the love of Anjou. M. Simier on the other side, left no means unessay'd to remove Leicester out of his place and favour with the Queen, revealing to her his marriage with Essex's widow; the Queen thereupon grew into such a passion, that she commanded Leicester not to stir out of the Castle of Greenwich, and intended to have committed him to the Tower of London, which his enemies much desired. But Suffex, though his greatest adversary, and one that earnestly endeavoured to promote the marriage, dissuaded her, as out of a solid judgment, and the innate generosity of his noble mind, he was of opinion, that no man ought to be troubled for his lawful marriage, which hath ever been had in honour and esteem. Yet glad he was, that by this marriage, he was now put beside all hopes of marrying with the Queen. Nevertheless, Leicester was so incensed thereat, that he bent himself to revenge the wrong he had received. And there wanted not some, who accused him, as if he had suborned one Teudor, of the Queen's guard, a bravo, to take away Simier's life. This is certain, the Queen commanded by publick proclamation, that no man should offer any affront to Simier, his attendants, or servants, either by word or deed. About this time it happened, that while the Queen for her pleasure, was rowed in her barge upon the Thames, near Greenwich, attended by Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hatton, her Vice-Chamberlain, a young man discharged a piece out of a boat, and shot one of the bargemen in the Queen's barge, through both his arms. who was presently apprehended and led to the gallows, for a terror to him; but he solemnly protesting, that he did it unwittingly, and thought no harm, was soon discharged. Neither would the Queen believe what some buzzed in her ears, that he was purposely set on to mischief, either her or Simier. So far was she from giving way to any suspicion against her subjects, that she was wont to say, she could believe nothing of her people, which parents would not believe of their children. The reader will plainly discern, that whatever we may think of such things now, they were looked upon, even by wise men, as very credible at the time in which they are said to have happened.

[K] And was ever after closely attached to his interests.] In this note, it is intended to discuss the several suspicions that were entertained of Leicester's views upon the Crown, some of which are thought to have been as early as the close of King Edward's reign, and that the great Duke of Northumberland meant not to deprive, or to depress the two princesses farther, than to bring them to certain matches which he had proposed, and which, having once brought to bear, he would have put down his daughter-in-law, Queen Jane, with the same facility that he set her up (30). This scheme is so fine spun, that one can hardly believe there is so much in it as a thread of truth; and yet his proclaiming Queen Mary at Cambridge, his desiring to confer with the Queen's Counsellors, his compliance with the old religion at his death, the sudden restitution of his family in the next reign, and the early favour of his son Robert in this, in which none of his wives had any share, are circumstances not easily accounted for; indeed so far from it, that Mr Camden has more than once recourse to the stars (31). The first scheme in this reign, was with respect to the Queen of Scots, whose title Leicester openly abetted, and, in conjunction with the Earl of Murray, drove on the marriage between that Queen and the Duke of Norfolk, which he is afterwards said to have betrayed influence, so he stood exposed, as might be naturally expected, to the shafts of envy, and as, except his father, who had the rule in a minority, there never was any subject in England greater than himself, so the attempt made upon his character surpasses any thing that is to be met with in antient or modern story (a). This piece, which is commonly called LEICESTER'S COMMONWEALTH, was published at least, if not written, beyond the seas, but imported hither in great quantities; and from the books having leaves edged with green, and the supposed author's name, it was stiled father Persons's Green Coat (b). The drift of this book was to represent to the people, that the English Constitution was subverted, and a new form imperceptibly introduced, to which no name could be so properly given as that of a Leicestrian Commonwealth; and, in order to render this notion plausible, the Earl of Leicester was not only represented as an Atheist in point of Religion, a secret traitor to the Queen, an oppressor of her people, an inveterate enemy to the Nobility, a compleat monster with regard to ambition, cruelty, and lust; but it was also suggested that, pursuing his father's plan, he had thrown all offices of trust and profit into the hands of his creatures and dependants; so that the Court, the Fortresses, the Navy, the Kingdom of Ireland, the Northern and Welsh Marches, the Isle of Wight, and, in short, every thing was in his power, and the Queen had scarce any thing left her but a titular sovereignty (c). It is no wonder that a libel like this should make a very great noise, or that the Queen and her Ministers should take the alarm as they did; but it is really somewhat surprizing, that her Majesty thought the properest method for removing the impression this bitter performance was sure to make upon the vulgar, should be issuing letters from the Privy-Council, in which all the facts contained therein were declared to be absolutely false, not only to their knowledge who signed them, but also of the Queen herself (d); which however she did, as appears from some of those letters yet extant (e) [L]. His nephew, the learned and ingenious Sir Philip Sidney, undertook to refute to Queen Elizabeth for his own security, that is to say, himself said it by way of excuse; for that he first promoted, then revealed, and at length prosecuted it as a crime, are undeniable facts (32). His enemies gave this turn to the whole, that by these practices, he meant to remove the Duke of Norfolk, the most powerful and popular nobleman in England, out of his own way, and Mary's title out of the way of the Queen. This being effectually done, there followed an Act of Parliament, in 1571, of a very strange nature, of which, as it is almost the only thing the Historian speaks of, as from his own knowledge, Camden (33) shall give an account to the reader. 'The iniquity of these times, and the love which the Parliament of England (now met at Westminster) bare to their prince and country, was the occasion of a law, for preventing the practices of seditious persons; whereby, according to the tenor of former laws, it was provided, that if any man should attempt the death, or personal hurt, of the Queen, or raise war, or excite others to war against her; or if any one should give out, that she is not the lawful Queen of this realm; but that any other can claim a juster title thereto, or should pronounce her to be an Heretick, Schismatick, or Infidel, or should usurp the right and title of the kingdom during her life, or should affirm, that any other has a right to the Crown, or that the laws and statutes cannot limit and determine the right of the Crown, and the succession thereof, every such person should be guilty of high-treason. That if any one during the Queen's life, should, by any book, written or printed, expressly maintain, that any person is, or ought to be the Queen's heir and successor, except the natural issue of her body, or should publish, print, or disperse any books or writings to that effect, he, and his abettors, should for the first offence be imprisoned for a whole year, and forfeit the one-half of his goods. If any should offend a second time, he should incur the penalty of a Premunire, that is, loss of all his goods, and perpetual imprisonment. Some looked upon this as too severe, who thought it would tend to the establishing the quiet of the nation, if an heir apparent were declared. But it is incredible, what jests those that lewdly catch at words, made upon that clause, except the natural issue of her body, since the Lawyers term those children natural, which are begotten out of wedlock, whom nature alone, without the intervention of honest matrimony, hath begotten, and those they call lawful, according to the tenor of the Common-Law of England, who are in lawful matrimony begotten of such a one's body. So that I myself, being then a young man, have often heard people say, that this word

' was inserted in the act by Leicester, with a design, that one time or other he might impose some bastard son of his upon the English, for the Queen's natural ' issue.' We have the same thing confirmed to us by various authors, but whatever view there might be from this act, it was held, that the Earl of Leicester entertained a good opinion of his brother Huntington's pretensions, which produced a very close correspondence between those two Lords, who had not been always upon such friendly terms (34). The nature of this title was very plausible, and could not but found pleasing enough in the ears of the people, more especially, such as were inclined to Puritanism, of whom that Peer was a declared protector. In respect to his pretensions, they were very clear and short; Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon, who had married Lady Katherine Dudley, daughter to John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, was the son of Francis, Earl of Huntingdon, by Katherine his wife, one of the daughters, and heirs of Henry Pole, Lord Montacute, who was son and heir to Sir Richard Pole, Knight of the Garter, by Margaret Plantagenet, Countess of Salisbury, who was the daughter and heiress of George, Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward IV (35). It is said, that this title was commonly discoursed of by such as favoured it, or would be thought to favour it, because the power of the Earl of Leicester was such, that no-body durst complain of their discourses; and, on the other hand, few or none thought it their business to question it, for fear of being drawn within the statute abovementioned, made on purpose to tie peoples tongues upon that subject; in which, upon the whole, it proved of service to the true heir. Some however there were, who insinuated, that the Earl of Leicester meant to set up his brother-in-law, as his father, the Duke of Northumberland, had done his daughter-in-law; that is, till such time as he could make a better title in his own family, by the marriage of his son to the Lady Arabella (36); and it is highly probable, that these crooked schemes of his, after the death of Mary Queen of Scots, induced the Cecils to reconcile themselves to her son; and thus there was a compleat turn made by Queen Elizabeth's Ministers, since, in the beginning of her reign, Leicester was the avowed Champion of the Queen of Scots title, and was very near ruining Lord Keeper Bacon, and Secretary Cecil (37), for being secret favourers of the house of Suffolk.

refute this invective, and actually composed an answer, which is still preserved, but, either from the multiplicity of his affairs, or from other reasons with which we are not acquainted, was never finished, or at least never published (f). Yet, notwithstanding all the pains that were then and afterwards taken to suppress and discredit it; this secret history gained a most unaccountable currency; nor was the mystery of the writing, printing, and publishing, any more than the name of its real author, ever certainly discovered, which, with other concurrent circumstances, has induced a suspicion, that not only the Popish exiles abroad, but some abler heads, who were jealous of Leicester's power and influence at home (g), had a great hand therein, or, at least, furnished the materials [M]. In 1585 the association, contrived by the Earl of Leicester, was approved in Parliament, and a law passed to carry it into execution (b); which, with many other penal statutes, affrighted many of the Nobility; so that Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, and son to the unfortunate Duke of Norfolk, endeavoured to retire out of the kingdom, which brought him into great troubles; the Earl of Northumberland, being sent prisoner to the Tower, destroyed himself with his own hands, and the Lord Paget sought shelter beyond the seas; all of whom pretended to charge their misfortunes on the severities with which they were prosecuted at home (i). At this time the affairs of the Protestant Low-Countries were in a perplexed situation, and the States thought that nothing could contribute so much to their recovery, as prevailing upon Queen Elizabeth to send over some person of great distinction, whom they might set at the head of their concerns, civil and military (k); which proposition, Camden says, so much flattered the ambition of this potent Earl, that he willingly consented to pass the seas upon this occasion, being well assured of the Bishop himself, and the rest of the Justices of Peace in the counties of Lancaster and Chester (38); in which, after taking notice of the industry with which libels were spread, and describing the nature of this infamous one against the Earl of Leicester, one of her Majesty's principal Noblemen, and one of her Chief Counsellors of State, which had moved her Majesty, by letters under her own hand to the Lord-Mayor, Sheriffs, and Aldermen of London, to declare and testify his innocence; they thought it their duty to follow her Majesty's example, which induced them to write this letter to inform them, first, that her Majesty had noted in them some slackness in the prosecution and suppression of former libels, therefore she expected upon this second notice, that they would use greater diligence in searching out and preventing the circulation of this mischievous book; after which they proceed, first in the Queen's name, and then in their own, in the following terms:

' That she (the Queen) verily looketh for the most strict and precise observation thereof, in the sharpest manner that may be devised, testifying in her conscience before God unto you, that her Highness not only knoweth in assured certainty, the books and libels against the said Earl to be most malicious, false, and scandalous, and such as none but an incarnate devil himself could dream to be true, but also thinketh to be of the fulness of malice, subtilie contrived to the note and discredit of her princelie government of this realm, as though her Majesty should have failed in good judgment and discretion in the choice of so principal a Counsellor about her, or be without taste, or care of all justice and conscience, in suffrynge suche heynous and monstrous crimes, as, by the said books and libels, be infamous imputed to pass unpunished, or finally, at the least, to want either good will, ability, or courage, if she knew these enormities were true, to call any subject of her's whatsoever to render sharp account of them, according to the force and effect of her laws. All which defects (God be thanked) we, and all good subjects, to our unspeakable comforts, do know, and have found to be far off from the nature and vertue of her most excellent Majesty. As of the other side, both her Highness, of her certain knowledge, and we, to do his Lordship but right, of our synccare consciences must needs affirm, these strange and abominable crimes to be raised of a wicked and venomous malice against the said Earl, of whose good service, sincerity of religion, and all other faithful dealings towards her Majesty and the realm, we have had long and true experience. Which things considered, and withal knowing it to be an usual trade of traiterous minds, when they would render the Prince's government odious, to detract, and bring out of credit the principal persons about them, her Highness, taking the abuse to be offered to her own

' self, hath commanded us to notify the same unto you, to the end, that, knowing her good pleasure, you may proceed therein as in a matter highly touching her own estate and honour. And therefore we wish and require you, to have regard thereof accordingly, that the former negligence and remissness shewed in the execution of her Majesty's commandment, may be amended by the diligence and severity that shall be hereafter used. Which amendment and carefulness in this cause chiefly, her Majesty assuredly looketh for, and will call for account at all your hands.

[M] Or at least furnished the materials.] We are at a loss for the original title of this book, for it has gone by many; it is very probable however, that it was at first called A Dialogue between a Scholar, a Gentleman, and a Lawyer (39). but in the body of the book the author plainly declaring, that the old English Monarchy was now changed into a Leicestrian Commonwealth, the book was again printed with the title of Leicester's Commonwealth, &c (40). Both these editions were printed beyond the seas, without any name of author or Printer, or so much as the place of the impression, or the year; yet that it was in 1584, is plain enough from the facts mentioned in it (41). Dr Thomas James (42), who was a very learned and knowing man, ascribed it to Robert Persons the Jesuit. Anthony Wood says (43), that it was commonly supposed to be written by him, and adds, in a parenthesis, that he had most of his materials for the composition thereof, from Sir William Cecil Lord Burleigh. Upon what foundation this report stands it is not easy to say, but this is certain, that Persons himself denied that he was the author of it, neither is it reckoned amongst his works either by Pits or Rybadeneira. Yet whoever considers and compares the conference about the succession which Persons published under the name of Doleman, will not easily believe that he was not the author of this book also, though perhaps he might not call it Leicester's Commonwealth, and therefore might think himself at liberty to deny his writing a book under that title. As to Lord Burleigh's furnishing the materials, when we consider the paper signed by him, which the reader has seen in the foregoing note, it must appear very improbable, It may not however be amiss to observe, that it is on all hands agreed, that our having ample powers granted him, and some sort of authority, over the Lord High-Admiral of England (l), which, as it was without example, could not but be highly grateful to one of his high temper, who loved command; more especially over such as might, in other respects, esteem themselves his equals. Accordingly, October 22d, in the same year, he was constituted Captain-General of all such forces as served, or thereafter should serve, in the Low-Countries, for the relief of the inhabitants there: and was empowered to levy in England, or the dominion of Wales, five hundred able and sufficient men, of his tenants and servants, to attend his person beyond the seas; and in his passage thither, and returning from thence, them, and every of them, to employ in his service, as he shall think convenient; which retainers and followers, under his hand and seal signifying the same, were, during the time so employed in his service, to have the Queen's protection for their bodies, lands, and goods; any law, statute, or restraint, to the contrary thereof, in any wise, notwithstanding: With a mandate to all Justices of Peace, Mayors, Sheriffs, &c. and all other officers, to be obedient thereto (m). Before his departure the Queen admonished him to have a special regard to her honour, and to attempt nothing which should be inconsistent with the employment to which he was advanced; and particularly she required him to search into the method of the States raising and falling the value of money, that so the soldiers might not receive their pay at one rate, and give it out at another; and very affectionately recommended to his care the young Noblemen of the country, and more especially the sons of the late Prince of Orange (n). On the eighth of December, 1585, he embarked, having with him fifty sail of ships; and those that accompanied, or soon after followed him, were the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Essex, the Lord Audley, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Sheffield, the Lord North, and the Lord Borroughs, Sir William Russell, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Robert Sidney, Sir Henry Stanley, Sir Gervase Clifton (o), Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir William Pelham, Lord Marshal of the Field, Sir Arthur Basset, Sir Walter Walter, with many other persons of distinction (p). On the 10th he arrived at Flushing, with his whole train, his person being guarded by fifty archers, bearing bows and arrows, fifty halberds, and fifty musqueteers, were magnificently entertained by Sir Philip Sidney, Governor of the town for her Majesty, by Grave Maurice, second son to the late Prince of Orange, by the Queen's Embassador and the States, and all sorts of people, expressed the greatest joy on his arrival (q). This was carried to a very extraordinary height on both sides, great feasts given, and nothing to be seen during the remaining part of that month but mirth and diversions; on the fifteenth of January following all the points of ceremonial were settled, for the establishment of such an administration as might be for the common benefit, and prevent all disputes; accordingly, on the 26th of the same month, the Earl was sworn to the States, and the States to the Queen, and to obey the Earl as her Lieutenant (r). On the sixth of February following they published their placard concerning his authority, which was very ample; his Excellency then entered upon the discharge of his office, and some exploits were performed against the Spaniards, which highly raised the reputation of the English troops, and the characters of the officers who commanded them (s). On the 23d of April, 1586, being at Utrecht, his Lordship kept the feast of St George with prodigious magnificence, in which, as one of our Historians says, he appeared most Prince-like, invested in his robes of the Order, guarded by the principal Burghers in the town, and his own guard of fifty halberdiers, in scarlet cloaks, edged with purple and white velvet (t). It seems the Queen was not at all pleased with these proceedings of the States, or of her Lieutenant, and therefore sent over her Vice-Chamberlain (u), with letters written in so sharp a stile, as made both the States and the Earl very uneasy [N]. Upon explanations from the one, and very deep submissions from the other,

our famous Historian Mr Camden had his materials for the first part of the Annals of Queen Elizabeth, from that noble person, and many are of opinion that he actually wrote them; now, upon examination it will be found, that a great many of the facts in Leicester's Commonwealth are likewise related, though in a softer and less peremptory stile, in those Annals, of which we have given in this work several instances; from whence it may be concluded, that whoever was the author of this book was well supplied with intelligence, and that, notwithstanding the declaration of the Privy Counsellors, it was not universally believed to be a heap of falsehoods, though undoubtedly there are abundance of falsehoods in it, and many things represented as indubitable facts, that are no more than exaggerated suggestions. No pains were spared in circulating it abroad as well as at home, for in the year after it's original publication, it was translated into French under the title of La Vie Abominable, Rusée, Trahisons, Murtres, Impositions, Empoisonnements, Paillardises, Atheïsmes, & autres tres Iniques Conversations, duquel ia use & use Journellement, le my Lord de Lecestre Machiaveliste, contre l'Honneur de Dieu, la Majeste de la Royné d'An-

It has been several times reprinted in English, particularly in 1600 in 8vo, in 1631 in the same size, the running-title in this edition being a letter of State of a Scholar of Cambridge; in 1641 in 4to and in 12mo, with the addition of Leicester's Ghost; and again reprinted in 1706 in 8vo, under the title of secret Memoirs of Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester, with a preface by Dr Drake, who pretended it was printed from an old manuscript. The design of reprinting it in 1641 was to give an ill impression of the government of Charles I, and the like was supposed to be the design of Dr Drake in his publication; to say the truth, it may be considered as a standing libel upon all overgrown Ministers and governments by faction.

[N] As made both the States and the Earl very uneasy.] In order to apprehend this matter clearly, it will be necessary to see, first the power granted by the States, which over and above the powers granted him by the Queen's commission and their own, were expressed to be in their placard of the 6th of February, 1586 (44). 'The highest and supreme commandment and absolute authority above, and in all matters of warfare other, the Queen was pacified, and his Excellency left to prosecute the duties of his charge (w). His expedition for the relief of Grave, a place of great importance, besieged by the Prince of Parma, was, at first, attended with great appearance of success; but, after he had taken the forts that impeded his passage to the place, the Dutch Governor very unexpectedly surrendered, at the persuasion, as was reported, of his mistress; for which, notwithstanding he obtained an honourable capitulation, his Excellency caused him, and two other officers of note, to be put to an ignominious death (x). The English forces continued to render great service, the Lord Lieutenant himself driving the Spaniards out of the whole island of Betawe (y). The Lord Willoughby, at Bergen-op-Zoom, beat a convoy going to Antwerp, which was a thing of great consequence; and Count Maurice, assisted by Sir Philip Sidney, took Axel by surprize (z). His Excellency had to deal with one of the best officers that age, or indeed any other, had produced, the Prince of Parma, who is said to have projected the taking of Utrecht when the Lord Lieutenant was there in person, and, with that view, intended to have sent in a considerable number of men, in various disguises; but it seems his plot was discovered, and disappointed (a). The Prince of Parma then invested Reinberch, in which there was a garrison of twelve hundred English troops, under the command of Colonel Morgan; his Excellency thought himself obliged to disengage that place, and yet was unwilling to hazard a battle, and therefore besieged Zutphen, which had the desired effect, for the Duke of Parma marched immediately to engage the allied army; accordingly, on the 22d of September, the vanguards came to action, in which the English distinguished themselves, though with some loss; and there it was that the famous Sir Philip Sidney received a mortal wound (b). The Spaniards, however, had been certainly beaten, if the Duke of Parma, with his whole army, had not advanced to their assistance. The siege of Zutphen was notwithstanding continued, and some very brave actions performed before it; but, however, they were not able to reduce the place (c) [O]. Upon his Excellency's return to the Hague he found the States uneasy and discontented; warfare both by sea and land, to execute and administer the same to the resistance of the enemy, even as his Excellency should think most commodious to the preservation of those countries, and so further, to do all such things as appertain to the office of a general Captain. And furthermore, we commit the administration and use of policy and justice over the aforesaid united Provinces and associated cities, and members of the same, into his hands, to execute and administer the same, with such power and authority as have had in times past, all the other Governors of these Low-Countries before him, and especially, as have been exercised, and lawfully administered in the time of Charles the fifth, &c. We therefore command all Governors of Provinces and Cities, all Admirals, Vice-Admirals, all Officers and Soldiers by sea and land; and furthermore, all other Counsellors, Officers, Treasurers, Receivers, Bailiffs, Burgomasters, Magistrates, &c. of what quality or condition soever, to honour, respect, and obey him, as they ought to do, &c. In the Queen's letter, among other expressions, were these. 'How contemptuously you have carried yourself towards us, you shall understand by this messenger, whom we send to you for that purpose. We little thought, that one, whom we had raised out of the dust, and prosecuted with such singular favour above all others; would, with so great contempt, have slighted and broken our commands, in a matter of so great consequence, and so highly concerning us and our honour. Whereof, though you have but small regard, contrary to what you ought by your allegiance, yet think not that we are so careless of repairing it, that we can bury so great an injury in silence and oblivion. We therefore command you, that, all excuse set apart, you do forthwith, upon your allegiance which you owe unto us, whatsoever Heneage our Vice-Chamberlain shall make known to you in our name, upon pain of further peril.' She also wrote to the States-General. 'That to her disgrace, and without her knowledge, they had conferred the absolute government of the confederate Provinces upon Leicester her subject, though she had absolutely refused it herself, &c. she therefore advised them to turn Leicester out of that absolute authority, whose commission she had limited, not that she thought their cause unworthy to be favoured, but to provide for, and secure her own honour, which she esteemed more dear to her than life itself.' Bentivoglio (45), intimates as though this step must have been before secretly made known to the Queen, or the Earl of Leicester would not have accepted the Government, without her private consent. And Strada (46), more openly charges her Majesty with an ambitious view of seeking to add the Low-Countries to her dominions, by permitting Leicester to take upon him the sovereignty. But this is improbable. The Provinces had been twice offered her by a solemn embassy from the States, her Parliament had solicited the acceptance, and promised her supplies to support it, and the universal inclination to submit to her, in conjunction with the forces she had ready to send over, must have rendered all oppositions impracticable. It has been observed, that Strada was an Italian Jesuit in the pay of Spain, and consequently the English could expect no fair representation from him, who hated them as heretics and as enemies. Yet he says, the Earl of Leicester was such an absolute master of his own temper, that he could as he pleased adapt it to any man's humours or designs. Agreeable to this, Mezeray calls him a subtle, dextrous courtier; and what other Historians cite, argues him to be a man of great abilities, though the general hatred and envy of many people suppressed his real virtues, or imputed them to artifice and design.

[O] They were not able to reduce the place.] While the Earl of Leicester continued the siege, viz. on the 4th of October, the great fort demanded a parley, which being granted, Count Hollock, or as we now write Hohenloe, stepped out to confer with them (47), but in the midst of the conference, as the Count was speaking, he was shot through the mouth, and the ball took off the jewel at his Ear. To revenge this treachery, the English repeated their attacks, and the same day made an assault on the lesser fort sword in hand. Captain Edward Stanley, was the first who mounted the breach, and perhaps truer courage was never shewn (48). He was opposed by the Captain of the fort, who standing alone in the breach, aimed his pike at his breast as he was entering. On which, with great presence of mind, laying hold of the pike, he strove with all his force to pluck him from his post, if he refused to let go his hold. But finding his strength insufficient to effect his purpose, he suffered himself to be raised up by his competitor on the rampart, and his soldiers following, so terrified the garrison with his unexpected presence, that deserting the defence, as many as were able, made their escape by a back gate, and fled to Zutphen, leaving their Captain prisoner. The Earl of Leicester knighted Stanley for his courage, presented him with forty pounds sterling, and settled a pension on him for life. He likewise knighted Captain Reade, who also shewed great bravery on that occasion. And the enemy, much terrified, abandoned the great fort the next night. But the Earl judged it not convenient discontented; they received him coldly, and, as their own writers say, with expostulations and complaints. He endeavoured to satisfy them, and, for that purpose, entered into a long detail of what had been effected, and of the causes why more was not effected, which, however, did not answer his purpose; he then attempted to dissolve the Assembly, failing in that too, he declared in anger his resolution of returning to England (d). However, being afterwards brought into a better temper, he gave them to understand, that though he still persisted in his resolution of returning home, it should be so far from being prejudicial to them, that he would make it turn to their advantage (e). Whatever exterior marks of satisfaction this might produce, it is very certain that the States retained their displeasure, which proceeded from the suspicions, that notwithstanding the oath of fidelity he had taken, he practised upon the minds of the people, and laboured to possess them with an opinion, that he was better affected to the Protestant religion and the publick good than themselves (f), the consequences of which they clearly foresaw, and very much feared [P]. His subsequent behaviour did not lessen their apprehensions, for when the day came for his departure, he, by a publick act, gave up the care of the Provinces into the hands of the Council of State, but privately, by an act of restriction of the same date, he reserved to himself an authority over all Governors of provinces, cities, and forts, and not contented with that, deprived the Council of State, and those who had the chief direction in the Provinces, of their accustomed jurisdiction (g). He experienced in his passage all the difficulties of the season and the country, being obliged to embark and land several times, and to make use part of the way of a waggon. He arrived at the Court at Richmond on the 23d of November (h), where, notwithstanding all that was past, he was very well received by the Queen. Her Majesty was at that juncture more uneasy than ever about the Queen of Scots, apprehending herself to be in great danger from the practices set on foot for obtaining the liberty of that Princess, whom she had now taken a resolution to remove, and was therefore glad of the Earl of Leicester's presence, in whom she had ever a great confidence (i). When the matter came to be debated in Council, which was before his return, he was consulted by letter; and it is said that the Earl venient for his army to continue any longer before Zutphen, till the rigour of the season should be abated, it being sufficiently blocked up by the garrisons which lay in the towns round about it. Many persons of eminent rank amongst the English nation having highly distinguished themselves, the Earl of Leicester (49), in reward of their merit and for his own honour, conferred in his camp, the dignity of a Knight Banneret on the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Audley, and the Lord North; and knighted Sir Henry Goodyere, Captain of the Guard, Sir Henry Norris, Sir John Borroughs, Sir John Winkfield, Sir Roger Williams, Sir Robert Sidney, Sir Philip Butler, Sir Henry North, Sir Thomas Denis, Sir William Knolles, Sir George Farmer, Sir George Digby, Sir — Steward, and Sir — Beauford. On the 15th of October, his Excellency, after securing of Deventer, came to Arnheim to visit his nephew Sir Philip Sidney, whom he found past all hopes of recovery, dying two days after to his infinite regret, and was bewailed by him with great sorrow, shutting himself up for a whole day, as Stowe relates, who is very circumstantial in whatever regards this noble person.

[P] And very much feared.] But notwithstanding these outward professions of regard, they were jealous of him (50), and privately proceeded to straiten his authority. And in other letters to the Queen, would have inserted a clause to limit his command on his return to them, had not the Lord Buckhurst interposed, and laid before them the mischief it would have produced from his Lordship's power with her Majesty. These proceedings were not agreeable to the majority of the people, who were firm in the interest of the Earl of Leicester, and threatened to be revenged of the States, if the Queen should take any offence at their alterations (51). In Friesland, the Clergy offered her Majesty the sovereignty of the Low-Countries without any restriction, having held two Synods on the occasion. The Synod at Sneek presented a petition to the Lord Buckhurst, in which they invited her Majesty to come to the assistance of Christ, who threw himself and his children into her arms, and implored her protection (52), and several other towns protested they would depend only on her Majesty; also the preachers at Amsterdam, openly inveighed against the magistrates from their pulpits, and libels were set up against the States. But as the people seemed determined to take up arms, the Lord Buckhurst signified to them from her Majesty, That it was her inclination to send back the Earl of Leicester, to compose their differences, by re-assuming the Government. And this expectation of his Lordship's presence, gave a check to their violence, and put a further stop to the proceedings of the States, who had begun to introduce a new scheme of government. Prince Maurice was brought to profess all good will and amity to his Lordship, and Count Hollock promised to receive him with all honour and friendship; also the States-General, and Council of State, both publickly and privately assured the Lord Buckhurst, of all duty and fidelity to him. But before the Queen was prevailed on to give consent to his Lordship's return, she required Lord Buckhurst, by letter, to let the States know, she expected they should send an army into the field, on his arrival, of ten or twelve thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and give assurances, that one hundred thousand pounds, arising from the extraordinary contributions, should be delivered at such reasonable times, as might serve to defray the charges of the said army, into the hands of some person of the country, who should be nominated by the Earl of Leicester, to be treasurer of the army, and to be issued out by his Lordship's direction, with the privity of the Council of State. But this not being agreeable, the Lord Buckhurst acquainted the Queen with their sentiments; and that on their non-compliance he had declared to them, he had no commission to promise his Lordship's return. On this, they resolved to provide for their own security, and accordingly established new superintendants on their frontiers, which was opposed by Lord Buckhurst, as contrary to the twenty-fourth article of their contract, by which the nomination of them was reserved to her Majesty's Lieutenant, yet his opposition produced no effect. However, as their perils increased continually on them, there seemed no other means left to prevent their entire ruin, but the settlement of a present Government, attended with a proportionable supply of men and money. The Lord Buckhurst, out of a true sense of those difficulties which the States laboured under, and the uncertainty of his Lordship's return, drew up a new scheme for the establishing such a government in the United Provinces; which very highly offended the Earl of Leicester, and seems to be the principal motive of the aversion and hatred he ever after expressed towards him (53).

Earl gave it as his opinion, that it would be the safest and best expedient to make use of poison, which was vigorously opposed by Secretary Walsingham, to whom, though a Court Divine was sent to settle his conscience as to the lawfulness of this method, he remained fixed in his sentiment, that it ought to be done by form of Law (k). Accordingly a commission was drawn, grounded upon the late Act of Parliament, in which all the Members of the Privy-Council were appointed to be her Judges, and, amongst others, the Earl of Leicester; but being abroad, he neither assisted at the trial, nor at the judgment given in the Star-Chamber, neither was he present in Parliament; yet sufficient care was taken to make all the world sensible that he approved these measures, by printing the applications to the Queen from both Houses, in a letter directed to him, and in this very form, together with that letter, they are still to be found in one of our old Chronicles (l). It is no wonder, therefore, that, laying aside all thoughts of what had distasteful her in his misconduct in the Low-Countries, the Queen was wonderfully pleased to have him near her again upon such an occasion, more especially as the same point upon which he had been consulted before, came again upon the carpet; for the trial had done little for the Queen's satisfaction if execution did not follow, and how that might be done with least discredit to Queen Elizabeth, remained a point difficult to decide. The Earl of Leicester kept to his first notion, and proposed making her away privately; another scheme was offered, as little honourable though more extravagant, which was, to send her back to Scotland and have her put to death upon the frontiers of both countries. The majority of the Council approved neither, but inclined rather to prosecute the legal method in the end as well as at the beginning (m). The Queen seems to have concurred with the Earl of Leicester, as appears from the letters written to Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury, which not taking effect, the other way was at last resolved on, and Davison, by a very artful piece of management, bore all the blame (n). About this time he was constituted Lord Chief-Justice in Eyre of all the forests south of Trent (o), and, as appears from several letters in the Cabala, was highly favoured by Queen Elizabeth [Q]. During his absence from the Low-Countries the Spaniards had bribed York and Stanley, two Englishmen whom the Earl had appointed, the first Governor of a fort near Zutphen, and the other of Deventer, to deliver those places into their hands, which, by the treachery of York, so wrought on Stanley as he complied, and the loss thereof gave occasion to loud exclamations and complaints against the Earl of Leicester (q). Whereupon the States-General immediately assembling, agreed to invest Prince Maurice (r) with the full power and authority of Stadtholder and Captain-General of Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, and to give him command over all the militia within the said Provinces. And pursuant to this determination, they obliged all their officers to receive a new commission from him, and to take a new oath to the States, and discharged all recusants whatsoever from the service. Queen Elizabeth was displeased with these alterations in their government, and resented the diminution of the Earl of Leicester's authority as an injury offered to herself, and thereupon immediately directed the Lord Buckhurst, her kinsman, to enquire into, and complain of, the innovations introduced in the absence of the Earl, and to settle all differences between them; and the States, in return, assured her Majesty, that their late proceedings were but provisional, and enforced through fear of a general revolt on the loss of Deventer; but that, at his Lordship's arrival, they would readily acknowledge both him and his authority, in as ample a manner as it had been granted to him at the first (s). Also in their letter to the Queen, March 1, they represented to her, that they were infinitely sorry her Majesty should entertain any sinister conceit of their actions and proceedings, which they attributed to the practice of their enemies, and concluded with desiring the Earl might return to his government, which they alledged was highly necessary to their safety [R].

The

[Q] Was highly favoured by Queen Elizabeth.] It might have been expected, that, after the indignation expressed against him by his Sovereign, for exceeding his authority in the Low-Countries, could have little hopes of obtaining new marks of favour, considering more especially how many places of honour and profit he held already. Yet the Earl was so compleat a Courtier, that he knew how to turn this disagreeable accident in a little time to his service. His conduct in the affair of the Queen of Scots, was very acceptable to the temper of Queen Elizabeth; his intelligence from Spain, which he never wanted, and was never trusted either to the eye or ear of a Secretary of State, gratified her Majesty highly, who knew by experience that it deserved entire credit; but what proved of the highest service of all, was his opening her Majesty's eyes in relation to the double-dealing of the Duke of Parma, who, while engaged in a treaty with England, was taking all the necessary measures to invade it. By these steps he regained the Queen's confidence entirely, and then it was suggested, that as he had been so unfortunate to incur her displeasure, of which he had received very public marks, as well by letters, as by the message with which Vice-Chamberlain Heneage had been entrusted, it was necessary, for the satisfaction of the world in general, and of the States of Holland in particular, that this should be cancelled by some extraordinary act of grace, by which it might be known both at home and abroad, that he was cleared from all imputations, and stood on as good terms with the Queen his Mistress as ever. This affords us a pregnant instance of his art and address, and many other like instances might be given, sufficient to shew, that whenever he met with cloudy weather at Court, he could never be brought to believe that it was fair again, unless he felt the warmth as well as splendor of sunshine; and thus every return to favour cost her Majesty a fine for her anger, and brought him an ample reward for the humility of his submissions (54).

[R] Was highly necessary to their safety.] While the negotiations mentioned in the text were carrying on between the Queen's Minister and the States, the creatures of the Lord Lieutenant in the Low-Countries were far enough from being inactive; on the contrary, they were so busy, and took such exceptions to every thing that was done by the States in the Earl's absence, that at last they intimidated them to such a degree, as to be almost afraid of acting at all, and even to wish

(54) Leicester Commonwealth

The Queen yielded to this, but with some difficulty, so that his Lordship did not go back to his charge, as was desired and expected, in the beginning of the spring, which his friends in Holland gave out afforded great advantage to the enemy. The Duke of Parma began the campaign with the siege of Sluys, the most considerable town in Flanders, except Ostend, that remained in possession of the States. He first attacked the fort of Blanchenberg, commodious for the conveying succours to the besieged by land, which made little resistance, as his coming thither was unexpected, and no provision made to oppose him (t). His next step was to raise a fort in the island of Casante to cut off all relief by sea. But before he could execute his design, Sir Roger Williams, with five companies from Bruges, entered the town, and supplied it with provisions and ammunition to hold out a considerable time against him. Whilst this town was besieged, the Earl of Leicester, on the 18th of June, was made Lord Steward of the Queen's Household (u), and setting sail from England on the 25th of the same month, landed in Zealand about the latter end of it. He brought with him a considerable supply both of horse and foot. Prince Maurice and the Deputies of the States attended on him at Flushing, to congratulate his return, and left Count Hollock to watch the motions of the enemy. When they had conferred on raising the siege, it was determined to attempt it by sea, to which end they shipped five thousand foot and six hundred horse, with all necessary provisions for the relief of the town, and on the fleet's appearing in the channel, the Earl of Leicester made signals to the besieged that he was come to their assistance (w). But on examination, finding the channel blocked up, and the passage secured, he saw it would be in vain to proceed that way. For three days he continued in suspense what step to take, and then weighing anchor he bent his course towards Ostend, with a resolution to succour the besieged by land. The Earl of Leicester had no sooner landed his forces, but he prepared to attack the fort of Blanchenberg, and, joining the whole garrison of Ostend to his army, marched directly against it. The loss was of no less consequence to the Duke of Parma, than the gaining it would have been advantageous to the Earl, and therefore the Duke, leaving the siege every where well provided, led the remainder of his army to the defence of the fort against his Lordship (x). The English were ready to begin their batteries when the Duke of Parma came up, but on sight of the army they deferred their hostilities, and after some consultation retired to Ostend, from whence they returned with the same fleet where they had before been at anchor, not far from Sluys, and the Duke of Parma again presented himself to their view, whereby they found themselves under a necessity to retire once again, and never more attempted to raise the siege. The loss of Sluys renewed the misunderstanding between the Earl of Leicester and the States, whilst the blame of the action was thrown by each party on the mismanagement of the other. The Earl complained of the State's negligence, in not making sufficient preparations, and not restraining the first attempts of the Spaniards against the town. And the States, in return, virulently inveighed against his Lordship, and imputed the whole misfortune to his ill conduct, and the delay of the English forces. And this dissatisfaction increasing, they refused to establish him in that absolute authority which had been conferred on him at his first arrival. This diminution of his power was so highly resented by him, that he openly expressed his displeasure against the States, and the Dutch writers charge him with having entered into indirect practices to regain it, by forming parties in his progress through the country, and conversing chiefly with the Ministers and private persons (y), so that they, and the common people, were so transported with his appearances of piety, and his zeal for their interests, as to approve of all he did, and loudly exclaimed against the proceedings of the States [S]. The Queen, however, being well apprized by her Ministers at home sincerely for the return of the Lord Lieutenant, that some degree of weight might be restored to the government. In these practices the Earl's most indefatigable agents were the Clergy, and how very able he was to manage a set of men, who, of all others, delight themselves most in managing the minds of the multitude, will appear from the following letter, which certainly is a master-piece in it's kind, though both in the matter and the stile, it differs not much from many of this noble person's epistles (55).

GENTLEMEN,

THAT I did not return such an answer to several of your letters as you desired and expected, was not for want of good will towards serving the cause of God, and defending the poor people, but it was because I had not yet received her Majesty's resolutions, about what was farther necessary to be done for the service of your country. But the Queen having given me full directions with regard to the forces she will send to your assistance, and having laid her commands upon me to return, I therefore, postponing all private views and considerations, and abandoning all those advantages which

God has bestowed on me in this kingdom, intend to hasten over, and satisfy the desires of a people who have so often called for me, to which the zeal and good inclinations of some have more induced me than the demerits of others, that suffer themselves to be made tools for keeping me back by slanders and detractions, which I shall nevertheless enter into my book of oblivion, that no harm may befall those who seek to do me such disservices. And I hope I shall never give the people any cause to diminish their good will and affection for me. In the mean time I intreat you to go on in your duty, and to admonish and excite those under your care to peace and unity, to the end that they may more and more deserve all the benefits they receive. For the rest I refer myself to my arrival, and so I recommend you, Gentlemen, to the protection of the Almighty.

home of the situation of affairs in the Low-Countries, thought proper to re-call him by an instrument dated November 9, 1587, and at the same time appointed Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby, Captain-General of her forces (z). Camden relates, that the Earl of Leicester, on his return, finding an accusation was preparing against him by the Lord Buckhurst and some other of his enemies, for his misconduct in the management of affairs in the Low-Countries, and that he was summoned to appear before the Council, privately implored the Queen's protection, and earnestly besought her, 'Not to receive him with disgrace upon his return, whom, at his first departure, she had sent out with honour; nor bring down alive to the grave, whom her former goodness had raised from the dust (a).' And that the Queen was so pacified with his expressions of humility and sorrow, as to pass by the displeasure she had conceived against him, and to admit him into her former grace and affection. The day when it was expected he should have given in his answer, he took his place at the Council table, and when the Secretary had begun to read his accusation, he rose up and interrupted him, complaining of being injured, and declaring that his publick commission was limited by private instructions, and making his appeal to the Queen, he evaded the accusation, and came off in triumph; and by his power with her Majesty, he so far prevailed, that a censure was passed upon the Lord Buckhurst, who was confined thereupon to his house for several months. It is very certain, that how much soever this noble person's employment in the Low-Countries might gratify his ambition, or perhaps his vanity, it was very far from turning in any other manner to his advantage; since, at his last going over, he took up very large sums of money at high interest upon his barony of Denbigh (b), which, after his return, he found it impossible to discharge, upon which the Merchants who had lent the money, most of whom had borrowed it upon their own private credit in order to supply him at that juncture, finding themselves very much distressed by this disappointment, applied for redress to the Lord Treasurer as well as to the Lord Chancellor, but it does not appear that any thing was or could be done for their relief. Whether it was in regard to this affair, or some other relating to the transactions in the Low-Countries, certain it is, that the Earl had frequent differences with the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, which at length rose so high, that his Lordship told the Earl plainly at Council, that he found his Lordship very much inclined to cross him upon all occasions, and more especially before the Queen; and that he liked it so ill, that he could and would find ways to anger him as well; adding some other speeches, which the Lord Treasurer took as a charge against him for acting to the Queen's prejudice, upon which, the very same night, he resolved to expostulate the matter freely with the Earl by letter, which he sent him the next day, and received an answer in the evening (c). This as it serves to shew the temper of this noble Peer much better than any of the accounts we have of him extant, and as the reader may possibly think it a better vindication than any that

Countries, the Earl of Leicester left the free administration of publick affairs to the States, without making use of any such precaution as he had taken when he was there before; notwithstanding which we are positively told, and therefore it must rest upon the Historian's (56) credit who says it, that he had it in his head to usurp the government, and to send the Prince of Orange and the Pensionary Barnevelt, prisoners into England; so that he reckons it amongst the many wonderful escapes of the inhabitants of these provinces, from the open tyranny of Philip II, and from the fox-like subtleties of William, Prince of Orange, that they were not subdued by the all-grasping ambition of our potent Earl of Leicester. It is indeed certain, that before he quitted that Government, the Earl distributed amongst his particular friends, some gold medals, of which there are yet to be found in the cabinets of the curious; on the face (57), the Earl's effigies in bust armed, with this inscription, ROBERTUS DUDLEUS. COM. LEYC. BELG. GUBER, i. e. Robert Earl of Leicester, Governor of the Low-Countries; on the reverse, a Shepherd's dog looking back upon the flock, from which he is going; and in the exurgue, under the dog's legs, INVITUS DESERO, i. e. unwillingly I abandon; about the circle, NON GREGEM SED INGRATOS, i. e. not the flock, but the ungrateful. These insinuations had such an effect upon the minds of the people, that the whole nation was in confusion, some Dutch garrisons affecting to adhere to the English; and on the other hand, Sir William Russell taking such steps, as gave no small jealousy to the State, which was augmented (58), by the coming of the Lord High-Admiral of England upon their coasts, just at that juncture. These jealous suspicions, at last rose so high, that the Dutch well affected to their own government, according to the genius of that people, to which the Earl of Leicester conformed in his medals, struck others, upon which were the old allusion of the two pots swimming at sea, with this inscription, si collidimur, frangimur; i. e. if we clash we are undone. The Lord Admiral did all he could to settle the minds of the States, and of their subjects; which, however, was not effected till the Queen sent her orders to the Lord Willoughby, to reduce by force, if that should be necessary, such places as refused to yield obedience to the States, which convinced them, that they had at least done her Majesty wrong, whatever foundation there might be for questioning the upright meaning of the Earl of Leicester, who in this command, says the Historian, was the first Englishman that bore the swelling title of Excellency; and therefore, many at home were very well pleased to see him forced to lay it down with so little honour (59). The nature of the subject, a just regard for truth, and a sincere desire the reader should want no lights that is in our power to give, oblige us to observe, that the Earl of Leicester's medal, is far from being any conclusive evidence of his bad intentions, since the words, fairly construed, mean no more than that he left with reluctance, those whom he had considered in the light of a flock committed to his charge; and this, notwithstanding some of them had repaid with ingratitude, all the care he had taken. We must also remark, that those who disliked the Earl in England, concurred with his enemies in Holland, to give a sanction to all their jealousies and surmises, which, whatever effects they might have in those times, cannot pass for unsuspected testimonies in these. The Earl of Leicester had his faults, and those very great faults too, but other ministers might not be without them, or even without a propensity of magnifying those of the Earl of Leicester, in order to prejudice him with their sovereign, in whose confidence, while he had so large a share, it was impossible that he should escape envy, or that such as envied him, should (contrary to the nature of that passion) always speak truth.

than have been offered of his proceedings, we have placed it at the bottom of the page [T]. It has before been observed, that the Duke of Parma, who was a great Politician as well as a great Captain, set on foot a negotiation with the English Court, as if it had been in his power to have concluded an absolute peace; upon which, the Earl of Derby, and some other persons of credit and distinction, and amongst the rest Sir James Crofts, Comptroller of the Queen's Household, were sent over with the title of Commissioners to negotiate with them, in the month of April 1588 (d). A great deal of time was spent to very little purpose, and notwithstanding the Duke of Parma was earnestly solicited, he could never be prevailed on to produce the commission by which his Catholick Majesty impowered him to treat and conclude, because in reality, he had no such commission to produce. Sir James Crofts, who was a plain man, and heartily desirous that a peace between England and Spain should take effect, made a journey to Brussels, without having any authority to do, in order to confer with the Duke (e); in which, though the rest of the Commissioners allowed that he was too forward, yet they cleared him from any ill intention, as well as from doing any thing that was amiss; yet, upon their being recalled in the month of August following, Sir James Crofts was accused by the Earl of Leicester, for his unadvised journey to Brussels, and by an order of the Privy-Council, committed to prison (f). The whole nation was by this time alarmed with the apprehensions of the Spanish Armada, and amongst other precautions that were taken, an army was assembled at Tilbury, consisting of between sixteen and seventeen thousand men, of which the Earl of Leicester was made Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Essex commanded the horse (g). Queen Elizabeth, that she might encourage her subjects by her presence, went to review that army in person; and upon that occasion, made a short and memorable speech, which as it contains a character of this nobleman, given by his Sovereign to her people, it is requisite to insert (h). ' I myself, said she, will be your General, Judge, and Rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already, for your forwardness, you have deserved rewards and crowns; and we do assure you, on the word of a Prince, they shall be duly paid you. In the mean time, my Lieutenant-General shall be in my stead, than whom, never Prince commanded a more noble, or worthy subject, not doubting, but by your obedience to my General, by your concord in the camp, and your valour

[T] At the bottom of the page.] We have the circumstances mentioned in the text, from Mr Strype, who had taken notice of a former difference between these noblemen, and preserved two excellent letters occasioned thereby (60), but much too long to be inserted here. As for the letter written by the Lord-Treasurer, upon this last quarrel, that gentleman does not give us so much as a line of it, though he has preserved the Earl of Leicester's answer entire, and a very extraordinary paper it is (61).

My Lord,

I Know not from whence my hap hath it, but it hath fallen out sundry times, both contrary to my expectations, and much less by any desert of mine, that I have found your Lordship more ready to thwart and cross my endeavours than any other man's, especially in the presence of her Majesty, and for such cause as I have been the more earnest in, when by your Lordship's own allowance and opinion, it had been so resolved on by our conference before, as fit and meet advices to be given her Majesty, for the best furtherances of her own services. And these causes have lately been most in question; in which, I myself, by her appointment, have been furthest employed, viz. about assistance of the Low-Countries. And therefore, did both at your Lordship's hands, and other my Lords, hope to be assisted and comforted, so far as my opinion should tend to the service of her Majesty, and to matters, being before, by your Lordship and others, debated, and agreed upon. Wherefore, finding it to fall out otherwise, and to draw difference in argument, where there was good assent before; what was it? but to leave me in her Majesty's opinion, to be a man either affectionate or opinionative in mine own conceits; and withall, to see her Majesty's service hindred, and to take lack through such needless and unprofitable controversies among Counsellors. Albeit, I know and grant among Counsellors, there may, and must rise, by way of argument, divisions in opinion, which is both lawful and very convenient, and oft doth, without any causes of dislike at all. And God forbid there should be. But, my Lord, in these causes, we have been two or three times before her Majesty, we had debated the matter before. And the course I took, was no other than your Lordship did best like and most advise. And to fall into contrary opinions before her Majesty, caused me both to take it ill, and to shew it plainly to you as I did. And the words which I added withal, which your Lordship doth set down in your letter, that I did charge you with some matters towards her Majesty; assuredly, my Lord, I used no such words. But finding myself grieved with such cross handling, as both at this and at other times I have done, I told your Lordship, I saw your Lordship very ready to cross me now-a-days before her Majesty. That I like it so ill, that I would and could find way to anger you as well. And that I had not dealt in this sort either with you or any of your's, but much otherwise. And so my Lord I have done to my poor power, and with as much desire to have you my assured friend, as any friend you have found in England. Which finding these occasions more than once falling to my lot, I can hardly dissemble or bear the unkind dealing of them, but rather to deal as I am dealt withal, when all kindness is not only so little regarded but hardly requited. In which conceit, my Lord, I pray you think I can be as others are to me. And to that end was my speech and my meaning, and that I said was to your Lordship's self, and before none other, but moved, as your Lordship said, in passion. And as I have been loth to have the occasion that should drive me to take such hard or unkind courses, as I see some do, and my self very deeply felt. Thus much, my Lord, I have thought good to set down, which receiving your Lordship's letter, even as I came from the Court, had no time till late this night to answer. Wherein I will not hide the conceit I had upon the causes I have shewed, finding myself indeed heartily moved and grieved, but plainly and flatly to deliver my mind, rather than to dissemble as many can. Leaving to your Lordship to consider of my doings, how you have found them, if I be well used. And so in very haste, leaving the rest till I speak with yourself, I commit you to the Lord. From my house, this Monday night.

Your Lordship's very friend, if you so regard me,

R. LEYCESTER.

‘ in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over those enemies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people.’ At this time, there is nothing plainer than that he stood as well with Queen Elizabeth as ever; and it is highly probable, that the Earl of Leicester, than whom no man understood a court better, was persuaded of this himself, otherwise he would never have sought an employment still greater than any he had, which was that of the Queen’s Lieutenant in England and Ireland, nor would he have obtained it as he did, if the Queen’s favour had not been as strong towards him as ever; but a stop was put to the passing the letters-patents prepared for this purpose, by the Lord Chancellor Hatton, and the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, who are said to have shewed the Queen in time, what hazards she might run, by intrusting so large, or rather so exorbitant, a power in the hands of a single person (i). It is not at all improbable, that the danger of the Spanish Invasion being by this time over, made the Queen think so extensive a command unnecessary, which inclined her to listen to the suggestions of those two great Statesmen upon this subject. Whether the Earl of Leicester conceived any dislike at this, and thought of retiring from Court, as some have suggested, or whether, as it was usual with him, he was desirous of enjoying the pleasures of privacy in the country at that season; certain it is, that he set out about the end of August, for his Castle of Kenelworth (k), but making some stay at his house at Cornbury in Oxfordshire, he there breathed his last, September the 4th 1588, when he was about the age of fifty-six (l). At the time of his demise, he was of the Queen’s Privy-Council, Lord-Steward of the Household, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, High-Steward of that of Cambridge, Chief Justice in Eyre in the Counties beyond Trent, the Queen’s Lieutenant and Captain-General of the Forces in Holland, Governor and Captain-General of the United Provinces, and General of the forces raised in England against the Spaniards; Knight of the French King’s Order of St Michael, and of the most noble Order of the Garter (m). Some writers add, Earl-Marshal of England (n), but without authority; for certainly, he never enjoyed that office (o). As to the manner of his death, there are very different opinions, and all countenanced by some authority. We are told by Camden, that he died of a fever (p). Sir Robert Naunton (q), who was well acquainted with the transactions of those times, informs us, that though he ended not his days by so violent a death, or by the fatal sentence of judicature, as his father and grandfather, yet (as is suggested) by that poison which he had prepared for others, wherein they report him a rare artist [U]. At Court an opinion prevailed, that he did not leave the world by a natural disease, but by some practices of a diabolical nature; concerning which, several examinations were taken before the Privy-Council (r), with which, perhaps it may not be amiss to make the reader acquainted [W]. That he died under a cloud, which time and emula-

[U] Wherein they report him a rare artist.] It appears from hence, that Sir Robert Naunton (62) did not entirely discredit the reports that ran upon this subject, which were indeed very publick, and the names of the persons frequently mentioned who were employed in these pernicious practices, as well as those who suffered by them. As to the former, there was one Salvadore, a domestick of the Earl’s, who died himself very suddenly; and Dr Julio (63), who was very highly in his favour. As to the latter, besides the Lord Sheffield and the Earl of Essex, who are thought to have been removed for the sake of their wives, there are some others that have been publicly said to travel the same road, by the same conveyance, though for other reasons. As for instance, the Cardinal Chastillon, who died at Canterbury in 1570, as he was going out of England, and who is said to have offended this great Earl, by informing the Queen of the arts which he used to disgust such foreign Princes as sought her Majesty in marriage. That this Prelate was highly carested by the Queen is beyond all doubt, and that he was poisoned is likewise certain, but by whose contrivance is by no means clear (64). The case of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton may be accounted, of all others, that which bears the hardest upon the Earl in point of circumstances; he is said to have been poisoned in a sallad at Leicester-House, being taken ill at table, and dying before he could be removed: the latter part of this story is acknowledged by the Earl of Leicester himself, in a letter to Secretary Walsingham; and as to the former, it depends upon a family tradition, that Sir Nicholas accused the Earl upon his death-bed. However, it was the report generally prevailed, and Camden does not speak of it as a thing entirely groundless (65). The same story is told of his great competitor the Earl of Suffex, but with no great shew of probability or truth, much less of certainty, though said to have been taken from his own mouth. He was indeed the Earl’s enemy to the very last, for on his death-bed he is reported to have given this caution to his friends (66): ‘ I am passing into another world, and must now leave you to your fortunes, and to the Queen’s grace and goodness, but beware of the gipsy (Leicester) for he will be too hard for you all, you know not the beast so well as I do.’ All these tales would be absolutely incredible, if the proposal for taking off the Queen of Scots by a dose was not positively vouched by Camden, and the Lady Sheffield’s loss of her hair and nails testified by herself upon oath. Hence it was a saying in those days, That folks often fell without seeing the hand that pushed them, and that many died who knew not their own disease.

[W] To make the reader acquainted.] We have observed in the text, that, upon the return of Sir James Crofts, Comptroller of the Household, who was one of the Commissioners in the Low-Countries, he was committed for acting imprudently in the discharge of his trust. After the Earl of Leicester’s death, among other reports that flew abroad, one was, that the son of this Gentleman had been instrumental in his Lordship’s sudden end (67). Upon this Mr Edward Crofts, and several other persons, were brought before the Privy-Council, when the following facts came out, as they are transcribed from the original minutes; being examined concerning the Earl of Leicester’s death, he (Edward Crofts) saith, that after his father Sir James Crofts was committed, this examine came home to his own house at Charing-Crofts, and lamenting, said unto Smith and Pille’s wife, that he and all his were undone except he had help. And Smith said he would do what he could; and willed this examine to give him the names of all the Council, which he did. And Smith promised to tell him who were his father’s enemies; and did after tell him that the Earl of Leicester was his great enemy. Within two or three days after, Smith, walking up and down with this examine, made a flirt with his thumb, and bad him be of good comfort, for the bear is tied to the stake, or muzzled, whether he doth not remember; and in what manner or fort the Earl was dealt withal

tion, the companions of great ones brought upon him, as a certain writer suggests (1), one would think a little improbable; since Camden assures us, that the Queen expressed a very deep concern for his death, but then, the force of this assertion is lessened, by his adding, that she suffered his goods to be sold by publick auction, for the discharge of a debt due to the Crown, in pursuance of a maxim, from which she rarely departed, of remitting to none the claims upon them from her Treasury (2). Whatever the disposition of his Sovereign might be to him, he left the strongest testimonies of duty and fidelity towards her, that words could possibly express, in his last will, penned by his own hand, during his last residence in Holland; which is a piece so singular, that it cannot but afford pleasure to see a part of it in the notes (u) [X]. In that instrument, which is written with he doth not know. That Smith told him, that his father should not remain in prison a full month. And that this examine should be the man that should obtain the warrant for his delivery, and so he did. All the persons abovementioned were examined as well as Mr Crofts, who confirmed every tittle of what he had said, particularly Smith himself; but what punishment they suffered, or whether they suffered at all, is not mentioned. We learn also from the same author, that the Earl of Leicester was in good health on the 2th of August, when he wrote a letter to the Lord Treasurer Barleigh in behalf of a friend of his, excused his going out of town without taking leave of him, and declared his intention to return speedily, which is a plain proof that he did not retire from any discontent.

[X] In the notes.] There is no need of any introduction to this piece, after what is said of it in the text, it begins thus (68): ' This is the last Will and Testament of me Robert Earl of Leicester, her Majesty's Lieutenant-General of all her forces in the Low-Countries, and Governor and Captain-General of all the United Provinces, written with his own hand the first of August, in Middleborough, 1573. First, I take it to be the part of every true Christian, to make a true testimony of his faith at all times, and especially in such a case and such a time as this is. And therefore I do mean here faithfully to make a short declaration, to testify in what faith I do live and depart from this world, through the grace of my Lord and Saviour, to continue me in the same till the separation of this life and body. And so I do acknowledge my creation and being to be had and continued by the Providence of our Almighty God, the creator of all things both in Heaven and Earth, and do confess that above all deeds that his Divine Majesty hath done for mankind, is the gift of his blessed son Christ Jesus to be the Redeemer and Saviour of his people that be faithful, by whose only merits and passion I verily believe, and am most assured of, the forgiveness of all my sins, be they never so great or infinite, and that he only is the sufficient sacrifice that hath appeased the wrath of his father, and that blessed lamb which innocently suffered all torments, to bear the bitter burden due to us miserable wretches, for his most tender compassion over all that have grace to believe on him. All which his grace's goodness and mercy I most faithfully take hold on, being so promised by himself, who is the only truth itself, that I am the child of salvation, and to be the inheritor of his everlasting kingdom, and to meet with him at the joyful day of resurrection with all the faithful children and saints of God. In this faith I now live, and in this faith I trust to change this life, with continual prayer to the Throne of Grace, to grant me, during this pilgrimage of mine, a true, humble, and penitent heart, for the due recognition of all my offences, and the willing amendment of the same, and to fly instantly to the sure anker-hold, my Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, to whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be all honour, glory, and dominion, for ever, Amen. Thus being in perfect health and memory, and having set down my faith as a true Christian, and being uncertain of the hour of death, I think it my part to settle my worldly matters in as good estate as I can, especially being hastily and suddenly sent over, and likewise having very little leisure since my arrival to get any time for my private business. But first, my will is to commit this wretched body of mine, when it shall please God to separate it from the soul, to the order of my dear friends that shall be living, as my executors, and my overseers of this my last Will and Testament, and they to take ' such order for the burial of my body as they shall think meet, always requiring that it may be done with as little pomp or vain expences of the world as may be, being persuaded that there is no more vain expences than that is; a convenient tomb or monument I wish there should be. And for the place where my body should lie it is hard to appoint, and I know not how convenient it is to desire it, but I have always wished, as my dear wife doth know, and some of my friends, that it might be at Warwick, where sundry of my ancestors do lie, either so, or else where the Queen's Majesty shall command; for as it was, when it had life, a most faithful, true, loving servant unto her; so living, and so dead, let the body be at her gracious determination if it shall so please her. Touching my bequests, they cannot be great by reason my ability and power is little, for I have not dissembled with the world my estate, but have lived always above any living I had (for which I am heartily sorry) lest that through my many debts from time to time, some men have taken los by me. My desire therefore is, and I do charge my executors to have due consideration, that if any person shall justly, after my decease, make such complaint, that they shall be satisfied as far as it shall be found in any equity it is due unto them, with advantage to them. Besides I do here appoint my most dear well beloved wife, the Countess of Leicester, to be my sole executrix of this my last Will and Testament, and do require her, for all love between us, that she will not only be content to take it upon her, but also to see it faithfully and carefully performed. And albeit there may many imperfections be found with the making of this Will, for that I am no Lawyer, nor have any Counsel with me to place things in such form as some are able, yet as my true meaning is, I trust, to express, that accordingly it may be interpreted, for I mean to make it as plain as I can. And first of all, before and above all persons it is my duty to remember my most dear and most gracious Sovereign, whose creature under God I have been, and who hath been a most bountiful and princely mistress unto me, as well in advancing me to many honours, as in maintaining me many ways by her goodness and liberality. And as my best recompence to her most excellent Majesty, can be from so mean a man chiefly in prayer to God, so, whilst there was any breath in this body, I never failed it even as for mine own soul. And as it was my greatest joy in my life-time to serve her to her contentation, so it is not unwelcome to me, being the will of God, to die and end this life for her service. And yet, albeit I am not able to make any piece of recompence of her great goodness, yet will I presume to present unto her a token of an humble and faithful heart, as the least that ever I can send her, and with this prayer withal, that it may please the Almighty God, not only to make her the oldest Prince that ever he gave over England, but to make her the godliest, the virtuouslest, and the worthiest in his sight, that ever he gave over any nation. That he may indeed be a blessed mother and nurse to this people and Church of England, which the Almighty God grant for his Christ's sake. The tokens I do bequeath unto her Majesty, is the jewel with three great emeralds, with a fair large table-diamond in the midst, without a foil, and set about with many diamonds without foil, and a rope of fair white pearl, to the number of six hundred, to hang the said jewel at, which pearl and jewel was once purposed for her Majesty, against a coming to Waustead, but it must now thus be disposed, which I do pray you my dear wife see performed, and delivered to some of those whom amazing art; in as much, as the language thereof is scarce to be distinguished from that of nature, he takes great care of his family, and shews wonderful condescensions towards his wife; though after all, the bulk of his fortune is secured to his son Robert, whom he styles constantly his base son, with what meaning must be left to conjecture. As he died before his brother Ambrose, Earl of Warwick, and that noble peer was universally beloved, he had interest enough to carry his brother's testament, or at least, the most essential parts thereof into execution, which otherwise would have been attended, if we may guess from what happened in the next reign, with insuperable difficulties (w). The corps of the Earl of Leicester was removed from Cornbury Park to Warwick, where it was interred in our Lady's Chapel, adjoining to the Quire of the Collegiate Church, and a very noble monument is erected to his memory, with his effigies in armour lying on his back, with his Earl's Coronet on his head, and the effigy of his Countess lying by him, with an inscription in capitals, the substance of which, the reader has already seen; as it contains little more than a recapitulation of his employments (x). The character bestowed upon him by Camden (y), is to this effect. He was looked upon as a finished courtier in every respect; elegant in his dress, liberal in his way of living, bountiful to soldiers and men of letters; very adroit in chusing his time and carrying his point; complaisant in his temper, but insidious towards rivals; amorous in the former part of his life, and in the latter, uxorious to a strange degree. As for the rest, as he preferred an envied height of power to solid virtue; he furnished matter for a multitude of malicious detractors to descant upon, who, even in the zenith of his glory, failed not to prosecute him with their libels, which were mixed with abundance of untruths. To sum up all, what was said of him in publick, had the air of praise and panegyrick; but in private, and where people durst be free, he was represented in quite a different light. This without doubt, considering it's brevity, is an admirable description, and by far superior to the diffuse accounts that are to be met with in other writers; but as it is perfectly adapted to the Historian's subject, it may be possibly thought too succinct, to close a particular article composed of such a variety of matter, and therefore we will endeavour with the utmost impartiality, to subjoin a more copious representation of this great Statesman and fortunate favourite in publick and in private life. He is said to have inherited the parts, as his brother the Earl of Warwick was the heir of his father's virtues (z). His ambition was great, but his abilities were greater. His dexterity as a courtier, appeared as soon as he entered the Court; for he obtained under King Edward, more than any of his brethren, in point of places and donations (a), and this address continued through all his different situations; he complimented Queen Mary upon her accession (b), though he went a prisoner out of her presence; and notwithstanding he met, as might be expected, with a bad reception, yet he persevered till he obtained, not only a pardon, but a place. He secured however, so good an interest with her successor, that he was declared a favourite, as soon as she was declared a Queen, and maintained the first place in her confidence as long as he lived; as he was desirous of the graces of his Sovereign, so he studied that the world should take notice of his success, which appeared early in the magnificence beyond example, with which he discharged the office of Constable, or Prince of the Revels, in the Temple (c), and in this he persisted through his whole life, introducing creatures of his own, to elbow out any of whom the Queen took notice, without his participation, and thereby kept himself always supreme (d). But though he loved the station of a Favourite, he affected also that of a Minister (e). He would be first in all things, and he was so; in the Court, in the Camp, and in the Cabinet, at the same time; he changed his parties often, but never his views. He affected in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's time, a great respect for the Spanish and Popish interest; advising her to give good words to King Philip, that she might have leisure to settle the affairs of religion, and of her kingdom, upon a solid foundation; and thus he made his court at home, and preserved his interest and intelligence abroad, which he used to the last, and is said to have bequeathed it as a legacy to his son-in-law, Essex (f). The Papists and the Puritans separating from the Church about the same time, he went over to the latter, the former having chiefs of their own, not to be removed but by prosecutions, which therefore was the way that he took (g). He professed a kindness for Mary Queen of Scots, but it was to please Queen Elizabeth, and when he proposed the Association afterwards, which proved the ruin of that Princess, it was still to please, as well as to preserve Elizabeth (h). His religious zeal was intirely governed by, or at least had a constant connection with, his temporal interests, which induced him sometimes to take measures that were not at all agreeable to those Prelates that were at the head of the Church, who could never be brought to consider him as a friend to themselves, or a well-wisher to it (i) [Y]. As great a Politician as he was, he never chose a back game, tho' no-body knew

' I shall hereafter nominate and appoint to be my overseers for her Majesty.'

[Y] Or a well-wisher to it.] In this note, it is proposed to give some account of the disputes this potent Earl had with the Clergy, which have been transmitted to posterity, with circumstances not much to his honour. He exercised his office of Chancellor of Oxford with a very high hand, and by preferring his dependants, secured himself a great influence there, attended, as might be expected, with much clamour (69). He differed with Archbishop Grindal, and though he was much in the confidence of the Queen, brought him at first into discredit with her, and then into disgrace; nay, to such a degree was this persecution carried, that knew better how to play it, when no other road to success was left (b). It was this desire of seeming as well as being powerful, that made him industrious to prevent any from being called to Council, before he knew what road they would take, and what length they would run. He sought and loved men of abilities, but took care to keep them at a distance from Court, and in stations where he might be useful to them, and they to him; thus he sent Sir Henry Sydney, his brother-in-law, over to Ireland, placed the Earl of Pembroke in Wales; Lord Hunfdon at Berwick, and the Earl of Huntington at York, with the title of President of the North (l); in a word, he reduced the management of domestic affairs into a regular system, so that there was no part of the kingdom, in which he had not an influence, and in the counties round his castle of Kenelworth, almost every thing was dependent upon him, either through hope or fear (m) [Z]. When we consider the poor prelate desired to lay down his archiepiscopal dignity, and actually caused the instrument of his resignation to be drawn; but his enemies believing he was near his end, did not press the perfecting of it, and so he died with his mitre on his head, of a broken heart (71). He kept his house long, and was reported to be blind; a certain author, no great friend to Bishops, and whose testimony is the more credible when he speaks kindly of them, shall give the history of this Archbishop's fall, and of the share the Earl had in it, his words are these (72). There was an Italian Doctor (one Julio Bargarucci) that having a known wife alive, yet bearing himself on the countenance of some great Lord, did marry another gentlewoman. This good Archbishop not winking at so publick a scandal, convened him for that, and proceeded by ecclesiastical censures against him; letters were presently written from this great Lord to the Archbishop to stop the proceeding, to tolerate, to dispense, or to mitigate the censure, but the Bishop remained still unmoved and unmoveable; when no subjects intreaty could be found to prevail, they intreat the Sovereign to write in the Doctor's behalf, but this John Baptist, not only persisted in his non licet habere eam, but also, in a reverend fashion, required an account of her Majesty's faith, in that she would seem to write in a matter, that if she were truly informed, was expressly against the word of God. The Queen, in a gracious disposition, was purposed to have yielded an account in writing, but the great Lord not only dissuaded her from that, as too great an indignity, but incensed her exceedingly against him; whereupon he was privately commanded to keep his house, where, because he was sometimes troubled with sore eyes, his friends gave out he was blind. In which if he resembled Tiresias the Soothsayer, he might also have been like him in another respect, by foretelling the fate of his persecutor. For that Lord, that so persecuted this prelate about his physician's two wives, dying twenty years since, left two wives behind him, that can hardly be yet agreed, which was his lawful wife. A certain Ecclesiastical Historian acquaints us, that Dr Julio's divorce, was not the single fault of this Archbishop, it seems he would not part with Lambeth House (73), to which the Earl had a mind; but the most remarkable circumstance in this business, is, that the Archbishop's want of vigilance in suppressing Puritans, was the cause assigned for oppressing him by that very nobleman, who was known to be their principal protector, and to whom consequently this could not give any real offence (74). Dr Whitgift succeeding in the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, succeeded also in a short time to the dislike of the Earl of Leicester, who having provided for Mr Cartwright, the father and chief of the Puritans, not only by making him master of his Hospital at Warwick, but also by granting him an annuity of fifty pounds a year out of his own estate, recommended him also to the Archbishop, with whom he had had many controversies (75). Mr Cartwright on his side behaved very respectfully, and his Grace not civilly only, but kindly, for which the Earl thanked him, as if the favour had been done to himself, by letter, intimating at the same time, what good things might be expected in case Mr Cartwright was again allowed to preach; but the Archbishop would not be drawn into that, and gave his Lordship his reasons in a long epistle (76). The Earl was then silent upon this subject, but soon after addressed himself to the Archbishop upon another, which was to demand his opinion as to the lawfulness of assisting the Dutch, on the score of religion against their

Sovereign the King of Spain, which he knew, could not fail of bringing him into great difficulties. The Archbishop in his answer, declined giving any such opinion, for which conduct of his, he advanced many reasons; but these would not satisfy, and he was at last obliged to pen a resolution of what was stiled the Queen's case of conscience in that matter, which he did so wisely, that no exceptions could be taken (71). The Archbishop, and the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, being Visitors of St John's College in Cambridge, the Earl of Leicester interposed, by his letters, to stay their proceedings, which occasioned much trouble (78). In the mean time Mr Cartwright broke out again, and the conduct of the Puritans gave the Queen so much trouble, that the Earl of Leicester to preserve the Queen's favour, thought fit to leave them. Dr Heylin gives us this account of the matter (79). 'It is worth observing, that the Puritans were then most busy, as well in setting up their discipline, as in publishing their railing and seditious pamphlets, when the Spaniards were hovering on the seas with their terrible navy. At what time they conceived, and that not improbably, that the Queen and Council would be otherwise busted than to take notice of their practices, or suppress their doings, or rather, that they durst not call them into question for their words and actions, for fear of alienating the affections of so strong a party as they had raised to themselves; the serious apprehensions of which mischievous Counsels prevailed so far on Leicester and Walsingham, that they did absolutely renounce any further intercession for them, professing that they had been horribly abused with their hypocrisy, which possibly might happen better for themselves than it did for the Church, the Earl of Leicester going to his own place before the end of this year, and Walsingham being gathered to his fathers within two years after.'

[Z] Either through hope or fear. In the foregoing note, we have shewn what a stroke he had in the Church, and how little able the first subject of the Queen was to bear up against his displeasure, though conceived upon none of the justest motives. As to his power paramount in the state, we may form some idea of that, from the observance that was shewn to him, when he visited Buxton Wells, by the Earl of Shrewsbury, one of the ancientest peers in the kingdom, and the sense which Queen Elizabeth expressed of that Earl's behaviour in the following letter (80), written in her own hand, which contains, perhaps, as high a testimony of favour, as ever was expressed by a Sovereign to a subject.

ELIZABETH.

OUR very good cousin: being given to understand from our cousin of Leicester, how honourably he was, not only lately, received by you our cousin, and the Countess, at Chatsworth, and his diet, by you both discharged at Buxton's, but also presented with a very rare present; we should do him great wrong, holding him in that place of favour we do, in case we should not let you understand, in how thankful sort we accept the same at both your hands, not as done unto him, but unto our ownself: reputing him as another ourself. And therefore, you may assure yourself, that we taking upon us the debt, not as his, but our own, will take care accordingly to discharge in such honourable sort, as so well deserving creditors as ye are, shall never have cause to think ye have met with an unthankful debtor, &c.

this attentively, we shall be the less surprized at his great weight in Parliament, where he had always a strong party in the House of Commons at his devotion; and in the House of Peers, he directed things at his will, having sometimes six, eight, or even ten proxies in his own hands (n), there being at that time no order to restrain so exorbitant a privilege. If in any thing he overshot himself, it was in accepting the command in the Low-Countries, to which those who were least inclined to him, were most ready in giving their approbation (o), and in his absence, brought Sir Christopher Hatton into high credit, with which he was much offended (p). It is certain his dignity did not answer his expectation, but served rather to hurt his fortune and to impair his power, both which however he would have recovered if he had lived, for he perfectly understood the Queen's temper, and had a great ascendancy over it. In his private life he affected a wonderful regularity, was very circumspect in his speeches, and wrote as well as any man of his time (q). It was a saying of his, that a great man ought to know every thing, and be able to do every thing by himself, or by his instruments; which he made good in his practice. But with respect to men of ordinary rank, whom he employed and admitted to great familiarities, their favour was seldom of any long date, but he found ways and means to dispose of them, either in distant employments, or otherwise, so that when he thought proper to dispense with their services, they might be able to do him no hurt (r). He carried his pretences to piety very high, though to gratify his passions, he fell into vices that could not be concealed; and though no man talked more of moderation and justice, yet he was guilty of some acts of oppression that were both violent and mean [AA]. It is wonderful, that, with these great inequalities in his behaviour, he should be able to maintain himself, and under such a reign, in the possession of absolute power, for such a number of years as he did, and that too in spite both of open and secret opposition; which fully justifies an observation that has been made upon his conduct, viz. That his depth was not fathomable in those days, or his policy to be reached in these (s). In a word, the family of Dudley, in three descents, furnished men of such capacities, as our Histories scarce record the like; the grandfather, the father, and the son, were all great men, but the last the greatest and most fortunate of the three, if any man can be so reputed whom flattery itself would be ashamed to stifle good. This Earl had by his last Countess, Lettice, daughter of Sir Francis Knolles, Knight of the Garter, and widow of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex, an only son Robert, Baron of Denbigh, who died in his childhood, July 15, 1584, for whom an altar-monument was erected by that of his father at Warwick, with his effigies thereon, and a very pompous inscription to his memory (t). As for Lettice, Countess of Leicester, she survived near forty-six years after the decease of the Earl, by whom an ample

It was but an ill return that he made to this nobleman, if it be true as some have suggested, that he countenanced the stories told to his prejudice out of female jealousy by his Countess, and thereby brought him into suspicion with the Queen his mistress (81), who had confided in him formerly, as much as in any man of his quality, the Earl of Leicester himself excepted, and had been ever faithfully served.

On what account this exorbitant indulgence was shewn to the Lord Leicester by the Queen, is not for us to decide, which even in those days was but indifferently understood. However, that her Majesty was supposed to have had thoughts of marrying him, not libels and secret histories, but even the gravest and most authentick writers affirm; and therefore we may attribute to this, the singular condescension of the Queen on one side, and the lofty behaviour of the Earl on the other. Osborne (69), who lived near her time, and was a passionate admirer of this Princess, makes no manner of doubt of it, and having mentioned some of the reasons said to be used to give a colour to this marriage, he proceeds thus. 'Nor could Leicester render his bed vacant to a more thriving end, as he is rumoured to have done, than to make room for the greatest and most fortunate Princess the sun ever looked upon without blushing, in relation to oppression or blood: this may be allowed upon the score of probability, that his Lordship would hardly have been so rampant and uncivil, without some extraordinary invitation, as to draw a blow in her presence, from another Privy-Counsellor more zealous possibly than discreet; to whom, when the Queen said, He had forfeited his hand, his reply was, He hoped she would suspend that judgment, till the traitor had lost his head, who did better deserve it: but this accident bordering so near the confines of her honour, did admit no further debate, it being no other than she, in a less sprightly humour might have given him herself, none being more flexible to all kind of jollities than the minds of Princes, when unbent from publick affairs.'

In all public Commissions, the Earl of Leicester's name was sure to be inserted, and in most of them he took care to act, for he was an excellent patron, and seldom failed any body that was attached to him; he missed no opportunity of gratifying himself and his followers, and frequently obtained grants of great value, such as of timber, waste lands, encroachments upon forests, and licences for importing and exporting certain goods, all of which he sold for large sums of money (82). He valued himself not a little upon the court paid him by the nobility; and such as held themselves of too high rank to make such kind of submissions, he frequently found means to reach, when they least expected it. Such were his deeds at Court, in quality of the Queen's favourite and chief minister, which he thought title sufficient to command obedience from men of all ranks, as appears from his behaviour to the Lord Chief Justice Anderson, as we have shewn in another place (83). For all this, his Lordship was not always a courtier, he could sometimes act the patriot too, and that with equal life and spirit, as when he declared in Parliament, that a husband should be imposed upon the Queen, or that she should be obliged to nominate a successor for the security of the State (84). But it has been doubted whether he was in earnest in that bold declaration, or whether he made it with a view to discover what other great peers were of this sentiment, and then to lead them, under colour of zeal for their country, into practices which might render them obnoxious to the resentment of the crown (85).

[AA] That were both violent and mean.] We are informed by Camden (86), that when the Lord Paget retired beyond the seas, he complained that he was forced to take this step for his own preservation, because, through the arts of Leicester and Walsingham, he found the Queen's favour entirely estranged from him, which might possibly pass for a calumny, if soon after, upon his being attainted in Parliament, the Earl of Leicester had not procured a grant to himself of Paget, afterwards stiled Essex-House. We are told by Sir Robert Atkyns (87), that this Earl caused some of his agents ample provision was made for her, with the highest testimony of affection, in his Will, of which she was appointed executrix, and that she lost no time in proving it, appears by the date, September 6, 1588, when her Lord had not been two days dead (u). Her Ladyship was likewise very expeditious in a third marriage with Sir Christopher Blount, a gentleman who had great dependance upon her son the Earl of Essex, and whose tender friendship for him afterwards cost him his life (v). It does not appear, that, during the remaining part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, the Countess-Dowager of Essex had any great interest, though her son succeeded her husband in the Queen's favour. On the contrary we are told, that it was with the utmost difficulty the Earl of Essex prevailed upon the Queen to admit the Countess his mother to her royal presence, and this too after repeated disappointments; neither could he afterwards prevail in the same suit, though he urged it with much warmth (x). We need not wonder therefore, that her solicitations could avail him little in his last misfortunes, though it is very certain that she did for him all that was in her power. But in the reign of King James she had great credit at Court, at least for some time, as will be seen elsewhere. The last years of her life were spent in retirement in the country, where she lived hospitably and charitably till her decease, which happened December the 25th, 1634 (y). She was buried with great funeral pomp in the same tomb with her second husband, in the church at Warwick, and on the right hand of his monument there is a large copy of verses, in two columns, on a tablet, to her Honour, subscribed Gervase Clifton (z).

agents to apply themselves to the Lord Berkeley, for a sight of his family evidences, that the Earl might be the better able to shew his alliance to that noble house, some of which they took away, and then a title being set up by the Earl of Leicester, to part of Lord Berkeley's lands, he lost them for want of those evidences to support his right. We have mentioned in another part of this work, the case of Mr Arden, of Park-Hall in Warwickshire (88), who was brought to an untimely end, for despising that low method of making court to this great man, to which some of his neighbours condescended, which was by wearing his livery. Sir William Dugdale acquaints us with the injury done to one Mr Robinson of Warwickshire, who by some strange methods lost his estate, which was afterwards found in this great Earl's possession (89). But in another place we are informed, that this Robinson, was the son of a gentleman killed in the Queen's service at Newhaven, under the Earl of Warwick, that he was bred up in Leicester's service, in which he spent a great deal of money, and thereby entangled his estate; that upon this, suits grew between him and the usurers, who at the bottom were but this Lord's instruments, and in an attempt of theirs to get possession, a man was killed by Robinson, or some of his party in their own defence, for which he was imprisoned, tried, and convicted, but lost only his estate (90); which with other lands, was afterwards conveyed to the Queen in exchange, and so all farther disputes prevented. But the Earl's power and influence, great as they were, met now and then with a check, and particularly in the case of Sir John Packington, to whom having wrote to know the titles to the Bishop and Dean of Worcester of certain lands, the honest Knight fairly sent him word, that if he meant to make any use of him to the prejudice of the Church, he had mistaken his man (91). We have carried these memoirs to an unusual length, for which the nature of them must be our excuse, since the article is certainly of great importance, and would have afforded matter for many more sheets, if we had not studied brevity, as far as was consistent with perspicuity. DUDLEY (Sir ROBERT) as he was called here, and, as he was stiled abroad, Earl of Warwick, and Duke of Northumberland. He was son of Robert Earl of Leicester by the Lady Douglas Sheffield, and was born at Sheen in Surrey in 1573, where, for reasons that we have seen in the former article, he was very carefully concealed, as well to prevent the Queen's knowledge of the Earl's engagements with his mother, as to hide it from the Countess of Essex, to whom he was then contracted, if not married (a). At the time of his birth, however, and some time after, he was considered as the Earl of Leicester's lawful son by Ambrose Earl of Warwick, and others of his nearest relations, particularly by Sir Thomas Butler and his son, who, as the Earl affirms in his Will, intended to leave his son Robert their estate. When he was about five years of age, his father, the Earl of Leicester, married Lettice, Countess-Dowager of Essex, openly, and thereupon his son Robert was no longer treated as his lawful child, but as his natural issue by the Lady Douglas Sheffield. Out of her hands the Earl was very desirous of getting him, in order to put him under the care of Sir Edward Horsey, Knt. Governor of the Isle of Wight (b), which some have imagined was with a sinister view, not against the boy, for whom Leicester had ever the greatest tenderness, but with a thought of bringing him upon the stage at some proper time, as his natural son by another Lady. At that time, however, he failed of his purpose, but not long after it seems he prevailed, and got the child into his hands; he sent him then to school at Offington in Suffex in 1583, where he was under the care of one Owen Jones, to whom, upon a certain occasion, the Earl expressed himself to this purpose (c): 'Owen, thou knowest that Robin my boy is my lawful son, and as I do, and have charged thee, to keep it secret, so I charge thee not to forget it; and therefore see thou be careful of him.' There he received the first rudiments of literature, and gave very extraordinary proofs of the wonderful pregnancy of his parts, which were not only equal, but even superior to those of any of his family. After remaining four years in this private school, he was removed, in 1587, to the University of Oxford, and there entered of Christ-Church by the stile of Comitis filius, i. e. an Earl's son, and placed under the care of Mr Thomas Chaloner, afterwards Sir Thomas Chaloner, and Tutor to Prince Henry (d). In about a year after he came to the university, and when he was about the age of fifteen, his father died, leaving him, after the decease of his uncle Ambrose, Earl of Warwick, his noble castle of Kenelworth, the lordships of Denbigh and Chirk, and the bulk of his estate, which, before he was of age, he in a great measure enjoyed, notwithstanding the enmity borne him by the Countess-Dowager of Leicester. He was at this time looked upon, and very deservedly, as one of the finest Gentlemen in England; in his person tall, well shaped, having a fresh and fine complexion, but red haired; learned beyond his age, more especially in the Mathematicks; and very expert in his exercises, and particularly in riding the great horse, in which he was allowed to excel any man of his time (e). With these accomplishments and a great fortune, it is no wonder that he was every where well received, and particularly at Court, more especially as he was of a frank and open disposition, very generous and friendly, and though few were so well versed in books, much addicted to an active life. His genius prompted him to great exploits, and having a particular turn to Navigation and discoveries, he resolved, soon after he was of age, to make a voyage into the South Seas at his own expence, in hopes of acquiring as great fame thereby as the famous Thomas Cavendish of Trimley, Esq; his dear and intimate acquaintance, whose sister he married. But after a great deal of pains taken, and much money spent, the government would not suffer him to proceed, looking upon it as a dangerous voyage, in which they thought it not fit to hazard the lives of the Queen's subjects (f). Mr Dudley was not to be cured of his desire of going to sea, even by this disappointment, and therefore fitted out a small squadron for the river Oroonoke, and the coasts adjacent, of which he took the command in person; he sailed from Southampton road November 6, 1594, and returned to St Ives in Cornwall about the end of May 1595, having performed all, and indeed more, than could be expected from him, considering his small strength, taking, sinking, and otherwise destroying, nine sail of Spanish ships, one of which was a man of war of six hundred tons, which he fought board and board for two days, till he had no powder left, and she afterwards sunk at sea (g). He wrote a particular account of this voyage at the request of the Reverend Mr Hakluyt, which he afterwards published in his large and valuable Collection [A]. In the succeeding year he fitted out two ships and two pinnaces, for the South-Seas, under Capt. Benjamin Wood, at his sole expence, and attending the Earl of Essex and the Lord High-Admiral of England in their glorious expedition against the Spaniards, he, for his gallant behaviour at the taking of Cadiz, received the honour of knighthood from the first of those noble Peers (h). In the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Dudley being then a widower, married Alice, daughter to Sir Thomas Leigh (i), and settled upon her in jointure great part of his estate, and gaining by this marriage some powerful friends, he began to entertain hopes of reviving the honours of his family. He considered with himself that it was not yet too late to make proof of the legitimacy of his birth, by which he would become clearly entitled to the honour of Lord L'Isle and Earl of Leicester, as heir to his father, as also to the earldom of Warwick, by virtue of the limitations in his uncle's patent, as also to the castle of Warwick, and several fair manors in that county and elsewhere, by force of the entail; full of these hopes, in the year 1605, he commenced a suit in the Court of Audience of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the plague being then at London, obtained a Commission directed to Dr Zachary Babington, Chancellor of the diocese of Lichfield, to examine witnesses on that head, which

[A] In his valuable Collection.] It was certainly a mark of true courage, as well as of publick spirit, that as soon as he became of age, and entered into the possession of his fortune, Mr Dudley, instead of indulging himself in the pleasures of a Court, should undertake so long and hazardous a voyage, as even the last of the two was, which he projected. The ships that he fitted out, were the Bear, of two-hundred tons, in which he commanded himself; the Bear's Whelp, Captain Monk, and two Pinnaces, the one called the Frisking, and the other the Earwig. Captain Monk returned with his vessel and two prizes, before the end of the year; of which, Mr Dudley having no knowledge, waited for him near the Azores; but hearing no news, and finding many of his men sick, he thought it better to proceed in his undertaking, as soon as it was in his power to do it conveniently. Accordingly having taken two prizes, he put Captain Benjamin Wood into the one, which he called the Intent, and Captain Wentworth into the other; so that having now three sail under his command, he made the best of his way for the island of Trinidad, in the West-Indies. Upon his arrival there, he detached the ship called the Intent, and her consort, to the Leeward-Islands, and with his own vessel, laboured to make what discovery he could of the great Empire of Guiana; the writings and example of Sir Walter Raleigh, having been no small motives to this enterprize. All the account he gives us of the countries, the rivers, and the people, as also of the reports that prevailed amongst them of very rich countries that lay farther within land, agree perfectly well with the relations of that learned Knight and shew plainly, that he did not magnify any thing beyond the informations that he received. Mr Dudley heard, as well as he, of silver and gold mines, particularly, one of the latter at Wakkaru, and also obtained some specimens of gold from another place. It seems, he was in expectation of Sir Walter's coming thither, and was in great hopes of their making very considerable discoveries together, which induced him to stay as long as it was safe for him to do, and then he returned to Europe, as is related in the text, having barely as much provision left as would serve for his voyage (1). After gaining, by this expedition, experience sufficient to qualify him for a sea commander; he went with the Earl of Essex, and the Lord High-Admiral Howard, to Cadiz, in quality of Captain of the Nonpariel (2), and in that warm service, shewed all the courage of an adventurous young man, and all the coolness and conduct of an old officer, as was reported of him at his return. It is probable, that the reader will be desirous of knowing what became of Captain Wood's enterprize in the South-Seas, whither he was sent with a good ship, and a pinnace fitted out in 1595, at the expence of some thousand pounds; but the misfortune is, that no information on that subject can be had, no news being ever heard, either of the ships or men (3), which was much regretted in those days, because Mr Benjamin Wood, was looked upon as a man of steady courage, great integrity, and of uncommon abilities as a seaman, which recommended him to the favour and friendship of this great genius.

which was accordingly done (k). But no sooner had Lettice, Countess of Leicester, notice of these proceedings, than she procured an information to be filed, by Sir Edward Coke, the King's Attorney-General, in the Star-Chamber, against Sir Robert Dudley, Sir Thomas Leigh, Dr Babington, and others, for a conspiracy; and, upon the petition of Lord Sidney, an order issued out of that Court for bringing in all the depositions that had been taken by virtue of the Archbishop's commission, sealing them up and depositing them in the Council chest (l). In order, however, to keep up some appearance of impartiality, Sir Robert Dudley was allowed to examine witnesses, as to the proof of his legitimacy, in that court, which when he had done in as full a manner as in such a case could be expected, a sudden order was made for staying all proceedings, and locking up the examinations, of which no copies were to be taken but by the King's licence (m). This was such a blow to all the hopes of Sir Robert Dudley, and made it so evident that he had no favour to expect where his enemies had influence enough to preclude him from justice, that he resolved to retire abroad, in hopes that time might either lessen his misfortune, or at least mitigate the sharp sense he had of it; in order to this he applied for a licence to travel for three years, which was very readily granted him, there being many who chose to have him out of their way, and others, who bore him good will, thought that at this juncture his withdrawing for a time might be of use to him. But in the manner of his leaving the kingdom there was something that shewed, he inherited some of the vices as well as most of the great qualities of his family (n) [B]. He had not been long abroad, before such as meant him no good procured, notwithstanding his licence, a privy-seal, commanding his return into England, being very sensible that he would not obey it. The pretence for this was, that he had assumed in foreign countries the title of Earl of Warwick, which irritated some at Court extremely (o). It seems they formed a true notion of his circumstances and disposition, for Sir Robert, finding himself well received at the Court of Florence, resolved to continue there notwithstanding the letter of re-call, and this gave a handle for seizing his whole estate, which was vested in the Crown, during his natural life, by the statute of fugitives.

[B] As well as most of the great qualities of his family. When Sir Robert Dudley had once settled his resolution of quitting England, he resolved to make the place of his retreat as agreeable to him as it was possible, and therefore prevailed upon a young lady, at that time esteemed one of the finest women in England, and of a family distinguished for their beauty, to bear him company in the habit of his page (4). This Lady was Mrs Elizabeth Southwell, the daughter of Sir Robert Southwell, of Woodrising in the county of Norfolk (5), who, as the reader will find in the text, he afterwards espoused, in virtue of a dispensation from the Pope; whence a certain writer, who bore him no good will, has taken occasion to say, that he left England, because he could not be allowed to have two wives (6); in which, there would have been more truth, if Sir Robert Dudley had married that Lady here, as it is very certain he did not. How much soever she might be blamed in following him as she did, yet her conduct afterwards was without exception, and as she lived in honour and esteem, and had all the respect paid her, that her title of a Duchess could demand; so it is reported, that Sir Robert never altered his affections, but to shew his high regard for her memory, caused a noble tomb to be erected to her memory in the church of St Pancratius in Florence (7), where her body lies interred, and where he desired that he might be buried with her. As to his issue by this Lady, they will be taken notice of hereafter. It is very probable, that this marriage might prove a great bar to his return into England, and might be also a motive to the passing so extraordinary a law as that was, by which Lady Alice Dudley, was enabled to dispose of her jointure during his life. But before we close this note, it may not be amiss to examine what the reasons were, which induced the Lords in the Star-Chamber to treat Sir Robert Dudley's cause as they did. It seems that Sir William Leighton, upon whose advice he chiefly depended, when he found what evidence might be produced to prove the marriage of Lady Douglas Sheffield, with Robert Earl of Leicester, gave him advice, which though wise and well laid in itself, yet gave an opportunity to Sir Robert's enemies, to cast out such insinuations as threw an odium upon his whole proceedings. For when the commission mentioned in the text was brought down, and a Notary came afterwards to speed it, Sir William resolved to commence a suit in the courts at Lichfield, in the name of Sir Robert Dudley, in which one John Bushell was raised up as the adversary upon a charge, that he should have called Sir Robert, a Bastard three years before; upon this, one Goffe cites him to the court, in causa probri & convitii, and Goffe earnestly prest him to appear thereto. It was never intended by this suit to punish Bushell, but only to prove the marriage and legitimation. Bushell appeared, and made such answer as suited best for their purpose. The thirty-six articles were exhibited, thirty whereof tended to prove the marriage and legitimation, and some of the rest the defamation. And Dr Babington, then sitting in judgment in the court, and knowing the matter to be there profecuted, unduly, against a raised adversary, upon colour of defamation, admitted a very unlawful profecution of the libel, and ordered the defendant to make present answer, and then Frodsham, Salisbury, and Jones, were again examined as witnesses. And after their examinations, carried back to Clarges, Goffe, and Leigh's houses, and had diet and apparel given them by directions of Sir Robert Dudley, and Sir William Leighton. For these offences and undue proceedings, which tended to call in question the Lord of Leicester, and his then Lady's marriage, and her jointure, and the estates of many of the King's subjects, they were all committed; Sir William Leighton fined three-hundred pounds, Babington, one-hundred marks, Goffe, forty pounds, Salisbury, and Frodsham, one-hundred pounds a picce, and Jones, forty pounds. All the examinations and depositions taken in the Court of Audience by the Commissioners, and at Lichfield, suppressed and damned. The examinations and depositions in the Court, that concern the marriage between the Earl of Leicester, and the Lady Douglas Sheffield, to be sealed up by the Clerk of the Court, and never to be seen or published; Jones, Salisbury, and Frodsham, to be ever after held suspected in their testimonies touching the marriage and legitimation of Sir Robert Dudley, and the rest were acquitted (8). But this sentence takes no notice of the depositions of Lady Douglas, Sir Robert Dudley's mother; of Lady Parker, and many other persons, who deposed to his legitimacy; and yet this gave a colour for sealing and locking these up, which was what the friends of Lettice Countess of Leicester sought, and shews how dangerous a thing it was to leave matters of so high a nature to be determined in that Court, without the assistance of a jury, and without appeal (9). An inconvenience, which by degrees was so much felt, and so generally understood, that it was by Act of Parliament dissolved, at the common prayer of the whole nation.

(7) So his son Charles D. of N. informed Anthony Wood.

He left behind him Lady Alice Dudley his wife, and four daughters, for whom sufficient provision was made. In this situation things continued for some years, till some persons about Henry Prince of Wales suggested to him, that Kenelworth Castle was one of the finest and most magnificent places in the inland parts of the kingdom, and very fit for his Royal Highness's residence, upon which some overtures were made to Sir Robert Dudley abroad, as well as to Lady Alice at home, the Prince desiring to have it by way of purchase. These proposals were very readily accepted, on account, as it is said, of some promises that were made of having regard to his claims when a proper opportunity offered (p). In the mean time a commission issued for enquiring into the value of this estate, and the return thereto being very curious, the reader will find it in the notes [C]. The treaty beforementioned came at last to a conclusion, and deeds were executed bearing date November 21, 1611, by which, in consideration of fourteen thousand five hundred pounds, to be paid in one year to the said Sir Robert Dudley or his assigns, the said castle of Kenelworth, together with the manor and lands bearing the same name, the manors of Rudfen, Balshall, and Long Itchington, were settled upon the said Prince and his heirs, with condition that Sir Robert should hold the Constableship of the said castle for the term of his natural life, by patent from his Royal Highness: of this purchase-money, which was but a very inconsiderable sum in comparison of the value of the estate, but three thousand pounds was ever paid, and that to a Merchant who broke soon after, not one penny coming to the hands of Sir Robert Dudley (q). Prince Henry likewise dying, his title to the castle and lands descended to his brother Charles Prince of Wales, who, in the nineteenth year of the reign of King James I, procured an Act of Parliament to enable Alice Lady Dudley, who had a jointure therein, to alienate it, notwithstanding her coverture, in consideration of the sum of four thousand pounds, to be paid her out of the Exchequer, and a yearly pension (r); which said sum was accordingly paid, as the pension likewise was for some time, but grew afterwards into arrear, through the distress of that Prince's affairs after he came to the throne (s). But though Sir Robert Dudley lived in exile, and without receiving any considerable supplies from England, he still cherished some hope of his return; to facilitate which, and to ingratiate himself with King James, he drew up a scheme for improving the royal revenue (t), which scheme falling into the hands of some persons of great distinction, and being by them made publick, this was considered as a thing of a pernicious nature, for which they were imprisoned, but upon a discovery of the true author, they were shortly after released [D]. The place which Sir Robert Dudley chose

[C] The reader will find in the notes. The credit of this paper, will sufficiently appear from the subject of it, and the facts that are contained therein; all that is farther requisite, is to acquaint the reader, that the original is still preserved in that great treasury of British Antiquities, the Cotton Library.

The Castle of KENILWORTH, situate upon a rock.

The circuit thereof, within the walls, containeth seven acres, upon which the walks are so spacious and fair, that two or three persons together may walk upon most places thereof.

The castle, with the four gate-houses, all built of free-stone hewn and cut, the walls in many places, of fifteen and ten foot thickness, some more, some less, the least four foot in thickness square.

The castle and four gate-houses, all covered with lead, whereby it is subject to no other decay than the glass, through the extremity of the weather.

The rooms of great state within the same, and such as are able to receive his Majesty, the Queen, and Prince at one time, built with as much uniformity and convenience, as any houses of later time, and with such stately cellars, all carried upon pillars and architecture of free-stone, carved and wrought, as the like are not within this kingdom, and also all other houses for offices answerable.

There lieth about the same in chases and parks, twelve hundred pounds per annum, nine hundred pounds whereof are grounds for pleasure, the rest in meadow and pasture thereto adjoining tenants and freeholders.

There joyneth upon this ground, a park-like ground, called the King's Wood, with fifteen coppices lying all together, containing seven-hundred eighty-nine acres within the same, which in the Earl of Leicester's time were stored with red deer, since which, the deer strayed, but the ground in no sort blemished, having great store of timber, and other trees of much value upon the same.

