

THE
CHRISTIAN'S DAILY COMPANION,

PRESENTING AN ENTIRE VIEW OF DIVINE TRUTH,

IN A

SERIES OF MEDITATIONS

FOR EVERY MORNING AND EVENING THROUGHOUT THE YEAR.

BY THIRTY-ONE CLERGYMEN

OF

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

BLACKIE & SON:
QUEEN STREET, GLASGOW; SOUTH COLLEGE STREET, EDINBURGH; AND WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON.
MDCCCXLIII.

1843

THE
CHRISTIAN'S DAILY COMPANION.

PREFACE.

---

In presenting this volume now complete, it is gratifying to state, as affording the hope of its usefulness, that its first design was suggested by many who were the devout readers of its predecessor—the “Family Worship.” That work, penned by upwards of 180 ministers of the Church of Scotland, is now well known to the Christian public, who have testified their sense of its value as a help to family devotion. And this, now offered as a fit associate and auxiliary to the former, has been accomplished by a more limited number of clergymen, whose names are given in connection with their several allotments; and who being distinguished for talents and learning, for piety and evangelical views of divine truths, as well as pains-taking and experience in applying the words of eternal life to every rank and condition of their flocks, must afford a sufficient guarantee for the worth and faithfulness of those instructions which they have been called in the providence of God thus to convey.

Whilst the former work has its place in ministering to the family altar, this is calculated to assist in the equally important duties of the closet. We say equally important; for certain it is, that the devotions of the household will dwindle to a cold formality, unless there be a serious and constant regard to those which are personal and secret, in the observance of which it is felt that the soul has singly to do with its Creator and Redeemer. With what livelier heart do the inmates come together, when, morning and evening before assembling, they have severally held communion with God by a prayerful meditation on his word! Or, on leaving the family altar, what nobler preparation for the duties of his calling will each one find, when he retires for a few moments to ask a blessing on the service past, and learn for himself a special lesson from the lips of that great Lord who came to be the light and life of the world.

And who can fail to own the necessity, or, when trial is made, to reap the fruit of secret communings with his own heart! “Come my people, enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee.” This is no unwelcome task to those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity; who have sought a hiding-place in his pavilion, and have tasted of the hidden manna. And if there be any who have no relish of such heavenly communion, let them inquire how far they are prepared “to meet their God,” to go through the valley of death, or even to endure a night of solitary sickness. How should they be prepared for the great reckoning? if they have not learned to meditate alone and pray alone, while there is nothing external either to soothe or to distract; to call self to an account; to penetrate the recesses of the heart, and from the depth of its discovered iniquities to cry unto God. To the darkest of these depths, though there be a wall on every side, there is light above; a space of open sky and a memorial there, “The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious.” “If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? But there is forgiveness with thee that thou shouldst be feared; with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption.” And if this secret communing with the heart be so essential, we doubt not the brief doctrinal and this secret communing with the heart be so essential, we doubt not the brief doctrinal and practical discourses of the CHRISTIAN’S DAILY COMPANION will be found eminently conducive to that end; serving to improve and endear those retired hours, which, though taken from the world, will yet add to its stores, and enrich the soul by treasure laid up in heaven.

But accommodated as these meditations are to the studies of the closet, they are beyond all question equally appropriate to the family circle; and wherever circumstances may allow, it will be found that this work, as its title implies, will prove a fit companion to the "Family Worship." There is no duty of man; no relation in which he is placed; and no doctrine; no precept; no promise, unfolded in the divine Word, which this manual fails, however shortly, to handle; and much care has been taken that it might, by the divine blessing, be efficacious to the awakening of the conscience, and engaging the affections of parents and children, of masters and servants, with a view to strengthen every obligation and enhance every endearment of the family tie.

But whether perused in company or seclusion, it is calculated, by its Scriptural lessons for every morning and evening throughout the year, to afford a pleasant and profitable way of acquiring a comprehensive knowledge and inward application of revealed truth. It has often been recorded, as the experience of devout Christians, that besides searching the Scriptures daily, it is of excellent use to take a small portion of the Word as a theme of meditation for the day. By this method some momentous text of inspiration is more fixed in the memory, whilst being clearly remembered, it becomes by much thinking engraven on the heart; and the scenes which from morning to night are ever shifting before the eye; whether they be of inward emotions, or the ways of men, or the dealings of Providence; present the occasions on which the truth so kept in view cannot fail to be applied as heaven's own wisdom, and to be appreciated as heaven's best treasure. And if such method of using the sacred volume be found so highly beneficial, then obviously the work now furnished is not only in accordance with that method, but designed for its furtherance and fitted to secure its best results. It is indeed the Spirit of God who alone can make the word spirit and life, or cause anything of man's help to avail; but it is by such means as those now contemplated that the Spirit is pleased to operate; that He guides the believer into all truth, and brings all things to his remembrance whatsoever the Lord hath spoken. And, O if the reader would but reckon the mornings and evenings of a year, and the number of lessons for eternity which might thus be easily and successfully learned, he would be astonished on the one hand at the amount of good that might be gained by the diligence which keeps pace with time; and on the other at the loss insensibly incurred by taking no note of moments as they fly, and suffering so many seasons of grace to pass away unimproved.

To the reader it may not be uninteresting to know what is the scope of this work, and by what means it was provided that a diversity of writers might be led to act in concert, and avoid alike the tediousness of unnecessary repetition, and the injury of vital omissions. It was essential to the attainment of an end so desirable, that a previous plan and arrangement of the several parts should be laid and conducted by one hand; a department which it is hoped the reader will find to have been well entrusted to the Rev. Dr. PATERSON of Glasgow. And with regard to the scope of the work, it was judged necessary, and this is its chief characteristic, that the passages for meditation should not be merely select, but so selected as to embrace an entire view of Divine truth, in its doctrines, promises, and precepts, as well as practical application; and that not in the dryness of a system, but after the manner of the Word itself, now giving relief by variety, and now lending force by the union of precept and promise; of privilege and duty. It will be observed, however, on glancing at the "List of Subjects," that the exercises for each day have a special bearing on each other, and preserve for the most part a certain association whether of resemblance or of contrast; whilst the whole series has been so ordered as to unfold to the utmost that the limits would allow, all that counsel of God which is given to make wise unto salvation. And let the pious reader rest assured that he is followed by the prayers of all who have contributed to these pages. It is their earnest desire, that in all their labours, whether of the pulpit or the pen, they may have a single eye to the glory of God and the saving of souls; and their humble hope is, that this work may, by the Divine blessing, be of use to many, long after its writers are numbered with the dead; that it may prove a guide to the young, a staff to the aged, a consolation to the afflicted and the dying. Let every reader proceed with its perusal only in the spirit of prayer, and then as the Lord liveth, and is faithful and true, there will be a good hope through grace that this manual of devotion will be instrumental in winning souls to Christ, and increasing the faith which worketh by love, purifieth the heart, and overcometh the world.

TITLES OF SUBJECTS.

JANUARY.

		Page
1st Morning	Creation,	Gen. i. 1. . . . . 1
— Evening	Communion with God,	Ps. lxxiii. 28. . . . . 2
2nd Morning	Scripture given by inspiration,	2 Tim. iii. 16. . . . . 3
— Evening	The divine Teacher,	John xiv. 26. . . . . 4
3rd Morning	One God,	Deut. vi. 4. . . . . 6
— Evening	Purity from idols,	Ezek. xxxvi. 25. . . . . 7
4th Morning	True Worshipers,	John iv. 24. . . . . 8
— Evening	God revealed in nature,	Rom. i. 20. . . . . 9
5th Morning	God all-seeing,	Prov. xv. 3. . . . . 9
— Evening	God unsearchable,	Rom. xi. 33. . . . . 11
6th Morning	Holiness of God,	Rev. xv. 4. . . . . 11
— Evening	God the righteous judge,	Gen. xviii. 25. . . . . 13
7th Morning	Mercy and truth united,	Ps. lxxxix. 14. . . . . 14
— Evening	Eternity of Jehovah,	Ps. xc. 2. . . . . 15
8th Morning	Divinity of Christ,	John i. 1. . . . . 16
— Evening	God manifest in the flesh,	1 Tim. iii. 16. . . . . 17
9th Morning	Divinity of the Holy Spirit,	1 Cor. ii. 10. . . . . 19
— Evening	Spirit of adoption,	Gal. iv. 6. . . . . 20
10th Morning	Persons of Trinity equal in glory,	2 Cor. xiii. 14. . . . . 21
— Evening	The temple of God,	1 Cor. iii. 16. . . . . 21
11th Morning	Immutability of counsel,	Ps. xxxiii. 11. . . . . 23
— Evening	Sovereignty of grace,	Rom. ix. 15, 16. . . . . 24
12th Morning	Creator and Preserver,	Neh. ix. 6. . . . . 25
— Evening	'Remember now thy Creator,'	Ecl. xii. 1. . . . . 26
13th Morning	Righteousness of providence,	Ps. cxlv. 17. . . . . 27
— Evening	Reverence of God's dealings,	Deut. viii. 2. . . . . 28
14th Morning	Dependence on God,	Acts xvii. 28. . . . . 29
— Evening	Steps directed,	Prov. xvi. 9. . . . . 31
15th Morning	Gratitude to the Supreme Ruler,	Ps. xcii. 2. . . . . 32
— Evening	Universal Disposer of events,	Prov. xvi. 33. . . . . 33
16th Morning	Vanity of human devices,	Prov. xix. 21. . . . . 35
— Evening	'All things work together for good,'	Rom. viii. 28. . . . . 37
17th Morning	The Omnipotent reigneth,	Rev. xix. 6. . . . . 39
— Evening	Nothing too hard for God,	Jer. xxxiii. 27. . . . . 41
18th Morning	Daily bread,	Mat. vi. 11. . . . . 43
— Evening	Not live by bread alone,	Mat. iv. 4. . . . . 44
19th Morning	Know not what shall be on the morrow,	James iv. 13, 14. . . . . 46
— Evening	Ought to say, If the Lord will,	James iv. 15. . . . . 47
20th Morning	Source of all perfection,	James i. 17. . . . . 48
— Evening	Trust in Providence,	Mat. vi. 26. . . . . 50
21st Morning	Man made after the image of God,	Gen. i. 26. . . . . 51
— Evening	End of Creation—God's glory,	Rom. xi. 36. . . . . 52
22nd Morning	Immortality of the soul,	Gen. ii. 7. . . . . 54
— Evening	Male and female made after the image of God,	Gen. i. 27. . . . . 55
23rd Morning	Garden of Eden,	Gen. ii. 15. . . . . 56
— Evening	Help meet for man,	Gen. ii. 18. . . . . 58
24th Morning	The forbidden tree,	Gen. ii. 16, 17. . . . . 59
— Evening	The first sin,	Gen. iii. 6. . . . . 61

JANUARY.				Page
25th	Morning	Plea of the guilty,	Gen. iii. 13.	62
—	Evening	Watchfulness and prayer,	Mat. xxvi. 41.	63
26th	Morning	Expulsion from Paradise,	Gen. iii. 24.	64
—	Evening	Invitation to the heavy laden,	Mat. xi. 28.	66
27th	Morning	'Death passed upon all men,'	Rom. v. 12.	67
—	Evening	The second Adam,	1 Cor. xv. 22.	68
28th	Morning	Hiding from God,	Gen. iii. 8.	69
—	Evening	Omnipresence of Deity,	Ps. cxxxix. 7.	71
29th	Morning	Reign of sin and death,	Rom. v. 14.	72
—	Evening	Righteousness and life through Jesus Christ,	Rom. v. 17.	74
30th	Morning	Israel, a sinful nation,	Isa. i. 4.	75
—	Evening	None that doeth good,	Ecl. vii. 20.	77
31st	Morning	Heart deceitful above all things,	Jer. xvii. 9.	78
—	Evening	'A new heart will I give you,'	Ezek. xxxvi. 26.	80

FEBRUARY.

1st	Morning	Gospel hid to the lost,	2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.	82
—	Evening	Deliverance from the power of darkness,	Col. i. 13.	83
2nd	Morning	Under the law—under the curse,	Gal. iii. 10.	85
—	Evening	Redemption from the curse of the law,	Gal. iii. 13.	87
3rd	Morning	Death the wages of sin,	Rom. vi. 23.	89
—	Evening	Eternal life the gift of God,	Rom. vi. 23.	90
4th	Morning	No pleasure in the death of sinners,	Ezek. xviii. 32.	91
—	Evening	Repugnance to spiritual life,	John v. 40.	93
5th	Morning	Who shall stand before God?	1 Sam. vi. 20.	94
—	Evening	Blessedness of pardon,	Rom. iv. 7, 8.	96
6th	Morning	The Lamb of God,	John i. 29.	97
—	Evening	Blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin,	1 John i. 7.	98
7th	Morning	No sin charged to God's elect,	Rom. viii. 33.	100
—	Evening	Nature of election,	1 Peter i. 2.	101
8th	Morning	Marvellous love to a guilty world,	John iii. 16.	102
—	Evening	Christ able to save to the uttermost,	Heb. vii. 25.	104
9th	Morning	The Mediation of Christ,	1 Tim. ii. 5.	105
—	Evening	Christ from above, and above all,	John iii. 31.	106
10th	Morning	Like honour to the Son, as to the Father,	John v. 23.	107
—	Evening	Incarnation of the Son,	Heb. ii. 17.	109
11th	Morning	Prophecy fulfilled in Christ,	Luke xxiv. 44.	110
—	Evening	The fulness of time,	Gal. iv. 4, 5.	111
12th	Morning	'God blessed for ever,'	Rom. ix. 5.	113
—	Evening	The Word made flesh,	John i. 14.	114
13th	Morning	The mighty God,	Isa. ix. 6.	116
—	Evening	Christ worshipped by angels,	Heb. i. 6.	117
14th	Morning	The great Prophet,	Deut. xviii. 15.	119
—	Evening	Danger of refusing him that speaketh,	Heb. xii. 25.	120
15th	Morning	Sudden appearance in the temple,	Mal. iii. 1.	122
—	Evening	Christ revealing God,	John i. 18.	123
16th	Morning	God glorified in mercy and judgment,	2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.	125
—	Evening	The Spirit testifying of Christ,	John xv. 26.	126
17th	Morning	Prayer for divine light,	Ps. xliii. 3.	127
—	Evening	The word hid in the heart,	Ps. cxix. 11.	128
18th	Morning	Treasure of wisdom and knowledge,	Col. ii. 3.	129
—	Evening	Encouragement to ask wisdom of God,	James i. 5.	131
19th	Morning	Wisdom crieth at the gates,	Prov. viii. 3.	132
—	Evening	Danger of inconsideration,	Deut. xxxii. 29.	133
20th	Morning	God reproving that sinners may give ear,	Prov. i. 23.	134
—	Evening	Judgment to the refusers,	Prov. i. 24, 26.	136
21st	Morning	Children diligently to be taught,	Deut. vi. 6, 7.	137
—	Evening	Children capable of saving knowledge,	2 Tim. iii. 15.	138
22nd	Morning	The serpent cursed,	Gen. iii. 15.	140
—	Evening	Christ's voluntary mission,	Ps. xl. 7, 8.	142
23rd	Morning	Christ an offering for sin,	Isa. liii. 10.	143
—	Evening	Christ, holy and higher than the heavens,	Heb. vii. 26.	144
24th	Morning	The man of sorrows despised and rejected,	Isa. liii. 3.	145
—	Evening	Christ bearing our griefs,	Isa. liii. 4.	146
25th	Morning	The cross the Christian's glory,	Gal. vi. 14.	148
—	Evening	The end for which the Saviour suffered,	1 Pet. iii. 18.	149

FEBRUARY.				Page
26th	Morning	Saints in covenant with God by sacrifice,	Ps. l. 5.	150
—	Evening	Desires after God,	Ps. lxxiii. 25.	151
27th	Morning	Without shedding of blood no remission of sin,	Heb. ix. 22.	152
—	Evening	Cleansing and atoning blood,	Ezek. xxxvi. 25.	154
28th	Morning	God will by no means clear the guilty,	Exod. xxxiv. 7.	155
—	Evening	Christ bearing the iniquities of his people,	Isa. liii. 6.	156

MARCH.

1st	Morning	Christ our passover,	1 Cor. v. 7.	158
—	Evening	Christ declared by his resurrection,	Rom. i. 4.	159
2nd	Morning	God's love in the gift of his Son,	1 John iv. 10.	160
—	Evening	Love to God,	1 John iv. 19.	161
3rd	Morning	Reconciled by the death of Christ,	Rom. v. 10.	163
—	Evening	A willing people in the day of power,	Ps. cx. 3.	164
4th	Morning	The flesh warring against the Spirit,	Rom. vii. 21.	165
—	Evening	A clean heart,	Ps. li. 10.	167
5th	Morning	Lord's prayer for his people,	John xvii. 24.	168
—	Evening	Advocate with the Father,	1 John ii. 1.	169
6th	Morning	Ever living Intercessor,	Heb. vii. 25.	171
—	Evening	Intercession limited by time,	Luke xiii. 8.	172
7th	Morning	Drawing near with a true heart,	Heb. x. 21, 22.	173
—	Evening	Prayer without fainting,	Luke xviii. 1.	174
8th	Morning	The only name by which sinners can be saved,	Acts iv. 12.	176
—	Evening	The blessed trust,	Ps. ii. 12.	177
9th	Morning	Travail of the Saviour's soul,	Isa. liii. 11.	178
—	Evening	The Lamb in the midst of the throne,	Rev. vii. 7.	179
10th	Morning	The King of Zion,	Ps. ii. 6.	181
—	Evening	Christ's kingdom not of this world,	John xviii. 36.	182
11th	Morning	The title on the cross,	John xix. 19.	183
—	Evening	The Redeemer's throne in the heavens,	Heb. i. 3.	185
12th	Morning	The Lord, judge, lawgiver, and king,	Isa. xxxiii. 22.	186
—	Evening	Christ the sole Head of the Church,	Eph. i. 22.	187
13th	Morning	The sceptre of righteousness,	Heb. i. 8.	188
—	Evening	King of Zion dispensing grace,	Ezek. xxxvi. 27.	189
14th	Morning	Ransomed from the grave,	Hosea xiii. 14.	191
—	Evening	Satan bruised by the God of peace,	Rom. xvi. 20.	192
15th	Morning	Every thought brought under obedience,	2 Cor. x. 5.	193
—	Evening	Zion's children rejoicing in their King,	Ps. cxlix. 2.	194
16th	Morning	Divine teaching sought in prayer,	Ps. lxxxvi. 11.	195
—	Evening	Vengeance to them that know not God,	2 Thes. i. 7, 8.	196
17th	Morning	Whom to know is life eternal,	John xvii. 3.	197
—	Evening	Earth full of the knowledge of the Lord,	Hab. ii. 14.	198
18th	Morning	The lowly cradle,	Luke ii. 7.	199
—	Evening	The star of Bethlehem,	Mat. ii. 2.	200
19th	Morning	The Redeemer's poverty,	Mat. viii. 20.	201
—	Evening	No trust in uncertain riches,	1 Tim. vi. 17.	202
20th	Morning	Endurance of contradiction,	Heb. xii. 3.	203
—	Evening	Reviled for Christ's sake,	Mat. v. 11.	204
21st	Morning	Temptation in the wilderness,	Mat. iv. 8, 9.	205
—	Evening	Temptation in Eden,	Gen. iii. 5.	206
22nd	Morning	Spoiling principalities,	Col. ii. 15.	207
—	Evening	Resistance to the tempter,	James iv. 7.	208
23rd	Morning	The mournful cry,	Mat. xxvii. 46.	209
—	Evening	'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?'	Rom. viii. 35.	210
24th	Morning	Christ's agony and prayer,	Luke xxii. 44.	211
—	Evening	Confidence in trouble,	Ps. lxxi. 20.	212
25th	Morning	'Crucify him, crucify him,'	John xix. 15.	213
—	Evening	Intercession for transgressors,	Isa. liii. 12.	215
26th	Morning	Pilate's sentence,	Luke xxiii. 24.	216
—	Evening	Judgment-seat of Christ,	Rom. xiv. 10.	217
27th	Morning	The mock crown,	Mat. xxvii. 29.	218
—	Evening	The crown of life,	Rev. ii. 10.	219
28th	Morning	Death of the cross,	Phil. ii. 8.	221
—	Evening	No cross—no crown,	Luke xiv. 27.	222
29th	Morning	Christ able to succour the tempted,	Heb. ii. 18.	224
—	Evening	Suffer with Christ, reign with Christ,	2 Tim. ii. 12.	225

MARCH.			Page
30th Morning	Jesus mocked in his thirst,	John xix. 28.	226
— Evening	'Let him that is athirst come,'	Rev. xxii. 17.	228
31st Morning	'It is finished,'	John xix. 30.	229
— Evening	'I have finished my course,'	2 Tim. iv. 7.	230
APRIL.
1st Morning	Saviour giving up the ghost,	Luke xxiii. 46.	232
— Evening	House appointed for all living,	Job xxx. 23.	234
2nd Morning	The sepulchre hewn out of a rock,	Mark xv. 46.	235
— Evening	No work nor device in the grave,	Eccl. ix. 10.	236
3rd Morning	Christ foretels his resurrection,	John ii. 19.	238
— Evening	Being dead with Christ, we shall live with him,	Rom. vi. 8.	239
4th Morning	The empty tomb,	Mat. xxviii. 6.	241
— Evening	Christ the first-fruits,	1 Cor. xv. 20.	242
5th Morning	Our Lord's ascension,	Mark xvi. 19.	244
— Evening	'Seek those things which are above,'	Col. iii. 1.	245
6th Morning	The Lord's coming in glory,	Acts i. 11.	246
— Evening	Judgment according to deeds,	2 Cor. v. 10.	248
7th Morning	Set day when Christ shall come,	Acts xvii. 31.	250
— Evening	'Awake to righteousness, and sin not,'	1 Cor. xv. 34.	251
8th Morning	The righteous and the wicked,	Ps. i. 6.	253
— Evening	Confidence in the Lord's coming,	1 John ii. 28.	254
9th Morning	Lightning coming out of the east,	Mat. xxiv. 27.	256
— Evening	Watching unto prayer,	1 Peter iv. 7.	257
10th Morning	The Lord and his rewards,	Rev. xxii. 12.	258
— Evening	A right to the tree of life,	Rev. xxii. 14.	259
11th Morning	Plenteous redemption,	Ps. cxxx. 7, 8.	261
— Evening	Bought with a price,	1 Cor. vi. 20.	262
12th Morning	Christ despised and rejected,	John i. 11.	264
— Evening	Inability to come to Christ,	John vi. 44.	265
13th Morning	Spirit of truth the only guide to truth,	John xvi. 13.	266
— Evening	Three that bear record in heaven,	1 John v. 7.	267
14th Morning	Gospel not in word, but in power,	1 Thes. i. 5.	269
— Evening	Not by works, but through mercy saved,	Tit. iii. 5, 6.	270
15th Morning	Saviour praying for the Comforter,	John xiv. 16.	272
— Evening	Argument to prayer for the Spirit,	Luke xi. 13.	273
16th Morning	The peace of Zion's children,	Isa. liv. 13.	274
— Evening	Saving faith the gift of God,	Eph. ii. 8.	275
17th Morning	True believers the sons of God,	John i. 12.	277
— Evening	'Help thou mine unbelief,'	Mark ix. 24.	278
18th Morning	Strengthened with might by the Spirit,	Eph. iii. 16—19.	280
— Evening	The faithfulness of God,	1 Cor. i. 9.	281
19th Morning	Called with an holy calling,	2 Tim. i. 9.	283
— Evening	Chosen to salvation,	2 Thes. ii. 13.	284
20th Morning	Quickened together with Christ,	Eph. ii. 4, 5.	286
— Evening	New creatures in Christ,	2 Cor. v. 17.	288
21st Morning	Ministry of reconciliation,	2 Cor. v. 18.	289
— Evening	God in Christ reconciling the world,	2 Cor. v. 19.	291
22nd Morning	Ambassadors for Christ,	2 Cor. v. 20.	292
— Evening	Earnest heed to the message,	Heb. ii. 1.	294
23rd Morning	Crucified Jesus, Lord and Christ,	Acts ii. 36.	295
— Evening	Crucifiers convicted,	Acts ii. 37.	296
24th Morning	Turned from darkness to light,	Acts xxvi. 18.	298
— Evening	'Open thou mine eyes,'	Ps. cxix. 18.	299
25th Morning	Taught of God, men come to Christ,	John vi. 45.	300
— Evening	Attractive power of Divine love,	Cant. i. 4.	301
26th Morning	Four golden links,	Rom. viii. 29, 30.	303
— Evening	What Christ is made to the believer,	1 Cor. i. 30.	304
27th Morning	What believers are in him,	2 Cor. v. 21.	305
— Evening	Faith counted for righteousness,	Rom. iv. 3.	307
28th Morning	Way of the sinner's justification,	Rom. iii. 24, 25.	308
— Evening	Law not void through faith,	Rom. iii. 31.	309
29th Morning	God just, and the Justifier of them that believe,	Rom. iii. 26.	310
— Evening	The soul's sense of redeeming love,	Ps. ciii. 2—4.	311
30th Morning	Imputed sin—imputed righteousness,	Rom. v. 18.	313
— Evening	Unbelievers die in their sins,	John viii. 24.	313

MAY.

		Page
1st Morning	Works no ground of justification,	Gal. ii. 16. . . . . 315
— Evening	The righteousness which is of God by faith,	Phil. iii. 9. . . . . 316
2nd Morning	Creature righteousness, filthy rags,	Isa. lxiv. 6. . . . . 317
— Evening	White raiment,	Rev. iii. 18. . . . . 318
3rd Morning	Spirit of adoption,	Rom. viii. 15. . . . . 319
— Evening	Heirs of God,	Rom. viii. 17. . . . . 320
4th Morning	Lost sinners, sons of God,	1 John iii. 1. . . . . 321
— Evening	Seeing the Lord as he is,	1 John iii. 2. . . . . 322
5th Morning	Debtors to amazing love,	Eph. i. 3—5. . . . . 323
— Evening	The witness of the Spirit,	Rom. viii. 16. . . . . 324
6th Morning	Followers of God as dear children,	Eph. v. 1. . . . . 325
— Evening	Faith and brotherly love,	1 John iii. 23. . . . . 326
7th Morning	Good for brethren to dwell in unity,	Ps. cxxxiii. 1. . . . . 327
— Evening	'Blessed are the peace-makers,'	Matt. v. 9. . . . . 329
8th Morning	Chastening in love,	Heb. xii. 6. . . . . 330
— Evening	Gracious design of correction,	Heb. xii. 10. . . . . 332
9th Morning	Danger of pride or fainting under the rod,	Heb. xii. 5. . . . . 333
— Evening	Sanctified affliction,	Ps. cxix. 67. . . . . 335
10th Morning	Lord's sympathy with the afflicted,	Isa. lxiii. 9. . . . . 336
— Evening	Affliction ending in glory,	2 Cor. iv. 17. . . . . 337
11th Morning	Holy as God is holy,	1 Pet. i. 15. . . . . 339
— Evening	The flesh and the Spirit,	Rom. viii. 13. . . . . 340
12th Morning	The new man,	Eph. iv. 22—24. . . . . 341
— Evening	Conformity to Christ's death,	Phil. iii. 10. . . . . 342
13th Morning	Newness of life,	Rom. vi. 4. . . . . 344
— Evening	Adorning the Saviour's doctrine,	Tit. ii. 10. . . . . 345
14th Morning	Work out your own salvation,	Phil. ii. 12, 13. . . . . 347
— Evening	Sanctification through the truth,	John xvii. 17, 20, 21. . . . . 349
15th Morning	Peace bequeathed,	John xiv. 27. . . . . 350
— Evening	Peace through our Lord Jesus Christ,	Rom. v. i. . . . . 351
16th Morning	The Christian's hope,	Rom. v. 5. . . . . 353
— Evening	Hope, by the power of the Holy Ghost,	Rom. xv. 13. . . . . 355
17th Morning	Characteristics of Christ's kingdom,	Rom. xiv. 17. . . . . 356
— Evening	Christian perfection,	Heb. xiii. 20, 21. . . . . 357
18th Morning	Path of the just,	Prov. iv. 18. . . . . 358
— Evening	Arise, shine for thy light is come,	Isa. lx. 1. . . . . 360
19th Morning	Kept by the power of God,	1 Pet. i. 5. . . . . 362
— Evening	Constant eye to Jesus,	Ps. xvi. 8, 9. . . . . 363
20th Morning	Tabernacle dissolved,	2 Cor. v. 1, 2. . . . . 364
— Evening	'Flesh resting in hope,'	Ps. xvi. 9, 10. . . . . 365
21st Morning	Resurrection of the body,	1 Thes. iv. 14. . . . . 366
— Evening	'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise,'	Luke xxiii. 43. . . . . 368
22nd Morning	Valley and shadow of death,	Ps. xxiii. 4. . . . . 369
— Evening	'He shall enter into peace,'	Isa. lvii. 2. . . . . 371
23rd Morning	'Yet in my flesh shall I see God,'	Job xix. 26. . . . . 373
— Evening	Sown in dishonour, raised in glory,	1 Cor. xv. 43. . . . . 374
24th Morning	Welcome to heaven,	Mat. xxv. 23. . . . . 376
— Evening	Labour not in vain,	1 Cor. xv. 58. . . . . 377
25th Morning	Know as also we are known,	1 Cor. xiii. 12. . . . . 379
— Evening	All tears wiped away,	Rev. xxi. 4. . . . . 380
26th Morning	The fight of faith,	1 Tim. vi. 12. . . . . 382
— Evening	Safety of the Saviour's flock,	John x. 27, 28. . . . . 383
27th Morning	What the Lord requires,	Mic. vi. 8. . . . . 385
— Evening	The way to please God,	Heb. xi. 6. . . . . 387
28th Morning	'To the law and to the testimony,'	Isa. viii. 20. . . . . 388
— Evening	Things secret and things revealed,	Deut. xxix. 29. . . . . 390
29th Morning	Union of the branch and vine,	John xv. 4. . . . . 391
— Evening	The new heart,	Ezek. xi. 19, 20. . . . . 393
30th Morning	God obeyed rather than man,	Acts iv. 19. . . . . 394
— Evening	Steadfastness of divine law,	Ps. cxi. 7, 8. . . . . 396
31st Morning	Christ came not to destroy the law,	Mat. v. 17. . . . . 397
— Evening	Law fulfilled in God's people,	Rom. viii. 3, 4. . . . . 398

JUNE.

			Page
1st Morning	Tables of the law,	Deut. x. 4.	400
— Evening	Summary of the ten commandments,	Mat. xxii. 37-40.	401
2nd Morning	Obedience on the ground of redemption,	Exod. xx. 2.	403
— Evening	Obedience sought in prayer,	Ps. cxix. 33.	404
3rd Morning	Creatures set apart for God,	Lev. xx. 8.	406
— Evening	Sovereign claim to obedience,	Lev. xx. 7.	407
4th Morning	The Lord God, merciful and gracious,	Exod. xxxiv. 6.	408
— Evening	Grace sought that God may be served,	Luke i. 74, 75.	410
5th Morning	'Thou shalt have no other gods before me,'	Exod. xx. 3.	411
— Evening	The evil heart of unbelief,	Heb. iii. 12.	413
6th Morning	A father's advice to seek God,	1 Chron. xxviii. 9.	414
— Evening	God avouched to be thy God,	Deut. xxvi. 17.	416
7th Morning	Worship due to God only,	Mat. iv. 10.	418
— Evening	The beauty of holiness,	Ps. xxix. 2.	420
8th Morning	Knowledge of God, obedience to God,	1 John ii. 3, 4.	421
— Evening	God's way desired and grace found,	Exod. xxxiii. 13.	423
9th Morning	No other god because no other saviour,	Hos. xiii. 4.	424
— Evening	No God, the wish of fools,	Ps. xiv. 1.	426
10th Morning	Gold no confidence,	Job xxxi. 24.	427
— Evening	Love of money the root of evil,	1 Tim. vi. 10.	428
11th Morning	Lovers of pleasure,	2 Tim. iii. 4.	430
— Evening	Sensual idols,	Phil. iii. 18, 19.	431
12th Morning	The honour that cometh from men,	John v. 44.	433
— Evening	Vain glory and death,	Acts xii. 22, 23.	435
13th Morning	Christ supreme in the affections,	Mat. x. 37.	436
— Evening	False excuses,	Luke xiv. 18-20.	437
14th Morning	Going down to Egypt for help,	Isa. xxxi. 1.	439
— Evening	Backsliders admonished,	Isa. xxxi. 6, 7.	440
15th Morning	God counting our steps,	Job xxxi. 4.	441
— Evening	God with whom we have to do,	Heb. iv. 13.	442
16th Morning	The temple of God,	2 Cor. vi. 16.	444
— Evening	Keep yourselves from idols,	1 John v. 21.	445
17th Morning	Salvation in turning to God,	Ps. lxxx. 19.	446
— Evening	In God's presence fulness of joy,	Ps. xvi. 11.	448
18th Morning	Bowing before images,	Exod. xx. 4-6.	449
— Evening	The heart given to God's law,	Deut. xxxii. 46.	451
19th Morning	No similitude seen in Horeb,	Deut. iv. 15, 16.	452
— Evening	Their graven images burn with fire,	Deut. vii. 25.	453
20th Morning	Kneeling before the Lord,	Ps. xcv. 6, 7.	455
— Evening	Peace the answer of prayer,	Phil. iv. 6, 7.	456
21st Morning	Traditions,	Mat. xv. 6.	457
— Evening	Adding to God's word,	Deut. xii. 32.	459
22nd Morning	God, a jealous God,	Exod. xxxiv. 14.	460
— Evening	I will worship towards thy holy temple,	Ps. v. 7.	461
23rd Morning	Taking the name of God in vain,	Exod. xx. 7.	463
— Evening	Family worship,	Gen. xviii. 19.	464
24th Morning	Swearing falsely,	Lev. xix. 12.	465
— Evening	Swear not at all,	Mat. v. 34-37.	467
25th Morning	Glorious and fearful name,	Deut. xxxviii. 53, 59.	468
— Evening	Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,	1 Pet. i. 3.	470
26th Morning	Works praise and saints bless,	Ps. cxlv. 10, 11.	471
— Evening	The regardless destroyed,	Ps. xxxviii. 5.	472
27th Morning	The word above all God's name,	Ps. cxxxviii. 2.	473
— Evening	Tremblers at God's word,	Isa. lxvi. 2.	475
28th Morning	Blessings cursed,	Mal. ii. 2.	476
— Evening	Parents neglecting their offspring,	1 Sam. iii. 13.	477
29th Morning	Job's parental care,	Job i. 5.	479
— Evening	Excellency of Jehovah's name,	Ps. viii. 1.	480
30th Morning	Sins of the tongue,	Ps. cxxxix. 4.	481
— Evening	'Keep the door of my lips,'	Ps. cxli. 3.	483

JULY.

1st Morning	The sabbath of the Lord thy God,	Exod. xx. 8-10.	484
— Evening	Rest in heaven,	Heb. iv. 9.	486

JULY.			Page
2nd Morning	Sabbath as old as the creation,	Gen. ii 2, 3.	498
— Evening	Sabbath a merciful institution,	Deut. v. 14.	499
3rd Morning	Manna six days,	Exod. xvi. 25, 26.	490
— Evening	'Breaking bread,' first day of the week,	Acts xx. 7.	491
4th Morning	'Thy pleasure on my holy day,'	Isa. lviii. 13, 14.	493
— Evening	Sabbath one whole day,	Lev. xxiii. 32.	494
5th Morning	In earing-time and harvest also rest,	Exod. xxxiv. 21.	495
— Evening	Sabbath in all your dwellings,	Lev. xxiii. 3.	497
6th Morning	Assembling together on the Lord's day,	Heb. x. 25.	498
— Evening	Honouring God with the lips,	Mat. xv. 8.	499
7th Morning	Treading wine-presses on the Sabbath,	Neh. xiii. 15.	500
— Evening	Lord's day, gladness and joy,	Ps. cxviii. 24.	502
8th Morning	Honour thy father and thy mother,	Exod. xx. 12.	503
— Evening	Guilt of neglecting parents,	Mat. xv. 5, 6.	504
9th Morning	Mockers of parents,	Prov. xxx. 17.	505
— Evening	Training of children,	Prov. xxii. 6.	507
10th Morning	Sparing the rod,	Prov. xiii. 24.	508
— Evening	Provoke not your children to wrath,	Eph. vi. 4.	509
11th Morning	Duty of husbands to wives,	Eph. v. 25.	511
— Evening	Duty of wives to husbands,	Eph. v. 22, 23.	512
12th Morning	Masters have a Master in heaven,	Col. iv. 1.	513
— Evening	Servants doing the will of God,	Eph. vi. 5, 6.	514
13th Morning	Duty of subjects,	Rom. xiii. 1.	516
— Evening	Duty of rulers,	2 Sam. xxiii. 3.	517
14th Morning	'Should not the shepherds feed the flocks?'	Ezek. xxxiv. 2.	518
— Evening	Respect due to faithful pastors,	1 Thes. v. 12, 13.	519
15th Morning	Brotherly love,	Rom. xii. 10.	520
— Evening	'If thine enemy hunger feed him,'	Rom. xii. 20, 21.	522
16th Morning	'Thou shalt not kill,'	Exod. xx. 13.	523
— Evening	Sin of anger,	Mat. v. 21, 22.	524
17th Morning	Punishment of murder,	Gen. ix. 6.	526
— Evening	Persecution for righteousness sake,	1 John iii. 12.	527
18th Morning	'Do thyself no harm,'	Acts xvi. 28.	528
— Evening	Sin and danger of intemperance,	Eph. v. 18.	529
19th Morning	Vengeance not man's but God's,	Rom. xii. 19.	531
— Evening	Living peaceably with all men,	Rom. xii. 18.	532
20th Morning	Rendering good for evil,	Mat. v. 44.	533
— Evening	Suffering for righteousness sake,	Mat. v. 10.	534
21st Morning	'Thou shalt not commit adultery,'	Exod. xx. 14.	536
— Evening	Adultery in the heart,	Mat. v. 28.	537
22nd Morning	Exhortation to purity,	Eph. v. 3, 4.	538
— Evening	Filthy communications,	Eph. iv. 29.	539
23rd Morning	God of purer eyes than to behold evil,	Hab. i. 13.	540
— Evening	Pure, lovely, and of good report,	Phil. iv. 8.	542
24th Morning	'Thou shalt not steal,'	Exod. xx. 15.	543
— Evening	Restoration of unlawful gains,	Lev. vi. 4.	544
25th Morning	Industry rewarded,	Prov. xxviii. 19.	545
— Evening	Pleasure and poverty,	Prov. xxi. 17.	547
26th Morning	He that will not work shall not eat,	2 Thes. iii. 10.	548
— Evening	Honest labour has something to spare,	Eph. iv. 28.	549
27th Morning	A brother waxen poor,	Lev. xxv. 35.	550
— Evening	Bowels of compassion,	1 John iii. 17, 18.	552
28th Morning	Charity blessed,	Ps. xli. 1.	553
— Evening	Alms in secret,	Mat. vi. 1.	554
29th Morning	Robbing God,	Mal. iii. 8—9.	556
— Evening	Tribute to whom tribute is due,	Rom. xiii. 7.	557
30th Morning	The Lord the avenger of fraud,	1 Thess. iv. 6.	558
— Evening	False weights an abomination,	Deut. xxv. 13—16.	559
31st Morning	Servants faithful, not purloining,	Tit. ii. 9, 10.	561
— Evening	Withholding the labourer's hire,	James v. 4.	562

AUGUST.

1st Morning	Bearing false witness,	Exod. xx. 16.	563
— Evening	Truth in the inward parts,	Ps. li. 6.	565
2nd Morning	A good name precious,	Eccl. vii. 1.	566
— Evening	Speech that cannot be condemned,	Tit. ii. 8.	567

AUGUST.			Page
3rd Morning	Fervent charity,	1 Peter iv. 8.	568
— Evening	Tale-bearers amongst God's people,	Lev. xix. 16.	570
4th Morning	Slanderers,	Ps. ci. 5.	571
— Evening	False swearers,	Mal. iii. 5.	572
5th Morning	Coals of juniper,	Ps. cxx. 3, 4.	573
— Evening	True dealers God's delight,	Prov. xii. 22.	575
6th Morning	Hypocrites, seared conscience,	1 Tim. iv. 2.	576
— Evening	The hypocrite, unmasked,	Job xxvii. 8.	577
7th Morning	Sincerity has God for a witness,	1 Thes. ii. 5.	578
— Evening	Flattering titles,	Job xxxii. 22.	580
8th Morning	The portion of liars,	Rev. xxi. 8.	581
— Evening	Oneness of the church—truth its union,	Eph. iv. 25.	582
9th Morning	'Lead me in thy truth,'	Ps. xxv. 5.	584
— Evening	Children walking in truth,	2 John 4.	585
10th Morning	'Thou shalt not covet,'	Exod. xx. 17.	586
— Evening	Spirituality of the law,	Rom. vii. 7.	587
11th Morning	Covetousness idolatry,	Col. iii. 5.	588
— Evening	Contentment,	Heb. xiii. 5.	590
12th Morning	Godliness great gain,	1 Tim. vi. 6—8.	591
— Evening	Sacrifice of praise,	Heb. xiii. 15.	592
13th Morning	Ahab heavy and displeased,	1 Kings xxi. 4.	593
— Evening	'Set not your heart upon riches,'	Ps. lxii. 10.	594
14th Morning	Mordecai at the king's gate,	Esth. v. 13.	595
— Evening	Mind not high things,	Rom. xii. 16.	597
15th Morning	End of the commandment is charity,	1 Tim. i. 5.	598
— Evening	Envy and strife, confusion,	James iii. 14-16.	599
16th Morning	Picture of charity,	1 Cor. xiii. 4-7.	601
— Evening	Saviour's love in laying down his life,	John xv. 13, 14.	602
17th Morning	Walking in God's statutes,	Ezek. xx. 19.	603
— Evening	'Quicken me in thy way,'	Ps. cxix. 37.	604
18th Morning	Law in the heart and children taught,	Deut. iv. 9.	605
— Evening	Law as frontlets and written on gates,	Deut. vi. 8, 9.	607
19th Morning	God's law a nation's privilege,	Deut. iv. 8.	608
— Evening	Light to the eyes and joy to the heart,	Ps. xix. 8.	609
20th Morning	All the world guilty before God,	Rom. iii. 19.	610
— Evening	Contrariety of the flesh and spirit,	Gal. v. 17.	610
21st Morning	None that doeth good,	Ps. xiv. 2, 3.	612
— Evening	Physician not for the whole but the sick,	Mat. ix. 12.	614
22nd Morning	Self-deceivers,	1 John i. 8.	615
— Evening	'Search me, O God,'	Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.	616
23rd Morning	Captivity to the law of sin,	Rom. vii. 23.	617
— Evening	'O wretched man that I am,'	Rom. vii. 24.	618
24th Morning	Self-justification,	Job ix. 20.	620
— Evening	Woe is me! for mine eyes have seen the king,	Isa. vi. 5.	621
25th Morning	No perfection in time,	1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10.	622
— Evening	Accepted in the Beloved,	Eph. i. 6.	623
26th Morning	God a reprover,	Ps. l. 21.	625
— Evening	Danger of forgetting God,	Ps. l. 22.	626
27th Morning	The tongue a world of iniquity,	James iii. 6.	627
— Evening	Reckoning for every idle word,	Mat. xii. 36.	628
28th Morning	Iniquities counted, the heart faileth,	Ps. xl. 12.	630
— Evening	'O Lord, make haste to help me,'	Ps. xl. 13.	631
29th Morning	Unprofitable servants,	Luke xvii. 10.	632
— Evening	'Why cumbereth it the ground,'	Luke xiii. 7.	633
30th Morning	Grace that bringeth salvation,	Tit. ii. 11, 12.	634
— Evening	Careful to maintain good works,	Tit. iii. 8.	635
31st Morning	Provoking the Most High,	Ps. lxxviii. 17.	637
— Evening	Sinners not consumed,	Mal. iii. 6.	638

SEPTEMBER.

1st Morning	Taking pleasure in sinners,	Rom. i. 32.	639
— Evening	Knowing, and not doing the will of God,	Luke xii. 47, 48.	640
2nd Morning	Children of disobedience,	Eph. v. 6.	642
— Evening	Offending in one point, guilty of all,	James ii. 10.	643
3rd Morning	By nature children of wrath,	Eph. ii. 3.	644
— Evening	The faithful saying,	1 Tim. i. 15.	645

SEPTEMBER.

			Page
4th Morning	Who shall dwell with devouring fire?	Isa. xxxiii. 14.	646
— Evening	The Lord—mighty to save,	Zeph. iii. 17.	647
5th Morning	Everlasting destruction,	2 Thes. i. 9.	646
— Evening	Is there no balm in Gilead?	Jer. viii. 22.	650
6th Morning	Depart from me, ye cursed,	Mat. xxv. 41.	651
— Evening	Kiss the son, lest he be angry,	Ps. ii. 12.	652
7th Morning	Repentance towards God,	Acts xx. 21.	654
— Evening	Belief and unbelief,	John iii. 36.	655
8th Morning	Mourning for a wounded Saviour,	Zech. xii. 10.	656
— Evening	Lord good and ready to forgive,	Ps. lxxxvi. 5.	657
9th Morning	Gifts for the rebellious,	Ps. lxxviii. 18.	659
— Evening	Repentance the Saviour's gift,	Acts v. 31.	660
10th Morning	Contempt of Christ's ministers,	Luke x. 16.	661
— Evening	Woe unto thee, Chorazin!	Luke x. 13.	663
11th Morning	By deeds of the law no flesh justified,	Rom. iii. 20.	664
— Evening	In the Lord shall Israel glory,	Isa. xlv. 25.	666
12th Morning	Ignorance of God's righteousness,	Rom. x. 3, 4.	667
— Evening	The humble exalted,	Luke xviii. 14.	669
13th Morning	Faith cometh by hearing,	Rom. x. 17.	670
— Evening	God giveth the increase,	1 Cor. iii. 6, 7.	671
14th Morning	Search the Scriptures,	John v. 39.	673
— Evening	Watching daily at wisdom's gates,	Prov. viii. 34.	674
15th Morning	Word of salvation sent,	Acts xiii. 26.	675
— Evening	Hear and your soul shall live,	Isa. lv. 3.	676
16th Morning	Devils believe and tremble,	James ii. 19.	678
— Evening	Faith which worketh by love,	Gal. v. 6.	679
17th Morning	Simon the magician,	Acts viii. 13.	680
— Evening	Examine yourselves,	2 Cor. xiii. 5.	681
18th Morning	The seed in stony places,	Mat. xiii. 20, 21.	683
— Evening	The God of all grace make you perfect,	1 Pet. v. 10.	684
19th Morning	Latter end worse than beginning,	2 Pet. ii. 20.	685
— Evening	The breast-plate of faith,	1 Thes. v. 8, 9.	686
20th Morning	Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord,	Mat. vii. 21.	688
— Evening	Depart from me ye that work iniquity,	Mat. vii. 22, 23.	689
21st Morning	Faith the substance of things hoped for,	Heb. xi. 1.	690
— Evening	God's gifts in various degrees,	Rom. xii. 3.	692
22nd Morning	Salvation, to whom sure?	Acts xvi. 31.	693
— Evening	Believing and confessing,	Rom. x. 10.	694
23rd Morning	Christ knocking at the door,	Rev. iii. 20.	695
— Evening	Fairer than the children of men,	Ps. xlv. 2.	696
24th Morning	'And thou shalt call his name Jesus,'	Mat. i. 21.	698
— Evening	Perfect peace,	Isa. xxvi. 3.	699
25th Morning	Drawing back unto perdition,	Heb. x. 39.	700
— Evening	A throne to him that overcometh,	Rev. iii. 21.	702
26th Morning	Bearing much fruit,	John xv. 8.	703
— Evening	Christian graces,	2 Pet. i. 5—7.	704
27th Morning	Hope purifies as Christ is pure,	1 John iii. 3.	706
— Evening	Purity of heaven,	Rev. xxi. 27.	707
28th Morning	Ho, every one that thirsteth,	Isa. lv. 1.	708
— Evening	Destitution without Christ,	Rev. iii. 17.	709
29th Morning	Care of the bruised reed,	Mat. xii. 20.	710
— Evening	The Lord's kindness to his flock,	Isa. xl. 11.	712
30th Morning	Fruit unto holiness,	Rom. vi. 22.	713
— Evening	Eternal life,	Rom. ii. 6, 7.	715

OCTOBER.

1st Morning	Danger of denying Christ,	2 Tim. ii. 12.	716
— Evening	'Fear not for I am with thee,'	Isa. xli. 10.	717
2nd Morning	God spared not his own Son,	Rom. viii. 32.	718
— Evening	'As thy day is so shall thy strength be,'	Deut. xxxiii. 25.	720
3rd Morning	The Lord will withhold no good thing,	Ps. lxxxiv. 11, 12.	721
— Evening	His love inseparable from his people,	Rom. viii. 38, 39.	722
4th Morning	Repentance granted to the Gentiles,	Acts xi. 18.	723
— Evening	Repentance not to be repented of,	2 Cor. vii. 10.	725
5th Morning	Grief for sin, unceasing,	Isa. xxxviii. 15.	726
— Evening	Blessed are the poor in spirit,	Mat. v. 3.	727

OCTOBER.			Page
6th Morning	Necessity of repentance,	Luke xiii. 5.	728
— Evening	'Why will ye die, O house of Israel?'	Ezek. xviii. 31.	729
7th Morning	Rend your hearts and not your garments,	Joel ii. 12, 13.	730
— Evening	'Fell on his neck and kissed him,'	Luke xv. 20.	731
8th Morning	Be zealous and repent,	Rev. iii. 19.	733
— Evening	Goodness of God leadeth to repentance,	Rom. ii. 4.	734
9th Morning	'Turn thou me and I shall be turned,'	Jer. xxxi. 18.	735
— Evening	Shame and anguish at the sight of sin,	Jer. xxxi. 19.	736
10th Morning	Seeking the Lord while he may be found,	Isa. lv. 6.	738
— Evening	The Lord will abundantly pardon,	Isa. lv. 7.	739
11th Morning	Fruits meet for repentance,	Mat. iii. 8.	740
— Evening	Cease to do evil, learn to do well,	Isa. i. 16, 17.	742
12th Morning	Searching the heart and turning to the Lord,	Lam. iii. 40.	743
— Evening	Perfecting holiness in the fear of God,	2 Cor. vii. 1.	744
13th Morning	Not willing that any should perish,	2 Pet. iii. 9.	746
— Evening	Joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth,	Luke xv. 10.	747
14th Morning	The grand commission—'teach all nations,'	Mat. xxviii. 19, 20.	748
— Evening	The word shall not return void,	Isa. lv. 10, 11.	749
15th Morning	Not by might nor by power,	Zech. iv. 6.	750
— Evening	Waiting on the Lord,	Isa. xl. 31.	752
16th Morning	Steadfastness in the faith,	Acts ii. 42.	753
— Evening	Gospel—the power of God,	Rom. i. 16.	754
17th Morning	The word a lamp unto the feet,	Ps. cxix. 105.	756
— Evening	Awake, thou that sleepest,	Eph. v. 14.	757
18th Morning	Communion with Christ,	John vi. 55, 56.	758
— Evening	No communion, no life,	John vi. 53.	760
19th Morning	Prayer in an acceptable time,	Ps. lxxix. 13.	761
— Evening	'Ask what ye will,'	John xv. 7.	762
20th Morning	Prayer with fasting,	Dan. ix. 3.	764
— Evening	God repenting of the evil,	John iii. 5—10.	765
21st Morning	Hypocritical fasting,	Isa. lviii. 5—7.	766
— Evening	Saviour's directions how to fast,	Mat. vi. 16—18.	767
22nd Morning	Understanding the scriptures,	Neh. xiii. 8.	769
— Evening	Convincing power of the word,	1 Cor. xiv. 25.	770
23rd Morning	Word given that hope may be in God,	Rom. xv. 4.	771
— Evening	Edification by the word of grace,	Acts xx. 32.	773
24th Morning	'He shall read therein all the days of his life,'	Deut. xvii. 19.	774
— Evening	Keeping the things that are written,	Rev. i. 3.	775
25th Morning	Assembling in God's house,	Deut. xxxi. 12, 13.	776
— Evening	Sons and daughters to the Almighty,	2 Cor. vi. 18.	778
26th Morning	Delighting in the law of the Lord,	Ps. i. 2.	779
— Evening	Trusting in the Lord for light,	Prov. iii. 5.	780
27th Morning	'Then opened he their understanding,'	Luke xxiv. 45.	781
— Evening	Effects of the Spirit,	Isa. xlv. 3—5.	783
28th Morning	Ordination of the ministry,	Eph. iv. 11, 12.	784
— Evening	Called of God as was Aaron,	Heb. v. 4.	786
29th Morning	Instant in season and out of season,	2 Tim. iv. 2.	787
— Evening	Ministers fervent in spirit,	Acts xviii. 25.	788
30th Morning	Faithful stewards,	1 Cor. iv. 2.	789
— Evening	Pure from the blood of all men,	Acts xx. 26, 27.	791
31st Morning	Able ministers of the New Testament,	2 Cor. iii. 6.	792
— Evening	United prayer for the Spirit,	Acts i. 14.	793

NOVEMBER.

1st Morning	Word preached that souls may be saved,	1 Cor. i. 21.	795
— Evening	Word received with meekness,	James i. 21.	796
2nd Morning	Young man cleansing his way,	Ps. cxix. 9.	797
— Evening	Speaking the truth in love,	Eph. iv. 15.	798
3rd Morning	Indwelling of the word,	Col. iii. 16.	800
— Evening	The Lord's glory beheld,	2 Cor. iii. 18.	801
4th Morning	The word more than necessary food,	Job xxiii. 12.	802
— Evening	Fruit in old age,	Ps. xcii. 14.	803
5th Morning	Old and New Testament seals,	Gen. xvii. 9, 10.	805
— Evening	Baptism not regeneration,	Acts viii. 23.	806
6th Morning	Baptizing all nations,	Mat. xxviii. 19.	807
— Evening	Privilege and duty of the baptized,	Gal. iii. 27.	809

TITLES OF SUBJECTS.

xi

NOVEMBER.			Page
7th Morning	Faith required—the Ethiopian,	Acts viii. 36, 37.	810
— Evening	Repent and be baptized,	Acts ii. 38.	811
8th Morning	Promise to you and your children,	Acts ii. 39.	812
— Evening	Putting off the body of sin,	Col. ii. 11.	814
9th Morning	'But now are your children holy,'	1 Cor. vii. 14.	815
— Evening	Children invited to Christ,	Mat. xix. 14.	816
10th Morning	Care of children's souls,	Ps. lxxviii. 5, 6	818
— Evening	Parental vows,	Ecl. v. 4, 5.	819
11th Morning	Sin of neglecting baptism,	Mark xvi. 16.	821
— Evening	Bodies washed with pure water,	Heb. x. 22.	822
12th Morning	Ordinance of the supper,	1 Cor. xi. 23—25.	824
— Evening	Christ evidently set forth,	Gal. iii. 1.	825
13th Morning	'This do in remembrance of me,'	1 Cor. xi. 25.	826
— Evening	Forgetfulness of God's goodness,	Ps. lxxviii. 10, 11.	828
14th Morning	Lord's death shown till he come,	1 Cor. xi. 26.	829
— Evening	The Lord's coming,	Rev. i. 7.	830
15th Morning	The cup of blessing,	1 Cor. x. 16.	832
— Evening	Lovers of Christ, loved of the Father,	John xiv. 23.	833
16th Morning	One body—partakers of one bread,	1 Cor. x. 17.	834
— Evening	Eating with gladness and singleness of heart,	Acts ii. 46.	835
17th Morning	Eating and drinking unworthily,	1 Cor. xi. 29.	836
— Evening	Self-examination,	1 Cor. xi. 28.	837
18th Morning	'Eat, O friends—drink, O beloved,'	Cant. v. 1.	839
— Evening	Of his fulness have all received,	John i. 16.	840
19th Morning	Thanksgiving and payment of vows,	Ps. l. 14.	841
— Evening	Faces towards Zion,	Jer. l. 5.	843
20th Morning	Zion's wilderness like Eden,	Isa. li. 3.	844
— Evening	The voice of rejoicing and salvation,	Ps. cxviii. 15.	845
21st Morning	Trusting and finding help,	Ps. xxviii. 7.	847
— Evening	Not returning to folly,	Ps. lxxxv. 8.	848
22nd Morning	The new song,	Isa. xlii. 10—12.	849
— Evening	The hart panting for the water-brooks,	Ps. xliii. 1, 2.	850
23rd Morning	A voice from the throne,	Rev. xix. 5.	852
— Evening	Darkness—marvellous light,	1 Pet. ii. 9.	853
24th Morning	Glorious in holiness, fearful in praises,	Exod. xv. 11.	855
— Evening	Earth filled with the Lord's glory,	Ps. lxxii. 17—19.	856
25th Morning	Hearer of prayer,	Ps. lxxv. 2.	857
— Evening	A father pitying his children,	Ps. cxiii. 13.	859
26th Morning	Pouring out the heart before God,	Ps. lxxii. 8.	860
— Evening	Service of the lips,	Isa. xxix. 13.	861
27th Morning	Acceptable service,	1 Pet. ii. 5.	862
— Evening	Lord and Redeemer,	2 Kings xvii. 35, 36.	864
28th Morning	Asking according to divine will,	1 John v. 14.	865
— Evening	The new and living way,	Heb. x. 19, 20.	866
29th Morning	The Spirit's help in prayer,	Rom. viii. 26.	867
— Evening	Need of Divine teaching,	Job xxxvii. 19.	869
30th Morning	'Pray without ceasing,'	1 Thes. v. 17.	870
— Evening	Prayer, refuge of the afflicted,	James v. 13.	871

DECEMBER.

1st Morning	Boldness at a throne of grace,	Heb. iv. 15, 16.	873
— Evening	Ask—that your joy may be full,	John xvi. 23, 24.	874
2nd Morning	Supplications for all men,	1 Tim. ii. 1.	875
— Evening	Prayer for the church,	Ps. xxviii. 9.	877
3rd Morning	Prayer that God's glory be exalted,	Ps. lvii. 11.	878
— Evening	Prayer for the peace of Jerusalem,	Ps. cxxii. 6—8.	879
4th Morning	The publican smiting upon his breast,	Luke xviii. 13.	880
— Evening	The broken and contrite heart,	Ps. li. 17.	882
5th Morning	Lord nigh to all that call,	Ps. cxlv. 18.	883
— Evening	'Not as I will but as thou wilt,'	Mat. xxvi. 39.	884
6th Morning	Spiritual direction,	Job xxiii. 3, 4.	885
— Evening	Prayer without knowledge,	Rom. x. 14.	887
7th Morning	The Lord's prayer to be used,	Luke xi. 1, 2.	888
— Evening	The Lord's prayer given as a directory,	Mat. vi. 9.	889
8th Morning	Children of God by faith in Christ Jesus,	Gal. iii. 26.	890
— Evening	'Our Father which art in heaven,'	Mat. vi. 9.	892

DECEMBER.				Page
9th	Morning	'Hallowed be thy name,'	Mat. vi. 9.	893
—	Evening	The Lord sanctified in them that come nigh,	Lev. x. 3.	894
10th	Morning	'Thy kingdom come,'	Mat. vi. 10.	895
—	Evening	Surely the Lord cometh quickly,	Rev. xxiii. 20.	897
11th	Morning	'Thy will be done,'	Mat. vi. 10.	898
—	Evening	Job's submission,	Job i. 21.	900
12th	Morning	'Give us this day our daily bread,'	Mat. vi. 11.	901
—	Evening	Neither poverty nor riches,	Prov. xxx. 8, 9.	902
13th	Morning	'Forgive us our debts,'	Mat. vi. 12.	904
—	Evening	Forgiving one another,	Eph. iv. 31, 32.	905
14th	Morning	'Lead us not into temptation,'	Mat. vi. 13.	906
—	Evening	Resistance to tempters,	Prov. i. 10.	907
15th	Morning	'For thine is the kingdom,' &c.,	Mat. vi. 13.	909
—	Evening	Pleading in prayer,	Dan. ix. 19.	910
16th	Morning	Waiting on the Lord,	Ps. xxvii. 14.	912
—	Evening	The Creator fainteth not,	Isa. xl. 28, 29.	913
17th	Morning	Good hope through grace,	2 Thes. ii. 16, 17.	915
—	Evening	Able to keep you from falling,	Jude xxiv. 25.	916
18th	Morning	Days on earth as a shadow,	1 Chron. xxix. 15.	917
—	Evening	The night cometh,	John ix. 4.	918
19th	Morning	Time of departure at hand,	2 Tim. iv. 6.	919
—	Evening	Dying in the Lord,	Rev. xiv. 13.	921
20th	Morning	God of the living not of the dead,	Mat. xxii. 31, 32.	922
—	Evening	The resurrection and the life,	John xi. 25, 26.	923
21st	Morning	Awaking to life, or shame and contempt,	Dan. xii. 2.	924
—	Evening	Satisfied with God's likeness,	Ps. xvii. 15.	925
22nd	Morning	Immortality,	1 Cor. xv. 54.	926
—	Evening	'O Death, where is thy sting?'	1 Cor. xv. 55—57.	928
23rd	Morning	After Death the judgment,	Heb. ix. 27.	929
—	Evening	Every man must give an account,	Rom. xiv. 11, 12.	930
24th	Morning	Verily God judgeth in the earth,	Ps. lviii. 11.	932
—	Evening	The bygone ruin,	Gen. vi. 5—7.	933
25th	Morning	In the last days—scoffers,	2 Pet. iii. 3.	934
—	Evening	Day of the Lord as a thief in the night,	2 Pet. iii. 10.	935
26th	Morning	Holy conversation and godliness,	2 Pet. iii. 11.	937
—	Evening	Every work brought into judgment,	Eccl. xii. 14.	938
27th	Morning	Son of man in the glory of his Father,	Mat. xvi. 27.	940
—	Evening	The sinner speechless,	Mat. xxii. 12.	941
28th	Morning	Everlasting punishment—life eternal,	Mat. xxv. 46.	943
—	Evening	The wicked turned into hell,	Ps. ix. 17.	944
29th	Morning	Faithful over a few things,	Mat. xxv. 21.	946
—	Evening	'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,'	Mat. xxv. 21.	947
30th	Morning	The pure in heart shall see God,	Mat. v. 8.	948
—	Evening	'Unto him that loved us,'	Rev. i. 5.	949
31st	Morning	The ransomed of the Lord,	Isa. xxxv. 10.	950
—	Evening	The Lamb for ever and ever,	Rev. v. 13.	951

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS.

Rev. J. Forbes, D.D., LL.D., Glasgow.....	Jan. 1	Jan. 14	Rev. Archd. Bennie, Edinburgh.....	Aug. 13	to	—	26.
— H. Cook, D.D., LL.D., Belfast.....	— 15	— 28.	— Robert Jeffrey, Girthon.....	— 27	—	Sept. 9.
— N. Morren, A.M., Greenock.....	— 29	Feb. 11.	— J. Julius Wood, Edinburgh.....	Sept. 10	—	— 23.
— James Barr, D.D., Port-Glasgow.....	Feb. 12	— 25.	— Robert Buchanan, D.D., Glasgow	— 24	—	Oct. 7.
— James Morgan, A.M., Belfast.....	— 26	Mar. 11.	— Walter Paterson, Kirkurd.....	Oct. 8	—	— 21.
— William Dunn, A.M., Cardross.....	Mar. 12	— 25.	— William Arnot, Glasgow.....	— 22	—	— 28.
— D. Landsborough, Stevenston.....	— 26	April 8.	— Andrew Gray, A.M., Perth.....	— 29	—	Nov. 4.
— R. M. McCheyne, A.M., Dundee.....	April 9	— 22.	— R. Stewart, D.D., Broughshane.....	Nov. 5	—	— 11.
— George Craig, Sprouston.....	— 23	May 6.	— W.M. Hetherington, A.M., Torphichen	12	—	— 18.
— J. M. McCulloch, D.D., Kelso.....	May 7	— 20.	— John Macfarlane, Colesie.....	— 19	—	— 25.
— James Brewster, D.D., Craig.....	— 21	June 3.	— James Smith, Dumbarton.....	— 26	—	Dec. 2.
— M. Mackay, LL.D., Dunoon.....	June 4	— 17.	— William Buchan, Hamilton.....	Dec. 3	—	— 9.
— Thomas Brown, D.D., Glasgow.....	— 18	July 1.	— William K. Tweedie, Edinburgh	— 10	—	— 16.
— James Foote, A.M., Aberdeen.....	July 2	— 15.	— William Mackenzie, Dumblane..	— 17	—	— 23.
— J. G. Lorimer, Glasgow.....	— 16	— 29.	— William Nixon, Montrose.....	— 24	—	— 31.
— William Wilson, Carmylie.....	— 30	Aug. 12.

THE CHRISTIAN'S DAILY COMPANION.

---

JANUARY.

FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth,' Gen. i. 1.

THE work of creation, implying the production of all things out of nothing, constitutes an amazing operation of the power of God. And as the universe arose at his command, its continued duration is absolutely dependent upon his will. Nothing in heaven or on earth is independent or self-existent; for this constitutes the incommunicable excellence of him who alone hath immortality, who dwelleth in light which is inaccessible to mortal eye, and full of glory. As to man he is of yesterday, and knows nothing. Tracing back the annals of time, we arrive at no very extended era at the foundation of the proudest monarchies, and the most venerated institutions. Within a circle, somewhat more enlarged, we embrace the origin of the globe itself, and of the surrounding heavens; when the sun began to roll his earliest circuit, and the moon to measure forth her appointed revolutions. Beyond this, and within a range, however, comparatively great, still finite, we reach the era when the angelic hosts were called into existence. But the years of the right hand of the Most High who can number? He inhabiteth eternity and its praises. Uncreated, unlimited, and independent, as there shall never arrive a period in the exhaustless flow of the cycles of futurity when he shall cease to be; neither was there ever a period, in all the remote tracts of past duration, when he began to exist.

'I am the First, and I the Last;
Time centres all in me;
Th' Almighty God, who was, and is,
And evermore shall be.'

The doctrine of creation, in the proper sense of the term, depends upon the testimony of inspiration for its proof. Evidences of design so copiously exhibited throughout all the departments of the universe, unquestionably proclaim to every reflective mind the existence of God. But it was long a question, with some of the most eminent philosophers of antiquity, whether matter was not essentially eternal; and whether God ought not to be viewed rather as the contriver of the universe out of elements already existing, than in the strict and proper signification of the term, its Creator, or absolute Author. To the devout student of revelation there is no longer any darkness resting upon this subject; for 'through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God; so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.'

The design of this great work was to display the glory of its adorable Author; and how fully it was fitted to secure this end, we may even yet understand, notwithstanding the extent to which it has been marred by the influence of sin. The wisdom, the power, and the majesty of God, every where appear in the astonishing magnificence and sublimity of those vast and harmonious arrangements which constitute what have been called the laws of the material universe. His goodness, liberality, and benevolence, together with the all-comprehending and ceaseless assiduity of his providence, shine forth not less conspicuously in connection with the organization, the preservation, and the enjoyments common to the endless variety of the tribes of animate creatures which people the earth, the air, and the sea. It has been justly observed, that though pain and suffering are incident to the creation, it cannot be said, that there is to be found any where an arrangement, or an object, having no beneficial use, and whose sole and ultimate end is to produce misery. Whence then has evil been derived, wherefore has it been permitted to enter? This is a mystery which the scriptures explain in the most explicit manner. 'By one man's disobedience sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death hath come upon all men in that all have sinned.'

A

But the visible creation forms as it were only a platform for the exhibition of a still more glorious work, the work of redemption. In it the perfections of God as the Saviour, as well as the Creator of man, are revealed. The purest justice blends with the richest mercy; and the holiness of the lawgiver is seen in unison with the tender compassion of our Father in heaven. 'The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.' At first man was made to be as it were the priest of the glorious temple of creation; and with rational soul, articulate speech, and spiritual service, the duty belonged to him of celebrating the worship and praise of the great Author and Governor of all things. But what, alas, has man become, and what does he continue to be, until washed from his sin in the blood of Jesus, and renewed in the spirit of his mind after the image of him who created him? He is an apostate from the kingdom of righteousness, an alien from God, a slave of sin and Satan, and the devoted victim of condemnation and death. And how wonderful the interposition of sovereign grace; whether we regard the state in which it finds us, or the rank and the honour to which it designs to raise us. The work of God, in reconciling a guilty world to himself, not imputing to men their trespasses, stands forth to every reflective mind who devoutly regards it under an aspect as peculiarly divine, as the astonishing operation by which he formed all things out of nothing. To educe from a state of moral evil, such as this world presents, those glorious results which the gospel contemplates, to convert rebels into sons; to give them the victory over sin, and Satan, and death; to advance them to the enjoyment of a glorious immortality, and to set them at his own right hand in heavenly places, manifests an infinitude of love and mercy, of unparalleled grandeur, such as no created mind could have conceived, until it was actually revealed. When the heavens and the earth were made, the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted aloud for joy; but what higher and intenser acclamations of delight and praise shall distinguish that day, when all the glory of the work of redemption shall stand displayed; when mortal shall put on immortality, and corruption incorruption, and death shall be swallowed up of victory; and the saints of God set free, shall rise and reign in the kingdom of the Father for ever and ever.

---

FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'It is good for me to draw near to God,' Ps. lxxiii. 28.

THE benefits of religion are incalculably great and precious. It constitutes the safety, the blessedness, and the ornament of our nature, to cherish its spirit, to taste of its joys, and to follow its counsels. Of all religious duties, 'to draw near to God' is the most sacred; and whenever it is rightly engaged in, it cannot fail to be accompanied with benefits which will enable the sincere worshipper to join in the auspicious acknowledgment of David, 'it is good for me to draw near to God.' It is eminently a spiritual duty; and consists in realizing with more than usual solemnity and awe the divine presence; in resting with vigorous faith and confidence in the divine word; in feeling and confessing our deep unworthiness and guilt before him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; in laying hold of the righteousness of Christ, and confiding in his all-prevailing intercession and infinite merits; in exercising the privilege of transacting with God in prayer, and praise, and other religious duties; and in drawing from his excellencies and perfections motives for love, for hope, and for joy in God.

When compared with any of the other prevailing employments of life, what an enhancement is conferred upon that which is here commended to our adoption, whether we consider its nature or effects. There is a social principle in human nature, and rightly exercised it may be productive of much good; but how often does man employ it to evil. What baneful lessons may be learned in the society which is most congenial to the ungodly mind; and how injurious are the effects produced by an indiscriminate mixture with the world. But wisdom, grace, and holiness, the blessing which addeth no sorrow, the joy unspeakable and full of glory, and which maketh not ashamed, form the portion of those who habituate themselves to wait upon God, and who seek his face in spirit and in truth. Like Moses on descending from the mount, who bore upon his countenance and his person the indication of that glorious presence in which he had stood, they will carry with them unto the duties, the labours, and the trials of life, a sacred influence which will at once dignify their characters, and strengthen, and comfort their minds. For whether it be to temper the gaiety of youth with discretion, to abate the pride and presumption of a fleeting prosperity, to check the repining murmurs of a state of distress, to soothe the sorrows of bereavement and desolation, or to cheer the bed of affliction and of death ; how good is it to draw near to God.

But farther, as a sacred duty, how appropriate and just is the acknowledgment, here made, in regard to drawing near to God. There is a conscious enjoyment in following the dictates of truth and righteousness ; and in acting in unison with the principles of an enlightened conscience ; whilst, on the other hand, there is a sense of bitterness and self-reproach attendant on the neglect of known duties, and the violation of sacred and acknowledged obligations. We cannot, and we ought not, indeed, to draw near to God, to minister to a self-righteous and self-complacent spirit. We need forgiveness, even for our best duties ; and our devotional services, no less than our ordinary actions, can only find acceptance with an infinitely holy God through the merits of the Saviour. At the same time, 'to draw near to God' with a sincere and humble desire to serve him acceptably, through Jesus Christ, cannot fail to be accompanied with comfort and joy ; for it shows to the extent that we are enabled to do so, that our hearts are impressed by divine grace, that we are alive to a sense of our spiritual duty, and that we have become reconciled to God through the blood of the cross. A knowledge of this should dictate the earnest and habitual prayer that God would quicken us by the Holy Spirit to love and serve him ; that he would draw us, by the cords of love, into a state of closer and more spiritual communion, and that he would increase in us that faith without which it is impossible to please God.

It is good to draw near to God as your Creator ; to realize your dependence upon him, to reverence his high and glorious perfections, and to stir up your minds to gratitude, adoration, and thanksgiving, towards him, as the supreme source of all being, and of all blessing. How delightful to be able to 'see God in all his works, and to find incentives to praise him in the glory of the heavens, and in all the fullness of the world.' The inspired psalmist exhibits, in many interesting passages, how the pious mind may hold converse with God, through the medium of his works, and offer up the tribute of an intelligent praise in behalf of universal nature, to its Creator and its King.

It is also good to draw near to God, as your Preserver ; to celebrate his goodness every morning, and his faithfulness every night. He is the strength of our lives, and the length of our days ; he compasseth our path and our lying down, and is acquainted with all our ways. 'The Lord reigneth, let the earth be glad, and the multitude of the isles rejoice.' What contentment, security, gratitude, and resignation, would it not inspire, to cast all our care upon God, and to acknowledge the righteousness, the faithfulness, and the mercy with which he governs all his creatures, and makes all things work together for his own glory and the best interests of those who love him.

It is good to draw near to God as your Redeemer ; to supplicate the aids of his grace, to treasure up the promises and consolations of his faithfulness and loving-kindness, to meditate upon all the excellence of his character, all the riches of his grace, and all the glory of his kingdom.

In fine, it is good to draw near to God as your Judge ; to examine yourselves by his holy word, to implore, in the spirit of unfeigned penitence, the forgiveness of sin, and an interest in his grace ; to beseech the sacred guidance of his wisdom and the powerful efficacy of his Spirit amidst the snares and temptations of life ; and to devote yourselves, both soul, and body, and spirit, to his holy and blessed service. 'Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.'

---

SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'All scripture is given by inspiration of God,' 2 Tim. iii. 16.

How endlessly diversified, and even opposite, have been the views and sentiments of those reputed the wisest men by the world, upon subjects of the highest and most sacred importance. What a labyrinth the history of the schools and sects which from time to time have risen, flourished, and then passed into oblivion. We need not wonder, although a mind perplexed and bewildered with the endless mass of incongruous tenets which have been promulgated, should almost sink into despair about the possibility of ever finding truth. But the gracious Author of our being, he who gave man understanding, has mercifully interposed to remedy this great and sore evil, and has placed before us, in the sacred oracles, the knowledge which is necessary to make us wise unto salvation.

The subjects about which scripture is concerned, though the farthest from the reach of mere human investigation, are of the highest practical moment and of the most enduring personal interest to every member of our race. The being, the perfections, and the counsels of God; the nature, the authority, and the sanctions of the divine law; the demerit of sin; the method of restoration to the favour of God through a Redeemer; the regenerating and sanctifying agency of the Holy Spirit; the covenant relation in which God stands to his people; the unalterable love which he bears to them, and the ineffable blessedness to which he shall exalt them, constitute an outline of the grand themes presented to our knowledge in the divine testimonies. Every great and solemn question which we can desire to have solved in relation to our duty, our interests, and our prospects, as accountable beings, is satisfactorily settled in the scriptures, and it is no slight demonstration of their excellence that whilst they shed a copious light upon every subject truly interesting or important, in a religious and moral point of view, they utterly abstain from gratifying the idle inquiries of a mere fruitless curiosity. To derive benefit from the holy scriptures, we must read them with reverence, humility, faith, penitence, and an earnest and prayerful spirit, that we may find them to be to our souls a savour of life unto life. Relinquishing the proud spirit of self-sufficiency, which is so natural to the human mind in its unregenerate state, we should sit with the teachableness of little children at the feet of inspiration, and the sacred testimony, 'thus saith the Lord,' should be decisive upon every subject, and command the profoundest homage of our understandings and of our hearts. Whatever apparent difficulties we may find in any part of scripture, we should reflect, that it ought to be expected that 'the only wise God' should have discoveries to place before us beyond our capacity fully to conceive, and works to reveal past finding out. A consciousness of our spiritual blindness and liability to err on all subjects relative to salvation, should dictate a spirit of fervent and habitual supplication to the great Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift. To how many does the power of indwelling corruption render the volume of inspiration a sealed book, because they neglect the duty to which they are called in this respect; 'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not.' The loftiness of pride disdains to learn from the source of revelation, as something altogether abject and useless; the presumptuous complacency of a self-righteous spirit scorns to admit its humbling truths, and rejects it as a libel on the character of human nature; the boldness of impenitence and infidelity calls in question the justice and truth of its representations, concerning the guilt and penalty of sin, and affects to compliment the mercy of God at the expence of his truth; the love of the world spurns the sacred principles which it inculcates as visionary and enthusiastic, whilst the lawless violence of vice and licentiousness blasphemes its authority as a tyranny subversive of the natural liberty and happiness which are the prerogative of man.

The doctrine, that all scripture is given by inspiration of God, impresses a peculiar value upon every portion of the sacred volume, and should secure the conviction that a design, worthy of infinite wisdom and righteousness, pervades all it contains. Let us aspire to possess an eminently sanctifying and comforting experience of the majesty, the power, the purity, the wisdom, and the excellence which distinguish the sacred oracles. 'They are more precious than gold; yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey or the honey comb.' The main design of the Spirit of inspiration, in both the Old and the New Testament, is to reveal Christ; to make known his character, his offices, and his work as a Saviour; to invite sinners to come to him, and believe on him, that he may be made unto them of God, 'wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and complete redemption.' How solemn are the warnings against despising the divine testimonies, and rejecting Christ. 'Whosoever shall fall on this stone, shall be broken, but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind them to powder.'

'Within this awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries.
Oh! happiest they of human race,
To whom our God has given grace
To hear, to read, to fear, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way;
But better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.'

SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'But the Comforter, who is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things,' John xiv. 26.

It is the privilege of the redeemed to be exalted to the most distinguished rank, and to the most glorious prospects. Not only are they delivered from a state of condemnation, but they are advanced to the dignity of the sons of God, and 'receive the spirit of adoption, whereby they cry, Abba, Father.' And although the world knows them not, as it knew not their divine Master, that renders not the communications with heaven, which they are privileged to enjoy, or the blessings from on high with which they are visited, the less real or the less precious. The Holy Ghost, the third person in the adorable Godhead, is equally concerned as the Father and the Son in promoting the work of human redemption; and it constitutes his special province to form the medium of communication through whom Christ and the blessings of salvation are sealed and applied to believers. A knowledge of his person, and of his work, accompanied with an earnest desire to enjoy the benefits which he conveys, is essential to salvation; and, accordingly, the Saviour concluded not his personal ministry, nor left the earth, until he had first instructed his disciples, that they were henceforth to look upon themselves as placed more immediately under the guidance, protection, and consolation of the divine Spirit, whom, at his intercession, the Father should send down upon them. The agency of the Spirit is distinguished by the most consummate wisdom and grace, and he adapts his communications and blessings with admirable suitability to the various circumstances of the church, to the diversified exigencies of believers, and to the peculiar openings of providence, and to the state of the world at different periods. On the day of pentecost, and during the age of miraculous interposition, he manifested his presence by affixing the seal of heaven, by signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds, to the doctrines which the apostles delivered. At all times his operation is necessary to render the ordinances of the gospel efficacious, that sinners may be convinced and converted; saints edified and comforted; and the church built up in faith and holiness to eternal life.

The necessity for divine teaching arises from the corruption and moral blindness, together with the alienation of heart from God, characteristic of human nature in its fallen state. It is not enough to have the objective knowledge of divine things set before the mind in the volume of inspiration, if the mind itself is incapable of rendering due attention to them, by an aversion which repels the subject altogether, or by sinful prejudices which warp its vision, and prevent the truth from being fairly and distinctly felt. We do not depreciate the value of the divine testimonies when we assert that they are insufficient of themselves, exclusive of the power of the Holy Spirit, to make men wise unto salvation. They claim for themselves no higher honour than that of being the 'sword of the Spirit,' the instrument which he wields for penetrating and subduing the soul of the sinner. The divine Author of Christianity teaches us that it is the Spirit who quickeneth, the word profiteth little. And one of the greatest apostles and ministers of the New Testament has placed it upon record, 'that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' The constant misapprehension of our Saviour's own immediate disciples, it has been well observed, of which we read so much in the gospel, was certainly due as much to their being blind, as to their being in the dark; to their defect in the power of seeing, as to any defect in the visibility of what was actually set before them.

It is the province of the Holy Spirit to open the heart, as in the case of Lydia, to attend to the things that are revealed in the gospel, and spoken by the ministers of Christ; to impress convictions of sin, as took place on the day of pentecost, with the three thousand who were converted under the preaching of Peter; to impart faith, and to enable the sinner effectually to flee to Christ for salvation, as happened with the Ethiopian eunuch, the Philippian jailor, and others; and to produce a growing experience of the power and efficacy of divine grace upon the soul, and a persevering devotedness in the Christian life under all its duties, and under all its trials, as was exemplified by the faithful disciples of the apostolic and of every subsequent age. When Paul would express his confidence, that the Thessalonians had received the gospel, when it was first preached to them, in a saving manner, he does so by ascribing their reception of it to the agency of the Holy Spirit. 'For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.' All vital godliness, all genuine and permanent religious principles, must then be implanted in the soul by the Spirit in every instance; and his agency, and his blessing, must also continue to attend the work, throughout all its progress, onwards to its final consummation in glory. The gift of the Holy Spirit, and of his precious influences, was the purchase of the Redeemer's blood; and it was in virtue of the efficacy of his atoning sacrifice, that when he ascended up into heaven, he obtained his interposition to guide, and comfort, and sanctify his disciples. To pray for the Spirit, to cherish his indwelling in their souls, and to walk in communion with him, constitutes the privilege and the duty of all who receive the gospel. But how much is this privilege undervalued, and how extensively is this duty neglected! The self-righteous tendencies of the heart are so strong, that we are habitually in danger of leaning to our own understandings, confiding in our own sufficiency, and resting satisfied with our actual state, however characterized by backsliding, lukewarmness and spiritual degeneracy. If we felt aright our sinfulness on the one hand, or if we knew the grace of God on the other, and understood what we would become by walking in the Spirit, and bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit, how should we long and thirst for the influences of the Spirit as our chief good! O let the solemn impression of these words be felt by every individual. 'To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace.' Heaven is brought down to every soul in which the Spirit has his residence; and to the degree that his enlightening, sanctifying, and comforting operations are enjoyed, the joy of heaven is experienced, and its character and dispositions are formed. 'Ho, every one that thirsteth, come unto the waters and drink, and he that hath no money; yea, come buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore will ye give your money for that which is not bread? and your labours for that which satisfieth not? Harken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness. Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.'

---

THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,'
Deut. vi. 4.

ALTHOUGH the Jews were not distinguished for scientific eminence, like many other ancient commonwealths, yet they infinitely excelled them all in the knowledge of a sublime and pure theology. While Egypt, Greece, Persia, and the whole ancient world, was spell-bound by idolatrous delusion, how remarkable the contrast among the posterity of Abraham; who had a law which not only prohibited the least approximation to the sin in question, but inculcated the most elevated and spiritual conceptions with regard to the unity, perfection, and the majesty of Jehovah. And although this people were not distinguished for superiority in learning, or in science, but the reverse, yet has science, in the fullest manner, adopted and accredited their faith; and from the loftiest star to which she has winged her flight, or the deepest laboratory of nature into whose recesses she has ever penetrated, has she brought back accumulated demonstrations to the doctrine that there is but one God. Every where she finds herself within an empire which by the uniformity of its laws, the identity of its institutions, and the symmetry and consistency of its administration, proves this great truth. The same force which causes a stone to fall, or a stream to flow, at the earth's surface, is found to incline and bend to the sun the largest and the most remote planet in our system; and to guide the course of the erratic and far revolving comet, as it pursues its mysterious flight, crossing over worlds through the interminable fields of one unexplored immensity, unto the equally profound and inaccessible recesses of another. It is the same God who forms the dry land, and who holds the waters of the deep in the hollow of his hand; who weighs the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance; who kindles into brightness the host of heaven by the breath of his mouth; and who has filled the whole universe with the harmonious indications of his all-creative and adorable power.

The degradation connected with the idolatrous worship of the heathen world, constituted a decisive and melancholy evidence of the power of Satan over a fallen and blinded race. It was at once the effect and the punishment of that spirit of enmity and alienation which caused them that they did not like to retain God in their knowledge. 'Professing themselves to be wise they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things.' If the religious feelings and dispositions of the human mind be not exercised on their proper objects, and consecrated to the worship and service of the true God, they will be perverted to the most injurious and degraded ends; and from being the glory become the disgrace, and the bane of human nature. Hence an undue love of the creature, an extravagant desire for the pleasures and possessions of the world, and the vain hope that a satisfying enjoyment can be obtained in the multiplication of those objects which please and flatter the natural feelings and sentiments of the mind. The scriptures teach us to regard covetousness as idolatry, and upon a similar ground are we to consider every unhallowed affection, as of this nature, which would exalt any created thing to that place in our esteem and confidence which is due only to God.

---

THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'From all your filthiness, and all your idols, will I cleanse you,' Ezek. xxxvi. 25.

IDOLATRY and wickedness were invariably connected in the history of the people of Israel, and no sooner did they depart, in any case, from the true God, and adopt the creed of the surrounding heathen, than they became characterized for every thing flagitious, immoral, and abandoned in conduct. How untenable the sentiments of those who attribute little or no influence to the religious opinions which men may entertain, and who conceive that a high standard of virtue and moral purity may coexist with heretical, sceptical, or infidel principles. Before God would bring back the captivity of Israel, and reinstate them in the land from which they had been cast out for their sins, he showed them that he would effect a great spiritual change upon them, and cleanse them from all their filthiness, and from all their idols. And in like manner are we taught in the New Testament, that before any can be put in possession of the mercy of God in Christ, or of the inheritance which awaits the saints in life, they require to become the subjects of a change so great and decided, as to admit of being expressed by terms no less emphatic than those of being born again, and made new creatures. And hence the security provided in the economy of grace, that the mercy of God cannot be exercised in vain; or, as an eminent divine has strongly stated the subject, that the righteousness of Christ can never be made the covering of a dead soul. There is a necessary and inseparable connection between regeneration and justification, and it is only in that heart which has been renewed and purified by the power of the Holy Spirit, that Christ can dwell, and that the blessings of salvation can be effectually received and enjoyed.

To have restored Israel to the land of Canaan without, in the first place, renewing them to repentance, and cleansing them from their filthiness and their idols, would have been a course neither really beneficial to themselves, nor calculated to promote the glory of God. And how surely then may we know that none of the children of men can ever be permitted to enter into that heavenly kingdom of which Canaan was only an emblem and a type, unless they are first washed from their sins in the blood of Christ, and renewed in the spirit of their minds by the Spirit of God. The society, the employment, and the blessedness of heaven, can only be congenial to those whom God has prepared for them; and it could constitute no real enjoyment to the wicked, and the unregenerate, to be advanced to those sacred seats, if they retained, and carried with them, minds alien from all the piety and all the purity for which their inhabitants are distinguished. Have you sought to be made meet for the inheritance which awaits the saints in life; and that the very God of peace would sanctify you wholly; and that your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? Have you turned to God in a spirit of deep penitence, mourning over past sins, and earnestly entreating that he would mercifully pardon and graciously receive you? Have you felt your obligation to love the Lord your God with all your heart, with your soul, with all your strength, and with all your mind? Has the love of Christ constrained you thus to judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live to themselves, but to him who loved them, and gave himself for him? Is it your daily care to keep yourselves from idols, and to become more and more dead unto sin and alive unto righteousness? 'Know you not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin; but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you.' 'What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of these things is death. But now, being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.'

---

FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'God is a Spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth,' John iv. 24.

THE particular truth which it was the design of our Lord to inculcate at this time, was that the disputes between the Jews and Samaritans, about the place where they ought to worship the Father, were on the eve of becoming altogether groundless and inept, inasmuch as every thing merely ceremonial in religion was in the act of being for ever abolished; and nothing but what was spiritual and moral, and therefore essentially immutable, was to be permitted to remain. The doctrine that God is not confined to temples built by the hands of men, but that he is every where present in the fullness of his perfections throughout the immense universe, was uniformly acknowledged, throughout all ages, by his enlightened and spiritual worshippers. Under the Mosaic dispensation, however, it pleased God, for wise and holy ends, to define and limit the mode of observing his worship, and to specify the times, and the seasons, and the localities, in which sacrifice, and some of its other more solemn duties, required to be performed. But as the use of the typical and ceremonial institutions of Judaism, so also their obligation terminated simultaneously with the death of Christ, and we find at that time the finger of God putting visible dishonour upon them, to show that they were for ever abolished. Thus the sacred vail which was only lifted up once ever year when the high priest entered into the holiest of all, was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. And a short while after, when the Romans besieged Jerusalem, under Titus, voices were heard in the temple, as an ancient historian mentions, saying, 'Arise, let us depart;' and the very next day the abomination of desolation was seen standing in the holy place, and the whole of that splendid fabric was so completely consumed with fire and overthrown, that not one stone was left standing upon another. And now, after the lapse of a long succession of centuries, the Mosaic ritual has been so completely set aside by providence, that notwithstanding all the zeal and pertinacity of the Jews to resist the divine counsels, they have no where, throughout the whole world, a sacrifice, a temple, or a priest.

The nature of the worship which God requires is described under two particulars, spirit and truth. To worship God in spirit, is to worship him with the soul, or thinking principle, in contradistinction to the mere body, or material part of our frame; it is to worship him with the devout and holy affections which the divine Spirit imparts, and not with the cold and lifeless formality of a mere ceremonial observance; it is to prostrate our hearts before him in deep humility and self-abasement, and not to multiply idle genuflexions, or insincere and hypocritical confessions; it is to present the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving from a pure heart fervently, and not to burn the incense of odoriferous perfumes, or of costly oblations. Let us ever bear in mind, when we engage in the worship of God, that we appear in the presence of the great Searcher of hearts, and that it is impossible that any vail or covering can hide us from his inspection and knowledge. 'Keep thy feet when thou goest into the house of God, and be more ready to hear, than to offer the sacrifice of fools, for they consider not that they do evil.' Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few.

To worship God in truth, includes two things: the one, that our worship have truth for its substance; the other, that it be true or sincere in its exercise; it must be founded upon, and consist with, the will of God as revealed in the holy scriptures, and it must also be engaged in with unfeigned reverence and heartfelt solemnity. As to the value and importance of truth, it is essential to every thing that has a claim to the consideration of intelligent beings. It is truth which confers on science its dignity, gives to experience its use, imparts to knowledge its worth, and invests religion with its authority and sacredness. It is the glory of God that he is a God of truth, and it is the excellence of his word, and of his works, and of all his operations and promises, that they are replete with truth, and free from any mixture of deceit or error. As there can be no subject more profoundly important and interesting than religion, we are not left to our doubtful speculations regarding its doctrines, but have received from heaven an inspired revelation, containing every thing which is necessary to make us wise unto salvation. And accordingly Christ announces himself to us, in reference to his threefold offices of a Priest, a Prophet, and a King, as the way, the truth, and the life. By his atoning sacrifice he has opened up a way of access and return to the Father. By his word and Spirit, he has set before us the truth, which should guide us in that way; and by his divine power he communicates spiritual life to those who are dead in trespasses and sins, and will raise up to eternal life all his redeemed people on the morn of the resurrection. But we require to come to God with a true, that is, with a sincere and unfeigned worship, avoiding and hating the sin of drawing near to him with the service of the lips, or of presenting a faithless and hypocritical homage. In every action sincerity is essential to the validity and worth of the duty performed. No Father would esteem the professions of a child who expressed an affection he did not feel, or promised an obedience he did not render; and can you suppose that God will be mocked by such proceedings? He saith to the wicked, What hast thou to do to declare my covenant, or to take my name into your mouths? Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; purify your hearts, ye double-minded. Sincerity must be founded on faith, or a cordial and unfeigned reliance upon the merits and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is only when we come to God in his name, that we can find acceptance for our persons, and for our services. It is a blind sincerity which acts or feels differently, the sincerity of presumption, and self-righteousness, and impenitence; and therefore it cannot be but hateful in the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Let us never engage in any act of worship or devotion without first seeking the preparation of the heart which cometh from the Lord; and that he would give us grace whereby we may serve him acceptably with reverence and godly fear.

FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead,' Rom. i. 20.

It is the glory of man's intellectual being, that he can look from nature up to nature's God. He is necessarily led to conclude, that every effect must have a cause, and thus from the existence of the visible universe, and the innumerable indications of wisdom and design which it presents, is he compelled to conclude, that it is the work of a Being of Almighty power, of eternal existence, and of supreme and absolute sovereignty. Accordingly, the belief of the existence of a great first cause has prevailed among all nations, and the most degraded tribes have entertained it, no less than the most refined and learned states. In describing the creation of Adam, our great Poet has represented with much truth the first effort of his intelligence, as called forth and directed to an inquiry after a knowledge of the Creator from whose hands he had proceeded.

*'To speak I tried, and forthwith spake,
My tongue obey'd, and readily could name
Whate'er I saw; thou sun, said I, fair light,
And thou enlighten'd earth, so fresh and gay;
Ye hills and dales, ye rivers, woods, and plains;
And ye that live and move, fair creatures tell,
Tell if ye saw how came I thus? how here?
Not of myself. By some great Maker then
In goodness and in pow'r pre-eminent!
Tell me, how may I know him, how adore,
From whom I have that thus I move and live,
And feel that I am happier than I know.'*

When we endeavour to realize the existence of God, in its eternity, immutability, and independence; when we think of him as existing in all the glory and majesty of his perfections throughout all the infinitude of past duration, and that there never was a period when he was not; how are we absorbed in adoration and amazement. And when we farther reflect that all the excellence which we discover in creation is the result of his creative wisdom and power; and that what we behold is but a single ray in comparison with the stupendous and glorious whole; and that the magnificence of the universe, in all its united splendour, may form only a partial display of the inexhaustible resources of his infinite nature, how are we overwhelmed with the contemplation of his unbounded and unsearchable perfections and attributes! He alone possesses all-sufficiency and absolute independence; needing nothing, and forming the source and support of all else that either now or ever can exist. Creation was his sovereign act, the result of his absolute good pleasure, but in no degree necessary to enhance his felicity, or in any way promote the perfection of his existence. All the goodness and mercy which so abundantly distinguish the universe, is the effect of the purest and most disinterested benevolence; for no return can be made by any of his creatures to the Creator but out of that which they themselves have received; for of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever and ever.

FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good,' Prov. xv. 3.

THE consciousness of being an object of observation is usually felt by men to be powerfully repressive of evil, and an exciting stimulus to the practice of what is great and good. And accordingly it is considered a circumstance of the utmost moment to give a free and extensive circulation to opinion, and to make the acts, at least of public men, the subject of a keen and penetrating observation, by bringing them under the attention of the community, and obtaining upon them a verdict of praise or censure. But the man who is solely guided in his conduct by a regard to human opinion, and who forgets or cares not that the eye of God continually rests upon him, is blind to a truth, of all others the most solemn and momentous, and which ought to have the chief place in the regulation and government, not only of his external actions, but of his inmost feelings and thoughts. Beneficial as the influence of human opinion may sometimes be, it is necessarily a fallible criterion, and they who would follow it implicitly are guilty of dishonouring the will and authority of God, and are exposing themselves to the danger of being led into many sins. It was the chief cause of blinding the minds of the Pharisees to the incomparable evidences which our Lord gave of his character as the promised Messiah and Saviour of the world, for they received praise one of another; in other words they countenanced and encouraged each in their contempt and rejection of his person and of his doctrines; and they cared not by repenting and believing the truth, to receive the praise which cometh from God only. It was also the inducement which prevailed upon Pilate to deliver Jesus to be crucified, contrary to his own avowed convictions of his innocence; for he was more afraid of being denounced by the malignant Jews to Tiberias the emperor as an enemy to Cesar, than to fall under the holy displeasure and condemnation of heaven.

Let the consideration, that the eye of God has rested upon you throughout the whole period of your history, and has been intimately acquainted with your every thought, and feeling, and pursuit, and action, be improved as a motive to deep and heartfelt repentance and self-abasement. It has often been remarked, that no one could even disclose to the knowledge of his most intimate friend, without shame and humiliation, his innumerable errors and sins; but how much more awful is the thought that all things are naked and open to God, and that you have never been able for a single moment to elude his inspection, or to hide yourselves from his presence. After Peter had denied his Lord, he read in his look that he had a full knowledge of all his guilt, and of all its aggravating circumstances, and the subdued disciple at once went out and wept bitterly; and O could you realize in a similar manner, by any intimation, the view entertained by the divine mind of your proceedings and character, how would it overwhelm you with self-abhorrence and grief of the profoundest nature.

Let the thought that you have to do with an infinitely holy God, whose inspection and whose law are spiritual, and extends to every feeling as well as every action of your lives, convince you of your need of a purer and more perfect righteousness than your own. How can you, without this, appear before him in judgment. Shall you be justified by your works. Which of them is without sin, which of them needs not to receive forgiveness. The individual who cultivates the external proprieties of conduct, has still within him a heart which is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. Who could vindicate before God the purity of all his motives, desires, principles, and designs. If we should say we are without sin, our own hearts would condemn us, and this would prove us to be perverse.

How graciously suitable to our polluted and sinful state, are the blessings provided for us through the mediation of Christ Jesus. He presents us with a righteousness of perfect purity; becomes our Advocate and Intercessor; reconciles us unto God; imparts the spirit of adoption whereby we say, Abba, Father; and draws us to a holy and habitual engagement in the service of God by the chords of a fervent gratitude and adoring love.

Be careful to cultivate in your hearts an abiding sense of the presence of an all-seeing God, and allow it to exercise a sanctifying influence over the whole tenor of your thoughts and actions. Confiding in his mercy, seek that you may also be found glorifying him in your bodies and spirits which are his, and thereby show that you are not subject to the charge which shall be brought against false and hypocritical professors, on the great day, of receiving the grace of God in vain. Instead of evincing that spirit of enmity which actuates the unregenerate, and in consequence of which they desire not to retain the knowledge of God in all their thoughts—cultivate a holy trust and confidence in God as the Father of mercy, and the God of all grace and consolation; and rejoice that he reigneth over all, and that the whole of your interests and concerns are under his wise and holy disposal. By daily and fervent supplication at a throne of grace, entreat that the love of God may be shed abroad in your hearts by the Holy Spirit, and that you may be enabled to walk before him as becometh dear children. 'O taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed is the man that trusteth in him. O fear the Lord ye his saints, for there is no want to them that fear him. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open to their cry. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth. The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles. The Lord is nigh to them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit,' Ps. xxxiv. 8, 9, 15—18.

FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out,' Rom. xi. 33.

ONE of the principal sources of the depravity and corruption of men, it has been remarked, arises from their not entertaining sufficiently pure and exalted views of the nature and attributes of God. In some cases they consider him to be altogether like unto themselves; actuated only by those views which they are pleased to impart to him, and consulting only those ends which seem to them to be consistent with the purposes of his government. Hence pride, impenitence, and unbelief are fostered in their minds; for how expect that they should submit to be taught of God, who have already anticipated, in their own conceptions, both what he is, and what he must do; and who are prepared to declare every doctrine absurd and false which transcends their thoughts, or contradicts their self-formed imaginations.

It might appear that the knowledge of God conveyed even by the first impressions of the light of nature, was fitted to fill every mind with a profound conviction of his infinite majesty and unutterable glory, and to warn the most arrogant against presuming to fathom his counsels, or penetrate his designs. How undeniably just and reasonable, as well as pious and reverential, is the acknowledgment drawn from Zophar, in regard to the transcendent and incomprehensible nature of Jehovah. 'Canst thou, by searching, find out God; canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven, what canst thou do? it is deep as hell, what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.'

The more an individual becomes conversant with the nature, the perfections, the counsels, and the works of God, his decrees of providence, his wonders of grace, his mighty judgments, and his sovereign counsels, he has reason to say, at every step by which he advances in this sublime knowledge, 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!' More especially is this the feeling of wonder and of praise with which we should contemplate the character of God in connection with the work of redemption. That he should have selected the inhabitants of this sinful world to be the objects of his mercy, whilst fallen angels are left to endure the eternal punishment of their revolt, constitutes an act of distinguishing grace which we cannot sufficiently admire and adore. And how infinitely mysterious was the vindication of his holy law which God required before he could extend mercy to us, and which he actually provided when he ordained his Son to undertake with all its humiliation, sufferings, and woes, the work of our deliverance. The method by which he secured our redemption, and the overthrow of the kingdom of Satan, was one which, though infinitely glorious in itself, and worthy of all his perfections, would never have entered into any finite mind to conceive. What but infinite mercy could have supplied the sacrifice? and could any thing but infinite holiness have rendered it necessary that it should be presented? Most just the sentiment of the poet in reference to the infinite sublimity of God, and of all his works:

*'The more of wonderful
Is heard in him, the more we should assent.
Could we conceive him, God he could not be;
Or he not God, or we could not be men,
A God alone can comprehend a God.'*

SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy,' Rev. xv. 4.

THIS forms a portion of the praises of the redeemed in heaven. Taking a retrospect of the administration of God, viewing in its completeness the whole of that comprehensive plan of which at present we can see only a small part, its every aspect, all its events, and all their bearings, serve to impress them with a profound and universal feeling of the infinite unutterable holiness of God. At present clouds and darkness surround the throne of God, and the devout inquirer is often painfully perplexed, in attempting to reconcile the ways of providence with the acknowledged excellencies and perfections of the Supreme Judge and Ruler of all. To understand, for instance, why sin was permitted to enter, and to spread its fatal effects through so extensive a portion of the dominions of God; to account for the enduring domination which idolatry and wickedness have been permitted to hold, for so many ages, over the great majority of our race, whilst truth and its attendant blessings have been enjoyed by comparatively a few; to know the cause why so many possess the advantage of the external call of the gospel, without being made the subjects of its converting and saving influence,—are questions which exceed the fullest investigation of man with his present limited and defective views adequately to resolve. But in the light of eternity, how shall all the darkness which now seems to lie over the divine administration pass away! and from the infinite wisdom, justice, and truth, which shall be seen to distinguish the whole, and every portion of the ways of God, the saints shall say with the feelings of ecstatic admiration and awe, 'Who shall not fear thee, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy.'

In God holiness is an essential and immutable perfection, or rather it constitutes the absolute and necessary glory and excellence of his nature; for in the same manner as it is elsewhere said of him that he only has immortality, implying that existence, as belonging to him, is alienable and eternal, so also here when it is asserted that he only is holy, it represents not only that he is possessed of holiness to an extent infinitely beyond all other beings, but that holiness, which in them is derived and contingent, is in him necessary, everlasting, and essential. He dwelleth in light which is inaccessible to mortal eye, and full of glory; yea, he is light, and in him is no darkness at all. Holiness in God is less a distinct and separate attribute than the combination of all those perfections which unite to constitute supreme and absolute moral excellence; it is the bright aggregate of spotless purity, unsullied truth, stainless rectitude, unalloyed mercy, and inflexible justice. In short, it is the brightness, not of a single perfection, but of the harmonious and united assemblage of all those perfections that constitute the peculiar glory of the divine nature.

The transcendent holiness of God claims, on his behalf, the adoration and reverence even of the most exalted of the angelic host; and O how should it engage towards him the deepest awe and the lowliest homage of fallen men. Consider how the prophet felt when a revelation was made to him in vision of the majesty and glory of God; when he saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple; and the seraphim stood having their faces covered with their wings, crying one to another, and saying, 'Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory.' Let us endeavour to realize the same deep emotions of conscious guilt and utter unworthiness which filled his mind, and which led him to say, 'Woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts.' Similar were the impressions produced upon the mind of Job, when he arrived at a saving discovery of the infinite purity and holiness which distinguish Jehovah. 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.'

Improve to this end every trace and indication which you every where witness of the transcendent holiness of God, whether in the operations of providence, in the visible judgments with which he often pursues and visits sin, to the astonishment even of the wicked themselves; in the purity, spirituality, and perfection of his revealed law; or yet more particularly in the sufferings and death of Christ, where you have the highest and most impressive evidence of the holiness of God which you can ever receive. When you take your station at the foot of the cross, and contemplate the infinite anguish of that mysterious occasion, when the Son of God cried out in overwhelming grief, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' O how much does it reveal of the infinite holiness of God; of the awful indignation with which he looks upon sin; and of the endless separation from glory and blessedness which must overtake those who seek not to have their sins expiated by the blood of atonement, but are willing to bear all their guilt upon their own souls. 'Who shall not fear thee, O God? for thou only art holy.' They who will not allow themselves to reflect upon the nature of God, as a holy God, and to be led to repentance and to a saving interest in Christ from a knowledge of his character as it is revealed to them in his own blessed word, to make them wise unto salvation, shall hereafter be overwhelmed with terror, and shall call upon the mountains and the hills to cover them from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall manifest himself as a consuming fire to destroy the workers of iniquity, and shall pursue them with his unmitigated vengeance to the abode of eternal woe.

But that very holiness which the impenitent and wicked shall feel to be infinitely terrible, shall constitute the theme of eternal joy and praise to the redeemed servants of Christ. They will delight to trace how God has, in all things, acted worthy of his own divine perfections, and they will acknowledge the praises of his justice, even whilst they celebrate the triumphs of his mercy. 'Great and manifold are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy.'

SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?'
Gen. xviii. 25.

In religion, as in science, there are certain axiomatic truths which only require to be enunciated, to appear self-evident to every rational and unprejudiced mind. And if there be one truth which bears this character more decidedly than another, it is undoubtedly that which is interrogatively expressed in these words of the patriarch. That God is a God of equity and truth; that he can lie under no conceivable inducement, even though it were possible for him to be impelled by any motive to depart, in any case, from the exercise of his own infinite rectitude so to do, but that he must decide and act, invariably, according to the principles of unerring wisdom and absolute justice, must appear intuitively certain to every individual who is capable of forming any conception of the nature and character of God.

Happy were it if this momentous truth engaged the confidence of the heart as firmly as it secures the conviction of the judgment; and if men rested in it with hope and patience under all the trials of faith with which they are conversant in the pilgrimage of life. With what holy acquiescence would they not submit to all the decrees of providence, if they felt that they proceeded from one who exercised his sovereignty for the highest and most glorious ends, and in accordance with the purest and most perfect designs! that nothing was fortuitous, or the effect of chance; that nothing was done capriciously, ignorantly, or malignantly, but that all was ordained with unerring wisdom and infinite faithfulness; that the very hairs of their head were numbered; and that not a sparrow could fall to the ground without the permission of God.

And how would it quell many a dark and disquieting thought in regard to the eternal destiny of our race, and the manner in which God shall deal with the heathen on the day of judgment, and those whose advantages have been few to entertain the firm conviction that the Judge of all the earth cannot but do right. Let us adore all his procedure, and reverently acknowledge whatever he decrees or ordains, that it is the result of infinite and unimpeachable rectitude, and that to murmur or repine at his dispensations is to manifest a presumptuous, a blind, and an impious disposition.

As God cannot do, neither can he say, but that which is right. Let us, therefore, reverence the whole doctrines and truths of revelation; and however painful it may be to human pride, let us acknowledge, in particular, the solemn truth of all those testimonies advanced by the oracles of God concerning our utter sinfulness and depravity. 'What things the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.' The impenitent and the self-righteous, and all who reject the views inculcated by the word of God concerning their sinful state, the desperate wickedness and deceitfulness of their hearts, and their innate aversion to what is holy and good, are in effect making God a liar, and the truth is not in them.

Let us be more especially convinced that the method of salvation provided for a lost world, through Jesus, is altogether right, and worthy of God to establish; and that there can, consequently, be no other way by which the guilty can receive forgiveness. 'It became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings.' There required to be offered an infinite sacrifice to take away sin, and that this might be provided God spared not his own Son, but gave him up freely to the death for us all. 'How then shall they escape who neglect so great salvation, which at first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him? God also bearing them witness both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost according to his own will.'

Above all, prepare to meet God as the righteous Judge of the whole earth, before whose awful tribunal an assembled universe shall stand, and from whose mouth irreversable decisions shall go forth to seal the eternal doom of all the various members of the human race. Seeing that you have no merit, and no righteousness of your own, to entitle you to acceptance with a God of infinite purity, seek that you may be found in Christ, clothed with the robe of his perfect righteousness and sustained by the advocacy of his all-prevailing intercession. Rejoice that the Redeemer can say, in behalf of as many as come to the Father through him, 'all mine are thine, and thine are mine.' 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? it is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth? it is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.'

---

SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne; mercy and truth shall go before thy face,' Psal. lxxxix. 14.

IN God all perfections harmonize; he is just when he exercises his mercy, and whenever he takes his seat upon the throne of judgment, 'mercy and truth go before his face.' Amongst sinful and imperfect creatures we may witness the rigour of a relentless vengeance exercised, or the partiality of a weak and unscrupulous leniency; but these things be far from God; he cannot compromise his holiness; he cannot deny himself; but must always act in such a manner as accords with the glory of his manifold and infinite perfections.

What copious and interesting illustration of this truth do we not derive from the method of salvation provided in the gospel. The sufferings and death of Christ reveal the justice of God in a light the most solemn and awful; the design of those sufferings, and of that death, manifest no less conspicuously his boundless love to sinners, and his delight in the exercise of mercy. Indeed, unless for the view set before us, in the cross of Christ, of the plan devised for our salvation, it would have been utterly impossible to conceive in what manner God could have delivered us from destruction without compromising the justice of his character, and the honour of his law. It is necessary, in order to sustain justice in its full and perfect exercise, that the law which it has ordained be upheld with unyielding faithfulness, and that every transgression be followed with the threatened punishment. Now this takes away from the lawgiver the power of dispensing with the appointed penalties. Having been right to be ordained, they are equally right to be executed. Nay truth, after they have been promulgated, adds to the obligation arising from their intrinsic rectitude to their being enforced. Strictly speaking, therefore, perfect justice is incompatible with the exercise of mercy, at least in the execution of a law, however mercy may preside over its formation, and regulate its nature and operation. The mercy of God, then, after his law was given to men, had no more any power to interfere, either to set aside its authority altogether, or in any degree whatever to modify its requirements, or mitigate its penalties. The law was under the sacred guardianship of justice, and the voice of justice alone could be heard in applying its provisions and appointing its awards.

But in the sufferings and death of Christ justice found a full satisfaction for the sins of all for whom he died; and now are they 'justified freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood; to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.'

How precious is the salvation of the gospel viewed as the gift of an infinitely holy God, whose throne is the eternal dwelling-place of justice and judgment. He was under no obligation to interpose to save us—he could not even have purposed to do so without, at the same time, resolving to give up his Son to the death for us all—and O how amazing was that love, how boundless that mercy, which consented by paying a ransom so great, to open up a way by which it might extend itself towards us, and provide for our redemption.

Let us seek to have our hearts more deeply impressed with a knowledge of the infinite value of the riches of divine grace; and let the love of Christ constrain us, because we thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead, and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who loved them, and who gave himself for them. Whilst we rejoice in mercy, let us reverence justice; whilst we cherish salvation, let us acknowledge that God would have only glorified his justice in leaving us utterly and for ever to perish.

As the nature of God is infinitely holy, and his throne a throne of righteousness, there can evidently be no communion between him and those who continue in the love and practice of sin; and, therefore, in vain do they profess to rely upon offered mercy who are hardened in impenitence, or engrossed by the love of sinful pleasure, or unconvinced of the necessity of becoming dead unto sin, and alive unto righteousness; or unwilling to exercise the self-denial and the perseverance requisite for insuring their progressive sanctification. Supplicate the renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, and give all diligence to make your calling and election sure, seeking to be holy as he who hath called you is holy.

Under the rod of chastisement, and when experceiving the correction of God for sin, faint not when you are rebuked of him ; remember that whilst justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne, mercy and truth go before his face ; and return to him with confession and supplication, and he will receive you ; for there is mercy with God that he may be feared, and plenteous redemption that he may be sought after.

---

SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God,' Psal. xc. 2.

In every case where we ascend from the consideration of the creature to the contemplation of the Creator, we are conscious of passing over an infinite range of separation, which necessarily divides whatever is limited and dependent in its nature from Him who is self-existent, eternal, and immutable in his being, and in all his perfections. We feel that there can be no comparison between the finite and the infinite, and that the highest and most glorious of created intelligences, with all they possess, sink into absolute insignificance in the surpassing splendour of that glory which emanates from the presence of the supreme and eternal Godhead. And there is no circumstance by which the infinite disparity between God and his creatures admits of being more impressively realized, than by the absolute immutability which distinguishes his nature, contrasted with the precarious and limited character of the being conferred upon them.

But there are circumstances in the brief and mortal span of human existence, not to be overlooked, which render the lesson of humility and self-abasement arising from this subject, more strikingly and solemnly impressive. If the most permanent of all created things, if the stars of the firmament, and the mountains which they have shone upon for so many generations, are but as yesterday, compared with the years of the right hand of the Most High ; if even the highest and first rank of heaven's hierarchies veil their diminished heads before the eternity which belongs exclusively to God, how should man feel his infinite nothingness before the Almighty, and shut up, in the humility which the thought impresses, prostrate himself in holy adoration before the majesty and glory which belong to the infinite and uncreated source of all being.

We venerate whatever possesses the character of antiquity and that has come down through a long lapse of ages, preserving something of unchangeableness amidst the vicissitudes and fluctuations which are incident to all earthly things. The everlasting hills, the perpetual firmament, the unchanging sun, the ever-twinkling stars, all nature's more permanent features impress the thoughtful mind with a sentiment of awe, when he reflects upon their enduring nature ; when he thinks that they are the same now as when looked upon by the men of other days, whose names, if known at all, are only known from history ; and when he farther considers how they shall remain unchanged, and be the objects of veneration to other minds, it may be thousands of years after he and the generation to which he belongs shall have passed into everlasting forgetfulness. But what are these compared unto God ? The most stable works of nature are not, in the absolute sense of the term, unchangeable, but only more abiding, only less fleeting than the frail and perishing creatures who successively inhabit a world of change and death. There is a period appointed in the counsels of the Eternal when the framework of the material universe shall be utterly dissolved ; when the elements shall melt with fervent heat ; and when the earth, and all things in it, shall be turned up. But the throne of God is established for ever, and of his dominion there shall be no end. 'A thousand years are with him as one day, and one day as a thousand years.' He is from everlasting to everlasting—from eternity to eternity—beholding and ordaining whatever comes to pass ; he dwells in a sphere too exalted to be reached by change. Nature fades, but he partakes not of the decay. Worlds are annihilated, but the convulsion affects not his throne. As he owes his existence to none, he holds it in dependence upon none, but Jehovah, I am, is his peculiar name, his high and incommunicable glory. How devoutly should we acknowledge God as our Creator and Preserver, the Author of our existence, the source of our every blessing, and the cause upon whom we are necessarily and for ever dependent for all the good we enjoy, or ever can receive. It is his power which upholds, his goodness which enriches, and his quickening energy which vivifies all who live. Whatever of permanence or stability exists, results from the sovereign good pleasure of God, who ruleth over all. Did an erring, weak, capricious being preside over creation, what anarchy, misrule, and tribulation would instantly follow. But the great and unchangeable Jehovah reigneth ; and hence the consistency of plan, the regularity of operation, and the uniformity of system which the universe presents. What cause to rejoice have angels and men because God reigneth, for he alone causeth us to dwell in safety; he is the strength of our lives, and the length of our days.

But in a particular manner, what joy and hope ought we not to find in the truth that the great, the unchangeable Jehovah, is a covenant God, the God of salvation, who has given us, in his word, exceeding great and precious promises, and who is calling us to the enjoyment of glory, honour, and immortality, at his own right hand in the heavens. The strength of Israel cannot depart; the Rock of ages shall never be shaken. Building upon him your confidence, and obeying his will, you shall never be put to shame, but he will justify all your hopes, and vindicate your fullest expectation. Wherever else you place your trust, uncertainty must be characteristic more or less of your hope. The princes of the earth die, and their favour ceases. Change is the characteristic of all sublunary things. But they that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. He is a sure portion, and an exceeding great reward; and though the hills may depart, and the mountains be removed, yet will his loving-kindness never depart from those who fear him, nor will his mercy be abolished.

---

EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God,' John i. 1.

The doctrine of the supreme divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ constitutes the grand central truth of Christianity, and confers infinite authority and glory upon the whole system of revealed religion. 'He who in former times spake unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath, by inheritance, obtained a more excellent name than they.'

The opponents of this sacred and momentous doctrine, aware how impossible it is to assail it successfully by denying that it stands supported by a vast amount of scripture evidence, have had recourse to other modes to lessen or destroy its credibility and value in the estimation of the ignorant and inconsiderate. Of these one of their most usual expedients is to denounce it as mysterious and incomprehensible—and since they assume it as a general principle, that no man is bound to believe mysteries, they draw the sweeping conclusion, that the doctrine in question forms no part of divine revelation properly understood, and that any support which it receives, is more seeming than real, and is the result of misinterpreting or misunderstanding the language of scripture. True it is that no man can be required to believe a proposition that is contrary to reason, but that is a very different case from the present, where the mysteriousness of the doctrine manifestly arises solely from its being above reason; or in other words, such as our imperfect and limited reason cannot allow us fully to comprehend. Mysteries of this description are found in nature and providence as well as in religion; but no one can justly refuse to believe them or deny that the belief of them is most important and in some cases essential, not only to our well-being, but even to our very existence. The process by which the body of man is nourished, and his life prolonged, for instance, involves principles of the most mysterious nature, in so far as we call that mysterious which has hitherto and probably will always exceed the discovery of human research; but who refuses to comply with the rules of experience, and the instincts of nature, until he has first resolved and ascertained the reasons for which they should be acknowledged and followed, in regard to the nourishment and well-being of human life. So far from being necessary, it would in reality form a serious objection to a revelation professing to come from God, that it included nothing mysterious, or in other words, nothing but what the human mind could learn and understand for itself. The province of reason, in religion, is limited, to ascertain the fact whether the scriptures are from God, and also by the application of a sound and judicious criticism, to discover what they teach; but beyond this, it cannot and ought not to presume to go. Having ascertained that God has spoken to us through the medium of his word, and having determined what that word really says, we are bound to render implicit submission to the truth and authority of all it reveals, in order to escape the impiety and guilt involved in the sin of making God a liar.

The portion of scripture under consideration has always, and with the greatest truth, been considered as affording a most cogent and irresistible testimony to the supreme divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is impossible for language to be more explicit in expressing any doctrine. As if for the very purpose of cutting off all ground of cavil, not only are the attributes, perfections, and operations, peculiar to Deity, ascribed to Jesus; but it is expressly stated, 'the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' There are instances in other places of scripture, where, in a secondary and inferior sense, angels and potentates are designated God; but the more distinctly and forcibly to show that the name was not so to be understood in this place, it is first applied with an undoubted reference to the eternal Jehovah, and then it is immediately applied in the very same manner to Christ. But whilst the present passage will and ought to be decisive, with every candid and unprejudiced reader of the scriptures, as a proof of Christ's supreme divinity, it is far from being the only one which bears upon this momentous subject. How explicit and sublime is the testimony, for example, which Isaiah bears to the same truth, chap. ix. 6. 'For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever.' Hence the apostle calls believers 'the church of God;' and to indicate the more explicitly that he employed the designation in reference to the divinity of Christ, he adds, 'which he hath purchased with his own blood,' Acts xx. 28. In the epistle to the Hebrews, Christ is described as higher than the angels, and as receiving their worship, which is only consistent with his being God. 'And again when he bringeth the first begotten into the world he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom.'

But it would be to repeat a great portion of the scripture, were we to enter upon this subject at length, or as its importance deserves. It is necessary, however, to notice that the works ascribed to Christ in his pre-existent state of creating the worlds, and that of judging the quick and the dead, and others in which he is at present or will hereafter be engaged, afford a decisive evidence to the same effect. The view which the accomplishment of these mighty operations gives of his attributes and perfections is only consistent with the doctrine of his supreme divinity; and thus this infinitely momentous doctrine has its truth based not only on the written testimony of scripture, but on the broad and enduring foundation of his works from the beginning of the world.

The doctrine in question, though itself mysterious, and past finding out, is at the same time fraught with the most valuable and precious practical lessons of faith and holiness to every believer. How does it proclaim, for example, the unutterable depth of our ruin, that an interposition so transcendantly great and glorious was necessary to bring us salvation. What infinite cause to love and confide in God, is presented by the consideration, that God so loved us as to give not a finite or created being, but his only begotten Son, to be a propitiation for our sins, and to accomplish our redemption from eternal misery. What profound impressions of the infinite holiness and rectitude of the divine government, and of the unspeakable guilt and danger of sin, flow from realizing the necessity for that great work which Christ came to our world to accomplish. And when you view the sacrifice of Christ in connection with his exalted nature, what an infinite value must it not be felt to possess; and how is it fitted to bring peace and consolation to the most distressed and troubled mind! And in fine, what comfort and hope must it not supply to know that your Redeemer is God; that his love is from everlasting to everlasting; that his wisdom, his power, his grace, are all boundless, and that he has engaged to exercise all his divine and glorious perfections, for advancing the best interests, and securing the eternal salvation of his people. 'Fear not, I am the first and the last; I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death,' Rev. i. 17, 18.

EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh,' 1 Tim. iii. 16.

THE scriptures not only admit, but glory in the admission, that the doctrine of the incarnation of Christ, or in other words, of the manifestation of God in the flesh, is a mystery; 'yea, even the very greatest of mysteries.' They have no controversy with any upon that point; but when the truth or reality of the mystery becomes the subject of question, they bear a decided testimony against the opinion of the unbeliever. The unbeliever denies that the truth of the mystery can be established—the scriptures declare the contrary, and supply the grounds upon which they demand our faith to it; for not only is it said that God was manifest in the flesh, but it is also added that he was ‘justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.’

Whether we understand by the Spirit, in this place, Christ's divine nature to be referred to, or more particularly the Holy Ghost, in either case, how fully can it be established that he was justified or confirmed to be God by the Spirit! What beams of divinity broke forth, and brightly shone in his darkest hours of humiliation and of suffering! ‘He did not display his royalty by a splendid equipage, sumptuous entertainments, or by advancing his followers to worldly honours; but he displayed it more gloriously by giving, what no earthly prince could give, health to the diseased, life to the dead, virtue to the profligate, and pardon to the guilty. Though a poor and mean woman was his mother, he was conceived and born of a virgin, the Holy Ghost coming upon her, and the power of the Highest overshadowing her. Though born in a stable, and laid in a manger, the wise men of the east, taught by a star, discover deity amidst this debasement; nay an innumerable multitude of the heavenly host join together in solemnizing his seemingly ignoble birth. He spoke and acted not as man only, but as God. When he discovered the signs of human infirmity, he also discovered the attributes of divine glory and power. He was tempted of the devil, but the devil could not enter into the most despicable animal, without his permission. As a man he hungers, and is maintained by the kindness of pious women who minister to him of their substance; but as God he miraculously fed thousands with a few loaves and fishes. He is baptized by John, but at his baptism the Father proclaims, ‘This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.’ One moment weary with labour he falls asleep; a great storm arises; the waves beat, and the ship where he sleeps seems ready to sink; but in that dangerous crisis he rebukes the winds, says to the sea, ‘Peace, be still,’ and lo the storm is turned into a calm at his command and will. Did the character and circumstances of his disciples obscure his glory? He determines them with a word to forsake all, and follow him—showed that even the hearts of men are in his hand, and that he turneth them which way soever he will. The foolishness of God appears wiser than man, and the weakness of God stronger than man, when he bestows on his despised followers miraculous powers, and a mouth and wisdom which their enemies cannot gainsay or resist. As a partaker of flesh and blood, he hath compassion on the wretched. As God he relieves them, healing the blind and the lame, curing the lepers, and even raising the dead. When apprehended as a malefactor, he demonstrates that no man could have taken his life from him, if he had not of himself been willing to lay it down. For he asks them sent to apprehend him, ‘Whom seek ye?’ and instantly they go backward, and fall to the ground. If men insult his sufferings, the sun is darkened, the earth trembles, and all nature is convulsed when the Lord of nature suffers. When pouring out his soul unto death, he divides a portion with the great, and divides the spoil with the strong.

He saves others, when his enemies scornfully say that himself he cannot save. When brought to the dust of death, and seemingly overcome, invisibly he conquers, and by death destroys death, and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil.*

Angels were witnesses of the great mystery of God's manifestation in the flesh; and however the transaction may be doubted or disbelieved on earth, there is no diversity of sentiment, but one united feeling of profoundest admiration, regarding the fact entertained among the hosts and hierarchies in heaven. An embassy of angels announced his nativity to the shepherds who kept their flocks on the plains of Bethlehem; and it was from the lips of an angel that the joyful tidings of his resurrection from the dead were first communicated to the women who went to the sepulchre, early on the morning of the first day of the week; by them conveyed to the disciples at large. Some expositors render the word angels, in this place, by the synonymous term messengers, and explain it of the apostles; and certainly the testimony of the apostles, sustained as it was in the face of the most formidable sufferings and deaths, constitutes a sublime evidence to the truth of Christianity in general, and to the divinity of Christ in particular. ‘We have not followed cunningly devised fables,’ did they all in effect declare to the world, ‘when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.’

* Dr Erskine's Discourses, Discourse xii.

The diffusion and progress of Christianity destined at length to fill the whole earth, forms an additional evidence of the truth of the gospel, and of the divinity of its great Author. Ancient prophecy had announced, that in Christ all nations of the earth should be blessed; that of the increase of his government and peace there should be no end; and that all the ends of the earth should be given to him for an inheritance. He himself says, 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.' It proves that he is Lord of all, and has all the treasures of wisdom and grace at his disposal, that from the day of Pentecost to the present time, numerous as have been the enemies to his cause, and strenuous their efforts to destroy it, it has prevailed over all opposition, and is still going forward, conquering and to conquer. In accomplishing all the good pleasure of his will, as the great Head of the church, and the Author of spiritual blessings, meditate upon the infinite perfections which he must of necessity exercise. The empire of providence is swayed by the same hand which rules over the kingdom of grace, for much of the work of conversion and sanctification depends upon the concurrence of events, and the discipline which they impart; and much of the effect which attends counsel or instruction, depends upon the season when it is given. 'Ye are God's building, ye are God's husbandry,' says the apostle, in writing to the Corinthians; and no truth certainly can be more consolatory than that all our interests and concerns, for time and eternity, are under the direction and care of a divine Redeemer.

---

NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God,' 1 Cor. ii. 10.

THE gospel, in contradistinction to the law, has been beautifully and expressively designated by an apostle the administration of the Spirit. That divine Person of the adorable Godhead, who is known in scripture by the appellation of the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, employs the gospel as the means by which he peculiarly acts upon the heart and conscience, enlightening, convincing, subduing and converting sinners; applying to believers the benefits of Christ's purchase for their justification, comfort, and sanctification; and in short, advancing in them, in all its various parts, that work of grace which is preparatory to their exaltation to a state of glory at God's right hand.

The personality of the Holy Spirit is clearly manifest from scripture, and the many passages in which he is spoken off, where it is undeniable that he is represented as a distinct person, utterly overthrow the tenet of those who would account for the name as only another appellation or expression for God. Thus, when our Lord was about to leave his disciples, he consoles them under the prospect of his departure by saying, 'when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me.' It is manifest that this most precious promise would be deprived of all meaning, and would become utterly inexplicable and unintelligible, upon the theory of those who represent the Holy Spirit as only a name, and not a distinct person.

In the primitive church, the Holy Spirit conferred many miraculous gifts upon the apostles and early teachers of Christianity, and among these, nor the least important and valuable, was the gift of inspiration. By the possession of this they not only enjoyed for themselves an accurate, comprehensive, and glorious view of the dispensation of grace, and of all its constituent doctrines and principles, but they were enabled to communicate to others the mind of God upon any subject connected with salvation, in the most full and perfect manner. To the work of the Holy Spirit, in this important respect, our Lord directed the attention of the apostles, when he said, 'I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot hear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak, and he will show you things to come.'

The personality of the Holy Spirit is very decidedly marked in the passage before us, when he is described as searching the deep things of God. To search, in scripture language, does not signify a superficial or imperfect view of a subject, but a thorough knowledge of it to its utmost extent. Thus in the prophecies of Jeremiah it is written, 'I, the Lord, search the hearts; I try the reins, to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.' Accurate and minute knowledge of any subject is, among men, the result of searching for it, that is, of diligent and extended investigation; and the term searching, when applied to God the Father, in the latter passage, or to the Holy Spirit in the one before us, is a figurative expression, denoting the exact and thorough knowledge of the subjects which are described as being made the theme of divine investigation. That the Spirit can search, or in other words, fully penetrate and understand all the deep things of God, is an evidence of divine perfection, which denotes that in this, as in all other attributes, the Holy Spirit is equal with the Father and the Son. And accordingly we find, in the various acts of worship commanded to believers, that the Spirit is conjoined with the Father and the Son, as the object of adoration and praise. You are baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. The apostle beseeches his fellow-disciples, in Rom. xv. 30, 'for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit,' to strive together with him in their prayers to God on his behalf. You are admonished against grieving the Spirit, and against quenching the Spirit; and you are called to know that ye are temples of the Holy Spirit, 'which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own.'

---

NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father,' Gal. iv. 6.

THERE is a close and mutual connection among the various parts of the economy of grace, so that the believing reception of one doctrine prepares for the admission of the others in due succession, and ultimately conducts to a full and cordial understanding and acceptance of all the glorious truths connected with the scheme of divine mercy. Let a deep impression of guilt, for instance, be riveted upon the conscience, and a conviction of the utter inadequacy of mere human merit to procure acceptance with God for the sinner, and how does this prepare for receiving the great truth, that the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin. And when a knowledge of the way of salvation through the Redeemer has been obtained, how easy does it become to pass on to a full knowledge of the blessings and privileges which belong to those for whom the Saviour died! He that spared not his own Son, but gave him up to the death for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things. And more particularly, how prepared is the believer's mind for receiving the doctrine of the Spirit after embracing the doctrine of justification by faith alone; and how necessary the transition by which you are led from concluding that you are brought by the death of Christ into a state of sonship, or filial relation to God, to receive the doctrine, that, together with this rank, God will send forth the Spirit of his Son into your heart, crying, Abba, Father.

In scripture the Holy Spirit is in some passages called the Spirit of God, and in others the Spirit of Christ, indiscriminately, according as the design of the inspired writer renders either the one application or the other more appropriate and expressive. This shows that he proceeds equally from both; and that he is not a mere attribute or name, as some have attempted to establish who have denied his personality. In Rom. viii. 9. we find both modes of appellation employed, the one in the first, and the other in the second clause of the verse. 'But ye are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' In the present passage the Holy Spirit appears to be called the Spirit of the Son, that is, of Christ, both because he is imparted to believers through Christ, or in virtue of their union with him, and also because he produces in them the same mind which was in Christ generally; and particularly the same confidence and love towards their heavenly Father.

During his humiliation, how did Christ manifest, on every occasion, an infinite love and complacency in the Father, a profound acquiescence in his will, together with a deep reliance upon his divine aid, in his deepest afflictions! 'Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared. Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered.' Now the same love and the same faith which distinguished Christ the Elder Brother, are also formed in his followers, the Holy Spirit being given them for this end, that they also may be able to draw near with confidence to a throne of grace, as children to a father who is able and willing to help them. In all the doctrines, and in all the ordinances of the gospel, there is a manifestation more or less explicit of that filial relation to God, into which it is the grand design of the dispensation of mercy to introduce all who believe. At a communion table we are instructed to sit down as sons, and not to stand afar off as aliens, or to look on as menials or servants. In prayer we are encouraged to confide in God as most willing to receive us, and to supply all our wants according to his riches in glory through Jesus Christ. And it is only in so far as you have attained to a holy love and confidence in God, through the merits of the Saviour, that you have come to the enjoyment of that spirit of sonship which it is the design of the gospel to form in the souls of men. By nature we are all filled with a spirit of enmity, or in other words, of rebellion and distrust towards God; and it is not until Christ is received, and the promises of the gospel, that this spirit is destroyed, and that the spirit of reconciliation and adoption is obtained.

---

TENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen,' 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

Nor only do we find in scripture the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, severally manifested, in relation to the particular connection in which they stand to the plan of redemption; the Father representing the Godhead, and sustaining the office of securing the authority and honour of the divine law; the Son humbling himself, by becoming subject to the law in order to fulfil it; and the Holy Spirit applying Christ and the benefits of redemption to the souls of believers; but we find also passages, such as the present, where the economic distinctions referred to are scarcely seen to exist at all, and in which the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are represented in their unity as one God, the Author of all mercy and blessing. As it has been the work of redemption which has more peculiarly called forth the manifestation of the distinct personality of the three persons in the adorable Trinity, the scriptures appear to teach us, that one great end for this manifestation was to lead us to understand distinctly, and to feel with deep impression our infinite obligations to redeeming love; and thus we ought to be careful to maintain in our minds a realizing apprehension of the absolute oneness which subsists, not only in essence, but in counsel, and in operation, between the three persons of the eternal Godhead. Undoubtedly Christ shall continue for ever to exist as Emmanuel, God-Man; and the redeemed shall continue to behold in him the Mediator who, by assuming our nature, and becoming bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, satisfied the law, and delivered them from hell; at the same time it is to be kept in view, that Christ has lifted up our nature to the throne of heaven, and that he there possesses all that glory which he had with the Father before the world was.

It is evident that unless it had been the object of inspiration to teach us the absolute equality of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, it would not have presented instances of prayers, doxologies, and addresses in which they are conjoined and contemplated as the object of our worship, the supreme source of blessing, and the adorable Author of all glory and excellence. Upon the hypothesis, that two mere created and dependent beings were advanced to this honour, would there not manifestly be an impropriety, or rather an impiety, in such a conjunction, utterly inconsistent with the spirit of pure and reverential worship which the scriptures uniformly inculcate, and exclusively authorise. In order to manifest more fully the perfect equality subsisting between the Father and the other persons of the blessed Trinity, the order is not followed in this place, which the economic relation constituted among them would prescribe; but the blessing first supplicated, is 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ,' and then in succession, 'the love of God,' and 'the communion of the Holy Ghost.'

At the same time, so much of the economic relation may here be perceived, as shows in a very beautiful and interesting manner the way in which, as sinners, we become partakers of that great salvation, which is comprehensive of the blessings specified in this prayer, and of all others either implied in them, or that flow from them. We must then, in the first instance, receive the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ; in other words, his favour, including an interest in his righteousness, and in his advocacy or intercession; thereupon we become what otherwise in justice we never could be, objects of complacency or love to God the Father; and in consequence of this, again, we are, in the last place, privileged to enjoy that blessed communion of the Spirit which is co-extensive with the society of the redeemed in earth, and in heaven.

---

TENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?' 1 Cor. iii. 16.

IN the previous context, the apostle insists largely upon the nature and design of the church of Christ; shows that it has one only foundation upon which it rests, viz., Christ himself; that apostles and ministers are merely artificers employed for the erection of this spiritual edifice, and that believers, as component parts of the building, require to be eminently distinguished for their personal holiness, and for the good works which flow from their faith. 'If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward; if any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.' To urge yet more strongly upon believers the obligation to holiness, the apostle farther advances the solemn consideration which he thus states, 'know ye not that ye are the temple of the living God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?'

Every one must be familiarly acquainted with the general idea suggested by a temple. It is a place peculiarly consecrated to the worship of God, in which accordingly he claims a special property, and where his presence and favour may be found by those who worship with reverence and with godly fear. Under the Mosaic dispensation, there was one place where God was pleased to manifest his presence in the holy of holies, where the shechinah, or visible glory, shone forth between the cherubim from above the mercy-seat. Thither, however, the high priest alone was permitted to come once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and also for the sins of the people. The typical vail which excluded from this sacred spot, and which it would be fatal to attempt to pass, indicated that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest; that a controversy still subsisted between the Most High and a rebellious race; and that a more excellent sacrifice than that of bulls and of goats was necessary to satisfy offended justice, and to reconcile us to God.

Now when the apostle describes the Corinthians as temples of the living God, he points out, in a striking manner, the privileges and blessings enjoyed under the gospel, and the intimate union and favour with God to which believers are admitted, as contrasted with the alienation, distrust, and terror, with which the law inspired those who were under its institutions. We are called to know that God is in Christ Jesus reconciling a guilty world unto himself, and not imputing to men their trespasses; and all men, whatever be their condition, are now invited to cast away the arms of rebellion, to submit to mercy, and to become partakers of the most intimate union and favour with God. 'Behold I stand at the door and knock, and if any man open I will come in and sup with him, and he with me.' Now the middle wall of partition is destroyed—God is besieging the hearts of his children, and will have them to open to him, that he may come in and dwell with them, and walk in them, and be a father to them for ever.

When man was originally created, he was endowed with a rational and immortal soul, and was rendered capable of serving and glorifying God in a more perfect manner than any of the rest of the creatures connected with this lower world. He was in reality an animated temple, holy and pure, from the altar of whose heart there ascended the incense of a ceaseless adoration, gratitude, and praise; and all whose faculties were ministering servants, consciously engaged in a higher service than that of the creature, contemplating in whatever they did, as their high ultimate end, the glory of the Creator. But sin dissolved the sacred relation, and laid in the dust man's spiritual glory; and spoiled of innocence, and forsaken of God, his heart became the dwelling-place of every unclean and evil thing; and his condition would have been one of hopeless and irretrievable ruin, had not God, in his sovereign mercy, seen meet to signalize his glory by accomplishing our redemption, rather than consigning us to merited destruction and everlasting death.

It is the blessed object of God, under the gospel, to receive man back into favour, to cleanse him from all his idols, and all his abominations, to establish his throne in his heart, to fit him for enjoying communion with him, and serving him; and in fine, to exalt him to dwell with him, and to glorify him throughout eternal ages in the kingdom of heaven.

Are ye the temple of God, and what purity of character, what devotion of spirit, what entire consecration of all your powers and talents to the honour and service of God, should distinguish you from a world that lieth in wickedness! To profane a temple, by introducing into it any thing unsuitable to the sacred use for which it has been erected, is an act of aggravated impiety; and to resign yourselves to any sin, to follow any idol, after being enlightened and sanctified by the Spirit of God, involves an amount of guilt of peculiar magnitude, and cannot fail, unless speedily repented of, to incur the heaviest judgments. To this our Lord seems to refer in Matt. xii. 43. 'When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return unto my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first.'

What need of vigilance, self-denial, and prayer, earnest and persevering prayer, that you may be kept pure from idols, as become the temples of God. How true the testimony of scripture, that it is not in man who walketh to direct his steps aright. What a lamentable tendency to spiritual backsliding and deterioration is characteristic of our nature. How soon does the flame of piety begin to burn dimly upon the altar of the heart, and how constantly does it need to be revived and purified. The service of the house of Aaron, in waiting on the ancient temple, was unceasing; and they were exempted from all other labours to devote themselves exclusively to its appointed duties. And what an interesting lesson do they, in this respect, present to you, of the careful and assiduous zeal with which you should watch over the interests of your soul, and be always found living to the glory of God. O let the worship of God be attended to with punctual and persevering care. Every morning and evening offer up your sacrifice of praise and of thanksgiving. Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts. Quench not the Holy Spirit. Lead a life of faith, and spirituality, and holiness. 'What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they will be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty;' 2 Cor. vi. 16—18.

ELEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations,' Psal. xxxiii. 11.

THE immutability of God's counsels is a necessary conclusion from the unchangeableness of his being and perfections. 'He is not a man that he should lie, nor the Son of man that he should repent.' His unerring wisdom, infinite holiness, and absolute truth, preclude the possibility of his ever being under a necessity of deviating from the determination which he has formed, or of failing to fulfil the engagements to which his faithfulness stands pledged. Known unto him are all things to the end of the world, and no unforeseen difficulties, no unexpected circumstances, can ever require him to modify his purposes to meet the altered aspect which the state of the universe may at any time present. Even the actions of free and intelligent agents can occasion no uncertainty, and induce no change in the eternal counsels of God, but fall in with the most perfect accordance with his foreknowledge and foreordained purpose. And thus it is that the fulfilment of prophecy has never in a single instance failed, when the appointed time has arrived for its accomplishment; and although rebel spirits and wicked men, in many instances, had nothing less in view than to establish the counsels of God, and to vindicate his truth, their agency has, in innumerable and very important cases, been overruled to that end. How, for instance, was the crucifixion of Christ the effect of the blind rage and wickedness of his enemies, and yet in every point how were they controlled and overruled, that in such minute particulars as casting lots for his raiment, and abstaining from breaking one of his bones, they gave prophecy cause to triumph in the complete fulfilment of her every announcement.

To reconcile the decrees of God, or even his foreknowledge, with the freedom of the human will, is a subject of too profound a nature to be competent for the limited powers of man, at least in the present state of existence; and it should be sufficient for us to know that the fact is so without being curiously inquisitive into its grounds. In no sense can the actions of wicked men be so traced to God, or connected with the necessity of fulfilling his counsels, as to charge him, in the most remote manner, with being the author of sin. On this subject the scriptures are most explicit. 'Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.'

Neither ought we so to think of the immutability of the divine counsels, as to imagine that the necessity for exertion or prayer is superseded, by the consideration that whatever has been ordained cannot but come to pass, whether we labour and pray for it or not. God who ordains the end, ordains likewise the means, and without the employment of the one we have no ground to look forward and expect the other. The duty of prayer has been appointed by God, and his blessing is promised in answer to it, and if any neglect the duty, they are justly excluded from the reception of the benefits which otherwise they might have received.

Let this subject be improved, as a reason for being steadfast and consistent in the Christian life. God is unchangeably the same for ever, and our allegiance to him ought to be no less devout than permanent and enduring. The same obligation which exists now will always exist, to entitle God to your highest love, your holiest confidence, and your most reverential obedience. His glory shall never depart, his throne is established throughout all generations; his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. 'Thus saith the Lord, the King of Israel, and his Redeemer, the Lord of hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and besides me there is no God. And who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it, and set it in order for me, since I appointed the ancient people? and the things that are coming, and shall come, let them show unto them. Fear ye not, neither be afraid; have I not told thee from that time, and have declared it? ye are even my witnesses. Is there a God besides me? yea, there is no God; I know not any,' Isa. xlv. 6—9.

---

ELEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy,' Rom. ix. 15, 16.

THE sovereignty of God especially appears in the exercise of his grace; and to make it the more to be known that he is solely determined by his sovereign good pleasure in exercising forgiveness and mercy, how often does he proceed in a way wholly opposite to that which our ideas of fitness and propriety would dictate. 'God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty, and base things of the world, and things that are despised, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.'

What a remarkable illustration of this truth was given, in selecting fallen men in preference to fallen angels, to become the objects of redeeming love. The whole tenor of the divine dispensations, in connection with the development of the plan of mercy, is demonstrative of the same thing. The people of the Jews were chosen to be God's peculiar heritage, not because they excelled the rest of the nations; they were inferior in almost all the elements of grandeur which constitute the magnificence of empires. When God would set up a king over Israel, he took not the first born of Jesse, but the youth who had not yet reached manhood, and who, apparently unequal to the toils of war, was employed in the peaceful labours of the shepherd in the distant solitudes of the land. In the family of Isaac, the blessing descends, not to the first born, as the patriarch himself intended and desired, but according to the sovereign purpose of God, to Jacob, the younger of the two brothers. And the same infinite sovereignty is visible in the adjustment of all the details of the plan of salvation. What, for instance, could be more powerfully demonstrative of this than the selection of the humble virgin to be the Saviour's mother; Bethlehem-Ephrath, little among the thousands of Judah, to be the place of his nativity; and the fishermen of Galilee to be his chosen disciples and ambassadors to the nations?

There is no doctrine more offensive to the innate pride of the human heart, than that which teaches us to acknowledge the sovereign and unmerited grace of God as the source from which we must look for salvation, and all its constituent blessings; and the entire absence of all room for boasting, in connection with the dispensation of mercy to the guilty and the lost. There is a powerful disposition in the sinful creature to magnify self; and to deem that it must be by some means honourable to our own strength and wisdom, rather than glorious to the grace and goodness of God, that salvation must be obtained. Hence the multitudes who, in the spirit of blinded Israel, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. They despise, as too humiliating and too deeply abasing, the doctrine of the cross; that salvation is the free gift of God, unmerited by any, and equally free to the most vile and guilty of sinners as to themselves; that God is sovereign in his mercy, and that publicans and sinners may enter into the kingdom of heaven, whilst they and others of similar pretensions to a higher worth are kept out, is what they cannot submit to believe. They trust to establish a claim, founded upon their virtues, to salvation, and by their defective and sustained obedience do they blindly and impiously arrogate a right to the clemency and favour of God. Let it be deeply impressed, however, that if salvation come by the law at all, it must be exclusively by the law; or if by grace, it must be wholly by grace.

TWELFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Thou, even thou, art God alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou pre-servest them all,' Neh. ix. 6.

THE knowledge of God is communicated both through the medium of his works, and of his word. It may be read in the fields of nature, and in the pages of revelation; it shines in the starry firmament with its innumerable host of revolving worlds; and beams with pure and intense splendour in the sacred records of the inspired testimony. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night succeeding night teacheth knowledge. But how should we stand reprov'd and self-condemned from considering how little accordance in general there is between the demonstrations of God, which are daily and unceasingly pouring in around us, and the ordinary tenor and habitude of our minds. What folly, what inconsideration, what enmity against God, characterize the heart and the thoughts of man! The whole scene of nature and providence is fitted to arrest and to fix our attention upon him who ruleth over all, and who is every where present, beholding the evil and the good. The morning proclaims his loving-kindness, and the evening his faithfulness. The varied seasons of the rolling year all speak of him. Whether it be the howling blasts of winter, or the gentle opening of the budding spring, the gay luxuriance of blooming summer, or the abundant riches of gathered autumn, that draw our attention to God, all direct us to lift the hymn of gratitude to him whose tender mercies are over all his works. The universe is replete with the evidences of his presence, the traces and manifestations of his divine perfections. When you look to the heavens you behold the magnificence of his creative and constructive power, in those vast systems receding into endless space, which perform in unmeasurable fields their majestic and ceaseless revolutions. When you walk abroad through nature's landscapes, each scene of loveliness that meets your eye, each object of interest that fixes your attention, all the organization and beauty that you admire, whether in things animate or inanimate, the very flowers of the earth, the grass of the field, or the insect that almost eludes your observation as it fulfils its ephemeral destiny,—all proclaim to you the being and the perfections of him who is the universal parent of all; and whose every work reveals him to be excellent in working and wonderful in counsel. But instead of telling you where you may find God, let us rather ask, where is he not? Can you flee from his Spirit, or leave behind you the proof of his existence, or escape beyond the limits of his authority and of his laws? The creation, throughout all its departments, is a witness of God, and an impressive demonstration of the duty of according with his will. It responds to every impulse of his power, and fulfils every dictate of his mind. How pointedly does the sun, from day to day, keep his track, and know his time of rising, and of going down. With what regularity do the waters of the great deep ebb and flow, and all the processes of nature observe their appointed courses. And is it that the human heart is the only place where God is not adored and his will complied with? O what a miracle of wickedness is every ungodly impenitent man! He appears as a dark blot on the face of creation, that absorbs without reflecting or manifesting the image of its divine Author; a jarring chord that mars the sacred symphony of that mighty harp whose every string tells, in sweetest music, that the hand which framed and which touches it is divine. Let every irreligious man consider the host of witnesses around him, and above him, which declare the power and glory of God. Let him meditate upon the infinite excellence and divine majesty of the adorable Jehovah. Let him ponder his title to receive from his rational creatures all praise, and honour, and blessing, and thanksgiving. 'The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom extendeth over all. Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word. Bless ye the Lord, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his that do his pleasure. Bless the Lord, all his works, in all places of his dominions. Bless the Lord, O my soul,' Psal. ciii. 19—22.

The withholding from God the glory due to his great name as the supreme Creator, Governor, and Benefactor of all things, is a sin which has often been visited with the effects of his most signal displeasure. When David numbered the host with a feeling of unholy confidence in an arm of flesh, and withdrew his trust and dependence from the Rock of Israel, he not only subjected himself to the remorse of his own conscience, but entailed a pestilence upon the people, which in those days cut down seventy thousand men. When Nebuchadnezzar, in a spirit of sinful self-elation, arrogated to himself the praise of having exalted Babylon to that height of grandeur and magnificence which rendered her the mistress of cities, saying, as he walked in his palace, and surveyed her extent and her splendour, 'Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, The kingdom is departed from thee. The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar, and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.'

The adoption of second causes in the economy of the divine administration is an arrangement highly beneficial in its use, and eminently worthy of him to appoint, who ordains all things in infinite and unerring wisdom. It forms a mode of administering events more adapted to the nature and faculties of human beings, constituted as they at present are, than any other that could be substituted in its stead. In consequence of the invariable sequency which connect causes with their effects, we adjust our conduct, regulate our expectations, and exercise our powers in the most sure and satisfactory manner. Upon the institution of second causes, in short, depends all the advantage of observation, experience, and science, without which the active powers of man could not be exercised to any purpose, and would have been possessed in vain. But is it on account of an excellence, in his mode of administration, which contributes so essentially to the harmony of nature, and to the preservation and happiness of every living thing, that we are to overlook God, who has given to all things, not only their existence, but their several properties and qualities, so that for any power or efficacy they may possess they are wholly dependent upon him whose they are and for whose glory they are created. 'Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith, or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood,' Isa. x. 15.

---

TWELFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them,' Eccl. xii. 1.

THERE is scarcely any object of greater interest, or that should engage in a stronger degree, the attention of the Christian philanthropist, than the sound moral and religious education of the young. View the youth of a nation or community individually, and they may appear of little comparative importance; but view them in the aggregate, take them in the whole, and they constitute the hope of society, the elements of its future fabric with whom it must depend whether the cause of moral, intellectual, and religious improvement shall decline or advance. The young form the silent but sure invaders of the country of their birth, who in a few short years shall occupy every seat, and fill every department of social life from the highest to the lowest, and impart an aspect and character of their own to the movements and operations of the great social system. And a duty, the importance of which the dictates of mere natural policy so powerfully enforces, has yet a higher and more sacred sanction from the word of God; which by precept and example shows how important it is to lead the young to an early and decided pursuit of piety and virtue, as the source of their true happiness both here and hereafter.

In the exhortation before us, the royal preacher does not deem it unworthy of his elevated office and important duties to condescend to present himself as the counsellor of the young; and the counsel which he gives is one deserving of all the honour which it could receive, by coming from the lips of the wisest and most illustrious king of Israel. How precious is the season of youth for laying the foundation of all true excellence and worth; and what a lamentable fact is it that its advantages are often defeated by the indiscretion, the folly, and the inconsideration so frequently characteristic of the youthful mind. It may be most appropriately called the spring time of human life; for not only does the corporeal frame then disclose its advancing powers with peculiar loveliness, but the expanding mind, in the freshness of its early impressions, in the vividness of its affection, in the constant flow and energy of its spirits, in the quickness and versatility of its powers of observation and memory, and in the untiring activity of all its faculties, presents a most invaluable opportunity for making progress in every department of knowledge and excellence. An eminent philosopher has justly remarked, that were the amount of human acquirements divided into two parts; the one comprehending what is acquired in the season of youth, and the other that which is laid up in after years; the former would decidedly preponderate in extent and value. But above all is the season of youth favourable for acquiring and cultivating religious principles and impressions, and for forming the character to a conformity to the holy commandments of God. And accordingly, they who begin to seek God early have the special promise given to them that they shall find him, Prov. viii. 17. How beautiful and interesting is piety in youth, how hateful and awfully inauspicious profaneness and vice. Bring as a grateful tribute to your Creator the first-fruits of your lives; bestow your earliest and chief attention upon his blessed word; employ your activity and strength in his holy service, and direct your prayers to the end that he would ever guide and sanctify and preserve you in his fear. By commencing early the Christian life, you will not only make greater progress in it, but you will do so with more ease and pleasantness than those who delay and who familiarize themselves with courses far from being favourable to their future well being. When the young are seen uniting with the loveliness of youth, the still more pure and lasting charms of religion and holiness, tempering the sprightliness of their prime with the seriousness and humility of true wisdom, blending with the recreations and pursuits of their age preparation for eternity, what parent will not rejoice, what Christian friend will not approve and commend. 'A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.'

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and a good understanding have all they who keep his commandments. Let religion guide you, and your course shall be in the end triumphant. When we behold the stately vessel gay with its streamers, and bright in its ornaments, bounding into the ocean, its future element, we cannot help thinking of the varied destiny which lies before it; what storms it may encounter, what unseen and unknown dangers it may have to brave; and if the benevolent mind must breathe the fond wish that it may long speed a prosperous course, and be preserved by a kind providence through all the perils of the deep, until laid aside, no more to be fraught with human interests and concerns, O how much more is the destiny of young immortals in the prime of life; and with the longer voyage of the world before them, fitted to awaken a yet deeper and more intense solicitude. And when we think of the many dangers of their probationary existence, the temptations, afflictions, and trials which lie before them, who does not pray that they may be kept from all evil, and be brought at last unto the heavenly kingdom? Commend yourselves to God by heartfelt and persevering supplication; take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may stand; having done all, to stand. 'Be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord.'

THIRTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works,' Ps. cxlv. 17.

A profound reliance upon the righteousness of God, amidst the vicissitudes and under the trials of life, forms the source of genuine resignation, and affords a principal motive for desiring to improve to a proper end the painful dispensations of providence. We may rest assured that no trouble would be ordained unless it were merited, and that when sent it is designed and fitted to evince the evil of sin; and by humbling us to lead us to turn unto God, seeking mercy, and resolved to live for the future in accordance with the requirements of his holy will. What ample illustration does the whole course of providence present, when received in connection with the doctrines of the gospel, that God is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. The end which he seeks to accomplish in all his dealings is the sanctification of his people; and his every measure is pursued in perfect and unerring righteousness. Even the love which he cherishes towards them is subordinated to the still higher love which he bears to righteousness; and instead of allowing sin to remain in them he uses often the painful discipline of the rod, and the sharp heat of the furnace, to cleanse them from their idols, and to purify them from their dross.

The righteousness of God was remarkably demonstrated in the ejection of our first parents from paradise; and in laying them under the curse which entailed sorrow and death upon them, and upon all their posterity, in consequence of the violation of the divine law. Even though he had so loved them, that he admitted them to the closest and most confidential intercourse and communion, yet could he not allow their sins to pass unpunished, nor depart from the execution of the law which he had given them to obey. In the case of Moses, too, highly distinguished as he was in many respects, even above other prophets and holy men, how strikingly was the righteousness of God manifested, when, for speaking unadvisedly with his lips at the waters of Meribah, he and Aaron were deprived of the privilege of being allowed to lead the people of Israel into the promised land. In some respects, sin in the servants of God is more heinous than in others, and particularly when their mercies and blessings have been great, and therefore they may incur a heavier rebuke and more painful chastisement. But their sufferings and pains are limited to the present life; and therefore they may the more patiently endure. For God will not cast off for ever his servants, nor will he utterly consume them in his anger; but he will chastise them in measure, and afterwards will he rejoice over them, to bless them and to do them good. 'For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord, thy Redeemer. For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee,' Is. liv. 8—10.

The whole history of the church and of its several branches, affords still farther demonstration of the truth, that the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. How did he reprove the seven churches in Asia for all their backslidings and transgressions, and call them to repent, lest he should come quickly and remove their candlestick out of its place. When mercies are misimproved, how surely are they followed by judgments, and when privileges are despised or are held in unrighteousness, how irrevocably are they at last forfeited and lost. And on the other hand, how true is it, that blessings abound to those who are steadfast in their integrity, and who have suffered for righteousness' sake, and who have trusted in the divine faithfulness and goodness in days of degeneracy and trial. The apostle presents encouragement to the believing Hebrews, despised no doubt, and persecuted by their unbelieving fellow-countrymen, from this consideration—'God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love which ye have showed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints and do minister; and we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end.'

The righteousness of God will yet be more fully and gloriously manifested by the transactions and decisions of the great day of judgment, when he shall render to all men according to the deeds done in the body, whether they have been good or whether they have been evil. They who have believed with the heart on the Lord Jesus Christ, and who have truly died to sin and lived to righteousness, shall then be acknowledged and accepted; an everlasting separation shall be made between the precious and the vile, between them who feared God and them who feared him not. 'But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap; and he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness,' Mal. iii. 2, 3.

THIRTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee,' Deut. viii. 2.

PECULIARLY impressive and interesting were the claims which the deliverances God had wrought out for them, and the mercies he had imparted to them, during their journey to the land of promise, had upon the remembrance of the Israelites to the latest generations. They were under a state of discipline and preparation, at that period, which it was salutary and instructive for them ever afterwards to refer to, as fitted to show them the danger of falling again into those sins which they had previously been guilty of; and the necessity of being warned and admonished by the judgments which had then been incurred. 'The Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments or no: and he humbled thee and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna which thou knewest not, neither did thy Father know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old, neither did thy foot swell these forty years. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee.'

The condition of the Israelites in the wilderness was typical of the pilgrimage of faith, to which you are called as the followers of Jesus; and O how often, like theirs, does our unbelief require to be rebuked, our pride to be corrected, our murmuring and rebellion to be visited with the rod of painful chastisement, and our many wanderings from duty and from God to be repressed with a holy severity. What improvement and advantage might we not reap, if we habituated ourselves to reflect more carefully upon all the way that the Lord our God has led us; what cause for humiliation would we not find in our manifold sins; and what motives for gratitude that we were not permitted utterly to perish, in being given over to our hearts' lusts.

The habit of devoutly reviewing God's dealings with them has always been characteristic of his genuine people, and has eminently tended to advance their best interests; deepening their sense of his manifold mercies, showing them the duty of continuing to trust in him, and supplying them with a source of wisdom and experience of a peculiarly important and valuable nature amidst the temptations and trials of life. An instance of this we have in the history of David, who when Saul would have dissuaded him from encountering Goliath, as not able to fight with him in battle, called to mind the merciful preservation vouchsafed to him on previous occasions of peril by the favour of God, and said, 'The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine.' In the case of the great apostle of the Gentiles, how frequent and solemn are the references which he makes to his former unconverted state, when he was a persecutor and injurious, and how profound is the admiration and gratitude which he expresses that he should have been counted worthy to receive mercy, and to be made a preacher of that gospel which he went about to destroy. 'Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.'

How infinitely unmerited must the mercies of God, which they have so richly enjoyed, appear to those who habituate themselves to a careful consideration of all the way in which he has led them. 'To us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him. Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets,' Dan. ix. 8—10.

What motives to repentance and to new obedience arise from a saving consideration of the long-suffering and forbearance of God. 'It is now high time to awake out of sleep.' How vile and unprofitable does the service of sin appear to them who look back upon it; 'what profit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed, for the end of those things is death?'

How should the remembrance of past mercies be treasured up as an incentive to bless God for his goodness, and as a reason for patiently submitting to his will on the day of trouble. 'Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?' 'Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.'

It is valuable to form a connected view of God's dealings; to see them in their principle and in their end, as all designed to advance his own glory and to work together for good to them who love him. How many erroneous impressions and false views would it not correct, concerning what is truly good for man, thus to consider the ways of the most High. 'We call the proud happy; yea, they that work wickedness are set up.' But a juster estimate would teach us to esteem the lowly, the afflicted, the poor and contrite in spirit; those whose trials, though numerous, have all been sanctified, as the alone blessed and truly happy. Better is it to choose with Moses, to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy all the riches and honours of Egypt. In the end, how shall the redeemed, on taking a retrospect of all the way in which God has led them, approve of the wisdom and faithfulness of every dispensation which he allotted in the journey of life. 'They shall sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty: just and true are all thy ways, thou King of saints.'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'In him we live, and move, and have our being,'
Acts xvii. 28.

THE reason at the present day, and with the many religious advantages we enjoy, why any do not glorify God as God, neither are thankful, is not that they are ignorant of his nature and perfections, as the omnipotent God, and the supreme Benefactor, but that they do not desire to retain the knowledge of God in all their thoughts. The age of idolatry has for ever passed away; but still is there reason for the expostulation and remonstrance which was originally addressed to the house of Israel, being applied to us, in all its original force and severity: 'Hear, O heavens; and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know; my people doth not consider.' How inadequately do we realize our dependence upon God, the intimacy of his continued presence, the operation of his sustaining hand, the ceaseless communications of goodness which flow to us from his boundless liberality. Although he is the strength of our lives, the health of our countenance, and the length of our days, may not weeks, and months, and even years pass away without our rendering to him any homage, or expressing any gratitude, or testifying the least consciousness of his Almighty power and unwearied care. And when this is considered, how can any pretend to deny the depravity of human nature, or that 'all have sinned and come short of the glory of God?'

The doctrine of our entire and constant dependence upon God, obviously lays us under a variety of very solemn and important duties to our supreme Benefactor. Of these, gratitude evidently holds the first rank, together with all those devout acknowledgments by which it ought to be expressed. It is meet that we celebrate the loving-kindness of God every morning, and show forth his faithfulness every evening. Submission is another important duty, implying resignation to the divine will, and contentment with our lot, and with all the events and circumstances by which it may be marked. A cheerful alacrity in duty is farther required; that we live as seeing him who is invisible, and that we walk worthy of all the mercy and goodness which we are daily receiving from his hand.

Elevating views of the perfections and character of God are peculiarly adapted to sustain our zeal in his service, and to engage our habitual homage and reverence towards his holy name. How honourable, how blessed, to be the worshippers and servants of him who filleth heaven and earth with his presence, who is the supreme Proprietor of countless worlds, and the beneficent Author of all being, and all excellence. Under what an infinitely important light is religion and all its duties seen, when viewed in connection with the glory and majesty of him who is the supreme and only potentate, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords. That he should allow us to know him, that he should admit us to confide in him, and hold communion with him, and serve him, what a distinction is it, what an unspeakable honour. He is the sovereign source of all riches, and wisdom, and power, and excellence; the Author of life, and of its every enjoyment. His presence forms the light and glory of heaven; his frown sheds darkness and desolation on every region on which it falls. With what reason should we acknowledge, with emotions of the liveliest gratitude and wonder, the infinite mercy and goodness of God. 'He that is mighty hath done great things for us, holy is his name. His mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation. He has put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away. He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy, and he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever,' Luke i. 49—56.

Little as the puny and short lived actors on the scene of time may think of that eternal and Almighty Being who, in the infinitude of his power, wisdom, and goodness, created and upholds this vast and glorious universe, with every thing it contains, he is no distant or unconcerned spectator of its interests or movements; he sits not retired in viewless majesty, leaving the works of his hands to be the sport of accident: he surrenders not the sceptre of his kingdom to any delegated power, as if he could be weary, or needed to find relief by dividing, with any other, the care and anxieties of empire; neither does the perfection of his government, nor the incommunicable attributes of his nature, admit of such a severance between the Creator and his works; he alone is exclusively and essentially self-existent, and independent; and other beings, from the very necessity of their nature, can only live, and move, and act through him; as a ray of light lives in its connection with the centre of illumination whence it emanates; as the stream exists and flows only whilst it continues connected with the fountain from which it has its birth, in like manner all things exist in their dependence upon God, who sustains them in being and in the possession of their every property, so that the moment he withdraws from any of them his sustaining hand, or intercepts the communication of his gracious blessing, they instantaneously and unavoidably perish.

Let the consideration of this great truth be deeply and permanently impressed upon the heart; thus will the ever-varying scene of human life, with all its ceaseless changes, lead forth your thoughts to God, and constitute a daily renewed source of piety and praise; thus will you be taught to cherish a lowly estimate of yourselves, and of your various resources, faculties, and blessings, for the continuance of which every moment you are dependent upon the divine will; and thus will you feel the duty of engaging in all your labours and enterprises in a spirit of prayerful reliance upon the help and favour of God, and with the sincere desire and intention, that whatever you do may prove acceptable in his sight, and conducive to his glory. 'Go to now, ye that say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy, and sell, and get gain. Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow; for what is your life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that,' James iv. 13—15.

FOURTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps,' Prov. xvi. 9.

ENDOWED with powers of reason and reflection, it is not only allowed, but required, that we should devise our way; yet should it always be in accordance with the dictates of God's revealed word, and in submission to his most holy and blessed will. The sin consists in man 'leaning to his own understanding,' doing what seemeth good in his own eyes, and fixing his plans and his purposes without reference to the sovereign purpose or mind of God. 'Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy, and sell, and get gain. Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that. But now ye rejoice in your boastings; all such rejoicing is evil.'

It forms an important and interesting part of practical religion to refer all things to God; to trace his hand guiding and directing whatever comes to pass, and to acknowledge, with habitual reverence and submission, the wisdom of all his ways, and the righteousness of all his dispensations. In those examples of piety which the scriptures have transmitted for our instruction, nothing is more distinguishable than the habitual and devout recognition of God in all things which has been usual with his people. Their brighter and their darker experience alike embodies the acknowledgment, that he ordains, in righteousness and faithfulness, whatever comes to pass. Many seem to live as if God only interposed on great occasions, and in connection with afflictive dispensations; and that the ordinary tenor of providence was a current which flowed smoothly of its own accord, and which required no immediate acknowledgment of the hand of God to be made. They cherish no practical impression of the doctrine of a particular providence, or of the influence which it should constantly exercise upon their minds. It is, indeed, the inestimable privilege of the afflicted to know that God is a refuge to the distressed, and a very present help in the time of trouble; but beware of quenching the grateful emotions which his goodness should awaken, or of forgetting, in the day of ease and prosperity, that all your well-springs are in God. It is one and the same Almighty Ruler who holds all our destinies in his hand; who both killeth and maketh alive, who maketh poor and who maketh rich, who bringeth low and who lifteth up.'

The doctrine, that God rules over all, and that there is nothing too great to dispense with his care, and nothing too little to be beneath his notice, is accordant with the testimony of scripture, and all the most enlightened and exalted views which reason, as well as revelation, can form of his nature. We see, within the limits of our contemplation, no inconsiderable portion of that vast progression of being which seems to retire to an infinitude beneath, which cannot be followed for its minuteness, and to rise to another infinitude above, which cannot be comprehended or contemplated for its vastness and sublimity. But is there any point, within this range, where an indication is presented that the care of God ceases, or that his creative and governing power and wisdom ceases? Are the discoveries of the telescope replete with a beauty, and order, and magnificence, which evidently proclaim the glory of God; but are the secrets of the microscope the development of a confusion and chaos which indicates that there lies in the humbler regions of existence a province to which the presence and the power of God has manifestly been denied? The opposite has most unequivocally and brilliantly been demonstrated to be the case. The limb of the most ephemeral insect is formed as curiously and skilfully, and is as admirably adapted for the ends of its existence, as the arms and members of a man. The eye of the invisible animalcule has its fluids, and lenses, and nerves as appropriately adjusted and placed for the purposes of vision, as that of the horse or the elephant. And not to overlook the illustration of Christ—the hair of our head, simple and inartificial as it seems, with its tubular form, with its longitudinal and transverse fibres, and all the organs by which it lives and grows, constitutes in its mechanism a production no less admirable than the lofty cedar, or the stately oak, the ornament of nature, and the pride of earth's grandest landscapes.

But in reality the whole framework of nature, and the whole system of providence hangs so closely together, and is so mutually dependent in all its parts, that it is impossible to say whether the wisdom and care of God are more necessary for superintending the great or the minute events which occur. How often may events, upon which the destinies of the world hinge, depend upon causes seemingly the most trivial and contemptible. In the history of the Old Testament, for instance, do we not find God inflicting his most signal vengeance upon his proud and vain-glorious enemies, by employing, not the higher but the humbler order of causes; sending the fly, the locust, and the caterpillar as the ministers of famine, disease, and death. The distinction which some pretend to establish between a general and particular providence, as if God concerned himself with the one but not with the other, is founded upon an evident misconception of the nature of things. The truth is, things great and small are so closely and inseparably linked together, that the hand which shall guide the one must govern the other; and the mind which dictates the decrees that regulate worlds, must also appoint and adjust the course of the minutest events. Be assured then, that nothing connected with your condition can be the effect of chance, or the result of blind fatality, but is the effect of the wise, and just, and holy determination of your heavenly Father. Of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever and ever.

---

FIFTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'It is good to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night,' Psal. xcii. 2.

GRATEFULNESS and praise are, at all times, due to God; yet are there some periods that give a peculiar call to this holy exercise. The Psalmist here specifies two—the morning and the evening, and assigns to each its most suitable subject. 'It is good to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night.' What then is the loving-kindness of God? 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.' 'For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believed on him, might not perish, but have everlasting life;' and 'God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' The general goodness of God is daily seen in a thousand forms, in the preservation of man and beast, and in the opening of his hand to supply every thing that lives; but that special love of God to a sinner, that pities his miseries, heals his diseased soul, washes away his guilt, restores him to his Father, enrobes him in righteousness, and makes him an heir of glory—all this is only to be found and seen in the promise, incarnation, working, suffering, atonement, resurrection, ascension, and intercession of the Lord Jesus Christ. Yea, in this, and in this alone, 'was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God had sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.' 'Do we not then inquire—how may we best show forth this love? The answer is easy. 'The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him that died for them and rose again.'

Might we not then expect to hear every professing Christian exclaim—'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword; nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us; for I am persuaded that neither life, nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.' But alas! of how many may it be said—and O, mine own heart, beware lest it be also said of thee—'The ass knoweth his owner and the ox his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.'

But whatever calls to consideration we may have hitherto slighted, whatever opportunities we have hitherto neglected, once again the morning invites us, by its peculiar arguments, to show forth the loving-kindness of the Lord. He has watched over us while we slept; he has spared us to another day; he has caused his sun again to arise—the emblem of 'the Sun of righteousness, with healing in his wings,'—he sets duty before us, both for ourselves and for others; and shall the Giver of all good be forgotten, his love unfelt, his name unpraised ?

'O! thou my soul, bless God the Lord,
And all that in me is
Be stirred up, his holy name
To magnify and bless.
Bless, O my soul, the Lord thy God,
And not forgetful be
Of all his gracious benefits
He hath bestowed on thee.
All thine iniquities who doth
Most graciously forgive,
Who thy diseases all, and pains,
Doth heal, and thee relieve.
Who doth redeem thy life that thou
To death may'st not go down ;
Who thee with loving-kindness doth,
And tender mercies crown.'

But while the morning thus calls to the showing forth of love, the evening calls for our testimony to God's faithfulness. The evening first suggests God's faithfulness to his promise of mercy, after the endurance of the deepest provocation, and after the infliction of the most terrible judgment. To Noah he promised, 'while the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.' The return of the night is therefore a new attestation to the truth of him who hath said, 'my covenant I will not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David—that is, the true David, the beloved, as the name David signifies—'his seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me; it shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven.'

This 'faithfulness' of God, this 'immutability of his counsel, confirmed by an oath,' is indeed the 'strong consolation' of sinners 'who have fled for refuge, to lay hold upon the hope set before them.' But, as 'it is impossible for God to lie,' so to believers there is no just cause of doubt, nor to the 'chief of sinners' any ground for despair. 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.'

How then may we best exhibit the goodness of this holy exercise?

1. It is good for our own souls, as the most cheering and comforting of all subjects. The mind must more or less partake of the character of the objects upon which it most constantly dwells. 'Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, we are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.' 'Now if God himself be blessed,' the man who is likest him, must be most blessed; and he is likest God who knows most of his love in sending his Son, and his faithfulness in keeping covenant.

2. It is good for others that, by our morning and evening sacrifice, we bear witness to their consciences of their obligations to God, and if God will thereby convince their judgments, move their affections, decide their waverings, and confirm their purposes, that 'seeing our good works, they may glorify our Father who is in heaven.' There is not merely a chain of moral dependency between God and man, but also a similar chain between man and man; and did we reflect how much the eternal salvation of our neighbours may be connected with our example, we would see a new form of goodness in every holy duty, and feel a new obligation to its private and public observance.

FIFTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord,' Prov. xvi. 33.

WHEN events proceed with great regularity, we are disposed to refer them to some law, or to some known or unknown agent, by whose influence they are produced. Thus the regular succession of day and night, the exactly measured changes of the moon, the varying yet certain positions of the planets, and even the departures and the returns of the comets, are all attributed to the operation of one common law of gravity, pervading both earth and heaven. But when events occur without any apparent order, and without any assignable agent, men are disposed to attribute them to fortune, to chance—words that mean nothing but the exclusion of a law, and even of God, from any part or management in the plan or production of these events.

Now, with the first of these views the word of God most exactly agrees. And when the believer, taught by his word and Spirit, 'considers the heavens,' the scripture tells him they are 'the works of God's fingers;' and when he views 'the moon and the stars,' he is told that 'God has ordained them.' But the word of God goes farther; and when it conducts the believer to consider those events in which all appears disorderly and fortuitous; where he sees no direct agent, and can discover no abiding law; even there he is assured the same God rules, a similar law pervades, a similar plan is arranged; and that with equal regularity—though the principle be undiscovered—and that with equal certainty—though the event be not anticipated—will ‘all things work together for good to them that love God.’ Nay, the scriptures cast their light even beyond this region of obscurity, and discover that even those events that arise from the sins of men—sins which God hates, which his law denounces, and which his justice will punish—sins of which God is not, and cannot be the author—are yet under the control of his government, advance his designs, fulfil his purposes, and illustrate his perfections, as much as those events that arose from obedience to his commands and devotedness to his glory. Thus Joseph informs his brethren who had sold him unto Egypt, ‘Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither; for God did send me before you to preserve life.’ In which words, Joseph does not mean to say, ‘Be not grieved nor angry with yourselves for the sins of envy and covetousness, which induced you to sell me hither; but be not grieved nor angry for the mere act of selling me, which event God has overruled to our common preservation.’ Indeed, in an evil world, such as this world confessedly is, if God were deprived of the means of over-ruling and directing those events that originate from the sins of men; if while ‘the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God,’ the wrath of man did not accomplish the plans of God; and if ‘the wrath of man did not praise him;’ and if ‘the remainder of the wrath he did not restrain,’ little would remain of this world as the field of God’s management; and he would be virtually excluded as its moral and efficient governor.

But God is not, and cannot be excluded from governing any department of his works, or from directing any class of events. His wisdom plans, his power accomplishes all things.

How blind is man when he will not see this! how perverse when he will not acknowledge it! We praise an architect for the beauty, grandeur, stability, and convenience of a dwelling. We praise a mechanist for the ingenuity of his invention, and its perfect adaptation to effect his purposes; and if in the dwelling we perceive some apartments of which we cannot discover the intention, or in the machine some wheels or springs of which we cannot discover the use—surely we do not conclude the apartment formed no part of the original plan, or that the wheel and the spring arose without and beyond the intention of the mechanist. And so, comparing earthly with heavenly things—so is it with God. We glorify him, not for a world totally without a design; not for a world in which, though some few parts have been planned, the remainder is fortuitous; but we glorify him for a world where the great and the little are alike objects of his care; where he who ‘counts the stars,’ likewise ‘numbers the hairs of our heads;’ where he who ‘raises up’ Pharaoh, ‘or hews down’ Nebuchadnezzar, suffers not even ‘a sparrow to fall to the ground’ without his knowledge and consent.

But the glory of the divine plan can never be fully understood or appreciated, so long as it is confined to the mere formation and government of the world. Its true character is not discovered till we view it as providing for the salvation of sinners. It is when we see how God ‘hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him; in whom we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,’—it is then, and not till then, that we discover the glory of a plan which originating in the depths of eternity, is developed in the fullness of time, and which runs through eternity, displaying at once the glory of God, and dispensing salvation and happiness to redeemed sinners.

This view of the divine plan, purposes, and government, is calculated to suggest many practical considerations.

1. From how many unnecessary, useless, and tormenting personal fears, anxieties, and cares—should it set the believer free! ‘Give no thought for your life,’ said our Lord, ‘what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life (which God still continues,) more than meat, and the body (which he still upholds) more than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, what shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or, wherewithal shall we be clothed? For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.'

2. What a strong excitement does this doctrine afford to the religious education of children, and what encouraging hope does it inspire for their future progress and welfare! The believer knows 'he is worse than an infidel, and one who has denied the faith, who provides not for his own family.' But he sees in this provision for children, as in provision for himself, not merely meat and drink and clothing, but 'the grace of God that bringeth salvation,' and the righteousness of God 'that insures acceptance,' in the Beloved.' While therefore he 'trains up his child in the way he should go,' relying upon the promise that 'when he is old he will not depart from it,' he is free from all undue care about things temporal, and his heart and his prayers are mainly directed to the salvation of their immortal souls. Their future progress to riches or poverty, to honour or obscurity, he knows to be in the purposes of heaven; and while he neglects no means that may contribute to their success, he confides in no agency, and calculates upon no results, beyond the wisdom, the mercy, the grace, and the providence of God.

3. What a remedy does this doctrine afford to the believer in sickness and pain, what consolation under bereavement of friends, or children, and what support under worldly loss, disappointments, and troubles! 'No affliction for the present seemeth joyous, but grievous.' Yet in every affliction 'God speaketh to us as unto children, saying, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him: for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' When sickness, weakness, and pains distress, and death threatens, the believer finds his most reviving cordial in 'looking to Jesus;' and feeling that his 'affliction ariseth not from the dust, nor his sorrows from the ground,' and in knowing that it is sent, either to correct some error of heart or life, or to sow some good seed of truth, or ripen some fruit of experience, or afford some example to others of the peace and composure 'with which a Christian can die.' When bereaved of dearest relatives that were as the apple of the eye, or stripped naked, as was Job, by the losses of worldly possessions, the believer is able to say, 'It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good.' 'The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord!' 'Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and seen the end of the Lord, that he is very pitiful.' Yet that patience is as nought, when compared to the patience of the Lord Jesus, when 'he bore the cross and despised the shame;' and which patience and endurance he has 'left us as an example that we should follow his steps.' And that pity which Job experienced is no less now than of old. 'For as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him,' 'for he knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are dust. Paul could say that for Jesus he 'had suffered the loss of all things;' he could say believers 'took joyfully the spoiling of their goods;' yet these trials came visibly from the hands of wicked men. How much more then should believers submit with patience; yea, count their trials joy, when they can ascribe them directly to the purpose and the hand of God!

SIXTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand,' Prov. xix. 21.

'Your ways are not my ways, nor your thoughts my thoughts, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.' And this word God addresses to every unconverted sinner for discovery and reproof of his thoughts, while to every renewed and self-examining heart, they come as a word of warning to watchfulness and prayer. But not only are God's thoughts higher than men's thoughts—that is, higher in their holy origin, their holy nature, and their glorious object—but they are higher still in the sufficiency of their means, and the certainty of their accomplishment. 'For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither'—that is, without effecting the end for which they were sent—'but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that there may be seed to the sower, and bread for the eater; so shall my word be that proceeded out of my mouth; it shall not return to me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.'

Let us then, in the light of God's revealing word, proceed to examine man's heart, and contrast its manifold and abortive devices with the abiding counsel of the Lord.

1. When we examine the heart of man, we find it teeming with thoughts and devices. One chief thought and device generally ruling over all the rest, but surrounded by multitudes of inferior thoughts, plans, and designs, of which there seems no end. Multitudinous as the waves of the sea, man's thoughts are rolling on; and as wave succeeds wave with voice and motion unexhausted, so thought succeeds thought not only undiminished but increasing still.

2. But the thoughts of man's heart are characterized by Solomon as 'devices,' when contrasted with the 'counsel' of the Lord. Now a device is either some plan by which inventive ingenuity supplies a deficiency, overcomes an obstruction, or accomplishes an unexpected end; or it implies some subterfuge in which cunning, hypocrisy, or dishonesty, secretly meditate or attempt what openly they dare not avow. And, in this last sense it is, that the heart of man—is man unrenewed in the spirit of his mind—is charged 'with many devices.' How many are the devices by which profession labours to pass for principle! How many the 'devices' by which hypocrisy labours to deceive others, and often succeeds, for a time, in deceiving itself! How many the 'devices' by which infidelity seeks to evade the evidence of God's word and the warnings of conscience! How many the 'devices' by which worldliness excuses its love of forbidden pleasure, and covetousness its love of unhallowed gain! How many the 'devices' of lukewarm hearts which 'have forgotten their first love,' to account for, or excuse, or rest satisfied with, their spiritual declensions! How many the 'devices' of the prayerless, whether in the closet, the family, or the congregation, to evade that 'fellowship' with God, and that acquaintance with their own hearts, which prayer absolutely requires! And how many the 'devices' of dying and accountable beings, to banish the thoughts of that death which is at the door, and of that 'wrath to come' in the judgment that follows! And yet, these are but a few of the most common and superficial of the 'devices' of man's heart. Beyond all these, there is an endless, a nameless, and undistinguishable multitude of 'vexing thoughts,' or vain imaginations, or forms of deep 'deceitfulness,' or 'errors,' which the heart they inhabit cannot fully understand, and of 'secret faults' from which even the believer requires daily to be 'cleansed.' 'Our Father who art in heaven, give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses,' is alike the language of self-knowledge, experience, humility, and faith.

3. The 'devices' of man's heart are generally, for a time at least, secret from the world; and, as we have discovered by the word of God, are sometimes hidden from the heart where they dwell. 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of,' was addressed, by our Lord, to believers in the days of his flesh, and are certainly as truly applicable in the days of his absence in glory.

4. The 'devices' of man's natural heart are, when thoroughly examined, deliberate plans against God. 'Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast their cords from us.' Yea, though they be the 'cords of love,' tender and attractive, though they be the 'bands of a man,' rational in evidence, and binding in conscience, yet 'hand joins in hand,' with combined and borrowed might, to break them violently asunder, and cast them contemptuously away.

In these 'devices' against God, however, not God, but man, generally appears the object of antipathy. Of this fact, Balak and Balaam are two of the most notable examples. So far from professing to devise anything against him, Balak sought his object, professedly, by worshipping God. Balaam was God's professed prophet and priest; and both Balak and Balaam acknowledged God's power and, in their own perverted senses, both sought his favour and blessing. But while the ostensible object of their 'devices' was the ruin of Israel, the real object of each was the frustration or reversal of an acknowledged 'counsel' of God.

In their 'devices' against God, it is farther to be observed, that while God himself, so far from being the declared object of opposition, may be the object of professed respect, still the opposition is really against himself, because it is against his law, or ordinances. Thus a human legislature repeals, in part at least, the law of the sabbath—a partial repeal that includes, in principle, the repeal of the whole; and not a few professed followers of the Lamb do all in their power to repeal, by their neglect, the ordinance of the Lord's supper, though enforced by the highest of all authorities, and the most touching of all appeals, the dying request and injunction of the Redeemer.

5. The last characteristic we shall notice in the 'devices' of man is, their invariable disappointment. Man's 'devices,' like his righteousness, are 'as the morning cloud and the early dew.' Like Jonah's gourd they expand in a night, bloom in the morning, and promise a permanent shade through the day; but the worm of sin is gnawing at the root unseen, and when he most needs a 'hiding place from the wind,' and 'a shadow in the heat,' man's head is left defenceless—and disappointed in his hopes, dissatisfied with himself, disgusted with the world, if grace prevent not, he is found loudly murmuring and vainly contending against his Maker.

But 'God's ways are not man's ways.' His 'counsels' embracing empires and churches, and descending to families and individuals, surveying the whole circle of birth, and life, and death, ruling in all the variations of joys and sorrows, of gains and losses, successes or disappointments; in all these his 'counsels' shall stand. They cannot fail of their accomplishment, for they are planned in unerring wisdom; they cannot fail of a blessing to them that love the Lord Jesus, for they are based on eternal love. Neither is he a man that he should change, nor the Son of man that he should repent, but while all other things are uncertain and unstable, the 'counsel of the Lord that shall stand.'

But let not the believer be impatient, or disappointed, if the 'devices' of man appear for a time too wise or too strong for the 'counsel' of the Lord. Hear, O humble believer, hear thou the word of the Lord. 'Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him; fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way; because of the man that bringeth wicked devices to pass. For they shall soon be cut down as the grass, and wither as the green herb. Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. Delight thyself in God, and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart. Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass. And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light'—even the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that do believe—'and thy judgment as the noon day'—even the judgment of grace, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

And whilst 'sentence against an evil work is not speedily executed,' neither let the wicked presume, nor the believer doubt. The 'counsel' of the Lord must be an emanation of his nature, and pattern of his character; and as God is 'long-suffering' his judgment must wait upon mercy. 'But yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace. But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs, they shall consume into smoke; they shall consume away. But the steps of the good man—the man made good by the renewing of the Holy Ghost—the steps of the good man are ordered by the Lord. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down; for the Lord upholdeth him in his hand. The law of his God is in his heart'—written there by the love of the Lord Jesus—'and none of his steps shall slide.'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.' Rom. viii. 28.

AMONG the marks of a true believer, knowledge holds a conspicuous place. A believer in Jesus knows what no other knows. 'No man knoweth the Son but the Father, and none knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.' The believer 'knows that his Redeemer liveth.' The believer 'knows that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, he has a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' And, amidst all the darkness, difficulties, and contradictions of a 'present evil world' he knows 'that all things work together for good.'

1. The wisdom and knowledge of God work together with our ignorance and folly for good. 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! To the wisdom of God we are indebted for the whole plan of redemption. The wisdom of God devised the means for rendering the plan effectual. The wisdom of God has counteracted the malice, the cunning, and the power of all enemies. The wisdom of God has 'destroyed the wisdom of the wise, and brought to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom'—its own favourite but vain philosophy—'knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching,' rather by the preaching of foolishness—'to save them that believe.'

2. The Almighty power of God works together with our weakness, 'the weakness of God is stronger than men.' His power sustains us in weakness, and upholds our goings, so that our footsteps do not slide. His power subdues our wills, brings our every thought into the captivity of Jesus; works in us mightily both to will and to do of his good pleasure, so that we who of ourselves are unable to do any thing, 'can effectually do all things through Christ strengthening us.'

3. The judgments and chastisements of the Lord work together with mercy for good. 'Behold the goodness and severity of God,' how harmoniously they combine to awake us from 'the sleep of death,' then to 'show us the path of life and of joy;' how violently they detach us from sin, and how tenderly they draw us to the Lord! Like the unsparing plough, the one 'breaks up our fallow ground;' like the gentle dew from heaven, the other descends upon the seed of the word. God's judgments, in the forms of personal and family afflictions, were Job's real friends. They led him at once to a clearer sight of God, and a deeper knowledge of himself. They led him from the giddy and destructive precipice of self-justification to 'the depths' of humiliation from which he cried to God, 'I have heard of thee with the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' 'Before I was afflicted,' saith the Psalmist, 'I went astray; but now I have kept thy law. It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes. I know, Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me.' And Paul, who had the deepest experience of the heaviest trials, yet pronounces these all to be 'light afflictions,' commissioned to 'work out for us a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory.' And so they do work, not as effecting an atonement for our sins—for 'the blood of Jesus Christ' alone 'cleanseth us from all sins,'—but by effecting, 'through the Spirit,' the mortification of our sins. By working 'through the Spirit' new graces in our souls—and more especially the grace of patience, by which we are in measure assimilated to the Lord Jesus Christ, and prepared for the enjoyment of his kingdom. But God, in the midst of judgment, remembers mercy, and 'sets the one over against the other' not as antagonists in providence and grace, counteracting one another, but as fellow-labourers in the same field, where the weed that is plucked by the hand of judgment gives room for the growth of the seed that is sown by the hand of mercy,

4. The promises of God work together with our doubts and fears for good. Since the beginning of the world God has made himself known to his people in a promise. 'The seed of the woman' was promised to 'bruise the head' of the serpent. 'The seed of Abraham' was promised to bless all nations. When Jesus ascended up on high, and received gifts for men, the promise of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, was the endowment of his church; and the promise of his own coming, is still the manna upon which she feeds, and the rock at which she drinks. Now behold how effectually the promises work in company with our doubts and fears. 'I remembered,' saith the Psalmist, 'I remembered God and was troubled; I complained and my spirit was overwhelmed. I communed with mine own heart, and my spirit made diligent search. Will the Lord cast off for ever? And will he be favourable no more? Is his mercy clean gone? Doth his promises fail for evermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? And I said, this is mine infirmity; but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High. I will remember the works of the Lord; surely I will remember thy wonders of old.' Thus doubts and fears, conducting to deeper examination, do but clear the foundations of faith, and consolidate the building of God which they only seemed calculated to demolish.

5. The strivings of the Spirit and the temptation of Satan, yea, the power of holiness and the guilt of sin, all work together for good. The temptations of Satan afforded to our Lord his first recorded opportunity of testing, as it were, the efficacy of scripture. The assaults of infidelity have served both to draw and to sharpen the 'sword of the Spirit.' Satan's subtlest temptation but discovers to the believer more and more of the deceitfulness of his heart; and compels him to pray more fervently for the daily 'renewing of the Holy Ghost.' It is the pain of disease that makes us prize the physician. It was when 'the law came,' that 'sin revived' and Paul 'died.' It was then he discovered he was 'a wretched man;' it was then he cried, 'Who shall deliver me?' and it was then he was filled with thankfulness for deliverance 'through Jesus Christ his Lord.'

But do all these things work together for good to all? No. There are those to whom 'the glorious gospel of the blessed God' is 'the savour of death unto death.' Two marks distinguish those for whom 'all things work together for good;' they love God, they are the called according to his purpose.

What, then, are the distinguishing marks of those who love God?

1. They are drawn to God by a grateful sense of sins pardoned, graces conferred, and glory promised and secured. 'We love him because he first loved us.'

2. They render a cheerful submission to his authority. 'If ye love me, keep my commandments.' 'For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous.' A blessed doctrine which, so far from begetting a pharisaic confidence in our own righteousness, is a light of God essential and efficacious to discover our many shortcomings and to lead us to him 'in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace.'

3. They earnestly desire his countenance, companionship, and possession. 'Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee. My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever.' 'My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come, and appear before him?'

4. They ardently delight in him. 'Delight thyself also in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desire of thine heart.' 'I delight to do thy will, O my God! yea, thy law is within my heart.'

5. The believer is sold, devoted, sacrificed to the God whom he loves. He is not 'his own,' he is 'bought with a price.' 'My beloved is mine, and I am his,' saith his heart. Believers 'have given their own selves to the Lord;' and drawn 'by the mercies of God,' present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, their reasonable service.'

Believers are farther characterized by being 'called according to God's purpose,' which calling is thus admirably expounded: 'Effectual calling is the work of God's Spirit, whereby convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, as he is offered to us in the gospel.' Now, when there is a work in us, either to 'will or to do of God's good pleasure,' that 'willing and doing must be either of ourselves or of God. Of ourselves it cannot originally be; for the 'carnal mind,' which is the original mind of every man, is 'enmity against God.' It must therefore be 'of God that showeth mercy.' 'For who, O believer, maketh thee to differ? or what hast thou that thou hast not received?' Or 'who hath first given to God, and it shall be recompensed to him again?' It is God, wise in counselling, merciful in pardoning, just in determining, gracious in bestowing, and sovereign in ruling, to whom the 'called' sinner is indebted for the voice that reaches him, the power that awakens, the argument that convinces, and the love that draws him.

1. Let us then admire that providence which embraces the universe in its widest range, yet attends to the creatures in their minutest details.

2. Let us adore that 'God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' whose providence and grace run so happily and so unitedly in the same channel.

3. And whatever our worldly or spiritual lot may be, let us never forget that all things come to God's children from the same loving heart, and all things are directed by the same unerring and Almighty hand.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The Lord God omnipotent reigneth,' Rev. xix. 6.

To acknowledge the being of God is one thing, to see his government is another. 'Rabbi,' said Nicodemus, 'we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.' We can thus understand and account for the various views of men as to the government of God, who yet all agree in admitting, and maintaining, and illustrating his being and perfections. One fancies and endows a mysterious power called nature, as the ruler in elements and events. Another, that God, at creation, impressed certain general laws upon his works, and that these proceed to carry forward the world without any necessity of farther interference upon the part of God. Others, can discover no government in the world but that of chance, blind, irregular, unintelligent, powerless; while others boldly and blasphemously deny his right to rule over them, saying in the pride and rebellion of their hearts, 'our lips are our own, who is Lord over us?'

There is still another class from whose eyes, the government of God almost disappears. The believer under withdrawings of God's countenance, and harassed by sore trials, is sometimes tempted to say, 'These are the wicked that prosper in the world; verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocence,' and 'what profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin?'

Now to all these it is equally announced 'The Lord God omnipotent reigneth.' What a glorious revelation! What a magnificence of title! what an enlightening—what a consoling truth! God, the covenant God, our God, reigneth. The omnipotent reigneth! And because omnipotent, he reigneth over every thing that possesses any portion of derivative power. 'Of him, and to him, and through him, are all things.' Over things inanimate he reigns. The stars, the clouds, the winds, the waves, the fire—the winter's cold, the summer's heat, are all the subjects of his kingdom. 'Sing, therefore, unto the Lord with thanksgiving, who covereth the heavens with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth. He giveth snow like wool, he scattereth hoar frost like ashes, he casteth forth ice like morsels, who can stand before his cold? He sendeth out his word and melteth them; he causeth his wind to blow, and the water to flow.' Over the plants of the earth he reigns. He 'clothes the grass of the field.' 'He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth.' Over the beasts of the field he reigns. 'He giveth the beast his food, and the young ravens which cry.' 'Lord, thou preservest man and beast; how excellent is thy loving-kindness! Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.' And over man he specially reigns. Man's birth is within his government, 'his substance was not hid from him; his eyes did see his substance yet being imperfect; and in his book all his members were written.' Of his life the whole progress is under the guidance of the Lord. 'He knoweth our downsitting and our uprising, and is thoroughly acquainted with all our ways. His hand has often 'led us in a way we did not know;' constantly cherished us with a kindness we did not deserve, sometimes corrected us, but with a father's pity, and always protected us with the power of a mighty King. 'O that men would give to the Lord praise for his goodness, and for his works of wonder to the children of men!'

The Lord God omnipotent reigns likewise in the kingdoms of this world. They have risen, they have advanced, they have declined, and they have fallen, but the Lord God directed and controlled their mightiest movements. 'To the intent that the living might know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.' And in a manner not more powerful, yet more special, does the Lord God omnipotent reign in his church. This speciality lies in the eternal love wherewith he loved it, in the gracious sovereignty wherewith he chose it, in the power wherewith he redeemed it, in the mercy wherewith he pardoned it, in the riches of grace wherewith he endowed it, in the righteousness wherewith he clothed it, and the glory to which he exalted it. God reigned with a special distinctness in the Jewish church—but this distinctness arose not because he was really more visible in the Jewish than in the Christian church, but because the eyes of men were more open to see him. The word of God to Joshua, 'I will never fail thee, I will not forsake thee,' is not one whit richer in promise than the word of Christ to his disciples, 'Lo! I am with you always, even to the end of the world.' He that was once with the church in the wilderness, is the same that is now with the church in glory; and on earth he is still 'head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all.'

But let us never forget, when we contemplate the government of God, that he necessarily reigns, not by the single attribute of power, but in the full combination and energy of all his attributes. In the government of God we must therefore expect apparent contradictions. Weak man cannot contemplate the full tide of mercy, and love and long-suffering, flowing onward, and full fraught with blessings, without apprehending a counter current in justice, severity, and wrath. But these are not contrary the one to the other; each is an exhibition of the same all-perfect Jehovah dealing; 'To them who by a patient continuing in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, eternal life; but unto them who are contentious, and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, tribulation, and anguish, indignation, and wrath.' When therefore he is slow to answer prayer, let us not foolishly conclude he has forgotten to be gracious; but is calling us to that waiting spirit and dependent attitude that best becomes a weak creature and an unprofitable servant. And when we see the prosperity of the wicked, and witness the afflictions of the children of God, let us not rashly conclude that God has forgotten either; that sinners may yet be led to repentance; if he persevere in sin, his judgment will awake and not tarry; and that afflicted saint is ripening his fruit for a richer harvest, and polishing his graces for brighter glory.

'O Lord, thou art my God and King,
Thee will I magnify and praise;
I will thee bless, and gladly sing
Unto thy holy name always.
Each day I rise, I will thee bless,
And praise thy name time without end.
Much to be praised, and great God is:
His greatness none can comprehend.'

1. The Lord God omnipotent reigneth! What a solid foundation for confidence and hope, in times when the darkest clouds hang over the kingdoms of this world of which we are subjects, or over the church of the living God of which we are members! The atmosphere of kingdoms and churches is never long untroubled; but no kingdom will fall but by sin, and 'righteousness exalteth a nation;' and no church will be cast away, if she have not first cast off her first love; and no matter how mighty be the powers by which truth and godliness are threatened, 'no weapon formed against Zion will ever prosper.'

2. The Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Let us draw nigh to the well of consolation and let our thirsty soul drink freely in the days of our personal or family troubles! 'Man that is born of a woman, is of few days, and full of trouble.' From these troubles God's children have no exemption. And where Jesus himself was 'a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief,' it were shame if the servant were better than his Lord. He for the joy set before him endured the cross; the believer endures as 'seeing him that is unseen.' It is written, 'The Lord reigneth, let the people tremble.' And again, 'The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.' For though 'clouds and darkness are round about him, yet righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.' That throne of grace is now the believer's refuge, as that throne of glory will hereafter be his home. For 'unto him that overcometh,' saith the Lord, 'will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I have overcome, and am set down with my Father in his throne.'

---

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Behold, I am the Lord, the God of all flesh: is there any thing too hard for me?' Jer. xxxiii. 27.

EVERY man, even in his best estate, is contending with some difficulty that he finds 'too hard for him.' Many things are 'too hard' for his understanding, and when he has wearied the flesh with 'much study' of the spirit, he feels he is 'of yesterday and knows nothing.' And how many things he finds 'too hard' for his hand, even when he attempts them 'with all his might,' his sorrows, his disappointments, and his losses, are continually testifying.

Now, it is good for men to have made this discovery of the practical difficulties, the impossibilities, that hedge them in; but it is most dangerous to suspect God of being subject to similar limitations. Yet this very suspicion, seemingly heightened to conviction, is one of the chief sources of the sin and the misery of men. The impenitent sinner either suspects or believes the infliction of his threatened judgments, 'too hard' for God when he defies him; the professing Christian suspects the fulfilment of his promise to be 'too hard' for God when he doubts him. It was to rebuke this defiance, and to dispel this doubt, that 'the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, saying, Behold I am the Lord, the God of all flesh: is there any thing too hard for me?' Let us endeavour to dig down to this root of atheism in the impenitent, and this tormenting remnant of unbelief in the children of God. Now it is a fact that the sin of the impenitent and the error of the believer generally arise from investing God with some attribute esteemed as the highest perfection. The impenitent invests a God of his own creation with such mercy as blinds the eyes and ties up the hand of justice; and therefore he concludes judgment to be 'too hard' for him; while the weak believer invests the true God with a holiness that so abhors sin that he doubts or almost despairs of the exercise of covenant mercy.

Now while the prophet is commissioned to rebuke the impenitent, his main object is to dispel the doubts and confirm the faith of God's people. To this end he employs principally the following conclusive arguments—and may the Lord, for whom nothing is 'too hard,' make them effectual to the conviction of our judgments and the comforting of our hearts.

1. The Lord, speaking by the prophet, asserts his own independent sovereignty—'I am the Lord,' the owner of all worlds, and as the owner doing whatever he will with his own. 'I am the God of all flesh,' therefore entitled to the unlimited worship of all men; and acknowledged, in that act of worship, as able to give or to withhold, according to the counsel of his own will.

2. The prophet asserts God's power in the details of the world, upon the ground that he is the Creator of the whole. 'Ah, Lord God! behold thou hast made the heavens and the earth by thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee.'

3. Unlimited mercies being to God's children the most attractive, and judgment to sinners the most alarming, evidences of unlimited power, the prophet proceeds as by an arithmetical calculation of his goodness and judgment to give evidence of these attributes. 'Thou showest loving-kindness to thousands; and recompencest the iniquity of the fathers unto the bosom of their children after them. For thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.'

4. Miracles of judgment, either beyond, or above, or contrary to the course of creation, are next marshalled in evidence that nothing can be 'too hard' for God; and especially his 'signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, and in Israel, and amongst other men,' miracles wrought 'with a strong hand, and an out-stretched arm, and with great terror,' till he gave Israel 'the land which he swore unto their fathers.'

And now, if we desire an evidence that nothing is 'too hard' for God, and surpassing all that have yet been adduced, we find that evidence concentrated in Christ Jesus. There can be nothing 'too hard' for his love, seeing the Father 'spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up to the death for us all;' and we conclude, therefore, with a certainty that cannot be shaken, he will 'with him also freely give us all things.' There can be nothing too hard for his condescension, for 'though our Lord was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich.' And surely there can be nothing too hard for his power in the weakness of our flesh, since he conquered sin in the flesh, because of triumphant holiness; and through death destroyed death, and 'him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, that he might redeem them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage.'

What sweet consolation may the believer derive from contemplating the Almighty power of God!

He finds within himself much darkness, much weakness, much guilt; he finds around him many temptations, a world sometimes attractive, sometimes tormenting, always evil. He has tried watchfulness, and it has slept on its post; he has fled to prayer, but, like those of Moses, his hands have hung down; he has tried fasting, but the flesh still is weak; he has tried resolutions, but, for binding nature, they have no more availed than the withs and the flax bands on the arms of Samson. Within are fightings, without are fears, behind is sin, and before is judgment. In one question spiritually put, and spiritually answered, lies his only refuge,—'is there any thing too hard for God?' No. He can penetrate that heart were it hard as the nether millstone. He can wash away those stains though red like crimson. He can strengthen that spirit though unstable as water. He can restore that soul from the depths of disease, and crown that slave of sin and satan with the loving-kindness and tender mercies of the Lord.

What efficient direction may the believer hence derive for the moral government of his own spirits. When he enjoys many blessings in health, in family, in friends, in worldly business, his God 'has done all things well.' Yes, God's power has done all, and gratitude must follow when the doer and the giver is seen. But the believer may be in adversity. Sickness may be wasting him, pain tormenting him, a thousand griefs, worse than all these, may arise from family or friends, while riches may be denied him, or make to themselves wings, and flee away, as an eagle toward heaven; still there is nothing 'too hard' for the Lord; he can sustain him with the patience of Job, and can teach him to drink, with resignation, the cup of bitterness with his Lord.

What confidence can this doctrine infuse in all the threatening or most hopeless aspects of public affairs! Indeed to the believer no darkness can be hopeless. He trusts neither in princes nor in men's sons; his hope is in the Lord. He sees a world of dark and idolatrous heathenism, or fierce and indomitable Mahometanism; he sees scarce a point of light to penetrate the clouds that cover it; and he would despair of ever seeing those innumerable millions converted, enlightened, or civilized, did he not rest upon one principle,—there is nothing 'too hard' for God. He sees the church, the professing, baptized church, grievously infested with false doctrine, poisoned by heresy, rent by schism, deceived by self-righteousness, or deformed with hypocrisies. He sees her beset with infidelity upon the one hand, and by apostate Christianity upon the other; and he exclaims, in the very bitterness of his heart, 'Can these dry bones live?' And the oracle of the living God replies, 'Is there any thing too hard for God?' He was with his church in Egypt, and brought it out with a mighty hand. He was with his church in the wilderness, and he led it as a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron. He was with his church in ten heathen persecutions, and he plucked her as a brand out of the burning. He was with the remnant of his saints who, retired within the mountain recesses of the Alps and Appenines, preserved the light of the gospel in ages of grossest darkness. He was with his church in the dawn and struggles of the blessed Reformation. He forsook her not in her 'faithful contendings' for the truth 'once delivered to the saints;' and he has promised to be with her alway, even to the end of the world, and will assuredly perfect 'his strength' in his people's 'weakness.'

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Give us this day our daily bread,' Matt. vi. 11.

'TRUST in the Lord,' saith the psalmist, 'and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.' Accordingly we come before our Father saying, 'Give us this day our daily bread;' and in these words we humbly acknowledge,

1. That, notwithstanding all our personal abilities, means, and efforts, we are utterly unable to supply, even for a single day, the wants we now feel, and of which we anticipate the daily return.

2. We acknowledge that for the supply we so much need, we have nothing to offer to God.

3. We testify our confidence in the prayer-hearing, and the prayer-answering God, and in that wakeful and all-sufficient providence which watches over us, and for us, and 'supplies the wants of every thing that lives.'

4. By uniting with this daily petition a prayer for daily pardon, we acknowledge that we daily forfeit, by our sins, those blessings that we daily require.

5. By these words, our Saviour teaches that temporal things constitute the lawful subjects of prayer.

Let us then examine what are those temporal things for which we are authorised to pray.

1. We are taught to ask for bread, so far as necessary for our sustenance and health. By necessary food, and the vigour it imparts, we may glorify God in the duties of our several callings, and whatever we can employ to the glory of God, that we are privileged to ask and expect. But in asking of God to give us bread, we imply and include all those ordinary means whereby bread is supplied. We consequently implore the blessings of the covenant with Noah, in which 'summer, and winter, and heat, and cold, and seed-time, and harvest,' are ensured, 'while the earth remaineth.' We ask his blessing upon the skill of the husbandman, and 'the labour of the ox' in the field. We pray for the continuance of that protection and safety in our own land whereby industry is encouraged and rewarded. We pray for that peace amongst the nations during which the interchanges of commerce commingle the various productions of art and of agriculture, till the north and the south become as one climate, and the people of all lands as one common family.

By confining our temporal petitions to bread, our Lord intended to preserve us from covetous longings after deceitful riches, and ambitious aspirings after fading honours. It was thus he tested the amiable, moral, and rich young man who came anxiously inquiring, 'What good thing shall I do to have eternal life?' and who answered to the catalogue of commanded duties, 'all these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?' 'Then Jesus answered and said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow me.' There was the touchstone for detecting the alloy of the character; for 'when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions.' Nor did there lie any sin in his having or his holding these 'great possessions' in his hand; the sin and the sorrow lay in having them in his heart. For 'if any man love the world, or the things of it, how dwelleth the love of God in him?' Yet, be not deceived; not all that is in the world, but all that is of the world, is cursed. And all that is in the world, being of the world, is the 'lust of the flesh,'—licentiousness—'and the lust of the eye,'—covetousness—'and the pride of life,'—the ambitious aiming at 'high things for ourselves;' and all these must we, for Christ's sake, not merely 'sell,' but, through the Spirit, utterly 'mortify' and cast out, ere we can truly and fully adopt and utter that single petition, 'Give us this day our daily bread.'

2. This bread, with all its included blessings, is called ours. It is so called in virtue of the original gift to Adam, and its subsequent continuance and extension to Noah. We inherit our derivative portion of both these grants. But like feudal lieges renewing their homage, and thereby confirming their titles, we are ever renewing our petitions, and pleading our investiture with the gracious promise, 'bread shall be given, and water shall be sure.' But at the same time we are confining ourselves to the limits of our own property. 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's,'—is not merely a commandment for morals, but a guide to piety. There are two forms of covetousness. The one, an unsatisfied view of what we have, with an undefined and unlimited desire of more; the other, not merely dissatisfaction with the amount of our own lot, but the envying of another, with a specific longing for what is his. Now both these forms of covetousness this petition utterly condemns. Before God it confines our hearts not merely to bread, but to our own bread. Let me neither 'envy nor grudge' at the good and prosperity of my neighbour—yea, rather let my soul rejoice with him because of the kindness of the Lord.

3. 'Our bread' we ask only for 'this day.' 'We know not what to-day may bring forth,' therefore we 'give no thought for to-morrow?' By the constitution he has given, God makes us sensible of present wants, and teaches us by his word and Spirit to ask of him present supplies. But of future wants God has not made us sensible. Nay, he has shown us by many examples around us, and by many warnings of his word, that the future wants anticipated, may never come or never be felt. They may never come, because Providence may increase its kindness—they may never be felt, for we may soon be beyond their reach in the grave.

Now while we daily need and daily pray for the 'meat that perisheth,' how much more earnest should we be to obtain 'that meat which endureth unto everlasting life—the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and never die!' The soul has spiritual appetites corresponding to those of the body. 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.' 'And, I say unto you, ask, and it shall be given you.' For 'what man is there of you, who, if his son ask bread, will give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will give him a serpent? If ye then being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things—even the Holy Spirit with all his comfort and all his fruit—to them that ask him!'

And let us remember that, though our bodily appetite can be satisfied until it desires no more, that appetite will soon return and require to be again supplied. The body lives by daily bread. Even so, while God 'satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness,' it is by daily supplies of righteousness that we are satisfied, and by daily aid of the Spirit that we are supported.

But how may we discern true spiritual appetite? What is its daily bread? The spiritual appetite is characterised by a deep feeling of the unsatisfying nature of all worldly things. 'My flesh,' saith the Psalmist, 'longeth in a dry and thirsty land where no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.' But chiefly is it characterized by seeking, not merely ordinances, but God himself in the ordinances. 'O God, thou art my God, early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee; my flesh longeth for thee.' 'As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee,

O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God.' God, the living God, in a living Christ, is the only bread and water of life to satisfy a living soul. Lord, give us ever this bread; so shall our soul live, and sing praises to thy name.

---

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God,' Matt. iv. 4.

WHEN satan tempted our first parents in paradise, to eat of the forbidden fruit, so soon as 'the woman saw that the tree was good for food, she took of the food thereof, and did eat, and gave also to her husband with her, and he did eat.' Thus 'by one man's disobedience sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' From that hour satan reigned 'as the god of this world,' and by 'the power of death' which he attained, and 'the fear of death' which he infused, he held his victims and his slaves 'all their lifetime subject to bondage.' But to dethrone this usurper, and to deliver his wretched slaves, 'the seed of the woman' was promised. But while promised with a power 'to bruise the serpent's head,' it was foretold that the serpent should 'bruise his heel.' And now 'the fullness of the time' being come, 'God sends forth his Son,' and announces him from heaven beloved of the Father, and as therefore worthy of all audience and acceptance of men. But the malignity of the enemy is unabated, and remembering, it may be, how, through the appetite for food, he had succeeded in paradise, he now, in the wilderness, makes, through the appetite, his first attempt against 'the Son of God.' The state of our Lord, and the place of his temporary residence, conspired to favour the temptation. He had now fasted forty days and forty nights, and 'was an hungered;' and the wilderness to which the Spirit led him had afforded no food. Therefore 'when the tempter came to him he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.'

Upon two accounts, these words claim our special attention. 1. Because of the important truth they contain. 2. Because of the efficient answer they furnish to satan's most subtle and malignant temptations.

1. They contain an important truth which God has continuously illustrated in his providence. Noah and his family, when all beside perished, lived in the ark, not by bread alone, but by that word of warning which God gave, and they in faith received. Moses and Israel, during forty years in the wilderness, lived not even by the manna from heaven alone, but by the word of God that promised, and in faithfulness and mercy prolonged, the miracle. Nor is this power of the word of God confined to times of old, or to acts of miracle; but till this hour, and before our own eyes, men live not by bread alone, but by the mercy of God, which by an invisible providence, but a visible instrumentality, converts into scenes of light the 'dark places of the earth,' and into homes of love 'the habitations of horrid cruelty.'

2. These words are still farther important, because they furnished our Lord with a triumphant answer to satan's first temptation. The word of God, while it anxiously warns believers against 'the wiles of the devil,' reminds them that are tempted how 'they are not ignorant of his devices,' and encourages them by the joint word of command and promise, 'resist the devil, and he will flee from you.' The first and chief 'device' of the enemy is evidently to suit his temptations to our state of mind and body, and to the circumstances or the places in which we are found. Now the mind of our Lord must have been intensely occupied by the testimony from heaven; satan, therefore, by insinuating a doubt, seeks to generate ambitious pride in its demonstration. Our Lord was an hungered; satan therefore tempts him into a distrust of providence. There is no help at hand; satan therefore urges him to self-dependence. To all these 'cunning devices' our Lord opposes one simple reply—'it is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' Now the mouth of God had just said, 'This is my beloved Son,' and on that bosom of love the Son rests with confidence, that whatever is needful for him his Father 'will provide.' But this was not written merely to record or magnify the wisdom or the victory of our Lord; it was written for our learning, direction, consolation, and encouragement; and chiefly to show that he who was in 'all points tempted as we are,' is 'able to succour them that are tempted.'

These two views of the words of our Lord suggest the following practical reflections.

1. Life, and the means of life and health, are the most valuable of all earthly blessings. Life never loses its value, even under pain, so long as there is hope of relief. 'All that a man hath will he give for his life.' What endless toil of body and of mind do men willingly and cheerfully undergo, to provide the means of life! To what advice will they not have recourse? To what regimen will they not submit, what medicine will they not employ, in order to prolong their days! Nor are men to be condemned for all this care of the body. They are only to be condemned, when, for the sake of the perishing body, they neglect the immortal soul. O! that men were but as careful, while they provide the meat that perisheth, to provide that meat which endureth to everlasting life! While every improvement of tillage is applied to the earth; while every manure is sought that may render it more fruitful; while every seed is imported that may increase the harvest; O! that men were as diligent to break up the fallow ground in their own souls; to dig around and manure the barren and endangered fig trees there; to sow the seed of the word in the furrows of broken and contrite hearts; and to prepare a harvest of faith, and love, and zeal, and holiness, for the coming of the Lord of the harvest!

2. Now there is no harvest of the earth but by the seed—there is no life of the soul but by the word. But many seeds of the earth are unproductive; the produce of many is worthless, of others deleterious or destructive. How different the seed of the word! Man shall 'live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' How careful should we therefore be to 'search the scriptures!' Every study is for immortality! Every word is a principle of eternal life!

3. Yet whatever be the soil, whatever the culture, and whatever the seed—there is no harvest but by the rain, the dew, the wind, and the sun. So is it with the soul. Paul may plant, and Apollos water—God giveth the increase. What humble, watchful, prayerful dependence, should we therefore exercise on the power and the teaching of the Spirit of God. He alone can 'teach us all things.' He alone 'bring all things to our remembrance.' He alone 'take the things of Christ, and show them to us;' and he alone produce that blessed 'fruit of the Spirit,' which assumes the beautiful forms of 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against which there is no law.'

4. And should we not remember that as the body in health demands daily bread, and as health and strength depend upon the necessary supply, so the soul, in health, demands the bread of life, and is preserved in spiritual vigour according to the regularity and abundance with which its hunger is satisfied.

NINETEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Go to now, ye that say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain. Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow,' James iv. 13, 14.

JAMES wrote his epistle 'to the twelve tribes scattered abroad,' and who being thus deprived of the possession of their lands, were necessarily driven to commerce for subsistence. He wrote also with an eye to their migratory dispositions and habits, which seldom permitted them to settle down permanently in one place, but carried them with their wares from city to city in search of purchasers and profit. But while he addresses himself immediately to the Jews, his admonitions are applicable to all men in similar employments. Nay, to all men in every employment, for scarcely is there any man endowed with ordinary understanding and feelings who is not more or less engaged in contemplating the 'gain' which is sooner or later to be derived from his labours. Still the apostle must be understood as addressing himself particularly to those who are busied in commercial pursuits; wherefore, that we may point out his meaning, we should reflect for a little on some commercial peculiarities that render the admonition so necessary.

1. Commerce necessarily forces its votaries to be, in a great degree, 'citizens of the world.' Their minds must expatiate more or less widely through all its geography, and the peculiar commercial advantages of countries and cities must be the frequent subject of their meditations. Hence in choosing their place, and their society, they are under constant temptation to overlook religious dangers, or disadvantages, and tie down their thoughts to the simple question of the prospect of profit, or the danger of loss.

2. The fluctuations of commerce are always so frequent, generally so unexpected, often so unaccountable, that there is great danger that the providence of God, though admitted as a doctrine, may yet be neglected as a principle of action, and object of constant regard.

3. Whereas from the sudden fluctuations of commerce there are occasions of great individual or national loss, yet these same fluctuations as frequently are the cause of sudden and extensive gain; hence a continuous tendency to 'hastening to be rich,' to impatience and murmuring if the boon be denied, and a forgetfulness of the giver, if the desire be gratified.

Now it is to be observed that the apostle, so far from discouraging or condemning the commercial spirit, implies its encouragement by offering his best instructions for its regulation, 'Go to now, ye that say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go into such a city, and buy, and sell, and get gain.' This worldly and presumptuous spirit he utterly condemns, and the remedy presented is simply this: never say what ye will,—'For that ye ought to say; If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that. Therefore that every one engaged in worldly business, and calculating upon its gains, may perceive, and, by the grace of God, be led to feel the force of the apostle's argument, let him attend to the statement of facts by which it is enforced.

It is important therefore to observe that the resolutions and calculations he condemns, are suspended by a chain of such mere presumptions as is utterly incapable of sustaining their weight. There are four principal links described by the apostle.

1. The resolution and calculation condemned presume, not merely upon to-day, but on to-morrow, whereas 'we know not what a day may bring forth.' 2. They presume not merely upon to-morrow, but a whole year's residence in one place, whereas, at the best, 'here we have no continuing city.' 3. They presume that we are above the fluctuations and uncertainties of the world, and that by our skill, diligence, or what the world calls 'good fortune,' we are sure to 'get gain.' 4. All doubt of success removed, presumption strengthens into certainty—and we not only anticipate times that are not our own, count gains we have not realized, but like thoughtless minors we hasten to spend our future income, and 'rejoice in our boasting,' though 'all such boasting is evil.'

Now that on these presumptions thousands rest, and that in these boastings thousands indulge, are matters that are best proved by an appeal to every man's own heart. Yet surely the folly of them cannot be denied! Does not all experience prove the madness of any calculation founded on the presumed certainty of human life? Does it not equally testify to the fleeting tenure of all earthly riches? and the unsatisfying nature of all earthly joy? Does not the Saviour warn us against any trust in riches? Does he not entreat us to transfer our commerce and our treasure to a higher and safer world? And does he not admonish us that we are not profited should we

'gain the whole world,' if we, by any negligence, 'lose our own souls?'

1. If then to-morrow be so uncertain, how precious is to-day! We know not when we draw one breath, if ever we shall draw another. We know not, when we awake, whether ever we shall sleep, but in the grave; and we know not, when we sleep, whether ever we shall awake again till our doom is sealed for eternity. Let us see then that we 'walk circumspectly; not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil.'

2. Time, eternity—death, judgment—heaven and hell—are awful realities. Yet by men whom the world calls wise, they are often dealt with as the toys of thoughtless children. Time is wasted, eternity forgot; death is unthought of, judgment disregarded; heaven not longed for; hell not shunned. Yes, hell not shunned! For where Satan's lies are received, and God's truth rejected; where his devices are followed, and God's love despised; where his service is rendered, and God's law rejected; there Satan's companionship being chosen, participation in his doom cannot be avoided.

3. Let no man vainly try to join whom Christ has dissevered. 'We cannot serve God and Mammon!' Nor is it necessary, even for worldly purposes, to make the vain attempt. True godliness never yet stood in the way of success; and in case of disappointment, which may come to any, godliness can ensure what riches alone can never obtain—that rest to the soul which Jesus promises, and that abiding contentment which is great gain.'

NINETEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that,' James iv. 15.

'Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh.' Therefore, if without any implied or expressed reference to the will of God, we habitually say, We will go to such a place, and do this or that, it is evident 'the abundance of the heart' is 'self'—self in counsel, self in determination, self in agency, and self in honour. This mode of speech the apostle utterly condemns, not because he would give a lesson on the mere proprieties of expression, but because, by correcting the expression, he would correct the heart.

The words of the apostle present to us three things: 1. The will of God. 2. Our dependence upon it for continuance of life, and every power of acting. 3. The heartfelt, habitual, and invariable use of such forms of speech as should both remind ourselves of these things, and bear witness of them to others.

1. The will—in man the power of weighing, choosing, and determining upon his actions; but still in the whole process liable, because of sin, to be influenced by ignorance, error, prejudice, or evil inclination. The will—in God, his most wise perception in himself of what is good, and his most holy disposition and purpose to carry it into effect for his own glory as the end, and the well-being of his creatures as the means. And thus accordingly sings the church on earth, as the Spirit giveth her utterance, 'Our God is in heaven; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased;' and thus sings the church in heaven, 'Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and they were created.'

2. If for the pleasure of the Lord all things were created, it is evident that only at the pleasure of the Lord can any thing continue. Yet is it one thing to admit the truth of this statement, and another and very different thing to feel and to act under its power. Indeed there is such a tendency in the human heart to forget God himself—his presence, his watchfulness, his power, his holiness, and his judgment—that it can never surprise us, if those who can thus forget their God, should also, and at the same time, forget themselves. To this forgetfulness three causes mainly contribute. First, We possess, in a high degree, the useful, but much abused power, of banishing from the mind disagreeable objects and thoughts, and of calling up others more congenial and agreeable. Now of all subjects, God, and holiness, and sin, and death, and judgment, must to the unrenewed heart be far the most disagreeable; they are accordingly dismissed, and in their room a host of unhallowed thoughts are conjured up, that leave, in their revelling, neither time nor inclination to think seriously, either of ourselves or of God. Secondly, We become so immersed in business and care, that when compelled, by some pressing necessity, to think seriously, for a little, of God and our souls, we are speedily re-absorbed by the whirlpool of worldly engagements, which all assuming the forms of important and imperative duties, not only carry us away altogether to temporal shadows, but furnish us with an excuse for neglecting eternal realities. Thirdly, Life and success are seen to depend upon so many worldly supports, that the invisible Supporter of all is overlooked in the light of his own gifts. Thus life is seen to depend so much on original strength of constitution, so much on food, raiment, climate, medicine, and care; while success is seen to depend so much upon industry, frugality, acuteness, and honesty; that to these we learn to look as idolatrously and stupidly as Israel to the golden calf when they sung before the works of their own hands, and said, 'These be thy gods, O Israel, that have brought thee out of the land of Egypt.'

Now that we are entirely dependent for the power of either attempting or doing any thing, is evident from the fact, that upon God's will alone we depend for 'life, and breath, and all things.' 'He made us, and not we ourselves; we are his flock, and the sheep of his pasture.'

3. Such being our condition, of humble dependence, how just that our lips should speak the language of our condition! Instead of proudly saying, 'we will go, and we will do,' how necessary to premise, 'if the Lord will.' The propriety and necessity of this mode of speech is evident upon two accounts. First, For our own sake, that we may be kept 'mindful of our latter end,' and so busy 'counting our days, that we may apply our hearts to wisdom.' Philip, king of Macedon, is said to have had a servant whose duty it was to awake him to business, each morning, with these words, 'Remember, Philip, that you are a man!' And such a memento is constantly furnished to our ears and our hearts, when we habitually refer both life and success entirely to the will of our heavenly Father. Secondly, A continued and habitual reference to the 'will' of the Lord, is equally necessary for the sake of others. We see a world around us hurrying on, not only to death, but to ruin; and as coffin after coffin goes by, we merely hear men inquire, Who is dead? And then so instantly and so earnestly resuming their employment, or their pleasures, that it is evident they do not think how soon they may, or must, follow.

Now, as 'none of us liveth to himself.' we are bound to watch over and warn one another; to have 'our speech always with grace, seasoned with salt,' that is, with such preservative truth, as may resist, to the utmost of our opportunity and power, the corrupting conversation of a 'world that lieth in wickedness.' We are bound, as we shall answer for 'every idle word,' to 'let no corrupt communication proceed out of our mouth, but that which is good, to the edification of the hearers,' and there is not a truth in the bible, which the world more needs to hear, or by which, under grace, it is more likely to profit, than by the constant reference of godly men to the gracious and sovereign will of God, by which he 'gives or takes away' as seemeth to him good, and which will infallibly be done 'on earth as it is in heaven.'

---

TWENTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning,' Jam. i. 17.

'Who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?' are questions which nature and grace unite in addressing to every man. The body is God's gift, the life is his gift, the spirit is his gift—every thing that distinguishes the body, its health, and its vigour—every thing that distinguishes the life, its sustenance and endurance—every thing that distinguishes the spirit, the understanding, and the affections—all are the gifts of God. So nature testifies, not of man's right and possessions, but of God's liberal endowments. To the same effect is the testimony of grace, 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son,' thereby teaching the redeemed to sing 'thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.' The Holy Spirit is his gift. 'I will pray the Father,' says our Lord, 'and he will give you another Comforter.' The everlasting righteousness which Christ brought in, and which, amongst 'the things of Christ,' the Spirit shows to us, is a gift. 'For if by one man's disobedience death reigned by one; much more they who receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.' And even that promised life itself, is not our natural inheritance, but 'the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.' Nay, the whole work of salvation, and the faith whereby it is apprehended, are God's gifts; for so it is written, 'by grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.'

Now of the gifts that come by nature, this is remarkable, that though they are many, though they are great, though they are highly prized, yet not one of them is really good, not one of them is perfect. They are not good; for though all combined, they can neither certainly relieve pain, nor communicate happiness; and they are so far from perfect, that most bodily gifts, after a few years of use, become daily worse, until they are utterly extinguished; and the endowments of the spirit, weak at the best, either gradually decay with the bodily powers, or speedily sink into second and hopeless childhood.

Still this is not the fault of original nature; coming from God's hand, all was very good; and very good only because every gift was perfect. But now since sin has entered into the world, there is evil and imperfection in all nature's choicest gifts, and to remedy this evil, and supply the imperfection, is the great end and glory of 'the gospel of the grace of God.'

Now the gifts of grace are all good, because every one supplies our wants, or relieves our pains. 'Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.' 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, who healeth all thy diseases.' The gifts of grace are good, because every one of them communicates joy. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom we have access, through faith, into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God.' The gifts of grace are likewise all perfect. The whole gifts of grace are indeed summed up, and included, as jewels in a casket, in the person of our Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ. He is our 'all, and our in all,' and having him, we have the Father; and having the Father, and the Son, we can want nothing. For thus prays our Lord for 'all that should believe in him through the disciples' word: 'That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they may be one in us; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.'

But besides this gift whereby the church of believers is made 'perfect in one,' and found 'complete in him' all the personal gifts whereby believers are endowed, are in detail, perfect gifts. The gift of the Spirit is perfect, for he 'abides' with the church 'for ever.' The gift of regeneration is perfect, for the believer is 'born not of corruptible, but of incorruptible seed, by the word of God that liveth and abideth for ever. The gift of righteousness is perfect, for it is 'the righteousness of God.' Nay even those 'gifts' in which there is growth and increase, are perfect,—faith, hope, charity, and every form of grace and fruit of the Spirit, all are perfect. They are perfect as 'gifts,' being secured by the oath of God. They are perfect in kind, being brought from above, from the Father of lights; and they are perfect in working—for 'he that hath begun a good work,' in his people's heart, 'will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ.' For 'the path of the just,'—the man justified by faith,—the path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more until the perfect day.'

But this perfection of the 'gifts' depends altogether on the perfection of the Giver. They all come from 'the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.' But this can be said of no other light. The fairest orbs of heaven vary. Some by change of position, as they run in their courses; some by increase or decrease of splendour; the very sun himself is overshadowed, and the moon is darkened by the eclipse; and an hour is coming when the heavens 'shall wax old as a garment, and as a vesture the Lord shall change them, and they shall be changed; but he is the same, and his years shall have no end.' Jesus the Son of God is that true light by which the nature and glory of God are made manifest. A portion of his light he communicates to prophets and apostles, and in degrees, varying according to his will, to every believer. Thus our Lord says of John, 'He was a burning and a shining light; and ye were willing, for a season, to rejoice in his light.' And thus says the apostle of believers, 'ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord.' 'Do all things without murmuring or disputing, that ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world.'

Let us remember then whence all our light is derived. It is only in God's light we can see light. Let us never trust to the light of our own understandings; but in all our inquiries and resolutions, ever pray to the Father of light, 'Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.'

Let us always live under the salutary remembrance of the unsteadiness as well as insufficiency of our own light. How variable is the light we enjoy in our own heart,—how beclouded the light we exhibit to others. He who at first caused the light to shine into our dark hearts, can alone preserve it in steadiness and brightness. O that we had grace so to shine before men, that, seeing our good works, they might glorify our Father who is in heaven!

Let us always live endeavouring to recount the gifts of God to ourselves and others. The task is endless, but sanctifying and delightful. 'Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works, and thy thoughts of mercy to usward; they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee; if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.'

Let us, for all his gifts, endeavour to give God the glory. Bodily, mental, and spiritual gifts—let all be employed to set forth his praise. With the imperfect gifts of nature, let us glorify him; for he perfects his strength in our weakness; and with the perfect gifts of grace, let us praise him, for we can do all things through Christ strengthening us.

And if at any time we feel the want of either temporal or spiritual gifts—let this be the light of our darkness, and the foundation of our hope and trust—'If God spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not, with him, also freely give us all things?'

—
TWENTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?' Matt. vi. 26.

FROM every object in nature around him, from every employment in which men were engaged, and from every circumstance in which he was placed, our Lord was accustomed to draw his instruction. As man he gives evidence of the most attentive observation, and trains his disciples to similar habits. 'Behold,' says he, 'the lilies how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these; wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith?' And turning from the flowers with which he has beautified the earth, 'Behold,' he adds, 'the fowls' with which he has peopled the air! How innumerable where they congregate in the forest, or scatter on the heath; where they surround the cultivated field, or penetrate the crowded city; where they give life to the solitary sea rock, or find their home upon the deep waters; as they migrate from climate to climate, and become citizens of every land! By what toil of sowing, or reaping, or by what foresight of gathering into barns, can all their hosts be fed? The bee, under a regular government of power and affection, selects her delicious deposit from every flower of summer, and lives through the winter on her reserved capital. The ant, 'having no guide, overseer, or ruler, gathereth her food in the harvest,' and exhibits, as in a school of instructive industry, the fittest lesson for the sluggard; but the bird neither sows nor reaps with any toil, nor gathers into barns by any industry or foresight,—yet by a bountiful provision, whereby he 'supplies the wants of every thing that lives,' in a manner suited to its own nature, our heavenly Father feedeth them.

Yes, our heavenly Father 'supplies the wants of every thing that lives,' but each in a way suited to its own nature; each in a manner suited to display the endless and lovely variety of instincts and propensities with which he has endowed his creatures, and the inexhaustible stores by which he can supply their wants.

And if every creature is supplied in a manner suited to its own nature—that is, in a way suited to its own capacities and free and unbiassed inclinations—then, as the bee and the ant are supported by the incessant labours of an industry for which they are fitted, while the bird is equally supplied without either toil or foresight—then is man to derive his support from that foresight with which, beyond all other creatures, he is endowed, by an industry which, above all other creatures, he is competent to vary and pursue, and from which, when rationally followed, he derives both his pleasure and his health. Were man not capable of being taught 'more than the beasts of the field;' were he not by nature and acquirement 'wiser than the fowls of heaven;' then should he live by their law, and be provided for after their manner.

But being differently constituted both by capacity and inclination—an inclination to industry, universal and invariable, and only prevented by evil education or sinful indulgence—man is bound, by the law of his nature and his God, 'to provide things honest in the sight of all men;' to avoid being 'slothful in business;' and to remember that it is 'the hand of the diligent that maketh rich.' From the argument of our Saviour drawn from the providential feeding of the fowls of the air, no man can derive any argument against the employment of means for his support. For whether the means within his power be mental acquirement or bodily strength, they are those divine endowments which, by the very fact of their possession, he is bound to exert. The bee and the ant put forth the utmost power with which God has endowed them; the very improvident bird labours incessantly for its young; and, when food is exhausted, or climate annoys, it fearlessly and laboriously wings its way over oceans and continents in search of a new home and a new store. Man can therefore plead neither the example of nature, nor the authority of grace, for any wilful idleness, any improvident neglect, any prodigal squandering of any means that God bestows.

But while the appeal of our Saviour is not directed against means, it is directed against all unbelieving fears for the present or the future ; against all doubt and distrust of power, or mercy, or goodness ; and against all those engrossing anxieties and cares about worldly provision, which so often haunt and torment the minds of men both in their waking and sleeping hours. And especially are they intended and calculated, both by example of providence and precept of our Lord, to sustain the minds of men under the pressure of difficulties, disappointments, sickness, pains, and sorrows. For as it is not merely in the plenty and warmth of summer, but in the dearth and storms of winter, that the bird is fed ; so it is not merely in the bright sunshine of prosperity, but under the darkest clouds of misfortune, that we are warranted to put our trust in Him who is faithful to the letter in every promise and engagement.

Observe a speciality in our Saviour's argument, 'Your heavenly Father feedeth them: are ye not much better than they?' Are we not much better, being in God's own image? Are we not much better, being bought with so great a price? Are we not much better, being endowed with such precious promises? Shall we not therefore follow faith farther than they pursue their instincts? and depend as implicitly on the grace of God, as they on the bounties of nature?

Observe how the birds, while they are bountifully fed, are yet required to seek their food ; so let us learn to seek, and to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all other things shall be added unto us. What contempt of God not to seek that righteousness and kingdom which he sent his own Son to bring in and to establish ; or to neglect that great salvation which he hath purchased with his own blood!

How blessed, when cares intrude and annoy, to recall that description of the afflicted believer, 'casting all his care upon God, because he careth for him!' How consoling and strengthening the exhortation, 'Cast thou thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee ; he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved !'

How freely and confidently may we ask all that we need for our souls ! God 'feeds the ravens of the desert when they cry unto him : ' he will not then neglect the cry of his dear children. 'As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.' 'And if men, being evil, know how to give good gifts to their children, how much more will our heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him !'

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness,' Gen. i. 26.

THE inspired history of creation presents a beautiful example of progressive excellence. First, the material world, but 'without form and void ;' then light ; then the firmament of heaven ; then dry land, and plants of every form ; then lights in heaven to rule the day and night ; then the fish of the sea, and fowls of the air ; then all the beasts of the field—and, all being thus prepared, 'God said, Let us make man,' last and noblest of his works, 'in our own image, after our own likeness.' At the formation of every other thing, God said, 'let it be,' and it was so. But, at the formation of man, there is a divine council, and an image impressed representing, as far as a creature may, the infinite attributes of the Creator. All this imports that man was a creature superior to all that had hitherto been made. Let us examine the import of the record.

In all ages of the Christian church, this divine consultation has been understood of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Barnabas, the fellow labourer of Paul, observes, 'For the Lord was contented to suffer for our souls, though he be the Lord of the world ; to whom God said, the day before the completion of the world, "Let us make man after our image, and similitude."'

Hermas, the cotemporary of Paul, adds, 'He was present in council with the Father in forming the creatures.'

Theophilus of Antioch, about the year 180, observes, 'He directed these words, "Let us make man," to none other than his own Word.'

Irenæus, about the year 187, speaks thus, 'His word and wisdom, his Son and Spirit are always present with him, to whom he spake, saying, "Let us make man."'

Origen, born in 185, likewise declares, 'To him also spake he, the Father, "Let us make man after our image"'

Augustine, born in 354, more extensively commenting on the words, and combating the perverse interpretations of them, has these words, 'Had God said no more than "Let us make man," it might, with some colour, be understood as spoken to the angels, whom the Jews pretend he employed in framing the body of man and other creatures ; but seeing it is immediately added, "after our image," it is highly profane to believe that man was made after the similitude of angels, and that the similitude of God and angels is one and the same thing.'

These form but a small portion of the chain of evidence that history furnishes; but they may suffice as a valuable specimen of the early and continuous assertion of the truth; and may be usefully summed up in the words of the learned Kennicot: 'God,' he observes, 'being about to create man, is introduced saying, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness;" in consequence of which the historian tells us, "so God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him." It is evident then that God created man in his own image. This is mentioned thrice, by way of emphasis, and to prevent, if possible, all possibility of misconstruction. Now what God did, was certainly what God proposed to do. God created man in his own image, that is, in the image of the Godhead, and therefore God proposed to create man in the image of the Godhead. But if God proposed to create him in the image of the Godhead, the proposal must have been made to the Godhead, because the words are, "Let us make man in our image." And if the proposal here made, be by God to the Godhead, it is absurd to suppose it made to the same person that makes it; and consequently reasonable to think it made to the other two persons in the unity of the Godhead.'

What a glorious revelation, what an ennobling truth! Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, engaged in the designing and effecting of the first creation, as in the purpose and completion of the second! Yes, the second creation! For 'if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature,'—a new creation—'old things'—the wreck and remnant of the fall—'are passed away. Behold all things are become new.'

How benevolent the design of the Godhead, to make the rational creatures happy, by making them good; and in making them good, to raise them to the highest possible standard, even the image and likeness of the uncreated God.

This image of God in man consists in the impress not of one, or of any select portion of his attributes, but of such measure as the creature may receive of them all. Man is an image of God's eternity; for, though, as a creature, he is but of yesterday, as immortal 'he endureth for ever.'

Man is an image of God's omnipotence; for though weak and powerless in himself, he 'can do all things, through Christ strengthening him.' Man is an image of God's omnipresence; for though in body confined as to a prison house, in spirit he 'sitteth, even now, in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.' But it is mainly in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, with dominion over the creatures, that the image of God is discovered in man. In bodily strength, long life, and acuteness of sense, many creatures vie with man, or decidedly surpass him; but in the knowledge, and resulting fear, love, and service, of God, the weakest believer stands on an elevation, literally infinite, above all the inferior tribes. Of these principles the product is 'righteousness,' the complete fulfilment of all that is commanded. This righteousness stood on the basis of creation in the first Adam, and by sin was cast down; it stands upon the basis of the Creator in the second Adam,—'God manifest in the flesh,'—and so is incapable of injury. This knowledge and righteousness are manifested in 'true holiness'—of a creature still in the world, the utter separation from the world; of a creature still immersed in the duties, cares, and sorrows of the world, yet altogether dedicated to God, and living above the world; wearing out time, but living in eternity; a prisoner in a house of earth, but a spiritual dweller in God.

And as such, man is seen a true image of God, in the dominion which he holds over the works of God. Even in the hands of unrenewed sinners, there appears a remnant of original dominion. But every province is in a state of rebellion, and none more obstinate than the sinner's own heart. But Christ Jesus we see 'crowned with glory and honour,' and acknowledged 'Lord of all;' and every believer we see restored in him to a co-partnership in that throne which he gained by overcoming the world, and in which he sits till death, the last of his and our enemies, shall be utterly and eternally destroyed.

---

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen,' Rom. xi. 36.

'ALL things,' visible and invisible, all things in heaven above, and in the earth below, were created by 'the word of the Lord,' and by his continued energy they are all sustained; through him, as the channel of administration and beneficence, every needful supply is furnished, whether of light, and rain, and dew from heaven, or of plants on the earth, or of good and perfect gifts to the souls of men; and to him, as to a centre of universal attraction, all things tend in their progress, bearing witness to his infinite perfections, and thereby exhibiting his glory to all his intelligent creatures.

Three questions here naturally present themselves. What is the glory of God? How can we glorify him? What are our inducements and obligations to render him glory?

What is the glory of the Lord? It is, first, that visible splendour in which God has been pleased to make his presence manifest to men's bodily senses. Thus it is said in Exodus that 'Moses went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount. And the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days. And the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount, in the eyes of the children of Israel.' But that this was not the sole, but merely one visible exhibition of his glory, is manifest from the fact, that after this Moses says to the Lord, 'I beseech thee, show me thy glory;' and the Lord graciously answers, 'I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by. And I will take away mine hand, and thou shalt see my back parts—or that which I shall hereafter be—but my face shall not be seen.' Agreeably to this account of the visible glory, John describes it as exhibited in the Son of God. 'And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.'

Now since 'man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever,' it becomes a subject of the most solemn inquiry, How shall we glorify him?

We cannot cause any visible glory to appear to ourselves or others. It might be highly presumptuous, nay, impious, to desire it. But we glorify God when we diligently study, spiritually discover, and humbly and fervently acknowledge his perfections. That this should be our chief end on earth is evident, because it is the chief work of the church in heaven: for, 'they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. And when the living creatures give glory, and honour, and thanks, to him that sat on the throne, that liveth for ever and ever, the four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power.'

We glorify God when we acknowledge all the blessings we enjoy, and all the gifts with which we are endowed, to have come down from him as their source, and to be employed for him as their sovereign. Even as David saith: 'Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty; for all that is in the heaven, and in the earth, is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as Head above all.'

We glorify God when we humble ourselves beneath his mighty power, when we confess and lament our sins before him, when we bow to his chastisements, and deprecate and flee from his deserved anger. Thus speaks the prophet to Israel; 'Hear ye and give ear; be not proud, for the Lord hath spoken. Give glory to the Lord your God, before he cause darkness, and before your feet stumble on the dark mountains.

We glorify God when patiently, cheerfully, and joyfully, we are contented to suffer for truth and righteousness. Thus Peter admonishes the church—'If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.'

We glorify God when we employ our hearts, and our voices in his praise, and so fulfil his own declaration, 'who offereth praise, glorifies me.'

Our obligations to glorify God result immediately from the various means whereby he may be glorified. We have had his brightest perfections shining upon us in the beams of 'the Sun of righteousness.' The very opening of our eyes therefore compels us to tell of what we see. He has enriched us with his spiritual treasures, and we are bound to acknowledge our obligation. We have sinned against his law, and come short of his glory in our disobedience; we are bound, therefore, to glorify the mercy by which we are brought to salvation. If tried in the furnace of affliction, we are bound to glorify him; for he only refines us from the dross of worldliness, that the brightness and the value of the gold may appear. He has given us eyes to see, hearts to feel, and voices to praise: we are bound, therefore, to employ our gifts to the honour and glory of the donor.

But beyond the obligations to the duty, there lies this paramount inducement, which we select out of many. Our eternal enjoyment of God—our possession of him as our own—as our Father, our Saviour, our Sanctifier—with all our delight in his perfections and gifts—all lie in the very act of glorifying God, and cannot be separated from it. To glorify God, is to enjoy God; an enjoyment that increases as our knowledge, our faith, our love, our hope, our confidence, our submission, our sensibility, and our utterance increase—an enjoyment, now imperfect, because we but see as through a glass darkly; but it shall be perfected for ever when we shall see as we are seen, and know as we are known.

—
 TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul,'
 Gen. ii. 7.

THE appearance of material objects, independent of observation and experience, affords no intimation of what they may become. The man who looks upon a little seed, could, from that sight alone, form no anticipation that, by man's ingenuity, it would be converted into cloth; and the man who looks upon the cloth, it may be coarse in texture, and discoloured in appearance, could never, from that sight alone, foretell that, by a subsequent transformation, it would become the paper from which he reads. Now if such be the changes upon material things produced by man's art and device, how much greater changes may we reasonably expect when the work is from the hand of God! Here is dust of the ground. Dried in the sunbeams, it is scattered by every wind. Wetted by the rain, it again becomes adhesive, and easily formed by the plastic hand of the potter. Burned in the fire, it becomes a vessel of use or of ornament; but the power of man is now exhausted, and further than mere commixture of materials, and change of form, he is utterly unable to proceed.

Of such mean materials, can anything higher be made? Yes; 'the Lord formed man out' of this very 'dust of the ground,' intending, no doubt, by this record of his origin, to demonstrate, first, the wondrous wisdom and power of his Maker; and, secondly, to inculcate a perpetual lesson of the deepest humility upon a creature, the root of whose genealogy arises from the 'dust of the ground.'

But how much deeper still sinks the lesson of humility, when 'through faith we understand that the worlds were formed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.' In other words, that, not of an eternal, or self-existent material, did God make the worlds—but that he made all things of nothing, by the word of his power, by the forthputting of his omnipotence. Those glorious stars of light were formed of nothing—not higher was the origin of the light; and of worthless dust—of that dust so originated, was our body formed; so that, not merely are we of dust, and to dust returning, but we are of nothing; called into being at the will of the Almighty, and sustained in that being by the same continued will.

The lesson of humility sinks deeper still, when we reflect that though man was originally formed of the dust, it was, in common with all created things, pronounced 'very good;' whereas the dust of which we now are formed, lies under God's wrath and curse. 'Cursed,' said the Lord God, 'is the ground for thy sake;' and 'because of these things,' that is, sin—saith the apostle—'the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience.'

But while the lesson of humility is thus derived from our origin, the lesson of admiration, not of ourselves, but of our Maker, is derived from our structure. 'God formed man,' and every portion of his frame attests the divinity of the workmanship. When we contemplate a time-piece, a telescope, a steam engine, or any other curious piece of machinery, we never hesitate, indeed we cannot hesitate, to ascribe design, and skill, and power, to the mechanist. Nor does our ignorance of the principles of the machine, or of the formation of its several parts, detract one jot or tittle from our admiration of the structure itself, or of the genius of him by whom it was designed and completed. And surely, when we contemplate the human body, the mysterious means by which it is nourished, the wonderful contrivances by which its organs are fitted for their several uses—the adaptation and subserviency of one part to another—and the concurrence of so many contradictory powers and forms to one harmonious result—while we exclaim, with the psalmist, 'we are fearfully and wonderfully made,' we must acknowledge with the philosopher, that the contemplation of one single organ is sufficient to rebuke and to silence atheism, and to demonstrate the being and the perfections of God our Creator.

And if the body be sufficient to call forth our admiration of itself, and of him who formed it, how much more should the soul? We have a soul, a power, a mode of being, for which matter and motion, organ and function, can never give the shadow of account. The soul is the breath of God in man. 'The breath of the Almighty,' says Job, 'hath given me life.' It is not dust, it returneth not to the dust, because it is not of the dust. 'The dust shall return to the earth as it was, but the spirit, the breath of the Lord, shall return to God who gave it.' God is the former of our bodies, but he is the Father of our spirits. And while the body of Adam was not formed without reference to the body of Christ, it is in the soul that the image of God in man is chiefly to be traced. Like him it is spiritual, not formed of the dust; like him it is immortal, and to him it returns for judgment; like him, though it have not unlimited knowledge, it hath unlimited capacities; like him, it hath everlasting righteousness, the gift of God through faith of Jesus; like him, it is made perfect in holiness, being renewed by the Holy Spirit; it is the temple in which God is acceptably worshipped, the habitation in which he delights to dwell!

Alas! that our spirit, so nobly born, so gloriously endowed, so highly destined, should ever cleave to the dust! Alas! that it should be proud of dust, and careless of heavenly breathings! Proud of a strength that is crushed beneath the worm; proud of features that fade as the flowers, and wither as the grass; proud of raiment, the memorial of sin; proud of titles of which 'sinner' is the chief, and proud of habitations which must soon be exchanged for the grave! What melancholy proof of a nature fallen far from original righteousness, when men make so much of dust, so little of spirit; so much of time, so little of eternity!

But while death smites and corruption destroys the body which God has formed, how reviving and glorious is the doctrine of the resurrection. 'We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. And when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass that saying which is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

And while the dust, in the mean time, 'returns to the earth as it was,' let us remember 'the spirit must return to God who gave it, and so 'every man shall give an account of himself to God;' 'seeing then that all these things,' which now court our affections, or excite our cares, 'shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for, and hastening unto, the coming of the day of God.' Wherefore, seeing that we look for such things, 'let us be diligent that we may be found in him in peace,' because justified; 'without spot,' because washed; and 'blameless,' because clothed upon with 'the righteousness of God.'

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them,' Gen. i. 27.

WHEN a heathen philosopher was asked by a Sicilian king, 'what is God?' he requested three days to think of it. Being asked again, he requested three days more—and, at the end of that time, he candidly confessed, that the more he inquired, the more he was bewildered; that the more he thought of it, the less he seemed to know. And this has ever been the case where the light of scripture has been neglected, refused, or unknown. But where that light shines, the question is easily answered. We ask what is God? The scriptures answer, 'God is a spirit.' He is not matter, but the Creator of it. We ask again, 'what is God?' and the scriptures answer, 'God is light.' The light of the sun, moon, and stars, so fair, so glorious, is the visible emblem of his invisible glory; and that visible light which the eye beholds, is but the emblem again of that intellectual light by which the mind sees. He is unclouded, unobstructed, unbounded, intellectual light, for 'his understanding is infinite.' We ask again, 'what is God?'—and we are compelled to ask again, for all this description will not entitle God to our affections; and we seek for a God to whom we can dedicate the heart—and the scriptures answer us, 'God is love,' and 'he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him.'

Now such was the original in the image of which God created man. He created him spiritual, intimately connected with matter, being the intended heir and invested lord of a material world; yet, at the same time, so totally independent of matter, that his mental powers could strengthen as his bodily powers decayed, and 'though the outward man perish, yet the inward be renewed, day by day.' He created him intellectual, with a mind full of light—full of the light and knowledge of God, and of duty—full of the light and knowledge of nature—capable of converse with God, not on terms of equality, but in communion of knowledge, possession, and interest. He created him capable of love, the love of gratitude to a bountiful Benefactor, the love of attachment to the Supreme Good.

Thus 'God created man in his own image.' To mark the certainty of it as by a second witness, it is added, 'in the image of God created he him;' and it is subjoined as an exposition, to mark the extension of it, 'male and female created he them.'

The scriptures never speak a word in vain. Even in those places where the things spoken seem most superfluous, the Spirit speaks from a deep perception of all that is in man, or in prophetic anticipation of the false opinions and evil practices that may afterwards arise, and which it may be important to correct, or contradict. In this manner do we account for the varied repetition about the image of God in man, and for the seemingly unnecessary appendage to that repetition, 'male and female created he them.'

For it is well known that in all ages and countries, where Christianity has not prevailed, woman has either been secluded as a prisoner, or degraded into a slave, and that Christianity alone has acknowledged her dignity, asserted her freedom, and conceded and secured her legitimate privileges.

And yet in providing for this blessed domestic revolution in the history of woman, it is instructive to remark, how the Bible never condescends to argue the question, against man's usurpations, or in favour of woman's equality and freedom. And why this oversight, or neglect? Because the scriptures attain the end by a different and more effectual process; that is, by historic narrative, representative parable, or implied consequence. By historic narrative; as when it is shown that woman is the equal copartner with man in the endowment of the image of God; by the converse of angels with women as readily and familiarly as with men, as with Sarah and the wife of Manoah; by the high achievements they were privileged to effect, and the divine qualifications with which they were endowed; as were Deborah and Anna; the familiar converse which our Lord held with the woman of Samaria, and plain revelation to her of his divine commission; by the parable in which a woman, engaged in her domestic duties, is employed as an emblem of the kingdom of heaven; by the employment of a woman with her child in the book of Revelation, to set forth the persecutions and preservation of the church; and by the frequent exhortations addressed to godly women, by which their value, in the sight of God, is more clearly evinced, than by any more direct assertion, or more formal argument.

And yet these form but a few specimens of the mode in which the scriptures assert the legitimate rank of woman, and in which, while denying to man the privileges of a tyrant, they remove from him those annoyances that must constantly arise from the struggles of a slave.

True it is, that in some countries, and in some states of society, woman has been, or still is, rather treated as an idol to be worshipped, than as an helpmate, and partner, in the labours and journey of life—as a being to be won, and kept, and served by flattery, rather than as one to be enlightened by education, convinced by reason, or elevated by religion. And yet, after all, what is this idolatry but the denial of equality, and the disguised establishment of tyranny? The idolater has, no doubt, made his idol a god, yet has he never treated that idol on terms of equality; but changed, discarded, or degraded it, according to the caprice of the moment.

How much happier they who have sought, like those of Cana, to have Christ at their marriage feast! How much happier they, who in ruling their household, have learned to rule it but as Christ rules the church! How much happier they who having learned, from the scriptures, the difference between equality and selfishness, have learned such submission as the church renders to Christ! How much happier they who, instead of living together as the servants and devotees of worldly principles, practices, fashions, and habits, have learned to live 'as being heirs together of the grace of life, that their prayers be not hindered.' And how much happier they who, judging of time only in the light of eternity, have learned to view every relation, and every duty of this life, as it bears upon their prospects in the life that is to come. The time is coming when 'there is neither male nor female, but all are one in Christ Jesus, and if Christ's, then Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.' And the time is nigh when these shall neither 'marry, nor be given in marriage, but be as the angels of God in heaven.' Yet, in that heaven, every union of grace shall survive, indestructible as the Spirit by which it was wrought on earth.

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it, and to keep it,' Gen. ii. 15.

In what place God made man, the scriptures do not inform us. That it was not in Eden, is evident from the narrative of the creation. For when God had formed man's body of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, he took the man, and did not leave him in the garden, but put him into the garden; and this removal was effected for the purpose of reminding the man, that not only being, but every means of well-being, was derived entirely from God, was held at his good pleasure, and as easily resumed, as it was freely and generously bestowed. It was needful even in Eden, that man should feel he had no inherent right; for a sense of God's goodness, and of the creature's absolute dependence, is as essential to preservation in a state of holiness, as in a state of restoration from sin.

When God created man, he blessed him. But no gift can render any one blessed, unless in so far as God is seen to be the giver. The happiness of Eden lay not in the majestic rivers by which it was watered; in the pleasant and fruitful trees with which it was planted; in the salubrious sky that shone above the head; nor in the fertile soil that lay beneath the feet; it lay not in the loveliness of the flowers that bloomed in nature's earliest spring, nor in the sweet voice of the birds that sung amongst the branches. It lay not even in the communion of human spirits, though maintained and cemented by innocence. It lay in the fact, that every gift was traced immediately to God as its fountain, and thence deriving its every power of contributing to the creature's enjoyment.

But it is moreover worthy of special remark, that when God placed man in Eden, in a state of holiness and happiness, he did not intend him to be idle. He put him into the garden, 'to dress it, and to keep it.' He gave him the whole earth, but with a commission to 'subdue it.' But this commission to 'subdue' did not imply any stubbornness or rebellion, but the suppression of that superabundant luxuriance with which the vegetable world was invested, and the converting to his purposes of the various powers with which nature, in all her kingdoms, was so bountifully endowed. This order was exactly suited to man's capacities and condition. Enabled to think, one part of his employment must consist in thinking; but enabled to act, another part must necessarily consist in acting; and in the connection of these two capacities, thinking and acting, must the third element of his nature be called forth—that is, his capacity of enjoyment. Without these capacities of thinking and acting, and of thence deriving his enjoyment, man would have been no image of his great Creator. The eternal mind, the Spirit of God, is not a quiescent entity, immovably absorbed in its own contemplations. He acts eternally in purpose, having his 'delights with the sons of men,' and endowing them with his choicest gifts 'in Christ Jesus, before the world was.' In the beginning he puts forth the Almighty energies of creation, and in the progress of time is ever acting, not by mere impressed or delegated laws, but by the untiring hand which 'upholds all things' according to 'the word of his power.' And if the 'delights' of the eternal love thus lay in the mighty purpose and works of creation, and the beneficent design and accomplishment of redemption, man, to be an exact created image of the uncreated Godhead, must not only be invested with the attributes of thought, but with purposes and capacities of activity, by which he may exercise, not a creative, but a formative power—the image of creation; and by which he may calculate, and anticipate, and prepare for futurity—the image of providence; and from which, in subordination to the will of God, he may derive his 'chiefest joys,' and be conformed to the image of Him, who, 'for the joy set before him, endured the cross, and is now set down on the right hand of God.'

Idleness, in a state of sin, affords not only an opportunity, but an incentive to more sin; and 'the sweat of the brow,' and the sorrow of the heart, in which man is doomed to eat bread, might be supposed a punishment inflicted upon a criminal, rather than a merciful regimen for the healing of a perishing invalid. Yet, while the infliction of labour as a curse, is neither to be forgotten, nor denied, it is an infliction of punishment only in so far as the bitterness of sin is infused into the original cup of enjoyment. Man's first enjoyment originally lay in perfect communion with God; his second in communion with whatever, as partaking of the same image, enjoyed the same communion; and his third in the active duties of that universal dominion with which God had invested him as his delegated representative. Idleness was therefore inconsistent with man's original nature and office, and must be as inconsistent still, though his nature has become infected, and the dignity of his office forfeited by sin.

When we return to contemplate the first man in the state of innocence, we cannot fail to acknowledge and admire the dignity of his birth. There is a dignity in birth. The son of parents, wise, good, and thus truly great, cannot be disrobed of a portion of the parent's praise. But how transcendent the dignity of Adam's ancestry! He traced his genealogy immediately to Almighty God! And he claims a derivative right to every region of the earth! Yet, thus dignified in descent, thus endowed with dominion, he is immediately appointed to work!

Are we, then, to be surprised, if that labour which was required as a duty, and which was necessary to enjoyment, in a state of holiness, should continue to be required as a duty, and be necessary to our correction and reformation when we have sunk into a state of sin? Mere animal enjoyment may come without labour; the birds neither sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns. But where mental enjoyments are required, they can only be attained when they have roused and directed the bodily powers into active obedience to the will of God. And this is the will of God, 'if any man will not work, neither should he eat.' The idle man, therefore, is condemned to die; and should he continue to live, he lives but as the robber lives, by literally stealing what is not his own, and incurring the righteous condemnation both of God and man.

But how can we enjoy the contemplation and communion of God, when actively and laboriously engaged in the business of a busy world? Can a weary body co-operate with an active mind? Can a heavenly spirit consist with an earthly hand? Yes, these are different, but not contrary. The spirit may be willing, while the flesh is weak, and the weakness of the one will not be charged against the willingness of the other. On the contrary, this weakness is the very test of willingness; while it keeps willingness humble, from the consciousness of the weak or, perhaps, reluctant, companion with which it is conjoined.

Indeed worldly employments are no hindrances to communion with God. Paul the tent maker was surely as near to God as Paul the apostle. Neither are temptations any real hindrances. Our Lord in the wilderness, under Satan's most subtle devices, was only drawn the nearer to his Father, by the efforts of the tempter to drive him away.

Let us bless God for active powers, and continuous employments. And if Eden required a dresser and a keeper, how much more may we look for incessant cares and labours in a world of sin? Let us, nevertheless, plant in the vacant field, and water in the dry; and in due time God will give the increase, and we shall reap, if we faint not.

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make an help meet for him,' Gen. ii. 18.

BECAUSE God alone is supremely wise and good, he is therefore the only proper Judge of what is good for any of his creatures. Of man, he pronounces—It is not good he should be alone; and to remedy the defect, he resolves to make an help meet for him. At this time, it seems highly probable, the holy angels were in being; for, when God 'laid the foundations of the earth;' when he 'laid the measures thereof' and 'stretched the line upon it'—then the 'morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' And certain it is that, at this time, all the lower animals had been created. How then is man said to be alone? Just as a cottage may be alone in the midst of a forest. It has no kindred with the trees: it is alone of its kind. So was man. He was alone of his kind: and the beneficent Creator determines to make an help meet for him; an image of himself, as he was an image of God; capable of mental communion with him, as he was with God; capable of doubling his happiness, by partaking it; and should any disaster deprive him of that happiness, capable of alleviating his sorrows by copartnership in his burden.

Man was therefore not made for solitude. Solitude is, no doubt, often to the mind what medicine is to the body. Medicine is salutary, as it interrupts some unhealthy process, invigorates some weakened organ, or corrects some deranged function. But just as to live on medicine would be inconsistent with health, so, to live in solitude would be inconsistent with happiness. Even in a state of holiness, solitude is inconsistent with happiness; for, were there no advice to be asked, no comfort needed, no wants to be supplied, still, in solitude, there would be no object for the affections, and thus, not only one department of our constitution totally unoccupied, but the chief source of our enjoyment totally dried up.

But when God created man, and formed an help meet for him, he did not contemplate the mere span of his obedience, but embraced in his beneficent and merciful purposes the whole period of his future history. And if, in Eden and in innocence, it was not good to leave him alone, much less could it be good for him when, as a guilty exile, he was driven forth to till the ground, now cursed for his sake, with no title but sin, no entail but sorrow, no home, no rest but the grave! And when, to counterbalance these severe, but yet merciful inflictions, God gave him the promise of 'the seed of the woman,' not till then appeared the full wisdom and the goodness of the provided companionship. His help meet then stood beside him not merely the partner in his guilt, and exile, and curse, and 'toil,' and sorrow, but the depository of his highest trust, the reflector of his brightest hopes, the partaker, and, by partaking, the increaser of his liveliest joys, the counsellor in his deepest perplexities, the par-tipicator of his cares, the soother of his griefs, the healer of his wounded spirit, and the commissioned trustee of a lost world's redemption.

To replenish—that is—not, as some imagine, to fill again, but to fill completely—the earth with inhabitants was one great part of the gracious purpose of the Creator; and to this end a portion of his original blessing was specially directed. And if this gracious purpose has never yet been fully realized, the fault lies not in any deficiency in the blessing, but in the folly and wickedness of men, by which the human race has been continually drained away in 'wars and fightings,' arising from the lusts that 'war in the members;' while the progress of population has been still farther impeded by the barbarism arising from the cruelties and devastations of war, and from the pestilences and famines that have invariably followed on its track.

But the mere multiplication of inhabitants was not God's full purpose. His purpose included the multiplication of men to know him as God, to remember him as Creator, to love him as Redeemer, to fear him as Judge, to be like him as Sanctifier, and to obey him as Lawgiver and Father. And here it is that the helpmeet's qualifications, and worth, and excellency, are to be chiefly discovered. In training up a vigorous youth to bodily activities or to mental acquirements, a father may effect much; but in training the child to teachableness, to self-denial, to gentleness, almost every thing depends upon a mother. A father may raise and finish a noble superstructure; a mother must previously have laid the unseen foundation. It is thus father and mother should combine and be mutually helpful to each other in training up their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. But not as if a father's work begins only where a mother's ends. To ensure the ends of a good education, they must be concurrent instructors, and proceed upon one uniform system, and with one great object—not the mere accomplishments, but the salvation of their children. What a beautiful, what a glorious sight! a pious family on earth—a redeemed family in heaven!

That the impediments to parental education are great and many, cannot be denied. Some are impeded by sickness, some chilled by poverty, others distracted by cares and troubles, some overwhelmed in business; but the great, and indeed the only insuperable impediment, is the neglect of salvation as the only worthy aim of instruction. When the value of a child is estimated by its soul—when the destiny of the child is felt to be heaven or hell—and when the parents feel that they may be the guilty and unhappy agents of eternal destruction to their own offspring, or the honoured and blessed instruments of their eternal salvation and glory—then every impediment will give way under the irresistible pressure of these sovereign motives, and the work of a godly education will advance, blessing the lowly cottages of the poor, and the lordly dwelling of the rich on earth, and swelling the train of those that follow the Lamb, and celebrate his praises in heaven.

Let it then be never forgotten, that, in every such union of earthly interests, eternal interests are inseparably involved. And let it be farther considered that these are the eternal interests not merely of the parties forming this union, but it may be the interests of many generations. How needful then to seek the divine guidance and blessing, remembering that, while 'house and riches are the inheritance of fathers, a prudent wife is from the Lord.' And that while 'favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain; a woman that feareth the Lord she shall be praised.'

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,'
Gen. ii. 16, 17.

EVERY created thing must be subject to some law; and every law must prescribe or enforce some limit beyond which the subject may not pass. This fact is manifest in God's works of creation. The planets in their heavenly courses are subject to the laws of motion and attraction from which they never depart. The plants in their earthly beds are subject to the laws of heat and moisture, and to which they are ever obedient in bud, and flower, and fruit. The beasts of the field, the fishes of the water, the fowls of the air, all follow the instinct, that is, the law of their respective natures. Shall man be found an exception to this general rule of creation? Certainly not. He must be the subject of some law, because he is a creature; and he must be subject to a moral law, because he is intelligent and accountable.

We find, accordingly, that the law given to Adam is neither the mechanical law that governs the heavenly bodies, nor the vegetable law that produces the plants, nor the instinctive law that rules the lower tribes,—all which laws originate and terminate in the constitution or qualities of the things themselves—but is a law originating in the will of Almighty God himself, and addressed to a creature possessing a will the image of the will of God, not impressing necessities on a mere body, but presenting reasons to an intelligent spirit.

In contemplating this law, we cannot fail to acknowledge, in the very first place, its great liberality; 'Of every tree of the garden,' saith the sovereign Ruler, 'thou mayest freely eat.' And here it is specially to be observed, that while man continued in obedience, the tree of life was not excepted from the generous grant. It was the emblem, the pledge, the visible security of life; that is, of immortal life; for life, where death has not yet intruded, and where, by the conditions of the covenant, it cannot intrude, is immortal life.

But to remind our first parents that this liberality is not a right, but a gift—God is pleased to except from the grant a single tree, to which he gives the ominous name of 'the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.' And here it is to be carefully noted that, in creation, all was pronounced 'good,' yea, very 'good;' and that now when 'evil' is superadded, as a possibility, the description of that evil is, 'thou shalt surely die.'

Whether we contemplate God or man, this was a most appropriate ordinance. It was fit that God, as the Sovereign of the world, should still retain some royalty, as it were, in his own possession, to remind man of his dependence and his allegiance. It was suited also to the condition of man. Adam was not now the victim of the 'carnal mind' to which sin has enslaved his posterity. He was free from all tendency or desire to moral wrong. Had God, therefore, given him a mere moral law, such as is addressed to sinners, regarding a moral good to be done, or a moral evil to be avoided, there would have been no suitableness of the law to the creature. God, therefore, gives him a law suited to his condition of innocence; that is, a positive injunction, not a moral precept; yet a positive injunction involving all moral consequences in its breach or observance.

The divine injunction was intended to impress upon man that the reason of obedience is to be referred implicitly to the divine will; and that because the divine will is simply an expression of the divine nature, that is, of the divine wisdom, sovereignty, goodness, and mercy.

Thoughtless, ignorant, and foolish men, have raised various objections against this narrative. They have objected against the appointment of a tree as a sacramental test of human obedience. But have they forgot that man was now confined to vegetable food? Have they forgot that man had now no inclination to sin, while he had the same inclination then that he now has for food? Have they overlooked the fact, that to subordinate inclinations to the will of God is the only real morality? Surely they cannot overlook, they cannot forget these facts. Now God placed his precept in the way of the only inclination that man could have to disobey; and, consequently in the only way where temptation could test obedience.

But farther, it has been objected, that so small a sin as the eating of a fruit, could not have provoked the divine displeasure as Adam's sin is represented to have provoked it. Here it is not important to question or discuss what men mean by small sins. Were that needful, it might be easily shown that there are few of the more heinous immoralities that were not in the sin of our first parents—such as unbelief in God, the fruitful parent of all sin, ingratitude, covetousness, pride, robbery, atheism. But to demonstrate this is not our present object, we are only concerned to examine how far the test was suited to the state of man, and worthy of the divine Legislator.

That it was suitable to the state of man, we have seen, because it stood in the only path where temptation could test allegiance. That it was suited to the dignity of God must be admitted, as dignity consists not in soaring infinitely above his creatures, but in condescending to their low estate, an estate that must always be low, just because God is high; and that can never be elevated, but in proportion as God 'humbleth himself to see the things in the earth.' Now the test was worthy of the God of wisdom, because it could be, and was most clearly stated, and because it was most perfectly understood, and because, in breach or observance, it formed a perfect witness between the parties to the original covenant.

The institution of the tree of knowledge was farther worthy of God, because it exemplified his goodness, secured the multitude of his other favours, and prescribed a law of the most easy and simple observance.

The narrative, independently of the character, miracles, and prophecies of Moses, carries in its bosom its own evidence. Man never could have invented a narrative so simple, a plan so efficient, so worthy of God, or so suitable to man.

It details the legislation of innocence, one simple injunction, one implied promise, one awful sanction. How easy the study, how easy the obedience of the law. Hasten, Lord, the time when still greater simplicity of law, and still greater ease—yea, delight—of obedience shall be established! When Christ shall be the King—paradise the kingdom—saints the subjects, and love the only law!

—
 TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat; and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat,'
 Gen. iii. 6.

WE are truly informed that 'evil communications corrupt good manners,' and we are solemnly warned to 'have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness.' And if inattention to these lessons brought ruin upon a state of innocence, how needful for our recovery from a state of sin!

That we may justly estimate their value, let us trace the progress of the first sin arising from the neglect of them; for in that sin we have not only the fountain, but the similitude of all other sins.

In examining the sin we must first observe what leads to its commission—the woman holding converse with the serpent. In this she contravened no positive law, but seemed to be guided by the general principles of sociality. Nay more, she was called on to converse of God, and his gifts and prohibitions, and to communicate information to an apparently anxious inquirer. Now in all this she sinned not. Perhaps we may not even call her prudence in question, as, for aught that appears, she may have been totally ignorant of the character of her inquirer. But the moment the serpent commences to contradict God's word, and to brave his threatenings, or to insinuate against him a charge of insincerity, stinginess, or jealousy—and the moment she lends a willing ear to this contradiction and charge, then commences that sin by which our first parents fell, and death was entailed on themselves and their posterity.

And so ordinarily commences every subsequent sin, especially the sin of infidelity. The infidel assumes the form of a modest inquirer after the things of God; starts first some difficulties we are requested to solve; insinuates some doubts we are entreated to weigh; and when the equilibrium of the mind is disturbed, puts forth some bolder contradiction of a divine truth; suggests some argument in favour of greater liberty than the word of God permits; and thus, so well suits temptations to tendencies, that, before we are aware, the seeds of infidelity and of immorality—infidelity's inseparable offspring—are deeply sown in the heart, and advancing to maturity before we are aware of their existence.

In another remarkable particular do the temptations of infidelity resemble that of the serpent. He represented the tree as desirable 'to make one wise,' thus sophistically confounding knowledge and wisdom. That the woman would know more when she had sinned, was a literal truth—that she would be wiser, was an absolute falsehood. Even so does infidelity ever affect to ally itself with philosophy, and by 'great swelling words of vanity' to deceive the minds of the simple. Nay, even sound philosophy, legitimately inquiring into the truths of nature, often produces the same injurious effect, by leading away the mind from the 'invisible things of God,' and riveting the attention altogether to visible and perishing objects.

The next view of this sin presents it as arising from agreeableness to the appetite and the eye. And these still continue to be the most vulnerable quarters upon which satan makes his assaults, and where he gains his victories. The moment our attention is fixed upon 'what we shall eat, and what we shall drink,' farewell communion with a holy Father and a crucified Saviour; and the moment the mere beauties of nature and art take full possession of our imaginations, 'the beauty of holiness' loses all its attractiveness, and we become idolaters of the creature, while we forget the Creator, and are betrayed to worship the works of men's hands, whilst we think we are but admiring them as mere objects of curiosity or taste.

Another point demanding our most serious attention is, the instant activity and zeal that sin inspires for its farther propagation. The moment the woman had taken, she gave—and what is specially lamentable, she gave to him who was bone of her bone, and copartner in her destiny, and thus misled and ruined her nearest and dearest friend. And so would every sinner have others to sin with him:—

'Depravity's own work is to deprave.'

There is an apostolic zeal in the cause of evil that presents a bold similarity to the most ardent zeal in the cause of good,—a zeal that will often 'compass sea and land to make one proselyte,' and seeks and finds its reward in making him 'a child of hell.' But alas! how much is sin aggravated when it is communicated through the channels of kindred and family; when husbands and wives encourage one another to forget God; when parents train up their children in the way that they should not go; and the table of friendship is turned into a snare.

When, moved by the importunity of his wife, Adam took of the fruit and did eat, he knew he was commanded to replenish the earth; therefore must have known that he represented all his posterity, and that they would be involved in his sin and misery. Accordingly the scriptures inform us that 'by the disobedience of one many were made sinners,' and 'as by one man's disobedience, sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.'

Can that sin be small which disbelieved God, and gave full credence to the devil? Can that sin be small that renounced allegiance to the Creator, and knowingly inflicted ruin upon all his posterity?

Yet of this sinful parent, are we the sinful children! How humbling are such views of human nature. Weak it was in innocence, how much weaker when fallen! How wonderful the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, 'who though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich!' That to the tree of knowledge we might really be admitted, even to that tree of the knowledge of good unmixed with evil! To that tree of life which is in the paradise of God, and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations!

And let it be seriously observed, that all good to the descendants of Adam must come in the form of healing. 'Lord, heal my soul,' must each of us say, 'for I have offended thee.' And they that be whole need not the physician, but 'they that are sick.' Christ came not 'to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' What gratitude do we not owe to the second Adam? Who from the fallen earth raises to a throne in heaven; who from slavery conducts to freedom, from ruin to restoration, from darkness to day, from death to life, from degradation to glory!

—
 TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat,' Gen. iii. 13.

AN unconverted sinner is never found without some ready excuse for his sin; and every excuse has one of three objects. The first object is to satisfy the sinner's own conscience, or, at all events, to silence its accusations; the second, is to satisfy the reason, or to silence the rebukes of others; and the third, is to palliate or justify sin in the sight of God himself. It is impossible to enumerate all the sources from which those excuses are drawn; but it may be useful to instance a few of the most common, not to suggest them for the use of sinners, but, by the mere mention of their names, to demonstrate their futility. Not a few, for example, seek their excuse in admitting their sin, but pleading, in palliation, that it is a little one. Others, again, will not plead the littleness of their sin, but urge the infrequency of its commission. Others will plead their ignorance of the evil of their sin, and urge that whatever has been wrong in their conduct, they did not intend. Others charge their sin to mere want of thought, or assert that the temptation took them suddenly and unawares. Others will plead the imperfection of their natural temper, and affect to deplore that it is weak or ungovernable; while others produce, as a full satisfaction for all that is past, their purpose or determination to amend for the future. But of all excuses the chief is that which shifts the sin from the sinner's own shoulders, and lays the burden of the guilt upon another. This was the first excuse, and urged in reply to the questioning of God himself; and, since that hour, it has constituted the great model upon which most excuses for sin have been formed.

Before we can fully comprehend the futility of the excuse, we must examine the circumstances that led to it as a final effort to escape from the accusations of conscience, or the cognisance and judgment of God.

Our first parents, while in innocence, had freely conversed with God. But the moment they had sinned, being smitten by their conscience, they hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden. Whence we discover that the object of every excuse is, in some manner, to hide our sin. 'And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself. And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldst not eat? And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave unto me, and I did eat.' Now in this reply it is to be remarked, that it is not obvious whether Adam charges his sin more to the woman than to God himself; for while he relates that the woman 'gave to him,' he tells the Lord, it was the woman whom he had given to be with him. So that it would appear he traces the evil back to God, and charges to his gift, the shame and the guilt in which he now stands before his Judge.

To this excuse, so frivolous and ungrateful, God does not pause to reply, but immediately said unto the woman, 'What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.'

The chief thing remarkable in this excuse is, great ignorance of God. To the trees of the garden our first parents had foolishly fled as a hiding-place from the eyes of omniscience; and now to any but the true account they have recourse, hoping to evade his searching yet merciful examination. They do not confess to God that, in the midst of his bountiful profusion, they had coveted the only gift he had withheld; they do not tell him that a little food had tempted them to disregard his authority; they do not tell him they had felt discontented with their state of blissful innocence and happy communion with God; they do not tell him that, moved by ambition, they had sought to escape from the rank of subjects, and claim an equality with their Creator—but, concealing these things in their own bosom, they answer as under the impression that God can discover no more than they are pleased to reveal.

But ignorance of God's omniscience is not the only thing remarkable; there appears an equal ignorance of his mercy and his grace. To fly, to hide, to evade, to deceive, are the objects of every act and answer; but not a word of sorrow, not a prayer for pardon, is heard from the lips of the sinners.

How wonderful that one simple act of sin, and within a period so obviously brief, could have produced a transformation of character so sad and so degrading!

But at this we need not wonder; the natural world around us can sufficiently illustrate the process. One single cloud can obscure the sun; one single injury to the bodily eye can render his glories invisible—so one single sin interposing between God and the soul becomes as a cloud impenetrable to the light of his countenance, and totally deprives us of that purity of heart without which no man can see the Lord.

Let us learn then the utter vanity of every excuse for sin. The ingenuity of our first parents was unsuccessful. Most probably they were unsuccessful in satisfying themselves; it is certain they were unsuccessful in satisfying God.

Let us learn also the danger of abiding in the way of temptation—of standing in the way of sinners, of walking in the counsel of the ungodly, or sitting in the seat of the scorner.

Let us beware of the shallow selfishness that would lay down our guilt at the door of our neighbour. That we may be tempted by others is most certain. And theirs is the guilt of the temptation, and for that they must account to God; ours, the guilt of compliance; and for this we must account likewise.

Instead, then, of excusing our sins, let us confess our sins, and flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us. For though we have sinned, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus the righteous: and if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us in his blood from all unrighteousness.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation,' Matt. xxvi. 41.

AFTER our Lord and his disciples had ended the observance of his last supper, they sung an hymn, and went forth unto the mount of Olives. There he warned them of his own approaching trials, and of their defections from him. So little, however, did the disciples know their own hearts, that instead of being cast down with the prospect of their weakness, or unfaithfulness, or led to pray that the dark hour or the bitter cup might pass from them, they boldly conclude against the possibility of their defection, and promise and aver, with one consent, that though they should die with him, yet would they never deny him.

Thus solemnly conversing they arrive at Gethsemane, a small garden situated at the foot of the mount; and here leaving the rest of his disciples, as when formerly taking witnesses of his glory, he now takes with him Peter, and the two sons of Zebedee, to be witnesses of his agony; and going with them to a short distance from the others, 'he began to be sorrowful, and very heavy. Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; tarry ye here, and watch with me. And he went a little farther, and fell on his face and prayed, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. And he cometh to his disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What! could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.'

Four chief uses of watching seem to be recorded in scripture.

First, Watching the mere progress of time, as saith the prophet Isaiah, 'He calleth to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, 'The morning cometh, and also the night.' By this use of watching, we are constantly reminded of the necessity of counting our days, so that they may not pass unobserved, or unimproved. Secondly, Watching is applied to the looking out for coming events of any kind. This is likewise exemplified by Isaiah in these words; 'Thus saith the Lord, Go, set a watchman, let him declare what he seeth—and he hearkened diligently with much heed.' This watching includes the great duty of observing the ways of providence, and the signs of the times in which God has cast our lot. Thirdly, Watching is applied to the guardianship of property, as when our Lord declares, 'if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up.' Fourthly, Watching is applied to guarding a place against enemies. Thus Nehemiah, when endangered, 'prayed to God, and set a watch against them,' and thus the Lord says, by Isaiah, to his lately desolate and forsaken, but now restored and protected church, 'I have set a watch on thy walls, O Jerusalem.'

From these, which are the chief views of watching, we are forcibly reminded of the following circumstances.

1. Of our constant liability either actually to forget, or live as if we did forget, the progress of time, the decay of youth, the advance of age, the nearness of death, and the certainty of judgment. How few feel that they are growing old, even when gray hairs appear! How frequently does even sickness fail to arouse to a sense of mortality! How needful, therefore, to watch our days, as we watch a time-keeper, to recollect how many are gone, and think of how few are to come.

2. By our Lord's call to watching, we are reminded of our constant danger of becoming absorbed in the affairs of time, to the sad neglect of eternity.

3. By the call to watching, we are reminded of the invaluable treasure of which God has appointed us stewards, and of the awful terms of responsibility upon which our trust is held. This treasure is not merely our own souls, but frequently the souls of others, for whom we watch, as they who must give account.

4. We are, finally, reminded that we watch in a state of warfare, surrounded by enemies.—The world with its pomps, vanities, and allurements; the flesh with all its weaknesses; the devil with all his wiles—so that not even one moment's relaxation can be permitted from our vigilance;

'seeing our adversary goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.'

But, while watchfulness suggests a wakeful sense of accountability—the call to prayer reminds us of our constant dependence. Prayer without watchfulness, is to ask of God what we judge not worth the keeping; watchfulness without prayer is to attempt to keep the treasure we have never actually received. For 'ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you,' are the precious promises upon which alone we can rely for preserving what we possess, or obtaining what yet we require. Whatever is the object of watchfulness should, therefore, immediately become the subject of prayer.

Prayer is the heart making report of its watchfulness to God, and offering therein all its desires for things agreeable to his will. But the main object, both of watchfulness and prayer, is to escape entering into temptation. To this preservation watchfulness and prayer contribute in two ways. First, as the means of obtaining, through grace, the counsel, protection, guidance, or deliverance of God; and, secondly, as the instrumental means of keeping us from evil. The man who is watching against sin, is, by the very temper of watchfulness, rendered unacceptable to sinners, so that they entice him not; while the man who prays without ceasing, is, by that very prayerfulness, so occupied with higher things as to be habitually rendered insensible to the lower things of the earth.

If we then be risen with Christ, let us seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Let us set our affection on things above, not on things upon the earth; for what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what would a man give in exchange for his soul?

How strange that Christ should be in an agony in the garden, while his disciples have ceased to watch; how much stranger, if he be interceding in heaven, and his disciples have ceased to pray. Let us watch without sleeping; let us pray without ceasing.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'So he drove out the man,' Gen. iii. 24.

WHEN the earth arose from the hand of God in all the freshness and beauty of creation, he chose out a special residence for man, and 'planted a garden eastward in Eden, and out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it, and to keep it. And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.'

Thus amply endowed with all that was good for use, and fair to look upon—thus strictly commanded, and thus solemnly warned,—man stood without any excuse, when he coveted the sole royalty that God had reserved, and violated the sole command to which obedience was enjoined. Hitherto God had appeared to man merely as a gracious Benefactor, now he appears as an offended Judge. Hitherto he had spoken in the sweetness of blessing, now he speaks in the bitterness of the curse. The innocent creature he had 'put into the garden,' the guilty creature he now drives out.

'Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God. On them who fell, severity.' But in a God of mercy, why this severity? Because the God of mercy is also a God of truth. God had given a reasonable command, enforced by a reasonable penalty, and the truth of God must be kept. 'Yea, let God be true, and every man a liar.' Were one jot or tittle of God's word to fail, God would cease to be a competent or righteous Judge. He would cease to be competent—for if he gave a law that required not to be enforced, the enactment of such a law proved his unfitness to legislate. He would also cease to be righteous—for if he enforced not his law, he violated his word—and thus ceasing to be a righteous law to himself, must thereby cease to be a righteous Judge for others. The word of the Lord, therefore, cannot be broken; but sin must be followed by a correspondent punishment.

The punishment inflicted upon our first parents implies deep displeasure against sin. The Lord God did not simply 'send' them away.—He 'drove' them out from the garden. Had he merely commanded them to go, there had been no reasonable expectation of obedience—for they who had disobeyed when innocent, would much more disobey when guilty. Had he merely commanded them to go—they who had so readily invented excuses for one sin, would no less readily have defended another. They would still have lingered around their earliest home, and hid themselves again beneath the trees of the garden. And had God permitted this, they would soon have concluded him to be such an one as themselves—indeed, had he permitted this, he would have been such as themselves. They had believed a lie—God would have told an untruth. They had practised sin—God had not punished it—and between the culprit who sins, and the judge who neglects to punish, the sole difference lies in rank; there is none in disposition or character. The one is a culprit, because he breaks a law—the other, because he does not enforce it. The act of God in 'driving' out our first parents, is, therefore, a practical revelation of that 'indignation and wrath' with which he regards every sin—a revelation, not merely necessary for the exhibition of his own character, but equally necessary for man, who must see, before he can fly from, the terrors of 'the wrath to come.'

Our first parents did not attempt to deny their sin—they merely attempted to excuse it; the woman charged her guilt upon the serpent, the man referred his to the woman—both pleading temptation, not merely as the cause, but also as the defence of their rebellion.

And so do sinners still continue to plead, not with, but against God. Some sinners allege, in their excuse or defence, the peculiarity of their natural temper. On this ground, for example, some either palliate or deny the guilt of sudden anger with all its unseemly accompaniments and lamentable consequences. Others allege the power of natural appetite, or of acquired habit; while habit is again traced to the society and circumstances by which they were surrounded, inveigled, or betrayed. In a word, any plea, but that of 'guilty,' will the sinner put in before God; or, if forced to this at last, even still some allegation of the littleness of the sin, and of the greatness of the temptation, will be found on the lip or in the heart, in order to diminish the guilt, or to mitigate the sentence. Now, because, in reality, all this is but to transfer the sin back to God—and, in some way or other, to lay it at his door, it became absolutely necessary that God should not only exhibit the full detail of the curse, but that he should deprive the sinner of the scene of blessedness with which he had been originally endowed; that sin and misery thus meeting together, in the memory of past joys, and the pressure of present sorrows, might become as medicines in the hand of the great Physician, for working out, in mercy, the sinner's final cure; that the miserable exile might desire a better country; the unhappy outcast a father's home.

But is not this 'driving' out of the man from

Eden, the sad and terrible emblem of the final sentence against impenitent souls, to whom the Judge, on the throne of his glory, shall say, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire?' Here sin and misery are in temporal, there in eternal union! But miserable sinners though we be, while here our state is never hopeless. Here the cherub guard is not only withdrawn from the tree of life, but Jesus says, 'Look unto me, and be ye saved.' And because we were under the curse, he himself became a curse for us; and because we were in sin, he himself 'bare our sins in his own body on the tree;' and because we were in misery, 'he bare our griefs, and carried our sorrows;' and because we were exiles and outcasts without rest from our profitless toils, Jesus therefore said, and says, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'

Let us then flee to the refuge, to lay hold upon the hope set before us! Once were we, in Adam, expelled from Eden; now are we, in Jesus, invited, entreated to return. Let us linger no more—let us doubt no more. He who was and is just to punish—was and is also mighty and merciful to save. He who righteously 'drove out the man,' is the same who, in grace, restores him to glory.

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,' Mat. xi. 28.

SOME parts of scripture seem specially intended either for particular characters, or special circumstances. Thus the 'twenty-third' has been called 'the child's psalm'—and certainly from the lips, as it were, of 'babes and sucklings,' it has been more frequently heard than any other. Thus the 'hundred and third' has also been denominated, 'the sick man's psalm,'—and how often, 'in the valley of the shadow of death,' it has been a lamp to his feet, and a light to his paths, every one can tell, whom office, duty, or sympathy, has called to visit the bed of affliction, or the house of mourning. But, perhaps, even beyond all these and similar blessed portions, the words upon which our meditation turns, have been employed to give light in darkness, comfort in sorrow, strength in weakness, and even hope in despair. What surpassing beauty, what attractive emphasis in every word! 'Come!' O! why is it not 'Go?' Why not 'depart' from me? 'Come unto me!' To Jesus! The incarnate God, the mighty, the merciful Saviour! 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden.' Toil-worn with your work, down-borne by your burden, 'Come unto me'—but not that I may task you more heavily, as Pharaoh did Israel when he sought for liberty—but 'come unto me, and I will give you rest.' And 'learn of me,' it is added, 'for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls.'

Let us then contemplate, first, the characters invited—'all that labour and are heavy laden.' Since sin entered into the world, labour has been the lot of man. 'And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it—cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee—and in the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread.' The earth, cursed in one place with obstinate barrenness, in another with perverse productiveness, yields only to labour; nor does winter in its cold, or summer in its warmth, afford any interval of relaxation from continuous toil. And 'all this labour of man is for the mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled.' But how greatly is this labour increased, when we contemplate the various arts that man must cultivate, the complicated manufactures in which he must engage, in order to provide the necessaries, conveniences, or comforts of his short and weary life! And how much greater still becomes human labour, when the body almost comes to rest, and the mind, either from choice, habit, or compulsion of circumstances, becomes the labourer in the field of thought. The contemplative investigator of truth alone can tell how true are the words of Solomon when he said—'Much study is a weariness to the flesh.'

But how often is this mental and bodily labour most grievously increased by disastrous disappointments in all our studies, purposes, and plans! How much heavier grows our burden still when we consider those sad bereavements of dear and beloved ones whom we expected to aid in our toils, to share in our successes, to divide our sorrows, or to double our joys! And how grievous becomes our labour, how intolerable our burden, when debilitated by sickness, or tormented with pain!—when 'wearisome nights are appointed to us, and tossings to and fro to the dawn of the day'—when in the 'morning we say, Would God it were even! and at even, Would God it were morning!'

But the most grievous labour and burden of our state ever arise from the power of temptation, and the consciousness of sin. 'The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity, but a wounded spirit who can bear?' This wound of the spirit sin alone can inflict, the conscience alone can feel. This burden alone is intolerable, for every other may be shaken off, or borne up—but sin unre-moved must sink the soul into eternal misery.

Now through the din of all this toil, the vexation of all these disappointments, the tears of all those bereavements, the sufferings of all this sickness, and the darkness and guiltiness of all this sin—there comes a sweet voice of invitation and promise—'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'

This blessed rest has its commencement in the heart. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' 'The peace of God, that passeth all understanding, keeps our hearts and mind.' In that peace, on earth—the peace of a 'conscience sprinkled from dead works'—the soul reposes as Lazarus, in glory, upon the bosom of Abraham. This peace, this rest in the conscience—the real seat of all human joy or woe—immediately pervades and subdues the affections, while it sets them 'upon things above'—removes them from 'things upon the earth,' and diffuses over them the sunshine and the calm of the upper world, of which the renewing Spirit of God is the specimen and the earnest. Then flee away all the terrors of the fiery law, and the rest of victory succeeds to the toils of the conflict. 'For the wages of sin is death, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' Then is subdued and laid prostrate all the power of sin. For when the law—sin's strength—is deprived of its terrors—when we pass from under the ban of the law, and come under the protection of grace—then cannot sin any more 'reign in our mortal bodies that we should obey it in the lusts thereof;' but grace reigns 'through righteousness, unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.' And then enter we into our temporal rest—temporal as to its duration, spiritual as to its nature—and then receive we 'the earnest of the inheritance, even of 'the rest that remaineth for the people of God.'

Come, then, all ye that labour and are heavy laden. You feel your burden—you deplore the galling yoke of the world and of sin—you purpose, one day, to come to Jesus, because you can elsewhere find no rest. O! come!—come!—come now. 'Seek the Lord while he may be found; call upon him, while he is near; let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.'

—
 TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned,' Rom. v. 12.

THAT sin is in the world no one can deny, unless those self-blinded souls who altogether deny its existence. That some men, however, should thus deny the existence of sin, by denying any real and essential distinction between good and evil is nothing more than a proof of what is often found—even that mental aberration upon one point may, in many cases, be accompanied with great powers of discernment and reasoning upon every other. That those who deny the existence of sin are in reality subject to mental alienation, can be easily proved; for let their feelings be outraged, and their influence undermined; let their name be calumniated, or their property abstracted—and then see whether they do not discover the difference between right and wrong, when it ceases to be a point of mere verbal disquisition, and is felt as a matter 'coming home to their lives and bosoms.' In a word, it is vain to deny that there is sin in the world. Idolatry, impiety, contempt of ordinances, disobedience to parents, oppression, cruelty, murder, licentiousness, fraud, cunning, deceit, robbery, lying, and covetousness, are every day assuming a thousand forms both in public and in private life; and though some of these forms some men may excuse, yet others of them every man is daily found to condemn.

Thus into a world created by a God holy, beneficent, just, and omnipotent—we find, beyond all controversy, that sin has obtained an entrance. But how? The scriptures cut short all farther inquiry as utterly unnecessary to the purposes of man, and plainly declare, that 'by one man sin entered into the world,' and that 'by one man's disobedience many were made sinners.'

We say, that to inquire deeper into the origin of sin is unnecessary for the purposes of man, that is, for his renewing and salvation. To the eye of curious research, a deeper investigation may appear desirable—but to him whose chief object is to learn 'what he must do to be saved,' there is neither need, nor time, nor desire, for farther inquiry. The physician who finds a disease the seat and nature of which he does not understand, may find it important or necessary to investigate its origin, in order to its cure; but if he find the patient in extreme danger, and sees not a moment to be lost, he will postpone his researches into the origin of the disease, and employ all his energies to palliate or remove the urgent and most dangerous symptoms.

And so is it with sin in ourselves and others. Sin appears in all. The symptoms are apparent and dangerous; every one an emblem and a fore-runner of death. Till the most urgent symptoms are removed, we have no time for inquiring into their deeper origin; and when they are removed, we are contented to learn what the scriptures discover, that 'by one man sin entered into the world.'

That Adam stood not as an individual, but as a federal head, is obvious; for as he received the blessing of multiplying, and the command of obedience, and the threatening of disobedience, at one and the same time, his obedience or disobedience applied, therefore, to all his posterity. And this fact we see every day illustrated in the occurrences of this life. If a father have an estate, his improvements and his additions descend to his heirs. If he squander or lose his estate, the effects of his folly, or his misfortunes, in like manner descend. Besides, since 'by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin,' we perceive, by simply reversing the order, that where there is death, there must have been previous sin. But we see death in children, therefore there must be sin in children. But, in cases of children dying in early infancy, it cannot have been actual transgression; it must, therefore, be that sin of the whole race which we inherit as the bitter fruit of Adam's first offence.

Now that all men naturally inherit sinful dispositions, is obvious to the eye of every man that examines the world around him. The proof lies in the fact, that in all men, without exception, as soon as action begins, sin begins. But this disposition could not have been the original condition of man. This is proved by reason as well as asserted in scripture. Reason absolutely proves it thus. We find men prone to sinful actions. We find them so prone from youth, from the very dawn of reason. But proneness to sinful actions, cannot arise from any other than sinful dispositions; in point of fact, such proneness is sinful dispositions. Now that God could not have created man so, is obvious—for if he create a being with sinful dispositions, he, as the author of these dispositions, is the author of sin, which is absurd and blasphemous. Man must, therefore, have been created holy; and man must have fallen from his original righteousness. The history, the mode, and the manner of that fall, the scriptures alone supply.

Of the evil of sin, the only natural expositors are disease, pain, and death. What they are to the body, sin is to the soul. They destroy its comfort, they disfigure its symmetry, they waste its beauty, they undermine its strength, they torment it with pain, and they deliver it over as a hopeless prisoner to corruption and to worms. There is this only difference—the death of the body is complete—the death of the soul is with the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched.

'Help, Lord, else we perish!'

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive,' 1 Cor. xv. 22.

THERE are two Adams mentioned in scripture—the first and the second. 'The first man (or Adam) is of the earth, earthy; the second man (or Adam) is the Lord from heaven. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly.'

Now, the first Adam was the federal head of all his posterity, and in him all his posterity die. The second Adam was also the federal head of all his posterity, and in him all his posterity live.

Our great concern is, therefore, to ascertain what the scriptures mean by 'being in Christ,' for upon that 'being in him,' depends our spiritual resurrection and eternal life. Our Saviour, in the fifteenth chapter of John, explains what is meant by 'being in Christ,' by the union between a vine and its branches. 'I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Abide in me and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.' Paul expounds the same union by a variety of emblems, but by none more specially than by that of the body and members. Hence he says of Christ and believers, 'Ye are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.'

Now, is this dwelling of believers 'in Christ, this union with him, merely figurative, or is it real? We answer—the union is real. This union is real, because, as Paul declares, that believers have access to God the Father ‘by one Spirit,’ they having the same Spirit that Christ possessed.—Christ and believers are one, by that one spirit. Father, Christ and believers are one, by one ‘life.’ ‘In him was life.’ He is ‘that eternal life that was with the Father, and was manifested to us.’ Yea, he is our life; for ‘when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory.’ By one spirit, therefore, and one life, believers are in Christ; and so are they made alive in him.

Therefore as all who are in Adam die, because they are in him, so all who are in Christ live, just because they are in him. The words of Paul do not signify—that so sure as all men die in Adam, so sure shall all men be made alive in Christ. No. But they mean—that so sure as all who are in the first Adam die, so sure shall all who, by the one spirit, by the one life, from the one Father, are in Christ, be made spiritually and eternally alive.

Are we, then, spiritually alive? Paul furnishes the answer: ‘The life that I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God.’ Now, what is it to live by faith? ‘Faith is the ground of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.’ Therefore, to ‘live by faith,’ is to live under the power of the hope of glory: and to live amidst the scenery of this world, but entirely by the principles of a world unseen. Now, these principles of the unseen world are three—First, ‘Christ crucified,’ by whom ‘the world is crucified unto us, and we unto the world,’ and by faith of whom we die unto sin, even as he died for it. Secondly, Christ interceding—for it is ‘because he ever liveth to make intercession for us,’ that we rely upon him, knowing that thereby ‘he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him.’ Thirdly, Christ coming unexpectedly, suddenly to judgment, deliverance, resurrection, and glory. This the believer dreads not, but earnestly prays for, saying, ‘Lord Jesus, come quickly,’ and longs for, and hastes unto, laying aside every weight, and every burden, and pressing onward ‘to the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ.’ Such are the symptoms of true spiritual life in the flesh—an eye ever looking to Christ crucified—a confident reliance upon his continual intercession—with that earnest desire that waits and watches for his promised return, and which, in the midst of all worldly allurements and attractions, never requires more than to arise and trim the lamp, and go in with the Lord to his glorious espousals.

That all such shall be made alive in the resurrection, is evidenced by the fact that they are alive already. Every principle of the spiritual life is the emblem of eternal life. It is more—it is not merely an emblem, it is an earnest, in the putting off of the old man, and the putting on of the new—it is not merely a preparation for the journey to Canaan; it is an actual entrance into ‘the inheritance of the saints in light.’

This inheritance the believer now has in glory, as Abraham possessed the inheritance in Canaan. He received it not in fulfilment, but remained a stranger in the land—but he received it in a promise of the future; and being strong in faith, staggered not at the improbability of its fulfilment. He believed God, and it was counted unto him to righteousness. Now there is nothing in this world so improbable as that a dead body should live. Accordingly when Paul preached at Athens, concerning the resurrection, the philosophers replied in scorn, ‘What does this babbler mean?’ But from the heart of the believer all improbability and uncertainty are cast out. For by faith he beholds ‘Christ already risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.’ He sees that ‘as by man came death, by man came also the resurrection from the dead. But every man in his order; Christ the first-fruits, afterwards they that are Christ’s at his coming,’ ‘when shall come to pass that saying, Death is swallowed up in victory; when the believer shall join in that eternal song of triumph, ‘O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.’ ‘O the height and the depth, the length and the breadth of the love of God!’ ‘For his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath he quickened us together with Christ.’

---

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

‘And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden,’ Gen. iii. 8.

EVERY object around us has its own peculiar voice. ‘The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof;’ and this voice is heard whether in the gentle breeze that scarce shakes the flowers, or in the terrible hurricane that prostrates the forest. The sea has a voice, whether in the rippling wave of the calm and lovely summer day, or in the maniac fierceness of the winter storm. The river has its voice, whether it roll its infant waters amidst the willows and pebbles of some obscure and untrudged glen, or have collected the tributaries of a continent to descend in the thunders of the cataract. Each beast, and bird, and insect, has its voice by which, according to its nature, it inspires either terror or delight. Above all—man has a voice, the oracle of his reason, the vehicle of his will, and the light of his affections. And since God has thus given to the animate and inanimate, to the rational and irrational—to each his peculiar voice, shall God alone, who bestowed these several gifts, be held voiceless and incapable of speaking in words to his creatures? ‘He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that teacheth knowledge, shall he not know?’ And he that giveth voice to his creatures, shall he not speak? And yet there are those who altogether either deny this capacity to God, or else deny that he has ever employed it—and this is infidelity. That is—to admit that every creature around us has a voice whereby either its nature or will is made known; but either that the Creator of all has no voice, or never spoke with it for the instruction of his rational and accountable offspring. Were a father never to speak to his ignorant children to instruct them, nor to his suffering children to comfort them, we must pronounce him either dumb or unnatural—and surely were God so to act to his intelligent creatures, we could form no other judgment of him! But God has, ‘at sundry times, and in divers manners, spoken in time past to the fathers by the prophets; and in these last days has spoken unto us by his Son.’

Why, then, is there infidelity in the world? Just because there is sin in the world. A guilty conscience soon produces a darkened understanding. ‘And men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil,’ and then flee away to every vain imagination and ‘refuge of lies,’ to escape alike from themselves and from God.

All this is wondrously exemplified in the conduct of our first parents when they ‘heard the voice of the Lord God.’ Once had that voice been sweet to the ear of listening innocence; now it sounds terrible in the ear of trembling guilt. Accordingly, when they heard his voice, ‘they hid themselves among the trees of the garden,’ as if the eye of God could not see and discover as far as his voice could sound. This unbalancing, as it were, of the attributes of God, still continues to be one of the chief refuges of every form of infidelity. Our first parents admitted that God could speak, and they did not attempt to escape from his voice—but they forgot, because they desired to forget, that God’s eye could see wherever his voice could reach; that is, that his attributes were all perfect, and therefore, all equal. And so, infidelity, if it admit at all the being of a God, readily asserts and takes refuge in his mercies, while it utterly denies and repudiates the existence and exercise of his retributive justice.

But this melancholy change in the perceptions and feelings of our first parents, indicated no corresponding change in the nature or rights of God. And though the infidel models his God to suit his fancy, or patronise his sins, yet God continues ‘the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;’ ‘a God of truth, and without iniquity, just and right in all his ways;’ ‘forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, but by no means clearing the guilty.’

The conduct of our first parents strongly exemplifies, not only that ‘fear of God which hath torment,’ and the most ignorant attempt to escape from him—but that alienation from God, as an object of love, which soon eventuates in enmity against him as an object of fixed aversion. Alienation from God appears in banishing the thoughts of him from the heart; as it is written of the sensualists—‘God is not in all their thoughts.’ It farther appears in neglect of, or aversion to, his word, so that the sinner thinks of it, and speaks of it as Ahab did of the prophet when he said, ‘I hate him, for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil.’ This alienation farther appears in neglect, or forsaking, of God’s holy ordinances. His sabbaths become a weariness, unless they may be profaned, the word of truth becomes distasteful, unless to be criticised and rejected, while prayer becomes either a lifeless formality, in which the body bends in the sanctuary, while the heart, with the fool’s eyes, wanders to the ends of the earth. But this alienation, we have said, soon eventuates in enmity; even so, saith the apostle, ‘the carnal mind is enmity against God.’ Now this is what men are little willing to acknowledge or believe. Like Hazeel to the prophet, each of them is ever ready to reply to the charge, ‘is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?’ And yet, notwithstanding all this denial, nothing can be more evident, for when ‘God was manifest in the flesh,’ both Jew and Gentile hated him with a ‘perfect hatred;’ and now that he is received up into glory, the name of Jesus is blasphemed, not only among infidels, but he is ‘daily crucified afresh,’ even ‘in the house of his friends.’

From the conduct of our first parents—let sinnara, finally, learn two things never to be forgotten. The alienated sinner has no peace; the impenitent sinner has no escape. Peace must come from 'the blood of the cross;' escape from him who said—'if ye seek me, let these go their way.' Lord, we will no more foolishly attempt to hide us from thine eye; but will humbly confess our sins, for 'thou art faithful and just to forgive, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'

'And, in the shadow of thy wings
Our refuge we will place,
Until these sad calamities
Do wholly overpass.'

— TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? Psalm cxxxix. 7.

The doctrine of the Trinity is the sun of the scriptures, the doctrine of the Spirit, the perfection of the Trinity. The knowledge of 'the Father' conveys us to God in heaven; even as it is written—'Our Father who art in heaven.' The knowledge of 'the Son' leads to God on earth; even as it is written, 'The Word was God; the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory,' or it leads us to a fixed locality in unseen glory where Jesus, in human nature, 'sitteth on the right hand of God,' and whence he shall come again into the world, and 'sit on the throne of his glory.' But the doctrine of 'the Spirit' bears us at once into the immensity—we gaze around, above, below—the earth, the sea, we traverse in our thought—to heaven's utmost assignable height we ascend—thence into the lowest hell we penetrate—but wheresoever we go, still the Spirit of God is there. He is there, never separate from the Father and the Son, but ever in triune and co-equal Godhead subsisting; but, in each varied locality of the universe, we find the all-pervading Spirit still leading to 'the Father' in heaven above, to the Son on the earth beneath, or the throne of waiting or of judgment hereafter, to himself everywhere.

How deep, how mysterious, is the scriptural doctrine of the Godhead! yet how important and glorious, as revealing the economy of salvation! But its depth and mystery derogate in nothing from its evidence, or truth, or value. For all powers within us, and all nature around us, are full of mystery. We know not how our own body grows, lives, or dies. We know not how our spirit thinks, or remembers, or anticipates. We know not how a blade of grass grows, or an ear of corn ripens. We know, from evidence, that these things are so, but 'how' they are so, we cannot tell. Even so is it with the mystery of Godhead. We know, from scripture testimony, that, in Trinity of Father, Son, and Spirit, the Godhead eternally and unchangeably subsists; we see how gloriously the doctrine solves the great problem of a sinner's salvation; and we see how it converts desire into certainty, and builds upon a rock that cannot be shaken; more, for satisfaction of reason, we need not know, and it may be that, in this imperfect state, more of God we cannot know.

The words upon which our meditation rests lead us chiefly to consider the Spirit of God as omnipresent; the other parts of the psalm to view him as omniscient. For if the Spirit of God be everywhere present as God is, then must he know every thing where he is, as God knows; but the understanding of God is infinite—therefore is the Spirit of God omniscient. The knowledge of God, however, with which we are concerned above all others, is his intimate knowledge of ourselves. And of this the Psalmist testifies, 'Lord, thou hast searched me.' How emphatic the word! 'thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my down sitting and mine uprising; thou understandest my thoughts afar off; thou compassedst my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. For there is not a word in my tongue, but lo! O Lord, thou knowest it altogether. Thou hast beset me behind and before, and thou hast laid thine hand upon me. Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell—the state of the dead—' behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, surely the darkness shall cover me: even the night shall be light about me. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.'

Alas! how unlike is this glorious doctrine to the debasing doctrine of our first parents when they 'heard the voice of the Lord, and hid themselves from the presence of the Lord among the trees of the garden!' They did not, for they could not, wait for the shades of night, but they seek a covering from the eyes of God beneath the green leaves of the trees! And so, in some degree or manner, thinks every unconverted sinner. Nay, sometimes so do God's own children think and act—as Peter, when, through the fear of man, he forgot both his own promise and his Lord's presence, and sought first in denial and then by oaths, not only to escape from the danger by which he was pressed, but also to escape from his conscience and his God. But the moment 'the Lord turned and looked upon Peter,'—the moment eye met eye—that moment the omnipresent, heart-searching Spirit of the Lord, was acknowledged, and 'Peter went out and wept bitterly.'

What a near, what an Almighty foe to sin and sinners is the Holy Spirit of the living God—what a confidence must he inspire into the hearts of believers. When they know not what to ask, he 'will help their infirmities and teach them what to pray for as they ought.' He can and he will 'teach them all things,' 'guide them into all truth,' and 'glorify Jesus' in their conversion and sanctification.

While, then, it is every day the design and labour of sinners to escape from God, let it be ours to seek after him more and more, and ever to draw nearer and nearer to his immediate presence.

But if God be everywhere, how can we approach nearer to him? Yes, God, our Creator, is every where, but God as new Creator, is only in Christ Jesus. For 'if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature'—a new creation—'old things are passed away; behold! all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ.' For 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them,' having 'made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.'

'All mine iniquities blot out,
Thy face hide from my sin:
Create a clean heart, Lord, renew
A right spirit me within.

'Cast me not from thy sight, nor take Thy Holy Spirit away;
Restore me thy salvation's joy:
With thy free Spirit me stay.'

—
TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression,' Rom. v. 14.

DEATH reigned, says the apostle. 'Art thou a king then?' it may be asked. He is a king—he is the king of terrors. Death's dominion over this fallen world, as it is legitimate in its origin, absolute in its exercise, and resistless in its effects, so is it wide as the world's extent, and lasting as the world's duration.

The reign of death is legitimate. His is no usurped authority. He is a king by right, and by divine right too. Men have, of late years, disputed much about the legitimacy of earthly dynasties; some recognising no source of kingly power but the capricious voice and fickle will of the people, while others, reviving the exploded ideas of non-resistance and passive obedience, seem almost to maintain in seriousness what has been ascribed to them in satire, 'the right divine of kings to govern wrong.' But be the true principle of the legitimate power of earthly monarchs what it may,—the rule of death over sinners is legitimate beyond all controversy. A time indeed there was—alas! how short!—when death was not our natural or rightful sovereign—when he was unknown on the earth except by name—when, to use the language of an ancient Jewish writer, 'the generations of the world were healthful, and there was no poison of destruction in them, neither was the kingdom of death upon the earth; for righteousness is immortal.' But no sooner did unrighteousness enter, than by it, and with it, entered death. Look at man in paradise, and you see there the reign of life—life dispensing to obedient man happiness in every form—perfect health in his body, perfect peace in his soul, and perfect enjoyment from their continued union without the fear of dissolution. But sin reigned unto death; and now, upon man's expulsion from Eden, you see life lying dethroned and dishonoured in the dust; and upon the ruins of the broken law the Law-giver erects and establishes a throne, which death ascends, that he may thence wield his ruthless sceptre over mortal man. Be it never forgotten then, that if death reigns over us, it is by an authority which, though delegated, is divine, even the authority of him 'by whom kings reign, and princes decree justice.'

The sway of death over mortals is absolute and irresistible. 'Where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may say unto him, "what dost thou?"' The wrath of an eastern despot is said to be as 'the messengers of death,' insuring swift and sudden destruction. Yet the mightiest tyrants may be resisted, and often have been resisted with success; but who of mortals can resist death? Who hath striven with him and conquered? If he once issue the summons: 'Arise and depart'—it matters not where, nor when, nor how—that summons must be obeyed. He can no more be overcome by violence, than subdued by intreaty; promises do not allure, threatenings do not awe, tears do not melt him. No human skill nor human strength can blunt his dart, nor could the wealth of worlds purchase one moment's exemption from his stroke. The king on his bed of state is as open to his assaults as the beggar on his bed of straw; and with the same ease that he enters the meanest hovel, he enters the kingly palace with its turreted battlements, and making his way through bolts, and bars, and hosts of armed guards, he reigns over royalty. Sinner! you may spurn every other yoke, you may throw off every other control, you may conquer every other enemy, but know that you are already death's doomed victim, and the yawning grave's assured prey.

Death's empire over sinful men is universal. There have been many extensive dominions, but his is the only really universal monarchy that has ever been on the earth. No country, no character, no condition of life, no age, and no circumstances, can withdraw us from his domination, or save us from his power. And it is specially noted by the apostle here, that he has reigned, as we know he continues to reign, over infants—over those who do not live to commit actual sin like Adam, but who, by reason of their connection with and descent from him, carry within them the seeds of moral depravity, and consequently of bodily corruption; for whenever you see a human body dead, be it only the body of a new born infant, that 'body is dead because of sin.' There is perhaps nothing we are called to witness so mournfully and mysteriously affecting as the agonising sufferings which infants sometimes endure, and the death in which these sufferings often terminate—so often, indeed, that it is a well known law of mortality that a great proportion of the human race die in infancy. The eye of the babe opens to heaven's light, and is then sealed in darkness; or if he is spared a few months to complete his span, it is only till his little tongue can lisp a parent's name, and then be silent in the grave. Ye Jacobs and Rachels! bereaved fathers and mothers, who have seen a darling child pining away with a sickness that was too plainly unto death, or convulsed with paroxysms of suffering, which harrowed up your souls, and were rendered doubly terrible by the inability of the poor babe to tell its distress but by the most piercing cries; ye who have had to hang over an infant's agony so intense and protracted, as to make you, who gave it birth, willing, anxious, thankful, to hear the last sound which proclaims release from pain and life together; say, as you were compelled to witness a scene like that, which rent your heart's core with an anguish that could only find relief in the assurance that the beloved of your soul lay in your arms a shattered and lifeless corpse,—O say what that accursed thing must be, which, under the government of an All-merciful and Almighty God, can entail such evils.

The empire of death, as it has been co-extensive with human existence since the fall, so it will end only with the world's dissolution. Adam, the first man, 'lived nine hundred and thirty years,' but—'he died,' and so did his more immediate descendants, each in his turn. Enoch, indeed, the seventh from Adam, on account of his signal piety, was translated, that he should not see death; and the extreme longevity of his son Methuselah might excite the expectation that the power of death was, in some measure, to be broken; but he also, when within thirty years of completing his tenth century, fell before the destroyer. Think of the countless generations over whom 'death reigned from Adam to Moses.' What proofs of his power did not the flood exhibit! 'Tis the carnival of death; 'tis the vintage of the grave!'—a whole world of victims, among whom, as in Nineveh, there would be many who, from their tender age, 'could not discern between their right hand and their left.' In the overthrow, by fire, of the cities of the plain; in the engulfing of Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea; in the strewing of the wilderness with carcases in heaps by the sword, the pestilence, and the fiery flying serpent, what do we see but death reigning from Adam unto Moses? Nor since that period has he for a moment ceased to reign. There have been long-lived kings, and long-enduring kingdoms, but the only perpetual dynasty is that of death; and he is immortal on this earth until the day when it shall be burnt up. We every where see how he tramples to dust plants and animals, man and man's works; and even those Egyptian pyramids that appear to defy his destroying rage, are but the trophies of his might; for are they not the sepulchres of kings? monuments at once of man's frailty, and of death's conquest.

We too are the subjects of death. And what are we but the copies, so to speak, of long-vanished human beings, our prototypes in body and mind? and after us others will be born, who will again look, and feel, and think, and act, and suffer exactly as we do, and over whom death will again reign.

Yet is there hope in Israel concerning this thing; and if the view of sin and its deadly consequences humbles and grieves us, we shall be the better prepared to welcome and embrace the message which proclaims the 'reign of life by one, Jesus Christ.'

—
 TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ,' Rom. v. 17.

WE have seen the reign of death by Adam; let us now contemplate the reign of life by Christ. If misery follows naturally in the one case, much more will happiness follow in the other. If pollution has been communicated, much more will purity; if wrath has been transmitted, much more will love; if the condemnation of many has been the result of one offence, much more will the justification of many be the result of one atonement; if by one man's disobedience we became sinners, much more by the obedience of another shall we be made righteous; if death reigned by the sin of man, much more shall life reign by the grace of God.

Mark the grand source whence this life emanates:—it is the free gift of the grace of God. That is a point which seems to require little proof. For if we are all sinners against God, and lie under his deadly curse, how can life ever come to us but as a favour gratuitously bestowed, because wholly undeserved? Where is the merit to purchase it? Where is our atonement for past guilt—where our security for future obedience? Where is the willingness to save ourselves from sin if we could—where the ability to save ourselves if we would? 'By grace are ye saved!' is a principle which lies at the very basis of the Christian scheme. It is involved in every scriptural account of man's natural condition; it is revealed in every proclamation of the glorious gospel; it accords with the uniform experience of every humble Christian; it is the implied sentiment of every devout prayer, and the sweet burden of every spiritual song; it is that which animates the praises of the sanctuary below, and will form the exhaustless theme of rejoicing in the temple above, where as the foundation has been laid, so the head-stone shall be brought forth with shoutings, crying, 'Grace, grace unto it.'

But in order to that glorious consummation, think what a large measure of grace must have been previously imparted! It is the reception of 'abundance of grace' which entitles to and prepares for the 'exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' The God who is rich in mercy, and abundant in goodness and truth, gives to his people to enjoy all spiritual blessings in rich abundance, and overflowing fullness. Does he pardon sin? He 'abundantly pardons.' Does he bestow the renewing influence of the Holy Ghost? He 'sheds it down abundantly.' Does he bless Zion's provision? He blesses it 'abundantly.' Did his Son come that believers might have life? It was 'that they might have it more abundantly,' when to all of them an entrance shall have been 'ministered abundantly into his everlasting kingdom.' And oh! what a scene of grateful rejoicing shall then be witnessed, when this mystery of God's grace shall be finished in God's glory. Think of the myriads who shall shine in brightness and beauty before the throne. Reckon up, if you can, the amount of real good that shall have been bestowed upon each through grace; and estimate also the imaginary good, but real evil, that through the same grace shall have been withheld. Endeavour to conceive of all the means and appliances in providence and redemption that shall have been successfully put in operation for their benefit. And say, is not the grace that shall in ways so mysterious have effected a result so blessed, well termed 'abundant grace?' And when the many who have received, who are receiving, and who shall yet receive this grace shall meet, and mingle, and rejoice together, will not that be a noble anthem that shall rise from all heaven's borders, when 'this abundant grace shall, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God.'

The apostle, however, specifies one particular gift of grace, which, of all others, may be described as the one thing needful, inasmuch as it constitutes at once the title to heaven, and the meetness for heaven's enjoyment. It is 'the gift of righteousness.' Now what is righteousness, but just that conformity to God's law, which He, as the Lawgiver, Governor, and Judge of the moral universe, can never fail to require? Even a human magistrate, if he allows a delinquent to escape with impunity, is held to be virtually conniving at the crime, and to be in spirit a partaker with the criminal. And shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Shall not He visit for sin? Or shall it be proclaimed through all the worlds of his wide dominion, that allegiance and rebellion, obedience and disobedience, virtue and vice, are regarded by him with equal indifference? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid! Then might the Deity as well cease to reign, as promulgate a law guarded by no penalties, enforced by no sanctions. But blessed be his name! in his dealings with us sinners, he announces a method by which his justice and mercy, his holiness and love, are made to harmonise gloriously, and in which he exhibits himself as a just God, yet a Saviour; as just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus. In the finished work, the obedience unto death of his incarnate Son, we discover how he made him who knew no sin to be a sin-offering for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Hence that gift of righteousness which is given unto and put upon all them that believe—even the righteousness which is called 'the righteousness of God,' because by him devised, provided, accepted,—his law being thereby fulfilled, his justice satisfied, his government vindicated, and the high honours of his throne maintained.

But while this is the only righteousness that can furnish a title to eternal life, there is another righteousness, the gift of the same grace, which is no less indispensable as a qualification for heaven's bliss. The one is that righteousness which having been wrought out and brought in by another, is imputed and received by faith; the other is that personal righteousness, that inherent holiness which is wrought in every believer by the Spirit of promise, who is a Spirit of purity, and without which 'no man shall see the Lord.' Did the gospel indeed assure a man that grace will abound to him though he continue in sin; did it profess to save him in his sins, and not from them; had it nothing to do with the heart, the will, the life,—then you might conceive of a sinner delivered from the fire of hell, and yet as much resembling as ever, in spirit and temper, the devil and his angels. But this holy word of life knows no such characters. In providing for our peace, it secures our purity; in redeeming the soul from death, it renews the heart unto a new life; in justifying the person, it sanctifies the character; in changing the condition, it transforms the man; in exhibiting Jesus as a substitute in order to righteousness imputed, it also reveals him as a purifier in order to holiness implanted. And out of the fullness of grace which it hath pleased the Father should dwell in him, his people receive, even grace for grace; wisdom, peace, love, joy, strength, patience, grace in time of need, grace sufficient, yea 'abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness.'

Come we now to the glorious issue of all in another world. 'Shall reign in life.' There is royalty, and there is immortality. Immortal royalty! that is the gift by grace which shall so abound unto many, in order that where sin abounded grace may much more abound. As sin had reigned unto death, and death had reigned over the sinner, so now grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life, that the sinner, deemed righteous and made righteous, may reign in glory. Under no figure is the happiness of heaven more frequently set forth, than under the idea of a kingdom, to denote the high degree of perfection and power to which Christians shall with their forerunner Christ be exalted. This reign is the subject of assured promise. 'I appoint unto you a kingdom, even as my Father hath appointed unto me.' It is the object of believing expectation. 'If we suffer, we shall also reign with him.' It is the theme of grateful praise. 'Unto him that hath made us kings to God!' Hence the crown of righteousness laid up by the righteous Judge; hence the crown of glory to be bestowed by the chief Shepherd; hence the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him. And that may indeed be termed the crown of crowns, which is incorruptible, unfading, eternal. 'Doth the crown,' asks Solomon, 'endure to every generation?' Earthly sovereigns, though enjoying the most vigorous health, and the most prosperous reign, may nevertheless be said to reign in death. Never are they secure from the attempts of open violence, or the inroads of insidious disease; and one or other of these things will one day terminate their life and their reign together. But the reign of saints in glory will emphatically be 'the reign of life,' the conscious reign of life; and it will doubtless form one of the sweetest and purest ingredients in their cup of enjoyment to know that nothing can possibly happen to interrupt or disturb it from without or from within, no sickness, no sorrow, no separation, no death. Theirs will be the life worth the living for, consisting of an immortality, not of being only, but of bliss,—higher than the delights of Eden, equal to the joys of angels.

THIRTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Ah sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil-doers, children that are corrupters!' Isaiah i. 4.

Of whom speaketh the prophet this? Of a nation of idolatrous heathens? No, but of God's chosen Israel, whom he had sought out as a people for himself, to be to him a name and a praise. How deep were their obligations! how distinguished their advantages! Them he had brought forth with a high hand from the house of bondage. He had led them safe through the depths of the sea and the dangers of the wilderness. He had subdued their enemies before them, and given them secure and peaceful possession of the delightful land—had fenced them about with covenant-privileges, and blessed them abundantly with covenant-blessings. Theirs was the only country where Jehovah, the one God, living and true, fixed his gracious residence, vouchsafed his special presence, recorded his great name, revealed his holy will, established his pure worship, and manifested his excelling glory. Yet see how unsuitable and ungrateful were their returns! Instead of seeking to fulfil their high destiny,—‘of the Rock that begat them they are unmindful,’ and they have forgotten the God who had chosen them to receive such peculiar and exclusive honours. While the surrounding nations pertinaciously adhere to their respective delusions, each one walking in the name of their god, the only people who enjoyed the light of revealed truth, constantly endeavour to extinguish or obscure it, and change their God and glory for lying vanities. And so darkened and degraded do they at length become, that their indulgent, but incensed, Father must here make to heaven and earth the touching appeal, ‘I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master’s crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.’ He then charges them with their accumulated guilt as a nation. They were not merely ‘sinful,’ but ‘laden with iniquity;’ not merely ‘evil-doers,’ as to the outward act, but polluted in their hearts; deceivers and being deceived—corrupted themselves, and the ‘corrupters’ of others.

Here then is a melancholy proof of the innate depravity and desperate wickedness of the human heart, in that a whole nation persisted with one accord in departing from the living God, though they enjoyed every advantage for seeking his favour, and securing his blessing. This is the very inference which the prophet himself drew from the mournful fact of his country’s apostacy. If they had ‘forsaken the Lord, and provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger, and gone away backward,’ or as the margin reads, ‘had become alienated,’ the cause of all this was to be sought for in the mental and moral disease of which they were the victims. ‘The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no soundness.’ Sin is the plague-spot of creation; it perverts all our faculties, and paralyses all our powers; it is the corrupt tree yielding corrupt fruit; it affects and influences, yea, it moulds at the root all our principles, aims, motives; our feelings, affections, and desires; our temper, conversation, and conduct. And O let us never forget, that it was nothing but this leaven of depravity, spreading wider and deeper through the Jewish nation, and pervading the whole mass, that led them, at last, to fill up the measure of national guilt and national punishment, by the rejection and crucifixion of the promised and expected Messiah. In the history of God’s chosen people we see exemplified this eternal truth, that as with righteous men, and righteous bodies of men, it shall be well, so with unrighteous men, and unrighteous bodies of men, it shall be ill; and as their corporate capacity ceases with this life, so it is in this life that the Judge of all deals with them. The deed of the Jewish rulers, confirmed as it was by the cries of the infuriated populace, and the continued unbelief of the great bulk of the nation, drew down upon them, as a people, the fearful judgments which had been denounced. God took away both their place and nation; their beloved house was left unto them desolate; they were scattered throughout all lands, without a country or a home; and to this day they remain an astonishment, and a bye-word, and a hissing, and a reproach—testifying to the remotest corners of the globe at once the depravity and the degradation of ‘the people laden with iniquity.’

But are we, as a nation, verily better than they? Are not all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, under sin? We call ourselves a Christian people, but is the grand fundamental truth of religion, namely, the supremacy of God, generally admitted, and practically acted upon in our national affairs? Is God in all or in any of our national thoughts, feelings, aims? Is he duly acknowledged in our national counsels, or our national acts? Is he gratefully owned in public mercies? Is he humbly adored under public calamities? Is there a distinct and devout recognition of the Supreme Being, either by the governors or the governed? On the contrary, have not too many of our national deeds shown contempt of his high authority, and disregard of his holy law? And when the majority of a country manifestly acquiesce in the iniquitous acts of its rulers, then, in the sight of other nations, and in the sight of the King of nations, the guilt contracted becomes that of the country at large.

But in endeavouring to estimate the degree of our national depravity, we are bound to mark, not only the deeds of our rulers, and the grosser vices that abound among the people, but to conceive, as we best can, of the aggregate amount of sin committed by the entire community. Let each man isolate himself from the mass; let him search his own heart, and try his own ways; and if he engage in the scrutiny in a faithful and honest spirit, he will discover not only that he is a sinner, but that, considering all his advantages in this highly favoured country, he is a sinner before God exceedingly. Now if the sum of individual trespass be so great, what must be the amount of national transgression? Is it not manifest, that to us, no less than to Israel, does the description apply, that we are 'a sinful nation, a seed of evil doers.'

The sins of others we cannot, indeed, repent of, but we may well be filled with shame and confusion of face on account of the humbling proof they afford of the depravity of our common nature; and we ought also to feel deep contrition, that we have not used all the endeavours we might have done to arrest the progress of abounding iniquity. But if our own personal sins have greatly swelled the amount of national trespass, of them we may repent—of them we ought to repent. Let reformation begin at home. Let every man study the secret plagues of his own heart, and the besetting sins of his own character, and be found mourning apart as in dust and ashes. The same God who here spake to Israel, now speaks to us, saying, 'Wash ye, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes. Cease to do evil; learn to do well. Seek judgment; relieve the oppressed; judge the fatherless; plead for the widow. Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.'

THIRTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not,' Eccl. vii. 20.

This is a clear and authoritative declaration of the sinful character of all men, and of the imperfect obedience of the best. It does not deny that there are, on the earth, those who, in contradistinction to the great mass of mankind, may be described as comparatively 'just,' pious, holy. It admits that these do good, much good, but it likewise intimates that they do evil, much evil, and that continually; yea, that in all the good they do, there wanteth not sin. It thus explodes the absurd idea of moral perfection being found to exist here below; it even precludes the supposition of its ever being attained in this life. 'There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good,' and even in the good that he doeth, 'sinneth not.' There is not a just man upon earth, who, along with the good that he doeth, doeth not much evil also.

Nor does this assertion stand alone in the bible; it is confirmed by other passages no less explicit. 'There is none righteous, (i. e. absolutely or perfectly just;) no not one. There is none that doeth good, (without sin) no not one. There is no man that liveth, and sinneth not. In many things we offend all; in all things we fail and come short of the glory of God.'

This testimony of scripture is confirmed by universal observation; for where, with the exception of one who was more than man, was there ever seen in our world a perfectly spotless life, a completely sinless character? Had such a man appeared, he could not fail to have attracted the admiring wonder of his cotemporaries, who would have transmitted with honour to posterity the memory of so rare a prodigy. But though the earth has existed for several thousand years, and during that period millions of men have been born, yet in no age and no country has there been found among those born in Adam's likeness, a single example of one 'who did no sin.'

And from universal observation let us pass to universal experience. Every man is, in a greater or less degree, conscious of guilt; is persuaded that he has left undone those things which he ought to have done, and that he has done those things which he ought not to have done. Every man is, on account of this conviction of present guilt, at some time or other apprehensive of future punishment. Every man who makes the attempt to abstain from all evil in thought, word, and deed, and to do his whole duty perfectly, finds the endeavour accompanied with great and insurmountable difficulties. Yea, who dare pronounce any one good work of man absolutely perfect, and without sin? Who will be bold enough to maintain, that his obedience, in any one instance, meets and answers the demands of that law which is spiritual, and reacheth unto the thoughts and intents of the heart? Who will presume to affirm, that in his best service there is no admixture of infirmity and imperfection? Who is there among the sons of men, who, in the review of any single transaction of his life, can lay his hand upon his heart and declare, that not only was the outward deed blameless, but that all the motives and feelings connected with it, both as to the matter and manner of the performance, were blameless too, and were such as would, in every respect, be regarded as perfect, not only in the superficial estimate of his erring fellow-creatures, but in the sight of the holy and heart-searching Judge, with whom we have to do?

But in farther confirmation of the truth here stated, we appeal to the universal confession of sin, (for by all it is acknowledged in words,) and to the peculiar emphasis and deep feeling with which it has always been confessed by the truly pious of every age. The more enlarged the acquaintance they have obtained with the extent and spirituality of the divine law, and the more they have studied in contrast with this, their individual dispositions and character, the more clearly have they perceived, and the more bitterly have they lamented their many short-comings and transgressions. Go back to the Old Testament saints, and witness holy Jacob. 'Few and evil have been the days of the years of my life.' Witness Job: 'If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me. If I say I am perfect, it also shall prove me perverse. I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' Witness Moses: 'Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.' Witness David: 'Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions.' Witness Isaiah: 'Woe is me, for I am undone, for I am a man of unclean lips.' Witness Jeremiah: 'Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? Let us search and try our ways.' Witness Daniel: 'O Lord, righteousnesses belong unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, because we have sinned against thee.' Witness Nehemiah, in a prayer, too, uttered in reference to his good deeds: 'Remember me, O my God, concerning this also; and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy.'

Turn we to New Testament saints, and we find the same humble and ingenuous acknowledgment. Simon Peter, overawed by the presence and power of the holy Jesus, exclaimed: 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord.' The beloved disciple John testifies: 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.' Even Paul, when distinguished by the highest measure of spiritual attainment by mortal ever possessed, is nevertheless heard groaning out the complaint: 'I find a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me.

O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'

Yea, it is worthy of remark, that as if to place the fact of man's sinfulness beyond all doubt and controversy, the word of God, in recording the errors and faults of the saints of old, exhibits them as at times failing most in the exercise of that particular grace or virtue by which, in general, they were most eminently characterised. Abraham, the father of believers, gave way once and again to unbelieving fears. The man Moses was 'very meek above all the men upon the face of the earth,' yet even he was overtaken by sinful anger, and spoke unadvisedly with his lips. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, but it was Job who cursed the day of his birth. Solomon was wiser than all men, yet how egregiously did he play the fool! No disciple more tender and loving than John, yet it was he who joined with his brother in proposing to call down fire from heaven to consume an entire village of Samaritans. No disciple so bold and undaunted as Peter, yet Peter alone denied his Master. Lord, what is man!

Do not all these considerations lead to the conclusion, that if corruption and depravity were merely of occasional and accidental occurrence, there would surely be some exceptions; but as no exceptions have ever appeared within the knowledge or the memory of man, we must infer, that the corruption is corruption of nature, that the depravity is depravity of heart. Seeing then, that the perfect law of a perfect God demands a sinless righteousness, which is not to be found in sinful man, let us renounce all dependence on our own doings, in whole, or in part. Like a humble Christian of former times, let us 'lay all our good works and all our bad works in a heap together, and let us flee from it to Christ the Saviour, that in him we may find sweet peace.' And let us rejoice in knowing that these imperfections of the 'just man' are found only 'upon earth!' In heaven the spirits of the just are 'made perfect.' There the people are all righteous. 'The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity.'

---

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?' Jer. xvii. 9.

THAT is not the language of figure, but of fact. It is not a hasty complaint uttered by some sullen misanthropist, nor a charge brought against any one individual, because deemed pre-eminent in wickedness. For the credit of our common nature we might wish it were possible to soften down the terms in consistency with truth; but that may not be, for no expressions can be less liable to misconstruction, than those which are here employed, by the great Searcher of hearts, to describe the lamentable condition to which our hearts have been reduced through sin. What that condition is we can only hope to know aright by divine teaching.

Men are represented in the bible, as 'deceivers, and being deceived,' hypocrites in regard to others, deluded in regard to themselves. From every quarter are we exposed to the influence of deception. We live in a deceitful world, where we tread on enchanted ground, and are in danger, every moment, of sinking into quicksands. Riches are deceitful; they promise happiness, but yield only anxiety. 'Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain;' the notice of the great, and the friendship of the good, are alike unsatisfying and uncertain, and so is all honour, save that which cometh from God. Yet these things are but passive instruments of deception, from which the heart takes occasion to deceive itself; for it is in its own nature 'deceitful above all things.' Were it not, indeed, for the deceitfulness of our own weak and wicked hearts, neither a deceitful world nor a deceitful tempter would prevail so much against us.

'Who knoweth the mind of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him?' And yet it is precisely that, by which alone we can truly know ourselves, which may most mislead us in the study. The hearts of others we know not at all, and of our own the little knowledge we possess, or can attain to, is limited, and very confused. In watching the suggestions of the mind, in analysing its feelings and motives, and in reviewing its operations, we may be said to resemble him who 'saw men as trees walking,' so indistinct and erroneous are our perceptions. Yea, not only is the heart in itself deceitful, it is full of deceivers. By him who alone knows it, it is declared to be 'corrupt according to the deceitful lusts.' Our every vicious principle, our every unhallowed propensity, our every depraved habit, is a deceiver, and leads us into captivity as much by art as by violence. Sin, indeed, generally, is represented as a deceiver; it dares seldom appeal to the understanding, but insinuates itself into the affections, first intoxicating the soul, and then polluting it; and no wonder then that the deceitful heart should become so 'desperately wicked.'

There is scarcely an object within the range of human thought or feeling respecting which man is not prone to err, and be mistaken? But most of all are we in danger of being deceived in judging of ourselves. The generation that existed in Solomon's days has never become extinct—the generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet are not washed from their filthiness.' We are apt to imagine that we excel in moral beauty, and are rich in spiritual attainments, while, in God's sight, we are 'wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.' We approach the throne of mercy, not with the prayer, 'God! be merciful;' but with the self-gratulatory acknowledgment, 'God I thank thee that I am not as other men;' and 'thinking ourselves to be something when we are nothing, we deceive ourselves.'

How frequently do men's hearts deceive them with regard to the nature of their religion! A fierce persecutor will persuade himself that he is doing God service, when killing his people. A degraded idolater will give his first-born for his transgression, the fruit of his body for the sin of his soul. 'He feedeth upon ashes;' a deceived heart hath turned him aside, so that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, 'Is there not a lie in my right hand?'

How deceitful is the wicked heart as to the fearful progress of indulged sin! Who upon his first entering upon a vicious course, ever duly contemplated whither it would lead him? A prophet looked earnestly in the face of Hazeal, and burst into tears. In fancy's eye he saw him mount the throne of Syria over the murdered body of his sovereign. Hazeal shuddered at the thought of a crime so repugnant to his present feelings, and exclaimed, 'What! is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?' And yet he was not slow in fulfilling his predicted destiny.

How deceitful is the heart in blinding us to our danger when we expose ourselves to the contagion of vice! Young persons, especially, imagine they may 'stand in the way of sinners,' and yet be secure from sin. But 'be not deceived; evil communications corrupt good manners.' 'Can a man take fire into his bosom, and yet his clothes be not burned? Can a man go upon hot coals, and yet his feet not be burned?' Did we rightly know the weakness and treachery of our own hearts, instead of going to the full length of what is lawful, we would hate the very garments spotted by the flesh, and abstain not only from the practice, but from the bare 'appearance of evil.'

How deceitful is the heart in filling us with an overweening conceit of our own wisdom, and a presumptuous confidence in our own strength, whether for duty or trial, for service or suffering! 'He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool;' so said the wisest of men, Solomon, and he lived to exemplify the truth of the maxim in his own person. 'Though all men,' said Peter to his Lord, 'be offended in thee, yet will I never be offended. I will go with thee to prison and to death.' Alas! in a few hours he denied, with oaths and curses, that he had ever known him.

How deceitful is the heart in concealing or palliating the baneful effects of sin in this world, and its dreadful consequences in the next! The sinner, in following his own heart's lusts, dreams of nothing but pleasure; he is tempted with the bait while the hook is kept out of sight. And even when, by a sense of sin's present bitterness, the conscience is awakened to a sense of future danger, how ingenious is the deceitful heart in devising the means of lulling it asleep into a false and fatal security. It suggests that the evil is not so very great after all; that there are many as bad, if not worse, than we are; and that it will be time enough to think of preparing for judgment when we receive warning to die. But 'be not deceived; God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.'

Well might the prophet ask, 'who can know it?' Even a heathen has told us that 'know thyself' came down from heaven. None can fathom the heart's depths, or explore its windings, but the omniscient God, whose pure but mysterious workmanship it originally was. 'I, Jehovah, search the heart, I try the reins.'

'Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me; and lead me in the way everlasting.'

---

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh,' Ezekiel xxxvi. 26.

How aptly and beautifully do God's promises and man's prayers illustrate and respond to each other! He gives the command; 'Make you a new heart!' The command excites the prayer, 'Create in me a clean heart, O Lord, and renew a right spirit within me.' The prayer draws forth the promise; 'A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you.'

What is the grand characteristic of the old heart, so deceitful and desperately wicked? It is a 'stony heart.' Take up a pebble, and feel it. How cold! how hard! how utterly destitute of sensation and life! If you try to bend it, it will break sooner than yield. If you strike it, it will resist, and seem almost to return the blow. If you lay upon it a burden, it will be sensible of no weight. If you apply to it a seal, it will take no impression. You may break it, or grind it to powder, still it has all the qualities of a stone, a lump of insensible matter, without vital warmth, vital energy, or vital motion.

Such-like, according to the testimony of God, is the heart of every unrenewed sinner. It is as hard as the nether mill-stone—cold, obdurate, senseless, unsusceptible as the rocky adamant. And hence when it is brought into contact with any of the great spiritual truths of the bible, there are no corresponding vibrations, no suitable emotions; every thing about it betrays the torpor of insensibility and the chillness of death.

Now in the illustration that is here presented, of the vital change effected in regeneration by the Holy Ghost, we may trace a striking analogy between man's animal and mental economy. That organ in the human frame which we call the heart, our Maker has constructed of a soft, elastic, fleshy substance, and it is necessary it should be so formed, in order that it may carry on with regularity its important functions. Were it to lose any part of its flexible fleshy texture, the circulation of the blood would be greatly impeded, if not altogether stopped; and, as is well-known, this is what really happens in the fatal disease called the ossification of the heart. That disorder consists in some parts of the heart becoming indurated or changed into a hard, bony substance, and by that means an impediment is given to its free motions, and the energy of its action is gradually diminished, until it wholly ceases to beat. See, then, how well the word of God is illustrated by his works. As a hard and stony heart could not possibly carry on the process of circulation, so when He, who makes all things new, engages to renovate the old man, we perceive with what beautiful propriety he promises to take away the ossified and useless organ, and to substitute the heart of flesh—soft, muscular, pliable, regular in its movements, and thus capable of circulating through the new and spiritual man, all the holy truths of his word, and all the blessed influences of his grace.

Mark the Author of the change. It is none other than God himself. He expressly and emphatically claims the work as his own. True religion, both in theory and practice, is of divine origin. It never would have had an existence in the world without the revelation of God, and it never will have had an existence in our souls, unless by God's 'working in us mightily.'

Observe the completeness of the change. In this disease of the heart all palliatives are inadequate; the cure, to be effectual, must be radical. To think of modifying and reforming a heart of stone were vain and hopeless. The induration which has produced the callousness that is described as being 'past feeling,' must be made to disappear; the ossified organ must be taken away, and a fleshy heart restored. Such, accordingly, is the remedy here promised and provided. A new heart, a new spirit—that is what is bestowed on all who are born again. Designed as they are for new work and a new world, they must obtain a new nature. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold all things are become new. The Testament Christ hath left us is a New Testament. We have in it a new and living way of access to God; a new name, a new priesthood, a new commandment, a new promise; new sacraments, a new sabbath, a new song. And we look for a New Jerusalem, in the new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Now in order that we, ourselves, may be made conformable to all these new and glorious arrangements, we too must be made new. Hence the command; 'Be transformed by the renewing of your minds. Put off the old man, and put on the new; serve in newness of spirit, walk in newness of life.' And hence the promise; 'A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you.'

Not, however, that in this promise of a new spirit, there is any thing intended like a destruction of the soul's identity. The change spoken of is not a natural, but an intellectual and moral renovation. The faculties remain substantially the same, but a new and spiritual influence is impressed upon them, a new and heavenly bias is given to them, and new, even divine strength, is imparted, for their right direction, and their proper employment. The renewed spirit has new perceptions, by which he sees himself as a sinner, ruined indeed, yet redeemed, and discovers, in the gospel, the light of the divine glory in the face of Jesus Christ. He has a new understanding, enabling him to discern spiritual things in a spiritual manner. Hence he recognises and adopts a new rule of judgment in forming his estimate, both of men and things, viewing them no longer in the deceitful twilight of time, but in the manifesting light of eternity. He obtains, also, a new will, causing him to delight in the law of the Lord after the inward man; and along with this new spirit he receives a new heart, which implies the renovation of all the feelings and affections of the soul, leading him to hate sin because of its turpitude, and to love holiness because of its beauty, and to desire heaven because there the people are all righteous.

Now as the characteristic of the old heart is, that it is a heart of stone, so the characteristic of the new heart is, that it is a heart of flesh. No longer insensible to divine things, it is a soft and feeling heart. Is it brought into contact with the word of God? The tender heart, like that of good king Josiah, is humbled on hearing God's words. Is it brought into contact with sin? The heart that is waxed gross feels little; the conscience that is seared as with a hot iron feels nothing; but the tender conscience, like the apple of the eye, is offended with a mote. Is it brought under the influence of affliction? The same fire which hardens the clay will melt the wax. 'My flesh trembleth because of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments.' Is it led to view the sins of others? 'Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because men keep not thy law.' Is it led to view the miseries of others? It feels for them, and with them, rejoicing with those who rejoice, and weeping with those who weep. And the tender sympathising heart will always be accompanied with the tongue of kindness and the hand of bounty.

Let us beware of mistaking the real nature of this spiritual transformation. It is not a change of creed, but of character; not new manners, but a new mind. It is not to be confounded with warm sensibilities, or temporary emotions. Pharaoh, Saul, Ahab, Judas, obtained 'another' heart, but it was not a new heart. The new heart is one that can feel after God, and find him, and is sensibly alive to the 'powers of the world to come.' It is the subject of new principles, motives, and aims; it glows with holy love, it beats with holy ardour, it prompts to holy obedience.

'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Reader, how is it with you? Are you renewed in the spirit of your mind? Are you grieved at the hardness of your heart? Here is a promise, full without limitation, and free without exception. One thing only is requisite, but that one thing is indispensable; it is that you plead the promise in prayer. For it is in reference to this very assurance that the declaration is made at the close of the chapter; 'Thus saith the Lord God, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them.'

F E B R U A R Y.

FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them,' 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

AN object, though within the ordinary sphere of vision, may be rendered invisible to us in various ways; as by the want of light to make it manifest, by the loss of eyesight to perceive it, or by the intervention of other objects which conceal it from the view. The glorious orb of day, however conspicuous and splendid in itself, 'shines not unto' the man who is blind, or who is immured in a dungeon, where its cheering beams never enter. And in like manner the object here mentioned by the apostle, though it not only stands revealed in clearest brightness, but is itself the light which maketh manifest, yet by multitudes remains unperceived, for unto them it shineth not—from them it is hid.

What is the object in question? It is 'the light of the glorious gospel of Christ who is the image of God.' The sun in the firmament appears an impressive emblem of the divinity—an image of the resplendent lustre, the inexhaustible energy, the all-pervading penetration, the ever-present influence, the rich bounty, the unchangeable perpetuity of the 'Father of lights,' the Dispenser of all good. And in the absence of revelation, we need scarcely wonder that this illustrious display of the Deity should be adored as God. Yet here is one who looketh forth as the morning, clear as the sun, fair as the moon, yea, altogether lovely, of whom it is said, 'Let all the angels of God worship him!' He is the image of the invisible God, the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person; the Sun of righteousness, the light and life of men. In beholding his gospel, the people who sat in darkness saw a great light. By the doctrines he preached, the precepts he inculcated, the example he exhibited, the death which he died, and the prospects which he unfolded, he dispelled the darkness of heathenism, and the gloom of Judaism, and upon them who dwelt in the region of the shadow of death, he caused light to arise.

What a contrast to this Declarer and Revealer of Deity, God manifest in flesh, the Light of the world, is presented in the 'god of this world,' the prince of darkness. He it was who led astray our race at the first; and the whole world is still said to 'lie in the wicked one.' He is the evil spirit that even now worketh in the children of disobedience, who 'walk according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air.' As he leads them captive at his will, and holds them as his bond-slaves, they may be said to serve him as their lord; and hence he is called the prince of this world, the god of this world. Not that he is the world's rightful governor—far from it; but how then does he retain his usurped and despotic authority? It is by blinding the minds of the unbelieving world, so that, (such is the emphatic import of the original) 'the illumination of the gospel of the glory of Christ may not beam upon them.' Well does he know, that one single ray of light from heaven, one glimpse of the divine glory in the face of Jesus Christ, would break the charm, and shiver his yoke in pieces. He knows that if God is once pleased to 'reveal his Son' in a sinner, that sinner will not continue submissive to satan's government a moment longer. And, therefore, he has recourse to wiles and snares, devices and depths, by means of which he makes them account that their most perfect freedom which is in reality the most inglorious vassalage, the severest bondage.

The apostle had been describing the veil that is on the heart of an unbelieving Jew; but he now intimates that besides the natural veil that is spread over all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, satan employs other expedients to obscure their views of gospel truth, and bar the entrance of gospel light into their minds. Of these the most common and the most fatally successful, are the things of this present world, which are fitly represented as a thick veil, woven by this world's god, and hung by him over the mind's eye of his votaries. There is the veil of deceitful riches, the power of which is so great, that a rich man can hardly see the attractive glories of the kingdom of heaven, so as to seek to enter therein. No less dangerous is the love of money to a poor man, whether it be money desired, or money to the smallest amount possessed; a coin of the basest metal placed upon the eye as effectually closes up its vision as a piece of silver or gold. Then there is the veil of worldly pleasure, 'the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye,' the indulgence of which so brutifies the soul in the world of sense, as to annihilate its perception of the world of spirit. There is the veil of worldly honour, fame, and power, the ambitious 'pride of life,' which dazzles so as to blind, saying, 'all this glory will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.' And there is, too, what operates with scarcely less influence, the veil of worldly cares, corroding anxieties, and bitter disappointments, 'the sorrow of the world,' which 'worketh death,' and instead of opening up the mind to the light and hopes of the glorious gospel, seals it up in the black darkness of despair.

Nor are these the only methods the god of this world employs to hide the gospel from 'the wise and prudent' who own his sway. There are 'spiritual wickednesses,' as well as 'fleshly lusts.' One man he puffs up with a conceit that he knows enough already, and may therefore neglect, with safety, all means of obtaining farther information. Another he stimulates to the gratification of his corrupt affections and depraved propensities, whether of flesh or spirit, that he may neither have leisure to study, nor inclination to understand the great truths of the bible. Another he fills with prejudice against the gospel of free grace, as not only erroneous in itself, but derogatory to the dignity of human nature, and hostile to the interests of morality; while God's ministers are branded as hypocrites or madmen, and God's people as fanatics and fools. At one time satan will represent the Almighty as too merciful to punish, and at another time as too just to pardon; and thus he either lulls the soul into a false security, or unhinges it by an enervating and cheerless despondency, which, though seen in different persons, are both equally characteristic of 'them who believe not.'

And what is the awful result of this spiritual blindness? When the gospel is hid from a man, he is lost. How can it be otherwise—seeing it is the only gospel of salvation, and reveals the only name given under heaven among men where-by they can be saved? And it is no light thing to be lost and perish. The benighted traveller is lost and perishes in the wintry storm. The wanderers through the sandy and trackless plains of the east, are lost in the depths of the interminable wilderness, and being disappointed of the expected well, lie down to die. The mariner becomes a castaway and is lost, who approaches, in the dark, a shore unknown, without a friendly beacon to guide his course. Yet all these are but faint and feeble representations of the dreadful fate of the man who is lost, because the gospel is hid from him through the blindness of his mind. Departing from the source of life, what can his doom be but death? Shutting out the glorious light of heaven, what can be expected of him but that he be cast into outer darkness, and be there left to wander on, and be lost in the blackness of darkness for ever?

Sinner! does the light of the glorious gospel shine to you? Have the scales been made to drop from your eyes, and the veil from your heart? Has your spiritual vision been purged of every film? Has He who, in creation, commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shined into your heart, to give you the light of the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ; and in his light do you, in some measure, see light clearly? Then be thankful for the privilege, and anxious to improve it. Let your light so shine before men, that they, seeing your good works, may glorify your heavenly Father. Beware lest, though once enlightened, satan again obtain the advantage over you, so as to blind your mind, and harden your heart. Pray habitually for the increasing illumination of the Holy Ghost, that by more enlarged and heart-affecting discoveries of the grace and glory of Christ, who is the image of God, you too may be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord; and so shall your path be that of the just, which as the shining light, shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son,' Col. i. 13.

Two dominions are here spoken of, and placed in contrast—the kingdom of darkness, and the kingdom of light. Every man in this world is the subject of one or other of these kingdoms; there is no middle state between them; 'he that is not with me,' says the Son of God, 'is against me.'

How important for every reader to ascertain to which of the two he belongs!

Here is the kingdom of darkness, the domain of satan, who is pre-eminently 'the power of darkness,' that is, the prince or sovereign who possesses the power. When Jesus was betrayed by a false friend, and seized by the hands of violence at the dead of night, he said to those who sought his life, 'This is your hour, and the power of darkness'—a deed of darkness, befitting the season you have chosen for its perpetration, and emanating from him who is the ruler of darkness. What was the object of Paul's commission to the Gentiles? It was 'to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God.' Before we can be made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, we must be delivered from the power of darkness. Christians are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, that they may show forth the praises of him who hath called them out of 'darkness' into his marvellous light. The apostle, in describing the conflict they have to maintain in standing against the wiles of the devil, says, 'We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness, (or wicked spirits) in high places.'