There runneth through the said grounds, by the walls of the castle, a fair pool, containing one-hundred and eleven acres well stored with fish and fowl, which at pleasure is to be let round about the castle.

In timber and woods upon this ground, to the value as hath been offered, of twenty thousand pounds, having a convenient time to remove them, which to his Majesty, in the survey, are but valued at eleven-thousand seven-hundred twenty-two pounds, which proportion, in a like measure, is held in all the rest upon the other values to his Majesty.

The circuit of the castle, manors, parks, and chases lying round together, contain at least, nineteen or twenty miles in a pleasant country, the like both for strength, state, and pleasure, not being within the realm of England.

These lands have been survey'd by Commissioners from the King and the Lord Privy-Seal, with directions from his Lordship, to find all things under the true worth; and upon oath of jurors, as well freeholders as customary tenants, which course being held by them, are notwithstanding surveyed and returned at thirty-eight-thousand five-hundred fifty-four pounds and fifteen shillings; out of which, for Sir Robert Dudley's contempt, there is to be deducted ten-thousand pounds; and for the Lady Dudley's jointure, which is without impeachment of waste, whereby she may fell all the woods, which by the survey, amount unto eleven-thousand seven-hundred twenty-two pounds.

[D] They were shortly after released I have taken notice of this matter altogether, though there was fourteen years difference between the framing of this proposal of Sir Robert Dudley's, and the commitment of the noble persons who published it. It was written about the year 1613, and sent to King James, being chose for his retreat, upon his leaving his native country, was Florence, where he was very kindly received by Cosmo II, Great Duke of Tuscany, and, in process of time, was made Great Chamberlain to his Serene Highness's Consort, the Arch-Duchess Magdalen of Austria, sister to the Emperor Ferdinand II, with whom he was a great favourite (u). He discovered in that Court those great abilities for which he had been so much admired in England, contrived several methods of improving shipping, introduced new manufactures, excited the Merchants to extend their foreign commerce, and by other services of still greater importance, obtained so high a reputation, that, at the desire of the Archduchess, the Emperor Ferdinand beforementioned, by his letters-patents, dated at Vienna, March the 9th, 1620, created him a Duke of the Holy Roman Empire (w), upon which he assumed his grand-father's title of Northumberland, and ten years after got himself enrolled by Pope Urban VIII, amongst the Roman nobility (x). Under the reign of the Grand Duke Ferdinand II, he became still more famous, on account of that great project which he formed, of draining a vast tract of morasses between Pisa and the sea, and raising Livorno, or Leghorn, which was then, though an ancient, yet a mean and pitiful place, into a large and beautiful town, improving the haven by a mole, which rendered it both safe and commodious; and having engaged his Serene Highness to declare it scala franca, or a free port, he, by his influence and correspondencies, drew many English merchants to settle and set up houses there (y), which was a thing of great importance to our Italian trade, and, considered in that light, was of very great service to his native country. It was not only in the Courts of Princes, that Sir Robert Dudley, by a happy application of his great talents, made himself admired, but also among the learned, to whom he was a generous patron and constant friend, and at the same time held a very high place himself in the republick of letters, as well on account of his skill in Philosophy, Chemistry, and Physick, as his perfect acquaintance with all the branches of the Mathematicks, and the means of applying them for the service and benefit of mankind; of all which, he has left abundant evidence in his excellent writings (z) [E]. In gratitude to his merit, and being in all respects, as singular and as dangerous a paper as ever fell from the pen of man, for which reason, I shall not transcribe any part of it here, but refer the reader in the margin, to the paper itself (10), which Wood supposes to have remained a manuscript; and which, considering the mischief it has done, one would have withed might have been the case. His great-grandfather's book, (was a very unlucky precedent, and this, which I take to have been a copy of it (11), suited to the times, was a paper to the full as unlucky; for though neither King James I, nor King Charles I, or their Ministers, made use of it, or intended to make use of it, yet it was turned to their prejudice, and the people were excited to abhor Statesmen, as the author of this project, who might very probably abhor it as much as they. I will give the history of it from a very able and authentick writer, the brother of that learned and worthy gentleman (12), who detected the real author of it, when it was first made the subject of public clamour. His words are these. 'It is not unworthy the notice, by what artifices they, that is the patriots in 1628, did really endeavour to make the King odious to his subjects, of which I shall only touch upon one grand imposture fobbed about by many of these chief ring leading members. And this was of a paper by them carefully and plentifully spread abroad, to discover the impertinence of Parliaments, and how by the subjects purfes, to keep the nation in a good defence against the King's enemies. And this was suggested, that the King had not only such a design on foot, but by him, or his means, this plot first took birth; whereas it was discovered by Sir David Foulis, one not ignorant of state-affairs, being thereunto several times employed by King James of blessed memory, that this paper was contrived several years before, viz. about 1613, by Sir Robert Dudley, then living at Florence, under the title of Duke of Northumberland. By which means, it seems some men would not leave any stone unturned, rather than fail of their intended ends; nor can I quit him from the same ignorance and malice, who long afterwards published it under the name of, "Strafford's Plot discovered, &c." endeavouring thereby to make him odious to the simple people, as if he had been the composer of it, and this only, because a copy of it was found in his study.'

In order to render these facts completely clear, we must not omit telling the reader who the persons were, that Whitlocke, says, were committed for the first offence (13), and against whom another writer asserts, that informations were filed by Sir Robert Heath, then

Attorney-General, in the Star-Chamber (14), viz. the Earls of Bedford, Somerset, and Clare; Sir Robert Cotton, Baronet; John Selden, and Oliver St John, Esquires; it will be likewise proper to mention, that the contrivance of salfening it upon the Earl of Strafford, was immediately after his decease, as appears from the title of the treatise expressed more at large; it ran thus, 'Strafford's Plot discovered, and the Parliament vindicated in their Justice executed upon him by the late discovery of certain propositions delivered to his Majesty by the Earl of Strafford a little before his tryal; with this inscription, Propositions for the bridling of Parliaments, and for the increasing of his Majesty's revenue, &c.'

[E] Abundant evidence in his excellent writings.] We have already spoken of the account of his voyage to the island of Trinidad, and the mouth of the river Oroonoque, to one of the islands in which it is said he gave his own name. We have also spoken of the proposition made by him in respect to Parliaments, and the increase of the revenue, either of which might sufficiently prove him a man of quick parts and solid abilities; but the work by which he is chiefly known to the learned world, and which in truth is most worthy of his general learning and great compass of knowledge, is that which follows, viz.

Del Arcano del Mare, &c. Firenze, 1630, 1646, in two volumes in folio. This work has been always so scarce, as seldom to have found a place even in the catalogues that have been published of rare books. It is full of schemes, charts, plans, and other marks of it's author's mathematical learning, but is chiefly valuable on the score of the projects that are contained therein, for the improvement of navigation and the extending of commerce. If we consider what has been since done, the work will appear less valuable; but capable judges will allow for the time in which it was wrote, and in that point of view it will appear truly admirable, as the author hints at many things that were in those days totally unknown, and of which, notwithstanding, he appears to have judged very right. There are also many things that have not as yet been executed, which might turn to the advantage of any maritime power that would be at the expence to prosecute his designs. In short, it is a singular treasury of curious and important schemes, which manifestly prove the author's high capacity for the advancement of useful knowledge, no man having ever had a stronger propensity to reduce speculations to practice than he, and the success that attended his labours in this respect, ought to derive an extraordinary degree for the support of his dignity, the Grand Duke bestowed upon him a pension of two-thousand sequins per annum; which, however, went but a little way in his expences, for he affected magnificence in all things, built a noble palace for himself and his family at Florence (a), and much adorned the castle of Carbello, three miles from that capital, which the Grand Duke gave him for a country retreat, and where he breathed his last, in the month of September, 1649 (b), in the sixty-sixth year of his age; leaving behind him, by Elizabeth his Duchess, to whom, by the Pope's dispensation he was married, a very numerous posterity, as the reader will see in the notes [F]. As for Alice, Lady Dudley, his second wife, whom he left in England; she, by the assistance of her friends and relations, secured to herself, and her daughters, the remains of that great fortune, which devolved to him in consequence of the Earl of Leicester's will, and other conveyances; and being herself a Lady of great parts, as well as distinguished piety, she had a great share in the favour of King Charles I, inasmuch, that upon her humble application to him at Oxford, setting forth the situation and state of her husband abroad, and the great losses she had sustained by resigning her jointure, upon expectancies which had been very indifferently fulfilled; that Prince was graciously pleased, by letters patents under the Great Seal of England, to give her the rank, stile, and title of a Duchess (c), during the term of her natural life; as also, the like privileges and precedences to her daughters, as if they had been Duke's daughters, with other signal testimonies of his gracious condescension and esteem. The preamble of this patent, as it is in itself a thing very extraordinary, and contains many points of history relative to this family, under the sanction of so high an authority, is placed at the bottom of the page [G]. degree of credit, to whatever he suggests as practicable; though beyond all doubt, something of the like genius must be required, in such an attempt to make use of any of his projects, which are delivered in a manner not very intelligible to vulgar understandings.

(15) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 127. We are told by Mr Wood (15), that our author wrote a physical treatise, entitled Catholicon, which was well esteemed by the Faculty, but as he had never seen it, he could say no more of it, and the very same reason must excuse us. He was the author of a very famous powder, called Pulvis Comitum Warwicensis, or, the Earl of Warwick's Powder, which shews that Dr Heylin was mistaken in affirming, that he never took that title (16), by which however it is certain he was known in Italy, before the Emperor created him a Duke. This celebrated powder is thus made, Take of Scammony, prepared with the fumes of Sulphur, two ounces; of diaphoretic Antimony, an ounce; of the Crystals of Tartar, half an ounce; make them all together into a powder. It is directed to be made different ways, both by Schroder and Zwelfer, but this is much the readiest, and what the shops are now accustomed to use; it was not at first received by the College, but is now become common in extemporaneous prescriptions, especially as a purge for children, to whom it is convenient to give, because of the smallness of the quantity requisite for a dose; it is a smart purge, and frequently given to children against worms, from five to fifteen grains; and to grown persons, from fifteen grains to half a dram. Dr Marcus Cornacchinus (17) varied this medicine a little in the proportions of the ingredients, and then published a treatise upon it, in which he recommended it as a kind of universal remedy; but notwithstanding all his pains, the original receipt has been preferred. It may not perhaps be amiss to add, since we are speaking of his inventions, that he is believed to have been the first person who broke setting-dogs (18). One might insist upon many other particulars, if the nature of this collection did not restrain us.

Duchess of Savoy, married for her second husband, the Marquis Palliotti, of Bologna, by whom she had a daughter, whose name was Adelhida (21), married to Charles, Duke of Shrewsbury, who died not many years ago, and a son who died likewise in England, in a manner suitable to his crime, but unworthy of his birth (22). These are indeed but very imperfect notices of the descents in this noble line, but they are the best that we have been able to obtain, and will serve to inform the reader of the strange vicissitudes that have happened to this great family, of which, for any thing that we know, there remains not any heir male, that is to say, descending from Edmund Dudley, father to the Duke of Northumberland; for as to the ancient house of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, though the eldest branch of it be likewise extinct as to heirs male, yet many of the younger branches still flourish, by the surname of Dudley, for Edmund Sutton, Lord Dudley, who was brother to John Dudley, had by his second wife, the widow of Sir Thomas Harrington, a son Thomas, who left behind him three sons, and as many daughters; and Richard Dudley, the eldest of these, left likewise a numerous posterity (23); Sir William Dudley, of Clapton in Northamptonshire, is from the same stock, deriving himself from Sir John Sutton (24), the first Baron of Dudley of that name.

[G] At the bottom of the page. The following copy of the preamble to the Letters-Patent, by which Alice, Lady Dudley, was created a Duchess, was transcribed from the original, in 1670, then in the hands of Lady Katherine Leveson, and collated and compared by Sir William Dugdale, Garter King at Arms; so that it affords the most authentick evidence, as well as a larger account of the principal circumstances that are briefly mentioned in the text (25).

To all Archbishops, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts, Bishops, Barons, Knights, and all other our loving subjects, to whom these our letters shall come, greeting. Whereas, in or about the beginning of the reign of our dear father, King James of famous memory, there was a suit commenced in our High-Court of Star-Chamber, against Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, and others, for pretending himself to be lawful heir to the honours and lands of the Earldoms of Warwick and Leicester, as son and heir of the body of Robert, late Earl of Leicester, lawfully begotten upon the Lady Douglas, his mother, wife to the said late Earl of Leicester, and all proceedings stayed in the Ecclesiastical-Courts, in which the said suit depended for proof of his legitimation. Yet nevertheless, did the said Court vouchsafe liberty to the said Sir Robert, to examine witnesses in the said Court of Star-Chamber, in order to the making good of his legitimacy, and divers witnesses were examined there accordingly. Lady Alice Duchess Dudley lived after this honour was conferred upon her many years, admired for her many amiable qualities, and very justly revered for that singular zeal which she expressed in doing good, a disposition, which, by extraordinary care in their education, as well as by the force of her own excellent example, she so infused into her five daughters, that, if all their works of piety and bounty were collected together, and properly set forth, they would make a very considerable volume, independent of any pænyrick they might be thought to deserve; which is a reason sufficient, that, excepting a single instance, we shall not mention those prodigious works of charity in this article, but content ourselves with referring the reader to authors that will in some measure satisfy his curiosity (d). Of these daughters, Lady Alezia Dudley dying a maiden, bequeathed her fortune of three thousand pounds to be disposed of to charitable uses, at the discretion of her mother who survived her, which Will of her's was punctually fulfilled, and many feel the effects of it at this day (e). Lady Douglas Dudley died also a maid. Lady Katherine Dudley espoused Sir Richard Leveson, Knight of the Bath. Lady Frances Dudley was the wife of Sir Gilbert Kniveton, Knight; and Lady Anne Dudley married Robert Holborn, Esq; afterwards Sir Robert Holborn, Knt. and Solicitor-General to King Charles I (f). Alice, Duchess Duddeley, as she herself spells it, departed this life January 22, 1668-9, in the ninetieth year of her age, and lies buried in the church of upon, by full testimony upon oath, partly made by the said Lady Douglas herself, and partly by divers other persons of quality and credit, who were present at the marriage with the said late Earl of Leicester, by a lawful minister, according to the form of matrimony then by law established in the Church of England, and the said Sir Robert and his mother, owned by the said late Earl of Leicester, as his lawful wife and son, as by many of the said depositions remaining upon record in our said Court, still appear, which we have caused to be perused for our better satisfaction herein. But a special order being made, that the said depositions should be sealed up, and no copies thereof taken, without leave, did cause him the said Sir Robert, to leave this our kingdom. Whereof his adversaries taking advantage, procured a special Privy-Seal to be sent unto him, commanding his return into England. Which he not obeying, because his honour and lands were denied unto him, all his lands were therefore seized on to the King our father's use. And not long afterwards, Prince Henry, our dear brother deceased, made overture to the said Sir Robert, by special instruments, to obtain his title by purchase of and in Kenilworth Castle in our county of Warwick, and his manors, parks, and chafes, belonging to the same, which upon a great under-value amounted as we are credibly informed, to about fifty-thousand pounds, but were bought by the said Prince our brother in consideration of fourteen thousand five-hundred pounds; and upon his faithful engagement, and promise of his princely favour unto the said Sir Robert, in the said cause, to restore him both in honours and fortunes. And thereupon, certain deeds were sealed in the ninth year of the reign of our said father, and fines also then were levied, settling the inheritance thereof, in the said Prince our brother, and his heirs. But the said Prince our brother departing this life, there was not above three thousand pounds, of the said sum of fourteen-thousand five hundred pounds ever paid, if any at all, to the said Sir Robert's hands; and we ourselves, as heir to the said Prince our brother, came to the possession thereof. And it appearing to our said Council, that the said Alice, Lady Dudley, wife of the said Sir Robert, had an estate of inheritance of and in the same, descendable unto her posterity, in the nineteenth year of our said dear father's reign, an Act of Parliament was passed, to enable the said Lady Alice, wife to the said Sir Robert, to alienate her estate which she had by the said Sir Robert therein, from her children by the said Sir Robert, as if she had been a feme-sole, which accordingly she did, in the nineteenth year of our said father's reign, in consideration of four-thousand pounds, and further payments yearly to be made by us to her, out of our Exchequer, and out of the said castle and lands, which have not been accordingly paid unto her by us for many years, to the damage of the said Lady Alice and her children, to a very great value. Which Sir Robert, settling himself in Italy, within the territories of the Great Duke of Tuscany, from whom he had extraordinary esteem, he was so much favoured by the Emperor Ferdinand the second, as that being a person not only eminent for his great learning and blood, but for sundry rare endowments, as was well known, he had, by letters-patents from his Imperial Majesty, the title of Duke given unto him, to be used by himself and his heirs for ever, throughout all the dominions of the sacred Empire. Which letters-patents have been perused by our late Earl Marshal and Heralds. And whereas our dear father not knowing the truth of the lawful birth of the said Sir Robert, as we piously believe, granted away the titles of the said Earldoms to others, which we now hold not fit to call in question, nor ravel into our deceased father's actions, especially they having been so long enjoyed by those families, to whom the said honours were granted, which we do not intend to alter: and yet, as we having a very deep sense of the great injuries done to the said Sir Robert Dudley, and the Lady Alice Dudley, and their children; and that we are of opinion, that, in justice and equity, the possession so taken from them, do rightly belong unto them, or full satisfaction for the same. And holding ourselves in honour and conscience obliged to make them reparation now, as far as our present ability will enable us. And also, taking into our consideration, the said great estate, which she the said Lady Alice Dudley had in Kenilworth, and sold at our desire to us, and at a very great under value, and yet not performed, or satisfied, to many thousand pounds damage. And we also casting our princely eye upon the faithful service done unto us, by Sir Richard Leveson, Knight of the Bath, who hath married the Lady Catherine, one of the daughters of the said Duke, by his said wife, by the said Lady Alice Dudley; and also, the great services which Robert Holbourne, Esq; hath done to us by his learned pen, and otherwise; which said Robert Holbourne hath married the Lady Anne, one other of the daughters of the said Duke, by his said wife, the Lady Alice Dudley: We have conceived ourselves bound in honour and conscience, to give the said Lady Alice, and her children, such honour and precedencies as is or are due to them in marriage or blood. And therefore, we do not only give and grant unto the said Lady Alice Dudley, the title of Duchess Dudley for her life in England, and other our realms and dominions, with such precedencies as she might have had, if she had lived in the dominions of the sacred Empire, as a mark of our favour unto her, and out of our prerogative royal, which we will not have drawn into dispute. But we do also farther grant unto the said Lady Katherine and Lady Anne, her daughters, the places, titles, and precedencies of the said Duke's daughters, as from the time of their said father's creation, during their respective lives, not only in England, but in all other our kingdoms and dominions, as a testimony of our princely favour and grace unto them, conceiving ourselves obliged to do much more for them, if it were in our power, in these unhappy times of distraction, &c.

[H] To her memory.] This stately monument at Stoneley, standing on the north side of the chapel, was built by Alice, Duchess Dudley herself, in her lifetime, with one below it, for her daughter Lady Alezia, who died May 23, 1621 (26). It may not be amiss in this note, to give some account of the Duchess's descent; her grandfather was Sir Thomas Leigh, Knt. Lord-Mayor of London, at the time of Queen Elizabeth's accession, who married Alice Barker, the niece of Sir Rowland Hill, a very rich merchant, who left her the greatest part of her fortune; their eldest son Sir Rowland Leigh, settled at Longborough in Gloucestershire, and inherited a great fortune from his godfather (27). Thomas, the second son, was knighted by Queen Elizabeth, and created Baronet by King James, he espoused Catherine, daughter to Sir John Spencer, of Wormleighton, Knt, ancestor to the Earls of Sunderland, and to his present Grace of Marlborough (28). Alice, Duchess Dudley, was the third daughter of this marriage; and her nephew Sir Thomas Leigh, for his steady adherence to King Charles I, in all his troubles, was created a peer of England, by the stile and title of Baron Leigh of Stoneley in the county of Warwick (29), which honours are still enjoyed by his descendant, and it may, without suspicion of flattery, be said, that the virtues of this noble family, their piety, probity, and charity, have constantly accompanied the title.

[I] At the bottom of the page.] What we have to deliver in this note, may be fully and at the same time succinctly set forth from the case of this Lady, with respect to the manor of Balsall in Warwickshire, which belonging formerly to the Knights Templars, was assigned by King Henry VIII, for the dowry of Katherine his last Queen, and the reversion granted by his son Edward VI, to his uncle the Lord-Proteſſor Somersſet; upon his attainder, the inheritance was granted by the Crown, to John, Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and upon his attainder, Queen Mary gave it to Edward Sutton, Lord Dudley, but afterwards proposing to revive the order of the Knights of St John of Jerusalem, that Lord conveyed this manor to the Crown, which put it in the power of Queen Elizabeth to grant it, as she did, by letters-patent to Sir Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester and his heirs (30); who by his deed, dated in the twenty-first year of the same Queen's reign, settled this manor and Itchington after his decease, upon Ambrose Dudley his brother, then Earl of Warwick, and the issue of his body, and for want of such issue, upon the Lady Mary Sidney, daughter to John, Duke of Northumberland, sister to both the aforesaid Earls, and wife to Sir Henry Sidney, then Lord President of Wales, for her life, and after her decease, upon Sir Philip Sidney her first son, and the issue male of his body; and for want of such, upon Sir Robert Sidney, second son to the said Lady Mary. and his issue male (31). From this entail, Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester, made his claim, he being son to Sir Robert Sidney, whose elder brother Sir Philip, died without issue, and after the death of Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick, without issue, he got into present possession of all the great estate of Robert Dudley, the old Earl of Leicester, except only what his Countess Dowager had for her jointure, of which Balsall and Itchington were part; and the favouring his title, granted him a lease of both during her life, and, he, held both after her decease, by virtue of his pretended title, by the said entail; during which he cut all the timber of Balsall heath and the demesnes, to the value of many thousand pounds. Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, revoked this deed of entail; and by his last will and testament, dated at Middleburgh in Zealand, the first of August, 1587, the year before he died, he gave this estate to Ambrose, Earl of Warwick for life, and the inheritance to Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, who obtained a decree in Chancery for the whole; but upon his retiring, the suit ceased till his death, when the Lady Katherine Leveson, and the Lady Anne Holbourn, after a long suit in Chancery, obtained Balsall and Itchington, but could not get into quiet possession thereof, till a little before the restoration of Charles II, at which time the Lady Anne Holbourn, had three parts of the estate, and the Lady Katherine Leveson a fourth part, the said Lady Holbourn, having purchased her sister the Lady Douglas's fourth part, for the sum of one-thousand pounds; and the Lady Frances Kniveton her other sister, dying without issue, it was agreed she should have her fourth part also, in consideration of the great sums of money she had expended in the law suits, the Lady Katherine Leveson having been at no charge. Which Lady Anne Holbourn in her life-time greatly repaired the church, which was in a very ruinous condition, and by her will endowed it with one-hundred pounds per annum, for the maintenance of a preaching minister for ever; but the Lord Viscount Brouncker, having a legacy of fifteen-hundred pounds, and doubting her estate would not hold out to pay her debts, charitable gifts, and legacies, 'tis supposed he persuaded her by a codicil annexed to her will, to reduce the salary from one-hundred pounds, to fifty pounds per annum. She gave also by her will, five-hundred pounds to finish the repairs of the church; and also, fifty pounds per ann, to be paid out of the rents at Itchington, for the augmentation of the church there, and many other great legacies; for the payment of which, and of her debts, her three parts of Itchington were by decree in Chancery sold to Serjeant Newdigate, and her three parts of Balsall, to the Lady Katherine Leveson, who, being thereby possessed of the whole, except what was given to the two churches, out of her pious care and charity, to the poor of Balsall, did by a codicil annexed to her will, bearing date, on or about the twenty-first of February, 1670, give and devise all the manor and lordship of Balsall, and all the rents and issues of her estate there, for the founding an hospital as near the church as conveniently might be, for twenty poor persons, being widows, and poor women not married, of good lives and conversations, to be chosen out of the poor inhabitants of the parish of Balsall; and if there should not be so many poor widows and poor women unmarried in the said parish, to be placed in the said house, that then such as should be wanting, for the time only, of such want, and no longer, should be chosen out of the poor inhabitants of Itchington, in the county of Warwick; of Trentham, in the county of Stafford, and Lilleshull, in the county of Salop, there to remain for their respective lives, except for their miscarriages they should be removed, and to have the yearly sum of eight pounds per annum, and also yearly one gown of grey cloth, with the letters K. L. in blue cloth, to be set upon the breast thereof, to be worn continually by them; and if they, or any of them, should refuse to wear the said gowns, with the letters aforesaid, then to be put out, and others elected in their rooms. That immediately after the erecting and finishing of the said house, there should be a Minister of God's word provided, who should twice every day read the scripture, and pray, either in the church of Balsall, or house, hospital, or alm-house, with the said poor persons, and instruct them for the good of their souls; for which, he should be allowed twenty pounds per annum, and that he should also teach and instruct twenty of the poorest boys of the inhabitants of Balsall and parish, until they shall be fit to be apprentices, not taking any thing from their parents. According to this devise, an hospital was built, and in the first of Queen Anne (32); it was enacted, that the said house should be made an hospital, and incorporated, and named, and called the Hospital of the Lady Katherine Leveson; that there should be for ever thereafter, eleven Governors, which should be incorporated and made one body politick, to have perpetual succession, and a common-seal, to be capable to compleat the history of this illustrious family. A family, at least as remarkable as any that have flourished in this kingdom; which has produced as great men, and as good women, as any that are mentioned in our Histories, and of which hitherto we have had but very imperfect accounts, which it is presumed will appear a sufficient reason to justify the care that has been taken of them in this work, a care, that, though it has rendered these articles very extensive, might have carried them to a far greater length, if we had not used all the precaution possible to avoid prolixity, without prejudice to that perspicuity, the want of which would have been destructive to our original design.

capable of purchasing lands, of suing and being sued; of making leases, of choosing officers and servants, and to have the power to enlarge the number of the alms-women, and the buildings, as to them shall seem meet and convenient. As also, that they should take care constantly to have the sum of one-thousand pounds out at interest, to answer and satisfy for any accident of fire, or otherwise relating to the said hospital; and, that in all meetings relating to the good government thereof, there should not be less than six Governors, and the majority of those present to be binding. Since which Act of Parliament, their stock increasing, they have enlarged the said hospital, and placed therein twenty-seven old women; and in the year 1721, made an order, that the same should be further enlarged, at which season it was expected, that in due time a new pile of building might be erected, and the number of persons enlarged to thirty-four, with an allowance of twelve pounds per annum. This pious and charitable lady, has an inscription erected to her memory, in the chapel of our Lady at Warwick, with which, in respect to the historical particulars contained therein, we will conclude this article (33). 'To the memory of Lady Katherine, late wife of Sir Richard Leveson of Trentham, in the county of Stafford, Knight of the Bath, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, which honourable Lady taking notice that these tombs of her noble ancestors being much blenished by consuming time, but more by the rude hands of impious people, were in danger of utter ruin, by the decay of this chapel, if not timely prevented, did in her life-time give fifty pounds for it's speedy repair: and by her last will and testament, bearing date the 18th of December 1673, bequeath forty pounds per annum, issuing out of her manor of Foxley, in the county of Northampton, for it's perpetual support, and preservation of these monuments in their proper state, the surplufage to be for the poor brethren of her grandfather's hospital in this borough, appointing William Dugdale, of Blythe-Hall in this county, Esquire, who represented to her the necessity of this good work, and his heirs, together, with the Mayor of Warwick for the time being, to be her trustees therein.' DUGARD (WILLIAM) a very eminent Schoolmaster in the XVIIth century, was the son of Henry Dugard a Clergyman, and born at Bromsgrave in Worcestershire in the year 1606. He had his education chiefly under Mr Henry Bright, Master of the royal school adjoining to Worcester cathedral, and Prebendary of that church, by whose good instructions he made a great progress in all kind of classical learning. At the age of sixteen, on the 13th of September 1622, he was admitted into Sidney-college in Cambridge, and put under the tuition of his uncle, Richard Dugard Bachelor of Divinity (a). In the year 1626 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Master in 1630 (b). Soon after, he was appointed Master of Stamford school in Lincolnshire; from whence, on the 27th of July 1637, he was elected, 'with one mutual consent and agreement,' Master of the free-school in Colchester (c): which he very much improved, not only in number of scholars, but also in divers useful and necessary repairs and amendments about the house (d). He resigned it the 17th of January 1642-3 (e), and on the 10th of May 1644, was chosen Head-Master of Merchant-Taylors school in London. As he was a very diligent, exact, and excellently learned man in all grammatical learning, that school greatly flourished under his care and influence (f). But for shewing, as was thought, too great an affection to the Royal Cause [A], and especially for being concerned in printing Cl. Salmassius's Defence of King Charles I [B], he was deprived of his school on the 20th of [A] But for shewing, as was thought, too great an affection to the Royal Cause.] That he was very well affected to King Charles I. and to the Royal Interest, appears from a curious register he kept of his school (1), wherein the following verses of his are entered.

On the beheading of King Charles I.

Μάρτυρ ὑπερ θεῶν πατριάρχης ἱεροῦ ὄχι ἀριστὸς
Σκηπτοῦχος ΚΑΡΟΛΟΣ μὲν ἀμειτέων χερσὶν

And on the burial of Oliver Cromwell's mother in Westminster-Abbey.

Ὅς δύο μὲν βασιλείς τε καὶ ὅλεσε τρεῖς βασιλείας.

i. e. 'Here lieth the mother of a cursed son, who has been the ruin of two Kings, and of three kingdoms.' However, it was not for these verses, as Mr Strype at first imagined (2), that he was dismissed the school, but for being concerned in printing the book mentioned above; and also Εὐχὴν βασιλέων (*).

[B] Especially for being concerned in printing Claudius Salmassius's Defence of King Charles I.] Of this, Mr Dugard has left the following memorandum in the Register-book above-mentioned. *Ad Februarii 20, 1649. of February 1649-50, and imprisoned in Newgate; his wife, and six children, turned out of doors; and a printing-press of his, which he valued at a thousand pounds, seized (g). Being soon after released, he opened, on the 15th of April 1650, a private school on Peters hill, London. But on the 25th of September, the same year, he was restored to his former station, by means of the same Council of State, who had caused him to be removed (b). There he continued with great success and credit till about the middle of the year 1661; when he was dismissed, for breaking some orders of the Company of Merchant-Tailors, having been publicly warned and admonished of it before (i). He presented a remonstrance to them upon that occasion, but to no purpose (k). Whereupon he opened a private school in Coleman-street, July 4, 1661, and by the 25th of March following, had gathered an hundred and ninety-three scholars; so great was his reputation, and the fame of his abilities (l). But he lived a very little while after; for he died in the year 1662. He gave by Will several books to Sion-College Library (m). Besides the qualifications of his mind, which made him be highly valued and esteemed; he was also an excellent Scholar, and particularly a good Orator and Poet (n). He published some few books for the use of his schools [C].

this book, he observes the danger and hurt of putting books into the hands of children indiscriminately, without selecting what is best in them, and leaving out the bad. And ascribes the corruption of manners, then too much prevailing, to the injudicious and careless use of books of all sorts. Then he affirms, that the chief regard is to be had to the morals of youth, which are not to be endangered even under pretence of the greatest learning. *Quantum enim detrimentum adolescentium animis afferant ii, qui vel hunc, vel alios id genus Authores sine rerum delectu in lucem edunt, aut legendos proponunt, nostrorum temporum perquam corrupti mores, quorum incauta lectio parens est, satis declarant. DUGDALE (WILLIAM) a most industrious and excellent Antiquary and Historian, in the XVIIth century, was the only son of John Dugdale [A] of Shustoke, near Coles-Hill in Warwickshire, Gent. by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Arthur Swynfen; a younger son of William Swynfen of Swynfen in Staffordshire (a). He was born at Shustoke the 12th of September 1605; and had his first education in grammar-learning under Mr Tho. Sibley, Curate at Nether Whitacre near his native place, till he arrived to the age of ten years and upwards; and afterwards under Mr James Cranford, in the free-school at Coventry, till he was near fifteen years old. Then returning home to his father, he received further instructions from him, especially in Law (b), and History; in all which he became soon after well versed by his own indefatigable industry. Mean time, his father being aged, and grown very infirm with a dead palsy, and desiring to see him matched in his life-time, he married, on the 17th of March 1622-3, Margery, second daughter to John Huntbach of Seawall in the parish of Bishbury in Staffordshire, Gent. As he was then but in the eighteenth year of his age, he boarded with his wife's father till the death of his own father, which happened on the 4th of July 1624. But, soon after that, he went and kept house at Fillongley in Warwickshire, where he had an estate formerly purchased by his father. In 1625 he bought the manor of Blythe in Shustoke aforementioned; and, the year following, sold his estate at Fillongley, and came to reside at Blythe-Hall. His natural inclination leading him to the study of Antiquities and History (c), he was greatly encouraged thereto by that great Antiquarian Samuel Roper, Esq; a Derbyshire Gentleman, and Barrister at Law, with whom he became acquainted about the year 1615. And having also, after his settling at Blythe-hall, read Mr William Burton's Description of Leicestershire, and being made known to him (d), he was by that learned person introduced (e) to Sir Simon Archer of Tamworth, Knt. a great lover of Antiquities; who delivered to him collections he had made out of divers ancient writings, and brought him acquainted with Sir Simon Archer of Brome-Court, and most other

[A] Was the only son of John Dugdale.] This John Dugdale was the only child of James Dugdale, of Cletherow in Lancashire, Gent. (which name and family had been of long continuance in those parts) and had his chief education in St John's College, Oxon. Where applying himself to the study of the Civil-Law, he took the degree of Master of Arts; and continuing there the space of fourteen years, was for some time Clerk of the Accompts for that College, and Steward of their Courts. During some years of his stay in that college, he was tutor to William Paulet, only son to the Lord Giles Paulet, younger son to William, the first Marquis of Winchester, of that noble family. When he left the University, resolving to settle in the country, he took liking to the woodland part of Warwickshire, where Mr Paulet had a fair estate. Selling therefore his lands in Lancashire, he gave him a large fine for a lease of the impropriate Rectory of Shustoke, during the term of sixty years, where finding the house ruinous he all new built it. Fixing himself there, and marrying his wife Elizabeth abovementioned, he had by her our author, William; and one daughter, named Mary, which became the wife of Richard Seawall, son of Henry Seawall, Alderman of Coventry (1).

other Gentlemen in Warwickshire. By their advice and encouragement he undertook a Description of that County, of which we shall give an account below. In 1638 he accompanied Sir Simon Archer to London, who introduced him to the learned Sir Henry Spelman: and, during his residence in that place, he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the most eminent Antiquarians in the nation [B]. Among the rest, Sir Christopher Hatton took great liking to him, and joined with Sir Henry Spelman in recommending him to Thomas Earl of Arundel, then Earl Marshal of England; who, on the 24th of September 1638, created him a Pursuivant at Arms Extraordinary, by the name of Blanch-Lyon, having obtained the King's warrant for that purpose. Afterwards, he was made Rouge-Croix Pursuivant in Ordinary, by virtue of his Majesty's Letters-Patent dated March 18, 1639-40, in the room of Mr Edward Walker, removed to the office of Chester-Herald. By which means, having a lodging in the Heralds-Office, with

[B] He had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the most eminent Antiquarians in the nation

Take a full account of all this in Mr Dugdale's own words. After he settled at Blythe-hall, having read the description of Leicestershire, published by Mr William Burton of Lindley in that county, (about eight miles distant from Blythe-hall) he was introduced into his acquaintance by Mr Fisher Dilke of Shustoke, a kinsman to Mr Burton, and by the said Mr Burton, into the acquaintance of Sir Simon Archer, of Tamworth in the county of Warwick, Knt. Who being much affected to Antiquities, and having made some collections out of divers ancient writings, did freely communicate to him what he had so gathered, and brought him acquainted with most of the gentlemen of note in the county; who being desirous, through his incitation, to preserve the honour of their families by some such publick work, as Mr Burton had done by those in Leicestershire, did freely communicate unto him the sight of their ancient evidences. Amongst the which he found none more knowing, and forward to encourage such a work, than Sir Simon Clarke of Bromie-Court, in the parish of Salford, who imparted to him divers things of consequence, especially the Leiger-book of the Priory of Kenilworth. Sir Simon Archer going to London with his Lady in Easter-Term, Anno 1638, much importuned Mr Dugdale to accompany him in that journey; whereunto he assenting, Sir Simon being acquainted with the learned Sir Henry Spelman, Knt (a person famous for his knowledge in Antiquities) and then near eighty years of age, brought Mr Dugdale to him: who receiving him with great humanity, and finding, upon discourse with him, and the sight of divers Collections relating to the Antiquities of Warwickshire, (which he then shewed him) that he had made some good progress in those studies, told him, That being a person so well inclined to that learning, and so good a proficient therein, he esteemed him very fit to serve the King in the Office of Arms; and that the most noble Thomas Earl of Arundel, then Earl Marshal of England, having by virtue of that office, the nomination of all such as were admitted into that society, would think it a good service to the publick, to prefer such therunto as were thus naturally qualified, and found sedulous in those studies, offering to recommend him, the said Mr Dugdale, to his Lordship for that purpose: which he did accordingly. Whereupon he was introduced unto that honourable person, first, by Sir George Gresteley of Drakelow, in the county of Derby, Bart (who was then in London,) and well known to his Lordship. Waiting some time upon Sir Henry Spelman, Sir Henry told him, That there was a Yorkshire Gentleman, one Mr Roger Dodsworth, who had taken much pains in search of Records, and other ancient memorials, relating to the Antiquities of that country, but especially as to the Monastery-foundations in the Northern parts of this realm, which work he did not a little recommend to the pains and care of some industrious and diligent searchers into Antiquities: affirming, that out of his own great affection thereto, he had in his younger years got together the transcripts of the foundation-charters of divers Monasteries in Norfolk and Suffolk (himself being a Norfolk man) much importuning Mr Dugdale to join with Mr Dodsworth in that commendable work, which by reason of his youth, and inclination to prosecute those studies, might in time be brought to some perfection. Unto which proposal Mr Dugdale readily assented, and, within few days after, casually meeting with Mr Dodsworth, at Mr Samuel Roper's chamber in Lincoln's-Inn, and communicating what they were in hand with, as to their farther progress in those studies, readily engaged themselves to each other, to endeavour the gaining of what transcripts they could obtain from any ancient Leiger-books, publick Records, original Charters, or other manuscripts of note, in order thereto; but still with this reservation, that Mr Dugdale should not neglect his collections touching the Antiquities of Warwickshire, wherein he had made a considerable progress. Being thus in London, and desirous to gain acquaintance with all persons of note, there, who stood affected to Antiquities, Mr Roper brought him to Mr Henry Lillye, an arms painter in Little-Britain, who according to that measure of learning he had gained, was not a little versed in those studies, having been employed by divers persons of honour and quality in framing their pedigrees, out of original evidences, and other warrantable authorities. Hereupon conversing some time with Mr Lillye, he there accidentally met with one Mr Richard Gascoigne, a Yorkshire Gentleman, who also stood much affected to those studies, especially as to matters of pedigree, wherein he had taken some pains for divers northern families; who having great acquaintance with Sir Christopher Hatton, of Kirby in the county of Northampton, afterwards created Lord Hatton, a person highly affected to those studies, and who had not spared for cost in gaining sundry transcripts from publick Records, Leiger-books, ancient Charters, and many choice MSS. brought Mr Dugdale to that most worthy person, by whom he was made welcome, with all expressions of kindness, and readines to further him in those his labours. In order thereunto Sir Christopher made him soon acquainted with Sir Thomas Fanshaw, his near kinsman, at that time the King's Remembrancer in the Exchequer (afterwards Lord Viscount Fanshaw) by means of which great office he had the custody of divers Leiger-books, and other manuscripts of great antiquity; specially that notab'e Record called the Red Book, as also Testa de Nevill, Kirby's Quest. Nomina Villarum, and others, to all which by his favour he had free access. Nor was he less careful to obtain the like access for him to the Records in the Tower of London, through his interest with old Mr Collet, the chief clerk at that time there under Sir John Barroughs, whom he amply rewarded with sundry gratuities, for his kindness and pains in furthering Mr Dugdale, as to his Collections from those rarities there reposed. During his stay also at London at that time, he was by the said Mr Samuel Roper, brought into the acquaintance of Sir Thomas Cotton, Bart. son to the most worthy Sir Robert Cotton, founder of that incomparable library in his house at Westminster, of most rare and choice manuscripts, whereby he had also free access thereto, and made such Collections as were of singular use to him in several volumes, which have been since made publick. By the said Mr Roper, he was also introduced into the acquaintance of Mr Scipio Squire, then one of the Vice-Chamberlains of the Exchequer, through whose kindness and favour he had access to that venerable Record, called Doomday-Book, as also to the Fines, Plea-Rol's, and sundry other things of Antiquity remaining in the Treasury (2).

with a yearly salary of twenty pounds out of the Exchequer, and perquisites, for his support; he spent that, and part of the year following, in augmenting his collections out of the records in the Tower, and other places. In summer 1641, through Sir Christopher Hatton's encouragement, he employed himself, with one Mr William Sedgwick a skilful arms-painter, in taking exact draughts of all the monuments in the Abbey Church at Westminster, St Paul's Cathedral London, and in many other Cathedral, Collegiate, Conventual; and Parochial Churches [C], wherein any tombs or monuments were to be found; to the end that the memory of them, in case of that destruction then imminent, might be preserved for future and better times. In 1642 he received orders, by warrant under the Royal Signet Manual dated June 1, to repair to his Majesty at York, according to the duty of his place. Which he accordingly did, and continued there till about the middle of July, when he received the King's command to attend Spencer Earl of Northampton Lord Lieutenant of Warwickshire (f), who was then endeavouring to secure the chief places in and near that county, and to disperse the forces assembled by the Lord Brook for the Parliament's service (g). During his attendance upon that Lord, he summoned the castle of Banbury which surrendered to his Majesty, but Warwick and Coventry refusing so to do, the persons by whom they were held, were proclaimed traitors by Mr Dugdale. He attended the King at Edge-hill battle, the 23d of October 1642 [D], and afterwards to Oxford (where on the first of November he was created Master of Arts (h)), and thence to Reading and Brentford; his Majesty intending to proceed to London. But being forced to return back to Oxford, our author continued there (i) by his Majesty's command, till the surrender of that garrison to the Parliament, June 26, 1646. And, in the mean time, was, on the 16th of April 1644, created Chester-Herald, in the room of Edward Walker, Esq; advanced to the office of Norroy. In this same year he took a journey to Worcester, and extracted out of the Registers of the Bishop, and Dean and Chapter, the like materials for his Antiquities of Warwickshire, as he had done at Litchfield. Likewise, during his long residence at Oxford, he applied himself to the search of such Antiquities, in the Bodleian and other Libraries, as he thought might any way conduce towards the furtherance of the Monasticon, designed by Mr Roger Dodsworth and himself; as also of whatsoever might relate to matter of History, touching the antient Nobility of this realm, of which he made good use in his Baronage. After the surrender of Oxford garrison, upon articles, in May 1646, Mr Dugdale having the benefit of them, repaired to London, and, for the sum of a hundred and sixty-eight pounds, compounded for his estate which had been sequestered. Then he, and Mr Dodsworth, vigorously proceeded to compleat their collections for the Monasticon, out of the Tower Records, and Cottonian Library: in which latter, Mr Dugdale sorted many bundles of original letters, and choice memorials, and caused them to be bound in eighty volumes [E]. In May 1648 he waited on the Lady Hatton to Calais, who was to meet there the Lord Hatton her husband: and when his Lordship returned to Paris, Mr Dugdale accompanied him thither, and stayed near three months in that city; where, through the favour of Mr Francis Du Chesne, he had the perusal of the collections of his learned father Andrew du Chesne (k), out of which he copied many curious things, relating to the Pories-alien in England, which were cells to great abbies in France, &c. He returned to England in August, having a safe conduct from Queen Henrietta-Maria. After which, he and Mr Dodsworth, went on compleating their collections for the Monasticon, and preparing them for the press. When they were ready, the booksellers not caring to venture upon so large and hazardous a work, Mr Dodsworth and Mr Dugdale hired sums of money, and printed at their own charge the first volume, which was published in the year 1655 [F], in folio, as were the second and third volumes afterwards.

[C] And in many other Cathedral, Collegiate, Conventual, and Parochial Churches. Particularly, those at Peterborough, Ely, Norwich, Lincoln, Newark upon Trent, Beverley, Southwell, Kingston upon Hull, York, Selby, Chester, Litchfield, Tamworth, Warwick, &c. The draughts were taken by Mr Sedgwick, then servant to Sir Christopher Hatton; but 'tis probable the inscriptions were copied by Mr Dugdale's exact pen. They were deposited in Sir Christopher Hatton's library (3).

[D] He attended the King at Edge-hill battle, on the 23d of October 1642. And about that time, committed to writing the most memorable passages in that battle, of which he had been a spectator. That the relation of all particulars relating thereto might be the better understood, he took with him, in the February following, some Gentlemen of note and a skilful surveyor, and rode to Banbury, (the Castle whereof was then his Majesty's garrison) and thence to the field of battle, which he exactly survey'd; noting where each army was drawn up, how and where the cannon on each part were placed, as also the particular graves wherein all the slain were buried: observing, from the relation of the neighbouring inhabitants, the certain number of bodies which lay interred in every grave, which in the whole did not amount to quite one-thousand, though the general report of the vulgar made them no less than five-thousand (4).

[E] In which latter (the Cottonian) Mr Dugdale sorted many bundles of original letters, and choice memorials, and caused them to be bound in eighty volumes. They were bundles of most valuable papers of state, which Sir Robert Cotton had obtained from several hands: containing the transactions between Cardinal Wolsey, and others, with several of his letters; as also of T. Cromwell afterwards Earl of Essex, Secretary Paget, Cecil Lord Burleigh, Secretary Walsingham, and others, relating as well to foreign as domestic affairs; and likewise the letters and papers of Mary Queen of Scots, John Duke of Norfolk, and other eminent persons in those times. Mr Dugdale having sorted them, caused them to be bound up with clasps, with the arms of Sir Thomas Cotton on each side of every book (5).

In the mean time, our industrious author having finished 'The Antiquities of Warwickshire, illustrated [G],' he printed that valuable work at his own charge: and for near a year and a half, whilst it was printing, continued in London, in order to correct the press himself, because the ordinary correctors were not skilled in the pedigrees. During his residence in which place, he had an opportunity of collecting materials for The History of St Paul's Cathedral in London [H], which he published in 1658, fol. Upon the restoration of King Charles II, he was, through Lord Chancellor Hyde's recommendation, advanced to the office of Norroy King of Arms, then vacant by the promotion of Sir Augmentationum; Bibliothecis, Bedleiana, Arundelliana, Cottoniana, Selbriana, Hattoniana, aliisque, digestum.* Adorned with the prospects of Abbeys, Churches, &c. After the publication of this, the printing of the second volume was put off for above five years, till the greatest part of the impression of the first was sold, in order to raise money for going on with that expensive work (6). This is the reason why the second volume was not published till the year 1661; The title of it was, Monastici Anglicani Volumen alterum. De Canonicis Regularibus, Augustinianis, Scilicet, Hospitalariis, Templariis, Gilbertinis, Premonstratensibus, & Maurinis sive Trinitarianis. Cum Appendice ad Volumen primum de Coenacis aliquot Gallicanis, Hibernicis, & Scoticis. Nec non quibusdam Anglicanis arta emissis, &c. These two volumes were collected, and totally written by Mr Dodsworth; but Mr Dugdale took great pains, in methodizing and disposing the materials, in making several indexes to the two volumes, and in correcting them at the press: for Mr Dodsworth died in August 1654, before the tenth part of the first volume was printed off (7). The third volume was published in 1673, under this title. Monastici Anglicani volumen tertium & ultimum. Addita quaedam in volumine primo, ac volumine secundo, jam pridem edita; Nec non fundationes, sive donationes, diversarum Ecclesiarum Cathedralium ac Collegatarum, continens. Ex Archiepiscopi regis, ipsius autographis, ac diversis Codic. Manuscriptis descripta. Several curious things in this volume were communicated by Mr Ant. Wood, and Sir Tho. Herbert, Baronet (8). These three volumes contain chiefly the Foundation-Charters of the Monasteries at their first erection, the Donation-Charters in after-times being purposely omitted; which are so numerous, that twenty such volumes would not contain them.

[G] The Antiquities of Warwickshire illustrated. The whole title of the book is, 'The Antiquities of Warwickshire illustrated; from Records, Leiger-Books, Manuscripts, Charters, Evidences, Tombs, and Arms: beautified with Maps, Prospects, and Portraictures, Lond. 1656 fol.' The Author gives us this account of it — 'As for the work itself, it is an Illustration of the Antiquities with which my native country (Warwickshire) hath been honoured; in accomplishing whereof, I have spent the chiefest of my time for much more than twenty years, diligently searching into the vast treasuries of publique Records, besides a multitude of Manuscripts, original Charters, and Evidences in private hands, as the margents where they are cited do manifest (9). — A second edition of this curious and useful book was published in 1730 — in two volumes, printed from a copy corrected by the author himself, and with the original copper-plates. The whole revised, augmented, and continued down to this present time; by William Thomas, D. D. sometime Rector of Exhall, in the same county. With the addition of several prospects of gentlemen's seats, churches, tombs, and new and correct maps of the county, and of the several hundreds, from an actual survey made by Henry Beighton, F. R. S. Also complete lists of the Members of Parliament and Sheriffs taken from the original Records; and an alphabetical index and blazony of the arms upon the several plates.' One fault there is in the method of this book; namely, That the parishes are not distinguished from the villages by any particular mark. The titles at the beginning of the several divisions, should therefore have been printed in different characters: as for instance, the parishes in old English letter, or in capitals; and the villages in Italic, as they are now. The name of each parish should likewise have been put at the top of the page, or pages, which contain an account of the same. — However, this is our author's master-piece (10), and allowed to be the best methodized and most accurate account that ever was wrote of this nature (11).

[H] During his residence in which place, he had an opportunity of collecting materials for The History of St Paul's Cathedral in London ] Of which he gives us himself the following account 'Meeting casually there with Mr John Reading, a Nottinghamshire Gentleman, who had formerly been Clerk of the Nisi Prius for the Midland-Circuit, and with whom before the Rebellion he was acquainted, he friendly invited Mr Dugdale to his house at Scriveners-hall, with promise to shew him some old manuscript books, original charters, and other ancient writings. Coming thither accordingly, Mr Reading brought forth five ancient manuscript books in folio, which were Leiger-books of the lands anciently given to the Cathedral of St Paul in London; and freely lent them to him, to carry into the country until the next ensuing Michaelmas Term, intimating that he should have the use of many more upon his next return to London. But in Michaelmas Term, when Mr Dugdale came to restore those books so lent, he found that Mr Reading was dead, and had constituted one Mr Williams, a Barrister at Law of the Temple, his executor. Addressing himself therefore to the said Mr Williams, and desiring a sight of the rest, he very civilly brought him to Scriveners-Hall, and there shewing him many other old manuscript-books, original charters, and very ancient writings in bags and hampers, all relating to that great Cathedral, he freely lent them to him, to carry to his own lodging, they amounting to no less than ten porters burdens.' Having them therefore thus in his private custody, and bestowing pains to sort them into order, he made extracts from them, of what he found historical in reference to that church. And to the end the memory of those noble and ancient monuments might be preserved (which were afterwards destroyed, the church being made an horse-garrison by the late rebellious usurpers) did by the help and favour of sundry worthy persons who voluntarily offered to be at the charge of those plates, in which the representations of them were cut in brass, as also the lively prospects of the whole fabrick (inside and out), accomplish the same; and having succinctly framed an historical narrative of the foundation and endowment thereof, likewise of all the chantries, and what else was most memorable therein, published it, under this title, 'The History of St Paul's Cathedral in London from its Foundation till these Times: Extracted out of original Charters, Records, Leiger-books, and other Manuscripts. Beautified with sundry Prospects of the Church, figures of Tombs and Monuments, &c.' Lond. 1658. fol. There was a Second Edition of this curious book corrected and enlarged by the author's own hand. To which is prefixed his life written by himself. Published by Edward Maynard, D. D. Rector of Boddington in Northamptonshire.' London, 1716, fol. Five of the original plates being lost, five new ones were engraved for this second edition. There are in it great additions, which were not in the former edition: particularly, a new introduction, and many additions in several places, to the quantity of some sheets in all; besides an account of the new-building of St Paul's from year to year to 1685; with a catalogue of the several benefactors, and the sums they gave towards the building of it, our author being one of the Commissioners appointed for that work: and, which is more than all the rest together, 'An Historical account of the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches of York, Rippon, South-well, Beverley, Durham, and Carlisle.'

Sir Edward Walker to that of Garter; and his patent passed the Great-Seal on the 18th of June 1660 (m). In 1662 he published 'The History of Imbanking and Draining of divers Fens and Marshes, both in Foreign Parts and in this Kingdom, and of the Improvement thereby. Extracted from Records, Manuscripts, and other authentick Testimonies: Adorned with several Maps, &c.' fol. Written at the desire of the Lord Gorges, Sir John Marsham, Bart. and others who were adventurers in that costly and laudable work, for draining the great Level, which extends itself into a considerable part of the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, Norfolk, and Suffolk. About the same time, he completed the second volume of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, and published it in 1664 [I]. As also the second part of that learned Knight's Glossary [K]. Likewise, having in his many years search into Records, &c. taken notes, as occasion offered, of the names of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers, Lord Treasurers, Justices itinerant, Justices of the King's-Bench and Common-Pleas, Barons of the Exchequer, Masters of the Rolls, King's Attorneys and Solicitors, and Serjeants at Law; he compiled out of them a book entituled Origines Juridiciales, &c [L]. which he published in 1666, fol. His next work, was, The Baronage of England [M], of which the first

[I] He completed the second volume of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, and published it in 1664.] Under this title, Concilia, Decreta, Leges, Constitutiones in re Ecclesiarum Orbis Britannici; viz. Pan-Anglica, Scotica, Hibernica, Provincialia, Dioecana: Ab introitu Normannorum, An. Dom. MLXVI. ad exitum Papam, sive ad An. Dom. MDXXXI. Accesserunt etiam alia ad rem Ecclesiasticam spectantia; uti reperiuntur in eorundem Actis, Canonibus Ecclesiasticis, Principum rescriptis, Libris impressis, antiquis Manuscriptis, Chartis, Schedis, & Monumentis veteribus. Sir Henry Spelman's name only appears in the title. And the Book is dedicated, by Charles Spelman, Sir Henry's grandson, to Gilbert Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury; who, with the Earl of Clarendon, had been the chief promoters of this work, and put Mr Dugdale upon it. 'Twas printed in a very incorrect manner; but Mr William Somner took a great deal of pains, in noting all the faults, in the margin of a copy belonging to him, which was deposited in the Library of the Church of Canterbury. What great share Mr Dugdale had in this work, will best appear from hence: That, out of two-hundred and ninety-four articles whereof that volume consists, a hundred and ninety-one are of his collecting, being those that are marked with an * in the list of the contents, at the beginning of the volume (12). The materials for it (besides those left by Sir Henry Spelman) were gathered by Mr Dugdale, out of the Archbishops and Bishops Registers, the Cottonian and other Libraries, and our ancient English Historians (13).

[K] As also the second part of that learned Knight's Glossary.] The first part was published in 1626, fol. and afterwards considerably augmented and corrected by Sir Henry. He did not live to finish the second part, but left much of it loosely written; with observations, and sundry bills of paper, pinned thereto. These Mr. Dugdale took the pains to dispose into proper order, transcribing many of those loose papers, &c. And having reviewed the first part, caused both to be printed together in 1664, (14) under this title, Glossarium Archaeologicum, continens Latino-barbara, peregrina, obsoleta, & novæ significationis vocabula. There was another Edition of it in 1687. The second part, digested by Mr Dugdale, began at the letter M. But Mr Wood observes (15), that it 'comes far short of the first.' Nay, some have asserted (16), 'that he or they who put out the second part of Sir Henry Spelman's Glossary, did not do right to his memory.' In answer to which, Dr R. Brady gives us the following account (17). 'The first part [of the Glossary] to the letter N. was published in the year 1626, the whole being then finished, and offered by Sir Henry Spelman, to Mr Bill the King's Printer, for the value of five pounds in books only: But he refusing to give him that small rate for the Copy, he ventured to print the first part of it at his own charge, and most of the books lay upon his hands till the latter end of the year 1637, when two Booksellers in St Paul's Churchyard took them off. The next year, Mr Dugdale being with Sir Henry Spelman, and telling him, that many learned men were very desirous to see the remaining part of that work, Sir Henry then told him what is here related, and produced both parts of the Glossary, the first whereof was printed, and interleaved with blank leaves, as also was the second, which was in manuscript, wherein he had added and altered much. After King Charles II's Restoration, the Earl of Clarendon then Lord Chancellor, and Dr Sheldon then Bishop of London, inquired of Mr Dugdale what was become of the remaining part of the Glossary, or whether it was ever finished? He told them it was finished, and in the hands of Mr Charles Spelman, grandchild to Sir Henry, and youngest Son to Sir John. Whereupon they desired Mr Dugdale to move him to print it; which he did: but finding that the Booksellers would give nothing for the Copy, and that he was not able to print it at his own charge, and returning this Answer to the Lord Chancellor, and Bishop of London, they contributed liberally themselves, and procuring many Subscriptions to that purpose, desired Mr Dugdale to receive the money, and deal with a Printer to perform the work: which he did, and caused it to be printed as he received it, all under the proper hand-writing of Sir Henry Spelman, without alteration or addition.' This account the Reader will be pleased to compare with the beginning of this Note, which is taken out of Sir William Dugdale's Life, written by himself. But that learned Author assures us, in the same Life (18), (11) Page xix. that the second part of the Glossary was published, without any alteration from Sir Henry's Copy, as by some hath been ignorantly furnished.'

[L] Origines Juridiciales, &c.] The whole title, is, 'Origines Juridiciales: or Historical Memorials of the English Laws, Courts of Justice, Forms of Tryal, Punishment in Cases criminal, Law-writers, Law-books, Grants and Settlements of Estates, Degree of Serjeants, Inns of Court and Chancery. Also a Chronologie of the Lord Chancellors, and Keepers of the Great Seal, Lord Treasurers, Justices Itinerant, Justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, Barons of the Exchequer, Masters of the Rolls, King's Attorneys and Solicitors, and Serjeants at Law.' The Historical Part, which was designed as an Introduction to the Chronological Tables, is divided into seventy-eight chapters. And the book is adorned with the heads of Sir John Clench, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Randolph Crew, Sir Robert Heath, Edward Earl of Clarendon to whom the Book is dedicated, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Sir John Vaughan, and Mr Selden. There are also plates of the Arms, in the windows of the Temple-Hall, and other Inns of Court, &c. The first Edition, as is said above, was in 1666; and the second in 1671. having the three last Plates more than the first, but being very full of faults. There was a pretended third Edition in 1680. but it is only the second, with a new Title-page; and a Continuation, in three leaves at the end, of the Chronology and Catalogues aforesaid. Bishop Nicolson recommends this Book, as a proper Introduction to the History of the Laws of this Kingdom (19).

of those who had their rise before the end of King Henry the Third's Reign. Deduced from publick Records, antient Historians, and other Authorities. — That of the second is the same, with this difference — Which had their rise, after the end of King Henry the Third's reign, and before the eleventh year of King Richard the Second. — And of the third — As had their rise, from the tenth year of King Richard the Second, until this present year 1676. These two last Volumes are generally bound together. What induced our Author to undertake this work, he tells us in the following words. I must ingenuously acknowledge, that I had not any thoughts of attempting this work here made publick, until (by God Almighty's disposal) attending the late King Charles the First, of blessed memory, in his garrison at Oxford, according to the duty of my place; and continuing in his service there, from the beginning of November An. 1642. until the end of June, 1646, I had both leisure and opportunity of perusing many excellent Historical Manuscripts, choicely preserved in the famous Bodleian Library, and sundry Colleges there; whence having gathered a large stock of fit materials in order to such a work, I grew encouraged to proceed farther; and thereupon, betook myself to a diligent search into those old Records in the Tower of London, Office of the Rolls, Exchequer, and sundry other publick places. Next into that incomparable Treasury of most antient and choice Manuscripts; which the late worthy Sir Robert Cotton Bart. had, in his time, happily got together: and after that, into divers other, no less estimable; which, with much charge, had been gained by the Right Honourable, the late Lord Hatton; and by his especial favour communicated to me; likewise into that elaborate collection from the Pipe-Rolls, made by Mr Roger Dodsworth, my late deceased friend, and into sundry other, whereunto my Quotations do refer: amongst which, those of Robert Glover, formerly Somerset-Herald, (most opportunely acquired from several hands, wherein they lay obscured) were not the least (20). The collecting of the materials for this work, cost the industrious Author a great part of thirty years labour (21). But, notwithstanding his great care and pains, there are many faults in it: so that the Gentlemen at the Herald's Office, dare not depend upon the generality of matter relating to pedigree therein (22). However, this most useful work did not deserve the severe censure, which a sour and ill-natured pedant (23), hath passed upon it, in his Three letters, containing remarks on some of the numberless errors and defects in Dugdale's Baronage (24). For, therein he is charged, with inaccuracy (25), want of capacity, and judgment (26), much negligence and ignorance (27), master-piece of stupidity (28), with gross and complicated blunders (29); who, as often as he has opportunities, falls into mistakes (30), and has fagotted his collections together (31). That, a very great number of inconsistencies, and contradictions are plentifully strewed through his whole book (32) &c. He owns indeed, that Dugdale is esteemed by much the best writer, who has yet made a general treatise on this subject [of the Peerage] for which he seemed aptly qualified, being very laborious and industrious, and having been furnished with a vast number of excellent materials; and favoured with opportunities of access to public Offices and Libraries, from whence a structure truly noble, and worthy of the subject, might have been raised; but having more regard to his profit than his honour, and the work being very large and tedious, he did not allow himself time to examine and compare his vouchers, nor the tasks of his several Ammanuenses (33). — He had (says he elsewhere) a greedy appetite to Antiquities, but, like the Ostrich, he swallowed whatever came in his way, unchewed, and it passed thro' him undigested. He seems to have had little Judgment in collecting, and less care and understanding in transcribing; and his manner of composing is still less excusable, as it more affects other men. His Avarice made him undertake burdens too heavy for his shoulders, and pushed him beyond his speed. His eye was so fixed on his chief end, that he overlooked the means of deserving either praise or profit. His works (I speak as to that before me) seem to have been patched up by the help of Alphabets, and from whatever occurred, which, either by himself or his illiterate Ammanuenses, was thought to the present purpose; extracts were crudely huddled together, without any regard to truth or probability, or the consistence of one part with another; which is the reason that in any fact, wherein any plurality of persons is concerned, whereby it comes to be related in several places, it is very rare if such relations are not materially different, and sometimes none true. The margin of his book, I own, I have found useful, as it directs the nearest way to better information; but his authorities there, are in general erroneously vouched, that they give no evidence to the purposes for which they are produced; so that there is no depending upon him, without examining his witnesses. In fine, his disagreeing fragments of unchewed materials are so unartfully disposed, and so coarsely laid together, that the whole heap seems to me no better than rudis indigestaque moles (34). i. e. a rude and undigested heap. — Such is the harsh and unmannerly attack of the anonymous letter-writer, upon Mr Dugdale's book now before us. — It must be owned, that there are many mistakes in the Baronage (and mistakes are indeed hardly avoidable in a work of that nature). But the industrious and learned Author, instead of being reviled, or treated with contempt, ought to be corrected with mildness, and duly esteemed, for having proceeded, at once, so far in a work, wherein very little progress had been made before he took it in hand: all other accounts of the Nobility, by Milles, Brooke, &c. being little more than bare catalogues, or at best very lean performances. — If the letter-writer had pointed out Mr Dugdale's faults and mistakes (which he had great opportunities of discovering, by his place in the Exchequer) he should at least have treated him with decency and good manners. 'Twas the least that was due to the memory of a man, who had published so many useful books: a man whose name will be remembered with veneration and honour, while that of snarling Ch. Hornby will be buried in everlasting oblivion. — It were greatly to be wished, that Gentlemen of skill and leisure, would make a thorough review of so useful a book as the Baronage; and, after having compared it with the Records and our antient Historians, &c. give a new Edition of it. No greater service could be done to the curious and inquisitive Reader, or to any one who is a lover of the English History. — Mr Wood informs us (35), that Mr Dugdale sent to him Copies of all the Tomes of this work, with an earnest desire that he would peruse, correct and add to them what he could obtain from record or other authorities: whereupon spending a whole long vacation in that matter, he drew up at least sixteen sheets of corrections, but more additions; which being sent to the Author, he remitted a good part of them to the margin of a Copy of large paper of his Baronage.

his room Garter Principal King of Arms (o). His patent for that office passed the Great-Seal April 26, 1677; and he was solemnly created Garter, the 24th of May following, at the College of Arms. The next day he received from his Majesty the honour of knight-hood, much against his will by reason of the smallness of his estate (p). But, to return to his works. In 1681 he published 'A Short View of the late Troubles in England; Briefly setting forth, Their Rise, Growth, and tragical Conclusion. As also, some Parallel thereof with the Barons-Wars in the Time of King Henry III But chiefly with that in France, called the Holy League, in the Reigns of Henry III and Henry IV, late Kings of that Realm. To which is added, A perfect Narrative of the Treaty at Uxbridge in ann. 1644.' Oxford, fol. And, 'The antient Usage in bearing of such Ensigns of Honour as are commonly called Arms (q).' With 'A true and perfect Catalogue of the Nobility of England. A true and perfect List of all the present Knights of the Garter, &c. as they now stand in St George's Chapel in Windsor-Castle, Sept. 10, 1681.' And, 'A Catalogue of the Baronets of England, from the first erection of that dignity, until the 4th of July 1681 inclusive.' Oxf. 1681, 8vo [N]. There was a second edition of it in the beginning of the year following, wherein the Catalogue of Baronets was continued to the 6th of December. The last thing he published was, 'A perfect Copy of all Summons of the Nobility to the Great Councils and Parliaments of this Realm, from the XLIX. of King Henry the IIIrd until these present Times. With Catalogues of such Noblemen as have been summoned to Parliament in right of their Wives, and of such other Noblemen as derive their Titles of Honour from the Heirs-Female from whom they are descended; and of such Noblemens eldest sons as have been summoned to Parliament by some of their Fathers Titles. Extracted from publick Records.' Lond. 1685, fol. He writ some other things, which were never published [O]. His Collections of Materials for his Antiquities of Warwickshire, and Baronage of England, all written with his own hand, being twenty-seven volumes in folio, he gave by Will to the university of Oxford; together with sixteen other volumes, some of his own hand-writing; and they are now preserved in Ashmole's Musæum. He gave likewise several books to the Office of Heralds in London, and procured many more for the same (r) [P]. At length this most industrious person contracting a great cold at Blythe-Hall, died of it in his chair, about one o'clock in the afternoon, Feb. 10, 1685-6, in the eighty-first year of his age. His body being conveyed to the parochial church of Shustoke abovementioned, was, on the 12th day of the same month, deposited in a stone coffin, lying in a little vault, which he had caused to be made under the north side of the chancel of the church there. Over that vault he had erected in his life-time an altar-tomb of free-stone; and had caused to be fixed in the wall above it, a tablet of white marble, whereon was engraved an epitaph made by himself [Q]. He had several children

[N] The antient usage in bearing of such ensigns of honour as are called arms, &c. To both the editions of this book are added, '1. An exact Alphabetical Catalogue of all the Shires, Cities, Burrough-towns, Cinque-ports in England; specifying the number of the Knights of the Shires, &c. 2. A true and perfect Catalogue of the Nobility of Scotland, &c. 3. A true and perfect Catalogue of the Nobility of Ireland, with a list of all the Shires, Cities, and Burroughs of Ireland, which make returns of Parliament, &c.' All three compiled by Charles Hatton, Esq; son of Christopher Lord Hatton (36).

[O] He writ some other things, which were never published. Particularly, 'Historical accounts of the ancient Families of Hastings Earl of Huntingdon, and Maners Duke of Rutland. And, Genealogical Tables of the Kings and ancient Nobility of England; of the Kings and principal Nobility of Scotland; and of the other Kings of Christendom, and great Families of Germany.' He made, for his own use, Indexes to most of our English Historians, viz. Matthew Paris, Matthew of Westminster, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntingdon, Ethelward, Ingulphus, Thomas of Walsingham, &c. And also, in twenty-six thin folio's, Indexes to the sixty volumes of Collections from Records by Sir John Kniveton, in the Library of the late Lord Hatton: besides those to Leland's Itinerary, and Collectanea. Our author was likewise the chief promoter of the Saxon Dictionary by Mr William Somner, printed at Oxford in 1659 (37).

(37) Life, &c. p. xxiv.

[P] He gave likewise several books to the Office of Heralds in London, and procured many more for the same. Besides his Antiquities of Warwickshire, and the rest of his printed books, he gave thereto, One large volume MS. of the Arms and Monuments in the Cathedral of York, and divers other churches in that county, lively pricked with a pen (by Mr Gregory King then his Clerk, since Rouge-Dragon Pursuivant of Arms) and the epitaphs transcribed according to the very letter of each: another MS. containing a transcript of three old visitations, which were not in the Heralds Office, viz. of Lancashire, in King Henry the VIIIth's time; Staffordshire in Queen Elizabeth's time; and Northumberland in the time of King James I. Another MS. marked L. 12. containing divers arms in colours of foreign Kings and Princes, British Kings, ancient English, Scottish, and Irish Nobility. &c. By his procurement also it was, that Tho. Povey, Esq; then one of the Masters of the Requests, gave to the said office, those MSS. containing copies and extracts from divers publick Records: and that the late Duke of Norfolk bestowed upon it, in 1678, several manuscript, as well as printed, books relating to History and Genealogy (38).

dren [R] by his wife mentioned above, which died the 18th of December 1681, aged seventy-five, after they had been married almost fifty-nine years (s). Sir William Dugdale's character is sufficiently manifest from what hath been said of him in this article. However, we shall add the character given of him by Mr Wood (t). 'Had this indefatigable person sequestered himself from worldly troubles, and totally addicted himself to his studies, and had minded the publick more than his private concerns, the world might have justly enjoyed more of his lucubrations, and those more true and accurate than such as are already published, especially those in his latter days: Yet however what he hath done is prodigious, considering the great troubles that he had endured for his loyalty, and the cumbrances of this world that he had run through; and therefore his memory ought to be venerated, and had in everlasting remembrance, for those things which he hath already published, which otherwise might have perished and been eternally buried in oblivion.'

[R] He had several children.] Both sons, and daughters. One of his daughters, named Elizabeth, was married to the famous Elias Ashmole, Esq; All his sons died young, except JOHN, who was created Master of Arts at Oxford, on the 9th of September 1661, being then chief Gentleman in the chamber of Edward Earl of Clarendon, Lord Chancellor of England (40). October 26, 1675, he was appointed Windsor-Herald upon the resignation of his brother-in-law Elias Ashmole, Esq (41); and Norroy King of Arms in the beginning of March 1685-6, about which time he was knighted by K. James II. He published 'A Catalogue of the Nobility of England, according to their respective Precedencies, as it was presented to his Majesty on New-years-day An. 1684.' To which is added 'The Blazon of their paternal Coats of Arms, and a List of the present Bishops.' Printed at London on a broad side of a large sheet of paper in 1685; and again, with additions, in 1690 (42). This Sir John Dugdale died Aug. 31, 1700.

DUPPA (a) (BRIAN) successively Bishop of Chichester, Salisbury, and Winchester, in the XVIIth century, was born at Lewisham in Kent [A] March 10, 1588-9 (b). He was educated in Westminster school in the quality of a King's scholar; and learned Hebrew of Dr Lancelot Andrews, then Dean of that church. From thence he was elected student of Christ-Church Oxon. in May 1605 (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 6, 1609 (d). In 1612 he was elected Fellow of All-Souls-college (e); and the 28th of May 1614, took the degree of Master of Arts (f). Afterwards he went into Holy Orders; and travelled abroad, particularly into France and Spain (g). In 1619 he was unanimously chosen one of the Proctors of the university; in which office he acquitted himself well, being an excellent Scholar, and a genteel and discreet person (h). On the 1st of July 1625, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity (i); at which time he was Chaplain to the Prince Palatine. He was also Chaplain to Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Dorset, by whose interest and recommendation to the King, he was appointed Dean of Christ's-Church in Oxford, June 30, 1629, and installed the 28th of November following (k). To this church and college he was a great benefactor [B]. In 1632 and 1633, he was Vice-Chancellor of the university of Oxford (l), which office he discharged with great moderation and prudence. Being constituted, in 1634, Chancellor of the church of Sarum, he was collated thereto the 19th of June (m). Soon after, he was made Chaplain to King Charles I, and appointed, in 1638 (n), Tutor to Charles Prince of Wales, and afterwards to his brother the Duke of York (o): which proved his future happiness, being then accounted by all a most excellent man. On the 19th of May 1638, he was presented to the rectory of Petworth in Sussex (p); and, about the same time, nominated to the bishoprick of Chichester. He had restitution of the temporalities the 12th of June (q), and was consecrated the 17th of the same month (r). In the year 1641, he was translated to the See of Salisbury, but received no benefit from it, on account of the ensuing confusions (s). Upon the suppression of Episcopacy, he went and waited on the King and Prince at Oxford, where he continued some time. After the surrendering of that city, he attended his Majesty (to whom he was a great favourite) in other places; particularly during his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight (*) [C]: and is said by some, to have assisted him in composing his Pourtraiture (t) [D]. 'Tis certain, the King intrusted him with matters of the greatest moment

[A] Was born at Lewisham in Kent ] Most authors affirm, that he was born at Greenwich; and so it is in his epitaph, which may have occasioned this general mistake. But the Bishop himself says in his Will, that he was born at Lewisham; of which place his father, Jeffry Duppa, was then vicar (1). Mr Wood, in his Historia & Antiquitates Univ. Oxon. rightly affirms, that it was at Lewisham; (though he says otherwise in his Athense;) And so doth likewise David Lloyd, in his Memoirs of the Lives, Actions, &c. of those noble, reverend, and excellent personages that suffered by death, sequestration, &c. in our late intestine wars (2).
[B] To this church and college he was a great benefactor.] He began wainscoting the choir, and paving the cathedral, and glazing the windows with painted glass: All which were finished by his successor,

Dr Samuel Fell (3). He also bequeathed thereto, at his death, a handsome legacy, as will be shown afterwards.
[C] Particularly during his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight ] The distressed King used to say, That his confinement was much relieved by the good Bishop's conversation (4).
[D] And is said by some to have assisted him in composing his Pourtraiture.] That is, 'Εὐχὰν βασιλεῦς. The Pourtraiture of his Sacred Majesty, in his 'solitudes and sufferings.' One author supposes (5), that Dr Gauden, the publisher of that book, 'prevailed with Bishop Duppa to give him one chapter: but is not positive in that point. However, the Bishop is 'thought by many to have been privy to the composing of it (6).'

moment and concern, especially in supplying the vacant bishopricks; and he was continued in the same trust under King Charles II, during the Usurpation (u). After the barbarous death of his gracious Master, our worthy Bishop retired to Richmond in Surrey, where he spent most of his time in great devotion and solitude till the Restoration of his royal pupil King Charles II. Then his past services and sufferings were not forgotten. For he was translated to the rich bishopric of Winchester [E], to which he was elected September 10, 1660, and confirmed the 4th of October following. He was also made

Lord Almoner (w). In the beginning of the same year, before his translation, he was appointed one of the Visitors of the university of Oxford, to put out those, who had been thrust into the places of the ejected Masters and Fellows, during the times of confusion (x). About the year 1661, he began an hospital at Richmond, which he tolerably well endowed [F]. He had designed some other works of piety and charity, but was prevented by death: for he enjoyed his new dignity little more than a year and a half. He died at Richmond March 26, 1662, aged 73 years and sixteen days (y). A few hours before he expired, King Charles II honoured him with a visit, and kneeling down by the bed side begged his blessing, which the Bishop, with one hand on his Majesty's head, and the other lifted up to Heaven, gave with a most passionate zeal (z). After his body had lain some time in state at York-House in the Strand, it was decently conveyed thence, the 24th of April following, to the abbey-church of Westminster, where it was buried on the north side of King Edward the Confessor's chapel (a). Soon after a large marble-stone was laid over his grave; and a monument, with an inscription, erected to his memory [G]. By his Will, he bequeathed several sums to charitable uses [H]. He died as he lived, honoured and beloved of all that knew him, being a person of such exemplary piety, eminent candor, humility and meekness; and of so clear a character, that he left not the least spot upon his life or function (b). Moreover, he was a man of excellent parts, a very good Preacher, and an ornament to his profession, not only by the qualifications of his mind, but also by the comeliness of his person, and gracefulness of his deportment, which rendered him worthy the service of a Court, and every way fit to stand before Princes (c). He wrote a few things, of which we shall give an account in the note [I].

[E] He was translated to the rich bishopric of Winchester.] 'To the great joy and comfort, as Mr Wood observes (7), of many Lords and Gentlemen, as well as the clergy, who all had a deep sense and memory of his prudence and piety, owing to him a lasting tribute, for his great example of virtue and godliness, &c.'

[F] About the year 1661, he began an hospital at Richmond, which he tolerably well endowed.] For the endowment of it, he purchased land in Sheperton in Middlesex, of Dr Bates, for fifteen hundred and forty pounds, which he settled for the maintenance of the poor people placed in that hospital, or almshouse; but the ground whereon that almshouse was built, not being settled at the time of his decease, by reason of the death of the person intrusted, he directed his executors, in his will, to purchase that ground, and cause it to be settled for ever according to his intent (8). This almshouse is of brick, and stands on the hill above Richmond; being the effect of a vow made by the founder, in the time of King Charles the Second's exile.—On the gate is this inscription.

'I will pay the vows which I made to God in my trouble.'

In it are ten poor widows, who are allowed twenty-pence a week a-piece, and twenty shillings to buy coals, and a gown once in two years. The minister and churchwardens are overseers of it. But the poor widows, being alms-women, are not to have any benefit from the parish, and so live in a very mean condition (9). The Bishop had a more than ordinary affection for Richmond, because he had privately resided there several years during the times of confusion, and especially because he had educated the Prince in that place (10).

[H] By his Will he bequeathed several sums to charitable uses.] Particularly, lands in Pembridge in Herefordshire, which cost 250l. settled upon an almshouse there begun by his father. Five hundred pounds directed to be paid to the Bishop of Sarum, to be bestowed upon an organ in that church, or such other use as the Bishop shall think fittest. Five hundred pounds to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church in Oxford, towards the new buildings. Two hundred pounds to be bestowed on the cathedral church of Chichester, as the Bishop, and Dean and Chapter shall think fit. And to the cathedral church at Winchester, two hundred pounds. To the poor of Lewisham in Kent, where he was born, forty pounds. To the poor of Greenwich in Kent, forty pounds. To the poor of Westrham in Suffex, twenty pounds; and twenty pounds more to provide communion-plate for that parish, if they want it, otherwise that 20l. also to the poor. To the poor of Witham in Suffex, twenty pounds. Ten pounds per ann. for ten years, to William Watts, to encourage him to continue in his studies. To ten widows of clergymen 500l. i. e. fifty pounds a-piece. To ten loyal officers that were not yet provided for, 500l. i. e. fifty pounds a-piece. To All Souls College, Oxon. two hundred pounds. By a codicil he gave three hundred pounds to the repair of St Paul's cathedral in London, and, in several sums, to private friends and servants, above three thousand pounds, — &c. (11). So that the character given of him by Bishop Burnet (12), is neither kind, nor just. 'He had been, says he, the King's tutor, though no way fit for that post, but he was a meek and humble man, and much loved for the sweetness of his temper; and would have been more esteemed, if he had died before the Restoration, for he made not the use of the great wealth that flowed in upon him, that was expelled.' It must be remembered, that Bishop Burnet seldom or never speaks well of any of his order.

[I] He wrote a few things, &c.] Namely, 1. 'The Soul's Soliloquie, and Conference with Conscience.' A Sermon before King Charles I, at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, on the 25th of October, being the monthly fast, on Psalm xlii. 5. Lond. 1648, 4to. 2. DUREL (JOHN) a learned Divine in the XVIIth century, who wrote several pieces in vindication of the Church of England, was born at St Helier's [A] in the Isle of Jersey, in the year 1625 (a). About the end of the year 1640, he was entered a Student of Merton college in Oxford; but when that city came to be garrisoned for King Charles I, and the seat of the Muses was turned into a seat of war, Mr Durel, after a stay of two years there, retired into France: and having studied for some time at Caen in Normandy, took the degree of Master of Arts, in the Sylvania college of that place, on the 8th of July 1644 (b). Then he applied himself to the study of Divinity, and assiduously pursued it above two years, at Saumur, under the famous Moses Amyrault (c) Divinity Reader in that Protestant university. In the year 1647 he returned into his native country, and continued there for some time among his relations (d). But after the reduction of that island by the Parliament-forces in 1651, having been concerned in the defence of it for the King (e), he was forced to withdraw, or rather expelled, from thence. Whereupon he withdrew to Paris, and received Episcopal Ordination in the chapel of Sir Richard Browne, Knt. then his Majesty's (f) Resident in France, from the hands of Thomas Bishop of Galloway, translated after the King's Restoration to Orkney [B]. Not finding any employment in or about Paris, he came to St Malo's; and had no sooner acquainted his friends with the condition he was in, but the Reformed Church of Caen invited him very kindly, by an express, to come and be one of their Ministers, in the absence of the most learned Samuel Bochart [C], who was going into Sweden. Not long after, the Landgrave of Hesse having written to the Ministers of Paris, to send him a Minister to preach in French at his Highness's Court, he was by them recommended to that Prince, of whom likewise he received a very kind invitation by several letters (g). But not thinking fit to accept of either of those places [D], he chose to be Chaplain to the Duke De la Force, father to the Princess of Turenne; in which station he continued above eight years (h). Upon the Restoration of King Charles II he came over to England, and was very instrumental in setting up the new Episcopal French church at the Savoy in London [E], wherein he officiated first on Sunday 14 July 1661, and continued

[A] Was born at St Helier's.] The chief town in the island; so named from Helierus, a pious hermit, martyred there: and not from Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, who never was in the island, or had any relation thereto (1). Therefore, the right name of that town is not St Hilary, as it is called by A. Wood, Camden, and many other writers, but St Helier. . .

[B] And received Episcopal Ordination — from the hands of Thomas Bishop of Galloway, &c.] Being a native of Jersey, ordained in France, and by a Scotch Bishop, that made a certain writer (2) doubt, whether he was Ecclesie Anglicanae Presbyter, a Presbyter of the Church of England, as he styles himself in his Vindication, &c. But that author showed therein both his ignorance and malice: for the inhabitants of Jersey being true and faithful members of the Church of England, any one of them that had received episcopal ordination, might justly call himself a Presbyter of the Church of England.

[C] The most learned Samuel Bochart.] Author of Canaan, Phaleg, Hierozoicon, and other excellent books, intended for the explanation of the holy Scriptures; wherein he shews a prodigious skill in the Oriental, and other languages, and a fund of good sense and exquisite judgment. He was invited about the year 1651 to Sweden, by Queen Christina.

[D] But not thinking fit to accept of either of those places.] He tells us, That 'the providence of God did not permit him to go to either of these places' whither he was invited (3), but assigns no other particular reason.

[E] And was very instrumental in setting up the new Episcopal French church at the Savoy in London.] We have a full account, in one of his books (4), of the origin and foundation of that episcopal church, which we shall give in his own words. 'About twenty years since (5) the Duke of Soubize, living near the Court, and finding it troublesome, and sometimes impossible for him, by reason of his infirmities, to go to church as far as Threadneedle-street, where the Walloons have their church, he had commonly a French sermon preached before him in his own house every Sunday. Thither the French, who live in those parts, did usually resort, to save themselves the labour and toil of going up so great a way into the city. This they found so commodious, that after the Duke was dead, they resolved to set up a French church about the Strand, and wholly to leave going to that of the city, except such men as continued to pay their usual stipend (as some there were that did) towards the maintenance of their ministers, and others sometimes upon occasion. But this notwithstanding, those of London so highly resented the erecting of that new church, that ever since they endeavoured by all means possible to pull it down. Their last assault against it, was after the Restoration of King Charles II; — when they made their addressees to his Majesty, to have the French congregation at Westminster (for so it was called, as being within the liberties thereof) broken, and forbidden ever to assemble any more; giving for reason of this their humble petition, That the said congregation was not established by any lawful authority, and that by their privilege, all those of the French language, wheresoever they lived, in either of the cities of London or Westminster, have but one only place, where they are permitted to assemble for the publick worship of God in their own tongue. They of Westminster, to keep up their congregation, presented their humble suit to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to consider, what trouble and toil it would be for them, especially such as had great families and young children, to go every Sunday to church at such a distance. The King, all things considered, found out a way to grant them both their requests; by breaking the French congregation of Westminster, according to the desire of those of the Walloons congregation of London, as being established indeed without any lawful authority; and by setting up a new church under the immediate jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, wherein divine service should be performed in French, according to the book of Common-prayer; his Majesty being pleased to provide for the maintenance of a minister, to be therein a constant preacher; and leaving it to every one's liberty to join with those of the old Walloons congregation

nued to officiate there for some years after, with great liking and applause (i). In April 1663, he was made Prebendary of North Aulton in the cathedral church of Salisbury, being then Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty (k); and, the 11th of February following, succeeded Dr Hawles in a canonry of Windsor (l). On the 1st of July 1668, he was installed into the fourth prebend of Durham (m), and had a rich donative conferred on him (n). The 28th of February 1669-70, he was actually created Doctor in Divinity (o), by virtue of the Chancellor's letters [F]. In 1677 King Charles II gave him the deanery of Windsor, vacant by the death of Dr Bruno Ryves, into which he was installed July 27 (p). He had also the great living of Witney in Oxfordshire conferred on him (q). All which preferments he obtained, partly through his own qualifications; being not only a good Scholar, but also 'a perfect Courtier, skilful in the arts of getting into the favour of great men;' and partly through his great interest with King Charles II, to whom he was personally known both in Jersey and France (r). Mr Wood thinks (s), that had he lived some years longer, he would undoubtedly have been promoted to a bishopric. He published several things [G]; and among the rest, 'I. The Liturgy of the Church of England asserted, in a Sermon, preached [in French] at the Chappel of the Savoy, before the French Congregation, which usually assembles in that place, upon the first day that divine service was there celebrated according to the Liturgy of the Church of England.' Translated into English by G. B. Doctor in Physick. Lond. 1662, 4to. II. 'A View of the Government and publick Worship of God in the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas. Wherein is shewed their Conformity and Agreement with the Church of England, as it is established by the Act of Uniformity.' Lond. 1662, 4to [H]. Exceptions having been made to this book by the Nonconformists [I], our author published, III. A Vindication of the Church of England against the unjust and impudent accusations of the Schismatics; Lond. 1669, 4to [K]. He died June 8, 1683, and was buried, the 12th day of the same month

'gation of London, or to become members of the new French church of Westminster, which was likewise permitted by his Majesty's letter, to add to that Minister, for whom his Majesty was to provide, as many others, as by them should be thought convenient, provided the said ministers be presented to the Bishop of London for the time being, to be by him instituted.'

[F] By virtue of the Chancellor's Letters Wherein, among other commendations of him, his Lordship (6), said; 'his fame was so well known to them [i. e. the University] especially for the great pains he had taken in the Church, that he could hardly propose to them any thing in his behalf, in which they would not be willing to prevent him.— Adding—that 'of his parts and learning they were better judges than himself, but had not so much experience of his loyalty, fidelity and service to his Majesty as himself, &c (7).'

[G] He published several things. Namely, besides those mentioned above, these few following. 1. Theoremata Philosophiæ rationalis, moralis, naturalis, & supernaturalis, quorum veritatem tueri conabitur in Coll. Sylvano Acad. Cadomensis, &c. 8 Jul. 1644. Cadom. 1644. 4to. They were the Theses he maintained in the University of Caen, when he took his Master of Arts degree. 2. He published, a French, and Latin, Translation of the Common-prayer-book, upon the review of it at the Restoration: 3. The whole Duty of Man, translated into French; said to be by the Doctor's Lady, but very probably with his assistance (8). 4. He intended to publish a collection of the several Liturgies of all the Protestant Churches; but never did (9).

[H] A view of the Government and publick worship of God in the Reformed Churches, &c. In this book, the learned Author puts the Controversy between the established Church of England and the Dissenters upon its right foot. For, the Presbyterians having given out, 'That the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas, were as much averse to the Government and publick Worship of God in the Church of England as themselves,' He shews, in Sect 1, the conformity of the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas with the Reformed Church of England, in these particulars. Because; those Churches that follow the Confession of Augsburg, have the same Ceremonies with the Church of England; have subordination of Pastors, and in some Bishops and Archbishops, both name and thing; set Forms of Prayers; Holy-days, and Fast-days; magnificent Churches, Organs, Surplice, Church-Ornaments, Cross in Baptism, receiving the Communion kneeling, &c. All which he confirms by quotations from authentick writers, and by letters sent to him by the Ministers of most of the Reformed Congregations in the several parts of France. In Sect II. He maintains, that in those things, in which some Reformed Churches beyond the Seas differ from the Reformed Church of England, they do not pretend they should rather conform to them, than they to her, and that they never desired the abolition of our Church-government, or of our Book of Common-prayer, but that they approve of both, and wish we may ever enjoy the benefit of both in peace and quietness.— At the end, there is an Appendix, containing, among other things, the Preface to the Agenda, or Form of Prayer used in the Churches of Poland and Lithuania. And a letter of Dr Peter Du Moulin, wherein he informs our Author, that in 1651, Archbishop Usher told him, David Blondel had concluded his Apologia pro Hieronymi sententia, (i. e. his book in favour of Presbytery) with words to this purpose. 'By all that we have said to assert the rights of the Presbytery, we do not intend to invalidate the antient and Apostolical Constitution of Episcopal Preeminence. But we believe that wheresoever it is established conformably to the antient Canons it must be carefully preserved, and wheresoever, by some heat of contention or otherwise, it hath been put down or violated, it ought to be reverently restored.' But that book having been written at the earnest request of the Assembly of Westminster, of the Scots especially, who had their Agents at Paris to strengthen their party by misinforming the Protestants of France, and winning them to their side: when these Agents saw this conclusion of Mr Blondel's manuscript, they expostulated with him very loud for marring all the good he had done in his book, and never left importuning him, till they had prevailed upon him to put out that conclusion.

[I] Exceptions having been made to this by the Nonconformists. Particularly in a book entituled, Apologia pro Ministris in Anglia (vulgo) Nonconformistis. Anno 1662. Aug. 24. Die Bartholomæo diserto, ejusdem Adversus argutiolas, putidasque calumnias, Durelli, Ellisi, aliorumque. Per Irenæum Eleutherium A. M. ex Acad. Cantab. i. e. 'An Apology for the Nonconformist Ministers in England, ejected Aug. 24. 1662. against the little subtilties and stinking calumnies of Durell, Ellis, &c.' In which Mr Durell is treated with great contempt, and called many hard names. The Author of it was Henry Hickman (10); and it was visibly printed beyond Sea.

‘ He was a person of unbiassed and fixed principles, untainted and steady loyalty, as constantly adhering to the sinking cause and interest of his Sovereign in the worst of times; who dared with an unshaken and undaunted resolution to stand up and maintain the honour and dignity of the English Church, when she was in her lowest and deplorable condition. He was very well versed also in all the controversies on foot between the Church and the Disciplinary party; the justness and reasonableness of the established constitutions of the former, no one of late years hath more plainly manifested, or with greater learning more successfully defended against its most zealous modern oppugners than he hath done, as by his works is manifest (u).’ The same author calls him elsewhere (w), ‘ the judicious and laborious advocate for the Church of England, both in word and in deed.’ Other writers have also spoken in his praise, and even his antagonist Dr Lewis Du Moulin, commends him for his civility and candour, and the smoothness and beauty of his language (x).

DYER (Sir JAMES) an eminent Lawyer, a worthy Patriot, and Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the second son of Richard Dyer, of Wymaulton in Somersetshire, Esq; in which county this worthy person was born, at his father's seat of Roundhill (a), in the beginning of the XVIth century, as there is good reason to believe, in 1511 (b). He received part of his education at Broadgate-Hall, in the university of Oxford (c), where he was entered a Gentleman-Commoner; and removed from thence without taking a degree, as being intended for the study of the Law, to the Middle-Temple, London. In that learned society he very soon became remarkable, as well for the quickness of his parts, as for his extream diligence in his profession; and after having continued for some time in the degree of Barrister, he was elected summer reader of that house, in the sixth year of the reign of King Edward VI (d). He was by the King's writ, bearing date 19th of May, 1552, called to the degree of a Serjeant at Law (e), and was also Speaker of the House of Commons, in the parliament which met the first of March the same year (f). On the 19th of October, 1553, he was, together with William Standford, made one of the Queen's Serjeants at Law (g). In this station, he assisted with the gentleman beforementioned, at the trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Knt. at the Guild-hall of London, for high-treason, April 17, 1554 (h), at which time his colleague, Serjeant Standford, behaved with great warmth and bitterness against the prisoner; but Serjeant Dyer took very little or no share in that prosecution, which certainly does honour to his memory, as that prosecution did none at all to the Crown, or to those who managed it (i). On the 8th of May, 1556, being then a Knight and Recorder of Cambridge, as well as one of the Queen's Serjeants, he was constituted one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas (k), and must therefore be the person mentioned by the Reverend Mr Strype (l), though he is strangely mistaken as to his title [A]. April the 23d, 1557, he was removed to the King's-Bench (m), and sat as a Puisne Judge there, during the remainder of Queen Mary's reign. In the beginning of that of Queen Elizabeth, viz. November the 13th, 1559, he was again made one

[A] Is strangely mistaken as to his title.] It may be easily conceived, that so wise a man, and so great a lawyer, as Sir James Dyer, should perfectly understand the constitution of the Church; and without entering at all into the violences of parties, be willing to lay hold of any opportunity of doing a thing which he thought right in itself, whatever turn things might take, or which Church soever prevailed. We are therefore, obliged to Mr Strype, for setting down, and thereby preserving, the memorial of the just and pious act done, by this learned and upright lawyer, though he seems, through some mistake, to be willing to attribute it to another of the same name; but as there was no such person, and as all the circumstances of this fact perfectly agree with our Chief Justice's character and situation, there can be no doubt that he was the man. The story, as related by Mr Strype, runs thus (1). ‘ I shall insert into this history one particular matter, which how little soever it may be thought, yet because of the strangeness and rarity of it may deserve to be recorded. It was the deappropriation of an impropriation, in the diocese of Bath and Wells; which was restored back to the Church, by Dyer, Lord Chief Justice, in the reign of King Philip and Queen Mary; and by James Dyer, and his heirs for ever, made presentative, or presentable lawfully, and by royal authority. It was the church of Staplegrove juxta Taunton. And James Dyer, Knight, and Capital Justiciar of the Bench, presented Chr. Dyring thereunto, Sept. 17, 1575, void by the death of Walter Gardiner.’

of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, but he did not long continue in that station, for Sir Anthony Brown, who presided in that court, in the reign of Queen Mary, and who had remained in that post in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, being inflexible in his adherence to the Romish Communion, it was not thought proper to leave him any longer in so high an office (n), though in all other respects, he was a most worthy person; neither indeed did himself desire it, but rather chose to serve in a less distinguished place; and therefore, on the 22d of January following, the Queen was pleased to constitute and appoint Sir James Dyer, Knt. Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas (o); and the very same day, Sir Anthony Brown was made one of the Judges of the same court, in the room of Sir James Dyer (p). In this high office, few have served with greater reputation during their lives, or left a greater character behind them, either in point of probity or sufficiency (q). In 1572, he assisted at the trial of Thomas Duke of Norfolk; and upon the Duke's desiring to have counsel allowed him, alledging it was no more than had been granted to Humphry Stafford, in the reign of Henry VII; Sir James Dyer answered, that it was true, but that it was to a point of Law, viz. whether he was legally taken out of sanctuary or not; but that as to point of fact, he neither had, nor could have, counsel, as the law stood (r). He continued in his office without the least diminution, either of his own reputation, or the Queen's favour, twenty-four years, which is longer than any who sat, either before or after (s). At length, full of years, and in the just esteem of all good men, he paid his last debt to nature, at Stowton in Huntingdonshire, where he had purchased an estate, March 24, 1581, in the seventieth year of his age, and was buried in the parish church there, on the ninth of April following (t). Of his family we shall give the reader some account in the notes [B]. He was the author of a large book of reports, printed about twenty years after his decease, and which have been highly esteemed for their succinctness and solidity. He left behind him also, some other writings, relative to his profession, of all which, the reader will meet with a more full account, at the bottom of the page [C]. By these, in conjunction with the services he rendered his country

Reports of several select matters and resolutions, of the reverend judges and sages of the law, touching and concerning many principal points, debated by them in the several reigns of the most high and potent Princes, the Kings Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth, and the Queens Mary and Elizabeth, collected and reported by that most reverend Judge, Sir James Dyer, Knt. heretofore Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; to which are now added, many thousand references to other books of the Common Law, as well antient as modern, besides a great number of cases that were never before printed, with three Tables, the first, containing the principal matters in the said book; the second, the names of all the cases reported therein; and the third, the names of the new cases added in the margin.