Now under this dominion of darkness all men are by nature. Ever since the apostacy in Eden, satan, the prince of this world, has swayed his iron sceptre over blinded, deluded man. As light is the emblem of knowledge and joy, so darkness is the emblem of ignorance and wretchedness. As darkness wraps up visible objects from our bodily eyes, so ignorance hides the true nature of things from the eyes of the mind. Light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; but there is nothing more unpleasant in itself, or more commonly associated with the idea of terror, than the gloom of night, and so the term darkness came likewise to be used to denote the feeling of horror and misery. In this sense, therefore, the power of darkness is nothing else than the tyranny which the devil exercises over his wretched and captive slaves, filling their understandings with error, and their consciences at one time with insensibility, and at another time with affright. The depth of his abyss vomits forth, as it were, a black and dense vapour, which conceals from them heaven and its blessed brightness. It was thus that he turned all the heathen nations from the service of their Maker; first obscuring, and then extinguishing those sparks of divine knowledge they yet retained—until so gross was the darkness, that men were not ashamed to fall down before the works of their own hands, and converted that earth which the Creator God had formed to show forth his praise, into one vast temple of idols. Great is the power of darkness in encouraging and concealing vice. 'He that doeth evil cometh not to the light.' Need we wonder then that the heathen of ancient times, like the heathen of our own day, not retaining God in their knowledge, should have given themselves over to the vilest abominations, which are fitly represented as 'deeds of darkness'—'the unfruitful works of darkness?' So thoroughly was the pagan world pervaded by this character, that they are spoken of as the darkness itself; 'Ye were sometimes darkness.'

Yet why limit the description to pagans? Though Paul had been a well-instructed Israelite of the strictest sect, and touching the outward righteousness of the law was blameless, he yet here includes himself among those who had been under the 'power of darkness.' And not to speak of the many heathens at home—adulterers, profane swearers, drunkards, sabbath-breakers, persons given to covetousness, which is idolatry—are there not thousands and tens of thousands who, though nominally Christian, are as much under the power of darkness as was Paul before his conversion? for they have not the knowledge of God, and the love of God is not in them.

Professing Christian! if the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness! and how great too its power in misleading you into error, and exposing you to danger! Yes, and unless removed by divine illumination, it will surely end in the horror of great darkness hereafter—the blackness of darkness for ever—the outer darkness, so called because it consists in perpetual banishment from Him who is the light and life of men.

But from this power of darkness true Christians are delivered—the original word denoting that exertion of power which is put forth in snatching a person from imminent peril. God, by the illumination of his truth, and the energy of his grace, rescues them from the darkness and chains of the spiritual Egypt, and gently leading them by the hand, introduces them into the kingdom of his well-beloved Son.

What a contrast between these two kingdoms! The one of darkness, the other of light; the one of pollution, the other of purity; the one of discord, the other of peace; the one of death, the other of life. 'Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.'

Here then is another distinguished privilege in the covenant of redemption, namely, the being made the honoured and happy subjects of the King of Zion. For God might have been pleased, in the exercise of his sovereignty, to have delivered the sinner from the dominion of satan, and then left him in possession of a liberty like Adam's, and like him liable to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage. But no!—'if the Son make you free, ye shall be free indeed.' This kingdom is called that of God's Son, because he is at once its divine Founder and its glorious Head; he alone can procure for us a meritorious title to the inheritance of the saints in light, and he alone can produce in us an adequate meetness for its enjoyment. None can become heirs of God, but by being first made, through a soul-uniting faith, joint-heirs with Christ; and then all things are theirs, for they are Christ's and Christ is God's. He is his dear Son, in whom he is ever well-pleased,—his eternal delight; and, therefore, he will withhold nothing from him or from his. 'The Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me.' 'Father! I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am to behold the glory which thou hast given me.' 'Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

Who is it that effects this marvellous and blissful translation? It is none other than God himself, for none other than He could accomplish it. If we then have reason to hope that we are the subjects of it, unto Him let us give all the glory, and let us be careful to live worthy of so high a calling, and so noble a destiny. 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. But if we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.' 'Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord. Walk as children of the light, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Walk honestly as in the day, putting off the works of darkness, and putting on the armour of light.' As the subjects and servants of the Lord Christ, be valiant for his truth and his cause on the earth, in opposition to all the powers of darkness. The Son of God was manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and his followers war the same good warfare. Each one of us must, in the end, present himself as fresh from the conflict, or be denied to mingle in the eternal joys and triumphs of the conquerors in the world of light and glory.

SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them,' Gal. iii. 10.

WHAT is the law that bears a sanction so terrible? It is the law of God, the moral Governor of the universe. He has formed us rational and responsible beings. Breathing into us the 'breath of lives,' he has made us spirits, endued with reason, conscience, immortality. He has given to us, in that character, a law to observe as the rule of our conduct towards him, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves. That law, being a bright transcript of his own moral perfections, is, like himself, holy, and just, and good. We are bound to observe it by every consideration of duty, gratitude, and interest, for it is the will of our wise Creator, our mighty Preserver, our kind and unwearied Benefactor; and obedience to it is identified with our real happiness, here and hereafter.

Mark we then, the wide extent of the law's demand, and the awful nature of the law's penalty.

Its demand is obedience in all things, obedience always; that is, obedience perfect and perpetual. It requires the strict and unflinching performance of all things 'written in the book of the law'—meaning by that, the moral law summed up in the ten commandments, as unfolded in all their spirituality by the Son of God, the Lawgiver, Incarnate. With respect to our duty to God, it tells us, that he will endure no idol in our hands or hearts; that he will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images; that as holy and reverend is his name, so we must ever think and speak of Him with that solemn awe and deep veneration which his character is so well fitted to inspire; and that, claiming as his own, yet blessing for our good, the seventh portion of our time, he will have us duly to hallow it, and greatly to delight in it. But along with piety to God, his law prescribes righteousness and peace, mercy and truth towards our fellow-men. It calls upon us, in the various relations of domestic, social, and public life, to cherish and display respect to superiors, condescension to inferiors, kindness to equals, honour and love to all. Forbidding all violence and impurity in action, word, or thought, it intimates, that causeless anger is of the nature of murder, and that a lascivious glance is of the essence of adultery. Condemning all dishonesty and fraud, either in deed or in desire, it enjoins the most steadfast uprightness, the most unbending integrity. It bids us lay aside all malice, and guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and evil speakings, and all lying, holding our neighbour's reputation as dear to us as our own. Finally, it requires of us that our conversation be without covetousness, and that we be content with such things as we have. And in all these things it requires us to continue always, with constant, unremitting, persevering diligence. It demands of us, that this perfect obedience be perpetual, reaching from the beginning of life to its close,—the same in youth, in manhood, and in old age—the same under all circumstances of temptation, difficulty, and danger—the same in our days of sickness and poverty, as in our days of health and wealth; and in addition to all this, it utters, with stern rigour, the announcement, 'He that once offendeth in one point is guilty of all;' because by that one act of offence he shows that he is destitute of that love to God, 'with all the heart, and soul, and strength, and mind,' which is the 'fulfilling of the law.'

Now be it carefully noted, that this statement of the extent of the law's demand, cannot be at all affected by the question of the creature's inclination or disinclination, or his consequent ability or disability to fulfil what it requires. The provisions of the law are one thing—the character of those who may be under it is another; and be that character what it may, it cannot, in the least, impair the law's integrity, detract from its authority, nor relax its obligations. If their character be good, the law requires nothing more than obedience—if bad, it will be satisfied with nothing less. In matters of human legislation, shall we propose to ascertain what is legal or illegal by consulting, not the statute-book of the realm, but the diversified opinions and feelings, inclinations and conduct, of those for whose government the law is designed? The laws of man, indeed, are constantly undergoing change, and frequently prove inoperative in consequence of human imperfection; but as the Deity is perfect, we cannot suppose Him to promulgate an imperfect law, nor to be satisfied with imperfect or temporary obedience. Nor is there any part of his word, which gives the least countenance to the idea, that since the fall, or by reason of the death of Christ, the law is relaxed in its requirements, so as to be accommodated to the weakness of man. Had such an intimation been given, it is evident, that every man would have interpreted the latitude to which he might indulge in sin, according to his peculiar and besetting propensities; and the only thing which would have remained as law, would have simply been what nobody felt any strong disposition or inducement to violate. But it is at our peril that we bring down the high standard of obligation from the strict requirements of the commandment which is spiritual and exceeding broad—the claims of which are founded on divine, unchangeable righteousness, and which is stable as the pillars of Jehovah's throne, immutable and eternal as Jehovah's existence. Sooner shall heaven and earth pass away, than one jot or one tittle pass from his holy law; sooner shall the Deity cease to be than cease to demand a perfect obedience to that perfect law, by which satan is as much bound in moral duty to-day, as at his first creation—however disinclined he may be to attend to any one of its injunctions.

Such being the law's demand, let us now look at the penalty it threatens in the event of disobedience. It is a curse, even the curse which stands written at the end of the same book; 'Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them; and all the people shall say, Amen.' The curse is opposed to the blessing; and as a blessing implies the enjoyment of good, so a curse implies, not only the privation of good, but the endurance of evil. When He who is the Source and Bestower of all happiness blesses a man, that man cannot fail to be happy; and when He curses a man, even by simply withholding his blessing, that man cannot fail to be miserable. For the malediction of God is not a mere imprecation of evil, which, in the mouth of a creature, might be only a vain and impotent wish. As his curse is never causeless, so it is never fruitless. It always carries its effects along with it, and ensures every misery which it denounces or foretells.

Among the Hebrews, however, this word curse would call up certain more definite ideas of punishment, which took their rise in the irrevocable nature of votive offerings. When a gift was presented to the Lord by any worshipper, not only was the thing offered separated from a common to a sacred use, but it was pronounced to be irredeemable, and thus became as really lost to the offerer as if it had been actually destroyed. Hence arose the two ideas of separation and destruction, as connected with the word devoted or accursed; and both are included in the curse of the broken law. There is the curse of separation—the being excommunicated from God's holy and happy creation—the being expelled, like the first murderer, from the presence, and deprived of the friendship of God himself. 'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God.' And is there no curse in that?—to have him, who was our kindest Father, for our greatest foe—to be deprived of a parent's blessing, driven from his door, and left to wander as disinherited outcasts far from our native home—to hear the dread words, 'Depart, ye cursed!' and to see a great and impassable gulf fixed, cutting us off for ever from the society and the bliss of heaven—in a word, to 'be banished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.'

For there is the curse of destruction as well as of separation. A thing devoted was irrecoverably lost; and to prevent even the possibility of redemption, if it was a living thing, it was 'surely to be put to death.' It is even so here. The man who forfeits the favour of the God of happiness, is devoted to certain destruction. 'They who are far from God shall perish.' Not, however, that we are to understand by this the annihilation of the sinner's being. No; but the annihilation of his happiness, the destruction of that which alone deserves the name of life, that which alone is worth the living for, namely, peace and enjoyment. Hence it is called the 'being lost,' 'the dying the second death.' The exact quality of the punishment we may be unable fully to understand; its undefined nature invests it with unknown horrors; but the plainest testimonies of God's word leave us no room to doubt, that it will consist in inconceivable anguish both of soul and body. And it will be coeval with the happiness of the righteous, for the self-same word is employed to describe the duration of both; that word is everlasting.

To beings so circumstanced, how cheering ought to be the announcement, that there is one 'who redeems from the curse of the law, by being made a curse for them.'

SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree,'
Gal. iii. 13.

We have seen the extent of the law's demand, perfect and perpetual obedience; we have heard the awful sanction by which this demand is enforced, namely, a curse from God, implying the loss of his Fatherly blessing, and everlasting destruction from his presence. It is only in so far as we are rightly impressed with these facts, and perceive clearly our own personal demerit as transgressors, that we shall cordially welcome the glad tidings of a Redeemer from the law's curse, by having been himself made a curse upon the tree.

The allusion here is obviously to the kind of death which Jesus died, when he hung a self-devoted victim upon the cross. Nothing had, at one time, been more unlikely, than that the people would allow him to be put to death at all; nor could it well have been anticipated, that, in the event of his being cut off by an oppressive judgment, he would suffer a punishment which was scarcely known among the Jews, but was peculiar to the Romans, and was by them inflicted only on robbers, rebels, and such like notorious criminals. It was a death held by the Jews in the greatest possible execration, being reckoned not merely ignominious, but for a special reason accursed. That reason is to be found in a provision of their criminal code, which, while it inflicted no punishments that would stamp perpetual disgrace upon the living, yet allowed in certain cases a brand of infamy to be affixed to the bodies of those who had been punished with death. One of these was the suspension of the corpse upon a gallows or tree; and the person thus suspended was called 'the curse of God,' or the accursed of God, being deemed an abomination in his sight. In this the vilest class of infamous punishments the Jews reckoned death by crucifixion, inasmuch as, after the body was dead, it 'hung upon a tree.'

How may we escape the wrath and curse of God due to us for sin? Can we deliver our own souls by any works of our own performing? No! we can hope for no redemption from the curse by our own doings, because we cannot obey perfectly and perpetually in the future, any more than we have done in the past; and even though we could, still our future obedience could no more atone for past sin, than the ceasing to increase a debt will cancel a debt already contracted. Nor can we hope for redemption from the curse by our sufferings, any more than our doings, seeing that the penalty of one transgression is eternal death. Nor could the most exalted seraph, the highest archangel, have redeemed us from the curse, for if he could have done so, God needed not to have sent his Son. None but Christ was sufficient for this great work, but he has proved all-sufficient. He assumed our nature, occupied our place, met all the claims of law, satisfied all the demands of justice. Did the law insist on complete obedience? He has yielded it, by working out and bringing in an everlasting righteousness. Did justice threaten us with the law's penalty, the curse? 'Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us.'

Here is an assertion no less clear than authoritative, of the grand doctrine of substitution, imputation, redemption by suffering and sacrifice. That we might live Christ died; that we might be happy he became miserable; that we might inherit the blessing, he submitted to the curse. He was our Redeemer by becoming our Surety—acting, enduring, dying for us, and that not merely in a general way as our Benefactor, but in our room and stead.

'He that is hanged is the curse of God.' We found that the curse to which we are exposed as transgressors, includes separation from God, and destruction from his presence. To both these horrible evils was the innocent Lamb of God subjected on behalf of sinners. He was emphatically called the Nazarene, 'the isolated one,' the Joseph separated from his brethren. He left the seat of glory, his Father's house, his eternal home, and dragging himself away from its holy joys and high communions, became an exiled outcast in this world of misery. How often was he a solitary wanderer, spending whole nights alone upon the mountains, far from the busy haunts of men, who 'hid, as it were, their faces from him!' How few companions had he here below! and at the last, even they all forsook him and fled. And when the closing scene of his agony and death arrived, 'he looked for comforters, and there was none.' Not only was he driven forth from the holy city, and excommunicated from the congregation of Israel, but as he hung upon the accursed tree, severed at once from earth and heaven, he was excluded from the gracious presence and blissful fellowship of his Father, God; and while the surrounding darkness was a fit emblem of the state of his own soul, deprived of heaven's light, bereaved of heaven's comfort, he exclaimed, out of the depth of his forlorn desolation: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'

His, too, was the curse of 'destruction,' inasmuch as he was devoted to death, as well as to suffering. 'The Messiah was cut off, but not for himself;' he was cut off, not out of the congregation only, but 'out of the land of the living;' for the transgression of the people was he stricken. This grand truth had been typically represented under the ceremonial law, by what was done on the day of atonement. The high-priest took two goats; over one of them, called the scape-goat, he confessed all the sins of the people, 'putting them upon the head of the goat,' and sent him away into the wilderness; and 'the goat bore upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited.' The other goat was sacrificed to make expiation for sin; so that while in the one we see the curse of separation into an uninhabited desert, in the other we see the curse of being devoted to destruction. Now, in both these respects, Christ was made a curse for his people. 'He his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree.' 'God made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.' 'As the bodies of those beasts, whose blood was brought into the sanctuary by the high-priest for sin, were burnt without the camp, so Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.' As the scape-goat was sent forth into the wilderness, far from the commonwealth of Israel, so Christ, our substitute, was expelled from Jerusalem, the type of the congregation of the living, and was led forth to Golgotha, 'the place of a skull;' to Calvary, a hill of infamy, a desert of death. He was treated as one lying under the heaviest excommunication—as one who was accursed to the death—as not only unfit to live, but as unworthy to die within the precincts of the holy city, unworthy even to look with his closing eyes toward's God's holy temple.

Learn from this, Christian soul, that if the Christ was made a separated, devoted curse, it was for you; that voluntarily, and from the love he bore to you, he consented to be cut off from the communion of the blessed. He left Jerusalem, the city of peace, in order that you might enter in, and find there safety and establishment for ever. He went forth to Golgotha, the place of public execution, the spot where was raised the accursed tree, the dismal abode of infamy and death, in order that you might escape eternal death and endless infamy, and be raised to life and honour everlasting. Yes! and it is even there, when surrounded with all death's hideous memorials, and when enduring death's severest pangs and most degrading ignominy, that he redeems his church from death's sting, which is sin, and from the curse of the 'strength of sin,' which is the law. Even then and there, with the cold dews of death upon his brow, he raises the standard of the once accursed but now honoured cross; for the very shame of the punishment serves but to evince the love and exalt the glory of Him who submitted to it—enduring the cross, despising the shame.

The enjoyment of this redemption, however, is not co-extensive with exposure to the curse. He only that believeth shall be saved. 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' If any man love not the Lord Jesus, he shall be 'Anathema Maran-atha'—accursed at his coming!

THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'The wages of sin is death,' Rom. vi. 23.

THE labourer is worthy of his hire, and the soldier of his wages; but the hire of iniquity is punishment, the wages of sin is death. 'When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.' 'What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed! for the end of these things is death?'

There is the death of the body. No sooner did our first parents commit sin, than they received in themselves the sentence of death, and that sentence has also been executed upon all their sinful offspring, with only two exceptions. The law of mortality is universal and unavoidable, 'because all have sinned.'

How frequently has a holy God inflicted instant death on the presumptuous transgressor in a way of judgment! Remember Lot's wife, and Korah and his company, and the sons of Aaron and Eli, and Ananias and Sapphira, and many others, whose awful fate is recorded in the book of God, and acknowledge, as you read, that verily there is a reward for the wicked as well as the righteous, that verily there is a God who judgeth on the earth! The same truth has been exemplified in the history of communities as well as of individuals. Look at the world before the flood, at the men of Sodom and Gomorrah, at the Egyptians who perished in the sea, and the Israelites who perished in the wilderness. They all toiled laboriously in the service of sin, and they reaped its stipulated wages.

And if we could trace the avenging progress of the angel of death now, we should find the destruction of many a sinner effected in the self-same manner. Liar! swearer! Sabbath-breaker! glutton! drunkard!—what security have you that the next time you utter words of falsehood, or take God's name in vain, or profane his sacred day, or abuse his good creatures to the fulfilment of your base lusts—you shall not receive, in the very act of sinning, the just recompense of your deeds?

But even when sin is not immediately followed by death as a judgment from God, it often, in various other ways, does work out death as its certain consequence. There is a natural tendency in many vices to hurry on the perpetrator to an early, premature grave. We read in the bible that 'bloody and deceitful men do not live out half their days.' Sometimes their passions impel them to the commission of crimes, which bring them to an untimely end by the hands of public justice. Dissipation and licentiousness not only waste the substance, but ruin the health, clothe a man with rags, and bring him to a piece of bread. Habits of sensual indulgence visibly undermine the bodily constitution; and in the bloated countenance, the emaciated form, or the trembling gait, you at once read the sin in the punishment. To how many fatal accidents does intemperance expose its votaries? How many bodies are found dead or drowned, that are recognized as the bodies of drunkards, who have administered to themselves the slow but sure poison? Nor are these the only methods in which this life, so short at the best, is by the sinner rendered shorter still. Lazy inactivity and luxurious ease enervate the body as well as the mind, and are as prejudicial to health as to happiness. 'Envy,' says the wise man, 'is the rottenness of the bones.' Fretful peevishness, corroding worldly cares, and vexing anxieties, the habitual indulgence of anger, malice, revenge, —all these tend more or less to shorten life; for though the results may seem more remote and are less easily traced, the effect is no less certain. Not one in a thousand is supposed to die a purely natural death; the greater number either directly or indirectly hasten on their dissolution. How many have we known who, there is every reason to believe, would have lived a longer life had they lived a better! They might have enjoyed a good old age, had it not been for their dissolute youth, and their profligate manhood. Some, indeed, of a similar character you may see dragging on their miserable existence for years, but their appearance lamentably testifies that they are filled with the sins of their youth, which shall lie down with them in the grave. In all such cases, therefore, the sinner may justly be regarded as a self-murderer,—acting as if he wished to anticipate his final judgment,—forcing for himself a passage into hell, that in its flames he may be tormented 'before the time.'

For that, after all, is sin's final wages;—not the death of the body only, but the death of the soul, the destruction of both soul and body in hell-fire. That is the ultimate hire of those who toil to life's end in the service of iniquity; as is evident from its being here placed in contrast with the 'life eternal' given by God through Christ to those who, being made free from sin, become the servants of righteousness.

And what is the second death? We cannot tell. It is one of those tremendous realities, which must be experienced in order to be described; it is one of those facts which our faith admits without being able to explain. We do not know—God forbid we ever should—the feelings of the impenitent soul, as it passes out of the body through the gloomy valley of the shadow of death into the broad day-light of eternity, and discovers in the full blaze of that light—that it is lost! This only do we know, that it will be for ever dying without ever becoming extinct,—that it will be for ever living in misery and for ever seeking annihilation, but shall not find it; for the punishment will consist not in the extinction of being, but of happiness and of hope.

This death is as certainly due to the sinner as are wages to the labourer; it is sin's appointed and appropriate recompense. Were not this the due reward of evil deeds, the God of justice would not have assigned it; and were it not to be actually inflicted, the God of truth would not have threatened it. If we knew fully all the obligations sin has violated, all the excellencies it has insulted, all the dire effects it has produced, and will yet produce, throughout the universe, we should then have some adequate conceptions of its odious malignity and its deep demerit. But there is One who knows these things full well, and in his judgment respecting sin's exceeding sinfulness, namely, 'that they who do such things are worthy of death' let us humbly acquiesce, believing that it cannot but be according to truth. In the great day of the revelation of his righteous judgments, His awards shall be made known and vindicated before an assembled world; the convinced and condemned sinner will then be speechless; and the Judge of all the earth will be justified when he speaketh, and clear when he judgeth.

'The wages of sin is death.' Nothing our fancy can picture, or our fears apprehend, can exceed the amount of misery which is represented by the being 'bound hand and foot and cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth—where their worm never dies, and their fire is never quenched—where they have no rest day nor night—and where the smoke of their torment goeth up for ever and ever.' May the God of mercy have mercy upon every reader, that he die not the second death!

---

THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'But the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord,' Rom. vi. 23.

LIFE for our Death! the very blessing we require. Yet it would be a comparatively low and limited view, were we to regard this as implying merely the restoration of animal life and immortality to the body at the last day. Looking at the word in its fullest and highest acceptation, it must be held to include the spiritual life of the soul here, and the immortal life of soul and body in that glorious state of endless happiness which remains for the people of God; it is 'life eternal.' Death, we saw, is the wages or hire of sin, but it is not said that life is the merited wages, the deserved reward, of righteousness. No! it is a gift, a free gift of the grace of God. True, indeed, it is bestowed only on certain characters, but the formation of that character is itself the work of the Spirit of God, and to him, therefore, belongs all the glory. 'Now, being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.' Yet there is no proportion between the obedience of the highest saint, and the boundless, endless bliss of heaven, which could entitle him to any such reward. It is a reward not of debt, but of grace, and the very holiness which qualifies for its enjoyment, yea, and even the faith which humbly receives it, are not of ourselves—they are the gift of God.

The perfect freeness of this gift is farther apparent from the medium through which it is conveyed, viz., through Jesus Christ our Lord. 'As by man came death, by man also comes life.' This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son,' as a treasure sealed up and secured—life hid with Christ in God. And, therefore, as he who has the field has the treasure, as he who has the fountain has the water, as he who has the garden has the 'fruit, so 'he that hath the Son hath life.' Yes! it is a sublime and solemn truth, that the eternal Son of God is possessed in the highest and most important sense, not by the worlds that are upheld by his power, not by the heavens that display his glory, not by the angels that worship before his face, but by the lowly heart that bows to his grace, and rejoices in his salvation. To such he is the Resurrection and the Life—the resurrection of the body, and the life of the soul; for transforming the spirit by the energy of his grace, he shall, in due time, change the vile body also, and 'fashion it like unto his own glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.' Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!

This eternal life is 'through Jesus Christ,' inasmuch as he purchased it for us by his death. To us it comes in every sense free, without money and without price, but dear did it cost our suffering Lord. If we are to live, he must first die. 'The bread which I give is my flesh, which I give for the life of the world. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day.' That we might be rich he became poor; that we might have fullness of joys, he became a man of sorrows; that we might be heirs of glory, he became acquainted with grief.

This life eternal is 'through Jesus Christ,' inasmuch as he publishes it to us by his gospel. 'I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not walk in darkness, but have the light of life.' He was the life manifested; in him was life, and the life was the light of men. When many of his followers, 'being offended at the spirituality of his doctrine' on this very point, went back and walked no more with Jesus, he said unto the twelve, 'Will ye also go away?' Then Simon Peter answered him, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life; and we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God.' The beloved disciple John bears his solemn testimony respecting 'that which was from the beginning, which he had heard, which he had seen with his eyes, which he had looked on and his hands had handled of the Word of Life.' And he himself, the Witness, faithful and true, declares that power has been given him over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father has given him. 'And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.'

This eternal life is 'through Jesus Christ,' inasmuch as it is he who produces in us its commencement here, and prepares us for its consummation hereafter. Unto him, as accepted High Priest and exalted King, is committed the entire dispensation of the Holy Ghost,—the ministration of 'the Spirit;—and by virtue of this 'law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus,' the Son quickeneth whom he will.' Hence it is that he is so often spoken of as being 'the Life,' in the abstract. 'When Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then ye shall also appear with him in glory.' He obtained it by his death, he announced it by his gospel, he imparts it by his Spirit. He is all our salvation in time, and will be all our praise in eternity.

What is the gift which is to be thus freely bestowed by God through Christ on his believing people? It is 'eternal life;' but all that is included in that expression we can no more comprehend than we can conceive of all the misery that is threatened in that 'eternal death' to which it stands opposed. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' Suffice it to observe, that it consists in deliverance and exemption from all possible evil, and the possession and enjoyment of all possible good—and that throughout eternity.

There is the removal of all evil. 'They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.' They rest from their labours and their sufferings together. There is no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither is there any more pain; for the former things are passed away.

There is the fruition of all good, and especially of the chief good,—the beatific vision, and holy service, and blissful fellowship of the Deity. They are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. The powers of their minds being purified and perfected, they will search all things, yea, the deep things of God, with unceasing attention and unwearied delight—exchanging the feeble and indistinct conceptions of earth for the living light of heaven. There no darkness shall cloud the mind, no impurity defile the heart, no effort exhaust the vigour, but in ever-growing assimilation to the image of the Blessed, they shall realize with ecstatic rapture the fullest gratification of their desires, the highest consummation of their hopes. Him whom not seeing they love, they shall then see 'as He is;' they shall be for ever with one another, and for ever with the Lord. And conducted, under celestial guidance, to new scenes of adoring contemplation, and to new sources of unmingled bliss, 'the Lamb who is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'

FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye,' Ezek. xviii. 32.

It is Jehovah who speaks; and his words contain a solemn declaration and an urgent entreaty, both addressed to sinful, perishing men.

The declaration is, that he has 'no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;' and who that knows anything of God can for a moment doubt this? He is a God of truth; and it were the height of impiety to call in question any of his asseverations. He is a God of wisdom; and can we suppose that he would call beings into existence and then wantonly proceed to destroy his own workmanship? He is a God of goodness and love; and it is as impossible that these attributes should take pleasure in the wretchedness of his creatures, as that his holiness and justice should take pleasure in their iniquity.

Nor has he left himself without many a witness to confirm to us the truth of his own saying, and place it beyond the possibility of contradiction. His works, as well as his word, show him to be a God, who feels for the sinner while he hates his sin.

God is love! and that love includes the intense and immeasurable desire of doing good; it is nothing less than the almighty energy of the divine mind, manifested in the unceasing and endless diffusion of happiness. As he is essentially blessed in himself, it is nothing but goodness that could have prompted him to create the universe, and give existence, and the means of existence and enjoyment, to the innumerable orders of creatures which it contains. As he is supremely good in himself, so he is the Author and Giver, the Source and Bestower of all the good that is any where or at any time enjoyed. His goodness is the praise of earth; it is the glory of heaven; it shines and is confessed throughout the universe. And can such a God, think you, have pleasure in the death of him that dieth?

'His tender mercies are over all his works.' The noon-tide sun and the cheerful day; the full-orbed moon as she walks in brightness and beauty at night; the verdant earth, the spacious sea, the bespangled firmament; the healthy breeze, the fruitful shower, the varying seasons; the flowers arrayed by his hand, the beasts fed by his bounty, the birds watched by his care—all his works praise him, all his creatures declare that the Lord is good. And can such an one then have pleasure in the death of him that dieth?

But man is pre-eminently the subject of exquisite and extensive enjoyment, and it is all from God. Other creatures here below he made for man, but us made he for himself, that we might share in his happiness and rejoice in his joy. 'How precious are thy thoughts unto us, O God! how great is the sum of them! if we should count them, they are more in number than the sand.' Are we not the objects of his constant protection, and his ever-wakeful, unwearied keeping? Does not his visitation preserve our spirits, and his kindness bless every moment of our lives? What have we ever had of good that we did not receive from his gracious hand?—convenient food, needful raiment, secure dwelling, refreshing repose, affectionate relatives, faithful friends—all of us life's necessaries, and many of us its luxurious comforts. In Him we live, and move, and have our being; and can He have pleasure in our death?

But from his ceaseless loving-kindness to us as creatures, turn to his dealings towards us as sinners. The high powers he has conferred upon us, and the providential bounties he has heaped upon us, we have employed as instruments of rebellion against him. And how now must he conduct himself towards us? He might in a moment frown us into perdition—he might crush us into nothing—for he could annihilate with a word those worlds which by a word he created. But blessed be his name! He against whom we have sinned would be our Redeemer; and for this end he sent his own Son into the world, not to condemn the world, but that by his labours, his prayers, his agonies, his tears, his blood, his life, the world through him might be saved. Rather than that we should suffer, God spared not his own Son, but gave him up to the death for us all. When we hear the eternal Father saying, 'Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow; smite the shepherd;'—when we see him bruising and putting to grief his best-beloved, and laying on him the iniquity of us all,—can we once harbour the impious thought, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, has pleasure in the sinner's misery?

And who but the same God, so rich in mercy, has suffered our manners and spared our lives until now? If our death and destruction had been with him an object of pleasurable desire, how easily and instantaneously might he have accomplished it! He had but to will it, and long ere to-day our bodies would have been in the grave, and our souls in hell. Yet not only has his long-suffering forbearance prolonged life, but his grace has surrounded us with all the means of salvation, which are fitted and intended to exhibit to us his love in Christ Jesus, and to be the channels for conveying to us his Holy Spirit, as the Spirit of life and peace. Much and earnestly does he strive with our consciences, that he may guide us in the way everlasting; and surely, then, the God who gave his Son to die for us, and who sends his Spirit to quicken us to life, can have no pleasure in our death.

It is upon this solemn declaration, the truth of which is so fully attested by God's entire procedure towards the sinner, both in providence and grace, that is founded the urgent entreaty, 'Turn yourselves, and live ye.' The fact of such an entreaty being addressed to us by God, clearly shows, were any farther proof required, the perfect sincerity and solemn earnestness of the declaration he had made, that he desires not the sinner's death. Nor does this entreaty stand alone. The Bible is full of invitations the most tender and affectionate—addressed to the worst of sinners, without distinction or reserve—to turn from the error and evil of their ways, that they may live. And if these invitations they persist in rejecting to the close of life, then the blame of their destruction can only be laid at their own door. The Almighty has made it evident in a variety of ways, and in a manner the most affecting, that so far from seeking the sinner's death, he would far rather that he should be saved and come to repentance. Yea, he swears to it by his own eternal self-existence, so glorious and happy: 'As I live,' saith the Lord God, 'I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked. Turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways, for why will ye die, O house of Israel.' Turn us, O Lord, and we shall be turned; heal us, and we shall be healed; save us, and we shall be saved; for thou art our praise.

FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life,' John v. 40.

The word life denotes in gospel phraseology, not bare, conscious existence, but happy existence. A man may be alive, and yet be most miserable; and even though there may be nothing to cause him present uneasiness, he may be rendered very unhappy by the dark uncertainty as to how it may fare with him hereafter. Life, then, in the highest and noblest sense of the term, points us to that glorious state of holiness, peace, felicity—perfect, endless, undisturbed, which awaits the perfected just in the kingdom of their Father—the fullness of joy in his presence, the pleasures at his right hand for evermore.

But while this will be to the believing soul life's ultimate consummation, we also find that under the same designation are included in scripture all those spiritual blessings which precede it here, and prepare the saint for its final enjoyment hereafter.

There is the life of pardon and justification. Being all sinners against God's holy law, we are condemned criminals, and in the eye of the law are dead already, and are only waiting for the execution of the sentence; 'the soul that sinneth shall die.' But in Christ there is life; for to them who are in him by a living faith condemnation there is none. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes the Christian free from the law of sin and death. His sin is freely forgiven; his trespass is fully remitted; his iniquities are cast behind God's back, as into the depths of the sea, whence they shall never rise against him in judgment; they shall not be once mentioned unto him, nor remembered any more for ever. Before God, through Christ, he stands up as righteous, having the righteousness of Christ put upon him as a garment, and reckoned unto him as a possession. Being thus justified freely by his grace, he is accepted in the Beloved. And is not this pardon, this acquittal, this acceptance, life in the truest sense?—when God's law being satisfied, and his justice vindicated, the sentence of death is reversed, and the gift of life is bestowed. It is then only when a man is absolved, reconciled, adopted into the family of God, that he begins really to live as his child. 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my words, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.'

Then there is the life of renewal and sanctification. By nature we are said to be carnally-minded, which is death—to be 'dead in trespasses and sins.' But as the Father hath life in himself, even so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; and as the Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son also quickeneth whom he will. When the Saviour died, and rose, and revived, it was that he might be the Lord both of the quick and dead. As a reward of his obedience to the death, he received into his hands the entire dispensation of the Holy Ghost, and hence it is called the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus making us, in this sense also, free from the law of sin and death. Nothing but the application of that law can ensure the result desired, namely, the awakening us to a life of holiness. Education will not do it, precepts will not do it, example will not do it, argument the most cogent—persuasion the most affectionate and earnest will not do it; the gospel itself will not do it, if it come in word only. It is the Spirit that quickeneth: the letter killeth; the words which Jesus speaks, they are spirit and they are life.

And what then is regeneration but the communication of new life to a dead soul? What is confession of sin and self-abhorrence on account of it? What are faith, hope, love? What are righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost? What are the aspirations of prayer, the emotions of thankfulness, the songs of praise, but the evidences and enjoyments of a new-born child of God? And from what do all these things flow, but from the sinner's coming to Christ that he may have life?

Finally, there is the life of happiness and glory. For it is after all this that life in the highest degree begins. These earnest and foretastes of heaven shall issue in that eternal felicity for which they prepare the saint. This renewal, sanctification, comfort, peace, shall issue in the joy unspeakable and glorified. For what is glory but grace consummated and perfect? What is the kingdom of God in heaven, but the same kingdom that was begun on earth?—there completed in all its parts, subduing and pervading the whole man in soul, body, and spirit—heightened, refined, sublimated, indestructible, eternal.

Now, in all these senses of the term, life is to be found in Christ, and in Christ alone; and yet, though it be the very thing we dying sinners most need, sinners will not come to him that they may have life. As to the life of pardon and justification they fancy they do not need it—for as they have not (as they suppose) wronged man, they cannot have wronged God; or if they feel that they are chargeable with some offences, they think that God is too merciful to punish weak creatures like them; that if he should require some satisfaction to his justice, their good deeds will at least balance, if not outweigh, their bad deeds, and that their prayers and alms, their services, and sacrifices, and sufferings, will surely be taken into account in the matter of their justification. They cannot bring themselves to suppose, that they ought to be treated as on the same footing before God as the worst of criminals. The humbling simplicity of the gospel of free grace offends them; and as they cannot see how they can be under death, 'they will not come to Christ that they may have life.'

Still more reluctant are sinners to come to Christ for a life of holiness. Indeed, there are not wanting many, who would be willing, yea, anxious to accept deliverance from wrath and hell from any quarter, provided it did not come to them in the way of previous deliverance from evil passions and darling lusts. They would have no objection to obtain a title to the happiness of heaven when they die, but they care not to seek after that holiness which forms the indispensable qualification for its enjoyment. If Christ offered them life in sin, they would eagerly run to him; but as what he offers is life in obedience, they 'will not come to him that they may have life.'

Now, the cause of this refusal is only to be found in the sad perversity of man's will, and in his deliberate preference of darkness to light, of evil to good, of death to life. Most earnest and free is the gospel offer, and most full the gospel promise of wisdom and strength above our own in the sincere use of the means appointed. But the sinner comes not, because he will not; he persists in choosing cursing rather than blessing, and therefore the blame of his misery and destruction will lie entirely at his own door. 'Awake, thou that sleepest! and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.'

---

FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?'
1 Sam. vi. 20.

THIS was the exclamation of the people of Bethshemesh, when the Lord had smitten so many of their number, on account of their irreverent familiarity, and impious curiosity in 'looking into the ark.' They had, at first, received it with all joyful respect, 'offering burnt-offerings, and sacrificing sacrifices;' but its continued presence in the midst of them wore off those impressions of sacred awe. And it required a signal and miraculous display of heaven's vengeance to give a check to their unholy presumption, and to convince them that 'God is greatly to be feared, even in the assembly of his saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are round about him.' 'Who,' cried they, 'is able to stand before this holy Lord God?'

'The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.' When we would describe the character of a fellow-creature, we endeavour to seize on that peculiar feature by which he is most strikingly marked out from others—that quality which is said to form the basis of his character. Now, to speak after the manner of men, it is no disparagement to any of the attributes of Jehovah, but rather constitutes their highest glory to affirm, that holiness lies at the foundation of them all. And by holiness we mean that perfection of the Deity, by which, to use the language of his own word, 'He is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and cannot look upon iniquity.' Under this title is he worshipped and feared by his people on earth—'the holy Lord God, the Holy One of Israel.' Under this title is he worshipped and praised by saints and angels in heaven—'the holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty.' His name is holy; his nature is holy; his Spirit is holy; his word is holy; his works are holy; his saints give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness; and holiness becometh his 'house for ever.'

But what sinner is able to stand before this holy Lord God? 'Thou, even thou, art to be feared: and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry?' 'God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day.' The careless sinner, indeed, will not believe this, or if he does not deny the truth of a future judgment, he treats it with indifference and unconcern. But whatever he may think, or however he may feel, 'his judgment lingereth not,' and how will he be able to stand? 'The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.' 'Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong in the day that I will deal with thee? I, the Lord, have spoken it, and I will do it.'

Even in a present life, God can so alarm and dismay the conscience of a sinner with a discovery of his own guilt and misery, and of the bright and spotless holiness, and the burning, consuming justice of his Judge, as to lay him prostrate and trembling at his feet. Unable to look up to the divine majesty, far less to stand before Him, he lays his hand upon his mouth, and his mouth in the dust; and out of the depths of distress and anguish he is heard to groan: 'The arrows of the Almighty are within me, and the poison thereof drinketh up my spirit. My flesh trembleth because of Him, and I am afraid of his judgments. Destruction from God is a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I cannot endure. While I suffer his terrors I am distracted.' When they hear of 'righteousness, temperance, or judgment to come,' again they tremble. When they read in the hand-writing of conscience, the appalling mystic scroll, 'Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting!'—then their countenance is changed, and their thoughts trouble them, so that the joints of their loins are loosed, and their knees smite one against another.

And how comes it then, that so many sinners can live as if there were no God, or as if his title of the 'holy Lord God' were but an empty sound? It is because they have not yet been brought to realize his dread presence as the Witness of their conduct, the Hearer of their words, the Searcher of their hearts, the Judge of their souls. God, as the God with whom they have to do, is not in all their thoughts; and hence the question has never seriously occurred to them, as to how they shall stand before him; or if it has sometimes been suggested to them, it has promptly been repelled as an unwelcome intruder. But a man's treatment of a truth cannot in the least affect its reality, nor prevent its consequences. Your forgetfulness of death will not keep you alive; your doubt of a resurrection will not hide you in the grave; your denial of a judgment will not delay one moment its approach, nor exempt you from any one of its penal awards. And, oh sinner, what will you do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation that shall come from far? To whom will ye flee for help, and where will ye leave your glory? If thou hast run with the footmen, and they wearied thee, how then wilt thou contend with horses? And if in the land of peace wherein thou trustedst they wearied thee, how then wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan? What will you do, when God riseth up? And when he visiteth, what will you answer him? In that awful day of the revelation of God's righteous judgments—'the day for which all other days were made'—the whole world of the ungodly will lie guilty before God, and not one of them will be able to endure the lightning of his eye, or the terror of his frown. They will call, but call in vain, to the mountains and rocks: 'Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?'

All joy to the believer who lives, walks, stands by his faith! In drawing near before this holy Lord God, his language is, 'If thou, O Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.' Himself a guilty and polluted creature, he, nevertheless, stands up before God in Christ, acquitted, accepted, approved; and living under a ministration not of bondage and death, but of liberty and life, he is even permitted to 'look into the ark' of the gospel—not indeed with the prying gaze of idle curiosity, but with a hallowed contemplation like that of angels when they 'desire to look' into the mysteries of redemption. 'Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape the wrath to come, and to stand before the Son of Man.'

FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin,' Rom. iv. 7, 8.

It is thus, says the apostle, that 'David describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works.' On the occasion upon which the psalmist had tasted the blessedness he describes, righteousness of his own he had none to plead; for he had, in the matter of Uriah, committed an act the most unrighteous, involving a complication of the foulest crimes. When the prophet Nathan represented to him the character of his offence by a parable, he was slow in recognising his own image in the portraiture; and hence it has been supposed that up to the moment of his conviction by that word of God, he had been careless, hardened, and utterly dead to feeling. But he himself informs us, in the thirty-second psalm, (from which the apostle's quotation is taken) that the case with him had been far otherwise. He kept silence, but conscience spake. The remorse which it excited he hoped might disappear through the influence of time and change; and persisting in the excuse or palliation of his guilt, he would neither confess it before God, nor condemn it before men. But this vain struggle to repress and conceal his mental anguish, not only aggravated the torment, but affected his bodily health. 'My bones waxed old—my moisture was turned into the drought of summer.' It was in this condition that the prophet's message found him, and at last drew from him the humble acknowledgment, 'I have sinned against the Lord.' And Nathan said unto David, 'The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die.' And David, filled with emotions of contrition and gratitude, which his bursting, broken heart could not contain, hastened to his chamber, and falling upon his knees, he gave vent to his feelings in this fervid acknowledgment, 'O the blessednesses of him whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.'

Forgiveness of sin is the first in order of new-covenant blessings; for so long as a man's guilt is uncanceled, God is his enemy, and he cannot know peace. But the youngest believer has forgiveness upon the first act of faith. 'I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake.' It has its source in the infinite mercy and rich grace of Jehovah. He is a 'God ready to forgive;'—a 'God of pardons,' as the original bears; to him belong mercies and forgivenesses;' and this is his name and this his memorial throughout all generations: 'The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin.' Yet he reserves to himself the prerogative of dispensing his pardons according to the wise method of his own grace, namely, by Christ Jesus the Mediator, in whom alone we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins. When Jesus was on earth, he had full power to remit sin, and if he is exalted to heaven, it is as a Prince to give repentance, and as a Saviour to grant remission; and 'through this man is preached unto us the forgiveness of sins.'

The forgiveness extended to the Christian is most comprehensive and complete. It embraces guilt of every kind, by whatever variety of phrase designated—'sin, iniquity, trespass, transgression.' It includes all sins, however numerous—the God of mercy 'abundantly pardons.' It excludes not guilt the heaviest and most aggravated. 'Pardon my iniquity, for it is great.' And the act of forgiveness once passed is never more recalled. The sin is said to be covered, blotted out, cast into the depths of the sea, never to be found by man, never to be remembered by God, not once to be mentioned to the offender.

Now can such an one fail to be blessed? 'Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins.'

What man is happy if he be not the man whose iniquities are forgiven? Is it a blessed thing to be freed from condemnation, to be delivered from wrath, to be quiet from fear of evil?—instead of having sin imputed, to have righteousness reckoned unto us?—to know that God, from being our greatest foe, has become our greatest friend? to know that the very power and purity of Jehovah, which formerly frowned upon us, now smile upon us in love, and are engaged on our behalf? to know that we have now in enjoyment a peace which passeth all understanding, and in prospect a happiness superior to the joys of paradise, equal to the glory of angels?—all that blessedness belongs to the pardoned penitent. 'Being justified by faith we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom also we have access by faith into the grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. We joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement.' The man whose 'sin is covered,' obtains assistance and acceptance in all duties; and in his mercies and trials, his comforts and crosses, he has the blessing which enriches without sorrow. Need such a man dread adversity? His troubles, indeed, may be many, constant, aggravated; but they shall not really injure, they shall rather benefit him, for they too are 'blessings in disguise.' He shall be sustained under them, sanctified through them, and in due time delivered out of them all. Every loss shall conduce to his gain; every suffering shall turn to his salvation; every event shall work for his good. Need he fear death? The sting of death was sin, but forgiveness has extracted the poisoned dart, and converted the curse into a blessing? Need he shudder when he looks into the grave? But it is no longer the condemned cell where the criminal passes the night before being led forth to punishment. It is rather the chamber of repose, where the invited welcome guest is attired and adorned, previously to his being ushered into the presence of the great King. Need he be apprehensive of the judgment of the last day, with its accompanying terrors—the opening heavens, the rending earth, the dissolving elements—the wreck of nature, and the crash of worlds? That day will but proclaim his acquittal; it is the day of his complete redemption. Need he shrink from the contemplation of eternity? It will but multiply and perpetuate his joys.

Yet in order to the enjoyment of the blessing of pardon, confession of sin, and supplication for mercy are absolutely required. 'I said I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found.' 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'

SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!' John i. 29.

SUCH was the attestation of the Baptist to the person and work of the King of heaven, whose way in the earth he came to prepare, and whose reign on the earth he announced. 'The prophets prophesied until John;' but John was 'more than a prophet.' Clad in the mantle of Elijah, and with a double portion of his spirit, the herald of the Son of God was 'the greatest of those born of women.' Let us receive his testimony with the believing attention and reverential obedience which the authority and dignity of such a messenger demand. With what scrupulous fidelity and self-sacrificing devotedness did he fulfil his office! 'There cometh one after me who is mightier than I—who is preferred before me—who must increase, whilst I must decrease.' And when he has at last found the Christ in very deed, he cries out with joy, like one who has suddenly met with what he had been eagerly in quest of: 'Behold him! behold him! the Mercy promised to the fathers! the Desire of all nations! the long-promised and long-expected Messiah!'

'Behold the Lamb of God!' With these few words the Baptist annihilates all the sacrifices and expiations of the law; he declares that in Christ the victim, and in none else, resides the merit and efficacy, which can alone take away the burden of sin's guilt from the conscience, or the stain of sin's pollution from the heart. It is as if he had said. 'All the sacrificial lambs that you have ever seen or read of till now—whether that which was substituted in the room of Isaac, or those whose blood was sprinkled on the lintels and door-posts of our fathers in Egypt, or those which in commemoration of that event we slaughter every year at the passover, or those which, morning and evening, are presented as burnt-offerings upon the altar—all are but types, emblems, shadows. None of them is really the Lamb whose blood we require to wash away sin. He is the true Lamb whom you now behold—the substance, the body, the fullness, the antitype of all the others, who were but figurative images of him. Under that mean outward form, behold the Messiah who is to be cut off but not for himself. He is the Lamb of God—the Lamb separated and sent, furnished and fitted, appointed and approved by God—the Lamb whom God demands, and by whom alone God will be appeased—the Lamb consecrated to God, and who, in God's purpose and promise, was slain before the foundation of the world.'

The figure denotes gentleness and patience, for a lamb allows itself to be led, tied, shorn, slaughtered without resistance, and even without complaint. It thus becomes a fit emblem of the sweet benignity and long-suffering forbearance of Him, who innocently and meekly endured every insult and injury without a murmur—who allowed himself to be apprehended, condemned, buffeted, spit upon, scourged, crucified without one attempt at resistance, or one word of reproach—who 'was led as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth,' unless to implore forgiveness to his murderers.

Yet it is not so much to the lamb as a creature that the allusion is made, as to the lamb as a sacrifice. Now, no lamb was accepted for an offering, unless it was free from all blemish; and here then is an emblem of the spotless purity of Christ our paschal sacrifice—his birth immaculate, his life blameless—‘a lamb without blemish, and without spot’—the Holy One of God, who fulfilled all righteousness.

It is this circumstance which imparted such virtue to his expiation, and rendered it so effectual for taking away sin. For that is the principal idea conveyed here, namely, the removing the imputation and punishment of guilt, by bearing it in his own person, and so taking it out of the way. He himself took on him our griefs and infirmities, and carried away our sicknesses and sorrows. ‘He his own self bore our sins in his own body upon the tree.’ The very employment here of the figure of a sacrificial lamb shows clearly, that Christ takes away sin in some other way than merely by destroying its power through the effect of his precepts, and the influence of his example. If Christ’s death was a real satisfaction for sin, then the ancient sacrifices were intelligible types of him; but if he saves only by the force of moral suasion, it is impossible to perceive any analogy between his death and that of the legal victims; and yet his own word expressly declares that they were all figures of him.

The Baptist’s announcement declares unequivocally, that the blessed result of his substitution and sacrifice would be the removal of sin. He ‘takes away sin,’ even ‘the sin of the world’—not of Jews only (as their exclusiveness and bigotry might suggest) but of Gentiles also. ‘He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.’ But though his atonement be amply sufficient for all, and freely offered unto all, it does not follow that all are actually saved. For just as a remedy, however efficacious, can only heal those who employ it; as food, however wholesome, will only nourish those who partake of it; as a place of refuge, however capacious and secure, will only shelter those ‘who flee to it’ for safety—so the sin of those only is taken away by the Lamb of God who humbly receive him, by believing on his name.

‘We have heard the witness of John.’ If the voice of so great and good a man has any weight with us;—if the glory of his still greater Master is dear to us;—if we value our own soul’s salvation—let us believingly behold, and joyfully embrace this Lamb of God, promised in the ancient oracles, sent in the fullness of time; sacrificed to atone for guilt on earth; and now in heaven, in the midst of the throne, beheld, beloved, adored as the Lamb slain. Was he manifested to take away sins? Let us willingly part with ours, never again to resume them, and dearly prize the purity he has purchased. His blood is the source of all grace and all blessing; but let it be despised, and it will become avenging blood, calling down the fury of ‘Him that sitteth upon the throne,’ and kindling into fiercer indignation the ‘wrath of the Lamb.’

SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

‘The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin,’ 1 John i. 7.

‘WITHOUT shedding of blood is no remission.’ Under the law all things were purged with blood. The expiatory sacrifices were always bloody, and in that did their value consist, for the life of the immolated victim was in the blood. By the ‘blood of Christ’ therefore is to be understood his vicarious sufferings and atoning death, which are uniformly represented as the ransom of the believer’s soul, and the price of his eternal redemption.

It is the ‘blood of Jesus’—the name which is above every name. That name he bears because he saves his people from their sins; and as he is able to save unto the uttermost, his blood cleanseth from all sin.

It is the ‘blood of Christ,’ the Anointed of the Father, the Sealed of the Holy Ghost, the Messiah clearly promised, amply qualified, fully commissioned to execute the divine purposes of love in saving sinners with an everlasting salvation. To those who are in Christ there is no condemnation; and delivering them from sin’s punishment, i.e. at the same time rescues them from the power, the prevalence, the practice of iniquity; his blood cleanseth from all sin.

It is the ‘blood of God’s Son.’ True it is, that the blood shed was the blood of his humanity, for his divinity could not suffer; yet was it his divinity that gave virtue and value to his sacrifice. It is not his blood as the Son of Man, which is the meritorious procuring cause of salvation, but his blood as he was the Son of God, the Son of the Blessed,—Himself God over all, blessed for evermore! ‘Feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.’

And in what does the peculiar value and efficacy of his blood consist? It possesses a purifying virtue; it cleanseth from sin. This evidently implies, that man being by nature defiled, stands in need of cleansing. Sin is the soul's pollution. Originally created pure and spotless as its Maker, it has lost his image, and is deeply sullied with the stains of iniquity. 'What is man that he should be clean, or he who is born of woman, that he should be righteous?' Pure, indeed, we may appear to be in our own esteem, for 'all the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes; but Jehovah trieth the spirits.' In the sight of that Holy One, who is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and who cannot look on iniquity, we are altogether filthy; yea, 'though we wash ourselves as with snow-water, and make our hands never so clean, yet shall he plunge us in the ditch, and our own clothes shall abhor us.' The heavens are not clean in his sight. How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh up iniquity like water? And as to any ability on our part to remove this pollution, who among us can say, 'I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?' Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one. And, therefore, a new and divine influence is requisite to renew and purify the human soul; and it is for this end that a fountain has been opened in the house of David, and for the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.

This blood cleanseth from sin in its guilt, and consequently delivers from its punishment. Satan accuses, conscience condemns, God frowns upon the transgressor; the law flashes its lightnings, and rolls its thunders. But 'we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.' Jesus having suffered, the law is satisfied, the punishment is remitted, the believer is absolved, God is reconciled, conscience is pacified, and Satan accuses in vain. To condemn a man who has been washed in the blood of the Lamb, would be contrary both to the justice and mercy of God; contrary to his justice, for he has accepted Christ's sacrifice as a ransom—contrary to his mercy, for it would be to punish one who, in the eye of law, has been found and declared innocent. But 'now being justified by Christ's blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him.'

This blood cleanseth from sin also in its pollution. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Christ gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, sprinkling the unclean, sanctify to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your con-sciences from dead works to serve the living God? Having, therefore, these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

This blood cleanseth from all sin—from sin of every kind. Men have often speculated regarding a fancied panacea or remedy for every disease to which the human body is subject. But what cannot be found for the body is to be found here for the soul. The blood of God's Son is a universal remedy—it cleanseth from all sin—from sin original and actual, sin personal and relative, sin private and public, sin of omission and of commission, sin of heart, speech, conduct. Jesus was delivered 'for our offences,' and there is no offence which his blood cannot wash away. The greatest wickedness ever committed by man was the murder of the Holy One and the Just; yet, even to his betrayers and murderers, was the gospel of reconciliation preached, and first preached too—'beginning at Jerusalem;' and upon some of the very persons who madly exclaimed, 'His blood be on us, and on our children,' was that blood sprinkled, not as the blood of vengeance, but as the blood of peace. And as it cleanseth from all sin, however heinous and aggravated, so it cleanseth from all sins, however numerous. They may exceed, in multitude, the stars of the sky, or the sands of the sea, yet this most precious blood will remove their guilt from the conscience, their pollution from the heart, their love from the mind, their practice from the life.

This blood cleanseth from all sin—sin of every nation, Jew or Greek, barbarian or Scythian, bond or free. The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all. From every country, and kindred, and people, and tongue, shall the ransomed of the Lord be brought, and forming that glorious church which is the purchase of the Redeemer's blood, they shall be presented pure and faultless before the Redeemer's throne, not having spot or wrinkle, nor any such thing.

This blood cleanseth from all sin, sin of every period. It is not said merely that it had cleansed or will cleanse, but that it now cleanseth. Its efficacy is present and perpetual as well as universal. The fountain once opened has never once been shut, but continues to send forth its purifying streams to the ends of the earth. As there is ever a copious source of corruption in our hearts, so there is a constant inexhaustible flow of cleansing blood; it is never lost or congealed like the blood of the ancient sacrifices; it has been deprived of none of its virtue by the lapse of ages, but is, at this moment, as fresh 'as when it first was shed.'

nor will it cease to flow so long as there is a sinner to be saved, or a sin to be forgiven.

Let the unholy and unclean flee without delay to this precious blood of sprinkling, and let saints who feel they are contracting daily habitual guilt, repair daily and habitually to the cleansing fountain; and so shall they be prepared at last for taking part in the sweet song: 'Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.'

SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?' Rom. viii. 33.

THE apostle supposes the judgment to be set, the books opened, and the accused summoned to the bar. But there appears among them those, whom the Judge has not only acquitted but approved—has selected as the chosen friends of his heart, the destined heirs of his glory—and who shall lay any thing to their charge? The various but indissoluble links in the golden chain which draws them up from earth to heaven, have been enumerated in a preceding verse;—they are 'foreknown, predestinated, called, justified, glorified.'

The whole had its source in the 'foreknowledge' of God with respect to them;—by which we are to understand not simple prescience, for 'known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world,' nor the knowledge of bare discrimination, since all things that have been, and that are, that shall be, or that can be, are naked and open to the eternal eye of Him with whom the past, and the future, are one continued ever-present now. But God's knowledge of his people, whether from eternity or in time, implies a knowledge of special love, of peculiar complacency, of approbation and acknowledgment. 'The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his.' 'My sheep hear my voice, and I know them.' 'Does God cast off his people whom he foreknew?' No! for they are 'elect' according to the 'foreknowledge' of God the Father.'

Having thus been from eternity the objects of his free choice, they became the subjects of his predetermined purpose. 'Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate.' This marks the absolute sovereignty and infallible certainty of the divine decree, and points to the ultimate execution, in all its parts, of the divine appointment. 'Being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.' This fore ordination includes a destined conformity to the likeness of the first-born Son of God, and a consequent admission into God's family. 'Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will.' It takes in holiness as the way, and heaven as the end. They are 'chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy;'; they are 'ordained to eternal life.'

And because he loved them with an everlasting love, therefore with loving-kindness does he draw them. 'Whom he did predestinate, them he also called.' He calls them indeed, in the first instance, as he does others, by the invitation to observe gospel ordinances, and to share in gospel blessings, for that is a call addressed to all who enjoy the means of grace. Yet though in this sense 'many are called, few are chosen;'; whereas with respect to God's foreknown and predestinated people, they are 'called, and chosen, and faithful.' In addition to the outward and (as regards the impenitent) ineffectual call of God's word, there is addressed to them the inward, spiritual, effectual call of God's grace. When Christ says to them as he said to Matthew the publican: 'Follow me,' they arise and obey the summons. Upon what grounds did Paul assure the Thessalonian Christians that he knew their 'election of God?' It was because 'the gospel had come to them, not in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.' 'God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth; wherunto he called you by our gospel.' 'Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.'

Hence it is here asserted, that they are not merely invited to a participation of gospel blessings, but are admitted to their actual enjoyment. 'Whom he called, them he also justified.' A state of justification is opposed to a state of condemnation; it is to obtain at once forgiveness and acceptance, to be treated, not only as negatively guiltless, but as positively righteous, and consequently to pass from death unto life. It has its source in God's gratuitous favour—'being justified freely by his grace.' The meritorious procuring cause is the finished obedience and atoning sacrifice of the Lord Jesus—'being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him.' The instrumental medium is faith in his name—'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, who is the Justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.'

And what is the final, blissful result? 'Whom he justified, them he also glorified.' The apostle, after looking back to the good pleasure and purpose of God from the past eternity as the originating cause, now looks forward to the glorification of the elect in the coming eternity as the ultimate end. They are the vessels of mercy which God had afore prepared unto glory. The Saviour said of them, when he was on earth, 'I appoint unto you a kingdom;' and when he shall appear from heaven to call them home, he will say, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.'

'What shall we say then to these things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?' Not God: for it is he who justifieth them, since he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for them all; and if the Judge be for them, who can be against them? Who is he that condemneth them? Not Christ: for it is he who consented to be delivered for their offences, and who rose again for their justification, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for them. Shall the law accuse? It is satisfied. Shall justice denounce? It is vindicated. Shall conscience torture? It is pacified. Shall satan, the 'accuser of the brethren,' dare to prefer a charge? He shall be put to silence and shame—nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

---

SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Elect according to the fore-knowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ,' 1 Pet. i. 2.

HERE is another explicit and solemn assertion of the doctrine of an 'election by grace'—originating in the distinguishing love and foreknowledge of God the Father from eternity, and manifested in time by the bestowal of pardon through the blood of the Son, and the production of purity by the grace of the Spirit. The apostle would represent to us the manner in which the three persons of the adorable Trinity concur and co-operate in the salvation of God's chosen, devised by the Father, procured by the Son, applied by the Holy Ghost.

Even were the testimonies of scripture on this subject less explicit than they are, let us only connect together these two simple facts, (which are admitted by every humble Christian) namely, that salvation is of free grace, and yet that all men are not saved, and it is impossible to resist the conclusion that 'it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God who showeth mercy.' 'Who maketh thee to differ from another?' 'Even so, Father! for so it seemeth good in thy sight.'

There are, it is true, difficulties connected with this subject which we cannot explain; but where is the truth of God—where is the work of God that is wholly free from difficulties to the limited capacity of short-sighted mortals? Often has it been asked: 'How can we reconcile the purpose of God according to election, with the universality of moral obligation, or the individual responsibility of man? If God's designs of mercy be restricted to a certain number of the human race, why is the gospel addressed to all? and how can it be the duty of all to believe it?' Now in reply to these and such like questions, it would be enough to remind the objector, that if salvation is of God's grace, and if all are not saved, the force of the objection lies, not merely against God's precious decree, but against his actual conduct; it is directed not more against the limitation of his gracious designs than against the limitation of his gracious injunctions, the only difference being that the former are secret and concealed, while the latter are open and manifest.

But the truth is, that according to the principles of scripture, such objections are wholly inadmissible. If it be one bible-fact that God hath chosen Christians unto salvation, and if it be another bible-fact that unto all men is the word of this salvation sent, and that they are accountable for the use they make of the means of salvation God has afforded them—then no difficulties, real or imaginary, in the way of reconciling these two facts together can invalidate the truth of either. Our business with things revealed, is not to explain, but to believe; not to harmonise, but to practise. If in the course of our inquiries, we meet with some new truth that seems irreconciliable with one we had formerly admitted, shall we, on that account, reject either the one or the other? Certainly not. Sound philosophy will tell us to receive both, to reason from both, but not to deduce from the one what might weaken the force of the other. Upon this principle the sacred writers act; for they bring together into close juxtaposition, principles apparently the most discordant, without ever pretending to reconcile them, far less insinuating, that the apparent discrepancy should affect our reception of either. 'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you.' 'Give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall.' 'Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life. No man can come unto me except the Father which has sent me draw him.'

But in point of fact, the doctrine of predestination is not attended with greater difficulties than many other doctrines of revelation, which are received by all who profess Christianity. None, for example, will deny that 'God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity,' and yet none can deny that iniquity abounds; but who has yet been able to reconcile the holiness of God with the origin of moral evil? None will deny that 'God is love,' but who can perfectly reconcile the goodness of God with the introduction of moral and physical suffering? Again, that the foreknowledge of God is a necessary part of his omniscience is acknowledged by all who have correct views of the divine character. On the other hand, that man is a responsible agent is taught at once by the law of conscience, and the word of the Most High. But what speculations have yet harmonised these two facts, or fixed the precise point of their agreement? Who of mortals has ever discerned that hidden link in the great chain of truth, by which they are connected? And yet our consciousness of the impossibility of reconciling them does not lead us to doubt or deny either.

Another vulgar objection against the doctrine of election is often stated thus: 'If I am to be saved, I shall be saved whatever be my vices; if I am to be lost, I shall be lost whatever be my virtues.' But such an inference from the doctrine can only proceed from the grossest misconception of its true nature, and an utter disregard of the connection which God has established here, as throughout all his works, between the means and the end. Apply the same reasoning to the business of life, and its absurdity will be instantly apparent. As certain it is in the purpose and perception of God, that we shall be rich or poor, healthy or sick, live long or die soon, as that our soul shall be saved or lost. But does any man reason against the use of means for the security or increase of worldly property, the restoration of health, or the preservation of life, because he is persuaded of the foreknowledge and pre-determination of God in reference to these matters? And why then should he for any such reason exclude the use of means from the great concerns of religion? The invitations of the gospel to faith and repentance are as universal and as binding as are the obligations of the law; if a man is saved, it will be because he has embraced those invitations, if he is lost it will be because he has rejected them.

Here, finally, is the great safeguard of the doctrine—namely, that it is an election to holiness, even 'through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience.' The decree is passed in heaven, but on earth it is known only by the result, and that is a holy conversation and godly life. The elect are chosen 'to be holy and without blame'—to be created again in Christ Jesus unto good works, wherein God had before ordained that they should walk in them. To what are they predestinated, but to be conformed to the image of God's Son?—so that if a man's character be utterly destitute of the lineaments of the holy Jesus, he possesses as yet no evidence of his being an elect child of God; while, on the other hand, in proportion as he is made to resemble the meek and lowly Saviour, in the same proportion will the evidences of his election of God increase. And while the doctrine thus secures the interests of holiness, it also illustrates the nature of the final perseverance of the saints. God's eternal purpose of grace does render absolutely certain the ultimate salvation of every one of the elect; but no man has any right to conclude that he is one of the blessed number, unless he is actually enduring in faith and obedience even to the end.

EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life,' John iii. 16.

NOTHING but our long familiarity with the marvellous fact here stated, can account for our ever reading this passage without the deepest emotion. How simple, yet sublime the announcement! how plain, yet how profound! The language is so perspicuous as to be intelligible to all, and yet so fraught with mystery is the sentiment conveyed as to be beyond the full comprehension of men or angels.

The grand truth here exhibited is, that the originating cause of our salvation was the love of God in the gift of his Son. Even if this had not been so clearly revealed in the bible, the view which is there given of God's nature and character would have led us to a like conclusion. He is there represented as self-existent—'sufficient to himself alone;' and consequently independent, no less in being than in bliss. He is all-perfect, and therefore all-glorious. His personal felicity being uninfluenced by any thing from without, is necessarily incapable of diminution or of increase. What then, it may be asked, could have moved him to form men upon the earth at first, and when they had fallen from Him, and from happiness, what could have induced him to send down his Son to be their Deliverer? Was it merely that he might thereby found a claim to their gratitude, augment his own grandeur, and promote his own interests? Thy goodness, O creature, extendeth not to Him. He became not more glorious in himself, when he called into existence myriads of intelligent and exalted beings. They were but emanations of the Great Spirit—they were only manifestations of the innate, essential glory that had resided in Him from eternity. And can a man—can the poor worm man—be profitable unto God? Is it any pleasure—any personal benefit to Him, that thou art righteous? Or is it gain to him that thou makest thy ways perfect? 'If thou be righteous, what givest thou him, or what receiveth he at thine hand?' Far less was it from any dread of thy continued enmity and rebellion that he interposed to save thee. 'Will he reprove thee for fear of thee? Will he enter with thee into judgment? Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art, and thy righteousness may profit the son of man—but if thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? Or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?' The combined legions of darkness have long been hurling their blasphemies, and directing their machinations against his throne—but all that shall only rebound to the praise of the glory of his justice, which shall be magnified in their everlasting destruction. Was there any obligation on the part of God to give up his Son for us? This will not be maintained; for if in any sense it could be said, that we deserved that Christ should die for us—it might be said with equal truth that we deserved salvation without Christ. If then there was no previous obligation of merit on our part, or of necessity on his, and if there was no room for the exercise of any selfish motive to influence his determination—in what is it that the mission of his dear Son originated? In what can it have originated, but in his own goodness—his desire to relieve our misery, and secure our happiness—in a word, in his love towards us—a love absolutely disinterested and sovereignly free—a love exercised without any antecedent obligation, and without the possibility of any adequate return?

Let this view of the Father's love serve to counteract certain notions which many entertain of the plan of salvation—notions most derogatory to the character of God, and calculated to affect materially our grateful and devout feelings towards him. They readily perceive the love of the Son in laying down his life for transgressors; but when they think of God the Father's share in the work of redemption, they picture him to themselves as a gloomy, relentless, blood-thirsty tyrant, who could not find it in his heart to love sinners till his own Son had been first sacrificed; whereas the wondrous truth is, that the death of Christ, so far from being the cause of God's love, was just the effect of that love. Christ's death was not intended to excite the divine compassion—any more than it was intended to excite the divine justice,—but it was designed to display and illustrate both in a way that never was done before, and so as to shed a brighter lustre over every other perfection of the Deity. But love was at the bottom of the whole;—love was the primary motive of all; love, the purest in its source, yet distinguishing as to its objects, for while it passed by fallen angels, it laid hold on fallen men. Oh! how unlike the God of the gospel, to be represented as if he had waited in calm indifference or stern impatience, until salvation should first be wrought out, and then coldly and reluctantly receiving the sinner to his favour on the bare ground of legal right. Why, what is the most glorious character he sustains, and the title by which he is most honoured? Is it not as 'the God of salvation—the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ?' Did he not so love the world as to give his only-begotten and well-beloved Son—not sparing him, but freely delivering him up to agony and death for us all? Yea, did not He himself take the principal part in the actual infliction of the severest torments which the Son endured? The meek and holy Lamb of God suffered much indeed from the cruelty of men and the malice of devils; but all that was as nothing compared with what in the garden and on the cross proceeded directly and immediately from the hand of his Father God. Was he stricken, and smitten, and afflicted? It was of God. Was he bruised and put to grief? It pleased the Lord thus to make his soul an offering for sin, and to lay on the devoted head of the innocent Victim the iniquity of us all. Yes, it was his own Father, whose delight he had been from eternity, and in whose love he had from eternity rejoiced—it was even He who now so darkly frowned upon him, and kindled up against him his burning wrath, and pierced him through with his poisoned arrows, and sank him down with the weight of his avenging curse, and compelled him to drink to the dregs the cup of bitterness and trembling. It was his own Father who, standing over the agonised and dying Son, shut out for a season his cries and prayers, steeled his paternal bosom until the world's crisis should be past, and man's redemption secured—and in words, the mysterious and awfully affecting import of which it will take eternity to unfold, called upon his justice to arm itself against his best beloved, and not to spare him: 'Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow! Smite the shepherd.' Who that reflects on these things will harbour the injurious thought, that God the Father sacrificed nothing for sinners, and took but a cold and passive interest in their salvation? Will he not rather, whenever he thinks of the precious blood of the spotless Lamb, devoutly remember, and thankfully acknowledge, that by God he was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world—by God he was manifested and given to the death—by God he was raised up and glorified? And all this he will cheerfully ascribe to nothing but what Paul emphatically styles the philanthropy of God our Saviour, or his 'love and kindness towards man.'

If love is to be found no where else, 'herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.' 'We know and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.' 'He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?'

EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them,' Heb. vii. 25.

This is the consolatory inference which the apostle draws from the fact of the Saviour's eternal existence and unchangeable priesthood. It comprises a description of those who are saved by him, and an assertion of the boundless extent and perpetual duration of his saving power.

Who are they that shall be saved by Christ? They and they only who 'come unto God by him.' This denotes, in bible language, the first act of penitential faith, leading to the habitual exercise of humble devotion. To both these feelings men are naturally strangers. They are 'afar off from God;' being alienated from his service and love, and enemies to him in their minds and by wicked works. A consciousness of guilt and pollution, and a consequent dread of his displeasure, make them, like Adam, flee from his presence, and avoid his approach. The very first step then that a wretched creature must take in the way of returning to happiness, is a step towards God, the Author of all happiness. Being made aware of his danger whilst at a distance from God, and believing in the revealed character of God in Christ as a God of mercy, and embracing the calls and invitations of the gospel to return, the penitent soul humbly comes to God, as a wandering sheep comes to the fold, as a prodigal son comes to the father, as a subdued rebel comes to the sovereign, at once to offer allegiance, and to implore forgiveness. But very needful is it to bear in mind, that it is through Christ alone that sinners, if they would be saved, must go unto the Father. A deist may go unto God, as did Cain, without a mediator, presenting his own works, the fruit of his own ground, the result of his own labours; but a believer goes, like Abel, by and through another, making mention of his righteousness, of his only, and offering only of his gifts, for of these alone will God testify his acceptance. Look at the Jewish high priest ministering and acting in behalf of the people on the great day of atonement, (for that is the apostle's own illustration), and you will at once perceive how they 'came unto God by him.' He has entered within the veil into the holy of holies, carrying with him the blood of the immolated victim. Ask a Jew: 'What mean ye by this service?' And he will tell you, that the high priest has gone in before God for the people, and that they, if they would be accepted, must go unto God by him, relying on nothing but the sacrifice which he has offered, and the intercessions and incense which he for them has presented. Thus it is also that we must approach unto God, if we would be received of him in favour. We see the High Priest of our profession entering heaven with his own blood, and offering up along with it the incense of his merits and his prayers; and it is upon Christ so occupied that faith fixes,—it is on Christ so occupied that hope rests. But, whereas the Jewish worshipper, even on the day of atonement, had to stand afar off, with the veil of the temple interposed between him and the inner sanctuary, the devout Christian has free, unrestrained, constant access into the secret of God's presence with his Anointed, and may humbly urge, in Christ's name, at the throne of the earthly grace, the very pleas which the great Intercessor is urging for him at the throne of the heavenly glory.

Being an accepted and ever living Priest, Christ is able to save those who come unto God by him to the uttermost—that is, in all conceivable circumstances of misery and helplessness, and always, unceasingly, even to the end. Unlike the Aaronic high priest, he has no need to renew his great oblation, or to devolve his office upon a successor. 'This man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable, an untransferable priesthood,' i. e. a priesthood which can never pass into other hands. And hence the perfection of his sacrifice, and the perpetuity and prevalence of the mediation which he founds on it, qualify him for being so 'mighty to save.' From the lowest depth of guilt he can rescue; from the greatest degree of depravity he can recover; from the farthest point in backsliding he can restore; from the extremest length in wickedness, even from a life-time of transgression, he can redeem: yea, and at the eleventh hour, when the hoary-headed criminal seems about to drop like a rotten and withered branch into the flames of hell, He can pluck the fire-scathed brand from the burning, and exalt the saved sinner to a place in his kingdom and a throne by his side. An idolatrous and bloody Manasseh, an adulterous and murderous David, a cowardly and backsliding Peter, a blaspheming and persecuting Saul, he was able to save 'at their uttermost.' A crucified thief he took with him, 'at his uttermost,' into paradise. Corinthians who were debased by every vice—'unrighteous, fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, effeminate, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners'—he washed in his blood, sanctified through his Spirit, justified by his righteousness. And all these are set forth as proofs, pledges, patterns, of his long-suffering to forbear, his willingness to forgive, his power to redeem. So long as there are in this world sinners to save, there is a Christ to save them; for as his life in heaven can have no end, so his office of High Priest admits of no interruption, and his ability to save of no decay. Is there a sinner reading these pages who can be beyond Christ's uttermost?

NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus,' 1 Tim. ii. 5.

THE fundamental truth of revealed religion, that there is but one Saviour, is here connected with the fundamental truth of natural religion, that there is but one God. The latter is a truth which is admitted by all but pantheists or idolaters; it is proclaimed by that unity of design and operation which pervades the Creator's works; and the supposition of there being more than One Infinite Spirit—'of whom, and to whom, and through whom are all things,' would involve a manifest absurdity. Yet not more true is it that there is only one God, than that there is only one Mediator.

The necessity of mediation between opposite parties arises from their being in a state of variance or enmity; and such is the lamentable state of things between God and man. 'The carnal mind is enmity against God,' and God hath a controversy with every sinner. He is 'angry with the wicked every day'—and the alienation thus produced might have remained perpetual, had not a daysman or umpire appeared to make both at one, by 'laying his hand upon them both.' But 'this man shall be our peace,' inasmuch as he maketh peace by the blood of his cross, and preacheth peace by the word of reconciliation, and giveth peace by the sweet influence of his grace. God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses; and men being justified by faith, have peace with God through the Lord Jesus Christ.

And as he died on earth to make atonement, so he lives in heaven to make intercession. 'If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life.' His mediation for man in the world of glory is effected through his perpetual and prevalent intercession at God's right hand—an intercession based upon the perfection of the work which he accomplished here below. As the high priest under the law, who was the mediator of the old covenant, went in before Jehovah in behalf of the people, but not without blood, bearing on his breastplate the names of the twelve tribes of Israel;—in like manner, Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, appears continually in the presence of God for us, presenting before the throne the blood of the covenant shed for the remission of sins, and bearing on his heart and on his shoulder the names of his people—on his shoulder that he may sustain them by his power, on his heart that he may bless them with his love. Whether he needs to mediate for them by express words is a useless inquiry. The blood of Abel had no audible voice, any more than the spheres in the firmament, which nevertheless speak the Maker's praise to men of every tongue. Abel's blood had a voice, and so has the blood of Christ. But it speaketh better things than the blood of Abel. The blood of Abel cried loud for vengeance; the blood of the Lamb slain, seen in the midst of the throne, gently whispers peace. This is the true Israel, who as a Prince hath power with God and with man, and prevails.

But if it be a blessed truth that there is a Mediator between us and our offended Sovereign, let it be deeply impressed upon our minds that there is but one. This necessarily results from the fact of there being but one God, with whom we have to do. As he is the infinite and unchangeable, there is but one sacrifice can meet the demands of his perfect law; there is but one Intercessor who, upon the plea of that sacrifice, can propitiate his favour. Every saint, however holy, is a sinner saved by grace; every seraph, however exalted, is but a servant fulfilling his own appointed work. Other foundation for acceptance can no man lay, save that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus. His is the only name given under heaven among men whereby (if we are to be saved at all) we must be saved. 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.'

Rejoice, O Christian! in your having such an advocate with the Father, as Jesus Christ the Righteous One, who urges your suit at the court of heaven in the form of a man, and with the feelings of a brother. Yes! the Mediator is the man Christ Jesus. Men as they rise in honour and power too often lose the recollections and forsake the friendships of their humbler days. But though Jesus the Son of God hath passed into the heavens, we have not there a High Priest who cannot be touched with a feeling of our infirmities, but one who feels with us and careth for us. Does Christ live for you in heaven, and ought not you to live for him on earth? Does he represent you before God? And should not you, in your humble sphere, seek to represent him among men? Does he stand and plead your cause with God? And will not you stand up for him before the evil-doers, and plead his cause with the workers of iniquity?

NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'He that cometh from above is above all,' John iii. 31.

It is of the utmost consequence, that we entertain correct and scriptural views of the person of Christ the Mediator. Now his forerunner, John, here solemnly testifies to the great and essential difference that existed between himself and the Master, in that, while he, like all former divine messengers, was of the 'earth, earthy,' Christ was from heaven above, and coming as the Lord from heaven, is 'above all.'

Mark here the recognition of a distinction of natures in Christ; for the words seem clearly to imply that he possesses another nature besides his human. And the same idea is confirmed by a variety of other passages, where there is no express assertion of his Supreme divinity. 'What and if ye should see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before? I went out from the Father, and am come unto the world; again I leave the world, and go unto the Father. No one hath ascended up to heaven, save he who came down from heaven, even the Son of Man, who is in heaven.' To denote his possession of a nature superior to the human, is he not often expressly distinguished from men? 'Paul an apostle not of man nor by men, but by Jesus Christ.' 'Not as pleasing men, but as the servants of Christ.' 'The law maketh men high priests, but the word of the oath maketh the Son.' What mystery, indeed, could there have been in the 'Word being manifest in flesh,' unless it was the manifestation of a higher nature than that of mere man—a nature till then invisible?

But the Baptist here further asserts the pre-existence of Christ, or that his superior nature had a being before his appearance in our world. The same sentiment had previously been uttered by John when he said: 'He that cometh after me is preferred before me, (or goes before me) for he was before me.' Witness, too, Christ's own remarkable declaration to the Jews: 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am.' Even if that does not imply self-existence, it must certainly denote an existence prior to that of Abraham; for this was the proof which he adduced of his being 'greater than Abraham,' and so the Jews understood him, nor did he contradict the inference they drew from it.

It is farther intimated here, that this higher, invisible, pre-existent nature of the Christ, had its abode in heaven; and lest we might suppose that it was an angelic nature, other passages assure us that it was not the nature of angels, but a nature far superior to theirs. In describing his incarnation it is said, 'He took not on him the nature of angels,' i. e. the new nature he assumed was not that of angels; the angelic was not his former superior nature, nor was it the inferior nature which he afterwards assumed. Angels, as their name imports, are only messengers or servants; and the Almighty employs, in that capacity, even inanimate creatures, making 'the winds his messengers, and the flaming fire his ministers.' But unto which of the angels saith he at any time, 'Thou art my Son. Sit thou at my right hand!' Unto which of the angels saith he not, 'Let all the angels of God worship Him!'

'He that cometh from above is above all,' because he was before all. He had an existence prior to the foundation of the world. 'In the beginning was the Word,' even in that beginning when God created the heavens and the earth. He had a glory with the Father before the world was, for the Father loved him before the foundation of the world. 'The same was in the beginning with God;' he was 'before all things.' These declarations, if they do not explicitly assert his existence from eternity, seem necessarily to imply it; and it is elsewhere set forth in terms as plain and distinct as can be furnished by the language of man. He is that 'Eternal Life that was with the Father and was manifested unto us.' To him the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews applies the sublime description of the psalmist: 'Thou, Lord, in the beginning didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands,' (there is the past eternity). 'They shall perish, but thou endurest—thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail,' (there is the eternity to come). How is the eternal, independent, necessary self-existence of God the Father set forth in the book of Revelation? By language which is elsewhere in the same book applied to the Lord Jesus Christ: 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, the first and the last.' Connecting all these proofs together, can we now err in acknowledging, that he who came from above is above all, seeing that he is God over all, blessed for ever? Amen.

How consoling to the Christian to know, that his Lord and Saviour came 'from above!' Did he reveal the character of God? He had been in his bosom from eternity. Did he make known the bliss of heaven? It had been his eternal home. On the other hand, how much does this consideration enhance the responsibility and aggravate the guilt of those who reject him! He is 'the Lord from heaven!' 'See then that ye refuse not him that speaketh; for if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven.'

TENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father,' John v. 23.

WE have seen the plain testimony of scripture as to a distinction of natures in Christ—the one human, the other superior to the nature of man, superior to the nature of angels—a nature which existed before his manifestation in flesh, yea, before the foundation of the world, even from all eternity. But, in addition to this, the bible contains many intimations, more or less direct, of his true and proper divinity.

How is the Supreme God known and acknowledged by his rational creatures? Is it not by the perfections of his character, and the names that are consequently given to him? Is it not by the works of his hand, and the worship that is consequently paid to him.

Is omnipotence, or the power of doing every thing that seemeth to him good, an essential attribute of Jehovah? Jesus is the 'Mighty God.' In nothing is the 'exceeding greatness' of the divine power more signally exhibited than in raising the dead. Yet he had power to lay down his own life, and he had power to take it again; and he will raise and change the vile bodies of his saints, and fashion them like unto his glorious body, according to the energy whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. Is omnipresence a necessary perfection of the divinity, no less than underived eternal self-existence? Christ's ability to show himself everywhere present is asserted in terms as express as those which the Old Testament had employed in reference to the God of Israel. By Jehovah it was promised: 'In all places where I record my name I will come unto you, and I will bless you.' And by the Saviour it is promised: 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' The same perfection is involved in his omniscience, or the prerogative of knowing all things. Every circumstance in human character and human conduct lies naked and open before him. He 'knew all men, and needed not that any man should testify to him of man; for he knew what was in man.' He knew from the beginning who they were that believed not, and who he was that should betray him. Now to know the human heart is described as a distinguishing characteristic of Jehovah. 'The heart is deceitful above all things. Who can know it? I, Jehovah, search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.' But the self-same power is asserted of the Son of God, 'who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire:' 'All the churches shall know that I am He which searcheth the reins and hearts; and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.' Hence the declaration of Simon Peter: 'Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee.' Hence the prayer of the disciples when assembled to appoint a successor to Judas: 'Thou, Lord, who knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen.' Hence the expectation of the waiting church for the time when 'the Lord shall come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts.'

Turn we from his perfections to his works,—from what he is to what he does. What is the most common representation given of the Supreme God in the bible? Is it not as the 'Maker of heaven and earth?' What is the most common of all the proofs appealed to there, as well as in natural religion, for the being of a God? Is it not the work of creation, in which the invisible things of him, even his eternal power and Godhead, are clearly seen from the things that he made? But of Christ it is asserted, in terms the most explicit and comprehensive, that he made the worlds—that without him not any one thing was made that was made—that by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him. Is it alleged that he may have done all this by delegated authority and communicated power? What then becomes of the argument for the existence of a Supreme God, drawn from the works of his hand? Is it supposed that nothing more was intended in these passages than a spiritual and moral creation by the gospel? But did the unfallen principalities or powers stand in need of this new creation? Or can it be said that in this sense the world was made by him, when it is added of the same world, 'the world knew him not.' Moreover, of the earth and the heavens which he created, it is affirmed that 'they shall perish,' but can that be affirmed of any part of his new creation?

But there are other works of God, no less honourable and glorious, which demonstrate his existence, and show forth his praise, and these likewise are ascribed to Christ. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand—all things pertaining to the providence of the universe, the government of the church, the judgment of the great day. He upholdeth all things by the word of his power; by him all things consist. When on earth he had power to forgive sins, and now he is exalted far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. All things are put under his feet; in all things he has the pre-eminence; he is the Head over all things to his church; and as in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, he filleth all in all. Hence to him belongs the mighty work of the resurrection, and none but He shall fill the seat of judgment. 'We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ: so then every one of us must give an account of himself unto God.'

It is after we find these attributes and works of God ascribed to the Saviour, that we are prepared to understand the sense in which the names and titles of God are given to him, for we then perceive that it is not the language of figure but of fact. 'The Word was God.' 'God was manifest in flesh.' As concerning the flesh he was of the seed of David, but being justified in the Spirit, he was declared to be God over all, blessed for ever.

Need we wonder then that he has been, and now is, the object of humble adoration, and the subject of grateful praise, both on earth and in heaven. The first disciples in every place called upon the name of the Lord. Thomas owned him as 'his God;' often was he besought of Paul, and to him Stephen commended his departing spirit. All the angels of God worship him; all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father; and a time is coming, when at the once despised name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth, and every tongue shall confess that he is Maker, Proprietor, Governor, Lord of all—to the glory of God the Father.

TENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren,' Heb. ii. 17.

In setting forth the love of God the Son towards our sinful race, as shown in his spontaneous and devoted interposition between them and merited punishment, the scriptures often dwell upon the fact, that he did not disdain to assume their own frail and dying flesh. And it is, indeed, very evident, that this is a circumstance which is well fitted to show the deep intensity of his attachment to them, and the low condescension to which, on their account, he was willing to submit. For suppose the case, that it had come within the purpose of the Father's mercy to have devised, and of the Son's grace to have undertaken a scheme of redemption for fallen angels, and that, in order to its execution, Christ had taken upon him the nature of angels; though doubtless it had been infinite humiliation for the Creator to have veiled himself in any nature not his own, still as he made angels spirits like himself, and as they retain their high powers of intellect, even in their apostacy, there would have been some shadow of assimilation in point of spiritual capacities and spiritual energies between God the Spirit and those angelic spirits whose nature he had deigned to assume. 'But verily he took not on him the nature of angels—he was made lower than the angels,—he took on him the seed of Abraham.' There was this peculiarity in the case of ruined man, that that body in which, had he preserved his innocence, he would have flourished in immortal health and strength, has now become the source of debility, disease, death. And yet that is the very body in which, with all its weaknesses, the Son of God appears—that is the very body which, with all its meanness, misery and mortality the ever-blessed One deigns to put on. Knowing that without this depth of humiliation, the salvation of men could not have been accomplished, he despised not their affliction, he abhorred not their misery, he consented that a body should be prepared for him, and forasmuch as 'it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren,'—like unto his brethren in all things, sin only excepted, did he become.

The leading fact involved in this statement is the incarnation of our blessed Lord, or his taking to himself a true body and a reasonable soul, becoming a partaker of the flesh and blood of those whom he came to redeem, and whom, in consequence of this assumption of their nature, he acknowledges as his brethren. Like them he passed through infancy, childhood, and youth, till he reached the stature of a perfect man. He was susceptible of hunger and thirst, cold and heat and weariness; in short, of all the sinless pleasures and pains of our common humanity.

This truth of the incarnation is set forth by the apostles of the Lord in a great variety of phraseology; and the frequent and emphatic manner in which they dwell upon it seems to show, that they thought there was a risk of the primitive Christians losing sight of it in the acknowledged glories of his divinity. But while they delight in unfolding that glory in all its splendour, they represent it as enshrined on earth in the tabernacle of his flesh. Great, indeed, is the mystery of godliness, 'God manifest in flesh.' It passeth the knowledge of men; it transcends the comprehension of angels; and, therefore, all our speculations and conjectures about the modus of the union and co-existence of the two natures, divine and human in one person, are unprofitable and vain. But as a clearly revealed bible-truth we must receive it in the simplicity of faith, in the same manner as all but atheists receive the truth of the being of a God who yet cannot be searched out or understood—in the same manner as all but materialists admit the union and co-existence in one person of the fleshly body and spiritual soul of man, who is himself one of the greatest mysteries with which he is conversant.

But if the Son of God became man, it was purely for the benefit and advantage of men his brethren; it was that he might be a High Priest, merciful towards them, while faithful in the things of God, and that fulfilling the law's righteousness and suffering the law's penalty in the nature that had transgressed, he might make reconciliation for the sins of the people. The heathen represented their deities as sometimes coming down to earth in the likeness of men. But with their grovelling conceptions of the divine character, they ascribed as the reasons for this disguise, either motives of curiosity, a wish to engage in vain-glorious exploits, or to indulge in the most debasing vices. But contrasted with these imaginary visits, O how holy and beneficent, how pure and godlike, does the manifestation of the Son of God appear, when He descends into the lower parts of this earth. The meanness of our origin, the frailty of our frame, the agonising sufferings and ignominious and accursed death which in our flesh and blood he knew he was to undergo, nothing repelled him, nothing could discourage him. Never was there disinterestedness, never self-devotedness like his; for he became like unto man, not merely that he might introduce them into God's family as his brethren, but in order that in their nature for them he might suffer, and for them he might die, and that by his sufferings and death they might escape endless suffering and death everlasting. The importance then of this doctrine cannot be too greatly magnified. Reject the fact of the incarnation, and you undermine the whole gospel scheme, you destroy the possibility of a sacrificial atonement, you deprive the Christian of a suffering and sympathising brother, a powerful succourer, a once crucified but now ever-living Redeemer.

Let his own people, whom he is not ashamed to call his brethren, fix their adoring and grateful contemplation upon this marvellous truth, that he was in very deed partaker of their flesh and blood. We see him who thought it no robbery to be equal to God, vailing for a time his glory behind our feeble, dying clay, and humbling himself to the manger, to the cross, to the dust of death. We see him who inhabited the praises of eternity, leaving the happy society of heaven, and mingling with wretched outcasts; becoming an heir of the same infirmities, subject to the same laws, exposed to the same curse, and coming down among us, not in the splendours of majesty and power, but in a form of meanness and poverty, degradation and servitude. When we can realize the simple fact, that in that young man of Nazareth there dwelt for a period of thirty-three years, 'all the fullness of the Godhead bodily,' we stand in amazement at the divine condescension; we are overawed by a sense of the divine loving-kindness; we 'fear the Lord and his goodness.' Will God in very deed dwell with man upon the earth? When we know that God did, in very deed, dwell with man upon the earth, we feel as if this polluted globe had been sanctified by such a visitant, and every spot of it on which we tread is now holy ground.

---

ELEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me;'
Luke xxiv. 44.

THE ancient Jews divided the Old Testament scriptures into three great portions, viz. the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses: the Prophets, comprising the historical books (exclusive of the Pentateuch), and the Prophets strictly so called: and the Chetubim or Hagiographa, i. e. holy writings, which was sometimes simply called 'the Psalms,' from the book with which it began. Our blessed Lord then in the above passage, before 'opening the understandings of his disciples to understand the scriptures,' intimates to them that all these scriptures had testified of himself. He was the sum and substance of all the ancient revelations, and especially of the recorded predictions. To Him gave all the prophets witness, throwing around him the beams of their united light. The 'spirit of prophecy' was 'the testimony of Jesus;' for it was the 'Spirit of Christ' that was in these holy seers, and it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

Even in the age before the flood, God left not himself without witness to the great work of redemption that was to be accomplished by his Son. No sooner had man fallen, than his guilty fears were relieved (even before the threatened curse was uttered) by the cheering announcement that the 'woman's seed should bruise the serpent's head.' In the faith of his advent, Adam worshipped and Abel sacrificed before the 'presence of the Lord' at the east of Eden; and Enoch walked with God as reconciled by the Messiah's first coming, while he prophesied of his second coming to judgment. Noah, too, was a preacher of that righteousness of faith of which he was an heir, his deliverance by the ark being a figure at once of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, and of the baptismal purification of his people.

In patriarchal times the Redeemer was made known to Abraham as he in whom all the families of the earth shall be blessed;—and the gospel promise thus preached to him was, through his faith, counted unto him for righteousness. The same assurance was often renewed to him, more especially on the occasion of his offering up Isaac the son of promise—an affecting emblem of God not sparing his own Son but delivering him up for us all. In Melchisedec, the righteous and peaceful king of Salem, and the priest of the Most High God, do we not perceive a figure of the Son of God, who is now a priest upon his throne, and being a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec hath, like him, a divinely-derived and untransferable priesthood? At Bethel, where the Angel of the covenant talked with Jacob, he saw a mystic ladder bringing heaven and earth into union like the great Mediator, and upon which the holy angels of God ascended and descended as on the Son of man. But from which of Jacob's many sons is the Messiah to be born? 'That our Lord was to spring out of Judah it is evident; for of him was it said by his dying father: 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and to him shall the gathering of the nations be.' About the same period a voice was heard from the land of Uz, saying, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth.'

We next come to the grand era of Moses, who was himself an eminent type of the Christ, as Deliverer, Prophet, Governor, and Judge of his people. And in 'the law of Moses' many things are written of him. As his salvation had been shadowed forth by the redemption from Egypt, by the passover and the sprinkling with blood, so the whole ritual that was established was one grand prefigurative image of Him that was to come. He was set forth in every bleeding sacrifice as an offering for sin; in the manna from heaven as the bread of life; in the smitten rock as the source of refreshment; in the brazen serpent as the crucified, exalted Saviour; in the tabernacle and temple as the residence of the present Deity—God with man upon the earth; and in the Urim and Thummim of the sacred oracle as the brightness of glory, the perfection of beauty, the light and life of men.

The frequency with which Christ is spoken of in the 'Prophets and Psalms' may be gathered from the fact that in no less than thirty-three different places, the Evangelist Matthew alone, after adverting to some particular incident in the life of his divine Master, adds: 'These things were done that the scripture might be fulfilled.' The period at which he should appear, the family whence he should descend, the place where he should be born—the beauties of his character, the value of his doctrine, the might and mercy of his works—all was foretold. But still more minute were the predictions to which he himself here referred, as having been fulfilled in his last sufferings and death. The description of the traitor had been given in the Psalms, as 'his own familiar friend who ate of his bread, yet lifted up his heel against him.' The exact price for which he sold his Lord (the price of the vilest slave), and its employment in the purchase of the potter's field had been specified by the prophet Zechariah as 'the price of him whom the children of Israel did value.' When brought to prison and to judgment, 'false witnesses were to rise up against him, and such as breathed out cruelty.' All that should then see him would 'laugh him to scorn.' He was to give his 'back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and hide not his face from shame and spitting, so that 'his visage would be more marred than any man, and his form more than the sons of men.' They were to pierce his hands and feet, and yet a bone of him was not to be broken. They were to part his garments among them, and yet for his chief vesture they were to cast lots. Even the sorrowful plaint he was to utter from the cross had been expressed by the Psalmist by anticipation: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' In fulfilling the law and the prophets, he who is the grand theme of the Old Testament, the antitype of the types, the substance of the shadows, the sum of God's ancient revelation, not only put honour upon it through life, but in the very act of dying. He held his life until the scriptures should be accomplished. And knowing that his receiving a draught of vinegar was the last thing connected with his death, recorded in the book of Psalms, he looked down upon his murderers, and raising his expiring voice into 'a loud cry,' he begged that that might be given him as the last conclusive proof that he was indeed the Messiah of whom Moses, and David, and Isaiah had spoken: 'Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished: and he bowed his head and gave up the ghost.'

ELEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons,' Gal. iv. 4, 5.

God is not a God of confusion, but of order; he does every thing not only in the best possible way, but at the best possible time. He might have sent his Son into the world as soon as man fell, or he might have delayed his mission until the end of the world; but in making known to us the riches of his grace 'he has abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence;' and, therefore, not until the period fixed in the eternal counsels of the 'only wise God,' was the Lamb manifested, who had been foreordained before the foundation of the world.

Hence the gospel is called the 'dispensation of the fullness of times.' The mystery hid for ages was not disclosed till the moment appointed and approved of God; and that moment was 'the fullness of time'—because it was neither too soon nor too late. All the reasons for this arrangement can be known only to God, yet there are some of them which appear sufficiently obvious to every candid and humble inquirer.

It was not too soon; for it was necessary that men should be taught by long and universal experience, how little could be effected by human wisdom or human power, in securing the grand objects of religion and virtue. 'The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick;' and the Gentile nations were suffered so long to walk in their own ways, that they might have at last a thorough proof and an entire consciousness of their spiritual malady, and thus be the better prepared to welcome the Great Physician. After so lengthened and so extensive a trial, it had become evident beyond all controversy, that mankind were utterly impotent to deliver themselves from their darkness and misery; and this conviction would pre-dispose them to embrace more readily the light and life of the gospel. 'For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe.' Another reason for the seeming delay may be found in the necessity which existed for preparing the untutored minds of Jews as well as Gentiles, for the revelation of abstract truth, by a previous economy of type and symbol, which presented outward things to the outward senses as patterns of the things spiritual and heavenly that were to be exhibited to the eye of faith. Moreover, the peace and consolation which the gospel was to impart would be more eagerly sought, and more highly valued, in consequence of the dispensation of terror and bondage which preceded it; and thus the law, both ceremonial and moral, 'was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ.'

But while the period here designated the 'fulness of time' was not too soon, so neither was it too late, as (speaking after the manner of men) it might have been, had the coming of the Son of God been delayed any longer. For by this time, as at the period of the deluge, 'all flesh had corrupted their way upon the earth.' The heathen world had been for ages sunk in the grossest ignorance of all that it most concerned them to know and to practice in order to happiness. And the night of thick darkness which so long overspread the other nations had now extended its deadly shadow to the favoured land of the Most High. Religion had degenerated into a lifeless form; morality was an empty name; judgment, mercy, and the love of God had nearly disappeared beneath the withering influence of Pharisaic hypocrisy and Sadducean infidelity and licentiousness.

There had nevertheless arisen not in Judea only, but throughout all the East an earnest, longing expectation of some merciful Deliverer. And at length the day dawned, the Sun of Righteousness appeared, the Great Prophet was manifested, mighty in word and deed, who was to be at once a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel. 'When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son.'

And as there was manifold wisdom displayed in the æra selected for his mission, so there was love and grace unutterable in the mission itself. It was not the highest of created beings that was sent, but God's own Son, his only Son, his well-beloved Son, who had been in his bosom from eternity, and in whom his soul delighted. Him he 'sent forth' from riches and glory to poverty and shame, from the songs of angels to the scorn of sinners, from heaven's highest happiness to earth's lowest misery. He became 'man born of woman,' and his days, therefore, though few, were full of trouble. He was 'made under the law'—subject to its ritual ordinances which he scrupulously observed, bound by its moral precepts which he righteously fulfilled,—yet, as the substitute of transgressors, exposed also to its penalty which he meekly endured. He thus became the Redeemer by being himself the Ransom. By his perfect righteousness imputed, and his powerful grace imparted, he redeems at once from the yoke of the law ceremonial, and the curse of the law moral, from the dominion of sin and the tyranny of Satan. His ransomed people thus pass from darkness to light, from death to life, from the condemnation of rebels to 'the adoption of sons.' God is their Father, Christ their elder brother, angels their ministers, and heaven their home.

'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!' Amazing condescension! that the Son of God should become the Son of Man, in order that sons of men might become sons of God. Let the life and character correspond, in some measure, to the high rank, the exalted privileges, the glorious hopes. 'Now are we the sons of God; and we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him.' 'Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.'

TWELFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever,' Rom. ix. 5.

DIVINE grace does not extinguish natural affection. Faith worketh by love; but this love is discriminating, and has a respect to all the different relations by which we are connected both as men and as Christians. Paul desired the salvation of all men, but he felt a peculiar and most pressing concern for the spiritual welfare of his Jewish countrymen. On their account he had 'great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart.' He went so far as to say, 'I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh.'

The Jews had many strong claims to his sympathy. Some of them were united to him by the ties of blood; many of them had been endeared to him in the bonds of friendship. They were all his fellow-countrymen, members of one commonwealth, the descendants of one great progenitor. Now they were a degraded people; but the apostle looked back to their former distinction, and viewed them as a nation that had been set apart and singularly honoured of God. Speaking of them, he says: 'Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever.'

It was the peculiar honour of the Jews that of them, 'as concerning the flesh, Christ came.' His descent can be traced from Abraham downwards in one unbroken line of succession. Agreeably to ancient prophecy, he sprung from the tribe of Judah, and the family of David. When he came to the Jews, 'he came to his own, but they received him not.' That which should have recommended him to their acceptance, was made by them a ground of objection against him. Even the brethren of Jesus, we are told, did not believe in him. Natural relationship is often unconnected with spiritual affinity. Many who stand highest in privilege are lowest in character, and shall be last in condition. The Jews gloried in being the descendants of Abraham, but despised the honour of being the progenitors of Christ.

The descent of the Saviour does not affect his essential dignity. He, who in his human nature could claim no higher than Jewish origin, is declared to be 'God blessed for ever;' and to make it manifest that this name was applied to him, not in the way of accommodation merely, nor to express an inferior and delegated authority, but to affirm his proper and supreme divinity, he is pronounced to be 'over all, God blessed for ever.' We are expressly commanded to honour the Son, even as we honour the Father. He bears the titles, possesses the attributes, performs the works, and claims the worship which belong exclusively to God. He himself asserted his Godhead; he accepted the homage which is peculiar to Deity; he allowed himself to be addressed by names which are descriptive of true and proper divinity. The work which the Father had given him to do required that he should be God, and proves that he is God. To bear the iniquities of his people in his own body on the tree, and by the one offering of himself to make reconciliation for iniquity, and bring in an everlasting righteousness; to act the part of Mediator between God and man, so as to sustain the honour of the former, and secure the interests of the latter; this is a work which Deity alone could execute. Jesus is a divine Saviour, and therefore 'mighty to save.' His obedience unto death has all the worth and efficacy which Deity could give it, and is worthy of all the confidence we can repose, of all the gratitude we can feel, and all the honour we can render.

As God he is the portion of his people. They have renounced every other ground of dependence; they have seen the vanity of earthly things; they have learned the guilt and folly of self-righteousness; they have abandoned all those 'refuges of lies' which the pride of an unbelieving heart naturally prefers; they have fled to Christ as their only hope; they build on him as the sure foundation; they accept of him as their all-sufficient portion. He is precious to them as the pearl of great price: they feel his service to be perfect freedom, and can say, 'Whom have I in heaven but thee? there is none upon earth whom I desire besides thee: thou art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.'

They honour him by their submission 'as well as their confidence, for he is at once their Sovereign and their Saviour. They confess his supreme dominion, and with the apostle declare him to be 'over all, God blessed for ever.' As God he is 'over all' in virtue of his essential and undivided prerogative. But he sways the sceptre of authority as the reward of his voluntary and meritorious abasement. He 'humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name.' He is 'over all' in—

The kingdom of nature. The earth is his, and the fullness thereof, and he giveth to every man severally as he wills. All creatures, from the mightiest to the meanest, 'live, and move, and have their being' in him. He rules over them as his subjects, and makes use of them as his instruments to fulfil his purposes, to protect his people, and show forth his praise. He is 'over all' in—

The operations of providence. Events occur exactly in the time, and manner, and order of his appointment. He sits at the helm of affairs, and guides the stupendous vessel in her course, permitting every storm that blows, producing every calm that succeeds, 'working all things according to the counsel of his will. Whatsoever pleaseth him that he doeth in the heavens above, and in the earth beneath.' He is 'over all' in—

The dispensation of grace; for he is Head over all things to the church, which is his body. Ministers possess a degree of authority, but it is derived from him, and must be exercised in subordination to him. Ordinances exert a beneficial influence, but they owe all their efficacy to his blessing. His will is our law in all matters both of faith and practice. This is a prerogative which he will not give to another, and which he will not share with another. But he has a two-fold empire in the church: one external and visible, another spiritual and invisible; the former extending to all who profess the faith of Christ, the latter confined to those who possess it.

His people are they who have been made willing that he should reign over them. They bear his image, and bow to his sceptre, and live in dependence upon him, and hold themselves at his disposal, and offer up the daily homage of their united ascriptions, saying, 'Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever.' 'Remember me, O Lord, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people. O visit me with thy salvation: that I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that I may glory with thine inheritance.'

TWELFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth,' John i. 14.

WORDS are the signs of our ideas, and the means of intercourse and communication between man and man. The bible is 'the word' of God, because it conveys to us the expression of his mind or will. But when the evangelist declares that 'the Word was made flesh,' it is evident that he speaks of a person, and it is equally obvious that he speaks of the person of Christ. In him from eternity were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and in the fullness of time he appeared on earth, in the character of a teacher sent from God to unfold the mysteries of his kingdom, to display the glories of his character, and reveal his purpose of mercy for the instruction and salvation of a benighted and perishing world.

But to fit him for his work it was necessary that the Word should be made flesh. The term 'flesh,' expresses the reality of our Lord's human nature, and embodies the great fact of his incarnation. He emptied himself of the glory which he had with the Father, and took upon him, not the nature of angels, but the nature of man, for he came to save not angels but men. His obedience could not have answered the end for which it was designed, had it not been the obedience of a man. He, therefore, became literally 'bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh,' having a true body and a reasonable soul, endued with the same faculties, performing the same functions, and subject to the same infirmities which are common to men. But his flesh had no mixture of depravity in it. He was in reality made flesh, but he was made only in the 'likeness of sinful flesh.' Because he had no sin of his own, he could offer himself a sacrifice for the sins of his people. It was a pure and perfect sacrifice that he presented; and the righteousness which he wrought out, in his life and by his death, was strictly and properly the righteousness of a man, and such as might be imputed to man for the ground of his justification and acceptance with God. 'Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.'

In his incarnation Christ emptied himself, but by thus emptying himself he acquired a fullness which he could not otherwise have possessed; a mediatorial fullness, a fullness of all spiritual excellencies and blessings; not the fullness of a vessel which is diminished by communication, but the fullness of a fountain which is ever flowing, yet ever full. He is 'full of grace and truth.' These words are descriptive of the character of Christ, and attribute to him the—

Perfection of all moral excellency. Grace expresses, in particular, the benevolence or compassion of Christ. The apostle has employed it in this sense in writing to the church at Corinth, 'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he who was rich for your sakes became poor, that ye by his poverty might be rich.' It was grace that brought him down from heaven to earth; grace appeared in all that he said, and did, and suffered; grace was infused into his lips, and breathed in all his discourses; his miracles were all acts of grace; his submission to the death of the cross exhibits a manifestation of sovereign, disinterested, unparalleled grace. He not only had grace, but was full of it; he possessed not one gracious property merely, but had grace in all its varieties, combining the estimable in character with the amiable, things pure and excellent with things lovely and of good report. But he was also 'full of truth.' This marks the sincerity and uprightness of his character. The Jews called him a deceiver, yet none of them could convince him of sin. He taught the way of God truly, and proved himself to be the faithful and true Witness. In him grace and truth were blended together in beautiful consistency, and absolute perfection. But the terms 'grace and truth,' apply to the redeeming work of Christ, and ascribe to him a—

Plenitude of all spiritual blessings. Grace expresses generally the privileges of God's favour and family, including pardon and acceptance, a new heart and a right spirit, deliverance from the bondage of corruption, the victory which overcometh the world, a title to heaven, and a meetness for it. In particular grace very frequently denotes the influences of the Holy Spirit. These and all other spiritual blessings are contained in the fullness of Christ. They are his by the appointment of the Father, for it pleased the Father that in him all fullness should dwell; they are his by the purchase of his own blood, in terms of the everlasting covenant whose conditions he fulfilled. To him especially has been committed a dispensation of the Spirit, and what he said to Paul he says to every disciple: 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' Truth, on the other hand, is expressive of knowledge or doctrine, and in this view of it Jesus could affirm, 'I am the truth.' He is the essence of eternal truth, and the substance of revealed truth. He must, therefore, have a perfect comprehension of truth, as well as be supremely qualified to make it known to others.

All the spiritual wants of his people have been provided for in the fullness of Christ. They are by nature ignorant, having the understanding darkened by the god of this world, who leads them captive at his will. But Christ is full of truth to open the eyes of their understanding, to turn them from darkness to light, and to train them up 'unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ.' By nature also, and by wicked works, they are enemies to God, exposed to his wrath, destitute of his image, averse to his service, incapable of honouring or enjoying him. But Christ is full of grace to pardon their sins, and restore them to favour, to purify their hearts, and fit them for duty. There is in him a fullness of all that they should desire, or can stand in need of either in time or for eternity. And his fullness is like himself—infinite and inexhaustible. As it is sufficient for all so it is accessible to all.

'Of his fullness have all we received, and grace for grace.' But as it was with him, so is it in some measure with his people. Grace and truth are combined in them as they were in him. He first opens the blind eyes by the light of his truth, and then subdues the stubborn and stony heart by the power of his grace. Truth is the instrument to prepare the way for grace, and grace is the agent to apply and give effect to the truth. Neither of them can be dispensed with, and in the experience of every true Christian both are combined. There may be truth in the understanding without grace in the heart, but grace cannot exist without the accompaniment of at least some portion of the truth. Hence the necessity of prayer in order to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. The light of truth may be diffused by mere human efforts, but the truth can be made effectual only by the operation of grace promised and put forth in answer to prayer. Truth is mighty and shall prevail, but the might of truth comes into operation through the omnipotence of grace

It is our privilege, as it was that of his personal followers, to behold in the flesh and fullness of Christ the glory as of the only begotten of the Father. We behold the antitype of that glory which overshadowed the mercy-seat, and which shone forth permanently, then first in the tabernacle, and afterwards in the temple. We see not a material glory which dazzles the external eye like that which the worshipping Israelites contemplated in the wilderness of Sinai, and which caused even Moses to exclaim, 'I do exceedingly fear and quake,' but a glory equally real, and incomparably more effulgent; the concentrated glory of all the divine perfections, not dimly shadowed forth, but clearly and intelligibly manifested. Let us behold his glory by making it the object of our devout contemplation, the theme of our study, and our song of praise; and 'beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord,' 'let us seek to be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.'

THIRTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Unto us a child is born, and his name shall be called, The mighty God,' Isa. ix. 6.

'Of whom speaketh the prophet this?' There is only one Being in the universe to whom this language can with any appearance of truth or consistency be applied. It is he who 'was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but who took upon him the form of a servant, and was found in fashion as a man;' who is at once the Creator and a creature, the everlasting Father and an infant of days; who combines in one mysterious person supreme dignity with the deepest abasement, the majesty of heaven with the meanness of earth, the peculiar attributes of Deity with the common properties of humanity.

The Old Testament saints were enabled to view the birth of Christ as an event already past. Regarding it in the light of inspiration Isaiah foresaw its certain approach, and could anticipate the angel's message to the shepherds of Bethlehem: 'Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.' Jesus is said to be the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; with equal propriety he may be pronounced the child born from the foundation of the world. Jewish patriarchs and prophets realized the fact of the Saviour's birth, not only as an object of hope, but a source of joy and thanksgiving. What was to them an article of faith, is with us a matter of history. We do not anticipate a future, but commemorate a past event, when we say, 'Unto us a child is born.'

The gracious design of Christ's birth should be carefully observed, and gratefully remembered. He is a child born 'unto us,' that is, for our benefit. He was given to us that he might be given for us a sacrifice to God of sweet smelling savour. The gift was perfectly free, and is inestimably precious. God had no greater or better gift to bestow. And he gave it not because he might not honourably have withheld it, but because sinners could not be saved without it. Truly 'in this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him;' and 'herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.'

The humiliating circumstances of the Saviour's birth must not be overlooked. These were all expressive of extreme indigence and lowliest abasement. His mother was the wife of an obscure and humble carpenter. His first dwelling was a stable, and a manger his bed. Even ordinary comforts and accommodations were denied him. But in the birth of Christ the lowliness of assumed humanity was connected with intimations of essential divinity. A voice from heaven declared him to be the Son of the Highest. An angel from before the throne descended to announce the event of his birth, and a host of angels joyfully hailed the announcement with a song of celestial melody, proclaiming 'glory to God in the highest, and peace on earth, goodwill to men.' The inhabitants of Bethlehem regarded him not, but eastern sages, travelling from a distant land, and guided by a supernatural star, hastened to do him homage.

To the eye of sense, indeed, the birth of Christ presented a scene of abject poverty and wretchedness. The child lay in all the helplessness of infancy, needing support, and imploring sympathy. But to the view of an enlightened faith the stable of Bethlehem exhibited a spectacle of sublime and surpassing interest. In any circumstances the birth of a child is an event of incalculable importance. It is the production of an immortal spirit, destined to spend an eternity, either in the light of God's countenance, or in the misery of outer darkness, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Who can tell to what extent he may become the instrument of good or of evil! Of unspeakably greater importance is the birth of a prince, the heir of a throne, the guide and the guardian of a nation's destinies! But how momentous beyond all comparison, and above all comprehension, must be the birth of Him who is the Prince of all the kings of the earth, and of whom it was predicted, 'and his name shall be called, The mighty God.'

This name has been given to him, not by the wisdom of fallible man, but by the word of the true God; not in obscure and doubtful terms, but in language plain and unequivocal; not in a few, but in many instances. As his name is, so is his character. He proved himself to be the mighty God by the words of truth which he uttered, and the wonders of power which he performed. At his bidding the waves ceased their raging, and devils abandoned their victims. His word gave health to the sick, hearing to the deaf, eyes to the blind, speech to the dumb, feet to the lame, and life to the dead. A virtue went out from him which produced immediate cures upon all to whom it extended, how distant soever in place, or hopeless in condition. His omnipotence reached to the souls of men as well as their bodies, and discovered itself in tranquilizing the troubled mind, in healing the wounded spirit, in converting the heart of stone into flesh, and the principle of enmity into a spirit of love.

The believing followers of Christ have learned to call him by the name of 'the mighty God.' They have seen its inscription written by the finger of God, and shining forth as with the light of a sunbeam on the page of inspiration. To the evidence of scripture has been added the testimony of experience. By revealing his Son in them, God has effectually convinced them of his deity, and constrained them with Thomas to exclaim, 'My Lord and my God.' They have the witness in themselves, and from what they have felt of his gracious power they know and acknowledge him to be indeed 'the mighty God.' This conviction is at once strong and unanimous. On many other points they differ in opinion, but with respect to the deity of Christ they are all of one mind. They all repose in him an unlimited confidence, and render to him supreme honour.

What may they not expect from him who is the mighty God! All things are his in nature, providence, and grace. But all that he is and has is theirs, for 'he is not ashamed to be called their God.' Therefore all things are theirs, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come. His infinite resources are pledged to supply them with all necessary good, as well as to support and deliver them from all existing evil. 'He hath provided for them a city.' And he is preparing them for it, and will put them in personal and everlasting possession of it. He is their Sun, and their Shield, he will give grace and glory, and will withhold no good thing from them.

But as he is theirs, so they are his. If they may warrantably expect so much from him, how much is he entitled to demand from them. 'Ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.' 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.' 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.'

---

THIRTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And again, when he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him,' Heb. i. 6.

THE scriptures afford little information with regard to the angels of God. Yet some interesting particulars have been recorded. We read of 'the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation,' and are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day. Hence we learn that there are fallen angels as well as men. But their apostasy was not universal. Those that maintained their allegiance are called 'holy angels.' With respect to their residence we are told that they dwell in the more immediate presence of God, before whom they offer up the homage of their united and unceasing devotion. We read of 'an innumerable company of angels,' all of whom are animated with one spirit of reverence, humility, zeal, and gratitude. They 'excel in strength,' and they exert their strength in fulfilling the pleasure of their Creator, and in promoting the ends of his government both in providence and grace. Angels are God's messengers to declare his will, and his ministers to execute it either for mercy or judgment. God's church and people derive important benefits from their instrumentality; for 'are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them which are the heirs of salvation. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.' But it is their highest privilege to serve him of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named; 'And when he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him.'

It is to the period of our Lord's incarnation that this emphatic injunction obviously refers. In his pre-existent state he had been the object of worship to angels who saw his glory, and acknowledged his divinity by presenting to him in common with the Father and the Holy Spirit the expressions of the most profound adoration and fervent praise. His mediatorial abasement in taking our nature upon him, did not lessen his claim to these angelic ascriptions, but on the contrary invested him with a new and most peculiar title to them. Accordingly, he had no sooner made his appearance upon earth, 'in the form of a servant,' and 'in fashion as a man,' than a voice, proceeding from the eternal throne, asserted his supreme dignity in the command: 'And let all the angels of God worship him.' By this order the babe lying in the stable at Bethlehem, in circumstances of apparent meanness and destitution, exposed to the contempt of a world which he had made, was notwithstanding declared to be the Lord of angels, and not only worthy of the respect which was due to their superior, but entitled to the worship which belonged to their Creator.

For it does not admit of a doubt that the worship required from the angels by this command is strictly and properly of a religious nature. As the reward of the Saviour's humiliation we are informed that 'God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth. And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' He claims from angels the worship of adoration, which is expressive of reverence, humility, confidence, and gratitude in the highest possible degree. But they are commanded to give him also the worship of their submission and service; for it is not the homage of the lips merely that is required or will be accepted, either from angels or men, but that of the heart and life. We read that 'angels, authorities, and powers were subject to him;' and he not only rules over them as subjects, but makes use of them as instruments to fulfil his purposes, and promote the interests of his kingdom. The command is most just and reasonable that all the angels of God should worship him. Their worship is due to the perfections of his Godhead; it is no less due to the honour of his mediatorship. By the angels themselves the command is understood in its most comprehensive import; they cordially approve of it, and yield to it a cheerful and perfect obedience.

During his abode on earth Jesus had to bear the scorn and contempt of men, but he was honoured with the worship of angels. They expressed their joy at his birth in a song of pious exultation and thanksgiving, doing honour alike to the Son and the Father, by ascribing 'glory to God in the highest.' In the wilderness, which had been the scene of his triumph, they attended him to supply his wants, and congratulate him on his victory. They stood by him in the garden to strengthen him under the weight of his mysterious agony. They uncovered his sepulchre to open the way for his resurrection; and they were present at his ascension to comfort his disciples, and announce to the church the event of his second coming. On these and other occasions, during the days of his flesh, the angels of God discovered their zeal for his glory, and declared their readiness to do him homage.

But their feelings of devotion are fully expressed in the services of the heavenly temple. There the glories of the Lamb fill every heart with love, and every mouth with praise. All the angels of God worship him, 'whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers.' They cover their faces with their wings in the contemplation of his greatness, and under the consciousness of their own insignificance. It is a willing, united, and harmonious service which they render to him. No constraint is employed, no reluctance felt, no hypocrisy assumed. Their worship has nothing in it of cold indifference or empty formality, but is full of ardour and energy, and at the same time pure, perfect and perpetual, offered without interruption, and to be continued without end.

From the command imposed upon the angels we learn both the Saviour's dignity and our duty. God is the only proper object of worship, and he will not give his glory to another. But when he brought in the first-begotten into the world, he said, 'let all the angels of God worship him.' If Christ is adored by all the hosts of heaven, surely he may be worshipped by the inhabitants of the earth. If he claims the homage of angels, much more is he entitled to the worship of men. The law given to them must be also the rule for us. Their practice should be our pattern. We have a law for ourselves, no less explicit in its terms, and if possible still more peremptory in its demand, for it is the declared will of God that 'all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father.'

'To them that believe he is precious.' In their estimation he is infinitely worthy of the warmest love, and of the highest honour. They cannot, in their present state, equal the purity, the fervour, and elevation of angelic worship. But they are by grace enabled to offer a tribute of devotion no less acceptable to Christ than that of angels; the offering of a sincere, humble, contrite and devoted heart. And they have the prospect of being made like unto the angels, with whom they shall unite as fellow worshippers in singing the song of the Lamb, serving him day and night in his temple, having washed their robes, and made them white in his blood. 'And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing.'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken,' Deut. xviii. 15.

Moses was held in high estimation by the Jewish people. They gloried in being called his disciples. Yet they practically disregarded the testimony of Moses in rejecting Christ, who exposed their inconsistency, and said to them, 'If ye believed Moses, ye would believe me, for he wrote of me.' Like all the other scriptures, the writings of Moses testify of Christ; in particular, we know upon the authority of Stephen, an inspired interpreter, that he pointed to the Messiah in these emphatic words, 'The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him shall ye hearken.' This prediction describes the Saviour's character, and declares the sinner's duty.

A prophet is a person who foretells future events. The Jews themselves were on one occasion compelled to admit the prophetic character of Christ; for, in obvious allusion to this prediction of Moses, they said, 'Of a truth this is that prophet which should come into the world.' The spirit which had been poured out upon him above measure was the spirit of prophecy. Of the predictions which he uttered some were fulfilled before his ascension, others received their accomplishment soon afterwards. Of those which remain to be accomplished, it may be affirmed that 'heaven and earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away till all shall be fulfilled.'

But he did also the work of a public instructor, which formed an essential part of the prophetic office. Nicodemus could say, 'We know that thou art a Teacher sent from God, and even the soldiers who had been sent to apprehend him were constrained to acknowledge, 'Never man spake like this man.' He differed from all other teachers, and was superior to them all, both in the matter and the manner of his instructions. As he is the wisest and best of teachers, his followers should be the most humble and diligent of scholars, looking into the perfect law of liberty, and continuing therein, not being forgetful hearers, but doers of the word, that they may be blessed in their deed.

It was predicted that Christ should be not merely a prophet, but a prophet like unto Moses. Many prophets arose after Moses, but none of them could be pronounced like unto him. All that Moses was, and infinitely more, may be affirmed of Christ. Moses, however, did not claim equality with the Messiah, but only a resemblance to him; and the resemblance may easily be traced in a variety of important particulars.

In Moses the office of prophet was combined with the character of redeemer; he rescued the people of Israel from the yoke of Egyptian oppression. Christ redeemed his people from the curse of the law, from the tyranny of satan, and the bondage of corruption. He delivered not their bodies only, but their souls, and accomplished for them not a temporal but an eternal redemption. Jesus was like Moses, both a lawgiver and a prophet. He put an end to the observances of the ceremonial law which Moses had instituted; but he confirmed the obligation of the moral law, to which he added some peculiar precepts of his own, and illustrated the whole in his perfect example, which possesses the force of a law. Moses acted the part of a guide to the Israelites in their way to the promised land; so Jesus, the Captain of salvation, was made perfect through sufferings, that he might bring many sons unto glory. His presence attends them like the fiery cloudy pillar, both by day and by night. He will guide them by his counsel, and receive them into his glory. Besides, Moses exercised the authority of a ruler, and Jesus has been anointed King on his holy hill of Zion, and shall reign till he shall have put all his enemies under his feet. On various occasions Moses acted the part of an intercessor, and either mitigated or averted threatening judgments. Jesus, too, made intercession for the transgressors by dying for them on earth; and he ever liveth to make intercession for them in heaven. In all these points of view Christ was raised up a prophet like unto Moses.

Yet in these, and in every other respect, he was a prophet far superior to Moses. As a prophet he infinitely surpasses Moses in the dignity of his person, in the extent of his power, in the excellencies of his character, in the value of his ministrations, in the permanency of his office, in the number and force of his claims. If therefore the people of Israel were required under the most awful penalties to obey the word of Moses, how much more is it incumbent on us to yield obedience to the voice of Christ? 'Unto him shall ye hearken.' These words declare—

The sinner's duty. It includes the exercise of considerate attention. This is the first step to conversion. A most important point has been gained when the mind of the sinner is awakened to serious concern about salvation, so as to make it the subject of earnest and prayerful inquiry. The gospel demands, and will bear the most minute and scrutinizing investigation. It speaks to the understanding and the judgment, as well as to the conscience and the heart, and says, 'Whoso hath ears to hear, let him hear.' It is the sinner's duty to hearken by—

Believing the word of Christ; for 'this,' says he, 'is the work of God, that ye believe in him whom he hath sent.' And the faith which he requires is not a mere act of the understanding, but a principle of the heart, consisting in the exercise of a simple and affectionate confidence, working by love, and enforcing obedience. They that know his name put their trust in him, and whilst they believe all his doctrines to be true, they esteem his precepts concerning all things to be right. To hearken expresses—

Submission to the authority of Christ: the submission of the will to the guidance of his word, of the heart to the influence of his love, and of the life to the demands of his law, and of the circumstances to the disposal of his providence. He demands an affectionate and unre-served submission; and he is entitled to it both as a testimony of respect to his authority, and an expression of gratitude for his redeeming grace. All who live by him, he disposes to live to him and for him. His love to them is evinced by their devotedness to him. They daily kneel at his footstool, and inquire, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'

To us the word of his salvation has been sent. It is his voice that speaks to us in every part of it, and we are called on by every consideration of interest and duty to hearken to it with a teachable, obedient, and prayerful attention, whether it addresses us in the language of doctrine or precept, of promise or threatening, of mercy or of judgment. 'Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness. Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'See that ye refuse not him that speaketh: for if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven,' Heb. xii. 25.

WE have here an admonition, and an argument, both of which, by alarming our fears, combine to enforce a most important duty. But in order to understand the meaning of the admonition, and feel the force of the argument, it is necessary that we should be made acquainted with the character of the Speaker, and also with the subject of his address.

The character of the Speaker possesses the highest claim to our attention. He is invested with supreme authority over us, and has an unquestionable right to dictate to us in all matters both of faith and practice. It is his sovereign prerogative to deal with us, and with every thing that belongs to us, and every thing that concerns us, according to his sovereign pleasure. Besides he is a Being of perfect veracity. His word may be implicitly depended on, 'for he is not a man that he should lie.' When he speaks, it is with the voice of truth and wisdom. Nothing, therefore, which proceeds from him can be either erroneous and hurtful, or even trifling and unprofitable. For he unites infallible wisdom with infinite love. He has the best interests of those whom he speaks to deeply at heart. His design is to make them happy; and he points out a way that will ensure their happiness both in time and for eternity. And he can give full effect to every word he utters, by a power to which all things are possible. He speaks, and it is done; he commands, and it stands fast. In him all the promises of God are yea and amen; for he is both faithful and able to perform. But his holiness constitutes the chief glory of his character. In him is no sin. He cannot look upon sin. And there is no sin so heinous and so offensive in his sight as the sin of refusing him that speaketh from heaven; it is a sin which he has expressed his determination to punish 'with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.' Such is the Speaker who demands our attention. In connection with these views of his character let us advert to—

The subject of his address. He comes to us with a message from God. He speaks the word of truth; it is the word of him who is 'the truth.' All other speakers are fallible, and, therefore, what they say ought not to be taken on trust, but should be received with caution, and examined with care. But the Speaker here is 'the faithful and true Witness.' There may be much in what he says to us that we do not and cannot fully comprehend; but there is nothing in it that we may not with safety and confidence believe. It is both 'a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation.' The communication which he addresses to us is not only true, but in the highest degree important. He declares to us the word of salvation. He tells us of our low and lost estate as sinners, lying under a sentence of condemnation, exposed to wrath, and ready to perish. He declares to us that 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' He assures us that 'with God there is mercy, and plenteous redemption;' a redemption exactly suitable, perfectly complete, infinitely precious, and altogether free. He speaks to us, in short, all that is necessary to be known, and nothing but what it supremely concerns us to know, for the salvation of our souls.

To refuse such a speaker, addressing us on such a subject, is to commit the most unaccountable folly, and to incur the most aggravated guilt; the guilt of base ingratitude, of daring impiety, of ruinous presumption: 'It is to dispute the sovereignty of God, to arraign his wisdom, to set his power at defiance, to deny his truth, despise his grace, and rush on the thick bosses of his buckler.' 'What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?' for if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven.' This question appeals to the facts of Old Testament history, and embodies an—

Argument that can neither be misunderstood nor evaded. It bids us take warning from the experience of the people of Israel. They 'refused him that spake on earth.' On various occasions they rebelled against Moses, and what was the consequence? Did Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, escape the punishment of their rebellion? Did Nadab and Abihu escape the vengeance which their impiety had provoked? Did the congregation of Israel who refused Moses, desiring to be led back again into Egypt, did they escape the effects of that in lignat on which was due to their apostacy? To these questions an answer will be found in the devouring plagues which desolated the camp of Israel, and successively carried off thousands and tens of thousands from among the people. One recorded fact speaks volumes on this subject. Of six hundred thousand persons who came forth with Moses out of Egypt, not more than two individuals were permitted to enter into the promised land. The whole, with these two exceptions, perished in the wilderness, as a memorial to every future generation of the solemn truth, that they escape not who refused him that spake on earth.

'He that despised Moses' law died without mercy.' Punishment inevitably followed transgression. No concealment could be practised. The offender, like Achan, might attempt to elude the stroke of justice, but, like Achan, he was sure to be detected. No lenity was to be expected. Moses had no discretionary power to remit, or even mitigate the penalty. The law was, in all cases, plain, explicit, peremptory, and inexorable. Every transgression received its just recompence of reward. From these facts the inference is too important to be overlooked, and too awful to be disregarded. We read it in the word of inspiration: 'If he that despised Moses' law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace!'

It is our privilege to live under a dispensation of grace. Christ, speaking to us from heaven in his word and ordinances, proclaims the message of reconciliation, and addresses the offer of forgiveness to the very chief of sinners. But there is no salvation in any other; and even he can save those only who believe and obey him. To all who reject him 'there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but the fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversary.' 'The sin of turning away from him must, therefore, place the sinner beyond the reach of mercy, and expose him to the accumulated penalties of a violated law, and a rejected gospel, which admit neither of the possibility of an escape, nor the prospect of a deliverance. But to as many as receive him, to them he gives power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name. 'Let us, therefore, fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest any of us should seem to come short of it.

Having received the Lord Jesus, so walk in him.'

FIFTEENTH DAY—MORNING.

'Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in. Behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts.' Mal. iii. 1.

Two illustrious persons are here distinctly alluded to, each of them called by the name of messenger, bearing a very intimate relation to one another, yet widely different in the rank and character, both personal and official, which respectively belong to them. We know upon divine authority that the first part of this prophecy received its accomplishment in the person of John the Baptist. Our Lord made this announcement to the Jews, when he spake of John, saying, 'For this is he of whom it is written, Behold I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.'

But a greater than John the Baptist is here; one whom John acknowledged to be incomparably his superior, and to whom he did not consider himself worthy to perform the meanest office. 'He it is, who coming after me, is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose.' It was customary for kings and conquerors to be preceded on their march by persons who acted either as heralds to proclaim their approach, or as pioneers to remove obstacles out of their way. In like manner, the advent of Messiah was to be announced beforehand by 'the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.'

The names here applied to him by the prophet, expressive at once of his supreme dignity, and of his gracious character, show him to be pre-eminently worthy of such honour. He is 'the Lord,' the universal ruler, to whom all power belongs, on whom all beings depend, from whom all blessings proceed, and to whom all homage is due. Like the forerunner who came to announce his approach, he sustains the character of a 'messenger,' but in a far higher and more important sense; for he is 'the Messenger of the covenant.' The scriptures make mention of many covenants, but this is 'a better covenant, established on better promises, a covenant of peace, an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure.' Jesus Christ is himself a party to this covenant, and is therefore called the Mediator of it, having undertaken to execute its conditions by the obedience of his life, and the sacrifice of his death for the redemption of those whom the Father had given him. But he is also 'the Messenger' or 'Angel' of this covenant, having received a commission from the Father to make known its provisions unto men, and to dispense them to his church and people throughout all ages to the end of time.

From the beginning of the world the coming of Messiah had been foretold and expected. Patriarchs saw it afar off, and were glad. The whole system of Jewish worship and government evidently pointed to it. To keep alive the expectation of it, holy men of God, speaking with the voice of inspiration, prophetically alluded to it. And Malachi, the last of these, made it the subject of a plain and most explicit prediction which expresses the certainty of the event, and confirms it by a twofold repetition. Probably there were then, as there are now, unbelievers, who scoffingly asked, 'where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were.' To silence the cavils of the profane, and alarm the fears of the secure, and establish the confidence of the doubting, and animate the hopes of the pious—the inspired prophet declared that 'the Lord, the Messenger of the covenant' would assuredly come, and that not only soon, but 'suddenly to his temple.'

In predicting the advent of Messiah, the prophets sometimes speak of him in his human nature as the son of David, and tell us that he would come and sit on the throne of David his father, and exercise dominion 'from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.' The highest place which a man can occupy is a throne, but the lowest place which God can accept is a temple. Accordingly, when the prophets connect the advent of Christ with his divine dignity as David's Lord, they declare that he would come not to his throne, but to his temple, as the only fit and appropriate place for his reception. The temple was erected for his honour, and dedicated to his service. He had said of it, 'This is my rest for ever; here will I dwell for I have desired it.' The visible symbol of his presence had indeed been long withdrawn from it. The Jews who were bound to protect its sanctity had allowed it to be prostituted to the vilest of purposes. But the Lord had not finally deserted it; and the time was now approaching when he would return to it, and expel the profane intruders who had degraded it into a house of merchandise, and a den of thieves; and when, by making it the scene of his personal ministrations, he would cause the glory of the second temple to exceed that of the first.

The event of Messiah's appearance was not only expected by the people of Israel, but desired and longed for. They understood not his true character, and grossly misapprehended the design of his coming. Predictions and promises, which held forth to them the prospect of a spiritual redemption, were so misinterpreted by them as to engender the hope of a temporal deliverance. A few there were among them, who, like Anna and Simeon, escaped the delusion which proved fatal to the great body of their countrymen, and with an enlightened and well-founded confidence 'waited for the Consolation of Israel.' But all of them looked forward to his appearance as an object of ardent and delightful anticipation; and therefore to all of them the prophet could truly say, 'The Lord whom ye seek shall come, even the Messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in.'

This intimation, which assured them of the speedy fulfilment of their hopes, loudly called them to the work of preparation. The design was to awaken serious concern, to enforce self-examination, to excite repentance, to induce humility, watchfulness, and prayer. The prospect of Christ's coming had in it much that was fitted to console and animate, but it had in it much also that calculated to rouse and alarm them. For he was to be to them as 'a refiner and purifier of silver; having his fan in his hand that he might thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff he would burn with unquenchable fire.' Knowing the terrors of the Lord, the prophet warned them of their danger, and anticipated the Baptist's message, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'

All that is here predicted of the first coming of Christ, may with truth be affirmed of his second advent. His second coming, like his first, will be personal and visible; for he 'shall come in the clouds of heaven, with his own and his Father's glory, and every eye shall see him.' It will be sudden and unexpected; for 'the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, and at such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.' It will be full of terror to his enemies; for 'he will try every man's work, and render unto every man according to his work, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish to every soul of man that doeth evil.' But to his own people it will be the day of redemption which they love, and long for, and haste unto; for as 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, so unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.' 'Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.'

FIFTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him,' John i. 18.

God is to be seen in his works; 'for the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead.' The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy-work. The earth is full of his riches. He may be seen in the operations of his providence; for what is providence but God manifesting his perfections in the preservation and government of the creatures he has made? Above all he may be seen in his word, which reveals to us his being and attributes, his purposes and will. Every man, therefore, who looks with attention and understanding into the world of nature, or the arrangement of providence, or the record of scripture, may be said to have seen God.

In the early ages of the world God was pleased to discover himself in a visible manner to his servants and people. He appeared to Adam immediately after the fall, and to Noah after the flood. He was seen by Moses and Manoah, by Samuel and David, by Elijah and Daniel. The people of Israel saw him in the cloud of glory which hung occasionally over the tabernacle, and which rested permanently on the mercy-seat. But he was seen only in his attributes and actings. His essence is spiritual, and, therefore, invisible. In this sense no man hath seen God at any time, nor can see him. And how little was seen of God amidst the shadows of the Old Testament revelation. Even Moses, unto whom 'the Lord spake face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend,' desired a fuller manifestation of the divine character, and prayed, 'Shew me thy glory.' But the privilege which was denied to him has been conferred on us: for 'God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ.'

All that mankind have ever seen of God was unfolded to them through the mediation of the Son; for 'no man knoweth the Father, but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.' He is 'in the bosom of the Father,' a partner in his counsels, perfectly conversant with all the movements of the divine mind; and he came forth from the Father to declare that which the world by its wisdom did not know, and never could have known concerning God. Having fulfilled his commission he could say, 'I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou givest me out of the world.' This he did in—

The constitution of his person. By uniting the human with his divine nature, he embodied the Godhead, and made it not only visible to our contemplation, but in some degree level to our comprehension. In the Man Christ Jesus we are brought into immediate contact with the divine presence, and we behold a distinct and intelligible exhibition of all that is peculiar in the divine character. 'Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father?' He declared the character of God in—

The doctrine which he taught. He exposed the errors of heathenism by declaring the unity of God, the spirituality of his nature, and the unlimited extent of his dominion. At the same time he corrected the prejudices of the Jews by inculcating the truth that God is not the God of any one people exclusively, and that Jerusalem is not the only place where men ought to worship, but that of every nation and in every place, 'he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him.' He spake of God, of his names and attributes, of his prerogatives and purposes, with the freedom, and fullness, and familiarity of one who had a perfect knowledge of the subject. He taught 'the way of God truly.' He declared God by—

The redemption which he accomplished. What is the cross of Christ but an illustration of the perfections of God, of his absolute sovereignty, his inflexible justice, his immaculate holiness, his unfathomable wisdom, his everlasting love; of all that is great and gracious, or awful and amiable in his character? Attributes seemingly inconsistent with each other are there made to appear in perfect harmony. We see God to be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, manifesting at once his hatred to sin, and his love to the sinner, strict to mark iniquity, yet merciful to pardon it; righteous in executing his law, yet gracious in passing by the transgression of the remnant of his people, because he delighteth in mercy.

'Blessed are our eyes for they see.' We see God made clearly manifest not only to our understandings, but even to our bodily senses. The Lord said to Moses, 'Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me and live.' The view of God's unveiled glory would be too bright and dazzling for our feeble faculties. But in the face of Christ it is softened down, and brought nigh, and presented in a form which we can safely approach, and intimately contemplate, and profitably study. The Saviour has conferred upon us other and, in some respects, more important benefits. But in estimating his claims to our gratitude it is ever to be remembered that all the knowledge of God which we have or can attain to comes to us through Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. They only who know Christ can be truly said to have seen God.

The pure in heart alone shall see God. He that ascends into the hill of the Lord, or stands in his holy place, must have both clean hands and a pure heart; for 'what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, or what communion hath light with darkness?' To see God is not so much the act of a mind enlightened by his word, as it is the exercise of a heart renewed by his grace. And as moral purity is the necessary qualification for seeing God, so it will be the invariable effect. 'But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.'

After all, how little can we see of God in our present state of imperfection and sinfulness. Here we see darkly as through a glass. It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he who is our Life shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. Who can conceive the blessedness of seeing God face to face, of beholding his beauty, and of being satisfied with his likeness? 'O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee; my soul thirsteth for thee; my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land where no water is. To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips.'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish. To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life,' 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.

'A SWEET SAVOUR' is that which gratifies the senses, such as the taste of some delicious fruit, or the fragrance of a rich perfume. The expression is used by the sacred writers chiefly in connection with the offering of sacrifice. To intimate the divine acceptance of Noah's sacrifice we are told that 'the Lord smelled a sweet savour.' The offerings required by the Jewish law were presented for 'a sweet savour unto the Lord.' These were merely the shadows of good things to come, but the body is Christ, who also 'gave himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour.' The labours of his servants in the ministry of the gospel cause to ascend to the throne of God the incense of a precious and acceptable offering, promoting, as they do, the honour of his name, and the advancement of his kingdom; therefore, Paul speaking for himself and his Christian brethren could say, 'We are unto God a sweet savour of Christ in them that are saved, and in them that perish.'

All existing diversities of character belong to one or other of the two classes which are here contrasted, and may be identified either with them that are saved, or with them that perish. The former of these classes may be comparatively few, but absolutely they will be a multitude whom no man can number. Nor are they confined to any one sect or party in the church, but include all of every sect and party who have been renewed in the spirit of their minds, and who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. But all have not faith. The apostle, in making mention of 'them that perish,' speaks not of heathens, nor of such as never heard of Christ, but of those to whom the gospel has been preached, and by whom it has been professedly embraced. It is a mournful yet undeniable fact that a large proportion of those who have access to the means of grace, instead of improving them for their salvation, abuse them to their own destruction. If from the professing friends of the gospel we could deduct the ignorant who do not understand it, and the lukewarm who are indifferent about it, and the sceptical who secretly disbelieve it, and the hypocritical who selfishly pervert it, and the profane who openly trample upon it, and the licentious who daringly abuse it; if, in short, we could separate from those who bear the name of Christians all who are Christians only in name, what a distressing minority would be left behind!

The same instrumentality which proves effectual in saving some is not merely unproductive of good to others, but will be to them the occasion of a heavier condemnation. In itself the gospel is calculated in every instance to become 'the savour of life unto life.' Such is its designed effect, and such too is its actual effect upon all who believe and obey it. But it does not produce this effect mechanically or necessarily. Every thing depends, under divine influence, upon the manner in which it has been received. The wilfully ignorant, the unbelieving, and impenitent, who reject the counsel against themselves, cannot be saved. And they perish not only without excuse, but under a fearful aggravation of guilt. They have incurred the penalty not only of disobedience to the law, but also the heavier penalty of disbelieving the gospel. By holding the truth in unrighteousness they pervert the word of life into an instrument of death. They extract poison from the flower which was intended to yield only honey. Instead of being renewed and sanctified by the truths, and precepts, and ordinances of the gospel, they become, through a presumptuous and thoughtless familiarity with these, more hardened in sin, more alienated from God, and tenfold more the children of hell than before; and in consequence, that which was appointed to be 'the savour of life unto life,' is to them 'the savour of death unto death.'

But God will be glorified both in them that are saved and in them that perish. His infinite holiness, justice, and truth will be manifested in the one; his sovereign compassion, wisdom, and love will be displayed in the other. He delighteth in mercy, and hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, yet they shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. And his procedure will be triumphantly vindicated, and his character supremely honoured in the estimation of an intelligent universe, who will confess that in this, as in every thing else, the Judge of all the earth has done that which is right.

The labours of his faithful servants may fail to be useful to men, but they cannot fail to be acceptable to God; for 'we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ.' He is not indifferent to the success of his own word. He commandeth all men every where to repent, and willeth that all should come to the knowledge of the truth, that they may be saved. Sinners may turn a deaf ear to his call, but they cannot deprive him of his glory. His servants may spend their strength for nought and in vain, but they shall in no wise lose their reward. They are accountable for the want of fidelity, but not for the want of success. Those for whose salvation they labour may derive no benefit from their exertions; but having acted their part honestly and faithfully they shall deliver their own souls, and receive at last the approving welcome of Him who is not unrighteous to forget their work of faith, and their labour of love, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

He has provided for our work, as well as for our reward. We serve a liberal Master, who is both our righteousness and strength. Let us honour him by our simple dependence on his word, on our cheerful submission to his will. 'For the Lord God is a sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.'

---

SIXTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he will testify of me,' John xv. 26.

WE learn from these words what the Holy Ghost is both in nature and in office. The language here employed by our Lord obviously describes, not a mere influence, but a distinct and divine person. In this sense the disciples unquestionably understood it. They often had occasion to allude to the character of the Spirit; and in all that they either said or wrote on the subject, the idea of his personality is clearly expressed or implied. Personal feelings and actions are uniformly ascribed to him. It was their practice to consult the mind of the Spirit, and their privilege to receive communications from him. Thus the Holy Ghost said, 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul;' we read of their having been 'forbidden of the Holy Ghost.' They inform us that the 'Spirit searcheth all things;' that he 'beareth witness;' they admonish us not to 'grieve the Holy Spirit,' with many other expressions of similar import, all attributing to the Spirit the character and properties of a distinct personal subsistence.

But it is chiefly in his official capacity that the Spirit is here presented to our contemplation. He is by name and by office 'the Comforter.'

He sustains also the character of a reprove: for 'he will reprove the world of sin.' By reproving or convincing of sin, he produces feelings of alarm, and grief, and self-condemnation in the soul. But having wounded, he also heals. He gives 'the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for a spirit of heaviness.' His gracious influences are equally effectual in removing the anguish of spiritual distress, and alleviating the pain of temporal affliction. To mourners of every description he says, 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.' He fulfils also the office of—

An Instructor. The disciples were in distress, and needed the ministrations of 'the Comforter.' But much of their anxiety proceeded from ignorance; and therefore the Comforter was promised to them in the appropriate character of 'the Spirit of truth.' 'Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come.' On the day of Pentecost they obtained the expected Comforter in the descent of the Holy Ghost, who called them out of darkness into his marvellous light, and imparted to them all necessary gifts and attainments for the arduous work to which they had been set apart. Their experience was peculiar and miraculous; but the dispensation of the Spirit which began with them was designed to be perpetual: and the subject matter of the Spirit's teaching is to us what it was to them. It is He 'of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, and the King of Israel.' 'He shall testify of me,' said Christ to his disciples; and again, 'He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you.'

But there is a difference in the manner of the Spirit's testimony. To the primitive disciples it was communicated by immediate and supernatural inspiration. We have a permanent record of it in the holy scriptures, which were given by inspiration of God, and in every part of which the Spirit testifies of Christ—of his personal glory and mediatorial abasement, of his justifying righteousness and atoning blood, of his perfect character and plenteous redemption. These are 'the things of the Spirit of God,' which the natural man receiveth not, and knoweth not, for they are spiritually discerned. 'But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God.'

We have, therefore, not only the external testimony of the Spirit which speaks to us, but also the internal testimony of the Spirit which speaks in us. In the one case, the Spirit testifies of Christ as revealed in the scriptures; in the other, the Spirit testifies of Christ as formed in the heart by the working of that mighty power which raised him from the dead: for 'the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.'

The wisest of men are liable to err, as the best of men are prone to sin; but the teaching of the Spirit is both infallible and efficacious. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps; but He is wise in counsel, and leadeth the blind by a way that they knew not, and which is the right way that will bring them to a city of habitation. 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together.'

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'O send out thy light and thy truth,' Psal. xliii.

3.

THIS psalm contains the record of David's feelings on an occasion of very trying emergency. In consequence of Absalom's rebellion he had been driven from Jerusalem, and subjected to many sad reverses. But there was one privation which he felt and lamented above every other. He expressed no concern about the recovery of his royal honours and prerogatives; but his heart was ready to faint within him when he remembered Zion, and the courts of God's house, now no longer accessible to him. His affections still lingered in the sanctuary, and he poured forth his desire in these emphatic words, 'O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead me, and bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles.'

Doubtless the psalmist uttered this prayer with a special reference to the circumstances of his own condition. Light may be understood to express the joy which springs from a manifestation of the divine favour. Never did David stand more in need of it than now when his soul was bowed down with grief, and filled with disquietude and alarm. Yet there was good reason to expect that God would interpose in his behalf, as he had graciously promised to do, and as he had done on many former occasions. He, therefore, prayed not only for the 'light' of God, but also for his 'truth' or faithfulness in the fulfilment of those promises upon which he had been encouraged to hope.

The situation of David was peculiar, but the feelings which it awakened are common to all the children of God, and the petition which it called forth will be found equally applicable to every variety of spiritual distress. The terms 'light and truth' fitly represent the illuminating and comforting influence of the Holy Spirit. He is the Spirit of truth, whose entrance gives light, and produces a joy that is 'unspeakable and full of glory.'

In offering this prayer we do not ask from God any new revelation of his will. We have no warrant to expect the light and truth of immediate and supernatural inspiration. But we ask from him the right and profitable understanding of that revelation which he has already granted, and which is perfectly sufficient for all the purposes both of holiness and comfort. Nothing is to be expected in answer to such a prayer without the use of ordinary means; but these means can be effectual only when they are accompanied with the demonstration of the Spirit, and with power. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned.' That knowledge by which the soul is savingly converted unto God must, therefore, be the effect of divine illumination, opening at once the eyes of the understanding and the door of the heart, turning it from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God. And the same divine influence which begins the good work of grace in the soul, is needful to carry it forward, and bring it to perfection. Not only in the commencement of the spiritual life, therefore, but in every subsequent stage of its progress, even under the most favourable circumstances, and with the most matured attainments, the believer has occasion to adopt the prayer, 'O send out thy light and thy truth.'

There are, in the experience of every child of God, particular situations which more especially call forth this devout aspiration. When the mind is harassed with difficulties relative to the truths of revelation, arising from inability to understand them, and to reconcile them with each other, or with the perfections of God, or the demands of his law, or the dispensations of his providence; when cases of perplexing doubt occur in which conscience is at a loss to discover the path of duty, or to decide between what is lawful and what is merely expedient, and knows not either what to think, or how to act; in such circumstances how precious the privilege of being permitted to ask direction from Him who is wise in counsel, and who has promised to guide the meek in judgment, and to teach them his way!

To mourners of every description, to those especially who mourn in Zion, who are cast down and disquieted with fears respecting the safety of their spiritual condition, or oppressed with grief and vexation of spirit under a sense of their own exceeding sinfulness, and of the unprofitableness of all their services, and of the little comfort which they have found in religious ordinances, and the small progress which they have made in Christian attainment; to those who lament the hidings of God's countenance, and the absence of all satisfying communion with him; who go mourning all the day, walking in darkness, and ready to faint with the sickness of hope deferred; to all such there is provided a never-failing resource, a fountain of rich and refreshing consolation lies within their reach; and they are invited to approach it, taking along with them a form of application, which the Hearer of prayer has himself prepared for them in the words of the inspired psalmist, 'O send forth thy light and thy truth.'

As a preparation for duty this prayer is no less appropriate than it is necessary for our comfort in distress. David said, 'I will wash mine hands in innocency; so will I compass thine altar.' Not only the more solemn services of devotion, but every act of religious worship requires the preparations of the heart which are from the Lord. To him we must look for the capacity to serve him acceptably and profitably in the ordinances of his own appointment; and after all that we have done or can do in the work of preparation by examining the state of our hearts, by reflecting on the conduct of the past, and forming purposes of obedience for the future, or otherwise cultivating the frame and feelings which are suitable in drawing near to God, we must have recourse to Him with whom is the residue of the Spirit, and without whom we can know nothing, and do nothing aright. 'Search me, O God, and know my thoughts. And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. O send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead me, let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles; then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy.'

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Thy word have I hid in mine heart,' Psal. cxix. 11.

By the word of God we understand the revelation of his will in the holy scriptures. It is his word, inasmuch as it came from him, treats of him, and will lead to him. He is its Author, its subject, and its end. Holy men of God were employed by him as the channels of communication, but they spake only 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.'

The bible is proved to be the word of God by its peculiar excellence, and its practical influence; by the originality of its doctrinal discoveries, by the purity of its moral precepts, by the harmony of its different parts, and the perfect adaptation of the whole to the condition of man as a sinner. It requires no addition, is susceptible of no improvement, admits of no alteration; it exhibits in every part the stamp of truth, and the impression of divinity, and 'is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.'

Few men have been so well qualified as David was to appreciate the value of the word of God. He had made it the subject of humble, habitual, and prayerful investigation. It had been his meditation by day, and his song in the night. His knowledge of it, obtained through divine teaching giving effect to his own researches, was extensive, intimate, and experimental. He could say, 'I have more understanding than all my teachers;' and he uttered the language not of ignorant superstition, but of enlightened and practical devotion, when he declared, 'Thy word have I hid in mine heart.' It is evident that David possessed a very minute and distinct recollection of the word of God. It was his privilege to have constant access to the scriptures themselves; but he had transferred a large portion of them to his memory, from whose stores he could derive either subjects of meditation, or motives to duty, or sources of comfort, or helps to devotion, as circumstances might require.

The language of David is strongly expressive of his attachment to the word of God. With Job he could say, 'I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food.' What is sweeter than honey? The Psalmist replies, 'How sweet are thy words to my taste; yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth.' What is more valued than riches? Hear David again, 'The law of thy mouth is better to me than thousands of gold and silver.' It was to him more precious than anything and everything else. He therefore hid it, as men hide a treasure, which they wish to preserve, but are afraid of losing; and having no other place worthy of its character, or fit for its reception, he enshrined it in the affections of his heart. 'Thy word have I hid in mine heart.'

This was in him the testimony of experience. The word of God he had felt to be 'quick and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword.' It had taught him the evil of sin, and the beauty of holiness. He had found it to be a 'lamp to his feet, and a light unto his path.' In affliction it had been his comforter, and his guide in difficulty and distress. When temptation assailed, it fortified him with the means of defence and security; and when conscience accused, it cheered him with the assurances of forgiveness and favour. In allusion to the effects which it had produced upon himself, he could affirm that 'the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever; the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.' 'Thy word have I hid in mine heart.'

He hid it there both for convenience and security. We cannot be certain of having the word of God always in our possession, or within our reach. Circumstances may exclude us from the opportunity of reading it; sickness may deprive us of the capacity of reading it. How important, then, to have it laid up in the heart, so as to carry it continually about with us, and to have ready access to it in all places, and on all occasions, for instruction and comfort. For David hid the word, not as the miser hoards his gold, for preservation merely, but for use. It was given not to amuse us with curious speculations, but to influence the affections, to regulate the conduct, and form the character.

The only way to render the word of God fruitful is to have it hid in the heart. If the seed is permitted to lie on the surface, instead of being buried under ground, it would be altogether unproductive. The incorruptible seed of the word, when sown in the soil of a good and honest heart, 'takes root downward, and brings forth fruit upward.' Its truths and precepts, its cautions and encouragements, received into the heart, exert a powerful and purifying influence, and become so many principles of holy activity and devoted obedience. Even its dark sayings, and its hard sayings, are revered for their wisdom, and loved for their excellency. The service which it requires is approved as a reasonable, and enjoyed as a pleasant, and recommended as a profitable service. 'Therefore,' says David, 'I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right, and I hate every false way. I will run in the way of thy commandments, when thou hast enlarged my heart.'

It was not for the purpose of concealment, but rather for the purpose of communication, that David hid the word of God in his heart. 'My tongue,' says the Psalmist, 'shall speak of thy word.' And again, 'With my lips have I declared all the judgments of thy mouth.' The word of God is not merely a trust which we should keep with a jealous care, but also a talent which we should employ with diligence and zeal for the spiritual good both of ourselves and others. No man who knows its value feels any disposition to monopolize the precious treasure; on the contrary, as it is his duty, so it will be his delight to put his fellow-sinners in possession of it; and in attempting to make it the instrument of good to others, he will render it more productive of benefit to his own soul. 'God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee.'

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' Col. ii. 3.

THE fullness of Christ constitutes the all-engrossing subject of scripture testimony. 'It pleased the Father that in him all fullness should dwell,' and 'in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.' He is full of compassion; for 'we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.' He is full of power; for 'all power is given to him in heaven and in earth;' and 'he is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.' He is full of grace; for 'his grace is exceeding abundant, and of his fullness have we all received, and grace for grace;' he is full of truth, for in him 'are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.' Let us consider what is the amount of this representation, and what is the use which we should make of it.

Peter uttered the language of truth, when, addressing himself to Jesus, he said, 'Lord, thou knowest all things.' As God he is essentially omniscient; and his knowledge, as it is infinite, so it is underived. But it is in his official and delegated capacity that we have now to do with him, as the divinely appointed Mediator between God and man, and Head over all things to his body the church. 'He needed not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man.'

'Wisdom and knowledge' often express the same thing. But in their nature they are essentially different, nor are they necessarily united in the same person. Men of very extensive knowledge often discover a very small share of wisdom. But knowledge without wisdom to guide its application can do little good either to the possessor or to others, and may do much evil. Christ combines in himself both wisdom and knowledge: his knowledge is wisdom, for it maketh wise, and without it there can be no true wisdom. It is the knowledge of God, of his attributes, his counsels, his will, and his ways; especially the knowledge of his purpose of redeeming mercy. Of these subjects how little can we know, and how much less can we comprehend! 'No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.' His understanding is infinite. Nothing is concealed from him; nothing is mysterious to him.

In man the acquisition of wisdom and knowledge is commonly the result of long and laborious exertions. But from eternity the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were hid in Christ. They were never hid from him; but they are hid in him, laid up in store as a precious treasure, that must be kept in safety, and be ready for use as circumstances may require. He had them in himself originally, independently, and inherently; but he has them also in trust for his people. They were committed to him by appointment of the Father, to qualify him for the discharge of his prophetic office. They are hid in him, not that they may be concealed, but that they may be communicated. He opened his treasures to man at his creation in the light of nature around him, and of conscience within him. He unfolded them anew to him immediately after his fall in a revelation of mercy, and in the promise of deliverance. To patriarchs and prophets in succession the same gracious discoveries were repeated with increasing fullness; and the light which had dawned upon the world in the prefigurations of the Mosaic economy, shone forth more and more unto the perfect day.

By the personal ministrations of Christ upon earth, the treasures of wisdom and knowledge which had been hid in him, were exhibited in rich and abundant profusion. He came that he might bear witness to the truth, and could say, 'I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.' The Jews were astonished at his doctrine, and asked, 'From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto him? How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?' But they spake ignorantly, and in unbelief. His doctrine was new to them because it had been hid in him. But he knew it perfectly from the beginning, and now revealed it in order 'to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ. To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God. According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

This view of the Redeemer's character serves to show both what he claims from us, and what we may expect from him. Men eminently wise and learned are universally regarded with respect and admiration. Yet how much ignorance and folly do they often discover! The mind of man can know only a few things, and it cannot know any one of these perfectly. But our Saviour is the only wise God. What are the stores of wisdom and knowledge which the industry and ingenuity of man have produced from the beginning of the world to the present day, compared with those boundless treasures which are hid in him? He is light, and in him is no darkness at all. All the wisdom and knowledge which his creatures can attain to is but a faint emanation of that light in which he dwells, and which no man can approach unto. To him, then, let us ascribe glory, and dominion, and blessing, and praise. And let us by faith and prayer look to him as the fountain of all true wisdom and saving knowledge, that he may give unto us 'the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him; that the eyes of our understanding being enlightened we may know what is the hope of our calling, and what the riches of the glory of our inheritance in the saints; that we may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.'

—
EIGHTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him,' James i. 5.

THAT which the apostle has here made a matter of supposition is in reality a matter of fact; for it is undeniably manifest, from the testimony of scripture, experience, and observation, that every man 'lacks wisdom.' 'Vain man would be wise, though a man be born like a wild ass's colt.' But his pretensions to wisdom serve only to discover his folly. The children of this world are, indeed, wise in their generation, but their wisdom is 'earthly, sensual, devilish.' Of that wisdom whose beginning is the fear of God, whose 'ways are pleasantness,' and whose 'paths are peace;' of that wisdom 'which is from above, and which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy,' of such wisdom they are altogether destitute.

Man is naturally blind to his real character and his highest interests. He overlooks altogether the chief end of his existence. He knows not in what true happiness consists, nor where it is to be found. He prefers the body to the soul, time to eternity, earth to heaven, death to life. He calls sweet bitter, and bitter sweet; he mistakes light for darkness, and darkness for light. The world is his idol. He looks only at things which are seen and temporal. Daily he puts the question, 'Who will show us any good?' but never joins in the prayer, 'Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me.' He is led captive by satan at his will. His language and conduct, his desires and pursuits, make it abundantly manifest, that with all his boasted attainments he still lacketh one thing, that is, wisdom. 'But where shall wisdom be found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof; neither is it found in the land of the living. The depth saith, It is not in me; and the sea saith, It is not in me. It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof.'

'Blessed be God, for wisdom and might are his.' He giveth wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding.' Solomon surpassed all other men in wisdom, but we read that 'God gave Solomon wisdom.' Daniel afforded proofs of extraordinary wisdom, but he acknowledged it to be God's gift, saying, 'I thank thee, O God, who hast given me wisdom.' And in both of these cases wisdom was bestowed in answer to prayer. Solomon asked it; Daniel and his pious friends in Babylon prayed for it. God's way of communicating wisdom is through the instrumentality of prayer. 'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God.' The same rule is observed by him in dispensing all other spiritual blessings.

He needs not to be informed, or argued with as if he were either ignorant or unkind. He is acquainted with all the exigencies of our condition, and has promised to supply all our need. But he intends that his people shall be made sensible of their own wants, and of his ability to help them; he desires to bring them to that state of mind which will prepare them to enjoy with the greatest comfort, and to employ with the greatest advantage to themselves and others, those blessings which he sees to be needful, and which he purposes to confer upon them. Hence it is, that 'for all these things he will be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them.' The recipient of his favours must, in the first instance, be a suppliant. We must ask that we may receive, and seek that we may find, and knock that it may be opened unto us.

Other means should be used in connection with prayer. God teaches wisdom in his word, and by his ordinances, which must be carefully and devoutly attended to. Prayer is designed not to supersede other means, but to enforce their observance, and insure their success. And as prayer is necessary, so it will be effectual. We know that 'if we ask any thing agreeable to his will he heareth us.' He has said, 'if any man lack, let him ask.' No conditions are proposed, no price is demanded, no characters are excluded. He requires only that we should feel our need of wisdom, and express it in prayer. In other cases the success of our prayers may be doubtful, but here it is certain. We know not what things to pray for as we ought, and in our ignorance and folly we often desire what we should dread and deprecate. But in praying for wisdom we act in obedience to God's express command, and in reliance on his promise. In answer to such a prayer he not only gives but gives liberally; never less than is asked, generally more. 'And God said to Solomon, Because this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honour, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life, but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself; wisdom and knowledge is granted unto thee; and I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honour, such as none of the kings have had that have been before thee, neither shall there any after thee have the like.' Thus it appears that 'godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.'

Wisdom comprehends all that is essential to the spiritual and eternal interests of man. It is another name for real and saving religion. In principle, it is faith; in experience, it is peace; and in character, holiness. It is the pearl of great price; it is the one thing needful. Other things may be desirable, this is indispensable. Other things may be needful to some, but all stand in need of wisdom, whether learned or ignorant, high or low, rich or poor.' 'Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting, get understanding. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to compared unto her. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her, and happy is every one that retaineth her.' And as wisdom is necessary to all, so it is attainable by all. 'Wisdom crieth aloud; she uttereth her voice in the streets, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' But wisdom is God's gift; as he confers the blessing, so he claims the glory. Let us then live in the spirit of dependence and gratitude, daily asking, 'So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.'

'Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever.' Amen.

---

NINETEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Wisdom crieth at the gates, at the entry of the city, at the coming in at the doors,' Prov. viii. 3.

By wisdom Solomon intends the Son of God. His people may be wise, but he is wisdom. He is the essence, the source, the perfection, the personification of wisdom. The term wisdom may, however, be understood to represent that system of divine truth which was taught by him, and by the apostles in his name. The gospel is eminently entitled to the appellation of wisdom. 'It is the wisdom of God in a mystery; the manifold wisdom of God.' Its doctrines are 'the word of wisdom;' its precepts are 'the ways of wisdom.' All who believe and obey it have been made 'wise unto salvation.' The voice of Christ speaks in every part of it, and in every part it speaks the language of true wisdom. Observe—

The publicity of its announcements. The heathen oracles uttered their responses in secret, and with studied ambiguity. Error shuns the light; but wisdom 'crieth' that all may hear. She comes forth to the gates of the city, or the streets, and other public places, where all classes of the people usually congregate in the greatest numbers. Thus did Jesus in the course of his personal ministry. In the last day, that great day of the feast, he stood and cried, saying, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' To Pilate, who asked him of his disciples and of his doctrine, he could say, 'I spake openly to the world, I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing.' He had not one doctrine for the rich, and another for the poor; but addressed to the people without distinction and without exception the word of truth and salvation. That which he did in his own person, he commanded the disciples to do in his name, 'What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house tops.' It is his will that all men should come to the knowledge of the truth, that they may be saved. Still he cries, 'Unto you, O men, I call, and my voice is to the sons of men. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.' The gospel is recommended by—

The kindness and impartiality of its administration. Wisdom crieth 'at the gates, at the entry of the city,' in the hearing of a large and promiscuous multitude, comprehending persons of every variety of rank and character. No where is the preaching of the gospel so much needed as in places of public resort, frequented as they usually are by the most ignorant, depraved, and worthless of mankind. The master of the feast commanded his servants, 'Go out into the high ways, and as many as ye shall find bid to the marriage.' In him there is enough and to spare; and as the provision is sufficient for all, so it is offered to all 'without money and without price.' There is no respect of persons with him. He condemned the proud Pharisees who felt no need of repentance; but kept company with the publicans and sinners, who confessed their guilt, and desired instruction. The gospel is remarkable for—

Plainness and simplicity. It speaks not only to the multitude promiscuously, but particularly to individuals. All the knowledge of it which is necessary may easily be obtained even by the most illiterate inquirer. Wisdom crieth not only 'at the gates, at the entry of the city,' but also 'at the coming in at the doors.' Thus Christ taught both publicly, and from house to house. Not only has he placed the word of salvation within our reach, he has brought it to our very doors. He has made it not only accessible, but intelligible to all, so that every man may read and can understand it for himself. 'And the Lord answered me, and said, Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it. The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.' The gospel is characterised by—

The urgency of its calls and invitations. Accordingly wisdom 'crieth' with an earnest and importunate voice. And she does not wait to be applied to, but goes forth to meet the people 'at the entry of the city,' and there solicits their attention. She perseveres in the attempt, and continues to press upon them with her importunities, following them from 'the gates' of the city even to 'the coming in at the doors' of their houses. Truly the Lord 'is long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.' He not only waiteth to be gracious, but employs positive means in order to persuade sinners to turn and live. He addresses them by his word and ordinances, by his ministers and people, by the remonstrances of conscience and the dispensations of providence. He speaks to them in the language of kindness and terror, of promise and threatening, of exhortation and entreaty. Instead of leaving them to the consequences of their criminal resistance, he bears with their indifference and renews his solicitations; he raises another and a louder cry; has recourse to more urgent importunity and more powerful means to enforce their compliance. With some the means prove successful; and when sinners repent and turn to the Lord, he sees in them the travail of his soul, and is satisfied. Others continue impenitent; and over them he utters the lamentation of unavailing sympathy: 'If thou hadst known, even thou, at least, in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes!'

How fearful, yet how just, will be the condemnation of those who turn a deaf ear to the cry of heavenly wisdom! They are without excuse; and the invitations of mercy which they have refused, and the means of grace which they have despised, and the opportunities of improvement which they have neglected, and the capacities of usefulness which they have misapplied, will form so many bitter ingredients in their cup of misery. But 'now is the accepted time.' Let the cry of wisdom, calling to repentance and promising forgiveness, be responded to in the prayer of the publican, who smiting on his breast, and not daring so much as to lift up his eyes to heaven, cried, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' Such a cry will assuredly come up with acceptance into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth, who is not only compassionate and merciful, but 'faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'

-----
NINETEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Oh that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!'
Deut. xxxii. 29.

THE JEWS were proverbially inconsiderate. Isaiah complained of them saying, 'The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.' Moses had witnessed many sad proofs of their forgetfulness and folly: and at the close of a long and laborious life, spent in their service, his heart's desire and prayer for them was, 'that they would consider their latter end.' The subject was not more important to them than it is to all. It teaches us that to 'consider our latter end' constitutes true wisdom. By our latter end he means death. But it cannot be profitably considered unless it is properly understood. We understand it to be—

The end of our present state of being, of its joys and sorrows, its duties and dangers, its possessions and pursuits, its comforts and cares. The hand then forgets its cunning, the tongue is silent, the pulse ceases to beat, and the lungs to breathe; the whole frame becomes a lump of cold and senseless clay. The ties which bind us to our nearest and dearest friends, and to every thing earthly, are then broken asunder; for 'they that have wives shall be as though they had none; and they that weep as though they wept not, and they that buy as though they possessed not; for the fashion of this world passeth away.' And the change is final. 'There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again. But man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? We understand our latter end to be—

The commencement of a future and eternal state of being. The 'dust shall return to the earth as it was; but the spirit shall return to God who gave it.' After death cometh the judgment, which shall try every man's work; and the sentence of the Judge shall admit of no appeal, nor can the consequences which follow, whether happy or miserable, be ever altered, or reversed. They that are Christ's, made perfect in holiness, shall immediately enter on the full and everlasting enjoyment of God; whilst the enemies of his cross and his cause shall be cast into outer darkness, 'where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth.' We understand death to be—

The universal destiny of man. The stroke of death cannot be resisted by force, nor evaded by artifice, nor set aside by the influence of rank or wealth. One event happeneth to the righteous and the wicked, to the king and his subjects, to the philosopher and the fool, to the man of wealth and the child of poverty, to the sinner of fourscore and the infant of yesterday. 'I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living.' We understand that the event of death may come—

Soon and suddenly upon us. It cannot be far off, and it may be very near at hand. This night thy soul may be required of thee. How often are children carried off before their parents, the scholar before their teacher, the physician before his patients. 'Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.' We understand death to be—

The penalty of guilt. 'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' In Adam all die, even those who never sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression. But as death is the wages of sin, so 'the gift of God is eternal life through our Lord Jesus Christ.' To understand death aright we must view it in connection with—

The remedy which has been provided for it in the sacrifice of Christ, who by dying took away sin, which is the sting of death, and destroyed him who had the power of death, that is, the devil, and delivered them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage, and who are enabled to say, 'Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord.' How awfully momentous is the event of death, when thus understood! How unaccountable, how fatal the infatuation which treats it as a matter of trifling or of distant concern. All who are truly wise will consider their latter end. Wisdom requires them to consider it with—

Serious attention, as a subject in which they are deeply interested, and with which they must very shortly be brought into personal connection. Fools may altogether exclude the thought of death; but instead of being resisted as a presumptuous intruder, it ought to be welcomed as a friendly monitor, and permitted habitually to influence our feelings and conduct. It is not more calculated to alarm the sinner and bring him to Christ, than it is necessary to humble the believer, and excite him to duty. They who are wise will consider their latter end—

Practically, and in the way of diligent preparation, by cultivating a state of mind and character suitable for meeting death. This includes the exercise of a simple and steady reliance on the work of Christ; connected with the cultivation of exalted spirituality, unfeigned and universal repentance, enlarged and active benevolence. Our lamps must not merely have oil in them, they must be filled with it, and exhibit a bright and vigorous flame. Nothing but the privilege of union to Christ realized by faith, evinced in the purification of the heart, and in the victory which overcometh the world, can prepare us to meet death with safety, or warrant us to meet it with confidence and comfort. 'Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall: for so an entrance shall be ministered to you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' They who are wise will consider their latter end—

Without delay. The Bridegroom may tarry, but the delay cannot be long; and the suddenness of his coming may be such as to take even those who love and long for his appearance by surprise. Then 'whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.' 'Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.'

TWENTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Turn you at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you,' Prov. i. 23.

WISDOM has a word in season for persons of every variety of character and circumstances. For the ignorant, she has a word of instruction; for the sorrowful, a word of consolation; for the secure, a word of alarm; for the fearful, a word of encouragement. She speaks here to sinners, to 'simple ones' who 'love simplicity,' to 'scorners' who 'delight in scorning,' to 'fools' who hate 'knowledge;' that is, to wilful, daring, and obstinate transgressors, and for them she has a word of 'reproof.' Her reproofs are conveyed through many different channels. One of these is—

The word of God. 'All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for reproof. It points out the evil nature and ruinous consequences of sin, and declares the certainty of a coming judgment, by which 'the wrath of God shall be revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men.' At the same time it deals with the peculiarities of individual character; it holds up to sinners of every description a mirror which reflects the image of their own depravity, and it comes home to the conscience of each in language which reproves alike the indifference of the careless, the duplicity of the hypocritical, the pride of the self-righteous, the impiety of the profane, and the excesses of the voluptuous. 'For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart.'

Ministers are reprovers. They are traitors to the cause of Christ who 'speak smooth things,' saying, 'Peace, peace, when there is no peace,' and seek to please rather than to profit and edify the people. Their commission runs in these terms, 'Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins.' John the Baptist did not flatter Herod the king, but reproved him as he deserved without fear or favour. Of Jesus it is said, that he taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes; and his servants are commanded to 'preach the word, be instant in season and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine.' Popular errors must not be countenanced, but corrected; prevailing sins must not be connived at, but condemned; unwelcome truths must not be concealed, but declared; the vices both of individuals and communities must, without distinction of rank, or sex, or age, or circumstances, be fearlessly exposed; the people must be addressed not in vague generalities, but in plain, pointed, and searching appeals to the conscience and the heart. He is a bad preacher who makes the hearers forget themselves in their admiration of him. Discourses which give greatest offence frequently do most good.

Conscience is a reprove. The sinner may shut his eyes to the light of scripture, and his ears to the voice of the preacher; but where can he find a retreat from the lash of an awakened conscience? By nature conscience is defiled; and it may be blinded through ignorance, or misled by error, or seared as with a hot iron by sensual excess. But the force of natural conscience cannot be altogether subdued; and when its testimony is heard condemning the sinner, and setting before him the terrors of a coming retribution, as in the case of Belshazzar whose 'knees smote one against another' when he beheld the hand-writing on the wall; or of Melix who 'trembled' when Paul 'reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;' what is this but a message of reproof from heaven? How precious are the reproofs administered by the counsels of—

Christian friendship! 'Faithful are the wounds of a friend.' David held them in high estimation, 'Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head.' Such reproofs ought to be received as tokens of affection, and listened to as the dictates of wisdom.

The afflictive dispensations of providence speak the language of reproof. Manasseh had been one of the chief of sinners, but solitude and suffering brought him to repentance, and he found mercy. We are prone to complain of our trials, but if we viewed them in the proper light we should see cause to be thankful for them. We ought always to bear in mind that to improve them aright is to be reprov'd by them. The reproofs of wisdom all aim at one practical object, it is to awaken repentance.' But reproofs cannot produce this effect without the operation of—

Divine influence. This is graciously promised; for wisdom has said, 'I will pour out my Spirit unto you.' Repentance is man's duty, but God's work. We may change the conduct, but he renews the heart; we may avoid the act of sin, but he destroys the love of it; we may go through the forms of duty, but he implants the principle of obedience. To the commandment which says, 'Turn ye at my reproof,' let us therefore reply, 'Turn thou me and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God.'

Reproofs must be understood in order to be effectual. Wisdom has provided and promised all needful instruction. She therefore adds, 'I will make known my words unto you.' The Spirit has given the word, but he must also give the capacity to discern its meaning. In his light only shall we see light. Let us unite dependence on his teaching with the diligent and prayerful use of all appointed means of instruction. Let us beware of setting at nought his counsels, or despising his reproofs; for he who being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy.'

—
 TWENTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'Because I have called, and ye refused, I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh,' Prov. i. 24, 26.

THE government of God demands from us now, and will ultimately obtain from all his intelligent creatures, unlimited acquiescence and approbation. We are not, indeed, permitted, in many cases, to know the reasons of his conduct; nor do we in any case possess the capacity fully to comprehend them. But he has a reason for every thing that he does, which, when clearly revealed, shall at once demonstrate the necessity of his procedure, and display its perfectly wise, and holy, and gracious character. 'Clouds and darkness are round about him;' yet righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne; mercy and truth shall go before his face.'