That learned and worthy Judge, Sir Edward Coke, gives us the following short and clear account, of the progress of Reports, and of the characters of their authors, to his own time (4). 'Right profitable also, are the antient books of the Common Laws yet extant, as Glanvil, Bracton, Britton, Fleta, Ingham, and Nova Narrationes, and those also of later times, as the old Tenures, old Natura Brevium, Littleton, Doctor and Student, Perkins, Fitzh. Nat. Br. and Stamford, of which the register Littleton, Fitzherbert, and Stamford, are most necessary, and of greatest authority and excellency; and yet the other also are not without their fruit. In reading of the cases in the books at large, which sometimes are obscure, and misprinted, if the reader, after the diligent reading of the case, shall observe how the case is abridged, in those two great abridgements of Justice Fitzherbert, and Sir Robert Brooke, it will both illustrate the case, and delight the reader; and yet neither that of Statham, nor that of the book of assizes, is to be rejected: and for pleading, the great book of Entries is of singular use and utility. To the former Reports, you may add the exquisite and elaborate commentaries at large of Master Plowden, a grave man, and singularly well learned; and the summary and fruitful observations of that famous and most reverend Judge and Sage of the Law, Sir James Dyer, Knt. late Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, and mine own simple labours: then have you fifteen books or treatises, and as many volumes of the Reports, besides the Abridgments of the Common Laws, for I speak not of the statutes and acts of parliament, whereof there be divers great volumes. And for that, it is hard for a man to report any part or branch, of any art or science, justly and truly, which he professeth not; and impossible to make a just and true relation of any thing that he understands not; I pray thee beware of Chronicle Law, reported in our Annals, for that will undoubtedly lead thee to error: for example, they say, that William the Conqueror decreed, that there should be Sheriffs in every shire, and Justices of Peace to keep the countries in quiet, and to see offenders punished; whereas the learned know, that Sheriffs were great officers, and ministers of justice, as now they are, long before the Conquest; and Justices of Peace had not their being until almost three hundred years after, viz. in the first year of Edward III. The learned and loyal Judge Jenkins, in his preface to his Reports, speaks also to this purpose (5). 'Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Sir William Stamford, Lord Broke, Lord Dyer, Sir George Croke, and Mr Edmund Plowden, all remarkably great men, have illustrated our Law by their learned writings. They who would effectually read our laws, must again and again turn over whatever is to be found concerning them, whether in printed books, or among our written records: but before they bestow their pains upon the more antient writings, because many things in them are grown obsolete, and gone into disuse; and many other points are distracted by variety of opinions; it is of importance to gentlemen, that as soon as they have acquired the rudiments of the Law, they should diligently collect and imprint on their minds, the solemn judgments and resolutions of the Judges, that they may raise their superstruc-

EDMONDES (a), EDMONDS, or EDMUNDS, (Sir THOMAS) Knt. memorable for his embassies at several Courts, was born at Plymouth in Devonshire (b), about the year 1563 (c). He was the fifth and youngest son of Thomas Edmond, Head-customer of that port, and of Fowye in Cornwall, by Joan his wife, daughter of Antony Delabere, of Shirbourn in Dorsetshire, Esq; who was third son of Henry Edmond, of New Sarum, Gent. [A], by Juliana his wife, daughter of William Brandon, of the same place (d). Where he had his education is not known. But we are informed, that he was introduced to Court by his name-fake, Sir Thomas Edmonds [B], Comptroller of the Queen's Household (e): and being initiated into public business, under that most accomplished Statesman, Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary of State (f), he was, undoubtedly through his recommendation, employed by Queen Elizabeth in several embassies. In 1592, that wise and discerning Princess, appointed him her Resident at the Court of France, or rather Agent for her affairs in relation to King Henry IV, with a salary of twenty shillings a day (g) [C]. And on the 17th of May, 1596, made him a grant of the office of Secretary to her Majesty for the French tongue, ' in consideration of his faithful and acceptable service heretofore done (h). ' Towards the end of that year he returned to England, when Sir Antony Mildmay was sent Ambassador to King Henry; but he went back again to France, in the beginning of May following, and in less than a month returned to London (i) [D]. In October 1597, he

[A] Who was third son of Henry Edmond, of New Sarum, Gent.] Sir Thomas Edmond, as the Rev. Mr Birch observes (1), was descended in a good family, different branches of which settled in several counties: but the books in the Heralds-office are so defective in his pedigree, that it is not to be traced higher than his grand-father, Henry Edmond of New Sarum, abovementioned; who had three sons, Laurence, Henry, and Thomas, and three daughters.

[B] By his name-fake, Sir Thomas Edmonds.] Ant. Wood takes Sir Thomas Edmond, who is the subject of this article, to have been the son of this Sir Thomas Edmonds, and brother to Sir Clement Edmonds, translator of Cæsar's Commentaries (2). But Mr Prince assures us (3), that they had different coats of arms, and consequently were of two distinct families.

[C] With a salary of twenty shillings a day.] But this allowance was so ill paid, or so insufficient for his subsistence, that he was obliged to represent, in most pathetic terms, his distress to the Lord-Treasurer, in a letter dated 21 Dec. 1593. Wherein, after representing how much he was indebted to one Mr Smyth's charity and pity, who had not only lent him, but also given him extraordinary credit for money; he adds, ' It is to many known the poor life I do here lead,

' under the burden of this heavy expence, far above my power to bear, protesting to your Lordship, in the faith of a Christian, such to be my present misery, as I have not the means, wherewith to put a good garment on my back, to appear in honest company; my horses the most part spoiled and spent, what by accidents, and the length of time; and generally never suffered in my poor particular, the like extremity of penury (5). ' Mr Birch observes upon that occasion, ' That complaints of Queen Elizabeth's parsimony were not at all unusual among her Ministers, both at home and abroad. And it is remarkable, that the Lord-Treasurer himself, in a letter still extant in the paper-office, written in the critical year 1588, while the Spanish Armada was expected against England, excuses himself to Sir Edward Stafford, then Ambassador in France, for not writing to him oftner, on account of her Majesty's unwillingness to be at the expence of messengers (6).

[D] And in less than a month returned to London ] The occasion of these frequent and sudden voyages, was, King Henry's requiring Queen Elizabeth, to lend 4000 men to his assistance, according to treaty: and his refusing to give up Boulogne for a caution (7).

- (k) Ib. p. 52. he was dispatched again as Agent for her Majesty to the King of France (k); and returned to England about the beginning of May 1598, where his stay was extremely short, for he was at Paris in the July following (l). But, upon Sir Henry Neville's being appointed Embassador to the French Court, he was recalled, to his great satisfaction, and arrived at London in June 1599 (m). Sir Henry Neville gave him a very great character (n), and recommended him to the Queen in the strongest terms [E]. Before the end of that year, namely, about December the 26th, he was sent to Archduke Albert, Governour of the Netherlands, with a letter of credence, and instructions to treat of a peace. The Archduke received him with great respect; but not being willing to send Commissioners to England, as the Queen desired, Mr Edmondès went to Paris, and having obtained of King Henry IV, Boulogne for the place of treaty, he returned to England, and arrived at Court on Sunday morning, February 17 (o). The 11th of March following, he embarked again for Bruffels (p); and on the 22d, had an audience of the Archduke, whom having prevailed upon to treat with the Queen, he returned home, April 9, 1600, and was received by her Majesty with great favour, and highly commended for his sufficiency in this negotiation (q). Soon after, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for the treaty of Boulogne, together with Sir Henry Neville, the Queen's Embassador in France, John Herbert, Esq; her Majesty's second Secretary, and Robert Beale, Esq; Secretary to the Council in the North; their commission being dated the 10th of May, 1600. The two last, with Mr Edmondès, left London the 12th of that Month, and arrived at Boulogne the 16th, as Sir Henry Neville did the same day from Paris. But after the Commissioners had been above three months upon the place, they parted, July the 28th, without ever assembling, by reason of a dispute about precedence between England and Spain (r). Mr Edmondès, not long after his return, was appointed one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council: and, in the end of June, 1601, was sent to the French King, to complain of the many acts of injustice committed by his subjects against the English merchants. He soon after returned to England; but, towards the end of August, went again, and waited upon King Henry IV, then at Calais; to whom he proposed some measures, both for the relief of Ostend, then besieged by the Spaniards, and for an offensive alliance against Spain (s). After his return to England, he was appointed one of the Commissioners, for settling with the two French Embassadors, the depredations between England and France, and preventing them for the future (t). The 20th of May, 1603, he was knighted by King James I; and, upon the conclusion of the peace with Spain, on the 18th of August, 1604, was appointed Embassador to the Archduke at Bruffels (u). He set out for that place the 19th of April, 1605 (w); having first obtained a reversionary grant of the office of Clerk of the Crown (x). And, though absent, was chosen one of the Representatives for the Burgh of Wilton, in the parliament which was to have met at Westminster, Nov. 5, 1605, but was prevented by the discovery of the Gun-powder-plot (y) [F]. During his embassy, he promoted, to the utmost of his power, an accommodation between the King of Spain and the States-General of the United Provinces (z) [G]. He was recalled in 1609, and came back to England about the end of August, or the beginning of September (a). In April 1610, he was employed as one of the Assistant-Commissioners, to conclude a defensive league with the Crown of France (b). And having been designed, ever since the year 1608, to be sent Embassador into that kingdom [H], he was dispatched thither in all

[F] But was prevented by the discovery of the Gun-powder-plot. Sir Thomas sent to our Ministry several notices about that plot, which he learned at Bruffels; and, among the rest, That the English regiment, in the service of the Archduke, was to be brought over to England, for seconding the enterprizes of the conspirators, after the execution of that hellish design (9).

(9) See View of the Negotiat. &c. as above, p. 248 — 255, 257.

[G] During his embassy, he promoted an accommodation between the King of Spain, and the States-General. It appears from some of his dispatches, that Prince Maurice was extremely averse to an accommodation; and used all the efforts imaginable, to persuade Henry IV, to prevent the success of the treaty about the truce. And, while it was negotiating, he was of a very craving humour: for, not satisfied with the large treatments granted by the States, nor contented with the restitution from the Archdukes of all the Prince of Orange's land in Burgundy, and the Netherlands; he further demanded satisfaction for certain pretensions, grounded upon grants to his father from the States of Brabant and Flanders, which carried with them no shew of equity (10). In his conduct he appeared to have been of a very warm temper; apt to fly out upon contradiction, and embrace hasty resolutions, from which he was afterwards obliged to recede, in a manner that did him no credit (11).

[H] And having been designed, ever since the year 1608, to be sent Embassador into that kingdom. His abilities, integrity, and faithfulness in his master's and country's service, were such a terror to the French Court, that they endeavoured to prevent his coming, and to have another appointed. For Mr de Puisieux, one of their Prime-Ministers, takes notice, in a letter to their Embassador in England, that they would get nothing, by having him in the room of Sir George Carew, since Sir Thomas Edmondès understood them too well. ' If he should be sent, adds Mr de Puisieux, it is only with a design to make a fuller discovery of our affairs. We cannot, nor ought to oppose openly, the appointment of him; but who ever can underhand divert this stroke, would, in my opinion, do a good service.' And Secretary de Villeroy, in a letter to the abovementioned Embassador, has these words, ' Let me know, — whether there is a means of procuring Sir Thomas Edmondès

all haste, in May 1610, upon the news of the execrable murder of King Henry IV, in order to learn the state of affairs there (c). He arrived at Paris, May the 24th, where he was very civilly received [I], and on the 27th of June, had his audience of Mary de Medicis, Queen Regent; the young King [Lewis XIII] being present (d). In November following, he caused an Italian to be apprehended at Paris, for having ill designs against his master, King James I (e) [K]. There being, in 1612, a competition between him and the Spanish Ambassador, about precedency (f), we are told, that he went to Rome privately, and fetched a certificate out of the Pope's Ceremonial, shewing that the King of England is to precede the King of Castile (g). He was employed, the same year, in treating of a marriage between Henry Prince of Wales, and the Princess Christine, sister to Lewis XIII, King of France; but the death of that Prince, on the 6th of November, 1612, put an end to this negotiation (h). And yet, on the ninth day of the same month, orders were sent him, to propose a marriage between the said Princess and our Prince Charles: however, he had more discretion than to open such an affair so soon after the brother's death (i) [L]. About the end of December 1613, Sir Thomas desired leave to return to England, but was denied till he should have received the final resolution of the Court of France, about the treaty of marriage; which having obtained, he came to England towards the end of January, 1613-14. Though the Privy-Council strenuously opposed this match, because they had not sooner been made acquainted with so important an affair; yet so zealous was the King for it, that he sent Sir Thomas again to Paris, with instructions, dated July 20, 1614, for bringing it to a conclusion. But, after all, it appeared that the Court of France were not sincere in this affair, and only proposed it to amuse the Protestants in general (k). In 1616, Sir Thomas assisted at the conference at Loudun, between the Protestants and the opposite party; and, by his journey to Rochelle, disposed the Protestants to accept of the terms offered them, and was of great use in settling the Pacification (l). About the end of October, in the same year, he was ordered to England; not to quit his charge, but after he should have kissed the King's hand, and received such honour as his Majesty was resolved to confer upon him, in acknowledgment of his long, painful, and faithful services, then to go and resume his charge; and continue in France, till the affairs of that kingdom, which then hung in a slippery and uncertain state, should be better established. Accordingly, he came over to England in December; and on the 21st of that month, was made Comptroller of the King's Household; and the next day sworn a Privy-Counsellor. He returned to the Court of France in April 1617; but took his leave of it towards the latter end of the same year. And on the 19th of January, 1617-18, was advanced to the place of Treasurer of the Household (m): which was all the preferment he enjoyed, tho' he deserved the post of Secretary of State, that he had been recommended for (n), and which none was better qualified to discharge. He was elected one of the Burgesses for the University of Oxford, in the first parliament of King Charles I, which met June 18, 1625, and was also returned for the same, in the next parliament, which assembled at Westminster the 26th of February following; but his election being declared void (o), he was chosen for another place. Some of the Speeches he made in this parliament, are printed [M]. On to be employed elsewhere; which would be a great relief to the Queen.—— However, I am not of opinion that you should make this proposal; for, if it does not succeed, it will only serve to exasperate this little man, who has spirit and courage enough (12).

[I] Where he was very civilly received] Tho' his person was not very agreeable to the French Court, as is manifest from the last note, yet his coming at that juncture was well taken. For, the next day after his arrival, he was visited by the Master of the Ceremonies, from the young King and the Queen Regent, to bid him welcome, and to make their acknowledgements to King James for that kind office of sending thither his Ambassador. Sir Thomas was the first in the performance of his office to the new King, for which he received many congratulations, and was visited with great affection by all the foreign Ministers at Paris, especially those who were professed friends to Great Britain (13).

[K] He caused an Italian to be apprehended—— for having ill designs against King James I.] The fellow had maintained several times, that if he had killed the King of England, he would think himself absolved of all his sins: and added, that he had a purpose shortly to go into England (14).

[L] However he had more discretion than to open such an affair so soon.] And when he excused himself to our Court for that omission, King James approved of his conduct in that point; as appears from a letter of his Majesty, dated December 11, to Sir Thomas: wherein are these words.—— Wee do very well allow of your carriage thairin, as fully agreeing with our meaning in our former direction, though peradventure sum words thairin might cause it to be mistaken. For it had been a very blunt thing in us, that you, our Minister, should, so soone after such a irreparable losse received by us, have begunne to talk of mariage, the most contrary thing that could be to death and funeralls. But because wee doubted not, that that motion would be renewed againe unto you, if not by Villeroy, at least by the Duke of Buillon, our meaning was thairfor, that you should intertayn the motione (15).

[M] Some of the Speeches he made in this Parliament are printed.] The first was on the 22d of March 1627. when he spoke to this effect. 'The King congratulating this present Parliament, he prays for a blessed supply, he assures us of his gracious inclination towards us, and of the consequence of this meeting, doth intimate how much the safety of ourselves and confederates abroad depends upon the good success thereof; and he wisheth a general oblivion of things that are past, least they cause distractions a-new, without a primary and free supply to his Majesty (16).' The second was January the 28th 1628. being as follows. 'I am sorry this house hath given occasion of so many messages about tunnage and poundage, after his Majesty hath given us a full satisfaction. You may perceive his Majesty is sensible of the neglect of his business; we that know this, should not discharge our duties to you, if we should not persuade you to that course, which should procure his Majesties good opinion of you. the 11th of June, 1629, he was commissioned to go Embassador to the French Court, on purpose to carry King Charles's ratification, and to receive Lewis the Thirteenth's oath, for the performance of the treaty of peace, then newly concluded between England and France: which he did in September following (p). And with this honourable commission, he concluded all his foreign employments. Having, after this, enjoyed a creditable and peaceful retreat for about ten years, he departed this life, Sept. 20, 1639 (q). His Lady was Magdalene, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir John Wood, Knt. Clerk of the Signet, by whom he had one son, and three daughters [N]. She died at Paris, December 31, 1614, with a character amiable and exemplary in all respects. Sir Thomas had with her the manor of Albins, in the parishes of Stapleford-Abbot, and Navestoke in Essex, where Inigo Jones built for him a mansion-house, delightfully situated in a park, now the seat of Sir John Abdy, Bart. (r). As to his person, Sir Thomas was small of stature (s), but great in understanding. He was a man of uncommon sagacity, and indefatigable industry, in his employments abroad; always attentive to the motions of the Courts where he resided, and punctual and exact in reporting them to his own [O]: of a firm and unshaken resolution in the discharge of his duty, beyond the influence of terror, flattery, or corruption. The French Court, in particular, dreaded his experience and abilities, as hath been shewn above; and the Popish and Spanish party there could scarce disguise their hatred of so zealous a supporter of the Protestant interest in that kingdom. His letters and papers, in twelve volumes in folio, were once in the possession of Secretary Thurloe, and afterwards of the Lord Chancellor Somers [P]. The style of them is clear, strong, and masculine, and entirely free from the pedantry and puerilities, which infected the most applauded writers of that age, namely, Lord Bacon, Sir Henry Wotton, Dr Donne, &c. (t).

' selves are witnesses how industrious his Majesty was to procure you gracious Laws in his Father's time, and, since that, what enlargement he hath made of our Liberties (*), and yet still we give him cause to repent him of the good he hath done. Consider how dangerous it is to alienate his Majesty's heart from Parliaments (17). David Loyd tells us (18), alluding in all likelyhood to these speeches, that Sir Thomas angered the faction against the Court, with his principles, that the King was to be trusted: that the revenue was to be settled: that the Protestant cause was to be maintained: that jealousies were to be removed, and things past were to be forgotten.— Besides these two speeches, there are several letters of his published, in the three Volumes of Memorials of Affairs of State (19).

[N] By whom he had one Son, and three Daughters.] The Son named Henry, was born in 1600, and died in 1635, being sunk into the most inveterate and incorrigible habit of drunkenness (20). He was Knight of the Bath (21). The Daughters were, Isabella, born at Brussels in November 1607, who had her name from the Archduchess her Godmother, and was married about March 1624-5, to Henry Lord Delawar. 2. Mary, married to Robert Mildmay, Esq; by whom she had Benjamin Lord Fitz-walter, Father of the present Earl Fitz-walter. 3. Louisa, born at Paris in 1611, and baptized the 15th of September, Lewis XIII. standing Godfather, and the Queen-Regent Godmother, by their proxies the Princess of Orange and the Duke of Bouillon. In March 1635-6, she married clandestinely one of her father's genteeler servants (22).

[O] And punctual and exact in reporting them to his own.] Sir Robert Cecill, in some letters of his, gives this character of Sir Thomas: That he was 'very trusty and sufficient (23): That her Majesty was well pleased with his carriage in all things: and that his letters satisfied the Queen in every thing committed to his charge (24).'

EDWARDS (THOMAS) a famous Presbyterian writer in the XVIIth century, and a bitter enemy to the Independents, who then bore sway in this kingdom, was educated in Trinity-college in Cambridge [A], where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in the year 1605, and that of Master in 1609 (a). He was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, July 14, 1623 (b). Where and what, his preferments were, we do not find: But we learn from himself (c), that, though he conformed, yet he was always a Puritan in his heart [B]. He exercised his Ministry, chiefly as a Lecturer, at Hertford, and

[A] Was educated in Trinity-College in Cambridge.] He must have removed from some other College to Trinity; for he was not admitted there, according to their books, till 1605, the very year when he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (1).—There was another Thomas Edwards, born at Huntingdon, educated there in Grammar-learning, and admitted into Sidney-college, October 16, 1614. But he did not take any degree in that College (2), nor, as it seems, in the University; and consequently could not be the same with our Author. However, after all, tho' we have taken great care to inform ourselves, which of these two was the person we are writing of, yet we could come at no certainty therein. Mr Wood assures us, that he was a Cambridge-man (3).

[B] Yet he was always a Puritan in his heart.] Of which take the following account in his own words. 'I never had a canonical coat, never gave a penny to the building of Pauls, took not the canonical oath,

' declined subscription for many years before the Parliament, (though I practised the old conformity) would not give ne obulum quidem to the contributions against the Scots, but dissuaded other Ministers; much less did I yeeld to bow to the Altar, and at the name of Jesus, or administer the Lords Supper at a table turned Altarwife, or bring the people up to rails, or read the book of sports, or highly flatter the Archbishop in an epistle dedicatory to him, or put articles into the High-Commission-Court against any, but was myself put into the High-Commission-Court, and pursevants with letters missive, and an attachment, sent out to apprehend me, for preaching a Sermon at Mercers Chapel, on a Fast-day in July 1640. against the Bishops and their faction, such a free Sermon as I believe never a sectary in England durst have preached in such a place and at such a time (4).'

and at several places in and about London (d); and was sometimes brought into trouble for opposing the received Doctrines, or not complying duly with the established Church [C]. When the long Parliament declared against King Charles I, our author embarked himself, with wife, children, estate, and all that was dear to him, in the same ship with them [D], and by all his actions, sermons, prayers, praises, and discourses, earnestly promoted their interest (e). But when the Independent party began to appear, and especially to be up- permolt, he became as furious against them as he had been against the Royalists; and opposed them with great virulence, both by writing and acting. The several pieces he published against them, were as follows. I. 'Reasons against the Independant Govern- ment of particular Congregations, &c.' Lond. 1641, 4to (f). [C] And was sometimes brought into trouble, &c] He gives us the following relation of it. 'Many years ago when I was persecuted by some Prelates and their creatures, in no possibility nor capacity by my principles and practices of preferment, I preached against, and upon all occasions declared myself against, the Brownists, Separatists, Antinomians, and all errors in that way, as well as against Popish Innova- tions and Arminian Tenets. There are many who were my Auditors in those times can and will wit- ness what I have preached at London and at Hart- ford against those errors, when I have in the same places preached such sermons against the prevailing opinions, innovations, and corruptions of the Pre- lates, that many thought I should never have preached again; and indeed was not without many sufferings and troubles, being put out of places, stopped from coming into others, and at last letters missive with an attachment sent out to bring me into the High- Commission-Court. About thirteen years ago at Magnus Church, I preaching against forsaking the publick assemblies, had, on a Lecture night at the same Church, a bill given me up (among the bills to pray for the sick) speaking bitterly for so doing. At Hartford about ten years ago, when Independ- ency and the Church way began to be fallen too by some men of note, and some people to look after it, I preached against it early, and by all wayes la- boured to preserve the people. About eight yeares ago when errors on the right hand tooke with many, I did at a Lecture in the city, at Aldermanbury, and Coleman-Street, preach against apostasie and falling to errors on the right hand, and more particularly at Coleman-Street, (many in that parish being then leaning that way) gave some considerations against errors on the right hand. I never yet fought any great things for myself, great livings, or coming into publick places of honour and respect, to be of the Assembly, or to preach in any publicke places be- fore the Magistrates either at Westminster or Lon- don, but have contented my selfe with small meanes, and to preach in private places in compa- rison, having refused many great livings and places, preaching here in London for a little, and that but badly paid (as many well know) minding the worke and service, little the maintenance. I can speak it truly that in these open times when many young men, raw preachers, men who never bore the heat of the day, have got great livings of two or three hundred a yeere well situated with houses and all accommodations, I have for the publick good de- clined all such offers, spent my owne temporall estate to minister to my necessities, not having had for almost these two last years forty pounds per annum, notwithstanding my constant preaching on Lords dayes, week dayes, and all extraordinary occasions of fastings and thanksgiving. (5).

[D] When the long Parliament declared against King Charles I. our Author embarked himself in the same ship with them.] He declares this himself, in the first part of his Gangræna, in the epistle dedicatory to the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament (6). 'All my actions from the beginning of your sitting, my Sermons, Prayers, Praises, Dis- courses, Actings for you speak otherwise. [i. e. than faucines and disrespect] I am one who out of choise and judgement have imbarcked my selfe, with wife, children, estate, and all that dear to me, in the same ship with you, to sinke and perish, or to come safe to land with you, and that in the most doubtfull and difficult times, not only early in the first beginning of the war and troubles, in a malignant place among Courtiers and those who were servants and had relations to the King, Queen and their Children, pleading your cause, justifying your wars, satisfying many that scrupled: but when your af- fairs were at lowest, and the chance of war against you, and some of the grandes and favourites of these times were packing up and ready to be gone, I was then highest and most zealous for you, preach- ing, praying, stirring up the people to stand for you, by going out in person, lending of money, in the later going before them by example; and as I have been your Honours most devoted servant, so am I still yours, and you cannot easily lose me.'

[E] Antapologia, &c.] This is 'Humbly sub- mitted (by the Author) to the Honourable Houses of Parliament.' And, in the Preface, he says (7), 'That he had drawn up that answer, for their sakes in speciall who were apt to be troubled with many doubts and feares about the constitution and govern- ment of the visible Church, and the way of worship and Communion in it: and, as to undeceive them in the Apologists, the Apologie, and their Church-way, so to satisfie his Readers in their scruples and doubts about Presbyterie.' A little after, he adds, 'This Antapologia I here recommend to you for a true glasse to behold the faces of Presby- terie and Independencie in, with the beauty, order, strength of the one, and the deformity, disorder and weaknesse of the other: and good Reader, I have some reason to beleve and hope, that if you will indeed reade and consider, looke impartially and throughly into this glasse, you may be either changed into the image of it, or at least so stumbled at Inde- pendencie, as to be kept from falling into it.'

The book which this Antapologia answereth, was, 'An Apologeticall Narration of some Ministers (8), formerly in exile, now members of the Assembly of Divines.' 'Tis inserted in the Antapologia, and an- swered there paragraph by paragraph. In one place (9), our Author pleads strongly for the lawfulness of set-formes of Prayer prescribed. 'I must tell you, says he, this great controversie upon it is raised only by yourselves (10), and the Brownists, there being no Divines, nor no Reformed Churches that I know of, but doe allow the lawful use of set-formes of prayer, composed and framed by others (as by sy- rods and assemblies) and doe make use of such some- times, as the Churches of France and Holland in the administration

III. Or, A new and higher Discovery of the Errors, Heresies, Blaphemies, and insolent Proceedings of the Sectaries of these times; with some Animadversions by way of Confutation, upon many of the Errors and Heresies named [F].' In these three parts of Gangræna, he gives Catalogues of the Errors of the Independents, and other Sectaries of his time; and expresses himself against them with great sharpness [G]. He also published, VI. 'The casting down of the administration of Sacraments usually doe, and those who practise them not so much, yet at least hold them lawfull. And I challenge you in all your reading to name one Divine of note and orthodox that ever held set-formes of prayer prescribed unlawfull, excepting only Independents.' In another place (11) he lays down many cogent reasons against an universal Toleration.

[F] With some Animadversions by way of Confutation upon many of the Errors and Heresies named.] The rest of the title, which is very long, is as follows. 'As also a particular relation of many remarkable stories, speciall passages, copies of letters written by Sectaries to Sectaries, copies of letters written from godly Ministers and others, to Parliament-men, Ministers, and other well-affected persons; an extract and the substance of divers letters, all concerning the present Sects: together with ten corollaries from all the forenamed premisses. Briefe animadversions on many of the Sectaries late pamphlets, as Lilburnes and Overtons books against the House of Peeres, Mr Peters his last report of the English Warres, The Lord Mayors farewell from his Office of Maioralty, M. Goodwins thirty eight Querres upon the Ordinance against Heresies and Blaphemies, M. Burtons Conformities Deformity, M. Dells Sermon before the House of Commons; wherein the legislative and judiciall power of the House of Peeres over Commons is maintained and fully proved against the Sectaries, the power of the House of Commons clearly demonstrated to be overthrowne upon the mediums brought by the Sectaries against the Lords; the late Remonstrance of the City of London justified, the late Lord Mayor (12) and the City vindicated from unjust aspersions, our brethren of Scotland cleared from all the calumnies and reproaches cast upon them, and the Magistrates power in suppressing Heresies and Blaphemies asserted. As also some few hints and briefe observations on divers pamphlets written lately against me and some of my books, as M. Goodwins pretended reply to the Antapologie, M. Burroughs Vindication, Lanseters Lance, Gangræna playes Rex, Gangræna Chrestum, M. Saltmarshes answer to the second part of Gangræna. A justification of the manner and way of writing these books called Gangræna, wherein not onely the lawfulness, but the necessity of writing after this manner is proved by Scripture, Fathers, the most eminent Reformed Divines, Casuists, the practice and custome of all ages.' [G] In these ——— he gives Catalogues of the Errors of the Independents, and other Sectaries of his time; and expresses himself against them with great sharpness.] The Errors, Heresies, and Blaphemies he particularly takes notice of, are by him referred to these sixteen heads or sorts of Sectaries (13), viz. 1. Independents. 2. Brownists. 3. Chiliafts, or Millenaries. 4. Antinomians. 5. Anabaptists. 6. Manifestarians or Arminians. 7. Libertines. 8. Familists. 9. Enthusiasts. 10. Seekers, and Waiters. 11. Perfectists. 12. Socinians. 13. Arians. 14. Antitrinitarians. 15. Antiscrpturists. 16. Scepticks and Questionists, who question every thing in matters of Religion; namely all the Articles of Faith, and first principles of Christian Religion, holding nothing positively nor certainly, saving the doctrine of pretended liberty of conscience for all, and liberty of prophesying. — Some of their errors, as set down by our Author, are as follows, 'That the Scriptures cannot be said to be the word of God; there is no word but Christ, the Scriptures are a dead letter, and no more to be credited than the writings of men, not divine but human inventions. That the Scriptures are insufficient and uncertain, there is no certainty to build any Doctrine upon them, they are not an infallible foundation of faith (14). That the holy writings and sayings of Moses and the Prophets, of Christ and his Apostles, and the proper names, persons, and things contained therein, are Allegories, and these Allegories are the mystery and spiritual meaning of them. That the new Testament, nor no place of Scripture in it, binds any further than the Spirit for present reveals to us that such a place is the word of God (15). That God hath a hand in, and is the Author of the sinfulness of his people; that he is the Author not of those actions alone, in and with which sin is, but of the very pravity, ataxy, anomy, irregularity and sinfulness itself which is in them. That all lyes come forth from out of the mouth of God. That no man was cast into hell for any sin, but only because God would have it so. That the soul dies with the body and all things shall have an end, but God only shall remaine for ever (16). Every creature in the first estate of creation was God, and every creature is God, every creature that hath life and breath being an efflux from God, and shall return into God again, be swallowed up in him as a drop is in the ocean (17). That by Christs death, all the sins of all the men in the world, Turks, Pagans as well as Christians, committed against the morall law and first covenant, are actually pardoned and forgiven, and this is the everlasting Gospel. That no man shall perish or go to hell for any sin, but unbelief only (18). That the least truth is of more worth than Jesus Christ himself (19). That there is a perfect way in this life, not by Word, Sacraments, Prayer and other Ordinances, but by the experience of the Spirit in a mans self. That a man baptized with the Holy Ghost knows all things, even as God knows all things; which point is a deep mystery and great ocean, where there is no casting anchor, nor founding the bottome. That if a man by the Spirit knew himself to be in the state of grace, though he did commit murder or drunkenness, God did see no sin in him. There is no free-will in man either to good or evil, either in his naturall or glorified estate (20). That the morall law is of no use at all to believers, that 'tis no rule for believers to walk by, nor to examine their lives by, and that Christians are freed from the mandatory power of the law. Neither faith, nor repentance, nor humiliation, nor self-denial, nor use of ordinances, nor doing as one would be done to, are duties required of Christians, or such things as they must exercise themselves in, or they can have no part in Christ. That the doctrine of repentance is a soul-destroying doctrine. That 'tis as possible for Christ himselfe to sin, as for a Child of God to sin. That God doth not chastise any of his children for sin; and let believers sin as fast as they can, there is a fountain open for them to wash in (21). That God's Children are not to ask the pardon and forgiveness of their sins, they need not, they ought not, and 'tis no lesse than blasphemy for a childe of God to aske pardon of sins, 'tis infidelity to aske pardon of sins, and David's asking forgiveness of sin was his weakness. That the soul of a man is mortall as the soul of a beast, and dies with the body (22). There is no resurrection at all of the bodies of men after this life, nor heaven nor hell, nor devils after this life (23). That in points of Religion, even

(14) Page 28. 'even in the Articles of Faith, and principles of Religion, there's nothing certainly to be believed and built on, only that all men ought to have liberty of conscience, and liberty of prophesying (24). 'Tis as lawful to break any of the ten commandments, as to baptize an infant: yea, 'tis as lawful to commit adultery and murder, as to baptize a child. That the Church of England and the Ministry thereof is Antichristian, yea of the devill, and that 'tis absolutely sinfull and unlawfull to hear any of their Ministers preach in their Assemblies (25). That all settled certain maintenance for Ministers of the Gospel, especially that which is called Tithes, is unlawfull, Jewish, and Antichristian. That 'tis unlawfull to worship God in places consecrated, and in places where Superstition and Idolatry have been practised, as in our Churches. That there is no need of human learning, nor for reading Authors, for Preachers, but all books and learning must go down; it comes from the want of the Spirit, that men write such great volumes, and make such adoe of learning (26). 'Tis unlawfull for the Saints to joyn in prayer where wicked men are, or to pray with any of the wicked (27). That there are Revelations and Visions in these times; yea to some they are more ordinary, and shall be to the people of God generally within a while. That the gift of Miracles is not ceased in these times, but that some of the Sectaries have wrought miracles. 'Tis ordinary for Christians now in these dayes, with Paul to be wrapt up to the third Heavens, and to hear words unutterable, and they cannot well have assurance of being Christians, that have not found and had experience of this (28). All the Earth is the Saints, and there ought to be a community of goods, and the Saints should share in the lands and estates of Gentlemen and rich men. That 'tis lawfull for a man to put away his wife upon indisposition, unfitnesse, contrariety of mind, &c. 'Tis unlawfull for Christians to fight, and take up arms for their laws and civil liberties. That using of fet formes of prayer prescribed is Idolatry (29). That 'tis not lawful for a Christian to be a Magistrate, but upon turning Christian he should lay down his Magistracy (30). That God hath a bodily shape and proportion (31). The Souls of the Saints departed now in Heaven, are on Earth every where present with their friends, and with all the affairs of this world, seeing and knowing them; and do now with Christ govern and rule the Kingdoms of the Earth, and all the affairs here below (32). That there is no need of Universities, that Universities are of the devill; that human learning is flesh opposed to the spirit, and that if men be anointed with the spirit, and accepted amongst the Saints, they are sufficiently qualified (33). That all shall be saved at last, both all men and devils: and shall see, feel, and possess blessedness to their everlasting salvation and comfort (34). That Christ shed his blood for line and horses and all other creatures, as well as for men, &c (35). These, and many more, are some of the blasphemies and horrid impieties, advanced and maintained in these unhappy Kingdoms, during those lawless distracted times, when every one did what seemed right in his own eyes. And no wonder; if we do but observe, what sort of creatures set up for the great Reformers of Religion, and Instructors of Mankind; namely (to use our Author's words) 'swarms of illiterate Mechanicks, as Smiths, Taylors, Shoemakers, Pedlars, Weavers, Women-preachers, &c. (36). And, by name, 'one Heath the Collar-maker of Waton, one Rice the Tinker of Aston, one Field the Bodies-maker of Hertford, one Crew the Taylor of Stevenage,' all in Hertfordshire: and the like in other Counties (37). He quotes his authorities and vouchers all along; and affirms, that the 'truth of the maine substance and matter of whatever he relates, both for opinions and matter of fact, is plainly demonstrated; by his quoting Books knowne to hundreds, by naming persons known for witnesses, by relating things common in the times, and these supported by the errors in the margins, or joyned to the matter, so manifest that he that runs may read it (38). Nay, he makes this declaration.—— 'I can say of it, that of all the particulars in this kind that I have related in these three books [of Gangrana,] besides many matters of fact in Antapologia, (which in all amount to some thousands) I do not know of any one particular related by me, excepting one, that I have reason to suspect was not true, and yet that was written me in a letter by a reverend and godly Minister, and was the voice of the Country (39).'

(15) Page 29. But it must be remembered, that among the errors above-mentioned, our Author places many Doctrines maintained by the Arminians, (and not taken notice of by me) which, tho' condemned by the Synod of Dort, time hath shewn to be most plain and unquestionable truths.

(16) Page 30. It is not only by such Quotations out of the books of Independent writers, as are set down above, that Mr Edwards shews his great inveteracy against that whole party. But he doth it likewise by censuring their actions; and displaying, their insolencies, pride, and arrogance; their covetousness, and ambition: their subtilties, and hypocrisy; their tumults and riots even in the most sacred places (40); their libertinism and atheism; their incests, and other uncleannesses; their looseness, immorality, and drunkenness; their deceitfulness, lying, and slandering; their horrible affronts to authority (41); their contempt of all that is sacred and serious, witness their baptizing of a horse, &c. (42).——He likewise endeavours to expose them to the utmost, by relating some of their absurd and non-sensical sayings: as for instance——

(17) Page 31. 'Christ judges not by the eye, or eare, he regards not mens prayers or duties; if they have Christ in their heart, though they do not read and pray, and trade in duties, Christ judges them according to their heart (43).——'I rejoyce that Christ is beginning to set up house-keeping; and his Saints shall not want while Christ have one penny; come buy without money, gold tried and white raiment, and anoint thine eyes with eye salve that thou maiest see' (44)——One preaching on John 20. 17. 'Touch me not, I am not yet ascended; collected from those words these three transcendent points. First, That laymen, weavers, tinkers and coblers being gifted might be preachers. Secondly, Learning was not any means or help to understand the meaning of the Scriptures. Thirdly, That any chamber, barne or stable, or other place was as holy as the Church; and that there was no holiness in the temple, for God destroyed it; nor in any Church (45).'

(18) Page 32. But when he comes to speak of a Toleration, (which the Independents were then making strong interest for, in order to work themselves into all places of trust or profit,) he loses all patience. 'This land, saith he, is become already in many places a chaos, a babel, another Amsterdam, yea worse, we are beyond that, and in the highway to Munster, but if a general Toleration should be granted, so much written and stood for, England would quickly become a Sodom, an Egypt, Babylon, yea, worse than all these (46). —A Toleration is the grand designe of the devil, his master-peece, and chief engine he works by at this time to uphold his tottering kingdome; it is the most compendious, ready, sure way to destroy all religion, lay all waste, and bring in all evil; it is a most transcendent, catholique, and fundamentall evil for this kingdom of any that can be imagined. As originall sin is the most fundamentall sin, all sin; having the seed and spawn of all in it: so a Toleration hath all errors in it, and all evils—— (47). Independency is become a compound of many errors, as Antinomianism, Brownism, Anabaptism, Libertinism, and if Independency could once get a Toleration, we should then see it speak out to purpose. And as Independency is in this sense all error, being the great cause of them, so many errors are for Independency, that is the love of errors causes many to become Independents—— (48)'

(19) Page 34. One remarkable particular in these books, must not pass without observation: and it is, that as early as the year 1646, the Independents had formed designs against the life of King Charles I. and resolved to cause him to be beheaded (49).—— Finally, we learn from

EGERTON (THOMAS) Lord High Chancellor of England, in the reign of King

(a) This I infer from A. Wood's words, mentioned in the text of this article.

James I, was the son of Sir Richard Egerton of Ridley in Cheshire, descended from the antient family of the Egertons, in that county [A]. He was born in Cheshire, about the year 1540 (a), and admitted Commoner of Brasen-nose-College in Oxford, about 1556, in the seventeenth year of his age. Having continued there three years, and laid a good foundation of learning, he removed to Lincoln's-Inn, and applied himself with such success to the study of the Law; that he became a noted Counsellor (b). Being taken notice of by that good judge of merit, Queen Elizabeth, she constituted him on the 28th of June 1581, her Sollicitor-general (c). The year following, he was elected Lent-Reader of Lincoln's-Inn, a place conferred on none but persons of great learning. He became also one of the Governors of that Society, and continued so for twelve years successively (d). On the 2d of June, 1592, he was made Attorney-general (e), and knighted soon after. April 10, 1594, he was appointed Master of the Rolls (f): And, upon the death of Sir John Puckering, had the Great Seal of England delivered to him at Greenwich, May 6, 1596 (g), with the title of Lord-Keeper; being at the same time sworn of her Majesty's Privy-Council (h) [B]. He was permitted, notwithstanding, to hold the Mastership of the Rolls till May 18, 1603, when King James I, conferred it on Edward Bruce, created afterwards Baron of Kinlosse (i). In 1598, the Lord-Keeper was in commission for treating with the Dutch, in order to lessen our charge of the war with Spain; and, with the Lord Buckhurst, and others, signed a new treaty at London, with the Embassadors of the States, whereby the Queen was eased of no less than a hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year (k), besides other advantages (l). In 1600 he was again in Commission with the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst, and the Earl of Essex, for negotiating affairs with the Senate of Denmark (m). This Earl, upon his disgrace, was committed to the Lord Keeper's custody, who did him many good offices, and endeavoured to keep him from those dangerous precipices [C], which proved afterwards his ruin.

[A] Was the son of Sir Richard Egerton of Ridley in Cheshire, descended from the antient family of the Egertons in that county.] Sir William Dugdale (1), and Mr Wood (2), say, he was a natural son of Sir Richard Egerton. And Robert Stephens, Esq; that he was descended, though in an oblique line, from an antient family in Cheshire (3). But Dr Fuller (4), Arthur Collins, Esq; (5), and others, do not mention his being illegitimate. The latter informs us, That his mother was Alice, daughter of — Spark, of Bickerton in Cheshire.—The famous and knightly family of the Egertons took their surname from Egerton, in this county, the place of their habitation: and derive their descent from Philip, a younger son of David of Malpas (6). From him, in lineal descent, was Sir John Egerton of Egerton, Knt. who fighting valiantly for the House of Lancaster, under the Lord Audley, General for King Henry VI, was slain at the battle of Bloreheath in Staffordshire, Sept. 23, 1459. He was succeeded by Philip his eldest son, who had issue John Egerton of Egerton, Esq; and Sir RALPH EGERTON of RIDLEY in Cheshire, Knt. This Sir Ralph was one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber to King Henry VIII, and knighted by him for his valour and conduct at the sieges of Terouenne and Tournay, and the battle of Spurs. Also, in consideration of his good services, he was appointed Standard-Bearer of England for life, with a salary of 100 l. per annum. Dying about the year 1528, he was succeeded by his son and heir Richard, who was of age in the year 1531, and afterwards knighted; father of the Lord Chancellor Egerton, whom we are treating of in this article.

[B] He had the great Seal of England delivered to him — with the title of Lord-Keeper.] And came into that place — magna expectatione, & integritatis opinione, i. e. with a great expectation, and opinion of integrity (7): which he fully answered.

[C] Who did him many good offices, and endeavoured to keep him from those dangerous precipices, which proved afterwards his ruin.] For that purpose he writ a letter to him, wherein, among other things, he tells him. — 'I will not presume to advise you; but shoot my bolt, and tell you what I think. The beginning, and long continuance, of this so unreasonable discontentment, you have seen and proved, by which you aim at the end: if you still hold this course, which hitherto you find to be worse and worse, (and the longer you go, the further you go out of the way) there is little hope or likelihood the end will be better. You are not yet gone so far, but that you may well return: the return is safe, but the progress is dangerous and desperate in this course you hold. If you have any enemies, you do that for them, which they could never do for themselves.— This being your present state and condition, what is to be done? What is the remedy, my good Lord? I lack judgment and wisdom to advise you, but I will never want an honest true heart to wish you well; nor, being warranted by a good conscience, will fear to speak that I think. I have begun plainly, be not offended if I proceed so.—The medicine and remedy, is, not to contend and strive, but humbly to yield and submit. Have you given cause, and yet take a scandal unto you? then all you can be is too little to make satisfaction. Is cause of scandal given unto ruin (n). When he was in actual rebellion, the Lord-Keeper, and others of the Nobility, were sent to him, in order to persuade him to return to his duty, wherein they exposed themselves to much danger (o) [D]. After that Earl's execution, the Lord-Keeper was in a special commission for compounding with his accomplices: And in another, in 1602, for putting the Laws in execution against Jesuits, and seminary Priests (p). Upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, her successor King James I. signified to the Privy-Council, April 5, 1603, by his sign manual, That it was his will and pleasure, Sir Thomas Egerton should exercise the office of Lord-Keeper, till further orders. And he waiting upon his Majesty at Broxbourn in Hertfordshire, resigned the Great Seal to the King, who delivered it again to him, ordering him to make use of it as he had done before. On the 19th of July following (q), King James caused the Great Seal to be broke, and put a new one into the hands of the Lord-Keeper Egerton, with a paper of his own signing, whereby he created him Baron of Ellesmere, for his good and faithful services, not only in the administration of justice, but also in Council, both to the late Queen and himself: the Patent for which he caused to be dispatched the 21st of the same month. And on the 24th, constituted him Lord High Chancellor of England (r). In 1609, he was commissioned to compound with all those, who holding lands by Knight's service, &c. were to pay the aid for making the King's eldest son (Prince Henry) a Knight (s). On the third of November, 1610, he was unanimously elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and installed the 10th of the same month at London; in the room of Rich. Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury (t). In 1612, he was one of the Lords who signed the articles of marriage between the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of King James, and the Elector Palatine (u). His health declined some time before his decease; particularly in the year 1615, when strong application was made by Sir Francis Bacon for his office of High-Chancellor (w) [E]. And to add to his affliction, that arrogant person, the Lord Chief unto you; yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to sue, yield, and submit to our Sovereign; between whom and you there can be no equal proportion of duty, where God requires it as a principal duty and care to himself; and when it is evident, that great good may ensue of it to your friends, yourself, your country, and your Sovereign, and extreme harm by the contrary. There can be no dishonour to yield; but in denying, dishonour and impiety (8).

 — In another letter, he tells him, — 'By way of caution, take this from me; There are sharp eyes upon you, your actions, publick and private, are observed: It behooveth you, therefore, to carry yourself with all integrity and sincerity, both of hands and heart, lest you overthrow your own fortunes, and discredit your friends that are tender and careful of your reputation and well-doing (9).'

 The Queen hearing of the Earl of Essex's desperate designs, sent the Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knolles, Comptroller of the Household, and uncle to the Earl of Essex, and Lord Chief Justice Popham, to know the cause of their tumultuous meeting. The gates being shut, they were, after some stay, let in by the wicket, but all their servants kept out, except the Purse bearer with the Seal. The court-yard was full of company, and the Earl of Essex in the midst of them; to whom the Lord-Keeper addressing himself, said, 'That he was sent, with the other Gentlemen, from the Queen, to know the cause of their assembling; and, if they had suffered any grievances, he promised them a fair and equitable redress.' To that the Earl of Essex answered in a louder tone than ordinary, 'That his life was fought; that he was in danger of being murdered in his bed; and had been perfidiously dealt withal; that letters had been counterfeited under his hand and seal, &c.' Chief Justice Popham answered, 'If any such matter were attempted or intended, it were fit for him to declare it, and to be assured of their faithful relation; and he should not fail of her Majesty's princely indifferency and justice.' The Earl of Southampton complained, of the assault upon him by the Lord Gray: to which Popham replied, 'That justice had been done, and the party in prison.' Then the Lord-Keeper pressed the Earl of Essex, 'to impart his grievances, if not openly, yet privately, and promised satisfaction.' Upon which the multitude interrupted him, crying out, 'Away, my Lord, they abuse you, they destroy you, they undo you, you lose time.' The Lord-Keeper putting on his hat, commanded them all upon their allegiance, to lay down their weapons, and depart.' Whereupon the Earl of Essex, and all the rest, put on their caps; and going into the house, the Lords followed him as to a private conference, fearing the multitude, which cried out, 'Kill them, shop them up, keep them for pledges, cast the great seal out at window.' When they were come into the inner apartments, the Earl of Essex ordered the doors to be bolted upon them, bidding them, 'Have patience whilst he should go and take order with the Mayor and Sheriffs for the city, and that he would be with them again within an hour.' And so he left them in the custody of Sir John Davis, Francis Tresham, and Owen Salisbury, who guarded them with muskets, primed, and cockt. But the Earl of Essex meeting with great opposition in London, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of his accomplices, persuaded him to send him to his house, to discharge the Lord-Keeper, &c. and with them to intercede with the Queen for his pardon. The Earl consented that the Lord Chief Justice Popham should be released, and none else; but he refusing to accept of his liberty, except the Lord-Keeper might enjoy the same, Gorges discharged them all: at which the Earl was extremely angry (10).

[E] Strong application was made by Sir Francis Bacon for his office of High-Chancellor ] As appears by the following extracts of some of his letters. One dated Feb. 12, 1615, begins thus. 'It may please your most excellent Majesty, Your worthy Chancellor, I fear, goeth his last day. God hath hitherto used to weed out such servants as grew not fit for your Majesty, but now he hath gathered to himself a true sage, or salvia, out of your garden; but his Majesty's service must not be mortal.' — Then he moves for his place; and uses the following arguments, amongst others, — Because his father (Sir Nic. Bacon) had it: That great inconveniencies would follow, if it was conferred either on Sir Edward Coke, Henr. Hobert, Esq; Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, or Geo. Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury. — He likewise offers this to his Majesty's consideration, That the place of Attorney General, which he should resign, was honestly worth six thousand pounds a year; and his place of the Star-chamber was worth fifteen hundred pounds per annum. — In another Letter, dated Feb. 15, he acquainted the King with the Chancellor's recovery. — But, says he, 'whoever thinketh his disease is but melancholy, he maketh no true judgment of it; for it is plainly a formed and deep cough, with a pectoral surcharge; so that, at times, he doth almost animam agere [i. e. expire, in a fit of coughing.]' — In a letter to Sir George Villiers, of Feb. 21, 1615, he desires, by his interest, to be sworn a Privy Counsellor, because the Lord Chancellor's health was growing with the days, and his resignation an uncertainty. Adding, that the Lord

Chief Justice Sir Edward Coke, sued him, about the same time, in a præmunire [F], which gave him a great deal of uneasiness (x). However, recovering from his indisposition, he was, on the 12th of May, 1616, constituted Lord High Steward, for the trial of Robert Earl of Somerset, and Frances his wife (y). And he was so honest, as to refuse to affix the Great Seal to the pardon granted them afterwards by King James I (z). But his infirmities returning more violently upon him, and finding himself unable to bear the fatigues of his laborious employment, he earnestly intreated the King to be discharged from his office (a) [G]. His Majesty parted with an old and faithful servant with all imaginable tenderness; and, as a mark of his favour, advanced him to the dignity of Viscount Brackley, on the 7th of November, 1616 (b). He also let him keep the Seal till the beginning of Hilary-term following, when he sent Secretary Winwood for it [H], with this message, 'That himself would be his under-keeper, and not dispose of it, whilst he lived to bear the title of Chancellor.' Which was accordingly done (c). On the 24th of January 1616-17, he voluntarily resigned the office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford, wherein he was succeeded by William Earl of Penbroke (d). His Lordship's Chancellor told him the day before, 'If the King would ask his opinion, touching the person he would recommend to succeed him, upon death, or disability, he would name him for the fittest man;' and asks Villiers's advice, whether use may not be made of that offer (11).

[F] Sir Edward Coke sued him, about the same time, in a præmunire. He did not act as principal in that affair, but was at the bottom of it. The case was this; Sir Edward had heard and determined a cause at common law; but there was some juggling in the matter. For the witness that knew, and should have related the truth, was prevailed upon to be absent, if any man would undertake to excuse his non-appearance: a pragmatist fellow of the party undertook it; went with the witness to a tavern, called for a gallon-pot full of sack, bid him drink; and so leaving him, went into the Court. This witness is called for, as the prop of the cause; the undertaker answers upon oath, 'He left him in such a condition, that if he continues in it but a quarter of an hour, he is a dead man.' This evidencing the man's incapacity to come, deeded the matter so, that it lost the cause. The Plaintiffs that had the injury, bring the business about in Chancery. The Defendants, Richard Glanville, and William Allen, having had judgment at common law, refuse to obey the orders of that Court; whereupon the Lord Chancellor, for contempt of the Court, commits them to prison. They prefer two Indictments against his Lordship, in the Star-chamber, the last day of Hilary-term; the Lord Chief Justice Coke joins with them, and foments the difference, threatening the Lord Chancellor with a præmunire, upon Statutes 27 Edw. III. and 4 Hen. IV.—In Easter-term 1616, the Lord Chancellor being recovered from his indisposition, pursued the affair; and it being brought to a hearing before King James I. who had consulted beforehand the most eminent Lawyers, he gave judgment, 'That the Statutes of 27 Edw. III. cap. 1, and 4 Hen. IV. cap. 23, did not extend to the Court of Chancery;' for the first was ordained against those that sued to Rome, and the latter was designed to settle possessions against disturbances, and not to take away remedy in equity (12). Sir Francis Bacon, afterwards Lord Verulam, observes upon this occasion—(13).—'That the last day of the Terme (and, that which all men did condemn, the supposed last day of my Lord Chancellor's life) these two Indictments were preferred.—But this I will say, if they were set on that preferred them, they were the worst workmen that ever were that set them on; for there could not have been chosen two such causes, to the honour and advantage of the Chancery, for the justness of the decrees, and the foulness and scandall, both of fact, and person, in those that impeached the decrees. The Grand-jury, consisting (as it seemeth) of very substantiall and intelligent persons, would not finde the bills, notwithstanding they were much clamoured by the parties, and twice sent back by the Court; and, in conclusion, resolutely seventeen out of nineteen found an Ignoramus.'—A little after, he calls 'this a great and publique affront, not only to the reverend and well deserving person of the Chancellor, (and at a time when he was thought to lye a dying, which was barbarous) but to the high Court of

[G] He earnestly intreated the King to be discharged from his office. And writ this letter to his Majesty for that purpose. 'Most gracious Sovereign, I find through my great age, accompanied with griefs and infirmities, my sense and conceit is become dull and heavy, my memory decayed, my judgment weak, my hearing imperfect, my voice and speech failing and faltering, and in all the powers and faculties of my mind and body great debility. Wherefore, conscientia imbecillitatis, [conscious as I am of my weakness] my humble suit to your most sacred Majesty, is, to be discharged of this great place, wherein I have long served; and to have some comfortable testimony under your royal hand, that I leave it at this humble suit, with your gracious favour: so shall I, with comfort, number and spend the few days I have to live, in meditation, and prayers to Almighty God, to preserve your Majesty, and all yours, in all heavenly and earthly felicity and happiness. This suit I intended some years past, (†) ex dictamine rationis & conscientia; love and fear stayed it: now necessity constrains me to it; I am utterly unable to sustain the burthen of this great service; for I am come to St Paul's desire, Cupio dissolvi, & esse cum Christo.—In another letter he expresseth 'an earnest desire to serve still: but, (saith he) when I remember St Paul's rule, Let him that hath an office wait on his office; and do consider, withall, my great age, and many infirmities, I am dejected, and do utterly faint: for I see and feel sensibly, that I am not able to perform those duties as I ought, and the place requires; and thereupon I do seriously examine myself, what excuse or answer I shall make to the King of Kings, and Judge of all Judges, when he shall call me to account; and then my conscience shall accuse me, that I have presumed so long to undergo and wield so mighty and great a charge and burthen.—

He concludes thus,—'so, I most humbly beseech your sacred Majesty, graciously to regard the great age, infirmity, and impotency of your most devoted, obedient, loyal, and faithful servant; let me not be as Domitius after was, * Maluit deficere quam desinere; but, with your princely favour, give me leave to retire myself from the careful service of this great office, and from the troubles of this world, and to spend the small remnant of my life in meditation and prayer.—' (14).

[H] He also let him keep the Seal till the beginning of Hilary-term following, when he sent Secretary Winwood for it. This we are assured of by Mr W. Sanderfon, the publisher of Aulicus Coquinaria; by way of reply to Sir Ant. Weldon; who, in his Court and Character of King James (15), says, that the Lord Chancellor was removed by Villiers's means, for 'not giving way to his exorbitant desires:—and, that to despight him the more, and to vex his very soule, in the last agony he sent Bacon, his desired successor, (one he hated) for the seals, which the old man's spirit could not brook, but sent them by his own servant to the King, and shortly after yielded his soul to his Maker.' The Great Seal was delivered to Sir Francis Bacon, March 7. 1616-7 (16).

Lordship's illness increasing, the King sent the Earl of Buckingham, and Sir Francis Bacon, to signify to him, that he intended to give him the title of an Earl, and an annual pension; but being at that time seventy-seven years of age, he did not live to enjoy either (e). For he died, at York-house in the Strand, March 15, 1616-17, in a good old age, and full of virtuous fame, and was buried privately at Dodleston in Cheshire (f). He was a person of a most venerable gravity, both in his countenance and behaviour, having been seldom seen to smile (g); so that many went to the Chancery, on purpose only to see his venerable garb; and happy they who had no other business there, as Dr Fuller well observes (h). As to his inward abilities; he had a quick wit and apprehension, profound judgment, and ready utterance (i). He was a prudent man, a good Lawyer, just and honest, so that none of the Bench in his time went beyond him: and after his death, all of the long robe lamented his loss (k). He was attended by servants of most able parts, and was the first Chancellor since the Reformation, who had a Chaplain, namely John Williams, afterwards Lord-Keeper, and Archbishop of York. When he saw King James so profuse to the Scots, with the grave fidelity of a Statesman he scrupled not often to tell him, That as he held it necessary for his Majesty amply to reward those his countrymen, so he desired him carefully to preserve his Crown-lands for his own support, seeing he or his successors, might meet with Parliaments, which would not supply his occasions, but on such conditions as would not be very acceptable unto him. It was an ordinary speech in his mouth, Frost and Fraud both end in foul (l). By his first Lady, Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Ravenscroft, of Bretton in the county of Flint, Esq; he had issue two sons, Sir Thomas Egerton, Knt. who died in his life-time; and John, who succeeded him, and was created Earl of Bridgewater [I]. Also a daughter, Mary, married to Sir Francis Leigh, of Newnham-Regis, in the county of Warwick, Knight of the Bath. He had no issue by his second, and third Lady (m). He writ a few things, but only one piece was published in his life-time [K].

[K] He writ a few things, but only one piece was published in his life-time.] That piece was, 'Speech in the Exchequer-chamber, touching the Post-nati. Lond. 1609. 4to. in sixteen sheets.' But in the year 1651, there was published, a little book entitled, 'Certaine Observations concerning the Office of the Lord Chancellor. Composed by the Right Honorable, and most learned, Thomas Lord Ellesmere, late Lord Chancellor of England.' Small octavo. extracted chiefly from records. He also left behind him at his death four MSS. of choice collections fit to be printed, concerning (1). The Prerogative Royal. (2). Privileges of Parliament. (3). Proceedings in Chancery. (4). The power of the Star-chamber (18).

ELSYNGE (HENRY) Clerk of the House of Commons, in the reign of King Charles I, was born at Battersey in Surrey in the year 1598; being the eldest son of Henry Elsyng, Esq; (a) [A]. After a suitable education in Westminster-school, he was admitted, in 1621 (b), into Christ's-Church-College in Oxford; and took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, June 22, 1625 (c). But, without taking any further degrees, he went and travelled abroad; and spent, at several times, above seven years in foreign countries. By which he became so accomplished a gentleman, that his company and conversation was desired by persons of the highest quality and best judgment. He was in particular so highly valued by Archbishop Laud, that his Grace procured him the place of Clerk of the House of Commons, to which he proved of infinite use, as well as a singular ornament (d). For he was the most excellent Clerk, both to take and express the sense of the House, that ever sat there: and also so great a help to the Speaker, and to the House, in stating the Questions, and drawing up the Orders free from exceptions, that it much conduced to the dispatch of business, and the service of the Parliament (e). His discretion also and prudence was such, that though the Long Parliament was by faction kept in continual disorder, yet his fair and temperate carriage made him commended and esteemed by all parties, how furious and opposite soever they were among themselves. And therefore, for these his abilities and good conduct, more reverence was paid to his stool than to the Speaker Lenthall's chair, who being obnoxious, timorous, and interested, was often much confused in collecting the sense of the House, and drawing the debates into a fair question; in which Mr Elsyng was always observed to be so ready and just, that generally the House acquiesced in what he did of that nature (f). At length, when he saw that the greater part of the House were imprisoned and secluded; and that the remainder would bring the King to a trial for his life; he desired, on the 26th of December 1648, to quit his place, by reason, as he alledged, of his bad state of health: but most people understood his reason to be (and he acknowledged it to Mr Whitelock and and others of his friends) because he would have no hand in the business against the King (g). After having quitted his advantageous employment, he retired to his house at Hounslow in Middlesex; where contracting many infirmities of body, by his sedentariness, some distresses in his family, and by a deep melancholy for the sufferings and loss of his Sovereign, he departed this life, about the middle of August in the year 1654, and in the fifty-sixth of his age. He was buried in his private chapel at Hounslow, which is the burying place of his family (b). He was a man of very great parts, and ingenuous education; was very learned, especially in the Latin, French, and Italian languages; a great Student, and a very just and honest man: one, in a word, of whom the great Mr Selden was very fond (i). He was author of a few good things, of which we shall give an account in the note [B].

(i) Whitelock, ubi supra.

[B] He was Author of a few good things, &c.] Namely, 1. 'The ancient method and manner of holding Parliaments in England.' Lond. 1663. reprinted since in 12°. the third edition being in 1675. Mr Wood supposes (2), that it is mostly taken from a MS. entitled, Modus tenendi Parliamentum apud Anglos: 'Of the form and manner of holding a Parliament in England, and all things incident thereunto, digested and divided into several chapters and titles,' an. 1626, 'written by our Author's Father, who died while his Son was in his travels.' This curious little book, which seems to have been a collection made by the Author for his own use, is divided into eight Chapters. Ch. 1. Of summons. Ch. 2. Of appearance. Ch. 3. Of the place of meeting, and form of sitting. Ch. 4. Of Parliament days. Ch. 5. Of Proxies. Ch. 6. Of the cause of Summons. Ch. 7. Of the Speaker of the House of Commons. Ch. 8. Receivers and Tryers of Petitions. — In Chap. 1. He shows, among other curious particulars, 'who were antiently summoned to Parliament.' And they were 'Archbishops, and Bishops;' on account of their dignity and tenure. 'All Abbots and Priors, which held by an Earldom or a Barony,' by reason of their tenure. 'All Earls and Barons by reason of their inheritable Nobility and tenure, and their Peers also,' by reason of their tenure. 'The Judges, and Barons of the Exchequer, the King's Privy Council, and his learned Counsel,' were also summoned; but had no vote, nor were summoned on account of their tenure. — 'The Knights of the Shires, and the Barons of the Cinque Ports' were also summoned; and, 'The Citizens and Burgeses were ever elected and sent to the Parliament.' Next he enquires,

(2) Athen. ubi supra.

'whether the summons were antiently by one general writ or particular writs:' and affirms, that 'before the Conquest, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Peers were summoned to Parliament by one general Summons; and, that the others who were neither Lords nor Peers had particular writs.' He also gives, the first writ of Summons extant upon record, namely that of 49 Hen. iii; the titles of the parties summoned; the form of the antient writ for the election of the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses, &c. In Chap. III. he examines, 'Whether the Lords and Commons did antiently sit in one room together. And, whether the Commons did antiently sit at conference with the Lords.' In Chap. IV. he enquires, 'On what days the Parliament may not sit:' and shows by some instances, that they formerly used to sit on Sundays. — II. Mr Elynge likewise wrote 'A Tract concerning Proceedings in Parliament;' never published. It was some time in manuscript in the possession of Sir Matth. Hale, who bequeathed it in his Will to Lincoln's-Inn Library. III. Our Author left also behind him some Tracts and Memorials of his own writing, but so imperfect, that his executor would not publish them, lest they should prove injurious to his memory. IV. Ant. Wood ascribes moreover to Mr Elynge, 'A declaration or remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, agreed on by the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, 19 May 1642. Lond. 1642. in six sheets 4to.' But it is too virulent to be consistent with Mr Elynge's character as given above. The reader may see it in Rushworth's Historical Collect. Vol. 4. and in Edw. Husband's Collection of Remonstrances, &c. Lond. 1643. 4to. p. 195. C

After some time spent at the university, he travelled into foreign countries, and, upon his return, was introduced to the Court of King Henry, who, being a great patron of learned men, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and employed him in several embassies, particularly to Rome in 1532, about the affair of the divorce of Queen Catherine, and afterwards, about the year 1536, to the Emperor Charles V (b). Sir Thomas was an excellent Grammarian, Poet, Rhetorician, Philosopher, Physician, Cosmographer, and Historian; and no less distinguished for his candour, and the innocence and integrity of his

[B] Educated in Academical learning at St Mary's Hall in Oxford.] The year of his admission, thro' the defect of the record, cannot easily be determined; unless it was about the year 1514: for, four years after, viz. in 1518, one Thomas Elyot was admitted ad lecturam alicujus libri facultatis Artium Logices Aristotelis, which is the admission to the degree of bachelor of arts; and in Lent the same year he completed that degree by determination in School-Street. It appears likewise, that the said Thomas Elyot was, in the beginning of August 1524, admitted ad lecturam alicujus libri institutionum, that is, to the degree of bachelor of the Civil Law. Now if it could be made appear, that Sir Thomas Elyot died at about fifty years of age, we might certainly conclude him to be the same with Elyot the bachelor of arts and of the Civil Law; otherwise not (2). ETHEREGE (GEORGE), a celebrated Wit in the reigns of King Charles and King James II, and eminent for his poetical genius, eſpecially in Comedy. He is ſaid to have been deſcended of an antient family in Oxfordſhire [A], or allied to it (a), and born about the year 1636, but not very diſtant from London 'tis believed, as ſome of his neareſt relations appear to have been ſettled not far from this metropolis, in the county of Middleſex. 'Tis thought he had ſome education at the univerſity of Cambridge, but it ſeems he travelled into France, and perhaps Flanders alſo, in his younger years; and at his return, ſtudied, for a while, the Municipal Laws, at one of the Inns of Court in London (b). But the polite company he kept, and his own natural talents, inclining him rather to court the favour of the Muſes, and cultivate the Belles Lettres, he purſued the ſame ſo effectually, that the town was obliged with his firſt dramatiſk performance in the year 1664 (c); intituled The Comical Revenge: or, Love in a Tub [B]; the writing whereof brought him acquainted, as he has himſelf informed us, with Charles, afterwards Earl of Dorſet; to whom it is, by the author, dedicatèd. And the fame of this play, with his lively humour, engaging converſation; and refined taſte in the fashionable gallantries of the town, ſoon eſtabliſhed him in the ſocieties, and rendered him the delight of thoſe leading Wits among the Quality and Gentry of chief rank and diſtinction, who made their pleaſure the chief buſineſs of their lives, in that reign; ſuch as George Villiers Duke of Bucks, John Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter, Sir Car. Scroop, Sir Charles Sidley, Henry Savile, &c. Encouraged hereby to proceed, he brought another comedy upon the Stage; but it was four years after, in the year 1668 (d), intituled, She would if ſhe could; which alſo gained him no leſs applauſe [C]. And it was expected that he would, by the continuance

[A] An ancient Family in Oxfordſhire ] Whereof, there was one, reſiding at Thame in that county, before the Reformation; from whence ſprung the learned Dr: George Etherege, who was born there, about the year 1520; educated at Chriſt-Church-College, in the Univerſity of Oxford; was King's Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue there, in the Reign of Queen Mary, and ſome part of Queen Elizabeth's: but then, as he had been an oppoſer of the Proteſtants, was obliged to reſign it; whereupon he followed his Profeſſion of Phyſick in the City of Oxon, and inſtructed ſeveral ſcholars, who were the ſons of ſome Roman Catholic gentlemen, in the Sciences, to his old age, being alive in 1588; and was buried in the ſaid city, when he died. He wrote and tranſlated many learned books in his younger years; as John Leland has, in his poetical encomiums remembered (1); being a good Hebreian, Greecian and Poet; ſome of them written in Divinity, Phyſick, Muſick, and Verſe; among which was his Alta Henrici Octavi, in a Greek Poem, which he preſented to Queen Elizabeth, when, in a progreſs, ſhe viſited that Univerſity, Anno 1566. But it being thought only deſigned for the uſe of her Maſteſty, and its author, it was during his life kept from the preſs, and ſo has continued ever ſince in MS and ſub noſtris atticis (2). He alſo tranſlated a book written by Paulus Aegineta into Engliſh; the Pſalms of David into Hebrew verſe; and moſt part, or all of Juſtin Martyr, from the original Greek; beſides ſome other things, for the particulars whereof we ſhall at preſent refer to our author (3).

[B] The Comical Revenge: or Love in a Tub.] This Comedy was acted at his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York's Theatre, then newly erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; and firſt printed, as is obſerved above, in Quarto, 1664. again, in 1669, 1689, 1690; and afterwards in the volume of our Author's Comedies printed together. It is dedicatèd by him, to the Honourable Charles Lord Buckhurſt; to whom he ſays, 'I could not have wiſhed myſelf more fortunate, than I have been, in the ſucceſs of this poem: 'the writing of it, was a means to make me known 'to your Lordſhip; the acting of it, has loſt me no 'reputation; and the printing of it, has now given 'me an opportunity to ſhew how much I honour you, ' &c. (4). Mr Langbaine ſays that, 'This Comedy, 'though of a mixed nature; part of it being ſerious, 'and writ in heroic verſe, yet has ſucceeded admirably on the ſtage; it having been always acted with 'general approbation (5).'

continuance of his studies to polish and enliven the theatrical taste, be no less constant in such entertainments than the most assiduous of his contemporaries. But it was ascribed to his indolence, or too great an indulgence in his pleasures, rather than any close engagement at that time to more serious applications in the affairs of State, that his ingenuity was so alienated from the exercise of his pen; and indeed it is manifest, that there was an interval of above seven years, between that, and the appearance of his next, which was also his last dramattick production; and which, by the way, will shew us when that poem was written by his friend the Earl of Rochester which we shall here below cite; wherein though our author is highly complimented with all the requisites of an accomplished Poet, he is yet condemned to lose the Laurel for that delay [D]; his said last comedy not being published till 1676. It is intituled, The Man of Mode: or, Sir Fopling Flutter. It is dedicated by him to the Duchefs of York, who then was Mary the daughter of the Duke of Modena; in the service of which Duchefs our author, as he says in his said dedication, he then was; and this play still exalted his reputation, even above what both the former had done; he having therein, as perhaps he had also partly set himself some example in the others before, shadowed forth (but somewhat disguisedly) some of his noted acquaintance and contemporaries who were known, or thought to be so, by his said draughts of them, the Theatre-Royal, by their Majesties Servants, and printed Quarto, 1693, &c. And tho' it has neither Dedication, Preface, Prologue, nor Epilogue, that might inform us of its success, the reason whereof may perhaps presently appear, yet has it had great encomiums also bestowed upon it. One of our comick writers, who was his contemporary, and afterwards Poet Laureat, writes thus of this Play, 'She would, if she could, I think, and have the authority of some of the best judges for it, is the best Comedy that has been written since the Reformation of the stage. And even that, for the imperfect representation of it at first, received such prejudice, that had it not been for the favour of the Court, in all probability it had never got up again; and it suffers for it, in great measure, to this very day (6).' (8) Langbaine's Account of the Engl. Dramattick Poets, p. 187.

Mr Phillips says of these two Comedies, Love in a Tub, and She would, if she could, that for pleasant wit and no bad oeconomy, they are judged not unworthy the approbation they have met with (7). Gildon agrees with Langbaine, that this last, is a Comedy of the first rank; and Langbaine further wishes 'For the publick satisfaction, that this great master would oblige the world with more of his performances; which would put a stop to the crude and indigested Plays, which, for want of better, cumber the stage (8).'

These applauses arose from our Author's changing the study after old copies, and chimerical draughts from ungrounded speculation, which is but painting with dead colours, for those, taken directly from the freshest practise and experience in original life. He drew his characters from what they called the Beau monde; from the manners and modes then prevailing with the gay and voluptuous part of the world; which has made them appear the more natural, tho' we cannot say the more innocent. He has also spirited his dialogues, especially in the courtship of the fair sex, for which he is distinguished by Mr Dryden and others, with a sparkling gaiety which had but little appeared before upon the stage, in parts pretending to the character of modish Gallants; and to judge of his figures according to the rules of true resemblance, he will appear a masterly hand; but strictly to examine them, by the rules of honour, morality, and the principles of virtue, where none such are seriously professed; as the main business in the Comedies of those times, and most since, are intrigues of unlawful love, would be a severity, that might tend to eclipse that exposure of those corruptions, which has ever been allowed as the greatest benefit of Theatrical representations; according to the reflexions which have been made on the comic writings of our Author, and some other contemporaries, by a late writer (9): tho' it is by the same hand also owned on the other side, that corruptions are too often taught upon the stage, under the pretence of exposing them. To describe and make known those poisonous things which are baneful to the body, may be necessary and sufficient for the avoidance of the ignorant; but those examples that poison the morals and virtues of the mind, are so palatable to the vicious, that the simple or bare descriptions of them often prove fatal, unless accompanied with such powerful antidotes, as may destroy their mischievous efficacy, or such prospects of their destructive consequences, as may terrify mankind more by their durable disasters, than tempt them by their fleeting delights; as the same Author has also observed upon this topic (10): and this part of the argument has been also more directly applyed to Sir George's Plays, particularly by a late reformer of the stage, who had been a comick writer himself; and who, upon quoting a reflexion that had been made on a speech in one of his own Comedies, as too much inclining to a vein of wantonness, may seem to have aimed at some apology for it, by recriminating upon this play of our Author's, as what is intirely written in that vein; where speaking of luscious expressions and descriptions that gratify a sensual appetite, he says, 'This expedient to supply the deficiency of wit, has been used more or less, by most of the authors who have succeeded on the stage; tho' I know but one who has professedly writ a play upon the basis of the desire of multiplying our species; and that is, the polite Sir George Etherege; if I understand what the lady would be at in the play called She would, if she could. Other Poets have here and there, given an intimation that there is this design, under all the disguises and affectations which a lady may put on; but no author except this, has made sure work of it, and put the imaginations of the audience upon this one purpose from the beginning to the end of the Comedy. It has always fared accordingly; for, whether it be, that all who go to this piece, would, if they could, or that, the innocents go to it, to guess only what She would, if she could, the play has always been well received (11).'

[D] Condemned to lose the Laurel for that delay. In the said famous Poem, written by the Lord Rochester (*), after the example of Sir John Suckling's upon the like subject, Apollo finds some plausible pretence of exception to the claim of every poetical candidate for the laurel crown; therefore our Poet, by the scheme or drift of it, could escape no less disappointment than the rest; yet his Lordship, to do him ample justice, has sufficiently shewed his merits to it, in every thing but his perseverance to exert them; which, after having first of all discarded Mr Dryden, he next expresses thus.

(*) Tho' it has since been sathered, as well as some others, without any authority, upon George D. of Buckingham. See The Tryal of the Poets, for the Bays, in Imitation of a Satire in Boileau, among The Miscellaneous Works of Geo. late D. of Buckingham, &c. 8vo, 1704, p. 41.

This reverend Author was no sooner set by,
But Apollo had got gentle George in his eye;
And frankly confessed, of all Men that writ,
There's none had more Fancy, Sense, Judgment or Wit:
But, i'th' crying sin Idleness, he was so harden'd,
That his long sev'n years silence was not to be pardon'd.

Which plainly shews that the Poem in which these lines are written (12) was just before the publication of our Author's next Play abovementioned in the text, and here, in the following note.

them, to many of the audience, which rendered the Play very popular [E]. It seems he was

[E] Which made the Play very popular.] This Comedy, called The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flut-ter, acted also at the Duke's Theatre, besides the first edition, abovementioned, in 1676, had other impres-sions in 1684, &c. Our Author, in his courtly Dedi-cation to the said Duchefs of York has this, among other very complaisant and respectful expressions; 'I hope the honour I have of belonging to you, will excuse my presumption: 'tis the first thing I have produce'd in your service, and my duty obliges me to what my choice durst not else have aspired.' The song in the last act, was translated by Sir Car Scroop, from part of an Elegy written in French by Madame la Comtesse de la Suze (13). The Prologue was also writ-ten by the said Baronet; in which he has these Verses.

(13) See Le Re-cueil des Pièces Gallantes, Tom. I. p. 42.

With modest fears a Muse does first begin,
Like a young vengeb newly entic'd to Sin:
But, tickled once with praise, by her good will,
The wanton fool would never more lye still.
'Tis an old mistress you'll meet here to night, Whose chains you once have look'd on with delight;
But now of late, such dirty drabs have known ye,
A Muse 'oth' better sort's asham'd to own ye, &c.

And he goes on, to censure the superfluous impor-tation of any foreign characters of folly, when we are overstocked with such varieties, as are giving conti-nual provocation to be exposed at home. Therefore he entertains the audience, to be favourable to their own breed, and forbare to damn in the copy, what they have admired in the original. The Epilogue to this Play was written by Mr Dryden; in which he found it proper to anticipate the audience with an opinion that there was no personal satire intended; and to prevent any thing of that kind being suspected therein: so describes one of the principal characters, that of Sir Fopling, which was most liable to such sus-picion, as a draught drawn only from the imagination, or its ideas arising from the collective body of Fops in general, and pointing, by no means, at any parti-cular man. To which purpose the former part of that Epilogue is thus written:

Most modern Wits, such monstrous Fools have shown,
They seem not of Heav'n's making, but their own.
'Those nauseous Harlequins, in Farce may pass,
But there goes more to a substantial ass;
Something of Man, must be expos'd to view,
That, Gallants, they may more resemble you:
Sir Fopling is a Fool, so nicely writ,
The Ladies would mistake him for a Wit.
And when he sings, talks loud, and cocks, would cry,
I vow, methinks he's pretty company;
So brisk, so gay, so travell'd, so refin'd!
As he took pains to graff upon his kind.
True Fops help Nature's work, and go to school,
To file, and finish God Almighty's Fool:
Yet none Sir Fopling, him, or him can call;
He's Knight 'o th' Shire, and represents you all:
From each he meets, he culls what e'er he can,
Legion's his name, a People in a Man.

And to the same sense concludes,

Yet every man is safe from what he fear'd,
For no one Fool is hunted from the herd.

And yet he has here so described his dress, his airs, and humours, however gathered only from this che-mical precedent, as he would have it thought, on the Drama, that the town was rather confirmed in, than diverted thereby from applying the imaginary to a real person. And who was the original of this picture agreed upon at last to be, but Beau Hewit, the most notorious Fop of that time! as we have been credibly informed; also that the part of Dorimant was drawn for the Author's friend the Earl of Rocheller; wherein his inconstancy, fallhood, and triumphs, in the conquest and ruin of the fair, are varnished over with such agreeable and captivating graces, of modish and polite gallantry, that they may have been no less delectable to the lighter, than displeasing to the graver part, or those whose business it is, to assume, or pro-fess this character. The Poet has also drawn out some sketch of himself in this Play, if we mistake not, in the character of Medley: nay, as we also had it from the same intelligence, that of the late Mr John Bow-man, who had either acted the part of Sir Fopling, or some other in this Comedy, when it was in its earliest and highest repute, the very Shoemaker, in the first act, was also meant for a real person; who, by his improvident courses, having been before unable to make any profit of his trade, grew afterwards, upon this publick representation of him, so notable, and drew such a resort of the best customers to him, as obliged him to such close application in his business, and made him so ambitious of giving satisfaction, that he thenceforth became a very thriving man, and ac-quired a very substantial and comfortable maintenance for himself and family. The play met with extraor-dinary success upon the stage, however different judg-ments have been given of it. Langbaine says, 'It is written with great art and judgment; and is ac-knowledged by all to be as true Comedy, and the characters as well drawn to the life, as any play that has been acted since the Restauration of the English stage (14):' with whom Gildon agrees. 'Tis true our Author has here in this, as well as his other Comedies before, made some witty allusions, and sim-ilies drawn from the Sportsman's language, or phrases used in the country diversions of hunting and hawk-ing; which might not be so familiarly relished by some of his Criticks, or meer Courtiers, Citizens, and Cockneys in town: and though he may not have so highly built upon any little underplots, that keep up the spirit and business of the scenes, till they have gathered to one such capital plot as might at last break out into that surprizing disclosure of events, which would answer the expectation of some judges; whence it was objected, that he had written two, as one Author, (*) or as another, not over correctly, (* In the Works of G. Duke of Bucks, as be-fore, p. 60.) three taking Plays without one Plot; tho' 'tis by others asserted, these three Plays are neither without Plot or Humour (15): Yet those little objections, from some of his audience, were foundation enough it seems, for a satirical pen to raise a little character of him upon, in that poem, where the said satirist mentions our Au-thor, among the better sort of those Poets, who were then damned, as he acknowledges, only by the igno-rant, after this manner.

But our Author has been handled, with regard parti-cularly to this last Comedy, more severely yet, by that Critick in Prose, who, as we have above read, bestowed some censure upon the last before mentioned: but with what candour and equity, this has been so rigorously reflected on, is submitted to other judges; by some of whom, it has been thought that, to sift out some coarse and indelicate sentiments or expres-sions from the meanest or lowest characters, and men-tion nothing that is gay, witty, or polite, from any others; nothing like what Dorimant has accosted the widow with, was addicted to some great extravagancies; being too free of his purse in gaming, and of his constitution with women and wine; which embarrassed his fortune, impaired his health, and brought some satirical reflexions upon him. Gildon says, that for marrying a Fortune he was knighted (e); but we have it more particularly in a poem of those times, which never was printed, that to make some reparation of his circumstances, he courted a rich old widow; but her ambition was such, that she would not marry him unless he could make her a Lady; which he was forced by the purchase of knighthood to do (*). This might be, as it is computed, from the chronological order in which that poem seems to have been transcribed, in the volume of such like poems, wherein we have seen it, about the year 1683 (f). We hear not of any issue he had by this Lady: but we have been informed that he cohabited, whether before, or after his said marriage, we know not, for some time with Mrs Barry the Actress, and had a daughter by her; that he settled five or six thousand pounds upon her; but that she died young (g). From the same intelligence we have also learnt, that Sir George was, in his person, a fair, slender, genteel man; but spoiled his countenance with drinking, and other habits of intemperance; and in his deportment, very affable and courteous, of a sprightly and generous temper; which with his free, lively, and natural vein of writing, acquired him the general character of Gentle George, and Easy Etherege; in respect to which qualities, we may often find him compared with Sir Charles Sidley [F]. His said courtly address, and other accomplishments, won him the favour of the Duchess aforesaid, afterwards, when King James was crowned, his Queen; by whose interest and recommendation he was sent Ambassador abroad. In a certain pasquil that was written upon him, it is intimated as if he was sent upon some embassy to Turkey; which, because never printed that we know of, we shall here in a note transcribe [G], to shew how free the Wits could be with his character, who had been so with his own conduct. Gildon says, that being in particular esteem with the late Queen, King James's consort, he was sent Envoy to Hamburgh (h); but it is, in several books evident, that he was, in that reign, a Minister at Ratibon; at least, from the year 1686, to the time that his Majesty left this kingdom, if not later;

I say, to gather us out a few weeds only, and overlook every flower, has been thought, in this instance, but a partial description of the Muses garden; and some of our most celebrated Comedies written since, might suffer as much or more, by such inequitable examination. The part of Dorimant seems not so expressly intended for the perfect fine Gentleman, as the refined rake or libertine; the unconfined rover after amorous adventures; therefore, strict honour and honesty are not to be expected in such a character; and the play is unjustly brought to the test, upon the false and unallowable proposition of its being an absolute pattern of genteel Comedy. If all plays were to pass the ordeal of moral virtue, it would have company enough in the fiery sentence; and under such a merciless trial, it might not in some measure, be denied, 'But that the negligence of every thing which engages the attention of the sober and valuable part of mankind, appears very well drawn in this piece; as it must be denied, that it is necessary to the character of a fine Gentleman, that he should in that manner trample upon all order and decency.' And tho' we cannot be so very violently prejudiced, as to assert that 'This whole celebrated Piece is a perfect contradiction of good manners, good sense, and common honesty; that there is nothing in it, but what is built upon the ruin of virtue and innocence;' and, 'That nothing but being lost to a sense thereof, can make any one see this Comedy, without observing more frequent occasions to move row and indignation, than mirth and laughter;' yet, we may partly coincide with the Critick, in the conclusion of his remarks on this play; where, at the same time, that he allows it to be nature, we also agree, it is nature (tho' not in the utmost, yet) in its corruption and degeneracy (17). These three Comedies were reprinted together in the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, but so blindly, as to the time when they were written, having no particulars of any date, but that of the year in which they were then reprinted, that there is no knowing by any thing in the book, whether they were ever published before, or that the Author was not then alive (18); an imperfection, for want of some considerate editor, common in the new impressions of books, often to the perplexity, obstruction, and misguidance of studious men in their pursuits of historical knowledge. At the end of this edition, are the two poetical Epistles of our Author, which, in his Embassy, he addressed to the Earl of Middleton, and three other small Poems, that will hereafter be somewhat further spoken of (19).

[F] Often find him compared with Sir Charles Sidley. Among other testimonies which might be produced, that of his learned friend Mr John Evelyn is in these words,

While fathers are severe, and servants cheat,
Till bauds and whores can live without deceit,
Sidley and easy Etherege will be great (20).

Another Poetical Writer has these lines upon them;

Here gentle Eth'rege's and Sidley's Muse,
Warm the coy maid, and melting love infuse:
No unchast words, with harsh offensive sound,
The tender ears of blushing virgins wound;
Nor thought, which nauseous images inspire,
And damp the glowing heat of soft desire:
But calm and easy the sweet numbers move,
And ev'ry verse is influenc'd by love (21).

[G] We shall here, in a note transcribe. This Pasquil upon our Author, also two of his Plays, and his embassy to Turkey, as we have it now before us, consists of these lines:

Eth'rege by Knight and Lords united club;
Pickled his Play, and Person in a Tub:
For Comical Revenge, the Lord thought fit
To have a single Trial of his Wit;
In which the Title, if well understood,
Does shew, he wou'd write better if he cou'd:
But he and's Play have different mishaps;
One's purg'd to cure, t'other to get more claps.
His meagre face did his bad fate foretell;
That, like himself, 'twou'd not be count'nanc'd well:
Instead of sense, he welcomes you with sound;
For his Fee-simple was two hundred pound:
Yet let us not at this great bounty scoff;
He's the first Fire-ship e'er was well paid off.
Ovid to Pontus sent, for too much Wit;
Eth'rege to Turkey, for the want of it (22).

more especially it appears that he was then there, in his own letters, which he wrote from thence; some, to the Earl of Middleton, in verse; to one whereof his Lordship engaged Mr Dryden to return a poetical answer; in which he invites Sir George to write another play, and to keep him in countenance for his having been so dilatory in his last, reminds him how long the comedy, or farce, of The Rebearfal had been hatching, by the Duke of Buckingham, before it appear'd (i); but we meet with nothing more of our author's writing, after his last comedy aforesaid, for the stage. However, there are in being some other letters of his in prose, which were written also from Ratisbon; two whereof, which he sent to the said Duke of Buckingham, when he was in his recess, because they are not only entertaining in themselves, but will give us a stronger, and more exact resemblance, both of the writer and receiver, than any draught that could be made with the most vivid colours, in a more distant description, may not, we persuade ourselves, be thought tedious here to produce [H]. As for his other compositions, such as

[H] May not be thought tedious here to produce. We have met with but three letters of Sir George's writing in Prose, from Ratisbon. One is directed to his friend in London, whose name is not mentioned, and dated from that city, August 23. 1688; wherein, he gives a short account of some German Beauties there, &c. There is moreover, something arch in this letter; where Sir George is speaking of an indolent friend 'whose mistress, says he, I should pity, but 'that I am persuaded his prudence has made him 'chuse her in the Family:' and a little further, he talks in the very same sense of himself: 'I have 'learned to ogle and languish in publick, like any 'Walcup; and to content myself in private, with 'a piece of Household-bread, as well as some of my 'friends (23).' But the other two letters, which are more considerable for their contents, being thought worthy of revival, and proper to illustrate this article, we shall here recite; the first of them is as follows:

To GEORGE Duke of BUCKINGHAM.

My Lord,

I Received the news of your Grace's retirement into Yorkshire, and leading a sedate contemplative life there, with no less astonishment, than I should hear of his Christian Majesty's turning Benedictine Monk, or the Pope's wearing a long perriwig, and setting up for a flaming beau in the seventy-fourth year of his age. We have a picture here in our Town-Hall, which I never look upon, but it makes me think on your Grace; and I dare sware you'll say, there is no dishonour done you, when you hear whose it is: in short, 'tis that of the famous CHARLES the Vth, who amidst all the magnificence that this foolish world affords, amidst all his African laurels and Gallic triumphs, freely divested himself of the Empire of Europe, and his hereditary kingdoms, to pass the remainder of his life in solitude and retirement.

Is it possible that your Grace, who has seen ten times more luxury than that Emperor ever knew; conversed with finer women; kept politer company; possessed as much too, of the true real greatness of the world as ever he enjoyed, should in an age, still capable of pleasure, and under a fortune, whose very ruins would make a comfortable Electorate here in Germany; is it possible, I say, that your Grace should leave the Play at the beginning of the fourth Act, when all the Spectators are in pain to know what will become of the Hero, and what mighty matters he is reserved for, that set out so advantageously at first? That a person of your exquisite taste, who has breathed the air of Courts even from your infancy, should be content, in that part of your life which is most difficult to be pleased, and most easy to be disgusted, to take up with the conversation of country Parsons; a sort of people, whom to my knowledge, your Grace never much admired; and do penance in the nauseous company of Lawyers, whom I am certain you abominate!

To raise our astonishment higher; who could ever have prophesied, though he had a double gift of Nostradamus his spirit, that the Duke of Buckingham, who never vouchsafed his embraces to any ordinary beauty, would ever condescend to sigh and languish for the heirs apparent of a thatched cottage, in a straw hat, flannel petticoat, stockings of as gross a thrum as the blew-coat boys caps at the hospital, and a smock, the Lord defend me from the wicked idea of it! of as coarse a canvas as ever served an apprenticeship to a mackarel-boat? who could have believed, till matter of fact had confirmed the belief of it; and your Grace knows that matter of fact is not to be disputed, that the most polished refined epicure of his age, that had regaled himself in the most exquisite wines of Italy, Greece, and Spain, would, in the last scene of his life, debauch his constitution in execrable Yorkshire ale? and that he, who all his life-time, had either seen Princes his play-fellows or companions, would submit to the nonsensical chat, and barbarous language of farmers and higglers!

This, I confess, so much shocks me that I cannot tell what to make on't; and, unless the news came to me confirmed from so many authentic hands, that I have no room left to suspect the veracity of it, I should still look upon it to be apocryphal. Is your Grace then in earnest, and really pleased with so prodigious an alteration of persons and things? for my part, I believe it; for I am certain that your Grace can act any person better than that of a hypocrite.

But I humbly beg your Grace's pardon for this familiarity I have taken with you. Give me leave therefore if you please, to tell you something of myself. I presume that an account of what passes in this busy part of the world, will not come unacceptable to you, since all my correspondents from England assure me, your Grace does me the honour to enquire often after me, and has expressed some sort of a desire, to know how my new character fits upon me.

Ten years ago, I as little thought that my stars designed to make a politician of me, and that it would come to my share to debate in publick assemblies, and regulate the affairs of Christendom, as the Grand Signior dreamed of losing Hungary: but my royal Master having the charity to believe me master of some qualities, of which I never suspected myself, I find that the zeal and alacrity I discover in myself, to support a dignity which he has thought fit to confer upon me, has supply'd all other defects, and given me a talent, for which, till now, I justly fancied myself incapable.

I live in one of the finest and best mannered cities in Germany, where 'tis true we have not pleasure that perfection as we see it in London and Paris, yet to make us amends, we enjoy a noble serene air, that makes us hungry as hawks; and though business, and even the worst sort of business, wicked politics, is the distinguishing commodity of the place, yet I will say, that for the Germans, they manage it the best of any people in the world; they cut off, and retrench, all those idle preliminaries and useless ceremonies that clog the wheels of it every where else: and I find, that, to this day, they make good the observation that Tacitus made of their ancestors; I mean, that their affairs, let them be ever so serious and pressing, never put a stop to good eating and drinking, and that they debate their weightiest negotiations over their cups.

ters concerns make it necessary for me to come to their assemblies. They are indeed a free-hearted, open sort of gentlemen that compose the Diet; without reserve, affectation, and artifice; but they are such unmerciful plyers of the bottle, so wholly given up to what our sots call good-fellowship, that 'tis as great a constraint upon my nature, to sit out a night's entertainment with them, as it would be to hear half a score long-winded Presbyterian Divines cant successively one after another.

To unbosom myself frankly and freely to your Grace, I always looked upon drunkenness to be an unpardonable crime in a young fellow, who, without any of these foreign helps, has fire enough in his veins to enable him to do justice to Cælia, whenever she demands a tribute from him. In a middle-aged man, I consider the bottle only as subservient to the nobler pleasure of love; and he that would suffer himself to be so far infatuated by it, as to neglect the pursuit of a more agreeable game, I think deserves no quarter from the ladies: in old age, indeed, when it is convenient very often to forget and steal from ourselves, I am of opinion that a little drunkenness discreetly used, may as well contribute to our health of body, as tranquillity of soul.

Thus I have given your Grace a short system of my morals and belief in these affairs. But the gentlemen of this country go upon a quite different scheme of pleasure: the best furniture of their parlours, instead of innocent China, are tall overgrown Rummers; and they take more care to enlarge their cellars, than their patrimonial estates. In short drinking is the hereditary sin of this country; and that Hero of a Deputy here, that can demolish, at one sitting, the rest of his brother Envoy's, is mentioned with as much applause as the Duke of Lorraine, for his noble exploits against the Turks; and may claim a statue, erected at the publick expence in any town in Germany.

Judge then, my Lord, whether a person of my sober principles, and one, that only uses wine, as the wiser sort of Roman Catholics do images, to raise up my imagination to something more exalted, and not to terminate my worship upon it, must not be reduced to very mortifying circumstances in this place; where I cannot pretend to enjoy conversation, without practising that vice which directly ruins it.

And as I have just reason to complain of the men, for laying so unreasonable a tax upon pleasure: so I have no less occasion to complain of the women, for wholly denying it.

Could a man find out the secret to take as long a lease for his life, as Methuselah, and the rest of the Antidiluvian gentlemen, who were three hundred years in growing up to the perfection of vigor, enjoy'd it the same number of years, and were as long in decaying, something might be said for the two crying sins of both sexes here; I mean, drunkenness in the men, and reservedness in the ladies. What would it signify to throw away a week's, nay, a month's enjoyment upon one night's debauch, if a man could promise himself the age of a patriarch? or where would be the mighty penance in dancing a dozen years attendance after a coy female; watching her most favourable moments, and most accessible intervals, at last to enjoy her, if infirmities and old age were to come so late upon us?

But since fate has given us so short a period to taste pleasure with satisfaction; three or four days sickness is too great a rent-charge upon human nature, and drunkenness cannot pretend, out of its own fund, to acquit the debt. And, my Lord, since our gayety and vigor leave us so soon in the lurch; since feebleness attacks us, without giving us fair warning; and we no sooner pass the meridian of life but begin to decline; it is hardly worth a lover's while to stay as long for compassing a mistress, as Jacob did for obtaining a wife; and without this tedious drudgery and application, I can assure your Grace that an amour is not to be managed here.

But, my Lord, I forget that while I take upon me to play the moralist, and to enlarge so rhetorically upon the preciousness of time, I have already made bold with too much of your Grace's: for which reason, I here put a stop to my Discourse, and will endeavour, the next packet that goes from this place, to entertain your Grace with something more agreeable.

I am,

Ratibon,

Nov. 12. 1686.

My LORD,

Your GRACE's most obedient Servant,

G. ETHEREGE (24).

Here, our reader has the most frank and undisguised, natural and lively images of Sir George's sentiments upon the Duke's retirement from all the splendor and luxury of life; his own employment in his political capacity, with the habits and tempers of those gentry of both sexes, among whom he resided; and what is most directly to the purpose in this place, a more faithful and perspicuous portrait of his own humour and genius, than he could have been display'd by, in all the characters that were to be drawn of him. Now the reader is to judge, whether there is not a scene as diverting, a spirit as brisk, and a resemblance of himself as clear, in the next.

To his Grace the Duke of BUCKINGHAM.

My Lord,

I Never enjoy myself so much, as when I can steal a few moments from the hurry of publick business, to write to my friends in England; and as there are none there, to whom I pay a profounder respect than to your Grace, wonder not if I afford myself the satisfaction of conversing with you by way of letters, the only relief I have left to support your absence at this distance, as often as I can find opportunity.

You may guess by my last, whether I don't pass my time very comfortably here; forced as I am by my character, to spend the better part of my time in squabbling and deliberating with persons of beard and gravity, how to preserve the ballance of Christendom; which would go well enough of itself, if the Divines and Ministers of Princes would let it alone: and when I come home spent and weary from the Diet, I have no Lord Dorset's or Sir Charles Sidley's to sport away the evening with; no Madam I. . . ., or Lady A. . . .s; in short, none of those kind charming creatures London affords, in whose embraces I might make myself amends for so many hours murder'd in impertinent debates; so that, not to magnify my suffering to your Grace, they really want a greater stock of christian patience to support them, than I can pretend to be master of.

I have been long enough in this town, one would think, to have made acquaintance enough with persons of both sexes, so as never to be at a loss how to pass the few vacant hours I can allow myself: but the terrible drinking that accompanies all our visits hinders me from conversing with the men so often as I would otherwise do; and the German Ladies are so intolerably reserved and virtuous, with tears in my eyes I speak it to your Grace, that it is next to an impossibility to carry on an intrigue with them. A man has so many scruples to conquer, and so many difficulties to surmount, before he can promise himself the least success, that for my part I have given over all pursuits of this nature. Besides, there is so universal a spirit of censoriousness reigns in this town, that a man and a woman cannot be seen at Ombre or Picquet together, but 'tis immediately concluded, some other game has been play'd between them; and as this renders all manner of access to the ladies almost impracticable, for fear of exposing their reputation to the mercy of their ill-natured neighbours, so it makes an innocent piece of gallantry often pass for a criminal correspondenc.

So that, to deal freely with your Grace, among so many noble and wealthy families as we have in

poons, and smooth panegyrics; which we shall only concisely enumerate at the foot of the

this town, I can only pretend to be truly acquainted with one: the gentleman's name was Monsieur Hoffmann, a frank, hearty, jolly companion; his father, one of the most eminent wine merchants of the city, left him a considerable fortune, which he improved by marrying a French jeweller's daughter of Lyon. To give you his character in short, he was a sensible, ingenious man, and had none of his country vices; which I impute to his having travelled abroad, and seen Italy, France, and England. His lady is a most accomplished, ingenious person, and notwithstanding she is come into a place, where so much formality and stiffness are practised, keeps up all the vivacity and air, and good humour of France.

I had been happy in my acquaintance with this family for some months; when an ill favoured accident robbed me of the greatest happiness I had hitherto enjoy'd in Germany, the loss of which I can never sufficiently regret. Monsieur Hoffmann, about three weeks ago, going to make merry with some friends, at a village some three leagues from this place, upon the Danube; by the unskillfulness or negligence of the watermen, the boat, wherein he was, unfortunately chanced to overset, and of some twenty persons, not one escaped to bring home the news, but a boy, who miraculously saved himself, by holding fast to the rudder, and so by the rapidity of the current was cast upon the other shore.

I was sensibly afflicted at the death of my worthy friend; and so indeed were all who had the honour of knowing him. But his wife took on so extravagantly, that she, in a short time, was the only talk both of city and country. She refused to admit any visits from her nearest relations; her chamber, her antichamber, and pro-antichamber were hung with black; nay, the very candles, her fans, and tea-table wore the livery of grief: she refused all manner of sustenance, and was so averse to the thoughts of living, that she talked of nothing but death: in short, you may tell your ingenious friend Monsieur de Saint Evremond, that Petronius his Ephesian Matron, to whose story he has done so much justice, in his noble translation, was only a type of our more obstinate, as well as unhappy German widow.

About a fortnight after this cruel loss, for I thought it would be labour lost to attack her grief in its first vehemence, I thought myself obliged, in point of honour and gratitude to the memory of my deceased friend, to make her a small visit, and console her ladyship upon this unhappy occasion: and though I had been told that she had refused to see several persons who had gone to wait on her, with the same errand, yet I presumed so much upon the friendship her late husband had always expressed for me, not to mention the particular civilities I had received from herself, as to think I should be admitted to have a sight of her: accordingly I came to her house, sent up my name, and word was immediately brought me, that if I pleased I might go up to her.

When I came into the room, I fancied myself in the territories of death; every thing looked so gloomy, so dismal, and so melancholy. There was a grave Lutheran minister with her, who omitted no arguments to bring her to a more composed and more christian disposition of mind. Madam, says he, You don't consider that by abandoning yourself thus to despair, you actually rebel against Providence. I can't help it, says she; Providence may e'en thank itself, for laying so insupportable a load upon me. O syc, Madam, cries the other, this is downright impiety; what would you say now, if heaven should punish it by some more exemplary visitation? That is impossible, replies the lady sighing; and since it has robbed me of the only delight I had in this world; the only favour it can do me, is to level a thunderbolt at my head, and put an end to all my sufferings. The parson finding her in this extravagant strain, and seeing no likelihood of persuading her to come to a better temper, got up from his seat, and took his leave of her.

It came to my turn now, to try whether I was not capable of comforting her; and being convinced by so late an instance, that arguments brought from religion were not likely to work any extraordinary effects upon her, I resolved to attack her ladyship in a more sensible part, and represent to her the great inconveniencies, not which her soul, but her body received from this inordinate sorrow.

Madam, says I to her, next to my concern for your worthy husband's untimely death, I am grieved to see what an alteration the bemoaning of his loss has occasioned in you. These words, raising her curiosity to know what this alteration was, I thus continued my discourse. By endeavouring, Madam, to extinguish, or at least to alleviate your grief, than which nothing can be more prejudicial to a beautiful woman, I intend a publick benefit; for if the publick is interested, as most certainly it is, in the preserving of a beautiful face, that man does the publick no little service who contributes most to its preservation.

This odd beginning operated so wonderfully upon her, that she desired me to leave this general road of compliments, and explain myself more particularly to her. Upon this, delivering myself with an unusual air of gravity, which your Grace knows I seldom carry about me, in the company of ladies, I told her that, Grief ruins the finest faces, sooner than any thing whatsoever; and that, as envy herself could not deny her face to be the most charming in the universe, so if she did not suffer herself to be comforted, she must soon expect to take her farewell of it. I confirmed this assertion, by telling her of one of the finest women we ever had in England, who did herself more injury in a fortnight's time, by lamenting her only brother's death, than ten years could possibly have done; that I had heard an eminent Physician at Leyden say, That Tears, having abundance of saline particles in them, not only spoiled the complexion, but hastened wrinkles: But, Madam, concluded I, why should I give myself the trouble to confirm this by foreign instances, and by the testimonies of our most knowing Doctors, when alas! your own face so fully justifies the truth of what I have said to you.

How! reply'd our disconsolate widow, with a sigh, that came from the bottom of her heart; and is it possible that my just concern for my dear husband, has wrought so cruel an effect upon me in so short a time? with that, she ordered her gentlewoman to bring the looking-glass to her, and having surveyed herself a few minutes in it, she told me, she was perfectly convinced that my notions were true. But, cries she, what would you have us poor women do in these cases; for, something, continues she, we owe to the memory of the deceased, and something too, to the world, which expects at least the common appearances of grief from us.

By your leave, Madam, says I, all this is a mistake, and no better; you owe nothing to your husband, since he is dead, and knows nothing of your lamentation. Besides, could you shed an ocean of tears upon his hearse, it would not do him the least service: much less do you lie under any such obligation to the world, as to spoil a good face only to comply with its tyrannic customs. No, Madam, take care to preserve your beauty, and then let the world say what it pleases; your ladyship may be revenged upon the world whenever you see fit. I am resolved, answers she, to be intirely governed by you; therefore tell me frankly, what sort of a course you'd have me steer? why Madam, says I, in the first place forget the defunct; and in order to bring that about, relieve nature, to which you have been so long unmerciful, with the most exquisite meats, and the most generous wines. Upon condition you'll sup with me, cries our afflicted lady, I will submit to your prescription. But why should I trouble your Grace with a narration of every particular?

In short, we had a noble regale that evening in her bedchamber; and our good widow pushed the glass so strenuously about, that her comforter, meaning myself, could hardly find the way to his coach. To conclude this farce, which I am afraid begins now to be too tedious to your Grace, this Phoenix of her sex, this pattern of conjugal fidelity, two morning ago, was married to a smooth-chinn'd ensign the page [I]. All that we have met with more than is here mentioned or referred to of his

of Count Trautmandorf's Regiment; that had not a farthing in the world but his pay to depend upon I assisted at the ceremony; tho' I little imagined the lady would take the matrimonial receipt so soon.

I was the easier persuaded to give your Grace the larger account of this Tragi-comedy, not only because I wanted better matter, to entertain you with at this lazy conjuncture, but also to show your Grace that not only Ephesus, in antient, and England in latter times, have afforded such fantastical widows, but even Germany itself; where, if the ladies have not more virtue, than those of their sex in other countries, yet, they pretend at least a greater management of the out side of it.

By my last packet from England, among a heap of nauseous trash, I received the Three Dukes of Dunstable, which is really so monstrous and insipid that I am sorry Lapland or Livonia had not the honour of producing it: but if I did penance in reading it, I rejoiced to hear that it was so solemnly interred to the tune of cat-calls. The Squire of Alsatia however, which came by the following post, made me some amends for the cursed impertinence of the Three Dukes; and my witty friend Sir C...S...y's Bellamira gave me that intire satisfaction, that I cannot read it over too often.

They tell me my old acquaintance Mr Dryden has left off the theatre, and wholly applies himself to the study of the controversies between the two Churches. Pray Heaven! this strange alteration in him portends nothing disastrous to the State; but I have all along observed, that Poets do religion as little service by drawing their pens for it, as the Divines do Poetry, by pretending to verification.

But I forget how troublesome I have been to your Grace: I shall therefore conclude with assuring that I am, and to the last moment of my life shall be, ambitious of being,

My LORD,

Your GRACE's most obedient and most obliged servant,

Ratibon, Octob. 21.

(25) Miscellaneous Works of George Duke of Buckingham, as before, p. 131, &c.

So this letter is dated, in the volume here referred to, from whence the copy above is transcribed; but there seems to be a little mistake in it, and that the original was dated the year before; otherwise, it will appear to have been sent by our Author, to his noble friend, above a year after the said Duke was dead; besides, 'tis likely he should have had Sir Charles Sidley's Comedy of Bellamira sent him sooner than two years after it was published, for it was first printed in 1687; and as Shadwell's Squire of Alsatia was first printed in 1688, 'tis most probable this letter was written the same year, because Mr Dryden had given over his Popish controversies, upon the Revolution, and before the next year.

[I] Enumerate at the foot of the page.] Of these his smaller Poems, we have met with about twenty that have been ascribed to him in print, besides the little sonnets that are interspersed in his Plays; tho' in the most particular account that has been given of him, and his writings (26), there are not above half a dozen of them mentioned. One of the earliest perhaps of these his lesser Poems, may be that, To Her Excellency the Marchioness of Newcastle, after the reading of her incomparable POEMS: It consists of about forty lines, and begins thus, Madam, with so much wonder we are struck (27): and because we have hitherto given but a very slender specimen of our Author's poetry, the conclusion of this panegyric may here serve for a further taste of it.

(26) See Giles Jacob's Account of the Poets, in his article of Sir G. Etherege.

(27) One volume of her Ladyship's Poems, &c. was published in folio 1653: another, of her Letters and Poems, in 1676.

While we, your praise, endeav'ring to rehearse,
Pay that great duty in our humble verse;
Such as may justly move your anger, you,
Like Heav'n, forgive them, and accept them too.

But what we cannot, your brave Hero pays,
He builds those monuments we strive to raise;
Such, as to after ages shall make known,
While he records your deathless fame, his own:
So when an Artist, some rare Beauty draws,
Both, in our wonder share, and our applause:
His Skill, from Time, secures the glorious Dame;
And makes Himself immortal in her Fame.

Another of his panegyric Poems bears this title—To Mr I. N. on his translations out of the French and Italian; beginning with, While others toil, our country to supply, &c. about a page and half. His translation of Voiture's Urania, is in four stanzas of alternate verse, beginning thus—Hopeless I languish out my days. His song, To Sylvia, is in three stanzas, or quadrains; concluding with, Who sees her must love, and who loves her must die: by which it is still remembered among our sonneteers. Another Song.—Tell me no more you love, &c. in sixteen lines. To a very young lady; beginning, Sweet bud of beauty; in fourteen lines. To a lady who fled the sight of him.—If I my Celia could persuade; in eighteen lines. To a lady, asking him, how long he could love her.—It is not Celia in our power; in two stanzas of six. The Divided Heart.—Oh Colin that I were but sure: near a page. The Imperfect Enjoyment.—After a pretty amorous discourse: fifty lines. The forsaken Mistress: a Dialogue, between Phyllis and Strepbon.—Tell me gentle Strepbon why: About a page. Here are eleven of our Author's Poems, which are to be found in one volume (28). In another, entituled our Author's Works, we find, the last of them reprinted; and four besides, that are different, viz. A song of two stanzas on the inquietudes of love; beginning with, Ye happy Swains whose Hearts are free. And another Song of Basset, in eight stanzas of alternate verse. Beginning—Let Equipage and Dress despair (+). We have also, in that volume called our Author's Works, the two poetical letters sent by him from Ratibon, as was before observed, to the Earl of Middleton; both written in verse of eight feet; the former containing near fourscore lines, the latter near forty; describing the dress and humours, of the ladies especially, in those parts, and how he passed his time among them; much in that airy and amorous vein wherein his letters in Prose are written, before recited. Those five Poems are in the volume before mentioned (29). And these two poetical letters are to be found likewise in two other collections at least; one in that, which is titled, Familiar Letters by the Lord Rochester, &c. before quoted (30), where we have also a poetical answer to the former of our Author's (31), tho' it is not mentioned in that collection by whom it was written; but in another, the name of Mr Dryden appears to it (32), who in the beginning of his said answer takes notice that at the time of his writing the same, about 1687, Sir George was aged fifty-one years; from whence may be computed the time of his birth, as it is above given. And in the conclusion of that answer, Mr Dryden intimates that Sir George had some while since begun another Play, which he incites him to finish, as what could not fall below the Rehearsal; and as he knew no George, meaning our Author and the Duke of Buckingham, who could write any thing under ten years warning; as we have partly hinted already in the text above. There are besides that answer, the two said poetical letters, in this same volume, and two songs more of his, not before mentioned. The one beginning with these words—Cease anxious world, your fruitless pain; in three stanzas of six lines: and the other, with these—In some kind dream upon her, Slumber steal; in fifteen lines (33). Lastly, there are three Poems more ascribed to our Author, in another volume, which we have also before quoted. One is entituled, The Libertine: beginning, Since death, on all, lays his impartial hand; consisting of three stanzas of eight lines, and a chorus (34). The others, are two Satires, upon Nell Guyn, one of King Charles's Mistresses. The first is called, Madam Nelly's complaint: beginning with—If Sylla's ghost made bloody Cat's line start: in his writing in prose, is, a short piece, intituled, An Account of the Rejoycing at the Diet of Ratisbonne, performed by Sir George Etherege, Knight, residing there, from his Majesty of Great Britain; upon Occasion of the Birth of the Prince of Wales. In a Letter from Himself. Printed in the Savoy 1688 (k). How far beyond this, or the next year he lived, the writers on our Poets who have spoken of him, have been, as in many other particulars of his life, so in the time when he died, very deficient. In Gildon's short and imperfect account of him, which we have been forced to consult in want of better, 'tis said that after the Revolution he went for France to his Master, and died there, or very soon after his arrival in England from thence (l). But there was a report, as we have received it from an ingenious Gentleman, that Sir George came to an untimely death, by an unlucky accident at Ratisbon; for after having treated some company with a liberal entertainment at his house there, in which having perhaps, taken his glass too freely, and being, through his great complaisance, too forward, in waiting on some of his guests at their departure, flush'd as he was, he tumbled down the stairs and broke his neck, so fell a martyr to his civility (m). Some of his surviving relations, having received a credible account of, from a person who was acquainted with them, we shall succinctly mention, in the short note hereunto subjoined [K].

in about two leaves. The other is called The Lady of Pleasure; with its argument at the head of it, whereof the first line is, The Life of Nelly truly shewn. In about three leaves and a page (35). These two satires, as we remember, were printed before, without any author's name: and indeed, they seem to be written, the last especially, in a grosser stile, with more blunt or vulgar expressions in it, than was customary to Sir George, besides as it mentions the death of Nell Guyn, we believe it may therefore be found, it was written after that of our Author.

[K] In a short note hereunto subjoined ] Since the foregoing part of this article was printed off, we have been informed, that there are two Wills in the Prerogative office, which might possibly have given some further light into the family, and other particulars relating to our Author, could we have had a timely extract of them. The first is executed by William Etherege, Anno 1649 (36); the last, by another William Etherege, in Middlesex, Anno 1690 (37): whether the former was the father of our Author, or any other relation, and the latter his brother, we have not now time to examine. But from those who have been conversant with some survivors of the family, we have received intelligence that, our Author Sir George, had a brother, who lived and died at Westminster; had been a great courtier, yet a man of such strict honour, that he was esteemed a reputation to the family. His picture, painted in a gown, with his fine black curled hair, is in the possession of a friend. He had been twice married, and by his first wife, had a son; a little man, of a brave spirit, who inherited the honourable principles of his father. He was a Colonel in King William's wars; was near him in one of the most dangerous battles in Flanders, I think it was the battle of Landen, in 1693, when his Majesty was wounded, and the Colonel both lost his right eye, and received such a contusion on his side, as he complained of to his death. He was offered in Queen Anne's reign, twenty two hundred pounds for his commission, but refused to live at home in peace, when his country was at war. This Colonel Etherege died at Eling in Middlesex, about the third or fourth year of the late King George; when his dear friend, the Lord Rivers, had his body opened; and there was found a gathering where he had received his bruise, which looked like a foddren turnip, and probably hastened his death. He was buried in Kensington church, near the altar; and there is a tombstone over his vault, in which was also buried his wife, son, and sister: That son was graciously received at Court by Queen Anne, and soon after his father returned from the wars in Flanders, under the Duke of Malborough, she gave him an Ensign's commission, intending further to promote him, in reward of his father's services; but he died a youth: and that sister married Mr Hill of Feversham in Kent; but we hear not of any male issue surviving. G

EVELYN (JOHN) a great Philosopher, a worthy Patriot, and a learned writer in the XVIIth century. He was descended from a very antient and honourable family, as appears from several authentick vouchers, a branch of which, at the time of his birth, was settled in the county of Surrey, though it flourished originally in the county of Salop, at a place which is still called Evelyn (a) [A]. George Evelyn, Esq; purchased the estate

(a) Additions to Camden's Britannia, published in English by Bishop Gibson, Vol. 1. col. 649.

[A] At a place which is still called Evelyn. ] Our Author himself, had taken great pains to enquire into the origin of his family, in consequence of which, he found that they had formerly written their name Evelyn and Ivelyn, as well as Evelyn, which might be confirmed by a variety of instances; he was likewise informed, that a branch of their family flourished in France, and that one of them was taken prisoner, at the battle of Agincourt; but what had more of certainty, and deserved better to be depended upon, was taken from the tradition of the family, that they came from Long Ditton into Surrey, and to Long Ditton, from Harrow on the Hill, but that originally, they were seated at the town of Evelyn, in the hundred of South Bradford, in the county of Salop; of which county also he reports, that the Onslows likewise were, who removed about the same time from a place of that name, in the neighbourhood of Shrewsbury; as the Hattons also did from a place called Cold Hatton, in the same hundred with Evelyn in Shropshire; and, which is very remarkable, all settled again near each other in Surrey (1). George Evelyn, Esq; the founder of this branch of the Evelyns in Surrey, first carried the art of making gunpowder to perfection in England, and for the convenience of his works in the neighbourhood, purchased an estate at Wotton, of one Mr Owen, but who were the owners of this place in early times does not appear (2). This George Evelyn had a considerable interest at Court, and procured from Queen Elizabeth a grant, in conjunction with Thomas Reeves, of the Rectory of St Nicholas Coleabby in Queenhith Ward, London, which afterwards came by mesne conveyances to the family of the Hackers, and by the attainder of Colonel Francis Hacker, who commanded the guard when King Charles the first was murdered, came again to the Crown (3). It was in the latter part of his life that this gentleman came to live at Wotton, which however did not hinder him from planting there, as appears from what our Author himself tells us (4). ' In a word, to give an instance of what store of woods ' and timber of prodigious size there were growing in ' our little county of Surrey, the nearest of any to ' London, and plentifully furnished, both for profit ' and pleasure, with sufficient grief and reluctancy I ' speak it, my own grandfather had standing at Wot- ' ton, and about that estate, timber that now were ' worth one hundred thousand pounds, since of what ' was left my father, who was a great preserver of ' wood, there has been thirty thousand pounds worth ' of

of the family at Wotton in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and had by two wives sixteen sons and eight daughters; he departed this life May 30, 1603, in the seventy-third year of his age, leaving his estate at Wotton to Richard Evelyn, Esq; his youngest and only surviving son by his second wife (b). This Richard Evelyn, Esq; married Eleanor, daughter and heiress of John Standfield of Lewes in the county of Suffex, Esq; and was a person of great worth and virtue (c) [B]. He had by the Lady beforementioned three sons, viz. George, John, and Richard; of the second of these, John, we are to speak in this article. He was born October 31, 1620, at his father's seat at Wotton (d), and was very carefully educated in his tender years, receiving the first elements of learning at the free-school at Lewes in Suffex, from whence he removed in 1637 to Baliol-college in Oxford (e), where, as a Gentleman-Commoner, he remained for about three years, during which space he prosecuted his studies in Logick and Philosophy, and then removed to the Middle-Temple, where he remained till the breaking out of the Civil War, when he repaired to Oxford, and obtained leave from King Charles I, under his own hand, to travel beyond the seas for his improvement (f). In the spring of 1644 he left England, in order to make the tour of Europe, which he performed very successfully, making it his business to enquire carefully into the state of the Sciences, and the improvements made in all useful arts, wherever he came; concerning which he made very large and valuable collections, the contents of which he most generously communicated to all such as applied to him for information (g). He spent some time at Rome, and having an opportunity there to learn the true sentiments of the Papists upon the cutting off Archbishop Laud's head, he thought himself obliged, in justice to that great Prelate's memory, to give an attestation thereof under his own hand (h) [C]. He visited likewise other parts of Italy for the sake of improving himself in Architecture, Painting, the knowledge of Antiquities, medals, and other branches of polite literature, and at the same time left nothing unexamined, that could contribute to the perfect understanding of Natural Philosophy, to which, beyond all other sciences, he was passionately addicted. We have an instance of his care and industry in this respect, preserved by one of the greatest and most intelligent Philosophers of this or of any other country (i) [D]. In 1647 Mr Evelyn came to Paris, where,

' of timber, fallen by the axe and the fury of the late hurricane and storm: now no more, Wotton stript and naked and ashamed almost to own its name.'

[B] Of great worth and virtue. Richard Evelyn, Esq; mentioned in the text, had besides his three sons, two daughters, Elizabeth, who married Edward Darey, of Dartford in Kent, Esq; and Jane the wife of William Glanville, Esq; (5). George Evelyn, Esq; elder brother to our Author, enjoyed the family estate at Wotton fifty-eight years; and dying in 1698, at the age of eighty-three, he left it to his brother John; he was a person of great worth, and generally esteemed by his neighbours as appeared from his being frequently elected Knight of the Shire for the County of Surrey (6). In his time, there was a very extraordinary discovery made upon opening the family vault, of which there is a full account in the additions to the English Britannia, which there is so much the more reason to credit, as those additions came from our Author himself. After describing the ridge of hills that divide Surrey from Suffex and Kent, he proceeds thus (7): 'Not far from the bottom, stands an ancient seat of the Evelyns of Wotton, among several streams gliding thro' the meadows, adorned with gentle risings and woods, which as it were encompass it. And these, together with the gardens, fountains, and other hortulane ornaments, have given it a place, and name amongst the most agreeable seats. In opening the ground of the churchyard of Wotton, to enlarge a vault belonging to this family, they met with a skeleton, which was nine foot and three inches long, as the (*) worthy and famous Mr John Evelyn had it attested, by an antient and understanding man then present, who accordingly measured it and marked the length on a pole, with other workmen who affirmed the same. They found it lying in full length between two boards of the coffin, and measured it before they had discomposed the bones. But trying to take it out, it fell all to pieces, for which reason they flung it amongst the rest of the rubbish, after they had separately measured several of the more solid bones.'

[C] Under his own hand. In order to understand this matter, it is necessary that the reader should know, that amongst other things charged upon Archbishop Laud, one was, that he had endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England to the Church of Rome, and had kept a secret correspondence with the Pope, and to maintain this, witnesses were called to shew in what credit he stood at Rome. Sir Henry Mildmay had told the Archbishop in private discourse, that he was the most hateful man there, that had ever sat in the See of Canterbury since the Reformation, but when he was examined as a witness, he affirmed that there were two factions at Rome, one of which did indeed speak very ill of the Archbishop, but the other spoke very well of him. The Archbishop intimated, that he did not believe Sir Henry Mildmay had ever been at Rome. Mr Chaloner deposed, that at Rome some had a good opinion of the Archbishop, and thought him well inclined to them, for which reason they prayed for him; Mr Anthony Mildmay seconded his brother's account, and said that the Jesuits hated him, but that the secular Priests loved the Archbishop very well, but this was hearsay only (8). After the Archbishop's death, this matter was much talked of, and therefore, as Mr Evelyn happened to be at Rome when the Archbishop was put to death, he was desired to give some account of the general sentiments of people there, which he accordingly did in the following certificate (9).

I was at Rome in the company of divers of the English Fathers, when the news of the Archbishop's sufferings, and a copy of his sermon, made upon the scaffold, came thither. They read the sermon, and commented upon it, with no small satisfaction and contempt, and looked upon him as one that was a great enemy to them, and stood in their way, whilst one of the blackest crimes imputed to him, was his being popishly affected.

JOHN EVELYN.

[D] Of this or of any other country. The person mentioned in the text, is the honourable Mr Boyle, who speaking of the effects of cold, and of the reasons there are to believe that they may subsist, even after the cold which produced them ceases, provided they are not exposed to a degree of heat that must destroy them, mentions the preserving of snow the whole year round in repositories, far from being cold enough to produce such an effect; which therefore ought to be attributed to the bare keeping of the snow from being exposed to warm air. To illustrate this, that learned man tells us, he intended to have cited from some books, an account of these storehouses which he remembered to have seen in Italy; but where, being recommended to Sir Richard Browne, Bart. the King's Minister there, he made his addressees to his only daughter Mary, whom he not long after married, and in her right became possessed of Sayes-Court near Deptford in Kent, where he resided after his return to England, which was about the year 1651 (k). He had before that time recommended himself to the notice of the learned world, by publishing several treatises which were extremely well received, and the leisure he had in his retreat at Sayes-Court after his return, put it in his power to add quickly to their number. These were for the most part translations, either from the learned or modern languages, for he was perfectly versed in both, without any unreasonable prepossessions in favour of Antiquity, or prejudice against it. Such kind of labours, whatever they may be thought of now when translations are become common, were then very justly esteemed, and were, without question, highly serviceable, as well in propagating useful knowledge, as in the improvement of our stile, of which Mr Evelyn was a great master, as these treatises, if he had left none besides, might sufficiently demonstrate [E]. The situation of publick affairs induced but missing of his expectation in books, he endeavoured to supply it by enquiry.—— But let him tell the rest of his story himself—— meeting therefore the other day, says he (10), with my ingenious friend, Mr John Evelyn, his inquisitive travels, and his insight into the more polite kinds of knowledge, and particularly architecture, made me desire and expect of him that account of the Italian way of making conservatories of snow, that I had missed of in several authors, and having readily obtained my desire of him, I shall not injure so justly esteemed a stile as his, to deliver his descriptions in any other words than those ensuing ones, wherein I received it from him. 'The snow pits in Italy, &c. are sunk in the most solitary and cooled places, commonly at the foot of some mountain, or elevated ground, which may best protect them from the meridional and occidental sun: twenty five foot wide at the orifice, and about fifty in depth, is esteemed a competent proportion. And though this be excavated in a conical form, yet it is made flat at the bottom or point. The sides of the pit are so joisted, that boards may be nailed upon them very closely jointed. His Majesty's at Greenwich, newly made on the side of the castle hill, is, as I remember, steened with brick, and hardly so wide at the mouth. About a yard from the bottom, is fixed a strong frame, or tressel, upon which lies a kind of wooden grate, the top or cover is double thatched with reed or straw, upon a copped frame or roof, in one of the sides whereof, is a narrow door case, hipped on like the top of a dormer, and thatched, and so it is compleat.' To conserve snow. 'They lay clean straw upon the grate or wattle, so as to keep the snow from running through, whilst they beat it to a hard cake of any icy consistence, which is near one foot thick, upon this they make a layer of straw, and on that snow beaten as before; and so continue a bed of snow and a bed of straw S. S. S. till the pit be full to the brim. Finally, they lay straw or reed, for I remember to have seen both, a competent thickness over all, and keep the door locked. This grate is contrived, that the snow melting by any accident in laying, or extraordinary season of weather, may drain away from the mass, and sink without stagnating upon it, which would accelerate the dissolution, and therefore the very bottom is but slightly steened. Those who are most circumspect and curious, preserve a tall circle of shady trees about the pit, which may rather shade than drip upon it.' This is certainly an admirable specimen of that care with which our Author registered his discoveries, as well as the curiosity which prompted him to enquire into every thing worthy of notice, either natural or artificial, in the countries through which he passed. It is much to be regretted, that a work so entertaining and instructive, as the history of his travels would have been, appeared even to so indefatigable a person as he was, a task for him too laborious to undertake; for we should have then seen clearly, and in a true light, many things in reference to Italy, which are now very indistinctly and partially represented; and we should also have met with much new matter never touched before, and of which we shall now probably never hear at all.

[E] Might sufficiently demonstrate.] As several of these treatises were printed before the Author's return to England, and others without his name; so we must depend upon the general opinion of the world, and the authority of Mr Wood for their being his; yet there is no great reason to suspect any mistake, since the account of them was published in his life-time, and therefore Mr Evelyn had an opportunity of setting the world right, if any error had been committed of consequence enough to have merited his notice.

There is a copy of verses by Edmund Waller, Esq; of Beaconsfield, prefixed and directed to his worthy friend Mr Evelyn, and part of the character he gives him is worthy the reader's attention. After describing the subject of the book he proceeds thus:

So vast this argument did seem,
That the wise author did esteem,
The Roman language (which was spread O'er the whole world in triumph led)
A tongue too narrow to unfold
The wonders which he would have told.
This speaks thy glory, noble friend,

Nor Lucan, we nor Horace spar'd,
Only Lucretius was too hard;

Untouch'd, till your victorious hand,
Did from his head this garland bear,
Which now upon your own you wear.
A garland! made of such new bays,
And fought in such untrodden ways,
As no man's temples e'er did crown, induced him to consider that privacy with which he lived at Sayes-Court as a very great blessing; and so fond was he of this rural retreat, that he was very desirous of making it his settled course of life, though but a young man, with a considerable fortune, and extremely admired and courted by all his acquaintance. This studious disposition, together with his disgust of the world, occasioned by that strange scene of violence and confusion that was then acted upon the publick stage, was so strong, that he actually proposed to the Honourable Mr Robert Boyle, the raising of a kind of college for the reception of persons of the same turn of mind, where they might enjoy the pleasure of agreeable society, and at the same time pass their days without care or interruption. His scheme for such an establishment is equally entertaining and curious [F]. But when a prospect appeared of better

[F] Is equally entertaining and curious. The letter, in which this plan of a college is contained, is directed to the Hon. Mr Robert Boyle, and dated from Sayes-Court, September 3, 1659. Our author expresses himself very much at large, and very pathetically represents, though with great caution and modesty, the miseries of the times, and the reasons which might induce men of true virtue and strict science to think of sheltering themselves in some quiet retreat, from the disagreeable accidents to which they might be liable, in such times, and amongst such men, as the world then abounded with. He declares, that if he had been a single person, and without family, he would, without hesitation, have dedicated his fortune to the raising such a college as he proposed, to the thoughts of which he seems to have been led by a discourse of the great Lord Chancellor Bacon's. He likewise observes, that notwithstanding his situation in the world prevented him from undertaking such a thing alone, yet nothing could give him greater pleasure than the hopes of associating Mr Boyle therein. He says farther, that, though this project had been long swimming in his mind, yet he had never communicated it to any person whatever, so that Mr Boyle need not be under any apprehensions of opening himself freely upon a thing of so private a nature. He adds to all this, that he had no particular cause of discontent, being, with respect to his circumstances, perfectly easy, happy, and satisfied in his family; well respected in the world; and, in all things, as free from the necessity of looking for such a retreat, exclusive of his own inclination, as any Gentleman whatever. Without taking notice of these parts of his letter, the plan itself would be scarce intelligible; to have transcribed them at large, would have swelled this note beyond its proper bounds; and therefore I judged it proper to contract them: but with respect to the author's scheme, which is very curious and entertaining, at the same time that it has a close relation to his personal history, it is certainly requisite that should appear in the author's own words. No doubt Mr Boyle wrote an answer to it, which would have been well worth the perusal, but whether that be still preserved or not is very uncertain. As for Mr Evelyn's proposal, it runs thus (11):

(11) Boyle's Works, Vol. II. P. 398, 399.

I propose the purchasing of thirty or forty acres of land, in some healthy place, not above twenty-five miles from London, of which a good part should be tall wood, and the rest upland pastures, or downs sweetly irrigated. If there were not already an house which might be converted, &c. we would erect, upon the most convenient site of this near the wood, our building, viz. one handsome pavillion, containing a refectory, library, withdrawing-room, and a closet; this the first story: for we suppose the kitchen, larders, cellars, and offices, to be contrived in the half story under ground. In the second should be a fair lodging-chamber, a pallet-room, gallery, and a closet, all which should be well and very nobly furnished, for any worthy person that might desire to stay any time, and for the reputation of the college. The half story above, for servants wardrobes and like conveniencies. To the entry fore-front of this court, and at the other back-front, a plot walled in, of a competent square for the common scraglio, disposed into a garden, or it might be only carpet, kept curiously, and to serve for bowls, walking, or other recreations, &c. if the company please. Opposite to the house, towards the wood, should be erected a pretty chapel, and, at equal distances, even within the flanking walls of the square, six apartments or cells for the members of the society, and not contiguous to the pavillion, each whereof should contain a small bed-chamber, an outward room, a closet, and a private garden, somewhat after the manner of the Carthusians. There should likewise be an elaboratory, with a repository for rarities and things of nature; aviary, dove-house, physick-garden, kitchen-garden, and a plantation of orchard-fruit, &c. all uniform buildings, but of single stories, or a little elevated. At convenient distance, towards the solitary garden, should be a stable for two or three horses, and a lodging for a servant or two. Lastly, a garden-house and conservatory for tender plants. The estimate amounts thus: the pavillion, 400/; the chapel, one hundred and fifty pounds; apartments, walls, and out-housing, six hundred pounds; the purchase of the fee for thirty acres, at fifteen pounds per acre, eighteen year's purchase, four hundred pounds; the total, fifteen hundred and fifty pounds; sixteen hundred pounds will be the utmost. Three of the cells or apartments, that is, one moiety with the appurtenances, shall be at the disposal of one of the founders, and the other half at the others. If I and my wife take up two apartments (for we are to be decently asunder however I stipulate, and her inclination will greatly suit with it, that shall be no impediment to the society, but a considerable advantage to the oeconomic part) a third shall be for some worthy person, and, to facilitate the rest, I offer to furnish the whole pavillion completely to the value of five hundred pounds, in goods and moveables, if need be for seven years, till there shall be a publick stock, &c. There shall be maintained, at the publick charge, only a Chaplain well qualified, an antient woman to dress the meat, wash, and do all such offices; a man to buy provision, keep the garden, horses, &c. a boy to assist him and serve within. At one meal a day, of two dishes only, unless some little extraordinary upon particular days or occasions (then never exceeding three) of plain and wholesome meat; a small refectory at night: wine, beer, sugar, spice, bread, fish, fowl, candle, soap, oats, hay, fuel, &c. at four pounds per week, two hundred pounds per annum; wages, fifteen pounds; keeping the gardens, twenty pounds; the Chaplain, twenty pounds per annum. Laid up in the treasury one hundred forty-five pounds, to be employed for books, instruments, drugs, trials, &c. The total, four hundred pounds a year, comprehending the keeping of two horses for the chariot, or the saddle, and two kine; so that two hundred pounds per annum will be the utmost that the founders shall be at to maintain the whole society, consisting of nine persons (the servants included) though there should no others join capable to alleviate the expence; but, if any of those who desire to be of the society, be so well qualified as to support their own particulars, and allow for their proportion, it will yet much diminish the charge, and of such there cannot want some at all times as the apartments are empty. If either of the founders thinks expedient to alter his condition, or that any thing do humanitus contingere, he may resign to another, or sell to his colleague, and dispose of it as he pleases, yet so as it still continue the institution. ORDERS. At six in summer prayers in the chapel. To study till half an hour after eleven. Dinner in the refectory till one. Retire till four. Then called to conversation (if the weather invite) abroad, else in the refectory. This never omitted but in case of sickness. Prayers at seven. To bed at nine. In the winter the same, with some abatements for the hours, because the nights are tedious, and the evenings conversation more agreeable. This in the refectory. All play interdicted, fans bowls, ches, better times, it occasioned some change in his sentiments, and, upon an attempt being made to damp the desires of the people for the King's return, he drew his pen in that critical season in defence of his Majesty's character (m), which, at such a juncture, was both an acceptable and a very important service [G]. Immediately after the King's return, Mr Evelyn was introduced to, and graciously received by, him, nor was it long before he received a very singular mark of the King's esteem for, and confidence in, him. It happened thus: there had many troubles and disputes fallen out between the Ambassadors of the crowns of France and Spain, for precedence in the Courts of foreign Princes, and amongst these there was none more remarkable than that upon Tower-Hill, on the landing of an Ambassador from Sweden, September 30, 1660, which was so premeditated a business on both sides, that the King, foreseeing it would come to a quarrel (n), and being willing to carry himself with indifference towards both, which could not be otherwise done, than leaving them at liberty to take what methods they thought proper for supporting their respective pretences, but to shew at the same time his concern for the publick tranquillity, orders were given for a strict guard to be kept upon the place, and all his Majesty's subjects were enjoined not to intermeddle, or take part with either side; and the King was farther pleased to command, that Mr Evelyn should, after diligent enquiry made, draw up and present him a distinct narrative of the whole affair, which he accordingly

'chefs, &c. Every one to cultivate his own garden. One month in spring a course in the elaboratory on vegetables, &c. In the winter a month on other experiments. Every man to have a key of the elaboratory, pavilion, library, repository, &c. Weekly fast. Communion once every fortnight, or month at least. No stranger easily admitted to visit any of the society, but upon certain days weekly, and that only after dinner. Any of the society may have his commons to his apartment, if he will not meet in the refectory, so it be not above twice a week. Every Thursday shall be a musick meeting at conversation hours. Every person of the society shall render some publick account of his studies weekly, if thought fit, and especially, shall be recommended the promotion of experimental knowledge, as the principal end of the institution. There shall be a decent habit and uniform used in the college. One month in the year may be spent in London, or any of the Universities, or in a perambulation for the publick benefit, &c. with what other orders shall be thought convenient.'

VII. An Apology for the Royal Party, written in a letter to a person of the late Council of State; with a touch at the pretended Plea of the Army. Lond. 1659. in two sheets in 4to.

But while Mr Evelyn and other gentlemen of his sentiments were thus employed, those of the contrary party were not idle, and amongst these one Marchmont Needham, who first wrote with great bitterness for the King against the Parliament, and afterwards with equal acrimony for the Parliament against the King, was induced to pen that piece mentioned in the text, which was deservedly reckoned one of the most artful and dangerous contrivances, for impeding that healing spirit that began now to spread itself through the nation, and with that view was handed to the press by Praise-God Barebone one of the fiercest zealots in those times, the title of which at large runs thus (14): News from Brussels, in a letter from a near attendant on his Majesty's person, to a person of honour here, dated March the 10th 1659. the design of this pretended letter was to represent the character of King Charles the Second in as bad a light as possible, in order to destroy the favourable impressions that many had received of his natural inclination to mildness and clemency. All the King's friends were extremely alarmed at this attempt, and saw plainly that it would be attended with most pernicious consequences; but Mr Evelyn, who had as quick a foresight as any of them, resolved to lose no time in furnishing an antidote against this poison, and with great diligence and dexterity, sent abroad in a week's time a compleat answer which bore the following title.

VIII. The late news or message from Brussels unmasked. Lond. 1659. 4to.

This was certainly a very seasonable and a very important service, which for his own safety our Author managed with such secrecy, that hardly any body knew from whom this Pamphlet came. But how much soever he had reason to be pleased with the success of his pen upon this occasion, he could not help being extremely mortified at the change he perceived in his friend Colonel Morley's behaviour, who of a sudden grew very silent and reserved, and at length plainly avoided any private conversation with Mr Evelyn. In this situation our Author had the courage to write him an expostulatory letter, which was in effect putting his life into his hands, and yet even this failed of procuring him the satisfaction he expected; however he felt no inconvenience from it, for this alteration in Colonel Morley's countenance towards him, was not at all the effects of any change in his disposition, but arose from his having entered into new engagements for the King's service, with Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper and General Monk (15), who had tied him down to such absolute secrecy, that he was not able at that juncture to give Mr Evelyn any hint that might make him easy, but by degrees these clouds were dispelled, and he saw plainly enough from the Colonel's publick behaviour, that he had no reason to apprehend any mischief from the confidence he had reposed in him.

[G] And a very important service ] The conduct of Mr Evelyn in this critical year 1659, which was in truth the most active in his whole life, is hardly taken notice of by any of those who have undertaken to preserve his memoirs, and therefore we will endeavour to give the reader as much light into it as possible. After the death of Oliver, and the deposition of Richard Cromwell, there were many of the Commanders in the Army, that shewed an inclination to reconcile themselves to the King, which disposition of theirs was very much encouraged by such as had his Majesty's interest truly at heart. Amongst these, Mr Evelyn had a particular eye upon Colonel Herbert Morley (12), an old experienced Officer in the Parliament Army, who had two stout Regiments entirely at his devotion, was very much esteemed by his party, and had the general reputation of being a person of great probity and honour. It was a very dangerous step as things then stood, to make any advances to one in his situation, yet Mr Evelyn, considering how much it might be in that gentleman's power to facilitate the King's return, fairly ventured his life, by advising the Colonel freely to make his peace with, and enter into the service of, the King. The Colonel, as might well be expected, acted coldly and cautiously at first, but at last accepted Mr Evelyn's offer, and desired him to make use of his interest to procure a pardon for himself, and some of his relations and friends whom he named, promising in return to give all the assistance in his power to the royal cause. At the same time that Mr Evelyn carried on this dangerous intercourse with Colonel Morley, he formed a resolution of publishing something that might take off the edge of that inveteracy, expressed by those who had been deepest in the Parliament's interest, against such as had always adhered to the King, and with this view he wrote a small treatise which had the desired effect, and was so generally well received, that it ran through three impressions that year, the title of this piece was (13), accordingly did, and it is a very curious and remarkable piece, though not taken notice of in any of the accounts of our author's writings, which is the reason of our speaking of it with all its circumstances [H]. Our author began now to enter into the active scenes of life, but yet without bidding adieu entirely to his studies; on the contrary, he published, in the space of a few months, several learned treatises upon different subjects (o), which met with great applause, the rather, because the author expressed in some of them his intention to prosecute more largely several philosophical subjects, in a manner that might render them conducive to the benefit of society; and of his capacity for performing these promises, some of these pieces were instances sufficient to satisfy every intelligent reader, as well as to justify the character he had already acquired, of being at once an able and agreeable

[H] With all its circumstances.] This piece of Mr Evelyn's is very curious, and not being to be met with in any of his works, the reader cannot be displeas'd with having this opportunity of perusing it, more especially when he sees, by the conclusion, what the consequences were of this political riot. The title of it ran thus: The manner of the Encounter, between the French and Spanish Ambassadors, at the landing of the Swedish Ambassador.

Upon Monday last being the 30th of September, about ten in the morning the Spanish Ambassador's coach, in which were his Chaplain with some of his gentlemen, attended by about forty more of his servants in livery, was sent down to the Tower wharf, and there placed itself near about the point, where the ranks of ordnance determine towards the gate leading into the bulwark. Next after him came the Dutch and (twelve a-clock past) the Swedish coach of honour, disposing of themselves according to their places. About two hours after this (in company with his Majesty's Coach Royal) appeared that of the French Ambassador's, wherein were Le Marquis d'Estrade, son to the French Ambassador, with several more of his gentlemen, and as might be computed near an hundred and fifty in train, whereof above forty were horsemen well appointed, with pistols, and some of them with carabines, musketoons, or fuzies: in this posture and equipage stood they expecting upon the wharf, and as near as might be approaching to his Majesty's coach, which was opposite to the stairs, about three in the afternoon the Swedish Ambassador being landed, and received into his Majesty's coach, which moved leisurely before the rest, and was followed by that of the Swedes. The French Ambassador's coach endeavoured to go the next, driving as close as possibly they could, and advancing their party with their swords drawn, to force the Spaniards from the guard of their own coach, which were also putting in for precedency next the King's. His Majesty's coach now past the Spaniard's, who held as yet their rapiers undrawn in their hands, stepping nimbly on either side of the hindmost wheels of their master's coach drew their weapons and shouted, which caus'd the French coach horses to make a pause: but when they observ'd the advantage, which by this the Spanish Ambassador's coach had gain'd, being now in file after the Swedes, they came up very near to the Spaniard's, and at once pouring in their shot upon them, together with their foot, then got before their coach, fell to it with their swords, both which the Spaniards received without removing one jot from their station.

During this demesse (in which the French received some repulse and were put to a second stand, a bold and dextrous fellow, and as most affirm with a particular instrument as well as address, stooping under the bellies of the French Ambassador's coach-horses, cut the hamstring of two of them, and wounded a third, which immediately falling, the coach for the present was disabled from advancing farther, the coachman forced out of his box, and the postilion mortally wounded, who falling into the arms of an English gentleman that stepped in to his succour, was by a Spaniard pierced through his thigh. This disorder (wherein several were wounded and some slain) caus'd those in the French to alight, and so enrag'd their party, that it occasion'd a second brisk assault both of horse and foot, which being received with extraordinary gallantry, many of their horse retreated and wheel'd off to St Katherine's.

It was in this skirmish, that some brickbatts were thrown from the edge of the wharf, which by a mistake are said to have been provided by the Spanish Ambassador's order the day before: but that they were not cast by any of the English, is attested by the general consent of all the spectators.

In this interim then (which was near half an hour) the Spanish coach went forward after his Majesty's, with about twenty of its retinue following, who still kept their countenances towards the French as long as they abode on the wharf, and that narrow passage of the bulwark (where the contest was very fierce) without disorder: so as the first which appeared on Tower-Hill, where now they were entering, was his Majesty's coach followed by the Swedes Ambassador's, and next by that of Spain with about twenty-four or thirty of his Liveries still disputing it, with a less number of French who came after them in the rear.

And here besides what were slain with bullets on the wharf, and near the bulwark, whereof one was a Valet de Chambre of the Spanish Ambassador's, and six more, amongst which a poor English Plaisterer, and near forty wounded, fell one of the French, who was killed just before his Highness's Life-Guard, no one person of the numerous spectators intermeddling, or so much as making the least noise or tumult, people or soldiers, whereof there were three companies of foot, which stood opposite on the hill to the Guards of Horse, 'twixt whom the antagonists lightly skirmish'd some fresh parties of French coming out of several places and protected by the English, amongst whom they found shelter till the Spanish Ambassador's coach having gain'd and pass'd the chain which leads into Crochet Friars, they desisted and gave them over.

Whatever disadvantage the French came off with in this rencounter, wherein except one man that fought among the Spaniards with a half pike, not any of the English were seen to act any thing that might contribute to the success of one side more than another, till a few of the multitude which stood on that side of the wharf being enrag'd by the wounds, which they received from the shot that came in amongst them, and whereof 'tis said some of them afterwards died, were forced to defend themselves with what they found at hand. For so careful was Sir Charles Berkeley, Captain of his Royal Highness's Life-Guard, to put in execution what he had in strict charge from his Majesty, that not a man of the spectators was suffer'd with impunity so much as with a switch in his hand. The French King from this occasion gain'd an advantage to the prerogative he stood upon, greater than if this contest had not happen'd; for whereas, this business of precedence had been hitherto in controversy between him and Spain, in so much that to prevent all inconveniencies, an accord had been lately made here betwixt the Spanish Ambassador and the Count of Soissons, that they should assist at no publick ceremonies, but upon all such casual encounters pass on their way as they fortun'd to meet: The King of France countermanding this agreement, and sending positive charge to D'Estrade not to abate any thing of those pretensions formerly stood upon, and hearing what ensued upon his Ambassador's executing of his injunctions, was so incens'd thereat, that the quarrel had proceeded to an absolute breach of the late concluded peace betwixt the two Kingdoms, had not the King of Spain condescended to agree that thence forward, precedence should be yielded to the French upon all such like occasions without any dispute.

agreeable writer [I]. About the close of the year 1662, when his Majesty was pleased, by his Letters Patent, to erect and establish the Royal Society for the improvement of Natural knowledge, John Evelyn, Esq; was appointed one of the first Fellows and Council (p). He had given a proof the same year how well he deserved that distinction, by a small but excellent work of his, intituled SCULPTURA (q), of which, as it is now become very scarce, an account shall be given in the notes [K]. [I] An able and agreeable writer. It is certain that very few authors who have written in our language, deserve this character so well as Mr Evelyn, who tho' he was acquainted with most sciences, and wrote upon many different subjects, yet was very far, indeed the farthest of most men of his time, from being a superficial writer. He had genius, he had taste, he had learning, and he knew how to give all these a proper place in his works, so as never to pass for a pedant, even with such as were least in love with literature, and to be justly esteemed a polite author by those who knew it best. His performances during this year, except one, were but light and trivial in comparison of those that he afterwards sent abroad; but it is necessary however, that the reader, who will expect a large account of those, should take notice of these likewise.

[K] In the notes ] Of this work which has been always looked upon as a very great curiosity, from the time of its publication to this day, the title at large runs thus. XIII. Sculptura: or the History and Art of Calcography and engraving in copper, with an ample enumeration of the most renowned masters and their works. To which is annexed, a new manner of engraving or Mezzo Tinto, communicated by his Highness Prince Rupert, to the Author of this treatise. Lond. 1662. 8vo. In the dedication to Mr Robert Boyle, dated at Sayes-Court, April 5th 1662, he observes, that he wrote this treatise at the reiterated instances of that gentleman. The first chapter treats of Sculpture, how derived and distinguished, with the styles and instruments belonging to it. The second, of the original of Sculpture in general. In this chapter our Author observes that letters, and consequently Sculpture, were long before the Flood, Suidas ascribing both letters and all the rest of the Sciences to Adam. After the Flood, as he supposes, there were but few who make any considerable question, that it might not be propagated by Noah to his posterity, tho' some admit of none before Moses. 'But what then shall we think of that book of the wars of the Lord, which this sacred Author mentions Num. xxi. not to insist upon the eighty eighth, and one hundred and nineteenth Psalms, by many ascribed to some of the patriarchs his predecessors? Mercurius Trismegistus, three hundred years after the Flood, and long before Moses, engraved his secret and mysterious things in stone, as himself reports, reforming what had been depraved by the wicked Cham, some in letters, some in figures, and enigmatical characters, such haply as were those contained in the magnificent and stupendous obelisks, erected by Misra the first Egyptian Pharaoh, which being at least, four hundred years before Moses, as the most indefatigable Kircher has computed, does greatly presage their antiquity to have been before that holy Prophet. But not to put too much stress upon superannuated tradition, this we are sure of is of faith and without controversy, that in Moses we have the tables of stone engraven by the finger of God himself, where the command is express even against the abuse of this very art, as well as an instance of the idolatry attesting that of Sculpture, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image. But this which is indeed, the first writing that we have Scripture to vouch for, does yet suppose engraving to have been of much greater antiquity. What else were the Teraphim, what the Pentos stolen by Rachael? The Idols of Terah? Or the Egyptians? &c. But we forbear to expatiate only that which is Ben Syrac, somewhere in Ecclesiasticus delivered, that the original of idolatry was from images to preserve the memory of the dead, as in process of time by the flatterers of great men, it was turned to be an object of adoration, plainly infers graving to have been older than Idolatry.' But now, continues our Author, to recover its esteem again beyond all prejudice (however by others abused as indeed many of the best things have been;) it was we know imputed for a spiritual talent in Bezaleel, and Aholiab, who made Intaglias to adorn the High Priest's Pectoral. And we have said how the Egyptians revered it, as seeming to have used it before letters, or rather their Hieroglyphics, importing faced sculpture were those elements by which they transmitted to posterity, what they esteemed most worthy of record, and not as some have imagined wrapp'd up in those enigmatical figures, the secrets of their arts both divine and secular; such as were also the Horapollinis notæ, and all those other venerable antiquities of this nature, transported to Rome out of Egypt, in no less than two and forty prodigious obelisks, interpreted by the industrious Kircher. Suidas attributes the invention to the Father of the Faithful, others to Theut or Hermes, some to Cadmus and the Phœnicians. Bibliander will have letters and sculpture from Adam, Josephus from Henoah; Philo from Abraham, Eusebius, from Moses, Cyprian from Saturn, where by the way, because it is said he did Litteras imprimere, Petrus Calaber, who calls himself Pomponius Lætus, absurdly deduces, that even the Typographical Art was known in the age of this Hero. But thence it descended to the Egyptians, by Misraim, and so was communicated to the Persians, Medes, and Assyrians, thence to the Greeks, and lastly to the Romans, from whom it was derived to us, as Peter Crinitus, in his seventh Book of bonestâ Disciplinâ, out of a very antient manuscript Bibliothecæ Septimianæ, seems to deduce. Now should all this but relate to the several characters it shall yet serve our purpose, since whoever was the inventor of letters, was also doubtless the father of Sculpture, as is apparent if not by the columns erected by Seth, (one whereof Angelus Roccha, in his Bibliotheca Vaticana, presumes to have been of brass) by several other instances, the writing with ink, paper, or parchment, being altogether a novelty in comparison with the more antient forms and materials, such as were the flit stones or slates, which succeeded the stately marbles, and preceded the thinner leaves of bark and tables of wood, which, from the German Bucher, signifying the Fagus or Beech tree, whose fruit does still with us retain the name of Beech mast, were called Books, to whatever voluble or folding matter applied. For before the invention of paper, they used the leaves of palm, as Varro, de Sibylla; then the rinds of trees, afterwards sheets of lead, linnen, wax, and ivory, as Vopiscus tells us. They wrote in silk among the Persians and Chinese, and lastly were invented parchment and paper. But, whether in all these or whatever the subject were some few later excepted, it was still by insculping, scarifying, and making a kind of incision into it, especially intending to consign to posterity, their laws divine and human, Roman, Egyptian, or Hebrew for so of old.

Thus were the Hieronicæ preserved in the temple of Olympian Jove, and the Roman Consuls in the Capitol, tion's being obliged to engage in a war with the Dutch, the King thought proper to appoint tol, and as by those innumerable inscriptions of irrefragable and undeniable antiquities does appear, we have already computed how probable it is, that Sculpture was in use in Egypt somewhat before, or at least, as soon as the Patriarch Abraham went thither. But the less discerning Greeks who received it from the Egyptians, could tell us of no writings of theirs extant before Homer, if we will prefer the authority of Josephus before that of Tatian, a learned Assyrian and contemporary with Justin Martyr, where he mentions no less than seventeen Greek writers more ancient than Homer. There are also enumerated the names of twenty Argive Kings from Inachus to Agamemnon, which strongly infers the means of recording by Sculpture and writing to have been very antient. For so we read, that the Poems of Hesiod were engraven in lead. Aristotle mentions Daphne, a certain Devotress of Apollo, Sabinus and Diodorus many others. But when or however it were, thence, as we observed, it travelled into Greece, that Theatre of Arts, where it soon arrived to the supreme height of perfection, when being applied to the forming of figures, it was celebrated by all the witty men of those and the succeeding ages. Homer tells us, of the engraving in the shield of Achilles, Hesiod of that of Hercules, not to mention the Sculptures upon the chariot of the sun described by the Poet, because it is altogether fictitious, tho' extremely ingenious, and whence perhaps they might have their Vehicula Caelata, mentioned by Q. Curtius. The third chapter treats of the reputation and progress of Sculpture among the Greeks and Romans down to the middle ages, with a discussion of some pretensions to the invention of copper cuts, and their impressions. The fourth, of the invention and progress of Chalcography, in particular together, with an ample enumeration of the most renowned masters and their works. The fifth, of drawing and design, previous to the Art of Chalcography, and of the use of pictures in order to the education of children. In this chapter our Author, in honour of the Art upon which he writes, discourses thus: 'It was in the former chapter, that we made rehearsal of the most renowned Gravers and their works, not that we had no more to add to that number, but because we would not mingle these illustrious names and qualities there, which we purposely reserved for the crown of this discourse; we did therefore forbear to mention what his Highness Prince Rupert's own hands have contributed to the dignity of that Art, performing things in graving of which some enrich our collection comparable to the greatest Masters, such a spirit and address there appears in all that he touches, and especially in that of the Mezzotinto, of which we shall speak hereafter more at large, having first enumerated those incomparable gravings, of that his new and inimitable stile, in both the great and little decollations of St John the Baptist, the soldier holding a spear and leaning his hand on a shield, the two Mary Magdalens, the old man's head, that of Titian, &c. after the same Titian, Georgion and others; we have also seen a plate etched by the present French King and other great persons, the Right Honourable the Earl of Sandwich, sometimes as we are told diverting himself with the burine, and herein imitating those antient and renowned Heroes, whose names are loud in the trumpet of fame, for their skill and particular affection to these Arts. For such of old, were Lucius Manilius, and Fabius, noble Romans, Pacuvius the tragic Poet, nephew to Ennius; Socrates, the wisest of men, and Plato himself, Metrodorus and Pyrrhus the Philosopher, did both design and paint, and so did Valentinian, Adrian, and Severus, Emperors, so as the great Paulus Æmilius esteemed it of such high importance, that he would needs have his son to be instructed in it, as in one of the most worthy and excellent accomplishments belonging to a Prince. For the Art of graving, Quintilian likewise celebrates Euphranor, a polite and rarely endowed person, and Pliny, in that chapter where he treats of the same Art observes, that there was never any one famous in it, but who was by birth or education a gentleman, therefore he and

Galen in their recension of the liberal Arts, mention that of graving in particular amongst the most permanent, and in the same catalogue numbers it with Rhetorick, Geometry, Logic, Astronomy, yea, Grammar itself, because there is in these Arts, say they, more of fancy and invention than strength of hand, more of the spirit than of the body. Hence Aristotle informs us, that the Grecians did universally institute their children, in the Art of painting and drawing, for an oeconomique reason there signified, as well as to produce proportions in the mind: Varro makes it part of the ladies education, that they might have the better skill in the works of Embroidery, &c. and for this cause is his daughter Martia celebrated amongst those of her fair sex. We have already mentioned the learned Anna Schurman, but the Princess Louisa has done wonders of this kind, and is famous throughout Europe for the many pieces which enrich our cabinets, examples sufficient to vindicate its dignity, and the value that has been set upon it, since both Emperors, Kings, and Philosophers, the great and the wise, have not disdained to cultivate and cherish this honourable quality of old, so nobly reputed, that amongst the Greeks a slave might not be taught it: how passionately does Pereskius, that admirable and universal genius, deplore his want of dexterity in this Art! Baptista Alberti, Aldus Pomponius, Guaricus Durer, and Rubens, were politely learned and knowing men, and it is hardly to be imagined, of how great use and conducive a competent address in this Art of drawing and designing, is to the several advantages which occur, and especially to the more noble mathematical Sciences, as we have already instanced in the lunar works of Hevelius, and are no less obliged to celebrate some of our own countrymen famous for their dexterity in this incomparable Art, such was that Blagrove, who himself cut those diagrams in his Mathematical Jewel, and such at present, is that rare and early prodigy of universal science, Dr Chr. Wren, our worthy and accomplished friend. For if the study of Eloquence and Rhetorick were cultivated by the greatest genius's and heroick persons which the world has produced, and that by the suffrage of the most knowing to be a perfect Orator, a man ought to be universally instructed, a quality so becoming and useful should never be neglected.' In the sixth chapter he discourses of the new way of Engraving or Mezzo Tinto, invented and communicated by his Highness Prince RUPERT, and he therein observes, 'that his Highness did indulge him the liberty of publishing the whole manner and address of this new way of engraving, but when I had well considered it, says he, (so much having been already expressed, which may suffice to give the hint to all ingenious persons how it is to be performed) I did not think it necessary, that an art so curious, and as yet so little vulgar, and which indeed does not succeed where the workman is not an accomplished designer, and has a competent talent in painting likewise, was to be prostituted at so cheap a rate, as the more naked describing of it here, would too soon have exposed it to. Upon these considerations, then it is, that we leave it thus enigmatical, and yet that this may appear no disingenuous rhodomontade in me, or invidious excuse, I profess myself to be always most ready sub sigillo, and by his Highness's permission, to gratify any curious and worthy person, with as full and perfect a demonstration of the entire Art, as my talent and address will reach to, if what I am now preparing to be reserved in the Archives of the Royal Society concerning it, be not sufficiently instructive.' There came however, into the hands of the communicative and learned Richard Middleton Maffey, M. D. and F. R. S. the original manuscript written by Mr Evelyn, and designed for the Royal Society, intitled Prince Rupert's new way of Engraving, communicated by his Highness to Mr Evelyn. In the margin of which is this note, This I prepared to be registred in the Royal Society, but I have not yet given it in, so as it still continues a secret. In this manuscript, he first describes the two instruments employed appoint Commissioners to take care of the sick and wounded; this was in November 1664, and Mr Evelyn was one of the number, having all the ports between Dover and Portsmouth in his district; and Sir Thomas Clifford, who was afterwards a Peer, and Lord High-Treasurer of England, was another of those Commissioners (r). We find these particulars in a letter from our author to Mr Boyle, in which he expresses how great a satisfaction it would have been to have had that worthy and charitable person for his colleague. His literary labours within the compass of this year were not only as great, but even greater than in any of those preceding, which arose from the great desire the author had to support the credit of the Royal Society, and to convince the world, that Philosophy was not barely an amusement fit to take up the time of melancholy and contemplative persons, but a high and useful science, worthy the attention of men of the greatest parts, and capable of contributing in a supreme degree to the welfare of the nation (s). In this noble design, as never any man engaged with a better will, or prosecuted his intentions with greater diligence, so it may be truly said, that never any advocate for Philosophy employed his talents with greater success. He exerted them also in the defence, and for the improvement, of the publick taste in Architecture and Painting, with equal vigour and with equal applause. The same praises that were bestowed upon him then, have been continued in respect to his works from the gratitude of posterity, nor are his learned efforts in behalf of science and the polite arts, less relished now than at the time of their first appearance, a reward, which, though it may have been deserved by many, has however been received by few, at least in the same degree with our author, and is therefore an incontestible proof of his merit [L]. As there is nothing more natural, than for men of ployed in this new manner of engraving, viz. the Hatchet and the Style, and then proceeds to explain the method of using them. He concludes with the following words: 'This invention or new manner of Chalcography, was the result of chance, and improved by a German soldier, who spying some scrape on the barrel of his musquet, and being of an ingenious spirit, refined upon it, till it produced the effects you have seen, and which indeed is, for the delicacy thereof, much superior to any invention extant of this Art, for the imitation of those masterly drawings, and, as the Italians call it, that morbidezza expressed in the best of their designs. I have had the honour to be the first of the English to whom it has been yet communicated, and by a special indulgence of his Highness, who with his own hands was pleased to direct me with permission to publish it to the world, but I have esteemed it a thing so curious, that I thought it would be to profane it, before I had first offered it to this illustrious Society. There is another way of engraving by rowelling a plate with an instrument, made like that which our Scriveners and Clerks use to direct their rulers by on parchment, only the points are thicker set into the rowell. And when the plate is sufficiently freckled with the frequent reciprocation of it, upon the polished surface, so as to render the ground dark enough, it is to be abated with the style, and treated as we have already described. Of this sort I have seen a head of the Queen Christina, graven, if I mistake not, as big as the life, but not comparable to the Mezzo Tinto of Prince Rupert, so deservedly celebrated by

[L] An incontestible proof of his merit] The digesting the numerous works of this elegant and excellent writer in their natural order, is a work of no small pains, as those who have given the world his memoirs heretofore were very sensible, and for that reason never attempted it; yet that is not the cause of our mentioning it here, but a consideration of quite a different nature, which is, that we may not be blamed for any deficiency or mistake into which we may happen to fall through want of proper guides, in spite of all the care that we could possibly take; and having promised this, we will proceed in our catalogue:

XV. SYLVA: or, a Discourse of Forest Trees, and the Propagation of Timber in his Majesty's Dominions. As it was delivered in the Royal Society the 15th of October 1662, upon Occasion of certain Queries propounded to that illustrious Assembly by the Honourable the principal Officers and Commissioners of the Navy. To which is annexed, POMONA: or, an Appendix concerning Fruit Trees, in relation to Cyder, the making, and several ways of ordering it: published by express Order of the Royal Society. By John Evelyn, Esq; Fellow of the Royal Society. Lond. 1664, fol.

VOL. III. No. 156.

The bare History of the editions of this most valuable work, the contents of which are too well known to stand in need of any account to be given of them here, is sufficient to employ all the room that we have to spare. It was written by the command, it was published in virtue of an order, of the Royal Society, signed by the Lord Viscount Brouncker, their President, and dedicated to the King. The second edition of it was published in 1669, with a new dedication to King Charles II, dated from Sayes-Court Aug. 24. The first paragraph of which is so remarkable as to deserve, in a great degree, the reader's notice. 'Sir, This second edition of Sylva, after more than a thousand copies had been bought up and dispersed of the first impression, in much less than two years space (which Bookfellers assure us is a very extraordinary thing in volumes of this bulk) comes now again to pay it's homage to your Serene Majesty, to whose auspices alone it owes the favourable acceptance which it has received in the world. But it is not that alone which it presumes to tell your Majesty, but to acquaint you that it has been the sole occasion of furnishing your almost exhausted dominions with more I dare say than two millions of timber trees, besides infinite others, which have been propagated within the three nations at the instigation, and by the direction, of this work; and that the author of it is able, if need require, to make it out by a competent volume of letters and acknowledgments, which are come to his hands from several persons of the most eminent quality, many of them illustrious, and divers of them unknown to him, in justification of what he asserts, which he the rather preserves with the more care, because they are testimonials from so many honourable persons of the benefit they have received from the endeavours of the Royal Society, which now-a-days passes through so many censures; but she has yet your Majesty for her Founder and Patron, and is therefore the less concerned, since no man of worth can lightly speak ill of an Assembly, which your Majesty has thought fit to dignify by so signal a relation to it.' There follows next a short discourse To the Reader, in which the occasion, contents, and design of the work, are cleared; then a copy of Latin verses by the learned Dr Beale; to these succeed another copy of Latin verses, written by R. Bohun, Esq; and then a third in Greek, by John Evelyn, junior, Esq; POMONA, which is but an Appendix, is however dedicated to that best of Ministers, Thomas, Earl of Southampton, and Lord High Treasurer of England. The third edition, with great additions and improvements, was published in 1679. The fourth edition in 1705, in which the Discourse to the reader is very much enlarged, and every chapter of the work very considerably augmented. There was a fifth edition, with all the lesser pieces of our author relating to agriculture and gardening annexed, in 1729, all in folio; nor is there any reason to doubt it's farther success.

XVI. A PARALLEL of the Antient Architecture with the Modern, in a collection of ten principal Authors, who have written upon the five Orders, viz. Palladio and Scamozzi, Serlio and Vignola; D. Barbaro and Cataneo; L. B. Alberti and Viola, Bullant and De Lorme; compared with one another. The three Greek Orders, Doric, Ionic and Corinthian, comprise the first part of this Treatise, and the two Latin; Tuscan and Composita, the latter; written in French by Roland Freart, Sieur de Chambray; made English for the benefit of Builders. To which is added an account of Architects and Architecture, in an Historical and Etymological Explanation of certain Terms, particularly affected by Architects; with Leon Baptista Alberti's Treatise of Statues. By John Evelyn, Esq; Fellow of the Royal Society. Lond 1664. folio.

This work, as well as the former, is dedicated to King Charles the Second, and the Dedication dated from Sayes-Court, August 20th. I will take the liberty of quoting some lines from it, not for the sake of panegyrick, tho' in that no writer excelled our Author, but upon the score of the facts that are mentioned therein, which there is a probability might not otherwise fall in the reader's way. After an apology for prefixing his royal name to a translation, our Author proceeds thus. 'I know none indeed, to whom could I more aptly inscribe a discourse of Building, than to so Royal a Builder, whose august attempts have already given so great a splendour to our imperial city, and so illustrious an example to the nation! it is from this contemplation, Sir, that after I had, by the commands of the Royal Society, endeavoured the improvement of timber and the planting of trees, I have advanced to that of Building, as its proper and natural consequent, not with a presumption to incite or instruct your Majesty, which were a vanity unpardonable, but by it to take occasion of celebrating your Majesty's great example, who use your Empire and authority so worthily, as fortune seems to have consulted her reason, when she poured her favours upon you; so as I never cast my eyes on that generous designation in the Epigram,

without immediate reflection on your Majesty, who seem only to value those royal advantages you have above others; that you may oblige, and that you may build. And certainly, Sir, your Majesty has consulted the noblest way of establishing your greatness, and of perpetuating your memory, since, whilst stones can preserve inscriptions, your name will be famous to posterity; and, when those materials fail, the benefits that are engraven in our hearts will outlast those of marble. It would be no paradox, but a truth, to affirm that your Majesty has already built, and repaired, more in three or four years, notwithstanding the difficulties and the necessity of an extraordinary oeconomy for the publick concernment, than all your enemies have destroyed in twenty; nay, than all your Majesty's predecessors have advanced in an hundred, as I could easily make out, not only by what your Majesty has so magnificently designed and carried on at that, your antient honour of Greenwich, under the conduct of your most industrious and worthy surveyor, but in those splendid apartments, and other useful reformation for security and delight about your Majesty's Palace at Whitehall, the chargeable covering first, then paving and reformation of Westminster-Hall, care and preparation for rebuilding St Paul's, by the impiety and iniquity of the late confusions, almost dilapidated, with what her Majesty the Queen-Mother has added to her Palace at Somerset-House, in a structure becoming her royal grandeur, and the due veneration of all your Majesty's subjects, for the honour she has done both this your native city, and the whole nation. Nor may I here omit what I so much desire to transmit to posterity, those noble and profitable amœnities of your Majesty's plantations, wherein you most resemble the divine Architect, because your Majesty has proposed in it such a pattern to your subjects, as merit their imitation and profoundest acknowledgments, in one of the most worthy and kingly improvements that nature is capable of. I know not what they talk of former ages, and of the now contemporary Princes with your Majesty, these things are visible: and should I here descend to more particulars, which yet were not foreign to the subject of this discourse, I would provoke the whole world to produce me an example parallel with your Majesty, for your exact judgment and marvellous ability in all that belongs to the naval Architecture, both as to its proper terms and more solid use, in which your Majesty is master of one of the most noble and profitable arts that can be wished, in a Prince to whom God has designed the dominion of the ocean, which renders your Majesty's Empire universal; where, by exercising your royal talent and knowledge that way, you can bring even the Antipodes to meet, and the poles to kiss each other; for so likewise, not in a metaphorical but natural sense, your equal and prudent government of this nation, has made it good, whilst your Majesty has so prosperously guided this giddy bark, through such a storm, as no hand, save your Majesty's, could touch the helm, but at the price of their temerity.' There is also another Dedication to Sir John Denham, Knight of the Bath, Superintendent, and Surveyor of all his Majesty's buildings and works, in which there are several matters of fact worth knowing, as indeed there are in all Mr Evelyn's Dedications; for tho' no man was naturally more civil, or more capable of making a complement handsomely; yet his merit was always conspicuous in his good manners; and he never thought that the swelling sound of a well turned period, could atone for want of sense. It appears from the Dedication of the second edition of the Sylva to King Charles the Second, that there was a second edition of this work also in the same year, viz. 1669, as there was a third in 1697, which was the last in the Author's life-time, and therefore the last that I am obliged to mention. In this third edition, which is very much improved, the account of Architects and Architecture, which is an original work of Mr Evelyn's, and a most excellent one of its kind, is dedicated to Sir Christopher Wren, Surveyor of his Majesty's buildings and works, and therein occurs a passage that concerns the personal history of our Author so much, that it would be unpardonable in me to omit it. Having said in the first paragraph, that if the whole Art of building were lost, it might be found again in the noble works of that great Architect, which, tho' a very high, is no unjust complement; more especially, continues our Author, St Paul's Church and the Monument, and then adds. 'I have named St Paul's, and truly not without admiration, as oft as I re-call to mind, as frequently I do, the sad and deplorable condition it was in, when, after it had been made a stable of horses and a den of thieves, you, with other gentlemen and myself, were, by the late King Charles, named Commissioners to survey the dilapidations, and to make report to his Majesty, in order to a speedy reparation: you will not, I am sure, forget the struggle we had with some who were for patching it up any how, so the steeple might stand, instead of new building, which it altogether needed: when, to put an end to the contest, five days after (16), that dreadful conflagration happened, out of whose ashes this Phoenix (16) August 27 Sept. 2, 1666. is risen, and was by providence designed for you. The circumstance is too remarkable, that I could not pass it over without notice. I will now add no more, but beg your pardon for this confidence of mine, after I have acquainted you that the Parallel to which this was annexed being out of print, I was importuned by the Bookseller to add something to a new impression, but to which I was no way inclined; till, not long since, going to St Paul's to contemplate that august pile, and the progress you have made, some of your chief workmen gratefully acknowledging the assistance it had afforded them, I took this opportunity of doing myself this honour.' The fourth edition of this work, printed long after our Author's death, viz. in 1733, was in folio, as well as the rest; to which is added the Elements

purſued their ſtudies; ſo Mr Evelyn gave a noble teſtimony of his high reſpect for that of Oxford, by uſing his utmoſt intereſt with the Lord Henry Howard, in order to prevail upon him to beſtow the Arundelian marbles, then remaining in the garden of Arundel houſe in the Strand (t), upon the univerſity, in which he happily ſucceeded, and obtained, in conſequence of it, all the reward he deſired, which was the thanks of that learned body, delivered by Delegates ſpecially appointed for that purpoſe (u); which venerable monuments of Antiquity ſtill remain at Oxford, and are now diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as contributes equally to ornament and uſe, where, while they continue to command the admiration of every intelligent ſpectator, they muſt, at the ſame time, perpetuate the remembrance of that zeal with which Mr Evelyn exerted himſelf, in order to procure ſo proper as well as ſo magnificent an act of bounty, equally worthy of the Moſt Noble Perſon by whom it was beſtowed, and of that moſt learned body upon whom it was beſtowed (w) [M]. This was far from being the laſt favour conferred by that noble perſon, at the requeſt of Mr Evelyn, whom he honoured with his friendſhip in the moſt entire degree, after he arrived at the high title of Norfolk; as, on the other hand, Mr Evelyn made no other advantage of his kindneſs towards him, than giving a right direction to the natural generoſity of that excellent perſon, whence flowed ſome particular marks of kindneſs to the Royal Society, which were very gratefully accepted, and ſomething farther would have been procured, if the ſudden and unexpected death of that great and good man (x) had not fruſtrated the ſchemes formed by our author for the ſervice of that learned ſociety, to which, from it's very foundation, he was attached with a zeal, which, however warm, never felt any decay [N]. Mr Evelyn ſpent his time, at this juncture, in a manner as

XVII. Μυστήριον τῆς Ἀπορίας; that is, another part of the Myſtery of Jeſuitiſm, or the new Hereſy of the Jeſuits, publicly maintained at Paris, in the College of Clermont, the twelfth of December 1661, declared to all the Biſhops of France, according to the copy printed at Paris. Together with the imaginary Hereſy, in three letters; with divers other particulars relating to this abominable Myſtery, never before publiſhed in Engliſh, Lond. 1664. 8vo. This, indeed, has not our Author's name to it; but, that it is really his, and that he had reaſons for not owning it more publicly, will appear from the following extract of a letter from him to Mr Boyle (17). 'If my book of Architecture do not fall into your hands at Oxon, it will come with my apology when I ſee you at London, as well as another part of the Myſtery of Jeſuitiſm, which, with ſome other papers concerning that iniquity, I have tranſlated, and am now printing at Roſton's, but without my name.—So little credit there is in theſe days, in doing any thing for the intereſt of religion!'

XVIII. Kalendarium Hortenſe, or the Gardiners Almanack, directing what he is to do monthly throughout the year, and what fruits and flowers are in prime. By John Evelyn, Eſq; Lond. 1664, 8vo. The ſecond edition of this book, which I take to have been in folio, and bound with the Sylva and Pomona, as I am ſure it was in the third edition, was dedicated to Abraham Cowley, Eſq; with great complements from our Author, to that excellent and worthy perſon to whom it had been communicated before, which occaſioned Mr Cowley's addreſſing to John Evelyn, Eſq; his mixt eſſay in verſe and proſe, entitled, the Garden, which has been always admired as one of the fineſt pieces that fell from the pen of that illuſtrious Poet. We ſhould next inform the reader of the ſeveral editions this curious and uſeful work has gone through; but the truth is, we have it not in our power, the editions of it being long ago out of number, the laſt (at leaſt that we know of) of which any account was kept, was the ninth; ſince that, it is ſaid in the title page, a new edition. The Author made many additions as long as he lived, ſo that the beſt was that printed by way of Appendix to the fourth and laſt edition of the Sylva in his life-time, which is alſo, in the fifth edition of that work, printed after his deceaſe; we have had many Kalendars ſince, ſome better and ſome worſe; but it was eaſy to write after ſo fair an original, which, in method and form, as well as matter, is very elegant and concise, and withal very plain, ſuited exactly to the capacities of thoſe for whoſe uſe it was deſigned.

ros, and containing the moſt antient and authentick inſcriptions, relative to the State of Athens, were, at an immenſe expence, purchaſed and brought into England, by Thomas Earl of Arundel, to whom our Author, Mr Evelyn, was well known in Italy, and were placed in the garden of his Palace without Temple-Bar; they were afterwards, as the reader has ſeen in the text, removed to Oxford, and are at preſent fixed on the outward wall of the Theatre, marked with the letter (H), to diſtinguiſh them from other antiquities of the ſame kind, and which are placed there likewiſe, that were beſtowed upon the Univerſity by the learned Selden (18). As a farther mark of the gratitude of that learned body, the following inſcription is placed under the arms of the noble family of Howard. 'Æternæ Memorix excellentiſſimi Dni. Domini Henrici Howard de Caſtle Reifing, Fratris & Hære-dis, Thomæ Howard Ducis Norfolciæ, a proſapia regiâ primi Comitis Angliæ, Comitibus Surreiæ Dominis & Baronis de Howard, Domini & Baronis Mowbray Seagrave Brewes de Gower Fitzallen Clun Oswaldtree Maltrevers & Greyſtoke, ad Muley Urshed Marocienſem Imperatorem Legati. pleasing as he could wish; he had great credit at Court and great reputation in the world, was one of the Commissioners for rebuilding St Paul's (y), attended the meetings of the Royal Society with great regularity; undertook readily whatever tasks were assigned him to support that reputation, which, from their first institution, they had acquired, and which, by degrees, triumphed over that envy which it raised. He was punctual in the discharge of his office as a Commissioner of the sick and wounded, and when he had leisure retired to his seat at Sayes-Court, where he carried into practice the rules he so judiciously laid down, and made his gardens the entertainment and the wonder of the greatest and most judicious men of those times, most of whom were his particular friends (z). Yet in the midst of his employments, both publick and private, and notwithstanding the continual pains that he bestowed in augmenting and improving the books he had already published, he found leisure sufficient to undertake fresh labours of the same kind, and that too without any diminution of the high character he had obtained by his former writings [O]. He made a journey to Oxford in the summer of 1669, where, on the 15th of July, he was honoured with the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law, as a mark of the gratitude of that learned body (a), and of the just sense they had of the credit derived to them from his being educated in Baliol-college. It was indeed a singular point of Mr Evelyn's felicity, that all the honours he obtained, and all the posts to which he was raised, were the meer rewards of his merit, and bestowed upon him without the least sollicitation. Thus, after King Charles II had tried, with very little effect, to promote trade, according to the advice of persons engaged therein (b), when he thought proper to erect

he died at his house in Arundel-Street (19). His friendship for Mr Evelyn began early, and lasted without interruption; so long as they lived; as appears from a solemn memorial of his gratitude, on the part of Mr Evelyn (20), besides several occasional testimonies of deep respect in his works. It was at the request of Mr Evelyn, that his Grace gave several testimonies of regard to the Royal Society, and bestowed upon them the Arundel Library, which was a curious and valuable collection (21). He likewise intended to have given a most noble statue of Minerva to the University of Oxford, but his unexpected death prevented Mr Evelyn from getting it timely removed (22). [O] By his former writings.] It is a point of justice due to the merit and memory of our author, to remark, that though he wrote so much, and published so many books, upon such a diversity of subjects, yet is there none of them that carries any mark of haste or negligence; on the contrary, they appear all of them to have cost much study and attention, and to perform more than is promised by their titles; some instances of which will appear in this note.

XIX. The History of the three late famous Impostors, viz. Padre Ottomano, pretended Son and Heir to the late Grand Signior; Mahomet Bei, a pretended Prince of the Ottoman Family, but, in truth, a Wallachian Counterfeit; and Sabbatai Sevi, the supposed Messiah of the Jews, in the Year 1666; with a brief Account of the Ground and Occasion of the present War between the Turk and the Venetian: Together with the Cause of the final Extirpation, Destruction, and Exile, of the Jews out of the Empire of Persia. Lond. 1668, 8vo.

This piece is dedicated to Henry Earl of Arlington, and, as I before observed, that Mr Evelyn's Dedications are filled with curious facts, rather than a crowd of complements; so, by giving him this, I shall at once justify that observation, and gratify his curiosity, as to the contents of a book that is now become very scarce; it runs thus:

My Lord,

THESE ensuing discourses entitle their original, to the noble industry and affection to truth of an illustrious person, and to the great and worthy ingenuity of a Persian stranger, lately amongst us, from whose mouth I have received the two following first narrations, and from whom I have been abundantly satisfied, that the particulars are of undoubted verity. For the third, and last, which concerns the story of that impudent Jew, it will need little apology, since it proceeds not only from an eye-witness, but from the hand of a person who has already gratified the publick with the fruit of many rare and excellent observations, and which becomes due to your Lordship upon a just claim; so as your Lordship having been so pleased with the first relation, cannot be less with the following; though I should never have presumed to be their deferent in this unpolished dress, had I not received some assurances of your pardon.

It will doubtless appear very strange, that impostures of this magnitude should so long abuse the world, were there no other interest in it than the vanity of the persons who assume to themselves the titles. Whatever the reason of it be, here we have matter of fact; and it was more than time the world should at last be disabused, which has been so long imposed on, and even laboured under the common mistake, That the cause of this obstinate war and quarrel 'twixt the Turk and the Venetian, was grounded only upon the taking Sultan Osman and his mother, pretended son and wife of Sultan Ibrahim, by the gallies of Malta. This was, my Lord, the believed report at my being at Venice the very year this action fortun'd, and it has since gained credit, and filled our ears, and all the Histories of this age, as a thing unquestionable; but, with what pretence of truth, these papers will both inform your Lordship, and give day to some other passages worthy the notice of inquisitive men, and of a conjuncture so seasonable for it, while the eyes and thoughts of all Europe are intent upon the success of Candia. What concerns the Wallachian vagrant will be a service both to his Majesty and other Christian Princes, whom this bold impostor has had the front to abuse, but, eripitur persona, the mask is now off, and I have no more to add than that of being, &c.

This Dedication is subscribed J. E. and certainly if Mr Wood had seen it, he would not have said as he does, I know nothing yet to the contrary but this may be a translation (23). The nature and value of this little piece was much better known abroad, one of the best received Literary Journals extant having given, though at some distance of time, a very just character of it (24), with this very remarkable circumstance, that the pretended Mahomet Bei was at that very juncture in the city of Leipfick. There is added, at the end of this piece, an account of the extirpation of the Jews in Persia, during the reign of Shah Abbas the Second, which is not so large or perfect as the rest, but then the author gives a hint of this, and does not press any thing farther than he is supported by authorities. He mentions a person, who, the very year that the book was published, took upon him the title of brother to the famous Count Serini, and that he had the misfortune to be shipwrecked in the West of England (25), by which he imposed upon persons of quality, till, by unluckily calling for drink upon the road in very audible English, he discovered the cheat, and was obliged to renounce his new dignity to avoid Bridewell. He farther remarks with respect to Sabbatai Sevi, that he was the twenty-fifth false Messiah that had attempted to impose upon the Jews, even according to their own account.

XX. Publick employment, and an active life preferred to solitude, in a reply to a late ingenious Essay of a contrary title. Lond. 1667. in 8vo. This was written, in answer to a discourse of Sir George Mackenzie's, preferring solitude to publick employment, which was at the time of its publication much admired, and as our Author apprehended this might prove an encouragement to indolence and timidity, he therefore wrote against it. We have in the Transactions of the Royal Society a character of this, and the piece before mentioned, which follows the account given of the second edition of the Sylva, and is worthy the reader's perusal (26). ' Besides other treatises which are anonymous, says this account, as being of a reserved nature, but are nevertheless, entirely for the honour of the King and this Kingdom, and generally for the good of all men, he hath lately made two considerable excursions, in one of which, treats for a caution of all future ages, and to denote the general aptness of mankind to be deluded and deceived, he hath published a well grounded history of the three late famous impostors, the first, merely casual and innocent, in Padre Ottomanno; the second, bold and impudent, in Mahomet Bei; the third, a confident cheat, in Sabbatai Sezi, the Jews counterfeit Messias: in the other tract, publick employment and an active life are preferred to solitude. Thus he, and other generous persons, can, in the crowd of publick business, find or make leisure to oblige all men; whilst morose schoolmen and narrow critics make it their main business, to out go Satan in their false accusations, disingenuous surmises, and immodest disturbances of the noblest endeavours and achievements.'

XXI. An Idea of the perfection of Painting, demonstrated from the principles of art, and by examples conformable to the observations, which Pliny and Quintilian have made upon the most celebrated Pieces of the antient Painters, parallel'd with some works of the most famous modern Painters, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Julio Romano, and N. Poussin. Written in French by Roland Freart, Sieur de Cambray, and rendered English by J. E. Esquire, Fellow of the Royal Society. Lond. 1668. 8vo. This translation, is dedicated to Henry Howard of Norfolk, heir apparent to that Dukedom, and the dedication is dated from Sayes-Court, June the 24th 1668. In the preface, he observes, that the reader will find in this discourse, divers useful remarks, especially, where the Author treats of Costume (27), which we, continues he, have interpreted Decorum, as the nearest expression our language will bear to it. And, I was glad our Author had reprov'd it, in so many instances, because, it not only grows daily more licentious, but even ridiculous and intolerable. But, it is hoped this may universally be reformed, when our modern workmen shall consider, that neither the exactness of their design, nor skilfulness in colouring, has been able to defend their greatest predecessors from just reproaches, who have been faulty in this particular. I could exemplify in many others, whom our Author has omitted, and there is none but takes notice, what injury it has done the fame of some of our best reputed Painters, and how indecorous it is to introduce circumstances, wholly improper to the usages and genius of the places, where our histories are supposed to have been acted.' Mr Evelyn then remarks, that this was not only the fault of Bassano, who would be ever bringing in his wife, children, and servants, his dog, and his cat, and very kitchen-stuff, after the Paduan mode; but of the great Titian himself, Georgion, Tintoret, and the rest, as Paulo Veronese is observed also to have done in his story of Pharaoh's daughter drawing Moses out of the river, attended with a guard of Swisses. Malvogius likewise, in a picture then in the King's gallery at Whitehall, not only represents our first parents with navels upon their bellies, but has placed an artificial stone fountain carved with imagery, in the midst of his Paradise. Nor, does that excellent and learned Painter Rubens escape without censure, not only for making most of his figures of the shapes of brawny Flemings, but for other sphalmata, and circumstances of the like nature, tho' in some, he has acquitted himself to admiration, in the due observation of Costume, particularly in his crucifixes, &c. Raphael Urbino was, doubtless, one of the first who reformed these inadvertencies, but it was more conspicuous in his latter, than in his former pieces. ' As for Michael Angelo, continues Mr Evelyn, tho' I heartily consent with our critic in reprov'ing that almost idolatrous veneration of his works, who hath certainly prodigiously abused the art, not only in the table this discourse arraigns him for, but several more which I have seen, yet I conceive, he might have omitted some of those imbittered reproaches he has reviled him with, who doubtless was one of the greatest masters of his time, and however he might succeed as to the Decorum, was hardly exceeded for what he performed in Sculpture, and the statuary art by many even of the antients themselves, and haply by none of the moderns, witness his Moses, Christy in Gremio, and several other figures at Rome, to say nothing of his talent in Architecture, and the obligation the world has to his memory, for recovering many of its most useful ornaments and members out of the neglected fragments, which lay so long buried, and for vindicating that antique and magnificent manner of building, from the trifling of Goths and Barbarians.' He observes next, that the usual reproach of Painting, has been the want of judgment in Perspective, and bringing more into history than is justifiable, upon one aspect without turning the eye to each figure in particular, and multiplying the points of sight, which is a point even Monsieur Freart, for all the pains he has taken to magnify that celebrated decision of Paris, has failed in. For the knowing in that art easily perceive, that even Raphael himself has not so exactly observed it, since, instead of one, as Monsieur Freart takes it to be, and as indeed it ought to have been, there are no less than four or five, as du Bossé hath well observed in his treatise of the converted Painter, where, by the way also, he judiciously numbers amongst the faults against Costume, those Landskips, grotesque figures, &c. which we frequently find abroad especially, for in our country we have few or none of those graceful supplements of steeples painted, horizontally and vertically on the vaults and ceilings of cupola's, since we have no examples for it from the Antients, who allowed no more than a fret to the most magnificent and costly of those which they erected. But, would you know from whence this universal caution in most of their works proceeded, and that the best of our modern Painters and Architects have succeeded better than others of that profession, it must be considered, that they were learned men, good Historians, and generally skilled in the best antiquities, such were Raphael, and doubtless his scholar Julio, and if Polydore arrived not to the glory of letters, he yet attained to a rare habit of the antient gusto, as may be interpreted from most of his designs and paintings. Leon Baptist Alberti was skilled in all the politer parts of learning to a prodigy, and has written several curious things in the Latin Tongue. We know that of later times, Rubens was a person universally learned, as may be seen in several Latin Epistles of his to the greatest scholars of his age. And Nicholas Poussin the Frenchman, who is so much celebrated and so deservedly, did it seem arrive to this by his indefatigable industry, as the present famous Statuary, Bernini now living, says Mr Evelyn, has also done so universal a mastery, that not many years since he is reported to have built a theatre at Rome, for the adornment whereof, he not only cut the figures and painted the scenes, but wrote the play, and composed the musick, which was all in recitativo. And I am persuaded, that all this is not yet by far so much as that miracle and ornament of our age and country, Dr Christopher Wren, were able to perform, if he were so disposed, and so encouraged, because he is master of so many admirable advantages beyond them. I alledge these examples partly to incite, and partly to shew the dignity and vast comprehension of this rare art, and that for a man to arrive to its utmost perfection, he should be almost members of that Council, he likewise appointed Mr Evelyn amongst those, that were recommended purely to that honour by their abilities (c). This preferment was so welcome to a person of his disinterested temper and true publick spirit, that he thought he could not express his gratitude better, than by digesting in a short and plain discourse the chief heads of the History of Trade and Navigation, which he accordingly did, and dedicated that small piece to the King, which was very graciously received, and is allowed to contain as much matter in as small a compass, as any that was ever written upon a topick so copious, as well as so important (d) [P]. As this promotion not only opened the means, but also required the employing many of his hours in the service of his country, it naturally diverted him in some measure from his studies; but, notwithstanding this, when the Royal Society (e) found it requisite to demand the assistance of some of its principal Members, and to exact from them the tribute of certain dissertations upon weighty and philosophical subjects, he did not plead either his age or his avocations in excuse, but cheerfully and vigorously set about the task that was assigned him, and performed it as happily as the Society or himself could wish, as the reader will learn at the bottom of the page [Q]. These were all the preferments he met with in that reign, and though they were ‘ most as universal as the Orator in Cicero, and the Architect in Vitruvius. But certainly, some tincture in History, the Opticks and Anatomy, are absolutely requisite, and more in the opinion of our Author, than to be a steady Designer, and skilled in the tempering and applying of colours, which amongst most of our modern workmen go now for the only accomplishments of a Painter.’

[P] As well as important.] We have in the text shewn the occasion and ground of this treatise, which from its bevyty deserves not the name of a book, so much as of a pamphlet. The title at large runs thus,

XXII. Navigation and Commerce, their original and progress, containing a succinct account of Traffic in general, its benefits and improvements, of discoveries, wars, and conflicts at sea, from the original of Navigation to this day, with special regard to the English Nation, their several voyages and expeditions to the beginning of our late difference with Holland, in which his Majesty's title to the dominion of the sea is asserted, against the novel and later Pretenders. By J. Evelyn, Esq; S. R. S. Lond. 1674. 8vo.

There is a dedication prefixed to the KING, in which he takes notice of that relation, in which he stood by his new office to his Majesty, which gave him the boldness to bring so inconsiderable an offering into his presence. There is also a very succinct account of it, in the Philosophical Transactions (28), and the truth is, that most people comparing the pompous title page, with the diminutive size of the book, have from thence formed a conclusion to its disadvantage, and consequently in some degree to the discredit of its Author. But whoever examines it narrowly, and weighs every part of it with due consideration, will, if I mistake not highly, entertain a different notion of this discourse, and think it at least equal to any thing we have of this gentleman's writing, which, so long as useful learning is esteemed, and the English language understood, will be thought no mean character. In order to have a right notion of it, we must first of all reflect on the Author's design in writing it; the nature and copiousness of the subject, and the persons for whose use it was principally intended. As to Mr Evelyn's design it was plainly this, to digest into as narrow a compass as possible in the clearest method, and in the most flowing language, the History of Commerce and Navigation in general, of those of England in particular, and of the rights of the British Crown to the dominion of the sea. These were subjects equally important and extensive, but it was by no means, his inclination to treat them in a full or in a scientific manner, tho' this short treatise is an abundant proof, that no man living was more capable of doing it, if that had been his view. But the truth is, he meant only to skim the cream, and to represent as succinctly and fairly as possible, the strongest and most interesting motives, to make these subjects the study of Those whom it most concerns the nation, should have them in their heads and at their hearts. In short, he meant it as a sort of brief introduction for the use of those noble and great personages, whom the King, for the honour of that board, had thought fit to associate with him in this commission (29). It was necessary to fix their attention, that the title should promise much, it was no less requisite, to secure a reading, that the piece should be very short. Take it in this light, it will appear instead of a superficial a very wonderful performance, for it comprehends in little more than a hundred pages, an universal history of these matters, from the origin of trade down to that time, and upon a strict review it will be found, that every material point is touched therein, and this at once in so sprightly and so judicious a manner, as to excite a desire in the ingenious and inquisitive reader, to search the several topicks to the bottom; and for their assistance in this respect, the best and most authentic Authors are indicated throughout, and tho' the treatise is so small, yet there is an accurate index or table at the end, the slightest review of which will plainly demonstrate the truth of all that I have said. Upon the whole, instead of censuring Mr Evelyn for publishing so trite a pamphlet, upon affairs of such national concern, we ought rather to applaud him for having reduced into an hour's reading, with much more labour to himself, than if he had wrote a great book, things of so much moment, and add to it our wishes, that some judicious person would make his learned dissertation, the text, and within the compass of a moderate Quarto, illustrate, by proper notes, so excellent an abridgment of all that is requisite to be known, upon matters that will never lose their use, and which import this nation more than any other, to which nothing can contribute so much as their being fully explained.

[Q] At the bottom of the page.] The title of this learned discourse, which will be ever esteemed and has been often reprinted runs thus:

XXIII. TERRA: A Philosophical Discourse of Earth, relating to the culture and improvement of it for vegetation, and the propagation of plants, &c. as it was presented to the Royal Society, April 29th 1675. By J. Evelyn, Esq; F. R. S. London 1675. fol. and 8vo.

There is prefixed to this discourse, a letter from the Lord Viscount Brouncker, President of the Royal Society, and our Author's answer; as these are very short, and altogether historical, we will give them to the reader, and refer him to the Philosophical Transactions, for a short, full, and accurate account of the work (30).—His Lordship's letter runs thus— ‘ Sir, ‘ the Council of the Royal Society, considering with ‘ themselves the great importance of having the publick meeting of the said Society constantly provided ‘ with entertainments suitable to the design of their ‘ institution, have thought fit to undertake to contribute each of them one, not doubting, but that many ‘ of the Fellows of the Society will join with them ‘ in carrying on such an undertaking, and being well ‘ persuaded of your approbation of this their purpose, ‘ so much tending to the reputation and support of ‘ the society, they desire that you will be pleased to ‘ undertake for one, and to name any Thursday after ‘ the fourteenth of January next, such as shall be ‘ most convenient for you, when you will present the ‘ society at one of their publick meetings by yourself, ‘ or some other of the Fellows for you, with such a ‘ discourse grounded upon, or leading to, philosophical experiments on a subject of your own choice: ‘ in doing of which you will benefit the society, and ‘ oblige, Sir, &c.

were none of them very considerable in respect of profit, yet they seem to have given him perfect content, and he was so easy in his own circumstances, so good an economist, and so true a Patriot, that while he daily saw fresh improvements made in every county throughout the kingdom, and the commerce of the nation continually extended, he thought himself perfectly happy, and never failed to express his sentiments in that respect with all the warmth and freedom imaginable. The severe winter of 1683 gave some interruption to his domestick enjoyments, the frost committing dreadful depredations in his fine gardens at Sayes-Court, of which he sent a full and very pathetick account to the Royal Society, in the beginning of the succeeding spring (f) [R]. Mr Evelyn's answer runs thus.

' My Lord, I have, in obedience to your Lordship, and the irresistiblé suffrages of that society, over which you preside, resigned the papers to be disposed of as you think fit: I hear your Lordship's sentence is they should be made publick. Why should not a thousand things of infinitely more value, daily enriching their collection, and which would better justify the laudable progress of that assembly, be oftner produced as some of late have been? This, my Lord, would obviate all unkind objections, and cover the infirmities of the present discourse, with things indeed worthy our institution. But as I am to obey your Lordship's commands, so both your Lordship and the society are accountable for publishing the imperfections of, My Lord, &c.'

As these letters fully declare the occasion and nature of this discourse, as well as the means of its being made publick, we may rest satisfied, that notwithstanding the great modesty of Mr Evelyn, this past in the opinion of the society for a very extraordinary performance, otherwise they would never have caused it to be published, much less in the manner they did, nor is it less certain, that it every way answered their intention, it being universally well received abroad, as well as at home, and excited a just esteem for that learned body.

[R] Of the succeeding spring.] It is a thing universally known, and by some still remembered, that the winter of 1683 was the coldest of any, the signal effects of which have been recorded by credible authors. Mr Evelyn's letter therefore is a very great curiosity; it is dated from Sayes-Court, Deptford, April 14, 1684, and, exclusive of an admirable history, contains, in a very narrow compass, a multitude of useful remarks, as well as entertaining particulars. 'As to timber trees, says he, I have not many here of any considerable age or stature, except a few elms, which having been decaying many years, one cannot well find to have received any fresh wounds, distinguishable from old cracks and hollownesses; and indeed I am told by divers, that elms have not suffered as the great oaks have done, nor do I find, amongst numerable of that species (elms) which I have planted, and that are now about twenty-five and thirty years standing, any of them touched. The same I observe of limes, walnuts, ash, beech, hornbeams, birch, chestnut, and other foresters: but, as I said, mine are young comparatively, and yet one would think that should less protect them because more tender, so as it seems the rifting so much complained of has happened chiefly among the over-grown trees, especially oaks: my Lord Weymouth made his lamentation to me, and so has the Earl of Chesterfield, Lord Ferrers, Sir William Fermor, and others concerned in the same calamity, which I mention because of their distant habitations. But if rightly I remember, one of these noble persons lately told me, that, since the thaw, the trees which were exceedingly split were come together and closed again, and I easily believe it, but, that they are really as solid as before, I doubt will not appear when they shall come to be examined by the axe, and converted to use: nor has this accident happened only to standing timber, but to that which has been felled and seasoned, as Mr Shilh, the Master Builder in his Majesty's ship yard here, informed me: so much for our indiginae.

'As for exoticicks, I fear my cork trees will hardly recover, but the spring is yet so very backward, even in this warm and dry spot of mine, that I cannot pronounce any thing positively, especially of 'such whose bark is very thick and rugged, such as is the cork, enzina, and divers of the resinous trees. The constantinopolitan, or horse-chestnut, is turgid with buds, and ready to explain it's leaf. My cedars I think are lost; the ilex and scarlet oak, not so; the arbutus, doubtful; and so are bays, but some will escape, and most of them repullulate and spring afresh, if cut down near the earth at the latter end of the month. The Scotch fir spruce, and white Spanish, which last uses to suffer in their tender buds by the spring frosts, have received no damage this winter; I cannot say the same of the pine which bears the greater cone, but other Norways and pinasters are fresh; laurel is only discoloured, and some of the woody branches mortified, which being cut to the quick will soon put forth again, it being a succulent plant. Amongst our shrubs, rosemary is entirely lost; and, to my great sorrow, because I had not only beautiful hedges of it, but sufficient to afford me flowers for the making a very considerable quantity of the Queen of Hungary's celebrated water: so universal I fear is the destruction of this excellent plant, not only over England, but our neighbour countries more southward, that we must raise our next hopes from the seed. Halimus, or sea purselan, of which I had a pretty hedge, is also perished; and so another of French furzes; the cypress are all of them scorched, and some to death, especially such as were kept shorn in pyramids, but amongst great numbers there will divers escape, after they are well chastised, that is, with a tough hazel or other wand to beat off their dead and dusty leaves, which growing much closer than other shrubs, hinder the air and dews from refreshing the interior parts. This discipline I use to all my tonfile shrubs, with good success, as oft as winter parches them.

'The berry-bearing favine, which, if well understood and cultivated, were the only best succedaneum to cypress, has not suffered in the least; it perfectly resembles the cypress, and grows very tall and thick. I think the arbor thuya is alive, and so is the American acaia, acanthus, paliurus, pomgranad; my laurustinus looks suspiciously; some large and old alaternus's are killed, especially such as were more exposed to the sun, whereas those that grow in the shade escape; the reason of which, I conjecture to be from the reciprocations of being somewhat relaxed every day, and then made rigid and stiff again all night; which bending and unbending, so often opening and closing the parts, does exceedingly mortify them and all other tender plants, which, growing in shady places, undergo but one thaw and change. Most of these will yet revive again at the root, being cut close to ground: the phillyreas angustis, and serratifolio's, both of them incomparably the best for ornamental hedges of any the perennial greens I know, have hardly been sensible of the least impression, more than tarnishing of their leaves; no more have the Spanish jasmynes and Persians; and I enumerate these particulars the more minutely, that gentlemen, who are curious, may take notice what plants they may trust to abroad in all events, for I speak only of such as are exposed.