In the indulgence extended to wicked men there is an apparent deviation from those principles of rectitude and impartiality which regulate the divine government. Not only do they seem to enjoy impunity in sin; they often attain to a far higher degree of prosperity than falls to the lot of others. This has in all ages been a source of perplexity and discouragement to the people of God, whilst it renders sinners bolder and more hardened in wickedness. But they abuse the divine forbearance and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth to repentance; and they treasure up to themselves 'wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgments of God.' 'Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.' But God will bring every work into judgment, and will render unto every man according to his work; and he will be glorified no less in the destruction of his enemies than in the salvation of his redeemed people. He has distinctly stated—

The grounds of their condemnation. They shall not be permitted to urge the plea of ignorance, nor the want of opportunity, nor even moral inability as their excuse; far less shall they be allowed to plead the decrees of God, or the limitation of Christ's atonement to those whom the Father has given him. It will be sufficient to answer every objection, and silence every murmur for the Judge to say, 'I have called, and ye refused.' 'Few are chosen,' but 'many are called;' and it is not with the purpose of election, which has not been revealed, that sinners have to do, but with the call of mercy which addresses to them the free, unrestricted, unconditional offer of salvation. In refusing this call they act wilfully, deliberately, from enmity to God, and aversion to his service. 'This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.' Thus they incur the guilt of disobeying the command of God, of denying his truth, of despising his mercy, of rejecting his counsel, of counting the blood of the covenant, wherewith Christ was sanctified, an unholy thing, and doing despite unto the Spirit of grace. Resting on such grounds the punishment of the wicked shall be perfectly—

Righteous. The justice of God demands it; his mercy permits it; his truth and faithfulness cannot be maintained without it. All the attributes of his character will be infinitely honoured by it. The whole intelligent creation will approve of it. Sinners themselves will silently acquiesce in it. The man who had not on the wedding garment was speechless in presence of the king, so shall be the finally impenitent under the sentence of the Judge. And their condemnation as it is perfectly righteous so it is inevitably—

Certain. Now they have an 'accepted time,' and a 'day of salvation.' But the door, by which they are now invited to enter, will then be shut. Prayer will no longer avail. All the things that belong to their peace will be hid from their eyes. The God of mercy will then have 'forgotten to be gracious,' and will 'be favourable no more.' How vain must be the hope of the poor and distressed when their prayer for relief is met not by the look and language of sympathy, but by laughter and mockery! How dreadful to hear the Father of mercies declare, 'I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh.' And he is not a 'man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent.'

How then shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation? Who can resist the force of his Almighty arm, or elude the inspection of his all-seeing eye? What is there to make up for the want of his friendship, or to protect us from the effect of his anger? The punishment of the sinner will be unspeakably—

Awful. To them on the left hand the Judge shall say, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' 'When, therefore, the great day of his wrath is come, who shall be able to stand? Who among us can dwell with devouring fire? who among us can dwell with everlasting burnings?'

But, blessed be God, there is still a way of escape. The time has not yet arrived of which it is said, 'Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer.' His patience continues to wait, and his Spirit to strive. He calls upon us to 'come, for all things are now ready. Turn ye, why will ye die, O house of Israel? Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.'

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'These words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up,' Deut. vi. 6, 7.

THE words which form the subject of this exhortation obviously refer in the first instance to the law of the ten commandments, which had on that very day been delivered to the people of Israel. 'These words' may, however, be supposed to comprehend generally the whole of revelation, including both the Old and New Testaments; and in particular they apply to the record which God has given of his Son Jesus Christ, which unfolds a complete system of truth to be believed, and a perfect rule of duty to be followed, with all necessary means to be observed for the purpose of enabling us to understand the one and to obey the other. Our duty in reference to the words of inspiration consists of two parts: we are commanded to receive them for our own benefit, and we are required to communicate them for the benefit of others. They demand in the first instance a—

Cordial reception from ourselves. It is not enough that we put them in our houses, so as to have constant access to them for reading and meditation; nor even that we have them in our memories so as to be able to repeat them with ease and accuracy from beginning to end. They must not only be known and remembered, but understood and approved; they must be regarded not only with profound respect, but with affectionate acquiescence; they must be submitted to not only from a sense of duty, but in the spirit of love. To this effect it is enjoined, 'These words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart.'

The words which God has commanded us deserve a place in the heart. They are the words of infallible truth, and merit our fullest confidence; they are the words of eternal life, and claim our warmest attachment. 'More to be desired are they than gold; yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey, and the honey comb.' It is the heart that God looks to, and speaks to: and the services we perform in obedience to his word can be acceptable and honouring to him in so far only as they express the feelings of the heart. So long as it has not taken possession of the heart, the word of God can produce no sanctifying effect on the character; and is in reality rejected. The good seed must be sown not by the way side, nor on stony ground, nor among thorns, where it would be either entirely lost, or exert only a superficial and temporary influence; but on the soil of a good and honest heart, where it will take deep root, and bring forth fruit in some thirty, in some sixty, and in some a hundred fold. But as it is man's duty to receive the word into his heart, so it is God's work to put it there, and he has graciously promised to do his own work. 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after these days, saith the Lord. I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.'

Having taken possession of the heart, the words which God has commanded us will necessarily exert their proper influence in securing all those practical effects which are intended or required. The memory will carefully retain them, the mind will seriously reflect upon them, the mouth will loudly speak of them, and the life habitually correspond with them. In particular, the reception of them for ourselves will produce the desire, and enforce the endeavour to—

Communicate them to others. This we are directed to attempt in two different ways. One is by teaching, or—

Instruction. 'Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children.' Children represent the youth of every family; and in this view the injunction is addressed to parents. To them has been committed the charge of teaching unto their children the words which God has commanded.

For this purpose they should read and explain the bible to their children, and enable them to read and understand it for themselves. Other branches of knowledge may be useful and even necessary; but what shall these avail in the end if the one thing needful has been neglected? The work of parental instruction requires much time and great labour; and it must be done not by substitutes, but by parents themselves, in a course of diligent and well directed personal efforts. It is truly said that 'a good man leaveth an inheritance to his children.' He may have nothing else to give, but if he has conferred on them the advantages of a religious education, followed up by fervent prayer, and illustrated and enforced by a consistent example, he leaves them an inheritance that is more valuable than any thing and every thing else. But 'children' represent the rising generation in general, and in this view the precept speaks to all without exception. Many parents care not for the spiritual interests of their families; in such cases it becomes the duty of every professing Christian to endeavour, as far as possible, to supply their lack of service. In no other way can we do so much good at so little expence as by extending the blessings of a religious education to the ignorant and neglected youth. But another mode of communication is by talking, or—

Conversation. 'Thou shalt talk of them.' To talk is to convey our thoughts upon any subject in a simple, homely, and familiar style of address, such as we are accustomed to employ in the common intercourse of domestic and social life. Without being necessarily coarse or undignified it has the recommendation of being universally understood, and of being calculated to attract and interest the minds both of the learned and the ignorant. It is the style which God himself has adopted in the revelation of his will, for the scriptures which contain it are distinguished throughout by their extreme plainness and simplicity. What was the teaching of Christ but a series of conversations in which he talked familiarly with his disciples or with the Jewish people? Some talk on religious subjects evidently for no other purpose than to display their own attainments: but our design should be to instruct and edify others; and this requires that we should speak of them with the utmost simplicity, and at the same time with great fervour and frequency. To obtrude these subjects officiously on the attention of others, would invariably do harm instead of good. A word fitly spoken, how good is it! In this as in every department of duty 'wisdom is profitable to direct;' but if it is the wisdom that cometh down from above it will determine us to embrace every opportunity that may be presented, whether in public or private, of inviting the attention of those with whom we associate to the things which belong to their peace.

Few points of character may be more safely relied on as an evidence of personal godliness than the desire to converse on religious subjects. It is truly mournful to think how very seldom matters of a spiritual nature find their way into our ordinary conversation. The professing people of God meet together and converse about many things; they talk on the state of the weather, or the news of the day, or on questions of national policy, or the merits of public men, or the defects of private character, but have not a word to say respecting the truths of the bible, nor the concerns of their souls, nor the realities of an eternal world. How different is the course which the authority of inspiration has dictated on the subject! 'Thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.'

This practice has many advantages to recommend it. It is of comparatively easy observance. Those who cannot produce a regular and well connected discourse upon the truths of God, are yet able to talk about them in familiar conversation. No man feels himself at a loss for something to say when he speaks of subjects that lie near to his heart, for 'out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.' Another recommendation is the probability of usefulness. In this way valuable lessons of truth may be communicated, and seasonable warnings administered, and serious impressions produced, no less extensively and no less effectually than by more public and laborious instrumentality. 'Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt gather it after many days.' But personal holiness is an essential qualification for religious usefulness. We must seek to have our own hearts impressed with the truths of the bible, and then the work of communicating them to others will be easy, pleasant, and successful.

---

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'That from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus,' 2 Tim. iii. 15.

WE know very little with regard to the early history of Timothy. One most important circumstance has been recorded for our instruction.

His father was not a Jew, nor a proselyte to the religion of the Jews, but a Greek, and consequently, if not hostile to the Jewish scriptures, yet ignorant of them, and indifferent about them. Timothy had not been circumcised in his infancy; but his religious education had, notwithstanding, been carefully attended to by his grandmother Lois, and his mother Eunice, who were not only Jewish by birth, but, which is far better, decidedly pious women. Through the blessing of God upon their labours, young Timothy acquired an early and intimate knowledge of the Old Testament scriptures; and he was by this means prepared to follow the example of his excellent mother by embracing the gospel, and devoting himself to the service of Christ. During the whole of his subsequent life he continued to cherish a grateful sense of the benefit which he had derived from early parental instruction; and Paul, his spiritual father, took occasion to remind him, both as a ground of thankfulness to God, and a motive to perseverance in duty, 'that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

Other writings make men wise, but not 'wise unto salvation.' The wisdom that may be derived from them is valuable in a very high degree, and capable of being applied to many useful purposes, and worthy of being sought after with ardour and diligence; but it is the wisdom of this world, which has to do only with the things of the world, and which, with the world, will at death pass away and be forgotten. What can all the wisdom avail us which the facts of history supply, or which may be derived from a minute acquaintance with the maxims of philosophy, the mysteries of science, or the rules of art, so long as we remain destitute of that wisdom which the light of inspiration has revealed? 'Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.'

The arrogant deist who denies the necessity of revelation, labours under a delusion scarcely more palpable and pernicious than the blinded votary of the Church of Rome, who asserts its insufficiency. We know that the scriptures need not the help of interpretations to clear up their obscurity; much less do they need the help of traditions to supply their deficiency. The end for which they were given, and their perfect efficacy to the accomplishment of that end, could not have been more clearly and conclusively affirmed than in the words of the apostle, who declares that they 'are able to make wise unto salvation.' They do this—

By the discoveries which they afford. The first step towards the attainment of saving wisdom consists in the knowledge or conviction of sin. The scripture hath concluded all under sin, 'that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become guilty before God.' But a conviction of sin without the hope of forgiveness could only lead to despair. The awakened sinner finds a refuge in the holy scriptures, which assure him of an acceptable atonement offered for the expiation of his guilt, of a perfect righteousness wrought out for the justification of his person, and an effectual influence provided for the sanctification of his nature. Here is a redemption alike honouring to the perfections of God, and suited to the circumstances of man, comprehending everything which we can possibly need, or reasonably desire, or profitably seek after, knowledge for our ignorance, pardon for our guilt, love for our enmity, purity for our corruption, strength for our weakness, hope for our fears, life for our death. The holy scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation by—

The influence which they exert. Our Lord said of them, what cannot be affirmed of any other writings, 'The words that I speak unto you they are spirit, they are life.' Paul had felt this influence in himself, and from experience he could declare, 'I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.' He had witnessed it in others, and he could appeal to thousands when he said, 'For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.'

But the holy scriptures can exert no influence unless they are believed. Articles of food may be wholesome and nutritious, but in order to impart strength to the body they must be received into it. Medicines may be calculated to effect a cure, yet the patient would inevitably perish if he should continue to resist their application. Our unbelief cannot affect the truth of the scriptures, but it will prevent their efficacy. The influence which they exert is not mechanical, but moral: it is the influence of doctrines and precepts, of promises and threatenings, addressed to the understanding and the judgment, the conscience and the heart. But these cannot operate unless they are felt; nor can they be felt until they are believed. Instead of being the savour of life unto life, which they are graciously intended and calculated to be, they become to all who reject them the savour of death unto death. And as it forms the chief aggravation of their guilt now, so it will constitute the bitterest ingredient in their cup of suffering hereafter, that the holy scriptures, which they have resisted, 'are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

After all, the holy scriptures exert only an instrumental power. They are perfectly fitted to do their work, but being merely an instrument, they can do nothing effectually without the agent. Since all men are by nature inclined to reject the scriptures, and since, in point of fact, the great majority of those to whom they have been addressed do actually reject them, the question arises, How comes it to pass that any believe them? This effect results from the operation of a power distinct from the scriptures, and which makes use of them only as its instrument. 'To you it is given,' says the apostle to the Philippians, 'to believe in his name.' And he speaks elsewhere not of the things which he wrought, but of 'the things which God wrought by him to make the Gentiles obedient in word and deed.' Without the agency of the Spirit, Paul would have planted, and Apollos watered in vain. Hence the Saviour prayed for his disciples, 'Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth.' But as the scriptures are nothing without the influences of the Spirit, so the Spirit does nothing without the instrumentality of the scriptures. Through them he begins his good work of grace in the soul, carries it forward, and brings it to perfection.

We have an important duty to perform in regard to the holy scriptures. It is to cultivate the knowledge of them. 'Thou hast known the holy scriptures.' All the knowledge that is necessary may be acquired by our own efforts in the use of appointed means, by reading and hearing, with diligence, meditation, and prayer. But to be made 'wise unto salvation' implies that we know the scriptures experimentally and practically, and in such a way as to be sanctified by them. They can be savingly useful to us in so far only as we mix faith with our knowledge of them, by realizing their truth, and by having recourse to them for principles to govern, rules to direct, motives to animate, and consolations to support us under all the difficulties, and troubles, and temptations of our present militant condition.

An early acquaintance with the holy scriptures is peculiarly necessary. How highly favoured are they to whom it can be said, 'that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures!' Let parents remember the word which says, 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' The experience of young Timothy serves to show how much a pious mother or grandmother may do for the salvation of children. To all who have enjoyed similar advantages, the apostle would say, 'Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. Those things, which ye have both learned and received, and heard and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you.' 'If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.'

---

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head,' Gen. iii. 15.

THE curse pronounced on the serpent consists of two parts, the one having a relation to its natural, the other to its representative character. An irrational animal cannot be the object of moral blame. The serpent was nothing more than the unconscious and involuntary instrument of corrupting Eve. Yet the serpent was made to share in the punishment of her disobedience. From being probably both harmless in disposition, and beautiful in form, it was degraded into an ugly and venomous reptile. 'Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field, upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life.' In consequence, the serpent has ever since been an object of dread and detestation, and it continues to this day to be shunned or destroyed as a dangerous enemy of the human race.

But the curse of God, which extended even to the visible instrument of the temptation, was chiefly directed against 'that old serpent, called the devil, and satan,' who was the invisible agent in the temptation. He tempted the woman by means of the serpent, and the divine displeasure was accordingly conveyed to him through the serpent as his representative. Let us view the curse in connection with its execution.

The design of the tempter was to put enmity between man and his Creator, and he succeeded in his diabolical purpose. In yielding to his solicitations, the woman accepted his offered friendship, and promised a willing obedience. Sin entered into the world, and death by sin. The heart of man, which had till then overflowed with love to God, became hardened with enmity against him. But satan could not retain the conquest which he had made. The victim whom he had deceived and enslaved was instantly torn from his grasp. To punish his treachery, and at the same time to defeat his purpose, God said to him, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman.'

But the evils of the first transgression descended to posterity. By the divine permission satan enjoys, to a limited extent, the influence he had acquired. He has had in every age a numerous offspring, who acknowledge him as their Father, and prove their descent from him by their devotedness to him. They breathe his spirit, bow to his authority, exhibit his likeness, and execute his will. In particular, they all inherit that enmity to God which actuates him; and are thus distinguished from the seed of the woman, who act under a different influence, and pursue an entirely opposite course. It is therefore added, 'I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed.' The seed of the woman is confessedly no other than the promised Messiah, the eternal Son of God, and the Saviour of a perishing world. He undertook to repair the ruins of our fall; and in particular he came 'to destroy the works of the devil.' But in the 'seed of the woman' are comprehended all the members of Christ's spiritual body, whom he redeemed on earth, and represents in heaven, who resemble him in spirit and character, and fight under his banner against the common enemy.

To the tempter the intimation here made was fraught with disappointment and alarm. It revealed a purpose which involved his defeat and degradation. He had gained a triumph, but it was to be neither universal nor perpetual. A remedy was provided for all the miseries which he had entailed on mankind. Even the woman who had fallen a victim to his treachery, was to commence in her own person, and to continue in her posterity a course of active and successful resistance to his authority. A far mightier than he was to arise who should control his dominion, and drive him from his throne, and cast him into 'everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.'

But the same announcement which spoke the language of terror to the tempter conveyed a message of mercy to man. We read in it a clear and comprehensive revelation of the glorious gospel of the blessed God. We behold in it the first ray of the Sun of righteousness which dawned on our benighted world. We hear in it a publication of those glad tidings which in the fullness of time an angel announced to the shepherds of Bethlehem. Our first parents did not deserve, but greatly needed the comfort of such a gracious assurance. It has proved effectual in confirming the faith, and animating the hope of God's people throughout all succeeding generations.

They have in every age been exposed to the effects of satan's enmity. From this source have sprung, more or less directly, all the evils either from within or from without by which they have at any time been afflicted. By him the assaults of temptation are directed, by him also the flames of persecution are kindled. Calumny, reproach, ridicule, blasphemy, with every form and degree of violence against the truth and its friends, have all their origin in the enmity of the serpent. 'We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickednesses in high places.' The agency of the tempter, indeed, does not visibly appear, but its reality is notwithstanding unquestionable. The voice of inspiration has asserted it, the language of uniform experience has demonstrated it, the page of universal history bears witness to it. His names express his enmity as well as his acts. He is satan the adversary, Apollyon the destroyer, the devil an accuser; he is a liar, a deceiver, murderer, a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.

But the enmity which pursues the members of the church was directed chiefly against the person of its divine Head. He who had seduced Eve in the garden assaulted Christ in the wilderness. The opposition he encountered, the persecutions he suffered, the snares that were laid for him, the insults that were heaped upon him, the resistance of avowed enemies, the treachery of pretended friends, were all the effects of satanic enmity. His death was emphatically the 'hour and the power of darkness.' The prince of this world seemed then to be triumphant. But 'the seed of the woman' conquered by submission. He suffered an injury in the heel; but in return inflicted on his adversary a mortal wound. 'It shall bruise thy head.'

This he has done effectually in his own person. 'Through death he destroyed death, and him that had the power of death, that is, the devil.' Having spoiled principalities and powers he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in his cross.' This he will do actually in the experience of his people. Believing in him they participate in the honours of his triumph, and shall reap the fruits of his victory. Relying on him they are strengthened to maintain the conflict in which he engaged, and to pursue the course which he set them the example. He will bruise satan under their feet, and enable them to say, 'in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us.'

'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcome, and am set down with my Father in his throne.'

—
 TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God,' Psal. xl. 7, 8.

THE Psalmist did not say this of himself. The inspired author of the epistle to the Hebrews has applied the words not to David, but to David's Son and Lord. Spoken by any other person they would have been unintelligible or contradictory; proceeding from him they are clear, appropriate, and full of deeply interesting truth.

It was in the time of man's extremity that the Redeemer undertook to work out his deliverance. No other expedients could be of any avail. Sacrifice and offering had been resorted to; but they could not take away sin. God did not desire and could not accept of them as an adequate atonement for the guilt of man. In this awful emergency, when his case seemed to be hopeless, and his salvation impossible, then it was that He, who alone had power to save, exclaimed with generous promptitude, 'Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God.'

In these words he expressed his adherence to the terms of a previous agreement. It had been from eternity 'written' in the book of the divine counsels; but that it might be manifest to the church it was 'written in the volume' of the Old Testament scriptures. The Son of God discovered no wish to shrink from his undertaking, now that the time of its fulfilment had arrived. On the contrary, he declared his willingness to act up to the very letter of his engagement, by doing and suffering according to all that had been written in the law, and by the prophets, and in the psalms concerning him. In the immediate prospect of entering on his work he gave utterance to the feelings of his heart in these memorable and most emphatic words, 'Lo, I come: I delight to do thy will, O my God.' He alludes to the work which he had to do, and expresses the state of mind with which he regarded it.

By the will of God we are to understand his law. The Saviour has explained his own meaning. Having said, 'I delight to do thy will,' he immediately proceeds to express the same sentiment in a different form, by adding, 'thy law is within my heart.' As the substitute of his people he was required to do all that the law enjoins, to abstain from all that the law prohibits, to render the full amount of submission and of service both in heart and conduct which the law demands, that he might become 'the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.' He had not only to pay their debt of obedience, but also to bear the penalty of their guilt. It was necessary that he should fulfil the precepts of the moral law; but it was no less necessary that he should realize the prefigurations of the ceremonial law, by submitting in our nature to the privations and pains of a laborious and sorrowful life, and to the suffering of a cruel, ignominious, and accursed death.

Yet in the near and certain prospect of all this sorrow and suffering he felt and expressed the most perfect acquiescence. There was on his part the absence of all disinclination to the will of God which he had to do. He moreover declared his cordial approbation of it. He did not merely submit to it as that which must be done; he heartily approved of it as that which ought to be done. He not only approved of it; he was delighted with it. He looked upon it with a high satisfaction, a sublime complacency, which disposed him to sacrifice and suffer everything that might be required in the doing of it. He said, 'Mine ears hast thou bored,' alluding to the ceremony of piercing the ear of a slave who refused to leave the service of his master, and who requested that his ear might be perforated with an instrument in token of perpetual servitude. In like manner, the Redeemer devoted himself unreservedly to the cause which he had espoused. And to show how entirely he was engrossed by it, how fervently he was attached to it, and how firmly he was resolved to persevere in it, he could declare, 'I delight to do thy will, O my God.'

He said this not in ignorance, but with a clear and certain foreknowledge of all that the will of God had appointed for him both to do and suffer. He discerned every ingredient of bitterness that was to mingle in his cup of sorrow; the treachery of Judas who betrayed him; the cowardice of Peter who denied him; the inconstancy of his other disciples, who, with one exception, forsook him; the injustice of Pilate, who first commanded him to be scourged, and then condemned him to be crucified; he anticipated the full amount of suffering that was reserved for him, when he cried, 'I delight to do thy will, O my God.' He said this not from insensibility to pain. There was nothing of stoical apathy in his constitution. His dread of suffering he did not conceal, but expressed on various occasions; and the expression which he gave of it forms an interesting feature in the example which he left. It shows the sincerity and genuineness of his character, and forms a striking contrast to the philosophers of Greece and Rome, who boasted of their indifference to pain, and their contempt of death. He prayed three times, 'If it be possible, let this cup pass from me;' and yet could say, 'Not my will, but thine be done.' Resignation is too feeble a term to describe the state of mind with which he suffered. He not only 'endured the cross,' but 'despised the shame.' He rose superior to it; he delighted in it, 'I delight to do thy will, O my God.'

This was not the language of momentary feeling, but of conviction and principle. Our Lord acted in conformity with this declaration from the commencement of his life to its close. His cup of wrath was felt to be palatable and even pleasing when he reflected that it was a cup which 'the Father had given' him. It was sufficient to render his work of suffering not only tolerable but delightful to know that he had been appointed to it by the will of his Father in heaven. We have in him, not only an object of faith which we should devoutly contemplate, but an example of holiness which we should carefully imitate. His disciples are they who, like him, delight to do the will of God. Their obedience falls infinitely short of his, yet it possesses a measure of conformity to his in the spirit and principle of it. He could say, 'I do always those things that please the Father;' and he claims kindred with those only who walk by the same rule, 'Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, and mother.'

—
 TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,' Isa. liii. 10.

OFFERINGS for sin have been presented in all ages, and among all nations. This practice can only be accounted for by tracing it to the positive appointment of God. There is nothing in the light of nature that seems to dictate such a mode of propitiating the divine favour. Yet the universality of the practice may be appealed to as a testimony to the fact of man's apostacy, and in confirmation of the truth that 'without shedding of blood is no remission of sin.'

These awful words are legibly inscribed on every part of the Jewish dispensation. Under the law 'almost all things are purged by blood.' To no purpose would the high priest have approached the mercy-seat had he not taken the blood of atonement with him. Prayer and intercession could be of no avail unless accompanied and enforced by the offering of sacrifice. But 'it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. For the law having a shadow of good things to come, could never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect. But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.'

The death of Christ was truly an 'offering for sin.' All that the sacrifices under the law did ceremonially and typically was done by the sacrifice of Christ actually and effectually. To adduce the whole of the passages in which this great truth is either obviously implied, or expressly and strongly asserted, would be to quote a large portion of the New Testament scriptures. One passage may suffice: 'For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.'

Christ's 'offering for sin' is a sacrifice of God's own providing. When no eye pitied, and no other hand could save us, He, against whom we had sinned, in the tenderness of his compassion, and in the plenitude of his mercy, said, 'Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom; I have laid help on One that is mighty.' He is the 'Lamb of God,' and 'the Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all.' His work of suffering was a work which the Father had given him to do, and his cup of sorrow was a cup the Father had given him to drink. 'It pleased the Lord to bruise him, and he hath put him to grief.' As he hung on the cross he verified the pathetic language of the prophet, 'Is it nothing to you all ye that pass by? behold, and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger.'

But the offering of Christ for sin was not more distinguished in its origin, than by its excellence. He offered up himself, his human nature; an offering absolutely without spot or blemish. He offered himself, not in part, but wholly. The offerings under the law were merely bodily sacrifices; and the offering of Christ was, in like manner, an embodied sacrifice; hence we read that he 'bare our sins in his own body on the tree;' and of our being 'sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ once for all.'

But his body was not the whole, nor the principal part of the sacrifice which he offered. It is not the body but the soul that makes the man. His body connects him with the inferior animals which have bodies without souls; but his soul unites him to the angels of heaven, who have souls without bodies. In the offering of himself, Christ 'poured out his soul unto death.' He underwent the most intense bodily suffering; yet this bore no proportion to the 'travail of his soul,' which was quite distinct from the pain of his body, and did not result from it. Before the hand of violence had touched his body he felt all the anguish of this mysterious travail. In the garden it convulsed him with agony, and expressed itself in drops of bloody sweat, and drew from him the exclamation, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.'

Christ presented his offering in the view of the people; yet the people could see a small portion only of his sufferings. They saw his countenance 'marred more than any man's, and his visage more than the sons of men.' They saw his back torn with the scourge, his head bruised with thorns, his body bending under the weight of his cross, his hands and his feet fastened by nails to the accursed tree. But they could see nothing of the anguish of his spirit under the hidings of his Father's countenance, when the sword of justice was plunged into his innocent side, and the storm of infinite wrath poured out its fury on his head, and the load of his people's guilt pressed him down to the lowest abyss of wretchedness, when he trode the wine-press alone, and magnified the law, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and triumphed over principalities and powers, and brought in an everlasting righteousness, and perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

In the offering of the Redeemer's soul for sin let us contemplate, with adoring wonder and gratitude, the transcendent love of God the Father in appointing so expensive a sacrifice, and of God the Son in consenting to become the victim; and let the love of Christ constrain us thus to judge, 'that if one died for all, then were all dead; and he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again.'

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens,' Heb. vii. 26.

AARON was an high priest, but not such an high priest as became us. As a man, he was guilty in common with all other men, and, therefore, needed daily to offer up sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the people's. The sacrifices which he presented, moreover, had no power to take away sin, and could not 'make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience.' The priesthood of Aaron, indeed, was divinely appointed, and it completely answered all the purposes of its institution. But it wanted both influence and permanence; it was entirely typical in its nature and use; and derived all its importance from that better dispensation which it prefigured, and by which it was superseded.

But we have 'an high Priest over the house of God.' This name has been given to Christ, not in the way of mere accommodation to the Levitical priesthood, but to express his mediatorial office, and redeeming work. He was like Aaron 'called of God an high priest;' and anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. The Jewish high priest offered sacrifice; Christ in like manner gave himself for us 'an offering and a sacrifice to God of sweet-smelling savour.' The high priest under the law went into the most holy place once every year, and presented himself before the mercy seat, having the blood of atonement in his hand; so Jesus our High Priest, 'by his own blood entered in once into the holy place, and sat down on the right hand of God, where he ever liveth to make intercession for us.' But Christ was not called to the priesthood after the order of Aaron. He belonged to a different family, and another tribe. Aaron represented Christ partly, but not perfectly. The law made nothing perfect: there was therefore 'a necessity for another priest, who should rise after the order of Melchizedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron.' Christ rose to the priesthood after the similitude of Melchizedec, of whom it is said that he was 'without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life.' He had parents like other men:

he had both a beginning of days and an end of life. But his descent is not recorded; neither is the date of his birth, nor of his death. These particulars were concealed, in order that he might be 'made like unto the Son of God,' who, as man, was without a human father, and as God, without a mother; who was in the beginning with God, and liveth for evermore; who is 'made higher than the heavens,' having a name given to him which is 'above every name.' Such an High Priest became us. He supplied all the defects of the Levitical priesthood, and realized all its pre-figurations. He has power with God, and prevails. Him the Father heareth always. He is just such a priest as we needed, and as a priest, he is all that we need. For in one mysterious person he combines supreme divinity with—

Sinless humanity. He took upon him the reality of our flesh, but he assumed only the likeness of our sinful flesh. 'It behoved him to be in all things made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high Priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.' He who knew no sin consented to be reckoned sinful, and submitted to be treated as sinful, that we 'might be made the righteousness of God in him.' But he is 'holy,' not merely in virtue of his consecration to the priesthood, but personally and inherently, in the possession of every moral excellence of which human nature is susceptible. He is, therefore, perfectly 'harmless,' as well as infinitely 'holy,' free from actual transgression, chargeable with no neglect or violation of duty. And as he committed no actual sin, so he contracted no moral pollution; for he was 'undefiled.' Wickedness prevailed around him, but it affixed no stain on him. He may with truth be said to have been 'separate from sinners.' He dwelt among them, and associated with them. He felt for them, and expressed his sympathy towards them by going about doing good both to their bodies and souls. Yet he was entirely separate from them in spirit and affection, in practice and character. In a moral point of view, he had nothing in common with sinners, and was in every respect opposed to them.

In the priesthood of Christ what a sure foundation is laid of confidence towards God! His work is perfect. We behold its effect in sin taken away, justice satisfied, peace procured, grace provided, death disarmed, and glory promised. Believing in him, we may ask with the apostle, 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.'

What a lovely character is here exhibited for our imitation! He left us an example that we should follow his steps. His people were pre-destinated to be conformed to his image. 'He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.' 'Be ye holy, for I am holy.' Let all who believe in him be careful to maintain good works.

As he represents us in heaven, let us represent him on earth. As he pleads with God for us, let us plead with men for him. Speak well of his ways, commend his truth, promote his cause, reprove the ungodly, edify the church, 'be steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.'

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY—MORNING.

'He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief,' Isa. liii. 3.

THE Saviour as a man is distinguishable from all other men by the character he exhibited, and the sufferings he endured. He is fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into his lips. No man ever spake, and none ever acted like him. History records no example equal to his in purity, in zeal, in excellence, and usefulness. As his character was peculiar, so was his experience. He descended as far below other men in humiliation and sorrow, as he rose above them in piety and moral perfection. The treatment he experienced was connected with circumstances which, in the highest degree, aggravated its criminality. He was treated with—Contempt, for 'he was despised of men.' They despised him for the obscurity of his birth, and asked, 'Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?' They despised him for the meanness of his occupation and kindred, saying, 'Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon: and are not his sisters here with us?' They despised him for the company with whom he associated, 'When the scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto his disciples, How is it that he eateth with publicans and sinners?' They despised his person and pretensions; his doctrine and miracles: they regarded him as a man utterly unworthy of respect or attention; they held him up to scorn and infamy as 'a wine-bibber and a glutton, the friend of publicans and sinners.' They even preferred a murderer to him. And after he had been given over to them to be crucified, as if the death of the cross were not a sufficient degradation, they loaded him with insult and indignity; they buffeted and spat on him; they clothed him in a purple robe; put on him a crown of thorns, and with impious mockery bowed the knee before him, and cried, 'Hail, King of the Jews.' To contempt there was added—

Rejection, for he was also 'rejected of men.' 'He came to his own, and they received him not.' They hated his instructions, and said, 'Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.' They resisted his authority, and declared, 'We will not have this man to reign over us.' He invited them to believe, that they might be saved; but they continued in unbelief: he commanded them to repent, that their sins might be blotted out; but they persisted in their impenitence. He was rejected by the elders; the lawyers rejected him; the whole Jewish nation, with a few exceptions, rejected him. They rejected the truths which he taught, the blessings which he offered, the ministry which he exercised, the sacrifice which he offered, the salvation which he wrought out. 'My people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me.' In addition to contempt and rejection he was subjected to the endurance of unparalleled—

Distress. His experience of pain and grief procured for him the distinguishing appellation of 'the man of sorrows;' a name alike honouring to him, and instructive and consolatory to us. What is the history of his life, but a tale of distress, having written on it within and without, 'lamentation, and mourning, and woe?' Grief was in him not an occasional feeling, but a habitual state of mind; and there were in it an intensity and an acuteness of suffering, of which he alone was susceptible. His acquaintance with grief began at his birth, and it became every day more intimate and agonizing until, under the weight of accumulated and overwhelming sorrow, he 'bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.' Such is the treatment which the Saviour met with; and in his character and conduct there was everything to aggravate its criminality. Let it be viewed in connection with—

The innocence of his life. He could appeal to his bitterest enemies, and ask, 'Which of you convinceth me of sin?' Never did he either provoke or resent an injury, for he was both harmless and holy. He exhibited a combination of all those qualities which are most calculated to disarm hostility, to command esteem, and engage affection. How strange, and contradictory, and seemingly unaccountable that the holiest of men should be the greatest sufferer! But the treatment he met with will appear still more inexplicable, when viewed in connection with—

The usefulness of his labours. He went about doing good, giving food to the hungry, health to the diseased, sight to the blind, speech to the dumb, comfort to the sorrowful, and life to the dead. He spent his life in ministering to the relief of human misery, and in adding to the amount of human happiness. What numbers of the Jews were debtors to his compassion and power! By his teaching, example, and miracles, he made himself a benefactor to the whole Jewish nation. Yet they despised and rejected him. Peter explained the mystery, when he said to them, 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know: Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain.' They were merely God's instruments, and did what his hand and his counsel determined before to be done. But they acted wilfully, and wickedly, and therefore righteously perished.

Let none imagine that in similar circumstances they would have acted a different part. The spirit which influenced them is common to all. Hence it is that the stone which the builders rejected is still disallowed: and of those who confess him in words, how many deny him by their works! But to them which believe, he is precious. Whilst others see no beauty in him that he should be desired, they exclaim, 'how great is his beauty!' Yet how small a portion do they know of him. But what they know not now, they shall know hereafter. They shall see the King in his beauty, and appear with him 'when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe.'

---

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows,' Isa. liii. 4.

IN the time of Isaiah, the sufferings of Christ were future; yet he spake of them as if they had been already past. He foresaw them by the spirit of prophecy; but he described them in the language of history, to intimate their absolute certainty, and their perfect efficacy. 'Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows.' This from eternity he had undertaken to do, and the engagement became available in behalf of man from the period of his fall. The death of Christ possessed the same importance, and exercised the same influence under the Old Testament dispensation, which belong to it under the New, as the only way of access to God, and the sure ground of acceptance with him. The prophet tells—

What the Saviour suffered—'griefs' and 'sorrows,' representing an extremity of pain and anguish both in soul and body which no finite mind can conceive, and which no human language can express. Never was there any sorrow like his sorrow. The prophet describes the manner of the Saviour's endurance, and tells us how he suffered; with what meekness, and patience, and cheerful resignation he bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows. Above all, he points out the principle of the Saviour's sufferings, and declares them to have been purely—

Voluntary. It was not possible, indeed, that the cup which the Father had given him should pass away from him. But the obligation to suffer resulted from choice, not from necessity. He could say, 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again.' We had no claim on his sympathy. He beheld in us nothing to attract his favour, but every thing to provoke his displeasure, and excite his abhorrence. Yet he 'loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word; that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy, and without blemish.' His sufferings were strictly—

Vicarious. He endured them not merely for our benefit, but as our substitute, and he endured them in our nature, which he took upon him with all its sinless infirmities attached to it. Thus he literally put himself in our place, and bore not his, but our griefs, and carried our sorrows. So that what he endured actually for his people, they endured virtually in him. Hence they are said to be crucified with him, to be buried with him, and to be risen with him. What he is mediatorially, they are in virtue of their union to him; all that he did and suffered in their behalf, they did and suffered in his person. And as their griefs and sorrows were transferred to him, so the merit of his submission and suffering is imputed to them. They become righteous in his obedience, and are accepted in him the Beloved. The Lord, looking upon them in the face of his Anointed, sees no iniquity in them, approves of them, delights in them, and blesses them with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places. His sufferings were completely—

Effectual. All that he undertook to do, he has accomplished. In him we have the antitype of the scape-goat, which carried away the sins of the people, after having been confessed by the high priest, into the wilderness. 'He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors.' The offering of the scape-goat needed to be renewed every year; but this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down on the right hand of God, having by this one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified, and 'become the Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him.' The members of the church on earth unite in expressing their dependence on him, and acknowledging their obligations to him saying, 'in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;' and the ascriptions of the redeemed in heaven assert the same truth, and breathe a similar spirit, and commemorate the same deliverance, 'Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God, and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever. Amen.'

The sufferings of Christ, it is true, have not procured for his people the privilege of exemption from the griefs and the sorrows of temporal affliction; far less can they serve as a substitute for the griefs and the sorrows of genuine repentance. But they open up a fountain of rich consolation and never-failing support under trials of every description; and in particular, to mourners in Zion they 'give beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.' Let us, by faith and prayer, look to him for strength both to act and endure as seeing him who is invisible; let us go to him without the camp, bearing his reproach; not only willing to serve, but prepared to suffer in his service and for his sake; rejoicing in the belief that they who suffer for him shall also reign with him, and that the sufferings of this present life are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,' Gal. vi. 14.

THE subject of this resolution is the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which we are to understand not the material or wooden cross on which the Redeemer was suspended, and in which there could be nothing whereof to glory; but the sacrificial cross, by which he made atonement for sin, and reconciled us unto God. In a more extended sense the cross means the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, which all refer to the cross as the foundation on which they rest, and the centre in which they terminate. We may observe—

The state of mind which the apostle expressed in reference to this subject. He resolved to glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ; thus expressing his approbation of it, his confidence in it, his attachment to it, his expectations from it, his determination to adhere to it, to commend it, to contend for it, to live under its influence. He spake in his public capacity, and expressed the determination of every faithful minister of Christ; he spake also in his private character, and gave utterance to the feelings of every real believer.

He excluded every other ground of glorying not consistent with the honour of the cross. There were many other things in which he had been accustomed to glory: but he no longer regarded them as grounds of glorying. What! Shall he glory in his honourable descent; sprung from the father of the faithful; of the stock of Israel; of the tribe of Benjamin; a Hebrew of the Hebrews? 'God forbid.' Shall he glory in his connection with the church of the living God; circumcised the eighth day; a member of the commonwealth of Israel; to whom pertained the covenants, the adoption, the giving of the law, and the promises? 'God forbid.' Shall he then glory in his superior intellectual attainments; brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; possessing a mind highly cultivated by the pursuits of philosophy, and richly furnished with the stores of literature? 'God forbid.' Shall he rather glory in the correctness of his moral deportment, as touching the law, a Pharisee; and as touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless? 'God forbid.' 'What things were formerly gain to me, these I counted loss for Christ: yea, I count all things but loss that I may win Christ, and be found in him.'

But whilst Paul rejected every ground of glorying not consistent with the claims of the cross, he made every other subject of glorying subservient to the honour of the cross. He still gloried in many things. He gloried in his infirmities; but it was that the power of Christ might rest upon him. He gloried in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses; but it was for Christ's sake. He became a fool in glorying. He gloried in the birth of Christ, in his life and labours, in his teaching and miracles; but it was because they all pointed to the cross. He gloried in the doctrine of Christ, because it was the doctrine of the cross; in the preaching of Christ, because it was the preaching of the cross; in the death of Christ, because it was the death of the cross; in the triumphs of Christ, because they were the triumphs of the cross. The apostle had the best possible—

Reasons for resolving to glory in nothing save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. He saw in it the most interesting display of the divine character that was ever presented to the world; exhibiting the justice, the holiness, the power, the truth, and the mercy of God in perfect harmony, and with the clearest evidence. He beheld in it the end and fulfilment of the Old Testament dispensation, which all pointed to the cross, and terminated in it. In the cross the type was met by its antitype, the shadow by the substance, the prefiguration by the reality, the prediction by the event: the dawn was succeeded by the day, the stars disappeared in the brighter light of the Sun of righteousness. In the sacrifice of the cross the apostle witnessed the achievement of a complete and final victory over sin, and satan, and the world, and death. He discerned in it the sure foundation of a sinner's confidence and hope towards God, than which 'other foundation can no man lay,' but on which whosoever believeth shall not be confounded, world without end. He knew it to be the only effectual mean of securing the attainment of personal holiness, both by the moral perfections which it exemplifies, and the purifying influence which it exerts. The enemies of Christ praise virtue, but the disciples of the cross practise it. And as the cross is the effectual mean of sanctification to believers, so it is the appointed instrument of conversion to sinners. Upon all these grounds Paul might well say, 'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

This was in him the language of grateful experience. He knew the value, because he had felt the efficacy of the cross. What but the influence of the cross changed the fury of the persecutor into the zeal of the preacher, and the pride of the self-righteous Pharisee into the humility of the Christian disciple? What but the power of the cross supported him under the fiery trials that befel him, and enabled him in the near prospect of martyrdom to say, 'Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge will give me at that day, and not to me only, but to all them that love his appearing.' For Paul is one only of an innumerable multitude who possess the same confidence, and taste the same consolations, and whose lips and lives express the same acknowledgments.

Mankind are naturally disposed to glory in everything save in the cross of Christ; but whilst some glory in their wealth, and some in their rank, and some in their honours, and some glory even in their shame, let our language be, 'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.'

---

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God,' 1 Peter iii. 18.

EVERY view in which the sufferings of Christ can be contemplated serves to enhance their value, and furnishes additional reason for wonder and praise. How important do they appear when viewed in connection with—

The character of the sufferer! 'It is better,' as the apostle had observed, 'that ye suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing.' And he could appeal to Christ as an illustrious example of generous and undeserved suffering. He was perfectly 'just,' yet he suffered. The Jews loaded him with accusations, and demanded his crucifixion; but his innocence shone forth even to the conviction of his enemies. The wife of Pilate proclaimed it; for she 'sent to him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with the blood of that just man.' Pilate himself bore public testimony to it; for he 'took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person.' And to the same effect the Roman centurion exclaimed, 'Certainly this was a righteous man.' We are assured by far higher authority that he did no sin, and knew no sin; that he is the Holy One and the Just, and did always 'those things that pleased the Father.' The sufferings of Christ acquire a still deeper interest when the character of the sufferer is contrasted with—

The unworthiness of those for whom he suffered. He the Just One suffered, but it was 'for the unjust;' for the guilty, who were obnoxious to his justice; for the depraved who were odious to his holiness, and averse to his service; for aliens and enemies, for the worthless and helpless, who neither deserved his favour, nor desired it; 'for the ungodly,' whom he might not only have left to perish in their sins, but whom he was called on to punish for their sins. But in order justly to estimate the sufferings of Christ, we must consider—

The gracious design for which he suffered. It was not merely that he might save us from wrath, but that he might sanctify us from sin, and 'bring us unto God.' He suffered that he might bring us to the knowledge of God, of his perfections and government, of his righteous law and redeeming love, of his abhorrence of sin and his compassion for sinners, of the way in which he might be both a just God and a Saviour. He suffered that he might bring us to the favour of God, by expiating our guilt, and procuring the blessing of a free and full remission of sin; by fulfilling the law, and working out for us a complete and everlasting righteousness. He suffered that he might bring us to the likeness of God, by providing a channel through which the influences of the Spirit are sent forth into the hearts of his people, to renew them 'after the image of Him that created them in righteousness and true holiness.' He suffered that he might bring us to the enjoyment of God on earth, by taking away sin which had set up a barrier between God and us; by thus opening up a way of access to God, and laying a foundation of acceptance with him, on the footing of which we may come boldly to the throne of grace for mercy to pardon, and grace to help us in every time of need. And he suffered that he might bring us to the presence of God in heaven. The kingdom which he received for himself, is at the same time the inheritance which he purchased for his people. At his ascension he took possession of it in their name, and on their behalf. He is now, by his word and Spirit, preparing them for it, and conducting them to it; and as the completing act of his mediatorial administration he will introduce them into the personal possession of it by presenting them before the presence of his Father's glory 'faultless and blameless with exceeding joy.'

Those for whom Christ suffered needed to be brought nigh to God. They are by nature the children of wrath even as others; they are far from God, and ready to perish. But they 'who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.' And having thus been brought nigh they ought to live near to God, cherishing a humble and contrite sense of their natural alienation and estrangement from him, and a grateful and affectionate sense of their restoration to his friendship, cultivating the feelings which are suited to the relation which they bear to him, and acting habitually under the impression that they are no longer 'strangers or foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God.'

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice,' Psal. l. 5.

It is well known that, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, and the most fearful judgments were executed upon the unbelieving Jews, those who had believed in Jesus Christ were miraculously preserved. And to this historical fact there seems to be a reference here, in the spirit of prophecy, for the announcement comes from Jehovah in the midst of threatened vengeance. 'Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.'

But there is a more awful judgment than that of Jerusalem intended here. It was typical of the final judgment of the world. And blessed be God, he who preserved the Christians in the siege of the ancient city, so that not a hair of their heads was injured, will deliver his people in the day of final retribution, with a far more glorious deliverance,—fulfilling again the gracious promise of Christ, and far more illustriously than before. 'He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.' Nor will he be satisfied with their deliverance merely, for he will exalt them to be sharers of his own glory; as it is written, 'the saints shall judge the world,—yea, they shall judge angels.'

But who are they that shall thus be delivered and honoured? What is their present character?

What are their attainments? The answer is clear and full,—'the saints of God, who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice.'

'The saints!' The title is borrowed from the sanctuary of old, and it means to be set apart, or separated, implying, that as the sanctuary was set apart for the service of God, so his believing people are separated from the ungodly, and devoted to his worship and fear. Did God dwell in the sanctuary? They are the temples of the Holy Ghost. Were all the ordinances of the sanctuary expressive of purity? They are pure in heart. Was holiness the law of the house? They are enjoined, 'be ye holy, in all manner of conversation.' With what propriety then are they termed saints? And is it not reason of surprise and humiliation that the term is used in the world as a reproach; and that there are many who shrink from bearing the appellation as though the deepest dishonour attached to it? Let it be our highest ambition to be reckoned among the saints of God, for they truly are the excellent of the earth.

As saints they are in covenant with God. This is the bond of connection between Jehovah and his people. His address to men is, 'hear and your souls shall live, and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.' According to this covenant he becomes their God and they his people,—He engaging to provide for all their wants, and they unreservedly yielding up themselves to him. It engages pardon and acceptance and purity and peace, all spiritual blessings here and hereafter, with a right to a competent portion of the good things of this life, so far as they may be necessary and conducive to the real interests of his people. And the relation of God to them is expressed in this form of covenant for their encouragement and comfort: as it is written, 'God willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us.' Let the sinner enter into this covenant, and he will find it the ark of safety, the city of refuge, the hiding-place from the storm of life and death and judgment. At the same time it implies a hearty and universal surrender to God. He receives us into favour, and we give him our hearts. He provides for our necessities, and we yield him our services. He pledges to us his love, and we lay ourselves, all we are, and have, upon his altar. He avouches us to be his people, and we avouch him to be our God.

And how can a pure and holy God thus treat with sinners, such as we are? This covenant is made with him 'by sacrifice.' It was made in eternity, not with the sinner, but with the Saviour, in the sinner's room. This is the testimony of the divine word, 'I have made a covenant with my chosen,—I have given him for a covenant unto the people.' Jehovah treats with sinners through the mediation of his Son, nor could his purity allow him to do so otherwise. The covenant secured all the blessings the sinner needs, but it was on the condition of the death of its surety. Sinners are taken into covenant with God 'through the blood of the everlasting covenant.' They come to Jesus, are united to him by faith, obtain an interest in his death, are then entitled to plead what he has done and suffered, and so enter into covenant with God by sacrifice, even through the merits and mediation of the sacrifice which Christ presented, when he gave his soul an offering for sin, and bare our sins in his own body on the tree. In no other way can the sinner come to God or enjoy his favour. 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me.' But coming thus he is welcome. When the blood was seen on the houses of Israel in Egypt they were passed by and left in safety by the destroying angel; and when the blood of the covenant is seen upon the sinner God accepts him, and owns him for a son. On the ground of that sacrifice he may ask and receive till his joy be full, God will withhold no good thing from him. And he may continually say, 'having therefore boldness to enter into the holiest of all, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh, and having an High Priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith.' Thus, coming to God through a covenant, sealed by the sacrifice of his Son, we need not fear even to stand before him in the judgment.

Meantime, in the solemn anticipation of that judgment, let us see that we live as those who have entered into covenant with God by sacrifice. In the prospect of being gathered in judgment, let us now gather together in the name of our great High Priest. There are many assemblies where we ought not to be found,—not with the ungodly in their pursuit of earthly pleasures and sensual gratifications, not at the race-course, the theatre, or the ball-room. Let us gather together at the family altar, knowing God will pour out his fury upon the families that call not on his name; in exercises of social prayer, knowing that if two shall agree upon earth, touching any thing they shall ask, it shall be done unto them; in the sanctuary, for God loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob; at the sacramental table, seeing Christ hath said 'do this in remembrance of me.' Acting and living thus, then may we trust there is evidence that when God shall pour out the vials of his wrath upon the ungodly, we shall be included in the number of his people, of whom he shall say, 'Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.'

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee,' Psal. lxxiii. 25.

THERE are many temptations, in the present aspect of the world, to doubt and distrust the providence of God; and on many occasions the mind of David appears to have been greatly harassed by them. He says, ver. 2, 3, 'my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.' Still worse, he was tempted to express himself, ver. 13, 14, 'I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency; for all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning.' But he was delivered from these vain and sinful thoughts. He informs us how this was, ver. 17, 'I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end.' Looking at the events of time, as there shown in the light of eternity, he exclaimed, ver. 19, 'how are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are consumed with terrors.' Humbled for his distrustful suspicions, he cried out, 'My heart was grieved, so foolish was I and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee.' He counted his own conduct highly irrational, and recovering the right exercise of his mind, he lifted up his soul to God, and said, 'Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee.'

These are the words of truth and soberness; and whatever may be the outward aspect of affairs, the more the exclamation of the psalmist is considered and tried, so will it be found to be wise and reasonable.

'Whom have I in heaven but thee?' We know of two glorious orders of beings in heaven besides Jehovah, glorified saints and holy angels. But what are these compared with God? They may be admired, and in some respects imitated, and their fellowship earnestly desired; but they cannot be sought unto in prayer, nor confided in to bless us, nor approached with the honour of worship. There is a disposition in the human mind to exalt them beyond their true condition, but this is condemned in the scriptures as superstitious and idolatrous. In the book of the Revelation, xxii. 8, 9, we read, 'When I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things. Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant; worship God.' Jehovah will not give his glory to another. Let us beware, that however we may admire the glorified inhabitants of heaven, we do not trust in them nor adore.

But whatever temptation may arise from this source, it is more difficult to say, 'There is none upon earth that I desire besides thee.' Our great attractions are to the earth and earthly things. And yet how vain are they all!

Riches! They are uncertain, and make to themselves wings and fly away. They are unsatisfying, mere husks, that cannot be food for a rational and immortal mind. They are perplexing, often more difficult to keep than obtain, to use than earn. 'If riches increase, set not thy heart upon them.' 'Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven.'

Pleasures! They are commonly the seeds of pain. Hear one who tried all their rounds, and bore faithful testimony to their insufficiency: 'I gave myself unto wine, I made me great works, I got me servants and maidens, I gathered me also silver and gold; whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.'

Ambition! A mere bubble! A phantom that may amuse for a moment, but beguiles and leaves to the bitterness of disappointment. Remember the history of the great king Nebuchadnezzar. 'He spake, and said, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken. The kingdom is departed from thee. They shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men.' 'Those that walk in pride, he is able to abase.'

The creature! We may love him, but not supremely. We may enjoy him, provided only we enjoy God in him. Apart from God he will be a snare. If put in the room of God, he will be a disappointment. Let us prize him as the gift of God, employ him as the servant of God, use him for the glory of God; but remember his and our dependence upon God, and be ready to part with him at the command of God. 'Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?'

The wise man raises his thoughts above the earth. God is his chosen portion. How satisfying and secure! He is reconciled to God in Christ Jesus, and loves, and serves, and honours, and enjoys him as a Father. The divine perfections are his security; unerring wisdom his counsellor; almighty power his support; unchanging faithfulness his refuge; unbounded love his consolation; inflexible justice his defence. 'The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it and is safe.' 'O taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed is the man that trusteth in him.' 'They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing.' O that we may ever breathe the spirit of David, saying with our whole heart,—

'Whom have I in the heavens high
But thee, O Lord, alone!
And on the earth whom I desire
Besides thee there is none.'

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Without shedding of blood is no remission,' Heb. ix. 22.

If any one will turn to a concordance, and search for the term blood, he will find it is used with so much frequency in the scriptures as at once to suggest the idea of great importance being attached to it. Nor is it the mere frequency of the term that is remarkable so much as the use of the blood itself, in connection with the doctrines intended to be taught, and the ends to be answered by it. Throughout the whole of the Old Testament scriptures, under all dispensations of religion, it has the greatest prominence given to it. If Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain, one feature of difference between their offerings was the shedding of blood. When Abraham was taken into covenant with God it was sealed by blood. And for its use under the Mosaic economy see the preceding context, from which the passage under meditation is an inference, and in every verse of which the term occurs, ver. 18—22. 'Neither the first Testament was dedicated without blood. Moses took the blood of calves and goats and sprinkled the book and all the people—this is the blood of the Testament—he sprinkled with blood the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry—and almost all things are by the law purged with blood. When it is considered that this is the language of the Holy Spirit, it must be felt that it is used with wisdom and design.

So also in the gospel. Marked attention is paid to the shedding of the blood of Christ. In the agony of the garden his 'sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.' At the time of his death the blood poured freely from his hands and feet, rudely lacerated by the nails that fastened him to the cross, as well as by the injury of the thorns with which, in mockery, he was crowned. And the incident is particularly noticed that as he hung on the cross, a soldier pierced his side with a spear, so that there came thence blood and water. Does there not seem to be a design to teach that all the blood which had flowed in the body of Christ was poured out until life became completely extinct? And when he died, and ordinances were instituted to commemorate his death, these are so ordered as still to keep the shedding of his blood prominently in view. Witness the water in baptism, and wine in the supper.

But let us inquire what meaneth this? What is the mystery in the shedding of blood? The principle of interpretation is thus given in the law of Moses, 'the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul,' Lev. xvii. 11. By pouring out the blood the life was given up, and by giving up the life, in the room of another, atonement was made. Under the law this was figuratively and typically declared, and only so, for the blood of bulls and of goats could never take away sin. But under the gospel this was literally and really accomplished when Jesus Christ poured out his soul unto death, and presented it an offering for sin. The ceremonies of the law were only the shadow, while his death was the substance. And so important is this doctrine, that the entire epistle to the Hebrews was written for its elucidation.

And what was there so peculiar in the shedding of Christ's blood as to render it thus efficacious? This is explained by John saying, 'the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.' He was the Son of God. As Son he was an equal partaker of the nature and glory of the Godhead with the Father and the Spirit. Hence the efficacy of his death—its merit is infinite—enough to satisfy for the sins of an apostate world.

But why was this necessary to the remission of sin? The law of God required it—the truth of God required it—the honour of God required it—the character of God required it. 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins, that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.' Wondrous economy! God glorified while the sinner is saved! 'The law magnified while the guilty is pardoned! Heaven sounding with praises while earth is redeemed from sin.

For in the one appointment of the shedding of blood a provision is made to meet the evil of sin in all its bearings. Here is pardon, and peace, and purity, and redemption. The blood of Christ is alike a title to heaven, and a motive to holiness. 'There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ.' And upon all such is it enjoined, 'ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and spirit, which are his.'

Am I in Christ? Does the holiness of my life evidence the reality of my faith? O! my soul, the blood of Christ now speaketh peace. Let it be sprinkled on the conscience by the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to apply it to the sinner. But it may be disregarded, and neither its necessity nor worth may be known, and if so, the day cometh when it shall cry for vengeance, worse than that of Abel—when the charge shall be, 'guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.' And then shall the punishment be that of him 'who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace.'

'Behold the Saviour on the cross, a spectacle of woe!
See from his agonizing wounds
the blood incessant flow;
Till death's pale ensigns o'er his cheek and trembling lips were spread;
Till light forsook his closing eyes, and life his drooping head!

'Tis finish'd—was his latest voice;
these sacred accents o'er,
He bowed his head, gave up the ghost, and suffer'd pain no more.
'Tis finish'd—The Messiah dies
for sins, but not his own;
The great redemption is complete,
and Satan's pow'r o'erthrown.

'Tis finish'd—All his groans are past;
his blood his pains, and toils,
Have fully vanquished our foes,
and crown'd him with their spoils.
'Tis finish'd—Legal worship ends,
and gospel ages run;
All old things now are past away,
and a new world begun.'

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you,' Ezek. xxxvi. 25.

THIS promise is addressed to the Jews, and contains an assurance of their final restoration to the favour and service of God, as is manifest from the context, 'Ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God,' ver. 28. 'Then the heathen, that are left round about you, shall know that I the Lord build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate; I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it,' ver. 36.

Viewed in this application, the promise is singularly rich and precious. For how great is the guilt of Israel! Yet shall it be removed. How deep their depravity! Yet shall it be healed. How invertebrate their sinfulness! Yet shall it be overcome. They crucified the Lord of glory, and cried out, 'His blood be upon us, and upon our children;' for eighteen hundred years they have continued to 'trample under foot the blood of the Son of God;' and by an obstinate perseverance in iniquity they have done despite to the Spirit of his grace. Yet is there mercy in store for them. The blood which they shed shall be applied to them for cleansing. This is the clean water spoken of in the promise. It can, and will make even guilty Israel clean. 'There shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.'

What exalted views does such a promise give us of the redeeming power and love of God! It is, indeed, a satisfying evidence of the precious doctrine of the apostle Paul, 'Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.'

And does it not encourage and require us diligently to seek the recovery of Israel? God has thoughts of mercy towards them, and we should labour to see them blessed with his favour. O for more of the prophet's spirit in the Christian church, breathing its anxieties for the ancient people of God in his words, 'For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.'

But it is not Israel only that is concerned in such a promise as this. The dealings of God towards them are illustrative of his dealings towards us. They are a living exemplification of the depth of the divine love, and the power of divine grace. Hence Christians are addressed, 'Ye are come to mount Zion, and the city of the living God'—to all the promises and privileges of ancient Israel. The clean water of Calvary has healing virtue for the souls of men in all ages and countries. And the rich promise upon which we dwell may be pleaded wherever there is guilt to pardon, or impurity to cleanse, or ungodliness to change. The address is to sinners, 'ye shall be clean.' And O how various and valuable the blessings which it contains.

It is a promise of pardon. 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin.' 'In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins.' There is no amount of crime beyond the reach of pardon. In this respect well might Jehovah say by the prophet, 'My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.' He pardoned Saul of Tarsus and Mary Magdalene. There may be defilement which water cannot cleanse, but there is no guilt which the blood of Christ cannot remove.

It is a promise of purity. And hence is it accompanied with this explanation, 'A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh.' The blood of Christ is the 'laver of regeneration,' in which the soul is washed, and in which, while its guilt is removed, its nature is changed. However hardened in sin before, it becomes tenderly alive to the claims of God and the obligations of his service. Its views, and dispositions, and purposes undergo a complete revolution. It may truly be said, 'If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold all things are become new.'

It is a promise of external holiness, as well as inward purity. For it is added, 'I will cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them.' When sin is pardoned, it is not that it may be contracted afresh. On the contrary, a powerful motive arises hence to avoid it in future. A sense of pardoning mercy is a mighty sanctifying principle. And when the heart is renewed, this is the qualification for a godly life. Till then the inclination is wanted; but as soon as this is done, holiness becomes the delight of the soul. As Jesus is loved, so is he imitated and obeyed. The more his work is considered, the more powerful its influence in determining to walk after his precepts. The very habit of the Christian is 'always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in his body.' He feels the force of the poet's sentiment—

'Talk they of morals! O thou bleeding Lamb!
The grand morality is love to thee.'

But let us not omit to notice that it is a promise upon which we have been meditating. A promise! Therefore we must come to God by prayer, and plead it with him. His language is, 'I will for this be enquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them.' A promise! Therefore we must receive the blessing gratuitously. We cannot purchase it. While we dream of a price, we hinder our reception of it. We are to ask and receive. It is the office of the Holy Spirit to apply the blood of Christ to the conscience, and this is the exhortation of Jesus, 'If your fathers, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto their children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?'

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'That will by no means clear the guilty,' Exod. xxxiv. 7.

'By no means!' The phrase is intended to be a strong expression of that which is affirmed. But the expression is not stronger than the reality. God cannot—will not—on no account—'by no means clear the guilty.'

His nature forbids it. They who know him must join with the prophet in saying, 'thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity.' How hateful sin is to a good man when he turns his eyes from the sight of it, loathing it in his very soul, and feeling towards it only hatred and disgust. But feeble are the emotions of the purest hearts when compared with the displeasure of a pure and holy God. 'Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee. The foolish shall not stand in thy sight; thou hatest all workers of iniquity. Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing; the Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man.'

The law of God forbids it. This law is correctly and beautifully described by the apostle Paul to be 'holy, and just, and good.' Holy! distinguishing in every instance between right and wrong, good and evil. Just! determining the claims and duties of all intelligent creatures. And good! securing the best interests of all who obey it. Now to this law are all subject, at all times, and in all things. None can escape from its observation, or evade its requirements. Nor can it relax its demands, nor forego its obligations. Wherever sin is found, the law detects and condemns it. It is the guardian of Jehovah's character, while it is the expression of his will. Nothing, therefore, can it tolerate that is contrary to the nature and the will of God.

And how illustrative of both the nature and the law of God have all his dealings towards mankind been. His law was published with a solemn sanction, 'in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.' And since it has been violated, the history of guilty man has been a record of 'weeping, and lamentation, and woe.' 'By the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation.' One sin involved a world in ruin. And as in this sinful world iniquity has abounded, so have the divine judgments been poured out. These have sometimes been general, as when the waters of the deluge swept away, in one awful destruction, the guilty inhabitants of the earth. At other times they have been more special, as when, provoked by special transgression, God destroyed the cities of the plain with fire and brimstone. And still are they manifest in the individual history of sinners, who have been plainly warned, 'be sure your sin will find you out,' and who have usually found, sooner or later, that verily there is a God who judgeth in the earth. To all which must be added the day of righteous retribution, when God will lay judgment to the line and righteousness to the plummet, and detect, and expose, and punish the guilty.

Nor will the mercy of God extinguish the attribute of his justice. Let us particularly observe the connection in which we find the subject of our meditation. 'The Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty.' The highest expression of mercy is joined with the strongest assertion of justice. And these are obviously brought together for the sake of warning and instruction. Let us carefully weigh the truths which are thus presented for our consideration.

We learn that while God delighteth in mercy he will yet maintain the claims of his justice. In the gospel, which is the brightest display of love, we have the most awful expression of justice. The very same act, even the gift of his Son, proclaims at the same time both these attributes. 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son;' yet 'it became him to make the Captain of our salvation perfect through suffering.' This way of salvation was chosen, because it was the only one by which the divine attributes could be harmonized in the redemption of sinners. 'God hath set him forth to be a propitiation though faith in his blood; that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.'

We learn that notwithstanding the mercy of God and the gracious provision which it has made for sinners, they who continue in sin shall not escape the righteous judgments of God. Such as have fled to Christ are looked upon in him. God is well-pleased with them for his sake, and he can and does justify them freely through him. But they who have not been united with him, and must therefore be treated upon the ground of their own worthiness, cannot stand before him when he ariseth to judge terribly the earth. For as his nature is still opposed to sin, and his law still condemnatory of it, the transgressor cannot escape either his cognizance or his wrath. As the provision of the gospel has not been embraced by him, 'the wrath of God abideth on him.'

We learn that the mercy of the gospel aggravates the guilt of the sinner. After describing its provisions, the apostle Paul exclaims, 'how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' Unbelief is a sin of the greatest magnitude. The fullness, the freeness, and the grace of the gospel, are its high aggravations. The unbeliever makes Jesus, the Friend, the Saviour of sinners, his enemy. He has rejected the proffers of his love, and he shall meet the terrors of his displeasure. And it becomes him to ponder well the question, 'Who may abide the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appeareth?'

Finally, we learn that God will visit for sin, even in his own people. In them, indeed, it is specially hateful to him. It is said with great emphasis, 'Our God is a consuming fire.' The God of the believer is a consuming fire to him, for he will not suffer sin upon him, but will burn it up with the breath of his judgment. How heavy was his hand upon ancient Israel when they disobeyed him! And his judgments upon them were heavy because they were dear to him. And what is still more to the point, he visits not merely his professing people, but those who are really his, when they sin against him. This is among the promises he has given them, 'I will visit your iniquity with stripes.' And has he not ever done so? How has he exposed and humbled his erring servants! The sin of Abraham, when he deceived Abimelech, was detected, and is recorded to his shame. David sought to cover his sin, but God made both it and its punishment public. An ungodly man may be allowed to conceal his crime, for it will be punished hereafter; but God will not permit his own servants to escape. Let us learn to be watchful. God is jealous of the holiness of his people. And may we never forget what may be interpreted either as a warning or a promise, 'he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness.'

---

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all,' Isa. liii. 6.

In this passage the prophet states comprehensively the doctrine of our Lord's atonement, setting forth in few and simple words its origin, and nature, and extent. Let us follow him in the views which he has so well expressed. And may their contemplation warm our cold hearts!

1. What took place is ascribed to the Lord. He it was who laid the iniquity of sinners upon Christ. The wonderful scheme originated with God himself, nor could it have been conceived by any finite mind. In the wonderful person and the atoning work of his own Son, he saw how pardon might be dispensed to the guilty consistently with justice; how the law might be magnified, while the transgressor was acquitted; how God might be glorified, and the sinner saved. What divine wisdom devised, his unbounded love consented should be done. 'God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but might have everlasting life.' He gave his Son—his only-begotten Son—to death—to the most cruel, cursed, and ignominious death—for men, for sinners, for enemies, for their sin, their salvation, their redemption. 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins.' But justice was not meanwhile relaxed. When the Son of God took the place of sinners, the hand of his Father was heavy upon him. The commission went forth, 'Awake, O sword, against the Shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow; smite the Shepherd.' On the cross he was constrained to utter the distressing cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' He endured the wrath of his heavenly Father.

Thus conspicuous was the hand of God in the whole scheme, originating, executing, and consummating it. O! how they misrepresent our views who think we make Jehovah a hard master, requiring to be pacified towards his sinful creatures by a sacrifice that should satisfy his justice. True, his holiness and truth required that an atonement should be made for sin, in order that it might be pardoned; but let us not forget that the atonement he required was by himself provided, that in the depth of his counsels, and the infinity of his love, he found the remedy, and proclaimed, 'Deliver from going down to the pit, for I have found a ransom.' We find the origin of the scheme for man's deliverance in the doctrine of the psalmist, 'The Lord is full of compassion;' or in the same truth, more strongly expressed, by the apostle John, 'God is love.'

2. But let us clearly understand what it was Jehovah did for sinners. 'He laid our iniquity upon him.' Words could not more clearly express the idea of substitution. In the most literal sense, our iniquity was laid upon Christ. This was required by the nature of the case, for sin must be punished in the nature in which it was committed; and as Christ took our nature to qualify him to stand in our place, he took also our sin that he might suffer in our room. In this doctrine alone do we find the meaning of the Mosaic ceremonies. To instance one out of many, let us remember the design of the scape-goat on the solemn anniversary of expiation, as described by the pen and authority of inspiration, 'Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions, and all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness.' Perhaps it would not be possible, in any other arrangement, more completely to exhibit the doctrine of substitution. Nor is it less manifest in the personal history of Christ himself. He was sinless; yet was there no sorrow like unto his sorrow. He said, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;' language which could arise only from the pressure of suffering under sin. We may, and must acquiesce in the plain testimony of the apostle Paul, 'God hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him;' not a sin-offering merely, as some would have it, but sin, inasmuch as our sin was reckoned to be his, and he was treated as though it were his own. This is the plain doctrine of the scriptures; simple and satisfactory, the Son of God in our nature, taking our sin, bearing its punishment, and bearing it away to the land of forgetfulness. What a provision! Meeting all the necessities of the case, as respects the honour of God, the character of his law, and the safety of sinners.

3. And for whom did the Lord make such a provision? We are told, 'He laid upon him the iniquity of us all.' The expression is certainly designed to declare the infinite efficacy of the atonement. In the death of Christ there is merit enough to satisfy for the remission of sins unto millions of apostate worlds. Are we then to infer that all the iniquity of all men was literally laid upon Christ? This cannot be, else none would suffer for sin, for Christ's death has availed to atone for all the iniquity laid upon him. Are we taught, then, that only some iniquity of every sinner was laid upon him? This cannot be admitted, for then none would be saved, as against every one some iniquity would lie. We are shut up to one interpretation—the Lord laid upon him the iniquity of all whom he represented, of all whom the Father gave unto him, of all who should be united to him, of all who would believe upon him. And thus interpreted, this mode of expression is worthy of the Spirit by whom it is employed. It is so universal as to hold out a warrant to all who will, that they may come and trust in him. Yet is it so limited as to remind us, that except we believe in him we cannot be saved. Let us then consider ourselves addressed in the solemn, searching question of our Lord, to the blind man whom he had healed, 'Dost thou believe upon the Son of God?' And may we be enabled to reply, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief.'

MARCH.

FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'Christ our passover is sacrificed for us,' 1 Cor. v. 7.

WERE an inspired teacher to go through the Old Testament in a series of comments upon it, there can be little doubt that he would find and preach Christ in every part of it, and that he would discover types of his person and work where, did an uninspired interpreter find them, he would expose himself to the charge of following his own fancies. Who, for example, would have seen a type of our Lord's death in the elevation of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, or of his lying in the grave, in the history of Jonah, had not our Lord himself condescended to notice it! True, the interpreter of scripture must beware that he do not yield to his imaginations, where he has not an inspired guide to lead him. But the necessity of this caution arises only from his incompetency. And we are well persuaded, that when the light of the upper world bursts upon our view, and when in it we contemplate the ancient law in its ceremonies and institutions, it will be found to reflect the glory of Christ in a much fuller degree than we ever saw it before, that it will be seen to exhibit his person and work in places where these did not formerly appear to us; in short, that in the law, as in every thing else, Christ is all. He is the treasure hid in the word of God, and it is only when we find him there that our search for it has been successful.

But our attention is now confined to a single type or illustration, the ancient passover. And how striking the form of expression used to point out its reference to Christ. He is called our Passover, intimating that the substance of the ceremony was Jesus Christ,—that whatever other purposes it may have served, it was designed mainly to be typical of him, and illustrative of his person, and history, and work. Hence, the mind of the apostle naturally passes away from the ancient ceremony to the great feast of the gospel, in which Christ is manifestly set forth crucified among us. And both are represented as having all their meaning and design in setting forth his truth and glory. They are two spectators, gazing upon the same object; two witnesses, testifying to the same person; two columns, bearing like inscriptions; two signs, pointing the same way.

Let us then for a little, contemplate the passover as illustrative of Christian doctrine.

1. And who will not here think of the paschal lamb? It must be chosen from the flock with care,—the best of its kind,—free from every blemish,—and in due time sacrificed and eaten. We have not been left to conjecture in finding here an emblem of Jesus Christ. Even the apparently trivial command, 'neither shall ye break a bone thereof,' is afterwards quoted in the history of Christ, as having been designed to have reference to him, and a whole train of circumstances is put into order and motion to bring about the intended allusion. 'These things were done,' saith the historian, 'that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken.' We would not have seen this meaning had it not been pointed out. And O! how fitting is the type. Jesus is indeed well set before us as 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.' The emblem is tenderly illustrative of his character, and history, and work, and well expresses his innocence, and patience, and sacrifice. Particularly does it exhibit him as the satisfying food of the believer's soul, and in this point the lines of the Jewish and the Christian passover meet, and both proclaim that the slain Lamb is the sacrifice to be eaten.

2. Equally clear and united is their testimony to the great blessing that has been obtained by the sacrifice which has been offered. They both commemorate deliverance. Of the one we are told, 'it is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses.' That was a great deliverance. They cried by reason of their taskmasters, and God heard them and rescued them from bondage. But even that deliverance was only typical of a better. How largely is the language descriptive of it employed to set forth the higher deliverance of the soul from the dominion of sin and satan! Often do the prophets commence with the one theme, and then rise to the other, elevating our minds from things temporal to those that are spiritual, and teaching us to see in the former the greater blessings of the latter.

3. The very manner of deliverance is strikingly in unison, under both dispensations. The last and awful judgment upon Egypt was the death of the first-born. 'There was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house where there was not one dead.' And who will not think of him, by whose death it was that deliverance has been obtained for guilty men? The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin, because he is the Son of God. He is the only begotten of the Father, his first-born, and therefore did his sacrifice avail to procure the freedom of his people.

4. The very sign employed in the time of Israel's deliverance is full of meaning and instruction. 'Ye shall take a bunch of hyssop and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel and the two side-posts with blood.' This was the sign to the destroying angel to pass by and leave the inhabitants within unhurt. And it is by the sprinkling of blood the sinner must now be preserved from the destroyer. The mark of Christ's blood forbids his entrance upon the security and peace of the believer.

5. Nor let us omit to notice in what manner the passover must be eaten. 'Thus shall ye eat it, with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; ye shall eat it in haste.' Emblem of the believer's condition upon earth! He is a pilgrim and a stranger here. Earth is only a lodge, heaven is his home, and he must maintain the spirit of one who is travelling to Zion.

6. In the passover they must use unleavened bread, with bitter herbs. And the meaning here is plain. Bitterness of soul, in exercises of deep humiliation, is well becoming in him who commemorates the death of Jesus as the sacrifice for his sins. While towards others there must be the suppression of evil passion, and no leaven of iniquity allowed to disturb the soul, well is it enjoined by the apostle, 'let us keep the feast, not with old leaven; neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.' And this agrees to our Lord's own lesson, 'if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift, first go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.'

---

FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'And declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead,' Rom. i. 4.

How many and how weighty are the themes of meditation here. The passage bears the ordinary mark of the word of God, clothed in the simplest language, yet containing the profoundest sentiments, truly 'apples of gold in pictures of silver.' The Son of God—declared to be the Son of God—with power—according to the Spirit of holiness—by the resurrection from the dead. Help us, O Spirit of truth, to apprehend and receive these gracious announcements.

'The Son of God.' A title which belongs exclusively to Jesus Christ. True, Adam is called the son of God, so are angels, and even sinful men; but not in the sense in which Christ is so called. He is the only Son of God, in the sense of being a partaker of his nature, and an equal sharer of his glory. The phrase is habitually so employed in the scriptures, and was understood in this highest acceptation by the Jews. For when Christ called himself by the name of the Son of God, they charged him with blasphemy, alleged that he thus made himself equal with God, and proceeded to inflict the punishment of the law for blasphemy, even to stone him to death. In this name let us receive and adore him for—

'He has been declared to be the Son of God.' Declared! The term is well chosen, and is fraught with meaning and deep allusions. By the resurrection he has been declared, not made, to be the Son of God, as some would teach. And this peculiar style of language accords with what we observe in another place, where the angel, announcing the miraculous conception and birth of Christ, says, 'that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God'—called, not made the Son of God at that time, nor by that means. In all such passages the allusion is to the eternal generation of the Son of God. As Son he is eternal. And it is only upon this principle we can interpret many portions of the word of God. It is written, 'God gave his only begotten Son.' Then he must have been the Son of God when the Father gave him, and this was from eternity. How blessed is our privilege to have such a Saviour, one whom we call the Son of God, and with whose name we associate the honours of the Godhead. And for what purpose is he thus announced? Glorious reply!

He is declared to be the Son of God 'with power.' As Son of God he is proclaimed to be Mediator, and as Mediator all power is given to him in heaven and in earth. As Son all power belongs to him essentially, but as Mediator all power is delegated to him for the salvation of his people. How often are these two thoughts brought together in the scriptures, the sufficiency of Christ, and the security of his people. 'It pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell—and by him to reconcile all things to himself.' 'In him dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily—and ye are complete in him which is the Head of all principality and power.' His glorious title now is, 'Head over all things to the church.' Not over the church merely, but over all things for the church's benefit. Over the material world—all its elements which he employs as he will. Over all mankind—influencing them according to his pleasure. Over the devils—for they are all subject to his control. Over angels—for he is at the right hand of God, angels, and principalities, and powers being subject unto him. His power is unlimited, sovereign, and absolute. So testifies the great Being whose office it is to bear witness unto Christ. For we read—

He is declared to be the Son of God with power, 'according to the Spirit of holiness.' Such testimony is borne to him by the Holy Spirit according to his office and custom. For he has always been engaged in so witnessing to Christ. It was he who dwelt in the ancient prophets, and instructed them in the knowledge of the coming Saviour. Their predictions are his testimonies. He met him when he appeared in the flesh, and publicly announced him to Israel, visibly descending on him as a dove, while the Father declared him to be his beloved Son. He attended him in all his ministry, in which we see the accomplishment of ancient prophecy, enabling him in his humanity to utter predictions, work miracles, and sustain the burthen of his ministry. Hence, saith Christ, 'the Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me.' He continued with him in his sore conflicts, his bloody sweat, and his bitter death, ever sustaining his own character as the Spirit of holiness, and recommending Jesus as the Saviour of men. But the best and surest evidence which he gave was subsequent to his death. He was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness—

'By the resurrection from the dead.' And as that was the grand proof, how clearly has the Spirit caused it to be substantiated. The evidence is irresistible. The witnesses were numerous—they were intelligent—they were honest—they endured hardship for the truth—they suffered death for their testimony, and could not be induced to conceal the fact of the resurrection of which they were witnesses. They who denied it were obliged to forge the most absurd stories in order to evade the force of evidence. And the Christian sabbath, then established, and designed to commemorate the event, has come down to our time, an imperishable monument, bearing upon it, indelibly engraven by the finger of history, the fact of Christ's resurrection.

In this fact of the resurrection we are furnished with the proof that the work of Christ is complete and accepted with the Father. He said on the cross, 'It is finished,' and he proved his saying true when he rose from the dead. Now, therefore, may we come to him with confidence for the ends of his mission. 'He is exalted a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins.'

We too shall be raised from the grave in virtue of his resurrection. 'The hour is coming, when all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation.' Gracious God! enable us to embrace Jesus as our Saviour now, that we may meet him at last with joy as our Judge. May we be found in him now by faith, and at length be partakers of his glory!

SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins,' 1 John iv. 10.

Love is not strictly an attribute of God, it is more correct to say that the nature of God is love. Hence when the apostle, who speaks most of love, exhausts his thoughts upon it, he relieves himself, and sums up the whole subject, saying, 'God is love.' How then shall we meditate upon the love of God? 'Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven, what canst thou know? Deeper than hell, what canst thou do? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.' The apostle Paul discovers the same incapacity to grasp the theme of divine love. His prayer for the Ephesians is that they may be 'enabled, with all saints, to comprehend what is the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of the love of God,' adding, 'which passeth knowledge.' And so in the passage before us the form of expression is very peculiar, 'Herein is love.' Herein, as though in nothing else it could be found. And, comparatively speaking, this is true, for there is no love like the love of God. It is like himself, and the vast, incomprehensible character of this love will soon be felt by us, while we endeavour to catch some of its features.

1. It is eternal. How deep the thoughts, how elevated the conceptions of the apostle Paul when, meditating on the love of God, as exercised towards man in eternity, he exclaims, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love!' Here is love in all its condescension, entering into the case of man, long before he had existence; love in all its ingenuity, providing against his condition as a sinner. What importance this view attaches to the expression of Jehovah's love. It made sure the redemption of his people before they became men or sinners. The whole plan was laid and fixed in eternity.

2. As the love of God is eternal in its origin, so is it immutable in its nature. This is only what should be expected as a natural and necessary consequence. For if God set his love in eternity upon his people, it is not to be expected that he would suffer its great design to be frustrated by the accidents of time. His love is occupied in time carrying out and consummating the plans it formed in eternity. Those whom he then chose, he now effectually calls. And having called them in his sovereign pleasure, he keeps them by his almighty grace. It is thus we are to account for their still abiding the objects of his love, notwithstanding their provocations and unworthiness. 'I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.' 'Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.' 'Saints are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.' But let us not abuse this feature of the divine love. In eternity it chose its objects that they might be holy, and its immutability maintains and confirms their holiness. If the love of God changes not, that is not merely an argument why our love should not change, but it is a security that it shall not change. And our Lord makes our perseverance an essential mark of our discipleship, saying, 'If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed.'

3. In the exercise of this eternal and immutable love, God 'sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.' His Son was chosen; for no other being was competent to the work, and the Father freely gave him up. He came as the messenger of the Father's love; and to carry out the purposes of his grace he assumed our nature, stood as our surety, bare our sin, and expiated its guilt. By this mediation he became a propitiation, reconciling his people to their offended God. He provided that the sentence of death should be reversed under which they lay; that their souls should be quickened and made alive unto God; that they should have opened before them the prospect of eternal life; and that, finally, they should be possessors of 'an inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.' Surely herein is love! Well may we acquiesce in the emphatic language of our Lord, 'God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but might have everlasting life.'

4. And for whom did God thus signify his love? For sinners. And how is it enhanced by this consideration! Hear how an inspired apostle regards it, 'When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly.' 'God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' Helpless, ungodly, sinful—these were the features of that creature upon whom God set his love. Not only was there nothing to attract, but everything to repulse. How loathsome to a renewed mind is the conduct of the ungodly; and how distressing to be obliged to hold communion with them. And if this be the case with believers, who are still men encompassed with infirmity, and bearing about a body of sin and death, how must it be with that pure and holy God who cannot behold evil nor look upon iniquity. This truly is the mystery of mysteries, the love of God for sinners.

O that this love may be shed abroad in our hearts, and that we may live continually under its constraining and sanctifying power!

SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'We love him, because he first loved us,' 1 John iv. 19.

THE great secret of the gospel, in its influence upon the sinner, consists in its use of the principle of love. God is there manifested to the soul in the exercise of love, and that discovery produces love. The apostle Paul, proceeding upon this principle, thus states the great burthen of his ministry, 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them;' and then on the ground of this revelation, addresses himself to sinners, saying, 'we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.' So close is the connection between a right apprehension of the love of God towards us, and the exercise of our love towards him, that it is laid down as a universal principle, 'we love him, because he first loved us.'

It is not inconsistent with the gospel to love God on account of the benefits which he has conferred upon us. True, we ought to love him for his own excellence, independent of his kindness to us. But we are not forbidden to be influenced by a sense of our obligations to him. Gratitude is a principle natural to man, and ought to be cherished by lively exercises. Where it is wanted we expect nothing that is good. The gospel is both designed and calculated to call it forth, and the blessings which it confers highly aggravate the guilt of ingratitude. If we do not love God for what he hath done in Christ, we can have no evidence of the enjoyment of his favour. Our love to him is an indispensable token of our participation in his love to us.

Let us then entertain the question of our Lord to Peter, 'Lovest thou me?' and remembering the solemn emphasis by which it was thrice repeated, let us examine our love to Jesus. We put the inquiry in the form of love to Jesus, for this is substantially the same as love to God, and it seems more easy to our weak apprehension.

If then we really love Christ we ought to be conscious of the existence of this affection in us. This was never questioned by Peter, when our Lord inquired at him, but in the simplicity of an honest heart he replied, 'Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee.' It grieved him to think his love to Christ should be questioned. Nor are we at any loss to determine whether we have love toward any of our fellow-creatures. Why then should it be counted weak and fanatical to speak of our love to Jesus? We may and ought to be conscious of its existence, and its exercise, and never rest until we are so.

But if this be thought an evidence too refined and unsatisfying, let us remember that love will show itself by the marked preference which it ever gives to its object, and especially so, when that object is Christ. 'I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord.' Such was the language of Paul, and the same is the sentiment of every true Christian, placing Christ above every other object, and renouncing every thing inconsistent with his service. In the Song of Solomon the church is made to say, 'my beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand.' He has attractions for her above every other being,—causing her to think upon him with great delight, to speak of him with rapturous praise, and yield him a cheerful and devoted service.

More particularly, love is ever found ardently to desire the presence of its object. And nothing can be more natural than the exercises of the church, in this respect, as described in the Song of Songs. 'By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth. I sought him but I found him not,' earnestly desiring communion with him. 'I will rise now and go about the city; in the streets and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth; I sought him but I found him not.' Ah no, Christ was not to be found in the concourse of sinners. 'The watchmen that go about the city found me; to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?' These were the ministers of religion. 'It was but a little way that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth. I held him and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mother's house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me.' This is the enjoyment of Christ in the ordinances of the church. 'I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.' Every thing is avoided that might disturb the sweet communion of the soul with Christ.

But let us not suppose that love is merely sentimental. It is an active, moving, mighty principle, urging to deeds of noblest daring, and calling forth other affections of the soul to vigorous and sustained exertion. It animates with indomitable zeal. See the apostle Paul, and hear how he spoke and acted under its influence: 'Whether we be beside ourselves it is to God, or whether we be sober it is for your cause. For the love of Christ constraineth us.' It induces a spirit of self-denial. Many waters cannot quench love. Any thing will be borne that can secure the favour or enhance the happiness of those we love. Nor is there any principle but this that will account for the hardships and privations which the servants of Christ have borne for his sake, and not merely borne with patience, but 'rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for his name.' Love prompts to unwearied efforts in behalf of the people of Christ. A tender interest is felt in all that concerns them for his sake. 'Who-soever loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.' Our affection for the parent binds us to his children. And as we love Christ so shall we love his people, and delight to do them good. This Christ requires at our hand, and he has distinctly forewarned us that he will look for this distinguishing mark in the day of judgment, when to all his servants he will be able to say, in explanation of their kindness to him, 'inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' In short, love prompts to the universal obedience of Christ. This is his own test: 'If ye love me keep my commandments.' And the same is the rule of his beloved apostle John: 'Hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.' And again he repeats the sentiment: 'He that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him.'

By these evidences let us try our love to Christ. Let us deal faithfully with ourselves. And while we are encouraged by the apostolic blessing, 'grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity,' let us be warned by the awful sentence, 'if any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ let him be anathema, maranatha,—accursed at the coming of our Lord.'

THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life,' Rom. v. 10.

WE are accustomed to reason from the past to the future. As we have been treated, hitherto, for good or ill, so are our expectations for the time to come. Applying this principle to the dealings of God with us, the experience of his goodness may well induce our confidence in him for all we need. But especially may this rule be adopted by the believer, who, when he thinks what Christ has already done for his soul, may well confide in him for all the purposes of his future salvation. This is the principle inculcated in the passage before us. Let us follow out the views which it suggests of the blessings which the believer has already received, and of his security for the future.

It reminds us that 'we were enemies.' Enemies to God. We were such by nature. No language could be stronger than that which is employed by the apostle Paul to describe the natural enmity of the human heart to God. 'The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.' By the carnal mind is meant the disposition which we inherit according to the flesh, and which is as universal as human nature. This disposition is enmity, not merely discovering some symptoms of opposition, but radically, in its very nature and constitution, opposed to God. As for the law of God, it does not feel nor own its obligation, nor until it is completely changed by the power of God, can it do so. Its nature is sinful, and must be regenerated before it can love God or his law. What is thus asserted may be proved by the least observation. Men every where are found in a state of rebellion against God. What he teaches they are indisposed to receive, and 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God.' What he forbids they are disposed to do, and they go astray from the womb. What he requires they neglect, and say, We will not have him to rule over us. And the dispensations and appointments of his providence provoke them to murmuring and impatience, for they desire to follow their own ways. It is, therefore, not too much to declare that men are enemies to God.

Now it was when they were such that God was pleased to provide for their reconciliation to himself by the death of his Son. And on every part of this provision how clearly do we see his sovereign grace. It originated with himself, unsought by the offender. When our first parents sinned, they hid themselves from God, and came not forth to confess their sin, and seek for pardon. The promise of deliverance came wholly and freely from God himself. Its nature was as gracious as its origin. It consisted in the humiliation, and suffering, and death of his own Son. Nothing else could suffice, and even this sacrifice was not withheld. By it the recovery of the sinner was completely secured. A new and living way of access was opened up for him to the pure and holy Being whom he had offended. Pardon was rendered compatible with the law and character of God. An atonement was made for sin, and nothing stood in the way to hinder the offender's return to God, if he could only be persuaded to embrace the provision of the gospel. And even this also was secured. The Holy Spirit was a part of the Saviour's purchase. He is sent into the heart, and inclines it to receive Christ. 'By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.' Thus the whole scheme is one of sovereign mercy from first to last—its origin, its nature, its completeness, its very application. And this last not less so than any of all the rest. For however gracious the dispensation, such is the blindness and hardness of the sinner that, if left to himself, he would never submit to it. He must be constrained by the same grace that originated and completed it. And it is his consciousness of this that affects him perhaps as much as the scheme of mercy itself. For why should God deal so tenderly by him? What was there in him beyond any other sinner to induce the favour of God? He is sensible there was nothing, and he acknowledges, in the fullest sense and with heart-felt gratitude, that 'when he was an enemy he was reconciled to God by the death of his Son.'

Shall he not then trust this gracious God for the future? Will not he who has begun so good a work in him carry it to perfection? Yes; here also the provision is complete. If the believer has been reconciled to God when an enemy, by the death of his Son, 'much more being reconciled shall he be saved by his life.' The death of Christ secured his reconciliation to God, and the life of Christ is abundant security that his salvation shall be completed.

By the life of Christ we are reminded of what he is, and does, and has undertaken to accomplish as our risen and exalted Saviour. 'All power has been given unto him in heaven and in earth.' He rose the conqueror of sin and satan, he ascended leading captivity captive, he has gone to heaven the representative and advocate of his people, he pleads their cause at God's right hand above, he sends out his Holy Spirit in his gifts and graces as these may be needed by them, he restrains their enemies, he controls and guides all the affairs of men, and he makes all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose. All this, and far more, is implied in the saying of the apostle Paul, 'he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.' And how noble the triumph of believers, celebrated by the apostle, as resting on this secure basis! 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, (yea rather that is risen again), who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power,' Psal. cx. 3.

WHAT are we to understand by the day of power? This is determined by the context, in which there is a prediction of gospel times. Christ is congratulated by the Father upon his victory as the Saviour of men, ver. 1. The extension of his cause and truth is clearly foretold, ver. 2. And then, as the consequence of this, it is promised to him that his people should willingly submit themselves to him. By the day of power, therefore, we are to understand the gospel age and dispensation.

But why, or for what reason is the gospel so described? There is great propriety in the representation, and that for many reasons. The gospel was the age of miracles. It was long foretold that it should be so distinguished. Isaiah writes of it, 'Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped, then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing.' When Christ came he applied these predictions to himself, and by an appeal to his own miraculous works proved that the Messiah was come in him. Again, the gospel is 'the ministration of the Spirit,' and is remarkably accompanied by his power. Compared with the full measure of the Spirit's influences, enjoyed under the gospel, it is said of all former dispensations, 'The Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified.' The new dispensation was opened by the miraculous effusion of his gifts and graces upon the day of Pentecost. The word preached by the apostles was accompanied by 'the demonstration of the Spirit and of power.' And they could appeal to their hearers, that they 'had preached the gospel unto them with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.' But besides these general interpretations, there is a view of 'the day of power' suggested by the expressions accompanying it, which it may be well particularly to notice. 'Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning; thou hast the dew of thy youth.' Does it not foretell the time when the converts of the gospel would be as numerous and beautiful as the dew-drops of the morning, and that these would be found especially among the young? Assuming that this is a right interpretation, then by the 'day of power' is to be understood the day of conversion, when the Holy Spirit comes in mighty and saving operation upon the mind, quickening the conscience, renewing the heart, and creating the sinner a new man in Christ Jesus. Such a time is well called the day of power. Nothing but the mighty power of God can regenerate the sinner. 'He hath saved us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.' He alone can correct our wayward dispositions, subdue our rebellious wills, change our sinful habits, and reform our evil practices. When such a change is effected, it is truly a 'day of power'—saving and divine.

And let us now observe the result of such a day, and its gracious operations. The subjects of it are 'willing,' they become the voluntary servants of the Lord Jesus. By the power of the Holy Spirit their minds are so enlightened as clearly to discriminate between right and wrong, between good and evil; their hearts are so changed as to choose and take pleasure in the ways of God; their taste becomes spiritual, their affections heavenly, their desires pure, their pursuits righteous. Thus 'God worketh in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure.' Their will and conduct he conforms to his own. Let us remember the service of the believer is not rendered in the spirit of a slave but a son. What he does for God he delights to do. He is emphatically 'WILLING.'

He is willing to be saved by Christ. He is willing to be a debtor to sovereign grace. Nor will anything but the power of Jehovah's Spirit ever make him so. The gospel is the last refuge of the sinner. Until he sees that either he must perish or embrace it, he will not embrace it. Self-righteousness is the great enemy of Christ. It can exist under any form. The great complaint of men, whether nominal Christians or heathens, unenlightened Protestants or degraded Papists, is the same. 'Being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, they have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God.' Only he who has felt the power of the Holy Ghost, perceives and receives the truth that 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.' But he does understand and submit to it. He humbles himself to be taught of God. He thankfully embraces this only hope of the sinner. And he willingly rejoices to say, 'I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ my Lord; that I may be found in him, not having mine own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through faith of Christ, even the righteousness which is of God by faith.'

He is willing to have Christ for his master as well as his Saviour. Whatever is shown to him to be contrary to the will of Christ in his life he is willing to abandon. We see in him the proof of the testimony, 'God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.' The grace of the Spirit is seen in him, enabling him to renounce long-cherished and sinful practices, to obey the trying command, 'If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee.' Nor is he merely made to cease from that which is evil, he is taught to do well. He feels the force of the remonstrance, and seeks to comply with its demands, 'Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and your spirit, which are his.' He is willing to imitate Christ. He longs after greater conformity to him, desirous to have the mind in him that was also in Jesus, to walk even as he walked, to be pure as he was pure, benevolent as he was benevolent, self-denied, and holy, and devoted like him.

He is willing to honour Christ. Not only in his own heart, but in the world. He is zealous, yea, jealous for the honour of Jesus upon the earth. This makes him willing to contribute to his cause. He contributes of his substance, 'a cheerful giver,' because he feels the power of the exhortation, 'Freely ye have received, freely give.' He contributes of his labour, in doing good as he has opportunity. He contributes of his time and talents, desiring to obey the command of his Lord, 'Occupy till I come,' and anticipating his summons, 'Give an account of thy stewardship.' Should difficulties arise, and disappointments, and distresses, and even persecutions, he is willing to bear them. God enables him to receive the consolation, 'Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.'

---

FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me,' Rom. vii. 21.

'I WOULD do good.' So said Paul and so saith every believer. He has undergone an entire moral change, which lays the foundation of holiness in a regenerated heart. The language expressive of this change is singularly strong and pointed: 'We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus, unto good works.' The believer is the work of Jehovah's hand, who causes him to undergo a revolution of character that changes all his principles and motives of action, and in virtue of which he is led into the practice of good works. The same change is described by another apostle under another view, and he says of it, 'whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God.' This meaning must be that so far as he is a partaker of a new, regenerated nature, he does not commit sin. That nature is contrary to sin. It is pure as its own author, and were there no other nature than this in man there would be no sin found in his life. This is the nature which is called in the scriptures the 'new man,' and whose voice is uttered in the earnest cry, 'I would do good.'

He desires to do good. This is his bent and inclination. It appears as soon as there is a work of grace in the soul. In the young convert it is singularly interesting. It cannot be repressed. It is ardent to be engaged. Often does it err in the way of doing good, and may many times transgress the limits of human prudence, yet the disposition is strong and inextinguishable, nor can it rest in indolent inaction.

He delights to do good. What he purposes does not arise from any constraining sense of duty merely. There is such a sense of duty, but there is something higher at the same time. He takes pleasure in his pursuits. The word of God is precious to his soul. The people of God are dear to his heart. The ordinances of God are the joy of his spirit. He 'delights in the law of God after the inward man,' approving it, applauding it, and anxiously aspiring after clearer views, and more hearty conformity to it.

And he does good. It is not all mere desire and purpose with him. God gives him, more or less, the desire of his heart, and he finds and embraces opportunities of doing good. The house of mourning, or the social meeting, or the dying bed, or the sabbath school, may be the scene of his labours. He must watch the providences of God, and follow them as his guide. In labouring in that department which God, he believes, has assigned him, he labours not in vain, but in due season shall he reap if he faint not.

But alas! 'When he would good, evil is present with him.' This arises out of remaining indwelling sin. For as there is a new nature, out of which all good desires and holy purposes arise, so there is an old nature upon which the new nature has been superinduced by the grace of God. There are thus in every believer both the new man and the old man. There is the law of the spirit of life, and the law of sin and of death. As Paul says, 'I delight in the law of God after the inward man, but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.' It is by reason of this old man, this corrupt and sinful nature, that 'evil is present' with the believer. And so much is this the case that Paul says, 'in me, that is, in my flesh (in his old nature) there dwelleth no good thing.' As far as the new nature prevails there is no sin; as far as the old nature prevails there is nothing but sin.

An evil heart is present. Its 'corruptions are not altogether destroyed. These discover themselves from time to time as there are provocations to call them forth. They are hard to be suppressed. The soil once barren, but now enriched by cultivation, is ever inclined to send forth its native evil fruit. And although the heart be renewed by grace, there is still a remaining depravity that attaches to it by nature, and inclines to manifest its evil dispositions.

An evil body is present. Its passions are strong. Its lusts cry for their gratification. By its infirmities it darkens the mind, by its propensities it pollutes the imaginations, by its weaknesses it incapacitates for duty. This is what Paul seems particularly to have felt when he cried out, 'O! wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'

An evil world is present. Its temptations are many. Its riches deceive, its pleasures allure, its ambition blinds the soul. Our Saviour well said, 'beware of men.' Man is the enemy of man. The ungodly seek to destroy the work of grace in the believer. They malign it, and persecute it, and thwart it. 'In the world ye shall have tribulation.'

An evil enemy is present. Satan has access to the mind. He employs the corrupt heart, and the flesh, and the world, for his devices against the believer. All temptations are rendered stronger through his agency. 'We wrestle not against flesh and blood (merely) but against principalities, and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places.'

Such is the Christian life. This is its law. It is a controversy at the best. It is no doubt well that it is so, for it tends to our humiliation, and to the glory of Christ, and weans from this life, and makes us long for the next. And O! it is well that this law of the Christian's condition should be carefully considered and remembered. Let us not wonder at the strong temptations that beset us, but let us be prepared against them. The more we shall desire to do good the more may we expect evil to be present with us, through the hindrance of satan. Let us be vigilant. 'What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch.' Let us be prayerful. 'Pray without ceasing.' 'Be vigilant, be sober, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour.' Let us seek to grow in grace, 'bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.' And let us in faith, and hope, and patience, and purity, wait for the time when we shall lay down this body of sin and death, be delivered from temptation, see Christ as he is, and be satisfied with his likeness.

---

FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me,' Psal. li. 10.

WHAT earnestness is here! How it reproves the indifference with which we too often call upon God. There is no studied form of expression, but the very reiteration of thought and variation of language which might be expected when the heart is poured out. Let us consider what is sought, and from whom, and by whom it is sought.

What is sought? The creation of a new heart, the renewal of a right spirit. All the terms employed are strongly expressive of the change that was desired. A creation. To create is to call into being that which before did not exist. And the work of the Spirit, in restoring the sinner to holiness, produces a change as great as when he first called him into existence. The figure of a new or second birth is therefore habitually used to illustrate this operation of divine grace. The creation of a new heart. This is the seat of life, and therefore must it be sound if the functions of the body shall be properly discharged. The heart is the fountain, and it is only by its purification the streams which issue from it can be made pure. Christ has said, 'Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies—the things which defile a man.' If such defilement would be avoided, the heart must be created anew. A renewal. This supposes the previous existence of powers, but that they require to be restored to their right condition and exercise. And when this term is connected with the former, a creation, we have a just idea of the work of regeneration. It is a change as great as in a new creation, yet it is not the production of any new powers, but a change upon those faculties that previously existed. The understanding is not formed, but it is enlightened; the will is not called into being, but it is subdued; the passions are not originated, but they are engaged with right objects; the affections are not produced, but they are occupied aright. The renewal of a right spirit. The disposition must be changed. As it was before averse to God, it must be brought to acquiesce in his will, and delight in his ways. And the law to which before it refused subjection, must now be approved as holy, and just, and good, and cheerfully chosen as the unvarying standard and rule. This was what David here so earnestly desired—the creation of a new heart, the renewal of a right spirit. He varies his language, more perhaps to express the fullness and fervour of his heart, than to give any different views of the object which he sought. Still, the variety of his language is not without its meaning, and this much at least may we gather from it, that the change which he desired was thorough, radical, and universal.

From whom did he seek it? From God alone, for he alone was able to bestow it. The scriptures are pointedly full in representing the new birth to be a divine work. The language of the evangelist John is plain and instructive, saying, 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name, which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' The new birth is not of blood—by no connection of the child with the parent, however godly that parent may be. Nor is it of the will of the flesh—arising from no desire, nor effected by any power inherent in human nature. Nor yet of the will of man—produced by no influence which one man can exercise over another, however that may be the instrument in the change. But of God—by the operation of the Holy Spirit on the mind, according to his own pleasure, and by the exercise of his own power. The description of the apostle Paul is drawn from the work of the Spirit in creation, and is as follows, 'God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ Jesus.' The same power that was necessary to reduce to order the rude chaos at the first creation, is no less necessary to the creation of a new heart, and the renewal of a right spirit now. And it is needful to keep this truth in mind, not merely because it is only thus the blessing can be obtained, but to expect to obtain it otherwise discovers a defective apprehension of the nature of the work, beguiles the soul into self-deception, and must end in disappointment. Let us seek it where David did, from God, for there alone can it be obtained.

And was this the prayer of David? Yes, of David the man after God's own heart. How comes this? Had he not already a new heart and a right spirit? Of this there can be no doubt, yet did such a prayer become him now. He is engaged in an exercise of deep humiliation for gross sin. The evidence of his conversion must have been greatly darkened by his offences. He had no legitimate title to count himself a child of God while sunk in such grievous criminality. It is well said by Thomas Scott, 'I would not give a farthing for that assurance which sin does not shake.' In David it was shaken, and so he comes to God as though he had never been a partaker of his grace, and cries to him for a new heart and a right spirit. Or if, in exercises of humiliation, he had been restored to a comfortable sense of pardon and acceptance, still would this prayer become him. He had sad evidence how little progress he had made in the divine life, how weak was his heart, how strong was remaining sin. He might well therefore cry out for growth in grace, and that in the strong language which he did employ. For although the work of regeneration be complete, yet is that of sanctification progressive; and as for the increase of holiness, we have reason daily to pray, 'Create a clean heart, O God; renew a right spirit within us.'

Let us learn from this case not to rest in any reformation short of a thorough regeneration of the soul. Till that is effected, there is no vital godliness, no true religion, acceptable to God, and saving to the soul.

Let us learn how dangerous it is to have the evidences of our salvation darkened by sin. If we act so, we are laying the foundation of bitter exercises, and can be restored only through much tribulation.

Let us learn to set no limits to our desires after conformity to God. The longer we live, and the more we learn of him and of ourselves, of his purity and our sinfulness, so should we seek the destruction of the old man, and the confirmation, and advancement, and purification of the new man.

FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am,' John xvii. 24.

THE people of Christ are here described as 'those whom the Father has given to him.' Yes, they were given to him in an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure, before the world was. 'Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved.' How surprising! that in eternity the love of God should be placed upon any of his rebellious creatures, and a sure provision made for their deliverance. In accordance with this eternal covenant they are given, in another sense, to Christ now. And to this he alludes in the opening of his intercessory prayer. 'Glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee; as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.' They are given to Christ now, by an act of adoption, that he may provide for them as his own children. The blessing he confers upon them is eternal life, not merely the future mansion, but the present possession of it. 'He that believeth on the Son of God hath everlasting life.—Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life.—He that hath the Son hath life.—Hear, and your souls shall live, and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.' Thus the people of Christ have now 'eternal life abiding in them;' for as Christ himself saith, 'this is life eternal to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.' His people have been given into his hand, and he has removed their guilt, clothed them with his own righteousness, renewed their hearts, reformed their ways, and he will preserve them, through life and in death, to the full enjoyment of eternal life in heaven.

And what glorious prospects are set before them there! They shall be with Christ. This will constitute the height of their blessedness. Even on earth how mighty the influence of the little acquaintance they have already with him, on both their holiness and their happiness. These originate in their knowledge of him, and as it progresses so they advance. But faith, by which they now obtain an indistinct view of their risen Lord, shall in heaven be turned into sight. And when they see him, what effect will this produce on their purity and their bliss. 'Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.' The influence even of this prospect is great, and 'every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure.' What then must the reality, the enjoyment, be? Holiness and happiness mutually influence each other, and when there is entire conformity to Christ what shall be the enjoyment of him? The prophet has drawn aside the veil and given us a glimpse of the heavenly glory; and it is worthy of remark that the grand enjoyment ever appears to be the immediate presence of Christ. 'They are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple, and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.' Is not this the amount of the Saviour's own consolatory promise, 'I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go away, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also.' And this is the apostle's consummation of all the blessedness in store for his people: 'the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which remain and are alive shall be caught up unto the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.' Are we prepared for the presence of Christ? How should we feel, were he at this moment to manifest himself? Would we hail him with joy, and be ready to enter into his rest? Let us remember that, to prepare them for this the people of Christ are 'given unto him.'

And to this glorious end they shall assuredly come, for this is the will of Christ. 'Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory.' And he shall not be disappointed. It has long been promised unto him, 'that he shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied.' And what will satisfy him? Nothing short of the eternal redemption of his people. See how he was exercised when his ministry was about to terminate on earth. 'I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world.—I pray for them which thou hast given me.—Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me;—while I was with them in the world I kept them in thy name, those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost.' So in eternity, he will not be satisfied that one, whom he has redeemed, that one of all those who have been given to him, should be wanting. How the fond father longs to see his scattered children home, and with what delight he surveys them all safely collected beneath the paternal roof again, after many wanderings and temptations! So Jesus waits and longs to see his people home in heaven. His mediatorial bliss will not be complete till then. And as he has the will, so he has the power. His eye is on them wherever they are, his arm is around them by land and sea, his bosom heaves with love to admit them to his rest, and make them sharers of his glory. 'I pray that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they all may be one in us.' Then shall the Saviour be satisfied and the blessedness of his people completed.

Have we, by our own consent, been given unto Christ? Do we set our heart on heaven as the object and consummation of our hopes? Shall we behold the glory of the risen Saviour, and be glorified with him for ever? O! that we may be enabled truly to say, 'our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.'

---

FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous,' 1 John ii. 1.

So then 'any man' may sin. Yes, all men do sin. What a strange perversity it is that has led some to teach there may be men free from sin. It is a sad misapprehension of the scriptures, for their testimony is so plain that he who runs may read and understand. 'There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not,' Eccl. vii. 20. 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us,' 1 John i. 8. 'In many things we offend all,' James iii. 2. And the very persons addressed in the passage before us are true Christians, under the designation of 'little children.' Let us be careful not to resist the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the scriptures, for it is very displeasing to him, and blinding and hardening to the soul. Let no imagination of ours, however specious and beautiful, be placed in opposition to his truth, but let every hypothesis, and prejudice, and pre-conceived theory give way when it does not stand the test of 'thus it is written.' And is not the divine testimony in exact accordance with all experience and observation? Who will say I am innocent? Who will lay aside the daily use of the Lord's prayer, on the ground that the petition, 'forgive us our trespasses,' has become inappropriate to his case? Or whom have we ever seen or known that we could account to be faultless? How can it be that any are so ignorant of themselves as to imagine they do not sin? If there be such persons, they have yet to learn the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. They need the Holy Spirit to convince them of sin. All who know themselves must say, 'our hearts condemn us.' And if so, how must we be in the sight of him 'who is greater than our hearts, and knoweth all things?' The enlightened conscience can have no peace, under a sense of the divine cognizance and judgment, save in the apprehension of the righteousness of Christ. The cry of such a one is, 'behold, O God, our shield, and look upon the face of thine Anointed.' There the soul does rest, and can bear the scrutinizing eye of God, but there only. As for himself and his attainments, the more holy he grows he becomes the more humble. As he increases in knowledge he thinks the more lowly of himself. And there is nothing wonderful in hearing an apostle proclaim himself to be 'the chief of sinners.' There are times when the most advanced Christians are ready to make the same complaint of themselves. All have sinned, and do sin, and come far short of the glory of God.

But let us beware we do not abuse this humbling confession. It is not made by one who desires to live in sin, and uses it as an excuse. On the contrary, it proceeds from the hatred of sin, and the jealousy of himself as a servant of the Lord. He does not willingly commit sin. When at any time he is overtaken by temptation, and hurried, in an evil hour, into sin, it is his burthen and grief. We see the operation of gracious principles in David and Peter when they were drawn aside for a season. Let the humiliation of the 51st Psalm be witness for the former, and the flood of penitential tears for the latter. They did sin, but they could find no pleasure in it. They were wretched and uneasy, and found no rest until they returned to God in deepest humiliation, and were restored to the enjoyment of his favour. It is not the mark of a believer that he never sins, for then could no one have the consolation to know that he was a believer; but it is the mark of a believer that whenever he is betrayed into sin he is overtaken also with godly sorrow. The Christian cannot live in sin. It is a burthen heavier than he can bear. And his life is a life of controversy with it, striving against sin.

Let us be careful, when at any time we have sinned, not to delay exercises of humiliation. There is a reluctance then to come before God. We shall be tempted to hide our sin, and there is danger of the heart being hardened. Let us be watchful here. As soon as conscience upbraids us let us hear its faithful warning, and go and confess our sin. This will operate most favourably and powerfully on our sanctification. We shall not be so likely to fall into the sin again for which we have written bitter things against ourselves. Particularly should we be watchful to adopt this course with respect to our besetting sins. They are most likely to have dominion over us. But if we are accustomed, whenever we have committed them, to go with lowly confession and self-condemnation to God, we shall gain the dominion over them. God will bless the exercises, and his grace will confirm us in the habit of resistance. And this is essential to our comfort. God has graciously so ordained it that the souls of his people must bear dispeace while sin is allowed upon them. But when they have been duly exercised for it, he graciously restores them for his name's sake. And it may even prove that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound in elevating them to higher joys, and confirming them in holier habits than before—their very sins, wonderful to think! being made to contribute to their sanctification.

And O! what gracious encouragement we have to humble ourselves thus before God seeing 'we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.' He is on the right hand of God, and pleads the merit of his own work, for the remission of his people's sins. Hence the ground of his advocacy is declared, 'he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.' The merit of his death is infinitely efficacious. There is no sin in all the world but it is equal to remove. At the same time he acts the part of an intercessor, and presents our humiliations before the throne of God. These are worthless in themselves; but presented by him, and perfumed with the incense of his mediation, they are accepted, and we are restored and blessed. Nor does it suffice to procure our pardon, he confers grace suited to the time of need. He sends out his Holy Spirit in his gifts and graces. He restores the joy of his salvation, and upholds us with his free Spirit.

SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He ever liveth to make intercession for them,'
Heb. vii. 25.

'He ever liveth!'—and is therefore competent to make intercession. 'He ever liveth,'—and sustains an uninterrupted intercession. 'He ever liveth,'—for the very purpose of making intercession. Let us pursue these thoughts for a little.

1. Because Jesus 'ever liveth,' he is competent to the office of an intercessor between God and man. There is a great peculiarity of person necessary to occupy such a position. He must have power with God and man that he may prevail. No sinner therefore can be a prevalent intercessor, not even a created angel, for neither possesses any claim upon God by which he can plead for the benefit of others. Behold the constitution of the Saviour's person, and see how suited he is to the office. He is God, and may therefore treat with the Father; while he is man, and may appear for men. He who would undertake the redemption of sinners must be a partaker of their nature; but to be competent to the work he must possess power that is divine. And such is Jesus. 'The Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continueth to be God and man in two distinct natures and one person for ever.' 'Great without controversy is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh.' And this is the very argument of the apostle in the passage before us. 'Wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens. Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's, for this he did once, when he offered up himself. For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity, but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated for evermore.' O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! He saw, and he only, what was essential to the character of an intercessor. And, blessed be his name, he provided what was needed. Hence the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus by the virgin Mary—a man, but sinless—the assumption of humanity by the Son of God. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.' We have a great High Priest, Jesus the Son of God. Our intercessor is the living One, and therefore competent to save. With what confidence may we come to him! He can give us what we need. He can prevail with God for us. 'As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son also to have life in himself.' And he dispenseth it to whom he will.

2. In this relation he has ever stood to the church of God, and sustains an uninterrupted intercession. How largely is this feature of our Intercessor's priesthood here illustrated and enforced? He is described as 'a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec.' And see the extraordinary history and position of that mysterious person, that herein he might be a proper type of our ever-living High Priest, 'Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually.' On all these points the world was left in ignorance that he might the more fitly be a type of him to whom eternity literally belongs. But not merely was the Intercessor's person eternal, but his priesthood also. He sustained it from the first in accordance with the eternal covenant. And he has exercised it, and shall continue to do so, while there shall be believers to need its benefits. So early as the time of Job it sustained the hearts of the faithful. It was in a season of darkness and temptation that, losing sight of the great Intercessor, he exclaimed, 'He is not a man as I am that we should come together in judgment, neither is there any daysman betwixt us that might lay his hand upon us both.' And it was the apprehension of the Mediator that again filled him with peace and joy, and caused him to exclaim, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.' Afterwards, when the law was given to Israel, it was through the great Intercessor, for it is written, 'It was ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator.' At length he came, the substance of all the ceremonies of the law, and declared his own doctrine, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' And when he had finished his work, and rose triumphant, and was about to ascend, he did so in a way very illustrative of his intercession. 'He lifted up his hands and blessed them, and while he blessed them, he was taken from them and carried up into heaven.' He was afterwards revealed to the prophet in the same character, for 'he stood as a lamb that had been slain,' intimating that he did so in the capacity of an intercessor, pleading his own atoning death. Well therefore might the apostle infer, 'This man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood.'

3. And he 'continueth,' 'ever liveth,' for the very purpose of maintaining his intercession. To this was he set apart in the councils of eternity. For this was he anointed by the Holy Spirit in the fullness of time. And in this does he delight himself in the courts of heaven above. He is occupied in preparing his people upon earth for their removal thence, and in receiving them to his own rest when their work is finished here. On earth he gives them of his Spirit, washes them in his blood, guides their steps, sustains their labours, and presents their prayers; in heaven he carries them to the throne, acquaints them with its holy habitations, unfolds the purposes and plans of God, and rejoices in their unbroken praises. To each believer does he bend his attention as though there were not another in heaven or earth but he, and on all he waits as though no one needed his special care. He sympathizes with each and with all, and proves himself a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

'He who for men their surety stood,
And pour'd on earth his precious blood,
Pursues in heav'n his mighty plan,
The Saviour and the friend of man.'

'Our fellow-suff'rer yet retains
A fellow-feeling of our pains;
And still remembers in the skies
His tears, his agonies, and cries.'

SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Lord, let it alone this year also,' Luke xiii. 8.

THIS language was originally employed with reference to the Jewish nation and their privileges. They had long been the favoured people of the Lord, the Son of God himself at length came among them, he had sent out instructors among them, but they rejected both him and them. By their unbelief and obstinacy they greatly provoked Jehovah, and he threatened to withdraw their opportunities. The time was fast approaching when they would bring upon themselves swift destruction. But the merciful and forbearing Saviour first admonished them. And to administer his reproof, and give them warning in the least offensive form, he uttered his instructions in the form of a parable. 'A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I came seeking fruit on this fig-tree and found none; cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it. And if it bear fruit, well, and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.' All this indulgence was granted, these advantages conferred, but in vain, the nation persevered in unbelief, and resisted the ministry of the Son of God, till at length he proceeded reluctantly but determinedly, to pronounce its doom: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate, and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' The threatened destruction soon followed, Jerusalem was laid on heaps, the temple was consumed to ashes, the nation was scattered abroad, they have ever since been a people robbed and spoiled, and are a standing testimony to the destruction awaiting all who abuse their privileges.

What a lesson is here to the nations professing Christianity! They are now enjoying the national privileges which the Jews forfeited by their unbelief. But they hold them on the same terms, by the same tenure, even that they shall improve them. 'Because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded but fear. For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee.' If ever there was a time when this warning seems to be necessary, it is now. National religion has become a term of reproach with many. The nations are letting go many sound principles to which they once adhered. May the Lord have mercy upon Britain, and not suffer her to forsake the national allegiance which she owes to Jesus. Let her take hold of his truth with a firmer grasp, or, great, glorious, and free, though she be, the time may come when she shall not be known among the nations.

What a lesson is here to the professing churches of Christ! The Jewish church and nation were both alike unfaithful to their opportunities, and they perished in one common destruction. Nor does the Jewish church afford the only warning. Let us call to mind the seven churches of Asia. They were plainly threatened that unless they repented their candlestick should be removed. But they repented not, they filled up the cup of unbelief and sin, the divine forbearance would endure no longer, the little light that remained was soon extinguished, the crescent of an impostor was hoisted where the cross once floated in triumph, and the desolations of many generations now proclaim the consequence of abused and neglected privileges.

What a lesson is here to every Christian congregation! We are blessed with our sabbaths, our sanctuaries, and our sermons. But how are these improved. Is the sabbath our delight, holy unto the Lord, and honourable? Is the sanctuary our refuge, of which we devoutly say, How amiable are thy tabernacles? Are our sermons accompanied with the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power? Are men convinced of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment? If so, well. If not, God may soon be provoked to deprive us of our means of grace. Our teachers may be removed from our eyes, our sanctuaries closed, or a mere dead service performed there, and our sabbaths overrun with desecrations, till they can scarcely be distinguished from any other day. Alas! alas! How far is this the case already. Let us consider our ways. The revival of religion in the land must begin with the churches. Let us inquire what can be done to stay impending judgments.

There is a solemn lesson here to every individual. Our opportunities are still many. We have the word of God in our hands, and his ear is open unto our cry. Opportunities of doing and receiving good are presented on every hand. Much is given to us, and much shall be required. Ah! what fruit are we bringing forth? Is the good seed that is sown amongst us bringing forth, some thirty, some sixty, some an hundred-fold? Surely this may reasonably be expected by the Lord of the vineyard. He cometh seeking fruit, even repentance, and faith, and holiness. If he find it not he will pour forth his judgments. Our blessings may be withdrawn from us, or we may be removed from them. 'Let us kiss the Son lest he be angry, and we perish from the way when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.' When the Lord cometh may he find us watching!

---

SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Having an high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith,' Heb. x. 21, 22.

'The house of God' is a common appellation for the church, in the scriptures. 'Moses was faithful in all his house, as a servant.'—'Christ as a Son over his own house, whose house are we.'—'That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God.' It is not without good reason the appellation is so common. It is intended to express the character of the church, whose members are under one head, bound in love to a common father, loving one another as the children of one family, and having a common dwelling-place, both in this world and the next. Even death does not break the union that binds them together. 'Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named,' is the description of inspiration. For although the church militant is yet far removed from the church triumphant, still have they a tender sympathy in one another. Daily are they becoming more assimilated, and soon shall the whole number be complete, and safe in heaven. Alas! that this unity should have so little distinguished the church in its history hitherto. It has rather been as a house divided against itself. Hence has it not stood as it might against the assaults of the wicked one, and its dissensions have been no small hindrance to its progress. May the prayer of Christ speedily be answered: 'that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.'

'Over this house of God we have an High Priest.' This is Jesus, the Son of God, who in the character of an high priest has taken the care and oversight of the church. And how faithfully does he sustain the offices of that high and holy relation. The apostle Paul elsewhere says of him, 'we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God.—We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.' Greatness and mercy are the features of his character. So great, that nothing is beyond his power. So merciful, that there is no creature beneath his notice. O! what it is to possess the sympathy of such a Being. He condescends to discharge towards his church all the duties of the office he sustains. Is it the duty of a priest to offer sacrifice? He offered up himself, he gave his soul an offering for sin, himself the priest, the altar, and the sacrifice. Does it belong to the priest to offer intercession? 'It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.' 'He is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.' Did the high priest bless the people? As he ascended he lifted up his hands and blessed his followers, in that attitude he remains, and he was seen by the prophet in glory, pleading his sacrifice, and dispensing gifts to men. He is 'an High Priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedeck.'—'The same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.'

'Let us then draw near.' O yes, we may now draw near to God. We may 'enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the vail, that is to say, his flesh.' Appearing in his name, we shall be accepted for his sake. 'Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building, neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.' We may draw near for Christ is there, heaven is sprinkled with his blood, it is perfumed with the incense of his intercession, he will appear our friend, our elder brother, and we need not fear to come even to the throne. O! how we live beneath our privileges, standing afar off when we should draw nigh.

But let us beware that we draw near 'with a true heart.' No insincerity must be allowed in that approach. 'God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.' We have to do with him who searcheth the hearts, and trieth the reins of the children of men. And it becometh us to say and feel like David, 'if I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me.' What we ask we must honestly desire to obtain; what we vow we must be careful to pay; what we profess we must take care that we feel. Let us not draw near with the mouth, and honour him with the lip, while the heart is far from him. Let us remember all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. For when the apostle saw the High Priest in his heavenly glory 'his eyes were as a flame of fire, and his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace, and his voice as the sound of many waters.'

Still, if we draw near with a true heart, we may also come 'in full assurance of faith.' On his word we may confidently rely, his promises we may assuredly believe, his merits we may boldly plead, and in his name we may fearlessly confide. Whatsoever we ask, believing, we shall receive. The more we trust in him the more we honour him. We may encourage our souls in every approach and say, 'Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.' What a ground, what a warrant, what an encouragement to faith! A throne of grace! Come boldly! Obtain mercy! Find grace! Surely it is not unreasonable to exercise the assurance of faith.

'In ev'ry pang that rends the heart,
The Man of sorrows had a part;
He sympathizes with our grief,
And to the sufferer sends relief.
With boldness, therefore, at the throne,
Let us make all our sorrows known;
And ask the aids of heav'nly pow'r
To help us in the evil hour.'

SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'That men ought always to pray, and not to faint,' Luke xviii. 1.

THERE is great danger of men fainting in prayer, and therefore are the exhortations of Christ on this subject most seasonable and sustaining. How much instruction is conveyed in these few words, 'Men ought to pray!' Prayer is natural—a duty, a privilege. It arises out of the relation in which we stand to God as his dependent creatures, but especially is its obligation increased, and its benefit required by our sinful condition. 'Men ought always to pray.' In all situations and at all times is it needful and binding. The habit of prayer should be diligently cultivated, that, as the apostle enjoins, we may 'pray without ceasing.' Every event and every circumstance should remind us of God, bring us to him, and lead us to seek his direction, or praise his goodness. And we should be on our guard against neglecting prayer, knowing, as we are here warned, that there is great danger of fainting.

This danger partly arises out of the nature of prayer. It is a simple, spiritual exercise—the communion of the soul with God. But this is an exercise very distasteful to men. Hence the constant inclination to turn it into a mere ceremony. To say prayers is easy, to perform penances is easy, to endure pilgrimages is easy; but to pray is not easy, it requires a change of heart, the help of the Holy Spirit, constant watchfulness over the heart, and an abiding sense of eternal things upon the mind.

Besides, God is pleased often to delay apparent answers to prayer. Even where it is most sincere this may be the case. Let us remember how Christ treated the woman of Canaan when she came to him to supplicate for the deliverance of her daughter, who was grievously vexed with a devil. At first he seemed entirely indifferent to her entreaty, for 'he answered her not a word.' Even when his disciples took up her cause and became intercessors for her, being annoyed by her importunity, he alleged she had no claim on his mission, as he had been 'sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' Not yet discouraged, she drew still nearer, and worshipping him, said, 'Lord, help me.' But he seemed immovable, and replied, 'It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs.' She had her answer, 'Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table.' Not till then did he grant her request. He delayed—he raised up apparent difficulties, and it would seem as if her request could not be granted. Was this unkindness in our Lord? None will say so. The issue justifies the delay. And this case is recorded for our instruction. God may delay to answer our prayers, but we should not therefore faint. There is a time to withhold, and a time to bestow. God knows what is best for us. Let us wait his pleasure, and not faint.

Or it may please God to answer our prayers in such a way as we do not expect, or which at the time we may not understand. We have an instructive example of this case in the history of the apostle Paul. 'A thorn in the flesh was given him, a messenger from satan to buffet him.' Although we cannot tell what this was, yet we know it was some strong temptation. He betook himself to prayer as his only refuge. 'For this thing,' says he, 'I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me.' Here also was delay, for he prayed once and again, apparently without an answer, and was obliged to urge his suit upon the Lord thrice. Nor was this all. For although an answer came, it was very different from what he desired and expected. The temptation was not withdrawn as he prayed it might be. The answer was, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' The temptation was continued, but he obtained strength to bear it. And this he understood to be the answer, for he added, 'Most gladly therefore will I glory in mine infirmity, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.' Who does not justify the divine procedure, not only in the delay, but in the nature of the answer. Let us not limit the Holy One of Israel. He understands our case better than we do ourselves. And let us gratefully receive such answer as he may be pleased to give, and not faint.

Great good may arise to the suppliant both by the delay and by the answer being different from what he expected. It is well fitted to throw us back upon exercises of self-examination. Have our prayers been such as we should offer, or as God should answer? Is there anything in our life that proves a hindrance to our supplication, and which must be removed before a righteous God can answer it? Are there means which we have neglected to employ, and in the neglect of which it is presumption to expect that our prayers shall be heard? How good it were to engage in such reflections as these! In the happy results of them we might eventually find the answers to our prayer.

At the same time, such a delay is calculated and, no doubt, intended to exercise our faith. We must learn to trust God when we do not see the reasons of his conduct. How nobly is this grace manifested in Abraham! He had received the promise of a son, but how unlikely that it should ever be fulfilled, how long the trying delay, years after years passing by, and to all human apprehension the long-promised and much-cherished object growing more unlikely than before. But his faith in God sustained him. He had his hours of trial and seasons of darkness, and there were times when he was tempted to seek the fulfilment of the promise by unlawful means. But on the whole he clung to the hope set before him through all this dark night of disappointment, and his example is thus quoted by the apostle Paul, 'He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform.' Our business is to learn what God has promised, and in persevering prayer and labour to wait the time of his performance.

By this means the grace of patience will be much exercised and strengthened. We must not be in haste when God is not. We must submit ourselves and our ways to his government. It may be well to have our fond schemes crossed by his providence. We must learn to bear his will no less than to do his will. It is a wholesome lesson when we are taught that 'our strength is to sit still.' And it is a high attainment when we can say with all our hearts, 'Thy will be done.'

Let us pray thus, and in due season we shall be answered. Only let us be sure that what we ask is agreeable to the will of God, and sooner or later our request shall be granted. Let us remember the parable of the importunate widow.

EIGHTH DAY—MORNING.

'There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved,' Acts iv. 12.

THERE is no Saviour but Christ. The language of the scriptures is very strong and decided. 'Neither is there salvation in any other'—not in angels, nor in men, and they cannot confer what they do not possess; those things essential to salvation are not within the compass of their feeble powers and limited capacities. 'There is no other name,' no other being or character so constituted as to be capable of undertaking or executing the salvation of sinners. Not 'under heaven'—and this is a large compass. 'Not among men'—be their attainments what they may, knowledge, or influence, or goodness, or whatever else they may possess. It is manifest the language of scripture is thus precise and pointed, for the purpose of forcing men out of the many refuges of lies to which they are apt to betake themselves, and of shutting them up to the one only method of salvation which God has provided.

For how numerous are the vain devices of men! One trusts in his innocence—never having seen himself in the light of the divine law, nor having felt the condemnation which it pronounces upon sin. Another rests in an idea of his comparative purity—others seeming to be much more depraved than himself—and not understanding that all men stand as sinners upon the common ground of guiltiness in the sight of God. Not a few are satisfied with their purposes of future reformation, not doubting but opportunity shall be given, and that when embraced all shall be well. A larger class are building their hope upon some vague expectation, that what is wanted in them will be supplied from the grace and righteousness of Christ. Many are proud of their attainments, and entertain no doubt that they shall be accepted and rewarded for them. Some are satisfied with notions of the divine mercy that float in their imaginations, without being able to say precisely what their hope is. And very many form no ideas upon the subject, are wholly engaged with the things of time and sense, or, if a serious thought betimes should visit them, they dismiss it with the idea that they are no worse than others, and must fare as well as they in the chances of eternity. So it is, notwithstanding the fullness, and plainness, and urgency of the gospel. Where men are at pains to form opinions, they are almost as various as their countenances. Something, indeed, they have in common, for all savoir of the self-righteousness of man, but the forms which they assume are almost as many as the persons who indulge them. But they are alike vain. Of them all may it be said, 'the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it, and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it.' 'The hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place.'

Blessed be God, however, if there be only one Saviour, he is all-sufficient. If there be no other name that can prevail, it is all-prevalent. And what is his name? The Lord Jesus Christ. O! who can fathom this name! And what thoughts are suggested by these titles! The Lord! This name belongs to him, both by nature and by office. By nature he is Lord of all—by office all power has been given to him in heaven and in earth. He is the Lord of the conscience, moving it as he will; the Lord of life, bestowing and withholding it; the Lord of glory, to whom all praise belongs; the Lord of all men below as well as the redeemed and angelic hosts above. Jesus! This is a name altogether taken from his office. He is called Jesus because he saves his people from their sins.' This is the design and purpose of his mission. For that end he came, and this he is ever engaged in accomplishing—saving men from the guilt of sin by washing them in the fountain of his blood, delivering them from its power by renewing their hearts in righteousness, and upholding them in the midst of duty and temptation by the grace of his Holy Spirit. Christ is also a term of office. It implies his appointment to the work of saving sinners, and includes his offices of prophet, priest, and king—as a prophet communicating instruction by his word and Spirit, as a priest reconciling sinners to God by his atoning blood, and as a king ruling the hearts of his people and restraining the rage of their enemies. What a Saviour! How complete in person and in work! Yet we are prone to distrust him. Even when the need of such a Saviour is in some measure felt, we are fearful to commit ourselves into his hand. His salvation is full and free, and these are man's great stumbling-blocks. He would prefer to be indebted to the Saviour only in part. He would like to pay some equivalent for redemption. But know, vain man, either Christ must be a whole Saviour or none. We must either be complete in him or have no interest in him at all. O! that man understood how in him 'God justifieth the ungodly.' This is the grand offence. Yet if we would be saved it must be borne. In that testimony we must acquiesce,

'believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.'

And O! let us consider what interest is at stake, even the salvation of the soul. How precious is the soul! 'What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' The soul may be lost, and unless we come to Jesus so it shall. Or the soul may be saved, and if we come to Jesus so it shall. We may neglect his salvation, and 'dying, we shall die;' or we may embrace him by faith, and living, we shall live for ever. United with him there shall be no sentence found against us. No sin shall have dominion over us. We shall be preserved in life, sustained in death, acquitted in the judgment, and made blessed throughout eternity. Shall we then trifle with this salvation. O! let us examine ourselves whether we be in the faith. And never let us rest until we are enabled, in faith and hope, to say, Christ is 'all my salvation and all my desire.'

—
EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Blessed are all they that put their trust in him,' Psal. ii. 12.

'Trust' is used in the Old Testament scriptures as equivalent to faith in the New Testament. It implies an unreserved confidence in its object. That object is here declared to be the Son, meaning Christ, and the confidence of the soul is to be reposed in him. In the exercise of this confidence all other dependencies are forsaken, the heart is wholly withdrawn from them, but it is conscious of resting on a sure foundation when it builds upon Christ, and it neither needs nor desires any other security.

Such trust is declared to be 'blessed,' and that in trying times, which are here predicted. The heathen should rage, and the people imagine vain things. The rulers of the earth would be joined together to oppose the progress of the gospel; God would rise up in his indignation, proclaim the dominion of his Son, extend it upon every hand, inflict heavy judgments which would make the earth to tremble, and dash every opposer in pieces as a potter's vessel. But in the midst of these convulsions some would be safe, they would be preserved as the apple of the eye, even all they who put their trust in Jesus.

Times such as these have often been seen upon the earth, and may be expected again. But this word of consolation never has failed, and never can fail. At all times, indeed, scenes of trouble and temptation abound. And although these may not be public, nor acted on the great theatre of the world, yet in every heart is there a sense of its trouble or deliverance, it knows its own bitterness, or experiences its secret joy. Of this joy or security the great principle is trust in Jesus, and it may be profitable to trace it in some of its operations.

What peace does it give to the soul that has been harassed by a sense of sin! The exercised and awakened sinner only needs to know the Saviour, and his anxieties are at an end. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.' The eye of faith sees the Saviour in his fullness, discovers God in him casting upon the sinner a benignant look, beholds him reconciled and reconciling sinners unto himself, sees the light of his countenance lifted up, and rejoices in him as a father and a friend. It is enough for him that Jesus has lived and died. Every demand of the law he sees met in him. And now he hears his tender invitation, and thankfully accepts it, 'Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls; for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.'

The same confidence in Christ sustains under the heavy pressure of this life's tribulations. From these the believer is not exempted. As the child of Adam, inheriting his depravity, and still, in a measure, retaining it, he must expect sorrow; for man that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble. But especially as a child of God must he lay his account with afflictions. They are among the promises that are made to believers, for when they are needful for correction they shall not be withheld. But the principle of trust sustains him under them all. He can enter into the view of the believing Corinthians, and say, 'When we are judged we are chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world.' He is satisfied with the assurance, that 'all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose.' And he is comforted by the exhortation, 'My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.'

Should outward calamities arise, either in the world or in the church, his trust in Jesus does not leave him. He is not indifferent to them, but may be deeply moved and affected by them.

He ought to be so, yet he is not to despair. Enough for him, 'The Lord reigneth.' The convulsions of society, as the storms in the atmosphere, may be the means of its purification. The interests of religion are dearer to his Master than they can possibly be to him. He could hinder what now agitates and distresses, but he is pleased, for purposes known only to himself, to permit it. In his own hand the believer leaves his cause—assured it is safe, well knowing that he will bring light out of darkness, and order out of confusion. 'He will make the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder of wrath will he restrain.' Christ reigns, therefore all shall be well.

Even in death his hope does not forsake him. He trusts in Christ, and is not disappointed. He can sweetly sing of Israel's Shepherd, 'Yea, though I pass through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.' Death is the hour of satan's triumph, and therefore is it commonly the chosen hour when Jesus is pleased to glorify himself in his overthrow. 'By death he conquered him that had the power of death,' and in death he makes his people partakers of his victory. In much submission he enables them to say, 'Father, thy will be done;' or in confidence to cry, 'I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day;' or it may be that he elevates them to the spirit of a holy triumph, and they sing, 'O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

In eternity the principle of trust is consummated in both its nature and enjoyment. Faith becomes sight, and hope, fruition. The song of victory is sung, 'Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever.' He becomes one of the holy, happy throng so beautifully described in answer to the elder's question, 'Who are these, and whence came they? These are they that have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple, and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.' Well may we say, 'Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.'

NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied,' Isa. liii. 11.

THE sorrow of Christ is called the 'travail of his soul.' The phrase is borrowed from what is known to be the greatest example of human suffering, and to which our Lord has frequently alluded as emblematic of painfulness. It is particularly his mental anguish that seems intended. For although his bodily sufferings were great, those of his soul were greater. He suffered from persecution when a child, and was obliged to be concealed among strangers. He endured great privations, so as to be led to say 'foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.' And at the time of his arrest, and trial, and death, many and grievous tortures were inflicted upon his person. But these seem to be comparatively overlooked, and we are directed to his internal anguish as answering to the 'travail of his soul.' There are many periods of his history in which this was pointedly apparent.

Such was the hour, when in full prospect of his agony and death, he said, 'Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour.' But for this cause came I unto this hour.' The prospect of suffering is perhaps equal to the reality. Of this distress we are happily free, by our ignorance of futurity. But Christ foresaw what he was to suffer. We do not wonder if the tradition be correct, which says he was never known to smile. What a load must have rested on his spirit! And there were times when this was peculiarly oppressive. He had vivid apprehensions of his coming sorrow, and this appears to have been one of those afflictive seasons.

Of the same kind was his temptation in the wilderness. Satan cast out his vilest poison, and sought to pollute his soul. The temptations were all mental—distrust, presumption, and pride. There was a conflict of his soul with the great enemy of himself and of his people. Some of his followers have had bitter experience of 'the depths of Satan,' but they have endured little in comparison with their Master.

It is only on this principle we can understand our Lord's agony in the garden. At this time there was no violence done to his person, yet his suffering seems to have been as acute as any he ever endured. He said, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.' And thrice did he fall upon his face and cry, 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.' We cannot explain his exercises on any other ground than that he gave his 'soul an offering for sin.' 'Being in an agony he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling down to the ground.' It must have been the wrath of God, which his soul then endured, that so drank up his spirit.

And so upon the cross. The height of his anguish was when he cried, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me.' The nails that pierced his hands and feet, the crown of thorns that was placed on his head, the reed that smote him, all these were painful, but beyond them all was the withdrawal of his Father's countenance, while he hung a sacrifice for sin! This completed the travail of his soul.

O! what must sin be that so agonized the Son of God! What the love of God that gave up his Son to endure such sorrow! What the spirit of Jesus, who voluntarily submitted to all this for man's redemption! And what ought to be our humiliation, and gratitude, and sense of duty and obligation when we thus behold the travail of the Saviour's soul.

But this is past. As his anguish was bitter, his joy is proportionably great. It is described in terms expressive of perfection: 'he shall be satisfied.' He is satisfied now, and shall be so more and more, as he sees the fruit of his labour brought to consummation.

He is satisfied in the retrospect of what he has done. As when God surveyed the work of his hands, at the conclusion of the creation, and pronounced it good, so Christ can look back upon redemption and echo his own dying cry, 'It is finished.' In it all he sees no imperfection. Redemption is complete. Let us rest in it too.

He is satisfied, while he sees the work of salvation carried forward in the hearts and lives of men, by the operation of his own Holy Spirit. He convinces men of sin, and righteousness, and judgment. He keeps his saints by his own mighty power. He is ripening their souls for glory. And Jesus joyously awaits their arrival. Let us not be satisfied, unless the work of salvation is begun and carried on within us.

He is satisfied as he sees his sons and daughters brought safely home to glory. He sympathizes in their present struggles, and will detain them here no longer than is necessary for his purposes and their own good. His prayer is, 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory.' Daily and hourly are they arriving there. And as each is ushered in, heaven bursts with new songs of praise and victory. And the bosom of the Redeemer heaves with growing satisfaction. Let us anticipate this hour and be able to say, 'I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness.'

He shall be satisfied still more, when he shall have gathered all his people home. 'He shall send out his angels with a great trumpet, and they shall gather his elect from the four winds of heaven.' He shall cause them to sit down in the kingdom of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and they shall go no more out. Not one of all his redeemed family shall be left, and he shall rejoice over them with exceeding joy. O! shall we be there?

He shall be satisfied when he shall contemplate the great and numerous purposes that have been answered by his mediation. 'He shall restore all things.' His voice shall be heard, 'behold I make all things new.' He shall command, and the earth, polluted by sin, shall be burned up, while 'a new heavens and a new earth' shall rise out of the ruins. O! where shall we then be, and what shall be our destiny?

He shall be satisfied while, as the exalted Saviour of the church, he receives the praises of eternity. 'I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands: saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.'

---

NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes,' Rev. vii. 7.

THE martyred saints of God are here specially intended. The multitude of the redeemed are described at ver. 9. 10. Among these some appeared peculiarly distinguished, and the elder inquires, 'what are these?' They are represented as those who have particularly borne tribulation, and the description so accords with that given of the martyrs in the preceding chapter, ver. 9—11, that we doubt not they are the characters specially designed. Still the account of their blessedness applies to others also. Although in degree their happiness may be exalted, in kind it is the same with that of all the saints of God; so that the representation now before us may be understood of the redeemed universally.

They are in the presence of Christ, who is described as a 'Lamb in the midst of the throne.' The double figure is common, and it is designed to hold forth the Saviour in his glory, under the most endearing character, as a Lamb, and at the same time as clothed with supreme dominion, so that he is a Lamb in the midst of the throne. The very same are the ideas expressed in another part of this book, only that the imagery is a little more full and complete. 'I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb, as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth,' Rev. v. 6. 'A Lamb,' meek and gentle. 'A Lamb in the midst of the throne,' clothed with authority and power. 'A Lamb on the throne, having seven eyes and seven horns'—the emblems of knowledge and power. Once he endured affliction, and as 'a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.' But now he is exalted to honour. He has passed from the cross to the crown. Yea, because he was humbled in the character of Mediator, now he is exalted. In the presence of that great and gracious Being do the redeemed now stand. They are admitted to the most intimate and endeared fellowship with their once crucified but now exalted Lord. He still bears to them the relation of their Shepherd, and as such he is here represented to guide, satisfy, and cherish them.

He feeds them with knowledge. It is of their abode the prophet speaks, saying, 'the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.' His presence is enough. He makes all mysteries plain. The dark providences of earth are now fully unfolded. Much that once distressed them is now made to minister to their joy. And they can heartily join in the song of Moses and of the Lamb, 'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints; who would not fear thee and glorify thy name?' As the God of providence they admire and adore his ways, acknowledging them to be great and marvellous; but as King of saints, they bow in lowliest reverence, and own them to be just and true. Thus they follow the Lamb wheresoever he goeth, drinking in knowledge from his instructions; and as they learn more and more of God, rising in their rapturous praises, and making the mansions of glory to resound with their songs.

He satisfies them, 'leading them to living fountains of waters.' What a heaping up of figures, to convey some faint idea of the rich provisions of the upper sanctuary! Water—fountains of water—fountains of living water. Water is employed to convey the idea of luxurious enjoyment, for what a blessing is it esteemed by those who dwell beneath the scorching influence of a burning sun. It is a favourite emblem in the scriptures, and with good reason, for it was well understood by those to whom it was then addressed. And here it is carried even into the description of the joys of heaven, to impart some idea of the refreshment there provided for the soul. But it is not water merely, but 'fountains of water.' There is no limit to the enjoyments of heaven. Unlike those of earth they are never spent. On the contrary they are still increasing. God is better and better known, and more and more enjoyed. The glories of redemption are becoming more and more endearing. The fountain of their blessing is exhaustless. To complete the description, they are 'fountains of living water.' They proceed from the throne of God and the Lamb. They are living themselves, and they impart life to all who partake of them. As they quaff the sacred draughts of heavenly love and consolation, they grow increasingly vigorous in the service of their God. They rest not day nor night. They have life, and are continually made to have it more abundantly, while the Lamb leads them to the fountains of living waters.

Finally, the Lamb cherishes and comforts them. 'God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.' And the Lamb is God. The terms are used promiscuously. In no part of scripture are the views of Christ more exalted than in this book of the Revelation. And the prophet describes him as he saw him in heaven. As God, the Lamb dries up the tears of the redeemed. Many did they shed on earth. Over their own sins. Over the sins of others. Over their own and others' calamities. But now sorrow and sighing are fled away for ever. There is no more sin, therefore no more curse, and no more sorrow. They now rejoice in their former sorrows. Their tears were carefully put into the bottle of the Lord, and now their joys are proportioned to their bitterness and number.

Happy, happy world! Are we prepared for its exercises and joys? O! let us not deceive ourselves. 'There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.'

Now let us hear the heavenly exhortation, 'Be ye ready.' Now let us 'prepare to meet our God.' Are we ready? The time is short. 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.' Let us not defer till to-morrow. Death determines our eternal destiny. As the tree falls so it lies. And once having entered on the eternal world, the unchanging sentence is pronounced, 'he that is unjust let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous let him be righteous still; and he that is holy let him be holy still.'

TENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion,' Psal. ii. 6.

'YET'—although at one time nothing seemed more unlikely. For this is he who was crucified as a malefactor, who, when he said, 'Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' caused the high priest to 'rend his clothes,' and cry, 'He hath spoken blasphemy,' while all the people shouted, 'He is guilty of death.'

'Yet'—in spite of all the opposition that was given to him. The princes, the priests, and the people were all leagued against him; the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Herodians laid aside their jealousies and dissensions, and joined their power to crush him; rulers who before were at enmity, forgot their alienation, and became one to make common cause against him; his own friends, terrified and despairing, forsook him and fled; satan mustered all his forces to overthrow him, so much so, that our Lord said to him, 'This is your hour and the power of darkness;' death and hell combined their power to make him their prisoner. But all in vain—'he rose from the dead, spoiling principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it.' He hath ascended on high, leading captivity captive. And when revealed to the prophet who was favoured with visions of his ascended glory, he beheld him 'having on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords.'

The description of kingly authority, in the passage before us, is as complete as language could render it. 'I'—Jehovah—'have set him'—firmly and unchangeably—'my King'—mine own chosen and anointed One—'upon my holy hill of Zion'—supreme over my beloved people—all the interests of Zion, which is the church, being committed to his hands. In language, justly approved and familiar to our ear, 'Christ executeth the office of a king in subduing us to himself, in ruling and defending us, and in restraining and conquering all his and our enemies. What an office! Subduing, ruling, defending, restraining, conquering.

'Subduing.' He subdues his people to himself. Like all other men they are born estranged from him, and their hearts are enmity against him. They soon discover dispositions of bitter hatred, and fall in with the company of his betrayers and murderers. But he has power over the human heart. He made it at the first pure and holy, and now that it has become corrupt, he can create it anew. He comes in the power of his Spirit and touches their hearts. He reveals himself to them as their almighty Saviour. He discovers to them what he has done for their redemption. They are made ashamed of their rebellion, lay down their arms which they had lifted up against him, adore his mercy, praise his name, love him supremely, and devote themselves to his service. Thenceforth they are subdued to his will.

Having subdued them, he continues to rule over them. He does so by his word—putting it into their hands, inclining them to acknowledge its authority, and follow its lessons in all things. By his Spirit—causing Him to accompany the word that he may explain, recommend, and enforce it. By his providences—disposing the events and circumstances of their lives so as to accomplish his purposes of mercy towards them. Thus he rules in their hearts, in their lives, in their families, and in the church. Everywhere his supremacy is acknowledged, and his will is their law.

And while he rules them, he defends them. Against their own hearts, which are deceitful and would draw them aside to vanity. Against temptations, which continually assail them and seek to overthrow their constancy. Against satan, who 'goeth about, as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.' And against the world, which is ever laying snares to entangle them. He defends their principles, and enables them to maintain them. Their character—'bringing forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day.' And their hope—helping them to cling by it through all the perils of life.

In defending his people, he restrains their enemies. His power reaches to them, and he can control them as he will. He is 'head over all things to the church' He can hinder their purposes of injury. 'When king Jeroboam heard the saying of the man of God, which had cried against the altar in Bethel, he put forth his hand from the altar, saying, Lay hold on him. And his hand, which he put forth against him, dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him.' He can incline them to offices of kindness. 'The Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, and he made a proclamation, saying, He hath charged me to build him an house in Jerusalem. Who is there among you of all his people! The Lord his God be with him, and let him go up.' He can employ them for purposes of chastisement. 'O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation. I will send him against an hypocritical nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge. Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so.'

Finally, he will conquer all his and their enemies. 'Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Anointed. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.' 'Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come.' So full is the divine testimony. Jesus shall reign and conquer. The nation and kingdom that will not serve him shall perish. The kingdoms of this world shall be the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever. 'Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.' And all this, for 'he hath set him King upon the holy hill of Zion.'

TENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'My kingdom is not of this world,' John xviii. 36.

A KINGDOM is one of the most common representations of the church of Christ, to be found in the scriptures. Particularly was our Lord himself accustomed to employ it. There must, therefore, be a special propriety in it, nor is it difficult to perceive the reason of it. The church is a kingdom because it is a community, placed under the government of Jesus Christ as its King and Head—its members are closely united by common interests and pursuits—they are subject to the same laws—possess the same privileges—adopt the same customs—and are called to contend against common enemies. But while the church, in all these things, resembles the kingdoms of this world, it is very different from them in others. In many things it is directly opposed to them, and they to it. It has ever been an object of the world's jealousy and hatred. And while its design has been to bless and regenerate the world, the purpose of the world has ever been directed to its destruction. The grand peculiarity of the church is, that it 'is not of this world.'

Its subjects are not of this world. They have been chosen out of the world. They are called saints, meaning that they have been separated from others, and that they are set apart, by divine grace, to serve and glorify God. They are called the elect, implying that they have been chosen out of a multitude as objects of special favour, and subjects of peculiar influences. The very term church is most expressive of the same idea, for it means called out, and imports that it consists of persons who have been called out of the world by means of the preaching of the gospel, and are now united in the faith and fellowship of the Lord Jesus Christ. Men are not members of this church, in the sight of God, because they have been born in a land of Christian light, nor because they have descended from Christian parents, nor even because they have been presented to God in baptism, nor because they have sat down at the Lord's table. By these means they may and are constituted members of the visible church. But of the church, as its menbership is known and approved by God, they can become members only by the new birth unto righteousness. Such are 'born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.'

And after they have been called out of the world, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, they are required to keep themselves apart from the world. On no subject is the language of the divine word more full and pointed. 'Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. For if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world.' Love is an affection of which the world is unworthy. It may be esteemed according to its value, but it cannot be loved without sin. For love is an affection that allows no rival, and to place our love upon the world is to shut out Christ. Let us be on our guard against its temptations, for they are dangerous and deceitful. Against its people, who may allure us into sin. Against its riches, which may withdraw our hearts from God. Against its pleasures, which may fascinate and lead to folly. And against its honours, which may render us ambitious and proud.

Between the world and the church there is constant enmity. At the fall, God said, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed.' God hath put it there and none can remove it. It has ever been apparent from that hour to the present. Cain hated and slew his righteous brother Abel. Ishmael persecuted Isaac. Jacob was the object of Esau's jealousy. At all times he that is born of the flesh has persecuted and injured him that was born of the Spirit. It matters not that all make one profession. In the visible church itself there have ever been two distinct societies. One has been worldly in its spirit and pursuits, the other spiritual and heavenly. These cannot coalesce. Many are the forms under which their opposition has been apparent, but the principle from which it has proceeded has ever been the same. Christ himself did not disarm the enmity of the world. And let us not wonder if his most righteous, and consistent, and benevolent followers are misrepresented, and maligned, and injured.

But in this controversy it is to be remembered the servants of Christ are not to employ the weapons of the world. This Christ would not allow in his defence. 'If my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now is my kingdom not from hence.' His apostles also disclaimed the use of such earthly weapons, saying, 'the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but spiritual, and mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds.' Our Lord, indeed, will not own such weapons in his service, for he has plainly warned his followers, 'they that take the sword shall perish by the sword.' The officers of the church must exercise authority, but even this must be wholly spiritual, the sentence and the punishment alike.

The world is only for a season the residence of the church. It is what the wilderness was to Israel. The people of God are journeying through it. They are pilgrims and strangers here. All their supplies are furnished by their great Head. He gives them water to drink from the rock, and bread from heaven to eat. He goes before them in the cloud of his presence, and guides and protects them. And as soon as they cross the Jordan, and are settled in the heavenly Canaan, the wilderness through which they have passed shall be left to desolation and destruction. The world will be destroyed. All its interests shall perish, while none of those of the church of Christ shall be injured. It is a mere scaffold on which the heavenly architect is pleased to stand until he shall build up his church, and complete the spiritual building. As soon as that is done, the scaffolding shall be taken down and cast aside, the world shall be consumed with fire, while the church shall stand for ever a monument of the love, and power, and faithfulness, and truth, of the divine hand by which it was constructed. May we be living stones in this temple of the Lord!

ELEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews,' John xix. 19.

NOR only did he write this title, but the manner and spirit in which he did so are truly surprising. For the historian farther informs us: 'this title read many of the Jews, for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city; and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. Then said the chief priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews, but that he said, I am the King of the Jews. Pilate answered, What I have written, I have written.' What he had done he would not recal, nor yet alter the way in which he had done it.

Observe here the over-ruling providence of God. We cannot suppose that Pilate understood what he had done. He could not assign a reason for having written the title in various languages, or if he had a reason it was not in accordance with the divine will; nor could he explain, in all likelihood, why he preferred to write as he did, rather than in the amended form recommended to him. But having adopted a certain course, his obstinacy caused him to persevere in it. Nor is this the only occasion in which we see a restraint upon the human will in the history of our Lord. A similar case is recorded by John in chapter xi. 49—52. 'And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this he spake not of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God, which were scattered abroad.' These are two remarkable cases, the one that of the civil governor, the other that of the ecclesiastical ruler. Both ignorantly and truly bore witness unto Christ. If they attached any meaning to their own words, it was not the correct one. Whatever motive influenced their conduct it was not a right one. Yet they were both instruments in the hand of the Lord, for the accomplishment of his purposes. Even their bad passions and unholy purposes were employed for the fulfilment of his gracious designs. 'He made the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder of wrath did he restrain.' O! how he can turn the hearts of men as he will, guide their words, and govern their actions. Let us remember he is doing so every day. He is making enemies bear unwilling or undesigned testimony to his Son. He is employing their agencies and activities for his own ends. He says to their enmity, 'hitherto shalt thou come and no farther.' And he moves them to do what his hand and counsel had determined before should be done. Yet they are free and responsible in what they do. God tempts them not to evil, nor puts any constraint on them to do it, although he may be pleased, in his inscrutable sovereignty, to leave them to their own will and suffer them to commit it.

Observe farther in this conduct of Pilate the spirit of prophecy. He wrote the title in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. His reason may have been to make it thus intelligible to the various persons of different countries, who might read it. But the Spirit of God had an ulterior object.

In this inscription, so written, there was an intimation that all nations and tongues were interested in the death of Christ. He should indeed die, not for that nation only who crucified him, but for the whole world. And was there not here a prophecy, that the time was approaching when all should read in their own tongues the wonderful works of God, and hear the story of redeeming love? The providence of God had so ordered it that at this very time people of all nations were assembled at Jerusalem, for the purpose of celebrating the feast. Thus the wonderful events which had taken place would be carried throughout all countries. And it was not many days after when the Holy Ghost came upon the apostles, with the gift of tongues, and the representatives of all nations were present to attest its reality. 'We do all hear in the language wherein we were born.' This is but a figure and a foretaste of that day 'when the angel shall fly through heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, to all nations and people, and tongues, and kindred.'

Observe here too the Spirit of truth. Pilate wrote 'the King of the Jews,' nor would he alter what he wrote. The form suggested by the chief priests would certainly have been much more agreeable both to the Jews and the Romans. The Jews counted it a disgrace that a malefactor should be called their king, and they wished the title altered. The Romans considered the claim made by the title to be treason against Cæsar. And is it not wonderful that Pilate did not adopt the suggestion lest he should offend his royal master? It may have been that he wished to annoy and disgrace the Jews, knowing that Christ was an innocent man, and that what they did was from envy and the basest motives. Still he adhered to his purposes. No fear nor desire to please could make him change. Yet he was a man devoid of principle. O! see the Spirit of God working even by the worst passions of the human heart, and laying an arrest upon them to do his will. Truly the king's heart is in the Lord's hand, and he turneth it as the rivers of water. Its turnings may be as numerous and tortuous as the playful, fitful meanderings of the stream, yet the Lord governs them all, and will make them tributary to his counsel. He made the pusillanimous Pilate boldly and determinedly to proclaim the truth, and abide by it in this instance; saying, 'this is the King of the Jews.' So can he ever do, and so is he doing every day with the hearts of the children of men.

Finally, observe here the spirit of love. Jesus is proclaimed the King of the Jews, notwithstanding the baseness of their conduct towards him. They crucified him, yet did he not disown them. Even his murderers among them he entreated to return and submit themselves to him when, by his resurrection, he was proved to be their King. The apostles were to preach to all, 'beginning at Jerusalem.' And still has he purposes of mercy toward them. In love will he return to them and yet restore them to his favour. He now chastens them for their rejection of his claims, but he will be pacified towards them. He has commanded that a special regard shall be had to them by all the churches of the Gentiles. He has promised that they who love them shall prosper. He hath loved them with an everlasting love, and with loving-kindness will he draw them. This is his promise, 'behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock, in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. And I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, and feed them upon the mountains of Israel, by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.' May the Lord hasten it in his time!

—
ELEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Who, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high,' Heb. i. 3.

THE mediatorial person, and work, and glory of Christ, are often found united in the scriptures. The dignity of his person qualified him for his work, and gave efficacy to it; that work is complete in itself, and fully meets the condition of the sinner; and, in consequence of the perfect accomplishment of the work entrusted to him, he is now raised to the highest glory in the presence and enjoyment of his heavenly Father. An example of this kind occurs in the passage before us. Let us follow out its views in a few meditations upon it.

1. The person intended is emphatically marked, 'Who—himself.' The work he had undertaken was such that he could have no associate in it. He was equal to it, and he alone. And his qualifications for it are largely set forth in the context. 'The Son of God—heir of all things—maker of the worlds—the brightness of the Father's glory—the express image of his person —the upholder of all things.' What a heaping together of images and illustrations! What a glorious object must he be in whom all these rays of divine majesty meet! Let us reflect upon them for a moment.

'The Son of God.' The phrase denotes equality with God. It applies to Christ in a sense which makes him an equal partaker with the Father and the Spirit in the nature and glory of the Godhead. It belongs to him as it does not to any created intelligence. And hence is he called his own Son—his beloved Son—his only-begotten Son—his first-born. How far short language falls of conveying just ideas of the persons of the Godhead!

'Heir of all things.' Who could inherit all things? Who possesses a capacity to do so? Of what avail were it to a creature to appoint him the possessor of the earth? It would profit him nothing. He could not enjoy it. He could not use it. He might bear the name, but it would be a name merely. Is this the idle compliment paid the Saviour here? No! No! He is capable of being heir of all things. And the capacity arises from his divine nature.

'Maker of the worlds.' Let it not be said he was employed merely as an instrument or agent. A creature is not capable of being employed to create. And the testimony of scripture is not limited to this mode of expression. If it is said here, 'by whom he made the worlds'—it is said elsewhere, 'all things were made by him.' He is the Creator in the fullest and highest sense, even as the Father and the Spirit.

'The brightness of the Father's glory.' He saith himself, 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' The perfections of God shone in him, and were exercised and manifested by him. In him the character of Jehovah is presented to the contemplation of men. What an absurdity, yea blasphemy, it would be to speak thus of a finite creature!

'The express image of his person.' The phrase recognizes a distinction of persons, while there is unity of nature. And that is more fully declared at ver. 8, 'Unto the Son he (God) saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.' God said unto God. Is not the only reasonable and right interpretation, the Father said unto the Son?

'Upholding all things by the word of his power.' Precisely a similar representation occurs in Col. i. 16, 17, where there is added to a most sublime description of Christ as the Creator, 'by him all things consist.' What are we to think of a creature sustaining the universe?

Is it not plain that the scriptures labour to raise our views of the Saviour's person to the highest conceptions we can form? The representations are as exalted, and as numerous and varied as of the Father himself. And why? To lead us to right views of the work he performed. For—

2. He, himself, 'purged our sins.' None but he could do so—he did so fully. The phrase is used to signify the removal of sin in every sense in which it attached to man. He atoned for the guilt of sin, having borne its punishment in his own body on the tree. And how full is the divine testimony to the complete satisfaction which has thus been made! 'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.' 'Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as a lamb without blemish and without spot.' 'I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you.' The blood of Christ, once applied to the soul, removes all its guilt. Though its sin may have been as scarlet, it becomes as wool; though red like crimson, it is made white as snow. But not merely is the guilt removed, the power of sin is overthrown. The sinner is not only pardoned, but sanctified. And this purification is ever, in like manner, traced to the blood of Christ. 'For if the blood of bulls and of goats sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot unto God, purge your consciences from dead works to serve the living God.' 'Who, his ownself, bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead unto sins, should live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed.' The blood of Christ renews the heart, furnishes the motive of obedience, and is thus, in the hand of the Spirit, the destruction of sin in the heart and the life. Thus has he purged our sin in the removal of both its guilt and its power. And hence is his work celebrated in the heavens in these very aspects of it, 'Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever.' Nor can any doubt remain upon the completeness of his work. For—

3. His glory has succeeded to his work. Having purged our sins, 'he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.' He sat down—his work being finished. He sat down on the right hand—his work being accepted.

He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high—himself being honoured. Jesus is glorified as the triumphant Saviour of his church. The Spirit has it now for his office to take the things of Christ and show them unto men, that he may be exalted. He waits in glory till his enemies shall be made his footstool. His cause had its foundation securely laid in his death, it is now carried forward by his grace, and shall be brought to a glorious consummation. 'His name shall endure for ever. His name shall be continued as long as the sun. Men shall be blessed in him, and all nations shall call him blessed. And blessed be his glorious name for ever. And let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen and Amen.'

---

TWELFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; he will save us,' Isa. xxxiii. 22.

How seldom do we think of that great day for which all other days are passing! How little do we live under the conviction that before the bar of the Omnipotent each one of us must hereafter stand, and render an account of every word, and thought, and deed! And yet thus saith the scripture of truth: 'God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness.' 'God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.' Even here, even in the present world, it is manifest that he judgeth. How often do we see the sinner caught alive in his own devices—the wicked man eating the bitter fruit of the evil he sowed! How often has the sudden and terrible destruction of the blasphemer constrained the most careless to acknowledge that the hand of an avenging God was in it! But though the sentence of the Judge may have gone forth already, it is not generally executed here; it is only in eternity that divine justice will be fully vindicated in the face of the universe. And how solemn a consideration is it, that he unto whom we must answer is the omniscient one. Ah! there can be no escaping him amid the crowd; no darkness nor shadow of death in which to elude his eye! 'Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the day of thy youth, and walk in the way of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes, but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' Ay, and we may not forget that it is by the 'man he hath ordained,' the Lord will judge the earth—that now he hath committed all judgment to the Son. A most consoling truth this is, indeed, to the believer—for how can he fear, hereafter, the tribunal of his elder Brother—his dear Redeemer, with whom he delights now to hold fellowship, on whose arm of love he leans incessantly! But how startling is it to the unbelieving and impenitent! Methinks I would rather plead before the great and terrible God, than meet, on the day of his wrath, the rebuking eye of that Jesus whose grace I have so often despised, to whose invitations of love and mercy for years and years I have turned a deaf ear!

Seeing then that there is a universal judgment, we cannot fail to inquire what the rule of it is—and the answer is plain, 'the law of the Lord.' It is written, that he who is our Judge, is also our lawgiver. The Lord is the Head of his spiritual kingdom; and his part it is to order it as he sees meet—to prescribe the principles on which it is to be administered. On the heart of every member of it, more or less distinctly, he hath written the work of his law; at any rate all men must answer him at last according to the light he has given them. 'As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law.'

Yea, the Lord is not only our Lawgiver and our Judge; he is also 'our King.' All power in earth and heaven is his—he rules in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will; on his vesture and thigh, as Mediator, the name is written, 'King of kings, and Lord of lords.' It is impossible not to see how terrible in this character he must be to his foes. Who can fight against God? who can rush unscathed against the thick bosses of the Almighty's buckler? The kings of the earth may set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against his Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords; but he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision.

Ah! but judgment is his strange work! The exercise of regal power in which he delights most is the defence and salvation of his people. How emphatic are the prophet's words, and which of us with our whole hearts will not join him in drawing the inference: 'The Lord is our king—he will save us.'

Surely, surely, than this there cannot be any thing more mightily calculated to animate the people of God.

The Lord is our king; we may trust, therefore, that he will not allow sin to have dominion over us, nor the guilt of it to subject us to the condemnation of hell.

The Lord is our king. We may commit our souls, therefore, in life and death to his keeping, and rest with perfect confidence in his care.

The Lord is our king. Let us not fear, therefore, what men can do unto us—greater is he that is for us than all that can be against us.

The Lord reigneth. The church, therefore, is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her. Though evil days come unto her, he on whose shoulders is the government shall deliver her out of them all. She may be brought down into the dust—but she is the king's daughter, and he will loose the bands from her neck, and restore unto her beauty for ashes. She may be cast into the furnace—as often she has been—but the fires will only purge her dross. Long and heavily the cloud may hang over her, as again and again it has hung of old—but it is a cloud surcharged with light, and will but rain blessings down as it rolls by. 'Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities; thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.'

TWELFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church,' Eph. i. 22.

ALAS! we do not yet see these blessed words realized in our world! very far, indeed, to human view, are the kingdoms of the earth from being the kingdoms of the Lord Jesus. It is only a few, a very few, called by his name, who acknowledge him. Multitudes there are who deny his right, and defy his power. And yet in the eternal counsel it is fixed that he shall be Lord of all; the book of prophecy is full of pictures of the peace and blessedness of his universal sway. Who can help wishing that these bright days would come speedily—who can fail to pray the prayer that very soon the wilderness and the solitary place may be glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose. And yet though men see it not, it is true that God hath put all things already under the feet of his Son. It was for this that he endured the cross, despising the shame; this is the mighty prize which his toils, and sorrows, and travails have won. The prediction was, 'the Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.' And these glorious words abundantly prove that the prediction has been accomplished. 'Therefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' And for what purpose has the sceptre been given to Jesus? To what end does he wield it? How does he employ the absolute and unlimited authority with which as Mediator King he has thus been invested? O how we rejoice to know that it is singly for the good of his people—for the glory of his redeemed! The apostle, under the guidance of inspiration, declares that he is 'Head over all things to the church.'

And well, well may he be styled its sole Head. He is its Head—because he hath purchased it with his own blood. 'Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it—that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing.'

He is its Head—because it is by his grace alone that every member of it is converted. He came to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance—and not till his word is brought home in power to the heart can any feel their need of salvation, and flee for refuge to the hope of the gospel.

He is its Head—because he pours down on it continually from heaven the sanctifying influences of his Spirit. 'It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send him unto you.' Blessed be Jesus that that promise has never failed! He lives still freely to communicate to all who seek it in faith the free gift of his Spirit—and all on whom it descends are transformed and regenerated—most graciously prepared for the sinless exercises and joys of the habitation whither he has gone before them.

And what more consoling truth can there be to believers than this, that he who rules the church rules the world also—ay, and rules the world in accordance with the designs of his church. The kingdom of providence is now subservient to the kingdom of grace. The rise and fall of kings—the revolutions of governments—the decline and growth of empires—the most diverse vicissitudes of human affairs—all are under the control of the mediatorial dominion—all are subordinated to the growing glory of Zion.

What then shall we say of a church which owns not Jesus as supreme? How shall we characterize a spiritual community which fails to own and confess him before the world as Master and Lord in his own house? It is no church of Christ at all. It is a body without a head. Let us never forget what is written, that his church is 'Christ's body,' the fullness of him that filleth all in all; so that such are the riches of his condescension, that even He who filleth all in all is not complete in his mediatorial character without the preservation and salvation of its members! How thankful ought we to be to God that the church of our fathers has clung to this truth at all hazards; in evil times and prosperous alike; let us pray that she may never be tempted to let it go.

Still let me not boast vainly of Christ's Headship, if I have not yielded my own spirit to his sway. Such boasting is vain, as it is impious. O Lord, bow thy heavens, and come down and subdue me unto thyself. I desire to be wholly thine. Casting myself down at the foot of the cross, let my believing cry be, 'my Lord and my God!' And then, indeed, as the willing subject of Christ's kingdom, by whatever name I am called here, how may I rejoice in the thought that my Redeemer reigneth, yea, reigneth over all as a man. He to whom all power in heaven and earth belongs is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; on the throne of the universe—on the throne of heaven, and earth, and hell—a human heart, the heart of a brother, is beating.

THIRTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'A sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom,' Heb. i. 8.

THESE words plainly refer to the Lord Jesus Christ. They are quoted from the xlth Psalm, which contains one of the most beautiful prophetic descriptions in the whole bible of the grace and glory of Christ's dominion. 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.' And most gracious words they are: the truth which they inculcate is one on which it is most pleasant to meditate. The sovereign whom we serve is indeed King of kings and Lord of lords; but the height of power to which he has been exalted only serves more brightly to display that righteousness which is the fairest jewel in his crown! With the sword girt on his thigh, it is true that he rides prosperously in his majesty; but it is all because of meekness and truth. His arrows are sharp in the heart of his enemies, whereby the people fall under him. Ah! but faithfulness is the girdle of his loins, while his garments smell of myrrh, and aloe, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces! The righteousness in which Jesus rules is particularly exhibited in the forgiveness which he bestows on the church. This forgiveness is not the gift of mere mercy: it is the triumph of truth not less than of mercy. In the room of his people he satisfied by his death all the demands of the law; by his resurrection from the dead it was plainly declared that eternal justice was satisfied with the sacrifice; and having now ascended to heaven he has a manifest right to distribute to whom he will the blessings which he purchased at the cost of his own blood. Well then may the sceptre of grace he holds out for sinners to touch be styled a sceptre of righteousness; for in righteousness he has won the power to stretch it out to the very chief of sinners. In his salvation, truth and mercy meet together on equal terms: in the eye of the law he is declared to be just even when he justifies the ungodly.

And how mightily is this calculated to relieve all those desponding souls against whom the terrors of the judgment have arrayed themselves! The very justice, the very inflexible justice of heaven, is the guarantee of the believer's security. It is because He is faithful who has promised—it is because the Judge of all the earth must do right and cannot lie, that the church of Christ is built on a rock, and even the humblest, poorest member of it is safe.

Blessed be God that the government which by righteousness Jesus hath thus won, in righteousness he conducts and shall conduct to the end. With him there is no respect of persons: under him neither may any fear to find injury, nor hope to escape if they commit it. The widow's cause he delights to plead; he is the stranger's shield and orphan's stay; the humble folk also he forgets not who put their trust in him. But his right hand worketh terrible things to the proud—he breaks in pieces the oppressor. This was the prophecy of him of old, 'The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might; and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears, but with righteousness shall he judge the world, and reprove with equity for the meek: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.'

Who can help reflecting on the difference between his own people and his enemies under Messiah's sway?

See the righteous man. Is he subjected to the reproach of the world, falling on evil days and evil tongues? He has his appeal to the King who sits on his holy hill of Zion with justice and judgment as the habitation of his throne, and most surely of the King he will be justified. Is he the prey of persecution and intolerance here? Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right, and vindicate his violated truth hereafter in the face of the universe? Is he called to eat the bitter bread of penury, or to agonize on the bed of pain and languishing, or to weep often by the deathbed and over the graves of those he loves? It is the will—it is the doing of the righteous One—and whatever he orders is ordered wisely and well.

Ah! but these are the stinging thoughts of the wicked. In the midst of his godless prosperity a still small voice within whispers fearfully that his sin shall yet find him out! Even though his fraud, and treachery, and tyranny, escape unseen and unpunished on earth, he feels that there shall be a retribution beyond. He cannot believe that the denunciations of the Judge will not be executed: he cannot persuade himself that his threatenings are empty sounds, intended merely to frighten the weak and timid. They are the words of Him who cannot lie—whose sceptre is a sceptre of righteousness—and who speaks as he acts. 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one jot or tittle of his word shall perish.' O Lord, I cannot stand before thee in my own righteousness: if thou deal justly with me my portion in eternity shall be misery and despair. Give me grace now to flee for refuge to the hope of the gospel; that in the face of Jesus Christ my Redeemer thou mayest look on me, and in thy truth visit me with thy salvation.

THIRTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them,' Ezek. xxxvi. 27.

THE Lord Jesus, as the Head of his spiritual kingdom, has taken care to provide for the loyalty of his people. In their natural state he finds them rebels and aliens, and he makes them willing in the day of his power: in their natural state they hate his law and his gospel, and he inclines their hearts unto his word; by a sweet violence he constrains them to walk in his statutes, and to keep his judgments, and do them.

If we sit down with the simplicity of little children to our bibles,—if we search at all into the sins of our hearts and lives, we will all be convinced that we must needs undergo a change of nature ere we can be the true subjects of the King of Zion! This change is so great, so thorough, so pervading, as to be called a 'new creation:' it is represented by such strong figures as these, 'passing from darkness into light,' from 'Satan to God,' from 'death to life.' We may not be able to point out to others,—we may not know ourselves, the precise time at which it began, or the exact manner in which it was effected. There are persons indeed who aver that it is always sudden, always violent, ever accompanied with strange excitements, and strong agitations and throes of the heart and frame. Such persons are presumptuous enough to dictate to the Spirit of God the mode of his operations in the conversion of sinners, which is just as various as the various tempers and habits of sinners. Sometimes conversion is a sudden, sometimes a gradual work: in one it is wrought in a moment, in others it is the slow result of diverse processes that may have been in operation for years; in this man it is begotten of many labours, and travails, and tears; in that man it is calm, and soft, and gentle, as the heart is opened, and love melts and subdues the whole spirit into tenderness. But in all it is a real work, and though we may not specify the day and date of its taking place, we can take two different periods of our life, the present and some one gone past, and by the contrast show that it must have taken place. 'One thing is certain,' every believer can say with him of old, whom Christ restored to sight, 'one thing is certain, that whereas once I was blind, now I see.'

Now the author and agent of this change is the Holy Spirit,—whose gifts Jesus hath purchased for his people. The scriptures tell us that no man can truly call Jesus Christ Lord but by the Spirit,—that if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his. It is his office to convince men of sin; it is his office to guide men to the truth; it is his office to renew men after the image of God, and to prepare them for the sinless exercises and happy society of heaven. There is not a single grace of the Christian life which does not flow from his influences. Would you know his fruits, mark the catalogue, 'Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.' O how blessed a thing it is to have the heart right with God! how happy those who account the statutes of the King their joy, and his testimonies their song in the house of their pilgrimage! This evening let us all search and see whether the promise of Ezekiel, 'I will put my Spirit within you,' has been realized in our experience. Is our affection to the Saviour cold and weak? is our faith in him a faith merely of the letter? are our services in his sanctuary dull and formal? are our prayers at his footstool, in the family and the closet, few and short and heartless? have we no love to his truth? are we not diligent to keep his judgments and do them? are we barren and unfruitful in good works? O! then, just as surely as if a voice from heaven proclaimed it, we may believe that we have not yet the Spirit of Christ,—that we are none of his.

And yet this is not so, because the Spirit has not done his part with us. At some time or other, to some degree or other, we have all experienced his working. Who can say that the arrows of the Lord have been flying around him for years, and yet that he has escaped utterly untouched? In a Christian land, with the bible in our possession, and a gospel ministry at our doors, if we are yet unbelieving and impenitent, it is just because we have grieved, and vexed, and quenched the Spirit. And yet the Lord is waiting to be gracious. O come and let us petition for an outpouring of God from on high, on our family and our neighbourhood! Blessed be God that the days of revival and refreshing from his presence are not gone by in the land; ever and anon rumours of them are filling our ears, from east, and west, and north, and south. And alas! as we survey the vast fields of spiritual death that are spread around us, who will not give thanks with his whole heart for the gracious visitation? True, there may be extravagance, and fanaticism, and enthusiasm; true, there may be extraordinary excitements and agitations, which, as they pass away, leave men more inveterately ungodly than before.—And such things satan loves. But wherever the Spirit of God is vouchsafed, the invariable and eternal effects are 'goodness, and righteousness, and faith.' Come then, and on our knees let us plead God's own promise of this precious gift to the fervent prayer of faith; 'if a son shall ask bread of any of you who is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? or if he ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion? if ye then being evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction.' Hosea xiii. 14.

WE cannot tell what it is to die. We can follow a man to the very verge of being—but the last step between the two worlds, the final link between time and eternity, is invisible. We trace the ravages of the growing disease—we see the body tossing in agony, the multitude of the bones vexed with strong pain—we mark the gathering paleness, the closing eye, the stiffening features, the shortening, sinking breath—we watch till the spirit hovers on the very lips—but none ever returned to tell of the parting struggle which rent the tabernacle of flesh, none ever returned to tell us of the experience of the last feeling, of the very severing of the thread of life. The last enemy must be fought alone—without any earthly companion the gloom of the valley of shadows must be trodden by all; and no one can stand beside the bed of a dying man without witnessing the awful solitariness that sits on his face. Now this is the blessed privilege of believers, that in the situation of all others the most trying to human nature, they lean with perfect confidence on the arm of their Lord. To them death is a covenant-mercy, and the grave a quiet place of rest; to them death, in his worst shape, environed with all his terrors, is but the messenger that calls them home to their Father's house.

Let us meditate for a little on some of those circumstances in death, which though most terrible to others, their faith teaches them to overcome.

1. Painful, bitterly painful often is the last struggle with mortality—the earthly tabernacle falling to pieces—the mysterious bond between soul and body breaking. And yet how often have the testimony of a good conscience, and the hope of a better inheritance through the cross of Christ, inspired composure and fortitude amid the worst agonies of the flesh! There are few better appeals to the infidel than the voice from the death-bed, 'See how a Christian can die.'

2. Again, very grievous are the separations which death makes. It is sad to part from scenes we have known long, and objects on which our fondest affections were lavished; it is sad to leave for ever the 'old familiar faces.' That is a fearful text to the worldling: 'Thou shalt have no more a portion in any thing that is done under the sun.' Ah! but the Christian knows that he is a pilgrim and a stranger here, and as a pilgrim he lives; all the while his chief treasures are in heaven, and a removal from earth in God's good time he frequently looks forward to as not less good for him than inevitable. It is true that he were a traitor to his nature did he not feel, and feel keenly, as friends and kindred are weeping around him. But though his heart be sad, and tears may flow, he sorrows not as those who have no hope. This is the truth that scatters flowers around his tomb, 'there is a meeting again in heaven;' and if a fear will sometimes arise within him for the future provision of those whom he is about to leave behind him to the pity of a cold world, it cannot disquiet long. He commends them to his Father in heaven—and sweet, soothing to his soul, beyond ought that thousands of silver and gold can give, are these gracious words, 'Leave thy fatherless children, I will keep them alive, and let thy widows trust in me.'

3. Again, who can contemplate the gloom which hangs over the tomb of nature, and not weep? See the dust given to the dust; see the turf wrapping the little heap; see the flesh consumed from the bones; see the very bones mouldering away. O the grave, the grave! Is this the end of him whose thoughts wander through eternity? 'Man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?' Ah! but from the Star of Bethlehem light has been flung on the tomb of nature, and athwart the dunnest gloom of the valley of shadows. 'Come, see the place where the Lord lay.' It is desolate, tenantless for ever; and written over it ineffaceably are these glorious words, 'I am the resurrection and the life; if a man believe in me, though he were dead yet shall he live again; he that believeth in me shall never die.'

4. Finally, it is the doubts and fears—it is the apprehensions of wrath and forebodings of judgment which accompany it—that make death most terrible to a man. To enter into the immediate presence of the great God—to appear with all his sins unshriven on his head before the Judge of the quick and the dead; how fearful a thought! See that poor conscience-stricken one, vainly weeping, and vowing, and confessing, and promising; see that weary soul idly casting a look every where for some anchor on which to rest—panting hopelessly after any refuge which may shield it, any thing that may quiet it in that awful hour! O! how fearful is death to him who has no part nor lot in the everlasting covenant! Ah! but what enemy can intermeddle with the peace of him for whom Jesus died, for whom Jesus is interceding in heaven? As from the foot of the cross he looks to his crucified Redeemer, and thence lifts his eye of faith to mount Zion, this is the triumphal song he takes up, 'O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God who hath given me the victory through my Lord Jesus Christ.' My soul, enter not thou into the secrets of those who live and die without the consolations of the gospel of the grace of God.

'O may the grave become to me
The bed of peaceful rest,
Whence I shall gladly rise at length,
And mingle with the blest!
Cheered by this hope, with patient mind
I'll wait heaven's high decree,
Till the appointed period come,
When death shall set me free.'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And the God of peace shall bruise satan under your feet shortly,' Rom. xvi. 20.

ONE of the most beautiful titles of Jesus in the scriptures is the 'Prince of peace.' And well may he be so styled. At his birth the herald angels sang, 'Peace on earth, good-will to men;' his ministers are 'ambassadors of peace;' his gospel is a 'message of peace;' he 'makes peace through the blood of his cross;' himself is the 'peace' of the believer.

Let us consider the way in which this blessing is secured, and of what value it is.

Naturally we are enemies to God, fearing him, hating him—and, as enemies, he cannot suffer us to live in quiet, 'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.' But there is reconciliation with God through his Son! By grace he draws us nigh to him in the name of Jesus;—he shows us the suitableness of the gospel salvation to our case as guilty and polluted sinners, and enables us with our whole heart to accept it;—and then he enters into a covenant with us, saying, 'I will be no more wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee;'—being justified by faith we have peace with God. And to peace with God succeeds peace of conscience. Who shall lay any thing to our charge? The demands of the law are satisfied in our stead—and the Judge is well-pleased. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again. We look to divine mercy leagued with divine truth in our behalf—we look to the all-sufficient merits and all-prevailing intercession of our Mediator—we look to the gospel promises confirmed to us with an oath for ever—and we are 'filled with peace in believing.' No one may estimate the value of that peace save they to whom it is given! It is a perpetual feast; it is the joy and sunshine of the soul; it passeth all understanding; the world cannot give it nor take it away; it is heaven upon earth begun. Without this thousands of silver and gold cannot buy content—all the honours of time piled on the head cannot charm disquietude away: with this, in the worst privations of penury, in the face of the world's scorn and the proud man's contumely, on the wasting bed of disease, amid the weariness and pain of dissolution, the believer is happy. With a reconciled Father in heaven, with an interceding Redeemer, with a witnessing Spirit, with an approving conscience, what has he to fear—who can intermeddle with his joy?

Now, satan is ever ready with all his arts to obstruct us in the acquisition of such a blessing as this, because it is utterly subversive of his kingdom. He fills us with doubts and fears—he tries to disturb us with hard thoughts of God, and miserable forebodings of guilt—he tempts us at times into dejection, and despondency, and despair. But our consolation is, that through Christ Jesus, though he be our enemy, he is a conquered enemy. He cannot hurt us if we adhere stedfastly to our Saviour, and fail not to implore the constant supply of his grace to direct and strengthen us in the evil hour. Faith and prayer are the weapons of proof which he cannot stand. And yet strive as we may, we must not expect in this life to be complete victors: not till death call us hence, will he be bruised utterly under our feet. As long as we carry about with us a body of sin in an evil world, we have to wage a keen and continual warfare with the great enemy of souls; and the calm we do enjoy is but an 'armed truce' maintained with the sword in our hands. Ah! but there is nothing to hurt or destroy in all that holy mountain whither death leads the weary pilgrim of faith; the arrows of the tempter cannot reach him there. 'O that I had wings like a dove—for then would I flee away and be at rest.'

There is another truth which very naturally suggests itself in connection with such reflections as these. All they who have found peace with God in Christ delight to live in peace with one another: brotherly communion is one of the tests of their discipleship. And why should not all be united together in heart and spirit as well as in name?

They have one faith, one Lord, one baptism—they have the same hopes, and the same promises and privileges—they are devoted to the same cause, and subjects of the same gracious government—fellow-pilgrims are they in the journey of life, and heirs together of one heaven. How blessed a thing it is for such as are brethren to dwell together in unity! Ah, but satan hates that unity! He rules by their strife and divisions—and therefore he ceases not day nor night to foment them. And, alas! he has but too well succeeded. On which ever side we turn, the eye cannot fail to witness and deplore his triumphs. See how the poor church is torn, and rent, and bleeding with a thousand wounds; see the professed followers of the Prince of peace hating each other, slandering each other, persecuting each other—the worldling's scoff, the laughing-stock of the infidel!

And yet the book of prophecy declares that all these sad breaches shall assuredly be healed. The kingdom of satan shall totter and fall: the God of peace shall bruise satan shortly under the feet of his Son. The day is coming when 'the mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills righteousness;' the day is coming when the soldiers of the cross shall league together with 'lines unrent and confederate banner' against the common foe, and gather from the north, and the south, and the east, and the west, and go forth to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Great God, in thy great mercy let it come speedily! 'I will pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sake, I will now say, Peace be within thee.'

---

FIFTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ,' 2 Cor. x. 5.

OUR greatest sorrow here as Christians arises from the body of sin we carry about with us—from the working of yet unsubdued corruption within us. 'The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, so that the good we would we do not, and the evil which we would not, that we do'—'even when we mean to do good, evil is present with us.'

But the power of Christ as King is pledged to bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of his gospel—and neither his power nor his promise can ever fail. However hard and obdurate our hearts are, the word of the Lord is as 'fire, and as the hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces;' and we are melted and subdued before it. However haughty we be in our rebellion, the grace of Jesus is irresistible; it casts down every imagination, every high thought that exalteth itself against him; it constrains us to acknowledge him as absolute Lord, and with our whole soul, and body, and spirit to become his willing subjects. Now the way in which we are thus brought and kept under the complete obedience of the gospel, is by having implanted within us, as a living, vital affection, the love of Jesus. Grace subdues us, and love holds us captive. O! there is no principle which exercises such sway over the heart as this! It has led men to renounce riches, and reputation, and honour as dross for Christ's sake; it has led men to abandon all the endearments of home and kindred, and to go out to the land of the stranger and the savage to preach Christ; it has led men to brave the dungeon gloom, and the rack, and the wheel, and the stake for the 'testimony of Christ;' it constrains men still by a sweet violence to dedicate every faculty and every possession, all they have, and all they can do to the service of Christ. 'None but Christ, none but Christ,' is ever the cry of fervent faith: 'I charge ye, daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my Beloved, that ye tell him I am sick of love.'

That we may form some estimate of its influence on the frame and tenor of a man's character, see how changed he is since he yielded himself to the love of his Saviour.'

Once the sanctuary was a weariness to him, now it is his joy and song, for Jesus is there. Once the sabbath was in his eye the dullest day in all the week; now he longs till it come round again, for it reminds him of the triumphs of Jesus. Once his prayers were barren and heartless; now his choicest moments are spent at the footstool of the throne, because he pleads with his God in the name of Jesus. Once he preferred all other books to the bible; now he meditates in it day and night, and the oftener he reads, he likes it the better, because it testifies of Jesus. Once he talked about any thing and every thing but religion; now it is his pleasantest theme, for he cannot cease speaking of Jesus. Once he chose his companions out of the gay, and the foolish, and the frivolous; now his communion is with the household of faith, for on each member of it he delights to trace the image of Jesus. And let us not suppose that the change he has thus undergone is a partial and a temporary change. 'If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold all things are become new.' He has new hopes and new fears, new duties and new pursuits, new desires and new aversions, new joys and new sorrows. The same things which he did before he does now in a new way, and with new motives; even his very diligence in the business of life receives now a new direction, and springs from new motives. 'To me to live is Christ;' he takes up the words of Paul as emphatically expressive of the dedication of his whole soul to the Lord: 'I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.'

Do we know any thing of this 'captivity to the obedience of Jesus?' We call ourselves by his name. In avouching him to be our Lord are we rendering him the unqualified homage of the heart and the life? Is he 'in us,' and are his laws our songs in the house of our pilgrimage? O Lord God, thou knowest. Blessed Jesus, I desire to be thine—thine now—thine wholly—thine for ever. Do thou help me to watch against every disloyal thought and deed. Teach me to order my steps in thy word, and let not any sin have dominion over me. Alas! even when I am most diligent in self-examination, there is much evil within which I cannot feel nor see as I ought! 'Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'

—

FIFTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King,'
Psal. cxlix. 2.

IN the eye of the men of the world religion is continually associated with moroseness and gloom. They chase it away from their social circles as the enemy of their peace; melancholy they regard as merely another name for it. And yet never could there be an idler nor more slanderous deceit. The mariner rejoices when his little bark is rescued from the sucking whirlpools of ocean; the captive exults when he exchanges the dungeon gloom for the sweet light of the sun, and the fetter for freedom; the weary exile leaps with joy when he is restored again to the old faces and the pleasant home of his youth. But these are all faint and feeble emblems of the blessedness of penitent sinners, when after many dark days and nights of tears, the light of gospel truth breaks in on their souls, and the weight of wrath which was weighing them down to death is lifted off, and they have found Jesus, and through Jesus, peace with their Father in heaven, and a heritage in their Father's house! There are none so happy, none in all the world so happy as they. They are beautified with salvation; the high praises of God are in their mouth; they sing aloud upon their beds; even though sorrowful they are always rejoicing. Their path is as the shining light, which shineth ever brighter and brighter: their life is associated with the sweetest and softest imagery, smiling skies and green pastures, and quiet waters. And hear how David speaks of them in the verse which is prefixed to his evening's meditation, 'Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.'

'Children of Zion' is one of the scripture titles of believers: their 'King' is the Lord Jesus Christ. And well indeed may they rejoice in him,—ever as they look on him in faith,—in whatever light they contemplate him.

Let them rejoice in his person. He is the image of the invisible God,—fairer than the children of men,—the chiefest among ten thousand.

Let them rejoice in his love. Many waters could not quench, nor floods drown it; it is the burden henceforth through eternity of the hosannahs of paradise.

Let them rejoice in the righteousness which he has wrought out for his people. It has magnified the law and made it honourable; it acquits and absolves from the condemnation of sin; it furnishes a right to the tree of life.

Let them rejoice in his salvation. It is rich, and free, and full,—suited to all,—ready for all,—offered to all.

Specially let them rejoice in his omnipotent and eternal sway. O there is no single conceivable element of decay or dissolution in human empires which has any place in the government of Jesus! Death wrests the sceptre from the best and bravest on an earthly throne: but the mediator King is alive for evermore, and holds the keys of hell and of death. The rebel may usurp the rights of his prince here, and the traitor may plot and betray; but the subjects of the King of Zion count his testimonies 'their songs,' and none that is unfaithful or covetous hath any inheritance with him. The impotence of an earthly monarch may make him a prey to tumult and sedition, or his ignorance may tempt the crafty to ensnare him into destruction, or neglect of his office may beget ominous complaints and murmurings among his people, or his tyranny may arm them up against him to hurl him headlong from his throne. Ah! but our Lord knoweth all things, and his wisdom is infinite,—his arm breaks in pieces the enemy, —he hears the sighing of the needy, and pleads the widow's cause,—in truth he judges the nations, and his folk with equity. A rival may start up against an earthly monarch and dispute his title and defy his power, or the fatigues of government may wear him down, or disease may waste him, or old age may leave him helpless and defenceless to the invader. But who of the sons of the mighty can once be likened unto the King of heaven; nothing is too vast for his superintendence, or too minute for his concern; his eye never sleeps, nor is his right hand ever weary; with him a thousand years are as one day, and one day as a thousand years. Well then it becomes all the children of Zion to be joyful in their King. For the present blessings he dispenses let them praise him; let them praise him for the future hopes he inspires. What more effective barrier could there be to despondency from within or from without than this, that Jesus reigneth! The crowd may rage; but he it is that stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves and the tumult of the people! Rulers may take counsel together and unite their lawless power against his church: he shall break them with a rod of iron, he shall dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel. And why should any be troubled in heart who have touched the golden sceptre which he has stretched out, and avouched Jesus to be their King. Rejoice rather in the Lord always, and again I say rejoice: cry out, and shout thou inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee.

---

SIXTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

Teach me thy way, O Lord; I will walk in thy truth: unite my heart to fear thy name, Psal. lxxxvi. 11.

To avoid wandering in the dark, we are all very ready to inquire our way when the shades of night are descending on the earth. O how much need there is of far more anxious inquiry that we may not be lost in the everlasting night which lies beyond the grave?

Here I am a pilgrim travelling towards eternity. Now, the bible declares that to a happy eternity, there is but one way. And what is that one? Jesus Christ, and the truth as it is in Jesus. There are many ways to hell—a thousand different tracks—and troops of travellers may be found in each gaily and giddily dancing or lazily toiling along. To heaven, however, the single solitary way is through the blood, and merits, and mediation of our Redeemer. These are his own words, and they cannot be misconstrued, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life—no man cometh to the Father but by me.' And who can fail to rejoice in Jesus as the medium of intercourse between God and men—as the means of communication between earth and heaven?

In this character, I cannot help connecting him with that beautiful type of old, Jacob's ladder, hanging midway in the sky, and clustering with bright spirits! Down that pathway it is that the angels come when they are commissioned to minister to the heirs of salvation—and up it again they mount, to tell of another and another poor sinner repenting, and believing, and saved, and to make heaven's arches ring with the news! Along that pathway it is that every redeemed soul, since time began, has climbed to paradise; along it it is that every single prayer of faith has ever reached the throne; ay, and down it alone come every grace and blessing from the tabernacle on high which cheer and sustain men on the earth.

It is called the 'new' way: the former one, through the perfect obedience of Eden, has been shut up utterly since the fall, and shall continue shut for ever. It is called also the 'good old' way: the blood of the Lamb by which it is consecrated was slain from the foundation of the world. It is a plain way: the way-faring man, though a fool, cannot err therein. It is a safe way: no faithful pilgrim has ever been hurt or lost who trode it. It is a pleasant way: the ransomed of the Lord return to Zion with songs and everlasting joy on their heads. Ay, and blessed be God, it is a free way: there is no angel with flaming sword standing at its portal—the poorest and meanest may enter it without money and without price. Now, it is surely a momentous question, 'How is this way to be known?' The answer is simple. The Lord, the Lord alone, teacheth it. And how does he teach it? By bestowing on us his Holy Spirit. That Spirit is emphatically 'the Teacher.' It is he who clears away every prejudice, every obstructing cloud, and guides us into the truth. It is he who opens up the word, and inspires us with a relish for it, and every day helps us to discover in it something new. It is he who takes of the things of Christ, and shows them to us in power, and conforms our hearts and lives unto his image. Without him we can neither know the Lord's will, nor walk in his statutes, nor fear his name: without Him we can do nothing. And how is this great gift of God to be brought down from heaven? O we rejoice to believe that it is promised to the fervent prayer of faith! Come, then, and let us cry together at the footstool of the throne of grace, 'Teach me thy ways, O Lord—unite my heart to fear thy name.' Come and let us plead with God in the name of Him whom he loveth and heareth always, 'For Christ's sake, lift on us the light of thy countenance—take not thy Holy Spirit from us.' And with prayer let us join firm and resolute purpose of heart. 'I will meditate, O Lord, in thy fear, and follow on to know thy ways—I will delight myself in thy statutes—I will not forget thy word—O Lord, I will walk in thy truth.'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ,' 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

THE day of judgment will be a great and terrible day. And there is no doubt that its terrors must be enhanced by the outward sublimity of the scene. The trumpet will peal—the dead will gather from the sea, and the grave, and hell at the sound—the Judge will descend in the air with his chariot of flame, and its wheels as fire—myriads of angels will wheel their glittering hosts around him as he descends—on a great white throne erected will he sit with the beam of justice in his hand, and the assembled universe at his feet!

All this must constitute an august spectacle. And yet I believe that the chief terrors of the last day will not be outward but spiritual terrors. Far more intensely than by all that is around him will the poor sinner be awed by the consciousness of guilt within, by the burning conviction that surely, surely, his iniquity will find him out. Amid the countless thousands around the throne, each soul shall stand apart—in fearful solitariness—because according to what each has thought, and said, and done, will the issues of the great day to it be rendered. O! that is a solemn admonition in the word, enforced by a most weighty argument, 'let every man prove his own work—for every man shall bear his own burden!'

'The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire.' For what purpose? 'To take vengeance.' Ah! how little do wicked men dream of retribution beyond? They do not believe, but they shall see—and however they may escape on earth, deriding the threats of the law, the condemnation that awaits them is as sure as God's truth is sure. And on whom is he to take vengeance? 'On them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel.' Some, indeed, on the earth have but slender means of attaining to the true knowledge of their Creator: to many the glad tidings of salvation have never come. With all such the just Judge will deal justly. 'They that have sinned without law shall be punished without law—and they that have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law.' The persons referred to here are such as are wilfully ignorant—such as are impenitent and disobedient in the midst of much long-suffering and many, many, gracious invitations and precious privileges. To them 'much has been given,' and 'much will be required' at their hand.

And let no one think that there can be any lack of evidence to condemn the sinner at the bar of the Lord when he is revealed in glory. Lack of evidence! The messengers of Christ whose admonitions, sabbath after sabbath, for years, he disregarded, shall testify against him; the blessed example, and advices, and prayers, and tears of the godly around his dwelling-place, shall testify against him; the godless companion who lured, or laughed, or jibed him into sin, shall testify against him, unavailing mutual shame and secret abominations; the Holy Spirit of God shall testify against him, telling of vexings, and grievings, and idle strivings, of grace resisted, of remonstrances stifled, of invitations spurned! His own heart, his own conscience will convict him: self-convicted, self-condemned, he will blench from the tribunal, and try to hide in dens and caves from the wrath of the avenger.

God only knows when the day of vengeance shall come. He has not revealed the date of it to any; no good purpose would have been served by the revelation. But this we know assuredly that as men die so they shall be judged. To every man the day of his death may be regarded as just the day of judgment. When once the dark valley is trodden, the fate of his eternity is sealed; beyond it the blood of the everlasting covenant is powerless to save. Ah! with what crying earnestness might the cast-away spirit cry in hell—if it could cry in hope, 'Lord, try me yet again.' As the tree falleth so shall it lie.' 'He that is unjust shall be unjust still, and he that is filthy shall be filthy still, and he that is righteous shall be righteous still, and he that is holy shall be holy still. O then how doth it become me every day to practise secret and searching self-examination! Am I ready to die? Am I prepared for the judgment? If this night my soul shall be required of me, shall I go to heaven or to hell? O Lord God, thou knowest; my hope is in thee.

SEVENTEENTH DAY—MORNING.

'And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent,' John xvii. 3.

Of all attainments, the first and the highest is the knowledge of God. Without this all other knowledge is worthless—not the less worthless utterly, that the proud and the learned boast of it. 'Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this that he understandeth and knoweth the Lord.' But how can weak blind nature attain unto such understanding? Never, never by its own strength. The poor heathen lived in darkness, and in darkness died. With all his toiling, with all his painful incessant searchings, his natural eye could not penetrate the thick mists—thick as midnight—that hung between him and the throne of heaven. He was as a prisoner groping wearily round and round his dungeon wall, but incapable of catching anything more than a dim and scattered glimpse of day. Yea, the more he thought of God—as himself sadly confessed—the darker, the more incomprehensible, God appeared. Ah! but thanks be unto Jesus Christ that the Almighty is now clearly revealed in his word to man. The simplest child in a Christian land knows more of him than the wisest wits of old Greece or Rome!

Come and let us meditate on God in the gospel: would that we felt aright what a privilege it is to be able to look up to heaven, and say, 'Thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer!'

I have been taught in the bible to know God as the Creator of all things. The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament showeth his handywork—by his wisdom he founded the earth, and settled the mountains, and strengthened the fountains of the deep. The gods of the heathen are idols: He alone is from everlasting to everlasting—the only living and true God.

I have been taught in the bible to know God as the Preserver of all things. He sits at the helm of the universe which he made, and directs it at his will. No one can stay his hand from working—or say unto him, What doest thou?

The eyes of all wait upon him—and he gives them their meat in due season. He opens his liberal hand, and satisfies the desire of every living thing. Specially he is the Shepherd of his people, and they never want. All the circumstances of their lot most graciously and wisely he orders: yea, he makes their very troubles work together for their good.

Now, it is indeed possible that to some measure of such knowledge as this—to some such knowledge of God as my Creator and Preserver, I might rise by my own native energies. In the book of nature the blindest may trace him: in providence his love and bounty are daily felt by all. Ah! but the grand question is, How may God, as a just God and righteous, deal mercifully with sinners? I know that he hath made me, and that he upholds me—but how can I know him as a Saviour—how can I be brought to know him, and to confide in him as at once vindicating his law and extending forgiveness to a guilty world? This knowledge unaided nature never in all time could have reached. It is derived solely from revelation; it comes exclusively through Jesus Christ whom God hath sent. Out of Christ God is either looked upon as an inexorable Judge, taking sure vengeance on every transgressor, or more falsely still, as a vacillating Judge, exercising his pity at the expense of his truth and to the confusion of his government. It is only in the gospel of his Son that his Godhead is fully exhibited to the world: no where else than in the gospel can we know God as a Father, a reconciled Father—just, yet justifying the ungodly—with all his attributes united, and harmonised, and glorified in the salvation of men. 'He who commanded the light to shine out of darkness,' says Paul, 'hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.' 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father,' said Jesus himself, 'and no man knoweth the Son but the Father, and he to whom the Father will reveal him.'

This knowledge of God, revealed in the face of his Son, is called by John 'eternal life'—and well may it be so. It is the way to eternal life—'I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh to the Father but by me.' It is the earnest of eternal life—'We all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.' The full fruition of it hereafter constitutes the essential glory of heaven—'Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.' O that the saving knowledge of God were vouchsafed to us, that we might worship him and serve him aright—yea, love him too with our whole heart! Blessed Jesus, do thou teach us! Show us the Father—and it sufficeth us. 'Whoso hath seen me hath seen the Father.' Reveal thyself therefore to us—and help us with Thomas to cast ourselves down at the foot of thy cross, and cry, 'My Lord and my God.' Here we are but pilgrims and strangers—our best days are but vanity—few and evil, and soon gone. Ah! but the life begun on earth of thy believing followers never ends: the life of faith issues in a life of glory. Lord, we believe; help thou our unbelief. Deliver us from the power of the grave: ransom us from death.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea,' Hab. ii. 14.

WHEN these glorious words are realized, how beautiful will the earth be—how beautiful and blessed! A seraph's pen were required to describe it; no human fancy can worthily conceive it, or language of man picture the wondrous transformation. Eden will be restored again; earth will reflect as in a mirror the fairest hues of paradise. And is it so that this can ever be? Yea, verily it shall be—it must be—for the Lord God hath willed it and predicted it. Jehovah is truth itself: our God is the Lord omnipotent, and he cannot be withstood. Whatever he hath spoken must come to pass; heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one tittle of his word shall fail. Come then, and amid the ridicule of the infidel, and the sneering of the world's wise men, and the despondency of our own fainting and faithless hearts, let us solace ourselves with the promises of the King of Zion. 'It shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established on the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flock unto it.' And again, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee; ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.' And again, 'The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.' Blessed be God, many tokens have already been vouchsafed to us that he has not forgotten his promises. Even now there are green spots in the wilderness. The plant of renown is budding beautifully, and spreading abroad its branches. Already the Sun of righteousness has arisen on the horizon of heathenism—and many a dark heart and rocky, on many a distant shore, has been melted and enlightened by his rays. We will rejoice in what has been done—and take it as a pledge of the more abundant glory that yet remaineth to be fulfilled. That little cloud not bigger than a man's hand shall yet cover the heavens. Yonder stone cast out of the mountain without hands, shall yet become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. And let us not forget that it is by human agency that the wondrous work is to be wrought. Not to angels but to men has the commission been given to extend and to perpetuate the gospel kingdom. 'How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed: and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard: and how shall they hear without a preacher: and how shall they preach except they be sent?' And let no one say that it is idle to expect a few such weak human agents to achieve the conversion of the world. It is not in their own strength that they labour—but in the strength and through the grace of Jehovah. We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might manifestly be of God. When it seemeth good unto him he may cause whole nations to be born in a day. And surely it were grievous sin in us to keep back in unbelief or despondency from this work. It is a general law of the gospel, that those who have experienced its power themselves will not and cannot rest till they have sought to bring others to experience it also. There never lived a single sincere follower of the Lord Jesus Christ who did not desire earnestly to have as many as he could united with him in the faith. Christianity is essentially communicative and diffusive—it grows by means of free distribution. Look to the dark ages of the church, when no efforts were made to dispel the torpor that hung over the nations. She grew cold, and torpid, and inert, and poor. How emphatically were the words verified in her history, 'There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; there is that withholdeth, but it tendeth to poverty!' And it holds exactly so with individuals. 'The liberal soul shall be made fat—and he that watereth shall be watered also himself.' I look to the state of those to whom the gospel has never come—and I prize the more my own privileges—I am filled with deeper gratitude to Him whose grace alone hath made me to differ. Ay, and it is impossible to contemplate the labours of patient and devoted missionaries without being made better myself. How can I read of them without feeling keenly how weak in comparison has been my zeal in my Master's cause! How can I look to the lives and deaths of such men as Schwartz, and Elliott, and Carey, and Martyn, without desiring to catch somewhat of that holy flame which burned so brightly in their bosoms?

And in what way may I aid in the missionary work? I may contribute of my money towards it. I may unite in social meetings with those who seek to stir each other up in its cause. Specially I can pray. It is by petitioning that the windows of heaven are opened; prayer moves the hand that moves the universe. And that I may be ready to distribute, and willing to communicate, and more zealous in prayer, let me cast my eyes abroad and survey what yet is to be done. Let me look to whole continents, over which the shadow of death is hanging. If this be too vast and too general a prospect, let me take a single solitary soul—without one ray of light from the gospel of Christ to irradiate the gloom in which it is shrouded—in life and death. Having contemplated this single soul, let me multiply it ten thousand thousand thousand times, and try to sum up the arithmetic of such misery. And O surely hard, hard as adamant will my heart be, if it be not touched with pity for the poor heathens, plunging race after race, generation after generation, into a dark and unknown eternity at a venture! Blessed Jesus, take unto thyself thy glorious power and reign. See of the travail of thy soul and be satisfied. Let thy kingdom come; let thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn,' Luke ii. 7.

DRAW near, O my soul, and behold this great sight! The Lord of heaven and earth hath descended from the height of his sanctuary and tabernacled with dust and ashes! See the 'everlasting Father' a weeping babe—the 'Holy One and Blessed' a man of sorrows in the likeness of sinful flesh—the Lord of glory the despised and rejected of men! There is mystery here which I cannot penetrate; the more I meditate on it the more mysterious it appears!

Mary came up from Nazareth to Bethlehem, great with child—she sought admission to an inn but was repulsed from it—wearing and sad she betook herself to the stable—and as the days were accomplished that she should be delivered, there she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger.

And so was born the Lord Jesus Christ! So poor, so mean was the nativity of the Son of God!

The town was full of strangers from all quarters of Judah—but neither rich nor poor took any interest in this event, the strangest, the most astonishing which the world ever saw. The birth, like the character of Immanuel, was humble and lowly—his entrance into the world was a fitting emblem of the reception which awaited him in it—too true an earnest of the humiliation manifold in which his days in it were passed!

And this was He—lying down with the beasts of the stall, on whose vesture and thigh the name is now written, 'King of kings, and Lord of lords.' This was He without a place where he might lay his head, whom nations now delight to honour, at whose altar every knee through all the earth shall yet bow, and every tongue confess! Who can declare the end from the beginning? From how small beginnings do the mightiest and most magnificent results issue! 'Unto what is the kingdom of God like, and whereunto shall I resemble it? It is like a grain of mustard seed which a man took and cast into his garden—and it grew and waxed a great tree, and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it.'

Jesus was born in a stable, and laid in a manger!

Let us contemplate, with adoring reverence, his marvellous love to men. All this strange humiliation he underwent for us—poor miserable sinners. That we might be forgiven—that we might be reconciled to offended justice, who were aliens and rebels—that we might be raised from death to life, and instead of heirs of wrath should become partakers of the blessedness of heaven, Jesus took on him our nature, and submitted to a degrading birth, and lived a life of poverty, and died an accursed death: 'ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich.' And can we think of his love 'passing knowledge' without in return being filled with love towards him? Is it possible to survey with careless and cold hearts the manger of Bethlehem, and the cross of Calvary?

O no! our hope is in thee, gracious Jesus, who hast done so great things for us. Thou art all our salvation, and all our desire. To the blessed purposes for which thou camest into the world, our earnest prayer ever is to be conformed. 'If we forget thee, let our tongue cleave to the roof of our mouth, and our right hand forget its cunning.'

Jesus was born in a stable, and laid in a manger!

Let us be convinced of the vanity of earthly distinctions. We are strongly tempted to give too much of our thoughts to the riches of this world. Its greatness and glory fascinate the carnal eye. As we gaze on them from afar we envy and repine. Ah! but how insignificant they appear in the light of the manger of Bethlehem! What contempt does it cast upon them! How can we stand beside it in faith, and court them any more? If it had seemed good to Jesus he might have invested himself with all the trappings of outward magnificence which the weak and vain idolize; but he rejected them—he cast them from him. And does not this strikingly manifest their worthlessness in his eye? How can we call ourselves the followers of Christ, and yet seek great things?

Jesus was born in a stable, and laid in a manger!

Let the proud man, therefore, humble himself. O why should pride dwell in any of our hearts! How inexcusable is it especially in the disciples of the Son of Mary! He condescended to men of low estate. Yea, though in the form of God, and counting it no robbery to be equal with God, he made himself of no reputation, and took on him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. And shall we be puffed up who have nothing save what he has given us? How dare we count any one as too mean for our regard, or any service too humble, by which we can benefit the poorest brother, and glorify our God?

Jesus was born in a stable, and laid in a manger!

Let the poor man, therefore, be patient, and contented, and resigned. The low condition in which our Saviour appeared, was intended to sanctify poverty to his followers in every age, and to ennoble it, even amid its worst humiliations. To the poor the gospel is preached—out of the ranks of the poor most have been chosen to paradise. And who can murmur or despond in the memory of these most touching words: 'Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man had not where to lay his head?'

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him,' Mat. ii. 2.

SAD as was the humiliation of the Lord Jesus in his early years, there were ever some scattered rays that broke forth from the cloud, betokening his inherent glory. Angels heralded his birth,—Simeon and Anna, in the Spirit, testified of him while yet a babe in his mother's arms,—and as we read here, a preternatural star shone over the place of his nativity, and guided philosophers from afar to do him homage.

It is interesting to inquire into the motive which led these men to undertake such a journey.

It is well known that, about this time, over all the East the expectation of Messiah's speedy coming prevailed: in this expectation doubtless the sages shared, and it might have been strengthened by a partial acquaintance with the writings of the ancient prophets, or with some of the dispersed Jews. But it was a star which more particularly attracted them; 'we have seen his star in the east.' What this star was we cannot tell. Probably it was a meteor hovering over Judea. But how came they to connect it with the birth of Christ,—to pronounce it 'his star?' Some have thought that, as it was a common opinion among the ancients that great events, such as the birth or death of princes were betokened by strange sights in the sky, they were induced to consider this meteor as referring in some way or other to that glorious person of whose coming there were so many rumours throughout the world. But this plainly cannot account for their conduct. Some have thought that they were influenced by the prediction of Balaam, a prophet of the East; 'There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel.' But neither can this account for the strength of conviction which they manifested. The true explanation of the secret is, that they were brought to associate the star with Jesus, by the very same influence which leads still every sinner to his Lord,—the influence of the Spirit of God. God kindled a meteor in their sight to testify to them of his Son,—and himself revealed to them in some way or other, about which it were idle to speculate, what it meant.

These wise men then, on the appearance of the star, left their native land,—and after the expense and fatigue of a long journey reached Jerusalem; and then not in doubt, not in conjecture, but with the fullest conviction of the truth, they put the question, 'Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have come to worship him.'

And we read in the remainder of the narrative

how Herod the king was troubled at the inquiry, —how he gathered the chief priests together, and found from them that Bethlehem was predicted as the birth-place of Messiah,—how he sent the strangers to Bethlehem with a treacherous injunction to return and tell him what they saw,—how they went to Bethlehem and worshipped Jesus in his mother's house, and presented to him gifts, gold, and frankincense and myrrh,—and how being warned of God in a dream, they disregarded Herod's injunction, and in faith, and hope, and joy, departed into their own country.

1. Let us see in this little history a proof that Jesus was the light of the Gentiles as well as the glory of Israel.

In old prophecy he was sung of as the Shiloh unto whom the gathering of the nations should be,—the root of Jesse which was to stand for an ensign of the people,—the star to whose light the heathen should come, and kings to the brightness of its rising. And scarcely is it known that he is born than prophecy hastens to its fulfilment. See from the far east,—the land of idols,—a company of heralds seeking Messiah,—proclaiming him in the very streets of Jerusalem,—worshipping at his feet! Are not these witnesses before all men of the truth and faithfulness of God's promises? These are the first-fruits of the Gentiles, the tokens and earnest of that plentiful harvest which the Lord shall go on gathering, till the whole earth be one vast field resplendent with his glory.

2. These wise men opened out their choicest treasures to Jesus. O how doth it become each one of us to put the question to ourselves, 'what have we given to the Lord?' If we must answer, nothing,—vain are our professions,—vain utterly. Even now he is saying, 'son, daughter, I died for thee, give me thy heart.' O God put it into our hearts to respond to the touching appeal. Blessed Jesus I will present thee with gifts of the goodliest things I possess,—'the gold of faith, the frankincense of devotion, the myrrh of humble obedience;' whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth whom my soul desires besides thee.

3. Let us remember how far more highly favoured we are than these strangers. They were guided by a flickering star to Bethlehem,—we live in the full light of gospel day. They saw him but as a babe,—we can look to him now as he that is gone to his kingdom,—with the name on his vesture and his thigh, 'King of kings and Lord of lords.' They undertook a long and weary journey to find him, and with difficulty succeeded: he is now at our doors,—his word is in our hands;—sabbath after sabbath in our sanctuaries his gospel message has been ringing in our ears. Ah, unto whom much is given, of them much shall be required! I fear that against many of us,—glorious as our privileges are,—these eastern pilgrims will rise up and testify in the day of judgment.

NINETEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head,' Matt. viii. 20.

A CERTAIN scribe one day came up to our Lord and said, 'Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest!' It was an excellent salutation; no words could betoken a better spirit. But instead of accepting his offer—instead of encouraging the man—Jesus replied, 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.'

There are two views which may be taken of the scribe's character.

1. We may suppose that his determination to follow Christ was hasty and inconsiderate. He was charmed by what he had seen and heard of the wonderful works, and blessed lessons, and holy, benevolent life of Jesus—and grew suddenly in love with his religion. Without inquiry, without contrition, without humble prayer—in a moment of excitement and enthusiasm—he cried, 'Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.' Jesus knew that he had not counted the cost—that he was looking only at the fair side of the Christian life—that he was influenced by a temporary impulse, and not by deep settled conviction. Jesus saw the disease of his heart—and instantly stirred it and laid it bare. In the simplest and most affecting language he spake of his poverty and humiliation, leaving him to infer how hard a lot all must expect to lead who would follow a Master so lowly; and it is likely that the scribe's hasty resolution melted away. There are many such scribes in the world still. At some period or other of their lives the most careless and godless are occasionally awakened, aroused, alarmed, driven into confessions, and prayers, and most serious purposes. Ah! but they are merely touched, not changed! They think not of the toils of the warfare which the believer is called to wage. They think not of the deceitfulness of their own hearts. They never deliberately weigh the troubles manifold that beset the path of duty, and as a breath begat their religion, a breath scatters it.

2. Or we may suppose that the scribe's determination to follow Christ sprung from covetousness and worldly-mindedness. He fancied that Christ would soon become a mighty temporal prince—and with the ambitious hope of receiving preferment by joining him early, he offered to devote himself to the service of his kingdom. But the Lord dissipated speedily the idle dream. And who can read his reply without being melted and subdued: 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.'

The Saviour of men, while he tabernacled on the earth which he came to save, had no habitation which he might call his own! Certain devout persons received him under their roof, and ministered to him of their substance! And why was he so sorely humbled? It was that he might fulfil the scriptures, as 'the man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.' Why? It was that he might show the vanity of this world's wealth—that he might sanctify and sweeten penury to his followers. Why? He humbled himself, that we might be exalted—for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich. And verily Jesus will accept of none as his followers who would make a gain of godliness. We fear that there are some still who run greedily after the error of Balaam for reward. We fear that there are some still who assume the mask of sanctity to advance their temporal interests—some who intermingle scripture with their conversation, and are minutely observant of the punctilios of religious form and ceremony, that they may the more successfully rise in the world. 'Woe unto you, scribes and pharisees, hypocrites; ye shall receive the greater damnation.' O may grace be given us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness! And remembering our Master's humiliation, let us not pant after great things for ourselves. Remembering Him who 'had not where to lay his head,' let us not envy the rich man for his riches, nor despise the poor brother, nor ever repine amid the worst privations. 'If any man come after me, let him deny himself, and take up the cross and follow me.' Looking to Jesus, and casting in our lot with his followers, let us take up the song of Ruth: 'Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if ought but death part thee and me.'

NINETEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy,' 1 Tim. vi. 17.

THE Lord Jesus once uttered these terrible words, 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.' The evil, indeed, cannot attach to wealth in itself. It is a gift of God, and may be sanctified—and many examples there are on record of the union of great possessions with simplicity, and humility, and Christian philanthropy. Still it is very difficult to have wealth without abusing it—and it is its abuse which Jesus denounces. Alas! the temptations which it casts in a man's way are manifold and grievous: in every age of the church their fatal effects have been too manifest. It exposes him to pride and self-indulgence—it tends to chain down his affections utterly to the earth—it lays him open to basest flattery, and excludes from him faithful reproof and admonition—it prejudices him against the humbling salvation of the gospel—it disposes him to practical infidelity and atheism. 'The love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some have coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.' 'They that will be rich fall into temptations and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.' The young man whom Jesus loved went away in tears from his feet, an outcast, 'because he had great possessions.' And what pathos is there in these simple words of the great apostle of the Gentiles, 'Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world.'

Now Timothy was strictly charged to deal faithfully with the souls of the rich among his flock—and it well becometh all to whose lot much of the good things of earth has fallen, to give heed to the admonition.

How foolish is pride in such persons! What they have is not their own, and it is altogether undeserved. Doth God love them more than others because of their wealth? No. He hath chosen the poor of this world rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom. Then are they wiser than others? No. 'The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither riches to men of understanding.' Then are their souls of more value than others? No. On the scale of eternity the meanest and mightiest stand equal. Then are they happier than others? No. Those only who have laid up treasures in heaven are called to rejoice, yea, even to rejoice always. Then doth the church invest them with more authority than others? No. 'If there come into your assembly a man with a gold ring in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment, and ye have respect unto him that hath the gay clothing—are ye not partial in yourselves and become judges of evil thoughts.'

Not more foolish is it to be elated by affluence than to trust in it. Can a man with all the multitude of his possessions ransom his own soul, or his poorest brother? No. Is a man sure to retain the riches he has won? No. Scripture calls them with emphasis 'uncertain'—they take to themselves wings and flee away. Does wealth exempt from the grave? Alas! the small and the great lie down together in the dust: death cannot be bribed by the costliest offerings to stay one moment his resistless, relentless arrow. We brought nothing into the world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out: what doth it profit a man to gain the whole world, if he be a castaway in the end?

Let all then cease from vain boasting. Let all renounce their sinful reliance on the creature which perisheth. O that through the Spirit of grace we were enabled rather humbly to trust in the living God, and to glory in him! From him cometh down every good and perfect gift—he giveth us richly all things to enjoy—he too taketh away, and when he takes, he takes but what he gave. Surely then our duty is to acknowledge the gracious Author of our mercies—our privilege ought to be to use what he hath conferred for his glory. The scripture teaches us in all estates of life to consider ourselves as stewards of God. Whenever, therefore, we act as our own masters, or employ what we possess for our own selfish purposes, we are embezzling the property of another. God forbid that any of us should be tempted of satan to hoard up our money, or to squander it on our lusts, while multitudes around us are pining in penury, or perishing for lack of knowledge, and we lift not a hand to relieve them! Otherwise we will subject ourselves to the curse, 'Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten; your gold and silver are cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you.'

TWENTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself,' Heb. xii. 3.

BITTER was the opposition which the Lord Jesus encountered on the earth in accomplishing the salvation of men. 'He came unto his own—but his own received him not.' He wrought miracles in their presence in attestation of his divine mission, such as divine power alone could have achieved; they imputed them to devils, or idly demanded more. A life of holiness and meekness, and love celestial, such as the world never saw before, he exhibited to their eye; they laboured strenuously to traduce it and to revile it. Lessons of wisdom such as man never spake, he taught in their synagogues, and by their way-sides; they listened but to mock, and cavil, and blaspheme. From his birth to his death he was a man of sorrows—despised and rejected of men—stricken, smitten, afflicted, oppressed. And how did the Saviour bear himself under the cruel treatment which he experienced. Patiently he endured all;—as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, he opened not his mouth. Had he chosen he could have confounded his enemies by an interposition of miraculous power,—he could have summoned legions of angels from heaven to protect and defend him. But it behoved him to submit to whatever the Father sent,—and his own love to men prompted him to undertake. And so he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself;—when he suffered he threatened not—for the joy that was set before him he bore the cross, despising the shame. Now this blessed example of humility, and gentleness, and patience unparalleled, it is the duty of every follower of the cross to look unto—well and seriously to consider. Alas, it is too seldom the theme of our prayerful meditations—too seldom the model after which we strive to regulate our life!

How striking an argument does the survey of it furnish against pride!

Who will presume to cherish a single 'high imagination' in the presence of the meek and lowly Jesus? The disciple is not above his master, neither the servant above his lord.

How striking an argument does the survey of it furnish against revenge?

All hatred, and malice, and ill will, are rebuked by the spectacle. O how can I look to my Saviour loving his enemies, praying for them, in life and death, yea weeping over them, without casting away from me, as the poison of the soul, every malignant thought which satan may prompt against my brother!

How beautifully calculated is the consideration of it also to quiet and compose amid the distractions of life!

None of our sufferings can once be compared with the sufferings of Jesus. No anguish of our spirits can at all approach to the intensity of his, when with men and devils leagued against him, and the burden of a world's guilt on his head, and the light even of God's face hidden, he cried, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me;' yet hear his prayer in the midst of his agony, 'not my will, but thine be done.' O that the same mind was in us which was in him! Sinless himself, he endured all the contradiction of sinners without a murmur. And why should a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins;—what are our sufferings compared with our sins?

Patience is one of the fairest jewels in the Christian's crown. There are men who brand us as dastardly and faint-hearted when we render not back railing for railing. The fantastic honour of the world—fantastic in its murder—arms itself at all points with daggers, and demands a brother's blood in compensation for his hasty word! O it is nobler far to bear, and to forgive—to fear to break God's law more than to fear the reproach of men! Our Master, when he was reviled, reviled not again;—when he suffered he threatened not, but committed himself to him who judgeth righteously. O that the same mind was in us which was in him! I will look to Jesus—and be patient of injury—gentle and resigned under reproaches. I will look to Jesus—and never in the evil hour charge my God foolishly, nor ever suspect his love, nor ever question the truth of his promises. I will look to Jesus, and faint not at hope deferred, or hope blighted. I will look to Jesus—and though he should slay me, yet will I trust in him. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

—
TWENTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake,' Matt. v. 11.

THE world cannot tolerate the true believer. In his warfare with it there is no discharge—and vain it is to try to woo or conciliate such an enemy. 'If ye were of the world,' said Christ to his first disciples, 'the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.' 'Yea,' says Paul to Timothy, after recounting the troubles himself had encountered in the service of his Master, 'yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.' This persecution is of various sorts: it suits itself generally to the temper and spirit of the age. In former times it manifested itself by stripes, and imprisonments, and spoiling of goods, and torturings, and murders. Of late it has assumed a milder appearance—but its hostility is not the less inveterate, and it may be even more dangerous than of old. Now, the chief weapons it wields are ridicule and reproach—feeble in themselves indeed—but deadly when dexterously applied. It catches at the failings of the weak brother, and the life of the formalist belying utterly his profession, that alike on both and on all it may fasten the brand of hypocrisy. Our prejudices, and indiscretions, and infirmities, and inconsistencies, all furnish fuel for its satire—and the paltriest misrepresentation, when pointed with a sarcasm, will always find minds silly enough to laugh. It sets itself to invent all kinds of calumnies and nicknames against us. It calls us bigots and fanatics. It accuses us of spiritual pride and all uncharitableness. It affects to deride us as weak in intellect, and sour, and gloomy, and morose of heart. Every possible evil report it delights to retail—and believes every one. Sedition, deceit, dishonesty, treachery—there is no charge so odious which it is ashamed to forge and to apply.

Now, it is hard to be evil spoken of. It is very hard to be reviled and despised. No man likes to be laughed at. Alas! how many have refused to take up the cross lest it should subject them to the reproach of the godless and profane. How many have fallen from the faith of their fathers, that they might avoid the rallery of dis-solute wits!

Ah! but Jesus hath said, 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you.' Blessed are ye—and surely those whom he calls blessed are blessed indeed; he who calls them blessed can make them so.

'Fear not then the reproach of the scoffer, neither be afraid of his revilings.' Why should we fear? His evil words are false—and if we do not live down the slander on earth, the judgment-day will surely vindicate our name before the universe. Why should we fear? Similar treatment have all the saints of God in times past encountered—and with so large and so bright a company, it is our privilege to be fellow-sufferers as well as fellow-heirs. Why should we fear? It is the image of Jesus the Christian martyr bears, which the persecutor hates—and can the servant be greater than his Master? It is for Jesus' sake we are troubled—and who would grudge to endure in such a cause.

Yea, the more we are tried—the more we suffer—the more bitterly we are maligned—just the more sweetly will the Lord lift his face on us, the more of his grace and strength will he vouchsafe to us. He remembers what himself was called to endure at the hand of a gainsaying world—and he cannot fail to sympathize with his people. 'I will glory therefore in infirmities, in reproaches, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake—for when I am weak, then am I strong.' O there is no possible situation on earth—not even the one of bitterest calumny and sorest pain—which may not be made 'blessed' to the followers of the cross! How often has the furnace of affliction, seven times heated—how often have the fire, and the wheel, and the rack, and the dungeon's gloom, testified of the glorious consolations of the everlasting gospel, of the sweet fellowship which the Lord holds with his own in the evil hour? The blasphemer has been awed into silence—the persecutor has gnashed his teeth at the sight!

'Plead my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me. Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for mine help. Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me; say unto my soul, I am thy salvation. False witnesses did rise up; they laid to my charge things that I knew not. Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even to my cause, my God and my Lord—and my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness, and of thy praise, all the day long.'

—
 TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'The devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me,' Mat. iv. 8, 9.

How splendid must the vision have been which satan spread out before our Lord! Who could have gazed on it unmoved. He showed him all the gorgeousness of wealth, and all the magnificence of regal luxury, and all the pomp and circumstance of war, and, more captivating still to a noble spirit, all the pride of human wit and genius—and while his eye was feasting on the spectacle, he said, 'All these things will I give thee.'

Now, it is true, that the devil is called the 'prince of this world,' and that he is permitted to employ the vanities and honours of the world as baits, wherewith to lure his votaries to perdition. But to pretend that God has handed over absolutely to him the government of the world, that he may dispose of it as he pleases, is a vile and impudent falsehood.

'All these things will I give thee,' said he, 'if thou wilt fall down and worship me.'

It was an awful condition: and yet many, many, do not shrink from taking him at his word.

Nakedly and literally stated, indeed, all repudiate his proposal. We have heard in story of men who sold themselves to satan at a price—and after their bartered round of rioting had run, were caught down to hell. There were no such men. Were the devil to say to the proudest and most reckless sinner of the race, 'Come and enlist under my banner, and you shall have as much of wealth, and honour, and feasting as you like for a specified time, and then you shall take up your abode with me for ever;' at the offer the proudest and most reckless sinner would recoil in horror. Ah! but the tempter is too cunning to avow such conditions of entering into his service—and they are often accepted without a paction! As Esau sold his birth-right for a mess of pottage, how many a man barter away the peace of his eternity for a little, a very little portion of this world's good things! As the zeal of many a flaming patriot has been strangled by a ribbon—how many are there who sacrifice every hope of the inheritance of the saints, to the glittering bribes—the poor and worthless but glittering bribes—which pleasure or ambition holds out to them! Satan shows them the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them—he holds out to them the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life—and he says to them, 'fall down and worship me,' and they straightway fall down and worship him. It is well to remind all such fools that they are hearkening to a deceiver and a liar. He cannot give them even what he promises—and he is misleading them into ruin. It is not in his power even to bestow money on them; if he do so for a time, it will be taken away just when they most need it. He cannot give health to enjoy it—or one hour's longer life—or one moment's peace of mind. Ay, though he were faithful to his promise—though he performed exactly all which he engaged to do—still, still, these solemn words of scripture would apply: 'What shall it profit a man though he gain the whole world, if he lose his soul?'

Let us contemplate, in the temptation of Jesus, a most affecting instance of his humiliation. O! how revolting it must have been to his holy soul to have submitted to be dragged from place to place by the fiend, listening to his foul suggestions and blaspheming words!

Let us learn from the temptation of Jesus that it may be the lot of those whom God loves most to be severely tried. He was solicited to distrust and to renounce God—and is the disciple above his Master? There is nothing too bad for the wicked one to propose—or the carnal heart to conceive.

Let us contemplate, in the temptation of Christ, an example of complete and victorious virtue. We too have to contend not only against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Setting before us ever the conduct of the great Captain of our salvation, let us learn to resist the devil and he will flee from us.

Finally, let us extract from the temptation of Christ a lesson of consolation under our worst trials. Why was he tempted? Why? That he might have a fellow-feeling with us—that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in the house of his God. 'In that he suffered, being tempted, he is able also to succour them that are tempted.'

'To human weakness not severe
Is our High Priest above;
His heart o'erflows with tenderness,
His bowels melt with love.

'With sympathetic feelings touch'd
He knows our feeble frame;
He knows what sore temptations are,
For he has felt the same.'

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'And ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil,'
Gen. iii. 5

THE tempter attacked our first parents with consummate cunning. Step by step he advanced stealthily toward his purpose,—and did not discover it till he was sure of victory. And see how skilfully he adapted his temptation to the state in which they were placed. He did not offer them release from misery. Of any of its forms they had no experience: even in fancy they were utter strangers to it. He did not lure them with a picture of sensual enjoyment. In Eden's happy garden they wanted nothing; whatever could minister music to the ear, or beauty to the eye, or gratification to the palate, was theirs already in profusion. It was with intellectual good that he baited his hook. He promised them an enlargement of mental vision: he flattered them with the proud ambition of equaling Deity in knowledge and wisdom. 'In the day ye eat thereof'—was the fiendish bribe—'your eyes shall be opened—and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.' Alas, they fell into the snare so artfully laid—and so death came into the world, and all our woe! When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise—she took of the fruit thereof and did eat, and gave also unto her husband, and he did eat.'

And indeed, in a certain sense, satan's words literally held good. Like many ambiguous oracles of the heathen priesthood in later times, there is a lying equivocation in them. It did happen—that when Adam and Eve fell, they became as gods. Ah, but it was by renouncing the authority of the God of heaven, and becoming lords unto themselves! It did happen—that when Adam and Eve fell they knew good and evil. Ah, but it was by bitterly finding evil after forfeiting the good!

And in every age, too true it is, that the wicked one slays multitudes with the same weapon which proved so fatal of old!

Still he fills men's hearts with high thoughts and aspiring imaginations. Still he seduces them with the glittering vision of intellectual pre-eminence—and the affectation of liberality, and superior independence of soul. How many have fallen in the pride of knowledge and vain philosophy! How many have been entangled in error, and snared into scepticism and infidelity by trusting to their own hearts, and leaning on their own understandings! 'Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit—there is more hope of a fool than of him.' O far be from us all presumption of learning—all vain self-confidence! Far be from us the foolish spirit which leads so many witlings and sciolists, and sophists, to renounce the plain beaten track of truth in the wretched ambition of appearing wiser and cleverer than the herd! The most highly gifted are always the humblest. To know much is just to know how little can be known. The temper of true philosophy is ever meek, and gentle, and docile. With the simplicity of little children, it teaches us to sit down to the bible, and read, and believe.

Now just as satan tried the first, he tried the second Adam: having first conquered man he assailed Immanuel too, because he appeared in man's likeness.

Let us rejoice that Jesus was tempted in all things as we, yet without sin. He is the wisdom of God and the power of God—and well may we trust in him. Directed by his Spirit, and strengthened by his arm, we shall be conquerors, and more than conquerors over every foe.

Let us rejoice that Jesus was tempted in all things as we, yet without sin. Like him let us resist the devil, and he will flee from us. He is our enemy still: he goes to and fro over the earth, seeking whom he may devour. But he is a conquered enemy. Jesus defied and disarmed him; so may we if we believe in Jesus. Let us equip ourselves then for the combat; and if, as in the wilderness, he draw his artillery at any time from the word of God, let us be ready ever to answer the texts which he perverts by others more justly applied. O that grace were given us to stand fast in the faith—to quit us like men, and be strong! It is a quaint yet sage advice, 'If you would escape sin, parley not with temptation.' When an attempt is made to lure us, or laugh us, or frighten us into sin—and we know it manifestly to be sin—we may not stand and muse—we may not wait to argue with ourselves what course we ought to follow. Jesus turned round and cried, 'Get thee behind me, satan.' 'He that doubteth is damned if he eat:' so saith the apostle, in reference to eating without faith. And it too often happens that the man who is 'careful to answer in the matter'—the man who continues hesitating, and considering, and perplexing himself about an answer, when he is tempted to violate a plain precept, is sure to fall. The principles of the worldling bend to his convenience: they can neither stand against clamour nor favour, smile nor frown. The Christian has the words engraven on his heart, 'my righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go—though an host encamp against me I shall not fear.'

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in his cross,' Col. ii. 15.

ONE of the chief objects of Messiah's mission was to destroy the works of the devil. And this he consummated on the cross.

As by sin the power of the law was against us, so through sin the power of satan was over us. But when Jesus made atonement to the divine justice for sin, we were redeemed from the usurped dominion of hell. By being lifted up on the tree he fought and overcame all the powers of darkness—openly, publicly, he made a show of his victory over them, and put them to shame before the universe. And thus was verified the first promise, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.'

And who can fail to wonder at the strange way in which the Lord accomplished his mighty-work?

Other conquerors by all the pomp and pride of war achieve their victories, and win for themselves an undying name. But it was by ignominy and humiliation that Jesus was glorified: it was by weakness that he subdued the mighty: it was by suffering that he overcame. Yea, his very death it was that formed his crowning triumph? Satan the adversary thought that he had foiled him, and the world thought so too, when, in bitter agony, and amid scorn and shame, he expired on Calvary. But satan's seeming triumph was in truth an irrecoverable overthrow: the hour in which the powers of darkness were mightiest was the very hour in which they were subverted: when Jesus cried, 'It is finished,' and gave up the ghost, the kingdom of hell was shattered to its centre, and through all its abyss the howlings of defeat and despair rang.

And see how after Messiah ascended to heaven, and commissioned his messengers to go and preach the gospel of his kingdom, stronghold after stronghold of satan fell under them, and his poorest bond-slaves were set free.

Little aided by human learning, strangers to fame, or wealth, or power of men, sometimes hated, sometimes despised, sometimes persecuted unto the death—the humble, defenceless disciples went forth among unknown nations in the name of their crucified Master. Yet no conqueror ever triumphed as they. Though the truths they taught were bitter and unpalatable—though they proclaimed open and uncompromising war against what was dearest to the pride of nature—the proudest were humbled at their word, the vilest were reclaimed, the most inveterate foes were converted into friends and champions of their cause. Philosophy was baffled in her very citadels—the false god left his falling temple—the lying oracles were silenced—courts and governments followed in the train of conquest—kings of the earth brought in their glory and their honour to Jesus. Thus it was that in the magnificent language of prophecy, ‘the thirsty land became springs of water, the solitary place was gladdened, the desert blossomed as the rose.’ Thus it was that the principalities and powers of hell were spoiled, and made a show of openly. And what was the weapon which wrought so mighty a revolution as this? It was the cross of Christ—it was the preaching of Christ crucified. The history of the faith, the very history of the world—for ages—was but the history of the triumphs of the cross.

Ay, and still unto the end of time the words are true, ‘I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.’

There is nothing that can shake satan's kingdom in the heart of the sinner—nothing that can crush it in the world—save this. Discourse to the inveterate profligate of the beauty and utility of virtue, of the consistency of a good life with the nature of man and the place which he occupies in creation: tell him that even in this world a fearful portion of the wages of iniquity is sometimes paid down in the diseased frame, in the lothesome name, in blighted hopes and blasted faculties: tell him of an angry God, and of the awful immutable sanctions of his law: tell him of death, and judgment, and the penal fire, and the undying worm. Your terrors will only harden the man in obstinacy, or plunge him into despair. Ah! but let him be taught that Jesus, for the sake of sinful men, left the glories of his Father's house, and tabernacled on the earth a man of cares and sorrows, and submitted to the accursed death of the cross: let him be taught that the same Jesus whose tears in the days of his flesh fell over perishing Jerusalem, is even now from the right hand of the throne beseeching him to flee for refuge to the hope of the gospel: let him be taught that even to him, as to the worst and most reckless outcast, the invitations of love are sent, ‘Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die.—Look unto me, and be saved.—Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.—Let whosoever will, come.’ Let such truths as these be brought home to him by the grace of God, and there is no coldness, nor deadness, nor inveteracy of vice which they will not subdue. These are the truths which melt, and break, and penetrate, and enlighten, and reclaim. They arrest the worldling even amid the bustle of his cares, and the swellings of his tumultuous joys—they fall on the weary penitent as the dew on the mountains of Zion.

Blessed Jesus, by the power of thy cross let my heart be won unto thee, and every evil imagination in it and proud, cast down utterly! ‘I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.’

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

‘Resist the devil, and he will flee from you,’
James iv. 7.

THERE exist persons who think little of the warfare which believers are called to wage with the prince of darkness. There are persons who ridicule us when we speak of the activity and wiles of the great enemy of man, as if we spoke idle tales. And it is true that they dwell in peace—that they are not troubled with the watchings, and strugglings, and fightings of the Christian soldier. But why is this? It is because satan has taken up his dwelling in their hearts—and of course if they seek not to disturb him he will never care to disturb them. It matters not to him one jot that we deride his power, or deny his very existence, if we do his work! And yet what shouts of laughter must the story raise among the spirits of hell, that there are men on the earth—wise men, too, as they reckon themselves—led captive at the will of their chief, who denounce him a nonentity! If it be true, as the bible declares, that Jesus died to redeem men from death, it is not less true, for the same bible tells it, that there is a wicked one employing incessantly all the powers of a mighty yet malignant nature to keep men in death. ‘Be sober, be vigilant,’ saith Peter, ‘because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour.’ ‘You hath Jesus quickened,’ writes Paul to the Ephesian converts, ‘who were dead in trespasses and sins, wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience.’

Now we are taught that ‘if we resist the devil, he will flee from us.’ And how is he to be resisted? Simply and solely through Christ Jesus.

Let us see how the Captain of our salvation conquered—that after him we may fight too.

Thrice satan openly attacked the Lord—thrice the Lord replied to the tempter, 'It is written;' and thrice with a text of holy writ he repelled him.

And Jesus wielded this weapon in his warfare that we might wield it in ours. This is a weapon that has been forged in the armoury of heaven; it is of celestial proof and temper, and nothing may prevail against it. It is worthy of notice that all the other armour of the follower of the cross is defensive. His loins are girt about with truth—and his breastplate is righteousness—and his feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace—and faith is his shield—and the hope of salvation is his helmet. But the word of God is the sword of the Spirit—and with it must he go forth to the battle field—with it, despite all the confederacy of hell, he is sure of victory. Ay, but it must never be ungirt from his side! His enemies are many; they are strong and keen—and manifold are their wiles. Every step he is called to contest. The peace he may obtain on earth is but an 'armed truce.' It is only in heaven that there are no weapons of war needed. It is only in that holy mountain whither death leads the persevering pilgrim of faith, that there is nothing to hurt or destroy.

Let us ever then, and diligently, 'search the scriptures.'

Here will we find something to soothe in every sorrow—to animate in every difficulty—to solace under every disappointment—to strengthen and sustain in every temptation. Here will we find a word in season to the worldling—to the formalist—to the mourner in Zion—to the troubled in spirit—to the penitent—to the saint. In this page it speaks to the young with all the solemnity and sweetness of a father's voice—in that page, to the old and gray-headed, gilding and gladdening their decline. It is a light unto the feet, and a lamp unto the path; the way-faring man, though a fool, shall not err therein.

And along with the diligent reading of the word, that we may stand in the evil day, let us unite earnest and fervent prayer.

Thus we will be best prepared either for active conflict, or patient endurance, or persevering service in the cause of truth. When we awake, ere we enter the busy perilous scene, we may not forget to bless the God who has preserved us during the watches of the night, and mercifully prolonged our time of visitation; we may not forget to implore that he would still continue to guide us and protect us, to prosper our honest industry, to shelter us from mishap, to fortify us against temptation. And when the lengthening shadows summon us to repose, it were surely meet to confess the manifold sins of the day, and to entreat forgiveness through the blood of Jesus; it were surely meet to commend ourselves to him who never slumbers, under whose pavilion alone is quiet rest found. Delays, and difficulties, and discouragements, and disappointments may come—trials hard to bear—conflicts from which the Christian has often to retire foiled, or discomfited. But Jesus spake a parable to this end, that men should pray always and not faint. We are called to go on wrestling—to persevere in patient waiting upon God. And the promise of Him who cannot lie is ours, that at some time or other, in some way or other, though not in our time, nor in our way, an answer will be sent. There is not, on record, a single petition offered up in faith and rejected. Neither since the world began do we read of a single prayerless sinner that was saved. O that God would impress on us his own words, 'Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation.'

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'
Matt. xxvii. 46.

THESE words were quoted from the xxxiii Psalm—which contains many direct references to Messiah. And indeed they are strange words. Who can explain—who can comprehend them?

Could it be that the divine nature of the Saviour deserted for a time his human nature, and left it helpless? This would have taken away from his obedience unto death all its virtue as an atonement;—for how could the obedience of a mere man in the room of men have in ought propitiated eternal justice? It was not certainly his Godhead which was agonized—but it was from its union with Godhead that the agonies of his humanity were meritorious. We confide in his sacrifice—because we see united in him, as the surety for sinners, the nature that owed the debt and the nature that could pay it to the uttermost—the nature that could suffer and the nature that could give to these sufferings an infinite value.

Could it be that the dying Jesus ceased to be dear to his Father in heaven? O no! The love of the Father was inseparable from his Elect—and never, never was he so intensely the object of that love as when he hung on the cross of Calvary. 'Therefore doth my Father love me,' were his own words in the prospect of dissolution, 'because I lay down my life that I might take it again.'

Why then did the Lord utter that mysterious cry? It was because the wrath of God was resting on him as the Saviour of men. It was the cry of him who was 'wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities.' As his Son, his only-begotten Son, the soul of Jehovah ever delighted in him—but as the surety of sinners, bearing a load of imputed sin, it pleased Jehovah to smite him, and bruise him, and put him to grief—yea, to cause him to feel in all its bitterness what it was to be 'made a curse' for the accursed.

And who may estimate the anguish which he bore then! All the powers of darkness were assailing him in the fury of despair—cruel men and godless were heaping scorn, and insult, and blasphemy on his head—his frame was racking with excruciating pain—a weight of guilt, inexpressible, inconceivable, sufficient to have weighed down the world to hell, was on his soul:—and in the midst of all this he was not only without consolation, but actually forsaken, abandoned of his Father in heaven! These scriptures faintly represent his feelings: 'Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps—thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves.' 'Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion—I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint—my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels.' And yet how meekly did the Saviour suffer! The question, 'Why hast thou forsaken me?' only expresses in the most emphatic way possible, the intensity of what he endured. And see how he manifests his unshaken confidence in God! Even under the hiding of his face, he still addresses him as his God, 'My God, my God!'

The lessons which this subject teaches no one can misapprehend.

1. Let me adore the wondrous love of my Redeemer. How can I survey ever so carelessly the woe to which it subjected him, without weeping over the weakness of my faith, and the coldness of my zeal in his service?

2. How dreadful a thing it must be to be eternally forsaken of God! Jesus—the gentle, patient Jesus—who uttered not a murmur when the fury of his enemies was fiercest—who opened not his mouth amid shame and cursing—cried out in agony when his Father even for one short hour took from him a sense of his presence. Who then can lie down with the outcast in hell?

3. Ay, and like as Jesus suffered, let not his followers complain though they suffer too. God sometimes hides his face from his saints in his anger; the sun goes down on them in their way to Immanuel's land; they cannot sing Zion's songs by the rivers of Babel; they smite upon their breasts and dare not look upwards. The promises of the bible cannot soothe them—its denunciations are cutting as a sharp two-edged sword: their bitter prayer is, as they wander on without a guide, almost without hope, 'How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord—will the Lord cast off for ever, and will he be favourable no more? Is his mercy clean gone—doth his promise fail for evermore?' Ah! but Jehovah hides often his love under a frowning face. Better far is their worst sorrow than the mirth of the men of the world. He visits them thus to convince them that there must be a difference between the peace of their pilgrimage and the peace of their eternal rest. Let us never forget that it is sin which causes the Lord to depart from us—and that if we confess the sin, and deplore it, and forsake it, he has pledged his truth to return. Wherefore let us be jealous over ourselves with a godly jealousy, and search out the cause of the Lord's controversy with us. While there be many that say, 'Who will show us any good?' let this be our heart's desire—our fervent and constant prayer, 'Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.'

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?'
Rom. viii. 35.

It was love to men that brought down the Lord Jesus from heaven—it was in love that he tabernacled on the earth, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief—it was in love that he went about continually doing good. Who can forget the kindly sympathy which he manifested so often towards human misery wherever he met it? See him touched with compassion for the childless widow of Nain, and weeping with the weeping sisters by their brother's grave. See him speaking celestial consolations to yonder woman who was a sinner, as she lay in contrition at his feet. See him on the height of Olives surveying impenitent Jerusalem, and in the prospect of its impending doom, mourning over it. See him on the night in which he was betrayed forgetting his own sorrows, and making provision in the sacrament of the supper for the future consolation of his disciples in every age, amid the temptations of life. See him turning to poor fallen Peter, and subduing him with a look of love. See him on his way to Calvary meeting the weeping women and saying to them, 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me.' But it was towards those for whom he suffered—it was on the cross—that the love of Jesus was emphatically exhibited. Behold the Lamb of God bleeding, groaning, dying! Why that marred form, and scarred visage? Whence those wounds? Why that cry of agony? Why that streaming blood down his sacred frame? It was FOR US; in love to us who believe in him it was all. He bore all and more, infinitely more, than human eye saw, or human tongue can tell, because there was in his heart a love to us which many waters could not quench, nor floods drown. 'Scarcely for a righteous man will one die—peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die—but God hath commended his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us!' From that cross suspended, Jesus the Lord is looking down—and in that look there is love unconquerable, irresistible—its language is, 'Son, daughter, I died for thee, give me thy heart.' And can we look unmoved; unmoved can we listen to such an appeal? Will there be no response from us—not one of us to echo back the sound? Will it be suffered to waste itself away as over a land of graves? God forbid!

The manifold obstacles which lay in the way of the flowing forth of Christ's love on men, served but to endear him to us the more. In despite of our apathy it was kindled within him—our guilt did not avert it—our ingratitude could not extinguish it—our misery in life and death only drew forth its tenderness—the agonies which it prompted him to endure in our room, only demonstrate before the universe its intensity and its strength. O the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of Christ: it passeth knowledge.

Ay, and this love is enduring as it is strong! Who shall separate us from it? Shall tribulations, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Can death, or life, or angels, or principalities, or powers, or things present, or things to come? O no. In all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; he loves his people with an everlasting love; having loved his own, he loves them to the end. The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but his kindness shall not depart from us, neither shall the covenant of his peace be removed.

Let none of us then fear who believe in Christ crucified—none of us whom Jesus loves! Are we afflicted? He chastens his people in mercy—in all their afflictions he is afflicted. Are we in danger of falling into temptations? 'My grace, saith the Lord, will be sufficient for thee—as thy day so will thy strength be.' Do enemies many and strong compass us about. Unto our God the shields of the earth belong—greater is he that is for us than all that can be against us—he who hath delivered and doth deliver will yet deliver. Do we recoil from the thoughts of death, and of that dark world into which death will carry us? Jesus is the rod and staff of his people, as they tread the valley of shadows—in the midst of it, to the eye of faith, he causes green pastures to rise—beyond it, under the light of his countenance, we see the Father's house whither he has gone to prepare a place for us. And let no one suspect, that amid the glories of his mediatorial sway he may forget even the poorest and meanest for whom he died. Just as he was of old is he now, with a heart as tender, and a love as strong. The grace and tenderness which shone so sweetly on Calvary, still form the fairest jewels in his crown. Zion said in her despondency, 'The Lord has forsaken me; and my Lord hath forgotten me.' But what was the reply of heaven: 'Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, she may forget; yet will I not forget thee.'

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly,' Luke xxii. 44.

So deep—so intense was the mental anguish of the Redeemer in the garden of Gethsemane, that 'his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground!'

And why was he so agonized? It could not be from fear of dying. This were to arraign his fortitude, and to degrade him below the level of many of his own martyred followers, who endured without a groan much more lingering tortures in the dungeon and at the stake. It could not be from the ingratitude and opposition of the world. From the very first it was his enemy: he cared little for its smile or frown. It could not be from the desertion and treachery of his chosen friends. He knew well long before that this would take place—he predicted it—he forewarned them of it. It could not be from the humiliation of crucifixion with the brand of a criminal on his head. Though it was the meanest and most ignominious of deaths, he despised the shame of it in the prospect of his mediatorial crown: it was a small thing to him to be judged of men's judgment. O it could not be because a guilty conscience was torturing him on the eve of dissolution! His meat and drink, all his life long, was to do the will of his Father in heaven; he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. Neither could it be because he feared the beyond—the dark unknown eternity which fills so many poor dying souls with horrors. 'My Father loveth me,' he cried, 'because I lay down my life that I might take it up again.'

Whence then that mysterious anguish? He was agonized as the surety for sinners. The hand of the Lord, the Judge and Avenger, was upon him then as the Redeemer of a lost world: it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief for us. He saw the immensity of guilt—heaped up to the heavens—which he had undertaken to expiate; he saw the terrible vengeance which this guilt deserved and demanded; he heard the cry of eternal justice, 'Pay me that thou owest;' and then, while the wrath of God entered his soul and oppressed him with its weight beyond all conception of men, satan let loose on him his fiercest fury, and drove him almost into despair. It was a terrible hour—the hour and power of darkness. 'All that was hateful in sin, and all that was fearful in avenging justice, and all that was horrible in satanic malice, were combined to put to the test his uttermost power of endurance.'

And to what refuge did he betake himself in his extremity? To prayer—to importunate prayer. These are touching words, 'being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly.' Would that all of us were convinced that this is the best—and the only refuge in the evil hour! The bitterer the cup which we have to drink—the more darkly our troubles swell and thicken around us—after the example of Jesus, the more fervent ought our supplications to be. 'Is any among you afflicted?—let him pray,' saith the scripture. Prayer moves the hand that moves the universe. This is an eternal promise, and the truth of heaven is pledged to it, 'Ye shall seek me, and find me, when you shall search for me with all your heart.'

1. If God spared not his own Son, will he pass by the rebel and the alien? It cannot be. If God poured out the full vials of his wrath on Him whom he loved so well, how may I expect to be miserable on my deathbed and throughout a long eternity, who have for years and years been living at enmity with him! God help me or I perish!

2. Jesus had no sins of his own. The load he bore was a load of imputed guilt; and yet it was so grievous as almost to weigh him down to hell. O if the imputation was so intolerable—what must the burden of actual guilt be! If I have no part with Christ, how shall I be able to stand the stings of an awakened conscience, and the terrors of the law arrayed against me, and the arrows of the Almighty within me! My God, my God, leave me not alone to such misery. O that I may win Christ and be found in him, having my iniquities laid to his account, and his merits to mine!

3. How sad it is to think that Jesus, who loved us so dearly, and endured for us such anguish of soul, is so neglected on the earth which he came to redeem! Can it be that that gracious One—who spent such a terrible night of old in Gethsemane, tortured and rent, forsaken so of God, and beset so bitterly of the devil, because he bore our iniquities on his own head—is the same Jesus to whose words many are lending a deaf ear, of whose gospel many are ashamed, of whose salvation many never think or speak, in whose name so few pray and plead at the footstool of the throne of grace! Alas, alas, it is too true! And yet, methinks, the angels who came to minister to him in his agony will scarcely credit it—the very devils of hell cannot hear of it without wonder! 'Good Lord, cast me not away from thy presence—take not thy Holy Spirit from me.'

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Thou, which hast showed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth,' Psal. lxxi. 20.

THE people of God cannot claim exemption from the ills of human life. They are exposed to the same dangers, and subject to the same privations as other men. Often do they mourn blighted hopes and lowering fortune; often on the bed of languishing they pine away weary days and nights of pain; often are they called to stand round the death-beds of dearest friends, and to build their tombs, and weep over them. Ah! but this is their consolation: 'If ye endure chatening, God dealeth with you as with sons—for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not.' In all their afflictions their Saviour is afflicted—with all he sympathises—out of all, in his own good time and way, he has promised to deliver them.

Let us consider how the sorest trials, by the grace of God, are made to work together for our good.

We might say that affliction tends to moderate our attachment to the things of time. Under it the world loses its hold on our hearts—we lift our eyes upwards, and seek in heaven surer and more enduring treasures than earth can give. We might say that it is in the school of affliction that many of the fairest graces of the Christian character are taught and fostered. There best we learn patience, and fortitude, and humility, and sympathy with the woes of each other. We might say that affliction is often a means of awakening into fervour the spirit of prayer, and bringing down in more plentiful effusion the grace of God. There are few, even of the most hardened and reckless men, who, in the hour of severe trials, are not brought down upon their knees. 'As thy day,' saith the scripture, 'so shall thy strength be.' The more I am troubled, the more I feel my own weakness—the deeper the conviction of my own weakness, the more earnestly am I constrained to seek the divine assistance—and the more I seek and need, the more I find. Wherefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake, for when I am weak then am I strong. We might say that affliction helps us to see, in their fullest beauty, the promises and consolations of the gospel. O! it is not till the hour of hard things comes that we truly feel the value of faith! When the world has cast us off, and friends are weeping around us, and eternity is opening before us, the most careless of us all will be compelled to confess that there is one thing needful—that a poor, distressed, dying sinner needs comfort, and that nothing can smooth the pillow of death like the hope of eternal life through Christ crucified. How happy the man who under the shinings of heaven's countenance, however bitter be the cup that is given him to drink, can take up the scripture—'Though heart and flesh fail, God is the strength of my heart, and portion for ever!' Might we not add, also, that it is through affliction we learn most nearly to be conformed to the image of Jesus our Saviour. He was emphatically a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. And how can we resemble him more than when we take up his cross—when, in calm and cordial submission to trouble, we say with him, 'Lord, not our will, but thine be done?'

O! whether I look to earth or heaven, I find abundant proof of the truth, 'it is good to be afflicted.'

Who are those so meek and so gentle amid the world's buffetings—patient of evil and of provocation—on whose wrath, or fretfulness, or discontent the sun never descends? These are they whom affliction has taught to hope, and quietly to wait for the salvation of their God. Who are those that never quail in the day of danger—fearless and foremost in the battles of the faith—cleaving to their Master most when the world frowns on him? These are they who have been trained to independence in the school of affliction—unto whom it has been given in behalf of Christ, not only to believe in his name, but also to suffer for his sake. Who are those humble contrite ones—of the chastened spirit, weaned utterly from vain glory, and from pride? These are they whom affliction has tutored in self-knowledge—who have looked inwards, and felt and confessed that they suffered far less than they deserved. Who are those whose tear ever starts forth at the tale of woe—they of the kindly and affectionate heart, with feet ever swift to run on the errand of mercy, with hands open as day to melting charity? These are they who have known well grief themselves, and care, and penury—who have wept by a mother's or sister's grave. Yea, who are those spirits in paradise, arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. O not till I join their happy choirs will I fully appropriate the words, 'Thou which hast showed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and bring me from the depths of the earth.'

---

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him,' John xix. 15.

It was the foolish fancy of an old moralist, that the very sight of a perfect man would charm the world into virtue. The fate of Jesus Christ on the earth has dissipated the delusion for ever. He was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners; he went about continually doing good; his meat and drink it was to do the will of his Father in heaven; and yet he was despised, and reviled, and scourged, and murdered. These are terrible words, 'The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified his Son Jesus, whom ye delivered up in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go. But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you, and killed the Prince of life.' Alas! there is no beauty in holiness to attract the carnal eye. Still, as of old, the judgment of the men of the world is blind and perverse; they hate the truth and persecute it.

'Away with him, away with him'—cried the Jews. O how shall the authors of that mad cry stand before the Lord the Judge! My soul enter not thou into their secrets; unto their assembly mine honour be not thou united. And yet let me not forget my own guilt in theirs. By my ingratitude and disobedience, by my rejection of the gospel offers, and my grieving, and vexing, and quenching the Spirit of Christ, have not I joined often in their cry? O Lord God, thou knowest! Lord, have mercy upon me. Deliver me from the fate of those who crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.

'Away with him, away with him, crucify him,'—cried the Jews. The wild cry was obeyed. Jesus was led away as a lamb to the slaughter—and on the tree of Calvary he died. Let me think of the bitterness of that death. How agonizing must have been the tearing and piercing of his hands and feet, as the iron spikes were driven through them! Let me think of the lingering torture of that death. For at least six hours he hung suspended, ere his frame was exhausted and the travail of his soul done. Let me think of the shame of that death. It was a punishment to which only the vilest criminals and slaves were subjected; yea, by the law of God it was held accursed! Blessed Jesus, all that humiliation—all the slow wasting agony of the cross thou didst endure without a murmur for me, that I might believe and live. For my sake thou wast made 'a curse,' that I might inherit the blessing: for me thou wast 'made sin'—for me the wrath of an angry God entered thy soul, that I might be forgiven and saved.

O the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of Jesus! It transcends all thought—it passeth knowledge. It was love that brought down Immanuel from glory—it was love that sustained his spirit amid the pains of Calvary—engraven on his person, engraven on his life, engraven indelibly on his death are the words,

'Love to sinners of men.' In the gospel scheme there is indeed wisdom infinite—far more gloriously manifested than in all the wondrous harmonies and adaptations of nature; but it was love that prompted that wisdom to devise good things for sinners. In the gospel scheme there is indeed eternal and immutable justice—more strikingly vindicated far than it could have been by the damnation of every single soul which had ever transgressed the law; but it was love that turned away the sword of avenging justice from the sinner, and caused it to fall with all its weight on the Surety. In the gospel scheme there is indeed omnipotent power—ay, and far more majestically exercised than it ever has been in the thunder, and the earthquake, and the hurricane; but without love that power would have been employed to destroy not to save. O the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of Christ Jesus! If I forget thee, my crucified Lord, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth—let my right hand forget its cunning.

'Crucify him, crucify him,'—cried the Jews. And behold the man!—behold the Lamb of God bleeding, groaning, dying! Ah! to the stubborn, to the hard-hearted, to the unbelieving and impenitent man, there is no more terrible spectacle than that in God's universe! Is it possible to look to it, and to consider ever so lightly what it behoved Jesus to suffer ere he could make atonement to the divine justice for sin, without trembling over the words, 'Our God is a consuming fire.' If these things were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? The long, deep silence of ages shall again be broken by another communication from heaven. That same crucified one shall descend again in like manner as he ascended; and all who are not drawn to his cross shall be driven to his judgment-seat. 'Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him.' And then when the stars fall down from heaven, and the moon becomes as blood, and the angels of God range their glittering lists along a burning world—when the great white throne is set up, and the books are opened, and the eternal doom is to be read—neither wealth, nor power, nor knowledge—neither name, nor vow, nor keenest prayer will avail—nothing, nothing, save an interest in the death of the Son of Mary. O Lord, even now at the foot of thy cross give me grace to kneel and cry, 'My Lord and my God.'

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors,' Isa. liii. 12.

ON one occasion a curious disciple put the question to Christ, 'Lord, are there many that be saved?' But Christ, in reply, bade the man look to himself: 'Enter ye in at the strait gate, for many shall seek to enter in and shall not be able.' Secret things belong unto God—and he has not chosen to reveal the number of his elect. But we know that when they are all gathered in, they will form a goodly company. They are spoken of in the scriptures as a 'multitude which no man can number.'

Now, as the Redeemer bare the sins of every one on his own body on the tree, for every one also he intercedes in paradise. 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.' There is no more precious truth in the word than this. Many a fainting heart has it cheered—many a weary and heavy laden penitent has it restored to peace and joy. In the far distant heavens—the temple unseen, not made with hands—there is one pleading for me, who am but dust and ashes. He bears my name upon his breastplate, he takes my prayers and presents them mingled with much incense on the golden altar before the throne. He had, indeed, no taint of sin—yet was he, while upon earth, compassed about with infirmities, and he can be touched with mine. 'Though he knew not what it was to fall, he knew well what it was to struggle and to fight.' He can sympathise with me in poverty, and sorrow, and sickness; he can sympathise with me amid all the scorn, and hatred, and persecution of the world; he can sympathise with me in the anguish and perplexity of my innermost spirit; he can sympathise with me under the worst temptations of satan; he can sympathise with me amid the gathering shadows of the dark valley; he can sympathise with me even under the hidings of my God's face. All these things himself felt—and in all he has a fellow-feeling with me. Ay, and whereas the sons of Aaron's race were not suffered to continue by reason of death, this Man hath an unchangeable priesthood—he liveth for ever.'

O! who can fail to rejoice over the blessed words: 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous!'

The qualifications of Jesus for this office who will dispute? His intercession is founded on righteousness; it is the intercession of one who has purchased whatever he seeks, and has a right to it. As a just God, Jehovah cannot refuse a single one of the blessings which he pleads from him for his people—for he died to procure them, and eternal truth is pledged to dispense them as the fruits of his death. Our advocate is the Son of God—his well-beloved Son—his only begotten Son; on his vesture and his thigh the name is written, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Our advocate is the Son of man—and just as he was of old is he still, with a heart as tender, and a love as strong; in that he suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted. O! no one poor sinner ever confided in him in vain! How came those spirits to heaven? All, all committed their cause to his keeping—and through his advocacy they won their places by the throne.

And for what does the Lord Jesus intercede?

He pleads that we may be preserved from evil and temptation. 'I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil.'

He pleads for the persevering sanctification of his people. 'Holy Father, keep through thine own truth those whom thou hast given me—Lord, sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth.'

He pleads for the union of his people in peace and charity. 'Neither pray I for these alone—but for them which believe in me through their word, that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee, that they all may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.' O! if there are any who care not for a torn, and mangled, and bleeding church—any who care not for the miserable spectacle which their jealousies and divisions, as Christians, exhibit to the world—surely this voice of the Mediator within the veil might touch them!

Finally, Jesus pleads for the eternal blessedness of all his people in heaven. These are the very words of his intercession, and at this moment they are ascending in sweet memorial before the throne. 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory.' Let none fret therefore, let none despond at the death of the saints. Their death was but the answer to the prayers of Immanuel; he desired their presence in heaven; and he sent his angels to conduct them to the place which himself had gone before to prepare.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required,' Luke xxiii. 24.

WE must have pronounced the guilt of Pilate very great, though the person brought before him had been undistinguished in any respect from the many thousands of Israel. Pilate had been sent into this province by the Roman emperor, and by a law written by the finger of God even on the heathen heart, he could not but know, that as judge, he was bound to act with the strictest justice. How sinful then was his conduct, when it appears that he was thoroughly convinced that this person whom he condemned was perfectly innocent! Expressly is it recorded by more than one evangelist, that 'he knew that for envy they had delivered him;' and his own explicit declaration was, 'Behold I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him.' How base and infamous was it then after this, to give him into the hands of those who were thirsting for his blood. His guilt was increased by his having had a preternatural warning. When he was set down on his judgment-seat, his wife sent to him, saying, 'Have thou nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream, because of him.' The meek yet noble bearing of the prisoner had already inspired him with awe; and hearing that he had declared himself to be the Son of God, he became more afraid to condemn him. But the Jews knew how to assail him, and they cried, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend; whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar.' Knowing the malice of those who importuned him, and dreading the wrath of an earthly prince more than HIS by whom princes reign, he meanly and wickedly 'gave sentence that it should be as they required.' 'And he released unto them Barabbas, who, for sedition and murder, was cast into prison; and when he had scourged Jesus, he delivered him to be crucified.'

Still greater, however, was the guilt of the Jews. They were 'Israelites, to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises.' The coming of Christ, to be a light to the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel, was the most precious promise of God to their nation. And though, when he came, 'he grew up,' as had been predicted, 'as a tender plant, as a root out of a dry ground;' yet, in the midst of his humiliation, there were sufficient proofs of his heavenly origin. His birth, which had been foretold by the angel Gabriel to the virgin mother, was celebrated by a multitude of the heavenly host. At his baptism, and on the mount of transfiguration, was the voice from heaven heard, saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased.' The holiness of his life, and the wisdom, purity, and sublimity of his doctrine confirmed by countless miracles, gave the strongest possible proof that he was indeed the Son of God.

Had he been a noisy demagogue, promising them victory, and riches, and political power, the people in general would have followed him. Had he been of lax morality, and ready to wink at hypocrisy, oppression, and worldly-mindedness, the world would have loved its own, and he would have been welcomed by many. But because he was meek and lowly, and came to establish a spiritual kingdom, and to wean his followers from the present world, and to render them meet for the heavenly inheritance, he was rejected and despised by those whom he sought to enlighten and sanctify. Because he was not only holy himself, but inculcated the necessity of holiness; because he rebuked pride, and hypocrisy, and worldly-mindedness, the scribes and Pharisees hated him, and sought to destroy him. In seeking his destruction they sinned against far clearer light than did Pilate the heathen governor. And because they hated this light, when Pilate, unprincipled though he was, sought to deliver him, being full of envy, they became the more inveterate, and cried, 'Away with him, away with him, crucify him, crucify him.' And they did crucify him with two malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

Great was the guilt of Pilate, and of the unbelieving Jews, but what must we think of ourselves if we neglect this Saviour? How aggravated must be our guilt, who have had much clearer light, and who have not had the same prejudices to contend with! How great have been our advantages! What could the Lord have done for us that he hath not done? And what returns have we made? Are we living in his service, or are we in a state of rebellion against our sovereign Lord and bountiful Benefactor? Were we to say to the unrenewed man, 'Do you hate Christ?' unless he were a thorough infidel, he would regard the question as an insult; and yet his mind is enmity against God. Do you restrain prayer? Do you forsake, or nearly forsake, his ordinances? Do you hate those who are remarkable for their piety? Are you disposed to sneer at them, and to listen with pleasure to anything which you think renders their sincerity questionable? If you hate his ordinances, you have much reason to fear that you hate the God of ordinances. If you hate the members of Christ's mystical body, you cannot but hate Christ the living Head.

But, O my soul, is it enough that thou shouldst be able to say, I do not hate Christ? Art thou satisfied with the mere absence of hostility? Do not deceive thyself: for if this be the case, thou dost hate him. At the best thou canst but rank among the lukewarm, whom 'he will spue out of his mouth.' Has he not said, 'He who is not for me is against me, and he who gathereth not with me scattereth abroad.' O Holy Spirit, breathe on my cold heart, and inspire devout affections, if not already communicated; and fan the spark of heavenly love if already kindled; that it may mount up into a brightening flame. Stir up all that is within me to praise and magnify thy holy name; and, in the spirit of heaven-born love, may I be able to say, 'My Beloved is mine, and I am his;' 'he is the chief among ten thousands, and altogether lovely.'

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ,' Rom. xiv. 10.

JESUS died, and rose, and ascended; and he whom the heavens have received is to come again in glory; he who was unjustly judged is to be the sovereign Judge of all who have ever lived; 'for we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.'

There is something solemn in standing even before an earthly tribunal. If we were taken from our solitary cell, and had every eye in the crowded judgment-hall fixed on us;—when life or death, honour or infamy, would be the result of the trial, as it drew towards a close would not our feelings be wound up to the highest pitch? How much more awful, however, to stand before a heavenly tribunal; to be judged by him whose servants are glorious seraphs, whose ministers are a flame of fire, whose chariots are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, whose voice can shake the heavens, and 'who will by no means clear the guilty!'

But who is this Judge? It is Christ the Son of God. How august the Judge! How sublime what is written by him who, in prophetic vision, beheld the judgment! 'And I saw a great white throne, and him who sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heavens fled away, and there was no place for them.' He is to come with all the glory of the Father and the holy angels; and he will judge righteous judgment, for he cannot be awed, he cannot be bribed, he cannot be deceived; and his decision is final, there is no appeal.

And who are to be judged? All; 'we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.' At the sound of the last trumpet the dead shall arise; they who are alive shall be changed, and all shall come to the judgment. Behold this vast assembly! 'Who are they arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? These are they who have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God;' therefore do they shine as the stars in the firmament; therefore they who had once lain among the pots, are now as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold; while in their song of praise they with rapture say, 'Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.'

But are glory, and honour, and immortality to be bestowed on all? Where at that great day shall the sinner and the ungodly appear? Not with that happy throng on the right hand of the throne, who, with beaming countenances and enraptured hearts, are crying out, 'Alleluia, alleluia;' but with that trembling crowd on the left hand of the throne, about to hear that dreadful and irreversible sentence, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' In vain do they cry to the mountains and the rocks to hide them; the elements melt with fervent heat, and the mountains and rocks have perished in the flame. The great day of his wrath is come, and who of them is able to stand!

How wonderful that the certainty of such events as death and judgment should not more deeply affect the hearts and lives of the children of men! 'All men think all men mortal but themselves.' How apt are we to forget that we, as well as others, shall appear before his judgment-seat; that every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him, and shall wail for their aggravated sins!

Should we forget that there is an event fast coming which brings us individually to judgment? That event cannot be far distant, for here we cannot abide long. Every thing around us is subject to decay. The flowers bloom and wither; the verdant foliage of the forest soon shrivels, and by the first rude blast is strewed on the ground. Man, the child of mortality, withers as the green herb. With his first breath he inhales a poison, which continues to rankle till it brings the goodly fabric to the grave. Friends and neighbours die; and God is saying to us by their departure, 'Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return.' 'Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.' Should not we each say, Art thou ready, O my soul? Art thou prepared to meet thy God? Hast thou fled to the only refuge? Hast thou laid hold of the horns of the altar? Hast thou cast thyself at the feet of the great High Priest? Hast thou sought pardon through the covenanted mercy of God? Hast thou applied to the blood of sprinkling? Hast thou washed in the fountain opened? Hast thou been renewed and sanctified by the Holy Spirit? And art thou living by the faith of the Son of God? If we can give no satisfactory answer to such questions; and if we have reason to fear that we are yet in our sins, would it not be the height of madness to continue in this perilous state, suspended by a frail thread over the dread abyss, when next moment it may be snapt asunder? Should we not with prayers, and tears, and groanings that cannot be uttered, implore mercy to pardon and grace to help? If, on the contrary, we think that we have passed from death to life, and that there has been an outpouring of grace on our souls;—then let us remember that grace is not shed abroad in the heart that it may remain dormant, but that it may stir us up to live more and more to the praise and glory of God. That if we are Christians, then are we the lights of the world; the salt of the earth; the good leaven to leaven the lump. 'Whatever our hand findeth to do, let us do it with our might;' 'for the night cometh when no man can work;' 'and after death, the judgment.'

—
 TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head,' Matt. xxvii. 29.

How bitter were the ingredients mingled in that cup which the Redeemer drank for the guilty sons of men! Jews and Gentiles combined in loading him with ignominy and insult. Pilate, though he declared that he found no fault in him, commanded him to be cruelly scourged; and it was scarcely a palliation that he did it to gratify the hatred of the Jews, and to move them to pity; for he was thus setting them an example of injustice and cruelty which they were too much disposed to follow. Accordingly when he brought him forth, and set him before them, and said, 'Behold the man!' their relentless cry was, 'crucify him, crucify him.'

Not less cruel was the conduct of the soldiers, unto whom, when he was scourged and condemned, he was delivered. Though bleeding from the cruel scourging, to which, though innocent, he had been subjected, their rugged hearts were not softened. Scourging was both a painful, and an ignominious punishment. It dwelt upon the Saviour's mind; for in foretelling his last sufferings he always mentions the scourging to his disciples. We may learn the severity with which it was executed from the prophetic words of scripture, 'the plowers plowed upon my back; they made long their furrows.' Unmoved by his meekness, or by his unmerited sufferings, the ruffian soldiers, with wanton and deliberate cruelty, sought to add to the sufferings of his body, and of his mind. They stripped him, and put on him a scarlet robe. 'And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it on his head, and a reed in his right hand; and they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, king of the Jews! And they spat upon him, and took the reed, and smote him on the head. And after they had mocked him, they led him away to crucify him.' With what studied contempt and cruelty was he treated! The crown, we doubt not, was intentionally of thorns, that its spikes might pierce his temples, when they pressed it on his head. These soldiers were the subjects of a state in which honorary crowns were often bestowed as the reward of some distinguished action, such as the saving of the life of a Roman citizen, or being the first to scale the walls of an enemy's city. How glorious the crown which He deserved to wear, whom they insultingly crowned in cruel mockery! He came to pull down the strongholds of Satan; and he will lay the loftiest of them at last in the dust. He was engaged in a work which was to save the life, not of one, but of many; of a multitude whom no man can number, whom he is to rescue from misery, to raise from earth to heaven, and to crown with eternal blessedness. How resplendent the crown he now wears! 'We see Jesus,' saith the apostle, 'who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour.' 'For the joy that was set before him, he endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.'

In contemplating such heinous wickedness, can we fail to be struck with the wonderful forbearance of God? The Jews had been highly favoured by him of old, and often had they tried his long-suffering. He had sent to them his servants the prophets; but they beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. Last of all he sent to them his Son, saying, 'They will reverence my Son.' But in the language of the parable, 'when they saw his son, they said among themselves, This is the heir, come, let us kill him, and let us seize on the inheritance; and they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him.' What forbearance was it that he did not instantly miserably destroy these cruel murderers!

But let us consider how often we ourselves have tried his long-suffering. He has raised from the dead this crucified Redeemer, and has exalted him to be a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins. And yet, are there not thousands in a land of light who are not only unthankful, but with all the malice and hatred of the Jews, 'set themselves against the Lord and his Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast their cords from us?' Though God may for a time spare, is he not saying to every one who acts thus impiously, 'Despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But, after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.'

And should we not, from the patience and forbearance of the Son of God, learn patience and humility in the day of trial? 'He was despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from him: he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter; and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.' When visited with unmerited reproach or injury, let us look unto Jesus, and learn patience and humility. 'Forasmuch as Christ has suffered for us in the flesh, let us arm ourselves likewise with the same mind.' 'For even hereunto were we called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps; who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again, but committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously.' Let us 'consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be wearied, and faint in our minds.' Let us 'humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt us in due time; casting all our care on him, for he careth for us.' 'If we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him.' If we seek to bear up under the trials of life in such a manner as shall redound to the glory of God, then the God of all grace, after we have suffered a while, will call us to his kingdom and glory, and will bestow on us that crown of righteousness which fadeth not away. Let us put on then as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercy, kindness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake has forgiven us. Let us seek so to live that when the end of our warfare is near, we may, like the apostle, say, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.'

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life,' Rev. ii. 10.

THIS exhortation is given by the first, and the last, and the living One, to those who had already shown themselves faithful in his service. Neither the exhortation nor the promise were intended to be limited to the saints at Smyrna; but may be considered as addressed to believers in every age. 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.' We are left in no doubt as to the person giving this exhortation to be faithful; for who could give a crown of life but the Son of the Eternal, who alone could say, 'I am the first and the last, I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death?' And what is it to be faithful? Would we be faithful were we to be ashamed of him in the company of the ungodly? Would we be faithful were we to put our hand to the plough, and then to turn back? Would we be faithful were the dread of suffering to induce us to deny him, and to swerve from the path of duty? Would we be faithful to him as the Captain of our salvation, were we to hold treacherous communication with those of the enemy's camp? Would we be faithful were we to spend in idleness, or folly, or riot, the time he has challenged as his own? Would we be faithful were we to spend the talents he has committed to us for our own selfish purposes, or in the service of the enemy? No! to be faithful we must love him, and cleave to him, and serve him; enduring hardness as good soldiers, and living to him through whose goodness and mercy we live.

It is Christ's voice that says to us, 'Be ye faithful.' Then whatever our hand findeth to do, let us do it with our might, as there is neither work, nor wisdom, nor knowledge, nor device in the grave to which we are hastening. It is the voice of the blessed Bridegroom that saith, 'Be thou faithful;' and should we not give him the first place in our heart, that we may say with joy, 'My Beloved is mine, and I am his?' 'Be thou faithful,' saith he; and O my soul, what cause hast thou to be faithful! Is he not the chief among ten thousands, and altogether lovely? Has he not done every thing for thee? His was love that many waters could not quench, neither floods drown, nor death destroy. And wilt thou not yield to him the love of thy heart, the obedience of thy life, and the praises of thy tongue?

What encouragement hast thou, O believer, to be faithful! What precious promises he gives! 'He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.' Thou art engaged in a warfare then; and from this warfare there is no discharge, for thou must be faithful unto death. 'If any man draw back, my soul,' saith the Lord, 'shall have no pleasure in him.' But the first death shall soon come disarmed of its sting, and thou shalt never taste of the second death. What a blessing! To be saved from the lake of fire, and from lying down in everlasting burnings!

But deliverance from hell would not satisfy him who had loved Christ, and had endured poverty, and reproach, and tribulation for his name's sake. But listen to his voice, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.' How delightful the words: I will give thee a crown of life! I wore the crown of thorns, yea, I suffered death, that I might give thee a crown of life. I will give it. I, the faithful and true witness, whose promises are all yea and amen, not one failing. How animating this promise! What interest was excited, and what energies put forth at the games of ancient Greece; and when the victor was crowned before the assembled multitude, he seemed at the height of earthly happiness; though the crown was but of leaves, and though the wearer of it might die almost as soon as the fading leaves of his crown. But here is a crown given by the Son of the Eternal, along with a kingdom that cannot be moved, and everlasting life, and glory, and happiness in the presence of God, and of his Christ.

It is the King of Zion who saith, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.' Thou art fighting under his eye; and dost thou require more to encourage thee? Yes, more is needed, and it is not withheld. Thou needest strength for the conflict, and asking the aid thou needest, it will be freely bestowed. He will make his grace sufficient for thee, and perfect his strength in thy weakness. Without this thy heart would sink within thee before the seen array of earthly enemies; and the more dreadful, though unseen, array of spiritual foes. Clothed in the armour of God, and going in the strength of the Captain of thy salvation, he who gave the stripling David the victory over the uncircumcised Philistine, will make thee conqueror over all that can rise up against thee. The enemy may be allowed for a little to prevail; but fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer. Though Satan, by his emissaries, may spoil thee of thy goods, he cannot prevent thee from being rich towards God. Though he may try thee, he cannot torment thee; though he may cast thee into a prison, he cannot shut thee up in hell; he cannot shut thee out from the favour of the Lord. Many may rise up against thee, speaking great swelling words of wrath and vanity; but he who is for thee is more powerful than all who are against thee. He will make his grace sufficient for thee, for he has promised that as thy day is, so shall thy strength be. He may call thee to the field of conflict; but he will be thy shield in the hour of danger. He may suffer thee to be cast into the fiery furnace; but it is that the trial of thy faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, may be found with praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Beloved, examine yourselves then whether ye be in the faith, remembering that true faith purifieth the heart, and worketh by love, leading those who are possessed of it to live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved us, and gave himself for us. Think of the enemies with whom you have to contend; of their fiery darts, of their countless wiles, and of their cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive and to destroy. But think also of the Master whom you serve; on the aid, which in answer to your prayers, he has promised; and on the rich reward of grace which he assures you he will bestow. Splendid may be an earthly crown; but little to be envied is he that wears it. Cares lurk amidst its brightest ornaments; and the power of royalty cannot banish them. It brings no comfort in the hour of sorrow; it cannot ward off sickness and trouble; it cannot save from the agonies of death; it cannot justify in the day of judgment. But from the midst of the seven golden candlesticks a voice is heard, 'Be ye faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life.' It is the faithful and the true Witness who speaks, and his promises are all yea and amen; and the crown is a diadem of beauty which he bestows on those who are to live, and reign, and rejoice with him for evermore. 'Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.'

—
 TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross,' Phil. ii. 8.

WELL-fitted are the sublime doctrines of our most holy faith to have a practical influence on the hearts and lives of believers; and therefore does the apostle say, 'Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ.' 'Stand fast, in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel; in nothing terrified by your adversaries; which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God.' Does he wish them cheerfully to bear up under those trials to which they were called, 'for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ?' He teaches them to regard tribulation endured on this account as an honour, and a privilege, and a cause of thankfulness; 'for unto you,' says he, 'it is given, in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his sake.' Does he wish them to avoid strife and vain-glory, and to cultivate peace, and brotherly-kindness, and lowliness of mind? He points to Him who said, 'Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart;' and he says, 'Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.'

How astonishing this humiliation! 'Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.' To have some faint idea of the depth of the Saviour's humiliation, it is necessary to bear in mind his original dignity and glory, even the glory which he had with God his Father before the world began, 'when he was by Him, as one brought up with Him; and was daily his delight, rejoicing always before Him.' 'He was in the form of God;' and, as his 'taking upon him the form of a servant, and being made in the likeness of men,' means that he really became man, and appeared in a humble station as the servant of all; so, his 'being in the form of God,' means that he was really God:—and that no doubt might remain, it is added, and 'thought it not robbery to be equal with God.' 'I am the Lord,' saith the Almighty, 'and my glory I will not give unto another;' and yet it is declared respecting the Redeemer, that he was the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. 'In the beginning was the WORD, and the WORD was with God, and the WORD was God.' He is very God of very God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory; so that all should honour the Son even as they honour the Father. How incomprehensibly great his glory! Who by searching can find out God? Who can find out the Almighty unto perfection? 'What is man,' might we say, 'that He should be mindful of him, or the children of men that he should visit them?' Or if he did visit them, we might have expected that it would be in wrath, to overwhelm by his mighty power his enemies in a rebellious province of his empire. But he beheld them with mercy; he said, 'How shall I make thee as Admah, how shall I set thee as Zeboim?' He veiled his glory, and he came to save.

Great had been his humiliation, had he stooped to take on himself the nature of the brightest of the angels of God. But 'though rich, for our sakes he became poor, that we, through his poverty, might be rich.' It is a principle of our nature, that we feel more acutely for those who, from exalted stations, are plunged into the depths of distress. The very same afflictions are in reality more grievous to them than to those in humbler life. How trying is poverty to those who have known nothing but affluence! And how grievous are neglect, and scorn, and insult, to them who have long been accustomed to honour, and who have ever been treated with deference, and regarded with respect! And yet what is their humiliation to that of the Son of God? 'He made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.' He was made under the law, and he fulfilled all righteousness by doing and suffering his heavenly Father's will; and as we had broken the law;—by becoming obedient unto death in our room, and enduring the penalty, he magnified the law and made it honourable by his perfect, passive obedience in our stead upon the cross. And let us bear in mind that he was not compulsorily humbled; that he voluntarily 'humbled himself,' laying down his life as a ransom for many.

Had he laid down his life in any form, well might we have said, 'Wonder, O heavens, and be astonished, O earth, Messiah suffers! the Prince of life dies! Still more wonderful is it that he should humble himself even unto the death of the cross,—a painful, lingering, ignominious, accursed death; the death of slaves, or of the most wicked malefactors. And let us remember that in dying he really bore the curse, suffering not only in his body, but still more in his soul; for 'his soul was exceedingly sorrowful even unto death;' 'it pleased the Lord to bruise him, to put him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for sin.' How great those agonies that constrained him to say, 'Is it nothing to you all ye who pass by? Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done to me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger!'

How consistent was this plan of salvation with all the attributes of God. Not one of them was compromised. 'It became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of our salvation perfect (to consecrate him) through sufferings.' Yes; through sufferings alone, and awful sufferings, could our salvation be accomplished, and perfect atonement made. 'Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience from the things he suffered.' He thus, as Mediator, experimentally learned what it was to obey; and having obeyed even unto death, he can sympathize with his followers in the most painful parts of their duty.

How perfect the sacrifice! He died for our sins, and rose again for (in proof of) our justification. Had he not risen, if we had believed him sincere, we could only have talked of him, and been sad, saying, 'We hoped that it had been he who was to redeem Israel.' Our faith would have been vain, without foundation. But now that he is risen, and returned to glory, we have proof that the sacrifice was accepted, and the debt paid; and we may say, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, has begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.'

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple,' Luke xiv. 27.

ONE might think that to live as a Christian should be a very easy matter, when it is only to be guided by Christ, and to advance in the path which leadeth to heaven. And it would be easy, were there no corruption within, and no enemies from without. But a warfare must be carried on, as the believer has to go up through an enemy's country; and from the remains of corruption in the heart; he is as one who struggles with the current, and swims against the stream. Our blessed Master never sought to entice any to be his disciples, by concealing the difficulties to be encountered. On the contrary, most expressly does he here say, 'Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.' And not less explicitly does he elsewhere say, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.'

To be Christ's disciple, a person must deny himself. Religion does impose restraints, and though they are all salutary, they are often painful to flesh and blood. Religion forbids every undue indulgence of the appetites and passions. It teaches us to be moderate in eating and drinking; to be temperate in all things; using, but not abusing the gifts of God's providence. We fear there are now, as in the days of the apostle, those who profess to be Christians, but who in very truth are of the synagogue of Satan. 'Many walk,' said he, 'of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction, whose god is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.' And a similar sentence is recorded respecting those who indulged in any filthiness of the flesh or of the spirit. 'Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of heaven.'

We must be ready, if called on, to part with our earthly comforts and temporal enjoyments; nay, with everything dear to us rather than forsake Christ. Painful as it would naturally be to flesh and blood, it is recorded of the early Christians that they took willingly the spoiling of their goods, regarding it as an honour to suffer loss for his name's sake. Great violence also was often done to the feelings of their heart, when they were required to hate—not literally—but in comparison with their greater love to Christ, the dearest of their friends: the same thing, let us remember, is necessary still. If the authority of superiors, whether civil, ecclesiastical, or natural, should require us to act contrary to what conscience and the word of God assure us is our duty, however painful the self-denial may be, we are forbidden to yield. We must be very sure that we are guided by the word and will of God, ere we venture to disobey either civil or natural superiors; but when we have the thorough conviction of this, though the tears of a tender mother, or the entreaties of an indulgent father, or the commands of those who can punish us for disobedience, should be employed to move us,—we must set our face like a flint, and at all hazards obey Christ rather than man.

To be Christ's disciples we must bear our cross. This is in allusion to the custom of causing the condemned malefactor to bear his cross to the place of execution. And can we refuse to bear it for the sake of Christ, when we look at him going up the hill of Calvary, and bearing his cross, and when we remember that for our sins 'he humbled himself and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross?' By this figurative expression of bearing our cross, is meant that, from love to Christ, we should patiently, yea cheerfully, endure everything, even death itself, rather than forsake him whose 'favour is life, and whose loving-kindness is better than life.' The cross is whatever is distressing in our lot; not of our own making or finding, but of God's appointment; and receiving it as from God's hand as a trial of our faith and love, and for the improvement of our Christian graces, we are required to bear it meekly, and patiently, and, as far as we are enabled, cheerfully. Is it the reproach of the world because of our religion that we are required to bear? 'As Jesus suffered without the gate, so must we go forth to him without the camp bearing his reproach,' like Moses 'esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt.' Are we visited with personal affliction? Let us hear the voice of the rod, and him who hath appointed it, and seek to bear it in the spirit of resignation. Are we tried with domestic bereavement? Let us remember that all we have is but a loan, that when it is reclaimed we may be ready to say, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord.' Are we tried with poverty? Let us remember that 'Jesus, though rich, for our sakes became poor;' 'that the foxes had holes, and the birds of the air nests, but that the Son of man had not where to lay his head.'

To be Christ's disciples, we must come after him—follow him. We must imitate his example, and obey his commands. We must not pick and choose those commandments least disagreeable to us, but in all things we must seek to do his will. We must learn of him who was meek and lowly; we must learn of him who was constantly doing good, consulting not merely the good of the body, but still more the good of the soul. We must imitate him in his piety; and when we consider that it is by prayer that we obtain grace, by which alone we can be enabled to follow him either in doing or in suffering according to his will; what an incitement have we to pray with all manner of prayer and supplication, that 'the very God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, would make us perfect in every good work to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.'

'No cross then—no crown,' since it is written, 'Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.' We need not go out of our way to seek a cross: it will be found in the direct path, in some form, by every traveller towards Zion;—and daily found; otherwise Christ would not have said, 'If any man will come after me, let him take up his cross daily, and follow me.' If we find no cross from the hatred of the world, may it not be because we are walking according to the course of this world; and that the world loves its own? If there is no cross arising from the workings of the heart, is there not reason to fear that the heart is yet unrenewed, and that the crucifixion of the old man has not yet been begun? When the inspired apostle, in his spiritual warfare, was constrained to cry out, 'O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'—if we know nothing of this inward warring, can we be fighting a good fight?—can we be bearing our cross, and following Christ? If we feel the cross, and are groaning under it, let us seek strength from him that we may be enabled to bear it; and he will make his grace sufficient for us; and having borne the cross, he will in due season give us the crown, exalting us to glory and blessedness at his right hand in the heavens.

—
 TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted,' Heb ii. 18.

WHAT believer is there who does not know, from experience, that this life is a state of temptation? God tempteth no man with evil, but He sends temptations, as trials of the believer's faith. Temptations arise also from the remains of corruption in the renewed heart; from the allurements of the world; from the enticements, or from the threatenings of the ungodly; from the wiles, or from the fiery darts of the wicked one. If fallen man were left to himself, how hopeless would be his condition; but the believer is not sent a warring at his own charges; nor required to carry on the combat in his own strength. He can look unto the Captain of his salvation, and derive courage from knowing that, 'in that He himself suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.'

'He suffered being tempted.' His whole life here below, and particularly during his public ministry, was a scene of temptation, and sorrow, and suffering. How grievous, at the very outset of his ministry, to be tempted of the devil during forty days in the wilderness! How distressing to his holy heart, how humbling and afflicting to his pure nature, to hear, for so long a period, his unholy suggestions and blasphemous proposals!

Though Satan, being foiled, left him, his temptations were still grievous, arising from the impenitence, and ingratitude, and malice of those whom he addressed. 'He came to his own, but his own received him not.' He came from heaven to earth; from the height of glory, to the depth of humiliation; he spake as never man spoke, and proved by his miracles that he came from God; he came to seek and to save that which was lost; and what a trial, when in mournful accents he was constrained to say, 'ye will not come unto me that ye may have life!' When he spake to them with so much fervour and affection; when he wrought so many miracles of mercy; and could call on them to believe on him for his work's sake, mere callousness and indifference would have been grievous; but how much greater his trial when there were added hatred, and malice, and bitter hostility; when they came to hear him, 'that they might entangle him in his talk;' when they watched his wonderful works, 'that they might find an accusation against him!' How deeply he felt under such a temptation is evident from its being recorded that he 'looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts.'

Time would fail us were we to attempt to enumerate all the temptations he experienced, when he had to endure the contradiction of sinners against himself; when they accused him of being in league with accursed spirits; and took up stones to stone the Holy One and the Just. But to know that he 'suffered, being tempted,' it is enough to touch on some of those grievous temptations which cluster around him at the close. How great the trial in Gethsemane, when in sore amazement and agony of soul he fell on the ground and prayed; and when in the writhings of his spiritual conflict, his sweat was as great drops of blood falling down to the ground! Was it nothing to be betrayed by one of his disciples, yea, and betrayed with a kiss? Was it nothing to be denied by another of his disciples, and to be forsaken by all? Was it nothing to be condemned, and scourged, and crucified amidst the cruel mockings and insults of his murderous foes? Was it nothing that hell should send forth her legions, to vent all their malice, and to pour all their wrath on his devoted head? Oppressed and afflicted though he was, he endured in silence, 'and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.' But when the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all, when he hid from him that countenance whose smile is heaven, and whose frown is the bitterness of the deepest woe; then burst forth the mournful exclamation, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring?'

When he himself thus suffered being tempted, is he not able to succour them that are tempted? By these sore temptations, he has acquired, for the relief of others when tempted, a qualification and meetness he could not otherwise have possessed. He is willing to help them, for 'he is a High Priest that can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities.' He is able to succour them; for overcoming temptations far greater than his followers can be exposed to, he has proved the all-sufficiency of his power. He has acquired a right to succour them; for they are his purchased possession, the sheep of his pasture; and none shall pluck one of them out of his hand.

He has the right, and the power, and the will to defend them from the cunning fox, and the ravening wolf; and to deliver them in the hour of jeopardy from the paw of the lion and of the bear.

What excuse have we then if we flee not to him for succour? Do we walk in darkness? What is that, to what he endured in the hour and power of darkness, and under the hidings of his Father's face? Do we groan under the burden of our iniquities? Did he not come to bear them all? And does he not say, 'Come unto me all ye who labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest?' Do our temptations arise from the remains of corruption? He never, indeed, had any struggle from sinful propensities, but it is from this very sinlessness that we can look to him with confidence, for otherwise he could not have succoured us in the time of need. Are we assailed by the fiery darts of Satan? Let us take the shield of faith, which will quench those fiery darts; and the helmet of salvation; and the sword of the Spirit; and clothed in the armour of God, and guided by the Captain of our salvation, let us resist the devil, and he will flee from us. Going in the strength of the Lord, we shall find, by blessed experience, that he can give us the victory.

'Seeing, then, that we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us, therefore, come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need;' and our great High Priest will cause us to see, 'that having suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.'

---

TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'If we suffer, we shall also reign with him,' 2 Tim. ii. 12.

THE apostle in exhorting Timothy, exhorts all believers to 'be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus,' and to 'endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ.' In various forms does he teach that the Christian life is a state of warfare, and of zealous and strenuous exertion. He reminds us that, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, we should be willing to endure hardness, because every good soldier seeks the approbation of his commander. By referring also to the celebrated games of ancient times, he teaches that we should not only be zealous in Christ's service, but that our zeal must be under the guidance of prescribed laws. 'If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully.' We must seek then not only to be zealously affected in a good thing, but in a right way; our zeal being according to knowledge. He draws a lesson also of patient labour from the practice of the husbandman, who industriously labours that he may be made partaker of the fruits. And when he sought to encourage Timothy to suffer patiently in the cause of Christ, he could teach him not only by precept, but also by his own example. 'Remember,' said he, 'that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, according to my gospel: wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound. Therefore, I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory. 'It is a faithful saying; for if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us.'

'Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards;' and as suffering is the lot of humanity, the alternative is—shall we suffer in the service of Christ, or in the service of Satan? It is well to bear in mind that this is the true state of the case; for it is a common and ruinous mistake, especially in the days of our youth, that by casting off the restraints of religion, and living as we list, walking in the sight of our own eyes, and in the way of our own heart, we may escape trouble, and secure a large amount of happiness. We may say to Christ, 'we will not have thee to reign over us;' but is the rule of corrupt appetites, and passions a gentle sway? Is Satan's yoke not galling? Are his wages always pleasant and satisfying to the soul? Does not unquestionable authority assure us that the wages of sin is death? Bitter, bitter often is the cup which the slave of sin must drink, ere his service in this world comes to a close. The heart may become hardened, and the conscience seared, but for a time conscience fails not to perform her office; and the lash of an evil conscience is often worse than a scourge of venomous scorpions. The sons of riot, for instance, may pretend to be happy, but even in laughter their heart is sorrowful, and their mirth is compared in scripture to a blaze of crackling thorns, only rendering more dismal the gloom by which it is immediately succeeded. And what consolation have they in the time of trouble? To seek for sympathy would be to proclaim their shame. Their grief then is concealed from the eye of the world; but like the liquid fire in a burning mountain it is not the less consuming, because it is hid. And as they are without comfort, so are they without hope; for continuing impenitent every hope must perish. Christ is faithful to his threatenings, as well as to his promises; and he has declared that 'if we deny him he also will deny us.' And when will he deny the ungodly? In that great day when he comes with all the glory of the Father, and the holy angels; when he appears in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory; coming in flaming fire to punish with everlasting destruction, from his presence and from the glory of his power, those who have not honoured God, and have not obeyed the gospel of his Son.

Our blessed Master never sought to induce any to follow him by promising exemption from sufferings. On the contrary he has declared, that 'if any man would come after him, he must deny himself, and take up his cross and follow him.' 'All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.' 'In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.' 'Fear not, for I am with you.' 'I will never leave you, nor forsake you.' Their very trials are converted into blessings. Leaving friends and possessions for his sake and the gospel's, they were promised a hundred-fold more now, and in the world to come eternal life. Not that the hundred-fold was to be in kind; but in value. They would enjoy that in God, which all creatures a hundred times multiplied would not have been to them; and the gifts, and graces, and consolations of his Holy Spirit would be a hundred times better portion, than all that could be parted with for the sake of Christ.

And then what are all, even the spiritual blessings of time, compared with life everlasting. 'If we suffer, we shall also reign with him.' Is there not something exceedingly animating in being called to suffer for Christ? The apostle counted it all honour that he was thought worthy to suffer for him. The brave soldier, in the day of battle, is stirred up to deeds of more noble daring, when having his commander's glory at heart, he has an opportunity of promoting it, and of proving the sincerity of his attachment. Christ can no longer be assailed by his enemies in person, but his cause is assailed; and when we are called to 'come to the help of the Lord against the mighty;' and when it is said, 'Who is on the Lord's side, who?' ought we not to come forward boldly on the Lord's side, though we should expose ourselves thereby to danger and suffering? It is in the face of danger and suffering that we best prove our attachment. And if our sufferings in Christ abound, our consolations also shall abound by Christ. Let us persevere then in the path of duty, though it should be the path of suffering. Animated by the assurance that, 'if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him,' let us press onward. Then, ere long, as the ransomed of the Lord we shall return and come to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon our heads; we shall receive joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall for ever flee away.

---

THIRTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst,' John xix. 28.

HE was tried in every point like as we are, yet without sin. By suffering under hunger, and thirst, and weariness, and other sinless infirmities of our nature, he at once gave evidence of his great humiliation, and proof that he was in truth man. As he returned to Jerusalem from Bethany, where he had lodged during the night, he hungered; and the barren fig-tree to which he sent his disciples supplied him with no food. On his way from Judea to Galilee, he was wearied with his journey, and in the heat of the day he sat down on Jacob's well; and there said to a woman of Samaria, 'Give me to drink.' Very different was the treatment he experienced from this female Samaritan, unprincipled though she had formerly been, from that which now in a time of much greater need he experienced from the assembled Jews. Most acutely, we doubt not, had he felt the pain inflicted by the scourge, and the thorns, and the nails; and worn out with lingering suffering, he cried, 'I thirst.' O the depth of humiliation of which this cry gave evidence! As God, he had made the dew, and the rain, and the rivers, and springs; and as God-man, he was the fountain of living waters—the stricken rock from which streams of consolation and refreshment were to flow; and yet so deeply had he humbled himself, that now, under his agonizing sufferings, he needed to cry, 'I thirst.' Now, according to recorded prophecy, 'his strength was dried up like a potsherd, and his tongue clave to his jaws;' and not wonderful was it, that from long suffering and loss of blood, he should then cry out, 'I thirst.' In his humiliation this cry may be regarded as an appeal to his enemies; but they were dead to all compassion; and the appeal was made in vain: and yet not in vain, seeing that by their very cruelty, though they meant it not, a prophecy was fulfilled. The holy Sufferer knew the hardness of their hearts, and it was that the scripture might be fulfilled that he said, 'I thirst.' How precious would a cupful of cold water then have been to the suffering Saviour! Instead, however, of giving water, they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on hyssop, and put it to his mouth. That this was done in the spirit of cruel mockery appears from the prophecy respecting it. After saying, 'Reproach hath broken my heart, and I am full of heaviness, and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none;' he immediately subjoins as part of the complaint, 'They gave me also gall for my meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.' The gall had already been given to him; 'and Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. And they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on hyssop, and put it to his mouth. When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, 'Tis finished; and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.' 'He shall drink of the brook by the way, therefore shall he lift up the head.'

'I thirst!' How often have we read this without thinking of what, even from thirst, the Redeemer suffered when he thus gave utterance to his sufferings! We grieve when we think of his being torn by the scourge, and pierced by the nails; but do we deeply sympathize when, at the close of his sufferings, he cries, 'I thirst?' And yet this very thirst may have added more to his distress than all that he suffered from the thorns, and the scourge, and the nails. We have read of a number of British subjects being immured by a despot's power, in a crowded dungeon, in a sultry clime; and while many died, others were driven to utter frenzy, and to raving madness, by the agonies of thirst. How unspeakably precious, in some circumstances, may a single drop of water be! 'In hell, the rich man in the parable 'lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame.' How inconceivably precious would a spongeful of water have been to Christ when, in the agonies of crucifixion, he said, 'I thirst!' Then was fulfilled what had been uttered in prophecy ages before: 'From above he sent fire into my bones, and it prevailed against them; he hath spread a net for my feet, he hath turned me back, he hath made me desolate and faint all the day.' 'Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress; my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me.' 'They have heard that I sigh; there is none to comfort me: all my enemies have heard of my trouble; they are glad that thou hast done it.' Think then, O my soul, on the sufferings of thy Saviour, when laden, and desolate, and forsaken, he said, 'I thirst.'

'I thirst!' O should we not, in meditating on this, learn resignation? His sufferings were unmerited, for he was altogether without sin. Our sufferings are all merited, and are always less than we deserve. Should we not be resigned then in the day of trial, when we may sing of mercy as well as of judgment? Should we not hear the voice of the rod, and Him who hath appointed it, when, if we receive chastening as from a Father's hand, he will sanctify the affliction, and cause it to be one of the 'all things' that work together for our good?

'I thirst!' said the suffering Saviour. 'And they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on hyssop, and put it to his mouth.' Alas, alas! did no eye pity? Did no hard heart relent? Must the dying Redeemer say, I was thirsty, and they gave me no drink? Nay, what is worse, must his complaint be, 'In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink?' In what circumstances of trial then can the believer be placed, in which he has not cause to be, not only resigned, but thankful? Is he visited with bodily trouble? How often are there affectionate friends tenderly to sympathize; and to do all that earthly friends can do, to comfort, and to soothe! But though it should be otherwise; though earthly friends should either turn their back, or prove miserable comforters all; what a happiness is it, that there is one friend who sticketh closer than a brother, who knows what it is to suffer, and who is both able and willing to comfort and to sustain! That friend is the Saviour of sinners, who said on the cross, 'I thirst.' O let us love him: let us serve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind, saying, Lord, we are thy servants, we are thy servants, the sons of thy handmaiden: thou hast loosed our bonds!

THIRTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'And let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely,' Rev. xxii. 17.

THE SON of God, exhausted with sufferings of body and soul, said, 'I thirst.' O what an opportunity of doing what never would have been forgotten through time or through eternity! And did many rush forward to quench the Redeemer's thirst? Alas, alas! they made haste, but it was to add bitterness to his bitter cup, 'In his thirst they gave him vinegar to drink.' And yet, instead of visiting them with vengeance, either immediately, or when he came to his kingdom, from his throne of glory he said of old, and he says now, 'If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink;' 'let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'

How precious the offer! How precious even the common element of water! Withhold it even a few days from man, and he dies in agony. What water is to the body, grace is to the soul;—indispensably necessary to its life and welfare. Grace is here figuratively spoken of as living water, 'the water of life.' Grace was typified by the refreshing streams that flowed from the smitten rock in the wilderness. Rich are the blessings of grace that flow from Christ this smitten rock, such as pardon of sin, and consequently deliverance from the punishment of iniquity; sanctification of body and spirit, and consequently deliverance from the power of sin; meekness for the inheritance, and at last possession of the 'kingdom that cannot be moved.' The pure river of water of life is of heavenly origin; it proceeds 'out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.' It is life-giving; and the life imparted is life everlasting. It purifies; 'I will sprinkle clean water on you, and ye shall be clean.' It refreshes; it is 'as rivers of water in a dry place;' or as 'a well of water springing up unto everlasting life.' How precious the invitation then, 'Let him that is athirst come!'

How general the invitation! 'Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life.' This invitation, without doubt, extends to all those who have tasted of the water of life; who have had experience of its virtue, and earnestly desire fresh supplies, saying, 'As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee, in a dry and thirsty land where no water is.' It extends also to those who as yet know nothing of the joys of God's salvation, but who have been made to feel their need of mercy to pardon and grace to help. For them the fountain is open, and to them the invitation is given, 'Come ye unto the wells of salvation, and draw, and drink with joy.' But extends it no farther? Yes: it is to those also who are labouring in the fire, compassed about with sparks of their own kindling; thirsting—but coming to broken cisterns—wells without water, or to empoisoned streams which only feed the burning thirst that consumes them;—searching eagerly after happiness, saying, 'Who will show us any good?' and yet utterly ignorant where this true good is to be found. How merciful is it to say to such, 'Ho! every one that thirsteth, come unto the waters.' 'Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread; and your labour for that which satisfieth not?' And lest they should still fear that the invitation extends not to them, because they thirst not aright, it is subjoined, 'and whosoever will, let him take the water of life.'

How free is the invitation! It is not only, 'Whosoever will, let him take the water of life,' but let him take it freely. The unrenewed man is a stranger to the riches of the glory of divine grace; and he concludes that he must have some righteousness of his own to entitle him to apply for grace; and Satan seeks to keep him in this belief, that without some merit of his own, application would be fruitless. But Christ says, 'By grace ye are saved through faith;' 'take the water of life freely.' 'The water of life' is saving grace; and saving grace is free grace, unmerited kindness; for were it merited, it could not be free grace. He who died for sinners offers it freely, without money and without price; and what he offers liberally and ungrudgingly, he wishes you to take unsparingly, saying, 'Drink, yea, drink abundantly' of the water of life.

It is the Prince of life that offers it. 'In his thirst they gave him vinegar to drink;' but he holds out to you the cup of salvation. 'To-day, while it is called to-day, harden not your hearts.' Do you hesitate? To-day he says, 'Come;' to-morrow he may say, 'Depart from me ye cursed.' To-day he says, Drink—drink of the living water. To-morrow he may say, Drink—but drink of the cup of trembling; and drink of it for evermore.

What love is manifested in the earnestness of the invitation! When the need is so great, it had been enough, one might have thought, to give the most distant hint, that all our wants might be supplied. But wonder, O heavens, and be astonished, O earth, at the condescending kindness of the Lord, when all we need is not only offered, and freely offered, but with the utmost urgency, and earnestness pressed on our acceptance! 'Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money, and without price.' To rouse the careless sons of men, and to attract their special attention, the cry is raised aloud, 'Ho!' How precious is water to the exhausted traveller! Were we in the wilderness, almost perishing of thirst, and were the smallest fountain of water discovered, with what speed would we rush to it! How eagerly would we drink of it, muddy and polluted though it might be, even amidst the thirsty camels' feet! And when we are in the moral wilderness, and when our soul fainteth in us, how wonderful, when the fountain of life has been pointed out, that we should need to be urged to drink of it! He who freely offers the living water, knows that we must perish if we drink not; and therefore his compassionate and urgent cry is, Come, come, come! Come, and take freely, not only water, but wine, and milk, without money, and without price;—water, to save from death; milk, to nourish and strengthen; and wine, to cheer and gladden the fainting soul. 'The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished,' John xix. 30.

An angel's tongue could not tell the full import of these words, 'It is finished.' But yet, though we cannot fathom the depth of their meaning, we may with profit consider, that—

Christ's sufferings were then finished. In assuming our nature, he became subject to its sinless sufferings of body and of mind. How great would be his heart-griefs during the whole of his ministry arising from the impenitence, malice, and hatred of the Jews to whom he addressed himself, offering them life, and warning them to flee from the wrath to come! But his sufferings at the close of his ministry were above what we can form any conception of, strong as the language is which the evangelists employ in describing them. 'He began to be sore amazed,' to be in consternation, to be laden with grief, saying, 'my soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.' 'This was the hour and power of darkness,' and being in agony he fell on his face, and prayed most earnestly, and in the mental struggle, 'his sweat was it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.' And soon was the blood to flow in streams from his sacred body, when he gave his back to the smiters, his hands and his feet to be nailed on the accursed tree; when his head was torn by the thorns, and his side pierced by the spear. And yet all that fiends from hell, and all that foes on earth could do, was but as a drop to the bitter waters of a full cup which was wrung out for him, when his Father hid from him his face. Then the waters came in unto his soul, and in the anguish of his heart he cried out, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me.'

The tempest, however, had now done its worst. The lurid cloud, having exhausted its thunders, and launched its fierce fires against his head, had vanished. His Father's benignant countenance again beamed on him in all its brightness, and with the triumphant voice of a conqueror he cried, 'It is finished.' Can we conceive the feelings of a great commander when for a whole day he has witnessed the bloody strife betwixt two mighty armies, when victory, for hours, has hung trembling in the balance, now inclining to this side, and now to that; when the fate of empires depended on the result—can we conceive his feelings, when the long wished-for moment at last comes when he can lead to the decisive charge his noble troops, when he hears them raise the shout of triumph; when he sees the proud array of the enemy's host utterly broken and routed, and changed into a mingled mass of flight, and carnage, and consternation? O! how much less then can we conceive the full import of the words of the Son of God, when all his spiritual foes were discomfited, when the deadly struggle was brought to a close, and when with the shout of a conqueror he cried, 'It is finished!'

'It is finished;' types and prophecies were fulfilled. The true paschal Lamb was then slain when Christ our Passover had been sacrificed for us. The true Rock was now smitten, when he who is indeed our Rock, was stricken, smitten, and afflicted. Then it was seen why the red heifer, whose ashes were to be mingled with the waters of purification, was an unclean thing to be burnt without the camp, when Christ, bearing our sins, as the worst of malefactors, had suffered without the gates. Then the typical meaning of the brazen serpent could be understood, when Christ had been lifted up on the cross, that those who looked to him might be healed; that they who believed on him should not perish, but should have eternal life.

Time would fail us were we to attempt to enumerate the prophecies which were fulfilled when Christ said, 'It is finished.' The treachery of Judas; the injustice of Pilate; the cruelty of the Jews; the impious taunts of the rulers; the insulting mockery of the soldiers; the parting of his raiment, the casting of lots for his vesture; and many other prophecies, had been accomplished; and Jesus knowing that one yet remained—that the scriptures might be fulfilled, he said, 'I thirst.' 'And they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on hyssop, and put it to his mouth, and when he had received the vinegar, he said, 'It is finished, and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.'

'It is finished;' the atonement had been completed. The great God who made us had a right to give us laws, and to vindicate the authority of these laws when we had broken them. Had the punishment been inflicted on us, we must have everlastingly perished. In the great plan of redemption, mercy and truth met together, righteousness and peace kissed each other. It was to save sinners, and yet to magnify the law of God, that the Redeemer came. It was to make atonement for sin, by bearing our sins—by dying in our room and stead, thus satisfying divine justice, and reconciling us to God—that the Son of the Eternal appeared in the flesh. It was to destroy death, and him who had the power of death, that he suffered on the cross. It was to save a multitude, whom no man can number, that he endured the cross, despising the shame. And now that the work was complete; now that he had torn the prey from the dragon's teeth, and saw the gates of heaven opened for himself and his followers—with what transport would he exclaim, 'It is finished!' and with what rapture would it be re-echoed by those who through the merits of this sacrifice had already entered, who, beholding the overthrow of Satan in the triumphant victory of the Son of God, would strike their golden harps to a louder song, saying, 'Alleluia, Alleluia! Salvation to our God who sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever.' 'Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests to God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen.'

'It is finished.' Legal worship ends; the Mosaical dispensation is brought to a close; and gospel ages begin to run. Though well-fitted to answer the purpose intended by infinite wisdom, the dispensation under which the Jews had hitherto lived, was one of distance, and darkness, and fear. 'For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never, with 'those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect.' 'But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.' But 'what the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.' How delightful the blessed gospel truth, that 'God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons!' Darkness, and distance, and dread were now at an end, and the followers of Christ might draw near unto God as children unto a father who was both able and willing to help them. And this privilege was not to be granted to the Jews only; but to those also who in time past had been Gentiles in the flesh, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, without God, without Christ, and without hope. But the veil had now been rent, the partition wall had been broken down, that they who had been far off, might be made nigh by the blood of Christ; and that through faith in his name Jews and Gentiles might both have access by one Spirit unto the Father; and be built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

'Tis finish'd—The Messiah dies
For sins, but not his own;
The great redemption is complete,
And Satan's pow'r o'erthrown.

'Tis finish'd—All his groans are past;
His blood, his pains, and toils,
Have fully vanquished our foes,
And crown'd him with their spoils.

'Tis finish'd—Legal worship ends,
And gospel ages run,
All old things now are past away,
And a new world begun.'

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'I have finished my course,' 2 Tim. iv. 7.

'It is finished,' said the Saviour; and when all his sufferings were finished, and types and prophecies fulfilled, and complete atonement made, with what joy would he say, 'It is finished!' Though the apostle's sufferings were not propitiatory, neither light, nor few, had the afflictions been which for Christ's sake he had endured; and though he was about to suffer martyrdom, and to seal his testimony with his blood, he could look death in the face, not only without dismay, but with complacency and delight. At an earlier period he could say, 'Behold I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.' He had obtained his wish; he had fulfilled his ministry; he had been found faithful; he had rejoiced to spend and to be spent in the service of the best of Masters; and with holy joy he now could say, 'I have finished my course.' Soon, very soon, will it be the lot of every one of us to say, 'I have finished my course.' O! what will these words imply when they are uttered on the brink of the grave; when all life's interests are crowded into a moment; when that moment is the last of time, and the next the beginning of eternity—that dread moment which is to seal our doom—to determine whether it is to be well with us for ever; or whether it had been better—far, far better that we had never been born!

What then is this course? The apostle speaks figuratively; but the figure is easily understood. In Greece of old there were periodical assemblies, in which all had an opportunity of competing for prizes, and the much-wished prize was often an honorary, ornamental, but a fading crown. The contests were often trials of bodily strength or agility, such as running or wrestling. Rules were laid down by which the competitors were to be regulated; and none could be crowned who did not strive according to these rules. Regarding life as a race then, rules are given in the holy scriptures; the course is prescribed; the goal is heaven; and the prize is a crown of glory. The prophets, apostles, and martyrs, are held up to us as patterns: Christ himself has left us an example that we should walk in his steps. Grace also is freely offered to us by him who giveth power unto the faint, who strengtheneth the weak hands, and confirms the feeble knees. When Christ from his throne says, Look unto me, and I will guide you to the victory; if we forget the prize, and pant after the dust, what can await us but disgrace and discomfiture? When the Lord from heaven says, Be strong, fear not, quit you like men, onward, onward; and when Satan says, Soul! take thine ease; crown thyself with rose-buds before they wither; walk in the ways of thine own heart, and in the sight of thine own eyes, that thy heart may cheer thee all the days of thy life; if we believe the tempter, and forsake the way of the Lord God, soon shall we find that our path is covered with darkness; that it taketh fast hold on hell; and leadeth down to the chambers of everlasting death.

Think on the blessedness of running in the right course. Is there not a happiness in tracing the footsteps of prophets, and apostles, and martyrs, yea, and of the Redeemer of souls? Is there not sweet satisfaction in serving him who has bought us with a price? in esteeming, like Moses, the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt, having respect unto the recompence of the reward? Is there not a foretaste of the reward of grace, even in this world; an earnest of the inheritance? And how great the consolation when life is closing, when the course is finished, and when death is at hand! At that dread moment what would it avail though we could say that we have been rich, and prosperous, and honoured of men, if we have no treasure laid up in heaven, and if we have not, through Christ, sought the favour of God? When the night cometh when no man can work, O how much worse than frivolous shall this world's affairs appear to us, if they have been our chief concern; and have weaned our hearts from the Redeemer of souls! When every day tells, in some degree, on our future destiny, how sinful to trifle—how dreadful to live in guilt! How great the wisdom, and how exquisite the happiness in 'laying aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith;' then when the time of our departure is at hand, each, like the apostle, may say, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also who love his appearing.'

How awful, on the other hand, is the state of those, who instead of fighting the good fight, fight against God; against Christ; against the Holy Spirit; against the best wishes of good men; against the richest mercies; against their own souls! They are finishing their course, but they are advancing in the broad way which leadeth to destruction; in the downward path which taketh hold on hell. As instead of keeping the faith, they have continued strangers to repentance towards God, and to faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, there awaits them—not the crown of righteousness, but the cup of trembling. To as many as receive him Christ gives power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name, who are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. But what is to be the final doom of those who do not receive him, who do not live by the faith of the Son of God? 'He that believeth not, is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.' While we rejoice that it is written, 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life,' O let us never forget the no less truthful record, that 'he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.'

A P R I L.

FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

*'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, he gave up the ghost,'
Luke xxiii. 46.*

HE died. How wonderful! The Prince of life groaned, and bled, and died. All of him that could die, died. He assumed our nature that he might be capable of dying. Sin brought death into the world; and death passes on all, for that all have sinned. But behold the wonder! here death passed with far more than his usual terrors on one who had never sinned. But he was made sin—a sin-offering for us: on him was laid the iniquities of us all. Every sinner deserves to be forsaken of God. That he might feel the heavy load of our sins which he had undertaken to bear, he was deprived for a time of a sense of his Father's support, while the vials of wrath which we had merited were poured on his head. But the Father's love, which was ever the same—now that our debt was paid—shone forth in unclouded brightness. And the love of the Son, which the bruising of his soul could not abate, now rose into re-assured confidence; and having cried with a loud voice, to show that life was yet strong in him, and that his enemies could not have taken it away; but that he willingly laid it down; his work being finished, he said, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said this, he gave up the ghost,'—gave up, or sent away his spirit, yielding a willing victory, that by dying he might conquer death; 'and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage.'

Naturally, there is something almost overwhelming in the thought of death. It is an untried work, which has never been described by any who have accomplished it, for none ever returns to tell us what it is to die. It makes us shudder to think that this body, which we have so carefully cherished, is to become the prey of corruption—the food of worms. Death breaks asunder the dearest ties; it brings to a close every earthly pursuit; it ushers us into the presence of God, and it fixes our doom through eternity.

O what a privilege, through faith in Christ, to have death unstinged; and to have 'a strong consolation' in these trying circumstances. How encouraging to remember that Christ said, 'I go to my God and your God, to my Father and your Father;' that, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, we may say to this reconciled God, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit,' in the full persuasion that he will save those that trust in Him.

Meditation on this wonderful decease which Christ accomplished at Jerusalem would be of little avail, were we not led daily to commit the keeping of our souls to God in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator;—and unless we keep constantly in view that he was thus 'lifted up from the earth' on the cross 'that he might draw all men to him.' O should it not be our desire that we may 'be drawn with cords of a man, and with bands of love?' And when we pray, 'Draw us, and we will run after thee,' should we not strive unflinchingly to follow him ourselves, and to be instrumental in inducing others to follow him? Should we not say to those advancing in the path of ruin, Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die; turn to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope, turn ye, turn ye, that your souls may live? Should we not beseechingly say to those over whom we may have influence, 'We are journeying to the place, of which the Lord said, I will give it you: come with us, and we will do you good?' Then, when our hour cometh, may each of us say, 'Into thy hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth.'

What a beautiful example is here set us of ejaculatory prayer! The term ejaculatory is derived from a word which signifies to dart, or to shoot out suddenly, and is well-fitted to describe that kind of prayer which consists in short unpremeditated sentences, on sudden emergencies, often raised from the heart of man! The language of ejaculation is indeed often used by thoughtless and ungodly persons, when it is not the language of the heart; and not an address unto God, but a profane exclamation, as if they were invoking his help, or his protection, or his mercy, when God is not in all their thoughts; and when, instead of praying to God, they are taking his name in vain, and breaking one of his holy commandments! This is one of the marks by which the ungodly may be known. The children of God will not speak irreverently of their heavenly Father. An ejaculation may also be the cry of nature in the time of great and sudden jeopardy. He who had never prayed before,—when the ship in which he sailed is sinking amidst the billows,—will, in all likelihood, in that dread moment cry out, 'Lord, have mercy on my soul!' Some are so foolish as to restrain prayer in the day of health, trusting to such a cry as this in their last moments. And yet it is questionable whether, in any such case, it is the prayer of faith; whether, in any such case, there is even the remembrance of Christ, or anything more than the cry of nature in the hour of impending danger.

Very, very different is the ejaculatory prayer of the believer. His prayer is the aspiration of the renewed heart under the influence of the Holy Spirit: and when the cry for mercy is raised, the eye of faith is also lifted up to the heavenly Intercessor at the right hand of the throne. Short though such ejaculations be, they are often more acceptable and more effectual than longer prayers. They rise fresh and warm from the heart, with less mixture of impurity than often is found in longer addresses to the Almighty. A child of God, at the footstool of the throne of the Eternal, is a spectacle which the brightest cherub may behold with delight. But when it is said, 'Behold he prayeth!' do only holy eyes behold? No. The malignant eye of the adversary is upon him also, and he strives to mar the work by unholy suggestions. His fiery darts can be shot unseen; and their venom, when felt, should speedily be counteracted by fervent ejaculations.

One advantage of ejaculatory prayer is, that it can be employed at all times, and in all places. It can be raised amidst the world's busiest scenes; and if circumstances do not admit of its being uttered aloud, the Lord of Sabaoth listeneth to the lowest whisper, and he can interpret the pious breathings of the heart. The sons of Reuben cried to the Lord in the midst of the battle, and he was entreated of them, because they put their trust in him, and he delivered their enemies into their hands. The Syro-phenician woman cried unto Jesus from the bottom of her heart, 'Lord, help me!' And he granted her heart's desire. Blind Bartimeus cried to him, 'Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me. And Jesus answered and said unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I might receive my sight. And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.' Peter, beginning to sink in the sea, cried, Lord, save me. And immediately Jesus stretched out his hand and saved him. The disciples, when a great tempest in the sea had arisen, awoke their Master, saying, 'Lord, save us: we perish. Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea: and there was a great calm.'

In what lawful undertaking can we engage which may not with advantage be preceded by some pious ejaculation? In the day of health and prosperity is not ejaculatory prayer needed that we may not be entangled by the world? And in the time of sickness and sorrow, how much would sorrow be soothed, and affliction softened, by frequent ejaculations raised to the Lord! As our times are in his hand; as we are surrounded by dangers seen, and dangers unseen; as in the midst of life we are in death, O let us habitually commit ourselves to the Lord in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator; then, when our last hour comes, we may, like Stephen, say, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' Or like Him to whom Stephen prayed, we may say, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit;' and we shall assuredly find that he will keep that which we have committed to him against that day.'

'I come, I come, at thy command,
I give my spirit to thy hand;
Stretch forth thine everlasting arms,
And shield me in the last alarms.

'The hour of my departure's come,
I hear the voice that calls me home;
Now, O my God! let trouble cease;
Now let thy servant die in peace.'

FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living,' Job xxx. 23.

NOTHING is more certain than that we shall all descend into the grave. Adam was doomed to it for his transgression; and his descendants having inherited his nature, and walked in his steps, have been involved in his sentence; for it is written, 'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death has passed upon all, for that all have sinned.' Our fathers, where are they? Of the thousands who occupied our places a century ago, not one remains; 'they have been brought to the house appointed for all living,' and 'the place that once knew them, knows them no more.' When we are surrounded by the trophies of death, and know that ere long we shall be numbered among his victims, how wonderful is it that so many should think lightly of so solemn an event, as if it were a matter in which they were not personally interested. O may we feel its great importance, and consider our latter end, and apply our hearts unto wisdom.

The certainty of death should wean us from an undue attachment to this world's enjoyments. Were the good things of this life to continue ours for ever, and were there nothing better on which we could set our hearts, then would we do well to seek them as our chief treasures. But when blessings of far greater value are held out to us, and when the good things of time cannot satisfy an immortal spirit, and when, moreover, they cannot be ours long, how foolish would it be to give them the first place in our hearts! Would the traveller, who is returning from a long sojourn in a distant land, be so delighted with the accommodations of an inn, as to wish to continue there, though a few stages more would bring him to the end of his journey—to the embraces of his kindred, and to the happiness of a long-wished-for home? And should not we then—if amidst the world's allurements we should at any time feel disposed to say, 'This is our rest, and here will we abide, for we do like it well,'—should not we reflect that this cannot be our rest; that there remaineth a rest for the people of God in a far happier country, to which, with alacrity, we should bend our steps? The apostle, to moderate our joys and our sorrows, and our attachments in this fleeting world, speaks of all as the pageantry of a procession, which, whether joyful or mournful, whether magnificent or the reverse, passes, vanishes, and is seen no more. 'But this I say to you, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth that they who have wives be as though they had none; and they who weep as though they wept not; and they who rejoice as though they rejoiced not; and they who buy as though they possessed not; and they who use this world as not abusing it, for the fashion of this world passeth away.'

The certainty of death should lead us diligently to prepare to meet the Lord our God. 'It is appointed unto men once to die, but after death the judgment.' O the blessedness of being able to say in faith and hope, when the last moment comes, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit!' These were the last words of the dying Saviour, and they can become ours, only when by faith in his name we can look up to God as our reconciled Father through Christ Jesus. Without faith it is impossible to please God;—impossible to live in peace, to die in peace, to appear before him in peace. Jesus is our peace; by him alone the Lord's merited anger can be turned away. If we have laid hold on Christ as he is offered in the gospel, and have experienced the renewing efficacy of the Holy Spirit, then have we passed from death unto life; and being adopted into God's family, it will be our study to walk as the children of God. If the certainty of death has led us to flee to him who has conquered death, and who can give us the victory, then may we regard death as among the blessings of the covenant: and knowing that the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ his Son, we may often look forward to death; and welcome its approach without dismay, saying, 'I know in whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he will keep that which I have committed to him against that day.'

Reader! Hearer! Ponder the paths of thy feet. Hast thou not only entered, but continued long to advance in the paths of the wicked? Look back, I beseech thee, on the dark record of departed years, and consider what permanent advantage thou hast ever derived from the practice of iniquity. Has it rendered thee happy, peaceful, respectable? Does the remembrance of it soothe thee in the hour of sorrow? Will it afford any consolation when heart and flesh are beginning to faint and fail? Will it avail thee in that hour, when the silver cord shall be loosed, and the golden bowl broken; when the dust shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it? Was there ever a person known to rejoice at the hour of death that he had led a life of ungodliness? And has there ever been one, when stretched on his death-bed, known to lament, that 'in simplicity, and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, he had his conversation in the world?' Many, however, through the hope set before them in the gospel, have been enabled to rejoice even amidst the agonies of the last conflict. We have this, among many others, as the dying testimony of a faithful servant of Christ, who, in his journey towards Zion, had not been exempted from the trials of life: 'you have been accustomed,' said he to a friend who was weeping over him, 'to take notice of the sayings of dying men, and this is mine:—That a life spent in the service of God, and in communion with him, is the most comfortable and pleasant life which any man can lead in this world.'

At that awful moment when departing life is glimmering in the socket, when the glazed eye is fixed, when the faltering pulse has almost stopped, and when the pale countenance is beginning to change,—even the infidel might be convinced that the believer has the advantage of him. The believer not only rejoices in hope; but he can say, Though my hope should be ill-founded—though there should be no hereafter, and though life should be but a dream, my faith has rendered that dream unspeakably more delightful. It has guided me through life; it is cheering me at death; and if it be true, as I most firmly believe it is, it shall gladden and bless me through eternity. How different in these circumstances is the state of the infidel! Even though religion were false, he has not been a gainer by rejecting it; for, in doing so, he has rejected what alone could have enlightened the dark stages of his journey; and what alone could have shed a radiance on the clouds that hang over its close. And if it be true, (and the most determined infidel cannot be sure of the contrary) then for less than nothing and vanity he has neglected the great end for which he was created, and has sealed the eternal ruin of his immortal soul.

SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'And laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre,' Mark xv. 46.

NEVER had the grave opened to receive such a victim. Deeply interesting is the affecting record; may the Holy Spirit teach us to answer, according to his word, the following questions—

Where did they lay the blessed Saviour when they had taken him down from the cross? 'They laid him in a sepulchre hewn out of a rock.' Had the sepulchre been less secure, it would not have been so easy to gainsay the enemy, when it was said that the body was stolen away. As the sepulchre was under ground, (for they went down into it), and as it was hewn out of the solid rock, there was neither inlet nor outlet, but by the door, to which a great stone was rolled, and as the stone was sealed by those in authority, there could be no collusion betwixt the guards and his disciples. 'It was a sepulchre wherein never man before was laid; so that it could not be said that it was some other person than Jesus who arose; neither could it be said that he had been quickened by touching some holy prophet's bones.'

How was he buried? Openly. There was no secrecy; friends and foes might come. Alas! there were few friends; but they were sufficient to perform this last mournful duty, and to bear witness that he had been committed to his grave. When his disciples had fled, some faithful and affectionate women were found at the cross, and at the grave. There also do we find those who had once been faint-hearted—Nicodemus, who had come to the Saviour by night; and Joseph of Arimathea. Now, however, by strengthening grace, 'the weak were as David, when the strong were as tow.' Now, the lately timid Joseph, went in boldly unto Pilate and craved the body of Jesus; and he and the equally strengthened Nicodemus, having taken their revered Master from the cross, without fear of the consequences, laid him in Joseph's own sepulchre; so that by this, and his suffering as a malefactor, the prophecy was fulfilled that 'he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death.' There also his enemies were on the alert, their malice following him even to the grave; and the next day after the preparation, (and as the Jews reckoned their day from sunset to sunset, this was immediately after Jesus was laid in the grave), they went to Pilate, and telling that he had said when he was alive that he would rise again the third day, they sought and obtained a guard, and placed it at the sepulchre, and having sealed the stone, they probably dismissed their fears.

Why was he buried? To complete his humiliation. When a monarch dies, great is the descent from the palace to the tomb; but how much greater, when it is from the glory of heaven to the darkness of the grave! It was the lowest step, and it was taken. It also proved his death;—already proved, indeed, by the soldiers not breaking his legs, because they saw he was dead, and yet plunging the spear into his side, destroying life had one spark remained, and fulfilling the prophecies, 'they shall look on him whom they have pierced;' and a bone of him shall not be broken.' Other prophecies and types were thereby fulfilled. The sign of Jonas was now given when the Son of man was three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. And his own prophecy in the words of the psalmist; 'thou wilt bring me into the dust of death;' and his own predictions to his disciples were fulfilled, when he was laid in the grave.

This has been recorded for encouragement, and for warning. 1st. For encouragement. Our case is never hopeless, if, in faith, we commit ourselves to the Lord. He often causes dark clouds to gather round his people, that in utter hopelessness of human aid, they may look to the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, who fainteth not, neither is weary, and whose hand is never shortened that it cannot save. 'We were pressed,' says the apostle, 'out of measure, above strength, inasmuch that we despaired even of life; but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead; who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us.' In times of difficulty, and perplexity, and danger, then let us remember that the darkest hour of the night is that which immediately precedes the dawn, and let us look to him who can cause light to arise. When the affectionate disciples had laid their beloved Master in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and had rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, how would their hearts sink within them, when they departed from the sepulchre, their mournful duty being performed! And yet from that closed sepulchre what a beam of heavenly light was soon to shine! The Redeemer died, but by dying, and lying in the grave, and rising again, he has unstunged death, and changed its nature; and no less has he changed the nature of the grave. It was a prison; but to those who believe in Christ, it is a hiding-place where the wicked cannot trouble; and a chamber of repose where the weary are at rest. It was a loathsome dungeon; but it has become a bed of spices, a perfumed dormitory, where he gives his beloved sleep. And he will at last say to them, 'Awake and sing, ye that sleep in the dust, for your dew shall be as the dew of herbs.'

2d. For warning. For whom has Christ in dying conquered death? For his friends and followers only; for those who under his banners fight the good fight. Without the shield of faith you cannot fight the good fight; you cannot obtain the victory unless you are justified by faith; you cannot live in God's favour; you cannot die in peace. Death will come upon you with ten thousand times greater terrors than if you had never heard that he has been conquered. He will meet you unarmed, and feeble; with triumphant shout he will rush on his prey; and the withering stroke of his relentless hand will render you wretched for ever and ever.

This passage also warns us against being uncharitable in judging of others. Nicodemus at first came to Jesus by night, probably from fear, or from shame; and Joseph, it is written, was a disciple, but secretly for fear of the Jews. Some, on learning this, might be disposed to say, they cannot be true disciples, otherwise they would neither have been ashamed nor afraid to own Christ as their Master. But the trial was a great one to young disciples. They were men of rank, and had they publicly confessed themselves to be followers of Christ, they would probably have been put out of the council, and out of the synagogue. We do not defend their conduct. They ought to have publicly owned him, leaving the issue to providence. But though at first they had not sufficient faith to lead them to bear reproach, and to suffer loss; we find that in the time of need, when bolder men failed, more grace was given to them, so that strong in affectionate regard for their beloved Master, without shame or fear, they asked the body from Pilate; and the one furnishing fine linen, and the other a tomb, they performed every duty which devoted attachment could dictate. Let us not, then, despise in others the day of small things, but rather pray that he who breaks not the bruised reed, and quenches not the smoking flax, would cherish the spark of grace which he has communicated, till the day dawn, and the day-star arise in their hearts.

---

SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest,' Eccl. ix. 10.

MAN was created, not for sloth and idleness, but for a life of activity, both of body and mind. In paradise, there was employment for the mind, in contemplating the works of God's hand, and in adoring and worshipping the almighty Creator. There was exercise also for the body; for our first parents were placed in the garden of the Lord, and their happy employment was to keep and dress it. In heaven there shall be abundant occupation for the spirits of the just made perfect, in contemplating the wonders of redeeming love, and in celebrating the praises of God and of the Lamb. What shall be the employment of the glorified bodies of the saints in light, we cannot tell: but it shall be the perfection of the happiness of the ransomed, when, after the resurrection, their bodies and their spirits are constantly engaged in the blissful service of the Lord their God. Then there shall be no interruption, for there shall be no remaining weakness to render rest necessary; and there shall be no weariness, for they shall be constantly engaged in those very exercises in which they have the highest delight. Even in our present fallen state, it is only in the faithful discharge of duty that we can enjoy any portion of true happiness here, or can be prepared for the enjoyment of higher happiness beyond the grave. The time given us is limited, therefore the message of the Lord is, 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.'

What are we thus urgently called to do? Our duty as prescribed by God; and this we should resolve to do 'while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work.' We learn from the words of our blessed Master, what is the most essential part of the duty required of us. 'What shall we do,' said the Jews, 'that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered, and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.' Whosoever believeth on him shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life. 'But he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God.' Faith in Christ is the foundation work. 'Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid already, even Jesus Christ; and if we rest not on him, we are building a refuge of lies on the sand, and the first flood will sweep it away. Dost thou believe in Christ? is the first question then to be asked, and it is a most important one. If thou art destitute of faith, thou art destitute of the hand which lays hold on Christ for salvation; thou art without a right to the blessings of the covenant; and wert thou to die in this state, thou wouldst die in thy sins, and the blackness of darkness would encompass thee. If thou art without faith, the duties to which thou art loudly called are 'repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ.'

Hast thou faith? Thou art then God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained, that thou shouldest walk therein. It is God who has made thee to differ. He has extended towards thee his redeeming love; and thou hast been made nigh to him by the blood of his Son. When thou ponderest on that love which many waters could not quench, and many floods could not drown, surely the language of thy heart will be, I will love the Lord who has delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. 'What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits towards me?'

There is then a work of faith, and there are labours of love, in which the believer is bound to be engaged. He is bound to be diligent to increase in the knowledge of him, whom to know is life everlasting. He is bound to be diligent in cultivating increasing conformity to his beloved Master. He is bound to be diligent in seeking to promote the glory of God, and the welfare of immortal souls. He is bound to fight the good fight, to carry on the warfare against sin and Satan, and to follow the Captain of our salvation, whatever dangers may come in the way. He is bound to be ready, not only to do, but also to suffer according to the will of God;—seeking to glorify the Lord by patient endurance; by unflinching firmness; by cheerful resignation, saying, 'Not my will but thine be done.'

Thy duty, moreover, whatever it be, must be done speedily. 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it.' When? To-morrow? No; to-morrow may find thee in an eternal world;—but do it now—instantly—without delay; thou hast no time to lose: thou hast made no covenant with death and with hell. Up, then, and be doing. 'To-day, while it is called to-day, harden not thy heart.'

Do it heartily—'with thy might.' True, thou art of thyself all weakness and insufficiency; yet thou mayest be strong—'strong in the Lord and in the power of his might;' for, 'he giveth power to the faint, to those who have no might he increaseth strength.' 'Whatsoever thy hand' then 'findeth to do, do it,'—not in a cold, listless, lifeless manner, like a reluctant slave:—but 'with thy might,' as one whose heart is in the work, who is devoted to the service of the best of Masters, and who delights to spend and be spent in promoting the glory of Him who loved him, and gave himself for him.

And do it perseveringly. Whilst life continues thou art on the field of battle; and wouldst thou put off the harness, or seek discharge, till the shout of victory is raised? Onward, onward, in the path to glory. 'Be not weary in well-doing, for in due season thou shalt reap abundantly, if thou faint not.'

And how powerful are the motives to diligence. Death is at thy heels; the grave is opening to receive thee; and wert thou to die in the service of the adversary, unchangeable misery would be thy doom. In the grave there shall be found no place of repentance. Grief in that world of spirits there shall be; but no godly sorrow:—woe—woe unutterable, but it shall be from the pangs of remorse and despair. No offer of salvation shall there be made; never shall it again be said, 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved;' never in that dark abyss shall the long-neglected invitation be heard, Come unto me, and I will give you rest. The sentence passed is irreversible. The doom once fixed can neither be escaped, nor softened, nor shortened. It is commensurate with eternity, and it will continue for ever to be unmitigated woe, woe, woe! 'Knowing the terrors of the Lord, we would persuade men.' 'Beloved,' seeing that such is the doom of the ungodly, 'be diligent that ye may be found of Christ in peace, without spot, and blameless.'

THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up,'
John ii. 19.

THE occasion on which these words were uttered was a memorable one. It was when he had come up to Jerusalem at the passover, the first that had taken place after he entered on his public ministry. When he went into the temple to worship, 'he found in it those who sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting.' This was a profanation of God's house which had been sanctioned by those in power, under the pretext, no doubt, of accommodation to the worshippers; but, in reality, to make iniquitous gain. Jesus, on beholding it, was filled with holy indignation; and, having made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen, and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables, and said to them that sold doves, 'Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise,' or in still stronger language, 'a den of thieves.' Though the Jews durst not resist, they rendered an unwilling obedience, and seeing him acting like a prophet invested with heavenly authority, they said, 'What sign showest thou, seeing that thou doest these things? Jesus answered and said to them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up.'

They asked a sign. A sign means often in scripture, as in this place, a proof of the truth of anything: thus, 'What shall be the sign (i. e. proof) that the Lord will heal me?' Did they wish a miracle to prove that he was possessed of heavenly authority? Had they made inquiry at those who had come up from Galilee to the feast, they would have found that he had lately wrought a very wonderful miracle in changing twelve firkins of water into wine. But had he not already given them the strongest practical proof of his authority? One might have thought that it would have required a strong armed force to drive out traders of so many kinds, especially as their iniquitous trade had been sanctioned by high authority. But when this was effected by himself, and when, though in his holy zeal and indignation, by pouring out their money, and overthrowing their tables, he had done what was calculated to irritate worldly-minded men, they nevertheless fled in dismay before him, what more could reasonably have been asked in proof that he had a right to exercise the authority which he had now assumed, in driving those who profaned it out of the temple.

But did he give them any other sign? Had they asked in humility and in confirmation of their faith, a sign would immediately have been granted to them. But as they asked in the spirit of unbelief and hatred, he referred them to a distant proof in figurative language, saying, 'Destroy this temple, (meaning the temple of his body,) and in three days I will raise it up.' This was in conformity with his practice on other occasions of addressing himself to his malignant enemies in parables, that as they did not wish instruction, hearing they might hear, and might not understand. Thus, the same word, according to the disposition of the hearers, proves to some the savour of death unto death, and to others the savour of life unto life. They heard it in the spirit of hostility; they did not seek to be instructed in the meaning of it; and though they remembered it, they wrested it, and sought to work his ruin by a false statement of it when he was accused before Pilate. The disciples understood it not at the time; but they laid it up in their hearts, and pondered on it, and after his resurrection, had their faith by the remembrance of it confirmed.

His resurrection from the dead, to which he referred as the sign, was a complete proof of his divine authority, for he was thus declared to be the Son of God with power.

1. Had he been an impostor, he would never have appealed to such a proof; for his claims might have been put to the test, which would have proved his ruin. Such an appeal, had he been an impostor, would have shown that he was as foolish as he was wicked.

2. Though an impostor had been so foolish as to appeal to his resurrection on the third day, God would not have wrought a miracle to sanction the claims of an impostor. His resurrection from the dead is ascribed to the power of God the Father; and what better proof can we have that divine justice was satisfied, and the debt paid, than the deliverance of our Surety from the prison of the grave?

3. His resurrection on the third day, according to his well-known prediction, mentioned by his bitter enemies when they obtained a guard from Pilate, is a complete proof of his divine authority. He was man to die for us, and God to overcome death; and therefore does he say, 'I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it up again;' and here does he say, 'In three days I will raise it up.' He raised others: he said, 'Lazarus, come forth,' and he came forth after he had been four days dead. We read of others raising the dead; but where else do we read of a dead person raising himself to life? This could be effected only by divine power. Jesus had predicted his resurrection on the third day; and had appealed to it as the great proof on which he rested his claims. He did rise on the third day, God would not have deceived his people; therefore Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world.

Now, is there no practical lesson which the death and resurrection of the Son of God should teach us? If we believe that he died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, one might think that our own hearts should tell us what effect such wonderful truths should have on those who have experienced so much goodness and mercy. Had Christ been merely a man, and had he generously laid down his life for us; and by doing so had he been the means of saving us from great temporal calamities, and of obtaining for us great worldly blessings, what bounds should there have been to the grateful affection with which we cherished the memory of so generous a deliverer and benefactor? But when he was God as well as man, and when by divine power he took up the life which he laid down; and when he lives to bestow those rich blessings which his death purchased, and to intercede for us at the right hand of God, should not all that is within us be stirred up to laud and magnify his name; and should it not be our honour and happiness, as well as our duty, to live to his glory and praise? Had there been any doubt on the subject, the apostle would have removed it, for he says, 'Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.' And another apostle says, 'The love of Christ constrains us, because we thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead, and that he died for all, that they who live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for us and rose again.' Let us therefore present ourselves unto God, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable, which is our reasonable service: being not conformed to this world, but transformed by the renewing of our minds, that we may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'Now, if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him,' Rom. vi. 8.

By nature we were all dead in trespasses and sins, without the power, and without the will to live to God. We were dead, as lying under the sentence of condemnation. Already had we felt the withering blight of the curse of the broken law; and as we could have done nothing to free ourselves from the curse, it must have become heavier, and heavier, and heavier, for ever and ever. 'But when we were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly.' He came to redeem us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; bearing in his own body on the cross the curse that we had deserved. He died in our room and stead, and as believers are members of his mystical body, what happened to the Head may be said to have happened to the members. Believers, therefore, may be said to be dead by the law, to be crucified together with Christ, to be 'dead with Christ.'

As Christ died for sin, believers are bound to die to sin. As many as are baptized, are baptized into his death. Wherever union to Christ has taken place, this death to sin has begun also. 'Knowing this,' says the apostle, 'that our old man is crucified with Christ, that the body of sin might be destroyed.' With much propriety is this dying to sin compared to crucifixion, for it is a painful, lingering, and ignominious death. Though the crucifixion is still going on, the old man, even in the throes of death, continues to struggle; though, by the power of divine grace, he has been dethroned and disabled, and so much weakened that he is spoken of as destroyed. 'And the body of sin,' says the apostle, 'is destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin.' 'They that are Christ's then have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts;' 'the world is crucified to them, and they are crucified unto the world;' 'they are dead with Christ.'

But if we be dead with Christ, 'we shall also live with him.' Yea, they already live with him, not through any principle of life they have of themselves, but through his Spirit living in them. United to Christ by faith, they are not only justified through the merits of his blood, but sanctified also through the power of his Spirit. 'You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins;' and 'quickened,' it is added, 'together with Christ,' to teach that it was in consequence of being united to Christ by faith that they were quickened.

O what a blessed change has taken place on those who, by the power of divine grace, are living by the faith of the Son of God. By his Spirit they have been quickened; it is by his Spirit dwelling in them that they are kept alive, and that the work of sanctification is carried on in their souls. Christ is not only in them the principle of life, but the very end for which they live. 'To them to live is Christ;' it is his glory they have in view; it is his will they consult, and by his word and will they are regulated. 'The love of Christ constraineth them, because they thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead, and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but to him who died for them and rose again.' At first they may be but as babes in Christ; but will God forsake his own spiritual offspring? 'Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, she may forget; yet will not I forget thee. The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee: neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord.' Whom the Lord loves, he loves unto the end. The bruised reed he will not break, the smoking flax he will not quench; but, by the fostering breath of his Holy Spirit, he will fan the vital spark he has communicated, till it gradually brighten into a gladdening flame.

And yet what is all this to what is promised, when the apostle says, 'If we be dead with Christ, we shall also live with him.' He looks beyond the present life, with all its blessings, and fixes his enraptured gaze on the life which is to come. 'The gift of God is everlasting life through Jesus Christ his Son.' 'We shall live with Christ;' and oh, the blessedness of living with God, and with his Christ, through an eternity of happy years! Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things that God has laid up in store for those that love him. 'As the ransomed of the Lord they shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall receive joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall for ever flee away.' 'They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun smite them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'

Believer, art thou not encouraged by this? Thou art in the wilderness, but thou goest up leaning on Christ as thy beloved. Thou art surrounded by enemies; but there is one on thy side more powerful than all that can rise up against thee. Thou goest a warring; but thou art not sent on thine own charges, and thou goest clothed in the whole armour of God.

Believer, art thou not comforted by this? Thou art weak, and hast come far short of thy duty: but with the Lord there is righteousness and strength; with the Lord there is forgiveness and plenteous redemption.

Believer, art thou living with Christ now? Then art thou sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise; and what great things mayest thou hope for? A kingdom that cannot be moved; an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. Art thou not saying, What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? Lord, I am wholly thine. 'My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise; awake up my glory; awake psaltery and harp, I myself will awake early.'

Meditate much, then, O my soul, on the love of Christ; and rejoice that in dying he conquered death, and can make thee more than conqueror.

O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Christ is the resurrection and the life, and he will save from death, and raise to eternal glory, all who believe in him. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope.' 'Thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is fullness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.' I shall behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness.

FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay,' Matt. xxviii. 6.

'DESTROY this temple,' said Jesus, 'and I will raise it up in three days.' The temple had been destroyed. They had laid the dead body of the Saviour in a sepulchre hewn out of a rock; they had rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre; the chief priests had sealed the stone, and placed a watch. Great would be their triumph, but even the triumph of the enemies of Christ yields nothing deserving of the name of joy. Unspeakably more to be desired was the grief of Nicodemus, and of Joseph of Arimathea, while they affectionately removed the body of Jesus, and laid it in the sepulchre; or the sorrow of the pious and tender-hearted women, who witnessed what was done, sitting over against the sepulchre. Nay, greatly preferable was the heart-felt sorrow of the apostles, though much bitterness mingled with their grief. Not only had their hopes been blasted when their Master had been taken away; but they had the painful feelings of self-reproach; for they had forsaken their beloved Master in the hands of his enemies, in spite of their strong protestations that they would never forsake him. But though the tears they shed were in part the bitter tears of self-reproach, they were also the tears of contrition, and the tears of sincere affection, and the Lord was about to send them consolation. The night of their distress was now at the darkest, and the blessed dawn of gospel light was near at hand.

Angels first proclaimed the joyful tidings about to gladden them. The pious women, who had faithfully followed him to the grave, having 'rested the sabbath day according to the commandment,' were now returning early in the morning of the first day of the week, while it was yet dark, to discharge, with bleeding hearts, the last duties of affection to one whom they had so sincerely loved. They were aware of obstacles; and they said, 'Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?' for it was very great; but prompted by warm affection, though aware of the difficulty, they went onward. But when they came they found the stone rolled away; and they entered in, and found not the body of Jesus. 'And as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold two men stood by them in shining garments, who said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen; remember how he spake to you when he was yet in Galilee.' Angels, then, first proclaimed the tidings of the resurrection. An angel had proclaimed his birth; an angel had succoured him in the wilderness; an angel had comforted him in the garden of Gethsemane; but the days of his sufferings were over; and the brightest of the angels of light would be ambitious of the honour and happiness of proclaiming, even unto one or two mourners in Zion, that their Lord whom they sought was no longer among the dead: that he was the resurrection and the life; that though lately dead he was alive again: 'He is not here: for he is risen as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay.'