'As for the choicer rarities, which are set in for hyemation, they certainly escape, or are impaired, accordingly as they are treated by the more or less experienced and industrious gardner, or commodiousness of the conservatory; but to say what may be added on this subject, would require a large chapter, not a letter; I would in the mean time advise such as have suffered detriment in their green-houses, not to despair, when they see the leaves of their myrtles, oranges, oleanders, jasmynes, and other precious shrubs, russet or altogether shrivelled and falling; but to cut them to the quick, plaister the wounds, and plunge their cases and pots, trimmed with fresh mould, &c. in a warm bed, carefully refreshed, shaded, aired, and treated as sick patients, and as the prudent gardner best knows how. But above all, that he be sure not to expose them till these eastern winds (which I call our English Etesians, and which makes our springs so uncomfortable, when we think Winter and all danger past) be qualified; for they are deadly to all our plants abroad, and frequently do us more prejudice than the most churlish winters, as commonly finishing the destruction of what the frosts have spared; nor are we to be flattered with a warm day or two, which are apt to tempt gardeners to set out their plants before the end of April, or that we find the wise mulberry put forth, which is certainly the most faithful monitor; nor should we indeed cut or transplant any of the perennials, till of themselves they begin to sprout.

King James, we find him, in December 1685, appointed, with the Lord Viscount Tiviot of the kingdom of Scotland, and Col. Robert Philips, one of the Commissioners for executing the great office of Lord Privy-Seal, in the absence of Henry Earl of Clarendon Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which he held till March 11, 1686, when the King was pleased to make Henry Baron Arundel of Wardour Lord Privy-Seal (g). He wrote nothing under this reign at all. After the Revolution he was Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital, and though he was then much in years, yet he wrote some, and translated other pieces, amongst which we are to reckon that labour of his, which has been so highly commended by the best judges, and which will do lasting honour to his country (b) [S].

I need say nothing of holly, yew, box, juniper, &c. hardy and spontaneous to our country; and yet, to my grief again, I find an holly standard, of near one hundred years old, drooping and of doubtful aspect; and a very beautiful hedge, tho' indeed much younger, being clipp'd about Michaelmas, is mortified near a foot beneath the top, and in some places to the very ground; so as there is nothing seems proof against such a winter, which is late cut and exposed. This hedge does also grow against the south, and is very russet, whilst the contrary side is as fresh and green as ever; and in all other places of my plantations that are shaded, the unhorn hollies maintain their verdure, and are, I judge, impregnable against all assaults of Weather. Among the fruit-trees and murals, none seem to have suffered, save figs; but they being cut down, will spring again at the root.

The vines have escaped; and of the esculent plants and fallads, most, except artichokes, which are universally lost; and, what I prefer before any fallad whatever eaten raw when young, my sampier, is all rotted to the very root; how to repair my loss I know not, for I could never make any of the seed which came from the rock sampier (tho' mine were of the very kind) to grow. The arborecent, and other sedums, aloes, &c. tho' housed, perished with me; but the yucca and opuntia escaped. Tulips many are lost, and so the Constantinople-narcissus, and such tuberose as were not kept in the chimney-corner, where was continual fire. Some anemonies appear, but I believe many are rotted; but I have made no great search in the flowery parterre, only I find that most capillaries spring, and other humble and repent plants, notwithstanding all this rigorous season. My tortoise, which, by his constant burying himself in the earth at approach of winter, I looked upon as a kind of plant-animal, happening to be obstructed by a vine-root from mining to the depth he was usually wont to inter, is found stark dead, after having many years escaped the severest winter. Of fish I have lost very few; and the nightingals, which for being a short wing'd bird, and so exceeding fat at the time of the year we commonly suppose them to change the climate, whereas indeed they are then hardly able to flee an hundred yards, are as brisk and frolick as ever; nor do I think they alter their summer stations, whatever become of them all winter. I know not yet of any body who has given tolerable satisfaction, in this particular, amongst our Ornithologists.

[S] Which will do lasting honour to his country.] The following treatises were published within the period assigned in the text. We know nothing of the first, except that it has had a place in the catalogue of our author's Works, from which therefore we have no right to remove it; the second is a translation, and annexed to another and larger work of the same author's; the third is that work which we have so much commended, and to which this note principally refers.

XXIV. Mundus Muliebris: or, the Ladies Dressing-Room unlocked, and her Toilette spread. In Burlesque. Together with the Fop-Dictionary, compiled for the Use of the Fair-Sex. Lond. 1690, 4to.

XXV. Monsieur de la Quintinye's Treatise of Orange-Trees, with the raising of Melons, omitted in the French Editions; made English by John Evelyn, Esq; Lond. 1693.

This is added to the Compleat Gardner, written by the same author; translated and published in folio, with these pieces, by Mr Evelyn. We are told at the beginning, that, about twenty years before, Mons. de la Quintinye being in England, and making our author a visit at his house, he requested of him some directions in relation to melons, for the cultivation of which that French gentleman was remarkably famous, who sent them over accordingly to our author from Paris; and he assures us, that his great motive in publishing them, was to put into the hands of the world in general, and of the lovers of the art of gardening in particular, the very best directions, that, in reference to this curious subject, had ever been given. These instructions make in the whole but one half sheet: the treatise of oranges is larger, and is contained in thirteen chapters, exclusive of the preface; yet the chapters are of no great length, making in all not more than nine sheets. The method is very natural and exact, the treatise full of curious observations; and therefore it was a great service rendered to the publick by Mr Evelyn, to annex it to the translation of the rest of this great man's works, by which they are made complete.

XXVI. NUMISMATA: A Discourse of Medals, ancient and modern; together with some account of Heads and Effigies of illustrious and famous Persons, in Sculpt and Taille Douce, of whom we have no Medals extant, and of the Uses to be derived from them. To which is added, a Digression concerning Physiognomy. By J. Evelyn, S. R. S. Lond. 1697, folio.

There is prefixed to this book, a short but very affectionate dedication in Latin, to the only son and heir of Sidney Lord Godolphin, then Francis Godolphin, Esq; now the Right Honourable Francis Earl of Godolphin, of whose father, Mr Evelyn, as indeed what good man does not? makes most honourable mention, as of his most intimate and most faithful friend, recommending to his young patron the cultivation of those shining virtues, and great abilities, which were inherited to his family; and remarking to him, his peculiar happiness in descending from a line equally distinguished for parts and probity. The ingenious author has entered on his noble and extensive design by informing the reader in his epistle, that having begun this work about five years before, he desisted from prosecuting it, upon the publishing of Mr Walker's treatise upon the same subject; but finding some particularities that admitted of a further improvement, he went on again with his own discourse, and, after a short introduction, bewailing the failure of marbles, statues, trophies, &c. in perpetuating memorable actions.

He begins his first chapter with the use of medals, either made for money, or to preserve the memory of worthy actions; observing their very early use in the world, and that the first Roman money was brass, without any mark at all; then shews the original of stamping, which was for a testimonial of their being of such a weight. The first silver stamped at Rome, was a little before the first Punic war, and gold not till about sixty-two years after, at which time the worth of gold to silver, was as twelve and a half to one, tho' in the earliest times it bore but a decuple value among the Romans

One would have imagined, that being now on the borders of fourscore, and having been at least half a century an author, he would have thought it no dishonour to have sued out his Writ of Ease, when, being full of years and glory, he might have laid down his pen with as general an approbation from the candid judges of that age, as their fathers had shewn to those treatises which fell from it when he first took it up. But Mr Evelyn was not of that sort of men who are glad of a plausible excuse of retiring from labour, notwithstanding nature furnishes them with strength to go through it; on the contrary, he considered his health and his abilities, and, above all, his improved stock of knowledge from experience, as talents intrusted with him by Providence for the benefit of mankind; and he scorned in his old age to perform less diligently his duty, than, from a true principle of publick spirit, he had done in his youth. It was to this excellent frame of mind, so much admired and so little imitated, that we owe his last treatise, at least his last new treatise upon sallets (i), in which it is hard to say which deserves to be commended most, the agreeable vivacity of his language, or the wonderful maturity of his judgment [T]. Happy old man, who still

(i) See this farther explained in the note.

Romans and Greeks. Next, coming to speak more particularly of medals, he is of opinion, that they did not, when first made, pass for money, but were stamp'd in memory of particular famous actions or persons. But upon the inundation of the Goths, the lustre of medals ended, with all the more polite arts. He then treats of the materials used for money, whether leather, paper, earth, porcelain, coral, shells, linnen, or the like. He in the next place speaks of the time when the several metals came first in use, and is inclined to think iron and copper were the first, of which he gives several instances. Then he proceeds to consider the impressions and sizes, of which latter there were three.

The second chapter treats of the medals of several nations, as Hebraic, Punic, Barbarous, those of the Goths, Huns, Lombards, &c. with the British coins; where he says, he has seen a series of all our coins, from Edward the Confessor to his own times, except Richard the third. Then returning to speak of medals, he mentions the Saturnalian made in buffoonry, and touches upon some of the customs used at that feast; and observes, that, except those, no medals were made but upon grave and serious occasions. Speaking of the heads and reverses, he says, medals without any reverse are never antique, but may without head be good. Our author next makes several remarks touching the heads, as whether naked or crowned, bearded or shaven, &c. as likewise of the figures expressed at length on the reverses. He proceeds to the Greek medals, with their several ornaments and reverses; thence to the Barbarous, Parthian, Armenian, &c. and so to our Saxon, of all which he describes the particular ornaments on their heads, &c. then he comes to medals made of remarkable persons; touches upon Papal and French medals; after which he mentions the curious collection of Pyrrhus Ligorius, being twenty-six volumes of draughts of medals, inscriptions, reliefs, &c. Greek and Roman; of the Duke of Savoy's, Duke Albert's of Bavaria, now in the custody of the Royal Society, containing the images of Roman Kings, Consuls, Dictators, Knights, Tribunes, &c. from the foundation of Rome to Julius Cæsar; after which, he remarks the niceness of the Antients, in having their resemblances taken by none but exquisite masters; whence we may well believe their medals to be very like them: he concludes this chapter with a proposal of designing, in dead-life, by a very good hand, what medals of undoubted truth can be procured, and these to be as well and exactly engraven on copper-plates.

The third chapter treats of antient and modern reverses, as they relate to History, Chronology, and other parts of learning, the use and benefit whereof he shews in several particulars; informing us not only in History and Chronology, but also giving the true form of several habits, instruments, engines, machines, inventions, achievements, customs, &c. of the Antients, but imperfectly otherwise described; together with the figure under which they represented their gods and genii, particular countries, &c. with the several rewards, as crowns, &c. for virtuous and noble actions: then deploring the want of medals to illustrate our own history, he gives an account of all, or the most, that have been stamp'd here, from Edward the third through the several reigns to the late Revolution; referring the reader for those made since that time, to the late published Histoire Metallique de Guillaume III, by N. Chevalier, in fol. Amsterdam 1692.

VOL. III. No. CLVII.

The fourth chapter treats of persons and things deserving the honour of medals, tho' most of them never obtained it; and in this he finds our nation too deficient, and names several ingenious worthies then living.

The fifth chapter is of inscriptions upon medals, and their several forms and differences, chiefly relating to Roman and Greek medals; here he gives us the notes and abbreviations of words to be met with in Roman medals.

In the sixth chapter, he lays down instructions for the procuring antique and rare medals, with directions to distinguish the true from counterfeits, presenting a catalogue of some alphabetically; and in this place shews the several tricks used in making the cheats, and false ones, and sets down some ways to take off medals, by a sort of glaw and such like curiosities.

In the seventh chapter, our Author discourses of mints, and the most skilful artists, with directions to collect and dispose medals for the cabinet, and adds some reflections on the modern clipping, and diminution of coin. Here he observes the great number of mints in the same kingdom formerly, and the excellency of the method now used in minting, far beyond the old way of hammering, and in this place gives his opinion and reasons, against either debasing the coin, or enhancing the value, and then enumerates the most eminent masters in this art: amongst them he mentions Treca of Milan, who cut the King of Spain's arms on a table diamond, next he gives a catalogue of authors treating of this subject, with some curious collectors of our own and other nations, and then concludes his chapter, with a catalogue of those medals that succeed Jovianus, where Mr Walker's catalogue ends.

The eighth chapter gives an account of heads and effigies in Taille douce with particular directions for such a collection, presenting us with a catalogue of persons meriting a place therein, as well women as men.

The ninth chapter, which concludes the work, contains a digression concerning physiognomy, where the Author beginning with the head, goes through all the features of the face, and proportions of the body and limbs, giving his opinions and conjectures of the natural dispositions, wit and qualifications, to be gathered from the observation of each part and member particularly interspersed with historical remarks.

[T] Or the wonderful maturity of his judgment.]

The title of this work was very short being only this. XXVII. ACETARIA: A Discourse of Sallets, by J. E. S. R. S. Author of the Kalendarium. Lond. 1699. 8vo.

This, which was our Author's last work, was dedicated to the Lord Chancellor Somers, at that time President of the Royal Society, and the view of this dedication, was to procure a publick establishment for that society, as will sufficiently appear from the following paragraphs, which cannot seem tedious to the reader, since, except some of Mr Dryden's, he will hardly find any dedications in our language, penned with equal elegance and spirit.

My Lord,

THE idea and plan of the Royal Society, having been first conceived, and delineated by a great and learned Chancellor (31), which high office

(31) Francis Lord Verulam, and Viscount St. Albans, still in full possession of his parts, undertook and accomplished some years after this the reviewing of his Sylva, in which last edition (k) he has interspersed various circumstances relative to his private life, as well as to his subject, and has also shewn that he had serious and affecting thoughts of his latter end, though not put in mind of it by his infirmities, which are circumstances, that, if further explained, cannot be unacceptable to the inquisitive reader [U]. It has been before hinted, that as his collections were very great,

‘ since your Lordship deservedly bears, not as an acquisition of fortune, but your intellectual endowments, conspicuous (among other excellencies) by the inclination your Lordship discovers to promote natural knowledge: as it justifies the discernment of that assembly to pitch upon your Lordship for their President; so does it no less discover the candour, yea, I presume to say, the sublimity of your mind, in so generously honouring them with your acceptance of the choice they have made.

‘ A Chancellor, and a very learned Lord, was the first who honoured the Chair; and a no less honourable and learned Chancellor resigns it to your Lordship (32).

(32) Lord Viscount Brounker, Chancellor to Queen Katherine. Charles Mountague, Esq; Chancellor of the Exchequer.

‘ So as after all the difficulties and hardships the society has hitherto gone through, it has, thro’ the favour and protection of its Presidents, not only preserved its reputation from the malevolence of enemies and detractors, but gone on culminating and now triumphantly in your Lordship: under whose propitious influence, I am persuaded it may promise itself, that which indeed has hitherto been wanting to justify the glorious title it bears of a Royal Society, the emancipating it from some remaining and discouraging circumstances which it as yet labours under, among which that of a precarious and unsteady abode is not the least.

‘ This honour was reserved for your Lordship, and an honour permit me to call it, not at all unworthy the owning of the greatest person living, namely, the establishing and promoting real knowledge, and next to what is divine, truly so called, as far at least as human nature extends towards the knowledge of nature, by enlarging her Empire beyond the land of spectres, forms intentional species, vacuum, occult qualities, and other inadequate notions, which by their obstreperous and noisy disputes affrighting, and till of late deterring men from adventuring on farther discoveries, confined them in a lazy acquiescence, and to be fed with fantasies and fruitless speculations, which signify nothing to the specific nature of things, solid and useful knowledge by the investigation of causes, principles, energies, powers, and effects of bodies and things visible, and to improve them for the good and benefit of mankind.’

It is a great pity this proposition of our Author’s was not accepted, since undoubtedly a national establishment under the direction of so wise and prudent a person, would have enabled the society to have prosecuted their laudable and useful designs, in a manner worthy of themselves and honourable to their country. It is not however impossible, that this proposition might come to nothing by their President’s loss of power, which fell out very soon after; but however it happened, our Author’s zeal and diligence in the application was truly laudable. He had the honour to be one of the first members, and he continued to be one of the most active for upwards of forty years. This last work is nothing inferior to any of the preceding, the same learning, the same perspicuity, the same quickness and penetration reigns through the whole. The reader meets not only with all that he can expect, but with much more, and such a multitude of curious observations are interspersed, as render it as pleasant and entertaining as it is useful. Yet the Author suspecting that some might possibly censure the great pains he had taken upon such a subject, and from thence infer, that he was lead to treat such matters, with so much skill and pains, from the refined luxury of his own palate, took care to guard against this in the following elegant apology, which he has inserted in his dedication.

‘ The favour I humbly beg is your Lordship’s pardon for this presumption. The subject is mean, and requires it, and my reputation in danger, should your Lordship hence suspect, that one could never write so much of dressing sallets, who minded any ‘ thing serious, besides the gratifying a sensual appetite with a voluptuary apician art. Truly, my Lord, I am so far from designing to promote those supplicia luxuriæ, as Seneca calls them, by what I have here written; that were it in my power, I would re-call the world, if not altogether to their pristine diet, yet to a much more wholesome and temperate than is now in fashion; and what if they find me, like to some who are eager after hunting and other field sports, which are laborious exercises; and fishing, which is indeed a lazy one, who after all their pains and fatigue, never eat what they take and catch in either? For some such I have known: and tho’ I cannot affirm so of myself, when a well dressed and excellent sallet is before me, I am yet a very moderate eater of them. So as to this book, luxury, I can affirm, and that truly, what the Poet says of himself, on a less innocent occasion, Lasciava pagina, vita proba. God forbid, that after all I have advanced in praise of sallets, I should be thought to plead for the vice I censure, and chuse that of Epicurus for my Lemma. In hac arte consenui, or to have spent my time in nothing else. The plan annexed to these papers, and the apparatus made to superstruct upon it, would acquit me of having bent all my contemplations on sallets only, what I humbly offer your Lordship is, as I said, part of natural history, the product of horticulture, and the field dignified by the most illustrious, and sometimes titled Laureato vomere, which as it concerns a part of Philosophy, I may without vanity be allowed to have taken some pains, in cultivating as an inferior member of the Royal Society.’ Such was the modesty, such the learning, and such the politeness, of this great man!

[U] To the inquisitive reader.] It is chiefly from the works of great men, that the curious and particular passages of their lives are to be collected. This indeed is a thing of great labour, but at the same time infinitely pleasant to those who delight in honouring the memory of such benefactors to mankind. In this note, we intend a specimen of this sort from the most extensive and most historical of our Author’s performances. We learn from thence, that the true signification of his Surname Evelyn, written antiently Avelan or Evelin, was silberd, or rather hazel, which gives him occasion to remark, that these trees are commonly produced where quarries of free-stone lie underneath, as at Hazelbury in Wiltshire, Haslingfield in Cambridgeshire, and Haslemere in Surrey (33). He more than once remarks, that his grandfather was a great planter and preserver of timber, as it seems were the antient possessors of the place where he lived, from whence it acquired its name of Wotton (i. e.) Woodtown from the groves and plantations that were about it (34). He farther remarks, that there was an oak felled by his grandfather’s order, out of which there was a table made, measured by himself more than once of five foot in breadth, nine and a half in length, and six inches thick, all entire and clear. It was set up in brick work for a pastry board, and to fit it for that use, it was shortened by a foot, being originally ten foot and a half, as appeared from an inscription cut in one of its sides, from whence it appeared to have lain there above one hundred years, when our Author wrote this description (35). When his grandfather’s woods were cut down, which consisted entirely of oak, they sprung up again, not oaks but beeches, and when these too in their turn felt the axe, there arose spontaneously a third plantation, not of oaks or beech, but of birch, which he does not set down as a thing singular in itself, but because it happened under his own eye (36). He is a declared enemy to iron works, on account of their destroying woods; yet he observes from the prudent maxims prevailing in his own family, they had quite a contrary effect, as being one principal cause of their making such large plantations, and taking so great, so he was far from confining them entirely to his own use, but was ever ready to communicate them for the benefit of others, and, considered in that light, was a great benefactor to the publick. An instance has been given in the notes to this purpose, in respect to the famous Mr Boyle, and many instances more might be given, of which, not to trespass on the reader's patience, we will mention but a few; he it was that furnished to the late reverend and learned Bishop of London those additional remarks on the county of Surrey (l), which are published in his English edition of the Britannia; he contributed largely to Mr Houghton's valuable work (m); and the ingenious John Aubrey, Esq; has testified, how often he was indebted to him for his friendly assistance in many of his undertakings (n). In respect to the Royal Society, he was equally assiduous in his attendance, and careful in his intelligence; whatever fell within the compass of his own extensive enquiries, he never failed to transmit them to that judicious body, nor was he less attentive to the procuring them proper correspondents both at home and abroad, of which copious testimonies are to be met with in their Registers, and in their printed Transactions (o) [W]. He might therefore justly stile himself, as he did, a Pioneer in their much pains about them (37). It was a relation of his, that sold Richmond new Park to King Charles the First, after planting many fine trees there (38). Our Author carried this disposition with him to Sayes-Court, where he must have shown it very early, since he assures us, that the Marquis of Argyle presented him with the Cones of a peculiar kind of fir, which he takes to be the Spanish pinaster or wild pine, and gives a very particular account of the manner in which they grew in the Marquis's country in Scotland (39). He informs us, that it was the Lord Chancellor Bacon who introduced the true plane tree, which he planted originally about Verulam, from whence he had his title (40). Mr Evelyn takes to himself the honour of having propagated the alaternus from Cheshire to Cumberland, which was before reputed an inhabitant only of the green house, but is found very capable, not only of living without doors, but of standing unhurt by the rigour of our severest winters (41). He mentions a most glorious and impenetrable holly hedge, which he had at Sayes-Court four hundred feet in length, nine feet high, and five in diameter, which occasions his dropping a hint, that the fine gardens he had raised there, were wholly ruined by the Czar of Muscovy, who it seems lived there, for the sake of being near the yard (42). He recommended Mr Gibbons the Carver, to King Charles the Second, by whom some exquisite works were performed in St Paul's Cathedral (43). He was likewise consulted by the Bedford family, about preserving their fine trees, so long as the gardens were kept up about Bedford House, which before the last edition of his book were demolished, to make way for the new buildings about Bloomsbury (44). He takes notice of an admirable remedy for a Dyfentry, which had been otherwise in all probability buried in oblivion, and this is the fungus substance separated from the lobes of Walnut Kernels, powdered and given in a glass of wine, which he affirms relieved the English soldiers in the famous Dundalk Campaign in Ireland soon after the Revolution, when all other remedies failed (45). He was acquainted with the Conde Mellor a Portuguese Nobleman, who resided some time at the Court of King Charles the Second, when an exile from his own, by whom he was informed, that his father, when Prime-Minister as himself had likewise been, received in a case a collection of plants of China oranges of which only one escaped, and was with difficulty recovered, and yet from this plant came all the China oranges that ever were seen in Europe, which our Author observes, is a most noble and wonderful instance, of what industry may do from the slightest and least promising beginnings (46). One instance of the vast advantages derived from woods I shall borrow, because the facts are notorious and indisputable (47). 'Upon the estate of George Pitt, Esquire, of Stratfieldsea, in the County of Southampton, a survey of timber being taken in the year 1659, it came to ten thousand three hundred pounds, besides near ten thousand sapplers not valued and growing up naturally. Since this there hath been made by several sales, five thousand six hundred pounds, and there has been felled for repairs, building and necessary uses, to the value at the least of twelve hundred pounds, so as the whole falls of timber, amount to six thousand eight hundred pounds. The timber upon the same ground

' being again surveyed, Anno 1677, appears to be worth above twenty one thousand pounds, besides eight or nine thousand sapplers, and young trees to be left standing, and not reckoned in the survey. ' But what is yet to be observed, most of this timber abovementioned being oak, grows in hedgerows, and so as that the standing of it, does very little prejudice to the plough or pasture.' To conclude, this worthy person, who was born in a town famous for wood, who derived from his ancestors an affection for plantations, who wrote the most correct treatise of forest trees extant in our own, or perhaps, in any language, and who was himself a most eminent Planter, had a strong desire, after the example of Sir William Temple, who directed his heart to be deposited in his garden, to have his corps also interred in the like manner (48), but very probably he was prevailed upon to alter his mind afterwards, notwithstanding what he had expressed upon that subject (49) in his book; which shews how warm and lasting, that passion for improvement was in his own breast, which, with so much learning, eloquence, and success, he laboured to excite in the bosoms of his countrymen.

[W] In their printed Transactions.] It would take up too much time and room, to take notice of every thing that occurs in this valuable collection, that might be alledged to this purpose; and therefore we shall content ourselves with a few instances. Upon some discourse at the Royal Society of the eruptions of Mount Vesuvius, he procured the following extract of a letter from Mr Henry Robinson, to whom it was written by Captain William Baddily, and at the same time produced some of the ashes which are mentioned therein; which letter and which ashes had been preserved for upwards of thirty years (50).

' The sixth of December 1631, being in the Gulph of Volo riding at anchor about ten of the clock that night, it began to rain sand or ashes, and continued till two of the clock the next morning. It was about two inches thick on the deck, so that we cast it overboard with shovels, as we did snow the day before: the quantity of a bushel we brought home, and presented to several friends, especially to the Masters of Trinity-House. There was in our company Capt. John Wilds, commander of the Dragon, and Capt. Anthony Watts, commander of the Elizabeth and Dorcas. There was no wind stirring when these ashes fell; it did not fall only in the places where we were, but likewise in other parts, as ships were coming from St John d'Acree to our port, they being at that time an hundred leagues from us. We compared the ashes together, and found them both one. If you desire to see the ashes, let me know.'—Thus in the spring of the year 1670, our author communicated, in the following letter to the Lord Viscount Brouncker, a large and circumstantial account of a very singular and extraordinary invention, by a person of rank, called the Spanish Sembraior, or new engine for ploughing and equal sowing all sorts of grain, and harrowing at once; by which a great quantity of seed-corn is saved, and a rich increase yearly gained; together with a description of the contrivance and uses of this engine, which epistle ran thus (51).

' I cannot devise better how to express my great respects to your Lordship, than by my utmost endeavours to promote the interest of that Society, over which you have so long, with so much ability and affection, their service, which expression was well chosen, since it marked at once how humble and how indefatigable he was, in whatever might contribute to the advancement of that noble design, which was the basis of their institution. He was a true lover of freedom of thought in all philosophical enquiries, which as he practised upon all occasions himself, so he very readily indulged it to others; and though nobody was freer from prejudices, or spoke more discreetly than he did, of books that it was impossible for him to commend, yet he never repented any attack made upon his own, but bore the contradiction of his opinion with all imaginable temper, being persuaded that truth and reason would always triumph in the end, and that it was better to leave things to the decision of the publick, than to embark in endless controversies, though in the defence of sentiments ever so well founded (p) [X]. When we consider the number of the books he published, and the variety

‘ fection, so faithfully presided. This therefore will ‘ plead my excuse with your Lordship, if, in some confidence of gratifying the generous designs of that noble assembly, I communicate to them, through your hands, not only the instrument which I herewith present them, but the description of the use and benefit of it, from such a deferent as I am sure they will very highly value.

‘ My Lord, it is now almost two years since that, by somewhat an odd accident lighting upon a paper lately printed in Spanish, I found a short passage in it, giving notice of a certain plough newly brought out of Germany into Spain; in both which places it had, upon trial, so generally obtained, as, besides the royal privilege which was granted to the inventor, as to procure the universal approbation. Upon this hint I took the boldness to write to my Lord Ambassador, intreating his Excellency that, as his more weighty affairs would give him leave, he would not disdain to inform himself more particularly concerning it. This his Lordship was not only pleased to do, but so highly obliging as to transmit to me the engine itself, together with a full description of it and its use; all of it written with his own noble hand, which I do here consecrate to the Royal Society, to be inserted among their precious cimelia.

‘ My Lord, being not so happy as to wait on you myself with it, at your publick assembly this day, I desire your Lordship will cause these papers to be read there, and expose the instrument to their examination and trial. There are many gentlemen who will not be offended with these rusticities, and who know how highly such inventions, and even attempts, have been valued by the greatest and the best of men. Something (’tis possible) may happen to be out of order, by reason of the long journey it hath passed; but their ingenious Curator will soon be able to reform, and, if need be, improve it. My Lord of Sandwich is that illustrious person to whom the Society is obliged for this, and many other favours and productions of his own more consummate genius, which enrich their registers. But let me tell them, his Lordship hath made, and brought home with him, such other polite notices and particulars, of Spain and other foreign parts, as I know no person, of the most refined and publick spirit, who hath approached him besides your Lordship: an emulous and worthy example, certainly to the rest of our noblemen and ministers of state abroad, who may travel with so many advantages to inform themselves above others: and it is to me a shining instance, of both your Lordship’s happy talents and great comprehension, that, in the throng of so many and so weighty employments, you can think of cultivating the arts, and of doubly obliging your country.’

The description of this machine, translated from the Spanish into English, is of a considerable length, and therefore we refer the reader to it in the Transactions. The chief reason for mentioning it here, was to shew how vigilant our author was in his enquiries, and how diligent in the prosecution of them; and yet not with any view of concealing the discoveries he made, but quite the contrary; that the Royal Society might have the honour, and the British nation the benefit, of them. In this respect, no doubt, he reaped abundant satisfaction, since it was declared, over and over again in the Transactions, that his Sylva had raised whole forests, and his Pomona produced numberless orchards; yet that he affected not praise out of any degree of vanity, but was really pleased with being the instrument of good to others, appears very plainly from that warmth, as well as readiness, with which he recommended other men’s works to the favour of the publick, even upon subjects on which he had employed his own pen, particularly in the case of Mr Smith, which is printed in the Transactions (52).

(52) Ib. No. 102.

He was also very assiduous in procuring, as early as possible from abroad, all new books upon curious and useful subjects; as also such, as, from their universal high character, were become scarce and dear; some of which he communicated to the Secretary of the Society, and of others he made large and curious extracts himself; and, as is very justly observed, his translations were doubly valuable, on account of that clearness and fidelity with which he expressed the author’s sense, and the improvements that he added from his own observations, as he rendered no treatises into English, without being perfectly versed in the subject upon which, as well as the language in which, they were written. He likewise, in testimony of his respect and duty to the Society, bestowed upon them those curious tables of veins and arteries, which he brought with him from Padua, and consequently deserved to be honourably mentioned in their registers, and to have his picture, as it is, hung up in their apartments (53).

[X] Though in defence of sentiments ever so well founded.] Amongst other advantages that attended the institution of the Royal Society, one was its giving birth to, and the highest encouragement for, free and open enquiries; nor was it any wonder, that, amongst these, some turned upon those learned persons who first exerted themselves in favour of this method of improving knowledge, amongst these, Mr John Houghton, tho’ with great decency and good manners, censured our author’s great performance, on account of its crossing a notion he had advanced, that it would be highly advantageous for the nation, if all the timber within twelve miles of a navigable river were destroyed. It is but fair that he should speak for himself; his words then are these (54).

‘ I question not but you eagerly expect to hear what may be said, in answer to Mr Evelyn’s Sylva. There he seems to be quite of another opinion, and to give many instances of profits from woods, so great that few other parts of husbandry can equal them. I must confess Mr Evelyn is a great man, one that I have the honour to be acquainted with, and happy is he that is so; he is a gentleman of great piety, modesty, and complacency; and also endowed with such an universality of useful learning, that he may very well be esteemed a darling of mankind. But he is particularly well versed in the affairs of the woodman; and his Sylva is so good a book, that I have not heard of any thing written on the subject like it. To answer it, I will not pretend; to gainsay what he affirms I can’t, for I believe he loves veracity more than life. I will only make some observations, and, if my sentiments differ from his, I know he will pardon me, he being well inclined to allow freedom of thought, and also well versed in a motto, (*) NULLIUS IN VERBA.

(54) Collections on Husbandry and Trade, Vol. IV. p. 273.

‘ Now I first observe the reasons why this Sylva, or discourse of forest-trees, was delivered to the Royal Society. It was, as I am told, in the title-page, upon occasion of certain queries propounded to that illustrious assembly, by the honourable the principal Officers and Commissioners of the navy. What these queries were, do not altogether appear; but, by the discourse, one of them seems to be how timber might be propagated in his Majesty’s dominions. An answer to this, our ingenious author hath bravely given. But my considerations are not how, or how not, to propagate variety of the subjects upon which he employed his time, it is impossible to forbear wondering at his industry and application, which must be greatly heightened when we reflect how careful he was in reviewing, correcting, and augmenting all his original works, from whence it is evident, that whatever subject appeared weighty enough to attract his attention, never lost it's place in his thoughts, but, on the contrary, was often reviewed, and reaped the continual benefit of the new lights he received, as well as of his future meditations, which is the true reason that his treatises are so perfect in their kind, and continue as much esteemed by posterity, as they were by the inquisitive and judicious part of the world at the time they came first from the press. But this is not all; and our astonishment cannot but attend the information of his leaving behind him unfinished, or at least unpublished, works of a more extensive nature than those that are printed, which had cost him incredible pains, and for the composing of which he had made prodigious collections (q) [r].

(q) See the Preface prefixed to his Discourse on Sallets.

The

propagate timber; but a query, Whether it is best, within certain limits, to propagate it or no? a thing quite beside his design.

Indeed in his introduction, he, like a very good Englishman, laments the notorious decay of our wooden walls, which he thought likely to follow, when our then present navy should be worn out or impaired: and I must confess, when he considered the great destruction of our wood that had been made in the foregoing twenty years, by some thro' necessity, and others thro' ill ends and purposes; together with our not being used to fetch much timber from abroad, and a general cry that none could furnish us with any for shipping, especially so good as our own; with the addition of what amounted to a complaint from the honourable Commissioners of his Majesty's navy: when he considered all this, I say; every good man will rather commend than blame his zeal.

But now since that destruction of our timber, hath forced us to look out for a more convenient supply to London, and some other places; and our having greater experiences of sea-fights than ever we had, before, other things are known; and it is believed, to my certain knowledge, by some of the Commissioners of the navy, and others, that have been greatly concerned in building of ships, that there is some other timber in the world that will build ships as well as ours; for instance, the French Ruby that we took from France, when he joined with Denmark and Holland against us, had such good timber in it, that, as I have been told, England never had better; the bullets that entered this French ship, made only round holes without splinters, the thing our timber is valued for; and it was so hard, that the carpenters with their tools could hardly cut it, it was like a piece of iron.

I fancy it some of that oak Mr Evelyn speaks of in his forecited Sylva, chap. III. pag. 25. "There is, saith he, a kind of it so tough, and extremely compact, that our sharpest tools will hardly enter it, and scarcely the very fire itself, in which it consumes but slowly, as seeming to partake of a ferruginous and metalline shining nature, proper for sundry robust uses." These last thirty ships that were built, have a great deal of foreign timber in them; and, altho' there is some decay in them already, yet I am told that the fault is not attributed to the foreign timber, but rather to the hasty building, the king having not a stock before hand, the timber had not time enough for a seasoning. For these reasons, and what I said before about the increase of seamen, perswades me to believe, that such means will never lessen our strength; and I question not, but, that for our money, we may be furnished sufficiently from abroad.

This paper was published November the sixth 1683, and October the thirty-first 1701; the same gentleman published another paper, in which he maintained his former opinion (55), and undertakes to refute Mr Evelyn's observations, as to the profit made by planting, complaining that what he had before written, was never answered; intimating at the same time, that the reason was, because it was unanswerable; his words are these. Mr Evelyn tells us of one Mr Edward Salter, who planted an ash, and before his death sold it for forty shillings. I will not reckon the ground this ash grew on to be worth any thing; but suppose the ash when planted was worth but one shilling, and the man lived but eighty four years after, the shilling would have amounted to six pounds eight shillings, which is far better than forty shillings.

V O L. III. No. 157.

Again, three acres of barren land sown with acorns, in sixty years became a very thriving wood, and was worth three hundred pounds. Being 'twas barren land, I'll suppose it worth but three shillings the acre, nine shillings the three acres; which for sixty years was worth, in present money, fifteen pounds, nine shillings, and seven-pence; which doubled every twelve years, makes four hundred ninety-five pounds, six shillings, and eight-pence. Suppose that the tillage, acorns, and setting, came but to the third part of fifteen pounds, nine shillings, and seven-pence, it would be upwards of one hundred and sixty-five pounds; which together makes above six hundred pounds, for the three hundred pounds.

This warm censure might be safely trusted by our author, without any answer, in those days, when none pretended to decide without hearing both parties with attention. It is however but doing common justice to his memory; to set these points in a clear light, more especially as it may be done in a very narrow compass. In the first place, Mr Evelyn lays down facts that are indisputable, for he mentions no improvement in his book without clear authority. On the contrary, Mr Houghton's is a supposition, and, which is worse, a supposition that is entirely groundless. He values the young ash plant at a shilling; he might have read in Mr Evelyn, that an hundred saplings, of three years growth, are worth but eighteen-pence. Instead of fourscore and four years, he ought to have set down a third, or at most half, that time; and then, at his own rate of compound interest, the value of the plant would not have exceeded a single penny. His objections to the second instance, are not less frivolous. Barren ground, in the common acceptation of the word, is ground worth nothing, and for that reason unlet and unemployed; our critic will have it worth three shillings an acre, and, having thus created a rent of nine shillings a year, he converts it next into a rent charge, and supposes a sixty years lease of this barren land, to be worth two and thirty years purchase; and this money, put out at compound interest, is run up to twice as much as the wood is worth. We will not push things to extremity, but suppose, with him, the land worth nine shillings a year, and to be sold for twenty years purchase, which would produce nine pounds; that nine pounds placed out at compound interest, at the rate of six per cent. would amount, in sixty years, to two hundred eighty-eight pounds; so that there is twelve pounds, and all the intermediate profits by lopping, to pay for the original plantation and cultivation of the trees; upon the whole it is manifest, even from this author's manner of arguing, that planting wood is not only more honest and virtuous, but at the same time a safer and speedier way of raising a great fortune, than the most exorbitant usury.

[Y] He had made prodigious collections. We may, from the large works which Mr Evelyn has published, from the compleat plan which he has given us of a large work he intended to publish, and from various circumstances that occur in his letters, form a pretty sure judgment of the method pursued by him, in composing the many and valuable treatises that fell from his pen. His way was when he had made choice of a subject, to resolve it into its proper parts, and to entitle these according to the bulk of the volume, he proposed, either books or chapters, that he might digest his materials under their proper titles. He then set down his own thoughts, in a free succinct manner under every head, to which he added what occurred to him, useful or memorable in his reading, and when

(t) See the inscription in the book last cited.

The History of this learned person's life and labours terminates together, for, in a short time after he had fitted the fourth edition of his Sylva for the press, he departed this life in the eighty-sixth year of his age, Feb. 27, 1705-6 (r), and was interred at Wotton in a tomb of about three foot high of free-stone, shaped like a coffin, with an inscription upon a white marble stone with which it is covered (s), expressing, according to his own intention (t), That living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, he had learned from thence this truth, which he desired might be thus communicated to posterity, That all is vanity which is not honest, and that there is no solid wisdom but in real piety. As to that more lasting he had finished this, he digested his own thoughts regularly, supporting them by proper testimonies, from ancient and modern authors, or if that were the case, shewing the reasons for which he dissented from them. This made his collections very large, in comparison of the books he published, into which there entered nothing but the quintessence of the authors he had perused. The first great work which occupied his thoughts, was one of which he formed the plan in his travels, and of which neither Mr Wood, Mr Aubrey, nor any other writer that I have met with, takes the least notice, tho' it was certainly a very great and important design, every way worthy of his learning, penetration, and vast abilities. He intended to have called it

A General History of all Trades.

We have an account of this in one of his own letters to Mr Boyle, in which he assigns the reasons for his laying it aside, after it had cost him incredible pains and application. The reader will without doubt, be pleased to see what he has said upon this subject, his letter is dated from Sayes-Court, August the ninth 1659, and begins thus (56).

(56) Boyle's Works, Vol. V. p. 397.

'I am perfectly ashamed at the remissness of this recognition, for your late favours from Oxon, where though had you resided, it should have interrupted you before this time. It was by our common and good friend Mr Hartlib, that I came now to know you are retired from thence, but not from the Muses, and the pursuit of your worthy designs, the result whereof we thirst after with all impatience, and how fortunate should I esteem myself, if it were in my power to contribute in the least to that which I augure of so great and universal a benefit! but so it is, that my late inactivity has made so small a progress, that in the History of Trades, I am not advanced a step, finding, to my infinite grief, my great imperfections for the attempt, and the many objections which I cannot support, of conversing with mechanical capricious persons, and several other discouragements, so that giving over a design of that magnitude, I am ready to acknowledge my fault, if from any expression of mine, there was any room to hope for such a production farther than by a short collection of some heads and materials, and a continual propensity of endeavouring in some particular, to encourage so noble a work as far as I am able, a specimen whereof I have transmitted to Mr Hartlib, concerning the ornaments of gardens, which I have requested him to communicate to you, as one from whom I hope to receive my best and most considerable furniture, which favour I do again and again humbly supplicate, and especially touching the first chapter of the third book, the eleventh and twelfth of the first, and indeed on every particular of the whole.' Whocver would be better acquainted with the whole extent of our Author's project, may consult his extract of the life of Signor Giacomo Favi, who had the like, and intended to have travelled over the whole world, in order to collect proper materials; in which design having made some progress, he died of a fever at Paris. Of this gentleman, Mr Evelyn speaks in raptures from the similitude between their tempers, but it seems, he had not altogether the patience of that Italian virtuoso, who could accommodate himself to the humours of the lowest of the people, as well as make himself acceptable even to the greatest monarchs of Europe (57). But tho' our Author desisted from the original plan, yet it was not till he had finished several parts of it, particularly his Chalcography, which Mr Boyle prevailed upon him to publish, and the following pieces which he never published.

(57) See the Life of this eminent person, who was a native of Bologna in Italy, prefixed to Mr Evelyn's Chalcography.

Five Treatises, containing a full view of the several Arts of Painting in Oyl, Painting in Miniature, anealing in Glass, enamelling, and making Marble Paper.

We may form a judgment from the piece he published, of the great loss the world had from his not altering his resolution, with respect to these, which no doubt were as thoroughly finished, and as perfect in their kind as that. We may collect from the letter before mentioned, that a system of gardening made a part of his great design, which however there are some grounds to believe, he detached from thence and considered as a whole or distinct system of itself, to the compleating of which, he applied himself with great spirit and labour, and intended to have given it the following title, under which he shewed part of his collection to his friends.

We cannot positively affirm; but, there are very probable grounds to believe, that this was the very same work, of which he has given a plan before his Acetaria, about which he intimates in his Preface to that treatise, he had spent upwards of forty years, and his collections for which had in that time filled several thousand pages. The title of this vast work as it is there expressed, is this.

The Plan of a Royal Garden. Describing and shewing the amplitude of that part of Georgicks, which belongs to Horticulture.

He proposed to divide this into three books, the first of which was to consist of six chapters, wherein he meant to discourse of the principles of things, the four reputed elements, the celestial influences, the seasons, the natural soil of a garden, and all the artificial improvements that could be made therein. The second book was to contain twenty four chapters, and of these it is sufficient to say, that the twentieth chapter seems to have been executed in his discourse of fallets, and that the last chapter of this book, was no other than his Gardiners Kalendar. The third book was to be divided into twelve chapters, and to comprehend all the accessaries, so as to leave nothing which had so much as any relation to this favourite subject unexhausted. The cause of his leaving this work also unfinished, he very freely and plainly tells us, was his perceiving, that it exceeded his whole power of execution, that is, to come up to the scheme formed in his own mind, notwithstanding his glorious spirit, his easy fortune, and indefatigable diligence. This we may very easily credit, when we consider that his treatise of fallets could not be above a fortieth, perhaps, not above a fiftieth, part of his intended performance.

To these his unpublished works, we must add another, mentioned only by Mr Wood, who gives us nothing concerning it but the following title.

A Treatise of the Dignity of Man (58).

Our Author has likewise etched, when he came to Paris 1649 (59), five several prospects of places, which he had drawn on the spot, between Rome and Naples, to which he prefixed also a frontispiece intitled, *Locorum aliquot insignium & celeberrimorum inter Romam & Neapolin, jacentium υποδειξεῖς & Exemplaria; Domino Domino, Thomæ Henshaw, Anglo, omnium eximiarum & preclarissimarum artium cultori ac propugnatori maximo & συνοπ. lasting monument, which the pens of the most learned and ingenious men have consecrated to his memory, in the characters which they have afforded us of him and his writings, the reader will find some notice taken at the bottom of page [Z]. By his most [Z] Taken at the bottom of the page.] It is a natural and very just method of concluding articles like this, with characters of the author by eminent persons; for it is first paying a due respect to their memories; next it affords the reader satisfaction, who is desirous of learning on what authorities such high characters are built; and lastly, it justifies the praises bestowed, and the pains taken, in the compiling such articles, more especially when they are carried to an extraordinary length. But it is requisite, that even this necessary attention should be kept within just bounds; and therefore having already cited Mr Boyle, and the Royal Society, in praise of Mr Evelyn, we shall now confine ourselves only to a few, and those too the most eminent, of the learned writers, who have celebrated this great man, and endeavoured to do justice to his labours. We will begin with Abraham Cowley, Esq; who, in his essay, intitled the Garden, having declared that a rural retreat, and a life of privacy and study, was the utmost extent of his wish, and had been so for many years, proceeds thus (60). 'Several accidents of my ill fortune have disappointed me hitherto, and do still, of that felicity; for tho' I have made the first and hardest step to it, by abandoning all ambitions and hopes of this world, and by retiring from the noise of all business, and almost company; yet I stick still in the inn of a hired house and garden, among weeds and rubbish, and without that pleasantest work of human industry, the improvement of something which we call not very properly, but yet we call our own. I am gone out from Sodom, but I am not yet arrived at my little Zoar. O let me escape thither (is it not a little one), and my soul shall live. I do not look back yet, but I have been forced to stop, and make too many halts. You may wonder, Sir, for this seems a little too extravagant and pindarical for prose, what I mean by all this preface: it is to let you know, that tho' I have missed, like a chymist, my great end; yet I account my affections and endeavours well rewarded, by something that I have met with by the by; which is, that they have procured me some part in your kindness and esteem, and thereby the honour of having my name so advantageously recommended to posterity, by the epistle you are pleased to prefix to the most useful book that has been written in that kind, and which is to last as long as months and years. Among many other arts and excellencies which you enjoy, I am glad to find this favourite of mine the most predominant, that you chuse this for your wife, tho' you have hundreds of other arts for your concubines, tho' you know them, and beget sons upon them all, to which you are rich enough to allow great legacies; yet the issue of this seems to be designed by you to the main of the estate; you have taken most pleasure in it, and bestowed most charges upon it's education: and I doubt not to see that book, which you are pleased to promise to the world, and of which you have given us a large earnest in your Kalendar, as accomplished as any thing can be expected, from an extraordinary wit and no ordinary expences, and a long experience. I know no body that possesses more private happiness than you do in your garden, and yet no man who makes his happiness more publick, by a free communication of the art and knowledge of it to others. All that I myself am able yet to do, is only to recommend to mankind the search of that felicity which you instruct them how to find and to enjoy.

I.

Happy art thou whom God does bless,
With the full choice of thine own happiness;
And happier yet, because thou'rt blest,
With prudence how to chuse the best.
In book, and gardens thou hast plac'd aright, (Things which thou well dost understand,
And both dost make with thy laborious hand,)
Thy noble innocent delight.
And in thy virtuous wife, where thou again dost meet Both pleasures more refin'd and sweet;

The fairest garden in her looks,
And in her mind the wisest books.
Oh, who would change these soft, yet solid joys!
For empty shews, and senseless noise;
And all which rank ambition breeds, Which seem such beauteous flowers, and are such pois'nous weeds, &c.

The ingenious and learned Joseph Glanville (61) gave a high character of our author, when but a very few of his works had appeared. 'Mr John Evelyn, says he, hath very considerably advanced the history of fruit and forest trees, by his Sylva and Pomona; and greater things are expected from his preparations for Elysium Britannicum, a noble design now under his hands; and certainly the inquisitive world is much indebted to this generous gentleman, for his very ingenious performances in this kind; as also for those others of Sculpture, Picture, Architecture, and the like practical useful things, with which he hath enriched it.' But the judicious and reverend Dr William Wotton speaks more highly of our author, as being acquainted with most of his writings; and in comparing the antient with the modern Agriculture, he delivers himself thus (62). 'In making my comparison, I shall comprehend all that the Antients understood by their Res Rustica, as it takes in the forester's, the husbandman's, and the gardner's business: Cato, Varro, and Columella, include the grasier's also, thereby compleating the whole body of farming; but since his work cannot well be made a science of, I shall omit it. By a forester here, I understand one that knows how to plant, propagate, and increase, all sorts of timber-trees, what soils are proper for every sort, how they may best be defended from dangers in their growth, to what uses they are most applicable when they have arrived to their utmost perfection, and how they may be best applied. Such a man, in short, as Mr Evelyn instructs in his Sylva, where he gives a full system of the woodman's skill, what he ought to know, and what to practise. A great part of his work, and indeed the nicest part of it, the Antients were strangers to, as having less occasion for it. The world was then, comparatively speaking, in it's infancy; there was no want of wood for fuel, building, or ships, and this plenty made men less curious in contriving methods of preserving what they had in so great abundance. England, till within a few ages, was every where over-run with wood: The Hercynian forest, antiently took up what is now the most flourishing part of Germany: and France, which is at present so wonderfully populous that little cultivable ground remains untill'd, was in Caesar's time over-spread with woods and forests. As Men increase, tillage becomes more and more requisite, the consumption of wood will be proportionably greater, and it's want, and the necessary uses of timber, which grow upon men as they become more numerous, will, of consequence, put them upon ways to preserve and increase it. Commerce, with distant parts, will shew men rare and useful trees, to which their own soil was before a stranger; and luxury will soon teach them to transplant them. No wonder therefore, if modern writers excel the antients, upon a subject which they had less occasion for. The Romans indeed were curious in planting trees for shade or fruit; but their industry in that particular, came under another head, as rather belonging to the gardner's work. It may therefore, perhaps, be esteemed a small character of Mr Evelyn's discourse of forest-trees, to say, that it out does all that Theophrastus and Pliny have left us on that subject: For it not only does that and a great deal more, but contains more useful precepts, hints, and discoveries, upon that now so necessary a part of our Res Rustica, than the world had till then known, from all the observations of former ages. To name others after him, would be a derogation to his performance.' In comparing the antient and modern husbandman and gardner, he speaks as highly of Mr Evelyn's Pomona and

Upon the stone coffin, in which the leaden one lies that holds her body, a white marble stone is placed of the same shape, with a very short inscription (y), which informs us, that at the time of her demise she was in the seventy-fourth year of her age, and that she was esteemed, admired, beloved, and regretted, by all who knew her (z).

and of his Kalendar, which, however, we will omit. Bishop Burnet (63), acknowledging some communications from him, styles him 'that most ingenious and virtuous gentleman, Mr Evelyn, who is not satisfied to have advanced the knowledge of this age, by his own most useful and successful labours, about planting and divers other ways, but is ready to contribute every thing in his power to perfect other men's endeavours.' The honourable Roger North speaks thus of his brother the Lord-Keeper Guilford's visit to our author, and of his manner of living (64). 'His Lordship was once invited to a philological meal, at the house of Mr Evelyn at Deptford. The house was low, but elegantly set off with ornaments, and quaint motto's, at most turns; but, above all, his garden was exquisite, being most boscaresque, and, as it were, an exemplar, of his book of forest-trees. They appeared all so thriving and clean, that, in so much variety, no one could be fatiated in viewing; and to these were added plenty of ingenious discourses, which made the time short.' A very critical inquirer into every thing relating to English history, the late Lord Bishop of Carlisle, speaking of his Numismata, bestows the following character of that book, and it's author (65). 'We might justly have expected whatever could have been desired on this subject, from the excellently learned pen of Mr Evelyn, had he bent his thoughts, as was believed, towards the consideration of our British coins as well as medals. It now appears, that his Numismata carried him no farther than those larger, and more choice pieces, that are usually called by this latter name; whereon he has, indeed, treated with that accuracy and sineness, which became a gentleman and a scholar.' Our Author's works are also very honourably mentioned by several foreign writers (66), particularly by the judicious Morhoff, who tells us that some of them were translated into Latin. It may prove some satisfaction to the inquisitive reader, if we add that his picture was thrice drawn in oil, first in 1681, by Vanderborcht, a famous artist, and brought out of Germany at the same time with Wenceslaus Hollar, the graver, by the Earl of Arundel; a second time in 1648, by Walker; and the third time by Sir Godfrey Kneller, for his friend Mr Pepys of the admiralty, of which that at the Royal Society is a copy. There is a print of him by Nanteuil, in which he is represented, in a cloak in his own hair, and under him some books marked with the cypher J. E. He likewise drew him more than once in black and white, with Indian ink; and there is a picture of him in crayon by Lutterel (67).

EVELYN (JOHN) son to the former. He was born at his father's house at Sayes-Court near Deptford, January 14, 1654 (a), and was there very tenderly educated in his infancy, being considered (after the death of his brother Richard Evelyn, January 27, 1657, who, though but five years of age, was esteemed a kind of (b) prodigy) as the heir of the family. He was likewise universally admired for the pregnancy of his parts, which induced his father to send him in 1666 to Oxford, where he remained in the house of the most ingenious and learned Dr Ralph Bathurst, then President of Trinity-college, before he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner, which was in Easter-term 1668 (c). It is not clear at what time he left Oxford, but Mr Wood seems to be positive that he took no degree there, but returned to his father's house, where he prosecuted his studies under the directions of that great man (d). There is, however, good reason to believe, that it was during his residence in Trinity-college, and when he was not above fifteen years of age, he wrote that elegant Greek poem which is prefixed to the second edition of the Sylva, and is a noble proof of the strength of his genius, and wonderful progress in learning in the early part of his life. He discovered his proficiency soon afterwards, both in the learned and modern languages, by his elegant translations (e); as well as his intimate acquaintance with the Muses, in some original poems which were very justly admired. Of all these the reader will have a farther account in the notes [A]. He married Martha, daughter and

[A] Will have a farther account in the notes.] If we consider the father's turn of mind, and how much the young gentleman must be obliged to hear and see of gardens and plantations, we need not in the least wonder that he should employ his pen first upon this subject, more especially in the easy way of translation, and from a book so justly, as well as generally admired, as the French jesuit's has ever been. The title of our author's little treatise, was,

I. Of GARDENS, four books, first written in Latin verse, by Renatus Rapinus; and now made English, by John Evelyn, Esq; 1673, 8vo.

His father annexed the second book of this translation to his Sylva; and it must be allowed, that as the sense is very faithfully rendered, so the poetry is very easy and harmonious, more especially if we consider it as the work of a lad of nineteen. The reader will judge of this from the following short specimen, containing instructions for the culture of the cypress-tree in gardens, founded upon the fable of the unhappy catastrophe of Cyparissus (1), supposed to be changed into beautiful evergreen, by intemperate grief; or by the power of Apollo, at the youth's own request. What is said of Sylvanus, is an improvement of the fiction, as delivered by the antients.

He had by his wife two sons and three daughters. His eldest son Richard died an infant at Sayes-Court, as did his eldest daughter Martha-Mary. His second daughter, Elizabeth, married Simon Harcourt, Esq; eldest son and heir of Simon Lord Viscount Harcourt, Lord High-Chancellor of Great Britain, by whom she became mother to the present Lord Viscount Harcourt (b). Jane, his third daughter, died an infant at his house in the parish of St Martin's in the Fields, and was interred at Kensington. John Evelyn, his second and only surviving son, born at Sayes-Court March 2, 1681, succeeded to his grandfather's estate. He was married at Lambeth chapel, September 18, 1705, to Anne, daughter of Edward Boscawen of Worthivil in the county of Cornwall, Esq; He was, by Letters Patents bearing date July 30, 1713, created a Baronet (i). This worthy Gentleman, who inherits the virtue and learning, as well as patrimony of his ancestors, made several alterations and additions to the family seat at Wotton in 1717, one of which was the erecting a beautiful library, forty-five feet long, fourteen feet broad, and as many high, for the reception of that large and curious collection of books made by his grandfather, his father, and himself (k). He is at present the eldest of the Commissioners of the Customs, Fellow of the Royal Society, and is blessed with a numerous posterity.

While in the cooler pastures once it fed,
An arrow, shot at random, struck it dead.
But when the youth the dying beast had found,
And knew himself the author of the wound.
With never ceasing sorrow he laments,
And on his breast his grief and anger vents.

Converts his former love to present hate;
And no more pity in his angry words,
Than to himself th' afflicted youth affords.
Weary of life, and quite oppress'd with woe,
Upon the ground his tears in channels flow;
Which having water'd the productive earth,
The Cypress first from thence deriv'd it's birth,
With Sylvanus's aid; nor was it only meant
T' express our sorrow, but for ornament.
Chiefly when growing low, your fields they bound;
Or when your garden's avenues are crown'd,

With their long rows; sometimes it serves to hide,
Some trench declining on the other side.
Th' unequal branches always keep that green,
Of which it's leaves are ne'rè divested scen.

And by rough trials greater glory gains.

[C] A Chronicle which was printed after his decease. It was first printed at London in 1516. fol. by R. Pynson; and afterwards by William Raftell, 1533, fol. in neat and small black types, and on good paper. At the conclusion of each part, there is a Hymn to the Virgin Mary [omitted in the following Editions.] And at the end of all 'Thus endeth Fabyans Cronicle. Printed by W. Raftell, and fynished the laste daye of December, in the yere of our Lorde. M. V. C. and XXXIII.' There are also at the end five leaves, which bring down the History to the beginning of King Henry VIII. but are omitted in subsequent Editions, particularly in one of the year 1559. now before us. The whole work is divided into two Volumes: whereof the first begins at Brute, and ends at the death of our King Henry II. and Philip II. King of France. The second Volume, which is the most valuable of the two, contains the Chronicles of England and of France, from the beginning of the reign of King Richard I. until the end of the reign of Charles IX. of France, that is till the year 1504, the 20th of King Henry VII. And it appears by the conclusion, that it was finished by the Author, Novemb. 7. 1504 (2). The second Volume begins with an account of the Wards of London, and the parish Churches in each Ward: and then are set down the Bailiffs of that City under every year, from the time they were appointed, that is from 1190, until the year 1209, when the two Bailiffs were converted, by King John, into a Mayor and two Shireves. Of these the Author gives exact lists, under each year, as far as his Chronicle reaches. He comprehends, as 'tis said in the title-page, the Chronicles of England and of France; not all together, or under the respective years, but in distinct Chapters, or Articles, denoted, in the beginning, by the words Anglia and Francia.—We are told, that Cardinal Wolsey caused as many copies of this book as he could come at, to be burnt, because the Author had made too clear a discovery of the large revenues of the Clergy (3). As for the character it bears: 'tis called by one who was a good

FAIRFAX (THOMAS, Lord) a very active man in the Parliament's service during our unhappy Civil Wars, in the last century, and at length General of their armies, was the eldest son of Ferdinando Lord Fairfax [A], by Mary his wife, daughter of Edmund Sheffield Earl of Mulgrave. He was born at Denton within the parish of Otley in Yorkshire, in January 1611 (a). After a proper school education, he studied some time in St John's college in Cambridge, to which in his latter days he became a benefactor. He appears to have been a lover of learning, though he did not excel in any branch, except it was in the History and Antiquities of Britain, as will appear in the sequel. Being of a martial disposition even in his younger years, but finding no employment at home, he went and served in Holland as a voluntier under the command of Horatio Lord Vere [B], in order to learn the art of war (b). After some stay there (but how long we cannot learn) he came back to England; and, retiring to his father's house, married Anne, fourth daughter of the said Lord Vere. Here he contracted a strong aversion for the Court; either by the instigation of his wife, who was a zealous Presbyterian (c), or else by the persuasions and example of his father, who grew 'actively and factiously disaffected to the King (d).' So that, upon his Majesty's first endeavours to raise a guard at York for his own person; [apprehended then by the people of those parts, and found quickly after, to be the beginning of an army;] he was entrusted by his party to prefer a petition to the King, beseeching him to hearken to his Parliament, and not to take that course of raising forces: which petition the King endeavouring to shun, he pressed with that instance, and followed him so with it, on Heyworth-moor, in the presence of near 100,000 people, that at last he presented it upon the pommel of his saddle (e). Shortly after, upon the actual breaking out of the Civil Wars, in 1642, his father having received a commission from the Parliament to be General of the forces in the North, he had a commission under him to be General of the Horse (f). His first exploit was at Bradford in Yorkshire, which he obliged a body of Royalists to quit, and to retire to Leeds. A few days after, he and Capt. Hotham, with some horse and dragoons marching thither, the Royalists fled in haste to York. And the former having advanced to Tadcaster, resolved to keep the pass at Wetherby, for securing the West Riding of Yorkshire, from whence their chief supplies came. Sir Thomas Glemham attempted to dislodge them from thence; but, after a short and sharp encounter, retired (g). Whereupon William Cavendish Earl of Newcastle, and Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland, united their forces at York, amounting to 9000 men (h), and resolved to fall upon Tadcaster: which being judged untenable, the Lord Fairfax, and his son Sir Thomas, drew out to an advantageous piece of ground near the town: but, after a six hours fight, were beaten, and withdrew in the night to Selby (i). Three days after, Sir Thomas marched in the night by several towns in

[A] Was the eldest son of Ferdinando Lord Fairfax] The Heralds, according to their usual flattering strain, trace up this family's pedigree even higher than the Norman Conquest. Telling us, that it was at that time seated at Toucester in Northumberland, from whence they removed into Yorkshire (*). But it is a great question, whether surnames were thus early taken from persons' complexions; as this of Fairfax, signifying Fair locks, from fair, and the Saxon feax hair: and the family seems to have had no notion of this derivation, when they took for their motto this rebus or pun, viz. the Latin words Fare fac, say, do. — But to return; Sir William Fairfax was High-Sheriff of Yorkshire in the 26th and 31st of King Henry VIII. and Thomas, his grandson, was advanced by King Charles I. May 4. 1627. to the title of Baron Cameron in Scotland (1). This Thomas Lord Fairfax married Helen, daughter to Robert Ask, Esq; and by her left five sons and two daughters. Ferdinando, the eldest, was entirely attached to the Parliament (2); one of their committee for the county of York (3); and General of their forces in Yorkshire, and the adjacent counties (4). He served them with the utmost zeal, upon every occasion, till his death, which happened, at York, March 13, 1647-8 (5). By his wife, Mary, daughter of Edmund Sheffield Earl of Mulgrave, as above related, he had three sons; Sir Thomas, who is the subject of this article; Charles, slain at the battle of Marston-moor, July 3. 1644; and another, not mentioned by name. Also six daughters (6). This family, as Mr Whitlock informs us (7), was descended from the Law.

[B] Under the command of Horatio Lord Vere] This Horatio, was fourth son of John de Vere the fifteenth Earl of Oxford of that noble family: and by King Charles I. ann. 1625, was advanced to the title of Lord Vere of Tilbury (8). He long served in Holland, with great valour and reputation, jointly with his brother the brave Sir Francis Vere Governor of the Briel. In 1620. Sir Horatio commanded the Regiment sent from England to the assistance of the Elector Palatine (9): and afterwards was employed in several other expeditions in the Netherlands. About the year 1632, or 1633, Sir Thomas Fairfax served as a voluntier under him; and was at the considerable action of taking Bosch, or Bois-le-Duc, from the Spaniards, but had no command while he was there. He returned to England in 1634, or 1635 (10).

in which the Royalists lay, and came to Bradford, where he entrenched himself. But having too many soldiers to lye idle, and too few to be upon constant duty [C], he resolved to attempt his enemies in their garrisons. Accordingly coming before Leeds, he carried that town (Jan. 23, 1642-3) after a hot dispute, wherein a good store of ammunition fell into his hands, of which he stood in great want (k). Next he defeated a party of 700 horse and foot at Gisborough, under the command of Col. Slingsby (l). And then Wakefield and Doncaster yielded themselves to the Parliament. But, for these overacts, William Earl of Newcastle, the King's General, proclaimed Sir Thomas and his father traitors, and the Parliament did the like for the Earl (m). In the mean time, the Lord Fairfax being denied succour from Hull, and the East Riding, was forced to forsake Selby, and retire to Leeds: of which the Earl of Newcastle having intelligence, he lay with his army on Clifford-moor, to intercept him in his way to Leeds. Whereupon Sir Thomas was ordered by his father, to bring what men he could to join with him at Sherburne, on purpose to secure his retreat. To amuse the Earl, Sir Thomas made a diversion at Tadcaster, which the garrison immediately quitted, and whereof he slighted the works. But the Lord Goring marching to its relief, with twenty troops of horse and dragoons, defeated Sir Thomas upon Bramham-moor: who also received a second defeat upon Seacroft-moor, where some of his men were slain, and many taken prisoners. So that he made his retreat with much difficulty to Leeds, about an hour after his father was safely come thither. And, according to him, this was one of the greatest losses he ever received (n). Leeds and Bradford being all the garrisons the Parliament had in the North, Sir Thomas thought it necessary to possess some other place: therefore with about 1100 horse and foot, he drove, on the 21st of May, the Royalists out of Wakefield, which they had seized again; and took 1400 prisoners, 80 officers, and great store of ammunition (o). But, shortly after, the Earl of Newcastle coming to besiege Bradford, and Sir Thomas and his father having the boldness, with about 3000 men, to go and attack his whole army, which consisted of 10,000, on Adderton-moor; they were entirely routed by the Earl, on the 30th of June (p), with a considerable loss [D]. Upon that, Halifax and Beverley being abandoned by the Parliamentarians, and the Lord Fairfax having neither a place of strength to defend himself in, nor a garrison in Yorkshire to retire to [E], withdrew the same night to Leeds, to secure that town. But, by his order, Sir Thomas stayed in Bradford with 800 foot and 60 horse; wherein being surrounded, he was obliged to force his way through: in which desperate attempt, his Lady, and many others, were taken prisoners [F]. At his coming to Leeds, he found things in great distraction; the Council of War having resolved to quit the town, and retreat to Hull, which was sixty miles off; with many of the King's garrisons in the way. However, though there were fifty or sixty troops of Royalists within three miles of Leeds, he got safely to Selby, where there was a ferry, and hard by one of the Parliament's garrisons at Cawood (q). Immediately after his coming to Selby, being attacked by a party of horse which pursued him, he received a shot in the wrist of his left arm, which made the bridle fall out of his hand; and being among the nerves and veins, suddenly let out such a quantity of blood, that he was ready to fall from his horse. But taking the reins in the other hand in which he had his sword, he withdrew himself out of the crowd [G]; and after [E] Nor a garrison in Yorkshire to retire to.] For Sir John Hotham, the Governor of Hull had declared, if they were forced to retreat thither, he would shut the gates on them. Whilst the Lord Fairfax was musing on these sad thoughts, a messenger was sent unto him from Hull, to let him know the townsmen had secured the Governor; that they were sensible of the danger he was in, and if he had any occasion to make use of that place, he should be very readily and gladly received there (14).

I sent two or three horsemen before, to discover what they could of the enemy, who presently returned, and told us there was a guard of horse close by us.——I, with some 12 more, charged them. Sir Henry Fowles, Major-General Gefford, myself and 3 more brake through; Capt. Mudd was slain, and the rest of our horse being close by, the enemy fell upon them, and soon routed them, taking most of them prisoners, among whom was my wife, the Officer Will. Hill, behind whom she rid, being taken. I saw this disaster, but could give no relief; for after I was got through, I was in the enemies rear alone; those who had charged through with me, went on to Leeds, thinking I had done so too: but I was unwilling to leave my company, and stay'd till I saw there was no more in my power to do, but to be taken prisoner with them. I then retired to Leeds (15).'

[G] He drew himself out of the crowd.] These additional circumstances, from his own account, may not be unacceptable to the reader. '——The enemy minding nothing so much as how to get away, I drew myself out of the crowd, and came to our men, who turned about, and seeing me ready to fall from my horse, they lay'd me on the ground: now when I was almost senseless, my Surgeon came seasonably, and bound up the wound, and stopt the bleeding. After a quarter of an hour's rest, I got a horse-back again; the other part of our horse had beaten the enemy back to Cawood, the same way they came first to us. Thus by the goodness of God, our passage was made clear; some went over the ferry after my father, I myself with others went through after a very troublesome and dangerous passage (being often attacked, sometimes in the front, sometimes in the rear) he came to Hull (r). Upon these repeated disasters, the Scots were hastily solicited to send 20,000 men to the assistance of the Parliamentarians, who were thus likely to be over-powered. The Lord Fairfax, after his coming to Hull, made it his first business to raise new forces, and in a short time had about 1500 foot, and 700 horse. The town being little, Sir Thomas was sent to Beverley, with the horse and leaving only a few garrisons, was marched with his whole army into Lincolnshire; having orders to go into Essex, and block up London on that side. But he was hastily recalled Northward, upon the Lord Fairfax's sending out a large party to make an attempt upon Stanford-bridge near York. The Marquis, at his return into Yorkshire, first dislodged from Beverley Sir Thomas, who retreated into Hull, to which the Marquis laid siege; but could not carry the place. During the siege, the horse being useless, and many dying every day, Sir Thomas was sent with them over into Lincolnshire, to join the Earl of Manchester's forces, then commanded by Major-General Cromwell (t). At Horncastle, or Winsby, they routed a party of 5000 men, commanded by Sir John Henderfon: and, at the same time, the besieged in Hull making a sally upon the besiegers, obliged them to retire. These two defeats together, the one falling heavy upon the horse, the other upon the foot, kept the Royalists all that winter from attempting any thing; and the Parliamentarians, after the taking of Lincoln, settled themselves in winter quarters (u). But Sir Thomas had not long the benefit of them, for in the coldest season of the year, he was commanded by the Parliament to go and raise the siege of Nantwich in Cheshire, which the Lord Byron, with an army from Ireland, had reduced to great extremity. He set forward from Lincolnshire December 29, and, being joined by Sir William Brereton, entirely routed, on the 21st of January, the Lord Byron, who was drawn out to meet them (w) [H]. After that, they took in several garrisons in Cheshire, particularly Crew-house, &c (x). Sir Thomas having stayed in those parts till the middle of March, was ordered back by his father into Yorkshire, that by the conjunction of their forces he might be abler to take the field. They met about Ferry-bridge; and Col. Bellasis, Governor of York, having advanced to Selby, to hinder their junction, they found means, notwithstanding, to join, and entirely defeated him, on the 11th of April 1644 (y) [I]. This good success rendered Sir Thomas master of the field in Yorkshire, and nothing then hindered him from marching into Northumberland, as he had been ordered by the Parliament, to join the Scots, which were kept from advancing Southward by the superior forces of the Marquis of Newcastle, quartered at Durham. But that stroke having thrown York into the utmost distraction, the inhabitants speedily sent to the Marquis to haste back thither; by which means a way was left open for the Scots, who with cold and frequent alarms were reduced to great extremity. They joined the Lord Fairfax at Wetherby, on the 20th of April, and marching on to York, laid siege to that city [K], wherein through the levels to Hull.——I had been twenty hours on horseback, after I was shot, without any rest or refreshment, and as many hours before. And as a further affliction, my daughter [afterwards Duchess of Buckingham] not above five years old, being carried before her maid, endured all this retreat a horseback; but nature not being able to hold out any longer, she fell into frequent swoonings, and in appearance was ready to expire her last. Having now passed the Trent, and seeing a house not far off, I sent her with her maid only thither, with little hopes of seeing her any more alive, though I intended the next day to send a ship from Hull for her. I went on to Barton, having sent before to have a ship ready against my coming thither. Here I lay down to take a little rest, if it were possible to find any in a body so full of pain, and a mind yet fuller of anxiety and trouble. Though I must acknowledge it as the infinite goodness of God, that my spirit was nothing at all discouraged from doing still that which I thought to be my duty. I had not rested a quarter of an hour, before the enemy came close to the town. I had now not above a hundred horse with me, we went to the ship, where under the security of her ordinance we got all our men and horse aboard; and crossing Humber, we arrived at Hull, our men faint and tired. I myself had lost all, even to my shirt, for my cloaths were made unfit to wear with rents and blood. Presently after my coming to Hull, I sent a ship for my daughter, who was brought the next day to the town, pretty well recovered of her long and tedious journey. Not many days, after the Earl of Newcastle sent my wife back again in his coach, with some horse to guard her; which generous act of his gained him more reputation, than he could have got by detaining a lady prisoner, upon such terms (16).

[H] Entirely routed, on the 21st of January, the Lord Byron, who was drawn out to meet them.] His army of Irish consisted of 3000 foot, of whom above 2000 were slain or taken prisoners; and of 1800 horse, most of whom escaped by flight. Col. George Monk, then in the King's service, being taken in this action, was sent up prisoner to the Tower of London, where he remained till 1647, when he entered into the Parliament's service, for the reduction of Ireland. And his great bravery in that kingdom was the cause of his succeeding advancement (17).

[I] They found means, notwithstanding, to join, and entirely defeated him, &c.] The Lord Fairfax took a great compass about, to deceive the vigilance of the Royalists, and by that means joined his son (18). Their attack was in three divisions; the first led on by the Lord Fairfax himself; the next by Sir John Meldrum; and the third by Col. Bright, brother-in-law to Col. Lambert: Sir Thomas Fairfax led on the horse. The matter was a long time disputed with equality on both sides, till the horse forced a passage into the town, where the following prisoners were taken; 2 Colonels; 3 Lieutenant-Colonels; 1 Major of horse, and 3 of foot; 8 Captains of horse; 11 Captains of foot; 3 Captain-Lieutenants; 3 Lieutenants of horse; 23 Lieutenants of foot; 12 Ensigns; 6 Cornets of horse; 4 Quarter-masters; above 60 Serjeants, Trumpets, &c 1600 common Soldiers; 2000 Arms, and above; and all the bag and baggage (19).

wherein the Marquis of Newcastle had shut himself up (z); being closely pursued, on the way thither, by Sir Thomas, and Major-General Lesley (a). And when Prince Rupert was advancing out of Lancashire to the relief of that place, they marched with 6000 horse and dragoons and 5000 foot, to stop his progress (b): but he eluding their vigilance, and fetching a compass about with his army, which consisted of above 20,000 men, got into York (c). Whereupon the Parliamentarians raised the siege, and retired to Hefsey-more. The English were for fighting, and the Scots for retreating; which last opinion prevailing, they both marched away to Tadcaster (d), there being great differences and jealousies between the two nations. But the rash and haughty Prince, instead of harassing and wearing them out by prudent delays, resolved, without consulting the Marquis of Newcastle or any of his officers, to engage them, on Marston-moor, eight miles from York, on the 2d of July: where that bloody battle was fought, which entirely ruined the King's affairs in the North (e). In this battle, Sir Thomas Fairfax commanded the right wing of the horse [L]. The Prince, after his defeat, retiring towards Lancashire, and the Marquis, in discontent, sailing away to Hamburg (f), the three Parliament-Generals came and sat down again before York, which surrendered the 15th of July: and the North was now wholly reduced by the Parliament's forces, except some garrisons (g). In September following, Sir Thomas was sent to take Helmesley-castle, where he received a dangerous shot in one of his shoulders, and was brought back to York, all being doubtful of his recovery for some time (h). Some time after, he was near being killed by a cannon-shot before Pomfret-castle [M]. Hitherto he had acquitted himself with undaunted bravery, and with great and deserved applause from his party. Had he stopped here, or at such times at least as the King's concessions were in reason and equity a just ground for peace (which was more than once) he might have been honourably ranked among the rest of those Patriots, who took up arms only for the redress of grievances. But his boundless ambition, and his great desire to rule, made him weakly engage, with the utmost zeal, in the worst and most exceptionable parts of our unhappy Civil Wars. For, when the Parliamentarians thought fit to new model their army, and to lay aside the honest but unsuccessful Robert Devereux Earl of Essex; they unanimously voted Sir Thomas Fairfax to be their General in his room: and he being easy, and forward to undertake or execute any thing that he was put upon, was the more readily chosen by the two then prevailing parties of Presbyterians and Independants. To him Oliver Cromwell was joined with the title of Lieutenant-General, but with intention of being his governor (i); and he was indeed the spring of all his succeeding motions. Sir Thomas being thus voted Commander in Chief of the Parliament's army on the 21st of January 1644-5 (k), received orders from the Parliament speedily to come up from the North to London (l). Accordingly he repaired privately thither Febr. 18, and, the next day, was brought by four of the members into the House of Commons, where he was highly complemented by the Speaker, and received his commission of General (m). The 15th of the same month, an Ordinance was made, for raising and maintaining of forces under his command [N]: it having been voted, a few days before, that he should nominate all the Commanders in his army, to be taken out of any the other armies, with the approbation of both Houses (n). March 25, the Parliament ordered him 1500*l* (o). The 3d of April, he went from London to Windsor where he had appointed the general rendezvous; and continued there till the last day of that month, new-framing and moulding the army: or rather Cromwell doing it in his name. For, as Mr Rapin well observes (p), Cromwell had such an influence over him, that he made him do whatever he pleased. April 16, he was appointed by both Houses Governor of Hull (q). In the mean and other Northern counties, were deposited, being accidentally blown up; Sir Thomas recovered as many of those valuable pieces as he could, rewarding very generously such soldiers as brought any of them to him. He had before employed Roger Dodsworth, to copy out great numbers of them, allowing him an annuity of 40*l.* per ann. during his life; by which means they were preserved from irrecoverable ruin, and make a very considerable part of the Monasticon Anglicanum. All the said Dodsworth's collections and MSS. amounting in the whole to 122 volumes, were afterwards bequeathed by the Lord Fairfax to the Bodleian Library at Oxford (20).

[M] He was near been killed, &c. This we learn from Mr Whitelock, in these words. 'Sir Thomas Fairfax and Colonel Forbes standing together near Pomfret-castle, a cannon-bullet from thence came betwixt them, and the wind of it beat them both to the ground, and put out one of Col. Forbes's eyes, and spoiled that side of his face, and yet no other hurt to Sir Thomas Fairfax (22).'

[N] An Ordinance was made, for raising and maintaining of the Forces under his command. This Ordinance imported, that there should be forthwith raised and formed, for the defence of the King and Parliament, the true Protestant Religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom, an army consisting of 6600 horse to be distributed into eleven regiments; and of 1000 dragooniers, to be distributed into ten companies; and of 14,400 foot, to be distributed into twelve regiments, each regiment of foot to consist of twelve hundred, and each such regiment to be distributed into ten companies. For their maintenance, there was imposed upon nineteen of the counties and cities in England, the monthly sum of fifty three thousand four hundred and fifty six pounds; which was raised in the same manner as our present Land-tax (23).

[O] When

mean time, Taunton, in Somersetshire, one of the Parliament's garrisons, being closely besieged by the Royalists, Sir Thomas Fairfax received orders to hasten to its relief, with 3000 horse and foot (r). He began his march May 1, and by the 7th had reached Blandford in Dorsetshire (s): but the King taking the field from Oxford, with strong reinforcements brought by the Princes Rupert and Maurice; Sir Thomas was ordered by the Parliament, to send 3000 foot and 1500 horse to relieve Taunton, and himself to return, with the rest of his forces to join Oliver Cromwell and Major-General Browne, and attend the King's motions (t). The 14th of May he was come back as far as Newbury (u); where having rested three nights, he went and faced Dennington-castle, and took a few prisoners. Thence he proceeded to lay siege to Oxford, as he was directed by the Committee of both kingdoms, and sat down before it the 22d. But before he had made any progress in this siege, he received orders to draw nearer the King, who had taken Leicester by storm, May 31, and was threatening the eastern associated counties (w). Sir Thomas therefore rising from before Oxford, June 5, arrived the same day at Marsh-Gibbon in Buckinghamshire; on the 11th he was at Wootton, and the next day at Giffborough in Northamptonshire: where he kept his head-quarters till the 14th, when he engaged the King's forces at the fatal and decisive battle of Naseby [O], and obtained a compleat victory (x). The King, after that, retiring into Wales, Sir Thomas went and laid siege on the 16th to Leicester, which surrendered on the 18th (y). He proceeded, on the 22d, to Warwick; and thence (with a disposition either to go over the Severn towards the King, or to move Westward as he should be ordered) he marched on through Gloucestershire towards Marlborough, where he arrived the 28th (z). And here he received orders from the Parliament, to hasten to the relief of Taunton, which was besieged again by the Royalists; letters being sent at the same time into the associated counties, for recruits, and the arrears of pay, for his army (a). But July 2, upon his coming to Blandford, he was informed that the Lord Goring had drawn off his horse from before Taunton, and left his foot in the passages to block up that place, marching himself with the horse towards Langport (b). Sir Thomas Fairfax therefore advancing against him, defeated him there on the 10th of July (c); and, the next day, went and summoned Bridgewater, which was taken by storm on the 22d (d). He became also master of Bath the 30th of the same month; and then laid close siege to Sherborne-castle, which was likewise taken by storm August 15. And having besieged the rich and famous city of Bristol from the 22d of August to the 10th of September [P], it was surrendered to him by Prince Rupert (e); at which the King was so excessively angry [Q], that he ordered the Prince to go and seek his subsistence somewhere beyond sea (f). After this laborious expedition, the General rested some days at Bath, having sent out parties to reduce the castles of the Devises and Berkley, and other garrisons between the West and London; and on the 23d moved from Bath to the Devises, and thence to Warminster on the 27th, where he stayed till October 8, when he went to Lyme in Dorsetshire (g). From this place he came to Tiverton, of which he became master on the 19th (h); and then, as he could not undertake a formal siege in the winter season, he blocked up the strong city of Exeter, which did not surrender till the 13th of April following (i): in the mean time, he took Dartmouth by storm January 13, 1645-6 (k); and several forts and garrisons at different [O] When he engaged the King's forces at the fatal and decisive battle of Naseby. As I am not writing a history of England, I shall not enter into the particulars of this battle, but only take notice of the share Sir Thomas Fairfax had in it. He commanded the main body of foot; and behaved with uncommon valour and bravery (24). During the engagement, having had his helmet beat off, he rid bareheaded up and down from one part of his army to another, to see how they stood, and what advantage might be gained: and coming up to his own life-guard, commanded by Col. Charles Doyley, he was told by him that he exposed himself to too much danger, and the whole army thereby, riding bareheaded in the fields, and so many bullets flying about him; and Doyley offered the General his helmet, but he refused it, saying, 'It is well enough Charles.' (25)—This visible difference appears in the encouragement given to the two contending parties, which may account for their different success almost in every battle. The King's forces fought for Him, not for themselves; and both officers and soldiers were in general negligent and unfaithful in their duty (26). But the Parliamentarian soldiers fought for themselves, for booty and plunder, at least for very great rewards, and could not but mend their fortunes by fishing in troubled waters; no wonder therefore that they fought with so much fury and resolution.

[P] And having besieged the rich and famous city of Bristol, from the 22d of August to the 10th of September. Sir Thomas Fairfax, in his first summons to Prince Rupert, has these remarkable words; which are submitted to the reader's consideration.— 'Sir, the Crown of England is and will be where it ought to be; we fight to maintain it there. But the King misled by evil counsellors, or through a seduced heart, hath left his Parliament, under God, the best assurance of his crown and family: the maintaining of this schisme is the ground of this unhappy war on your part: and what sad effects it hath produced in the three kingdoms, is visible to all men. To maintain the rights of the crown and kingdom jointly; a principal part whereof is, that the King in supream acts is not to be advised by men of whom the law takes no notice, but by his Parliament, the great counsel of the kingdom, in whom (as much as man is capable of) he hears all his people as it were at once advising him, and in which multitude of counsellors lyes his safety, and his peoples interest; and to see him right in this; hath been the constant and faithfull endeavour of the Parliament. And to bring these wicked instruments to justice that have misled him, is a principal ground of our fighting (27).—But, from these plausible and righteous sentiments, Sir Thomas seems to have departed afterwards.

[Q] At which the King was so excessively angry And the more, as the Prince, in a letter to his Majesty of the 12th of August, had assured him, 'that if no mutiny happened, he would keep Brillol for four months (28).'

different times. Febr. 16, he defeated the Lord Hopton near Torrington (l) [R]. This Nobleman retreating with his broken forces into Cornwall, Sir Thomas followed him: In pursuit of whom he came to Launceston Febr. 25, and to Bodmin March 2. On the 4th Mount Edgcombe was surrendered to him; and Fowey about the same time (m). At last the Parliament-army approaching Truro, where Lord Hopton had his headquarters; and he being so hemm'd in as to remain without a possibility of escaping; Sir Thomas, on the 5th of March, sent and offered him honourable terms, if he would capitulate [S]. After some delays and difficulties, the Lord Hopton accepted of them; and a treaty was signed by Commissioners on both sides, March 14; in pursuance of which, the Royalists, consisting of above 5000 horse, were disbanded; and took an oath never to bear arms against the Parliament (n). But, before the treaty was signed, the Lord Hopton and Arthur Lord Capel, retired to Scilly, from whence they passed into Jersey, Apr. 17, with Charles Prince of Wales, Sir Edward Hyde, and other persons of distinction (o). Thus the King's army in the West being entirely dispersed, by the vigilance and wonderful success of General Fairfax; he returned, March 31, to the siege of Exeter, which surrendered to him upon articles, the 13th of April, as I have already observed (p): and with the taking of this city ended our General's western expedition. Having entirely subdued those parts, which were the greatest strength and almost the only refuge of the Royalists, he marched, with wonderful speed (q), towards Oxford, the most considerable garrison remaining in the King's hands. Setting out therefore from Exeter April 18, he came, on the 1st of May, with his army before that city, and began to lay siege to it (r). The King, who was there, afraid of being enclosed, privately, and in disguise, departed from thence on the 27th of April; and May 4 put himself into the hands of the treacherous Scots (s). Oxford surrendered upon articles June 24 [T], as did Wallingford July 22 (t). After the reduction of these places, Sir Thomas went and besieged Ragland-castle in Monmouthshire, the property of Henry Somerset Marquis of Worcester, which yielded Aug. 19 (u). And thus, before Michaelmas 1646, the unhappy King Charles I. had neither army nor fortrefs left in England. The next employment required of the General, was to disband Major-General Maffey's brigade, which he did at the Devises. About that time he was seized with a violent fit of the stone, under which he laboured many days. As soon as he was recovered, he took a journey to London; where he arrived Novemb. 12, being met some miles off by great crowds of people, and the city-militia. The next day, both Houses of Parliament agreed to congratulate his coming to town, and to give him thanks for his faithful services and wise conduct [U]: which they did the day following, waiting upon him at his house in Queen-street (w). Hardly had he had time to rest, when he was called upon to convoy the two hundred thousand pounds that had been granted to the Scottish army; the price of their delivering up, or betraying, their Sovereign King Charles [W]. For that purpose he set out

[R] Febr. 16. he defeated the Lord Hopton near Torrington ] And, as a reward for this great service; on the 24th of February, the Parliament ordered fifty thousand pounds for his army, out of the Excise (29).

[S] Sir Thomas Fairfax sent and offered him, on the 5th of March, honourable terms, if he would capitulate. ] Namely, 'to the souldiery in general, English and Forreigners, liberty either to go beyond sea, or to their homes in England, as they pleased; and to such English as should choose to live at home, his protection for the liberty of their persons, and for the immunity of their estates from all plunder or violence of souldiers, and all to go their wayes with what they had, saving horses and armes; but for officers in commission and gentlemen of quality, he should allow them to go with horses for themselves and one servant or more, suitable to their quality, and with armes befitting gentlemen in a condition of peace; and such officers as would goe beyond sea for other service, to take with them their armes and full number of horses answerable to their offices. To all Troopers and inferiour sort of Horse officers bringing in and delivering up of their horses and armes, 20s. a man in lieu of their horses to carry them home: to English gentlemen of considerable estates, his passe and recommendation to the Parliament for their moderate composition (30).'

[T] Oxford surrendred upon articles June 24.] And at that juncture, Sir Thomas expressed his regard to learning, by agreeing in the 14th article of the surrender, 'That the Chancellour, Masters and Schollers of the University of Oxon, and the Governours and Students of Christ-Church, and all other Heads and Governours, Masters, Fellowes and Schollers of the Colleges, Halls, &c. of the same University, and the publick Professors and Readers, and the Orator thereof, and all other persons belonging to the said University, or to any Colleges or Halls therein, should and might, according to their statutes, charters and customes, enjoy their ancient forme of government, subordinate to the immediate authority and power of Parliament: and that all the rights, privileges, franchises, lands, tenements, houses, possessions, rents, revenues, hereditaments, libraries, debts, goods and chattels, belonging to the said University, or to Christ-church, or to any Colleges or Halls in the said University (except such rents and revenues as had been already taken and received by Ordinance of Parliament) should be enjoyed by them respectively, free from sequestrations, fines, taxes, and all other molestations whatsoever. And that all Churches, Chappels, Colledges, Halls, Libraries, Schooles, and publick buildings, within or belonging to the City or University, or to Christ's Church, or the severall Colleges or Halls thereof, should be preserved from defacing and spoyle.' But it seems these articles were not relished by the root-and-branch-men (31). Sir Thomas took also great care for the preservation of the publick library, which in several respects did suffer while the garrison was possesst by the royal party (32).

[U] And to give him thanks for his faithful services and wise conduct ] They gave him something more substantial than words and compliments, by making him very considerable presents and grants at different times. As namely, in 1645, they sent him a jewel of great value, set with diamonds, which was tyed in a blue ribband, and put about his neck (33). In 1646 an ordinance was made for settling 5000l. a year upon him, and his heirs (34). And 4000l. a year was granted to him out of the Duke of Buckingham's estate (35): which probably was part of the 5000l. settled upon him by the Parliament. Instead of the other thousand, 10,000l. was given him by Parliament (36).

out from London, Decemb. 18, with a sufficient force (x), carrying at the same time 50,000*l.* for his own army. The King being delivered by the Scots to the Parliament's Commissioners at Newcastle January 30, 1646 7; Sir Thomas went and met him, Feb. 15, beyond Nottingham, in his way to Holmby; and his Majesty stopping his horse, Sir Thomas alighted, and kissed his hand; and afterwards mounted, and discoursed with him as they rode along (y) [X]. The 5th of March following, after long debate in Parliament, he was voted General of the forces that were to be continued. He came to Cambridge the 12th of the same month, where he was highly caressed and complimented, and created Master of Arts (z) [Y]. Hitherto, the crafty and ambitious Oliver Cromwell had permitted him to enjoy in all respects the supreme command, at least to outward appearance. And, under his conduct, the army's rapid success, after their new model, had much surpassed the expectation of the most sanguine of their masters, the Parliament. The question now was, to disband the majority of them after their work was done, and to employ a part of the rest in the reduction of Ireland. But either of the two appeared to all of them intolerable. For many having, from the dregs of the people, risen to the highest commands; and by plunderings and violence amassing daily great treasures; they could not bear the thoughts of losing such great advantages. To maintain themselves therefore in the possession of them, Cromwell, and his son-in-law Ireton, as good a contriver as himself, but a much better writer and speaker, devise how to raise a mutiny in the army against the Parliament. To this end they spread a whisper among the soldiery, 'that the Parliament, now they had the King, intended to disband them; to cheat them of their arrears; and to send them into Ireland, to be destroyed by the Irish.' The army enraged at this, were taught by Ireton to erect a council among themselves, of two soldiers out of every troop and every company, to consult for the good of the army, and to assist at the Council of War, and advise for the peace and safety of the kingdom. These were called Adjutors, or Agitators (a), and wholly under Cromwell's influence and direction; the most active of them being his avowed creatures (b). Sir Thomas saw with uneasiness his power on the army usurped by these Agitators; the forerunners of confusion and anarchy, whose design (as he observes) was to raise their own fortunes upon the publick ruin: and that made him resolve to lay down his commission (c). But he was over-persuaded by the heads of the Independent faction to hold it [Z], till he had accomplished their desperate projects, of rendering themselves masters not only of the Parliament but of the whole kingdom. For, he joined in the several petitions and proceedings of the army that tended to destroy the Parliament's power (d); about the beginning of June, he advanced towards London, to awe the Parliament, though both Houses desired his army might not come within fifteen miles of the same (e); June 15, he was a party in the charge against eleven of the Members of the House of Commons (f) [AA]; in August, he espoused the Speakers of both Houses, and the sixty-six Members that had fled to the army, and betrayed the privileges of Parliament: and entering London, August 6, restored them in a kind of triumph. For which he received the thanks of both houses; and was appointed Constable of the Tower (g). He was no way concerned in the violent removal of the King from Holmby [BB], by Cornet Joyce, on the 3d of June;

pains, in endeavouring to clear his friends the Scots, from the imputation of having sold the King to the Parliament (37). But if the Parliament did not actually give that sum for this very consideration, it is certain, that it very much secured and hastened the payment of the Scotch army's arrears: which, without such a valuable pledge as the King's person, might have remained long unsatisfied. Tho' it is true that they were become very burdensome to the Northern counties (38): But if they had grown too troublesome, as they were no longer necessary, they would undoubtedly have been served in the same manner as they afterwards were by Oliver Cromwell. Mr Whitelock's following words deserve to be duly weighed. 'Now there began to be an understanding between some here and the Scots, for their delivery up of the King's person to the Parliament (39).' And the same author mentions (40), that the King said, 'he was bought and sold.'

[X] And afterwards mounted and discoursed with him as they rode along. The King said to one of the Commissioners of the Parliament, 'That the General was a man of honour, and kept his word with him (41).' But we are not informed upon what occasion.

[Y] And created Master of Arts. He was also, Jan. 11. this year, elected one of the representatives in Parliament for the Burgh of Cirencester (42).

[Z] But he was over-persuaded ——— to hold it Tho' he had never thought of opposing or disobeying the Parliament, yet he was disposed to more concurrence with the impetuous humour of the army, when he saw it was so much complied with, and submitted to, by all men (43).

[AA] June 15. he was a party in the charge against eleven of the members of the House of Commons. These eleven accused members, were, Denzill Hollis, Esq; Sir Phillip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, Major-General Massey, John Glynn, Esq; Recorder of London, Walter Long, Edward Harley, and Antony Nicholl, Esqrs. (44). The substance of the charge against them, only amounted to some pretended 'violent or oppressive ways, tending (as the words of the accusation) to overthrow the rights and liberties of the subjects of this nation.' But their real fault (which was far from being a fault) consisted in their opposing the army's unlawful and arbitrary proceedings; endeavouring to disband it; or sending part into Ireland: Which, as it tended to ruin and put a period to the exorbitant power of the army, was in their eyes an unpardonable crime. No wonder, therefore, that they opposed to the utmost all attempts towards their own dissolution; and endeavoured to exclude from Parliament, or destroy, all those that were for pulling them down from their exalted height, and sending them back to their mechanick trades, or reducing them to their original meanness, obscurity, and rags. And thus, as Mr Whitelock well observes (45), 'The army whom the Parliament had raised, paid, and commissioned, now mutiny against them, and with their swords in their hands, controul and oppose their principals and masters.'

[BB] He was no way concerned in the violent removal of the King from Holmby The reasons, sent to the General by the authors of this violence, for their committing it, were, 'That they had intimation of a design,

June; and waited with great respect upon his Majesty at Sir John Cutts's house near Cambridge (b). Being ordered, on the 15th of the same month, by the Parliament, to deliver the person of the King to such persons as both Houses should appoint; that he might be brought to Richmond, where propositions were to be presented to him for a safe and well-grounded peace (i): instead of complying (though he seemed to do so) he carried his Majesty from place to place, according to the several motions of the army [CC]. And yet he outwardly expressed, upon most occasions, a due respect for him [DD]; so that his ambiguous conduct was owing to the fear he had, lest the Parliament should become masters of the King's person. Thus, not having the will or resolution to oppose what he had not power enough to prevent, he resigned himself entirely to Cromwell [EE]; and though he wished nothing that Cromwell did, yet he contributed to bring it all to pass (k). It was this undoubtedly that made him concur, Jan. 9, 1647-8, in that cruel Declaration of the army, wherein they adhered to the Commons votes, of 'No further address or application to the King; and resolved to stand by the Parliament, in what should be further necessary for settling and securing the Parliament and kingdom, without the King and against him (l).' His father dying at York March 13, he became possessed of his title and estate; and was appointed Keeper of Pontefract-castle, Custos Rotulorum of Yorkshire, &c. in his room (m). But his father's death made no alteration in his conduct, he remaining the same fervile or deluded tool to Cromwell's ambition. For he not only sent extraordinary supplies, and took all pains imaginable for reducing Col. Poyer in Wales; but also quell'd, with the utmost zeal and industry, an insurrection of apprentices and others in London, April 9, who had declared for God and King Charles (n). The 1st of the same month, he removed his head-quarters to St Edmund's-bury; and upon the Royalists seizing Berwick and Carlisle; and the apprehension of the Scots entering England; he was desired, May 9, by the Parliament, to advance in person into the North, to reduce those places, and to prevent any danger from the threatened invasion. Accordingly he began to march that way, the 20th (o). But he was soon recalled, to quell an insurrection in Kent, headed by George Goring, Earl of Norwich, and Sir William Waller. Advancing therefore against them

'design, which they were able to make good, of some to surprize the King (46);' viz. the Parliament, or some by their order. For, as one observes, the King was then the golden apple contended for by the Parliament and the army.—Sir Thomas gives the following account of that affair. 'Being at Saffron-Walden, I had notice that Cornet Joyce, an Arch-Agitator, who quartered about Oxford, had seized on the King's person, removed his guards, &c. So soon as I heard of it, I immediately sent away two regiments of horse, commanded by Colonel Whaley, to set all things again in their due course and order. But before he came to Holmby, the King was advanced two or three miles on his way to Cambridge, attended by Joyce, where Colonel Whaley acquainted the King, he was sent by the General to let him know how much he was troubled at those great insolencies that had been committed so near his person; and as he had not the least knowledge of them before they were done, so he had omitted no time in seeking to remove that force, which he had orders from me to see done: and therefore he desired his Majesty that he would be pleased to return again to Holmby, where all things should be settled again in as much order and quietness as they were before. And also he desired the Commissioners of Parliament to re-assume their charge, and attend the King as usual. But the King refused to return, and the Commissioners to act; whereupon Colonel Whaley urged them to it, saying, He had an express command to see all things well settled again about his Majesty, which could not be done, but by his returning again to Holmby. The King said positively he would not do it; so the Colonel prest him no more, having indeed a special direction from me to use all tenderness and respect, as was due to his Majesty.—The next day I waited on his Majesty [at Sir John Cutts's house], it being also my business to persuade his return to Holmby, but he was otherwise resolved, the Agitators having brought him into an opinion that the army was for him.—That it might appear what a real trouble this act was to me,—I called for a council of war to proceed against Joyce, for this high offence and breach of the articles of war; but the officers, whether for fear of the distempered soldiers, or rather (as I suspected) a secret allowance of what was done, made all my endeavours in this ineffectual (47).'