To whom were these joyful tidings first proclaimed? To the pious women who had so faithfully followed him. While this would convey a tacit reproof to the disciples who had forsaken him, it was intended, we doubt not, as a sweet and honourable reward to these devout females, for their superior courage and attachment. They had come with him from Galilee; they had followed him to Calvary; they had stood weeping by his cross; they had followed him to the sepulchre; and having seen where, and how he was laid; and having rested on the sabbath,—with the early dawn of the first day of the week they returned, bringing sweet spices, that they might pay the last tribute of respect and affection to one who had been so dear unto their hearts. When they came to the sepulchre, and saw that the stone was rolled away, and found not the body of Jesus, they were much perplexed: but the angel said to them, 'Fear not ye: I know that ye seek Jesus that was crucified; he is not here: he is risen as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay.' O how delightful to hear such tidings! To have their doubts in a matter of vital importance removed! to have an answer to impious gainsayers! to be commissioned to proclaim the joyful news of the resurrection to weeping friends! Accordingly, 'they departed from the sepulchre with fear and great joy; and ran to bring the disciples word.' Their own tears had been wiped away, and they hastened to be the messengers of joy to others.

But though the truth of God's word had been so far cleared up as to be the ground of great hope, and of most interesting expectation—still their hearts would desire something more. Many, many thoughts would arise in their minds. Is he indeed risen, would they say? Is it not all a dream? Was it in truth an angel who spake to us? Have we rightly comprehended his meaning? O! that we could once more see our beloved Master! O! that we knew where to find him, that we might cast ourselves at his feet! They had been faithful in little; and they were now to be blessed with much; for as they went according to the injunction of the angel to tell his disciples, 'behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. And he said unto them, Be not afraid; go, tell my brethren,' (blessed words! not my cowardly disciples), 'go, tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.' Their joy would be full. They had beheld their risen Master; and they would be ready to say, Lord, it is enough, it is enough; our eyes have seen thy salvation.

Mourner in Zion, why weepest thou? Mournest thou an absent Lord? Sayest thou, I have sought him whom my soul loveth; I sought him, but I found him not? O! that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even unto his seat! 'Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon.' Weep not, thou contrite mourner; thy beloved, though unseen, is near at hand. Seek him in the closet, and seek him in the sanctuary; seek him when thou risest up, and seek him when thou liest down; seek him when thou art at home in thy house, and seek him when thou goest by the way; his sweet accents will, ere long, be heard; his bright footsteps will, ere long, be seen; his benignant smile will, ere long, beam forth; he will again make himself known to thee, as he does not unto the world; and soon shalt thou say, with delighted heart, I have found him whom my soul loveth; I will hold him, and not let him go; 'my beloved is mine, and I am his;' he is the chief among ten thousands and altogether lovely.

FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept,' 1 Cor. xv. 20.

THE doctrine of the resurrection of Christ in connection with his atoning death, forms the very foundation of all our faith and hope. 'If Christ be not risen,' says the apostle, 'then is our preaching vain, and your faith also vain; ye are yet in your sins. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.'

What proof have we of this? Abundant proof; numerous witnesses. 1. The two angels who said, 'he is not here: he is risen as he said: come, see the place where the Lord lay.' If the testimony of two respectable men is considered sufficient; can we reject the testimony of two holy angels? 2. The Roman soldiers. They had been placed as a watch by the enemies of our Lord; but an angel descended from heaven, and rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre; and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. From their inability to escape, it is probable that they heard the angel declaring to the women that Jesus had risen. Afterwards some of the soldiers came into the city, and showed to the chief priests all the things that were done. The self-destructive lie, which by a bribe of large money they were by the unprincipled chief priests induced to tell, could not shake the belief of any person of the slightest reflection; for how could they possibly tell what was done when they were asleep? 3. Mary Magdalene. When in well-known accents Jesus said to her, Mary; with what delighted heart would she respond unto him, Rabboni, my Master. She was commissioned by him to tell the joyful tidings to his brethren; and though they might regard this, as they had done what had been told them of the vision of angels, as idle tales, their unbelief, till they had superabundant proof, helps to strengthen our faith. It shows that they were not the dupes of their wishes; for instead of being credulous, their Master needed to upbraid them, saying, 'O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that was spoken by the prophets.' 'They believed not for joy, and wondered.' 4. The disciples on various occasions. On that memorable first day of the week, on which he arose, he appeared to ten of the apostles, John xx. 19. And on the succeeding first day of the week, when they were again assembled, and Thomas with them, he appeared and gave such convincing proof to un-living Thomas, that he cried out, 'My Lord, and my God.' He appeared to two of the disciples as they journeyed to Emmaus, and was made known to them in the breaking of bread. He appeared on another occasion to several of the disciples, and said to them, 'have ye here any meat?' And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and a honey-comb, and he did eat before them.' At the sea of Tiberias he appeared to Peter, and Thomas, and Nathaniel, and the sons of Zebedee, and did sit at meat with them. On another occasion he was seen of above five hundred at once, of whom the greater part were alive at the time the apostle wrote, and were ready to give an answer if questioned by gainsayers. 'And last of all was he seen of me also,' says the apostle Paul, for 'the Lord appeared to him by the way to Damascus,' when he who had been a bitter persecutor was converted to the faith of the gospel.

Of what event in the whole range of history is there more abundant proof? The chosen witnesses were those who had seen him, and known him before his death, and who had the evidence of their senses to convince them that he had indeed risen. At last, in the very act of blessing them, he was parted from them, and taken up into heaven; and two angels said to them, 'Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus whom ye have seen taken up into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven.' And when, on the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, they were endowed with miraculous power from on high, being thoroughly convinced that their Master had gone into heaven, instead of meeting as they had done, in secret, for fear of the Jews, they in the most public manner proclaimed the truth as it is in Jesus, charging the chief priests with having crucified and slain the Holy One and the Just, whom God had raised from the dead, of which they were witnesses. In doing so they could have no prospect of worldly gain. On the contrary they met with nothing but hatred and persecution, so that the apostle might well say, 'if in this life only we have hope in Jesus, we are of all men the most miserable.' And yet not one of them apostatized: all of them continued steadfast till the end of their lives, and many of them sealed their testimony with their blood. And to what did they unflinchingly leave their dying testimony? It was to their belief of a fact. Many have become martyrs rather than renounce the most absurd opinions. Opinions may be firmly held whether they be right or wrong. But here do we find men of sound judgment, and good character, taking willingly the spoiling of their goods, yea, laying down their life in the flames, or on the cross, in testimony of their firm belief of a fact respecting which they could not be mistaken, and that fact of no less importance than the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

What profit is there, then, of the resurrection of Christ? Much every way. The scandal of the cross has passed away for ever. To the unbelieving 'Jews it may be a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but to them who are called, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.' Well may the believer say, 'God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world is crucified to me, and I unto the world.' He is risen! delightful, heart-rejoicing truth! The early Christians felt this, and, therefore, their gladdening congratulation, we are told, when they met, was, He is risen! He is risen! How precious to them; how precious also to us! How deep our interest in the truth of the resurrection of Jesus, for with the apostle we can say, 'now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept!' At a certain time an early sheaf of the ripening crop was brought to the priest who waved it before the Lord, who, by accepting it, made it the earnest and pledge of the coming harvest. 'Christ is risen,' risen by his own power, for he had power to take up his life again, and what an earnest, what a pledge to his followers, in his becoming the first-fruits of the rich harvest of the grave! 'For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' Others had been raised, to die again; but Jesus is risen never to die, and is become the first-fruits of those to be raised by him to live for ever and ever. He is declared to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection from the dead. It is a proof of his divinity. It is a proof that by his atoning death divine justice was satisfied, as God sent his angel to open the prison door to set our Surety free. 'He died for our sins; he rose again for our justification;' in proof that the debt was paid, the penalty endured, and our justification, through his merits, completed. It is a proof, 'that as many as believe in him shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life.'

Believer! has Christ risen as the first-fruits, and wilt thou grieve above measure for those who have fallen asleep in Jesus? Their souls are made perfect in holiness, and have passed into glory. Their flesh also doth rest in hope, and at his life-giving voice shall come forth, in ten thousand times greater loveliness than was ever possessed by the most lovely on earth. Dry up thy tears, thou affectionate mourner. 'Rejoice in the Lord, and again I say, rejoice.'

Unbeliever! has Christ risen from the dead, and hast thou not by faith laid hold on him as thy Saviour? Canst thou make a covenant with death, and with hell? Out of Christ thou must perish in thy sins; for to thine other unexpiated sins, thou hast added this, which is unpardonable, 'thou hast not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.' Up then while it is called to-day. 'The night cometh when no man can work.'

FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'So then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God,' Mark xvi. 19.

THE Lord's ascension, as well as his resurrection, had been the subject of prophecy. The holy men of old, who spake as the Spirit gave them utterance, had 'testified beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and of the glory that should follow.' So sure is the fulfilment of prophecy, that coming events are often spoken of by the prophets as having already taken place. Thus, 'Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive, thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them,' Psal. lxxviii. 18. And again, 'The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thy enemies thy footstool,' Psal. cx. 1. Before his death, Christ himself foretold his return to heaven, saying to his disciples, 'If ye loved me, ye would rejoice when I said, I go away, because I go to the Father.' And, after his resurrection, his first cheering message to his mourning disciples, whom he kindly calls his brethren, was, 'Say to them that I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God.' For wise and kind purposes his ascension was for a little delayed. Had he appeared only once to his disciples, and then been taken up into heaven, it would neither have been so satisfactory to them, nor would it have furnished so complete evidence to others, as when 'he showed himself alive, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days.' There were love and wisdom also in his gradually preparing them for his departure, and in fitting them by his instructions for the important duty which devolved on them, of being his chosen witnesses in the world; and of proclaiming among all nations the doctrines of the cross. What delight and edification would they derive from being permitted to hold converse with their risen Master! How would they hang upon his lips, seeking to profit by every opening of his mouth, and by every word of his tongue! Their instruction was a chief object; for we read that 'he gave commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen, and was seen of them forty days, speaking of the things pertaining unto the kingdom of God.' 'And after he had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.'

How great the glory to which he was exalted!

And yet with what beautiful simplicity of language it is expressed, 'He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God!' He humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also has highly exalted him. As God he could not be exalted. As the man, Christ Jesus, he humbled himself; as the man, Christ Jesus, he was exalted, his glory shining forth more brightly when contrasted with his great humiliation. He not only entered heaven in holy triumph, but he sat on the right hand of God. God is a spirit, not composed of bodily members, and therefore the language is in accommodation to our ideas. To be seated on the right hand of a king is regarded as the highest earthly honour, and sitting on the right hand of God the King of kings is expressive of the highest heavenly honour.

It was from mount Olivet he ascended. This had been a place of favourite resort. We read that he went to the mount of Olives, as he was wont, with his disciples. There had he often spoken to them, as never man spake; there had he often prayed with them, as never man prayed; and there had he also suffered, as never man suffered. What had been the place of sweet converse; the place of fervent prayer; the place of agonizing sufferings; was destined to be the place from which he was to ascend to glory. Should not the home, then, where we meet with our family and friends be, not only the place of sweet converse, but the place where prayer is wont to be made? And should not the closet of the believer be a place of converse with Jesus, and a little sanctuary for prayer—that though it should soon become the chamber of sore trouble, yea, and the chamber of death—the chamber of affliction may be gladdened with the Lord's presence, and the bed of death may be the place from which the ransomed spirit rises to the glory of the heavens?

What encouragement does the ascension of Christ give to his followers! When the Redeemer became obedient unto death, and was laid in the grave, what gloom would overspread the infant church! Greatly would the disciples fear that their cause was lost, and that the enemy had prevailed. These fears must be for ever dissipated when their Lord not only rose from the dead, but was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. His inveterate enemies might be filled with hatred and rage: but 'He who sitteth in the heavens would laugh; the Lord would have them in derision.' Where he had gone, they could not follow. There was a gulph betwixt, which they could not cross: and a gulph beneath ready to swallow the impenitent.

His followers would then remember that he had said that it was expedient for them that he should go away, 'For if I go not away, the Comforter will not come: but if I depart, I will send him to you.' And the promise of the Holy Ghost was not restricted to his immediate followers, but is given for the encouragement of believers even unto the end of the world.

'Christ,' says the apostle, 'has entered into heaven itself, to appear in the presence of God for us.' Believers are of themselves unworthy of the honour of approaching the footstool of God's throne, and of raising to him their prayers; but what encouragement is it to know that their prayers rise with acceptance, perfumed with the incense of Christ's intercession, who sits as our Mediator at the right hand of God.

How encouraging the consideration that he has gone to prepare a place for his followers! 'In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, ye may be also.' Are not all his promises yea and amen? What implicit confidence then may you repose in him. The Forerunner has entered the everlasting gates, and his followers shall all enter also. The Head is already in heaven, and so ere long will be all the members. We follow, in thought, even the earthly friend who has entered within the vail, and we cherish the hope that he still takes an interest in those who were the endeared companions of his pilgrimage while he tabernacled here below. O should not believers then be encouraged to look to Christ, when they are assured that, amidst the glory of the heavens, he is not for a moment unmindful of them; that by his Spirit he is present with them on earth; that he will never leave them; that he will be their guide even unto death, and at death will receive them into glory?

---

FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God,' Col. iii. 1.

HE is risen indeed, and has appeared unto many. 'Unto the apostles whom he had chosen, he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.' And after he had given commandments unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. What is the practical bearing of this sublime truth? 'If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.'

Our duty then is to 'seek those things which are above.' To be disposed to seek them, the understanding must be enlightened, that we may have some idea of their great value. Naturally, our eyes are blinded, and our understanding darkened. We are quick-sighted as to the supposed value of worldly things; but 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' He only who is taught by the word and the Spirit of God, sees the worth of 'those things which are above.' But he who is enlightened, not only sees their value, he sets his affections on them, and wishes to obtain them. Nor does he merely wish for them, he strives to obtain them, with a vehemence of zeal and energy proportioned to the value he sets on them. 'Work out your salvation,' says the apostle, with fear and trembling; for it is the Lord who worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.' We may engage in the world's business with zeal and activity; but 'the things which are above' being unspeakably more precious, on them chiefly must our affections be set; them must we most highly prize, and most ardently seek after. The things which are on the earth are temporal, the things which are above are spiritual and eternal.

What are those things which are above? They are heavenly blessings, of which no tongue can speak in terms proportioned to their worth. God himself is the chief portion of his people: he is their all in all; and blessed they whose heritage is the Lord. 'Know then the God of thy father,' said David to his son, Solomon, 'and serve him with a perfect heart, and a willing mind.' To seek God, then, is to seek to enjoy him as our covenanted God; to seek to live in his service, and in communion with him, as the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: to seek fresh communications from on high; rich outpourings of the Holy Spirit, that we may 'be sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession to the praise of his glory.' As from him cometh down every good and every perfect gift, among the things which are above, which we are to seek, are those supplies of heavenly grace which transform us more and more into the image of Christ, and render us meet for being partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.

Our being risen with Christ is a reason why we should seek those things which are above. And what is meant by being risen with Christ? We must bear in mind that without Christ we were dead. The natural man is dead, because condemned by the broken law. He is dead—not to natural actions;—he can eat, and drink, and walk. Not to rational acts;—he can think, and reason, and argue. Not to civil acts;—he can buy and sell. Not altogether to moral acts;—he can be honourable in his transactions, he can be kind to the poor, and affectionate to his friends. But he is spiritually dead: and till quickened together with Christ, he cannot perform any spiritual service so as to be acceptable unto God: he may have the form—but he is destitute of the power of godliness. Though spiritually dead by the poison of sin, as soon as he believes in Jesus he is quickened; the sentence of the law is blotted out, and there is no condemnation to him as being in Christ Jesus: as it is written, 'You, being dead in your sins, and in the uncircumcision of your flesh, has he quickened together with him, having forgiven all your trespasses.' Now, then, 'if ye be risen with Christ;' or, if believers, 'since ye are risen with Christ, seek those things which are above.' Christ has quickened you for this very purpose, that you might set your affections, not on those things which are on the earth, but on those things which are above; walking by faith, and not by sight; 'living by the faith of the Son of God, who loved you, and gave himself for you.' Let your lives be hid with Christ in God. Seek heavenly things; they are in store for you. Prize spiritual things; they were bought with the blood of the Son of God.

There are both motive and encouragement 'to seek those things which are above,' in the words, 'where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.' Is Christ the treasure of your soul? Is he to you the chief among ten thousand? Then, surely, you will desire, when the pilgrimage of life comes to a close, to ascend to heaven where he reigns in glory; and to be for ever with the Lord. Unless, however, you both seek and obtain, through his merits, spiritual blessings from above, while you tabernacle here below, you cannot enter these blessed abodes; for without faith it is impossible to please God; without holiness no man can see his face in peace. But what encouragement have we to ask in his name, when he is seated on the right hand of God, and when he has said, Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full! For the encouragement of his disciples, when about to leave them, and of his followers in every age, he said, 'at that day' when he was at the right hand of God;— 'at that day ye shall ask in my name, and I say to you that I will pray the Father for you. For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.' Will you not seek then those things which are above, when Christ, in whose name you solicit them, has promised that he will pray the Father for you; and when, for the sake of his all-powerful intercession, God will not only fulfil your desires, but will do unto you far more exceedingly above all that you can ask or think? Is it possible that you can contemplate Christ at the right hand of God, and the rich blessings he is ready to shower down on you, and yet cleave unto the dust, and to the things which are on the earth? Open your mouths wide for heavenly grace—for 'the unction of the holy One;' the 'anointing which is received of the Father, and which abideth;' which restamps you with the lost image of God; and seals you for coming glory.

---

SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven,' Acts i. 11.

THIS is not a solitary statement of this glorious event. We find it thus recorded by the evangelist Mark, 'So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.' And in the Gospel according to Luke, 'And he led them as far as to Bethany; and he lifted up his hands and blessed them. And it came to pass while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. And they worshipped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; and were continually in the temple praising and blessing God.' He was received into the heaven of heavens, or in his own words, 'into the place where he was before.' If there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, what joy would there be on the return to heaven of him who gives repentance—and gives, by his atoning sacrifice, efficacy to repentance; and saves a multitude, whom no one can number, from merited misery, and raises them to an eternity of peace and joy. What joy would there be among the ransomed who, through the prospective influence of his atoning blood, had already entered the abodes of bliss. When they saw him seated on the right hand of God, to plead the cause of their brethren in the wilderness below, with what redoubled rapture would they cry, Halleluia, Halleluia; salvation to our God who sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever. To him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests unto God, and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises to our King, sing praises.

As the bodies of the saints who are alive at his second coming are to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, so in all likelihood in a moment would Christ's body be transfigured before his disciples. Perhaps in the very act of blessing them, his countenance would shine like the sun, and his raiment would become white and glistering, and in slow and glorious triumph would they see him ascending, till, while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, a cloud—the bright symbol of the presence of the invisible God—received him out of their sight. 'When behold two men, i. e. angels, 'stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.' Behold an employment worthy of angels; at once serving Christ, in instructing his servants; and being ministering spirits unto those who are the heirs of salvation.

And what were the effects produced by what they heard, and what they saw? 1st. Had the slightest doubt remained on their mind as to the divinity of their blessed Master, it must have been for ever dissipated. They had beheld the King in his glory, they had seen him ascending to the abodes of everlasting joy; they had heard the testimony of angels that he had gone into heaven, and would in glory return from heaven; every one of them would be ready, like Thomas, to say, 'My Lord, and my God;' and they worshipped him.' 2d. They were filled with great joy. Before his death, when he spoke of his departure, they were very sorrowful. He told them that it was expedient for them that he should go away, as he would send them the Comforter; and that if they loved him, they would rejoice when he said he was going away; because he was going to the Father. Now, they did rejoice; they rejoiced that he had entered the realms of glory; that he had risen superior to all his enemies; that all power was given to him in heaven, and on earth; and that that power would be exercised in behalf of his followers. 'And they returned to Jerusalem with great joy.'

3d. They continued to wait on God in his public ordinances, and in social worship. Not only were they continually in the temple at the hours of prayer, praising and blessing God; but in the upper room where they assembled as the followers of Jesus, 'they all continued, with one accord, in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' 4th. They continued steadfast to the last in the service of Christ. After the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost, they in the boldest and most public manner preached the gospel of the kingdom, proclaiming their once crucified, but now risen, ascended, and glorified Master, as both Lord and Christ. They continued to do so at Jerusalem in the presence of those by whom he had been crucified, and throughout the earth; not one of them flinching from the dangerous undertaking; not one of them renouncing the faith; but taking willingly the spoiling of their goods; enduring reproach, and cruel mockings, and scourgings, and imprisonment, and banishment, and even death itself;—many of them sealing their testimony with their blood.

And what effect has the ascension of Christ produced on us? O! should we not rejoice that he can say, 'I have glorified thee on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. And now, O Father, thou hast glorified me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was?' Should we not rejoice in the exaltation of our best friend;—in the victories he has obtained;—in the blessings he has purchased;—in the redemption he has wrought out;—in our having in him at the right hand of God, an Intercessor, 'whom the Father heareth always;' and is ready to supply all our wants, according to his riches in glory by Jesus Christ?

How consolatory is it, in troublous times, for the church to look up to her glorious Head, and to remember the love which he bears to Zion! 'He has graven Zion on the palms of his hands, and her walls are continually before him;' and neither the powers of the world, nor the gates of hell, shall ever prevail against her. Chastenings and judgments may be sent, but it is in mercy and in faithfulness. Enemies may increase against her, and dangers may rise around; but the Lord reigneth over Zion, and let 'Zion's children be joyful in their King,' 'In six troubles he will deliver her; yea in seven no evil shall touch her.' 'The Lord of hosts is with her; the God of Jacob is her refuge.'

Look up, then, believer to Zion's King. Daily learn of this glorified Master. Diligently prepare for his glorious appearing;—then, when the sudden shout is raised, He cometh! He cometh! the Bridegroom cometh! Your glad response will be, Welcome! Welcome! Welcome Christ, Welcome heaven, Welcome eternal glory!

SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad,' 2 Cor. v. 10.

WHAT great events come under our notice in reading the New Testament scriptures; the birth,—the death,—the resurrection,—the ascension of Christ, are events that are past. Another wonderful one to come is the judgment. That coming event is most certain. We have it here declared by the inspired apostle, and it elsewhere rests on the authority of Christ himself. 'When the Son of Man,' says he, 'shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.' It is the certainty of this day of final doom that vindicates the ways of God to man, and which will show that verily there is a reward for the righteous. God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ his Son.

Before his judgment-seat we must all appear. When he shall come in his own glory, and with the Father's glory, and with attending angels, how striking will be the counterpart to that state of humiliation when no man stood by him; when his very friends forsook him and fled! How fitting that he should appear invested with all glory and power, to those who mocked, and despised, and crucified him in the exercise of their little, brief, tyrannical power; and that he should return to be the sovereign Judge of those by whom in the days of his flesh he was so iniquitously judged!

When he cometh he will judge righteous judgment; he will render to every man according to his works. Lest any, however, should think that they who are saved, shall be saved by the deeds of the law, let us not forget that Christ has said, 'this is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.' 'He that believeth on him shall not be condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he has not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.' God has given us his Son, and the gospel of his Son, and he has given us sufficient evidence, yea 'infallible proofs,' that he is his Son; our destiny, then, on the last day will hinge on this. Have we believed in him as the Son of God, and have we received him as the only Saviour? If we have,—then we shall have lived by the faith of the Son of God; and the sentence shall be, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.' If we have not, then the fruits of faith not having been exhibited, the dreadful sentence shall be, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' They who have not fled to Christ, and by faith laid hold on him, are still under the law; and by the law they shall be judged. The law is holy, and just, and good, and it requires perfect obedience, and it denounces an everlasting curse on every one that transgresseth, or that cometh short of its requirements. There is none that liveth and sinneth not, so that by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified; and he who has not faith in the offered Saviour, shall be judged without mercy; for he has despised the offered mercy; he has spurned at the sceptre of grace; he has rejected the only remedy; and he must, therefore, reap the fruit of his unbelief and ungodliness. 'If he that despised Moses' law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses; of how much sorer punishment will he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace! 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.'

As Jesus has said that they only who do the will of our Father in heaven shall enter into the kingdom of heaven;—are they admitted because of the merit of their works? No! so imperfect are their services, and so numerous are their omissions and transgressions, that if the Lord were to mark iniquity, and in strict justice to deal with them, according to the merit of their deeds, they could not stand in judgment; their thoughts, and words, and works must condemn them. But they have been made acquainted with him who came to be a propitiation for sins. They have laid hold on Christ, who is made unto them wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. 'By grace they are saved through faith, and that not of themselves, it is the gift of God; not of works lest any man should boast;—and yet every one shall receive according as his works shall be.

The wicked shall receive according as his works have been. He who has not faith is under the law; and as he must bear the penalty of the broken law, his lot must be perdition; for his deeds have been evil. He, on the other hand, who has faith,—having the righteousness thereof, and having brought forth its fruits, shall stand rejoicing in that day. For the gospel tells him, that if in faith and contrition 'we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' By believing, Christ becomes the Lord our righteousness, our substitute, and surety; and his righteousness is imputed to us, i. e. is placed to our account. The blood of Christ can cleanse from all unrighteousness; and therefore the Lord has said, 'I will be merciful to your unrighteousness; your sins and your iniquities I will remember no more.'

Not only is Christ made unto the believer righteousness, but also sanctification and redemption; so that not only has he redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins;—not only is he clothed in the robe of his righteousness, but being renewed in the spirit of his mind, and made a new creature in Christ Jesus, he seeks to live to the glory, and in the enjoyment of God; for he 'is God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God has before ordained that he should walk in them.' Good works then, though not in any degree the meritorious cause of salvation, are the unailing fruits of faith;—the natural consequences of being in a state of grace. Far, indeed, does the believer come short, and often does he offend, and far is he from having as yet attained perfection; but his treasure is in heaven;—his face is Zion-ward; and though powerful enemies oppose his progress, by whom he may at times be discomfited, he returns to the charge, knowing that in the end he shall be made even more than conqueror. He is weak in himself; but in the Lord he is strong; and he is incited to diligent exertion in the Lord's cause, by the remembrance that his person and services are accepted in the Beloved; and that there is a rich reward of grace awaiting his sincere though imperfect obedience.

It is a serious consideration also, that every thought, and word, and deed, is not only remembered, but goes to the formation of character. The believer is like the gifted artist set zealously to work on the marble statue, newly blocked out of the native rock. As yet the outline is rude, and the features rugged; but he has a standard of ideal excellence in his mind's eye, and in seeking conformity to it, he assiduously labours. Day after day, and month after month, he plies his task, and amidst numerous discouragements he perseveringly proceeds, for he toils for immortality; and he thinks himself amply rewarded, if at last his work stand forth, almost instinct with life, and of surpassing beauty,—and be beheld with universal admiration. O! believer canst thou grudge labour, when thou seekest a better immortality; when thy model is the Son of the Eternal,—when something better than genius directs thee;—when thy hand is guided by the Spirit of God? He can soften the more than marble-hardness of the natural heart, and mould it to his will. He can carry on the work towards the measure of the perfect stature of the fullness of Christ, and can reward thee,—not with the applause of a fickle world, but with the approbation of God, when before assembled worlds thou shalt hear,—with a thrill of joy which would be too enrapturing for the body of flesh to endure,—'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!'

Unbeliever! thou also art labouring for eternity;—thou also art laying up in store;—thou also art completing a likeness;—but thou art working blindfold, and thou shalt shudder when thou seest it accomplished; for thou art fashioning thyself after the image of Satan, the murderer from the beginning; yea, thou already resemblest him, for thou art murdering thine own soul, and seeking to murder the souls of others. A little longer and the work is finished, and thy damnation is sure; and thou must thyself own the justice of thy doom, when Christ, thy long insulted Judge, shall say from his throne, Depart from me, thou cursed, into everlasting fire. Thou wouldest not come to me, that thou mightest have life; thou wouldest not believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God!

SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead,' Acts xvii. 31.

'It is appointed for all once to die.' Though we were to sink into nothing at death, this would be a solemn event: but life and death rise into ten thousand times greater importance when 'after death the judgment,' and when the way in which we have spent this brief life is to tell on our destiny through eternity.

The day is appointed. It is appointed by God, whose decrees are unchangeable. It is a set time: a set time has limits. Eternity has none; so that, compared with eternity, the intervening time may be said to be short. Every moment also is making it shorter, every step is bringing us nearer the judgment-seat. Therefore the apostle says, 'The coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' Behold, the Judge standeth before the door.

Who is to be the Judge? The man whom God hath ordained. In these words, 'the man whom he hath ordained,' there is an obvious allusion to Christ's humiliation: 'who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took on himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and, being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross.' 'Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him;' and how right and fitting was it that he who humbled himself to redeem, should be exalted to high honour as Judge! And how much kindness was manifested to the children of men in appointing Christ to be the Judge! Had we been allowed to choose our judge, whom could we have chosen in preference to him, who, 'though rich, for our sakes became poor, that we, through his poverty, might be made rich;' who, 'though the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person,' became 'bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh;'

yea, died 'the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God?'

And in what manner is he to conduct the judgment? 'In righteousness:' 'shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' There shall be no undue rigour; but every allowance consistent with justice for our infirmities; and for our disadvantages and difficulties. Though invested with high prerogative, there shall be nothing arbitrary in his proceedings; but he will conduct the judgment according to righteous principles previously made known. There shall be no partiality. Earthly judges, even without knowing it, by a natural regard for their friends and connections, and by their party feelings, are at times partial. But with the Lord there is no respect of persons. The rich and the poor shall stand on the same footing before his tribunal. No wealth can bribe him; no power overawe him; no flattery can blind him; no cunning can deceive him. Every decision shall be according to perfect righteousness, so that even those who are consigned to misery shall be constrained to own the justice of their doom. All who have laid hold on Christ by faith shall be regarded as righteous in his sight, for they are arrayed in the spotless robe of his own righteousness. Though their own deeds could not stand scrutiny so as to merit reward in point of law, a reward of grace has been promised; and the rewards of grace shall in that day be apportioned by the Judge according to righteousness. They shall consequently be, not in proportion to the greatness of the services in the eye of the world, but according to the ability of those who performed them; and according to the holiness of the motives from which they flowed. Accordingly, the mite of the widow, given in the richness of her love, and in the depth of her penury, shall receive a more glorious reward of grace from the heart-searching Judge, than the costly donations of the rich who, out of their abundance, gave much. The hope of this reward should stir us up to exertion, and it may influence the noblest minds. Moses 'had respect unto the recompence of the reward.' But it is on Christ's righteousness alone that we can rely for acceptance of either our persons or services. He is all our salvation. Arrayed in the pure robe of his righteousness, we shall be able, amidst the awful splendour of his coming, to 'lift up our heads on high;' for our best Friend is to be our Judge, and he cometh in his glory to save us.

How dreadful must be the judgment to the ungodly, both because Jesus is to be the Judge, and because he is to judge in righteousness!

Christ was offered to them as a Saviour, and they rejected him. They were told of the judgment to come, but they turned away their thoughts from it, as if that would have turned away the judgment from them. 'If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' How deplorable shall be their state when the cry is raised, 'Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him, and shall wait for' their unpardoned iniquities!

'It is appointed unto men once to die; but after this the judgment.' O! is it not the coming judgment that renders death so awful to sinful men? When a chained prisoner 'reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come,' a conscience-stricken Roman governor trembled on his judgment-seat. But though Felix trembled, he stifled his convictions, and perished under much deeper guilt than if he had never heard the convincing reasonings of the inspired apostle. But what is the savour of death unto death to some, may prove the savour of life unto life to others. After having long been listless hearers of the word, the inhabitants of St Kilda were, a few years ago, by God's grace, so much impressed by a discourse addressed to them by their pious minister, on the judgment of the great day, that they could scarcely give sleep to their eyes at night; and the first thing that for several mornings many of them did, was to ascend to their highest ground to see whether there were any appearances of the Lord's coming to judgment. And this, their minister told me, was the beginning of an awakening, the salutary effects of which are still apparent on the simple-hearted inhabitants of that remote isle of the sea.

Because this predicted event has not yet taken place, let not any say in his heart, 'My Lord delayeth his coming,' and begin to act as if he were never to come; as if the judgment were never to be set; and the books never to be opened. 'The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up.' The Lord has not only appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he has ordained, but he has given assurance of this to all men in that he has raised him from the dead. When our blessed Saviour tabernacled here below, he declared that he was appointed by God to judge the quick and the dead, and appealed to his resurrection as a proof of this; and when God did raise him from the dead, he thereby set his seal to his commission, and openly proclaimed him as the Son of God with power, by whom the world was to be judged. With this assurance, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation, and godliness, looking for, and hasting to, i. e. making diligent preparation for, the coming of the day of God! The times of ignorance have passed; the gospel light has arisen; and God now calls on all men to repent. Nor is repentance all that is required. Mere sorrow for sin would not be sufficient. It might be the sorrow of the world that worketh death. Grief for being deep in debt, can never pay off the debt. Sinner! the most High requires of thee—not only repentance towards God—but faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. Flee then to the Saviour. He sweetly invites—he will affectionately welcome thee. But if thou wilt not come to Him for mercy—He will come to thee in judgment:—He will come in flaming fire, to punish thee with everlasting destruction from the presence of God, and from the glory of his power. Let the terror of the Lord persuade thee to flee from the wrath to come. The sceptre is still held out. The door is still open. Bow before the sceptre of grace. Turn thee to the stronghold while the gate is unshut. Turn thee, turn thee, why wilt thou die?

---

SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame,' 1 Cor. xv. 34.

SIN is compared in scripture to sleep; for as the natural senses are bound up in natural sleep, the sinner's spiritual senses are so locked up that he does not exercise them to discern betwixt good and evil. And as he that is asleep is void of care and fear; the sinner is without fear or care, though in the greatest possible danger. Repentance is spoken of as awaking from sleep. As the aroused sleeper, when told of impending danger, instantly flees from it, so he who was asleep in sin, when the eyes of his understanding are opened to the greatness of his danger, flees from it to the only stronghold. He who is thus aroused, not only flees from sin, but awakes to righteousness, that is, to a holy life and conversation. Righteousness is the soul's conformity to the rule of the divine law contained in the scriptures; in which we have not only a perfect rule, but a perfect pattern set before us. God has revealed himself to us in the face of his Son, and we should contemplate Christ, that thus 'beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, we may be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.'

Precious is the knowledge of God as revealed to us in the gospel of Christ his Son; for where there is the saving knowledge of him, the Spirit of God has enlightened our eyes, and taken of the things that are Christ's, and has shown them to us, and has taught us their value. We cannot have the knowledge of God, as revealed by his word and Spirit, without being constrained to love him, and to seek to live to him. Had he been like the false gods of the heathens, the knowledge of him might have been productive only of hatred, or of fear; or it might have encouraged us to indulge in those sins of which their gods were supposed to set the example. But our God is adorned with every excellence and perfection; and possessed of every attribute that is calculated to command our veneration and love. He made man in his own image, in knowledge, in righteousness, and in holiness; and while he continued holy, he was happy in his delightful service, enjoying the smile of his Creator, and holding blissful communion with the Lord by whom he was made. One might have thought that the sin of our first parents would only have drawn forth some wrathful manifestation of his power in the destruction of his ungrateful and rebellious creatures: but whilst he showed his displeasure, and his hatred of sin, the fall proved the occasion of making us acquainted with the loveliest attribute of the divine character—his mercy towards his fallen creatures. The manner in which this mercy was exercised increases our veneration. Had it been mercy merely—a general act of indemnity—it might have lessened our reverence, and might have emboldened us in the practice of sin, as men are encouraged to disobey, by excessive lenity in their earthly rulers. But in showing compassion to sinners, he has also shown his hatred of sin; he has magnified his law, and made it honourable; for mercy and truth have met together; and he can be just, and yet the Justifier of the ungodly. We had no claim on his mercy; but he gave unsolicited—of his own free will—of his mere good pleasure, from the benignity of his nature, which delights in bestowing blessings. And then, what he gave was worthy of the heavenly Giver; it was a gift to which an equal could not be found in the whole of his boundless dominions;—it was the greatest gift which even the Almighty could bestow. The redemption of the soul was precious, and had well nigh perished—for where was the ransom? 'The depth said, It is not in me; the sea said, It is not in me:—the topaz of Ethiopia could not equal it, neither could it be valued with pure gold. But the Lord passed by, and saw us in our blood, and he said unto us, Live; yea, he said unto us, Live: and the time was a time of love. 'He gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but should have everlasting life.' A speculative knowledge of all this we may have, and be strangers to heavenly love, and holy living. But if the knowledge, and the love of God be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us, there love will spring up in return, and we shall seek to serve him whom 'we sincerely love; for 'if any man love me,' saith Christ, 'he will keep my words.'

How many are there, however, who do not keep his words; and where sin is wilful and habitual, is it not to be traced to this, that 'they have not the knowledge of God?' They know that there is a God, but they know not his nature. They either think that he is such a one as themselves, who will wink at sin; or they regard him as a stern and arbitrary master, commanding disagreeable services; shutting up from enjoyment; and prohibiting all that can yield delight. O! they do not know that 'he is love, and dwelleth in love;—that he delights in the happiness of his creatures, and has done more for the salvation of the rebellious sons of men, than any of them could ever have thought of, or durst ever have ventured to ask. They do not know that his laws are good, and wise, and holy; that his commandments are not grievous, that his restraints are salutary, and prohibit only what would prove our ruin. They do not know—do not from the heart believe, that he offers the pardon of all their sins through the blood of his Son; and not only grace and guidance here, but everlasting glory in the world to come. Satan has blinded the minds of those who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them. 'They have not the knowledge of God,' and therefore 'they walk in the way of their own heart, and in the sight of their own eyes.'

If ignorance of God was shameful in the Corinthians who had been brought up amidst the darkness of heathenism, how much more shameful and inexcusable is it in the inhabitants of Christian lands! In them it is wilful ignorance; they love darkness rather than light; they will not come unto the light, lest their deeds should be reproved. Great is their guilt, and if they continue impenitent, great ere long must be their condemnation. God, in his mercy, yet cries unto them, 'Awake;' and the original word implies an awaking after a fit of intoxication. O! you have too long been intoxicated by sin; too long imposed on by Satan; too long sunk in deadly lethargy. 'What meanest thou, O sleeper? Arise, and call on thy God, if so be that God think on thee, that thou perish not.' God does think on thee. He still waiteth to be gracious. In his great mercy he seeks to rouse thee: he says, Awake, awake: 'awake to righteousness, and sin not.' 'Why wilt thou die?' Why wilt thou perish in thy rebelliousness? 'Awake thou that sleepest; and arise from the dead, and Christ will give thee light.' O! wilt thou weary out such patience? Wilt thou exhaust such long-suffering? Wilt thou constrain him to say, Sleep on; 'and according to thy hardness, and impenitent heart, treasure up for thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God?' The sleep of death is coming; the night of the grave is at hand; but there shall be an awakening; the trump of God shall rouse thee; the voice of Christ shall be heard by thee in the grave, and thou must come forth; and alas, alas! to the resurrection of damnation.

—
EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

*'For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous :
but the way of the ungodly shall perish,'* Psal.
i. 6.

DIVERSIFIED as the character and conduct of the children of men may appear to mortal eyes, in the sight of God the whole race is comprehended in the two classes here mentioned, the righteous, and the ungodly. At the great day, the tares shall be separated from the wheat, and the sheep from the goats. 'The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, but the way of the ungodly shall perish.'

But who are the righteous? They who have been convinced that by nature all are unrighteous;—that 'the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men,—and who have been led, in spiritual alarm, to cry out, How shall we escape from the wrath to come? What shall we do to be saved?—and who, by the word and Spirit of God, have been led to flee to Christ for salvation; and have obtained not only justification through his blood, but sanctification through his Spirit; and have become new creatures in Christ Jesus. Free from sin they are not, for there is none that liveth and sinneth not; but sin has no longer the dominion over them; they live not in sin as their element; they regard it as the plague of the heart which they desire to be thoroughly healed; they are dying unto sin, and it is their desire and endeavour to live by the faith of the Son of God who loved them, and gave himself for them.

And what profit is there in this? 'The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous.' In scripture, to know, often signifies to approve. 'The Lord knoweth them that are his.' 'I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy; for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversity.' 'You only have I known of all the families of the earth,' said God of old to his favoured people. 'I will not know a wicked person,' i. e. I will not approve of him. 'Then will I profess unto them, I never knew you,' (never approved of you, never owned you as my followers), 'depart from me, ye workers of iniquity.' But 'the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.' He approveth of them, and loveth them, 'and spareth them as a man spareth his son that serveth him.' In all their ways they acknowledge him, and he directeth their steps, and bringeth their ways to a happy issue. Even now he causeth goodness and mercy to follow them; and he leadeth them in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. And eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived the blessedness he has laid up in store for them in a better world. Richer shall be their portion of glory and holiness than if they had been the pure and spotless descendants of the unfallen occupants of Eden; free of all original taint, and unstained by any actual transgression. In this case their portion of glory and happiness would have been great, but it would have been proportioned to the righteousness of a sinless creature. But the glory to be bestowed on the ransomed was purchased by the precious blood of the Son of God, and will be proportioned to the transcendent merits of the Lord our righteousness, in whom 'all the fullness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily.' Therefore in scripture it is declared to be 'according to the riches of his glory,' and 'to show the exceeding riches of his glory in his kindness towards us in Christ Jesus.' When the blight of Eden is far more than remedied—when the malignant venom of the serpent,—though he meant it not, has afforded occasion for the display of mercy, the loveliest attribute of Deity, and has redounded to the higher glory and happiness of the children of men, must we not exclaim, 'O the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!'

But 'the way of the ungodly shall perish.' Who are the ungodly? As there are but two classes, and the righteous, or the justified by Christ, are the friends of God; the ungodly must be his enemies. And yet how many are there of this class who would think it foul scorn to be ranked among the wicked. True, they say, we are not saints; and there is nothing they would be more ashamed of than being thought very religious; but as there is nothing that the world highly blames in their conduct, they regard themselves as in a state of safety. Of what consequence would it be that such persons were led to consider that the scriptures declare, that so long as they are in a state of nature, they are ungodly; that so long as they are unrenewed, they are enemies to God in their minds by wicked works! Take the most favourable case of the unrenewed man; let him be amiable, and upright in his dealings, and correct in his moral conduct; yet how much is there lacking! He has not the fear of God before his eyes, he has not the love of God in his heart, he seeks not to live to God's glory—the very name ungodly marks him as living without God, and without Christ in the world, without faith, and consequently without any well-founded hope. How dreadful the condition of the ungodly! Has not God declared that, 'the way of the ungodly shall perish?' Shall perish! What is that? What is it for a soul to perish? The inspired apostle could not tell. He says, 'Where shall the sinner and the ungodly appear?' 'What shall the end be of them who obey not the gospel of God?' Ask him who is now drinking the cup of trembling in hell what it is to perish, and he will answer I cannot tell, for a lower deep is threatening to devour me; the day of judgment is coming, when body and soul are to be again united, that as they were partners in sin, they may be partners in shame and in sorrow. Yea, were we to outstrip time, and to enter the precincts of eternity, and to look through the bars of those adamantine gates, never never to be opened, and to see one who, after his final doom, had made his bed in hell, and lain down in everlasting burnings; and to ask him what it is to perish; with a howl of despair that would make our hair stand on end, and cause our very blood to curdle, he would say to us, I cannot tell, for who can tell the end of that which is to be endless? Who can measure the depth of woe which is unfathomable? Who knoweth the power of his anger? Who can tell the amount of misery already excruciating, which is ever increasing, and which must continue to increase while eternity rolls on?

Be wise now, therefore, ye that fear not God. Be instructed, ye sinful children of men. 'Kiss the Son lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his anger is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.'

EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming,'
1 John ii. 28.

How full of affection is this exhortation! How suitable, when a pious pastor is addressing his flock; or a kind father addressing his beloved family, 'Little children, abide in him!' To abide in Christ, we must be in him; and to be in him, we must have faith, we must be born again. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.' 'Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.' It is a real and radical change: before it takes place, the soul is dead. 'You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins.' It is passing from death to life,—to spiritual life; becoming a new creature in Christ Jesus: being translated from the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of God's dear Son. How important the change! We celebrate with joy the birth of an earthly prince; but here is one born an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ; an heir of an inheritance which is incorruptible,—of a kingdom that cannot be moved. Here a new branch of the true vine shoots forth. Here a new temple of the Spirit is raised. Here, out of what was baser than dust, a precious gem is formed, to be one of the jewels of Christ's crown, and to shed its bright and ever-increasing lustre through all the ages of eternity. Who but the Spirit of God could accomplish this change? 'The Spirit applieth to us the redemption purchased by Christ, by working faith in us, and thereby uniting us to Christ in our effectual calling.' When thus united to Christ, we are living stones of the holiest temple; we are in Christ as members of his mystical body.

This is a union that cannot be broken. Scripture assures us that they who really are in Christ continue to abide in him. 'Being confident of this very thing, that he who hath begun a good work in you will perform it till the day of Jesus Christ.' 'I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father who gave them me, is greater than all, and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.' 'The anointing which ye have received of him, abideth in you,'—and even as it has taught you, you shall abide in Him. If we can prove then that we are now in a state of grace, we at the same time prove that we shall hereafter be in a state of glory; for grace and glory differ not in nature but in degree. Grace is the sweet bud; glory is the magnificent blossom fully expanded to bloom in unfading beauty, and in unceasing fragrance in the paradise above. Grace is the precious seed; glory is the golden harvest: grace is the dawn; glory is the splendour of the perfect day: grace is the foretaste; glory is the delightful banquet: grace is the armour, and the might, and the valour in the day of battle; glory is the shout of victory, the song of triumph, the dividing of the spoil, the crown of the warrior, the rest, and peace, and blessedness that remain for the people of God. Grace is the hidden manna, whereof if a man eat, he shall never die.

Believers persevere in a state of grace, not of any natural necessity, but by the appointment of God. Adam fell in paradise; and if believers were left to themselves, they would fall away from God. If when there was no sin in the heart the tempter prevailed, how much more would this be the case when there are traitors within the citadel, ready, if not watched and restrained, to open the gates to the foe. But it is the will and appointment of God that believers shall endure to the end, and be saved. 'Fear not, little flock: it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.' 'Father, I will,' saith the unfailing Intercessor, 'that they whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory.' 'They are also sealed by the Spirit unto the day of redemption;' so that believers are safer than if they were the sinless descendants of our fallen first parents. Our first parents were pure, but their salvation was in their own keeping. Their believing descendants have remains of corruption, but their salvation is entrusted to the Shepherd of Israel: he has given grace, and he will give glory; 'for they are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation.' They are safe in the promises of the covenant;—and safer if possible in vital union with Christ, who cannot die, and who has declared, that because he lives they shall live also.

This doctrine may be abused by those who have a name to live and are dead; but true believers extract not poison from so sweet a flower. They know that much watchfulness is necessary, and that true grace manifests itself in this watchfulness. They know that though they cannot finally and entirely fall away, they may fall into grievous sins, which may prove injurious to the good cause,—which may open the mouths of scorers, and prove stumblingblocks to those who are asking the way to Zion;—which may darken their own prospects, and bring down temporal judgments, that they may be rendered humble and contrite, and may not be condemned with the world. Believers cannot expect the joy and peace arising from this doctrine, unless they have proof that they are persevering,—giving all diligence to make their calling and election sure;—living near to God;—cleaving to the Saviour, and growing in grace. In the wilderness through which they pass, they have to contend with the lion and the bear, the wolf and the fox. The old serpent also is ever near to their path, at one time alluring them as an angel of light, at another time as a fierce archer, assailing them with a flight of fiery darts. Is there not need then of the utmost vigilance and steadfastness, when their salvation, though sure, must be more wonderful than the deliverance of Daniel from the den of lions, or of the three children from the fiery furnace, or of the people of Israel from the wrath of Pharaoh, and from the divided waters of the Red sea?

How great, however, will be the joy of that deliverance! When shame and confusion of face shall be the portion of hypocrites, and of the self-righteous, and of the openly ungodly; when every refuge of lies shall be swept away; what holy joy and confidence shall be the portion of those, who in an evil world continued to abide in Christ, and now stand before him at last in the pure robe of his own righteousness. Much they had read, and heard, and thought of Christ; but his glory is a thousand fold greater than all that they ever read or heard, or imagined; and their blessedness in beholding him in peace, is far, far above what they had ever conceived. Their joy is now full. They have entered the haven, never again to encounter the storm. The days of their mourning are ended; the clouds return not after the rain. Their sun has risen never to go down, neither shall their moon withdraw itself, for the Lord shall be their everlasting light, and their God their glory. 'They have returned and come to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy on their heads; they have received joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing have for ever fled away.' Amen.

NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be,' Matt. xxiv. 27.

WHAT a solemn and glorious event is that spoken of in these words, the coming of the Son of man! His first coming was infinitely wonderful, when He left the bosom of his Father, emptied himself of his glory, and himself bare our sins on his own body on the tree. His second coming will be very different, but still infinitely wonderful. 'Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation,' Heb. ix. 28. May we be among the number of those who 'love his appearing,' who are 'looking for that blessed hope,' and who are 'waiting for his Son from heaven, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.' Surely they have but cold love to Jesus that do not burn with desire to see the fair brow that was crowned with thorns.

1. Christ's coming will be terrible as lightning to his enemies. Nothing is more terrific than the lightning. It is so powerful, so sudden, so deadly in its stroke. The strongest man is like a straw before it. Much more terrible will Christ's appearing be to all unbelievers. To his own dear people it will be like the approach of summer. When they see the signs of his coming, they will say to one another, 'the summer is nigh,' ver. 32. 'He shall come down like rain on the mown grass, as showers that water the earth,' Psal. lxxii. 6. To poor waiting believers 'He shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds,' 2 Sam. xxiii. 4. To those that fear God's name in this dark world, 'The Sun of righteousness shall rise with healing in his wings,' Mal. iv. 2. The cry shall be one of ineffable joy to them, 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh.'

How different that day shall be to unconverted souls! 'Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord. To what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light,' Amos v. 18. That day shall burn as an oven to you. 'The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel,' 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. Then will be fulfilled that awful word, 'All kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him,' Rev. i. 7. O! thou that obeyest not the gospel, where wilt thou hide from the lightning of his eye? Thou wilt say, Ah! there he is—the crucified One—whom I lightly esteemed. O! mountains and rocks fall on me, and hide me from Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.

2. Christ's coming shall be sudden as lightning. What can be more awfully sudden than the lightning. A curtain of dark lowering clouds is hung over all nature. A death-like silence reigns over all nature. Not a leaf is stirred by the wind. When suddenly, 'the voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire.' 'The lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west.' And the loud pealing thunder shakes the wilderness. So shall the coming of the Son of man be. Whenever that glorious event shall take place, one thing is certain, that it shall be awfully sudden. A thief does not send word what hour he is coming to break up the house. 'The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.' It shall come 'like travail on a woman with child.' 'As a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth.' Many will be saying, I think the Saviour will not come at such and such a time. What says the word? 'The Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not.' Am I ready to meet him? Would it be a grief and terror to me, if what some Christians think were true, that Christ may come even now? Do I love his appearing? Do I obey that command, Song iii. 11? Am I a wise or foolish virgin? Have I not only a lamp, and wick, and flame, but oil in the lamp? All these are infinitely momentous questions. Happy the soul that can answer, 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus.'

3. Christ's coming shall be conspicuous as lightning. Lightning cannot be hid. By all it is seen at the same moment. The labourer in the field, the artizan in the workshop, the servant at the mill—all see the flash; but in a far more perfect manner shall be the coming of the Son of man. 'Behold he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him.' Jesus said to the high priest and all his accusers, 'Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' Matt. xxvi. 64. And again it is written, 'they shall look on him whom they pierced.' O amazing truth! Those who will not look to Christ now must look then. Those who will not 'behold the Lamb of God, to be saved by him, must behold the Lamb coming in wrath to destroy them. O happy believer, you shall cry in that day, 'This is our God, we have waited for him.' 'This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend.' 'My Lord and my God.'

NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer,' 1 Pet. iv. 7.

I. OBSERVE where a believer stands. He stands within sight of the end of all things. He stands upon a watch-tower, high above the noise and the cares of this present evil world. Things temporal are beneath his feet, things eternal are spread out before him. This is the bible description of a believer, 'We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen,' 2 Cor. iv. 18. Consider how short the whole of a lifetime is. From the cradle to the grave is but a few steps. 'The days of our years are threescore years and ten, and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow, for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.' The half of men die before the age of twenty. Even when men lived many hundred years, it was but a span—a moment, compared to eternity. Methuselah lived 969 years, and he died. 'My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle. My days are swifter than a post. They are passed away as the swift ships. As the eagle hasteth to the prey.'

The time of this world's continuance is short, 'The end of all things is at hand.' A little while, and the day of grace will be done. Preaching and praying will soon be over. The last sabbath sun will soon set. 'My Spirit shall not always strive with men.' Soon ministers will give over wrestling with the unbelieving world. A little while and the number of believers shall be complete. We shall come 'unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.' The parting cry of Christ was, 'Surely I come quickly.' Soon the sky shall open over our heads, and Christ shall come. A little while, and we shall stand before the great white throne. A little while, and the wicked shall not be. We shall see them going away into everlasting punishment. A little while, and the work of eternity shall be begun. We shall serve him day and night in his temple.

'When this passing world is done,
When has sunk yon glaring sun,
When we stand with Christ in glory,
Looking o'er life's finished story,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know,
Not till then, how much I owe.'

II. Observe the duties of a believer. 'Be sober, and watch unto prayer.' 1. Be sober. Let nothing dim the eye that is looking on eternal realities. Let nothing engross the heart that is already given away to Christ. Sit loose to the dearest objects in this world. Brainerd mentions an instance of a poor Indian woman who, after her conversion, was resigned to the divine will in the most tender points. She was asked, 'What if God should take away your husband from you, how do you think you could bear that?' She replied, 'He belongs to God and not to me. He may do with him just as he pleases.' An old divine says, 'Build your nest upon no tree here; for you see God hath sold the forest to death, and every tree whereon we would rest is ready to be cut down, to the end we may flee, and mount up, and build upon the rock, and dwell in the holes of the rock.'

Be sober in the griefs of this world. Weep as though you wept not. This world is the vale of tears. It is a Bochim. There are always some mourning. No sooner is the tear dried up on one cheek than it trickles down another. Still the believer should be sober and chastened in his grief. Weep not for those that died in the Lord; they are not lost, but gone before. The sun, when it sets, is not lost; it is gone to shine in another hemisphere. And so have they gone to 'shine like the sun, in the kingdom of their Father.' Weep not for those who died out of the Lord. When Aaron lost his two sons, 'Aaron held his peace.' Weep not over bodily pains and losses. Murnur not. Be sober. If you are in Christ, these are all the hell you will ever bear. When we win to the presence of Jesus, all our griefs shall look like children's griefs. A day in his banqueting house will make you 'forget your poverty, and remember your misery no more.'

Sit loose to this world's enjoyments. Be sober. In a little while you will be at your Father's table above, drinking the wine new with Christ, you will meet with all your brothers and sisters in the Lord, you will have pure joy in God through ceaseless ages. Do not be much taken with the joys that are here. If ever you are so much engrossed with any enjoyment here that it takes away your love for prayer, or for your bible, or that it would frighten you to hear the cry, Behold the Bridegroom cometh—then your heart is 'overcharged.' You are abusing this world.

2. Watch. 'Knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.' Nothing is more difficult than to watch. We are naturally like him who said, 'a little more sleep, and a little more slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep.' One thing is essential to all true watching—the gift of the Holy Spirit. 'Anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see,' Rev. iii. 18. Take out the beam that is thine own eye. Not only abstain from dimming the spiritual eye, but clear it. What shall I watch? Watch the work of grace in thine own soul. Has God cast the seed into the field of thine heart? Then see if the blade appear, or the ear, or the full corn in the ear. Has your soul been made a vineyard of red wine? Then say often to your Beloved, 'Let us get up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appears, and the pomegranates bud forth,' Song vii. 12. Watch thine enemies. You have enemies within, and enemies without. Many seek to take thy crown. 'Cast all your care upon the Lord, for he careth for you. Be sober, be vigilant, for your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour.' Watch the Redeemer's cause. The disciples slept while Jesus' body sweated drops of blood. Many disciples do the same in our day. Lie not on a bed of ivory while Joseph is in affliction. Be one of the 'watchmen over the walls of Jerusalem,' Isa. lxii. Be one of those who watch for the morning.

3. Watch unto prayer. Some watch and pray not. Right watching quickens prayer. Seest thou the wants, corruptions, infirmities, backslidings, temptations of thine own spirit, the heart deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, yea, unsearchably wicked to human eye. Watch unto prayer. Let the eye look within, and then above. Seest thou the cause of Jesus bleeding, Israel turning back before their enemies, plants of the Lord's planting withering, many walking no more with Jesus, Ephesus losing her first love, Laodicea turning lukewarm, ministers fainting in the day of adversity, Jonah fleeing from the presence of the Lord, the hands of Moses weary, Amalek prevailing against Israel? 'Watch unto prayer.'

Seest thou a spring-time of love, Immanuel coming over the mountains of Bether, winter departing, flowers appearing, showers of blessing falling? 'Watch unto prayer.' Soon Scotland's day of grace will be ended. 'Ask ye of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain.' Hearst thou Ephraim bemoaning himself, the dry bones of Israel shaking, saints loving her stones? Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; never hold thy peace day nor night, give him no rest—'Watch unto prayer.'

TENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be,' Rev. xxii. 12.

THERE is something peculiarly sacred about a parting word. When a father assembles his children round his dying bed, and gives them his last affectionate counsels; you may be quite sure that as long as they have hearts to feel they will remember and often ponder over his parting words. Here are the parting words of the Lord Jesus. Here are the latest accents that fell from the blessed lips of Immanuel. They fell on the ear of the beloved John as he lay entranced on the shore of sea-girt Patmos, 'Behold, I come quickly.'

I. Observe the person who comes. 'Behold, I come.' We may say, like the disciples on the lake of Galilee, 'It is the Lord.' It is the First, and the Last, and the living One, who was dead, and, behold, he is alive for evermore. Jehovah-Jesus is the person who comes. He whose name is 'Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace.' He who is the image of the invisible God, by whom all things were created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible.

It is Jesus that comes. He that walked on the sea of Galilee, sat wearied on the well of Sychar, and wept beside the rocky sepulchre of Bethany. He that was surety for sinners, who sweated blood in Gethsemane, who was silent before Pilate, and who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God on Calvary. 'This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.'

It is He who is the righteousness and strength of all his people. He who is our life, He on whom we lean coming up from the wilderness, He who is afflicted in all our afflictions; our tender Shepherd, our elder Brother; He whom, having not seen, we love. It is He that comes. Surely every believer will love his appearing. You may tremble who know not God, and obey not the gospel. This is He whom you have lightly esteemed. He stood at your door till his head was filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night. You despised him and neglected his great salvation. How will you bear to see him coming in the clouds of heaven!

II. Observe the time when he comes. 'I come quickly.' Christians differ widely as to the time when Christ shall come. This diversity is not to be wondered at. 'Of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father,' Mark xiii. 32. 'Of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you; for yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night,' 1 Thess. v. 1, 2. Take it at the longest calculation, it will soon be here. He said, I come quickly, 1800 years ago. Much more now may we say, He comes quickly. A few days, and every eye shall see him. The sun is waxing old—weary of shining on a Christ-despising world. The whole creation groans under the ever-increasing load of guilt and woe. The lines of prophecy are converging to a point. The cup of Popery is nearly full. The time, times, and half a time, are hastening to a close. The souls below the altar are crying with a loud voice, 'How long, O Lord.' The Euphrates is drying up, that the way of the kings of the East may be prepared. There is a noise and a shaking among the dry bones of Israel. 'In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye' the once crucified, now exalted, but long-despised Jesus shall come. 'Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation.' Oh! believer, let this solemn truth make thee patient under the frown and contumely of an unbelieving world. Hold thy possessions with a slack hand. 'Take heed, lest at any time your heart be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares.' Behold, I come quickly!

III. Observe what he brings with him. 'My reward is with me.' Christ himself shall be the greatest reward of his people. 'Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward.' Any place would be heaven if we were with Christ. No place would be heaven without Him. 'Whom have I in heaven but thee?' Oh to talk with him as Moses and Elijah did on the mount of transfiguration, to hear Him speak gracious words, to lean our head where John leaned his, to hold Him, and not to let him go, to behold that countenance which is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars, to have him turning upon us his eyes of divine tenderness and holy love—that will be a reward.

He has many crowns of righteousness to give to them that love his appearing. He has 'the harps of God'—

'Lord, I believe thou hast prepared, (Unworthy though I be,)
For me a blood-bought free reward,
A golden harp for me.

'Thy strings and tuned for endless years,
And formed by power divine,
To sound in God the Father's ears
No other name but thine.'

He has 'authority over ten cities' to give to his own. He has a kingdom prepared for them before the foundation of the world. He has a place beside him on his throne. But He himself will be our greatest reward, 'I will give him the morning star.'

IV. Observe what he will do. He will give every man according as his work shall be. Christ is to be Judge of all. 'For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son,' John v. 22. This is part of Christ's reward, that every knee shall bow to him. It is fitting that He that stood silent before the Jews, and at the bar of Pilate, and was buffeted, spit upon, and condemned, should sit on the throne and judge his enemies. It will be greatly to the joy of Christ's people in that awful day, when they receive their reward from the hand that was pierced for them. It will make all unbelievers stand speechless when he to whom they have always said, Depart from us, shall say to them, Depart from me, ye cursed. Oh! that we may obtain mercy of the Lord in that day.

'See the Judge our nature wearing,
Clothed in majesty divine;
You who long for his appearing,
Then shall say, This God is mine;
Gracious Saviour, own me in that day for thine.'

TENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city,' Rev. xxii. 14.

I. Let us meditate on the character of the saved. 'They that do his commandments.' All that are on the road to heaven, are not only a justified people, but a sanctified people. This was God's end in choosing us. 'Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son.' If any man be chosen to salvation, it is through sanctification of the Spirit. He has chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy. This was Christ's great end in dying for us, that he might make us a holy nation. 'Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it by the washing of water through the word.' He laid down the unspeakable price for this. He became a man, he became a curse for this. He groaned, sweated blood, was bruised, bowed his head, gave up the ghost for this; that He might have liberty to make us free, humble, self-denied, loving, pure as he himself is pure. This is the Holy Spirit's end in dealing with us. It would not be righteous in Him to dwell in an unjustified soul. It is no rest for the dove of heaven. He therefore awakens the soul—discovers to the man his guilt, depravity, lothesomeness. He glorifies Christ in the man's soul—destroys the face of the covering that is over the carnal heart. He softens the rocky heart, and inclines and engages the will to cleave to the Lord Jesus Christ alone for righteousness. Then He sees no iniquity in that man. He says of that soul, This is my rest; here will I dwell, for I have desired it. He writes all the law in that heart, Jer. xxxi. 33. He does not omit one of the commandments. The man cries out, 'I delight in the law of God after the inward man,' Rom. vii. 22. And not only does He give him the will, but the ability, to serve God; 'It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure,' Phil. ii. 13.

'I have now made a new question,' says Rutherford, 'whether Christ be more to be loved for giving sanctification, or for free justification? And I hold he is more and most to be loved for sanctification. It is in some respect greater love in Him to sanctify than to justify; for he maketh us most like himself, in his own essential portraiture and image, in sanctifying us; justification doth but make us happy, which is to be like the angels only. God be thanked for ever that Christ was a told down price for sanctification. Let a sinner, if possible, lie in hell for ever, if He make him truly holy, and let him lie there burning in love to God, rejoicing in the Holy Ghost, hanging on Christ by faith and hope; that is heaven in the heart and bottom of hell.'

O my soul, art thou one of those that do His commandments? Have I come into the bonds of the new covenant, and got the law put in my inward parts, and written on my heart? Does Christ stretch forth his hand to me, saying, 'Behold, my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother,' Matt. xii. 50. On this my eternity hangs. If I receive an unholy gospel I shall perish. They are ungodly men who 'turn the grace of God into lasciviousness.' The branches that bear no fruit He taketh away. They that are saved are they that do his commandments.

'Had I a throne above the rest,
Where angels and archangels dwell,
One sin unsain within my breast,
Would make that heaven as dark as hell.'

II. Let us meditate on the blessedness of the saved. 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.' Holiness is its own reward. To be holy is to be happy. God is happy because he is infinitely holy. The devil never can be happy because he has lost every spark of holiness. The first rest of the believing soul is when he comes to Christ and finds pardon. But there is a further and sweeter rest when he learns of Christ, who is meek and lowly in heart, Matt. xi. 28, 29. Holiness is the river of God's pleasure, and therefore it fills the soul that drinks of it with divine joy. But it has a further reward.

1. They have right to the tree of life. Adam lost us that right when he fell. 'God drove out the man: and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.' In vain did Adam strive to find a secret entrance. Perhaps he tried to creep through the embowering thickets, or through some wooded pass. Perhaps he tried to enter under cloud of midnight, or by morning's early dawn, before the birds began their matin praise. But all in vain; that flaming sword 'turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.' Adam's children, up to this day, have spent their strength and ingenuity in the same vain attempt. They have gone about to establish their own righteousness. But all have found—a few on this side of eternity, and some, by fearful experience, on the other side—that the flaming sword of divine justice still turns every way, to keep the way of the tree of life. No—not every way. There is 'a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh.' A second Adam came, the Lord from heaven. He gave himself to the flaming sword of justice. A voice was heard, 'Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts.' And now that slain Lamb of God says, 'I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' The guiltiest may enter in by Jesus. And hear how sweetly he says, 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God, Rev. ii. 7.

O my soul, like Ephesus thou hast left thy first love, yet this promise is to thee. In Jesus thou hast a right to the tree of life. 'He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' I that in myself have a right to a place in hell, in Christ have a right to a place under the shadow of the tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God.

2. May enter in through the gates into the city.

Here we are on our way to the heavenly city. We are coming up from the wilderness. Sometimes we have clouds between us and Christ—doubts as to our conversion—our union to Christ—our new nature. There all clouds and doubts shall flee away. Here we have diverse temptations from the old man, from the world, from our adversary the devil; there temptations cannot come. The old man will drop off as we enter the pearly gate; the world will then dazzle no more when we look on the golden pavement; the fiery darts will never rise over the battlements of the New Jerusalem. Here we have no city where the most are righteous. We can hardly speak the name of Jesus in the streets, but we are made the song of the drunkard. There the inhabitants are all righteous—'there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth.' None but the holy angels, and the brothers and sisters of Christ shall be there. The song of eternity shall be, Worthy is the Lamb. Here we love Christ unseen. Often he withdraws himself and is gone. We seek him and find him not. There we shall be for ever with the Lord. We shall see him as he is. We shall be with him, and behold his glory which his Father gave him. We shall say without another doubt to all eternity, 'I am my Beloved's, and his desire is toward me.' This is the reward of the sanctified. O my soul, is this reward for thee? Welcome light afflictions, which are but for a moment. Welcome sweet cross, that I must bear for Jesus. Roll round, swift years. Hasten the day of his espousals—the day of the gladness of his heart and mine, that I may enter with all his redeemed through the gates that are all praise.

'Jerusalem, my happy home,
Name ever dear to me;
When shall my labours have an end
In joy, and peace, and thee?'

ELEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Let Israel hope in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption. And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities,' Psal. cxxx. 7, 8.

In these words we have a believing Israelite inviting all his people to come to the same Fountain where he has found pardon and peace with God. He had been himself awakened by the Holy Spirit to feel the awful 'depths' of sin and misery in which he was sunk by nature, and by practice. On his knees, beneath the heart-searching eye of God, he felt that he was 'under sin,' that his 'mouth must be stopped,' and that he could not be just with God,' ver. 3. 'If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?' But even in these depths the free mercy of God was reached forth to him; the scales were made to fall from his eyes by the eyesalve of the Spirit, and the glorious discovery was made to his soul, that there is a way of forgiveness open to the vilest of men, ver. 4. 'But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.' With intensest anxiety did this believing soul now wait for the Lord. Those only who have experienced the dawning of the Sun of righteousness on their own soul, can know what it is to 'wait for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning.' More anxiously than the sick man on his bed, 'full of tossings to and fro,' longs for the first gleam of morning light coming in at his window; more anxiously than the weary Levite, keeping watch upon the temple wall, turned his eye toward the east, to see if the day began to break over mount Olivet; more anxiously far did this believing soul now wait for fuller discoveries of the fair face of Immanuel, and for a richer experience of the power of Jesus to purge the conscience, and purify the heart.

But no man can be contented to go to the Well of salvation alone. Joy in Christ is not a selfish joy. A man may have gold without wishing others to share with him. A man may have earthly learning, and be proud to keep it to himself. But the moment a man has found Christ, his cry is, 'Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did.' O! that all I love but knew Him. 'Let Israel hope in the Lord, for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption, and he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.'

O sinner, whoever thou art, here are three amazing reasons why thou shouldest hope in the Lord. Satan would drive thee to despair, as if there was no hope that such an one as thou art could be saved. But as God is true, here is a door of hope for thy perishing soul.

1. 'With the Lord there is mercy.' God is such a God that with him there is mercy. Mercy dwells in him as in a fountain. All the mercy that is in the universe flows from him. Mercy is compassion to those who deserve no compassion, but infinite wrath. It was mercy that made God spare fallen man, and not cast the world speedily into hell. It was mercy that made him give his only begotten Son. It was mercy that made him choose, awaken, and draw any sinner to Christ. He never saved any but out of free sovereign mercy. There is none so vile but God can save him without prejudice to his justice, truth, holiness, or majesty. God has saved as vile wretches, in time past, as any vile wretches that need now to be saved. Manasseh, once a monster in human form, is now a white-robed saint before the throne. The dying thief is this day with Christ in paradise. The murderers of Jesus are now tuning their harps of gold, and singing, 'Worthy is the Lamb.'

This is good news for thee, O vilest of men—for thee who hast sinned against light and against convictions. I do not know that God will save thee, but I know that if he does, it will be in perfect accordance with his nature. 'He delighteth in mercy.'

2. With him is plenteous redemption. When the manna fell upon the face of the wilderness round the camp of Israel, there was a plentiful supply for the many thousands of Israel. 'He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.' So it is with Christ. He is freely offered to every creature. We are not straitened in Christ, but in our own hearts. 'With him is plenteous redemption.' No sinner ever came to Christ, and found the Fountain of forgiveness dried up. One of the texts that was instrumental in the conversion of John Bunyan was this, 'Yet there is room,' Luke xiv. 22. Undone sinner, let this text lead thee to Christ. Many have come to Christ since the days of Abel. Thousands have entered through the strait gate, and are now his believing people on earth, or his glorified people in heaven. 'But yet there is room.' There is room for thee under Christ's wings. 'With him is plenteous redemption.' Brainerd once asked one of his converted Indians, 'Do you see enough in Christ for the greatest of sinners?' She replied, 'O enough, enough, for all the sinners in the world, if they would but come.' And when he asked her if she would not tell others of the goodness of Christ; turning herself about to some poor Christless souls who stood by, she said, 'O there is enough in Christ for you, if you would but come. O strive, strive to give up your hearts to him.' Sinner, let the words of this poor believing Indian sink into thy heart. There is enough in Christ for thee, for with him is plenteous redemption. O! take up the words of the returning prodigal, 'How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough, and to spare, and I perish with hunger; I will arise and go to my father.'

3. He redeems from all iniquities. If you drop a pebble into the bosom of the ocean, it is covered out of sight in a moment. But if you were to carry an immense rock and plunge it into the same ocean, it would be equally covered. So is it with the least of sinners, and the chief of sinners, when they come to Christ. There is no difference. The ocean of the blood of Jesus covers both equally. All sinners that come to Christ are equally justified in the sight of God. He will redeem Israel from all his iniquities. Christ is no half-saviour. His work is perfect. Dost thou believe in Christ? Then 'all the transgressions that thou hast committed shall not be mentioned unto thee.' Canst thou say the sweetest words that human lips ever uttered, 'My Beloved is mine?' Then on the authority of him who cannot lie, I say to thee, 'As far as east is from the west, so far hath he removed thy transgressions from thee.' But perhaps thou sayest, 'However far removed, God's all-seeing eye may still be fixed on them. This cannot be; for thou canst say with Hezekiah, 'Thou hast cast all my sins behind my back.' Nay, they are not only behind God's back, but out of sight, for it is written, 'Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.' But are they not to be found in God's book of remembrance? Listen to his own gracious declaration, 'I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins.' But God can remember my sins, even though he has blotted them out of his book. Hear again his own word, 'I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.' But surely if God were to search out my sins he would find them somewhere, and condemn me in the judgment. Fear not, O troubled soul, this cannot be; for it is written, 'The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found.'

ELEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's,' 1 Cor. vi. 20.

IN these words we have the history of a believer.

1. There was a time when he did not belong to God. This is implied when it is said, 'ye are bought with a price;' for a man does not buy what is already his own. An unconverted soul does not belong to God. In one sense, indeed, all things belong to God; for 'the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.' He says, 'Every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills.' And again, 'the Lord hath made all things for himself, yea, even the wicked for the day of evil.' Still, it is also true that the wicked do not belong to God. They are not his portion, his inheritance, his purchased possession. They are lost. They are sold under sin. When a fisherman draws his nets, and finds a great many bad fish among the good ones, he does not count the bad ones as his own. He gathers the good into vessels, and casts the bad away. So does God look upon lost souls. He says to them, 'Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God.'

God does not reign in unconverted souls. It is true he reigns over them, as he does over the wild beasts of the forest, and over the wild waves of the sea. He makes their wrath to praise him. He holds them in with bit and bridle. But God does not reign in their hearts. The devil reigns there, and not God. 'The heart of an unconverted man is the devil's house,' Mark iii. 27.

O! it is good for me to look unto the rock whence I was hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence I was digged. Truly I can say, like Hezekiah, 'Thou hast loved my soul from the pit of corruption.' Should I not add, 'I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul?'

2. The happy change. 'Ye are bought with a price.' When a man has bought anything, and paid for it, more especially if it has cost him a great price, he says, 'This is mine.' So it is with God and the believer. He has laid down a price for him, the pearl of great price. And now he says of every believing soul, 'Fear not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine.' The moment that Jesus spreads his skirt over a poor dying polluted sinner, the voice of the Father is heard saying, 'Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom.' There never was a possession so completely belonging to any one as a redeemed soul belongs to God. We are his by creation, 'He hath made us, and not we ourselves.' We are his by preservation. 'In him we live, and move, and have our being.' How many years he preserved us when we were cutting at the hand that kept us out of hell. We are his by election. 'Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you.' 'Fear not, O Jacob, my servant, and thou Jeshurun whom I have chosen.' We are his by redemption. 'I lay down my life for the sheep.' 'This is my body broken for you.' We are his by the indwelling Spirit. 'I will dwell in them and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.' Accordingly, we are peculiarily dear to God. 'Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee.' God puts more value upon one believer than upon all the ungodly in the world. He is very kind to the ungodly; he gives them food and raiment; houses and riches, health and pleasures, sunshine and showers; and yet he gives a child of God more in one day than he gives to all the ungodly during their whole existence. He gives his own children—forgiveness, peace with God, and the Holy Spirit. Truly we are not our own, we are bought with a price.

3. The blessed duty flowing from this. 'Wherefore glorify God,' &c. This duty is simply the resignation of soul and body into his hands, for time and for eternity. Take an example in one of the holiest and most eminent divines that ever lived. 'I have been before God, and have given myself, all that I am, and have, to God; so that I am not, in any respect, my own. I can challenge no right in this understanding, this will, these affections which are in me. Neither have I any right to this body, or any of its members—no right to this tongue, these hands, these feet; no right to these senses, these eyes, these ears, this smell, or this taste; I have given myself clean away, and have not retained anything as my own. I gave myself to God in my baptism, and I have been this morning to him, and told him that I gave myself wholly to him,' (President Edwards). Or take the example of a dear boy who died about eight years old, and who was evidently taught by the same Spirit. One evening, near his death, he said to his watchful mother, 'Mother, I think I belong to him.' She asked, 'To whom, my child?' He replied, 'To God, mother; my will, my understanding, my affections; I am God's boy altogether, mother.'

O my soul, dost thou know anything of this? Canst thou say, 'I am my Beloved's, and his desire is toward me?' Is it the chief desire of my heart to glorify God by fleeing from all sin? When the world comes and says, Come with us, stolen waters are sweet; my soul replies, Sinful world, I am not yours, I am the Lord's. When Satan says, Come with me, thou shalt not surely die; my soul cries out, Get thee behind me, Satan, I am not yours. I was once yours, but now I am bought with a price; I am Christ's. When my own wicked heart says, Come and taste a little worldly pleasure; my new heart replies, Old man, I am not thine—I am not my own, I am bought with a price—therefore will I glorify God in my body and my spirit, which are his.

TWELFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He came unto his own, and his own received him not,' John i. 11.

IN this chapter John describes the coming of the Son of God into the world, and his rejection by those whom he came to save, in three different ways. In ver. 5. he says, 'The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not.' When Jesus came to this world, it was like the rising of 'the bright and morning star;' but the hearts of men were covered over with murky vapours, like those that settled over Egypt in that night when the 'darkness might be felt,' so that the heavenly radiance of Immanuel was not allowed to shine upon their souls. To those that knew him he was 'the light of men,' 'the morning Star,' 'the Sun of righteousness,' the 'morning without clouds;' but all the rest of the world comprehended it not.

Is it not still the same? 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness.' On many souls Christ has arisen with healing in his wings, so that we can say to them, 'Arise; shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon thee.' But, ah! the most have never admitted the sweet, soft, peace-bringing beams of Jesus to shine into their dark hearts. 'The God of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them.' They know not whither they are going. Their feet are ready to stumble on the dark mountains. 'The path of the wicked is as darkness; they know not at what they shall stumble.'

Again, in ver. 10. it is written, 'He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not.' Strange visit to this fallen world! He who 'hung the earth upon nothing'—he who said, 'Let there be light, and there was light'—he who 'formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life'—he 'by whom were all things created that are in heaven, and that are on earth'—that glorious being came to his own world, 'God manifest in the flesh.' Surely all his creatures will run to worship and adore him. Surely they will 'worship and bow down; they will kneel before the Lord their maker.' Not so: 'the world knew him not.' They knew him not at his birth. He left the hallelujahs of the heavenly world for the manger at Bethlehem. No angel bowed before the infant Saviour. No seraph veiled his face and feet before him. 'The world knew him not.' A few shepherds from the fields of Bethlehem came and kneeled to him; and the wise men saw and adored the infant King; but the most despised him. 'He is despised and rejected of men.' 'She wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger, for there was no room for them in the inn.' They knew him not during his life. Few believed on him. They called him glutton, wine-bibber, deceiver. Once they sought to cast him over the rocks. Often they plotted to kill him. He that had all things now wanted every thing. 'Certain women ministered to him of their substance,' Luke viii. 3. He had no money to pay his tribute. The creatures of his hand had a warmer bed than he. 'The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.' 'Every man went to his own home; Jesus went to the mount of Olives.' Another time he sat weariod on a well, and said to a poor woman, 'Give me to drink.' He that was God over all, blessed for ever, could say, 'I am a worm and no man.' The world know him not to this hour. The offence of the cross has not ceased. The way of salvation by Christ for us is still despised by most. He who is a sanctuary to all them that believe, is a stumbling-stone and rock of offence to most. O my soul, canst thou believe on Jesus when the world despise him? Canst thou be one of the little flock? Canst thou enter in at 'the strait gate, and walk on the narrow way,' with an unbelieving world on every side?

'Obey the gospel call,
And enter while you may;
The flock of Christ is always small,
And none are safe but they.'

Again, in ver. 11. it is written, 'He came unto his own, and his own received him not.' In John xix. 27, the same words are rendered more fully, 'to his own home.' To see the full meaning of the passage before us, we must adopt the same reading here: 'He came unto his own home, and his own family received him not.'

The Jews were, as it were, his own family; and when he came to them, it was like coming to his own home. It was he who called their father Abraham, and separated them from among the nations to be a peculiar treasure: 'He said, Surely they are my people, children that will not lie: so he was their Saviour. In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them: in his love and in his pity he redeemed them; and he bare them, and carried them all the days of old,' Isa. lxxiii. 8, 9. He was the substance of all their types. He was the true pillar-cloud that guided their fathers, the true bread from heaven; he was the rock that followed them. He was the true Isaac the child of promise, the prophet like unto Moses, the David the beloved, the true Solomon the prince of peace. Though to all the world he may appear 'without form or comeliness, having no beauty that they should desire him;' yet surely his own Israel will receive him as 'the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys.' Ah no! 'He came unto his own, and his own received him not.' They cried, 'Not this man, but Barabbas.' 'Away with him, away with him, crucify him, crucify him.' 'His blood be upon us, and upon our children.' The rulers derided him. The very thieves railed at him. They shoot out the lip, they wag the head, they give him vinegar to drink.

To this day his own receive him not. Ah! think, sinner, whom it is you are despising. Did you ever see the son of a king lay by his robes and his glory, become a poor man, and die in misery, and all for nothing? Do you think the Lord Jesus Christ left his Father's love and the adoration of angels, and became a worm and died under wrath, and all for no purpose? Is there no wrath lying upon your soul? Have you no need of such a Saviour? Why then do you delay to flee to him?

'Ungrateful sinners! whence this scorn
Of God's long-suffering grace!
And whence this madness that insults
The Almighty to his face?'

TWELFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day,' John vi. 44.

I. How amazing is the depravity of the natural heart! The scriptures abundantly teach us this. All faithful ministers lift up their voice like a trumpet to show the people this; and it is the first work of the Holy Spirit on the heart to convince of sin. There is not in the word of God a more fearful discovery of the depravity of the natural heart than in these words. David says, 'Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me,' Psal. li. 5. God says by the prophet Isaiah, 'I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously, and wast called a transgressor from the womb,' Isa. xlvi. 8. And Paul says, 'We were by nature the children of wrath, even as others,' Eph. ii. 3. But here we are told that the impotency of a natural man, and his aversion from Christ, are so great that they cannot be overcome by any power less than divine. 'No man can come unto me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him.' There never was a teacher like Christ. 'Never man spake like this man.' He spoke with such authority, not like the scribes, but with a heavenly dignity and power. He spoke with such wisdom; he spoke the truth without any imperfection; his teaching was pure light from the Fountain of light. He spoke with such love, with the love of one who was to lay down his life for his hearers. He spoke with such meekness, bearing the contradiction of sinners against himself, when reviled, reviling not again. He spoke with such holiness, for it was 'God manifest in the flesh.' And yet all this did not draw them. There never was a more precious gift laid at the feet of sinners. 'My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. I am the bread of life. He that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.' The very Saviour their perishing souls needed was now before them. His hands were stretched out to them. He was within their reach. He offered himself to them. Yet they would not come to him. Oh! the desperate blindness, hardness, deadness, and wickedness of the unconverted heart. Nothing but Almighty grace can change it. Oh! graceless man, your friends warn you, your ministers cry aloud to you, the whole bible pleads with you; Christ, with all his benefits, is set before you; and yet, unless the Holy Spirit be poured upon your heart, you will remain an enemy of the cross of Christ, and the destroyer of your own soul. 'No man can come unto me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him.'

II. How invincible is the grace of Jehovah! No creature power can draw the sinner to Christ. Demonstration, miraculous evidence, threatening, invitation, may all be used in vain. Jehovah alone can draw the soul to Christ. He pours out his Spirit with the word, and the soul is sweetly and powerfully inclined to run to Jesus. 'Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power.' 'Is any thing too hard for the Lord?' 'The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will.' Take an example:—A Jew was sitting at the receipt of custom, near the gate of Capernaum. His brow was furrowed with the marks of covetousness, and his jealous eye exhibited all the low cunning of the publican. Very probably he had heard much of Jesus; perhaps he had heard him preach by the shore of the lake of Galilee; still his worldly heart was unchanged, for he remained at his wicked trade, sitting by the receipt of custom. The Saviour passed that way, and as he bent his eyes upon the busy Levi, said, 'Follow me.' He said no more. He used no argument, no threatening, no promise. But the God of all grace breathed on the publican's heart, and he was made willing; 'he arose and followed him.' It pleased God, who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will, to give Matthew a saving glimpse of the excellency of Jesus; a drop fell from heaven upon his heart, and melted it; he smelled the sweet savour of the Rose of Sharon. What is all the world to Matthew now? He cares not for its gains, its pleasures, its praises, any more. In Christ he sees what is sweeter and better than them all. He arose and followed Jesus.

Let us learn that a simple word may be blessed to the saving of precious souls. Often we are tempted to think there must be some deep and logical argument to bring men to Christ. Often we put confidence in high-sounding words. Whereas it is the simple exhibition of Christ carried home by the Spirit, which awakens, enlightens, and saves. 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts.' If the Spirit be breathing on the people, these little words, 'Follow Jesus,' spoken in love, may be blessed to the saving of a whole congregation.

Let us learn to give the whole praise and glory of our salvation to the free, sovereign, efficacious grace of Jehovah. An old divine says, 'God was so angry with Herod for not giving him the glory of his eloquence, that the angel of the Lord smote him immediately, and he died a miserable death; he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost. But if it be very sinful in a man to take to himself the glory of such a qualification as eloquence, how much more a man's taking to himself the glory of divine grace, God's own image, and that which is infinitely God's most excellent, precious, and glorious gift?' How many times, in the 1st chapter of Ephesians, does Paul insist upon it that we are saved by free, unmerited grace? And how fully does John ascribe the whole glory of salvation to the free grace of the Lord Jesus? 'Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever. Amen.' How solemn are the words of President Edwards, in his Personal Narrative! 'The doctrines of God's absolute sovereignty and free grace, in showing mercy to whom he would show mercy; and man's absolute dependence on the operations of the Holy Spirit, have very often appeared to me as sweet and glorious doctrines. These doctrines have been much my delight. God's sovereignty has ever appeared to me a great part of his glory. It has often been my delight to approach God and adore him as a sovereign God, and ask sovereign mercy of him.'

'O! to grace how great a debtor
Daily I'm constrained to be!
Let that grace, Lord, like a fetter,
Bind my wandering heart to thee.'

THIRTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to come,' John xvi. 13.

I. Let us meditate on the glorious person here spoken of. 'The Spirit of truth.' A little before Jesus had called him 'another Comforter,' and 'the Comforter,' because he is the Author of all true divine comfort in the soul of man. He alone pierces the heart with deep conviction of sin, and binds up the broken-hearted by healing discoveries of Christ. 'These words'—the Comforter—(says an eminent Christian) 'seem immensely great, enough to fill heaven and earth.' But here he is called 'the Spirit of truth;' for two reasons: 1. Because he sees all things truly. He is the omniscient One. He sees sin as it is, in all its infinite blackness. He sees the heart of man as it is; his eye penetrates to the deepest recesses of the ungodly heart. He sees Christ as he is, in all his infinite excellency and glory. 'He searches all things, yea, the deep things of God,' 1 Cor. ii. 10. He sees the gospel in all its divine wisdom and pure heavenly grace. 2. Because he teaches all things truly. He is the Fountain of life and light to the soul of man. When he comes to the soul, he quickens and enlightens in the same moment. He reveals the truth, as it is in Jesus, without any imperfection, without any cloud or error. If there be any dimness in our view of divine things, the fault does not lie in the Teacher, but in the perverse heart of the disciple. He does his part with divine perfection, revealing the Mediator in all his matchless beauty, fulness, and grace. Earthly teachers fail in two ways: in their perception of the truth, and in their communicating the truth. They do not see things exactly as they are, nor do they teach them exactly as they see them. But the Spirit of truth does both. O that we were filled with a sense of the glory of the third person of the blessed Trinity. Then we would pray with David, 'Thy Spirit is good, lead me unto the land of uprightness,' Psal. cxliii. 10.

II. Let us meditate on the work of the Holy Spirit. 'He will guide you into all truth.' In the verses preceding, Jesus had told them what the Comforter would do in the hearts of natural men; 'He will convince the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment;' but here he tells them what the Comforter will do for those who are disciples indeed, 'He will guide you into all truth.' The same sweet promise is repeated, 1 John ii. 20. 'Ye have an unction from the holy One, and ye know all things.' This does not mean that Christians know all worldly knowledge. The apostles themselves, with the exception of Paul, were unlearned and ignorant fishermen of a small inland lake, and many a simple cottage-believer is on his way to glory,

'Who knows, and knows no more, his Bible true.'

'Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called.' Neither does it mean, that Christians who have the Spirit know all divine things. The disciples were long ignorant of the death of Christ, and of his resurrection; and Paul expressly says, 'Now we see through a glass darkly; now I know in part.' This is the childhood of the new creature—we speak as a child, understand as a child, think as a child. What then does this promise mean? 1. It means that he will teach you all things needful for your salvation. In smaller matters he sometimes allows you to wander, to teach you your ignorance and weakness; but in things essential to your salvation, he will guide you with his eye. If a mother were guiding her little child through a wood, where there was no danger, she might allow it to stray, now and then, and lose itself, to teach it to keep closer by her side; but if they came to a place where were the dens of wild beasts, she would clasp her child in her arms, and carry it quickly past. So does the good Spirit. In smaller matters he suffers you to err, but not when the safety of your soul is concerned, then he will carry you as on eagles' wings. He will guide you into all truth. That was a sweet word which Jesus spake, 'There shall come false Christs and false prophets, insomuch that if it were possible they shall deceive even the elect.' Dear believer, whose feet have been set upon the rock, it is not possible that you can be deceived as to your eternal salvation. 2. It means that he is willing to make you know all things.

It is your own fault, not his, if you are not guided into all the truth as it is in Jesus; he is an infinite fountain of pure heavenly light; he is willing and able to leave neither sin nor darkness in your soul. Soon you will be filled with the Spirit, and then you will see face to face, and know as you are known, and love as you are loved.

In the following part of the verse, the truth which the Spirit teaches is more fully opened up. 'He shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear that shall he speak.' When Jesus himself came to this world he came as a Witness. This is his name, Rev. i. 5. 'Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness.' And he said to Pilate, 'To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth.' Most men receive his testimony as Pilate did; they say, 'What is truth?' and turn away. Still Jesus came to bear witness that men are lost, that God is love, and that there is a way of forgiveness to the chief of sinners. Such is the office of the Spirit of truth, 'When the Comforter is come he will testify of me,' John xv. 26. O! it is sweet to be taught, by the Spirit, the deep things of God's bosom. 'The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him.'

Again, 'He will show you things to come.' This promise was eminently fulfilled in the experience of Paul, when the Spirit showed him so expressly the features of the coming papacy, 1 Tim. iv. 1. And in the experience of the beloved John, when, on the lonely rock of Patmos, he was 'in the Spirit on the Lord's day.'

To all believers it is fulfilled, when amid the bustle, and confusion, and abounding wickedness of their present dwelling, they can calmly, and with holy delight, feed upon the prophecies and promises of the conversion of Israel and of the world.

THIRTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one,' 1 John v. 7.

IN verses 4th and 5th, we see that the only way of overcoming the world is by believing that Jesus is the Son of God. 'Be often at Gethsemane, be often at Golgotha;' and so the weakest child of God may trample the world, the devil, and the flesh below his feet. But some may ask, Upon what evidence am I to believe that Jesus is a divine, full, and free Saviour?

Here is the evidence, 'There are three that bear record in heaven.' Oh! that Jesus may breathe upon us while we meditate on THE HEAVENLY WITNESSES.

I. THE FATHER. Jesus often appealed to the testimony of his Father. 'The Father himself, which hath sent me, he hath borne witness of me,' John v. 37. One amazing example of this was at his baptism. Jerusalem and all Judea had come out to John to be baptized. The work of the day was nearly done, and it was probably near the evening. The setting sun was pouring his golden rays through the palm trees that skirt the banks of Jordan. John, clothed in his rough garment of camels' hair, stood stern and bold declaring the words of eternal life, while multitudes hung upon his word. Then Jesus came to be baptized. No sooner had he come up out of the Jordan than the heavens were opened, as to the martyr Stephen. Every eye was attracted to heaven; when, behold! a dove descended gently upon the head of Jesus. Every eye now rested upon Jesus; when a still small voice broke upon the silence of evening, like the rushing of the wind through the forest, or like the noise of distant waters. First it spoke to Jesus, 'Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased.' Then it spoke to the listening crowd, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' (Comp. Luke iii. 22; Matt. iii. 17.)

In this way God has confessed Jesus to be his Son, and the Saviour of the world. This testimony was repeated on Tabor's woody summit, and is still unrecalled. That voice is still echoing through the world, and shall do so till the knell of the departing universe, 'This is my beloved Son: hear ye him.' In this way does the Father point the eyes of all his creatures to Jesus, 'Behold the Lamb of God!

II. THE WORD. In courts of law it is not customary to take a man's evidence concerning himself. He would be the very best and most conclusive witness; but man is such a depraved creature that he cannot be trusted in a matter where his own interest is concerned. But Jesus is the blessed Word of God 'who cannot lie,' and therefore it is quite right and lawful to take his own evidence concerning himself. Let us meditate on his testimony.

By his miracles he declared himself to be the Son of God, and the Saviour of sinners. 'The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me,' John x. 25. They were all done at his own command and will, not as prophets and apostles wrought their miracles in the name of another. Jesus said, 'I will: be thou clean.'

They were all miracles of mercy; with the exception of cursing the barren fig-tree, and even that, rightly understood, was a miracle of mercy also. All he did showed divine love towards sinners glowing in his bosom. They were all typical miracles; showing forth the glorious salvation which he came to work out. He opened the eyes of the blind, cleansed the lepers, cast out devils, raised the dead. Every one of his miracles did in this way point the weary sinner to Jesus, saying, 'Behold the Lamb of God!'

By his plain declarations he bare record that he was the Saviour of the world. When he stood beside the well of Sychar, the poor guilty woman of Samaria said to him, 'I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ, when he is come, he will tell us all things. Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am he.' To a poor guilty worm he plainly revealed himself.

Again, a poor blind soul at Jerusalem had received sight from Christ. Jesus said to him, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God? He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he which talketh with thee. And he said, Lord, I believe.' How plainly did he here declare himself to be the Son of God!

Again, he said to the unbelieving Jews, 'I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.' Thus did the blessed Word join in the testimony of the Father, drawing all men to himself, drawing every eye to behold him, every heart to cleave to him. 'Behold me, behold me!' 'No man cometh to the Father but by me.'

III. THE HOLY GHOST. In many ways does the Holy Ghost bear record. At the baptism of Jesus he came down upon him like a dove. He abode upon him. He anointed him for his ministry. He assisted him to offer up himself without spot unto God. But most of all, on the day of Pentecost he bare witness to Jesus. Christ had said, 'It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I go away, I will send him unto you.' And so when he came from the hand of the risen Saviour, he showed that Christ was risen indeed. He came in cloven tongues of fire, and every tongue spoke the glory of Jesus, Acts ii. So in every time of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of sinners, there is a fresh testimony that Jesus is the Saviour of the lost. The Spirit always directs the sinner to look to a pierced Christ. 'I will pour the spirit of grace and supplications, and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced,' Zech. xii. 10.

Oh! my soul, hast thou believed the record of the heavenly witnesses? 'If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.' If a faithful minister says he is willing to receive anxious souls to tell them the way of peace, how many will knock at his door, saying, Sir, what must I do to be saved? And why? Because they believe his word. But why do you not go as confidently to the door of Christ? Does he not say, 'Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.'

Oh! my soul, behold the guilt, the blackness of unbelief. Words cannot tell the weight of that God-defying sin. 'He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar.' We shall see better the guilt of this in that day when 'the fearful and unbelieving' shall be cast in along with whoremongers and murderers into the lake of fire, Rev. xxi. 8.

---

FOURTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake,' 1 Thess. i. 5.

THRICE happy minister who can address his people in these delightful words. Oh! that all our ministers could with truth say this. Why is it not so? Surely if we are determined, like Paul, 'to know nothing among them but Christ Jesus and him crucified;' if we are filled with the same Holy Spirit, if we live the same devoted life, and carry the same message night and day with tears, we ought to be able to use these precious words. 'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again bearing his sheaves with him.' The day of Pentecost was the time of the first-fruits. The day of ingathering is yet to come. The apostles had the former rain. We wait for the time of the latter rain.

I. Let us meditate on an unsuccessful ministry. The gospel comes to the people in word only. How often a faithful minister preaches the gospel, and the people seem to drink it in with joy! A beam of natural eloquence lights up all he says, or he has a gentle pathetic strain which rivets their attention. But no saving effects are seen to follow. No hearts are broken, no souls added to the church of such as shall be saved. So it was with Ezekiel: 'Lo! thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not,' Ezek. xxxiii. 32. These are they that receive the word into stony places; they hear the word, and, anon, with joy receive it, yet have they not root in themselves, but dure only for a while.

Oh! my soul, art thou contented to receive the gospel in word only? Can a hungry man be fed by the smell of the viands? Or can a beggar turn rich by hearing the sound of money? And can my hungry soul find rest by hearing the tinkling of the gospel cymbals? Alas! it is a fearful thing to drop into hell under the sound of gospel mercy.

But there are some who not only hear the gospel, but know the gospel; and yet it comes to them in word only. How many a child is brought up under godly parents, well catechized in divine truth, well disciplined in the bible? They understand the gospel scheme. They have all knowledge; no point is new to them. And yet they have no spiritual sight; no tasting and seeing that Christ is good; no rock below their feet; no sitting with great delight under the shadow of the apple-tree. Ah! these are the most miserable of all unconverted hearers. They will sink lower than Capernaum. Ah! how many children of ministers, how many sabbath-school teachers, how many preachers of the gospel may know, that the gospel has come to them in word only, and never in power. Alas! how sad is it to perish pointing to the city of refuge, to preach to others, and then to be a cast-away. But there is a more excellent way. Turn we now to meditate on—

II. A successful ministry. 'Our gospel came unto you in power.' What a powerless thing the gospel sometimes appears. The minister is half ashamed of it. The people slumber under its most affecting statements. Again, at another time, the gospel is evidently 'the power of God unto salvation.' An unseen power accompanies the preached word, and the sanctuary is felt to be the house of God, and the very gate of heaven. Then the word of Jeremiah is fulfilled: 'Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?' Jer. xxiii. 29. Then stout-hearted sinners are awakened. Old, and middle-aged, and little children, are made to cry, What must I do to be saved? An awful stillness pervades the assembly. The arrows of the King of Zion are sharp in the heart of the King's enemies, and the people are brought down under him. Oh! sinner, has the gospel come thus in power to you? Has the hammer of the word broken your rocky heart? Has the fire of the word melted your icy heart? Has the voice that is 'like the noise of many waters' spoken peace to your soul?

'Our gospel came unto you in the Holy Ghost.' It is he, the third person of the blessed Godhead, that makes the gospel come with power. It was he who 'moved upon the face of the waters,' when this world was without form and void, and brought life and beauty out of a dead world, Gen. i. 2. It is he that moves over the face of nature still, when the winter is past, and brings the fresh life of spring out of the cold bosom of the ground, Psal. civ. 30. But most of all, it is the Holy Spirit's work to take away the veil from the hearts of sinners, so that they turn to the Lord, 2 Cor. iii. 16. The carnal mind has got such enmity to God, the unconverted sinner is so stupid in divine things, that there must be the work of the Almighty Spirit—quickenings, enlightening, and making willing—before the sinner will cleave to Jesus.

Oh! sinner, has the Holy Spirit come to you? Sweet is the peace which they enjoy who are taught by him. When it is a dry time, ministers labour in vain; they spend their strength for nought and in vain. They feel like one standing on the sea-shore, speaking to the hard rocks, or the raging waves, or the tameless winds. But when the Holy Spirit comes, the weakest instruments are mighty, 'mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds.' Oh pray for such a blessed time.

'Our gospel came unto you in much assurance.' This is the effect on the soul, when the word comes with power, carried home by the Holy Ghost. The soul thus taught has a sweet certainty of the truth of the great things revealed in the gospel. When a man contemplates the sun, he feels a certainty that it is not the work of man but of God. So when a sinner gets anointed eyes, he sees a glorious beauty and fullness in Christ, so that his heart is filled with a sweet certainty of the truth of the gospel. He does not ask for evidences. He sees enough of evidence in Christ himself. He says, I am all guilt: thou art Jehovah my righteousness. I am all weakness: thou art Jehovah my banner. I am all emptiness: in thee dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. 'I am my Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine. He feedeth among the lilies.' It is this that fills the bosom with all joy and peace. It is this that gives a sweet sense of forgiveness and nearness to God. It is this that enables us to pray. Now we can say, 'My soul shall make her boast in the Lord.' 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' 'Who shall separate me from the love of Christ?' This is the gospel coming in much assurance. Oh! happy minister that can take up these words of Paul, and say, 'Our gospel came not unto you,' &c. That people is thy joy here, and shall be thy crown throughout eternity.

'What contradictions meet
In ministers' employ;
It is a bitter sweet,
A sorrow full of joy.
No other post affords a place
For equal honour or disgrace.

'On what has now been sown
Thy blessing, Lord, bestow;
The power is thine alone
To make it spring and grow.
Do thou the gracious harvest raise,
And thou alone shalt have the praise.'

FOURTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour,' Titus iii. 5, 6.

I. The way of pardon. When a soul is under conviction of sin, he feels that God is angry with him every day. The soul sinks down into a gloomy condition, 'the sorrows of death compass him, and the pains of hell get hold upon him.' When God visits this soul in mercy, he does it by revealing something in the heart of the Lord Jesus Christ; he makes 'the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appear,' ver. 4. The Spirit pours a beam of light upon the face of Jesus. He shows how he pitied the lost, came for the lost, obeyed and died in the room of the lost, and that the guiltiest of men may freely receive him as his Saviour. The sinner beholds the Lamb of God, and his bosom is filled with peace in believing. Now this is what is meant in these words, 'According to his mercy he saved us.'

1. Some souls are seeking salvation 'by works of righteousness.' You take great pains in religious duties, you read the word and pray, you feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, in order to make up for past sins, and to lay God under obligation to save you. From these words it is plain that you have mistaken the way to heaven; this way is blocked up; it is 'not by works of righteousness which we have done.' 'If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain,' Gal. ii. 21.

2. How are we to be saved? It is by 'the appearing of the love and kindness of God our Saviour.' You think that you must do something to change God's mind toward you, whereas Christ our great High Priest has, by the one offering up of himself, done all that needs to be done, or that ever can be done, to open the way of reconciliation to God. God is 'ready to forgive,' Psal. lxxxvi. 5. Learn not to look in, but to look out for peace. You are poring over your dark history, and your still darker bosom; you are straining your eyes to discover some gleam of light there. This is vain. Who ever sought the light of the rising sun by gazing into a dungeon? Look out upon the kindness and love of God our Saviour. It is a discovery of the person, offices, beauty, finished work, and freeness of God our Saviour, that fills the heart with peace, and the mouth with praise.

'My terrors all vanished before his sweet name,
My guilty fears banished, with boldness I came
To drink at the fountain life-giving and free,
Jehovah Tsidkenu is all things to me.'

II. The way of holiness. 'He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost.' 1. It is a 'washing.' The work of the Spirit on the pardoned heart is called washing, because it is a making clean. The natural heart is polluted and vile; no streams of nature can wash it clean, no good resolutions, or vows, or endeavours can change the carnal heart, Jer. xiii. 23. The Holy Spirit alone can do this. 2. It is 'the washing of regeneration,' or of a new birth. It is no outward washing of the body, but an inward change upon the soul; no baptism with water, but baptism with the Holy Ghost. Ah! how often have I washed the body clean, have I ever experienced the washing of regeneration? I was once washed in the water of baptism, have I been baptized with the Holy Ghost also? 3. It is a constant washing. The water that Christ gives shall be within the soul, 'a well of water springing up into everlasting life,' John iv. 14. Most places, when well washed, keep clean for a time. Not so the heart of man; it is a vile sink of iniquity. The 'river of water of life' must be turned into it, and made to flow perpetually through it. We must be watered every moment. Oh! happy soul that has got the Fountain of living waters within. We do not know our deceitful heart if we do not feel our need of an unceasing well of the Spirit to purify us from all filthiness. 4. It is 'a renewing of the Holy Ghost.' When a house has become crazy and insecure, no repairs will do it any good. It must be taken down and built up again. Such a house is the heart of a sinner. It is past all repair. The leprosy of sin is ingrained in the walls of it. It must be taken down and built up again. This is the 'renewing of the Holy Ghost.' When there has been a long and severe winter the trees stand bare and leafless; they are in a manner dead, and cannot bear fruit. If the winter were to continue they would really die. But when summer breathes upon them again, the juicy sap ascends into the branches in full and mighty stream, 'the fig-tree puts forth its green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell.' The face of the earth is renewed, Psal. civ. 30. Such a dead plant is the heart of a sinner. A Christless state is the winter of the soul. But when Christ is revealed, when the soul comes into the love of God, when the Spirit is sent forth into the heart, the soul becomes a new creature, and sings, 'I am like a green olive tree in the house of God.' Lastly, 'The Spirit is shed on us abundantly.' Christians often complain that there are few drops of the Spirit falling in our day. Alas, there is too great cause for this complaint. Yet in one view it is not true. Wherever there is a single believer, there the Spirit is shed abundantly. When I look at the whole world lying in wickedness, and the thousand snares laid for my soul in every path; when I listen to the roaring of the lion who walketh about seeking whom he may devour; and above all, when I look in upon the law in my members warring against the law of my mind, I am tempted to cry, 'I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul.' If I had legions of angels on my side they could not hold me up. No created arm can keep me from falling. But Jesus says, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' He sheds the Holy Ghost abundantly. What a constant dropping of the rain, what a constant springing of the well, what a full inflowing of the river of God is needed to hold up my helpless soul. Glory to God for an indwelling Sanctifier. 'Now unto him who is able to keep me from falling, and to present me faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.'

FIFTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever,' John xiv. 16.

How much of the majesty of Christ shines in these words! What a divine sweetness breathes in them! He knows his own mind, he knows the mind of his Father, he knows the mind of the Spirit, and, therefore, he speaks with a holy certainty. I will pray, the Father shall give, the Spirit will abide with you for ever. We should receive his words with the same sweet certainty as that with which they were spoken.

I. Observe what Christ will do. 'I will pray the Father.' This shows that Christ is not dead. He was dead, but he is now alive for evermore. The dead do not pray; the lips that are sealed in death are silent lips. But Jesus says, 'I will pray the Father.' He looks beyond his agony in the garden, and on the cross; he looks beyond his rocky sepulchre; and, as if he had nothing to do but to step into the presence of his Father, he says, 'I will pray the Father.'

Again, this shows the constancy of Christ's love. When a friend is going away to a far land—an 'inner friend'—a praying friend, we say to him as we are going to the ship, 'Now you will never forget us,' and he says, 'No I never will, I will pray for you.' O! such a friend is Christ. He is one born for adversity, a friend that sticketh closer than a brother. At times we are cast down when we think of his glory, and our meanness; of his being the very Sun of heaven, and we a vile worm on the earth; but be not faithless but believing. I will never forget you, he says, even when I am at the right hand of the Father, I will pray for you.

II. Observe what the Father will do. 'He shall give you another Comforter.' We learn from these words the certainty of the gift of the Holy Spirit. How confidently Jesus speaks, 'No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son shall reveal him.' If an angel had come and said, the 'Father shall give you another Comforter,' we might have doubted; for, how does an angel know what the Father will give? But Jesus is 'the true and faithful Witness,' he had 'come from God, and went to God,' and he says with a divine boldness, 'The Father shall give.' Ah! how many Christians seem never to have received the Comforter. How many have no sweet sense of forgiveness. How many have no close walk with God. Ministers constantly bless their flocks, saying, 'The communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all.' How few seem really to possess it. Why is this? It is because of unbelief. You do not fully realize this truth, 'We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.' You do not believe that the Father delights to give the Spirit, in answer to the prayer of his Son. You do not live upon that promise, Isa. xlix. 8. 'In an acceptable time have I heard thee.'

Again, observe that word, 'another Comforter.' Jesus was the first Comforter. He came 'to comfort all that mourn;' his words were all 'good words, and comfortable words;' his blood was peace-speaking blood. He had comforted the disciples by the way, by the well, and on the stormy sea. But now he must go his way to him that sent him. He leaves this word behind, 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter.' 'He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him, also, freely give us all things.' Enter into this argument, O my soul! He that gave the first Comforter for sinners will surely give the second Comforter to his dear children.

III. Observe what the Comforter will do. 'Abide with you for ever.' Jesus and his Spirit are one. He knew what is the mind of the Spirit. He also knew what is in man—the unbelieving, inconstant, unholy heart of man, and yet he says the Comforter shall abide with you for ever. Sometimes a young believer is cast down by this thought, 'How do I know that my faith shall not fail me; the veil of unbelief may cover my heart again, perhaps in the hour of temptation, perhaps in a dying hour.' Here is the answer, Jesus will pray, the Father will give, and the Comforter will abide with you for ever. Observe this in a singular instance, Luke xiii. 31. 'Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not.' Be not afraid, only believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. He that was the Author will be the Finisher of your faith.

Sometimes a young believer is sadly cast down by a discovery of the plague of his own heart. When he looks into the smoking volcano that is in his own bosom, he begins to tremble lest after all he become a cast-away. Take these two directions: 1. Be humbled in the dust under your body of sin and death, but do not despair. Paul had the same, and all true Christians have the same. Make this resolution your own, 'Resolved never to give over, nor in the least to slacken my fight with my corruptions, however unsuccessful I may be.' 2. Believe in the Comforter. Keep your eye fixed on Christ, on his wounds out of which the blood flowed, that cleanseth from all sin; on his lips that pray so sweetly for his own, (Song v. 16). wait for 'that holy Spirit of promise.' He alone can make you holy; and he will do it, for faithful is he that promised.

'Beware of Peter's word
Nor confidently say,
I never will deny thee, Lord,
But grant I never may.

'Man's wisdom is to seek
His strength in God alone,
And even an angel would be weak,
Who trusted in his own.'

FIFTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?' Luke xi. 13.

Jesus desires all his disciples to pray for the Holy Spirit. He knows that we cannot believe at the first, nor continue believing without this precious gift. He knows that our soul cannot live, love, resist the devil, mortify the deeds of the body, nor overcome the world, without this living water; therefore does he urge his people to ask, seek, and knock. He is still saying to poor sinners, 'If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water,' John iv. 10.

I. Earthly fathers, who are evil, give good gifts to their children. This is a fact in human nature. The most wicked fathers are often kind to their offspring. In some countries it is true, Satan has shown his infernal power in destroying the parental affections, so that the Hindoo mother has been known to plunge her sickly infant into the Ganges, or even to hurry it, while yet alive, into a grave dug with her own hands, and to trample the ground over it with her own feet. 'The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.' In general, however, there is, even in the bosom of savage men, a chord of tenderest love toward their little ones. The wild Indian of America will bring home from the woods the most brilliant feather to deck the brow of his prattling boy; and the rude Greenlander will brave the icy blast to provide a scanty meal for his tender children. You must break a father's heart in pieces, before you can break asunder that mysterious bond of love that binds him to his child. Earthly fathers who are evil give good gifts to their children.

II. How much more shall God, who is a good Father, give the Holy Spirit. God excels an earthly father in two respects:

1. He is wise, 'the only wise God.' Earthly fathers are short-sighted men. They do not know the wants of their children, nor do they know the best time and way of supplying these wants. They often give to their children when they should withhold, they pamper their humours, and spoil their dispositions; they often withhold when they should give, and provoke their children to fretfulness. But God is a wise Father. 'The Father of spirits' knows our frame, and remembers that we are dust. He knows our minutest wants, and he knows the very best time and way of supplying them. Above all, he knows our need of the Holy Spirit. He knows that we are naturally dead in trespasses and sins. He knows that a veil is over our hearts—he knows that our faith is weak—and that our enemies are too many for us, and too strong. He knows the temptations and afflictions to which we are called. He knows the manner and measure of the Spirit's help which we need to keep us from falling.

2. God is love. God has a natural love to a soul in Christ. Earthly fathers love their children, but O how coldly compared with God's love. In Isa. xlix. 15. it is preferred above a mother's love: 'Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee.' There is no love in this world like a mother's love. It is a free, unbought, unselfish love. She cannot account for it. You cannot change it. You must break to pieces the mother's heart before you will change it. It is the fullest love with which a creature can love. She loves with all her heart. But the love of God to a soul in Christ is far above a mother's love. It is a love ingrained in his nature, and God must change before his love can change. It is a full love. The whole heart of the Father is as it were continually showered down in love upon the Lord Jesus. And when a sinner comes into Christ the same love rests upon that soul; (see John xvii. 26.) When the sun showers down its beams on the wide ocean, and on a little flower at the same time, it is the same sunshine that is poured into both, though the ocean has vastly larger capacity to receive its glorious beams. So when the Son of God receives the love of his Father, and a poor guilty worm hides in him, it is the same love that comes both on the Saviour and the sinner, though Jesus is able to receive infinitely more. In Psal. ciii. 13, God's love is compared to a father's love: 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.' His love combines all the tenderness of a mother's, and all the wisdom of a father's love. How surely then will he give the Holy Spirit to every one of his children that ask him. Far more surely than an earthly father gives bread to his hungry children. This is good news for my weary soul. I am like David in the wilderness, (Psal. lxxiii. title,) 'My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is. 'My soul followeth hard after thee; thy right hand upholdeth me.' All my grace comes from thee. Thou didst begin the good work in me when I was an enemy, wilt thou not carry it on, now that I am a child? Thou didst pour down the Spirit when I was like the dry ground, wilt thou not water me every moment now that I am a plant, though a feeble one, of thine own planting? Hear the divine answer, O my soul, and be still! 'I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely, for mine anger is turned away from him. I will be as the dew unto Israel,' Hosea xiv. 4, 5.

'Come holy, holy, holy, Lord,
The Father, Son, and Spirit come,
Be mindful of thy changeless word,
And make the faithful soul thy home.'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'All thy children shall be taught of the Lord;
and great shall be the peace of thy children.'
Isa. liv. 13.

WHEN the Jews are brought again to Zion, and converted to God, they will be an example of a people, 'all taught of the Lord.' God says, Jer. xxxi. 34. 'They shall all know me, from the least of them even unto the greatest of them.' And again, Isa. lx. 21. 'Thy people shall be all righteous.' They are to be the first example of a 'righteous nation.' In some of our well-ordered parishes, we see a people all taught of man; but, ah! how much ignorance, deceit, and wickedness are lying below the surface. But all the children of Zion shall be taught of the Lord, and, therefore, they will be a people of great peace, and great holiness.

Such is the case of spiritual Zion at this moment. They are all taught, not of man, nor of angel, but of the Lord, and their peace passeth all understanding.

1. Meditate on the great teacher, the Lord. He alone knows divine things as they are. Ministers have but glimpses into the eternal world. They see but little of sin, of the shortness of time, of the depth of hell, of the love of God, of the person, work, and grace of Christ. Therefore they cannot teach effectually. Books also are infinitely imperfect. The best of them are but sparks from the bible, mingled with human darkness. But the Lord knows all things as they are. 'All things are naked and laid open to the eyes of him with whom we have to do.' He knows our infinite guilt; hell and destruction are before him. He knows the Son. 'No man knoweth the Son but the Father.' He knows, 'The love of Christ, that passeth knowledge.' He then can make it known. O my soul hast thou been taught of the Lord! Again, he alone can teach the heart. Man can speak to the ear, to the understanding, to the memory, God alone to the heart. The reason why human teaching does not convey saving light to the soul is, that the heart is dead. The carnal mind is enmity against God, and against everything that comes from God; and, therefore, when the truth is presented, the worldly heart draws the mind away from beholding it. But when the Lord is teaching, he touches the heart, and it melts under his hand. He awakens concern in the dead soul, so that the person runs to hear the word preached. He makes the soul willing in the day of his power. He makes salvation, by Christ, clear to the mind, and sweet to the heart, in the same happy moment. None can teach like God. He can teach a child, or an idiot, or an old man. Is any thing too hard for the Lord? 'O send forth thy light and thy truth, let them lead me, let them guide me.'

2. What is divine teaching? It is not mere head-knowledge of divine things. Many have great knowledge of the bible, have read it all, studied much of it, learned much of it by heart; they know the Catechism well, they have a just notion of divinity; some have great knowledge of books, of Boston, and Willison, and Flavel; some may be great judges of sermons, able to discriminate between legal and evangelical preachers; alas! all this may be, and more, without one spark of divine teaching. Alas! how many ministers have there been like the finger-post that points the way, but does not go. No doubt Judas had a clear knowledge of divinity, and could preach well, yet Jesus said he was a devil. We know that Satan has great knowledge of the bible, and yet he only trembles.

What then is divine teaching? It is God giving the soul a sense of the wondrous beauty, excellence, and sweetness of the way of salvation by Christ. 'Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.' Take an example in one of the most eminent saints that ever lived. 'The first instance that I remember, of that sort of inward sweet delight in God and divine things, that I have lived much in since, was on reading these words, 1 Tim. i. 17. "Now, unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." As I read these words, there came into my soul, and was as it were diffused through it, a sense of the glory of the divine Being; a new sense, quite different from anything I ever experienced before. Never any words of scripture seemed to me as these words did. I thought with myself, how excellent a Being that was, and how happy I should be if I might enjoy that God, and be rapt up to him in heaven, and be as it were swallowed up in him for ever! I kept saying, and as it were singing over these words of scripture to myself; and went to pray to God that I might enjoy him; and prayed in a manner quite different from what I used to do, with a new sort of affection. But it never came into my thought that there was anything spiritual or of a saving nature in this. From about that time, I began to have a new kind of apprehensions and ideas of Christ, and the work of redemption, and the glorious way of salvation by him. An inward sweet sense of these things, at times, came into my heart; and my soul was led away in pleasant views and contemplations of them.'

Ah! this is divine teaching. This is the teaching that brings us to the foot of Christ, like the woman which was a sinner. Before, we are perplexed about coming to Christ, believing on Christ, closing with Christ; but now it is all sweet and easy; we cannot but believe on Jesus. This is teaching that fills the bosom with all joy and peace. It gives 'great peace,' 'peace like a river,' 'joy unspeakable and full of glory.' This is the teaching that sanctifies. A man may have the head-knowledge of an angel, and the heart of a devil. But when God touches the heart he makes all things new.

'Behold! I change all human things,
Saieth he whose words are true,
Lo! what was old is passed away,
And all things are made new.'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.' Eph. ii. 8.

Most men try to lay God under debt to save them. They work for salvation instead of working from it. They 'go about to establish their own righteousness.' In this way worldly people seek eternal life: 'What shall we do, that we might work the works of God?' John vi. 28. Although in words they renounce all pretence of any worth in themselves or in their duties, yet they have a secret hope of recommending themselves to God by their decency, sobriety, and religious performances. In this way those who have a little concern for their souls, like the young ruler, seek for eternal life: 'Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?' Matt. xix. 16. His earnest desire was to make himself appear righteous before God. In this way, also, those who are under the deepest concern often wander in search of pardon and peace. Perhaps there may be traces of this feeling in the anxious question of the poor jailor, 'Sirs, what must I do to be saved,' Acts xvi. 30; and in the piercing cry of the prostrate Saul, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' Acts ix. 6. Certain it is that self-righteousness is the worst and longest-lived viper in the human breast. Most men under convictions are very unwilling to throw away all self-confidence. They are not willing to despair of ever being fair in the sight of God in themselves. They shrink back from the idea of being lost and undone, for anything that they can do. They do not like to venture to lie helpless and without a plea at the feet of a sovereign God. How solemn to a sinner in such a state should these words be, 'By grace ye are saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God!'

I. Salvation is by grace. When a man chooses an apple off a tree, he generally chooses the ripest, the one that promises best. It is not so with God in choosing the soul he saves. He does not choose those that have sinned least, those that are most willing to be saved; he often chooses the vilest of men, 'to the praise of the glory of his grace.' This is proved by the instances given in the Bible of brands plucked out of the burning. Why did God choose Manasseh, who 'caused his children to pass through the fire,' set 'a carved image in the house of God,' and filled Jerusalem with the blood of holy men, while many of his deluded people, who had sinned far less, perished? 2 Chron. xxxiii. Why did God save Zaccheus the hoary-headed swindler, 'the chief of the publicans?' Luke xix. 1—10. Why did Jesus tell the Pharisees, 'the publicans, and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you? Why did Jesus enter into the pearly gates of paradise with a poor thief, who had never done anything but sin up to his last hour? Luke xxiii. 43, comp. Matt. xxvii. 44. Why did he leave the other thief, who was no worse than his fellow (both were hell-deserving), to sink into perdition within an arm's length of an Almighty Saviour? All these things happened unto them for ensamples, to show us that God saves according to the good pleasure of his will, not for our goodness, but to show his own free adorable grace.

The same thing is proved by the experience of every child of God. Who that has ever 'tasted that the Lord is gracious,' does not feel a response in their bosom to the declaration of a simple believer, 'Had he not chosen me before I was born, he had never seen reason to choose me afterwards.' There was nothing in me to attract the love of God. 'Behold, even to the moon and it shineth not, yea, the stars are not pure in his sight; how much less man that is a worm, and the son of man which is a worm.' He loves what is pure, holy, heavenly; but 'I am carnal, sold under sin.' There was everything in me to drive God away. 'God is angry with the wicked every day,' Psal. vii. 11. He was angry with me. His whole nature abhorred me, for I was under Adam's sin; I was shapen in iniquity; every member of my body, every faculty of my soul, had been only the servant of sin. Yet he came over all these mountains to my soul. I said, Art thou come to torment me before the time? I desire not the knowledge of thy ways. But he made me willing in the day of his power. Glory, glory, glory, to the Father who chose me, the Son who died for me, and the Spirit who quickened me. Salvation is of the Lord, and it is all of grace.

II. Salvation is through faith. When David Brainerd was under conviction of sin, the corruption of his heart was dreadfully irritated by this, that faith alone was the condition of salvation. Of this very text he used to say, 'It is a hard saying: who can bear it?' Another thing that kept him in misery was this, 'I could not find out what faith was, or what it was to believe, and come to Christ. I read the calls of Christ to the weary and heavy laden, but could find no way that he directed them to come in.' This is a difficulty which almost every inquiring sinner feels. It is probable that Satan often uses it as a fiery dart to keep poor sinners away from Christ. The only way really to know what faith is, is to experience it. In one part of the word it is described as 'knowing.' 'This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent,' John xvii. 3. A true realizing knowledge of God, and of Christ as the sent of God, is saving faith. Have I this knowledge, O my soul? I was born like a wild ass's colt. God was not in all my thoughts. I did not like to retain God in my knowledge. But it pleased God to reveal his Son in me. Flesh and blood could not reveal Him unto me, but my Father who is in heaven. He has opened to me the way of salvation, so that I see its wisdom, excellency, and freeness. I cannot but believe, and this I humbly trust is that faith which is the gift of God.

Again, it is described as discovering the beauty and excellency of Christ: 'In that day shall the branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely for them that are escaped of Israel,' Isa. iv. 2. A real discovery of the glory, suitableness, and freeness of the Lord Jesus Christ in the soul, is saving faith. Natural men know what it is to get a discovery of a beautiful countenance, and the natural heart immediately glows with admiration. None but believers know what it is to get a discovery of the fair face of him who is 'fairer than the children of men,' and to have the heart filled with all joy and peace in believing. Has this discovery been made to me? Can I say, 'Whom, having not seen, I love; in whom, though now I see him not, but believing, I rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.' Once I saw no form nor comeliness in Jesus, no beauty that I should desire him. But he came like a roe or a young hart, leaping on the mountains, skipping on the hills. He stood behind our wall, he looked in at the window, showing himself through the lattice. He showed me his hands and his feet pierced for sinners. He showed me that there was room beneath his shining righteousness. He showed me his heart, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; and now I cannot but say, He is to me beautiful and glorious, excellent and comely. If there were ten thousand other ways of pardon, I would pass them all by, and flee to him. He is altogether lovely. This I trust is saving faith, which is the gift of God.

'Amazing grace! (how sweet the sound!)

That saved a wretch like me:

I once was lost, but now am found;

Was blind, but now I see.

'Twas grace that taught my heart to fear,
And grace my fears relieved;
How precious did that grace appear
The hour I first believed!

'Through many dangers, toils, and snares,
I have already come;
'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far,
And grace will lead me home.'

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name.' John i. 12.

WHEN the Lord of glory came to this world, the most despised and rejected him. Yet all did not. Isaiah cried, 'Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?' And yet in a few verses after he adds, 'He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied,' Isa. liii. 1, 11. In like manner, John in this chapter tells us, that when Jesus came, 'the darkness comprehended him not; 'the world knew him not; 'his own received him not.' Still, a little flock did receive him. Their eyes were opened to behold his glory, their hearts to feel his love. They left their earthly all, and followed him, they hung upon his lips, kept his sayings, walked in his steps, put on his righteousness, drank in his spirit; and 'to them he gave power to become the sons of God.' There always has been, and always will be, a hidden church. As David was never to want a son to sit upon his throne, so David's Son and David's Lord never shall want souls over which to reign. As in Noah's day of almost universal corruption, and in Elijah's day of dark idolatry, there were some hidden ones that knew and loved the Lord; so in our day, in the darkest parishes of Scotland, you will find some hearts that kindle at the name of Jesus. In countries sunk in the darkness of popery, you will find some heaven-taught souls groping their way to heaven by the strait gate and the narrow way. Christ will never want a vineyard on earth on which to show his love and care. He will never want a witnessing church to proclaim his grace. 'Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' Matt. xvi. 18.

How clearly these words show that to receive Christ is the same as to believe on his name. Many souls find great difficulty in knowing what faith is. Satan seems to make great use of this in some hearts, in order that he may divert their anxious soul from the great object of faith to look at the workings of their own mind. The Bible makes no difficulty in the matter. At one time it is described as coming to Jesus: 'I am the bread of life, he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst,' John vi. 35. Again, it is called a laying hold: 'Who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us,' Heb. vi. 18. In another scripture it is called submitting: 'They have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God,' Rom. x. 3. In other parts of the word of God it is called looking to Jesus, calling upon the name of the Lord, hearing that the soul may live, knowing, cleaving to the Lord. In one and all of these the meaning of God is, that the heart is made willing to be justified through the blood and obedience of the Lord Jesus. O! it is the truest and most lasting joy in the universe when Christ is fully revealed to the soul, and when the excellency of the way of salvation by Christ is made manifest; the heart is often so filled that the tongue cannot speak. It is 'joy unspeakable, and full of glory.'

Sinner, have you received the Lord Jesus Christ? Has your heart melted at the sight of the heaven-provided Saviour? Have you known the gift of God? Have you seen and delighted in the finished work of Christ? If Christ had to come and die, you might say, perhaps he will not go through with it. But he has done it. It is more than eighteen hundred years since he agonized in Gethsemane, and poured out his soul upon the cross. 'It is finished.' His whole work, as Surety in the place of sinners, is finished. The whole undertaking is completed. Nay more, God has accepted it. He has declared it from heaven: 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased,'—and that any sinner is welcome to draw near by Jesus. O! I am willing to be found in Jesus, let your soul reply; I am willing to stand under the shelter of the one Mediator to all eternity. What satisfies God satisfies me. 'Who shall condemn? It is Christ that died.'

But what good shall I obtain by receiving Christ? Hear the divine answer: 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God.' An awakened soul is seeking only rest, peace with God, forgiveness of sins. But Christ gives far more. He gives the child's place in the father's love. We are by nature children of the wrath, a generation of vipers, children of the wicked one; but the moment we consent to put on the glorious righteousness of Immanuel we become adopted sons of God: 'God sent forth his son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.'

Sinner! do you know what it is that God offers you in the gospel? Though you are a viper, under the curse of the broken law, and your heart more like Satan than God, yet the holy God offers you a place in his bosom. He sent forth his Son to make room for you, to take you into the son's place. He cast out his dearly beloved Son, that he might enfold you in his arms. What are all the joys of sin compared with this? What are earthly titles compared to this? Sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. Surely you must be deceived by the god of this world, if you are willing to remain a child of the devil rather than become a child of God.

There is still fuller blessing contained in these words. Those who receive Christ receive power to become adopted sons. This is blessed, this is wonderful. But those who receive Christ receive power to become real sons—sons by a new birth. It is good to be an adopted son, but ah! to be a real son of God, having the same spirit, features, joys, this is the full bliss of being a Christian. When a rich man adopts a beggar boy into his family, and takes him for a son, he not only clothes him, and feeds him, but he educates him as his child. He puts him under a teacher to rid him of old habits, to put a new spirit in him, the spirit of his own child. This is what God does with all that receive Christ. When a sinner flees to Christ, God not only puts the best robe on him, and embraces him, and seats him at his table, but he sends forth the Spirit of his Son into his heart. The same almighty Spirit that dwelleth in his own bosom, and in his Son, the Spirit that was given to Jesus without measure, he sends into the poor pardoned sinner's heart, to make him a son indeed, 'born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' Surely if men knew what God is willing to do for them in Christ, they could not so lightly esteem the Rock of their salvation. O sinner! God is willing to take out your old alienated heart, and to give you the heart of one of his own weaned children. He is willing to give you the Spirit of Christ, to change you into his image, to make you like him now and in eternity. Surely it may be said to every soul that despiseth Christ, 'Woe unto thee, O Jerusalem! wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be?' Jer. xiii. 27.

'Lo! his clothing is the sun,
The bright Sun of righteousness,
He hath put salvation on,
Jesus is his beauteous dress.

'Lo! he feeds on living bread,
Drinks the fountain from above,
Leans on Jesus Christ his head,
Feasts for ever on his love.'

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief.' Mark ix. 24.

How very small was the faith with which this man came to Christ. It was like a grain of mustard seed. Twice we read of Jesus expressing wonder at the great faith of the poor worms that applied to him. When the centurion came to him in behalf of his beloved servant who was sick, he believed that Christ was willing and able to heal him, though he lay beneath a sinful roof. 'Jesus marvelled at so great faith,' Matt. viii. 5—13. When the Syro-phenician woman cried after him in behalf of her child, she would not be turned back by his long silence, or by his seemingly rough words; she saw deep into his heart of grace, and waited for an answer of peace, till Jesus cried, 'O woman, great is thy faith, be it unto thee even as thou wilt,' Matt. xv. 21—28.

Another time a leper came, and as he kneeled said, 'Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean.' This was little faith. He believed the power of Jesus; he was not sure of his willingness. He thought he might be willing, for he came and applied to him; still he was not sure, and said, 'If thou wilt.' With holy majesty Jesus rebuked his unbelief, and granted his desire: 'I will, be thou clean,' Matt. viii. 3. But far weaker than all these was the faith of this unhappy father; 'If thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us.' Alas, that ever such words should be spoken to the Lord of glory. He in whose hand our breath is, and whose are all our ways—He by whom all things were created that are in heaven, and that are in earth—He whose name is Jehovah-Rophi, 'The Lord that healeth thee,' was standing before him, and yet his faith could reach no higher than that, 'If thou canst do anything.' And yet Jesus did not cast the unbelieving man away from him. Jesus never can deny that word, 'Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.' He sent him home a happy father with his child made whole. These things were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. How evil unbelief appears in another, and yet how little do I perceive the same dishonouring thoughts of Christ when they lurk in my own bosom. I feel as if I never could use such language to Jehovah-Jesus; and yet how many times in the day I doubt both his love and his power. How often, when guilt is on my conscience, I doubt whether he be entirely willing to be the Mediator between God and such a sinful wretch as me. How often, in an hour of temptation, when the passions are roused, I doubt whether he be able to subdue such a heart as mine. How often these words are the language of my heart: 'If thou canst do anything, have compassion on me, and help me.' And yet for all our unbelief, he doth not send us empty away. Faith, as a grain of mustard seed, obtains everlasting benefits, Luke xvii. 6. Do not let me then keep away from Christ, because my faith is small. Though he had to call his disciples, 'Ye of little faith,' yet that did not hinder him from rebuking the winds and the sea for them, and there was a great calm, Matt. viii. 26. In like manner though my name may be, 'Thou of little faith,' to the end of life's troubled journey, yet will I go to him with such faith as I have, and he will in no wise cast me out.

But observe the prayer of the anxious father, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief.' O! surely this was a groan dictated by the Spirit of supplications. Never was prayer better timed, or better expressed. The Author of faith stood before him—to whom could he go for faith but unto Christ? Faith is the gift of Jehovah Jesus, John xvii. 2. He in his kingly power, riding through the world, sends out his arrows, and brings down the people under him, Psal. xlv. 5. He not only brings gold for our ransom, and white raiment to cover our nakedness, but he brings in his hand, to the door of sinners, eye-salve to anoint our eyes, that we may see, Rev. iii. 18. He was not only wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for iniquities, but he bids us reach forward our finger, that he may guide it into the prints of the nails, and reach forward our hand, that he may guide it to his wounded side. He was not only the Rock cleft for sinners, but by his Almighty power he puts us into the cleft of the rock, and hides us there, Exod. xxxiii. 22.

Would that all the church of Christ were taught this prayer, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief,' or that other, 'Increase our faith,' Luke xvii. 5. Two precious things are contained in it. A sense of our want of faith, and a clear knowledge of the fountain whence living faith must flow. Few people know how small their faith is. In a Christian land, sitting under a lively ministry, surrounded by warm-hearted Christian friends, the feelings are fanned into a glow, and the believer thinks that his faith is strong and full. But let providence call that believer to a foreign land, where—

'The sound of the church-going bell
These valleys and rocks never heard,
Never sighed at the sound of a knell,
Nor smiled when a sabbath appeared.'

Let him wander among those that never pray to Jesus, like Abraham in the land of the Canaanites, or let him lie on a sick bed with none to wait on him that know the Saviour, then he will begin to learn by sad experience that warm feelings are not faith—that faith in Jesus is like a grain of mustard seed in his bosom. O it is a painful but a blessed lesson to be taught how weak our faith is. It makes us trust less to our feelings, and less to friends, and makes us cleave closer to Christ as our all in all.

But if it be good to know how little faith we have, it is better far to know what an overflowing fountain Jesus is. He is 'Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending.' He is 'the Author and the Finisher of our faith.' He anointed our eyes at the first, and made us see men as trees walking. He alone can anoint them more fully, that we may see all things clearly. He alone can help our unbelief. He can cover all the sin of it, for O it is crimson sin. He can remove it by fuller discoveries of himself. 'My Beloved is like a roe, or a young hart.' On Judah's hills the gazelle bounds with amazing ease and graceful swiftness over the most rugged rocks. It is its very nature to spring from crag to crag. So easily, swiftly, and agreeably to his gracious nature does the Lord Jesus reveal himself to the souls that wait for him. Often by a single visit the unbelief of half a lifetime vanishes, and the soul cries out with adoring joy, 'My Lord, and my God.' Wait on the Lord Jesus, O doubting soul. Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart. 'It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord,' Lam. iii. 20. Often look beyond the blue sky to him who sits on the right hand of God, and cry out with tears, 'Lord I believe, help thou mine unbelief.'

'Lord, thou canst heal me if thou wilt,
For thou canst all things do,
O cleanse my leprous soul from guilt,
My filthy heart renew.

'He heard, and with a gracious look,
Pronounced the healing word,
"I will—be clean," and while he spoke,
I felt my health restored.

'Come, lepers, seize the present hour,
The Saviour's grace to prove,
He can relieve, for he is power;
He will, for he is love.'

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.' Eph. iii. 16—19.

How remarkable are the prayers of Paul! He used to pray for individuals whom he loved by name. Without ceasing, the names of Timothy and Philemon were upon his heart, 2 Tim. i. 3; Phil. iv. He prayed for believers whom he had never seen, Col. i. 9; ii. 1. He prayed for all true saints, Eph. vi. 18, 24. He wrestled with continual sorrow of heart for the Jews, Rom. ix. 1; x. 1. In how remarkable a manner he prayed, 'without ceasing,' 'day and night,' 'with joy,' 'with thanksgiving,' with humility 'bowing his knees.' How large were his requests! He opens his mouth wide, that God may fill it. In Rom. xv. 13. he prays: 'Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing.' In 1 Thess. v. 23. he prays: 'And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly,' &c. So in these words he asks for amazing gifts. God only can fully comprehend the vast meaning of such a prayer. The words of man seem to be too narrow to express his large desires. These are 'groanings that cannot be uttered,' the intercession of the Spirit through the mind and heart of Paul. None but God could have given such a prayer, and none but God could answer it.

O that all ministers could pray like Paul. Probably no man ever lived who was the means of saving so many souls as Paul. Probably no minister was ever made the instrument of bringing his people to such a height of holiness as Paul. How was this? Look at his prayers for an answer. Consider their frequency, their urgency, their vastness. It was on his knees Paul fought the good fight of faith, and obtained grace for his own soul, and for all the churches. Such a man would be a blessing to the whole world. 'O Lord, teach us to pray.'

There are three principal petitions here, each one growing out of the other.

1. Consider the last petition, ver. 19. 'That ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.' This is the sum and end of all his prayers for them. Indeed it is the chief end of man. The great object of the gospel is to bring poor empty sinners to be filled with all the fulness of God, to be like an empty vessel cast into a vast ocean, to be filled with all the fulness of his love, of his presence, of his Spirit, of his joy, of his likeness. This Adam would have been had he persevered in holiness. This we become when united to Christ, and shall be to all eternity. This David panted after, 'My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God,' Psal. xlii. 2. This David, in some measure, enjoyed: 'Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none on earth whom I desire beside thee,' Psal. lxxiii. 25. Certain it is that the believer's God can draw near, and reveal himself, and fill the soul in a way that worldly men never thought of. He can fill the heart with a sense of his love. One dear Christian could say, 'My soul hath been compassed about with the terrors of death, the sorrows of hell were upon me, and a wilderness of woe was in me, but blessed, blessed, blessed be the Lord my God, he hath brought me to a place of rest, even to the sweet running waters of life.' Another dear Christian, of whom President Edwards writes, experienced such clear and lively views of Christ that 'her soul did, as it were, swim in the rays of Christ's love like a little mote swimming in the beams of the sun that come in at a window.' The same person, speaking upon the most deliberate consideration, could say, that 'what was enjoyed in a single minute of the whole space, which was many hours, was worth more than all the outward comfort and pleasure of the whole life put together.' O! that Christians now were filled with these drops of the fulness of God. He can fill the soul with his holiness. A natural man has not a spark of God's holiness. He may be pleasant, amiable, and of a natural integrity, but he has none of the 'living water.' The moment a soul is united to Christ, the same Holy Spirit who dwells in the bosom of the Father dwells also in him. 'I will put my Spirit within you,' Ezek. xxxvi. 27. The believer becomes 'a partaker of the divine nature,' 2 Pet. i. 4. He becomes 'a partaker of his holiness,' Heb. xii. 10. He does not become as holy as God, but the same stream that flows through the divine bosom flows through the soul that is one with Jesus. O to be holy as he is holy, blessed as he is blessed, pure as Christ is pure. O to be filled with all the fulness of God.

2. Consider the second petition, ver. 17—19. 'That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith, that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge.' This appears to be one vast petition expressed twice over, that they may have a calm, abiding, realizing view of Christ and his love. If any man were to ask, How shall I come to be filled with the fulness of God? The answer will be found in this prayer; you must come first to an abiding believing knowledge of 'the love of Christ which passeth knowledge.' Keep the eye of faith continually fixed on Jesus, on his glorious person, 'fairer than the children of men;' on Jesus your Prophet, having 'the tongue of the learned to speak a word in season to them that are weary;' on Jesus your Priest, 'through the eternal Spirit offering himself without spot unto God;' on Jesus your King, reigning from sea to sea in the hearts of his own, and winning many crowns in the conversion of sinners. Behold him, behold him. Keep your eye and heart upon him, keep the arms of faith around him, so 'that Christ may dwell in your heart by faith.' A tree takes a firm hold of the ground by its thousand roots; the winds shake but cannot remove it, so let your heart 'be rooted and grounded in the love of Christ,' then you may calmly view the vastness of that love. When a man is first awakened he does not know much of his sin, and cannot know much of the love of Christ; but when rooted and grounded in Christ, and the Spirit breathes in the heart, he then begins to comprehend with all saints, and to know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge. Observe 'the breadth and length of it:' 'As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us,' Psal. ciii. 12. Compare Lev. xvi. 22. So broad and so long is the love of Jesus. Observe the depth of it: 'He being in the form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but emptied himself,' &c., Phil. ii. 6. Measure from the throne of glory to the cross of Calvary, or to the rocky sepulchre—so deep was the love of Christ. Observe the height of it: 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne,' Rev. iii. 21. Measure how far it is from the lowest hell to the throne to which Christ will raise us; so high was the love of Christ. 'It passeth knowledge.' It is like a vast ocean, and our heart is like a little creek upon the shore; we embrace the ocean, but we cannot measure it; we shall know more of it in eternity; we never shall know it all, for 'it passeth knowledge;' and it gives 'a peace that passeth all understanding.'

3. Observe the first petition, ver. 16. 'That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man.' If any man were to ask, How shall I come to that abiding believing knowledge of the love of Christ? The answer is to be found in this petition. The Father must grant you his free Spirit. Every word is precious—'That he would grant you.' The gift of the Spirit at first is of free grace. When he breathes on the dry bones in the open valley, it is of freest mercy. And so every further work of the Spirit on the heart is of free grace. O what need have we to pray, 'Cast me not from thy presence, neither take thy Holy Spirit away from me.'

But has God enough to supply our need? Yes, he has 'riches of his glory,' unsearchable riches. Just as he has inexhaustible treasures of rain and dew to water every green herb, so he has infinite treasures of the Spirit all ready to be poured into the hearts of his needy people. But what will his Spirit do for me? 'He will strengthen you with might in the inner man.' Your eye is dim, and cannot see afar off. He will anoint it that you may see the King in his beauty. Your heart is dead and stony. He will quicken and soften it that eternal things may impress you. Your faith is like a bruised reed. He will strengthen you with might, so that you shall hold Christ, and not let him go. It is true of the Spirit as of the Father, that 'he giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might he increaseth strength.'

---

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord,'
1 Cor. i. 9.

THE anxieties of a faithful pastor never end in this world. First he is anxious that his people be brought to Christ, and then he is anxious that they be kept abiding in him to the end. What a fountain of consolation is this text while he looks upon those, of whom in his heart he has the sweet persuasion that they are 'sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints,' and repeats these words in his heart, 'God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ.' It is this sweet truth, the faithfulness of our covenant God, that is a rock to the pastor's soul, and makes him feel that those who are now 'dearly beloved, and longed for,' will soon be 'his joy and crown.' But not only to the pastor, to the flock also, especially in time of temptation, affliction, and desertion, these words are like 'the snow of Lebanon, or the cold flowing waters from another place.' Sometimes it pleases God to withdraw his comfortable presence from the soul, chiefly to humble us in the dust, to discover some unmortified corruption, or to lead us to hunger more vehemently after him. Such was David's state when he said in his heart, 'I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul,' 1 Sa. xxvii. 1. And again, when he wrote the 42nd psalm. Such was the feeling of Job when he said, 'the arrows of the Almighty are within me;' and again, 'Oh that it were with me as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness,' Job xxix. 2, 3. In such an hour as this, when the feeling of distance from God is almost insupportable, ah! how cheering, how full of nourishment, what a heavenly cordial may this word in the hand of the Spirit be: 'God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.'

I. Believers are called to share with Christ.

To have fellowship with another, is to have things in common with him. Thus in Acts iv. 32, it is said of the first Christians, that they were 'of one heart and of one soul, neither said any that ought of the things which he possessed were his own, but they had all things in common.' They had all their goods in common, they shared all they had with one another. This is what John desired to see amongst Christians in spiritual things, 'That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us,' 1 John i. 3. The same expression is used here, 'Ye are called unto the fellowship of his Son.' How strange, that a creature of sin and shame should be called to share with God's dear Son. Yet so it is; he shared our flesh and blood with us, that we might share his throne with him.

1. We share with the Son in his justification.

Once Jesus was unjustified. Once there were millions of sins laid to his charge. Men, devils, nay, even his holy Father, hurled their fierce accusations at him. He stood silent. He could not answer a word. Although 'he did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth;' yet he had agreed to bear the sins of many, and therefore, he was dumb under every accusation. 'It was exacted, and he was made answerable.' This was his chief agony in the garden, and on the cross, that at the bar of God he was unjustified; 'He was numbered with the transgressors.' His only comfort was, 'He is near that justifieth me,' Isa. l. 8. He knew that his trial would be short and that he would overcome. The hour of darkness is now past. The wrath of God has all fallen upon him. The thunder clouds have spent their lightnings on his head. The vials of God's anger have emptied their last drops upon him. He is now justified from all the sins that were laid upon him. He will bear the scars to all eternity, Rev. v. 6; but not another drop of agony shall ever fall upon his soul. When he comes a second time it is 'without sin,' Heb. ix. 28. Have you the Son? Do you believe the record that God has given concerning his Son? Do you with purpose of heart cleave to the Lord Jesus? then you share with him in his justification. You suffered in his suffering, you obeyed in his obedience, you died in his death. You are as much justified as Christ is. You have as little to do with the guilt of your past sins as Christ has. There is as little guilt lying upon you as upon God's dear Son. The vials of wrath have not another drop for Christ, and not another drop for you. 'By Jesus all that believe are justified from all things,' Acts xiii. 39.

2. We share with the Son in his Father's love.

When Jesus was about to leave this world, he said to his disciples, 'I leave the world and go to the Father.' When he died he cried, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' When he entered into heaven, and passed up the opening ranks of the adoring angels, the Father said, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee;' as if he had said, Never till this time did I see thee so worthy to be called my Son. Ah! it was a blessed exchange when he left the frowns and curses of the world for the embrace of his Father's arms; when he came from under the outpoured wrath of God into his full eternal love and smile; when he left the crown of thorns for the crown of glory. Such is the change of every poor sinner in the moment that he is persuaded and enabled to embrace Christ. Dost thou believe with all thine heart that Jesus is the Son of God? Can you say you have fled for refuge to Christ? Then you share with Christ in his Father's love. Christ says, 'I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God,' John xx. 17. God is as much your Father as he is Christ's Father. Your God as Christ's God. The Father loves you with the same full, unchanging, soul-satisfying love, with which he loves Jesus, (see that never to be forgotten prayer, John xvii. 26.) Oh! what a blessed change for an heir of hell to become an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ,' John viii. 17. For one who deserved, and still deserves, to share with the devil and his angels, to share with Christ that sits at the right hand of God. Oh! to inherit God, to have a son's interest in God! Eternity alone can reveal the full meaning of that word, 'Heir of God, and joint heir with Christ.'

II. God is faithful to souls in Christ. 'God is faithful, by whom ye are called unto the fellowship of his Son.' When a soul is in affliction, temptation, or desertion, his cry is, 'The Lord hath forsaken me, and my God hath forgotten me.' Sometimes this feeling approaches to actual despair. Here is a rock for the soul to lean upon, 'Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever,' and 'God is faithful' who called us to share with Christ. Harken to the voice of the great shepherd, 'My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father which gave them me is greater than all, and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.' Satan desires to have you. The world are laying snares for you. Your own wicked heart would sometimes be for leaving the hand that has saved you. But 'none is able to pluck you out of the Father's hand.' Harken to the Father's own word, 'Thou art my servant, I have chosen thee and not cast thee away,' Isa. xli. 9. The soul united to Jesus is not like the grass, but like the palm tree. Even in old age he shall bear fruit, he shall be full of sap and flourishing. 'To show that the Lord is upright: he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him,' Psal. xcii. 15. At the very time when Zion was saying, 'My God hath forgotten me,' God had her walls engraven on his hands, Isa. xlix. 16. Look still to Jesus, oh! deserted soul. The love of God shines unchangeably on him. Abide in him and you will abide in the Father's love. Your afflictions may only prove that you are more immediately under the Father's hand. There is no time that the patient is such an object of tender interest to the surgeon, as when he is bleeding beneath his knife. So you may be sure if you are suffering from the hand of a reconciled God, that his eye is all the more bent on you. 'The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms.'

'If ever it should come to pass
That sheep of Christ might fall away;
My fickle, feeble soul, alas!
Would fall a thousand times a day.
Were not thy love as firm as free,
Thou soon would'st take it Lord from me.'

NINETEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began,' 2 Tim. i. 9.

THERE are two ways in which men are called to believe the gospel. There is an outward and an inward calling, an earthly and a heavenly calling. All believers are 'partakers of the heavenly calling,' Heb. iii. 1.

The outward call comes to all who hear the gospel sound: 'Many are called, but few chosen.' Every time the church bell rings it is a call. It says, 'Come away sinner, thy sabbaths are numbered. Eternity is at hand. God's people are hastening to the house of God, God's stewards are dealing out the bread of life. Sinner do not stay behind; Jesus is ringing for thee, inviting thee, wooing thee. If thou wouldst but listen, it would sound as joyfully as a marriage bell.' Ah! there are multitudes in Scotland who hear no more of the gospel than the bell, and that will be enough to condemn them in the great day. The open church door is a call. It seems to say, 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many shall seek to enter in and shall not be able.' 'Go ye to them that sell, and buy for yourselves,' lest the bridegroom come and the door be shut.

Come in, come in,
Eternal glory thou wilt win.'

The lighted windows of the church at evening are a solemn call. They cry in your ears, 'Jesus is the light of the world.' 'Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you.' Jesus hath lighted a candle, and is sweeping the house, and seeking diligently to find lost pieces of silver. The village spire that points the way to heaven, is a silent call. It says, Look up stedfastly into heaven, and see the glory of God and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. 'Seek those things which are above. Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth.' The voice of the preacher is a call. It says, 'Repent and believe the gospel, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' 'We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled unto God.' Every tract given in at your door is a divine call. It says, 'I have a message from God unto thee.' 'Behold I stand at the door and knock.' Every leaf of your Bible is a call. 'It says, Search the scriptures.' I am able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. I am given by inspiration of God, and am profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness. The death of every unconverted friend is a loud call. It says, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' 'It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment.' 'Prepare to meet thy God.' It may truly be said of every sinner that shall read these words, that you are now called, warned, invited to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on Christ set before you. If you have not got enough to save you, you have enough to condemn you.

But all who are in Christ have received the inward call. All, who like Timothy, have 'unfeigned faith,' and have received 'the Spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind,' have been 'saved and called with a holy calling.' This is the work of the Holy Spirit; and therefore it is called a holy calling. It is the call of the unseen Almighty Spirit who sweetly inclines the will, and melts the heart of the sinner. It is therefore a saving call. When Jesus said to Matthew, 'follow me,' the Spirit breathed upon his heart, and made him willing: 'He arose and followed Jesus.' When Paul preached to the Thessalonians, he gave the outward call. Had Paul stood alone, they would have remained as hard as the rocks that dash back the waves of the Ægean sea. But the Spirit breathed upon their hearts, and so the gospel came not unto them in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance,' 1 Thess. i. 5. When Paul preached at Philippi by the river's side, many a Grecian matron had the outward call. His words fell pleasantly upon their ears. Still all remained unmoved but one; one heart was opened, a foreigner whose dark eye told that she came from the sunny plains of Asia. 'The Lord opened the heart of Lydia,' Acts xvi. 14.

O sinner! do not think that your reading or hearing the gospel will of itself save your soul. Do not think that because you have a Bible, a minister, and a place in the house of God, that you are therefore on the way to heaven. Remember God must save you, and call you with an holy calling. If you are not quickened from above, your outward calls will only be the savour of death unto death to your soul. It will be one of the chief miseries of hell to remember the texts and sermons that you heard on earth, when you would not come to Christ and have life.

Bless God, you who have been 'saved and called with an holy calling,' for it is 'not according to your works, but according to his purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.' Every saved soul can say, 'He hath not dealt with me after my sins, nor rewarded me according to mine iniquities.' He has called me out of darkness into marvellous light, from under wrath and curse to pardon and peace with God, from death unto life. How many he has passed by that were no worse than me. But he has been willing to make known the riches of his glory on me, a vessel of mercy which he had afore prepared unto glory. How sure my sinful soul is of glory. He calls from heaven, and calls to heaven. 'Whom he did predestinate, them he also called, and whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified.' 'Bless the Lord, O my soul.' Now I may sing with Toplady,

'Sweet to look back, and see my name
In life's fair book set down,
Sweet to look forward and behold
Eternal joys my own.'

NINETEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth,' 2 Thess. ii. 13.

WHEN travelling through popish countries, where the people bow down to images of wood and stone, and where God's word is forbidden, the mind of a believer turns to the fearful words in the preceding verses with a feeling of unutterable sadness; and, again, when the mind wanders from these desolate regions to the little flock of dear believers in happy Scotland, it realizes something of the joyful feeling with which Paul wrote these words—'But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord,' ver. 13.

I. We are here taught that God is sovereign in choosing the souls that are saved.

1. He is sovereign in choosing men, and not rebel angels. We read in the bible of two grand apostacies from God. The first took place in heaven. Lucifer, son of the morning, one of the brightest cherubs that stood round the throne, rebelled through pride along with myriads of the holy angels. 'They kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation.' 'God spared them not, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment,' 2 Pet. ii. 4. The next rebellion was in paradise. Man believed Satan rather than God, and ate of the forbidden fruit. 'By one man's disobedience many were made sinners.' Both of these families sinned against the same God, broke the same holy law, fell under the same curse, and were condemned to the same fire. Now it pleased God, in infinite compassion, to provide a way of pardon for some of these lost creatures. He determined to save some 'to the praise of the glory of his grace.' But whom shall he save—men or rebel angels? Perhaps the unfallen hosts of heaven pleaded that their once brother angels should be taken, and men left. They might have said that the angelic nature was higher and nobler, that man was a worm. 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!' He spared not the angels. He passed by the gate of hell. He raised no cross of Calvary there. 'He took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham,' Heb. ii. 16.

2. He is sovereign in choosing the countries that have the light of the gospel. All nations are equally lost, and vile in the sight of God. 'He hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' And yet how differently has he dealt with different peoples. Why did God choose Israel to be a peculiar treasure to himself, and to have the oracles of God committed to them? Was it because they were more righteous than others. No; that is expressly denied: 'Understand, therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiff-necked people,' Deut. ix. 6. Neither was it on account of their greatness: 'The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; (for ye were the fewest of all people;) but because he loved you,' Deut. vii. 7. Again, why has China, with its teeming millions, been walled around for centuries, and left to the darkness of its vain idols? Why has India been left under the cruel chains of Hindooism? Why has Africa been given over to witchcraft and superstition? Why has the fair face of Europe been almost given over to the delusions of the man of sin; and why has our own bleak island been chosen to be so long the brightest repository of the truth in all the world? Are we better than they? No, in no wise. There are sins committed among us that would make the heathen blush. 'His way is in the sea.' 'He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy; and he hath compassion upon whom he will have compassion.'

3. He is sovereign in choosing the most unlikely persons to be saved. You would have expected that most of the rich would have been saved. They have most time to study divine things; they are not harassed by the fears of poverty; they can procure all advantages. And yet hear the word of God: 'Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom,' James ii. 5. Again, you would have thought God would have chosen the wise and learned, to be saved. The gospel is a subject of deep wisdom. The Bible is written in ancient languages, hard to be acquired. And educated men are generally free from prejudices, to which the common people are subject. And yet hear the word of our Lord: 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.' You would have thought that surely God will save the most virtuous people of the world. He is a God of purity, who loves what is holy; and though none are righteous, no, not one, yet some are much less stained with sin than others. Surely he will take these. What says the Lord Jesus to the Pharisees? 'The publicans and harlots do enter into heaven before you.' The blameless young ruler is left to go away sorrowful, whilst the king of glory enters in at the pearly gate of the New Jerusalem with a thief washed in his blood by his side.

If my soul is saved, am I not bound to give thanks? If ministers are bound to thank God for the free salvation of their people, how much more are we bound to praise him ourselves for saving us. I am no better than a rebel angel. Devils never rejected Christ as I have done, and yet he passed them by and saved me. I am no better than a Chinese or a Hindoo, and yet grace has passed millions of them, and come to me. I was no better than the sinners round me, perhaps worse than most, and yet I trust I can say, 'Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.' Glory to God the Father, that he chose me before the world was. Glory to Jesus, that he passed by millions and died for me. Glory to the Holy Spirit, that he came out of free love and awakened me.

II. We are here taught that God chooses the means as well as the end. 'He hath chosen us unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth.' The first step that God chooses his people to come to, is 'belief of the truth.' God does not choose men to leap from their sins into glory. But he sends the free Spirit to anoint their eyes, to melt their hearts, to persuade and enable them to embrace Christ freely offered in the gospel. A simple heart-felt belief of the truth, is the first mark that we have been chosen to salvation. 'All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me.' Have I come to Jesus? Then I know that I am one of those whom the Father gave to him before the world was. Do I really believe the truth as it is in Jesus? Then God has chosen me to salvation. The second step that God chooses his people to come to, is 'sanctification of the Spirit.' It is written, 'After that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise,' Eph. i. 13. The moment the soul cleaves to the Lord Jesus, the Holy Spirit takes up his abode in that bosom; he abides there for ever. He changes the cage of unclean birds into a temple for Jehovah's praise. He makes the soul all glorious within. He destroys the dominion of sin; he fills, quickens, renews the whole inner man. Have I received the Holy Ghost? Has that heavenly seal been applied to my heart, impressing upon me the features and the mind of Jesus? Have I the sanctification of the Spirit? Then I have the clear evidence that my calling and election are sure. I can look back to my election before the world was; and forward to my salvation when the world shall be passed away. How foolish is the presumption of those who say, 'If I am not elected, I cannot be saved, whatever I do; and if I am elect, I shall be saved in whatever way I live.' The simple answer is this, Whether you are elect or not, you cannot be saved without believing the truth, and being sanctified by the Spirit. What is written in the Lamb's book of life, I do not know; but what is written in the holy Bible, I do know, that 'he that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned.' And 'without holiness, no man can see the Lord.'

'To God's holy child, so strong to redeem,
By us, who through grace his likeness do bear,
Be glory for ever, while rooted in him,
A people of prudence and peace we appear.'

—
TWENTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ; (by grace ye are saved),' Eph. ii. 4, 5.

WHAT a fearful discovery do these words give of what was once the condition of all true believers?

'We were dead in sins.' The apostle classes himself with the Ephesian believers in the humbling confession. The most living and burning saint, who now tunes his harp before the throne of the Lamb, was once a dead soul. This is the true condition of all unconverted men at this moment; they are dead in sins. Even our highly-favoured country is like the valley which Ezekiel saw full of bones: 'And he caused me to pass by them round about; and, behold, there were very many in the open valley, and, lo, they were very dry,' Ezek. xxxvii. 2. The understanding of a natural man is dead: 'He is wise to do evil, but to do good he has no knowledge,' Jer. iv. 22. 'There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God,' Rom. iii. 11. The mind is often clear and penetrating on earthly things, but it is dark and dead in heavenly things. The heart is dead. True, it is alive toward worldly friends, and worldly objects. In pursuit of their lusts 'they have made ready their heart like an oven, while they lie in wait.' But set the loveliest of all beings before them, the precious corner-stone, the desire of all nations, the pearl of great price; and their heart is not affected, it melts not, it moves not, it loves not; it is dead. The conscience is dead. They feel wrongs done against themselves or against their neighbours, but they do not feel wrongs done against God, or against Christ, or against the Holy Spirit: 'Unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled,' Tit. i. 15. In some the death of the conscience is total, so that they are past feeling, 'having their conscience seared as with a hot iron.' How many swearers can pour out their oaths, without once imagining that they are striking at the throne of God. How many can put away the gospel message, without feeling that they are making God a liar. How many can come unconverted to the Lord's table, without once thinking that they are crucifying Christ afresh, and putting him to an open shame. In such cases their 'consciences are seared as with a hot iron.'

Turn we now to consider the blessed change that has been wrought in the heart of every believer: 'He hath quickened us together with Christ.' It was a solemn scene when Jesus stood beside the rocky sepulchre of Lazarus. It was a little way from the village of Bethany, embosomed in its fig and almond trees. Martha and Mary stood weeping, and many Jewish friends beside them. They had rolled away the stone from the mouth of the cave, and as the Saviour looked into the dark silent tomb he cried,

'Lazarus come forth. And he that was dead came forth bound hand and foot with grave clothes, and his face bound about with a napkin.' This was giving life to the dead. A still more marvellous scene, compared to which this is but as the drop before the thunder shower, shall yet take place upon this earth. 'The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation.' When the voice of Christ is heard, then from every lonely church yard, from the deep caverns of the sea, and from silent battlefields, the myriads of sleeping dead shall rise and come forth. It will be a day of joy to some, and of woe to others, joy and woe unspeakable. But more wonderful, even than this, is the quickening of the soul in conversion. It is spoken of in these words, 'The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live,' John v. 25. In every part of the world where the Spirit accompanies the preaching of the gospel, this secret, silent resurrection of dead souls is going on every day, little noticed by men, though well known in heaven, and in hell. When the Spirit comes he gives life to the dead conscience; he makes it accuse and condemn the sinner, so that he feels lost and undone. He gives life to the understanding, anointing the eyes with eyesalve, so that the sinner sees the way of pardon provided by God. He gives life to the heart, melting it, and persuading the sinner to cleave to Jesus; and so he 'quickens us together with Christ.' The Spirit thus raises the soul out of its grave, looses his grave clothes, namely, worldly lusts and attachments, and lets him go free. 'What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us.' If He quickens my soul, then no power can keep it dead. Truly, the guilt, indwelling sin, temptations, and spiritual enemies of my soul often confound me. But I pray to know 'the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe,' Eph. i. 19. And then I sing—

'With Christ the Lord I died to sin,
With him to life I rise,
To life, which now begun on earth,
Is perfect in the skies.'

But what is it in the bosom of God that moves him to quicken a dead soul? The answer is to be found here: 'God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, (by grace ye are saved).' The free rich grace of God is the fountain from which the quickening Spirit flows.

When God came to save Paul he found him dead in sins. There was nothing in the heart of Paul to draw God to visit his soul. But he came because he was rich in mercy, and out of the great love wherewith he loved him, by grace he saved him. There is nothing lovely or attractive about the dead, especially if they have been long dead. The coldness, the want of motion, the paleness, the want of animation, is dreadful. The corruption is abominable. And so Abram says, over the remains of his beloved Sarah, 'Give me a possession of a burying-place, that I may bury my dead out of my sight,' Gen. xxiii. 4. So there is nothing amiable to the eye of a Holy God in a dead soul. The coldness, the insensibility, the corruption is loathsome, in his pure sight. And yet he came to the dead soul of Paul, and gave it life. And every soul that now rejoices in the love of God can say, I was polluted in mine own blood, when he passed by and said unto me, Live; yea, he said unto me, when I was in my blood, Live, Ezek. xvi. 6.

There is good news for those who feel themselves loathsome as the putrid dead. You may be quickened, for such were all believers once. Good news for those who feel helpless as the dead. The Lord can quicken such. And he is rich in mercy; 'He willeth all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.' He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. In him compassions flow. He is ready to forgive. One poor soul who had long been tempest-tossed under the conviction of a life time of sins, was brought to full peace in Christ by meditating on the 1st verse of the fifty-first Psalm: 'According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions.' She said, 'I will just put the multitude of his tender mercies over against the multitude of my sins.' And so she found rest for her soul. Surely this soul, and all who have been thus saved by free sovereign grace, will have cause to join in Rowland Hill's favourite hymn:—

'And when I'm to die,
Receive me, I'll cry,
For Jesus hath loved me, I cannot tell why.
But this I can find,
We two are so joined,
He'll not be in glory, and leave me behind.'

TWENTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new,' 2 Cor. v. 17.

WHAT is it to be in Christ Jesus? It is a very remarkable expression, and occurs very frequently in the word of God. Paul speaks of Andronicus and Junia his kinsmen, 'who also were in Christ before me,' Rom. xvi. 7. He says, that he counted all things but dung, that he might 'win Christ, and be found in him,' Phil. iii. 9. And he speaks of dear departed believers, as those who 'sleep in Jesus,' 1 Thess. iv. 14. The meaning of this blessed expression is, that those who have fled to Christ, are reckoned with by God as if they were a part of Christ. His crucifixion is reckoned theirs; his spotless obedience is reckoned theirs. God sees no iniquity in them. He looks upon them in the face of his Anointed. Just as Christ was in us when he stood in our place, and was covered over with our sins so completely that none of his holiness appeared, so we are in Christ when we submit to his precious righteousness, and are so covered, that none of our sins appear in God's pure sight. How plainly was this sweet truth taught to our first parents after the fall: 'Unto Adam, and to his wife, did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them,' Gen. iii. 21. How plainly did he teach them that they could not come naked and guilty into his presence, neither could their own rags of self-righteousness cover them, but the snowy clothing of a slain Lamb must be their raiment, neither have they strength to put it on themselves, but God must clothe them. Thus they were taught what it is to be in Christ Jesus.

When Jacob came to his father Isaac in the goodly sweet-smelling raiment of his elder brother, and he came near to his father, and his father kissed him, and smelled his raiment, and blessed him, this was a dark shadow of the way in which a sinner comes to the Father, Gen. xxvii. 15. Here only is the great difference: God is not deceived at all, but of his own free will, most truly, righteously, and by consent of our Elder Brother, clothes us in the sweet-smelling raiment of Jesus, so that we can sing, 'He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with jewels,' Isa. lxi. 10. In the parable of the vine (John xv.) Jesus said to the disciples, 'Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.' He teaches us the need of a vital and continued union to himself. It is not enough once to consent to be washed in my blood, and clothed with my righteousness, you must remain thus, even until death. And herein consisted all the peace and joy of the first believers; they constantly abode in Christ. This was their answer to all accusations, 'Christ hath died,' 'I am crucified with Christ.' Herein consisteth all my joy. Blessed be the day when first I was found in Christ. Whenever I am in myself before God, then comes darkness, accusations of conscience terrify me, the curses of the law threaten me, the smallest temptation is too strong for me, my soul is like a rolling thing before the whirlwind. But the moment I am again made willing to hide in the wounds of the great Mediator, to be covered with the bright shining folds of his 'garment down to the foot,' that moment the accusations of conscience are hushed, the thunders of Sinai die away, I sit like the maniac at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in my right mind, and a still small voice whispers within my breast, 'Ye are become dead to the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God,' Rom. vii. 4.

What is the result of being in Christ Jesus? 'If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold! all things are become new.' A divine change takes place upon that soul more wonderful than the creation of the world, a change brought about by Him who calleth the things that are not as though they were. Indeed this change is begun before the soul submits to Christ, for nothing less than Almighty power can melt the rocky heart, and bend the stubborn will to relish the gospel way of salvation. But it is after a man is brought to Christ that the change is manifested.

1. He becomes a new creature in understanding. No man dares to think until he is at peace with God. The mind of a natural man shrinks back from contemplating the realities of God and of the eternal world. The understanding is busied about things seen and temporal, or else about unseen things apart from God; but all that is divine and holy in the universe, or in other words, all that is truly worth knowing, is a field into which the unconverted soul dare not enter. 'The natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God.' When a soul is made willing to take Jesus as his mediator, and comes into pardon and peace with God, then he begins to think. A new world is opened up to him, the ocean of divine truth stretches out before him, and the verdant hills of immortality rise up to view. The treasures of wisdom and knowledge hid in Christ, and the glories of the three-one Jehovah now fix the heart. The Holy Spirit renews the soul in knowledge after the image of Jesus. A new life of the understanding is begun in that soul. 'I am unable to express the actings of my soul as I feel them, (says Andrew Lindsay), yet I am helped to conceive a little of them by the springs which are in the way from my home; as those springs, though small, have some water in them, so I trust it is with my soul; the water in some of these springs is covered with grass and weeds, so is the sight of this life hid from me, at times, by the corruption of my heart; but as the water appears on a man's removing the weeds with his hands, so does this life by a new manifestation. And as the water continues in these springs, now in August when great pools are dried up, so I hope the life of God will continue in my soul, because the love of Christ is unchangeable.' Happy soul! This is the experience of a new creature in Christ Jesus.

2. He becomes a new creature in his affections. No man truly loves till he come to Christ. 'Love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love.' Before Paul fled for refuge to lay hold on Christ, he was an old creature in his affections. 'I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth,' Acts xxvi. 9. His heart was like a bow bent against Christ and his cause. He hated the humbling truths of the gospel. When God's faithful witnesses were put to death, he gave his voice against them. But when he came to Christ he was made a new creature. Never, perhaps, did such burning love to Christ ever glow in a human bosom as in Paul's: 'What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.' And now what tender compassion breathes through his soul toward the little flock of 'Christ: 'Being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us,' 1 Thess. ii. 8. He is a new creature in love. He has got the same stream of love in his heart that springs eternally from the bosom of God. O sinner! this is what God will make thee if thou art willing to be found in Christ. Remember, none but new creatures will ever enjoy the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

' From various cares my heart retires,
Though deep and boundless its desires
I've now to please but one;
He before whom the Elders bow
With him is all my business now,
And with the souls that are his own.'

---

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation,' 2 Cor. v. 18.

In the preceding verse it is written, 'If any man be in Christ Jesus, all things are become new' in that soul, and here we are told whence all this change proceeds: 'And all things are of God.' The beginning, the carrying on, and the perfecting of the glorious work of regeneration in the soul, is the work of Jehovah; so that every new creature can sing, 'The Lord will perfect that which concerneth me; thy mercy, O Lord, endureth for ever; forsake not the work of thine own hands,' Psal. cxxxviii. 8. In a still wider sense these words are true, 'All things are of God.' He is the fountain of being: 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. And God said, Let there be light, and there was light.' All creatures flow from him, and will ultimately show forth his highest praise. Harken to the song of the four and twenty Elders, as they cast their crowns before the throne: 'Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created,' Rev. iv. 11. He is the fountain of providence. Every drop of water in the air, or in the river, or in the ocean, performs its appointed course. The myriads of insects that flutter in the sunshine, all fulfil his will. And every man, angel, and devil, only fulfil the eternal counsel of the blessed Jehovah: 'All things are of God.' The natural heart rages against this truth, but it is like the raging of the foam upon the everlasting rocks—the purpose of the Lord it shall stand. But the true meaning of the words is, that all things of the new creation in the soul are of God. It is God who freely, sovereignly, and from eternity loves the soul that is to be saved: 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee.' It is God who guides the soul under the ministry where he is to be awakened, he prepares the way to the heart, and at length, when his blessed time is come, he sends the word home with power. It is God who keeps the awakened soul from going back to the world, from taking rest in any refuge of lies, or from being offended at Christ. It is God who reveals his Son in the heart, as he did to Paul: 'It pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me.' This is a work peculiarly divine; nature cannot help in it. Man cannot accomplish it. It is God who now fills the soul with the Holy Spirit, and he persuades the sinner most freely and heartily to leave old sins, old habits, old companions, and to follow Jesus in the way. All this amazing change, more wonderful than the creation of the world, more durable than the whole material universe, is the work of God alone: 'All things are of God.' Ah yes! when my guilty soul shall stand washed, and justified, and sanctified before the throne of God, when I shall see clearly the whole way by which he has led me, when I shall know fully the spring and ocean of that love which is from everlasting to everlasting, when my dark mind shall grasp the whole plan of the universe, by which every atom, and every being, saved or lost, is brought to yield eternal glory to God and the Lamb, then I shall understand the word that is written, 'Salvation belongeth unto the Lord,' and I shall be enabled to join the new song of the innumerable company before the throne, 'Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb,' Rev. vii. 10.

In what remains we have a description of the stream of grace which flows from this Fountain of living waters. A twofold stream is here set before us, the one part reconciliation to himself, the other the gift of the ministry. They are mentioned together in like manner: Rom. i. 5, 'We have received grace and apostleship.' These two gifts are not inseparable. Many have been reconciled to God who have not got the ministry committed to them. Women, for example, are made partakers of grace, but never of apostleship; for Paul says, 'I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence, 1 Tim. ii. 12. Those also who are converted in mature years, when they are deeply engaged in some profession, do not seem to be called upon to change their business, and undertake the work of the ministry, unless in extraordinary times, and by a very clear call from heaven: 'Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called,' 1 Cor. vii. 20. On the other hand, many have had the ministry of reconciliation committed to them who never received saving grace in their own souls.

Was not Judas called by Christ to be an apostle? Matt. x. 4. And are there not in all the Protestant churches many ministers called to the ministry as Judas was. Woe to that man who has the office of the ministry without grace in his own soul. He is of all men the most miserable. Like one who carries water, and tastes not of the precious draught. Like the sign post pointing to the city of refuge, itself immovable: 'It had been good for that man if he had not been born.'

'The sword of God shall break his arm,
A blast shall blind his eye,
His word shall have no power to warm,
His gifts shall all grow dry.'

When these two, grace and apostleship, are united in one man, O! what a gift is this from the God of all grace. What amazing love is it not only to save our guilty souls, but to make us instrumentally the saviours of the souls of others: 'According to thy manifold mercies, thou gavest them saviours, who saved them out of the hand of their enemies,' Neh. ix. 27. It is Christ alone who gives faithful pastors, and from him they should be sought. This is one of the gifts which he obtained by dying for sinners, 'He gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors, and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ,' Eph. iv. 11. It is Christ alone who guides ministers to the sphere where he wishes them to shine. Happy the pastor who allows no hand but Christ's to place or to remove him. It is Christ alone who gives them all their light and brightness, all their gifts and graces, the gifts of prayer, eloquence, knowledge; the graces of faith, love, zeal, perseverance, boldness. All this was taught to John in the island of Patmos, when he saw 'one like the Son of man walking in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, and he had in his right hand seven stars,' Rev. i. 13, 16. It is Christ alone who gives ministers all their success: 'I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase,' 1 Cor. iii. 6. He can take away the blessing from a slothful, self-pleasing, self-conceited minister. He can bless one who is weak in body, weak in argument, weak in everything. When I glance for a moment at the weight, vastness, responsibility, blessedness, and glory of this work, these words rise up before me: 'Unto me who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ.' When I consider the urgent need of unconverted men, the shortness of the time, the awfulness of eternity, and the mercy that has come to my own soul, I am forced to cry, 'Necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel,' 1 Cor. ix. 16

'Chief shepherd of thy chosen sheep,
From death and sin set free,
May every under-shepherd keep,
His eye intent on thee.

'With plenteous grace their hearts prepare,
To execute thy will,
Compassion, patience, love, and care,
And faithfulness, and skill.

'Inflame their minds with holy zeal,
Their flocks to feed and teach,
And let them live, and let them feel,
The sacred truths they preach.'

—
TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation,' 2 Cor. v. 19.

In these words we have an epitome, or short description of the gospel ministry.

1. Observe the manner in which God approaches sinners in the gospel: 'God was in Christ.' If God had come to us without a Mediator, it would have been to destroy. In his unchangeable nature he is holy, sin-repelling, and sin-consuming. This is the glory of God, his moral image, without which he could not be Jehovah. As surely as fire devours wood by its physical nature, so surely God must destroy sinners by his glorious moral nature. Therefore it is written, 'Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup; for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness,' Psal. xi. 6, 7. And again, 'Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity,' Hab. i. 13. And 'we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, the Lord shall judge his people. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. For our God is a consuming fire,' Heb. x. 30, 31; xii. 29. If God had drawn near to us without his justice being satisfied in the blood and obedience of the Lord Jesus, his justice must have broken out upon us, and sought its satisfaction in our everlasting punishment. Glory to God in the highest, that God did not come to us without Christ, that he did not come upon us naked, guilty, defenceless, without a shelter for our heavy laden soul. He put the Mediator between him and us: 'For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all,' 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6: 'God was in Christ.' Christ is the meeting place of a holy God, and hell-deserving sinners: 'Having therefore boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, let us draw near.' When the high priest entered within the vail, on the day of atonement, he carried with him a bason filled with the blood of a bullock, slain as an atonement for himself and his house. He dipped his finger in the blood and sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat seven times. He then carried in another bason filled with the blood of a goat, slain for the sins of the people. Dipping his finger into the blood he sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat. The mercy-seat was of pure gold, the floor was covered with gold, yet he did not fear lest he should soil it. The mercy-seat and the golden pavement were wetted with blood. His feet stood upon the blood. That blood represented the blood of Christ. And the high priest standing on the sprinkled blood represented the only way in which a sinner can come to a holy Jehovah. God meets us in Christ. O sinner! hast thou come to God in Christ, hast thou entered into the holiest by the blood of Jesus. If not, thou art yet unpardoned, and ready to perish. Some have very weak notions of conversion. They seem to think that to weep at a sermon, to pray with a glow of feeling, to amend the life a little, is true conversion—whereas it is turning to God in Christ: 'Ye turned to God from idols,' 1 Thess. i. 9. Except thou be thus converted, thou wilt never see the kingdom of God.

3. Observe the extent of the gospel remedy: 'Reconciling the world unto himself.' There can be no doubt that the whole world will not be saved: 'Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.' The awful transactions of the judgment-day are summed up in these solemn words: 'These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal,' Matt. xxv. 46. One amazing portion of the human race will depart speechless, conscience-stricken, self-condemned, into a hell as everlasting as the heaven of those who are saved. O self-deceived Universalist! it is the same word which describes the eternity of heaven and the eternity of hell. There can be no doubt that God has chosen a peculiar people out of this world: 'Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee,' Psal. lxxv. 4. Six times over, in the 17th chapter of John, does Jesus call them 'the men which thou gavest me,' and he says, 'I pray for them, I pray not for the world.' And yet it is equally true that 'God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth,' 1 Tim. ii. 4. He is 'long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance,' 2 Pet. iii. 9: 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself.' The gospel is truly and sincerely addressed 'to every creature under heaven.' The calls and invitations of God to wicked men are not mere words of course, far less are they deceitful and lying words; they are true as God is true. There is not even the shadow of falsehood in them. Hear the words of a master in Israel: 'There is all in God that is good, and perfect, and excellent, in our desires and wishes for the conversion and salvation of wicked men. As for instance, there is a love to holiness absolutely considered, or an agreeableness of holiness to his nature and will; or in other words, to his natural inclination. The holiness and happiness of the creature, absolutely considered, are things that he loves. These things are infinitely more agreeable to his nature than to ours. There is all in God that belongs to our desire of the holiness and happiness of unconverted men and reprobates, excepting what implies imperfection. All that is consistent with infinite knowledge, wisdom, power, self-sufficiency, infinite happiness, and immutability. Therefore there is no reason that his absolute prescience, or his wise determination and ordering what is future, should hinder his expressing this disposition of his nature, in like manner as we are wont to express such a disposition in ourselves, viz., by calls, and invitations, and the like.' O sinner! it is true that God has no pleasure in your dying, but had rather that you would turn from your wicked ways and live. God honestly, sincerely, and with all his heart, beseeches you to be reconciled through the blood of Jesus. He is willing this day to cover you with the blood and obedience of the Lord Jesus, so that he may consistently, with his just and holy nature, not impute your trespasses unto you. Why has he spared you out of hell to this day? Only because 'he is not willing that you should perish.' Why has he followed you with personal and family mercies, comforts, deliverances? 'The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance,' Rom. ii. 4. Why has he sent frowns of providence upon you, poverty, sickness, bereavements, disappointments, like wave upon wave? Is not this the answer: 'Whom I love, I rebuke and chasten; be zealous therefore, and repent,' Rev. iii. 19. Why has the Spirit striven with you in the Bible, through ministers, and in secret prayer? Is it not that the holy loving Spirit desires you to turn to Christ, and is 'vexed,' and 'grieved,' and 'quenched,' by your 'always resisting?' Acts vii. 51. Why, above all, does Christ offer himself freely to every creature, why has he knocked at your door, and stretched out his hands to you all day long? Ah! read here the answer, which you will remember to your everlasting agony in hell, if you turn not, 'How often would I have gathered your children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' Matt. xxvii. 37. O sinner! the Lord Jesus Christ is like the manna. It fell round about the tents of Israel every morning, so that no Israelite could go out of his tent without either gathering it, or trampling it below his feet. So the Lord Jesus is laid down at thy feet. Thou must either take him as thy Surety, thy Saviour, thy Lord, or trample him below thy feet.

'Come ye weary heavy laden,
Lost and ruined by the fall,
If ye tarry till you're better,
You will never come at all,
Not the righteous, sinners Jesus came to call.'

—
TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God,' 2 Cor. v. 20.

I. Meditate on the ground of the gospel message, ver. 21. 'He hath made him to be sin,' &c. What a remarkable description of Christ is here given, 'He knew no sin.' He was pure in his birth. The angel that came to Mary called him 'that holy thing which shall be born of thee.' He was pure in his life, 1 Pet. ii. 22. 'He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth.' He was pure in his death, 'He offered himself without spot unto God.' But here we are told 'he knew no sin.' He did not know the feeling of sin. He did not know the swelling of pride, the burning of lust, the rankling of envy in his pure bosom. He knew suffering well, but he knew no sin. Learn, O my soul, the loveliness of Christ. 'He is altogether lovely.' His loveliness consists mainly in this, that he knew no sin. It is this that ravishes the hearts of the redeemed above while they sing, 'Who shall not fear thee, and glorify thy name, for thou only art holy?' Learn the suitableness of Christ. If Christ had had a spot of sin he could not have suffered for ours. 'Such an High Priest became us who is holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners.'

But how did God deal with this sinless One? 'He hath made him to be sin for us.' In Isa. liii. 6. we are told, 'The Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all.' But here it is described in a more dreadful manner. The Lord heaped upon him the thousands and millions of our sins, till at last he was so covered, in God's sight, that nothing but sin appeared. He was looked upon, by his Father, as one entire mass of sin. He was dealt with by God as if he were all sin from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head. Learn, O my soul, the deep agonies of Christ; he knew no sin, and yet he was made sin. Nothing can be more agonising to a pure mind, than to have sins imputed to him. This was Christ's deepest sorrow. Hence the heart-rending cries recorded in the 22d. 38th. 40th. and 69th. Psalms; cries that often resounded through the silent vale of Kedron. Learn the amazing love of Christ; 'it passeth knowledge.'

But why was he made sin? It was 'that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.' Just as Christ was so covered with our innumerable sins that in the eye of a holy God he appeared one mass of sin, so the vilest of sinners who consent to be found in Christ, is so covered with his glorious righteousness, that in the eye of God he appears one mass of divine righteousness. The sinner is lost and swallowed up in the righteousness of Christ.

O my sinful soul! what an amazing provision is here set before thee for thy complete pardon and acceptance with God. As truly as Christ was made the sin of men, so truly may I be made the righteousness of God. As truly as our sin covered him, so that none of his heavenly beauty appeared, so truly may his righteousness cover me that none of my hellish blackness may appear. Christ held down his head for shame on account of my sin, I may hold up my head in peace on account of his righteousness.

'Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to thy cross I cling;
Naked came to thee for dress,
Helpless look to thee for grace;
Foul I to the fountain fly,
Wash me, Saviour, or I die.'

II. Meditate on the gospel embassy, ver. 20 'We are,' &c. Christ was God's greatest ambassador. He was 'the messenger of the covenant.' He was sent to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.' He was 'the faithful Witness.' He was sent to tell men the way to the Father. But when he ascended up on high he sent his believing followers in his name, John xx. 21. 'Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.' 'When he ascended up on high, he gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors, and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ.' 'Now then (all faithful ministers may say) we are ambassadors for Christ.'

1. This shows that ministers should speak with authority. The people were astonished at the doctrine of Christ, 'for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.' He spoke with a holy certainty and boldness, and so should ministers now. 'These things command and teach; let no man despise thy youth,' 1 Tim. iv. 11, 12. A faithful minister should be like Jeremiah, (i. 18.) 'I have made thee this day a fenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls against the whole land.' He should hear God saying to him as he did to Ezekiel, (ii. 7.) 'Thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.' How fearful is the curse threatened if we alter the gospel of Christ, Gal. i. 8.; if we add to, or take away from, the message committed unto us, Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

2. Ministers should speak with divine tenderness. 'God is love,' and so should his ambassadors be. There is in the heart of God the deepest compassion for perishing sinners. Hear his words, Deut. v. 29. 'O that there were such an heart in them, that they would fear me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever,' (compare xxxii. 29; Ezek. xxxii. 11). When God was manifest in flesh he showed this holy tenderness through his whole life, Luke xix. 41. 'When he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it,' (compare Matt. xxiii. 37). Such should be the heart of every faithful minister. Paul used to preach with many tears, Acts xx. 31. His tears often fell upon the parchment on which he wrote his epistles, Phil. iii. 18; 2 Cor. ii. 4.

Surely if we could realize an eternal hell into which the most are dropping, an eternal heaven which the most are losing, and a divine Saviour whom the most are rejecting, we would preach as Jeremiah did, 'O that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears,' ix. 1. We would be mercifully bold, like the angels at Sodom, laying hands on lingering sinners, and pulling them out of the fire.

3. This shows the message which ministers bear. 'We pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled unto God.' There is a quarrel between sinners and a holy God. 'God is angry with the wicked every day.' The dark heavy clouds of divine anger are resting upon their heads, ready to break every moment. Sinners are angry at God. Their carnal mind is enmity against God. They are night and day fighting against God. Now God sends his ministers with a white flag of truce, and he puts this word in their mouths, 'Be ye reconciled unto God.' O my soul, hast thou heard and received the 'good tidings of great joy?' Have I submitted to the way of pardon here revealed? Then in a moment God's anger is all turned away, and my heart is changed from bitter enmity to love and praise.

---

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip,' Heb. ii. 1.

COULD we look into the secret history of believers, what woful declensions might be pointed out. How many, who began the conflict well, have fallen under the blows of Apollyon. How many are there of whom God complains: 'What iniquity have ye found in me that ye are gone far from me,' Jer. ii. 5. How many of whom Jesus complains, 'I have this against thee, that thou hast left thy first love,' Rev. ii. 4. The spring of all these sad declensions is to be found in 'letting slip the things which we have heard.'

I. Meditate on the times when Christians are in danger of letting the gospel slip.

1. A time of worldly prosperity. An old divine says, 'Quails often make a lean soul.' 'He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their souls.' When a man is under conviction of sin, divine things often absorb every other anxiety. That text is ever before him, 'What shall it profit man to gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?' He becomes careless of his person, for he feels that he would be decking a body condemned to the burning. He becomes careless of his business, for the matter of his forgiveness is unsettled. He walks among the things of time, looking through them into the things of eternity. What a vain shadow is this world to an awakened soul. O! how that soul sickens at the vain companies of an unbelieving world; how he loathes their dances and wanton songs. But when that soul has found true rest in Christ, sometimes the world begins to smile again. He begins to launch out into business, or a more lucrative situation is offered to him. His attention is a little diverted from eternal things; he becomes more keen about the things of time. He begins to lose his fresh hold of Christ. He is letting slip the things which he heard. So it was with Lot. When he first came from Haran he left all for God. He followed Abraham, a simple shepherd lad with staff in hand. But when he got flocks, and herds, and tents, and when he saw the plain of Sodom well watered everywhere, he went and pitched his tent toward Sodom, Gen. xiii. So it was with Demas. At one time he seemed to leave all for Christ. He became the companion of self-denying Paul. But soon his eye was caught with the glitter of gold. He lets slip the things which he heard. He bids farewell to the believer's joys and trials: 'Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world.' 2 Tim. iv. 10. O my soul, 'love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.'

2. A time of persecution. 'For every ten bodies which persecution has killed, it has slain a thousand souls.' We are told of the seed that sprung up so quickly in stony places, that 'when the sun was up it withered away,' and Jesus explains this of those who, 'when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by they are offended,' Matt. xiii. 21. Some people are brought to Christ with little or no persecution. They attain 'to joy and peace in believing,' no man forbidding them. They begin to think that the offence of the cross has ceased, and that the solemn warnings of tribulation to the believer were intended for a bye-gone generation. Suddenly their sky is overcast. They begin to be hated, and buffeted, and opposed for their attachment to Christ. An awful prospect is before them. Either they must breast the tide of scorn and reproach that is now flowing in upon them, perhaps from their dearest friends, or else they must let slip the things which they have heard. Ah! how often, in such an hour, the soul shrinks back from an open confession of Christ before men, refuses to bear the cross, and falls into unholy compromise with an unbelieving world. Storms try the vessel, and persecution tries the believer. When Peter was in peace he could say, 'Though all men forsake thee, yet will not I.' But when the hour of trial came, he said with oaths and curses, 'I know not the man.'

II. Meditate on the remedy. 'We ought to give the more earnest heed,' &c.

1. Increase thy diligence in the means of grace.

If you have truly found the Lord Jesus, be often at the spot where you have met with him. Every true disciple should often resort to Gethsemane, John xviii. 2. If you found him in the word, be faithful and diligent in meeting him there. If you begin to let your Bible slip, you are beginning to let Jesus slip. If you found him in secret prayer, give the more earnest heed to meet him often there. It is a sweet trysting-place with Jesus, 'within the veil.' If you let slip the throne of grace, you let Him slip who sits thereon. Have you found Jesus in the sanctuary, then 'love the habitation of his house, and the place where his honour dwelleth,' Psal. xxvi. 8. Has he revealed himself to you in the breaking of bread, then 'continue stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine, and in fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayer,' Acts ii. 4'.

2. Feed on Christ in the ordinances. Many love the ordinances who love not Christ. Many are occupied about the shell who never taste the kernel of the gospel. These are Sardians who 'have a name to live while they are dead.' These are talkers about the gospel and its ministers; but 'the talk of their lips tendeth to penury.' If you have found Christ in ordinances, give earnest heed to find him more and more. Penetrate through every veil to the living Saviour, and the living God. Do not rest in a form of prayer if you find not Christ. 'Bodily service profiteth little.' O my soul, abhor the cloak of formality. It is an abomination to God and man. 'It is iniquity, even the solemn meeting.' But O how sweet are ordinances when we can say, 'He brought me into his banqueting house, and his banner over me was love.'

3. Watch against occasions of letting slip. If you knew the deceitfulness, the desperate and unsearchable wickedness of your own heart, and if you knew the adversary who accuses you day and night, you would be sober and vigilant. Watch your own heart, its infirmities and tendencies; 'Keep thy heart above all keeping, for out of it are the issues of life,' Prov. iv. 23. Watch the roaring lion; be not ignorant of his devices, 1 Pet. v. 8. Watch the world, for you are in an enemy's country, 'The whole world lieth in wickedness,' 1 John v. 19. Above all, keep your eye on Jesus. You cannot hold him if he does not hold you. 'Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you,' 1 Pet. v. 7.

'Let doubt then and danger my progress oppose.
They only make heaven more sweet at the close,
Come joy or come sorrow, whate'er may befall,
An hour with my God will make up for it all.'

A scrip on my back, and a staff in my hand,
I march on in haste through an enemy's land,
The road may be rough, but it cannot be long,
And I'll smooth it with hope, and I'll cheer it with song.'

—
TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ,' Acts ii. 36.

THIS is the strong and confident asseveration of an aged and unlettered fisherman, on whom a greater change had within the last hour passed, than could have been accomplished by the longest and most effective moral and intellectual training. Peter was one of those, who, a few days before, had asked Jesus, 'Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?' and who, a few hours before, were so ignorant of the true nature of Messial's kingdom, that they might have repeated the question. But the day of Pentecost had arrived, and was not yet half gone; the promise of the Father had been waited for, and had just been obtained; the promise expressly made by our Lord to Peter, 'What thou knowest not now, thou shalt know hereafter,' had just received its fulfilment; 'the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father,' 'the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him,' had just been miraculously and by a visible sign, vouchsafed; 'they had now an unction from the Holy One, and they knew all things;' the visible had been accompanied with an audible miracle, — 'they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.' Peter, therefore, though an aged and unlettered fisherman, and till now filled with the secular expectations and inveterate prejudices of the Jews, became instantly and intimately acquainted with the true nature of Messiah's kingdom. A divine knowledge had entered his understanding, and had suddenly revolutionized his long cherished views and expectations; the emblem of a divine commission had sat, or, as some suppose, was still sitting on his head; a divine power had attuned his tongue instantly to speak in languages he had never learned, and with an energy which all the power of the adversary could neither gainsay nor resist; he who formerly quailed before a timid maid, so as to abjure his Lord, now fearlessly proclaimed to the 'confounded' and partly mocking multitude of strangers and fellow-countrymen around him, with all the authority of an ambassador from God, and with all the certainty and confidence of one who knew what he affirmed, and testified what he had seen; 'Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ.' His crucifixion may be to you a stumbling-block, and all the more so, that ye yourselves inflicted it. But let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that the cross hath become a crown. That same Jesus whom ye crucified is Lord—the Lord of all. 'God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' His crucifixion, you thought, had disproved his Messiahship, and you cruelly and tauntingly reviled him, saying, 'Let Christ the King of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe.' 'But Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, though ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain, God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it: and being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear.' 'Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ. He is 'Messiah the Prince,'—'the Lord and his Anointed.'

But who is this that is so highly and so assuredly exalted? He is that same Jesus, whom the angel of the Lord so named, because he would save his people from their sins—that same Jesus, in crucifying whom, the Jews unwittingly fulfilled the purposes of the merciful Jehovah. 'For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering.'

'He died to bear the guilt of men,
That sin might be forgiven;
He lives to bless them and defend,
And plead their cause in heaven.'

He is the Expectation of the Jews, the Consolation of the Gentiles, the Saviour of all—'a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of God's people Israel.'

Precious truth! More precious than gold, yea, than much fine gold! For what is a man profited though he gain the whole world and lose his soul! Oh! then, let us 'beware lest that come upon us which is spoken of in the prophets; 'Behold! ye despisers, and wonder and perish!' The house of Israel have beheld, and wondered, and perished—perished from their land; and thereby exhibited an irrefragable testimony to the truth of his Messiahship, whom they despised and rejected:—perished in their sins in other lands; and thereby exhibited a painful testimony to the guilt and inveteracy of an unbelieving heart. But are the house of Israel the only despisers that believe not, but wonder and perish? To the impenitent and unbelieving of every age and nation, it may be said, Know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom by your unbelief and sin ye crucify afresh, both Lord and Christ;—both Lord and Christ, to save in this the day of mercy—both Lord and Christ, to destroy with a fearful aggravated destruction, if ye neglect so great salvation. God hath spoken: ye may deny it, but ye cannot disannul it. God hath spoken: ye may deny it, but the denial cannot take away your sins, or give you comfort under them. God too hath done it, and who can hinder? Who can resist his will? He hath made that same Jesus both Lord and Christ; and 'all his works are done in truth,' 'his work is honourable and glorious, and his righteousness endureth for ever.' Ye may cavil at his work, but your cavilling is sin; and it can no more affect the certainty and stability of what he hath done, than the impatient petulance of the bear-eyed child can arrest the rising of the sun, or bring a cloud upon his mid-day brightness. 'Why do ye not understand my speech?' said Jesus to the perverse Jews; even because ye cannot hear, that is, bear my words. They are too pure, too offensive, too self-denying. 'If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.'

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'Now, when they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter, and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?' Acts ii. 37.

WE may be brought to a conviction of sin and the felt necessity of a Saviour, by a prayerful inquiry into the truth as it is in Jesus. But this is not the only means. Providence, by his angry dispensations, sometimes thunders forth at once, as from mount Sinai, the condemnatory sentence which scripture contains, but does not force upon the attention, much less upon the faith of men.

He sometimes, by a sudden calamity, causes to flash upon the mind, with the suddenness, the vividness, and the fearfulness of lightning, the truth which had formerly shone clearly and steadily, but unregardedly, from the page of revelation. What is thus accomplished by the frowns of Providence, is sometimes not less suddenly, and not less strikingly, accomplished by the simple preaching of the word. While the cloud of Providence is charged with the lightning, the Scriptures—the quiver of the Almighty, are charged with the sharp arrows of conviction; and when directed by the Spirit, are not less effectual in piercing to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit. The simple announcing of a text is sometimes the means of startling the conscience from the sleep of self-security, to a painful apprehension of coming wrath. 'As a dream when one awaketh,' so the sin-convicted and self-condemned sinner comes to a consciousness, that hitherto he has been dead, while he lived—dead to the most solemn and momentous realities, to the most certain, the most awful, and the most imminent of dangers.

The effect of such a disclosure is an irrepressible alarm; and while an irrepressible, it is seen to be a well-founded alarm, respecting the salvation of the soul. For, how fearful the revelation which the disclosure makes! It is wrath that is revealed, the wrath of an Almighty avenger, wrath revealed from heaven, from the throne of Him whose glory now appears like a consuming fire—not the radiant glory of a purely beaming light, of an unclouded sun, as He appears to angels and reconciled men; but the portentous glory of a fiery meteor, of a blood-like sun charioted in mountain masses of lurid clouds pregnant with flames, in which the red right hand of the Almighty seems embosomed, and already moving to smite with its awful everlasting vengeance. It is wrath too, from which there is seen to be no escape. It is seen that 'he that fleeth shall not escape, and he that escapeth shall not be delivered.' And while it is 'a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation,' from which there is no escape; it is a judgment and indignation, for deliverance from which the sin-convicted can plead no self-satisfying, and far less a God-satisfying excuse. His sin, he has come to see, was willfully, obstinately, and perseveringly committed; and so committed, notwithstanding manifold counsels, warnings, and rebukes.

The terrors of the awakened conscience being thus, the terrors of coming wrath—wrath from heaven—wrath from which there is no escape, and for the mitigation of which the sinner can plead no excuse; it is with an earnestness at which the dead in sin may wonder, or which they may deride as weakness, but for which there is in reality too good reason, that the convicted and self-condemned sinner cries, Men and brethren, what shall I do?

This is a cry, not in solitude; or if in solitude, not in solitude alone. It is a cry directed to those who can sympathize with, and counsel, in such an emergency. And to such, though a distressing, it is a gladdening cry. It is the uttered pangs of the second birth; but it is joyfully prophetic of the life that shall never die. True repentance is a cup of bitterness—a dark valley—a day of great heaviness and sorrow, and trembling of heart. It is 'the daughter of sadness, clothed in sackcloth, and sitting in ashes. Her eyes are red with weeping, and her breast is bare, and sore with beating.' Were this the sorrow of the world, which worketh death, we might well weep over it. But it is a sorrow which calls for joy—joy even in heaven—the joy of angels over one sinner that repenteth. The gay, laughing prodigal, wasting his substance in riotous living, makes the wise man, and especially the serious Christian, weep. The prodigal become the swine-herd, sitting in rags, without a friend to give to him, and fain to fill his belly with the husks that the swine did eat, full of melancholy, poignant thoughts on his past folly and the want and degradation of his present state; this sad spectacle fills the wise man and the serious Christian with the joy of hope. But it is a spectacle enough to make the sons of God shout for joy, when the downcast prodigal, coming to himself, and calling to mind his father's house, says within himself, 'How many hired servants in my father's house have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father.' The prodigal is yet in wretchedness; but he is on his way to happiness: and the joyful father might well say, even before the best robe was put upon him, before the ring was on his hands, or the shoes on his feet, 'let us eat and be merry.' It is not then to uninterested, but to deeply and joyfully sympathizing counsellors—to brethren, that the penitent address themselves, when they inquire, 'What shall we do?' Let not the spiritually distressed, therefore, fear to go to the godly minister or neighbour, to ask counsel, how they may obtain comfort to their afflicted souls. Let them go to impart joy and return rejoicing.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—MORNING

'To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me,' Acts xxvi. 18.

'Who so blind as those who will not see?' asks the proverb. And says the prophet, 'Bring forth the blind people that have eyes.' There is, then, other than natural; there is intellectual, moral, spiritual blindness. Comparatively few are blind to the light of the sun. It is the reverse of this with the light of the gospel: comparatively few have their eyes open to behold it. None can behold it, till they obey the command in its spiritual sense, 'Go wash in the pool of Siloam.' Go then, ye that are blind, to the fountain of gospel truth and spiritual influence; like the blind man, wash in faith, and like him you will come seeing.

Seeing what? God in his majesty, holiness, and frowning displeasure against iniquity—sin in its guiltiness and loathsomeness—self in your guilt, depravity, danger, and helplessness—Christ in his all-sufficiency and freeness for your salvation—God in Christ, reconciling a guilty world unto himself, not imputing to them their trespasses. You will see time in its shortness and uncertainty, eternity with its heaven of bliss and its abode of misery—the one in its allurements, the other in its terrors, and both in their unending perpetuity.

But you will say, All these I see; I have been taught them from my youth up. Yes, you have heard of them by the hearing of the ear, but hearing is not seeing. Mark the difference: 'I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, but now doth mine eye see Thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' It is one thing to be told that God is holy, it is another by faith to see God's holiness. It is one thing to be told that sin is sinful, it is another by faith to see sin's sinfulness. It is one thing to be told that Christ is all-sufficient, it is another by faith to see and lay hold on his all-sufficiency. It is one thing to contemplate past events and distant scenes with the faculties of the unimaginative, uninterested compiler of facts; it is another to contemplate these with the realizing and creative faculties of the poet or the painter. What imagination is to the poet or the painter, faith is to the Christian. It gives vividness, presence, substance, to the object which it contemplates. 'Faith is the substance of things hoped for.' It not only knows that God is in heaven, it sees him there: 'It enters within the veil.' Imagination makes the poet feel; so does true faith the Christian. It brings the object which it contemplates near to him,—gives it not only reality but proximity. It enables him to know experimentally the full import of that expression, 'Enoch walked with God;' and can he but feel, when he is conscious of such august and holy companionship?

We have said that hearing is not seeing. But there is also a seeing which is not the seeing of faith. There is openness of the mind's eye to truth in the abstract, while there is blindness to truth in the concrete, that is, to truth in connection with the object of whom it is affirmed. The eye of the mind may take in the idea of infinitude, and wisdom, and power, and goodness, from the works of creation and from the page of scripture, while there is a habitual blindness to the personality, presence, and active agency of the Being in whom these attributes reside. In short, God's attributes as abstract truths may enter the mind and remain there, while God's personality and presence as the actual possessor and exerciser of these attributes, is habitually excluded. And so of every other scripture truth. This enables us to understand how unbelievers and nominal Christians can sometimes stand amazed at the works or ways of God, and yet with truth be said to be 'living without God in the world.' It is the mere immensity of the power, or wisdom, or beneficence, which overawes them, not the apprehended personality and agency of the Godhead in whom these attributes reside. They are overawed, but their feeling is like that of the atheistic painter when he contemplates Alpine scenery; or like that of the atheistic poet when he contemplates the sublimities of the hurricane—the feeling of the mere man of taste. Such feeling is no certain indication of the faith of a Christian, or of a religionist of any name; for it may be experienced by him who denies the being of a God. Say not then that your eyes are open to gospel truth, merely because you have been taught it, and are feelingly impressed by it.

But the text speaks not only of opening the blind eyes, but of turning from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God. And why? Because we may have our eyes opened to the darkness in which we have hitherto lived, and yet 'love the darkness rather than the light; our deeds being evil.' Light is pleasant to the eye that loves it, but it is painful to the eye that cannot bear it. The light of evidence is courted by arraigned innocence: 'He cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest.' But the light of evidence is dreaded by the arraigned culprit, and he is tempted to do every thing in his power to quench it, or to escape from it: 'Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reprov'd.' It is not enough, therefore, that the light of conviction shine in upon the conscience; the power of conversion must turn from 'the unfruitful works of darkness.' Gospel light only makes manifest; it does not necessarily convey salvation. It reveals the way, but we must turn our feet into it, and walk therein. Has then the gospel opened our blind eyes to the darkness in which we have hitherto lived? Let us turn our back upon the darkness, and hasten to the region where the true light shineth. Having turned our back upon the darkness,—which is Satan's element, and one of the chief secrets and sources of his power,—we shall escape from under the dominion of that dread and deceitful enemy to God; and having reached our once angry, but now reconciled Father, we shall obtain forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified. What is there in darkness that should be tempting to any but a devil? To him the darkness is tempting, were it for nothing else than to escape the light. But if we are not wholly devils, and if we dread their destiny, what more desirable than forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among the sanctified by faith in Christ?

-----
 TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—EVENING

'Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law,' Psal. cxix. 18.

THERE are professing Christians who can admire the beauty and propriety of such a prayer as this; but who, when you unfold to them its meaning and the doctrine upon which it proceeds—the doctrine of spiritual influence,—will forthwith say, 'This is an hard saying: who can hear it.' They find it easy, and they think it rational, to utter the prayer without meaning; but they find it hard, and they think it irrational, to utter it with the intelligence and faith of a Bible Christian.

The Greek Testament contains the same wondrous things that the English Testament contains. But we must learn the language, before we can see those wonders in it. In like manner, we must learn the language of the Spirit, before we can read spiritually its recorded discoveries. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned.' It is only a Grecian that can teach to understand Greek: so it is only the Spirit that can teach to understand the things of the Spirit. 'The things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.' 'But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God.' 'Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.' Of whom speaks the apostle when he says, we have received? Of himself, or of other men? Of himself; but of other men also: 'for the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal,'—to every man that asks. 'Ask, and it shall be given unto you,' &c., Luke xi. 11—14. How undeniable then the doctrine! How universal the offer! How free the gift! 'Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief.' Lord, I avail myself of the promise, and betake myself to thee in prayer. 'Spirit of truth!' descend into my soul: what is dark, do thou enlighten, and make me obedient to the truth. Spirit of wisdom, and of a sound mind! 'make me wise unto salvation,' and 'let my heart be sound in thy statutes.' Spirit of love! enable me to love Him who first loved me; and may the love of Christ constrain me. Spirit of sanctifying power! 'create within me a clean heart, and renew within me a right spirit.' Comforter of the sorrowing! 'restore unto me the joy of thy salvation.' Spirit of adoption! enable me to cry, and to feel while I cry, Abba, Father. Revealer of the deep things of God! 'open mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.' Father, hear; Son, thou art my surety and my plea; Holy Ghost, the helper of the helpless, help my infirmities, and make intercession for me, with an earnestness that cannot find utterance. Amen.

How welcome every one to utter such a prayer! And how strong the inducements; whether we consider the power and willingness of the hearer and answerer of prayer, the prevalence of the intercessor at the throne, the power of the intercessor in the heart, or the gifts which are received in answer to our supplications!

But it ought not to be forgotten, that the blessings which we receive through the Spirit, are not sent down by miracle from heaven. They are already upon the earth treasured up in the law of God. They are like the treasures hid in the earth for the husbandman that ploughs, or for the miner that digs for them. In the word are hid the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and though the eyes were opened by the Spirit, we cannot expect to find them, till we seek them there. The word is 'the sword of the Spirit;' and it is through it that he inflicts the blessed wounds of conviction. It is the Spirit's chest of healing medicine, from which he takes and applies 'the balm of Gilead,' and 'the oil of gladness.' The Bible is the Father's blood-sealed testament to his believing children: and it is from it that he makes known to them their present privileges and future prospects. The Bible is the believer's manual of devotion; and it is in prayerfully perusing it, or meditating on it, that the Spirit quickens his piety and gratitude. The Bible is the believer's authoritative rule of rectitude; and it is while prayerfully perusing or remembering its dictates that the Spirit discovers to him the true import of its precepts, and makes him feel the authority by which they are enforced. When we read the Scriptures then, let us present the prayer, 'Open mine eyes.' And when, in our daily devotions, we add this to our other supplication; let it be out of the law, and not from heaven, or from the Spirit brooding upon a void within, that we look for the expected wonders. And wonders we shall behold—Wonders of Wisdom and knowledge, prompting the exclamation, 'Oh! the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!'—Wonders of condescension; 'Will God indeed dwell with men?'—Wonders of suffering; 'Behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow;'—Wonders of love, of love 'passing knowledge;'—Wonders of guilt and ruin; 'There is none righteous, no, not one;'—Wonders of unbending rectitude, yet of justifying grace; 'A just God and a Saviour;'—Wonders of grace to the chief of sinners; 'This day shalt thou be with me in paradise;'—Wonders of privilege; 'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God;'—Wonders of providence; 'I am as a wonder unto many;'—Wonders of future prospect; 'Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath in store for them that love him;'—condemning, yet justifying; alarming, yet peace-speaking; humbling, yet exalting; saddening, yet gladdening wonders! These we shall behold; not only know, but behold; behold and feel; behold and feel as deeply interested actors and sharers in them, and not as staring, but apathetic, because uninterested spectators; behold and feel with the discerning eye, and beating heart, of a rational being; and not with the brutish eye and heart of the irrational creation.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me,' John vi. 45.

'TAUGHT of God,' that is, taught by God; not concerning Him. Or, God-taught, as the original might be correctly rendered; and, as the same phrase, 'taught of God,' in 1 Thes. iv. 9, would be rendered, if literally rendered.

'Learned of the Father.' Here also the 'of' should be 'by,' or 'from,' to indicate with less ambiguity, as the original does, whence the learning has been derived.

But, how taught by God? By His works, by the miracles of Christ, and by His word, say some. Truly so; but not wholly, nor chiefly so. Many of the Jews whom Jesus addressed, had enjoyed this mode of teaching to the full, and had not come to Him. But He says, Every man that hath heard and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. It is of an effectual teaching that Christ speaks; not of an ineffectual. He speaks of his Father as a teacher by whom men shall learn; not of his works or word, as a book from which they may learn. How then taught by God? Taught by his Spirit, for this is the prediction of the prophets: 'It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God.' 'I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes; and ye shall keep my judgments and do them.'

Why should we demur to receive such a doctrine? Why be slow to avail ourselves of such a promise? Are we naturally so teachable in divine things, so void of prejudice, so fond of truth?—of humbling, self-condemning truth? Are holiness, and self-denial, and love of God, so natural to us, so congenial to our corrupt affections, that we need not the aid of a divine illuminator and sanctifier? Are we so like the holy angels that we are already worthy of, and fit for, heaven? Or, if not, is it so easy a matter to acquire their likeness, and a liking to their society, their employments and enjoyments, that we can dispense with foreign aid for such a purpose? Have we hitherto been so obedient to the truth? Have we hitherto made so ample a return to Christ, for the great love wherewith He loved us? In our eating, in our drinking, and in whatsoever we have done, have we done all so uniformly, so devoutly, so devotedly to the glory of God, that we are sensible of no shortcomings; or of no such shortcomings as to make us wish for help that they may be fewer, and that the very end of our being may be more the desire of our hearts, and the fruit of our lives? Ah! what says an inspired and eminently devoted apostle! 'We know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin.' 'O! wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'

But whence our unwillingness to acquiesce in, and to ask for, so necessary, so desirable, and so free a gift, as the gift of the Spirit? 'It interferes with my free-agency. It detracts from my own sufficiency. It makes man nothing, and God everything, in my salvation.' O pride, pride! of how much hast thou bereft us! Of how much wouldst thou bereave us still! Is it not enough that thou separatest between chief friends on earth? that thou sealest up the fountain of love and charity, by sealing the lips and palsying the hand of the poor but proud unfortunate among men? Will nothing satisfy thy lust of power, and love of liberty, but the separating of the creature from the Creator—the redeemed from the Redeemer? Will nothing satisfy the haughtiness of thy poverty, but to spurn the pearl of great price, and the riches of redeeming and sanctifying love? 'Thou sayest I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.' Let the forbearance and tenderness of a compassionate God, who knows thee and thy necessities better than the proud can know themselves, subdue thee to acceptance of His authoritative, yet affectionate advice: 'I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see.' But, still talking of thy freedom? Thou fool! It is because God will not, cannot, as moral governor, touch thy moral freedom, that thou, if impenitent, art left to perish in thy sins. God desires not the death of any sinner, and He has done every thing short of interfering with liberty of will, for overcoming the sinner's unwillingness to come unto Himself. His seeming interference, and the sinner's plausible, but unfounded objection, are an affecting proof of this. 'Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life.'

But it is not only the pride of moral freedom; the pride of personal character creates a prejudice against the doctrine of the text. 'Every one that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me.' This draws a distinction between themselves and the true followers of Christ, which the worldly and unregenerate cannot brook. They would fain be thought the followers of Christ, although they have not his Spirit. 'But if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His.' They would unwittingly be both the pharisee and the publican—the pharisee in character, and the publican in blessing. Forgetting their bad deeds, they boast of their good deeds, would be thought less needful of repentance than the publican, and would thereby be justified in the sight of God. Nay, they despise, perhaps, the publican and his unostentatious distance, downcast eyes, and beating of his breast. Yet they would inherit his blessing. They give to God their negatives in morals, and their positives in religion:—their negatives in morals; for they are neither extortioners, nor unjust, nor adulterers, nor quite so bad as the publican, which they think is saying a great deal for themselves:—their positives in religion; for they fast twice in the week, and they give titles of all that they possess; and these are the substantial, if not the essentials, of a gift. These they give, and they think it hard that a becoming consciousness on their part of the value of their gift, should of itself turn their gold into dross, and their sacrifice into an abomination. Such is their knowledge of divine things. Yet they are not ignorant. They are sometimes the wisest of the wise in this world; and they are not unfrequently the wise in their own conceit. But it is of the world that they have learned—not of the Father: and they have been always learning, but have never come to the knowledge of the truth. Well did Esaias prophesy, saying, 'This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. But in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.' Teach me thy way, O Lord, teach me to do thy will, for thou art my God; thy Spirit is good.

---

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Draw me, we will run after thee,' Cant. i. 4.

THIS prayer is from the Song of Songs; that is, according to a Hebrew idiom, The most excellent of Songs. Open mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of this portion of thy law.

The church of God is in this Song poetically represented under the figure of a bride, surrounded by a company of choral virgins. The bride sings, 'Draw me.' The choral virgins unite with her in singing, 'We will run after thee.'

Though this Song, as a whole, can be fully understood and appreciated only by the experienced Christian, it nevertheless contains sentiments common to him with the newly begotten in the faith. Of these sentiments this is one, 'Draw me, we will run after thee.'

Drawing implies unwillingness to follow. But the text is a prayer, and if sent up to God in sincerity, the will must have followed. True: the will of the new man has followed, but not of the old. 'The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other.' 'To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not.' There is willingness implied in the prayer, to be drawn; but there is unwillingness of some kind implied in the necessity to be drawn. There is the obstinacy of the will, and the obstinacy of the affections and propensities. The one obstinacy may be subdued, while the other remains unbroken.

Drawing implies difficulty and tardiness in following. These arise from various causes:—from the opposition of the old man, already referred to—from the very frailty of our frame, the spirit being often willing, while the flesh is weak—from the sacrifice which duty sometimes calls on us to make of our temporal interests and tenderest affections, such sacrifice being often painful, as the cutting off of a right hand, or the plucking out of a right eye—from the very blindness of the understanding, often, as to what duty really is; the question of duty being sometimes so beset with difficulties and momentous consequences, that nothing but very pains-taking and prayerful inquiry can set us free from its entanglements,—and finally, from the opposition of misjudging friends, who would dissuade us from incumbent duty, or from the opposition of unbelieving, envious, and malicious foes, who would withstand us in the active discharge of it. But greater is He that is for us, than all they that can be against us. For,

See the power of divine grace: Draw me, we will run after thee. Grace overcomes difficulty, and converts tardiness into a race. Sin may have so paralyzed our frame, that our feet may be almost gone, and our steps well nigh slipped: but, 'He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength.' 'He maketh my feet like hinds' feet.' Unsanctified, and even natural and amiable affections, may so fetter our spiritual energies, that we may be like the chained captive, slow and toilsome in our movements of obedience; but, 'They shall take them captive, whose captives they were, and they shall rule over their oppressors.' Sinful selfishness may so obscure the path of duty, that we shall 'meet with darkness in the daytime, and grope in the noon-day as in the night;' but, 'I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight.' Misjudging friends may say, 'There is a lion in the way,' but, 'Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet.' Persecuting foes may prompt the complaint, 'Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy;' but, 'The arms of the wicked shall be broken, and the Lord upholdeth the righteous.' Gravitation does not act more uniformly in preventing us from ascending bodily into the clouds, than does sin in ourselves and in the world around us, in preventing the soul from freely ascending on the wings of meditation into the heaven of heavens. 'But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.'

Are such my weaknesses? and such thy promises? Draw me to thy promises: enchain my faith and my affections to them—to Thyself, that I may be drawn by them—by Thyself. Draw me from the world's allurements and sinful entanglements. I am fettered: but, 'Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.' Draw me to duty. I am weak: but, 'Perfect Thy strength in my weakness.' Draw me by the cords of love—by the cords of Thy love to me; by the cords of love in my heart to Thee. Enlarge my heart by love's strong, expansive emotions, and I will run in the path of Thy commandments. What shall hinder, when love without allures, and love within constrains? How light the footstep which is winged by such a sentiment! How willing the surrender which is made by such a sentiment! How incorrupt, how acceptable the sacrifice which is salted by such a sentiment! It is the essence and the sweetener of devotion. It is the soul and beauty of obedience. It is the comforting and animating sister of faith and hope, and it shall live when they have died. Draw me by the cords of love, and if those cords must be the cords of salutary chastisement, they are still the cords of love. Thy will be done. 'The bitter must come before the sweet, and that will make the sweet the sweeter.'

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified, Rom. viii. 29, 30.

We have here an enumeration of, and a scripture foundation for, the most peculiar doctrines of our Confession and Catechisms—predestination, effectual calling, and justification by the righteousness of Christ. The Arminian and Socinian must find it hard to mould such a text as this into conformity with their opinions: and, after they have done what they could in this way, it must disconcert them not a little, to find such a text as this at every considerable interval of perusal, struggling, like a warped plant, to recover in their minds its natural shape and dimensions.

We have here, also, the intimate and inseparable connection which subsists between these fundamental doctrines. They are the links of a chain, firm as the links of destiny—the links of that golden chain which binds the redeemed on earth to their glorious destiny in heaven. They are the steps of one continuous ladder, indissoluble at any part; reaching, like Jacob's, from earth to heaven: founded deep as the unknown depths of the one, and reaching high as the unseen glories of the other. It has its angels too:—the angels of the churches calling—the Angel of the covenant justifying—the angels that carried Lazarus into Abraham's bosom, ushering into glory.

Whatever may be said of foreknowledge and predestination, as these affect the finally impenitent, we have here a foreknowledge and predestination that every mind should rejoice to admit—predestination to holiness and happiness. The former is a dark, the latter is a radiant mystery. Our selfishness may recoil from admission, and even from the contemplation of the one. Our selfishness should be allured to the faith and grateful contemplation of the other.

Our gratitude to a benefactor, and our confidence in him, are enhanced when we come to know that he knew us and our necessities, long before we came to know either him or his benefactions toward us. But God's foreknowledge of us preceded our being—preceded all time—was coeval with eternity. 'Known unto God are all his works from the beginning.'

Our gratitude and confidence are still farther enhanced, when we come to know that the kindnesses of our benefactor are the result of a settled and unalterable purpose respecting us; especially if it be a settled, unalterable purpose, formed irrespective of any other view of our character and condition than that of our poverty, wretchedness, and helplessness. Both these ideas then, are involved in the term predestination. It is a 'purpose'—a 'purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began.' It is a purpose, including not only our happiness, but our regeneration and holiness; nay, a purpose having our regeneration and holiness primarily in view, and as preparatory to happiness—as the means unto the end. 'For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate;' but predestinate to what? 'To be conformed to the image of his Son'—the perfection of holiness: and for what end? 'That he might be the first-born among many brethren'—the perfection of happiness.

Again, our gratitude and confidence are still farther enhanced, when, in order to banish our fears respecting the future, our benefactor makes known to us his unalterable purpose of providing for our happiness; and at the same time makes known his power to fulfil his purpose. Behold then another enhancement of the believer's gratitude and confidence towards the God of his salvation! 'Whom he did predestinate, them he also called'—'called out of darkness into his marvellous light'—the light of a fully revealed salvation; whether it respects its Author, its Finisher, its objects, or its end.

Another, and perhaps the greatest, enhancement of our gratitude and confidence, is, when we come to know that the principles upon which our supposed benefactor's purpose of providing for our happiness is founded, are such as have required or shall yet require, a painful sacrifice of his own ease and comfort: when we come to know, for example, that in order that we may be rich, he must become poor; that we may be honoured, he must be despised; that we may live, he must die a lingering and ignominious death. Behold then another, and the greatest of conceivable enhancements of the believer's faith and gratitude towards his heavenly Benefactor! 'Whom he called, them he also justified—and justified how? By the atoning death of his own dear Son. 'He made his soul an offering for sin.' 'He who was rich for our sakes became poor, that we, through his poverty might be made rich.' 'Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

Finally, our gratitude and confidence are consummated, when we come to contrast our former condition with that to which our benefactor has already raised, or is yet to raise us:—if it be, for instance, from beggary to opulence, or from heirship to poverty to heirship to a throne, that he has raised us. But what earthly contrast can give an adequate idea of the believer's deserved condition, as compared to that to which God has in prospect raised him? For 'whom he justified, them he also glorified.' A grovelling worm, and a soaring eagle—a dungeon and a palace—a raging fever and blooming and buoyant health—the chamber of the dead, and the bridal feast with its decorated queen of beauty—a sacked city, with its groans of agony and its howlings of despair, and a woody hamlet on a sunny festive-day, re-echoing with the dance of sportive youth, and the mirth of happy age—these are infinitely feeble, they are meaningless as contrasts, if used to express the difference between the believer's deserved, and his destined state of being. Think on the fire unquenchable, on the gnawing worm that never dies, on the angels that kept not their first estate, on the wandering stars to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever. Such is the destiny that he deserved. But behold the sun when he shineth in his strength. The believer's destiny is higher, his abode is brighter, his soul is purer, his range of vision more unbounded. Listen to the song of the heavenly host. Your dull ear cannot take in a thousandth portion of its sweetness. It is such a song that he shall sing; and all its sweetness he shall, with a seraph's ear, drink in greedily and everlastingly. 'And I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne; and no man could learn that song but the redeemed from the earth.' 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath in store for them that love him.'

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption,' 1 Cor. i. 30.

IN Christ, not merely by profession, but by covenant relationship and vital union. Levi the tithe-receiver was, we are told, a tithe-payer; —not however in his own person, but in his father Abraham: 'for he was yet in the loins of his father when Melchisedek met him.' What Abraham did long before Levi was born, Levi is thus said to have done in him, as being one with him in natural relationship and covenant relationship to God. In like manner, whatever Christ did for us, we are considered as having done in him; and whatever He is for us, we are considered as being in Him. 'Who of God is made unto us wisdom,' &c. This is less emphatic than the original. Its full meaning is as follows: Who is made unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness from God, and sanctification from God, and redemption from God,—all blessings precisely suited to our character and necessities as sinners; and all, from that very Being with respect to whom our necessities are felt. But what are these necessities? Ignorance, guilt, pollution, and liability to perdition. But here we have,

Wisdom to enlighten our darkness, to chase away its superstitious fears and false hopes, and to give 'more understanding than the ancients,'—wisdom from the All-wise, from Him whose understanding is infinite—wisdom from God.

We have here a mantling righteousness, sufficient to enfold the guiltiest soul—a righteousness when robed in which, God sees no iniquity in Jacob, and no perverseness in Israel. It is a robe without a stain, without a rent, pure and radiant as the light, and imperishable as the God that wrought it out and gives it. 'Who are these which are arrayed in white robes.'—'These are they which have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb.'—'I counsel thee to buy of me—white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear'—the white raiment of justifying righteousness from God, the righteous judge, under whose sentence of condemnation sin has already brought us.

Nor is this all. Not only is the sinner's guilt covered; his pollution of heart is purged away, and sanctification from God is wrought within the soul. Clothed with the mantle which admits into God's spiritual family, the believer undergoes the training of God's adopted children; His own Son being the master, His word the class-book, His Spirit the eye-salve and healing medicine, His providence the rod of correction, or the reward of diligence. Besides, the believer's rags being exchanged for robes, he acquires a prince's nobility of soul, loathes his former filth, and aspires after the pure and lofty destiny awaiting him. And this he does not despairingly, but in the full assurance that sanctification truly begun, is sanctification completed: for like wisdom and righteousness, it is from God—from God as a whole and certain, and not as a partial and uncertain gift; as will appear from the last and consummating blessing.

Redemption. Wisdom is given to make sinners wise as to their folly—their folly amid guilt and danger, and an utter destitution of a justifying righteousness. Righteousness is given, for acceptance with, and for access with boldness to the infinitely Holy; and it necessarily leads to sanctification. Sanctification is given, that God may be holy as well as just in our redemption, which is the consummation of all the preceding blessings.

'These are the means, but this the end.'

Glorious scheme! Divine in its origin, fair in its proportions, harmonious in its movements, magnificent and beneficent in its results, as a new creation!

But what is the animating soul, the moving, harmonizing principle? It is Christ. He it is that gives all these blessings their individual meaning, makes them available for us, and so indissolubly connects them, the one with the other, that they may be said to blend like the colours of the rainbow. He is 'the white light' of gospel truth; and these blessings are its decomposed elements, spanning, rainbow-like, the sinner's threatening horizon, that he may look and repose on the stability of the divine promises. Without light we could not have the rainbow with its distinct yet blending colours; so, without Christ, we could not have these distinct yet blending and peace-speaking adornments of the soul. The colours of the rainbow have their resemblances in the varnished compounds of this world's dust: so, we may have the varnished resemblances of these gospel gifts and graces, in the gifts and graces of this world. But how dim! how sordid! how superficial! We may have this world's wisdom. But it will die with us; and while it lasts, how adulterated and debased by folly! We may have righteousness of a tawdry whiteness, with which to clothe ourselves in the artificial light of an earthly tribunal. But how rent, and stained with spots! And how black will its white become before the great white throne! We may have sanctification, consisting of sanctity of look, and gait, and phraseology, sufficient to deceive the most discerning spirit. But what will such sanctity avail, when the deceiver and self-deceived has appeared naked in the presence of his Judge? We may have a redemption. No: we can have none. We are speaking of the soul; and out of Christ there is for it no redemption. 'There is none other name under heaven, given among men whereby we must be saved, but the name of Jesus.' Be mine, then, a vitally uniting faith in Christ; that He may be made unto me wisdom, and make me wise unto salvation—that He may be made unto me righteousness, and that I in Him may be found righteous as Himself, now, and in the great day—that He may be made unto me sanctification, and that I may be holy as He is holy, and at death be found meet for his immediate presence—that He may be made unto me redemption; redemption, from hell, from a wicked and ensnaring world, and from the otherwise hopeless mansions of the dead.

---

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him,' 2 Cor. v. 21.

MADE sin! He who knew no sin made sin! Made sin for us! Made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him! How emphatic the terms; how divine the appointment; how humbling the doctrine; how precious the privilege!

How emphatic the terms! for it is not,—'made a sin-offering.' That may indeed be its meaning; yet the expression is remarkable—'made sin.' Without doubt, the expression is used to intimate, not merely that our punishment, but that our sins were made His—transferred to him by imputation; to intimate, that He had taken on Himself not only our responsibilities, but our very character. 'He who knew no sin was made to be sin for us.' True it is, that our imputed guilt could never make Him an actual transgressor. Could it have done so, that would itself have rendered Him unfit to be our substitute. Yet how complete his substitution, and how honouring to the divine law, that it was as a sinner, and with 'our iniquities laid upon Him,' that he suffered, 'the just for the unjust.'

The strength of this expression, 'made sin;' and it recalls another, 'made a curse for us,' should convince us of the unscripturalness of contemplating Christ merely as a sufferer by sin, and not also as a substitute for sinners in the fullest sense of the terms. There is a manifest and essential difference between these two views of the Lamb of God. Contemplate Him as an outcast innocent, as a persecuted benefactor, as dying that He might rise again, and thereby bring life and immortality to light, and you have the first, but an altogether inadequate view of His character and atoning work. Contemplate Him, on the other hand, as personally a perfect innocent, but officially, and by imputation, guilty; contemplate him in all that he did and suffered, as doing and suffering all in the room, and as the representative of sinners—as made not only a sufferer, but a sinner in our behalf, and a sinner in so emphatic a sense as to justify the expression from the pen of inspiration, ‘made sin ;’ and you have the second and only adequate view of Christ’s character and atoning work which will meet the demands of scripture. You will then see, not only how God could be just in justifying the ungodly, but how He could be just in hiding His face from the perfectly righteous One, and in smiting him with the sword of sin-avenging justice. You will then see too the full meaning of being ‘made the righteousness of God in Him ;’ see that while our sins were made His, His divine righteousness and its infinite meritoriousness are made ours; for it is a righteousness which is ‘unto all and upon all them that believe’—unto all as a gift, upon all as a covering. ‘He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness.’ You will then see how complete we are in Him, who is the Head—how completely He was what we are, and how completely we are what He is, in the work of our salvation. Wondrous and blessed exchange! Wondrous, that the infinitely, eternally, and essentially Happy, should condescend to suffer—to suffer that ‘we might rejoice’—‘rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.’ More wondrous still, that the infinitely, eternally, and essentially Holy, should condescend so to ally Himself unto our sinfulness as to be ‘made sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. Blessed exchange! The sinner made righteous—made the righteousness of God! Bless the Lord, O my soul. Bless the Wonderful—the Prince of peace. Sin has been consumed on the golden altar of His divinity. The ashes of a consumed have become the imperishable beauties of a glorified humanity; and in Him who once was made sin, we behold the everlasting righteousness of God’s redeemed people.

How divine the appointment! An atoning substitute!—a substitute whose previous and revealed appointment is necessary to apprise mankind of the need of such a substitute! Whence could the idea come? From God-dishonouring, God-debasing man, whose inveterate proneness to idolatry and will-worship all past history so sadly demonstrates? And such a substitute!—

so holy, so divine! So allied to man, and so allied to God! So conformable to the sinner’s wants, and so equal to the law’s demands! Could human-thought, could angel-thought give birth to the conception? Impossible. And even granting the conception possible, where could it find realization? where could such a substitute be found? In heaven? Then who but God could send him thence? On earth? Alas! all flesh have corrupted their ways, and there is none righteous; no, not one. No second Jesus has appeared, or can appear, either as a reality, or as an imagined and recorded character. Jesus, the holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners, were he again upon the earth, and hourly before our eyes, would baffle the wit of man even to appreciate and paint his character; not to speak of originally conceiving it. Earth has no colours equal to its brightness. Heaven alone could supply the colours, and inspiration alone could guide the hand to a faithful portraiture.

How humbling the doctrine! For, whence the necessity of such a substitution? From the extent, the spirituality, and the unchangeableness of the demands of the law of God; and our utter inability to meet those demands. ‘If there had been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness would have been by the law. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith.’ Boasting! In the creature? In such a creature? Before God? Before such a God? How impious the thought! But, have we ‘submitted to the righteousness of God ;’ and has ‘the righteousness of God been revealed to us from faith to faith?’ How self-renouncing such a submission! How humbling such a revelation! It is the submission of the culprit whose mouth has been stopped, and whose own lips have condemned him. It is the humility of him who contemplates personal guilt in the presence, and under the very eye of perfect holiness—of him whose personal corruptions are drawn forth into the beaming light of divine righteousness. Nor is his humility less deeply felt; it is more deeply and ingenuously felt when, by faith, he comes to be embosomed in its brightness—enrobed in its spotless whiteness. Like poverty promoted to the robes of royalty, the believer’s present rank makes him more sensible of the lowness of his origin. Like modesty exalted to honour, the more sensible he is of his exaltation, the more is he inwardly humbled and ashamed. Like linen, clean and white, upon an impure body, the imputed righteousness of Christ only makes him more sensible of his personal uncleanness, and of the necessity of the 'washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost.' How humbling the doctrine! But,

How precious the privilege! What more precious, during life, than peace to the troubled conscience, and freedom of access to God in meditation and in prayer? What more precious than confidence in God, and a well-founded hope of a blessed immortality when we come to die? What more precious than an all-prevailing plea of acquittal, and an irresistible claim of right to the heavenly inheritance on the day of final reckoning? But all this is the preciousness of the privilege of being made the righteousness of God. 'Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.' And, 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth.'

---

TWENTY SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness,' Rom. iv. 3.

WHAT is faith? It is a simple belief of, and reliance on, the divine testimony, whatever the subject of that testimony may be; whether testimony respecting a temporal or a spiritual deliverance. The blessing bestowed upon simple belief of, and reliance on, the divine testimony, is a personal experience of the deliverance of which the testimony speaks. Christ, when on earth, testified his power to heal; and when he wished to show the connection between faith in that power, and its exercise in behalf of any individual, He required an explicit avowal of faith in Himself before exerting his power to heal. 'Believe ye that I am able to do this?' was the question. 'Lord, I believe,' was the requisite answer; and it never failed to obtain the blessing. Such was the faith through which the patriarchs received their recorded temporal deliverances: as is largely illustrated in the eleventh chapter to the Hebrews, 'Who through faith subdued kingdoms,' &c.

But there is faith in the divine testimony respecting spiritual, as well as temporal blessings: and this is the faith which is here ascribed to Abraham. It was a faith which looked beyond the present, to another and happier state of being. For while 'by faith he sojourned in the land of promise,' he sojourned there 'as in a strange country;' 'for he looked for a better country, that is, a heavenly,'—'for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.' And of Isaac, Jacob, and Sarah, and perhaps of Abel, Enoch, and Noah, as well as of Abraham, it is said, 'These all died in faith, not having received the promises,' &c. Read Heb. 11th chapter, 13—15, 16, 35 verses. Also, for David's sentiments respecting a future state, read Ps. xvii. 15; xlix. 14, 15; and for Asaph's, Ps. lxxiii. 24; and for Job's, Job xix. 25—27.

Again, Abraham's faith had respect to Christ: for said Jesus to the Jews, 'Your Father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad.' And says Paul, Gal. iii. 8, 'The scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed.' Nor was this gift of faith in spiritual blessings through a coming Messiah, peculiar to believing Abraham. 'By faith, Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward.' And says Jesus, 'many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and to hear those things which ye hear.' 'Of which salvation,' says Peter, 'the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who have prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.' Prophets and kings are here spoken of, not, however, as though the knowledge and belief of a coming Messiah were confined to them. All who knew and believed their writings had a like faith and hope. Hence we read of the 'just and devout Simeon waiting for the consolation of Israel;' of 'Joseph, the honourable counsellor, who waited for the kingdom of God; and of all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.' Hence also the current expression before and at the time of Messiah's advent, 'That prophet that should come into the world.'

The faith of Abraham, having thus respect to Christ, was a justifying faith—'it was counted to him for righteousness.' Having respect to Christ, it was identical in character and effect with that which is required under the Christian dispensation; that is, it was faith in a coming Saviour, and a faith which justified without works. Such too must have been the faith of Abraham's believing predecessors. Such we are expressly told was the faith of Abel, Enoch, and Noah—a justifying faith. Such also must have been the faith of his fellow-patriarchs, and of his believing fellow-countrymen of after ages; for it is in general terms declared, that 'by it (faith) the elders (ancients) obtained a good report.' 'And these all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise.'

Such was their faith; such is our faith—a faith counted for righteousness.

Mark then the oneness of the economy of grace in this particular. Justification by faith is one of the unbroken, bright threads, running the whole length of the otherwise variegated web of the divine dispensations—from Abel to the new-born sinner of the present moment; from the new-born sinner of the present moment to the sounding of the last trump.

Mark too the presumption of our seeking to be justified by works. If Enoch, 'that walked with God, and was translated that he should not see death, because he had this testimony that he pleased God;' if Abraham, who is called 'the friend of God,' and is so highly promoted at the marriage supper of the Lamb, that to lie with the head upon his bosom, as is said of Lazarus, is to enjoy the highest honour and felicity; if David, 'the man after God's own heart,' the most gifted, the most devout of scripture writers, and the most experienced of scripture-saints;—if these most eminent of holy men had nothing of which to boast in the sight of God, spoke of 'the blessedness of the man whose iniquities are pardoned, and whose sin is covered,' and were justified by faith, which was counted to them for righteousness; how shall we, who have no pretensions to their godliness, and devotion, and heavenly-mindedness, presume to arrogate to ourselves a righteousness of which they were destitute? 'God resisteth the proud, but He giveth grace to the humble.'

---

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God,' Rom. iii. 24, 25.

God's righteousness might have been declared in the sinner's condemnation. Here it is said to be declared in the remission of his sins, and his justification by grace. But how? Through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. And how does redemption in Christ Jesus manifest the righteousness of God in the justification of the sinner? By Christ's being set forth to be a propitiation. Let this term 'propitiation' be clearly understood, and the 'how' will become apparent.

There are other terms in our language which will express a part, but not the whole of its meaning. Thus, when Christ is said to be our propitiation, we might explain the expression by saying, that He is our peace-maker. This explains what he does as our propitiation—makes peace. It explains the 'what,' but not the 'how,' in the question. It does not explain the chief idea implied in propitiation. The chief idea is, that in making peace, He, as an atoning sacrifice, makes satisfaction to God's justice in behalf of, and in the room of the sinner. A man may make peace between two hostile parties, especially if both have been at fault, by simple reasoning and remonstrance. He may do this without any sacrifice on his part, and therefore without becoming in any sense a propitiation. But if the one party has an undoubted claim upon the other; if, for example, the cause of the enmity be a large and most just debt, and if the creditor will not, and cannot, from claims otherwise made upon him, forego the debt; in this case, the peace-maker must satisfy the just demands of the creditor, before he can expect to reconcile him to the debtor. If he do so at his own expense, he makes a sacrifice, and becomes, in a sense, a propitiation:—but only in a sense; for the full and proper meaning of the term propitiation can be found only in the work of our redemption. And it is found as follows. God and the sinner are at enmity. The cause of the enmity is, that the sinner owes, but has failed to give to God what He, as an infinitely righteous Governor requires—a perfect obedience to his just and unchanging law. The sinner is neither able nor willing to give this perfect obedience. God is unwilling to inflict the penalty. He desires, determines on his forgiveness. But, in forgiving, He cannot recede from the demands which his law makes upon the sinner, without such a satisfaction to its claims as shall vindicate its authority and rectitude. God accordingly sends his Son to make this satisfaction. The Son, for this end, voluntarily takes upon himself the nature and the obligations of the sinner—his obligations as subject to the law, and as liable to its penalty. Subject to the law, He gives perfect obedience to its requirements, that, as perfectly innocent, He might meritoriously bear its penalty. Its penalty

He bears. He dies the just for the unjust. —Whatever coming short of the demands of unbending justice there may seem to be in Christ's being a substitute only, and not the actual transgressor, is more than made up by Christ's dignity as divine, and by his near relationship to God as his eternal Son. For what more honouring to the law; what vindication of its authority more appalling, than that the Son of the Lawgiver, than that the Lawgiver Himself, should, in the room of the sinner, and with the sinner's iniquities laid upon Him, suffer the penalty? This did He, 'who, being the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.' Eternal Justice has been satisfied, and, in testimony of the fact, Christ is set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare God's righteousness for the remission of sins.

The scripture proof of this view of Christ's atoning work is most abundant. It is to be found in the very term 'propitiation;' which implies these four ideas, enmity, reconciliation, a reconciler, and a propitiatory sacrifice as the ground of the reconciliation. The chief of these ideas is the last, which is often set forth in scripture, especially in the sacrifices under the ceremonial law, as these are explained in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The text itself exhibits this last idea as the chief; for it is 'through faith in His blood, that He becomes a propitiation to the sinner. Again, we have the term redemption in the text, which, with other ideas, has that of the payment of a price as its distinctive meaning. Hence the expressions, 'to give his life a ransom;' 'bought with a price;' 'redeemed not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ;' 'Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood.'

Let not the above view be supposed to detract from the mercy of God. His righteousness required that His law should be vindicated before the sinner could be saved. Not, however, that He was unwilling to pardon, but that, as righteous Governor, He was morally unable to pardon, without a vindication of His law. Not that He was unwilling, but most willing; yea, resolved to pardon: and, therefore, both the pardon and requisite vindication originate in, and proceed from Himself. As a God of justice He exacts the vindication; as a God of mercy he provides for its accomplishment. Mercy as well as justice is thus more illustriously displayed. Hence we are said to be 'justified freely by his grace.'

Had the exacted vindication been made of the sinner, this could not have been said. The exaction was made not of the sinner, but of a substitute—of a substitute provided by the Exactor—provided by the Exactor in behalf of those who were in a state of enmity, and of such an enmity as refuses even to admit the necessity of such a substitute. How true then, how emphatic the statement—'justified freely by his grace!' Grace is the origin, freeness is the character of the blessing. Grace gave it birth; freeness sends it forth in universal offer, and for gratuitous acceptance. Grace is the fountain-head; freeness is the channel bearing down within its flooded banks to the parched wilderness, the waters of salvation, 'without money and without price.' Ho, every one that thirsteth! come ye to the waters.

—
TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Do we then make void the law through faith?
God forbid: yea, we establish the law,' Rom.
iii. 31.

'It is of the nature of transgressors and criminals,' says an acute divine, 'to bear a grudge and prejudice against the law, because the law is against them.' How then does the transgressor and criminal, in the person of the objector, whom the apostles addresses in the text, come to stand up for the law? Because he has not seen it to be against him. He has not been personally condemned by it; or if he has, he thinks that after condemning, it may yet, in the end, acquit and justify him—a nation not tending much to the honour and establishment of the law. But this answer, besides accounting for their self-contradictory zeal for the law, on the part of the legalist, and the unimpressed by a sense of sin, serves to establish the converse of the above quotation, namely, that it is of the nature of righteous and justified persons to have a favour and love for the law, because the law is for them. The legalist and personally uncondemned by sin, presumptuously think that the law is, or at least may, in the end be for them. Hence they can have a zeal for the law. The justified by faith know that the law is already for them, and cannot be against them; and therefore they cannot but be in love with, and be zealous for the law. But while both are zealous for the law, the zeal of the one proceeds upon a virtual making void the law; the zeal of the other has its origin in a complete and glorious establishment of the law. Why is it that the legalist and impenitent bear no grudge nor prejudice against the law? Because they think that it is not so high in its demands, nor so inflexible in the infliction of the penalty, as to be already conclusively against them; which is a virtual making void the law. For what greater dishonour can be done to a law, than first to break it, then to withhold its just vindication, and then to deny that ever it required the vindication sought? Faith, on the other hand, establishes the law in all its authority, meets all its demands, and manifests its unchangeableness. That faith does this for the law in the character of judge, none who know the object of that faith can deny. That object is Christ, dying the 'just for the unjust,' 'magnifying the law, and making it honourable.' By his death he has shown that the moral Governor of the universe has not relaxed, but has rather, if we take into account the dignity of the Substitute, and the sufferings he endured, enhanced the demands of the law. He has shown what the legalist and impenitent have to expect, when they are summoned to answer personally, and on their own footing, at the law's magnified tribunal.—But it is not so much the authority of the law as judge, as its practical influence as the governor of human conduct, that is alleged to be made void by the doctrines of gratuitous justification; and it is not so much of its practical influence on the conduct of the impenitent—with respect to them its practical influence must be seen to be mightily augmented—as of its practical influence on the conduct of the believer of the doctrine, that the allegation is made. The believer is delivered from the law as a judge, and therefore, it is concluded, he is removed from its restraints as a governor of conduct. The conclusion is plausible. But if it be just, what is to be said of angels and glorified saints. They are delivered from the law as a judge; but are they delivered from it as a governor of conduct? And if it be possible for them to honour and obey the governor without fearing the judge, it follows, that fear of punishment is not the only motive fitted to secure obedience. Nay, if we contrast the obedience of heaven with obedience on earth, we will be disposed to conclude, that there must be some other means more effective in securing obedience, than that of the fear of punishment. Let a sovereign be loved; let his law be loved, because seen to be holy, just, and good; let the sovereign be viewed by the subject, not only as a just and affectionate governor, but as a personal friend, as a personal benefactor, as a father, and a more effective provision will be made for sincerity, uniformity, and ardour of obedience, than could be made by the most exact requirements and the severest penalties. Such then is the provision made by the gospel for securing the obedience of its subjects—love, gratitude, sense of obligation, delight in acting conformably to these sentiments, discomfort in acting contrary to them. The more a man is persuaded that has been justified freely by the grace of God, the more deeply are these sentiments felt, and the more actuating and sanctifying is their influence upon his heart and conduct. Besides, consider the nature and consequences of that spiritual change with which justifying faith is uniformly accompanied—a new birth, a new creation, all old things done away and all things become new, renewal in the spirit of the mind. Consider too the believer's privileges, hopes, and enjoyments; how quickening, strengthening, elevating, animating, and how utterly incompatible with the love and practice of sin! Nor is this all. The objection to gratuitous justification proceeds upon the supposition that the believer is freed from all fear of penalty. This is not true. He is indeed freed from fear of the final penalty, everlasting condemnation. But when he falls into sin, he falls into a pit, and mire, and under the power of a hated and much dreaded oppressor; his most satisfying joys are turned into bitterness of soul, and he subjects himself to the rod of an angry Providence. In these there is a restraining and actuating power, not to be found by the legalist in the distant and sometimes doubted penalty, however great.

---

TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness; that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus,' Rom. iii. 26.

God set forth his Son to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, for two ends: First, 'To declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past,'—that is, under the former dispensations—'through the forbearance of God.' The sins committed under the former dispensations God forbore to punish, in the prospect of Christ's propitiatory sacrifice for sin; and now that 'Christ, in the end of the world hath appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself,' it is seen from Christ set forth as a propitiation for those sins, that God's forbearance was not exercised at the expense of his justice; but that during the long exercise of the mercy of forbearance, respect was prospectively had to justice, in the appointed death of Jesus. How long and how sorely tried was His forbearance! Yet He waited to be gracious.

But if Christ, set forth as a propitiatory sacrifice for sin, declares that justice was not dethroned during the long reign of forbearance, under the patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations, that exhibition no less emphatically declares, Secondly, That justice is still enthroned with mercy in forgiving sin 'at this time,' that is, under the present dispensation. To declare at 'this time his righteousness,' &c. Had God forgiven the ungodly, and treated them as just persons, without any vindication of His law, He would have acted solely as a God of mercy, and from any thing we can see, would have done violence to His character as a God of justice. But he cannot at any instant, or in any matter, act from the impulse of one attribute so as to derogate from another. All his attributes must harmonize at every instant, and in every act. It is one of the distinguishing peculiarities of the gospel, one of those peculiarities which are far beyond the reach of human discovery, and therefore demonstrative of the gospel's heavenly origin, that in it mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other, in the salvation of the sinner; that in it God is just and the justifier—a just God and a Saviour. Christ has vindicated the law—magnified it and made it honourable. This he has done more fully and strikingly than could have been done by the death of the actual transgressor. Hereby God is declared just in pardoning.—But He is declared to be just, not only in pardoning, but in justifying and eternally rewarding the transgressor. Christ died not merely as a solemn warning that sin shall not escape unpunished, nor merely that the sinner might be delivered from the merited reward of his misdeeds. He died as our substitute: and not merely as a suffering substitute; nor merely as a vindicatory substitute, like one rebel chosen out of ten to suffer the last penalty of the law, in order to vindicate its authority while forgiving the other nine. He died as our meritorious substitute, that the pardoned might not only have their guilt removed and the penalty remitted, but that they might be invested with His perfect righteousness, and on the ground of its meritoriousness, have a claim, so to speak, on the justice of God for the reward which that meritoriousness has purchased—eternal life. God hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; not merely that we might not die the death of sinners, but that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. And made the righteousness of God in Him, how just is God in justifying and eternally rewarding the ungodly.'

We have said just in justifying the ungodly. But that term must be restricted by the phrase, 'him which believeth in Jesus;' that is, him that believeth in the necessity, reality, and sufficiency of Christ as a sin-atoning Saviour. But why so restricted? Because no satisfaction has been made; no satisfaction can be made to justice in behalf of him, who, after rebelling and after forgiveness has been offered, still perseveres in his rebellion. There must be first submission to its claims before justice can permit the forgiveness of the sinner. And no submission can be fuller and more honouring to justice, than is implied in faith in Jesus. It is the submission of the penitent, justice-adoring suppliant—of the suppliant confessing personal desert of punishment, humbly, gratefully, and eagerly, laying hold of the justice-honouring-substitute, and founding all his claim to mercy on the honour done to justice by the death of Jesus.

How great the encouragement thus held out to come and be reconciled to God! Every obstacle has been removed. All things are ready. God is waiting to be gracious. Fear not. 'Fury is not in me:—Let him take hold of my strength, that he may make peace with me: and he shall make peace with me.' 'There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus.' 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'

But how wretched, how hopeless is a state of unbelief! Unmitigated, fearfully aggravated justice, claiming the impenitent and unbelieving as its own! No more sacrifice for sin! Fiery indignation which shall devour the adversary! What so fitted to alarm! Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?

---

TWENTY-NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies,' Psal. ciii. 2—4.

The same words have sometimes a very different meaning in the lips of different men. These words may be used not without an important meaning, and not without feeling, even by the unbeliever: but how far short do both the meaning and the feeling come of those of the consciously reconciled and devout believer! The gratitude of the one is the gratitude of the natural man for blessings to the animal nature; the gratitude of the other is the gratitude of the spiritual man for blessings to the spiritual nature. It is his spiritual nature—his soul, that he addresses, when the Psalmist says, 'Who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases,' &c.

To the believer the soul is the chief object of concern. For what is life? It is a vapour—unsubstantial, evanescent. What is all time itself when compared unto eternity? It is but a fleeting moment. And what makes eternity to come more awful than eternity gone by? The soul—the soul lying under the curse of its iniquities. Give him deliverance from these, and every other deliverance will be very vanity in his estimation. But deliverance he has obtained—deliverance from iniquities already committed; and, as iniquities are daily committed—for every little sin has in his sight the magnitude of an iniquity—they are by faith and penitence, daily remitted. Hence the song of gratitude, 'Bless the Lord, O my soul: who forgiveth all thine iniquities;' who not only has forgiven, so as to accept in the Beloved, but continues to forgive, so as to bless in the Beloved.

Not, however, that his iniquities, when committed, leave the soul scatheless as soon as the prayer of penitence has been uttered, and the promise of forgiveness has by faith been appropriated. They inflict painful and sometimes festering wounds upon the soul, which sicken and predispose it to farther iniquity. But there is the healing Spirit, who mollifies the wounds, and gradually restores to perfect soundness. Hence the next clause in his song: 'Who healeth all thy diseases.' 'I said, Lord, be merciful unto me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee.' 'O Lord my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me.'

If from want of watchfulness, and from want of prayer for forgiveness and for the healing and sanctifying Spirit, the soul, as sometimes happens, has been brought to the very verge of destruction; if the wounds inflicted by sin have been allowed to fester, overspread, and eat in to the very vitals;—in such an extremity God does not desert him, but gives him reason to add this to his other ascriptions: 'Who redeemeth my life from destruction.' 'Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world;' and, 'The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation.'

But besides the negative blessings of deliverance from guilt, from spiritual disease, and deadly apostacy, there are positive blessings—'Kindnesses and mercies.' And how precious these kindnesses and mercies! Trebly precious! Precious in themselves—precious from their source—precious from their abundance and their dignity!

—Precious in themselves. They are not only the kindnesses and mercies of deliverance from the fears and discomforts of conscious guilt, but of settled, soothing peace, of animating hope, of beautifying joy—of settled, soothing peace, for 'his soul shall dwell at ease;' and it is the peace of God which passeth all understanding,—of animating hope, for 'it entereth within the veil,'—of animating joy, for 'we rejoice in hope of the glory of God,' 'rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.'

—Precious in their source. They are loving-kindnesses and tender-mercies—the mercies of a loving, the kindnesses of a tender heart;—not the kindnesses of the churl, which are cold as snow in winter; but the kindnesses of a father, which are as the dew upon the tender grass;—not the fitful mercies of a tyrant, like gleams of sunshine in a tempestuous day, but the tender mercies of the mother's heart, yearning with affection over her sickly babe. 'As the eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the Lord.'

—Precious from their plenty and their dignity: 'Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies.'—The crown is the emblem of plenty: 'Thou crownest the year with thy goodness.' Accordingly, the kindnesses and mercies of the gospel are not given with the sparing hand of the needy or the niggard. They are given as the givings of the God of harvest—outpouringly and seasonably.—The crown is the emblem of victory: 'He is not crowned except he strive lawfully.' The victory then, and its attendant honours, are the believer's; and the believer's from the Lord.—'We are more than conquerors;' and, 'Victory is of the Lord; He giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

Well then may the believer exclaim, in a sense infinitely higher, and with sentiments infinitely purer and more elevated than the most grateful worldling: Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits—forget not all his benefits. To remember all is impossible:

'Eternity's too short to utter all thy praise.'

But, O my soul forget not all his benefits. Justified freely! Justified by Immanuel's righteousness! Sanctified wholly, in body, soul, and spirit! Preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ! Glorified! Crowned! Precious privileges and glorious hopes. Bless the Lord, O my soul.

THIRTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

'Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life,' Rom. v. 18.

'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' All have sinned. In what sense? In the same sense in which Adam sinned? that is, actually? No, not in every instance: 'Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression. In what sense then have all sinned? All have sinned in Adam as their federal head: 'By one man's disobedience many were made sinners;' and, 'By the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation.' 'In Adam all die.'—As to the extent of the penalty, it is worthy of special notice that it is called 'condemnation,'—not natural death only, but condemnation. It is not only said, 'Through the offence of one many be dead;' but, 'The judgment was by one to condemnation.'

Such is the result of our headship in Adam. But Adam 'is the figure of him that was to come;' that is, as Adam was our federal head bringing us into condemnation, he was a figure or type of Christ our federal head, bringing us into a state of righteousness and salvation—Christ, 'the second man,' 'the last Adam.' 'As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.'

But is the headship in both co-extensive? The text implies that it is. But in what sense? It cannot be supposed that upon every one condemned in Adam, the justification of life will so come, as that he shall be justified and saved, whatever may be his personal faith and character, whether believing or unbelieving, saint or impenitent sinner. Such a supposition would contradict the plainest dictates both of reason and scripture. 'The free gift,' says Calvin on this text, 'is made common to all, inasmuch as it is offered to all; not because it is actually bestowed upon all. For, although Christ suffered for the sins of the whole world, and is offered to all without distinction, yet all do not lay hold upon him.' But a more complete and consistent sense is found by keeping the federal headship in view. Through Adam condemnation has come upon all of whom he is the head. Through Christ, the free gift unto justification of life has come upon all of whom he is the head, namely, his body the church. This interpretation accounts for the 'all' of the text, being spoken of as 'the many,' in verses 15 and 19; and it accounts for the restriction contained in the 17th verse, where those who shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ, are described as 'they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness.'

Let not, however, anxiety to establish particular interpretations of controverted words or clauses in this or any text, tempt us to overlook the undoubted and apparent truth which it contains. Judgment is here declared to have come upon all men to condemnation. Sad truth! yet certain. It is judgment to condemnation by the righteous God: 'And shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' And if it originally came by the offence of one; it has been a thousand times incurred and confirmed anew 'by many personal offences.' But the sadness needs not be the sadness of discontent or despair: for, 'As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men to justification of life.' Here we have justification sufficient to meet and answer all the wants implied in condemnation,—justification free and universal in offer; free, universal, and sure in effectual application to every one that believeth. If we are condemned in Adam, and on account of personal guilt, along with Adam; 'There is now no condemnation,' there is justification of life—a life-giving justification, 'to them that are in Christ Jesus.' 'Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.' Wonder, O heavens, and give ear, O earth! 'God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

THIRTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins,' John viii. 24.

THE command to believe, is sometimes so understood as greatly to obscure the specific duty implied in it. Considered in itself, to believe is an act of the mind by which we embrace and rely upon as true, all that the Bible says respecting Christ. Considered in connection with its fruits, it comprehends, along with the act of the mind technically called faith, the whole of what is usually denominated obedience. In themselves, however, faith and obedience are perfectly distinct. Yet they are sometimes so confounded and lost the one in the other, that there is no correct conception of either. The result of this is, either that the command, believe, is considered as being identical with the command, obey, and a less explicit form of it; or, faith is assigned a subordinate importance as compared to obedience, being considered merely as the means, or rather as a means unto the great end obedience. It is not considered, as it ought to be, as being in itself an end, as being in itself a distinct and specific command, so distinct and so specific as sometimes to be put in direct contrast to the command, obey. It is not considered as being the command, obedience, to which is the turning point of our salvation. When our Lord put the question to the two blind-men, Believe ye that I am able to do this? and when he said to the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe; the faith required had no reference to obedience. Also, when our Lord said to Peter, 'O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt?' and to the disciples, 'Have faith in God; for verily I say unto you, that whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith;'—it was a state of mind and heart alone which was required. Now, the faith which justifies and saves is as specific in its nature, and as much an act of the mind and heart alone, as was the faith by which miracles were wrought or received. When the apostle says, 'They have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God,' Rom. x. 3, he evidently speaks of a mental, and not of a moral act; for these words stand opposed to ignorance of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness. And says he elsewhere, 'To him that worketh not, but believeth, his faith is counted for righteousness.' 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth,—not worketh, nor worketh and believeth taken conjunctively, but believeth taken distinctively.' Hence the prominence and importance given to faith in the word of God. It is called 'the work,' and 'God's commandment' by way of eminence. 'This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.' This 'is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ.' Let us then beware of confounding what the apostle calls the 'obedience of faith,' that is, of believing—of yielding assent unto the truth, with the obedience of works. Let us not suppose that we are obedient to the truth as it is in Jesus, merely because we are doing our little utmost to be obedient to the moral law; which little utmost we may try to do, while Christ is not in all our thoughts, or there, only as a subject of doubt and speculation, if not of positive denial. Let us listen to his words in their specific, strictest sense, 'If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins.'

If any man be disposed to say that he has no power over his belief; the inveterate drunkard or libertine urges the same excuse; he says he has no power over his practice. No man can bid away his evil propensities by a mere effort of the will; and it is equally admitted, that no man can, by a mere effort of the will, bid away his unbelief. Means must be employed. Means will be effectual in both cases. And the first means is, to cease cherishing, either by thought or deed, the evil which is desired to be eradicated. Ceasing to do evil is a preparatory, and the most important step in learning to do well, in matters of speculation as well as in matters of practice. If faith in the gospel be desired—and who would not desire to have a firm faith in its sanctifying truths and glorious promises?—avoid every thing that is hostile to it, and welcome every thing that is friendly.

As another preparatory means, let us examine the heart whether it be right toward God, and willing to receive truth from whatever quarter, and however humbling. The heart and not the understanding is the stronghold of unbelief. Therefore, let pride and prejudice, and above all, the love and practice of sin, be renounced; let humility, piety, love of truth, and a sacred regard to the dictates of conscience, become the cherished inmates of the breast; after, or along with this preparatory process, let the understanding be directed to the investigation of the truth of scripture, and to the study of scripture truth, under a solemn impression of the momentous importance of the inquiry, and with earnest prayer to the God of truth, that he would aid, direct, and bless our inquiries. Let these means be employed, and then let us say whether it be true that we have no power over our belief. A modification, or an entire change of our former creed, will be inevitable. We have not, it is true, such a command over our belief, as to be able to determine, beforehand, what will be its precise complexion;—and yet what a command have even sceptics over their belief, and with what facility and certainty can they mould it to their prejudices and passions, when they allow themselves to be led by these! We may not be able to determine, beforehand, what will be the precise result as to our belief; but surely we would be no more entitled, on this account, to say that we have no power over it, than the merchant would be entitled to say that he has no power over his lot in life, because he cannot predict what will be the precise issue of his speculations in business. We may not be able to determine, beforehand, the truths which our creed will contain: but one truth we may predict that it will contain, namely, that we are sinner. If we are sinners, and if Christ be no Saviour, we shall die in our sins, for there is none other name under heaven laying claim to such a character. If Christ be a divinely appointed Saviour, he says, 'If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins.'

M A Y.

FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified,' Gal. ii. 16.

It is objected against the doctrine of justification by faith, that it is inconsistent with rational views of God's moral government. Is not God, it is asked, a God of justice, and is it not essential to his character as such, to reward virtue and punish vice? What therefore, it is concluded, but personal obedience or disobedience can be the ground of our acceptance or rejection by God? The truth of the premises is undeniable; and we proceed upon this admission to show the inadmissibility of the conclusion. God, it is said, is a God of justice, and must reward virtue and punish vice. This we admit; but so far from concluding as the objector does, we argue to the very contrary. That the argument may be the better understood let the following distinction be attended to, namely, the distinction between obedience considered in itself, and obedience as found in the person of a responsible agent. If it be asked, will not God reward obedience? We answer, most certainly. But if it be asked, will not every one in whom obedience is found be finally approved of and rewarded by God? We cannot give an immediate or unqualified answer to such a question. We must first know whether it be a complete, or only a partial and imperfect obedience. Bring before a just king a man who has been for many years a loyal and blameless subject, but during all these years has been an undetected murderer, and will it not become a question, whether his blamelessness, since the murder was committed, entitles him to the life and privileges which his life has already forfeited?—not to speak of the reward to which the uniformly obedient are entitled; to that he can have no imaginable claim. Is obedience entitled to a reward? is one question. Is man's obedience entitled to a reward? is another and very different question. That God will reward the obedience of a race of innocents is certain. That he will reward the obedience of a race of sinners; that is, that he will overlook their sins, and deal with them only for their obedience, our very reason tells us is by no means certain. Nay, if reason gives us any certainty at all in the matter, it is that the sinner must be reckoned with as well for his sins as for his partial obedience, for it is as essential a part of justice to punish as to reward. The conclusion to which we are hereby driven is, that if we have already forfeited our life by sin, we cannot claim its restoration at the hand of justice, and that the inevitable result of our trial on the ground of obedience and disobedience must be our condemnation.

But it will be said, that while the justice of God rewards our good deeds, the mercy of God will forgive our bad ones. In reply we observe, 1. That if it be as essential a part of justice to punish as to reward, then if mercy be extended, it comes not as a matter of right, but wholly as a matter of grace. 2. That if a man, by transgression, incur the penalty of a broken law, the utmost that his subsequent good conduct can claim at the hand of justice is a mitigation of the punishment, not its remission, far less a positive reward. But what we need, as sinners, is not a mitigation of the punishment proportioned to the number of our good deeds. That the justice of God will grant even to the finally condemned. What we need, as sinners, is the entire forgiveness of our sins, and complete restoration to the divine favour. And shall we go to justice for such a gift as this? And if we go to mercy, shall we insist on mercy bestowing as a matter of right what it can give only as a matter of favour. If we go to justice we must take what alone justice can give—a complete reward for a complete obedience, an unmitigated punishment for unmitigated disobedience, or a mitigated punishment, yet still a punishment, for an imperfect obedience. If we go to mercy for remission either of an unmitigated or mitigated punishment, we must go renouncing all claim of right, and receive, as a free and unmerited favour, whatever mercy is willing to bestow. So that for a sinner to speak of personal merit as the ground of his acceptance with God, is the grossest folly, not to say impiety. To speak thus, argues a state of heart utterly unbecoming the transgressor—a state of heart which is the essential element of impenitence. If then there must be the exercise of mercy in our acceptance by God, is it any dishonour done to justice to consult and answer its claims in the method by which the mercy is vouchsafed? Yet this is precisely what justification by faith does. It is a method of acceptance devised and prescribed by God, for the express purpose that he might be a just God, and at the same time a Saviour. It does honour to justice, by inflicting its penalty on an altogether willing and all-meritorious substitute; and by requiring an humble and adoring acknowledgment by faith on our part, that such a vindication of the claims of justice was indispensable to our salvation. Far, therefore, from justification by faith being derogatory to the justice of God in the moral government of the world, it is the only way in which we can be saved in consistency with that attribute; and so far are we from being able to be justified by the works of the law, that we have already been condemned by them. We will never have views of the moral government of the universe consistent in themselves, honouring to God, and comforting to our souls, till we can say with the apostle, 'Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.'

—
FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith,' Phil. iii. 9.

SALVATION, from its very nature, must be of grace, and not of merit, and we must look for it, not to justice, but to mercy, to mercy pacifying justice.

But in what does this salvation consist, and what must we do in order to become partakers of it?

Has the gospel only made provision for the forgiveness of the past, and left us to work out and merit anew the salvation of the soul? On such a supposition salvation would be impossible. For let God enter into judgment with us after our belief of such a gospel, and who could stand the scrutiny of his righteous judgment? We must inevitably be condemned and perish, just as before the proclamation of such a gospel.

But it may perhaps be thought, that while such a gospel provides for the forgiveness of the sins that are past, it provides also for the relaxing of God's severity of justice in judging for the time to come, makes him less strict in entering into judgment with us, nay, makes an imperfect obedience meritorious. If this be supposed, it follows that the effect of the death of Christ has been to prove, that God must have been too strict before, and convicts him of injustice in originally exacting from us more than an imperfect obedience. If God has entered into judgment with us on the principles of strict unbending justice, and on these principles, has declared that condemnation hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned; and if he afterwards departs from such a strictness, lets down the demands of his law, and enters into judgment with us, and justifies us on less strict principles; then, one of two things must follow; either he was unjust to us in pronouncing condemnation in the first instance, or he was unjust to his own law in pronouncing justification in the second instance; that is, he must either be an unrighteous Governor exacting more than he can justly demand, or a fickle and inconsistent governor, beginning his government on one principle, and unable on account of its severity to carry it out, ending it with another and less stringent principle. One or other of these conclusions must be arrived at if we entertain the idea that the gospel provides for the relaxing of the strictness of God's justice in judging us for the time to come. The impiety of both conclusions should make us turn with horror from the premises.

But how are these conclusions to be escaped? By being 'found in Christ, not having our own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.' 'Found in him,' we are able to meet the strictest demands of justice. In him we have suffered the penalty of the law, and obtain remission for the past. In him we have a perfect righteousness sufficient to meet all, even the highest demands for the future. And it is no relaxing of justice to deal with us as found in such a substitute. His death is more demonstrative of the unchangeableness of the law, and more honouring to its prerogatives, than the death of the actual transgressor. His righteousness is infinitely more meritorious as a ground of acceptance than that of any creature, even the most innocent and exalted. It is 'the righteousness which is of God.' Found therefore in Christ, 'not having our own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ,' the justice of God, instead of being relaxed or impaired, is confirmed and magnified in our salvation. What an emphasis does this view of salvation by the gospel, give to the words of Paul! 'And, O God, grant that I through faith may be enabled to appropriate them.' 'We have no confidence in the flesh. Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more. But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.'

—
SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away,' Isa. lxiv. 6.

HERE are three of the most distinguishing features of the genuine penitent,—self-loathing, self-reunciation, sense of estrangement from God and of consequent spiritual impotency.

1. Self-loathing. 'We are all as an unclean thing.' It is of the nature of uncleanness to be insensible to its own defilement. The swine is not only an unclean, but an unconsciously unclean beast. It has a sense of its own, but that sense seems to find gratification equally in the unclean and the clean. So is it with the impenitent. He is insensible to spiritual defilement, either in himself, or in his sinful enjoyments. He has a sense of right and wrong, of happiness and misery; but by that sense he can know only, and that but partially, the punishment of sin, or at most, its worthiness of punishment. He cannot, while impenitent, feel its offensiveness as a self-polluting uncleanness. Consciousness of guilt may make him a fearful or suffering, but not a self-loathing culprit. But let him be renewed in the spirit of his mind, and what formerly seemed to him a mere scripture hyperbole, or perhaps a calumny against our nature, will be seen and felt to be a certain and humbling truth. Let his eyes be opened to the holiness of God, and like Job, too much a self-approver before the appearing of the Holy One, he will be brought to exclaim, 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' Let him by faith be brought to the great High Priest of our profession, to have his character, as a sinner, judicially pronounced, and like the leper with his clothes rent, his head bare, and a covering upon his upper lip, he shall be constrained to cry out, Unclean, Unclean.

2. Nor will it be uncleanness of person only, but uncleanness of covering, that will then be discovered and confessed. 'All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags,' tainted with the leprosy of sin.—It would seem that it is possible to form too low an estimate of the value of our righteousnesses in the sight of God. Let a man form ever so low an estimate of his benefactions towards his fellow-men, and he will be commended not less for his humility than for his beneficence. He may be thought more humble than necessary; yet his very excess of humility will command reverence; while a self-complacency, less even than an exact estimate of his benefactions would warrant, will provoke envy and detraction. But it is, and if we are to be taught by the wise in this world, it ought to be otherwise, when we speak of righteousness in the sight of God. We must not, it seems, suppose that the humility and self-renunciation which commend us to our fellow-men are acceptable and well-pleasing in the sight of God. Let us speak of the worthlessness of our good deeds done to our neighbour, and the stronger our language, and the greater our sincerity in using it, the greater will be our commendation. But let us speak of the worthlessness of our good deeds as done to the holy heart-searching God, and the stronger our language, and the deeper our sincerity, the greater will be our reprobation—the stronger our language, the more will we be deemed hypocrites; the deeper our sincerity, the more will we be deemed fools and fanatics. But, O my God! be mine the sincerity of such hypocrisy! be mine the wisdom of such folly! Enter not into judgment with thy servant. Mine innocence I have worn to rags. My moralities, my charities, my prayers, my love, my zeal, my holiest, heavenliest frames of mind and heart have been leavened, leprosid, and polluted by sin; and they all need the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus, and thy forgiving mercy. Be mine the righteousness of the Redeemer. All my righteousnesses are as filthy rags.

3. But whence this all-pervading and polluting sinfulness? From our estrangement from God, from our inherent depravity, and from our consequent spiritual impotency for what is truly and only good. 'We all do fade as a leaf,' and our iniquities like the wind have carried us away.' The primary application of this text is without doubt to the Jewish nation; and therefore the withering of the leaf, and its dispersion by the wind, evidently describe the withering of their national energies, and their dispersion as a people by a sin-avenging providence. But the figure no less aptly describes the character and condition of the whole human race. In all, the green leaf is seared, has lost its freshness and vitality, is severed from the parent stem, and if left to itself, is susceptible of nothing but tossing and corruption. In other words, a blight has passed upon the mental, and moral faculties, and spiritual sensibilities of every human being; and the energy that remains is an energy which, if left to itself, inevitably tends to corruption in morality and religion. This tendency all history and personal experience prove, and sadly exemplify. This the true penitent has come to know experimentally. He sees what he should have been, and where he should have been, and how far and how violently he has been driven away by the gusts of evil passion within, and the current of evil influences and example without. He sees how when he was living in rebellion, all his actions were the actions of a rebel, and partook, some more, some less, but all in some degree of the spirit and offensiveness of rebellion. He is sensible, too, of this offensiveness belonging not only to himself, but to all his fellow-men; and penitentially confesses in the words of the prophet, 'We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; we are all withered away like a leaf, and our iniquities like the wind have carried us away.'

SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see,'
Rev. iii. 18.

THERE are two kinds of riches spoken of in the Bible. There are the 'deceitful,' 'uncertain,' and 'unprofitable' riches;—The deceitful, which prompt the rich farmer's soliloquy, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry;' but 'to whom God said, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee:'—the uncertain, that 'are not for ever,' and that 'take to themselves wings and flee away:'—the unprofitable, 'that are kept by the owners thereof to their hurt,' and that 'profit not in the day of wrath.' Such were the riches of the rich man, who was clothed in purple, and fared sumptuously every day, but afterwards lifted up his eyes in hell being in torments, and saw the once mendicant and diseased, but now glorified Lazarus afar off in Abraham's bosom.

In contrast to these, there are 'the treasures in heaven,'—'the true riches,'—'the durable riches and righteousness,'—'the riches,' 'the exceeding riches of his grace,'—'the riches of the glory of his inheritance,'—'the unsearchable riches of Christ.' These last are the only riches worthy of the name. All past experience has proved the deceitfulness, uncertainty, and unprofitableness of the former. All Christian experience, and the word of God, have proved the truth, the durability and unsearchableness of the latter,—proved them to be gold tried in the fire.

Again, there are two kinds of raiment mentioned in scripture; the 'rags of righteousness,' and 'the garments spotted by the flesh;' in contrast to which we have 'the wedding garment,' 'the garment of salvation,' 'the robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb.' The former is the clothing of spiritual poverty and impurity; the latter is the clothing of divinity—spotless purity—'fine linen, clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints.'

With respect both to the riches and the raiment, there are those who are disposed to say, 'I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing.' But to such, 'The Amen, the true and faithful Witness,' saith, 'Thou knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.' Thou sayest I am rich—rich already, and have need of nothing. Thou sayest I am rich—rich in and of myself, and need not depend upon another. But the Amen saith, Thou art poor—thy riches are poverty; thou art poor—poor in and of thyself—thou and not another. I counsel thee, take my advice, and lean not to thine own understanding, for he that trusteth to his own heart, especially in such matters, is a fool. I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in a fire, in which your gold would be consumed to ashes; and white raiment without a spot, and in which there is no rent through which the shame of thy nakedness can appear. Thou hast nothing with which to buy, for thou art poor. But my invitation is the old invitation of the prophet, Come, buy, without money and without price.

—Buy of me, and what thou receivest without money and without price, shall be as rightfully thine own, as if it were an actual purchase. Thou art blind, blind to thy poverty and nakedness, to my riches, and the glory of my regal vestments. But I have an eye-salve. Come and anoint thine eyes that thou mayest see.

How kind, how forbearing the Redeemer, towards the pride of self-sufficiency! 'I counsel thee.' It might have been an indignant 'I command thee.' But 'my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord.'

How pure, how precious, how lasting, the blessings of the gospel! Gold, gold tried in the fire, seven times purified. Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth. Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven.

How condescending the Holy One, to disrobe himself of his divinity, and invest himself with our humanity, that he might weave for us the robes of righteousness and immortality!

'How bright these glorious spirits shine!
Whence all their white array!
How came they to the blissful seats,
Of everlasting day!
Lo! these are they from sufferings great,
Who came to realms of light,
And in the blood of Christ have washed
Those robes which shine so bright.'

How conformable the grace of the gospel to our necessities! Vain is the light of the brightest sun to the darkened eyeball—vain the most glorious promise to the unbelieving heart. How suitable then the eye-salve of spiritual influence! that we may see and believe, believe and rejoice in 'that light, with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.' But the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not. Yet they say, We see. Yes, they see enough to condemn them, but not enough to save them. Therefore their sin remaineth.

THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father,'
Rom. viii. 15.

THE spirit of bondage is the spirit which actuates the bond-slave, and that spirit is fear and crouching servility. The bond-slave is his master's property. His sinews are his master's substance, and he can claim no reward. His master may feed him; but he may do so, just as the manufacturer does his machine—to keep him going. The chief difference between the bond-slave and the machine is, that the machine is inanimate, but the bond-slave can feel, and fear, and hate—feel the rod, fear its infliction, hate its inflictor.

Such is the spirit of bondage, and it aptly describes the state of the unreconciled sinner's heart towards God and his law. God is to him clad in terrors—a consuming fire, and he cannot think of God without disquietude. The just requirements of God's law he feels to be severe and imperious exactions, and his toilsome endeavours to fulfil them bring no reward. From the lash of the law he cannot escape, and its lacerations whet his spirit into real, though it may be unconscious hatred of the authority by which they are inflicted. But, says the apostle, 'Ye have not received the spirit of bondage, but the Spirit of adoption;' that is, the Spirit of love and confidence; and these, in their most endearing and confidential form.

The love is endearing, for it is the love of the loving child toward the loving parent. But it is more. It is confidential, for it is the love of the loving son toward the loving father. A son loves his mother with the love of tender endearment; but he loves his father with the love of endearing confidence. His father has power to protect him, and promote his happiness, as well as, like his mother, the inward emotions of disinterested affection. Hence the twin sentiments, love and confidence.

Nor are these less ardent, because they are the offspring of adoption, and not of natural relationship. Adoption, when complete, gives all that natural relationship can give, with this additional incentive to love and confidence; that it is on self, as an outcast and perishing, that its gifts and affection are bestowed. When were the filial love and confidence of the prodigal more deeply and strongly felt? Was it when his father gave him the portion of goods that fell to him, and with an embrace permitted him to take his leave on his journey of prodigality? Was it not rather, when, after having forfeited his sonship, his father had compassion on him, and ran and fell upon his neck, and kissed him, and adopted him anew into his family, with formal investiture and rejoicings; saying, 'Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found.' But this is precisely the adoption vouchsafed to the estranged but returning child of God. 'We are all his offspring' by nature, but have lost our filial affection, and have become, estranged from him and his unfallen family by sin. Yet, let us remember that he is our Father still, and return to him by true repentance, and he will freely reinstate us in all our former honour and happiness, and near relationship unto himself. By the Spirit of adoption he will cause us to feel towards him a love, and to address him with a confidence, all the greater that he condescends rejoicingly to say of us, 'This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found.'

Abba, Father! Is this language the privilege of the believer? Is it language prompted 'by the Spirit which proceedeth from the Father?' Lord, help our unbelief. Let the Spirit also 'help our infirmities, and make intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered.'

'Then let us, with a filial heart,
Come boldly to the throne
Of grace supreme, to tell our griefs,
And all our wants make known.

'That mercy we may there obtain
For sins and errors past,
And grace to help in time of need,
While days of trial last.

'Then let our hearts no more despond,
Our hands be weak no more:
Still let us trust our Father's love,
His wisdom still adore.'

THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

'And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ,' Rom. viii. 17.

IN order to our comfort, our enjoyment of the faith which we profess, and our freedom and pleasure in keeping the commandments, it is of the utmost consequence that we have a firm and realizing persuasion of the privileges which belong to ourselves as believers.

We say, to ourselves as believers. For, while we do not doubt that believers are the children of God, we may be in great and habitual doubt whether such a character and such privileges belong to ourselves. This doubt may arise, not so much from conscious want of faith, as from conscious defectiveness in our obedience, and therefore we add,—to ourselves as believers,—as believers, not as workers. There is a tendency to connect our adoption and its privileges with works instead of faith; and being unable to satisfy ourselves that we have worked enough to assure ourselves that they are ours, we can never come to have a satisfying persuasion of our personal adoption. Whereas, were we to connect our adoption, as the Bible does, with our faith alone, the reality and strength of which is so easily ascertainable, we should have less difficulty in discovering that we are personally, and in very deed, the sons of God; and we should then enjoy the happiness of being conscious of such exalted and promising relationship. Let us first ascertain that we really believe; let us then take for granted, as a heaven-ordained consequence, that we are sons and heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. Let us habitually dwell upon the honours and the rights with which we are invested, and the inconceivably blessed prospects, which, with the certainty and rightfulness of an inheritance, await us; and how great will then be the comfort and enjoyment which our faith will afford us! how strong will then be the inducements to walk in all the statutes and ordinances of the Lord blameless! and how great our freedom and delight in doing so! Obedience will then flow from a cherished persuasion of our adoption, and not from a vain attempt to found our adoption on our obedience. If great or habitual subjection to any sin create in us a doubt, as it may well do, of the reality of our faith, and so of our adoption; we will thereby be led to entertain the question anew, and all the more earnestly and searchingly, on account of our backsliding, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God.' But although disobedience may prompt such a question, obedience cannot answer it. The heart alone can answer. Obedience may fortify the answer of the heart, but it cannot supply it when wanting. It may keep out doubt from the heart already believing, but it is no certain indication of faith in the heart that is unconscious of believing.

But, not only are we entitled, and (if we consult our happiness and progress in holiness,) called upon, to argue directly from our faith to our adoption. We are also entitled to argue from our adoption to all that that word implies; namely, heirship, heirship to him who has been pleased to adopt us, co-heirship with him, in and through whom we are adopted. If sons then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ.

—Heirs, that is, sure expectants of an inheritance. Nay, legal claimants; if we consider the economy of the gospel, and the relationship to the Disposer of the inheritance, into which the gospel brings us. According to the law of nature the son is the legal heir of the father. The gospel is no exception. Nature is in this an illustration of grace. If sons then heirs.

Heirs of whom? Heirs of God, that is, legal claimants and expectants, deriving our claims and expectations from him who is the source of all law, authority, and power, and whose will as Testator is sealed with the seal of immutability, and ratified by the blood of his own dear Son. If sons, then heirs, heirs of God.

But heirs of what? Of all the good that is in God, up to our utmost capacity of receiving. God is the portion of his people. He is 'the possessor of heaven and earth,'—'all in all;' and therefore an all-sufficient portion. He is 'from everlasting to everlasting,' and says, 'I change not;' therefore a never-ending portion. He has 'all power in heaven and earth;' therefore an inalienable portion. No power can wrest it from us. Omnipotence is pledged to its preservation and perpetuation. 'Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none on earth whom I desire besides thee.' But see another bulwark of our faith and hope:

—'Joint heirs with Christ,' that is, having our expectations built not only on our own adoption, but on his eternal sonship. We are in him. His heirship is our heirship. We are joint-heirs. 'The glory which thou gavest me I have given them.' Nor are our expectations founded on relationship only, but on the rights of purchase. He redeemed us by his precious blood; and it is the privilege of the bought, as well as of the buyer, to urge the payment that has been made. Nay more, our rights and expectations are those of actual possession by our head and representative. 'He has arisen the first-fruits of them that sleep.' Heaven is our inheritance, 'whither our forerunner has for us entered.' 'I go to prepare a place for you. And, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.' 'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?' or, 'from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord?' 'the eyes of our understanding being enlightened, that we may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints.' 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again,' as sons and heirs, 'unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; to an inheritance, incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.'

FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God,' 1 John iii. 1.

'THE sons of God! what tongue can tell
The glory and the grace,
These little words are teeming with
For our rebellious race!
The sons of God! what heart can know
The greatness of that love,
Which speaks in words so comforting
To man, from heaven above!

—'To man, so worm-like, so defiled,
So long the slave of sin,
So hostile to his Saviour, God,
When striving him to win.
—To man from heaven, so oft defied,
By deed and daring thought;
Yet crying from its battlements,
A crown, a crown, for nought.

'Behold and wonder, O my soul;
Behold what love hath done!
Raised thee from vileness, and from flames,
To sonship and a throne.
Behold and wonder, O my soul;
And let the wonder wake Adoring raptures in my breast:
—My soul, O Spirit, take;

'In vision waft it to the realms,
All gloriously bright,
That I may see and wonder more,
And kindle at the sight;
And with the hosts above proclaim;
The love of God Most High;
The Sovereign of the myriads
Who Holy, Holy, cry.

'Love gave to that adoring throng,
Their crowns and harps of gold,
Their deathless life, their robes of light,
Their blessedness untold.
Love winged the cherub, fired the seraph;
Called them around the throne,
To sing and revel in the beams,
Mantling the Living One.'

'How great such love! but greater far,
Greater beyond compare,
The love of God to sinful men,
Who His salvation share.
That, is the benefactor's love,
This, of the insulted Lord,
Forgiving when he might have cursed,
As the deserved award.

'That, is the benefactor's love,
This, of the injured Father,
By love alluring rebels home,
Around his throne to gather.
That, is the benefactor's love,
This, of the Elder Brother;
That gives, this saves from death, then gives
The glories of the other.

'That, is the benefactor's love,
Who makes no sacrifice:
This, of Incarnate Deity,
Who saves by groans and cries;
Who stoops from regal dignity,
Among the hosts of heaven,
To die a more than mortal death,
That sin might be forgiven.

'That, is the love the angels know,
They long have felt its reign:
This, the great mystery divine,
Whose depths they sound in vain;
The mystery of God himself,
High as the heavens above,
Deep, as the lowest depths beneath,
Boundless,—for God is love.

'And is this love, a love for me?
This dignity and bliss!
Behold, and wonder, O my soul,
And love, with love like this.
And is this love, a love for you,
Ye perishing in sin?
Behold, and wonder, and believe,
And ye shall glory win.

'There is, there is, a land on high,
A resting-place, a home,
Where exiled hearts no more shall sigh,
Nor rebel passions roam.
Oh! give me then an eagle's wings,
Give me to soar away,
To that blessed land of light and love;
I'm weary of delay.

'Not that this life I would despise,
Or say, earth has no joys:
I know 'tis paradise regained
When grace sin's guilt destroys.
It is that I would weep no more,
Nor feel sin's deep disgrace;
It is that I would love still more,
And see my Father's face.

'And is it so! shall all my wo,
Cease there to gnaw my heart!
Shall mem'ry to oblivion throw,
The thoughts from which I smart!
Oh! hasten then, ye tardy hours,
Speed on my dying day;
Unveil the regions of the blessed,
Whose love knows no decay.'

FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is,' 1 John iii. 2.

A KING'S son, when in exile, has one consolation—the thought of his regal parentage. There is consolation in such a thought; especially if his exile be only for a time, and if he have the prospect of being ere long recalled to inherit his father's throne. Now is our exile: but we are the sons of God—of the King of kings; and we have the certain prospect of being ere long recalled to our Father's house—the regal mansion of the universe; and 'To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne.'

It doth not indeed appear what we shall be there; but our ignorance is not the ignorance of uncertainty. It is only the ignorance of imperfect knowledge; or rather, of incapacity of knowing. It does not appear, because it hath not been revealed. And it hath not been revealed, because we have not eyes to see—to take in the revelation were it made to us. But when he shall appear, then we shall have eyes to see; for, 'He shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.' Then we shall be like him—be beside him—see him as he is, with the unclouded vision of immortals.

And how transforming such a sight! Even here, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, believers 'are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.' But how much more gloriously transforming and assimilating will the beholding be, when through a glass darkly has become 'face to face.' The mortal countenance of Moses, when on the mount, caught such a dazzling radiance that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold it. But how perfect the glorious assimilation, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, when this earthly shall have put on the image of the heavenly, and when in glorified humanity we shall have been admitted not only to behold, as Moses did, the effulgence in which the Godhead is enthroned, but to enter that effulgence and behold 'face to face,' and see him as he is! We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.

This we know. With this knowledge let us rest satisfied. Were a king to send his son to the outskirts of his empire to tell some simple rustic that his father had called him to come and share with him the honours and pleasures of his palace, what would the rustic know of these, but that they were his, and that they surpassed his knowledge? He would know that they awaited him: and this would be enough to make him exultingly and thankfully await the knowledge of what they are. Though therefore it doth not appear what we shall be, we know that when He shall appear we shall be like him.

This we know. This knowledge let us cherish. Though not actual, it is certain knowledge. 'For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'

Though not minute, it is comprehensive knowledge. We shall be like him—terms comprehending all the holiness, the happiness, and glories of Divinity.

Though knowledge only in part, that which is perfect is a-coming. And though it doth not yet appear, it will soon appear what we shall be. He that cometh shall come and will not tarry:

'Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced Him.' Yes, they too shall see him, but it will be to be consumed by the brightness of His coming. The brightness which will transform the saint, will confound and consume the sinner. Summer-brightness transforms the grub into a winged daughter of the sun,

— 'Rising from their tombs

To higher life; by myriads, forth at once,
Swarming they pour; of all the varied hues
Their beauty-beaming parent can disclose.
Ten thousand forms! ten thousand different tribes!
People the blaze.'

But the same brightness parches the earth, shrivels up the grovelling worm, sets on fire the forest, and consumes, amid crackling horrors, every living thing within its dark recesses.— Emblem of the twofold power of the revealed glory of the Son of man. Rejoice, ye righteous, and say, Even so: come, Lord Jesus. Tremble, ye impenitent transgressors, for the hour is coming when ye shall say to the mountains and to the rocks, 'Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand.'

FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ; according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will,' Eph. i. 3—5.

Much in few words—a crowded yet perspicuous sentence, from a gorgeous passage of the word of God: in which the deepest mysteries, the highest sublimities, the richest blessings, the most glorious privileges, the most animating hopes, the most humbling, comforting, and sanctifying doctrines of our faith, are brought together, and presented to the eye of contemplation with the magnificence of mountain scenery—like mountain beyond mountain, and deep beyond deep, and all illumined with the softest, richest, and most gladdening sunshine. Each word is a theme, each clause has the comprehensiveness of a science. How full of rich and sublime truth the heart that could give it utterance with such copiousness, compactness, simplicity, and power!

God—God, even the Father—the Father of Jesus Christ—the Father of our Lord—hath blessed—blessed us—with spiritual blessings—with all spiritual blessings—blessings in heavenly places—in Christ! How boundless, how varied, how glorious, the field of contemplation presented to the reflecting mind! how elevating, quickening, beatifying, to the believing mind! Blessing, when we deserved the curse! blessing from such a Being—so great, so independent, and so glorious! blessing from such a Being in such a character, that of a Father—the Father of such a Son—of such a Son appointed to such an office, that of anointed Saviour and Lord of all, of all for us! blessings so pure, so numerous and comprehensive, and in such lofty regions! blessings for us; and therefore so full of condescension, so unmerited, so often forfeited; so personal too, and therefore so deeply interesting! blessings in Christ; and therefore so dearly purchased, so freely offered, and so secure and certain of bestowment! Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ.

But read again. He hath chosen us—chosen us in Him—before the foundation of the world—that we should be holy—without blame—holy and without blame before Him—and in love! And yet again. Predestinated us—unto the adoption of children—by Jesus Christ—to Himself—according to the good pleasure of his will!

Thought of!—made choice of!—made the subject of an irreversible decree, before the foundations of the earth were laid! Holiness of character and blamelessness of life, the end!—love the animating principle!—Himself the witness and the judge!—Adoption of children, the privilege!—God the adopting Father!—Jesus Christ the ratifying sacrifice, and indissolubly connecting bond of filiation!—and all according to the good pleasure of his will! What an aggregation of wonders for meditation; of obligations and incentives to gratitude; of encouragements to hope, and confidence, and joy; of motives to affectionate, zealous, and fruitful obedience! Can these things be in any measure apprehended and believed, and their influence be unfelt? Can such truths be lodged in the heart, without expanding, purifying, and giving an earnest of the heavenly inheritance? And can they be there and have such effects, without awakening an ardent gratitude? It was gratitude in the breast of Paul which brought these blessings together, and set them forth to view in this striking passage. It was the intensity of his gratitude which so clustered and condensed them; and it was that that intensity might become still more intense, that in blessing God he recounts the magnitude and multiplicity of his obligations. May mine be a like gratitude, and may it be quickened by a like apprehension and concentration of my obligations in all their magnitude and multiplicity.

FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God,' Rom. viii. 16.

WE can reason directly from our faith to our adoption. If we can truly say, I believe, we can as truly say, I am a child of God, and an heir of glory. But here we have a more experimental evidence to the same effect—the witness of the Spirit. The one is a conclusion drawn from a state of mind. The other is an impression made, as by a seal, upon the heart. 'After ye believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance.' Faith entitles us to conclude—I am a son. But after this, and along with this, the Spirit impresses on the heart the confidence and affections of a son. The one is a persuasion, the other a pledge—a pledge in three ways :

1st. As a gift. A gift from a father to a child is an evidence to the child that the father loves him, and acknowledges him as a son. The Spirit is in an eminent sense the gift of the Father; and we are expressly told, that He is given in consequence of previous adoption. 'Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts.' Hence we can say with John, 'Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us,—the most intimate of all relationship—'because he hath given us of his Spirit:' and with Paul, 'ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you.

2d. As the Spirit of adoption; that is, the Spirit witnesseth with our spirit by the filial confidence and filial emotions which He produces. Natural relationship gives confidence to a son toward his father. He can count upon that relationship as a guarantee that his father loves him. But strong affection in the son gives a greater confidence. It is confidence itself. In such a case, the confidence of relationship is lost in that of love; and filial love is not the ground only, as filial relationship is, but the very essence of filial confidence. But filial confidence toward our Father in heaven is the fruit of the Spirit: and thus 'the Spirit witnesseth with our spirit that we are the children of God.' 'And hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.'—'The Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.'

3d. As a regenerating and sanctifying Spirit. 'The fruit of the Spirit,' or in other words, the testimonies which he gives to our adoption, are 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, (fidelity), meekness, temperance.' Let these fruits, therefore, be produced:—let love, love to God, his holiness, his law, his creatures, supplant selfishness, hatred, and corrupt affections; let joy, 'joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ,' and joy in the happiness of others, supplant the bitterness of spirit produced by slavish fear of God, by envy and malice toward our fellow-men; let peace, even that 'peace which passeth all understanding,' peace with God, with ourselves, and with one another, supplant the disquietude of conscious enmity to God, and the disquietude of self-reproach and of contention with our neighbour; let long-suffering, that long-suffering which bears with equanimity and without retaliation, ingratitude, injustice, and unmerited reproach, supplant an impatient, querrulous, quarrelsome, and vindictive disposition; let gentleness, the gentleness of a kind, affable, and courteous disposition, and of a mild and inoffensive deportment, supplant sourness of temper and surliness of behaviour; let goodness, the goodness of piety, generosity, and candour, supplant an irreligious, covetous, captious, and selfish disposition; let fidelity, the fidelity of faithfulness to the trust committed to us, whether by God or man, the fidelity of an honourable, upright mind, and of an incorruptible honesty and veracity, supplant a disposition, faithless, tortuous, vacillating, regulated by no religious principle, and animated by no religious hope; let meekness, the meekness which gives long-suffering a calm and unruffled, as well as a patient temper, and a benignant as well as a dignified and unfrowning aspect, let such meekness supplant secret repining at the wrongs of others, as well as angry and malevolent feelings; let temperance, the temperance which keeps in due subjection our appetites and passions, and fits our souls and bodies for being the dwelling-place—the temple of the Holy Ghost, let such temperance supplant all desire for debasing and corrupting pleasures, and all tendency to excess in lawful pleasures; let a thorough change of character by regeneration, be thus accompanied by sanctification of internal feeling and social affection, and outward deportment, and can we be insensible to the evidence which will thereby be afforded that the kingdom of God has been formed within us? Knowing from the greatness of the change, whose work it is, as well as from the testimony of scripture, can we fail to be persuaded that we have therein the witnessing of the Spirit of God with our spirit, that we are the children of God? Besides, will not the nature of our internal experience be such—have so much of heaven in it, as to prove its celestial origin, and thereby our personal adoption? Will not the love be so pure, so disinterested, so divine? Will not the joy be so placid, so elevating, so animating, so satisfying? Will not the peace be so well-founded, so stable, so gratifying? Will not the long-suffering, the gentleness, the goodness, the fidelity, the meekness, the temperance, be so opposite to our former, and so congenial to our present character, as to convince us that they could not spontaneously, could not by any mere moral training, become the product of our depraved nature? Will they not be such that we will feel as if the Divinity had taken up his abode within us? But why say, as if? 'Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?' 'Ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.'

---

SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us,' Eph. v. 1.

ONE of the advices usually given to those who desire to arrive at superior excellence in any walk of science, or art, or life, is, to keep habitually before them some eminent example of the excellence after which they aspire. The advantage of such an example is, that it gives distinctness, individuality, embodiment, to the object at which they aim. It also guides as a light, allures as an attractive influence, and prompts by the love and admiration which it inspires. But the Christian is an aspirant after the highest of all excellence, whether in kind or in degree. If wise then, he will imitate the worldling, though not in the object of his pursuit, yet in his policy. He will keep habitually before him the perfect exemplar of the excellence after which he aspires—be a follower—an imitator of God.

An example is more influential the more nearly the exemplar is allied to us by the ties of kindred, affection, or benefaction. The virtues of a father are more constraining to a son than to a stranger. To the son the virtues of the father are better known, in their fruits he has more largely shared, in the honour attached to them he feels a deeper personal interest, and he lives in closer contact with their assimilating influence. Believers then, are not 'strangers and foreigners.' They are 'dear children,'—beloved of God. They know their Father's excellencies, and have experienced their blessed fruits, in a sense, and to an extent, that the world knows not of. Their Father's honour they feel to be their own, and they live in intimate and habitual communion with Him, by meditation and by prayer. Great therefore are their encouragements, facilities, incitements, obligations, to be imitators of God. The points in which He can be imitated are indeed few in number: but they are cardinal points, and they embrace the whole circle of human duty. They are such as these: 'Be ye holy, for I am holy. Be ye merciful even as your Father which is in heaven is merciful. Love one another as I have loved you.'

Of all the moral perfections of the Godhead, that of love and its kindred sentiments is the most imitable. Holiness and love may be viewed as comprehending all the other moral perfections of the divine character, and they are the two great elements of Christian perfection. But there is this difference between them. Holiness is more a description of character than a principle of action. Love is more a principle of action than a description of character. And besides being more a principle of action, it is that perfection which most readily commends itself to our affections, and to which we are most indebted. Accordingly, it is with respect to love that the Apostle says, Be ye imitators of God, as dear children. As dear children ye are beloved. Love in return. Loving children are beloved children. Show therefore that you are loved by loving.

And walk in love: that is, in all your walking be actuated by it. Walk in it as an atmosphere, surrounding you wherever you go, and imparting vitality, health, and vigour, to all your practice. Walk in it as in a way, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, but allowing it to direct and hedge in your path, whether it may lead you to the sanctuary or the infected chamber, to the society of friends or the society of foes, to the house of mourning or the house of feasting.

Walk in love, and take Christ along with you as your pattern and prompter. Like his, let your love be purely disinterested, for, 'when he was rich, for our sakes he became poor.' Like his, let your love be self-denying, for, 'Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.' Like his, let your love be practical, for 'He went about doing good,' and we ought not to be weary in well-doing. Like his, let your love be forbearing and forgiving, 'Putting on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye.'

Let us be prompted to such a love by considering what we ourselves owe to it—deliverance from the wrath to come, our present peace and hope, and a future inheritance among them that are sanctified. And it was Christ that loved us and paid the price of such deliverance. May we love Him, because he first loved us. It is all the return that He requires of us. It is a self-enriching return. Shall we then not make it?

---

SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment,' 1 John iii. 23.

A SINGLE commandment, but a twofold injunction, enforcing both faith and love, and a commandment comprehending every other; for faith embraces all that is necessary to the justification and acceptance of our persons in the sight of God; and love is the sum of human duty,—is its most actuating, its everlasting principle. The commandment is first faith, then love,—faith to reconcile, and love to manifest the reconciliation, and beatify by the heavenliness of the sentiment. But it is faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and then, love one to another. And rightly so: for faith in the Son of God not only reconciles to God, but to our fellow-Christians. 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God; and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.' The household of faith 'are one body,' and 'are members one of another:' so that 'whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.' Being one body, they are filled and actuated by one Spirit, have one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all. Ties so numerous, so close, so sacred, so strong, make mutual love a natural and inevitable result of true faith in Christ. Hence the test of sincere discipleship—brotherly love. 'We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren: he that loveth not his brother abideth in death.'

Few things are more difficult than to control the faith and the affections. Some falsely magnify the difficulty into an impossibility. Yet here we have a positive command to control our faith and our affections. And why? Because difficulty of obedience does not abrogate the authority of the lawgiver; otherwise, the more we become enslaved to sin, the more do we become emancipated from the restraints and responsibilities of righteous government. Neither does difficulty of obedience render an expression of the will of the lawgiver unavailing. On the contrary, an expression of his will in the form of command, is the very thing which helps us to obedience, especially if the command be the utterance of legitimate and acknowledged authority, prescribe what in itself is right, contain directions, and present powerfully constraining inducements to render the required obedience. A command from the father of lies, to believe a lie, could give us no command over our faith. The command, 'love your enemies,' from a bitterly persecuting foe, could give us no command over our affections. But can the same be said of the God of truth, when commanding us to believe the truth—of the God of love, when commanding us to imitate his love, or rather, to repay the great love wherewith he loved us even when we were enemies?

And is it no assistance to our obedience, when it is not merely his commandment, 'That we should believe on his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another,' but that we should do so, as he gave us commandment? That is, that with respect to faith, we should obey his commandment, intelligently, searching the scriptures;—ingenuously, judging not according to appearance, but judging righteous judgment;—in the way of obedience to truth and duty already known, and willingness to follow new discoveries of truth and duty; for, if any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine;—finally, prayerfully, saying, 'Lord, help mine unbelief.' And with respect to mutual love, his commandment is, that we should obey it in the manner which his word prescribes, and from all the considerations which his word suggests. As to the manner which his word prescribes, his commandment is, that love should be 'unfeigned,' 'without dissimulation,' 'with a pure heart,' 'fervently;' that it should be with 'meekness and forbearance,' and should lead us 'to esteem others better than ourselves;' that it should be a self-propagating love, 'provoking unto love;' that it should be an active love, 'by love serving one another;' that it should be a lasting love, 'letting brotherly love continue.' As to the considerations which his word suggests, his commandment is, that we should love one another from a consideration of the dignity and blessedness of the sentiment, 'Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God,'—from a consideration of the congeniality of the sentiment of love to the renewed and sanctified soul, 'Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently, — from a consideration of the example and obligations of the love of God and of Christ, 'Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another;' 'and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us and given himself for us;'—from a consideration of our common frailties, 'Let brotherly love continue, remembering them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body;'—from the consideration that love is the distinguishing and most commendatory badge of the Christian profession, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' It is thus that He has given commandment with respect to faith and love; and how depraved the heart, and how obdurate the will, which can withstand the force of such rules and considerations! What but positive hostility to Him who gives the commandment, and the dislike of the unregenerate heart to the commandment itself, can be the cause of difficulty in rendering obedience? And who could dare to urge hostility and dislike as an excuse for not obeying? Who too, that feels the difficulty, and is willing to encounter and overcome it, would not ask for that assistance from on high which is so freely offered to all that will but submit to ask it?

SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!' Psal. cxxxiii. 1.

UNION among brethren is here affirmed to be both profitable and pleasant; and in the remainder of the psalm, these properties are illustrated by apt and beautiful similitudes which, in accordance with the usage of Hebrew poetry, are arranged in an order inverse to that of the properties themselves.

For brethren to dwell together in unity is obviously pleasant—most pleasant! How grateful to the senses must have been the odoriferous unguent, when it was poured out on the head of the high priest on the day of his consecration, and went down over the whole of his splendid vestments, diffusing fragrance as it went! Equally pleasant to the soul is the spectacle of a harmonious brotherhood, whether that brotherhood be a family, a nation, the collective human race, or that more exalted relationship which is formed by regeneration and adoption through Christ Jesus! Where unity exists, mutual confidence is easily maintained; and with confidence are sure to be conjoined kindness and love—the very elements of happiness. Nay, the play of the benevolent affections assimilates their possessors to God himself; for 'God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him!'

But it is good as well as pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity; delightful as 'ointment poured forth,' it is also profitable as the refreshing and fructifying dew.

How good is it for brethren, the children of the same parents, to dwell in unity! Let a family be united, and all their burdens will be lightened by being shared; all their sorrows alleviated by the interchange of mutual sympathy; all their enterprises made to prosper by the energy of hearty co-operation.

How good is it for fellow-citizens of the same country to dwell in unity! What but the prevalence of mutual respect and good will among all classes of its inhabitants can secure a nation's prosperity during peace? What but a united people can form an impregnable bulwark during war?

How good is it for the whole family of men to maintain the relations of amity and peace! O! what a happy world we should behold—how fast would civilization spread—how gloriously would religion prosper—were men of every tribe and tongue to unite in causing wars to cease under the whole heaven! Earth would reflect somewhat of the image of heaven!

The advantages of unity, however, are most of all apparent among 'brethren in Christ Jesus.' How plainly does union among Christians tend to give strength and stability to the Christian church! The fable of the dying father and the bundle of lanes is not more applicable to children of the same family, than to the Christian brotherhood. Let believers busy themselves more with the minor points on which they differ, than with the grand verities on which they are agreed—and their enemies will easily triumph over them. But let them maintain the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, and strive to excel each other, not in questions of disputation, but in obedience to the Redeemer's new commandment—and they will present a front to the foe, which all his onsets will be unable to break!

How plainly, moreover, does union tend to secure a copious descent of divine influence on the church! Not a few of the most precious promises in scripture are suspended on unity as their condition: 'If two of you,' says the Saviour, 'shall agree on earth touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done to them of my Father which is in heaven.' The more numerous the signatures attached to the petitions we send to the celestial throne, the greater, it would seem, is the influence of our petitions there. While, on the other hand, the surest way to turn aside our prayers, and shut up the windows of heaven against us, is to cherish unbrotherly sentiments. The Spirit, like the peaceful dove, resolutely forsakes every scene of confusion and strife. And let a religious revival be proceeding ever so prosperously, you have only to start a spirit of disunion, in order to drive off the hallowing influence, and transform the seeming garden into a blasted desert!

Nor are the benefits of brotherly union limited to believers themselves. Such union helps them to bring others under the influence of their religious principles. Even in Christian lands the divisions which unhappily exist among the faithful, present a formidable obstacle to inquirers, and furnish a powerful handle to enemies; and they must be still more influential for evil in heathen countries. Imagine the case of three or four missionaries, of different sects, labouring in the same district; and suppose that, instead of giving exclusive prominence in their public teaching to the essential truths on which they are at one, and evincing in their private intercourse a constant anxiety to fulfil the Saviour's new commandment, they make their differences their principal theme, and maintain the attitude of rivals towards one another. In such a case is it possible that their work can go on prosperously? Prosperously! Why, not a single convert will be added to the faith! Their heathen auditors will be more affected by their practice than by their preaching; and the conclusion drawn in regard to the claims of the gospel will just be this: 'This religion is indeed a religion of love in name, but it is a religion of strife in reality! It professes to breathe only the spirit of the gentle dove, but it inspires its subjects with the temper of the tiger! It cannot be from God! It must be an imposture! Away with it!' All experience proves, that the cause of Christ can make rapid advances only when its adherents 'stand fast in one spirit, with one mind,' and display a temper which compels spectators to exclaim, 'Behold, how these Christians love one another!'

Such being the pleasantness and profitableness of unity, how important that I should maintain and promote it! But how is this to be done? If I would be one with my brethren, I must begin by becoming one with Christ. If I would see my home the abode of love; my country a land of peace; the world a united community; the church a scene of brotherhood; I must commence the work by first giving myself to the Lord, and striving to induce all within the sphere of my influence to do the same. The moment a man believes in Christ, he acquires such new views of his own character, of his relationship to his brethren, and of his obligations to love and benefit them, as must constrain him to dwell with them in unity! In a world whose inhabitants are so variously endowed by nature, so differently trained in youth, so oppositely circumstanced in after years, it would be unreasonable to expect the same opinions, the same tastes, the same forms of worship and government, everywhere to prevail. But uniformity is not essential to unity. The sons and daughters of a human parent may differ widely in taste, and pursuit, and outward condition, and yet all alike cherish the warm family affection which they imbibed in early years at the same mother's knee and around the same father's hearth. And so the children of the one great Father in heaven need not be precluded, by their inevitable diversities in minor and external things, from loving the same adorable Redeemer, and dwelling as brethren one with another. Let no obstacle, then, discourage me from making universal union an object both of pursuit and of hope! Union is heaven's first law. The works of God in creation are all marked by unity. The scheme of providence is arranged on principles of perfect harmony. And redemption has for its first and last object to reconcile and heal—to unite man with God, and heaven with earth! Is such indeed the constitution of the universe? And shall man persist in forming the only exception to the beautiful design—the only note of discord in the glorious anthem of harmonious praise? Perish the impious thought!

SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Blessed are the peace-makers: for they shall be called the children of God,' Matt. v. 9.

DISCORD and its baneful effects are unhappily too rife in families, in the church, and in the world, to render it at all doubtful that 'peace-makers' are a class of men much and urgently needed. But where are we to look for these ministers of reconciliation? Christian! it is thy duty to assume the office! To discharge the function of a peace-maker is one, and a most essential, part of every believer's mission. As a follower of Jesus, he is required not only to follow peace himself, but also to use his influence for allaying feuds among others; not only to avoid planting himself the thorns and briars of strife, but also to root out those which other hands have planted. He would not, as a man, behold a neighbour's dwelling on fire without assisting to extinguish the flames; and no more must he, as a Christian, stand idly by, while the fires of vindictive passion are consuming the happiness and virtue of his fellow-men. Let others, if they will, be the apostles of strife: His mission is to heal and harmonize—to mediate between friends and reconcile foes—to nip quarrels in the bud—to prevent disagreements from ripening into rancour—to make peace descend, with halcyon wing, on every scene of stormy contention—to transform earth into the image of heaven! Beautiful office! Who would not aspire to perform it? who would not account it an honour to discharge its duties with success?

To this noble vocation the believer is invited by the highest of all examples. When Jesus left the bosom of the Father to suffer with men on the earth, what was the office he came to perform? Was it not that of a 'peace-maker' between God and man? And when, after enduring the cross and despising the shame, he returned to his Father's right hand in heaven, what was the function which in the plenitude of his love he chose to assume, and has ever since fulfilled?

Was it not that of a Mediator, and minister of reconciliation? And shall the disciple who bears his name, and professes to be his representative, decline the honour of treading, in this respect, in the Redeemer's steps?

For this vocation the believer is also peculiarly qualified. Being himself reconciled to God by faith in the Mediator, he lives in an element of constant peace, which cannot but dispose him to seek the peace of others. Being favoured, moreover, with the continual presence and help of that Spirit whose office is to form him to the love of God and of man, he is, or ought to be, a proficient in the exercise of the charity which hopeth all things, and which, so far from dwelling on the faults and infirmities of others, delights to cast a veil over their errors, and to draw out to view their latent excellencies. In a word, the believer carries, or ought to carry, within his bosom, a copious fountain of brotherly-kindness, which being perpetually fed from the love and grace of heaven, may well be expected to flow forth in streams of healing charity among his brethren on earth!

Although furnished with such motives and qualifications for undertaking it, the Christian must not expect to find the office of peace-maker an easy one. Few tasks, indeed, are beset with more difficulties and discouragements. The evil spirit of discord is emphatically of that 'kind which goeth not out but by prayer and fasting.' An irascible temper is too prone to self-justification, and too impatient of rebuke, to be easily brought under the dominion of calm reason. And party-spirit, whether it appear in society or in the church, takes too many disguises, and is fenced with too many palliations, to 'come forth' in obedience to the ordinary forms of exorcism. The peace-maker must also lay his account with misconstruction of his own motives and objects. Is he not certain to incur the open hostility of the violent and narrow-minded; and to be stigmatized as a 'meddler with other men's matters,' even by persons more open to reason? If it is a family-quarrel in which he attempts to mediate, he undertakes what is proverbially a thankless office, If it is a difference in his own religious sect or party, he has nothing to expect but to be branded as a disguised adversary by some; a lukewarm friend by others; an unsafe and timorous counsellor by all. Let it be added, that he has to contend with the further difficulty,—surely no imaginary one! of making peace without any sacrifice of principle. 'Could he but soften a little the demands of truth and justice, so as to adapt them to the views of contending parties, how easily, in many instances, should he bring matters to a pacific issue! Yet this must not be! The peace-maker may waive his own rights, but he must not tamper with the claims of his God! He may sacrifice his own comfort or reputation, but he must not surrender one iota of heavenly truth! He may accommodate himself to many of the customs and prejudices of others, to please them for their good to edification, but never once must he descend to any sinful compliance, never once must he compromise any evangelical sentiment! With reference to things indifferent, his course may be pliant and accommodating, as the shallow stream which yields to every obstacle, and takes its direction from every rock or shrub that indents its channel; but with respect to the eternal obligations of truth and duty, he must resemble the river in full flood, when it sweeps along with an evenness of current, and unity of strength, 'which, while it is beautiful to behold, is terrible to withstand!'

The difficulties of the peace-maker, however, ought not to be contemplated apart from his encouragements. Such a devoted friend of his species may surely calculate on being sometimes cheered with instances of success. And need it be said how highly in every such case his good offices will be prized, his presence welcomed, his memory revered, by those whose feuds he has healed! But even if universal failure attend his efforts, he is not without his reward! No disappointments can deprive him of the inward consciousness of pure intentions—the comfort of a peaceful and benevolent temper—or, what is better than all, the association into which his office brings him with the best of all Beings. His Father in heaven is 'the God of peace!' His Redeemer is 'the Prince of peace!' The Holy Ghost, the Comforter, is the bestower of peace! The covenant-offices of the glorious Trinity are all exercised with a view to the promotion of 'peace on earth.' And is it nothing?—no encouragement?—no reward?—to be associated with the Tri-une God in a work which infinite love has selected as its own? Nay, in the act of prosecuting such a work, there is more than association with God; there is assimilation to God. To display a peaceable and peace-making temper is to resemble God—is to reflect his image—is to exhibit the mark of his children! And who can doubt that the Almighty Father loves to contemplate the likeness, and will at last acknowledge it! What then though the peace-maker may encounter opposition or obloquy from men? he has a Father in heaven who owns him for a son! Men may despise him, but he is dear to God! And a day is hastening on, when being taken from this land of strife and sorrow, he shall be borne to a region where no feeling of unkindness ever jars on the soul, and no note of discord ever grates the sense.

Blessed, then, are the peace-makers who shall thus be called the children of God! O! to breathe their spirit—to copy their example—to enjoy their reward! That I may be enabled to do so, 'let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking be put away from me with all malice;' and let me open my heart and life to the humanizing influence of that Holy Spirit of grace, whose blessed fruits are 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance!'

---

EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth,' Heb. xii. 6.

THE afflictions of life, whatever be their secondary causes, are all to be referred to the purpose of God as their ultimate source. Under the Divine government, nothing happens by chance or by necessity; nothing befalls any creature, which is not the result at once of deliberate design, and of special superintendence. The fall of a sparrow enters into the plan of Providence, no less than the fate of an empire; the trivial mishaps of the cottage, no less than the tragic misfortunes of the palace. No event can be named, however apparently casual or contingent, which does not owe its origin to the purpose, and its occurrence to the providence of Heaven.

God being thus the author of our afflictions, the question naturally arises, In what capacity does he appoint and administer them? Is it in the mere exercise of his power as a Sovereign? Or is it for the vindication of his law as a Judge? Or, finally, is it in the character and with the ends of a Father?

With the holy Scriptures in his hands, no man need incur the impiety of ascribing the ills of life to a capricious exercise of Almighty power. The God whom the Bible unveils to our faith, is incapable of any exercise of power merely for its own sake. He is a Being who can never act without a reason, far less from caprice; nor can any reason suffice to move His infinite mind, which does not commend itself to the most comprehensive wisdom, and the most exalted rectitude. When God afflicts, therefore, He must do so from some wise and righteous motive. And, as he is as incapable of acting cruelly, as he is of acting capriciously, that motive must be one which precludes Him from dealing either unjustly or unkindly towards the subjects of his government.

Is the theory more tenable which views our afflictions as the award of a righteous judge? It is not. At first sight, indeed, human sorrows seem to have a penal design; for they entered the world in connection with sin, and they are confessedly the natural and appropriate wages of transgression. But the fact that they are penal in their own nature, does by no means infer that they are actually imposed on us for a penal purpose; and the experience of human life, as well as the general aspect of the world, is in entire contrariety with such a hypothesis. What would be the state of the world, were retributive justice the rule of the Divine Providence? Would it be such a scene as we now behold, where the ills of life, though sufficient to cast a shadow over our joys, are neither so numerous nor so severe, as materially to affect our general comfort? No. It would be a place of universal and unmitigated misery. What, again, on such a supposition, would be the comparative condition of the righteous and the wicked? Would one event happen to them both? or would the saints, rather than the ungodly, be those who are subjected to a series of troubles peculiar to themselves, over and above the ordinary 'shocks that flesh is heir to'? It is impossible! The truth is—this world is a scene, not of retribution, but of probation with a view to retribution. Guilt abounds, but its punishment is suspended. Men deserve wrath, but the execution of the sentence is averted or deferred. There is a moral government; but mercy is so much more the rule than justice, that the scheme can be reconciled with the Divine rectitude, only on the supposition of the existence of an economy of grace and a future retribution.

The only consistent account of affliction is that which connects it with the plan of redemption; and describes it as subordinated to the objects contemplated in that blessed plan. The true and sole key to the mystery of Providence, is the scheme of redemption through Christ Jesus. Under this economy, the penalty of sin, instead of being a thing still in dependence, is a thing which, in the case of all believers, has been already exhausted and liquidated by the sufferings of their substitute; and the relation in which God stands to them, is no longer that of an offended Judge whose law is armed against them, but that of a gracious Father who has been reconciled by the death of his Son, and is bound not only to grant them all the spiritual blessings purchased by Christ, but to order his providence in such a manner as to insure their actual possession of these blessings. In fact, by the tenor of this gracious scheme, God cannot bestow upon his people anything but blessings; and when, therefore, he casts the cloud of sorrow over their path, their affliction must be, in reality, a privilege, not a punishment; a token of love, not a messenger of wrath!

In beautiful accordance with this view of the subject, the apostle represents affliction as the 'chastening' of a Father, and a mark of sonship. 'For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not!' The chastisements of an earthly parent are well known to have love for their origin; for it cuts a parent to the soul to subject his child to pain and weeping; and no stronger proof of true affection can be given, than in the exercise of seasonable correction. 'He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes.' It is the same with our heavenly Father. His chastisements, so far from throwing a shade of suspicion over his kindness, are to be regarded as decisive evidences of his concern for our well-being. Such a father as God is, would doubtless, were such a course consistent with our good, strew the whole of our path with roses, instead of making it rough with briars. But he loves us too sincerely—he values our souls too highly—he cares for our true happiness too intensely—to withhold from us an allotment which, like affliction, is one of the blood-bought privileges and promised blessings of the Christian covenant.

Need it be added, that such a view of the troubles of life is most consolatory to the Christian mourner? That our sorrows are the appointment, not merely of a God of infinite wisdom, but of a reconciled Father; that they are put into our hands, not as a cup of trembling, but as a cup of blessing; that they are expressions of divine love—new covenant mercies—marks of sonship; how rich are such considerations in matter of holy thankfulness and joy! We are not, indeed, to infer our adoption into God's redeemed family from the mere fact that we are afflicted; for to mourn is the common lot and destiny of man. But if we have arrived, on other and independent grounds, at a well-founded persuasion of our union with Christ, let us not, from any fear of being deemed presumptuous, deny ourselves the comfort of realizing a Father's hand in our troubles. It is the absence, not the presence, of afflictive dispensations, which constitutes the real ground for alarm; it is those who are 'without chastisement whereof all are partakers'—not those who are bowed down with a heavy load of woe, that have reason to fear lest they should be found 'bastards and not sons.' And we therefore debar ourselves from comfort which God designs for us, and declares to be ours—if, when troubles abound, we allow painful misgivings about the Divine favour to agonize our souls.

EIGHTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness,' Heb. xii. 10.

IN a preceding verse we are informed of the motive of our heavenly Father in afflicting us; in this, of the end He has in view. Affliction, according to the apostle, is not only the result of Fatherly love, but the appointed and appropriate means of filial improvement. As it has its source in the same infinite benevolence which originated the scheme of our redemption, so it is subordinated, in its ends and uses, to the objects of that blessed scheme—being turned by the Divine mercy from its natural purpose as the wages of sin, into an instrument and auxiliary of holiness.

How consolatory is such a discovery to all who feel that holiness constitutes the true dignity of their nature, and is cheaply purchased at any cost, however great, of present suffering. To know that our Father's chastisements are dictated by love, is cheering: but doubly cheering is it to know besides, that they are designed for our profit, more especially when we also remember that our Father is as able to secure, as He is disposed to seek, our good. In the case of an earthly father, the pure current of parental affection is often polluted by the admixture of angry or capricious feeling; and even when he is most desirous to render correction subservient to the benefit of his child, he is liable to fail of his object by administering it at an improper season, or to an unsuitable extent. But no error can ever occur in the chastenings of our Father in heaven. His wisdom is unerring, his knowledge infinite. He can desire no object which he has not power to secure. He can run no risk of defeating his end by the employment of means either inadequate or superfluous. And if He engages to make our sorrows conduce to our sanctification, we may rest assured that they will all be adapted, alike in measure and in order, to our exigencies—imposed only when necessary—and removed whenever their purpose is accomplished.

The holy and gracious end thus contemplated by God in afflicting us, ought to reconcile us to our trials, even were we ignorant of their fitness for effecting it. But on this point also we have full information, for, in fact, the experience of Christian mourners in all ages is nothing else than a commentary on the fitness of sorrow as an engine of sanctification.

Take, for example, the case of the backslider, who is fast departing from his God, and returning to the love and service of the world. What so likely to arrest him in his defection, to spoil his relish for worldly enjoyments, and to throw him once more on God for consolation, as a succession of heavy trials. A single stroke may be insufficient to rouse him; but it is scarcely possible that he shall sleep on while shock after shock assails him. Every one admires the sagacity of the chief who, after finding the inefficacy of all ordinary expedients to detain his son and heir from following the fortunes of the Pretender, took a loaded pistol from his breast, and deliberately lodged its contents in the arm of the fool-hardy youth, thereby inflicting a wound which unfitted him for joining the rebels. And shall we less admire the fitness of the means which the heavenly Father employs when he sends sickness upon the backslider's person, bereavement into his family, or a moth among his treasures,—when he says to one fiery trial, 'Go and consume his outward comforts!' and to another, 'Go and destroy his peace of mind!' when, in short, he adds sorrow upon sorrow, until the wanderer 'comes to himself,' and returns to the paths of righteousness.

Or, take the case of a Christian who, from being unalive to the defects of his character, is taking no step for its amendment. What so fitted to bring him to a sight and sense of his imperfections as a season of severe trouble? Water which appears pure and pellucid while kept in a state of rest, may cast up particles of mire and dirt when it is troubled. And so the soul which in the calm of prosperity seems to be wholly under the influence of grace, may exhibit countless defilements when the storm of adversity descends to stir it through all its depths. If impatience is my unknown sin, a fit of racking pain must help me to detect it. If it is worldlymindedness, an unexpected loss of earthly substance must bring it to light. If it is undue attachment to my family, a sore domestic bereavement must bring me acquainted with its power. Affliction is, in fact, of the nature of a test applied to one's principles and temper, and it is hardly conceivable that it shall not issue in making a Christian alive to the defects of his character, and thereby preparing him for their successful cure.'

But it were superfluous to multiply illustrations. As there are sins which only suffering can enable us to detect, so there are graces which only suffering can enable us to display. But for the trials that darken the domestic hearth, where would be the means of calling into exercise those gentle and kindly affections which prompt us to alleviate the griefs of others by tender sympathy and offices of love? But for the ruder shocks that assail us in the world, where would be the scope for the development of the loftier and sterner virtues? How could patience have her perfect work, unless there were protracted trials to endure? How could forgiveness be exemplified, unless there were injuries tempting to revenge? Who has not been electrified by displays of moral heroism which, but for times of sore trial, could never have been elicited? There are some sufferings which we pity: but who ever dared to pity Daniel in the lion's den, or the three children in the fiery furnace, or Paul and Silas singing praises in the dungeon? A voice within us instinctively whispers, 'How enviable is such glorious intrepidity!' and the thrill of admiration which warms our hearts as we witness every such display, vouches for the fitness of affliction as a discipline of holiness.

Affliction, indeed, does not operate as a charm, and make us holy whether we will or no. It cannot recall the backslider from his worldliness if he obstinately refuses to bethink him of his danger; it cannot bring the slothful believer acquainted with the plague of his heart, if he pertinaciously decline to turn his eye inward; it cannot refine our sensibilities, or strengthen our patience, or exercise our heroism, if we set no value on the possession and display of these lovely graces. But wherever, and whenever, there is a soul earnestly set on its own sanctification,—wherever, and whenever, there is a soul disposed to walk up to the measure of its present light, and desirous of more light, that its walk may become still holier, there and then will affliction prove itself, whatever form it assumes, a ministering angel sent down from heaven to beautify and hallow the sufferer. Nor ought we to complain, but rather to rejoice, that it visits us again and yet again, and refuses to let us go until we take from its hands the fulness of the blessing wherewith it is charged.

NINTH DAY.—MORNING.

'My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him,'
Heb. xii. 5.

WE are cautioned against two extremes into which the afflicted are prone to fall—disregard of the divine chastisements, and despondency under them.

It is not necessary that we should cherish a conscious contempt, either of God or of his visitations, in order to incur the guilt of 'despising the chastening of the Lord.' This sin is chargeable on many who would shrink with horror from the idea of mocking the divine providence; and, indeed, it assumes so many and various forms, that it may easily be committed without our being aware of our guilt. In some, it takes the form of a stoical or a studied indifference to trouble—an indifference, which, though it has the sanction of worldly fashion to recommend it, plainly implies contempt of him who has endowed us with an emotional nature, and requires us to feel our sorrows, to the end we may be made better by them. In others, it appears in a habitual tendency to separate God from their trials. The 'chastening' may not itself be despised; but the divine Chastener is as little recognized as though, like the gods of the Epicureans, He had long ago exchanged activity for repose, and left his world to work on by its own communicated energies. A third class neglect the end of their afflictions—acknowledging, perhaps, the providence of God in them, but turning a deaf ear to the design of the rod, and the duty of improving it. While a fourth evince the same unsoftened and unbelieving temper, by restraining prayer in the season of adversity, and thus showing that they are without any true sense of dependence—any conscious need of heavenly help—any sincere desire for that blessed relief which arises to the sorrowful from pouring out their hearts before their God.

But the sin of despising the chastening of the Lord, whatever form it assumes, is grievously unbecoming in Christians. To be indifferent to the rod were daring impiety, even did God chasten only as an offended Sovereign, or as a righteous Judge! But is it in either of these capacities that he afflicts us? Far from it! Hear the argument of the apostle: 'My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' It is then as a Father that God afflicts—a kind and considerate Father, who loves his children, and spares not the rod, just because he loves them! And is it nothing—no presumption—no impiety—to condemn a Father? to pour despite on a Father's love? Consider the case! The great God comes forth from his place to set in order a course of afflictive events for our benefit; He deigns to occupy his infinite mind in adapting them to our several exigencies; He sacrifices his parental feelings (if we may so speak) so far as to chasten those whom it pains him to subject to any suffering? And yet, instead of seconding his design, and showing gratitude for his condescension, we make as light of his corrections as if they were the result of chance, or as if all we had to do with them was to get rid of them! What blindness! what unthankfulness! what heartlessness! O Lord! how marvellous is thy mercy in still continuing to address to such hardened offenders the paternal entreaty, 'My son, despise not thou the chastenings of the Lord.'

The case of those who run to the opposite extreme of fainting under the divine rebuke, is perhaps worthier of commiseration; but it is not less criminal. Despondency usually appears—unless its victims be persons of a morbid temperament, who require a physician for the body rather than comfort for the soul—in connection with heavy and protracted afflictions. And who requires to be told, that it is difficult for flesh and blood to bear accumulated woe! It is trying to be stretched prostrate on the bed of sickness, when the support of one's family, or the success of one's favourite scheme, imperiously calls for immediate and vigorous exertion! It is mysteriously trying, to be laid aside from active duty, and to have only the work of patience assigned us, when our prospects of usefulness are bright, and our desire to throw ourselves into them ardent. No one who has not had his fondest hopes suddenly blasted, or the object of his warmest regard unexpectedly severed from his grasp, or the result of years of anxiety and labour in a moment consumed before his eyes—can form an adequate conception of the strong temptations which God's people sometimes have to faint under their burdens—to weary of life—and to abandon themselves to despair!

Yet the sin of the despondent is not less grievous than that of the despisers of the divine chastisements. Does it not, equally with the other, imply a disbelief of the providence of God? Does it not, equally with the other, involve a disregard of the end of affliction? Above all, is it not accompanied with the self-same aggravation—contempt of a Father's love? It is remarkable, that the apostle employs the same argument against both sins. He calls upon the children of God to avoid both, from one and the same consideration—namely, that the Chastener is a Father; and the chastening the result of paternal love: and he, therefore, virtually teaches that both are extremes arising from the same principles, and involving similar guilt. Indeed, what conceivable proof can there be of the folly and guilt of immoderate grief, so decisive as the fact that our heaviest, no less than our lightest, trials originate in the love of God, and are administered with a special regard and adaptation to our wants and well-being? What could any man wish for more, in respect to his trials, than to have them measured out, and superintended by an infinitely wise and gracious Being—a Being who knows what is best for him—and who will not, like a foolish father, ruin him by ill-timed indulgence, nor yet weary him by unnecessary correction?

The true course for the people of God is to pursue the middle path between apathy and dejection. We are not forbidden to mourn, nor are we precluded from seeking the removal of our sorrows. But our grief must not be allowed to unfit us for duty, nor must we labour so much for the removal as for the sanctification of our trials. Let us ever strive, then, to make our sorrows tributary to our piety! While trial lasts, let us possess our souls in patience. And whensoever we are tempted to faint or to murmur, let us thus commune with our own hearts, and with God: 'Why should I repine? Am I not a sinner who deserve far more than I suffer? Am I not in the hands of a gracious Father who corrects in love, and will not inflict one pang more than is necessary? O my Father! let me ever trust thy wisdom, and confide in thy goodness! Let me ever, by the eye of faith, pierce the clouds, and contemplate the bright serene heavens stretching away behind them! And let my hard and foolish thoughts of thy providence give place to meek resignation, and filial confidence, and lively hope!—so that I may desire and have no will but thine!'

NINTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word,' Psal. cxix. 67.

THE Psalmist here records the result of his personal experience with regard to the respective tendencies of a state of prosperity and a state of affliction. He had passed successively through both conditions: and on a review of their influence, he felt bound to declare that the former had proved as unfavourable, as the latter had been propitious, to his spiritual improvement. . . .

Is the experience of the Psalmist singular in this respect? Or is it only such as these opposite conditions may be expected generally to produce?

When it is said that uninterrupted prosperity is apt to make men forget and forsake God, it is not meant that such is its necessary effect, irrespective of the character of men. Far from it! Heaven is a place secure from adverse changes, and yet there the inhabitants never go 'astray' from God! Eden, in the state of man's innocence, was a scene of unbroken prosperity, and yet there our unfallen progenitors walked with God! The effect of outward circumstances depends in a great measure on the beings on whom they operate. And in determining the moral tendency of prosperity, we must look not alone at the nature of prosperity, but also and chiefly at the character of man.

Now, what is the character of fallen man? Is it too much to affirm, that instead of being pre-disposed to piety, he has a natural bias to ungodliness? Present the idea of God to an unconverted man, does he welcome it? does he strive to detain it before his mind? Alas! he shrinks from it, and struggles to shun it and shut it out. Show him the character of God as revealed in scripture—His holiness, His rectitude, His omniscience: does he thank you for the display? does he gladly entertain the thought of such a Being, as one well-fitted to solemnize and sanctify his soul? Alas! he immediately and instinctively resists it as the intrusion of a visitor whose presence would only serve to disturb and torment him—to thwart his schemes of ambition—to embitter his cup of worldly pleasure. Such being our natural estrangement of heart from God, what can be the effect of unvarying prosperity but to build us up in ungodliness? We are strongly tempted to forgetfulness of God, even amid calamities and disasters, which remind us that 'the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong;'—and what but entire atheism can be expected to result, when no wish is ever frustrated, and no plan miscarries? The Psalmist describes nothing more than the natural working of a long course of prosperity, when he says of the wicked, 'Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.' Nor does the history of the world certify any fact more clearly than this, that disregard of God, self-dependence, worldly-mindedness, and hardness of heart, are the fearful price which men generally pay for an overflowing cup of earthly good. 'Give me not riches,' prayed the inspired son of Jakeh, 'lest I be full and deny Thee, and say, Who is the Lord!' 'Ah!' said the celebrated Dr Johnson, to the great comedian of the time, when the latter, in the full flush of his success, conducted the moralist over his splendid mansion and garden—'Ah! these are the things which unfit us for death, and make us unwilling to die!'

The Psalmist, then, recorded an experience regarding prosperity, which thousands have shared with him, when he said, 'Before I was afflicted I went astray.' But is his experience regarding affliction equally that of men generally? Is affliction as beneficial in its tendency as prosperity is perilous?

As prosperity is not necessarily the occasion of irreligion, so neither is affliction of piety. In the same way as men whose hearts are right with God may be very prosperous without being impious, men whose hearts are thoroughly ungodly may pass through 'a sea of troubles' without being at all loosened from the world, or led to God. Such cases, however, form the exceptions. Constituted as human nature is, adversity is usually a school of piety and virtue.

Let us suppose the case of an unawakened sinner, who has no thought about God, and no desire for any other portion than what the world seems capable of supplying. He is in high health; he has ample possessions, and still ampler prospects; his temper is cheerful; his society is courted; and no disappointment has ever occurred to scatter his day-dreams, or cool his ardour. In these circumstances, what has such a man to do with religion! Beyond the questions, 'What shall I eat, and what shall I drink?' there is nothing to excite his interest, or occasion him anxiety. As to his relation to God—the state of his soul—his prospects for eternity—these are matters which cannot be expected so much as to occur to his thoughts, far less to fill him with solicitude. Yet there is a way by which a wise and merciful God may reach the heart of this votary of the world! He may visit him with affliction; he may lay him on a bed of racking pain, or of wasting sickness; or he may consume from before his eyes the worldly portion on which his heart is set, and so convince him of the folly of resting for happiness on any thing under the sun. It does not indeed necessarily follow, that the visitation which is thus fitted to spoil his relish for created good, will work in him a moral change, and shut him up to God as the only source of felicity. For, alas! such is the perverseness of fallen man, that even affliction sometimes hardens, instead of softening, the heart, and weds more closely to the world, instead of divorcing from it. Still the suitability of such adversities as a means in the hand of the Divine Spirit for arresting and turning careless sinners, is apparent. And nothing more will happen than might be reasonably anticipated, if this gay and giddy worldling shall rise from his bed of sickness, or come forth after the shipwreck of his fortunes, a man completely changed,—a man, whom prosperity only confirmed in irreligion, but whom affliction has turned to God,—a man, whose experience warrants and requires the confession, 'Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word.'

But the effect of affliction is not exhausted when it has proved the occasion of turning a sinner, in the first instance, from the error of his ways. It leaves impressions behind it, and conveys lessons, which may be expected to operate for good throughout the whole remaining course of his pilgrimage. The child who has been scorched by unwarily meddling with gunpowder, learns to be cautious in handling it for the future; and must not the man who has seen the bitter fruits of sin in the sickness of his body or the remorse of his soul or the unhappiness of his family, learn from this experience to be on his guard against a lapse into his former evil courses? In this, and countless other ways, may affliction tend to the benefit of the Christian convert. And, so far, therefore, from being a thing to be deprecated, it is a thing to be desired by every one who would 'keep' God's 'word,' and carry within his bosom the treasure of a healed and holy heart.

If it be thus the tendency of affliction to recall us from our wanderings to God and duty, the practical inference is inevitable, that it is not only a good, but a responsible thing to be afflicted. The ordinary means of grace are admitted to entail a responsibility proportionate to their power of benefiting us; but the rule is equally applicable to our afflictions. Nor can those of us who have been often in the furnace be held guiltless, unless our purification from sin be commensurate with the refining power of the ordeal.

TENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'In all their affliction, he was afflicted,' Isaiah lxiii. 9.

DURING his abode on earth, the Lord Jesus, to whom these words refer, was afflicted with all the afflictions to which his people are exposed. His condition was indeed a continual affliction. His good name was vilified by slander; his beneficent acts repaid with ingratitude; his friendly counsels rejected with insult. Foes maligned him; friends deserted or betrayed him; devils mocked and tempted him; the God in whom he trusted hid his countenance from him! In short, there is no sorrow incident to man in this fallen state, excepting the misery which springs from conscious guilt and indwelling corruption, in which the blessed Jesus did not largely share; while over and above the ordinary 'shocks which flesh is heir to,' he had to drink to its dregs that cup of penal wrath, which is the rightful desert of all, and the destined heritage of the finally impenitent.

The fact that our blessed Lord thus endured in his own person every species of human affliction, constitutes the first and the chief element of comfort to the Christian mourner. In the sufferings of a sinless Saviour, he reads his own exemption from the penalty of sin. One who had no sins of his own to suffer for, and yet led a life of unexampled sorrow, must have been emptying the vials of wrath in behalf of others. On no other theory than this, can the afflictions of the Holy One and the Just be explained in consistency with the rectitude of the Divine government. And the mourner in Zion, therefore, is chargeable with no presumption, when he extracts strong consolation from the afflictions with which Christ was afflicted; and interprets them into an assurance that the cup of sorrow which he is called to drink in this vale of tears, is without one drop of gall, or one ingredient of wrath, to embitter its taste.

This view of Christ's sufferings, however—though it thus lies at the foundation of all true comfort—is not that by which the prophet here seeks to reconcile the mourner to his lot. The words do not run—'with all their afflictions'—but 'in all their afflictions, he was afflicted.' They relate, not to the sorrows which our sins caused the Saviour, but to the sorrows which our afflictions cause him. They speak of him as a sympathizing, rather than a suffering Saviour. He suffers, they assure us, when believers suffer; he grieves when they grieve; in all their afflictions, he is afflicted.

Being a partaker of human nature, Christ's personal experience of suffering could not but prompt and qualify him to feel for the woes of others. A mere man can scarcely pass through a course of severe trials, without acquiring a capacity of sympathizing with all who are similarly tried. And how then could He whose heart was an unfathomable fountain of sensibility and tenderness, fail to acquire in the school of adversity a fellow-feeling for his brethren in sorrow? Scripture reveals what at once commends itself to our faith, when it assures us that 'we have not an high priest who cannot be touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, but (one who) was in all points tried as we are, yet without sin.' And it deduces an inference from the fact, as irresistible as it is consolatory, when it adds, 'For in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted (or tried), he is able to succour them that are (similarly) tempted.'

It is accordingly not more certain that Christ while on earth was himself afflicted, than that he felt for the afflictions of others. Follow him along the whole course of his pilgrimage, and what do you behold, but a man ever ready to grieve more for the woes of others, than for his own? You seek for him in vain in the place of high festivity, or in the resorts of the gay and prosperous; his steps are unfamiliar with such haunts! But go to the wilderness where a multitude is fainting for lack of sustenance; and, behold! he is there to be 'moved with compassion on them.' Go to the gate of the city, where there is a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she a widow; and, behold! he is there to say to the widowed mourner, 'Weep not.' Go to the place of burial, where sisters are weeping over a brother's recent grave; and, lo! he is there to mingle his tears with theirs, and to whisper to their hearts the blessed assurance, 'I am the resurrection and the life.' Is Peter agitated with groundless alarm, and ready to sink, because the wind is boisterous? Jesus is by his side to re-animate his feeble faith. Is Mary weeping for her buried Lord, and disconsolately exclaiming, 'I know not where they have laid him?' Jesus is standing near to raise her drooping spirits, by the affectionate greeting, 'Mary!' When indeed did the Saviour ever behold affliction in any of its forms, and especially the mental distress which arises from tenderness of conscience, and anxiety about salvation, without having his sympathy awakened?

But is that heart which while on earth thus led at every spectacle of woe, less tender—less tuned to sympathetic feeling now? Assuredly no! My adorable Redeemer is still 'the man Christ Jesus;' and, though he occupies a throne, he is my brother still. A human heart throbs beneath the vesture of the King of kings? And I may feel as sure of his sympathy, now that he is at the right hand of God far above all principality and power, as if he were still my fellow-sufferer in this vale of sorrow. Nay, his exalted office as Head over all things to the Church, ought to impart a peculiar charm, in the Christian's estimation, even as it adds a peculiar efficacy, to his sympathy. It were cheering to know that we have a sympathizing friend in Heaven; but how much more cheering to be told that that friend is on the throne itself; that his fellow-feeling for our infirmities is not greater than his power to give effect to it; nay, that he holds and exercises his high prerogatives to the very end he may give effect to it. To know that my Saviour, my Advocate, my Teacher, my King—he who has all power committed to him in heaven and in earth—is my brother, and a brother born for adversity:—herein indeed is consolation. Christian mourner! take and enjoy this blessed consolation. Rest assured that exaltation has not changed the compassionate Jesus. Thy sorrows may be too sacred for the ear of an earthly friend; or thou mayest have no earthly friend to divide them by sharing them with thee. But they cannot be beyond the knowledge, and the sympathy, and the help of Him who is at once omniscient and all-merciful; who proved the reality of his love by dying for thee, and who lives and reigns that he may bless and save thee.

TENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' 2 Cor. iv. 17.

APART from its revelation of the future glory, the Bible makes many discoveries well fitted to reconcile the afflicted Christian to his lot. It teaches him that his trials proceed, not from blind chance or inevitable fate, but from the purpose and providence of God:—a consolatory discovery! It acquaints him that they are not the inflictions of an angry Judge, but the chastenings of a loving Father; a consideration more cheering still! It informs him—and appeals to his own experience in corroboration of the fact—that they are intended and fitted to advance his best interests, to withdraw him from sin, to wean him from the world, to allure him to God; a most blessed addition to his knowledge! And, most consolatory of all! it assures him that he is not left to suffer unnoticed and uncommiserated, but that he has the constant sympathy of a compassionate Redeemer who, though now exalted beyond the reach of evil, still retains a remembrance of his own unnumbered woes, and a fellow-feeling of the sufferings of his people!

Still, these blessed discoveries are not all that is necessary for the comfort of the child of sorrow. His lot and destiny, despite of them all, is still to suffer while life remains. 'Flesh,' according to the pregnant saying of Luther, 'remains flesh until the earth is thrown over.' Or rather, as Fenelon expresses the same sentiment, 'When we have nothing more to suffer, we have no longer to live—as a patient is dismissed from the hospital as soon as he is restored to health.' One thing more, therefore, is needed to sustain and cheer the Christian in this desert land; and this the Bible likewise provides, when it unveils to his faith 'the unsuffering kingdom,' and invites him, with hope as his guide, to go up and take possession—to anticipate his dismissal to its songs—and to compare the lightness of his afflictions here, with 'the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory' there!

To assist us in forming some conception of this reversion of glory, the apostle here introduces the figure of a balance—with the believer's afflictions in the one scale, and the glory of heaven in the other. And so 'light,' he assures us, is the former scale compared with the latter, that it at once kicks the beam. The 'afflictions' of earth are 'light,' and 'but for a moment;' whereas the 'glory' of heaven possesses a 'weight' which is 'far more exceeding and eternal.' Nor does he present us, in illustration of the subject, with merely a striking figure. He clothes the figure in language which is the very soul of energy. The phrase, 'a far more exceeding and eternal weight,' has in the original a force which defies translation; it exhausts even the strength of the Greek tongue; nor indeed can it be explained, except on the supposition that the apostle had in his mind a conception of the magnitude and magnificence of the glory destined for the Christian mourner, which made him feel how inadequate is the speech of earth to embody the thoughts of heaven!

The reversion of glory which thus awaits the afflicted believer has various properties which may well serve, by the contrast they afford to his present sorrows, to reconcile him to his lot.

In the first place, it is enduring, while his afflictions are only temporary. 'His affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for him an eternal weight of glory.' The life which now is, is short, and the sorrows which sadden it are evanescent; but the life to come is everlasting, and the blessedness to which it introduces knows no end! 'Frailty' is stamped upon every thing earthly, and even its miseries depart like a flowing stream; but the inscription on all things in heaven—on its objects, its pursuits, its inhabitants, its joys, is, 'FOR EVER.'

This reversion is, in the second place, as delightful as his present lot is distressing. Instead of 'affliction,' there shall be 'glory;' instead of 'light affliction,' 'an exceeding weight of glory.' Sweet to the weary body is anticipated rest; sweet to the endangered soul is the hope of deliverance! But the believer is encouraged to expect not rest only, but recompence—not safety only, but happiness—not exemption from all evil only, but enjoyment of all good! How consolatory such a prospect! how suitable to his circumstances! Now, he is subjected to physical suffering—to disease with its pain and languishing—to poverty with its numerous train of hardships—to death with its loathsome and humbling accompaniments. But, in heaven, he shall be freed from suffering—enriched with 'enduring substance'—and endowed with a 'charmed' and immortal life! Now, he is liable to be assailed by the tongue of calumny, to be reviled by those he labours to benefit, and despitefully entreated for his righteousness' sake. But, in heaven, he shall be numbered with the saints whom God has justified, and none can condemn—confessed by his Redeemer as his good and faithful servant—and honoured with the love and admiration of angels! Now, he is sometimes required to do violence to his strongest affections—counting not his property—his relatives—his life dear to him, that he may honour Christ. But in heaven, he shall obtain an inheritance which shall never be taken from him—friends who shall never desert him—a recompence which shall infinitely transcend all his sacrifices! Now, his heart is often troubled by the humbling consciousness of indwelling corruption, and his righteous soul vexed by the sight of abounding iniquity. But in heaven, he shall be placed beyond the fear and the capacity of sinning—attired in the beauties of holiness—and for ever associated with beings who are as perfect in purity as in happiness! What suffering too severe to be borne, when it is to be followed by such enjoyment! What night too dark to be cheerily endured, when it is to usher in such a morning!

Finally, this reversion of future glory stands related to his present afflictions, as their appointed and necessary result. 'His light affliction worketh for him an exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' Between the Christian's present position and future prospects, there exists not only a contrast but a connection. They are related to each other as means and end, as work and wages, as battle and victory.

'The path of sorrow, and that path alone,
Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown!'

No Christian, indeed, can be so ignorant as to suppose that his afflictions merit the heavenly inheritance. But though they do not purchase glory, they prepare him for it. They help him to mortify the sins that unfit, and to cultivate the graces that meeten, for its pure delights. They train him to a capacity for its enjoyments. They attune his taste and affections to a unison with its songs and sanctities. And, as by the gracious constitution of the new covenant the future recompence of the saints is apportioned to their present attainments, so they enable him, by improving them to the utmost, to secure for himself an exalted place among the redeemed—a crown of more than ordinary lustre—a position very near to the throne! O how light must affliction appear, when it is thus perceived to carry in its bosom the very germ of celestial blessedness—when it is seen to be, as it were, the crystal tomb in which the soul is nurturing its strength, and trimming its wings, to take its happy flight, as a perfect being, in the atmosphere of light and purity above! Privileged to read his coming destiny in his present trials, the Christian mourner may well exchange heaviness for rejoicing, and begin, even in this valley of tears, the song of the heavenly land!

Think on these things, ye mourners in Zion, and be comforted! Yet a little while, and the blessed prospect will be turned into reality!

—'Ye good distressed!
Ye noble few! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up awhile;
The storms of wintry time will quickly pass,
And one unbounded spring encircle all.'

ELEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation,' 1 Pet. i. 15.

The grand object of the economy of grace is to form us anew to the moral likeness of God—to make us holy even as God is holy. To this, as its ultimate end, all its parts and provisions are subservient. For this the Father devised the plan of mercy; for this the Son assumed the mediatorial office; for this the Holy Ghost becomes the paraclete of the church. We are justified, only that we may be also sanctified. We obtain a title to heaven through the perfect righteousness of our Substitute, only that we may further acquire the personal holiness which constitutes our meetness for its joys.

The gospel, having it thus for its ultimate end, to reassimilate us to the moral likeness of God, most naturally and properly holds forth the Divine holiness—that is, the perfect moral excellence of the Divine character—as the grand model after which we ought to aspire. Such a standard is confessedly above our reach, even as the heavens are above the earth. For, uniting, as it does, 'all that is pure with all that is kind—all that is lovely with all that is venerable—every excellence and all infinite,'—we may well say of it, 'It is high, we cannot attain unto it.' Yet, in selecting such a standard, the gospel has consulted the exigencies of God's people, not less than the accomplishment of its own gracious design. So far from being an objection to the Christian morality, it is its very glory, that it presents a model so perfect as to afford scope for indefinite and endless imitation. As no arrow can hit its mark unless the aim be taken towards a point still more elevated, so no progress can be made in holiness unless the pattern aspired after be one of superhuman excellence. There might be a temptation to pause in the pursuit of holiness, and a plea for supine contentment with present attainments, were we called to take for our exemplar merely the character of a fellow-creature. But having the all-perfect Creator for our pattern, we have a ceaseless reason and inducement to prosecute our pious labour with unflagging ardour. At no stage of sanctification, however advanced, can we stop and say, 'I have finished my task!' Let the heights of attainment we have reached be ever so elevated, there yet lie beyond peaks of holiness still higher—Alps above Alps of still rarer spiritual excellence. Having nothing less to acquire than entire and universal conformity to the Divine character, we must feel constrained to exclaim, even to the last sigh we draw, 'There is much land still to be possessed!'

'But granting that it is proper to set the highest example before me, and to expect me to strain towards it with untiring effort,—what does such an example avail so long as I am incapable of understanding it? I cannot summon up a well-defined conception of the Divine character! The holiness of a purely spiritual Being is a sublime abstraction which it baffles all my efforts to realize! I am dazzled by its glory, but I cannot discern its features! And how can I be expected to imitate that of which I have no precise conception? Let the believer who thus feels and reasons be reminded, that the Divine likeness which the gospel exhorts us to transcribe into our life and conversation is not that of a purely spiritual being—is not an aggregate of undefined and unimaginable attributes. In merciful accommodation to the weakness of his children, God has come down and dwelt in flesh, thus enshrining his perfections in the tabernacle of a human nature, and rendering his excellencies in some measure appreciable by our understandings, and level to our sympathies. True it is—most true! that a purely spiritual Being—a Being of whom we know not so much what he is, as what He is not—a Being whose eternity and infinitude paralyse our understandings and affections, even in their first outgoings towards Him—cannot be the object of imitation, more than of confidence and love, to creatures constituted as we are. But then let it be remembered, that He who came to declare the Father—He who himself said to his disciples, ‘he that hath seen me hath seen the Father,’—is no mere abstraction. In Jesus Christ we have One made like unto ourselves—with a body like our own—a soul like our own—perceptions like our own—passions like our own. In Him we behold One who breathed the same air with ourselves—stood in the same relationships—passed through the same chequered course of joy and suffering—died the same death—preceded us to the same heavenly glory. In Him, therefore, and in his life, we possess a model as intelligible as it is perfect—a model, by copying which we copy God—by conformity to which we become conformed to the Divine image. ‘Let us therefore,’ to adopt the words of Jeremy Taylor, ‘press after Jesus, as Elisha did after his master, with an inseparable prosecution, even whithersoever he goes, that according to the reasonableness and proportion expressed in St Paul’s advice, “As we have borne the image of the earthly, we may also bear the image of the heavenly.” For in vain are we called Christians, if we live not according to the example and discipline of Christ, the Father of the institution.’

ELEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

‘For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live,’ Rom. viii. 13.

THE state of grace on which the believer enters at conversion, is a middle state between that unregenerate condition in which he is born, and that condition of perfect purity to which he shall be ushered at death; and as it is intermediate to these two extremes in point of time, so it is also intermediate in point of character. It is neither all sin like the former, nor all sinlessness like the latter. It is a mixed condition. With a strong tendency to evil, there is conjoined a powerful love of holiness. There is much of ‘the old man,’ but there is also much of ‘the new man,’—much of miry clay, but also much of finest gold. The believer is conscious of the simultaneous existence within him of two antagonist principles—the flesh and the spirit; and he is called on to maintain a constant warfare, in which the flesh lusts against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh.

Conflict, however, is not the sole characteristic of this middle state: there is progression as well as conflict. It is not a state of ‘drawn battle,’ in which the two opposing principles are equally balanced. There is incessant war, but it is a war in which victory ever leans to the one side, and defeat disheartens the other. The state of grace does more than stretch over the lengthened space between unregeneracy and glory; it conducts from the one extreme to the other. It is a process of convalescence, in which disease is daily giving way, and healthful vigour re-asserting its dominion;—a process of refining, in which the baser metal is undergoing a gradual dissipation, and the silvery residuum waxing purer and brighter;—a ladder, like that seen in vision by the patriarch, which is planted indeed on the earth and partly enveloped in the fogs and smoke of this lower air, but which, nevertheless, stretches upward, and onward, and away, through the clear ether, to the better—even the heavenly country.