[CC] According to the several motions of the army ]

The army was in the end of March 1647, at Walden; May 26, &c. at St Edmund's-bury; June 4, &c. at Newmarket; June 10, at Royston; June 14, &c. at St Alban's; June 25, at Barkhamstead; the 26th, at Uxbridge; the 30th, at High-Wickham; July 21, at Aylesbury; the 24th, at Bedford; the 31st, at Uxbridge; Aug. 2, at Colebrook; the 4th, at Hammer-smith; the 6th, at London; the 7th, at Croydon; the 14th, at Kingston; the 28th, at Putney; in November, at Hertford; in December, &c. at Windsor.—And the King was, till June 3, at Holmby; the 5th, at Huntington; the 8th, at Sir John Cutts's; the 11th, at Newmarket; the 24th, at Royston; the 26th, at Hatfield; July 2, at Windsor; the 3d, at Caverham; the 21st, at Woburne; the 24th, at Latimer's; Aug. 2, at Stoke-Abbey; the 14th, at Oatlands; the 24th, at Hampton-Court (48): where he continued till the 11th of November following, when he escaped into the Isle of Wight.

[DD] And yet he outwardly expressed, upon most occasions, a due respect for him ] For, in letters from him to the Parliament, he declares, that he and his officers 'endeavoured only the settlement of the publick peace, and rights of the nation; and assured the King, that this being done with his concurrence, the rights of his Majesty and his family should be provided for; and in the mean time his Majesty should find from them all personal civilities and respects, and such freedom as may stand with safety, and the trust lying upon them.—That they are no enemies to the Monarchy and Civil government.—That they conceived, to avoid all harshnesses, and afford all kindnesses to his Majesty, consisting with the peace and safety of the kingdom, is the most christian, honourable, and prudent way; and that tender, equitable, and moderate dealing towards his Majesty, his family, and party, is the most hopeful course, to take away the seeds of war, and feuds amongst us and our posterity, and to procure a lasting peace (49).'

[EE] He resigned himself entirely to Cromwell.] About this time, being tired with multiplicity of business and petitions at London, he appointed Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, and divers other officers, and such field-officers as were in town, or any five of them, to meet every day in Whitehall, to receive petitions, and consider of businesses relating to the army, and for the better preparing of dispatches (50).

them from London, in the latter end of May, he defeated a considerable party of them at Maidstone June 2, with his usual valour (p) [FF]. But the Earl, and about 500 of the Royalists, getting over the Thames at Greenwich into Essex, June 3, they were joined by several parties brought by Sir Charles Lucas, and Arthur Lord Capel, which made up their numbers about 4000; and went and shut themselves up in Colchester on the 12th of June (q). The Lord Fairfax, informed of their motions, passed over with his forces at Gravelend, with so much expedition, that he arrived before Colchester June 13. Immediately he summons the Royalists to surrender; which they refusing, he attacks them the same afternoon with the utmost fury. But being repulsed, he resolved, June 14, to block up the place, in order to starve the Royalists shut up therein into a compliance. These endured a severe and tedious siege of eleven weeks, not surrendering till August 28. and feeding for about five weeks chiefly on horse-flesh; all their endeavours for obtaining peace, or honourable terms, being ineffectual [GG]. This affair is the most exceptionable part in the Lord Fairfax's conduct. For, he granted the worse terms to that poor town, than to any other in the whole course of the war; he endeavoured to destroy it as much as possible; he laid an exorbitant fine, or ransom, of 12,000*l.* upon the inhabitants, to excuse them from being plundered; and he vented his revenge and fury upon Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle [HH], who had behaved in the best and most inoffensive manner during the siege, sparing that buffoon the Earl of Norwich, whose behaviour had been quite different (r): so that his name and memory there ought to be for ever detestable. After his mighty exploits against a poor and unfortified town, he took a kind of triumphant progress to Ipswich, Yarmouth, Norwich, St Edmund's-bury, Harwich, Mersey, and Maldon (s). About the beginning of December, he came again to London, to awe that city and the Parliament, and to forward the proceedings against the King; quartering himself in the royal palace of Whitehall (t): and, 'by special order from him and the Council of the army [II],' it was, that several members of the house of Commons were secluded and imprisoned, the 6th and 7th of that month (u); he being, as one expresses it, lull'd in a kind of stupidity (w). He was foremost in the list of the King's Judges, but refused to act (x), probably by his Lady's persuasion [KK]. Feb. 14, 1648-9, he was voted

[FF] With his usual valour. Though he was very much disabled and indisposed, and had a great fit of the gout then upon him, yet he could not be prevailed with to remain with the main body of the army in the field; but, with his foot wrapped up, he mounted on horseback, led on his men in the greatest danger, and was one of the first in all this action. Both sides did their parts with much valour and resolution, and there was scarce any action in the war more desperate and hazardous, and better performed than this (51).

[GG] All their endeavours for obtaining peace on honourable terms being ineffectual. For, as early as June 19, they proposed, 'That there might be a treaty between both armies for a peace:' adding, that 'it was the general peace of the kingdom they contended for.' But Sir Thomas replied, 'That such a treaty, and for such a peace, was not the proper work of himself, or the army, but theirs that had employed him:' and he offered only, that if within 24 hours they laid down their arms, the common soldiers should have liberty to depart to their several homes; and the officers pass to go beyond sea. His terms grew much higher afterwards (52).

[HH] And he vented his revenge and fury upon Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle. From the very beginning of the siege, he expressed the utmost passion and resentment against Sir Charles Lucas in particular (53): and, in his Memorials (54), is so injurious to his memory, as to call him, and Sir George, mere soldiers of fortune. His words are, 'But Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Lisle, being mere soldiers of fortune, and falling into our hands by chance of war, were executed.' Whereas Sir Charles was no more a soldier of fortune than his Lordship; for he had an estate in Essex, till dispossessed of it by plundering rebels; and was heir to the honour and estate of his brother John Lord Lucas, for want of issue male. In his letter to the Parliament, his Lordship seems to question, whether he had not prejudiced the honour and justice of Parliament in their execution. '—For some satisfaction, says he, to military justice, and in part of revenge for the innocent blood they have caused to be spilt, and the trouble, damage, and mischiefs they have brought upon the town, this country, and the kingdom, I have, with the advice of a Council of Warre of the chiefe officers both of the country forces and the army, caused two of them who were rendered at mercy, to be shot to death before any of them had quarter assured them. The persons pitched upon for this example, were, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Lisle, in whose military execution I hope your Lordships will not find cause to think your honour or justice prejudiced (55).'

[II] And by special order from him and the Council of the Army. These are Mr Whitelock's express words; but the Lord Fairfax clears himself from it, in the following manner. 'To prepare a way to this work [the King's Tryal] this agitating council did first intend to remove all out of the Parliament who were like to oppose them, and carried it on with such secrecy, as I had not the least intimation of it till it was done, as some of the members of the house can witness, with whom I was at that very time upon special business, when that attempt was made by Colonel Pride upon the Parliament, which I protest I never had any knowledge of till it was done. The reason why it was so secretly carried, that I should have no notice of it, was, because I always prevented those designs when I knew them (56).' The Lord Clarendon also confirms the same. 'No body own'd this act of violence in the exclusion of so many members: there was no order made for it by the house. Fairfax the General knew nothing of it, and the guards themselves being asked "what authority they had," gave no other answer, but "that they had orders (57)." But the same noble Author observes in the foregoing page, that the committee of Parliament that was appointed to confer with the General, for the better procuring a good intelligence and correspondence between the Army and the Parliament, were forced to attend full three hours, before they could be admitted to his presence; and then he told them sullenly and superciliously, 'that the way to correspond with the army, was to comply with their remonstrance' and the next morning a guard of musqueteers was placed to seclude the members.

[KK] He was foremost in the list of the King's Judges, but refused to act, probably by his Lady's persuasion. She exclaimed aloud against the proceedings of the High court, and the irreverent usage of the King by his subjects, insomuch that the court was interrupted (58): for her husband, the Lord Fairfax, being called first a one of the Judges, and no answer being made, the crier called him the second time, when there was a voice heard that said, 'he had

- (y) Whitelock, p. 381. voted to be one of the new Council of State (y). But on the 19th he refused to subscribe the Test, appointed by Parliament, for approving all that was done concerning the King and Kingship (z). March 31, he was voted General of all the forces in England and Ireland, more to his honour than intrinsic power (a). In May, he marched against the Levellers, who were grown very numerous, and began to be troublesome and formidable in Oxfordshire, and utterly routed them at Burford (b). Thence, on the 22d of the same month, he repaired to Oxford with Oliver Cromwell, and other officers, where he was highly feasted; and created Doctor of Laws (c). Next, upon apprehension of the like risings in other places, he went and viewed the castles and fortifications in the isle of Wight, and at Southampton, and Portsmouth; and near Guilford had a rendezvous of the army, which he exhorted to obedience (d). June 4, he was feasted with other officers, &c. by the city of London, and presented with a large and weighty bason and ewer of beaten gold (e). In June 1650, upon the Scots declaring for King Charles II, the juncto of the Council of State having taken a resolution to be beforehand, and not to stay to be invaded from Scotland, but to carry first the war into that kingdom; General Fairfax, being consulted, seemed to approve of the design. But afterwards, by the persuasions of his Lady, and of the Presbyterian Ministers, he declared himself unsatisfied, that there was a just ground for the Parliament of England to send their army to invade Scotland: and resolved to lay down his commission, rather than engage in that affair [LL]. Whereupon, on the 26th, the ordinance whereby he was appointed commander in chief of all the forces of the Parliament being repealed, that high trust was immediately committed to Oliver Cromwell (f); who was glad to see him removed, as being no longer necessary, but rather an obstacle to his further ambitious designs. For a kind of compensation, the Parliament settled an annual revenue of five thousand pounds upon his Lordship (g). Being thus released from all publick employment, he went and lived quietly at his own house in Nun-Appleton in Yorkshire; always earnestly wishing and praying (as we are assured) for the restitution of the Royal Family, and fully resolved to lay hold on the first good opportunity to contribute his part towards it; which made him always looked upon with a jealous eye by the Usurpers of that time. As soon as he was invited by General Monk to assist him against Lambert's army, he cheerfully embraced the occasion, and appeared, on the 3d of December 1659, at the head of a body of gentlemen of Yorkshire; and, upon the reputation and authority of his name, the Irish brigade, of 1200 horse, forsook Lambert's army, and joined him. The consequence was, the immediate breaking of all Lambert's forces, which gave General Monk an easy march into England (h). The 1st of January 1659-60, his Lordship made himself master of York (i); and, on the 2d of the same month, was chosen by the Rump-Parliament one of the Council of State, as he was again on the 23d of February ensuing (k). March 29, he was elected one of the Knights for the County of York, in the Healing Parliament (l): and was at the head of the Committee appointed, May 3, by the House of Commons, to go and attend King Charles II. at the Hague; to desire him to make a speedy return to his Parliament, and to the exercise of

' more wit than to be there,' which put the court into some disorder, and somebody asking, who it was, there was no other answer but a little murmuring. But, presently, when the impeachment was read, and that expression used, of 'All the good people of England,' the same voice in a louder tone answered, 'No, nor the hundredth part of them:' upon which, one of the officers bid the soldiers give fire into that box whence those presumptuous words were uttered. But it was quickly discerned that it was the General's wife, who had uttered both those sharp sayings; who was presently persuaded or forced to leave the place, to prevent any new disorder.—Having been bred in Holland, she had not that reverence for the Church of England, as she ought to have had, and so had unhappily concurred in her husband's entering into Rebellion, never imagining what misery it would bring upon the kingdom; and now abhorred the work in hand as much as any body could do, and did all she could to hinder her husband from acting any part in it (59).—A. Wood relates some particular circumstances of the Lord Fairfax's behaviour, at the time of the King's murder, that show such extreme hypocrisy, or so much indolence, stupidity, and easiness in being imposed upon, that they are hardly credible.—'Tis true, says he, that before the King was beheaded, he did use his power and interest to have the execution deferred for some days, forbearing his coming among the officers, and did fully resolve with his own regiment to prevent the execution, or have it deferred till he could make a party in the army to second his design: but behold his policy! all the morning of that day on which the King was beheaded, and the time when he was be-

' headed, he was with certain officers of the army at prayer or in discourse, or both, in Major Thos. Harrison's apartment in Whitehall (being a room at the hither end of that gallery looking towards the Privy-garden) and knew nothing of it, as it doth appear by this passage. When his Majesty was beheaded, and his corps thereupon immediately confined and covered with a black velvet pall, Bp. Juxon who attended him on the scaffold, and Thomas Herbert the only groom of his bedchamber that was then left, did go with the said corps to the backstairs to have it embalmed, and Mr Herbert, after the body had been deposited, meeting with the General, Fairfax asked him "how the King did?" Whereupon Herbert looking very strangely upon him, told him that "the King was beheaded," at which he seemed much surpris'd (60).'

[LL] And resolved to lay down his commission rather than engage in that affair.] A committee from the Council of State went to confer with him upon that subject, in a room in Whitehall; but (tho' they went first to prayer, that God would direct them in this business, and Cromwell and most of the rest prayed) yet the prayers of these hypocrites could not be countenanced with a heavenly influence, nor their reasons and arguments prevail upon his Lordship. And if they had, very sorry and disappointed would many of them have been; as Mr Whitelock, a member of this committee, observes in the following words—'none of the Committee so earnest to persuade the General to continue his commission as Cromwell and the Soldiers. Yet there was cause enough to believe that they did not overmuch desire it (61).'

(m) lb. p. 133. of his kingly office (m). May 16, he waited upon his Majesty with the rest [MM]; and atoned in some measure for all past offences, by readily concurring and assisting in his Restoration. After the dissolution of the short Healing Parliament, he retired again to his seat in the country; where he lived in a private manner, till his death, which happened November 12, 1671, in the 60th year of his age (n) [NN]. Several letters, remonstrances, and other papers, subscribed with his name, are preserved in Rushworth and other Collections, being published during the time he was General; but he disowns most of them [OO]. After his decease, some 'short memorials, written by himself,' were published; which do him no great honour [PP]. The Lord Fairfax, as to his person, was tall, but not above the just proportion (o); and of a gloomy and melancholy disposition. He stammered a little, and was a bad Orator in the most plausible occasion (p). As to the qualities of his mind; he was religious in the way he professed, which was Presbyterianism (q) [QQ]: of a good natural disposition (r): a great lover of learning, having contributed to the edition of the Polyglott, and other large works (s): and a particular admirer of the History and Antiquities of Great Britain, witness the encouragement he gave to Mr Dodsworth (t). He was of a meek and humble carriage, and but of few words in discourse and Council; yet when his judgment and reason were satisfied, he was unalterable; and often ordered things expressly contrary to the judgment of all his Council (u). His valour was unquestionable. He was daring, and no self-seeker (w). And in action in the field, he appeared so highly transported, that scarce any one durst speak a word to him, and he would seem like a man distracted and furious (x). His being outwitted by Cromwell, or suffering himself to become the tool and property of that wicked ambitious man, was his greatest blemish. Happy would it have been for the nation, happy for himself, if he had retired sooner [RR].

[MM] May 16, he waited upon his Majesty, with the rest. He drew upon him, as A. Wood relates, the curiosity and eyes of all men, as known to them by name to have been Captain-General of the Parliament-Army. And when the first ceremony was past, he desired, as 'tis said, to see the King in private, and to ask him pardon for the past offences, which accordingly he did with all submission (62).

[NN] Till his death, which happened November 12. 1671. in the 60th year of his age. He was buried in an isle joyning on the Southside to the Chancel of Bilburgh Church, near York. Over his grave was soon after put this Epitaph. 'Here lye the bodies of the right honourable Thomas Lord Fairfax of Denton, Baron of Camerone, who died Nov. the 12th. An. 1671, in the sixtieth year of his age. And of Anne his wife, Daughter and Coheir of Horatio Lord Vere Baron of Tilbury. He had issue, Mary Duchefs of Buckingham, and Elizabeth (63). — His eldest Daughter, Mary, had the misfortune of having for husband the witty, wicked, George Villiers Duke of Buckingham; to whom she was married May 24, 1657 (64). She died in November 1704 (65). There is no account of the other daughter.

[OO] But he disowns most of them. In these words. 'One thing more requires I should say something to, before I conclude; that is, concerning papers and declarations of the army that came out in my name, and the Council of Officers. I say, from the time they declared their usurped authority at Triploew heath, I never gave my free consent to any thing they did: but being yet undischarged of my place, they set my name in way of course to all their papers, whether I consented or not: and to such failings are all authorities subject (66).

[PP] After his decease, some short memorials, written by himself, were published; which do him no great honour. They were published in 1699, 8vo. by Brian Fairfax, Esq; The author never designed them for the press, only to remain for the satisfaction of his own relations: but they were published to prevent a surreptitious edition. As I said, they do no great honour to the noble author: for they are writ in an odd canting strain; and moreover abound with mistakes. For instance, in p. 122. now accidentally open before me, he says.—'That the Besieged in Colchester after four months close siege were compelled to surrender. But the siege of that place lasted neither four months, nor three months; being only from the 13th of June to the 27th of August. And the like in other instances.

[QQ] He was religious in the way which he professed, which was Presbyterianism. But Sir Roger Manley, on the other hand, says, that tho' 'constancy was attributed to his natural temper, being melancholy, it was notwithstanding thought ductile where religion was in question; and therefore Cromwell, that famous impostor in godliness, was given him for a supervising Lieutenant (68).

[RR] Happy for himself, if he had retired sooner. For, as Mr Addison elegantly represents it,

When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
The post of honour is a private station (69).

Brian Fairfax, Esq; the editor of his Lordship's Memorials, concludes his character with the following encomium; 'that so long as unfeigned piety towards God, invincible courage joynd with wonderful modesty, and exceeding good nature: justice and charity to all men in his private life; and an ingenuous acknowledgment of his publick error, with hearty endeavours to make reparation, as soon as he was convinced of it, shall be esteemed in the world: so long shall the name of my Lord Fairfax be honoured by good men, and be had in perpetual remembrance (70). — The Duke of Buckingham, his Lordship's son-in-law, composed also an Epitaph for him, wherein he bestows the highest praises and compliments upon him.

FANSHAW (Sir RICHARD) an excellent Poet, employed in several embassies by King Charles I. and II, was the youngest son [A] of Sir Henry Fanshaw, of Ware-Park in Hertfordshire [B]. He was born about the year 1607 (a), and received the first rudiments

He was descended from the family of Fanshaw, of Fanshaw-gate in Derbyshire; being the great-grandson of John Fanshaw, of that place: this John's two sons, Henry and Thomas, were successively Remembrancers of the Exchequer (1); and the latter buying Ware-park of Katharine Countess of Huntington, about the year 1570, made it the place of his residence. By his first wife, Mary daughter of ——— Bouchier, he had issue Henry his eldest son and heir, who was made a Knight, and died the 10th of March 1615; having had by his wife, Elizabeth daughter of Thomas Smith, Customer of the port of London, ten children; and among the rest, Thomas, Simon, and RICHARD who is the subject of this article. - ments of his education from the famous Thomas Farnaby; afterwards he completed his studies in the University of Cambridge, and from thence went to travel into foreign countries; by which means he became a gentleman admirably accomplished (b). In 1635 he was, for his early abilities, taken into the service of the State by King Charles I. and appointed Resident to the Court of Spain: whence being recalled into England, at the beginning of the troubles in 1641, he followed the Royal interest during all the succeeding calamitous times, and was employed in several important matters of State. In 1644, attending the Court at Oxford, he had the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law conferred upon him (c): and being now grown very eminent for his excellent parts and learning (d), he was made Secretary to Charles Prince of Wales, whom he attended into the western parts of England, and thence into the isles of Scilly and Jersey (e) [C]. In 1648, he was appointed Treasurer of the Navy under the command of Prince Rupert, which office he managed till the year 1650, when he was created a Baronet by King Charles II; and sent Envoy-extraordinary to the Court of Spain. Being recalled thence into Scotland, he served there in quality of Secretary of State; to the great satisfaction of all parties, notwithstanding he never took the Covenant or Engagement. In 1651, he was made prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and committed to close custody in London: where continuing till he contracted a dangerous sickness, he had liberty allowed him, upon giving bail, to go for the recovery of his health to any place he should choose, provided he stirred not five miles from thence without leave from the Parliament. Among other places, he was at Tankerley-Park in Yorkshire, in 1654; where, and during the rest of his confinement, and at vacant hours afterwards, he made several translations, and wrote divers poems, of which an account is given below (f). In February 1659-60, he repaired to King Charles II, at Breda, who knighted him the April following (g). Upon his Majesty's Restoration, it was expected that he would have been made one of the Secretaries of State, not only from the kindness his Master long had for him, and the hopes formerly given him of it; but likewise as a recompence, in some measure, for the great sufferings which both he and his family had sustained in that King's service. However missing that preferment, he had the place of Master of Requests conferred on him, a station in those times of considerable profit. Afterwards, for his known abilities, and accurate Latin style, he was also made Secretary of the Latin tongue (h). In 1661, being one of the Burgesses for the University of Cambridge, he was sworn a Privy-Counsellor for Ireland (i): and having, by his residence in foreign courts, qualified himself for publick employments abroad, he was sent Envoy-extraordinary to Portugal, with a dormant commission to the Ambassador, which he was to make use of as occasion should require. Shortly after, he was appointed Ambassador to that Court, where he negotiated the marriage between his master King Charles II, and the Infanta Donna Catharina, daughter of King John VI. He returned to England towards the end of the same year (k). We are assured, that he was sent again Ambassador to that crown in 1662 (l); and when he had finished his commission, to the mutual satisfaction both of King Charles II, and of Alphonso King of Portugal, being recalled in 1663, he was sworn of his Majesty's Privy-Council (m). In the beginning of the year 1664, he was sent Ambassador to Philip IV, King of Spain [D]; and arrived February the 29th at Cadiz, where he was saluted in a manner unexampled to others, and received with several circumstances of particular esteem (n) [E]. Dromore: But his son Thomas sold Ware-park to Sir Thomas Byde, Knt. Simon was also knighted. The place of Remembrancer of the Exchequer was enjoyed by Sir Henry, and Thomas Lord Viscount Fanshaw, and his son, during the reigns of King James I. and King Charles I. and II. (2).

[C] And thence into the isles of Scilly and Jersey] But not of Guernsey, as Mr Wood hath it (3): For it does not appear that the Prince was at all in Guernsey. See Lord Clarendon (4), and the rest of our Historians.

[D] In the beginning of the year 1664, he was sent Ambassador to Philip IV. King of Spain.] His correspondence during this embassy was published in 1702, in one volume 8vo. under this title. 'Original Letters of his Excellency Sir Richard Fanshaw, during his embassies in Spain and Portugal: which, together with divers Letters and Answers from the chief Ministers of State of England, Spain, and Portugal, contain the whole negotiations of the treaty of peace between those three crowns.' The publisher received those letters from the hands of a daughter of Sir Richard, who had left them in her possession. He observes in the preface, that 'Learned men of all degrees, qualities, and employments, are extremely inquisitive after the letters and correspondencies of such persons as have had the honour of being employed at foreign courts in the quality of Ambassadors, Envoys, or Residents, or at home as Publick Ministers; and their curiosity is soon accounted for, when we consider the advantage that is gained by seeing things as they are in their native dress; before the succeeding embellishments of artifice or interest have disguised, and rendered them more plausible than in truth the originals were designed for.' In Sir Richard's instructions, the chief points recommended to him, were, to demand reparation and punishment from some freebooters, who had taken ships from the English; and to endeavour to restore amity, trade, and commerce, and renew the alliance between England and Spain: to mediate an accommodation between Spain and Portugal: to get the transportation of blacks into the West-Indies, appropriated to the English; and the pre-emption of Spanish wools, &c. (5).

[E] And received with several circumstances of particular esteem.] It appears from one of Sir Richard's letters, that this extraordinary respect was paid him not only upon his own, but also upon his master the King of England's account. His words are thus. 'I had not been three hours on shore [at Cadiz] when an Extraordinary arrived from Madrid, with more particular orders than formerly from his Catholick Majesty, importing that our Master's fleet (when arrived) and this Ambassador, should be prelatud from the city in a manner unexampled to others, and which should not be drawn into example hereafter. Moreover (and this so likewise) that I and all my company must be totally defray'd, both here and all the way up to Madrid, upon his Catholick Majesty's account, with several other circumstances of particular esteem for this Court King Philip died, Sept. 17, 1665; leaving his son Charles, an infant (o), and his dominions, under the regency of his Queen, Mary-Anne, daughter of the Emperor Ferdinand III (p). Our wise Minister taking an advantage of this minority, put the finishing hand to a peace with Spain; which was sufficiently tired and weakened with a twenty-five years war, for the recovery of Portugal, that had been dismembered from the Spanish crown in 1640. The treaty of peace was signed at Madrid, December 6, 1665 [F]. About the 14th of January following, his Excellency took a journey into Portugal, where he staid till towards the end of March (q). The design of this journey undoubtedly was, to endeavour to bring about an accommodation between that crown and Spain: which however was not effected till 1667, by the mediation of his Britannick Majesty (r). Sir Richard having fulfilled his commission, was preparing for his return to England; when, June 4, 1666, he was seized at Madrid with a violent fever, which put an end to his life the 16th of the same month (s); the very day he had designed to set out on his return home. His body being embalmed, was conveyed by his lady, with all his children then living, by land to Calais, and so to London: whence being carried to All-Saints-Church in Hertford, it was deposited in the vault of his father-in-law Sir John Harrison, till May 18, 1671, when it was removed into a new vault, made on purpose for him and his family in the parish-church of Ware. Near the vault, there is a handsome monument erected to his memory (t) [G]. He was remarkable for his meekness, sincerity, humanity, and piety; and also was an able statesman and a great scholar, being, in particular, a compleat master of several modern languages, especially the Spanish, which he spake, and writ, with as much exactness as if he had been a native of that country (u). What he wrote, or published, is mentioned in the note [H]. By his lady, Anne, eldest daughter of Sir John Harrison, of Balls, he had six sons and eight daughters; whereof only one son, and four daughters, survived him (w).

The rest contains only an account of his family, marriage, issue, offices, and employments, which have been sufficiently related already in this article.

(9) See Bayle's Dictionary, under the article GUAINI. [H] What he wrote, or published, is mentioned in the note. 'Tis as follows, I. An English translation, in rhyme, of the celebrated Italian pastoral, called Il Pastor Fido, or The Faithful Shepherd; written originally by Battista Guarini (9). Printed at London 1646, 4to. and 1664, 8vo. see a further account of it below. II. A translation from English into Latin verse, of, The Faithful Shepherdes, a Pastoral; written originally by John Flecher, Gent. Lond. 1658. III. In the octavo edition of The Faithful Shepherd, anno 1664, are inserted the following poems of our author's, viz. 1. An Ode upon Occasion of his Majesty's Proclamation in 1630, commanding the Gentry to reside upon their Estates in the Country. 2. A Summary Discourse of the Civil Wars of Rome; extracted from the best Latin Writers in Prose and Verse. 3. An English Translation of The fourth Book of Virgil's Æneis, on the Loves of Dido and Æneas. 4. Two Odes out of Horace, relating to the Civil Wars of Rome, against covetous rich Men. IV. He translated from Portuguese into English, The Lusiad, or Portugal's Historical Poem; written originally by Luis de Camoëns. Lond. 1655, &c. fol. V. After his decease, namely in 1671, were published these two posthumous pieces of his in 4to. Querer per solo querer: To love only for Love's sake, a dramatick romance represented before the King and Queen of Spain; and Fiestas de Aranjuez: Festivals at Aranjuez. Both written originally in Spanish, by Antonio de Mendoza; upon occasion of celebrating the birth-day of King Philip IV, in 1623, at Aranjuez. They were translated by our author in 1654, during his confinement at Tankerley-Park in Yorkshire: Which uneasy situation induced him to write the following stanza's on this work.

Time was, when I, a pilgrim of the seas,
When I 'midst noise of camps and courts disease;
Purloin'd some hours to charm rude cares with verse,
Which flame of Faithful Shepherd did rehearse.

But now restrain'd from sea, from camp, from court,
And by a tempest blown into a port;
I raise my thoughts to muse on higher things,
And eccho arms and loves of Queens and Kings.

Which Queens (despising crowns and Hymen's band)
Would neither men obey, nor men command:
Great pleasure from rough seas to see the shore;
Or from firm land to hear the billows roar (10).

We are told, that he composed several other things, remaining in manuscript, which he writ in his younger years, but had not the leisure to compleat (11).—Even some of the forementioned printed pieces have not all the perfection which our ingenious author could have given them. For, as the writer of the short account of his life observes, 'being, for his loyalty and zeal to his master's service, tossed from place to place, and from country to country, during the unsettled times of our anarchy; some of his manuscripts falling by misfortune into unskillful hands, were printed and published without his consent or knowledge, and before he could give them his last finishing strokes.'—But that was not the case with his excellent translation of Pastor Fido; which was published by himself, and hath been applauded by some of the best judges, particularly by Sir John Denham; who, after censuring servile translators, goes on thus:

A new and nobler way thou dost pursue,
To make Translations and Translators too.
They but preserve the ashes, Thou the flame,
True to his sense, but truer to his fame.

FARQUHAR (GEORGE), an ingenious comic Poet, in the latter end of King William's reign, and part of Queen Anne's; was descended of a good family in the North of Ireland, where, it is said, his parents held no mean rank (a). We have been informed, by a gentleman of that country, that his father was Dean of Armagh, but have not met with it confirmed: however, it is attested by another of his countrymen, that he was the son of a clergyman, and born at Londonderry, in that kingdom; which was in the year 1678, as may be computed from his account of him (b). There, he received his more juvenile instruction; and there he discovered a genius, so early devoted to the Muses, that unless he is complimented, as he intimates Poets often by themselves are, with being the Authors of ripe fruits in their greenest years, he gave several specimens of his poetry before he was ten years old, in which he manifested a depth of thinking, as well as an elegance of expression, far beyond his years; one example whereof, being preserved by the writer of his memoirs above quoted, may also, in this account of ours, be thought not unworthy of preservation [A]. We receive it from the same hand, that his parents having a numerous issue, could bestow on him no fortune further than a genteel education; therefore, when he was qualified for the University, he was sent to Trinity-College in Dublin; which, as we are elsewhere informed, was in 1694, he being then in the seventeenth year of his age (c). Here, by the progress he made in his studies, he acquired a considerable reputation (d); but we find it not consented to, that he there took his degree of Bachelor of Arts (e); for indeed, his gay and volatile disposition, could not long relish the grave and regular course of a collegiate life; and his own opinion of it, to that sense, he afterwards freely enough displayed in several parts of his comedies, and other writings: besides, the expence of it, without any immediate prospect of some profitable returns, might be inconsistent with his circumstances. The more polite and popular entertainments of the town, most attracted him, especially those of the stage; and he does not seem to have been in that college much above a year, or two at most, before he perceived some hopeful temptation of transplanting himself thither, from the encouragement he saw others receive. For, when Mr Joseph Ashbury, the master of Dublin theatre, had carried thither from England, among others, to recruit his company of players, Mr Robert Wilks, who had been, from the latter end of the year 1690, till his said return into Ireland (f), under Mr Christopher Rich, at Drury-Lane house, tho' very little to his advantage; but was now, at Dublin, much advanced in his salary, and much more care'd by his own countrymen than he had been at London, as we have it in another life of Mr Wilks, different from that last quoted (g); Mr Farquhar soon found also his own person, and his parts, being already known by some of his poetical performances, so recommend him to that master, or this player, that by the voluntary choice of the one, or cordial interest of the other, he was readily admitted into the said theatre; but his services there were of no long continuance. It is indeed reported, that his genteel figure, proper gesture, ready memory, and just elocution, rendered him very acceptable there; only his voice, which, either in speaking or singing, among private company, made him also, as we have been informed by those who knew him, very engaging, was too mild, too low, in those publick and numerous assemblies. In short, he could not rant and rave, and tear a passion to tatters, as Shakespear phrases it (h); or captivate the commonalty of an audience, which is ravished more with sound than sense: and might possibly want, like Thomas Otway and Nat. Lee (i), that front or assurance, that conceit of self-sufficiency, which disguises defects and improprieties, both in speech and action; overbears the generality of spectators; and carries many veteran stagers plausibly thro' those parts, which they are unqualified naturally to personate. His more excellent talents, however, might have preserved the Player at Dublin, and lost the Poet at London, but for an accident, whereby he was near turning a feigned tragedy into a real one [B]; which

[A] May in this account be thought not unworthy of preservation] This early production of our author's, which has indeed in it something beyond the years in which it is said to be written, is as follows.

The pliant soul of erring youth,
Is like soft wax, or moisten'd clay;
Apt to receive all heav'nly truth,
Or yield to tyrant Ill the sway.

Slight folly in your early years,
At manhood may to virtue rise;
But he, who in his youth appears
A fool, in age will ne'er be wise (1).

(1) Memoirs of Mr George Farquhar, p. 4.

However, our author himself reflects upon the ascribing some compositions to ingenious men in their green years, or their pretending to have written them before they did; as if it were not only unnecessary, but might be disadvantageous, thro' the extraordinary expectations it might raise, of proportionable improvements in their riper productions; so extenuate the chaacter it was intended to magnify; where he brings in Poet Lyric, saying to his correspondent, 'Now, Sir, here's a poem, which, according to the way of us Poets, I say, was written at fifteen; but, between you and I, it was made at five and twenty (2).'

[B] He was near turning a feigned tragedy into a real one.] This story we find related after this manner. 'Mr Farquhar was extremely beloved in Ireland, and had indeed the advantage of a very good person, tho' his voice was weak; but as he never met with the least repulse from the audience, in any of his performances, he was resolved to continue on the stage till something better should offer; but his resolution was soon broke by an accident. For Mr Farquhar being to play the part of Guyomar (3), who kills Vasquez, one of the Spanish Generals; and for getting to exchange his sword for a foil, in the engagement, he wounded his brother tragedian who presented Vasquez, very dangerously; and tho' it proved not mortal, yet it so shocked the natural tenderness of Mr Farquhar's temper, that it put a period to his acting ever after (4).'

which being so repugnant to his inherent humanity, added to his other discouragement; and this happening at the time when Mr Wilks received a more profitable proposal than he expected, from Mr Rich aforesaid, of four pounds a week, if he would return, with his wife, to the English stage, it was with the less difficulty that Mr Farquhar was persuaded to bear them company (k). After their arrival at London, which might be in the year 1696 (l), Mr Wilks, who was well acquainted with his abilities, ceased not his importunities; till he had prevailed with him to write a play (m); assuring him, that he was beheld by all who knew him, in a much brighter light than he had opportunity hitherto of shewing himself; and was fitter to exhibit entertaining compositions for the stage, than to echo those of other Poets upon it. But he was more substantially invited yet, by a genteel and decent accommodation, which would enable him, both with means and leisure, to exercise his genius at ease, in the study of dramatick poetry; for we are told, it was not very long after that accident at the Playhouse in Dublin, before the Earl of Orrery, who was a patron as well as master of learning, in regard to his singular merits, which he saw hitherto unrewarded, gave him a Lieutenant's commission in his own regiment; then in Ireland, which he held several years (n). From the former of which authorities here referred to, we also learn, that, as an officer of the said rank in the army, he behaved himself very commendably, and gave several proofs both of his courage and conduct. Whether this commission was conferred upon him before, or after he obliged the town with his first comedy, we are not particularly informed; and authors differ in their nomination of the first play that Mr Wilks performed in, upon his return to the English stage. Whether he acted the part of Palamede (o), as it has been affirmed by one of our dramatick Historians (p), or that of Armusia (q), according to the assertion of another (r), is not here very material: but we have among Mr Farquhar's Miscellanies; an Epilogue of his writing, which was spoken by Mr Wilks at his first appearance, as tis said, upon the English stage (s); which we take to be rather this, his first appearance, upon his return thither, unless it may be urged, that our Author, who wrote such verses as are before quoted, at ten years of age, might very well write these, at twelve or thirteen. In the year 1698, his first comedy, called Love and a Bottle, appeared on the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane, and it was, as well for the sprightly dialogue, as that lively turn of incidents in it, which fill the stage with business, and keep up the spirit of such compositions, very well received, tho' Mr Wilks had no part in it. In 1699, the late celebrated Mrs Anne Oldfield, was, upon his judgment and recommendation, first admitted into the said theatre [C], she then being sixteen years of age (t): and in the former part of the year 1700, he brought his CONSTANT COUPLE, OR TRIP to the JUBILEE, upon that stage, it being then the Jubilee year at Rome, when some Popish zealots, of all countries, made their trip thither, to buy pardons and other trinkets or fairings, for the convenience of soul and body. But our Author drew such a gay airy figure in Sir Harry Wildair; the part was so perfectly adapted to Mr Wilks's, genius, and it was so animated by his gesture and vivacity of spirit, that it is not determinable whether the Poet or the Player received more reputation by it. Towards the latter end of this year, we meet with Mr Farquhar in Holland, probably upon his military duty; from whence he has given a description, in two of his letters, dated in August and October that year, from the Brill and from Leyden, no less equitable than facetious, as well of those places, as the people (u); and in a third, dated from the Hague, in the same month last mentioned, he very humorously relates how merry he was there, at a treat made by the Earl of Westmorland; while, not only himself, but King William, and others of his subjects, were detained there by a violent storm, which he has no less comically described (w); and has, among his poems, written also an ingenious copy of verses to his mistress upon the same subject. Whether this mistress was the same person whom he calls his charming Penelope, in several of his love-letters addressed to her, and some others probably

[C] Mrs Oldfield was by his recommendation, &c. admitted into the said theatre. The particulars of this assertion we have from a person who was then servant to Mr Rich, master of that theatre, in a letter which he wrote to the editor of Mrs Oldfield's life, in which it is printed in these words.

S I R,

IN your Memoirs of Mrs Oldfield it may not be amiss to insert the following facts, on the truth of which you may depend. Her father Capt. Oldfield, not only run out all the military, but likewise the paternal bounds of his fortune, having a pretty estate in houses in Pall-Mall. It was wholly owing to Capt. Farquhar that ever Mrs Oldfield became an actress, from the following incident. Dining one day at her aunt's, who kept the Miter Tavern in St James's Market (*), he heard Miss Nanny reading a play behind the bar, with so proper an emphasis, and such agreeable turns suitable to each character, that he swore the girl was cut out for the stage, to which she had before always expressed an inclination, being very desirous to try her fortune that way. Her mother, the next time she saw Capt Vanbrugh, who had a great respect for the family, told him what was Capt. Farquhar's advice; upon which, he desired to know whether, in the plays she read, her fancy was most pleased with tragedy or comedy? Miss being called in, said comedy; she having, at that time, gone thro' all Beaumont and Fletcher's comedies; and the play she was reading, when Capt. Farquhar dined there, was The Scornful Lady. Capt. Vanbrugh, shortly after, recommended her to Mr Christopher Rich, who took her into the house, at the allowance but of fifteen shillings per week. However, her agreeable figure, and the sweetness of her voice, soon gave her the preference, in the opinion of the whole town, to all our young actresses; and his Grace the late Duke of Bedford, being pleased to speak to Mr Rich in her favour, he instantly raised her allowance to twenty shillings per week: her fame and salary, at length, rose to her just merit.

Your humble servant,

in which she is not so called, we know not; but have been informed by an old officer of the army, who very well knew Mr Farquhar, and some of his youthful gallantries, that by that name we are to understand Miss Oldfield, above mentioned; and that the person meant by Mrs V——, in one of them, said to be her bedfellow (x), was Mrs Verbruggen the actress; the same, who was some years before Mrs Mountfort (y), from whom Mrs Oldfield received her first theatrical instructions, and succeeded, when she died three or four years after in child-bed, in her principal parts, with singular commendation: and we shall see presently, how comfortably Mr Farquhar could warm his fancy, and chase up his inclinations, at this bright sparkling flame of his: from whence we need not doubt what another person, who was acquainted also with her, has said in these words; ‘I have often heard Mrs Oldfield mention the many agreeable hours she had spent in Mr Farquhar’s company (z).’ But here, Chronology calls upon us, for the space of a few lines, to Order. In the beginning of the following year, he was a spectator of, if not a mourner at, Mr Dryden’s funeral; but the description he has made of it, is indeed no mournful one (a). And now his last comedy having met with almost unparalleled success, and so charmed the whole town, that nothing could relish like a continuation of it; he accordingly, in that year, 1701, brought out his comedy called Sir HARRY WILDAIR, &c. and when Mrs Oldfield came to shine out, equal with Wilks, in those two plays, there were none at that time which more attracted the gay company at least, which frequented the Theatre, or more engaged their approbation: of these three comedies hitherto spoken of, we shall say something more hereafter, with his others, in a note together. In the next year, he published those Miscellanies, as some call them, or Collection of POEMS, LETTERS, and ESSAYS, which we have before cited; though, perhaps stiled, in this first edition, as we find them in some catalogues of books, by a title somewhat different (b); of which, it may not be improper here, to be somewhat more particular [D]. Some of those

[D] Of which it may not be improper to be here somewhat more particular.] In this collection of our Author’s poems, letters, and essays, reprinted with the succeeding editions of his comedies, several of the poems seem, by their titles or subjects, to have been some of the earliest of his productions; as his Pindarick Ode on the Death of General Schomberg, who was killed at the battle of the Boyne, in Ireland, anno 1690. An Epigram on the Riding-House at Dublin. On the Death of Queen Mary. An Epilogue, spoken by Mr Wilks, at his first Appearance on the English Stage, as before-mentioned. His Prologue on the proposed Union of the two Houses. His Verses written in Orinda’s Poems, in imitation of Ovid. Those To the ingenious Lady who wrote The Fatal Friendship (6). To a Lady, being detained from her by Storms. And some others.

(6) Mrs Cath. Trother, printed 4to, 1698; which Gildon thinks deserves the Applause it met with. His Dramatick Poets, in Appendix, p. 179.

His Letters, as we observed, were written in 1700 and 1701. Some, when he was in Holland; and the rest, when he was returned to England; of which we have mentioned some chief parts relating to his personal history, but the greatest number contain his courtship and amours with one or two of the fair sex; some, dated from Grays-Inn; others, from the Inner Temple; and some part of Essex, when he was in the country. In one of his amorous letters, containing a contest between his head and his heart, in which the latter, by the help of some other members, gets the better in the conclusion, which is slyly witty and waggish; there runs throughout such a singular vein of humour and drollery, that we may take it for a comedy in miniature (7). In another, his distinctions upon those female maxims of amorous policy, asserting, that if the women will fly, the men will pursue; and that enjoyment quenches love; with his arguments against the inconsistency of love with reason, he has, like an honourable lover, ingeniously defeated those tyrannical and heterodox principles in the fair sex, and attempted to introduce a reformed system in their doctrine of love; by distinguishing, like a man of sense, what only is the passion of fools (8). But among his letters to his dear Penelope, or Mrs Oldfield as it is reported, that above referred to, in which Mrs Verbruggen is affirmed to be mentioned, concludes with his verses upon Rosamond’s Pond in St James’s Park, and the Water-rat which had frightened his charmer aforesaid, away from the banks of it, in these words.

(7) Farquhar’s Letters, &c. p. 49.

(8) Id. p. 51.

Fair Rosamond did little think,
Her crystal pond should turn a sink;
To harbour vermin that might swim,
And frighten beauties from the brim.

Henceforth, detested pond, no more Shall beauties crown your verdent shore;
Your waves, so fam’d for am’rous league,
Are now turn’d Ratsbane to Intrigue.

But his letter and dialogue, written to the same person, as ’tis said; from Gray’s-Inn, upon her swearing her mask the evening before; which was a female fashion in those days, as well in publick walks, as among the spectators at the Playhouse; because they so naturally display his pleasant temper and talents, and will afford an idea of them as clear as most of the rest, therefore may not be thought tedious to repeat, especially as they are all that we shall revive out of this collection, are as follow.

‘The arguments you made use of last night for keeping on your mask, I endeavoured to defeat with reason; but that proving ineffectual, I’ll try the force of rhyme, and send you the heads of our chat in a poetical dialogue between You and I.’

You.

Thus Images are veil’d which you adore;
Your Ignorance does raise your zeal the more.

I.

All Image-worship for false zeal is held;
False idols ought indeed to be conceal’d.

You.

Thus Oracles of old were still receiv’d;
The more ambiguous, still the more believ’d.

I.

But Oracles of old were seldom true;
The Devil was in ’em—sure he’s not in you!

You.

Thus mask’d in Mysteries does the God-head stand;
The more obscure, the greater his command.

I.

The God-head’s hidden pow’r wou’d soon be past,
Did we not hope to see his face at last.

You.

You are my Slave already, Sir, you know;
To shew more charms, wou’d but increase your woe:
I scorn an insult to a conquer’d foe.

I.

those letters were published, from the copies returned him, at his request, by one of his female correspondents, as appear therein (c); who was, as it is reported, the said Mrs Oldfield; and she often delighted to read them, many years after they were printed; as she also did, that Essay at the end of them, which is called A Discourse upon COMEDY, in Reference to the ENGLISH STAGE; which, as it is both very entertaining, and expressive of our Author's sentiments upon this subject, a few extracts thereof may not, in this article, be unwelcome [E]. But what may give a more natural and lively representation of him still,

I.

I am your Slave, 'tis true; but still you see,
All slaves, by nature, struggle to be free:
But if you would secure the stubborn prize,
Add to your wit, the fetters of your eyes;
Then pleas'd with thralldom, would I kiss my chain,
And ne'er think more of liberty again (9).

This collection of Poems, Letters, &c. is dedicated by our Author to Edmund Chaloner, Esq; an ingenious admirer of the Muses, especially that of Mr Farquhar; and a descendent of the famous Sir Thomas Chaloner, who was himself a man of distinguished wit and learning in his time; also a Soldier as well as a Poet, like Mr Farquhar; who has therein not only celebrated the virtuous qualities and accomplishments of his Patron, in a very polite manner, but shewed, in the example of that Ancestor, how harmoniously Mars and Minerva may combine, or make a most illustrious union in one person. How dangerously that brave Ancestor escaped death, when shipwreck'd by the storm that defeated the expedition of Charles the Emperor against the Algerines; when he caught, and held fast in his mouth, the cable that saved his life, with the loss of his teeth: how bravely he purchased the honour of being made Knight-Banneret in the field: How discreetly he discharged his embassy to Philip II. of Spain: how learnedly he wrote several books in prose and verse, some of which made even the grave Lord Burghley, a Latin Poet as well as himself, in his commendation, may not only be seen partly in this dedication, but more largely elsewhere (10); while here we proceed to observe that our Author, among other agreeable addresses to his Reader, in the Preface of this Collection, says very jocosely of himself, as to his equipments, or stock and change of apparel or furniture for his understanding, that truly 'this gentleman is of some circumstance and condition, and has not been engaged in the shifts that some late sparks were put to for their habits, who ferret all the wit-brokers in town; taking up, from several places, and strut in a second-hand finery, patched up of the scraps and remnants of the eminent men of the age; for I must tell you, Sir, tho' his cloaths be but plain, yet they are his own, taken up handsomely at one place, where he may have credit for as much more when these are worn out.' It were easy, by many instances, in these Letters, &c. to point out the great spirit of vivacity and volubility in his thoughts; his drole and sportive, his lepid and ludicrous vein: and in his style, sometimes quaint, sometimes florid, often comprehensive and compact, some turns both of period and expression, inclining to the elegant and sententious, but commonly, through a humour naturally chearful, free and debonnair, not only pithy and poignant, but pleasing and persuasive. Had the sun-shine of his wit not been clouded so soon, but suffered by Death to have run a longer course, it would probably have brought to maturity, such richer fruits of more solid and serious subjects, as would have preferred themselves to the nicer, and more exquisite taste, of the most mature, serious, and solid readers. But in less than two years after the said intercourse of amorous epistles, Mr Farquhar was diverted from the publication of any more, by another fair lady who fell in love with him; and fearing no other impediment to her desires of securing him to herself, than the slenderness of her circumstances, so contrived, that they were represented to him much more considerable than he at last found them. So he thought, before this discovery, that if Cupid's fire-arms would so effectually wound, when but singly loaden with the charming image of the fair, wherewith he had before been so deeply smitten; it were in vain now to think of escaping them when doubly charged, with beauty and fortune too. In short, it seems his own inclination, as well as the prospect of advantage, led him clearfully into the bands of matrimony; and we hear nothing to the contrary but they made a Constant Couple: nor is it otherwise objected to him, by the Poet who gave this unnecessary caution:

(11) Memoirs relating to the late famous Mr Thomas Brown; with a Catalogue of his Library, 4to, 1704; in the Poem at the end, p. 19.

For her affection so engaged his good nature, that he forgot the thoughts of that disappointment; till afterwards another, from a noble or rather titled courtier, left him to increase the number of those examples, which may convince the credulous, without the expence of a trial, that there may be some delusions in friendship, more fatal than those in love.

[E] A few extracts thereof may not, in this article, be unwelcome.] This Discourse upon Comedy in reference to the English Stage, which is the last, printed in his collection of Letters beforementioned, consisting of about twenty-six pages, seems, by his mentioning at the entrance, his three first plays, to have been written in 1701. The uncommon success which those plays met with, having nettled some of the waspish criticks, and provoked them to exert their little stings, he wrote it in justification of those moderate irregularities, and other tolerable or compensing liberties he had taken in them; but his allegations for them are so agreeably or plausibly rational, that it is no wonder Mrs Oldfield should prefer some parts thereof, as the most humorous of all other apologies for licence in this species (12) of the drama, equal to what is granted in all other branches of poetry, even tho' she had received no previous impression, from his engaging conversation, of partiality in his favour. For, in some places, his style and sentiments are so adapted to his subject, and, against the austerity of critical rules for the composition of Comedy, are so comically displayed, that he has left even those pleased, whom he might not leave persuaded: and in other parts, his ironical praise of ancient rules, for all systems of advice or reprehension, in our modern modes of corruption and vanity, contains some of the most delicate and refined spirit of ancient satire. Indeed, he had briefly and blithly enough given us an abstract of the usual subject matter both in Tragedy and Comedy before, in a parley between LOVEWELL and LYRIC the Poet after this manner,

(12) Life of Mrs Oldfield, p. 49.

LOVE: What relish have you of Comedy?

LYR: No satisfactory one—My curiosity is forestalled by a fore-knowledge of what shall happen: for as the Hero in Tragedy, is either a whining cringing fool, that's always a stabbing himself; or a ranting hectoring bulley, that's for killing every body else: so the Hero in Comedy is always the Poet's own Character (13).

LOVE: What's that?

LYR: A compound of practical rake, and speculative gentleman, who always bears off the great fortune in the play, and shams off the Beau and Squire with a Whore or Chambermaid: and as the Catastrophe of all Tragedies is Death, so the end of Comedies is Marriage.

LOVE: And some think that the most tragical conclusion of the two, &c. (14).

But here in this professed discourse upon Comedy before us, our author saw reason to be more copious and explicit upon the topic; tho' after all when he comes to its definition, he makes no formal mystery or frightful intricacy in it, but very freely and simply explains it to be no more at present than, a well framed Tale, handsomely told, as an agreeable vehicle for censure or reproof: which for sensible men qualified to use it, may be an explanation particular enough, and for stupid ones, any other which is more particular, would be only more puzzling. Among the points of doctrine laid down in this comic creed, or plan of

(13) Which, by the way, is allowed to have been his own practice in this very play, and others; and indeed, in divers places, when any thing in another is to undergo the discipline of ridicule, he very generously makes free with something of his own to partake of it.

(14) See Farquhar's Love and a Bottle, Act 4, Scene 2.

still, is one among those letters, which he calls THE PICTURE, containing a description and his dramatic principles, we find not that he would have any other Poet more than himself, ignorant of the criticks rules, or is against their being read; but after that, he would have an able genius follow his own, or conform himself occasionally to those which are most suitable to his present subject, and such persons, as are to be instructed or entertained by it. He laments, that poetry alone of all other professions, and chiefly the Drama, lies open to the insults of all pretenders, and that this kind of all others must submit to such a variety of unequal judges. He allows without dispute, that an author must endeavour to please that part of the audience, who can lay the best claim to a judicious and impartial reflection; but desires he would first consider, to what division that claim does most properly belong, tho' he foresees that scholars will be angry with him, for making this the subject of a question; yet will not allow that such meer readers of antient authors in their antient languages are the better sort of judges in this case. However, he allows one of these profound scholastics, after having turned thro' Aristotle and all the old criticks, to have formed a regular play, with a single plot, without song or dance, circumscribed to three hours, and unity of place, with the allowance of an hundred and fifty pounds to dress it; then after all, the meager empty thing, blown up indeed with windy words, is found by the player to have no more operative matter for him to shew his art upon, than a carpenter can find in a piece of steel: 'Here is the lamp and the scholar in every line, but not a syllable of the Poet; here is elaborate language, sounding epithets, flights of words that strike the clouds, while the poor sense lags after, like the lanthorn in the tail of a kite, which appears only like a star, while the breath of the player's lungs has strength to bear it up in the air.'—So that, 'the audience not meeting the diversion they expected on the stage, shift for themselves in the pit; every one turns about to his neighbour in a mask, and for default of entertainment now, they strike up for more diverting scenes when the play is done: and tho' the play be regular as Aristotle, and modest as Mr Collier could wish, yet it promotes more lewdness in the consequence, and procures more effectually for intrigue, than any Rover, Libertine, or Old Bachelor whatsoever. At last comes the Epilogue, which pleases the audience very well, because it sends them away, and terminates the fate of the Poet; the Patentees rail at him, the town damns him, and he may bury his copy in Paul's, for not a Bookfeller about it will put it in print.' Hence he further proceeds to observe, how the town has been often disappointed in these critical plays, and how authors who have been admired in their speculative remarks, have been ridiculed in the practice; so advises his friend to lay aside his superstitious veneration for antiquity, and the usual objections that the present age is illiterate, or their taste vitiated; that we live in the decay of time, and the dotage of the world; which he contradicts, and asks him, why we should be so hampered in our opinions, as if all the ruins of antiquity lay so heavily on the bones of us, that we could not stir hand or foot?

'Why shou'd the Poets be hoodwinked at this rate, and by what authority should Aristotle's rules of poetry stand so fix'd and immutable? Why?—By the authority of two thousand years standing—because, thro' this long revolution of time, the world has still continued the same—by the authority of their being received at Athens, a city, the very same with London in every particular; their habits the same, their humours alike; their publick transactions, and private societies a la mode de France;—in short, so very much the same in every circumstance, that Aristotle's criticisms may give rules to Drury-Lane; the Areopagus give judgment upon a case in the King's Bench; and old Solon shall give laws to the House of Commons!'

Then he proceeds by farther illustrations to shew, that we are not to form these modern and domestick entertainments, if we hope for success, upon antient or foreign plans; with specifying how easy it were out of Dr Tillotson's Sermons, to trump up a pamphlet upon the art of preaching, whence conclusions shall be drawn as from Aristotle in Poetry, that any sermon whatever, either by a Presbyter in Geneva, or a Jesuite in Spain, that deviates from these rules, deserves to be hissed, and the Priest kicked out of the pulpit.

Then he gives another instance—'I go down to Woolwich, and there upon a piece of paper, I take the dimensions of the Royal Sovereign, and from hence I frame a Model of a Man of War: I divide the ship into three principal parts, the Keel, the Hull, and the Rigging: I subdivide these into their proper denominations, and by the help of a sailor, give you all the terms belonging to every rope; and every office in the whole ship: will you from hence, infer that I am an excellent Shipwright, and that this model is proper for a trading Junk upon the Volga, or a Venetian Galley in the Adriatic Sea?'

It is further from his arguments to be gathered, that, if Homer had submitted to the rules of criticism, he had been more regular, but more enervate; more formally circumscribed, but less copious and sublime; more crude, contracted, barren, and debased, than he any where is; in a word, had finished every thing off, with the nicest and most artful declension of grandeur and magnificence; whence and from other parts, 'tis inferred, that a Homer cannot want the leading-strings of an Aristotle, and that Poets derived not their Art from books of criticism, but criticks theirs, from those of Poetry. And he thinks that, 'If Prince Arthur had been in the place of the Iliad, we should have had other rules for Epic Poetry; and Doctor Blackmore, had carried the bays from Homer, in spite of all the criticks in Christendom.' In like manner, as the Paradise Lost is not wholly confined to the dictates of that Philosopher, other laws of Epic Poetry may be drawn out of Milton hereafter by another Aristotle. Then as for his rules of Dramatic Poetry; 'If they had been drawn from certain and immutable principles, and fix'd on the basis of nature, (more convincingly than in those generalities wherein it is the same in all nations) why should not his Ars Poetica be as efficacious now, as it was two thousand years ago? And a single Plot, with perfect Unity of Time and Place, do as well in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, as at the Play-house in Athens?'

He further looked upon Homer, as a man of too great a knowledge in the immaterialities of his art, to prescribe it materially and pedantically by Grammar rules; or in mood and figure, to the varieties of genius among mankind. 'He was too much a Poet to give rules to that, whose excellence he knew consisted in a free and unlimited flight of imagination; and to describe the Spirit of Poetry, which alone is the true Art of Poetry, he knew to be as impossible, as for human reason to teach the Gift of Prophecy by a definition.'

He is for making Aesop the Father of Comedy, and thinks, 'we cannot now better seek for its foundation, than in his symbolical way of moralizing upon tales and fables, with this difference that his stories were shorter than ours. He had his tyrant Lyon, his statesman Fox, his beau Magpye, his coward Hare, his bravo Ass, and his buffoon Ape, with all the characters that crowd our stages every day; with this distinction nevertheless, that Aesop made his beasts speak good Greek, and our Heroes sometimes can't talk good English.' He goes on to shew how, by such antient and modern practice, in Scripture Parables, and Allusions, with other indirect, insinuating, and most palatable, as well as expedient arts of schooling mankind into better manners, what was the primary End of Comedy, and would afford the justest Rules for it. Thus having displayed the principal threads of his discourse, he winds himself up in his conclusions.

'That our business lies not with a French or Spanish audience; that our design is not to hold forth to antient Greece, nor to moralize upon the vices and defaults of the Roman commonwealth: No, no; An English play is intended for the use and instruction of an English audience; a people not only separated from the rest of the world by situation, but different also from other nations, as well in the complexion and temperament of the natural body, as in the constitution of our body politick: as we are a mixture of many nations, so we have the most unaccountable and character of himself; which we should not refrain from transcribing entirely, as what might contribute so properly and directly to the illustration of his life, if his works were a scarcity; but as they are not, we shall only here sketch out a few of the strongest, or most distinguishing and observable lineaments; that he may not be wholly unknown to those who have not seen them, nor wholly forgotten by those who have [F]. In 1703, came forth another diverting comedy of his, intituled THE INCONSTANT: or, The Way to win Him, which had merit enough to have been equally successful with the rest, but for the inundation of Italian, French, and other farcical interruptions; which, thro' the interest of some, and the depravity of others, broke in upon the stage, to the scandal, in being submitted to, of our more refined taste, which had preferred it's own genuine weighty sterling, our true English humour, wit, and sense, to such coin as was base, light, and counterfeit. These

' countable medley of humours among us, of any people upon earth; these humours produce variety of follies, some of them unknown to former ages; these new distempers must have new remedies, which are nothing but new counsels and instructions; so begs, if our utile, which is the end, be different from the antients, that our dulce, which is the means, be so too; for to different towns there must be different ways, &c.

' Then, what sort of dulce, which he takes for the pleasantry of the tale, or the plot of the play, must a man make use of to engage the attention of so many different humours and inclinations? Will a single plot satisfy every body? Will the turns and surprises that may result naturally from the antient limits of time, be sufficient to rip open the spleen of some, and physick the melancholy of others; serew up the attention of a rover, and fix him to the stage, in spite of his volatile temper, and the temptation of a mask? To make the moral instructive you must make the story diverting: the splenetic Wit, the beau Courtier, the heavy Citizen, the fine Lady, and her fine Footman, come all to be instructed, and therefore must all be diverted; and he that can do this best, and with most applause, writes the best Comedy, let him do it by what rules he pleases, so they be not offensive to religion and good manners.' Thus, his grand and general rule for our stage is, to be as generally instructive as he can, which cannot be, without making his work delightful to the generality. This secret of pleasing so generally such different tastes in a modern audience, must be attained by studying the humours of the moderns; so he prefers the models of Shakespear, Fleteber, and others of our own Poets, who made themselves no slaves to the patterns or precepts of antiquity, before those of Plautus and Merauder. Not that he rejects, or despises all rules or decorum: he is not for having the English Stage a State of Anarchy: No Sir,—For there are extreams in irregularity, as dangerous to an author, as too scrupulous a deference to criticism. And hercof as he had given an instance of the one, so he also gives an example of the other. Concluding that, he is as little a friend to these rambling plays as any body; and that he has never espoused their party by his own practice: yet cannot forbear some further vindication of the great Shakespear upon this head (*); and then, thus begs the critical carpers to let our old English authors alone.

' If they have left vice unpunished, virtue unrewarded, folly unexposed, or prudence unsuccessful, the contrary of which is the utile of the Comedy, let them be lashed to some purpose: if any part of their plots have been independent of the rest, or any of their characters forced or unnatural, which destroys the dulce of plays, let them be hissed off the stage: but if, by a true decorum in these material points, they have writ successfully and answered the end of Dramatic Poetry, in every respect, let them rest in peace, and their memories enjoy the encomiums due to their merit, without any reflexion for waving those niceties, which are neither instructive to the world, nor diverting to mankind; but are like all the rest of the critical learning, fit only to set people together by the ears, in ridiculous controversies, that are not one jot material to the good of the public, whether they be true or false.'

[F] That he may not be wholly unknown, to those who have not seen them, nor wholly forgotten by those who have. Our author tells the Lady to whom this resemblance of himself was sent, (when he was aged about twenty three years) that he would challenge Fandyck or Kneller, to draw it more to the life; and if he had not some thoughts that the substance would fall to her share, he would not part with the likeness; which he thus colours forth, in some of the principal features, under the title of

' THE PICTURE.

' My Outside, is, neither better nor worse than my Creator made it, and the Piece being drawn by so great an Artist, 'twere presumption to say there were many Stroaks amiss. I have a body qualified to answer all the ends of its creation, and that's sufficient.

' As to the Mind, which in most men wears as many changes as their body, so in me, 'tis generally dressed like my person, in black.—In short, my constitution is very splenetic, and very amorous; both which I endeavour to hide, lest the former should offend others, and that the latter might incommode myself: and my reason is so vigilant in restraining these two failings, that I am taken for an easy-natured man by my own sex, and an ill-natured clown by your's.

' 'Tis true, I am very sparing in my praises and compliments to a Lady, out of a fear, that they may affect myself more than her: for the idols which we worship, are generally of our own making; and tho' at first, men may not speak what they think, yet truth may catch them on t'other hand, and make them think what they speak.

' But most of all, I am cautious of promising, especially upon that weighty article of constancy; because, in the first place, I have never tryed the strength of it in my own experience; and secondly, I suppose a man can no more engage for his constancy, than his health; since I believe they both equally depend upon a certain constitution of body; how far, and how frequently that may be liable to alteration, especially in affairs of love, let the more judicious determine.

' I am seldom troubled with what the world calls airs and caprices; and I think it an idiot's excuse for a foolish action, to say, 'twas my humour.—I can't relish the jest that vexes another in earnest.—I think it the worst office in my nature to make myself uneasy for what another should be punished.—I have so naturally a propensity to ease, that I cannot cheerfully fix to any study that bears not a pleasure in the application, which makes me inclinable to Poetry above any thing else.

' I have very little estate, but what lies under the circumference of my hat; and should I, by misfortune, come to lose my head, I should not be worth a groat: but I ought to thank providence, that I can, by three hours study, live one and twenty, with satisfaction to myself, and contribute to the maintenance of more families, than some, who have thousands a year.

' I have many acquaintance, very few intimates, but no friends, I mean in the old romantic way.—Nor can I love after the old romantic discipline: I would have my passion, if not led, yet at least waited on by my reason; and the greatest proof of my affection that a lady must expect, is this: I would run any hazard to make us both happy, but would not, for any transitory pleasure, make either of us miserable, &c.'

These foreigners made partizans among our treacherous countrymen, to deprecate our dramatick, and other poetical writers, especially several whose compositions had been well received, and consequently our Author; whom we meet with in a satire of that kind, published the next year, thus spoken of [G]. It seems to have been so early as 1704, that the Farce called THE STAGE COACH, in the composition whereof he was jointly concerned, made it's first appearance in print: and it has always given satisfaction, both in England and Ireland; unless to some ungrateful fault-finders, and those who will seek matter to displease themselves in such things as might yield them pleasure. At this time Mr Farquhar had been about a twelve-month married, and it was at first reported, to a great fortune; which might not a little exasperate the invidious temper of those who grudged his prosperity. His next comedy, named THE TWIN RIVALS, which he dates at the bottom of the dedication, in December two years before that farce, might therefore be acted, and published, a year before it, as some have intimated it was; but, in several other accounts, it is spoken of as if it was neither played nor printed before 1705 (d). Our Poet was possessed of his commission in the army, when the Spanish expedition was made under the conduct of the Earl of PETERBOROUGH, tho' it seems he kept it not long after; and tho' Mr Farquhar was not embarked in that service, or present at the defeat of the French forces, and the conquest of BARCELONA; yet, from some military friends in that engagement, he received such distinct and compleat relations of it, in their epistolary correspondence, and more particular information upon the return of some others, that he wrote a copious poem upon the subject, wherein he has made the said Earl his hero. But it not being published till after our Poet's death, it is somewhat wanting in those corrections wherewith it would have been improved and ornamented, had his health allowed him a deliberate review (e). Some two or three years after it was written (*), the impression of it was addressed, by the Author's widow, to the said Nobleman: and because it was never reprinted with his other works, and is therefore now scarce, the epistle before it not being prolix, is here below preserved [H]. This poem is enough to prove that Mr Farquhar did

(*) In a MS. of this Poem now before us, there is no date; nor could we find any in the printed copy we have seen of the said Poem, consisting of six canto's, and 48 pages in 4to, the bottom of it's title-page being cut off.

[G] Whom we meet with, in a satire of that kind, published the next year, thus spoken of.] In this satire, among some other Poets, whose endeavours to please the town, had made them objects of the author's consideration, the omission of Mr Farquhar's, would have made him appear too inconsiderable; but as they had met with a reception more singularly successful, it may expose a singular deficiency as well in the author's genius as justice; to summon our Poet into the Court of Apollo, upon such infolid and ungrounded matter of accusation, how natural soever and unavoidable it may be, for a general esteem, to be sure of propagating some particular envy.

Therefore, after the said satirist has set Mr Francis Manning's claim to the bays aside, for the defects of his own writings, but allowed him to adopt those of the Honourable Mr Charles Boyle, afterwards Earl of Orrery, he goes on thus:

Is it so then, said Farquhar? my matters are safe,
By Saint Patrick, my business is done;
For 'tis known, I have made Pit and Gallery laugh,
Without any one's help but my own.

My Jubilee Dicky, and airy Sir Harry,
Will vindicate what I have said;
And none, but myself, has a title to carry
The Laurels away on my head.

By your leave, Brother Teague, reply'd Mac Fleckno's Ghost (†),

Our countrymen are better known;
The Beauties are borrow'd, of which you thus boast,
But the Faults, I dare swear, are your own.

Tho', the town may allow, what you'd have 'em all take

For granted, with no one you joyn;
Since none, but a man of your judgment, could make Such language, to such a design.

And I can't but applaud the resolve you have ta'en,
In the present employ which you chuse;
For it's nobler in red, to make a Campaign,
Than to butcher an innocent Muse (15).

Epistle is as follows.

My LORD,

MY presumption, in dedicating to your Lordship this Poem, found among my dear deceased husband's writings, will I hope obtain, not only your Lordship's pardon, but favourable acceptance. For, to whom should this address be made, but to that Hero, who is the glorious subject of the song. Happy! could it by art represent, what was really done by your Lordship in that expedition, so surprising, as not only surpasses all Poetic description, but makes even truth itself romantic. The difficulties your Lordship had to encounter, in the different interests and opinions of your confederates, was not the least part of that undertaking. You were to convince, before you engaged, and your invincible reason was to confirm the assured conquest of your sword. MONJUICH, beyond obelisks and pyramids, will be the eternal monument of your fame; where, upon the fall of that great, tho' unhappy Prince of Darmstadt, your Lordship heroically interposed, turned, and assured the fate of the Austrian Monarchy. BARCELONA, became the rival of MADRID, and MADRID itself had received its natural Lord; and had not envy itself blasted the sure-laid design, my Lord MORDENT had rivalled the glory of the BLACK PRINCE himself, on the Theatre of Spain.

Accept, great SIR, these laurels, planted by your transcendent valour, and reaped by your victorious arm. Accept that tribute, which is here offered, by an humble but sincere hand, to that magnificent vertue, which hath restored the foundation of the Austrian Spanish Monarchy, and which none but our great QUEEN can establish and confirm.

That your Lordship may live, to see the effects of so glorious an undertaking ratified, in a sure and lasting peace; the West-India trade flowing into the British channel; and the good wishes of all good men, derived into lasting blessings upon your Lordship and noble family, is the hearty prayers of my Lord,

Your LORDSHIP's most devoted,

MARGARET FARQUHAR (16).

did not burn all his unprinted writings before his death, as the author of his Memoirs has intimated he did. There are two more of his plays to be spoken of, which have no less attracted the town, and been received with no less approbation, than any before mentioned; the one, his comedy called THE RECRUITING OFFICER; which, as we compute, was first acted in 1706; tho', in the printed registers of our dramattick writings, the first edition of it is dated in the following year: and the first impression of his last comedy, intituled THE BEAUX STRATAGEM, is mentioned in those registers to have been no earlier than three years after our Author was dead: whence they have also, very unconsciously, inclined some to fix the date of his death so many years later than it really happened (f). Of these plays, and the rest before named, we shall refer to some few further remarks, here proper to be remembered [I]. But of our Comic Author's untimely end, which

(f) See Giles Jacob of him, in his Account of the Poets; and The Compl. List of all our Engl. Dramatic Poets, and of all the Plays, &c. annexed to The Tragedy of Scanderberg, 8vo, 1747, p. 230. And the Life of Mr Wilks, 8vo, 1733, p. 19.

[I] Of these Plays, shall refer to some few further remarks, here proper to be remembered.] It has been with some difficulty, and not without some doubt, that we have settled the first appearance and publication of these plays, thro' the usual blindness in all latter editions, and blunders of our poetical registers in those particulars, as we have in this article above done; to supply the text with those necessary links of chronology, which, as the writings of a Poet are generally the main actions of his life, would have been wanting in that principal chain, or capital part thereof, had we reserved the said dates to be shrunk into this, or any other limb of it. The general character that has been given of these Comedies, is that, 'the success of most of them far exceeded the author's expectations; that he was particularly happy in the choice of his subjects, which he took care to adorn with variety of characters and incidents; his style, is pure and unaffected; his Wit, natural and flowing; and his plots, generally well contrived. He lashed the vices of the age, tho' with a merciful hand; for his Muse was good-natured, not abounding over-much with gall, tho' he has been blamed for it by the critics: It has been objected to him, that he was too hasty in his productions; but I believe, by such only, who are chiefly admirers of stiff and elaborate performances; since, with a person of a sprightly fancy, those things are often best, which are struck off in a heat (17). It has been also observed that his humour, being truly natural, makes all his plays very entertaining, and that, his principal characters in several of them, were generally copies of himself (18); which are gay, brisk, and vigorous; courtly, amorous and gallant, or intriguing parts; particularly 'tis said, that, in his character of George Roebuck, a wild young rover, in his first play (19), newly come from Ireland, because he would not, in obedience to his father, marry a woman, by whom he had twins at a birth there, who therefore follows him here to London, &c. it was thought, that the author has therein, or at least in other incidents, sketch'd out in some part, or some measure, his own story. This is partly hinted at by a writer, of that time, who, speaking of Mr Thomas Browne, says of him, and some other contemporary Poets, that 'had he been as happy in his temper as in his genius, he had certainly been hoisted up among the first rate wits of his time: his lewdness had been no blot in his scutcheon there: 'twas not Tate's seeming sanctity that prefer'd him to the bays; nor Congreve's chastity, to the opinion of the quality: Shadwell had never been Laureate in his latter days, but by being an early rake, and fixing his reputation with Dorset, Dudley, and the rest: it was not Vanbrugh's modest plays that raised his esteem among the ladies, nor Motteaux's pretence of being a persecuted brother, that exalted him, from a solitary garret, to the reputation of a current credit upon the exchange, and a place in the Post-office: Rowe had shewn more wit in keeping his estate, than he has shown in all the plays he ever writ, especially the last: and certainly Mr Farquhar knew how necessary lewdness was to establish his reputation, when he exposed Roebuck in the first play he writ, for his own character (20). And yet his writings are not so disagreeable in this respect, or corruptingly loose as several of some other Poets here mentioned; his genteel gallants and flighty rakes have such an airy volatile manner of carrying off any liberties in their ludicrous or jocular discourse, that they are not so deeply affecting, nor leave such pernicious impressions upon the imagination, as other figures of the like kind, more strongly stamp; by more indelicate and heavier hands, have an untoward faculty of doing. In this our author's first play, Poet Lyric makes free with burlesquing some of Nat Ler's Heroics, in his Sophonista, &c. 'Tis dedicated to Peregrine Marquis of Carmarthen, and the Prologue and Epilogue were written by Joe Haynes, a noted Player and Prologue writer, of merry memory in those times, who played Pamphlet the Bookseller, and Rigadoon the Dancing Master, in this Comedy; and various other parts, not only on the smaller, but the larger stage of the world itself, in many other countries as well as England; diverting both Princes and people, wherever he went, Proteus and Camellion-like, in all shapes and colours: whether, as Mr Joseph Hains, Signor Giuseppe Hains, or Monsieur Hains; whether, as Secretary Hains, Preceptor Hains, Doctor Hains, Count Hains; or any other dignity whereto he was advanced, or title he assumed (21). Mr Farquhar's next Comedy (22) is dedicated to Sir Roger Moflyn, of Moflyn-Hall in Flintshire. The author's friend who wrote the Prologue, says the ladies may safely smile; for there is neither scandal, smut, lewd-tongued beau, or double entendre in it; to which sense, our author asserts in his preface that, 'he has not displeas'd the ladies, nor offend'd the clergy; both which were now pleas'd to say, that a Comedy may be diverting without smut or profaneness.' The Epilogue was spoken by Mr Wilks, who acted so excellently the chief part, that our author, in that preface, says of him, 'Mr Wilks his performance has set him so far above competition, in the part of Wildair, that none can pretend to envy the praise due to his merit: that he made the part, will appear, says he, from hence, that whenever the stage has the misfortune to lose him, Sir Harry Wildair may go the Jubilee.' But the Poet may be happily mistaken in his prophecy, the source of theatrical merit may change its channel, and the Part in time, may make the Player, if it has not as yet altogether done so, equal to the original actor of it; seeing it has been always well received as often as it has been played, since death, for near these twenty years past, has denyed us his masterly performance in it. And it were to be wish'd, that this generous applause of that sprightly and graceful actor's abilities, may not have tended to affect the character of our author's own; since it may seem, that, such grateful encomiums upon the perfections of the Comedian, have promoted some ingratitude towards those of the Comedy: for it is believed, that such praises, by our author of his actors, have hinted, to some rivals for preheminece in the Muses favour on the drama, who were jealous of any growing monopolies in that sphere, some attempts to make a plausible transfer of his praise, by attributing that which was due to the success of Mr Farquhar's Comedies, more to the merits of the Players than the Poet; more to the enlivening gaiety and gallantry of those, by whom his characters were personated, than the intermixtures of that wit and humour, which usually prepossess us in favour of such characters in other plays (23); which illiberal artifice of Poets and other ingenious men, towards one another, is no novelty; for just so, not to mention other instances, Mr Shadwell, before had endeavour'd the like alienation, by imputing the deserved esteem, and laudable reception of Mr Otway's most approved Plays, not to any thing in the Acts, but the Actors of them (24). A later critick, who has also been a candidate for theatrical approbation, having in a useful work, which deserves it, among others, drawn out the plot of this play:

which was so much regretted, in a person who had been so generally delightful, both in his writings play, and called it a celebrated Comedy, full of contrivance; yet thinks, the plot not regular, or consisting of certain means, to compass a certain end; because the catastrophe appears as it were involuntary, and owing to the chance of incidents, more than to measures concerted with design (25); which, whether defective or commendable, we have not now leisure to examine, since, in some cases, the greatest art, is artfully to conceal a design, under the appearance of chance. But here we are reminded of a little dialogue, which happened upon the great success of this play, between Jubilee Dicky, a noted part in it, and Thomas Durfey the Poet, or Poetaster, which you please; as we received it, from a late living Magazine of merry tales, jests, and other conceits of the noted wits and authors of his time. It seems Durfey wanted to bring a play upon the Theatre-Royal, and meeting little Dicky in the height of spirits, at the great resort to Farquhar's Comedy, asked him, When they should have some breathing time, to get up a play of his? What is it? said Dicky. *Why don't you know the story of Maffianello, the Prince of Fishermen? Ay, ay, but I fear his Fish will grow stale upon his hands, or make but insipid entertainment at our house, during this Carnival there. Why, will the humour in your Constant Couple last for ever? No, no, the Trip that is making in it to this Jubilee, will surely be at an end by the Revolution of the next. But it scarcely was; for we are told, in one place, that it had a run for fifty two nights (26), and may learn from our author himself, that it so much filled the stage, for the greater part of that season, that it brought the Play-house some fifty audiences in five months (27): and immediately after, he was encouraged to bring on a continuation of it in another Comedy for the next season. In short, the fancy of the town was so engrossed even by the former of these Comedies, that Durfey soon carried his play to Mr Betterton's company in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and the tripping humour in both of them, endured so long, that, little Jubilee Dicky, in all common discourse, either with, or of him, lost his christian name ever after; and hundreds call'd him Dicky, as long as he lived, to one who called him Henry Norris.*

This second part (28), is dedicated by the author to the Earl of Albemarle. His Prologue to it is founded upon the same sentiments, he soon after published more at large, in his discourse on Comedy, as we have before shown; and we see here in verse, as there in prose, that his general deduction is, to make his Dramatic Entertainments generally delightful, that they may be alike instructive, which could not be done without making them engaging to the generality; by taking greater licence than the antients have confined us to, and drawing the several new shapes and habits in modern life, for an English stage, not from the patterns of old Greece or Rome, but rather to make the living Audience his rule, than the dead letter of Aristotle. He found, by successful experience, the best comic sport to consist in springing and flushing the fresh wild game that lay before, or about him, and taking his aim there; at the fashionable gallantries, and modish extravagancies in real life; the new-fledg'd humours and manners, the full-plum'd vanities and affectations of the times; the ridiculous follies, seducing fallacies, the novel disguises and deceits of the town: this was the fat-fed game he was for catching as it rose, or shooting on the wing; as Mr Pope professedly prescribed and enjoyed himself to pursue afterwards (29): which was only to be done by more enlarged schemes in respect to the drama than were antiently limited, or are now descended to us. As for any formal and regular revival of the trite and thread-bare figures or characters of antiquity, he leaves them in possession of the Antients, and to the rumination of the grave and critical Antiquaries; as he says, in that Prologue himself.

He leaves to learned pens, such labour'd lays,
You are the Rules by which he writes his Plays:
From muddy books, let others take their view;
He hates dull reading, but he studies you.

Thus then, the Pit and Boxes are his Schools,
Your Air, your Humour, his Dramatic Rules, &c.

The fourth of these plays (30), he dedicates to his countryman and fellow collegiate, Richard Tighe, Esq; from whom he partly copied the character of young Mirabell, so well acted by Mr Wilks. It drew a splendid and crowded audience for six nights successively, till Lent intervened, tho' the Tumblers, Rope Dancers, French Dancing Masters, Dancing Dogs, French Strollers, and Italian Squallers, had now so much engrossed the town, that our author has, with no less good sense than good humour, very genteely rallied our depraved taste and extravagance at that time therein; as well he might, when that beardless songster Sigismondo Fideli, had twenty pounds a night for singing (31): Also in dancing, as Mr Farquhar observes, the charms of Gallic heels were too hard for an English head, and that no instruction in the moral of a play, could come in competition with that of a minuet. He owns that he took the hint of this Comedy from Fletcher's Wild Goose Chase; and that admired turn of the plot in the last act, which has drawn tears of joy from many bright eyes, was built upon a real adventure of the Chevalier de Chastillon, well known at Paris. There is an ingenious Epilogue to this play composed by Nicholas Rowe, Esq; and in the humorous Prologue, written by Mr Motteaux, the Farce, above named, which was written by him in conjunction with our author, being mentioned, seems to have been composed the same year by them, if not before, tho' it might not be printed till the next.

And that same year also, soon after the Comedy last mentioned, his fifth seems to have been brought on the stage (32). It is dedicated to Henry Brett, Esq; in December 1702, therefore printed the next year, as we presume, from the date of that satire next quoted in the margin; tho' some writers know not of its appearance till two years later. Our Poet having in the preface, ingeniously obviated such objections as had been made to it, owns himself obliged to Mr Longueville (†) for some expressions in the part of Teague; something in that of the Lawyer, and for his hint of the Twins, upon which the author formed his plot. After this acknowledgment, he adds, that few of our modern writers have been less beholden to foreign assistance in their plays, than he in the scenes of this. But how slender soever the assistance was that he had, 'twas enough to be snarled at by the little cynical satirists, who envying the success of his plays, had pronounced the beauties in them to be borrowed, but the blemishes to be his own; as was before related. Another of these satirists says of Mr Farquhar, with intent, perhaps, of fathering this play wholly upon the said Mr Longueville, and one of our famous Poets, from whom it is there said to be drawn, in these words,

So names this, called the Twin-Rivals, in the margin. The reason why we have fixt the publication of the Farce before mentioned in the next year after the last play, is grounded on the authority of that author, who quotes two impressions of it in that year (34), tho' several others mention it, as if it was not published before our author had been three years in his grave.

Between the publication of this and his next dramatic performance, our Poet had been in Shrewsbury, and other parts of Shropshire to recruit soldiers for his regiment or company; there he gathered matter for the plot and characters of his diverting Comedy upon that subject (35); and this as we compute, was acted in 1706, tho' it is not mentioned to have been printed before the next year. He dedicates it, for the hospitable reception he had there received, to his friends round the Wrekin, a noted hill in that county; which this play has made more so, by promoting a health in drinking to our friends so situated; a health that has the advantage over other celebrated toasts, of being a lasting beauty; old without age, and com-writings and conversation, we can give but a melancholy, if not tragical account. For some debts, it seems, pressing him to make his application to a certain noble courtier, who had bestowed upon him most bountiful professions of solid friendship, he was, by that plausible patron, persuaded to turn his commission into the money he wanted, and this man of honour, by his interest, would get him another; but, when the profitable friend in his purse was gone, he could not find the honourable one, truly at court, not in the courtier himself! which disappointment, in this dependance on his courtly friend, with the other he had undergone in the fortune of that lady, whom he had espoused for her love of him, now uniting to prey more eagerly on his mind, and tormenting it with the corroding reflections of some domestick difficulties, in the necessary accommodation of his family, made way to his heart, and, by a sure, tho' no sudden declension of nature, carried him off this worldly theatre, while his last play was acting, in the height of it's success, at that in Drury-Lane: and tho' the audience all bestowed their plaudites upon the performance, some could not conceal their tears for the approaching loss of its author; which happened, in the latter end

'mon without scandal:' and in this dedication, excuses Mr Rich for acting his play upon Durfey's third night, for his Wonders of the Sun, or Kingdom of Birds, tho' it is not said in our erroneous registers of plays, to have been acted till three or four years after this time; and then, that it was at the Theatre in the Hay-Market. Our author also tells us, 'that the Duke of Ormonde encouraged him, and the Earl of Orvery approved the play: my Recruits were reviewed by my General and my Colonel, and could not fail to pass muster; and still to add to my success, they were raised among my friends round the Wrekin (*).' Mr Wilks played Captain Plume, and Mr Cibber, Captain Brazen, the two Recruiting Officers; Richard Estcourt, a celebrated Comedian and Mimic, played Serjeant Kite; and Sylvia the Justice's daughter was performed by Mrs Oldfield, whose name appears not in the Dramatis Personæ before any other Comedy of our author's earlier than this. Here again, as in the Trip to the Jubilee, we have been led to believe, that what supports the success of the play in one of those parts is, the proper sense and observation of the player; that the humour is not conceived to be hit in Serjeant Kite, but is admirably supplied by the action of Mr Estcourt (36). But a later writer who seems to have more particularly examined this play, and given us distinctly the plan, characters, and incidents of it, has been more regardful of its merits; and from its connected parts, concludes with this general character of the whole, where 'tis said,— 'there are besides the two grand designs, some lesser ones, tending to gain recruits; yet, at the same time, are also conducive some way or other to the better carrying on the main business; such as Serjeant Kite's pretending to tell fortunes;—Silvia, in the habit of a man, making love to Rose, a pretty country girl;—Captain Plume, cajoling Bullock, Cosiar Pearmain, and Thomas Appletree, with several other little incidents, which are extremely diverting in the representation, and altogether serve to render this Comedy as entertaining, as any one I know of, that the stage for many years has had to boast of; and I believe will always continue to be so; at least while there are any military gentlemen in the kingdom; ladies who delight in a red coat and feather; or, in fine, while there remain any lovers of true nature in a Dramatic performance (37).' This Comedy has lately been translated into French, under the title of L'Officier en Reuerue, and it was acted the night before we are now writing of it (†) to a full audience, at the little Theatre in the Hay-market, by the English company of Antigallic Players, with great applause: from whence it may be concluded, this Comedy, as would probably be found in others of this author, were they put to the same trial, has in it, such intrinsic merits, that its success neither depends on any particular actors, nor will relinquish it, even in a foreign language.

The seventh and last of our Author's Comedies (38), was certainly written in or towards the end of the same year with that last mentioned; however an edition of it, which might be printed four years later (†), may have misled some writers of him to think it was then first acted; and the author's advertisement at the beginning, expressing his illness, as the Epilogue at the end, his being ready to expire, while the play was in action, might strengthen their opinion to an assertion that the Comedy was not played, and the Poet did not die, before the year in which that edition was dated. But by looking only into the second page of the Comedy, we may see reason to judge, from what Boniface the Innkeeper says to Aimwell, of his ale, when he bid the tapster broach him some of his Anno Domini, marked 1706, after having pretended to be stored with some that was smooth as oyl, &c. and just fourteen years old, on the fifth of next March, 'tis very apparent that the play was finished before this day of that Month in the said year: and this is explained by the same humour which Boniface uses three leaves further, where his said guest talks with him about eatables. He had all dainties in the house, that might be got ready for supper; but the guest could have nothing that he names, therefore bid the landlord bring what he would, that is, what he had. So we may conclude from this, as from other authorities hereafter mentioned, that the play tho' rehearsed some months before, was acted in April following and till the author made his exit, before the actors in it. Archer, a good sociable character, and Mrs Sullen, who was sociable to him, were very engagingly played by Mr Wilks and Mrs Oldfield (‡). It has been looked upon as an extraordinary testimony of the author's vigorous genius, that, tho' he was so cramped in time, as to have begun and ended this play in six weeks, and so depressed in spirits, by a settled sickness upon him all the time, he has yet gained the reputation of having sung herein like the swan, sweetest when dying; the said Comedy having been, as we may read, universally allowed to be his master-piece (39).

Many other particulars of these seven Comedies, &c. no less, or perhaps more material, must now be submitted to the prohibition of Time: therefore we shall only here observe, that the first edition we have read of them printed with his Poems and Letters together, was in 1711 (40), and the first that we have seen of them was printed for Bernard Lintot, &c. in octavo 1714, which is adorned with a Sculpture before it, of Mr Farquhar, introduced, or led up by Ben. Jonson to Apollo. They have so well maintained their credit ever since, as to arrive at eight (41) or nine editions at least. But we cannot part with them, without observing one general defect in these, as well as almost all other modern editions of books; that all the dates, which would, were they faithfully preserved, inform us when the several pieces in them were first separately printed, are designedly suppressed, to give place in the title page, for that single date of the year, in which they were all printed last together. This crippling usage has been complained of, as a mercenary deceit in the proprietors of such copies; tending to the obscurity of their authors, the confusion of those editors and other writers, who are covetous of doing historical honour and justice to their memory, by a regular revival, or distinction of their performances; and consequently, to the dissatisfaction of all curious readers: and this only, it seems, to make such books more vendible and taking, with ignorant and superficial novices, by the greater air that is thus given them of novelty; least such shallow purchasers should disrelish them, for that which should recommend them, by their having received the approbation or encouragement of more judges, than by such suppression of all chronologic directions, as so many furrows in the face even of unwrinkled maturity, their cunning owners would have it thought they had stood the test of.

end of April in the year 1707, before he was thirty years of age; as may, by the authorities annexed, more convincingly appear [K]. Thus having attended our entertaining Dramatist o'er the contracted stage of his short life, yet thro' the various characters, in some degree, which he acted on it, of the Player, the Lover, and the Husband; the Soldier, the Critick, and the Poet, to his final catastrophe; it is here time to close the scenes, and drop the curtain.

[K] As may, by the authorities annexed, more convincingly appear. The particulars, relating to those unhappy disappointments which are said to have hastened the end of this ingenious Poet, and the time when he died, being drawn from the testimonies of such as were acquainted with him, and cotested by other authentic vouchers, are therefore the more credible, and less liable to doubt. We find, he had once the opinion, wherewith men of experience have sometimes kindly apprised many raw and credulous dependants upon their counterfeit patrons; and had some design, as we have heard, of displaying those characters in their lively colours; of which, more hereafter may possibly be said in another place. So long since, as in some of his early publications, he thus intreats his reader to admit him, with the usual forms of civility — 'If you be a Courtier, you will show your breeding; receive him with a sincere smile; swear to do him all the service you can; and you will certainly keep your word—as you used to do (42).' But now, it seems, he was more strengthened in his faith of the sincerity that there might be, without any guile or collusion, in a Courtier's generous professions; till his own fatal experience restored him to his former judgment, as we shall presently see. Upon this part of our subject, one of those writers before mentioned who knew him, thus expresses himself.

His last Comedy, the STRATAGEM, he began and ended in six weeks, with a settled sickness upon him all the time; nay, he even perceived the approaches of death, e'er he had finished the second act, and, as he had often foretold, dy'd before the run of his play was over. His other plays were dedicated to persons of distinction, and he designed a dedication of this last to my Lord Cadogan; but his Lordship, for reasons unknown, evaded it, tho' he made him a handsome present, with promises of his future favour; which probably, would have been fulfilled if our author had survived; tho' he had but little reason to rely on the promises of great men; a certain great Courtier having prevailed on him to sell his commission, with solemn assurances of providing for him better, which he forgot to keep (43). Here this author tells us, that Mr Farquhar, in one of his songs, seems to have pointed at that person, in the third stanza below recited; and this is all he quotes of that famous song; which consists of thirteen stanzas: but because the very first of them, and the two others, being upon the same topic, may partly as well concern or resemble, and help to distinguish the said great Courtier, as others of like features and complexion, they are here selected from the rest, in the ## SONG of a TRIFLE.

A Trifling Song you shall hear,
Begun with a Trifle, and ended:
All Trifling People draw near
And I shall be nobly attended.

The Court is from Trifles secure,
Gold Keys are no Trifles, we see;
White Rods are no Trifles I'm sure,
What ever their Bearers may be.

But if you will go to the place
Where Trifles abundantly breed,
The Levee will show you his Grace, Makes Promises, Trifles indeed.

A Coach, with six Footmen behind,
I count neither Trifle, nor Sin:
But ye Gods! how oft do we find A scandalous Trifle within! &c (44).

Then the same author goes on, in relation to Mr Farquhar's other disappointment in these words — 'Tis supposed that, thus failing of his expectations, together with an unfortunate marriage, shortened his days. For his wife, by whom he had two daughters only, thro' the reputation of a great fortune, tricked him into matrimony. This was chiefly the fault of her love; which was so violent for him, that she resolved to leave nothing untry'd to gain him: Tho' some husbands would have proved meer husbands in such a case, Mr Farquhar was so charmed with her love and understanding, that he entirely forgave her; therefore, when I say, an unfortunate marriage conducted, with other circumstances, to the shortning his days, I only mean that his fortune being too slender to support a family, led him into a great many cares and inconveniencies: for I have often heard him say that, it was more pain to him, in imagining that his family might want a needful support, than the most violent death that could be inflicted on him. But his wife being long since dead, his good friend Mr Wilks has been highly instrumental in setting his children above want (45). This piece of friendship, is thus explained elsewhere. 'Mr Farquhar left two orphan daughters. Mr Wilks gave each of them a benefit-play, to put them out apprentice to Mantel-makers: and his worthy friend and patron, to whom he dedicated his Miscellanies, Edmund Chaloner, Esq; procured them a pension of twenty pounds a year, which they now enjoy (46).'

As to our authority for his last play being rehearsed in 1706; and then, or in the beginning of 1707, acted, and that the author died this year, it is to be found in the characters both of it, and himself, published at those times (†), in one whereof, the author has spoken thus of him, but the next month after that in which we asserted him to have died. 'All that love Comedy, will be sorry to hear of the death of Mr Farquhar, whose two last plays, had something in them that was truly humorous and diverting. 'Tis true, the critics will not allow any part of them to be regular; but Mr Farquhar had a Genius for Comedy, of which one may say, that it was rather above rules than below them. His Conduct, tho' not artful, was surprizing: his Characters, tho' not great, were just: his Humour, tho' low, diverting: his Dialogue, tho' loose and incorrect, gay and agreeable; and his Wit, tho' not superabundant, pleasant: in a word, his plays have, in the tout ensemble, as the Painters phrase it, a certain air of novelty and mirth, which pleased the audience, every time they were represented; and such as love to laugh at the Theatre, will probably miss him more than they now imagine (47).'

Lastly, that we might omit no satisfaction to our reader that could be further procured, in confirmation of this authority, the books belonging to the Church of that Parish, wherein he was buried, having been, at our request, searched for the date of his interment, our reverend and worthy friend has returned this answer to the question.

S I R,

IN St Martin's Register, on May the 3d 1707, one Mr George Falkwere was buried, whom I look upon to be the Poet; though somewhat differently spelt from his name. The nearness of the sound, and the difficulty of spelling names aright, by persons who only take them from common pronunciation, and the ignorance of Parish Clerks in general, will easily account for the difference here, &c. FASTOLFF (JOHN), Knight, and Knight-Banneret; a valiant and renowned General, Governor, and Nobleman in France, during our conquests in that kingdom, under King Henry IV, V, and VI, of England; and Knight-Companion of the Most Noble Order of the Garter; has been fancied, from the title of his French barony, and from his name being so often corruptly mentioned in the French Histories, by occasion of his long residence, and many engagements in the wars there, to have been born in France, at least of French extraction. Others, though allowing him a native of England, have no less erroneously fixed his birth-place in Bedfordshire: But it is well known, in the real place of his nativity, that he was descended of an antient and famous English family in the county of Norfolk; which had flourished there, as also in other parts of the kingdom, in very honourable distinction, from before the Conquest [A]: And from such a train of illustrious ancestors, many of them dignified, at least with the honour of knighthood, invested with very eminent employments, and possessed of extensive patrimonies, this Worthy is descended. But one of the most conspicuous or principal branches of them being seated at Castre in Heg near Great Yarmouth in that county, which estate descending to him, he afterwards adorned with a noble family seat (a), it is presumed he was there born, or in Yarmouth itself. He was the son of John Fastolff, Esq; of that town, a man of considerable account in those and other parts, both for his means and merits, especially for his publick benefactions, pious foundations, &c (b). His mother was Dame Mary, the daughter of Nicholas Park, Esq (c); and this their son was born in the latter end of King Edward the III's reign, as we have been particularly informed, by the author last cited, who is furnished with the materials that may speedily, we hope, inform the public, as well in other necessary circumstances, as the birth of this renowned Knight; which, according to his intelligence, could not happen later than 1377. It is not doubted but he was, by a strict education, grounded as well, in that learning and other accomplishments which afterwards, improved by his experience and sagacity, rendered him so famous in war and peace, as is those virtuous and religious principles, which governed his actions to the last. His father dying before he was of age, the safeguard of him and his estate were of that importance, that they were both committed to the care and direction of one of the first Noblemen in the kingdom. One author says, that he was ward to John Duke of Bedford, who was afterwards the most wise and able Regent of France we ever had there; and more expressly, that he was the last ward which that Duke had (d); but we have been otherwise informed, that he was trained up in the Norfolk family (†), which may not be improbable, to those who know it was not unusual in those times, even for young Nobles themselves, at least under wardship, to be trained under others, especially Ministers of State, in their houses and families, as in academies of behaviour, and as candidates for preferment

[A] In very honourable distinction from before the conquest.] We are informed by an ingenious gentleman of no common curiosity, in his enquiries after our old English coins, that one of the Fastolffs was Master of the Mint, under Edgar one of our most famous Saxon Kings (1): and by another eminent restorer of antiquities, that Nicholas Fastolff held lands the ninth of Edward II. in Wychinton, Redham, &c. in Norfolk (2): and in that year two fines were levied, the first (3) between John Fastolff Querent, Thomas Fastolff Parson of Fekenham, and Nicholas Fastolff Deforciant of lands in Castre and Great Yarmouth; and by the second, several lands in Yarmouth, and Heg in Norfolk, and Reydon in Suffolk, were settled on the said John and Joan his wife for their lives, the remainder to Nicholas, son of John and Ida his wife in tail, remainder in fee to the right heirs of Joan. Nicholas was Chief Justice of Ireland (4), in the first of Edward III. and was a Justice Itinerant in Nottingham (5). And this Nicholas (6), son of John, with Ada, his wife, settled lands in Castre, and other parts of Norfolk, and Reydon in Suffolk, on themselves in tail; then, to the heirs of Nicholas; remainder to John, son of John in tail; remainder to Thomas and Richard, brothers to John. In the 20th year of that King, Alexander (7) held lands in Reppes; and in the 23d, Thomas son of Alexander held others in Yarmouth, and in the 35th this Thomas died, seized of large possessions. In the 48th John Fastolff was looked upon as a man of such abilities and fidelity, that he was sent into foreign parts (8) upon some secret negotiation, of high concern to the King; in which year Hugh Fastolff of Great Yarmouth, was Lieutenant to William Nevil the Admiral, as he had ten years before been to William Hesel (9); which Hugh was brother of John Fastolff. In the first of King Richard II the Earl of Warwick, Admiral, makes Sir John Fastolff of Yarmouth his Deputy, who had a protection in the third year (10), being sent upon a naval expedition for the crown. Sir Hugh Fastolff, his father dying the 5th of Richard II (11), he obtained a confirmation of free-warren in his demesne-lands of Castre and Thwayte (first granted in the 44th of Henry III. to Robert de Castre). Many other Knights and Esquires of the name, might be produced, and their extensive territories named, especially in the two counties here specified; among whom, as it has been said, the branch whence our Knight descended, was seated at Castre, where John (12), son of Nicholas appointed himself to be buried, in the church of the Holy Trinity; where also there was a free chapel, dedicated to St John the Baptist; to which John Fastolff the elder (13) presented in 1377, and John, son of Alexander, in 1383, and our religious Knight himself, about four years after his final return from the wars of France (14). His mother Dame Mary Fastolff, who after his father's death was married to Sir Thomas Mortimer, died May 2, 1406, and was buried in the chapel or choir belonging to the chantry of the Holy Cross. Her memory was honoured with an obit, anniversary and tomb, and there was an anniversary kept for her soul in the college of his house at Castre, the same day they sang it at Attleburgh (15). There are still in being several other presentations, and last wills of many others of this family, which being so numerous, so divided into several branches under the same christian names, with such frequent interchange, and traverses, or conjunction of settlement, that it becomes very perplexing to deduce the pedigree of our Knight in a direct line, as may be seen in the elaborate attempts of a late very able Herald and Antiquary (16), to whom we are much indebted for this part, and must be, for others of our Worthy's history, since the family-papers, which are in being, and have been promised to see the light, will not be so timely published, as further to enlarge now our prospect, or less doubtfully in many steps direct our progress.

ferment to the service of their country, at home or abroad. But if he was under Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, while he enjoyed that title among us, as we shall find it elsewhere reported, it could be but one year, he being banished the kingdom by King Richard II. in 1398. [B], though his younger son, who was restored to that title, many years after, might be one of Sir John Fastolff's feoffees. And it is pretty evident, that he was, but a few years after the banishment of that Duke, in some considerable post under Thomas of Lancaster, afterwards Duke of Clarence, and second son of the succeeding King Henry IV. This Thomas was sent by his father so early, according to some writers, as the second year of his reign, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (e), which was in 1401. And it is not improbable but Fastolff was then with him, for we are informed by an Historian who knew him, that in the sixth and seventh years of the said King Henry, that is, in 1405 and 1406, this John Fastolff, Esq; was continually with him (f). And the same Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was again there, upon his said government in 1408, almost to the beginning of the next year, when also it is no less probable that Fastolff was still with him; because that very year last mentioned, we find it asserted, that he was married in that kingdom, to a rich young widow of quality, named Milicent, Lady Castlecomb, daughter of Robert Lord Tibetot, and relict of Sir Stephen Scrope; the same perhaps who is mentioned, though not with the title of knighthood, by Sir P. Leycester, as above, to have been the said Lord Lieutenant's Deputy of Ireland, during most of the intervals of his return to England, in those years we have spoken of him in the said government; which Deputy-Lieutenant died in his duty, also the said year. This marriage was solemnized on the feast of St Hilary in Ireland, the year aforesaid; and Fastolff obliged himself in the sum of a thousand pounds, to pay her an hundred pounds a year, in the nature of pin-money during life; and she received the same to the 24th year of King Henry VI (g). The lands in Wiltshire and Yorkshire which came to Fastolff by this marriage with the said Lady, descended to Stephen Le Scrope her son and heir. We may reasonably believe, that this marriage in Ireland engaged his settlement in that country, or upon his estate at Norfolk in his own, till, in obedience to the commission he received, his command of some forces, or post of trust, under the English regency in France, soon after required his residence in that kingdom. For, according to the strictest calculation we can make, from the accounts of his early engagements in France, the many years he was there, and the time of his final return, it must be, not long after his said marriage, that he left either England or Ireland, for that foreign service: Being employed abroad by King Henry IV (h), and had exercised Wars in France, Normandy, Angeoye, and in Mayne, as also in Gyen; having under the King, my Sovereigne Lord, Offices, and Governances of Countrees and Places; as of Castells, Fortresses, Citees and Townes, be XXX Yeer and more continyuid (i); which agrees very well, with what our first English Printer has published, in his concise, yet comprehensive character of him, but little more than twenty years after his death, where he speaks of his exercising the Warrys in the Royame of Fraunce and other Countrees, &c. by Fourty Yeres enduryng (k). So that, we cannot see any room, either in the time or the temper, in the fortunes or employments of this our Worthy, for him to have been a companion with, or follower and corrupter of Prince Henry, in his juvenile and dissolute courses; nor, that Shakespear had any view of drawing his Sir John Falstaff, from any part of this Sir John Fastolff's character; or so much as pointing at any indifferent circumstance in it, that can reflect upon his memory, with readers conversant in the true History of him. The one is an old, humorous, vapouring, and cowardly, lewd, lying, and drunken debauchee, about the Prince's Court, when the other was a young and grave, discreet and valiant, chaste and sober, Commander abroad; continually advanced to honours and places of profit, for his brave and politic achievements, military and civil; continually preferred to the trust of one government or other; of countries, cities, towns, &c. or as a General, and Commander of armies, in martial expeditions, while abroad; made Knight-Banneret in the field of battle; Baron in France, and Knight of the Garter in England: and particularly, when finally settled at home, constantly exercised in acts of hospitality, munificence, and charity; a founder of religious buildings,

[B] That Duke being banished by King Richard II. in 1398.] This Thomas Mowbray was created Duke of Norfolk, on September 29, being the 21st of Richard II. Anno 1397, as the Monk of St Albans records (17); and having charged Henry of Bolingbroke, Duke of Hereford, with taxing the King of evil government, and he denying the same, a challenge ensued; which was so near being brought to a determination at Coventry, that they entred the lists prepared at all points for the encounter; Duke Thomas his horse was barbed with crimson velvet, embroidered richly with his arms, in lions of silver, and with Mulberry trees for his rebus; to represent, according to the allusive or symbolizing fashion of those days, his surname of Mowbray (18). But to prevent this combat, that Duke of Hereford was banished, according to the Monk of St Albans, on the 13th of October 1398, for ten years; and this Duke of Norfolk, for life (19). But his adversary being crowned a year after, by the name and title of Henry IV. the Duke of Norfolk died with grief at Venice, in the first year of the said King's reign, Anno 1400 (20). So that, there is but a narrow space of time that will admit our Fastolff under the care, or in the service of this Duke of Norfolk, while he held that title in England. As for his two sons; the eldest named also Thomas, was never Duke of Norfolk; for being engaged in a conspiracy against the King, he was five years after beheaded at York, with Archbishop Scroop (21); and his brother John was not restored to the title till the third of Henry VI (22). and yet might after that be, as we are informed he was, one of Sir John Fastolff's feoffees (23).

and other stately edifices, ornamental to his country, as their remains still testify; also a generous patron of worthy and learned men, and a publick benefactor to the pious and the poor; not only on this side, but even beyond his grave. In short, the more we collate the circumstances in this Historical character, with those in that Poetical one, we can find nothing discreditable in the latter, that has any relation to the former, or that would mislead an ignorant reader to mistake, or confound them, but a little quibble, which makes some vicinity in their names, and a short degree in the time wherein the one did really, and the other is feigned to live. And in regard to the Prince of Wales, or our Knight's being engaged in any wild or riotous practices of his youth, the improbabilities may also appear from the comparison of their age, and a view of this Prince's commendable engagements [C].

[C] The improbabilities may also appear from the comparison of their age, and a view of the Prince's commendable engagements, &c. This Prince Henry, born in south Wales, 1388, was the eldest son of Henry of Bolingbroke, spoken of in the last note, afterwards King of England. This son, during his father's exile in 1398, was taken by Richard II to Ireland, and imprisoned in the castle of Trim. He was afterwards some time a Student in Queen's College in Oxford, under his half uncle (24), Henry Beaufort, who was that year Chancellor of the said University (25). Richard was deposed, and the Prince's father, Henry IV. crowned in October 1399, and the Prince being arrived at the age of twelve years in 1400, had the succession entailed on him in Parliament, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earl of Chester, and soon after Duke of Aquitaine. From Oxford, he was called to Court, where Thomas Percy, Earl of Worcester, was his Governor, whose hostile attempts at the battle of Shrewsbury in July 1403, cost that disloyal Earl his head (26), and this Prince Henry almost his life; who, confronting the Percies in battle, was wounded in the face with an arrow; but this badge of honour and the overthrow of Henry Percy, by others called young Hotspur, were hopeful tokens of his ensuing success against Owen Glendour in Wales, whom he pursued to destruction, being then scarcely sixteen; but if he pursued Owen to his death on the Welch mountains, it seems to have been beyond 1404, two or three years or more (27): Yet before he was misled to any libertine courses (however, on the stage, he is improbably represented in the height of them, before he was fifteen) and after Falstaff was engaged in the service of Prince Henry's brother, Thomas of Lancaster afterwards Duke of Clarence. Falstaff in the play, appears to have been in the battle of Shrewsbury with Prince Henry; but Falstaff in history, appears not there; being probably in Ireland, with, or by the appointment of, the said Thomas of Lancaster from his first going Lord Lieutenant thither; where our Knight should then appear, in order to make out the forty years service of Sir John Falstaff, in France and other countries, as Caxton has above declared; and we compute, by the time that Prince Henry had appeased the tumults in Wales, and disturbances in other countries, so as to be settled in any tolerable quiet or tranquillity at home, Falstaff was married and settled in Ireland; soon after which, it must be allowed, that he was sent by King Henry into France, to answer the thirty years, and more, he expresses himself above to have resided in that kingdom. The interval between Falstaff's marriage in 1408, or departure to France, and the King's death in England 1412, is the only room we can see for the Prince's disorderly excursions; for it was not before he was of years beyond the command of tutors (28) however in the play he may appear in the midst of them, before the battle of Shrewsbury: so that we see as little vacancy for our Falstaff's being a partaker of them, in history, or chronology, as there was probability he should then, or any other time, be such, in his more solid age and disposition. He was at least ten or eleven years older than the Prince; old enough to disrelish his youthful extravagancies; yet no such disparity in their age, as that he could be properly represented, by the old, gray-headed, unwieldy buffoon and debauchee, who appears such a subject of derision on the stage. If Falstaff had ever been a corrupter of the Prince, King Henry would never have preferred him to any posts of honour, or trust; nor would the Prince himself, when he came, reclaimed, to the Crown, have advanced him still higher; but had discarded him with a sum of money, or stipend, as he did the Libertines and Parasites who had soothed him in his vices.

His frolics of robbing, in company with them, his own stewards, of his own money, and making them amend at the foot of their accounts (29); his attempt to rescue one of his accomplices, whether Bardolf, or any other, in the Court of King's Bench, from the course of the law, and rashly striking the Chief Justice, Sir William Gascoyne, on the bench, for which he suffered imprisonment (30), were actions countenanced by men of other principles, disposition, and conduct, than Falstaff. But there are so many other disagreements, which remove all similitude between them, that the honours of the real Knight cannot be affected by the humours of the fictitious one. That commitment by the said Judge, of Falstaff to the Fleet prison in the play (31), was, when Falstaff in history, had manifestly been a good while in France. In the play, Falstaff is a man of mean, necessitous, shifting circumstances throughout; Falstaff, in record, was richly possessed of lands and estates in several places, from his youth. Falstaff in the Poet's account, was near three-score before the battle of Shrewsbury (32). Falstaff in history, not above twenty six; the theatrical Falstaff ends his life, soon after his princely companion ascends the throne, and before he goes into France (33), but the historical Falstaff, in the accounts of the Heralds and Biographers, survived that King Henry V. no less than thirty seven years. As to its being said of the one, that he was a Page to the Duke of Norfolk (34), as we have before read, that the other was also trained up in the Norfolk family, there is nothing but what was reputable in that, since, in those times, it was the custom for Lords and Dukes themselves to be so trained: nor does this seem a foundation so premeditated, so personally pointed at our Knight, so deeply or widely laid, as to intend the fixing a credit in so many false circumstances, upon one that may be true; since it was probably, and might be as truly, said of Oldcastle as Falstaff: for the Poet first drew the character of his Sir John Falstaff, in Sir John Oldcastle's name; but being thereby thought to have displeased some descendants, or at least, made too free with such an early and eminent instrument, or advancer of, and sufferer for our Reformation, the Poet was obliged to change the name, from one that might have well enough implied the old battered bravo we see represented, to one that might as well express other parts of the same character, by a staff that was false in its soundness, or strength for support, and as little to be relied, or depended on, as a broken reed. Then, our Falstaff appearing conspicuous, tho' dispersedly, in the old histories of that Prince's time, yet thro' the want of distinct revival, being become much unknown to common fame in the Poet's days, might readily hint such an easy variation, or transposition of the letters in his name, as would answer that purpose; but nothing in all his story, that we have met with, could hint the character. That such change of those famous names in history, or substitution of one for the other, was made by the Poet, we may be satisfied from his own words; where he says, 'If you be not too much cloyed with fat meat, our humble author will continue the story with Sir John in it, and make you merry with fair Catharine of France; where for any thing I know, Falstaff shall die of a sweat, unless already he be killed with your hard opinions; for Oldcastle died a martyr, and this is not the man (35).' And yet the freedom thought by some grave writers to have been taken with both, has given them offence, notwithstanding that Sir John's name in the play, is not according to the strictness of the letter, to be found in history. 'The Comedian, says one author, is not excusable by some alteration of his name, seeing the vicinity of sounds intrench on the memory of that worthy Knight; and few do heed the inconsiderable difference in spelling their names (36). Then in regard to the substitution of one person for the other, he says in one place, 'Stage Poets have themselves been very bold with, and others very merry at, the memory of Sir John Oldcastle; whom they have fancied a boon companion, a jovial royster, and yet a coward to boot; contrary to the credit of all chronicles, owning him a martial man of merit. The best is, Sir John Falstaff hath relieved the memory of Sir John Oldcastle, and of late is substituted buffoon in his place; but it matters as little what petulant Poets, as what malicious Papists have written against him (37). In another place, the same author again has these words of Sir John Fastolff, 'To avouch him by many arguments valiant, is to maintain that the sun is bright; tho' since, the stage hath been over-bold with his memory, making him a thrafonical puff and emblem of mock-valour. True it is, Sir John Oldcastle was the make-sport in all plays for a coward. It is easily known out of what purse this black penny came; the Papists railing on him for a heretic (38), and therefore he must also be a coward; tho' indeed a man of arms every inch of him, and as valiant as any in his age. Now as I am glad that Sir John Oldcastle is put out, so I am sorry, that Sir John Fastolff is put in, to relieve his memory, in this base service to be the anvil for every dull wit to strike upon (39). But as other Dramatists before Shakespear had made free with Oldcastle, they ought to bear the first blame, and a larger share of it, as they had taken greater liberties, tho' with less wit. For there was a play of Henry the V. before Shakespear's, in which not only Oldcastle is in the gang of robbers with the Prince (40), but there is a scene in which the Prince strikes the Judge a box on the ear, whereas in Shakespear, this action is more modestly sunk into a narrative. Then afterwards, as the same character serves, if you will, for Fastolff, as well as it did for Oldcastle, this shows there was no particular satire intended by him upon one or the other. A late Poet Laureat, who first published Shakespear in a small edition, is also for thinking him somewhat to blame, in this his second choice of personating our Knight, Sir John Fastolff, being a name of distinguished merit in the wars of France, &c. (41). tho' he afterwards found some colourable pretext for excusing him, from the misconstruction of a much-commended retreat he made to the preservation of his army, as will be hereafter related: And a later author yet, has by some strong reflections upon Shakespear's picture of Falstaff, taken the notion also, that our Knight was directly designed to be exposed therein, where he instances that, 'As of old the reputation of Socrates was in his life-time sullied by Aristophanes, in personating him on the stage; so the memory of our hero, had in this last age, met with the same hard fate by interludes in plays (42);' then shews, how opposite to good manners and good nature, it is, to deride only the absent, but how disingenuous, unjust, and against the principles of humanity, to impair the fame of the dead; since the best and greatest men have placed their reputation, in the next degree to their souls, as giving some shew of existence and a sort of immortality, whereby they survive their bodies; a principle so far implanted by nature, that even the heathens have cheerfully yielded up their lives, in contemplation of the glory of it (43). Yet a little further, owns that Shakespear cannot be charged with any premeditated spleen against the memory of our Knight, when he composed his Comedies, as he substituted Sir John Fastolff for Sir John Oldcastle, which might be done at random, since his first design was evidently no more than to entertain the theatre with a fat, amorous, vain, cowardly, drunken old fellow, the corrupter of Henry V. while Prince, as the subject of mirth and ridicule: 'and it must be confessed, that he has performed his design with incomparable wit, and inimitable humour, which have made such lasting impressions on the generality of spectators, that they have been induced or bewitched into a belief, that this drollery was a piece of true history (44). We might produce some grave poetry also, written by authors on this subject, who were in the same way of thinking. But as we have elsewhere quoted some of it, from an historical poem in MS. we shall here only add part of two other stanzas from the same, where, tho' scandal is believed, in this stage-mirth, to pursue the steps of honour, yet if truth may settle our opinion, we may be satisfied.

Howe'er the Heaps
May crowd, in hungry expectation all,
To the sweet Nugilogues of Jack and Hal (45).

And a little further, after having said, what may suffice to do right to our Worthy, let the guilt fall where it may; since the election made by Henry, of his officers and ministers was unquestionable; and judgment secured the honours he conferred, as well as the glory he acquired,

Then, from his bounty, blot out what may rife,
Of comic mirth, to Fastolff's prejudice (46).

But perhaps, it has not been cautiously enough considered, whether there may not be some inadvertency in these applications? whether discredit may not be appropriated thereby, where it was never designed? Could it be supposed, that Shakespear's natural candour and impartiality in other characters, had been warped in this, by any interest in, or respect towards, the Shrewsbury family, on account of some antiquated emulation or difference between John Lord Talbot, the most renowned ancestor of that family, and Sir John Fastolff in France; a man of that Poet's incomparable abilities could have made a substantial satire of it; could have burlesqued Fastolff, as well as any body else, out of history, and transformed some incidents really graceful, into a character no less grotesque. But who does the horning of a dead corps on Falstaff's back reflect upon (47)? whose honour suffers, in his being forced to the unexpected surprise of his armed plunderers to surrender his treasure (48)? whose policy is impeached, by his creeping into a bucking basket, to avoid the storms of a jealous husband (49): whose reputation suffers by his being buffeted in the disguise of an old witch, or fortune-teller of Brentford (50)? or whose valour is to be called in question, because he cannot avoid being tormented by a swarm of little fairies in Windfor-forest (51)? If the good name of Fastolff or any other man of honour, had ever been maliciously doomed to sacrifice, to durable disgrace or exposure, in the character of Falstaff, it would have been founded upon some important, some significant transactions, some instances of flagitious and irreputable misconduct, not such odd, drole, inconsiderable circumstances as these, the harmless issue of pleasant wit and humour, or delightful union of nature and fancy; all so visibly devised of the comic strain, so designed only for innocent merriment and diversion, without any personal reflexion on this great man, or any other, that we believe there is no real character to be read of in all history, that can be justly disparaged by any application; discernably intended, of this imaginary one in poetry. But if, after this, succeeding readers or spectators whether Antiquaries, Heralds, Historians, or Poets, will indulge the like austerity with some of their predecessors, will still captiously conceive that character to have been directly levelled at this Knight, and still with more rigour than candour, equity, or reason possess themselves, that any sterling coin, or plate of the true standard, was ever meant to be any ways forged, or imitated, by a piece of mettle of the most dissimilar mixtures or alloy; which, neither in weight or colour, form, stamp, or inscription, bears any resemblance; which pretends not to usurp so much as the very name; but only borders upon it: if any I say, will cherish their credulity so far as this, and the Falstaff of the Comedians must be still taken for the Fastolff of Chronologists, instead of exclaiming seriously, or with sober sadness in history, against the poetical injury, let a reparation be made by poetical justice; and for the false character imposed under the name Falstaff, let the real one appear, in the valiant and vigilant, trusty and incorruptible, politic and prudent, temperate and continent of our Knight, will clear him from being a promoter of, or partaker in them. For it is apparent, that he had been some time entrusted with a command in France, before the death of King Henry IV; because in 1413, the very first year of his son, who was now grown the reformed, and soon after proved the renowned, Henry V; it appears that Fastolff had the castle and dominion of Veires in Gascoigne, committed to his custody and defence (l): whence it is very reasonably inferred, that he then resided in the said duchy, which at that time was possessed by the English. In June 1415, Fastolff, then only an Esquire, was returned by indenture, with ten men of arms, and thirty archers, to serve the King at his arrival in France (m). Soon after King Henry was arrived in Normandy, in August following, with above 30000 men (n), the English army having conquered Harfleur, the most considerable port in that duchy, Fastolff was constituted Lieutenant thereof, by the Earl of Derby, as one Historian informs us (o); but as we find it in others, the King, upon this conquest, constituted his said uncle Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorset, Governor of Harfleur, in conjunction with Sir John Fastolff, and having repaired the fortifications, placed therein a garrison of two thousand select men, as Titus Livius numbers them; or of fifteen hundred men at arms, and thirty-five Knights, according to Hall's account; to which number one of the French Historians also adds, a thousand archers (p). Towards the latter end of October in the year last mentioned, he was dangerously engaged in the ever-memorable battle of Agincourt, where the English, under their Heroick Monarch, obtained one of the most glorious victories upon record throughout their Annals. And here it is said that Fastolff, among others, signalized himself most gallantly by taking the Duke Alençon prisoner (q). Though other Historians say, upon that Duke's desperate encounter with King Henry himself, in which he cut off the crowned crest of his helmet, he was slain upon the spot (r). However, Fastolff at this, or some other battle, did take a French General of the first quality prisoner [D]. For his eminent services in those victories, he received, before the 29th of January following, the honour of knighthood, and had the manor and demesnes of Fritense, near Harfleur, then bestowed upon him during life (s). In the year 1418, he was ordered to seize upon the castle and dominion of Bec Crespin, and other manors, which were held by James D'Auricher, and several other Knights; and had the said castle, with those lands, granted him in special tail (t), to the yearly value of 2000 scutes (u). In 1420 he was at the siege of Monsterau, as Peter Basset has remembered; and in the next year at that of Meaulx-en-Brie. About five months after the decease of King Henry V, the town of Meulent having been surprized, in January 1422, John Duke of Bedford Regent of France, and Sir John Fastolff then Grand Master of his Household, and Seneschal of Normandy, laid siege to the same, and re-took it. In 1423, after the castle of Cravent was relieved, our Knight was constituted Lieutenant for the King and Regent in Normandy, in the jurisdictions of Roan, Evreux, Alençon, and the countries beyond the river Seine: also Governor inent Sir John Fastolff: In the brave and experienced soldier, the wise and able statesman, the steady patriot, the generous patron, and the pious benefactor. It would be a labour that might surely well reward itself, were it judiciously executed, to produce a rich and solid figure, of such an original, as might put all copies out of countenance; of such native brightness, as would eclipse all feigned lustre, or detrimental efficacy in any effigial counterfeit; and sublimely to essay, whether the fictitious Falstaff of Shakespeare, so admirably figured out by art, like Spenser's false Florimel, so artfully imaged out of snow, would shrink and dissolve away at the presence of the true one (*). But whether it be ever effected or not, we may safely let the name of Falstaff preserve its corruption, without impairing Fastolff's merit, as the name of Epicurus, tho' distorted to signify voluptuous gormandry, and carnal delight, yet injured not the man among the wisest Philosophers: We may let Sign-Painters draw the picture of Sir John Falstaff before the doors of drinking-houses, and if Fastolff's reputation suffers, it must be in nobler company; and let such historians as will write the lives of highwaymen, make Falstaff the Captain-General of them (†), which cannot in justice be done without displacing his gallant Prince, even any historical highwayman cannot rob Fastolff of the honours, due to his long, toilsoone, and signal services.

[D] Did take a French General of the first quality prisoner.] It does not appear to have been that Duke of Alençon, who was taken prisoner by Fastolff, now at the battle of Agincourt; because, while King Henry after having killed two of his adversaries, was fighting astride over his brother, Humphry Duke of Gloucester, beaten to the ground, as one historian writes (52), or rather defending his uncle the Duke of York, and stooping to raise him according to others (53); so soon as Alençon, taking the advantage of that inclining posture, had cleft, or cut off the crest of his Majesty's helmet, and battered it with the stroke into his brow, he was, notwithstanding the discovery he made of himself, by crying out, who he was, and the King's desire to save him, cut to pieces on the place, by the surrounding guards. There was another Duke of Alençon, in succeeding battles; but we find not, either in the French or English histories, that he was taken prisoner by Fastolff. But we are elsewhere informed, it was the Duke of Bar who was taken by him; and yet that could not be in this battle; for, we find that among the French Princes and Lords who fell in such numbers there, Edward Duke of Bar and John his brother, were both slain in the field (54): yet there was another Duke of Bar, who, after the siege of Orleanse, appears to have brought succours to Charles VII. the young King of France (55); and this might be the prisoner meant by one of our Poets, in a grave historical work, tho' written in antient English verse, where he is characterizing our old hardy warriors in the conquest of France, &c. and having briefly described the bravery of that stout Sir Philip Hall (56), who regained us Crotoy, and obtained such an admirable victory over the proud Clermont, he makes this comparison:

Strong Fastolff, with this man compare we may;
By Salisbury who, oft being seriously employ'd,
In many a brave attempt, the gen'ral foe annoy'd:
With excellent success in Maine, and Anjou fought,
And many a bulwark there, into our keeping brought;
And chosen to go forth, with Vaudemont in war,
Moſt resolutely took, proud Renate Duke of Barre (57).

vernor of the counties of Anjou and Maine, and before the battle of Verneuil was created Banneret (w). About three months after, Sir John, being then Captain of Alençon, and Governor of the marches thereof, laid siege to the castle of Tenuye in Maine, as a French Historian informs us (x), which was surrendered to him; and in 1424 he was sent to oppose the delivery of Alençon to the French, upon a discovery made that a Gascoigner had secretly contracted to betray the same (y). In September 1425, he laid siege to Beaumont le Vicompt, which surrendered to him (z). And then also he took the castle of Sillie-le-Guillem, from which he was dignified with the title of Baron: But this, revolting afterwards again to the French, was assaulted by the Earl of Arundel (a), and retaken about seven years after. In the year last mentioned, our active warrior took also St Ouen D'Estrais near Laval, as likewise the castle of Gravelle, with other places of strength from the enemy; for which dangerous and indefatigable services in France, he was about the same time elected in England, with extraordinary deference to his merits, Knight Companion of the Order of the Garter [E]. In 1426, John Lord Talbot was appointed Governor of Anjou and Maine, and for this purpose Sir John Fastolff was removed to another place of command (b), which in all probability might be the foundation of that jealousy, emulation, or competition between them, which never was cordially reconciled. In October 1428, he had a protection granted him, being then going into France (c); and there he performed an enterprise of such bravery and conduct, as is scarce thought to have been parallel'd in ancient or modern history (d); for it seems that the English army, at the siege of Orleanse, being in great want of provisions, artillery, and other necessaries, Sir John Fastolff, with another approved Commander or two, were dispatched for supplies thereof, by W. de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, to the Regent at Paris; who not only provided him plentifully therewith, but allowed him a strong guard at his return, that he might convey the same safely to the siege. The French, knowing the importance of this succour, to prevent it, joined two armies of much more numerous force than he had, to meet him; and, whether by several divided encounters, or in a pitched battle, as the French themselves allow it, he totally overthrew them; slew greater numbers than he had under him, not to mention the wounded and the prisoners; then calmly conducted his convoy safe to the English camp. And because it was in the time of Lent, and he had, among his other provision, several of his wains and carriages, which he made a most artful use of, as so many fortifications, laden with many barrels of herrings, the French, with their usual air of depreciating any defeat, have ever since called this victory in their Histories, The BATTLE of HERRINGS [F]; chusing rather to give the honour of it to [E] About the same time elected Knight of the Garter.] The Duke of Bedford did before or after Sir John Fastolff's election, in a very particular and persuasive manner, recommend to the Sovereign and other Knights of the Garter, the election of Sir John Radcliffe also into the said order, for his martial valour and virtues, his long faithful and signal services of his country; having exercised the Armys, the space of XXVIII Wynters unreproched (58): yet upon the vacancy of a stall at Windsor, by the death of the Earl of Westmorland, and a scrutiny made, on St George's Eve in the 4th of Henry VI. in which it was found, that Sir John Fastolff, and Sir John Radcliffe, were not only nominated by a greater number before the other Knights of great merits, but by an equal number of votes, the said Duke being then the King's deputy and president at that election, did yet of the two, tho' both as he said were indeed undeniably deserving of this honour, judge, Sir John Fastolff to be most worthy of it; and, according to his authority, did declare him admitted into the place of the deceased (59), and Radcliffe was elected soon after upon another vacancy; which preference to such an extraordinary competitor, by such an able and unblemished, such an honourable and unbiassed judge, must imply very high deserts, in the receiver then abroad, of that exalted honour. In the letter sent by, or in the name of King Henry VI. to Sir John Fastolff, importing his election, there are these words:— 'Considerant, tans les bons, leaux, & honnorable services, que avez de pie cà faiz, en service de nostre tres redouté Seigneur & Pere, que Dieux assoille, & que faitez continuellement en nostre; come plusieurs autres desertes d'onour, que Dieux a souffert estre en vous, en tollerant toujours, comme bon & feal subject, les paines & travaux de guerre, pour nostre bon droit, & juste querelle susseiner, vous a esleu un de noz compaignons du dit ordre (60) &c.' As much as to say, 'In consideration of your good, loyal, and honourable services, heretofore performed, to our most redoubted Lord and Father, whom God absolve, and which you are incessantly exercising, under us; as well as for other deserts of honour, wherewith God hath endowed you, and disposed you, so constantly upon all occasions, like a true and faithful subject, to endure the pains and toils of war, in support of our full right and just quarrel; we have elected you one of our companions of the said order, &c.' A commission was also issued to the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, and Suffolk, to receive Sir John's oath, and to invest him with the Garter; further directing, that he should, with all convenient dispatch, send over his helmet and sword, to be hung up in the chapel at Windsor; and depute an honourable Knight of untainted character, to take possession of his stall (61). Accordingly the deputation of Sir John Fastolff, to Sir Henry Inghouse, and Sir William Breton, appointing them jointly and separately his Proctors, to take possession of his stall; to offer his mantle, helmet, and sword; and to take the oath required by the statutes; as it was written in French, and dated from Lancone, the 3d of February, was sent to them, and is also preserved (62). And the Royal Commission, directed to Sir John Robessart one of the Knights Companions of the Order, for the installation of him, by Sir Henry Inghouse, one of the said Proctors, is dated from the King's castle of Wallingford, the 25th of February, 1426, and in the 5th year of the said King Henry VI. wherein, to the character given again of Sir John, much in the sense of the former, there is the addition made, of his great sense, courage, and experience in arms (63). According to the tenor of these instruments (64), he was elected at the next installation; and these are honourable testimonies of his personal qualifications and virtues; and of his fortitude, and merit in publick services (65).

[F] The Battle of Herrings.] This battle is famous in history, antient and modern. A late French Historian, having recorded the death of that valiant Thomas Montagu, Earl of Salisbury, who begun the siege of Orleanse; and mentioned the other English Commanders, of greatest distinction who lay before that town; such as the Earl of Suffolk, the Lords, Talbot and Scales; Fastolff, and Gladidas, as he is called (†), whose merits, supplying the place of his birth, had

(†) By Monstrelet Father Daniel, &c. who say, that General Gladidas was killed at this siege, in 1429. But we know of no such English name; nor could it be meant for Sir Tho. Gargrave, who was there also slain there; he being of an eminent family Yorkshire: but there was W. liam Gladisdale, Commander of great bravery, then likewise killed in defending a castle; whom we take to be this Gladidas: See Stow's Annals, fol. 370 had the interception of the dead fish, than the intrepidity of their living foes. But that the fortune of war is precarious, our Knight was a witness; who found it as necessary in his next adventure to exercise his conduct, as he did in the last his courage. For soon after the English army was obliged to raise the siege of Orleans, though they received recruits from the Duke of Bedford, they were in no degree strong enough to encounter the French army at Patay. At the battle which happened there in June 1429, many of the English, who were of most experienced and approved valour, seeing themselves so unequal, and the onset of the French so unexpected, that nothing but inevitable ruin would be the consequence of a rash resistance, that all would be lost; like those who made such a disadvantageous opposition; therefore some saved themselves, and among them, as it is said, Sir John Fastolff; who, with such as could escape, retired to Corbeil (e). It seems he deemed it romantic, to encounter the torrent that rushed on them in such a surprize, and so unprepared as his inferior forces were to repel it; but he being a principal Leader, it might well be expected that the overthrow of those who stood up against it, would be imputed to his said detachment, though the loss would have probably been greater by his conjunction; so he might be thought responsible for the ill success which happened, who would not have been accounted so, had it been worse, and he either been killed, or with the great Lord Talbot, Lord Scales, Lord Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampston, been taken prisoner of war. Here the French tales, which some English Historians have inconsiderately credited, contradict, or invalidate themselves; for after having made the Regent most improbably, and without any examination, or audience of defence, divest Fastolff had raised him to the highest offices of command in the army; he proceeds to observe, that by reason of the discontinued, or piece-meal circumvallation, which the English had made about that town, the French were encouraged to steal their troops into it; and that this gave occasion to a considerable action: 'For, the Count of Clermont, having got a body of troops at Blois, to guard a Convoy to Orleans, had information that Fastolff was upon the road, conducting of provisions from Paris to the camp. He gave notice of it to the Count of Dunois, and desired him to make a sally out of Orleans, and carry off that Convoy. The Count of Dunois came out accordingly with his horse, passed the forts, and joined Count Clermont's army, at Jenville; and, their troops being thus joined, amounted to four thousand men. On the 12th of February, they set forward to meet Fastolff, and came up with him at Rouvray St Denis. That English General had, only two thousand five hundred men with him, and ranged his troops behind his carriages. The French immediately fell upon them with their cannon, and if they had continued in that manner, to shatter in pieces their waggons, which served as entrenchments, they had been infallibly lost; but the impatience of John Stuart, Constable of Scotland, and his brother William, was the cause of the ill success that happened. They cried out, that it was now time to give battle, and lighting from their horses, with the Scotchmen under their command, they marched up to the breach. The French were obliged to follow them; but, the English Archers having suffered them to draw near, made their discharge upon them at a small distance, and cut off most of those who were placed in the first ranks. Fastolff, at the same time, having ordered some of his battalions to advance with their swords and axes in hand, forced their assailants to retire. The horse, which was to have sustained the attack, instead of keeping their ground, when they saw the foot give way, betook themselves to flight, and the English pursuing, utterly routed them. There were five or six hundred French and Scots left upon the field; the two Stuarts suffered the punishment of their imprudence, and were slain, with several other Lords and Gentlemen. The Count of Dunois was dangerously wounded; however, he got together the remains of his routed army, and re entered Orleans, by passing between the intermitting forts, which had been built by the English. His arrival, a little recovered the townsmen from the consternation they were in, upon the news of this overthrow, which the besiegers had mightily augmented. This engagement was called, The Battle of the Herrings; because, among the provisions which Fastolff was carrying to the camp, there were a great many barrels of herrings (66). But if there were some who enlarged, there were also others who lessened this victory; and among them one of the old French Historians, who mentions only a much smaller number to have been slain at it than the foregoing, and other writers. By this author we are informed, that Fastolff in his return with his said Convoy from Paris to Orleans, was met near Jenville and encountered by the Duke of Bourbon, and his army, which was much more numerous than the English. There they had very many and desperate skirmishes. Stuart the Constable of Scotland, and the Sieur D'Orval were killed, 'Et environ deux cent hommes en leur compagnie,' and about two hundred men in their company: then Fastolff and his troops proceeded on their march to Orleans (67). This account, which mentions but the death of two hundred, may very well agree both with the other before quoted, which reckons their loss at five or six hundred men, and even with that, here under recited, which computes the said loss at near three times this number; if we but understand that the lesser number which fell, was meant to have been in the particular regiments of Stuart and D'Orval only, the other, of the whole French and Scotch army in general. But there is an history compiled more distinctly of these times, by one who was then alive; was present at most of the important occurrences in them, and had greater advantages of knowing the full truth of this action, than any others who have written of it; this was Peter Basset sometime gentleman of the bed chamber to King Henry V (68), who in his said history, which was never printed, written also in the French tongue, tho' with a Latin title, has been much more accurate in some circumstances of this engagement than the rest. He agrees, it was in the time of Lent, that this Convoy was so resolutely defended by Fastolff thro' the French army to the English camp; which accounts for the great quantities of fish there were among the other provisions in it. That Sir Thomas Rampston with his soldiers were also joined to him in this charge, and likewise Sir Simon Morheir, Provost of Paris, with his band of cross-bows, and a party of the Regent's household troops; but that in all, they were not more than fifteen hundred men of arms; and when they were departed from Jenville en Beauvise, upon a very frosty morning towards the siege, and were arrived near Rouvroy, they discovered the enemy approaching them to the number as well French as Scots, of about nine or ten thousand men; where, among other Lords and Nobles, were Charles the eldest son of the Duke of Bourbon, Sir William Stuart, &c. whereupon Fastolff drew up his men in battle array, planted before the archers a pallisade, or entrenchment of sharp pointed stakes, to obstruct the French cavalry from overbearing them, and chained or bound all his loaded cars and carriages of provisions and artillery together also, as a more substantial bulwark, or enclosure against the cannon of the enemy; who, when they were approached, received their certain death or disablement with such incessant and vigorous activity, that the French were totally defeated and dispersed. fastolff of his honours [G], they no less suddenly restore him to them; for, as they phrase it, apparent causes of good excuse (f); though against the mind of the Lord Talbot; between whom, there had been, it seems, some emulous contests, and therefore it is no wonder that Fastolff found him, upon this occasion, an adversary. 'Tis not likely that the Regent ever conceived any displeasure at this conduct, because Fastolff was not only continued in military and civil employments of the greatest concern, but appears more in favour with the Regent after the battle of Patay than before (*). It was but in 1430, that the Regent preferred him to the Lieutenancy of Caen in Normandy (g). In 1432 he accompanied the Regent into France, and was soon after sent Ambassador to the Council of Basil, and chosen, in the like capacity, to negotiate a final or temporary peace, with the adversary of France (b). And that year, Fastolff, with the Lord Willoughby, commanded the army which assisted the Duke of Bretagne against the Duke of Alençon (i). Soon after which he was, for a short space, in England; for, in 1433, going abroad again, he constituted John Fastolff of Olton, probably a near relation, his General Attorney (k). In 1434, or the beginning of the year after, he was again with the Regent of France; and, in 1435, he was again one of the Ambassadors to conclude a peace with the enemy of France (l). Towards the latter end of this year, the said renowned Regent died at Rouen, deservedly reckoned among the greatest men of his age, says a late French Historian (m); and as the greatest proof he could give of his trust or assurance in the honour

(*) So that, rather than any dishonour here, can be allowed, the Retreat itself, as it is told, must be doubted.

Liam Stuari and his brother, with abundance more, as well French as Scots, to the number of about twenty five hundred, were left dead in the field, and not one Englishman of any distinction or above the common rank lost his life; but Fastolff carried his troops, his provisions, ammunition, &c. safe to the said siege (69), and this battle has been very justly admired, no less for the extraordinary conduct of it, than its success; it being almost incredible, as another has said of it, that fifteen hundred English, under the fatigue of a march, encumbered with the charge of a large quantity of provisions, should gain a complete victory over nine or ten thousand of the enemy who attacked them, under the conduct of the first persons of distinction; and that by killing twenty five hundred of them on the spot, without the loss of a single soldier of reputation (70).

[G] Divest Fastolff of his honours] However some of our Historians have been unwarily misled by French writers, this may certainly be accounted worthy of remembrance, among those Retreats which have met with great applause from men of the greatest military skill and experience (71). Leaders to a battle, often improve every step they take, as in their observations, intelligence, and knowledge, so consequently in their judgments, resolution, and determinations. The very motion of an army into different positions, or more advantageous places; the surprise of an enemy, disappointed of succours or supplies; the inequality that attack him, which may fall so heavy upon one part of the army that the other cannot relieve it; the discovery of unexpected reserves, ambuscades, or new recruits, may give a commander good occasion of new resolves, that may reverse his proceedings; so that even a precipitous retirement may be more honourable, than an obstinate perseverance to unavoidable ruin; and surely, unless in cases of inevitable necessity, a General, whose courage is duly tempered with the caution it ought to be, will not hazard a general loss without some apparent prospect of advantage; but conclude that, a prudent retreat will be more commendable than a dishonourable overthrow. That this was the case here is evident, in that, the Regent was so far from depriving Sir John Fastolff of his George and Garter, before any examination, and restoring them after one, or any other way diminishing or degrading him of his honour, that he was continually to his death, making additions to it; and more frequently now, more signally after this conduct at the Battle of Patay, in which the English had such a vast inferiority of so many thousand forces, than before. This were enough to clear his reputation, without any other argument; but hear what an able judge of these matters has said upon this occasion.

A charge of so high a nature, and such a severe animadversion, should have been vouched by authentic contemporary writers; and till such shall be produced, let us consider what absurd consequences are necessarily imply'd in this censure; and whether these do not afford us reasonable presumptions to doubt the truth of this tradition: and here, to omit that the image of St George, was not in all probability, a symbol of the Order in that age; and admitting that those words of the later Historians should be construed only to mean that the Cross of St George, an ensign of it, was taken from him; it will be however confessed, that this Duke, then Regent of France, could not constitute or invest any person with this Order, tho' by this action, if it should be true, it must be allowed, that he had an absolute power to divest a companion, and that, without the knowledge of the Sovereign, or any concurrence of the other Knights; and, which is the more incredible, that he actually exercised this power upon an information only, without hearing or examining into the truth of the charge, or complaint; which seems not consistent with the honour, generosity; and exalted character of this Regent, who had the greatest reverence for this Order (72), and was a most punctual observer of its statutes (73), as appears from several circumstances: and it is very surprising, that this most heroic Duke, who esteemed himself limited and circumscribed to the statutes, in the case of the election of our Knight, should be on a less guard in deposing him, and thereby casting on him an indelible infamy, by a voluntary power not allowed by the statutes then in being; for the degradation of a Knight who should fly from battle, was an article first inserted into the statutes made by King Henry VIII. which too is there restrained: if it should please the Sovereign and the Company in the next chapter.

But taking it for granted, as the same author proceeds, that the Regent, upon the first representation, should have been so far warmed, as, under that impression, to declare, that our Knight might in his opinion deserve to be degraded for this his supposed demerit; or, in the highest extent, as these authors deliver it, the ensigns of the Order were actually demanded and taken from him; yet this hasty prepossession of the Regent, cannot be construed to be any diminution of the character of our Knight, since these same Historians inform us, that after an examination of this charge, those ensigns were restored him, as they word it, for apparent causes of good excuse, tho' against the mind of the Lord Talbot, who must have been a powerful adversary. And tho' we have not the particulars of his vindication, or specification of his conduct, yet such an honourable acquittal, under these circumstances, gives reasonable grounds to presume, that this sudden accusation had no pretence of foundation, but was a causeless defamation; and that his retiring was irreproachable. But it is the greatest degree of evidence, that this Regent was fully convinced, and satisfied in the management of our Knight, in this critical nice juncture, in that he afterwards continued to employ him in military and civil administrations of the highest importance, &c.

(74) as we have instanced by many examples in the text above, which sufficiently prove, that he never could have been preferred to those honourable employments, commands in the army, and offices of trust, if ever he had been so degraded, dishonoured, or disgraced.

hour and integrity of Sir John Fastolff, he made him one of the executors of his last Will (n). If any readers are inclined to suspect, that these distinctions wherewith he honoured our Knight, were the product of any private or particular affection in the Regent towards him, let them observe, that Richard Duke of York, who succeeded in the Regency of France, made Fastolff a grant of an annuity of twenty pounds a year out of his own estate, pro notabili et laudabili servicio, ac bono consilio: for his notable and laudable services, and good counsel (o). Which is sufficient to shew this Duke's sentiments also of his merits. In 1436, and for about four years longer, he seems to have been pretty well settled at his government in Normandy; after which, in 1440, he made his final return home, and, laden with the laurels he had gathered in France, raised a new plantation of them in his native country; where he shone as bright in virtue as he had in valour, and became as illustrious in his domestic, as he had been in his foreign character [H]; peace having

[H] Became as illustrious in his domestic, as he had been in his foreign character ] As his valour made him a terror in war, his humanity made him a blessing in peace: all we can find in this scene of his recess, being elegant, hospitable, and generous, either as to the places of his abode, or those persons and foundations on which he showered his bounty. The streams of his treasure, that fed this fountain of his munificence, were very numerous and plentiful; as may be seen, in the jury's return to the writ of enquiry, into the lands and estates whereof he was possessed at his death (75) in Norfolk, Suffolk, Yorkshire, and Wiltshire. He was a benefactor to both the Universities; bequeathing a considerable legacy to Cambridge, for building the schools of Philosophy and Law (76), for which the first order under their Chancellor Laurence Bishop of Durham, is dated in June 1458; and at Oxford, he was so bountiful to Magdalen-Collège; thro' the affection he had for his friend William Wainfleet, the founder thereof two years before, that his name is commemorated in an Anniversary speech: and tho' the particulars of his bounty are not now remembered, because he enfeoffed the said founder in his life-time; it is yet known, that the boar's head in Southwark, now divided into tenements, yielding one hundred and fifty pounds yearly, together with Calcedot manor in Suffolk, were part of the lands he bestowed thereon; and Lovingland in that county is conceived also, to have been another part of his donation (77). But, at Castre, the antient seat of his family, is to be seen the remains of his magnificent seat or mansion house, the hall whereof was fifty nine feet long and twenty eight broad (78). At one corner thereof stands a ruined tower of brick, above one hundred feet high, and over one of the windows are carved his arms surrounded with the Garter. The current tradition, that this house was erected by a French Nobleman who was taken prisoner by our famous Knight, according to the model and architecture of his own castle in France, as the price of his ransom, does appear very probable from what has been before related. He furthermore appointed there by his executors, a college to be built for a master, six priests, and seven poor men, and that they should endow it with an annuity of an hundred and twenty marks; chargeable upon part of his estate, but by some accident it was reduced to a Chantry (†). He likewise built a splendid seat in Yarmouth, and a Royal Palace in Southwark (79). His liberality also extended to Bicling and Pulham-Mary, in Norfolk; the churches thereof being formerly adorned with his arms; and among the ornaments in the last of them, there was the effigies of Sir John Fastolff (80), in gilt armour anneiled on one of the glass windows, with his Crest, on a Wreath, Azure, and Or; a Plume of Feathers, Argent; and two Escutcheons, with the Cross of St George, within the Garter; and his Lady kneeling, in her coat armour; Argent, a Saltere, Gules; with these words subscribed, Orate pro animabus Johannis Fastolff, qui multa bona fecit tempore vite, &c (81). In some old books of Heraldry, his arms have been erroneously blazoned; for Fastolff bears Or and Azure, quarterly; on a bend Gules, three Crosets Argent; and not Scallops, according to the description we may meet with in some pedigrees of the family; as may be proved not only from several original seals of the Fastolff's still in being, but in the old arms which remain carved in stone over a window of his house at Castre by Yarmouth (82). Some errors have also escaped the pens of learned men, in relation to that William Worcester above quoted. He was learned in Antiquities, and Heraldry, Physick, and Astronomy; and had a good genius, as well for History as Poetry. He is called in old writings not only servant, and Soget, or Segret, to Sir John Fastolff, but was his Pursuivant, and (*) Secretary. Many of his letters, as we understand in this capacity are still in being (83). But that he was Sir John's Herald, by such a title, or distinction, as Botoner, from the Cross Crolets Botouée, in our Knight's arms, is a misconception in one author (84), no less than it is in another, who fancies, because this learned writer was conversant in medicinal studies, that he was therefore called a Botaner, or Herbalist (85). Whereas we may gather from his own writings, that he was born at Bristol; that his father's name was Worcester and his mother's Botoner, hence he often names himself William Worcester, alias Botoner; and hence arose the error in Pits (86), and others, of making two distinct persons of the two names. He had been exercised in wars above 44 years (87); so eminent and faithful were his services, under this great man, that in his will he left him one of his executors. He wrote many books, tho' we meet with but one that was printed, and that is his translation from the French, of Cicero de Senectute which he addressed to William Wainfleet, Bishop of Winton, and will be further quoted in the next note. He wrote Antiquities of England; Abbreviations of the learned; Medicinal collections; a book of Astrology; another of Cities, Monasteries, Abbies, &c (†); likewise his Itinerary; all it seems, or most of them, in Latin; besides a particular treatise, gratefully preserving the life and deeds of his master, under the title of Acta Domini Johannis Fastolff, which we hear is still in being, and has been promised the publick; had it been published sooner, it might have prevented some mistakes, if not liberties, which some conceive to have been unreasonably taken with the name and memory of our Worthy. The son of this Worcester, among other things, also made a collection of several authentic instruments relating to the English Wars and Government in France; which he dedicated to King Edward IV. wherein is a catalogue of the Princes, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Bannerets, Knights, and other persons of eminence, who were of the Regent's court: Therein is remembered Fastolff's posts of honour, and the places under his government; styling him, Knight-Banneret, Baron of Cilliquillim; great Steward, or Grand-master of the Regent's Household; the King's Lieutenant of Normandy for one year, and after, Governor of Anjou and Maine, for many years; Captain of the City of Mauns, and the castles and towns of Alançon, Mayn, Fresney le Vicont, for fourteen years; likewise of Cant, Verneuil, and Hunflue some years. In this book are several publick memorials, concerning the grand articles and negotiations of peace and war; with some ordonnances as we remember, having seen a copy of this collection (88), which were composed in French and issued forth, by our no less politic, than heroic Knight; who, as well, penn'd those things, which are worthy of being read, as performed those, which merit to be recorded; being no less able to advise than to execute; and, as that collector remarks of him, if these his counsels, instructions, and admonition, had been duly observed, they would have prevented many miscarriages, which might conduce to our loss of France.

having her victories, no less glorious than those of war. We have heard, there is still in being, preserved among the old family-writings, an Inventory of all the rich jewels, plate, furniture, &c. that he either had, or left in France, at his return to England. In 1443, he had licence granted him to employ some of his Majesty's ships to convey materials for building, or furnishing one of his mansion-houses (p). In 1450, he conveyed to John Kemp, the Cardinal-Archbishop of York, and others, his manor of Castre in Fleg, and several other lands, in the deed of conveyance specified (q). No retirement could obscure his reputation, no infirmities weaken him in the exercise of generous actions, to the last. At length being arrived, in the year 1459, beyond the venerable age of fourscore years [I], and ripe with the great honours of his good works, to be gathered from this world to a better, he disposed himself in the most charitable and religious manner, to his appointed translation. In that year, he says of himself, that he was In good remembrance, albe it I am gretly vexid with sickenesse, and thurgh age infebelyd (r). He lingered under an hectic fever and asthma for an hundred and forty-eight days (s); but before he departed he made his Will, on the fifth of November in that year (†), of which we shall give some extract below [K], and died the next day after, being that of St Leonard's feast, or the eve before

[I] Beyond the venerable age of fourscore years. As may be computed from the time of his birth at the beginning mentioned; however, for the sake of an even number, two or three odd years are omitted in the following character and account, that was published before a translation of Cicero, by our first Printer, of this excellent man, about twenty two years after his death, in these words.— ‘Whiche book was translated, and thystoryes openly declared, by the ordenaunce and desyre of the noble aunyent Knyght, Syr Johan Fastolff, of the Countee of Norfolk, Banneret, lyvyng the age of fourscore yere; exercysing the warrys in the Royame of Fraunce, and other countrees, for the diffence and unyversal welfare of both Royames of Englond and Fraunce, by forty yeres enduryng, the fayte of armes haunting, and in admynstryng justice, and polytique governaunce, under thre Kyngs; that is to wete, *Henry IV. [K] Of his Will, we shall give some extract below. It was written in Latin, and a fair copy of it, not very correct, we have seen, as also a translation or abstract in English; but in neither is it expressed, who the witnesses were, nor what the arms, or figure of the seal. It bears date, on the Sunday after the Feast of All Saints, in November 1459, setting forth, That the said Sir Johan Fastolff, Knight, of the County of Norfolk, and in the Diocese of Norwich, made and published this his last will and testament in his Manor of Castre, within the said Diocese, in the following manner. First, he commends his soul to God, to the Virgin Mary, and to all the Saints; and bequeaths his body to be buried after his death, in the conventual church of the Monastery of St Bennet, in the Holmes, in the said Diocese, under the arch of the new chapel, which he lately rebuilt there, on the south side of the choir or chancel, under a marble tomb, near the body of Milicent his former consort, who lies interred there. He further ordains, that the Abbot, and the said Convent, shall give security, before his interment, that they will grant and confirm to John Paston, and to such others as shall be nominated by him, full power of granting the lands, &c. which the said John Paston and other Peoffees of the said Sir Johan Fastolff, or their Peoffees hold of the said Abbot and Convent, to seven Monks, or Priests, and their Successors, towards endowing and establishing a College, within the Manor and Lordship of Castre; or so much of the land, as the said Sir Johan Fastolff shall think fit. Likewise orders, that all his debts should be paid, and all forfeitures be fully compensated, restored, and satisfied. He bequeaths towards the repair and support of the harbour at Great-Yarmouth, and towards renewing and repairing the walls of the said town, for the public benefit, or conservation of the town, and the adjacent country, one hundred marks; on condition that, the Burgesses and Governors thereof, shall without delay, proceed to the said reparations, that the inhabitants may pray for the repose of his soul. He gives to the parish churches of the several villages, wherein he had either feat, manor, lands or tenements, a silk gown, to celebrate mass and pray for his soul in, and that there should be erected in those churches, his achievement of arms, embroidered at the discretion of his executors, and so as were most convenient to, or becoming those churches. He bequeaths to his tenants and menial servants, a competent reward out of his goods and chattels, to the sum of three hundred marks, according to their rank, condition, and merits; and so, as his gentleman or valets may have a proportion double to the rest; more especially regarding those who constantly attended him, in all perils and dangers, in sickness and health. Likewise gives to all the orders of religious and mendicant Friars, both in Great-Yarmouth and the city of Norwich, that they may offer their prayers for his soul, a sufficient sum, according to the discretion of his executors; on condition, that the partakers thereof have no property, but depend upon the alms and charity of good christians for their support. He bequeaths the residue of his goods, &c. after all debts, legacies, and charges are cleared, to his executors hereafter named; that they may distribute them according to discretion, and so as to promote the salvation of his soul, among the fittest objects of charity; the poor, infirm, lame, blind, those confined to their beds, and who cannot maintain themselves or their family. But still to prefer his poor relations, neighbours, and those who were known to him; or where he had any lordships, manors, lands, or tenements; and for repairing of churches, in the said towns and villages; also the public roads and bridges, and other charitable uses, especially in Norfolk and Suffolk. And that, one thousand marks or pounds be laid out, within a year, upon his funeral, his legacies and other charities aforesaid. And that five hundred and thirty three pounds six shillings and eight pence, shall be laid out annually, so far as his goods, lands, &c. by sale shall amount to, till they are fully disposed of; and he exhorts in the name of Jesus Christ, that this trust be sincerely and faithfully discharged by his executors; and as he would in conscience, reason, and justice, do for them in like case; and as they will answer for the contrary at the tremendous tribunal of God. Then he constitutes William Bishop of Winchester, John Lord de Beauchamp, Nicholas Abbot of Langley, John Stokes, Doctor of Laws, Friar John Brackley, Doctor of Divinity; William Yelverton, one of the King's Judges, John Paston, Esq; Henry Filongley, Esq; Thomas Howes, Priest, and William Worcester, to be the executors of this his last Will. And the execution thereof he thus declares limited: that the said John Paston, and Thomas Howes, shall have the administration and disposition of the moveable goods, money, &c. which shall arise from the sale of his lands, and the produce thereof, and they only, to dispose of the said effects for the benefit of his soul; and none of the rest to concern themselves, in disposing of his said goods, &c. unless they are before, as it appears in the Escheats (t), being the 39th, or last year of King Henry the Vith's reign, and no less than thirty-six years beyond the extravagant retrenchment of T. Fuller (u). He was buried with great solemnity in a chapel of his own building, at the abbey-church of St Bennet at the Holm in Norwich, which was ruined at the dissolution (w); and so devoutly was he revered in the dust, that John Beauchamp, Lord of Powyke, in his last Will dated the 15th of Edward IV (x), appointed a chantry, more especially for the soul of Sir John Fastolff. In one of Mr Ashmole's choice old volumes of MSS. lately in the possession of a noble Peer, to whom we have been beholden for many extracts out of it, there is a concise character of our Worthy, written in the reign of King Henry VII, by a Knight who was then King of Arms, wherein Sir John Fastolff is called 'a rich Knight, and a grete bilder; having bilded Caster Hall in Northfolk, 'a Royal Palace in Southwork, and another in Yermouth: a speciall goode Maister to the 'Officers of Armes, and was most triumphantly brought in erthe, that I have heard of 'any man of his degre.' are requested to aid and assist them. And that none of the rest, shall sell, receive, or distribute any of his effects, without the consent of those two; nor any of them interfere in the administration while those are alive; hoping they will not refuse their aid, when it is requested. But if either of those two decline, or refuse to act and officiate, or should die before the complete execution of his Will, then he of the two, who is willing to administer, or does survive, shall associate one of the other executors, whom he thinks most fitting and capable. So, as often as one dies, or declines the trust, the other shall elect one of the rest. But where both shall refuse to act, or both die, before a substitute is chosen, then such two of the survivors, as shall have a majority of suffrages among themselves, are allowed to administer; and the two thus chosen, may, as they see occasion, consult with the Bishop of Winton, Lord Beauchamp, Abbot of Langley, Friar Brackley, Yelverton, Filongley, and William Worcester. He further appoints Thomas Archbishop of Canter- bury, Walter Bishop of Norwich, Master Robert Popy, Chancellor, and Hugh Fen, to be Supervisors of this his last Will; and desires, that the two acting executors may receive such recompence for their trouble, as the said Bishop of Winton and John Stokes, or the major part of the survivors, shall think fit. He also ordains that the supervisors of his Will, and the other executors, shall receive such reward for their trouble, as the two acting executors shall account fully proportionable thereto: and that, if any of the said executors shall obstruct, or molest the said John Pafson and Thomas Horves, in the due execution of their trust, or incur any of the offences before mentioned, they shall be discharged from having any concern therein: or if they are thus troublesome before they shall be admitted to a share in the execution, he wills and ordains, that every such delinquent shall be declared, and held, incapable of such trust, and be excluded from any share in it. Dated in the year, &c. abovementioned.

FECKENHAM (JOHN DE) the last Abbot of Westminster, was so called from his birth-place Feckenham-forest in Worcestershire, where his parents, who were poor cottagers, resided; his right name being Howman (a). Shewing in his youth a very good genius, and a strong propensity to learning, the Priest of the parish instructed him some years; and then, by his own and other persons interest, got him admitted into Evesham monastery. After having continued some time there, he was, at the age of eighteen, sent to study at Gloucester-college in Oxford; an house for students of the Benedictine Order; where the monastery just now mentioned had an apartment (b). When he had sufficiently improved himself in academical learning, he was recalled to his abbey, in order to give room for other students. That abbey being dissolved among the smaller ones, Nov. 17, 1536, he subscribed the resignation with the rest of his brethren, and had a yearly pension of an hundred florins [A] allowed him during life (c). Whereupon, returning to his studies at Oxford, he continued some years in Gloucester-college (d): and in 1539, June 11, took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (e); being then Chaplain to Dr John Bell Bishop of Worcester (f). That Prelate resigning his See [B] Nov. 17, 1543 (g), Mr Feckenham was entertained in the same quality of Chaplain, by Dr Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, with whom he continued till 1549. But Bonner being then deprived of his bishopric (h), by the Reformers; Feckenham was committed to the Tower of London [C]. Soon after, he was borrowed thence, as his own words are (i),

[A] And had a yearly pension of an hundred florins ] That is about 22 or 23 l. a year. But Br. Willis, Esq; says, it was only 10 l. per ann (1).
[B] That Prelate resigning his See ] T. Fuller says (2), that it was after his death, our author Feckenham became chaplain to Bishop Bonner: which is a mistake.—J. Stevens (3); hath run into the like, or a greater error; when he affirms, that Bishop Bell dyed in 1539: and Mr Dart also (4), when he places his death three years after 1537.—Ant. Wood more properly expresses it, in the following words: 'that Bishop giving up his place in few years after.' viz. after 1539.—Dr John Bell, as is said in the text of this article, resigned his See in 1543; and did not die till Aug. 11. 1550 (5). What induced him to this resignation, is no where expressed. He was for some time a promoter of the Reformation. But in 1543, when the act for the advancement of true religion, &c. was brought into Parliament, he did but faintly promote it, tho' he had promised Archbishop Cranmer to be strenuous therein (6). So that, either a dislike of the Reformation, or fear of danger, were the motives of this his resignation.

[C] Feckenham was committed to the Tower of London. ] The reason of his commitment is not very exactly known. Dr R. Horne, Bishop of Winchester, says, the cause of his imprisonment, was his promising first, and then refusing, to administer the Sacraments after the Protestant manner (7). But T. Stapleton, who is not much to be depended on, affirms, that it was his defending the fast of Lent, and opposing justification by faith alone; and those, he says, were the

to dispute on the chief points controverted between the Protestants and Papists. The first disputation he engaged in, was at the Savoy in the house of Francis Ruffel Earl of Bedford: the second at Sir William Cecil's in Channel-row: and the third at Sir John Cheke's in White-Friers. Thence he was carried down to Worcestershire, where he still held a benefice; and had four solemn disputations with John Hooper Bishop of the diocese: the first at Pershore during that Bishop's visitation, and the last in the cathedral of Worcester (k) [D]. After that, he was remanded to the Tower, where he continued till the accession of Queen Mary I. to the crown in 1553. But being then released, he was called to Court, and made one of the Queen's Chaplains (l). He also became again Chaplain to Bishop Bonner [E], when restored to his bishopric, which was Sept. 5, 1553 (m). And, the 25th of January following, was collated by him to the prebend of Kentish-town, in St Paul's cathedral (n). The 10th of March next ensuing, he was elected Dean of the same church, in the room of Dr William May, deprived (o): and June 20, 1554, was collated to the rectory of Finchley in Middlesex, which he held only a few months (p). But the same year, on the 23d of September, he obtained the rectory of Greenford Magna in the said county (q). Before I proceed further, I must observe, that on the 10th of February 1554, he was sent by the Queen to the Lady Jane Gray (viz. two days before her execution) to commune with her, and to reduce her from the doctrine of Christ to Queen Mary's religion, as Mr Fox expresses it (r) [F]. In April, he was one of the Disputants, at Oxford, against Archbishop Cranmer, and the Bishops Ridley and Latimer, before they were inhumanly committed to the flames, and martyred for their strict adherence to the Protestant religion: but he said very little against them (s). He had also a conference, in 1555, with one Thomas Haukes, a Protestant; whom he endeavoured in vain to bring into a belief of Transubstantiation (t): and though he appeared warm upon that occasion, yet, if a just representation is given of him, it was contrary to his natural disposition. For, all Queen Mary's reign, he wholly employed himself in doing good offices to the afflicted Protestants, from the highest to the lowest. Francis Ruffel Earl of Bedford, and Ambrose and Robert Dudley, afterwards Earls of Warwick and Leicester, tasted of his kindness: as did also Sir John Cheke. Nay he even interceded so earnestly with Queen Mary for the Lady Elizabeth's enlargement out of prison, that he incurred the Queen's displeasure for a while (u). In May 1556, the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of Doctor in Divinity, without performing any exercise; and the ensigns of that honour were ordered to be carried to him (*), being then in great esteem for his learning, piety, charity, humility, and other virtues (w). The September following he was made Abbot of Westminster-abbey, which was then restored by Queen Mary, and fourteen Benedictin Monks placed there under his government with episcopal power (x) [G]. Upon the death of Queen Mary in 1558, her successor Queen Elizabeth, not unmindful of her obligations to Dr Feckenham, sent for him [H], before her coronation, causes alledged in the register of Archbishop Cranmer; who for that reason summoned Feckenham to appear at Lambeth before several commissioners, and he persisting in his opinion, Cranmer caused him to be committed; for the truth whereof Stapleton appeals to the said register (8).

[D] And the last in the cathedral of Worcester. Some say, that J. Jewel Bishop of Salisbury was one of the opponents at this last disputation (9). But Ant. Wood thinks it is false (10). Th. Stapleton mentioning this disputation, says, Bishop Hooper acknowledged, he was thoroughly satisfied with Mr Feckenham's reasoning (11). But by this we may justly doubt of that writer's veracity. For Bishop Hooper was a man not easily satisfied in any respect, much less with so direct an opponent to that opinion, for which he afterwards suffered; and therefore it carries with it an air of too great improbability. But, notwithstanding, Reyner takes it from him, Wood from Reyner, and others from them both, without boggling at the absurdity (12).

[E] He also became again Chaplain to Bishop Bonner. And, as T. Fuller expresses it in his whimsical way, he crossed the Proverb, like master, like man; the patron being cruel, the Chaplain kind, to such who in judgment dissented from him (13).

[F] And to reduce her from the doctrine of Christ to Queen Mary's religion, as Mr Fox expresses it. Part of the communication between them, according to that author, was as follows: 'Feck. Why? what do you receive in that Sacrament? [viz. the Lord's Supper] Do you not receive the very Body and Blood of Christ? Jane. No surely, I do not so believe. I think that at Supper, I neither receive Flesh nor Blood; but Bread and Wine: which Bread when it is broken, and the Wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance, how that for my sins the Body of Christ was broken, and his Blood shed on the Cross, and with that Bread and Wine, I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his Body, and shedding of his Blood for our Sins on the Cross. Feck. Why? Doth not Christ speak these words, Take, Eat, this is my Body. Require you any plain-er words? Doth he not say, it is his Body? Jane. I grant he saith so; and so he saith, I am the Vine, I am the Door, but he is never the more the Door nor the Vine. Doth not St Paul say, He calleth things that are not as though they were? God forbid, that I should say, that I eat the very natural Body and Blood of Christ: for then either I should pluck away my redemption, or else there were two Bodies, or two Christs. One Body was tormented on the Cross, and if they did eat another Body, then had he two Bodies: or if his Body was eaten, then was it not broken upon the Cross, or if it were broken upon the Cross, it was not eaten of his Disciples, &c. (14).

[G] And fourteen Benedictin Monks placed there under his government They were brought in with some difficulty and opposition at first; for the Prebendaries of Westminster, legally settled in their places, would not resign them, till Cardinal Pole, partly by compulsion, partly by compensation, obtained their removal (15). What T. Fuller affirms in the same place, appears improbable; that 'fourteen Benedictins only could be found in England, then extant since their dissolution, which were unmarried, unpreferred to cures, and unaltered in their opinions.'

[H] Queen Elizabeth, not unmindful of her obligations to Dr Feckenham, sent for him The first messenger, it seems, found him planting those elms which are now in the Prebendaries garden; and we are told, he would not go till he had finished his plantation (16). Whether to his honour, or discredit, let the reader judge!

nation, to consult and reward him; and, as tis said, offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury, provided he would conform to the laws, but he refused (y). He appeared in her first Parliament, taking the lowest place on the Bishops form; and was the last mitred Abbat that sat in the House of Peers (z). During his attendance there, he protested and spoke against every thing tending to the Reformation. Namely, the 27th of February 1559, he dissented to the bill, For restoring the Supremacy to the Imperial Crown of this realm: March 15, to the Provisoes in the bill for restoring the First Fruits and Tenths to the Crown: March 22, to the bill for restoring the Patentees of the Bishop of Winchester's lands: April 6, to the bill, empowering the Queen, upon the avoidance of any archbishopric or bishopric, to take the Temporal Possessions thereof, and recompense them with personages inappropriate: April 17, to the bill for the Supremacy a second time; and likewise when it passed, at which time he made an elaborate speech against it: And May 5, to the bill for annexing certain religious houses to the Crown (a). He also made a long speech against the bill for the Uniformity of Common Prayer, and service in the Church (b) [I]. And offered zealously to be one of the Disputants, at the solemn conference held at Westminster, about religion, during this session of Parliament; but was not admitted (c). This strong opposition causing him to be looked upon with an evil eye, he was committed to the Tower in 1560 (d); where he continued till 1563, when he was taken thence, and put into the custody of Robert Horne Bishop of Winchester. But having written against each other about the oath of Supremacy, and now having frequent and warm disputes upon that subject [K], he seems to have had but an uneasy life there (e). And not altering his opinion, which seems to have been the end of his being put into the Bishop's hand, he was remanded to the Tower in 1564. But, soon after, through the intercession of friends, he was removed to the Marshalsea, where he had more liberty and air. Being also discharged from hence shortly after, he lived for some time in Holbourn, where he built an aqueduct (f). In 1571, he attended Dr John Story before his execution (g). We find him again in custody in the year 1574; when he was released upon bond of appearance (h). In 1578, he was in free custody with Richard Cox Bishop of Ely; whom the Queen had desired, to use his endeavours to bring Dr Feckenham (being a man of learning and temper) to acknowledge her Supremacy, and to come to church: He was induced at length to acknowledge the Queen's supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, but could never be brought to a thorough conformity (i) [L]. Soon after, the restless spirit of some of the Roman Catholicks, and the frequent attempts upon the Queen's life, obliged her, for her greater safety, to have the most eminent and active of that profession closely confined. Whereupon our author was imprisoned, among others, in Wisbich-castle in the Isle of Ely; in which town he built the cross still standing there (k). He continued a prisoner the remainder of his life; which he spent in great piety and devotion, and in works of charity and beneficence. Dying in 1585, he was buried in Wisbich church (l). He was a middle-sized man, somewhat fat, round-fac'd, beautiful, and of a pleasant aspect, affable, and engaging in conversation (+). As to his character: Mr Camden calls him a learned and good man, that lived long, did a great deal of good to the poor, and always sollicitated the minds of his adversaries to benevolence (m). T. Fuller styles him, 'a man cruel to none, courteous and charitable to all ' who needed his help or liberality (n):' Dr Burnet, 'a charitable and generous man, ' that lived in great esteem in England (o).' And Mr Dart concludes the account he gives of him in these words: ' though I cannot go so far as Reyner, to call him a martyr, ' yet judge! Sanders affirms, that the Queen would fain have had Monks in her new establishment of religion; and, therefore, she pressed Feckenham and his Monks to continue in Westminster-Abbey, and she would secure them and their possessions, provided they prayed for her, and officiated according to her laws (17). But Sanders is an author of little credit.

[I] He also made a long speech against the bill for the Uniformity of Common Prayer, &c.] Dr Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, had attributed this speech to Archbishop Hethe (18). But Mr Strype hath restored it to its true author, from a MS. in the Cottonian Library (19), and published it at length in his Annals of the Reformation (20): where he observes (21), that in this speech, Dr Feckenham made very unworthy and unbecoming reflections upon the foreign Protestants of greatest eminence, as Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, Martyr, for their different sentiments about the Sacrament; and especially upon two of our own Bishops, Cranmer and Ridley.

[K] But having written against each other about the Oath of Supremacy, &c.] What Dr Feckenham writ upon that subject, was in the time of the Parliament holden January 12. Anno 1562-3. and it was occasioned by the bill for assurance of the Queen's royal power; the Papists imagining thereupon, that commissioners should be appointed to exact from them the oath of supremacy. The title of his book was, A declaration of such scruples and stays of conscience, touching the Oath of Supremacy, as Mr John Feckenham by writing did deliver unto the Lord Bishop of Winchester, with his resolution made thereto. See below note [M]. As for the subsequent disputes between him and Bishop Horne, you have an account of them in Mr Strype's Annals of the Reformation (22).

[L] But could never be brought to a thorough conformity.] His reasons principally were these. 1. ' He did not find fault indeed with any thing set forth in the book of common service: but desired withal, ' that all the rest of the old service that was taken out, ' should be restored again; as prayer to the Saints, ' and for the dead, the seven Sacraments, and external sacrifice. 2. He would not come to Church, ' because he was not of our Church for lack of Unity; ' some being therein Protestants, some Puritans, and ' some of the Family of Love. 3. He would not conform, because he could see nothing to be fought, ' but by the spoil of the Church, and of Bishops ' Houses, and of Colleges Lands: which he said ' made many to pretend to be Puritans, seeking for ' the fruits of the Church.' These reasons he gave in writing, with his name subscribed, to Bishop Cox above mentioned (23).

[M] A List of his Works.] The few things he published, were these, 1. ' A Conference Dialogue-wife, held between the Lady Jane Dudley, and Mr John Feckenham, four days before her death, touching her faith, and belief of the Sacrament and her religion.' Lond. 1554. 8vo. and 1625. 4to. There is a thing of the like nature in J. Fox's book of Martyrs (24), intituled, the Communication had between the Lady Jane and Feckenham. 2. Speech in the House of Lords, 1553. 3. Two Homilies on the first, second, and third articles of the Creed. Lond. 4to. 4. Oratio funebris in exequiis Ducissæ Parmæ, Caroli quinti filiæ, & Belgicæ Gubernatricis. i. e. A funeral oration on the death of the Duchess of Parma, daughter of Charles V. and Governess of the Netherlands. 5. Sermon at the Exequy of Joan Queen of Spain, &c. on Deuter. xxxii. 28, 29. Lond. 1555. 8vo (25).

6. A Sermon at the funeral of Queen Mary, on Ecclesiastes iv. 2 (26). 7. ' A declaration of such scruples and staies of conscience touching the Oath of Supremacy, as Mr Feckenham delivered by writing to Dr Horn, Bishop of Winchester.' Lond. 4to. 1566. Answered by Bishop Horne in 1566. 4to. refuted by Thomas Stapleton the year following. This piece of Feckenham is printed in Reyner: who calls the Bishop's answer thereto, an impious book, and full of lies; librum impium, plenumque mendaciis. 8. Objections or Assertions made against Mr John Goughe's Sermon preached in the Tower of London, 15 January 1570. 9. Caveat Emptor. Which seems to have been a caution against buying Abbey-Lands. He had also written Commentaries on the Psalms; and a treatise of the Eucharist, against John Hooper: which were lost among other things (27).

FELL (JOHN) a learned and most excellent Bishop in the XVIIth century, and son of Samuel Fell, D. D. Dean of Christ-Church [A], by Margaret his wife, daughter of Thomas Wyld of Worcester, Esq; was born at Longworth (a) in Berkshire, June 23, 1625 (b). He received his education mostly in the free-school at Thame in Oxfordshire, and in Christ-Church Oxon. where he was admitted Student in 1636, at the age of eleven years. On the 24th of October 1640, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and that of Master June 2, 1643 (d): about which time he was in arms for King Charles I, within the garrison of Oxford, and afterwards was an Ensign. In 1648 he was turned out of his Student's place by the Parliament-Visitors, being then in Holy Orders; and from that time till the Restoration of King Charles II, he lived in a retired and studious condition, partly in the lodgings of the most famous Physician Tho. Willis his brother-in-law (e), in Christ-Church, and partly in his (f) house over-against Merton-college in Oxford; wherein he, and others (g), kept up the devotions and orders of the Church of England, and administered the sacrament and other duties to numbers of Royalists, especially Scholars that had been ejected in the year 1648 (h). After the King's Restoration he was made Prebendary of Chichester, and Canon of Christ-Church, (in the room of Ralph Button ejected) into which last he was installed July 27, 1660 (i). On the 30th of November following he was installed Dean of Christ-Church (k), being then one of his Majesty's Chaplains in Ordinary; and Doctor in Divinity (l) [B]. As soon as he was fixed in that eminent station, he earnestly applied himself to purge the college of all remains of hypocrisy and nonsense, which had but too much prevailed every where in the late times of confusion: and to improve it in all sorts of learning, as well as true religion; laying those foundations that have rendered it so famous to posterity, and will continue to make it ever flourish. Neither was he less diligent in restoring its discipline, than adorning it with magnificent buildings. For, by his own benefactions, and what he procured from others, he built the north side of the great Quadrangle [C], which had never been finished before, though

[A] Samuel Fell. D. D. Dean of Christ-Church.] He was born in the parish of St Clement-Danes, London, elected Student of Christ-Church from Westminster-School, in 1601, aged 17 years, took the Degrees in Arts, that of Master being completed in 1608, elected Proctor of the University in 1614, admitted Bachelor of Divinity the year after, and about that time became Rector of Freshwater in the Isle of Wight. In May 1619, he was installed Canon of Christ-Church, and the same year proceeded in Divinity, being about that time domestic Chaplain to King James I. In 1626, he was made Margaret-Professor, and so consequently Prebendary of Worcester, (which was about that time annexed to the Professorship) he being then a Calvinist. But at length leaving his opinion, he was, through Archbishop Laud's interest (1), made Dean of Lichfield, in 1637; and, the year following, Dean of Christ-Church, in the place of Dr Duppa (2). He was a person of a most publick spirit, as will be always remembered by the many stately works he carried on in his college; as namely, finishing the wainscote of the Choir, paving the Cathedral, and glazing the windows with painted glass, which his Predecessor Duppa had begun. He also laid out considerably on his lodgings, and completed Peckwater, and the noble staircase leading up to the hall; and began building the north side of the great Quadrangle, which he would soon have perfected: and, had not the times prevented it, endeavoured doing more. But having by his loyalty to his Prince, and zeal for the Church of England, exasperated the rebels, who sought his life, he was ejected, Anno 1647, and being threatened to be murdered, was forced to abscond, and dying heart-broken February 1, 1648 (the day he was made acquainted with the murder of his Royal Master King Charles I.) he was buried in the chancel of Sonningwell-Church near Abingdon in Berkshire, (where he had been Rector and built the front of the parsonage house) with only this short memorial, on a small lozenge of marble, laid over his grave: Depositum S. F. February 1648 (3).

[B] And Doctor in Divinity] He was created so, October 3. 1660 (4).

It was begun to be built in a manner suitable to the rest of the Quadrangle, by his father Dr Samuel Fell; and was by him, the College, and several benefactors, carried on to the top, and had all the frame of timber belonging thereunto laid. But before the inside could be finished, and the top covered with lead, the civil wars began: so it continued exposed to the weather, till the Presbyterians became masters of the University; who minding their own private concerns more than the public good, took the timber away, and employed it for their own use. But after the Restoration, Dr Fell, by his own benefaction, and those of the then Canons, though begun by the renowned Cardinal Wolsey. Next he rebuilt part of the lodgings of the Canon of the second stall, and the east side of the Chaplain's quadrangle, both which were finished in 1672; and a handsome range of buildings thereto adjoining, fronting the meadows, finished in 1677 and 1678 [D]. The next fabrick erected by his care, were the lodgings belonging to the Canon of the third stall, near the passage leading from the great Quadrangle into Peckwater; finished about the year 1674. And, finally, he built the stately tower over the principal gate of the college, begun on the old foundation (laid by Cardinal Wolsey) in June 1681, and finished in November 1682, mostly with the monies of benefactors, whose arms are carved on the stone roof of the gateway (m) [E]. He also made the elegant long walk in the meadow (n). In the years 1666, 1667, 1668, and part of 1669, he was Vice-Chancellor of the university; and whilst he continued in that office, took great care to have persons of all degrees go in their proper habits. He likewise looked narrowly to the due performance of the publick exercises in the schools; and reformed several abuses therein. That he might keep up the credit of them, and of the whole university, he frequently attended himself the disputations in the schools, the examinations for degrees, and the publick lectures of Professors; and others; and by his presence rendered them more considerable, and caused them to be better performed than they were before, or have been since (o). In a word, he was a most excellent Disciplinarian: and kept up the exercises in his own college also with great strictness; was admirable in training up youth of noble extraction, had a faculty in that peculiar to himself, and took great delight in it. Several mornings in the week constantly, he went round his college to the chambers of Noblemen and Gentlemen-Commoners, to examine and see what progress they made in their studies. No one was a greater encourager and promoter of learning in the university, and all publick works belonging thereunto, than himself; witness not only the edifices beforementioned, but also the Sheldonian Theatre, which was built chiefly by his sollicitation. He likewise advanced the press, and improved printing in Oxford in such a manner as it had been designed before by that publick-spirited person Archbishop Laud; by whom it would certainly have been effected, as well as other matters of greater concern relating to religion and learning, had not he been prevented by the iniquity of the times. He was an eager defender and maintainer of the university and its privileges, especially while he executed the office of Vice-Chancellor, and always endeavoured to advance its liberties; for which he often gained the ill opinion of the citizens of Oxford (p). So worthy and illustrious a person did well deserve to be advanced to the highest dignities in the Church: Accordingly (upon the translation of Dr Henry Compton to the See of London) he was nominated Bishop of Oxford; elected January 8, confirmed February 5, and consecrated Febr. 6, 1675-6 (q). At the same time he had leave to hold his deanery in commendam, purposely to keep him in the college, that he might do farther good therein, and in the university. No sooner was he settled in his See, but he undertook the rebuilding of the episcopal palace at Cuddesden in Oxfordshire: the outside of which was finished in 1679, and the inside soon after (r). Holding also the Mastership of St Oswald's hospital at Worcester, he rebuilt that in a sumptuous manner, bestowing all the profits of his income there, in augmenting it, and recovering its estates. And part of the revenues of his bishopric arising from the impropriation of the dissolved prebend of Banbury (s), he liberally gave five hundred pounds to repair that church; which being the largest in Oxfordshire, and much out of repair, would otherwise have fallen down. He likewise established daily prayers at St Martin's, alias Carfax, the principal city-church in Oxford, at eight in the morn-

and many generous persons that had been formerly members of the College, and of others (5), quite finished that building, for the use of two Canons; together with the part between the then imperfect building on the north side of the great gate, and the north-west corner of that Quadrangle (6). Towards this building, Dr J. Fell gave no less than five hundred and fifty pounds (7). [D] Next he rebuilt part of the lodgings of the Canon of the second Stall, and the east side of the Chaplain's Quadrangle ——— and a handsome range of buildings thereto adjoining, fronting the meadows ———] In the place where this last-mentioned range of buildings stands, Philip King, Auditor of Christ-Church, had built, about the year 1638, very fair lodgings of polished free stone. But they were burnt by carelessness, Nov. 19, 1669, and with them the south-east corner of the Chaplain's Quadrangle, besides part of the lodgings of the Canon of the second Stall, which was blown up with gun powder, to prevent the spreading of the fire towards the Library, Treasury, and Church. But they were soon rebuilt by our worthy Dean's care, particularly the east side of the Chaplain's Quadrangle, with a straight passage under it, leading from the Cloister into the field, as it now is, which was finished in 1672 (8).

[E] And, finally, he built the stately Tower over the principal gate of the College, &c.] Into this Tower he caused to be removed, Anno 1683, out of the Campanile (or steeple) in the Cathedral, the bell called Great Tom of Christ-Church; said to be brought thither with the other bells from Osney-Abbey; which Bishop Fell took care to have recast with additional metal, inasmuch, that it is now by far the biggest bell in England. Round it is this inscription: Magnus Thomas Cusius Oxonienfis, renatus April viii. MDCLXXX, regnante Carolo Secundo, Decano Johanne Oxon. Episcopo, Subdecano Gulielmo Jane S. S. Theol. Professore, Thesaurario Henrico Smith S. S. Theol. Professore, Curâ & Arte Christoferi Hodson. The dimensions of it are as follows, Diameter seven feet one inch; from the crown to the brim five feet nine inches; thickness of the striking place six inches; weight of the whole bell near seventeen thousand pounds; and of the clapper three hundred and forty two pounds; sixteen men are required to ring it. It first rung out May 29, 1684, from which time to this, it is knolled every night, a hundred and one times, agreeable to the number of Students in the College, as 'tis said; as a signal to all scholars to repair to their respective colleges and halls; and so it used to be, while it hung in the Campanile aforesaid (9).

morning, and eight at night. In a word, he expended his whole substance in works of piety and charity. Among his other benefactions to his college, it must not be forgot, that the best rectories belonging to it, were bought with his money. And as he had been so bountiful a patron whilst he lived, and as it were a second founder of that college, so he left to it at his death an estate for the maintenance of ten or more exhibitioners for ever; who are, as vacancies happen, to be elected every first day of November; when there is a publick speech spoken in the Refectory in commemoration of him (t). Thus this pious, learned, and zealous person, employed himself wholly in doing good. At length having brought his body to an ill habit, and wasted his spirits by too much zeal for the publick, and by forming too many noble designs: All these things contributed, with the unhappy turn of religion which he dreaded under King James II, to wear him quite out and shorten his life. So that he died July 10, 1686, to the great loss of learning, of the whole university, and of the Church of England (u). We may suppose that so active a man as he was, had not much time for contemplation. However, in general, what he published was excellent [F]. As to his character, besides what hath been already said of him above; He was the most zealous man of his time for the Church of England; and none went beyond him, in the performance of the rules belonging thereto. He constantly frequented divine service in publick four times a day; and had, besides, prayers twice every day in his own family. He was a person of strict morals and great virtues. In particular he was a man of a most generous spirit, undervalued money, and disbursed it so freely, upon learned, pious, and charitable uses, that he left sometimes for himself and his private use little or nothing. His charity was so great, that he was a husband to the afflicted widow, a father to the orphan, and a tender parent to poor children (w) [G]. In his episcopal capacity, he was an excellent judge of men and merits, an exemplary supervisor of his clergy, and a diligent asserter of the rights of the Church (x). To conclude his character; He was a bold and resolute man, and did not value what the generality said or thought of him, so as he could accomplish his just and generous designs: which being too many to effect was the chief cause of shortening his days (y). In this one thing he was particular, that he was no admirer of the Royal Society (z). He was buried July 13, in the Divinity-chapel, or north isle adjoining to the choir of Christ-church cathedral (a). Over his tomb, which is a plain decent marble, is an elegant inscription, composed by the learned and polite Dean Aldrich, his successor. He was never married.

[F] In general, what he published was excellent.] It is as follows. I. 'The Interest of England stated: or a faithful and just account of the aims of all parties now pretending; distinctly treating of the designs of the Roman-Catholick, Royalist, Presbyterian, Anabaptist, &c. 1659. 4to. two sheets.' But 'tis not certainly known, whether he was the author of this (10). II. 'The life of the most learned reverend and pious Dr Henry Hammond, who died April 25. 1660, &c.' Lond. 1660. 8vo. reprinted afterwards, with additions, at the head of Dr Hammond's works. III. He published, Alcinoi in Platonicam Philosophiam Introductio. Oxon. 1667. 8vo (11). IV. In laudem musicæ carmen Sapphicum. A sapphic ode in praise of music. Designed undoubtedly for some of the public exercises in the University; for a copy of it, now by me, was set to music. It is very beautiful and elegant. V. He published, Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis, duobus voluminibus comprehensæ. Oxon. 1674. fol. beautifully printed. i. e. The History and Antiquities of the University of Oxford, &c. written by Antony à Wood in English; and translated, at the charge of Dr Fell, by Mr Christopher Wake, and Mr Richard Peers, besides what he did himself. And he also was at the expence of the printing. But Mr Wood tells us, 'That Dr Fell taking the liberty of putting in and out several things, according to his own judgment, and those he employed being not careful enough to carry the whole design in their head as the author would have done; he desireth therefore, that the author might not be accountable for any thing which was inserted by him; or be censured for any useles repetitions or omissions of his agents under him (12).' At the end of it there is a Latin advertisement to the reader; containing an answer to a letter of T. Hobbes, wherein he complained, that Dr Fell had caused several things to be omitted or altered, which A. Wood had written in that book in his praise. VI. 'The vanity of scoffing; in a letter to a gentleman.' Lond. 1674. 4to. VII. He published, S. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, in Greek and Latin: with notes at the end. Oxonæ, 1677. 12mo. VIII. 'Account of Dr Richard Allestry's life.' Being the preface to the said Doctor's Sermons published by our author. IX. 'Of the Unity of the Church.' Translated from the original of St Cyprian. Oxford 1681. 4to. X. He published a beautiful edition of St Cyprian under this title, Sancti Cæcilii Cypriani Opera recognita & illustrata per Johannem Episcopum Oxoniensem. Oxon. 1682. fol. XI. He published several Sermons, as 1. 'The character of the last days,' preached before the King, on 2 Pet. iii. 3. Oxon. 1675. 4to. 2. 'A sermon preached before the House of Peers on December 22. 1680. Being the day of solemn humiliation.' Mat. xii. 25. Oxford 1680. 4to. XII. He also published, or reprinted, every year while he was Dean of Christ-Church, viz. from 1661, to the time of his death, a book, commonly a classical author, against New-year, to distribute among the Students of his house: to which books he either put an Epistle, or running notes, or corrections. FENTON (EDWARD) a bold adventurer for discoveries, an experienced seaman, and a gallant officer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was descended from an ancient family in the county of Nottingham, and had some estate there (a), which he sold, as did also his younger brother Geoffrey, afterwards Secretary of State for Ireland, being more inclined to trust to their own abilities, than the slender hereditary patrimony descending to them from their ancestors; and they were among the very small number of those, who take such daring resolutions in their youth without living to repent of them in their own old age. He was a person of very quick and lively parts, which had been improved by a good education (b), but as his brother's turn was to study and books, so his inclination led him rather to a military and active life, which induced him to court the favour, and by degrees procured him the protection, of the two potent brothers Warwick and Leicester (c). He served some time with great reputation in Ireland, but upon Sir Martin Frobisher's report of the probability of discovering a North-West Passage into the South-Seas, he resolved to engage with him in his second voyage, and accordingly was appointed Captain of the Gabriel, a bark of twenty-five tons, in which he accompanied that famous seaman in his voyage to the streights which bear his name, in the summer of the year 1577; but in their return he was separated from Sir Martin in a storm, notwithstanding which he had the good fortune to arrive safe at Bristol (d). In the third expedition undertaken in 1578, he commanded the Judith, one of the fifteen sail which composed Sir Martin Frobisher's Squadron, and had the title of Rear-Admiral (e). It is very certain that scarce any expedition was undertaken during that reign with greater expectation, or prosecuted with less effect; which misfortune put an end, for that time, to all endeavours of the like nature [A]. Captain Fenton, however, was very far from being [A] To all endeavours of the like nature.] It is a question that has been more than once started, but hardly ever discussed, why so many great attempts for discovery were made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the art of navigation was so imperfectly understood, in comparison of what it now is, and when our shipping was so inconsiderable as on all hands it is at that time allowed to have been? For this there may be various reasons assigned, such as, that it was an age of discoveries, the Spaniards and Portuguese had led the way, and almost every nation in Europe that had ships or could build them, was for making some trial, which excited that spirit of emulation, which effectually brings to light the hidden powers of genius, and this it was that enabled the English to display their natural advantages which in this respect, were many beyond other nations. Another motive was the Queen's encouragement to all enterprizes of this sort, for from the beginning of her reign, she had nothing more at heart than raising a force at sea, and besides, it was found in process of time, that there was no better method than this, of employing restless and impatient spirits, that might have been otherwise troublesome at home. A third cause was the number of gentlemen, that addicted themselves to the sea service, who from an innate spirit of generosity and activity, were most ready to set on foot and prosecute such expeditions as tended to raise their reputations, by affording them frequent opportunities of displaying both their conduct and their courage. In reference to this particular discovery of a North-West passage into the South-Seas, there were besides the general motives, some that were peculiar to those times, as for instance, this was looked upon as a point, in which the honour of England was highly interested, on account of the attempts made by the two Cabots, from whence, if it could have been perfected, we had an indubitable right to the title of first discoverers. In the next place, the great thing aimed at in those days, was to come at a share in the East-India trade, which at the time Captain Fenton made his two voyages, was altogether unknown to the English Nation, but was indeed, presently after opened to us by Sir Francis Drake. Add to all this, that a new passage was ardently desired from the difficulties, that were apprehended in proceeding by the old track of the Cape of Good Hope, which voyage its tedious length, and the great consumption made thereby amongst the seamen, had brought into discredit. A third question of as great importance as any of the rest may be moved, which is, why after all the pains taken about it, all thoughts of this discovery were laid aside even in this reign? To answer this fully would require a great deal of room, but possibly the notions contained in the following remarks of Sir William Monson, might somewhat contribute thereto (1). 'If (says he) by the North-West there be so quick a passage, and so short a way to go and come as is desired, I say, the trade in a few years will be overlaid, for as it is now by the Cape of Good Hope, since we and the Hollanders have had traffick in the East-Indies, pepper is brought from two pence to four pence there, and when it increases in price where it should lessen, and falls where it should increase, what think you in time, this voyage will come to if followed, either the one way or the other? Let us likewise consider, what needless commodities they bring from thence. I see not but this country may live as well without spices as our forefathers have done, neither are they to be had in truck of our home commodities, as cloth, lead, and tin, but if the merchant make gain by this trade, the chiefeft stock he employs must be in silver, which has, and will in time make such a dearth of money in England, as all men in general will rue it: and as I have said before, we shall have the less money, and the greater quantity of those needless commodities, if the navigation should prove short and easy. If a man will speak truly and indifferently of the trade of the East-Indies, it is not so fit for any King or Prince, as the King of Spain, who has other Indies to supply the silver that goes out of his country, then what hope have we to persevere in that voyage, who have no mines or means by traffick to bring money into this kingdom? For this, take for an infallible argument, that country which receives more commodities than it vends, the overplus must of necessity be of money: and by reason of our wasteful expence in such needless and superfluous things, as silks, lawns, spices, wine, tobacco, sugar, and a hundred such vanities, we must confess there comes in much more of these commodities, than goes out of the realm in truck for them: and then let us consider the benefit of this trade, and how long it is like to continue good for the benefit and profit of this kingdom. The mischief that is befallen us by exhaulting our silver, was foreseen long since by Charles the Fifth, Emperor, who being holding the greedy gain of the Portugueses in their trade to the East-Indies, was wont to say, they were enemies to Christendom, by carrying their treasure from Europe to enrich the heathens.' In those days such suggestions as these must have been very plausible, but we know from experience that there is nothing in them. Both the English and Dutch have prosecuted their trade to the East-Indies by the ordinary course, and have as Sir William says, carried prodigious quantities of silver to the East-Indies, but notwithstanding this, the trade has been very profitable to them, by furnishing them with vast quantities of rich goods, which they have exported and sold with large profit, convinced by this miscarriage that the design was impracticable; but, on the contrary, suggested from time to time, that the discovery of a North-west passage was a point of very great importance to the commerce and navigation of England, and might, notwithstanding former disappointments, be resumed with reasonable hopes of success. His importunate solicitations for several years, joined to the interest of his noble patron the Earl of Warwick, procured him at length another opportunity of trying his fortune at sea, and that in a way, and with a force, sufficient to gratify his ambition (f), and for the speedy execution of which he immediately betook himself, with the assistance of his friends, to make all the preparations possible. Of this voyage we have several authentick accounts, and yet it is not easy to apprehend the true design of it (g). The instructions given by the Privy-Council to Mr Fenton, and which are still preserved, say expressly, That he should endeavour the discovery of a North-West passage, but by a new route which is laid down to him, viz. he was to go by the Cape of Good Hope to the East-Indies, and, being arrived at the Moluccas, he was to go from thence to the South-Seas, and to attempt his return by the supposed North-West passage, and not by any means to think of passing the Streights of Magellan, except in case of absolute necessity (b) [B]. Notwithstanding so that the carrying out of silver, tho', at first sight, it has a ruinous appearance, is in reality a right policy, because by carrying it out we acquire the means of bringing larger quantities in. What the consequence may be to Europe in general, is another consideration, which however does not affect us, for while we thrive by the East-India trade, it would be madness, from speculative considerations, to entertain the least thoughts of restrictions. But if, by degrees, we should be rivalled in that trade, then to be sure reviving Captain Fenton's project, and trying to preserve it by a new passage, would be a measure not rational only, but requisite; neither, perhaps, is that period, which demands such a consideration, at so great a distance as some may imagine.

[B] Except in case of absolute necessity. The instructions given to Edward Fenton, Esquire, by the Right-Honourable the Lords of her Majesty's Privy-Council, were dated April the ninth 1592, and are in all appearance extremely precise (2). According to these instructions Mr Fenton is declared to be Captain-General in this expedition, the number of men to be employed therein is limited to two hundred, the gentlemen, ministers, surgeons, factors, and their servants included. The following persons were appointed to be the General's Council, viz. Captain Hawkins, Captain Ward, Mr Nicholas Parker, Mr Maddox, Mr Walker, Mr Evans, Randolph Shaw, and Matthew Talboys, and he was restrained from doing any thing of moment, without the consent of at least four of these assistants. Mr Maddox the minister was appointed Secretary, and directed to keep a fair journal-book of the meetings of this council, and of the transactions therein, which was to be presented by them at their return to the Queen. In reference to the power of punishing, there is a very large and ample provision made, which because it is more than probable, that something of the like kind was put into all instructions, and as it gives great light into the method which Sir Francis Drake took upon the discovery of a conspiracy against himself, it is more than probable the reader will be glad to see at large. This article, I the rather transcribe, because it shews how men were restrained and kept to their duty, before martial laws received the sanction of the legislature, whence it will appear, that regulations in those days were nothing less than arbitrary, and that when Queen Elizabeth, by the advice of her Council, established rules for discipline in virtue of her prerogative royal, that prerogative was a fence to the law, and secured the persons suspected, the invaluable privilege of being tried by a jury.

V. Item, If there happen any person or persons employed in this service, of what calling or condition he or they shall be, should conspire or attempt privately or publickly, any treason, mutiny, or other discord, either touching the taking away of your own life, or any other of authority under you, whereby her Majesty's service in this voyage might be overthrown or impugned, we will therefore, that upon just proof made of any such treason, mutiny, or any other discord, attempted as aforesaid, the same shall be punished by you or your Lieutenant, according to the quality and enormity of the fact.

Provided always, and it shall not be lawful either for you or for your Lieutenant, to proceed to the punishment of any person, by loss of life or limb, unless the party shall be judged to have deserved it, by the rest of your assistants as is before expressed, or at least by four of them. And that which shall concern life, to be by the verdict of twelve men of the company employed in this voyage, to be impanelled for that purpose, with the observation of the form of our country laws in that behalf, as near as you may. Provided if it shall not appear, that the forbearing of the execution by death, shall minister cause to increase the fact of the offender, then it were better to convince the party of his fact, by the oaths of twelve indifferent persons, and to commit him to hard imprisonment until the return. And as well of the facts committed by any, as also of the proof thereof, and of the opinions of you and your assistants, and the manner of the punishment, the register shall make a particular and true note in the book of your consultation as is before appointed.

He was restrained from removing Captain William Hawkins, who was to command his own ship, Captain Luke Ward, who was to command the second ship, or Captain Carlisle, who was to have the command of the land forces. As to the nature and design of the voyage, the reader will be pleased to peruse the three following articles, which will at least shew him, in what light the Privy-Council desired to represent them.

VIII. You shall make a just and true inventory in every ship and vessel appointed for this voyage, of all the tackle, munition, and furniture, belonging to them at their setting forth hence, and of all the provisions whatsoever, and one copy thereof, under your hand, and under the hands of your Vice-Admiral and Lieutenant, to be delivered to the Earl of Leicester, and the other to the Governor of the Company for them, before your departure hence; and the like to be done at your return home, of all things then remaining in the said ships and vessels, with a true certificate how, and by what means, any parcel of the same shall have been spent or lost.

IX. Item, You shall use all diligence possible to depart from Southampton, with your said ships and vessels, before the last of this present month of April, and so go on your course by Cape de buena Esperança, not passing by the streight of Magellan, either going or returning, except upon great occasion incident, that shall be thought otherwise good to you, by the advice and consent of your said assistants, or four of them at the least.

X. Item, You shall not pass to the North-Eastward, of the fortieth degree of latitude at the most, but shall take your right course to the Isles of the Malucos, for the better discovery of the North-West passage, if, without hindrance of your trade, and within the same degree, you can get any knowledge, touching that passage, whereof you shall do well to be inquisitive, as occasion in this sort may serve.