It is to persons professing to be in this mixed and progressive state, that the apostle addresses the words prefixed to this meditation; and his admonition relates to the discipline to which they ought to subject the earthward part of their character. ‘If ye live after the flesh,’ says he, ‘if ye foster and follow the impulses of remaining corruption, ye shall return to that state of spiritual death—the prelude of death eternal—from which ye profess to have passed; but if, through the help of the Holy Spirit, ye habitually resist and crucify your carnal nature, ye shall steadily advance in that spiritual life—which is eternal life begun.' In other words, mortification of indwelling sin, is, according to the apostle, at once essential to spiritual life and a means of life.

Mortification of sin is essential to spiritual life. The propensity to sin has no inherent tendency to decay, any more than the principle of holiness to flourish, in the human heart. On the contrary, the former is as truly indigenous, as the latter is exotic, to our nature; and in every instance, therefore, in which the two conflicting tendencies are left to their own spontaneous operation, it is inevitable that grace shall droop and die, while sin shall strengthen until it choke its antagonist, and overrun the soul. In point of fact indeed, no person who has been once savingly converted, is ever permitted to fall back into a state of absolute spiritual death. But the case of the backslider who, from neglect of self-restraint, relapses into worldliness, is decisive of the tendency of sin to resume its original dominion over the soul. And he, therefore, who foregoes the habit of self-mortification, must not only be, for the time, without any evidence of life, but have reason to question whether he has ever at all been made spiritually alive.

But mortification is also a positive means of life. There is indeed a species of mortification which is not even a sign of grace, far less an auxiliary of life. When a man, for example, mortifies one sinful affection, only that he may gratify another; or relinquishes an evil habit from regard to health or public opinion, or because age or infirmity has spoiled his relish for it, or under the delusive hope of thereby purchasing salvation; it would be preposterous to expect any such result as genuine amelioration of character, for such cessation from sin may consist with an unsubdued love of sin itself. True mortification, however,—mortification proceeding from hatred of sin and a sincere desire and determination to be delivered from it, cannot be exercised without helping forward the work of sanctification. What is the necessary effect upon a man's character of habitual abstinence from evil deeds, and unvarying resistance to depraved affections? Is it merely to break the chain of sinful habits, and weaken the power of sinful appetites? This is indeed one effect, and a most beneficial one. But is this all? Far from it! Does not the man who uniformly mortifies the deeds of the body and strangles unholy desire in its first motions, exercise, in this sacred warfare, various important principles of the new nature?

Does he not exercise, for example, strength of will, hatred of sin, concern for his own spiritual welfare, zeal for the honour of God? If he is strenuous and successful in keeping under the body, and crucifying natural inclination, to what does he owe this energy and success but to the ceaseless and growing vigour of such principles as these? Yet such principles are the very elements of the spiritual life—the very lineaments of the Divine likeness. In mortifying the deeds of the body, therefore, the believer does more than narrow the dominion of sin; he extends and strengthens the reign of holiness. And though ostensibly employed in carrying on only one of the two great moral processes to which the gospel calls him—the process of subduing the earthward part of his character, he yet actually, though only indirectly, advances the other and parallel process of strengthening and maturing the principles of his new and spiritual nature. Instead of living after the flesh and thereby incurring the risk of death, he mortifies the deeds of the body and thereby invigorates life.

TWELFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'That ye put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness,' Eph. iv. 22—24.

In entering upon the work of sanctification, the believer naturally begins with the renunciation of his outward sins, and the crucifying of his evil inclinations. A sense of sin is the first feeling which the Spirit awakens: a determination to break off sin by righteousness, the first purpose which the Spirit inspires. And as the works of the flesh are manifest, and even the depraved desires whence they proceed easily discernible by his now quickened conscience, he cannot but perceive it to be his duty to betake himself, at the very outset, to the task of withdrawing his members from the service of Satan, and engaging in conflict with the evil tempers and propensities to which he has been hitherto in bondage. This task, however, though specially incumbent immediately after conversion, is not confined to any single stage of the Christian life. Sin, though it ceases to reign, continues to exist, in the soul of the believer; nor can he reasonably calculate on ever arriving, on this side the grave, at such a state of perfect freedom from its evil promptings, as to warrant him to return his sword into the scabbard. The recorded experience of the most spiritually-minded believers would seem to justify the conclusion, that 'warfare till death' is the Christian's destiny and duty.

But mortification of sin is only one-half of the task which the expectant of heavenly glory is called to perform. Besides conquering sin, he has to acquire holiness. Besides putting off the old man, which is corrupt, he has to put on the new man, which is created after the moral likeness of God. The image of the earthly is to be effaced, only that the image of the heavenly may be re-stamped upon the soul. In a word, the sanctifying process is incomplete until there is a constant and universal prevalence of holiness over the whole man; until all the faculties of the inner, and all the members of the outward man, are not only delivered from the power of corruption, but 'consecrated to God in love, if not perfectly with respect to act, yet sincerely with respect to principle and purpose of dedication.' Sinless holiness is indeed out of the question, and cannot be matter even of expectation to any enlightened child of God, while encumbered with a body of sin. But at full sanctification, and nothing short of this—at sanctification which 'fills the whole man, leaving no part empty of good, and no part under the power of habitual evil, though in every part capable of increase'—the believer is bound, and should delight, to aim. Nothing less than this is his privilege, and nothing less should be his pursuit.

In the twofold process of putting off the old, and putting on the new man, the faculty of the soul which the believer has chiefly to exercise, and which the Spirit of God has chiefly to renew and strengthen, is the will, or, as the apostle denominates it, 'the spirit of the mind;' and accordingly the exhortation to 'be renewed in the spirit of your mind,' is placed in the centre of the passage before us, as having an equal reference to each of the two great duties enjoined, and as forming, in fact, the keystone that binds them into one sanctifying process. Let but the will be renewed, and the double result of mortified sin and progressive holiness is certain. The will is that which controls the whole man, and gives a character to his temper and history; and it is that, therefore, in which it is of supreme importance that grace rather than sin—God rather than Satan—should sit enthroned. Establish God's authority in the will, or in other words, make the path of holiness our choice, and nothing more is wanted to effect a thorough reformation of heart and life. The moment the will is given up wholly to God, obedience ceases to be a task, mortification of sin becomes easy, and the pursuit of holiness in all its branches a pleasurable exercise. How, indeed, should abstinence from sin be irksome to him whose choice and delight are fixed on holiness? How should Christ's yoke appear hard, or Christ's burden heavy, to him to whom conformity to the Redeemer is a matter of choice and desire? Such a man has the strongest of all inducements to holiness—even the love of it—the pleasure which he takes in it. Such a man resembles God; for the grand distinctive feature in the Divine character is, that he is righteous and holy, because he loves rectitude and purity!

But who can attain in this life to such a measure of likeness to God as this? Reader! men in all ages have done it; and thou thyself mayest do it. Provided thou hast already given thyself to the Lord, and obtained the forgiveness which is through faith in him, the path to complete sanctification is open before thee—the goal within thy reach! Only believe and press on! Abandon all known sin. Let thine eyes be habitually upon the bright and consummate model of excellence, whose temper and character thou art called to transcribe. Admire, adore, love Him—so that unconsciously, intuitively, and almost without an effort, thou mayest come to resemble him. And, above all things besides, pray for the Spirit—the sanctifying Spirit; for his light, that thou mayest discern more and more of the beauty and excellency of true holiness; for his power, that being baptized as with fire, thy dross may be consumed, thy tin purged, thy cold affections warmed, thy stony heart melted, and thy whole nature made to take the mould of the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

TWELFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death,'
Phil. iii. 10.

SANCTIFICATION, though it ought to be his ultimate end, is not the first thing which the sinner has to pursue. Being in a state of guilt and condemnation, he must first of all go to Christ for pardon and justification. So long as he is unforgiven, he is incapable of holiness. So long as he regards God as his enemy, he cannot love him—and where there is no love in the heart, there can be no holiness in the life! It is only when he is brought to the knowledge of Christ as his divinely appointed and accepted substitute, and repairs to him, saying, 'Lord Jesus, thou art my righteousness, and I am thy sin—thou hast taken on thee what was mine, and given to me what was thine!' that his enmity is slain, his confidence in God restored, and a disposition implanted to follow holiness, not as a legal condition of acceptance, but as a pleasure and privilege.

The cross is thus the only starting-post whence the race of sanctification can be commenced. But it is more. 'Looking unto Jesus,' is an attitude of mind as essential at every subsequent stage as at the outset of the Christian course. In fact, a realizing view of Christ is the very aliment and vitality of holiness. Like the diver who works at the bottom of the sea, the believer can subsist and labour only by virtue of supplies transmitted down to him from a higher element; and these supplies of life and strength—are they not all treasured up in Christ, and receivable only through the habitual exercise of faith in him? Accordingly, the apostle, when expressing his ardent desire after perfect meetness for the resurrection-glory, makes it his prayer—as the grand means to this end—that he 'may know Christ, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings.' 'Give me but this precious knowledge—this blessed experience,' he virtually says, 'and then I shall be certain to attain unto the resurrection of the dead—the resurrection from the death of sin here, and the resurrection to glory hereafter.'

'The power of Christ's resurrection' is merely another name for newness of heart and life; 'the fellowship of Christ's sufferings,' another name for mortification of sin; and to both these ends a knowledge of Christ is at once essential and conducive.

When you look at Christ's resurrection in the light in which scripture presents it, what do you behold? Not merely a man raised from the dead; not merely a vast miracle—a marvellous display of Almighty power! You connect the wonderful event with its final cause and proper effects. Remembering that Christ rose as your representative—you interpret his resurrection as the divine seal to the sufficiency of his obedience; and you read in the 'mighty power which God wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand,' a pledge that the same quickening energy will raise you alike from the death of sin, and from the dust of the tomb. And realizing these things, how can you fail to be quickened and comforted by the blessed contemplation! It is true, that the truths thus presented to you cannot of themselves communicate life to your soul, and that it requires the inscrutable agency of the Holy Spirit to render them effectual. But to these truths, the Spirit is pledged to give stringency and effect—these truths are his appointed instrument for quickening and sanctifying the soul. And you may, therefore, calculate with all confidence on obtaining, through faith in the reality and ends of Christ's resurrection, an experience of the 'power' of that resurrection—even an experience of 'the exceeding greatness of God's power to usward who believe.'

Nor is a knowledge of Christ less conducive to the other result prayed for, an experience of 'the fellowship of his sufferings!' In reference to his sufferings, no less than his resurrection, you are privileged to look on Christ as your Representative. 'These sufferings,' you are entitled to say, as you turn the eye of faith to the cross, 'are the penalty of my sins—that death, the expiation of my offences; and now the law, being magnified, has lost its power to damn me, and its right to reign over me!' You have thus virtual fellowship in Christ's sufferings, as well as the legal benefit of them. But can such virtual fellowship be believingly contemplated, without prompting you to crucify the flesh, and thereby become a real participant with Christ in suffering? Let the Spirit but exhibit, in their true colours, the hatefulness of those sins which brought your Redeemer to the dust of death, and the fearfulness of that wrath which but for his unutterable agonies, must have been your portion; and how shall you remain at peace with yourself, so long as any one sin has dominion over you? No doubt it is painful to deny one's self an inveterate evil habit!—to pluck out a right eye!—to cut off a right hand!—to tear asunder the old man limb from limb! 'It is no easy thing for a man to pursue his sins, as it were, to the cross—to nail them there—and to let them bleed till they expire.' But the spectacle of a crucified Saviour is surely sufficient to nerve you for the task—were it tenfold more irksome! Would you not cheerfully incur a painful sacrifice—though no benefit were to result therefrom—merely to evince your gratitude to a benefactor who had made you a rich present of gold or silver? And can you decline to crucify the old man for his sake, 'who hath given for you,' to adopt the words of Luther, 'not gold or silver, but himself; who hath received for you so many wounds; who hath undergone for your sake an agony and sweat of blood; who hath acquired for you a Father in heaven full of love;'

especially when this work of mortification is not more conducive to his glory, than to your own benefit? But fellowship of Christ's sufferings is not all painful; its pain is not without a high and peculiar pleasure. Jesus himself rejoiced in spirit, even while enduring the bitter cross; and are not you also enabled to say, 'Dying, yet behold I live; sorrowful, yet behold I rejoice?' In making sacrifices for Christ—in curbing and repressing the outbreaks of sin—there is a high and a stern delight. And irrespective of the growth in sanctification which such self-denial secures, and the blessedness in which that sanctification terminates, there is in the very consciousness of holy self-restraint, a sweetness—an ecstasy—a delectation, which verifies the saying in regard to every man who is daily dying unto sin, 'He alone has life who learns thus to die!'

THIRTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life,'
Rom. vi. 4.

ADAM, by whom sin entered into the world, was not only the public representative, but the natural root of all his posterity; and was therefore the means, when he fell, not only of involving all mankind in a state of condemnation, but of transmitting to them a corrupted nature. Christ, who came as the second Adam to repair the evils introduced by the first, stands to his spiritual progeny in two correspondent relations. While he is, on the one hand, the representative or substitute through whom the redeemed obtain a reversal of the sentence of condemnation, he is also, on the other hand, the vital head from whose fulness they derive a new and spiritual life. As in the former capacity he accomplished a work for them, by which they are constituted legally righteous, so in the latter capacity he effects a work in them, by which they are rendered personally righteous.

The two characters thus sustained by Christ, though essentially different, are yet closely connected. Indeed, his power as the vital head of his people, is the appointed and necessary result of his work as their substitute. He undertook the latter that he might be entitled and qualified to exercise the former. And when therefore at his resurrection he obtained gifts for men, and was invested with the prerogative of dispensing these gifts out of his own fulness, he received nothing more than the stipulated wages and rightful reward of his previous labour of love.

To the benefits flowing from Christ in both his characters, the sinner is admitted the moment he believes the gospel—faith being the link by which the Spirit unites him to the Redeemer. And as Christ's work as substitute was subservient to his investiture with the honours and privileges of vital head, so the new relation to God into which the sinner is brought by having the Surety's righteousness imputed to him, is subsidiary and conducive to his attainment of a new and holy character. Unbelievers do not comprehend how a free remission and acquittal on the ground of a vicarious righteousness, should not tend to licentiousness rather than holy living. But he who possesses these blessings, knows that he has obtained the benefit of Christ's death. only that he may experience the power of Christ's resurrection; and the new principles which are infused into his mind through union with his Head, naturally constrain him to die to sin, and to walk in newness of life. What are the views and feelings which necessarily occupy the soul of the man who realizes his union with Christ? Does he not look upon himself as having virtually suffered the penalty of sin, when his surety died, and as therefore set free from its right to rule over him? Does he not feel somewhat as a criminal might be supposed to do, who, after suffering the last penalty of the law, and thereby acquiring an experience of the bitter effects of crime, had been miraculously restored to life in order to exhibit by a new course of conduct the salutary fruits of this dear-bought experience? Would not this criminal feel constrained to reason thus with himself, 'Have I already died by the hand of sin, and shall I now expect to live by it? Have I endured so much agony and shame on account of it, and shall I now be so foolish as to expose myself by continuing in it to a renewal of these unutterable woes?' It is true the case of the believer is not exactly parallel to that of a criminal in the circumstances supposed, for he has not himself actually suffered; he has only virtually suffered in the person of his surety. But does this consideration tend to weaken his impression of the exceeding sinfulness and ruinous tendency of sin? On the contrary, does it not serve to deepen it? His own sufferings and death might have taught him the evil and desert of sin; but surely not so affectingly as the sufferings and death of ONE, who united the Divine to the human nature, and voluntarily paid his debt out of love to his soul?

As he realizes the sufferings of Christ in his stead, he cannot but conclude that the sin which required such a costly sacrifice to expiate it, is a thing essentially and utterly abominable; while the view which is presented of the Saviour's disinterested love, cannot but send the lesson home with constraining power to his heart. The thought that a divine Redeemer pitied and loved him so tenderly as to submit to bleed and die for his deliverance, is even more touching than the thought that sin is such an evil that no inferior sacrifice could have atoned for it; and while he looks, therefore, at the cross, his own heart must be pierced with contrition—his own soul melted to penitence, the love of sin killed, and the resolution spontaneously formed to turn from all iniquity. O, there is no fear of the interests of holiness suffering from faith in the free pardon of sin! Clog the justification of a sinner with qualifying conditions, and men may remain dead in sin; for by thus limiting its freeness, you rob it of all power to melt and subdue the heart. But let its unfettered freeness be seen—let sinners perceive that they do not require to labour for pardon, but simply to accept the pardon which a gracious Saviour has already purchased, and their souls will be drawn to Christ with a force of affection sufficient to emancipate them from the tyranny of evil!

'Talk they of morals, O thou bleeding Lamb,
The grand morality is love of Thee!'

Nor is a view of his union with Christ as his vital head less sanctifying to the believer, than a persuasion of union with him as his substitute. When he looks to Christ as a risen and reigning Saviour, what does he behold but an argument and encouragement to newness of life? Is not Christ exalted to give life to his people? Is He not entrusted with the 'well of life?' Is it not His office to dispense the Spirit—to intercede for his people, and to ensure their sanctification? Is He not, in short, their life, inasmuch that it is not so much they that are alive, as Christ that liveth in them? Can such considerations be other than most purifying, most consolatory? To feel that I am one with a Saviour thus exalted and thus occupied,—that I am a member of that mystical body through which the Spirit, poured without measure on the Head, freely and abundantly circulates,—that indissolubly united to him, I have continual access to his fulness, and am sure of being ultimately made to share in his glory:—why this is to live in a region far removed above the world of sin and death,—this is to breathe an atmosphere in which evil cannot but languish, and holiness strengthen;—this is 'newness of life!'

The believer's union with Christ is thus not only the source of his sanctification, but a stimulant to it. And what his union thus enables and induces him to aim at, his public profession as a Christian pledges him to pursue. He has been baptized into the death of Christ,—nay, 'buried with Christ in baptism;' and in the act of emerging from the mystical waters into the open air of heaven, he has virtually declared that he is washed from the guilt and pollution of sin, that he may henceforward walk in the beauty of holiness. Baptism, indeed, is only a sign of the communicated purity of the Christian; nor is the language of the apostle to be regarded as expressive of an inseparable connection, far less an actual identity, between the outward rite and the spiritual grace. Baptism is called a death unto sin by a common rhetorical figure, in the same way as the elements in the Lord's supper are denominated the body and blood of Christ. Still this sacrament—though only an emblem—is a most impressive one; and by partaking of it, the believer necessarily proclaims his death unto sin, and resurrection to holiness. By giving myself to Christ in a mental act, I do indeed lay myself under invincible obligations to walk with him in newness of life: but by publicly avouching my union with him at baptism, I add the solemnity of a vow to the sacredness of an act of self-surrender. Like the youthful Carthaginian, I swear at the altar of the Lord an eternal and irreconcilable enmity with the devil, the world, and the flesh; and now no compromise may be entered into, no armistice may be negotiated! My dismissal from the Church militant to the Church triumphant, can alone be allowed to terminate the contest!

THIRTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things,' Tit. ii. 10.

THE leading phrase in this verse—'adorn the doctrine of God'—may sound strange to some readers. What, they may ask, is it possible to 'adorn' the doctrine of God?—to embellish, by human comment or human practice, the pure and perfect truths of the gospel—the truths which, instead of needing the foreign aid of ornament, are 'when unadorned, adorned the most?' To attempt such a thing—what is it but 'To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,

To throw a perfume on the violet.'

Yet there is a sense in which it is practicable to 'adorn' the doctrine of God. The design, let it be remembered, of 'adorning' an object is not so much to add to its intrinsic value or beauty, as to commend it to the admiration of beholders; and to this it is by no means essential that the thing which recommends, should be superior, or even equal, to the thing recommended. A fine scholar may obviously reflect credit on his teacher, and so recommend him to others—though the attainments of the pupil fall greatly below those of the preceptor. And in like manner a Christian may shed lustre on the lessons of the gospel—bear living witness to its hallowing and gladdening influence—and thus commend it to the admiration and acceptance of others; even though the best illustration he is able to offer, whether by his lips or by his life, come immeasurably short of its intrinsic excellence and glory.

In this verse, however, there is more to surprise the reader than the terms in which it is expressed. Who are the persons whom the apostle expects and requires to 'adorn' or recommend the doctrine of God? Are they persons whose stations or offices invest them with peculiar facilities for influencing their fellow-men? Men of rank, who occupy a position in society whence all may behold their virtues? Ministers of Christ, whose office furnishes them with constant opportunities of expounding the principles, and exemplifying the spirit of the gospel? Martyrs, who lead the van of the Christian host, and are necessarily 'a spectacle to men and angels?' Not at all! It is of persons of a very different class that the apostle speaks; it is of the mean, not the mighty of this world; the despised, not the exalted; the rude and unlettered, not the polished and erudite; it is bondmen and bondwomen: individuals belonging to the humblest class of society! 'Exhort servants,' says he to Titus, 'that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.'

But the most startling thing still remains. In what way are these humble persons to recommend the gospel? Is it by services and sacrifices of a peculiarly sacred kind? Is it by much prayerfulness, by strict sabbath-keeping, by zeal and liberality in supporting schemes of Christian usefulness? So most readers would have expected! Yet how different is the fact! Not a word does the apostle drop about purely religious duties, indispensable as these doubtless are. He speaks exclusively of duties of an entirely opposite class. The Christian's 'ornaments,' according to this passage, are not the sacred, but the secular virtues; not the shining services which draw the eyes of the brethren, but the homely and every day duties which pass under the eye of the world. 'Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity, that (thus) they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.'

Nor is it difficult to discover substantial reasons why an apostle should thus single out persons of humble station as the adorners of the gospel, and specify common duties as those on which its honour is chiefly staked.

It is to be remembered, in the first place, that persons of humble station form the great majority of Christians. 'Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, and things which are not, hath God chosen, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.' And would it not, then, be to rob the great mass of Christians of a noble privilege, if only the great and powerful were capable of adorning the doctrine of God—if no services were fitted to recommend the gospel but such as require wealth, and leisure, and high accomplishment to perform them? Blessed be God, there is no such exclusiveness in gospel privilege! The peasant has it in his power no less than the peer, to shed around him the savour of Christ. Servants! ye are not precluded from reflecting honour on the name of your Redeemer. Children of the poor! ye are not shut out from the high distinction of being fellow-workers with God. Not one man upon the earth, however narrow his sphere or scanty his substance, but may do something for God—but may have his lowly condition exalted, his homely employment ennobled, by the lustre of a pure and virtuous life!

Let it be also remembered, in the second place, that a faithful discharge of common duties tells more powerfully with the world in favour of religion, than any observance of the offices of piety. Worldly men are not surprised to find Christians giving themselves to sabbath-keeping, and other sacred services; neither do they believe that strictness of religious profession requires any great strength of principle, or affords any security for honesty and diligence in the ordinary affairs of life. How mightily then must it tend to convince them, that Christian principle is more than a name—is really a thing of power—when they behold its professors discharging, with all good fidelity, the various duties of their station and callings! Let a worldly master be made to see that his Christian servant is, of all others, the one who most sacredly watches over the interests of his purse and property: or let a worldly parent be made to perceive that of all his children, the one who is most given to his Bible is also the one who is most dutiful to himself; and how shall either of them be able to resist the inference, that Christianity is indeed a thing of high worth and holy efficacy? To excel in attention to duties of a purely sacred kind, may perhaps be the surest way to recommend ourselves to the admiration of our fellow Christians; but the way to advance the credit and esteem of our religion in the world, is to show all good fidelity in the relations of common life—to be firm to our word and faithful to our engagements, and to evince in all things an inflexible adherence to the law of rectitude and kindness.

A faithful discharge of common duties is also, in the third place, the best test of the actual presence and power of religious principle. It is not in the sanctuary, or under the public eye, that character is most undisguisedly disclosed. In public, men occupy an open stage, where they are tempted to play a part and exhibit themselves to the best advantage. It is only when they retire behind the scenes—when they return to the workshop or mingle in the family, that their minds, as well as their persons, appear in an undress. It is comparatively easy to preserve the semblance of piety when surrounded by the godly, or exposed to the excitement of sacred services. In such scenes and employments there is a charm which precludes the access of temptation, and enables the hollow professor not only to impose on himself, but to pass muster with others as a genuine saint. But it is otherwise amid the cares, and crosses, and petty annoyances of common life. Amid the tear and wear of every-day avocations, a man's temper is put to a severe test; nor is it possible that an assumed character can be long preserved, when every hour brings provocations to fretfulness—facilities for acting fraudulently—opportunities of advancing one's own interest at the expense of his neighbours. The apostle James describes the person who offends not in word as 'a perfect man,' that is, a man whose character has all the completeness which arises from the predominance of Christian principle: and the same may be said of every one who, amid the manifold temptations of his daily occupation, rises superior to the impulse of evil, and dorns his religion in all things.

Ought it not to be added, in the last place, that the example of Christ stamps a peculiar value and honour on the duties of common life? We do not exhaust the amount of honour which our Lord put on the station of the lowly, when we recal the fact that, in relinquishing his glory for humiliation, he took on him the form of a servant. His marvellous condescension in this respect was followed up by the diligent discharge, for thirty years together, of the duties of a humble sphere. Large as was the portion of time allotted by him to the performance of his sacred function as God's messenger, larger far was that which he devoted to the humble duties devolving on him as a son, a brother, a neighbour, a friend, a subject. And why was this, if not to show that this class of duties possessed in his eyes a very high importance, and was to be supremely binding on his followers? O, if He who is the Christian's exemplar, deemed it befitting to spend the greater part of his life in fulfilling the obligations and offices belonging to the lowly condition in which he was born and reared, how grievously must they mistake their Christian vocation, who reckon the duties of their ordinary callings beneath their notice—who disparage them as secular things which afford no scope for the culture of spiritual-mindedness—or who conclude that they sufficiently adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, when they merely display a flaming zeal for Christian truth, and a high esteem for Christian ordinances!

FOURTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure;
Phil. ii. 12, 13.

THE grand privilege of the Christian dispensation is the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the souls of believers. Under the Jewish economy, though God dwelt with men on the earth, the symbols of his presence were restricted to a local temple. During the period, too, of Christ's residence in flesh, the Divine abode was in a visible sanctuary—the temple of Christ's human nature. But when the Redeemer ascended to his kingdom, and received, as one reward of his mediatorial work on earth, the right of dispensing the agency of the Holy Ghost, a new and more comprehensive economy was ushered in. God, instead of any longer confining the manifestation of himself to a sensible or local habitation, vouchsafed to make the souls of believers his dwelling-place. And now the brotherhood of the saints, and not any material fabric—the worshippers, and not the walls which enclose them—constitute his temple. ‘Know ye not that believers are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in them?’

The object of the Spirit, in dwelling with his people, is to form, maintain, and perfect the life of holiness in their souls. He finds his temple full of defilement, with strange fire on its altar, and the tables of the money-changers in its court; and his gracious purpose in visiting it, is to purge it of its pollution, and consecrate it anew into the sanctuary of God, so that the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, and the din of the traffickers, may give place to the holy ministry of praise, and prayer, and good works! In effecting this blessed transformation, the Spirit deals with man as a free agent—not forcing him, or even leaving him to remain an inactive spectator, but engaging, stimulating, and directing the exercise of his rational powers. He anoints our eyes, that we may understand the things of Christ; he renews our will, that we may comply with their dictates, and have a taste of their sweetness; he quickens our conscience, that we may nicely discern, and promptly decide, between the competing claims of Christ and sin; he purifies and elevates our affections, that, turning away from the broken cisterns of worldly good, we may seek and find our happiness in God. In a word, he so takes of the things of Christ and shows them to our souls, as to render them vital, influential, operative principles—the very aliment and sustenance of the spiritual life.

As the Spirit, in sanctifying us, thus ‘worketh’ by means of our rational powers, and not independently of them, his presence and operations are indistinguishable from the proper and independent action of our own minds. The fact of his indwelling and influence is known in no other way, than the omnipresence of Deity in creation is known—from faith in the Divine testimony, and observation of the effects produced. But is this glorious privilege, on this account, the less certain, or the less valuable? Is it necessary that we should discern the Spirit by any peculiarity of immediate sensation, in order to be persuaded that he is with us and within us, and that he is ‘mingling his operations with our own government of our will and affections?’ Who pretends to be able to discriminate between the diabolical suggestions of Satan, and the spontaneous workings of his own corrupt nature? And why should we expect to be wiser with reference to the operations of the antagonist influence? In truth, our incapacity to distinguish the movements of the Spirit from the workings of our own minds, is an inevitable result of the method which the Divine agent vouchsafes to adopt in sanctifying us—the method of actuating and guiding our faculties, rather than overbearing them, or dispensing with their co-operation. And this method of influencing us, instead of lessening, serves mightily to enhance, the honour conferred on us by the residence of Deity in our souls. It shows that the Eternal Spirit sets a high estimation on the constitution and laws of our nature. It shows that he will not do violence to our faculties—even to save our souls! He will use them as his instruments, but he will not force them! He will honour them, by employing them as his ministers; but he will not put on them the dishonour of employing them without our own concurrence!

It cannot occasion surprise that the apostle should adduce this grand privilege of Christians, as a persuasive to personal diligence in working out our own salvation. Why, the very thought of such an august presence within us, must tend to put the soul in a pious frame! King Solomon, when presiding at the dedication of the temple, was so overwhelmed with the thought of Jehovah deigning to abide between the cherubim, that he exclaimed, ‘But will God in very deed dwell with men on the earth? behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain him; how much less this house that I have built!’ Can we feel less overawed, when we realize the presence of the Eternal Spirit in these polluted hearts of ours? That God has come to us, instead of requiring us to go to him!—that he is mysteriously about us and within us—watching us, counselling us, striving with us; that, go where we may, do what we please, we cannot escape from him; but are either led by his Spirit, or else grieving and resisting his Spirit!—how solemnizing, how searching such a consideration! how fitted to rebuke every rising of unholy desire, and to hush every pulse of sinful passion! It is, however, the thought of the Spirit’s co-operation, rather than of his indwelling, that forms the chief incentive to holy living. Indeed, a sense of his holy presence would only fill the soul with dismay, were it unattended with an assurance of his Almighty help. Happily, this is not our situation! The infinite Spirit abides with us, not merely to show us the plagues of our own hearts, but to vouchsafe us his aid in effecting a cure. And knowing this, how can we ever lack either the inducement or the ability to ‘cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord?' True, we are weak, and the work given us to do is arduous; but can we doubt of accomplishing it, when He is with us to lend his co-operation—the Almighty power! Though he is free and sovereign, are we not authorized to expect the helps of his grace, whensoever we realize and feel our dependence on his agency; and, therefore, to enter upon every incumbent duty, however difficult, with the heaven-taught resolution, 'I will go in the strength of the Lord God!' The host of Israel, though but a handful compared with the armies of the aliens, never hesitated to join battle, when they knew that the ark of the Lord was among them:—and need we shrink from encountering our spiritual foes—even though their name be 'legion'—when He who dwelt above the ark by a visible symbol, dwells in us by his Spirit? Why refuse to stretch forth the withered hand, when He commands, who issues healing virtue with the command? Why decline to work out our own salvation, when it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure?

Nor is the persuasion of this glorious and present help a stronger incentive to diligent, than it is to anxious effort, in fulfilling our mission as Christians. While it persuades us to 'work out our own salvation,' it equally persuades us to work it out with 'fear and trembling.' The expression 'fear and trembling,' may possibly refer to the risk to which believers are exposed, of forfeiting and losing the aid of their mysterious visitant, by insensibility to their privilege, or misimprovement of it. It is a fearful consideration, that the Divine agent is susceptible of offence; and that, as he will not work in us against our will, so he may be constrained, by our neglect or perversity, to suspend his gracious offices, or even wholly to abandon us. When the threatened destruction of the Jewish temple drew nigh, there was heard from its recesses a mysterious sound, as of a rushing army, and a voice saying, 'Let us depart hence!' A similar departure of its occupant may be expected, when the temple of the Holy Ghost is defiled; when impure thoughts are indulged; when duty is neglected; when lukewarmness takes the place of zeal; and worldliness of piety. Surely such a consideration may well fill us with 'fear and trembling,' and self-jealousy. Tremble, O my soul! lest thou shouldst involve thyself in such an awful calamity! Help me, O my God, to woo the Spirit to stay, instead of tempting him to depart! Whensoever carnal endanger my spirituality of mind, let me abhor and resist them as a sacrilegious profanation of the sanctuary! And whensoever, on the contrary, I am favoured with an experience of pious emotions—of peculiar tenderness of conscience—of ardent love for Christ—of burning indignation against myself for my unworthiness of his love; let me detain and sanctify the solemn impressions—regarding them as that fine climate of the soul, where the work of the spiritual husbandry may be most effectually advanced—as auspicious gales of Divine influence, to which I should spread every sail, that I may be smoothly wafted onward to Immanuel's land!

FOURTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me,' John xvii. 17, 20, 21.

WHILE 'the Holy Ghost who proceedeth from the Father and the Son,' is the great agent in regenerating and sanctifying the soul, it is important to remember, that in accomplishing the gracious work he employs the intermediate instrumentality of the word. His method is to take the things of Christ as exhibited in the gospel, and show them to the soul. He enlightens us, but it is by means of the truth contained in the word. He persuades us, but it is by means of the arguments and motives revealed in the word. He instructs, commands, promises, threatens, importunes, stimulates, and actuates, but only through the moral suasion and native influence of the truth. Accordingly, while our Lord recognises the necessity of divine influence, by praying in behalf of his disciples that the Father would sanctify them, he equally declares the necessity of the intermediate instrumentality, by adding, 'Sanctify them through thy truth—thy word, which is truth.'

Nor is the word—and especially that part of it which by way of distinction is called the truth—the truth respecting the person and work of Christ, unadapted to this important office. On the contrary, it is admirably suited as a moral means to purify the soul and ameliorate the character, being indeed framed and fitted by infinite wisdom for this very end. "All Scripture being given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' Not more nicely adapted is light to the human eye, or melodious sound to the human ear, or atmospheric air to the human lungs, than the word, 'which is truth,' to the nature and constitution of the human mind. Nor, in point of fact, can this divine instrument be brought into direct contact with our souls, by being understood and believed, without leading us to repentance, love, and new obedience; without informing the intellect, renewing the will, quickening the conscience, humanizing the temper, and sanctifying the life. In consequence, indeed, of our natural depravity we are averse to the truth; and so effectually does this unhappy state of the heart bar up the approach to our understandings, that we require the Spirit to anoint our eyes and change our hearts, before we can discern its import and excellence, or experience its moral impression. But still the word contains all the materials of sanctification, all the doctrines which are to be believed, all the precepts which are to be obeyed, all the considerations which are to move and influence us in the work of holiness. And apart from the study of its contents, we may seek all our life long for the aid of the Spirit, without receiving one beam of heavenly light, or one drop of heavenly comfort! Comparing the soul to the wax which is to be impressed, the word is the seal which communicates the impression, and the Spirit the heat which prepares the wax for receiving it; and just as it would be absurd to expect the intended impression to be made on the wax by applying the heat, without also applying the seal whereon the image and superscription are engraved, so it is unwarrantable to expect the Holy Ghost to sanctify the soul, without the study of that divine record which alone contains the materials of edification. The Spirit indeed, like the heat to prepare the wax, must be there; but the word, like the seal to convey the impression, must likewise be there. The one agency is ineffectual without the other; the word is necessary as the means of stamping the divine likeness on the soul; the Spirit as the means of putting the soul in a moral state capable of discerning the glory of the word and of being persuaded by it. And the doctrine, therefore, which every one who desires to be 'one' in character with the Father and the Son, ought habitually to remember and act upon, is, that while the word without the Spirit cannot, the Spirit without the word will not sanctify!

Let me, then, guard against the error of expecting sanctification by the direct and immediate agency of the Spirit, without the use of means, and in particular the diligent study of the word. Reliance on the Spirit, and prayer for his help, are indeed indispensable; but reliance is presumption, and prayer a vain oblation, when the word is not hid in the heart, and kept in contact with the soul. The province of the divine Teacher is not to communicate any new revelation, but simply to take of the things of Christ, and reveal them to the soul; and it is superstition or enthusiasm to ascribe to his influence any light, or experience, or joy, which is without the warrant of Scripture to support it. The Spirit adds nothing to what is already in the Bible. His influence (let the comparison be made with reverence,) is but the telescope which renders visible the countless lights in the firmament of revelation,—the microscope which discloses to our wondering gaze the unsuspected glories which crowd every portion of scripture. And, as the stars of divine truth are shining on in their glory, and its minor lights and lessons all sparkling in the sacred page—though the unaided eye of the natural man discerneth them not, so the way in which alone I can experience their genial heat and radiance, and through their assimilating influence become one with God and Christ and my fellow-Christians, is not to turn away my gaze from these spiritual heavens, but habitually to observe and contemplate them—adding devout prayer for those enlarged powers of vision which it is the province of the enlightening and quickening Spirit to impart!

---

FIFTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.' John xiv. 27.

WHAT Christ here bequeaths is doubtless the peace which he came into the world to obtain for his followers, and which his apostle beautifully describes as 'the peace of God which passeth understanding, and keepeth the heart and mind through Christ Jesus.' It is the inward peace of a forgiven and justified soul—the sensible peace in the heart, which springs from actual peace with God. This peace is the Redeemer's dying blessing to every true disciple; and it is enjoyed by every such person in a measure proportioned to the liveliness and constancy of his faith. While he remains without faith in God's forgiving love, he can have no true peace; for his conscious guilt must prompt him to regard his judge as his enemy, and to recoil with instinctive dread from his presence—even as the untamed inferior animals flee from the presence of man. But whenever he is brought to look upon God as a reconciled father through Christ, his suspicions are allayed, and his confidence excited. His soul enters into peace. He realizes the Divine love to himself, and he loves God in return. God looks down on him 'with the gracious smile of paternal benignity,' and he looks up to God with the happy confidence of a forgiven child.

This 'peace' Christ was well entitled to bequeath. It was to procure it that he left his heavenly throne; it was to put himself in a position to acquire it, that he stooped down to the humble and sorrowful estate of man; it was to purchase it, that he paid down the immense price of his own most precious blood. It was his, therefore, by conquest; and consequently his to destine and bequeath.

This 'peace' was a legacy worthy of Christ to leave. No bequest could have been bestowed more accordant with the design of his mission—more suited to the exigencies of his followers—more desirable in itself! He might have left us riches, for 'the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;' but what could the wealth of a world have done to heal our troubled hearts? He might have loaded us with honours, for 'both riches and honour come of him:' but what could all earth's heraldry have availed to rescue us from the misery of conscious guilt, or the dread of coming retribution? Blessed be his name! he has left us what is far more precious—even a holy peace of heart, which produces real and abiding happiness; which adds relish to the cup of prosperity, and sweetens the bitter draught of sorrow; which keeps the spirit calm in life, and raises it to a holy confidence in the prospect of the grave. Who that knows any thing either of the wretchedness of being estranged from God, or of the felicity of reconciliation, would desire a better legacy!

'Give what Thou canst, without it I am poor;
And with it rich, take what Thou wilt away!'

This 'peace' Christ bestowed—not reluctantly or sparingly, or only for a season, as the world bequeaths its gifts; but freely, fully, and for ever. Not with the grudging repugnance of the worldly man who would outlive his heirs if he could, and who relaxes his hold of the property accruing to them, only when he can no longer retain it; not with this cold reluctance did the Redeemer confer this dying blessing on his people. Though it had cost him untold sacrifices to acquire it, yet he had acquired it, only that he might have it to bestow; and when therefore he gave it, it was with the cordiality of one who knew that it is more blessed to give than to receive. And what he gave, he gave for ever; for the gifts of Christ 'are without repentance!' The world's gifts concern only the perishable body; but Christ's peace is designed for the undying soul. The world has nothing to confer, which is not alike unsatisfying in its nature, and evanescent in its duration; but the peace of Christ is a well of living water that springeth up into everlasting life.

No wonder it should be said to those who possess such a legacy, 'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid!' What, indeed, is there in the world that can reasonably disquiet the man who knows that God is his friend, and heaven his home! Equanimity is confessedly the grand secret of human happiness; and where is equanimity to be found, if not in the breast of him who has the peace of God to keep his heart and mind through Christ Jesus? What are the crosses and cares of the world to him who has cast the burden of all his concerns on the Lord, and feels that they cannot be in better hands? What is death, with all its gloom and ghastliness, to him who has committed his soul to the keeping of Christ, the conqueror of death, and believes that the grave is the road to his heavenly home? The peace—the transient, unstable peace—which the world can alone bestow—the peace which springs from lightness of heart, and briskness of spirits—or from unbroken prosperity—or from carnal security, may well give way at the shock of adversity, or the approach of death. But it is amid these very scenes that the believer's peace may be expected, not merely to shine serene, but to gleam with refulgent lustre. It is when the cloud is darkest, that the bow of peace spans it with the most brilliant hues!

FIFTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ,' Rom. v. 1.

It must be obvious to every thoughtful mind, that nothing short of a perfect righteousness—an entire and universal conformity to the divine law—can bear the scrutiny of a holy God, or form the ground of acceptance in his sight. Yet if this be so, what is to become of fallen man, who so far from having a spotless obedience to rely on, cannot point, during a whole lifetime, to so much as one act of unexceptionable obedience? The gospel mercifully solves the difficulty, by revealing a righteousness performed by another in the sinner's room, prepared to his hand, and freely tendered for his acceptance. It acquaints us, that Jesus the eternal Son of God, by taking our flesh and fulfilling in our stead the precepts and the penalties of the law, has brought in an everlasting righteousness. It holds forth this righteousness as the robe of 'fine linen, clean and white,' in which the sinner may attire himself. And it assures us, that such is its superlative worth in the eye of heaven—such its infinite sufficiency as a plea to justification, that on the ground of it—even though wholly external to himself—the guiltiest child of Adam may look upward to his Judge in heaven, and onward to the judgment day, not only without tormenting dread, but in the full assurance of an honourable acquittal.

But how is the sinner to become personally interested in this vicarious righteousness? The answer is, 'By faith.' 'Being justified,' says the apostle, 'by faith.' 'Faith' here means not faith or belief abstractedly considered, nor even faith in every thing which God reveals, but faith in the person and righteousness of Christ—faith inclusive of its object. So long as the sinner is without this faith, it is the same to him as if no vicarious righteousness had been provided—he remains in Adam, and consequently under the guilt and condemnation of sin. But the moment he has this faith, he becomes one with Christ; Christ's righteousness is put to his account; and he is held to have suffered for his sins when Christ suffered—to have fulfilled the law when Christ obeyed. Not that faith is necessary as a meritorious addition to Christ's righteousness! Far from it! Faith is simply the empty hand that receives Christ's righteousness: and it is wholly exercised in giving credit to truths which expressly exclude all merit and boasting on the part of the sinner. To believe that I am a lost sinner, and wholly incapable of doing anything to purchase acceptance with God—can there be any merit in this? To believe that my restoration to the divine favour is due, not in any measure to myself, but wholly to the work done for me by another—can there be any adding to the righteousness of Christ in this? To believe that the way to honour God's law both in its command and in its curse, is not to rely on my own doings, but to trust to Christ for righteousness—can there be anything like dividing with Christ the glory of salvation in this? Yet what is the faith which is indispensable to justification—what? but simply the believing of these things?

An immediate result of this faith is 'peace with God'—actual peace on the part of God towards the sinner, and sensible peace in the sinner's own heart. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God.' 'Peace with God' in the sense of reconciliation on the part of God, is a self-evident result, or rather accompaniment, of justifying faith. In fact, it is merely another name for justification, considered as the act of God: for faith, according to the constitution of the new covenant, unites the sinner to Christ—attires him in Christ's righteousness—and consequently renders him an object on which God may look—no longer with the anger of an offended Sovereign, but with the complacency of a reconciled Father.

'Peace with God,' in the other and more common sense of peace in the sinner's own conscience, is a less obvious, but equally certain and immediate, result of justifying faith. It is indeed conceivable, that God might be at peace with the sinner, and yet the sinner remain in his original state of painful apprehension and suspense. The sentence of condemnation might be actually expunged, and yet the sinner continue ignorant of the blessed fact. Such a case is conceivable. But happily for us this is not the manner of God! The fact that his Judge has become his Friend, is not kept secret from the sinner who flees to Christ for refuge, or left to be ascertained by him only after his faith has had time to evince its existence by its fruits. The faith by which he lays hold of Christ's righteousness as his plea to the divine favour, brings him in contact with truths which assure him of his Father's forgiveness, and impart immediate confidence and hope to his bosom. In the very act of believing the love of God as manifested in the gift and work of his Son, he cannot but gather up a confident persuasion of the friendship of heaven. Believing, as he does, that his Almighty Judge, so far from being irreconcilable, is full of concern for his well-being—that divine mercy has originated and executed a wise and benevolent plan for his salvation—that God himself has actually come down, and, in the person of the eternal Son, brought in a righteousness which magnifies the divine law, satisfies the divine justice, and is at once sufficient and intended for the free justification of all who repose on it: believing all this—what can the effect on his mind be but to produce peace—immediate peace? Can his tormenting dread continue after he has admitted these things to be true? 'Can the voice of love and mercy from Calvary fail to hush the tremblings awakened by the thunders of Sinai?'

Nor is even the consciousness of believing essential to his enjoying this peace. This peace flows directly into the soul from the truths believed, and may therefore be experienced in all its tranquilizing sweetness before the sinner has time to make his belief the subject of distinct contemplation. If, indeed, he is conscious of believing, his peace will be thereby confirmed; for this will justify him in appropriating to himself the promise, 'He that believeth shall be saved;' and still more will it be confirmed, when he is privileged to mark the fruits of faith in his heart and life; for these will assure him that his faith is indeed that which stands connected with the gospel promises. But irrespective of, and antecedently to, any such processes of self-reflection and self-examination, he may, and ought, to enjoy peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. The source of his peace is not in his conscious faith, or in his conscious holiness, but in the gladdening truths which he believes. And as these truths produce their proper effects on the mind, irrespective of any reflex consciousness of its own operations, so he has only believingly to contemplate them, in order to experience the immediate influence of their consolatory import.

'Blessed,' says the psalmist, 'is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, and unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity!' 'Blessed!' No wonder! To know and feel that the Almighty God is pacified towards him, and that the infinite attributes of power, and wisdom, and justice, are set for his defence, instead of being arrayed for his destruction—what consolation can bear comparison with this? The assurance of God's friendship is no transient emotion which familiarity may render less gladdening! The light of a heavenly Father's smile sheds a steady and abiding satisfaction on the heart; and the man who is blessed with it carries a treasure in his bosom, which may well make the path of obedience sweet, and cause him to drink either his wine or his water with a merry heart! Do I possess this holy peace? If I do, let me be thankful for the blessing, and strive, by constantly looking to 'the Lord my righteousness,' to retain and increase it. If I do not—but why should I not possess it? Is not the Redeemer's righteousness freely tendered for my justification? And will not God be more honoured by accepting me on the ground of that perfect righteousness, than by exacting at my own hands the punishment of my sins? Surely that which satisfies God, may well satisfy me! Surely that which is sufficient to turn away God's anger, and light up his countenance with a smile of reconciliation, ought to impart peace to my conscience, and restore confidence in my heart!

---

SIXTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us,' Rom. v. 5.

THE hope here spoken of, as appears from verse 2nd, is 'hope of the glory of God.' Of this hope the apostle asserts that it 'maketh not ashamed'—an expression which, though negative in its form, must be held, in conformity with the usage of scripture language, to involve the opposite affirmation, and consequently to mean, that the believer's hope, so far from being a cause of shame to him, is a ground of joy and exultation. Some indeed consider the apostle's meaning to be merely this, that the hope of the Christian will not put him to shame by being eventually disappointed. But this interpretation, though it conveys an important truth, and indicates the superiority of the believer's hope to the fallacious hope of the sinner, seems neither to fall in with the drift of the context, nor to come up to the height of the Christian's privilege. Throughout the passage, the apostle is discoursing, not of the future, but of the present, effects of the graces enumerated by him—faith, patience, experience, and hope. And instead of designing a contrast between the blessed fruition which shall crown the Christian's expectations, and the disappointment in which the hope of the sinner shall issue, his object is to show, that the universal tendency of hope to fill the heart with joy and the mouth with exultation, is experienced by the believer, no less than by those whose hope is directed to other and inferior objects. In short, his assertion that 'hope maketh not ashamed,' is but a reiteration, in another form, of what he more unambiguously teaches in the second verse, when he declares it to be one of our Christian privileges, that we 'rejoice in hope of the glory of God.'

So much is it the property of hope to exhilarate its possessor, that moral writers have often, and most justly, cited the pleasure connected with it as a striking proof of the Divine benevolence to man. To Hope belongs the happy power of lighting up the present with radiance borrowed from the future. 'It is the wealth of the indigent, the health of the sick, the freedom of the captive. It is our flatterer and comforter in youth; it is our flatterer and comforter in years which need still more to be flattered and comforted.' Nor indeed can misery well be the inmate of any bosom which is warmed by its glow! No man can be truly wretched till he has come to the end of his hopes! But if even earth-born hopes, however unsubstantial and precarious, are fitted, by the law of our nature, to cheer the heart and gild the path of life, how sweet! how enlivening! must be the hope which anticipates and antedates the future inheritance of the saints. What an alleviation amid the sorrows of life, to be able to realize eventual admission to a world where all tears shall be wiped away! What a solace under the burden of conscious sin, to be able to behold in the distance the kingdom which is as 'sinless' as it is 'unsuffering!' Such a hope as this stretches along the whole path of existence, and may well maintain the soul in calm and unbroken serenity, whatever be our outward lot. It brightens the scenes around us, by bringing down upon them the reflected radiance of the fairer scenes beyond! It cheers a gloomy present, by drawing on the expected delights of a glorious future! It makes us forget the ruggedness of the ground we walk upon, by taking off the eye from 'our light afflictions, which are but for a moment,' and fixing them on 'the exceeding and eternal weight of glory!' Nor can this hope ever be dashed by any doubt of the capacity of its object to fulfil our expectations. Celestial blessedness is not one of those things which hope, prone as it is to high-colour its objects, can gild with over-brilliant hues! The glories of heaven are ineffable and inconceivable! Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him! He who is privileged to cherish this lively hope, must possess in it 'an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast' to retain him firm and serene amidst all the tempests and troubles of life!

This blessed hope, being based on the promise of God, and produced by faith in the mediation of Christ, may and ought to be cherished by the believer the moment he embraces the gospel. As soon as faith relies on the truth of the Divine promise, hope ought to wait for the enjoyment of it. The believer's title to heaven rests not on any thing in himself, but solely on the finished work of his Saviour; and never, therefore, can he acquire a better title than that with which he is invested on his first reception into the family of God. And in truth, there must be some indis-tinctness in his views, or some feebleness in his desires, or some wavering or weakness in his faith, if he does not feel himself warranted, from the very first, to 'rejoice in hope of the glory of God.'

Hope, however, in common with peace, joy, and the other graces which spring up in the believer's heart the moment he embraces the gospel, is capable of increase and confirmation. Though his title to heaven be complete from the first, his perception of it may become clearer. Whatever tends to convince him of the reality of his union with Christ, and his consequent interest in all the blessings of Christ's purchase, must equally tend to give new force and vividness to his hope of glory: and as he grows, therefore, in experience of the fruits of faith, he cannot but gather fresh and ever-increasing evidence of his title to the celestial inheritance. In an especial manner is 'the love of God which is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost,' a confirmation of this hope. The knowledge that a living friend has remembered me in his will, may warrant me to indulge the hope of eventually receiving the legacy: but how much must it tend to strengthen this hope, if I am daily receiving fresh proofs of my friend's continued love to me! Such love I cannot but interpret into an assurance that my friend will not revoke the deed he has made in my favour. And can the believer draw a less cheering inference from his experience of the love of God? Nay, the man who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart, has more than an evidence of his acceptance: he has the seal of that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of the future inheritance—he has the meetness for heaven, no less than the title to it: and it is impossible that he should not abound in the hope which maketh not ashamed! Let it be remembered, however, that the 'good hope through grace' is not produced, but only confirmed, by this and the other fruits of faith. Its sole foundation, from first to last, is the mediation and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. Christ, and none but Christ, is the 'beginning' of the believer's confidence—the anchor of the believer's hope! Nor is the fresh glow of expectation which warms his heart as he grows in conscious meetness for the final glory, a new feeling, but simply a reinforcement of that blessed hope which gladdened his downcast spirit when he first discovered the Bible to be —'true,

And in that charter read with sparkling eyes,
His title to a treasure in the skies!'

SIXTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost,' Rom. xv. 13.

A LIVELY hope of the future inheritance is not more fitted to gladden, than to sanctify the soul. Accompanied, as it necessarily is, with both an ardent desire, and a supreme esteem, for its object, it cannot but act as a spur to pious exertion, and lead its possessor to purify himself even as Christ its source, and heaven its object, are pure. It was a Jewish maxim, that the spirit of prophecy rests only upon men of a hopeful temper; and certain it is, that the hope of such a glorious inheritance as Christ has purchased at the cost of his most precious blood, is eminently conducive, if not to the exercise of spiritual gifts, at least to the growth of spiritual graces. The things which we hope for, no less than the things which we believe, exert an assimilating influence on the mind. And it seems scarcely possible, that a man shall be habitually bethinking him of the rest which remains above, and antedating his admission to its holy society, and treading in imagination its pavement of glory, without thereby acquiring an enhancement of heavenly-mindedness, and deriving a fresh incentive to holy obedience. The radiance which was reflected from the face of Moses when he returned from converse with God on the mount that might be touched, may well have its counterpart in the soul of him whom hope leads daily to converse with the spirits of just men made perfect on the mount of the heavenly Zion!

The influence of hope, as a means of comfort and sanctification, of course depends on the force and vivacity of the sentiment; and the believer, therefore, in proportion as he values his holiness and comfort, must be desirous to abound in hope—to have not merely a 'trembling hope,' but the assurance of hope—the full assurance of hope. For such a hope, accordingly, he is encouraged to pray to him who reveals himself under the endearing name of 'the God of Hope'—the hope-giving and hope-sustaining God; and that his prayers and efforts may take a right direction, he is informed that the way to abound in hope is to abound in faith—that the nether-spring of an unfading hope, is a heart filled 'with all joy and peace in believing.'

There may be occasional gleams of hope, where there is no steady faith either in Christ or in that eternal life of which he is the author. There is so much of the dazzling and the beautiful about the object of Christian hope—so much that appeals to the imagination and the feelings, that sensibility may be kindled at the contemplation, and something like hope of eventual possession indulged. But this pleasurable feeling may be nothing more than the mere romance of the imagination—poetry, and not piety—transient illusion, not abiding reality. A new train of thought may scatter it—a whisper of conscience may annihilate it. But not thus transient and meteoric is the hope which springs from a firm reliance on the finished work of Christ, and the promise of eternal life through him! He who has peace with God through faith in Christ's righteousness, and a confiding reliance on those great and precious promises which are all yea and amen in Christ Jesus, possesses, as it were, the golden chain 'whereby hope holds to her anchor.' His hope cannot desert him. Its exhilarating power may vary with the varying causes that operate on his moral sentiments; it may not always rise to the glow of ecstasy; it may sometimes become so feeble as scarce to be discernible by his consciousness. But so long as Faith keeps her seat, and is attended by her handmaids, Peace and Joy, Hope must also be present. If there is not sunshine, there will at least be light; if there is not full assurance, there will at least be a 'good hope through grace!'

Dost thou, then, desire to abound in hope? Abound in faith. Look to Jesus. Recall his dying love. Realize the sufficiency of his vicarious righteousness. Rest on the prevalence of his perpetual intercession. Sit at his feet. Listen to his promises. Follow him to his glory. Thus act faith on him; and thy soul shall be filled with peace and joy in believing, and thy heart refreshed with the hope of eternal life! Nor fail to add prayer to faith—prayer, for the influence of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is the bestower and sustainer of the peace, and joy, and hope, which Christ has provided. Nor can these graces be abiding inmates of the heart, except through the indwelling and influence of that adorable Agent.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost,' Rom. xiv. 17.

IN religion men are strangely prone to attach undue importance to external rites and modes of administration. Though nothing is more clearly taught in scripture than the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom—though the prophets speak of it as a kingdom diverse from all others, and Christ himself expressly declares, that instead of being a secular kingdom which cometh with observation, it is a spiritual dominion which 'worketh its silent and unseen way through the world of souls;' yet multitudes in every age follow the ancient Jews in conceiving of it as an external polity rather than a reign of holy principles, and in inferring their interest in its blessings from their observance of certain prescribed forms and ceremonies, rather than from the amelioration of their moral sentiments. Uniformity of outward administration is more prized and sought after, than uniformity of inward experience; and the zeal which ought to be directed towards the conversion of souls, is suffered to expend itself in unbrotherly disputes about forms of government and modes of worship. Not that outward institutions are without their use or obligation. On the contrary, they are, within certain limits, essential to the existence and profession of religion—the 'meat and drink' by which religion is sustained. But to identify them with religion, or account them the chief part of it, is to identify the 'meat and drink' which supports life, with life itself. The reign which Christ came to establish, and lives to advance, is a reign by his Spirit over the unseen movements of the soul. And apart from this, all forms of government, all modes of worship, all systems of discipline, all outward ordinances—are but a mock-Christianity!—the show without the substance!—the casket without the jewel! 'The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.'

The 'righteousness' characteristic of Christ's kingdom, is internal righteousness, or conformity to the will of God, in contradistinction to mere external and ritual observance. Human legislators must be content with outward obedience, since neither their cognizance nor their control reaches farther; but the prerogative of God is seen in commanding the heart and swaying the will. It is the submission of the inner man, that He claims as his due! And no one can be said to have the kingdom of God within him—whatever be the conformity of his outer doings—who does not obey the will of God from the heart; who does not take the whole will of God for his rule, and take it too in its largest extent and spirituality; who does not cherish a principle of aversion to all sinful desires as well as unholy deeds, and labour to have every thought and imagination, as well as every word and action, brought into captivity to the law of Christ! Such a righteousness is not a product of the soil of nature. It is a fruit of the Holy Spirit. And in vain does any one expect to exemplify it, until he has become reconciled to God by faith in the righteousness of Christ, and thereby acquired that grateful confidence in his heavenly Father's love, which is the well-spring of cheerful and unreserved obedience!

'Peace,' as a characteristic of Christ's kingdom, stands opposed to the strife and debate which exclusive attention to things external is apt to engender. Like 'righteousness,' it is the inmate only of a heart which has been purged of its enmity to God and man, by faith in the redeeming love of a reconciled Father; and as righteousness consists in conformity to God, so it displays itself in brotherly sentiments towards men. This 'peace' is the very opposite of that party-spirit which so widely prevails among Christians, to the scandal of the church, and the extinction of charity. It has no sympathy with that narrow bigotry which excludes from the pale of Christ's kingdom all who decline to conform to a particular form of outward profession, or with that love of disputation and controversial triumph which turns zeal for the truth into an apple of discord. It loves to dwell on the points on which Christians agree more than on those on which they differ. It makes allowances for the weakness of brethren; refuses to impute bad motives; and hails with delight the evidences of real religion, whatever be the sect or party in which they appear. And as it considers Christian unity to consist in oneness of spirit rather than in outward uniformity, and schism to be a breach of brotherly love rather than a departure from established order; so it directs its chief efforts towards the cure of the misunderstandings and heart-burnings that separate Christians, and strives, as its grand object, to bring all under the practical influence of Christ's new commandment. What a beautiful spirit! How suitable in the subjects of a kingdom of which the peaceable and peace-making Jesus is the Head! Would God it were universally cherished and displayed!

'Joy in the Holy Ghost' is the holy delight which springs from a persuasion of the indwelling and sanctifying operations of the divine Spirit. The Holy Ghost is the grand privilege of the kingdom—the great promise of the Father—the blessed legacy bequeathed by Christ to his church; and the possession of such a gift cannot but prove a source of joy unspeakable to all who have reason, whether from faith in the divine promise, or from observation of the effects produced on the soul, to conclude that it is theirs. The Spirit is the 'unction' whereby believers are made kings and priests unto God, and taught to understand and relish the truth as it is in Jesus. The Spirit is the 'seal' of God upon their souls, whereby their Father bears them witness that they are his, and assures them of their interest in his love and favour. The Spirit is 'the earnest of the future inheritance,' being given them as a pledge, that they shall obtain, in due season, all the eternal benefits which Christ has purchased. The Spirit is the 'first-fruits' of the future glory—and an assurance therefore to all who enjoy his communications, of the full harvest of unending blessedness which is 'reserved in heaven.' In fact, in this one privilege of the Spirit, all the blessings of the kingdom are included—all that is necessary to render believers safe and happy—all that is necessary to assure them of the love of God and of eventual felicity with him. And how should it fail to fill them with joy—abiding, exquisite joy? What better proof can we have of the favour of God—what higher dignity can we enjoy—what greater assurance of eternal glory, than that God has given us his Holy Spirit? To know that we have the Spirit, is to taste the grapes of Canaan in the wilderness—to have heaven begun on earth! Compared with the calm and holy satisfaction which this persuasion imparts—a satisfaction which gladdens without agitating the soul—

'Like a summer wave, whose motion
Heaves, but does not break the ocean;'— compared with the tranquil and abiding light of this holy joy, the turbulent pleasures of the world are but as the crackling of thorns—a sudden, and soon-extinguished blaze!

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.'
Heb. xiii. 20, 21.

'The God of peace.' God the Father is entitled to this appellation, both because he is fully pacified by the atonement of Christ, and because he is the author and giver of peace. In approaching Him in prayer for spiritual blessings, it is necessary to recognise the relation in which he stands to us as a reconciled God, for it is only through a Mediator that we can draw near to His throne; and without a persuasion of His being at peace with us, it is impossible to feel that child-like confidence which is essential to acceptable prayer. The assurance, however, that He is pacified, emboldens us to go and spread out our wants before Him—while the additional assurance that he is the willing bestower of peace and happiness, encourages us to expect a favourable audience and answer.

'That brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus.' The Father showed himself to be the God of peace, by awarding to our surety the honours of a glorious resurrection. No sooner had the Saviour completed his vicarious work by submitting to the agony of an accursed death, and the shame of an unhonoured burial, than an angel was despatched from the court of heaven to unbar the gates of the tomb, and, by setting the mighty captive free, to proclaim to the universe the Divine acceptance of his work. Christ was thus raised again for our justification. And we have, therefore, the blessed privilege of knowing that the God whom we approach has solemnly and publicly declared his full satisfaction with the work which forms our plea, to His favour and help.

'That great Shepherd of the sheep.' In the case of Christ, the honours of a resurrection were but preparatory to the higher honour of investiture with all power as the Shepherd and King of his Church. So fully satisfied and well pleased was the Father with what Christ had done on earth for His glory and man's salvation, that He not only brought him again from the dead, but endowed him with power and authority, as 'the great Shepherd,' to give eternal life to the sheep, to carry them in his arms, to gather them to his fold, and so to guide, feed, defend, and preserve them, that none of them should ever perish, or be plucked out of his hand. The willingness of God to bless us, was thus attested by his delegating the power of saving us to one whose interest in our welfare and desire to help us admit of no suspicion. And cold and unconfiding indeed, must be our hearts, if, after such a display of the good-will of Heaven, we can doubt of our Father's readiness to hear our prayers!

'Through the blood of the everlasting covenant.' This expression seems designed to qualify not any one of the preceding clauses separately, but the whole of them collectively, and to indicate the ground on which the Father has become reconciled to us, and raised our Shepherd to the right hand of power. 'The blood of the covenant' is the blood of Christ, by which the covenant is sealed; and the lesson conveyed by these words is this fundamental and all-important one, that to the merit and worth of Christ's sacrifice we are indebted for peace with God, and every other spiritual blessing. We are, therefore, taught to approach God only through the mediation of the Son, and to ask for mercy and grace as benefits which can be ours, only because they have been purchased for us by our surety!

But what is the petition which we have thus so many and such strong encouragements to present to our Father in heaven? It is a petition for sanctification by the Spirit, for the sake of Christ. 'The God of peace . . . make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ.' We are to pray that our reconciled Father would fit us for every good work; that he would accomplish this by giving us the Spirit to work in us both to will and to do; and that He would vouchsafe all for the sake of the Redeemer's merits. What a comprehensive prayer! How cheering to think that the precious benefits which it craves are attainable, when earnestly, patiently, and habitually sought after! Inspiration taught Paul to ask them for his readers: and doubtless it would not have taught him to ask them, had there been any doubt as to their bestowment! Temporal blessings are not promised unconditionally; and it is better that the applicants should not be certain of obtaining them. But fitness for every good work, and the indwelling aid of the Spirit of grace, are blessings which we may seek under the full assurance of finding them. And shall we then, by neglect of fervent believing prayer, consent to forego them? Consent to forego them! Consent, with such treasures within our reach, to remain poor, infinitely poor, in time and through eternity! What terms of severity can be strong enough to describe the folly, ingratitude, impiety, and presumption, which such fatal neglect would imply!

'To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.'

It is not certain whether this doxology refers to 'the God of peace,' to whom the prayer is addressed, or to 'Jesus Christ,' who is the nearest antecedent. But the point is of no importance, as such an ascription is equally due to both, and to the Holy Spirit also. The blessed and glorious three are one God in covenant for our salvation; and though the offices which they execute are distinct, yet the part which each performs is so important as well to deserve our adoration. Nor can believers more worthily anticipate the holy services of heaven, than by habitually ascribing to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, equal and endless praise!

For pitying us when all undone,
My soul! the Almighty Father bless;
For pardon purchased, bless the Son;
The Spirit bless, for holiness:
For full salvation to the lost,
Bless Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!

---

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'But the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day,' Prov. iv. 18.

THE life of the just or justified is a path of 'light.' Before a man comes to Christ, he walks in darkness, for he is ignorant alike of his own and of the Divine character; and he has no source of comfort beyond what the present world supplies. But when once 'God, who at the first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into his heart, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ,' a new and clearer course opens upon him. His own character stands revealed to him in all its sinfulness, and that of his God in all its excellence; Christ is seen and sought as the only refuge; heaven is anticipated as a grand reality; confidence in God takes the place of servile dread; a relish for Divine things supplants the love of the world; the hope of a blessed immortality overcomes the fear of death. In a word, the man walks in light; so that, instead of pursuing the journey of life in utter ignorance of his state before God, and in constant dread of judgment to come, he presses onward with a clear mind and a tranquil heart—following a path which is lighted up by the reflected lustre of those spiritual realities which, though invisible to others, are taken home with intensest sympathy by his believing and regenerated heart.

The life of the justified is also a path of 'shining light.' The knowledge and joy which fill the believer's soul, cannot but shine out from his temper and life, so as to attract the attention of his fellow-travellers. His heavenly principles cannot but shed an unearthly beauty on his walk and conversation. The light which encircles him while he is with God on the mount, cannot but beam from his countenance when he comes down into the world. It is true, that worldly men dislike the example that condemns them, and are ever ready to escape from the rebuke which it administers, by questioning the purity of the motives which sustain it. But when piety is deep-rooted, and consequently consistent, it is sure to live down obloquy. The world reverences in its heart the holiness which it dislikes; and however much a believer may be despised or denounced for his singularity, when he first settles in a neighbourhood, the light of his example is certain eventually to secure for both himself and his principles the respect and admiration of all around him. None will in the end be so firmly trusted—none so frequently consulted—none so reverentially deferred to, as he. And when death removes him from the scene of his usefulness, the worldliest of his neighbours will be found lamenting his loss, and inwardly wishing to be as secure as he was, of entering into glory. The justified man is thus 'the light of the world;' and it therefore becomes him 'not to hide his light under a bushel,' but to let it 'shine before men, that they may see his good works, and glorify his Father which is in heaven.'

The main point, however, in the walk of the justified, which is set forth in the similitude of the wise king of Israel, is its progressive lustre. 'The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' As to justification, there is no progression; for the man who is once justified, is justified for ever; and, though he may become more and more certain of the fact of his justification, as his evidences of grace increase, he can never acquire a better, a different, or a more complete title to heaven, than he obtains the moment he believes on Christ. But with respect to sanctification or personal conformity to the moral likeness of God, growth is a prominent characteristic—even from the dawn of conversion onward to the perfect day of meetness for heaven.

The believer's knowledge, for example, is progressive. At first it is as the faint light at day-break; disclosing spiritual objects to his view only in dim and shadowy outline. It is long before he becomes thoroughly acquainted either with the desperate wickedness of his own heart, or with the full glory of the Divine character as seen in the person and cross of Christ. It is only by degrees that he discovers the extent and spirituality of God's law; and learns, from a perception of its exceeding breadth, to look with wonder on its perfect fulfilment by Christ, and with shame on the narrowness of his own attainments. It is only by degrees that he discerns the beauty, preciousness, and claims of Christ in the various offices which he executes as the Teacher, Advocate, King, and Judge of the redeemed, and in the various influences which, as the dispenser of the Spirit, he communicates to his people. Such comprehensive knowledge, however, he does acquire, and the more fully, the longer he sits at the Saviour's feet. The dawn of spiritual discernment gradually advances into the day; and long before he passes to that world where 'he shall know even as also he is known,' he is favoured with an amount of acquirement, which makes him wonder at his earlier and lengthened blindness of heart.

His faith, too, is progressive. From his entrance on the path of life, he firmly believes as much of the revealed will of God as he understands. But as knowledge is essential to faith, his faith cannot embrace a large circle of Divine truth, so long as his knowledge takes in only a limited one; nor can it rise to the strength of a habitual principle of action, while the objects to which it is directed comprise but a section of the field of revelation. As knowledge, however, increases, faith extends its range; having more objects to fix upon, it is oftener called into exercise; from being only an occasional, it becomes a frequent, and by and bye the habitual attitude of his mind; and thus at length he becomes strong in faith—nay, walks by faith. How often is the fact of such a progress evinced, especially at the close of life! You shall behold the believer displaying, in the prospect of dissolution, a confidence in the certainty of unseen and eternal things, as steadfast and realizing as if the veil which separates him from the invisible world had become so thin and transparent, as to enable him to penetrate to the scenes beyond. He sees Christ upon the throne ready to receive him. He beholds the spirits of departed Christian friends waiting to welcome him. He descries the angel of the Lord approaching to deliver him from the chains of sin, and the prison of the flesh. The light shines around him. Another moment! and the angel shall smite him on the side, and bid him go free.

The believer's love is equally progressive. Love, in truth, must necessarily keep pace with knowledge and faith. The more I know and believe of my own guilt and helplessness, the livelier must be my gratitude and love to him who remembered me in my low and lost estate. The more I know and believe of the glories of the unfading inheritance which is reserved in heaven, the warmer must be my affection for the benefactor who purchased it at the cost of his own most precious blood. To know God, is necessarily to love him; for 'God is love.' And it is therefore only in the natural order of cause and effect, that with every increase of knowledge in the understanding, there should be a corresponding increase of love in the heart ; even until love to God becomes the supreme and dominant affection, and the desire to be with Him in heaven triumphs over the interests and inclinations which bind to the earth.

Is not joy also a progressive sentiment? Sometimes, no doubt, the believer's joy is more vivacious immediately after conversion than at a later stage. As the first outbreak of morning light is peculiarly sweet to the watcher's eye, from its succeeding a season of darkness ; so the joy which the sinner experiences when he first finds rest in Christ, is often characterized by a liveliness not afterwards felt. But joy may gain in depth what it loses in liveliness. The deepest and strongest wave is not that which breaks in sparkling foam ; and the happiness of a confirmed believer may be all the deeper and purer, that it does not flow over in glittering and transient effervescence. Let the young convert's 'joy in believing' be what it may—is it once to be compared with the calm and steadfast assurance of him whose interest in Christ is certified by the mature fruits of the Spirit? What can the inexperienced Christian know of the 'rejoicing' which flows from the testimony of a good conscience? or of the delight which results from conscious and growing likeness to Christ? or of the joy—'joy in the Holy Ghost'—which arises from a persuasion of the indwelling of the Spirit of God? Such exquisite joys as these are reserved for an advanced stage of sanctification ; and are, therefore, decisive of the progressive sweetness of the believer's joy.

Equally progressive is the Christian's path in humility, in hope, in tenderness of conscience ; in short, in all the separate rays which, by their combined and blended loveliness, form his 'shining light.' His progress, indeed, is not always invariable or uninterrupted. He is not exempt from periods of stationariness, and even of declension. Faith sometimes wavers ; love sometimes waxes cold ; hope sometimes becomes obscured ; and joy, in particular, being dependent more than any other grace on constitutional temperament, is liable to frequent ebbs and flows. His path lies sometimes high up on the mount, and sometimes low down in the valley. And, as there are Christians, on the one hand, whose joy is lively at the outset of their course, and comparatively languid during their remaining journey ; so there are also Christians, on the other hand, whose path resembles that of the sun in a cloudy day, which, after struggling in vain at morning and at noon to pierce the murky sky, suddenly breaks forth with cheering radiance at eventide, to make the hour of his setting an hour of glorious beauty. Progress upon the whole, however, is the law of the Christian life. Retrogression is the exception, not the rule. Nor did the wise king misread the experience of the saints, when he ventured to give a place among his Proverbs, or maxims of general truth, to the beautiful and consolatory saying, 'The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.'

EIGHTEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Arise, shine ; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee,' Isa. lx. 1.

THIS is the salutation of the prophet to the church, in the prospect of the advent of Christ, 'the light of the world,' and 'the glory of Israel.' Nor are the terms in which it is couched, too glowing to express the great and happy change which the coming of the Saviour effected on the intellectual and moral condition of the human family.

Reflect, for instance, on the light which Christ shed on the character and government of God! The world had long lost all just conceptions of the Divine nature and attributes. While the mass of mankind had 'changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things ;' even the enlightened few had no higher idea of Him than a material Being confined to some local temple, or a pure abstraction without the power or the will to attend to earthly concerns. What a new and benignant light, then, must Christ have thrown into men's minds, when he revealed the sublime doctrine, that God is a Spirit pervading all space with his presence—that he is continually in active communication with every part of creation—and that, so far from being regardless of this world and its inhabitants, he exercises a providence which extends as well to the humble lily and the tiny insect as to the starry sphere and the heavenly seraph! Yet this was but the rudiments of what Christ taught respecting Deity. He showed men the care and condescension of God in providence, only as a prelude to the display of his mercy in redemption ; he pointed to the works of his bountiful hand, only that he might encourage them to trust in the love of his paternal heart. He drew aside the veil of the unseen world, and exhibited the Father of mercies thinking of the well-being of his children—planning a scheme to deliver them from their sin and misery—surrendering his only begotten Son to humiliation and death as a satisfaction for their sins—and setting in order a series of dispensations for the purpose of recalling them to happiness. And what the Saviour thus revealed in his gospel he manifested still more affectingly in his person and beneficent acts. Christ was himself the image and reflection of the Divine nature, softened, subdued, and contracted, to meet the conception and sympathies of men.

Or, reflect on the light which Christ shed on the condition and destiny of man! A world which knew not God could know little either of the way of acceptance with him, or of the future destiny of his rational creatures. If a sense of sin was awakened, it could only fill the soul with terror; if the idea of a future life arose, it could only serve to throw a black shadow over present enjoyment. But, in truth, men had ceased to listen to conscience, or to anticipate retribution. The wisest shrunk from contemplating their moral relation to their Maker; and as for an after life, they deemed it merely a theme for scholastic speculation, or poetic invention. 'Heathen philosophy halted at the grave; and even ancient revelation, though it accompanied its disciples a little beyond, and told them of Sheol and of Hades, deserted them in the middle of their darksome journey.' But where former wisdom had only made darkness visible, Christ shed full and resplendent light. He explained how man may be reconciled to his Maker; and rolled away the stone from the sepulchre of human hope. He empowered faith to look upward to a God reconciled to all who believe in his Son; and encouraged hope to look onward beyond the valley of death to a region of perfect and unending blessedness. Appearing as the Saviour from sin and the conqueror of death, and endowed with power to give eternal life to as many as received him, he assured his followers of forgiveness, adoption, and holiness here, and of public acquittal and everlasting glory hereafter. How truly was such a Redeemer the light of the world! How befittingly might the church in the prospect of his advent, be exhorted to 'arise and shine' in the light of her Lord!

But Christ is still the light of the church and of the world, as truly as when 'the people that sat in darkness saw a great light:' and the prophet's salutation may still be addressed to the Christian community, and to the world at large, whenever the former receives an enhancement of spirituality, or the latter is turned from the pursuit of lying vanities to the service of God. As oft as a revival occurs in the church—as oft as the missionary standard is planted on a heathen shore—as oft as the kingdom of heaven makes an advance in the earth, the apostrophe may be re-echoed, 'Arise, shine!' for in every such instance Christ, the only light, has arisen upon benighted souls! Nor are the words less applicable to individual Christians, than to communities. What scatters the darkness of the sinner's heart, when he first receives with joy the gospel-message, but the coming of Christ to him? What recalls the backslider from his worldliness, but a fresh view of Christ? What sheds sensible comfort into the soul of him who has experienced a season of spiritual despondency, but a returning perception of the glory of Christ? Whatever be the season of the believer's spiritual prosperity and joy—whether it be amid sorrows which he is enabled patiently and thankfully to endure; or at death, when his hope of glory is unwavering; or at his admission to heaven, when his joy shall be full—the single and sole strength of his happiness is Christ: nor can he be addressed, in each of these instances in more appropriate terms than these, 'Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee!'

O let me make sure that this day-spring from on high has risen on my heart! It is not enough to have an intellectual apprehension of what Christ is, and has taught. Even the eye of a corpse is capable, so long as its transparency continues, of receiving on the retina the picture of external objects; and so the understanding may take in the whole circle of Christian doctrine, while the soul remains in spiritual death! Nothing short of a believing view of Christ as a Saviour, can turn the darkness of nature into the light of peace, and joy, and hope. But O this can! A believing view of Christ is a view of God reconciled—of sin forgiven—of acceptance secured—of heaven purchased: and how can the soul that is refreshed with sights like these, continue to wear its prison-garments, or to work in chains! No abiding light, or comfort, or purity, can dwell in the heart till Christ has entered it: but when once He becomes the object of its habitual contemplation and love, perpetual sunshine may settle on it! In a picture of Christ in the midst of his disciples, by one of the ancient masters, the artist has worked out the happy idea of making Christ the central object from which the light streams upon the other figures—so that the group of disciples are in light, only in the degree in which they are near to him, or turned towards him: all that is turned away from Him is in deep shadow. This is a pictorial illustration of the relation in which Christ stands to his people in al.

ages. It is only in the measure in which they look on Him, and to Him, that their peace, and joy, and holiness abound. Their light, their only light, is light in the Lord!

—
NINETEENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation,' 1 Pet. i. 5.

SUPERNATURAL aid is not more necessary to enable the sinner to make good his entrance on the path of life, than to preserve him from deviating from it afterwards. Accordingly the believer has the promise of the Spirit to abide with him for ever; and he is encouraged from first to last to rely on divine strength as his sufficiency. In keeping us, however, the Holy Spirit does not supersede the exercise of our own rational powers, or influence these by direct and immediate suggestion. He employs gospel-truths as the means of moving and actuating us. He takes of the things of Christ and shows them to our souls. And, in order to render the motives of the gospel influential and operative, he works faith in in us—faith being the instrument by which, according to the constitution of our nature, truth is borne home to the mind, and turned into a principle of action. The Spirit thus preserves us in the path of holy obedience by enabling us to exercise faith in the truth as it is in Jesus; or, in other words, we 'are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.'

The efficacy of faith as an instrument of sanctification, depends not so much upon the mental act itself, as upon its object. Faith moves the will and affections, only when its object is of a nature to actuate them. The belief of a piece of intelligence which possesses no native interest or importance, cannot excite any emotion, or touch any spring of action. But if the intelligence be of vital interest or felt importance, it is sure, according to the law of our nature, to awaken, the moment it is believed, sentiments answerable to its own character—to gladden us, if it be joyful tidings—to alarm us, if it be of frightful import—to kindle gratitude and love, if it speak of disinterested kindness. It is on this principle, that faith in the gospel is necessarily an effective engine of sanctification; for it brings truths to bear upon us which are of a heart-melting and sin-subduing character—truths which possess in their own nature a vast importance, an overwhelming interest; a prodigious moral influence. The paternal care of an Almighty and ever-present God—the disinterested love of a Saviour who once died for us, and ever lives to plead for and sympathize with us—the present and omnipotent help of the Holy Spirit of grace—a hell of unutterable woe prepared for the impenitent—a heaven of unending blessedness secured to the faithful—what truths are momentous, if these are not? what discoveries are fitted to stir the soul through all its depths, and to stimulate to a holy course of life, if these are not? These things may be intellectually apprehended without exciting a deeper feeling than admiration; but to realize them as undoubted facts, and yet not to be solemnized and sanctified by them, may be pronounced impossible. Can love to God fail to spring up in the bosom of him who is firmly persuaded of the divine love to his soul? Can sin fail to be hated and shunned by him who is habitually favoured with a believing view of Jesus dying for his sins on the cross? How should the lies of Satan find credence with the man who believes the truth as it is in Jesus? How should the baits and allurements of a wicked world prevail over the heart that is habitually gladdened with the smile of a reconciled God, and the hope of an unfading heaven? Temptation ceases to be tempting to the man of faith. He lives in communion with a world of purity. He breathes a different moral atmosphere from other men. He dwells apart on the holy and radiant summit of the mount of God, beyond the reach and influence of those motives and objects which chain down his fellows to the dust of the earth. Like Elisha's servant when endowed with powers of supernatural vision, he sees the mountains around him covered with horses and chariots of fire—he sees God's power, and Christ's love, arrayed on the side of his salvation: and how should he refuse to throw himself afresh into the battle of the Lord? Let his faith flag or fail, and Satan may gain the advantage over him; the unseen world being withdrawn from his view, this world of sense and sin may resume the occupancy of his affections. But so long as faith keeps God, and Christ, and heaven, within the circle of things by which he perceives himself to be surrounded, his triumph over the devil, the world, and flesh, is certain! 'All things are possible to him that believeth.'

Why is it, O self-righteous man! that with all thy laborious efforts to attain such a measure of moral excellence as will secure the divine favour, thou art ever falling short of thy hopes, and never able to acquire that confidence in God's love, and that delight in his law, which thou professest to seek after? Know that it is because thou hast not faith! One believing, heart-melting look at Christ in his matchless love and inexhaustible fulness, would do more to dispel thy hard thoughts of God, and to win thee to cheerful obedience, than a thousand years of such legal and calculating service, as thou art fruitlessly attempting!

Why is it, weak and wavering Christian! that thou art so inconsistent in thy practice, and so clouded in thy prospects—so often without sensible comfort, and so often an opprobrium to the Redeemer's gospel? Know that it is because thou art not habitually exercising faith! Holy affections and purposes can be kindled and kept in flame, only by direct exercises of faith; and thou art chargeable with daring presumption, if thou expectest that the power of God will keep thee unto salvation, otherwise than by bringing it to pass that thy 'faith fail not.'

---

NINETEENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth,' Psal. xvi. 8, 9.

NOTHING connected with our Lord's sufferings is more remarkable than his immovable firmness and cheerfulness, both in the prospect, and under the pressure of them. His whole deportment, while on earth, was a living comment on the words which the psalmist here ascribes to him, 'I shall not be moved; my heart is glad, and my tongue rejoiceth.' He foresaw from the first all that he was to suffer, whether from men, from devils, or from his heavenly Father; and yet instead of recoiling from his task, or undertaking it with reluctance, he entered upon it with the most resolute courage and alacrity. He appeared not merely determined, but desirous to suffer. The prospect filled him with exultation, rather than alarm. And his resolution, so far from being shaken when the dark tempest closed around him, only rose into mightier strength with each successive onset of the pitiless storm. 'He steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem,' though he knew that there he should encounter ignominy and death. He sternly rebuked his disciples for attempting to dissuade from his purpose. He commanded Judas to execute 'quickly' his traitorous design. He entered of his own accord the garden where he knew that unutterable agony awaited him. He allowed his enemies to drag him to judgment, and to tear his flesh with the cruel scourge, and to nail him to the bitter cross, and to turn his griefs into mockery, 'though with one frown he could have sunk them all in the gulf of perdition.' And even when he hung on the accursed tree—the victim alike of divine and human wrath, so calm and unwavering was his undaunted spirit, that he grieved more for his murderers than for himself, and expostulated with the women standing around, because instead of weeping for themselves and their children, they wept and wailed for him!

How consolatory to reflect, that the Redeemer bore the penalty of our sins with such resolute zeal and cordial willingness! Ought this not to enhance our admiration of the holy Sufferer—to enliven our gratitude for his mercy—to strengthen our confidence in his readiness to save us? Ought it not also to form the subject of our imitation? 'Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps.' Nor can we better evince our admiration of the constancy and cheerfulness with which he suffered for us, than by bearing our own cross in a similar temper—possessing our souls in patience under the various trials of life, and not only 'taking patiently,' but 'rejoicing in tribulation.'

But the temper in which Christ suffered is not more deserving of our imitation, than the motives which enabled him to display this lovely temper. Why was it that none of these things moved him, and that his heart was glad, and his tongue rejoiced? He himself tells us, 'I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.' He kept in view the glory of God as his grand end; and he confided in the arm of God as his stay and defence. The maintenance of the divine justice and the manifestation of the divine love, were, in his estimation, objects which would be cheaply secured at any cost of suffering; and to these objects, therefore, he cheerfully postponed all regard to his own personal comfort. The assurance of Almighty protection was to him a sufficient reason for dismissing all anxiety as to the triumphant issue of his undertaking; and with this as his reliance, he threw himself unhesitatingly into the arduous course marked out for him. It was thus a supreme regard to the glory, and a confident trust in the help of God, that nerved the Redeemer for his task and sustained him in the execution of it. Let the same holy motives support and animate us! Our trials, indeed, cannot advance the honour of God in the same degree as the sufferings of him who could say, in a sense altogether peculiar and unparalleled, 'I have glorified thee on the earth.' Yet our trials are not less the appointment of God than his; nor are they less designed to promote in their own degree, the honour of their Author. And nothing can be more certain than that this will be their blessed issue—provided we habitually recognize the gracious end for which they are sent, and look up for the promised grace to enable us to sustain and sanctify them. The proportion in which we subordinate our own wills to the will and glory of God, may be confidently taken as the measure of the divine support and approbation we shall receive. Nor can we run any risk of being ever ‘moved,’ whatever be the number and severity of our distresses, so long as we ‘set the Lord always before’ us.

—
 TWENTIETH DAY.—MORNING.

‘For we know, that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven,’ 2 Cor. v. 1, 2.

By the ‘earthly house of this tabernacle,’ in which the believer ‘groans, being burdened,’ the apostle means the animal structure in which the soul at present resides; and by the ‘house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens,’ the glorified body with which it is to be attired at the resurrection of the just. The allusion seems to be to the ancient Jewish tabernacle, in which the ark of the covenant was lodged. When the Israelites in the wilderness were called to break up their encampment and proceed on their journey, the tabernacle had to be taken down, and the ark to be carried by itself. So, the apostle informs us, when the period of our earthly sojourn is ended, the tabernacle of the body must be ‘dissolved,’ and the separated soul sent forth on its eternal journey. When, again, the Israelites arrived at a place of rest, the tabernacle was re-erected, and the ark restored to its original position within it. In like manner, adds the apostle, a time is awaiting the Christian pilgrim, when, having reached the heavenly rest, his body shall be reared anew—‘an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.’

That the believer should feel his present earthly tabernacle to be a burden, and earnestly desire to be ‘clothed upon with his house which is from heaven,’ cannot occasion surprise. For, though the human body is admirably adapted upon the whole to be the organ and instrument of the conscious spirit which inhabits it, it is yet, in common with the soul, a partaker in the disastrous effects of the fall, and consequently encompassed with infirmities which necessarily render it a clog and incumbrance to every spiritual man.

Is not the body a burden, from its constant liability to pain and disease? How harassing are pain and languor to the mind! and that not only from their tendency to disturb its tranquil and salutary processes of thought, but from their operating as a drag upon pious affections and enterprises of usefulness! To long to throw one’s self into the zealous and animated discharge of duty, and yet to be precluded from it by bodily infirmity!—to be equipped, as it were, with pinions ready for soaring flights of Christian usefulness, and yet to be constrained to dash them hopelessly against the cage of a frail and enervated tenement of clay!—what believer can feel this to be other than a galling thralldom?

Is not the body a burden, from the restraint which it puts on the powers and aspirations of the soul? Our present bodily organs are wholly inadequate to give full play to the inherent energies of the soul. Such instruments as the telescope and microscope by which objects, too remote or too minute to be discerned by the unassisted eye, are made visible, afford decisive proof that the soul has powers of perception far greater than its bodily senses permit it to exercise. And what is true regarding the faculty of external perception, equally holds of our powers of spiritual discernment. What regenerate man is not conscious of longings after a knowledge of divine and eternal things, to which his present restrained powers are incompetent? The glimpses of the divine love and holiness which sometimes break in upon his mind, pass like the lightning’s flash; he cannot detain them; and though his soul follows hard after them, and would even go out of the body to regale itself with their beauty, he is ever dragged down to the dust by the clog of his bodily organization. He feels himself—to borrow an apt similitude—like a strong man fettered and hand-cuffed, who must content himself with meditating what he will do when set at large.

Does not the body, moreover, possess various separate interests of its own, which clash and interfere with those of the soul? How many of our appetites have an exclusive reference to the welfare of the body! and how prone are our purely animal propensities, from their clamant and peremptory nature, to usurp and engross those thoughts and desires which ought to be employed by the soul in attending to its own paramount concerns! Let a man become religious at whatever season of life, he is sure to find his heart pre-occupied by a host of corporeal appetites, which he can only buffet and starve into a surrender. He cannot pray, without having his holiest breathings disturbed and polluted by the demands of carnal desire and bodily appetite. He cannot converse with his conscience, without having the small still voice drowned amidst the loud clamours of the flesh. And aided, as these ceaseless efforts of the mere animal part of his nature unhappily are, by the treacherous and earthward tendency of the fallen soul itself, how can he fail to cry out with the apostle, 'O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'

Then the body imparts increased sensibility to the domestic and social affections. Our Lord assures us, that 'in the resurrection there shall be no marrying, neither giving in marriage;' an announcement which plainly implies that the affections which cement the marriage union and other domestic and social relations, are, at least in part, purely animal instincts which are not to survive our present bodily organization. The bitter griefs, therefore, which such affections cause us when they are lacerated by the loss of friends, must be due, in some measure, to the connection of the soul with a corporeal frame; and must fall to be added to the physical 'burden' under which the believer has here to 'groan.' Nor are such griefs a small enhancement of the 'burden.' The sorrow of an unconverted man for the death of a beloved relative, is often a slight and medicable wound compared with that of a Christian. The former, caring little about the eternal destiny of his departed friend, has nothing more than his own personal or family loss to sadden him. But the latter has often the added grief of fearful misgivings as to the everlasting state of the soul that has gone to its place. This to the believer is the point on which his sensibility is acutest. Nor indeed can he have a heavier burden, than a heart lacerated by doubts and apprehensions in regard to the salvation of one who was bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh.

The child of God is thus encumbered with an 'earthly tabernacle,' which is in many ways a 'burden' to him; and being so, what wonder that he should look onward with wistful eye to the time when his spirit shall be set at large, and enshrined in a new and glorious habitation? The hope of enlargement were itself enough to excite earnest longings for the dissolution of this material frame. But it is his privilege to anticipate not merely deliverance from the drag of a vile body, but investiture with a glorified one. Hope leads him onward to the resurrection, and shows him a house prepared for the eternal residence of his soul, which is as much adapted to develop, as his present crumbling tabernacle is to restrain and cripple his faculties! Once invested in this raiment of paradise, he shall never more know what it is to sorrow, or to suffer, or to die; to labour after what he cannot attain, or undertake what he cannot achieve. The will to do good shall not prove fruitless for want of the power; nor the purpose of holiness remain unexecuted from lack of adequate organs to give effect to it. What a blessed hope! Who would not cherish it? Who would not consent to go out of the body, and leave all the passing attractions of this earthly scene, in order to realize it? Death indeed lies between us and our rest—death! from which nature shrinks with instinctive recoil. But ought we not to forget and overleap the fear of death, in the anticipation of the blessedness which thus stretches away on the farther side of it? Death though a painful way, is still the way to heaven; and what though the valley be dark, when its termination opens upon Emmanuel's broad and pleasant land!

TWENTIETH DAY.—EVENING.

'My flesh also shall rest in hope: for thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption,' Psal. xvi. 9, 10.

ST PETER, in his sermon on the day of pentecost, offers the following commentary on these words: 'Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.' The language of the psalmist is thus the language of Christ himself, in the prospect of that resurrection and glorification which were to follow his sufferings and death. As the curse to which Christ submitted as his people's substitute, included the infliction of the mortal stroke which consigns the body to the grave and the soul to a separate state of existence, so it was indispensable, in order to the completion of his vicarious work, that his body should die, and his soul go forth into the invisible world deprived of those material organs which are essential to its perfect activity and well-being. But this subjection to the power of death was to be but temporary. It was the only remaining effect of the curse which had to be endured, and consequently the immediate precursor of his release and reward. The curse being fully exhausted, it was impossible that he could be holden of the bonds of death. Divine justice had then no alternative but to loosen these bonds—to re-unite his soul and body—and by awarding him the public honours of a resurrection, to acknowledge and proclaim the perfection of his sacrifice, and the glory of his character as a Saviour. All this, accordingly, Christ foresaw. And so gladdening was the prospect to his suffering spirit, that for the joy thus set before him he cheerfully endured the cross, despising the shame, and exultingly exclaimed, even in the hour of his bitter agony, 'Therefore my heart is glad, and my tongue rejoiceth.'

This hope of a joyful resurrection which cheered the Redeemer in the prospect of death, may be warrantably entertained by all his followers. For, by raising the Head from the grave, God has given a decisive pledge that he will also raise the members. Not only is the believer's soul united to Christ, and treated by God as a part of Christ, but his body participates equally in the mystical union. His very dust is dear to God on Christ's account. Nor in truth can Christ himself be said to be fully risen from the dead, until the body of every one of his people is clothed in the glory of the resurrection. Believers, indeed, are not authorised to calculate on as brief a detention under the dominion of mortality as their Master. Their flesh must see corruption, and their souls remain—it may be for long ages—dissevered from their material vehicles. Yet eventual resurrection in an embodied state is secured to them. And it is not less their privilege, than it was his, to rise superior to the fear of the last enemy, through 'the sure and certain hope' of a blessed resurrection.

Not that the happiness of believers is all deferred till the resurrection of the just. No! Death introduces their souls immediately into glory. The intermediate state, though in itself a fruit of the curse, has been turned into a blessing by Christ's passage through it; and in it therefore their souls may enjoy, in the presence of their Lord, a prelibation of the felicity reserved for them at the redemption of the body. Still their happiness is not consummated till the resurrection; the effects of the curse are not finally removed till the resurrection; the end of the Redeemer's mediation is not completely attained till the resurrection: nor can their hope therefore be turned into full fruition, so long as that glorious event is only in the distance. Indeed, the state of departed spirits, blissful as it is, cannot properly be an object of lively hope. We can form no definite idea of the happiness of a spirit abstracted entirely from matter; and the gospel would have done little to endear the prospect of another world, had it merely told us that our souls were to exist in a state of widowhood from their material organs. In the idea of a resurrection, however, there is every thing to kindle hope and excite desire. The felicity of an embodied soul in a material heaven, falls in some degree within the range of our conceptions and sympathies. And in proportion as we feel the burden of a polluted soul, and the clog of a vile body, we cannot but long for the arrival of the time when the perfected spirit shall be united to a glorious and incorruptible body.

---

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—MORNING.

'For if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him,' 1 Thes. iv. 14.

FAITH in Christ Jesus—a full belief of his divine nature and dying love—forbids every doubt of the fulfilment of his gracious purposes towards those who have trusted in his name. Has he indeed expiated sin by his death on the cross in our stead, and risen from the grave in our nature? and shall he fail in any respect, in carrying out the glorious purpose, for which he came into the world and became obedient unto death; 'even to bring many sons unto glory?' Shall he return without them, as if foiled in his plan, or failing in his love? If we believe either in his purpose or his power to save, we can never admit any such unworthy apprehensions into our minds. 'He shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied.' He shall bring with him a multitude, which no man can number. His glory is essentially concerned in the result. They that believe in him shall be raised by his might, through his merits, and in his likeness. 'Because he lives, they shall live also,' as to their immortal souls; and as he rose from the sepulchre, they shall rise also as to their mortal bodies. His resurrection is at once the proof, the pledge, and the pattern of theirs. 'He hath abolished death; and no part of their nature shall be left under its power. 'Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept.' 'Christ the first-fruits, and afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming.' The general harvest shall correspond to that which was first gathered. They that are his shall be like him—conformed to his image in all parts of that nature which he hath assumed—ransomed, renewed, raised up and exalted to heavenly places. They shall be changed as spirits 'into the same image, as by the Spirit of the Lord;' and their 'vile bodies shall be fashioned like unto his own glorious body.' Nor does this follow merely as a truth—'a part of the truth as it is in Jesus,' which we receive and rest upon by our faith in him: it follows also, as a consequence of that faith in him by which they live. Believers, by their faith, become one with him in whom they believe; and are united with him as the vine with its root, as the members with the head. As his mystical body, they are animated by his life-giving Spirit; they are 'bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh;' and this connection nothing can destroy, not even the stroke of death. Their bodies shall be raised up as his was; rendered spiritual and incorruptible as his own now is; fitted for the occupations and enjoyments of his heavenly mansions; brought together with him to be where he is, and to see him as he is.

This resurrection of the body, of the same body, though dissolved into its elements, and dispersed in the dust, is indeed a great mystery, and is declared to us as a mystery. The manner of it is not revealed, and is not an object of our faith. It is the fact only that is made known, and with which we are concerned. Our belief of this fact is at once resolvable into our belief of the power of God. It is not an incredible thing, that God should raise the dead; that he can give, as he hath said that he will give, to every one his own body as easily as he gave to that body its first existence. 'God hath both raised up the Lord, and will raise up us also by his power.'

As believing, then, that Jesus died and rose again, so may we be assured that those 'who sleep in Jesus God will bring with him,' in their bodies as well as in their souls. As he brought back their Lord and Head, so will he bring with him all that are his, as in fact a part of himself; as not only his purchased property, but as his own proper body, from which he shall never more be disjoined. The great Redeemer came into the world to destroy all the works of the devil, to do away with all the consequences of sin, to repair all the ruins of the fall. 'By man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' All mankind, by the Lord's interposition, being placed under a dispensation of mercy, shall be raised from the grave and brought forth for judgment; but to those only who are one with him by faith, can this resurrection be spoken of as indeed a blessing. Of all such he is more especially the representative and the forerunner; and they shall all go 'whither the forerunner is for them entered,' and in the same nature with which he entered. As, in consequence of their relation to Adam, they received the taint of mortality in their bodily frames, and so became subject to death; so, in consequence of their relation to Christ, shall they receive the power of an endless life, and be raised up in their mortal frames in the image of God, in which they were at first created; yea, even in more than its original brightness. 'The Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwelling in them now as his temples, shall also quicken their mortal bodies, and bring them forth as temples restored from their ruins, and rendered meet for his service in heavenly places.

Waiting for this redemption of their bodies, and their full manifestation as the sons of God, they rest in peace as on their beds, as in a sleep. Immediately after their departure from the body their souls have passed into glory; 'but their bodies, being still united to Christ, do rest in their graves,' as in a quiet chamber which he hath consecrated for their use, by making it for a season his own resting place in their nature. Their bodies, therefore, are not to be viewed as cast forth, as done with and thrown away, as a mere mass of corruption; but, having been once the habitation of his Spirit, they are still embalmed by a preserving principle, which shall cause them to spring up from the dust of the earth more glorious than ever. Thus, like seed sown in the ground, they, properly speaking, do not die, but rather pass through a quickening process, and are prepared to spring up again under the life-breathing power of an eternal spring.

There is then nothing to distress the feelings, in thinking of those who have died in the Lord, or in waiting the dissolution which awaits our own mortal bodies. They are then laid in the silent grave, as on a bed of repose, about to take a sleep for a season. They are sensible of no lapse of time, no weariness, no inconvenience or injury whatever; but pass, as it were, a short night in safe seclusion and peaceful slumber, till called forth by the morning of the resurrection, refreshed, renewed, refined, and reunited to their immortal spirits, in blessedness unspeakable and unalloyed through eternal ages. Then shall be fulfilled the saying, 'death is swallowed up in victory;' and then shall be heard the unceasing song of praise, 'thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

—
 TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—EVENING.

'And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise,' Luke xxiii. 43.

IN these few words, spoken in such circumstances, how bright a display is presented to us of the glory and grace of the Redeemer; of the glory of his power to save to the uttermost, and the riches of his grace to all who come unto God by him. At such a moment, when he appeared most destitute of all power to save himself, and was taunted on that account by one of the abjects of the earth; when nailed to the ignominious cross, and sinking under the rage of his enemies; deserted by every earthly friend, and accounted of men to be forsaken also and stricken of God; yielding up his life, and ceasing from all farther contest, as one utterly discomfited and overcome by a strength superior to his own; even at such a moment does he speak of possessing a kingdom and bestowing a place in paradise. Then indeed it was that his right hand got him the victory, and gained kingdoms for his disposal, even in his fall, dealing the mortal blow to the adversary, and saying of his mighty work, 'It is finished.' Then it was that he 'spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them, even on the cross.' In the assurance of this triumph from that very cross, and while yielding up the ghost, did he utter these memorable words, 'Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.' Truly, the weakness of God is stronger than men. 'Though the Lord, as man, was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God, and liveth as God for evermore, to 'bestow eternal life on as many as God hath given him.'

But here we behold, more especially, the riches of his grace, in that, as soon as he receives the power to save, he forthwith proceeds to exercise it, and freely to bestow his crowns of life. Not only may we say, in regard to the merits of his death, and the power of his resurrection, 'That all who sleep in Jesus God will bring with him;' but, in the assurance of his being not only mighty but willing to save, we may confidently say in his name to them that are dead in sin, yea, to the vilest of them all, that they may inherit, as their portion, all the glories of his kingdom. 'Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.' 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' 'Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'

Such especially is the language of the event here related, of the words here recorded, 'I say unto thee, 'thou shalt be with me in paradise.' Unto whom was this gracious promise made, and made so freely and so fully, without any reserve or restriction, and with so much readiness and compassion? To the thief on the cross—to a poor condemned, deserted, and dying malefactor, in the last hour of his existence, in the lowest extremity of wretchedness. Here we behold a suppliant at the throne of grace, who had no worthiness to recommend him as any grounds of his acceptance, who had wrought only evil in his place, who had nothing to say for himself before his judge, and who could only pray to be remembered in mercy. Here we read of the gracious declaration of the mercy which he sought, granted without any delay, without any condition, without any abatement; granted to the fullest extent, and beyond what he presumed to seek. Not only was he remembered in mercy, not merely released from punishment, not merely encouraged to hope for some favour, not merely raised to a portion of enjoyment, but received at once to the blessedness of heaven, and to the presence of his Lord: 'To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise.' We have read in the clearest language, or rather we witness in actual exemplification, the most gracious truth, the most consoling assurance to a fallen and sinful world, the inexhaustible compassion of the divine Redeemer, even to the most evil and unworthy of mankind, whenever they cast themselves on his mercy, and commit their spirits to his hand.

Let no one ever despair of that mercy, either in his own case, or in the case of others, however long they have delayed, however heinously they have sinned. In the salvation of sinners nothing is impossible for divine mercy to grant, for divine mercy to accomplish. At no time is repentance too late, or the prayer of faith unavailing. Every thing in this case, and in the whole strain of the blessed gospel, conspires to prove the consoling truth to men, that when God pleases, he can enlighten the darkest minds, and soften the hardest heart, and humble the proudest spirit, and cleanse the most polluted soul; and thus plant holy fear, repentance, faith, love, and every heavenly affection in that breast, which before was occupied by the vilest abominations.' To this miracle of mercy then we must look, in our concern for the most hardened, that we may clearly see the power of God's grace, and the proof of its unseen working for the conversion of lost souls. To this miracle of mercy we must point the eye of those who have grown old in sin, and delayed repentance to the last hour; and remind them always that the same Saviour is still ready to pray for them, and the same Spirit still able to pacify them; 'that the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him.' 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.'

Neither, however, let any one madly pervert this singular instance of heavenly grace, by deliberately delaying to turn unto God, in the hope of experiencing a similar act of his sovereign mercy. There is one such case recorded in his word, that no soul may despair of his mercy, when brought at last to seek it in sincerity and in faith; but only one such case recorded, that no soul may presume upon his mercy, while now refusing to seek it, or rather rejecting its gracious offer in his word. Not that the Lord will ever refuse to hear a similar prayer, but that the sinner may never have the time, or the power, or the heart to offer a similar prayer. Let all take every encouragement from this case; but let them take, for their instruction, the whole case. See, indeed, the one thief on the cross dying penitent, and heard in his dying prayer; but see also the other, equally near to the Saviour, and equally in need of his grace, dying hardened, and only blaspheming in his death. Let all learn in time to fear, that a thoughtless death is the ordinary issue of a thoughtless life. Let all rejoice in such a trophy of divine grace, encouraging them to draw near; but let no one pervert it into a temptation of the devil, enticing them to stand afar off.

Let us look still farther into the whole of this case, and see that while the Redeemer is ready to save, he is also resolved to sanctify; that while pardoning the sinner he puts away also the power of sin. Before he here said, 'To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise,' he first previously prepared the departing spirit for the enjoyment of paradise. Here we see, in the penitent thief, a true sense of his own sin, a sight of the Saviour's excellence, an open avowal of his own faith, a compassionate concern for a fellow-sinner, a desire to be with Christ, and a humble prayer for his favour; all those essential graces, in short, in embryo, which might have expanded in time into all the duties of a holy life. Let all this be duly kept in mind, not, indeed, as his work of merit, procuring his admission into paradise, but as the way of his preparation, making him meet for its blessedness; and, while any think of being saved as he was, let them think also of being sanctified as he was.

Let all hear, also, from these words of the Saviour, a loud call both of encouragement and of urgency, thus to prepare for his presence: 'To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise.' How solemn the admonition thus conveyed in one brief impressive word, and yet how consolatory to all who listen aright to its friendly voice. How short may be the passage, how speedy the transition from time to eternity? This day, this night, may the soul of any one be required to meet the Lord in judgment, to remain with him in paradise, or to pass on to outer darkness. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, may the sinner be summoned to receive his final condemnation, and the saint be invited to enter upon his heavenly rest. How awful and how urgent the call thus given to watchfulness, to diligence, to patience, to daily waiting for the Lord. 'What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness! how diligent that we may at last be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.'

—
 TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—MORNING.

'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me,' Psal. xxiii. 4.

THERE is a fear of death which all men instinctively feel, and are naturally formed to feel, and are in all reason warranted to feel. Viewed merely as the loss of life, and as a separation from all that we love in life, as the painful dissolution of the mortal frame, and our final entrance into the world of spirits, we naturally shrink from every appearance of its awful form, from every apprehension of its immediate approach. This dread of what may be termed 'the stroke of death;' the act of dying—the hour of departing, this dread of dissolution, is intimately interwoven with man's present being, and is, in fact, essential to the preservation of his earthly existence; and, however much it may at times be overcome by the power of strong or sudden emotions, it is the deliberate sense of mankind, that death is one of the greatest evils, which, either as an injury or a penalty, they can inflict upon a fellow-creature; and the voluntary encountering of it, one of the greatest sacrifices which one man can make for the sake of another. 'All that a man hath will he give for his life;' scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.'

But, besides 'the stroke of death,' and its usual dreaded accompaniments, there is 'the sting of death,'—the apprehension of its future consequences—a dread, not of what may befall the body, but of what may become of the soul—a sense of sin, and of its deserved punishment—a sight not merely of 'death on his pale horse,' but of 'hell following with him.' All this is in truth well fitted to overwhelm the heart of man with inexpressible alarm. 'The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. Death has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' In this view more especially it is, that death is our great enemy—our last and worst enemy; the officer of divine justice arresting the transgressor, and hailing him to judgment.

The fear of death in this view, is 'the terror of the Lord—the terror which the Lord at first presented to preserve man from the breach of his holy law—the terror which the Lord still presents, to persuade men to seek a refuge in his mercy from the curse of that law. This is indeed a most salutary fear, and as essential to the safety of the soul, as the instinctive fear of death is to the safety of the body. Generally may it be welcomed as the first symptom of spiritual life in the soul of man; but too generally do men strive to escape from it, or to suppress it, by every method in their power. Yet is it clear to all men, that, shut their eyes as they may, they must be overtaken at last by this sight of 'the king of terrors,' not only sinking under his stroke, but suffering from his sting; and most convincingly have they shown, by their uniform and deliberate practice, how much reason they feel for fearing his last summons—ready to present their thousands of burnt-offerings, and ten thousands of rivers of oil; nay, 'to give their first-born for their transgression, the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul.' 'Through the fear of death, they are all their life time subject to bondage.'

How welcome, in such circumstances, the blessed assurance from the Father of our spirits, that he hath provided a Redeemer to deliver us from this fear of death, and to 'destroy him who had the power of death' As a mighty conqueror advancing to our relief, he is heard proclaiming aloud this his purpose to save, 'O death! I will be thy plague; O grave! I will be thy destruction;' and inviting all who feel this bondage to 'commit their spirits into his hands,' and to 'fear no evil.' He both possesses the power, and hath purchased the right, to put down our great enemy, and to put away all his terrors. 'He hath tasted death for every man,' and taken away the penalty which death had been commissioned to inflict; and all who lay hold on him with humble faith, he will conduct in safety through the dark domains of their conquered foe. Well then may we say with the Psalmist, 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.' Not only do you then follow in the train of a conqueror, but you enjoy the company of a comforter. You have a power over your heads, which no enemy can withstand, and a presence around your path, which no evil can abide. 'Thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff,'—a rod of iron to dash in pieces all your opposers—a staff of support to uphold your progress through all difficulties. Possessed of all power in heaven and on earth, he secures your safety as his flock, in your passage through the dark valley; and, by his gracious word and Holy Spirit, presents you with the prospect of entering a happy pasture as your everlasting abode. Thus may you walk on your way; not only free from fear, but full of hope—hope in death, and hope of a life that shall never die. 'Fear not,' he hath said to all who seek in him a refuge from their fears, 'I am the first and the last. I am he that liveth, though I was dead, and am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death.' He hath lived and died in your nature, and brought it again from the dust of the earth. He hath lain in your grave, and prepared it for your rest. He holdeth the keys of your place of repose, and will open it again, as you awake at his coming. He hath taken possession in your name of a heavenly mansion, and is waiting to assign your portion in his presence. He hath not only gone before as your leader into the eternal world, but also abideth there for ever, as the Lord of that world. As you lay down your bodies in the narrow house, you are committing them in trust to the safe keeping of the mightiest and most friendly hand that you know; and, as your spirits enter the unseen world, you go, not so much to a strange land, as to your native home, where your gracious Deliverer holds the sovereign sway, and dispenses the richest blessings. You are there admitted as his servants and friends to see his face, and to serve him day and night for ever, free from all feeling or fear of evil, and for ever saying, as the source of all your peace and joy, 'Thou art with me.'

How melancholy the reflection, that multitudes of our fallen race know not at all, or seek not at all, for their departing spirits this sovereign remedy—this everlasting consolation. Knowing well that this awful conflict is awaiting them; and that they cannot possibly escape the power of this last enemy; knowing, also, that they have no security against his approach for a single moment, and that they may meet his summons every morning when they awake, or every night while asleep, at every step which they take, in the midst of every word which they speak; yet who seek no retreat from his terrors—no shield from his sting—no friendly hand to bear them up as their strength gives way—no cheering light to guide their steps through the dark valley—no spot of refuge through the gloom, on which to rest their eye as it closes for ever on all earthly things; but rather choose to go down to the dust trembling and alone, and rushing with reckless want of thought into the deepest shadow of the grave, or sinking in the agony of despair under the mortal stroke of their soul's adversary. 'O, why will ye thus die?'—thus depart in darkness or in dread, when a heavenly light is offered, and an unerring guide is at hand; when a gracious comforter is provided, and a mighty conqueror is arrayed for your protection and peace! 'O that men were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end.'

How invaluable the privilege, and unspeakable the blessedness, of those who do know and believe that such all-sufficient aids are awaiting them in their last conflict. What though their frail nature may at times tremble at the thought, or their hearts feel a momentary alarm as it draws near, yet are they able to trust their Lord's promise of strength according to their day, and grace to help in their time of need. The dark valley is to them the path to heaven, and their latter end is peace. They depart to be with Christ; and can calmly say, as they depart, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' They hear his voice, 'fear not, for I am with thee;' and their hearts confidently reply, 'I will fear no evil, for thou art with me.'

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—EVENING.

'He shall enter into peace: they shall rest in their beds, each one walking in his uprightness,' Isa. lvii. 2.

Of whom speaketh the prophet in these words? Of 'the righteous and the merciful.' But who are these, and where to be found? They are men who know that there are naturally none righteous, no not one, and who feel that they have no righteousness of their own before God; but who have been accepted of God as righteous in his sight through faith in his Son; who are therefore filled with the love of righteousness by the power of his Spirit, and who are led in the way of righteousness to the glory of his name. They are thus 'a chosen generation and a peculiar people,' to whom the merit of righteousness is imputed, in whom the Spirit of righteousness is implanted, to whom the rewards of righteousness are imparted, and who now walk in righteousness as the will of that God, the service of that Saviour, and the way of their own soul's blessedness. They are 'the excellent of the earth,' and 'the salt of the earth,' for whose sake, and by whose means, the earth is preserved and blessed. They are excellent in God's sight; excellent in themselves, and excellent among men. They are excellent in God's sight, as being his work, and the objects of his favour. 'The righteous Lord loveth righteousness and his countenance doth behold the upright.' He who is the sole and Sovereign source of all excellence, hath set them apart for himself, and taketh pleasure in their way; preserveth them as his precious things, and prepareth them for higher excellence in his presence. They have thus a principle of excellence in themselves, an excellent and exalted spirit of mind, rising far above the things of this earth, reaching forth towards an eternal world, passing beyond all the little distinctions of men, and seeking nothing less than 'the honour which cometh from God only,' aiming to be made like to the Lord himself in all excellence, to be in his hand instruments of all that is good to all around them. They are thus among mankind examples and dispensers of good as they have any opportunity; planted as trees of righteousness, and yielding their blessed fruits in their season. They are 'the salt of the earth,' seasoning it with grace, checking the progress of its corruption, shedding a salutary influence throughout its moral atmosphere, and saving it from destruction, because they are as a blessing within it. 'By the blessing of the upright the city is exalted;' and for the elect's sake days of suffering are shortened. For even ten's sake Sodom itself would have been spared.

Yet, like their gracious Lord, they are often lightly esteemed by 'a world which lieth in wickedness;' and when they are taken away, no man regardeth. They are generally the Lord's hidden ones, little known among men, and willing themselves to be as the least of all, the last of all, the servants of all; and often also are they tried with sore troubles, such as their own hearts only know, or sometimes it may be, so as to make them seem smitten of God; nay, forsaken of God. Yet very different is the judgment and purpose of God in regard to them, and such as thus hold them in contempt. This ignorance of their excellence, this indifference to their departure, is only a token that they who are insensible to such a calamity, are themselves ripening for greater calamities, and on the eve of being forsaken and smitten of God. When the example, and exertions, and effectual prayers of the righteous, are at any time made to cease, in any place, or among any people, it is a sure sign that God is ceasing to strive with that people, and is preparing to punish their iniquities. By the very ceasing of that restraint which the presence of the righteous may have in some measure imposed upon the prevalence of wickedness, that wickedness breaks forth with renewed audacity, and the measure of their iniquity is full. And the more suddenly that the righteous are taken away, as if perishing under God's displeasure, the more evident is the near approach of his judgments. They are taken away from the evil to come, just about to come. The ambassadors are recalled, and thereby war is declared. The intercessors have ceased, and, where none are calling for mercy, fury is ready to be poured out. The friends of the Sovereign are withdrawn to a place of safety, and the rebellious are set as a mark for the arrows of the avenger. When the righteous Lot entered into Zoar, then the Lord rained upon Sodom the threatened destruction.

The removal of the righteous and the merciful in such instances of divine judgments on a place or people, is, on the other hand, at once the release and the recompense of these righteous. As merciful men, they are spared the pain of witnessing such calamities; and as righteous men, they are raised to the blessedness for which they were prepared. They are far away from the sight or suffering of any evil, and they are forever secured in the full enjoyment of every good. They now rest as on their beds: and, as the rest of the labouring man is sweet, so do they relish the rest on which they have entered, the more that they may have led on the earth a life of toil and trouble. 'There the weary are at rest.' Their bodies may, doubtless, be said literally to rest in the grave till the resurrection; but this is only a momentary stage in their progress to the full enjoyment of the entire rest provided for their whole renewed nature in the heavenly mansions. So brief is that period, in comparison with the rest that remaineth, that we may look at once to the period, when the words of the Sovereign Lord are addressed to them from his throne of judgment: 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.' 'Then the righteous go away into life eternal.' Yet their rest is not that of the dead, but of the living. 'They enter into peace,' into the conscious enjoyment of that happy portion which is the repose of the soul; a blessedness which is above the mere feeling of repose, a positive felicity, which they have been made meet to enjoy—the possession of that which is purely good: a good accomplished after labour, enjoyed in peace, secured for evermore.

Let us then ever keep in mind, that this is not a rest, which necessarily follows from our removal to an eternal world; and that all when they die are not as a matter of course, enjoying such a rest as this. It is the rest of the 'righteous and the merciful men;' the rest of those who have 'feared lest they should fall short of it,' and who have laboured to enter into it; 'who have exercised the patience of the saints,' who 'have kept the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus;' who have at length died in the Lord—who have at least desired to do all this uprightly, 'each one walking in his uprightness—who have been 'upright in their hearts before God, and loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity;' and whose unspeakable blessedness it is (as the words have also been understood) that they are still walking onwards in their uprightness—enlarging, in endless progression, their capacity of enjoying their pure and perfect peace—advancing nearer and nearer to the image, to the glory, and to the joy of 'the Lord their righteousness.' How unspeakably precious, how greatly to be remembered, how earnestly to be desired, how incessantly to be sought, by every soul, and for every soul, the mysterious moment of entering upon such a course of walking, as leads onward and onward to so glorious an issue—to nothing short of a place before the throne of the ever-blessed and ever-living God.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—MORNING.

'And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God,' Job xix. 26.

NEVER was fallen man, even for a moment, left comfortless in his misery, and without some 'good hope through grace.' Even before the sentence of his first transgression was pronounced, and his heart made to feel the full penalty which he had incurred, the voice of mercy was uttered, and the glimpse of a restoration was presented. A seed of the woman was promised to bruise the head of the serpent; and even she who was first deceived by the adversary, was cheered with the thought, that she should be made instrumental in his discomfiture. From her mortal body, now doomed to the corruption of the grave, should come forth a Deliverer from all the terrors of that death, which her transgression had brought into the world. The full import of this promise, and the manner in which it should be accomplished, was still very dimly seen; but there was in it enough to banish despair, to inspire hope, to speak peace through the faith of its fulfilment. Gradually was the great redemption brought more clearly into view, when Abraham, the father of the faithful, saw by his faith the day of this Child of promise, and was glad; when Job, the great example of suffering believers, looked to a living Redeemer and was comforted. How very precious and full of consolation this patient saint did feel this blessed hope to his soul, most plainly appears both from the forcible words in which he professes his faith and hope, and from the earnest wish which he uttered that his dying words (as he then evidently thought them to be) should never be forgotten among suffering men, but should be recorded indelibly for their benefit. 'O that my words were now written! O that they were printed in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!'

It is most important and interesting to observe how altered was the whole strain of his language as a sufferer, from this point in his progress; how, in the very extremity of his affliction, he was enabled, by the prospect of a glorious redemption both to his sinful soul and suffering flesh, to suppress his complainings towards God, and to converse in composure with his friends. How much, indeed, do we find in his memorable words, now so indelibly recorded for our meditation, of the true grounds of every sinner's hope, and of every sufferer's consolation! How distinctly does Job here express his belief of those essential truths connected with man's salvation, which were afterwards proclaimed in the fulness of time to all the nations of the earth! How distinctly does he express his own need of a Redeemer, and the divine nature of that Redeemer, in whom he placed his trust; speaking of him, not so much as a promised Deliverer yet to come, but as even then living, the living One, and the Source of life, the Author of life eternal; speaking of him, at the same time, as holding a close relationship to himself, as his kinsman, his nearest of kin, to whom belonged the title of ransoming and restoring the forfeited inheritance, and avenging on the adversary the destruction of life; speaking, if not of his coming to suffer in the flesh, and of his rising in man's nature from the grave, yet assuredly of his appearing at last in a body that could be beheld with the eye of man, and standing on the earth with power to bring forth man's mortal nature from the grave, to see his glory, and rejoice in his salvation. This was Job's consolation: I know that such a Redeemer liveth, and that he will be my Redeemer, that he will come to ransom his people, and that I shall be blessed, at his coming, with a full relief from all my present miseries. Conscious that he embraced with faith unfeigned the promise of such a Saviour, he was confident in the hope of partaking the promised salvation. That salvation he clearly apprehended, more fully than had yet been testified by any other believer, as extending to the whole nature of fallen man, even to that part of his nature which was most visibly seen to bear the penalty of sin, to decay and die, to corrupt in the grave, and to mingle with the dust of the earth. This hope holds a very prominent place in Job's remarkable declaration; and he dwells upon it with special emphasis, not indeed as forming the essential part of the expected salvation, but as that portion of the truth, which, in his times, most required a testimony to be given, and which testimony would, in his circumstances, be more especially worthy of being recorded, and likely to be remembered. He doubtless placed his happiness, as he distinctly declared, in the assurance of his seeing God, and beholding his face in righteousness, as what the soul only can discern and enjoy. But in this also he rejoiced, that his soul's joy should be full, on finding even the perishing body, which had in this life been its burden and its snare, its object of anxiety, its trial of patience, its cause of sorrow, of adherence to life, and aversion to death, made at last its renewed companion, and the worthy partaker of its perfect blessedness. He looked upon his fleshly frame, covered with sores, from the sole of the foot unto the crown of the head, so loathsome to his own feelings, and so disgusting to all around him. He saw his skin, the natural covering of his flesh, already consumed, and the flesh itself undergoing, while he yet lived, the very process of dissolution. He looked down to the corruption of the grave, and to the devouring worms of the earth, as soon about to destroy it utterly. Yet, in the strength of his faith, was he here enabled to say, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and that I shall live again by his power, that I shall see him as my God in peace, and behold him, for myself, as my own everlasting portion. Yea, in this very flesh, so rapidly dissolving, and with these very eyes, so soon to be closed in the grave—in this very body, redeemed by his power, raised up, restored, and renewed for ever, shall I see God.

So may all the friends of the Redeemer take comfort under this view of the grave, so revolting to our natural feelings. Though in itself it is more an imaginary than a real evil; yet does it form, by the constitution of our nature, one of the terrors of the grave. It is a part of the penalty pronounced upon sin, and which it is designed that we should feel as a penalty, that the body should not only suffer death, but suffer indignity; should not only be deprived of life, and deposited in the dark prison-house, but should become the prey of the worm, and mingle with the dust of the earth; and all this is only a righteous retribution of man's sinful preference of the perishing body to the precious soul, and conveys an impressive admonition against all sinful pampering of its appetites, and senseless pride in its beauties, to the neglect of the infinitely nobler excellencies, and inculcably higher interests of the immortal spirit.

The dissolution of the body, and dispersion of its very elements, may present also to the eye of sense an objection to its future resurrection, an intimation of its unworthiness to be re-formed and re-animated to an endless life. But to the eye of faith no hindrance stands in the way of its exaltation. The Redeemer liveth, and liveth in our nature, even he who was a partaker of our own flesh and blood; nay, made in the likeness of sinful flesh, our kinsman according to the flesh, the man Christ Jesus, a being consisting of body and soul. The word was made flesh, and, under that mortal vail, manifested his glory as the only begotten of the Father. In that nature he wrought out his gracious work as a Redeemer; suffered in it the ignominy of the cross; submitted in it to the power of the grave; and in it rose again as the triumphant Conqueror of death. No part of that nature, which he thus redeemed, will he leave under the power or in the hands of that discomfitted enemy. My Redeemer liveth, may every believer say with Job, liveth in the flesh which he assumed, in flesh like mine; and in my flesh, in flesh like his, shall I behold him. How instructive and how engaging the admonition thus presented, to reverence, and to reverence highly, even the perishing body, not as the unworthy rival, but as the inseparable companion of the never-dying soul. As honoured, even in this mortal scene, to be the habitation of God through the Spirit, and as about to be still farther honoured as itself an inhabitant or even a temple in the heavens, let us dread the thought of making it in any measure an instrument of unrighteousness, an agent of the evil one. Let us give diligence to 'cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.' We know that our Redeemer liveth; 'we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.' 'Let every man who hath this hope in him purify himself, even as his Lord is pure.'

---

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—EVENING.

*'It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory:
it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power,'*
1 Cor. xv. 43.

It is the first work of the blessed Spirit to convince the world of sin; and it might seem sufficient for that purpose to point the eye of man to his misery; nay, merely to those miseries which palpably affect his mortal body. The miseries of the soul are less discernible to his sight, and less distinctly felt by his fleshly mind; but those of the body are manifest to every sense, and make impressions to which he cannot remain insensible. The ravages of death, as simply affecting the body itself at all seasons of its existence, in such a variety of ways, by such a multitude of means, and by a power so irresistible, and that not merely depriving it of life, but racking all its senses with pain, and defacing all its beauties with disease; not merely casting it down in its strength, like the mountain oak, or the monumental column, which often remain entire after their fall, and tell to future times the former height of their glory; but sending it away out of sight, changing its wonderful frame, dissolving its whole substance into a mass of revolting corruption, and dispersing its every element throughout creation, as utterly as if it had never existed—all these effects and attendants of mortality, which may be seen and felt by every man, proclaim aloud to every ear the existence of some awfully malignant cause. That fatal cause the word of truth distinctly declares to be the malignity of sin, 'the wages of sin is death.' These are its baneful fruits even in respect to the perishing body; and of these only we speak at present, as most clearly discernible by every bodily sense, as most hateful to every natural feeling, and as alone calculated to carry conviction of its evil into every human heart. So may the very prevalence of suffering in man's lot prove the first corrective of the power of sin in his heart; and the mere sight of bodily suffering teach the lesson of penitence to the soul. In all that we witness or endure of mortal misery, in every instance merely of the body's decay, disease, and death, may we see, as it were, a hand pointing to sin as its cause; and hear a voice, even from every silent tomb or open grave, warning us to hate, and shun, and resist, and destroy its power in the world around us, and in our own hearts and lives. So, by the strongest feelings even of our fallen nature, by those of sympathy and self-love, by all the ills that merely 'the flesh is heir to,' by all that we see of them in others, or dread of them in our own case, may we be constrained to 'abhor that which is evil.'

But the more deeply that we grieve under this reign of sin and death, and sorrow at the sight of their desolating ravages, even over all the majesty and beauty of man's mortal frame; so much the more have we cause to rejoice in the glory of its final restoration, and in the full reparation which shall at length be rendered for all its degradation. Let us not limit our views to a part of the wondrous plan, or stop short either at the fall of our race by sin, or at the fall of our mortal bodies by death; but let us learn always to look forward by faith over the whole field of man's progress, and the whole counsel of God's will. Let us not dwell on the seeming severity of the Sovereign judge in the penalty of sin, when we are hearing his gracious proclamation of its speedy and entire remission to all who will embrace his offered mercy. Scarcely need we deplore the defacing power of disease and death over that body, which we may thus behold, in the visions of faith, returning so speedily to life and immortality; nor need we stand long mourning at the taking down of this clay-built cottage, however rudely demolished, when we are called to contemplate, as rising out of its ruins, 'a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'

Let us not perplex ourselves with idly questioning how this can be done, how the dead are raised, 'with what body they do come.' Much hath God shown us in the wondrous changes which are daily taking place in his visible creation, to help our comprehension of his power in this final change of our own bodies in the grave. Clearly does the apostle here teach us, that the body laid in the grave is only as the seed of the body, which shall be raised in glory. It is not the actual seed which is sown, that the husbandman reaps from his field; but only a similar grain, which has sprung from its decay, and which bears the elements of that seed in its substance. It is not the very same body laid in the grave, which comes forth at the resurrection; but a body unspeakably more glorious, raised by Almighty power from its dissolution in the dust, as the germ which he created at first, capable of producing such immortal fruit. Here indeed all parallel ceases, inasmuch as it is raised up not only a glorious body, but a body indestructible and spiritual. This will be its special glory, that it shall then be incapable of dying any more. Nothing causing death, nothing deserving death, nothing capable of death, shall be found in its frame. 'It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a natural (an animal body) it is raised a spiritual body.' Let us meditate on the wondrous change and glorious features of the body thus raised and restored, and rendered spiritual.

This body, the abode of weariness, the prey of disease, the incumbrance of the soul, the seat of ensnaring appetites, and the instrument of unrighteousness; this body, rising from the grave by the Lord's quickening Spirit, shall leave there all its weakness, and bring forth with it new powers for its heavenly life. 'This corruptible shall put on incorruption.' This frame, formed from the dust and returning to dust again, so soon exhausted by toil, and requiring to be recruited by daily rest, so liable to pain and decay, so easily injured by innumerable accidents, so often tainted by subtle and malignant disorders, so frequently filled with corruption even while it lives, and so certain to become the prey of the worm at last—this corruptible thing, quickened again by the Spirit of the Lord, shall put on a glorious form, resembling the light in beauty; free from all languor and pain, liable no more to injury or decay, full of unceasing vigour and health, fitted to join in the services of angels and the felicity of heaven. 'This mortal shall put on immortality,' never more to tremble in the apprehension of dissolution, or to feel the stroke of death, or to be stretched out a breathless corpse, or to be torn away from interesting duties, or to be put out of the sight of weeping friends; but, under the power of the Lord of life, shall become spiritual in its nature, the pure dwelling-place of a glorified spirit, capable of seeing the Lord as he is, and of serving him for evermore. How glorious such a transformation, and how welcome such a promise; laying down corruption, to take up incorruption; laying down weakness, to take up strength; laying down defilement, to take up purity; laying down mortality, to take up immortality. This is the crowning excellency of all these glories, that they are imperishable; and this is the summary of them all, that, 'as we have once borne the image of the earthy, we shall then bear for ever the image of the heavenly.' To His glorified body we are warranted to look, as at once the proof and pattern of our own, as 'the first specimen of immortal man'—'a glorious being, over which death hath no more power, which will subsist in undecaying youth and splendour, when the heavens are no more.* This divine image let us desire even now, if possible, to begin to bear fully in all its features; and, as looking forward to be clothed with a similar glorified body, so labour to be animated with the same heavenly mind that was in him, and so to be not only admitted 'to behold his glory,' but also enabled to 'enter into his joy.'

—
 TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—MORNING.

'His Lord said unto him, 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'
 Mat. xxv. 23.

WHOSE gracious words are these, and to whom are they addressed? They are the words of the sovereign judge, and the compassionate Saviour of the world; and are spoken with infinite condescension to those of his own creatures, and of his own redeemed, whom he hath honoured to love and serve him. How worthy is he to be served as the Lord of all!—how happy all they who are in any measure privileged to serve him!—how unspeakably glorious the recompense provided in his mercy for them as his servants! He hath all authority in heaven and on earth; and it is proclaimed, as the supreme law of the whole human race, that 'all men should honour the Son even as they honour the Father.' He hath all excellence in himself to deserve this universal honour and obedience; 'in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead'—all the glory of the Father. He possesses all possible special claims to our utmost love and service; 'unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever.' The time will come, when the acknowledgment of his worthiness shall be the universal song, when 'every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are on the sea, and all that are in them, shall be heard saying, Blessing, and glory, and honour, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.' Well indeed might we feel the glory of his exaltation to be so great, as to feel our unworthiness of being permitted to serve him; unworthy either that he should come under our roof, or that we should be taken into his household, were it not so clearly the will of God and our calling. To this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. 'He died for all, that they might live; that they should not henceforth live unto themselves, but to him that died for them, and rose again; wherefore we labour, that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him.' 'Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus.' Nothing, indeed, is too small that he will not receive as a service, when done to serve him. 'Whosoever,' he hath himself said, 'shall give you a cup of cold water, in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward.' No one is too humble in condition to be allowed thus to do him service; and even the despised slaves among men are exhorted by his apostles to consider themselves as the servants of Christ, 'doing the will of God from the heart;' nay, called to 'adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour.' Nor are even they, who have shamefully degraded themselves by serving the vilest of all masters, shut out from becoming his servants for ever; 'being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.'

How gracious this view of the Lord's service; a service into which all may enter, and find every man his work; and more gracious still, in that it is a service which all may fulfil, or rather find the means of fulfilling, while desiring to serve him. No soul of man is excluded from entering; no soul that enters oppressed; nothing required of any one above what has been given. The great principle of the service is the same in all ; and such as the poorest, the feeblest, the lowest, the youngest may attain in the highest degree, and be found in the foremost place. That principle is simply fidelity, that each be found faithful to his Lord in the things committed to his care ; 'do faithfully whatsoever thou doest.' It is to feel ourselves to be his servants—nay, his property—bought by him with a price—bound to him by every tie—blessed only through him in every stage of our progress. It is to make it our chief aim to honour and serve him in all that we do—to please him well in all things ; not merely doing the thing commanded, but because it is his commandment ; not doing it grudgingly, and as against our will, but cheerfully and from the heart ; not doing it slothfully and superficially, as just to save appearances, but with a ready mind, and with the ability which God giveth. It is to do it also in the way and manner that he directs ; not according to our own liking, or by means of our own devising ; but agreeably to his own instructions, and after his own example ; if possible, as he hath done, or as we have reason to think would have done the same. It is, last of all, to desire and to seek, as he enjoins us, his own guidance and help in his own service ; as he hath himself said to all that come to him, 'without me, ye can do nothing ;' 'Lo I am with you alway ;' 'abide in me ;' 'ask of me ;' 'my grace is sufficient for thee.'

* Robert Hall.

It is not, then, of much moment, where we may be placed, or what we may be called to do in his service ; but solely with what spirit of faithfulness we do his will, and finish his work. All are on a level with regard to this power of approving themselves in his sight. 'He accepteth according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not ;' and he proclaims it as a rule in his kingdom, that 'he who is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much.' In this principle of faithfulness, we are all equally concerned, and all equally called to exercise it in all that we do. Let us apply this principle to ourselves in all that he hath put into our hand, or given us any power to do ; and see that we live, not as if we had no master, or were our own masters, but as his stewards and servants ; 'not unto ourselves, but unto him that died for us, and rose again.' Whatever it be, possession, or power, health, strength, talents, time, knowledge, substance, any power of doing good, of persuading others to do good, of praying God to do them good—'As every man hath received the gift, so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. If any man speak, let him speak as of the oracles of God ; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability that God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ.'

How gracious that Lord whom we are called to serve, in the encouragement which he imparts, in the recompense which he provides for all his faithful servants ! How far beyond all that they could ever deserve, or presume to expect, even that which he himself enjoys. What was specially the joy set before him, for which he did so much, and in which he invites us to be partakers ? The joy of giving glory to God, by bringing souls to his glory ; and this joy all who serve him may even now be privileged to taste. In all that thus gives glory to God, or gains good to man, there is a blessedness to be enjoyed ; 'in the keeping of all his commandments there is a great reward.' 'Great peace have they that love his law ; a joy unspeakable in the thought of his love, and in the hope of his glory.' There is a present blessedness in the very thought of serving such a Master, in the assurance of his presence and protection, in the endeavour to do any thing that may please or serve him, in the hope of receiving his gracious commendation, in the prospect of being received at last where he is, 'where his servants shall see his face, and serve him day and night,' and sing his praise without ceasing. How lightly may we hold all approbation or opposition from men, from all creatures, from all worlds, in comparison with these words from his mouth : 'Well done, good and faithful servant,' who would not serve thee ? with all that we have will we serve thee. With thine only can we serve thee. 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do.' Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.

---

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord,' 1 Cor. xv. 58.

ON the Lord's part there is no discharge from his service, and, on the part of his faithful servants, there is no desire to leave it ; they find his yoke to be easy, his burden light, and his service perfect freedom to their souls. They become no longer servants but friends, and are made partakers of all that is his. They are treated by him as brethren, and even made joint heirs of his inheritance. He said to them freely,

'All things are yours;' and, when he makes the supposition of their going away, it is the instant answer of their souls, 'Lord, to whom can we go but unto thee? thou hast the words of eternal life.' They are thus 'stedfast and unmoveable,' faithful unto death; 'nor do they merely wish to remain with him, but to render him more service, to increase their labours, and to abound therein more and more; nay, to be always thus abounding, 'growing in grace,' 'pressing always to the mark,' 'shining more and more unto the perfect day.'

This abounding in the work of the Lord follows, we may say, infallibly from the very nature of the service, and from the constitution of our own nature. Having once tasted that the Lord is gracious, there is a hungering and thirsting for more of the heavenly food. The appetite here 'grows by what it feeds upon.' The soul, advancing in excellence, enlarges its capacity as well as its desire for more. All this follows also from their Lord's increasing claims upon them that serve him. We cannot number his benefits, nor measure his loving-kindnesses. These are renewed every morning, and new obligations laid upon us every moment to love him more, and serve him better. We are made to feel that our most abounding labours can never keep pace with his abounding mercies; and that, though we had done all that was our duty to do, we are still only unprofitable servants. With the powers even of angels, and the ages of eternity to serve him, we shall never be able to requite the Lord for his goodness; but ever must it be our duty our desire, our delight, to 'abound in the work of the Lord.' 'Wherefore,' we may well say to one another in these words of the apostle, 'be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.'

This we may know, if any thing can be known. Whether we are indeed labouring in the Lord, or labouring as we ought to do in such a service—this we may not know, at least so confidently as we would wish to know it; but this we may assuredly know, that if so be that we truly labour to please and serve him as our Lord, it shall not be in vain. This is a figure of speech to express more strongly the very contrary to its being in vain, to intimate that nothing shall be more full, more satisfying, more certain, than the blessed return or recompense of this labour. It shall not be in vain on your part, that is, your labour shall not prove ineffectual through your inability to complete the work given you to do, but you may be assured of strength from your Lord himself to fulfil your portion of service. It is himself 'who worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure.' His own hand is ever stretched out for your help, and you have only to ask his aid. This help he giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, never reproaching any for their great need of it, or their frequent asking of it. Every power that you put forth on his work becomes stronger in his strength; and your very apprehension of failing, at any time, insures your success by making you go the oftener, and trust the more to his power. He hath said to all that serve him, 'my grace is sufficient for you;' and you may say always in humble confidence, 'I can do all things by Christ strengthening me,' nay, 'I will glory in mine infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.'

This assurance of strength for our task, and even some prospect of its successful accomplishment, is not altogether sufficient encouragement in any labour, unless we have also in view a suitable recompense of our toil, after the work is done, otherwise our labour would be empty or unprofitable, and so far therefore 'in vain.' But here especially is our labour in the Lord encouraged by its gainfulness, its exceeding great reward. In itself, indeed, all our labour can merit nothing at his hand, and cannot be accomplished without his help. But it is his good pleasure to connect with such labour the blessedness which he hath fully purchased, and freely promised, and to proportion it to the measure of our work of faith and labour of love which we show to his name. 'Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap; he that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.' How great as well as gracious is this recompense of reward, as our encouragement to abound in his work. It is immediate and at hand. This service from the first is pleasant, and in the very work there is instant enjoyment. 'Godliness is profitable for all things, even for the life that now is;' a portion of the recompense accompanies the labour, and increases with every day's service. 'Blessed is every one that feareth the Lord, that walketh in his ways.' It is exceeding great, its value is incalculable. Its 'merchandise is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold, and all the things that thou canst desire are not to be compared to it.' It is 'an exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' which shall yet be revealed. It is certain and sure, depending not upon the turns of human affairs, the stability even of nations, or the power of any created being, but resting on the promise of a God that cannot lie, 'with whom is no variableness or shadow of turning, of whose words not one jot or tittle shall pass away, till all be fulfilled.' Of that promised reward, and of the Lord's power to bestow it, 'he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he raised him from the dead, and made him Head over all things to the church.'

Knowing all this, believing all this, being already in the Lord, and loving your Lord, and labouring in the Lord, (for to such we now speak), 'Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.' Be not weary in such well-doing; for in due season ye shall reap, if ye faint not.' Be not slothful in such labours; for, according as your sufferings or services in the Lord abound, your consolations shall abound also. Keep ever in mind that, of all labours, this is the most productive, the only labour under the sun, which shall not be 'in vain,' of which not any portion shall fall to the ground, not even the intention of the heart to fulfil it shall fail. Even, then, as traders or labourers for gain, let us see where our true profit is to be found. Let us not be seen, like simple ones, 'spending our money for that which is not bread, and our labour for that which satisfieth not;' toiling most for the meat which perisheth, and least for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life. But rather, like persons of enlarged views, who look forward to the end of things, and beyond this life of vapour, let us learn to seek early, to seek diligently, to seek at all times, and above all things, the unsearchable riches, 'a treasure in heaven,' the 'better and the more enduring substance.'

—
 TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—MORNING.

'For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known,'
 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

OUR present views of spiritual and heavenly things, of all that relates to the essential excellencies of the divine nature, the mysterious processes in the works of creation, the springs and purposes of the events at any time in progress in the order of providence, the depths and issues of the glorious plan of redeeming grace, the final state and full felicity of the saints in the heavenly world—the knowledge of such things is too wonderful for us; it is high, we cannot attain unto it.' At no time, indeed, hath God left himself without a witness; and much of 'the invisible things of him are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead.' Yet still have we daily reason to feel and to say, 'touching the Almighty,' his infinite perfections and secret purposes, we cannot find him out; and even of his visible creation, after our utmost researches into its extent, uses, and relations, are we often constrained to say with the same devout worshipper, 'Lo these are parts of his ways, but how little a portion is heard of him.' The book of inspiration hath indeed shed a blessed light on our darkness, in all that concerns our spiritual state and duties; and we are not left to lament the want of any knowledge necessary for our soul's salvation. But still are there many things, which we do not know at all; and even what we do know, we know only in part. The heavenly truths most clearly revealed, are, for the most part, revealed to us only in a general way; and of many particular points, the reasons on which they are founded, the manner of their influence, we know in a measure nothing at all, or at most so little, as scarcely to deserve the name of knowledge. Even in reading God's own declarations of what he hath done in the general government of the universe, and for the glory of his name, or in our personal experience of his dealings towards us as individuals, or others around us and connected with us—we are repeatedly called to adore in humility what we cannot penetrate; and to exclaim with the apostle, 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.' With respect especially to the eternal and unseen world, the felicity and glory of the redeemed, the particular sources from which their happiness shall flow, the peculiar circumstances in which their glory shall consist, the precise way in which the Lord will communicate himself and his blessedness—these are all subjects, which we know only in part, or rather which we 'see only as through a glass, darkly;' as dim and broken reflections from the surface of a mirror under an imperfect light.

All this, however, is nothing more than what we have reason to expect, and it is not possible that the case should be otherwise. It is no more than what reason teaches us to expect, that our finite capacities should be unable to comprehend the schemes of the infinite mind. 'Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?' It is no more than what we might expect beforehand, that we should be unable, not merely as finite, but as fallen creatures, to enter into the thoughts of the holy Lord God; as the gracious Redeemer said to his disciples, 'I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now.' It is no more than what our ordinary practice in life dictates; and, as it would be neither practicable nor proper to make the child aware of the reasons for every step in his teaching and training, or the soldier acquainted with the grounds of every order and movement in his service; neither would it be suitable, nor perhaps compatible with our spiritual training and believing obedience, that the Most High should take us into his counsels, and 'give account to us of his matters.' It is no more than what he has a right to require, that we should acquiesce in his declarations and dealings, on the ground of what we do know of his thoughts towards us; though we see them only in part, that we should learn to take his simple word, and trust his gracious intentions; saying always in the confidence of children, 'even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.' It is more especially our duty thus to rest satisfied in the wisdom and goodness of his darkest dispensations, when we have his own promise, that they shall afterwards be all clearly revealed, and fully vindicated; thus graciously intimating, that they are now concealed from our view merely because we are not yet capable, or would not now be the better of knowing them; and that they are all not only right and good in themselves, but such as we ourselves shall finally approve to have been so. 'What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.' 'Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known.'

It will thus form no small part of the occupations and enjoyments of the heavenly state to be making continually fresh discoveries of the counsels and character of the supreme Jehovah; and to have, at the same time, the consciousness that this will prove to our souls an inexhaustible source of delightful contemplation. Then shall we have indeed turned aside from all other objects and interests to see this great sight, and to behold with exalted adoration and enraptured astonishment the traces of his glory, and the tokens of his goodness in ever-varying and endless succession. But more especially shall we then be blessed with a sense of the peculiar presence of God himself, shining every where as the constant light of the heavenly world. 'They are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple, and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.' God shall then be the all in all, the entire and unceasing object of their contemplation. They shall no longer see him darkly through any distant vision, or dim outward symbol, but shall have an immediate view of his excellencies; they shall see him face to face, 'They shall see him as he is.' How sad the state of those blinded souls, and how unsuited for the heavenly mansions, who have no spiritual sight to behold him who is invisible, who see nothing of the blessed God in the glass of his works and of his word, and who have no desire to draw near to him in his visible temples, or learn to say in devout earnestness and affection, 'thy face, Lord, will we seek.' 'Lord, lift on us the light of thy countenance.' Thus desiring to turn away their eyes from his glory, and even to hide themselves from his sight, they shall at last have their own depraved wish fulfilled, and 'shall be cast out into outer darkness,' and 'punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power.' O, let it rather be 'the one thing that we desire of the Lord, and that we will seek after, that we may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of our life, that we may behold the beauty of the Lord;' and that he who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, would shine in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. 'With thee, O Lord, is the fountain of life; in thy light may we see light;' and 'walking in the light, as thou art in the light, may we have fellowship with thee the Father, and with thy Son Jesus Christ,' now and for evermore. Amen.

---

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.—EVENING.

'And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away,' Rev. xxi. 4.

THE end of our faith is the salvation of our souls, and this salvation can be completed only in a spiritual and eternal world. 'A new heaven and a new earth' are promised as the future habitation of the redeemed; but the blessedness there provided for them is at the same time spoken of, as something which is above their present power to comprehend or to conceive. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be;' and the things which are to be seen and heard in the heavenly paradise, are declared to be such as are unspeakable in the words of man; nay, such as it would not be allowed for a man to utter. Its blessedness is therefore represented to us by figures or similitudes, comparing it to those things, which, though not really the most excellent in themselves, men are disposed to consider as the most precious or glorious acquisitions; such as golden crowns and shining garments, treasures inexhaustible, inheritances incorruptible, thrones of glory, rivers of pleasure. But more especially it is described by negative terms, by exemption from things evil, by the assurance that no such evils shall in any measure ever be found in that blessed abode. These evils are what all mankind more or less feel; and are able to understand the blessedness of feeling them no more, of being secured from them for ever. To be at rest from toil, to be at peace from trouble, to be at ease from pain, to be exempt from sorrow, to be secure from dying—these are blessed reliefs and exemptions, which our very feelings in the body, and fears in this life, make us capable of understanding, and appreciating, and desiring—ready often to say with the Psalmist, ‘O that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest.’ ‘There shall be no more death,’ even in its mildest shape; no more departing from things that have pleased us, from persons who are dear to us; no more dread of those more appalling forms and accompaniments of death, which make him the king of terrors and the executioner of divine justice; no more sight of ghastly disease, mangled limbs, or garments rolled in blood; nothing to hurt or destroy in all the holy place. There shall be ‘neither sorrow nor crying;’ nothing to cause grief or call forth weeping; no more sorrow of sympathy for the sufferings and oppressions of fellow-creatures; no more sorrow of affection on account of the unkindness or misconduct of friends; no more sorrow of the soul at the sight of transgressors, or under the sense of our own sinful nature; ‘sorrow and sighing shall for ever flee away.’ ‘Neither shall there be any more pain,’ no more feeling of any suffering in glorified bodies of the saints; no wearisome nights on a bed of disease; no tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day; no inhabitant among them saying I am sick; no sense of weariness, of cold and nakedness, of scorching heat or of pining want; ‘They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.’ ‘The former things have passed away; all things causing such evils have come to an end; and there can be no more experience of them where no cause for them exists. ‘There shall in no wise enter therein any thing that defileth,’ no more sin and no more curse; ‘God shall wipe away all tears from their faces.’ They are no longer in a dying world, or in a weeping world, or in a wicked world, where there are daily so many occasions of sorrow to the heart of the believer; who, the more he has of the mind of his Lord, is the more like him ‘a man of sorrows and acquainted with griefs.’ But not only are all such things passed away, so as not to exist, so as not to be experienced, but even so as not to be remembered as reasons for sorrow, or at least so as to be swallowed up and lost amidst the surrounding sources of unceasing blessedness to the soul; ‘the former things’ shall not be remembered nor come into mind. Not only shall there be no cause for tears to flow, but God himself shall dry them all up for ever—shall not only remove every new cause for weeping, but shall open such views of all past reasons of sorrow, as to change them into grounds of rejoicing. He has trained them as his children, and chastened them in his affection, and suffered their tears to flow for their good; but now, that these days of trial are past, he removes all the traces of their grief, and turns their very mourning into joy, and makes them rejoice from their sorrow. ‘The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces.’

But we must not confine our thoughts of heavenly blessedness to mere freedom from all present evils, or to those views of it which are drawn from earthly similitudes, of which even earthly minds may be glad to hear, and to which they may look forward with satisfaction as good things to be enjoyed. But let us ever remember the pure and spiritual character of all the happiness that is there enjoyed, and the proper sources from which it flows. It is not merely that there shall be no tears; but that God is there present to wipe them all away: it is because God himself will dwell with them, and be with them, and be their God. It is not merely that they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; but because ‘the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne’ shall there feed them as his flock, and lead them unto those living fountains of water; and so God, in such ways, by such means, ‘shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.’ It is not merely being delivered from all evils for evermore, but being for ever with the Lord our deliverer, that shall form our future blessedness. It is to be where he is, to see him as he is, to love him as he is, to be like to what he is; it is, as he himself hath expressed it, to behold his glory, and to enter into his joy as our Lord. In our desires of a heavenly portion, let us never forget that to learn Christ is the way to heaven; and, in all our thoughts of its blessedness, let us bring the whole into one bright point as its sum and substance, viz. that it is 'to be with Christ.' Let us never imagine that we can have the spirit of that heavenly society formed in any measure in our souls, if, in our anticipations of its felicity, we are overlooking the presence of him, who is the Lord of that heaven, the light of that heaven, the life of that heaven, the object of adoration and praise to all who dwell in that heaven above. To him let us now learn daily to ascribe all the hope that gladdens our hearts—the hope of such a blessedness as our eternal portion. 'I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.' 'Blessed be he that cometh in name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!' Thus honouring him in our hearts and before men, as the author of our eternal salvation, we should be daily preparing to join the company of his saints in casting their heavenly crowns before his throne, and singing their eternal song of praise: 'Thou art worthy; for thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation.'

---

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—MORNING.

'Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses;' 1 Tim. vi. 12.

To the greater part of the human race the whole of their life on earth is nothing else than a continued fight, a hard struggle for subsistence, an unceasing conflict with want and suffering. Few at least there are, in any condition of life, who are known to finish their earthly course without encountering, in some measure or other, under some form or other, the host of enemies ever ready to assail their rest or peace. Every human being, it may be said, merely in regard to things temporal, has a fight on hand, a conflict to carry on, for the preservation of life, for procuring the means of life, for the attainment of what they hold to be the blessings of life. This is a sort of fight, which cannot well be called either good or bad in itself, the unavoidable struggle of the natural man for the supply of his wants or the gratification of his desires. Often, indeed, is this mere animal fight rendered, by the manner in which it is carried on, an evil fight, an act of aggression against the rights and comforts of others who are engaged in the same warfare; an act of daily rebellion against the will and the claims of the great Sovereign of the world, in which they live; a wanton spoiling, it may be, of all his good gifts to themselves, or a cruel desolation of all the blessings that he gives to others; a frenzied attempt to resist his mighty power, to defeat his purposes for good, to accomplish their own destruction.

There is a very different warfare, however, which all are called to enter, and to pursue, with all their courage and perseverance, a contest for the welfare of the soul, as well as for that of the body; a conflict with the enemies of God and man, a noble resistance to all the powers of evil; a righteous contending for all that is good in the life that now is, and also in that which is to come; a struggle that may well be called a good fight, good in all its objects, good in all its means, good in all its effects, good for all who are engaged in its toils, or who are concerned in its success. It is 'the fight of faith.' It is truly so called, and must be so carried on, if we would gain the victory, and secure the prize. It is the fight of faith. It is a warring for such blessings as faith only can enable us to discern; a wrestling against such enemies as faith only enables us to overcome. 'We walk by faith,' we war by faith, and not by sight. 'This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith.' We have to watch and war, not only against things seen, against flesh and blood, against an evil nature, and an evil world, but 'against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places;' enemies who can be discerned and defied only by that faith which is 'the evidence of things not seen.' We have to watch and war for blessings which we do not now see, but which we hope for, and can be upheld and encouraged in our contests only by the power of that faith which is 'the substance of things hoped for.' We have to watch and war by a strength above our own, and which we can apply for and apprehend only by that faith with which we 'see him who is invisible,' and are united to him who is our help: 'Who is he that overcometh, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?' By this faith it is that we keep before our minds much stronger motives, and higher hopes, and better blessings, than what the gain of the whole world can present. By this faith it is, that we can fix our thoughts on the unspeakable glories of the invisible and eternal state, as our chief object of pursuit, and as in all reason the most worthy of our utmost exertions. By this faith it is, that the amazing love of the most high

God, manifested in the work of our soul's redemption, through the mediation of his Son Jesus Christ, is pressed upon our hearts in all its constraining power, as our supreme law and rule of duty at all times. By this faith it is, that we have ever present before our inward man the realizing view of our gracious Redeemer, as our all-sufficient Defender and Leader in the good fight, 'the Captain of our salvation, made perfect through suffering,' and so calling us, both by his claims upon us, and his example before us, to suffer with him, and for him, that we may finally and for ever reign with him: 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne.' This is the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus, the exceeding great reward of all who war this good warfare, even a crown of glory which fadeth not away, and which the Lord himself will bestow at his appearing; 'the free gift of God, even eternal life, through Jesus Christ.' This gift so precious is not, indeed, to be purchased by our money, or our merits, or our many labours; but it is 'the promise which God has freely promised' to them that love him, and which he hath sent his Son to bestow on as many as receive him. O! then may we not say to every soul of man, receive him, as himself the unspeakable gift of God to man, and as bringing with him nothing less than the gift of eternal life to your souls. Stand ready to receive what he is so willing to bestow. Press forward to seek from his hand what you so much need to secure. Lay hold with all your might of the offered gift, even of eternal life, and 'hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.' Let your grasp of it be as desperate as that of one who is struggling for his life, and who will not loose his hold except with his life. For, indeed, 'it is not a vain thing, it is your life,' a life alone worthy of the name, a life of heavenly blessedness, a life of immortal existence.

And to every one who may be addressed, like Timothy, as a 'man of God,' through faith acquainted with God, at peace with God, aiming to please God, may we still more especially say, Hold fast the profession which you have made before many witnesses, and endure all hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, worthy of the Lord who hath called you to glory, and to virtue. Remember how much his glory and your own good are concerned in the issue of your welfare; how you are made as a spectacle to angels, and to men; and how many are interested in the triumph of your faith. Resist, then, the great adversary, 'be stedfast in the faith,' and give no place to his temptations, or his threatenings, no not for an hour. 'Flee all those hurtful lusts that drown men in destruction and perdition, and follow after righteousness, and godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.' Fight your good fight with those heavenly weapons which your Lord approves, and provides, and promises to make effectual. 'Take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand.' Listen to your heavenly Leader's voice, and let his cheering words be continually sounding in your ears. 'Watch ye, stand fast in the faith.' Quit yourselves like men, be strong, 'strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might,' assured that you can do all things through Christ strengthening you, and shall be more than conquerors in all things through him that loved you.' Look to your Leader's example and follow his steps, through evil report, and through good report, through life and in death. Like him despising every shame, and enduring every cross; though like him you should at last yield up your mortal life, you then, like him, conquer in death, and receive from his hands the crown of life, and sit down with him for ever on the right hand of God.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.—EVENING.

'My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand,' John x. 27, 28.

ONE of the most beautiful and expressive emblems, employed in sacred scripture, to describe man's condition as a fallen creature, is that of lost sheep, sheep that have gone astray. Other emblems imply our guilt and rebellion against God; but this expresses chiefly our misery and danger in ourselves, as wandering from God, and seeking our good from the things of this world: 'All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way.' The emblem, in its natural meaning, is remarkably descriptive of man's inability to secure himself from the miseries of his spiritual estrangement and aversion from God. A sheep that is lost is peculiarly helpless and exposed, incapable of finding its way to the fold or the flock, which it has left; neither swift enough to flee from its various enemies, nor strong enough to resist; liable to a multitude of dangers, of which it has no experience or apprehension; and, unless speedily recovered by the care of the shepherd, sure in some way or other to be destroyed. This its rescue and restoration is the apt similitude of our redemption by the great Shepherd of souls, who 'came to seek and to save that which was lost.' He fulfils all the offices of a good Shepherd in this work which was given him to do, and which he gave himself to do; but there is one point, in which he did more than what any shepherd can ever be imagined to do, and in this, therefore, the comparison utterly fails, namely, in that he gave his life for his sheep. A shepherd among men may expose his life to risk, for the sake of his flock; as when the young shepherd of Israel threw himself upon the lion and the bear, and, at his own peril, plucked his sheep from their mouth; but the gracious Redeemer, as the good Shepherd, came deliberately, and on purpose, to suffer death for his flock: 'I lay down my life for the sheep: no man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself.' He made himself, as one of the helpless and unresisting flock, an offering and a sacrifice unto God, that they might go free; 'He was led like a lamb to the slaughter; and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth; the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.'

Now to this flock—the church of God, which he hath 'purchased with his own blood,'—he continues to fulfil all the offices of a great and good Shepherd, till he carry them safe through the dark valley, and bring them all to the heavenly fold, where they shall for ever go out and in, and find pasture, in the full enjoyment of that eternal life which he hath given them. In this his office as the Shepherd of our souls, there is indeed presented to our minds the most engaging and affecting view of his care for our safety, and compassion for our misery, and condescension to our infirmities; even more, in some respects, than in the similitude of a father's watchfulness and labours for his children's welfare; inasmuch as a family may grow up, and guide themselves, and even support their parents in their turn; but a flock is always helpless, and continually dependant on the shepherd's care. In no words can the Redeemer's care, as a Shepherd, be so truly and beautifully described as in those of his own Holy Spirit in the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, xxxiv. 6, &c.

The Lord is thus to his people, in a spiritual sense, what a shepherd is to his flock: 'He shall feed his flock like a shepherd,' he is the Shepherd and Overseer of our souls. For this office he possesses every requisite qualification in the highest degree, and fulfils its duties in the most effectual manner. 'He is mighty to save,' and though they are so feeble in themselves, and surrounded with so many adversaries, seeking to devour them; not one of them shall be lost, and no being is able to pluck them out of his hand. Though they are found in every place, and are every moment requiring his aid, yet he is able, by his divine presence, to watch over all and every one of those committed to his charge, or who cast themselves on his care: 'He calleth his own sheep by name.' He feeds them as a hungry flock, vainly seeking their souls' happiness in the barren wilderness of this world; leading them to the pasture of his word and ordinances, feeding them with knowledge and understanding of their true good, and giving them 'the meat which endureth unto eternal life.' He guards them in their defenceless state, from all things that would do them harm; making all things that befall them work together for their good; and enabling them to walk safely amidst the powers of darkness that surround them on every side, and seek their destruction every moment. He guides them in their readiness to go astray; warning them as by a voice behind them, 'this is the way, walk ye in it;' and, when wandering at any time from his paths, and made to feel their need of his help, he is at hand to hear their cry, and to bring them back to his fold, and to restrain them by his gracious influence on their hearts. He does all this also, not only as the great Shepherd, but as a good shepherd; knowing their weakness, and touched even with a feeling of their infirmities, going before them by his own example, and encouraging them to follow his steps; nay, 'constraining them by his love; strengthening them by his grace, carrying the feeblest, as in his bosom, and gently leading along those that are heavy laden with their burdens. In all this also he is faithful to the charge which he had undertaken. Having loved them as his own he loves them to the end, and nothing shall be able to separate them from his love, having come to seek and to save them, when they knew him not; he will never leave or forsake them after having brought them to know his voice, and to obey his call; but will carry them on 'from strength to strength till every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.'

How great the blessedness of having such a Shepherd as the object of our faith and trust, and of being able to rejoice in the sense of his superintending care and unchangeable love. How precious such a persuasion to every soul of man, when truly feeling our weak and defenceless condition, even in our earthly pilgrimage, and our lost and ruined state as spiritual beings. How precious such a persuasion, founded not upon our own worthiness, but upon the Lord's faithfulness, enabling us to say with the apostle: 'I know in whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.'

How important also to consider and keep in mind the character which he himself gives of his flock, and which many, he tells us, who now appear as the sheep of his hand shall be found to want, when he shall come, as the last act of his office, to separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. This character is generally, that we welcome him as our Shepherd; that it may said of us: 'Ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned to the Shepherd of your souls,' and that we be, indeed, saying each for himself, 'I have gone astray like a lost sheep, seek thy servant;' 'Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee; and let thy judgments help me.' And it is farther, that we wait on him for all the direction which we need; that we give heed to hear his voice, and show that we know his voice, and follow him as he calleth us. So may we be warranted to say, 'The Lord is my shepherd;' and so may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, make us perfect in every good work to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

—
 TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—MORNING.

'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' Mic. vi. 8.

At no time hath God left himself without a witness, or man without a guide; and more especially in his revealed word hath he clearly shown us what is good, and as clearly charged it upon us as his will to make that good known (both its good tidings and its good counsels) to every living soul on the face of the earth. This he hath done with authority, and hath the fullest authority to do. He hath shown it, both as his sovereign will, and as our supreme good; not as a matter submitted to our choice, but as a message sent down for our obedience; not merely pointing out the good and right way, that we may walk in it if we please; but saying with authority which we must not presume to question, as well as with a regard to our good which we cannot question, 'this is the way walk ye in it.' As in himself the source of all excellence, and possessed of all power, he has an essential right to rule over all inferior natures, so that enlightened reason would make it their wisdom to learn and follow his will; but especially, as the author and upholder of their existence, he holds the most unquestionable title to their entire submission, and to their utmost service. We must feel at once, that we are not only made by him, but made for him; and that, merely as his property, it must be the grossest injustice to withhold our allegiance and obedience, in whatever he hath shown to be his will. Not only as indebted to him for our existence at first, but as dependent on him for its continuance every moment; we are made to feel his authority over us, to do with us and to direct us as he may please. As his creatures, we are always in his hands, and entirely at his disposal. Our whole existence, with every enjoyment which it brings, hangs upon his sole will and sovereign pleasure. If he hide his face, we are miserable; if he withdraw his hand, we are nothing. Vain man may indeed imagine himself to be his own master, and affect independence of his Maker, saying in his heart, or acting as if he said, 'Who is Lord over us?' But this is nothing else than the madness which is in his heart as a fallen creature; nothing better than the illusion of the maniac, who speaks of himself as a king, and tosses about the straws in his cell as his subjects.

Not only, however, hath the most high God the most rightful authority to show us his will; he hath graciously shown us 'what is good;' and his holy will, made known to us, is just the way of our own true happiness. He alone indeed hath the ability, as well as the authority, to show us what is good; as he best knows the form of being which he hath given us, and the means most conducive to its well being. We may thus be well persuaded of the suitableness of his law addressed to the children of men, merely from what we are able to discern of his wisdom and goodness in the provision which he hath made for the welfare of the several inferior creatures around us. So that whatever aspect any of his commandments may, at first sight, bear to our apprehension, it would become us to be satisfied, and to say with the apostle, that it is 'holy, just, and good.' Such indeed has been proved to be its character by the experience of mankind, by the experience both of those who have found that, in forsaking his commandments, they have forsaken their own mercies, and followed their own misery; and in the experience of those who have as convincingly found, that, in keeping his commandments, even in the degree in which they have been able to keep them, there is a great present reward. Whenever men think and feel otherwise, it is only in the enmity of the carnal mind against God, and not from any defect of goodness in his commandments. Whenever they are disposed to regard his law as over strict or spiritual, to reject that as evil which he hath shown to be good, to rebel against that as grievous which they should welcome as most gracious; it all proceeds from their own blindness and corruption, and only proves the disordered state of their fallen nature. What is sweeter than honey to man's natural sense of taste? And what is our conclusion when any man rejects it as nauseous, and declares it to be bitter? Not surely that honey has lost its savour, but that he has lost his soundness of health. Such indeed, in the case of natural objects, is his own conclusion. Of these he has knowledge sufficient to feel, that the change here is in himself, not in the honey; and so, often has he, even in his natural conscience, an apprehension of the goodness of God's law in itself—an approbation of its precepts, when observed by others in regard to himself, and a conviction that it is the best rule of duty for all men, which it would be their happiness to follow; and a general conformity to it of his own laws and regulations in society. But when charged with our duty to obey it as God's holy will, in all its spirituality and purity, in our whole heart and life; or when burdened with the fear of God's displeasure on account of our sins against it; then do we begin either to question its authority and excellence, or to substitute something else in place of this perfect obedience which it requires, and which we feel ourselves unable to render. It is to man in this state, and in danger of this error, that the words are addressed, 'he hath showed thee, O man, what is good.' It is to man awakened to some sense of his obligation, and yet of his inability, to worship and serve God—sensible of his duty to 'come before God,' sensible of the glory and majesty of 'the most high God,' sensible of his unworthiness and guiltiness in the sight of that God, as requiring some great atonement or offering on his part, wherewith he may come with acceptance; anxiously inquiring after some way of his own devising to gain that acceptance; and as in this state willing, if he could, to go beyond all ordinary acts of worship, to give all that he could be supposed to possess: thousands of burnt-sacrifices, rivers of oil-offerings, the very fruit of his body, even his first-born, 'for the sin of his soul.' To man in this state, a state to which every soul shall at last be brought, a sense of guilt and apprehension of wrath, which all shall feel when standing before his judgment-seat; to man, now trembling as a sinner, and inquiring as a suppliant, the gracious message has been given, the way of peace proclaimed. 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good;' showed this all clearly and fully in his revealed word, showed it to all to whom that word has come, and to whom it is his charge to send it; namely, to men at large, to all mankind, 'his good and acceptable and perfect will.' He hath given to them a law, which is entirely and unchangeably good, the transcript of his divine nature, the source of happiness to his rational creatures, the instrument of their sanctification as sinners, the rule of their duty to himself and to one another, the eternal law of righteousness, the essence of unceasing good, which never can be altered, and in place of which nothing can be substituted. 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good,' and nothing can ever be put in its place as good to thy soul, nor canst thou ever be set free from the love of it as the supreme good of thine own immortal nature. This is the summary and the substance of what he thus requires, requires in all its extent, requires at all times, and never can cease to require of all living souls: namely, 'to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God.' He hath showed thee, O man, how thou mayest come before him, and stand before him, and rejoice before him, even for evermore. And that not by making void what he thus requires, but by establishing it more firmly than ever as his will; not by setting thee free from the love of it, but by instilling the love of it as the very life and joy of thy soul; not by directing thee to bring any offering to stand in place of this love of it, but by providing an offering, which binds the love of it upon every heart, even by 'the Lord our righteousness,' who hath fulfilled all righteousness, and who forms all who receive him as their Lord to the love of all righteousness. 'This man,' as the prophet had already said in God's name, 'shall be the peace.' He hath made our peace by fulfilling in our stead what God requires; but now prepares us to enjoy this peace, by renewing our souls to the same love of all that God requires. He shows us what is good, and all who have learned of him, have learned, or rather are learning, to love him with their whole souls: to love what he did, to love what he now does, to love what he now is, to love to become daily more like to himself, even to him who said, 'Lo, I come, in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart.' And of all who embrace through him God's covenant of mercy, it is as expressly written in the volume of the book, 'I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts.' This then still is, and ever will be, the language of their's as his people, and as their Lord's was, 'I delight in the law of God after the inward man.' 'I will delight myself in thy commandments which I have loved.' 'O how love I thy law, it is my meditation all the day.' 'O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes!' He hath showed thee, O Christian, what is good, showed it in him who alone is good; and what doth the Lord still require of thee, or if not required, what shouldst thou require of thyself, but 'to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' not as thereby gaining thy salvation, but as thereby glorifying thy Saviour.

---

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.—EVENING.

'Without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him,' Heb. xi. 6.

NOTHING of that good which God hath showed to man can be sought, nor any part of what he requires be duly rendered, 'without faith;' without faith it is impossible to please God; nay, without faith it is impossible for any desire to please God to exist in the heart, or to continue to influence the practice, and to be carried out with any measure of perseverance. The first thought of coming to God to offer him any worship, to yield to him any obedience, or to seek from him any good, must be founded upon some principle of faith. He that cometh to God with any view of pleasing him, 'must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.' He must have some realizing sense, such as faith only can present to the mind, of God's invisible being, spiritual presence, and overruling providence. This can be maintained only by the power of faith, as the evidence of things not seen, as the eye by which we are capable of seeing him that is invisible. But, as coming to God with any view of pleasing him, there must be also a persuasion of his willingness to receive the services of creatures such as we are, and some way of their receiving a reward from his hand. This can be known only by his own declaration of his will to that effect; and this declaration from God can be apprehended only by faith as a reliance on the testimony of God, and an assent to the truths which he hath revealed—a resting both upon God's veracity in what he hath affirmed, and his faithfulness in what he hath promised.

The first inquiry in the heart of fallen man naturally is, 'wherewith shall I come before the Lord?' how much do I stand in need of his forgiveness for sins that are past, and on what ground can I hope for his mercy and favour? Or, supposing that forgiveness received, what can I be able to render as a service, with which he may be pleased? 'what shall I do to inherit eternal life;' or, supposing it revealed, as here expressed, that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him, when can I say that I have sought such a reward so diligently as I ought? The more clearly that any one discerns the excellence of the law of God as holy, just, and good, and the more deeply that he feels his obligation to obey it in thought, word, and deed, the more may he be discouraged to seek the reward of that obedience which it requires. He either contents himself with yielding a reluctant servile submission, or he renounces the task in despair as above his strength. He regards the law with enmity, as a hard service, and the lawgiver with dread, as 'a consuming fire.' Here then is the power of faith in presenting to sinful man in these circumstances, not any testimony of his pleasing God, or being able to please him by his own walking or working; but the testimony of God himself, the testimony of Jesus Christ, of a new and living way for his access to the most high God, and acceptance in his sight; nay, of a reward from his Father in heaven, 'the reward of the inheritance,' provided and promised to all them that believe his promise, and 'this is the promise that he has promised us, even eternal life.' This is the testimony which faith receives as the truth of God, and on which it rests as a warrant to seek to please God, and in which it rejoices as the assurance of a reward from the hand of God, namely, that 'God hath set forth his Son to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood; that he then declares the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God, and yet his righteousness in such remission on the ground of that propitiation; that he is thus at once 'just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.' By this faith in Jesus does the sinner receive a testimony, and rejoice in the hope that he may please God, not by any merit of that faith, or of any thing proceeding from that faith; but for the merit and through the mediation of him in whom he believes, and with whom God is ever well-pleased. There also is the testimony of Jesus himself, on which the sinner rests as his warrant to come to God; namely, that he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, 'and that him that cometh he will in no wise cast out.' Having thus come he receives farther the testimony of Jesus, how he ought to walk and to please God, and how he may find grace from God to work in him, both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Farther still, from the same testimony of Jesus, he is able to apprehend by his faith, as the substance of things hoped for, the glorious nature of this recompense of reward, laid up in store for them that love him; and so to 'press forward to the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.'

Thus does faith, looking to the power, and grace, and promises of the Redeemer, animate every soul of man with the testimony, that he may, indeed, please God, and find him a most gracious rewarder. This faith alone presents to sinful man sufficient encouragements to think of pleasing God, and in the very nature of these encouragements, the most suitable motives to please him more and more as a happy service. Looking by faith to what God is in himself, and what he hath done for us; to the infinite glories of his nature, and to the transcendent love of the Redeemer, we receive the most exalted views of our obligation to please him, and experience the most transforming influence of things not seen. Looking by faith to the things hoped for, to the reward of the inheritance, we reach the gates of the celestial city, and view by the same faith the paradise of God, and the multitude of the redeemed, and the glories of the eternal state; and are constrained to exclaim, 'Behold! what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God.' Faith thus worketh by the power of the world to come, and by the love of the Lord whom you serve. Living by this faith, we are constrained to 'count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord;' to live henceforth not unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us and rose again.' We thus learn not to calculate how little may please him, but to consider how much we may do to serve him. The law of our God and the love of our Lord will then be in our heart, and our heart's desire and prayer will be to know all that he hath showed to us to be good, and to do all that he hath declared to be his will. However high that will may be above our strength, however contrary to our natural inclinations, however opposed to our earthly interests, requiring the surrender of a 'right eye, or a right hand,' we shall nevertheless feel our duty to please him, and shall wish, not to bring it down to the level of our corruption, but to raise our souls to the purity of the heavenly precept, 'to stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.' 'Lord, increase our faith;' may it 'grow exceedingly;' may we 'look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen;' may we never cast away our confidence which hath great recompense of reward, neither may we rest satisfied with the thought of having obtained this precious faith through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; but may we 'give all diligence to add to our faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly-kindness and charity; that we may be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

---

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.—MORNING.

'To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them,' Isa. viii. 20.

HE that cometh unto God must believe that he is; and he that would please God must welcome his own instructions as to the best way of pleasing him. 'Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God;' and without such a faith as receives and rests upon that word, it is indeed impossible to please God. To that word faith must look, as the sole and supreme rule of the truths to be believed, and of the duties to be rendered. 'To the law and to the testimony.'

By these terms is the divine word very generally and very suitably denominated; 'a testimony' from God himself, pledging his own veracity in the declaration of those truths which we are concerned to believe; and 'a law' from God on high, pronouncing by his own authority those precepts which we are called to obey. Nor was this merely a voice of words spoken, to be passed from one human being to another, and preserved as they best could for their guidance; a word which might have been changed, forgotten, or lost; but 'a scripture,'—words written or recorded, to remain indelible and unaltered; always at hand to be consulted, and to be re-called again and again to remembrance. 'Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;' and not only spake, but wrote as they were com-