The remaining articles in these instructions are not very material, whereas, those that we have cited deserve to be well considered, since whatever the literal import standing these instructions, Sir William Monson tells us plainly, that Mr Fenton was sent to try his fortune in the South-Seas (i), and so himself understood it. In the month of May 1582, Mr Fenton left the English coast, with three stout ships and a bark. With these he sailed first to the coast of Africa, and then for that of Brazil, directly from whence he intended to have sailed for the Streights of Magellan; but hearing there that the King of Spain; who had better intelligence it seems of his project and intentions than if he had read his instructions, had sent Don Diego Flores de Valdez, with a strong fleet into the Streights to intercept him, he, upon mature deliberation, resolved to careen (k). Putting into a Portuguese settlement for that purpose, he there met with three of the Spanish Squadron, one of which was their Vice-Admiral, which he sunk after a very brisk engagement, and then put to sea in order to come home (l) [C]. His Vice-Admiral, Captain Luke import of them might be, it is pretty certain that Mr Fenton understood, that his business was to go into the South-Seas, and that by the Streights of Magellan, and, as we have hinted in the text, the Spaniards were in good time apprized of this also. It is very likely, that the scheme expressed in these instructions, was that originally proposed by this gentleman, and indeed a more probable way of finding the North-West passage could not be devised, for which reason it is not at all impossible, that this old scheme may be some time or other reviewed, revived, and carried into execution. But whatever Mr Fenton's notions might be, my Lord of Leicester was for joining a little profit with the honour, and going through the fore-door into the South-Seas, as the shortest and most likely way to find a back door out of them; in a word, our General had his small Squadron equipped, manned, victualled, and supplied with goods proper for the coasts of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, and after disposing of these, if he could find a North-West passage it would do him honour, if not, he was to get home again as well and with as much wealth as he could.

[C] In order to come home. As for the strength which Captain Fenton had under his command, it was for those times very considerable (*), consisting of two ships and two barks. The biggest of the ships was called originally the Bear, but upon occasion of this voyage was new named the Leicester Gallion, of the burthen of four hundred tons, on board of this vessel went General Fenton, having under him, Captain William Hawkins, and Mr Christopher Hall. The other ship was the Edward Bonaventure of three hundred tons, of which Captain Ward was the Commander, and the Master one Thomas Perry, the Bark Francis of forty tons, was under the command of Captain John Drake, and the Elizabeth of fifty tons had in her, Captain Thomas Skevington. They were kept upon the English coast, by foul weather and contrary winds, all the month of May, but at length they put to sea, being bound, as Captain Ward says, for China; on the third of August they came to an anchor upon the coast of Guinea, where they began to trade with some profit, then they went to the coast of Brazil, and upon enquiring of the General what course they should steer in case of being separated, it was agreed first to make the best of their way to the river of Plate, and then to the Streights of Magellan. Upon that coast they took a small vessel, with an officer or two and some Friars on board, from whom they had the first news of a Spanish Fleet in those seas, and after they dismissed them, they likewise gave the first intelligence to the Spanish Fleet of those English ships being upon that coast. On the 20th of December, a Council was held on board the Gallion Leicester, in which Captain Fenton demanded their opinions, whether, notwithstanding the Spanish Fleet was in those seas, they should continue to make the best of their way to the Streights, or whether it might not be better to winter some where else, and where? Upon this the opinions of Captain Hawkins and Captain Drake were desired, because they had passed the Streights before, but it seems, they could not well agree, and after hearing them, the Council were of opinion, that it might be very dangerous in the condition they were in, and the strength of the enemy considered, to continue their voyage to the Streights of Magellan, and that therefore it would be but prudent to put into the Port of St Vincent in Brazil, or to sail for the river of Plate, with all imaginable expedition. This produced a new consultation, as to which of those places should be preferred, and at last, after much debate, it was agreed to go to Port St Vincent, there to refit and gain intelligence, of which notice was presently given to the crews of their respective ships, that they might not apprehend the General had abandoned his design; on the 20th of January they came in sight of St Vincent, and on the 24th in the morning, there was a Council held on board the Leicester, where, upon the proposition of Captain Luke Ward, it was agreed to use the Portuguese as friends, and to make satisfaction for what they might have occasion for. The Spanish Fleet that had been sent, as well to hinder the English from passing the Streights, as to settle and build a town there (3), was prodigiously strong, consisting of no fewer than twenty three sail of large ships, with three thousand five hundred men on board, but never did a more unfortunate Fleet sail from the coast of Spain, or from any other country, for five of their largest ships with eight hundred men were lost upon their own coasts, two more were disabled, and the other sixteen arriving on the coast of Brazil wintered in the Rio de Janeiro. There he had intelligence of Captain Fenton's being at sea, upon which he resolved to proceed earlier than he intended for the Streights. But meeting with a storm, he sent three of his largest but weakest ships, with his infirm men, and most of the women on board, to remain in safety at Port St Vincent, not having the least suspicion that the English were there. These three Spanish ships attempted to enter the Port the afternoon of the same day, on which the Council was held which has been before mentioned. As these ships were very large, and had six hundred men on board, they fired upon the English immediately. General Fenton who did not expect this, and was embarrassed by his instructions, was not very hasty to engage, upon which two of the ships attacked the Edward Bonaventure very briskly, upon that the General seeing there was nothing to be done but by force, came in to her assistance, and behaved himself very gallantly till darkness put an end to the fight; the next morning it appeared, that the Spanish Vice-Admiral was sunk, and most of her crew lost, the Spaniards themselves agree that he might have sunk the other two, but he did not. After the fight the English ships put to sea, and on the 29th of January, the Edward Bonaventure lost sight of the Admiral. Captain John Drake in the Francis had been separated some time before, and sailed for the river of Plate where he lost his ship, but himself and his men got on shore. After this, General Fenton with the Leicester Gallion and the Elizabeth, sailed to Spirito Santo in Brazil, where they victualled and refitted, and then returned to England. This account is sufficient to convince the reader, of the truth of what we advanced in the former note; but if he has any scruples remaining, they will be entirely taken away by the perusal of Sir William Monson's short Relation of this expedition (4). 'In the year 1582, and two years

Luke Ward, who commanded the Edward Bonaventure of three hundred tons, was separated from the Admiral soon after the action, and perceiving no hopes of rejoining him, proceeded homewards as well as he could, and, not without enduring great hardships, and passing through many difficulties, arrived at length safely at Plymouth, towards the latter end of the month of May 1583 (m). It is from this Captain Ward that we have an account of this voyage, which seems to be very fairly and honestly written, though it does not appear that he was in any degree in the secret of the design, or acquainted with the real intentions of his Admiral, either as to trade or discovery (n) [D]. As to Capt. Edward Fenton, he too returned safely into England, and does not seem to have lost any credit by the disappointment he met with in this expedition. It may be his patrons were satisfied with his conduct, and with the reasons that he gave them for his return; which seems the more probable, since we find him at sea again in 1588, and entrusted with the command of one of her Majesty's ships. In some of the accounts of that glorious action, he is said to have commanded the Antelope (o); yet Sir William Monson (p) makes him Captain of the Mary Rose; but, in which ever ship he was, it is unanimously agreed, that he behaved like a man of honour, and had a very distinguished share in those actions, the fame of which will last as long as History remains. We know little or nothing of his future course of life, except that he spent the remainder of his days, at, or near Deptford, it may be at Says Court, afterwards the seat of Sir Richard Brown, and now in the possession of Sir John Evelyn as his descendant, where he died in the spring of the year 1603, and was buried in the parish-church at Deptford (q). A monument was there erected to his memory, by the pious care of Richard Earl of Cork who married his niece, with a suitable inscription thereon (r), which, because it is not only elegant but succinct, the reader will find in the notes [E]. It may not be amiss to observe here, that one Edward [D] Either as to trade or discovery.] What we have delivered in the last note, is from Captain Ward's journal of this voyage, which is remarkably full and clear. He tells us amongst other things, that General Fenton and his Lieutenant Hawkins could never agree, but who was in the fault does not at all appear.

Fenton

Another writer, and a man of great character (5), thinks they were all to blame, and lets us into a particular of this expedition, of which there is not a word mentioned elsewhere, and that is this, tho' other noblemen countenanced and forwarded the design, yet that noble Peer the Earl of Cumberland, was at the greatest part of the expence. The same writer says, that the expedition was ruined by General Fenton's being persuaded by some ignorant people to think of wintering in Brazil, for look, says he, and you'll find, that whoever turns but one foot back, never gets forward any more. But our business here, is to give an account of Captain Ward's return (6). As soon as he found himself parted from the Admiral, he proposed to his officers and ship's company to rejoin him, but they positively declared the thing was impracticable, and that returning to Port St Vincent was running into the mouths of the Spaniards, so that they convinced, or rather put him under the necessity, of returning home. Accordingly on the first of February they shaped their course for England, they landed on the 11th of March on the island of Fernando, where some of their men through the treachery of the inhabitants were seized on shore; however, they had the good luck to fill three casks of water which was of great consequence to them, having now but very little of that, or of any other necessaries, and were so weakly manned, that they were afraid of touching any where else. On the 27th of May they had sight of the lands end in England, and on the 29th in the morning brought the Ramhead to bear North of them, but the weather being thick and little wind, by a mistake in their sounding, they ran ashore and were in great danger of being lost in sight of Plymouth, however they were afloat again at the next tide of flood, and then came in safely. We have no farther account of Captain John Drake, except that in an engagement with the Savages, he lost five of his eighteen men, and with the other thirteen was taken prisoner. In this condition he continued fifteen months, when one Richard Fairweather, who had been master of his pinnace, persuaded him and a young man who was with him, to attempt crossing the river tho' it was nine leagues broad in a small canoe in order to get to the Spaniards; but when with much difficulty and danger they had reached the opposite shore, they were so weak and faint, that they were able to proceed no further, however meeting with some Indians, servants to the Spaniards, they gave them cloaths and meat, and a Spanish Captain being informed of their adventure, sent four horsemen to bring them to his house and there he entertained them very kindly, intending to have sent them back to Europe at his own expence; but the Viceroy of Peru, being acquainted with what had passed, sent for them, upon which Captain Drake was dispatched to Lima, but the other two men being married remained where they were (7). We will close all with this remark, that the event plainly shews, if Mr Fenton had pursued his voyage to the Streights, he might have passed them without danger, and have executed his whole design.

[E] The reader will find in the notes.] The inscription mentioned in the text runs thus (8).

To the never fading memory of Edward Fenton heretofore, Esquire of the Body to Queen Elizabeth, a gallant Commander during the troubles of Ireland, first against Shane O-Neal, and then against the Earl of Desmond, who after having explored the hidden passages of the Northern Seas, and in other hazardous expeditions visited remote and scarce known places, merited the command of a royal ship in that glorious sea fight against the Spaniards in the year 1588.

He died in the year of our Lord 1603.

The reverend Dr Fuller tells us, that this gentleman breathed his last some days after Queen Elizabeth, upon which he makes the following remark (9). Observe, by the way, how God set up a generation of military men both by sea and land, which began and expired with the reign of Queen Elizabeth, like a suit of clothes made for her and worn out with her: for Providence designing a peaceable Prince to succeed her, in whose time martial men would be rendered useless; so ordered the matter, that they all almost attended their mistress, before or after, within some short distance, unto her grave. He who considers that the famous Earl of Nottingham, Lord High-Admiral; Sir Charles Blount, Earl of Devonshire, Sir George Carew, Earl of Totness, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir William Monson, Sir Robert Mansel, and many more great officers by sea and land survived Queen Elizabeth, may possibly doubt, whether the Doctor Fenton published a book translated from the French, intituled (s), The Wonderful Secrets of Nature, collected from various authors, divided into forty-one chapters, and dedicated to the Lord Lumley; but it is generally agreed by the learned, that he was a different person from the Gentleman of whom we have been speaking; and, indeed, considering the nature of this treatise, and comparing it with the character of Captain Fenton, one cannot well doubt the truth of this opinion (t).

formed a right judgment of the intention of Providence. This is certain that the reign of that Princess stands in no need at all of rhetorical flourishes; plain language, accuracy in facts, and impartiality in relating them, will set the history of it, above any thing with which even an ingenious fancy can adorn romance. E

FENTON (Sir GEOFFREY) a learned and elegant Writer, an active and able Statesman, Privy-Counsellor, and Secretary of State in the kingdom of Ireland, during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James I. He was descended from a very ancient family in Nottinghamshire, and born in that county to a small estate, towards the middle of the XVIth century (a). We have no distinct account of the place of his education, notwithstanding which there is good reason to believe that he was very well brought up, since it is certain, that, while a young man, he gave very pregnant instances of his acquaintance with ancient and modern learning, as well as of his being perfectly versed in the French, Spanish, and Italian languages (b), as is evident from his translations, which procured him great reputation, and the countenance of several persons of great quality, being very highly esteemed (as indeed they deserved to be) at the time they were published (c) [A]. What the inducements were which engaged him to leave his

[A] At the time they were published. It cannot but be acceptable to the judicious and inquisitive reader, that we draw out of obscurity, the history of such worthy persons as have made their way to considerable posts in the government, by their polite accomplishments. Whoever consults either T. Fuller, or Lloyd who transcribed him, will find very high commendations of Sir Geoffrey Fenton, but will be at a loss to know how he deserved them, otherwise than by knowing he translated an Italian book, and became Secretary of State for Ireland. We will endeavour to set this in a better light, by giving an account of most, if not all the writings that fell from his pen, and were made publick, from which the reader will receive several hints of the motives to his advancement, which could not have been obtained any other way, and will be also enabled to form some idea of his abilities.

In order to understand this title page clearly, it is requisite to inform the reader, that the familiar Epistles of Anthony Guevara had been published in English, by one Edward Hellowes, so that this work of Mr Fenton's, consisted of such pieces of the same author as were not contained in that work. The Epistle dedicatory is, to the Right Honourable and vertuous Lady Anne, Countess of Oxenford, and is dated from the author's chamber in the Black Friars, London, February the 4th 1575. This Lady was the daughter of Sir William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, and, from the following passage in the dedication, it will appear that noble person was our author's best patron, and that one great intension of Mr Fenton in translating and publishing this work, was to testify his warm zeal and absolute attachment to that great Minister. In the first part of his dedication he sets forth the advantages, which the study of the sciences bring to those who are in an exalted station, and having done this briefly, he proceeds thus. 'These happy fruits of science and learning, raise noble personages into merit and dignity, and set to work excellent wits, to record the reputation of their greatness and virtues, dividing the doings of their life, some into warnings to avoid harms and miseries, and some into precepts the better to establish examples and draw to imitation. And as above all others of our time, your Honour hath been always right worthily noted a diligent follower of those arts and studies, which best serve to the declaration and glory of true virtue and piety; so at the contemplation of the same, I am bold to bring forth, under the protection of your Ladyship, this treatise, containing a moral discourse fortified with Philosophy and some texts of Divinity: not that I hold it worthy your view and judgment, but according to good meaning to use it as an interpreter of the devotion and service wherein I am vowed to your Ladyship, and your honourable house and parents. And wherein the intentions of the writers in these days, this is a lamentable error that they consider not those customs and good doctrines, agreeing with holy virtues and commandments of the law of God, but think it is a great testimony of their singularity and excellency, to publish under forms of speech, matter either merely vain in itself, or at least unfruitful to the use and instruction of life, I thought good by the experience of their writings, not to be so curious to set out this work with elegancy of phrase and rhetorick, as to exhibit precepts to live well, joining to that small eloquence of words, I have used a diligence withal to dress and institute conversation and manners, the same being the direct line that leads to virtue, which without this, is but the figure and image of that it ought to be. Wherein having respect to modesty, I am far here from meaning to challenge the labours of others, and much less seek to obtrude upon mine own any dignity or merit, but refer me and my travel to the opinion of your Ladyship, whom I humbly beseech, as touching the order and parts of art in the book, to judge them with that property of favour, which is wont to construe nothing to blame, and for the texts and precepts, whether moral, civil, or of divinity, your Ladyship, in all the works you shall read, cannot find better doctrine than in the life of your honourable father, in whose manner and actions is fulfilled a more full example of virtue, than in all the rules and similitudes which my pen can deliver. And as stones of rare and precious price, express their lustre better in gold than in any other metal; so good and well qualified discourses are holden so much the more noble and dear, by how much are worthy and excellent the persons to whom they are presented, the dignity of the one supporting and amplifying the nobility of the other. And as trees transplanted or removed out of their natural stock into a better, become both more fair and goodly to behold, and yield a fruit more pleasing his own country in order to serve the Queen in Ireland, cannot, at this distance of time, be recovered; it is however certain that he went thither well recommended, and that being in particular favour with Arthur Lord Grey, then Lord-Deputy in that kingdom, he was sworn of the Privy-Council about the year 1581 (d). It is more than probable that his interest might be considerably strengthened by his marriage with Alice, the daughter of Dr Robert Weston, some time Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and Dean of the Arches in England, a man of great parts, and who had no small credit with the Earl of Leicester (e), and other Statesmen in the Court of Queen Elizabeth; and when he was once fixed in his office of Secretary, his own great abilities and superior understanding made him so useful to succeeding Governors, that none of the changes to which that government was more than enough subject in those days, wrought any alteration in his fortune (f). One thing indeed might greatly contribute to this, which was the strong interest he found means to raise, and never was at a loss to maintain, in England; so that whoever was Lord-Deputy or Lord-Lieutenant in Ireland, Sir Geoffrey Fenton continued Queen Elizabeth's Counsellor there, as a man upon whom she depended, from whom she took her notions of the state of affairs in that island, and whose credit with her was not to be shaken by the artifices of any faction whatever (g). He it was that infused into the Queen's breast that strong aversion to Hugh O-Neile, whom she had created Earl of Tyrone, and who, notwithstanding that and numberless other obligations, remained ever a faithless rebel to the Queen, and an implacable enemy to the English nation. He it was that persuaded the Queen, that the Irish were to be held in obedience by doing them, on all occasions, strict justice; but never to be won to a loyal affection for her government, by unnecessary acts of indulgence. He it was that convinced her, the safety as well as glory of her government in that island, depended upon the flourishing of the English interest, as this again must do, upon the security which the English inhabitants had of enjoying their property under the protection of the laws, and without being exposed to the caprices of great men, who might entertain too high notions of their own authority (h). The sense that wise Princess had of Sir Geoffrey Fenton's wisdom and fidelity, induced her to send for him frequently over into England, that she might receive full and true accounts of the state of things in Ireland, and take thereupon such measures, as appeared to her and her Council most expedient. Of this we have a very singular instance in the year 1585 (i), of which the reader will find an account at the bottom of the page [B]. But notwithstanding Sir Geoffrey's sentiments in respect to Tyrone, several

' the taste; in like sort a work of learning, drawn out of his proper author, and recommended to some noble and vertuous personages, becomes so much the better received, and with a fruit more liked, by how much it is incorporate in the virtues and name of an excellent patron. In which respect knowing that there shines in your Ladyship, a virtue of learning and judgment, as doth the pearl in the gold, and that your mind is divinely inclined to the contemplation of vertuous studies, I beseech you let this be admitted amongst the publick monuments of your virtue, tho' far unworthy of your noble desire, yet being covered with the wings of your authority and name, it may be holden so much the more perfect and plausible, by how much it is an imp grafted in the foil of your greatness, and enriched with the gold of your name and virtues, referring the faults rather to the infirmity of my skill and knowledge, than to my desire and will, which is wholly dedicated to the service of your right honourable father and his house.'

IV: The History of the Wars of Italy, by Francis Guicciardini, in twenty books. Lond. 1599, folio.

This work is dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, and the dedication bears date January the seventh, 1578, from the author's chamber near the Tower of London. By comparing these two last dates it seems highly probable, that, in the edition which is now common, there is a new title page, and that, in reality, the book was published in 1579. He mentions his having wrote other pieces in his Epistle Dedicatory, as to which some writers express great uncertainty, but it is probable they are those abovementioned; nor is it unlikely that Lord Burleigh advised him to go to Ireland, where that most vigilant Minister never wanted some person in his confidence, who sent him from time to time advices of the true state of that country.

[B] At the bottom of the page.] In order to justify what has been said in the text, and to satisfy the reader of the great favour which Sir Geoffrey Fenton enjoyed in the English Court, through the recommendation of his patron the Lord Burleigh, we will cite but one passage, from many that might be quoted, from the Irish History (1). 'But Secretary Fenton, who was one of the best servitors the Queen had in Ireland, and much confided in by her Majesty, or, as others word it, was a moth in the garments of all the Deputies of his time, was frequently, as at this time, sent for into England, to inform the Queen of the true state of that kingdom. What discovery he made of the miscarriages of the government I do not find, but they may be easily traced from the instructions he carried back, which bore date in December 1585, and were to this effect: That the Lord-Deputy, and the late Justices and Officers of the Exchequer, should answer. 1. What became of the fines, recognizances, forfeitures, wards, marriages, and reliefs, belonging to her Majesty, and of what value they were, since March 1579, and by whose warrants were they respectively given, pardoned, or disposed of. 2. What leases have been made of the crown lands in that time, with, or without, fine, and what fine, what rent? 3. What debts were due to the Queen at Michaelmas 1579, or since, and by whose fault they remain unlevied? 4. That the faulty officers may be suspended, and the recoverable debts immediately levied, and a list of the desperate debts returned. 5. What debts have been remitted on account of the land being wasted, and what proof there was of such waste. 6. What profits and casualties have been answered on Sheriffs accounts since Michaelmas 1579, and what sums have been by warrants called Mandamus's divided amongst the Barons and Officers of the Exchequer, &c. Besides these, he had other instructions to communicate to the Deputy, viz. that since the kingdom was in peace, some of the army, being 1900 strong, might be discharged. 2. That the Deputy should certify, whether it were better to give the soldiers sterling pay and no victuals, in which case he is to take nothing from the country without payment at such reasonable rate, as the government shall assess, or to continue victuals, and the old Irish pay, for the Queen will no longer allow both victuals and the encreased pay. 3. That the contribution several of the chief Governors of Ireland, and some of the most considerable men there were inclined to favour him, and to procure repeated acts of pardon for his repeated treasons, and notwithstanding these were, by constant experience, found altogether ineffectual, yet General Norris, who was Lord-President of Munster, and sent over on purpose to reduce him, procured a commission from the Queen directed to himself and Sir Geoffrey Fenton, dated May 9, 1595, empowering them to make a final treaty with the rebels (k). Accordingly, on the 24th of April 1596, they concluded such a treaty with the Earl of Tyrone, who promised submission, swore obedience, and had a full pardon granted him, dated the 12th of May (l). Soon after this, General Norris and Secretary Fenton were appointed Commissioners to settle the province of Connaught, in which they were very successful (m); but had not the same good fortune in a renewed conference with Tyrone, who was again in rebellion, and with whom, at the request of General Norris, they entered into a fresh negotiation (n). In this strange situation the affairs of Ireland continued, or rather grew worse and worse, till the great Earl of Essex was sent over Lord-Lieutenant, and sworn into that high office April 15, 1599 (o). He soon fell into the old track of negotiating with the rebels he was sent to subdue, which proved his ruin (p). Upon his return to England, which was followed by the death of Sir Thomas Norris Lord-President of Munster, the affairs of that island became in a manner desperate, but soon changed their appearance upon the coming over of Charles Lord Montjoy, with the title of Lord-Deputy, and Sir George Carew who was appointed President of Munster (q). With these noble persons Sir Geoffrey Fenton entered into a strict friendship, and, at their request, came over to England in the summer of 1600, in order to procure the necessary supplies of men and money for the service in Ireland, and his credit in England was so great, that he very speedily obtained all that he could reasonably expect, two thousand old troops being that very year sent into Ireland (r), which vigorous measure was quickly followed by the extinction of the rebellion, and total reduction of the kingdom (s): Upon the return of Sir Geoffrey Fenton into Ireland, he contributed as much as in him lay to the settling of publick affairs, and to the strengthening the English Protestant interest, in which he proceeded with great success, notwithstanding the Irish were well enough inclined to have revolted upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, if their late losses, their terror of the Lord-Deputy Montjoy, and Tyrone's having surrendered himself, had not rendered such an attempt extremely dangerous, or rather absolutely impracticable (t). In 1603, that noble person being constituted Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, had leave given him to come over to England, Sir George Carew, afterwards Earl of Totness, being sworn Lord-Deputy in his absence (u). At this time Sir Geoffrey Fenton married his only daughter Katherine to Mr Boyle, afterwards the great Earl of Cork (w), which proved to him a of 2100 l. per annum in lieu of cess, purveyance, &c. be revived. 4. That Captain Norris be made Vice-President of Munster, with all the usual allowance, except the salary of two hundred marks per annum, which must be reserved for his brother the Lord President, and that the Vice-President's pension of twenty shillings a day be immediately stopped. 5. That the Queen's orders be publickly read in Council, except they require secrecy, and then to be communicated to such of the English Council as are ordinarily attending on the state. 6. That all offices be given to fit persons, who are personally to officiate, except in special cases. 7. That the courts be removed out of the castle. 8. That the Secretary of State keep the signet, as in England, and that he make all bills, warrants, and writings, that require signature, and that he keep a register thereof, and have his fees for the same. 9. That the Parliament being ended, Ulster might be so settled that the Deputy might repair into Munster, to watch the motions of Spain. 10. That suspected persons be secured, and that the suspected inhabitants in towns be disarmed, and that the loyal townsmen be armed and disciplined, and that those that were lately rebels be enjoined to keep at home; and if the Spaniards land, that the forage be destroyed, and the cattle removed up into the country. The Queen also gave Secretary Fenton particular instructions about the plantation of Munster, and devised a plot to this effect: that the undertaker for twelve thousand acres should plant eighty six families upon it, viz. his own family should have sixteen hundred acres, one chief farmer four hundred acres, two good farmers six hundred acres, between them; other two farmers two hundred acres a piece, fourteen freeholders each three hundred acres, forty copyholders each one hundred acres, and twenty six cottagers and labourers eight hundred acres, between them; and so proportionably for a lesser signiory: and she ordered, that, if any unforfeited lands be intermixed with the forfeited, that the party should be compounded with to his content, and bought out, that so the undertaker might have his manor entire; and she also ordered a better survey to be made of the escheated lands, for the direction of the commissioners in setting them out to the undertakers.' It is very probable, that these marks of confidence in the Secretary were not highly pleasing to the chief governors in Ireland, but it was what the Queen could not well avoid, many of the governors being much more concerned how to promote their own power, and augment their own fortunes, than to reduce the rebels, and extend the Queen's authority, which if they had steadily pursued, might certainly have been brought to pass (2). We are told, that Sir William Fitzwilliams, who was many times Chief Governor of Ireland, by different titles, behaved there always extremely well, except when he was last in power, which is ascribed to a very indiscreet expression of a great Minister, upon his soliciting some reward from the Queen for his many years services in Ireland, who told him that his demand was ill founded, for the government of Ireland was not considered as a service but as a preferment (3). Sir William having had time to reflect upon this court notion, he carried it into execution when he went over the last time in 1588, with the title of Lord-Deputy; so that we need not wonder that grounds of complaint were continually found against these great men, and transmitted into England, where, if supported by proofs, they were sure of being heard and redressed. One thing appears much to the honour of Sir Geoffrey Fenton, which is, that, in the distribution of that vast plantation of Munster, when large estates cost little more than the asking for, he desired none for himself; neither was he in that commission granted in the year 1587, which gave such offence to the Lord-Deputy Fitzwilliams, but contented himself with discharging the duties of his own office, except, when by her Majesty's, or the chief governor's, command, he was put upon other services.

source of great satisfaction, though he did not live to see his son-in-law reach the zenith of his fortunes, but he saw him entering the road to the highest preferments, and, what must have added to his pleasure, saw this in some measure owing to his own interest and powerful recommendation [C]. His known zeal and great services secured him a sufficient interest in the new Court, and upon the coming over of Sir Arthur Chichester to exercise the office of Lord-Deputy of Ireland in 1604, Sir Geoffrey Fenton found a new friend, who had as great confidence in him (x) as his two predecessors; so that in full possession of his credit and authority, and, with a very fair prospect in respect to the happiness of his posterity, he paid that great debt which all men must pay, at his house in Dublin, October 19, 1608 (y), and with much funeral solemnity was interred at the cathedral church of St Patrick, in the same tomb with his wife's father the Lord Chancellor Weston (z), leaving behind him the character of a polite Writer, an accomplished Courtier, an able Statesman, and a true friend to the English nation, and Protestant interest in Ireland. At the time of his demise Sir Geoffrey Fenton left a son, Sir William Fenton, who survived him several years, but whether he left any posterity or not is more than, at this distance of place and time, we are able to determine.

[C] To his own interest and powerful recommendation. We have in another part of this work touched upon this matter, and of what fame has whispered of the secrets that were between these two great men, who certainly were not more closely related by alliance, than by their tempers, and the maxims which governed their respective conducts (4). We reserved however for this note, some very curious passages in the Earl of Cork's (5) True Remembrances. After setting down his voyage to England, of which an account is given in the article relating to his life, he proceeds thus. Then I returned into Ireland with my Lord-President's licence to repair to Court, where in his way to Dublin where he proposed to embark, he dealt very nobly and father-like by me, in persuading me it was high time for me to take a wife, in hopes of posterity to inherit my lands, advising me to make choice of Sir Geoffrey Fenton's daughter, and that if I could affect her, he would treat with her parents to have the match between us, wherein he prevailed so far as the 9th of March 1602, I was in his Lordship's presence contracted to her in her father's house at Dublin. The 25th of July 1603. I was married to my second wife, Mrs Katherine Fenton, the only daughter of Sir Geoffrey Fenton, Principal Secretary of State, and Privy-Counsellor in Ireland, with whom I never demanded any marriage portion, neither promise of any, it not being in my consideration; yet her father, after my marriage, gave me one thousand pounds in gold with her. But that gift of his daughter unto me, I must ever thankfully acknowledge as the crown of all my blessings, for she was a most religious, virtuous, loving, and obedient wife unto me all the days of her life, and the happy mother of all my hopeful children, whom with their posterity I beseech God to bless. — I Richard Earl of Corke, was knighted by Sir George Carew, Lord-Deputy of Ireland at St Mary's Abbey near Dublin, the 25th of July 1603, being St James's day, and the very day that I was married to my second wife, Mrs Katherine Fenton. I was sworn a Privy-Counsellor to King James for the province of Munster, at the Council-table at Dublin, by the Lord Chichester, then Lord-Deputy of Ireland, the 12th of March 1606, with commandment from the Lord-Deputy and council to Henry Dunkard, then Lord-President of Munster, to admit me into that council, who upon former direction from this state had refused either to swear or admit me a Counsellor of that province. In the life-time of Sir Geoffrey Fenton, there were born of this marriage a son Roger, and a daughter Alice, the Earl of Corke named his third son Geoffrey after his grandfather but he died young, the Countess of Cork dying in 1629, she was buried in the choir of St Patrick's church in Dublin, in the same tomb with her father and grandfather. FERRARS (GEORGE) a learned Lawyer, a grave Historian, a celebrated Poet, and a most accomplished Courtier, in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. He was descended from an antient family seated in Hertfordshire (a), and was born there in a village not far from St Albans about the year 1510 (b). He was bred at the university of Oxford, but in what particular Hall or College, even the most indefatigable Anthony Wood himself, has not, with all his industry, been able to discover (c). He removed from thence to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himself with such vigour and diligence to the study of the Laws, as very soon rendered him eminent in his profession (d), so that he made a considerable figure in Westminster-Hall as an Advocate, at the same time that he was much admired in the Royal Court for his sprightly wit and good breeding. His first rise in his profession, and at Court, was owing to the King's great Minister Cromwell Earl of Essex, who was himself a man of great parts and strong passions, rose purely by his abilities, and countenanced men of capacity as long as he continued in favour; neither does it appear that his misfortunes affected them in their progress at Court, but in the business of equity it happened otherwise, and it seems such as had his countenance, were not so fortunate with respect to his successors, which was the case of Mr Ferrars (e). He was the King's menial servant, whom he attended in war as well as peace, and served, not with his pen only, but his sword; in short, he was a very gallant man in all the senses of the word, which entitled him to so large a share in that Monarch's favour, that, to manifest his affection for him, he made him a very considerable grant in his own native county, and that out of his proper and private estate (f) [A]. lity, our author was descended; and it is also very likely, that he had himself an estate in this county, descended to him from his ancestors, before King Henry the Eighth made him a grant of the manor of Flamstead. This place is by some writers supposed to have been antiently called Verlamsted (1), from the river 1535, and yet within seven years afterwards, either through want of œconomy, or by too great confidence in his friends, he seems to have brought his affairs into a very untoward situation, which might perhaps be one reason, why he procured himself to be chosen a Member for the borough of Plymouth in the county of Devon (g), in the Parliament summoned to meet at Westminster on the twenty-second of January, in the thirty-third year of that King's reign, where, during the sessions, he had the misfortune to be taken in execution, by an officer belonging to the Sheriffs of London, and carried to the Compter, then in Breadstreet (b), the news of which being carried to the House of Commons occasioned such a disturbance there, as not only produced his discharge (i), but a settled rule with respect to privilege; which, with the proceedings therein before the King, Lords, and Commons, make his case not only extremely curious and entertaining, but of great use and importance, for which reason it will be found at the bottom of the page [B]. But notwithstanding

However this matter may be, it is certain, that it was part of the possessions of the Monastery of St Alban's in the time of Edward the Confessor, and was granted by Leofstane, Abbot of that Monastery, to three Knights, to defend the country from thieves (3). It was taken from them by William the Conqueror, and given to Ralph de Tony (4), or as it is in Domesday book, de Todeney, who was standard-bearer to that Prince at the battle of Hastings, and continued in his family, till, through the failure of heirs male, it came by the marriage of Alice Tony into that of the Beauchamps, Earls of Warwick, and, with the rest of their lands, was held by Richard Nevil, Earl of Warwick, in right of Anne his wife; from her it was taken by Act of Parliament, and settled upon her two daughters, Isabel and Anne, the former married to George Duke of Clarence, and the latter to Richard Duke of Gloucester (5), afterwards King Richard the Third; but, in the third year of King Henry the Seventh, the old Countess of Warwick was restored to her whole estate by a new Act of Parliament, with power to alienate the same, or any part thereof, and she conveyed it to the King, entailing it upon the issue male of his body, with the remainder to herself and her heirs (6), and it continued in the Crown, till, as we have mentioned in the text, it was granted by King Henry the Eighth to George Ferrars, Esq; and his heirs, and in their line it continued, till, by the marriage of Catherine Ferrars, it came to Thomas Lord Viscount Fanshawe of the kingdom of Ireland, by whom it was sold to Edward Peck, Serjeant at Law (7). This manor has Court Leet and Baron, consists of between six and seven hundred acres of demesne, and several copyholds, fineable at the will of the Lord; so that it was a very considerable grant in point of profit, exclusive of the pleasantness of its situation, and the wholesomeness of its air, for which it is deservedly famous.

[B] At the bottom of the page.] A certain author has given us a very large account of this whole affair, under the title of Ferrer's case (8), without any mention of the author from whom it is taken, and also with some omissions; we will therefore set it down exactly here. For if it deserved to take up so much room (as certainly it did) in a general history of England (9), the more reason there is that it should be fully and truly stated in such an article as this. In Hollinshed it stands thus:

In the Lent season, whilst the Parliament yet continued, one George Ferrars, gentlemen, servant to the King, being elected a burges for the town of Plymouth in the county of Devonshire, in going to the Parliament house, was arrested in London by a process out of the King's-Bench, at the suit of one White, for the sum of two hundred marks or thereabouts, wherein he was late afore condemned, as a surety for the debt of one Weldon of Salisbury; which arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Moils, Knight, then Speaker of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgeses, their order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called St. John, should forthwith repair to the Compter in Breadstreet, whither the said Ferrars was carried, and there demand delivery of the prisoner.

The Serjeant, as he had in charge, went to the Compter, and declared to the Clerks there what he had in commandment. But they, and other officers of the city, were so far from obeying the said commandment, as, after many stout words, they forcibly resisted the said Serjeant, whereof ensued a fray within the counter gates, between the said Ferrars and the said officers, not without hurt of either part, so that the said Serjeant was driven to defend himself with his mace of arms, and had the Crown thereof broken by bearing off a stroke, and his own man stricken down. During this fray the Sheriffs of London, called Rowland Hill and Henry Suckliffe, came thither, to whom the Serjeant complained of this injury, and required of them the delivery of the said Burgeses as afore. But they, bearing with their officers, made little account either of his complaint or of his message, rejecting the same contemptuously, with much proud language, so as the Serjeant was forced to return without the prisoner; whereas, if they had obeyed authority, and shewed the service necessarily required in their office and person, they might, by their discretion, have appeased all the broil, for wisdom asswageth the outrage and unrestrainable furiousness of war, as the Poet saith,

The Serjeant, thus hardly intreated, made return to the Parliament house, and finding the Speaker and all the burgeses set in their places, declared unto them the whole case as it fell, who took the same in so ill part, that they altogether, of whom there were not a few, as well of the King's Privy-Council, as also of his Privy-Chamber, would sit no longer without their Burgeses, but rose up wholly, and repaired to the Upper House, where the whole case was declared by the mouth of the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audley, Knight, then Lord-Chancellor of England, and all the Lords and Judges there assembled, who judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the order of the Common House. They returning to their places again, upon new debate of the case, took order, that their Serjeant should repair to the Sheriff of London, and require delivery of the said Burgeses without any writ or warrant had for the same, but only as afore. And yet the Lord-Chancellor offered them to grant a writ, which they of the Common house refused, being in a clear opinion, that all commandments, and other acts of proceeding from the Nether House, were to be done and executed by their Serjeant without writ, only by shew of his mace which was his warrant. But before the Serjeant's return into London, the Sheriffs, having intelligence how heinously the matter was taken, became somewhat more mild, so as, upon the said second demand, they delivered the prisoner without any denial. But the Serjeant having then further in commandment from those of the Nether House, charged the said Sheriffs to appear personally on the morrow by eight of the clock, before the Speaker, in the Nether House, and to bring thither the Clerks of the Compter, and such officers as were parties to the said fray; and, in like manner, to take into his custody the said White, which wittingly procured the said arrest, in contempt of the privilege of the Parliament.

Which commandment being done by the said Serjeant, accordingly, on the morrow, the two Sheriffs, with one of the Clerks of the Compter, which was the standing the solemnity of this judgment, there have not been wanting some who have questioned the validity, or at least the equity of it, and these have suggested, that there were some private and particular reasons, which induced the King and the House of Lords to suffer things to be carried so very high upon this occasion (k); neither have there been wanting some, even of the great Sages of the Law, who have publickly expressed their doubts upon his case (l); notwithstanding which it has continued to be taken for a precedent, though it has been very seldom mentioned, but those suggestions and these opinions have been mentioned likewise [C]. He continued in high favour with King Henry the chief occasion of the said fray, together with the said White, appeared in the Common House, where the Speaker charging them with their contempt and misdemeanor aforesaid, they were compelled to make immediate answer, without being admitted to any counsel, albeit, Sir Roger Cholmley, then Recorder of London, and other of the council of the city there present, offered to speak in the cause, which were all put to silence, and none suffered to speak but the parties themselves, whereupon, in conclusion, the said Sheriffs, and the same White, were committed to the Tower of London, and the said clerk, which was the occasion of the fray, to a place there called Little Ease; and the officer of London which did the arrest, called Tailour, with four other officers, to Newgate, where they remained from the eight and twentieth, until the thirtieth of March, and then they were delivered, not without humble suit made by the Mayor of London, and other their friends.

And for so much as the said Ferrers, being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by privilege of Parliament, was not by law to be brought again into execution, and so the party, without remedy for his debt, as well against him as his principal debtor. After long debate of the same by the space of nine or ten days together, at last they resolved upon an Act of Parliament to be made; and to revive the execution of the said debt against the said Weldon which was principal debtor, and to discharge the said Ferrers. But before this came to pass, the Common House was divided upon the question; howbeit in conclusion the act passed for the said Ferrers, by fourteen voices.

The King then being advertised of all this proceeding, called immediately before him the Lord Chancellor of England and his Judges, with the Speaker of the Parliament, and other of the gravest persons of the Nether House, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect: First commending their wisdoms in maintaining the privileges of their House, which he would not have to be infringed in any point; he alledged, that he being head of the Parliament, and attending in his own person upon the business thereof, ought, in reason, to have privilege for him and all his servants attending there upon him. So that, if the said Ferrers had been no Burgefs, but only his servant, yet, in respect thereof, he was to have the privilege as well as any other. For I understand, quoth he, that not only for your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your cooks and horse keepers, enjoy the said privilege; insomuch, as my Lord Chancellor here present hath informed us, that he being Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and, in execution upon a statute of the staple. And for so much as the said Cook, during all the Parliament, served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by the privilege of the Parliament. And further we be informed by our Judges, that we at no time stand so highly in our Estate Royal, as in the time of Parliament, wherein we, as head, and you, as members, are conjoined and knit together into one body politick, so as, whatsoever offence or injury during that time is offered to the meanest member of the House, is to be judged as done against our person, and the whole Court of Parliament. Which prerogative of the Court is so great (as our learned Council informeth us) as all acts and processes coming out of any other inferior courts, must, for the time, cease, and give place to the highest. And touching the party, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our servant to be one of this House, and being warned thereof before, would, nevertheless, prosecute this matter out of time, and thereupon was well worthy to have lost his debt, which I would not wish; and therefore do commend your Equity, that having lost the same by Law, have restored him to the same against him who was his debtor. And if it be well considered, what a charge it hath been to us and you all, not only in expence of our substance, but also in loss of time, which should have been employed about the affairs of our Realm, to sit here welnigh one whole fortnight about this one private case, he may think himself better used than his desert. And this may be a good example to others, to learn good manners, and not to attempt any thing against the Privilege of this Court, but to take their time better. This is mine opinion, and if I erre I must refer myself to the judgment of our Justices here, and other learned in our Laws.

Whereupon Sir Edward Montacute, Lord Chief Justice, very gravely told his opinion, confirming, by divers reasons, all that the King had said, which was assented unto by all the residue, none speaking to the contrary. The act, indeed, passed not the Higher House, for the Lords had not time to consider of it, by reason of the dissolution of the Parliament, the feast of Easter then approaching. Because this case hath been diversly reported, and is commonly alledged as a precedent for the privilege of the Parliament, I have endeavoured myself to learn the truth thereof, and to set it forth, with the whole circumstance at large, according to their instructions who ought best both to know and remember it.

[C] Have been mentioned likewise.] As, in the foregoing note, the reader is in full possession of the case, we shall in this discuss what has been observed thereupon by some very eminent writers; and first, let us observe, that a modern Author (10), whose eminent skill in our histories and antiquities have very justly gained him a high reputation, makes some very bold remarks upon these proceedings, which we will report in his own words. 'From this time the power and privilege of the House of Commons took a progressive increase, and this precedent was gained by the King's want of an aid, who, at that time, expected the Commons would voluntarily offer him a subsidy, the Ministry in the House of Lords knowing the King's Will, gave the Commons the compliance to punish those that imprisoned one of their members.' These are facts, and it is to be wished that some authority had been suggested in support of them. It is true, our author seems to have been led by his reading, what another person reports as the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice Dyer, we shall come to that hereafter, but, in the mean time, we will endeavour to explain what is hinted at above from the works of a noble Historian (11). 'During this session of Parliament some wrong was offered, as our histories say, to their antient privileges; a Burgefs of theirs being arrested: whereof the King understanding, not only gave way to their releasing him, but punishment of the offenders, insomuch, that the Sheriffs of London were committed to the Tower, and one delinquent to a place called Little Ease, others to Newgate. By which means the King, whose master piece it was to make use of his Parliaments, not only let foreign Princes see the good intelligence betwixt him and his subjects, but kept them all at his devotion: which also he so industriously procured, that rather than he would seem to require more at this time than they had lately given, he borrowed divers sums of money of men above fifty pound yearly in his books, which he looked on often, giving them in lieu thereof Privy-Seals, as security for their repayment in two years; by this means, suffering his Parliament rather to take notice

Henry all his reign, and seems to have stood upon good terms with the Lord Protector Somerset, in the beginning of the reign of Edward VI, since it appears that he attended the Protector, in quality of one of the Commissioners of the army, in his expedition into Scotland in 1548 (m), which perhaps might be owing to his being about the person of Prince Edward in his father's life-time, and consequently one for whom that young Prince had a singular kindness [D]. Another instance of this happened about four years afterwards, of his wants than to supply them, which yet served to prepare them for his next occasion. We have the same thing, tho' in fewer words, set down by Stowe, who tells us, that the Sheriffs were obliged to pay twenty pounds for their fees, before they were discharged; and that, in May following, the King took a Loan of all such as were rated at fifty pounds and upwards in the subsidy book.' We will now proceed to what has been alledged as the sentiment of the Lord Chief Justice Dyer (12), who lived in those days, and whose authority, in a point of this nature, would be of the greatest weight. 'It was said by Dyer, that if a man be condemned in debt or trespass, and is chosen one of the Burgeses or Knights of Parliament, and afterwards is taken in execution, he cannot have the privilege of Parliament, and so it was held by the judges of the Law in the case of one Ferrers, in the time of King Henry the Eighth; and tho' the privilege at that time was allowed him, yet it was unjust.' But suppose, after all this, we should resort to Sir James Dyer himself, and in his Reports we shall find, that in the thirty-sixth of Henry the Eighth, there was a case in the King's Bench, which brought the matter of Parliamentary privilege into question, and that case was this (13). One Trewynard was taken upon an Exigent, at the suit of one Skewis, and being in execution, a writ of privilege issued from the Parliament to R. Chamond, then Sheriff of Cornwall, reciting, that Trewynard was a Burges, and therefore entitled to the privilege of Parliament; in obedience to which writ the said Sheriff, in the time of the last session of the last Parliament, held in the thirty-fifth of the King, suffered him to go at large, and, upon this, an action of debt was brought by the said Skewis against the said Chamond. 'In this case three points are to be considered, first, whether privilege is to be granted to a Burges of Parliament, taken upon a writ of execution; secondly, if the privilege be grantable, whether the party, so enlarged, is discharged of the execution for ever, or only during the time of the Parliament: and, thirdly, admitting that the privilege is not allowable in this case, yet, whether the Sheriff, by this writ, issuing from the Parliament, shall be held sufficiently excused and discharged against the Plaintiff, in debt?' In reasoning on the first head, he observes, 'that it seems the privilege is allowable; for the proof of which he says, it is necessary to consider the state of Parliaments, which consists of three parts; the King, as the chief head; the Lords, as the principal members of the body; and the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses, as the inferior members; he next mentions the ceremony and solemnity attending elections; and then goes on thus: after that the members are returned, their attendance is so necessary to the Parliament, that they ought not, for any business, to be absent; and no one person can well be missed, for that he is a necessary member, and therefore if any die before the Parliament, a new one shall be chosen in his place, so that the entire number may not fail; and then, it follows, that the person of every such member ought to be privileged from arrest at the suit of any particular person, during the time that he is busied in the affairs of the King and the Realm; and such privilege has usually been granted at all times by the King to the Commons, at the request of the Speaker of the Parliament, the first day, &c. Common reason will persuade, that, for as much as the King, and his whole Realm, have an interest in the body of every one of its members, it seems that the private commodity of any particular man, ought not to be regarded. Then, as to the first point, he concludes that the Court of Parliament is the highest Court, and has more privileges than any Court of the Realm, for which, it seems, that, in every case, without any exception, every Burges is privileged, when arrest is only at the suit of the subject; and the present case is so much the better, inasmuch as the execution was sued out during the sitting of Parliament, in such a case, as the Plaintiff was at his free election to sue out an execution against his body, or against his estate or goods.' He then proceeds to the second point, as to which he says, 'it seems to him the party is not discharged from the execution for ever, but only for a certain time,' for which he gives many reasons. In reference to the third point, he says, 'it seems that the Sheriff is not chargeable, because, if no default or offence in his office there is no reason to charge him, and there seems to be none in him, because the office of a Sheriff lies chiefly in the execution and serving of writs and process in the Law, for the doing of which he is the immediate officer, and to do which he is sworn. For this reason he is required, by his office and oath, to make just return, and the Law intends and considers him as a lay person, and not to have any cognizance of the science of the Law; and therefore, where a writ comes to him, whether it comes with or without authority, is not a point for him to dispute; on this head he offers several reasons, all tending to prove, that the Sheriff might think it right to execute that writ of privilege. He then puts this question, and now let us see, in case the Sheriff disobeyed this writ, what damage he would sustain? Truly, he would be in danger of perjury, and also of imprisonment and ransom at the King's will, and this was done in the same Parliament, in respect to Hill and Stukely (this should be Suckliffe) the Sheriffs of London, who were committed to the Tower for their contempts, for that they would not suffer George Ferrers, who was arrested upon an execution, to go at large, when the Serjeant at Arms came for him without any writ; so that, probably, Chamond might be terrified by this precedent from disobeying the writ of Parliament, which is the highest Court of the Kingdom. And it plainly appears by the writ, that it was clear in Parliament, that the party ought to have his privilege in this case, for otherwise the writ should have been a Habeas Corpus cum Causa, which writ is often granted before the Judges are satisfied whether privilege lies in any case or not; and if they find that it does not lie, then they remand the matter by Procedendo, &c. and tho' the Parliament do err in the grant of a writ of privilege, yet it is not reverfible in another Court, and therefore there can be no fault in the Sheriff.' I have stated this matter at large from Dyer's Reports, that the reader might see the reasoning of that great man, who, in time, became himself Speaker of the House of Commons, upon so nice a subject. It is true Sir Edward Coke, when Speaker of the House of Commons in the thirty fifth of Elizabeth, delivered his opinion to the House in these words (14); 'as for Trewynard's case, recited in my Lord Dyer, I have heard great learned men say, that that cause is no good Law, and that the House did more than was warrantable.' But to put an end to all disputes of this kind, in the first year of King James it was provided for by a statute (15), that the discharging a person out of execution by privilege of Parliament, should not void the judgment, in which the Legislature seem not to approve my Lord Coke's Law, so much as they did that of Lord Dyer.

[D] Had a singular kindness ] It appears sufficiently from all our histories, that Edward the Sixth, in his infancy, was very weakly, and therefore the King his father was very anxious for the preservation of his health, in respect to which, at the persuasion of this gentleman, he was sent to the Priory of St Giles's in the Wood, then the house of Sir Richard Page, Knight, Lieutenant of the Band of Pensioners given him by the said King, and this for the sake of its excellent air, standing also very near Flanshead. That estate came afterwards, by marriage, to the family of Saunderson, wards, at a very critical juncture, for, when the unfortunate Duke of Somerset lay under sentence of death, and it was observed on the one hand, that people murmured and gave open testimonies of discontent; and, on the other, that the King himself was very uneasy and melancholy, those who were about him thought it their interest to study any method to quiet and amuse the one, and, if possible, to entertain and divert the other (n). In order to this, at the entrance of the Christmas holidays, George Ferrars, Esq; was proclaimed LORD of MISRULE, that is, a kind of Prince of sports and pastimes, which office he discharged for twelve days together at Greenwich, with great magnificence and address, and entirely to the King's satisfaction. In this character attended by the politest part of the Court, he made an excursion to London, where he was very honourably received by officers created for that purpose, splendidly entertained by the Lord Mayor, and, when he took his leave, had a present made him in token of respect (o) [E]. But notwithstanding he made so great a figure in the diversions of a Court, he preserved at the same time his credit with all the learned world, and was no idle spectator of political affairs, as appears from the History of the Reign of Queen Mary, which, though inserted in the Chronicle, and published in the name of Richard Grafton (p), was in truth penned by our author, as we are told by honest John Stowe (q), an author of incontestible authority in such cases. To this circumstance, if a certain critical writer had any way adverted, he would certainly have mentioned it amongst many less curious and less useful particulars (r). This method of sending works into the world under other mens names, who were benefited by it, was a thing in those days very common, and indeed a great part of another General History of England was composed in this manner; neither are the learned at a loss for the names of the true authors of most of the reigns, as will be shewn in another place (s). Our author, Ferrars, was an Historian, a Lawyer, and a Politician, even in his poetry, as evidently appears from those pieces of his that are inserted in the MIRROR for MAGISTRATES (t), and which are scarce inferior to any thing that have found a place in that collection [F]. He wrote likewise, in the earlier part of his life,

Saunders, who pulled down the old fabrick and built a new and very elegant house, in which, however, a bed very richly embroidered with the arms of England was preserved, on account of the tradition that he had slept in it, and several panes of glass, in which the royal arms were also painted, found, for the same reason, admittance into the new house (17). We need not therefore at all wonder, that King Edward should shew a particular liking to Mr Ferrars, whom he had known so long; and who, from the pleasantness of his temper, was very likely to inculpate himself into the good graces of a young Monarch, allowed to have parts much superior to his years.

[E] In token of respect. We have this story, and the occasion of it, largely enough related by several of our Historians; it is not therefore of any great consequence, the rather, since they transcribe each other, from which we take it. Honest John Stowe (18) tells it thus: 'The King kept his Christmas with open household at Greenwich, George Ferrars, gentleman, of Lincoln's-Inne, being Lord of the merry disports all the twelve days, who so pleasantly and wisely behaved himself, that the King had great delight in his pastimes. On Monday the fourth of January, the said Lord of Merry Disports came by water to London, and landed at the Tower-Wharfe, entered the Tower, and then rode through Tower-Street, where he was received by Serjeant Vawce, Lord of Misrule to John Mainard, one of the Sheriffs of London, and so conducted through the city with a great company of young Lords and Gentlemen, to the house of Sir George Barne, Lord Mayor, where he, with the chief of his company, dined, and after had a great banquet, and at his departure the Lord Mayor gave him a standing cup, with a cover of silver and gilt, of the value of ten pounds, for a reward, and also set a hoghead of wine, and a barrel of beer, at his gate, for his train that followed him, the residue of his gentlemen and servants dined at other Aldermens houses, and with the Sheriffs, and so departed to the Tower-Wharfe again, and to the Court by water, to the great commendation of the Mayor and Aldermen, and highly accepted of the King and Council.' Grafton observes (19), that this was so acceptable to the young King, that he made it sufficiently appear by his princely liberality in rewarding the service; but he does not tell us what that reward was. I have found it some where suggested (20), that it was a large grant of Abbey-Lands, but I believe this must be a mistake, for this grant was in the second year of the King, and consisted of the Priory of Mergate, or Markiate, now called Market-Street, lying at a small distance from Flamstead, but in the county of Bedford, and valued at the time of the Dissolution at the annual rent of one hundred forty three pounds one shilling and three pence (21). It is true it may be suggested, that there might be two grants, one in reward of his services in Scotland, and the other upon this occasion; but we may fairly alledge, in answer to this, that gifts of such lands are so duly recorded, that it would be scarce possible to miss finding some notice of it, if such a subsequent grant there had ever been.

[F] In that collection] The first edition of this book, in which edition were many of our author's pieces, was printed in 1559; the second, into which the rest of his Poems are inserted, after his death in 1587; and the third, which was also not barely reprinted, in 1610, but with many additions; all in Quarto. The title of the second edition, at large runs thus:

The Mirour for Magistrates, wherein may be seen, by examples passed in this Realm, with how grievous plagues vices are punished in great Princes and Magistrates, and how frail and unstable worldly prosperity is found, where fortune seemeth most highly to favour. Newly imprinted, and with the addition of divers tragedies enlarged.

The first edition of this book was published by William Baldwin, who prefixed an epistle before the second part of it, wherein he signifies, that it was intended to reprint the Fall of Princes, by Boccace, as translated into English by Lidgate the Monk; but, that upon communicating his design, to seven of his friends, all of them sons of the Muses, they dissuaded him, proposing to look over the English Chronicles, and to pick out of them such stories as were most entertaining, and at the same time not void of instruction, which they undertook to adorn each with a robe of poesy. Amongst these friends of his, none more ready in promising, none more willing in performance, than our Mr George Ferrars, who furnished Mr Baldwin with four stories for that edition of the Mirour, &c. the titles of which follow:

1. The fall of Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice of England, and other his fellows, for misconstruing the Laws, and expounding them to serve the Princes affections.
2. The Tragedy, or unlawful Murder, of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester.
3. Tragedy of King Richard II.

life, some pieces in his own profession, which gained him great reputation, and which manifestly shews, that he was not so great a Courtier as to prefer the prerogative of the Crown to the rights or property of the subject, but one who well understood, that the welfare of this nation must depend upon maintaining, in it's full vigour, our most excellent constitution [G]. It very rarely happens, that, where a man so often changes his course of life as Mr Ferrars did, or, to speak with greater propriety, was forced to do, that he maintains himself without blemish in the world's good opinion; and yet such was his happy fortune, that change in his station wrought none in his credit, but in all the variety of scenes through which he passed, and from the earliest to the latest day of his life, he was beloved, admired, and caressed, by all who knew him, and more especially respected by the learned, who consulted him upon their labours as a candid Critick and a generous friend (u). For these circumstances, notwithstanding that deluge of oblivion which has swept away the remembrance of many great things done in those times, we have with some pains been able to recover; though without question much more might have been said, if Leland had lived to perfect those works which he began, or if his unhappy fate had not deterred others from attempting to preserve the personal memoirs of those illustrious and ingenious men, who flourished in those days [H]. Yet to that great man,

Amongst these the complaint of Elianor Cobham, Duchesse of Gloucester, who was banished for her consulting conjurers and fortunetellers about the life of King Henry the Sixth, and whose exile quickly made way for the murder of her husband, has, of all his compositions, been most admired; the reader perhaps, will not think his time mispent in the perusal of a few stanzas (22); that Lady speaks.

The Isle of Man was the appointed place
To penance me for ever in exile;
Thither, in haste, they poasted me apace,
And doubting scape they pin'd me in a pyle,
Close by myself; in care, alas, the while
There felt I first poor prisoners hungry fare, Much want, things scant, and stone walls hard and bare.

The change was strange from sylke and cloth of gold
To rugged fryze, my carcass for to cloath;
From Princes fare, and dainties hot and cold,
To rotten fish, and meates that one would loath:
The dict and dressing were much alike boath:
Bedding and lodging were all alike fine,
Such Down it was as served well for swyne.

Neither doe I mine own case thus complayne,
Which, I confesse, came partly by desert,
The only cause which doubleth all my payne,
And which most neer goeth now unto my hearte,
Is that my fault did finally revert,
To him that was least guilty of the fame,
Whose death it was, though I abode the shame:

Whose fatal fall when I do call to minde,
And how, by me, his mischief first began;
So ofte I cry on fortune most unkinde,
And my mishap most utterly doe banne,
That ever I to such a nobleman,
Who from my crime was innocent and cleare,
Should be a cause to buy his love so deare.

Oh! to my heart how greivous is the wounde,
Cailing to minde this dismal deadly case,
I would I had been dolen under ground

Or tooke delight in any kind of grace;
Seeming in mee that him did stir or move,
To fancy me or set his heart to love.

Where I was wont to see the christall streames
Of royal Thames, most pleasaunt to my sight,
And farewell Kent right famous in all realmes,
A thousand times I minde you in my dreames,
And when I wake most grieft it is to mee
That never more agayne I shall you see.

[G] Our most excellent constitution. We have already observed, that the fall of his patron, Thomas Cromwell Earl of Essex, induced him pretty early to quit the publick exercise of his profession as a Counsellor at Law, but not before he had given publick testimonies of his great knowledge and reading, as appears from

[H] Who flourished in those days. There is no doubt, that many of the Poems penned by our author in the earlier part of his life, and by which he recommended himself to the favour of his gracious Sovereigns Henry and Edward, are now lost. Mr Wood mentions an Epitaph made on Dr Phayer (23), a very learned Physician, which is not now to be met with. The learned Mr Leland has entered amongst his notes one, which shews the respect he had to our author's judgment, in these words (24). 'Mr Ferrars told me, that Gower the Judge could not be the man that write the bookes yn English, for he said that Gower the Judge was about Edward the Secundes time.' His remarks upon the English History, in the prose part of the Mirror of Magistrates, are very judicious, and shew that he was perfectly master of the subject, that he had studied it long and carefully, and had made diligent enquiry into the secret springs of great events, which might have qualified him to have undertaken the writing any part of our history with reputation. Of this, what he has written, viz. the reign of Queen Mary, is another good proof; and John Stowe (25), who loved not Grafton, and in truth had no reason to love him, might very probably let us into the secret of this reign being written by Mr Ferrars, purely to prevent Richard Grafton from having the credit of it, and indeed it is very unlike the rest of his work, which, if a certain Prelate's judgment (26) will influence the reader, deservedly procured him, from George Buchanan (27), the character of a very heedless and unskilful writer. None of the authors we have met with deliver any thing as to Mr Ferrars's religion, but it is highly probable, if not certain, that he was a settled, and it may be a zealous, Protestant, not upon account of his receiving grants of Abbey Lands, for that might be but a precarious proof, but from his coming into the world under the protection of Thomas Lord Cromwell, a man certainly persuaded of the truth of the Protestant Religion, whatever errors he might fall into in the practice, and from the high credit in which he stood with man we stand indebted for several particulars of our author's history, occasionally set down in his valuable papers that are yet preserved (w), as well as for that excellent poem which he addresses to Mr Ferrars, and which alone had been sufficient to have transmitted his memory to posterity with honour, if all other helps had been wanting [I]. With respect to the time of our author's death we are not exactly informed, all we know is, that he died in the year 1579, at his house at Flamstead in Hertfordshire, and was buried in the parish-church; for, as Mr Wood informs us, on the 18th of May the same year, a commission was granted from the Prerogative, to administer the goods, debts, chattels, &c. of him the said George Ferrars, then lately deceased (x). There flourished also at the same time with him one Mr Edward Ferrars, a Warwickshire Gentleman of a good family, bred, as well as our author, at Oxford, a celebrated Poet likewise, and much in the good graces of Henry VIII, to whom a certain writer who lived near those times ascribed many of the pieces written by our author, and thereby misled (y) Mr Wood in his first edition, but he afterwards corrected that mistake from our author's poems (z). This Edward Ferrars died in 1564, and lies buried in the church of Badesly Clinton, in the county of Warwick.

the Lord Protector Somers and King Edward the Sixth, to which it is scarce possible he should have attained, if he had not been so. In his history also of the reign of Queen Mary, tho' written with much caution and wonderful moderation, and wherein he speaks highly of the personal virtues of that Princess, yet he shews himself clearly of the reformed religion, more especially in the large account he gives of the death of Archbishop Cranmer (28), and of Sir Thomas Wiat's insurrection; and, indeed, in all other passages where it could be expected, referring for further particulars, to the Acts and Monuments written by John Fox.

[I] If all other helps had been wanting.] What is said in the text is no more, than what is justly due to the pains taken by that incomparable Antiquary John Leland, whose elegies in praise of the worthy persons who flourished in his time, are many of them short histories of their lives and actions, as the reader will perceive by the following Poem, the beginning of which alludes to Mr Ferrar's feat at Verlamum or Flamstead, and is a very elegant complement. The late learned Bishop Tanner thought, that the last lines related to the Duke of Somers's expedition into Scotland; but perhaps they may be with more justice referred to his expedition into that kingdom, when Earl of Hertford, in the reign of King Henry the Eighth; nor is it at all improbable, that Mr Ferrars might attend him in the first, as he certainly did in the last. Mr Leland's Poem runs thus (29):

Ad Georgium Ferrarium.

Si modo Verlamum vetus urbs victoribus olim
Cognita Romanis tota niteret ovans:
Te niveis certe insigniret grata lapillis,
Texeret ac facili florea ferta manu:
Queis tua congaudens redimiret tempora festa
Quod Mufas deamet Castaliumque gregem.
Concidit antiquæ sed gloria funditus urbis,
Albani fanum quod reparavit opus.
Fortunæ scandens alta ad fastigia summæ,
Cromuellus sibi te vir catus asseruit.
Deinde animo leges patrias evolvis, & illis,
Sedulus infervis caufidicoque foro.
Patronum veterem repetis patronus & ipse,
Ac lepidis dictis lætitiæque studes.
Gloria at illius cecidit magnamque ruinam
Passa est: sic verfat fors male fida rotas.
Aulica vita tibi placuit, mox regia magni,
Te Henrici gremio foverat ampla suo.
Horrida bella sonant, Martis foetura coruscant, Et Scotti & Morini tela cruenta vibrant.

Bellator produs Martius, atque minax.
Vidisti Scottos victor Morinosque fugatos, Et patuit virtus amplior inde tua.
Perge, ut cœpisti, magum te ostendere factis
Ferrari, & nostro carmine major eris.

This I have found thus translated, or rather Paraphrased.

*If that fam'd City which the Romans knew (Renown'd for arms, renown'd for learning too)
Shone now in splendour as in days of old,
Happy her Citizen in Thee she'd hold,
Whose genius back her former joys convey'd,
Castalian springs and ev'ry tuneful maid;
For in her turn, sweet bard, each muse is thine,
I am content with one, but thou hast nine.
Proud of thy virtues, she'd exalt thy fame
With golden honours, strive to deck thy name;
But what she was St Alban's is, and she,
Tho' less her right, puts in her claim to thee.
The cautious Cromwell early call'd thee friend,
Bespoke thy fortunes, taught thee to ascend;
When to the laws you bent your maiden choice,
And crowds applauding listened to your voice;
While your great patron fill'd the chair of state
And saw you in your turn becoming great,
You sooth'd the burthen of perplex'd affairs,
Heighten'd his pleasures, and consol'd his cares.
At length he fell! O fall severe indeed!
And yet to all who fortune trust, decreed.
Then to the Palace all your thoughts attend,
And mighty HENRY well supply'd your friend.
But war breaks out, the Scot and faithless Gaul,
By base invasions for chastisements call:
Thy sword and shield are readily sustain'd,
And martial heat again your veins distend;
The Scots well beaten, and the Gauls subdu'd,
All arts of peace are once again pursu'd.
Your valour found as sterling as your wit,
All own your virtues for each station fit,
For Courts and Camps alike by nature form'd,
With sense enliven'd, and with courage warm'd:
Go FERRARS on, compleat your brave designs,
You have deserv'd, and shall transcend my lines.*

FISHER (JOHN) Bishop of Rochester in the XVIth century, a man worthy to live in better times, was born at Beverley in Yorkshire, in the year 1459 (a). His father, named Robert, was a Merchant in that town, who left him an orphan very young. But his good and kind mother, whose name was Anne, though she married again, did not neglect this son, and another younger she had by her first husband; causing them to be carefully educated in the collegiate church of their native place, Beverley. When fit for the university, John was sent to Michael-House (b) in Cambridge, in the year 1484, and placed under the tuition of Mr William de Melton. He took the degrees in Arts in 1488 and 1491; and being elected Fellow of Michael-house (c), was one of the Proctors of the university in 1495 (d). The same year, he was elected Master of Michael-house, in the room of his tutor William de Melton preferred to the dignity of Chancellor of the cathedral church of York (e): and having for some time before applied himself to the study of Divinity, he took Holy Orders, and became eminent as a Divine. So that the fame of his learning and exemplary virtues reaching the ears of Margaret Countess of Richmond, mother of King Henry VII, she chose him her Chaplain and Confessor: in which station he behaved with so much goodness and wisdom, that she committed herself and her whole family to his government and direction. And by his advice and persuasion it was, that she undertook those munificent foundations at Cambridge [A], of which an account is given lower (f). In 1501, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (g). The same year he was chosen Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and again in 1504 (h); during the exercise of which eminent office [B], he encouraged learning and good manners: and is said by some to have had Prince Henry, afterwards King Henry VIII, under his tuition in that university (i). In 1502, he was appointed, by charter, the Lady Margaret's first Divinity Professor in Cambridge (k). Likewise, anno 1504, being nominated Bishop of Rochester [C], upon the translation of Richard Fitz-James to the See of London; he was confirmed by Pope Julius the Second's bull, dated 14 October 1504 (l). This small bishopric he would never afterwards exchange for a better, tho' he was offered both Lincoln and Ely [D]. For, he called his church his wife, and was wont to say, He would not change his little old wife, to whom he had been so long wedded, for a wealthier (m). At the time of this promotion he was attending the building and foundation of Christ's-college in Cambridge; and as he was not accommodated with a convenient lodging, Dr Tho. Wilkinson President of Queen's-college dying in 1505, the Society chose him their President in his room [E]. This Headship he gratefully accepted, and kept it a little above three years (n). In 1506, he perfected the foundation of Christ's-college, and was appointed in the statutes Visitor for his life, after the death

[A] And by his advice and persuasion it was, that she undertook those munificent foundations at Cambridge.]

For this, among others, we have the authority of the renowned Erasmus (1). Reverendus Episcopus Rossensis, vir non solum mirabili integritate vitæ, verum etiam alta & recondita doctrina, tum morum quoque incredibili comitate commendatus maximis pariter ac minimis. — His nominibus aliquando Regis Henrici qui nunc Angliam moderatur aviæ paternæ Margaritæ egregiè charus, & à confessionis secretis. Cui Margaritæ auctor fuit, ut in Academia Cantabrigiensi Collegia duo construxerit, & amplis possessionibus ditaverit. Quorum alterum Christo Servatori, alterum S. Johanni Evangelistæ consecravit. Solebat etiam ipse pro sua facultate bonæ spei adolescentes, maximè pauperiores liberaliter ad studia nutrire.

[B] During the exercise of which eminent office.] Dr William Richardson seems to conclude, that Thomas Wolsey was chosen Chancellor in 1514, upon Bishop Fisher's refusing to continue so any longer (2). But in R. Parker's History of the University of Cambridge, it is said, that Bishop Fisher was then confirmed in that office for life. '1514. Hoc anno factus [scil. Job. Fisher] perpetuus Academiae Cancellarius (3).'

[C] Being nominated Bishop of Rochester.] He was promoted thereto, chiefly through the original recommendation of him to King Henry VII. by Dr Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, as he acknowledges in the dedication of his book against Oecolampadius to that Bishop.—Adde, quod Regi Henrico septimo — meam parvitatem commendasti, ut sola existimatione, quam de me concepit, & meo motu, citra quodvis aliud obsequium, citra cujusquam preces, quod & mihi non semel affirmabat, episcopatum Rossensem, cui jam indignus presum, ultro donaverit. Non desunt forte complures quibus creditum est genitricem illius, nempe Comitum Richmondia, Derbique, sceruarum eximiam, & plane incomparabilem, heraque mihi multis rationibus charissimam, suis precibus a filio dictum episcopatum impetrasse mihi Vere longe aliter sese res habet. Quod & tua dominationi compertissimum est. — Sed ad dominationem tuam redeo, cui (ut dixi) post Regem prudentissimum defunctum, omnia commoda, quæ mihi meisque suppetunt, ex hoc episcopatu me debere confiteor. The substance of which is, that it was not through the Lady Margaret's interest, but the Bishop of Winchester's original recommendation of him to King Henry VII. that he obtained the Bishopric.—Before the King gave it him, he writ a letter to his mother, which begins thus. 'Madam, and I thought I should not offend you, which I will never do wilfully, I am well'

'myndit to promote Master Fisher your Confessor to a Bishopric; and I assure you Madam, for non other cause but for the grete and singular virtue, that I know and se in hym, as well in conyng and natural wisdom, and specially for his good and vertuose living and conversation. And by the promotyon of suche a man, I know well, it should corage many others to lye vertuosely, and to take such wayes as he dothe, which shulde be a good example to many others hereafter. Howebeit without your pleasure knowen I woll not move hym, nor tempt hym therein, &c— (4).

[D] This small bishopric he would never afterwards exchange for a better, tho' he was offered both Lincoln and Ely.] His own sentiments upon that subject are truly just and noble. Habeant licet alii proventus pinguiorcs, ego tamen interim pauciorum animarum curam gero, adeo ut quum utrorumque ratio reddenda fuerit, quod & propediem haud dubie futurum est, nec pilo meari sortem optarim uberiter. i. e. 'I ho' others have larger revenues, I have fewer souls under my care, so that when I shall have to give an account of both, which must be very soon, I would not desire my condition to have been better than it is (5).

[E] The Society chose him their President in his room.] Dr Fuller is mistaken, when he says (6), that this election was, whilst the Bishop was 'employed in building of St John's college.' For it was not built till some years after.

of the munificent foundress (o). He was also the chief instrument in the foundation of St John's college in the same university, and from the same bountiful hand the Countess of Richmond. Her intention was, to bestow the remainder of her charities upon the most magnificent chapel, which her son King Henry VII was erecting at the east end of Westminster-Abbey, by richly endowing a chantry there. But communicating her design to her Confessor Bishop Fisher, the great director of her charity, she was easily prevailed upon by him, to whom she was all obedience, to alter her purpose, and found St John's college. The King's licence was obtained for that purpose; but before it was passed in due form, the King dies April 21, 1509, as does the Lady Margaret herself June the 29th following. By these unhappy and unforeseen accidents, the care of the new foundation devolved upon her executors, of whom the most faithful and most active, nay the sole and principal agent, was Bishop Fisher. And he carried it on with the utmost application, and an honest and industrious zeal (p). In 1512, he was appointed to go to the Council of Lateran at Rome, but never went (q) [F]. St John's college being finished in 1516, he repaired to Cambridge, and opened that college with due solemnity; and was also commissioned to make statutes for the same (r). Not content with all that he had done for that noble seminary of learning, he became a considerable benefactor to it afterwards (s) [G]. And it was through his persuasion and intreaties, that Dr Richard Croke came and settled at Cambridge, where he was the first Greek Professor after Erasmus (t). Upon Martin Luther's first appearance, and his stout opposition to the errors and innovations of Popery, Bishop Fisher, like a zealous champion for the Church of Rome, was one of the foremost to enter the lists against him. He not only endeavoured to prevent the propagation of his doctrine in his own diocese, and in the university of Cambridge, over which, as Chancellor, he had a very great influence: but also preached and wrote, with great vehemence and earnestness against him (u). The King's book, intituled, An Assertion of the Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther, is thought chiefly to be the work of Bishop Fisher (w): who, moreover, published, A Defence of the King of England's Assertion of the Catholique Faith against M. Luther's Book of the Captivity of Babylon; and, A Defence of the Holy Order of Priesthood, against Martin Luther. With other pieces, mentioned below in note [X], among the rest of his works. Nay, he even took a resolution of going to Rome, for the settlement of those points; but was diverted by Cardinal Wolsey's calling together a Synod of the whole clergy, wherein the Bishop delivered himself with great freedom [H], on occasion of the Cardinal's stately pride (x). Hitherto Bishop Fisher had continued in great favour with King Henry VIII, but the business of the divorce being set on foot in 1527, he adhered so firmly to the Queen's cause, and the Pope's Supremacy, that it brought him into great troubles, and in the end proved his ruin. For, the King who had a great esteem for him, both on account of his honesty and learning, having desired his opinion on the subject of his marriage with Queen Catherine of Arragon; the Bishop declared, That there was no reason at all to question the

[F] But never went. For, as the learned Mr Baker well observes (7), 'tho' some of our historians have sent him thither, and the University had recommended their affairs to him, as ready to go, by a letter dated February 1514 (8), and tho' he had drawn up and sealed procuratorial powers to William Frefel, Prior of Ledes, during his absence, dated March 10 the same year, yet he never went; he says himself, his journey was stopt (9), and these procuratorial powers, together with other letters recommending him to some men of note at Rome, are yet lodged amongst the archives of St John's college, and show, they were never delivered.'

[G] He became a considerable benefactor to it afterwards. For he not only bore a part in the charge of the building; but much augmented the revenues of it with lands, whereby four fellowships were founded upon his own account, and one reader of an Hebrew Lecture, another of Greek, together with four examining readers, and four under-readers to help the principal. And observing that the price of victuals began to rise, he gave wherewith (by weekly dividend) the fellows commons might be augmented: bequeathing also thereto his library (thought to be then the best in Europe) after his decease; together with all his plate, hangings, and other household-stuff whatsoever, by a deed of gift in his life-time; and putting the college in possession of the same by indentures, only borrowing them back again for his own use, during his life. But they were seized, upon his being attainted of treason. He had moreover, to shew his perpetual good will to this college, built a little chapel near the college-chapel, and erected there a tomb of white marble finely wrought, for his own burial-place. But his body was laid elsewhere, as will be related in its due place (10).

'I had thought, that when so many learned men, as substitute for the clergy, had been drawn into this body, that some good matters should have been propounded for the benefit and good of the Church: that the scandals, that lye so heavy upon her men, and the disease which takes such hold on those advantages, might have been hereby at once removed, and also remedied. Who hath made any the least proposition against the ambition of those men, whose pride is so offensive, whiles their profession is humility? or against the incontinency of such as have vowed chastity? how are the goods of the Church wasted? the lands, the tithes, and other oblations of the devout ancestors of the people (to the great scandal of their posterity) wasted in superfluous riotous expences? how can we exhort our flocks to fly the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, when we that are Bishops set our minds on nothing more than that which we forbid? if we should teach according to our doing, how absurdly would our doctrines found in the ears of those that should hear us? and if we teach one thing, and do another, who believeth our report? which would seem to them no otherwise than as if we should throw down with one hand what we built with the other: we preach humility, sobriety, contempt of the world, &c. and the people perceive in the same men that preach this doctrine, pride and haughtiness of mind, excess in apparel, and a resignation of our selves to all worldly pomps and vanities. And what is this otherwise, than to set the people in a stand, whether they shall follow the sight of their own eyes, or the belief of what they hear ——— (11).'

the validity of that marriage, since it was good and lawful from the beginning. And, from this opinion no considerations whatever could make him recede afterwards (y). When the affair came to be tried before the two Legates, Campeius and Wolsey; Bishop Fisher was one of the Counsellors assigned to the Queen; and presented to the Legates a book he had written in defence of the marriage: making a speech at the same time, wherein he desired them, to take good heed of what they did in so weighty a business (z). In the Parliament which met November 3, 1529, a motion being made for suppressing the lesser monasteries, the Bishop warmly opposed it in the Upper-House [I]; and endeavoured to wipe off some general aspersions, thrown upon the clergy in the Lower House, at the bringing in of bills about mortuaries, pluralities, and probates of Wills (a). He also opposed in Convocation, the proposal there made, for granting the monasteries of 200*l.* per annum value, and under, to the King: so that the proposal was then rejected (b). In 1530, he escaped two very great dangers, namely, of being poisoned, and shot, in his house at Lambeth-marsh [K]; whereupon he retired to Rochester (c). When the question, of giving King Henry VIII. the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, was debated in Convocation, in 1531, the Bishop opposed it with all his might: which only served the more to incense the Court against him, and to make them watch for all opportunities of getting rid of so troublesome a person (d). He soon gave them the opportunity they sought for; namely, in his tampering with, and hearing too much to, the visions and impostures of Elizabeth Barton, the Holy Maid of Kent (e): a proceeding, which nothing but his age, his bigotry for the Church of Rome, and a desire of supporting its doctrines by the same unlawful arts as have been too often employed, can excuse (f). However, it is necessary to see what reasons he alledges for his behaviour in that affair; for which the reader will be pleased to consult the note [L].

[I] The Bishop warmly opposed it in the Upper-House ] His speech was as follows, ' My Lords, here are certain bills exhibited against the clergy, wherein there are complaints made against the viciousness, idleness, rapacity, and cruelty of Bishops, Abbots, Priests, and their Officials: but, my Lords, are all vicious, all idle, all ravenous, and cruel Priests, or Bishops? And for such as are such, are there no laws provided already against such? Is there any abuse that we do not seek to rectify? Or can there be such a rectification, as that there shall be no abuses? Or are not clergymen to rectify the abuses of the clergy? Or shall men find fault with other mens manners, whiles they forget their own? and punish where they have no authority to correct? if we be not executive in our laws, let each man suffer for his delinquency; or if we have not power, aid us with your assistance, and we shall give you thanks. But, my Lords, I hear there is a motion made, that the small Monasteries shall be taken into the King's hands, which makes me fear it is not so much the good as the goods of the Church, that is looked after. Truly, my Lord, how this may sound in your ears I cannot tell, but to me it appears no otherwise, than as if our holy mother the Church were to become a bondmaid, and new-brought into servility and thralldom, and by little and little to be quite banished out of those dwelling places, which the piety and liberality of our forefathers, as most bountiful benefactors, have conferred upon her; otherwise to what tendeth these portentous and curious petitions of the Commons? to no other intent or purpose, but to bring the clergy into contempt with the laity, that they may seize their patrimony. But, my Lords, beware of yourselves and your country; beware of your holy mother the catholique Church; and the people are subject unto novelties, and Lutheranism spreads itself amongst us. Remember, Germany and Bohemia, what miseries are befallen them already; and let our neighbours houses that are now on fire, teach us to beware our own disasters. Wherefore, my Lords, I will tell you plainly what I think, that except ye resist manfully by your authorities, this violent heap of mischiefs offered by the Commons, you shall see all obedience, first drawn from the clergy; and secondly from yourselves; and if you search into the true causes which reign among them, you shall find that they all arise through want of faith '——At this speech some of the Lords were pleased, others displeased. And the Duke of Norfolk, addressing himself to the Bishop, said, ' My Lord of Rochester, many of these words might have been well spared; but I wis that it is often seen that the greatest clerks are not always the wisest men.' To which the Bishop replied, ' My Lord, I do not remember any fools in my time that ever proved great clerks.' But when the Commons heard of it, they were all in a flame, and sent their speaker Thomas Audeley to complain to the King: who thereupon sent for the Bishop, and asked him, ' why he spake thus?' The Bishop answered, that ' being in counsel, he spake his mind in defence of the Church, whom he saw daily injured, and oppressed by the common people, whose office it was not to judge of her manners, much less to reform them, and therefore he thought himself in conscience bound to defend her in all that lay within his power.' The King bid him ' use his words more temperately,' and that was all. Which gave the Commons little satisfaction (12).

[K] In 1530, he escaped two very great dangers, namely of being poisoned, and shot, in his house at Lambeth-marsh. ] One Richard Rouse, who was acquainted with the cook, coming into the Bishop's kitchen; took his opportunity, while the cook was gone to fetch him some drink, to throw a great quantity of poison into gruel which was prepared for the Bishop's dinner. He could eat nothing that day, so escaped; but, of seventeen persons that ate of it, one Mr Bennet Curwin, and an old widow, died, and the rest never perfectly recovered their healths. Upon this occasion, an act was made, which declared poisoning to be high-treason, and adjudged the offender to be boiled to death. That severe punishment was inflicted upon Rouse, in Smithfield, soon after. But the act was repealed, 1 Edw. VI. c. 12. & 1 Mar. c. 1. — As for the other danger, it was thus. A cannon-bullet, that was shot from the other side of the Thames, pierced through his house, and came very near his study, where he used to spend most of his time (13).

[L] For which the reader will be pleased to consult the note. ] Those reasons are taken from a letter written by him to the House of Lords, while the bill for attainting Elizabeth Barton and her accomplices, was depending.—— ' It may please you to consider that I sought not for this woman's coming unto me, nor thought in her any manner of deceit. She was the person that, by many probable and likely conjectures, I then reputed to be right honest, religious, and very good and vertuous. I verily supposed, that such feigning and craft, compassing of any guile or fraud had been far from her: and what default was this in me, so to think, when I had so many probable testimonies of her virtue? 1. The bruit of the country which generally called her the Holy Maid. 2. Her entrance into religion upon certain visions which was commonly said that she had. 3. For the good religion and learning that was thought to be in her ghottly father (14), and in other

The Court having the advantage against him they wanted, soon made use of it, by adjudging him to be guilty of misprision of treason, for concealing the Maid's speeches that related to the King; and condemning him (with five others) in loss of goods, and imprisonment during the King's pleasure: but he was released upon paying 300*l.* for his Majesty's use [M]. In the same Parliament, which met Jan. 15, 1533-4, wherein this sentence was passed upon him and the rest of Elizabeth Barton's accomplices; an act was made, which absolutely annulled King Henry's marriage with Catherine of Arragon; confirmed his marriage with Anne Boleyn; intailed the crown upon her issue, and nominally upon the Lady Elizabeth; made it high-treason to slander or do any thing to the derogation of this last marriage; and enjoined all persons whatsoever to maintain and keep the contents of this act (g). In pursuance of it, on the day of the prorogation of that Parliament, March 30, an oath was taken by both Houses, whereby they 'swore to bear faith, truth and obedience all onely to the King's Majesty, and to his heirs of his body of his most dear and entirely beloved lawfull wife Queen Anne, begotten and to be begotten. And farther to the heirs of the said sovereign Lord, according to the limitation in the Statute made for surety of his succession in the crown of this realm mentioned and contained, and not to any other within this realm, nor foreign authority or potentate, &c. (b).' Instead of taking this oath, Bishop Fisher withdrew to his house at Rochester. But he had not been there above four days, before he received orders from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other Commissioners, authorized under the Great-Seal to tender the oath, to appear before them at Lambeth. He appeared accordingly, and the oath being presented to him, he perused it a while, and then desired time to consider of it; so five days were allowed him. At the expiration of them, he appeared again before the Commissioners, and told them, 'He had perused the oath with as good deliberation as he could: but as they had framed it, he could not (with any safety to his own conscience) subscribe thereto, except they would give him leave to alter it in some particulars; whereby his own conscience might be the better satisfied, the King pleased, and his actions rather justified, and warranted by Law.' They all made answer, that 'the King would not in any wise permit, that the oath should admit of any exceptions or alterations whatsoever.' And the Archbishop in particular, said, 'You must answer directly, whether you will or will not subscribe.' To which the Bishop replied, 'If you will needs have me answer directly, my answer is, that forasmuch as my own conscience cannot be satisfied, I absolutely refuse the oath.' Whereupon he was immediately committed to the Tower, it being on the 26th of April 1534 (i). But, in respect of his great reputation for learning and piety, earnest endeavours were used to bring him to a compliance. Some Bishops waited upon him for that purpose; as did afterwards the Lord Chancellor Audeley, and others of the Privy-Council, but they found him immoveable (k) [N]. Secretary Cromwell was also with him, to try

'virtuous and well learned Priests, that then testified of her holiness, as it was commonly reported. Finally, my Lord of Canterbury (15), that then was both her ordinary and a man reputed of high wisdom and learning, told me that she had many great visions. And of him I learned greater things than ever I heard of the Nun herself.——But here 'twill be said, that she told me such words as was to the peril of the Prince, and of the realm.——The words that she told me concerning the peril of the King's Highness were these, That she had her revelation from God, that if the King went forth with the purpose that he intended, he should not be King of England seven months after, and she told me also, that she had been with the King and shewed unto his Grace the same revelation.——But whereas, I never gave her any counsel to this matter, nor knew of any forging or feigning thereof, I trust in your great wisdoms that you will not think any default in me touching this point.——It will be said, that I should have shewed the words unto the King's Highness. Verily if I had not undoubtedly thought that she had shewed the same words unto his Grace, my duty had been so to have done. But when she herself, which pretended to have had this revelation from God, had shewed the same; I saw no necessity why that I should renew it again to his Grace.——And not only her own saying thus persuaded me, but her Priorefs's words confirmed the same, and their servants also reported to my servants that she had been with the King. And yet besides all this, I knew it not long after by some others that so it was indeed—— (16).

[M] He was released upon paying 300*l.* for his Majesty's use ] This is R. Hall's account (17). But Dr Burnet says, he does not find, that the King proceeded against him upon this act, till by new provocations he drew a heavier storm of indignation upon himself (18). He observes further upon this point, that when the cheat was first discovered, Secretary Cromwell, sent the Bishop's brother to him, with a sharp reproof for his carriage in that business; and withal advised him to write to the King, and desire his pardon, which he knew the King, considering his age and sickness, would grant. But he wrote back, excusing himself, that all he did, was only to try whether her revelations were true, &c.—Cromwell sent him a long answer (19); in which he charges the matter upon him heavily, and shews him, that he had not proceeded as a grave Prelate ought to have done; for he had taken all that he had heard of her upon trust, and had examined nothing.——Then he shews, how guilty he was, in not revealing what concerned the King's life, and how frivolous all his excuses were.——And after all, tells him, that though his excusing the matter had provoked the King, and that if it came to a trial, he would certainly be found guilty; yet again he advises him to beg the King's pardon for his negligence, and offence in that matter, and undertakes that the King would receive him into his favour.——But Fisher was still obstinate, and made no submission, and so was included within the act for misprision of treason.

[N] But they found him immoveable ] His answer to the Bishops was thus, 'My very good friends, and some of you my old acquaintance, I know you wish me no hurt, but a great deal of good; and I do believe, that upon the terms you speak of, I might have the King's favour as much as ever. Wherefore, if you can answer me to one question, I will perform all your desires. What is that, said they? It is this, said the Bishop, what will it gain a man to persuade and convince him. He advised him to write to the King: But he told Cromwell, that as he knew the King's jealous temper, he was afraid of writing, for fear his Majesty should take something amiss: however, upon his repeated solicitations, he consented to write. Cromwell found, that the thing which stuck mostly with him, was, That the marriage was to be reckoned contrary to the law of God, on account of the prohibition in the Levitical Law. He sent therefore Roland Lee, elect of Coventry and Lichfield, to talk with him upon that point. The issue was, Bishop Fisher declared, that he would swear to the succession; never dispute any more about the marriage; and promised allegiance to the King: But his conscience could not be convinced, that the marriage was against the law of God (l). These concessions did not satisfy the King [O]: who was resolved to let all his subjects see, there was no mercy to be expected from him by any one who opposed his will (m). Therefore, in the Parliament which met the 3d of November 1534, he was attainted for refusing the oath of succession, and his bishopric was declared void from the 2d of January following (n). During his confinement the poor old Bishop was but hardly and unkindly used, and scarce allowed necessaries; as appears by Dr R. Lee's Letter, and the Bishop's own complaints, to Secretary Cromwell (o) [P]. He continued above a year prisoner in the Tower, and might have continued there till released by a natural death, which could not be far off considering his advanced age: But an unseasonable honour paid him by Pope Paul III (p), hastened his destruction; that was, the creating of him, on the 21st of May 1535, Cardinal, by the title of Cardinal Priest of St Vitalis. When the King heard of it, he gave strict orders that none should be permitted to bring the Hat into his dominions; and therefore it came no nearer than Calais (q). Moreover, he sent Secretary Cromwell to examine the Bishop about that affair [Q], and from this time his ruin was absolutely determined. But as no legal advantage could be taken against him, Richard Rich, Esq; Solicitor-General, a busy and officious man, went to him, on the 7th of May (r); and in a fawning and treacherous manner, under pretence of consulting him (as from the King) about a case of conscience, unwarily drew him into a discourse about the tender point of the Supremacy. Concerning which the Bishop inconsiderately uttered these words: 'As to the business of Supremacy, I must needs tell his Majesty, as I have often told him heretofore, and would so tell him, if I were to die this present hour, that it is utterly unlawful; and therefore

'to win the whole world, and to lose his own soul.'

— To the Lords of the Privy-Council he answered thus, 'My Lords, you present before me a two-edged sword; for, if I should answer you with a disacknowledgment of the King's Supremacy, that would be my death; and if I should acknowledge the same perhaps contrary to my own conscience, that would be assuredly unto me worse than death. Wherefore I make it my humble request unto you, that you would bear with my silence, for I shall not make any direct answer to it at all (20).'

[O] These concessions did not satisfy the King. When they were reported to him, he swore, 'Mother of God, both More and he should take the oath, or he would know why they should not; and they [Cromwell, and rest of the counsellors] should make them do it, or he would see better reasons why they could not (21).'

[P] As appears by Dr R. Lee's letter, and the Bishop's own complaints, to Secretary Cromwell Dr Lee represented to Secretary Cromwell, that the Bishop's body could not bear the cloaths on his back; that he was nigh going, and that he could not continue unless the King were merciful to him. — And how great and just were the poor Bishop's complaints, appears from the following extract of a letter of his to the same Mr Secretary Cromwell.

'Furthermore, I beseech you be good master unto me in my necessity. For I have neither shirt nor sute, nor yet other cloaths, that are necessary for me to wear, but that be ragged and rent too shamefully: notwithstanding, I might easily suffer that, if that would keep my body warm. But my diet also, God knoweth how slender it is at many times. And now, in my age, my stomach may no away but with a few kind of meats: which if I want, I decay forthwith, and fall into crases and diseases of my body, and cannot keep myself in health. And, as our Lord knoweth, I have nothing left unto me, for to provide any better, but as my brother of his own purse layeth out for me, to his great hindrance. Wherefore, good Master Secretary, estones, I beseech you, to have some pity upon me, and let me have such things as are necessary for me, in mine age, and especially for my health. And also that 'it may please you, by your high wisdom, to move the King's Highness to take me unto his gracious favour again, and to restore me to my liberty, out of this cold and painful imprisonment. Whereby ye shall bind me to be your poor bedesman for ever unto Almighty God: who ever have you in his protection and custody. Other twain things, I must desire upon you. The toon is, it may please you, that I may take some priest with me in the Tower, by the assignment of Master Lieutenant, to hear my confession against this holy time. That other is, that I may borrow some books, to say my devotion more effectually these holy days, for the comfort of my soul. This I beseech you to grant me of your charity. And this our Lord God send you a merry Christmas, and a comfortable, to your heart's desire. At the Tower, the 22d day of December, your poor bedesman,

[Q] Moreover he sent Secretary Cromwell to examine the Bishop about that affair. After some conference between them, Cromwell asked him, 'My Lord of Rochester, what would you say, if the Pope should send you a Cardinal's hat, would you accept of it?' The Bishop replied, 'Sir, I know my self to be so far unworthy of any such dignity, that I think of nothing less; but if any such thing should happen, assure yourself I should improve that favour to the best advantage that I could, in assisting the holy Catholick Church of Christ, and in that respect I would receive it upon my knees.' When this answer was brought to the King by Secretary Cromwell, Henry said in a great passion, 'Yea, is he yet so lusty? well, let the Pope send him a hat when he will, Mother of God, he shall wear it on his shoulders then, for I will leave him never a head to set it on (23).'

'The Bishop's answer hath been differently represented by our historians, as if it had been, 'That if the Cardinal's hat was laid at his feet, he would not stoop to take it up.' But that was Sir Thomas More's answer to his daughter Mrs Roper, when she acquainted him that the Bishop was created a Cardinal (24).

‘ therefore I would not wish his Majesty to take any such power or title upon him, as he loves his own soul, and the good of his posterity (s).’ The Bishop being thus caught in the snare purposely laid for him; a special commission was drawn up for trying him, dated June 1, 1535 [R], and the indictment against him for high-treason was found the 11th of the same month, it being (as the record expresses it) for having said, ‘ The King owre Sovereigne Lord is not Supreme Hed yn Erthe of the Cherche of England (t).’ He was then so ill that he could not be brought to his tryal, but in the mean time all his books and other effects whatsoever were seized. On the 17th being a little recovered, he was brought to the King’s-Bench-bar; partly on horseback, and partly by water, because his weakness did not permit him either to walk, or to go wholly on horseback. Upon a short tryal he was found by his jury guilty of high-treason [S]; chiefly, if not solely, for the words abovementioned, spoken by him in confidence to Mr Solicitor Rich: and condemned to suffer death as in cases of treason (u), notwithstanding all that he could alledge in his own defence [T]. On the 22d of June he received the news of his execution on that day, from the Lieutenant of the Tower, at five o’clock in the morning, with great calmness; and slept soundly two hours after it. When he was getting up, he caused himself to be dressed in a finer and more cleanly manner than usual [U]. Being come down stairs, he was carried in a chair, upon account of his great weakness, to the place of execution, upon Tower-hill; where, instead of suffering the usual death of traitors, he was beheaded, about ten o’clock in the morning. Such was the tragical end of John Fisher Bishop of Rochester (w), after he had arrived to the age of 76 years 9 months, and some days over. His body was buried in the church-yard of All-hallows-Barking, removed afterwards within the chapel in the Tower; and his head set up the next day over London-bridge (x). He was a very tall man, as being six foot high; and with that, comely, upright, and well-formed; and strong and robust. But, in the decline of life, he grew extremely emaciated. His complexion was brown, his forehead broad, and his features duly proportioned (y). Erasmus represents him as a man of the greatest integrity, of deep learning, incredible sweetness of temper, and grandeur of soul [W]. Both friends and enemies acknowledge, that he was a pious man, sober, temperate, and charitable; and not only learned himself, but also a great lover and encourager

[R] A special commission was drawn up for trying him ] The persons in that commission were, Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellor, Charles Duke of Suffolk, Henry Earl of Cumberland, Thomas Earl of Wiltshire, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, Sir John Fitz-James Chief Justice of England, Sir John Baldwin Chief Justice of the Common pleas, Sir William Paulet, Sir Richard Lyfter Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Sir John Port, Sir John Spilman, and Sir Walter late Justices of the King’s-Bench, and Sir Antony Fitz-herbert, one of the Justices of the Common pleas (25).

[S] He was found by his jury guilty of high-treason.] Mr Jeremy Collier rightly thinks (26), that he was proceeded against only upon Statute 26 Henr. viii. c. 13. [and that too strained.] This Statute made it high-treason, maliciously to wish or desire by words or writing, or to imagine, invent, or attempt any bodily harm to be done to the King, the Queen, or their heirs apparent; or to deprive any of them of the Dignity, Style, or name of their royal estates.—At the time of his tryal, the Bishop made the following observation with regard to that statute;—‘ I pray you, my Lords, consider, that by all equity, justice, worldly honesty, and courteous dealing, I cannot (as the case standeth,) be directly charged—with treason, though I had spoken the words indeed, the same being not spoken maliciously, but in the way of advice and counsel, when it was requested of me by the King himself; and that favour the very words of the statute do give me, being made only against such as shall maliciously gainsay the King’s Supremacy, and none other: wherefore, although by rigour of law, you may take occasion thus to condemn me, yet I hope you cannot find law, except you add rigour to that law to cast me down, which herein I hope I have not deserved (27).’

[T] Notwithstanding all that he could alledge in his own defence ] He objected mostly against the Solicitor-general’s evidence, and thought it exceedingly hard and cruel. And therefore he addressed himself to him in this manner; ‘ Mr Rich I cannot but merit to hear you come in and bear witness against me of these words, knowing in what secret manner you came to me.’—Then addressing himself to his Judges, he related to them all the particulars of Rich’s coming; and thus went on.——‘ He told me,

‘ that the King, for better satisfaction of his own conscience had sent unto me in this secret manner to know my full opinion in the matter [of the Supremacy] for the great affiance he had in me more than any other:——and he told me, that the King willed him to assure me on his honour, and in the word of a King, that whatever I should say unto him by this his secret messenger, I should abide no danger nor peril for it, neither that any advantage should be taken against me for the same.——Now therefore, my Lords, concludes he, seeing it pleased the King’s Majesty to send to me thus secretly under the pretence of plain and true meaning, to know my poor advice and opinion in these his weighty and great affairs, which I most gladly was, and ever will be, willing to send him; methinks, it is very hard injustice to hear the messenger’s accusation, and to allow the same as a sufficient testimony against me in case of treason (28).’

[U] He caused himself to be dressed in a finer and more cleanly manner than usual.] And when his man expressed his wonder at it, seeing his Lordship knew well enough he must put off all again within two hours, and lose it. ‘ What of that, said the Bishop, doest thou not mark, that this is our Marriage-day, and that it behoves us therefore to use more cleanliness for solemnity of the Marriage-fake (29).’

[W] Erasmus represents him as a man of the greatest integrity, &c.] See above note [A]. And also observe these words of the same celebrated author. Aut egregiè fallor, aut is vir est unus cum quo nemo sit hac tempestate conferendus, vel integritate vitæ, vel eruditione, vel animi magnitudine (30). Dr S. Knight rightly observes, that he was, ‘ in all respects, the greatest favorer of learning and learned men’ in his time: and that ‘ no age ever afforded a person whose heart was more set upon the promotion of good literature in himself, and others.’ Erasmus, of immortal memory, whom he greatly admired, encouraged, and supported, is a pregnant instance of his singular affection for learned men. And his learning Greek, (*) when he was advanced in years, is a sufficient proof of his relish and love for all polite literature. To which add, his endeavours to restore learning in the University of Cambridge to a right use, and to banish thence every thing that had too long usurped that name (31).

He was indeed much addicted to the superstitions in which he had been bred up. But few people, at the age of fourscore, are very prone to forsake the notions they have imbibed from their tenderest years. We shall give an account of what he writ, or published, in the note [X].
